ed, set forth, or known. The law required the inventors to file such written description of it, and of the manner and process of making, compounding and using it, "in such full, clear, concise and exact terms as to enable any person skilled in the art or science to which it appertains, or with which it is most nearly connected, to make, construct, compound and use the same." Act July 4, 1836, § 6, (5 Stat. 119;) Act July 8, 1870, § 26, (16 Stat. 201;) Rev. St. § 4888. This is all the law required in this behalf, and, it is shown by the testimony, both of those skilled in the art and science to which this substance appertains, and with which it is most nearly connected, and those dealing in and making practical use of it, has been done. Those wishing to use it know what to apply for to obtain it, and how to make use of it, when obtained. It is not a mere scientific abstraction, but it is an article of commerce, useful in the art of coloring, that can be bought, sold, handled and consumed. The inventors appear to have done all that could be done, and all that was required, or would be useful, in describing it.

It is insisted, that, at the time of this invention, this product was old, and as well known as it was afterwards, and that what was invented was, in reality, merely a new process of producing it. Whether the product was new with the invention, or was known before, is a question of fact, to be determined upon the evidence. Chemically pure alizarine was unquestionably well known among chemists. Madder alizarine was well known among chemists and artists in dyes. If this is the same as either, it could not be a new invention. If not the same as either, it is not claimed that it is the same as any other known thing. The chemists examined as witnesses on each side are of such eminent learning and undoubted character, that the solution of this question is not involved with such difficulties as are sometimes to be encountered in settling questions of fact. A careful examination of the testimony of Professor Chandler, a witness for the defendants, and that of President Morton and Professors Hedrick and Ordway, witnesses for the plaintiff, shows that he differs from them more about names of things, the construction of terms, and inferences to be drawn, than about the actual existence of material facts. Madder alizarine contains chemically pure alizarine, expressed by the chemical notation $C_{14}H_8O_4$. So does this product. So far the witnesses agree; and, so far as that particular ingredient is concerned, the two substances are identical. He regards that as the important thing, and the presence of the other things which each contains, as unimportant and useless, if not injurious, accidents. That other things do exist in each, as they testify, he does not deny. They say that this product contains isopurpurine, anthrapurpurine, monoxanthraquinone, and some other less important ingredients, not named, which were not only not ingredients of either pure alizarine, or madder alizarine, but were not known at all until they were brought out by this invention. He says that purpurine was discovered by Collin in 1828, and anthraquinone by Dumas and Laurent in 1832. Purpurine is chemically different from isopurpurine or anthrapurpurine, and anthraquinone from monoxanthraquinone, as here understood. He does not say that any dye stuff before that of Graebe and Liebermann ever contained isopurpurine, anthrapurpurine and monoxanthraquinone, with pure alizarine, as theirs did and does. So, upon the testimony that is not really contradictory, their product was a new composition of matter. He says these things are mere impurities, whose presence is not wanted, and which are tolerated, because it is better to endure them than removing them, and he produces exhibits to show what colors may be made upon fabrics with them and without them. The others say that they are useful coloring agents, and exhibits are produced to show that fact. From all it appears, that they are influential as coloring agents, in producing results different from those that can be produced without them. So that the product of these inventors, containing them, was not only a new composition, but a new dye stuff. That it is useful, as other coloring materials are useful, is beyond any question. From these considerations it appears that Graebe and Liebermann invented a new and useful composition of matter, for which they properly obtained their original patent, and, so far as is open to inquiry here, their reissued patent.

The claim that the defendants do not infringe rests, apparently, upon the idea, that they only use the product of a different process, and not that they do not use or vend dye stuff substantially the same as this.

The case of Badische Anilin & Soda Fabrik v. Hamilton Manuf'g Co., [Case No. 721,] in the district of Massachusetts, before the late eminent Circuit Judge Shepley, covers most of the questions made in this case, but not all of them, for, there is evidence in this case that does not appear to have been in that, and some questions are made here that do not appear to have been made there. So far as that case goes, it is an ample authority for the decision here reached; and, upon the facts found here, it goes nearly, if not quite, as far as this case does.

Let a decree be entered for the plaintiff, establishing the validity of the patent, and for an injunction and an account of profits and damages, occasioned by the infringement, according to the prayer of the bill, with costs.

BANKRUPTCY—EXEMPTIONS—STATE LAWS.

[Under Act March 3, 1873, (17 Stat. 577, c. 235,) providing that exemptions allowed bankrupts "shall be the amount allowed by the constitution and laws of each state respectively, as existing in the year 1871," where the law of a state has been changed, (Act Ohio, May 1, 1873,) so that two different statutes were in force therein at different periods of the year 1871, the state law in force at the close of that year should control all exemptions claimed in proceedings begun after that time.]

In bankruptcy.

WELKER, District Judge. This matter comes before me by exceptions of the assignee to the action of the register, in allowing the bankrupt personal property of the value of five hundred dollars, instead of a homestead. The bankrupt [Anthony Baer] was the head of a family, and not the owner of a homestead. His wife was the owner, in her own right, as her separate property, of a homestead which was occupied by the bankrupt and family as a family homestead. He claims that under the laws of Ohio he is, notwithstanding this occupancy, entitled to the exemption of personal property in lieu of a homestead. Under the laws of the state, as they existed up to the 1st day of May, 1871, the bankrupt would be allowed this exemption when not himself the owner of a homestead; but on that day the exemption law was so changed by amendment that, by reason of his wife's being the owner of a homestead in her own right, he was not entitled to claim it. The supreme court of the state, in 23 Ohio St. 603, decides that under the act of May, 1871, where the husband occupies the homestead of the wife as a family homestead, he cannot hold exempt from execution the personal property allowed by the act, in lieu of a homestead. The act of congress respecting exemptions in bankruptcy, amended in 1873, [Act March 3, 1873; 17 Stat. 577, c. 235,] provides that they "shall be the amount allowed by the constitution and laws of each state respectively as existing in the year 1871." In the year 1871, two different statutes were in force in Ohio, during two several periods of the year, one before the 1st of May, and a different one afterwards.

The question in this case is: What was the provision of the law in Ohio on that subject in the year 1871, as construed in the light of the bankrupt laws? Does it mean the law as it existed at the commencement of the year, at any time during the year, or as it was at the close of the year? It might happen in many of the states that the law might be changed several times during the year, and thus several rules adopted. If it had been intended to be the law at the commencement of the year, in order to prevent the difficulty growing out of such changes, the act of congress would, no doubt, have named the 1st of January, 1871. As it does not do so, to settle the rule, some period in the year should be adopted that would prevent the change. If the question should arise in the year 1871 it could be settled by adopting the law in force when petition in bankruptcy was filed. But in cases commenced since that year, some other construction must be given the bankrupt act as to what part of the year is to be adopted, controlling the rights of the parties. It seems to me that the law in force at the close of the year, for all exemptions claimed by bankrupts in proceedings filed after that time, should be regarded as the meaning of this provision of the bankrupt law. It can hardly be claimed that congress intended, in the act passed in 1873, to recognize as the rule of exemptions, laws that were repealed and ceased to be in force during the year 1871. If so, in states where several rules were adopted during the year, which rule is to be adopted? In this case the register adopted the law as the rule governing the right of the bankrupt, which was changed and ceased to be in force on the 1st of May, 1871. In this construction he erred, and therefore the exceptions are sustained, the allowance made by him is set aside, and the allowance refused.

Case No. 724.

BAETJER v. BORS.

[7 Ben. 280.] [1]

District Court, S. D. New York. April, 1874.

CHARTER—CLASSIFICATION OF VESSEL—PLEADING—CONTRACT AGAINST PUBLIC POLICY—DAMAGES—DEMURRAGE—SUNDAY—GOLD CONTRACT.

1. A vessel was chartered to H. B. in November, 1868, for a voyage from Philadelphia to Europe, with a cargo of petroleum oil. Before she had arrived at Philadelphia, H. B. transferred the charter, at an advance, to C. B., who agreed to perform its conditions, the agreement of transfer containing the words: "H. B. guarantees the vessel to be first class." On the 1st of April, 1869, H. B. notified C. B. that the vessel was then at Philadelphia, ready to load under the charter. The vessel at that time had no classification either in the English, French or American Lloyds. On the 6th of April, C. B. wrote to H. B. that he had found that the vessel was not first class, and that, therefore he must consider the charter cancelled. Some correspondence passed between the parties, and, on April 12th, H. B. wrote to C. B., enclosing a copy of a classification of the vessel, issued to her on April 9th, showing that she had been classed as first class by the American Lloyds, and claiming thus to have performed his guaranty. C. B. replied repeating that he considered the charter cancelled because the vessel was not first class when she was tendered to him on the 1st of April. The vessel lay out her lay days, and was then chartered by her master at a lower rate of freight than was specified in the charter. The owners of the vessel sued H. B. and obtained judgment against him for damages for not loading the vessel under the charter. H. B. thereupon filed this libel against C. B., to recover damages for his not carrying out his agreement. The libel alleged that the notice to C. B. was given on or about the 31st of March, and also that C. B., though duly requested, refused to carry out the conditions of the charter. Held, that under the agreement between H. B. and C. B., it was necessary that the vessel should be actually classified;

2. That, H. B., might, under the libel, show a tender of the vessel at any other day, within the terms of the contract, than March 31st;

3. That, as C. B., did not set up any damage resulting to him because of the vessel's not having a classification when she was tendered on the 1st of April, and was not, therefore, in any different position on April 12th, from what he was on April 1st, H. B., must be held to have fully complied with his agreement on April 12th, and C. B., was then bound to have accepted the vessel;

4. That, as C. B., absolutely refused to accept the vessel, H. B., was not bound to keep her any longer in readiness, and it was immaterial whether she remained at Philadelphia during all the lay days mentioned in the charter;

5. That, whether the assignment of the charter at an increased rate was void as against public policy or not, the respondent could not avail himself of the defense because it was not set up in the answer;

6. That, H. B., was entitled to recover the damages sustained by him, by the breach of the agreement by C. B., on the 12th of April.

7. A reference being had to compute the damages, the commissioner reported, as damages:

The difference between the amount the ship was entitled to receive and the sum for which she was afterwards chartered	£341 9 6
The libellant's profits on the assignment of the charter party	98 12 0
Five per cent. for rechartering, and three per cent. brokerage, per barrel	56 4 0
	£496 5 6
Amounting, in currency, on June 19th, 1869, to	$3,280 19
Interest thereon to date of report	1,157 57
Demurrage, 28 days, from May 22d, 1869, to June 19th, 1869	1,295 48
	$5,733 24

The respondent excepted to the report: Held, that the decree awarded to the libellant the damages sustained by him, not the damages sustained by the master or owners of the vessel;

8. That, as their interest under the charter was not directly assigned to the libellant and the libel did not allege that he had paid the judgment recovered against him by the master, or had paid anything to the master or owners on account of damages sustained by them, the item of £341 9/6 must be rejected;

9. That, as to the item of profit on the charter, it did not appear how it was arrived at, and the report must be referred back for further information on that point;

10. That the item of £56 4 must be rejected, because it was damage sustained by the master or owners of the vessel, if by any one;

11. That, as to the demurrage, the libellant was not bound to keep the vessel in readiness for the respondent after the 12th of April, and could not claim demurrage without showing due diligence thereafter in rechartering;

12. That, at any rate, too many days were allowed, as Sundays were not excepted in the calculation;

13. That, as the contracts were in gold, the report should have been in gold dollars, and not in currency;

14. That the respondent could not have an advance in the price of oil from April 1st to April 12th taken into consideration, as the libellant was not bound to tender the ship on any particular day, and the answer said nothing of any such advance.

[In admiralty. Libel by Herman Baetjer against Christian Bors to recover damages for a failure to carry out an agreement to transfer a charter party. Interlocutory decree for libellant. Respondent excepted to the commissioner's report. Report overruled in part, and referred back for further proceedings.]

W. R. Beebe and H. R. Wing, for libellant.
G. H. Forster, for respondent.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. On the 14th of November, 1868, at London, the agents of the master of the Russian barque Kaleva entered into a charter party, in writing, with the agents of Herman Baetjer, of New York, wherein the former contracted that the vessel should proceed to Philadelphia, and, after discharging her cargo, should there load, from the factors of the latter, a cargo of refined petroleum in barrels, and proceed therewith to Queenstown or Falmouth, for orders, and discharge at a port in the United Kingdom, or on the continent, between Havre and Hamburgh, on being paid, as freight, six shillings sterling per every 42 gallons gross gauge of barrels shipped, whether full, partly full, or empty; and ten per cent. additional, if ordered to the continent; and fifteen pounds sterling gratuity to the master; and, if ordered to a direct port of discharge, on signing bills of lading, the freight to be one sixpence less per barrel of petroleum; 40 running days, Sundays excepted, to be allowed for loading and discharging; the freighter to have the option of keeping the vessel ten days on demurrage, over and above the said laying days, at seven pounds sterling per day. On the 4th of January, 1869, the barque not having yet arrived at Philadelphia, Herman Baetjer, the libellant, entered into a written agreement with Christian Bors, the respondent, at New York, such agreement being signed by them and endorsed on the back of a copy of the said charter party, and being in these words: "For a proper consideration, the within charter is hereby transferred to Christian Bors, of New York, he agreeing to carry out all its conditions, and to pay H. Baetjer, or order, when vessel is loaded, the difference between the within chartered rate, and six shillings and three, if ordered from Cork to the United Kingdom, or six and nine, if ordered to the Continent, with sixpence off, if ordered to a direct port, all per 42 galls., with 5 per cent. primage. H. Baetjer agrees to pay the gratuity of (£15) fifteen pounds, and to place the vessel in one safe loading berth. H. Baetjer guarantees vessel to be first class."

The controversy in this suit arises on the foregoing last clause of this transfer of the charter party. It was at first written, before signature, thus: "H. Baetjer guarantees vessel to class 3-3 1-1." Before signature, the words "be first" were interlined between the word "to" and the word "class," and "3-3 1-1" was erased, by drawing the pen through it, but so as to be still visible. The paper was signed with such interlineation and such erasure thus visible.

The libel avers, that, the vessel having arrived at Philadelphia and discharged her cargo, the libellant was ready to place her in one safe loading berth; that the respondent, on or about the 31st of March, 1869, was notified thereof, and of her readiness to receive cargo; that the vessel continued ready to receive cargo, as required by the charter party, until after the expiration of the forty running days allowed for loading and discharging, and the ten days allowed for keeping the vessel on demurrage; that the respondent refused to load the vessel or to carry out the conditions of the charter party, and the agreement under which it was transferred to him; that, by reason thereof, the master of the vessel, after the expiration of the fifty days, was compelled to, and did, procure, at Philadelphia, a cargo for the vessel, from other parties, but at a much less rate of freight than that agreed to be paid by the terms of the charter party, with which cargo she afterwards proceeded to the continent of Europe; that, on the 31st of July, 1871, the master of the vessel, in a suit brought by him in this court, in admiralty, against the libellant in this suit, on the charter party, to recover damages for a breach of it by the libellant in this suit, such suit being brought in June, 1869, recovered a judgment against the libellant in this suit for $3,939 16 gold, and $50 currency, damages, and $151 67 costs, the respondent in this suit having been notified, at the time, of the commencement of such suit by said master, and invited to take part in defending it; that the libellant has expended, in disbursements and counsel fees in said action, $250, and has, by the refusal of the respondent to load the vessel, been otherwise damaged in the amount of $1,000; that the respondent has not paid said judgment or the damages sustained by the libellant by reason of the failure of the respondent to perform the agreement under which the charter party was transferred to him; and that the master of the vessel performed all the conditions of the charter party on his part to be performed, and the libellant performed all the conditions of the agreement by which the charter party was transferred, on his part to be performed. The libel claims to recover, as damages, $3,939 16 in gold, and $1,401 67 in currency.

The substance of the answer is, that the libellant, by the clause, in the instrument of transfer, guaranteeing the vessel to be first class, guaranteed her to be first class on either Lloyds' Register of British and Foreign Shipping (commonly called the English Lloyds), or on Bureau Veritas, Registre International de Classification de Navires, (commonly called the French Lloyds), or on the American Lloyds' Register of American and Foreign Shipping (commonly called the American Lloyds); that, on the 1st of April, 1869, when the vessel had not obtained any certificate, and was not first class, but, on the contrary, had not been classified, and had no class on said English, French or American Lloyds, the libellant informed the respondent that the vessel was at Philadelphia, ready to receive cargo, and that the lay days would commence to count from the 1st of April, 1869; and that thereupon the respondent rescinded the agreement of January 4th, 1869, by reason of the breach of it by the libellant, in that the vessel was not first class on either the English, the French or the American Lloyds, but had no class whatever.

The transfer of the charter party to the respondent does not provide that the vessel shall be tendered to the respondent at or by any particular time. Nor is it set up in defence, that there was any improper or hurtful delay in tendering her to him. The parties are agreed that the words "first class" have reference to the classing of vessels by some one of the three Lloyds referred to. The libellant contends, that the import of the agreement is, that the vessel shall be such in character, to bind the defendant to accept the tender of her, that she would, when tendered, if then offered for classing to the three Lloyds, be classed by some one of them as first class, in its mode of classing; and not that she shall, when tendered, have been, in fact, classed by some one of them, by a classing still then in force, as first class, in its mode of classing. The respondent contends for this latter construction, and, still further, that the agreement extends to requiring that the libellant shall, with the tender of the vessel, present to the respondent a certificate from some one of the three Lloyds, of a subsisting classing of the vessel by it as first class. It appears that the object of such classing of vessels by the Lloyds is, that the insurance company to which the shipper of cargo by the vessel, or her owner, applies for insurance on such cargo or vessel, may have, in the record of the vessel, by a continuing and subsisting classing of her, on the books of the particular Lloyds, evidence and a guaranty, in such examination of her as is known to be made by the competent persons conducting the Lloyds, that she is of a certain class or character. Unless the vessel is recorded on the books of the Lloyds as being classed in a continuing and subsisting class, the fact that she is in a condition to be capable of being so classed is of no value, in the premises, to the insurance company or to the person applying for insurance. The record is the thing of value. It is not reasonable to construe the agreement on the part of the libellant so as to relieve him from the duty of procuring the actual classing of the vessel and making of the record, and throwing that duty on the respondent. This is further shown by what transpired before the agreement of transfer was signed. The broker who negotiated the transfer by communicating directly with the parties, was told by the respondent that he would not take any vessel but such as was first class. Thereupon the broker, in drawing the agreement, drew it that the vessel was to class 3-3 1-1. That is a class of the French Lloyds, and is the first class therein. When the agreement, so drawn, was taken to the libellant, he informed the broker, that, although the vessel had been classed in the French Lloyds as 3-3 1-1, (and which fact he had communicated to the broker before the agreement was drawn), yet such class, being for a specified time, had expired, and all he would do would be to guarantee her to be first class. Thereupon the language was changed, as stated. I cannot but regard it as incumbent on the libellant to see that the vessel had a recorded classing as first class on the books of some one of the three Lloyds, in order to make it incumbent on the respondent to accept a tender of the vessel.

The respondent was duly notified, in writing, at New York, by the libellant, on the 1st of April, that the vessel was then at Philadelphia ready to receive cargo, and that the lay days would commence to count from that day. At that time the vessel had no recorded subsisting classing in any one of the three Lloyds. On the 6th of April, the libellant was informed by the respondent, by letter, that he had found that the vessel was not first class, and that, therefore, he must consider the charter as cancelled. On the 8th of April, the libellant informed the respondent, by letter, that the libellant adhered to his agreement guaranteeing the vessel to be first class, and would furnish evidence thereof, if required, and should consider the charter to be in full force, and added, that, while he had refused, in the instrument of transfer, to warrant the class of 3-3 1-1, he had guaranteed her to be first class, knowing of the intention of her master to have her reclassed in Philadelphia. This shows that the libellant regarded an actual classing procured by some other party than the respondent, as necessary to answer the guaranty that the vessel should be first class, and that the libellant was conscious that he had not yet fulfilled his agreement, and that he was willing to consider it a part of his agreement, to furnish, if required, evidence of such actual classing. In reply to the libellant's said letter of April 8th, the respondent informed the libellant, by letter, that he still refused to accept the charter, and had no interest in the vessel, and considered the charter cancelled, on the ground of the vessel's not being first class. In reply, the libellant on the 9th of April, informed the respondent, by letter, that, if the respondent required any certificate, proving the vessel to be first class, as guaranteed, he would furnish the same to him. In reply, the respondent, on the 9th of April, informed the libellant, by letter, that, from the libellant's said letter of the 9th of April, he, the respondent must conclude that the vessel had a certificate of first class, when tendered to him ready for loading, on the 1st of April, and that, if the libellant could produce such certificate from one of the three Lloyds, not later than April 1st, he, the respondent, wished it to be sent to him, for inspection. In reply, the libellant, on the 10th of April, informed the respondent, by letter, that he had sent to Philadelphia for a copy of a certificate of classification, which was in the hands of the master of the vessel, and would transmit it to the respondent as soon as it should be received, and that, when he guaranteed the vessel to be first class, he was satisfied he should be able, at any time, when called upon, to prove his words by actual facts. On the 12th of April, the libellant wrote to the respondent thus: "In conformity with my note to you of the 10th inst., I now beg to hand you enclosed a copy of certificate of the Russian bark Kaleva's classification, rating A 1½, thereby verifying my guaranty, as per endorsement on charter party, since you have called upon me * * * to furnish the same." In reply, the respondent, on the same day, wrote to the libellant thus: "I received your letter of this day with enclosed certificate, which now is of no interest to me, as I informed you a week ago that I consider the charter of bark Kaleva cancelled, you being unable to furnish me with proofs of her being first class when the vessel was tendered to me April 1st, and you certainly could not expect me to wait twelve days before it would be decided if she would get a first class certificate or not." In reply, the libellant, on the 13th of April, informed the respondent, by letter, that he considered the charter of the vessel transferred to the respondent in full force, and should hold the respondent to the fulfilment of the same.

The certificate of classification which the libellant sent to the respondent on the 12th of April, was a certificate dated at Philadelphia, April 9th, 1869, issued by the American Lloyds, certifying that the bark Kaleva had been duly surveyed by a surveyor of the Society of American Lloyds, and found in good order and fit to carry dry and perishable goods, and would be entered in the American Lloyds' books, and classed A 1½ for one year from the date of survey. The date of the survey was April 9th, 1869, or a day or two before. It is shown that a vessel classed A 1½ in the American Lloyds is first class. The vessel remained at Philadelphia for fifty days after the 1st of April, and then her master chartered her to take a cargo of petroleum in barrels from Philadelphia to Cronstadt, at a rate of freight from one shilling and nine pence to two shillings per barrel less than the rate specified in the charter party. She arrived safely at Cronstadt with her cargo.

The theory of the answer is, that, as the vessel had no first-class certificate on the 1st of April, when the libellant tendered the vessel, the respondent could and did rescind the agreement. It is true, that the libel avers that the notice to the respondent was given on or about the 31st of March, but it also avers that the respondent, although duly notified and requested, refused to carry out the conditions of the charter party or of the agreement of transfer. Under the libel, I think the libellant may show a tender of the vessel at any other day within the terms of the contract. As before remarked, no particular day is specified or limited by the contract; and the answer sets up no damage to the respondent by reason of his supplying the place of this vessel with another one, because of the failure of the libellant to have a recorded classing of the vessel on and by the 1st of April, when the tender was received, or any other damage to the respondent resulting from such failure, so as to show that the position of the defendant was different, by reason of such failure, on the 12th of April from what it was on the 1st of April, nor is there any evidence tending to show any such fact. On the whole case, I think it must be held that the libellant did not comply with his agreement until the 12th of April, when he sent the certificate to the respondent, but that he did fully comply with it on the 12th of April, and that the respondent was then bound to accept the vessel. As the respondent then absolutely refused to accept the vessel, the libellant was not bound to keep her longer in readiness, so that it is immaterial whether or not she remained at Philadelphia, ready for the respondent, for fifty days from the 12th of April.

It is urged, that the notice to the respondent was not a tender of the vessel, that the libellant did not place the vessel in a loading berth, and that the libellant did not pay the gratuity to the master. It was sufficient, the vessel being at Philadelphia, for the libellant to notify the respondent of that fact, and of the readiness of the vessel to receive cargo, and it was then for the respondent to designate the loading berth, and the libellant would then have been bound to put the vessel there, if it was a safe one. As to the gratuity, the libellant only relieved the respondent from paying it. The objection taken by the respondent, in the correspondence, concerned only the classing of the vessel, and no other objection was specified; and, when the difficulty as to the classing was remedied, the original notice remained and became operative as a tender on the 12th of April, in connection with the sending of the certificate and the insisting by the libellant on the continuance of the respondent's obligation.

As to the objection, that the assignment of the charter party at an advance on the charter rate was void, as against public policy, it is sufficient to say that the answer does not take that defence. Independently of this, I am not prepared to hold that such a contract as this, assigning a charter party, has about it any element of invalidity. See Story, Cont. (3d Ed.) § 547.

The libellant is entitled to an interlocutory decree, that he recover the damages sustained by him by the breach, by the respondent, of the agreement of January 4th, 1869, as a breach committed by him on and from the 12th of April, 1869, such damages to be ascertained by a reference. No directions are given as to the rule of damages, as it was not discussed at the trial. All other questions are reserved until the coming in of the report.

The reference ordered was thereafter held, and the commissioner reported as follows: "The original charter, with the assignment thereon, shows that the ship was to receive six shillings sterling for each cask of forty-two gallons, and, by the terms of the decision, the lay days were to commence on the 12th of April, 1869, and, by the terms of the charter party, 40 lay days expired on the 22d day of May, 1869.

Total	$5,733 24."

To this report the respondent excepted, in ten exceptions:

1. That the commissioner adopted an erroneous measure of damages, in that he allowed to the libellant not merely the damages sustained by him by the breach, by the respondent, of the agreement of January 4th, 1869, as a breach committed by him on and from the 12th of April, 1869, but other large sums for items of damages not sustained by the libellant.

2. That the commissioner allowed to the libellant the difference between the amount the ship was entitled to receive from the libellant, and the sum for which she was rechartered May 29th, 1869, at which date the market price for charters had fallen to four shillings and three pence (at which rate per barrel she was then rechartered) from five shillings and sixpence, which was the rate on April 12th, 1869.

3. That the commissioner allowed to the libellant, as profit on the assignment of the charter party, £98 12 sterling, when the amount of such profit, after deduction of the gratuity of £15, which the libellant agreed to pay, was only £28 2 6 sterling.

4. That the commissioner allowed to the libellant 5 per cent. for rechartering, and 3 per cent. brokerage per barrel, £56 4 0.

5. That the commissioner allowed to the libellant, in currency, June 19th, 1869, $3,280 19, when he should not have allowed him any greater sum than $137 50, in gold coin.

6. That the commissioner allowed for interest from June 19th, 1869, to July 4th, 1874, $1,157 57, when he should not have allowed any greater sum than $41 59, in gold coin.

7. That the commissioner allowed to the libellant demurrage.

8. That the commissioner allowed to the libellant, in the item of difference, £341 9 6, the sum of £241 13 11, which arose from the decline in the rate of petroleum charters from April 13th, 1869, to May 29th, 1869, and allowed, in the 28 days' demurrage, for 21 days after the vessel was rechartered, and while she was loading under such recharter.

9. That the commissioner erred in the computation of the difference between what the ship was entitled to receive and what she was afterwards rechartered for, and in the computation of the libellant's profit on the assignment of the charter party.

10. That the commissioner should have considered the consequences to the respondent by reason of the failure of the libellant to perform his guaranty until the 12th of April, 1869, in the advance in the price of oil from April 1st to April 12th, 1¾ cents per gallon, whereby it would have cost the respondent $3,600 more to purchase cargo for the Kaleva on the 12th of April than on the 1st of April.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. The interlocutory decree was, that the libellant recover the damages sustained by him by the breach, by the respondent, of the agreement of January 4th, 1869, as a breach committed by him on and from the 12th or April, 1869. It did not award to the libellant a recovery for the damages sustained by the master or owners of the vessel by such breach. Their interest under the charter party was not directly assigned to the libellant, nor was it assigned to him indirectly, by the libellant's having paid the judgment recovered against him by the master of the vessel for breach of the charter party. The libel, after averring that the respondent refused to carry out the conditions of the charter party, and of the agreement under which it was transferred to him, avers, as damages, that, by reason thereof, the master of the vessel was compelled to procure a cargo at less freight than that agreed to be paid by the terms of the charter party, and that such master recovered a judgment against the libellant for a breach of the charter party by the libellant, and that the libellant expended money in such suit, and had, by the refusal of the respondent to load the vessel, been otherwise damaged. The libel does not aver that the libellant has paid the judgment, or has paid anything to the master or owners of the vessel on account of any damages sustained by them. The libellant, therefore, has sustained no damages in respect of any difference between any amount the vessel was entitled to receive and any sum for which she was afterwards rechartered. The report does not state what amount the ship was entitled to receive. The charter party fixes the freight at so much per barrel, but does not specify the number of barrels, and the report does not state what number of barrels is taken as the basis of the calculation. Nor does the report state for what sum the vessel was afterwards chartered. But this becomes immaterial, as the whole item of £341 9 6 must be rejected.

The item of £56 4 0 must be rejected. The report does not state how it is made up, or how much the item for rechartering is, or on what sum the percentage for rechartering is calculated, or on how many barrels the brokerage is calculated. I infer that there is a mistake in calling this brokerage a percentage per barrel. It ought probably to be so many cents brokerage per barrel. But the libellant does not aver in his libel, or show, that he has paid the item, or any part of it. It is an item of damage sustained by the master or owners of the vessel, if by any one. For the same reason, the item for demurrage must be disallowed.

As to the demurrage, as the libellant was not bound to keep the vessel in readiness for the respondent, after his refusal, on the 12th of April, to accept her, so, as against the respondent, the libellant and the master of the vessel were bound to use all diligence in rechartering the vessel, and could in no event claim demurrage without showing such diligence and inability to charter the vessel. In any event, too many days were allowed, as Sundays were not excepted in the calculation in the report.

Of course, the calculation of interest in the report is erroneous; and, as the contracts were payable in gold, the report should have been for a sum in gold dollars, and not for a sum in currency.

There remains the item of £98 12 0 allowed in the report as profit on the assignment of the charter party.

How that item is made up does not appear. It is probably intended to be the difference, at so much per barrel on a given number of barrels, between the chartered rate and a rate deduced from the agreement of January 4th, 1869. Whatever the proper sum for such profit may be, the £15 gratuity, for the reasons before given, should not be deducted from it. But it is impossible to make any decision as to the item until the report states how the item is arrived at.

The respondent, instead of excepting to the report, should have moved to send it back for ambiguity and uncertainty and insufficiency.

As to the 10th exception, the advance in the price of oil is not an element in the case, as the libellant was not bound to tender the vessel at any particular time, and the answer says nothing about any advance in oil.

The report is referred back for further proceedings in conformity with this decision.

UNITED STATES MARSHALS — DEPUTIES — LIABILITIES—ATTACHMENT OF DEPUTY.

1. Where a deputy marshal receives money on a judgment, after he has returned the execution, he may be attached, on a neglect to pay over the amount in pursuance of the order of the court.

2. The marshal is responsible for the acts of his deputy, done in the line of his duty. But when the deputy does not so act, the marshal is not responsible.

[Cited in The Laurens, Case No. 8,122.]

3. The deputy is an officer of the court, and may be held responsible as such.

[At law. Action by Bagley against Yates and Prentiss. Judgment for plaintiff. Heard on plaintiff's motion to attach Alexander H. Stowell, deputy marshal, for retaining certain moneys received on execution. Attachment granted.]

Mr. Seaman, for plaintiff.

Mr. Abbott, for defendants.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This is a motion for an attachment against Alexander H. Stowell, deputy of the late marshal, Conrad Ten Eyck. The affidavits showed that the judgment in the above case was rendered in November, 1838, for $832 50 damages, besides costs. That execution was issued the 23d November, 1838, which was delivered to Stowell, as deputy marshal. That said Stowell collected of the defendants $80, January 3, 1839; $200, 28th February, 1839, and paid over to the plaintiff's attorney, $247, and afterwards returned the execution, made on the execution $247, and paid the same to the plaintiff. After the return of the execution, he received and receipted for $519 75, some of which he paid over to the plaintiff, but retained a part in his own hands, after deducting his fees. The marshal is authorised by statute, to appoint one or more deputies, who are required to take an oath of office, and they are recognised as officers of the circuit and district courts, and liable to be removed by them. It is objected that this proceeding should be had against the marshal, who is responsible for the acts of his deputies.

The marshal is responsible for the acts of his deputies, while acting in the line of their duty, but beyond this he is not responsible. In the case before us, the deputy received the principal part of the money after the return of the execution, when he had no authority to receive it, a part of which has not been paid over. For this act the marshal cannot be held responsible. The deputy is an officer of the court, and is subject to its power as such. He has been ordered to pay over the money in his hands, in the above case, which he has not done. And the question is, whether he is not liable to be attached for the disobedience. The deputy acts in the name of the principal, and it is contended he is not liable to be sued by the plaintiff, whose money he collects on execution. In such case, the principal or his deputy is liable, at the option of the plaintiff. Certainly the plaintiff is not bound to look to the deputy, but may proceed against his principal. But, as before remarked, he cannot take this course where the acts of the deputy, complained of, were not done in the line of his duty.[2] Having received the plaintiff's money, under the pretence of an authority, by virtue of his office, he is responsible to them. The payment by the defendant, to the deputy, not being authorised, did not discharge him, but having received money on account of the plaintiffs, they may compel him to pay it over to them. And, as he acted under the assumed authority of the process of this court, he must be held responsible in this mode of proceeding.

It would be disreputable to the court, and to the institutions of justice, if in such a case, the court should not afford a summary remedy against one of its officers. In the case of U. S. v. Mann, [Case No. 15,716,] the chief justice held, that a deputy marshal might be attached for not paying over moneys collected by him. If a deputy marshal, clerk or attorney, receive in such capacity, money which he refuses to pay over on the order of the court, he may be attached. An attachment is grantable against an officer of the court, where he misdemeans himself in office. 1 Bac. Abr. "Attachment A."

The court grant the attachment.

[2] NOTE, [from original report.] It is laid down in Knowlton v. Bartlett, 1 Pick. 271; Marshall v. Hosmer, 4 Mass. 60; Bond v. Ward, 7 Mass. 123; and in other cases decided in Massachusetts, that the sheriff is liable for the acts of his deputy done under color of office, whenever the deputy would be liable for the same acts. We are not prepared to admit this doctrine to the extent as laid down; but if it were admitted, it does not affect the personal liability of the deputy.

BANKRUPTCY—VOLUNTARY PETITION — CONCEALMENT OF PROPERTY—EVIDENCE.

[1. To defeat a voluntary petition to be declared a bankrupt, under Act Aug. 19, 1841, (5 Stat. 440, c. 9,) creditors must prove that the petitioner had property at the time of his application which he knowingly and intentionally omitted to state in his inventory.]

[2. Evidence that the bankrupt had earned and possessed property in past years is not sufficient to support the objection to his petition, or to cast on the bankrupt the onus of accounting for it, unless it is also shown that he had property at or near the time of his alleged insolvency.]

[3. A want of providence in the management of property, or a refusal to appropriate it to the payment of debts, or even proof that it was dissipated or squandered dishonestly, does not afford a bar to a petition under the bankruptcy act of August 19, 1841, (5 Stat. 440, c. 9.)]

[4. The purchase of the bankrupt's furniture by his son-in-law at an execution sale, though the goods were subsequently left in the possession of the bankrupt's family, (but not remaining with him at the time of his application,) and the purchase of his real estate at a mortgage sale by another son-in-law, do not afford presumptive evidence of an ownership remaining in the bankrupt, which would require him to account for the property in his schedules, under Act Aug. 19, 1841, (5 Stat. 440, c. 9.)]

In bankruptcy. This was an opposition by the creditors of John Bailey (who had petitioned for a decree in bankruptcy, [under Act Aug. 19, 1841, 5 Stat. 440, c. 9] on the report of the commissioner, to whom the case had been referred, showing cause against the petitioner being declared a bankrupt. The evidence went into the dealings and transactions of the petitioner from the year 1820 to the present time, but no particular specific fraud or concealment of property appeared to be made out. [Objections disallowed.]

Mr. Monell, for creditors.
Mr. Jansen, for bankrupt.

BETTS, District Judge. The question whether the petitioner shall be deemed a bankrupt comes upon objections filed by his creditors, and the report of the commissioner of the proofs thereon. A wide extent of proof has been allowed the creditors, and the general bearing of it as a whole seems to be, that the petitioner has, since the year 1820, been in possession of property, or entitled to receive it, which is not clearly accounted for by him. Admitting the inference is supported by the facts in evidence, that the appreciation of real estate purchased in Goshen by the petitioner, the profits of his various copartnerships, his rents, the monies retained by him on loan, &c., placed at his disposal an amount of money greatly beyond what he has shown to have been expended or appropriated by him, it by no means follows that such inference supports the objections taken in this case. The petition was filed on the first of March last, and the question at issue accordingly is, whether the petitioner set forth a true account of the property, rights and credits belonging to him at that time. He asserts that he has done so. This the creditors deny, and undertake to establish their allegation by proof. The pertinency and effect of the evidence to maintain this point on their part is, therefore, the essential subject for consideration. It is obvious, however, that, as the periods compared recede in point of time, the force of the presumption weakens so as to become exceedingly feeble, and even amounts to no evidence at all unless supported by corroborative circumstances.

In the case before the court, proof that the petitioner had $1,000 in cash on the first of February or first of January, 1842, would import that it remained his on the first of March, unless some clear explanation of its disposition was furnished. But evidence that such amount went into his hands in 1826, would be but an exceedingly slight ground for inferring that he had it in 1842, in the absence of any statement of his denying its possession, and would raise no suspicion in impeachment of his oath upon the subject.

Two or three other general features of the case will be adverted to as illustrative of the doctrine upon which this decision will be grounded.

The creditors undertake to trace the circumstances and course of business of the bankrupt for twenty years and more, from his removal to Goshen, in the year 1820, with his family, where he commenced the grocery business with a capital of $500, and household furniture worth about $200, through his various employments as merchant by himself and in partnerships; as tavern-keeper; keeper of the county gaol; butcher, and clerk in a store, and though, during the running of this period of time, and in his shifting avocations, it is in proof that money had been earned and property acquired by him, which sums up in the aggregate to a considerable amount; and, although his own statement of his affairs, and the receipts and expenditures of monies be admitted loose and unsatisfactory as a matter of debit and credit or strict accounting, yet his income and means are not shown to be of a magnitude that they might not, in that long period of time, have been absorbed in the ordinary expenses of a family, or be lost through his own improvidence or prodigality without exciting special remark or notice. Furthermore, it does not appear upon the proofs, the bankrupt was ever regarded a man of affluence, nor is there evidence of any clear investment of property by him whilst he so continued in business.

On the contrary, the general complexion of the evidence denotes that his circumstances must have been during the time rather straitened and embarrassed; for his real estate was placed under mortgages, and was ultimately sold on their foreclosure, and judgments were at times obtained against him, on one of which his personal effects were ultimately all sold.

The most the whole of this description of proof makes out, in my judgment, is, that the bankrupt was placed in circumstances where, by prudence and good judgment, he might have secured property to himself; but it failed to prove he ever acquired means which placed him independent of his debts and liabilities. But, taking the view of the proofs urged on the part of the creditors, that they show the bankrupt realized several thousands of dollars from the profits of his various businesses, this fact will in no way support the objections, unless the right to such property is shown to have continued with him at the period of this application. If it has been squandered by extravagant living, or dissipated by improvident management, or some supposition of an opprobrious character be involved in its disappearance, no such circumstances would support the objections. The act demands of the bankrupt the surrender of the property actually his when he presents his petition, but holds him to no accountability for past improvidence or vice in the disposition of his estate. The creditors, in resisting his prayer for a discharge, take upon themselves to prove he has not produced and surrendered all his property—that there is property still at his command, or in which he has a subsisting equity.

The testimony very clearly shows, that at least when the bankrupt left Goshen and removed to Middleton, he had been, by various proceedings at law and equity, stripped of all the property he was known to possess. It is thought there are badges of fraud discerned in those proceedings, because one of his sons-in-law purchased his personal property at a sheriff's sale, and another acquired a portion of his real estate from the mortgagee who had bid it in on a mortgage sale. To give any significance to these imputations of fraudulent contrivance, it is necessary that the right of property should have been left in the bankrupt after the sale as it was before; that he should have advanced the money to make the purchases, or that a possession should have been allowed him, which might be regarded a fraud on creditors. No rule of law or equity inhibits the purchase of a father-in-law's property at public sale by his son-in-law, the relationship only availing to help out or give point to proofs of mala fides in the transaction. There is no such proof in this case to be helped by the presumption or suspicion. The bankrupt had ceased to have any possession of the personal property for more than a year before his application under the act, and the testimony is direct and positive that he retained no interest whatever in the real estate after the foreclosure of the mortgage and sale under it. It is not intended to assert that this is a plain case of open and ingenuous proceeding in all respects on the part of the bankrupt. There are doubtless many matters disclosed by the proofs that give occasion to doubt whether he had dealt with entire fairness towards his creditors while he was in credit and had command of means which might have been applied in part to their benefit, and the want of plain and full accounts of his business transactions, not only tends to embarrass inquiry into the state of his affairs, but is calculated to awake suspicion that there is an intentional concealment of facts which would operate to his prejudice.

Be the effects of these investigations what they may upon the general correctness or integrity of the bankrupt's dealings, I think the evidence as it stands will justly admit of only one conclusion bearing on the issue now to be decided, and that is, that it does not show the bankrupt to have had property of any kind at the time this petition was filed. Admitting there are circumstances brought to light in the review of the bankrupt's affairs, which might most naturally excite suspicion in minds of his creditors, I should still do injustice to my own impressions, deduced from the testimony, if I did not add that I discover no deficiency in his means that might not be readily accounted for from ungainful adventures in business—an expenditure in living fully up to, if not above, his income, and losses in his bad speculation in Middleton. It is not however of moment now to adjust the weight of evidence applicable to either of these hypotheses; the point submitted upon these objections is disposed of by pronouncing that the creditors have failed to sustain them by proof. It is accordingly ordered, that the objections be disallowed, and the petitioner have leave to put his case on the docket, and move for a decree of bankruptcy.

BANKRUPTCY—AFFIDAVIT TO SCHEDULE—POWERS OF NOTARY.

[Though Rev. St. § 5017, requires the schedule of a bankrupt to be verified by oath before a district judge, register, or commissioner, a verification before a notary is sufficient, under Act Aug. 15, 1876, (19 Stat. 206, c. 304,) empowering notaries to take affidavits in the same manner and with the same effect as commissioners.]

In bankruptcy.

Petition by creditors of the bankrupt setting forth that the schedules filed by Bailey were not properly verified, because they were not sworn before the district judge, or a register, or a commissioner, but before a notary public, and asking that an order might be entered requiring Bailey to verify the schedules according to law.

F. Dabney, for petitioning creditors.

H. W. Suter, for bankrupt.

W. E. L. Dillaway, for creditors against the petition.

LOWELL, District Judge. This petition is denied, because the statute of 15th August, 1876, (19 Stat. 206, c. 304,) gives authority to notaries public to take depositions and do all other acts in relation to taking testimony to be used in the courts of the United States, and to take acknowledgments and affidavits in the same manner and with the same effect as commissioners of the circuit court. Rev. St. § 5017, requires the schedule and inventory to be verified by the oath of the petitioner before a district judge, register, or commissioner; and section 5110 says that no discharge shall be granted to a bankrupt if he has willfully sworn falsely in his affidavit annexed to his schedule or inventory; showing, conclusively, that this verification is an affidavit, which is the only point on which a doubt occurs to me. Petition denied.

District Court, D. Oregon. June 1, 1872.

"ARMIES" OF THE UNITED STATES DOES NOT INCLUDE MARINES—ACT JULY 17, 1862.

The word "armies," as used in the acts of congress, and particularly in section 21 of the act of July 17, 1862, (12 Stat. 597,) [admitting to citizenship aliens enlisted in the armies of the United States upon proof of one year's residence, and without previous declaration of intention,] does not include "marines."

[In the matter of Robert Bailey's application for naturalization. Denied.]

Section 21 of the act of July 17, 1862, (12 Stat. 597,) provides: "That any alien, of the age of twenty-one years and upwards, who has enlisted or shall enlist in the armies of the United States, either the regular or volunteer forces, and has been or shall be hereafter honorably discharged, may be admitted to become a citizen of the United States, upon his petition, without any previous declaration of his intention to become a citizen of the United States, and that he shall not be required to prove more than one year's residence within the United States, previous to his application to become such citizen; and that the court admitting such alien, shall, in addition to such proof of residence and good moral character as is now provided by law, be satisfied by competent proof of such person having been honorably discharged from the service of the United States as aforesaid."

"On May 6, 1872, Robert Bailey presented his petition in this court praying to be admitted to become a citizen of the United States, under said section. The evidence produced upon the hearing of the petition satisfactorily showed that the petitioner was born in England more than twenty-one years prior to the application, and that on May 14, 1866, he enlisted in the marine corps of the United States, from which he was honorably discharged on May 14, 1870, and that he was otherwise qualified to be admitted to citizenship under said section."

The court being in doubt whether the petitioner's case came within the statute, the matter was continued for advisement.

DEADY, District Judge. The case turns upon the question, does the phrase "armies of the United States" include "the marine corps" of the United States?

The matter was submitted by the petitioner without argument, and I have not been able to find any direct authority upon the question. It may be admitted that the word armies or army, in its unlimited and most general sense, might be taken to include all the organized and armed power of the republic—its fighting forces, whether operating on sea or land, or both. But such does not seem to be the sense in which it has been used in prior acts of congress. The constitution, (article 2, § 2,) in providing that "the president shall be commander-in-chief of the army and navy of the United States," recognizes them as different and distinct bodies or organizations. For some years after the organization of the government, the term "army" was not used in the legislation of congress. At the first session of congress, after the adoption of the constitution, congress passed an act "to adapt to the constitution of the United States the establishment of troops," raised under the resolution of the continental congress of October 3, 1787, (1 Stat. 95.) This was the nucleus of the present army of the United States. No mention is made in the act of seamen or marines, and at the time, the United States had neither a navy nor a marine corps. The act does not use the term "army," but describes the force as "troops in the service of the United States," and the organization as an "establishment."

This act was superseded by the "act for regulating the military establishment of the United States," passed April 30, 1790, (1 Stat. 119,) which provided that "1216 non-commissioned officers, privates and musicians" should be "raised for the service of the United States," and that with their officers they should be "formed into a regiment of infantry, to consist of three battalions and one battalion of artillery." This act was followed by the acts of March 3, 1791, (1 Stat. 222;) March 5, 1792, (1 Stat. 241;) March 28, 1792, (1 Stat. 246;) June 7, 1794, (1 Stat. 390;) all of which are entitled acts to fix the military establishment of the United States or to provide for protecting its frontiers. They all describe land forces as infantry and artillery, but are silent on the subject of the navy or marine corps. In section two of the last named one the word army is used for the first time. It declares that the pay of the "army" shall not be in arrears more than two months.

These were followed by the acts of March 3, 1795, (1 Stat. 430,) and of May 30, 1796, (1 Stat. 483,) both of which are entitled as acts concerning "the military establishment of the United States" and provided exclusively for land forces. Then came the act of April 27, 1798, (1 Stat. 552,) providing for an additional regiment of "artillerists and engineers." Next came the act of May 28, 1798, (1 Stat. 558,) which authorized the president "to raise a provisional army," and provides for the appointment of a lieutenant-general, who "may be authorized to command the armies of the United States." The act of March 2, 1799, (1 Stat. 725,) authorized the president "to augment the army." The act of March 3, 1799, (1 Stat. 749,) provides "for the better organizing of the troops of the United States." It uses the word army frequently, and provides (section 9) that a commander of the army shall be appointed and commissioned by the style of "general of the armies of the United States."

None of these acts contain any direct provision concerning seamen or marines, nor do the words army or armies as used therein appear to include in any instance persons serving in the navy or marine corps.

The first act for the establishment of the navy of the United States, was passed March 27, 1794, (1 Stat. 350,) and is entitled "an act to provide a naval armament." By this act the marines were constituted an integral part of the navy—each vessel having as a part of her officers and crew one lieutenant and a certain number of marines. The marines continued upon this footing until the passage of the act of July 11, 1798, (1 Stat. 594,) entitled "an act for the establishing and organizing a marine corps." This act provided for the organization, "in addition" to the then "military establishment," of a separate "corps of marines." The "companies or detachments" of this "corps" were to serve on the "armed vessels" of the United States, "in lieu of the quotas of marines" previously provided. This corps was made "liable to do duty in the forts and garrisons on the sea cost, or any other duty on shore," as the president might direct; and was to be governed by "the rules and articles of war, prescribed for the military establishment of the United States," and "the rules for the regulation of the navy * * * according to the nature of the service" in which they might be employed.

In the case of U. S. v. Freeman, 3 How. [44 U. S.] 564, it was held that although the marine corps was declared by the act of July 11, 1798, (supra,) to be an addition to the military establishment of the United States, yet the officers of the marine corps were not, therefore, included in the phrase "officers of the army."

In Wilkes v. Dinsman, 7 How. [48 U. S.] 125, it was held that prior to the act of 1798 the marines were a part of the crew of a vessel of the navy, and that ever since they have been associated with the navy, except when specially detailed by the president for service with the army; and that they were to be considered as embraced "in the spirit of the act of 1837 by the description of persons 'enlisted for the navy.'"

By the act of February 11, 1847, (9 Stat. 125,) congress provided that each officer and private "enlisted or to be enlisted in the regular army or regularly mustered in any volunteer company for a period not less than twelve months, who has served or may serve during the present war with Mexico," etc., should receive certain bounty land. I have not been able to find any decision or ruling as to whether this description of persons included marines or not. But it would appear, that although two battalions of the corps served with the army on land from Vera Cruz to the city of Mexico they were not considered as embraced in the description of persons—officers and privates of the army, and therefore, congress by joint resolution of August 10, 1848, (9 Stat. 340,) declared that the officers and privates "of the marine corps who had served with the army in the war with Mexico" should "be placed in all respects as to bounty land * * * on a footing with the officers and privates of the army."

So the act of September 28, 1850, (9 Stat. 520,) which gave certain lands as a bounty to the officers and privates "who performed military service in any regiment, company or detachment in the service of the United States," in certain wars, appears not to have been considered sufficient to describe seamen or marines, and accordingly congress by the act of March 3, 1855, (10 Stat. 101,) gave a similar bounty to the officers and privates of the navy and marines.

Is there anything in the matter of the act of 1862, or the circumstances under which it was enacted, to require or authorize the court to give the word army or armies a broader or different signification than appears to have been given to it in the instances above cited?

And first, the act was passed early in the progress of the late civil war, which in the main was a conflict upon land. It offered the boon or privilege of American citizenship to any person who would honorably serve in the armies of the United States, upon only one year's residence in the country, and otherwise upon terms more favorable than it was offered to others.

The object of the provision is apparent. The government was endeavoring to raise large bodies of troops to carry on a gigantic war upon land, and this was a means to aid in accomplishing that end—to induce aliens to enlist in the armies of the United States. By the act of July --, -061, (11 Stat. 318,) the maximum of the marine corps was fixed at 2,500 privates. It is not reasonable to suppose that congress would resort to this extraordinary means to keep up a marine corps of only 2,500 men, particularly when it is remembered that persons serving in that corps were by law entitled to the extraordinary privilege of prize money.

No alien has a right to become an American citizen, except upon such terms and conditions as congress, in legislating for the common weal, may prescribe. The act under consideration entitles persons who may honorably serve in the armies of the United States, to this high privilege, and the court is not authorized to enlarge it, by construction, so as to include a class of persons, who do not appear to be within its spirit or letter.

The term army or armies has never been used by congress, so far as I am advised, so as to include the navy or marines, and there is nothing in the act of 1862, or the circumstances which led to its passage, to warrant the conclusion that it was used therein in any other than its long established and ordinary sense—the land force, as distinguished from the navy and marines.

On a former occasion, this court decided orally, that a seaman was not within the provision of this act. Upon further and careful examination of the subject, I am unable to find any substantial reason for concluding that there is any difference in this respect between a seaman and a marine, or that persons who have served as either are to be regarded as having served in the armies of the United States, within the ordinary and long established meaning of that term. And if I am mistaken in this conclusion, the petitioner is not without remedy. Congress, if it sees proper, may extend the act of 1862, to marines by name, as it did the bounty land acts of February 11, 1847, and September 28, 1850.

BANKRUPTCY—COMPOSITION—AUTHORITY OF CHILDREN AND MARRIED WOMEN TO VOTE FOR—RATIFICATION BY HUSBAND — DAMAGES AGAINST BANKRUPT FOR TORT.

1. One of the members of a bankrupt firm had been the guardian of his own children. The firm was indebted to the children in a large sum, for which the guardian held its notes, payable to himself as guardian, but not indorsed by him to his wards. Under these circumstances, held, that the children, having become sui juris, were competent to vote as creditors of the firm in favor of a composition proposed by it.

2. One of the said children, being a married woman, voted for and signed the resolution for the composition without producing the authority of her husband therefor; but the husband afterwards made and filed an affidavit that he had given her his authority, and that her vote had his approval. Held, that such affidavit was both a ratification and estoppel, and made good the wife's act.

3. Damages for a tort are not provable against a bankrupt's estate until they have been assessed.

4. Unliquidated damages for a tort placed by the bankrupts on their schedule, but denied by them to be a valid claim, were properly excluded from the debts of the bankrupt estate, when it was to be ascertained whether creditors holding one-half the debts had assented to a proposed composition.

[In bankruptcy. Petition of J. M. & J. Lockhart and Paul Fourchy for review, asking that the decree of the district court confirming the composition made by the bankrupts G. M. Bailey and Pond with their creditors be set aside. Decree affirmed.]

John E. Austin, for petitioners.

John H. Kennard, W. W. Howe, and S. S. Prentiss, contra.

BRADLEY, Circuit Justice. The petition of review in this case asks the court to set aside a decree of the district court, [unreported,] made May 2, 1876, confirming a composition made by the bankrupts with their creditors, under Rev. St. § 5103, and the act of 1874, and directing the resolution of composition to be recorded.

The errors assigned are, that the district court allowed to stand votes amounting in the aggregate to about $45,000, by the three children of G. M. Bailey, one of the bankrupts, and struck out a claim for damages for $30,000, which had been placed on the schedule by the bankrupts, thus increasing the vote in favor of the composition by three names and $45,000 in amount, and diminishing the amount of the entire indebtedness by one name and $30,000 in amount, which changed the result. There is no charge that the amount voted on by the children was not due to them; but it is alleged that the claim was mostly secured by notes of the bankrupts, given therefor, payable to the order of the said G. M. Bailey, guardian, and not indorsed by him to the children. But if they are sui juris and competent to act in their own behalf, I do not see why this fact should prevent them from agreeing to the compromise. They proved their debts regularly, and were entitled to the privileges of creditors. The presumption is, that they were entitled to demand the notes from their father at any time. He holds them merely for their benefit, and if the compromise stands, the claims of the children against the bankrupt firm, whether represented by the notes or not, will be discharged the same as the claims of other creditors. They stand in all respects on an equality with the other creditors. But it is said that one of the children is a married woman, and voted and signed the resolution without authority of her husband. If she actually had such authority, whether it was exhibited or not, her act would be binding on her and on him. Since this petition has been pending, her husband has made and filed an affidavit in this court that she had his full authority for what she did, and that her votes in favor of the composition had his full approval. He can never go behind this affidavit. It binds and estops him forever. And, as a ratification goes back to the first act and gives it validity, this affidavit, viewed merely as a ratification, validates the wife's acts. But it is more than a ratification. It is a full estoppel and proof against the husband that his wife acted by his authority at the time.

The striking out of the claim of $30,000 for damages, thereby reducing the sum total of the schedule that amount, presents a question of more difficulty. On the original schedule this claim is put down in the following words: "Marshall & Bateman, Shreveport, La., merchants, $30,000, 1873, about. This claim is not admitted. Suit pending in one the district courts, in and for the parish of Orleans, state of Louisiana, for damages alleged to have been sustained by them in our agent closing up their store in order to force settlement of debt due us."

Out of abundant caution, the bankrupts put this claim down. They do not admit it at all. They deny it. It does not seem reasonable that a claim which any man may choose to make against another, however futile, can stand as a bar to that other's adjustment and composition of his debts. If so, a man sued for libel, a newspaper proprietor for example, might never be able to get a composition. Persons often sue for $100,000 or $200,000, and as often recover nothing at all. This $30,000 is not put down as a debt, but only as an unjust claim. It has never been proven. It has never been heard from in the bankruptcy proceedings. Surely it cannot be possible that such a claim should stand as a barrier against a composition. There must be some remedy in such a case. Injustice and absurdity can never be law.

By section 19 of the original bankrupt act of 1867, (Rev. St. § 5067,) it is provided that when the bankrupt is liable for unliquidated damages arising out of any contract or on account of any goods wrongfully taken or withheld, the court may cause such damages to be assessed in such mode as it may deem best; and the sum so assessed may be proven against the estate. It would appear from this, that unliquidated damages of this kind are not provable until they have been assessed. The claim in question not being provable, and not being admitted to be a valid claim, but denied to be such, I think it was rightfully excluded from the estimate of debts, of which one-half is required to validate a composition. The composition would be good as to the other claims, if not as to that; and as to that, should it ever be substantiated in whole or in part, the composition may not apply. The bankrupt may, perhaps, be subject to the risk of its not applying. On this point it is unnecessary to express any opinion. The decree of the district court is affirmed.

ARREST IN ONE DISTRICT AND REMOVAL TO ANOTHER FOR TRIAL—WHETHER POWER TO GRANT ORDER IS IN THE CIRCUIT JUDGE.

1. A person arrested in one district, for an offense committed in another, who has not been indicted, nor committed by a commissioner, is entitled to an examination in the district in which he is arrested.

[See In re Clark, Case No. 2,797; U. S. v. Shepard, Id. 16,273.]

2. The power to order the removal of a person so accused from the district in which he is found to the one in which he should be tried, seems to rest in the district judge, and not in the circuit judge. So Mr. Justice Miller intimates; Mr. District Judge Love contra.

[See U. S. v. Burr, Case No. 14,693.]

Letters upon the subject of the arrest in one district of a person accused of crime committed in another district.

A warrant issued by a commissioner in the northern district of Illinois for the arrest of Chauncey Bailey, for an offence committed in that district, was, with affidavits supporting the charge, submitted [by Vallette and

[1] [Reported by James M. Woolworth, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

Bearce] to Mr. Justice Miller, with the request for an order to the marshal of the district of Iowa to make the arrest, in order that the accused might be removed to the district in Illinois for trial. [Denied.]

The request was accompanied by the statement that it was recommended by Mr. District Judge Drummond, as if he approved it and considered it proper to be granted. The same question having presented itself on a previous occasion to Mr. District Judge Love, upon a like application for the arrest of one Cook and one Tracy, similarly proceeded against, Mr. Justice Miller applied to him for his views. It may be proper here to state, that in what Judge Drummond had said in respect of the matter, he had not intended to be understood as approving the proceeding. He had not examined or considered the question, and the result reached by the learned judges, whose opinions are given herein, is believed to have met his approval.

In answer to Judge Miller's request, Judge Love gave his opinion in the following letter:

"Keokuk, August 30, 1869.

"Dear Judge,—I never before had a case presented to me exactly like the one referred to in the papers herewith returned. In each of the numerous instances in which application has been made to me for the removal of offenders, excepting that of Tracy and Cook, indictments had been found in the district where the offence was alleged to have been committed. When this application was made, the young gentleman who brought it said that Judge Drummond had told him the same as he seems to have told Messrs Vallette and Bearce; and further, that the universal practice was to have the preliminary examination in the district where the offence was committed. I, however, without giving any opinion upon the general question, held, as I had always done in cases of indictment, that the prisoner should be brought before me, in order that the fact of identity might be inquired into. In this, I proceeded upon the idea that the finding in the other district, whether by indictment or otherwise, established nothing with regard to the identity of the prisoner.

"The marshal, in making the arrest, might mistake the man, and remove to a remote state an individual not charged with any offense whatever.

"There were no affidavits accompanying Judge Drummond's order in this case, and when the prisoners were brought up, the young man filed affidavits charging that the alleged offence was committed at the town of Brunswick in Scott county, Iowa. Upon this showing I discharged them, upon the ground that it would be futile to take the prisoners to a state where the court had no jurisdiction to punish the offence.

"Upon looking closely at the law, I see nothing whatever to warrant Judge Drummond's view. I hardly suppose we could look behind an indictment; but I see no reason whatever, either in the words of the law or the reason of the thing, why, in a case where there has been no finding by a grand jury, or even by a commissioner, the prisoner should not be entitled to an examination before his removal to a distant state.

"I find upon this subject, in Brightly's Digest, the following:

" 'Offenders committed to prison in a district other than that in which the offense is to be tried, may be removed to the latter for trial by a warrant of the judge of the district where they are imprisoned.

" 'The due course of law is that any individual, on an accusation against him, may be committed, if the offence be proved. The circuit judge may inquire whether the crime has been committed in the United States or not; and if committed within the United States, he is to commit him; and then the district judge is to remove him to the district where the crime was committed.' [U. S. v. Burr, Case No. 14,693.]

"A distinction seems here to be taken between the power to commit and the power to remove for trial. The language of the law is, 'It shall be the duty of the judge of the district to issue the warrant for the removal of the prisoner,' &c. May not the circuit judge be regarded as a judge of the district, quaere? As to many purposes, he certainly is, although that is not his title. In most respects, he is indeed the paramount judge of the district.

"Yours very truly, J. M. LOVE."

"Keokuk, August 31, 1869.

"Messrs. Vallette and Bearce.

"Gentlemen,—Your favor of the 17th inst., inclosing an affidavit charging Chauncey Bailey with violation of the internal revenue law, at Napeerville, Illinois, together with Commissioner Haynes' warrant of arrest, directed to the marshal of the northern district of Illinois, is received, with your request that I would issue an order to the marshal of the district of Iowa, directing him to arrest said Bailey, and deliver him to the marshal of the northern district of Illinois.

"I owe you an apology for the delay in responding to your letter. No statute was pointed out by you as authority for such proceedings, and the examination which I made hastily of the subject, resulted in a strong impression that there was none. With this, I should have been satisfied to return you the papers, but for the statement that Judge Drummond had suggested the application which you made to me.

"My respect for Judge Drummond's opinion on a question like this, which it seems probable he has fully investigated in the course of his judicial experience, made me hesitate very much before settling down to an opposite conclusion. I therefore sent the papers to Judge Love, of this district, at Ottumwa, requesting his views upon the question. Owing to his absence from home, I did not receive his reply until yesterday. He expresses himself as entirely satisfied that a person arrested in one district for an offence committed in another, who has neither been indicted, nor had any preliminary examination, is entitled to have that examination in the district where he is arrested, and in this proposition I fully concur.

"The 33d section of the judiciary act 1 Stat. 91, enacts, 'That for any crime or offence against the United States, the offender may, by any justice or judge of the United States, or by any justice of the peace, or other magistrate of any of the United States, where he may be found, agreeably to the usual mode of process against offenders in such state, and at the expense of the United States, be arrested, and imprisoned or bailed, as the case may be, for trial before such court of the United States as by this act has cognizance of the offence. * * *

" 'And if such commitment of the offender or the witnesses shall be in a district other than that in which the offence is to be tried, it shall be the duty of the judge of that district where the delinquent is imprisoned, seasonably to issue, and of the marshal of the same district to execute, a warrant for the removal of the offender, and the witnesses, or either of them, as the case may be, to the district in which the trial is to be had.'

"The act of August 23, 1842, (5 Stat. 516,) which confers upon the commissioners of the United States, of whom Mr. Haynes is one, the same authority that the act of 1789 conferred on the state magistrates, did not enlarge those powers, or provide for any different mode of exercising them. Nor do I know any act of congress which has repealed or essentially modified the mode of proceedings pointed out by that act. The section, which I have quoted verbatim so far as it concerns the question before me, does not, in express terms, say that a person charged with an offence against the laws of the United States must have an examination in the district where he is arrested, though the offence be committed in another state. It does not, in so many words, say that he shall undergo any examination at all. The language is, that he may be arrested, and imprisoned, or bailed. But this is to be done according to the usual mode of process against such offenders in the state where he is arrested. It would be a waste of time to attempt to show that an imprisonment or order for bail is never made in any state without a previous examination into the probable guilt of the prisoner, unless he voluntarily waives such examination. Nor would any well-informed lawyer hesitate to hold that the act of congress in question was not intended to authorize imprisonment without such preliminary examination by the committing magistrate as should satisfy him that there was enough evidence of the prisoner's guilt to justify a reference of the case to the grand jury of the proper district.

"Where, then, is the preliminary examination to be had?

"The most careless reading of the provisions of the act can leave no doubt on that subject.

"For any crime against the United States, the offender may be imprisoned, or held to bail, after, as I have shown, an examination by the proper officer of the state or district where he may be found.

"If this language left any doubt on the subject, it would be removed by a subsequent provision in the same section, that, if the commitment takes place in a district other than that in which the offence is to be tried, the judge of the district where the delinquent is imprisoned shall make the necessary order for his removal to the proper district for trial. This so clearly contemplates an examination and imprisonment in the district where the offender is found, without regard to that in which the offence was committed, that comment could not make it plainer.

"The power to order removal in these cases seems to rest alone on the judge of the district court. Such is the language of this act; and, in the absence of any statute authority, I should doubt very much the right of a judge of any other court to make such an order; though, possibly, the words 'judge of the district' may, by a liberal construction, be held to include any judge who exercises jurisdiction within the district. See, however, [U. S. v. Burr, Case No. 14,693.]

"I am therefore of opinion that no authority exists in any judge to order the removal of Mr. Bailey into the district of Illinois, until he shall have had a hearing, or been committed to prison in Iowa by some proper officer.

"I therefore return you the papers, and am, your obedient servant,

"SAMUEL F. MILLER."

[See Atlantic & P. R. Co. v. Cleino, Case No. 631; Trask v. Maguire, Id. 14,145; Same case, on appeal, 18 Wall. (85 U. S.) 391.]

In equity. This is a bill by certain stockholders of the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company against that company, its directors, and the officers of the counties through which the road runs, to restrain the collection of taxes levied by state authority on the property of the company for the year 1873. The bill, in theory, is like that in Dodge v. Woolsey, 18 How. [59 U. S.] 331. One ground on which an injunction is asked is that the property of the company is, by legislative contract, exempt from taxation for the year 1873. [Temporary injunction granted, with the reservation of a right to defendants to move to dissolve it on the first day of the next term, or as soon thereafter as counsel could be heard. For opinion on previous motion for the allowance of a temporary injunction, see Parmley v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co., Case No. 10,767.]

Baker & Lytton, for plaintiff.

H. Clay Ewing, Atty. Gen., and Mr. Clover, for counties.

DILLON, Circuit Judge. The special ground of relief in this case rests upon the twelfth section of the act of the legislature of the state, approved December 25, 1852, [Laws Mo. 1852–53, p. 13,] by which the Pacific Railroad, and the Southwest Branch Railroad, were, for a certain period, exempt from taxation, and upon the question whether the present company, the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company, is entitled to the benefit of that exemption, as the successor of the Southwest Branch Railroad. The twelfth section, above mentioned, provides that "the said Southwest Branch Railroad shall be exempt from taxation until the same shall be completed and in operation, and shall declare a dividend. * * * Provided, that if said company shall fail, for a period of two years after said road shall be completed and put in operation, to declare a dividend, then said company shall be no longer exempt from payment of said tax."

The undenied allegation of the bill is that the company has never declared a dividend, and that the road was not completed until the month of May, 1871.

The exemption, if it exists, in favor of the Atlantic and Pacific Company, would continue until May, 1873. The taxes now in question are taxes for 1873, and the learned counsel for the state have conceded in argument that, under the decision of the supreme court of the United States in Pacific R. Co. v. Maguire, 20 Wall. [87 U. S.] 39, holding that this twelfth section did constitute an irrepealable legislative contract for the temporary exemption from taxation therein provided for, that the property of the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad was not taxable for 1873, provided that company is entitled to the benefit of provisions of the aforementioned twelfth section of the act of December 25, 1852. But the counsel for the state denies that the original exemption remains in force, or that it was granted, or after July 1, 1865, could be granted to the present company, or to the South Pacific Company, its vendor or predecessor, and claims that in this respect the case is like that of Trask v. Maguire, 18 Wall. [85 U. S.] 391, (the Iron Mountain Case,) in which this court held, and whose holding was affirmed by the supreme court, that the original exemption in that case did not survive or continue in favor of the present company.

Judge Treat has written an opinion in which he distinguishes the two cases, and seems to think that the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company is entitled to the legislative exemption from taxation granted by section 12, before mentioned. Atlantic & P. R. Co. v. Cleino, [Case No. 631.] As the report of that case shows, I formed and expressed no opinion on this point, and placed my judgment distinctly upon another ground.

On the present argument, three recent opinions of the supreme court were produced—Southern Pac. R. Co. v. Laclede Co., [57 Mo. 147;] Lawrence Co. v. Atlantic & P. R. Co., [Id. 149,] and Barry Co. v. Atlantic & P. R. Co., [Id.]—in which that court, in favor of the company above named, set aside the taxes levied by the counties, on the ground that the company was entitled to the legislative exemption in said section 12. The opinions were brief, but this is the very point involved, and, although it is not discussed, it is, perhaps, fair to presume that it was not overlooked.

I have purposely refrained from examining, at this time, the question whether, in view of the provision of the constitution of 1865, (article 11, § 16,) by which the state was prohibited from thereafter exempting private property from taxation, this case can be distinguished from the Iron Mountain Case, because I think the question ought to be brought before a full bench and decided upon a more careful consideration than I am at present able to give to it. In view, however, of the judicial decisions mentioned, particularly those of the state supreme courts in favor of the company on the very point here involved, it would seem the wiser course to grant a temporary injunction against the collection of the tax. This is done, however, with the reservation of a right to the defendants to move to dissolve it on the first day of the next term, or as soon thereafter as counsel can be heard. It is ordered accordingly.

Ordered accordingly.

NOTE, [from original report.] The exemption claimed by the company was held at the term not to exist. See Mr. Circuit Justice Miller's opinion, [Parmley v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co., Case No. 10,768.]

BANKRUPTCY—HOMESTEAD EXEMPTION—"HEAD OF A FAMILY."

[1. In 1876, he returned to the farm. While at M., he once voted, and there was some evidence that he spoke of M. as his home, and that during his stay there he was nominated as a candidate for justice of the peace, but he never authorized his name to be so used. Held, that his right to a homestead exemption under 1 Wag. [3. C., a bankrupt, was a bachelor, and from 1853 lived on a farm with a sister, who furnished money for its purchase and improvement. The brother and sister furnished money and labor in unequal proportions. Another sister, an invalid, formed part of the household until her death, in 1861. In 1869, the surviving sister married. In 1872, after her husband's death, she returned to the home of the bankrupt, and made it her home, having her furniture there; but, her health being poor, she visited much of the time in the east, and also with brothers in the neighborhood. In 1876, C. was declared a bankrupt, and afterwards the sister returned to the farm. She was in charge of the household and domestic affairs at the farm, and paid no board. Held, that she was part of the bankrupt's family, and that he was entitled to an exemption as the "head of a family," under the Missouri homestead exemption laws, (1 Wag. St. pp. 603, 604, 697,) and under the bankrupt act of March 2, 1867, (14 Stat. 517, c. 176.)]

In bankruptcy. This was a bill of review, seeking to reverse the decision of Judge Treat [upon the bankrupt act of March 2, 1867, (14 Stat. 517, c. 176,)] sustaining the bankrupt's exceptions to his assignee's report, refusing to set him off a one thousand five hundred dollar homestead and certain personalties amounting to five hundred dollars. The assignee's refusal was on the ground that the bankrupt was not a housekeeper or head of a family. The exceptions alleged that he was such a housekeeper when he filed his petition in bankruptcy. The issues were tried before United States Register Enos Clarke, who held that the bankrupt was not such a housekeeper, and overruled the exceptions. On application to Judge Treat to reverse the decision, he heard the same evidence that had been heard by Register Clarke, and held that the bankrupt was such head of a family, and sustained the exceptions. [Affirmed.]

Mr. Dudley C. Comings, the bankrupt, was a bachelor, and from 1852 or 1853, lived on a farm about twelve miles from Monroe City, on which the exemption is claimed, with a sister, who, from that date until the farm was paid for, furnished funds for its purchase and improvement, she and he furnished money and labor in unequal proportions. Another sister, an invalid, formed part of the household until her death, in 1861. In 1869, the surviving sister married and moved away, and remained away until her husband's death in 1870. In 1872, she returned to the home of bankrupt, which she made her home, and where she left her furniture and her room furnished. Her health being critical, she visited much of her time in the east, and also with her two brothers living at Monroe City. The bankrupt's health failing him, he also went to Monroe City, and lived or slept, ate, etc., with a brother, doing such work as he could in consideration for his board. When his health was recovered, he returned to the farm, and was living there when he filed his petition in bankruptcy. There was also another view relied on by the bankrupt. In 1871, the bankrupt becoming feeble, engaged a family (Algers) to come and live in the house with him, and operate or work the farm on a division of the crops, etc. They were all the time subject to his management and control, and were with bankrupt at the filing of this petition. It was complained that while at Monroe, the bankrupt once voted, and there was some evidence that he spoke of Monroe as his home, and that during his stay there he was nominated as a candidate for justice of the peace. It appeared, however, that he never authorized his name to be so used.

DILLON, Circuit Judge. The district court sustained the claim of the bankrupt to a homestead exemption under the Missouri statute on that subject. The assignee contests the correctness of this ruling and brings the case here for review. I have read the evidence contained in the record, covering over one hundred pages. The statute of Missouri gives to each housekeeper or head of a family resident in the county "his homestead used by him as such," to the extent of not over one hundred and sixty acres, and in value not over one thousand five hundred dollars. 1 Wag. St. pp. 603, 604, 697. Certain other limited exemptions are made to each "head of a family." If the bankrupt is entitled to a homestead, I am of opinion that that right was not abandoned by his residence at his brother's in Monroe City, he having left his property on the home farm, except his wearing apparel and a few tools, and having gone to Monroe City because of his feeble health, and to be with his brothers, and having resumed his usual residence on the farm in which the exemption is claimed, before filing the petition in bankruptcy. I am of opinion that if it was essential to maintain the bankrupt's claim to the exemption to hold that the Algers (who were tenants under a special arrangement, and not relatives or dependents of the bankrupt) were part of or constituted the bankrupt's family, that this position could not be sustained.

The bankrupt had never been married, and if he had any family, it was constituted of himself and his widowed sister, Mrs. Metcalf. Years before, when the farm was being opened and improved, two unmarried sisters lived with him and were then part of his family. One of these sisters died, the other married Mr. Metcalf, say about 1869. She resided with her husband until his death in 1870. She was without children. I infer she had very limited means. In 1872, she returned to the bankrupt's farm as her home, brought her household goods there, and managed his house and household affairs. She paid no board. She was quite advanced in years, her health was poor, and the work was too hard; and by the advice of her physician she went in 1873 to reside with her brothers (two of them living as one family) at Monroe City, about twelve miles distant. She always paid her board at her brothers in Monroe City. The bankrupt's health was also poor, and about the same time he left his farm with the Algers, and went to live with the same brothers at Monroe City, doing enough about the brothers' mill to equal the value of his board. In the spring of 1876, shortly before the bankruptcy, the bankrupt went back to the farm. The brothers who owned the mill at Monroe City failed. Mrs. Metcalf went east and did not return to the farm until after the bankruptcy.

If we regard the direct statements of the bankrupt and Mrs. Metcalf, as to their purposes and intentions, the homestead right exists. While the facts cloud or render somewhat doubtful these declared purposes and intentions, on the whole, I think the circumstances, the undisputed facts, show that the right exists. I am clear that the right, if it ever existed, was not abandoned by the bankrupt's residence at Monroe. The case turns upon the question whether Mrs. Metcalf was part of the bankrupt's family. She lived there years before her marriage. It was her home prior to that event. After her husband's death she went there, and her brother received her as a member of his family, gave her a room, and she was in charge of his household and domestic affairs. She intended to remain there. She had no home of her own. Her household goods were there. She paid no board, and was not expected to. Her health failed, and she went, under the advice of her physician, to Monroe. Her relations to her brothers there were very different from her relations with her brother the bankrupt. Mrs. Metcalf says in her testimony that the bankrupt's house was regarded by her as her home, and she explains her absence therefrom by the condition of her health. The case is a close one, but under all the circumstances, I am of opinion that the district court was justified in regarding the bankrupt as a housekeeper or head of a family within the meaning of the Missouri statute, and its order in this respect is affirmed.

DEEDS IN ESCROW—INNOCENT MORTGAGEE.

Where persons exchanging lands place their deeds in escrow and transfer their possession, and the depositary records one of the deeds without the knowledge of the grantor, and the grantee procures a loan on the land, a mortgagee in good faith acquires a valid lien upon the land, though the mortgagor misappropriates the money. [Berry v. Anderson, 22 Ind. 40, and Everts v. Agnes, 6 Wis. 453, distinguished.]

[In equity. Bill by Henry Bailey against James Moorman and the assignee in bankruptcy of Noah Crim. James Moorman, in a cross bill, prayed for protection as an innocent mortgagee. Heard on exceptions to master's report. Overruled, and decree for cross complainant.]

GRESHAM, District Judge. On the 18th day of September, 1877, Henry Bailey, of Randolph county, and Noah Crim, of Henry county, entered into a written agreement for the exchange of the farms upon which they were then living, each surrendering to the other full possession. Crim's farm was incumbered, and by the terms of the agreement he was to pay all the liens, except $2,000, on or before the 25th of December. Deeds were duly signed and acknowledged and placed in the hands of James Brown, a loan agent residing at New Castle, Henry county, there to remain until the terms of the contract were complied with. At the time Brown became custodian of the deeds, it was understood and expected by the parties that Crim, through Brown, would raise money on the land conveyed to him, to remove the incumbrances, less $2,000, upon the land which he conveyed to Bailey. This seems to have been the reason for depositing the deeds with Brown. On the 22d of November, 1877, Brown, without the knowledge of either party, had Bailey's deed to Crim recorded in Randolph county, and made one or more unsuccessful efforts to negotiate a loan for Crim. Just what Bailey was to do before being entitled to his deed from Crim, the agreement and evidence fail to show, but on the 29th day of January, 1878, he demanded and received from Brown, Crim's deed for the Henry county land. On the 22d of April, 1878, James Moorman, of Randolph county, loaned Crim $2,100, and took a mortgage on the land described in Bailey's deed to Crim, to secure the loan. This Moorman did in good faith, and without any knowledge of the circumstances under which the deeds had been placed in the hands of Brown, or of Bailey's rights. Instead of applying the money obtained from Moorman to remove the incumbrances on the lands conveyed to Bailey, Crim used it for other purposes, and a few days thereafter went into bankruptcy. Bailey paid off the incumbrances and filed his bill against Moorman and Crim's assignee to enforce his vendor's lien, for the amount so paid, against the land conveyed to Crim, demanding priority over the mortgage held by Moorman.

Moorman set up his mortgage in a cross-bill, demanding protection as an innocent purchaser. The master reported in favor of Moorman, and the case is now submitted on exceptions to the report. Moorman had reason to believe, and did believe, that Crim was the absolute owner in fee of the lands upon which he took the mortgage. He found Crim in full and undisputed possession under a deed from Bailey, which was duly recorded. It is not pretended that he knew any fact or circumstance which was sufficient to put him on inquiry as to Bailey's rights. While laches cannot be imputed to Bailey for depositing his deed to Crim with Brown as an escrow, yet in doing so Bailey put it in Brown's power to mislead Moorman. On account of Brown's conduct either Bailey or Moorman must suffer loss, and I think the latter has the better equity.

The agent of Bailey, in disregard of instructions, had his deed recorded before Crim had complied with his agreement to remove the liens on the lands conveyed to Bailey. This was Bailey's misfortune. He put it in the power of Brown to inflict the injury, and it would be against natural justice to require Moorman to sustain the loss.

At the time of the exchange, Bailey understood that Brown was to assist Crim in raising money by mortgaging the land described in Bailey's deed. It was in this way that Crim was expected to be able to comply with his agreement to remove the liens, and it may be that Bailey was less surprised at finding his deed to Crim and the latter's mortgage to Moorman recorded than he was by Crim's refusal to use the money in discharging the liens.

It is urged by counsel for plaintiff that the paper placed in Brown's hands by Bailey was no more than an escrow; that the recording of it did not make it a deed; that its delivery without compliance with the conditions upon which it was held passed no title to Crim, and that therefore Crim conveyed no title to Moorman.

Berry v. Anderson, 22 Ind. 40, and Everts v. Agnes, 6 Wis. 453, are cited in support of this position. In Everts v. Agnes it was held that the fraudulent procurement of a deed deposited as an escrow, from the depositary, by the grantee, did not operate to pass the title, and that a subsequent purchaser from such grantee, without notice and for a valuable consideration, derived no title thereby, and could not be protected. In Berry v. Anderson the deed was procured from the custodian, who held it as an escrow, by fraud, and the grantor still remained in possession, which latter fact, of itself, was sufficient to put the purchaser on inquiry. It has been held that a deed delivered to an agent as an escrow, and by him delivered to the grantee contrary to the conditions, passes a title voidable only. Blight v. Schenck, 10 Pa. St. 285; Pratt v. Holman, 16 Vt. 530. Without deciding that Bailey's recorded deed to Crim was voidable only, I hold, for the reasons already given, that Moorman cannot be postponed in favor of Bailey. Blight v. Schenck, supra; Haven v. Kramer, 41 Iowa, 382.

Exceptions overruled and decree in accordance with the master's finding.

2. But these duties of the appraisers are, by the first section of the act of March 3, 1851, [9 Stat. 629,] limited to goods, wares, and merchandise, subject to ad valorem duty.

3. Values of imported goods subject to specific duty are, by section 8, of the act of February 10, 1820, [3 Stat. 542,] ascertained in the same manner as those of goods subject to ad valorem duty, but the requirement is for statistical purposes different from those described in the acts of congress making provision for the appraisement of articles subject to ad valorem duty.

4. In the appraisement of goods subject to specific duty the decision of the appraisers is not conclusive as in the case of goods subject to ad valorem duty.

At law. Motion for new trial. This was an action of assumpsit [by Adam Bailey and others against John Z. Goodrich] brought against the defendant as collector of the port of Boston, to recover the duties paid on two importations of rice from Calcutta, by the plaintiffs, one in December, 1861, by the ship Dolphin, and one in March, 1862, by the ship Fleetwing. [Verdict and judgment for defendant. Heard on motion for a new trial. Granted.]

Both importations were invoiced by the plaintiffs as "first quality Patna table rice." The plaintiffs entered the cargo of the Dolphin as "uncleaned rice," and dutiable at one half a cent per pound. The appraisers reported it to be "cleaned rice," and dutiable at one cent per pound, and duties were exacted accordingly. The importers protested against the levying of these duties, and appealed to the secretary of the treasury, who sustained the decision of the officers of the customs. In the case of the Fleetwing, the plaintiffs entered the cargo as rice, one cent per pound. The appraisers reported it as "cleaned rice correct," and duties were accordingly assessed; and the plaintiff protested against the levying of this rate of duty. The court instructed the jury that the finding of the appraisers in the case of the Dolphin, that the importation was clean rice, and dutiable at one cent per pound, after appeal, and after confirmation of that finding by the secretary of the treasury, was conclusive as to the character of the importation, and that the decision of the collector, based on that finding, after the same was confirmed on appeals by the secretary of the treasury, fixed the true rate of duty to which the importation was subject. They also instructed the jury in the case of the Fleetwing, that the plaintiff having entered the importation as rice, at one cent per pound, it became the duty of the collector, in the absence of any appeal to the secretary of the treasury, to assess the duties on that basis, and that the protest is not sufficient to recover back the duties on the ground that the plaintiffs were required by the collector to make such an entry. The court accordingly directed a verdict for the defendant, subject to the right in the plaintiffs to move for a new trial.

The hearing was had before CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice, and LOWELL, District Judge.

C. L. Woodbury and S. W. Bates, for plaintiffs.

W. A. Field, for defendant.

CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice. The jury in this case, under the instructions of the court, returned their verdict in favor of the defendant, and the plaintiff now moves the court to set the verdict aside and grant a new trial, upon the ground of error in the instructions. The substance of the instructions was, that the finding of the appraisers that the importation was cleaned rice, under the circumstances disclosed in the evidence, was conclusive. The tenth section of the act of 10th of March, 1861, imposed a duty of one cent per pound on cleaned rice, and fifty cents per one hundred pounds on uncleaned rice or paddy. 12 Stat. 183. Two importations of rice were made by the plaintiffs, one in the Dolphin, and the other in the Fleetwing, and the importations were separately entered at the custom-house. Entry in the first case was "uncleaned rice," and in the second case it was "rice, at one cent per pound."

In both cases the claim of the plaintiff was, that the rice was uncleaned, and consequently that it was subject only to a duty of fifty cents per one hundred pounds. The decision of the appraisers was that it was cleaned rice, and that it was subject to a duty of one cent per pound. Adopting their report, the collector classified the importations as cleaned rice, and assessed the duty accordingly. Plaintiff appealed to the secretary of the treasury, and he confirmed the decision of the collector. Whereupon the plaintiff paid the duties under protest, and brought this suit to recover back the excess beyond the amount properly levied on uncleaned rice. The proposition of the plaintiff is, that the instructions in the case of the Dolphin were erroneous; and that is the only question in the case, as the plaintiff declines to argue the other question.

The appraisement act of the 1st of March, 1823, in its fifth section prescribed the manner in which ad valorem rates of duties on imports should be estimated, and the sixteenth section provided for the appointment of certain appraisers, and required that they should make oath diligently and faithfully to examine and inspect such goods, wares, or merchandise as the collector may direct, and truly to report to the best of their knowledge and belief the true value thereof, according to the provisions of the fifth section of the act. 3 Stat. 732, 735.

Collectors of the customs were required by the act of the 28th of May, 1830, to cause one package of every invoice, and one at least out of every twenty packages of each invoice to be opened and examined. . . . . And if such goods were subject to ad valorem duty the requirement was, that they should be appraised. 4 Stat. 410. Appraisers were required by the sixteenth section of the act of the 30th of August, 1842, and it was made their duty, by all reasonable ways and means in their power, to ascertain, estimate, and appraise the true and actual market value and wholesale price of goods, wares, or merchandise subject to "any ad valorem rate of duty" at the time purchased, and in the principal markets of the country whence the same shall have been imported into the United States. 5 Stat. 563. Packages to be opened for that purpose and examined and appraised, were to be designated by the collector, and ordered to the public stores.

The precise requirement is, that he shall designate on the invoice one package at least of every invoice, and one package of every ten packages of the goods imported, to be sent to the public stores for examination.

Where it became necessary that the appraisers, in order to ascertain, estimate, and appraise the true and actual market value and wholesale price of the importation, should determine what were the principal markets of the country from which it was exported, the supreme court held that their decision in the premises was conclusive. Stairs v. Peaslee, 18 How. [59 U. S.] 524.

The duties of appraisers are also limited by the first section of the act of the 3d of March, 1851, to the appraising, estimating, and ascertaining the actual market value and wholesale price of goods, wares, and merchandise subject to "ad valorem rate of duty." They are to appraise, estimate, and ascertain the actual market value of such importations at the period of the exportation, in the principal markets of the country from which the same shall have been imported, and all charges, except insurance, and a charge for commission at the usual rates, are to be added, and the amount so computed is declared by the act to be the true value of the goods at the port where the same may be entered, upon which the duties shall be assessed. 9 Stat. 630.

Repeated decisions of the supreme court have established the rule that the report of the appraisers made to the collector, in pursuance of their duty to appraise, estimate, and ascertain the actual value or wholesale price of such goods at the period of the exportation, in the principal markets of the country from which the same were imported, is final and conclusive as to such value. Belcher v. Linn, 24 How. [65 U. S.] 522; Bartlett v. Kane, 16 How. [57 U. S.] 272; Rankin v. Hoyt, 4 How. [45 U. S.] 327. Required as the appraisers are to appraise, estimate, and ascertain such value, the supreme court has in effect determined that every matter necessarily involved in that inquiry and determination, must also be considered as conclusively decided in the suit to recover back duties assessed on the importation. Stairs v. Peaslee, 18 How. [59 U. S.] 524; Belcher v. Linn, 24 How. [65 U. S.] 523.

All of those decisions, however, were made in respect to importations subject to ad valorem duties, and in cases where some act of congress made it the duty of the appraisers to appraise, estimate, and ascertain the actual market value or wholesale price of the importation at the period of exportation, in the principal markets of the foreign country, as the basis upon which the ad valorem duties should be assessed. Importations, subject only to specific duties are not required to be so appraised and estimated, or the market value to be so ascertained for any such purpose. Values of all imported articles subject to specific duties are required to be ascertained by the eighth section of the act of the 10th of February, 1820, [3 Stat. 542,] in the manner in which the values of imports subject to duties ad valorem are ascertained, but the requirement is for statistical purposes, and not for any such purpose as that described in the acts of congress making provision for the appraisement of importations subject to ad valorem duties.

Our conclusion is that the instructions of the court in respect to the effect of the appraisers' report in the case of the Dolphin were erroneous, and the verdict must be set aside and a new trial granted.

Case No. 736.

BAILEY v. HANNIBAL & ST. J. R. CO.

[1 Dill. 174.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Missouri. 1870.[2]

RAILROAD COMPANIES — CONSTRUCTION OF PREFERRED STOCK CERTIFICATE, ETC.

Preferred stock certificates issued by the railroad company, construed, and held to give the holders thereof a preferable right to the first seven per cent of the net earnings each year; after which the holders of common stock are entitled to next seven per cent, and if any surplus it is to go to holders of the preferred and common stock equally.

[In equity. Bill by John Bailey against the Hannibal & St. Joseph Railroad Company to restrain respondent from paying certain moneys as a dividend on its common stock. Bill dismissed. This decree was affirmed on appeal in 17 Wall. (84 U. S.) 96. See note at end of case.]

[1] [Reported by Hon. John F. Dillon, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

[2] [Affirmed by supreme court in Bailey v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co., 17 Wall. (84 U. S.) 96.]

The complainant is the owner of 800 shares of the preferred stock issued by the defendant. The only question in the case is as to the extent of the respective rights of the preferred and common stock to dividends.

The certificates for the preferred stock recite that they are "issued in adjustment of the bonds of the company bearing date," etc., "and subject to the terms and conditions of an indenture between the said corporation, and Wm. Swift and others, trustees, dated April 1, 1863, and with the rights therein set forth, and certifies that the holder is entitled to ——— shares of the preferred stock of the said corporation, and shall be entitled to receive all the net earnings of said company, which may be divided pursuant to said indenture, in each year up to $7 per share, and to share in any surplus beyond $7 per share, which may be divided upon the common stock." In the indenture of April 1, 1863, is an agreement "that said preferred stock shall be entitled to a dividend of 7 per cent from the net earnings of said road, in each year, before any dividend shall be declared upon other unpreferred shares of the said corporation, and to an equal dividend with said other shares, in the net earnings of said corporation beyond said seven per cent."

The history of the issue of this preferred stock is briefly this: The war and other causes had in 1862 greatly embarrassed the company, and on the 15th day of October of that year the directors adopted a "plan" to extricate the company from its difficulties, which was set forth at length in a circular to the owners of bonds under the different mortgages. This project contemplated a relinquishment by them of a certain amount of their bonds, and the taking in the place thereof preferred stock. The character of the preferred stock to be taken is thus described in the plan: "The preferred stock to be 7 per cent and not cumulative, but to share with the common stock any surplus which may be earned over and above 7 per cent upon both, in any one year." It was this plan, without modification, to which the bondholders consented, and they signed an instrument to that effect, agreeing to surrender bonds "in accordance with the provisions of the plan of October 15, 1862, hereunto annexed," and to receive preferred stock therefor. The assent of all the bondholders having been obtained to this plan by the latter part of February, 1863, the aforementioned indenture of April 1, 1863, was drafted; and the evidence (the competency of which is objected to by the complainant) establishes that the purpose was to carry out and not to change the provisions of this plan. Indeed there was no authority in the committee having the matter in charge to change it. On the 30th day of May, 1863, pursuant to notice, a meeting of the stockholders of the company ratified what had been done and consented to and adopted the indenture of April 1, 1863, a printed copy of which was submitted to it, and certificates of preferred stock, in the form above mentioned, were from time to time issued to the bondholders by the company. No dividends were made prior to the year 1870. On the 29th day of June, of that year, a 7 per cent dividend was voted to the holders of the preferred stock, and 3½ per cent dividend was voted to the common stock out of the earnings of the first six months of 1870, and it was also voted that the earnings of the road for the remaining six months be applied to pay the further dividend of 3½ per cent on said common stock. To the carrying out of this vote in favor of the common stock the complainant objects, and files this bill for an injunction and relief.

Glover & Shepley, for complainant.

Thomas T. Gantt and James Carr, for railroad company.

Before DILLON, Circuit Judge, and TREAT and KREKEL, District Judges.

DILLON, Circuit Judge. It is admitted on both sides that the holders of the preferred stock are entitled to receive all the net earnings in each year, up to 7 per cent. The dispute relates to the net earnings over 7 per cent. The defendant claims that when the preferred stock has in any one year received its seven dollars per share, the common stock is entitled to receive seven dollars per share if so much shall have been earned, and that if there be any surplus beyond this, the two kinds of stock shall share it equally. For example: if the net earnings for a year shall be just 12 per cent, the preferred stock first gets its 7, and the common stock the remaining 5 per cent; if the earnings shall be 16 per cent, the preferred and common stock will each get its 7, and then share equally in the other 2 per cent.

On the other hand, the complainant claims that the preferred stock is first entitled to 7 per cent, and that it and the common stock share equally in any surplus beyond the 7 per cent, admitted to be first due to the preferred stock. For example: if the net earnings in any one year are 12 per cent, the complainant insists that the preferred stock is first to get its 7 (and this is admitted), and then to get one-half of the remaining 5 per cent. and the common stock the other half. This is controverted by the defendant, who insists as above stated, that the common stock is in such a case entitled to the whole of the 5 per cent. Both parties maintain that their positions are warranted by the language of the stock certificates. And the complainant insists that if there is any doubt upon the face of the certificate of the stock, it is removed by the language of the indenture of April 1, 1863, which it recites, and to which by its terms it is subject. On the other hand, the respondent contends that such is not the true construction of the indenture, especially when taken as it should be, in connection with the certificate, and that this is indubitably shown by the history of the issue of the preferred stock, and the aliunde testimony mentioned in the statement of the case. The complainant stands upon the stock certificate and indenture, and objects that all testimony outside of these is inadmissible to vary their construction or to affect his rights. The competency, in this proceeding, of the testimony aliunde it is not necessary to discuss, for after a careful consideration of the language of the stock certificate the court is of opinion that it does not support the claim of the complainant, but does sustain that of the respondent. The "surplus" mentioned in the certificate refers to what may remain after the preferred and the common stock has each had its $7 per share. If the intention had been as claimed by the complainant, all the language after the word "surplus," would be unnecessary; and the construction put upon it by the company is the only one which will give effect to all the language employed. The use in the indenture of the word "said," in the phrase "said 7 per cent," is a clerical error, and construing the certificate and indenture together, it should not have the effect to change the rights of the holders of the common stock.

We will not say that the language used does not raise a difficulty, but we think the result we have reached fairly warranted by the stock certificate and indenture, and we know (if it be proper to consider the extraneous evidence) that it is the one which was contemplated by all parties to the arrangement under which the preferred stock was issued.

The injunction will be dissolved and the bill dismissed.

TREAT and KREKEL, District Judges, concurred.

Ordered accordingly.

[NOTE. In affirming this decree, the supreme court, by Mr. Justice Clifford, held that seasonable objection that the indenture is the only evidence of the contract between the parties could not have availed the complainant if it had been made, "as it is well-settled law that several writings executed between the same parties substantially at the same time, and relating to the same subject-matter, may be read together as forming parts of one transaction; nor is it necessary that the instruments should in terms refer to each other, if in point of fact they are parts of a single transaction. * * * Until it appears that the several writings are parts of a single transaction, either from the writings themselves, or by extrinsic evidence, the case is not brought within the rule, as it may be that the same parties may have had more than one transaction in one day of the same general nature. Doubt upon that subject, however, cannot arise in this case, as the due relation of the several writings to each other is conceded by both parties." Continuing, the court said: "Standing alone, it may be admitted that the indenture furnishes some support to the views of the complainant, but it is clear that all ambiguity disappears when it is read in connection with the writings which preceded and followed it in respect to the same subject-matter. Ample justification for that remark is found in the plan which preceded it, and which was approved and signed by all the bondholders, and in the form prepared for the certificate of the preferred stock, which was adopted subsequently to the execution of the indenture, and which was accepted by all the holders of the preferred stock as a complete fulfillment of the arrangement between them and the company. Holders of preferred stock, as there provided, are entitled to receive all the net earnings of the company, which may be divided pursuant to the indenture in each year up to $7 per share, and to share in any surplus beyond $7 per share which may be divided upon the common stock, which, in substance and legal effect, is the same regulation as that contained in the circular or plan, and all the other writings upon the subject which were given in evidence at the final hearing." BANKRUPTCY—CONDITIONAL SALE — MINGLING OF ASSETS—PREFERENCE.

Where a bankrupt made a conditional purchase of logs which were sawed at his mill, and, the conditions not being fulfilled, the seller, after insolvency of the bankrupt, took back a quantity of sawed lumber instead of his logs: Held, that while he had a right to take such share of the sawed lumber as was in proportion to his interest in the logs, the taking of the rest of the lumber by consent of the bankrupt after insolvency in settlement of his claim, was in effect to give him a preference, and rendered the transaction void.

[In bankruptcy. This was a proceeding by John Bailey, Jr., assignee in bankruptcy, against Charles T. Henderson, to recover the value of the bankrupt's interest in certain lumber. Decree for orator.]

E. W. Smith and W. L. Burnap, for orator.

Leslie & Rogers and Orin Gambell, for respondent.

WHEELER, District Judge. This cause has been heard on pleadings, proofs, and agreements.

The logs in question were to be delivered by the defendant to the bankrupt "at his saw-mill." They had not been delivered when the absolute sale was changed to a conditional sale. The first note, if received in payment, would take the cause out of the operation of the Statute of Frauds, but it would not obviate the necessity of delivery according to the contract. After it was received the defendant had the logs to haul to the mill in order to fulfil the contract. While that remained to be done, the sale was not executed. Gibbs v. Benjamin, 45 Vt. 129. Until it was executed, the parties could by mere agreement change it from an absolute to a conditional one. The bankrupt could sell them back and no delivery or change of possession would be necessary. Having done that, he could buy them again conditionally. They did this in effect when they agreed to change the sale, and the lien reserved was valid. Wright v. Vaughn, Id. 369, differed from this case. There the property had been fully delivered before the parties to the sale undertook to change it.

This lien appears to have been recorded in ample season. The time begins to run from the delivery of the property, not the date of the lien. Laws Vt. 1872, p. 90.

These logs appear to have been mingled with others, and sawed and piled so the lumber could not be distinguished, with the consent of the defendant, by the bankrupt. Under these circumstances they owned the lumber in common in proportion to their respective interests in the logs. Inst. lib. ii. tit. I. § 27; 2 Kent, Comm. 364; Ryder v. Hathaway, 21 Pick. 298; Pratt v. Bryant, 20 Vt. 333. The share held by the defendant by virtue of his lien he had the right to take, as he did take. The rest of this common lumber, and some other, he appears to have taken in part payment of his claim, at a time when the bankrupt was insolvent, with such a view on the part of the bankrupt to give him a preference, and such knowledge of the purpose and of the insolvency on his part as to make the transaction void.

On these conclusions the orator, as assignee, is entitled to recover the value of the bankrupt's interest in the whole of the lumber taken. This is found at the price they agreed upon, with interest, to be $237.94. Let a decree be entered for the orator accordingly, with costs.

STEWART v. SAME.

Circuit Court, N. D. New York. June 20, 1876.

TOWN BONDS IN AID OF RAILROADS—ISSUE WITHOUT AUTHORITY—RIGHTS OF COUPON HOLDERS.

1. By a statute of New York, the county judge was authorized, on a petition by a specified number of tax-payers, to ascertain, by judicial inquiry, whether the majority of the tax-payers of a town, in number and in taxable property, desired the town to issue its bonds in aid of a railroad company, and, if he ascertained such to be the case, he was authorized to appoint three commissioners to execute and issue bonds in behalf of the town, and invest them in the stock or bonds of the company. On a petition and proofs, the county judge adjudged that the bonds should be issued by a town, and appointed commissioners to do so. Opposing tax-payers obtained a writ of certiorari for the review by the supreme court of the state of the decision of the county judge. After the writ had been issued, and the commissioners and the company had had notice of it, they executed the bonds and delivered them to the company. The supreme court reversed the judgment. The bonds had interest coupons, and B. subsequently brought suit against the town on some of the coupons. It did not appear how he acquired title to the coupons, or whether he ever owned the bonds to which the coupons belonged, although it appeared that he had the coupons in his possession before they fell due: Held, that he was not entitled to recover.

2. The issue of the certiorari suspended the operation of the judgment, and the company acquired no title to the bonds, which they could enforce as against the town.

[Cited in Stewart v. Lansing, Case No. 13,432.]

3. It appearing that the bonds were issued in fraud of the rights of the town, the burden was upon B. to show that he was a purchaser of the coupons in good faith and for value.

[Cited in Tracey v. Town of Phelps, 22 Fed. 634.]

4. But, certain of the bonds, with their coupons, having come into the hands of E., as a holder of them for value, before maturity, and then having passed to S., it was held, that S. was entitled to recover in a suit on some of such coupons, against the town.

[Cited in Stewart v. Lansing, Case No. 13,432; same case, on appeal, 104 U. S. 508.]

[See Lytle v. Lansing, 147 U. S. 59, 13 Sup. Ct. 254.]

5. Various defences overruled, as against S., as a bona fide holder.

6. The reversal of the judgment of the county judge could not invalidate the title of a bona fide purchaser.

[Suits by Manassah Bailey and John L. Stewart against the town of Lansing on interest coupons of certain town bonds. Judgment against Bailey and for Stewart.]

James R. Cox, for plaintiffs.

Milo Goodrich, for defendant.

WALLACE, District Judge. The suit by Bailey is brought upon interest coupons originally attached to bonds issued in aid of the Cayuga Lake Railroad Company, by commissioners appointed for that purpose by the county judge of Tompkins county, under the provisions of the bonding acts of 1869, 1870 and 1871, of the state of New York. Laws 1869, p. 2303; Laws 1870, p. 2049; Laws 1871, p. 2115. These acts authorize the county judge, upon the presentation of a petition by the requisite number of the tax-payers of the county, to ascertain, by judicial inquiry, if the majority of the tax-payers, in number and in taxable property, desire the town to issue its bonds in aid of the railroad, and, if he ascertains such to be the case, authorizes him to appoint three commissioners to execute and issue bonds in behalf of the town, and invest them in the stock or bonds of the railroad company. The county judge having entertained the petition of the tax-payers, and taken proofs, adjudged that the bonds should be issued, and appointed commissioners for the purpose. Opposing tax-payers contested the proceedings, and, pursuant to the statute, obtained a writ of certiorari, for the review of the decision of the county judge by the supreme court of the state. Upon review, the supreme court reversed the judgment. This reversal, in legal effect, vacated the entire proceedings taken before the county judge. The certiorari was the common law writ. After it was issued, and notice thereof given to the commissioners, and before the commissioners had taken the oath of office required by law, preliminarily to entering upon the duties of their trust, they executed and delivered the bonds to the railroad company, the latter having full notice of the certiorari and giving to the commissioners a bond of indemnity.

[1] [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission. 2 N. Y. Wkly. Dig. 562, contains partial report only.]

It does not appear how the plaintiff acquired title to the coupons in suit, but it does appear that they were in his possession before they fell due. It does not appear whether or not he ever owned the bonds to which the coupons were originally attached. Upon the facts, I do not think the plaintiff is entitled to recover. The bonds were originally negotiated between the commissioners and the railroad company in violation of good faith. The parties to the transaction were aware that proceedings were pending to annul the authority of the commissioners to issue the bonds. When the certiorari issued, the judgment and the proceedings upon which it was founded were removed to the supreme court, and the effect was, that all proceedings under the judgment, which had not actually been put in motion, would be suspended. The decisions in this state are uniform, that, upon the allowance of a certiorari, the effect of the judgment which it is taken to review, except in the single case of an execution already issued and in the process of being executed, is suspended as to all proceedings under it and as to all collateral matters. The judgment is not even evidence in a case between the same parties. It is as completely suspended as though it had never been rendered. Launitz v. Dixon, 5 Sandf. 249; Conover v. Devlin, 24 Barb. 636. Under these circumstances, the commissioners were no more justified in attempting to issue bonds in behalf of the town than they would have been if their agency had been revoked; and the railroad company, having knowledge of the facts, acquired no title to the bonds, which they could enforce as against the town. The case is not analogous to that where property has been sold under an execution upon a judgment subsequently reversed. I do not intend to intimate, that, if the bonds had been issued by the commissioners after the certiorari, and had come to the hands of an innocent purchaser, the latter would have acquired no title. Although the authority of the commissioners to act as agents of the town was suspended, such a purchaser would acquire the rights of a bona fide holder of commercial paper, and could recover against the principal as though the authority once conferred upon the agent had never been revoked. But, in such case, it would be incumbent upon the plaintiff to show that he had purchased innocently, relying upon the ostensible authority of the agent. Coddington v. Bay, 20 Johns. 637.

These views lead to the conclusion, that, when it appeared that the bonds were issued in fraud of the rights of the defendant, the burden was cast upon the plaintiff to show that he was a purchaser in good faith and for value. He could not rest upon the presumption derived from his possession of the coupons before they became due. Rogers v. Morton, 12 Wend. 484; Smith v. Sac Co., 11 Wall. [78 U. S.] 139.

Judgment is ordered for the defendant, in the suit by Bailey.

The suit by Stewart differs from the one by Bailey, in that it appears that the bonds were pledged as collateral, in February, 1873, to Elliott, Collins & Co., of Philadelphia, and sold by them after consultation with the officers of the railroad company. Elliott, Collins & Co. were holders for value and before maturity, and their sale to satisfy the pledge conveyed their title to the purchaser. Whether the plaintiff was the purchaser from them directly, or not, is not clear; but, however this may be, he succeeds to all the rights of Elliott, Collins & Co., and occupies the position of a bona fide purchaser.

As against a bona fide holder of the coupons, none of the defences interposed are tenable. Most of these defences are unavailing, within the doctrine of Munson v. Town of Lyons, [Case No. 9,935.] The petition upon which the county judge took cognizance of the proceedings for bonding the town was sufficient to call for the exercise of his judicial judgment; and, in an action on the bonds by a bona fide holder, this determination is conclusive.

It is urged, that there was no organized railroad company in behalf of which the town could extend its aid, because the articles of association fail to state the counties through which it is to run, as required by the general railroad act under which it is organized, and specify only the termini of the road. I am utterly unable to appreciate the argument. The road was actually organized, and if, in the manner of its organization, it failed to comply with such provisions of the statute, this could only be taken advantage of by the sovereign power; and after its corporate existence has been recognized by two subsequent acts of the legislature, it would, I think, be too late for the state to assail it.

It is also urged, that the bonds, when issued, were not sealed. I do not stop to inquire whether they were required to be sealed. It suffices that there is no sufficient evidence to show that they were not. The testimony of witnesses, that they do not remember to have seen seals on the bonds when they were delivered, in the absence of any pretence, even, that their attention was directed to the circumstance whether the seals were on, is entirely insufficient to authorize the conclusion that the offence of forgery has been committed by any one.

It is also urged, that the bonds contravene the statute under which they were issued, because not payable at the time required by it. The act of 1871, does not repeal section four of the act of 1869, but confers the right to issue bonds payable in less than thirty years, and, when thus issued, they are subject to the condition therein imposed. But, the right to issue pursuant to the terms of the first act still exists, and the bonds in suit conform to the terms.

The reversal of the judgment of the county judge by the supreme court cannot invalidate the title of a bona fide purchaser. The bonds had been issued and put in circulation prior to the reversal. The judgment was effectual when they were put in circulation. After they were given currency, no decision of the court could strip them of their negotiable character.

Judgment is ordered for Stewart.

BAILEY v. LOEB et al.

[2 Woods, 578;[1] 11 N. B. R. 271; 2 Cent. Law J. 42.]

Circuit Court, M. D. Alabama. Jan., 1875.

BANKRUPTCY—CLAIM FOR RENT AFTER BANKRUPTCY—LIEN UNDER STATE LAW.

1. The bankrupts became the lessees of premises for one year, and were adjudicated bankrupt within two months after the beginning of the term: Held, that rent, which accrued after the adjudication, could not be proved or allowed as a debt against the bankrupt estate, [under the bankrupt act of March 2, 1867, (14 Stat. 517, c. 176.)]

2. Where the law of the state gave the landlord a lien upon the goods and chattels on the demised premises to secure the rent for one year, and the lessees were adjudged bankrupt before the end of the year: Held, that the landlord had no lien on the goods and chattels, for rent which accrued after the bankruptcy and after the premises were surrendered.

3. The law of Alabama (Rev. Code, § 2878) does not give the landlord a lien for rent upon goods and chattels of a tenant found upon the premises, held by lease for one or more years; but as between an execution creditor and the landlord, simply declares that the latter shall be entitled to priority of payment out of the proceeds of the goods, to the extent of one year's rent.

[On appeal from the district court of the United States for the middle district of Alabama.

[In bankruptcy. Application by Loeb & Brother for an order compelling Bailey, assignee of the bankrupts, Shulman, Frankferter & Co., to pay rent for certain premises occupied by the bankrupts. The district court granted the order in part. Heard on the assignee's petition for a review and reversal of this decision. Granted, and order of district court annulled.]

At chambers.

This cause was a petition to review the action of the district court, [unreported,] sitting as a court of bankruptcy. The conceded facts were as follows: The defendants, Loeb & Brother, were the owners of a store room in the city of Montgomery. They leased the same to the bankrupts, Shulman, Frankferter & Co., for the term of one year, commencing on the first day of October, 1873, for a yearly rent of $1,800, payable in monthly installments of $150. A petition in involuntary bankruptcy was filed against the lessees on the 25th of November, 1873, and they were soon after adjudged bankrupts. At the date of the adjudication, they were the owners of a stock of goods which was upon the demised premises. The goods were seized by order of the bankrupt court, and remained on the premises until they were sold out by the assignee, who received the proceeds of the sale, which were more than enough to pay the rent for the entire year. The bankrupts did not occupy the store after they were adjudicated bankrupts; but it was occupied by the assignee from that date up to the 28th of January, 1874. After the last mentioned date, the assignee did not occupy the premises, nor did he let them to any other person. The rent of the store room was paid in full up to the time of the bankruptcy, and the assignee paid, as a part of the expenses of administration, the rent from the date of the bankruptcy up to the 28th of January, 1874. On that day he gave up the possession of the premises to the landlords, it being stipulated that they would not hold the assignee individually liable, upon any claim for rent, and the assignee agreeing that the acceptance of the premises by the landlords should not affect any rights or liens against the bankrupts' estate, which the landlords might have for the payment of rent to accrue after January 28th. Loeb & Brother claimed to have a lien upon the goods which were upon the premises at the time of the bankruptcy, for the eight months and three days' rent, from January 28th to October 1, 1874. They applied to the district court to order the assignee to pay out of the proceeds of the goods the said rent, amounting to $1,200. That court directed the assignee to pay them $600, and required the lessors to give up any further claim. The assignee, claiming to be aggrieved by the action of the district court, filed this petition and asked that the order of the district court might be reviewed and reversed. The defendants, Loeb & Brother, claimed that the rent which fell due after the 28th of January, 1874, was a debt provable against the bankrupt estate, and that under the laws of Alabama, they had a lien for its payment upon the stock of goods which were stored upon the leased premises at the date of the bankruptcy, and that they were entitled to priority of payment out of the proceeds of the goods, for the rent up to October 15, 1874.

M. D. Graham and H. A. Herbert, for petitioner.

David Clopton, contra.

WOODS, Circuit Judge. The first question for decision is, can rent, to accrue in future, after an adjudication in bankruptcy, be proven and allowed as a debt against the bankrupts' estate?

The 19th section of the bankrupt act [March 2, 1867; 14 Stat. 525] (Rev. St. §§ 5067–5072) describes what debts may be proven, and it declares that no other debts than those specified in this section shall be proven or allowed against the estate. The case of rent falling due in the future, at fixed and stated periods, is specially provided for as follows: "When the bankrupt is liable to pay rent or other debt, falling due at fixed and stated periods, the creditor may prove for a proportionate part thereof up to the time of the bankruptcy, as if the same grew due from day to day, and not at such fixed and stated periods." The meaning of this clause admits of no doubt. In the case of rent falling due at fixed and stated periods, the creditor may prove his claim for so much rent as had accrued at the date of bankruptcy. For instance, if the rent is $1,200 per annum, payable in quarterly installments of $300, and at the close of the second month of a quarter the lessee is adjudged bankrupt, although there may be no rent yet due, nevertheless the landlord may prove his claim for $200, the rent accrued at the time of bankruptcy. But the last clause of the 19th section says, he shall prove for nothing more. So a proportionate part of debts, other than rent falling due at fixed and stated periods, may be proven in the same way. For instance, a business man has a manager or bookkeeper hired by the year, at a salary payable quarterly. At the end of two months he is adjudged bankrupt. His manager or bookkeeper may prove for a proportionate part of his salary up to the time of the bankruptcy, but he cannot prove for any part that may accrue and fall due after the bankruptcy. The clear purpose of the bankrupt act is, to cut off all claims for rent to accrue, or for services to be rendered, after the date of the bankruptcy. These views, so far as the question of rent is concerned, are supported by the following cases: Ex parte Houghton, [Case No. 6,725;] In re Webb, [Id. 17,315;] In re May, [Id. 9,325.] The only case I have found where a contrary view is taken is In re Winn, [Id. 18,117.] In the Case of Trim, [Id. 14,174,] cited by counsel for defendants, it does not appear whether the landlord was allowed to prove for rent which accrued after the bankruptcy or not. The case of Longstreth v. Pennock, [Id. 8,488,] also relied on by defendants, only decides that the assignee should pay the rent up to the date of bankruptcy, and for such time as he actually occupied the premises after bankruptcy. It does not decide that a claim for rent after the bankruptcy is provable; for what the assignee pays for the time during which he occupies the premises is part of the expenses of administration, and is not paid as a debt of the bankrupt estate. In the case of Longstreth v. Fenner, [Pennock,] no rent was claimed or allowed beyond the time when the assignee delivered up the premises. The 19th section of the bankrupt act is so clear upon the point under discussion, that it would require very great weight of authority to show that the rent, falling due at fixed and stated periods after the date of the bankruptcy, could be proven as a debt against the bankrupt estate. The law says plainly that such a claim shall not be proven or allowed. I am, therefore, of opinion that the claim of Loeb & Brother, for rent falling due after the 28th of January, 1874, which was after the bankruptcy, and after the surrender of the premises by the assignee, cannot be proven or allowed as a debt against the bankrupt estate.

It seems to be a necessary consequence of this, that Loeb & Brother can have no lien upon the assets of the bankrupts for any such claim. The bankrupt estate owes them nothing; they have no debt which the bankrupt estate is liable to pay. The existence of a lien upon the bankrupts' goods presupposes a debt which their goods are liable to pay. As there is no claim or debt, there can be no lien. The language of the 20th section of the bankrupt act [14 Stat. 526] seems to sustain this view. It is when a creditor has a lien on the real or personal estate of the bankrupt "for securing the payment of a debt owing to him from the bankrupt," that provision is made for preserving the lien. Rent to accrue in the future cannot be called a "debt owing." In fact it is well settled that it is not a debt at all, contingent or otherwise. Auriol v. Mills, 4 Term R. 94; Lansing v. Prendergast, 9 Johns. 127; Savory v. Stocking, 4 Cush. 607; Bosler v. Kuhn, 8 Watts. & S. 183; English v. Key, 39 Ala. 115. In the case last cited, it was held by R. W. Walker, J., that "except where it is payable in advance, no claim for rent arises until the lessee has enjoyed the premises for the whole time for which the payment of rent is stipulated to be made."

But even conceding that at the date of the bankruptcy there was a debt owing from the bankrupts to Loeb & Brother, on account of rent yet to accrue, which might be proved and allowed against the bankrupt's estate, is it a fact that under the laws of Alabama, such debt was secured by a lien upon the goods of the bankrupts found upon the leased premises? The statute under which Loeb & Brother claim their lien declares that "no execution must be levied on goods or chattels in possession of, and upon the premises of a tenant, held by lease for one or more years until the rent due, or to fall due during the current year, is paid or tendered to the landlord; * * * and the sheriff executing the writ must levy and sell as well for the repayment of the rent so tendered as for the satisfaction of the execution." Rev. Code Ala. § 2878. Clay's Digest of Laws of Alabama (page 506, § 3) contains a similar provision applicable to crops. It declares that "the crop grown on any rented land in this state shall not be taken by virtue of any execution, or removed off the premises of any such rented land, unless the party so taking the same shall, before removal of the crop from such premises, pay or tender to the landlord or lessee thereof all money due for the rent of said premises at the time of taking such crop in execution; provided such rent or arrears do not amount to more than one year's rent; * * * and the sheriff, or officer levying the same, is hereby empowered and required to levy and pay to the plaintiff, as well the money so paid for rent as the execution money." This last cited law has been construed by the supreme court of Alabama. In Frazier v. Thomas, 6 Ala. 169, it was held that this law did not give the landlord a lien upon the crop raised on rented land; it merely declared that, as between the landlord and an execution creditor, the former should be entitled to preference to the extent of one year's unpaid rent. See, also, Whidden v. Toulmin, 6 Ala. 104. I am unable to distinguish any material difference between the two statutes cited. If the latter does not give a lien, neither does the former. The ruling of the supreme court of Alabama, just cited, is followed in North v. Eslava, 12 Ala. 240, and Denham v. Harris, 13 Ala. 465. However much these rulings may be opposed by high authority, they are a construction of a law of this state which this court feels bound to follow. As there was no execution levied in this case, I am of opinion that Loeb & Brother did not acquire any lien for rent on the goods of the bankrupt found on the demised premises. On all grounds, therefore, their claim to priority of payment, out of the proceeds of said goods, should be disallowed. The result is, that the district court fell into error in recognizing the claim and lien of Loeb & Brother for $600. The order of the district court complained of is therefore annulled, and the claim and lien of Loeb & Brother disallowed.

PAYMENT—CONFEDERATE NOTES—THEIR INVALIDITY.

1. The securities known as "Confederate Treasury Notes," issued by the self-styled Confederate States, during the Civil War of 1861–65, although not "bills of credit," issued by a state, and as such prohibited by the constitution of the United States, (article 1, § 10, subd. 1,) were, nevertheless, illegal; because they were issued by a pretended government, organized in the name of certain states, by subjects of the United States, who were at the time in rebellion against the rightful government of the United States, with design to dismember and destroy it.

2. A promissory note given in consideration of such bills is void, and does not constitute a debt provable in bankruptcy.

Question upon the certificate of a register in bankruptcy.

ERSKINE, District Judge. In 1863, John Neal loaned twenty-five hundred dollars in "Confederate Treasury Notes," to Milner, the bankrupt, for which amount he made his promissory note to Neal. Subsequently Neal, in making a disposition of some of his property among his children and grandchildren, gave this note to his son-in-law, Samuel Bailey, in trust for minor children of Susan Beall, a daughter of Neal.

Bailey, as trustee, sought to prove this claim against the estate of the bankrupt. Counsel for the latter objected: First, because the consideration for the contract was Confederate treasury notes; secondly, because these notes were borrowed for the purpose of hiring a substitute to serve in the Confederate army, with the knowledge of Neal; and that the notes were so appropriated, and the substitute hired therewith did go into the said army.

Evidence being heard on these points, the register rejected the claim, and the proceedings were certified to the judge. The conclusion at which the register arrived was approved.

The party whose claim was thus rejected petitioned the judge for a re-hearing, on the ground that the testimony adduced—in proof of the second objection, in particular—was wholly insufficient to warrant the decision of the register, or affirmance by the court. A new hearing was granted before the register. The testimony on both sides is long and contradictory, with the exception that all agree that the loan was made in Confederate treasury notes.

The register adhered to the course of reasoning previously entertained by him, and gave the same judgment as before. Mr. Bailey being still dissatisfied with the ruling, the matter was again certified for review.

From the views which I entertain of the legal principles involved in this proceeding, it is not essential to an approval or disapproval of the conclusion at which the register arrived, that these Confederate treasury notes, or any portion of them, were used to procure a substitute to serve in the Confederate army, or that they were employed for any other purpose. The register holds, as he held at first, that the contract was illegal and void; and this result I approve and affirm. But I do not concur with him in one of the principal reasons advanced for his decision; and which reason is more prominently argued in his first written opinion than in his last, namely, that these notes are bills of credit within the sense of that term, as understood in the constitution.

"No state shall enter into any treaty, alliance, or confederation; grant letters of marque and reprisal; coin money; emit bills of credit," etc. Const. [U. S.] art. 1, § 10, subd. 1.

No disquisition on the origin of bills of credit, or history of their rise and progress, or of their fall, under the inhibition just cited, would aid in the determination of this case. Therefore, I will but remark that the great minds that framed the constitution were, from recent experience, aware of the blighting effect on the domestic and foreign commerce of the states, and on the welfare of the whole country, which flowed from the almost indiscriminate issuing of these bills by the colonies, and afterwards by the states, as money, among the people, to suffer its perpetuation, or to longer tolerate it to the states; and time has proven the wisdom of their statesmanship.

So far as I have been able to ascertain, all paper answering to bills of credit put forth during the war of independence were promises to pay. But be this so or not, the supreme court of the United States, in Craig v. Missouri, 4 Pet. [29 U. S.] 410, held that a paper currency emitted by a state, and receivable in discharge of all debts and taxes due the state, and of all salaries and fees of office, &c. &c.—and pledging the faith and funds of the state for the redemption of these paper issues—was within the constitutional prohibition.

The same court, in Briscoe v. Bank of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, 11 Pet. [36 U. S.] 258, gave the following comprehensive definition of a bill of credit: "The definition, then, which does include all classes of bills of credit emitted by the colonies or states, is a paper issued by the sovereign power, containing a pledge of its faith, and designed to circulate as money."

Taking this definition, as imparted by the highest judicial tribunal in the land, as a guide, it will conduct to a correct conclusion of the endeavor to ascertain whether these treasury notes, or bills, issued by the so-called Confederate States, fall within it.

Although it is declared that no state shall emit bills of credit, yet if two or more of the states ally themselves, or confederate together, and on their faith and credit issue these bills, I apprehend the inhibition would apply with a force equally as direct and controlling against the allied or confederate states as against a single one.

Here is a copy of one of these treasury notes: "Fundable in eight per cent. stock or bonds of the Confederate States. Six months after a ratification of a treaty of peace between the Confederate States and the United States, the Confederate States of America will pay five dollars to bearer. Richmond, September 2, 1861. Receivable in payment of all dues except export duties."

Then follow the names of a register and treasurer. One decision—and only one—on this subject has been brought to my notice; that is the case of Bank of Tennessee v. Union Bank of Louisiana, [Case No. 899,] lately tried before Judge Durell and a jury, in the circuit court of the United States for the eastern district of Louisiana.

The judge is there reported to have said, in his charge to the jury, "That Confederate treasury notes issued by said government, and circulated as money, were bills of credit within the meaning of the constitution, and therefore an unlawful issue." The views which present themselves to my mind do not terminate in accord with the opinion expressed by the learned judge.

During the latter part of the year 1860, and in the early part of 1861, South Carolina, Georgia, Louisiana, Virginia, and other states, by similar modes, called on the people to send delegates to meet in convention. Accordingly, these conventions assembled, and each passed an ordinance of secession, as it is generally termed, by which ceremony these conventions severally adventured to withdraw the states from the Federal Union, and to release the people from their subjection to the laws of the land, and their allegiance to the nation. The constitutional state governments were overthrown, and superseded by spurious and revolutionary governments. The setting up of a pretended central or general government, styled "The Confederate States of America," followed; and, soon thereafter, open rebellion and war of portentous magnitude burst upon the nation. Prize Cases, 2 Black, [67 U. S.] 635; Shortridge v. Macon, United States circuit court, district of North Carolina, opinion of the

In the seceded states (so-called) the sovereign authority being, for the time, displaced, consequently there ceased to be, within any of them, a government under the constitution of the United States. Then, can it be said that the usurping power could pledge the faith of the state by a public law, or otherwise, for the payment of the notes or bills issued by the so-called Confederate States of America? Or could this pretended central government bind any of those states for the redemption of these notes?

But these Confederate treasury notes or bills do not pretend to have been emitted by a state, or a combination of states of the Union; nor can it be inferred from indicia found upon them—nor can their recondite history show—that they emanated from the sovereign power, and on the faith of any of the states. And thus it will be seen, that they did not possess the characteristic attributes of bills of credit, in accordance with the definition of the supreme court of the United States;—they did not issue by virtue of the sovereignty of the state, nor did they rest for their currency on the faith of the state pledged by a public law. Darrington v. State Bank of Alabama, 13 How. [54 U. S.] 12.

Notwithstanding these notes or bills were not, in my judgment, bills of credit within the prohibition contained in section 10 of article 1 of the constitution, yet they were none the less illegal; they were issued by a pretended government, organized in the name of certain states, by subjects and citizens of the United States, and who, at the very time, were in rebellion against their rightful government, and whose design and object it was to "dismember and destroy it." Prize Cases; Shortridge v. Macon, supra.

It may not be wholly unimportant to remark that it is a well established doctrine of the courts that a wide distinction exists between an executed and an executory contract. In the former case courts of justice will not, as a general rule, interfere between the parties, to set the contract aside, but will leave them where they placed themselves; and this, too, notwithstanding the contract be in part only founded on an illegal consideration.

Nevertheless, any person owning property may, if no fraud be put upon him, and no misrepresentation, or circumvention, or covin enter into the transaction, alienate it conditionally or absolutely, for what currency or thing he chooses, or even give it away.

But an executory contract, like this claim of Bailey, the trustee, [against the bankrupt Milner,][2] nevertheless, will not be enforced. The principles of law directly applicable to executory contracts, based upon illegality, were long since determined by the courts, both in England and in this country. One case only will be referred to. The doctrine on this subject, as laid down by Mr. Justice Washington, in Toler v. Armstrong, [Case No. 14,078,] is so succinctly announced that it is best it be given in his own words: "I understand the rule, as now already settled, to be, that where the contract grows immediately out of, and is connected with an illegal or immoral act, a court of justice will not lend its aid to enforce it. And if the contract be in part only connected with the illegal transaction, and growing immediately out of it, though it be in fact a new contract, it is equally tainted by it."

If this demand of twenty-five hundred dollars were allowed, the dividends of the creditors, arising from the assets would, of course, be diminished that amount—and this without any fault on their part, but wholly through the illegal dealings of the bankrupt and Neal. Bankruptcy Law, § 22, [Act March 2, 1867, § 22; 14 Stat. 537.]

I may add that the law, in allowing a guilty party to take advantage of the illegality of his own act—as is here done by the bankrupt—does so, not with a view of conferring a benefit on him, but upon grounds of public policy; and also, in this case, that injustice may not be done to the creditors of the bankrupt.

The decision of the register is approved. The clerk will certify this opinion to Mr. Register Murray.

NOTE, [from original report.] This case and Cuyler v. Ferrill, [Case No. 3,523,] should be read in connection with the later decision of the supreme court in Thorington v. Smith, 8 Wall. [75 U. S.] 1. It is there held, in an action to recover the agreed price in a contract of sale of property made in the usual course of business, and which price was, by the actual intent and understanding of the parties, payable in Confederate notes, that a contract made between persons residing in the so-called Confederate States, during the Rebellion, and expressed to be payable in Confederate notes, but having no other tendency or purpose to aid the Rebellion than the mere fact of its treating Confederate paper as the currency in which it should be discharged, may be enforced by action in the courts of the United States. Although the government of the Confederate States was not a de facto government in the highest sense known to the law, it was for the time being a government of paramount force. It acquired an actual supremacy, which indeed is not a legal defense for acts of hostility performed under it towards the United States, but which rendered submission to its authority in civil and local matters, not only a necessity but a duty. The notes issued by its authority must be regarded as a currency imposed on the community by an irresistible force. They must be regarded in our courts in the same light as if they had been issued by a foreign government temporarily occupying a part of the territory of the United States. Contracts stipulating for payment in such currency cannot be regarded, merely for that reason, as made in aid of the insurrection. They are free from blame except proved to have been made with actual intent to promote the insurrection. And they should be enforced in the courts of the United States, after the restoration of peace, to the extent of their just obligation.

[2 N. B. R. 478, (Quarto, 151;) 2 Amer. Law T. Rep. Bankr. 60; 1 Chi. Leg. News, 185.]

BANKRUPTCY—PROOF OF NOTES PLEDGED AS COLLATERAL.

[Promissory notes for $1,100, which were invalid in the hands of the payee, were pledged by him to secure an indebtedness of $147.35. Held, that on the bankruptcy of the maker the pledgee was entitled, under the bankrupt act of March 2, 1867, (14 Stat. 517, c. 176,) to prove against the bankrupt estate the full amount of the notes, and to receive dividends thereon to the extent of $147.35, and that the proof should not be restricted to the sum of $147.35, the amount of the debt secured by the pledge of the notes.]

[In bankruptcy. Petition by Bailey, assignee of Warner & Curtis, bankrupts, against T. W. Nichols, payee of promissory notes made by the bankrupts, and Hower & Co., indorsees. Prayer that the notes be canceled, except as to the interest of Hower & Co. Granted. Prayer that Hower & Co. be allowed to prove and receive dividends on only the amount of the notes. Denied.]

SHERMAN, District Judge. In March, 1868, Warner & Curtis purchased of T. W. Nichols a patent right, which was afterwards discovered to be of no value, and gave, among other things, their two promissory notes, one for five hundred dollars, due in eight months, and one for six hundred dollars, due in twelve months. In May, 1868, Nichols purchased goods of Hower & Co., to the amount of one hundred and forty-seven dollars and thirty-five cents, and gave them the above-named notes as collateral security for the payment of his indebtedness. It is admitted that the notes are valid in the hands of Hower & Co., but as to Nichols, they are void, the patent for which they were given being worthless, and he, in fact, subsequently agreeing to cancel them. Warner & Curtis were declared bankrupts, June 1, 1868, and Bailey appointed their assignee June 16, 1868. The petition prays: First, that Nichols may be decreed to surrender the two notes and they be cancelled, except so far as the interest of Hower & Co. is concerned; and second, that Hower & Co. may only prove said notes to the amount of one hundred and forty-seven dollars and thirty-five cents, and receive dividends on that sum. The first prayer is, of course, granted, as it carries into effect the agreement made between Nichols and Warner & Curtis.

The second involves this question. Can Hower & Co. prove against the estate of Warner & Curtis such an amount on the two notes that the dividends thereof will be sufficient to pay the full amount of one hundred and forty-seven dollars and thirty-five cents, or is it only allowable to prove to the extent of one hundred and forty-seven dollars and thirty-five cents, and receive dividends on that amount. When negotiable paper is deposited as collateral security, as this was, it is a pawn or pledge vesting a special property in the pawnee, with a right to detain it as security for the debt, and leaving the general property in the pawnor. Garlick v. James, 12 Johns. 146. When the pledge is negotiable paper, the pledgee cannot compromise with parties to the paper for less than the whole sum due on the paper, and if he does, he will be compelled to account to the pledgor for the full value. 15 Mass. 534; 12 Ind. He has a right to sue the paper and recover the full amount in his own name. Indeed, it has been held, that in the absence of a special power, he has no right to sell, but he may apply to a court of equity for a foreclosure and sale, and the purchaser in that case could certainly prove and receive dividends on the whole amount of the security. The pledge, in all cases, is a security for the whole and every part of the debt. The payment of a part still leaves the whole security a perfect pledge for the residue of the debt. Story, Bailm. § 301.

These principles show very clearly that Hower & Co. can hold the two notes until their debt is paid; that they have no right to compromise without the assent of Nichols; that they may sue and recover on the notes in their own name, and that the whole of both notes are as much security for the last, as the first dollar of their claim. This being so, it follows that they have the right to prove both notes against the estate of the bankrupts, or as much of the same as will secure dividends to the amount of one hundred and forty-seven dollars and thirty-five cents, their claim. This doctrine was expressly ruled by Lord Thurlow in Re Crossley, 3 Brown, Ch. 237; and by Lord Eldon in 6 Ves. 449, 600. And also in 1 P. Wms. 582. I am therefore compelled by these authorities to order, first, that Nichols surrender the two notes and that they be cancelled, except as to the interest of Hower & Co. in them; second, that Hower and Co. are entitled to receive, and that they be paid dividends on the amount of said two notes to the extent of one hundred and forty-seven dollars and thirty-five cents, and no more.

BANKS AND BANKING—NATIONAL BANKS—LIABILITY OF STOCKHOLDERS — ASSESSMENT BY THE COMPTROLLER—REMEDY.

1. In winding up an insolvent national bank the comptroller of the currency is vested with authority to determine when a deficiency of assets exists, so that the individual liability of the stockholders may be enforced, and no appeal lies from his decision.

[Cited in Young v. Wempe, 46 Fed. 355.]

2. The liability of a stockholder of a national bank is several. When a specific assessment upon the stockholders is ordered by the comptroller, a suit at law is a proper remedy to enforce it.

[Cited in Young v. Wempe, 46 Fed. 355.]

At law. This is a common law action brought [by C. P. Bailey, receiver, against Andrew J. Sawyer] to enforce the individual liability of a stockholder in the First National Bank of Duluth, and to recover the amount of an assessment ordered by the comptroller of the currency, to the extent of seventy-five per centum of the par value of the shares of the capital stock of said bank, under and by virtue of the act of congress in relation to national banks. A demurrer is interposed to the complaint. [Overruled.]

Upon the argument it is urged:

1. That the complaint should set forth the facts and data upon which the comptroller determined that a necessity existed which authorized proceedings to enforce the individual liability of stockholders.

2. That the suit should have been in equity, and not at law.

Mr. W. W. Billson, for demurrer.

Messrs. Ensign and Cash, contra.

NELSON, District Judge. The comptroller of the currency, by virtue of the national banking law, in winding up an insolvent bank, is vested with authority to determine when a deficiency of assets exists, so that the individual liability of the stockholders may be enforced. This liability is conditional, and was so held in Bank v. Kennedy, 17 Wall. [84 U. S.] 22, but the comptroller, in the exercise of a judicial discretion, decides, upon the data before him, when "it is necessary" to compel contributions from stockholders to pay the debts of the bank. The law clothes him with this authority, and no appeal lies from his decision by a stockholder. He appoints a receiver, and resorts to the ultimate remedy whenever, in his judgment, the condition of the bank requires its enforcement. And, as stated in Kennedy v. Gibson, 8 Wall. [75 U. S.] 504, a more speedy settlement of the affairs of an insolvent bank is thus obtained. Again, this obligation of the stockholder is fixed when he becomes a member of the corporation by taking stock therein, and is several, not joint. There is no necessity for invoking the aid of a court of chancery to determine the sum each stockholder must pay, for that is regulated by the number of shares of stock owned. When the comptroller declares and orders an assessment, the precise amount each stockholder must contribute is a certain exact sum. A suit at law would seem to be the suitable proceeding to collect the assessment.

Demurrer overruled.

BAILEY et al. v. SCHELL.

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Nov. 23, 1863.

CUSTOMS DUTIES—PROPERTY SUBJECT TO — CORAL CAMEO ACTS JULY 30, 1846, AND MARCH 3, 1857.

1. Under the tariff act of July 30th, 1846, (9 Stat. 44,) as amended by the tariff act of March 3, 1857, (11 Stat. 192,) coral, cut into the form of a cameo, and not set, and known as a coral cameo, in commerce, is liable to a duty of 24 per cent. ad valorem, under schedule C of the former act, as amended by the latter act, as "coral, cut or manufactured," and is not liable to a duty of only 8 per cent. ad valorem, as "cameos, not set."

2. The specific description in the act of 1846 must prevail over the commercial designation known at the time of the passage of that act.

At law. This was an action [by Eli W. Bailey and others] against [Augustus Schell] the collector of the port of New York, to recover back an alleged excess of duty paid, under protest, on coral cameos, not set. [Judgment for defendant.]

Daniel T. Walden, for plaintiffs.

E. Delafield Smith, Dist. Atty., for defendant.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. The cameos in question were charged with a duty of twenty-four per cent. ad valorem, under the act of March 3, 1857, (11 Stat. 192,) which reduces the duties imposed by schedule C of the act of July 30, 1846, (9 Stat. 44.) The plaintiffs claim that the proper duty was only eight per cent. ad valorem, under schedule G of the act of 1846, as amended by the act of 1857, on the ground that the article is "cameos, not set." It is invoiced as coral cameos. Schedule C of the act of 1846 imposes a duty on "coral, cut or manufactured." The article in question is coral cut into the form of a cameo, and not set; and the question is, whether the commercial designation of the article, which prevailed at the time of the passage of the act of 1846, shall govern, or the construction of the words of the statute. I am inclined to think, the latter. As the article is "coral, cut or manufactured," although it may have had a fixed designation previously, from its shape and fashion, yet, it was quite competent for congress to designate it by a specific material description, which necessarily takes it out of the one known to the trade. This has been a not unusual mode adopted by congress for the very purpose of taking away the power of fixing any other designation in commercial language. Inasmuch as the article comes within the very words of the specific description, I do not see that the evidence of the commercial designation can be allowed to prevail.

Judgment for the defendant.

BAILEY et al. v. The SONORA.

[Hoff. Op. 465.]

District Court, N. D. California. Nov. 28, 1859.

CARRIERS OF PASSENGERS—INSUFFICIENCY OF ACCOMMODATIONS.

[1. A passenger on a steamship, whether in first cabin, second cabin, or steerage, is entitled to such accommodations and conveniences as the exercise of reasonable care and the adoption of reasonable means for securing them can afford.]

[2. Second cabin passengers cannot complain of the discomfort necessarily incidental to a tropical voyage in a second cabin below the first, but they may demand that the number of passengers in the second cabin shall not be greater than it is capable of containing; that every reasonable facility for washing, etc., shall be afforded; that men and women shall not have berths or bunks assigned to them promiscuously, without adequate arrangements to secure privacy; that all proper measures to secure cleanliness, ventilation, etc., shall be adopted; and that the second cabin devoted to the use of passengers shall not be lumbered up with baggage belonging to the other passengers, so as to prevent the free use of the accommodations ostensibly given.]

[See Sparks v. The Sonora, Case No. 13,212.]

[3. In a libel for breach of contract with libelants, as second cabin passengers, it appeared that the vessel was crowded. For 198 second cabin passengers, only two wash basins were provided. Two parallel rows of standee bunks, running fore and aft, were erected in the cabin. Only a few inches of space separated the rows, and the berths in some instances were assigned to persons of different sex and strangers to each other. The voyage was through the tropics, and, as is usual, a large number of the passengers occupied the decks at night; but they were unable to retire until 11 P. M., and were aroused at 3 or 3:30 A. M., when the decks were washed. The mattresses used by these passengers were thrown down the hatchway of the second cabin, materially obstructing ingress and egress. The lower tier of standee berths was taken out, and baggage piled up in its place, in such quantities as to obstruct passage and prevent the proper cleansing of the cabin. From these and other causes, the air of the second cabin rendered its occupation incompatible with comfort, and perhaps with health. The drinking water was so hot as to be unfit for use, except after being cooled with ice, and passengers were charged twenty-five cents per pound for the ice. Held, that though some of the discomforts were to a certain extent incidental to a tropical voyage in a second cabin, the libelants had established a breach of the contract.]

[4. Held, also, that as the discomfort suffered by the women was greater than that experienced by the men, a discrimination should be made in the amount of damages, and that the female passengers should recover the full amount paid for their passage, and the male passengers one-half of that sum.]

[In admiralty. Libel by Bailey and others against the steamship Sonora to recover damages for breach of contract with libelants as passengers. Decree for libelants.]

Robt. Rankin, for libelant.

Hall McAllister, for claimant.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. The libel in this case is filed to recover damages for breach of contract with libellants as passengers. As to the principal facts of the case, the testimony does not leave much room for doubt. The most that can be alleged on the part of the claimants is that the discomforts and sufferings of the passengers, by reason of insufficient accommodations, have been somewhat exaggerated. In a recent case of a similar character, this court had occasion to advert to the extreme difficulty of determining with precision the degree of comfort which the owner of a steamer engaged in the transportation of passengers impliedly agrees to afford. That some inconveniences and discomforts incidental to a voyage in tropical latitudes, and on a steamer conveying passengers in large numbers, must necessarily be submitted to, is obvious. But in the absence of express stipulations, it is not easy to define the character of the accommodations which the passenger has a right to expect, or the degree of discomfort to which he must submit. It may be stated, however, in general terms, that the passenger, whether in first cabin, second cabin, or steerage, is entitled to expect such accommodations and conveniences as the exercise of reasonable care, and the adoption of reasonable means for securing them as the owner can afford him. He cannot, of course, expect that the accommodations of the second cabin shall be as good as those in the first; nor that the discomfort necessarily incidental to a tropical voyage in a second cabin, below the first, and filled with passengers, shall be avoided. But he may demand that the number of passengers in the second cabin shall not be greater than it is capable of containing; that every reasonable facility for washing, etc., shall be afforded; that men and women should not have berths or bunks assigned to them promiscuously, without adequate arrangements to secure privacy; that all proper measures to secure cleanliness, ventilation, etc., should be adopted, and that the second cabin, devoted to the use of passengers, should not be lumbered up with baggage belonging to the other passengers, so as to prevent the free use of the accommodations ostensibly afforded them.

I do not consider it necessary in this case to recapitulate the evidence. It will be sufficient to state the facts which seem to have been clearly established. It appears that the vessel was crowded with passengers, to an extent which, though not so great as on a previous voyage, nevertheless appears to have been greater than was consistent with their comfort, or, probably, with the provisions of the law. It is shown that for 198 second cabin passengers only two wash basins were provided, thus depriving them, and especially the females, of the means of securing personal cleanliness. That two parallel rows of standee bunks, running fore and aft, were erected in the cabin. These rows were separated by a space only a few inches wide—and the berths were in some instances assigned to persons of different sex and strangers to each other. Such an arrangement it was no doubt the desire of the agents of the company to avoid. But it appears to have been made, in this instance, probably owing to the difficulty of properly regulating the matter with so large a number of passengers on board. It appears, that as is usual, a large number of passengers occupied the decks of the vessel at night. It can hardly be alleged that having enjoyed that privilege, they have nothing to complain of—for it is shown that they could not retire until about 11 P. M., and were aroused in the morning at 3 or 3½ A. M., at which time preparations for washing decks commenced. The mattresses used by these passengers appear to have been thrown down the hatchway of the second cabin, materially obstructing the ingress to and egress from that part of the vessel. It is also shown that the lower tier of standee berths was taken out and baggage piled up in its place —and that this baggage was in such quantities as to obstruct the passage way between the middle and side berths, and in a considerable degree to prevent the proper cleansing of the cabin. It appears that from these and other causes, the air of the second cabin was in such condition as to render its occupation incompatible with comfort, and perhaps with health, a fact which may naturally be inferred from the circumstance that so many of the passengers, and amongst them some women, preferred to sleep on deck on a mattress with no bedding, and where they were compelled to rise every morning at 3 or 3½ A. M. It is also shown that the drinking water furnished to the second cabin during nearly the whole voyage was so hot as to be unfit for use, except after being cooled with ice, and that they were charged twenty-five cents per pound for the ice they obtained for the purpose. The foregoing are the principal matters relied on by the libellants, as showing a breach of their contract.

It is obvious that to a certain extent some of the discomforts complained of were incidental to a voyage of this description, by passengers who had only the right to a second cabin passage. It could not be claimed, for example, that each second cabin passenger should have had a washing basin for his exclusive use; but it might justly be expected that more than two basins would be provided for 198 passengers. That those who occupied the second cabin should suffer some discomfort from foul air, &c., was unavoidable, for a considerable number of passengers could not be placed in a single cabin between decks without being far less agreeably situated than if they had occupied state rooms on the deck above. But they had a right to expect that the floor of their cabin should not be converted into a baggage room for the first cabin baggage; that passengers should not be put in the cabin in such numbers as to make it uninhabitable, and that the number on board the vessel should not be so great as to prevent the ordinary means of ventilation (i. e. opening of port holes) from being available. If standee berths of the construction testified to were to be used, women, at least, had a right to expect that they would not be assigned promiscuously to persons of a different sex. That it may have been necessary to arouse those who slept on the decks at a very early hour for the purpose of washing decks may be admitted; if passengers chose, nevertheless, to occupy the decks, it may be said to have been their own choice to do so. But to make this an available answer to the complaint on this score, it should appear that other accommodations were afforded to such passengers which were as comfortable as their contracts entitled them to claim, and which they could have used without injury to health or exposure to physical suffering. Whatever difference of opinion may exist as to the precise character of the accommodations to which second cabin passengers are entitled on such a voyage, or the degree of discomfort to which they must submit, it must, I think, be conceded that they were at least entitled to a full supply of water fit to drink. It cannot, surely, be claimed to have been a fulfilment of the contract to offer them hot water, which was only palatable after being cooled with ice, which the passengers were obliged to purchase. If it had appeared in this case that every reasonable precaution had been taken, and means adopted to provide for the wants and proper accommodation of the passengers, but that through unforeseen accidents, they had been exposed to more than ordinary annoyances, it might have been urged that such accidents ought not to be regarded as breaches of the passenger contract. But in this case it seems to me that all the grievances of which they complain can be referred directly or indirectly to the fact that the vessel was overcrowded. The officers, no doubt, did all that lay in their power to promote the comfort of the passengers. But the large number on board rendered their efforts, to a great extent, ineffectual. It is to this cause that we must attribute the confusion which occurred in the assignment of berths—the necessity of stowing the baggage in the second cabin—they take with them good and substantial reasons the inadequate provision for facilities for washing, etc.—and for the same reason, it is testified, it became impracticable to open the port holes and properly ventilate the cabin. It seems to me, therefore, that the grievances complained of must be regarded as breaches of the contract, which the ship could have readily avoided, and for which it should be held responsible.

The amount of damages to be decreed is, necessarily, arbitrary, to a certain extent. No complaint is made as to the provisions furnished the passengers; nor does it appear that sickness prevailed to any considerable extent. No other suffering is shown than that which would necessarily arise from the nature of the accommodations afforded. The passengers arrived in the usual time and in safety. In attempting to estimate the degree of suffering to which, from the various causes mentioned, the passengers were subjected, it is, I think, evident that to the women it must have been greater than to the men. I think, therefore, that a discrimination should be made in the amount of the damages to be awarded. I shall decree to the female libellants the sum admitted in the answer to have been paid by them respectively for their passages on the Sonora, and to each of the men one-half that sum. A decree to this effect must be entered.

Circuit Court, S. D. Ohio. April Term, 1868.

EQUITY—PLEADING—STATUTE OF FRAUDS.

1. Where a bill in equity charges acts of fraud, and sets up, among other things, an agreement by a defendant to execute a mortgage of real estate, and avers a failure and refusal to execute such mortgage, such defendant cannot, by plea, aver the invalidity of such agreement as a parol agreement and void under the statute of frauds, but will be required by answer to respond to the allegations of the bill.

2. The court will require all the facts to be presented to enable it to decide whether the plea of the statute of frauds will be available.

[Cited in McCloskey v. Barr, 38 Fed. 170.]

[In equity. Bill by William Bailey against C. J. Wright and H. Craft charging fraud in their failure to execute a certain mortgage. Heard on motion of complainant to strike defendants' plea from the files, and require them to answer to the merits. Motion allowed.]

R. M. Corwine, for complainant.

John L. Miner and George R. Sage, for defendants.

OPINION OF THE COURT. The bill in this case alleges, in substance, that upon certain false and fraudulent representations by the defendants, the complainant was induced to make an advance to them of $20,000, to be invested in the purchase of cotton for the benefit of all the parties. It is averred, also, that as an inducement for making said advance, and an indemnity therefor, the defendant Wright represented himself as the owner of valuable real estate in Cincinnati, which he promised to mortgage to the complainant to secure him against loss for said advance in money. The bill contains direct allegations of fraud on the part of defendants, prays for an account, and for a decree requiring the defendant Wright to execute a mortgage on the real estate in Cincinnati, according to his promise.

The defendant Wright has filed a plea to the bill, denying all the allegations of fraud, and averring as to the averments of the b that he promised to execute a mortgage of real estate, that if any such promise was made, it was verbal, and therefore void under the statute of frauds. The pending motion in the case is for an order to withdraw the plea from the files, and to require an answer to the merits. The only question intended to be presented on this motion is, whether, under the allegations of the bill, the defendant Wright can rely on his averment that the promise to execute the mortgage was void under the statute of frauds, without an answer in response to the charges of fraud in obtaining the advances of money by the complainant. The defendant has an undoubted right to set up that the agreement to mortgage was by parol, and therefore void. But the law seems now to be well settled, that where facts are asserted in a bill, the effect of which may be to take a verbal agreement out of the operation of the statute of frauds, it is incumbent on the respondent to respond by answer to such facts. This would seem to be the fair construction of the thirty-second rule of the rules of practice in chancery, adopted by the supreme court for the guidance of the courts of the United States. And such seems to be the law applicable to the question, as laid down by Judge Story. Story, Eq. Pl. 591.

It is clear that a plea merely setting up the invalidity of an agreement under the statute of frauds, where other facts are averred in the bill in support of the complainant's equity, and which may be of a character to require a court to ignore the plea of the statute, the defendant should be required to file his answer to such facts. Such, it seems to the court, is in accordance with the spirit and design of the thirty-second rule before referred to. And without deeming it necessary, in deciding the present motion, to refer to the frauds alleged in the bill, and without intimating any opinion upon the question, whether, if the frauds charged were proved, the legal effect would be to supersede the plea of the statute of frauds, and present the entire transaction for inquiry on the broad principles of equity, an order will be entered requiring the defendants to file their answer to the bill. There can be no hardship in such an order. The defendants should gladly avail themselves of the opportunity of denying the frauds charged. I trust they will be able to acquit themselves of all imputations impugning their integrity in the transactions set out in the bill.

Case No. 750.

BAILEY WASHING & WRINGING MACH. CO v. LINCOLN et al.

[4 Fish. Pat. Cas. 379;[1] Merw. Pat. Inv. 108.]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. March, 1871.

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS—PROCESS AND RESULT—LATER DISCOVERIES—MECHANICAL EQUIVALENTS.

1. Although an inventor may not be informed of the particular value of the material which he employs, yet if he employs it no one else can patent its use in the same way by discovering its peculiar value.

2. Although one element of a combination may be old, and a subsequent inventor may have made in it an immaterial improvement, yet if he have combined it with other devices, he may hold the combination against those who have invented nothing, but have merely substituted the old element in the new combination.

3. A claim for a result, by whatever means obtained, or for a process, to whatever substance applied, which might be applicable to substances yet undiscovered, would be too broad.

4. In patents for a machine, a statement that the parts may be made of any suitable materials, means known materials. If it did not, one who should afterward discover a new material would have no right to make the machine.

5. A process or means would be extended beyond the real invention if they included later discoveries. But a machine is independent of such discoveries.

6. In a patent for a machine the patentee, by the phrase, "any suitable material," intends to point out that the arrangement or combination does not depend on the use of the precise material where others may serve the purpose.

7. Under the decision in Stimpson v. Woodman, [10 Wall. (77 U. S.)] 117, it would not be invention to combine a known tool with a known machine, if the combination required nothing beyond the ordinary skill of the mechanic.

8. In a doubtful case, it can not but exercise great influence on the determination that the defendants have obtained possession of an alleged prior machine and have not produced it.

9. A rubber roller covered with cloth is not the equivalent of a roller having an exterior surface of rubber.

10. Reissued letters patent of John Allender for "improved roller for expressing water from clothes," dated April 18, 1865, examined and sustained.

[Disapproved in Bailey Wringing Mach. Co. v. Adams, Case No. 752.]

In equity. This was a bill in equity filed to restrain the defendants [Alexander Lincoln and others] from infringing letters patent for "improved roller for expressing water from clothes," granted to John Allender, January 11, 1859, assigned to S. A. Bailey, S. S. Cook, and B. M. Cook, and reissued to them June 28, 1864; again reissued November 8, 1864, and again April 18, 1865, and assigned to complainants. [Decree for complainants. For other suits involving the same letters patent, see Bailey Washing Mach. Co. v. Young, Case No. 751; Bailey Wringing Mach. Co. v. Adams, Id. 752; and Eureka Clothes Wringing Mach. Co. v. Bailey W. & W. Mach. Co., 11 Wall. (78 U. S.) 488.]

The claims of the original and the several reissues were as follows:

Original patent:

"I claim a roller I, consisting of a spirally coiled spring J, arranged on a shaft or roller made smallest in the middle (to allow the spring to yield,) covered with India rubber, or some flexible material, that will yield or bend readily, as the spring J yields to the cloth, clothes, or other article being squeezed by the rollers."

[1] [Reported by Samuel S. Fisher, Esq., and here reprinted by permission. Merw. Pat. Inv. 108, contains partial report only.]

Reissue of June 28, 1864:

"I. A roller so constructed as to yield more at its center than at or near its ends, in combination with a covering of vulcanized rubber of tubular form, as and for the purpose set forth.

"II. Cog-wheels, in combination with elastic rollers, constructed and used substantially as set forth."

Reissue of November 8, 1864:

"I. A roller so constructed as to yield more at its center than at or near its ends, in combination with a covering of vulcanized rubber, of tubular form, as and for the purpose set forth.

"II. Cog-wheels in combination with vulcanized rubber rollers, or any other elastic substance or compounds impervious to water."

Reissue of April 18, 1865:

"I. A roller made of a spirally coiled spring, arranged on a shaft or roller made smaller at the center than at the ends, as and for the purposes specified.

"II. A roller so constructed as to yield more at its center than at or near its ends, covered with vulcanized rubber, or any other compounds impervious to water, substantially as and for the purpose set forth.

"III. Cog-wheels, in combination with rollers of vulcanized rubber, or any other elastic substance or compound impervious to water, for the purpose set forth.

"IV. Rollers made of or covered with vulcanized rubber, or any other elastic substance or compound impervious to water when used in combination with cog-wheels, and a spring or springs around the shaft or roller, for the purpose set forth.

"V. Rollers for washing or wringing machines made of or covered with vulcanized rubber, or any other elastic substance or compound impervious to water when used in combination with adjusting spring or springs.

"VI. Rollers for washing or wringing machines made of or covered with vulcanized rubber, or any other elastic substance or compound impervious to water when used in combination with adjustable spring or springs, and screw or screws to adjust the pressure to the springs and rollers."

M. E. Ingalls and C. L. Woodbury, for complainants.

M. B. Andrus and Geo. Gifford, for defendants.

LOWELL, District Judge. The complainants are assignees of a patent originally granted to John Allender, of New London, Connecticut, in January, 1859, and three times reissued. This bill is founded on the last reissue, which was granted April 18, 1865, and the earlier reissues have not been given in evidence, and were not in any way connected with this case. The descriptive parts of the specification are precisely the same in this last reissue as in the first patent, but the claims are very different and raise the questions discussed in this case.

The specification declares that Allender has "invented a new and useful roller for squeezing the water, drying liquor, etc., from cloth, clothes, etc.," and proceeds to describe its construction and use. It describes, by reference to drawings, a wringing machine consisting of two rollers fitted with a frame and boxes, and with spiral springs and set screws, to give and adjust the requisite pressure to the rollers, and a guide to conduct the clothes properly between the rollers. Each roller consists of a shaft made smaller in the middle and surrounded by a flat metal spring so as to form a cylinder, and around this "there is a cylindrical covering D, made of India rubber, or some flexible material that will yield or bend readily as the spring cylinder inside of it yields to the pressure of the cloth or clothes passing between the rollers." The patentee gives directions for fastening the cylinder of India rubber, and for gearing the rollers and using the whole. The model which accompanied the original specification is in evidence, and appears to represent a wringing machine, as now usually constructed, excepting the internal construction of the roller.

The only claim in the first patent was for the roller; and the evidence tends to show that it was new and useful. But it seems to have been discovered soon after these machines came into use for wringing clothes, that by putting on the roller a sufficient thickness of India rubber, the spiral spring might be discarded, because the covering would then have all the necessary elasticity. When or by whom the change was made, does not appear; but it does appear that the machine, as so modified, has gone into very general use, and is of very great value, the complainants alone making fifty thousand of them in one year.

If this were the whole case, there would be no injustice or difficulty in holding that the roller of Allender contained the later roller, and that whether the latter were a patentable improvement or not, it was still within the scope of the patent.

But upon the evidence, I must assume that John Young first made an India rubber covering for rollers in wringing machines in 1848, because there is put in evidence a copy of a decree upholding a reissue of his patent, which claimed no less than that, and because one of the complainants' witnesses states the fact to be so, and there is no contradicting evidence. Assuming, then, that rollers covered with India rubber were known at the date of the Allender patent, his original claim was only for an improvement in rollers by putting in the spiral spring.

In the complainants' existing reissued patent, there are six claims, one for the roller, three for combinations not in issue here, and two that are the subject of controversy. No.

5 is, "rollers for washing or wringing machines made of, or covered with, vulcanized rubber or any other elastic substance or compound, impervious to water, when used in combination with adjusting spring or springs." No. 6, the same combination, with the addition of set screws for adjusting the pressure of the adjusting springs. No question is made that the defendants use a combination of rollers covered with India rubber, combined with adjustable springs and set screws; but they deny the validity of the claims: 1st, as being too broad; 2d, as being for a different invention from that of John Allender; and, 3d, for want of novelty.

I agree with much that was said at the argument, of the danger of reissues, to expand the scope of a patent, and bring within its reach subsequent inventions, and the courts should be watchful to guard against such abuses. But much of this criticism is not fairly applicable to the complainants' conduct, because the drawings and model show that Allender had made a working machine which seems to be valuable and to contain all the elements of the wringers now in use; and there is no evidence that any thing claimed in the reissue has been invented since his time, excepting the change in the roller, if that be an invention, by which the spiral spring is omitted.

It does appear to be true that he either did not understand the full value and scope of his machine, or was induced or obliged not to claim it. Taking the strongest view against him, namely, that he was not informed of the peculiar value of India rubber as a covering for the rollers, but thought any flexible material would do as well, or nearly as well, still he points out India rubber as the covering which he considers the best; and no one who should afterward discover its peculiar value, could patent its use in the same combination; and if so, Allender may, by reissue, claim its use in that combination, if he invented it; otherwise it must be held that by describing and not fully claiming it, he has abandoned it, which is precisely what he may avoid by a reissue. As Young had invented a roller covered with India rubber, the respondents insist that Allender in reality invented nothing but an improvement on that roller, which turns out not to be of sufficient importance to be retained in general use, and is not used by them. The complainants contend that the description in the first patent, with the drawings and model, show that although Allender may have thought he invented more than he did in one direction and less in another, yet, in fact, he had combined India rubber covered rollers, with set screws and springs, in a wringing machine, and that made an operative machine, so that, if he had made exactly the claims they now make, he could have held them.

The plaintiffs appear to me to have well maintained their position. Taking the Young roller to be well known, and granting that Allender's improvement on it is not important, yet if he invented the combination of his roller with the set springs and screws, and his roller includes Young's and something more, he may hold its combination as against those who have invented nothing, but have merely put back the Young roller in the place of his. In this point of view, that is, so far as the combination is concerned, the case is not different from one in which Allender had invented the whole roller, as he perhaps thought he had; the defendants could not then have used a roller which contained essential parts of his; and if he invents a combination, they can not use it by merely substituting another well-known part for one of his. So that, if the patent ought to be construed as claiming only a combination of his roller with the other elements, the respondents would infringe by using an old one which operated in the same way to produce a like result in the combination.

The fifth and sixth claims are not open to the criticism so strongly urged against them by the respondents, that they cover not only all materials which were then known as coverings for rollers, but all that may be discovered afterward. They do say "vulcanized rubber, or any other elastic substance or compound impervious to water." In this they copy substantially the reissued patent of Young which has been adjudged valid, and which is for the application of India rubber, or other elastic gum impervious to water, etc. If the claim were for a result by whatever means obtained, or for a process to whatever substance applied, which might be applicable to substances yet undiscovered, it would be too broad; but in patents for machines, it is usual to say that the parts may be made of any suitable materials, and that means known materials; but even if it does not, a person who should afterward discover a new material, would have no right to make the machine, and the inventor is protected against a machine when made of any such material, though the second inventor would have the exclusive right to the new material. In the cases cited, the process or means would be extended beyond the real invention, if they included later discoveries. But a machine is independent of such discoveries. In patents for machines, the patentee by such a phrase intends to point out that the arrangement or combination does not depend on the use of the precise material, where others may serve the purpose.

There arises, however, upon the evidence concerning the state of the art, a serious and difficult question, touching the novelty of the combinations of the fifth and sixth claims. This evidence I have studied with a great deal of care, having read over much of it several times. The English patents of Jessup and Underhill show two inventions which, in combination, would seem to cover the claims in suit here. The former is of squeezing rollers combined with springs and screws; but the rollers are made of wood, and the latter, assuming wringing machines to be well known, describes a roller covered with India rubber, for use in a wringing machine. Under the recent decision of the supreme court, in Stimpson v. Woodman, 10 Wall. [77 U. S.] 117, as I understand its effect, it would not be invention to combine a known tool with a known machine, if the combination required nothing beyond the ordinary skill of a mechanic, and this would be a fortiori, if the combination had been already suggested. But upon the evidence, I think Allender's invention was earlier than the second of these English patents. Indeed, the preponderance of testimony that way is very considerable, and the witness introduced by the defendants to fix a later date does not fairly contradict those of the plaintiffs on this point. Then there is the Carlock machine used in New York for a considerable time, and to which a very large amount of the evidence applies. It is not shown to my satisfaction that Carlock had any such springs and set screws, or their equivalent, as the patent calls for. The main witness, Mr. Carlock himself, has made so many different statements on the subject that his memory cannot now be relied on, and the other witnesses are met by counter evidence. In a doubtful case of this character, it can not but exercise great influence on the determination that the defendants, through one of their counsel, have obtained possession of this machine since the suit began, and have not produced it. A very ingenious argument was addressed to me to prove that the machine which Carlock sold to Darcey, and which the defendants now have, was a different machine from that which contained these combinations. There is no doubt that Carlock did have two machines, of which the latter in date is admitted not to have contained the elements of this combination; and if the defendants have procured this machine, and any unfavorable inferences are drawn from their not producing it, still the result is only what was before admitted, that this later machine did not anticipate Allender; and the controversy is, whether the former machine did so or not. This is the argument. To this, one obvious answer is, that the defendants, by taking such pains to procure a machine pending this suit, and secretly, admit it to be the machine which was important to be secured. Besides this, the evidence shows clearly that this was the first machine. I need not review the proofs, but will only say that I have considered them with all possible care and have no doubt on this point.

No question of fact was raised about the Day machine. Day had a factory in New Jersey in which he used, before the date of Allender's invention, a washing and wringing machine, with which he squeezed starch out of flat webs of cloth; and this machine had one, and afterward two rollers covered with India rubber, which again was covered with folds of printer's blanket or felt, and over this with folds of muslin. The rollers were combined with blocks of India rubber, to give the pressure, and with wedges to adjust the pressure, and these are undoubtedly the equivalent of the springs and set screws of the reissued patent. The combination operated in a like way to produce a similar result, provided the rollers of the Day machine are the equivalents in construction and operation of the rollers of the patent. A part of the elasticity of the Day rollers, and probably a considerable part, was due to the cloth; and the practical operation of the machine was different in this respect, that the cloth absorbed water and gave it out again at each operation, thus combining washing with wringing, though there is no doubt that the wringing was well done. For a wringing machine, it is of importance to dispense with the cloth, but the question is, whether there could be invention in dispensing with it. I have had much doubt on this point; but, upon the whole, am of opinion that the rollers of the Day machine are different from those of the complainants. They are not covered with India rubber, and I think there might be invention in combining a rubber-covered roller, as Allender did, with the other elements of the Day machine. The India rubber of Day performs the office of the spiral spring of Allender, and if the latter had not covered his roller with India rubber, but with cloth, and had claimed and continued to claim only any flexible covering, he could have held, perhaps, only his peculiar spring; because Day had already covered rollers with cloth, and had a spring of India rubber beneath it; but to substitute an India rubber covering for one of cloth, appears to be important and valuable, and I do not know that it is any less an invention than to substitute a spiral spring for India rubber underneath. I was much pressed with the argument that a person who should merely wind a piece of cloth over the plaintiffs' rollers, would infringe the patent by using the machine in that way; and if so, one who had done the same thing beforehand had anticipated the invention. Here, I think, the true test is, whether the machine is substantially the same. If a piece of cloth or muslin were so tightly stretched over the roller that it remained for practical purposes covered with India rubber, no doubt there would be infringement; but a roller covered with cloth, as distinguished from one covered with India rubber, would not infringe. In this connection the reissued patent clearly claims only coverings impervious to water, and though there is no such claim or intimation in the original patent, yet the model shows such a roller, and its value being discovered as we have already seen, it may be claimed by a reissue.

It was said that the combination should have included the guides. If it had done so, I suppose the defendants' machine would be within it, because that appears to have guides, and I confess to some doubt whether the assignees of the patent would not have done better to include them. But as this case stands, that question is decided when the Carlock and Day machines, neither of which had any guides, are disposed of. If the claim had included the guides, the difficult points connected with those machines would have been avoided.

Decree for complainants.

BAILEY WASHING MACHINE CO. v. YOUNG et al.

[12 Blatchf. 199; 1 Ban. & A. 362.] [1]

Circuit Court, N. D. New York. June 16, 1874.

EQUITY PLEADING—ANSWER — NOT SWORN TO BY ALL OF THE DEFENDANTS.

An answer, in a suit in equity, put in in the names of all three of the defendants, as their joint and several answer, but signed and sworn to by only two of them, will be stricken from the files, as irregular, but with leave to the two to erase therefrom the name of the third, and file it as their own answer only.

[In equity. Bill by the Bailey Washing Machine Company against John Young, James Young, and John E. Young. Heard on motion to strike defendants' answer from the files. Motion granted.]

Livingston Scott, for plaintiff.

John F. Seymour, for defendants.

WOODRUFF, Circuit Judge. In this case an answer has been put in in the names of the three defendants, and as their joint and several answer, but such answer is signed and sworn to by James Young and John E. Young only. This was irregular. The complainant might, if so advised, have accepted the answer, and replied to it, and thereby have waived the irregularity. Freelands v. Royall, 2 Hen. & M. 575. But this was not done. The complainant moves to take the answer off the files, and for such other relief as may be proper, and, on the motion for such other relief, counsel ask an order that the bill be taken pro confesso as against all of the defendants. That such answer is irregular, and that the complainant, though he may, is not bound to, accept it as the answer of all of the defendants, is according to the rules governing the subject, both in this country and in England. Fulton Bank v. Beach, 2 Paige, 307, 6 Wend. 36; Rogers v. Cruger, 7 Johns. 557; 1 Hoff. Ch. Pr. 229; 1 Barb. Ch. Pr. 141; Denison v. Bassford, 7 Paige, 370; Cooke v. Westall, 1 Madd. 265; Cope v. Parry, Id. 83; 2 Daniell, Ch. Pr. 269; Bayley v. De Walkiers, 10 Ves. 441. An order granting leave to answer without oath or signature is necessary, and, if circumstances render it proper, would be granted. Cases supra, and Codner v. Hersey, 18 Ves. 468; —— v. Gwillim, 6 Ves. 285; —— v. Lake, Id. 171. On the other hand, I do not think that the irregularity should subject the defendants who signed and swore to the answer to serious loss. The answer was manifestly prepared in the expectation that all of the defendants would sign it, and, on the refusal of John Young to sign, his name should have been struck out. Although the bill of complaint is not a bill of discovery, since the defendants were not, under the rules, bound to answer any averment therein except at their option, and because the complainant has propounded no interrogatories, as the rules require, when he desires to enforce a discovery, (rules 40, 41,) nevertheless, the complainant has a right to require that whatever answer is put in be authenticated by the defendants who profess or purport to answer. 1 Barb. Ch. Pr. 168; Denison v. Bassford, 7 Paige, 370; New York Chem. Co. v. Flowers, 6 Paige, 654; Harris v. James, 3 Brown, Ch. 399; and the cases above cited. The answer should, therefore, be taken from the files, but with leave to the defendants who have answered, to erase the name of the other defendant, and file the answer as their own only. An order that the answer, as filed, stand as the answers of two defendants only, would seem to be substantially equivalent. Done v. Read, 2 Ves. & B. 310. But, the more orderly and proper state of the record will be to make the pleadings in form correspond with the fact.

What the complainant will be at liberty to ask, if it is seen fit to bring the case to a hearing upon the bill and the answer of two defendants, and upon the order to which the complainant will be entitled, taking the bill as confessed by the other defendant, it is not necessary, on this motion, to decide.

The complainant is not entitled to take the bill as confessed by the two defendants who have answered. Possibly, they may desire to amend their answer, setting up fraudulent collusion between the other defendant and the complainant, which is intimated in the affidavit. Whether they do so or not, the facts alleged in the bill of complaint they should be permitted to answer. Whether the conduct or implied admissions of a copartner would conclude them on a charge of tortious infringement of the complainant's patents, I do not now decide. Counsel suppose that it is so settled by authority. Colly. Partn. [Perkins's Ed.] 724; Kershaw v. Mathews, 1 Russ. 360; Hilby v. Stanton, 2 Younge & J. 75; Prince v. Haydn, 3 Younge & J. 190; Naylor v. Wellington, 8 Sim. 396. But, on examination of the bill of complaint, I do not find that there is any averment that the tortious infringement was by them as copartners, or that the infringement was by the copartnership firm of which they were members. It is true, that, in the introduction of the bill of complaint, the defendants are described as now being copartners, under a specified copartnership name or firm; but, when they became such, or whether they were such at the time of the alleged infringement, or whether the infringement occurred in the conduct of the copartnership business, is not stated. I cannot, therefore, assume that the failure of John Young to answer is to be taken as an admission which concludes, or even affects, the other defendants. Besides, it is not clear that every admission by a copartner is conclusive upon his associate, in a court of equity. It may be evidence against both, and yet, when made with intent to wrong the associate, it may not conclude him, so that he cannot prove the truth touching an alleged tortious invasion of the rights of another by the copartnership. Of that, however, the court will consider further, if the complainant choose to rest its case upon the bill and answer.

Let an order be entered that the answer be taken from the files, but with leave to the defendants answering to erase therefrom the name of John Young, and file it as their own answer only.

Hill & Ellsworth, for defendants.

McKENNAN, Circuit Judge. A motion for a provisional injunction is always an appeal to the discretion of the court, but, in the class of cases to which the present one belongs, such discretion ought to be exercised only when "the complainant's title, and the defendant's infringement, are admitted, or are so clear and palpable that the court can entertain no doubt on the subject." "The court are not bound, at this stage of the cause, to decide doubtful and difficult questions of law, or disputed questions of fact, nor exercise this high and dangerous power (if exercised rashly) in doubtful cases, before the alleged offender shall have an opportunity of a full and fair hearing." Grier, J., in Parker v. Sears, [Case No. 10,748.] This has long been the rule in this circuit at least.

The bill in this case is founded on a patent issued to the complainant as assignee, for an improvement in wringing machines. It is one division of the fourth reissue of letters patent originally issued to John Allender on the 11th of January, 1859, and extended for seven years. The original patent contained but two claims, the gravamen of which was a wringing roller of peculiar mechanical construction, with a covering of vulcanized India rubber, or any other elastic compound impervious to water. To each reissue new claims have been added, until at last (in the reissue of February 9th, 1875), they are eight in number, all of which, except the two original claims, are for subdivided combinations of devices which, in the aggregate, constitute a complete wringing machine. That these several reissues, and the expansion of the claims of the patent, were induced by the progress of the art to which they appertain, seems to me to be evident, still, they may be all valid, if the combinations claimed were embodied in the original machine, and were the product of the patentee's genius. But to determine this, they must be carefully scrutinized in connection with the state of the art at the date of the patent, and to this end, the fullest opportunity for inquiry and examination is essential. In this stage of the case, and without an opportunity for a full hearing, the court ought not to undertake the decision of fairly disputable questions of law and fact, if there be any such, by an exercise of the power which this motion invokes.

Undeniably the defendants do not infringe the two first, and the fourth claims of the patent. The third, fifth, sixth, seventh and eighth claims they are alleged to have infringed.

The last two of these claims are new, and appear for the first time in the present reissue. They are for combinations in which the guide or guides, described in the specification and shown in drawings and model, are a component element. Now, it is not so clear as to be free from doubt, that the flanges extending over the ends of the rollers in the defendants' machines, which form part of the standard in which the journals of the rollers are supported, are the equivalents of the guide in the complainant's machine. They are formally different devices, and do not seem to have been expressly intended to perform the same functions. The only office of the flanges is to prevent the clothes, passing through the rollers, from running off the ends and becoming entangled around the iron shafts. But although this effect might incidentally result from the use of the guide, such an adaptation of it does not seem to have been contemplated by the patentee. The specification requires—and this is clearly illustrated by the drawings—both faces of the machine between the standards to be covered with boards, which extend over the ends of the rollers, and to which are to be fastened a semicircular spout, simply "to guide the cloth or clothes between the rollers," so as to secure the application of their pressure, at a point upon them, at which, by reason of their peculiar construction, they have the greatest degree of elasticity. Not only is the exclusive function of the flanges not claimed for, or attributed to, any of the devices described in the specification, but, in view of the prescribed structure of the machine, the independent performance of it by the guide is obviously impracticable. Under these circumstances, the applicability of the doctrine of mechanical equivalents, as it is defined in recent cases, may well be questioned; and the infringement of these claims is, therefore, a fair subject of contestation.

But these claims, as well as the others referred to, are contested for want of novelty. Upon this point several affidavits of experienced and intelligent experts have been produced on each side, in which the opinions indicated are as positively expressed, as they are irreconcilably diverse. The weight of such evidence can only be properly estimated after the witnesses have been subjected to the ordeal of a cross-examination. Besides these, a large number of prior patents have been exhibited, which, in the examination I have been able to give them, raise doubts of the validity of some of the contested claims. These doubts may be removed, but the partial proofs which suggest them ought to be remitted to an exhaustive discussion, and more careful scrutiny, at a final hearing.

In reaching this conclusion, I am not unmindful of the weight properly due to a judicial decision in favor of the patent. When made upon final hearing, and upon evidence which is only reproduced at a subsequent interlocutory hearing, it ought to be taken as conclusively establishing the complainant's title. Not so, however, if new evidence is exhibited, of such significance as would probably, if it had been presented, have changed the former decision.

This patent has been repeatedly in litigation, but in one case only—Bailey Washing & Wringing Mach. Co. v. Lincoln, [Case No. 750]—was it subjected to a careful judicial examination, at final hearing. If the able judge, who decided that case, had had before him the new evidence introduced at this hearing, I am not prepared to say that his conclusions might not have been materially modified, if not entirely changed by it. While, therefore, I would, without question, interlocutorily adopt his judgment of the effect of the proofs before him, I cannot discard the influence of doubts caused by new evidence of material pertinency and now decide "that the complainant's title and the defendants' infringement are so clear and palpable that the court can entertain no doubt on the subject."

The motion for a preliminary injunction is, therefore, denied.

[2 Ben. 437;[1] 1 N. B. R. 613, (Quarto, 177.)]

District Court, S. D. New York. May, 1868.

VOLUNTARY BANKRUPTCY — FILING PETITION — PLACE OF BUSINESS.

Where a bankrupt did not reside in the southern district of New York during the next six months preceding the filing of his petition, but, before his insolvency, had been in business in New York city, and had, during the whole of the said six months, carried on business in New York city as the agent and attorney of his brother, in buying and selling merchandise, keeping an office for that purpose with his brother's name upon the sign; Held, that the petition in bankruptcy was properly filed in the southern district of New York.

In bankruptcy. In this case the petition was filed on February 29th, 1868, and set forth that the petitioner [Tattnall Baily] had carried on business for six months, next immediately preceding the filing thereof, at the city of New York. A paper was afterward filed with the register by the bankrupt's attorney, declaring that the bankrupt did not reside within the southern district of New York during any part of the six months aforesaid; that for some time before his insolvency, he carried on business, on his own account, in the city of New York, and from that time to the filing of his petition, and during the whole of the said six months, had been carrying on business as the agent and attorney of his brother, in buying and selling merchandise, keeping an office for that purpose in the city of New York, with his brother's name upon the sign, and well known to those who had dealings with him as so carrying on business at that office, the business having been done under a power of attorney and for a compensation of one half of the profits.

[The register certified to the court the question, whether the bankrupt was carrying on business in the southern district of New York, within said six months, giving it as his opinion that he was, and distinguishing this case from the case of In re Maggie, Case No. 8,951.]

[1] BY THE REGISTER. I am of opinion that he was. He was not carrying on business on his own account, but was the clerk of his brother, and yet it seems to me this is the proper answer. I submit the question with careful consideration in view of the decision of this court in Re Magie, [Case No. 8,951,] upon the certificate of Mr. Register Dwight, and in the belief that this conclusion is supported by the reasoning in that case of the register, and by the authority cited by the judge.

The bankrupt act of 1841 [5 Stat. 440] directed all petitions by any bankrupt, &c., to be filed in the district court of the district where the bankrupt shall reside, or have his place of business, at the time of filing such petition.

The act of 1867 [13 Stat. 517] requires the petition to be filed in the judicial district where the debtor has resided, or carried on business, for the six months next immediately preceding the time of filing such petition.

The petitioner, Magie, "was formerly in business for himself at Chicago, and has been engaged in looking after a personal matter since he came from Chicago, with an intent of returning there. He had been engaged as a book-keeper for a firm in New York city since January 1, 1868. Before that, and from October, 1867, he had been engaged in keeping books for another firm in New York city." He resided with his father in New Jersey.

Mr. Register Dwight, in this case, was of opinion that "the law intended to confer jurisdiction on those courts only where the petitioner would be known publicly as a resident and citizen, or where he had such business relations with the public generally as would equally cause him to be known," and he denied adjudication.

His honor, Judge Blatchford, thought the register correct in his decision, and that the principles laid down by this court in Re Kinsman, [Case No. 7,832,] in reference to a kindred provision in the bankrupt act of 1841, made it improper for the court to assume jurisdiction in this case.

In the case cited, the bankrupt lived with his family in Philadelphia, and between the first and the middle of March, 1842, he came to the city of New York, employed as agent for a machinist, and took board at a public hotel. He was superintending the erection of a building for manufacturing lead, and he described himself in his petition as "agent for machinist." The petition was presented on the 22d of March. If he arrived in New York on the 7th, he had been a fortnight there when he presented his petition; and nothing in the case showed he was there afterwards. The court said:

"To a certain sense the place of the most transient stoppage, a mere purchase, a bargain made by a man on his transit through a place, would render it for the time being his place of business.

"A fugitive or equivocal occupation, that may continue for a long period, or may terminate instantaneously, without any outward indications to mark its continuance or character, will not be sufficient to satisfy this provision of the law.

"More must be shown. It must appear that he has a fixed and notorious employment, pursued by him in such manner as to denote a place of business established by him, distinct from his place of residence."

It appears to me that this authority does not sustain the doctrine, which is supposed to be established without any qualification by the decision in the Case of Magie, [supra,] that where a bankrupt resides in one judicial district, and is employed as a clerk in another, he, therefore, cannot be heard as a petitioning debtor in the latter district. For it is well known that bankrupts, known to be such, cannot "carry on business" upon their own account. The very object of the bankrupt act is to liberate the honest and unfortunate debtor from a state of subjection and poverty, so that his enterprise and industry may be allowed full scope, for the equal benefit of the community and himself and his family. A trader doing business on his own account may indeed be a voluntary petitioner for discharge from his debts, or, under the provisions of the present law, he may for any act specified by the law be forced into bankruptcy; but, in the great number of cases of voluntary bankruptcy, the petitioner will be found to have been for some time, and, perhaps, for a long time, in some subordinate employment. And, I think, the act of congress contemplates such cases as being those where the petitioner "has carried on business" at the place where that employment was had. The speeches made in congress in support of the bill, and especially those of the Hon. Mr. Jenckes, of Rhode Island, chiefly able and influential in preparing it and securing its passage, show this. Judge Betts, in the Case of Kinsman, [supra,] uses this word "employment," and contrasts what is, as we commonly say, permanent employment, with a mere bird of passage, alighting at a hotel to superintend as "agent of machinist" some rising structure, such as the machinist may put up in some given period of time in any part of an extensive country, sending his agent with a carpet-bag to the hotel of the place, while he superintends it, and soon receiving him back again at the shop.

"Notorious" is a term of relative and not absolute signification as used here. The employment need not be absolutely notorious, else few could be brought within its meaning, but it must be notorious among those to whom the petitioner is known and with whom he associates in a social, or business way, and it is quite certain that many persons who are clerks, and no more than clerks, are in this sense "notoriously" employed as such, and that permanently, using the word with as much accuracy and fitness as it can be used with, in any application of it to human affairs.

As a matter of fact it is notorious (though not, indeed, universally known), that many persons who have been and are petitioning debtors in bankruptcy, residing in other judicial districts, are clerks in the city of New York, employed in well known houses, men of talent, extensive acquaintance, and large influence. And some of these men, though clerks, are much more widely known than some persons who do business on their own account, and have signs over their doors with their names on them.

Many petitions have been filed in the city of New York by clerks residing in other judicial districts, once traders on their own account; and it is too late to file new petitions elsewhere, and if it were not, they are unable to incur the expense of new procedure.

Under these circumstances, and with a strong impression of the correctness of the view here taken, and of its agreement with all the opinions expressed in the cases cited, and of the importance of a rehearing upon this question, I respectfully submit this paper to the consideration of the judge.

EDGAR KETCHUM, Register.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. I am of opinion that the petitioner was carrying on business for the six months next immediately preceding the filing of his petition, in the southern district of New York, within the meaning of the eleventh section of the bankruptcy act.

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS—APPEAL—INTERFERENCE.

[1. Under the provisions of the act of congress of July 4, 1836, (5 Stat. 120, c. 357, § 8,) that, if an application be made for a patent that may interfere with patents issued or for which applications are pending, the commissioner shall give notice to applicants and patentees; that, if either be dissatisfied with the commissioner's decision "on the question of priority of right or invention," he may appeal therefrom; and that "proceedings shall be had to determine which, or whether either, of the applicants is entitled to receive a patent,"—the jurisdiction of the appellate tribunal over the question of priority of right or invention only arises where there is an interference, and on appeal the question of interference, as well as the question of priority of right, comes before the court for review.]

[Cited in Yearsley v. Brookfield, Case No. 18,131.]

[2. The interference coming before the court for review on appeal under the act of July 4, 1836, (5 Stat. 120, c. 357, § 8,) is only an interference with respect to patentable matters; and, in deciding the question, the claims of the applicants must be limited to the matters specifically set forth as their respective inventions.]

[3. The applications of Morse (afterwards patent No. 6,420, May 1, 1849) and Bain (afterwards patent No. 6,328, April 17, 1849) purported to disclose a new system of telegraphy, consisting in the production of marks or discolorations on paper "chemically prepared" by the direct action of the galvanic current, and without the intervention of magnets or other intermediate devices. Both inventions proceeded upon the theory that the passage of a galvanic current through paper or other suitable material previously treated with any one of a variety of chemical solutions will produce discolorations or marks corresponding in number and length with the pulsations of the current. In the Morse apparatus the operator at the sending station produces currents corresponding to the dots and dashes of the Morse alphabet by the ordinary Morse key. At the receiving station, the prepared strip of paper is drawn by a register between a metallic cylinder or drum mounted upon a suitable standard, and a thin-edged platinum wheel held in contact with the strip by a metal spring, mounted upon a metal standard. The passage of the alternating currents from the platinum roller to the cylinder or drum through the strip produces the discolorations or marks which form the message. Morse claimed "the use of a single circuit of conductors for the marking of telegraphic signs, already patented, for numerals, letters, words, and sentences, by means of the decom posing, coloring, or bleaching effects of electricity acting upon any known salts that leave a mark, as the result of the said decomposition, upon paper, cloth, metal, or other convenient and known markable material." He also claimed the invention of the machinery described for the purpose stated. Bain's invention was designed to transmit a message through one machine by a single operation to any number of distant stations. The transmitting and receiving wires are combined in a single apparatus, one of which is placed at each station. The circuits are changed to transmit or receive at pleasure. The message is prepared or "composed" in permanent form by providing a slip of paper with perforations corresponding in length and arrangement with a predetermined system of signs or characters. This sending slip is wound upon a suitable roller, and is caused to pass between a transmitting roller and a comb or brush, which are normally in circuit. The non-conducting slip interrupts the flow of the current, except at such times as the perforations therein permit the brush to contact with the roller. By passing this slip between a number of transmitting rollers and brushes in separate circuits, but arranged in line in one machine, the message can be simultaneously transmitted to an indefinite number of stations. In the receiving devices, the prepared paper is wrapped around cylinders or drums. When the cylinders are revolved at a regular speed, they are caused to traverse across the machine under a stylus or contact point, whereby the marks or discolorations are disposed in a regular spiral around the cylinder, and the message is read in lines from left to right, in the ordinary manner of writing or printing, when the sheet is unwound. Held, that as the battery, the circuit, the prepared paper, and the marking by the electro-chemical process were not new, and were not patentable by either party, the Morse invention must be restricted to the machine or apparatus by which he combined these elements, and produced the marks; that, as thus restricted, there was no interference between it and the Bain apparatus; and that letters patent should issue to Bain for his invention.]

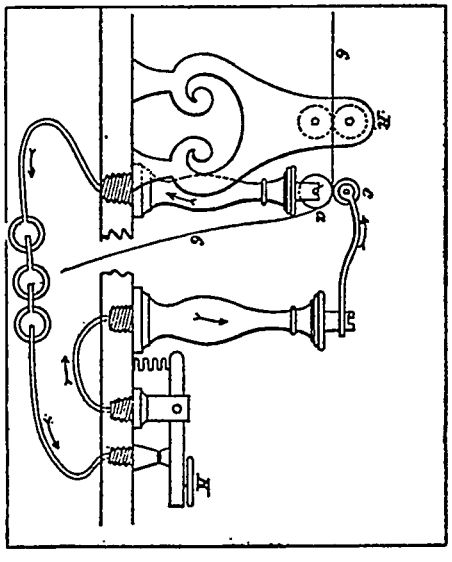
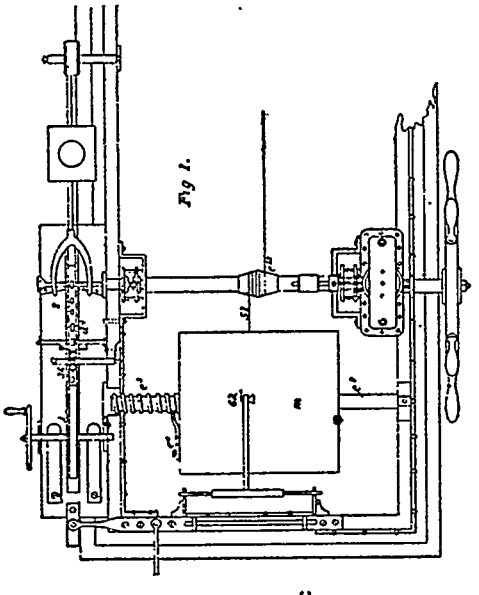
[Appeal from the commissioner of patents.]

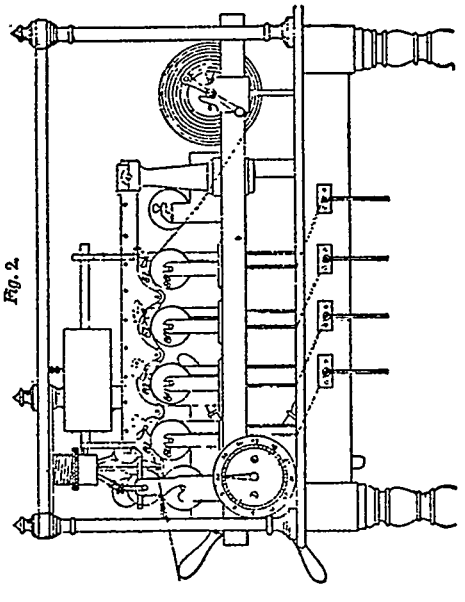
The applications in this case (afterwards patents to Morse 6420, May 1st, 1849, and to Bain 6328, April 17th, 1849) purported to disclose a new system of telegraphy, which consisted in producing marks or discolorations on paper "chemically prepared" by the direct action of the galvanic current, and without the intervention of magnets or other intermediate devices. The inventions of both parties proceeded upon the theory that the passage of a galvanic current through paper or other suitable material previously treated with any one of a variety of chemical solutions, as iodide of tin, sulphate of iron, acetate of lead, iodide of potassium, &c., will produce discolorations or marks corresponding in number and length with the pulsations of the current. The apparatus of Morse, as illustrated in the subjoined cut, was quite simple.



The operator at the sending station produces the alternating currents corresponding to the dots and dashes of the Morse alphabet by the ordinary Morse key K. At the receiving station the prepared strip 6 is drawn by a register R between a metallic cylinder or drum, a, mounted upon a suitable standard, and a thin-edged platinum wheel c, held in contact with the strip by a metal spring mounted upon a metal standard 6. The direction of the current is indicated by the arrows. The passage of the alternating currents from the platinum roller to the cylinder or drum through the strip produces the discolorations or marks which form the message.

Bain's invention was designed to transmit a message through one machine by a single operation to any number of distant stations. The transmitting and receiving wires are combined in a single apparatus, one of which is placed at each station. The circuits are changed to transmit or receive at pleasure. Fig. 1 is a plan view, showing the general arrangements only. Fig. 2 shows the devices for transmitting to a number of stations.





The message is prepared or "composed" in permanent form by providing a slip of paper with perforations corresponding in length and arrangement with a predetermined system of signs or characters. This sending-slip 2 is wound upon a suitable roller 1, and is caused to pass between a transmitting-roller d^4 and a comb or brush 36, which are normally in circuit. The non-conducting slip interrupts the flow of the current, except at such times as the perforations therein permit the brush to contact with the roller. By passing this slip between a number of transmitting-rollers 80 and brushes 81 (Fig. 2), in separate circuits, but arranged in line in one machine, the message can be simultaneously transmitted to an indefinite number of stations. The receiving devices are shown in the centre of Fig. 1. The prepared paper in the form of sheets is wrapped around cylinders or drums M (one of which is shown), either of which can be used while the other is being prepared. Steel slips or tongues e^4 on the cylinder take into a screw-thread e^3 on the fixed-shaft e^2. When the cylinders are revolved at a regulated speed by the cord 51 and the pulley e^{12} they are caused to traverse across the machine under the stylus or contact point 62, whereby the marks or discolorations are disposed in a regular spiral around the cylinder, and the message is read in lines from left to right in the ordinary manner of writing or printing when the sheet is unwound.

R. H. Gillet, for Mr. Bain.

1. Morse has not filed sufficient drawings nor deposited a sufficient model of his invention, nor has he described it in such full, clear, and explicit terms as to enable a person skilled in chemistry, electricity, and mechanics to construct and use the same to transmit intelligence. A local circuit only is shown; no centre connections are shown, nor any means of operating over long distances. No mode of preparing the paper chemically is described which is adequate to produce the results claimed. No telegraphic or other machinist can produce an instrument that will operate as and to the extent which Morse claims, and no chemist can produce the results he describes by complying with the specification. No evidence on this point was produced before the commissioner or is now before the judge. The reviewing tribunal is without any guide, except personally to read the specification and claim, and to examine the model and drawing of Morse's application, and determine whether by following the directions contained therein anything useful or important can be produced. The commissioner and examiners may be called by either party to testify under oath "in explanation of the principles of the machine or other thing" for which a patent is asked, but they cannot state facts or give opinions on other subjects. Bain denied the practicability of Morse's invention before the commissioner, and offered to go into proof upon that subject before the final hearing. The utility of his own invention was not denied. Under these circumstances, there was error in the decision of the commissioner in not ruling against Morse's claim; and the proper mode of correcting that error is to open the case for the production of full testimony on both sides.

2. There is in fact no real and substantial interference between the two applications. The underlying principles common to both machines are old, as admitted by the commissioner. The single circuit, the signs, and the use of chemically-prepared paper are separately old, and the invention of each party is restricted to his own particular combination and arrangement of devices by which these common principles are carried into effect. Bain uses chemical agents and the long telegraphic circuit, the earth making part of it, in a particular manner to produce the consequences which he describes. From a comparison of the drawings and models it will be apparent that the machines differ in form and substance. Morse's machine is incompetent to produce the effects described by Bain, if susceptible at all of practical use. It is denied that any operative machine could be produced by following the directions of those specifications. In a case of this kind proof should be resorted to.

3. The commissioner erred in allowing Morse to go into proof of his invention prior to his caveat and application, and at the same time refusing to allow Bain to make proof of his discovery before the date of his English patent of 1846. Unless the statute creates a difference in clear terms, the parties stand upon an equal footing before the patent office in all respects. The sixth section of the act of [July 4,] 1836, [5 Stat. 119,] removes the previous disabilities of foreigners, and declares that all persons may obtain patents under the circumstances and conditions therein named. The ninth section, it is true, raises a distinction between foreigners and citizens with respect to the payment of fees, requiring a citizen to pay $30, and a subject of Great Britain $500, and other foreigners $300. The question is whether a foreigner, having paid the requisite fee, is to be permitted to substantiate his right to a patent conferred upon him in terms by the sixth section, by showing, upon an issue of priority properly joined, when he in fact made the invention. No claim in the statute in terms makes this distinction between citizens and foreigners, whether they are prosecuting their cases ex parte or in interference. The seventh section, to which reference is made, relates exclusively to the ex-parte examination of an application. It provides that the commissioner shall in all cases issue a patent if it shall not appear, among other things, "that the same (invention) had been invented or discovered by any other person in this country prior to the alleged invention thereof by the applicant." This claim does not prohibit the foreign inventor from showing the date of his invention and obtaining a patent, but provides that such prior discovery, if not patented or described, will not prevent the American inventor from also obtaining a patent for the same. Nor does the proviso of the fifteenth section of the act furnish any rule governing the issuance of patents. The proviso in question declares that no patent, in a suit brought thereon, shall be held to be void on account of the invention, or any part thereof, having been before known or issued in any foreign country. It does not appear, however, that in such a case the plaintiff could recover. By the enabling clause of the section judgment will be rendered for the defendant, with costs, if it shall appear, among other things, that the patentee was not the first and original discoverer of the thing patented, while the later American inventor cannot recover against a prior foreign inventor; so there is nothing in the section to prevent the prior foreign inventor from sustaining his patent against all subsequent inventors.

The eighth section, establishing and regulating interferences, makes no exception against the foreign inventor.

Amos Kendall, [and with him Alexander H. Lawrence,] for Morse.

1. The only question submitted for decision in case of conflicting claims for patents is "priority of invention." St. [July 4,] 1836, [5 Stat. 120,] § 8; St. [March 3,] 1839, [5 Stat. 354,] § 11.

2. The appeal in such controversies must be decided in a summary way on the evidence produced before the commissioner. St. [March 3,] 1839, [5 Stat. 354,] § 11.

3. The chief justice has no authority to receive additional testimony, except that of the commissioner or examiners of the patent office, and that only "in explanation of the principles of the machine;" (Act 1839, § 11;) nor has he authority to return the case to the patent office for the purpose of taking additional testimony.

4. All the allegations and arguments of the other side, therefore, involving the questions of utility, novelty, and patentability are irrelevant and aside from the point at issue.

5. The contention by Bain that there is no conflict between his claims and those of Morse is an admission that Morse is entitled to all he claims. In this view, Bain should disclaim all that Morse claims, and go his way.

6. But there is an interference. Bain's third claim probably interferes with Morse's first claim. If granted, Bain could do all that Mr. Morse claims an exclusive right to do. He could write Mr. Morse's characters precisely as Morse does; and therein consists the interference.

7. Coming to the question of priority of invention, Morse was the first man in christendom, so far as we are advised, who conceived the idea of a telegraph by the chemical action of the electric fluid. In his application he swears that he conceived the idea in 1832, and the affidavits filed show he was experimenting upon the idea at that time. This was before Davy, Bain, or any other European inventor, so far as we are informed, had considered the subject. In 1846, as shown by the affidavit of his son, he had matured an instrument; in June, 1847, he filed his caveat, and in January, 1848, applied for a patent. By that time he was cut out, like all other inventors, from claiming the general principles of the apparatus by Davy's patent, dated July, 1838, and enrolled January, 1839, which disclosed the use of several circuits for marking parallel series of signs or discolorations, and by Bain's patent of 1843, for copying surfaces by the use of a single circuit of conductors.

8. Can a foreign inventor go behind his foreign patent to prove priority of invention? Mr. Bain says he can. The patent office and the attorney-general say he cannot. It is said that the citizen and an alien, neither having a patent abroad, stand on the same footing with respect to application for patent in this country, and have the same latitude in proving priority of invention. It is sufficient to say that this is not the state of facts before the court. In this case the alien has a foreign patent, and the question is, can he go behind that patent. The privilege is claimed for Mr. Bain for the purpose of putting him on an equality with Mr. Morse. It is singular that Mr. Bain does not perceive that the privilege he claims is not allowed to American citizens. If Mr. Morse had applied for a patent the same day that Mr. Bain did he could not have obtained one, because Mr. Bain had a patent for the same thing in England. The patent office could not allow him to go behind Bain's foreign patent to prove priority; yet it is maintained that Bain himself is subject to no such limitation. Aliens are those to be preferred to citizens. It is only when the application for a patent has been made here before the date of the foreign patent that the citizen is permitted to go behind that patent to prove priority of invention. See, however, Bartholemew v. Sawyer, [Case No. 1,070,] and later cases. If Mr. Bain had made an application here before he took out his patent in England, he also could have gone behind that patent to prove priority. In point of fact, therefore, the law and the decisions of the patent office place the foreigner and citizen upon precisely the same footing in these respects; and the reason Bain cannot go behind his foreign patent is because he made no application for a patent here until after he got one there.

9. The commissioner of patents is arraigned for deciding that in the eye of the American law the specification forms a part of the English patent, and that the date of enrollment, and not the date of sealing, is the true date of such a patent. He might have gone further, and stated that, in the eye of the English law, the specification is part and parcel of the patent. Hindmarch on Patents. Every patent issued in England is an incomplete instrument until the specification be enrolled; and if it be not completed by enrollment within six months, the inchoate grant becomes absolutely void. Specifications in England sometimes embrace inventions not thought of when the patent was sealed. It cannot be supposed that an invention so made or incorporated into the English patent would bar an American discoverer whose invention was subsequent to the sealing of the patent, but prior to the invention of the Englishman and the sealing of his caveat. Such a state of the law would open the door to great frauds. It is not necessary for Morse to describe fully or at all the chemical solutions used by him. Their capacity to make marks by the action of electricity was well known, and is not here claimed. It is well-settled law that a patentee need not describe in his specification things used by him which are well known, and also that a specification which, instead of describing a well-known thing, refers to a description given in a prior patent, is good.

The following extracts are taken from the reasons of the commissioner in support of his decision:

The decision implied that the invention (regarding the claims of both parties as the same) was new, original, useful, and therefore patentable. It implied, also, that the materials and mechanism, and the modus operandi, as set forth by both parties, were adequate to the results claimed, and that the specifications, drawings, and models of both parties were in substance sufficient to enable the undersigned to understand and comprehend the invention, as well as persons skilled in the particular art to which it relates. All these questions were preliminaries to the question of interference, and are not, therefore, in the opinion of the undersigned, involved in this appeal. The only question involved in the interference declared to exist between the claims of the two parties is the priority, according to the patent law of the United States, of their respective inventions of the matters claimed by each of them as new and original. * * *

The undersigned has decided that the drawings, models, and specifications were sufficient in both applications before he adjudged the interference. The sufficiency of the models, drawings, and specifications is a question, so far as it affects the issue of a patent, which is reserved alone for the commissioner. He determines it upon the evidence submitted by the party making the application. That evidence is the model, drawings, and specifications. The law has made no provision for trying the question in any other way. It has made no provision to allow any party or person to come in and offer testimony to show the insufficiency of the models, &c., of an applicant for a patent. There is no mode pointed out by law for trying the question. * * *

It is proper to remark, further, that Bain offered no evidence to the commissioner of the insufficiency of Morse's model, &c. He merely alleged in argument that they were not sufficient. The commissioner, therefore, had no other evidence before him than the model, &c., and upon that evidence he decided that they were sufficient. As no question as to the admissibility or inadmissibility of evidence on this point came before the commissioner, it is not a proper matter to bring before your honor on this appeal. See section 11, Act Approved March 3, 1839, [5 Stat. 354.] The said Bain alleges, as his second reason for the reversal of the decision of the undersigned, that "there is in fact no real and substantial interference between the two applications." The reply to this reason is substantially set forth above in the answer by the undersigned to the first reason for the reversal of his decision. But, in further reply, the undersigned states that, in support of the proposition contained in his second point, the said Bain supposes a case in which the same ends, being attained by different means, would not justify an interference. It is admitted that some of the features of Bain's invention differ from any found in Morse's; and Bain's claims to these particulars constitute no part of the interference between the two contestants; nor is a patent for those parts refused.

But, as has been before stated, the principal claims in the two applications were identical in substance, and it was upon them that the interference was declared. Parties, however, may come in direct conflict in their claims, though each may use different means to attain the same ends. Such cases often occur. Suppose, for instance, said Bain and Morse both used a chemically-prepared paper upon which to make telegraphic signs, and that each of them described paper prepared with such chemicals as they preferred to use, both differing as to the kind of chemical material adopted, and neither laying any special claim to their own chemicals for this purpose, but both claiming broadly the use of chemically-prepared paper for making these marks as telegraphic signs,—can it be doubted in such a case that an interference exists; that the claims, and in fact the inventions, are identical?—for neither party will limit his invention to the use of a special kind of paper. Indeed this would be obviously futile. It is plain, then, that some of the means may differ, and yet the inventions, in all patentable particulars and claims, be the same. If either party should attach any value to the special points of difference, he should lay separate claims to them. The interference in the present case was declared only upon those claims actually conflicting, and the parties so notified. The objection by Bain that Morse's invention was impracticable, because he did not describe a long telegraphic circuit, or the use of the earth as a part of the circuit, must be regarded as a cavil. All inventions for telegraphing by galvanism are of necessity made upon the supposition of a long circuit, though the experimental trials may be made through only few feet of wire. A long telegraphic circuit has no special signification in this case, and neither party claims a long or a short circuit or using the earth as a part of the circuit. The earth has been used as a part of the circuit in Morse's telegraph since its first establishment. A single circuit, however, has a special meaning and importance in both their present inventions. It is plainly demonstrable, in fact it must necessarily follow, that a plan of operations which will work successfully in a small room will work equally well upon the most extensive scale, provided the galvanic force be increased in the proper proportion to the increase of the extent of the circuit. * * *

The said Bain, as the third ground of appeal from the decision of the undersigned, alleges "that the commissioner should have declared the true date of Bain's patent to be the one appearing on its face, to wit, December 12th, 1846, which was before Morse's application or caveat." In order that your honor may fully understand the nature of the decision of the undersigned upon this point, and therefore be better enabled to judge of its correctness, he will proceed briefly to state its nature and the grounds on which it was made. The decision, in short, was, that in cases affecting the rights of other persons claiming priority or originality of invention, the true date of the English patent is the day of the enrollment of the specification, and not the day of the sealing of the patent. The grounds of the decision are to be found in the following facts and considerations: The English patent law provides that the inventor may file in the appropriate office the title of his invention, describing it briefly, and have his patent sealed; he is then allowed four months, if he does not intend to procure a patent in Scotland, or six months if he does so intend, to enroll in the appropriate office a full and complete description of his invention, technically called a specification, duly executed under hand and seal, when his right to the exclusive privilege which the patent secures becomes perfect and absolute. Until this full and complete description or specification is enrolled, the public are not advised of the particular nature of the invention of which he claims to be the author. This information he is bound to give, by the enrollment of his specification within the four or six months, as the case may be, or his patent becomes void. Until this enrollment of his specification, the patent is an imperfect or inchoate instrument, liable to be defeated by the non-performance, with the time specified, of the condition on which it was granted. It is not a perfect, complete, and absolute instrument until this condition is performed. Therefore, until the inventor has enrolled his specification, it may in truth be said, notwithstanding his patent has been sealed, that his invention has not been patented. Such, in substance, are the provisions of the English law with regard to the patenting of inventions. See Hind. Pat. pp. 70, 71, 157, 158.

The law and practice of this country are different. Here it is required that the model, drawings, and specification shall be filed, the invention examined, the patent recorded on the records of the patent office, and the specification enrolled on parchment and annexed to the patent before the instrument is sealed. In short, it is required to be a full, complete, and unconditioned instrument before it is delivered to the patentee. His title to his invention is absolute the moment his patent is sealed and signed by the proper officers. Our law knows no such thing as a conditional patent, liable to be confirmed or defeated by the performance or non-performance of some proviso or condition expressed in it. Its issue implies every requisite which is necessary to make it a valid and unconditional instrument, conveying to the patentee an absolute title to the invention which it describes. And in accordance with this view of the subject, our law, when it speaks of an invention as having been "patented" in this or a foreign country, implies that such foreign patent is perfect and complete, and not one liable to be defeated by the non-performance of a condition expressed in it. Section 7 of the act of July 4, 1836, [5 Stat. 119,] makes it the duty of the commissioner to grant a patent to the applicant, provided his invention has not been "patented" or described in any publication in this or any foreign country. Now, how is it possible for the commissioner to know what has been patented in a foreign country if such foreign patent does not contain a full description (or specification) of the thing patented? Suppose, when Mr. Morse made his application for a patent for his invention, some English work had contained the general statement that Mr. Bain had had a patent sealed on a particular day for an electro-chemical telegraph; how is the American commissioner to know from that general description what that invention of Mr. Bain is, and whether or not it is the same which is claimed by Morse? The thing is impossible; and such impossibility shows conclusively the correctness of the construction which the undersigned has put on the word "patented" in our law. Therefore it cannot be said, in the meaning of the American law, that an invention has been patented in England, or anywhere else, until every condition necessary to make such patent complete and absolute has been complied with by the patentee; and, therefore, the true date of an English patent, when it comes in conflict with the rights of the American inventor, must be the day on which it became a complete, perfect, and unconditional instrument.

And this construction finds an analogy in the well-known principles of common law relating to the dates of deeds and other instruments of writing. An instrument in writing under seal does not become a deed until it is delivered, and the day of its delivery is its true date. It may even be an impossible date—for instance, the 30th of February; yet if it was in fact executed on the first day of January, that would be its true date for all legal purposes. Deeds are also conditional, subject to be confirmed or defeated by the performance or non-performance of some stipulated act between the parties. It may depend also upon some event or contingency, which may confirm or defeat it. In all which cases it is an incomplete or imperfect instrument until the performance of the act or the happening of the event upon which its validity depends, and then it becomes an absolute and unconditional instrument or a nullity. These views seem so conclusive upon the mind of the undersigned that he does not deem it necessary to consider the question further, nor to follow the learned counsel for Mr. Bain, through the ingenious and elaborate argument which he has presented in support of his position, much of which might be very pertinent were the question pending before an English tribunal, under the laws of England, but is not pertinent before an American tribunal and under the laws of the United States. The undersigned respectfully refers your honor to his decision in this case for the precise nature of his adjudication on this point, and the reasons in favor of the same. It is proper to remark that our law makes provision for antedating patents in certain cases; but a patent cannot bear date before the day on which the application was filed in the patent office. The undersigned deems it proper to notice here an authority cited by the learned counsel for Mr. Bain, which he deems conclusive; which authority is found in an abstract of the English patent law prepared by an English solicitor of patents for the undersigned, and published in his annual report to congress for 1847, page 790. The correctness of that abstract is not affirmed by the undersigned, nor does he believe that it is a correct statement of the English law. He relies, rather, upon Hindmarch, an English author of high repute, before cited, for a correct statement of the English law on this point and its construction by the English courts of justice.

The said Bain assigns as his fourth reason why the decision of the undersigned should be reversed "that the commissioner erred in allowing Morse to go into proof of his invention prior to his caveat and application, and at the same time refusing to allow Bain to make proof of his discovery before the date of the English patent of 1846." The correctness of the decision of the undersigned to which this exception is taken depends upon the question whether or not our law makes a distinction between the rights of an American applicant and a foreign applicant, as affected by a question of priority or originality. And on this point the undersigned can add but little, if anything, to the force of the cogent and luminous opinion of the attorney-general, to whom the question was submitted; which opinion accompanies the appeal, and to which your honor is respectfully referred. On reference to the seventh section of the act of 1836, it will be seen that there are two grounds on which the commissioner is bound to refuse a patent to the applicant, viz.: First, if the thing sought to be patented has first been "invented or discovered by any other person in this country;" and second, if it has been "patented or described in any printed publication in this or any foreign country." If the thing has been invented by any other person in this country, but not described, the commissioner is bound to refuse a patent. But he is not bound to refuse a patent if it has been invented in some foreign country, but not "patented or described in some printed publication in this or some foreign country." The principle that seems to be plainly laid down by our law with regard to the matter is, that in a contest for priority between two persons claiming to have invented the same thing in this country priority as well as originality must be proven. But in a contest between a person who has made the invention in this country and one who has invented the same thing in another country, originality in the American inventor is sufficient ground for awarding the patent to him, although the invention of the other may have in fact been prior in point of time in a foreign country. This distinction is obvious and palpable, and is intended to protect the person who invents a thing in this country from being defeated in his rights by proof of the invention of the same thing in a foreign country, if such invention has not been patented or described as our law requires. The fifteenth section of the act of [July 4,] 1836, [5 Stat. 123,] recognizes this distinction in defining the ground and mode of defense in suits for infringement.

When there is no foreign claimant of the same invention, there can be no doubt as to the right of the American inventor, whether on an application for a patent or in a suit for infringement. In the one case the American commissioner would be bound to grant the patent to the American inventor, the latter conforming to the provisions of the law with regard to the mode of making the application, notwithstanding the thing claimed as new had been "invented and discovered" in a foreign country, but had not been "patented or described in some printed publication in this or some foreign country." And in an action of infringement, the defense that the thing in dispute had been "invented" in some foreign country, but not "patented or described," &c., would have to be ruled out for the same reason. In both instances originality, and not priority, is a sufficient ground to sustain the claim of the American inventor. To make the case more obvious, suppose Morse had made his application for a patent for his improvement in the telegraph before Bain had applied and before he had actually had his invention patented in England. If Bain's invention had not been "described," &c., the American commissioner would be bound to grant a patent to Morse, although Bain had in fact invented his telegraph before Morse had invented his. And suppose, further, that some person had infringed Morse's patent before Bain had patented his invention in this country, and an action had been brought by Morse for the recovery of damages for such infringement; would it be pretended for a moment that the fact that Bain's invention was prior in point of time to Morse's would be a bar to the recovery of damages by Morse? The provisions of the fifteenth section of the act of 1836, precludes such defense in express terms. And if the doctrine of the learned counsel for Bain is correct, would it not operate as a virtual repeal of the fifteenth section, so far as it relates to this subject? In all cases where a discovery has been kept a secret in a foreign country, and should afterwards be discovered and patented by some person in this country, all that the infringer of the American patent have to do would be to hunt up the foreign inventor, procure a patent in his name in this country, and plead it in bar to the further prosecution of the action, or produce it in evidence, and clearly show that the plaintiff had no cause of action. The American congress intended no such absurdity when it enacted the provisions of the fifteenth section of the act of 1836. Now the attorney-general, after taking a similar view of the question which the undersigned has submitted, very pertinently remarks that the American commissioner cannot be required to grant a patent which the courts of justice in this country would be bound to set aside.

The learned counsel for Mr. Bain has, while arguing his fourth point, much to say with regard to natural right and the rights of foreigners. It is not proposed by the undersigned to go into any metaphysical disquisition upon natural rights, nor how much all rights of property depend upon positive law. He would simply remark, in reply to the learned counsel, that foreigners have no rights in other sovereignties than that in which they are born, except what has been expressly conceded to them by the sovereign power of the countries to which they may go. They cannot even enter the limits of a foreign jurisdiction except by permission, express or implied, of the sovereign power. They have no legal privileges in the country to which they go except what are expressly granted to them. And all privileges which they are permitted to enjoy are granted as matters of favor and not of right. See Vatt. Law Nat. c. 7, § 94, and following sections; and Id. c. 8. But the right of the American inventor is recognized by the constitution. See article 1, § 8. The right may be extended to the foreigner, and it may be granted to him conditionally or in a qualified manner, or it may be absolutely refused; and this upon the general principles of national law which regulates the comity and courtesies of nations in their intercourse with each other. And the legislation of congress has been in accordance with this view of the subject. By the act of December [February] 21, 1793, [1 Stat. 318, c. 11,] only citizens of the United States were permitted to take out patents. By the act of April 17, 1800, [2 Stat. 37, c. 25,] the privilege was extended to aliens having resided two years in the United States. By the act of July 13, 1832, [4 Stat. 577, c. 203,] the privilege was extended to aliens resident who had declared their intention to become citizens. The privilege was further modified with regard to aliens by the act of July 4, 1836, [5 Stat. 119.] The right of the foreigner to take out a patent in this country for an invention or discovery made by him is precisely what our law defines it to be, and no more. Our statutes are construed according to their true intent and meaning so far as they affect the rights of foreigners, but they are to have no forced construction for the benefit of aliens, because the latter have no constitutional rights here further than has been expressly conceded to them by the sovereign power of the Union. Without following the learned counsel of Mr. Bain through the various steps of his elaborate argument on this point, much of which is inappropriate and irrelevant, and based upon a false assumption of facts, the undersigned again respectfully refers your honor to the able and conclusive opinion of the attorney-general herewith submitted, which in his view covers the whole of the question. That the commissioner would be obliged to issue a patent to "the inventor," (as is so earnestly insisted upon,) if a foreigner, to the exclusion of the American inventor, whose invention was subsequent, might be true if the foreigner had made his invention "in this country." Bain having made his abroad, does not come within the purview of our statute, even if his invention in point of fact was prior to Morse's. * * *

The learned counsel contends that the undersigned should have refused a patent to Morse on the ground that his invention was not of "practical utility." The "practical utility" of an invention is seldom determined at the patent office. The term "utility" has received from the courts a legal interpretation. According to that interpretation, it means any degree of utility; not that it shall be more useful than others. By the term "useful inventions" in the patent act of the United States is meant an invention that may be applied to a beneficial use in society, in contradistinction to an invention which is injurious to public morals, the health, or the good order of society. Bedford v. Hunt, [Case No. 1,217;] Kneass v. Schuylkill Bank, [Id. 7,875.] It is not necessary that the invention should be of such general utility as to supersede all other inventions previously in practice to accomplish the same purpose; nor is it important that its practical utility should even be limited, for the law does not look to the degree of utility. [Bedford v. Hunt, supra.] Acting in conformity to the spirit of the authorities above cited, the question of utility, any further than it concerns the public morals, the health, and good order of society, is not one which is particularly inquired into by the commissioner of patents in determining the patentability of an invention. Indeed in some cases it would be impossible for him to decide whether or not a machine was practically useful. That, generally, must be ascertained by actual experiment, which it would be impossible for the commissioner of patents in most cases to make. Therefore the general rule adopted by the patent office with regard to inventions is to decide upon the novelty, priority, and originality, and leave the question of utility to the public and the courts of justice to settle. But, as before remarked, (in answer to Bain's first reason,) this question of utility was not raised by the interference. It was a point settled by the undersigned before he ascertained that the claims of the respective parties did interfere. He decided that the inventions of both were useful and patentable before he declared the interference. In deciding that both claims were substantially the same, he decided that both inventions were useful, and he decided upon similar testimony, viz., the models, drawings, and descriptions of the two parties. He did not, as is alleged, decide expressly that Bain's invention was useful. The question was never raised. And with regard to Morse's, he had decided that it was useful before Bain had contended that it was not. But it is respectfully submitted that the question of utility cannot be raised by any second party on the issue of a patent. The law points out no mode for testing in the patent office the practicability of an invention, except by the examination of the specifications, drawings, and model. It has provided no way to take testimony touching that question. In short, prior to the issue of a patent, it is a question reserved for the commissioner alone, to be determined on the case before him. If he doubts, he may require experiments to satisfy him. If he does not doubt, nobody else has a right to raise the question nor to contest the issue of the patent on that ground, and he is bound to grant it. With these views, hastily put together, the undersigned submits the various questions raised by the learned counsel of Bain to the enlightened consideration and decision of your honor. All which is respectfully submitted.

Edmund Burke, Commissioner of Patents.

For convenience of reference, the opinion of the attorney-general upon the question of law presented in this case is given in full:

Sir: I have the honor to reply to your letter submitting an inquiry propounded by the commissioner of patents, whether a foreign patentee can go behind the date of his foreign patent and prove the actual date of his invention, in order to defeat the right of an American inventor, there having been no previous description of the invention in any printed publication; or, in other words, whether the fact of an invention or discovery abroad, which had not been patented nor described in any printed publication, will defeat a patent to an original inventor, who has invented or discovered the same thing in this country. The answer to be given to this inquiry depends upon the act of congress of July 4, 1836, [5 Stat. 119,] when the patent laws of the United States underwent a revision, and several important provisions were for the first time introduced. By the sixth section it is enacted "that any person or persons having discovered or invented any new and useful art, machine, manufacture, or composition of matter, or any new and useful improvement on any art, machine, manufacture, or composition of matter not known or used by others before his or their discovery or invention thereof, and not, at the time of his application for a patent, in public use or on sale with his consent or allowance as the inventor or discoverer, and shall desire to obtain an exclusive property therein, may make application in writing to the commissioner of patents, expressing such desire, and the commissioner, on due proceedings had, may grant a patent therefor." The same section provides that "the applicant shall also make oath or affirmation that he does verily believe that he is the original and first inventor or discoverer of the art, machine, composition, or improvement for which he solicits a patent, and that he does not know or believe that the same was ever before known or used, and also of what country he is a citizen."

Thus far the law is left substantially as it stood before, and, if not accompanied by any new provisions, would be controlled by previous adjudications, founded in a considerable degree upon enactments now become obsolete. But the seventh section introduces a new rule, which seems to be decisive of the question under consideration. It declares "that on the filing of any such application, description, and specification, and the payment of the duty hereinafter provided, the commissioner shall make, or cause to be made, an examination of the alleged new invention or discovery; and if, on any such examination, it shall not appear to the commissioner that the same had been invented or discovered by any other person in this country prior to the alleged invention or discovery thereof by the applicant, or that it had been patented or described in any printed publication in this or any foreign country, or had been in public use or on sale, with the applicant's consent or allowance, prior to the application, if the commissioner shall deem it to be sufficiently useful and important, it shall be his duty to issue a patent therefor." The rule here prescribed to the commissioner is afterwards reaffirmed and carried out in the form of a proviso in the fifteenth section, prescribing a rule of adjudication, namely: "That whenever it shall satisfactorily appear that the patentee, at the time of making his application, believed himself to be the first inventor or discoverer of the thing patented, the same shall not be held to be void on account of the invention or discovery, or any part thereof, having been before known or used in any foreign country, it not appearing that the same, or any substantial part thereof, had been before patented or described in any printed publication." While, therefore, the seventh section declares that a patent shall issue to the inventor (all other conditions being complied with) if the thing proposed to be secured had not "been invented or discovered by any other person in this country," the proviso of the fifteenth section enacts that the patent shall not be held void (all other conditions being complied with) "on account of the invention or discovery, or any part thereof, having been before known or used in any foreign country."

These provisions introduce an important modification of the law of patents, designed to protect the American inventor against the injustice of being thrown out of the fruits of his ingenuity by the existence of a secret invention or discovery abroad—that is to say, one not patented, and not described in any printed publication. It is well known that such secrets of trade exist in great numbers, and are designedly withheld from the public; and when, therefore, the American inventor has been so fortunate as to invent or discover the same thing, he is as great a public benefactor as if the secret did not exist in any foreign country. And it was the intention of congress to secure to him his rightful property in the result, and not permit it to be defeated by the foreign inventor coming forward afterwards either for a patent or without a patent. There is no more reasonable or just foundation or title of property than that which has been so imperfectly secured by law in the products of mind; and it is to be regarded as the presumed intention of the legislature effectually to secure it in every case where the reason of the law will apply and the language used will admit of a favorable interpretation. In the present case the intention is clear, and the language explicit and unequivocal, leaving no room for construction. The proviso, without the aid of the sixth section, furnishes a clear rule of adjudication, by which the rights of parties are ascertained; and it is impossible that an executive officer should regard that as an objection to the grant of a patent which the courts of law are bound to overrule as unavailable. The objection, therefore, which is now presented—that an original bona fide inventor in this country, who verily believed himself the original and first inventor or discoverer at the time of his application, and did not know or believe that his invention or discovery was ever before known or used; and when, in fact, it had not been before invented or discovered by any other person in this country, and had not itself, or any substantial part of it, been before patented or described in any printed publication in any country; that the American inventor, in such a case, is not entitled to a patent for his discovery, because it had been before known or used in a foreign country,—is directly opposed to the intent, the policy, and express words of the act of congress, and is without any legal foundation.

In such a case the American inventor is, in contemplation of law under the provisions of the act of congress, the original and first inventor. The fact that an invention not patented, and not described in any printed publication, has been before known or used in any foreign country, is rendered immaterial, except so far as it may have come to the knowledge of the applicant, and may thus conflict with the oath or affirmation which he is required to take, or with his claims as an original inventor. If he is an original inventor, and is in a condition to take the oath or affirmation prescribed, then the act removes the supposed objection out of the way, requires the commissioner to issue the patent, the courts to declare it valid, and establishes the American right, to the exclusion of the foreign discovery, which has not, in either mode indicated by the act of congress, been communicated to the public.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

Isaac Toucey.

Hon. James Buchanan, Secretary of State.

CRANCH, Chief Judge. The commissioner, upon hearing, decided that Mr. Bain's claim interfered with Mr. Morse's, and that Mr. Morse was the first inventor, and rejected the claim of Mr. Bain. From this decision Mr. Bain has appealed. It is contended by the counsel of Mr. Morse that the judge, upon appeal, has no jurisdiction of the question of interference; that an appeal is given solely upon the question of priority of invention; that upon the question of interference the decision of the commissioner is conclusive. Whether it be thus conclusive, then, is the first question to be decided. By the act of [July 4,] 1836, [5 Stat. 120,] c. 357, § 7, it is enacted that "if the specification and claim shall not have been so modified as, in the opinion of the commissioner shall entitle the applicant to a patent, he may, on an appeal and upon request in writing, have the decision of a board of examiners, to be composed of three, &c.; and on examination and consideration of the matter by such board, it shall be in their power, or of a majority of them, to revise the decision of the commissioner, either in whole or in part; and their opinion being certified to the commissioner, he shall be governed thereby in the further proceedings to be had on such application." This section is applicable to cases where there is no conflicting applicant, and shows that the legislature, by saying "if in the opinion of the commissioner," &c., did not intend to make that opinion conclusive. On the contrary, it provides "that the board shall be furnished with a certificate in writing of the opinion and decision of the commissioner, stating the particular grounds of his objection, and the part or parts of the invention which he considers as not entitled to be patented; and that the said board shall give reasonable notice to the applicant, as well as to the counsel, of the time and place of their meeting," &c. All these provisions were evidently intended to enable the board of examiners to revise the opinion and decision of the commissioner, and show that his opinion was not to be conclusive. By the eighth section of the same act (1836) it is enacted "That whenever an application shall be made for a patent which, in the opinion of the commissioner, might interfere with any other patent for which an application may be pending, or with any unexpired patent which shall have been granted, it shall be the duty of the commissioner to give notice thereof to such applicants or patentees, as the case may be; and if either shall be dissatisfied with the decision of the commissioner on the question of priority of right or invention on a hearing thereof, he may appeal from such decision on the like terms and conditions as are provided in the preceding section of this act; and the like proceedings shall be had to determine which, or whether either, of the applicants is entitled to receive a patent as prayed for."

The question of priority of right or invention necessarily implies interference. The commissioner, before he could decide the question of priority, must have decided that of interference, for without interference there can be no question of priority. Before I can have jurisdiction of the question of priority, I must be satisfied that there is an interference; and I must decide the question of jurisdiction, as well as any other question which arises in the cause. The opinion of the commissioner (mentioned in the eighth section, that interference exists) only justifies him in giving notice thereof to the other applicant and appointing a day to hear the parties upon that question. He decides it only pro hac vice, and for that purpose only. Upon the hearing, he is to decide; and from that decision, if either shall be dissatisfied with it on the question of priority, including that of interference, he may appeal; and upon such appeal, as I understand the law, the judge, in case of real interference, may "determine which, or whether either, of the applicants is entitled to receive a patent as prayed for." The scope thus given to the judge is broad enough to include the question of interference, as well as that of priority, if it should arise. By the act of [March 3,] 1839, [5 Stat. 354,] c. 88, § 11, it is enacted "That in all cases where an appeal is now allowed by law from the decision of the commissioner of patents to a board of examiners, provided for in the seventh section of the act to which this is additional, the party, instead thereof, shall have a right to appeal to the chief justice of the district court of the United States for the District of Columbia by giving notice thereof to the commissioner and filing in the patent office, within such time as the commissioner shall appoint, his reasons of appeal specifically set forth in writing, and also paying into the patent office, to the credit of the patent funds, the sum of twenty-five dollars. And it shall be the duty of the said chief justice, on petition, to hear and determine all such appeals, and to revise such decisions, in a summary way, upon the evidence adduced before the commissioner, at such early and convenient time as he may appoint, first notifying the commissioner of the time and place of hearing, whose duty it shall be to give notice thereof to all parties who appear to be interested therein in such manner as the said judge shall prescribe. The commissioner shall also lay before the said judge all the original papers and evidence in the case, together with the grounds of his decision, fully set forth in writing, touching all the points involved by the reasons of appeal; to which the decision shall be confined."

One of the reasons of appeal in this case is that there is no real and substantial interference between the two applications. The question of interference, therefore, is involved by the reasons of appeal, and must be decided by the judge. By limiting the jurisdiction of the judge to the points involved by the reasons of appeals, the legislature has affirmed it to that extent. The interference mentioned in the eighth section of the act of 1836 must be an interference in respect to patentable matters; and the claims of the applicants must be limited to the matters specifically set forth as their respective inventions; and what is not thus claimed may, for the purpose of this preliminary inquiry, be considered as disclaimed. The question, then, is, Does Mr. Bain claim a patent for any matter now patentable for which Mr. Morse claims a patent? To answer this question it is necessary to ascertain for what patentable matter Mr. Morse now claims a patent. In his specification filed January 20th, 1848, he says: "What I claim as my own invention and improvement is the use of a single circuit of conductors for the marking of my telegraphic signs, already patented, for numerals, letters, words, and sentences, by means of the decomposing, coloring, or bleaching effects of electricity acting upon any known salts that leave a mark, as the result of the said decomposition, upon paper, cloth, metal, or other convenient and known markable material. I also claim the invention of the machinery, as herein described, for the purpose of applying the decomposing, coloring, or bleaching effects of electricity acting upon known salts, as hereinbefore described." The commissioner in his written decision in this case says: "Such use of a single circuit" (i. e., to produce marks upon chemically-prepared paper) "is not the point at issue; nor is this claimed by either party. Said Morse claims using a single circuit of conductors for a certain purpose or in a certain way, viz., to mark his telegraphic signs, and also claims the machinery by which he accomplishes this purpose. Said Bain does not specifically mention in his claim using a single circuit, though this must be considered as an essential part of his invention and claim, and is necessarily involved in the final clause of his claim, to wit: 'So that in either case these form the received communication, substantially in the manner and with the effects described and shown.'" The commissioner proceeds: "The third clause of the claim of said Bain, with which the two claims of said Morse interfere, is as follows, to wit: 'Third. The application of any suitable chemically-prepared paper, without regard to the chemical ingredients used for such a purpose, to receive and record signs forming such communications, such signs being made by the pulsations of an electric current or currents transmitted from a distant station, said current operating directly and without the intervention of any secondary current or mechanical contrivance, through a suitable metal-marking style that is in continuous contact with the receiving paper, thereby making marks thereon, which marks correspond with groups of perforations in the paper composing the transmitted communication, or may be given by the pulsations from the spring 45 and the block 46; so that in either case these form the received communication, substantially in the manner and with the effects described and shown, including any merely practical variations, analogies, and equivalents in the means employed and the effects produced thereby.'" The commissioner in his written decision says: "The invention, it will be seen by the reference to the specifications of the parties respectively, does not consist in the use of the electric current to make marks upon chemically-prepared paper, nor making marks through a single line of conductors; nor could a claim to either of these devices have been entertained as patentable, as they have been long known." Again, it is said by the counsel of Mr. Morse: "It is admitted that neither could patent the battery, the circuit, the prepared paper, or the marking by the electro-chemical process. It was only a new combination of the several parts, so as to produce a new result, or an old result in a better manner, that either could patent. Again, the commissioner in his "reasons of decision" says: "It is true, as Mr. Bain asserts, that no one can monopolize the use of air, fire, or water, but it is equally true that any one can monopolize the use of air, fire, or water upon certain principles of operation which he may have invented or discovered; and this is precisely what the respective claimants in this case demanded as their right, and which gave rise to the interference, viz., each claimed the right to use, and exclude others from using, galvanic power to mark certain signs (which signs have already been patented by said Morse) upon chemically-prepared paper through a single circuit of conductors. A single circuit of conductors consisting either wholly of wire, or in part of wire and part of earth, for telegraphic purposes was not new. The signs or signals to be marked were not new, the same having been before patented by said Morse; and chemically-prepared paper for receiving telegraphic signs by galvanism was not new, the same having been patented in England in 1836 by Mr. E. Davy (7719 of 1836). Moreover, the use of a single telegraphic circuit for making the aforesaid signs upon paper was not new, the same having been before patented by said Morse. Neither party claimed any one or any two of the above elemental features. The invention of each was made up of the three combined, and the advantages claimed to have been discovered by each in these combined operations were identical."

There is nothing, then, now patentable in the Morse claim, left to be interfered with, except his claim of a patent for his invention of the machinery described in his specification or for his combination of machinery and materials as described therein. The claim of each applicant, therefore, is reduced to the claim for the combination of machinery and materials which he has invented, and does not include any of the matters claimed in his specification which are not now patentable. These combinations seem to me to be far from identical. Mr. Bain includes in his combination the use of the perforated paper for composing the communication and of the style which passes the electric current through the perforator and the machinery for transmitting the same communication to several different places at the same time. It is said that the style is not new; but he makes it an ingredient in his combination—and in that respect his combination differs from that of Mr. Morse, and it is a very important item—in connection with the perforated paper. He includes in his combination new patentable matter with old matter not patentable, and thereby makes a new patentable combination. This new matter thus introduced into the combination is admitted to be patentable in itself without combination with the old unpatentable matter, and, indeed, it seems to be a great improvement in the transmission of telegraphic information. But it is said that Mr. Bain is only authorized to obtain a separate patent for these inventions, and cannot claim a patent for his new combination of the old and new together. If, however, his new combination of old materials be patentable, which must be admitted, or it would not interfere with Mr. Morse's claim, it seems to be not the less patentable because it includes the new matter in connection with the old. The old matter may not in itself be patentable, but joined to the new matter a combination may be formed which may be patented. He is not obliged to take separate patents for each new patentable matter. He does not now ask for them. He may be willing to ask only for a limited use of those new matters, to wit, in combination, and not for an exclusive use of them for every purpose to which they may be applicable. Mr. Godson (Gods. Pat. p. 63) says: "A combination of old materials, when in consequence thereof a new effect is produced, may be the subject of a patent. This effect may consist either in the production of a new article, or in making an old one in a better manner or at a cheaper rate. This manufacture may be made of different substances mingled together, or of different machines formed into one, or of the arrangement of many old combinations. Each distinct part of the manufacture may have been in common use, and every principle upon which it is founded may have been long known, and yet the manufacture may be the proper subject for a patent. It is not for those parts and principles, but for the new and useful compound or thing thus produced by combination, that the grant is made. It is for combining and using things before known with something then invented, so as to produce an effect which was never before attained."

The counsel for Mr. Morse in argument said: "It is obvious, and is admitted by our adversaries, that Morse's instrument is a very different thing in form and structure from Bain's." But form and structure are very important matters in machinery; and if they enable the operator to do the work in a better manner, or with more ease, or less expense, or in less time, it is no interference, but it is an improvement for which the inventor may have a patent. When the application is for a patent for a combination of machinery and materials, form and structure become substance. They are the essence of the invention; and an admission that Morse's instrument is a very different thing in its form and structure from Bain's, is an admission of a fact which is prima-facie evidence, at least, that there is no interference between the two, and throws the burden of proof upon the other side. There was no evidence laid before the commissioner of patents upon the question of interference; so that he must have adjudged the interference upon a comparison of the two specifications, possibly without considering that the only patent either could obtain would be a patent for his own combination—all the materials of which Mr. Morse's combination consists being old and not now patentable. The question is not now whether the claims of Mr. Bain and Mr. Morse interfere as to matter not now patentable, but whether they interfere as to matter now patentable; and the only matter now patentable in Mr. Morse's specification is his own combination of machinery and materials. That combination constitutes his machine, and his machine is admitted to be a very different thing in its form and structure from Mr. Bain's. Form and structure constitute the identity of machinery. The combination consists in form and structure, and the patent, if issued, will, I presume, be issued for the form and structure of the instrument. It being admitted that the form and structure of Mr. Bain's instrument is very different from Morse's, there can be no interference in that respect. And if form and structure constitute the identity of machinery, there is no interference in the two instruments; and if the instruments are the combinations, or the result of the combinations, for which patents are now claimed, there is no interference in the two instruments in regard to any matter now patentable. But it is not necessary to rely alone upon the admission of Mr. Morse's counsel to show that there is a great difference between the machines used by the contending applicants to effect the objects, i. e., the rapid transmission of intelligence by the power of the electric current. Any one who will compare the two specifications and drawings and models will at once perceive that difference.

A patentable improvement is not an interference. The commissioner in his written decision says: "It appears from the records of the office that the application by said Alexander Bain, subject of Great Britain, was made April 18th, 1848; and upon examination of his claim it was found that the before-mentioned claim could be admitted to patent, no invention of a like character appearing in the public records of the office nor in any printed publication. Prior, however, to the final issue of the case, the secret archives were consulted, and it was found that an application filed by Samuel F. B. Morse January 20th, 1848, had been there deposited, in compliance with provisions of the law, which presented claims conflicting with those before mentioned set up by said Bain." This shows that but for the supposed interfering claim of Morse Mr. Bain was entitled to his patent; and if there be no interference in respect to patentable matter, he is still entitled to a patent for his own combination. But the counsel for Mr. Morse say: "There is an interference in that Bain's third claim palpably covers the whole of Mr. Morse's first claim, and, if granted, Bain could do all that Morse claims an exclusive right to do. He could write Morse's characters precisely as Morse does; and that therein consists the interference." But the only matter now patentable and claimed in Mr. Morse's specification is his peculiar combination of materials and machinery as therein described. All the materials used in the combination are old, and he will not under his patent be entitled to the exclusive use of any of them separately, or in any other combination than that which he has described in his specification. There cannot be a patent for a principle, nor for the application of a principle, nor for an effect. Two persons may use the same principle, and produce the same effect by different means, without interference or infringement, and each would be entitled to a patent for his own invention. Gods. Pat. pp. 63, 68, 74. So in the present case, although the power used by both applicants is the same, and the subject the same, yet, as the effect is produced by means which appear to me so different as to prevent an interference, the question of priority of invention does not arise. It is not, therefore, a case under the eighth section of the act of [July 4,] 1836, but under the seventh section of the same act, [5 Stat. 120;] so that each of the applicants may have a patent for the combination which he has invented and claimed and described in his specification, provided he shall have complied with all the requisites of the law to entitle him to a patent. If this were a doubtful question I should think it my duty to render the same judgment, so as to give Mr. Bain the same right to have the validity of his patent tested by the ordinary tribunals of the country which Mr. Morse would enjoy as to his patent, and finally, to obtain the judgment of the supreme court of the United States upon it. For if the commissioner and the judges should reject Mr. Bain's application for a patent, the decision would be final and conclusive against him unless he could obtain relief by a bill in equity under the tenth section of the act of 1836, [5 Stat. 121,] and the tenth section of the act of 1839, [Id. 354,] which it is said is doubtful.

I am therefore of opinion, and so decide, that there is no interference in relation to any matter (contained in their respective specifications) now patentable, and therefore that Samuel F. B. Morse is entitled to a patent for the combination which he has invented, claimed, and described in his specification, drawings, and model, and that Alexander Bain is entitled to a patent for the combination which he has invented, claimed, and described in his specification, drawing, and model, provided they shall respectively have complied with all the requisites of the law to entitle them to their respective patents. I deem it unnecessary, therefore, to decide upon any other points involved by the reasons of appeal.

2. An account current received and not objected to in a reasonable time becomes a settled account, bearing interest from the time it is stated, and the balance is payable on demand.

[See Baker v. Biddle, Case No. 764; White v. Macon, Id. 17,553; Hopkirk v. Page, Id. 6,697.]

3. An account made up of principal and interest becomes one principal debt when settled, the aggregate balance bearing interest.

4. Compound interest is not illegal, and may be recovered on an express promise, or one implied by law, as a part of the contract.

[At law. Action by Bainbridge & Co. against Wilcocks.]

The plaintiffs were bankers and commission merchants residing in London, the defendant a merchant residing in Philadelphia; this suit was brought to recover a balance of an account, principally for bills accepted by plaintiffs at the request of defendant, or drawn by him, on his promise to make provision for them at maturity. The money was paid before and in 1810, and charged in account; the defendant left the United States in June 1811, and did not return till 1825. On the 25th of June 1811, he wrote to the plaintiffs that he appointed William Waln of Philadelphia his agent in his commercial transactions, and desired them to take his directions, the defendant being about to go to South America and Canton. In September 1811 the plaintiffs sent to Mr. Waln their account current with the defendant, exhibiting a balance due by him of 300 pounds. In March 1813 they sent another account to him, balance 1500 pounds, in March 1815 another, balance 1660 pounds, in March 1817 another, balance 1830 pounds, which were received by Mr. Waln in due time; a copy of the last account was also delivered to the defendant in Canton in the same year.

These accounts were made up of the items of charge and credit, beginning with the old balance, on which interest was charged till the making up of the new account; a balance was then struck and carried to the new account. The three last accounts were made up of the balances of the former accounts, with interest added; the effect of which was, that the aggregate balance of principal and interest in the last account, became principal in the next, with interest computed upon it. In the last accounts, interest was charged during the late war with England, letters from the plaintiffs to the defendant at Canton, complaining of the non payment of the balance were sent in 1817, 1819, 1823, which were received, but were not replied to till 1824, when defendant refused payment, alleging that he had paid Mr. Waln, to whom the plaintiffs had charged the account on his guarantee made in 1810. Mr. Waln continued to be the agent of defendant till 1819, and appears to have kept up a regular correspondence with him, in which reference was made by both, to the accounts of the plaintiffs; there were large accounts between them and Mr. Waln, and Mr. Waln and the defendants, which were given in evidence at the trial, together with a great mass of correspondence. It was alleged by the defendant, that he had objected to the account in Canton when it was presented to him in the winters of 1817, 1818, but the evidence was contradictory. Much time of the trial was occupied on the allegation of payment to Mr. Waln by defendant, of the balance claimed by plaintiffs, who had at one time charged it to him, but no satisfactory defence was made out on that ground; there was also some controversy as to some of the items of the account, and some additional credits claimed. No questions of law arose at the trial except on the charge of compound interest, and interest during the late war, which were objected to by the defendant's counsel; these were the principal questions in the cause. The trial occupied eight days, principally on matters of fact. [Verdict and judgment for plaintiffs.]

Before BALDWIN, Circuit Justice, and HOPKINSON, District judge.

BALDWIN, Circuit Justice, (charging the jury.) The account between the parties consists of advances made in London by the plaintiffs, who resided there, to the defendant residing here, and payments made on account by the latter in London. The whole course of the transactions and correspondence between them shows, that the contract was to be performed in London; the rights and obligations of the parties, the rate of interest, and the rules for its computation, must therefore be governed by the law of England; the remedies on the contract depend on the law of the forum. The relation between the parties is that of agent, factor and depository on the part of the plaintiffs, and the defendant as their principal; their obligation is to account for the effects which came to their hands, his is to reimburse them for advances made, and responsibilities incurred at his request by a letter or a bill drawn on them. The contract between them is not one implied by a loan, but a special contract of indemnity, arising from the relation between them, governed by the law and usage of merchants, which makes it the duty of a person who draws bills on another without funds, to place them in the hands of the acceptor before the bill is due. Though the acceptor becomes the principal debtor to the holder of the bill, yet he is considered as the surety of the drawer, entitled to full indemnity, if funds are not provided in time: the factor or agent who has accepted on the faith of such contract, must be put in the same situation as if it had been complied with punctually. Interest is deemed to be a compensation for not paying money when due; the law of England as to the payment of interest is well settled.

On a note payable at a particular day, with interest, it is payable from the date, (5 Ves. 803; Coop. 29; 2 Mass. 568; 8 Mass. 221;) if interest is not mentioned, then it runs only after the day of payment, (2 Burrows, 1081;) if goods are sold payable at a certain day by a note or bill, if not given, the account bears interest, as if the note or bill had been given, for the obligation to pay is equal, (13 East, 98; 3 Taunt. 157; 2 Camp. 272, 280; 17 Ves. 278.) Any instrument of writing by which money is to be paid on a day certain, bears interest thereafter; not as damages, but as part of the contract. 3 Brown, Ch. 439; 3 Ves. 133, 134. The balance of an account properly stated, bears interest from the time of liquidation till the principal is paid, though the debt, from its nature, did not bear interest. 2 Ves. Sr. 365; 2 W. Bl. 761; 3 Wils. 206; 2 Atk. 211. It will be computed on all notes, bills, contracts or debts, which on their face, or the nature of the contract, carry interest, (2 Ves. Jr. 300,) from the day when payable, on money lent, (Dickens, 307, 308; Bunb. 119;) if there is no time of payment, or if payable on demand, then after demand made, (1 Ves. Jr. 63;) on an overdraft on a banker, though a note is taken for it payable on demand, the interest is due from the usage and course of dealing between banker and customer, and the contract implied therefrom, (2 Ves. Jr. 302;) so on an advance of money by an agent in transacting the mercantile concerns of his principal, (3 Camp. 466, 467.) It will be allowed on an account current between merchants, where one has laid out a gross sum for another. Ridgway's Case, Cas. t. Hardw. 285; 1 H. Bl. 305. So on an award to pay the sum due on a balance of accounts on a certain day, (3 Camp. 467;) or on award of damages assessed pursuant to a statute, (1 Maule & S. 173, 174;) on an account stated by a master in chancery, (1 P. Wms. 480, 653; 1 Atk. 244.) These are the rules which prevail at law, as well as in equity, except in cases of bankruptcy; in such cases as the commissioners cannot award damages, the interest is allowed only in cases where it is due by contract, not where it is given by way of damages merely. 1 Atk. 75, 80, 151, 244; 3 Brown, Ch. 436, 439, 504, 508; 2 Ves. Jr. 295; 1 Rose, 317, 400. Where the course of trade between two countries has been settled to allow interest in certain cases, it is evidence of a contract to pay it according to such usage, (Doug. 361,) as the tacit law of the contract presumed to be agreed on by the parties, (3 Caines, 234, 243.)

Though an account does not bear interest a priori, yet the party receiving the account with interest charged according to usage or custom, it is evidence of an original agreement to pay it; so if the parties have settled an account according to such usage. 3 Brown, Ch. 439, 508; 3 Wash. 352, 402, [Barclay v. Kennedy, Case No. 976, and Denniston v. Imbrie, Id. 3,802.] In all such cases, the interest accruing from the time when an account is liquidated by the parties, when it is settled or liquidated by presumption of law from the conduct of the parties, or their implied agreement, by an award, a report of auditors or a master, an inquest or a jury, becomes as much a part of the debt due by the contract, as the original sum out of which it arose. 2 Burrows, 1088.

To make an account a stated, settled, or liquidated one, it need not be signed by the parties, it is enough that it shows a balance, or that there is none. 2 Atk. 251, 399. If one merchant sends an account to another in a foreign country, and he keeps it by him any length of time, as two years, without objection, the rule of courts and merchants is, that it is understood as a stated account. 2 Ves. Sr. 239; 2 Atk. 251; S. P., 15 Johns. 409, 424. Where the parties live in England, it has been held that not objecting to the account by the second or third post is an allowance of it. 2 Vern. 276; S. P., 1 P. Wms. 653.

The time within which an account shall be taken as a stated one, unless objected to, cannot be definitely fixed; it depends on the circumstances of the case, whether an acquiescence or a presumed agreement to the correctness of the account exists. If it does, and the party does not account for his silence, the account is considered as settled to his satisfaction, and the party claiming the balance is not bound to prove the items of his account. The party charged may show errors and omissions apparent in the account, but the burthen of showing them is on him who receives and keeps the account without objection, and the errors must be specified; they will not be corrected on doubtful or only probable testimony, but must be palpable, and not to be misunderstood, the party complaining can only surcharge and falsify, but cannot open the account generally, unless there has been fraud practiced upon him. 2 Atk. 119; 9 Ves. 266; 1 Ch. Cas. 299; 1 Vern. 180; 2 Brown, Ch. 62. It is the law of this country. [Freeland v. Heron,] 7 Cranch, [11 U. S.] 151. And a settled account is not opened, by being introduced into a second one. [Chappedelaine v. Dechenaux,] 4 Cranch, [8 U. S.] 309. These rules apply to all stated or settled accounts which bear interest from the time of settlement, unless some time for payment is stated, although part of the balance is for interest. Where regular accounts are settled from time to time, interest on interest is allowed. 3 Brown, Ch. 440. Where an account of moneys paid for insurances, and on other transactions between agent and principal, had been rendered annually, and interest charged at the close of every year on the balance, and the interest of each preceding year added to the principal, and no objection was made when the accounts had been rendered, until the expiration of ten years from the first account, the interest so charged was allowed. 3 Camp. 466, 467. Where bankers furnish an annual account without objection, an agreement shall be presumed that the balance of principal and interest shall bear interest. 1 Ball & B. 428. Accounts between merchants may be settled every half year, on the principle of compound interest. 9 Ves. 223, 224. It may be allowed where there is a contract implied, or it is the usage of trade, (2 Ves. Jr. 16, 17, 20, 21; vide a very able opinion of the late Judge T. Smith, 4 Yeates, 224,) or accounts transmitted annually, (2 Ves. Jr. 20, semb.) It is not illegal. 1 Ves. Jr. 99. Compound interest cannot be a priori, but is just after the debt is due. 9 Ves. 224. When it is the custom of a place and the practice of the parties, to strike a balance every quarter, and render the account, it brings it to the case of a fresh agreement, at the beginning of every quarter, to lend the sum then due, which is not illegal. 2 Anstr. 496. Acquiescence in an account rendered, is not, per se, an agreement to it, but it is evidence from which it may be inferred, that the party who receives the account, without objection, thereby agrees to continue this course of dealing, and to retain the balance in his hands rather than to pay it. It is a tacit assent to the terms demanded by the creditor on the face of the account rendered, which is direct notice of his understanding of their agreement; if the debtor is not content, he is bound by every principle of good faith to give notice of his dissent. The balance due is the capital of the creditor, which he leaves in the debtor's hands on paying interest; if it is not recoverable, his capital consists in a dry, barren balance, while his debtor uses it to a profit. The law does not impose such hardship on an ordinary merchant who makes a profit by his dealing, still less on a factor who receives only commissions and interest on his advances; especially in a case like the present. No contract can be more obligatory in justice or mercantile faith, than one by letter promising to provide funds to meet an acceptance by a friend and agent; or an implied one more sacred, than what the law infers from drawing a bill without funds, and its acceptance for the accommodation of the drawer. Nor can there be a case where there can be less ground for complaint, than one where, after such a contract has been violated, the creditor strikes a balance of principal and interest only once in two years, as in the one before you; and if the law will presume an agreement from silence in any cases, it is in this, where accounts had been rendered at intervals of two years without an objection, till the expiration of thirteen years from striking the first balance.

It has been objected that the defendant was in Canton when the accounts were rendered. But it is a conclusive answer to this objection, that Mr. Waln was his agent, so notified to the plaintiffs, who were directed to correspond with him as such; the accounts were received by Mr. Waln, between whom and the defendant a constant correspondence was kept up. Notice to the agent was notice to the principal, it was the agent's duty to communicate the accounts, and from the evidence there can be no doubt of the fact that they were so communicated and received, but if they were not received in fact by the defendant the law will presume it in this case. We instruct you therefore, as matter of law, that the accounts which have been rendered by the plaintiffs, and received by Mr. Waln or the defendant, are to be considered as stated or settled accounts, and as liquidated by the parties; as fully so as if they had been signed by both. The balance struck is a debt bearing interest, as a matter of contract implied by the law, and the balance is considered as one debt, without regard to the items which compose it; the aggregate of principal and interest, due on the old account, is carried to the new, imparting a promise to pay on demand, with interest from its date.

A promise or agreement implied by law, is as binding as if made by the party, the legal presumption is in the place of proof by witnesses; if the evidence is in writing, or the facts are admitted, the law declares what is the contract which results from them; so if a jury find the facts specially, the legal conclusion is a matter of law. If the facts are contested and the evidence doubtful, the jury will decide whether there was a promise express or implied to pay interest; but if they are satisfied that there was such promise in fact, or that such facts existed as are the foundation for the legal presumption of a promise or agreement to pay it; then interest follows as a matter of law. But though not so satisfied that there was an express or implied contract for the payment of interest, the jury may find it as damages for the non payment of the principal. In this case there is no fact in controversy which can affect the question of interest, the account being a settled one, the law raises the promise to pay interest on the balance stated in the last account rendered, as a matter of contract, which you will find accordingly. This implied agreement, applies as well to the interest on the account during the late war, as to what accrued before or after; the promise which the law raises to pay the whole account, carries with it the war interest, though it may not have been recoverable had it been objected to in time, there is no law which makes such promise illegal, or which can prevent the plaintiff from recovering it on an express or implied promise after peace. Our opinion therefore is, that in point of law the plaintiffs are entitled to interest as stated in their account.

The jury found for the plaintiffs with only simple interest, and as no motion was made for a new trial, judgment was rendered on the verdict. Vide York and Sheepshanks v. Wistar, [Case No. 18,141.]

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. Oct. Term, 1832.[2]

ADMIRALTY JURISDICTION — SEAMEN'S WAGES — SET-OFF—PRESENTING ACCOUNT.

1. An account for provisions furnished to the owner or commander of a vessel, or for articles for her use when not on a voyage or in a foreign port, is not within the admiralty jurisdiction of the district court, either as a substantive distinct claim or as an off-set to a libel for seamen's wages. [The General Smith, 4 Wheat. (17 U. S.) 443, distinguished.]

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the eastern district of Pennsylvania. Affirmed.]

The case was a libel in the admiralty [by Bains against the schooner James and Catherine] for seamen's wages, to which the claimant offered to set off an account against the libellant, composed in part of provisions furnished him for the use of vessels which he had commanded, and a pump for one of them.

Mr. Hubbell opposed the allowance of the credit, 1. Because the account offered was not cognizable in the admiralty, it being merely for goods and provisions sold, and not on a contract in its nature maritime, or made at sea. Le Caux v. Eden, 2 Doug. 594; 3 Bl. Comm. 106; 3 Mason, 161, [Willard v. Dorr, Case No. 17,680;] [The General Smith,] 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 438. The claimant can make no offset against a claim for seamen's wages, otherwise than by showing advances made on account, or some matter which would tend to affect or diminish the amount of compensation due. 3 Mason, 171, [Willard v. Dorr, Case No. 17,680.]

Mr. J. M. Scott, for the claimant.

The libellant might sue at common law, and by changing the forum cannot put the other party in a worse situation than he would be at law. But though he sues in the admiralty, it is a court of equity, and will not permit a recovery against equity and good conscience, though the case may not come within any statute of set-off. 2 Burrows, 826; 2 Gall. 526, 551, [The Brutus, Case No. 2,060.] A court of law will set off one judgment against another. 4 Durn & E. [Term R.] 123. An obligor may set off against the assignee a debt due him by the obligee. 1 Rawle, 227, 291. And courts of admiralty have the same power of allowing set-off, as the courts of Pennsylvania. The debt claimed to be set-off is of admiralty jurisdiction, it being founded on a maritime contract for provisioning and repairing vessels. 2 Gall. 475, [De Lovio v. Boit, Case No. 3,776;] 4 Wash. 454, [Zane v. President, Case No. 18,201;] [The General Smith,] 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 438; [The Aurora,] 1 Wheat. [14 U. The New Jersey, Case No. 5,233.] And though the contract was made on land, it is incident to matters arising at sea. 2 Pet. Adm. 309, [Moxon v. The Fanny, Case No. 9,895.]

Before BALDWIN, Circuit Justice, and HOPKINSON, District Judge.

BALDWIN, Circuit Justice. The object of the libel was to obtain the payment of the balance of wages due the libellant as mate of the schooner James and Catherine, by shipping articles on a voyage from Philadelphia to Kingston and back. The contract and its faithful performance by the libellant is admitted by the answer, and the difference between the amount claimed, and that admitted to be earned, is but trifling. The controversy arises on an account set up by the respondent in bar of the claim for wages, by way of set-off, or payment, to which the libellant has demurred; because the contract on which the account is founded, was made and to be performed in the county of Philadelphia, and therefore not cognizable in the admiralty, as also because the admiralty cannot entertain pleas of set-off.

As the first ground of demurrer goes to the jurisdiction of the court, it must be first considered. The first item of the account of the respondent is a balance of account of 31 dollars, due in 1822, the items composing it not being stated, but averred generally in the answer to have been for provisions furnished by the respondent for different vessels, owned or commanded by the libellant, and a pump for the sloop Polly, so owned and commanded. The judicial power of the United States extends to all the cases enumerated in the third article of the constitution, but to none other; as this account is between two citizens of Pennsylvania, it is not cognizable by the courts of the United States; unless it presents a case arising under the constitution, laws or treaties of the union, or is a subject of equity, of admiralty or maritime jurisdiction. The first is not pretended, and it is therefore incumbent on the respondent to bring his case within the other provisions of the constitution. To do this it is necessary to show that at the time of its adoption, cases of this description were cognizable in the admiralty in any shape, whether by original libel, counter claim, or set-off, arising from either the nature of the contracts, its subject matter, or application; for as a mere balance of account, there can be no pretence that it is any other than a contract at common law, cognizable only in courts of law.

There is nothing in the nature or subject matter of the account which can vary its character, it is to be performed on land within the jurisdiction of this state; it is subject to none of the casualties, conditions, terms, or peculiar obligation of marine contracts. The credit is not given or accepted on any express or implied pledge of ship, cargo or freight, or on the faith of either. The answer contains no such allegation. Neither does it specify the kind of provisions furnished, their quantity or use, whether in port or on a voyage; or whether they were purchased by libellant as owner or commander of the respective vessels, or set forth any circumstances which vary it from a case of mere personal credit. Taking the account then as it is stated, and the application of the items to have been as alleged, it presents no one feature of a marine contract, or any maritime attribute or quality to which any part of admiralty or maritime law can apply. It is, in the words of the constitution, "a case in law," not a controversy "between citizens of different states," but of the same state, cognizable only in the federal courts, by the principles of the common law, if the plaintiff was competent to sue therein.

The counsel for the respondent has ably and ingeniously endeavoured to establish the position, that the admiralty has jurisdiction in personam over all contracts for materials and provisions furnished, and labour performed in building, repairing, equipping and provisioning ships; in doing which he has entered into a very extensive range of investigation of the jurisdiction of courts of admiralty, a subject on which great contrariety of opinion has existed and yet exists among the most learned judges and jurists of this country. It was once a very vexed question in England, between the courts of Westminster Hall, which were governed by the common law, and the admiralty courts, which acted under the orders of the king in council, and proceeded according to the principles of the civil law; but after a long struggle the latter yielded, and their proceedings have for more than two hundred years, been constantly controlled and held in restraint by the courts and rules of the common law. The decisions on this subject have often been reviewed and commented on in our courts, but without any satisfactory results, and there has been no decision of the supreme court settling the question.

There is a dictum in the case of The General Smith, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 443, stating the opinion of the court, in affirmance of the admission of counsel of the claimant, previously made in argument, that the admiralty had a general jurisdiction in cases of material men, both in personam and rem; but this point formed no part of the judgment of the court, was not before them, and could not be settled by this declaration of an abstract opinion in a case, where a ship was libelled on a claim which was adjudged by the court to be no lien in the case before them. [Satterlee v. Matthewson,] 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 413. The court did not take the point to be settled eight years afterwards, when it came up in the case of Ramsay v. Allegre; they did not consider the general question of jurisdiction, but decided the case on other grounds. 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 611. Mr. Justice Johnson, who was one of the court when the opinion in the case of The General Smith was delivered, considers the remarks on this subject as mere dicta, and dissents from them in a very able, learned opinion, in which he utterly denies the jurisdiction of the admiralty in personam, in the cases referred to. Not being then bound to take the law as settled by the opinion of the judges as declared in 4 Wheat. [17 U. S. 438] and finding that the decisions of the different circuit courts are in direct contradiction on the subject of this branch of admiralty jurisdiction, I am at liberty to consider it, as not so firmly established as to make it improper for me to be guided by my own judgment of the law as it was settled before the adoption of the constitution. The jurisdiction of the courts of admiralty in England, is a part of the royal prerogative conferred on the lord high admiral by the king's commission, (4 Co. Inst. 124,) and exercised by his deputies and inferior officers forming courts of different grades, from the highest of which an appeal lies to the king in council; but not being courts of record, their proceedings cannot be reviewed according to the course of the common law, and no act of parliament has provided for an appeal to the house of lords, as from the high court of chancery. Vide 3 Bl. Comm. 69.

The jurisdiction of the admiralty was deemed a jewel of great lustre and value in the diadem or crown of the king, and was carried to great extent by the lord high admiral and his officers; but however it might be cherished and enlarged by them, in order to extend the king's and their power, and promote their interest, it was odious to the commons of England, who became alarmed at the encroachments upon the jurisdiction of the courts of common law, and called loudly for the redress of the grievance. Similar complaints were made against the encroachments of the court of chivalry, which was composed of the lord constable and earl marshal, which had conusance of deeds of arms, and of things touching arms, which could not be determined by the common law, and remedies were provided for both cases. The statute 13 Rich. II. c. 2, (1 Ruffh. St. 385; Keb. 173,) prohibited the court of chivalry from entertaining any plea "that might be tried by the law of the land," and provided a remedy by a writ compelling them to surcease proceedings. Chapter 5 prohibited the admiral and his deputies from meddling with any thing done in the realm, and on the sea only as it had been used in the time of Edw. III. (1 Ruffh. St. 385;) this statute proving insufficient, another was passed, on the grievous complaint of all the commons, in 15 Rich. II. c. 3, (1 Ruffh. St. 400; Keb. 180,) the prohibition of the admiral's jurisdiction was more explicit and extensive, excluding it from all things done in the body of a county, as well by land as by water, or wreck of the sea. The parliament, finding that laws merely prohibitory, did not prevent the encroachments of the admiralty, again interfered in 2 Hen. IV. c. 11, on the prayer of all the commons, and passed an act authorizing the party aggrieved by any usurpation and exercise of admiralty jurisdiction, to sue the plaintiff, and directed that he should recover double damages, declaring that the statute and common law should be holden against the admiral and his deputies. 1 Ruffh. St. 438; Keb. 193. As this statute empowered the courts of common law to vindicate its principles, and secure the right of trial by jury by amercing plaintiff in the courts of admiralty in heavy and double damages; and as the court of king's bench, in the exercise of its high prerogative and supervisory powers over all inferior courts and tribunals, issued writs of prohibition which neither the admiral or his deputies dared to disobey, they were compelled to submit to the statute and common law of the kingdom, in civil and criminal cases. But they yielded with a bad grace. In the 8 Jac. I., more than two hundred years after the statute of 2 Hen. IV., the lord high admiral made a formal complaint on the subject to the king, against the judges, concerning prohibitions granted to the court of admiralty.

The fifth grievance complained of by the admiral is worthy of special attention. "That the clause of non obstante statuto, which hath foundation in his majesty's prerogative, &c., is current in other grants; yet in the lord admiral's patent, is said to be of no force to warrant the determination of the causes committed to him in his lordship's patent, and is rejected by the judges of the common law."

Such was the audacity of the pretensions of the admiralty, that it claimed to exercise jurisdiction in virtue of the king's patent, in defiance of the acts of parliament; and the complaint against the judges was, that they enforced the supreme law of the kingdom. On a reference of the complaint by the king to the judges, they met it by acts of parliament, judicial proceedings, and adjudged cases, which exposed and put an end to the audacious claims asserted by the admiralty, 4 Co. Inst. 134, 142. This occurred in the reign of Jac. I., from which time the statutes in restraint of admiralty jurisdiction have been observed and enforced by the courts of common law, so as to prevent any encroachment by prerogative courts, in contravention of the established laws. It is not necessary for me to examine in detail the adjudged cases in the English courts. It would be useless, after the able review of them by Judge Johnson in Ramsay v. Allegre, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 614, &c., as to the claims of material men to proceed in personam in the admiralty, and by a very distinguished jurist and statesman who presided in the state court of admiralty in this state, during and after the revolution, as to the same claim to proceed in rem. The conclusion to which both arrived was, that such claim was inconsistent with the law as it existed in England before, and in the United States after the separation. It is also needless to combat the proposition, that the civil jurisdiction of the admiralty was more expanded in the colonies than in the mother country; or that it could be exercised in opposition to the established course of the law of England, without an act of parliament to authorize it. As appeals lay from the colonial courts of admiralty, the line of their jurisdiction was necessarily that which was the rule for the appellate court. The courts of both the colonies and mother country, were organized on similar principles; each with its appropriate jurisdiction, as prescribed by statutes or regulated by usage, the evidence of which is in the adjudications of the courts in England, and those of the colonies and the states, which acted on the rules established by early statutes, and their uniform construction down to the revolution. The civil jurisdiction of courts of admiralty was confined to matters arising on the sea, out of the body of any county, and to subject matters in their nature maritime, or done in the prosecution of a voyage. Courts looked to the nature of the act done, as well as its locality, and though the act was done on shore, as the pawning a ship for the emergencies of a voyage, yet being of a maritime nature, and the cause rising on the sea, it was cognizable in the admiralty. 6 C. Rob. Adm. 40; Bee, 420, 435, [Clinton v. The Hannah, Case No. 2,898; and Shrewsbury v. The Two Friends, Id. 12,819;] Hob. 11; 1 Salk. 35. If a vessel is taken as prize, the legality of the capture must be tried in the admiralty, (1 C. Rob. Adm. 238; Bee, 371, [Dean v. Angus, Case No. 3,702;] Doug. 591, 597;) so of a cause of action growing out of a capture as prize, (Bee, 372, [Dean v. Angus, supra,]) or if goods are taken piratically at sea, they may be followed in the admiralty on land, because the original cause arose at sea, (3 Bulst. 29; Cro. Eliz. 685.) But if a mere trespass is committed at sea, or the original cause arises on land, or on the sea, in the body of a county, or is not of a maritime nature, though arising on the sea, the cognizance thereof belongs to courts of common law, who will prohibit the admiralty from proceeding therein. Bee, 435, [Shrewsbury v. The Two Friends, Case No. 12,819;] 4 Co. Inst. 134; Hob. 212; 2 L. R. 805.

Such is the admitted course of proceeding by the statute and common law of England. But it is alleged, that the jurisdiction of courts of admiralty in the United States is more extensive, and that the constitution has re-established it, as it was claimed by the admiralty before the restraining statutes of Rich. II. and Hen. IV., and that it may now be exercised in all cases, where it is authorized by the civil law, or had been exercised under the king's commission to the admiral. Should this construction be given to the constitution, it will present, in striking contrast, the opinion of the people of the states who adopted it, and the opinion of the people of England, during the four hundred preceding years, on the right of trial by jury, and the preference of the common to the civil law. It will also present in as striking a view, the great difference between the opinions of those who composed the first congress of the revolution, and the members of the convention, who framed the constitution, in relation to admiralty jurisdiction, in all its branches.

In the preamble to the declaration of the rights of the colonies in October, 1774, one of the grievances complained of was, that parliament had, by late acts, "extended the jurisdiction of courts of admiralty not only for collecting the said duties, but for the trial of causes merely arising within the body of a county." In the fifth resolution it is declared, "that the respective colonies are entitled to the common law of England, and more especially to the great and inestimable privilege of being tried by their peers of the vicinage, according to the course of that law." It was also "resolved, that the following acts of parliament are infringements and violations of the rights of the colonists, and that the repeal of them is essentially necessary in order to restore harmony between Great Britain and the American colonies, viz.: the several acts of (naming them) which impose duties for the purpose of raising a revenue in America, extend the power of the admiralty courts beyond their ancient limits, deprive the American subject of trial by jury, &c., are subversive of American rights." Vide Journals of Congress 27, 29, 14th of October, 1774. Among the grievances enumerated in the declaration of independence, is the following: "for depriving us in many cases of the benefit of trial by jury." These declarations show that the same spirit which actuated their ancestors in England, descended to the colonists with equal zeal, in favour of the common law, the right of trial by jury, the restriction of admiralty jurisdiction to its ancient limits, and against its exercise "over causes merely arising within the body of a county." It is not credible that principles, thus consecrated, would be abandoned by the people of the colonies, when they made themselves states, by their declaration of independence, or that they solemnly reversed them when they adopted the constitution. No state ever passed any law in accordance with the acts of parliament which led to the revolution, which in any way abridged the right of trial by jury, even in civil cases, or abrogated any principles of the common law, by substituting in their place the rules of the civil law, which had not been adopted in the mother country. Nor is there any pretence that the admiralty courts, in any of the states, between the declaration of independence and the adoption of the constitution, had ever assumed the jurisdiction of civil causes not cognizable by the courts of admiralty in England. On the contrary, all such courts whose decisions are known, have asserted and acted on the principle that their admiralty jurisdiction was confined to the cases, and must be exercised by the rules which had defined it in England. The able and learned opinions of Judge Francis Hopkinson, in the admiralty court of Pennsylvania, in Dean v. Angus, in 1785, [supra,] and in Clinton v. The Hannah, in 1781, [Case No. 2,898,] are full and conclusive on the subject. His character as a jurist and statesman is well known to all of us. We cannot presume him to have been ignorant of the law of courts of admiralty, or withhold from his opinions the high respect to which they are justly entitled. Another distinguished civilian, Judge Bee, of South Carolina, also examined the subject most ably in Shrewsbury v. The Two Friends, in 1786, [Id. 12,819,] and laid down the law in the same way. Judge Peters uniformly adopted the principles on which Judge Hopkinson acted. 1 Pet. Adm. preface, V., [Append. Fed. Cas.] He held that the people of the states had adopted the common law, and the maritime law as a part of it, existing at the revolution,—1 Pet. Adm. 112, [Thompson v. The Catharina, Case No. 13,949,]—and laid down the broad proposition that "the maritime laws of England existing before our revolution, and consistent with our situation are yet our laws. It is but recently that admiralty cases have been published. We have therefore unavoidably recourse to their common law books for authority." 1 Pet. Adm. 229, [Gardner v. The New Jersey, Case No. 5,233.]

Few men were more familiar with the jurisprudence of the states, or the political history of the country, than Judge Peters, from before the revolution till the adoption of the constitution; the high authority of his opinions, concurring with Judges Hopkinson and Bee, is the highest judicial evidence which we can have, of the nature and extent of admiralty jurisdiction as it existed, when the states granted it by the constitution to the courts of the United States. It was a jurisdiction limited and defined by the statute and common law, its boundaries had been declared by adjudications in the courts of the states, so recently before the framing of the constitution in convention, that they must have been familiar to the members. To the states in which courts of admiralty had been long held, its jurisdiction was well known, and in the absence of any judicial authority under the governments of the states, in opposition to what has been referred to, we must consider this jurisdiction to have been granted, precisely as it had been previously exercised.

As the obnoxious acts of parliament ceased to have any force after the declaration of independence, the jurisdiction of courts of admiralty which those acts conferred, necessarily ceased with them, and could not be exercised without the authority of a state law. All matters relating to revenue, the regulation of commerce and navigation, were therefore cognizable only in the courts of common law in the several states, as they were in England from time immemorial; for the most strenuous advocates of the admiralty never pretended that it had jurisdiction over these subjects prior to the statutes of Richard II. The criminal jurisdiction of offences committed on the sea, within the body of a county, was made cognizable by a special court organized by the statute 28 Hen. VIII. c. 15, (2 Ruffh. St. 258,) which was directed to proceed according to the course of the common law. 3 Co. Inst. 111. When the offence was committed on the main sea or the coasts of the sea, being no part of the body of any county, it was declared to be cognizable in the admiralty by the statute 27 Eliz. c. 11. 4 Co. Inst. 137.

From this time the line which separated the jurisdiction of admiralty in all its branches from that of the common law, remained firmly settled, and the jurisdiction of the common law over matters excluded from the admiralty was unquestioned. All causes arising in the body of a county, or arising on the sea, unless of a maritime nature, were cognizable by the courts of common law, and the principles on which they granted prohibitions to courts of admiralty, were as much a part of the common law as the rules of descent. It was a part of that great system of English jurisprudence which the colonists adopted in its largest sense,—1 Gall, 493, [U. S. v. Coolidge, Case No. 14,857,]—as a general and fundamental law, unless altered by acts of assembly, or was not adapted to their condition,—[Morris' Lessee v. Vanderen,] 1 Dall. (1 U. S.) 67; 9 Serg. & R. 330, 358; 11 Serg. & R. 273; [Town of Pawlet v. Clark,] 9 Cranch, [13 U. S.] 333,—which the people of each state claimed as their birthright, from the beginning of the revolution. As this system is the basis of the judicial institutions of all the states, it is incumbent on those who assert that any part of it is not in force, to prove it as an exception. 9 Serg. & R. 334. Especially is it incumbent on those who assert that the people of the American colonies or states were more in favour of the extension of admiralty jurisdiction beyond its ancient limits, so as to embrace the trial of causes merely arising within the body of a county, and less attached to the inestimable right of trial by jury than their English ancestors, to establish it by irrefragable proof. The unanimous declaration of rights by the congress of 1774, expressed the then sense of the people of the colonies, and there has never been a jurist or statesman who has controverted the principles of government and policy therein promulgated. On the contrary, these principles have been adopted as the foundation on which the state and federal constitutions have been built.

In the grant of judicial power over cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction to the courts of the United States, the right of trial by jury of all crimes (except in cases of impeachment) is carefully secured; "and such trial shall be had in the state where the said crimes shall have been committed; but when not committed within any state the trial shall be at such place or places as congress may by law have directed, article three, section two, clause three, of the constitution of the United States." The sixth amendment is still more explicit. "In all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury of the state and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law."

These provisions go to the root of the criminal jurisdiction of the admiralty, over offences committed on the high sea; thus far the American people have solemnly affirmed their declaration of rights, and excluded from the admiralty a branch of jurisdiction which the statutes of England authorized them to exercise. It remains to inquire whether they have, by the same instrument, enlarged the civil jurisdiction of the admiralty, so as to extend it to causes arising within the body of a county, which were cognizable exclusively by the courts of common law in England.

In pursuing this inquiry, I am not at liberty to overlook the view of the constitution which has been taken by the supreme court; or if I was, I would not be so presumptuous as to attempt to make a better one than is to be found in their opinion in Parsons v. Bedford, 3 Pet. [28 U. S.] 446, 447: "The trial by jury is justly dear to the American people. It has always been an object of deep interest and solicitude, and every encroachment upon it has been watched with great jealousy. The right to such a trial is, it is believed, incorporated into, and secured in every state constitution in the union; and it is found in the constitution of Louisiana. One of the strongest objections originally taken against the constitution of the United States, was the want of an express provision securing the right of trial by jury in civil cases. As soon as the constitution was adopted, this right was secured by the seventh amendment of the constitution proposed by congress; and which received an assent of the people so general, as to establish its importance as a fundamental guarantee of the rights and liberties of the people. This amendment declares, that 'in suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed 20 dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved; and no fact once tried by a jury shall be otherwise re-examinable in any court of the United States, than according to the rules of the common law.' At this time there were no states in the union, the basis of whose jurisprudence was not essentially that of the common law in its widest meaning; and probably no states were contemplated, in which it would not exist. The phrase 'common law,' found in this clause, is used in contradistinction to equity, and admiralty, and maritime jurisprudence. The constitution had declared, in the third article, 'that the judicial power shall extend to all cases in law and equity arising under this constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made or which shall be made under their authority,' &c. and to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction. It is well known, that in civil causes, in courts of equity and admiralty, juries do not intervene, and that courts of equity use the trial by jury only in extraordinary cases to inform the conscience of the court. When, therefore, we find that the amendment requires that the right of trial by jury shall be preserved in suits at common law, the natural conclusion is, that this distinction was present to the minds of the framers of the amendment. By common law, they meant what the constitution denominated in the third article 'law;' not merely suits, which the common law recognised among its old and settled proceedings, but suits in which legal rights were to be ascertained and determined, in contradistinction to those where equitable rights alone were recognised, and equitable remedies were administered; or where, as in the admiralty, a mixture of public law, and of maritime law and equity was often found in the same suit. Probably there were few, if any, states in the union, in which some new legal remedies differing from the old common law forms were not in use; but in which, however, the trial by jury intervened, and the general regulations in other respects were according to the course of the common law. Proceedings in cases of partition, and of foreign and domestic attachment, might be cited as examples variously adopted and modified. In a just sense, the amendment then may well be construed to embrace all suits which are not of equity and admiralty jurisdiction, whatever may be the peculiar form which they may assume to settle legal rights. And congress seems to have acted with reference to this exposition in the judiciary act of 1789, [1 Stat. 77,] c. 20, [§ 9,] which was contemporaneous with the proposal of this amendment; for in the ninth section it is provided, that 'the trial of issues in fact in the district courts in all causes, except civil causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, shall be by jury;' and in the twelfth section it is provided, that 'the trial of issues in fact in the circuit courts shall in all suits, except those of equity, and of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, be by jury;' and again, in the thirteenth section, it is provided, that 'the trial of issues in fact in the supreme court in all actions at law against citizens of the United States, shall be by jury.'" This view of the constitution and seventh amendment, is in perfect accordance with the spirit of the revolution, and perpetuates the principles of the congress of 1774, as settled constitutional law.

As the extension of admiralty jurisdiction beyond the line prescribed in England is necessarily a deprivation of the right of trial by jury, and a substitution of the civil for the common law in cases cognizable only by the latter in 1774; any construction which will give to the term admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, a more expanded meaning than the term had in England, must be rejected. In the emphatic language of the supreme court "the want of an express provision securing the right of trial by jury in civil causes, led to the adoption of the amendment;" it is therefore the bounden duty of every court, to so construe it as to effect that object. "In a just sense the amendment then may well be construed to embrace all suits which are not of equity and admiralty jurisdiction, whatever may be the peculiar form which they may assume to settle legal rights." In defining "suits at common law," in the amendment, the supreme court declare the term to be, what is denominated "cases in law" in the third article of the constitution; what then are such suits or cases? The court gives the answer, "not merely suits which the common law recognised among its old and settled proceedings, but suits in which legal rights were to be ascertained and determined, in contradistinction to those where equitable rights alone were recognised, and equitable remedies were administered; or where, as in the admiralty, a mixture of public law, and of maritime law and equity, was often found in the same suit." Adhering to this definition, the constitution becomes intelligible, in its reference to the three classes of cases to which the judicial power extends:

1. Cases in law, or suits at common law, wherein legal rights are to be ascertained, and legal remedies administered according to the old and established proceedings at common law.

2. Cases or suits in equity where equitable rights only are recognised, and equitable remedies administered.

3. Cases or suits in the admiralty, where there is a mixture of public or maritime law and of equity in the same suit.

Whether there is not a fourth class of cases, those of maritime jurisdiction independently of those of admiralty, need not now be examined.

It is next to be inquired by what rule or standard we are to ascertain what is a case in law, equity or admiralty, as contradistinguished from each other? The only rule furnished by congress, is in the acts regulating process in the courts of the United States, which provide, that the forms of writs, executions and other process in suits at common law, shall be the same as used in the supreme courts of the respective states; "in those of equity and admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, according to the principles, rules and usages which belong to courts of equity, and to courts of admiralty respectively, as contradistinguished from courts of common law. 1 Story, 67, 257, [1 Stat. 93, 275. c. 36.] No act of congress has defined this line of contradistinction, no state laws had done it before the adoption of the constitution; the jurisdiction of the respective courts had been well settled, and was well understood previously, so that no new statutory definition was necessary. The existing judicial systems of the states had been founded on the principles of the English jurisprudence. The application of the principles of the common law was universal as the rule of jurisdiction, unless altered by local statutes or usage. Hence we find that in the judiciary act, congress refer to "the common law," "the principle and usages of law" as terms of definite import, referring to the common law, and as adopted in the states. [Bank of U. S. v. Halstead,] 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 56, 58. In the ninth section giving admiralty and maritime jurisdiction to the district court is this expression; "saving to suitors in all cases, the right of a common law remedy in all cases where the common law is competent to give it," "and shall have cognizance of all suits at common law," &c. The eleventh section gives the circuit court jurisdiction of "all suits of a civil nature at common law or in equity," &c. The thirteenth section authorizes the supreme court, "to issue writs of prohibition to the district courts when proceeding as courts of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, and writs of mandamus in cases warranted by the principles and usages of law," &c. The fourteenth section gives the circuit courts power to issue writs not specially provided for agreeably "to the principles and usages of law." The fifteenth section gives them power to compel the production of papers "in cases and under circumstances where they might be compelled to produce the same by the ordinary rules of proceeding in chancery." The sixteenth section provides that suits in equity shall not be sustained in any case where complete remedy can be had at law.

The seventeenth section authorizes new trials to be granted "for reasons for which new trials have been usually granted by courts of law. Vide 1 Story, 56, 58, [1 Stat. 83.] Indeed the whole legislation of congress in relation to the judicial system of the United States, shows their reference to a pre-existing system, to which the terms they use are to be applied. Neither the constitution, the amendments, or laws, give a definition of law, equity, admiralty, or trial by jury," but the terms are not consequently indeterminate, or open to any construction which may be put upon them; they must be taken in the sense in which they have been universally understood through all time, by the people, the conventions and governments of the states and union. The jurisprudence of England is the test and standard to which these terms are to be referred, and by which they are clearly defined. In Robinson v. Campbell the supreme court declare, "that to effectuate the purposes of the legislature, the remedies in the courts of the United States are to be at common law or in equity, not according to the practice of state courts, but according to the principles of common law and equity, as distinguished and defined in that country from which we derive our knowledge of these principles." 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 222, 223. "And as the courts of the union have a chancery jurisdiction in every state, and the judiciary act confers the same chancery powers on all, and gives the same rule of decision, its jurisdiction in Massachusetts must be the same as in other states." [U. S. v. Howland,] 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 115.

So far then as relates to the respective jurisdiction of courts of law and equity, under the constitution, its amendments and the judiciary act, as construed by the supreme court; the jurisprudence of England is the test and standard of reference. The next question is to what period of time this reference is to be made; on this subject there is little or no difference of opinion. The people of the several states, delegated to the United States a judicial power over cases at law, equity and admiralty, according to the rules and principles established in England before the revolution, according to general opinion; and according to the opinion of some, at the adoption of the constitution and passage of the judiciary act. Certain it is, that all laws which extended to the colonies before the revolution, which were adopted by usage or acts of assembly, were enforced as a part of the jurisprudence of the states, as well as the common law. Statutes also which were "passed before the emigration of our ancestors, being applicable to our situation, and in amendment of the law, constitute a part of our common law." Patterson v. Winn, 5 Pet. [30 U. S.] 241. And the construction of such statutes which prevailed at the revolution is the rule for the courts of the United States. Cathcart v. Robinson, 5 Pet. [30 U. S.] 280, 281. It only remains to inquire, whether the framers of the constitution, its amendment, and the judiciary act, intended to make the English system the standard by which to test the respective jurisdiction of the courts of law and equity, and the civil law the standard of admiralty jurisdiction; or whether it was intended to refer to the English system, as it was settled at the revolution, the adoption of the constitution, or passage of the judiciary act, to ascertain what was a case in law or equity; but to go back four hundred years, and ascertain by the law of England as it was understood before the restraining statutes of Richard II., passed in 1389, (vide 1 Ruffh. St. 385,) what was a case in admiralty at that time. If the advocates of an admiralty jurisdiction, broader than consists with the statutes and common law of England, take the first position, the seventh amendment is necessarily annulled; for if a case arises which is by the English system a suit at common law, the amendment embraces it, and there must be a trial by jury. If a suit on such a case is sustained in the admiralty according to the civil law, there is no trial by jury, and the amendment does not apply; such a result makes the amendment contradict itself. If by the English law, a given case is one confessedly cognizable only by a court of common law, yet by the civil law it is as clearly cognizable in the admiralty; then if the amendment refers to the former for the definition of a suit at law, and the constitution refers to the latter for the definition of a suit in the admiralty, the amendment is a felo de se, as well as directly subversive of the object, which the supreme court declare it was passed to effectuate,—to supply the want of an express provision in the constitution, securing the right of trial by jury in civil cases. The defendant is excluded from a trial by jury in the very case provided for by the amendment. The constitution and amendment must of course be referred to the same system for the definition of the three classes of cases, or the constitution controls the amendment by the grant of a jurisdiction to the admiralty, over a "suit at common law," in which the trial by jury is secured. Such a doctrine would subvert the government, by making the constitution of paramount authority to the power which created, and can amend it in all its provisions, except the equal representation of each state in the senate.

If by assuming the other position the terms law, equity, admiralty are referred for their definition and contradistinction from each other to different periods, it will be attended with difficulties which cannot be surmounted. It must be taken to be the settled construction of the constitution by the supreme court, that the terms "cases in law and equity," refer to the line drawn between the respective courts in England, at some period. Assuming that to have been the 13 Rich. II. (1389), we go back to a time when there was neither a court, nor a system of equity jurisdiction, as contradistinguished from law; those who contend that the system of federal jurisprudence was intended to be organized on the model of that of England at that period, must be left to establish the proposition as they can. To reason upon it seriously, is difficult for those who oppose it. It is as difficult to reason on the proposition, that the framers of the constitution referred to the state of the law at that period, to ascertain what was a case of admiralty jurisdiction, while they referred to a period four hundred years later to ascertain what was a case of common law or equity jurisdiction. The same difficulty attends the discussion of the proposition, that when the common law was adopted in the colonies, the states, the constitution and judiciary act; that part of it should have been excluded, in virtue of which the courts of common law issued prohibitions to the admiralty, and all other prerogative courts. This is certainly not a time to contend, that it is congenial to the spirit of American institutions, to adopt the principles of courts proceeding according to the course of the civil law, under a patent of non obstante statuto, and without a trial by jury, in preference to the rules and principles of the common law. Nor can it be necessary to enter upon an argument to show that the statutes of England, though passed before the settlement of the colonies, which restore the common law, secure the trial by jury, and confine all courts within the line which the law prescribes for their jurisdiction, are in accordance with all our institutions, suited to the condition of the colonists, and were adopted by them as part of the common law.

It has been shown that the jurisdiction of the admiralty, was asserted in virtue of the king's prerogative to dispense with acts of parliament; the assertion of such a right by James II., was deemed so subversive of a fundamental principle of the English constitution, that it was declared to be an abdication of the crown at the revolution of 1688. 4 Ruffh. St. 440.

Whether the people of the United States intended by their constitution of 1788, to reestablish the supremacy of prerogative over law, or to authorize the district court to exercise a jurisdiction commensurate with that claimed by the admiral in his appeal to James I., as more congenial to the spirit and principles of the revolution of 1776, than the principles of their ancestors, is not deemed worthy of further inquiry. Certain it is, that the fear of such an assumption of jurisdiction, led to the seventh amendment, which was intended to remove all doubt by placing the right of trial by jury in suits at common law, beyond the danger of violation by any power under the constitution, "and which received an assent of the people so general as to establish its importance as a fundamental guarantee of the rights and liberties of the people." [Parsons v. Bedford,] 3 Pet. [28 U. S.] 446. A fundamental guarantee of the rights and liberties of the people, by sanctioning an admiralty jurisdiction according to the civil law, which repudiates the trial by jury, or on the principles asserted by the admiralty in England, in virtue of royal prerogative! If this is the only security left for the right of trial by jury in civil cases, the amendment has been made in vain, for the admiralty is left open to every plaintiff, who can bring his case within the rules of the civil law, or the English admiralty, according to their pretensions, prior to the statutes of Rich. II., in which the defendant cannot have the benefit of this "fundamental guarantee;" wholly abjuring any construction of the amendment, which would make it a fundamental and solemn mockery, I feel bound to give it a practical meaning, consistently with the solemn, repeated and uniform decisions of the supreme court. An amendment to the constitution, annuls all jurisdiction which the constitution grants, whether past, present or future, which is contrary to the amendment; it arrests the action of even the supreme court, in cases depending before them prior to the adoption of the amendment, and operates as an absolute prohibition to the exercise of any other jurisdiction than dismissing the suit. [Hollingsworth v. Virginia,] 3 Dall. [3 U. S.] 378, 382; [Cohens v. Virginia,] 6 Wheat. [19 U. S.] 405, 409; [Osborn v. Bank of U. S.] 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 868. The supreme court has declared the object of the seventh amendment, and inferior courts must so construe and enforce it as to effectuate that object. This fundamental guarantee of the right of trial by jury, applies to all cases or suits which the common law recognises among its old and settled proceedings, in which legal rights are to be ascertained, and legal remedies administered, whatever may be the peculiar form which they may assume. [Parsons v. Bedford,] 3 Pet. [28 U. S.] 447. These are cases or suits at law; let the plaintiff resort to what court he may, it does not change their nature, they cannot be cases in equity or admiralty, as contradistinguished from courts of law; the term a case or suit at law, refers to the cause of action, the remedy, and the mode of enforcing it, not to the forum to which the plaintiff may choose to resort. This is the meaning of the term in the constitution and amendment as judicially settled. It is also the manifest meaning of the judiciary act, which was passed at the same session of congress in which the amendments to the constitution were recommended to the states.

By the ninth section, the district court has "exclusive original cognizance of all civil causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction;" by the eleventh section, the circuit courts have "original cognizance concurrent with the courts of the several states, of all suits of a civil nature at common law or in equity," &c. From these two sections three propositions necessarily follow; 1. If the suit is one of admiralty jurisdiction, its cognizance is exclusively in the district court, and it cannot be sustained in a circuit or state court; 2. If it is a suit at common law or in equity, it can be sustained in a circuit or state court; and 3. Such cases cannot be sustained in a district court, as a case of admiralty jurisdiction. In thus distributing the judicial power among the inferior courts, and assigning to each the cognizance of particular cases, congress have evidently done it with a reference to some antecedent pre-existing rules, which distinguished the different classes of cases from each other; they have also intended to refer to some system which has defined them by such lines as will prevent a collision between the different courts, on the subject matters of their respective cognizance. Those rules cannot be found in the civil law, which does not distinguish cases at law from cases in equity; and as that code recognises neither suits at common law, courts of common law, or trial by jury, it is so utterly incompatible with the judiciary act, that their repugnance is apparent at first blush. It is therefore a self evident proposition, that the jurisprudence of the United States is not founded in the civil law, and that a reference must be had to some other system to define what is a case at law or in equity; it is equally evident that the definition of a case of admiralty jurisdiction, must be sought in the same system which defines the other cases, otherwise the courts will be involved in perpetual conflicts of jurisdiction. Conclusive as this view of the ninth and eleventh sections is, from their language and the subject matter to which they refer; the provisions of the thirteenth and fourteenth sections are too positive to leave a doubt as to the system of jurisprudence on which the courts of the United States were organized. The supreme court "shall have power to issue writs of prohibition to the district courts, when proceeding as courts of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, and writs of mandamus in cases warranted by the principles and usages of law, to any courts appointed or persons holding office under the authority of the United States." 1 Story, 59 [1 Stat. 80, § 13.]

The fourteenth section gives to all the courts power to issue "all other writs not specially provided for by statute, which may be necessary for the exercise of their respective jurisdictions, and agreeable to the principles and usages of law." In referring to which term, "agreeable," &c., the supreme court say, it doubtless embraces writs sanctioned by the principles and usages of the common law. [Bank of U. S. v. Halstead,] 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 56. It being the settled doctrine of the supreme court, that by the terms "principles and usages of law," congress refer to the common law, the conclusion follows, that the common law is the standard by which to ascertain what are proper cases for a pro[illegible]sition to a court of admiralty, and not the civil law; still less those principles on which the admiralty courts in the time of Jac. I., protested against the right of the king's bench to grant prohibitions. This section of the judiciary act, is therefore a decided and express repudiation of the past and present pretensions of the admiralty to the cognizance of any cases where prohibition would be granted in England; that it is constitutional cannot be doubted, as the supreme court in the case of the United States v. Richard Peters, district judge, affirmed their authority under this section by issuing a prohibition. [U. S. v. Peters,] 3 Dall. [3 U. S.] 121.

A reference to the act of congress for the regulation of process in the courts of the United States, will show that the rules of the civil law have been carefully excluded. By the process act of 1789, the forms and modes of proceeding in causes of equity and of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, shall be according to the course of the civil law. 1 Story, 67, [1 Stat. 93.] But by the act of 1792, the form and modes of proceeding in such cases were directed to be, "according to the principles, rules and usages which belong to courts of equity and to courts of admiralty respectively, as contradistinguished from courts of common law." 1 Story, 258, [1 Stat. 275, c. 36.] We must then resort to that system of jurisprudence, in which there are courts of common law, as contradistinguished from courts of equity and admiralty; to resort to the civil law for the rules which define the respective jurisdiction of these courts, when congress have excluded them as to the forms and modes of proceeding, would be manifestly opposed to the law. Such resort would also be useless, as the civil law recognises no courts of common law. Both of these acts have been deliberately examined by the supreme court, in Wayman v. Southard. They declare that "the forms of writs and executions and modes of proceeding in suits at common law, and the forms and modes of proceeding in causes of equity and admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, embrace the same subject, and both relate to the progress of a suit, from its commencement to its close." 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 29. The term, "forms and modes of proceedings, embraces the whole progress of the suit, and every transaction in it, from its commencement to its termination." Id. 32. "This section (second section of the act of 1792) then goes on to prescribe the rules and principles by which the courts of equity and of admiralty jurisdiction were to be governed." Bank of U. S. v. Halstead, Id. 58, governed from the commencement of the suit; jurisdiction of course is included, and trial by jury preserved. The whole system would be deranged, by adopting the civil law as the rule of jurisdiction, and regulating and governing the forms and modes of proceedings by rules, principles and usages which were unknown to that code, and known only in that system in which courts of common law are recognised, as contradistinguished from those of equity and admiralty jurisdiction.

There is another view of our system of federal jurisprudence, which leads to the same conclusions. The judicial power of the United States is confined to the cases enumerated in the third article of the constitution; all others remain under the exclusive cognizance of the states, as a part of their powers, reserved by the tenth amendment; the eleventh section of the judiciary act also leaves to state courts a jurisdiction over the cases therein enumerated, concurrent with the circuit courts. Any exercise of jurisdiction by the district court in admiralty, over cases at law or in equity, must therefore clash with that of the courts of the several states, as well as of the circuit courts. This will be avoided by adhering to the line of separation between the respective courts, as designated by the statute and common law of England, at the revolution or adoption of the constitution, and the system will be harmonious and consistent in all its parts, both federal and state. On the other hand, by attempting to introduce the admiralty jurisdiction of the civil law, or those principles which were asserted in early times in its favour, a foundation is laid for interminable conflicts of jurisdiction between the courts of the state and the union. Conceding, ex gratia, that the constitution admits of two constructions, that the seventh amendment does not remove the doubt, that the judiciary act does not exclude cases at law and equity, as defined by the common law, from the cognizance of courts of admiralty, and that the provisions of neither will be violated by the exercise of admiralty jurisdiction as claimed before the statutes which restrained it; it cannot be denied that they admit of a different and more obvious construction, more conducive to the harmonious movements of the two systems of state and federal jurisprudence; and which ought to be adopted, if it can be done consistently with the words, or spirit of the constitution and laws. The decisions of the supreme court have conclusively established the principle that the terms cases in law and equity in the constitution, and suits at common law, in the seventh amendment, are therein used as they are defined by the common law; some powerful reasons ought therefore to be given why the term "cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction" have not been used according to their common law definition, but in reference to its definition in a system, in all respects in collision with the common law. No such reasons have been given in argument, or appear in any of the cases referred to.

If there was any middle ground between the audacious pretensions of the admiralty in virtue of prerogative, and the limits prescribed by the statutes and common law of England, on which to place the admiralty jurisdiction of the district courts, there would be more reason for entertaining a doubt as to the meaning of the constitution, its amendments, and the judiciary act. But there is no middle ground on which to place such jurisdiction; when we once break over the line which restrained it by acts of parliament and prohibitions, we are necessarily thrown back on the civil law and the royal prerogative, for the rules and principles on which the right of trial by jury depends. It is in vain to contend that the seventh amendment will be any efficient guarantee for this right, in suits at common law, if an admiralty jurisdiction exists in the United States, commensurate with what is claimed by the claimant in this case. Its assertion is, in my opinion, a renewal of the contest between legislative power and royal prerogative, the common and the civil law, striving for mastery; the one to secure, the other to take away the trial by jury; and until the authoritative judgment of a higher court shall make it my duty to surrender my judgment to their decree, it will never be sanctioned by me. Judicial power must first annul the seventh amendment, or judicial subtlety transform "a suit at common law, into a case of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction," before I take cognizance of such a case as this without a jury. Both parties are citizens of Pennsylvania, the cause of action arose in the body of a county, the contract is governed by the common law, its subject matter is not of a maritime nature, or regulated by public or maritime law; but in all its aspects, a suit upon it from its commencement to its close, is cognizable only in a state court.

Viewing the question on which this case must turn, as involving most important consequences, I have given it a consideration not called for by the small amount in controversy, but called for on account of the principles it involves, as well as my duty to the profession and suitors, in cases which may come to this court by appeal. If it should be thought that any of the foregoing principles would shake the jurisdiction of the admiralty over contracts for seamen's wages, it must be admitted that the objection would have great, if not conclusive force, if the question was a new one; but in deciding on this, and other great questions of power, whether of courts or legislatures, the proper inquiry for a judge, is not merely into the original principle on which it depends, but also the practical, undisturbed, unquestioned exercise of jurisdiction for a long course of time. It is not only a powerful reason in favour of its legitimate existence, but to question it after it became recognised by all departments of the government, might tend more to shake foundations, than an adherence to a principle at first erroneous.

In England, the statutes of Richard II., or Hen. IV., have never been applied to suits for seamen's wages. Courts of common law have not issued prohibitions to the admiralty, against the exercise of this part of their jurisdiction; the judges have considered it as not embraced in the statutes, but as an exception to them, or sanctioned by the maxim of communis error facit jus. The reason is immaterial, the matter is at rest by common consent, the jurisdiction of the admiralty is unquestioned there, as a practical undisturbed construction of ancient statutes. So it is here. It has been exercised in the states before the confederation, from its adoption till the adoption of the constitution, and since then by the federal courts. In Sheppard v. Taylor, [5 Pet. (30 U. S.) 710,] the supreme court unanimously declared, "that over the subject of seamen's wages, the admiralty has an undoubted jurisdiction in rem, as well as in personam." Thus definitively settled, this matter is certainly not open to argument here. Though a contract for seamen's wages is made on land, and is cognizable by courts of common law, yet they must adjudicate upon it by the rules and principles of the maritime law. The rights it creates, the duties and obligations it imposes, the penalties it inflicts, the conditions and casualties to which it is subject, are mostly unknown to the principles of the common law, and a suit upon it partakes of few of the attributes of a "suit at common law." They are prescribed and regulated by the public or maritime law, so that though the suit to enforce the payment of wages, or the performance of the service, may be at common law, yet the controversy concerning them is not necessarily a case in law. The rights to be ascertained are not legal, as contradistinguished from cases in equity and admiralty in the third article, and the remedy by libel in the admiralty is not the suit at common law, but that peculiar proceeding, by the mixture of public, maritime and equity law, in the same suit, which, according to not only the opinion of the supreme court, but the correct legal construction of the seventh amendment to the constitution, is not forbidden by its provisions. So it was considered by the first congress which assembled after the adoption of the constitution, in the session succeeding that in which the same body recommended the amendments to the constitution. In the sixth section of the act of 1790, [1 Stat. 133,] for the regulation of seamen in the merchant service, they have a right to proceed in the district court for their wages, "and the suit shall be proceeded on in the said court, and final judgment be given, according to the course of admiralty courts in such cases used;" provided that nothing shall prevent any seaman or mariner from having or maintaining his action at common law, &c. 1 Story, 105, [1 Stat. 133, § 6.] In the previous sections of this law, there are various other provisions relative to seamen, which make the contract of service a statutory contract, peculiarly appropriate to admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, as regulations of commerce and navigation, and the service is in its nature maritime. But the law has made no provision for the exercise of admiralty jurisdiction over contracts for materials, labour or provisions, in building, equipping, furnishing or provisioning a ship when in our ports. Such contracts have no maritime attributes, but as to the rights and obligations imposed and arising, are regulated exclusively by the statute and common law of the states; and all controversies concerning them must be cases in law, in which legal rights are to be ascertained according to the old and settled proceedings of such courts, according to the law which regulates right and remedy, in as marked contradistinction to those in courts of admiralty, as the latter are to the former. Such cases therefore come directly within the seventh amendment, and agreeably to its solemn and authoritative exposition, are not cognizable in the admiralty.

The next aspect in which this account is presented for consideration, is as an off-set to the demand of the libellant, for which the respondent produces no authority from any writer of authority on maritime law, or any adjudication in the admiralty, but rests on general principles of law and equity. The contract for wages is a marine one, and from its nature, and the principles which govern it, seems to me not to come within the provisions of any statutes of set-off, their equity, or any analogous principle adopted by courts of law or equity. There are cases where each party having a judgment or decree for money, in the suits in which they are respectively plaintiffs, and entitled to the process of the court for collection; and the parties and the causes of action being within its jurisdiction, the court can do justice between them, by deducting the amount of the one judgment from the other, and order process only for the balance, or where a claim, over the subject matter of which the court have jurisdiction is pending before the same court in which a defendant has obtained a judgment; a court of law as well as equity may, in certain cases, direct proceedings to be stayed, till the other party can have an opportunity of a trial or hearing. And as courts of admiralty undoubtedly possess equity powers, the same rule may prevail there; but it is not necessary to the decision of this case to enter on the inquiry, or to attempt to specify the cases in which it could be done. As the admiralty has not jurisdiction of this account, as an original claim, they cannot take cognizance of it in shape of a set-off, as they have no power over the subject matter of the respondent's claim.

To subject the wages of a mariner to a defalcation on account of debts due to the owner of the ship, on matters unconnected with the particular contract, would be to deprive the former of all inducement to enter the service, which is to get bread for himself and family and secure a subsistence for them in his absence. It would be not only hard, but oppressive on him, at his return from a long voyage, to find his wages attached by a debt due the owner, or purchased by him from another, and neither stipulated or contemplated at the time of the contract to be charged upon his wages, and without any previous notice that an attempt would be made to do so. That the owner has no such right by the marine law is very evident from the following rule. "If a mariner takes up money or clothes, and the same is entered on the purser's books; by the marine custom it is a discount or receipt of so much of their wages as the same amounts to, and in an action brought by them for their wages the same shall be allowed, and is not accounted mutual, the one to bring his action for his clothes, and the other for his wages." Molloy, bk. 2, c. 3, rule 11, p. 249.

This is certainly a direct negation of the general right of set-off, or no provision would have been deemed necessary for such case; suggestio unius est exclusio alterius, is an old and safe maxim of the law. This subject has been taken up by the learned judge of the first circuit, and very ably considered; concurring fully with him in his views, and the conclusions, to which he arrived as to set-off in the admiralty, it is unnecessary to do more than to refer to his opinion, as reported in Willard v. Dart, [Case No. 17,680.] As it is not averred in the answer, that any of the supplies of provisions were made on the faith of, or with reference to the contract for wages, it cannot be pretended that they can be considered as payment. There are also other strong, if not conclusive objections, to this account, all the items preceding that of January 1831, are barred by the act of limitations, which might have been conclusive if it had been pleaded, and whether pleaded or not, the libellant could, at the hearing, have availed himself of the staleness of the claim and the lapse of time, on equitable principles, as settled in this court in Baker v. Biddle, [Case No. 764,] in suits in equity, and in the circuit court in the first circuit in the case of Willard v. Dart, [supra.] &c. This case affords a very powerful reason for the application of the rule. The answer does not state whether the provisions were furnished to the libellant for the supply of vessels on his own account, or of the owners thereof. If he was merely the master, the accounts ought to be furnished seasonably before he settles with the owner, and if not done before such settlement or in a seasonable time, according to marine usage, are proper charges only against the owner.

The decree [unreported] of the district court is affirmed with six per cent. interest and costs.

Case No. 757.

BAIRD v. BYRNE.

[3 Wall. Jr. 1.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. Oct. Sessions, 1854.

JURISDICTION—NATURALIZATION — FOREIGN ALLEGIANCE.

A mere "declaration of intention" by an alien, under the naturalization laws of the United States, to become a citizen, &c., and to renounce all allegiance to a foreign, his natural sovereign, in a judicial point of view, is not sufficient of itself, and without being perfected by an actual renunciation, to prevent such alien from being regarded as a "foreign citizen or subject," within the meaning of that clause of the constitution which gives jurisdiction to the courts of the United States over controversies between the citizens of a state and "foreign citizens or subjects." This point ruled at nisi prius, in a special case, and with the expression of a readiness on the part of the court to hear it more solemnly argued.

[Cited in Betzoldt v. American Ins. Co., 47 Fed. 706.]

[See Lanz v. Randall, Case No. 8,080.]

By the act of congress, on the subject of naturalization, (Act April 14, 1802, c. 28, § 1; 2 Stat. 153,) any alien, being a free white person, may become a citizen of the United States by declaring before certain courts prescribed by the act, his bona fide intention to become such citizen, "and to renounce forever all allegiance and fidelity to any foreign prince, potentate, state or sovereignty whatever, and particularly by name the prince, potenate, state or sovereignty whereof such alien may at the time be a citizen or subject;" and then at the expiration of three years, under certain provisos, making oath to support the constitution of the United States, and that he doth absolutely and entirely renounce and abjure such allegiance, &c.

With this law in force, Byrne, the defendant, a native of Ireland, came to this country in the spring of 1849, and immediately, on the 7th of April of that same year, made in the proper court the required declaration of his intention, and particularly of his intention to renounce his allegiance to the queen of Great Britain and Ireland. Soon afterwards he took up his abode in Philadelphia, where, with his father, he continued to reside. In 1853 he was elected captain of a volunteer company of Philadelphia troops, and as such was commissioned by the governor of Pennsylvania, and he frequently and uniformly declared, and this with emphasis and warmth, that he had thrown off his allegiance and ceased to be a subject to the queen of Great Britain and Ireland. He was thus residing here when, in April, 1853, this suit was brought by Baird, a citizen of Pennsylvania, before the expiration of the term of residence required by law as precedent to the final act of naturalization.[2]

"The judicial power" of the United States courts extending by the constitution (article 3, § 2, par. 1) to controversies between the citizens of a state, and foreign states, citizens or subjects, the question in this case, which arose on a plea to the jurisdiction, was whether the defendant was, when the suit was brought, a foreign subject, and as such within the jurisdiction of the United States courts; or, in other words, whether a person born in a foreign country, and owing allegiance to its sovereign, who emigrates to this country with the intention of becoming a citizen, can by his voluntary act, without the concurrence of his native government, throw off his allegiance, so as to cease to be a foreign subject, after he has made his declaration on oath of his intention to renounce that allegiance, and before the final act of naturalization.

Mr. Penrose, for the defendant, Byrne.

I. The circuit court is of limited jurisdiction, having cognizance only in a few cases. So strictly have the United States courts been confined within the limits prescribed, that it has been held, under the provision

[1] [Reported by John William Wallace, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

[2] On the expiration of the proper term, Byrne actually became a citizen; but on the breaking out of the war between Great Britain and Russia he went abroad, without any intention of returning to the United States, and entered into the military service of the emperor of Russia.

that the court shall have jurisdiction in controversies between citizens of different states, that neither the District of Columbia, nor a territory, is a state within the meaning of the constitution. Seton v. Hanham, Charlt. R. M. 374; Hepburn v. Ellzey, 2 Cranch, [6 U. S.] 445; New Orleans v. Winter, 1 Wheat. [14 U. S.] 91; Wescott v. Fairfield Tp. [Case No. 17,418.] Assuming, then, that if Byrne was, at the time of the commencement of this suit, not a subject of the queen of Great Britain, this court had no jurisdiction, let us inquire:

II. Was he at this time such a subject? It is not necessary to show affirmatively that he was a citizen, or even a subject of the United States. Whatever might be said in favor of that position, this case requires us only to show that he was not a subject of the queen of Great Britain and Ireland. We can expect no assistance from English authorities or decisions. A country which executed as a traitor a person born of French parents who were temporarily in England on a visit, because he was found in the army of his own country fighting against England; which maintains even now, that a child born in the United States, of an American mother, is a British subject, because its father, though a naturalized citizen, happened to have been born in England—such a country cannot be expected to aid much in discussing here a question of American citizenship. We have uniformly, and in the most decisive manner, repudiated as unjust and antiquated, the dogmas of England on the subject of allegiance. We have a code of our own upon that subject, and with a federal court interpreting the federal constitution, the only question will be, what is the American view? We have sent as an American minister, one Frenchman, Mr. Galatin, to the court of France; and another Frenchman, Mr. Soule, to the court of Spain; and by the law of allegiance, as laid down in England, our present minister in London is a subject of the British queen. The English courts, whose decisions ever run in parallelism with English interests, may decide what they please. We settle the law on some subjects for ourselves.

The case of Martin Koszta, though a diplomatic and not a judicial case, is in point. See The Washington Union, Extra, Sept. 29, 1853. Koszta, by birth an Austrian subject, had been engaged in an unsuccessful attempt at revolution against the emperor of Austria; and fleeing from the Austrian dominions to Turkey, had, in 1851 or thereabouts, come by agreement of the emperor to the United States, on condition that he should not again set foot on Ottoman soil. In July, 1852, he made the usual and proper declaration here of his intention to become a citizen of the United States, and to renounce all allegiance to any other state or sovereign, and particularly to the emperor of Austria. After remaining here about two years, he returned to Turkey for purposes of private business of a temporary kind, where he placed himself under the protection of the American consul, who gave to him a tezkera, or kind of passport or letter of safe conduct. Soon after this he was seized by agents of the emperor of Austria, and against his will, put on board an Austrian ship of war, to be taken into the Austrian dominions. Captain Ingraham, commanding an United States sloop of war, demanded his release under threat of a resort to force if the demand was not complied with by a certain hour. The prisoner was surrendered by the Austrian sloop to an agent satisfactory to Captain Ingraham, and he came afterwards to America. This interference was complained of by Austria, which declared that it "could not consider the individual in question as belonging to a foreign jurisdiction so long as the ties which bound him to his country were not legally dissolved." And that even if Koszta "could, without violating the laws of his own country, of his own accord, and without any other formality, have broken asunder the ties which bind him to his native soil," yet in this case he had "done nothing more than declare his intention of becoming a citizen of the United States, and with that object in view, of renouncing his rights of nationality in the states of the emperor." But how was this doctrine answered by our government? It declared, on the subject of allegiance generally, that the sounder and more prevalent doctrine is "that the citizen or subject having faithfully performed the past and present duties resulting from his relation to the sovereign power, may, at any time, release himself from the obligation of allegiance, freely quit the land of his birth or adoption, seek through all countries a home, and select anywhere that which offers him the fairest prospect of happiness for himself and his posterity." And while it was not contended that the "initiatory step in the process of naturalization invested him with all the civil rights of an American citizen," such step was declared to "be sufficient, for all the purposes of this case, to show that he was clothed with an American nationality, and that in virtue thereof the government of the United States is authorized to extend to him its protection at home and abroad." The government accordingly defended the acts of all its agents; not only of Captain Ingraham, who claimed possession of a man having an American tezkera or passport (which was enough to justify him), but of the American consul, who, on learning of Koszta's mere "declaration of intention," had so far regarded him as an American citizen as to give him a document usually given to citizens alone. Indeed, the secretary of state afterwards went further than he need have done for this case, in saying that mere domicile, animo manendi, or without any present intention of removing herefrom, gave such nationality.

Now, if Koszta was an Austrian, and "a foreign subject," what right had our government to prevent Austria's final control of him? By interfering as it did, completely and thoroughly, our government declared in an emphatic manner that he was not an Austrian subject; that whatever new character he might or might not have as yet acquired, he had lost his old one. No doubt, as a legal view, this, merely on our principles of allegiance, was right. We can well conceive, under our laws, of inchoate or initiate citizenship; and inchoate American citizenship is inconsistent with the completeness of any foreign subjection; perhaps with its existence at all. A man, it is true, must have a domicile somewhere; and he must have perhaps a national character. But it has not been decided that he must necessarily be a citizen totus, teres atque rotundus; invested with all political and civil rights of citizenship of the most favored class. Citizenship, under the American view, may be in a state of transition, which is enough for our purpose; though the more true view, in respect of legal analogies, is the one above mentioned, st. that of citizenship initiate. The alien has undoubtedly certain political rights by the mere declaration of intention; for he has a right, at the end of three years thereafter, on complying with certain terms, to become a citizen complete. His case finds a legal analogy in that of a tenant by the curtesy; who has no rights till the birth of issue; and no perfect rights till the death of the wife.

But a man may be a subject within the terms of the constitution, and yet not be a citizen within the naturalization or any other laws. Koszta, though not a citizen within these or any other laws, was so far a subject that he claimed and received the most ample protection of our government; a protection which certainly we do not extend to the subjects of foreign powers. We justified an act of war for this man. Our government "in discharging" what it called "its duties of protection," regarded him as its subject, bound by its laws, and bound to act as it directed. Great Britain and the United States have millions of subjects who are not citizens at all. Many of the people of the East, and some, probably, of the West India isles, are British subjects, but not British citizens.

It must be recollected, that the delay after thus making the declaration, before the alien becomes a citizen, is not of his own seeking. He does not say, "I don't intend to become a citizen now, but will consider the subject a little and see whether I will give up my allegiance to my native country." He is willing and anxious to become a citizen at any time; but the United States, for their own protection, and to prevent persons inexperienced in our institutions and mode of carrying on our government from interfering in a matter they don't understand, requires a term of probation, during which they may learn more of our affairs, and thus become better fitted for taking part in them. No foreigner who has declared his intention of becoming a citizen, would be unwilling to have the process completed at that same time. The simple act of swearing to an intention to renounce all allegiance to the queen of Great Britain and Ireland, is an act inconsistent with the idea of any further continuance of that allegiance.

It has been held, that after making the declaration of intention, there must be a continued and uninterrupted residence of five years in this country; and that any absence, however short, is sufficient to prevent subsequent naturalization. Now it would be unjust thus to require a man to remain here, and yet to assert at the same time that he was a foreigner, and not entitled to protection as a citizen of the United States. Is this requiring him to remain here consistent with the idea that our law considers him as remaining a foreign subject? This government, we have seen, has avowed its intention not to be guilty of this injustice; and further, that it will protect such persons and redress their injuries, even should those injuries be inflicted by the country claiming the allegiance. It can scarcely be that we would avow a doctrine in our intercourse with foreign nations, which we reject when applied to ourselves. That we should say to England "Mr. Byrne is entitled to our protection even against you, because he has ceased to be your subject," and yet, when he, himself, here asserts that he is not a subject of England, that we should deny it and say that he was.

If we look at the light in which a person, thus making a declaration of intention to become a citizen, is viewed by the statutes of the United States, we shall find that he is in no place considered as remaining a foreign subject, but that he is vested with certain rights which are entirely inconsistent with such an idea. The act of 26 March, 1804, [2 Stat. 293,] § 2, says: "When any alien who shall have complied with the first condition specified in the first section of the said original act" (that is, who has declared his intention, &c.), "and who shall have pursued the directions prescribed in the second section of the said act, may die before he is actually naturalized, the widow and children of such alien shall be considered as citizens of the United States, and shall be entitled to all rights and privileges as such upon taking the oaths prescribed by law."

Such a right as that given by the statute would scarcely have been given to the wife and children of a person owing allegiance to a foreign government: and it seems from this that it was thought that he ceased to be a foreign subject from the moment of making his declaration. This shows, too, that it is merely to prevent his voting that he is not naturalized at once, and that it was thought that from the time he makes the declaration he ceases to be a subject of the foreign government, and begins to become an American citizen, clothed with all the civil rights of the citizen, but from his inexperience not yet intrusted with the political rights. The expression "actually naturalized," is significant. It admits a naturalization short of actual or complete naturalization, a naturalization in law, or a naturalization for many purposes.

So, also, the patent act of July 4, 1836, § 12, [5 Stat. 121,] provides, "that any citizen of the United States, or alien who shall have been a resident of the United States one year next preceding, and who shall have made oath of his intention to become a citizen thereof, and who shall have invented any new art, &c., and shall desire further time to mature the same, may, on payment of the sum of $20, file in the patent office a caveat, setting forth the design," &c. Here there is a right given equally to aliens who have declared their intention, &c. and to citizens of the United States, from which right all other aliens are excluded. This seems to favor the view we have taken; but the 9th section of the act is still stronger. It is as follows: "That before any application for a patent shall be considered by the commissioner, the applicant shall pay into the treasury of the United States, or into any of the deposit banks to the credit of the treasury, if he be a citizen of the United States, or an alien, and shall have been resident in the United States for one year next preceding, and shall have made oath of his intention to become a citizen thereof, the sum of $30; if a subject of the king of Great Britain, the sum of $500, and all other persons the sum of $300." This act speaks of three classes of persons, viz.: Citizens and aliens who have been a year resident within the United States, and have declared their intention of becoming citizens thereof. 2d. All other aliens, except subjects of the king of Great Britain. 3d. Subjects of the king of Great Britain. Now Byrne must belong to one of these classes, and to one only. And being one of the persons described in the first class, no one will say that the act considers him as belonging to the third class also. If he be not of the third class, then has the plaintiff failed to prove the facts alleged in the record, and to repel the presumption of the want of jurisdiction.

Mr. Ingraham, on the other side, contended that the declaration of an intention to renounce, &c., was not a renunciation. It was, indeed, a thing of the least possible significance. The party might perfectly well change his intention. This locus penitentiae was given to him designedly; that he might see whether he knew his own mind. The omission of the party to carry out his intention involved no penalty from our government; nor would the existence of the declaration itself infer any penalty from his own. An intention to renounce at the end of five years is consistent with a continuing allegiance during the five years. Nay, it is inconsistent with any renunciation before the expiration of five years. Even the party himself, therefore, did not renounce his allegiance. If he had, it would be a nullity. He can make no renunciation not acknowledged by the law, and the law will not allow him to renounce it before the end of five years. The country could not accept it. If, then, the party does not renounce his old allegiance, and the country does not accept any new allegiance, in what way does his old allegiance cease? There is a fundamental error on the other side in supposing that a declaration of an intention to renounce is identical with an actual renunciation. The declared intention may not exist. A real intention may change, as we have said. This very case proves the truth of our argument. Byrne declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States, but abandoned the country soon after, and is a soldier in the army of the emperor of Russia, without the least intention of ever coming back here.

The case of Koszta was not a precedent. It was a political, not a judicial case. The fact that Koszta was on a neutral territory, Turkey, with an American passport, was enough to justify our government in saying to Austria, who had arrested him by main force, against the complaint of Turkey, "You have treated our 'protection' with indignity;" and in justifying in the eyes of the world, at least, a gallant officer of our navy who, with patriotic motives, had compelled a surrender of the man to the government with whose sign of protection he was invested.

The acts of congress which have given some privileges to persons declaring intention are of no significance, either as facts or arguments. Congress may favor such persons, as it has in special cases favored aliens who had made no declaration at all. An act by congress can't amount to an act by an individual no way connected with congress: nor can acts of congress, having nothing to do with the naturalizing of aliens, cause the transfer of allegiance from one sovereign to another. The very sections of both the acts relied on speak of persons who have done no more than "declare intention" as "aliens." They favor our view more than they do that of the other side.

GRIER, Circuit Justice, admitted that the question, as a judicial one, was new, and of some difficulty; but it being, as he stated, his opinion that a man could not throw off his natural allegiance except in assuming some new citizenship, he refused to dismiss the case in a summary way, for want of jurisdiction. And there being no disputed facts in the case, he directed a verdict for the plaintiff, giving leave, however, to the defendant to move to set it aside if he desired. The motion was made; but Byrne having actually abandoned this country soon after the suit was brought, and there not being any likelihood whatever of his return, the case was not heard of further.

NOTE, [from original report.] The conclusion thus adopted by the court in this case is sustained by the view subsequently taken by the court of appeals in Kentucky, in White v. White, A. D. 1859, 2 Metc. (Ky.) 189, where it was decided that an alien who had taken the preparatory oath to become a citizen of the United States, is not thereby rendered capable to take lands by descent; and that his subsequent naturalization does not operate to invest him with the title which in the meantime has vested in the commonwealth. It was supported, also, in the view taken by the federal government at an interesting crisis of American history; as appears by the following letter of the secretary of state to the then British charge at Washington: Department of State, Washington, July 20, 1861. Sir:—Having informally understood from you that British subjects who had merely declared their intention to become citizens of the United States, had expressed apprehensions that they might be drafted into the militia under the late requisition of the war department, I have the honor to acquaint you, for their information, that none but citizens are liable for duty in this country, and that this department has never regarded an alien, who may have merely declared his intention to become a citizen, as entitled to a passport, and consequently have always withheld from persons of that character any such certificate. I have the honor to be, with high consideration, your obedient servant, Wm. H. Seward. To the Hon. Wm. Stewart, etc.

Circuit Court, D. Connecticut. Dec. 19, 1868.

EQUITY—JURISDICTION—TO RESTRAIN THE ERECTION OF A BRIDGE.

This court has jurisdiction of a suit in equity brought to restrain the building of a bridge across the Connecticut river, between Saybrook and Lyme, to be used for a railroad, although the construction of such bridge is claimed to be authorized by the legislature of the state of Connecticut. The construction of such a bridge was enjoined until the final hearing of the cause.

[See Pennsylvania v. Wheeling & Belmont Bridge Co., 13 How. (54 U. S.) 518; Devoe v. Penrose Ferry-Bridge Co., Case No. 3,845; Silliman v. Hudson River Bridge Co., Cases Nos. 12,851, 12,852; Hatch v. Wallamet Iron Bridge Co., 6 Fed. 326, 780. Contra, Milnor v. New Jersey R. Co., Case No. 9,620; Pennsylvania R. Co. v. New York & L. B. R. Co., Id. 10,953.]

[In equity. Bill for injunction by William M. Baird against the Shore Line Railway Company. Injunction granted. At a subsequent hearing this provisional injunction was dissolved. See Baird v. Shore Line Ry. Co., Case No. 759.]

The plaintiff, a resident of Philadelphia and a citizen of the state of Pennsylvania, filed this bill in equity, praying for a perpetual injunction against the defendants, to restrain them from building a bridge across the Connecticut river, connecting their railroad track, between Saybrook and Lyme. He alleged that they were proceeding to erect the bridge, and that the same would very seriously obstruct the navigation of the river. The defendants, by their answer, set up that they were proceeding to erect such bridge under and by virtue of authority conferred on them by a statute of the state of Connecticut, and that the structure which they were erecting was not intended to obstruct, and would not in fact obstruct, to any considerable extent, the free navigation of the river. The plaintiff, who alleged that he was an owner of vessels enrolled and licensed under the act of congress, and engaged in running on said river, and interested in the navigation thereof, now moved that the defendants be temporarily enjoined against the further erection of the bridge, until the final hearing on the bill, answer, and proofs. This motion was founded on the bill and accompanying affidavits in support of its allegations. The defendants opposed it on their answer and on affidavits.

Richard D. Hubbard and William Hammersley, for plaintiff.

Henry B. Harrison and Tilton E. Doolittle, for defendants.

Before NELSON, Circuit Justice, and SHIPMAN, District Judge.

SHIPMAN, District Judge. We do not propose, at this stage of the controversy, to enter into a lengthy discussion of the important questions involved. As we intimated to the counsel on the hearing, we have no doubt on the question of jurisdiction raised by the defendants. The Connecticut river, at least at the point where this bridge is being erected, is a public river, free to all for the purposes of navigation. We regard the right of this plaintiff, as well as that of every other citizen, to its free navigation, as secured by the constitution and the laws of the United States. Any material obstruction to the exercise of this right is a wrong which this court has power to redress. As the injury complained of is of that peculiar character for which the remedy at law is not adequate, resort must be had to equity, and the plaintiff has, therefore, filed his bill on the equity side of the court. Over the questions thus presented, as we have stated, we think this court has ample jurisdiction. This jurisdiction is not impaired by the law of the state authorizing the erection of the bridge, for the constitution and laws of the United States, by which the free navigation of the river is secured, are paramount to the authority assumed to be exercised by the state.

After elaborate arguments, and upon due consideration of the proofs as they now stand, we think that the defendants should be enjoined until the case can be brought to a final hearing. The Connecticut river is an important river, emptying into a great arm of the sea, and over its waters a considerable commerce is carried on by citizens of other states as well as by those of Connecticut. It is navigable for large vessels for some fifty miles from its mouth, and it is very near its mouth that the defendants are engaged in erecting the bridge. In this particular, the case is without parallel in the history of this country, so far as we are informed. We are not aware that the attempt has ever before been made to throw a permanent bridge across a large navigable river, at or very near its entrance into the sea. Of course, to whatever extent the navigation may be endangered or obstructed, the danger and inconvenience will be felt by the whole commerce of the river. We are satisfied, upon the proofs, as they now stand, that the free navigation of this river will be materially abridged, and the commerce over it be seriously incommoded and burdened, by the erection of the structure on which the defendants are now engaged. We are now treating the case in its present aspect, leaving, of course, a final judgment upon this and other questions involved, to a later stage in the suit, when the proofs shall be fully presented. We, therefore, purposely abstain from dwelling at length on the points in issue between the parties, and content ourselves with the announcement that, on the facts now before us, we deem it our duty to temporarily arrest the construction of this bridge.

It is proper to add, that we regard this as the best course for all concerned, for, while it leaves all the important questions open for examination on final hearing, it will effectually prevent the introduction into the case of that element of embarrassment, arising out of large expenditures, which has been felt in the later stages of cases of a similar character. Though the defendants are thus subjected to delay, they are at the same time relieved from any hazards. The enjoyment of their railway franchise, as they have used it for many years, is not interfered with. On the contrary, their rights, as they have existed and been enjoyed down to the present time, and the immemorial rights of all to the free and unobstructed navigation of the river, are preserved until the final determination of the grave questions involved in the case.

Let an injunction issue.

BRIDGES—ERECTION—DRAWBRIDGE—ACT FEB. 19, 1869.

By the act of February 19th, 1869, (15 Stat. 273,) authority was given to the Shore Line Railway Company to erect a drawbridge over the Connecticut river, although this court had held [Baird v. Shore Line Ry. Co., Case No. 758] that such bridge would be an obstruction to navigation, and had enjoined its erection. The injunction was dissolved by the court, because of the passage of such act.

Richard D. Hubbard, for plaintiff.

Tilton E. Doolittle and Henry B. Harrison, for defendants.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. This motion is founded upon the act of congress passed February 19th, 1869, (15 Stat. 273.) The legislature of the state of Connecticut passed an act authorizing the defendants to erect and maintain a railroad bridge across the mouth of the Connecticut river. The second section provided that the bridge should be constructed and used so as not to be a substantial obstruction to the free navigation of the river, and should be provided with two draws, each of which should be of the width of at least one hundred and twenty feet; and that, during the season of navigation, the draws should be kept open, except when closed for the passage of engines and cars. Various other regulations were prescribed, to be observed by the defendants, which do not require to be particularly noticed. The third section provided, that the bridge and draws should be located and constructed in such manner, at such places, and upon such plan, as a board of engineers, to be appointed by the superior court of the state, should approve. The defendants, having procured the approval of such board, commenced the erection of the bridge, but were soon thereafter restrained from further proceedings, until the cause should be heard on pleadings and proofs, by a preliminary injunction issued by the court, on the ground that the bridge would substantially obstruct the navigation of the river. In this posture of the case, an application was made to congress on the subject, in pursuance of which the act in question was passed.

It is claimed, on the part of the defendants, that this act removes the objection taken by the court to the erection of the bridge, and authorizes its construction according to the plan prescribed by the legislature of the state, and approved by the board of engineers, while it is insisted, on the part of the plaintiff, that, according to the true construction of the act, the question still remains for the court to decide, whether or not the bridge, as thus built, will present a substantial obstruction to the navigation.

This first section of the act provides, that the consent of congress is given to the erection of a drawbridge over the Connecticut river, &c., by the Shore Line Railway Company, in accordance with the terms of a resolution passed by the general assembly, &c. The second section provides, that the bridge, when completed in the manner specified in said resolution, and in the place, and in accordance with the plans of the board of engineers, &c., and in accordance with the requirements of the second section of the resolution of the general assembly, &c., shall be deemed to be a legal structure, &c. The argument, on the part of the plaintiff, is, that, inasmuch as the first and second sections of the act, which are relied on as legalizing the bridge, refer to one built in conformity with the requirements of the legislature of the state, and one of those requirements is, that it shall be so built as not to be a substantial obstruction to the navigation, if it can be shown, to the satisfaction of the court, that it would be, if erected, the preliminary injunction should be continued—that the requirement referred to must be shown to have been complied with, in order to bring the case within the authority conferred by the act of congress. The argument is plausible. But I am not satisfied that it is sound, or can afford sufficient ground for disregarding the general intent of the act, and the fair import of particular provisions of the same. The clause in the resolution of the legislature of the state is but declaratory of a principle of law, and added nothing to the legal effect of that resolution. If it had been omitted, the construction of the state act would have been the same. Therefore, I am not satisfied that the act of congress, when it refers to the mode and manner of the construction of the bridge, and to the duties and obligations of the defendants, as prescribed in the state law, and, especially, in the second section of that law, has any reference to the principle of law there declared. It refers to the mode and manner of the construction of the bridge, and to the duties and obligations of the defendants as thus prescribed, that is, to the construction and use of the bridge.

The fourth section of the act, I think, confirms this view. Congress there reserves the right to withdraw its consent to the erection of the bridge, in case free navigation of the river shall at any time be substantially obstructed. It should be remembered that, at the time of the passage of this act, the court had enjoined the erection of the bridge, on the ground, that, in its judgment, the bridge would, if erected, be a substantial obstruction. The question, whether it will be so or not, is not left to the courts, but congress seem to have taken it under their own charge, and to have admonished the defendants that, if the bridge shall, when built, turn out to be an obstruction, they will withdraw their assent to its erection, and leave the courts to deal with it.

Another consideration worthy of note is, that, according to the construction claimed by the plaintiff, the act would be without any force or effect, and utterly nugatory. The power to confer upon the defendants authority to build a bridge over this river, belonged to the sovereign state of Connecticut, and was not at all dependent upon congress. This power, however, is subject to the qualification, that the bridge must be built so as not materially to obstruct the navigation of the river. So far as any impediment to the navigation is concerned, the power of congress is paramount; but not beyond this. Pennsylvania v. Wheeling & Belmont Bridge Co., 18 How. [59 U. S.] 421. Unless this act, therefore, was intended to confer authority to erect the bridge, notwithstanding this court had held it to be an obstruction to navigation, it was, legally speaking, an act without an object, and without any effect. I do not inquire what opinions individual members of congress may have held or expressed on this subject. I can look only to the act itself, and ascertain the intent and meaning of the law-making power from its terms and provisions.

Upon the best consideration I have been able to give to the case, I think that it was the intention of congress, by the act in question, to legalize the bridge, constructed in the mode and manner prescribed by the legislature of the state; and, as a consequence, the preliminary injunction, heretofore issued, must be dissolved.

BAIRD v. WOLFE.

Circuit Court, D. Indiana. May Term, 1849.

EJECTMENT—INTERESTED PARTY—WITNESS—LIMITATION OF ACTIONS—EQUITABLE TITLE—PRESUMPTION OF TITLE FROM POSSESSION.

1. A witness, at whose instance an ejectment is brought, and who is the assignee of a part of the consideration, for which the land was sold, and the suit being brought, on a failure to pay the consideration, is not a competent witness.

2. The statute of limitations does not run against an equitable title, nor in favor of one.

3. A presumption of a title may arise from long possession, and under such circumstances as are favorable to such a presumption.

4. But, it may be rebutted by circumstances or positive proof. In many cases the court will refer the presumption to the jury for their consideration and decision.

[At law. Action of ejectment by the lessee of James Baird, and Peter Bartmoss, against Benjamin Wolfe. Verdict and judgment for plaintiffs.]

Smith & Sullivan, for plaintiffs.
Mr. Judah, for defendant.

THE COURT, (charging the jury.) Patent for the land in controversy, was given in evidence, to James Baird or to his legal representatives, for four hundred acres, dated 21st September, 1847. Peter Bartmoss and Eli Adams being sworn, proved the heirship of the lessors of the plaintiffs. Mr. Ewing being offered as a witness, was objected to, on the ground of interest. It appears that he commenced the suit and procured Mr. Browning to become security for costs, and it was alleged, promised to indemnify him. Mr. Browning on being examined, said Ewing informed him, when he applied to him to indorse for costs, that the party was good, but did not specially promise to indemnify him. But the witness expected Ewing would not permit him to be injured. It appeared that Ewing was the assignee of a small part of the consideration agreed to be paid for the land. The witness was admitted to give evidence, by the court, subject, at any future stage of the case to be overruled. A deposition was offered which was taken under a rule of court, which authorized depositions to be taken under the laws of the state. Those laws specify certain cases in which depositions of witnesses may be taken, which do not require the reasons for taking them to be stated. The plaintiff claims a right to take them because they live more than one hundred miles from the place of holding the court. The deposition can not be received as having been taken under the act of congress, as the requisites of that act have not been complied with. Is the deposition admissible as having been taken under the laws of the state? The rule of court may be so construed, as to embrace merely the mode of taking depositions, where the right exists under the act of congress. The deposition was admitted on parol proof that the witness lives more than one hundred miles from the place of holding the court.

The land in controversy was not acquired in the ordinary mode of entry and payment, in the register's and receiver's offices, under the act of congress. On the 21st of April, 1806, [2 Stat. 395,] an act was passed, authorizing the registers and receivers of public moneys of the district of Vincennes and Kaskaskias, under the direction of the secretary of the treasury, to lay out one or more tracts of land in their respective districts, for the purpose of locating therein, tracts of land granted by virtue of any legal French or British grants, or of any resolution, or act of congress, etc. The claims of the character above stated, under various subsequent acts of congress, and the action and reports of the land officers were examined, and confirmed by congress, and certificates were issued which authorized the person to whom issued, to locate the tract within the time and place limited. This tract of four hundred acres was acquired in this mode. It was located by Baird, who sold the land to Duncan, and who, it is alleged, never paid the full amount of the consideration. Ewing was the assignee of the consideration to be paid, two hundred and fifty dollars with interest, and suit is commenced to recover the possession, by reason of the failure to pay the consideration in full.

The agreement for the sale of the land to Duncan, was proved, and that an imperfect deed was made out by Baird, which, together with the agreement, was placed in the hands of Ewing in June, 1824. In 1825, the witness's house was burnt, and these papers were burnt with it. It seems two hundred and fifty dollars of the purchase money remained unpaid, and of which Ewing was the assignee. And Ewing states, that from year to year, from 1819, at the time of the sale, to 1824, Duncan promised payment. One witness, who was one of Duncan's executors, and who examined his papers, never saw a receipt for the balance of the purchase money. He never saw a deed from Baird for the land. In 1835–6 believes Wolfe claimed the whole tract. He claimed the whole of it prior to the sheriff's sale. Wolfe took possession of the land in 1840 or '41. He purchased from Sloan, and one of the witnesses stated that he had seen a deed from him to Wolfe. The above is the ground on which the plaintiffs rest to recover the possession of the land. The legal title being in them under the patent, and a part of the consideration money not being paid.

The defense, gentlemen of the jury, is, first, that the purchase money has been paid. A receipt is produced, which, it is alleged, was given for the balance of the purchase money. The genuineness of the receipt, and the circumstances under which it was procured, are for your determination. If you shall find that the consideration money has been fully paid, it will take away from the plaintiffs all equitable considerations, and leave them only the claim to the legal title. On the part of the defendants, it is insisted, that the act of congress confirming the right to this tract to the original claimant, under the report of the register and receiver, vested in the claimant the legal title. This was not the effect of the confirmation. It was the right to four hundred acres of land which was confirmed, and not any particular tract of land. The certificate which the claimant received, as evidence of his right, authorized the location of four hundred acres of land, but, until such location was made, the claim was without locality, except within the district designated, for the satisfaction of such claims. A legislative act confirming a title, which was in its terms final, and required no further action of the government, would be considered a grant. But the right before us was not of this character.

The statute of limitations of twenty years is relied on, as a bar to the plaintiffs' recovery. To maintain this defense an adverse title must be shown. Since 1814, this claim appears to have been under Duncan, and there would seem to be no claim of an adverse character, unless it can be set up under the sheriff's deed. An equitable claim, however strong it may be, can not be set up at law to defeat the legal title. Nor can the statute of limitations be pleaded as a bar to a legal title, where the defendant has only an equity. Until the emanation of the patent in 1847, the legal title to the land in dispute, it is contended, remained in the United States. The statute does not run against the government, nor against an individual who holds only an equitable title. By Rev. St. [Ind.] 1843, p. 455, [§ 9,] an individual who holds a final certificate for lands purchased from the United States is vested with the legal title, so as to subject it to the lien of a judgment, and to execution, as where the patent has issued. But this law was not passed until after the above transaction. As the law then stood, the equitable title could not be sold on execution, and a sheriff's deed, it is supposed, on a sale of the equity merely, could not convey a title which could be set up under the statute. A title may be set up under the statute, which is fair upon its face, but inoperative, as it was adopted to protect a bona fide holder under such a title. But a sheriff's title must be considered as essentially connected with the judgment; and when the sheriff attempts to sell that which is not subject to execution, he can convey no title, and a void title is not one which the statute will protect. The purchaser, at most, in such a case, could take only the right held by the defendant in the judgment; and that right being only an equitable one, could not avail the defendant against the legal title. Ewing is an interested witness, as the recovery is for his benefit; and it appears by a contract with Bartmoss he is responsible for the costs, and what he has said is withdrawn from the jury. But waiving a reliance upon the statute of limitations, the counsel for the defendant relies on the presumption of a deed to Duncan.

This presumption is founded, 1. On a possession of thirty-five years. 2. No contract respecting the title was known for a long time. 3. That Duncan had the ability to pay the amount. 4. The receipt of the balance by Sullivan to be paid on the execution of the deed. 5. Acquiescence of the claimants in the sheriff's sale to defendant. 6. The loss of the recorder's office in Knox county, by fire. 7. The recital in the deed from Duncan to McCall. 8. The controversy between Duncan and Tuckers, in which Duncan said he had left his title at home. The presumption of title arises from lapse of time and circumstances, which may, however, be rebutted. When an individual has been a long time in the possession of the property, and there are no facts proved which go to rebut such presumption, the court will leave the question to the jury whether a title may not be presumed. But in this case, although the possession has been in the defendant and those who preceded him in the claim of purchase many years, yet there are facts which conduce to show that the whole of the consideration money has not been paid; and the deed to Duncan was not to be executed until the whole of the purchase money should be paid. It is true there is an acknowledgment of the receipt of the consideration on the deed, but this is not conclusive and may be explained. Indeed in all conveyances the consideration is acknowledged.

The receipt to Sullivan, if genuine, shows an intention by Duncan to pay the balance, but it does not appear that Sullivan was acting as the agent of Baird, or that he had a right to receive the money. In receiving it he acted as the agent of Duncan, and unless it was paid over, to the proper persons, Duncan could not claim a credit for it. The money it seems, was to be paid when the deed was executed. The deed that was made out by Sullivan for Baird was defective in not describing the boundaries of the tract, and it seems that this deed was never delivered. There is no controversy as to the whole of the consideration being paid, except the two hundred and fifty or fifty-four dollars. Now, this will explain why the possession of the land was taken and improvements made, by the acquiescence of those who obtained the patent. Until the patent was obtained, Baird could not make a deed that would be operative from its date. The patent, it seems, was not issued until 1847. A deed made before that time to Duncan, would have been made good by the patent, but the date of the patent is of some importance, as it may, in some degree account for the reason why a deed was not made to Duncan. And also the recognition or admission, at different periods by Duncan, that the above small balance was due.

Upon the whole the facts are left with the jury, whether from a deliberate consideration of them, the jury can presume a deed from the lessors of the plaintiffs, or from their ancestor. If there be anything in the case to make the presumption doubtful, as to a deed having been executed to Duncan, it will not be presumed. Jury found for plaintiff. Judgment.

BAJORQUES v. UNITED STATES.

[Hoff. Op. 53; Hoff. Dec. 1.]

District Court, D. California. June 10, 1859.

PUBLIC LANDS—SURVEYS—CONFIRMATION—RIGHTS OF GRANTEES PENDENTE LITE.

[Where the original grantee of lands has parted with his entire interest, parties who have obtained derivative titles pendente lite from such original grantee are entitled to contest a survey, though the original grantee as plaintiff, the United States, and vendees of two-thirds of the interest of the original grantee consent to its approval.]

[Land claim by Bartolome Bajorques and another against the United States. Confirmed. Motion for approval of the survey of the lands. Denied.]

HOFFMAN, District Judge. A final decree of confirmation having been made in this case, the survey of the lands, the claim to which was confirmed, has been brought into court for its approval. To the location and survey by the surveyor general the United States makes no objection. The counsel who has hitherto conducted the case on the part of the claimant, who was the original grantee, appears and also assents to the survey. But objections to it are made by other counsel, who represent parties to whom the original claimant has conveyed a portion of the land claimed by him. It is admitted that Bajorques, the original grantee, has parted with his whole interest in the land. The parties represented, therefore, by the counsel who has hitherto conducted the case, are assignees, or vendees, of a part of the land; as also are the parties represented by the counsel who object to the survey. It is claimed that these last are the owners of the greater portion of the premises; but this allegation is denied: I understand it, however, to be admitted that the survey is opposed by gentlemen who represent at least one-third of the lands, and that those who assent to the survey are not the owners of more than two-thirds of the interest of the original grantee.

The question then is, can the court confirm and approve the survey on the consent of the United States and the counsel representing two-thirds of the interest of the claimant, or are the parties holding the remaining third entitled to be heard in opposition to the survey? The importance of the question arises from the fact that if these latter have a standing in the court, they must be allowed to take testimony to bring the cause to a hearing, and probably appeal, if dissatisfied, from the decision of the court, thus retarding indefinitely the issuance of the patent, to the great damage of their co-owners, who are content with the survey as made by the surveyor general.

It was not questioned on the argument that the duty of reviewing and confirming or modifying the surveys of the surveyor general of lands confirmed to the claimants by the decree of this court, imposed upon it by the recent decision of the supreme court in the case of U. S. v. Fossatt, [21 How. (62 U. S.) 445,] involved the necessity of permitting parties to make objections to such survey, and to take testimony and to be heard in support of them. The United States are heard through the district attorney. The question presented in this case is—can the court refuse to hear all or any of the parties deriving title from the original grantee in whose name the claim has been prosecuted—when it appears that the original grantee has parted with his entire interest in the suit? If this were a regular suit in chancery, the answer would seem obvious. The decree confirming or correcting the survey which the court is now to make is declared by the supreme court to be the final decree in the suit. It is certainly a decree which must naturally affect the rights of all parties interested in it.

In equity proceedings, if pendente lite the complainant disposes of all his interest, the suit must abate. "It is very clear," says Mr. Justice Story, "that no party can stand before the court for a decree who has no farther interest in this, either formal or real." Hoxie v. Carr, [Case No. 6,802;] 3 P. Wms. 348; 9 Ves. 75. "And where the interests of new parties intervene pendente lite, having derivative titles under the plaintiff, there the suit may abate or become defective." Id., and cases cited. But this abatement is a mere interruption or suspension of the suit until the proper parties, who have derived their interests by purchase or transfer pendente lite, can be brought before the court by a supplemental bill. 1 Sumn. 179, [Hoxie v. Carr, supra;] Story, Eq. Pl. § 156.

In the case at bar no application is made for leave to bring in new parties to the suit. But it is admitted, as has already been stated, that the original claimant has parted with all interest in the lands. It appears to me that the parties who have acquired an interest and who have obtained derivative titles under the plaintiff pendente lite have a right to be heard in this proceeding, at all events as against other parties who have acquired precisely similar title to, it may be, the larger portion of the land. To say that grantees of the original claimant, who have acquired the greater portion of his portion, shall, for that reason, be exclusively entitled to appear, would be to apply or establish a rule anomalous and impracticable; for those who have acquired the greater portion of the land in extent may have the lesser portion in value, or the various grantees of the claimant may have equal interests, in both of which cases the rule suggested could not be applied. Nor can the fact that the counsel who now appear for the owners of two-thirds of the lands formerly represented the original Mexican grantee affect the decision of the question; for that gentleman now represents, not the original grantee, who has no further interest, but a portion, said to be the majority, of those who have derived title from him. Though I feel very reluctant to subject this or any other cause to delays which may possibly be unnecessary or vexatious, yet I have been unable to perceive any ground on which, under the circumstances of this case, I can refuse to hear and to pass upon the objections to the survey which may be made by either of the parties who have appeared. Those objections must be stated in writing, and filed in court. The court, on being informed of their nature, can make such further order as to the taking of testimony in support of them as the nature of the objections and the circumstances of the case may require.

In re BAKER.

District Court, D. Maine. Dec., 1875.

BANKRUPTCY ACT OF 1841 — ENDORSEMENT ON MORTGAGE IN FRAUD OF THE ACT — ATTACHING CREDITOR—LIEN.

1. An endorsement by the mortgagor upon a chattel mortgage, subjecting chattels acquired after the date of the mortgage to its operation, made in fraud of the bankrupt act, does not invalidate the mortgage otherwise valid, but simply fails of its purpose.

2. A creditor having attached the chattels of his debtor within four months of his bankruptcy, and meantime having paid the debt and assumed liabilities secured by an existing mortgage thereon to save the attachment, thereby acquires a valid lien upon the chattels attached, although the attachment becomes void upon the debtor's bankruptcy, and should be repaid the same by the assignee upon the sale of the chattels to which the lien attached.

3. An attachment by a creditor of the property of his insolvent debtor is not a fraud upon the bankrupt act.

In bankruptcy. Petition by attaching creditors to be reimbursed, from the proceeds of the sale of certain chattels of the bankrupt [Harrison Baker] by the assignee, for sums paid and liabilities incurred in raising a mortgage from the same, to preserve their attachment thereof that was dissolved by the debtor's bankruptcy. [Decree for petitioners.]

William P. Whitehouse, for petitioners.

Eben F. Pillsbury and Samuel Titcomb, for assignees.

FOX, District Judge. Baker was adjudged bankrupt in this court, upon his petition filed Sept. 20, 1875, and the respondents were duly appointed his assignees. The bankrupt was the keeper of the Augusta House, under a lease to him from Cushman & als., for three years from October 15, 1874, at a rent of $3,200 per year, payable in monthly installments, together with the taxes and insurance. The performance of the covenants of this lease were secured by a chattel mortgage to the lessors from Baker, of all the household furniture in the house, "together with all property of a similar description which he may hereafter add thereto, so that the said property should at all times be suitable and proper for carrying on said Augusta House;" the mortgage also provided "that said Baker should indemnify and save harmless the lessors from all liabilities they had already or may hereafter incur, by reason of advances made by them, or as signers or endorsers of any notes which they should make or endorse for the accommodation of said Baker." This lease and mortgage were duly recorded, and the bankrupt went into possession of the house and remained there until the filing of his petition in bankruptcy. He added to the furniture his purchases amounting to about $4,000, a portion of which was attached on a writ in favor of the Gas Company, July 31, 1875. This attachment was discharged, and on August 5th Baker executed on the back of the original mortgage an agreement reciting "that in consideration of the depreciation in value, by use past and future, of the property within described, I hereby agree that the within mortgage with this endorsement thereon shall hold and cover any and all additions that have been or may be made to the same; also including two billiard and one pool table put into the Augusta House by me together with all the fixtures thereto belonging."

This instrument was recorded in the city records on the same day.

Under the laws of this state, an attachment of chattels subject to a mortgage may be made on mesne process. Rev. St. [Me.] c. 81, §§ 41–44, provide that such mortgaged property may be attached, held and sold, as if it was unincumbered, if the attaching creditor first tenders or pays the full amount unpaid on the demand so secured. The mortgagee shall not bring his action against the attaching officer until he has given him forty-eight hours' written notice of his claim and the true amount thereof; and the officer or creditor may, within that time, discharge the claim by paying or tendering the amount due thereon, or restore the property. "If the creditor redeems such property and it is subsequently sold by the officer, he shall from the proceeds first pay to the creditor the amount, with interest, paid by him to redeem, and apply the balance to the debt on which it was attached."

The petitioners being creditors of the bankrupt, on the 18th of August sued out their writs against him, and caused the mortgaged furniture to be attached thereon by the sheriff of Kennebec county, and on the same day due notice of the attachment was given by the officer to the mortgagees, to which, on the 27th of the same month, they made written reply, setting forth in detail the several sums claimed by them to be secured by said mortgage, amounting in the aggregate to $5,903.72 on that day; and they further claimed to hold the same as security for the accruing rent during the continuance of the lease.

On the 27th of August, the mortgagees served upon Baker a notice of foreclosure, under the statute, for breach of condition of the mortgage, and on the 28th the attaching creditors paid to the mortgagees the amount claimed by them to be secured by the mortgage—i. e. $5,903.72, and also gave to them their obligation, binding themselves to assume and keep in the future all the other stipulations and covenants of said lease, "provided said lessors shall, promptly and without delay, enforce compliance with all the terms and conditions of the lease not already performed by us, and avail themselves of all needed legal measures, or allow us to do so, to expel said lessee for nonpayment of rent hereafter becoming due, and give us the privileges and benefit of said lease, according to the terms thereof."

On the sixth of September, a process of forcible entry and detainer, to recover from Baker the possession of the premises, was commenced against him by the lessors, returnable before the municipal court of Augusta, September 13th.

An appraisal was duly made of the attached property, and the appraisers having certified that it could not be kept without great expense and deteriorating in value, the officer, in accordance with law, advertised to sell the same at public auction on the 23d day of September, but was prevented from so doing by an injunction from this court, on the 22d of that month, in the bankruptcy proceedings; and the property was therefore held by the sheriff under his attachment until the respondents were appointed assignees, when the same was turned over to them by the sheriff. The process of forcible entry and detainer was also stayed by an injunction from this court, on the 24th of September, until the further order of the court.

The assignees having obtained the possession of the mortgaged property, Whithed proposed to purchase the same, together with any interest acquired by the assignees in and by virtue of the lease, for the sum of ten thousand dollars. They petitioned this court for leave to accept the offer of Whithed. Notice of the petition was given to the mortgagees and all others interested, and no one appearing to object, the court authorized the sale to be made under Rev. St. U. S. § 5063, which has been done.

Upon a careful revision of the accounts, it appeared that the bankrupt had paid to one of the lessors, Milliken, by board $786.67, which should have been allowed in part discharge of the rent; and that there had been an over-payment of rent, by the attaching creditors to that amount, on the 27th day of August. A settlement was accordingly made between the lessors and the attaching creditors, the sum of $4,919.11 being claimed as due on the 27th of August, and a further sum of $213.33 for additional rent of the premises from August 27th to September 20th, the day of the filing the petition in bankruptcy; these two amounts, in the aggregate $5,132.44, were retained by the lessors, and the balance of the amount received by them was repaid to the attaching creditors. The petitioners in their present petition now ask that the assignees may be ordered to refund to them, from the proceeds of sale, the $5,132.44 and interest, they having relinquished to the assignees and discharged all claim, under the endorsement on the mortgage of August 5th, to any proceeds of sale of the furniture acquired by Baker after the 14th of October.

The respondents, in behalf of the creditors, deny the validity of the original mortgage of Oct. 14th, and claim that it was rendered null and void by the proceedings of August 5th; and they called at the hearing the bankrupt as a witness, who testified "that soon after the attachment made by the Gas Co., Cushman, one of the mortgagees, called upon him, he being then unwell and confined to his room, with the mortgage and endorsement thereon, as it now appears, and requested him to execute the same, at the same time assigning as a reason therefor, that there were several parties in Augusta who were disposed to put him to trouble and expense, and subject them to a good deal of cost and inconvenience; that it would be no harm to me, but on the contrary a benefit to me if I signed the paper; and I then executed it."

It is claimed upon this statement, that one purpose of the mortgagees in thus procuring the endorsement and having the mortgage cover the subsequent acquired property of the mortgageor, was to delay other creditors and prevent their attachment of this property. The original mortgage provided "that all property of a similar description to that then on the premises, which the mortgageor should thereafter add thereto, should pass under the mortgage." A stipulation of this nature was held valid and effectual as against an assignee in bankruptcy under the former bankrupt law. Mitchell v. Winslow, [Case No. 9,673.] So that all of the subsequent acquired property of a similar description to the old, the mortgagees could have retained as against an assignee in bankruptcy. Cushman has not been called to contradict this statement of the bankrupt, and I am therefore for this hearing to consider it as established, that one motive and purpose of the mortgagees in procuring this endorsement was to delay creditors of the bankrupt, and that this transfer of the subsequent acquired property was fraudulent, and could not prevail as against attaching creditors.

No rights, therefore, were acquired to the new property, and this endorsement was a nullity, so far as creditors were concerned; but that I hold is the extent of its operation. It did not deprive the creditors of any rights whatever which they before had. The newly acquired property was still open to attachment for Baker's debts, but the property, which belonged to Baker at the time the original mortgage was executed, did not become subject to such liability. That mortgage was originally valid and effectual, and so continued notwithstanding the parties at a day long subsequently might have contemplated a fraudulent purpose relative to the other property of the bankrupt, and to subject it to liability for the security of the same claims embraced in the original mortgage. The rights of all parties are the same as they would have been, if instead of making this endorsement on the back of the original mortgage, a separate, independent mortgage had been given, on August 5th, upon the subsequent acquired property, as security for the claims covered by the original mortgage, and the parties at the time had designed thereby to defeat or delay the other creditors. It is quite clear that the latter mortgage would be fraudulent and void as against creditors and assignees in bankruptcy; but it is equally clear to my mind that it could not in any manner affect the prior mortgage untainted by any fraud in its inception.

In the present case the petitioners have filed a written waiver and release of all interest in and to any property not included in the original mortgage, the proceeds realized from the sale of that property being in excess of the amount paid by them to the mortgagees, so that no claim is made under the fraudulent endorsement.

It is further contended by the assignees, that there has been collusion between the petitioners and the owners of the Augusta House, to turn over all the personal property of the bankrupt to the petitioners, that they might acquire a title thereto for a sum far below its real value, and in fraud of the other creditors. The history of the case certainly manifests that the owners of the property were quite willing to be rid of Baker as their tenant, and that the petitioners, or Whithed, might take possession in his stead and occupy the house, and acquire all their rights to Baker's property, on complying with his obligations under the lease and mortgage.

To accomplish these ends there can be no question that the landlords resorted to a foreclosure of the mortgage and to their process of forcible entry and detainer, and the attaching creditors to the appraisal and contemplated sale by the sheriff of the property attached; but every step in these proceedings was in accordance with the laws of this state, while to counteract their force and effect, the bankrupt and his creditors applied to this court, and availed themselves of its restraining process to prevent their opponents obtaining any advantage by their movements under the various provisions of the state laws. Each side, in my view, stood on their legal rights, endeavoring to obtain all the advantages that the law would afford them; and as it would now seem, the whole rather resulted in a drawn game, neither party having obtained any very great success over the other, the property of the bankrupt having vested in his assignees in substantially the same condition it would have done if this warfare had never existed. But nothing is shown which would justify this court in declaring that there was such collusion between the parties as should deprive the petitioners of any rights to which they would otherwise be entitled.

Having disposed of these objections, there remains to be determined what are the petitioners' rights in this fund, the proceeds of the mortgaged property sold by order of the court, and now in the custody of the court, as against the assignees in bankruptcy.

The petitioners made an attachment of this property to secure a just debt; this attachment was valid under the laws of this state, but liable to be defeated by proceedings in bankruptcy instituted within four months. The property thus attached was subject to a valid mortgage; and the laws of this state empowered the attaching creditors to pay the amount of this incumbrance and discharge the claim thereon, and if the creditor redeem the property, and it is subsequently sold by the officer, he shall from the proceeds first pay to the creditor the amount, with interest paid by him to redeem the property. The officer, in strict compliance with the law, was about to sell this property and pay to the creditors the amount they had paid to redeem, when he was enjoined by this court from so doing, and was compelled to retain the property until assignees were appointed, and then to surrender it to them, and they have since, by order of this court, sold it for a sum in excess of the amount paid by the creditors to redeem it.

Under these circumstances, which party has the better equity, the creditors who have paid this amount to discharge this valid claim, an incumbrance upon the property, and for which at present they are just so much the poorer, or the assignees, who by reason and on account of this very payment by these creditors, have received the property relieved and discharged from this incumbrance, and thereby the estate in bankruptcy is just so much the larger for distribution than it would have been if the creditors had not paid this sum?

The simple statement of the proposition presents most conclusively its own solution. Conceding that the payment of the amount "discharged" the incumbrance, or "redeemed" the property, it is equally certain that the law itself, the instant the payment was made, the property being in the possession of the officer, imposed upon the property a new lien or incumbrance for the security of the creditors for the amount paid by them to redeem. The officer constantly retained the property charged with this trust and statutory lien, until sold by him, and the proceeds he was required to pay over to the creditor to the extent he had paid out in redemption of the property. The lien, therefore, upon this property for the security of the redemption creditor, was thus created by statute, and was as effectual and binding upon the property as could be had by the most formal contract. The statute provided its own method for its enforcement, and this would have proved effectual and sufficient if the court in bankruptcy had not interposed and prevented the officer from completing the steps in that behalf, which the state law contemplated as sufficient.

In Savings Bank v. Stuyvesant Bank, [Case No. 12,919,] Mr. Justice Hunt of the supreme court of the United States, says:

"The soundness of the position that liens are preserved under the bankrupt act, and that the holders of them are to be protected, cannot be well doubted.

"The bankrupt act of 1841, [5 Stat. 440; repealed March 3, 1843, 5 Stat. 614,] in its second section, was very explicit on this subject, and it was repeatedly held that liens or rights of property created by the laws of the state could not be disturbed while enforcing the provisions of the act. The rule is the same under the present bankrupt law, and although not stated in terms so precise and specific as are found in the act of 1841, the provisions of sections 14 and 20 establish the same rule."

In Re Wynn, [Case No. 18,117,] Chase, C. J., says: "We do not doubt that the assignee takes the property in the same plight in which it was held by the bankrupt when his petition was filed, subject to such liens or incumbrances as would affect it if no adjudication in bankruptcy had taken place. * * * Liens are of various descriptions, and may be enforced in different ways; but we think it sufficient to say here, what seems to us well warranted in principle and authority, that whenever the law gives a creditor a right to have a debt satisfied from the proceeds of property, or before the property can be otherwise disposed of, it gives a lien on such property to secure the payment of this debt." In that case a statute of Virginia required an officer who took goods on certain premises under legal process, to pay out of the proceeds the rent in arrear, and the chief justice remarks: "We cannot doubt that this statute creates a lien in favor of the landlord, and a lien of high and peculiar character." While that language is peculiarly applicable to the present case, the lien in the present case is of a higher nature, as the party claiming it has discharged a prior lien upon the same property, for the exact amount which he now claims to be allowed, and all parties interested in the property have been benefited to the exact amount claimed, as no one could have in any way recovered a dollar from the property without first discharging the incumbrance.

In Parker v. Muggridge, [Case No. 10,743,] Mr. Justice Story says, "The plaintiffs have an equitable lien and a superior title to the property over the assignee and the general creditors, and the assignee must take the property of the bankrupts for the general creditors, subject to this lien and superior title, * * * and the property will be followed and affected with the trust in the hands of the assignees, in the same manner and to the same extent as it would be in the hands of the bankrupt. * * * We all know that in bankruptcy the assignee takes only such rights as the bankrupt himself had, and is subject to like equities."

This last proposition, with a modification repeatedly recognized by Judge Story himself, that in cases of fraud the assignee may acquire and enforce rights which the bankrupt could not, has been affirmed scores of times, by every tribunal in the United States administering the bankrupt law. If bankruptcy had not intervened, the bankrupt could not have prevented the creditors receiving the payment which they now claim from the proceeds of the sale of the goods upon which they had a valid statute lien; charged with this lien those goods passed to the assignee, and the bankrupt court, administering principles of equity, is not restricted to the course provided by the statute for affording redress to these claimants. Having taken this property burdened with this incumbrance it is bound on every principle of equity law, first to see that this lien is paid off and fully discharged before it will allow any portion of the proceeds of the property to be distributed among the general creditors.

It is said that this principle will not justify the payment of the $213.33 being for the rent from the 27th of August to the day of the filing the petition in bankruptcy; it is claimed that this sum was paid by force of the petitioners' obligation of August 27th, by which they, on certain conditions, became personally accountable to the lessors for the subsequent rent. These conditions appear to have been complied with by the lessors, and I am of the opinion that the petitioners had rendered themselves personally accountable for the future rent; but I also hold that this remedy was merely cumulative, and that the lessors still held the security under their mortgage for its payment. They had done nothing at that time to discharge this security, or to estop them from availing themselves of it, in case it became necessary for their protection. They had received payment for rent up to the 27th of August, and had at the same time asserted, distinctly, their claim under the mortgage as security for future rent.

Between these dates, Aug. 27th and Sept.

20th, Baker was in possession of the premises, resisting the process of forcible entry and detainer instituted to oust him therefrom; his furniture was also there, subject to attachments for the benefit of the petitioners, who had at that time a much larger interest at stake in the same property, by reason of their lien on the same, for the amount paid by them to the lessors. They were therefore, as it were, compelled to discharge the claim for the subsequent rent, which was secured on the property, subject to their liens and attachment, as the claim for rent most certainly would have priority over the claim by attachment. The payment of the subsequently accruing rent was not strictly by force of the provisions of the law before cited, and it did not, therefore, strictly acquire for its security a lien as provided by statute, which would require the payment by the officer from the proceeds of sale; but its payment from these proceeds may, in my view, be justified under the circumstances, as against the assignees of the bankrupt by the principle of subrogation, which is frequently adopted by courts of equity. If the mortgage is to be deemed as now outstanding for the security of the payment of the rent, which under the circumstances may well admit of doubt, as the mortgagees upon notice have not objected to the sale of the mortgaged property, or to the granting of the prayer of the present petition, it is possible that the mortgagees might interpose and object, and that as against them and their future claims under this mortgage, the petitioners could not insist on being subrogated to their rights, qua the payment made by them for this subsequent rent; but I do not think the assignees in bankruptcy are at liberty to insist on this objection in behalf of general creditors: "It is a well settled and familiar principle that he, who acquires an interest in an estate that is subject to a mortgage or other charge, acquires at the same time the right to pay off such mortgage, or to exonerate the estate in the same manner that he would have been entitled, who created the incumbrance; and that in so doing he becomes substituted in the place of him to whom he has paid the money, in all cases in which it is necessary for his protection that the incumbrance should be kept alive; and he will in all cases of making such payment be deemed the assignee, if an assignment will better subserve the ends of justice than payment and extinction would do." Fletcher v. Chase, 16 N. H. 42.

"Where a party, advancing money to pay the debt of a third person, is compelled to pay it to protect his own rights, a court of equity substitutes him in the place of a creditor as a matter of course, without any agreement to that effect." Sandford v. McLean, 3 Paige, 122.

For these reasons, I hold that as against the assignees these petitioners have a right to demand the payment of the $213.33 from the sales of the mortgaged property, equally with the larger sum.

Finally, it is objected that these proceedings of the petitioners were in furtherance of an attachment, which was an attempt to obtain a preference fraudulent under the bankrupt law. This objection at first appeared of some force, but on reflection I am satisfied it should not prevail. The bankrupt act in terms declares what are prohibited and fraudulent transfers and preferences, and denounces them under certain penalties; but an attachment, on mesne process, is nowhere enumerated among them. It does declare, that the assignment to the assignee shall vest in him the property of the bankrupt, although the same is then attached on mesne process as the property of the debtor, and shall dissolve any such attachments made within four months next preceding the commencement of bankruptcy proceedings.

The attachment is nowhere declared to be a fraud upon the act; on the contrary, if permitted by the state law, it may be made and will continue in full force until the assignment, and only fails and dissolves away in case the assignment is made in proceedings commenced within the four months; in that case, the result will be, the party obtains no benefit from his attachment; he has incurred expenses incidental to it, for which he has no claim against the bankrupt or his estate; but any other rights, by virtue of the state law, which he has acquired in the property, still continue to him and are not affected by the bankruptcy proceedings. An express provision should be had to defeat these rights, and none such is anywhere found in the act.

It results that the petitioners are entitled to payment of the full amount claimed by them with interest from the date of such payments.

BANKRUPTCY—PREFERENCES—KNOWLEDGE OF CREDITOR.

[The value of the stock in trade of a debtor, who had little other property, was about equal to his indebtedness to his brother, and he owed other debts nearly double in amount. This brother with knowledge of the value of the stock, without inquiry into the debtor's circumstances, intimation of summary measures, or effort to obtain payment, began suit for the whole amount. The debtor, pending the suit, made no attempt to get an accommodation, but remained on friendly terms with his brother, bought on credit, and made payments to certain creditors from the proceeds of sales. The brother delayed 10 days in entering judgment and issuing execution. Held, that the parties intended to secure a preference, the debtor cooperated thereto, the creditor relied on such cooperation, and the judgment obtained by him was therefore void.]

[In bankruptcy. Petition by a creditor of Jerome E. Baker, a bankrupt debtor, that a judgment recovered by him against the debtor and execution levied upon his property be declared a lien upon the proceeds of his estate in bankruptcy. Denied.]

WALLACE, District Judge. I cannot concur in the conclusion of the register, that the proofs herein fail to show that the bankrupt procured his property to be seized on the execution obtained in favor of his brother. The nature of transactions like the one involved almost uniformly precludes the production of any but circumstantial evidence. Parties who collude to evade the law shield their actions from the cognizance of witnesses, and generally fortify their case by suppressing the truth, or misrepresenting the facts when called upon to testify. But it generally happens that the usual indicia of fraud will be detected, and when these are found, if they suffice to convince the judicial mind of the illegal character of the transactions involved, the testimony of the parties will receive but little credence. In order to determine that the judgment and execution in this case are invalid, it is necessary to find upon the proofs that when his property was seized, the debtor was insolvent or in contemplation of insolvency; that he procured his property to be seized with an intent to give his brother a preference; and that the brother had reasonable cause to believe the debtor to be insolvent, and knew that the seizure was made in fraud of the provisions of the bankrupt act. That the debtor was insolvent when the action was commenced in which the judgment was obtained; that he intended his brother should obtain a preference over his other creditors, by means of the judgment and execution, and that the brother was cognizant of these facts, I cannot entertain any doubt; and if, in addition, it can be found that the debtor facilitated this end by any affirmative action on his part, and the creditor was aware of it, the case is made out. At the time the action was commenced in which the judgment was obtained, the property of the debtor consisted only of his stock and accounts in trade; and, according to his own testimony, the stock was about equal in value to the amount of his brother's debt, while his other debts were nearly double in amount, and his accounts were of trifling value. The debt of the brother was for borrowed money, and constituted almost the entire capital with which the debtor commenced business, and no part of the principal had ever been paid. The brother and the bankrupt were on friendly and intimate terms. Apparently without any inquiry into the debtor's circumstances, and without any effort to obtain payment of any part of the loan, and without any intimation of summary measures, the brother, who was personally conversant with the ostensible value of the debtor's stock in trade, commenced suit for an amount which would necessarily absorb the whole of it. It would seem that not only was no effort made by the debtor for an accommodation or extension, but that no word of expostulation or of intercession was uttered by him, while no expression of sympathy or regret escaped from the lips of the creditor during the pendency of the action; an impressive silence fell upon the parties, and the Sunday visits, when the creditor remained from Saturday until Monday with his debtor, were characterized by an utter negation of all unpleasant topics. While these circumstances justify the conclusion that both parties intended that the creditor should get his debt, to the exclusion of other creditors, and excite a violent suspicion of collusion, they fail, probably, to show anything more than a passive acquiescence on the part of the debtor in the creditor's proceedings.

As the law now stands, a failing debtor may undoubtedly suffer a brother or any friendly creditor to obtain a preference, by means of legal process; he may resign himself to the purpose of the creditor with perfect tranquillity, and enjoy heartfull pleasure in the experience. More than this the wisdom of the law does not permit, and if, by any active participation with the creditor, he facilitates the seizure of his property, the law is transgressed, and the preference is illegal. That the debtor co-operated actively here is clear. After the action was commenced, knowing his hopeless insolvency, and knowing that his brother's execution would ultimately absorb his entire available assets, he continued buying goods on credit, and carrying on his business ostensibly in the same manner as before he was sued. He was justified in selling from his stock in trade until judgment should be obtained and execution issued; but he had no right to contract debts which he knew he could not pay legitimately, or to acquire additional property, in order to increase the fund available for favored creditors. It is true he continued making payments to divers of his creditors from the proceeds of his sales after he was sued, but each of these payments, in his then condition, was a preference, so far as he was concerned. It is not unfair to assume, under such circumstances, that his intention was to pay off favored creditors, or conciliate those whose hostility he might fear. However this may be, the certain result of his course was to augment a fund for his brother's benefit, and subject such goods as he might not sell, to seizure in appropriate time upon the execution. It is to be presumed that he intended the natural and ordinary consequences to follow from his acts, but the proofs disclose further evidence of a dishonest purpose, established by his own testimony. He admits that after he was sued, and after the time when judgment could have been entered against him, he was interviewed by an agent of one of his creditors, and led the latter to suppose that no change had occurred in his circumstances. The agent was fairly entitled to the information he requested, and the evasion of the debtor was such conduct as might be expected from one who was not disposed to deal fairly and impartially with his creditors.

That the brother knew that the debtor was so acting as to facilitate the former's purpose is evidenced by the signincant circumstance that the former delayed the entry of judgment and issuing execution for ten days after these steps might have been taken. He knew the debtor was carrying on his business apparently as usual, and selling from his stock in trade. He knew that the collection of his debt was daily becoming more precarious. Why was he so indifferent as to his security? If he was the diligent and unrelenting creditor that is to be believed, if his version of the whole transaction is true, why is it that for ten days after he could have seized the stock on the execution he neglected to do so? No explanation of this strange indifference to his interests is vouchsafed. His conduct is inconsistent with his whole theory of the transaction, and, in view of the other facts, is quite convincing evidence of the utter falsity of the narrative of the parties. In short, I cannot resist the conclusion that the parties had a brotherly understanding of the situation; that they were, in fact, acting in harmony and concert, and that the delay in seizing the property was because the ripe moment had not come. That the parties intended the creditor should get his pay, while the other creditors generally should not, and that the form of a hostile legal proceeding was adopted to secure this result, is obvious beyond a doubt. That the parties intended that the debtor should preserve a nice equilibrium between acquiescence and co-operation is probably true, but under such circumstances the role is so difficult that slight indicia suffice to show that it has failed. In such cases courts are justified in being critical to detect these indicia, and should accord them ample weight when discovered. Upon the evidence here I am satisfied not only that the parties intended a preference should be secured, under color of legal process, and that the debtor co-operated to secure this result, but also that the creditor anticipated and relied upon such co-operation. A decree is ordered denying the prayer of the petitioner, and the validity of his lien upon the fund, with costs of the proceeding.

BAKER v. BIDDLE.

Circuit Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. Oct. Term, 1831.

EQUITY — JURISDICTION — ADEQUATE REMEDY AT LAW—ANCILLARY RELIEF—PLEADING—BILL FOR DISCOVERY—DEMURRER TO JURISDICTION — BILL FOR ACCOUNT—STALE CLAIM—TRUSTS.

1. The sixteenth section of the judiciary act [1 Stat. 82] is a declaratory act, settling the law as to cases of equity jurisdiction, in the nature of a proviso, limitation, or exception to its exercise.

2. If the plaintiff has a plain, adequate, and complete remedy at law, the case is not a suit in equity under the constitution or the judiciary act.

3. There cannot be concurrent jurisdiction at law and in equity, where the right and remedy are the same, but equity may proceed in aid of the remedy at law by incidental or auxiliary relief, though not by final relief, if the remedy at law is complete. Its jurisdiction is special, limited, and defined, not as in England, where it depends on usage.

[Cited in Pierpont v. Fowle, Case No. 11,152.]

4. A bill for discovery does not lie for matter of which plaintiff has knowledge and means of proof, or of matter whereof he has the same means of information as the defendant (as public records). If such bill is sustained, it does not give power to make a final decree, if relief is not incidental to the discovery, where nothing is disclosed by the answer, or the whole equity of the bill is denied.

5. Though the rules and principles established in the English chancery at the revolution, are adopted in the federal courts, the changes since introduced there are not followed here, especially on matters of jurisdiction, as to which the sixteenth section is imperative.

[Cited in Pierpont v. Fowle, Case No. 11,152.]

6. An objection to jurisdiction for the want of parties, of equity in the bill, or of there being a remedy at law, need not be made by demurrer, plea, or in the answer; it may be made at the hearing, or on appeal.

[Cited in Pierpont v. Fowle, Case No. 11,152; Yeatman v. Bradford, 44 Fed. 538.]

7. A bill for an account does not lie, where an account has been rendered and received.

8. If an account is retained an unreasonable time without objection, it becomes in law and equity a stated or settled account, and a bar to an action or bill to account.

[Cited in Duryee v. Elkins, Case No. 4,197.]

[1] [Reported by Hon. Henry Baldwin, Circuit Justice.]

9. A bill to account lies only when an action to account lies at law, and when the case comes under some appropriate head of equity jurisdiction.

10. It does not lie on an agreement to procure an assignment of judgments for the use of the plaintiff, when he has evidence of the agreement, and compensation for the breach can be had in damages, nor where there has been a great lapse of time in asking it.

11. The staleness of a demand may be relied on at the hearing, though there is no plea, or demurrer, or the answer does not insist on it; equity acts by analogy, or rather in obedience to the statute of limitations on stale demands.

12. Equity has cognizance only of executory trusts, not of those executed, or where a trust can be enforced at law; there must be some act to be done by the trustee.

13. A trust once executed cannot be revived by the non execution of a trust resulting from a subsequent agreement relative to the same subject.

14. An agency closed wholly or on any distinct matter, as to which no act remains to be done by the agent, is not cognisable in equity, under the head of account or trust.

In equity. The substance of the case stated in the bill was the following. Valentine Eckert was the owner of a valuable farm in Berks county, on which there were heavy incumbrances by judgment; his son-in-law, Isaac Baker, who resided in Virginia, on the 27th of April 1819, caused 2800 dollars to be put into the hands of the defendant, to be so applied as to prevent a forced sale of the property, and to protect Baker from loss; that the trust was accepted by the defendant, who agreed to procure assignments of the judgments, which he was directed to pay out of the money he received. By the letters of the defendant from time to time received by Baker, he was informed of the proceedings of the defendant, which resulted in a sheriff's sale of the farm to him in 1821, for 10,200 dollars, of which he gave Baker notice, who confided in the assurances of the defendant, that the agreement to assign the judgments had been complied with until March 1823, when he found that he would lose the money advanced on the judgments, by their not having been assigned to him. On the 30th of April 1819, the defendant rendered an account, charging himself with the 2800 dollars, claiming credit for money paid on certain judgments therein specified, leaving a balance of 191 dollars to be applied to a debt due the Bank of Pennsylvania. Another account was furnished by the defendant after the sheriff's sale, by either of which he was indebted to Baker in a large balance. Baker made his will in 1829, appointing the plaintiff his executor, who demanded a settlement and payment of the balance, the defendant paid 1000 dollars on account, and offered to pay 695 dollars, the balance admitted to be due on receiving an indemnity against any claim on him by the creditors of Eckert, and exhibited a statement showing such balance. But this statement is inaccurate and unjust, as it gives Baker no credit for the judgments which were to have been transferred to him, and ought to have been paid to him out of the proceeds of the sale, leaving in the defendant's hands a large balance, the precise amount of which cannot be ascertained, inasmuch as the plaintiff has not a detailed account of costs and expenses and payments made by the defendant, for which balance he is accountable, but has refused to account though repeatedly applied to to do so, and denies that he ever agreed to procure assignments of the judgments he paid with Baker's money. The bill prays for a full answer to all the matters charged, whether the defendant did receive the 2800 dollars, and by means thereof procure the control of the sale of the farm, whether he assured Baker that he should have the benefit of the judgments he had paid, whether he did not cause the sale of the farm by execution, and by his silence confirm Baker's belief, that he was to be first paid his advances. That he may set forth the dates and amounts of the judgments which were liens on the farm, the amount he paid thereon, the time of payment, whether the balance in his hands was mixed with his other money, that he be decreed to account for all moneys or liabilities for which he is accountable to the estate of Baker, and pay the balance with interest, and for such further and other relief as the case requires.

The answer admits that Eckert owned the farm, states the judgments against him to be 13,900 dollars, admits the receipt on the 27th of April 1819 of the 2800 dollars, and a deed for the farm from Eckert to Baker dated 10th September 1818, for the consideration of 20,000 dollars acknowledged 23d of January 1819, which he had recorded at the request of the person who gave it to him. He also received a bond of J. G. to Baker on which there was then due 894 dollars; at the time of receipt of the money, defendant was directed to pay certain judgments against Eckert, and to apply the balance with the proceeds of the bond to other judgments, so as to induce the creditors not to press a sale, till Baker would have time to pay all judgments entered before the acknowledgement of the deed, and he applied the money accordingly. He avers that in receiving or paying the money, he did not conceive he was agent, attorney or trustee of Baker, or acting for him in any capacity whatever, that he was not and is not bound to account to him or his representatives therefor, but that he acted solely to serve Eckert and family, so as to enable them to profit by the sale to Baker. He denies that when the 2800 dollars was put into his hands, he was directed or requested to procure an assignment of the judgments he was directed to pay, or that he agreed or undertook to have it done, or that any intimation was given to him that such was the wish of Mr. Baker, the defendant believed that Baker rested on the security of the deed, and would pay the residue of the judgments. The bond of J. G. was due in July 1819 and defendant was directed to pay it to the judgment in which one Eesenbrier was plaintiff. The first communication received from Baker after April was a letter dated 24th of September 1819, directing the 2800 dollars to be entered on the judgments which had been paid, for the benefit of Baker, it being necessary then, as he was unable to pay all the judgments as he wished, and at the time agreed on for their payment, owing to the scarcity of money; that a sale of the farm was unavoidable, and had better be made by the sheriff. On the receipt of this letter defendant procured several of the judgments to be marked on the docket for the use of Baker, took out execution on one of them, levied on the farm and informed Baker by letter, who approved of what had been done, and desired the defendant to let him know the time of sale, this was done but Baker did not attend. The farm was sold and purchased by defendant in November 1821, he gave notice thereof to plaintiff and offered to convey it to him, but he declined, he also stated to him the appropriation of the purchase money to which no objections were made. He never received the money due by J. G., and delivered up the bond to the order of plaintiff, he never refused to settle with plaintiff or to pay him any balance in his hands, but on ascertaining the balance, authorized plaintiff to draw on him for 1000 dollars, paid that amount, forwarded him an account with such explanations as gave him a full account of what had been done. He afterwards offered to the plaintiff's counsel to correct any errors in the account, and put into his hands 695 dollars the balance of the account as stated by defendant to be paid plaintiff on his indemnifying defendant. He avers this account to be correct except an error of 131 dollars, which he is willing to pay on being indemnified; that he never undertook to have the judgments assigned, or assured Baker that they had been assigned so as to give him the benefit of them. The two accounts together with the usual affidavit were annexed to the answer. A great number of letters between the defendant and Isaac Baker were read, at the hearing several witnesses were examined, but there was nothing which varied the case as it appeared in the bill and answer, so far as affected the questions on which it was argued and decided. [Bill dismissed.]

Mr. Joseph R. Ingersoll, for complainant.

By the deed from V. Eckert to Isaac Baker, the testator had become the owner of the Moslem farm, either in his own right or as trustee for Eckert; the 2800 dollars was placed in defendant's hands for the purpose of paying such judgments as were liens before the date of the deed, and having been accepted by him he became a trustee for some one. Though he denies that it was for Baker, he admits the money was received from Baker to save the property, he was not bound or authorized to pay any judgment against Eckert after the deed took effect, as it not only would not tend to save, but would expose the property to be sacrificed on process by the elder creditors. Notwithstanding his denial, he has accounted to Baker and him only, has paid his executor 1000 dollars out of the money received from him, has paid judgments and marked them on the docket for his use, and paid for recording the deed out of his money; which acts estop defendant from denying the agency created between him and Baker. The relation of trustee and cestui que trust results by legal operation against his will. 1 Johns. Ch. 205; 2 P. Wms. 414. The result of this trust is, that he can do no act to the injury of Baker, or make any unauthorized application of his money, without liability to account to him, for all acts in which he did not acquiesce after being fully informed. 3 Swanst. 81. The money was advanced for a special purpose, and with special directions how to appropriate it, it was applied to other purposes inconsistent with those directions, besides which, the defendant acted as agent for others, whose interests were opposed to Mr. Baker, when it was his duty to have acted entirely for him, or to have renounced the agency, when he found it incompatible with his relations to others. His agency was limited, so as not to justify him in making any agreement to give a preference to any judgment, over those which were for the use of Baker, or to bind him to give any indemnity; he might use the money in his hands to effect the object, but when that could not be done, was bound to refund it. In October, 1819, on the faith of the money received on Gardiner's bond, he promised to procure an assignment of certain judgments to Baker, and wrote him he had done it, whereas it appears that it was not done and the money applied to other purposes, by which Baker has lost land and money: this is a breach of trust for which he is answerable to the amount misapplied, with interest.

Mr. Dunlap and Mr. J. C. Biddle, for respondent.

The answer denies any agreement to procure an assignment of the judgments, and being responsive to the bill is evidence, unless disproved by two witnesses; it is not pretended to have been made when the 2800 dollars was given to the defendant in April, 1819, nor was such pretence made till long afterwards. The receipt given for the money contained no such promise. the account rendered within four days afterwards and immediately received by Mr. Baker, stated the amount paid on those judgments, and no objections made to it. In directing defendant to pay these judgments, he was not requested to procure assignments; this was an afterthought in October following; having once paid the money on them, they could not be revived, or be held for the use of Mr. Baker so as to affect strangers; unless an assignment or entry for his use was made at the time of payment, they were satisfied and extinguished pro tanto. 1 Serg. & R. 399; 12 Serg. & R. 37, 41; 2 Rawle, 128. After the payment in April, Mr. Baker had no remedy under them by any subsequent act of defendant or the creditors, any undertaking of defendant in October, therefore, if made, was made under a mistake of the law, it was impossible to be performed so as to benefit Mr. Baker, and its non performance was no injury to him; but if there was a breach of an agreement, and damages have been sustained, the court has no jurisdiction. No fraud is alleged in the bill, the plaintiff had a full account before it was filed, nothing new is disclosed by the answer or evidence, the agency was special, its execution was stated twelve years before suit brought, so that if the plaintiff has any cause of action, it is at law where his remedy is complete, it is therefore not a case for equity. 1 Pet. C. C. 356, [Andrews v. Solomon, Case No. 378.] The sale of the property appears of record, the sheriff is accountable for the purchase money, so that without any resort to equity, the plaintiff has ample means of information, and can have full justice done him at law; besides he has disavowed the acts of defendant, which is a denial of any trust existing between them, and if there is any money due plaintiff from the proceeds of the sale, he must look to the sheriff. This court cannot decide on the rights of the judgment creditors in state courts, the court which issues the process for sale, makes the appropriation of the proceeds, according to their judgment on the priority of the respective judgments. A purchaser at sheriff's sale, is not accountable to the judgment creditor for the purchase money, it is paid to the sheriff, who brings it into court or appropriates it according to their order, and the priority of the liens on record. 14 Serg. & R. 257. The object of the plaintiff's bill, is to raise a trust by the purchase at sheriff's sale so as to make defendant accountable for a supposed balance, this is incompatible with any trust resulting from the receipt of the 2800 dollars, which was advanced for the purpose of preventing a sheriff's sale; they cannot, therefore, make out a trust for which defendant must account in equity. Being distinct transactions with distinct objects, they present separate causes of action at law, for acting either negligently in the execution of the agreement, or in violation of it, but neither transaction presents a case for equity. The defendant had accounted for the 2800 dollars before the alleged agreement to procure assignments; after the sheriff's sale, the priority of the judgment was no matter for account, or executory trusts, such as are alone cognizable in equity, there remained no act for defendant to do of which equity could compel the performance, it follows that the plaintiff's claim must rest in damages by a suit at law. But were this a case for equity, the staleness of the demand after an account had been rendered twelve years, would be a sufficient reason for its rejection. Jeremy, 548. This objection may be taken advantage of at any stage of the case. By the rules of chancery, and the twenty-third rule of the supreme court, we may set up any special matter in the answer, without demurrer or plea. On the case made out by the plaintiff, his remedy is complete at law, which, by the sixteenth section of the judiciary act, bars the jurisdiction of a court of equity; here is no case for a discovery, as the plaintiff had full knowledge before filing the bill, so that no discovery was necessary. 4 Wash. C. C. 349. [Mayer v. Foulkrod, Case No. 9,341.] If there was any mistake, it could be corrected at law. 2 Wash. C. C. 129. [Hurst v. Hurst, Case No. 6,932.] Where the legal remedy is fully adequate to the object, the sixteenth section applies, unless there are some special circumstances to take the case out of it,—2 Mason 270, [Bean v. Smith, Case No. 1,174;] [Russell v. Clark,] 7 Cranch, [11 U. S.] 89,—as in some cases of dower,—[Herbert v. Wren,] 7 Cranch, [11 U. S.] 370, 376,—the reforming a mistake in a contract,—[U. S. v. Howland,] 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 115,—or some defect in the remedy at law,—[Smith v. M'Iver,] 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 532. The want of jurisdiction is always open; a bill will be dismissed on this ground, after answer. [Fowle v. Lawrason,] 5 Pet. [30 U. S.] 503. It does not attach to a case of trust founded on mere allegation in the bill that there was a trust, or the receipt of money by one for the use of another, as a case for account. There must be some appropriate head of equity under which the obligation to account arises, (Jeremy, 504; 6 Ves. 140; 13 Ves. 131; 8 Ves. 193; 1 Brown, Ch. 194; 3 Brown, Ch. 137,) and some defect in the law, (1 Schoales & L. 205; 1 Ves. Jr. 416; 1 Ves. Sr. 161; 4 Brown, Parl. Cas. 436.) If assumpsit will lie, it is a case for law. Cary, 135, 139.

Mr. J. R. Ingersoll, in reply.

As the defendant has not pleaded, demurred, or set up in his answer the objection that the plaintiff has a remedy at law, it is now too late; the old practice was to plead it, then demur, or in the answer state that it would be relied on. Gilb. Ch. 220; Bunb. 29. It is too late to reserve it till the hearing,—2 Johns. Cas. 339,—because it is an acquiescence in the jurisdiction of equity, and prevents plaintiff from proceeding at law, having the same effect as an agreement to go on and settle the account,—2 Caines, Cas. 40, 52; 1 Wash. C. C. 320, [Gallagher v. Roberts, Case No. 5,194.] If there is no equity in the bill, defendant must demur. If the court has not jurisdiction, it must be pleaded. 1

Atk. 544; 13 Ves. 276. The objection cannot be taken at the hearing. 2 Vern. 483; 1 P. Wms. 477; 1 Ves. Sr. 446. The sixteenth section of the judiciary act, [1 Stat. 82] is only declaratory of the common law, affirming and adopting the rules of the English chancery, so it has been held by the supreme and circuit courts. 2 Mason, 270, [Bean v. Smith, Case No. 1,174;] 4 Wash. C. C. 204, 205, [Harrison v. Rowan, Id. 6,143;] [Robinson v. Campbell,] 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 221; [U. S. v. Howland,] 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 115; [Boyce v. Grundy,] 3 Pet. [28 U. S.] 215. The twenty-third rule only waives a plea or demurrer, and gives leave to set up special matter in the answer. Equity has jurisdiction of all cases of account, though courts of law may have a concurrent jurisdiction, (13 Ves. 278; 13 Price, 721; 2 Caines, Cas. 54; 10 Johns. 587; 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. 131, pl. 12,) as on a devise to pay debts and make distribution, (4 Johns. Ch. 651, 659,) cases of agency, as a supercargo, (Paley, Ag. 58.) So wherever the relation of principal and agent exists, a bill lies for an account, though the agency is gratuitously undertaken. 4 Madd. 198, (374,) 220, (417.) It lies whenever an action may be brought at law to account,—[Fowle v. Lawrason,] 5 Pet. [30 U. S.] 503,—where there are mutual accounts,—Paley, Ag. 55; 1 Petersd. Abr. 98; 2 Show. 301; 1 Holt, N. P. 500, 3 E. C. L. 172. So in all cases of money received for the use of another concurrently with assumpsit, (Kirby, 163, 164,) to have an account allowed, (3 Johns. Ch. 351,) and between landlord and tenant, (1 Schoales & L. 309.) Equity has jurisdiction of all trusts which are variable and flexible, for the execution of which no action lies at law, or where the accounts growing out of it are complicated. 2 Atk. 612; 1 Atk. 128. It is concurrent with law where the trust is executed, but exclusive when it is executory, or there is an open subsisting relation of trust between the parties. A plaintiff must show that the trust is executed, and a balance due, before he can sue at law for money had and received. 1 Holt, N. P. 500; 3 E. C. L. 172, note. So wherever the transaction partakes more of confidence than contract. 5 East, 449. Any person for whose benefit a trust is created, may come into equity. [Russell v. Clark,] 7 Cranch, [11 U. S.] 89. It gives relief on legal titles where deeds are suppressed. Hob. 109. It will continue to exercise its jurisdiction, though courts of law have recently given a remedy. 2 Swanst. 546, 580. Equity will sustain a bill against an attorney who acts for all parties, if he abuses his trust, (1 Schoales & L. 165,) so to compel a solicitor to deliver papers, (1 Russ. 519.) All trusts, though gratuitous and honorary, come within the cognizance of equity, whether they arise from agencies, or in cases of dower, partition, partnership, executors or administrators. 4 Johns. Ch. 651; 17 Johns. 384; 1 Fonbl. 23, note f; 2 Atk. 60; 3 P. Wms. 249; 5 Madd. 9; 3 Mason, 347, [Powell v. Monson & B. Manuf'g Co., Case No. 11,356;] 4 Wash. C. C. 349, [Mayer v. Foulkrod, Case No. 9,341.] In this case the receipt of the money made defendant a trustee to whoever owned it, liable to an account as between principal and agent, the account was demanded and refused, the uncertainty of the arrangements made by defendant, the inaccuracy of defendant's statements, which required correction, the remedy at law being doubtful, attended with great delay if pursued, all which circumstances make it a proper case for equity. In sustaining this bill the rights of no third person will be affected, between the parties equity will consider that as done which defendant undertook to do by an assignment of the judgments; had this been done the plaintiff would have been in the situation of a surety, entitled to the benefit of such judgments, (1 Atk. 133,) or of bail who pays money for his principal, (2 Vern. 608,) though the suretyship was voluntary, as by indorsement, (2 Bin. 382; 2 Madd. 570.) A judgment creditor who pays prior judgment with the intention of becoming the assignee, shall have the benefit of it, as such payment is no extinguishment when equity requires it to be kept alive. 10 Serg. & R. 404; 2 Rawle, 128. As a surety Mr. Baker had all the rights of these judgment creditors against the principal. 1 Johns. Ch. 412; 2 Johns. Ch. 554; 4 Johns. Ch. 121; 1 Gall. 32, [Hunt v. U. S., Case No. 6,900;] 10 Ves. 412; 11 Ves. 22; 14 Ves. 162. It therefore cannot be relied on by defendant that Mr. Baker shall have no benefit from the judgments of which he agreed to procure the assignments; that he was mistaken in point of law is no defence. [Hunt v. Rhodes,] 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 1, &c. Hence arises the trust, the money paid in April 1819 was to be refunded to Mr. Baker out of the proceeds of the sheriff's sale, this was prevented by the conduct of the defendant, in consequence of which the original trust was revived, and not having been executed according to the agreement, we may enforce it in equity by claiming an account, and payment of the balance. The objection founded on the lapse of time must be pleaded or insisted on in the answer, (2 Madd. Ch. Pr.; 1 Atk. 494; [Prevost v. Gratz,] 6 Wheat. [19 U. S.] 497,) as where the statute of limitations is relied on; its application by analogy is in the discretion of the court, here is no pretence of limitation as defendant has paid 1000 dollars within two years.

Before BALDWIN, Circuit Justice, and HOPKINSON, District Judge.

BALDWIN, Circuit Justice. The first question made in this cause is jurisdiction, which is an important one that ought to be settled to prevent its recurrence in other cases. By the second section of the third article of the constitution, the judicial power of the United States is extended to all cases in equity[2] between persons therein described; it also authorizes congress to establish inferior courts. In execution of this power circuit courts have been established by the judiciary act of 1798, [1 Stat. 73,] with jurisdiction over all cases in equity, by the eleventh section, but it must be exercised within the limits prescribed by the organic law creating this power, and confined to the cases and subjects defined. [Marbury v. Madison,] 1 Cranch, [5 U. S.] 173; [U. S. v. More,] 3 Cranch, [7 U. S.] 172; [U. S. v. Hudson,] 7 Cranch, [11 U. S.] 32; [Shirras v. Caig,] Id. 44; [U. S. v. Goodwin,] Id. 108; [U. S. v. Gordon,] Id. 287; [Martin v. Hunter,] 1 Wheat. [14 U. S.] 337; [Cohens v. Virginia,] 6 Wheat. [19 U. S.] 395; [M'Clung v. Silliman,] Id. 604; [Osborn v. Bank of U. S.,] 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 820; [Williams v. Norris,] 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 117; [Montgomery v. Hernandez,] Id. 131; [Connor v. Featherstone,] Id. 203. By the sixteenth section of this act it is declared, that "suits in equity shall not be sustained in either of the courts of the United States, in any case where plain, adequate and complete remedy may be had at law." 1 Story, Const. 59. It has been decided by the supreme court that this section introduced no rule, but was declaratory of the common law. [Boyce v. Grundy,] 3 Pet. [28 U. S.] 215. So this court must take it; but we must give it the effect of a declaratory law, which is to declare it for the past and settle it for the future. Vide 4 Co. Inst. 87; Keb. St. 807; 2 Ruffh. St. 539. "Whereas some question hath of late risen, whether &c; for declaration whereof, and in avoiding such question hereafter, be it enacted and declared, that the common law of this realm is, and always was, and ought to be taken." Such is the form and effect of a statute declaratory of the common law, so taking the sixteenth section it is a proviso, a limitation and exception to the jurisdiction of the court, declaring that the case defined is not a suit in equity, cognizable under the eleventh section.

There can be no doubt of the power of congress to define what should be a case in equity, by declaring what the common law was, which drew the line between the courts of law and equity, nor that when declared, it was obligatory upon all the federal courts, by super-adding the authority of the legislature to that of the common law, so as not to leave the line of separation discretionary with the judges. To give any other effect to a declaratory law than settling a rule and standard for all cases coming within it, would annul it, for if it leaves the common law as it was before, doubtful or discretionary in any way with the court, it is to all intents and purposes a dead letter.

In looking to the seventh amendment to the constitution, proposed by congress at the same session as the judiciary act, their intention is most manifest to connect the sixteenth section with this amendment, which declares that "in suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved." By the adoption of this amendment, the people of the states and congress have declared, that the right of jury trial shall depend neither on legislative or judicial discretion. There were two modes in which this right might be impaired: 1. by an organization of courts in such a manner as not to secure it to suitors; 2. by authorizing courts to exercise, or their assumption of equity or admiralty jurisdiction over cases at law; this amendment preserves the right of jury trial, against any infringement by any department of the government, and the sixteenth section prohibits all courts from sustaining a suit in equity where the remedy is complete at law. Connecting this with the ninth section, directing the trial of all issues in fact in the district court to be by jury, with the twelfth, giving the same directions in cases in the circuit court, and the thirteenth in the supreme court, the judiciary act was intended to preserve a right deemed too invaluable and sacred to be left to any other guardianship than the supreme law of the land.

When congress intended to make an exception, it was declared, in the ninth section, "except civil causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction;" in the twelfth, "except those of equity, and of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction;" in the thirteenth, the provision extended only to "actions at law." It thus became necessary to define what were "suits in equity so excepted;" this was done by the sixteenth section, so that to bring a case within the exception, it must be, 1. a suit of equity jurisdiction; 2. a suit in which a complete remedy cannot be had at law, for if such remedy could be had, then it was a "suit at common law," within the seventh amendment.

This view of the constitution and law is the same as taken by the supreme court. "It is well known that in civil cases in courts of equity and admiralty juries do not intervene, and that courts of equity use the trial by jury only in extraordinary cases, to inform the conscience of the court; when, therefore, we find the amendment requires that the right of trial by jury shall be preserved 'in suits at common law,' the natural conclusion is, that the distinction was present in the minds of the framers of the amendment. By common law they meant what the constitution denominated in the third article, 'law,' not merely suits which the common law recognises among its old and settled proceedings, but suits in which legal rights were to be determined and ascertained, in contradistinction to those where equitable rights alone were recognised, and equitable remedies were administered, or where, as in the admiralty, a mixture of public law, and of maritime law and equity, was often found in the same suit." Parsons v. Bedford, 3 Pet. [28 U. S.] 446, 447. Taking the amendment, the law, and their construction as the one law, it follows, that whenever a court of law is competent to take cognizance of a right, and has power to proceed to a final judgment, which affords a remedy, plain, adequate and complete, without the aid of a court of equity, the plaintiff must proceed at law, because the defendant has a constitutional right of trial by jury. If the right is only an equitable one, or, if legal, the remedy is only equitable, or both legal and equitable, partaking of the character of both, and a court of law is unable to afford a remedy according to its old and settled proceedings, commensurate with the right, the suit for its assertion may be in equity. This distinction is strongly illustrated in a case on the occupying claimant law of Ohio, directing compensation to be made for improvements on land recovered by ejectment, to be ascertained by commissioners appointed by the court which tried the cause. The supreme court held the law valid so far as respected the right of compensation, but unconstitutional as respected the mode of ascertainment, inasmuch as the circuit courts of the United States, in a suit at law, must submit every question of fact to a jury. Bank of Hamilton v. Dudley, 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 492, 525.

The tests of the relative jurisdiction over suits at law and equity are, 1. the subject matter, 2. the relief, 3. its application, 4. the competency of a court of law to afford it; their application is not to be regulated by the decision of state or foreign courts, where their judicial system is organized on principles wholly inconsistent with a federal government of limited jurisdiction in all its departments. All the courts of the United States are of limited jurisdiction, which, whether appellate or original, must be exercised in the mode pointed out by the constitution, an act of congress directing a different mode is void. [Marbury v. Madison,] 1 Cranch, [5 U. S.] 175. Their jurisdiction is special, limited to certain cases, the facts necessary to its exercise must appear on the record, or their judgment is erroneous, as in inferior courts in England,—1 Saund. 174; 1 Ves. Sr. 204,—though their proceedings are not nullities, because their jurisdiction does not appear,—[Kempe v. Kennedy,] 5 Cranch, [9 U. S.] 184, 185. An enumeration of cases on which the federal courts may act, is an exclusion of all others. [Marbury v. Madison,] 1 Cranch, [5 U. S.] 174; [U. S. v. More,] 3 Cranch, [7 U. S.] 172; [Durousseau v. U. S.,] 6 Cranch, [10 U. S.] 313; [U. S. v. Hudson,] 7 Cranch, [11 U. S.] 32; [M'Clung v. Silliman,] 6 Wheat. [19 U. S.] 603; [Osborn v. Bank of U. S.,] 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 820; [Montgomery v. Hernandez,] 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 132. A legislative exception from its appellate constitutional power is implied from a legislative affirmative description of the powers of the court. [Durousseau v. U. S.,] 6 Cranch, [10 U. S.] 314. If the law describes the power in general terms, embracing the case, without making any exception, it will be liberally construed and acted on. [Wilson v. Mason,] 1 Cranch, [5 U. S.] 91; [Cohens v. Virginia,] 6 Wheat. [19 U. S.] 400. But a strict construction is adopted in other cases. [Wiscart v. Dauchy,] 3 Dall. [3 U. S.] 324; [U. S. v. Goodwin,] 7 Cranch, [11 U. S.] 110. These are the rules on which the supreme court acts, whether on an appeal, writ of error, or a certificate of division. [Cohens v. Virginia,] 6 Wheat. [19 U. S.] 363; [U. S. v. Daniel,] Id. 547; [Wayman v. Southard,] 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 20; [Montgomery v. Hernandez,] 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 132. So as to the appellate jurisdiction of the circuit court, the time, the manner of its exercise, and its process must be subject to the absolute legislative control of congress. [Martin v. Hunter,] 1 Wheat. [14 U. S.] 349; S. P., [The Caroline v. U. S.,] 7 Cranch, [11 U. S.] 500; [Patterson v. U. S.,] 2 Wheat. [15 U. S.] 225. It cannot have been intended to leave the original equity jurisdiction, subject to different rules, or capable of being exercised in opposition to them.

State courts are organized on contrary principles; the supreme court of this state has all the powers of the court of exchequer, common pleas and king's bench. 1 Dall. Laws, 180. So has the supreme court of New York. 6 Johns. 280. In England the "king hath delegated his whole judicial power to the judges," "all matters of judicature according to his laws." 4 Co. Inst. 70, 74; St. 20 Edw. III. c. 1; 1 Ruffh. St. 246. Hence the jurisdiction of the courts was general and supreme over all matters subject to their respective cognizances. That of the court of chancery proceeding secundum equum et bonum, was original, not delegated. 4 Co. Inst. 73, 74. It is difficult to discover its origin. Mitf. Eq. Pl. 1. It can be traced to no act of parliament, but had existed time out of mind, it had become very extensive, and being extraordinary, was governed by no certain rules. 4 Co. Inst. 89. It extends to all cases not taken from it, and transferred to some other court of equity. Professing to act only in aid of the law in curing its defects, chancery adopted a general rule, not to interfere where the remedy at law was complete, but have not always adhered to it; the only test of jurisdiction being usage, they would not suffer it to be arrested because courts of common law gave the same relief. 3 Brown, Ch. 73, 224; 2 Caines, Cas. 40; 5 Ves. 784. Repeated attempts were made by the commons of England, to define and limit this jurisdiction "to such cases as have no remedy by the common law," but were defeated by the king's answer, "the usages heretofore shall stand so as the king's royalty be saved." 4 Co. Inst. 82, 83. Chancery has thus been left to define its own jurisdiction, by its own usages and precedents, never giving up what it had once exercised, and struggling for its extension over cases cognisable at law; courts of law too, judging likewise of their own jurisdiction, have in modern times assumed the powers of equity, so that from their respective decisions it has become difficult to draw the line between them. 2 Schoales & L. 630; 6 Ves. 86; 7 Ves. 18; 2 Eq. Cas. Abr. 382; Prec. Ch. 111, 244; 4 Brown, Ch. 296; 2 Ves. Jr. 122; 7 Mod. 43; 2 Ld. Raym. 785; 3 Durn. & E. [Term R.] 53, 151.

To avoid the confusion arising from this conflicting struggle for jurisdiction, between the different courts of common law and equity, congress vested the powers of both courts in the circuit courts, and did what the commons of England could not effect, prohibited their exercise of equity powers, in cases where the legal remedy was complete. Usage therefore is no test of jurisdiction in the federal courts, they cannot act (in the language of Buller, Justice,) as the lord chancellor does "in the plentitude of his power," (3 Durn. & E. [Term R.] 161,) but must proceed by the line drawn by the constitution, the law and the supreme court. It is no excuse for disregarding it, because courts of equity elsewhere act on another rule; as a matter of constitutional right, a defendant is entitled to a jury trial on an issue of fact in a suit at common law, and to his oath in his answer to a bill in equity, of which he cannot be deprived at the option of a plaintiff. 6 Ves. 184. It is enough for the purposes of justice, that one tribunal is open to every party, competent to give a remedy for every wrong; he ought to be compelled to resort to that which is appropriate to his case, and ask his remedy with the incidents attached to it. This court has been organised on this principle, with limited powers, it cannot sustain a suit at law on an equitable right only, adjudge a remedy appropriate only to equity, or sustain a suit in equity on a mere legal right, for which the law affords a complete remedy. [Graves v. Boston Marine Ins. Co.,] 2 Cranch, [6 U. S.] 444. This has been made our duty by a more imperative and safe rule than the usage or discretion of a chancellor.

A case however may be sustained in equity on a legal right, if the object and nature of the remedy sought are equitable. 10 Ves. 14. The rights and rules of property are the same at law as in equity, the remedy for their violation is different; if damages are sought for a breach of contract, it must be by a suit at law, if a specific execution is asked, it must be in equity, so to annul and set it aside for fraud. [Hepburn v. Dunlop,] 1 Wheat. [14 U. S.] 197. The right may be clear at law, but as a court of law cannot by assuming cognizance of the conscience act on the person of a party,—1 Ves. Sr. 446, —if the remedy is doubtful, difficult, not adequate to the object, not so complete as in equity,—[Osborn v. Bank of U. S.,] 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 842,—not so efficient and practicable to the ends of justice and its prompt administration, the sixteenth section does not preclude the jurisdiction of equity,—[Boyce v. Grundy,] 3 Pet. [28 U. S.] 215. Nor where it is necessary to bring before the court, persons who are interested or actors in the case, though not parties to the suit, and cannot be made parties to a suit at law,—[Osborn v. Bank of U. S.,] 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 843, 844;—where the competency of law falls short of the equum et bonum of the case,—4 Wash. C. C. 352; [Mayer v. Foulkrod, Case No. 9,341;]—where there is some difference in the remedy, and some equitable circumstances calling for its application, [Smith v. M'Iver,] 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 534, 535. But there must be some head or branch of equity jurisdiction under which the case comes, independently of the remedy being more complete. 4 Wash. C. C. 206; [Harrison v. Rowan, Case No. 6,143;] [Herbert v. Wren,] 7 Cranch, [11 U. S.] 376; [Osborn v. Bank of U. S.,] 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 842; 1 Ves. Jr. 423. In such cases equity acts to supply the defects of the law as to the remedy to which the party is entitled, and will administer its own appropriate relief by a final decree on the whole merits because cognizance cannot be effectually taken at law. 1 Schoales & L. 205.

When the jurisdiction of equity attaches, the extent of its exercise depends on the nature and object of the suit, if required only as preliminary, or auxiliary to a legal remedy, its power ceases when that is effected by the aid of equity; a subpoena in equity does not operate like a capias from the king's bench with a clause of ac etiam, or a quo minus in the exchequer, to draw from law, the cognizance of legal rights or legal remedies, when an auxiliary relief was alone called for,—3 Conn. 140, 170,—or be abused as a pretext for bringing causes proper for a court of law into equity, —[Russell v. Clark,] 7 Cranch, [11 U. S.] 89. A bill for discovery, for instance, must present a case of defect of proof,—1 Wash. C. C. 129, [Carson v. Jennings, Case No. 2,464,]—and relief must be an incident or consequence of the discovery, or the party after obtaining it will be sent to law for his final remedy,—3 P. Wms. 150; 2 Brown, Ch. 61; 1 Brown, Ch. 194; 6 Ves. 689; 3 Conn. 140, 170. Equity will not render a final decree in a case of fraud, unless the object of the bill is to obtain something besides mere compensation,—[Boyce v. Grundy,] 3 Pet. [28 U. S.] 221,—nor on an injunction, unless the object is to arrest the injury and prevent the wrong,—[Osborn v. Bank of U. S.,] 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 845,—or on a bill for an account, unless the justice of the case appears on the account,—1 Schoales & L. 308, 309. If the question of discovery, fraud, injunction, or account, involves the essence and merits of the whole case, as to right and remedy, and the court is competent to decide on the one and administer the other, it will, when put in possession of the materials to enable it to make a final decree, proceed to make it, to avoid multiplicity of suits. 3 Atk. 263; Amb. 541; 10 Johns. 596. So where a contract is made by fraud and imposition or the like, equity gives relief, which the law cannot, and having thus possession of the principal question, makes a final decree on the question and equity of the whole case. [Hepburn v. Dunlop,] 1 Wheat. [14 U. S.] 197. The court being once rightly in possession of the whole cause, will determine the controversy, although in its progress it may decree on a matter which was cognizable at law. [Cathcart v. Robinson,] 5 Pet. [30 U. S.] 278; [Wilson v. Mason,] 1 Cranch, [5 U. S.] 89. But if the answer to a bill of discovery confesses nothing, furnishes no evidence in favour of a plaintiff's claim, and denies the whole equity of the bill, this ground of jurisdiction is totally withdrawn from the case. [Russell v. Clark,] 7 Cranch, [11 U. S.] 89, 90. The rule resulting from these cases is plain and intelligible, the principal question in a cause is the cause itself; a court of equity once having cognizance of it, would not send the party back to law to settle its incidents; nor if the incidents only are before them, would they take the substance of the controversy from law.

It was a well established rule of chancery before the American revolution, to sustain a bill for discovery where they could not give the relief prayed for; if the plaintiff was entitled to a discovery, and not to relief, the defendant must answer the former, and might demur to the latter, but a general demurrer was uniformly overruled, if the plaintiff was entitled to an answer to either. Mitf. Eq. Pl. 148; 1 Ves. Sr. 248; 2 Caines, Cas. 176; 10 Ves. 553; 2 Brown, Ch. 281; 8 Ves. 2; 2 Atk. 44, 157, 284, 289; 2 Ves. Sr. 357. This rule was adopted in the United States and yet prevails. 2 Caines, Cas. 177; 1 Johns. Cas. 434, 435. It was changed in England in 1787, 1788, by Lord Thurlow, and a new one introduced which has been followed since. That a demurrer if good to the relief, is good to the discovery, if the discovery is sought for the purpose of the relief, (1 Madd. Ch. Pr. 216; 10 Ves. 553; 2 Brown, Ch. 280, 319;) a plaintiff is not entitled to discovery, if he goes on to pray relief to which he is not entitled, and a general demurrer is good to both, (4 Brown, Ch. 480; 2 Ves. Jr. 517; 3 Ves. 7; 6 Ves. 63; 11 Ves. 510.) The only reason given for so important a change in chancery proceedings is, that it was a hardship on a defendant to pay the expense of a long copy, when there was only a right to a discovery, and not be able to avoid it by a general demurrer. 2 Brown, Ch. 281.

Trivial as the reasons are, the rule affects the jurisdiction of the court most materially; if a general demurrer is allowed they cannot proceed, if overruled they can act on the whole case, thus doing away the distinction between incidental and final relief, and the cases where the principal question is before them, the essence and substance of the case, or only its incidents or an incidental question. A similar reason has led to an assumption of equity jurisdiction in account, wherever the relation of principal and agent exists, in the case cited by the plaintiff's counsel, because a "plaintiff can only learn from the discovery of the defendant how they have acted in the execution of their agency; and it would be most unreasonable that he should pay them for that discovery if it turned out that they had abused his confidence: yet such must be the case if a bill for relief did not lie." 4 Madd. 199, (Amer. Ed.) 220; Id. (Eng. Ed.) 376, 416; 1 Madd. Ch. Pr. 217. It is an old rule of chancery that plaintiff pays the costs of a bill for discovery though defendant resists it, (Bunb. 124; 1 Atk. 286; 4 Ves. 746,) though Justice Buller ruled otherwise, (1 Ves. Jr. 423;) yet it was never made a pretext for extending its jurisdiction till 1819. As costs are discretionary in equity, (1 Ch. Cas. 106; 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. 125; 2 Atk. 111; 1 Madd. 190,) the justice of the case could have been better answered by altering the rule as to the costs, than to make jurisdiction and final relief a mere incident to costs. In the rule of Lord Thurlow there is still less reason, for though the defendant pays the costs of a copy in the first instance, he charges it in his bill against the plaintiff. Ch. Cas. 106. Such are the pretexts for the assumption of jurisdiction when its extent and exercise depend on mere discretion, than which there can be no better reason for a statutory definition. Be the rule however as it may in England, or founded on solid or trivial reasons, it cannot be adopted by the courts of the United States; a check has wisely been provided against the assumption of equity jurisdiction by any new rule in English courts since the Revolution, (vide [Cathcart v. Robinson,] 5 Pet. [30 U. S.] 280,) especially those which depend on the discretionary power of the court over costs. No such principle has been sanctioned by the supreme court in the cases cited by plaintiff's counsel, they have decided that the acts of congress distinguishing cases at law from those in equity, refer to the principles settled in England before their passage, and not to the practice in the state courts. [Robinson v. Campbell,] 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 221; 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 115; [Fullerton v. Bank of U. S.,] 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 613. In the words of Judge Washington, the judiciary act adopts the long established principles of the court of chancery on the subject of equity jurisdiction. 4 Wash. C. C. 205, [Harrison v. Rowan, Case No. 6,143;] 4 Wash. C. C. 354, [Mayer v. Foulkrod, Id. 9,341.] It follows that new rules subversive of established principles and practice are excluded. Vide [Vattier v. Hinde,] 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 274.

It is contended by plaintiff's counsel, that the want of jurisdiction on the ground of there being a remedy at law ought to be by demurrer or plea, and comes too late after an answer. As a demurrer admits the facts of the bill, and can introduce no new ones, it presents only the question whether defendant shall answer it. Mitf. Eq. Pl. 86, 87. It denies the equity of the bill, as a demurrer to a declaration denies the cause of action, but at law the defendant may move in arrest of judgment, or assign error for the same cause, as the defect is not cured by verdict or judgment. [Tiernan v. Jackson,] 5 Pet. [30 U. S.] 585. There is no reason why a demurrer should be necessary in equity more than at law. It would be a hardship to compel the defendant in this case to admit the fact stated in the bill, that he undertook to procure an assignment of certain judgments to the plaintiffs, as the jurisdiction and relief might be consequent upon it; whereas, by denying it in his answer, the plaintiff would be out of court if he did not prove that fact. The difference between a demurrer at law and in equity is this, a judgment on a demurrer at law, if against a defendant, is final and peremptory, he puts it in at his risk, and the judgment is a perpetual bar; if a demurrer is overruled in equity, the defendant must answer over, but may insist on the same matter in his answer, (2 Atk. 284; 3 P. Wms. 94; 2 Ves. Sr. 492,) being the same as a respondeas ouster at law, (1 Caines, Cas. 7.) If the demurrer is allowed in equity, it is a bar and goes to the merits. 1 Atk. 544. In general if a demurrer would hold to a bill, the court will not grant relief though the defendant answers. 6 Ves. 686; 2 Jac. & W. 151. It will be done in some cases, but they are rare. Mitf. Eq. Pl. 87, (New York Ed.) The ground of a demurrer is, that the bill does not disclose a case which entitles the plaintiff to the relief prayed for; if the bill does not state or the plaintiff does not make out such case at the hearing, or on an issue, or by the answer, he cannot have a decree; the want of equity in the bill is fatal to the plaintiff's relief; although a demurrer or plea might have availed the defendant, he is not precluded by answering, and the precedents to this point are numerous. 3 P. Wms. 256, 257; 1 Ch. Cas. 144, 147; 2 Brown, Ch. 338, 340, 519; 4 Brown, Ch. 180, 198; 2 Ves. Jr. 56, 60; Comyn. 612; 1 Brown, Ch. 29, 201; 1 Atk. 451; 3 P. Wms. 94; 2 Ves. Sr. 493. After plea overruled he may answer to the same matter, or set it up in a second answer after the first has been overruled. 2 Ves. Sr. 492. The rare cases referred to in Mitford are North v. Earl & Countess of Stafford, 3 P. Wms. 148, 150, where the lord chancellor allowed a demurrer, but said he would have relieved on the hearing if there had been no demurrer; this dictum applied to the particular case, the defendant had demurred to the relief and not to the discovery, and the plaintiff was at liberty to except, to amend his bill, and force defendant to discover. The others were the Rector of Sherrington's Case, and the Case of Pickering, referred to in a note of the reporter in Brewster v. Kidgell, 12 Mod. 171, in which it is said, that the difference between granting and refusing relief in the exchequer depended on there being a demurrer. As the case of Brewster v. Kidgell is reported in Holt, 669; Carth. 438; Comb. 424, 466; 5 Mod. 369, 374; 1 Salk. 198; 2 Salk. 615; 3 Salk. 340; 1 Ld. Raym. 317, 322,—without noticing this point, little if any weight is due to this note of the reporter as evidence of a general rule, and his statement of the cases is too imperfect to ascertain their circumstances.

The counsel of the plaintiff relies upon a rule laid down by Lord Chief Baron Gilbert, that after answering, a defendant cannot object that the plaintiff's remedy is at law; this rule however appears by the text and cases cited, to be applied to the cases of bills filed for relief on deeds, bonds, or other papers, which have been lost or destroyed. Gilb. Ch. 50, 51, 52; 2 Mod. 173; 1 Ch. Cas. 11, 231; 1 Vern. 59, 180, 247. These bills are of two descriptions. 1. Such as pray only for relief, auxiliary to a final remedy at law, by a decree for a discovery and re-execution of the deed. 2. Such as, in addition, pray for payment of the money due; in the former an affidavit of the loss or destruction is necessary, in the latter not. Mitf. Eq. Pl. 42, 43. The reason of the difference is this, that if the matter of the bill is within the jurisdiction of the court, the plaintiff need not make affidavit that he hath not the writings, but if it be to give the court jurisdiction then he must. 2 Eq. Cas. Abr. 13, pl. 1; 2 Freem. 71, pl. 83. As a plaintiff cannot recover on a lost deed at law, it is a clear case for equity to supply the defect in aid of the law; when this is done by a decree for discovery and re-execution, the power of equity is functus officio, for then the remedy is complete at law to enforce payment, and a demurrer admitting the loss admits the jurisdiction to supply the defect. But as a decree for payment takes the final remedy from law to equity, there must be an affidavit to give jurisdiction for payment; if not made and the defendant denies the deed, he may demur, because he has a right to have it tried by a jury. If the deed is confessed in the answer, he cannot demur to the relief, as it is iniquitous to afterwards litigate it on an issue at law of non est factum, and he has nothing to do but to pay the money; so if he denies the deed without demurring, and it is proved by two witnesses. Gilb. Ch. 50, 51, 52, 219, 220; Mitf. Eq. Pl. 42. These principles are supported by the adjudged cases cited by Gilbert and

2 P. Wms. 541; 3 Atk. 17, 132; 3 Anstr. 859, 861; they apply however only to this class of cases, which are governed by appropriate rules, not interfering with those adopted in ordinary cases. The nature of a bill on a lost deed necessarily makes it an exception to the general rule, of which this case is an illustration; for here it is admitted and cannot be controverted, that a demurrer would be good if the plaintiff has a complete remedy at law, (3 Brown, Parl. Cas. 525,) whereas it would be overruled, if this was a bill on a lost bond with an affidavit annexed. In this case, as the answer admits or discloses nothing, which gives any jurisdiction independently of the allegations of the bill, the defendant is not put to his demurrer; nor is the case in the bill one in which the plaintiff was bound to make affidavit, in order to give jurisdiction to equity, or where any affidavit if made to any fact set forth, would authorize a transfer of the final remedy from a court of law, if it was a case for law without such affidavit. It has been thought proper to notice the rule in Gilbert the more particularly, as it was much pressed in the argument, and was the basis of the opinion of the judges in Ludlow v. Simonds, referred to hereafter. Admitting this rule as an exception in peculiar cases, we cannot hesitate in giving our opinion, that the established general rule of chancery is as laid down by Lord Eldon; "if you could have demurred to the bill, the court will not make a decree at the hearing;" the exception is, "if the defendant has the vouchers, so that the plaintiff cannot go on at law, and then the observation applies, that wanting discovery, the court gives relief particularly in matters of account." 6 Ves. 686. Here the plaintiff asks for final relief, which must be denied him unless at the hearing he has made out a case of equity jurisdiction. It is next contended that this objection must be made by a plea to the jurisdiction of the court.

A plea differs from a demurrer in this, the latter is on the ground that the case is not cognizable in any court of equity, and can set up no new matter; a plea must set up matter not in the bill, some new fact as a reason why the bill should be delayed, dismissed, or not answered, or it will be overruled. Mitf. Eq. Pl. 177, 179; Beames, 2, 7; 2 Madd. (Amer. Ed.) 346. A plea to the jurisdiction does not deny the plaintiff's right, or that it is not a matter proper for the cognizance of equity, but that the court of chancery is not the proper one to decide it. Mitf. Eq. Pl. 180; Beames, 57. It admits the case to be of equity jurisdiction, but asserts that some other court of equity can afford the remedy. This must be shown by matter set up in the plea, because the court of chancery being one of general jurisdiction in equity, an exception must be made out by the party who claims an exemption in order to arrest it. Mitf. Eq. Pl. 183; Beames, 57, 91; 1 Vern. 59; 2 Vern. 433; 1 Ves. Sr. 264. But if no circumstance can give jurisdiction to the court of chancery, no plea is necessary, a demurrer is good. The objection that the case belongs to another court of equity cannot be taken by demurrer. It must be by plea, (1 Atk. 544; Mitf. Eq. Pl. 123, 124; Beames, 100, 101; 1 Saund. 74,) showing what court has cognizance of the case, that it is a court of equity and can give the plaintiff a remedy, (1 Vern. 59; 1 Dickens, 129; 3 Brown, Ch. 301; 1 Ves. Sr. 203; 2 Ves. Sr. 357.) It is in the nature of a plea in abatement at law which cannot be put in after general imparlance, or received when it does not give the plaintiff a better writ. 1 Com. Dig. 151, (146, 147;) 1 P. Wms. 477; Beames, 92, 93; 1 Ves. Sr. 203, 204. The analogy however does not run throughout. Lord Hardwicke says, in Penn v. Baltimore, "First the point of jurisdiction ought in order to be considered: and though it comes late I am not unwilling to consider it. To be sure a plea to the jurisdiction must be offered in the first instance, and put in primo die; and answering submits to the jurisdiction; much more when there is a proceeding to a hearing on the merits, which would be conclusive at common law: yet a court of equity which can exercise a more liberal discretion than common law courts, if a plain defect of jurisdiction appears at the hearing will no more make a decree than where a plain want of equity appears." 1 Ves. Sr. 446, S. P., 3 Atk. 589; Beames, 56.

We have been much pressed with a contrary principle laid down by high authority, in Ludlow v. Simond, 2 Caines, Cas. 40, 51, 56; 2 Johns. Ch. 369; 4 Johns. Ch. 290. But it is not supported by the cases referred to, and is much shaken by subsequent opinions of the same judges who asserted it. Vide 9 Johns. 493, by Mr. Justice Thompson, who remarked, "This objection ought not to be very favourably received in this stage of the cause," by Chief Justice Kent, who does not notice this point in his opinion, (9 Johns. 505,) and by Judge Spencer, who had previously given his opinion, that the bill ought to be dismissed, (9 Johns. 504.) In 2 Johns. Ch. 369, Chancellor Kent rests his opinion solely on 2 Caines, Cas. 40, 56, in 4 Johns. Ch. 290, he repeats the rule as a general one, referring to 1 Johns. Cas. 434; 2 Johns. Cas. 431; 10 Johns. 595, 596,—in neither of which cases is the rule referred to laid down by any of the judges. In Ludlow v. Simond, Kent, J., quoted 1 Atk. 128; 1 Ves. Sr. 331; 3 Brown, Parl. Cas. 525; Mitford passim; Gilb. Ch. 51, 53, 219, 221; 1 Ves. Sr. 446,[3] neither of which support the position; hence he omits any reference to these cases in his two subsequent opinions in chancery, relying on the rule as one established in New York, by the case of Ludlow v. Simond which was decided in 1805.

In LeRoy v. Servis, Judge Benson, in delivering the opinion of the court of errors in 1801, laid down the rule of chancery to be, "For it is to be remarked that a defendant does not waive or forego a single advantage as to the merits, or the point whether the plaintiff has equity, by not demurring. He may equally insist on the same matter by the answer, which he may have done by the demurrer; and if he should omit them in the answer, he may still avail himself in argument on the final hearing of the case. 1 Caines, Cas. 1, 7; 2 Caines, Cas. 176, 182. Decisive as are the terms of this opinion, it was overlooked in 1805, and a local rule to the contrary laid down, which we cannot follow when it is in opposition to the established course of equity.

The true rule as laid down by Judge Benson is analogous to proceedings at law, where an objection is made that the plaintiff's remedy is in equity. In Pasley v. Freeman, 3 Durn. & E. [Term R.] 53, the question whether an action founded on a fraud, could be sustained at law, was decided on a motion for a new trial; so in Read v. Brookman, whether a plaintiff could recover on a lost deed, was decided on a demurrer to the declaration for want of a profert. 3 Durn. & E. [Term R.] 152, 157. Surely then a court of equity, which exercises a more liberal discretion in pleading than courts of law, will not hold a defendant to stricter rules on the question, whether the plaintiff has a remedy at law. In the courts of the United States, an objection to the jurisdiction of the court, or to the want of equity in the bill, has never been overruled for the want of a demurrer or plea, but has been sustained wherever the defect appears by the bill, the answer, or the proofs in the cause; it may be made on a motion to dismiss the bill,—1 Pet. C. C. 363, 383, [Andrews v. Solomon, Case No. 378; Thompson v. Tod, Id. 13,978;] [Duncan v. Walker,] 2 Dall. [2 U. S.] 205,—though the defendant answer the merits without taking this objection,—[Graves v. Boston Marine Ins. Co.,] 2 Cranch, [6 U. S.] 419, 444. So after a decree pro confesso, a reference and report of a master. [Fowle v. Lawrason,] 5 Pet. [30 U. S.] 496, 504, S. P.; [Massie v. Watts,] 6 Cranch, [10 U. S.] 158; [Russell v. Clark,] 7 Cranch, [11 U. S.] 75, 89; [Herbert v. Wren,] Id. 376; [Hepburn v. Dunlop,] 1 Wheat. [14 U. S.] 197; [Cameron v. M'Roberts,] 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 591; [U. S. v. Howland,] 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 115; [Osborn v. Bank of U. S.,] 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 739, 842; [Boyce v. Grundy,] 3 Pet. [28 U. S.] 211, 215. When urged in argument, the objection "is considered in the nature of a demurrer to the bill for want of equity. 1 Mason, 270; [Bullard v. Bell, Case No. 2,121.] So a decree will be reversed for the want of proper parties, after a hearing on the merits in the circuit court. [Wilcox v. Plummer,] 4 Pet. [29 U. S.] 180; [Caldwell v. Taggart,] Id. 202. We must therefore take the law of equity to be settled, that a defendant may, at any stage of the cause, rely on the want of equity in the bill, on the ground that the plaintiff has a complete remedy at law. The nature of this case, which is one very near the dividing line between law and equity, required us to examine this question thoroughly, in order to come to a satisfactory conclusion on which side of the line it comes, as well as to settle the general rules of equity jurisdiction, so far as it could be done by this court. The labour of making up a detailed opinion is our own, the tax upon the time of the bar in listening to its delivery, is voluntary and comparatively small. It is enough for us, that the course we take is from the impulse of duty, of this we must be the judges.

The objects of the bill are threefold, first, discovery, second, account, third, the execution of a trust. They will be considered distinctly.

1. Discovery. From the bill it appears, that the plaintiff's testator had received from the defendant, two accounts of the receipt and disbursement of the 2800 dollars put into his hands, also of the amount of the judgments against Eckert, the sum bid at sheriff's sale, the purchase by defendant, the application of the purchase money, and that defendant had communicated his proceedings by letters received by the testator, which were read at the hearing. Thus far plaintiff having previous knowledge of all material facts had no need of a discovery. The only matters disclosed in the answer, of which the plaintiff by his bill did not appear to have both knowledge and proof, were mostly of detail of what was in the accounts rendered, or would appear on the records referred to therein, in no way affecting the substance of the plaintiff's case in his bill. As the plaintiff had equal means of resorting to public records for information as the defendant, their contents are not a proper subject for a bill of discovery, as we decided in Ross v. Gibson [Case No. 12,074] at the last term. The merits of the plaintiff's claim were not changed by the answer, unless on matters merely auxiliary, or collateral to the principal question of relief, the answer has removed no legal impediment, or brought out any matters peculiarly within the knowledge of the defendant, so as to present a case of equity cognizance of any matter not cognizable at law; admitting the contrary, still equity can go no further than to supply the defects of law under this head. The discovery sought and made does not carry relief in equity as an incident, so as to give the court power to decree on the whole case, and take the controversy from law to equity, but leaves all questions as to a final remedy as open as before the answer. Vide [Fowle v. Lawrason,] 5 Pet. [30 U. S.] 503; [Russell v.

Clark,] 7 Cranch, [11 U. S.] 89; Mitf. Eq. Pl. 27, 42.

2. Account. The bill does not aver any refusal to account till 1829. On the contrary it admits that one was rendered in April 1819 and another two years before the death of the testator, exhibiting a balance due by defendant of 191 dollars and its appropriation, to which no objections were made as to the items, or the application of the money before the filing of the bill, nor is any fraud suggested. It is a good plea to an action at law for an account, that the defendant had accounted before suit brought, to the person from whom money had been received, or to the person to whom he was bound to account or directed to pay it, (Bull. N. P. 127,) or that the money had been received for an object which had been accomplished, (1 Vern. 95, 136, 208,) or that he never was the plaintiff's bailiff or receiver to render an account, (1 Com. Dig. 189, E. 3, 4, 5.) The object of the suit being to compel the settlement of the account, the plea of fully accounted is good at law,—4 Serg. & R. 44; 3 Wils. 113,—and a stated account is a good plea in equity,—[Chappedelaine v. Dechenaux,] 4 Cranch, [8 U. S.] 309; 4 Desaus. Eq. 175; 1 Atk. 1; 2 Atk. 1; Mitf. Eq. Pl. 210, 211. If plaintiff has agreed to the account his only remedy is at law for the balance; unless there is some legal impediment, equity will not interfere when the sum is certain. 1 Ves. Sr. 160, 163; 6 Ves. 141. In this case the account must be considered as settled by its long retention, without objection made in a reasonable time. 2 Vern. 276; 2 Ves. Sr. 239. Though not signed by the party it is a stated account, if it is in writing and shows a balance or that there is none. Mitf. Eq. Pl. 21; 2 Atk. 251, 399. The burthen of showing errors in such an account, is on the person who receives it without objections. [Freeland v. Heron,] 7 Cranch, [11 U. S.] 151. A settled account can be opened only for fraud or errors specified, and which are palpable or clearly proved. 2 Atk. 189; [Chappedelaine v. Dechenaux.] 4 Cranch, [8 U. S.] 309; 1 Ch. Cas. 299; 1 Vern. 180; 2 Atk. 119; 9 Ves. 265; 2 Johns. Ch. 216. It can only be surcharged or falsified by the plaintiff,—[Perkins v. Hart,] 11 Wheat. [24 U. S.] 256,—and is not affected by being introduced into a subsequent account,—[Chappedelaine v. Dechenaux,] 4 Cranch, [8 U. S.] 316. Long acquiescence in an account makes it a settled one. Stale demands are not favoured in equity when the party acquiesces for a length of time and sleeps on his rights. 1 Jac. & W. 59, 62; 2 Jac. & W. 152; 2 Schoales & L. 627. Conscience, good faith and reasonable diligence are required to call the powers of equity into action. 6 Johns. Ch. 369; Amb. 645; 3 Brown, Ch. 640; 2 Ves. Jr. 583. A trustee's account with an infant cannot be opened after eleven years' acquiescence in a settlement, unless by falsifying an item. 2 Brown, Ch. 62. An account is barred in eleven years. 2 Johns. Ch. 437; 3 Johns. Ch. 586. The bar from lapse of time is a conclusion from acquiescence, an inference from facts, which need not be set up by demurrer, answer or plea, but may be suggested at the hearing. 3 Brown, Ch. 646; 4 Brown, Ch. 268; 2 Ves. Jr. 87, 572, 582; 2 Schoales & L. 637. There is no fixed time when it operates in equity. It is applied by analogy to the statute of limitation,—[Thomas v. Brockenbrough,] 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 149; [Elmendorf v. Taylor,] Id. 168; [Willison v. Watkins,] 3 Pet. [28 U. S.] 52, 53,—or rather in obedience to them as Lord Redesdale, expresses it,—2 Schoales & L. 629, 636; 2 Jac. & W. 191. The effect however is the same as at law. 7 Johns. Ch. 122. In this state six years bars an action of account. 1 Dall. Laws, 95, 96. An infant is barred from an account of rents and profits, unless brought in six years after he comes of age. Prec. Ch. 518; 7 Johns. Ch. 113, 114. And the same rule applies to an account of all trusts, which are not the peculiar creatures of a court of equity. 7 Johns. Ch. 114; [Willison v. Watkins,] 3 Pet. [28 U. S.] 52; 2 Jac. & W. 147, 152, 191; [Peyton v. Stith,] 5 Pet. [30 U. S.] 491. We think this case comes within the spirit of all these decisions. The act of limitations has twice run over the plaintiff's claim, and being barred at law, we can see no equitable circumstance to take it out of the rule; the account must therefore be considered both at law and in equity as closed, so far as respects the receipt of the 2800 dollars.

The next ground for an account is an allegation in the bill, that the defendant undertook to procure an assignment of certain judgments against Eckert, to be made to plaintiff's testator; this is explicitly denied by the answer, and in our opinion the plaintiff has failed in doing away this denial (which is directly responsive to this part of the bill), though the answer was unsupported. Vide [Union Bank v. Geary,] 5 Pet. [30 U. S.] 110, 111. The defendant also avers in his answer, that he acted not as the agent, attorney or trustee of the testator, in any capacity whatever; that what he did, was purely and solely to serve Eckert and family. It is then incumbent on the plaintiff, to make out the defendant to have become his bailiff or receiver, by something independent of the receipt of the 2800 dollars; if he has succeeded in this, another difficulty occurs. Admitting that the alleged agreement was made, its obligation was a legal one, and the remedy at law upon it, so far as we can perceive, complete. The evidence of this agreement was in writing in possession of the plaintiff, and connected with the answer, presents the whole case; no evidence has been given at the hearing which gives any new turn to it, or presents any matter for equitable relief on the ground that defendant was the bailiff or receiver of the plaintiff, in any thing but the receipt of the money for which he had accounted, and the account was settled by acquiescence. No change of circumstances could open this account for revision. All future accountability rested on the subsequent agreement, which related to the performance of certain acts, and cannot be carried back into the original account, so as to make the performance or non performance of the agreement, a matter of account. As a settled account cannot be opened directly, it cannot be done collaterally; the only pretext for it is, that defendant acted in both transactions as plaintiff's agent, consequently they make but one account, which cannot be closed without embracing the whole conduct of the defendant. The answer denying the agency not having been disproved, excludes the jurisdiction of equity,—[Russell v. Clark,] 7 Cranch, [11 U. S.] 89; 3 Ves. 446,—and the defendant has rendered a full account of both transactions, it was not to open the old account, or to attach any responsibility not existing when it was rendered, nor can the court give it that effect, for though a defendant does not demur but answers, it does not give the plaintiff a right to any relief, to which he is not entitled by his bill. 1 Pet. C. C. 363, 383; [Andrews v. Solomon, Case No. 378; Thompson v. Tod, Id. 13,978;] Mitf. Eq. Pl. 87. That part of the plaintiff's claim which grows out of the agreement in October 1819, is for damages for its non performance, not for money pretended to be actually in the hands of the defendant; the sole question is whether the money was applied according to the agreement. If it was, the plaintiff has no case on his own showing. If not, the amount misapplied is a mere matter of calculation, as easy for a jury as a master. To sustain a bill for an account, there must be a series of demands and payments,—2 Caines, Cas. 51,—mutual dealings,—2 Johns. Ch. 171; 6 Ves. 139, 141; 9 Ves. 473,—great complexity in the accounts, some doubt or difficulty in proceeding at law, or some discovery required,—[Fowle v. Lawrason,] 5 Pet. [30 U. S.] 503; 6 Ves. 89; 10 Johns. 595; 2 Strange, 733; 1 Ves. Jr. 424; 13 Ves. 278, 279,—so that a court of law would not be competent to try it at nisi prius, and where the justice of the case depended on the account,—1 Schoales & L. 308, 309. The case must be one proper for an action of account at law, and involve an account. [Fowle v. Lawrason,] 5 Pet. [30 U. S.] 503; 2 Caines, Cas. 54. If the bill show a liquidated sum incapable of being entangled, it will be dismissed, as all difficulty of proceeding at law will be removed. 6 Ves. 688; 2 Rand. 450; [Graves v. Boston Marine Ins. Co.,] 2 Cranch, [6 U. S.] 444; 2 Mason, 270, [Bean v. Smith, Case No. 1,174;] 4 Wash. C. C. 352, [Mayer v. Foulkrod, Case No. 9,341.] So where the facts are within the knowledge of plaintiff, and the answer confesses nothing, or furnishes no evidence to support the bill. [Russell v. Clark,] 7 Cranch, [11 U. S.] 89. So where the object of the bill is to recover damages for the breach of an agreement, and not its specific performance,—Mitf. Eq. Pl. 95; [Hepburn v. Dunlop,] 1 Wheat. [14 U. S.] 197; [Boyce v. Grundy,] 3 Pet. [28 U. S.] 214, etc.,—or the plaintiff has a remedy by statute,—3 Atk. 740. Different reasons are assigned for the jurisdiction of equity in account, by Lord Redesdale, the difficulty of proceeding to the full extent of justice in courts of common law, (Mitf. Eq. Pl. 96,) by Lord Eldon, to avoid multiplicity of suits, (5 Ves. 687,) by Chancellor Kent, that it originated in discovery, (2 Caines, Cas. 52.) Assuming either as the ground, neither exists in this case. There must be some appropriate head of equity jurisdiction under which an account must be decreed. 1 Madd. Ch. Pr. 89; 1 Ves. Jr. 424; 3 Conn. 141; 1 Brown, Ch. 194. It is not enough to charge it in the bill, to change the jurisdiction, it must be distinctly made out. (3 Brown, Parl. Cas. 525; 2 Brown, Cas. 340, 519; 1 Ves. Sr. 172; 1 Atk. 598; 1 Vern. 359; 2 Vern. 382, 386; 1 Ch. Cas. 144, 147, 184,) or some ground of equity exist, growing out of the conduct of the defendant, (1 Brown, Ch. 40, 201; 2 Cox, 362; 2 Mason, 417, 418, [U. S. v. La Jeune Eugenie, Case No. 15,551.]

There are cases affirming the broad principle that courts of law and equity have a concurrent jurisdiction in account. 13 Ves. 279. It has been carried so far as to embrace all cases of principal and agent. 4 Madd. 199, 220. So it has been held in late cases of dower, though they seem to be considered as exceptions, rather than as falling within the principle of concurrent jurisdiction, as the interference of equity is on the ground of discovery, the removal of legal impediments, or some equitable circumstance to regulate its exercise. 3 Brown, Ch. 630; 5 Johns. Ch. 488; Prec. Ch. 244, 248; [Herbert v. Wren,] 7 Cranch, [11 U. S.] 376; 3 Atk. 130. The law had been explicitly laid down, that the chancellor had nothing to do in assigning dower, but in case of lands held in chivalry, (2 Ld. Raym. 785; 7 Mod. 43; Prec. Ch. 111;) yet in 1793 Lord Thurlow sustained a bill for dower, solely on the ground that the title was admitted by the answer, (4 Brown, Ch. 296; 2 Ves. Jr. 122.) This was the establishment of a new rule abrogating an established one, and forcibly illustrating the gradual assumption of jurisdiction by the court of chancery, in cases which by the ancient land marks of the law were cognizable only at law. We cannot adopt these or other innovations as guides, but must consider them as beacons, in the administration of the equity jurisprudence of this court. We cannot adopt any rules or principles of the law, which are in contradiction to those which were settled and established before the Revolution, [Cathcart v. Robinson,] 5 Pet. [30 U. S.] 280,—nor extend our jurisdiction in account beyond the rules prescribed by the supreme court in [Fowle v. Lawrason,] 5 Pet. [30 U. S.] 503. They result from the provisions of the constitution and judiciary act, which cannot be affected by any subsequent adjudications of any courts in England, or in those states which adopt them. In the present case there is nothing in the nature of the agreement, or in the conduct of the defendant, which can give any equitable jurisdiction over it; nor does the defendant stand in that relation to the plaintiff, as to make him liable to a bill or action to account. He is neither bailiff, or guardian, and as the account is not between merchant and merchant, the plaintiff must make him out to be receiver before there can be a case for account. Co. Litt. 172a; 2 Co. Inst. 379; Bull. N. P. 127. A receiver is one who receiveth the money of another to render an account. Co. Litt. 172. But a party cannot have account of money in which he has no property, as if A directs B to borrow money from C to pay D, the account lies not by A, but D. Hob. 36. If defendant has paid over the money as a trustee, the trust is executed and an account does not lie. 3 Wils. 114. There must be a privity between the parties, continuing till suit brought; account lies not by an executor or administrator at common law for want of privity, it is given by statute. Co. Litt. 89, 90, 96; 1 Com. Dig. 192. Here all privity arising from the receipt of the money, ceased on its payment to the persons directed, and rendering an account not objected to; there remained no subject matter to which the relation of receiver could apply at the time of the agreement, and as the money had passed from the testator for certain purposes, the property in it could only revest on their non performance. 1 Dyer, 22b. For these reasons we cannot sustain the bill under the head of account.

3. Trust. Where the legal right of property real or personal, is in one person for the use of another, there is a trust resting in confidence and conscience, on which a court of law cannot act, as it looks only to the legal right; hence a trustee is accountable only in equity, which acts on the conscience according to the justice of the case. 2 Jac. & W. 147 to 191. If a trustee gives a covenant to perform the trust, he is suable at law. [Duvall v. Craig,] 2 Wheat. [15 U. S.] 56. If A assigns goods to B to sell and pay the proceeds to C, and B receive them without a promise to pay C, his remedy is in equity. If B promises to pay C, the remedy is at law; so if A consigns goods to B to deliver to C, and B accepts the consignment, or any agreement is made to perform the trust, [Tiernan v. Jackson,] 5 Pet. [30 U. S.] 594, 602,—or the trust is executed,—3 Wils. 114,—the right to the property is then a legal one. To give jurisdiction to equity, some part of the trust must remain unexecuted, some act remain to be done which rests in confidence; the mere relation between the parties of trustee and cestui que trust, is not enough, there must be that trust which is a creature of a court of equity, not cognizable at law, (7 Johns. Ch. 114,) on which no action lies, but is only for the consideration of equity, (2 Atk. 612,) which acts to carry into effect the principles of law where it provides no adequate remedy, and supplies its defects, (1 Madd. Ch. 450; 2 Schoales & L. 630; 4 Johns. Cas. 654.) For the breach of all other trusts, an action lies at law. 1 Salk. 9; Wils. 204. It is a simple contract for which the remedy is personal. 2 Ves. Sr. 19; 2 W. Bl. 1269, 1272. Wherever the money or property of another is held on a legal trust, the right being legal, the legal remedy is adequate. 1 Bos. & P. 286, 288; 2 Bos. & P. 279, 281; 1 Maule & S. 714, 720; 7 Taunt. 403; 2 E. C. L. 156; 9 East, 378; 14 East, 590. So where there is a special agency, and the contract is closed wholly or as to any particular object, if the agreement, or its further execution has been ended by the death or act of the other party, it is a subject for law if the matters are distinct and can be separately executed. [Perkins v. Hart,] 11 Wheat. [24 U. S.] 250, &c.

In considering the transactions between the parties, we can discern no right in the plaintiff resting in confidence; if there was any trust it was a legal one. The answer discloses nothing of an equitable nature, the case is one where any discovery would be merely auxiliary to law, to enable the plaintiff to recover damages for the breach of the agreement alleged to have been made. As matter of mere trust, any which has ever existed has been executed, so far as confidence was reposed in the discretion of the defendant; if we sustain this suit on the deposit in April 1819, it will be on the principle that every bailment is a trust involving an account in equity. If it is sustained on the alleged agreement in October, we assume equity jurisdiction in all cases of principal and agent, where one agrees to do an act or receives money or property for another, though there is a complete remedy at law to recover damages for the breach of the undertaking. Being satisfied that the plaintiff has not made out a case for the relief prayed for in his bill under the head of discovery, account, trust, or other appropriate branch of equity jurisdiction, the bill must be dismissed.

NOTE, [from original report.] The remark of Lord Hardwicke, that "answering submits to the jurisdiction," has been misapprehended as appears by the case as reported. "The bill was for a specific performance and execution of the articles, what else was in the cause came by way of argument to support, or objection to impeach this relief prayed. The first objection for defendant was, that this court (of chancery) had not jurisdiction nor ought to take recognizance of it; for that the jurisdiction is in the king and council." 1 Ves. Sr. 444, 445. This objection, with others, which went to the jurisdiction, were considered elaborately, though they were not set up by the answer; the authority of this case is therefore in direct opposition to the position for which it is cited. The remark is consistent with the course taken, it is correct as a general rule, when applied to an objection to the jurisdiction of the high court of chancery, on the ground that an inferior court of equity has cognizance of the case; but it is not applicable to a case which is not cognizable in any court of equity, on account of the subject matter. With this distinction in view, this remark taken in connection with the whole sentence, the case before the court, and its course in its decision, is not only in perfect conformity with the cases which establish the principle laid down in Baker v. Biddle, but a direct affirmance thereof.

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. May Term, 1858.[2]

COLLISION—BETWEEN STEAM AND SAIL—FAULT—LIGHTS.

1. Steamers having more power and speed than sailing vessels, and being more immediately subject to control, greater caution and vigilance are expected of those in charge of them to avoid collisions.

[Cited in The Free State, Case No. 5,090.]

2. When a steamer and sailing vessel are approaching each other, the sailing vessel has, in general, a right to hold her course, and it is the duty of the steamer under such circumstances to adopt the necessary precautions to avoid a collision.

[Cited in The Free State, Case No. 5,090.]

[See The Carroll, 8 Wall. (75 U. S.) 302.]

3. The steamer is prima facie chargeable if she fails in this, and a collision occurs.

[Cited in The Sunnyside, Case No. 13,620.]

4. If the sailing vessel fails to keep her course, the fault will in general be attributable to her, provided it appears that under the unexpected change of course by the sailing vessel the steamer used all reasonable exertions to avoid the danger.

[Cited in The Sunnyside, Case No. 13,620; The Colorado v. The H. P. Bridge, 91 U. S. 699. The Coe F. Young, 1 C. C. A. 219, 49 Fed. 168.]

[See St. John v. Paine, 10 How. (51 U. S.) 557; The R. B. Forbes, Case No. 11,598; Haney v. The Louisiana, Id. 6,021; The Kentucky, Id. 7,716; Hall v. The Buffalo, Id. 5,927.]

5. These rules, however, cannot have any controlling application before the two vessels have approached to a point of danger, which renders their observance reasonably necessary.

6. No maritime usage requires merchant vessels constantly to carry lights.

7. Semble. If the absence of a light contributed to a collision in a harbor, or crowded thoroughfare, on a dark night, and one vessel showed a light and the other did not, it might well be held that the dark vessel, other things being equal, was in fault.

In admiralty. Appeal from the district court, in a cause of maritime collision; Ware, District Judge, presiding. [Nowhere reported. Reversed.]

The allegations of the libel [by Judah Baker and others against the steamship City of New York] were in substance as follows: On the 15th of December, 1855, the schooner George Engs, having on board a cargo of corn, flour, and iron, sailed from Philadelphia on a voyage to Boston. At half past three o'clock on the morning of the 19th of the same month, when steering about east-southeast, she made a light off her weather bow, which proved to be on board the steamer City of New York, bound from Boston to Philadelphia. The weather was perfectly clear when the steamer was first discovered, being at a distance of about five miles from the schooner, coming out between Block island and Montauk point, and steering about southwest by south. The schooner kept off east, on her course for Block island, to give the steamer a wide berth. A short time afterward, when the steamer was nearly abreast the schooner, the mate of the schooner, who was at the helm, observing that the steamer was winding off towards him, immediately called all hands, and the master and mate both shouted to the steamer, which was four or five times her length to windward, to luff or hold her course so as to keep clear, which could then have been done. Immediately before the collision, the mate put up the helm of the schooner for the purpose of saving the lives of those on board. The schooner was struck by the steamer's bow, on her starboard and windward quarter, about ten feet from her taffrail, and sunk, with everything on board except the crew, in about fifteen minutes afterward. It was set up as matter of defence, that, after having made the steamer, the schooner changed her course and kept off more and more, until the collision occurred; also that the schooner showed no lights, and was not therefore discovered so soon by several minutes as she would have been had she conformed to the usual custom; that as soon as she was seen, the helm of the steamer was put to the starboard, to keep her off and give the schooner room, presuming she would keep her course; but shortly after, the schooner put off more from the wind, in consequence of which the danger of collision became apparent, upon which the engine was stopped and reversed, though too late to prevent the accident. The bows of the steamer struck the schooner near her main rigging.

CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice, (after reciting the substance of the pleadings). Many of the circumstances attending the collision are admitted, and others are so fully proved, that they cannot properly be regarded as the subjects of dispute. A collision occurred between the two vessels, and the schooner was sunk and totally lost, with all her cargo, consisting of corn, corn-meal, flour, and iron. She was a vessel of about one hundred and thirty tons burden, engaged in the coasting trade, and sailed from Philadelphia on the 15th of December, 1855, on a voyage to Boston, fully manned and equipped, and with a full cargo. On the 19th of the same month, at about half past three o'clock in the morning, when off the coast of Long island, in the usual track of vessels sailing between those ports, and about three or four miles south to southwest from Montauk point, she met the steamer City of New York, bound on a trip from Boston to Philadelphia, and the collision took place. Damages are claimed on the part of the schooner, on the ground, that the collision is chargeable to the fault of the steamer, and the answer admits the collision and the loss, but denies that it was the fault of the steamer, and the respondents, as a matter of fact, insist that it was the fault of the schooner. It was a clear starlight night, but the moon had been down from a half-hour to an hour before the collision occurred. No light was shown on the schooner, but the steamer carried her usual lights, one forward and one on each quarter, and both the vessels had lookouts. It was the second mate's watch on board the schooner, from twelve o'clock at night to four in the morning, and he was at the wheel when the steamer was first discovered. At that time the steamer was about five miles distant, and the mate says the schooner was heading east by north, and that shortly afterward he put her off east for Block island. The wind was then not far from north, and about a six-knot breeze. When the master went below, at twelve o'clock, he says the wind was about north and was not quite steady, and that the schooner was then heading east-northeast. Reardon, the second mate of the steamer, says that the wind, at the time he first discovered the schooner, which was not until the vessels had approached within half a mile of each other, was north-northwest. These statements respecting the course of the wind are not conflicting, and lead to the conclusion that its bearing at the time of the collision was at least one point west of north. At the time the mate of the schooner first discovered the steamer, and when he changed her course from east by north to east, the course of the steamer was about southwest by south, and it is believed, from the evidence, that if she had kept that course a collision would not have occurred.

Allowing that the schooner was sailing five or six knots and the steamer about ten miles an hour, it is a reasonable calculation that they were approaching each other say at the rate of fifteen miles an hour, or one mile in four minutes. They were, therefore, about twenty minutes' sailing time apart when the schooner changed her course from east to north by east, and that change must have been made from fifteen to eighteen minutes before the schooner was discovered by any one on board the steamer. After that change was made, and before the schooner had been seen by the second mate of the steamer, the two vessels had advanced toward each other four and a half miles, which could not have been accomplished in much less than eighteen minutes at the rate of speed they were sailing. Assuming that the two vessels were approaching each other at the rate of a mile in four minutes, then the second mate of the steamer is mistaken in supposing that two minutes elapsed, after the engine was stopped, before the steamer struck the schooner, and his own testimony shows satisfactorily the error in his calculation. He admits that he gave the order to stop the engine, because he saw that the two vessels were coming together; and it was not until after he had noticed that the schooner had changed her course that he gave that order. When he first saw the schooner she was only about half a mile off, and that was before he had ordered the helm to be put hard a-starboard. What time elapsed after he ordered the helm to be put hard a-starboard, and before he gave the order to stop the engine, will appear most satisfactorily by a comparison of his testimony with what transpired on board the schooner at that precise time. She was approaching the steamer on a course of east by north, and the mate says he continued that course until the steamer was nearly abreast of the schooner, when the lights of the steamer suddenly changed, and he saw that she was coming down on to the schooner. Seeing that, he called all hands, and while the master was coming up from below he hove the wheel up. He says, however, at the same time, what it is important to notice, that the steamer struck the schooner before she could alter her course but very little, showing conclusively that the collision was inevitable irrespective of any change of course that was or could have been made. Before the master left the deck he directed the mate, or arriving near Montauk point, to steer east for Block island; and it is clearly proved that the change was made shortly after the steamer was first discovered, and that it was an order proper to be executed to carry the vessel on the usual route south of that island to Boston. In respect to the second change of course, it satisfactorily appears, both from the testimony of the second mate of the steamer and from the testimony of the mate of the schooner, who were in charge of their respective vessels, that it was not made until all chance of preventing the collision was gone. It is admitted in the answer that this last change was made after the helm of the steamer had been put to the starboard, and so is the testimony of the second mate of the steamer, by whom the order to starboard the helm was given. Two seamen, also, who were on board the steamer, testify to the same effect. They say, in substance, that after the wheel of the steamer was put hard a-starboard, and she had begun to pay off, they noticed that the schooner had her wheel hard a-port, and that she also had begun to pay off. It is true, that the mate of the schooner, after he discovered that the collision was inevitable, hove the wheel up, and it may be that she had begun to pay off when the collision occurred; but it is fully proved that her course had not been altered enough to affect the result, except, perhaps, to shift the blow from one part of the schooner to another. When the mate called all hands, the master says he jumped on deck, and that the situation of the vessels at that time was such that it could have made no difference whether the schooner had luffed, wound off, or kept a straight course. Shockley, the engineer of the steamer, says that he received the order from the second mate to stop the engine just before the steamer actually came in collision with the schooner. He estimates the time that elapsed after the order and before the collision at about a minute, but says he had just time to close the throttle-valve, and that it was the only order he received, although, from the quick way in which it was given, he expected that the order to reverse would immediately follow, and accordingly unhooked the engine and threw her into the back motion. It was to the change of course last made on the part of the schooner that the second mate of the steamer referred in his testimony, when he said that, after he ordered the helm to be put hard a-starboard, he noticed the schooner had altered her course more to the eastward, and not to the change from east by north to east, which had been made twenty minutes before, when the two vessels were five miles apart. He was referring to a change of course which he himself had seen, and not to one made at least fifteen minutes before the schooner had been discovered by any one on board the steamer. After the mate of the schooner first discovered the steamer, two changes were made in the course of the schooner, and only two, as conclusively appears by a careful comparison of all the testimony in the case. One was made when the two vessels were about five miles apart, and at least fifteen minutes before any one on board the steamer had discovered the schooner, and the other not until the vessels were in such close proximity that a collision was inevitable; and throughout all the intermediate period the schooner held her course without any change of the wheel whatever. Some change also was made in the course of the steamer after the second mate was informed by the lookout that a sail had been discovered on the starboard bow. How much change was made in the first instance does not appear; and the man at the wheel says that the first he knew of the matter was, that the second mate ordered the helm hard a-starboard, and that he executed the order as soon as it was received, leaving it to be inferred either that no previous order had been given, or, if given, that it had not been understood or obeyed. He had not seen the schooner when he executed that order, and when he did see her he says that she was heading towards the steamer, but omits to state what time had elapsed after the order was given before he saw her and the distance between the two vessels. His estimate that three minutes elapsed after the order was executed before the collision occurred is contrary to all the other evidence in the case, and therefore cannot be admitted to be correct. Howlett first discovered the schooner, and he says that he sang out twice to the second mate that there was a sail ahead, and he heard that officer singing out to the man in the wheel-house to put the helm a-starboard, and this was before the witness had ascertained the bearing of the schooner; and the second mate admits that he could not tell at that time which way the schooner was going, whether east-northeast or west-northwest, and yet he says he gave the order, and it was promptly executed, and it does not appear that it was countermanded before the collision. All these facts are so clearly proved, that it is difficult to see how they can be misunderstood. On this state of the evidence the respondents insist, in the first place, that the schooner was in fault, because she changed her course shortly after the mate of the schooner first discovered the steamer, and at the time when the two vessels were about five miles apart. That change did not exceed two points in any view of the evidence, and, according to the testimony of the mate, who had charge of the deck and made the change, it was but one point from east by north to east, and was one proper to be made to carry the vessel on her intended route south of Block island.

I. Steam vessels, having more power and speed than sailing vessels, and being more immediately subject to control, greater caution and vigilance are exacted of those in charge of them to avoid collisions. Consequently a sailing vessel, whether close-hauled or with a free wind, when a steamer is approaching, has in general a right to keep her course; and it is the duty of the steamer under such circumstances to adopt such precautions as to avoid a collision; and if she does not, and a collision occurs, the steamer is prima facie chargeable; and in order that the steamer may not be baffled in her purpose to adopt such precautions, it is the duty of the sailing vessel to keep her course as though there was no danger; and if she fails to do so, the fault will, in general, be attributable to her, provided it also appears that the steamer used all reasonable exertions to avoid the danger under the unexpected change of course on the part of the sailing vessel. The St. John v. Paine, 10 How. [51 U. S.] 583; The Oregon v. Rocca, 18 How. [59 U. S.] 571; The Clement, [Case No. 2,879.] These rules of navigation ought to be strictly adhered to in all cases where they are applicable. They were prescribed to prevent collisions and for the ascertainment of the rights of parties, after they have occurred, in cases to which they apply. They cannot, however, have any controlling application before the two vessels have approached to a point of danger which brings them into exercise, and makes their observance reasonably necessary in order to fulfil the purpose which they were designed to accomplish. Accordingly it was held by the supreme court, in the case of The Monticello v. Mollison, 17 How. [58 U. S.] 154, that they did not apply in a case where the approaching vessels were seven miles apart, it appearing, as in this case, that the change of course on the part of the sailing vessel was made before she had been seen by the steamer; and in Newton v. Stebbins, 10 How. [51 U. S.] 606, the same court held that the sailing vessel was not in fault, although the distance between her and the steamer when she changed her course was only three or four miles, and the change of course had been made by her after she had been seen by the steamer. A change of course under such circumstances, if made into the pathway of the approaching steamer, could not be justified, unless it also appeared that the steamer was guilty of negligence in not avoiding the danger. The change made in this case, however, was not of that character; and there is no evidence having the least tendency to show that it had the effect to baffle any precaution which those on board the steamer adopted or intended to adopt. Both these suggestions are disproved, as fully appears from the evidence already stated. When that change was made, there was no danger of collision, and if the steamer had kept her course it would not have occurred; and inasmuch as it did not in any manner contribute to the disaster, it was not a fault on the part of the schooner. The Genesee Chief, 12 How. [53 U. S.] 461.

II. It is contended, in the second place, by the respondents, that the schooner was in fault because she changed her course after she was seen by those on board the steamer. When the schooner was first seen by the second mate of the steamer, the latter was sailing about ten miles an hour, and he says the schooner was about a half-mile off, and he admits that he ordered her helm put hard a-starboard just as quick as he could, and that about two minutes elapsed before he gave the order to stop the engine; thus fully confirming the engineer, who says he received the order just before the steamer actually came in collision with the schooner. They were approaching each other at the rate of a mile in four minutes; and it appearing that they were but a half-mile apart when the order to starboard the helm was given, it shows to a demonstration that the speed of the steamer was not reduced until the instant of collision; and this confirms the testimony of the mate of the schooner, that she had not time after he hove up her wheel to make any considerable change in her course, and strongly corroborates the testimony of the master, that it would not have made any difference whether she had luffed, wound off, or kept a straight course, as the collision was then inevitable. Rules of navigation were designed to afford security to life and property on the high seas and other navigable waters, by preventing collisions, and cannot be invoked by those who have rendered their observance impracticable or imminently dangerous to human life. A change of course under such circumstances is not a fault, and certainly not when, as in this case, it appears that it did not contribute to the collision. The Birkenhead, 3 W. Rob. Adm. 76; The Rose, 2 W. Rob. Adm. 1; The James Watt, 2 W. Rob. Adm. 271.

III. It is insisted, lastly, by the respondents, that the schooner was in fault because she did not show any light prior to, and at the time of, the collision, and reference is made to a case decided in the third circuit to support that proposition. In that case the court expressed the opinion that sailing vessels navigating in harbors and thoroughfares in a dark night, where they are constantly liable to meet steamers, ought to show a light; and signified in strong terms, that between a vessel under such circumstances, with a light, and another without a light, other things being equal, they would hold the dark vessel to be in fault; admitting, however, at the same time, that there is no law requiring vessels navigating the high seas to carry signal-lights, and that courts of justice cannot establish any such rule, and make it obligatory on such vessels. Bark Delaware v. Steamer Osprey, [Case No. 3,763.]

No maritime usage requires merchant vessels constantly to carry lights, and it is understood there is some difference of opinion among navigators as to its expediency, especially when navigating along the coast, where the lights on board vessels are liable to be mistaken for land lights, and thus by deceiving other vessels as to their own true position, bring them into danger. In harbors and crowded thoroughfares the balance of safety would seem to be in favor of showing a light. Such were the views of the district judge, and they are believed to be correct; and where that precaution is omitted in such thoroughfares, on a dark night, and it appears that the absence of a light contributed to the collision, and that the colliding vessel showed a light and used all reasonable exertions to prevent the collision, it might well be held that the dark vessel, other things being equal, was in fault. That principle, however, cannot have any application to this case for several reasons apparent on an examination of the facts. Here the collision occurred on a clear starlight night, when several of the witnesses, who are experienced navigators, say that the schooner could have been seen two or three miles. Others say that a schooner in such a night might be seen a mile and a half or two miles, and some enlarge the distance three or four miles. Not a doubt is entertained that she might and ought to have been seen much earlier, if the lookouts on the steamer had been vigilant in the performance of their duty.

IV. Lookouts are valueless unless they are vigilantly employed on their duty; and whenever it appears that they are not so employed on board steamers, it must be considered as the fault of the steamer. Vessels propelled by steam have command of their own course and their own speed, and it is their duty, where there is room, to pass an approaching sailing vessel at such a distance as to avoid all danger; and if in consequence of the omission of duty on the part of lookouts, or their negligence, the approaching sailing vessel is not seen in season to prevent a collision, the fault is properly chargeable to the steamer, unless the sailing vessel was also guilty of a violation of the rules of navigation. The Genesee Chief, 12 How. [53 U. S.] 463. These reasons, together with those already mentioned responsive to the preceding propositions, lead necessarily to the conclusion that the collision was the fault of the steamer. Some evidence is exhibited in the case tending to show a local usage for sailing vessels to carry lights in the harbor of Boston. The effect of such a usage, if proved, it is not necessary now to consider, as the evidence introduced is not sufficient to show its existence. The decree of the district court [unreported] is therefore reversed, and a decree must be entered for the libellants.

Case No. 766.

BAKER et al. v. DRAPER et al.

[1 Cliff. 420.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. May Term, 1860.[2]

PAYMENT—BY NOTE—SIMPLE CONTRACT DEBT—MASSACHUSETTS RULE.

1. At common law a promissory note given for a simple contract debt does not operate as a discharge of the original obligation, or constitute a payment of the original debt, unless it affirmatively appears from the evidence that such was the intention of the parties at the time it was so given.

[Cited in Re Hurst, Case No. 6,925; The Helen M. Pierce, Id. 6,332.]

2. In this case the transaction must be governed by the rules of law which prevail where it took place; and in Massachusetts, where a party, bound to a simple contract debt, gives his own negotiable security for it, it is presumed as a matter of fact, in the absence of any circumstances to indicate a contrary intention, that the bill or note was given and received in satisfaction and discharge of the pre-existing debt.

[Cited in Re Hurst, Case No. 6,925; Kimball v. The Anna Kimball, Id. 7,772; The Helen M. Pierce, Id. 6,332.]

3. Such rule should be cautiously applied in all cases where the remedy upon the new security is not as good and effectual as upon the one for which it was substituted.

4. If there is any deception or fraud in the giving the new security, or if it was accepted without full knowledge of the facts, the plaintiff is not bound by the acceptance, but may tender it back or produce it in court to be cancelled, and seek his remedy on the original contract.

[Cited in The Eclipse, Case No. 4,268.]

5. Where the libellants, in Massachusetts, took a note for the amount of certain supplies furnished to a vessel, from a person whom they supposed to be one of the owners, but which person had previously given a bill of sale of his share in the vessel to certain third parties, to secure them for liabilities they had incurred for him, which was not at the time known to the libellants, held, that the libellants did not take the note in satisfaction and in discharge of the original liability of those to whom the credit was given, or with full knowledge of all the material facts.

This was an appeal in admiralty in a suit in personam, brought [by Baker and others] against the respondents [Draper and others] as owners of the bark Fernandina, to recover for certain supplies alleged to have been furnished by the libellants to the bark on the credit of the vessel and owners. Respondents admitted the ownership of one half of the vessel, and that they held the other half as security for certain advances made to, and liabilities contracted for, one Adolphus Davis, but denied that the credit was given on their account or that of the bark. They alleged that the supplies were furnished on the credit of the said Adolphus Davis, who was the ship's husband, and that he had subsequently paid for the same as follows, viz. by his promissory note for six hundred and eighty-six dollars and eighty-three cents, dated August 17, 1858, and payable in seven months from date. The libellants in a supplemental bill denied that the credit was given to Davis otherwise than as he was supposed to be one of the owners in the vessel. They also denied receiving the note as payment, and averred that, if such was the intent of the maker, then the transaction was fraudulent, because it was founded on a fraudulent concealment of material facts touching the ownership of the vessel, and that it had the effect to deceive and mislead the libellants. The note was brought into court and tendered to the respondents. Certain interrogatories were propounded in the supplemental libel, which were answered by respondents. A decree was entered in the district court [unreported] in favor of the libellants. [Affirmed.]

CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice. It is insisted by the respondents on this state of the case that the note was accepted by the libellants in payment of the bills for the supplies in question, and therefore that the suit cannot be maintained. On the part of the libellants it is denied that they ever received the note in payment, and they insist that the whole case shows that it was not so agreed or intended by the parties. At common law a promissory note given for a simple contract debt does not operate as a discharge of the original obligation, or constitute a payment of the original debt, unless it affirmatively appears from the evidence that such was the intention of the parties at the time it was given. Holt, Ch. J., said in Clark v. Mundal, 1 Salk. 124, that a bill shall never go in discharge of a precedent debt, except it be a part of the contract that it should be so. Such bill or note of the debtor himself or of a third party, say the supreme court, in Downey v. Hicks, 14 How. [55 U. S.] 249, is never considered payment of a precedent debt, unless there is a special agreement to that effect. Where persons were indebted to a bank, and gave their promissory notes for the amount of the debt, it was held by the same court that the mere acceptance of the notes by the bank did not necessarily operate as a satisfaction; and whether or not there was an agreement at the time to receive them as payment, or whether the circumstances attending the transaction warranted such an inference, was a question of fact for the jury. Lyman v. Bank of U. S., 12 How. [53 U. S.] 225. Satisfaction of the pre-existing debt as distinguished from an actual payment must always arise from the agreement of the parties, and not from the new security given for that purpose, which only operates as the consideration for the agreement. Hence the agreement must always be proved, and cannot be implied by law in a case where there are no facts or circumstances from which it may reasonably be inferred. James v. Hackley, 16 Johns. 277; Peter v. Beverly, 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 567; Whitbeck v. Van Ness, 11 Johns. 414; Gallagher v. Roberts, [Case No. 5,195.] But the courts of this state have adopted a different rule, and the question in this case must be governed by the rules of law which prevail in the jurisdiction where the transaction took place. Whenever a party bound to a simple contract debt in this state gives his own negotiable security for it, whether it be a bill of exchange or promissory note, it is presumed as a matter of fact, in the absence of any circumstances to indicate a contrary intention of the parties, that the bill or note was given and received in satisfaction and discharge of the pre-existing debt. That rule was adopted at a very early period in the history of the state, and has been followed by such repeated decisions that it must be regarded here as the settled law upon the subject. Very little embarrassment results from the practice, as was remarked by this court in another case, so long as the application of the principle is kept within the bounds which the rule itself announces. Properly understood, most or all of the cases admit that it is a presumption of fact, and not of law, and that it may be controlled by any circumstances which show that such was not the intention of the parties to the contract. When the rule was first adopted, it was placed upon the ground that, if an action could be maintained for the original debt, the debtor might also be sued by an innocent indorsee of the bill or note, and thus be compelled to pay the debt twice; and that is the principal reason assigned for the rule at the present time. Wherever the doctrine prevails, the new security is regarded in all respects as a substitute for the first promise, and the reasons assigned for its adoption show that it ought to be very cautiously applied in all cases where the remedy upon the new security is not as effectual and comprehensive as upon the one for which it was substituted. Mr. Greenleaf says, where the debtor's own negotiable bill or note is given for a pre-existing debt, it is prima facie evidence of payment, but is still open to inquiry by the jury. To the same effect also are the remarks of Shaw, Ch. J., in the case of Fowler v. Bush, 21 Pick. 230. He says the rule here differs from that of the common law, only in determining what shall be presumed to be the intent of the parties, from the fact of giving and accepting a negotiable note for a simple contract debt. Without further evidence of intent, we construe it, says the learned judge, to be payment, but the common law deems it to be collateral security. But this presumption may be controlled by other evidence, and when ascertained such intent shall govern. All of the cases upon the subject, in point of fact, agree that the giving and accepting of such a security is only presumptive evidence of the intent to extinguish the prior simple contract-debt, which, like other presumptions of fact, is liable to be repelled by the circumstances.

Courts of justice in this state and in Maine, where alone this rule prevails, have often had occasion to inquire and determine what circumstances are, and what are not, sufficient to repel this presumption. In the course of the numerous decisions upon the subject they have established certain general principles, to which it may be useful to refer. If there is any deception or fraud in the giving of the new security, or if it was accepted without a full knowledge of the facts, or under a misapprehension of the rights of the parties, the plaintiff or libellant, as the case may be, is not bound by the acceptance of the note, but may tender it back or produce it at the trial, to be cancelled, and seek his remedy on the original contract. So also, if, when the note was taken he supposed the maker was the only person bound for the goods, and that he was not changing the parties, but only taking a new security from the same party, then it is clear, say the supreme court of this state, in French v. Price, 24 Pick. 22, that the original contract is not so far extinguished as to prevent a resort to it after new parties are discovered. Where negotiable paper had been taken for a pre-existing debt, Shepley, Ch. J., in Fowler v. Ludwig, 34 Me. 461, held, that if the paper was not binding on all the parties previously liable, or, if the paper of a third party was received not expressly in payment, the presumption that it was so accepted might be considered as repelled. Similar views were also expressed in the case of Melledge v. Boston Iron Co., 5 Cush. 170, where it was held, that when the promissory note given is not the obligation of all the parties who are liable for the simple contract debt, and a fortiori when the note is that of a third person, and if regarded as in satisfaction, would wholly discharge the liability of the party previously liable, the presumption, if it exists at all, is of much less weight. Applying these principles to the present case, there can be no doubt what the result must be on the state of facts disclosed in the evidence. Testimony was introduced by the libellants tending to show, as matter of fact, that the note was not accepted as payment, but was received only as a convenient mode of adjusting the accounts; and the book-keeper testifies expressly that it was not so accepted, and that he made the transfers on the books without the authority or knowledge of the libellants. Whether so or not, and wholly irrespective of that evidence, I am of the opinion, from the circumstances of the case, that the libellants did not understandingly and with a full knowledge of all the material facts accept the note in satisfaction and discharge of the parties to whom the original credit was given; and there is much reason to conclude, from the evidence, that there was a want of good faith on the part of the maker of the note in negotiating the transaction. His clerk went to the counting-room of the libellants with the note already prepared; and when the maker of it sent the clerk, he must have known that the libellants supposed him to be the owner of one-half part of the bark, else he could not have expected that the proposition would have been accepted; and he well knew at the same time that he had conveyed his interest to another person. Another bill for repairs against the bark was settled on the same day in the same manner, and a conveyance was also made by him of certain real estate. Whether he owned any other property does not appear, but it does appear that he suspended payment shortly afterwards, and that he was insolvent. Taking all of the circumstances together, it is clear that the defence set up in the answer cannot prevail. The decree of the district court [unreported] is, therefore, affirmed, with costs.

Case No. 767.

BAKER v. FRENCH et al.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 539.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May 26, 1825.

SCIRE FACIAS TO REVIVE JUDGMENT — RETURN—ALIAS WRIT—DISCONTINUANCE.

1. If some of the terre-tenants named in the scire facias are returned "nihil," an alias scire facias must be issued against them, or the cause will be discontinued.

2. Semble, that the scire facias, or its return, must describe the land held by each tenant.

Scire facias [by John H. Baker, administrator of Bayly] against [George French and others] the terre-tenants of Ariana French, executrix of George French, deceased.

The writ stated that William Bayly, in June, 1812, recovered judgment against Ariana French, executrix of George French, for $501.87; and at the time of the rendition of the judgment against her, she was seized in fee of divers lands and tenements, and that execution remains to be made of the judgment; and that she has since departed this life; therefore the marshal was commanded to give notice to George French, Robert French, Virginia French, Elizabeth Weems, and Marianne C. French, widow of Charles French, terre-tenants of the lands and tenements in his bailiwick being, whereof the said Ariana French, executrix, as aforesaid, was seized on the 6th of June, 1812, on which day the said judgment was rendered, or ever afterwards, that they appear before the court, &c., on the 1st Monday of October, 1823, to show cause, &c., why the said William Bayly should not have his execution to be levied on those lands and tenements, &c. The marshal returned, "scire feci George French; and nihil as to the others."

Mr. J. Dunlop, for George French, the only terre-tenant summoned, moved the court to quash the scire facias, or to order it to be stricken off the docket as discontinued.

1. Because the original judgment did not bind the lands of the executrix.

2. Because only one of the tenants was summoned, and no alias scire facias against the others.

3. Because the lands are not described in the scire facias, nor in the return. 2 Tidd, Pr. 1038.

Mr. Ashton, contra.

Under the testamentary law of Maryland of 1798, c. 101, the judgment against an executor or administrator is de bonis propriis, in the first instance, being for the plaintiff's proportion of assets only, and is an original judgment, binding the person and property of the executrix in the same manner as if she had not been sued in that character. The return of the marshal is good. He has no authority to ascertain and describe the lands holden by the tenants, nor whether they were tenants of the freehold. It is not necessary that the judgment should be against all who are named terre-tenants in the scire facias. The defendant may plead in abatement, that there are other terre-tenants not summoned. If the return is defective, it is no reason for quashing the writ of scire facias.

Mr. Dunlop, in reply.

It is impossible for the court to render judgment, unless the land, held by the terre-tenants summoned, be described either in the writ of scire facias, or in the return. The judgment is not against the tenant, personally, but against the land. The forms of returns show that the sheriff always describes the land held by the tenant summoned. 2 Har. Ent. 174. But the action is discontinued by the omission to sue out an alias writ of scire facias against the terre-tenants not summoned upon the first writ. Tidd, Pr. 1042; U. S. v. Parker, [Case No. 15,992;] and Nicholls v. Fearson, at this term, [Id. 10,226.]

May 26, 1825. THE COURT, having taken time for consideration during the vacation, was of opinion that the cause was discontinued by the plaintiff's neglect to take out an alias writ of scire facias against the terre-tenants not summoned upon the first writ.

NOTE, [from original report.] In Adams v. Terre-Tenants of Savage, 3 Salk. 321, it was held by Holt, C. J., that where a scire facias against terre-tenants is general, it is not proper for the defendant to plead in abatement, that there are other terre-tenants not named, and so pray judgment of the writ et quod breve cassetur; but to pray judgment, whether without them, respondere debet; but where the scire facias is particular, (i. e., naming the particular tenants,) in such case the defendant may pray judgment of the writ. See, also, Michel v. Croft, Cro. Jac. 506; S. P. on Demurrer. In Coke's Entries, 619a, is a form of scire facias and return against terre-tenants of W. H. After reciting the judgment, and dying, seized, &c., the sheriff is commanded to make known to "the tenants of the lands and tenements which were of the said W. H., on the octave of St. Hilary, 33 Eliz., on which day the judgment aforesaid was rendered, that they be here at this day, viz., &c., to show cause, &c., why the debt and damages aforesaid ought not to be made of those lands and tenements," &c.; and the sheriff returned that he had made known to Thomas Hunt, knight, tenant of the manor of Baconsthorpe Weodal, with the appurtenances in Baconsthorpe, in his county, and of the manor of Bodham Hall, with the appurtenances in his county, &c. &c. And to Thomas Armiger, gentleman, tenant of 80 acres of land in Bodham, &c. &c., as to the other terre-tenants, being eleven in all. "And thereupon the plaintiff prays execution against the said Thomas Hunt," and the other tenants named in the return "of the debt and damages aforesaid, of those lands and tenements to be adjudged to him," &c.

BAKER v. GALLAGHER.

[1 Wash. C. C. 461.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. Oct. Term, 1806.

NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS—DEMAND, NOTICE, AND PROTEST — NO FUNDS IN HANDS OF DRAWEE — SPECIAL DEMURRER—SUIT BEFORE DUE.

1. When the drawer of a bill of exchange has no funds in the hands of the drawee, neither protest nor notice of non-acceptance or non-payment to the drawer, is necessary to enable the payee to recover.

[See Volk v. Simmons, Case No. 16,815; Cox v. Simms, Id. 3,306; Fenwick v. Sears, 1 Cranch, (5 U. S.) 259. For distinguishable case, see Mackall v. Gossler, Case No. 8,835.]

2. The payee must either state that the bill was protested, or show that it was not incumbent on him to protest it, because the drawer had no funds in his hands to pay the bill; but this omission can only be taken advantage of by special demurrer.

3. Where the drawer had no funds in the hands of the drawee, an action may be brought by the holder, upon the bill, before the time it would be payable, if it had been accepted. It may be brought immediately on non-acceptance.

At law. This action was instituted, [by Baker against Gallagher] to recover the amount of a bill of exchange for £224 sterling, drawn by the defendant on a merchant in Liverpool, in favour of the plaintiff, with interest from the date of it. The drawer having no funds in the hands of the drawee, acceptance of the bill was refused; and, to avoid the legal consequence of a protest, to fix upon the drawer payment of damages, which, by an agreement between drawer and payee, were not to be demanded, the bill was returned without being protested, this agreement having been communicated by the defendant to the drawee. This action was brought before the time for payment by the drawee would have arrived, had he accepted the bill.

Ewing, for the plaintiff, stated, first, that where the drawer has no funds in the hands of the drawee, neither protest, nor notice to the drawer, is necessary to enable the payee to recover. 1 Term R. 714, 410; 2 Term R. 717; 5 Term R. 239. Plaintiff must either state that the bill was protested, or show that it was not incumbent on him to protest; as, that the drawer had no effects in the hands of the drawee; but, the omission can only be taken advantage of by special demurrer. 1 Salk. 131; 1 Show. 125; 2 Doug. 684, note 144. Not even necessary to present it for acceptance. Chit. Bills, 68; 2 H. Bl. 336, and post. 2d. That the action was not brought prematurely. It may be commenced immediately on non-acceptance. 3 Burrows, 1687. 1 Doug. 55; 3 East, 481; Chit. Bills, 64, 100.

These points were admitted by Mr. Dallas for the defendant, who stated the case to be, that the defendant was indebted to one Niblie, of New Orleans, who again was indebted to the plaintiff: that, by the correspondence between Niblie and the plaintiff, it appeared, that the defendant was to pay to the plaintiff, what he owed to Niblie. In August, 1804, Niblie drew an order on the defendant for 500 dollars, in favour of one Vertner, at sixty days, which was accepted. This bill was drawn in December, afterwards. He contended, that the plaintiff was to be considered as the agent of Niblie; and, as the bill was drawn for the whole sum, which had been due from defendant to Niblie, without crediting the above 500 dollars, the defendant was entitled to a credit for that sum, the suit being between the original parties to the bill. [Verdict and judgment for plaintiff.]

Before WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice, and PETERS, District Judge.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice, charged the jury. The argument, founded on the idea of the plaintiff being the agent of Niblie, is ingenious, and would be sound, if the case would bear it out. If the plaintiff had not been the creditor of Niblie, we might have considered him as his agent. But, as the case is, it is nothing more than a promise by the defendant, to pay to the plaintiff, a creditor of Niblie, a debt due to him by Niblie, and the bill is evidence of this promise. It is of no consequence, if the defendant, instead of having paid a part, had previously discharged the whole of his debt to Niblie; he is still bound to fulfil his engagement to the plaintiff. Verdict for plaintiff, for his whole demand.

Case No. 769.

BAKER et al. v. GLOVER.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 682.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May Term, 1826.

EQUITY—INJUNCTION TO STAY EXECUTION—SURPRISE.

A court of equity will grant an injunction to stay execution upon a judgment obtained against a garnishee by surprise and will continue it till final hearing.

In equity. This was a bill [by Baker and others against Charles Glover] for an injunction to stay proceedings upon a judgment against the complainants as garnishees of Edward Smith by default, and for general relief. [Decree for complainants.]

The bill stated, that in February, 1818, the defendant Charles Glover, issued an attachment against Edward Smith, under the Maryland act of 1795, (chapter 56,) which was returned, "Laid in the hands of Elizabeth Baker, John R. Dyer, Edward Dyer, and Thomas Munroe, and summoned them as garnishees." That at the time of the service of the attachment, neither of the garnishees had any goods or chattels of Smith in their possession, and that neither of them was indebted to him. That relying on that fact, and being ignorant of the law and the proceedings of courts, they failed to appear at the return of the attachment, whereby they are informed that judgment of condemnation by default was entered against them as garnishees for $260 and costs, at June term, 1818, and that execution thereupon is in the hands of the marshal, who is about to levy on the property of the complainants. That the proceedings at law were illegal and void, inasmuch as the judgment was rendered against one of the complainants by the name of Elizabeth, when her name was Catharine; that there is no return on the capias against Smith, and no short copy of the cause of action set up at the court-house door. The bill then prays an injunction, and for general relief.

An injunction was granted in vacation by Thruston, Circuit Judge. The answer denies that the complainant Baker was not indebted to Smith. It avers that the defendant believes that the proceedings at law upon the attachment were correct and proper, and that a short note of the cause of action was set up at the court-house door, which the defendant himself saw. As to that part of the bill which complains that no return was made on the capias against Smith, the defendant answers, that before the capias was issued Smith had absconded and has not returned.

Mr. Morfit, for the defendant Glover, contended that by the rules of equity an injunction cannot be granted to stay execution upon a judgment by default. Graves v. Houlditch, 2 Price, 147; Ham. Eq. Dig. 503. That the complainant had a complete remedy at law, under the Maryland act of 1787, (chapter 9, § 6,) by a motion to set aside the judgment for surprise or irregularity, and to quash the execution. Cheetham v. Tillotson, 4 Johns. 500; 1 Johns. Cas. 429. That therefore there was no equity in the bill.

Mr. Key then moved the court to quash the execution, and to set aside the judgment at law against the garnishees rendered at June term, 1818, for irregularity. 1. Because there was no return of the capias against Smith. 2. Because there was no short note set up at the court-house door. 3. Because there was no evidence by which "to make appear to the court" what "goods, or chattels, or credits of the defendant were in each respective garnishee's hands," according to the provisions of the 4th section of the act of Maryland, 1715, (chapter 40.)

THE COURT ordered the injunction, and the motion to set aside the judgment and quash the execution, to be continued till the final hearing upon the cause in equity.

NOTE. Glover died, and the cause was abated.

BAKER v. HEMENWAY.

The CITY OF VALPARAISO.

[2 Lowell, 501.][1]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. Nov., 1876.

SALVAGE—TOWAGE AND SALVAGE—AMOUNT DECREED.

1. A steamship, worth, with her cargo, $500,000, took the ground in the harbor of Boston, and was pulled off, at about high water, by a large tug, assisted by the engines of the steamship, and by two small tugs, the principal power being furnished by the ship and the large tug, and the small tugs being occupied less than an hour. Held, that the small tugs had rendered a salvage service.

[Cited in The Athenian, 3 Fed. 250.]

2. That they were to be paid a liberal compensation, much more than their hire for an hour, but not one into which the value saved would enter as a very important element: Sums decreed, $800 and $400.

[Cited in The Athenian, 3 Fed. 250.]

[In admiralty. Libel by Baker and others against the steamship City of Valparaiso (Hemenway, claimant) for salvage.] The City of Valparaiso was a new steamship, built in England, and intended for the trade between Boston and Chili. In going down the harbor of Boston on her first voyage she grounded on Lovell's island in the daytime, about an hour and a half or two hours before high water. The wind was strong from the north-west, and tended to set her further on the shoal. She had a large and powerful tug, called the C. S. Winch, in attendance, to bring back some passengers; and, while lying aground and backing her own engines with all their power, she accepted the services of the two comparatively small tugs, the Macy and the Woolley, whose owners and crews bring this libel. The Macy assisted the Winch in pushing against the steamer's quarter, to keep her up to the wind; the Woolley assisted in drawing her off. The steamer was aground a little more than an hour. The facts were not seriously disputed; but the opinions of the witnesses were opposed upon the question how far the services of the tugs were important to the safety of the ship, her own witnesses testifying that she had ample means to haul off by anchors, &c., in addition to her engines, in case those alone had failed. The after-part of the ship was lightened by pumping out the water ballast. The vessel pursued her voyage to Valparaiso and back, and on her return was found to have been considerably injured by taking the ground, though the leak caused by it was not large. The ship and cargo were worth nearly half a million dollars. [Decree for libellants.]

J. C. Dodge, for libellants.

E. R. Hoar & S. Hoar, for respondent.

LOWELL, District Judge. That a vessel in distress accepting services without a special contract, and in the absence of a usage of the port, accepts a salvage assistance, is abundantly established. It will be enough to cite some of the decisions in this circuit, though the law is the same in all: The Versailles, [Case No. 6,365;] The Independence, [Id. 7,014;] The Island City, [Id. 55;] The Susan, [Id. 13,630;] The James T. Abbott, [Id. 7,202;] M. B. Stetson, [Id. 9,363;] The Coringa, [Id. 1,736.]

The important and difficult part of the case is not the name by which it is called, but the amount which shall be decreed. A very large value was saved, but under circumstances which do not contain other elements which should require the quantum to be large. The service resembled towage. I do not mean that there is any generic difference between towage and salvage. In the absence of a contract, the towing of a vessel in peril or disabled is salvage; but as a convenient word to distinguish an ordinary case of contract from one of salvage, "towage" is often used.

The increased use of tugs, and their rivalry, have operated to reduce the value of a salvage service in most of the ports to something not very much beyond the price of a towage contract contingent upon success. Competition has established what might almost be called a quantum meruit for cases of this kind. A striking illustration of this is found in the history of two cases which were tried in the southern district of New York. It had been held by the courts there that a corporation organized for saving vessels, and paying its men wages which did not vary with the service performed, could not be salvors. The decision was overruled by the supreme court: see The Morning Star, [Case No. 9,818;] The Camanche, 8 Wall. [75 U. S.] 448. In the mean time, two more cases of the kind had arisen in that district, and Judge Blatchford, refusing salvage, had allowed to the corporations what he called a liberal allowance for work and labor: The J. F. Farlan, [Case No. 7,313;] The Stratton Audley, [Id. 13,529] When these cases were reviewed in the circuit court, the decision of the supreme court had reversed the rule on which they were avowedly decided; but Judge Woodruff, nevertheless, affirmed the decrees, as having awarded a sufficient salvage: The J. F. Farlan, [Id. 7,314;] The Stratton Audley, [Id. 13,530.] That affirmance was wrong, unless Judge Blatchford had in fact, though not in name, given salvage. And such I suppose to be the case. He spoke of a liberal compensation; but liberality is salvage: there is no place for liberality in an action of contract. The circuit court in effect decided in those cases that salvage performed by means of towage in the harbor of New York should be compensated without any close attention to the amount saved, but rather as a liberal and enlarged compensation for work and labor. We are told by the privy council that value is never wholly lost sight of in these cases: The Amerique, L. R. 6 P. C. 468; and this is true; for the salvage for a small vessel might be much less than the worth of the time and labor employed; and, in a case precisely like this in other respects, if only $500 had been saved, no one would expect my decree to be what it will be in this case. The essential difference in assessing damages in contract and in salvage is, that in the former nothing can be considered but the means employed; in salvage, even when the value saved is left out of account, or nearly so, the general results are quite as important as the means used to accomplish them.

That the City of Valparaiso was in need of assistance, and that it was highly desirable that she should not lie on that shore beyond high water, was and is clear; more so, perhaps, since the amount of injury which she suffered has been found out than it was at the time. I should consider that her master and her owner, who was on board and was insured, had incurred a grave responsibility if they had not accepted assistance. If she had lain there twelve hours, no one will venture to say what the damage would have been.

When, therefore, some of the witnesses say that they do not think she was in peril, all they can mean is, that they believe she would have come off without assistance, not that her position, in itself considered, was not perilous. The weight of the evidence is, that by carrying out anchors and hauling on them with her winches, which were worked by steam, she could have applied as much and even more power in the general direction in which the tugs furnished it. But I have heard no witness say that this operation could have been successfully performed before high water; and I very much doubt it. High water was so near, that the witnesses dispute whether it had been actually reached or not when she came off; and that carrying out anchors would have been a slower work than hitching on a tug needs no testimony.

Most of the work was done by the steamer's engine, and by the large tug which makes no claim here. That which the libellants did appears to have been useful, and, I am inclined to think essential to the rescue at that time.

I have looked at many of the cases besides those already cited, to see how much has been given under various circumstances more or less like these. As well as I can estimate the intent of the courts, it has been to give to tugs what will be a handsome gratuity, enough to induce prompt and even eager assistance; and this would be enhanced slightly by a great value at risk, though in no important or definite proportion to value.

Taking all these circumstances into view, and intending to be liberal, I award to the Macy $800, to the Woolley $400, and costs.

NOTE, [from original report.] For the sense in which contract and salvage are contrasted with each other, see The Louisa Jane, [Case No. 8,532.]

BAKER v. HERTY.

[1 Cranch, C. C. 249.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. July Term, 1805.

ASSUMPSIT — QUANTUM MERUIT — AGREEMENT FOR EXTRA WORK.

Although there be an agreement that the value of extra work should be ascertained by persons mutually chosen, yet if such valuation has not been actually made, the plaintiff, in an action upon a quantum meruit, may give other evidence of the value of the work.

[See, contra, Fox v. Hempfield R. Co., Case No. 5,011.]

tra work; a special contract under seal having been made for building a house of a certain plan and description, which contained the following clause: "And it is mutually agreed upon that in case any misunderstanding shall take place in relation to the bill of particulars or any other misconception or want of appropriate words to convey the true intent and meaning of said parties, or in case any material alteration shall take place therein, so as to incur an extra expense to the contractor than that hereby contemplated, then and in either of said cases, a competent judge in the premises shall be chosen by each party, whose decision or extra valuation shall be conclusive and binding; and nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to enable either of the said parties to throw up or vary from this contract, and take another mode of valuation, either by the common mode of measure and value, or otherwise, instead thereof, but that such addition or reduction as shall or may be made in said work only, and valued as aforesaid, shall be binding on said respective parties."

Mr. Key, for the plaintiff, offered evidence of the value of digging an area, not contained in the original plan.

Mr. Hewitt, for the defendant, objected, and relied upon the above clause, as an agreement for another mode of ascertaining the value.

THE COURT overruled the objection and admitted the testimony.

Mr. Key offered evidence of a third story extra, and of other alterations made in the plan in the two lower stories.

Mr. Hewitt, having offered the agreement in evidence, objected to all the evidence given by the plaintiff, of extra work, alleging that it was provided for by the aforesaid clause in the agreement, and prayed the court to instruct the jury that they ought not to regard such evidence, it not being legal.

THE COURT refused. KILTY, Chief Judge, doubting as to the evidence respecting alterations in the two first stories, the original agreement being for a two-story house.

CRANCH, Circuit Judge. The whole extra work, whether it consist in alterations or additions to the original plan, or bill of particulars, is within the covenant; but as no persons have been chosen to ascertain the value of the extra work under that covenant, the plaintiff is not deprived of his original cause of action on a quantum meruit, and can only resort to the covenant for damages against the defendant for not appointing a person on his part to ascertain the value of the extra work. The defendant, in not paying for such work, has not committed any breach of that covenant.

BAKER v. JEFFERS et al.

[4 Cranch, C. C. 707.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. March Term, 1836.

LANDLORD AND TENANT—DISTRESS FOR RENT—APPORTIONMENT.

If the landlord evict the tenant from part of the premises, he cannot distrain for the rent. If he is entitled to an apportionment of the rent he may maintain an action for use and occupation; but if he is not entitled to an apportionment of the rent, he has no remedy.

Replevin [by Thomas Baker against Jeffers and Gideon.] Cognizance as bailiffs of Mrs. McGunnigle for rent-arrear; plea, an eviction by the landlady of a ten pin alley.

R. J. Brent, for the plaintiff, prayed the court to instruct the jury, in effect, that an eviction from a part of the premises suspends the payment of the rent. 1 Tuck. Bl. Comm. 27; 1 Saund. 204, note 7.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent) instructed the jury that if they should be satisfied by the evidence that the landlady, Mrs. McGunnigle, evicted the plaintiff from a part of the demised premises, she cannot recover in this action; because, if, at the time of the distress she was only entitled to an apportionment of the rent, and not to the whole rent, she had no right to distrain, but must resort to her action for use and occupation; and if it was not a case in which she was entitled to an apportionment, she cannot recover in any form of action.

Verdict for the plaintiff, and $50 damages.

BAKER v. KANSAS CITY TIMES CO.

[18 Amer. Law Reg. (N. S.) 101.]

Circuit Court, W. D. Missouri. 1879.

LIBEL—CHARGING MURDER—JUSTIFICATION.

[1. A party under reasonable apprehension of danger of life or great bodily harm has a right in self-defence to take the life of the aggressor, but he must have had no agency in bringing about the danger upon which he relies to justify the taking of life.]

[See note at end of case.]

[2. Where the deceased had published in his newspapers articles reflecting on the person accused of having committed the murder, and the latter, seeing the deceased on the street, crossed it, and addressed him, when the fatal quarrel took place, the jury must, in determining whether the accused person was guilty of murder, and in considering the intent of the accused in crossing the street and addressing the deceased, take into consideration the existing feeling and apprehension of the parties; and if they find that the accused calculated thereon to bring about a personal difficulty, he being prepared, and intending to make use of it if it occurred, the killing is not justified as self-defence, and is murder.]

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

[3. In an action for the publication of a libel charging plaintiff with being an accessory to a murder, an answer pleading the truth of the charge in justification, which charges the plaintiff with encouraging, countenancing, and supporting the person who did the killing, will be construed as pleading a legal justification, viz. the advising or commanding to kill.]

[See note at end of case.]

[4. In such action, the jury must, on a plea of the truth of the libel, consider the plaintiff as innocent of the crime until his guilt is established by evidence sufficient to produce an abiding conviction of his guilt.]

[See note at end of case.]

At law. This was an action for libel. [By F. P. Baker against the Kansas City Times Company.] Plea justification. The facts sufficiently appear in the charge.

M. J. Leaming, A. B. Jetmore, and H. B. Johnson, for plaintiff.

John K. Cravens and John W. Wofford, for defendant.

KREKEL, District Judge, charged the jury as follows: During the year 1877, there were published in Topeka, in the state of Kansas, two newspapers, one called the Commonwealth, owned and controlled by Floyd P. Baker, the plaintiff in this suit, the other called the Blade, controlled by J. Clark Swayze. During the same year, 1877, two other newspapers were published, one in Leavenworth, in the state of Kansas, known as the Leavenworth Times, the other in Kansas City, in the state of Missouri, known as the Kansas City Times, published by the defendant in this suit. The paper issued by this corporation is under the management and control of Morrison Mumford, who has testified in the case. In the Sunday's issue of the Kansas City Times, of April 1st, 1877, a communication appeared, dated Topeka, Kansas, March 29th, 1877, signed M. C. M., in which reference is made to Baker, plaintiff in this action, as follows: "The cloud of sorrow, caused by the felonious killing of J. Clark Swayze, has not yet passed away in this city; on the contrary, it thickens every hour, and the funeral of Mr. Swayze to-day, places a condemnation upon the villainous part which F. P. Baker took in the sacrifice of his life, seldom visited upon the acts of any man. * * * It was undoubtedly the object of those who conspired against the life of Mr. Swayze—Baker in particular—to murder the Blade by killing its editor; but in this they have signally failed, as the numerous assurances on part of the business men of Topeka, that the paper should have their undivided support, will show. I am reliably informed that ten new names were handed into the office last evening as subscribers to the Blade, all of whom had previously taken the murderer's organ." Of these two extracts, taken from and a part of the correspondence, Baker, the plaintiff, complains and brings his action against the Kansas City Times for damages.

To this complaint the defendant, the Kansas City Times, answers by setting up, first, the fact and circumstances under which the publication was made; next, a justification, alleging, "that said letter is true, for that the said F. P. Baker did, on the 28th day of March, 1877, and for some considerable time prior thereto, encourage and countenance the said John W. Wilson, in hostile acts toward the said Swayze, and in assaults upon the said Swayze, by the said Wilson, and so encouraged and supported by plaintiff said Wilson, did, on the 28th day of March, 1877, kill the said Swayze."

It becomes unnecessary to examine whether these pleas are technically and formally correct, for they have been replied to and treated as substantially sufficient. As this plea of justification disposes of the case in favor of the defendant, if found to be true, it is proper that it should be taken up first.

You will have to ascertain, in the first place, whether the correspondence charges that Swayze was murdered—that is, killed by Wilson, deliberately and with malice aforethought, for it would not be murder if Wilson had killed Swayze in self-defence. Should you come to the conclusion that the correspondence does charge that Wilson murdered Swayze, it will become your duty, in the second place to ascertain whether the charge is true. The defendant, the Kansas City Times, makes this allegation and is bound to prove it to your entire satisfaction. Now, for the purpose of ascertaining whether Wilson murdered Swayze, or acted in self-defence when he killed him, you will bring before your mind all the facts and circumstances testified to, existing prior to the killing, in order to arrive at the motives and intent with which Wilson went across the street and sought Swayze, as well as to ascertain the motives of Swayze in acting as he did. Wilson had a right to cross the street and remonstrate with Swayze against the publications in the Blade, and if that was the sole purpose with which he addressed Swayze, Wilson was in the right. But in trying to arrive at the intent of Wilson crossing the street and addressing Swayze, it will be proper for you to take into consideration the existing feeling and apprehensions of the parties, and if you shall find that Wilson calculated thereon as probably bringing about a personal difficulty—seeking rather than avoiding such—he, Wilson, being prepared, and intending, if such difficulty occurred, to make use of it for the purpose of killing Swayze, in such a case, Wilson cannot be said to have acted in self-defence, and the killing of Swayze would be murder. A party under reasonable apprehension of danger of life or great bodily harm, has a right in self-defence to take the life of the aggressor, but he must have had no agency in bringing about the danger upon which he relies to justify the taking of life. Should you, after a careful examination and consideration of the facts and circumstances testified to and connected with the case, come to the conclusion that Wilson, when he killed Swayze, acted in self-defence, then the defendant fails in making out his plea of justification, and you should find that issue for plaintiff. But if you shall find that Wilson did not act in self-defence in the killing of Swayze, then it becomes necessary for you to consider whether in the language of the plea of justification the plaintiff, Baker, encouraged, countenanced and supported Wilson in the murder of Swayze, so as to make him, Baker, accessory thereto.

In law, one becomes an accessory who is guilty of an act of felony, not by committing the offence in person, or as principal, but by advising or commanding another to commit the crime. You are therefore to determine from the testimony in the case whether Baker advised or commanded the murder of Swayze. The part of the answer setting up justification charges Baker with encouraging, countenancing, and supporting Wilson, terms of no well-defined legal signification when applied to a case such as the one before the court. I construe them to mean a legal justification, namely, the advising or commanding Wilson to murder Swayze. In trying to arrive at a conclusion as to whether Baker advised or commanded Wilson to murder Swayze, Baker is to be treated and considered by you as innocent of the crime of being accessory to the murder of Swayze by Wilson. The guilt of Baker must be shown by the defendant to your entire satisfaction, by which I here and elsewhere mean that the evidence in the case must produce an abiding conviction in your mind of the guilt of Baker. You should with care go over all the testimony in the case, and if you find expressions used or acts done by plaintiff, Baker, fairly admitting of two meanings, you are authorized to apply the meaning leading to innocence rather than guilt. In passing from this plea of justification I sum up as follows: First, ascertain from the correspondence complained of whether it intends to charge that Wilson murdered Swayze, and that Baker was accessory to the murder, and if you find that this is the case, you will next find whether Wilson did murder Swayze, or did the killing in self-defence. If you find that Wilson acted in self-defence, that ends the plea of justification, for there could be no murder when the killing was done in self-defence.

If you shall find that Wilson did not kill Swayze in self-defence, but committed a murder, you will next find whether Baker was accessory thereto, by advising or commanding the same. If you shall find that Baker was not accessory to the murder, such finding will end the plea of justification in favor of plaintiff. If you shall find that Wilson murdered Swayze, and you shall further find that Baker was accessory to the murder of Swayze, such finding establishes the plea of justification, ends the case, and you should find for defendant.

Turning from the plea of justification to the plea in mitigation pleaded by the defendant, I proceed to present the law regarding it, so that you may have the whole case before you. The law, proceeding upon the presumption of innocence, assumes when a crime is charged upon any one that he is innocent thereof, and presumes the charge to have been maliciously made. The author or publisher is permitted, as already explained, to show that the charge made is really true, and that the person charged is or has been guilty of the crime imputed to him. Upon sustaining the charge, the one making it is acquitted and stands justified, that is if he sustain his plea of justification. But if he fails to sustain his plea of justification, the author or publisher may show, in mitigation of damages, anything tending to establish that he acted without malice and bad intent, but from proper motives.

In cases such as the one under consideration the law will not allow the author or publisher to go free if he fails to establish his plea of justification, though he satisfy you of the purity of his motives and the greatest prudence and care in making the publication. The law requires a publisher not only to be satisfied of the truth of the charges he publishes, but he must also be able to establish them to the satisfaction of a jury, in case he is sued. If the plea of justification pleaded in this case has not been made out by the defendant, it will then be necessary for you to examine into the mitigating circumstances in evidence, so as to enable you to determine the good faith, prudence and caution exercised by the defendant in making the publication, as upon this, in a large measure, must depend the amount of damages which you may assess against the defendant. You will call to mind the undisputed fact that the correspondent, Morris, was not connected with the Kansas City Times, and determine whether more or less care should be required at their hands when receiving a correspondence from a stranger. The manner in which the correspondence was received, the gravity of the charge and the action of the conductor of the Times, in refusing or neglecting to retract the charges made in the communication, when his attention was called to it by the plaintiff, are proper for your consideration, as is also the duty which the conductor of a newspaper such as the Times owes to the public, as well as the legal obligation which he is under to the plaintiff. You are to guard, on the one hand, the right of plaintiff, and on the other the freedom of the press, which is measurably involved in cases of this kind. There is no claim for special damages made by plaintiff, and none has been proven. While it is your duty, in case the plea of justification has not been made out, to find damages against this defendant, the amount thereof is left to your discretion, which you will exercise with due regard to the parties.

[NOTE.

[DEGREE OF PROOF REQUIRED IN CIVIL ACTIONS WHERE THE COMMISSION OF A CRIMINAL OFFENSE IS IN ISSUE.

[In the note to this case, published in 18 Amer. Law Reg. (N. S.) at page 108, the annotator, after setting forth the instruction, states that the court "declined to instruct that the offense charged must be proved beyond a reasonable doubt, or with the certainty required to sustain an indictment;" but it has since been held that the direction that the evidence must be such as to produce in the minds of the jury an abiding conviction as to plaintiff's guilt as to the crime charged is in effect a direction that the proof must be beyond a reasonable doubt. Battles v. Tallman, (Ala.) 11 South. 247; Griffith v. State, 90 Ala. 588, 8 South. 812; Hopt v. Utah, 120 U. S. 430, 7 Sup. Ct. 618.

[There has been much discussion of the early rule as to the degree of proof required, not only in cases of libel and slander where a charge of crime is sought to be justified, but generally as to the degree of proof in other civil actions where the fact of a crime is in issue,—as on fire insurance policies where the defense relies on proof that the insured caused the loss, quasi criminal actions to recover penalties, actions to recover for selling liquor to minors in violation of state statutes, and the like; and in consequence thereof the rule, as originally laid down, has been the subject of much change and modification.

[The rule was originally established and laid down in Thurtell v. Beaumont, 1 Bing. 339, 8 E. C. L. 538, and in Chalmers v. Shackell, 6 Car. & P. 475, and is to the effect that in civil actions to recover damages for a criminal act, or where the defense seeks to prove a criminal offense, to defeat the action the same degree of proof will be required as would be necessary to convict upon an indictment for the crime; is still recognized in a number of the states, although unsupported in the English courts, except in cases of libel and slander, (Kane v. Hibernia Ins. Co., 39 N. J. Law, 704;) followed in other states with evident reluctance, and expressly repudiated in the majority. This rule, as is said in Continental Ins. Co. v. Jachnichen, 110 Ind. 59, 10 N. E. 637, "has its foundation in the tender regard in which the law holds the life and liberty of the subject. It had its origin, and was molded into form and consistency, when the penal code of England visited upon offenses of a comparatively trivial character the most harsh and cruel punishment. To mitigate the rigor of a code sometimes administered with severity, humane judges ingrafted upon the common law the rule that no one should be convicted of a crime which affected life or liberty until his guilt was established with such a degree of certainty as to exclude every reasonable doubt. Having grown up out of the humanity of the law, the rule is very properly retained in criminal cases, even after the reasons for it have in a good measure ceased to exist. The consequences of a mistake where life and liberty are involved are so overwhelming and irreparable that the integrity of the rule which requires a greater degree of certainty and caution in such a case, before coming to a conclusion, than in a case which affects property merely, should be steadily maintained and intelligently applied. This can only be done by limiting it to the class of cases which called it into being. To extend it is to render it obscure, and dissipate its benign effect in the cases where its benefits should be fully realized. In some exceptional cases the doctrine that, where a criminal act is charged in a civil action, the crime imputed must be established beyond a reasonable doubt, has gained recognition; notably in cases of libel and slander, when the defendant undertook to justify the uttering or publishing of that which amounted to a felony, and in cases where the action involved the burning of property under circumstances which amounted to arson. The rule was first extended to cases of libel and slander in England. The reason for the extension of the rule there was that if, upon the trial of a plea of justification of a charge which imputed a felony, the defendant proved the plea, the plaintiff was subject to be put upon trial for the felony proved, without the intervention of a grand jury. The verdict in such a case was equivalent to an indictment of the plaintiff. No such reason ever existed in this country for the application of the rule, and it may therefore be said it has been applied without any adequate reason." See, also, Ellis v. Buzzell, 60 Me. 209; Fowler v. Wallace, 131 Ind. 347, 31 N. E. 56.

[In Alabama, a mere preponderance of proof is sufficient in civil actions where the fact of the commission of a crime is put in issue. Adams v. Thornton, 78 Ala. 489, overruling Steele v. Kinkle, 3 Ala. 352; Tompkins v. Nichols, 53 Ala. 197. In California, proof beyond a reasonable doubt is required. Merk v. Gelzhaeuser, 50 Cal. 631. In Connecticut, in an action to recover treble damages, given by statute, for property feloniously taken, the court held that neither the fact that the issue involved the felonious taking, nor the fact that the action was for treble damages, altered the rule as to the degree of proof in civil cases. Munson v. Atwood, 30 Conn. 102. Hinman, J., concurring, denied that there was any distinction in law between civil and criminal cases as to the amount of evidence which ought to be required by a court or jury in order to find a fact; that the evidence must be such as to satisfy the mind of the truth of a fact; and that, when the mind was thus satisfied, there could be, of course, no reasonable doubt. See, also, Mead v. Husted, 52 Conn. 53. In Delaware, a mere preponderance of proof is necessary. State v. Gouldsborough, 1 Houst. Crim. Cas. 316. But otherwise in Florida. Schultz v. Pacific Ins. Co., 14 Fla. 73; Williams v. Dickenson, 28 Fla. 90, 9 South. 847. In the latter case the supreme court followed Schultz v. Pacific Ins. Co. with evident reluctance, and intimated that, if the question had been presented as an original proposition, it would have enunciated a contrary doctrine. In Georgia, preponderance of proof is sufficient. Schnell v. Toomer, 56 Ga. 168. In Illinois, proof of such an issue must be beyond a reasonable doubt. Germania Fire Ins. Co. v. Klewer, 129 Ill. 599, 22 N. E. 489; Sprague v. Dodge, 48 Ill. 142; McConnel v. Delaware M. S. Ins. Co., 18 Ill. 228; Webster v. People, 14 Ill. 365. But see Howell v. Hartford Fire Ins. Co., (U. S. Cir. Ct. N. D. Ill.) Case No. 6,780. A wife in a suit under the civil damage act is not required to make out her case beyond a reasonable doubt, but only by a preponderance of the evidence. Robinson v. Randall, 82 Ill. 521. And so in an action brought under the dramshop act to recover damages for selling liquors to a minor. Proctor v. People, 24 Ill. App. 599. In Indiana, the rule requiring proof beyond a reasonable doubt still exists. Byrket v. Monohon, 7 Blackf. 83; Lanter v. McEwen, 8 Blackf. 495; Gants v. Vinard, 1 Ind. 476; Swails v. Butcher, 2 Ind. 84; Wonderly v. Nokes, 8 Blackf. 589; Landis v. Shanklin, 1 Ind. 92; Shoulty v. Miller, Id. 544. Tull v. David, 27 Ind. 377; Bissell v. Wert, 35 Ind. 60; Tucker v. Call, 45 Ind. 31; Wilson v. Barnett, Id. 163; Hutts v. Hutts, 62 Ind. 214. To bring the case within the rule, there must be a specific charge of the crime, and not a charge by implication. Bissell v. Wert, 35 Ind. 60. Nor will it be sufficient that the facts charged involve the party in the moral turpitude of a crime. Id. Also, see Reynolds v. State, 117 Ind. 421, 17 N. E. 909. In Continental Ins. Co. v. Jachnichen, 110 Ind. 59, 10 N. E. 636, it is said that a civil action is subject to the rules of evidence belonging to actions of that class, without regard to the fact that the matter in issue may involve the commission of a crime. In Hale v. Matthews, 118 Ind. 531, 21 N. E. 43, the rule is recognized as applying to cases of libel and slander only, and as not extending to other civil actions. And in a very late case (Fowler v. Wallace, 131 Ind. 347, 31 N. E. 53) the majority of the supreme court, while adhering to the rule, say: "We are satisfied that the rule grew out of a misconception of principle, and we should be glad to escape from it; and, if we were not compelled by duty, we should decline to give it our adherence." The rule in this state never had application in bastardy proceedings. State v. Evans, 19 Ind. 92; Byers v. State, 20 Ind. 47; State v. Brown, 44 Ind. 329; Glenn v. State, 46 Ind. 368. In Iowa, the rule of the English cases cited prevailed for a considerable time, see Ellis v. Lindley, 38 Iowa, 461; Woodward v. Squires, 39 Iowa, 435; and Barton v. Thompson, 46 Iowa, 30; Mott v. Dawson, 46 Iowa, 533; but now a mere preponderance of proof is sufficient, Barton v. Thompson, 56 Iowa, 571, 9 N. W. 899; Welch v. Jugenheimer, 56 Iowa, 11, 8 N. W. 673; Behrens v. Germania Ins. Co., 58 Iowa, 26, 11 N. W. 719; Kendig v. Overhulser, 58 Iowa, 195, 12 N. W. 264; Coit v. Churchill, 61 Iowa, 296, 16 N. W. 147; and Riley v. Norton, 65 Iowa, 306, 21 N. W. 649, overruling Forshee v. Abrams, 2 Iowa, 571; Fountain v. West, 23 Iowa, 9; Ellis v. Buzzell, supra. Likewise in Kentucky. Aetna Ins. Co. v. Johnson, 11 Bush. 587. In Louisiana, a preponderance only is required. Hoffman v. Western M. & F. Ins. Co., 1 La. Ann. 216; Wightman v. Insurance Co., 8 Rob. 442. In Maine, in the leading case, (Ellis v. Buzzell, 60 Me. 209,) the court says: "We think it time to limit the application of a rule which was originally adopted in favorem vitae, in the days of a sanguinary penal code, to cases arising on the criminal docket, and no longer to suffer it to obstruct or incumber the action of juries in civil suits sounding only in damages." See, also, Knowles v. Scribner, 57 Me. 495; Decker v. Somerset Ins. Co., 66 Me. 406. Prior to Ellis v. Buzzell, the contrary doctrine had prevailed. See Thayer v. Boyle, 30 Me. 475; Butman v. Hobbs, 35 Me. 228. The rule requiring a preponderance of proof only is in force in Maryland. See McBee v. Fulton, 47 Md. 429, in which it is said that the rule requiring proof beyond a reasonable doubt in civil cases is appropriate only to the trial of issues between the state and a person charged with crime, and exposed to penal consequences if the verdict is against him. In Massachusetts, the court, in a case before it after the passage of the new practice act, said: "If there be any class of civil cases in which the instruction usually given in criminal cases might be required, it would be that class where the defendant has in a special plea fully and directly charged upon the plaintiff a crime, and where the same evidence must be adduced to support the plea as would be required upon an indictment for the like offense. But this principle would not apply to an action on contract where no special plea is required, as in the present system of pleading." Schmidt v. New York Union Mut. F. Ins. Co., 1 Gray, 529. And the court, in a later case, holding an instruction in a civil case requiring proof beyond a reasonable doubt to be erroneous, said: "It is better that the rule be uniform in all cases, leaving the instruction that the jury must be satisfied of the guilt of a party beyond a reasonable doubt to apply solely to criminal cases. Gordon v. Parmelee, 15 Gray, 413. In Michigan, in the case of Elliott v. Van Buren, 33 Mich. 49, Campbell, J., delivering the opinion, says: "There is no rule of evidence which requires a greater preponderance of proof to authorize a verdict in one civil action than in another, by reason of the peculiar questions involved. * * * There is no rule of law which adopts any sliding scale of belief in civil controversies." See, also, Semon v. People, 42 Mich. 141, 3 N. W. 304; Peoples v. Evening News, 51 Mich. 11, 16 N. W. 185; Hough v. Dickinson, 58 Mich. 89, 24 N. W. 809; People v. Hillhouse, 80 Mich. 580, 45 N. W. 484. In Minnesota, proof of fraudulent representations in an action for fraud need only be proved by a preponderance of evidence, where the averments of the complaint do not amount to a statutory charge of the crime. Burr v. Willson, 22 Minn. 206. And see Thoreson v. Northwestern Nat. Ins. Co., 29 Minn. 107, 12 N. W. 154. And now in Missouri, a preponderance of proof is sufficient. Smith v. Burrus, 106 Mo. 94, 16 S. W. 881; Edwards v. George Knapp & Co., 97 Mo. 432, 10 S. W. 54, following Marshall v. Thames Fire Ins. Co., 43 Mo. 586, and overruling Polston v. See, 54 Mo. 291. See, also, Rothschild v. American Cent. Ins. Co., 62 Mo. 356. But see Elder v. Oliver, 30 Mo. App. 575. And so in Nebraska, at least as far as bastardy proceedings are concerned. Strickler v. Grass, 32 Neb. 811, 49 N. W. 804, following Altschuler v. Algaza, 16 Neb. 631, 21 N. W. 407. In New Hampshire, the rule of Thurtell v. Beaumont, supra, never prevailed, one reason given being that, whatever the verdict might be, no punishment or disability was incurred. Matthews v. Huntley, 9 N. H. 150; Folsom v. Brawn, 5 Fost. (25 N. H.) 114. In New Jersey, it was held that the defense of usury must be proved beyond a reasonable doubt, Conover v. Van Mater, 3 C. E. Green, (18 N. J. Eq.) 481; Taylor v. Morris, 7 C. E. Green, (22 N. J. Eq.) 606; also a charge of adultery in an action for divorce, Berckmans v. Berckmans, 17 N. J. Eq. 453. But now it seems that a similar doctrine to that of Indiana prevails. Kane v. Hibernia Ins. Co., 39 N. J. Law, 704, reversing 38 N. J. Law, 449. The latter case states that Thurtell v. Beaumont stands alone and unsupported in the English courts, except in actions of libel and slander, and has but a slender support in this country; denies its application to actions on insurance policies; and confines it to actions for libel and slander. In New York, the English doctrine was followed in the early cases, Woodbeck v. Keller, 6 Cow. 118; Clark v. Dibble, 16 Wend. 601; Hopkins v. Smith, 3 Barb. 602; but is now repudiated, and the present rule seems to be that in all civil actions the party upon whom the burden of proof rests as to an issue is not bound to establish it beyond a reasonable doubt. It is sufficient if there is a fair preponderance of evidence in his favor. Johnson v. Agricultural Ins. Co., 25 Hun, 251; Freund v. Paten, 10 Abb. N. C. 311; Davis v. Rome, W. & O. R. Co., (Sup.) 10 N. Y. Supp. 334; People v. Briggs, 47 Hun, 266, affirmed 114 N. Y. 56, 20 N. E. 820; New York Guaranty & Indemnity Co. v. Gleason, 78 N. Y. 503; Stearns v. Field, 90 N. Y. 640; Seybolt v. New York, etc., R. Co., 95 N. Y. 562; Lewis v. Shull, 67 Hun, 543, 22 N. Y. Supp. 484. In Ferry Co. v. Moore, 102 N. Y. 667, 6 N. E. 293, it is laid down that, "there is no rule of law which requires the plaintiff in a civil action, when a judgment against the defendant may establish his guilt of a crime, to prove his guilt with the same certainty which is required in criminal prosecutions." And in People v. Briggs, 114 N. Y. 56, 20 N. E. 820, the court of appeals, citing the last case with approval, says: "There is no apparent reason for making any distinction * * * in behalf of a defendant in an action for a penalty in which the people are the party plaintiff. It is no less a civil action because so brought. The purpose of the action is not the 'punishment' of the defendant, in the sense legitimately applicable to the term, but such action is brought to recover the penalty as a fixed sum, by way of indemnity to the public for the injury suffered by reason of the violation of the statute. The effect of the recovery is merely to charge the defendant with pecuniary liability, while a criminal prosecution is had for the purpose of punishment of the accused." In North Carolina, the rule in criminal cases that the jury must be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt has no application in civil cases. Kincade v. Bradshaw, 3 Hawks, 63; Rippey v. Miller, 1 Jones, 479, 62 Amer. Dec. 177, and note. Likewise in Ohio, Jones v. Greaves, 26 Ohio St. 2; though the contrary doctrine was formerly maintained, Lexington F. L. & M. Ins. Co. v. Paver, 16 Ohio, 324; Strader v. Mullane, 17 Ohio St. 624. In Jones v. Greaves, supra, it is said that the reason of the rule in criminal cases is that of humanity. See Lyon v. Fleahman, 34 Ohio St. 151; Bell v. McGinness, 40 Ohio St. 204. In Pennsylvania, the rule is declared to be that, where the cause of action is founded upon a crime imputed, something more than a preponderance of proof is necessary; the presumption of innocence must be overcome by evidence so preponderating as to lead to the conclusion that the act complained of was committed,—something more than is required in a civil action, and less than is required in a criminal case. Catasauqua Manuf'g Co. v. Hopkins, 141 Pa. St. 30, 21 Atl. 638. And see Woddrop v. Thacher, 117 Pa. St. 340, 11 Atl. 621; also, Young v. Edwards, 72 Pa. St. 257; Steinman v. McWilliams, 6 Barr. (6 Pa. St.) 170. In Tennessee, an issue in a civil action involving a charge of crime merely requires to be proved by a preponderance of evidence. McBee v. Bowman, 89 Tenn. 132, 14 S. W. 481; Gage v. Louisville, N. O. & T. R. Co., 88 Tenn. 726, 14 S. W. 73; Chapman v. McAdams, 1 Lea, 500; Hills v. Goodyear, 4 Lea, 236. Bradish v. Bliss, 35 Vt. 326, (11th Ann. Ed. 117,) holds that there is no middle class of cases, and that the rule of evidence as to civil actions applies to all civil actions, whether or not criminal in their nature. And see, also, Burnett v. Ward, 42 Vt. 80, (13th Ann. Ed. 31,) holding that the rule does not apply to an action upon a statute giving cumulative damages; and Weston v. Gravlin, 49 Vt. 507, (15th Ann. Ed. 186,) a case of trespass for malicious injury; and see Currier v. Richardson, 63 Vt. 617, 22 Atl. 625. In Virginia, the rule of Thurtell v. Beaumont is adhered to. Warner v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 105. And so in West Virginia. State v. Ralphsnyder, 34 W. Va. 352, 12 S. E. 721. And likewise applied in contempt proceedings. State v. Cunningham, 33 W. Va. 607, 11 S. E. 76. But otherwise in Wisconsin. Washington Union Ins. Co. v. Wilson, 7 Wis. 169, followed in Wright v. Hardy, 22 Wis. 348, approved in Blaeser v. Milwaukee, etc., Ins. Co., 37 Wis. 31. Pryce v. Security Ins. Co., 29 Wis. 270, sometimes cited as overruling the principle of Washington Union Ins. Co. v. Wilson, supra, is said in Blaeser v. Milwaukee, etc., Ins. Co., supra, not to conflict with it. See Freeman v. Freeman, 31 Wis. 235, an action for divorce. And see the valuable note attributed to John H. May, sometime editor of Greenleaf's Evidence, in 10 Amer. Law Rev. 642.

[The decisions of the United States circuit courts are to the effect that a mere preponderance of proof is sufficient in actions to recover penalties. U. S. v. Brown, (Or. 1869,) Case No. 14,662, an action to recover a penalty for violation of the internal revenue act, (14 Stat. 144,) and Hawloetz v. Kass, (S. D. N. Y. 1885,) 25 Fed. 765, an action to recover the penalty prescribed by Rev. St. § 4901, for printing the word "patented" on an unpatented article; and also in actions on fire insurance policies, where a defense of willful burning of the insured property is interposed. Huchberger v. Merchants' Fire Ins. Co., (N. D. Ill. 1868,) Case No. 6,822; Scott v. Home Ins. Co., Id. 12,533. But in the supreme court of the United States the view is taken that proceedings for the purpose of declaring a forfeiture of a man's property by reason of offenses committed by him, though civil in form, are in their nature criminal, and that suits for penalties and forfeitures incurred by the commission of offenses against the law, of a quasi criminal nature, are within the reason of criminal proceedings. Boyd v. U. S., 116 U. S. 616, 16 Sup. Ct. 524. In U. S. v. The Burdett, 9 Pet. (34 U. S.) 682, a proceeding to forfeit a vessel because of foreign ownership, the court said that "no individual should be punished for a violation of law which inflicts a forfeiture of property, unless the offense is established beyond a reasonable doubt." And so in an action by the United States to recover a statutory penalty for violation of section 48 of the revenue act of June 30, 1864, the court held it incumbent on the government to prove the offense beyond a reasonable doubt. Chaffe v. U. S., 18 Wall. (85 U. S.) 516. And see Wisconsin v. Pelican Ins. Co., 127 U. S. 265, 8 Sup. Ct. 1370.

[In a well-considered case, recently decided,—U. S. v. Shapleigh, (Jan., 1893,) 4 C. C. A. 237, 54 Fed. 126,—it was decided, following the principles laid down in the supreme court decisions, that in an action under Rev. St. U. S. § 3490, to recover over $300,000, penalties from defendant for presenting a false and fraudulent claim against the United States, the government must prove its case beyond a reasonable doubt; but the reasons given by the learned judge in his opinion for the application of the rule of evidence were principally that the penalties sought to be inflicted were far heavier than any the court would probably have inflicted on a conviction for the crime, stating: "In each proceeding the same government, with its unlimited resources, proceeds against the same citizen to punish him for the same crimes, and in each the single question for the jury to determine is, was this defendant guilty of these felonies? Every consideration which induced the courts to establish the rule that the prosecutor must prove the crime charged beyond a reasonable doubt—the inequality of the parties in power, situation, and advantage; the purpose of the proceeding, which is the punishment of the defendant, not compensation for injury; the irreparable disgrace and injury that must result to the defendant from an unjust recovery; and the presumption of his innocence,—demands that this rule be applied to the latter to the same extent as it would be to the former proceeding. It is not the form, but the nature, of this proceeding, that must determine the rule to be applied to it." Notwithstanding, however, the decision in this particular case, the court recognized that "it is now settled by the great current of authorities in this country that, where a criminal act is alleged in a civil suit,—i. e. civil not in form merely, but in nature and purpose,—proof of the criminal act beyond a reasonable doubt is not required to warrant a verdict or decision in favor of the party who makes the allegation;" citing a number of cases.]

BAKER v. MIX.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 525.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. Term, 1824.

GARNISHMENT—ISSUE JOINED BETWEEN PLAINTIFF AND GARNISHEE—ENTITLING DEPOSITIONS.

When the issue is joined between the plaintiff and the garnishee, in behalf of himself and his principal, the depositions must be entitled as of a suit between the plaintiff and the garnishee, and not between the plaintiff and the principal defendant.

Attachment, [by John W. Baker against Elijah Mix, garnishee of John Bulkley, surviving partner of John Bulkley & Co.,] under the Maryland act of 1795, c. 56. The garnishee appeared and pleaded, 1st. That the said John Bulkley & Co. had fully performed the covenant on their part; upon the replication to which plea issue was joined. 2d. That he, the garnishee, had no effects of the principal debtor in his hands; upon the replication to which, issue was also joined.

At the trial of these issues, Mr. Marbury, for the defendant, offered in evidence a deposition, taken under the act of congress, in a suit in which John W. Baker was plaintiff, and John Bulkley was defendant.

Mr. Redin, for the plaintiff, objected to the reading of the deposition, because it was not taken in this suit, which is between Baker and Mix and not between Baker and Bulkley. Smith v. Coleman, [Case No. 13,029,] in this court, at April term, 1821, in this county, and Peyton v. Veitch, [Id. 11,057,] at November term, 1816, in Alexandria.

Mr. Marbury, in reply. By the 4th section of the act of 1795, c. 56, "the garnishee may plead, in behalf of the defendant, such plea or pleas as the said defendant might or could do if he had been taken by the sheriff under the writ of capias ad respondendum issued as aforesaid, and had accordingly appeared to the same." When the garnishee thus pleads in behalf of the principal, it becomes substantially a suit between the plaintiff and the principal, and may truly be entitled as such. The suit was originally brought against the principal, and was so entitled until the garnishee appeared; and if perjury were committed upon the trial, it might be averred in the indictment, and proved to have been in an action between the plaintiff and the principal. Although the garnishee has pleaded for himself as well as for his principal, the issue upon the plea for the principal is, in effect, a suit between the plaintiff and the principal, and may be averred to be such. Dale v. Beer, 7 East, 333.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent) thought that Bulkley, not having appeared, could not be considered as a party in the cause, and rejected the deposition. [See Baker v. Mix, Case No. 775.]

Case No. 775.

BAKER v. MIX.

[3 Cranch, C. C. 1.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. Term, 1826.

GARNISHMENT—PROCEDURE—NULLA BONA—ASSIGNMENT OF DEBT.

An assignment of the debt by the defendant to a third person, with notice to the garnishee, before service of the attachment, cannot be given in evidence upon trial of the issue of nulla bona, but must be pleaded specially.

[At law. Proceeding by John W. Baker against Elijah Mix, garnishee of Buckley & Co. See Baker v. Mix, Case No. 774.]

Under the plea of nulla bona by the garnishee, he offered in evidence a deed of assignment by Buckley, as surviving partner of Buckley & Co., to one Thomas Pryer, of all the effects of that firm, including the debt due to them by the garnishee, with notice thereof to the garnishee before the service of the plaintiff's attachment.

Mr. Reddin, for the plaintiff, objected to the evidence, and contended that the assignment could not be given in evidence upon the issue of nulla bona, but should have been specially pleaded, and cited 2 Har. Ent. 308, and Serg. Attachm. 91, 93, that a garnishee may plead an assignment.

Mr. Marbury, contra, contended that it was good evidence for the garnishee on the plea of nulla bona.

But the COURT, (CRANCH, Chief Judge, contra,) rejected the evidence on the issue of nulla bona.

Mr. Marbury moved for a new trial on the ground that the court erred in rejecting the evidence, and the motion came on to be argued at December term, 1826.

Mr. Marbury for the garnishee. Infancy may be given in evidence upon the general issue; so may coverture; yet in one case the plaintiff may reply, necessaries; and, in the other, special matter avoiding the marriage; so a parol release, or payment, and most matters in discharge of the action. 1 Chit. Pl. 471; Miller v. Aris, 3 Esp. 234; Sullivan v. Montague, 1 Doug. 106; Serg. Attachm. 93; Wood v. Roach, 2 Dall. [2 U. S.] 180; Steuart v. West, 1 Har. & J. 536; Harding v. Hull, 5 Har. & J. 478; U. S. v. Vaughan, 3 Bin. 400.

Mr. Reddin, contra. The plea of nulla bona goes only to the existence of the debt; an assignment does not show the debt is not due, and therefore should be pleaded specially. It admits the debt to be due at law, and is only a kind of equitable defence which the plaintiff, who had no notice of the assignment, did not come prepared to answer upon the issue of nulla bona. 1 Chit. Pl. 408. In the case from 3 Bin. 400, there was no question as to the form of the plea. In the case from 1 Har. & J. 536, the note was negotiable so that there was no debt to the defendant after his indorsement; and in the case from 5 Har. & J. 478, the assignment transferred the legal title, as well as the equitable. REMOVAL OF SUIT UNDER ACT OF MARCH 3, 1875—TIME IN WHICH APPLICATION MUST BE MADE TO REMOVE SUITS PENDING WHEN THAT ACT TOOK EFFECT—INFORMAL BOND HELD SUFFICIENT.

1. Where, in a suit pending in a state court at the time of the passage of the act of March 3, 1875, [18 Stat. 470,] the non-resident plaintiff applied to the state court, at the first term after that act went into effect, for its removal, and his petition showed a case proper for removal, and his bond, with sureties, was accepted by the state court, and the removal ordered to the circuit court, in which latter court a copy of the record in the suit was duly filed by the plaintiff and his appearance entered as required —on a motion by defendant to remand the cause to the state court: Held, that the petition for the removal was in time, being filed before the trial and at the first term after the passage of the act of March 3, 1875.

2. Held, that, although the condition of the bond for the removal was in conformity with the act of July 27, 1866, [14 Stat. 306,] and omitted the condition required by the act of March 3, 1875, as to paying costs that may be awarded by the circuit court for a wrongful or improper removal thereto, yet, as the case was one proper for removal, and the bond had been accepted by the state court, and the record was filed and the appearance of the plaintiff in the circuit court entered in time, the omitted clause in the condition of the bond was not sufficient ground for remanding the suit to the state court.

CHINESE — RESIDENCE — TREATY — POWERS OF A STATE — LEGISLATIVE ACT IN CONFLICT WITH TREATY — MULTIFARIOUSNESS — CONTRACTORS—REMEDY AT LAW.

1. The right to reside in a foreign country implies the right to labor there for a living.

[Cited in Re Parrott, 1 Fed. 507.]

[See In re Ah Chong, 2 Fed. 733, and In re Quong Woo, 13 Fed. 229.]

2. A state has no power to interfere with or in any way limit the operation of a treaty of the United States.

3. If it be admitted that a state has the general power to say who it will employ, or who its contractors shall employ, still the state being a member of the Union, and subordinate in the exercise of its general powers to the constitution of the United States and the laws and treaties made in pursuance thereof, it cannot exercise this power in any case where it conflicts with the operation of such constitution, laws or treaties.

4. A legislative act of the state of Oregon, which prohibits the employment by contractors of Chinese upon street improvements or public works, but permits all other aliens to be so employed, is in conflict with the treaty between the United States and the emperor of China, which secures to the Chinese, resident here, the same right to be employed and labor for a living as the subjects of any other nation, and is therefore void.

5. Parties having distinct claims against the same defendant cannot maintain a suit in equity thereon, jointly; and a bill containing two or more such claims is multifarious.

6. Any number of persons who may from time to time be engaged in making street improvements under several and distinct contracts with the city are not therefore a class of persons having a common interest in the subject of street improvements concerning which any one or more may sue for the whole.

7. A party threatened with proceedings under a void act has an adequate remedy at law.

[In equity. Suit by Perry Baker and others to enjoin the city of Portland from enforcing a state law prohibiting the employment of Chinese laborers for certain purposes. Defendant demurs. Demurrer sustained.]

James G. Chapman, for complainants.

F. O. McCown and Julius C. Moreland, for defendant.

DEADY, District Judge. This suit is brought to injoin the city of Portland from enforcing an act of the legislature, approved October 16, 1872, (Sess. Laws, p. 9,) entitled "An act to prohibit the employment of Chinese laborers on the improvement of streets and public works in this state." It provides, that "It shall be unlawful to employ any Chinese laborers on any street, or part of street, of any city or incorporated town of this state, or on any public works or public improvement of any character, except as a punishment for crime, and all contracts which any person or corporation may have for the improvement of any such street, or part of street, or public works or improvements of any character, shall be null and void from and after the date of any employment of any Chinese laborers thereon by the contractor."

The bill alleges that the complainants "are residents, citizens, property holders and taxpayers" of Portland, and now are and have been for many years engaged in the business of contracting for and making street improvements therein; that the defendant by its mayor and common council now require the complainants and other contractors to give bonds not to employ any Chinese labor upon such improvements, and threatens to refuse payment to any contractor and declare him delinquent who shall do so; that the said act of the legislature and the acts of the defendant thereunder are contrary to the constitution and laws of the United States and its treaty with the Ta-Tsing empire and contrary to the rights of "the complainants and other property holders, residents, citizens and taxpayers" of Portland and "the contractors and bidders upon the street improvements and other public works of the defendant; that the work upon the streets of the defendant is required by law to be let to the lowest responsible bidder, and that the defendant has contracted for and is about to contract for upwards of fifty thousand dollars worth of work upon its streets to be done this season, and has required, and declares that it will in all cases require contractors and bidders to give bond not to employ Chinese labor upon such work; that "said acts of the defendant done and threatened are and will be an irreparable injury to the complainants and other contractors and bidders" upon the street improvements of Portland and "to other residents, citizens, property holders and taxpayers" of the same, of many thousands of dollars; that "the injury to the complainants in the completion of their several contracts with defendant, already entered into for street improvements," by reason of being compelled to give bond as aforesaid, and "the threats and declarations of defendant to prohibit the employment of Chinese laborers upon its street improvements" by the means aforesaid "will amount to upwards of one thousand dollars."

Upon reading and filing the bill—July 7—an order was made that the defendant show cause why a provisional injunction should not issue as prayed for. The defendant showed cause by demurring to the bill which on July 14 was argued by counsel.

The demurrer sets up: 1. That this court has no jurisdiction to grant the relief prayed for; 2. That the bill is without equity; 3. That the complainants have no privity of interest, and are therefore improperly joined as parties; and, 4. That complainants have "a full and complete remedy at law."

As to the want of jurisdiction, it is claimed that it does not appear that the matter in dispute exceeds the sum of five hundred dollars, but on the hearing it was tacitly admitted that otherwise this was a case of federal cognizance, because arising under a treaty made by authority of the United States—namely, the treaty of June 18, 1858, [12 Stat. 1023,] and the additional articles thereto of July 28, 1868, [16 Stat. 739,] between the United States and the emperor of China.

Article 5 of said additional articles declares that the two high contracting parties "cordially recognize the inherent and inalienable right of man to change his home and allegiance, and also the mutual advantage of the free migration and emigration of their citizens and subjects respectively from the one country to the other, for the purpose of curiosity, of trade, or as permanent residents," while article 6 of the same declares that "Chinese subjects visiting or residing in the United States shall enjoy the same privileges, immunities and exemptions in respect to travel or residence as may be then enjoyed by the citizens or subjects of the most favored nation," and that citizens of the United States visiting or residing in China shall enjoy there the same privileges, etc. Public Treaties U. S. 148.

This treaty, until it is abrogated or modified by the political department of the government, is the supreme law of the land, and the courts are bound to enforce it fully and fairly. An honorable man keeps his word under all circumstances, and an honorable nation abides by its treaty obligations, even to its own disadvantage.

The state cannot legislate so as to interfere with the operation of this treaty or limit or deny the privileges or immunities guaranteed by it to the Chinese residents in this country. As was said by Mr. Justice Field in the "queue ordinance case," lately decided in the circuit court for the district of California, [Ho Ah Kow v. Nunan, Case No. 6,546,] to the national government "belong exclusively the treaty-making power and the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, which includes intercourse as well as traffic. * * * That government alone can determine what aliens shall be permitted to land within the United States and upon what conditions they shall be permitted to remain."

It will be observed that the treaty recognizes the right of the Chinese to change their home and allegiance and to visit this country and become permanent residents thereof, and as such residents it guarantees to them all the privileges and immunities that may be enjoyed here by the citizens or subjects of any nation. Therefore, if the state can restrain and limit the Chinese in their labor and pursuits within its limits, it may do the same by the subjects of Great Britain, France, or Germany.

True, this act does not undertake to exclude the Chinese from all kinds and fields of employment. But if the state, notwithstanding the treaty, may prevent the Chinese or the subjects of Great Britain from working upon street improvements and public works, it is not apparent why it may not prevent them from engaging in any kind of employment or working at any kind of labor.

Nor can it be said with any show of reason or fairness that the treaty does not contemplate that the Chinese shall have the right to labor while in the United States. It impliedly recognizes their right to make this country their home, and expressly permits them to become permanent residents here; and this necessarily implies the right to live and to labor for a living. It is difficult to conceive a grosser case of keeping the word of promise to the ear and breaking it to the hope than to invite Chinese to become permanent residents of this country upon a direct pledge that they shall enjoy all the privileges here of the most favored nation, and then to deliberately prevent them from earning a living, and thus make the proffered right of residence a mere mockery and deceit. In Chapman v. Toy Long, [Case No. 2,610,] this court, in considering these provisions of this treaty, said: "The right to reside in the country, with the same privileges as the subjects of Great Britain or France, implies the right to follow any lawful calling or pursuit which is open to the subjects of these powers."

Whether it is best that the Chinese or other peoples should be allowed to come to this country without limit and engage in its industrial pursuits without restraint is a serious question, but one which belongs solely to the national government. Upon it there has always been a difference of opinion, and probably will be for years to come.

But so far as this court and the case before it is concerned, the treaty furnishes the law, and with that treaty no state or municipal corporation thereof can interfere. Admit the wedge of state interference ever so little, and there is nothing to prevent its being driven home and destroying the treaty and overriding the treaty-making power altogether. But it is not necessary to consider further this feature of the case, because this demurrer must be sustained upon other grounds.

These complainants cannot jointly maintain this suit. There is no privity of interest between them. They are neither partners nor co-contractors. If either has a cause of suit it is on account of his separate contract with the city concerning the improvement of distinct streets or parts thereof. They have no common interest in the subject or object of the suit, but assert distinct and several claims against the defendant growing out of distinct and several contracts and matters relating thereto. The complainants are misjoined and the bill is so far multifarious. Yeaton v. Lenox, 8 Pet. [33 U. S.] 126; West v. Randall, [Case No. 17,424;] Story, Eq. Pl. §§ 279, 283, 544.

On the argument of the demurrer it was sought to be maintained that the complainants and other persons not named therein, who, like the complainants, are engaged in taking and performing contracts for the improvement of streets, constitute a class, called contractors, who therefore have a common interest in the subject of this suit, and that such being the case a bill may be maintained by one or more for the benefit of the whole, as in the case of a creditor's bill or a bill by the part of a crew of a privateer against prize agents for an account.

But there is no analogy between these cases and the one under consideration. All persons engaged in making street improvements, may have an interest in the questions involved in this litigation, but they have no interest in the object of this or any suit to enjoin the defendant from enforcing the act against Chinese labor, unless they are actual and proper parties to it. Persons engaged in making street improvements under several and distinct contracts with the city, are not, therefore, a class of persons having a common interest in the subject of street improvements, concerning which any one or more may sue for the whole. Story, Eq. Pl. § 97 et seq.; Adams, Eq. § 319.

Neither does it appear that the matter in dispute here exceeds in value the sum of five hundred dollars. The matter in dispute is the alleged right of the complainants to perform the two several contracts which they have taken for the improvement of the streets without being prohibited from employing Chinese labor. The injury which they may sustain by reason of the act being enforced against them is the only practical test of the value of the matter in dispute. The bill alleges that this will be more than one thousand dollars; but the allegation is vague and uncertain, and the estimate appears to include not only the loss which may arise upon the contracts which the complainants now have, but others which they may hereafter undertake.

Again, it is easy to see how the Chinese who are excluded from a certain field of labor by this act, and the property holders who, notwithstanding the pretense in the emergency clause, that it was made for their benefit, are thereby compelled to pay the increased cost of improving the streets adjoining their property are injured by the operation of it, but the case of the contractor is different. If, as is assumed, the exclusion of Chinese labor increases the cost of the work, then presumably the contractor gets more for doing it. No one is bound to take a contract to improve the streets; and it being understood when the contract is let that Chinese labor shall not be employed, the reasonable inference is that parties make their bids accordingly.

The demurrer is sustained, and the restraining order vacated.

On a rehearing of this case before Mr. Justice FIELD, and DEADY, District Judge, on August 21, 1879, the decree sustaining the demurrer was affirmed, and the bill dismissed. In delivering the oral opinion of the court, Mr. Justice FIELD, in substance, said:

I agree with the ruling of the district judge in sustaining the demurrer to this bill; and for the additional reason that the plaintiffs have an adequate remedy at law. Assuming that the act in question is invalid, because in conflict with our treaty with the emperor of China, then the plaintiffs, as bidders or contractors, may disregard it, and if the city refuses to give them contracts to which they are otherwise entitled, or to pay them for contracts performed with the aid of Chinese labor, they may sue the city at law, either to compel the municipal authorities to give them the contracts to which they are entitled, or to pay them for those they have performed.

NOTE, [from original report.] It is said that the state has the same right as an individual to say who it will employ. This proposition assumes that the state is the employer of persons who work upon street improvements. But this is denied upon the ground that the owner of the property being compelled to pay for the improvement is the real employer, and that the state only interferes to compel the owner to make the improvement, and to secure uniformity in the character and time of doing the same.

But admitting, for the present, that the state has such a general right, and further that it is the employer of persons who work upon street improvements under contractors, yet the state, being a member of the Union, and subordinate to the constitution, laws and treaties of the United States, in the exercise of its powers, it may be restricted in the exercise of this right in particular instances, by the operation of such constitution, laws or treaties. For instance, the state has the general power of taxation, but as a member of the Union it is restrained in the exercise of this power by the operation of the constitution and laws of the United States, so that it is in effect prohibited from taxing articles of great value, the property of its citizens, because the same are also the agencies or means by which the national government exercises its comparatively supreme powers. The bonds and notes of the United States, issued by it in pursuance of its power to borrow money, are instances in point.

Therefore, if the state cannot exercise this general right to say who it will employ in this class of cases without coming in conflict with the operation of the treaty, then it is virtually prohibited from so doing. This treaty having guaranteed to the Chinese the right to reside here permanently with the same privileges and immunities as the subjects of Great Britain, Germany and France, which certainly includes the right to labor for a living, if it includes anything, the state cannot, in the exercise of any of its admitted general powers, limit or deny this right.

If this act had provided that no alien should be employed on street improvements or public works it might be said that it did not discriminate against Chinese and was therefore not obnoxious to the charge of infringing the treaty. But as it is, the act in effect denies the Chinese the privilege of laboring for a living in a field where it permits all other aliens to be employed without restriction, and thus so far denies to them the privileges and immunities enjoyed by the subjects of other nations, which is directly contrary to the treaty.

The only legal remedy for the evils, real or fancied, of Chinese or other immigration, is by an appeal to the national government, in whom the power over the subject is exclusively vested. But the fact is, the anti-Chinese legislation of the Pacific coast is but a poorly disguised attempt on the part of the state to evade and set aside the treaty with China, and thereby nullify an act of the national government. Between this and "the firing on Fort Sumter," by South Carolina, there is the difference of the direct and indirect—and nothing more. M. P. D.

APPEAL—WEIGHT OF EVIDENCE.

This court, on appeal, upon a question of fact which has been established in the usual way, and with reasonable satisfaction, before the commissioner, will not disturb the decree of affirmance of the court below, where the rebutting proof is very general and indefinite.

NELSON, Circuit Judge. The only question in this case arises on the report of the commissioner in the court below, in respect to the amount of repairs made, and materials furnished, to the ship Potomac. The court below placed its decision upon a defect in the exceptions taken to the report, as relating either to matters settled in the decree and not before the commissioner, or not sufficiently specific and pointed to raise the objection. I am inclined to think the court right in both grounds stated. But, independently of this answer, I have looked into the evidence before the commissioner, without regard to formal objections, and am satisfied that the weight of it sustains the report; at least the evidence furnished on the part of the respondent, tending to reduce the amount and value of the repairs, and to change the terms upon which they were made, is so questionable, that we are not disposed to interfere with the report, as the witnesses were personally before the officer making it, and who had a better opportunity to determine the degree of credibility to be given them than we can have. The extent and cost of the repairs seem to have been established in the usual way, and with reasonable satisfaction, and the rebutting proof is very general and indefinite. Decree below affirmed.

[4 McLean, 572.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Michigan. June Term, 1849.

LANDLORD AND TENANT — HOLDING OVER — MUST BE AT SAME RENT — TRUSTS — LIABILITY OF TRUSTEE — MISAPPROPRIATION OF TRUST FUNDS.

1. A person having occupied a certain tenement under a written lease, at a certain rent, remained in possession sometime after the expiration of the lease—held, that he was bound to pay the same rent, as under the written lease.

2. Where property is received in trust, and the trustee sells it and receives the consideration and appropriates it, he is liable, [in assumpsit,] the same as an agent, should the sale not be objected to.

At law.

Mr. Seaman, for plaintiff.

Mr. Howard, for defendant.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This is an action of assumpsit. In consideration of two thousand dollars received by the defendant, he agreed to save the plaintiff harmless from all liability, as one of the firm of Root & Co. Also, to pay rent for his house and lot in Cold Water, one hundred dollars a year for two years, commencing 1st May, 1840; also to take proper care to remove the said Baker's store house, etc., to fit it up, said Baker paying for removing and fitting up, and rent of store $75 a year. And Root guarantied the payment by Hanchett of a note for $253, if suit should be brought upon it by 1st April, 1840. Root stated to one of the witnesses that Hanchett, the partner of Baker, proposed that he should take a lot in the village of Cold Water, with the house thereon, to apply on the judgment against Baker & Hanchett, and also upon a demand in favor of Root against Hanchett for $150. This was agreed to, and the lot was conveyed to Root. Root was to discharge Hanchett from his own debt, and discharge the judgment against Baker, or indemnify him against it. Root held the property until he sold it to Cooley, for barrels which were used by Root in his business.

The court charged the jury, that the plaintiff claimed a right of recovery on two grounds. 1. For rent for the house, $100 per annum, and for the store $75 per annum. The store was removed by Root, for which he had been credited $75. The premises were occupied some years after the written lease expired. And it is contended that the plaintiff can only recover for these years what the premises were worth. But, the court instructed the jury, that the defendant having occupied the premises under a written lease for a fixed price, and remaining on them after the expiration of the lease, without any other agreement, the same rent must be paid. And that interest from the time rent was due may be given by the jury. That the action was not on the guaranty, which is only referred to to show the nature of the transaction.

The plaintiff claims, as the second ground of recovery, the amount of the judgment on the note, which defendant agreed to pay on the purchase of the house and lot in Cold Water. The plaintiff also claimed the right to recover this amount against the defendant, if the house and lot were received by Root on trust, as he sold it for barrels which he afterwards sold for cash, and this it is contended makes him responsible on a general count for money had and received. And also, on the common count, if the jury should find that Root received the house and lot and promised to pay the judgment. And the court so instructed the jury.

The jury found for the plaintiff. Judgment.

APPEAL — REVIEW — WEIGHT OF EVIDENCE — DISPUTED QUESTION OF FACT.

On an appeal from a decree of the district court, based wholly upon its finding on a disputed question of fact, the burden is on the appellant to show affirmatively a mistake in the finding. The decree will not be reversed where the evidence is such as merely to raise a doubt in regard to the question of fact.

Admiralty appeals from [unreported] decrees of the district court of [the United States for the district of] Massachusetts in cases of cross-libels for damages caused by a collision between the schooners Nellie Doe and Trade Wind. The only question in the cases was whether or not the Trade Wind had a proper light at the time of the collision.

T. M. Stetson for appellants.
Marston & Crapo, for appellees.

SHEPLEY, Circuit Judge. These cases, which were heard and tried together, are appeals from the decrees [unreported] of the district judge for the district of Massachusetts, sustaining the libel of the owners of the Trade Wind against the Nellie Doe, and dismissing, with costs, the libel of the owners of the Nellie Doe against the Trade Wind.

The cases, which grew out of a collision between the two vessels in Vineyard sound, about three miles northerly of Cape Pogue, present, for the consideration of the court, questions purely of fact. In cases of this description there is usually great discrepancy and conflict in the testimony of the witnesses; and where the decision of the district judge is based entirely upon his finding upon a disputed question of fact, and no error is alleged in his application of the law to the facts, parties can hardly expect this court to reverse such a decree, merely by raising a doubt founded on the number or credibility of the witnesses. The appellant, in such a case, has all the presumptions against him, and the burden of proof cast on him affirmatively to show some mistake, made by the judge below, in the law or the evidence. It will not do to show that on one theory, supported by some witnesses, a different decree might have been rendered, provided there be sufficient evidence, to be found in the record, to establish the one that was rendered. The Marcellus, 1 Black, [66 U. S.] 417.

On the twenty-first day of January, 1868, the schooner Trade Wind was lying at anchor in the Vineyard sound, two or three miles north-east by east from Cape Pogue. There was a fresh wind from east to north-east. The weather was cloudy or misty, and there had been some snow-squalls. But it was not foggy, nor was the air so obscured that a vessel's light could not have been seen at a considerable distance, and, by a proper lookout, at a sufficient distance to have avoided a collision. The Trade Wind does not appear to have been anchored in an unusual place, or moored in an unusual manner. She was anchored in a "fairway," under circumstances in which she was bound "to exhibit, between sunset and sunrise, where it could best be seen, at a height not exceeding twenty feet above the hull, a white light in a globular lantern of eight inches in diameter, and so constructed as to show a clear, uniform, and unbroken light, visible all around the horizon, and at a distance of at least one mile," as provided in art. 7 of the act of April 29, 1864, (4 Stat. 259).

The schooner Nellie Doe had been at anchor in the early part of the night off Chatham. She had got under way, and was running for Holmes Hole, with the wind free, with mainsail, foresail, and two jibs set; and about about half-past three in the morning, sailing in a westerly direction up the sound, she ran into the Trade Wind, and both vessels were damaged.

The only negligence on the part of the Trade Wind specifically charged in the answer of the claimants of the Nellie Doe is in the allegation that the Trade Wind was "at anchor in the frequented track of vessels, without showing any signals, lights, or any mode whatever of notifying her presence to vessels on their course, and totally invisible to and unseen by the officers and crew of the Nellie Doe."

If the proof sustains this allegation, then the Trade Wind was in fault.

The master, mate, and one seaman, on board the Trade Wind, testify affirmatively and positively that there was a white light in the starboard fore-rigging, about fifteen or twenty feet above the deck; that it was a globe lantern, such as is generally used for a signal lantern on vessels of that class, and that it was burning brightly at the time of the collision; and the testimony of Sylvia, a Portuguese sailor on the Trade Wind, who was examined on other points in behalf of the Nellie Doe, tends to confirm the testimony of the three other witnesses, so far as the light is concerned.

Five witnesses from the Nellie Doe testify that they did not see a light on the Trade Wind, and most of them are quite positive that if there had been a light burning they could have seen it. And it is quite clear from all the testimony in the case that the light, if brightly burning, could have been seen that night at a distance of at least a mile, by persons who were looking for a light. But, taking into consideration the affirmative character of the testimony on the one side, and the merely negative character of the testimony on the other, after a careful review of all the testimony, and taking into consideration all the attending circumstances,—the relative position of the two vessels, the position of the sails of the Nellie Doe, the direction from the vessels of the West Chop Light,—it seems not difficult to explain the apparent contradiction in the testimony, by the fact that the light of the Trade Wind was obscured from the lookout on the Nellie Doe by the intervention of the sails of the Nellie Doe at a time when the eyes of those on board the Nellie Doe were so intently strained in looking in a different direction for the West Chop Light, that they failed to discover the light of the Trade Wind, which they might readily have done had they been looking in that direction.

Although the evidence on this point cannot be fairly considered as of a character not likely to raise a doubt in relation to the facts so affirmatively and positively testified to by the witnesses from the Trade Wind, yet it cannot be considered as affirmatively showing that there was any mistake in the finding of the district judge upon this question of fact. On the other hand, the preponderance of the evidence seems to sustain the decree of the court below. Decree affirmed, with costs.

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. March 20, 1848.

COPY-RIGHT—TITLE TO—CONDITIONS PRECEDENT—EFFECT OF MISTAKE—PUBLICATION.

1. Under the copy-right act of February 3d, 1831, (4 Stat. 436,) the deposit of the title-page in the proper clerk's office, the publication of notice according to the act, and the delivery of a copy of the book, are indispensable conditions precedent to a title to a copy-right.

[See Boucicault v. Wood, Case No. 1,693; Struve v. Schwedler, Id. 13,551.]

2. Where the title-page of a book was deposited in 1846, and the notice of the entry, as printed in the copies of the book, stated the entry to have been made in 1847: Held that, under section 5 of the act, the error was fatal to the title.

[Cited in Donnelley v. Ivers, 18 Fed. 594; Schumacher v. Wogram, 35 Fed. 211. Distinguished in Farmer v. Calvert Lithographing, etc., Co., Case No. 4,651; Myers v. Callaghan, 5 Fed. 730.]

3. Whether the error arose from mistake or not, makes no difference.

4. A sale of a book naturally imports publication, and the presumption is that the purchaser exercised his right to know the contents of the book and to make them known to others, and that an actual publication followed the sale.

[Cited in Parton v. Prang, Case No. 10,784.]

5. Hence, where copies of a book were sold prior to the date of the deposit of a copy of the title-page: Held, that such sale was evidence of a publication of the book at the time of the sale.

[Cited in Parton v. Prang, Case No. 10,784. Distinguished in Farmer v. Calvert Lithographing, etc., Co., Id. 4,651.]

6. And, where a printed copy of the book, then complete, was deposited in the clerk's office at the same time the title-page was deposited there: Held, that these facts, in connection with the fact of such prior sale, warranted the inference of an actual publication of the book prior to the date of such deposit.

[Cited in Daly v. Brady, 39 Fed. 266.]

7. Under section 4 of the act, a person is not entitled to the benefit of a copy-right, unless he deposits the title-page before the publication of the book.

[See Struve v. Schwedler, Case No. 13,551.]

[8. On motion to enjoin an infringement of copyright, the affidavit of defendant is competent evidence against the oath of the plaintiffs to the bill.]

In equity. This was an application [by Isaac D. Baker and Charles Scribner against John S. Taylor] for a provisional injunction to restrain the defendant from infringing an alleged copy-right of the plaintiffs to a book entitled "The Sacred Mountains, by J. T. Headley, author of 'Napoleon and his Marshals, etc.: Illustrated." The bill alleged, that the plaintiffs, being sole owners of the said work, which was composed and written by said Headley, but had not then been published, on the 10th of November, 1846, deposited in the office of the clerk of the district court for the southern district of New York, a printed copy of the title-page of the book, and on the same day delivered to the said clerk a printed copy of the book itself; and that, previous to its publication, they caused to be printed on the page immediately following the title-page, in each copy published: "Entered according to the act of congress, in the year 1847, by Baker & Scribner, in the clerk's office of the district court of the southern district of New York." The bill alleged that the year 1847 was printed by mistake for 1846.

The defendant opposed the application, on an affidavit of his own, stating that, at the time the title of the book was deposited, he was a clerk of the plaintiffs, and made known to them the said error in the imprint before the book was published, but that they declined having it corrected; and that he personally knew that the plaintiffs, by themselves and their clerks, sold divers copies of the book prior to the 10th of November, 1846. [Injunction refused.]

Seth P. Staples, for plaintiffs.

Hiram P. Hastings, for defendant.

BETTS, District Judge. The act of congress, entitled "An act to amend the several acts respecting copyrights," passed February 3d, 1831, (4 Stat. 436,) embodies the provisions of the acts of May 31st, 1790, and of April 29th, 1802, on the subject, and imposes on persons claiming the privilege of a copy-right the same duties and liabilities which attended the right under the prior statutes. It is quite useless to go into the general learning appertaining to the subject, or to state at large the decisions rendered in Great Britain under the English statutes. The supreme court of the United States, in the case of Wheaton v. Peters, 8 Pet. [33 U. S.] 591, has given an exposition of our statutes, which is obligatory on this court, and essentially covers the main question raised on this motion. The principle declared by that decision is, that under the laws of the United States a copy-right title is not perfected without a strict compliance with the provisions of the statute. Those requirements which, in England, are generally regarded as directory, and not as conditions precedent to title, (1 Daniell, Ch. Pr. 419; Curt. Copyr. 198, 205; Gods. Pat. 211,) are, under our laws, important and indispensable pre-requisites to a perfect title. Depositing the title-page in the proper clerk's office, publishing a notice according to the act, and delivering a copy of the book, are held to be conditions, the performance of which is essential to the title. On that authority, I think the point is placed beyond question, that the failure, in the present case, to publish the notice demanded by the act, in the manner directed, creates a fatal defect in the plaintiffs' title. Even though the failure to publish the statutory notice arose from mistake, this court would have no power to accept the intention of the party, in place of a performance, any more in respect to the insertion of that notice on the proper page, than in respect to the deposit of the title of the book.

But there was no mistake in this case. The plaintiffs knew of the error before the book was published. They, however, regarded it as trivial, and not worth the expense and trouble of correction. But congress, in the 5th section of the act of 1831, have seen fit to make the copy-right dependent upon the particular act of giving the notice, and, to mark its importance, the statute sets forth the words in which the notice shall be given. The direction must be strictly complied with.

The affidavit of the defendant, which, on a motion for an injunction, is competent evidence against the oath of the plaintiffs to the bill, proves sales of the work by the plaintiffs prior to the 10th of November, 1846, when the title of the book was deposited. It is argued for the plaintiffs that these alleged sales were only consignments of the work in advance of the publication, and that publication, by putting the book in circulation, was not made until after the date of the deposit of the title. There is no proof to support this version of the facts. A sale naturally imports publication. The purchaser having the right to know the contents of the book, and make them known to others, no presumption can be raised that the right was not exercised, or that an actual publication did not follow the sale. On the contrary, the presumption is the other way. And the inference is strong, that actual publication was made, as sworn to by the defendant, anterior to the 10th of November, from the fact that a printed copy of the work, then complete, was on that day deposited in the clerk's office, the deposit of the book, complete for circulation, and the deposit of the title being simultaneous acts. The 4th section of the act, in express words, denies all benefit to a person, under the act, unless he shall, before the publication of his work, deposit the title-page, &c.

The plaintiffs have failed to show themselves entitled to the injunction prayed for.

Appeal from the decree of the district court [of the United States for the eastern district of Pennsylvania.]

[In admiralty. Libel by B. & J. Baker & Co. against the ship Tros for salvage. Libel dismissed.]

Samuel C. Perkins, for libellants.
Henry Flanders, for respondents.

Opinion by McKENNAN, Circuit Judge. The only question, which it is necessary to consider in this case, relates to the right of the libellants to resort to the vessel and her cargo for compensation for the salvage services rendered by them. That they did render valuable services is not denied, nor is the amount claimed for them contested by the respondent; but it is maintained that their services were performed exclusively upon the footing of an engagement by a salvor, who was employed by the master of the vessel, and that, therefore, they have no remedy against the respondent.

The ship was a Norwegian vessel, and on her voyage from Marseilles to Philadelphia, with a cargo of iron, went ashore at Watchapique inlet, on the coast of Virginia, on the 6th of February, 1873. The master left the vessel on the 10th of February, and repaired to Philadelphia, to make arrangements for getting her afloat, instructing the mate, if any aid was offered during his absence, to decline it. On the twelfth the libellants' steamer, "B. & J. Baker," arrived at the vessel and proffered assistance, but the mate declined it, informing her captain of his master's instructions. The following day, during a gale, a signal of distress was set on the "Tros," in answer to which a boat was sent from the B. and J. Baker, and the crew of the "Tros" were taken off. On the next day, the 14th, the officers of the libellants' steamer put a steam-pump on board the "Tros," stating, in reply to an inquiry of the mate, "that if it was not wanted they could take it back again." The master of the "Tros," having made an agreement with the Coast Wrecking Company of New York, for the salvage of his vessel, that company's steamer Lackawanna reached her on the morning of the 15th, when she was given in charge to the steamer's officers, and they went to work to extricate her. "On the evening of the 15th, Capt. Stoddart of the firm of B. & J. Baker & Co., of New York, arrived at the 'Tros,' when G. W. Chadwick, the officer in charge of the Lackawanna, told him that he was then in charge of the 'Tros;' that Captain Stoddart asked permission to furnish aid in getting her off; that he at first declined to make any use of his force or material, but finally, at the solicitation of said Stoddart, he agreed to employ his lighters, steam-pump, and some of his men, fully explaining to said Stoddart that he employed such force and material as the agent of the Coast Wrecking Company of New York; that he was to be paid by said company according to the usual rates of said company, and was to have no claim whatever upon the ship." The facts embodied in this compendious statement of the proofs are supported by the uncontradicted testimony of the witnesses. Their import is free from all ambiguity. They establish

1. That the services of the libellants were declined by the officer in charge of the respondent's vessel.

2. That an agreement was made by the master of the respondent vessel with the Coast Wrecking Company of New York for the salvage of the vessel and her cargo, and that possession of her was surrendered to that company for that purpose.

And 3. That the libellants' services were performed only by the permission of the Coast Wrecking Company, and under its direction, with distinct notice that it was to be responsible for their compensation, and not the vessel. Upon what principle or reason then can the vessel be held liable? It is argued that its liability results from the fact that the libellants were the first to render assistance. But this extended only to the relief of the crew, without any contemplated further service. However meritorious it may have been, the saving of human life does not constitute an independent ground of salvage compensation. When it is characterized by great hazard to the salvor, and is accompanied by the preservation of property, it will doubtless enhance the allowance of remuneration for the latter service, but it is only a service of humanity, the value of which is incomputable by any measure of pecuniary recompense.

Certainly no other assistance was rendered before the arrival of the Lackawanna. It is true that before her arrival they had placed on board the "Tros" a steam-pump, but no use whatever had been made of it. Whatever priority they might have acquired, under other circumstances, by their proximity to the vessel, and their readiness to afford assistance, they did not assume any charge of her, or perform any actual service for her relief. She was not derelict, nor does she appear to have been in a condition of such imminent peril as to require immediate efforts to save her, or to warrant an intrusive interposition by the libellants. She was in the actual custody of an officer on board, and it pertained to him to determine whose assistance should be accepted. Against his will they could not entitle themselves to the character or reward of salvors, and their conduct repels any presumption that they sought to do so: The Dodge Healy, [Case No. 2,849.] Their only title to compensation, therefore, accrued by reason of the services performed after the vessel was put into the possession of the Coast Wrecking Co. The evidence in the cause determines the footing upon which these services were rendered. It seems to me to exclude any other conclusion than that the libellants were subordinate to the wrecking company, as its auxiliaries only, and that they accepted employment from it upon condition that it should be liable for their compensation, and not the vessel. By their own stipulation, therefore, the vessel is not their debtor, and their libel must be dismissed with costs.

BANKRUPTCY — PROVABLE CLAIMS — NOTE GIVEN BEFORE BANKRUPTCY BUT PAYABLE AFTER.

A note given before the bankruptcy of the maker, payable after and taken up by the payee (the indorser) before final certificate, may be proved under the commission.

[Cited in Re Perkins, Case No. 10,983.]

[See In re Broich, Case No. 1,921.]

At law. Assumpsit, upon a promissory note [by Baker and Comegyss against Ambrose Vasse.] The first count stated the note to have been given to the plaintiffs without valuable consideration, but to be indorsed by the plaintiffs to enable the defendant to raise money for his accommodation; that the plaintiffs indorsed it in blank; and that the note so indorsed was, in a regular course of mercantile negotiation, transferred, for a full and valuable consideration received by the defendant, to one Matthew Lawler; that when it became due the payment was demanded

(but not stating by whom) and not being paid was protested, and notice was given to the plaintiffs whereby they became liable to pay; that the plaintiffs paid it on the 17th May, 1802, of which the defendant had notice, whereby he became liable to pay to the plaintiffs, and in consideration thereof promised to pay. The declaration also contained the usual money counts. The defendant pleaded, 1st, non assumpsit; 2d, a discharge under the bankrupt law; 3d, that the note was not drawn payable to plaintiffs, to be indorsed by them for the accommodation of defendant, to enable him to raise money for his own use.

The case was argued by Mr. C. Lee, for the plaintiffs, and Mr. Simms and Mr. E. J. Lee, for the defendant, and the question made was whether the note upon which this action was brought, could have been proved under the commission of bankruptcy against the defendant. KILTY, Chief Judge, and FITZHUGH, Circuit Judge, were of opinion that it could not. CRANCH, Circuit Judge, that it could; but the court intimated that they would reconsider the case; and a verdict was taken for the plaintiffs subject to the opinion of the court on a case to be stated. [Judgment for defendant.]

The case stated that on the 10th November, 1801, at Philadelphia, the defendant signed and delivered to the plaintiffs his note for $2,500, payable one hundred and twenty days after date; that the plaintiffs on the day of the date of the said note, indorsed the same for the accommodation of the defendant, and to enable the defendant to raise money upon it for his own use, and redelivered said note to the defendant; that at the time of indorsing and redelivering the said note, the plaintiffs received from the defendant his indorsement upon their note for a like amount, payable at the same time, for the accommodation of the plaintiffs, to enable them to raise money for their own use, which was the only consideration for the indorsement of the first-mentioned note; that plaintiffs paid the whole of each of said notes to the last indorsees before the commencement of this suit, to wit, on the 17th May, 1802, with the interest and charges of protest, on the first note which was paid to M. Lawler, an indorsee thereof, and they have never received payment of any part thereof from the defendant. That sometime in the year 1801, the defendant sold the first-mentioned note, (the cause of action in this suit,) and received the whole proceeds for his own use; that the amount of the note upon which this suit is brought was demanded of the plaintiffs on the day it became due, to wit, on the 13th of March, 1802; that on the 10th of February, 1802, the defendant committed an act of bankruptcy at Philadelphia, and a commission was duly issued against him upon that act, on the 13th of February; that on the 4th of May the commissioners granted their discharge to the defendant, and on the 28th of May he obtained a final certificate of discharge from the judge of the district court; that the debt due on the first-mentioned note was not proved under the commission of bankruptcy, the commissioners having refused to permit the same to be proved.

For the plaintiffs, it was contended, that they could not prove this note under the defendant's commission; that no debt was due to plaintiffs till they paid the note, and the payment was not made till the 17th of May; that a debt contracted after the act of bankruptcy will not support a commission, nor can it be proved under the commission. Bamford v. Burrell, 2 Bos. & P. 1. But that if the rule were otherwise its being an accommodation note would prevent its being proved. Howis v. Wiggins, 4 Term R. 714; Brooks v. Rogers, 1 H. Bl. 640; Cowley v. Dunlop, 7 Term. R. 565.

For the defendant. Mutual notes were given, and therefore this was not an accommodation note, but for valuable consideration. If such a consideration passed, the debt was contracted when the note was given. Notes payable at a future day, may be proved under a commission. Bankrupt Act, § 39, (2 Stat. 32;) Cooke, Bankr. Laws, 122, 123; Macarty v. Barrow, 2 Strange, 949, Ex parte Wardwell, [Chilton v. Whissin,] 3 Wils. 17. A surety in a bond may prove under the commission, and if he pay the debt after the bankruptcy of the principal he cannot recover against him. Toussaint v. Martinnant, 2 Term R. 100; Martin v. Court, Id. 640. Where a party is bound to pay at all events, as these plaintiffs were, he may prove under the commission, though the debt is payable in future. Hancock v. Entwisle, 3 Term R. 435. If the plaintiffs had the note before a final dividend, they might have proved. Cowley v. Dunlop, 7 Term R. 565. They are not prevented from proving, because it is an accommodation note. Staines v. Planck, 8 Term R. 389. From Cowley v. Dunlop, [7 Term R. 565,] it seems that Howis v. Wiggins, and Brooks v. Rogers, are of doubtful authority; but those cases differ from this, that there, there were not, as here, mutual accommodations. Mutual notes are good considerations for each other; they are not contingent, but actual debts solvenda in futuro. Rolfe v. Caslon, 2 H. Bl. 570; Vide, also, [Joy's Lessee v. Cossart,] 2 Dall. [2 U. S.] 127, where the plaintiff may prove under commission if he could maintain debt. Ex parte Thomas, 1 Atk. 73, where an indorsee proved a note indorsed after bankruptcy. Walton's Case, Id. 122, where an indorser was allowed to prove against the drawer's estate, a bill taken up after bankruptcy; and Span's Case, Green, Bankr. Law, 39, where a holder proved a bill against acceptor's estate, which was negotiated after the acceptor's bankruptcy, and although he had not the bill at the time of his bankruptcy. Cooke, Bankr. Laws, 214, 215; Cooke, Bankr. Laws, 211.

Before KILTY, Chief Judge, and FITZHUGH and CRANCH, Circuit Judges.

CRANCH, Circuit Judge. The question is, whether the plaintiffs could have proved this note under the commission against the defendant. There is no doubt that the note might have been proved under that commission by somebody. The defendant's estate was already liable for its amount. But it never has been proved under the commission by anybody. The note therefore still exists as a note unsatisfied, and clothed with all its original obligation. The contract which it raised is still in full force as a special and express contract, and the principle of law is well settled, that where the parties have made an express contract, the law will not interfere and raise an implied one. For the law implies a contract only where the parties have failed to make an express agreement, and where otherwise injustice would be done to one of them. The present action being grounded on an implied assumpsit only, it might, perhaps, be sufficient for the defendant to show that there was an express contract respecting the same transaction. The plaintiffs cannot recover upon both the express and implied contract, for if there is an express contract, there cannot be an implied one. But waiving this bar to the plaintiffs' recovery, I am of opinion that the plaintiffs could have proved the debt under the commission against the defendant, and consequently that his certificate is a bar to the action. Cases have been cited on both sides, which are certainly in some degree contradictory to each other. I shall therefore pass over all the cases which precede that of Cowley v. Dunlop, [7 Term R. 565,] in which they were all taken up and reconsidered; and which, although it did not decide the question in that case, yet, if I do not misconceive the arguments of the judges, will go very far to decide the present. In the present case the note was originally given and made payable to the plaintiffs on a sufficient consideration; it therefore was a note upon which an action might have been maintained, and immediately created a debt payable in future. Nothing was defective in the original transaction; it was not a contingent debt, but an absolute engagement to pay a sum certain at a certain time, for a valuable consideration. The two notes were mutual considerations for each other, and in an action brought upon either of them against the maker, he cannot support an allegation that it was nudum pactum. It is true that if he had been obliged already to pay the other note in consequence of his indorsement, he might plead it by way of set-off, or maintain a counter action against the plaintiff; but until the two notes are thus mutually opposed to each other, both are valid, and remain good evidence of mutual debts. This note then constituted a good claim against the defendant's estate at the time of his bankruptcy. The estate was not only liable for it, but was the principal debtor, to whom the holder might and in justice ought to resort for payment. It ought not to be in the power of the holder to decide whether the certificate should or should not be a bar to the claim. The legislature has attempted to avoid this evil, by declaring that the certificate should be a bar, not only to such claims as were proved, but such as might have been proved under the commission, not contemplating the possibility that the mere transfer of the debt could prevent the certificate from being a bar. In the case of Cowley v. Dunlop, 7 Term R. 565, the judges were equally divided upon the question then before the court. Lawrence and Grose, justices, were decidedly of opinion that the defendant's certificate was a bar to the action; and Ld. Kenyon, C. J., in his argument admits principles which if correct are decisive in favor of the present defendant. He admits that if the bill had not been once proved against the defendant (the acceptor) and a dividend received, which, in contemplation of law, he considers as a satisfaction of the bill, and if it had been returned upon the indorser, subsequent to the bankruptcy, the indorser would thereby be remitted to his former right, and be in the same condition as if he had never passed it away, (so as to stand in the place of the indorsee) and consequently might have proved the debt under the commission. But he contends, that inasmuch as the holder of that bill had proved it under the defendant's commission, and received a dividend, whereby the express contract created by the bill was executed on the part of the defendant, and had become extinct, there was no right remaining under that bill to which the plaintiff could be remitted, and therefore when the plaintiff paid the balance of the money due upon the bill to the indorsee, a new implied contract arose on the part of the defendant which could not have been proved under the commission, and which therefore was not barred by the certificate. In the present case the note has never been proved under the commission, and therefore it still remains a valid, express contract, attended by all its resulting rights; and consequently, according to his lordship's opinion, upon being returned upon the indorser, he was remitted to his former right, and might have proved the debt against the defendant's estate. If the arguments of the plaintiffs' counsel are correct, an executor, an administrator, or an indorsee, obtaining possession of the securities after the act of bankruptcy committed, could not prove the debts. By which means a class of creditors, who had bona fide given credit to the securities, would, contrary to the express words of the act of congress, be precluded from any share in the bankrupt's estate; and the bankrupt himself would be placed in a much worse situation after his certificate than he was in before. For the moment he had given up every thing in the world, he would find himself still encumbered with a load of debts, and exposed to the vengeance or the malice of unrelenting creditors, without a hope of escaping from the burden. Because, under a second commission, he would be entitled only to a discharge of his person unless his estate shall pay seventy-five per cent. on the amount of the debts; and, by the statement of the case, he cannot have any estate at all. A construction of the law which will produce these consequences ought to be very obvious, and at least produced by a necessary implication. I can see no such necessity, and therefore I am obliged to reject such a construction. The judgment of the court was accordingly for the defendant.

NOTE, [from original report.] The cases of Buckler v. Buttivant, 3 East, 72, and Houle v. Baxter, Id. 177, were not cited, nor seen by the court, until after their opinion was given. They fully justify it.

BAKER v. WARD et al.

[3 Ben. 499.] [1]

District Court, S. D. New York. March, 1868.

GOLD CONTRACT—CHARTER PARTY—FALSE REPRESENTATIONS—PARTIES.

1. Where a vessel was chartered for a voyage from New York to Havana, for the sum of $2,900, payable in gold on the proper discharge of the cargo in Havana, of which sum $2,201.50 in gold had been paid: Held, that the owners of the vessel were entitled to a decree for $698.50, without reference to any premium on gold.

[Distinguished in Hus v. Kempf, Case No. 6,944.]

[See note at end of case.]

2. Where a charter party of a vessel stated her to be "of the burthen of 427 tons, or thereabouts," but contained no other statement as to her carrying capacity: Held, that any other agreement as to her carrying capacity must be held to have been waived by the charterer, and that evidence of false representations by the owners as to her carrying capacity, and of the charterers being induced thereby to make the charter, was inadmissible.

[Cited in Rawson v. Lyon, 23 Fed. 108.]

[See Watts v. Camors, 10 Fed. 145.]

3. Where a charter party was signed by the libellant as master and agent of the vessel, and the charterers agreed in it to pay the charter money to him or his agent: Held, that a suit to recover the charter money was properly brought by the master alone, without joining the owners of the vessel as libellants.

[In admiralty. Libel by Samuel Baker against James E. Ward and others on a charter party. Decree for libellant.]

Smedberg & Da Costa, for libellant.

Beebe, Dean & Donohue, for respondents.

[2] BLATCHFORD, District Judge. On the 26th of July, 1866, the libellant, as master of the British bark Vivid, entered into a charter party at New York with the respondents, for the charter of the vessel to them, for a voyage from New York to Havana, for the sum of $2,900 charter money, payable in gold on the proper discharge of the cargo in Havana. The libel avers the performance of the charter by the vessel, by the delivery of the cargo at Havana on or before the 25th of October, 1866, and that only $2,201.50 in gold has been paid on account of the charter money, and claims a decree for $1,005.84, in the lawful money of the United States, being the equivalent of $698.50, in gold, at the time of the commencement of the suit.

The answer sets up, that, at and before the making of the charter party, the libellant, in order to induce the respondents to enter into the charter, falsely and fraudulently represented to them that the vessel would carry and had already carried 3,000 round barrels of oil; that the respondents, relying upon such representations and believing the same to be true, chartered the vessel and loaded her for the voyage mentioned in the charter with all the cargo she could carry; that she would not carry 3,000 round barrels of oil, but only 2,600; that such representations were false and known by the libellant to be so; that the respondents sustained great damage therefrom; and that, by reason thereof, the charter was void.

The charter party, of which a copy is annexed to the libel and forms a part of it, contains no statement of the carrying capacity of the vessel. It merely states, that the vessel is "of the burden of 427 tons or thereabouts." The respondents, at the trial, offered to show, by evidence, the making by the libellant, and the falsity, of the representations before named; that such representations induced the respondents to enter into the charter party and to agree to pay a larger sum for charter money than they would otherwise have agreed to pay; that the libellant knew such representations to be false; and that, on the voyage in question, the vessel was loaded to her full capacity and carried only the bulk of 2,600 round barrels of oil. The court excluded such evidence, on an objection to it by the libellant. The evidence was inadmissible, for the reason that, the charter party being in writing, parol evidence was not admissible to vary its terms, and that any stipulation or agreement, as to the carrying capacity of the vessel, which was not found in the written contract, must be considered as having been waived by the respondents. 1 Pars. on Mar. Law, bk. 1, c. 8, p. 230; The Eli Whitney, [Case No. 4,345;] Pitkin v. Brainerd, 5 Conn. 451; Renard v. Sampson, 2 Kern. [12 N. Y.] 561.

[2] Since the decision of the supreme court of the United States, in April, 1871, on the legal tender act, [Knox v. Lee, 12 Wall. (79 U. S.) 457,] I have thought it best to publish here this decision, made by Judge Blatchford, in March, 1868, and omitted in its order, so that all the cases in this court, in which the gold question was involved, may be included in these reports.

The answer excepts to the libel on the ground that the libellant has no interest in the alleged cause of action set forth in the libel, and, therefore, cannot maintain this action, and on the further ground that the owners of the vessel should have been joined and made parties libellants in the action. The charter party was made with the libellant and describes him as master and agent of the vessel, and by it the respondents agree to pay the charter money to the libellant or to his agent. The respondents are, therefore, estopped from denying the right of the libellant to bring this suit, and it was not necessary to join the owners of the vessel as parties.

The libellant is, therefore, entitled to recover the amount unpaid on the charter money, namely, the sum of $698.50, with interest thereon, at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, from October 25th, 1866. But he claims that he should have a decree for this amount in gold, or for an amount which is the equivalent, in legal-tender notes, of that amount in gold. I have heretofore considered this question, both on principle and on authority, and have held that, under circumstances such as exist in this case, the party suing is entitled only to a decree for the number of unpaid dollars due to him under his contract. and that the addition of the words "in gold," in the contract, is, in view of the legal-tender acts of February 25th, and July 11th, 1862, (12 Stat. 345, 532,) to be treated as surplusage, or, what is the same thing in effect, that the decree is to be for the debt at the number of dollars expressed in the contract, with the privilege to the debtor to discharge it in the legal tender notes. The Blohm, [Case No. 1,556;] The Mary J. Vaughan, [Id. 9,217.] If the libellant should have one of the alternatives which he asks for in this case, a decree for the $698.50, with interest, "payable in gold," (and he can have nothing more than his contract calls for, so many dollars in gold,) still the respondents would have the right to discharge the decree, dollar for dollar, in legal tender notes. The law is express to that effect. The United States notes are made, by law, "lawful money and a legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private, within the United States, except duties on imports" and certain interest due to and by the United States. A decree in this case for so many dollars, payable in gold, would be a private debt, to be paid within the United States, and it would be impossible to withhold from the respondents the privilege of paying it, dollar for dollar, in legal tender notes, without holding the statutes on the subject to be void, and without declaring that what the law-making power has said shall be lawful money and a legal tender in payment of the debt, shall not be lawful money or such legal tender.

The libellant seeks, however, to evade the force of the legal tender act, by claiming, in his libel, that the number of dollars due to him in gold is "equal to the sum of $1,005.84, lawful money of the United States," and by asking a decree for the latter sum. The meaning of this averment must be merely, that the $698.50 in gold is equal to $1,005.84 in the United States notes which are made a legal tender by law. The gold and silver coins of the United States continue to be lawful money of the United States, and to be legal tenders to the extent prescribed by statute, as well since the passage of the acts making the United States notes legal tenders, as before. The silver dollar, containing the prescribed weight of silver, is still the unit, and is still lawful money and a legal tender, according to its nominal value; and the double eagle, eagle, half eagle, and quarter eagle, containing severally the prescribed weights of gold, are still lawful money, and are still respectively legal tenders, for twenty, ten, five, and two and a half of such units. The intent of the acts of congress was to put the United States note representing nominally one dollar, on the same footing, as to being lawful money, and a legal tender for a private debt, as the coined dollar. Wherever a debt exists which amounts to so many dollars in gold, an equal amount of United States notes, at their nominal value, will discharge it. If this were not so, the legal tender acts would be a juggle. They could be evaded without difficulty. All that it would be necessary to do would be to increase the amount of a contract debt to a number of dollars sufficiently large to deprive the debtor of the privilege which the acts intended to enforce upon him. But the court has no power to do this. The number of dollars is nominated in the contract. The words "in gold" mean no more than the words "lawful money." The contract is for so many dollars, lawful money, and the decree must be for that number of dollars, and it can be discharged in any money that is lawful money and a legal tender. When the statutes say that the United States note of one dollar nominal value shall be lawful money and a legal tender for a private debt, within the United States, they mean that it shall be a legal tender, at its nominal value, for a debt amounting to one dollar in any other money that is lawful money within the United States, and that such debt may and shall be fully discharged by the payment or tender of such note. Some of the statutes of the United States, as, for instance, the act of January 18th, 1837, (5 Stat. 137, § 9,) in making certain coins of the United States a legal tender, say that they shall be legal tenders "according to their nominal value." Other statutes merely say that they shall be legal tenders. The statutes in regard to the United States notes only say that they shall be "a legal tender." But the necessary meaning of all those statutes is, that the coins and notes shall be legal tenders according to the nominal values impressed on them, and which they exhibit to the eye. Now, to say that the respondents must pay $1,005.84, in United States notes, to discharge $698.50, of private indebtedness, payable in gold, would be to say that the United States note of one dollar, instead of being a legal tender at its nominal value, for one dollar of the $698.50 gold, shall be a legal tender at less than its nominal value, for such one dollar of gold, and that the indebtedness represented by such one dollar of gold shall not be fully discharged by the payment or tender of the United States note of one dollar. The decree would violate the express language of the acts of congress. Moreover, such a decree would violate the contract of the parties. The libellant contracted, at New York, for the payment to him, at Havana, of so many dollars in gold. He and the respondents did this with the full knowledge, on the part of both of them, that, so far as this contract provided for the creation of a debt which the respondents should ever be called upon to pay within the United States, the respondents would have the privilege of paying it in United States notes, dollar for dollar, at the nominal value of such notes. To deprive the respondents of this privilege, which the libellant voluntarily conferred upon them, would be to do what the court has no right to do. The libellant has resorted to this forum for the collection of his debt, and he must submit to the law of the forum.

It was urged by the counsel for the libellant, that two cases, recently decided by the supreme court of the United States, one at the December term, 1865, (Cheang-Kee v. U. S., 3 Wall. [70 U. S.] 320,) and the other at the December term, 1866, (Thompson v. Riggs, 5 Wall. [72 U. S.] 663,) establishes a contrary doctrine to that held by this court. I have examined those cases with care, and am unable to see anything in either of them that is in conflict with the views expressed in this decision.

The case of Cheang-Kee v. U. S., [supra,] only decides that, in a suit brought by the United States, to recover duties on imports, after the passage of the legal tender act of February 25th, 1862, [12 Stat. 345,] a judgment in favor of the United States, against the defendant, for "$1,388.10, payable in gold and silver coin, for duties," is a proper judgment; that the statement in the judgment, that the amount recovered is "payable in gold and silver coin, for duties," is merely a declaration of the legal effect of the judgment; and that such statement, although unnecessary, is strictly correct, and cannot affect the validity of the judgment, for the reason that it is a judgment for duties on imports, and that nothing but gold and silver coin is a legal tender for that description of indebtedness to the government. If any conclusion is to be drawn from that decision, as an authority bearing on the present case, it is a conclusion adverse to the view urged by the libellant, for it would seem to follow from the decision, that where, as in the present case, one of a private debt, something else, in addition to gold and silver coin, is a legal tender for the debt, a judgment for the amount of the debt, "payable in gold and silver coin," is improper.

The case of Thompson v. Riggs, [supra,] was this: At the time of the passage of the legal tender act of February 25th, 1862, Thompson had in the hands of Riggs, as a banker, on deposit, $6,600. The deposit was not a special deposit, but was a general deposit, and was subject to no condition or special agreement of any kind, but was made under such circumstances that Thompson parted with his title to the money, and such title became vested in Riggs, and Riggs became debtor for the amount to Thompson. Two years after the passage of the legal tender act, and when gold had risen to a premium of 57 per cent. above the value of legal tender notes, Thompson demanded the $6,600 in coin. Riggs tendered it in legal tender notes. Thompson then sued to recover a sum of money equal to the value in legal tender notes of $6,600 gold coin. The suit was not brought to recover any thing that was deposited after the passage of the legal tender act. There was a verdict and a judgment for Riggs, the defendant. Thompson then carried the case by writ of error to the supreme court, which affirmed the judgment. The language of the court (Mr. Justice Clifford delivering its opinion) in the case is to the effect, that, where a special deposit of bullion or coin is made with a banker, under such circumstances that the title to the thing or money deposited does not pass to the banker, but remains in the depositor, then the banker becomes the bailee of the depositor, and the latter may rightfully demand as his property the identical thing or money deposited; but that, where the deposit is general, and under such circumstances that the title to the money deposited, whether it is coin or legal tender notes, passes to the banker, the transaction is unaffected by the character of the money in which the deposit is made, and the banker becomes liable for the amount of the money as a debt, and can discharge the debt by any money that is by law a legal tender. The Bank of Kentucky v. Wister, 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 318, 325. These views of the supreme court give no support to the claim made by the libellant.

The true doctrine on the subject is no where expressed better than by Pothier, (Traite du Contrat de Vente, note, 416, Cushing's translation, pp. 264, 265:) "It remains to be observed, in regard to the price, that it may be rendered in a money different from that in which it is paid. If it is paid to the seller in gold, the seller may repay it in pieces of silver, or vice versa. In like manner, though, subsequent to the payment of the price, the pieces in which it is paid are increased or diminished in value, though they are discredited, and, at the time of the redemption, their place is supplied by new ones of better or worse alloy, the seller, who exercises the redemption, ought to repay, in money which is current at the time he redeems, the same sum or quantity which he received in payment, and nothing more nor less. The reason is, that, in money, we do not regard the coins, which constitute it, but only the value which the sovereign has been pleased that they shall signify; Ea materia forma publica percussa, usum dominiumque non tam ex substantia proebet, quam ex quantitate. D. 18, 1, 1. When the price is paid, the seller is not considered to receive the particular pieces so much as the sum or value which they signify, and consequently, he ought to repay, and it is sufficient for him to repay, the same sum or value in pieces which are current, and which have the signs, authorized by the prince, to signify that value." These views apply to all debts solvable in money, and to all money which the sovereign declares to be lawful money. Of course, I assume that the legal tender acts are constitutional and valid laws. I hold them to be so both on principle and on authority.

The libellant is entitled to a decree for $698.50, with interest from October 25th, 1866, and for the costs of the suit.

[NOTE. The act of 1862 (Rev. St. § 3588) provides that "United States notes shall be lawful money, and a legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private, within the United States except for duties on imports and interest on the public debt." Where a note is for dollars, payable by its terms in specie, the terms "in specie" are merely descriptive of the kind of dollars in which the note is payable, there being more than one kind of dollars current, recognized by law, and mean that the designated number of dollars shall be paid in so many gold or silver dollars of the United States. The act of February 25, 1862, in declaring that the notes of the United States shall be lawful money and a legal tender for all debts, only applies to debts which are payable in money generally, and not to obligations payable in commodities or obligations of any other kind. Trebilcock v. Wilson, 12 Wall. (79 U. S.) 687. A contract payable in gold and silver coin is an agreement to deliver coins of the standard weight and fineness, and it cannot be satisfied by a tender of United States notes. Bronson v. Rodes, 7 Wall. (74 U. S.) 229; Knox v. Lee, 12 Wall. (79 U. S.) 457; Butler v. Horwitz, 7 Wall. (74 U. S.) 258; Bronson v. Kimpton, 8 Wall. (75 U. S.) 444. Where it appears to be the clear intent of a contract that payment or satisfaction shall be made in gold and silver, damages should be assessed and judgment rendered payable in coin. Butler v. Horwitz, supra. See, also, Edmondson v. Hyde, Case No. 4,285. Where a contract is payable in gold coin, and the payee takes a judgment payable in currency, its amount should be for a sum equivalent in value to the amount of gold coin as bullion. Gregory v. Morris, 96 U. S. 619. The circuit court for the southern district of New York, in 1868, in awarding a decree on a bottomry bond payable in "United States gold," refused to allow a premium on the sum named in the decree in order to make such amount equal to gold. Circuit Court, D. Maine. May Term, 1840.

EQUITY—NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE—MISTAKE OF COUNSEL—LACHES.

1. Where a rehearing is sought on the ground of newly discovered evidence, after an interlocutory decree, the court will grant such a rehearing upon the filing of a supplemental bill, if the evidence is of such a nature as to entitle the party to relief upon a bill of review, or a supplemental bill in the nature of a bill of review, after a final decree, but not otherwise.

2. Error of judgment, or mistake of law by counsel, as to the pertinency or force of evidence, furnishes no ground for a rehearing.

3. Where the party, seeking relief, had knowledge of the evidence before the decree, or might by a reasonable diligence or inquiry have obtained it, he is not entitled to relief.

4. The general rule in cases of this sort is, not to allow a rehearing and a supplemental bill, where the newly discovered evidence is merely cumulative upon the litigated facts already in issue.

Moorhouse, Case No. 1,956, to the point that a court of equity will not ordinarily entertain jurisdiction of a matter which the person has had an opportunity of litigating in another court, and which had there been decided against him, unless it appears that circumstances beyond his control prevented his making the defense or trying the question.]

In equity. Petition by [Timothy] Whiting for a rehearing, and for leave to introduce new evidence in this cause, which was formerly before this court, and is reported in 3 Sumn. 476, [Baker v. Whiting, Case No. 787.] [Denied.] The petition, in substance, stated as follows: That the petitioner denies, expressly, that he ever was constituted agent of Tidd & Stimpson, or either of them, or their heirs. And that he never understood, that it was important to ascertain, whether they ever had any particular and properly constituted agent, and if so, who was such agent. Nor was he ever advised, that it was necessary to make the same appear in point of law; but, on the contrary, he was advised by his counsel in the cause originally, that it was a matter of no consequence; and he never received any other or different advice; and, for the circumstances relating thereto, he prays leave to refer to his affidavit.

That the petitioner did well understand, that John Cooper, Esq. had been the agent of Peck, the former proprietor of township No. 12; but that he did not know, that the said Cooper was the agent especially for the said Tidd & Stimpson, though he believes, that he was so told by the said Baker, before the bringing of the suit in equity, as he has stated in his affidavit. Yet, if he should be deemed to have had cause for inquiring into the truth thereof, he prays relief, on account of his utter ignorance, and of the advice he had received in regard to its being of no material importance.

That if this declaration did not refer to the time, for which the plaintiffs undertook to charge and treat the said Cooper as owner, but to a former period, then the petitioner submits, that there was no occasion for inquiry. And if the declaration was true, and known by the said Baker to refer to the period set forth in the bill, it was fraudulent in the said Baker and his wife to proceed against him, on the ground of his being such agent, the said Baker well knowing the contrary.

That since the decretal order of the court the petitioner has made most earnest inquiry, and discovered, that the said Cooper was the actual agent of the said Tidd & Stimpson, and of the heirs of Tidd, after his decease; and that the said Stimpson and the heirs of said Tidd did refuse to redeem the land from the said sale for taxes.

That the petitioner had no knowledge or notice of the intention of the plaintiffs to introduce in evidence the paper, purporting to be a license to erect a mill, made by him to Aaron L. Raymond and Paul Howe; and that it was not charged in the bill, nor annexed to the interrogatories, nor to the commission, and that no interrogation was framed by the plaintiffs pointing to it; and that if notice had been given to him in regard to the introduction of this paper, it would have led him to show the general agency of the said Cooper for the proprietors, and consequently, the particular agency of the said Cooper for Tidd & Stimpson, and the heirs of Tidd; and thence to the fact, stated by him, of their refusal to redeem the land, all of which circumstances lay in the same train.

The petitioner prays for a rehearing of the said cause, so that the same may be opened upon the point of agency, both at law and in fact, to afford him an opportunity to exhibit the truth in relation to such fact of agency; and to avoid extreme injustice being done in charging him, as agent of Tidd and his heirs, and Stimpson, when they, in fact, had another agent, and he was not their agent, and received no money from them for the payment of said taxes; but that they absolutely refused to pay them, or to redeem the said lands.

And if the prayer of the petitioner is opposed and pressed with the objection, that such circumstances might have been known and ascertained by him by diligent inquiry, and by advice and counsel, he then says, that they were all misled and deceived by the form of the false statements in the bill; and that the plaintiffs well knew the contrary, and must have suppressed the knowledge thereof from their own counsel, and therefore have obtained their decree by fraud, and are not, therefore, entitled to retain the benefit thereof.

That if the relief may not be obtained in the regular manner of a rehearing, the petitioner prays, that it may be granted by leave to proceed in some other and further manner, in the nature of review, and that all proceedings may be stayed in the meantime, and permission granted to perpetuate the testimony of John Cooper.

The affidavit of Whiting in support thereof, was as follows:

"I, Timothy Whiting, age seventy-two years, on oath declare and say, that since the hearing and opinion given by the court in the case of George Baker and wife, plaintiffs in equity against me, in the circuit court of the United States, for Maine district, at the present term, certain facts have come to my knowledge, which I am advised, and believe to be of great importance to me, and which, if they had been ascertained and exhibited in season, I have reason to believe would have been of a decisive character in my defence.

"I would refer, in the first place, to the affidavit of John Cooper, Esq., now on the files of the court, as containing two distinct facts; that for some years before, and also after August, 1821, he was the agent of several of the proprietors of said township No. 12, and among them of Jacob Tidd and Samuel Stimpson, and afterwards, on behalf of the heirs of said Tidd, and had the care of the lands in which they were concerned: secondly, that after the land was sold in August, 1821, for taxes, and purchased by me, the said Stimpson and the heirs of said Tidd refused to redeem the land stated by said Cooper.

"I further declare and say, as aforesaid, that I had no knowledge of the above refusal to redeem the land, as stated by said Cooper, until it was first made known to me by him, at the time of making said affidavit. And I further declare, that I did not know, that the said Cooper was the agent in special of said Tidd & Stimpson, and of the heirs of said Tidd, as he has stated in said affidavit for the lands in said township No. 12.

"I further state, that true it is, sometime in the year 1835, said Baker did call on me in Boston, and make inquiries concerning lands which said Tidd, or Tidd & Stimpson formerly owned in the vicinity, where I lived, and in which the heirs of said Tidd were interested, lying in what are now the towns of Marion and Cutler, adjacent to said Whiting, and also in said No. 12, now Whiting; and that, in his conversation, the said Baker spoke of General Cooper as having been formerly agent for certain proprietors in those townships generally, and among them, I believe, he mentioned the said Tidd & Stimpson. Such is the impression on my mind. Said Baker then understood, that I was in possession of the land, which he supposed to have belonged to Tidd & Stimpson, in Whiting, claiming title, and he stated, that he had ascertained the circumstances respecting the sale and purchase by me for the taxes. Nothing was said or intimated to me by said Baker respecting any agency of mine at any time on behalf of said Tidd & Stimpson, or either of them, in regard to said lands in Whiting sold for taxes. I state the foregoing conversation according to the best of my recollection and belief.

"I should not seek to introduce the mention of the above circumstance in this statement, except so far as it may be proper to qualify, or affect, what I have said respecting my not having knowledge, that said Cooper was ever agent of said Tidd & Stimpson. In that conversation said Baker made principal inquiry about the land in Cutler, which he proposed to sell to me. He did not, to my recollection, at that time, set up any claim to the land in Whiting.

"I further declare, and say, that I understood the said Cooper was formerly the agent of John Peck, who once owned the township, excepting settlers' lots, to take care of the lands belonging to said Peck; and that those, to whom Peck sold, generally employed said Cooper to see to their lands. He was so requested and employed by myself, as well as others, before I moved into the State of Maine.

"I further state, that my acquaintance with the business and concerns of what is now the town of Whiting commenced about the year 1816 or 1817. I then understood, that said Cooper was the agent of a considerable number of the proprietors of said township, and I supposed the major part of them. General Cooper gave numerous permits on behalf of those proprietors for whom he acted, without objection from me, and he knew and made no objection to those, which I granted, which was done with his consent. Neither of us intended, as I believe, to exceed our respective rights, or those, for which we acted, or to exercise them in such a manner as to interfere with each other. I acted with his advice and consent, on the part of those, for whom he acted as agent, in giving permission to Raymond and Howe to erect a saw-mill at the Orange Rips. I had no notice of the intention to introduce in testimony the paper made by me to said Raymond and Howe, which I could have explained by General Cooper and other testimony.

"General Cooper formerly lived in Machias; but shortly after the separation of this state from Massachusetts, he removed with his family into the town of Cooper, about twenty miles distant. Since which he has lived very retired, and I have rarely seen him, not more than three or four times, to my recollection, until the 13th of May last, and I have had little intercourse or conversation with him since his removal, on the subject of said lands. General Cooper is father-in-law to Rufus K. Porter, Esq., who took the depositions, in which some of the deponents mention said Cooper having been agent to sundry persons; but no mention is made of Tidd & Stimpson.

"I would further state, that when the proprietors' lands were sold for taxes in Whiting, I had no wish to prevent any proprietors from redeeming by paying their proportions. On the contrary, I desired, that they should; and Messrs. Odiorne, Parkman, and Winthrop redeemed their parts. And two persons living in Boston, partners in business, viz. Messrs. Kilham & Mears, were willingly permitted by me to redeem, through General Cooper, after their lands were forfeited. I was the largest owner of said township.

"I further declare and say, that when I engaged the Hon. Prentiss Mellen as my counsel in this cause, and advised with him on the subject of the bill, and when he was drawing the answer, I endeavoured, to the best of my power, to communicate to him a general statement of all the circumstances, material to the case, and relating to my defence, so far as I comprehended the grounds and occasion, and as fully as I recollected the facts, and had the opportunity afforded me in the course of my consultation with him, in order to give him as full a view as I was able of the case on my part. And I do well recollect, that I then stated to Judge Mellen, that General Cooper had formerly acted as general agent for non-resident proprietors. I communicated to Judge Mellen, in substance, my conversation with Baker, and showed him a letter from Baker to me, which I afterwards forwarded to Judge Mellen, at his request. Judge Mellen said it was of no consequence, who was the agent of any non-resident proprietors, except me; that the question was, whether I was the agent of Tidd & Stimpson, and he treated it as a matter of no importance, who else might have had any agency, and appeared averse to considering any such suggestion. I distinctly and perfectly remember, that I did endeavour to present that subject to his attention, and call his mind to that point; and I well remember the impression, which he appeared strongly to have, and which he left upon my mind, that it was a matter of no moment.

"I further declare, and say, that I did make to him the most direct and explicit denial of all agency on my part for the plaintiffs, and said Tidd & Stimpson, or the heirs of said Tidd; or that any money had been intrusted to me by them, to pay the taxes as set forth in the bill; and my defence was accordingly placed upon that denial, and the denial of all fraud, and upon my legal title. And relying on the sufficiency of this, with the advice I received, I did not suppose it to be important to ascertain, whether said Tidd & Stimpson, or the heirs of said Tidd, had employed any particular agent; and I was totally unadvised and ignorant in my own mind, of any use of ascertaining the extent of General Cooper's agency, under the impression, thus received from my counsel, that it was in nowise material to my defence. I was informed and understood, that the burthen of proof, in that respect, was upon the plaintiffs; and that the fact, that I was the agent, in opposition to the denial in my answer, was required to be established by conclusive testimony, equal to that of two witnesses; and that it was not incumbent to show, who was their agent, if I was not.

"And I again solemnly declare, that I was not the agent of said Tidd & Stimpson, or the heirs of said Tidd, or of any of them, by any appointment or authority from them, or either of them, directly or indirectly; and that I never intended, by any act or conduct of mine, to assume that character; although, in legal construction, in the view of the court, upon the evidence exhibited, I have been decided to have been such.

"In consequence of the state of evidence laid before the court, and remarks, which fell from the court, and upon suggestion to me of the other of my counsel, and also from them and by their advice, on my return from court, (which I left before the opinion was pronounced,) I immediately made a journey to the town of Cooper, and there ascertained the facts, stated by said Cooper in his affidavit, which I immediately enclosed to my counsel in Portland, requesting and urging them to take the proper measures for my relief, and obtain opportunity, if possible, for a further investigation of facts.

"I further say, that I was not informed of the testimony of the witnesses, until after my arrival in Portland to attend the trial of the case, except in a general manner, and that I was greatly surprised by the extent and amount of evidence at the hearing, beyond what I had an idea of, and in many respects and particulars different from my expectations.

"For the same reason as before stated, I have also procured the affidavits, which are now offered, of Enoch Hill, Isaac Crane, John Allen, and Eleazer Chase. I did not know, that these persons were acquainted with the facts they have stated, before their affidavits were taken, most of them having taken place sometime before I became acquainted with the country; they being advanced in life, living distant from each other, and two of them about thirteen miles from me, with whom I have had no connexion in business for ten or fifteen years past, and scarcely remember to have seen them.

"I beg leave finally to state, in words entirely of my own, if I may with propriety do so, that most of the lands, that I did own in that township, I conveyed to James Richardson, Esq., of Dedham, Massachusetts, some years since, in payment of a just demand against me; and having sustained a fair character through life thus far for integrity, which I believe the plaintiffs will not attempt to deny, it is extremely painful for me in my old age to be cast out from the society of the virtuous, by the sentence of judges of my native state. Timothy Whiting."

The deposition of John Cooper was as follows:

"I, John Cooper, of Cooper, in the county of Washington, and state of Maine, depose and say, that I was the agent of John Peck, the owner of township No. 12, now Whiting, from January 28, 1806, until the same was sold by him at different times to sundry persons. That I afterwards acted as the agent of Thomas L. Winthrop, Samuel Parkman, George and Thomas Odiorne, and Messrs. Jacob Tidd and Samuel Stimpson, all of whom purchased of said Peck; and that the non-resident proprietors' lands in said town were sold for taxes, in August, 1821. The deponent further saith, the above named Winthrop, Parkman, George and Thomas Odiorne redeemed their lands in said town, and had the same set off to them in severalty; and that the said Samuel Stimpson and the heirs of said Jacob Tidd, who deceased before said sale, refused to redeem their part, both before and after the time of redemption was out, giving as a reason, that the taxes were so high, they did not think it worth redeeming.

"The deponent further saith, that Major Timothy Whiting, who was the largest owner in said town, at no time acted as the agent of said Jacob Tidd and Samuel Stimpson, or of the heirs of the said Jacob Tidd deceased, according to the best of my knowledge and belief. Further deponent saith not. John Cooper."

There were other affidavits introduced by the petitioner, and also two receipts offered by the original plaintiffs. It is unnecessary to recite them at large, as they are sufficiently referred to in the opinion of the court.

The questions upon the petition were argued by C. S. Daveis and P. Mellen, for the petition, and by Hobbs & Fessenden, against it.

The arguments for the petition were substantially as follows:

1st. That new facts, or facts discovered after a decree, or after publication passed in the cause, and which are materially pressing upon the decree, afford sufficient grounds to entitle the plaintiff to a rehearing. Young v. Keighly, 16 Ves. 350; Perry v. Phelips, 17 Ves. 178; Cook v. Bamfield, 3 Swanst. 607; Norris v. Le Neve, 3 Atk. 34; Ord v. Noel, 6 Madd. 127.

2d. That the new matter, upon which such a proceeding becomes proper and necessary, must have come materially and substantially to the knowledge of the party or his agents, after the decree, or at least after the time, when it would have been advantageously introduced in the cause. Ord v. Noel, 6 Madd. 127; Willan v. Willan, 16 Ves. 87; Earl of Portsmouth v. Lord Effingham, 1 Ves. Sr. 434; Norris v. Le Neve, 3 Atk. 34; Goodwin v. Goodwin, Id. 370; Dormer v. Fortescue, Id. 124; Jones v. Jones, Id. 110; Barrington v. O'Brien, 1 Ball & B. 173.

3d. That it must also appear, that a reasonable diligence was used to acquire a knowledge of the facts proved by the new evidence, before the decree. Young v. Keighly, 16 Ves. 349; Standish v. Radley, 2 Atk. 177; Gould v. Tancre, Id. 533.

Such being the principles laid down by the authorities, it was contended, that, under the circumstances of the present case, Whiting was entitled to relief. The point in issue was, originally, the agency of Whiting; and the agency of Cooper was only a matter of evidence, bearing collaterally on the main question, and might easily be supposed to have no material relevancy to the case. The fact of the agency of Cooper was, besides, expressly denied under oath by the defendant in his answer. It was communicated to counsel during the preparation of the case, and was by them considered as irrelevant, inasmuch as the question was not, who was the agent of Tidd & Stimpson, but only whether Whiting himself was their agent. Whiting had no certain or positive knowledge with relation to the agency of Cooper, further than the information, that he received from Baker; and the fact, that Cooper had removed from the vicinity of Whiting, rendered it difficult for him to acquire any information with regard to it. But in point of fact, the matter never came to the knowledge of Whiting, until after the time had entirely elapsed, within which it could have been used as evidence in the original cause, or he could have been capable of giving any instructions in regard to it, under the effect of Norris v. Le Neve, 3 Atk. 35. Gilb. Forum Rom. 187.

Again, inasmuch as the matter lay within the knowledge of the original plaintiffs, and they were in conscience bound to discover it, the decree has been obtained by fraud, and ought therefore to be set aside. Manaton v. Molesworth, 1 Eden, 18. If the fact was, as Cooper states it in his affidavits, it must have been known to the plaintiffs and parties in interest in the case, and they had a double interest in concealing their knowledge of it, and shutting up every avenue that might lead to it. They have, therefore, been guilty of an imposition upon the court.

The arguments against the petition were substantially as follows:

1st. If this is a mere petition for a rehearing, it must be for error, apparent on the decree, or pleadings and evidence. Perry v. Phelips, 17 Ves. 178; 2 Smith, Pr. 62, 64; Story, Eq. Pl. 336; and cases there cited. And the court will not receive new evidence, taken after the decree. Addison v. Hindmars, 1 Vern. 442; 2 Smith, Pr. 32, 33.

2d. If the present proceeding is to be taken as preliminary to filing a supplemental bill, in the nature of a bill of review, the court will not allow it to be filed, unless for the discovery of new matter, material and relevant, and of such a nature, as to make it a fit subject of judgment in a cause; nor unless the evidence establishes satisfactorily, that the new matter did not come to the knowledge of the party or his agent within such time, as that it could have been advantageously used in the original cause. Mitf. Eq. Pl. by Jeremy, 84, 85; Ord v. Noel, 6 Madd. 127; Wiser v. Blachly, 2 Johns. Ch. 488; Livingston v. Hubbs, 3 Johns. Ch. 124; 2 Smith, Pr. 64; Dexter v. Arnold, [Case No. 3,856.]

Reasonable diligence also must be used, if there have been laches or negligence, the title to relief is destroyed. Pendleton v. Fay, 3 Paige, 205; Young v. Keighly, 16 Ves. 348; Blake v. Foster, 2 Ball & B. 457–461; Barrington v. O'Brien, Id. 140. It is contended, that the facts show conclusively, that Whiting knew from the beginning, that Cooper could testify concerning the agency and that, if reasonable diligence had been used, his testimony could have been obtained, as easily as his affidavit, since the decree. The defendant's want of knowledge of the rules of proceeding, and the want of attention, or just appreciation of the value of the evidence on the part of his counsel, afford no ground for even an enlargement of publication, much less for a bill in the nature of a bill of review. Whitelocke v. Baker, 13 Ves. 511; Cann v. Cann, 1 P. Wms. 727.

But, assuming that reasonable diligence has been used, the newly discovered evidence is immaterial and irrelevant; and it is consistent with the mass of evidence, produced by the plaintiffs, so far as it relates to the agency of Whiting.

Again, this is a proposition to prove a fact, before in issue, and therefore is objectionable, as being cumulative. The authorities are wholly against it. Wood v. Mann, [Case No. 17,953;] Respass v. M'Clanahan, Hardin, 352; Bowles v. South, Hardin, 461; Head v. Head's Adm'rs, 3 A. K. Marsh. 121. Besides; the granting of such a bill is not a matter of right, but rests wholly in the sound discretion of the court, (Story, Eq. Pl. p. 332, § 417, and cases there cited,) and, under the circumstances of this case, it should be denied.

Again, assuming that the evidence is material, the decree should be sustained, because, Whiting was tenant in common with Tidd's heirs and Stimpson, and therefore purchased for the benefit of his co-tenants, on the 7th of August, 1821, and must account to them. Fonbl. Eq. (Last Ed.) bk. 2, c. 5, § 1, note c, p. 423; Van Horne v. Fonda, 5 Johns. Ch. 407; Farmer v. Samuel, 4 Litt. (Ky.) 187.

The court took time to advise; and afterwards the following opinion was delivered.

Before STORY, Circuit Justice, and DAVIS, District Judge.

STORY, Circuit Justice. The petition in this case involved some novelty, as well as some nicety, as to the practice of courts of equity, in regard to the rehearing of a cause, and the introduction of new evidence after the cause has been argued, and an interlocutory degree has been pronounced, but before a final decree has been entered; and on that account we were desirous to take a little time to consider it, before we delivered our judgment.

It is plain, that a rehearing alone, without the introduction of the new evidence, would be utterly useless, since (as the learned counsel admit) they could not hope to change the opinion of the court upon the actual posture of the facts, originally in the cause. The main scope of the argument has, therefore, been addressed to the consideration of the new evidence. And it seems to us, that if it would have furnished a sufficient ground for a bill of review, or a supplemental bill in the nature of a bill of review, if a final decree had been pronounced, then it is competent for the court, in the present stage of the cause, to order a rehearing, and to direct the new evidence to be taken and brought before the court at the rehearing, as a part of the proofs in the cause. In this way complete justice may be done between the parties. But to compel the petitioner to wait until a final decree, and then to apply for a bill of review, or a bill in the nature of a bill of review, would not only occasion great delay, but also great expense to the parties, which ought, if practicable, to be avoided. The only other mode, by which the new matter can be brought before the court, is by a supplemental bill; but this course does not seem to us absolutely indispensable in a case, exactly circumstanced, as this is. See Story, Eq. Pl. §§ 337, 393, 890, and the authorities there cited; Gilb. Forum Rom. 49; Patterson v. Slaughter, 1 Amb. 292, 293. Indeed, the objection in this form has not been made at the bar; and the argument has proceeded upon the implied understanding, that, if the new evidence be admissible at all, the parties are content, that it should be received at the rehearing as more convenient, as well as less dilatory to them, than a more formal proceeding. In Standish v. Radley, 2 Atk. 177, Lord Hardwicke, upon a petition of the defendant, directed a rehearing of the original decree (it not being enrolled), and allowed the defendant to file a supplemental bill to bring before the court, at the rehearing, proof of certain releases, not before in issue, or known until after the decree. In Norris v. Le Neve, 3 Atk. 26, 32, 33, a petition for a rehearing, and to bring a bill in the nature of a bill of review, where the original decree had been made upon a bill and cross bill, was preferred before Lord Hardwicke by the defendant, partly upon new proofs, which were not before known, and partly upon new matters, which were not before in issue, after an interlocutory decree, and before the final decree. Lord Hardwicke was of opinion, that all the matters were sufficiently before the court upon the original hearing, upon the allegations in the original bill and cross bill, in the cause; and, therefore, that the defendants did not need a bill of review to bring the equity fully before the court. He also thought, that the new proofs offered were not new discoveries; and, therefore, he denied the petitioner. In Earl of Portsmouth v. Lord Effingham, 1 Ves. Sr. 430, upon the petition of the defendant, Lord Hardwicke allowed a bill of review to be brought upon new matter discovered since the decree, going to the title originally in issue. See Patterson v. Slaughter, 1 Amb. 293. In Attorney General v. Turner, 2 Amb. 587, the same great judge allowed a rehearing and a supplemental bill upon matters not before in issue, and newly discovered, upon the petition of the defendant. These seem all to have been cases, where a final decree had been pronounced by the court. But in Barrington v. O'Brien, 2 Ball & B. 140, and Blake v. Foster, Id. 457, Lord Manners allowed a rehearing, and a supplemental bill to be filed by the defendants upon newly discovered facts, after an interlocutory decree. The doctrine of these cases was fully recognized by Mr. Chancellor Kent, in Wiser v. Blachly, 2 Johns. Ch. 488, and Livingston v. Hubbs, 3 Johns. Ch. 124, and by the circuit court in Rhode Island in Dexter v. Arnold, [Case No. 3,856.] It is clear, therefore that the defendant would be entitled to relief by a rehearing, upon filing a supplemental bill, under the direction of the court, stating the new evidence, if it be of such a nature, and under such circumstances, as that he might have relief upon a bill of review, or a bill in the nature of a bill of review; but not otherwise. The rule, I take to be clear, that such a rehearing, and such a supplemental bill, will be granted only, when the party could entitle himself to relief upon a bill of review, or a supplemental bill, in the nature of a bill of review, after a final decree.

The questions then properly before the court are, first, whether the defendant, Whiting, had knowledge, or could, by reasonable inquiry and diligence, have acquired knowledge of the facts stated in Cooper's deposition, (for the other affidavits are merely explanatory, and of little consequence without that,) before the publication of the evidence, or before the hearing, which was a year afterwards, so that he might have availed himself of it before the decree. If he had such knowledge, or could by reasonable inquiry and diligence have obtained it, then it is clear upon the authorities, that he is not now entitled to any relief. The cases before cited, as well as Young v. Keighly, 16 Ves. 348, and Partridge v. Usborne, 5 Russ. 195, are directly in point. See, also, Story, Eq. Pl. § 414, and cases there cited. Secondly, whether, supposing the former point to be decided in favor of the defendant, Whiting, the evidence of Cooper is of such stringency and force, and relevancy, as that it justly might, and ought to entitle him to a reversal of the decree, by overcoming the former evidence in the cause, as well as the receipts, now produced by the plaintiffs from Whiting, by one of which he acknowledges himself to have received in April, 1816, from Jacob Tidd, $26.91 for his proportion of taxes on township No. 12, (the land in controversy,) for 1814 and 1815; and by the other to have received from Samuel Stimpson, in October, 1817, the sum of $5.57 in full of taxes on the same township for 1816 and 1817, which receipts certainly point very distinctly to an agency in the land by Whiting for those, under whom the plaintiffs claim title.

As to the first point. The great object of the new evidence is to establish, that Cooper was, in fact, the agent of Stimpson & Tidd, and Tidd's heirs, as to their interest in the township No. 12; and thus to repel the allegations of the bill, that Whiting was their agent, and to support his answer, denying such agency; and further, to show, that, upon notice from Cooper in 1821 of the sale of the lands for taxes, Stimpson declined to redeem the same; and thereby to raise a presumption, that Tidd, or Tidd's heirs, had knowledge of the sale, and acquiesced in the same manner without intending to redeem. The presumption certainly applies with no force to Tidd, who was at that time dead, or to Tidd's heirs; for his heirs were all at that time under age, and incapable of waiving or affecting their own rights in the lands.

Upon the actual posture of the evidence, it seems difficult to assert, that Whiting had not full knowledge, before the cause was at issue, that Cooper was the agent of Stimpson & Tidd, and other non-resident proprietors. Whiting in his affidavit admits, that he knew, that Cooper was agent for several non-resident proprietors of the township, at least from 1816 or 1817 up to the time of the sale, he himself having become a proprietor, under a levy in execution, of a large interest in the same township, as early as 1813. But he adds, that he did not know, that Cooper was the agent in special (without explaining what he means by these words) of Tidd & Stimpson, and of the heirs of Tidd, as Cooper has stated in his affidavit, for their lands in the township. Now, this last allegation must be received with the qualification, which Whiting has in another part of his affidavit referred to, viz. that he (Whiting) was informed by Baker (the plaintiff), in 1835, that Cooper had been formerly the agent for non-resident proprietors in certain townships generally, and among them he believes Baker mentioned, of Stimpson & Tidd, for Township No. 12. Now, this must have been nearly or quite three years before the publication of the testimony, and four years before the hearing of the cause, at May term, 1839. It is difficult, under such circumstances, to resist the conclusion, that Whiting was thus put upon inquiry and the exercise of diligence, as to the agency of Cooper; for, if Cooper was, at the time of the sale, and for years before, the known and active agent of Stimpson & Tidd, it would be most important evidence to repel the presumption, that he was himself also their agent.

What strengthens this conclusion, and, indeed, establishes it almost beyond controversy, is the fact, stated by Whiting in he same affidavit, that at the time, when his counsel was preparing his answer to the bill, he mentioned the circumstance of Cooper's agency to the counsel; but he was then informed, that it was not material, who was the agent of Stimpson & Tidd, if he (Whiting) was not. Certainly, as matter to be put into the answer, it was not material; but as matter of evidence to disprove Whiting's own agency, it was and must have been very material. That at the moment, when the answer was drawing, it did not strike the counsel with its true force, does not reflect any discredit upon his judgment, because that was not the stage in the proceedings, in which it was required to be weighed and considered. But when the evidence was largely gone into, at a subsequent period, to establish the agency of Whiting, in support of the allegations of the bill, if Whiting had used even ordinary diligence in bringing it to the view of counsel, it is scarcely credible, that it should have then been passed by with indifference. It went to the very pith of the controversy.

But, then, it is said, that Whiting was misled by the language of his counsel; and that he ought not to be made a sufferer therefor. But, I apprehend, that no court of equity has ever felt itself at liberty to grant an application of this sort upon the suggestion of an error of judgment, or a mistake of law by counsel, as to the pertinency or force of evidence to be used in a cause. In Norris v. Le Neve, 3 Atk. 36, speaking of new discoveries, which would entitle a party to a bill of review, it is said; "If they (the facts) were known to the parties' counsel, or to their attorney and solicitor, or agents, it is sufficient to rebut such an application, or there would be no end of suits. How many parties are there, that know not the merits of their own cause; but rely on the skill of their counsel or solicitor; and therefore, what counsel or solicitors know, must be allowed to be the knowledge of the parties." And, certainly, it would not do to allow clients to have a rehearing or review of a cause, simply because their counsel have not fully appreciated the merits of their cause, or even have overlooked the importance of certain points of evidence, and therefore have omitted to have it taken for the cause. I am very far from imputing to the learned counsel in this cause the slightest blame. What I wish to state is merely the general rule, which cannot be broken in upon without manifest danger to the interests of all the adverse parties in controverted suits; and it will certainly not do to lay down a new rule for this cause only.

There is another consideration, arising upon Whiting's affidavit. He states, that his acquaintance with the business and concerns of the township, commenced about 1816 or 1817; and he adds; "I then understood, that said Cooper was the agent of a considerable number of the proprietors of said township, and I supposed the major part of them. General Cooper gave numerous permits, on behalf of those proprietors, for whom he acted, without objection from me; and he knew and made no objection to those, which I granted, which was done with his consent." Now, this declaration clearly shows, that Whiting was well acquainted with Cooper's agency for many of the proprietors, as early as 1816 or 1817; and there is no pretence to say, that, being apprized of that fact, he was not put upon inquiry, as to the particular persons, for whom Cooper was agent, as soon as the present bill was brought. It was most natural, that he should actually have made such inquiry; and if he had, Cooper would at once have informed him, that he was the agent of Stimpson & Tidd, as well as of other persons. The very circumstance, that Cooper was the known agent of a large number of the proprietors, whose names were not known to Whiting, ought to have awakened in him a spirit of diligence. There was a still more impressive fact, to which I shall more particularly allude hereafter, which ought to have led him to make the inquiry; and that is, that he and Cooper, in managing the affairs of the township, mutually advised and acted in concert. "Neither of us (says Whiting) intended, as I believe, to exceed our respective rights, or those, for which we acted, or to exercise them in such a manner as to interfere with each other. I acted with his advice and consent on the part of those, for whom he acted as agent, in giving permission to Raymond & How to erect a saw-mill at the Orange Rips." Now, if Whiting himself was not the agent of Stimpson & Tidd in acts like this, which affected intimately the interests of all the proprietors, it would seem an almost irresistible conclusion, that he deemed the interests of Stimpson & Tidd to be represented by Cooper. It is not a little remarkable, also, that in this very paper, signed by Whiting, and giving the permission to Raymond & How, Whiting states himself expressly to be "the agent of the said township" (No. 12); thus, in effect, assuming to act as the representative of the proprietors.

And, here, it may be as well to dispose of that part of Whiting's petition, which complains of surprise, if not of fraud, in the introduction of that paper, as a part of Raymond's testimony. We think the complaint utterly groundless. That paper was properly introduced under the interrogatory addressed to Raymond for the production of all papers relative to permits to cut timber; and the counter paper, now offered by Whiting to explain the transaction, is in exact coincidence with the conclusion, deducible from the very language and objects, professed on the face of the former. And, if Whiting thought otherwise, after publication of the testimony, for one whole year before the hearing, he might have applied to have had it suppressed, or for leave of the court to introduce the counter paper at the hearing. See Whitelocke v. Baker, 13 Ves. 511. He did no such thing; and his present complaint must be deemed a mere afterthought, upon feeling the full pressure of the evidence at the argument.

But let us see, what is the new evidence relied upon of Cooper, and how far it establishes an exclusive agency in him for Stimpson & Tidd. Cooper, in his deposition, in answer to the first interrogatory, says; "That he acted as agent for John Peck, Esq., the principal owner in township No. 12, by verbal and written request, and by power of attorney, from 1794 to 1813 or 1814; and for Samuel Parkman, Thomas L. Winthrop, George and Thomas Odiorne, and Messrs. Jacob Tidd and Samuel Stimpson, who held under said Peck, by their verbal and written request, up to and including 1820. I was authorized to take a general supervision of their respective interests in said land." In answer to the second, he says; "That from about 1816, the general concerns of the township No. 12 were managed by Timothy Whiting (the defendant), who became the largest owner in 1813, and, considering me as the agent for the non-resident proprietors, above named, consulted me on all measures proposed for the general benefit. But no special communication with said Jacob Tidd or Samuel Stimpson, or any other of the above named proprietors or their heirs, was either made or received, other than before mentioned, as in my first answer; and no particular power was given or accounts settled, except that of the general agency of said township, unless where the proprietors redeemed their lands, and had them set off in severalty." In answer to other interrogatories, he says, that Whiting, to his knowledge, never assumed to be the agent of Tidd or Stimpson, or either of the before named non-residents; or to the best of his remembrance, ever undertook to act on account of any other than himself, and in his own right, except with his advice, given as agent of the said non-resident proprietors. That he considered himself as acting for the non-resident proprietors generally; and, as Whiting managed the general concerns of the township, he occasionally informed him (Cooper), as agent for the non-resident proprietors, of his proceedings, that he might make the necessary communications to them. That he (Cooper) paid the taxes of the non-resident proprietors of the township No. 12, until 1820. That he never had any written power, or authority to act as agent for Tidd & Stimpson, in relation to township No. 12; but so acted by their verbal request. That he had a special power in 1803, from them to act in their behalf, under the direction of John Peck, for township No. 11. That he had no letters from Tidd & Stimpson to himself, and no copies of any letters to them. That he considered his agency for Tidd and Stimpson at an end, when they neglected or refused to redeem their land. That in the winter of 1821, and the fall following, he was in Boston, and had personal interviews with Stimpson respecting his and Tidd's land in the township No. 12; and Stimpson utterly refused to redeem, and gave him to understand, that Tidd's heirs also refused to redeem, stating as a reason, that the land was not worth redeeming; that in the winter of 1821, Tidd was too sick to be seen, and that in the fall he had deceased.

This is the substance of Cooper's testimony. And the first remark, which is called for, is, that it is merely cumulative to the issue made in the original pleadings, that of the agency of Whiting, and is supposed, by affirming the agency of Cooper, to negative that of Whiting. We shall presently see, how far that conclusion is justified. Now, it seems to be a general rule, perhaps not strictly a universal rule, in proceedings of this sort, not to allow a rehearing and a supplemental bill upon new discovered evidence, which is merely cumulative to the litigated facts already in issue. Such was the opinion of Mr. Chancellor Kent, in Livingston v. Hubbs, 3 Johns. Ch. 124, and it was in some measure recognized in Dexter v. Arnold, [Case No. 3,856.] But waiving this consideration, another remark, which strikes the mind upon the first blush of the deposition, is, that it distinctly and unequivocally shows, that as early as 1816, and from thence upwards, Whiting had the most thorough knowledge of Cooper's agency for the non-resident proprietors, that he advised with him in all the concerns of the township, and acted under his advice in all measures, which respected the general interests of the proprietors. Cooper expressly asserts, that from about 1816, the general concerns of the township were managed by Whiting, with his advice and consent, as agent of the non-resident proprietors; and among these were Stimpson & Tidd. So that, in fact, according to this very aspect of the case, Whiting was a sub-agent, as to the whole affairs of the township for those proprietors, and acted as such up to the very time of the sale. Now, a sub-agent is just as much disqualified, as an agent is, to make a purchase in opposition to the rights and interest of his principal.

But it is said, that Whiting did not, in fact, know, that Stimpson & Tidd were non-resident proprietors, for whom Cooper was "in special" an agent. Be it so. But how does that help the matter? He had the means of knowing, if he chose to inquire; and he undertook to act under Cooper for all for whom Cooper was agent. Nay, it appears to me, that Cooper's testimony justifies the court in saying, that Whiting understood, that Cooper acted as agent for all the proprietors, except those, for whom Whiting undertook to act, as agent, in managing the general concerns of the township. It is not even shown, that there were any other proprietors of the township, except Whiting and those for whom Cooper purported to act. There are some twenty receipts and permits between 1816 and 1821, in which Whiting acted and signed "for the proprietors," or authorized acts to be done, affecting the interests of all the proprietors, such as the cutting of logs on the township, besides the Orange Rip contract, where he describes himself "as agent of the township." Besides; it is perfectly clear from the receipts now offered as new evidence, that Whiting positively knew, that Stimpson & Tidd were non-resident proprietors; and he actually received from them the taxes on their lands in the township, in 1816 and 1817. Now, at that time, he either acted as their direct agent, or as their sub-agent under Cooper in the payment of these taxes; and therefore, in either view, there is difficulty in presuming, that he did not know, whether Cooper was acting "in special" for them or not.

But the other part of the conclusion attempted to be drawn from Cooper's testimony, that he was the exclusive agent, is also incumbered with many difficulties. Cooper may have been an agent of Stimpson & Tidd, and not exclusively their agent. We have seen, that in the receipts and permits already referred to, Whiting acted as agent for the proprietors generally, and not for a part thereof. He nowhere signs, as sub-agent under Cooper. The receipts given by Whiting to Stimpson & Tidd, for the taxes in 1814, 1815, 1816, and 1817, profess no such sub-agency; but are apparently acts done by a primary agent. If Cooper means to affirm, that he always paid the taxes during his agency, until 1820, for Stimpson & Tidd, these receipts seem to contradict that suggestion. And it is not a little remarkable, that Cooper produces not a scrip of paper of any sort, touching his agency for Stimpson & Tidd, during its whole existence. No letters, no written receipts, no written charges, no written payments are produced. Every thing rests in general oral statements, after the lapse of more than twenty years.

But what presses upon my mind with peculiar force, is this, that from the written documents it is clear, that Whiting during the period assumed to act for the proprietors generally. Can he now be permitted, in order to justify himself in the sale for taxes, to disclaim that agency, and set up an adverse interest? If he can, ought the evidence to be admitted, unless it is perfectly clear, and fortified by written proofs, not dependent upon the frail memory of man? How can such a disclaimer consist with the language of the above receipts for the taxes of 1814, 1815, 1816, and 1817?

These last remarks are properly applicable to the second question, whether the evidence, if admitted, is of such stringency and force and relevancy, as justly to call for a reversal of the decree. To say the least of it, I entertain the most serious doubts upon that point. The most that the evidence properly establishes is, that Cooper acted as the agent of Stimpson & Tidd (not as an exclusive agent) by verbal authority; and Whiting may also have acted in the general concerns of the township for Stimpson & Tidd, by a like general authority, especially after he removed to the township, or managed its general concerns. But upon the other question, that Whiting either knew, or might by reasonable diligence have known, the facts, to which Cooper now testifies, as to his agency, there seems to me to be no just ground for doubt. Cooper's evidence on this point, in no proper sense, comes within the rule for the admission of new discovered evidence, according to the doctrine of courts of equity.

In respect to that part of Cooper's testimony, which states, that he communicated to Stimpson, in 1821, the tax sale, and he declined to redeem, it is a fact, that is not put in issue in the cause, and therefore, could be brought forward only by a supplemental bill. If it were admitted, it could not affect Tidd's heirs, but Stimpson only, for the reasons already stated. But there is this additional consideration, that if the cause were to be decided upon this ground, it would be upon the testimony of a single witness speaking to facts after twenty years, and to a confession, incapable, it may be, of being rebutted, after such a lapse of time. Besides; what is very material, is, that it does not appear, that Cooper ever communicated to Stimpson, that Whiting was the purchaser at the tax sale, or to Whiting, that Stimpson declined to redeem. These would be highly important ingredients if the defence had originally proceeded upon the ground, that Whiting was constructively, or expressly the agent of Stimpson & Tidd, and that they by their long acquiescence in his purchase, had waived the agency and right to redeem. But, if Whiting's defence, as now made, is to stand, that there never was any agency whatsoever for them, it does not seem practicable to give him the benefit of any such fact.

Upon the whole, our judgment is, that the petition ought not to be granted, and therefore, that the interlocutory decree already pronounced ought to stand.

Case No. 787.

BAKER et ux. v. WHITING et al.

[3 Sumn. 45.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Maine. May Term, 1839.

DEED—CONSTRUCTION—MAINTENANCE AND CHAMPERTY—EQUITY—TRUSTS—RIGHTS OF BENEFICIARY—CO-TENANT AS TRUSTEE—ADVERSE POSSESSION—EXTINGUISHMENT OF TRUST.

1. A deed of release for a valuable consideration, and intended to convey all the party's right and title, if it cannot take effect as a release, may be construed, in furtherance of the intention of the parties, as a bargain and sale, or other appropriate conveyance, ut res magis valeat, quam pereat.

2. The old cases with regard to maintenance and champerty go farther than would now be sustained in courts of equity.

3. A cestui que trust may lawfully dispose of his trust estate, notwithstanding his title is contested by the trustee. Neither the common law, with regard to maintenance and champerty, nor the statute of 32 Hen. VIII. c. 9, made in aid thereof, apply to a trust estate actually existing, either by the acts of the parties, or by construction of law.

[Cited in Wyman v. Babcock, Case No. 18,113.]

4. There can be no disseisin of a trust, though the exercise of an adverse possession for a great length of time may in equity bar or extinguish it.

[Cited in Hunter v. Marlboro, Case No. 6,908.]

5. A purchase by an agent will be deemed, by a court of equity, a purchase for his principals, unless the agent has openly and notoriously, and with full notice to his principals, discharged himself from his agency.

6. A tenant in common cannot, without the consent of his co-tenants, grant permits to persons to go on the premises owned in common, and to cut down timber thereon for their own use, for a compensation, called, in the language of the country, "stumpage."

[1] [Reported by Hon. Charles Sumner.]

7. All acts, done by one tenant in common, are to be done for the interest of all the co-tenants, and in conformity to their rights, until an adverse claim is notoriously set up and established by competent proofs.

8. Stimpson gave a deed of release of his interest, as a tenant in common, in certain premises to Baker; at the time of this conveyance, Whiting was in possession and seisin of the premises, claiming them in his own right, by virtue of a purchase under a tax sale. Whiting was one of the tenants in common of the premises, and was the agent of Stimpson and the other proprietors. Held, that the purchase of Whiting must be deemed a trust for the benefit of Stimpson and his grantee, Baker, to the extent of their interests; that he ought to be decreed to convey the legal title to the premises, after being satisfied of all just claims, which he had against them for taxes, for the purchase money laid out in the tax-sale, for his expenditures and improvements upon them, and also for his reasonable services as agent in the premises, deducting all sums of money received by him in the premises for "stumpage" or otherwise.

9. In equity, length of time is no bar to a trust clearly established; provided no circumstances exist to raise a presumption from lapse of time of an extinguishment of the trust, and no open denial or repudiation of the trust is brought home to the knowledge of the parties in interest, which requires them to act, as upon an adverse title.

Bill in equity [by George Baker and wife against Timothy Whiting and others] and cross bill. The bill stated, that on or about the 10th November, 1800, John Peck, by deed of bargain and sale conveyed to Jacob Tidd, father of Emily, the wife of George Baker, and to Samuel Stimpson seven thousand and twenty-three acres of land situate in township No. 12, now Whiting, in the county of Washington, whereby the said Tidd and Stimpson became seised of an absolute estate in the said seven thousand and twenty-three acres of land in fee simple as tenants in common thereof, and in common with other owners of the said township. Afterwards Tidd and Stimpson employed the defendant, Whiting, as their agent, to take care of the said land and prevent any trespass thereon, and to pay all taxes lawfully assessed on the same, or give notice thereof to his constituents, which the said Whiting undertook to do. Jacob Tidd died in the year 1821, and thereupon one seventh of his interest descended to his daughter Emily, who became seised thereof. Another undivided seventh part descended to her brother William Dawes Tidd, son of the said Jacob, who became seised thereof, and afterwards died, so seised, unmarried and without issue, whereby one sixth part of the said undivided share of the said W. D. Tidd, descended and came to the said Emily. Samuel Stimpson afterwards conveyed all his interest to George Baker.

The bill charged a combination between Charles Peavy, Timothy Whiting, Timothy Whiting, Jr., M. J. Talbot and Samuel A. Morse and others, persons unknown, and that they entered into the said tract and disseised the complainants, under pretence, that the said lands were legally assessed for public taxes and duly advertised and sold to the said Whiting, Sen., as the highest bidder, and that the said owners neglected to redeem the same according to the laws of Maine, whereby the said Whiting, Sen., lawfully became the absolute owner thereof in fee simple; whereas the contrary is true, and that no such tax was lawfully assessed, nor was any sale thereof lawfully made. That Whiting fraudulently kept the complainants and the said Tidd and Stimpson, wholly ignorant and uninformed of the said pretended assessment and sale, that he might seem to acquire some legal title to the said seven thousand and twenty-three acres, through their neglect to redeem the same. That the said Whiting, Sen., after his pretended purchase, sold the said lands, absolutely and in good faith, and for a valuable consideration, to the said Morse, Talbot and Whiting, Jr., or some of them. The said grantees petitioned for partition as tenants in common, with persons unknown, and that, on notice given and proved, and proceedings had, partition was made by commissioners appointed for that purpose, and lands were set off in severalty to Morse, Talbot, and Whiting, Jr.

The bill alleged further, that Whiting, Sen., under some pretence of right had cut down, converted to his own use, and received pay for large quantities of timber, without the license or consent of the complainants, or persons under whom they claim, and that during the past winter, and up to the time of the filing of the bill, the said Peavy and others had entered upon the said lands and cut down a large number of timber trees thereon, which they were about to remove and convert into lumber, to the great and irreparable injury of the complainants.

The bill concluded with a prayer, that the defendants might discover and exhibit any and all letters, agreements, memorandums, original deeds and paper writings in their possession or control, relating to the matters stated and charged; that they might account for the value of the timber and trees, which were upon the said lands, and cut down by them or by Whiting, Sen.; that they might be restrained from cutting and removing the said timber, and that they might be required to release their pretended titles to the premises, and for further and other relief.

The answer of Timothy Whiting, admitted the title to have been originally in Emily Baker, as stated; but alleged, that it was defeated by a tax-sale, on the 7th August, 1821, and further denied all agency for the complainants, or for Tidd or Stimpson, or that he ever undertook to act as agent for them. The answer stated, that the defendant, on 27th August, 1821, purchased seventeen thousand five hundred acres, lying in common with the residue of the said lands in the said plantation, at an auction sale of the same, by Enoch Hill, collector of taxes for that year, the same having been sold for the non-payment of certain taxes assessed on the said lands, being the unimproved lands of non-resident proprietors thereof, for the year 1821; the said taxes amounting to $357.85. The sale was advertised, previously, in the Eastern Argus, printed at Portland, and in the Eastport Sentinel, and notice thereof posted in the said plantation. The said collector executed and delivered a deed of the said land to the defendant on the 6th of November, 1821, to hold in fee simple, but subject to the legal right of redemption; but which was never redeemed, and so the defendant became the absolute owner thereof in fee. Whiting further alleged, that he owned several thousand acres in the town of Whiting, prior to August 27th, 1821, but had no means of knowing the exact quantity, and that, therefore, it became necessary for him to convey to Whiting, Jr., Morse and Talbot, in order to have his interest properly ascertained, and set off in severalty; that many years prior to the filing of the bill, Whiting, Jr., Morse and Talbot, had conveyed their said several parcels to the defendant, whereby the legal title became vested in him, and during the past winter and to the time of the filing of the bill, he entered upon lands owned by him in severalty, and no other, and cut down a large number of timber trees, as charged in the said bill, as he had a right to do. Whiting further alleged, that the deed mentioned in the bill, which was given by the said Samuel Stimpson to the said George Baker, was given in December, 1835, or January or February, 1836, at which time the land mentioned in the said deed was in the possession of the defendant or his assigns; the evidence of whose titles was all on record, and the said lands were then claimed to be the defendant's or his assigns', all which facts were well known to said Baker at the time he made his said purchase of the said Stimpson.

Answers were also put in by Samuel A. Morse, M. J. Talbot, and Charles Peavy, wherein they stated the origin of their interests in the estates mentioned in the original bill. A cross-bill was also filed by Timothy Whiting, Samuel A. Morse, and M. J. Talbot, charging a combination to purchase up stale or pretended titles, and praying for a dismissal of the original bill, a perpetual injunction in relation to the premises, and for further relief. The answer to the cross-bill denied all combination to purchase up stale or pretended titles, and concluded with a prayer for an injunction against Whiting to restrain him from cutting and carrying away timber from the premises, or permitting timber to be cut and carried away.

Hobbs, Fessenden, and Deblois, for plaintiffs.

Davels and Mellen, for defendants.

Before STORY, Circuit Justice, and WARE, District Judge.

STORY, Circuit Justice. Several objections have been taken to the present bill at the hearing, some of which involve matters of fact, and others matters of law. I will briefly state the opinion of the court upon all the points suggested at the argument.

The first question is, whether the plaintiffs have shown any title whatsoever to maintain the present bill; or, in other words, whether they have shown any interest or estate in the land in controversy. The bill states, that Baker and his wife are entitled in her right to one sixth of one undivided seventh part of the premises; and that Baker, in his own right, is entitled to one moiety of the premises, in virtue of his purchase and assignment from Stimpson, who was owner thereof. Mrs. Baker inherited from her father, Jacob Tidd, one seventh of the premises; and by the death of her brother, William Dawes Tidd, one seventh of one seventh; he, dying after he came of age, and his mother being entitled to share with his brothers and sisters. By the deed of Baker and his wife to Howe, in December, 1835, they released their right and title to four sixth parts of the premises; and the answer to the cross bill insists, that she never intended by that deed to part with the share derived from her brother. Be this as it may, it is very clear, that she has not conveyed it by this deed, since her right is still retained to the remaining two-sixths of the premises. So that Baker and his wife are fully entitled to the whole share derived from her brother. The bill is, therefore, maintainable by the plaintiffs in her right, so far as this interest goes.

As to the title derived by Baker by the deed of release from Stimpson of one moiety of the premises, as the release was for a valuable consideration, and meant to convey all Stimpson's right and title, if it cannot take effect as a release, it may be construed in furtherance of the intention of the parties, as a bargain and sale, or other appropriate conveyance, ut res magis valeat, quam pereat. This doctrine I take to be now well settled at law. But in equity there can be no question, that it is fully established. The case of Doungsworth v. Blair, 1 Keen, 801, is directly in point, if, indeed, so plain a principle required any authority to support it. In that case it was held, that an indenture, which was intended to be an indenture of release, but could not operate as such, might, for the purpose of carrying into effect the real intention of the parties, if there was a proper consideration, be construed as a covenant to stand seised. The case of a valuable consideration is far stronger. See, also, 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 168.

The main objection, however, taken to the operation of this deed, is, that at the time of this conveyance by Stimpson to Baker, the defendant was in full possession and seisin of the premises, claiming them in his own right, and of course, that Stimpson was then disseised, and the conveyance to Baker was void under the operation of the common law relative to maintenance and champerty, and the statute of 32 Hen. VIII. c. 9, made in aid thereof. This statute prohibits, under penalties, the buying or selling of any pretended right or title to land, unless the vendor is in actual possession of the land, or of the reversion or remainder. The object of the statute, as well as of the common law, was, doubtless, to prevent the buying up of controverted legal titles, which the owner did not think it worth his while to pursue, upon mere speculation; so that in fact, it might properly be deemed the mere purchase of a law-suit. 4 Bl. Comm. 135, 136; 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 83, §§ 1–20; Id. c. 84, §§ 1–20; Id. c. 86, §§ 1, 4–17. The old cases upon this subject have gone a great way, farther, indeed, than would now be sustained in courts of equity, which have broken in upon some of the doctrines established thereby. But be this as it may, neither the common law, nor the statute, applies to a trust estate actually existing, either by the acts of the parties, or by construction of law. Thus, a cestui que trust may lawfully dispose of his trust estate, notwithstanding his title is contested by the trustee; for the latter can never disseize the former of the trust estate; but so long as it continues, the possession of the trustee is treated, at least in a court of equity, as the possession of the cestui que trust. There can be no disseisin of a trust; although the exercise of an adverse possession for a great length of time may, in equity, bar or extinguish the trust. The whole question in the present case turns upon this; whether the defendant, Whiting, at the time of his purchase of the premises at the sale for taxes, in August, 1821, was the agent of the heirs of Jacob Tidd, of Stimpson, and of other proprietors of their undivided shares in the premises. If he was, then, upon the acknowledged principles of courts of equity he, as an agent, could not become a purchaser at the sale for himself; but his purchase must be deemed a purchase for his principals. It matters not, whether, in such a case, the defendant intended to purchase for himself, and on his own account, or not. For courts of equity will not tolerate any agent in acts of this sort, since they operate as a virtual fraud upon the rights and interests of his principals, which he is bound to protect. He was bound, as their agent for the premises, to give them notice of the intended sale, and to save the property from any sacrifice; and until he had openly, and notoriously, and after full notice to the principals, discharged himself from his agency, he could not be permitted, in a court of equity, to become a purchaser at the sale. If, indeed, as there is much reason to believe, at the time of the sale, he had funds of his principals in his own hands, sufficient to meet the taxes; and a fortiori, if he endeavored to dissuade, or to prevent other persons from becoming bidders at the sale, as some of the evidence states, his conduct was, supposing him to be agent, still more reprehensible. The validity of the conveyance, then, from Stimpson to Baker, depends upon the fact, whether the defendant, Whiting, was or was not the agent and mere trustee of the parties; and whether, if agent, eo instanti, that the conveyance under the tax sale was made to him, the law did not attach the trust to the lands in his hands. If it did, then the conveyance of Stimpson to Baker was valid. If it did not, then it was void, as falling within the reach of the doctrines respecting maintenance, champerty, and pretended titles. Those doctrines do not apply to trusts created in privity of estate, but to adverse and independent titles between strangers. It is quite a mistake to suppose, that a controverted trust may not be assigned by the owner, when it is clearly and unequivocally attached to property. If a contract is made for the sale of lands, the contractee may sell and assign the whole, or a part, or make a binding subcontract respecting the same, whether there be a controversy respecting the specific performance of the original contract, or not. The case of Wood v. Griffith, 1 Swanst. 55, 56, is fully in point upon this doctrine, even when the assignment or sale is made during the pendency of a suit for a specific performance.[2] I repeat it, therefore, that the whole question, whether the deed from Stimpson to Baker was a valid conveyance or not, depends upon the point, whether, at the time, the defendant was actually or constructively a trustee of the premises for Stimpson.

And, in my judgment, notwithstanding the stern denials of the answer of Whiting, the fact of the agency of the defendant, at and before the time of the tax sale, for Stimpson, as well as for the heirs of Jacob Tidd, and other proprietors, is completely established by evidence altogether unexceptionable and conclusive. It is proved by acts done, which in no other way could be lawful, or indeed could be fairly accounted for. And it is also proved by written documents and receipts, which admit of no reasonable doubt. It appears, that as long ago as 1815 the defendant, Whiting, became a purchaser, [2] See, also, 2 Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 1048–1051, 1053, 1054; Harrington v. Long, 2 Mylne & K. 590; Hartley v. Russell, 2 Sim. & S. 244. In the case of Prosser v. Edmonds, 1 Younge & C. 497, 498, there was no trust, but a mere naked right to set aside a conveyance for fraud, which distinguishes it from the present case.

and, as such, a tenant in common with the other proprietors of these undivided lands. He undertook, at various times, between 1815, and the sale in 1821, as well as afterwards, to grant written permits to different persons to go on the premises, and to cut down timber thereon for their own use, for a compensation called, in the expressive language of the country, "stumpage"; and, for this compensation, he also at several times gave receipts. Now, as a tenant in common, he had no authority whatsoever, without the consent, express or implied, of his co-tenants to grant any such permits, or to authorize any such acts. They are expressly prohibited, not only by the common law, but by the positive penalties of the statute of the state upon this subject. These penalties are severe; and the law will never presume, that a party does an unlawful act, unless it is shown by some competent evidence. The presumption in the absence of counteracting evidence is, that it is done under lawful authority, if it might have been so done. A court of equity would, a fortiori, indulge in such a presumption in favor of a party, who is a tenant in common, that he acted as a common agent, for the common benefit of all the proprietors; since in that way he may promote the true interests of all. Indeed, all acts, done by one tenant in common, are presumed to be done for the interest of all the cotenants, and in conformity to their rights, until an adverse claim is notoriously set up, and established by competent proofs. In the present case, upon this sole ground, in the absence of all counter proofs, the acts of the defendant, Whiting, up to the tax sale in 1821, ought to be deemed to be done by him as a tenant in common, acting for the benefit of all, and therefore acquiesced in by all.

But the case does not rest upon this sole ground, either of fact or presumption. The very permits and receipts afford satisfactory evidence, that the defendant, Whiting, did not act solely for himself; but that he acted for the other proprietors. It is true, that in one case only does he give a receipt in terms for the proprietors of the undivided lands for stumpage. But in all the other cases, and they are numerous, his receipts always purport to be "for the undivided lands," and never, in any instance, purport to be on his own individual account. This is very strong evidence to establish the real nature of the transactions. If he was acting for himself alone, his silence on this point is wholly unaccountable. If he was acting for himself and other proprietors, then the language is clear and intelligible; and has its appropriate effect. In this way too the acquiescence of his co-tenants would be easily explained. In any other view it would be utterly unaccountable. I have, therefore, no doubt whatever on this point, that the defendant, Whiting, was agent for Jacob Tidd during his life (and he died in March, 1821), and afterwards for his heirs (some of whom were, as it is said, at that time infants), as well as for Stimpson and other proprietors. If so, the purchase by him, at the tax sale, became immediately by operation of the principles of a court of equity a trust for the benefit of the principals.

Then, it is said, that the plaintiffs are barred from any right in equity by the mere lapse of time. It does not appear what were the respective ages of the heirs of Tidd at the time of the tax sale, nor what was the age of Stimpson; and all of them were at that time (as it should seem) citizens of another state, and of course came within the common exceptions of the statute of limitations. But, what is more particularly applicable to the present case, twenty years had not elapsed before the filing of the bill; and, I apprehend, that, in the case of a trust of lands, nothing short of the statute period, which would bar a legal estate or right of entry, would be permitted to operate in equity, as a bar of the equitable estate. This doctrine seems to be admitted by the authorities ever since the great case of Cholmondeley v. Clinton, 2 Jac. & W. 1, and it has been repeatedly acted upon in the supreme court of the United States.[1] Indeed, in the case of Prevost v. Gratz, 6 Wheat. [19 U. S.] 481, it was broadly laid down, that, in equity, length of time is no bar to a trust clearly established, and that, in cases where fraud is imputed and proved, length of time ought not, upon principles of eternal justice, to be admitted to repel relief. This doctrine is regularly true, when it is received with the proper accompanying limitations; that no circumstances exist to raise a presumption from lapse of time of an extinguishment of the trust; and no open denial or repudiation of the trust is brought home to the knowledge of the parties in interest, which requires them to act, as upon an asserted adverse title.

Upon the whole, I am of opinion, that the purchase by the defendant must be deemed to be a trust for the benefit of the plaintiffs to the extent of their interest; that the defendant ought to be decreed to convey the legal title to them, after being satisfied of all just claims, which he has against the lands for taxes, for purchase-money paid at the tax sale, for his expenditures and improvements upon the land, and also for his reasonable services as agent in the premises, deducting all sums of money received by him in the premises for stumpage, or otherwise. And it ought to be referred to a master to take an account in the premises, and to make report thereof to the court, according to the principles of this decree.

As to the other defendants, Peavy, Morse, and Talbot, no case has been made out against them of any fraud or misconduct, calling for the interposition of the court. The bill will, therefore, be dismissed against them, with costs. But the plaintiffs are entitled to costs, upon the cross bill, against the parties thereto, namely, Whiting, Morse, and Talbot, and may set them off pro tanto against the costs of the original bill decreed to Morse and Talbot.

The district judge concurs in this opinion, and a decretal order will be drawn up accordingly.

BANKRUPTCY—PROOF OF CLAIMS.

[Although the bankruptcy proceedings have been stayed, having been superseded by arrangement under section 43 of the bankrupt act, the sole power to admit claims against the bankrupt's estate is not vested in the trustees under the arrangement, but they may and should be proved before the register.]

[Cited in Re Cooke, Case No. 3,169. Disapproved in Re Trowbridge, Id. 14,191.]

In bankruptcy. James T. Brady & Co. have offered to make proof before the register of a debt against the estate of said bankrupt, and upon notice being given to the trustees of said bankrupt, acting under the provisions of section 43 of the bankrupt act, [14 Stat. 538,] John M. Kennedy, Esq., their solicitor, appears, and pro forma resists the offer on the ground that the bankruptcy proceedings have been stayed, and that the trustees themselves have the sole power to admit claims against the bankrupt's estate, and that only in the case of contested claims can the powers of the court and register be invoked. This position of the trustees' solicitor is based upon the decision of Judge Treat, in the district court for the E. D. Missouri. In re Darby, [Case No. 3,570.]

In this matter the bankruptcy proceedings have been stayed—they having been superseded by arrangement under section 43. The provisions of that section are extremely vague, and it is difficult to determine what the trustees may or may not do. In this matter, however, we are not called upon to say what the powers of the trustees are, save in respect of the allowance of claims against the bankrupt's estate. The decisions upon the 43d section have been but few, and none of them bear upon this question but the case cited by the trustees' solicitor. In that case Judge Treat says: "Whenever the trustees and committee are satisfied that demands are correct, and need no testimony to be taken, they can allow the same. When they are not satisfied the demand should be proved before the register on notice to the trustees. All demands not allowed already should be presented to the trustees for allowance, in the first instance, and, if allowed by them, no further action need be had; but if the trustees demand proof, they can apply to the register or judge for an order to have testimony taken with respect thereto before the register, or otherwise, and for the claims to be passed upon by the register."

From this opinion I am compelled to dissent. I cannot find anything in the statute to justify it, but everything to deny its correctness. The first clause of section 27 [14 Stat. 529] provides "that all creditors whose debts are duly proved and allowed shall be entitled to share in the bankrupt's property and estate pro rata," etc. Of course none others shall be entitled to share in the assets. Due proof of a debt can only be made by compliance with the 22d section of the act, [14 Stat. 527.] The second clause of that section provides: "To entitle a claimant against the estate of a bankrupt to have his demand allowed, it must be verified by a deposition in writing, on oath or solemn affirmation before the proper register or commissioner, setting forth the demand," etc. From these two clauses it is clear that to entitle a claimant to have his demand, and to share in the estate, he must prove his debt in the manner provided by section 22. The trustees cannot make distribution of the estate to and among any other persons than those mentioned in section 27, as entitled to share therein, that is to say, "creditors whose debts are duly proved and allowed."

But there is more in the act than this. Section 43 preserves the bankrupt's right to apply for and obtain his discharge, as though the ordinary proceedings under the act had continued. Section 29 provides, that when the bankrupt files his petition for discharge, notice is to be sent by mail to all creditors who have proved their debts. If, then, the trustees have power to allow claims not duly proved, such creditors would not be entitled to notice of the application, and the discharge might be granted without their knowledge. Such a result was never intended. If the bankrupt's estate is not equal to fifty per centum of his liabilities (as principal debtor) duly proved, he must, in order to obtain a discharge, file the assent in writing of a majority in number and in value of his creditors who have proved their claims, to whom he is liable as principal debtor. If the rule in Re Darby, [supra,] be correct, the creditors whose claims were allowed by the trustees, without being duly proved, would be excluded from the operation of this section, because the trustees had not disputed their claims and compelled them to make due proof. The bankruptcy proceedings may be resumed by order of the court, on sufficient cause being shown therefor, as the bankruptcy proceedings are only stayed until the further order of the court. No cause for resuming such proceedings can come to the knowledge of the court unless some party in interest makes complaint. Such complaint coming from a creditor should be from one who has proved his debts, one whose name is upon the records of the court.

It may be said, that under arrangement the trustees and committee of creditors may devise a system of their own for ascertaining the legal claims upon the estate. Such a suggestion involves the idea of judicial powers which the trustees and committee do not possess. There are numerous intricate questions as to what are provable and what are not provable debts, arising in bankruptcy proceedings, which trustees and committees would never discern, resulting oftentimes in the recognition and allowance of non-provable debts, to the injury of the general body of creditors. To say that trustees have power to allow debts without the form of regular proof, is certainly to say that they have the power to reject. Both powers certainly reside in them, or neither. If, then, the trustees have power to allow claims, it must follow that they must have judicial powers, and that in the exercise of such powers they determine the claims allowed by them as provable debts, when in fact they may not be provable. Having then allowed non-provable debts, they have gone one step towards determining a rule of their own for distributing the assets of the bankrupt, and their right to so determine may as well be recognized fully. But such a thing will not be contended for. No one will pretend that distribution can be made by the trustees to and among any but those whom the bankrupt act specifies.

There are still other considerations which enter into this question, but it is unnecessary to refer to them. Enough has been said to show that the provisions of the bankrupt act relating to the proof of debts, are as much in effect under arrangement as under the regular bankruptcy proceedings. Hence it follows, that James T. Brady & Co. have the same right, and are as much bound to make due proof of their debt before the register, as though the proceedings in bankruptcy had not been superseded by arrangement.

Samuel Harper, Register.

M'CANDLESS, District Judge. After a careful consideration of the opinion in Re Darby, [supra,] I am constrained to differ with my Brother TREAT, of the eastern district of Missouri.

To properly construe the 43d section, we must take the whole act together, and in doing so I can arrive at no other conclusion than that presented in the decision of Mr. Register Harper, which is hereby affirmed.

Case No. 789.

Ex parte BALCH.

[2 Lowell, 440;[1] 13 N. B. R. 160.]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct., 1875.

NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS—PAYMENT—EXTENSION OF TIME—ESTOPPEL—DISCHARGE OF INDORSER.

1. Company A. was promisor, and Company B. was indorser, of certain promissory notes. Both companies became embarrassed, and Company A. agreed to sell all its property to C., who had been the treasurer of both companies, at any time within one year, when he should have paid all the debts of the company. Friends of C. subscribed money, and put it into the hands of D., as trustee, to enable him to buy up the notes of Company A. indorsed by Company B. Held, that the purchase of these notes by the trustee with the funds of the subscribers was not a payment of the notes.

2. A representation by the holder of a note to the indorser that the note has been paid, does not discharge the indorser, who has been duly notified, unless he has suffered some loss or injury by reason of the representation.

3. A contract by the holder of a note to give time to the maker must be a valid and enforceable contract, as against the holder, or it will not operate to discharge the indorser.

In bankruptcy. F. V. Balch, trustee, offered proof against the assets of the Eliot Felting Mills, a bankrupt corporation, for the amount of three promissory notes of $5,000 each, signed by the City Mills and indorsed by the bankrupt corporation. It was admitted that the City Mills were primarily liable, and that one of the notes had not been duly protested, and the proof upon that note was abandoned.

The questions upon the other two notes arose upon the following state of facts: S. M. Weld had been treasurer of both corporations, and both stopped payment, and Weld and the Eliot Mills went into bankruptcy. Afterwards the City Mills voted to sell all their property for the purpose of paying their debts, which were equal to about the supposed value of the property. Still later, viz., March 17, 1875, a vote of the stockholders was passed, recalling the order for sale, and resolving to execute proper conveyances of all the property, which should be placed in the hands of Mr. Balch, as an escrow, to be delivered to Mr. Weld on his receiving his discharge in bankruptcy within one year from that date, provided he should elect, within one week after such discharge, to take the property, and should cause to be paid, or give a satisfactory guarantee against all the debts of the corporation, excepting one that was secured by mortgage. Weld was to run the mill in the mean time for cash, without subjecting the corporation to any liability, and, if he ultimately bought the property, was to have any profits earned in the interim. About ten days after this vote was passed a paper was drawn up, reciting that certain friends of Mr. Weld had raised $25,000, to be lent him on his obtaining his discharge, and that it was desirable that the money should be applied at once to purchasing the debts of the City Mills, and agreeing that the money should be placed in the hands of Mr. Balch, to be applied to that purpose in such sums and at such times as Mr. Weld should direct, and that Weld should give his notes in exchange for the debts so purchased, and that Balch should hold the debts so purchased until Weld should obtain his discharge and give his notes for the several amounts. This agreement was signed by the several subscribers to the loan, including most of the stockholders and directors of the City Mills, with some others. Weld further agreed by the same paper to devote his time to the superintendence of the business of the City Mills, with a view to purchasing the same under the vote above mentioned. Mr. Balch immediately bought these two notes, one of which was overdue and had been duly protested, and the other, coming due on the day of his purchase, he caused to be protested. On or about the 16th of April, 1875, the property of the City Mills was seriously damaged by a flood, and the project for a purchase by Mr. Weld was abandoned, and this corporation went into bankruptcy at or near the time the notes were bought by Mr. Balch. Mr. Weld informed one of the assignees of the Felting Company that they had been paid.

E. Merwin & W. P. Walley, for the assignees of the Eliot Felting Mills, contended:

1. That as against the indorsers this debt was paid by its purchase.

2. The holder is estopped by the representation made by Mr. Weld, the real party interested, that the notes had been paid.

3. Time was given to the City Mills, who were the principal debtors, and thereby the indorsers were discharged.

R. M. Morse, Jr., for the creditor.

LOWELL, District Judge. Two of the three points are clearly against the objectors.

1. These notes have not been paid. The evidence clearly shows that they were bought and were to be held good, at least against the City Mills. Now, I admit that if a surety pays a note, it may often be a payment in his favor, and yet no payment as against him. In other words, the holder may still sue the maker upon the note, as trustee for the surety; or the surety may often sue the maker himself. But if the note has been paid by the principal it is gone. In this case there has been no payment by either principal or surety. The money did not come from either, and the purchase did not affect the surety in any way unless his situation was afterwards changed by the act of the purchaser; that is to say, unless the second or third point is good.

2. There is no estoppel, because that depends on an actual loss of something in the particular case; and there is no evidence of such loss.

3. The third point does not depend upon damage in the individual case. If time has been given to the principal the surety is discharged, whether there has been damage or not.

To constitute the giving of time there must be a valid contract which a court would enforce in favor of the principal against the creditor. I think there is no such agreement in this case. By the vote, the City Mills agreed to wait for one week after Mr. Weld should obtain his discharge, or for one year, whichever event should first come about, before disposing of their property excepting to him. He undertook nothing.

To the agreement between Mr. Weld and the subscribers to the loan the City Mills were not a party, and there was no occasion for their becoming a party to it, for it does not bind the parties to it to do or forbear any thing in respect to the City Mills. It is res inter alios. The clause on which the assignees more particularly rely is that which says that the debts of the City Mills shall be held by Mr. Balch, for the benefit of the subscribers, until Mr. Weld obtains his discharge and gives his notes. This has nothing to do with suing or not suing the City Mills. It means that Balch is to hold for the subscribers until he holds for Weld, and is intended merely for the security of the former. But granting that it intends that Balch should hold the very notes that he receives, still, if he should sue them, the City Mills would have no equity to prevent him. A breach of his trust, in this respect, would be nothing to them.

Besides, I have no doubt that the true construction of the vote of March 17 is that Weld might at any moment after the vote was passed, whether before or after he obtained his discharge in bankruptcy, make up his mind and notify the corporation that he should not, under any circumstances, take the property. If this be so, there is nothing in the second paper to vary it. So that even if we grant that there was an implied agreement that Weld, buying the debts, should not sue them until he had determined not to buy the property, that merely amounts to an undertaking that he would not sue until he chose to sue, which, I apprehend, would be no answer or ground of action against him, because the very fact of his suing would conclusively prove and determine his election. Debt admitted to proof.

ABATEMENT—PENDENCY OF ANOTHER ACTION—BANKRUPTCY—JURISDICTION.

1. The pendency of a suit between the same parties, and respecting the same subject matter, in another state, may be pleaded in abatement in the courts of the United States.

[Disapproved in Lyman v. Brown, Case No. 8,627.]

[See note at end of case.]

2. But to make such plea effectual, it must show that the court where the suit is pending has jurisdiction.

[See note at end of case.]

3. Certain things are required to give jurisdiction to a proceeding in bankruptcy, and all these must appear in the plea.

In bankruptcy.

Mr. Wright, for plaintiff.

Mr. Fox, for defendant.

OPINION OF THE COURT. The following point has been certified by the district court, sitting in bankruptcy, to this court, viz: "Whether the facts set forth in the plea of the said John T. Balch, if true, constitute a bar to the proceedings in this cause."

Benjamin A. Munford v. John T. Balch. The plea states, that heretofore, and before the said petitioner exhibited his petition, in this honorable court, to wit, on the 31st day of October, 1842, the said petitioner, one of the late firm of Churchill & Co., in behalf of himself and late partner, William Churchill, and one John W. Harris, filed their petition in the district court of the United States for the district of New York, against the defendant, setting forth, among other things, that this defendant owed to them a sum greater than five hundred dollars, the consideration being for merchandise bought; and which this defendant avers is the same note as set forth in the present petition of the said Munford; and setting forth also that this defendant, on or about the 29th of January last preceding the filing of the petition, then being a merchant in the city of New York, made and executed an assignment and conveyance in contemplation of bankruptcy, secured and preferred certain creditors of this defendant, a preference over the general creditors of this defendant, and that said assignment was made to John E. Mitchell and John Hudson, of the city of New York; and that this defendant, in the spring of 1842, departed from the state of New York with intent to defraud his creditors, and to avoid being arrested; and they prayed that he might be declared a bankrupt, pursuant to the act of congress, which petition was for the like matter, relief, and purpose, as the present petition. The assignees filed their exceptions, and upon argument the cause was referred to a commissioner of bankruptcy, on the 13th of December, 1842; that the petition was depending the 11th of January, 1843; that it was discontinued the 28th of April, 1843; and this is pleaded in abatement to the present petition.

The pendency of another suit between the same parties, and involving the same matters, may be pleaded in abatement to a new suit. But, to make such plea effectual, it must be shown that the court had jurisdiction of the case. The proceeding in New York by the creditors of the said Balch, was, to subject him to involuntary bankruptcy, under the first section of the bankrupt act, [5 Stat. 440, c. 9.] The act declares, "that all persons, being merchants, or using the trade of merchandise, all retailers of merchandise, &c. owing debts to the amount of not less than two thousand dollars, shall be liable to become bankrupts, within the true intent and meaning of the act, and may, upon the petition of one or more of their creditors, to whom they owe debts amounting in the whole to not less than five hundred dollars, to the appropriate court, be so declared accordingly, in the following cases, to wit: whenever such person, being a merchant, or using the trade of merchandise, or being a retailer of merchandise, &c. shall depart from the state of which he is an inhabitant, with intent to defraud his creditors, &c.

Several things are necessary to subject a man to this proceeding. 1. He must be a merchant. 2. He must have left the state with a view to defraud his creditors, or done some other act named in the statute. 3. The petitioners against him must have a claim on him of a sum amounting to five hundred dollars. 4. He must owe debts to the amount of not less than two thousand dollars. These four things must be shown in the petition, to give the court jurisdiction.

From the plea, it appears that the said Balch was a merchant; that he committed an act of bankruptcy by leaving the state to defraud his creditors; and that the petitioners against him had a demand on him exceeding five hundred dollars; but, it does not appear that he owed an amount of not less than two thousand dollars. This is essential to the jurisdiction of the court, and without it the proceedings in New York were of no validity. The plea is taken as true, and it must show jurisdiction in the court, whose proceedings are set up in abatement; and having failed to do this, the demurrer to the plea should have been sustained. This may be certified to the district court.

[NOTE. At law, the pendency of a former action between the same parties for the same cause is pleadable in abatement to a second action, because the latter is regarded as vexatious. But the former action must be in a domestic court; that is, in a court of the state in which the second action has been brought. The rule in equity is analogous to the rule at law. Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Harris, 96 U. S. 588; Lyman v. Brown, Case No. 8,627. Pendency of an action in a state court is no ground for a plea in abatement to a suit upon the same matter in a federal court for the same state. Gordon v. Gilfoil, 99 U. S. 168. To the same effect, see Stanton v. Embrey, 93 U. S. 548; Loring v. Marsh, Case No. 8,514; Parsons v. Greenville, Id. 10,776; White v. Whitman, Id. 17,561; Hughes v. Elsher, 5 Fed. 263. Contra, Earl v. Raymond, Case No. 4,243. See note to Brooks v. Mills Co., Id. 1,955, for discussion (1876) of the principle afterwards decided by Gordon v. Gilfoil, (1878,) supra. A plea of lis alibi pendens is not good when the litigation is in a court of foreign jurisdiction. Lynch v. Hartford Fire Ins. Co., 17 Fed. 627. See, also, Pierce v. Feagans, 39 Fed. 587.]

BALCH v. COLMAN et al.

[2 McLean, 85.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Indiana. May Term, 1840.

NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS—RATE OF EXCHANGE—MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

1. The rate of exchange between two places is not exclusively regulated by the expense of transporting specie from one place to the other.

2. The true rule is the current rate at which drafts on New York sell in specie, or its equivalent, at Lafayette, the two points named in the contract.

[At law. Action on a promissory note by John T. Balch against Isaac and Samuel Colman and others.]

Messrs. Ingram and Baird, for plaintiff.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This action was brought on a promissory note for $536, payable at the Lafayette Bank, with the rate of exchange between the place of payment and the city of New York. At the time the note was given the Lafayette Bank, and the other banks of Indiana, redeemed their notes with specie; but having suspended specie payments for some months past, a question was raised, what shall be the rate of exchange which the plaintiff has a right to demand? Shall it be the present rate of difference between the depreciated currency of the state and funds in New York; or, shall it be the ordinary rate of exchange between specie, or its equivalent, at Lafayette, and funds in the city of New York? The judgment of this court is not given to be discharged in depreciated currency. The plaintiff has a right to demand specie, or its equivalent; and we can not regard the amount, which he has a right to recover by way of exchange, as of less value than specie. When the contract to pay the exchange was made, both parties, no doubt, looked to a sound circulating medium, convertible into specie, and, of course, of value equal to specie. And, in such a state, how is the rate of exchange to be ascertained? It is clearly not by ascertaining what would be the expense of transporting specie from the place of payment to the city of New York. This, undoubtedly, enters into the general calculation on the subject, and has great influence in fixing the rate, but there are other ingredients which must be looked to in making an estimate. Specie is not transported at the same rate as other merchantable commodities. There is the risk, the insurance, the delays, and other contingencies, which are taken into the account; and, not unfrequently, the scarcity or abundance of specie at the place of remittance, has an important effect on the price of exchange. The only correct rule, therefore, is to ascertain the ordinary rate of exchange between the two places; to be established by evidence, the same as the value of any other thing. The inquiry of the jury should be, what was the current price of drafts, in specie, or its equivalent, on New York, at Lafayette, at the time this note became payable. This must give the rate of damages which the plaintiff claims, for the difference of exchange between the two places.

BALCHELLER v. MASCOUTAH.

[7 Chi. Leg. News, 230.]

Circuit Court, S. D. Illinois. March 2, 1875.

AUTHORITY OF TOWN TO ISSUE BONDS IN AID OF RAILROADS—VOTE PREVIOUSLY GIVEN—ACT REPEALED.

1. That under the evidence the town authorities had the right to issue the bonds.

2. That when there had been a vote given under the constitution of 1848, by any town which was then authorized to issue bonds, the fact that the bonds were issued after the adoption of the constitution of 1870, cannot change it; that the constitution did not take effect on such a case at all.

3. That the legal effect of the language when it declared that no subscription should be made by any county court, or by the legal authorities of any incorporated city or town,—is when they were authorized to subscribe by the provisions of the act of 1869, and that it did not intend to repeal any specific authority given by a previous act of the legislature to a town named therein to make subscriptions of stock, or to issue bonds for the same purpose; that the act of 1869, did not repeal the act of 1867.

[At law. Action by William H. Balcheller against the town of Mascoutah on railroad aid bonds. Plaintiff demurs to rejoinders. Demurrer sustained.]

DRUMMOND, Circuit Judge. The decision in this case depends upon the construction to be given to the act of March 5th, 1867, authorizing the town of Mascoutah to issue bonds to such amount as the authorities by ordinance might determine, payable in not less than ten nor more than twenty years, and bearing 10 per cent. interest per annum, provided that no such bonds should be issued unless a majority of the taxpayers, to whom the question was to be submitted, decided in favor thereof. The replication to which rejoinders have been put in, which have been demurred to, avers that there was a decision made by the taxpayers of the town of Mascoutah; that there was a regular vote upon the question on two different occasions, and that by a majority of the taxpayers the town authorities were authorized to issue bonds.

Now there are two points made. One is that the town authorities had no right to issue the bonds, and that they were issued since the adoption of the constitution. It is, after all, at most pleading in a circle and could not be considered as anything more than an irregular traverse of the replication. As to the question under the constitution we have already substantially decided that point, and it is very clear that where there had been a vote previously given by any town which was then authorized to issue bonds, the fact that the bonds were issued after adoption of the constitution can not change it. In truth the constitution expressly excepted the issue of all bonds where it has been authorized by an existing law by a vote of the people prior to its adoption. In other words, the constitution did not take effect upon such a case at all.

Then the other point is, that by the act of the 10th of March, 1869, the act of 1867 was repealed. This act was an act incorporating the St. Louis & Great Eastern Railway Company. We have not seen the act, but we suppose it is correctly cited in the brief of the counsel for the defense. That act declared —the 15th section—that no subscription should be made by any county, or by the legal authorities of any incorporated city or town, until after the question of such subscription was submitted "by order of the legal authorities to the legal voters thereof." Now there is some conflict between this act of 1869 and the act of 1867, but it is more apparent than real; for instance, the manner in which a subscription should be made, and the persons who were to authorize the subscription are different; in the act of 1867 the city authorities were to issue the bonds in such amounts as they might determine, payable in not less than ten or more than twenty years bearing 10 per cent. interest per annum. There was to be a subscription by the act of 1869. The legal voters were to authorize it; in the act of 1867, the taxpayers were to authorize it. Voters and taxpayers are not identical under our law. Ten per cent. was authorized by the act of 1867, 8 per cent. only was authorized by the act of 1869. Now the question is whether this act intended to repeal the act of 1867. Was it in the mind of the legislature to repeal the former act by the latter? We think that the weight of the argument is that it did not intend to repeal it; that the legal effect of this language, when it declared that no subscription should be made by any county court, or by the legal authority of any incorporated city or town, is when they were authorized to subscribe by the provisions of the act of 1869, and that it did not intend to repeal any specific authority given by a previous act of the legislature to a town named therein to make subscriptions of stock, or to issue bonds for the same purpose. But if this were doubtful, we think the doubt must be solved in favor of the position, that the act of 1869 did not repeal the act of 1867, because the supreme court of this state must have passed upon that question.

It is strenuously contended on the part of the defense that it did not. But what are the facts? The bonds were issued under the act of 1867, by the town of Mascoutah, on the hypothesis that an authority existed for that purpose, and a tax was sought to be imposed to pay the interest upon these bonds and a bill was filed to restrain the town authorities from levying the tax. It is said and we do not doubt truly, that no question was made in the circuit court as to the effect of the act of 1869 upon the act of 1867, but in the argument before the supreme court when it finally came before the court on a writ of error, that point was made by counsel; in other words the attention of the court was distinctly called to the position taken by counsel, that the act of 1869 did repeal the act of 1867. The attention of the court was again called to it in the application for a rehearing; the court had decided in effect that there was nothing in point of law to prevent the town authority from levying a tax, thereby holding that it was a legal tax authorized by law. Now to say that under such circumstances, the court could disregard the act of 1869, if it did in its opinion repeal the act of 1867, is really asking more than we can believe, unless the court was entirely derelict in its duty. Because it was not material whether the act of 1869 was named in the pleadings or not, nor whether it might be a law having more or less of a public character or not. If it operated in point of law as a repeal, it was the duty of the court so to declare and hold that there was no authority to issue the bonds, and therefore no authority to impose the taxes. And although they say nothing upon this point in their opinion, it must have been because they considered it was unnecessary and not because they thought they were not bound to take notice of the law. If they thought that the one law repealed the other, they certainly should so have said. Again, this act of 1869, is a law for the construction of the St. Louis & Southeastern Railway Company, a railroad that goes through some counties of the state; it authorizes the taking of private property for the road on the ground that it is for the public use; and it was the duty of the court to take notice of this law when its attention was called to it. And it was named as a law which by possibility might repeal the law of 1867.

So on both grounds we hold that these rejoinders are not good, and that the demurrer must be sustained.

ADMIRALTY—LIBEL IN REM.

[A libel in rem cannot be maintained by the charterers of a vessel against the vessel for a cause of action founded upon a stipulation or condition of the hiring not embraced in the charter party, or for misrepresentations or concealment of facts in respect to the tonnage or capacity of the vessel by the master or owners, leading to the charter party.]

[In admiralty. Libel in rem by George Balchen and William F. Schmidt against the ship Eli Whitney. Libel dismissed. Affirmed on appeal by the circuit court in The Eli Whitney, Case No. 4,345.]

BETTS, District Judge. The bill in this cause, demanding damages because of misrepresentation on the part of the master of said ship inducing the libellants to take the charter party in the pleading mentioned and the injuries sustained by them thereby: and also because of the non-performance of an agreement made by the master with the libellants previous to the execution of the charter party: and the voyage therein stipulated having being fully performed by the ship: and the claim and answer interposed in the cause reserving to the benefit of the owners all exception to the jurisdiction of the court over the subject matter of the suit: and on the hearing in court, the claimants having objected that the matters alleged in the libel are not of admiralty or maritime jurisdiction: and it not being made to appear to the court on the part of the libellants that any commissions were earned by them on the return voyage of the ship: if they are entitled thereto under this contract:

It is considered by the court that an action in rem cannot be maintained because of a misrepresentation or concealment of facts, by the owner or master of a ship, leading to a charter party upon her for a voyage: and it is further considered by the court that engagements entered into by an owner or master in relation to the charter of a vessel, antecedent to the execution of the charter party, and not made part thereof, cannot be enforced in rem against the ship.

Wherefore it is considered and decided by this court that the action cannot be sustained by the libellants against the ship, because of her being hired or being let to them upon any stipulation or condition not embraced in the charter party, mentioned in the pleading. It is further ordered and decided by the court that the said ship be discharged from arrest in this case, and that the libel be dismissed with costs to be taxed.

BALDERSTON v. MANRO et al.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 623.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov. Term, 1825.

BILL OF LADING—ASSIGNMENT—TITLE TO CARGO.

The assignment and delivery of a bill of lading and invoice of goods in transitu, for a valuable consideration, conveys the legal title; and the goods cannot be attached as the property of the assignor.

[See The Mary Ann Guest, Case No. 9,197.]

This was a chancery attachment of the effects of Jonathan Manro, of Baltimore, in the hands of George F. Warfield and Fielder Luckett, by Ely Balderston, a creditor of Manro. It appeared that Manro, residing in Baltimore, and being largely indebted to sundry persons, on the 1st of March, 1823, made a deed of assignment of his property to the defendant, George F. Warfield, also of Baltimore, in trust for the payment of the creditors named in the deed, of whom the plaintiff was not one. This deed was duly acknowledged and recorded according to the laws of Maryland, and among other things assigned and transferred to the said trustee all the right of the said Manro to the returns, net proceeds, profits, and property in and to thirty-two bags of cocoa on board the brig Resolution; and for the better transferring the same to the said trustee, indorsed and assigned to him on the same 1st of March, 1823, the bill of lading and invoice thereof. It appeared also by the defendant's answer, that the trustee had lent his notes to Manro to the amount of $4,000 or $5,000 for which the trustee was liable, and he claimed a right to retain any surplus which might remain in his hands after paying the creditors named in the deed, to indemnify himself against that liability. The attachment was not issued until the 11th of March, 1823, ten days after the assignment and indorsement of the bill of lading to the defendant.

C. C. Lee, for plaintiff.

Mr. Taylor, for defendant.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent) was of opinion, that the assignment and indorsement of the bill of lading of the thirty-two bags of cocoa, transferred the legal title to Warfield, and that the court could not deprive him of that legal title, if his equity was equal to that of the plaintiff. Warfield is responsible for Manro to the amount of $4,000 or $5,000 and he is doubtful whether his other security is sufficient to indemnify him. If there should be a surplus of the trust-funds in his hands, after paying the trust-debts, he will have a right in equity to retain enough to secure an indemnification. It does not yet appear what that surplus, if any, will be; nor whether the other security, which he holds, is sufficient. Under such circumstances, a court of equity will not oblige him to relinquish that surplus, unless the plaintiff will indemnify him. We think that Mr. Warfield ought to take measures to obtain payment of the notes (for which he is responsible,) out of the funds pledged to the bank; and to settle the trust-debts, so as to ascertain what he will have to pay to the bank upon his indorsements, and what surplus there may be of the trust-fund; and that the cause should stand continued until he shall state such an account; and that the marshal pay into court the net proceeds of the sales of the cocoa, and that they be invested in some productive fund, until the court can make a final decree in the cause.

NOTE, [from original report.] At April term, 1826, the court ordered the bill to be dismissed with costs; and ordered the marshal to pay to Warfield the net proceeds of the sales of the cocoa.

[At law. Action by Baldraff against the Camden & Amboy Railroad Company for loss of trunk and contents. Verdict and judgment for plaintiff.]

This was an action against the company, as carriers of passengers and their baggage, from New York to Philadelphia. The jury in the court below found a special verdict, as follows:—

That the defendants are carriers of passengers and their baggage, and not carriers of merchandise from New York to Philadelphia —that the defendants had published in the public daily newspapers of New York and Philadelphia, from May to September, 1846, an advertisement, and delivered to the plaintiff, (now defendant,) who is a German, and did not understand the English language as well as the other passengers, on the 22d of August, 1846, a card or ticket. The plaintiff took the defendants' line, upon the said 22d of August, 1846, and put on board the steamboat Independence, belonging to defendants, and forming part of defendants' means of conveyance, among other baggage, a trunk containing 2,101 silver coins, commonly called French five franc pieces, and also certain articles of wearing apparel. The said trunk was directed to the conductor, or other agent of defendants, on board of said boat. The extra weight of plaintiff's baggage, including the said trunk, was paid for, and the said agent did take charge thereof. The plaintiff did not notify the defendants, or their agent, that the trunk contained coins or money, and no special agreement was made by them to accept or carry the same. The said trunk was lost, and not delivered to the plaintiff upon the arrival at Philadelphia, or at any time thereafter.

If the court shall be of opinion that the defendants are responsible for the injury arising from the loss of the money or silver coins aforesaid, then the jury find for the plaintiff, and assess the damages at twenty-two hundred and forty-five dollars and ninety-five cents, ($2,245.95). If the court shall be of opinion that the defendants are not liable for the injury arising from the loss of the money or silver coins aforesaid, then the jury find for the plaintiffs, and assess the damages at $10.

The district court gave judgment that the plaintiff recover the larger amount.

CONTRACTING—PROOF OF DEBT.

On the petition of a creditor, showing that he and the assignee objected to the claim of B., another creditor, an order was made referring it to a referee to examine into the facts. Before any evidence was taken before the referee, the assignee appeared before the referee and objected to the proceedings, on the ground that, since the assignee was elected, B. had made proof of his claim in form satisfactory to the register, and that the proof had been delivered to the assignee, and registered by him, and that, since the election of the assignee, the petitioning creditor had not renewed his objection, and the assignee had never objected to the claim. B., however, insisted upon proceeding with the reference: Held, that the reference should not have been proceeded with, and that the order of reference should be vacated, leaving the parties to pay their own costs and expenses.

February, 1872, may have been, on the assumption, that, prima facie, from the facts set forth in the petition on which it was made, the petitioning creditor and the assignee objected to the claim of Brewster, yet, when, before any testimony had been taken under the order of reference, the assignee appeared before the referee and objected to all proceedings under the order, on the ground that, since the assignee was elected, Brewster had made proof of his claim in form satisfactory to the register, who had received the same, and that the proof had been delivered to the assignee, and duly registered by him, and that, since the assignee was elected, the petitioning creditor had not renewed his objection to the proof of such claim, and no other creditor had made any objection to it, and that the assignee had never made any objection thereto, the reference should not have been proceeded with on the part of Brewster. There was no occasion for proceeding with it. The expense of proceeding with it was needlessly incurred. Nothing done in the course of it, after that, could bind the assignee. He did not afterwards appear on the reference, or produce any witnesses, or cross-examine any of the witnesses produced by Brewster. The original order of reference was granted ex parte, without due notice to the assignee, and only authorized the referee to take, on due notice to the proper parties, proof of the claim of Brewster, and such proof as might be offered in opposition thereto. When, in response to a notice, the assignee then appeared, and made the objection he did, in the terms above stated, the reference ceased to be one to which the assignee and the creditors generally of the estate, represented by him, could be considered as parties, so as to bind him and them as parties, or make him or them responsible for any expenses of the reference, if the assignee thereafter took no part in the proceedings. On such objection being made by the assignee, Brewster ought to have brought the matter before the court for instructions. Not having done so, he took the risk of going on. The entire aspect of the case, as it stood when the order of reference was made, on the facts set forth in the petition of Brewster, was changed, by the statement of the assignee that he had never objected to the proof of debt of Brewster, and had registered it as duly proved, and that no objection had, since the election of the assignee, been made to the proof of the claim, by any creditor. It was not the duty of the assignee to bring the matter before the court. He was not a party to the order of reference, and he discharged his entire duty by making the objection he did. The court must now do what it would have done, if, on the making of such objection by the assignee, the matter had been brought to its attention. It would have vacated the order of reference. There would have been no propriety in permitting the reference to proceed as between Brewster and the petitioning creditor, when it could not proceed as between Brewster and the body of creditors represented by the assignee. Although, where one creditor applies for an investigation, under section 22, [Act March 2, 1867; 14 Stat. 527,] of the claim of another creditor, it may be proper to hold the latter bound, as respects all the creditors, by the result of the investigation, yet, where, as in this case, a creditor applies for the investigation of his own claim, and the assignee, in response, says he has received proof of the claim, and registered it, and has never objected to it, it is not proper to permit an investigation of it to be had, as between such creditor and another creditor, against the objection of the assignee, when the estate cannot be bound by the result.

The order of reference is vacated, leaving the parties respectively to pay their own costs and expenses.

BANKRUPTCY—PROOF OF DEBT BY SECURED SURETY—SUBROGATION.

[1. In America, when the principal is insolvent, a solvent surety, who holds collateral security for his indemnity, is a trustee of the security for the creditor.]

[2. A bank held a note of a bankrupt for $3,000, and made proof in full against the bankrupt estate. An indorser of the note, who held, as collateral security, stocks pledged to him by the bankrupt, afterwards paid the debt to the bank, and sold the stocks for $1,045. Held, that the surety should give credit for the amount realized from his security, and should take a dividend only upon the excess of the original debt as proved.]

In bankruptcy. The bank held a note for three thousand dollars, signed by bankrupt and made proof in full against his estate. An indorser of the note, who held, as collateral security, stocks pledged to him by the bankrupt, afterwards paid the debt at the bank, and sold the stock for one thousand and forty-five dollars. The register certified the question to the court, and no one appeared to argue it.

LOWELL, District Judge. The equity announced in Maure v. Harrison, 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. 93, that a creditor is to have the benefit of the securities given by the debtor to a surety, was assumed to be sound by Sir William Grant in Wright v. Morley, 11 Ves. 22, but was soon after overruled by Lord Eldon in Ex parte Waring, reported in three different books, (19 Ves. 345, 2 Rose, 182, 2 Glyn & J. 406.) Lord Eldon appears to have been afraid that the business of traders and bankers would be injuriously hampered if the relation of trustee and cestui que trust were established in such cases; so that, as he said, a banker could never deal with the securities, even with the consent of the pledgor, until he had consulted with all the holders of the notes or bills. He held, however, in that case, that where both principal and surety were bankrupt, the same equity could be worked out by a sort of accident, that is to say: the assignee of the surety would have no right to use the pledged property as his general assets, because they were his only for indemnity; and the assignee of the pledgor could not take them without furnishing indemnity, and, therefore, to prevent a dead-lock between the two, the property must be applied to relieve both estates by paying the bills or notes pro tanto; not, however, by virtue of any equity which the bill-holders had, but as the only means of settling the two estates. This is the explanation of that case given by another learned lord chancellor, and is undoubtedly the true one. City Bank v. Luckie, 5 Ch. App. 776. This doctrine has been somewhat grudgingly admitted by the courts in England, and has been strictly limited to cases in which both parties were technically bankrupt or insolvent; that is, where their estates were being settled by the courts or in some equivalent mode; though a careful examination of the cases will show that the merchants of England have been disposed to take a larger view, and to administer the equity whenever the principal debtor has become insolvent, which is the American rule. See Powles v. Hargreaves, 3 De Gex, M. & G. 430; Ex parte Carrick, 2 De Gex & J. 208; Trimingham v. Maud, L. R. 7 Eq. 201; Ex parte Gomez, 10 Ch. App. 645; Ex parte Smart, 8 Ch. App. 220; Ex parte Prescott, 3 Deac. & C. 218; Ex parte Hobhouse, 2 Deac. 291; Inman v. Clare, Johns. Eng. Ch. 769; Vaughan v. Halliday, 9 Ch. App. 561. In this class of cases it has been uniformly held that when the creditors of this class had this incidental equity, or rather, when such an equity was cast upon them, they could prove against either estate only the balance remaining after the security was realized and distributed. Powles v. Hargreaves, 3 De Gex, M. & G, 436; Banner v. Johnston, L. R. 5 H. L. 157; Coupland's Claim, 5 Ch. App. 167; Leech's Claim, 6 Ch. App. 388; Ex parte Brett, Id. 838; Ex parte Joint Stock Discount Co., L. R. 19 Eq. 1, 10 Ch. App. 198.

This is an exception to the general rule that security need only be credited as against the estate which furnished it; but it appears to be sound. It would be inequitable to permit proof in full against the estate of the surety, when the very purpose of the pledge was to protect him to the extent of the value of the property. In this country the doctrine of Maure v. Harrison, 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. 93, has been adopted without the limitation annexed to it by Lord Eldon. It is held here that even a solvent surety is a trustee for the creditor when the principal is insolvent. Moses v. Murgatroyd, 1 Johns. Ch. 119; Russell v. Clark, 7 Cranch, [11 U. S.] 97, per Marshall, C. J.; Bank of Auburn v. Throop, 18 Johns. 505; Vail v. Foster, 4 Const. [4 N. Y.] 312; Pratt v. Adams, 7 Paige, 615; Toulmin v. Hamilton, 7 Ala. 362; Paris v. Hulett, 26 Vt. 308; Eastman v. Foster, 8 Metc. [Mass.] 19; Rice v. Dewey, 13 Gray, 47; In re Jaycox, [Case No. 7,242;] Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 368, 499; 4 Kent, Comm. 163; 1 Lead. Cas. Eq. (3d Amer. Ed.) 163. The difficulty anticipated in Ex parte Waring [supra] has not been found to occur. No doubt the surety and principal together can deal with the security as they please, so long as both are solvent, and the creditors have not interfered. But after the insolvency of either the principal or the surety, the law of this country undoubtedly is, that the property is to be applied to the debt upon which the surety is bound. It has even been held that he may apply it after his own liability has been barred by lapse of time, or in some other mode. See Phillips v. Thompson, 2 Johns. Ch. 418; Eastman v. Foster, 8 Metc. [Mass.] 19. And a bankrupt surety, being a trustee, may recover the property in his own name. Kip v. Bank of New York, 10 Johns. 63.

It would seem to follow, from the foregoing considerations, that a creditor, who has this clearly recognized equity, might be obliged, upon some proper terms as to the costs being paid by the assignees, to resort to the property to the extent of its value, before proving his debt against the estate of the principal debtor. So is the argument of the late Judge Hall, in his very able and elaborate opinion in Ex parte Jaycox, [Case No. 7,242.] The decision, however, did not touch this point. In that case Judge Comstock was an indorser upon the notes of the bankrupts for a large amount, and held a mortgage conditioned for the payment of the notes and for his indemnity. The holders of the notes proved in full, and refused to modify their proofs, but, on the contrary filed a stipulation that they made no claim to the security: "It being understood that this release and surrender are not in any manner to release or affect the right of the said George F. Comstock to enforce a certain mortgage, etc." Judge Hall held that the creditors had the right to prove in full, waiving their security. What the resulting equities would be, between the surety and them, or between the surety and the assignees, was not before him, but he intimated an opinion upon it. Afterwards, the indorser being sued at law, the court of appeals held that he had no defense arising from this state of things. They intimate that there was neither law nor equity to release him, in whole or in part; but that appears to be beyond the point in issue. Merchants' Nat. Bank v. Comstock, 55 N. Y. 24. That decision is sound, because the assignees of Jaycox and Green were not parties to the suit, and it did not appear that the indorser had been disturbed in his title to the security. If Judge Hall's opinion is right, the assignee might have filed his bill against the surety and the holders of the notes, to have it declared that they had waived their equitable right to security, and had thereby exonerated the surety pro tanto, and asking that the security might be given up and the holders be restrained from prosecuting the surety, excepting for the excess, if any, of their debt above the amount of the security. I have not seen the report of such a suit in that or any other case. If such a bill will not lie, the surety may indirectly have, as in that case he appears to have had, the benefit of the full proof, and of the security besides.

It has several times been held that the creditor may prove his debt in full, notwithstanding security held by a surety. Meed v. Nelson, 9 Gray, 55; Provident Inst. v. Stetson, 12 Gray, 27; Ex parte Braithwaite, 36 Law T. (N. S.) 520; same case on appeal, Ex parte Barnfather, Id. 841. It must be remembered, however, that the courts of bankruptcy had limited powers, and peculiar modes of proceeding. In a case somewhat similar in its principles to this, both the judges said that by admitting the debt to proof, they did not decide that the creditor could have a dividend on the whole amount. Ex parte Barham, 1 De Gex, M. & G. [1 Mont., D. & D.] 179. In another case they said, in both courts, that the right of the surety, if he should afterwards come in, was not, by any means, to be considered as decided by the admission of the full amount of the creditor's debt. Ex parte Braithwaite, 36 Law T. (N. S.) 520, 841. The cases most nearly resembling this, that I have found, are Ex parte Sherrington, 1 De Gex, M. & G. [1 Mont., D. & D.] 195, and Ex parte Mann, 5 Ch. Div. 367. In the former, the creditor had proved his debt in full, and the surety applied to sell his security, and the order was passed for a sale, and that the creditor might have the proceeds when he reduced his proof by an equivalent amount. In the latter, the surety's security was an assignment of certain debts due to the principal who afterward became bankrupt; by consent of the surety, the assignee collected these debts; and the register then ordered that he should apply the proceeds to pay the bills, although they had been proved in full by the holder. This order was affirmed on appeal. The holder not being before the court, they made no order for the reduction of his proof. The case seems to recognize an equity according to the American rule; that is, when only the principal was bankrupt. Ex parte Sherrington was not cited, and has never been overruled that I am aware of.

I think the law of England and of Massachusetts probably is, that when the court has jurisdiction of all the parties, so that complete justice can be done, the creditor must give credit for the security which the surety must apply towards his payment; but in the absence of the surety the creditor may, in the first instance, prove in full. The intent of the statute in permitting a surety who has paid the debt after the bankruptcy to prove it, is simply to put him on the footing of a creditor, which, by the old law, he could not be, unless he had paid before the bankruptcy. Now, if the surety had paid before the proceedings were begun, it is plain that he would be a secured creditor, and must give credit for the value of his security. Then, in subrogation to the creditor's proof, the surety should stand exactly as if he himself had proved. Whether we hold that the creditor has a distinct equity which chancery might require him to enforce; or that he may prove in full, leaving the assignee to establish and work out the resulting equities when the time comes for a dividend; or whether we simply say, the surety is now in court, and has the standing of a creditor who has been partly secured; the result is, that he should give credit for the amount realized from his security, and take a dividend upon the excess only of the original debt as proved, and it is so ordered.

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS—EQUITY PLEADING — ENTITLING AFFIDAVITS—BONNETS.

1. It is irregular, in a suit in equity, to swear a person to an affidavit entitled in the suit, before the bill has been filed.

The essence of the invention of Blake being, that the product of the action of the dies to which the thing is last subjected is the completed body of the bonnet, embossed in imitation of straw, and shaped and ready for practical use, as the body of a bonnet, without further covering or ornamentation, the patent is infringed if the last embossing die gives the ultimate shape to the bonnet, although such dies may be of the same shape as a die to whose shaping action the bonnet had been previously subjected.

Motion for provisional injunction. Granted.]

Suit brought upon letters patent for an "improvement in the manufacture of coverings for the head," granted to S. A. Blake, December 24, 1861, and more particularly referred to in the report of the case of Baldwin v. Schultz, [Case No. 804.] Before the motion was heard the defendants moved to dismiss the application, on the ground that the affidavit of one Eicke, relied on to prove a sale by the defendants of the hats alleged to infringe, was sworn to April 6, but the bill was not filed until April 8, and the subpoena was not issued until April 12.

S. F. Gordon and George Gifford, for complainants.

C. B. Stoughton and S. D. Law, for defendants.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. It is undoubtedly irregular to swear a person in a suit before the bill has been filed. The irregularity consists in having the affidavit sworn to under the title of a suit, in which no bill has been filed. If the title had been omitted, there would have been no irregularity. This is continually done in applications for habeas corpus and mandamus, and to swear falsely in such affidavits is indictable as perjury. The suit is commenced when the bill is filed. Eicke's affidavit ought not to have been entitled in the suit. On this ground the affidavit of Eicke should be excluded, but I will permit it to be resworn. The parties must be considered as having had reasonable notice of it. They have had a copy of it.

The affidavits were then read, and, after argument on both sides, the following opinion was orally pronounced:

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. If I have correctly understood the counsel for the defendants, I see nothing in this case to distinguish it from the one in which Schultz and Hecht were defendants. I have listened carefully to everything that has been urged, and it has made no impression different from that produced upon my mind in the other case. The counsel for the defendants has entirely misapprehended the scope and effect of the former decision as to the Blake patent. It is very true that Blake, in his patent, describes that particular sort of hat which required, in order to make it, that that there should be an opening cut in it. But that particular form of hat constituted no part of the invention of Blake. A hat may infringe the patent, and yet be seamless throughout. The essence of the invention, as it appears in the patent, is this: that the product of the action of the dies to which the thing is last subjected is the completed body of the bonnet, embossed in imitation of straw, and shaped and ready for practical use, as the body of a bonnet, without further covering or ornamentation. Now, this is true of the bonnet of the defendants. It is embossed fit for use, and shaped to the form in which the last dies used in its production leave it. It is of no consequence that other dies may have been used previously to shape it. It is no matter if it had been shaped by fifty dies previously. Bernard, in one of his affidavits, himself says that the last die used must be of the same shape as the previous one. This constitutes an infringement. This last die is the one that does the embossing. When the embossing is done by dies that have a shape, that shape is given by the embossing dies. Bernard, in his affidavit, says that it is absolutely indispensable that the embossing dies should have the same shape as the previous dies; and the embossing dies give the ultimate shape, because their shape is not altered. In my former decision I said: "It is claimed, on the part of the plaintiffs, that, according to the description in the specification of the Blake patent, the product of the action of the dies is the completed body of a bonnet, embossed in imitation of straw, and fit for use as the body of a bonnet, in the shape given to it by the dies, and without further ornamenting or covering its surface;" and I said I thought these views of Blake's invention were correct. The defendants do not afterward cover their hats, do not afterward ornament them, do not alter them in any manner. If the brim and top of the hat, as well as the body, are embossed by the dies, it is none the less an infringement. I also said, in that decision, that the proper construction of the claim of Blake's patent is, "that it claims a bonnet, the body of which is embossed, in imitation of straw or other braid, by dies, which, at the same time, give to it its ultimate shape." Its ultimate shape. It is no matter how many dies have previously given shape to it. It may have been one; it may have been twenty. It makes no difference what number. This last embossing die of the defendants is the one that gives the ultimate shape to the bonnet, because it is of the same shape as the previous die. The defendants say that there are two operations in the production of their bonnet. This is nothing but trying to evade the patent by splitting the thing into two—making two operations where only one was necessary. That will not do. A case very similar to this, in this particular, was lately tried in the district of Connecticut—Wallace v. Holmes, [Case No. 17,100]—in which the patent sued on was for a lamp-burner, to be used with a chimney, and so described in the patent. The defendants made and sold the burner; but, because they did not make or sell the chimney with it, they said they did not infringe. But it was held they did, as all the purchaser would have to do would be to buy a glass chimney next door and put it in. So, in this case, there was a purpose of infringing, I should say, in making two operations where only one is necessary. Courts always look with suspicion upon such a transaction. As to the Roger and Ledion patent, if that patent covered this invention, as to one thickness of muslin, it might be a patentable improvement to make the bonnet of two thicknesses. The defendants say that there is nothing in the fact of there being two thicknesses. Why do they not make their bonnets out of one thickness? There must be something in the using of two thicknesses. None of the parties who make the bonnets have used one thickness. The defendants may make as many hats as they please out of one thickness of muslin. In regard to the other suit—the suit against Schultz and Hecht [Baldwin v. Schultz, Case No. 804]—it is true that the parties on both sides in that suit were satisfied that the hearing should be had upon affidavits. The plaintiffs took the defendants' affidavits. The defendants took the plaintiffs'. The plaintiffs were willing to accept the defendants' affidavits as true, just as they were. The defendants did not care to cross-examine the deponents who made affidavits for the plaintiffs. It is not alleged here that any one of the witnesses knew anything else that could be brought out. Blake fixed 1860 as the date of his invention, and the defendants do not undertake to show that Blake did not make the invention when he said he did. The defendants say that if you take their hat from the first die and put it into their embossing die, you will get no salable hat; but, if you put the coating or putty upon the hat, after using the first die, and then use the embossing die, you will have a salable hat. But the point is, that they put the putty on, and then emboss the hat. They say that there is no infringement, because they do not emboss directly upon the muslin. True it is that, looking on the completed hat, the eye rests simply on the coating or putty, but the corrugations extend into and through the muslin, and show, as is here apparent, on the inside of the hat. This operation has an effect, over and beyond the mere ornamentation. There is a durability and stiffness in the hat made of this fabric. It is very light, yet, at the same time, it has the requisite stiffness. Now, this durability and stiffness and lightness are due to the fact that the hat is made out of two or three thicknesses of muslin, stamped in this way. If these defendants do not make the article out of one thickness of muslin, there must be something in this idea of Blake's of using two thicknesses. At first blush, one would say that there could not be any difference between a fabric made of one thickness of muslin and a fabric made of two thicknesses, with paste between them. Yet these defendants do not use one thickness. They do use two thicknesses. Hats made of one thickness look to me just as good, but the evidence and the conduct of the defendants go to show me that they are not, and that there is something in the use of two thicknesses which makes their employment necessary and useful. As to the coating, the bonnet is none the less an infringement because a coating is put upon it. Putting on this coating or putty may be an improvement—perhaps it is a useful improvement. But it is a mere addition. The defendants may have something more than Blake has, but it is none the less apparent that they have what Blake has. The same questions were before me in the Schultz and Hecht case. That case was fully argued. There is nothing which leads me to suppose that their counsel did not defend them to the best of his ability. Every point involved seems to have been presented. Besides I studied that case thoroughly, and gave more time and attention to it than to almost any other case that has lately come before me. Especially did I thoroughly study it, after its second argument, to make myself familiar with it, in view of the fact that, after having first given a decision one way, I felt called upon to give one the other way. If the defendants in the Schultz and Hecht case would not permit the case to be opened otherwise, there was certainly nothing wrong or fraudulent in making an arrangement to secure such re-opening. If a mistake had been made, it was the duty of the counsel, to himself, his clients, and the court, to get the case re-opened, if possible. If this had not been done, it would all have had to come before the court at another time. If there was any suppression of truth or lack of full consideration, the court ought to look into it. So, too, if any prior patent should be brought before me, or if any new testimony should be offered, it would be entitled to consideration, just as if the other case had never been heard. But there is nothing of that character. In regard to the suggestion about a license, the defendants knew of this patent, and had notice of the proceedings in the other case. They engaged in this business with their eyes open. They took the risk upon themselves. They asked for a license, but they did not ask for it on the ordinary terms. They wanted to impose conditions upon the licensers. It is undoubtedly true that, in some cases, and under certain circumstances, I have said I would not grant an injunction, except on refusal of the defendants to accept a license. I belive such was the fact in the Car-Brake Case, [Hodge v. Hudson River R. Co., Case No. 6,560,] the Fat Acid Case, [Tilghman v. Mitchell, Case No. 14,042,] and, if I recollect correctly, in one of the Hoop-Skirt Cases, [Doughty v. West, Case No. 4,028;] but in all of those cases the plaintiffs were perfectly open and free to grant licenses to anybody. The more licenses they had, the better it was for them. But that is not the case with these plaintiffs. They undertake to show, in their affidavits, why it would be prejudicial to them for these defendants to have a license. (Mr. Law stated that the defendants do not want a license, such as is offered them, because they can not honestly live up to its terms.) The conduct of these defendants, in this regard, is certainly very honorable, and I should think they were just such persons as the plaintiffs would desire to be licensees. It does not very clearly appear, I confess, how granting a license would injure these plaintiffs. In Waller's affidavit, it is not very clearly expressed. (Mr. Gordon called attention to the fact that the plaintiffs are themselves large manufacturers, and that they and their present licensees can supply the market, and that this appears in the bill of complaint, as well as in the affidavits.) I did not observe that the plaintiffs are themselves manufacturers of the bonnets. They are entitled to the injunction.

MARITIME LIENS—PRIORITIES—STATE AND FEDERAL LAWS.

1. The lien of a mortgage on a vessel, duly recorded according to section 4192, Rev. St., is inferior to all strictly maritime liens, but is superior to any subsequent lien for supplies furnished in the home port, given by state legislation.

[Appeal from the United States district court for the southern district of Alabama.

[In admiralty. Libel by Edward Baldwin against the steamer Bradish Johnson, (J. M. Stone and J. H. Stone, claimants.) Other creditors intervened, claiming liens for seamen's wages, supplies furnished in foreign and home ports, taxes, etc. Thereafter Charles Cavaroc Jr., intervened, claiming a lien by virtue of a mortgage of the steamer. The decree of the district court postponed the lien of the mortgage to the lien for supplies in the home port in The Bradich Johnson, Case No. 1,770. Charles Cavaroc, Jr., appeals. Reversed.]

The Bradish Johnson was seized upon a warrant issued upon the libel of Edward Baldwin. Other creditors, some of whom had furnished supplies to the steamer in her home port, and others of whom held admiralty liens for seamen's wages, and for supplies furnished in foreign ports, filed libels. All the cases were consolidated, the steamer was sold by order of the district court, and the proceeds paid into the registry of the court. Thereupon, under admiralty rules thirty-four and forty-three, Charles Cavaroc, Jr., filed his intervention, claiming the proceeds of the steamer, after the payment of costs and the general admiralty liens, by reasons of a mortgage upon said steamer, which, he averred, had been duly recorded according to the act of congress, before any other lien upon the boat had been created. On March 11, 1876, one Vincent J. Wood, who was at that time the sole owner of the Bradish Johnson, sold her to J. M. Stone and J. H. Stone, citizens of Alabama, for the price of $7,200, of which three thousand dollars were paid in cash, and the residue, $4,200, was evidenced by the notes of the purchasers, which they secured by a mortgage duly executed on the boat. This mortgage was recorded in the office of the collector of customs of the port of Mobile, on April 18, 1876, and about that date the Bradish Johnson was enrolled in said custom house, and the port of Mobile has ever since been her home port.

The Code of Alabama declared as follows: "Section 3465. A lien is hereby created on all ships, steamboats and other water crafts, whether the same be registered, enrolled, licensed, or not, that may be built, repaired, fitted, furnished, supplied or victualed within this state, for work done or materials supplied by any person within this state, for or concerning the building, repairing, fitting, furnishing, supplying or victualing such ships, steamboats or other water crafts, and for the wages of the masters, laborers, stevedores and ship-keepers of such vessels, steamboats or other water crafts, in preference to other debts due and owing from the owners thereof, which said lien may be asserted in any court of competent jurisdiction. Section 3466 Lien lost if action not brought in six months.—b. The lien hereby created shall expire after the lapse of six months from and after the maturity of the claim or debt, unless within the said six months judicial proceedings shall have been commenced to assert such lien." Under these provisions of the statute law, and after the registration of said mortgage, a large number of liens had been created for supplies, etc., furnished the Bradish Johnson in her home port of Mobile, and other ports of the state of Alabama. The district court referred the claims of all the creditors of the boat to a commissioner to report a tableau of distribution. The commissioner reported accordingly, and recommended the payment, first, of the costs of suit; second, of the maritime liens under the general admiralty law; third, liens under the state law, and these being sufficient to exhaust the proceeds of the steamer in the registry of the court, there was nothing left for distribution to the mortgagee. The report of the commissioner was confirmed by the decree of the district court. From this decree Cavaroc appealed to this court.

WOODS, Circuit Judge. The appellant Cavaroc concedes that liens by the general maritime law, such as for seamen's wages, supplies furnished the steamer in a foreign port, take precedence of his mortgage, but he denies that the lien given by the law of Alabama to material men and others, for repairs and supplies in the home port of the steamer, is entitled to priority over the lien created by the registration of his mortgage under the act of congress. This contention presents the main question brought up by the appeal. Section 4192 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which became a law July 19, 1850, declares that "no bill of sale, mortgage, hypothecation or conveyance of any vessel, or part of any vessel, of the United States shall be valid against any person other than the grantor or mortgagor, his heirs and devisees and persons having actual notice thereof, unless such bill of sale, mortgage, hypothecation or conveyance is recorded in the office of the collector of customs where such vessel is registered and enrolled. The lien by bottomry on any vessel, created during her voyage by a loan of money or materials necessary to repair, or enable her to prosecute her voyage, shall not lose its priority, or be in any way affected by the provisions of this section." I think it clear that the effect of this section is, that where a bill of sale, mortgage, hypothecation or conveyance of a vessel is recorded in accordance with the terms of the law, it is valid, not only against the mortgagor, his heirs and assigns, and persons having actual notice thereof, but against other persons.

It is not contended by the appellant that a mortgage so recorded would prevail over strictly maritime liens, but it is claimed that its lien is better than any subsequent lien not recognized by the general maritime law. In the case of The Lottawanna, 21 Wall. [88 U. S.] 558, it was held by the supreme court, that according to the maritime law, as accepted and received in this country, material men who furnish repairs and supplies to a vessel in her home port, do not acquire thereby any lien upon the vessel. The question is, therefore, reduced to this, can the states, by the passage of laws giving a lien upon vessels for supplies furnished in the home port, override a lien created by a mortgage recorded according to the act of congress and declared to be valid against all liens except maritime liens? No reason is perceived why supplies furnished in the home port of the vessel, where the mortgage is of record, should take precedence of the mortgage. The act of congress, in effect, gives validity to the lien of the mortgage, from the date of its record. No state law can postpone this lien in favor of one subsequently made.

It is insisted, however, that a contract for supplies to a vessel is a maritime contract, that the state law of Alabama has given a lien for such supplies, and that by an amendment to admiralty rule twelve, promulgated by the supreme court, on May 6, 1872—[Webb v. Sharp,] 13 Wall. [80 U. S.] 14,—the material man is allowed to sue in rem, in the admiralty courts, to enforce such lien, and that, therefore, the lien takes precedence of the lien of a mortgage duly recorded before the debt for supplies was contracted. In other words, it is claimed that the twelfth rule, as it now stands, gives the same lien for supplies in the home port as that given by the general maritime law for supplies furnished in a foreign port. In reply to this, it is sufficient to say that neither the supreme court of the United States, nor any other court, can, by rule, either create liens or postpone one lien to another. It may regulate the practice and method of procedure, but it cannot displace one lien in favor of another. So, by allowing material men, who have furnished supplies to a vessel in her home port, to proceed in rem, when the state law has given a lien, the court does not attempt to give the lien any precedence over prior liens, by mortgage or otherwise. In the case of the Lottawanna, supra, the court says (page 579): "As to the recent change in the admiralty rule (the 12th) referred to, it is sufficient to say that it was simply intended to remove all obstructions and embarrassments in the way of instituting proceedings in rem in all cases where liens exist by law, and not to create any new liens which, of course, this court could not, in any event, do, since a lien is a right of property, and not a mere matter of procedure."

The priority of a lien is also a right of property, and the supreme court could not, by rule, any more interfere with the priority of liens than it could create liens. So that the case stands just as it did before the amendment to the twelfth admiralty rule, and the question comes back, can a state, by its legislation, create a lien which shall have priority over one already existing by virtue of an act of congress? The question carries with it its own answer: White's Bank v. Smith, 7 Wall. [74 U. S.] 646; Aldrich v. Aetna Ins. Co., 8 Wall. [75 U. S.] 491. In my judgment the lien of a mortgage, duly recorded, is superior to any subsequent lien for supplies in the home port, given by the legislation of a state. This view has been held by Judge Drummond, in The Grace Greenwood, [Case No. 5,652,] and in The Kate Hinchman, [Id. 7,620.] See, also, Scott's Case, [Id. 12,517.] It has also heretofore been held by the circuit court for the district of Louisiana. See the case of The John T. Moore, [Id. 7,430.]

It follows, therefore, that the mortgagee is entitled to be paid out of the proceeds of the boat, next after the payment of the costs and general maritime liens, and before the liens created by the state law, for repairs and supplies in the home port. A decree in accordance with these views has been handed to the clerk for entry upon the minutes of the court.

Case No. 799.

BALDWIN v. The E. MORRIS.[1]

District Court, D. Connecticut. Feb. 19, 1877.

MARITIME LIENS—PRIORITY.

[1. A steamboat registered in New York was purchased by libellant's son, and was taken to Fair Haven, Conn., for repairs. The son had no means of his own or credit in Fair Haven, and a verbal arrangement was made between him and the libellant by which the latter agreed to advance money for the necessary repairs, wages of workmen and seamen, and outfit and stores on the credit of the boat, and to permit her to be taken to the Potomac, in the expectation that her profits there would repay the advances and discharge the lien. Repairs were made upon the vessel accordingly, and her hailing port was changed to Washington, D. C. Held, that libellant had a lien against the steamboat for the repayment of the money expended and advanced upon her credit in a foreign port for necessary repairs and supplies.]

[2. After being repaired, the vessel was taken to Washington, where she arrived January 19, 1876, and where other repairs were made. The owner obtained, on the security of the boat, the indorsement of his note for $1,000, to secure which note and bills, amounting in all to $1,500, a deed of trust to one Lowe was executed. The boat made regular trips on the Potomac from March 9, 1876, to April 13, 1876, but ran in debt. In March or April, 1876, one Hall verbally agreed to purchase one-half of the boat for $2,625, free from the $1,500 mortgage, and paid $1,409 on account thereof. Hall subsequently found that there were about $4,000 claims against the boat, and declined to make any further payments, on the ground that he had already paid for more than one-half of the boat. Prior to June 8, 1876, the owner had become involved in debt, and the boat had been libelled by the crew and by material men. Advances to pay the wages of the crew and some of the claims of the material men were obtained; and June 8, 1876, the first deed was released, and a second deed of trust to secure claims of Washington parties to the amount of $4,577 was made to Lowe. Lowe, Hall, and the persons secured by the deed of trust were all ignorant of libellant's lien, the owner asserting that the boat was free from liens except to Washington creditors. Libellant, however, was not aware of the representations or of the deeds of trust until the boat returned from Washington. On July 6, 1876, the vessel left Washington for New Haven, Conn., and during the remainder of the season plied between New Haven harbor and neighboring watering places, but at a loss. On July 24, 1876, Hall came to New Haven to protect his claim for the advanced purchase money, and met libellant and the owner at the office of his counsel. At this meeting, libellant stated that he had a claim upon the boat for $1,800 or $2,000, but in such terms as to lead Hall to understand that the claim was only against the owner personally. A second mortgage was given to Hall for the $1,409. The libel was filed October 12, 1876. On November 23, 1876, the boat was sold at auction by the trustee under the deed of trust, for $175, subject to all claims on liens. Hall bought the boat from the purchaser for $2,000. Hall, before and after buying the boat, had bought claims secured by the deed of trust, and his total claim at the time of the trial amounted to $5,209. Held: (1) That the libellant's lien had not been lost or waived as against bona fide purchasers, without notice, by libellant's delay, the period of eight months before bringing his libel not being, under the circumstances, an unreasonable time; (2) that, upon the evidence, the libellant was not estopped by concealment or misrepresentation from enforcing his lien against bona fide purchasers; and (3) that libellant's lien was superior to the title of Hall either as mortgagee or purchaser.]

SHIPMAN, District Judge. This is a libel in rem against the steamboat E. Morris upon a maritime lien for money alleged to have been expended for repairs and supplies, or loaned to the captain and owner to pay for repairs and supplies in a foreign port, upon the credit of said boat. Joseph T. B. Hall appears to defend, claiming the title to said steamboat.

The facts in the case are as follows: Theodore E. Baldwin, a steamboat captain, an inhabitant and resident of Washington, in the District of Columbia, after Nov. 29th, 1873, and a son of the libellant, purchased for the sum of $1,500, on August 19th, 1875, the steamboat E. Morris, in the city of New York, where she was then registered. The bill of sale was duly recorded. The vessel was a side-wheel tug boat, had been laid up at the wharf for two or three years, and was very much out of repair. The captain intended to run her himself as a freight and passenger boat upon the Potomac river, and bought her for that purpose. Before she could be used upon any waters, she needed extensive repairs both to her boiler, engine, and wood work. She was towed to Fair Haven, in this district, for the purpose of repairs, where there are a marine railway, ship yards, steam engine shops, and conveniences for the repairs of vessels. His father, the libellant, lived in Fair Haven, and was an experienced owner of vessels. Theodore E. Baldwin returned to Washington, leaving the repairs of the boat under the general oversight of his father. The captain had no means of his own, or credit in Fair Haven, which was well known to the libellant; and whatever repairs and supplies were furnished must be furnished either upon the credit of the boat, or upon the responsibility of some other person than the owner. A verbal arrangement was made between him and the libellant by which the latter agreed to advance money for the payment of the necessary repairs, wages of the workmen and seamen, her necessary outfit and stores upon the credit of the boat, to permit her to be taken to the Potomac, and go into business there, in the expectation and belief that her profits would be able to repay the advances and discharge the lien.

Serious and extensive repairs were made upon her under this arrangement, all of which were necessary. The engine was taken to pieces, and was repaired; new ash pans were cast; new crank was made; bilge pump was repaired; mast was taken out; wheels were repaired; decks were canvassed and painted; bells were put on the engine; she was caulked; graving pieces were put on the hull; steam pipe was repaired; her name and hailing port, "Washington, D. C.," were painted on the stern; and stores and outfit were purchased. These repairs occupied from September, 1875, to December, 1875. She then left for New York, to be inspected, and to receive a portion of her outfit, which could not be bought in Fair Haven. She arrived in Washington January 19, 1876. Before she left Fair Haven, the libellant advanced money to the captain for the purpose of procuring repairs and an outfit, which was spent in necessary repairs and outfit of the boat and wages; paid the wages of the workmen necessarily employed on the steamer, and bills for the necessary stores and outfit thereof, and for materials and labor necessarily used and employed on said steamer in said necessary repairs,—all of which money so spent and advanced amounted to the sum of $1,722.26, and was repaid therefor the sum of $413.00, leaving the balance due, for moneys necessarily expended in and upon the repairs, outfit, and wages, the sum of $1,308.76. The bill of the libellant, as presented, was the sum of $2,095.27, from which I deduct the sum of $150, charged for his own services in the oversight of said repairs, upon the ground that this was a voluntary service, and not rendered under a contract of hiring; also the sum of $143.66, expended by the captain from the moneys loaned to him in other than necessary repairs and supplies; the sum of $17, expended by the libellant for lawyer's fees; and the sum of $62.35, expended after the return of the boat from Washington, and not coming within the contract or agreement heretofore named, and not advanced on the credit of the boat. The said sum of $1,308.76 was all advanced and expended for necessary repairs and supplies upon the credit of the boat in a foreign port, which supplies could not have been procured upon the credit of the owner.

After the boat arrived in Washington, the captain deemed best, in order to fit her for the passenger trade, to put on a new upper saloon, and make other repairs; and for this purpose, he obtained, on the security of the boat, the endorsement of John B. Archer and Levi P. Wright upon his note of $1,000. Other expenses were incurred; and to secure all the bills and said endorsement, amounting to $1,500, a deed of trust of the boat was executed by the owner to R. P. Lowe. She was duly enrolled at the port of Georgetown, March 1, 1876, and licensed for the coasting trade. The boat commenced to make regular trips up and down the Potomac river on March 9th, 1876, but was unsuccessful, lost money, ran in debt, and stopped running April 13th, 1876. After the execution of said deed of trust, and in March or April, 1876, Joseph T. H. Hall verbally agreed with the owner to purchase one-half of the boat for $2,625, free from the $1,500 mortgage, and paid $1,409 toward the purchase money, but subsequently found that there were about $4,000 claims and debts upon account of materials furnished for the boat, and declined to make any more payments upon the ground that he had already paid for more than one-half of the boat.

Before June 8th, 1876, T. E. Baldwin had become burdened with debt. The boat was libelled by the crew, who were kept on board after she stopped her trips, and was released on bond, and was also libelled by material men of Washington for coal supplies furnished in her home port. The first deed of trust was surrendered and released. Between June 8th and July 6th, the seamen's wages, amounting to $916.72, were paid by J. B. Archer and L. P. Wright. On June 8th, 1876, a new deed of trust was drawn, and was executed on July 6th, 1876, by the owner to R. P. Lowe, to secure all the debts of Archer Wright and of the material men in Washington, to the amount of $4,577.63, and the boat was released from attachment. All the persons named in said deed and said Hall were ignorant of the alleged lien of the libellant, of which the owner did not inform them, but asserted that she was free from liens except as to said Washington creditors. They were guilty of no laches, and acted in good faith. The conduct of the owner in misrepresenting to his Washington creditors the nature and extent of his father's lien was extremely reprehensible, but the libellant was not aware of these representations, and did not know of the mortgages or deeds of trust until after the boat returned from Washington.

On July 6th, 1876, the boat left Washington for New Haven, for the purpose of running as an excursion boat from New Haven harbor to the watering places in the vicinity. She commenced her trips forthwith, and ran regularly until September, when the season closed. In the meantime she had lost money. On July 24th, 1876, said Hall came to New Haven to look after his claim for said advanced purchase money for said boat, and met, at the office of his counsel, the libellant and the owner. The negotiations resulted in the owner's giving said Hall a second mortgage upon the boat for $1,409. An important point in this part of the case is the alleged concealment upon the part of the libellant of his lien, and a consequent estoppel in pais against now asserting it as against the defendant. I find that at this interview the libellant did substantially declare to said Hall that he had a claim upon the boat for $1,800 or $2,000, but that said Hall was of the opinion that this debt was not a debt against the boat, but was a personal claim against his son, and that the assertion of the libellant that he had a claim against the boat made no impression upon the mind or memory of either said Hall or his counsel, who did not suppose that any lien existed, and took the second mortgage under that supposition; but I cannot find that the libellant intentionally or actually concealed or withheld the knowledge of said lien from said Hall, or wilfully or knowingly caused said Hall to believe that no lien existed.

The libel was filed October 12th, 1876, and the boat was taken into the custody of the marshal. She was sold at public auction by the trustee named in the deed of trust on November 23d, 1876, subject to all claims or liens, valid or invalid, to John B. Archer, for $175, who on December 5th, 1876, sold her to said Hall for $2,500. Said Hall heard from his counsel about November 1st, 1876, that the libellant claimed a lien upon the vessel. Before that he had purchased the interest of L. P. Wright and A. R. Shepherd, two of the cestuis que trustent, as hereinafter named, in the vessel; and he has expended in all upon the boat and the purchase of claims against her the sum of $5,215, as follows: Paid to T. E. Baldwin $1,409, to John B. Archer $2,500, to L. P. Wright $1,256, to A. R. Shepherd $50. He has agreed to purchase Emory & Co.'s claim for a coal bill of $198.27, which is named in the second deed of trust. The market value of the boat is from $1,500 to $2,500.

The conclusions of law from the foregoing facts are:

1st. The libellant acquired a valid maritime lien against said steamboat for the repayment of said sum of $1,308.76, expended and advanced for necessary repairs and supplies in a foreign port, upon her credit, with interest from January 19th, 1876.

2d. Said lien has not been lost or waived as against the bona fide purchasers without notice of said lien, by any delay on the part of the libellant in enforcing his lien. The period of eight months before bringing his libel was, under the circumstances of this case, not an unreasonable time.

3d. The libellant is not estopped by concealment or misrepresentation from enforcing his lien against bona fide purchasers.

4th. The lien of said libellant is superior to the title of said Hall, either as mortgagee or purchaser.

Let a decree be entered for the payment to the libellant of the sum of $1,308.76, and interest from January 19th, 1876, and costs, and, in default of payment, for the condemnation and sale of said boat.

[Chase, 432.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. South Carolina. May Term, 1869.

JUDGMENT—ENTRY—DESTROYED RECORD—FILING TRANSCRIPT—PARTIES—PRACTICE—SCIRE FACIAS.

1. A verdict having been obtained in 1860, no further proceedings are had in the cause until 1867. In the meantime the record has been destroyed. The plaintiff may file a transcript of the record in his possession, upon which a judgment may be entered as upon the original record.

2. In such case, the defendant having died in the meantime, his personal representative must be made a party, and a rule served to show cause why the transcript should not be filed, does not operate to make him a party.

3. It seems that when the personal representative is a non-resident, it should be done by scire facias.

4. The copy of the record produced, was in the possession of the plaintiff.

At law. The facts are fully stated in the opinion of the CIRCUIT JUSTICE.

Chamberlain & Seabrook, for plaintiff.

Magrath & Loundes, for defendant.

CHASE, Circuit Justice. This was originally a suit on which a verdict was obtained May 9, 1859, by the plaintiff against the defendant, for twenty-five thousand three hundred and fifty dollars. On motion, this verdict was set aside, and a new trial was ordered. On May 18, 1860, another verdict was rendered against the defendant, for fourteen thousand six hundred and sixty-six dollars and sixty-six cents. On June 4, the time for filing the bill of exceptions was extended for two months. On August 8, the time for filing exceptions was again extended to November 1, 1860.

The civil war, which soon followed, prevented any further action at that time. On February 13, 1867, the plaintiff proposed to file a transcript of the proceedings of the circuit court in this case, and also in the case of Baldwin v. C. A. L. Lamar, and others. A rule was issued upon the administratrix Lamar, to show cause why the order prayed for should not be made. The rule was duly served and returned, and on May 21, 1867, the order was made and the transcript filed. A motion is now made for a judgment upon the verdict evidenced by this record. The statute of the state, which has been practically adopted as the rule of proceeding in this court, provides that the transcript of a record lost or abstracted, when proved and filed, shall have precisely the same effect as if the record had never been disturbed. The question, then, is: What would be the right of the plaintiff in the verdict, obtained in May, 1860, had it remained on the record of the court during the whole period, and now, for the first time, a judgment was asked upon it? Undoubtedly a judgment ought to be entered upon the verdict; but it can not be entered nunc pro tunc. The accidents and events of the war must be regarded as causing inevitable delay. A judgment will only be rendered when asked. The plaintiff would be entitled to a judgment at this term, if this was all. But Lamar, the defendant, has been dead four years. The plaintiff appears to have taken for granted that the issue of the rule to show cause why the order to file the transcript should not be entered, made the administratrix a party to this record. We do not think so. We think that the record stands precisely as it would stand if there had been no war, and this was the next term after the verdict. If Mr. Lamar had died after the rendition of the verdict, before judgment could be entered, it would then be necessary to make the administratrix a party. This could be done in various ways, according to circumstances. It could be done on motion, or by a rule to show cause, or by a scire facias; and we think a scire facias should be issued in this case especially; the administratrix is not a citizen of this state, and it is proper that she should have the opportunity of pleading to the scire facias. We do not know that any plea will avail her. We do not propose to go into an examination of any question of jurisdiction or other defense in advance. The case was transferred to this court from the circuit court for the district of Georgia. We have been asked to make an order for re-transfer. No such order will now be made, but the case will be continued in order that the administratrix of the deceased defendant may be made a party to the record.

BETTS, District Judge. The application for a new trial on the part of the defendant in this case rests upon exceptions to the charge and ruling of the judge on the trial of the cause. The defendant, by a power of attorney executed August 31, 1836, authorized Elisha Starr to sell any lands owned by the defendant in the western states and territories, and purchased for him by the said Starr or I. Dewey, or received in exchange for other lands, purchased by them for the defendant. On the 7th day of November, 1836, Starr conveyed in the name of the defendant and his wife, to the plaintiff, certain real estate, situated in Milwaukee, territory of Wisconsin, and purchased conformably to the terms of the power of attorney, for the consideration of $1,800, which was paid in full. The conveyance was with covenants of seizin and warranty. The judge ruled at the trial that the power of attorney did not authorize Starr to convey with covenants, and decided that the deed was to operate only as a conveyance in fee as if executed without the insertion of covenants.

The counsel for the defendant excepted to the admission of the deed as evidence, but on the argument has discussed only the question whether the attorney had power to insert the covenants given with this deed, and has conceded, that otherwise than in respect to those covenants, the deed operates to the same effect as if executed personally by the defendant. The plaintiff not having excepted to the exclusion of the covenants, it is not necessary in this position of the case to review the construction put by the judge on the power of attorney, and the waiver of the defendant's exception also excuses the consideration of the formality and sufficiency of the deed itself. The action was assumpsit to recover both the consideration money paid, with interest, upon the ground that, at the time of the conveyance, the defendant had no title to the lands sold; and it rested upon the doctrine that, on an entire failure of the consideration, the vendor of real estate has a right to reclaim the purchase money and interest, although he has received a conveyance perfect in law to pass the title. The conveyance executed was without seal, but it appears that, by the law of Wisconsin, a scroll or designation of the place of seal operates as a deed. Acts Wis. p. 156.

Whether, if the laws of the place of contract had placed the transfer of real or personal estate on the same footing, and had adopted to both the remedies appropriate at common law to either, the same rule must be administered in other forums, might be a grave question; but it is merely a speculative one in regard to the present case, for it is shown that this instrument has in Wisconsin all the effect of a common law deed of bargain and sale.

The objection has been strenuously urged that the plaintiff did not prove at the trial any failure of title in the defendant, and that it is in no respect inconsistent with the evidence that there should have been vested in him at the time of the conveyance a valid title to the property. The exception on the trial was pointed to admission of but one item of proof on that head,—the certificate of the commission of the land office, authenticating certain proceedings in that office, alleged to have relation to the lands in question. The defendant's counsel construes the exception as contesting the admissibility and effect in law of the various papers embraced within the certificate, to support the allegation that the defendant had no title to those lands. Such is not the bearing of the exception: It evidently regards those documents as the only proof offered by the plaintiff to show a failure of title, and demands their exclusion as incompetent to establish the facts. Manifestly the exceptions cannot be sustained in that point of view. The documents were so authenticated as that by the laws of congress plaintiff was entitled to read them in evidence, if pertinent to the case, and the exception should accordingly have been to their legal effect and relevancy. There was already evidence given tending to establish the same fact. The Chicago treaty, the deposition of Starr, &c.; and in aid of that proof, the plaintiff offered the records of the land office, to show that the government had never granted those lands. The defendants had a right to call on the judge to decide whether the documents were full proofs to the point in inquiry, or merely to be received as auxiliary to other evidence, or what other, if any effect, was to be given them; but I think, as the case stands on paper, the defendants are not entitled to the absolute exclusion of that evidence.

A further point is made, that the judge charged the jury as matter of law that the defendant's title had failed; when it should have been submitted as matter of fact to them to find on the evidence, the court being authorized only to determine the construction and effect of the written documents, but not the effect of the entire proof. The bill of exceptions is very concise in detail, but I think it is manifest from the proceedings stated in it, that there was no contest before the jury as to any matter in pais. Both parties regarded the case as turning on points of law—the sufficiency of the power of attorney and the right of the plaintiff in this form of action, to recover back the consideration paid; and, to obtain the judgment of the court on these points, the cause was disposed of upon the assumption that the title of the defendant had failed. It would be contrary to the notorious practice of the court for the judge to take upon himself the determination of mere matters of fact, and withdraw it from the jury; and rather than suppose so unusual an omission with the late, learned and cautious judge who presided in this court and on the trial of this case, I should read the charge set forth in the exceptions, not as positive and directory to the jury, but as hypothetical, resting upon the supposition of its being found "that in this case, the title of the defendant having failed," they were then instructed that "the money paid him was paid without consideration, and the plaintiff was entitled to recover it back in this form of action."

The final position in the charge is the gist of the controversy, and the conclusion to which I have arrived in this branch of the exception renders it of less moment that any definite judgment should be pronounced at this time on the other points presented. The mistake, if any, was merely formal, for it can scarcely be supposed that the jury, on the evidence spread upon the bill of exceptions, could have presumed any title in fact passed by the deed, or existed in the defendant at the time of its execution or since. But assuming, as was palpably the understanding at the trial, that the title had failed, the main question is as to the right of the plaintiff to sue for and recover the consideration money paid. It rests partly on the inquiry whether the legal operation of the deed supplies him the relief sought, and partly on the form of action adopted. I take it to be incontrovertably the case of this state, that no action lies in behalf of a grantee against the grantor on a deed conveying real estate without covenants. This is not only so by positive statute, which provides that no covenant shall be implied in any conveyance of real estate, whether such conveyance contain special covenants or not, (1 Rev. St. p. 738, § 140,) but the like doctrine had been explicitly declared by the supreme court in 1804, (Frost v. Raymond, 2 Caines, Cas. 188,) and has never since been varied, (4 Kent, Comm. 476.) In Frost v. Raymond, the court discusses with great attention all the operative words in a deed in fee without covenants,—"grant, bargain, sell, alien, and confirm,"—and resolve that some of them imply a covenant of title by the grantor. This was also clearly the common law doctrine. The cases cited by the supreme court from the English adjudications sustain the positions laid down, and they are also strongly fortified by the opinion of Sergeant Sugden, and the case he adduces to support it, that if one sell another's estate without covenant or warranty for the enjoyment, it is at the peril of him who buys, because, the thing being in the realty, he might have looked into the title. Sugd. Vend. 315. The rule is different in a lease for years, for in such case it is adjudged that the words "grant," "demise," etc., imply a covenant of title in them. Co. Litt, 384a. but note 332; 3 Cro. Eliz. 674; Cro. Jac. 73. So also a contract to convey a fee simple, imports title in the vendor, and he cannot acquit himself of the engagement by making a bald deed, no title being in him at the time. 14 Mass. 425; 4 Conn. 350. Strong cases to this point are found in 2 Johns. 599; 10 Johns. 269; 12 Johns. 436; and the principle has been adopted and applied in other cases in this state, and by the supreme court of the United States. Bank of Metropolis v. Guttschlick, 14 Pet. [39 U. S.] 19. But none of these advance or countenance the doctrine that, after a deed in fee devoid of covenants is accepted by a grantee, he can raise an implied covenant thereon against the grantor. Had this been an action of covenant, therefore, it is plain, that the authorities would be decidedly against it, or that the plaintiff must have failed.

Is the right at all varied by changing this form of action, when the special undertakings or promises are made the foundation of the action? Assumpsit for money had and received is an equitable action of the broadest scope, but it can yield no fruit to the party unless the proof in the case shows his superior equitable and legal right to the money in question. What is then the gravamen to the action, the foundation upon which it rests? It must be a promise implied from the grant of land for a full consideration that the grant actually claims the title it purports to convey. In other words, this action, the same as one in covenant, is to be supported solely by this implied undertaking or promise of the vendor. The cases make no distinction favoring the claim in one form of action over that of another, or intimate that a promise may be implied, carrying all the effect of a covenant, in relation to the sale of land, when such covenant itself could not be implied.

The doctrine deduced from them all is, that there is no reason for allowing a party an action at law in such case, where he did not provide it for himself upon his contract. Sugd. Vend. 715. Lord Holt and the court affirm this to be the law, (2 Ld. Raym. 1119,) and recognize, in an action on this case for deceit, the principle that when the thing sold is in realty, without covenant of warranty, the validity of the right or title is at the peril of him who buys, (Cro. Jac. 197; 1 Serg. & R. 42; 4 Greenl. 101.) Gates v. Winslow was assumpsit to recover back the consideration paid, on receiving a quitclaim deed of lands, on this allegation, that no interest passed by the deed, and the court held that the action would not lie. 1 Mass. 65. This principle is reaffirmed with great strength of statement by Parsons, C. J., (4 Mass. 136,) and is fully recognized by the superior court of Pennsylvania and Maine, (Joyce v. Ryan, 4 Greenl. 101; Emerson v. Washington Co., 9 Greenl. 96; Dorsey v. Jackman, 1 Serg. & R. 42.) The court of chancery, acting with a view to the intrinsic equities of cases between parties, and without being controlled by rules that might be termed technical merely, will afford no relief to a vendee of land who has accepted a conveyance without covenants, when no fraud or deceit has been practiced by the grantor. In Thomas v. Powell, 2 Cox, Cas. 396, Ld. Loughborough, in such case, refused to impound the consideration money yet remaining in court and which had not reached the vendor. He held that the vendee must be remitted to his covenants, and if the deed contained none, the purchaser is entirely without remedy. Lord Rosslyn enforced the same principle, and held that even in a conveyance made by a master under decree of the court, the purchaser, after accepting the deed, could not recover back the purchase money because of a failure of title. Wakeman v. Duchess of Rutland, 3 Ves. 235. Abbott v. Allen, in this state, is a strong case to the same point. Chancellor Kent declared that if there be no fraud and no covenants taken to secure the title, the purchaser has no remedy in equity for his money because of a failure of title. 2 Johns. Ch. 519–523.

The precise point presented by this case has been repeatedly brought before the courts in England and this country, as shown by the authorities cited; and it has been uniformly adjudged, that neither in law on an implied covenant, nor in an action of assumpsit, nor in equity, can a purchaser of real estate who accepts a deed without covenants recover back the consideration money paid on a failure of title, unless there be fraud or deceit in the sale. All that is required in the disposal of the point presented is to ascertain what the fixed rule of law is; but it is also satisfactory to find it one not of arbitrary authority merely, but resting on the soundest principles of general justice. The court always looks to a whole instrument in writing and under seal as conclusive evidence of what the parties ultimately concluded between themselves. All antecedent propositions and understandings are deemed disposed of and substituted by what the deed expresses. So far then from countenancing the allegations that an important part of the stipulations are reserved, or can be implied out of the deed, beyond its language, the law holds that the writing is peremptory proof of what the parties ultimately agreed to between themselves, and that it would counteract more often than advance the understanding of both parties to raise, from a deed like this, engagements not expressed upon its face. 4 Kent, Comm. 474. This case is examined and decided solely upon the points presented by the exceptions and on the argument; that is to say, that the instrument of conveyance is to be regarded a mere grant of title without covenants of assurance, and that the right to retain the verdict rests upon the doctrine that a failure of title under such a grant enables the grantee to recover back the consideration paid, by action of indebitatus assumpsit. Under this view of the law, I am constrained to pronounce the ruling of the judge on the trial of the cause erroneous, and that the exceptions thereto must be sustained. A new trial is accordingly ordered, with costs to abide the event of the suit.

Case No. 801.

BALDWIN v. RAPLEE et al.

[4 Ben. 433.] [1]

District Court, N. D. New York. Dec., 1870.

SETTING ASIDE MORTGAGE—PAROL PROOF OF CONSIDERATION—USURY—PLEADING—ASSIGNMENT—CONCEALED FRAUD.

1. Where a mortgage purported on its face to have been executed to secure the payment of $10,000, according to the condition of a certain bond, and it appeared that no such bond was ever executed: Held, that that fact was not of itself fatal to the claims of the mortgagee, and that parol proof might be received to sustain the mortgage.

2. Where the note, to secure which a mortgage was alleged to have been given, was dated May 10th, 1868, and bore interest from that date, and the consideration of the note was not received till the 18th of that month; and, on a bill being filed by the assignee in bankruptcy of the mortgagor, to set the mortgage aside, it was claimed that the mortgage was void for usury: Held, that it was a sufficient answer to that objection to the mortgage, to say that there was no allegation in the bill, that the mortgage was usurious, or that there was any corrupt agreement or any intent to secure more than lawful interest.

3. Where a mortgage, which purported on its face to be given to secure a bond for $10,000, was assigned, but no bond was ever executed, and a note for $10,000, which was claimed to have been given for the consideration of the mortgage, was not delivered over when the mortgage was assigned: Held, that the mortgage was not thereby extinguished. The assignment of the mortgage, "together with the bond accompanying said mortgage, and therein referred to, and all sums of money due or to grow due thereon," was a transfer of the debt as well as of the mortgage, and would include the note as incident to the debt.

4. A deed or mortgage which misrepresents the transaction it professes to recite or the consideration on which it was executed, is liable to suspicion, and parol proof which contradicts or varies the terms of a mortgage, or is relied on to give it effect as a security for a debt, different from that which it is apparently intended to secure, should be of the most satisfactory character.

5. On a bill in equity filed to set aside a mortgage given as above, and assigned, it was attempted to sustain the mortgage as being given for an actual debt other than what was stated on its face: Held, that the defendants had not satisfactorily established their position, and that the mortgage must be set aside.

6. Even if there had been sufficient proof of an agreement to give a proper mortgage, and if a cross bill had been filed to obtain a reformation of the mortgage executed, yet whether, under the circumstances, a court of equity would have given relief to the holder of the secret lien of an unrecorded mortgage, as against the assignee in bankruptcy, quere.

7. Whether in a court of equitable jurisdiction the limitation of six months contained in the bankruptcy act, begins to run in the case of a concealed fraud, from the time of its commission or from the time of its discovery, quere.

[In equity. Bill by Mason L. Baldwin, assignee in bankruptcy of Jefferson T. Raplee, against Nehemiah Raplee and Ira Raplee, to set aside a mortgage executed by the bankrupt. Decree for complainant.

[Subsequently the respondents took an appeal to the circuit court, and a motion to dismiss the appeal was thereafter denied in Baldwin v. Raplee, Case No. 802. The final decree in the circuit court is nowhere reported.]

HALL, District Judge. This is a bill in equity, filed by the plaintiff, as the assignee in bankruptcy of Jefferson T. Raplee, a bankrupt, for the purpose of setting aside a mortgage for $10,000 and interest, executed by the bankrupt to the defendant Nehemiah Raplee, and bearing date April 14th, 1868. This mortgage appears to have been acknowledged, by the bankrupt, before Spencer S. Raplee, a notary public,—who is a brother of the bankrupt,—on the 15th day of April, 1868; and it was duly recorded on the 26th of July, 1869, at 8¼ o'clock, A. M.:—the bankrupt, who had for several years been doing business as an individual banker, having failed and closed his bank on the 23d of the same month. By an assignment dated on the 24th of the same month, the mortgage was assigned by Nehemiah Raplee to the defendant Ira Raplee, as security for a pre-existing debt, due to him from Jefferson T. Raplee, and for which Nehemiah Raplee was liable as his surety.

The creditor's petition against Jefferson T. Raplee, as an involuntary bankrupt, was filed on the 30th day of July, 1869, and under that petition the plaintiff was duly appointed assignee.

The mortgage in question was in the form of a deed or grant, with a provision and declaration in the following language; viz.: "This grant is intended as security for the payment of the sum of ten thousand (10,000) dollars and interest, according to the condition of a bond this day executed and delivered by the said Jefferson T. Raplee, party of the first part, to the said party of the second part; and this conveyance shall be void if such payment be made as herein specified." The words of such provision which are above italicised were written, and the others were part of the printed blank used in drawing the mortgage.

The assignment to Ira Raplee was in form an assignment of the mortgage "together with the bond accompanying said mortgage, and therein referred to, and all sums of money due and to grow due thereon;"—and it contained a covenant that there was unpaid and "due on said bond and mortgage the sum of $10,894 18."

The mortgage contained the usual power of sale, but no express covenant for the payment of the money therein mentioned.

The plaintiff's bill alleges that the mortgage was executed on the 14th of April, 1868, or on some other day between that date and the filing of the creditor's petition in bankruptcy, as aforesaid; that he was informed by the mortgagee and believed that no such bond as was described in the mortgage was ever at any time delivered by the bankrupt to the mortgagee; and that the plaintiff did not know of any other or further condition or terms of payment of the moneys mentioned in said mortgage. The bill also alleges that the United States internal revenue stamp affixed to said mortgage appeared by the record thereof to have been cancelled by the bankrupt on the 18th day of April, 1868; that no bond such as is described in the mortgage had ever been delivered to or possessed by said Ira Raplee, or been seen by him; and that the assignment to said Ira was made as collateral security, as aforesaid. The bill further alleges that said mortgage was executed and delivered to the said Nehemiah Raplee, as aforesaid, when the said bankrupt was largely indebted to divers persons, and insolvent, and with intent thereby to hinder, delay and defraud the creditors of the said bankrupt; and was taken and received by the said Nehemiah Raplee with the like intent, and with full knowledge of the insolvency of the bankrupt, and of his said fraudulent intent; and that it was executed and delivered by said bankrupt without any good or valid consideration whatever; and also that the assignment of said mortgage to Ira Raplee was also without any valuable consideration, and was received by him with full knowledge of the bankrupt's insolvency, and was utterly void as against the plaintiff; but it was not alleged that the mortgage was executed for the purpose of giving a preference to said Nehemiah Raplee over the other creditors of the bankrupt, or to defeat the object of the bankrupt act, or evade any of its provisions; or that it was executed or accepted in fraud of that act.

The defendants, by their answer, admitted and stated the execution of the mortgage on the 14th, and the acknowledgment thereof on the 15th April, 1868; the affixing and cancelling of the internal revenue stamps on the 18th of the same month; that it was not recorded until the 25th day of July, 1869; and that the assignment thereof to Ira Raplee was executed on or about the 24th day of July, 1869. The answer also admits that no bond was delivered to Ira Raplee at the time of the assignment of the mortgage; and it avers that the mortgage was duly delivered by the said Jefferson T. Raplee to said Nehemiah, on or about the 19th day of April, 1868.

The answer of the defendants, in respect to the allegation that no bond accompanied the mortgage, and in respect to the consideration of the mortgage, and the debt it was actually intended to secure, is as follows, viz.: "These defendants, further answering, aver and say, and each for himself says,—the said Nehemiah, of his own knowledge, and the said Ira, on information and belief, that, at the time the said mortgage mentioned was made, executed, and delivered by the said Jefferson T. to the said Nehemiah, in fact, no bond accompanied the same; that the blank used in preparing said mortgage contained said printed clause or words, but which are not expunged or erased at the execution thereof, through inadvertence or oversight; that, in truth and in fact, the real and true consideration of the said mortgage was the sum of $10,000 in cash, before that time lent and advanced to the said Jefferson T., by the said Nehemiah, and for which the said Nehemiah then held, and ever since has and still holds, the promissory note of the said Jefferson T.; and to secure the payment of the said sum so lent and advanced, and the said note, the said mortgage was made, executed, and delivered, by the said Jefferson T. to the said Nehemiah; that no part of said sum so lent and advanced by the said Nehemiah to the said Jefferson T., on the said note or any part thereof, has ever been paid." And, again, in another part of said answer: "And these defendants, further answering, aver and say, and each for himself avers and says, that he is informed, and believes, that no bond was ever executed to accompany the said mortgage, and the said Jefferson T. did not execute such bond, and the said Nehemiah, of his own knowledge, avers and says, that it was intended that the said mortgage should be held as security for the payment of the said sum of $10,000, so as aforesaid lent and advanced by the said Nehemiah to said Jefferson T., and the interest thereon; said sum being represented by the said note given by the said Jefferson T. to the said Nehemiah, and which sum or note has never been paid."

The answer also alleges, that the debt of the bankrupt to Ira Raplee, in respect to which Nehemiah Raplee was liable as security as aforesaid, was, in part, upon a note of said bankrupt for $5,000, given on or about the 4th of July, 1867, and payable thirty days after that date; and the remaining $5,000 was upon a certificate of that amount made by the bankrupt, as an individual banker, under date of January 1, 1869, and payable in current funds, with semi-annual interest.

The defendants denied all knowledge or suspicion of the bankrupt's insolvency, and averred that they had no cause to believe he was insolvent, or unable to pay his debts, until long after said mortgage was executed, and they denied that it was executed or accepted with the intent to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors.

There are other allegations and admissions in the bill and answer, but it is not deemed necessary to refer to them more particularly in this preliminary statement.

Upon the taking of the proofs in the case, Nehemiah Raplee was sworn as a witness for himself and his codefendant, and was examined at length in respect to the execution, consideration, delivery, and purpose of the mortgage in controversy. Jefferson T. Raplee, the mortgagor, had absconded immediately after his failure, and was absent from the state; and his father testified that he did not know where he was; and, of course, his testimony has not been produced.

Nehemiah Raplee's testimony is, in several points, entirely inconsistent with the allegations of his sworn answer. Instead of testifying that the mortgage was delivered on or about the 19th day of April, 1868, he first testified that it was delivered a short time after the 10th of May, 1868; and, instead of testifying that the mortgage was given for $10,000 in cash, previously lent and advanced by him to Jefferson T. Raplee, for which he then held his note, he testified that the mortgage was given for the transfer by him to Jefferson T. of a mortgage of Daniel Ellis, to the amount of $3,446 36, and his the said Nehemiah's check for $6,553 77, on said Jefferson T. Raplee's bank; that said mortgage of Ellis was assigned, and said check given and dated on the 18th May, 1868, on which day the mortgage of $10,000 was delivered, together with a note of Jefferson T. Raplee's for $10,000, dated on the 10th day of May, 1868. The mortgage, he says, was given as security for the payment of this note, dated more than three weeks after the date and alleged acknowledgment of the mortgage, and more than a week before the date of the check, and of the alleged assignment of the mortgage. The note is produced, and is in the handwriting of Jefferson T. Raplee. The mortgage and the certificate of acknowledgment, including the date, are also in his handwriting. The revenue stamp on the mortgage has on it the date, "Apr. 18, 1868," with initials, "J. T. R." and "N. R.," but neither of these initials are believed to be in the handwriting of either Jefferson T. or Nehemiah Raplee. The certificate of acknowledgment is signed by Spencer S. Raplee, the brother of Jefferson. On the note is an internal revenue stamp, purporting to be cancelled by J. T. Raplee's signature; but it is evident that this signature is in the handwriting of his brother, S. S. Raplee; and it is almost certain that the date on the stamp was first written April 20 or 21, 1867, and subsequently changed to May 10, 1868. This note appears to have been first endorsed on the back, "N. Raplee, Note, $10,000," and the letters "J. T." afterwards written above the "N." The assignment of the mortgage from Nehemiah to Ira Raplee is produced, bearing date July 24, 1869, and purporting to have been acknowledged on the same day; but the assignment refers to the record of the mortgage, on the 26th of the same month, or two days afterwards; and gives the exact time of such record, and the book and page on which it is to be found. The revenue stamps on this assignment purport to have been cancelled on the 24th July, 1869, and to have on them the initials of Nehemiah Raplee, and also the initials "J. T. A.," but the cancellation is not supposed to be in the handwriting of Nehemiah Raplee. This assignment was also recorded on the 26th, only half an hour after the recording of the mortgage assigned. It also appears, from the testimony of Nehemiah Raplee, that he had a mortgage on all the real estate of Jefferson T. Raplee, not embraced in the $10,000 mortgage; that such mortgage was given him three or four years before the failure of Jefferson T. Raplee, and that it was not recorded until after the failure. The mortgage now in controversy purports to have been executed in the presence of S. S. Raplee,—his name appearing as the subscribing witness thereto,—but his testimony furnishes no evidence as to the time of the execution of the mortgage, or of his having cancelled the stamp of the note, or being present at its execution.

The testimony of Nehemiah Raplee is certainly open to much criticism, and is, in many respects, indefinite and unsatisfactory. No assignment of the Ellis mortgage to Jefferson T. Raplee is produced, and such assignment is not proved, except by the testimony of Nehemiah Raplee, who also testified that this mortgage was afterwards owned and used by him; having, as he says, been reassigned, or the assignment from him to Jefferson T. having been given up and cancelled before it was recorded; but which he does not profess to be able to state. The bank pass-book of Nehemiah Raplee with his son's bank showed a balance of more than $2,000 against Nehemiah Raplee. He testified that he could not explain it, but that the balance should have been at least four or five thousand dollars the other way. Nehemiah Raplee swears that he supposed Jefferson T. Raplee to be solvent down to the day of his failure, and had no suspicion of his insolvency; but his testimony shows that he had abundant reason to believe his son to be unable to meet his obligations as they fell due, and the father's denial of his knowledge or belief of such insolvency must, in charity, be attributed to his ignorance of the legal signification of the term, as it would otherwise necessarily be considered a wilful perversion of the truth.

Ira Raplee also testified, that, at the time the assignment to him of the mortgage in controversy was executed by Nehemiah Raplee, no bond was delivered to him: that he asked Nehemiah about the bond, and he said he thought there was no bond, but if he had one, he (Ira) should have it also. He further testified that he had given all that occurred between Nehemiah and himself, and, from his testimony, it appears that nothing was said between them in respect to the note, the payment of which, it is now said, the mortgage was given to secure; and that no other writing in respect to that transaction ever passed between Nehemiah and Ira Raplee.

The $10,000 note of Jefferson T. Raplee was not produced by this witness, upon his examination, when he produced the mortgage and assignment, which were marked as exhibits; but it was afterwards produced and marked as an exhibit, upon the examination of Nehemiah Raplee, the payee. The note produced is payable one day after date, to the order of N. Raplee, but there is no assignment or indorsement on the note, transferring it or directing its payment in any form.

Ira Raplee also testified that, when the assignment of the mortgage was made to him, he asked Nehemiah Raplee for the bond; and that Nehemiah then said, "I have not the bond here, and I am not sure there is any; I will look when I go home, and if I have it, you shall have it."

Nehemiah Raplee further testified, that at the time of the assignment to Ira, he had no bond there, and that he thought Ira asked him about the bond, and that he told Ira that if he had one he should have it; and that he looked afterwards, and did not find any bond. And it is not pretended by him that he in any way intimated to Ira Raplee, at or before the mortgage was assigned to him, that the mortgage was given to secure the payment of the $10,000 note of Jefferson T. Raplee.

It was urged, in behalf of the plaintiff, that the mortgage could not be enforced, because it is, by its terms, a security for the payment of $10,000, according to the condition of a bond of even date therein described, and no such bond was ever executed.

But the mortgage is declared to be intended as a security for $10,000 and interest; and, under the cases of Jackson v. Bowen, 7 Cow. 13, Goodhue v. Berrien, 2 Sandf. Ch. 630, Shirras v. Caig, 7 Cranch, [11 U. S.] 34, and similar cases, it must be considered that the fact that the bond so described was never executed, is not of itself necessarily fatal to the claims of the mortgagee, and that parol proof may be received to sustain the mortgage. Whether, under the proofs in this case, it should be sustained, is a different question, and will be discussed after disposing of other objections urged against the mortgage.

It was also urged that the mortgage was void for usury, because the note produced is dated on the 10th of May, 1868, and bears interest from that date, and the alleged consideration of the note was not received by the maker, or parted with by the mortgagee, until the 18th of that month. It is sufficient to say, in answer to this objection, that there is no allegation in the bill that the mortgage was usurious, or that there was any corrupt agreement, or any intent to secure more than lawful interest; and that there is not sufficient proof to sustain an allegation of corrupt agreement and unlawful interest, if it had been made.

It was also insisted that the assignment of the mortgage to Ira Raplee was without any assignment of the debt secured by the mortgage, and that, under the cases of Langdon v. Buell, 9 Wend. 80, Jackson v. Blodget, 5 Cow. 202, Merritt v. Bartholick, 36 N. Y. 45, the transfer of the mortgage without the transfer also of the note which evidenced the debt thereby secured, extinguished the mortgage.

It is true, the note was not indorsed or delivered to the assignee at the time the mortgage was assigned, but the assignment itself, by its express terms, assigned the mortgage, "together with the bond accompanying said mortgage, and therein referred to, and all sums of money due and to grow due thereon," which is clearly a transfer of the debt, as well as of the mortgage, and would include, as incident to the debt, the note which was the direct evidence of its existence. This objection must, therefore, be overruled.

It was also urged that, by the return of the Ellis mortgage to Nehemiah Raplee, the mortgage was extinguished to the extent that the assignment of such mortgage entered into the consideration of the mortgage in controversy; but this testimony of Nehemiah Raplee, which shows that the Ellis mortgage was returned to him, also shows that it was purchased by him of Jefferson T. Raplee, and paid for by giving up evidences of debt then held against Jefferson T. Raplee. There is, therefore no evidence to show that any part of the $10,000 note has been paid.

The question whether the parol proof in the case is sufficient to sustain the validity of the mortgage in controversy remains to be examined.

A deed or mortgage which misrepresents the transaction it professes to recite, or the consideration on which it was executed, is, of course, liable to suspicion, and must sustain a rigorous examination. Shirras v. Caig, ubi supra. And parol proof which contradicts or varies the terms of a mortgage, or is relied upon to give it effect as a security for a debt different from that which it is apparently intended to secure, should be of the most satisfactory character; and it should be carefully scrutinized,—especially when such proof is the unsupported testimony of the party chiefly interested in sustaining the mortgage.

In this case, the mortgage, on its face, purports to be a security for the payment of a debt of ten thousand dollars, evidenced by the bond of the mortgagor, bearing even date with the mortgage; but it is admitted that no such bond ever existed; and it is alleged that the mortgage was in fact intended to secure the payment of a note of the mortgagor dated nearly four weeks after the date and acknowledgment of the mortgage. The mortgagee, in making an assignment of the mortgage, more than a year after its date, and after the mortgagor had failed and absconded, assumes to assign with it the bond therein described; and when then questioned in regard to the bond, stated that he did not know as there was a bond, but if there was, the assignee should have it, but said nothing whatever in regard to its being accompanied by, or being given to secure the payment of the note which it is now said it was intended to secure, and subsequently, as he testified, he "looked a good deal at different times" for the bond. There is no satisfactory explanation of the circumstance that the mortgage is dated the 14th of April, and the note the 10th day of May, when neither was delivered, or the consideration paid or transferred, until the 18th of May, 1868; there are suspicious circumstances in respect to the cancellation of stamps, and their dates, as before stated; and then there are the entirely inconsistent statements of the sworn answer and oral testimony of the mortgagee, in reference to the time of the actual delivery of the mortgage, and the consideration of the debt it was intended to secure. The sworn answer avers that it was given for $10,000 in cash, before then lent and advanced to the mortgagor by the mortgagee, and for which the mortgagee then held the note of the mortgagor, and was delivered on or about the 19th day of April, 1868; while the oral testimony of the mortgagee shows that it was delivered on the 18th of May, 1868, and given for the Ellis mortgage, for which $3,446 36 was allowed, and a check of $6,553 77; thus assuming that it was given for a present valuable consideration, and not for a pre-existing debt; and not for cash lent and advanced, as alleged in the answer. The insertion of the time and place of the recording of the mortgage in the assignment after its execution and acknowledgment, and before it was recorded, is of little consequence, except as showing that papers executed by some of the parties were altered after their execution, in view of the then existing circumstances.

Besides these circumstances of suspicion, and others which appear in the preceding statement, it is to be observed that the general statement of Nehemiah Raplee, that this mortgage was given upon the consideration stated in his oral testimony, and to secure the payment of the $10,000 note, is not well supported by his detailed statements of what occurred between him and the mortgagor, in respect to the giving of the mortgage and the purpose for which it was to be given, and was given, and what was said and done at the time the mortgage and note were delivered. In the first part of his examination, and in reply to the question of his counsel, "For what purpose this mortgage was given," he replied, "To secure me for a part of the money I had loaned him." In reply to the question, "Was that indebtedness represented in this note?" he replied, "It was represented there for $10,000. I wish to be understood; that represented $10,000 of his indebtedness to me." In reply to the question, "How came he to give you the note and mortgage?" he testified as follows: "Previous to his giving this mortgage, he was up to my house and said he was to make a payment on the coal property, and wanted to borrow some more money. I said I would help him what I could, and told him he was getting about all I had, and I wanted security. His reply to me was, that he could give me a mortgage on his banking building and lot, which he thought was good security for $10,000. He came down here; the conversation was at my house; the next time he came he brought the note and mortgage. He was in the habit of coming Saturday night or Sunday morning. I looked them over a few minutes on Sunday, and did not look at them again until several days after, when I took them from my desk and looked them over. I found out that his estimation, in looking over the figures of certain transactions, was correct, and I then put them away satisfied. There was only enough estimated to amount to $10,000 of what I had let him have. He delivered me a statement at the time of so much of his indebtedness to me as covered the note and mortgage. I have looked a part of two days for the statement, but cannot find it. I have means of stating what made up the amount of the $10,000. I let him have a bond and mortgage amounting to $3,446 33. I gave him my check dated on the 18th May, 1868, for $6,553 77. The two items make just ten thousand dollars."

There are other portions of Nehemiah Raplee's testimony which have some slight bearing upon the questions under discussion, but it is believed that it does not strengthen the case of the defendants. By their answer and the character of their proofs, they have assumed the burden of sustaining the mortgage by parol testimony, and showing that it was, in fact, given to secure the payment of the $10,000 note referred to; and the testimony on the case has not satisfactorily established their defence. A decree will therefore be made, setting aside the mortgage in controversy, and discharging the premises mortgaged from any lien under the same, with costs.

It has not been forgotten that it was claimed that there was at least proof of a valid agreement to execute a proper mortgage, and that such agreement would, in equity, be so enforced as to give it the effect of a mortgage. If a cross-bill had been filed to obtain a reformation of the mortgage executed, or to give effect to the agreement for a mortgage, the relative equities of the mortgagee and the assignee in bankruptcy, as the representative of the general creditors of Jefferson T. Raplee, would have been brought into competition, and it is not considered at all probable that a court of equity would have given relief to the holder of the secret lien of the unrecorded mortgage against the representative of creditors who had trusted the bankrupt, and deposited their money in his bank, on the faith of his being the owner of the property covered by the mortgage in controversy here, and of the Pennsylvania property, free of incumbrances, when the defendant, Nehemiah Raplee, held unrecorded mortgages on such property to its full value, with full knowledge that the bankrupt was insolvent, and that he was continually receiving deposits, as a private banker, from persons ignorant of his financial condition.

It was substantially conceded, upon the argument, that the assignee in bankruptcy could not avoid the mortgage in controversy on the ground that it was made and taken in violation or fraud of the provisions of the bankrupt act—it having been executed and delivered more than six months before the petition in bankruptcy was filed against Jefferson T. Raplee. It has not, therefore, been deemed necessary to discuss the question whether, in a court of equitable jurisdiction, the limitation of six months, contained in the bankrupt act, begins to run, in the case of a concealed fraud, from the time of the commission of such fraud, or from the time of the discovery of such concealed fraud, as in other cases where the statute of limitations is pleaded. See Carr v. Hilton, [Case No. 2,437;] Moore v. Green, [Id. 9,763;] Pritchard v. Chandler, [Id. 11,436;] and Martin v. Smith, [Id. 9,164;] and also the authorities cited in those cases.[2]

Nor has it been deemed necessary to discuss the question whether, under the principles established in Shawhan v. Wherritt, 7 How. [48 U. S.] 627, the holder of a secret lien, under an unrecorded mortgage, can overreach the title of an assignee in bankruptcy, by recording his mortgage after he has knowledge of an act of bankruptcy committed by the mortgagor.

A decree will be entered in accordance with this opinion.

[1. The circuit court obtains jurisdiction of an appeal from a decree of the district court by filing and serving notice of appeal, and not by the filing of the transcript.]

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the northern district of New York.

[In equity. Bill by Mason L. Baldwin, assignee in bankruptcy of Jefferson T. Raplee, to set aside a mortgage executed by the bankrupt. Decree for complainant. Respondent appeals. Heard on motion to dismiss the appeal. Denied.]

In December, 1870, a decree of the district court was entered in favor of the complainant. [Baldwin v. Raplee, Case No. 801.] The respondent filed notice of appeal, gave the requisite bond, and had a citation issued all within ten days and in due time; but the transcript upon appeal was not filed in the circuit court until May, 1871, and after two terms had passed. This had happened through an agreement of counsel that the transcript should be printed before being filed, and the appeal and the argument were stipulated over the two intervening terms. A motion was now made to dismiss the appeal because the transcript was not filed, and the appeal thus entered at the term next after the taking of the appeal, and it was claimed that this was a matter of jurisdiction and could not be waived by stipulation. [Denied.]

C. G. Judd, for the motion.

Wm. Kernan, opposed.

Before WOODRUFF, Circuit Judge, and HALL, District Judge.

WOODRUFF, Circuit Judge, denied the motion, and said that while the sweeping language used by Chief Justice Chase in Alexander's Case, [Case No. 160,] seemed to imply that the motion should be granted, yet it was evident that no such question was before him, and his language was not as well considered as if the points had been argued.

That while there would not be any doubt that if the appeal were not taken in ten days under section eight, this court would not and could not get any jurisdiction of the appeal. Yet the court does, by the filing and serving notice of appeal within the ten days, obtain jurisdiction, and that the words of the eighth section which refer to the entering of the appeal at the next circuit, are merely directory, and that the time for filing the transcript may be enlarged by agreement, as was done in this case.

[1 N. Y. Leg. Obs. 391.]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. 1843.

BANKRUPTCY—TRADING—ACT OF BANKRUPTCY—PREFERENCE.

1. R. and E. for several years were engaged in the business of planing and dressing deals, principally for other persons, but until the close of the navigation of 1841, they had been in the habit of purchasing, manufacturing and selling on their own account; subsequent to that time, with the exception of one or two small purchases, and a few trifling sales, they discontinued this branch of the business, but continued the other branch of it. On the 8th of July, 1842, they committed an act of bankruptcy: Held, that they must be considered traders [within the meaning of the bankrupt act of August 19, 1841, (5 Stat. 440, c. 9)] at the time they committed the act of bankruptcy.

[As to who are "merchants," within the meaning of the act of 1841, see Wakeman v. Hoyt, Case No. 17,051; In re Eeles, Id. 4,302; Everett v. Derby, Id. 4,576; Hall v. Cooley, Id. 5,928.]

2. The giving a mortgage of the whole of the bankrupt's estate and effects to a particular creditor, to hinder and delay the general creditors, is an act of bankruptcy, within the express terms of the statute. [Act Aug. 19, 1841, (5 Stat. 440, c. 9.)]

In bankruptcy. This was an application [by Ephrahim Baldwin against Lewis Rosseau and Charles Easton] for a decree in bankruptcy at the instance of a creditor. The case came before the court upon petition and answer, and the evidence taken before a commissioner. [Application granted.]

It appeared that the respondents had for several years been engaged in the business of planing and dressing deals, on a large scale, at their establishment for that purpose, at West Troy, in the county of Albany, and that the principal part of the materials wrought by them belonged to other persons; but until the close of navigation in the autumn of 1841, they had also been in the practice of purchasing, manufacturing and selling on their own account. At that time, with the exception, at most, of one or two small purchases, and a few trifling sales in the course of the ensuing winter and spring, they discontinued this latter branch of their business, but continued the other branch of it as usual. For several years past, Grant, Silliman and A. J. Rosseau had been their endorsers for the purpose of enabling them to obtain money to be used in the prosecution of their business, and at the time of the commission of the alleged act of bankruptcy, stood responsible as their endorsers for between $5,000 and $6,000, and were also their creditors to the amount of about $800 for money loaned. They were also largely indebted to others. The debt of the petitioning creditors was for a steam engine sold by him to them to be used in propelling their machinery, while they were fully engaged in carrying on both branches of their business. Shortly before the alleged act of bankruptcy, the respondents, finding themselves unable to meet their pecuniary engagements, proposed to their creditors, by some of whom suits had already been commenced, to secure their respective claims by giving a mortgage payable at a future day, on all their property, which they estimated to be worth $28,000; being several thousand dollars more than the whole amount of their indebtedness, including the responsibilities of Silliman, Grant and A. J. Rosseau, as their endorsers. But they insisted, however, on securing to their endorsers an absolute priority of payment, on the ground that they were under engagements to them to this effect, which they were not at liberty to disregard. Their other creditors were willing to grant them an extension of the time of payment, provided they should be placed on a footing of equality with the endorsers; but they refused to acquiesce in the condition of having a priority of payment secured to the endorsers. The respondents thereupon, on the 8th of July last, executed to Silliman, Grant and A. J. Rosseau a mortgage, payable in presenti, for $5,936.93, of all their real estate, consisting of the land on which their buildings and machinery were situated, and several other lots of ground, and including also several articles of personal property. They have ever since continued in the undisturbed possession and use of the mortgaged property, real and personal. It did not appear that they had any other personal property, except their household furniture. The execution of this mortgage constituted the alleged act of bankruptcy.

The case was ably argued.

Goodwin and Litchfield, for petitioning creditor.

Myers and Wright, for respondents.

CONKLING, District Judge, delivered the opinion of the court, and established the following points:

1. That as, for several years antecedent to the autumn of 1841, the respondents had confessedly been largely engaged in the business of buying and selling, and had then only ceased to do so, without any unequivocal act evincing their determination not to resume the business, they might properly be considered, under the circumstances of the case, as still being traders at the time of the alleged act of bankruptcy. Such was the clear import of the decisions in the English courts.

2. That if they were not to be considered as being at that time traders in fact, so as to be liable to compulsory proceedings under the bankrupt act, in respect of debts then or thereafter contracted, yet, in as much as the act of bankruptcy charged against them the debt of the petitioning creditor, and their other debts all had their origin while they were using the trade of merchandise, they were on this ground to be treated as merchants in this proceeding. It is true the words "being merchants, or using the trade of merchandise," are in the present tense. But the act [of August 19, 1841, (5 Stat. 440, c. 9)] in this intent is precisely the same as the English acts, and yet these acts, as the cases cited on the argument clearly show, are unequivocally held to embrace cases like the present, even though the debtor may be shown to have left off trading long before the alleged act of bankruptcy. This is a reasonable construction of the act, and in accordance with its spirit. The opposite construction would lead to its evasion and the defeat of its objects.

3. Admitting it to be doubtful whether, in giving the preference secured by the mortgage, the respondents are to be considered as having acted "in contemplation of bankruptcy," still the mortgage is, under all the circumstances, to be adjudged fraudulent in law as having been given for the purpose of hindering and delaying creditors, and as such an act of bankruptcy, within the express terms of the first section of the act. Had the mortgage embraced only a part of the property of the respondents, it might perhaps have been regarded as a mere act of preference, and not an act of bankruptcy, unless executed in contemplation of bankruptcy. But it was made to cover all their real property, consisting of several other distinct pieces of land in addition to the land on which their buildings and machinery were situated, and also personal effects of considerable value. The property thus conveyed, according to the respondents' valuation, was worth more than four times the amount of all claims which the mortgagees had upon them, and clearly evinces an intention to hinder and delay the other creditors, and especially those who had already instituted suits against them. The inference is irresistible, moreover, that it was agreed, or at least tacitly understood, between the parties to the mortgage, that the respondents should continue in the possession of the property, both personal and real, as in fact they did. This is also a badge of fraud; and in this respect there is no difference between a mortgage and an absolute sale. The whole current of decisions, from Twyne's Case [3 Coke, 80, 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. 1] downward in England, and also in this country, properly understood, is believed to be in accordance with this view of the case.

In concluding his opinion, his honor remarked, that it was due to Messrs. Rosseau and Easton, under all the circumstances of the case as they appeared before the court, to remark, that it by no means followed from anything he had intended to say that they designed to commit any actual fraud upon their creditors. Their intention, desire and hope seemed to have been ultimately to pay all they owed; and it appeared to be questionable, at least, whether the ultimate interests of their creditors would not have been better promoted by leaving them to prosecute their efforts for this purpose, as, up to the present time, they have been doing.

Case No. 804.

BALDWIN et al. v. SCHULTZ et al.

[9 Blatchf. 494;[1] 5 Fish. Pat. Cas. 75; 2 O. G. 315, 319.]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Sept. 26, 1871; March 30, 1872.

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS— HATS — COATING FOR TEXTILE FABRICS — NOVELTY AND UTILITY — EQUITY—INJUNCTION—AFFIDAVIT.

1. The reissued letters patent granted to the Modena Hat Company, as assignees of Henry Loewenberg, the inventor, April 30th, 1867, for an "improved fabric for hats, bonnets, &c.," on the surrender of original letters patent granted to said Loewenberg, February 28th, 1865, the claim of such reissue being, "The new compound fabric, hereinbefore described, having substantially a foundation of interlaced threads, and a surface composed of fibrous material, stiffened by gelatinous matter, and consolidated by pressure," are not infringed by the use, as a fabric, of muslin, having interlaced threads, but no surface of fibrous material, either as part of the fabric or artificially applied.

2. The letters patent granted to John L. Kendall and R. H. Trested, February 9th, 1869, for an "improved compound for coating textile fabrics for manufacture of hats and bonnets," the claim of such patent being for a compound composed of white French zinc, or its equivalent, or lead, ground in a colorless and inodorous oil, such as castor oil, and collodion, made by dissolving in ether gun cotton saturated with alcohol, are not infringed by the use of a compound not containing oil or collodion, but containing zinc white, starch, glue, glycerine, and damar.

3. In the claim of the letters patent granted to S. A. Blake, December 24th, 1861, for an "improvement in bonnets," namely, "A bonnet, cap, or other head covering, the body of which is made of two or more thicknesses of muslin, or other suitable fabric, shaped or formed with a series of raised or embossed stripes, in imitation of straw, or other braid, by means of suitable dies, in the manner herein set forth," the word "body" means a part of the bonnet which does not include the tip or crown-piece of the bonnet, and means that part of the bonnet to which the tip is united, in the finished bonnet.

4. According to the description in the specification of the Blake patent, the product of the action of the dies is the completed body of a bonnet, embossed in imitation of straw, and fit for use as the body of a bonnet, in the shape given to it by the dies, and without further ornamenting or covering its surface, and is not merely a frame, or carcass, or skeleton, requiring to be afterwards covered or ornamented, to make its exterior surface so comely and presentable as to be salable as a bonnet, and is not merely a fabric having the completed exterior surface necessary in the bonnet salable as such, but not shaped into its ultimate shape by dies, and requiring further manipulation to put it into such ultimate shape.

[1] [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, District Judge, and by Samuel S. Fisher, Esq., and here compiled and reprinted by permission. The syllabus is from 9 Blatchf. 494, and the statement of facts from 5 Fish. Pat. Cas. 75.]

5. The proper construction of the claim of that patent is, that it claims a bonnet the body of which is embossed in imitation of straw or other braid, by dies, which, at the same time, give to it its ultimate shape, such body being made of two or more thicknesses of muslin or other suitable fabric, united by starch or other suitable adhesive and stiffening substance.

6. The article produced according to the Blake invention is new and useful, an improvement in the trade, and patentable.

7. It is an infringement of the Blake patent to make a bonnet of three thicknesses of muslin, united by starch, and shaped by dies, which, at the same time, emboss it in imitation of straw braid, although a coating is put on the muslin-frame before it is subjected to the final action of the dies.

8. A hat may infringe the Blake patent, and yet be seamless throughout.

9. The essence of the invention of Blake being, that the product of the action of the dies to which the thing is last subjected, is the completed body of the bonnet, embossed in imitation of straw, and shaped and ready for practical use, as the body of a bonnet, without further covering or ornamentation, the patent is infringed if the last embossing die gives the ultimate shape to the bonnet, although such dies may be of the same shape as a die to whose shaping action the bonnet has been previously subjected.

[In equity. Bill by Nathan A. Baldwin and others against Joseph Schultz and Leopold Hecht, for infringement of letters patent. Dismissed. On a rehearing, decree is rendered for complainants.

[Final hearing on pleadings and proofs. Suit brought on three several letters patent, the property of complainants: (1) Letters patent for an "improved fabric for hats, bonnets," etc., granted to Henry Loewenberg, February 28, 1865, assigned to the Modena Hat Company, and reissued to them April 30, 1867; (2) letters patent for an "improved compound for coating textile fabrics for manufacture of hats and bonnets," granted to L. Kendall and R. H. Trested, February 9, 1869; and (3) letters patent for an "improvement in bonnets," granted to S. A. Blake, December 24, 1861. The nature of the inventions in controversy is sufficiently set forth in the opinion.] [2]

Solomon J. Gordon, for plaintiffs.

Thomas B. Hewitt, for defendants.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. This suit is brought on three letters patent: (1) A patent granted to S. A. Blake, December 24th, 1861, for an "improvement in bonnets;" (2.) A reissued patent granted to the Modena Hat Company, as assignees of Henry Loewenberg, the inventor, April 30th, 1867, for an "improved fabric for hats, bonnets, &c.," on the surrender of an original patent granted to Loewenberg, February 28th, 1865; (3.) A patent granted to John L. Kendall and R. H. Trested, February 9th, 1869, for an "improved compound for coating textile fabrics for manufacture of hats and bonnets."

The defendants are manufacturing and selling stamped hats, made in imitation of straw braid. Such hats are made by the following process: The frame is made of three-ply buckram, that is, three thicknesses of muslin, united by starch, formed into the shape of a hat by the use of smooth, heated dies of the desired shape. The frame thus formed is then coated with a compound, made of two parts of zinc white and one part of boiled starch, to which is added a mixture of glue and glycerine, (consisting of twenty parts of dissolved glue to one part of glycerine,) equal to one-half of the quantity of starch used. After these ingredients have been thoroughly mixed together, there is added one one-hundredth part of damar, which has been previously dissolved in benzine. The whole mixture is then passed through a paint mill, and is then applied with a brush to the outside of the buckram hat frame. Two coats of the compound are thus applied, and, before the second coat has become dry, a small quantity of powdered soapstone is shaken through a sieve over the outer surface of the compound. After the hat has become dry, it is subjected to the pressure of two cold dies, which are of the same shape as the hat, except that the lower die, or female die, which comes in contact with the outer surface of the hat, is engraved in imitation of straw braid. The male die, or upper die, is smooth. The hat, with the compound upon it, is placed in the engraved female die, and a square piece of india rubber, large enough to cover the whole inner surface of the hat, and to come out beyond the brim of the hat, is laid over the inner surface of the hat. The upper, or smooth, die is then brought down with great force on the india rubber, which regulates the pressure, and makes it uniform over the entire surface of the hat. By this means, the surface which has upon it the compound, is pressed into the engraving of the female die, and takes and retains the counter shape of the female die. It is claimed, that the defendants, in making and selling hats made by the process thus described, infringe the three patents referred to.

The reissued patent of 1867 to the Modena Hat Company claims, "the new compound fabric, hereinbefore described, having substantially a foundation of interlaced threads, and a surface composed of fibrous material, stiffened by gelatinous matter, and consolidated by pressure." The specification indicates cotton flannel as a material consisting of interlaced threads covered with a fibrous material. To stiffen such material by gelatinous matter, it suggests saturating it with the glutinous solution in water of soluble glass, and drying the saturated cloth. To consolidate the material by pressure, it suggests the action on it of a die or dies placed in a suitable press. The foundation of interlaced threads is described as giving strength to the fabric. The saturated fibrous material is described as forming a pulpy layer capable of receiving and retaining a highly embossed surface. It is manifest that the defendants do not infringe this patent. Although they use muslin, which has interlaced threads, yet their fabric has no surface of fibrous material. They do not use cotton flannel, nor do they put upon their muslin an artificial surface of flock or ground cotton.

The patent of 1869, to Kendall and Trested, describes and claims, as their invention, a compound to be applied as a facing or coating to buckram frames, and similar textile fabrics, and to paper. The ingredients of this compound are stated to be, white French zinc, or its equivalent, or lead, ground in a colorless and inodorous oil, such as castor oil, and collodion, made by dissolving in ether gum cotton saturated with alcohol. The mixture forms a thin white paste, and its merit is described as consisting in the fact, that, when applied with a brush as a coating, it dries almost instantly, has a soft, polished surface, is pliable, can be struck up by dies without injuring the surface, and is water-proof. The defendants do not use this compound. Their compound contains no oil and no collodion. The patentees add to zinc white, oil and collodion. The defendants add to zinc white, starch, glue, glycerine, and damar. In using this compound, the defendants do not infringe the Kendall and Trested patent.

The serious contest in this case is as to the Blake patent. The specification of that patent says: "This invention consists in a bonnet, cap, or other head covering, the body of which is made of two or more thicknesses of muslin or other suitable fabric, united by some adhesive and stiffening substance, and shaped and formed into a series of raised stripes, by means of suitable dies, in such a manner that the sewing together of said stripes is obviated, and that such bonnet, cap or head covering is a perfect imitation of the ordinary bonnets or caps made by sewing together a large number of narrow braids of straw or embossed stripes of muslin. * * * In order to form a bonnet, I make a sheet, by uniting two pieces of muslin or other material, by means of starch or other suitable adhesive material. I prefer rice starch for this purpose, as it makes a good stiffening. I then cut from this sheet a single piece, or two pieces, of proper shape to form the bonnet and tip, and, after dampening them and putting them as nearly as practicable into form over a suitable mould or former, I subject them to the action of suitable dies, which may be inserted into a press such as represented in figure 4. The female die is provided on its inner surface with a number of creases or grooves formed according to the stripes to be produced on the bonnet. The male die is perfectly smooth on its upper surface, and it is covered with a layer of paper, mill board, or other suitable material, which, when exposed to the pressure of the female die, will readily adapt itself to the inner surface of said die, the whole being arranged similar to the machinery generally used for embossing paper, leather, etc. The blank is now placed upon the male die, and the female die is brought down by means of a screw, so that the fabric assumes the shape of the male die, and at the same time the desired stripes are embossed on its surface. When taken from the press, the surface of the fabric presents a series of stripes, a, such as represented in figures 2 and 3 of the drawing, resembling closely the stripes or braids from which ordinary straw bonnets are made. In forming a bonnet, cap or other head dress by this process, it is indispensable that the blank, which is to form the body of the bonnet or other head covering, is cut open on one side, in order to place it on the die in such a manner that all its parts are exposed to the action of the dies. The tip, which may be pressed or embossed separately from the body of the bonnet, or simultaneously with it, is cut out and inserted after the ends of the body have been joined. The embossing itself gives to the muslin or other fabric the required stiffness, and a bonnet made according to my invention is superior in lightness, and in its graceful look, to bonnets made according to the ordinary method, and, furthermore, much time is saved, since the sewing together of the several stripes is obviated. It is obvious, that, by changing the form of the dies, bonnets of different shapes, or caps, or other head coverings, can be made in a manner similar to the one above specified. I do not claim as my invention the within described manner of embossing muslin, substantially the same method having been practised long ago; but, having thus fully described my invention, what I claim as new and desire to secure by letters patent, is: A bonnet, cap, or other head covering, the body of which is made of two or more thicknesses of muslin or other suitable fabric, shaped or formed with a series of raised or embossed stripes, in imitation of straw or other braid, by means of suitable dies, in the manner herein set forth."

The first question is as to the proper construction of the claim of the Blake patent. It is to be observed, that Blake puts no coating or covering upon the exterior surface of the fabric of his head covering. The stripes are embossed directly upon one of the thicknesses of muslin. It is also to be noted, that the specification of the patent draws a distinction between the body of the bonnet and the tip or crown-piece of the bonnet. According to the language used in the specification, the body and the tip, taken together, form the bonnet. The sheet, made of two or more thicknesses of muslin, united to each other by a suitable adhesive material, is the sheet from which the body and the tip are cut, either in a single piece or in two pieces. The claim is to a bonnet, in which the body thereof is made of two or more thicknesses of fabric shaped or formed with a series of raised or embossed stripes, in imitation of straw or other braid, by means of suitable dies, in the manner set forth. The word "body," in the claim, must be construed to mean a part of the bonnet which does not include the tip, and to mean that part of the bonnet to which the tip is united in the finished bonnet. It is the "body" which is to be made of two or more thicknesses of muslin or other suitable fabric, and it is the "body" which is to be shaped or formed with a series of raised or embossed stripes, in imitation of straw or other braid, and it is the "body" which is to be so shaped or formed by means of suitable dies, in the manner set forth in the specification.

The defendants have put in evidence six prior patents, as affecting the Blake patent, to show the state of the art, as bearing on the question of the construction of the specification of that patent, and to be used to attack the novelty of Blake's invention, and to aid in determining the question of the infringement of that patent. The date of Blake's invention is shown to be the very end of the year 1859. The six patents referred to are as follows: (1.) English patent to Alexander Daninos, dated February 4th, 1829, specification enrolled August 4th, 1829, for an invention "for the manufacture of improved hats and bonnets in imitation of Leghorn straw hats and bonnets;" (2.) English patent to Richard Archibald Brooman, dated April 11th, 1854, specification enrolled October 9th, 1854, for an invention "for improvements in the manufacture of hats;" (3.) Letters patent of the United States, granted to William Osborn, August 19th, 1856, for an "improvement in machinery for pressing bonnets and bonnet frames;" (4.) English patent to Gustavus Palmer Harding, dated July 14th, 1857, specification enrolled January 14th, 1858, for an invention "for improvements in the manufacture of hats, caps and other coverings for the head;" (5.) French patent to Roger and Ledion, granted September 15th, 1859, for the inventions described in the English letters patent to Marc Antoine Francois Mennons, next mentioned; (6.) English patent to Marc Antoine Francois Mennons, dated November 13th, 1860, specification enrolled May 8th, 1861, for an invention "for an improved manufacture for coverings for the head," being a communication from Gustave Victor Roger, a resident of France.

The Daninos patent employs two or three thicknesses of woven material, glued or cemented together, and treated by a waterproof composition. The hat is made of three pieces, the brim or rim being one piece, the sides another piece, and the top or crown another piece. Each piece is embossed or figured with an imitation of the plaiting and sewing seen on the surface of a real Leghorn straw hat. The brim or rim is embossed on both sides, an engraved plate being used for each side, and the embossing being done simultaneously by the two plates. The piece for the sides is embossed by being passed between a brass roller engraved with the design and a hard-wood roller covered with pasteboard. The piece for the crown is embossed by a brass plate. The top of the sides is glued or cemented to a rim which is turned up at the outer circumference of the crown, and the sides are also cemented or glued to a rim turned up on the brim. The characteristic distinction between a hat made according to the Daninos patent and the hat claimed in the Blake patent is, that the body of the Daninos hat is not formed or shaped with embossed stripes by means of dies. The dies which act in conjunction with each other to emboss the body of the Blake hat, give it its ultimate shape at the same time that it is embossed—the shape which it has as the body of the completed hat in the completed hat.

The Brooman patent describes a waterproof hat made of two thicknesses of felt cloth, with a sheet of gutta percha between them, formed into a hat by pressure in a mould, while the gutta percha is in a plastic state. The hat is not embossed in imitation of straw or other braid, nor could it be.

The Osborn patent describes a machine to form, by the pressure of two dies, all kinds, shapes and sizes of bonnets and bonnet frames, the dies being heated, and the article being formed by a single impression. It is sufficient to say, that this patent does not describe a hat made of two or more thicknesses of fabric, nor a hat embossed to imitate straw or other braid.

The Harding patent describes a process of making hats by stamping or pressing them into form between a hollow heated matrix and a hollow heated plunger. The material is described as being "cloth, velvet, plush and other similar materials," dressed with a solution of adhesive material. The specification says, that, "where requisite, a lining may be stamped up with the cloth, at the same operation;" that a water-proof solution or composition may be "used to cause adhesion, when the lining is employed;" and that "it will be readily understood, that any pattern or device capable of being produced by stamping, may be applied to the article to be formed, by engraving or otherwise preparing the matrix and plunger, to produce the effect required." There is not in the Harding patent any suggestion of a hat embossed in imitation of straw or other braid. It is very questionable whether such an embossed imitation could be made on cloth or velvet, or plush, or other similar material, even when dressed as suggested by Harding. The vague suggestion, that any device which is capable of being produced by stamping may be applied to the hat by engraving or otherwise preparing the matrix and plunger, to produce the effect required, is too general and indefinite. The burden of proof is on the defendants, to show the actual prior existence of a bonnet or other head covering answering the description of the claim of the Blake patent; and the Harding patent fails to show this.

The Roger and Ledion patent and the Mennons patent (the latter being subsequent in date to Blake's invention) describe a hat made to imitate straw, by compressing it in an electrotyped mould. A composition is made of collodion, pulverized cotton and castor oil, forming a pasty mass. The mould is obtained by depositing copper on the outer surface of a straw hat, by the electrotype process. The specification says: "The carcase of the hat or bonnet, formed in the ordinary way, of any convenient tissue, is coated on all sides with the plastic composition above described, and left to dry, after which it is placed in the electrotyped mould," and operated upon in a press, the inside of the hat being filled with discs of vulcanized caoutchouc, which act as an elastic piston, and force the plastic matter into the interstices of the mould. The strength of the defendants' case is mainly rested on this Roger invention communicated to Mennons. Criticism is made by the plaintiffs on the Roger specification, that it gives no description, suggestion, or hint, that the body or carcase of the hat is to be made of two thicknesses of material, so as to form one compound body, such as is described in the Blake patent; and, that it teaches, that the carcase is to be formed before it is pressed between the embossing mould and the piston, and not that it is to be shaped by such pressure. To show what was understood in the art, at the date of the French patent, September, 1859, by the expression, in the specification of that patent, "the carcase of the hat or bonnet, formed in the ordinary way, of any convenient tissue," the defendants have introduced evidence proving that, as early as 1857, hat or bonnet frames were made of two or more thicknesses of muslin, stuck together by paste, and stamped into the shape of a hat by means of smooth dies, at one operation, the hat or bonnet frame, when completed, being seamless, and consisting of two or more thicknesses of muslin throughout. The frame, thus stamped into the shape of a hat, is the carcase of the hat, formed of a tissue, and must be regarded as being included in the word "carcase," as used in the Roger specification. In regard to shaping the hat, Blake says, in his specification, that he first puts the cut-out pieces as nearly as practicable into form, over a suitable mould or former. They are then shaped by the action of the dies, the fabric assuming the shape of the male or lower die, at the same time that its surface is embossed by the female or upper die. The defendants first form their carcase or frame into the shape of a hat by smooth heated dies. In that condition, it is the carcase of Roger, formed in the ordinary way, known prior to 1859, of two thicknesses of muslin, united by an adhesive and stiffening substance, and stamped into shape by smooth dies, at one operation. The defendants then coat the carcase with a compound, as Roger does. They then have two dies of the same shape as the hat, the female or lower die being engraved on its inner surface, the upper or male die being smooth, the hat being placed in the female die, the entire inner surface of the hat being covered by a piece of india-rubber, and the male die, by its pressure against the india-rubber forcing the coated surface of the hat to take and retain the counter-shape of the engraved inner surface of the female die. In substance, this is the operation performed by Roger, the only difference being, that Roger makes his piston of india-rubber or caoutchouc discs serve the purpose of the defendants' male die and piece of india-rubber combined. But, from the nature of india-rubber, these instrumentalities in the two operations are the equivalents of each other, in their action in connection with the hat frame and the female die or mould, in the process of embossing the fabric. The Roger specification speaks of the composition as being reduced to shape in the mould. So, too, the defendants reduce to shape, in their female die, the compound which has been applied in two coats to the frame. Blake does not reduce any coating to shape, for he has no coating. His embossing is made directly on the surface of the muslin. He dispenses with a coating, and says, in his specification, that "the embossing itself gives to the muslin or other fabric the required stiffness." I am unable, therefore, to perceive that the defendants, in making the hats complained of, have done anything more than they are warranted in doing by the Roger and Ledion patent, assuming, as must be done for the purposes of this case, on the wording of the stipulation entered into by the parties, that that patent antedates Blake's invention.

In view of the Roger invention, as earlier than Blake's invention, the Blake patent, in order to be upheld as a valid patent, must be construed to be limited to a hat in which the embossing is made directly on the muslin, without the intervention of any coating, the required stiffness being given by the embossing itself, without the use of a coating, and the hat being lighter, by reason of the absence of the coating. On this construction, the patent is valid, but, as the defendants use a coating, they do not infringe it.

It follows, that the bill must be dismissed, with costs.

On Rehearing.

After the foregoing decision was rendered, in September, 1871, the case was re-opened, in certain particulars, and further testimony was taken, and the case was reheard. The following decision was given in March, 1872.

George Gifford and Solomon J. Gordon, for plaintiffs.

George F. Langbein, for defendants.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. A decision was rendered in this cause, in September, 1871, on final hearing, dismissing the bill. That decision proceeded upon the ground, that the defendants had not infringed two of the three patents sued on, namely, the re-issued patent to the Modena Hat Company, of April 30th, 1867, and the patent to John L. Kendall and R. H. Trested, of February 9th, 1869. As to the third patent sued on, that to S. A. Blake, of December 24th, 1861, it was stipulated by the parties, that a French patent, granted to Roger and Ledion, September 15th, 1859, antedated the invention covered by the Blake patent, and the court held that the defendants, in making the hats complained of, had not done anything more than they were warranted in doing by the description furnished, under such stipulation, as the description contained in the Roger and Ledion patent. The court also held, that, in view of the Roger and Ledion patent, as earlier, the Blake patent, in order to be upheld as a valid patent, must be construed to be limited to a hat in which the embossing is made directly on the muslin, without the intervention of any coating, the required stiffness being given by the embossing itself, without the use of a coating, and the hat being lighter by reason of the absence of the coating; but that, on such construction, the defendants did not infringe the patent, as they used a coating.

Before any decree was entered on that decision, it was discovered by the parties, that the description on which they and the court had acted, as the description contained in the French patent to Roger and Ledion, of September, 1859, was not the description contained in that patent, but was, to a considerable extent, in substance, the description contained in a French patent granted to Roger and Ledion July 19th, 1860. The only patent to Roger and Ledion, set up in the answer as antedating the Blake invention, is that of September, 1859. By consent of the parties, and on the order of the court, the case was reopened, so far as to admit of the taking of testimony to determine whether or not the hats made by the defendants infringe the Blake patent, in view of the Roger and Ledion French patent of September, 1859, and for further argument on the question of infringement and the proper effect to be given to such French patent, in determining that question. The defendants also had leave to introduce evidence of any additional matter of defence set up in the answer, but not theretofore relied upon and presented to the court, which they might see fit. Further testimony has been taken and the case has been reheard. The conclusion having been reached, in the former decision, that, in view of what was then understood to have been the Roger and Ledion patent of September, 1859, the bill must be dismissed, there were several matters of defence developed in the proofs, which were not considered or passed upon by the court, and which are now open for consideration.

The invention of Blake is not carried back to a date earlier than December 31st, 1859. It is shown, on the part of the defendants, that, as early as 1857, hat or bonnet frames were made of two or more thicknesses of muslin, stuck together by paste, and stamped into the shape of a hat, by means of smooth dies, at one operation, the hat or bonnet frame, when completed, being seamless and consisting of two or more thicknesses of muslin throughout. It is also shown, that, in the spring of the year 1859, hats and bonnets were made out of two-ply and three-ply buckram, (that is, two or three thicknesses of muslin stuck together by starch,) covered with satin, silk or velvet, by means of dies, at one operation, so that, when finished, the hat or bonnet was of one piece, seamless, and consisted of two or three thicknesses of muslin throughout, covered all over with silk, satin or velvet. It is also shown, that it was no new thing, at the date of Blake's invention, to stamp paper, and to stamp such two and three-ply buckram, in imitation of straw braid, to be used in making bonnets, by means of flat engraved plates or dies. It is claimed, on the part of the plaintiffs, that, according to the description in the specification of the Blake patent, the product of the action of the dies is the completed body of a bonnet, embossed in imitation of straw, and fit for use as the body of a bonnet, in the shape given to it by the dies, and without further ornamenting or covering its surface; and that it is not merely a frame, or carcase, or skeleton, requiring to be afterwards covered or ornamented, to make its exterior surface so comely and presentable as to be salable as a bonnet; and, further, that it is not merely a fabric having the completed exterior surface necessary in the bonnet salable as such, but not shaped into its ultimate shape by dies, and requiring further manipulation to put it into such ultimate shape. I think these views of Blake's invention are correct, and that the proper construction of the claim of his patent is, that it claims a bonnet, the body of which is embossed, in imitation of straw or other braid, by dies, which, at the same time, give to it its ultimate shape, such body being made of two or more thicknesses of muslin or other suitable fabric, united by starch or other suitable adhesive and stiffening substance. None of the articles above mentioned as prior inventions anticipate Blake's invention, on this construction of his claim, which is the construction which, in the former decision, I adopted as the proper one, aside from what was then supposed to be shown by the Roger and Ledion patent of 1859. The article produced according to the Blake invention is new and useful, an improvement in the trade, and patentable.

The hat testified to by Shaw as existing in 1857 is too vaguely deposed to. It is not shown how it was, in fact, made. It is not produced. All that there is is the casual observation of it by a person who calls back his recollection of it fourteen years afterwards, and who says it was made, in one piece, of muslin, with a surface of paper in imitation of Leghorn braid, and that it had the appearance of having been shaped, and put into imitation of Leghorn braid, by the use of engraved dies, at one process. Such evidence cannot be admitted as sufficient to invalidate the Blake patent.

This leaves to be considered only the Roger and Ledion patent of 1859. According to the true text of that patent, now produced, there is no suggestion in it of the making of a bonnet by dies, in imitation of straw braid, out of two or more thicknesses of muslin, united into one fabric by starch or other adhesive and stiffening substance. The patent indicates the mould or die, of proper form, and arranged to produce the imitation of straw on "a fabric of flax or cotton," impregnated with pasty collodion, and speaks of making hats in that way. The patent of Blake makes it an essential point that the bonnet shall be made of two or more thicknesses of fabric, united into a sheet by starch or other suitable adhesive and stiffening material. The importance of using such stiffening material is dwelt on, and the fact that the bonnet, when embossed, has a stiffness of fabric, and, at the same time, a lightness. The evidence shows that there is an advantage, in cheapness of manufacture and in flexibility during manufacture, in using a fabric thus made of two thicknesses, over the use of a single fabric of equal thickness with the two.

The defendants' bonnet is made in the same way as the bonnet of the Blake patent, in all the features of the claim of that patent. It is made of three thicknesses of muslin, united by starch, and is shaped by dies which, at the same time, emboss it in imitation of straw braid. The fact that the defendants put a coating on the muslin frame before subjecting it to the final action of the dies, does not make the product any the less the Blake product. It is shown, that, in the defendants' bonnet, corrugations are formed in the fabric itself, by the dies, though to an extent diminished by the thickness of the coating. Adequate stiffness can be given by embossing directly on the muslin, without any coating. But the required stiffness is given when a coating is used.

There must be a decree for the plaintiffs, for a perpetual injunction and an account of profits, as respects the Blake patent, with costs, with a reference to a master to take the account.

[NOTE. The case of the same plaintiffs against Barnard, published as a note to the principal case, as reported in 9 Blatchf. 509, is reported herein, sub nom. Baldwin v. Barnard, Case No. 797.]

Case No. 805.

BALDWIN v. SIBLEY et al.

[1 Cliff. 150.][1]

Circuit Court, D. New Hampshire. Oct. Term, 1858.

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS—ASSIGNMENT—EVIDENCE.

1. The granting clause of a deed was in the following words: "Give, grant, bargain, and sell . . . . one of Baldwin's peg-splitting machines, and the right to use the same and of vending to others to be used, in the county of Cheshire, excepting the town of Hinsdale, being the same machine for which letters-patent were issued," &c. Held, the deed contained no words authorizing the grantee to construct any machine whatever; that it was a conveyance of a single machine already in existence, and of the right to use and sell that single machine within the described territory.

2. Whenever a conveyance of a right under a patent is of a character to create an interest in the patent itself, it must be shown by an instrument in writing; while a license to make and use a machine, as it is not required to be recorded, need not be in writing; but such license conveys no interest in the patent, and no power to authorize a third person to construct the patented invention.

3. Consequently, oral declarations of a patentee, not made to the defendants, which, if admitted, would show an exclusive right within a described territory, in the person through whom defendants claimed to derive their right, were held inadmissible.

4. Evidence showing that defendants had, with the plaintiff's knowledge and without objection on his part, used their machine for a number of years, was held incompetent to establish an exclusive right in the person under whom defendants claimed to derive their right to use the machine in controversy.

5. Parol proof of a lost memorandum, shown by the patentee to one of the witnesses, which memorandum contained a list of the rights sold by the patentee, and enumerated among others the conveyance of the exclusive right within a specified district to the person under whom defendants claimed, was held inadmissible.

At law. Action on the case [by Stephen K. Baldwin against Amos Sibley and Delano Sibley] for damages for an infringement of a patent right. [On motion for a new trial. Overruled.]

Stephen K. Baldwin was the patentee of a machine for cutting shoe-pegs, under letters-patent [No. 2,725] dated the 16th of July, 1842. The patent was renewed on the 8th of July, 1856, and reissued [No. 409] in the following November. The writ contained three counts, and alleged in effect the construction and putting in practice of twenty machines which imitated the invention of the plaintiff. As to everything except the using and putting in practice of one machine, the defendants pleaded the general issue, and in respect to this one they pleaded specially that after the obtaining of the letters-patent, and before the same were renewed and reissued, their machine was constructed and assigned to them for a valuable consideration, and was put in use by them, of right, by the authority and license of the plaintiff. The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff, and defendants moved for a new trial, alleging error in certain rulings of the court, and also upon the ground of misdirections to the jury. It appeared at the trial that the machine in controversy had been constructed by one Hollon Farr, under a parol license from one Sylvanus Bartlett; under which license Farr had sold the machine to the first-named defendant, who, with the other defendant, had put the machine into use. A deed from Stephen K. Baldwin to Sylvanus Bartlett was introduced by the defence, under which it was claimed that Bartlett had obtained the right to manufacture and sell any number of the machines within a certain specified territory. According to the language of the deed, the grantors gave, granted, bargained, and sold "unto Sylvanus Bartlett one of Baldwin's peg-splitting machines, and the right to use the same, and of vending to others to be used, in the county of Cheshire, excepting the town of Hinsdale in said county, being the same machine for which letters-patent were issued under the seal of the patent-office of the United States." The court, however, construed the deed to convey to the grantee but one machine, with the right to use and sell the same within the described limits, and thus instructed the jury. This ruling of the court constituted one of the grounds of the motion for a new trial. The other rulings, to which objection was taken, sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Edmund Burke, for plaintiff.

John S. Wells and Causten Browne, for defendants.

CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice. It was insisted by the counsel for the defendants that the deed, when properly construed, authorized the grantee to make and use, and vend to others to be used, any number of machines he might see fit to make and sell within the territory defined and described in the deed. To that proposition it will be sufficient to say that the deed contains no words authorizing the grantee to make and construct any machine whatever. It purports to convey one of the machines, and the right to use and sell the same within the described territory, clearly leaving it to be inferred that the machine had already been constructed, and that it constituted the principal subject-matter of the contract. By the words of the deed, therefore, it is apparent that it was a conveyance, not of the right to make and construct a machine, but of the machine itself, as already constructed and in existence, and of the right to use and sell the same within the described territory. Reliance, however, is placed upon the succeeding phrase, which it becomes important to notice, as the whole instrument must be taken together in order to ascertain its true construction. All the ambiguity, if any, arises from that phrase, which is immediately connected with the one already recited, and reads as follows: "and of vending to others to be used in the county of Cheshire, excepting the town of Hinsdale in said county." Take the language as it reads, and it is too obvious to admit of a doubt that the whole paragraph is immediately connected with the word "same," which precedes it, and refers to the machine previously conveyed in the granting part of the deed; and this is made even more evident by the concluding portion of the sentence, in which the machine conveyed is described as being the machine for which the letters-patent were issued. Every one of these considerations is inconsistent with the idea that more than one machine was conveyed; and when taken together they afford a demonstration that the proposition assumed by the counsel for the defendants on this branch of the case cannot be sustained.

Second. Evidence was offered by the defendants tending to show that Sylvanus Bartlett, prior to the construction of the machine in controversy by Farr and its sale by him to the defendant, had a license, by parol from the patentee, to make and use, and vend to others to make and use, the patented machines within the territory described in the deed. It consisted of oral declarations of the patentee made at various times before the expiration of the original term for which the patent was granted. None of these supposed declarations, however, were made to the defendants or either of them; and being objected to by the counsel for the plaintiff, they were excluded by the court. On the same point and for the same purpose, the defendants also offered to prove that they had put in practice and used their machines for ten years before the original term of the patent expired, claiming to own it, and with the knowledge of the patentee, and without objection on his part. This evidence was also objected to by the counsel for the plaintiff, as incompetent and insufficient to establish a right in Sylvanus Bartlett to authorize Farr to construct the machine in controversy and sell it to the defendants, and it was accordingly ruled out by the court. They also offered to prove on the same point, and for the same purpose, that a paper or memorandum, since lost, was given by the patentee to one of the witnesses in 1858, as and for a list of the rights which he the patentee had sold under his patent, and that the list so delivered to the witness recited that he had sold to Sylvanus Bartlett the right to make and use, and vend to others the right to make and use, the patented machines, within the county of Cheshire in this district, with the exception of the town of Hinsdale, as claimed by him in virtue of his deed. Objection was also made to this testimony by the counsel for the plaintiff, and it was excluded by the court; and these several rulings constitute the foundation of the second cause assigned for a new trial in this case. These second rulings will be considered together, as all the evidence was offered for the same purpose, as is properly stated in the motion, and the several offers of proof involved the same general considerations. It was offered to prove by parol that the patentee had conveyed the right to Sylvanus Bartlett to make and use, and vend to others the right to make and use, an indefinite number of the patented machines within the described territory. No pretence was set up at the trial that Farr had any other right or license to make and sell the machine in controversy, except what was granted to him by Sylvanus Bartlett, or that the defendants or either of them had any right or license to put the machine in practice and use it, except what they derived by the purchase of the machine from Hollon Farr. This statement embraces a summary of the exact state of facts; and the only question is, whether the rulings of the court were correct. It is admitted by the counsel for the defendants that a patent privilege or monopoly could not be assigned at common law, except by deed, for the reason that, being a franchise and part of the royal prerogative, it could only subsist by royal grant. But it is insisted that the rule is otherwise in this country; and within certain limits and subject to certain qualifications, the argument appears to be just, and may well be admitted. By the eleventh section of the patent act of the 4th of July, 1836, [5 Stat. 121,] it is provided that every patent shall be assignable in law either as to the whole interest or any undivided part thereof, by any instrument in writing; which assignment, and also every grant and conveyance of the exclusive right under any patent, to make and use, and to grant to others to make and use, the thing patented within and throughout any specified part or portion of the United States, shall be recorded in the patent office within three months from the execution thereof. Whenever a patent is renewed and extended by the commissioner of patents, it is provided by the eighteenth section of the same act that the benefit of such renewal shall extend to assignees and grantees of the right to use the thing patented to the extent of their respective interests therein. These two provisions beyond question are in pari materia, and so far as they relate to the same subject must be construed together. Most of the questions arising upon their construction, which were originally supposed to be involved in any obscurity, have been settled by the decisions of the courts; and in respect to some others which have not been so determined, the language of the respective provisions is too plain and unambiguous to admit of any serious doubt. As a general rule, an assignment of an interest in a patent must be in writing, for the reason that such transactions are required to be recorded, and in fact and reality are not authorized to be made in any other way. Gayler v. Wilder, 10 How. [51 U. S.] 493. Licenses to make and use the machine for the purposes for which it is constructed, when derived from the patentee, or from one holding a territorial right by virtue of a valid conveyance from him, are not required to be recorded, and consequently need not be in writing. Contracts not required by law to be in writing may be proved by parol evidence; and therefore a mere license to make and use the thing patented, when derived from an authorized source, may be proved in that way. Difficulties sometimes arise in determining whether, by the terms of the contract, the right conveyed in any given case amounts to an interest in the patent or is only a license to make and use the thing patented, within the principles just stated; but it seems to be well settled, that, wherever the contract is of a character to create an interest in the patent itself, it must be shown by an instrument in writing, which indeed is clearly to be implied from the very definition of assignment as generally understood in its application to patent rights. It is a grant in writing of the whole or a part of the exclusive right vested in the patentee by the letters-patent; and it makes no difference whether such part be designated as an undivided part of the whole patent, or as the grant of the exclusive right of the patentee within a particular district; for in either case it is a conveyance of an interest in the patent, and as such must be in writing, and is required to be recorded. Curt. Pat. (Ed. 1849,) pp. 233, 234. When the patentee sells to another a patented machine made by himself, or permits such other person to make the machine, the party thus authorized becomes a licensee, with the right of using and selling the machine; but he has no interest in the patent, and it is well settled that he cannot, by virtue of such a contract, authorize a third person to make the machine. All the cases agree that every grant which embraces any portion of the exclusive right under the patent is an assignment, and there can be no doubt that every such assignment must be in writing; and if so, it cannot be proved by parol evidence. Other tests have been suggested by which to determine whether a particular instrument amounts to an assignment, or only to a license; and, accordingly, it has been held that an authority conferred upon a party to make or construct the thing patented, without mentioning his assigns, is nothing more than the grant of a power or the dispensation with a right or remedy which confers only a personal right upon the licensee, and is not transmissible to any other person. Several decisions have been made upon this subject, to which it may be useful to refer as the means of elucidating the particular question involved in this branch of the motion now under consideration. Where a patentee undertook, by deed under seal, to grant, bargain, sell, convey, assign, and transfer to another, his executors, administrators, and assigns, the right and privilege of making, using, and selling the thing patented, stipulating that the grantee should have the right and privilege of manufacturing the same to the extent that six persons could accomplish the object, with the right to vend the manufactured article in any part of the United States, it was held that this was a license or authority from the patentee, and need not be recorded. Brooks v. Byam, [Case No. 1,948.] One of the reasons assigned for holding that it was a license, and that it did not create an interest in the patent. was that the exercise of the right granted was not limited to any particular locality, and the same learned judge held that the right so granted was as entirely incapable of being apportioned or divided among different persons, and therefore that an assignment, by such grantee, of a right to another to make as many of the manufactured articles as one person could prepare was void. On the other hand, it was held by the supreme court, in Wilson v. Rousseau, 4 How. [45 U. S.] 686, that an assignee of the exclusive right to use two machines within a particular district can maintain an action for an infringement of the patent within that district even against the patentee, and the same court affirmed the principle in Woodworth v. Wilson, 4 How. [45 U. S.] 716, which was decided at the same term. At the trial it was understood by the court in this case that the evidence was offered by the counsel of the defendants to set up an exclusive right within the described territory; and it is proper to say that, if such was not the intention of the counsel at the time, he failed to make himself understood by the court. Whether so or not, however, it can make no difference in the determination of the questions presented in the motion for a new trial, as, in any point of view which can be taken of the case, the evidence was not admissible. If it was offered to set up an exclusive right in Sylvanus Bartlett, then it was inadmissible; because it was an offer to prove an assignment of an interest in the patent, which, to be valid and obligatory, must be in writing, and cannot be evidenced by parol testimony; and if it was offered to set up a mere license in the supposed grantee, then the right so conferred was a mere personal right in the licensee, which could not be transmitted to Hollon Farr. Gayler v. Wilder, 10 How. [51 U. S.] 492. Such, however, was not the nature of the right set up, as clearly appears from the offers of proof and from the course of the trial. Those offers were not made until the legal effect of the deed had been ruled by the court, and the parol testimony was offered as a substitute for the authority, which, it was insisted by the counsel for the defendants, might well be derived from the terms of the deed; and no doubt is entertained that the evidence offered, if admissible, would establish an exclusive right in Sylvanus Bartlett to make and use the machines, and vend the right to make and use the same to others. One thing, however, is certain, and that is, that the defendants either set up an exclusive right in Sylvanus Bartlett, or they did not. If they did, then the right could not be established by parol testimony; and if they did not, but merely set up a license in him to make and use the patented machine, then he could not assign that right in any way to another; so that, in either point of view, this cause for a new trial is destitute of any proper legal foundation.

Third. From the course of the argument it may be inferred that very little reliance comparatively is placed upon the third cause assigned for a new trial; and, considering the nature of the action, the character of the testimony, and the state of the record, it cannot be necessary to give it any extended examination. Suffice it to say, that, in view of the pleadings and of the well-known rule of law that all are principals in tort, it cannot be sustained. Accordingly the motion for new trial is overruled, and there must be judgment on the verdict.

EMMONS, Circuit Judge. The only question necessary to notice is whether a suspension of payment of commercial paper for fourteen days, subsequent to the amendment of July fourteenth, eighteen hundred and seventy, and within six months from the filing of the petition, is per se an act of bankruptcy, when there has also been a suspension of payment of the same paper before that enactment. The learned judge of the court below held that a suspension commencing before the amendment and continued afterwards, was not affected by it, but must be governed by the original act under which it commenced; holding, also, that under the act as it stood before the amendment a suspension for fourteen days, without fraud, was not an act of bankruptcy. He dismissed the petition. We are unable to concur in either of these views. A suspension of payment for fourteen days, before the amendment, was per se an act of bankruptcy. If this were not so, we are clear that such suspension commenced before and continued after the amendment, for fourteen days, is so.

While section thirty-nine stood in its original form, a large majority of the adjudications held that under it a suspension of payment for fourteen days was per se an act of bankruptcy. In re Wells [Case No. 17,387] was a petition in invitum in the northern district of New York. The petition alleged that the respondent "being a merchant, &c., fraudulently stopped and suspended, and had not resumed payment of his commercial paper within a period of fourteen days." There was proof of the suspension, but no allegation or proof that it was fraudulent. Hall, J., says: "It was contended on the argument that this provision which authorises proceedings in invitum against any person, 'who, being a merchant, &c., has fraudulently stopped or suspended and not resumed payment within a period of fourteen days,' does not authorise such proceedings unless the original stoppage or suspension of payment was fraudulent, no matter how long such suspension may be continued." He holds that such is not the true construction of the provision, but that "its true construction requires an adjudication if a merchant, &c., who has suspended and not resumed payment of his commercial paper within a period of fourteen days, although such suspension or stoppage was not fraudulent." "The provision," he says, "embraces two cases: the one of an original, fraudulent stoppage, in which proceedings may be instituted at once, and the other of a suspension of payment, not fraudulent, and not per se an act of bankruptcy, but which, if continued for more than fourteen days, becomes an act of bankruptcy by its continuance." He applies the same rule to a petition where there was an averment of fraud in the petition. In re Weikert, [Case No. 17,361.] See, also, In re Cowles, [Id. 3,297.] In Re Thompson, [Id. 13,936,] Drummond, J., uses language which has been literally adopted by the amendment of July, eighteen hundred and seventy. Similar rulings are made in Re Sohoo, [Id. 13,162,] and Doan v. Compton, [Id. 3,940.] In Re Noyes, [Id. 10,371,] Longyear, J., in his charge, adopted and applied the doctrine. I think the opinion of Shipman, J., may be added to these. In re Ballard, [Id. 816.] Certainly he does not, as the respondents' counsel suppose, rule the other way.

A contrary construction makes the law read substantially as follows: If the merchant fraudulently suspends at all, if but for one hour, he shall be adjudged a bankrupt and the same consequence—no more, no less—shall issue if he continue this fraudulent suspension for fourteen days. All in reference to the fourteen days' suspension is thus stricken from the law. Were it necessary to sustain this petition we should reject this latter construction of the original act, and say a fourteen days' suspension was sufficient without fraud. A less number of judgments, with varying and somewhat contradictory reasons, decided that the petition must in all cases contain an averment that the stoppage was fraudulent. In re Leeds, [Case No. 8,205;] Gillies v. Cone, [Id. 3,095;] In re Davis, [Id. 3,615;] In re Lowenstein, [Id. 8,574;] In re Dibblee, [Id. 3,884.] But these same judgments, and others by the learned judge, hold that suspension by a solvent debtor is fraudulent; that the like act by an insolvent who neglects himself to go into bankruptcy is also fraudulent; and when it is added that he also holds that the omission to pay a single note at maturity is evidence of insolvency, it is not perceived that the least difference exists between the practical results of his judgments and those which simply affirm that suspension of fourteen days is per se sufficient. Substantially the same criticism may be made in reference to the decision by Field, J., in Re Jersey Window Glass Co., [Case No. 7,292.] Indeed, they who hold that the fourteen days' suspension is insufficient without fraud, create such severe tests in reference to its existence, that practically mere suspension becomes sufficient. We prefer the more direct and less technical mode of arriving at the same result, which gives all the clauses of section thirty-nine a rational meaning.

It was to terminate this apparent conflict, and enact in plain language the construction which had made the fourteen days' suspension an act of bankruptcy per se, that the amendment was passed. It is in the very words of several judgments declaring how the former clause should judicially be read. It provides that if the merchant, &c., has fraudulently stopped payment, "or has stopped or suspended and not resumed payment of his commercial paper within a period of fourteen days he shall be adjudged a bankrupt." Looking to the reading of the original enactments, its literal adoption by an amendment, and the canons of interpretation which nearly all tribunals which administer the statute have to it, as a remedial and beneficient law whose spirit of equality should be extended by liberal constructions, I think no such exception to the operation of this clause should be set up by judicial implication. A suspension of payment should not be excluded because it had commenced before its passage. 2 N. B. R. 123, [In re Locke, Case No. 8,439;] 3 N. B. R. 86, [In re Muller, Id. 9,912;] 2 Abb. 243, [Silverman's Case, Id. 12,855.] I know of no precedent for giving a purely remedial statute a wholly prospective operation unless there is something in its language or nature that imperatively demands it. The general rule is quite the other way.

It seems to us, however, that this case requires no retrospective application of the amendment. The suspension continued for months after it was adopted. It is none the less a suspension afterwards, because there was also one before. Must a creditor commence proceedings within six months from the first suspension of commercial paper? Would not the petition be sustained by showing that the debtor had fraudulently suspended within six months, even though it commenced beyond that time? Is the suspension an indivisible act that once committed is not continuing? The law is full of analogies to the contrary. Every fourteen days' suspension, no matter how often repeated or how long continued, are but successive acts of bankruptcy, and the suspension by the respondents in this case, after the amendment, we must hold to be within it. Decree below dismissing petition reversed and ordered that an adjudication of bankruptcy be entered.

The BENLEDI.

[5 Sawy. 429.] [1]

District Court, D. Oregon. March 11, 1879.

SHIPPING — CHARTER PARTY — CONSTRUCTION OF RAINY DAY CLAUSE — DEMURRAGE — BILLS OF LADING.

1. The phrase "rainy day" being of itself indefinite and uncertain, the sense in which it was used in a particular contract may, therefore, be shown by the surrounding circumstances, including the usage of the particular port or trade to which the contract relates.

2. A charter party provided that the charterers should have thirty working days, not counting "rainy days," in which to load a vessel with grain at Portland, Oregon: Held, that the phrase "rainy days" was intended to apply only to the days on which the rainfall was such as to prevent the loading of the vessel with safety and convenience—the actual facilities of the port for so doing, being considered.

3. A contract entered into in Liverpool to load a vessel with grain in Portland, Oregon, is, in contemplation of law, made at the latter place, and, therefore, the condition and conveniences of such port for loading vessels with grain, or the established usage thereof upon that subject, may be shown to explain the meaning and use of dubious and uncertain phrases in the same, as, for instance, "rainy days."

4. The person to whom a bill of lading of a cargo is made, or the indorsee thereof, has the legal property in the same free from the lien for demurrage; and, therefore, the owners of a vesssel with an overdue claim for demurrage against the charterers, for which, by the terms of the charter party, they have a lien upon the cargo, are not bound to sign unqualified bills of lading to the charterers for such cargo, until such claim for demurrage is satisfied; and if such vessel is detained in port for want of a clearance, which, by the terms of the charter party, the charterers were to obtain, but did not for want of the bills of lading, such detention is, nevertheless, the fault of the charterers in not paying the demurrage or accepting bills of lading subject to the same, and, therefore, they are liable to the owners for the damage arising from such detention.

and J. M. ten Bosch, and in rem against the cargo of the Benledi, for demurrage and for damages for detention after loading. Decree for libelants.]

Ellis G. Hughes, for libelants.,
William H. Effinger, for defendants.

DEADY, District Judge. This is a suit in rem and personam, brought by certain parties constituting the firm of Balfour, Guthrie & Co., doing business in this city as the agents of Watson Brothers, of Glasgow, against certain persons constituting the firm of Wilkins & Co., of San Francisco, and J. M. ten Bosch, of this city, and the cargo loaded here on the British ship Benledi, for eight hundred and fifty-two dollars and sixty cents for demurrage and three hundred and forty-one dollars and four cents for damages for detention of said vessel after she was loaded.

The admitted facts in the case are as follows: On April 27, 1878, the ship Benledi, owned by Watson Brothers aforesaid, was duly chartered to the defendants, Wilkins & Co., for a voyage from the port of Portland, Oregon, to a port in the United Kingdom, or on the continent between Havre and Hamburg, the charterers to load said vessel at Portland with a full cargo of wheat or flour or other lawful merchandise to be carried for a specified freight. Among other things, the charter party provided that "the lay days for loading" at Portland should commence twenty-four hours after the discharge of inward cargo, and the report of the master that he was ready to receive cargo, and continue for "thirty working days to load," excepting "rainy days," which were "not to be counted as lay days in loading;" that, "for each and every day's detention over the specified number of lay days, four pence per register ton per day, day by day, shall be paid by the" charterers to the owners or their agents as demurrage; that the cargo should be stowed under the direction of the master, but the vessel should employ the stevedores named by the charterers, at the customary rates; and that the owners should have a lien upon the cargo for all freight and demurrage due under the charter party.

The Benledi arrived at Portland in ballast, on September 17, 1878, and on the twenty-fifth of the same month the master reported that he was ready to receive cargo, and the defendant, ten Bosch, acting as the agent of said Wilkins & Co., received said vessel and commenced loading her on October 30, and completed the same on November 11 following. The libellants, as the agent of the owners, claimed that the charterers had detained the vessel ten days beyond the time specified in the charter party and regularly demanded the agreed rate of demurrage therefor, which claim the charterers, by their agent, ten Bosch, denied and refused payment of the same, whereupon the libellants refused to sign the bills of lading for the cargo, unless the demand was paid or stated to be due thereon.

The charter-party provided that the vessel should be cleared in the name of the charterers, but on account of this dispute about the bills of lading, the charterers were unable to file a manifest of the cargo in the custom-house, and thereby the vessel was detained in port four days after she was otherwise ready to go to sea.

The difference between the parties about the demurrage and the bills of lading grew out of the question, whether, of the forty-eight days that elapsed between the time the master gave notice that he was ready to receive cargo and the completion of the loading, there were ten "rainy days" within the meaning of that phrase as used in the charter-party; and upon the correct construction of the clause in which this phrase occurs depends the proper determination of this controversy.

The defendants stand, as they claim, upon the letter of the contract, and insist that a day upon which any rain falls is a "rainy day" within the terms of the contract, and therefore not to be counted as a working lay day. On the other hand, the libellants contend that mere rain-fall does not make a "rainy day" within the meaning and spirit of the agreement, but the rain-fall must be such—the subject-matter, the usage, circumstances and facilities of the port being considered—as prevents the safe and convenient loading of such cargo.

The evidence shows that there was rain-fall on two days in September, thirteen days in October, and two days in November—in all seventeen days; and that the fall ranged from 1.100 of an inch to 87.100 per day, and averaged about 26.100 or a quarter of an inch. It also appears that during all the time between September 25 and November 11, wheat was loaded by the leading shippers in this port, and it does not appear that any one who had the wheat on hand ever declined to load it on account of the weather, but the reasonable inference is to the contrary.

On the trial, the libellants offered and were permitted to introduce, subject to further argument and objection, evidence from which it appears that it is the known and established usage of this port to load wheat on rainy days, unless the rain-fall is very heavy and accompanied by a driving wind, which very seldom occurs; and that the wharves are so constructed and the facilities for loading are such, that wheat can be as safely and conveniently put on board a vessel here in ordinary wet weather as in dry. Indeed, Mr. C. H. Lewis, a leading and long-established shipper and loader, testified that in his experience, he did not remember being prevented from loading by rain but on one occasion.

Different from this, but not contrary to it or affecting the fact of the usage, the evidence introduced by the defendants showed that during the past four years there were a few instances in which parties, who did not have the wheat to put on board, claimed under charter parties similar to this, that days on which rain fell were not to be counted as working days, and such claim was either submitted to or compromised. But it is not pretended that in any instance a shipper declined to deliver wheat or a master to receive it really on account of the rainfall.

This contract, though made in Liverpool, was to be performed, so far as this controversy is concerned, in Portland, and, therefore, the presumption is, that the parties to it contracted with reference to the laws, usages and general circumstances and condition of this port, including its climate and modes and facilities of discharging and receiving cargo. In other words, the contract, so far as it was to be performed here is considered to have been made here. Andrews v. Pond, 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 77; Naylor v. Ballzell, [Case No. 10,061;] Story, Confl. Laws, § 280.

Assuming, then, as we must, that this contract, as to loading the Benledi, was made here, is it competent to prove a usage in this port to load on days of ordinary rainfall, to ascertain the intention of the parties to the agreement so far as this "rainy day" clause is concerned? The decisions of the courts upon this subject have not been uniform, but the leaning of the later cases is to limit the office of usage, and with that tendency I agree.

But cases do and must arise, where the intention of parties to a contract could not be understood unless proof was allowed of the usage on the subject with reference to which it was made. And this is especially so in the case of mercantile contracts, and particularly the one styled a charter-party. The rule is laid down in Abb. Shipp. 250, 274, that the construction of a charter party "should be liberal, agreeable to the real intention of the parties, and conformable to the usage of trade in general, and of the particular trade to which the contract relates;" and this is cited with approbation by the supreme court in Raymond v. Tyson, 17 How. [58 U. S.] 59, in which Mr. Justice Wayne says: "That a charter party is an informal instrument as often as otherwise, having inaccurate clauses, and on this account they must have a liberal construction, such as mercantile contracts usually receive, in furtherance of the real intention of the parties and usage of the trade."

In The Reeside, [Case No. 11,657,] Mr. Justice Story says: "The true and appropriate office of a usage or custom is, to interpret the otherwise indeterminate intentions of parties, and to ascertain the nature and extent of their contracts, arising, not from express stipulations, but from mere implications and presumptions, and acts of a doubtful and equivocal character. It may also be admitted to ascertain the true meaning of a particular word or of particular words in a given instrument, when the word or words have various senses, some common, some qualified, and some technical, according to the subject-matter to which they are applied." See, also, U. S. v. Robinson, [Case No. 16,177;] 13 Wall. [80 U. S.] 363.

Finally, in the well-considered case of Barnard v. Kellogg, 10 Wall. [77 U. S.] 390, the supreme court lays down the rule: "The proper office of a custom or usage in trade is to ascertain and explain the meaning and intention of the parties to a contract, whether written or in parol, which could not be done without the aid of this extrinsic evidence. It does not go beyond this, and is used as a mode of interpretation, on the theory that the parties knew of its existence, and contracted with reference to it. It is often employed to explain words or phrases in a contract of doubtful signification, or which may be understood in different senses according to the subject-matter to which they are applied. But if it be inconsistent with the contract, or expressly or by necessary implication contradicts it, it cannot be received in evidence to affect it."

The phrase "rainy day" has no definite and certain meaning. It may be used and understood in many senses. In common parlance, it varies in signification from the day with light, passing April showers to the steady and strong pourdown of an Oregon December. Worcester defines "rainy" as follows: "Abounding in rain; showery; wet;" and Webster's definition is the same. But the definition, while it fixes some limit to the signification of the term, as that a rainy day is a wet one, and therefore not a dry one, does not free the matter from the uncertainty which is inherent in the expression.

Taken literally, in my judgment, the phrase "rainy day" means nothing less than a day of rain—a day on which rain falls during every moment of the period. Otherwise, the day is not wholly a rainy day but only partly so. Strictly speaking, as well say that a few minutes of sunshine make a fair day as that a shower makes a rainy one. Colloquially, it may be often used to describe a day upon which at least a moderate rainfall occurs during the greater portion of the time.

During a period of six years from 1873 to 1878 inclusive, as appears from the record of observations in the office of the signal service in this city, the days upon which any rain fell numbered from one hundred and fifty-one to one hundred and seventy-two a year, the average being one hundred and sixty-two days; and the total rain-fall during the same period ranged from 46.17 to 60.08 inches a year, the average being 52.96 inches; while the average fall per day for each of such years varied from 0.28 to 0.34 inches, the average fall per day for the whole period being 0.33 inches or one third of an inch. The greatest rain-fall on any one day in such years varied from 1.66 to 3.05 inches, and the average of such days was 2.33 inches.

Judged by these figures the rain-fall upon the days in question was relatively very light, it being only one quarter of an inch per day as against one third of an inch for the past six years, which latter computation includes many days—fifteen in 1878, upon which the rain-fall was inappreciable or too small to be measured. Yet, the fact is, the phrase when used abstractly and without reference to the surrounding circumstances is altogether indefinite and uncertain. To say simply that a day is a rainy one is almost as vague an expression as that a thing is as big as a piece of chalk or as long as a string.

A contract to plow, ditch or cut wood, "rainy days" excepted, would not be understood or construed as would a contract to harvest grain, "rainy days" excepted. Reference being had to the subject-matter, it would be manifest that the parties had not the same degree of rain-fall in view in making the last contract as the others, because they could be conveniently performed in weather in which the moisture would make it unsafe and unfit to harvest. In short, the phrase is one which may be used in different senses according to the nature of the subject-matter concerning which it is applied, and therefore may, according to the uniform doctrine of the authorities, be explained by usage where one exists. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 292. The established usage in this port being to load wheat on all such days as rain fell upon, between September 25 and November 11, 1878, and it being presumed that the parties used this phrase in the contract with a knowledge of this usage, it follows that within the meaning of such contract and the intention of the parties thereto, there were no rainy days within the time allowed for loading the Benledi, nor in fact during any of the time she was in port.,

But I think the same conclusion may be reached, without invoking this usage, as such. The charter is a written contract which the court must construe. If it contains any vague or dubious terms or provisions, the court in ascertaining what the parties understood and intended thereby may consider the contract in the light of the surrounding circumstances. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 277. As declared in section 686 of the Oregon Civil Code: "For the proper construction of an instrument the circumstances under which it was made, including the situation of the subject of the instrument, and of the parties to it, may also be shown, so that the judge may be placed in the position of those whose language he is to interpret."

This contract was made in Liverpool to be performed in Oregon. By it the charterers agreed to load the Benledi with wheat at Portland, the vessel to lay here for that purpose at the expense of the owners, for thirty working days, that is thirty days, excluding holidays, and longer if need be, at the expense of the charterers. But if after the working days commenced "rainy days" should occur, they were not to be counted. Now what was the object of this exception. Certainly not to enable the charterers to compel this vessel to lie here every day that any rain fell between September and May, six months it may be, at the expense of the owners, while they were waiting for a fall in the price of wheat to purchase a cargo cheaply. The only object in giving thirty working lay days to the charterers was to enable them to purchase a cargo and get it on board and a rainy day which would materially interfere with this purpose was to be excepted therefrom. Of course, the rain fall could not interfere with the purchase of cargo and therefore it can only be considered as affecting the loading of the same, supposing the charterer had the wheat on hand.

The burden of proof is upon the charterer to show that there were such days. The parties are presumed to have had in mind the known condition of things at this port when the contract was made, and contracted with reference to it; for instance, that there were covered wharves here from which cargo could be, and commonly was, safely and conveniently loaded in all ordinary rainy weather. The phrase "rainy day," then, as used in this contract, and as both parties to it must have understood it, means a day on which cargo could not be safely and conveniently loaded at this port.

Contracts must have a reasonable construction; and when they contain ambiguous or doubtful expressions these should be taken in that sense which best agrees with the general purpose of the contract. Chit. Cont. 74.

The much greater portion of the yearly mean number of days—one hundred and sixty-two, or over five months—on which some rain fell in the last six years, occurred in the usual season for shipping wheat from Portland for foreign ports. Under the construction claimed for this contract by the defendants, it would be in the power of the charterers in such a charter-party to detain a vessel here at the expense of the owners, from three to four months beyond the usual lay days, or the time deemed necessary for purchasing a cargo and putting it on board, simply because they had no cargo to deliver, and desired to wait for a more favorable market to purchase in. Now nothing is plainer than that the owners did not contemplate any such risk or any such delay as this, and nothing can be more unreasonable than to suppose that the parties to this contract ever intended to make any such one-sided and unjust agreement.

It may not be amiss to notice the fact, as strengthening this conclusion, if there can be any doubt about it, that this charter-party is a long printed formula, composed of disjointed and independent clauses intended for use in any part of the world, and particularly San Francisco, where, until lately at least, on account of the rarity of rain, there were no suitable conveniences for loading grain in wet weather. But the same forms appear to be used for any place, by striking out and inserting clauses to adapt them to the particular port for which they are then intended, and are usually very inaccurate and incomplete, and ought to be construed liberally in support of what appears to have been the real intention of the parties. Raymond v. Tyson, [17 How. (58 U. S.) 59.] Printed formulas are always general in their nature, so as to be used by different contracting parties, for similar subjects, but they do not contain the actual and immediate language of the parties thereto, as in the case of an agreement reduced to writing pro re nata, and therefore are not supposed to express the understanding and intention of the parties with the precision and completeness of a written agreement. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 278. The claim for demurrage must be allowed.

The demand for damages for four days' detention after the cargo was on board, rests upon the right of the libellants to retain the bills of lading until the demand for demurrage was satisfied, or to sign them subject to it, and of this I think there can be no doubt. The legal property in the cargo is in the person to whom the bills of lading are made or indorsed. The Thames, 14 Wall. [81 U. S.] 108; The Vaughan and Telegraph, Id. 266. Had the libellants given Wilkins & Co. clean bills of lading, the latter might have transferred them to third persons at once, as they intended to do, and thereby they would have lost their lien on the cargo for the demurrage. This they were not required to do. The claim for damage is also allowed. The defendants made a counter-claim for two thousand six hundred and nine dollars and thirty-one cents damages, on the ground of being kept out of the use of the money for which they might have disposed of the cargo of the Benledi, but for the withholding of the bills of lading. But as the libellants were justified in detaining the bills, they are not liable therefor.

There must be a decree for the demurrage —eight hundred and fifty-two dollars and sixty cents, with interest from November the eleventh—four months—twenty-eight dollars and forty-one cents, and for the damages for detention at Astoria, three hundred and forty-one dollars and four cents, with interest from November the twenty-fifth—three and one half months—ten dollars and six cents—in all, one thousand two hundred and thirty-two dollars and twenty-one cents, with costs and disbursements.

BALFOUR'S LESSEE v. MEADE.

[1 Wash. C. C. 18;[1] 4 Dall. 363.]

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. April Term, 1803.

PUBLIC LANDS — TITLE DERIVED FROM PENNSYLVANIA — ACTUAL SETTLEMENT — WARRANTS OF ACCEPTANCE.

1. To constitute a settlement upon lands in "the new purchase," under the provisions of the ninth section of the act of the legislature of Pennsylvania, passed April 3d, 1792; there must be an occupancy, accompanied by a bona fide intention immediately to reside upon the land, either personally or by a tenant; and without this, the mere improvement of the land, is of no importance; except as evidence of an intention to settle.

2. The proviso of the 9th section of the act, applies only to those who had an incipient title at some time by actual settlement, preceding the necessity which obliged them to require the benefit of the proviso; or by warrant; and such settlement, if so made, would be sufficient, although it were prevented, by the existence of hostilities, from being such a one as this section requires, by the occasion mentioned in the proviso.

3. Who is an actual settler to whom a warrant may issue, under the law. Actual settlement, under the 9th section, consists in clearing, fencing, and cultivating two acres of land, at least, on each 100 acres; erecting a house thereon, fit for the habitation of man, and a residence continued for five years, &c.

4. The survey made for the plaintiff in this case, gave no title, because—1. it was not a returnable survey; 2. it was not authorized by a warrant; 3. it was not made for an actual settler; 4. it was not made by an authorized surveyor.

5. A warrant of acceptance gives no title under the law, it not having been founded on a settlement.

6. The dismissal of the caveat filed by the defendant, did not settle the question of title, but left the same to be decided by an ejectment if brought within six months.

At law. This was an ejectment for four tracts of land, lying north and west of the Ohio and Alleghany rivers and Conewango creek in Pennsylvania. The plaintiff's title rested upon settlement rights, surveys, and warrants. In 1793, the plaintiff was a surgeon in the army, in garrison at Fort Franklin. He took some of the soldiers, went out, cut down a few trees, and built up five pens or cabins, about ten feet square; and without putting covers on them, returned back to the fort in about six or seven days. In April 1795, he had these five tracts surveyed in the name of himself, Elizabeth Balfour, and four others, each four hundred acres. The deputy surveyor had, upon application of the plaintiff, directed one Wilson to make the survey, but something preventing him from doing it, the plaintiff employed one Steel to do so, and upon returning the surveys to Stokely, he prevailed upon him to write an authority to

[1] [Originally published from the manuscripts of Hon. Bushrod Washington, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, under the supervision of Richard Peters, Esq.]

Steel to make the survey, which Stokely says he did, and antedated it, in order to make it appear to precede the survey. In May 1795, he obtained warrants of acceptance for two of the surveys of two of the tracts, having paid the consideration money for the whole.

In autumn 1794, Meade the defendant, finding no person settled upon these lands, built cabins upon the four tracts in controversy, covered them, or some of them, and then went off, not returning again until November 1795, when he came with his family to reside in one of the cabins, and fixed settlers upon the other tracts. In July 1795, the plaintiff gave notice to the defendant that he claimed the lands in question, that he intended to settle them, and forewarned him to proceed farther with his improvements thereon. In January 1796, the defendant caveated the plaintiff in form; and the same being tried before the board of property in March 1800, the caveats were dismissed, and warrants were ordered to issue; but they never did issue, in consequence of doubts afterwards existing respecting the plaintiff's title. In April 1796, the plaintiff made engagements with some persons to settle these lands for him; but after they had seen and approved the lands, they declined going on them, upon hearing of the defendant's claim. It was in proof by many witnesses, that the war with the Indians rendered it dangerous to settle in that country during the years 1793, 1794, and 1795, and that but few settlements were attempted before the spring or summer of 1796.

Mr. Dallas and Mr. Edward Tilghman contended, that the plaintiff had acquired a good right by settlement, survey, and warrant, to the lands in question, under the laws of Pennsylvania, and particularly the act of the 3d of April 1792, 3 vol. 209; and that the settlement of Meade in 1795, was in violation of the plaintiff's prior right, and of course void. That the plaintiff had been prevented by the Indian hostilities from settling or fixing settlers until the peace of Fort Grenville, made in August 1795, was ratified; in December 1795; and that he had attempted it in a reasonable time after that event. They cited [Fothergill v. Stover,] 1 Dall. [1 U. S.] 6; [McCurdy v. Potts,] 2 Dall. [2 U. S.] 98; [Sims v. Irvine,] 3 Dall. [3 U. S.] 457; Add. 216, 218, 354.

Mr. Ingersoll and Mr. M'Kean contended, that the plaintiff never had made a settlement within the meaning of the law, not having accompanied it with actual residence or intention to reside; that of course he never had an inceptive title to be protected, by the proviso in the 9th section of the act of 1792. They cited Add. 248, 335; the case of the Holland Co. v. Cox, in the supreme court of this state; and the decisions of the judges of that court, in a feigned issue tried at Sunbury.

The case was argued very much at length (beginning on Saturday and not ending before Tuesday at 2 o'clock, the court sitting until 9 o'clock at night on Saturday and Monday,) and with great abilities on both sides.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice, charged the jury. The importance of this cause led the court to wink at some irregularities in the argument of it at the bar, which has tended to protract it to an unreasonable length. Depending upon the construction of the laws of this state, and particularly on that of the 3d of April, 1792, it had at first the appearance of a difficult and complicated case. It is not easy at the first reading of a long statute to discover the bearings of one section upon another, so as to obtain a distinct view of the meaning and intention of the legislature. But the opinion I now entertain was formed on Saturday before we parted, open however as it always is, to such alterations as ulterior reason and argument may produce.

The better to explain and to understand this subject, it will be necessary to take a general view of the different sections of the [Pennsylvania] act of the 3d of April, 1792, upon which this cause must turn. The first section reduces the price of all vacant lands, not previously settled or improved, within the limits of the Indian purchase made in 1768, and all precedent purchases, to fifty shillings for every hundred acres; that of the vacant lands within the Indian purchase made in 1784, lying east of Alleghany river and Conewango creek, to five pounds; to be granted to purchasers in the manner authorized by former laws.

The second section offers for sale all the other lands of the state, lying north and west of the Ohio, Alleghany, and Conewango, to persons who will cultivate, improve, and settle the same, or cause it to be done, at the price of seven pounds ten shillings per hundred acres; to be located, surveyed, and secured, as directed by this law. It is to be remarked, that all the above lands lie in different districts, and are offered at different prices. Title to any of them may be acquired by settlement, and to all except those lying north and west of the Ohio, Alleghany, and Conewango, by warrant without settlement.

The third section, referring to all the above lands, authorizes applications to the secretary of the land office, by any person having settled and improved, or who was desirous to settle and improve a plantation, to be particularly described, for a warrant for any quantity of land not exceeding four hundred acres; which warrant is to authorize and require the surveyor general to cause the same to be surveyed and to make return of it, the grantee paying the purchase money and fees of office. The eighth section, which I notice in this place because intimately connected with the third section, directs the deputy surveyor to survey and mark the lines of the tract, upon the application of the settler. This survey, I conceive, has no other validity than to furnish the particular description which must accompany the application at the land office for a warrant.

The fourth section, amongst other regulations, protects the title of an actual settler against a warrant entered with the deputy surveyor posterior to such actual settlement.

The ninth section, referring exclusively to the lands north and west of the Ohio, Alleghany, and Conewango, declares, that "no warrant or survey of lands within that district shall give a title, unless the grantee has, prior to the date of the warrant, made or caused to be made, or shall within two years after the date of it make or cause to be made, an actual settlement, by clearing, fencing, and cultivating, two acres at least in each hundred acres, erecting thereon a house for the habitation of man, and residing or causing a family to reside thereon for five years next following his first settling the same, if he shall so long live; and in default of such actual settlement and residence, other actual settlers may acquire title thereto."

Let us now consider this case as if the law had stopped here. A title to the land in controversy lying north and west of the Ohio, Alleghany, and Conewango, could be acquired in no other manner but by actual settlement. No sum of money could entitle a person to a warrant, unless the application was preceded by actual settlement on the land; or if not so preceded by actual settlement, the warrant would give no title unless it were followed by such settlement within two years thereafter. The question then is, what constitutes such an actual settler, within the meaning and intention of this law, as will vest in him an inceptive title, so as to authorize the granting to him a warrant? Not a pedis positio—not the erection of a cabin—the clearing, or even the cultivation of a field: these acts may deserve the name of improvements, but not of settlements. There must be an occupancy, accompanied with a bona fide intention to reside and live upon the land, either in person or by that of his tenant;—to make it the place of his habitation, not at some distant day, but at the time he is improving; for if this intention be only future, either as to his own personal residence, or that of a tenant; then the execution of that intention by such actual residence fixes the date of the commencement of the settlement, and the previous improvements will stand for nothing in the calculation. The erection of a house, and the clearing and cultivating the ground, all or either of them, may afford evidence of the quo animo with which it was done—of the intention to settle; but neither, nor will all, constitute a settlement, if unaccompanied by residence. Suppose these improvements made. the person making them declaring at the time that they were intended for purposes of temporary convenience, and not with a view to settle and reside. Could this be called an actual settlement, within the meaning and intention of the legislature? Surely not. But though such acts, against the express declarations of the quo animo, will not make a settlement, it does not follow that the converse of the proposition will; for a declaration of intention to settle, without actually carrying that intention into execution, will not constitute an actual settlement.

How do these principles apply to the case of the plaintiff? In 1793 he leaves the fort at which he was stationed, and in which he was an officer, with a few soldiers, cuts down some trees, erects four or five pens, (for not being covered, they do not deserve the name of cabins,) and in five, six or seven days, having accomplished the work, he returns to the fort to his former place of residence. Why did he retreat so precipitately? We hear of no danger existing at the time of completing those labours, which did not exist during the time he was engaged in them. What prevented him from proceeding to cover the cabins, and from inhabiting them? Except the state of general hostility which existed in that part of the country, there is no evidence of a particular necessity for flight, in the instance of this plaintiff. It is most obvious, that the object of his visit to this wilderness was to erect what he considered to be improvements, but they were in fact not inhabitable by a human being, and consequently could not have been intended for a present settlement. He was besides an officer in the army, and whilst in that service he could not settle and reside in his cabins, although the country had been in a state of perfect tranquillity. In short, his whole conduct, both at that time and afterwards—his own statements when asserting a title to the land—the recitals in his warrants of acceptance and certificates of survey,—all afford proof, which is irresistible, that he did not mean in 1793 to settle. Mistaking the law, as it seems many others have done in this respect, he supposed that an improvement was equivalent to a settlement, for vesting a right to those lands. It is not pretended, even now, nor is it proved by a single witness—not even by Crouse, who assisted in making the improvements—that he contemplated a settlement. It has been asked, could the legislature have meant to require persons to set down, for a moment, on land encompassed by dangers from a savage enemy? I answer, no: at such a time, it was very improbable that men would be found rash enough to make settlements. But yet no title could be acquired without such a settlement; and if men were found hardy enough to brave the dangers of a savage wilderness, they might be called imprudent men, but they would also deserve the promised reward, not for their boldness, but for their settlement. The first evidence we have of an intention in the plaintiff to make an actual settlement, was in the spring of 1796, long after the actual bona fide settlement of the defendant with his family; for I give no credit to the notice from the plaintiff to the defendant in July 1795, since so far from accompanying it with actual settlement, he speaks of a future settlement, which however was never carried into execution. Every thing which I have said, with respect to the four hundred acres surveyed in the name of George Balfour, will apply, a fortiori, against the three other surveys in the names of Elizabeth Balfour, and the other warrantees, who it is not pretended were ever privy even to the making of the cabins, or ever contemplated a settlement upon those lands.

If the law then had stopped at the proviso, it is clear that the plaintiff never made such a settlement as would entitle him to a warrant. But he excuses himself from having made such a settlement as the law required, by urging the danger to which any person, attempting a residence in that country, would have been exposed. He relies on the proviso to the ninth section of the law, which declares, that "if any such actual settler, or any grantee in any such original or succeeding warrant, shall by force of arms of the enemies of the United States, be prevented from making such actual settlement, or shall be driven therefrom, and shall persist in his endeavours to make such actual settlement as aforesaid; then, in either case, he and his heirs shall be entitled to have and to hold the said lands, in the same manner as if the actual settlement had been made and continued." Evidence has been given of the hostile state of that country during the years 1793, 1794, and 1795, and the danger to which settlers would have been exposed. We know that the treaty at Fort Grenville was signed in August 1795, and ratified in December of the same year. Although Meade settled with his family in November 1795, it is not conclusive proof that there was no danger even then; and at any rate it would require some little time and preparation, for those who had been driven off to return to their settlements; and if the cause turned upon the question whether the plaintiff had persevered in his exertions to return and make such settlement as the law requires, I should leave that question to the jury, upon the evidence which they have heard.

But the plaintiff, to entitle himself to the benefit of the proviso, should have had an incipient title at some time or other; and this could only have been created by actual settlement, preceding the necessity which obliges him to seek the benefit of the proviso, or by warrant. I do not mean to say, that he must have had such an actual settlement as this section requires to give a perfect title; for if he had built a cabin, and commenced his improvements in such manner as to afford evidence of a bona fide intention to reside, and had been forced off by the enemy at any stage of his labours; persevering at all proper times afterwards in endeavours to return when he might safely do so; he would have been saved by the proviso. But it is incumbent on the plaintiff, if he would excuse himself, from the performance of what has been correctly called a condition precedent, to bring himself fully and fairly within the proviso which was made for his benefit. This he has not done.

Decisions in the supreme court, and in the common pleas of this state, have been cited at the bar; two of which I shall notice, for the purpose of pointing out the peculiar marks which distinguish them from the present, and to prevent any conclusions being drawn, from what has been said, either to countenance or to impeach those decisions. The cases I allude to are: the Holland Co. v. Cox; and the feigned issue tried at Sunbury.

The incipient title under which the plaintiffs claim in those causes, were warrants, authorized by the third section of this law: the incipient title in the present case is settlement. The former was to be completed by settlement, survey, and patent, these to precede the warrant: and for the better explanation of this distinction, it will be important, to ascertain what acts will constitute an actual settler to whom a warrant may issue, and what constitute an actual settlement as the foundation of a title. I have before explained, who may be an actual settler to demand a warrant—namely, one who has gone upon and occupied land with a bona fide intention of an actual present residence; although he should have been compelled to abandon his settlement, by the public enemies, in the first stages of his settlement. But actual settlement intended by the ninth section, consists in clearing, fencing, and cultivating, two acres of ground, at least, on each hundred acres; erecting a house thereon for the habitation of man, and a residence of five continued years next following his first settling, if he shall so long live. This kind of settlement more properly deserves the name of improvements, as the different acts to be performed clearly import. This will satisfactorily explain what at first appeared to be an absurdity in that part of the proviso, which declares, that "if such actual settler shall be prevented from making such actual settlement." The plain meaning is, that if a person has once occupied land with an intention of residing, though he has neither cleared nor fenced any land, and is forced off by the enemies of the United States, before he could make the improvements, and continue thereon for five years, having once had an incipient title, he shall be excused by the necessity which prevented his doing what the law required, and in the manner required. Or if the warrant holder, who likewise has an incipient title, although he never put his foot upon the land, shall be prevented by the same cause from making those improvements, &c.; he too shall be excused, if, as is required also of the settler, he has persevered in his endeavours to make those improvements, &c.

But what it becomes such a grantee to do, before he can claim a patent, or even a good title, is quite another question, upon which I give no opinion.

As to the plaintiff's surveys and warrants, they cannot give him a title. Not the surveys; First, because they are a mere description of the land, which the surveyor is authorized by the eighth section to make, and the applicant for the warrant is directed by the third section to lodge in the land office at the time he applies for a warrant. It is merely a demarcation or special location of the land, intended to be appropriated; and gives notice of the bounds thereof, that others may be able to make adjoining locations without danger of interference. This is not such a returnable survey, so as to lay the foundation of a patent. Second, It is not authorized by a warrant. Third, It was not done for an actual settler. Fourth, It was not made by an authorized surveyor, if you believe upon the evidence that the authority to Steel was antedated, and given after the survey was returned.

Not the warrant—First. Because it was not a warrant of title, but of acceptance. Second. It is not founded on settlement, but improvement; and if it had recited the consideration to be actual settlement, the recital would have been false in fact, and could have produced no legal or valid consequence.

As to the caveat; the effect of it was to close the doors of the land office against the further progress of the plaintiff in perfecting his title. The dismission of it again opened the door; but still the question as to title is open for examination in ejectment, if brought within six months, and the patent will issue to the successful party.

The plaintiff therefore having failed to show a title sufficient to enable him to recover in this action, it is unnecessary to say any thing about the defendant's title, and your verdict ought to be for the defendant.

The jury found for the defendant.

Case No. 809.

The BALIZE.

[1 Brown, Adm. 424.][1]

District Court, E. D. Michigan. June, 1872.[2]

WAGES—SEASON OF NAVIGATION — DESERTION—FORFEITURE—MITIGATING CIRCUMSTANCES.

1. Where a seaman is hired at a certain sum "for the season" of navigation, the presumption is, that the service is for the entire season.

2. The "season of navigation" as understood upon the lakes, comprises the eight months commencing April 1st, and ending November 30th.

3. Leaving a vessel before the expiration of the time of service, without the consent of the master, with the intention not to return, constitutes desertion by the maritime law.

[See The Union, Case No. 14,347; Cloutman v. Tunison, Id. 2,907; The Catawanteak, Id. 2,510.]

4. Such desertion works a forfeiture of all antecedent wages, unless a reasonable excuse be shown, founded upon gross misconduct or harsh usage.

5. Slight and transient causes, such as the fact that the meat used on board was for a short time slightly tainted, do not constitute such an excuse as to relieve from forfeiture.

[See Ulary v. The Washington, Case No. 14,323; Magee v. The Moss, Id. 8,944; Coffin v. Weld, Id. 2,953; Relf v. The Maria, Id. 11,692; Coffin v. Jenkins, Id. 2,948.]

In admiralty. Libel of George M. Granger [against the tug Balize] for seaman's wages. [Dismissed.]

The libel set forth the hiring of libellant to serve as sailing master on the tug Balize, at the rate of $1,200 for the season, and five per cent. commission on the net earnings of the tug; that in pursuance of this contract, he entered into the service of the tug about the first of March, and so served until the twentieth of July, and claimed a balance due him of $860.10. The answer admitted the performance of the service substantially as set forth in the libel, but claimed that libellant agreed to serve for the entire season, and that the commission should not exceed three hundred dollars; that he deserted the tug on the twentieth of July, and took with him the mate, two wheelsmen, and the lookout, and that by reason of his desertion, claimants suffered damage in about the sum of $5,000. [For subsequent course of litigation, see note at end of case.]

H. B. Brown, for libellant.

The agreement to serve at $1,200 per season, and five per cent. commission, does not legally import a hiring for the entire season, but for an indefinite time, giving either party the power to terminate the same at pleasure, provided the time and place be reasonable. Heim v. Wolf, 1 E. D. Smith, 70; White v. Atkins, 8 Cush. 367; Rossiter v. Cooper, 23 Vt. 522.

Libellant's leaving the vessel was no desertion as understood by the maritime law. The rigid doctrine of desertion, as administered upon the ocean, has no application to contracts by the season, or service upon harbor tugs; certainly not to persons acting in the capacity of master. But whether this be so or not, claimants ought only to be permitted to recoup the damages actually suffered by his leaving the tug, for nothing is better settled than that desertion does not necessarily work a forfeiture of the entire wages.

2 Pars. Shipp. 94, 100, note 5; Swain v. Howland, [Case No. 13,661;] Macomber v. Thompson, [Id. 8,919;] The Maria, [Id. 9,074;] The Moslem, [Id. 9,875;] The Mentor, [Id. 9,427;] Gladding v. This court should proceed by analogy to a court of common law, and award libellant what his services were really worth to respondents.

Although the court may hold that the unwholesome food furnished by the owner, and his interference in the management of the boat, was not such as to justify a desertion in the ordinary sense of the term, still I claim this may be considered by the court in palliation of the offense, if for these reasons the position of libellant was rendered uncomfortable and disagreeable to him.

An attempt was made to prove a large amount of damage suffered by the claimants, but it failed completely, and was virtually abandoned. There is not a particle of evidence showing that he induced others to leave with him.

Libellant's services in fitting out the vessel, and his board during that time, were all under his contract to serve as sailing master, were incidental and subsidiary to it, and he is entitled to recover for them, though he could not maintain a suit in admiralty for them as an independent cause of action. Libellant is also entitled to recover here his commission upon the earnings which were given him incidentally as part payment for his services. The old doctrine of the English courts, that denied jurisdiction in admiralty wherever a special agreement existed between the seamen and master, was wholly overthrown in Coffin v. Jenkins, [Case No. 2,948,] and since that case was decided, American courts have repeatedly taken cognizance of these claims. Reed v. Hussey, [Id. 11,646;] Tompkins v. The obligation to provide proper food, renders it necessary that the master should provide such food as is usual in vessels engaged in that kind of business. The Cyrus, [Id. 3,930;] Foster v. Sampson, [Id. 4,982;] The Mary Paulina, [Id. 9,224;] Collins v. Wheeler, [Id. 3,018.]

Mr. W. A. Moore, for claimants.

LONGYEAR, District Judge. There was no disagreement between the parties, at the hearing, that the wages of libellant were to be at the rate of $1,200 for the season of navigation, and five per cent. on the net proceeds of the earnings of the tug, but not to exceed $300 in addition to the $1,200. The only matter in dispute in this regard was, whether libellant had the right to leave at any time before the close of the season of navigation, the libellant contending that he had such right, and respondents contending that he had not. The rate of wages being by the season, the presumption is that the service was to be for the entire season. If the contract was different from that, and libellant was to have the right to leave at any time, the burden was upon him to prove it. Libellant testified that he was to have that right. Thomas Murphy, master and part owner of the tug, with whom the contract was made, testified that such was not the contract, that, in fact, nothing of that kind was mentioned. These witnesses being equally interested, and standing in other respects equally fair, the evidence is equally balanced, and the proposition of libellant is not sustained. The case must, therefore, proceed on the basis of a contract to serve for the entire season. The proofs showed that libellant left the service of the tug without consent, and with the intention not to return, before the close of the season; the defense of desertion, therefore, is pertinent, which defense it now remains to consider.

"The season of navigation," as understood here upon the lakes, comprises the eight months commencing April 1 and ending November 30. A contract, therefore, for the season of navigation, whether for wages or otherwise, must be presumed to have been intended to cover that period of time, where nothing to the contrary appears. The contract in this case, therefore, commenced to run April 1, notwithstanding, as appeared by the proofs, the tug did not go into commission and commence running until about April 25. It is in proof that libellant left the vessel, as above stated, July 20. His wages during that period, April 1 to July 20 (three months and twenty days), at $1,200 for the season of eight months would be $550. The five per cent. on the net proceeds was limited by the contract, as we have seen, to $300 in the aggregate, for the entire season. As it was in proof that the five per cent. exceeded that amount, the pro rata share for the three months and twenty days libellant served would be $137 50. This, added to the $550, would make $687 50 pro rata of the wages agreed upon applicable to the time of actual service. From this we would have to deduct $110 paid libellant while he remained in service, leaving a balance of $577 50 as the extent to which libellant would be entitled to recover in any event. Libellant served one month before the 1st of April, when, as we have seen, his contract commenced to run, overseeing repairs on the tug at Detroit, the home port, and he claims to recover also for that at the contract price. But it clearly did not come within the time limited by the express terms of the contract—the season of navigation; neither did it constitute any part, as incidental or otherwise, of the duties he contracted to perform, viz., those of pilot, or sailing master. Inasmuch, therefore, as that service did not come under the contract, and as at that time there was no lien and no process in rem on account of such service, no allowance could be made for it in the present form of action, in any event. The same reasoning applies to libellant's claim for his board during the same time, and for money loaned to the master.

The question then recurs, is the defense of desertion sufficient to defeat libellant's claim, in whole or in part?

1. As to the fact of desertion. As we have already seen, libellant quit without consent, and, as the proof shows, he did so against the express dissent of the master, and with the intention not to return. This constitutes desertion by the maritime law, unless he has made out a sufficient justification. The grounds of justification sought to be proven, viz., interference with his duties by the master, and unwholesome and insufficient food, I am satisfied are mere after-thoughts, and constituted no part of his reasons for leaving. He never made any complaint, nor did he at the time give those as the reasons for his leaving. In any view of the case, however, I do not consider the justification contended for sustained by the proofs. In fact, I am satisfied from the proofs, that libellant's only reason for leaving was that he had obtained other and perhaps more agreeable employment. The charge of desertion is, therefore, maintained as a matter of fact.

2. As to the effect of the desertion. By the strict rule of the maritime law, desertion works an entire forfeiture of all antecedent wages, and such must be its effect in this case, unless there is something that mitigates the offense. In the case of The John Martin, [Case No. 7,357,] which, like the present, was a case of desertion from a tug-boat, this court made use of the following language: "It is true the kind of service under consideration does not call for the same rigorous application of the law as ocean service, because there the consequences of desertion may be vastly more serious. The court may in its discretion alleviate the rigor of the general rule, and, in view of mitigating circumstances, may impose a less penalty than that of entire forfeiture of wages." To this doctrine I fully adhere. See, also, Lovrein v. Thompson, [Case No. 8,557;] Swain v. Howland, [Id. 13,661;] Gifford v. Kollock, [Id. 5,409;] The Union, [Id. 14,347.] The mitigating circumstances, however, must be such as to amount to a reasonable excuse, founded on gross misconduct or harsh usage. Slight and transient causes will not answer, especially where, as in this case, the desertion appears to have been deliberate and premeditated, and not the result of sudden impulse. Neither is it necessary, in order to maintain this defense, that it shall be made affirmatively to appear that any specific damages resulted from the desertion. Where this does appear, however, it will operate as an aggravation. Where, however, it is made affirmatively to appear that no damages resulted or could have resulted, the rule may be applied perhaps with less rigor.

The excuses contended for at the hearing, were: first, that the master interfered with libellant in the discharge of his duties; and, second, unwholesome and insufficient food. These have already been noticed in connection with the question of justification for desertion, and they were held insufficient for that purpose. Did they amount to a reasonable excuse? The proofs show that the only interference with libellant's duties by the master, consisted in orders, directions and advice to the former as pilot and sailing master, where to go and what to do in the employment of the boat. This was clearly nothing more than a legitimate exercise of the powers and functions of master, and did not constitute even a shadow of ground for complaint. The complaint of insufficiency of food is wholly unsupported by the proofs. The proofs show, however, that for a short time, meat was used that was slightly tainted. This, however, was but transient and of short duration; and the master explains that it was owing to circumstances at the time beyond his control. Libellant evidently so considered it, because he made no complaint of it at the time, and he remained in the service a considerable time after this cause of complaint had ceased. I am satisfied from the proofs that the main reason for his leaving was personal to himself, and for his own benefit. This, instead of being a mitigation, is rather an aggravation of the offense.

The best men are usually employed here, upon the lakes, before the commencement of the season of navigation; it is difficult to get good men after that time, and it will not do to encourage mariners to treat their contracts for service lightly, to break them at pleasure, and thus place owners at the mercy of their caprices and whims; and I desire it to be understood that the court looks upon all desertion, which is not fully justified, with disapprobation, and that the extreme penalty of the law will be inflicted in all cases where the party deserting has not a strong excuse, founded on gross misconduct or harsh usage towards him. In the view already taken, it is unnecessary to consider the claim of damages in consequence of the desertion. It is proper to remark, however, that although the respondents failed to establish such a state of facts as would constitute a basis for any specific measure of damages, yet sufficient appears from which it is fair to presume that damage to the owners must have resulted from the desertion. It is conceded on all hands that libellant possessed superior skill in the position in which he was employed, and that his services were also peculiarly valuable on account of his extensive acquaintance and popularity with owners and masters of vessels usually employing tugs, and also, on account of his knowledge of towing rafts, which this tug proposed to and did make somewhat a specialty. In place of libellant, the owners were obliged to take up with a man of qualifications inferior to libellant's in all respects; and although it is in proof that the remainder of the season was much less profitable for the towing business than that portion during which libellant served, yet it is fair to presume that with libellant's superior knowledge, skill and reputation, the tug would have earned much more than she did earn—how much more it would be impossible, as it is unnecessary, to determine. All that I intend to say, and all that is necessary to say here, is, that the owners were undoubtedly materially damaged by the desertion.

We see, therefore, the case has all the elements necessary to give the rule of the maritime law its full force, without any mitigating circumstances to break or alleviate it. It is therefore held that the balance due libellant for wages, as above stated, is forfeited, and the libel must be dismissed with costs.

Libel dismissed.

NOTE, [from original report.] This case was appealed to the circuit court. Pending the appeal, libellant brought suit for the same cause of action at common law, in the state court. The state court having, on motion, stayed the proceedings, the supreme court vacated this order by mandamus (27 Mich. 406), and directed the case to proceed to judgment. Before the trial of the case, however, the above decree of the district court, dismissing the libel, was affirmed by the circuit court on appeal. [Nowhere reported.] This decree was then pleaded in the state court, as res adjudicata, but was overruled, and a verdict rendered for the plaintiff for $602. The case was then removed to the supreme court of the state, by writ of error, where the judgment was affirmed at the October term, A. D. 1875. That court held that the decree of a court of admiralty, dismissing a libel in rem, was no bar to a suit at common law for the same cause of action.

Case No. 810.

Ex parte BALL.

PATENTS—REISSUE—COMBINATIONS.

[1. The act of congress of July 4, 1836, § 13, (5 Stat. 122,) which empowers the commissioner of patents, upon the surrender to him of a patent, to cause a new patent to be issued whenever the surrendered patent shall be inoperative or invalid by reason of a defective or insufficient description or specification, or when the patentee claimed more than he had a right to claim as new, if the error has arisen by inadvertency, accident, or mistake, is to be construed liberally, according to its spirit, and not literally, as restraining and limiting the right to a reissue.]

[2. If a patent be defective or insufficient, either in the specification or in the claim, the patentee has a right, if he desires it, in the absence of fraud and deception, and on complying with the other requisites, to have a reissue for each distinct and separate part, effectually to cure the defect in the mode of stating it; and he has a right to restrict or enlarge his claim so as to give it operation, and to effectuate his invention.]

[3. If a new function is developed by the combination of different elements of the invention, this is not new matter, beyond the scope of the invention.]

Appeal [by Ephraim Ball] from the decision of the commissioner of patents, for refusing, on said Ball's application, to reissue in three divisions, A, B, and C, of the reissued patent No. 831 for improvements in mowing machines. [Reversed.]

MORSELL, Circuit Judge. In his specification he has stated under his first division, A, his claim particularly consisting of three clauses; under that of B, consisting of nine clauses; and under that of C, four clauses.

Reasons of appeal have been filed, sufficient to cover all the points of error supposed to exist in the decision of the commissioner. In the report of the commissioner in answer to the reasons, he states, in substance, that the first clause of the claim under letter "A" was deemed to have been anticipated substantially in the patent of Sylla and Adams, dated September 20, 1853, of Philo Sylla, 1855; and of Jonathan Haines, 1855. He says the same device is employed in each of these references in the same combination for connecting the end of the finger-beam to the main frame of the machine, which drags a cutting apparatus upon the ground. The lugs or hinges referred to in this clause is a well known equivalent of the hinge employed for the same purpose in the patents named, and was used in the machine of Obed Hussey, patented in 1833, for connecting the cutting apparatus to the main frame; the arrangement of this hinge with the parts to which it is connected and with which it operates in Bell's machine has been deemed to involve patentable novelty, as will appear by reference to the official letter of April 12, relating to division C.

The second clause was anticipated in the patent of Jonathan Haines, 1855, in which the front hinge that connects the front of the frame, through the medium of the drawbar, with the shoe at the heel of the finger-beam, is arranged above and in advance of the cutter and finger-beam, substantially as specified in this clause of the claim.

The third clause as stated in the official letter of the 12th of April, involves two conditions relative to separate functions. The first, viz.: arranging the front hinge and the hinge at the heel of the finger-beam in a line which is parallel with the side of the frame, was found to have been anticipated in the patent of C. Wheeler, Jr., dated 1855, and substantially the same arrangement is to be seen in the other references cited and the other conditions, viz.: arranging the hinges and connections of the cutting apparatus or finger-beam so as to divide the strain between the opposite ends of the frame, and both sides of the axis of the driving wheels, was found distinctly anticipated in the patent of Wheeler and in the patent of Haines—both referred to above.

Upon a re-examination April 12, 1860, of divisions B and C of this application as amended they were regarded as embracing patentable novelty, and suggestions of amendment were made, which were believed to be necessary, in view of the condition of the art, and references were given to enable the applicant to restrict the claims, so as to embrace the substantial improvement of this applicant. For the reasons there assigned for requiring the amendments and refers to the official letters of that date. The specification of the original patent, as before stated, described the invention as an improvement on the machine patented in 1855 by Jonathan Haines, which machine embraces the substantive devices and their combinations which are employed in Ball's machine, Ball's invention being regarded as an improvement in the arrangement of the devices, and it is evident that it must be so regarded. For in comparing these two machines it is at once apparent that the principle of construction and of operation is the same, and that the difference in form and arrangement which were the invention of this applicant are distinctly seen, and of such a character as to be capable of an easy and brief description. In Haines' machine the cutting apparatus is drawn upon the ground by means of two hinged bars which connect the finger-beam to the front timber of the frame, and the end of the finger-beam which passes by the frame is connected to the rear end thereof by a curved rod or brace which is hinged to both, and the draw-bar on the inner side of the machine is hinged to the shoe in front of the finger-beam. Ball's improvement consists in taking from, rather than adding to, the Haines' machine; the finger-bar is cut off at a point outside of the hinge of the curved brace-rod at the rear of the frame, and it, together with the outside draw-bar, are thrown aside, and the inside draw-bar and lateral brace bar or rod are retained; the former is made broad and rigid where it is joined rigidly to the finger-beam instead of being hinged there like Haines', and the hinge of the lateral brace-rod is changed in its relation to the end of the finger-beam, from the position it occupies in Haines' machine. These changes in the construction and arrangement of the front hinge and the rear hinge (at the heel of the finger-beam) in a line with each other, parallel with and beyond the frame so as to permit a greater degree of vertical movement of the finger-beam, embraces the entire novelty of Ball's improvement upon the cutting apparatus, or its connections with the frame.

In regard to the other devices claimed, which are employed upon the main frame, viz.: The hangers or supports for the crank shaft, the independent axles, the ratchet wheels, pawls and springs, the case for enclosing parts of the gearing, the balance wheels and the swiveled pitman, the references cited in the several letters, present their prior use in other patented harvesting machines, and the mere reassembling of these old devices has not been deemed a patentable improvement or an advancement in this branch of the mechanic arts. The 13th section of the act of congress approved July 4, 1836, [5 Stat. 122,] empowers the commissioner, upon the surrender to him of a patent, to cause a new patent to be issued whenever the surrendered patent shall be inoperative or invalid by reason of a defective or insufficient description or specification, or when the patentee claimed more than he had a right to claim as new, if the error has arisen by inadvertency, accident, or mistake, &c. He quotes also the 5th section of the act of 1837, [5 Stat. 192,] the 13th section of the act of 1836, and the 8th section of the act of 1837, and says: "On the first examination of this application some doubts were expressed as to the alleged invalidity of the surrendered patents, (Nos. 831 & 832,) it not appearing that an adjudication upon this question had been had, nor was there any distinct fact presented to corroborate or sustain the belief of the applicant. The office was therefore left to discover wherein an error, if any, had been committed in the description of the surrendered patents, and this too from the unnecessary, prolix, and ambiguous specifications and claims. In the official letter of February 14, it was objected that the several divisions of the subject-matter were not such as contemplated by the law, because the law authorizes the issuing of the additional patents for distinct and separate parts only; and on the final examination the same opinion was expressed in the letter of the 12th of April relating to * * * division C, that all the clauses or specifications of claims which involve the use of substantially the same invention must be embraced in one patent. It was observed that each division contained one or more clauses of claims which covered a condition or arrangement indispensable to the integrity and operative capability of the invention as an improvement upon the harvesting machine. In other words, the several patents, as solicited, would necessarily have clashed with each other, from the nature of the improvements as set forth, which involve modifications and arrangements, instead of new parts, separable and distinct. Different assignees of these patents would have been mutual infringers in making and using the invention. For these obvious reasons the law of reissue and division contemplated the issuing of the additional patents for the distinct and separate parts only which were new at the date of the original patent, and capable of useful application independently of the other parts which were used with them in the particular machine in which they were described or originally patented. For these reasons the office did not deem it lawful or just to the public to put forth the several patents prayed for.

It will be observed that in the last part of the just recited report of the commissioner, he gives his opinion upon the various statutes providing for reissuing patents, in which he says doubts had been expressed in a former stage of the proceedings whether the alleged invalidity of the surrendered patents should not have been previously adjudicated upon, and also that some distinct fact should have been presented to corroborate or sustain the belief of the applicant. Also that the several divisions of the subject matter were not such as contemplated by the law, because the law authorizes the issuing of the additional patents for distinct and separate parts only and on the final examination the same opinion was expressed. As a principle thus intimated affects every part of this case, I have thought it best to take the consideration of the case in this order. That is my view in the construction of those statutes. He seems to think a stricter construction should be given than I can bring myself to think is correct. In the first place, he says the additional patents must be "for distinct and separate parts only." This word "only" I have not found used in any of the statutes. It is therefore the commissioner's own inference, and implies that the statutes are to be construed as restraining literally, and not liberally according to their spirit. This right to amend or correct the defects either in the description of the schedule, or in the matter of the summary of the claim, by a surrender of the old patent, in order to a reissue of a new and perfected patent, had its existence upon the broad principles of reason and justice, coeval with the authority to grant the protective exclusive right itself. It is an implied right contained in the grant itself by the public to the inventor. The real question is between those two parties, and the limitation or exception,—fraud and deception towards the public,—and the fair and equitable limits of the original invention, embracing all combinations, new and valuable, with their functions, so as, in the best and most effectual manner, to guard and protect this right shown by the specification, drawings, and model, taken together, from invasion by pretended inventors and pirates, and from the effect of subtle, refined distinctions. If, to do this, it should become necessary to divide and subdivide the invention, the reason is very sufficient, and within the provision of the law allowing the reissuing of separate patents. Whilst the patentee may be thus protected in his just and fair rights, it is not perceived how different assignees of the patents could be prejudicially affected, or in a worse condition than if the parts were all in one patent, an assignment of a part only, (as is not unfrequently the case.) I should think that, so far from any reason on the part of the public to complain, it would be deemed desirable that all the parts of the invention should be fully developed, that their interest also might be secured against similar dangers. It is objected by the commissioner that the integrity and operative capability of the invention would be affected. That the invention is not entire, but consists of separate and distinct parts, the first reissue and an inspection of the patent furnish unquestionable evidence. This answers the objection as to the necessity of a previous adjudication or some distinct fact to be presented. I think there was no such prerequisite of law; in the first place, the proceeding is to be an ex-parte proceeding before the commissioner as a ministerial officer, and in some respect like the proceedings in the first instance. There has been no decision sustaining such an objection, and the practice has been entirely otherwise. I think the oath of the party applicant stating the fact is enough.

That I am fully sustained in the principles I have stated, I will refer to a few decisions of the courts: In the case of Battin v. Taggert, 17 How. [58 U. S.] 83, Mr. Justice McLean, who delivered the opinion of the court as to the right of reissue, says: "So strongly was this remedy of the patentee recommended by a sense of justice and of policy, that this court, in the face of Grant v. Raymond, 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 218, sustained a reissued and corrected patent before any legislative provision was made on the subject. The same principle had been practiced in the patent office, and had been sanctioned in the case of Shaw v. Cooper, 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 310. The case of Grant v. Raymond, in delivering the opinion of the court, Mr. Chief Justice Marshall says: "The great object and intention of the act is to secure to the public the advantages to be derived from the discoveries of individuals, and the means it employs are the compensation made to those individuals for the time and labor devoted to these discoveries, by the exclusive right to make, use, and sell the things discovered for a limited time. That which gives complete effect to this object and intention by employing the same means for the correction of inadvertent error which are directed in the first instance cannot, we think, be a departure from the spirit and character of the act. An objection much relied on is: That after the invention has been brought into general use those skilled in the art or science with which it is connected, perceiving the variance between the specification and the machine, and availing themselves of it, may have constructed, sold, and used the machine without infringing the legal rights of the patentee, or incurring the penalties of the law. The new patent would retroact on them, and expose them to penalties to which they were not liable when the act was committed. This objection is more formidable in appearance than in reality. It is not probable that the defect * * * in the specification can be so apparent as to be perceived by any but those who examine it for the purpose of pirating the invention, they are not entitled to much favor." Whilst using this case for the purpose of showing the favored principle of this claim of reissue, I will notice another part of it to show upon what previous grounds the right should be allowed. It was a case in which the secretary of state, acting as a ministerial official, allowed the reissue. This appears to have been upon the representation of the party himself on oath stating the facts generally with his new specification as in this case, and requiring no previous adjudication. In illustrating the extent and nature of this right, the chief justice says: "If the mistake should be committed in the department of state no one would say that it ought not to be corrected. All would admit that a new patent correcting the error, and which would secure to the patentee the benefits which the law intended to secure, ought to be issued, and yet the act does not in terms authorize a new patent even in this case. Its emanation is not founded on the words of the law, but it is indispensably necessary to the faithful execution of the solemn promise made by the United States. Why should not the same steps be taken for the same purpose if the mistake has been innocently committed by the inventor himself?"

I have thus endeavored to show the origin and nature of the right, and as before estimated that the statutes referred to by the commissioner are not to be considered as restraining, but as confirmatory of the principles laid down by the supreme court in the case just recited. With respect, then, to the reissue of patents, the two sections of the act of 1836, section 13 [5 Stat. 122,] and the act of [March 3,] 1837, § 5, [5 Stat. 192,] are to be taken together in construction, and the most just and equitable extent to which the terms of the law, in its true spirit, will admit of, ought to be adopted. If his patent is defective or insufficient either in the specification or the claim, he has a right, if he desires it, in the absence of fraud and deception, on complying with the other requisites, to have a reissue of patents for each distinct and separate part, effectually to cure the defect in the mode of stating it, and he has a right to restrict or enlarge his claim so as to give it operation and to effectuate his invention. See the case of Battin v. Taggert, 17 How. [58 U. S.] 84, and the case of Hussey v. McCormick, decided by Mr. Justice McLean, 19 September, 1859, [Case No. 6,948.] The patentee, in his reissue, is entitled to every advantage within the full scope of his invention.

It may be here asked, if a new function is developed by the combination of different elements of the invention, whether this would not be new matter, and not within the invention, to which, without stopping to give my own reason for supposing it, cannot be so considered. I refer to the case just referred to, of Hussey and McCormick, to show conclusively that it would not. It may again be said that there can be no legitimate combination, as in the case now before me, where the different elements relate to separate functions. This is counter to the principles and decisions in the books on patent law, and the great current of cases in the patent office, in which patents have been granted without such an objection, and it is difficult to perceive any reason to sustain the position. There is no technicality in the term. It is of common parlance, with significant and common sense meaning. See Mr. Justice Story's opinion in the case of Carver v. Braintree Manuf'g Co., [Case No. 2,485.] In that case it was contended that the patent was not for a legitimate or patentable combination, since the improvement consisted in the assembling together of two distinct features or devices, but the judge said: "I see no objection to its being called a combination of particular forms and arrangement of structure to complete the improved rib. In a just sense, that is a combination which requires different things or different contrivances or different arrangements to be brought together to accomplish the given end." The great matter is, is it new and valuable, or is the result such? There is nothing in the objection inconsistent with the patents surrendered. It is no sufficient objection to the patentability of a combination that each separate element of which the combination is composed is covered when considered separately; this is fully settled by the late decision of the supreme court, and, indeed, according to the authorities on the subject, has long since been considered as a settled question. The application in this case for reissued subdivisions is not without good authority to sustain it. The precedents to be found in the patent office in the instances of McCormick & Hussey, and the decision of Judge McLean in the case of the latter against McCormick, are directly in point, and I think are not to be gotten over. [Case No. 6,948.]

I have carefully and fully examined and compared (with the assistance of the learned advocate on the part of the appellant) all the references particularly alluded to by the commissioner, and have found none of them to apply to the claims of Ball in the combinations in which they are made to stand.

With the foregoing views, I think the decision of the commissioner erroneous, and ought to be reversed, and the reissue as prayed are hereby ordered and directed.

Case No. 811.

Ex parte BALL.

[3 App. Com'r Pat. 344.]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. July 2, 1860.

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS—REISSUE—EVIDENCE.

[1. On an application for a reissue of a defective patent, the model filed by the patentee in compliance with the statute is admissible as evidence of the scope of the original invention, and the defects of the original patent.]

[2. The inventor was entitled to a reissue of letters patent No. 832 to Ephraim Ball, for improvements in reaping machines.]

Appeal [by Ephraim Ball] from the decision of the commissioner of patents, for refusing, on said Ball's application, to reissue, in four divisions, his reissued patent No. 832, for improvements in mowing machines. [Reversed.]

MORSELL, Circuit Judge. In this specification he has stated under his first division, No. 1, his claims, particularly consisting of four clauses; under No. 2, consisting of one; under No. 3, consisting of three clauses; and under No. 4, consisting of nine clauses.

He has filed five reasons of appeal: 1st. That the commissioner erred in refusing the reissue on the ground that new matter had been introduced, which the original model, papers, and drawings did not warrant or justify. 2nd. On the ground that certain references which he cited presented an anticipation of the useful invention, and parts of the useful invention for which patents were prayed. 3rd. That the reasons and objections which he gives therefor are untenable, and cannot be sustained by the patent law. 4th. For refusing to consider certain evidence which the said Ball presented in support of his said application, viz. the affidavits of N. C. Driver and Wm. H. Bell. 5th. Because, having failed to show that the said Ball was not the first and original inventor of the useful invention claimed, he erred in not allowing the application and division as prayed for.

The commissioner, in his report, in reply to said reasons, says: "The five reasons assigned for taking this appeal present three points for consideration: First, that the commissioner erred in deciding that the new applications and drawings embraced inadmissible new matter, which enlarged the scope of the original invention patented. Secondly, that it was error to decide that the alleged novelty of the invention had been anticipated by prior inventors, as evidenced by the references cited. Thirdly, that the commissioner erred in refusing to consider certain affidavits which this applicant proposed to submit and make them a part of the record. The grounds of the decision referred to in the first reason of appeal, as above cited, are clearly and fully set forth in the report of the board of examiners, to which attention is invited. Reasons for requiring the amendment will also be found in the official letter dated April 26." In regard to the second point or reason of appeal, it will be observed by references to the letters dated Feb'y 14, 1860, on the first examination, and April 26, that the office has not decided that this application does not involve some invention of a novel and patentable character, but rejected the application and refused the several divisions and claims for patents as prayed for, and required what were deemed necessary amendments, in view of the condition of the art at the date of the original patent. The grounds for refusing to consider the affidavits which were offered were twofold: First, because these affidavits were not furnished until after the examination had been made and an appeal taken, upon which a board of examiners had concluded their report, and submitted it to the commissioner. Secondly, because the law authorizes the reissuing of a patent for the same invention only, which was described in the surrendered original patent. What the same invention is must be determined from the original record, which cannot be enlarged by the suggestions of either the applicant or others. This is the settled practice of the office, under its rules, (vide section 44, p. 451,) and is imperatively necessary to protect substantive improvements, which have been patented to others, from being merged in the new descriptions of applications for the reissue of patents of earlier date.

I suppose the principles settled by me in the case 831, [Ex parte Ball, Case No. 810,] showing the origin, nature, and extent of the right involved in the above proposition, fully covers the question, and therefore little or nothing more need be added here, beside the broad principle of reason and justice upon which the right is supposed to be based. It was supposed that the provisions of the statute were not in any manner intended to narrow or restrain, but were confirmatory thereof to the fullest extent. As I understood the meaning of the commissioner, it is that what he calls the original record, however defective it may be in describing the invention, it must nevertheless be considered conclusive. Now it is true, as a general rule of law, that a record is conclusive of the matter it contains, but it will not be denied that the legislature has a right to change, alter, or even abolish the rule, and in cases of this kind it has been done, for the language is that whenever any patent * * * shall be imperative by reason of a defective or insufficient description, or specification. The word "any" is surely broad enough to embrace the original record or patent; then suppose the defect to be in that and in the specification also, however they are to be amended. It becomes a question of the admissibility of evidence, and the next highest evidence of the true extent of the invention is the model, being one of the prerequisites of the statute, and of the foundation upon which the patent issues; it is the highest original source which exists, to be resorted to under such circumstances for showing the defects, and I think may be used. I am happy to find that in this opinion, I am fortified by Judge Holt and the former Commissioner Bishop's opinion on the same subject.

The commissioner refers me to the report of the examiners adopted by him as his decision. The first objection stated in that document relates to the capacity of the machine for carrying its cutter apparatus folded upon the main-frame, the adjustability of the length of the pitman which communicates motion to the cutters, &c. The description as here given of the claim is supposed to be different from that which has been made according to the true mode of folding as claimed, which is not by turning the runners 22 and cutting apparatus upon their pivot K and then fold them over on the machine by means of the hinge I. The hinge I is attached to the rear of a swivelled piece which is free to turn on the socket piece, J, and the folding of the finger-beam is due to the swivel piece which turns in the socket-piece and not turned on pivot K, which holds the socket piece to the under side of the projecting end of the main frame. It would not therefore be necessary to disorganize the machine before the finger-beam could be folded, the hinge I being attached to the rear of the swivel-piece and not on the socket-piece. It is alleged that "Mr. Ball has never proposed to connect the socket-piece in any other position than just where it is shown in the original patented drawing, and also in the original model, viz. to the under side of the cross-piece of the frame, and that while the socket-piece is so attached, the finger-beam can be raised, turned, and folded over the main frame in front of the axis of the main-supporting wheels, and further that it is owing to the socket-piece being attached to the under side of the front cross-piece as described in the reissues; that it is held in the folded position, while the machine is being drawn from one field to another, and that too without any other means to hold it close to the side of the frame than simply its own gravity, a means which the commissioner seems to have overlooked." I have examined the model of Ball, and am satisfied that it is capable of the alleged function, and which is not considered as new matter. It has already been shown that the original model may be resorted to as evidence of the extent of the true invention, with respect to its affecting third persons by the reissues; it is probable that none other than those examining for the purpose of pirating the invention would be the description of persons, and therefore it is not of much matter. I think it appears also that neither the Wheeler nor Haines machine is affected by the claims as made by Ball. I have also satisfied myself by a careful examination and comparison that neither the Sylla and Adams machine of 1853, P. Sylla's of 1855, nor Haines' of 1855 are applicable to Ball's ninth claim.

As to the number of models referred to, without stating specifically what part or parts are applicable to the claims of Ball, and on account of the "condition of the art," I have not particularly examined them. And I hope the commissioner, upon more reflection, will be satisfied that the law does not impose any such unreasonable, onerous duty on the judge. From the foregoing views which I have taken of this case, and of the principles settled in case 831, [Ex parte Ball, Case No. 810,] I am satisfied that there is error in the refusal to grant the said reissue, and the said decision is hereby reversed and annulled, and that the said reissues be made accordingly as prayed.

TROVER—PLEADING—EVIDENCE.

In trover for "a chest containing sundry tools," and a "trunk containing sundry clothes," the plaintiff cannot give evidence of the value of the tools and clothes; the defendant being charged only with the conversion of the chest and trunk containing the tools and clothes, and not of the tools and clothes themselves.

[See Ball v. Patterson, Case No. 814.]

At law. Trover for "a chest containing sundry tools" and "a trunk containing sundry clothes."

Mr. F. S. Key, for the defendant, objected to the evidence of the value of the tools, the conversion of the chest and trunk only, being averred. The conversion is the gist of the action.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

Mr. Law, contra. The trover is of a "chest containing sundry tools," and "a trunk containing sundry clothes." The conversion is of the said chest, and the said trunk; that is, the chest containing the tools, and the trunk containing the clothes.

Mr. Caldwell, for the defendant. If it is a charge for converting the tools and clothes, it is too vague and uncertain.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, doubting) was of opinion that the defendant was charged only with converting the trunk and the chest, and not the tools and clothes, and of course evidence of the value of the tools and clothes was immaterial.

A declaration in trover for "a tool-chest containing divers tools, and working utensils," and a "trunk containing clothes," is sufficiently certain.

At law. The declaration having been amended, and a verdict rendered for the plaintiff, the defendant moved in arrest of judgment for uncertainty of the declaration, which was for "a tool-chest containing divers tools and working utensils," and "a trunk containing clothes."

Mr. Caldwell, for the defendant. A chest of tools would have been good; but a chest containing divers tools and working utensils, is not. It is too vague. Bottomley v. Harrison, 2 Strange, 809.

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS — REISSUE—BROADENED CLAIM.

1. The claim of complainant's reissued patent was, "One or more swinging bread-holders, suspended from the arms or end plates of a rotating reel, in combination with a furnace, so arranged and connected, that the products of combustion will pass into or through the chamber within which the bread-holders move." The specification shows, that the oven of the patentee is constructed with a solid bottom which completely shuts off the fire from the furnace, and flues by the side of the bread chamber so far removed, and so far cut off from the fire, that nothing but heated currents of air can pass into the chamber: Held, that the claim must be construed to be for the application of the rays of heat directly from the fire to the baking chamber, and that, as the original patent contained nothing calculated even to hint how this could be done, but the drawings and model suggest a mode of operation wholly different—viz., the baking of bread by the heat derived from the radiation of heated walls and heated currents of air, the reissued patent was broader than the original.

2. The reissued patent, granted to Hosea Ball, June 14, 1870, and extended for seven years from September 23, 1870, for improvement in ovens, held void for claiming what was not embraced in the original patent.

[In equity. Bills by Hosea Ball against John K. Withington and others and against John Bailie for infringement of letters patent. Dismissed.]

S. S. Fisher and John E. Hatch, for complainant.

Edward Boyd, for defendants.

Before EMMONS, Circuit Judge, and SWING, District Judge.

EMMONS, Circuit Judge. The bills charge infringement of letters patent, granted to complainant, September 23, 1856, for an "improvement in ovens," reissued October 12, 1869, and a second time reissued June 14, 1870, and extended for seven years from September 23, 1870.

By agreement of counsel, both cases were argued together, and the decision to be delivered, governs both.

The reissued patent, upon which the bills are founded, contains three claims; but the first, which is as follows, is the only one in controversy: "1. One or more swinging bread-holders, suspended from the arms or end plates of a rotating reel, in combination with a furnace, so arranged and connected, that the products of combustion will pass into or through the chamber within which the bread-holders move."

We prefer to rest the judgment solely upon the ground, that the original patent did not warrant that part of the claim, in the reissue, which includes the direct application of heat to the bread chamber. We say, the direct application of heat, because, we thus construe the words "products of combustion." The only significance which we can give to that part of the claim is, that the rays of heat from the fire must be radiated directly into the baking chamber. The reissued patent, as we construe it, claims a device which will accomplish this result. The infringement is said to depend upon the fact, that the defendants' apparatus applies the "products of combustion" directly to the baking chamber, and that, as the reissue claims this feature, there is an infringement. That it does so, is entirely clear, all the "products of combustion," which ascend at all, move upward and around the swinging bread-holders. There is no proof, nor is there any suggestion from counsel, that there is any "product of combustion," heat excepted, which is efficacious in the baking of bread. Conceding, which we much doubt, that there are what may be called two principles, in a legal sense, in the application of heat to the baking of bread, we can draw the line between them only as follows: The one, that used by the defendants, and which we suppose complainant's reissued patent to claim, radiates the heat directly from the fire into the chamber, with no intervening wall or medium, the air excepted, between them. The other, heats the baking chamber by heating its external walls, or by carrying heated currents of air into it, but excluding all the direct rays of heat from the fire. The former mode greatly economizes fuel. The fire is in close juxtaposition to the baking bread, which is rotated in the chamber above the directly ascending, and, therefore, greatest possible amount of heat which can be economized from a given amount of combustion. This mode defendants' device employs to the full. Turning to that of the complainant, it completely excludes the employment of the principle, if principle it be. Not a single direct ray, radiated from the furnace, can enter the chamber. Its bottom is solid, and completely shuts off the fire of the furnace. The flues by the side of the bread chamber are so far removed, and so cut off, from the fire of the furnace, that nothing but heated currents of air can pass into the former, through the apertures in the side walls. There is not only not a word in the original patent calculated to hint at the leading idea or principle employed by the defendants, but, the drawings and model suggest a mode of operation wholly different. They rely upon heated walls and heated currents of air to bake the bread, and must have been contrived at a time when fuel was used, whose unconsumed gases and smoke were noxious, and which, therefore, had to be conveyed away without contact with the dough. So far from suggesting the defendants' device, or the unwarranted claim made in the reissue, had a baker, about to adopt the device of the defendants, believed that that of the complainant embodied the best application of heat, he would have abandoned his own device, in the belief that it was worthless. We do not think the case one, where a beneficial idea has been appropriated by another in a different form. The complainant delayed, rather than hastened, the direct application of heat employed by the defendants.

It may be said the claim necessarily uses the terms "products of combustion," in a sense other than that imputed to them by the court; and, as they were used in reference to a device in which the direct radiation of rays from the fire was impossible, necessarily, they must have contemplated something else; what this something else is, is not stated. The court is asked to presume there is some unknown "product of combustion" besides heat, which can be conveyed, through the apertures in the side walls, upon the bread. It is argued, if the court will but imagine some such improved incident to combustion, that then the original device embodied a mode in which it might be employed in baking, and thus it would lay the foundation for the claim made in the reissue. The answer is: We know of no such quality; all the products of combustive material, in this process, is the heat evolved, and as the original patent provided no mode for its application, the subsequent claim for it is void.

Although our judgment goes upon another ground, and we have not, therefore, fully considered, whether the patent for this combination is void, because no invention is involved in making it, still, such is our strong impression. We apprehend the new mode, which dispenses with smoke flues and separating walls surrounding the baking chamber, depends far more upon the modern use of fuel, which can, without injury, be consumed directly beneath the dough, than in any discovery on the part of complainant, or any one else, in the application, or law, of a new principle of heat, to baking. But, however this may be, previous patents had, in express terms, pointed out the mode, and claimed as a benefit, the direct application of heat to a baking chamber. The attention of those engaged in this department of industry had been directly challenged to this subject, and, what we deem somewhat material upon the mere question of invention, they had combined a furnace and chamber, for the direct application of heat, with an endless chain or apparatus for moving the bread over the fire. The reel is an old and familiar device. We should feel that we were carrying the doctrine which protects slight inventions to the last limit, if we were to hold that the combination of the reel and furnace in this case, involved invention. We have no disposition to deprive this species of property of its due protection. When a meritorious invention is presented, every disposition is felt to protect it from spoliation by the employment of other devices, in which, it is apparent, the idea of the complainant has been employed. We decide this case against the complainant, because convinced, that not only had the patentee no notion whatever that he had included in his device what is claimed in the reissue, but because, neither the patent, specification, nor model, would have suggested it to any one else.

The bills will be dismissed, with costs.

BANKRUPTCY — SUSPENSION OF PAYMENT OF COMMERCIAL PAPER.

[The suspension of payment of commercial paper for 14 days is prima facie evidence of fraud, and casts the burden of proof on the debtor. In the absence of explanatory proof, such suspension is to be deemed fraudulent, within the meaning of the bankruptcy act of March 2, 1867, (14 Stat. 517, c. 176.)]

In bankruptcy. The question in this case arose upon a point of law made by the counsel for the alleged bankrupts, claiming that fourteen days' suspension of payment of commercial paper by a banker, merchant, or trader, must be accompanied by actual fraud, in order to constitute an act—or even to constitute prima facie evidence of fraud—of bankruptcy, within the meaning of the law. The question was argued, and all the known cases bearing upon this point cited by George G. Sumner and William Shipman, for petitioning creditors, and by Franklin Chamberlain, for the alleged bankrupts, and the following decision and opinion filed by the judge:

SHIPMAN, District Judge. The only question before the court in the present stage of this case is, whether the respondents have committed an act of bankruptcy. A number of their creditors have duly made application to have them declared bankrupts under those clauses of the act relating to involuntary bankruptcy. In their petition the creditors allege that the respondents are merchant traders and manufacturers, and that long before the date of the petition they fraudulently stopped and refused payment of their commercial paper, and have not resumed the same within a period of fourteen days, nor at any time since. There is no dispute about the facts. It is conceded that the respondents have suspended payment of their commercial paper, and have not resumed, and that this suspension has continued without interruption much longer than fourteen days. No explanatory proof is offered by the respondents, and the question arises whether, in this state of the case, the suspension is deemed fraudulent within the meaning of the act of congress. This court, in several uncontended cases, has decided that a suspension under such circumstances was to be deemed prima facie evidence of fraud, at least sufficient to cast the burden of proof on the debtor. This is the view taken by Judge Field, of the United States district court of New Jersey, in the case of Jersey City Window Glass Co., [Case No. 7,292.] It is sufficient to say that I adhere to this view of the law. Whether I should, in a case presented, go further, and concur with the views expressed by Judge Hall in Re Wells, Jr., [Case No. 17,387,] need not now be determined. It follows that a decree declaring the respondents bankrupts must issue.

BALLARD v. EDMONSTON.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 419.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Oct. Term, 1823.

APPRENTICE—MOTHER CANNOT BIND CHILD.

A mother cannot bind out her child as an apprentice.

[Cited in Charles v. Matlock, Case No. 2,615.]

The petition of Richard Ballard stated, that on the 9th of April, 1816, one Evan Edmonston, an infant under twenty-one years of age, by indentures signed and sealed by his mother, Sarah Edmonston, was bound to the petitioner for nine years from the 8th of June next following, to learn the trade of a tailor. That he came and served as an apprentice until about two months past, when he left the service of the petitioner, although the nine years have not yet expired, and the said Evan is still a minor, and refuses to return to his service, alleging that he is not bound by the indentures. The petitioner therefore prays that the said Evan may be brought before the court to abide such order as the court may deem just and equitable. The indenture was in the common form, but signed and sealed by the mother, and not by the son. By the 7th section of the act of Maryland of 1793, c. 45, it is provided, that, "in case the contract, whether defective in form or not, hath been partly executed, the said county or criminal court may award and compel the terms or any part of the terms to be performed by the master or mistress, or by the apprentice, as justice and equity may require; and the master or mistress of any apprentice may detain the said apprentice in his or her service, till discharged by the court aforesaid; and the said master or mistress may maintain such action against strangers, as if such apprentice had been legally bound to serve."

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

Mr. Ashton, for the petitioner, contended, that under the 7th section of the act, as the contract had been so far executed, on his part, the court should order it to be completed on the part of the boy, although the indentures are defective in form. The act does not mean mere technical form of the indentures, but the invalidity of the indentures from any cause. Here the contract was, that the boy should serve the petitioner as an apprentice. The indentures were only a matter of form; and although they may be defective, the contract continues, and under that section of the law, may be enforced with such modification, or upon such terms as the court may deem just and equitable.

Mr. Coxe, contra. By the common law the infant could not bind himself, nor could the mother bind him. The act of 1793, c. 45, § 4, only authorizes the father to bind out his infant son. The mother has no such power. There were therefore no parties competent to contract, and therefore there was no contract. When a power is given by statute, all the requisites of the statute must be complied with.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent) decided, that there was no contract binding on the boy, and ordered him to be discharged.

PRACTICE—PETITION AND BILL—LIEN—FRAUDULENT JUDGMENT.

1. A bankrupt suffered his property to be taken on legal process in favor of one of his creditors, under an execution issued on a judgment against him, the bankrupt intending thereby to give a preference to such creditor, and the creditor having reasonable cause to believe, at the time, that the bankrupt was insolvent: Held, that the transaction was void, under the 35th section of the bankruptcy act, [of March 2, 1867; 14 Stat. 534,] and that no valid lien was acquired in favor of the creditor by the taking under the execution.

2. The property levied upon under the execution was, under an order of the bankruptcy court, delivered to the assignee, and sold by him, subject to the determination of the court as to the validity of the lien claimed by the creditor. The assignee filed a petition, praying that such lien might be declared void. The creditor's answer prayed that it might be adjudged valid, and that the assignee might be directed to satisfy the execution out of the proceeds of the property held by him. On an objection taken by the creditor, at the hearing: Held, that, as the matter was brought up by petition, instead of by bill in equity, it was irregular; that both petition and answer must fall, and the proceeding be dismissed, without costs, with leave to the creditor to file a bill in equity, or bring a suit at law, as he might be advised, within thirty days.

In bankruptcy.

G. A. Seixas, for assignee.

F. N. Bangs, for execution creditors.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. On the proofs in this case, I regard it as established that the bankrupt, on the 9th of October, 1869 (the petition in bankruptcy having been filed on the 15th of October, 1869), being insolvent, suffered his property to be taken on legal process in favor of the firm of E. S. Jaffray & Co., under an execution issued on that day against him, on a judgment recovered on that day, in the marine court of the city of New York, by that firm, against him, for $486 80; that the bankrupt intended thereby to give a preference to that firm, as his creditors, they being such at the time; and that firm had reasonable cause to believe, at the time, that the bankrupt was insolvent, and that a fraud on the bankruptcy act was intended. The transaction was, therefore, void, under the 35th section of the act [of March 2, 1867; 14 Stat. 534,] and no valid lien was acquired in favor of the firm, by the taking under the execution. The petition of the assignee prays that such lien may be declared void. The answer of the firm to that petition, which answer was verified on the 17th of December, 1869, and filed on the next day, prays that the levy under the execution may be adjudged to be a valid lien, and that the assignee may be ordered to satisfy the execution out of the proceeds of the sale of the property. It appears, by the proofs, that the property levied upon under the execution was, on or about the 14th of December, 1869, under an order made by this court on that day, delivered to the assignee, the order providing that he should hold the proceeds separate from the other estate of the bankrupt, subject to the determination of this court on the petition filed by the assignee to ascertain the validity of the lien claimed by the firm, and that none of the rights or liens of the firm should be prejudiced by the order. It also appears, that the property has been sold by the assignee, and that its proceeds have been kept separate, to abide the order of this court.

The objection was taken, at the hearing, by the counsel for the firm, that, inasmuch as the proceeding instituted by the petition of the assignee is one against the firm as claiming an adverse interest touching property or rights of property of the bankrupt, transferable to or vested in the assignee, it is wholly irregular, because it was not brought upon a plenary bill in equity, but by a summary petition and an order to show cause. On the authority of the recent decision made in the circuit court for this district, in the case of In re Bonesteel, [Case No. 1,627,] this objection must be held to be well taken. As the petition falls, the answer must fall with it, and also the prayer of the answer, that the assignee may be ordered to satisfy the execution out of the proceeds of the sale of the property levied upon. The petition is, therefore, dismissed, but without costs to either party, as against the other; and, as the fund is in the hands of the assignee, leave is given to the execution creditors to file a bill in equity, or bring an action at law, as they shall be advised, against the assignee, in a proper court, for the enforcement of such rights as they shall seek to claim against the assignee in the premises, provided that be done in thirty days herefrom, at the expiration of which time, if it be not done, the assignee may apply for directions as to the fund.

Wright, Gatch & Wright, for plaintiff.

Mr. Richards, for defendant.

Before DILLON, Circuit Judge, and LOVE, District Judge.

DILLON, Circuit Judge. A proceeding under the Iowa statute to quiet title, is, in its essence, an equity suit. In the federal courts, whether a particular case is one at law or equity, depends upon the case stated in the petition. If the case there made shows a mere contest of legal titles, and the defendant is in possession, the remedy is at law.

If the plaintiff is in possession, or if neither party is in possession, and the petition or bill shows that equitable relief is necessary or proper, the jurisdiction is in equity.

The statements of the petition in this case show that the case is equitable in its nature, and the demurrer thereto must be sustained. It must be heard as an equity suit, and not as an action at law.

Demurrer sustained.

BANKRUPTCY—APPLICATION FOR DISCHARGE—FORM OF CREDITOR'S CONSENT THERETO.

1. Creditors who have not proved their claims in bankruptcy until after the day fixed for showing cause against the bankrupt's discharge, cannot then make objection to the discharge upon any other ground than fraud distinctly and specifically charged.

2. A creditor may consent to the bankrupt's discharge by an attorney in fact, or by his counsel, stating in open court that the consent is given; and it seems that an assent to the discharge need not be "in writing," since the enactment of section nine of the amendatory bankruptcy act of June 22d, 1874, [18 Stat. 180,] amending section 5112 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

In bankruptcy. This was an application for a discharge in bankruptcy on a certificate of conformity from the register. [Granted.]

The day for showing cause against the discharge was the 10th of December, 1877. The register states that:

On the day to show cause the only proof on file was that of Thomas Dunnill for a balance of $14,809.87, and the bankrupt produced a power of attorney, executed by Dunnill (now in Europe) some time before the bankruptcy, by virtue of which he claimed the right to consent to his own discharge. I thought the authority was insufficient, and so he has since procured and filed the necessary assent of that creditor (and of E. E. Taylor & Co., who have since proved their debt).

Since the day to show cause, the following proofs in opposition to the discharge have been filed:

J. F. Allen & Co.	$ 60 57
Turpin & Bro.	100 54
Jackson, Turpin & Co.	252 42
John T. Wadsworth	1,045 00

cause as shown above, February 28th, 1878.

The proofs of claims by the four creditors named by the register were filed on the 6th February, 1878. The register afterwards made a supplementary report, in which he stated:

On the day to show cause why the discharge of the bankrupt should not be granted, the only creditor who had then proved his claim, Thomas Dunnill, appeared by counsel and offered to assent to the discharge upon the power of attorney previously referred to. This I thought was insufficient, and so I told Mr. Coke, the attorney, if he would give the assent for his client, there being no other claim proved, that I would consider the assent to be given. The amount of Mr. Dunnill's claim being very large, Mr. Coke thought he had better get the assent of his client personally, and I think I suggested to him to send the necessary paper to Europe for that purpose, which he concluded to do. At that time I knew of no opposition to the discharge, and I had been under the impression that your honor had ruled that the assent could be given after the day named; in fact, the amendment of June 22d, 1874, left some doubt upon my mind in regard to this subject, and I had then determined to lay the matter before your honor at the earliest opportunity, which you will no doubt remember I did. I therefore left the case open for the assent of Mr. Dunnill, to be filed under the former practice in such cases, making no regular adjournment, nor fixing another day. March 9th, 1878.

The bankrupt's counsel states in his brief, that on the day for showing cause against the discharge, "a written consent, signed by Thomas Balmer, attorney in fact for the creditor Dunnill, was tendered to the register and rejected as insufficient, which consent in writing I insist was legal and valid." No objection in writing to the discharge, in conformity with general order in bankruptcy 24, was filed in the cause until the 15th March, 1878. The objection then filed was in the form of a petition by the creditor John T. Wadsworth, setting out that he had reason to believe that the bankrupt Balmer did not surrender all of his property to his assignee, to wit, that he did not surrender a certain piano-forte now in Balmer's use, nor certain jewelry owned by him. It prays that the bankrupt may be made by order of court to submit to an examination under oath touching this charge; and that pending such examination the bankrupt's present application for a discharge in bankruptcy may be stayed.

The following was the decision of the court:

HUGHES, District Judge. Two questions arise for determination:

1. Can creditors who have not proved their claims in bankruptcy until after the day fixed for showing cause against the discharge of the bankrupt, then make objection to the issuing of the discharge on any other ground than fraud specifically and distinctly charged? and if not

2. Whether the consent of the only creditor or creditors who have proved their claims at the day for showing cause against the discharge, as given in this case, is sufficient under section nine of the amended bankruptcy act of 22d June, 1874, amending what is now section 5112 of the Revised Statutes of the United States?

1. I think it is perfectly clear under general order 24 in bankruptcy that the objection to the discharge in this case was not made in time or in proper form; and that it therefore cannot be allowed by the court. There has been no "specification in writing of the grounds of opposition" to the discharge filed at all in this cause. The petition does not in terms make objection to the discharge. It simply asks that the bankrupt's application may be stayed to await the result of an examination of the bankrupt under oath. It does not charge fraud or any wilful intent to defraud on the part of the bankrupt. It merely sets forth the belief that a piano-forte and certain jewelry were not surrendered, and asks a stay of the application for discharge. But even if this paper were such a "specification of the grounds of opposition" to the discharge, as is contemplated by general order 24, it was not filed "within ten days after the day" on which the creditors were required to show cause against it. That day was the 10th December, 1877. If we consider that the whole time during which the register kept the matter open, waiting for a personal consent in writing to arrive from Dunnill, was in law but one day; yet, that paper having arrived on the 21st January, 1878, the objection was still too late, because of not having been filed within ten days after that day. And even if we consider that the matter was before the register until the date of his certificate of conformity, to wit, the 28th February, 1878, the objection was still not in time; for it was not filed until the 15th March, 1878. I think, therefore, that, as "a specification in writing of grounds of opposition" to the bankrupt's discharge, this paper is insufficient in form; and I also think that it was invalid as not in time, under order 24. It can have no effect as such a "specification," and the objecting creditor, Wadsworth, must resort to his remedy under section 5120, which allows a discharge, after it is granted, to be revoked within two years for fraud charged and proved against the bankrupt.

2. The consent which was given in this case, by the consenting creditor, Dunnill, seems to me to have been, under all the circumstances, sufficient. That creditor (who was the only one who had proved his claim) was in Europe. The bankrupt was his general attorney in fact here, still empowered to act for him, inasmuch as his bankruptcy had not terminated that power. Story, Ag. § 486. That attorney either offered or tendered to the register for his principal, a consent to the discharge in writing. The register declined to receive Balmer's consent as attorney in fact for Dunnill, but held the matter open until a specific consent in writing, signed by Dunnill personally, could be obtained from Europe, which in due course of mail was received, and was filed on the 21st January, 1878. Even if the clause in section 5112, which requires the consent of creditors to be in writing, has not been repealed by the ninth section of the amended bankruptcy act of 22d June, 1874, [18 Stat. 180,] the consent in writing which was offered or tendered to the register was valid and sufficient. The refusal of the register to receive such a paper as the law requires to be "filed in the case" cannot affect the rights of the person whom the law requires to file it, if he tenders it, or offers to file it. See Bennett v. Hunter, 9 Wall, [76 U. S. 326.] The creditor, through his duly accredited attorney, did all that he could do.

But in addition to the action of the attorney in fact, we have also that of Mr. Dunnill's attorney at law. This creditor's counsel offered also before the register to assent to the discharge. This assent could, of course, only be given orally, and was given orally. It is not necessary in this case to decide whether a creditor's consent to a bankrupt's discharge must be in writing; but I will say that, inasmuch as section nine of the amending act of June, 1874, repeals in terms the essential provision of section 5112, I think it repeals along with it the requirement that the consent of creditors shall be in writing at least so far as to make a declaration in open court by the creditor that he consents a sufficient consent in the contemplation of the ninth section of the amended act. If the consent is given out of court, it must needs be in writing without doubt. But if it be given orally before the register or in court before the judge, and is made to appear on the record by either the judge or the register, I deem such declaration of consent to be sufficient in contemplation of the amendatory section nine.

On the whole, I think the consent of Dunnill to Balmer's discharge in bankruptcy, as it appears on the face of the record before me, to be as complete as it could well be made, and that it is sufficient. The discharge may issue.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. This is a libel filed by the United States, as the owners of the steamboat Flora, against the steam ferryboat Baltic, to recover for damages caused by a collision which took place between the two vessels, on the 19th of December, 1863, about half-past one o'clock in the afternoon, in the harbor of New York, about 300 yards distant from the Barge office dock, at the foot of Whitehall street. The Flora was attempting to make a landing at the westerly side of pier No. 1, East river, being the pier at the extreme east end of the Battery. The tide was strong flood, running from west to east, and the wind was blowing strong from the westward. From some cause, either because she missed her landing, and was in danger of being carried against the end of pier No. 1, by the force of the wind and tide, or because she desired to make room for another vessel which was at pier No. 1 to get out, the Flora backed out, after having gone in bow on and got her stem within the end of the pier. The wind and tide swept her stern to the eastward, and she kept her stern way on, with her engine in motion working backward, until she came in collision with the Baltic, which was on her regular trip from Brooklyn to her slip at the foot of Whitehall street, New York. The Baltic did everything she was bound to do, by slowing to half speed, and then stopping, and then backing, to avoid the collision. That she did not do more, as, for instance, that, instead of stopping at once, the moment she saw the Flora backing, at a distance off which then was perhaps half a mile, she slowed to half speed, was no fault on her part. She could have had no reason to suppose, and was not bound to suppose, that the Flora would keep on backing so as to make a collision probable. She slowed to half speed the moment she saw the movement of the Flora, and she stopped and backed as soon as she had any reasonable ground for apprehending that a collision was imminent. There was nothing in view from the Baltic as a cause for the backing of the Flora, and nothing to indicate that there was or would be a necessity for the Flora to back to the extent she did. But, with the wind and tide such as they were, the slowing of the Baltic was a proper precaution. There having been no fault on the part of the Baltic, a decree dismissing the libel must, of course, be entered. But in addition to this, the evidence shows reckless carelessness on the part of the Flora. She appears to have blindly backed out into the harbor, with no person on her after deck to look towards the direction in which she was backing, and give signals from that part of the vessel, and no person on the lookout anywhere, and no person anywhere on her deck, except one man in her pilot house, whose attention was directed towards objects at the westward in the Hudson river. No reason is shown for her backing as far as she did. All the damage she suffered by the collision was the consequence of her own careless navigation. A decree will be entered dismissing the libel.

COLLISION IN EAST RIVER—FOG—SPEED—UNLAWFUL ANCHORAGE.

1. Where a brig lying at anchor in the East river, within the distance of sixty yards from a direct line between the landing places of one of the ferries, was run into by a ferry-boat in a fog in the early morning, the ferry-boat having previously made five trips on the ferry that morning, on which trips the light of the brig had been seen, and she had been avoided, and, on the trip in question, the ferry-boat, after starting from her slip, slowed to half speed, and ran on, looking for the brig, and, not seeing her, stopped her engine, and afterward started ahead again, and, as soon as she got way on her, shut off to half speed, and ran so till she sighted the brig at a distance of not over twenty yards, but, not being able to stop in less than thirty yards, was not then able to avoid a collision: Held, that the ferry-boat was in fault in going at too great speed, and that such fault contributed to the collision.

2. That the brig was violating an ordinance of New York city in lying where she was, and that such violation was a fault contributing to the collision.

G. A. Forster, for libellant.

B. D. Silliman, for claimants.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. This is a libel for a collision, filed by Baron de Livremento, the owner of the Brazilian brig Palma against the steam ferry-boat Baltic. The collision happened on the morning of the 14th of December, 1863, a few minutes after a quarter past six o'clock. The brig was lying at anchor in the East river, near the ferry-boat's slip, at the foot of Atlantic street, in Brooklyn. The ferry-boat plied regularly from the foot of Whitehall street, New York, to her slip at Brooklyn. She had been running on the morning in question since five o'clock, having left Brooklyn at that hour. The trip from one side to the other usually occupied six or seven minutes. She left Brooklyn again at half past five o'clock, and again at six o'clock. She left New York at a quarter past five o'clock, at a quarter before six o'clock, and at a quarter past six o'clock. The collision happened on the last-named trip. She had, therefore, made five trips on that morning before the trip on which the collision happened. On each of those trips she had passed the brig in safety. At the time of the collision, the tide was flood, and the Palma was heading to the southward and westward. There was a very thick and heavy fog at the time, it having been foggy since the previous afternoon, and very thick since before five o'clock. The Palma had anchored where she was on the previous afternoon, and had not shifted her position at all from the time she anchored, except as she swung with the changes of the tide. The ferry-boat struck the Palma, the starboard bow of the ferry-boat coming in contact with the starboard quarter of the Palma, and causing considerable damage. The pilot of the ferry-boat knew that the Palma was anchored there, and had seen her there at anchor on the previous afternoon. On the morning in question he had passed, on his trips, sometimes ahead of her, and sometimes astern of her, as she lay in the tide, and had made her light. On the five previous trips the tide was ebb, and the Palma headed to the north. On the collision trip, the tide was flood, and the Palma headed the other way. The Palma had a light in her rigging during the five trips of the ferry-boat, on that morning, prior to the trip on which the collision took place. This light the ferry-boat had looked for and made, and was guided by, on those five trips. Whether the light on the Palma continued to burn on the trip when the ferry-boat struck her, is disputed on the evidence. The ferry-boat, having left New York on such trip, slowed her engine down to what is called half speed, by shutting off, soon after leaving her slip on the New York side, and kept blowing her steam whistle every few seconds. She was looking for the brig. Not seeing her, she stopped her engine, and afterwards started ahead again, and, as soon as she got way on, shut off to half speed, and ran so till she sighted the brig, at a distance of not over twenty yards off. The engine of the ferry-boat was then stopped and reversed as quickly as possible, and her helm was starboarded, so as to throw her bow up the river with the flood tide. This was a proper manoeuvre, and caused the blow to be a glancing one, and comparatively light. The evidence is, that the ferry-boat, while running shut off, could stop her headway entirely in thirty yards, and that, if she had sighted the brig at a greater distance off than thirty yards, she would not have hit her.

It is impossible not to hold, on these facts, that the ferry-boat was in fault in going at too great speed in the fog, and that such fault contributed to the collision. Although the brig may have been in fault in anchoring where she was, and in not showing a light at the time of the collision, still such fault of the brig, although it partly led to the collision, cannot excuse the fault of the ferry-boat in not running at a sufficiently moderate speed in the fog to avoid the brig. She knew the position of the brig, and, although the brig had been anchored there since the previous afternoon, no notice to the brig to move her position is proved, and the ferry-boat seems to have been content to leave her there and to take the risk of hitting her, although it had been foggy from soon after she anchored, the fog increasing to the time of the collision. Having taken that risk, one element of it was, that the light on the brig, which was exhibited on the five trips, might cease to burn on the sixth. This view proceeds on the assumption that the brig did not have a light. Whether she did or not, I do not deem it necessary to find, for I am satisfied, on the evidence, that the brig was lying in a forbidden place. She was violating the ordinance of the city of New York (section 14, art. 2, c. 26, p. 291, Rev. Ord. 1859) which provides, that no vessel shall lie at anchor in the East river within the distance of sixty yards from a direct line between the landing places of either of the public ferries across the river. This ordinance was binding on the brig, and her violation of it was a fault. The Bedford, [Case No. 1,216;] The James Gray v. The John Fraser, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 187–189. Such violation contributed to the collision.

This case is in all its material features substantially like the case of The Bedford. There must be a decree apportioning equally between the two vessels the damages caused to the libellant by the collision, such damages to be ascertained by a reference.

In admiralty. This was a libel for a collision, which occurred on the 2d of October, 1865, about seven o'clock, A. M., between the steam tug Pope Catlin and the steam ferry-boat Baltic. [Interlocutory decree for libellant. The libellant's exceptions to the commissioner's report were afterward overruled in The Baltic, Case No. 824.]

The Baltic was a ferry-boat plying regularly across the East river, at the city of New York, from a slip at the foot of Hamilton avenue, in the city of Brooklyn, to a slip at the foot of Whitehall street, in the city of New York. The collision occurred on a trip of the ferry-boat from Brooklyn to New York. The Pope Catlin was lying with her bow to the westward, motionless, fastened outside of a small schooner, which was lying with her bow to the westward, fastened at the south end of pier No. 1, East river, which was the next pier westward of the ferry slip on the New York side. The Pope Catlin had just towed the schooner to that place from Brooklyn. The ferry slip had in it two berths for ferry-boats to lie side by side, with a structure of fenders between the two berths, such structure being much shorter than the jaws of the whole slip to the eastward and westward. The tide, at the time, was running strongly ebb, or to the westward, along the piers and the mouth of the slip. Out in the river, it was high water, or perhaps a little flood. The proper navigation of the ferry-boat, with such a tide, was to trend to the eastward, and sag to the westward with the ebb tide, while checking her headway, so as to enter that one of the two berths which was the more westerly, and which was the one for which she was destined. In going in, the port side of the ferry-boat struck the port side of the Pope Catlin, at a point about ten or eleven feet forward of the stern-post of the Pope Catlin, and caused considerable damage to her, by tearing up her deck, and otherwise. The principal part of the damage was shown to have been done by the port wheel of the ferry-boat (she being a side-wheel steamer), in its reverse motion, coming in contact with the tug, while the engine of the ferry-boat was working backward. The defence set up by the ferry-boat in her answer was, that the stern of the Pope Catlin extended some twelve feet beyond the easterly end of the pier at which she was lying, and the same distance across the entrance to the ferry slip, and in the direct line and track of the ferry; that the ferry-boat entered her slip slowly and carefully, with her engine reversed, but was carried by the tide against the tug, and was unable to prevent the collision; and that the collision was solely due to the negligence of the tug, in thus lying across the entrance to the slip.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. Where a vessel in motion comes into collision with a vessel which is motionless, the burden of proof lies on the vessel so coming into collision, to show that the collision was inevitable, or that the motionless vessel was to blame. The Percival Forster, Lown. Col. 58. In the present case it is claimed, on the part of the ferry-boat, that the force which swept her against the tug was a vis major, and that, therefore, the collision was, so far as the ferry-boat was concerned, the result of inevitable accident. The ferry-boat must be held liable for the damages caused by her, while in motion, to the motionless tug, unless she shows affirmatively that her being carried against the tug was the result of inevitable accident, or of a vis major, which human care and precaution, and a proper display of nautical skill, could not have prevented. The Louisiana, 3 Wall. [70 U. S.] 164, 173; The Granite State, Id. 310, 313, 314. Inevitable accident, as respects a colliding vessel, means that such vessel has endeavored, by every means in her power, with due care and caution, and a proper display of nautical skill, to prevent the collision. The Lochlibo, 3 W. Rob. Adm. 310, 318. Within these rules, it is fully established, on the evidence in this case, that, so far as the ferry-boat is concerned, the collision was not the result of inevitable accident, or of a vis major. The evidence shows, and indeed it was admitted by the pilot of the ferry-boat, in his testimony, that, as she approached her slip, another ferry-boat was about the length of the Baltic ahead of the Baltic, bound for the easternmost berth in the slip; that the Baltic did not stop for such other ferry-boat, and that, if the Baltic had been alone, and such other ferry-boat had not been thus ahead of her, she would have been able to go nearer to the pier at the easterly side of the slip. The effect of this would have been, that the farther she got to the eastward, the farther would she have kept to the eastward, and away from the tug, when sagged to the westward by the ebb tide. I am satisfied, from the evidence, that if the ferry-boat had exercised due care, and had kept as far to the eastward as she ought, and as she could but for her crowding too closely upon the ferry-boat ahead of her, she would not have struck the tug. Even if the tug projected with her stern across the entrance to the slip, the ferry-boat, having chosen to attempt to enter her slip with the tug in that position, and under circumstances which made it difficult to escape a collision, must, a collision having taken place, bear the consequences of the contingency to which she exposed herself. The Hope, 2 W. Rob. Adm. 8, 10. If the tug had been wrongfully lying wholly across the entrance to the slip, that would not have exempted the ferry-boat from responsibility for colliding with her in attempting to enter the slip. There was, therefore, fault on the part of the ferry-boat, leading to the collision.

But there was also fault on the part of the tug. The weight of the evidence is, that she was lying with her stern projecting partly across the entrance to the ferry slip, and where she had no right to lie. The character of the blow she received, the place where she was struck, and, indeed, the fact that there was any collision at all, all go to show that she must have been lying with her stern projecting to the eastward of the east end of Pier No. 1.

There must be a decree apportioning equally between the two vessels the damages sustained by the tug by the collision, with a reference to a commissioner to ascertain and report such damages.

Weeks and Forster, for libellant.

Benjamin D. Silliman, for claimants.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. This, a case of collision, in which a decree was made to the effect that the collision was caused by the negligence of both vessels, and that the damages should be equally apportioned. A reference was ordered to ascertain the damages and the question of costs was reserved. [The Baltic, Case No. 823.] The commissioner reports as due to the libellant on account of the matters mentioned in the pleadings, $959.13. No reference to report the amount so due to the libellant was made to the commissioner. What the commissioner ought to have reported, and what, from the evidence, he manifestly intended to report, was, that the $959.13 was the damages sustained by the libellant by reason of the collision. The report must be amended so as to conform to the fact and to the order of reference. I shall treat it, however, as being a report that the damages sustained by the libellant, by reason of the collision, amount to $959.13. Both parties have excepted to the report. The $959.13 is made up of three items: (1) Repairs to the libellant's vessel, $392.22; (2) Ten days' demurrage, at $45 per day, $450; (3) Interest on the $392.22, from December 26th, 1863, to the date of the report, at the rate of six per cent. per annum. The libellant has filed seven exceptions to the report, claiming: (1) That the interest on the $392.22 should be at the rate of seven per cent. per annum; (2) That the libellant ought to have been allowed interest at the rate of seven per cent. per annum on the $450 demurrage; (3) That the libellant ought to have been allowed $1,000 for permanent injury sustained by his vessel by the collision; (4) That he ought to have been allowed interest on such permanent injury. The fifth, sixth, and seventh exceptions of the libellant are to the exclusion by the commissioner of testimony offered by the libellant on the reference. The claimants have put in two exceptions to the report, claiming: (1) That no interest should have been allowed on the amount of the cost of repairs; (2) That no demurrage should have been allowed to the libellant.

There is no dispute as to the propriety of the allowance of the $392.22. Interest on that amount, it being the amount actually paid for repairs put on the libellant's vessel, as a consequence of the collision, forms a proper item in the damages; and the proper rate is six per cent. and not seven per cent. The Ocean Queen, [Case No. 10,410.]

As to the demurrage, I think the commissioner erred in allowing it. No proper case for its allowance is made out by the evidence, within the ruling in Williamson v. Barrett, 13 How. [54 U. S.] 101, 110, 111. The libellant wholly fails to show, by evidence, that he sustained any loss of service of his vessel, during the ten days while she was undergoing repairs, or that he sustained any damage by any such loss.

The claim for an allowance for permanent injury was properly rejected by the commissioner. The evidence on the part of the libellant on that subject is altogether vague and inconclusive, and the weight of it is, that the vessed was in as good condition after the repairs were made as she was before the collision.

I see no error on the part of the commissioner in excluding evidence.

All the exceptions on the part of the libellant are overruled. The first exception on the part of the claimants is disallowed and the second is allowed. The report of the commissioner must stand as a report made December 16th, 1868, reporting the amount, at that date, of the damages sustained by the libellant, by reason of the collision, at $509.13. This amount, with interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum, to the date of the decree to be entered, will be apportioned equally between the libellant and the claimants' vessel.

As to costs. I give to the libellant his costs in the cause, to and including the interlocutory decree of May 2d, 1868, and the costs of entering the final decree. The costs of the reference under the interlocutory decree, and the costs of the exceptions and of the hearing thereon, I award to the claimants, as the testimony before the commissioner relates almost wholly to the items of demurrage and permanent injury, both of which are disallowed, and as the libellant's exceptions are all of them overruled, and the claimants' principal exception is allowed. If there is any balance in favor of the libellant, between the two bills of costs, it will be added to his recovery. If there is any balance in favor of the claimants, between the two bills of costs, it will be deducted from such recovery, if less than such recovery; and, if larger than such recovery, such recovery will be deducted from it, and the claimants will have a decree for the remainder.

COLLISION—DAMAGES—AGREEMENT TO REPAIR—DEMURRAGE.

1. A bark, having been injured by a collision with a steamer, arrived in New York, where the agents of the steamer repaired the damages. The owners of the bark then filed a libel to recover demurrage for the detention of the bark while being repaired. The owners of the steamer set up that it was agreed that the repairing of the damages should be in full satisfaction of the claim. They also claimed that they could have hurried the repairs so as to have finished them in much less time, if the master of the bark had informed them of an offer of a charter which it appeared he had and which he refused because he was not certain that his vessel would be ready in time to begin to load under it: Held, that the burden was on the steamer to establish the agreement that the making the repairs should be in full satisfaction for all damages, and that on the evidence she had not established it.

2. That the master of the bark was not bound to have communicated to the agents of the steamer the offer of a charter which he had had; that his refusal to accept it was in good faith, and that the libellants were entitled to recover demurrage for the detention of the bark.

Thos. E. Stillman, for libellant.

E. P. Wheeler, for claimant.

CHOATE, District Judge. This is a libel to recover damages for a collision which occurred between the Norwegian bark Plutarch, of which this libellant was master and part-owner, and the steamer Baltic, on the 2d day of June, 1879, while the bark was bound on a voyage from Bordeaux to New York in ballast. The libel avers that "the bark continued on her voyage, and, on or about the 19th day of June, arrived in the port of New York; that the owners of the said steamer then assumed and superintended the repairs to the bark necessary to fit her for sea, and agreed to pay therefor; that the said bark, pending the completion of said repairs, was unfit for sea, and her owners lost the use and employment of her and were subjected to considerable expense for the maintenance and wages of the crew during the said period and for wharfage and other expenses." No question is made as to the responsibility of the Baltic for the collision, and it was shown that the repairs were paid for by her owners. The only question is whether she is liable for the detention of the vessel during her repairs. On this point the answer avers, (2d), "immediately on the arrival of the said bark in the port of New York at the termination of the voyage mentioned, it was agreed between the libellant and this claimant that this claimant should make, at its own expense, all the repairs necessary to restore the said bark to as good a condition as she was in before the said collision, and that the said libellant should allow the said claimant to make the same, and that the making by the said claimant at its own expense of the said repairs should be in full satisfaction and discharge of the said supposed cause of action alleged in the said libel and of all damages sustained by the libellant or by the owners of the said bark by reason thereof." The answer then avers performance of this agreement on claimant's part. It also avers, (3d), "immediately after the arrival of the said bark in this port, as aforesaid, this claimant offered to prosecute the same (i. e., the repairs), day and night, and this claimant offered that its said workmen should accompany said bark if it should go to any place in search of cargo, and it could have completed the said repairs in the space of three days, but the libellant then and there informed the claimant that the rates of freight were then so low that he preferred not to accept the same, nor to charter the said bark at that time, but to wait until such rates of freight should rise, and that the said claimant should and might make the said repairs at its own convenience; that the claimant, relying on the said statement so made, used only ordinary and reasonable diligence in and about repairing the said bark, and did not use extraordinary diligence in and about the same, as otherwise it would and could have done, and said vessel could easily have been taken from the pier at which she was lying to any other pier or port and have taken on cargo while said repairs were going on."

The proof is that before the arrival of the bark the claimant's agent sent a letter to be delivered to her master by the pilot, requesting him, immediately on his arrival, to call at the office of the respondent company, the owners of the Baltic, and that the claimant had also instructed a competent mechanic to be ready to have her repaired on her arrival. She arrived on Thursday the 19th of June, and on Saturday, the 21st, this libellant, her master, and his consignee, Mr.

[1] [Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and Benj. Lincoln Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

Boyesen, called at the office of the claimant company and there met Mr. Cortis, the managing agent of the company. The agreement set up in the second article of the answer that the claimant should repair the bark and that this should be in full satisfaction of all claim for damages by reason of the collision, was made orally during that conversation, if at all. There are three witnesses to what took place at that time, Mr. Cortis, Mr. Boyesen and the libellant. It is insisted on behalf of the claimant that the fair result of the testimony, considered in the light of the surrounding circumstances, is that the parties reached an understanding to the effect set forth as an agreement in the second article in the answer, although it is conceded that nothing was said in terms to the effect there set forth as to the repairs being in full satisfaction. This understanding, it is said, is to be properly inferred from the conversation as related by Mr. Cortis. His account is that, when they came in, he addressed the captain and said, "Captain, you had a slight collision on the Banks, I believe," to which the captain answered that he had; that he then said to the captain that it was their steamer, the Baltic, and asked the captain what was the extent of the damage, and the captain replied $800 or $900, he thought; that the captain said that the steamer had been handled in a masterly manner and was commanded by a good man; that he then told the captain that he would send a man on board and have the damages repaired to his satisfaction; that, as the damages were of a nature that would not prevent loading the vessel, the carpenters could go with her wherever he wanted to go to load, so that there would be no detention; that the captain then said he was satisfied, or all right, or something to that effect, and bade him good morning and left.

By the testimony of the captain and of Mr. Boyesen it appeared that when the subject was introduced and Mr. Cortis admitted that it was the Baltic which collided with the Plutarch, Mr. Cortis did not admit that it was the fault of the Baltic, but said in effect, "I don't know, captain, who is in fault in this business, but any way I will repair it for you." To which the captain said "all right" or "thank you." The testimony of Mr. Boyesen and of the captain is inconsistent with there having been anything said about the carpenters accompanying the ship so that there need be no detention, from which remark especially the inference is drawn of a waiver of all claim for demurrage and the acceptance of the agreement to repair as a full satisfaction. The witnesses are all of unquestioned character and intelligence. Upon the whole testimony I am not satisfied that any such remark was made or that the captain or Mr. Boyesen came away from the interview with any understanding on their part that what was offered to be done by the company was offered in full satisfaction, or with any condition that the captain should waive any claim he might have for demurrage, or that anything was said which should have led them to believe that that was Mr. Cortis's meaning or understanding. The defence set up is the making of a special agreement, as to which the burden of proof is on the claimant, and that burden he has not sustained. Nor is such an agreement to be inferred from the circumstances under which the offer to repair was made. Very likely Mr. Cortis had the idea in his own mind that he would avoid all claim for demurrage by promptly offering to repair the bark, and if no detention had in fact occurred, the course taken by him, which is certainly to be commended, would have had this effect. That he now thinks the subject was mentioned does not admit of any doubt, but the minds of the parties did not meet, so as to form a contract binding on them.

The evidence as to the detention is that before the claimant had commenced the repairs, the libellant, who came to this port with the intention of carrying a cargo of petroleum to Europe, was offered a charter by a broker, and that he refused it because he was not certain when the vessel would be repaired, and by the charter-party he would be obliged to agree to be ready for sea by the 16th of July, and to begin to load about ten days before that. He did not communicate this offer or the rejection of it to the claimant. No other charter offered till the 8th of July, when the repairs being nearly finished, he accepted a charter on the same terms on which the former charter had been offered. The repairs were commenced on the 24th of June and finished on the 11th of July. It was shown that by working night and day they could have been finished in eight working days, or by the 4th of July. The claimant did not offer to have the repairs go on night and day, and for a night's work the wages of the workmen would have been double what they were for a day's work. There was no proof of any special agreement such as is set up in the third article of the libel. It was shown that the vessel could have been safely moved while the repairs were going on and that cargo could in fact have been put on board of her by the 6th of July: that is, the repairs would not have prevented the commencement of her loading on that day and its prosecution afterwards.

It is insisted by the learned counsel for the claimant that the libellant was bound to communicate to the claimant the offer of a charter made to him; that if he had done so the claimant might have given orders for prosecuting the repairs more promptly or might have guaranteed that the vessel would be ready in time to receive her cargo under it; that as the libellant did not communicate this fact he is estopped to claim demurrage. This seems hardly to be the defence intended by the answer, but assuming that it is so, I think there was no duty to communicate the fact. The libellant could not then know whether even with great diligence he could safely agree to be ready for sea by the 16th of July. Although he knew in a general way the nature of the injury to the vessel, yet until the repairs were commenced it was a matter of uncertainty how long a time they would take. The claimant had proposed what should be done, and if it desired to know of any offers made to the libellant for a charter it could easily have required the information, but in the absence of such request the libellant had no reason to believe that the claimant would make any change in the plans in consequence of this offer. I think his rejection of the offer was made in good faith and not because he was waiting for freights to rise. I see no duty on his part to communicate the offer, under the circumstances of this case. It is also claimed that he informed the claimant that he was waiting for better freights and that the claimant was thereby led not to repair as promptly as it might. It is true that in the law of estoppel in pais "when an act produces conduct from which flows injury, it cannot matter whether that conduct be affirmative or negative, active or quiescent." Continental Nat. Bank v. National Bank of Com., 50 N. Y. 586. There is some evidence that the captain, in conversation with the men employed by the claimant to do the work, said something about his waiting for freights to rise. The captain having been examined before trial, has had no opportunity to testify since this evidence was taken. But I do not think these men stood in such a relation to the matter that what he said to them was any notice to the claimant, nor did the claimant act upon it. There is, therefore, no estoppel growing out of it. And so far as this testimony is relied on as showing that the captain rejected the first offer, not because he thought he could not comply with the terms of the proposed charter, but because he thought freights would improve, I think it is entitled to very little weight and is clearly overborne by the other testimony in the case.

The libellant is entitled to a decree for sixteen days' demurrage, and costs, with a reference to compute the amount, unless the amount is agreed to.

ADMIRALTY—SURETY FOR COSTS — PROCEDURE BY PETITION AND BY MOTION

1. The regular method of proceeding against a surety in a stipulation for costs in a suit in admiralty, is by petition, after notice to the surety. In such a case, the decree may be final and peremptory.

2. Upon a proceeding by motion, after a personal demand of the costs from the surety, a conditional decree only will be awarded.

In admiralty. This was a motion for a decree of condemnation against the surety in a stipulation in behalf of the libellant, in a suit in admiralty in rem, to pay costs, &c. [Granted.]

Notice of the decree dismissing the libel with costs, and of the return of the execution against the principal unsatisfied, was served on the surety, together with a taxed bill of the costs, and payment of the costs was regularly demanded.

BETTS, District Judge. The jurisdiction of the court over the parties and the subject matter, in bail stipulations, is fully established, and is exercised by awarding judgment and execution in a summary manner. The Alligator, [Case No. 248.] This power is necessarily incident to the court, in consequence of its jurisdiction over the principal cause.

It would be the more convenient and fit mode of practice, to pursue, in these cases, the course of the court in summary proceedings. The application to the court should be upon petition, a copy of which ought to be served on the party to be affected, and then the decree of the court might be peremptory. The present procedure, by motion, after a personal demand of costs from the surety, is sufficient to give the court cognizance of the matter, but, instead of a final, only a conditional decree will be awarded in this state of the case. The surety should have been directly apprized of the proceeding, and have had the opportunity to acquit himself of the obligation without incurring further costs or subjecting himself to be attached for contempt of court.

A decree must be entered, that the surety pay the taxed costs in the principal cause within ten days after notice of this order, or that an execution issue against him for that amount and also for the costs of these proceedings.

Circuit Court, W. D. Pennsylvania. July Term, 1865.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW — REVOCATION OF CHARTER —PRELIMINARY INQUIRY.

1. Where a charter of a corporation reserves to the legislature an unconditional power to alter or repeal the act, the corporation cannot complain that a subsequent repealing act is passed without adequate reasons. The legislature may repeal the charter arbitrarily.

2. But where a charter provides that "if the corporation shall at any time misuse or abuse" its franchises, the legislature may revoke the grant, the power of revocation is thereby made conditional upon the fact of some misuse or abuse; and this fact must be proved upon some inquiry giving the corporation an opportunity to be heard in defense, before the charter can be revoked.

3. It seems, that a proper mode for the legislature to institute the necessary preliminary inquiry into the fact of misuse, would be to pass a resolution directing that the attorney-general institute the proper proceeding in the courts, to ascertain the fact; and that if, in such proceeding, the charge be found true, the charter be revoked.

[In equity. Bill by the mayor, etc., of the city of Baltimore, to restrain the Pittsburgh & Connellsville Railroad Company from accepting an act passed by the Pennsylvania legislature in curtailment of respondent's privileges under its charter. Heard on demurrer to the bill. Demurrer overruled.]

This case presented only the question of the constitutionality of an act of the legislature of Pennsylvania, purporting to revoke the defendants' franchises. The original charter of the corporation conferred certain valuable railway franchises upon the company, and contained a reservation of the power to repeal, in the following terms: "If the said company shall at any time misuse or abuse any of the privileges herein granted, the legislature may resume all and singular the rights and privileges hereby granted to such corporation." The city of Baltimore advanced money to the corporation, which was expended in constructing the road contemplated by the charter. Subsequently the legislature, by an act passed in 1864, [August 19, (P. L. p. 1039,)] revoked and resumed the privileges granted by the original charter, so far as to restrict the company from building a part of the road which, under the original grant, they might have constructed. The city authorities, apprehending that this enactment, if accepted by the corporation, would diminish the security for the repayment of the advances which the city had made, filed their bill to restrain the corporation from accepting the act. And the corporation demurred to the bill.

[Before GRIER, Circuit Justice, and McCANDLESS, District Judge.]

GRIER, Circuit Justice. Is this repealing act repugnant to the constitution of the United States, on the ground that it impairs the obligation of the contract between the state and the company?

The objections made on the argument to the form of the pleadings and the right of the complainants to have the remedy sought in the bill, will be found to have been overruled in a similar case by the supreme court. We refer to the case of Dodge v. Woolsey, 18 How. [59 U. S.] 331. In that case, the complainant was a stockholder in the corporation whose interests were likely to be injuriously affected by the state legislation, if it should be carried into effect. In this case, the complainant is a creditor, who, on the faith of legislative acts granting certain franchises and privileges to the Pittsburgh and Connellsville Railroad Company, has advanced large sums of money which have been expended in constructing its road. If the corporation submits to this act of the legislature, divesting them of a most valuable part of their franchises, the security and rights of the complainant will be materially injured.

The bill is in the nature of a quia timet, and the complainant has a right to the remedy sought, if the court shall be of the opinion that the act of 1864 impairs the obligation of the original contract, or act of incorporation granted to the Pittsburgh and Connellsville Railroad Company. The only question, then, is as to the validity of this act.

That the act repealing the franchises of the corporation, or a material part thereof, and transferring its franchises and property to another corporation without its consent, impairs the obligation of the original contract, is not, and cannot be denied. Nor is it denied that an act granting corporate privileges to a body of men, who have proceeded on the faith of it to subscribe stock and borrow and expend money in constructing a valuable public improvement, is a contract; and that it is not within the power of either party to the contract to repudiate or annul it without the consent of the other.

The state claims no sovereign power to repudiate its contracts or defraud its citizens, and the constitution delegates no such power to the legislature. If, in the act of incorporation, the legislature retains the absolute and unconditional power of the revocation for any or no reasons; if it is so written in the bond, the party accepting a franchise on such conditions cannot complain if it be arbitrarily revoked. Or if this contract is that the legislature may repeal the act whenever, in its opinion, the corporation has misused or abused its privileges, then the contract constitutes the legislature the arbiter and judge of the existence of that fact. But the case before us comes within neither category. The act does not give an unconditional right to the legislature to repudiate its contract, nor is the legislature constituted the tribunal to adjudge the question of fact as to the misuse or abuse.

Moreover, the case before us admits that the condition of facts upon which the legislature is authorized to repeal the act does not exist. It admits that the corporation has neither "misused nor abused its privileges."

A charter may be vacated by the decree of a judicial tribunal in a proper proceeding taken for that purpose, without any such reservation in the act of incorporation. Then both parties are heard, and a verdict of a jury on the facts can be obtained; which concludes the question. But the legislature possesses no judicial authority under the constitution, and has no established course of proceedings in the exercise of such power. The party who is injured by its action is not heard. The reasons usually alleged in the preamble to such acts are the mere suggestions of some interested party, seeking to speculate at the expense of others. Professional solicitors, who infest the lobby, are ever ready, for a sufficient consideration, to impose on the good nature of honest but often careless legislators, by the suggestion of any necessary falsehood. If any one feels curious as to the methods used by agents of corporations to obtain such legislative acts as may be desirable, he will find them fully exposed in the opinion of the supreme court delivered in the case of Marshall v. Baltimore & O. R. Co., 16 How. [57 U. S.] 314, 333.

We do not intend even to insinuate that any such secret service by "skillful and unscrupulous" agents, stimulated "to active partisanship by the strong lure of high profits" to use most "efficient means" to get the vote of the "careless" mass of legislators, has been used in this case. But we do say that the recitals in the preamble to this act exhibit a labored attempt to justify a more than doubtful exercise of power by an array of reasons which, even if true in fact, might be demurred to in law as insufficient.

The act does not contemplate the exercise of the right of domain by which the property of individuals or corporations may be taken for some public use, on making ample compensation. Its object is to transfer the franchises and property of one corporation, anxious by every means in its power to complete a valuable public improvement, to another, whose interest is not to complete the road, and which is not required to do so at any time in this or the next century.

Where, in a case like the present, the legislature is asked to take the property of one corporation and give it up to another, on the ground that one has abused or misused its privileges, the just and proper mode would be to pass a resolution ordering the attorney-general to institute the proper legal proceedings to ascertain the fact of "misuse or abuse." If such issue be found true, then that the charter be revoked or resumed. We do not say that, without such judicial proceeding ascertaining the existence of the condition in which the right of appeal is reserved, the act is absolutely void. But we do say that in all such cases the party injured, if he denies the existence of such "misuse or abuse," has a right to be heard, and to have that question tried before he shall surrender his property or his franchise.

We do not think it necessary to notice the numerous and conflicting cases which have been brought to our notice by the learned counsel. In the case of Erie & N. E. R. v. Casey, 26 Pa. St. 287, 1 Grant, Cas. 274, the court found, after a full hearing of the parties, that the fact of "misuse or abuse" did exist, and therefore the act was not void. It cannot, therefore, be any precedent for a case which admits that such facts do not exist. The principles of law, so far as they affect this case, are very clearly and tersely stated by Chief Justice Lewis, in his opinion to be found in 1 Grant, Cas. 274, with a review of the cases and a proper appreciation of that from Iowa.

The sum of the whole matter is this:

1. The complainant has shown a proper case for the interference of the court in his favor.

2. The act complained of is unconstitutional and void under the admissions of the case.

3. The complainant is entitled to the decree of the court on the pleadings, as they stand.

4. The defendants may have leave to withdraw their demurrer and answer over; and if they shall so request, an issue will be ordered to try whether the Pittsburgh and Connellsville Railroad Company have misused or abused their charter.

BANKRUPTCY—CORPORATION — MOTION BY STOCKHOLDER TO SET ASIDE DECREE—LACHES.

[The correctness of a decree declaring a corporation bankrupt upon its voluntary petition cannot be impeached, after the lapse of a year, by a stockholder who had full knowledge of all the facts.]

[Cited in Re Collateral Loan & Sav. Bank, Case No. 2,997. Followed in Re Jefferson Ins. Co., Id. 7,253.]

[In bankruptcy. In the matter of the Baltimore County Dairy Association. This association was heretofore adjudged bankrupt in this court upon its voluntary petition. Heard on motion by Frank L. Morling to set aside the decree. Denied.]

L. P. D. Newman, for Morling.

Wm. Wirt Robinson, for respondent.

GILES, District Judge. It appears by the papers in this case that the original petition to have the said association adjudged bankrupt, etc., was filed in this court on the 17th of September, 1870, and that the same was referred to the proper register, who, on the 30th of said month, adjudged the said association to be bankrupt. The petition now filed sets forth "the petition of Frank L. Morling, a resident of Hookstown, in Baltimore county, in the state of Maryland, respectfully represents unto your honor, that he was one of the corporators of the Baltimore County Dairy Association, duly incorporated by the general assembly of Maryland, in the year 1866, chapters 123 and 124, named in the above entitled cause, long before the petition was filed to have the same adjudicated a bankrupt; that at the time of filing the same he was a corporator thereof, and ever since has been, and is now a corporator; he owns thirty shares of the capital stock of said association, of the par value of three thousand dollars; that the proceedings in said cause show that one W. F. Fundenburg, professing to act as secretary of said association, caused to be filed a petition in this honorable court praying that said association might be declared and adjudicated a bankrupt upon his petition, as such officer of said association. Your petitioner further shows that he is advised, and verily believes, that the act of said Fundenburg, as secretary, in filing the petition aforesaid, whereby said association was declared and adjudged a bankrupt, was and is wholly illegal and without warrant, under the provisions of 'An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States,' approved March 2d, 1867, [14 Stat. 517,] and a fraud upon the rights of your petitioner, in that Fundenburg was not duly authorized, by a vote of a majority of the corporators of said association, at any legal meeting called for the purpose, to prefer the petition, no such meeting ever having been called for that purpose. Wherefore, your petitioner prays that the petition heretofore filed by said W. F. Fundenburg, in the above-entitled cause, may be dismissed with costs to said petitioner, and for such other and further relief as the nature of the case may require."

The answer of the secretary of said association avers and declares "that he denies all the allegations of the said petition, except as to the fact that the said F. L. Morling is a stockholder in said Baltimore County Dairy Association, of which he knows nothing; and avers and declares that all the provisions of the act entitled 'An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States,' approved March 2d, 1867, were fully complied with by said association, in conferring upon your respondent, as its secretary, the authority made necessary by the said act, to prefer the said alleged petition on the 17th day of September, 1870, asking this honorable court to adjudge and declare said association bankrupt; and that said association was duly, legally, and properly so adjudicated by this honorable court, on a date which will appear by the records thereof. That even if the allegations of the said petition were true, which your respondent denies, it is now too late for said petitioner to ask this honorable court to set aside said proceedings, for the reason that said petitioner was fully cognizant of his own knowledge, and by information from others, of the action of said association in the premises, of the preferring of said petition, but made no objection thereto at the time of the filing thereof; nor at any time anterior to the date of the said adjudication, nor subsequently thereto up to the time of the filing of his petition, did he ever appear in this honorable court and show cause why the said association should not be adjudged bankrupt, and the usual proceedings taken on such adjudication."

Before the hearing on this motion the following statement of facts was filed: It is admitted in this case that the petition filed in this cause, on the 17th of September, 1870, by W. F. Fundenburg, was upon the direction of a meeting of the directors of the said Baltimore County Dairy Association, and not upon that of a majority of the stockholders of the said association. And it is further admitted that the petitioner, Morling, had due legal notice of the fact of the said petition, of the adjudication in bankruptcy, of the call for the meeting of creditors to appoint assignees, and of their subsequent appointment and proceedings to collect and settle the estate of the said bankrupt. And also that the said petitioner, Morling, was at the time of filing the petition in bankruptcy, and still is, a stockholder, and claims to have been at such time, and now, a creditor of said association.

GILES, District Judge. It appears by the bankrupt papers on file in this court, that on the 17th of September, 1870, the said association was largely insolvent; indeed, this is not denied by the counsel for the petitioner. It also appears that the resolution of the directors of the said association, authorizing their clerk to file the original petition in bankruptcy, was passed by a majority of the directors at a meeting duly and legally called for that purpose. Under this state of facts, this court is now called upon, in a petition filed on the 9th of September, 1871, to set aside the decree in bankruptcy in this case. And this after nearly a year has elapsed since its adjudication, with full knowledge on the part of the petitioner; and when, too, the estate has been partially administered by the assignees. No reason is assigned by the petitioner for his delay in bringing his objections before the court. And while no good could be accomplished by setting aside these proceedings, much harm might acrue to the general creditors by the issuing of attachments by those who may have obtained judgments against the said association. I do not think that any court has ever set aside a judgment or decree under similar circumstances. The old maxim, "Vigilantibus, non dormientibus, leges subservient," will well apply here. In the case In re Lady Bryan Min. Co. [Case No. 7,978,] it does not appear from the report of the case at what time the motion to vacate the order adjudging the company bankrupt was made. I presume it was made shortly after the order was passed, as it was made by a creditor having a lien by attachment, which would have been dissolved if the order had been permitted to stand.

In dismissing this petition, I do not wish to be considered as deciding that the original petition was regular and according to law. The form No. 3, as adopted by the justices of the supreme court, in exercising the power vested in them by the 10th section of the bankrupt act, certainly justifies the inference that they supposed this was a matter of procedure which they had authority to regulate. On the 16th of May, 1867, the supreme court passed the following order: "Ordered, that certain rules and forms of proceedings in bankruptcy have been framed and adopted by the court, in pursuance of the act of congress approved March 2d, 1867, and the same are promulgated as such." Among these, rule 32 reads thus: "The several forms specified in the schedules annexed to these orders for the several purposes therein stated, shall be observed and used, with such alterations as may be necessary to suit the circumstances of any particular case." And form No. 3, in the schedules annexed in said orders, is in these words:

"Corporation Petition.

"Statement to accompany petition of corporation (in bankruptcy).

"At a meeting of the stockholders (or, of the board of directors or trustees, as the case may be) of the ——— company (or association, or bank, or society), a corporation created by ——— of the state of ———, held at ——— in the county of ———, and state of ———, on this ——— day of ———, A. D. 18—, the condition of the affairs of said corporation having been inquired into, and being ascertained to the satisfaction of said meeting that the said corporation was insolvent, and that its affairs ought to be wound up, it was voted (or resolved) by a majority of the corporators (or stockholders, or directors, or trustees) present at such meeting (which was duly called and notified for the purpose of taking such action upon the subject aforesaid), that ——— be and ——— hereby ——— authorized, empowered, and required to file a petition in the district court of the United States, for the ——— district of ———, within which said corporation has carried on its business, for the purpose of having the same adjudged bankrupt; and that such proceedings be had thereon as are provided by the act of congress, entitled 'An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States,' approved March 2d, 1867. In witness hereof, I have hereunto subscribed my name as president (or other officer or agent) of said corporation, and affixed the {Seal of Corporation.} seal of the same this ——— day of ———, A. D 18—.

"President (or other officer) of said corporation."

And the counsel who framed the original petition in this case, and the register who acted on it, deemed they were strictly complying with the bankrupt law, in the mode and manner marked out by the supreme court.

Whether they did so or not I am not compelled now to decide, as a stockholder with full knowledge of all the facts, who remains silent for nearly a year after the adjudication in bankruptcy, will not be heard to impeach its correctness. The supreme court in the case of Zabriskie v. Cleveland, C. & C. R. Co., 23 How. [64 U. S.] 398, say (quoting approvingly the decisions in Ohio), "the supreme court of Ohio have recognized the obligation of corporators to be prompt and vigilant in the exposure of illegality or abuse in the employment of their corporate powers, and has denied assistance to those who have waited till the evil has been done, and the interest of innocent parties has become involved."

Upon this principle, so clearly enunciated, I dismiss the petition filed to vacate the proceedings in this case; the costs to be paid by the petitioner.

BALTIMORE & O. R. CO. v. VAN NESS et al.

[4 Cranch, C. C. 595.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov. Term, 1835.

EMINENT DOMAIN—PROCEDURE—CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTES—AMENDMENTS—MISRECITAL OF DATE OF PRIOR ACT.

1. The time, to extend and construct the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad into and within the District of Columbia, given by the act of congress of March 2, 1831, c. 84, [4 Stat. 476, c. 85,] was extended by the act of February 26, 1834, c. 11, [4 Stat. 672,] to another period of four years.

2. The act of March 3, 1835, c. 38, [4 Stat. 757,] is not void because its title misrecites the date of the act to which it is supplementary; nor is it confined to the mere construction of the road; but gives authority also to condemn land for the use of the company; nor is it void because its title purports it to be an act supplementary to an act which expired by its own limitation; it being revived by a subsequent act.

3. If the act of 1831 expired by the limitation contained in its 5th section, it was revived by the act of February 26, 1834.

4. It is not necessary that the jury should be sworn on the lot to be condemned. It is sufficient that they meet on the lot. They may be sworn on another lot.

5. Notice, on the 27th of April, that the jury would meet on the land, on the 1st of May, to take the inquisition, is sufficient.

6. The railroad is a road for public use, and land may be taken therefor, upon just compensation being made.

Several inquisitions were taken, upon several warrants issued by a justice of the peace for the county of Washington, against D. Carroll, John A. Wilson, D. A. Hall, and Moses Tabbs and others, under the act of congress of March 3, 1835, c. 38, (4 stat. 757,) entitled "An act supplementary to an act entitled 'an act to authorize the extension, construction, and use of a lateral branch of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad into and within the District of Columbia,' passed December, 1829." The act alluded to was not passed in December, 1829, but on the 2d of March, 1831, c. 84, [4 Stat. 476, c. 85.] These inquisitions being returned to the clerk's office by the marshal,

Mr. R. S. Coxe, for the defendants, moved the court to set them aside, for the following reasons:

1. Because there is no authority given by any act of the congress of the United States to warrant the said proceedings.

2. Because the said proceedings are wholly irregular and unauthorized by any law.

3. Because the jury did not estimate the comparative advantages and disadvantages of the contemplated railroad; but, in estimating the same, proceeded upon unfair and unequal principles.

4. Because the jury heard illegal evidence.

5. Because there was no lawful oath administered to the witnesses.

6. Because there has been no proper or lawful return of the said proceedings.

7. Because there was no legal or sufficient notice to the owners of the property through which the said road is laid.

Mr. Coxe contended that the act of March 3, 1835, [4 Stat. 757, c. 38,] was void, because its title referred to an act passed in December, 1829, when no such act existed; and that if it was not void, still it did not give any right to condemn land for the road; it only gives authority to locate and construct the road, but these powers do not imply a power to condemn the land. It refers to the act of 1831, which had expired by its own limitation, because the road was not commenced within a year after passing the act. If it was revived by the act of February 26, 1834, c. 11, the act of 1835 should have been supplementary to the act of 1834, and not to the expired act of 1831.

He contended, also, that the jury should have been sworn on the land, whereas the jury were sworn in all the cases, upon the land of Mr. Wilson only. That the act of 1831 only provides for the mode of proceedings by the marshal and jury; not as to any ulterior proceedings, or the return, or the jurisdiction of this court.

Mr. J. Dunlop, contra. The acts of 1831, 1834, and 1835 give the power to condemn the land, and refer to the Maryland charter of 1827, which requires the inquisition to be returned to the clerk, by whom it is to be filed in court, and it is to be affirmed, unless set aside by the court; and if set aside, a new inquisition is to be taken. There can be no doubt of the jurisdiction of the court.

The notices were all served on or before the 27th of April, and the jury was summoned for the 1st of May. There is no irregularity in the proceedings. There is no evidence that the jury estimated the comparative advantages and disadvantages; or that they proceeded upon unfair or unequal principles; nor that they received illegal evidence; nor in what manner the jurors were sworn. No error is shown in the return of the inquisitions.

Mr. Coxe, in reply, contended that the railroad is not a common highway. It is the exclusive right of the railroad company; and private property cannot be taken for private use. If it be doubtful whether congress has authorized the taking of private property, the court would so construe their act as not to violate the constitution.

CRANCH, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court. The act of congress of the 3d of March, 1829, c. 28, (4 Stat. 757,) entitled an act supplementary to an act entitled "An act to authorize the extension, construction, and use of a lateral branch of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad into and within the District of Columbia," passed December, 1829, (section 3,) authorizes the railroad company to construct their road through or over the lots or squares in the inquisitions mentioned, "upon the same terms, and with the same privileges as are prescribed for passing through the squares enumerated in the first section of the act;" that is, in the same manner and with the same rights and privileges which are granted to them by the act of the 2d of March, 1831, [4 Stat. 476,] "for the construction of their said road within the District of Columbia beyond the limits of the city of Washington, any thing in the said act notwithstanding." By the first section of that act (March 2, 1831) the railroad company are authorized to exercise the same rights, powers, and privileges, and be subject to the same restrictions in the extension and construction of this road, as they may exercise, or are subject to, under and by virtue of their charter of February 28, 1827, in the extension and construction of any railroad in Maryland, and are entitled to the same rights, &c., provided that before they proceed to construct any railroad on any land, &c., they shall first obtain the assent of the owner, &c.; but if they cannot obtain such assent, they may apply to a justice of the peace of the county of Washington, who shall issue his warrant to the marshal to summon a jury of twenty inhabitants of the district, not interested, &c., "to meet on the land," on a day, not less than three nor more than fifteen days after issuing the warrant, to proceed to value the damages which the owner or owners of any such land will sustain by the use or occupation of the same required by the said company; and the proceedings, duty, and authority of the said marshal, in regard to such warrant and jury, and the oath or affirmation to be administered, and inquisition to be made and returned, shall be the same as are directed and authorized, in regard to the sheriff, by the fifteenth section of the act of assembly of the state of Maryland incorporating the said Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company; and all the other proceedings in regard to such jury, and the estimating and valuation of damages, and the payment, or tender of payment of any damages ascertained by such valuation, and effect thereof, and of the view of any lands or other property or materials, as to giving the said company a right to use the same for the use or construction of any railroad within the said district as hereby authorized, shall in every case, and in every respect, be the same as is provided in and by the above-mentioned act of incorporation, in regard to the railroad thereby authorized to be constructed by the said company."

But, by this act of March 2, 1831, the railroad company were forbidden to cross any private property in the city of Washington, even with the consent of the owner. This prohibition was the cause of the act of March 3, 1835.

By the fifteenth section of the act of Maryland of February 28, 1827, each party is to strike out four of the twenty jurors, and the remaining twelve are to act as the jury of inquest, and the sheriff is to administer an oath to each juror that he "will justly and impartially value the damages which the owner or owners will sustain by the use or occupation of the same required by the said company;" and the jury, in estimating such damages, shall take into the estimate the benefit resulting to the said owner or owners, from conducting such railroad through, along, or near to the property of such owner or owners; but only in extinguishment of the claim for damages; and the jury shall reduce their inquisition to writing, and shall sign and seal the same; and it shall then be returned by the said sheriff to the clerk, or prothonotary of his county, as the case may be; and, by such clerk or prothonotary, filed in his court, and shall be confirmed by said court, at its next session, if no sufficient cause to the contrary, be shown; and, when confirmed, shall be recorded by said clerk or prothonotary, at the expense of said company; but if set aside the court may direct another inquisition to be taken in the manner above prescribed; and such inquisition shall describe the property taken, or the bounds of the lands condemned, and the quantity or duration of the interest in the same, valued for the company; and such valuation, when paid, or tendered to the owner or owners of the said property, &c., shall entitle the company to the estate and interest in the same thus valued, as fully as if it had been conveyed by the owner or owners of the same, &c.

Upon consideration of the proceedings in these cases, and the several acts aforesaid, the court is of opinion,

1. That the said proceedings are warranted by law.

2. That they are regular.

3. That it does not appear that the jury did not consider the benefits as well as the disadvantages.

4. That it does not appear that illegal evidence was received.

5. Nor that the witnesses were not properly sworn.

6. That the return of the marshal is correct in form.

7. The notice was sufficient.

Another objection, suggested in the argument, was, that it is taking private property for private use, which is not authorized by the constitution. The fifth amendment of the constitution of the United States says, that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation. But the objection is that private property is taken for private use, with just compensation; which is not within the prohibition of the constitution; although it would be an arbitrary proceeding. But this railroad, although it may be profitable to the stockholders, is also a great public benefit. It does not prevent the public from enjoying all the advantages which they enjoyed before, and gives them a cheaper, safer, and more expeditious mode of travelling than they would otherwise have. If it may not be called a common highway, yet it is really a common good. It is a great public convenience. The land is really taken for public use. The condemnation of land, for such purposes, has been so general, and so extensive, for many years, that it may well be considered as established by the law of the land. Every state of the Union has granted charters for such objects, with similar powers. The rates of toll, &c., are established by law, which could not be done unless the object was of a public nature; nor would the legislature have power to restrain them in the exercise of their private rights. The state of Maryland also has a great interest in the road, as it is to receive five per cent. upon the gross receipts of tolls from passengers; and has an option to take a large portion of the stock within a limited time after the completion of the road. The condemnation of the land, therefore, is clearly for the Maryland public use; even if it be not for the use of the whole American public.

If the constitutionality of a law be doubtful, the court is not at liberty to declare it void; but is bound to give it effect. In Fletcher v. Peck, 6 Cranch, [10 U. S.] 87, Mr. Chief Justice Marshall, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "The question whether a law be void for its repugnancy to the constitution, is, at all times, a question of much delicacy, which ought, seldom, if ever, to be decided in the affirmative in a doubtful case. The court, when impelled, by duty, to render such a judgment, would be unworthy of its station could it be unmindful of the solemn obligations which that station imposes. But it is not on slight implication and vague conjecture that the legislature is to be pronounced to have transcended its powers, and its acts to be considered as void. The opposition between the constitution and the law should be such that the judge feels a clear and strong conviction of their incompatibility with each other." Again he said: "It may well be doubted whether the nature of society and of government does not prescribe some limits to the legislative power; and if any be prescribed, where are they to be found, if the property of an individual fairly and honestly acquired, may be seized without compensation?" In the case of Horne's Lessee v. Dorrance, 3 Dall. 304, 312, [Van Horne v. Dorrance, 2 Dall. (2 U. S.) 304, 312,] the circuit court of the United States for the district of Pennsylvania admit, that, in a case of necessity, of which the legislature is the sole judge, it may take the real estate from A. and give it to B., on making compensation, to be ascertained by a jury, although the constitution of Pennsylvania expressly declares that the right of acquiring, possessing, and protecting property is natural, inherent, and unalienable.

So that, whether the railroad is a public or a private object, in itself, the legislature, having deemed it to be so far a public object as to be worthy of their control and regulation, and of the exercise of their power to apply private property to its use, upon making just compensation, to be ascertained by a jury, we cannot say that the provisions of the act, which authorize the condemnation of land, for such a road, are void, as being unconstitutional, or as contravening any of the principles of natural justice.

The inquisitions were all confirmed, (MORSELL, Circuit Judge, doubting as to the last point.)

SEAMAN'S WAGES—SAILING ON SHARES.

A master of a schooner sailed her on shares. A sailor, on leaving the vessel, had a settlement with the master and took the master's note for the amount of wages due him and some money loaned by him to the master. The note was not paid, and nine months after the discharge of the sailor, he filed a libel against the vessel to recover his wages. A settlement had been had between the master and the owners before the libel was filed: Held, that, although there was no evidence of a specific notice to the libellant that he was to be paid by the master only, yet under the circumstances, if the libellant ever had a lien on the vessel for his wages, he must be held to have waived it.

trade between Virginia and New York. It is brought some nine months after the libellant was discharged from the vessel. At the time of the discharge, a settlement was had between him and the master, for the wages then due, and also for money loaned by the libellant to the master; and the promissory note of the master for the balance of the account, payable at a future day, was then taken by the libellant. The vessel was sailed on shares, the master to furnish the crew; and a settlement between the master and owners was had before the commencement of this action. The note of the master not being paid, this action is brought to enforce a lien upon the vessel for the amount of the wages.

I am of the opinion, that the action can not be sustained, for the reason that the evidence shows that the service was performed upon the personal credit of the master. It is true that, in the case of a seaman, strong proof is to be required to establish an intention not to look to the vessel; and it is also true that there is, in this case, no evidence of a specific notice to the seaman that he was to be paid by the master. But other circumstances plainly point to the inference, that the libellant knew that the vessel was sailed on shares, and that he settled with the master upon the understanding that he was to look to the master alone for his pay. Further, the taking of the promissory note of the master payable at a future day, and the omission to proceed against the vessel for a period of nine months, no excuse for the delay being given, and the statements of the libellant that he had no claim against the vessel, warrant the determination that if the libellant ever had a lien it has been waived and cannot now be enforced against the vessel.

Libel dismissed, with costs.

BAMFIELD v. ABBOT.

[9 Law Rep. 510.]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. Jan., 1847.

ARMY OF UNITED STATES—ENLISTMENT OF MINOR—STATE LAWS—HABEAS CORPUS.

1. A minor, who enlisted in one of the volunteer companies, raised under the act of congress of May, [13,] 1846, [9 Stat. 9, c. 16,] providing for the raising of military forces for the Mexican war, but which company has not yet been mustered into the service of the United States, or received or accepted by any officer thereof, and has not received any rations or clothing therefrom, cannot be held in custody as a volunteer, under the law of the United States.

2. Nor can such minor be held under the statute of Massachusetts of 1840, c. 92, § 5, which provides for the ordering out of the militia, by draft or otherwise.

[Cited in Re McDonald, Case No. 8,752.]

This was a writ of habeas corpus to bring up the body of Robert C. Rowe. The first question raised was, whether the courts or judges of the United States have jurisdiction to inquire into the cause of detention. The petitioner set forth that he was the legal guardian of the said Rowe, who was a minor, and restrained of his liberty by the respondent, as commander of a company of volunteers, enlisted in the United States service in the war against Mexico, claiming to hold him by virtue of a pretended engagement on the part of said ward to serve in said war under the command of the respondent. The return of the respondent did not deny any of the allegations in the petition, but set forth that the cause of the detention of the said Rowe was, that he voluntarily enlisted and was mustered in Company C of the first regiment Massachusetts volunteers, on the 28th day of December last, and has received his rations and clothing since that date.

N. T. Dow, for petitioner.

Mr. Rantoul, for respondent.

SPRAGUE, District Judge. The return is not full and explicit, in the statement of facts, and at the hearing I stated to the learned counsel for the respondent, that by its language I understood that the respondent claimed the custody and control of the said Rowe as a volunteer soldier, who had been mustered into the service of the United States and received from them clothing and rations as such, under the act of 1846, [Act May 13, 1846; 9 Stat. 9, c. 16.] And I suggested that if that was not the ground on which the respondent intended to rest his claim, the return might be amended so as to present the facts as he wished to have them understood, and time was given to the counsel for that purpose. The respondent, however, has not seen fit to make any amendment or addition to his return, and I must take it as asserting a claim to hold the said Rowe in custody as a volunteer under the law of the United States. Under this petition and return, therefore, I cannot doubt that it is my duty to inquire into the cause of detention.

It appears that the said Rowe is now between 18 and 19 years of age; that previous to the fourteenth of November last, his residence had from his birth been in the state of New Hampshire; that both his parents died more than two years ago; that in the summer of 1846, the petitioner was appointed his guardian, and that both had resided in the town of Dover in that state, but that the guardian had not interfered with the labor or earnings of the ward. But the said Rowe left Dover on or about the 14th of November, without the consent of his guardian, who had no knowledge where he had gone until a week or ten days ago, when he heard that he was in Boston, and had enlisted as a volunteer. On the 28th of December last, he enlisted as a member of Company C of the Massachusetts infantry, which was subsequently organized under the authority of the governor of Massachusetts, and the officers were commissioned by him. But the original enlistment, and the whole proceedings, were for the express and sole purpose of having the said company received into the service of the United States as volunteers under the act of congress for 1846. And that for this purpose the said Rowe and about forty-five others had been examined by a captain and surgeon of the United States army, who had certified to their physical qualifications, and that they had been, by order of the respondent, as captain of said company, held under military discipline, at quarters in the city of Boston, and not allowed to depart from those quarters except by the order or special permission of the respondent, with a view of having them mustered into the service of the United States as volunteers, but for want of a sufficient number of men, the said company had not in any manner been mustered into the service of the United States, or been received or accepted by any officer thereof, or received any rations or clothing therefrom. The said Rowe has not then come under the authority of the president or any officer of the United States, and I do not understand the learned counsel as contending that he can be held by the respondent under the act of congress of 1846.

But it is insisted that he may be held under the Massachusetts statute of 1840, c. 92, § 5. In the first place, that section refers to the dormant and not to the active militia of Massachusetts. In the next place, no order of the commander-in-chief of the commonwealth, or any other officer, is shown, calling forth the militia or placing them in a state of preparation for actual service, as contended for. And thirdly, the return of the respondent does not rest his claim to hold the said Rowe in confinement upon any such ground, and in this respect the return is not inconsistent with the evidence. Whether the said Rowe has subjected himself to the duties imposed by the laws of Massachusetts upon the militia of that state, I am not called upon to decide, and express no opinion. The claim of the respondent being in my opinion not sanctioned by law, and the said Rowe having declared his wish to be discharged, I am bound to order that he be set at liberty.

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS—DAMAGES—COUNSEL FEES—ACT OF JULY 8, 1870.

1 There is nothing in the 55th section of the act of July 8th, 1870, (16 Stat. 206,) which entitles the plaintiff in a suit in equity for the infringement of letters patent, to recover, as an item of the damages prayed for in the bill, the amount of money paid by him to his counsel in the suit for services rendered therein.

[See Holbrook v. Small, Case No. 6,596; Whittemore v. Cutter, Id. 17,600; Stimson v. The Railroads, Id. 13,456; Philp v. Nock, 17 Wall. (84 U. S.) 460; Teese v. Huntingdon, 23 How. (64 U. In equity. [Bill by Lorey F. Bancroft and Andrew B. Yetter against Charles A. Acton for infringement of letters patent.]

William J. A. Fuller, for plaintiffs.

James Knox, for defendant.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. The question raised in this case, which is a suit in equity for an injunction and an account of profits, and the recovery of damages, founded on the infringement of letters patent, is, whether, under the 55th section of the act of July 8th, 1870, (16 Stat. 206,) revising, consolidating and amending the statutes relating to patents and copyrights, the plaintiffs can recover, as an item of the damages prayed for in the bill, the amount of money paid by them to their counsel in the suit for services rendered therein. That section provides, that, upon a decree being rendered for an infringement, in a suit in equity brought to prevent the violation of any right secured by patent, the complainant shall be entitled to recover, in addition to the profits to be accounted for by the defendant, the damages the complainant has sustained thereby, and that the court shall assess the same, or cause the same to be assessed under its direction, and shall have the same powers to increase the same in its discretion, that are given by such act, in its 59th section, to increase the damages found by verdicts in actions upon the case. It is manifest, that the sole object of this provision of the 55th section, which is new, is, to enable the plaintiff, by bringing a suit in equity, to recover, in such suit, not only the profits made by the defendant by means of the infringement, but also the damages sustained by the plaintiff thereby. In the absence of this provision, this could not have been done. But, under this provision, a plaintiff cannot recover, as damages, any items which he cannot recover as damages under the 59th section, in an action on the case. That section provides, that damages for the infringement of any patent may be recovered by action on the case. The damages spoken of in the 55th section can have no greater scope or extent than those spoken of in the 59th section. The provisions of the 59th section in regard to damages are but a re-enactment of the provisions on the same subject in the 14th section of the act of July 4th, 1836, (5 Stat. 123.) Under the latter act, it is well settled, by authoritative decisions, that counsel fees paid or incurred by the plaintiff, in an action at law for the infringement of a patent, are not a proper element for the consideration of the jury, in the estimation of the damages to be recovered in such action. Day v. Woodworth, 13 How. [54 U. S.] 363. There is nothing in the 55th section of the act of 1870 which enables the plaintiffs in this suit to recover the counsel fees in question as damages therein.

MARITIME LIENS—PRIORITY — DAMAGES FOR COLLISION.

[1. The claim of a libellant for damages occasioned by collision is a maritime lien upon the vessel at fault, or a charge or privilege which gives him substantially the same rights and remedies.]

[2. Maritime liens on a vessel sold under the order of a court of admiralty should, as a general rule, be paid out of the proceeds, in the inverse order of the dates of their creation.]

[5. No difference exists between seamen's wages for the same season of navigation on the lakes, or between the claims of material men who are concurrently giving credit in fitting out a vessel for a voyage, or preparing her for business at the commencement of a season. [6. In a libel in rem, all persons have a right to intervene for their interest, and the suit is, in substance, against such persons, as much as if they were specially named defendants. They are bound by the proceedings and decree, and a sale of the res under such proceedings extinguishes their rights.]

[7. A creditor who obtains a final decree before other creditors having co-ordinate claims have taken action is entitled to be paid in preference to those who do not assert their claims.]

[8. The claims of the holders of bottomry bonds, material men, and a libellant for damages for collision, are of equal rank, and are subject to the general rules of priority and preference.]

[Libel in rem by De Witt C. Bancroft against the steamboat America, J. W. Phillips, claimant.]

Before HALL, District Judge.

HALL, District Judge. The vessel of the libellant having been sunk by a collision with the America on Lake Erie, July 12th, 1852, a libel was filed to recover the damages, and on the 14th of December, 1852, $10,000 (ten thousand dollars) was awarded to him for the said damages. The America was sold, by order of court, September 10th, 1852, and the proceeds, amounting to $10,950, brought into registry.

Before the above mentioned decree was made, suits were commenced by seamen to recover wages, and so, after the sale, they were paid out of the fund without opposition. A suit was also commenced Oct. 2nd, 1852, to recover damages occasioned by a previous collision of the America, and those whose liens attached subsequent to the collision with the libellant's vessel, and which had possession of the America, and common-law liens, or liens under the state statute, were also directed to be paid out of the fund, though opposed by the collision claimant. The libellant then claimed, by petition, the whole residue of the fund, on the ground that he was entitled to preference over all the other parties.

Held, that the claim of the libellant for the damages occasioned by the collision was a maritime lien upon the America, or a charge or privilege which gave him substantially the same rights and remedies.

The maritime liens upon a ship sold under the order of a court of admiralty should, as a general rule, be paid out of the proceeds in the inverse order of the dates of their creation. These include wages, pilotage, towage, wharfage, claims for salvage, bottomry, damages for collision, and materials.

That this order of preference should be followed only when the liens all belong to the same class. But it is not intended to decide that a bottomry bond executed by the owner, or claims under contracts of freightment, are to be paid in the same order as though they were liens arising out of it, or founded upon the necessities of the ship. Nor is it intended to declare that any difference will be made between seamen's wages for the same season of navigation on the lakes, or between the claims of material men who are concurrently giving credit to a vessel, in fitting her out for a voyage, or preparing her for business, at the commencement of a season. A season of navigation on the lakes may be assimilated to a voyage.

This is a suit in rem, all persons having a right to intervene for their interest, and the suit is in substance against such persons, as much as if they were specially named as defendants. That they are bound by the proceedings and decree, and by a sale of the res under such proceedings their rights therein being extinguished.

That a creditor who obtains a final decree before other creditors having co-ordinate or equal claims have brought their actions is entitled to be paid in preference to those who do not assert his claim; the intervention of a creditor, for the purpose of obtaining payment of his claim, concurrently with or in exclusion of the libellant being in the nature of a defence to the adverse claim of the libellant.

That the claims of bottomry bondholders and material men are of equal validity, and should be subject to the same general rules of priority and preference, and that the libellant's claim for damages should be considered of equal rank with the latter.

POLICE POWER—CONTRACT WITH THE STATE—PUBLIC AGENTS—INJUNCTION.

1. A court of equity has power to enjoin the officers of a state from acting under a law which impairs the obligation of a contract made with the state.

2. Unless restrained by its constitution, a state, in the exercise of its police power may provide by contract that certain persons shall have exclusive privileges—as that, to supply the common schools of the state with text-books of a specified character and price.

3. An act of the state of Oregon authorized the adoption of text-books for the use of the common schools of the state, by a majority of the votes of the county superintendents, to be canvassed and declared by the board of education, and provided that the books so adopted should be exclusively used in such schools for the period of four years thereafter: Held, that such act did not constitute a contract with the publishers of the adopted books, by which the state was bound to use the same in its schools for said period, nor authorize the board of education to make any contract with such publishers on behalf of the state, concerning the furnishing and use of such books; but that said act was a mere regulation imposed by the state upon itself, and therefore the legislature might modify or abrogate it at pleasure.

[Cited in Ivison v. Board of School Com'rs, 39 Fed. 737.]

4. A state is not bound by the act of its agents, unless they are manifestly acting within the scope of their authority.

[In equity. Suit for an injunction by A. L. Bancroft and Hubert H. Bancroft against W. W. Thayer, governor, R. P. Erhart, secretary, and L. J. H. Y. Thompson and George H. Durham, for complainants.

Joseph N. Dolph, for defendants.

DEADY, District Judge. This suit is brought to enjoin the defendants, constituting the state board of education, from taking steps to adopt a new series of text-books for the common schools of this state, under section 12 of the act of October 29, 1872, as amended by section 4 of the act of October 4, 1878, (Sess. Laws, p. 61,) in place of the one now in use, published by the complainants.

The bill states that the complainants are citizens of California, and the defendants, of Oregon; that in pursuance of the act of October 29, 1872, aforesaid, entitled "An act to establish a uniform course of public instruction in the common schools of this state," the board of education, among others, adopted six books, published by the complainants, and known as the "Pacific Coast Series," as text-books to be used in the common schools of this state for the period of four years from October 1, 1873, which books were furnished by complainants during said period at fixed prices, in sufficient quantities for said schools; that said board of education, in pursuance of said act, again adopted said books for said schools for another period of four years from October 1, 1877; that in November, 1876, and prior to said second adoption, said board passed a resolution, prescribing "the manner of binding, the mode of printing, and the price to be paid for such series of books as might be adopted by said board for the said period of four years," and that the complainants, on November 26, 1876, "duly filed with the said board of education" their "written obligation," "wherein and whereby they undertook and agreed that if said Pacific Coast Series should be adopted for use in the common schools of Oregon, for the said period of four years from October 1, 1877," the complainants "would in all things comply with the demands of said board, as in said resolution set forth;" that thereupon said series of books "was adopted by the said board of education in the manner and form by law provided, and became the text-books to be used in the common schools of the state of Oregon" until October 1, 1881; that the complainants are bound to furnish, and said schools to receive, said books for said period, and complainants have so far complied with said contract, and are ready and willing to do so until the expiration of the same; that the complainants, in order to perform said contract, have been obliged to expend large sums of money in the purchase of material and labor for the manufacture of said books, and to publish and to keep on hand large quantities of the same, and, therefore, if such state board shall violate or fail to comply with the terms of said contract, the complainants will suffer great and irreparable loss; that on April 17, 1879, said board, in violation of said contract, and with intent to disregard it, ordered the defendant, Powell, to issue a circular to the county superintendents, directing them to vote upon the adoption of a series of text-books for said schools for the purpose of authorizing other and different books than said Pacific Coast Series, to be used in said schools during the remainder of said period of four years.

Upon reading and filing the bill, April 23, an order was made that the defendants show cause why a provisional injunction should not issue, as prayed for, and that in the meantime they be restrained accordingly. The defendants showed cause by demurring to the bill, which on May 6 was argued by counsel.

The demurrer sets up: 1. This court has no jurisdiction of the cause; 2. There is a defect of parties, in this, that the state is not made a party defendant; 3. The complainants have an adequate remedy at law; and, 4. There is no equity in the bill.

At the argument, upon the decisive authority of Osborn v. Bank of United States, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 738, wherein it was held that a court of equity may restrain, by injunction, a public officer of a state from acting under a void law of a state to destroy a franchise; that as the state cannot be joined as a defendant, its agent may be sued alone; and that the prohibition to sue a state, contained in the eleventh amendment to the constitution, does not extend to cases in which a state is not made a party on the record, even if the state has the entire ultimate interest in the subject of the suit—the first and second causes of the demurrer were expressly abandoned and the third one was not insisted upon.

Under the fourth cause it was maintained by counsel for the defendants: 1. That the power to regulate the common schools of the state is a part of the police power of the state which cannot be alienated or restrained even by express grant; 2. The law did not give the board of education or any one power to contract with the complainants to furnish school books for the use of the common schools of the state for any definite length of time, or at all; and, 3. No such contract appears to have been made.

The term "police power of a state" is a convenient and comprehensive expression used to signify those powers by means of which it not only preserves public order and prevents crime, but also promotes and secures good manners in the intercourse between its citizens, and thereby prevents a conflict of rights. 4 Bl. Comm. 162; Cooley, Const. Lim. 572.

The constitution of Oregon (article 8, § 3) declares that "the legislative assembly shall provide by law for the establishment of a uniform and general system of common schools." Now, if this be a police power—a mode of preventing crime or promoting good manners—as it probably is, the legislature may exercise it by contracting with any one to furnish books of a prescribed character and cost for the use of said schools for a definite period. To authorize and provide that, by means of contract or legislative grant, a particular person or persons shall have the exclusive right to do or furnish a particular thing, upon certain conditions, for the use and convenience of the public, has always been a common mode of exercising the police powers of the state, and unless the constitution imposes some limitation upon the power of the legislature in this respect, its action is final and binding. Slaughter-house Cases, 16 Wall. [83 U. S.] 66. As was well said by Mr. Justice Miller, in delivering the opinion of the court in the case last cited: "It may be safely affirmed that the parliament of Great Britain, representing the people in their legislative functions, and the legislative bodies of this country, have from time immemorial to the present day continued to grant to persons and corporations exclusive privileges—privileges denied to other citizens—privileges which come within any just definition of the word monopoly, as much as those now under consideration; and that the power to do this has never been questioned or denied. Nor can it be truthfully denied that some of the most useful and beneficial enterprises set on foot for the general good have been made successful by means of these exclusive rights, and could only have been conducted to success in that way."

To say that the legislature cannot barter away the police power of the state, or that one legislature cannot make a law which another one cannot repeal, is simply begging the question. It is not a question as to the comparative powers of different legislatures, but of the state. However many legislatures there may be, there is but one state, and it is a continuous being. The legislature is merely a means by which it exercises its powers.

The question is, then, could the state, as organized, make the contract? If it could, good faith requires that it should keep it; and under section 10 of article 1 of the national constitution it cannot pass a valid "law impairing the obligation" thereof. That it would be wise to place some limitations upon the power of the state to bind itself by contract, I admit. But that power is not in the courts, and can only be exercised by the people in the formation of the organic law.

It is claimed by the complainants that they have a valid subsisting contract with the state to furnish certain text-books for its common schools until October 1, 1881; and admitting, for the time being, that the transaction which is alleged to have taken place between the complainants and the state officers amounts in form to a contract to that effect, the question arises, was any one authorized by the state to make such a contract on its behalf?

The power to contract is claimed to be given to the board of education by the common school act of October 29, 1872. This act provides, in sections 10, 11 and 12 (Laws Or. 503,) for submitting the question of school books every four years to a vote of the county superintendents of schools. The vote is obtained by the superintendent of public instruction, acting under the direction of the board of education, sending a circular to each county superintendent containing a list of the studies required to be taught in the public schools, who "shall, after due consideration, write opposite each study the text-book preferred" by him, and return the circular to the state superintendent, "who shall cause the same to be laid before the state board of education, and the text-book in any one branch receiving the highest number of votes shall be the authorized text-book in that branch in the public schools of this state for the four years next succeeding the official announcement of the superintendent of public instruction." Every four years after "the first selection of text-books" the superintendent shall issue similar circulars for another vote on the question, and unless some new book shall receive a majority of the votes, no change shall be made during the ensuing four years. Section 17 provides that the board shall have power "to authorize a series of text-books to be used in the public schools, in accordance with the provisions of this act." But the legislature of 1878 amended section 12 aforesaid so as to empower the board of education to order an election for school books at any time when in its "judgment" any book in use is supplied "at an unreasonably high price, or is found to be excelled by more recent publications in that branch, or for any good and sufficient cause." It is further provided that any book adopted at such election shall be introduced into all the common schools of the state within six months thereafter. The defendants are proceeding under this amended section to order a new election at once.

These are all the provisions of law on the subject, and it will be seen at a glance that the power of selecting—"adopting"—school books is not in the board of education but the county superintendents. The only power the board has in the premises is to call the election for school books and to canvass the votes and declare the result. The power given them by section 17 aforesaid "to authorize a series of text-books" adds nothing to the case in this respect, for they can only exercise such power in the manner suggested by calling an election by the county superintendents and declaring the result.

After a careful consideration of the matter I am unable to find any authority in this legislation for making any contract with reference to the supply of school books. The county superintendents may vote to adopt and the board must declare the result and thereby authorize the use of the books elected. But in all this there is no power to contract and bind the state beyond its power of revocation. Here the power of the officers ends, and the people in the several districts are left to get the books on the best terms they can, or do without them and forfeit their share of the public funds.

A law requiring the secretary of state to purchase stationery exclusively from the complainants for four years would bind the secretary, but not the complainants, and of itself would not constitute a contract between the complainants and the state. Nor would a formal agreement entered into between the parties. for the delivery of the stationery and specifying the character and cost of the material to be furnished change or enlarge the operation of the law in this respect. Such a law would be nothing more than a regulation which the state imposed upon itself in the person of its secretary and which by the agency of its law-making power, the legislature, it could change or abrogate at pleasure. Such, it seems to me, is the character and effect of this legislation to secure uniformity in school books. The act is not a contract nor a proposal which being accepted may become a contract, but a rule for the government of certain officers and people of the state. Neither does it authorize any one to make a contract as a means of carrying its provisions into effect or otherwise. It merely provides for the selection of a series of school books at certain fixed intervals and commands their use in the districts under a penalty. The state is the only party to the transaction, and may therefore modify the regulation at pleasure. An act directly requiring the schools to use the Pacific Coast Series for the ensuing four years would not be a contract with the complainants to that effect, nor authorize the board of education to make one with them to furnish such books. But the fact that this act provides that the selection shall be made through the intervention of certain officers does not change its character in that respect, and it is still merely a regulation imposed by the state upon itself to the effect, that only certain books shall be used in its schools for a certain period or until otherwise provided by the legislature. It is true, as appears, that the board of education from, as I supposed, a laudable desire to supply the defects and omissions of this crude and incomplete legislation, entered into an arrangement with the complainants at the time of the selection of their books, which, as between individuals, might well be considered a contract with a view of securing the people of the state a constant supply of the books adopted until October, 1881, of good workmanship and at a fair and fixed price.

But it is a well settled rule of law, that the state is not bound by the acts of its agents, unless it manifestly appears that they were acting within the scope of their authority; and individuals as well as courts must take notice of the nature and extent of the authority conferred by law upon a person acting in an official capacity. "It is thought better that an individual should occasionally suffer from the mistakes of public officers or agents, than to adopt a rule which, through improper combinations or collusion, might be turned to the detriment and injury of the public." Whiteside v. U. S., 93 U. S. 257.

There being then, no valid contract between the complainants and the state by which the latter is bound to use the books of the former in its schools, it follows, of course, that the complainants have no right to the relief demanded, and therefore the prayer for an injunction must be denied and the bill dismissed.

EVIDENCE—REPUTATION AS TO PEDIGREE—WHO IS COMPETENT — DEPOSITIONS — GENEALOGICAL TABLE UNDER SEAL OF FOREIGN OFFICER.

1. It is no objection to the testimony of a witness who deposes to general reputation of pedigree, that he is not one of the family, or intimately acquainted with it.

2. The deposition of a witness, now dead, as to pedigree, may be read for that purpose only; though it was taken in another cause, between other parties, and on a different subject.

[Questioned in Hall's Deposition, Case No. 5,924.]

[See note at end of case.]

3. A deposition taken under a rule of court, and sworn to before a justice of the peace, may be read: the provisions of the judiciary act refer to depositions taken without such rule.

4. A witness whose deposition has been taken de bene esse, must be proved to have been served with a subpoena, and is unable to come; unless he is so old, and generally so infirm, that his attendance could not be expected: the age of 65 is not of itself sufficient to entitle it to be read.

[See Brown v. Galloway, Case No. 2,006.]

5. A deposition, though merely to prove a pedigree, if taken by others than those named in the commission, cannot be read.

[See Armstrong v. Brown, Case No. 542; Guppy v. Brown, Id. 5,871; Munns v. Dupont, Id. 9,926; Willings v. Consequa, Id. 17,767.]

6. A genealogical table, certified under the seal of a foreign officer, is not evidence.

At law. Ejectment for land lying in Pennsylvania, claimed in right of the female plaintiff, as cousin and heir at law of F. Weiss, Jun. who died intestate, and without issue. [Plaintiff nonsuited.]

B. Tilghman, for plaintiff.

Hopkins, (of Lancaster,) for defendants.

Before WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice, and PETERS, District Judge.

[This was an action of ejectment for lands in Lancaster county, formerly owned by Frederick Weiss, Sr., who died in 1751, and afterward by his son Frederick. The seisin of both father and son was admitted. The father had a brother and sister who died before him without issue. The plaintiff was the daughter of another brother. The lessors of the plaintiff claimed as heirs of the son. The defendants were in possession.][2]

The only questions decided by the court, were upon the admissibility of evidence. The following points were resolved:—

1. That it is no objection to the testimony of a witness who proves general reputation as to pedigree, that he is not one of the family, or intimately acquainted with it. The weight of his evidence, of which the jury must judge, will depend much on his means of information. 8 Johns. 129, cited in support of the evidence.

[Adam Drauck was called to testify as to the relatives of Frederick Weiss, Sr. In the course of his testimony he said: "I did not see any of his relatives. A gentleman named Kremer told me of his relations." He added upon subsequent examination that he knew personally some of Weiss' friends in Germany, and had brought letters over from them to him.

[Defendants' counsel objected, claiming that this was not evidence. Although hearsay might be evidence as to pedigree, such was not the case with mere gossip. It must be of persons intimate with the family.

[Tilghman, in reply, cited 8 Johns. 128, claiming that the objection was to the weight, rather than to the competency.

[Hopkins cited 3 Term R. 723: "What members of a family, and perhaps persons intimate, have said, is evidence, but what a mere stranger would say has always been rejected.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. The testimony is competent.][2]

2. That a deposition of a witness, since dead, proving the pedigree of the plaintiff may be offered in evidence in this cause, for this purpose only, although it was taken in another cause, between different persons, and on a different subject. It is at least equal to what a person has said, who was not on oath, on the same subject. In support of the evidence, were cited Bull. N. P. 233, 239. Hurst v. Jones, [Case No. 6,934,] in the former circuit court of this district. Against the evidence, [Respublica v. Lacaze,] 2 Dall. [2 U. S.] 118: 2 Strange.

[1] [Originally published from the MSS. of Hon. Bushrod Washington, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, under the supervision of Richard Peters, Esq.]

[2] [From Wall. Notes Dec.]

[Plaintiff then offered depositions taken in the case of Shultgheisser v. Eckart and wife, administrators of F. Weiss, Jr. This was objected to as taken in a different suit between different parties and in another court.

[Tilghman. We offer it to prove pedigree, —nothing else. Even ex parte depositions have been admitted. Hurst's Lessee v. Jones, Case No. 6,934; Lessee of Fackler v. Simpson, (Sup. Ct. Pa., May assizes;) Bull. N. P. 239. The respondent Eckart was a party to the suit in which the depositions were taken.

[Hopkins. The deposition offered was taken in suits between different parties, both plaintiff and defendant. Douglass v. Sanderson, 2 Dall. (2 U. S.) 116. Shippen, J., on page 118, says that depositions taken in other states are not evidence in cases of pedigree. Strange, 1151. Special evidence is not evidence even of pedigree.

[WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. Independent of the case decided in this court, (Hurst's Lessee v. Jones, supra,) and the authorities cited from Buller, the opinion of the court is that, on general principles, the deposition is evidence,—for, if his declaration would have been admissible, surely his swearing to it does not make it inadmissible.][2]

3. A deposition taken under a rule of court, and executed by a justice of the peace, may be read: the 30th section of the judicial act relates to depositions taken without a rule of court. The decision in this case is in strict conformity with the practice of this and the district court.

[Plaintiff then offered the deposition of Bernard Frazier—taken, not under the judiciary act of September 24, 1789, § 30, (1 Stat. 173,) but under a rule to take depositions.

[This was objected to as being taken before a justice, not a judge, as required by the act; and it was claimed that, though taken under a rule, and not under the act, the same strictness ought to prevail. The rule does not designate before whom the depositions are to be taken. If no person is designated in the rule, the act of congress ought to be the guide.][2]

4. A witness, whose deposition was taken de bene esse, and is offered to be read, must be proved to have been subpoenaed, and to have been unable to come; unless it is shown, that he is so advanced in age, and generally so debilitated, that his attendance could not be expected. The witness in this case was only sixty-five years of age, and his deposition was rejected.

[WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. The depositions were de bene esse. It is proved that Frazier is very aged, between 80 and 90. He came down here about two years ago and could hardly stir.

[PETERS, District Judge. There ought to be stricter proof; but as two years ago he was so feeble, and said he could not come again, I think it is circumstantial, and the depositions ought to be read.

[The depositions were admitted, and Tilghman read from the caption that Frazier was 63 years of age, or thereabouts. Thereupon, the court ruled that all presumption of inability was taken away, and the depositions were rejected.][2]

5. If a deposition be taken by other persons than those named in the commission, it cannot be read, although it is offered merely to prove a pedigree.

[Plaintiff offered depositions taken under a commission to Baden in the case above referred to. They were offered as ex parte depositions to prove pedigree.

[Objected to by defendant. Rejected.][2]

6. A genealogical table, certified under the seal of a foreign public officer, is not evidence.

[Plaintiff offered a genealogical table. Rejected.][2]

Upon the two last opinions being given, the plaintiff suffered a nonsuit.

[NOTE. The ruling in this case as to the admissibility of depositions in another suit seems to have been followed in Boudereau v. Montgomery, Case No. 1,694. Both cases were criticised by Baldwin, Circuit Justice, in the case of Hall's Deposition, Case No. 5,924. In Boudereau v. Montgomery the deposition was held inadmissible as such because the former suit was not between the same parties, but it was admitted as a declaration concerning pedigree, against the objection that it was made post litem motam. In the principal case it does not clearly appear that the deposition was made after controversy about the pedigree had arisen; and, if not, Mr. Justice Baldwin's criticism, which was based solely on the objection of post litem motam, does not apply to this case. In Hurst v. Jones, Case No. 6,934, sworn declarations made ante litem motam were held admissible.]

ARBITRATION AND AWARD — WITHOUT ORDER OF COURT—ENFORCING AWARD.

Pending an ejectment in the court, the parties agreed to refer it to certain persons to value the land in controversy, one third of which it was agreed belonged to the plaintiff, and two thirds to the defendant, and that if, by drawing lots, it should turn out that the plaintiff should take the whole, he was to pay the appraised value of the two thirds to the defendant. The award being made, the court refused to confirm it. Rule to show cause why the award made in this cause should not be confirmed. Pending the ejectment in this court, the parties entered into an agreement to refer it to certain persons to value the land in controversy, one third of which, it was agreed, belonged to the plaintiff, and the other two thirds to the defendant; and that the parties should decide by lot, which of them should take the whole land at the valuation, and that if it should fall to the plaintiff, the defendant should make a conveyance to him of his two thirds. The award was made, and the land was decided, in the manner pointed out by the agreement, to belong to the plaintiff. The defendant executed and tendered to the plaintiff a deed pursuant to the agreement.

Mr. Ewing, for defendant.
Mr. Ingraham, for plaintiff.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice, delivered the opinion of the court. The award, in this case, not having been under a reference by order of court, the agreement to refer can be considered only in the light of a private agreement of the parties, to be enforced by suit at law or in equity, as either may be best adapted to the case. Should either party refuse to comply with the award, he would commit no contempt of the court. The practice of the state courts,—[Kunckle v. Kunckle,] 1 Dall. [1 U. S.] 364,—by which awards like the present are enforced, grows out of the necessity of the case, produced by the want of a court of equity. But the same necessity does not exist as to questions depending in this court. It is of great consequence to the due administration of justice, that the line of demarcation between the law and the equity side of the courts of the United States should be constantly kept in view. Should we open the door of the former to applications like the present, we might as well shut that of the latter. Rule discharged.

Case No. 838.

BANG v. FARMVILLE INS. & BANKING CO.

[1 Hughes, 290.][1]

Circuit Court, E. D. Virginia. May, 1876.

FIRE INSURANCE—PAYMENT OF PREMIUM.

Although a policy of insurance provides in terms that the insurance company shall not be liable until the premium shall be actually paid, and that no such provision shall be construed as waived, except by some act as distinct as a clear, express agreement indorsed on the policy, held, that where insurance brokers, on delivery to them of a policy, were charged, in general account, with their knowledge, with the premium due on the policy, and they made no objection, the company was liable for the insurance money.

[See Frankle v. Pennsylvania Fire Ins. Co., Case No. 5,052a.]

[At law. Action on a policy of fire insurance by Frederick J. Bang against the Farmville Insurance & Banking Company. Judgment for plaintiff.]

The facts of the case are sufficiently stated by the CHIEF JUSTICE.

WAITE, Chief Justice. Woodward & Sherwood were the agents of the defendant at Jersey City, with authority "to take fire risks, fix rates of premium, receive moneys, countersign, issue, renew, and grant leave to transfer policies of insurance signed by the president and secretary of the company, and to transact the business of insurance in accordance with the rules and regulations of the company, and such instructions as might from time to time be given them by the officers thereof."

The plaintiff employed a firm of insurance brokers in New York to place a large amount of insurance for him upon his "frame building, known as Congress Hall, . . . in the village of Sharon Spa, N. Y." These brokers placed one thousand dollars with the defendant, and received from Woodward & Sherwood, as its agents, a policy for that amount, dated June 2d, 1875. The policy did not acknowledge the receipt of the premium, and contained conditions as follows: "This company shall not be liable by virtue of this policy, or any renewal thereof, until the premium thereof shall be actually paid." "The use of general terms, or anything less than a distinct, specific agreement, clearly expressed and indorsed on the policy, shall not be construed as a waiver of any printed or written condition or restriction therein." "The insurance may also be terminated at any time, at the option of the company, on giving notice to that effect, and refunding a ratable proportion of the premium for the unexpired term of the policy."

When the policy was delivered to the brokers, they were charged on the books of Woodward & Sherwood with the amount of the premium, less their commission of fifteen per cent. as brokers, and they credited that firm with the same amount on their own books. Woodward & Sherwood also at the same time credited the company with the premium. Soon after receiving the policy the brokers delivered it to Bang, charging him on their books with the premium. It is the custom of insurance agents to transact their business with brokers in good credit in this way. This practice had prevailed between Woodward & Sherwood and this firm of brokers for more than a year previous to this transaction. Statements were rendered the brokers monthly, showing each premium unpaid. As payments were from time to time made, they were so entered on the books as to show the particular premium they were intended to meet.

Monthly statements were also made by Woodward & Sherwood to the company, showing the risks taken and the premiums collected, as well as those uncollected. Remittances were made in such manner as to indicate the particular premiums paid. The agents were charged on the books of the company with the premiums upon all risks taken. Whenever a policy was cancelled for non-payment of premium, as was sometimes done, the charge against the agents for the premium on that policy was balanced by a corresponding credit. The company had ample means of ascertaining from month to month what premiums were paid upon the outstanding risks and what were unpaid. It also appears from the testimony of the president of the company that the general course of business between the agents and the brokers, as well as their customers, was understood at the home office, and no objection was ever made. In August, Bang paid his brokers on account $450, and this amount was placed to his credit without applying it to the discharge of any particular premium. This was sufficient to pay in full all premiums on all the policies obtained up to and including that of the defendant, but left a considerable sum due on the general account, which included premiums upon a large number of policies obtained after that had been issued. The premium on the defendant's policy was never paid by the brokers to Woodward & Sherwood, and they reported it to the company in all their monthly reports as unpaid and the risk uncancelled. Several times during the summer Woodward & Sherwood called the attention of the brokers to the fact that there had been unusual delay in the payment, and intimated that, unless it was soon provided for, they would be compelled to give notice of a cancellation of the policy on that account. The brokers recognized the fact of the delay, and promised to give it attention at once, but no steps were taken to cancel the policy, neither was the charge for the premium marked off in any of the accounts.

Things remained in this condition until September 1st, 1875, when the property insured was destroyed by fire. Within a few days after, the brokers tendered the premium to Woodward & Sherwood, but they, under instructions from the company, refused to accept it. The share of the loss payable by the defendant, and which is not disputed, if any liability exists, is $763.13. Some questions were raised upon the trial as to notice and proofs of loss, but the testimony shows clearly that prompt notice was given immediately after the fire, and that as soon as the adjustment was completed proofs were furnished showing the amount of the entire loss, the amount of the whole insurance, and the percentage to be paid upon each policy. Copies of the written portions of the several policies other than that of the defendant were not given, but no objection was made at the time on that account, the company rejecting the claim on the sole ground that the premium had not been paid. It is now too late to make this objection. Blake v. Exchange Mut. Ins. Co., 12 Gray, 265. It was also objected at the trial that there was such overvaluation of the property for the purposes of insurance as rendered the policy void. The proof fails to sustain this defence.

The only other question presented by the pleadings or upon the trial is as to the effect of the non-payment of the premium upon the liability of the defendant. There is no doubt that Woodward & Sherwood had power to give credit upon the premium, and to waive that condition of the policy which required its payment before the liability of the company should attach. This was not denied at the trial. They were the agents of the defendant to transact generally its business of insurance at Jersey City, in accordance with the rules and regulations of the company, and these rules and regulations, it is agreed, provided for credit by special arrangement. Neither can there be any doubt that there was a waiver of the advance payment in this case, if it could be done in any other manner than by an express agreement to that effect indorsed upon the policy. This case is not materially different from that of Miller v. Brooklyn Life Ins. Co., 12 Wall. [79 U. S.] 285, in which it was said that "where the policy is delivered without requiring payment, the presumption is, especially if it is a stock company, that a credit was intended, and the rule is well settled where a credit is intended, that the policy is valid though the premium was not paid at the time the policy was delivered, as where credit is given by the general agent, and the amount is charged to him by the company, the transaction is equivalent to payment."

The real question then, is, whether this case falls within the provision of the policy which is relied upon. The language is not that there can be no waiver unless an indorsement to that effect is made upon the policy, but that "the use of general terms, or anything less than a distinct and specific agreement, clearly expressed and indorsed on the policy, shall not be construed," etc. This is no more than providing that nothing shall be construed as a waiver that is less distinct or specific than an agreement clearly expressed and indorsed on the policy would be. Here the acts are clear, distinct, and specific, and the intention of the parties is unmistakable. The policy was delivered, and simultaneously with the delivery the brokers, with their consent, were charged in general account for the premium. The case is in effect as it would have been if, upon the delivery of the policy, the agents had accepted the note of the brokers for the amount of the premium payable on demand. A charge in account on book, with the consent of the party charged, is equivalent to an agreement by him to pay on demand the amount charged. We can hardly believe it will be seriously contended that if these brokers had in fact given their due-bill for the premium when the policy was delivered, an indorsement to that effect on the policy would be necessary to charge the company with liability.

In our opinion the charge on book, under the circumstances, made as it was in the usual course of business according to the custom of the trade, and known and assented to by the officers of the company, is to be treated as the equivalent of payment, and not as the waiver of the condition only. Certainly the acceptance of a note for the amount would have been such an equivalent, and we can see no difference in principle between that case and this. The brokers would be as much liable for the payment of the premium in the one case as in the other. If by any chance the premium could not be collected, ample protection was furnished the company against a continuance of the risk by that clause in the policy which authorizes its termination at the option of the company, on giving notice to that effect. This seems to have been relied upon by the agents as a means of protection against loss, under the practice which prevailed of delivering policies in advance of the payment of premiums, for it is proven to have been a part of the custom to cancel the policies upon notice if payment was not made within a reasonable time.

BANGS v. LITTLE.

[1 Ware, (506,) 520.] [1]

District Court, D. Maine. Aug. 12, 1839.

SEAMEN—POWER OF MASTER—CORPORAL PUNISHMENT.

1. The master of a vessel has the authority to correct by corporal punishments the negligence or misconduct of any of his crew. But his authority in this respect is not coextensive with that of a parent over his children, or a schoolmaster over his scholars. It extends only to the correction of such negligence or misconduct as relates to their duties as members of the ship's crew, or tends directly to the subversion of the discipline and police of the ship.[2]

[2. Cited in Fuller v. Colby, Case No. 5,149, to the point that a master may punish for disrespect, disobedience, or disorder on board, as far as a parent may a child.]

[3. A ship's master has no authority to inflict corporal punishment upon a seaman for repeating to members of another ship's crew harsh words of their captain, accidentally overheard, nor for falsely and maliciously telling them that their captain used such words, although the action of the seaman tends to create discontent and ill feeling among said crew, against their captain.] [2]

In admiralty. This was a libel for a marine trespass [by Bangs against John L. Little. Decree for libellant.]

The libellant alleged that he shipped at Portland for a voyage in the brig Brutus, John L. Little, master, from this port to one or more ports in the island of Cuba; that he faithfully performed his duty on board said brig, and was obedient to all the lawful orders of the officers; and that while at Matanzas, on the 15th of February last, the said Little, without any just cause, ordered him to be tied up by the hands to the rigging of the vessel, when with a twisted thong, called a cowhide, he struck him a dozen blows on the back, from which he suffered great pain in his body, and great mortification and humiliation in his mind.

The respondent, in his answer, admits the shipping of the libellant as stated in the libel, but denies that he did his duty as a good and faithful seaman, and alleges that he was careless, negligent, and indifferent in the performance of his duty, and not a good seaman in any one particular; "that at Matanzas, in said island of Cuba, the said Bangs, regardless of his duty as a mariner and as a man, and with a view to do mischief and disaffect the crew of the brig Franklin, and to irritate them and induce them to neglect and refuse to perform their duty on board said brig, and to enrage them with the master, George Brazier, did in fact clandestinely, as he himself confessed, listen at the door of the cabin of the said brig Brutus, and pretend that he overheard a conversation between said Captain Brazier and this respondent, in which he said Captain Brazier declared he would flog his whole crew;" the answer then proceeds to allege that this was untrue, and that no such conversation took place, but that the libellant told this story to the crew of the Franklin, by which they were made uneasy and dissatisfied with their captain, and that Capt. Brazier complained to him of this conduct of the libellant. It is further alleged that Bangs, upon being charged with the fact, denied it, "whereupon this respondent having proved the fact, that he had been thus clandestinely listening at the cabin door, and had thus basely lied, this respondent without anger, and to prevent such practices in future, did tie up said Bangs as he has stated, and did moderately chastise him by giving him one dozen blows with a small cowhide whip, without doing him any material injury." A number of witnesses were examined on both sides, and the material part of the evidence is stated in the opinion of the court.

Fessenden & Deblois, for respondent.

WARE, District Judge. The pleadings and the evidence in this case present a question of considerable delicacy and importance, as it affects the general police of our commercial marine. The libel is for an assault and battery by the master. The master in his answer admits the battery, as charged in the libel, and pleads a special justification. That the master has a general authority to inflict corporal punishment on one of his crew, in a reasonable and moderate manner, for any act of wantonness or carelessness by which the property intrusted to his care is injured or put in jeopardy, or for disobedience, or for riotous, disorderly, or insolent conduct, when it is necessary to maintain the discipline and subordination of the crew, is not denied. If that were the only point involved in the case, the inquiry would simply be whether any such offence has been committed, which the safety of the ship or the maintenance of good order and discipline required to be punished; and if there had been, whether the punishment were greater than the occasion required. That, however, is not the precise question which is presented in this case. It is, whether the master is authorized by the marine law to punish a seaman for any moral delinquency, which does not endanger the ship or cargo, and does not tend directly to the subversion of the discipline or good order of his own crew. For this is the ground on which the master puts his justification. It is, that the libellant "regardless of his duty as a mariner and a man," for the purpose of creating disaffection in the crew of another vessel towards the master, fabricated and told the crew of that vessel the false stories stated in the answer.

It is true that the master in his answer charges the libellant with listening at the cabin door to overhear his private conversation with the captain of the Franklin, who was then in his cabin; and if this fact were satisfactorily proved, it might undoubtedly be relied upon as an offence against the police and good discipline of the ship's crew. For the seamen are not only required to obey the orders of the master in all that relates to the navigation of the vessel and to the services for which they are engaged, but they are bound to observe towards him a decorous and respectful demeanor. Listening at doors and windows, for the purpose of overhearing and prying into the private affairs of another, is in any case a gross impertinence; it is particularly so when practised by a seaman towards the master of a vessel. But if the master relies on this charge of eavesdropping as a justification of the punishment, he must produce satisfactory evidence of the fact. Crimes and faults are never presumed without proof. The evidence in this case is, that the libellant was sent by the second mate to the round-house to get some spun-yarn, and in going for it he passed by the cabin door, so near that he might hear any thing which was spoken in the cabin in the ordinary tone of conversation. On his return he stated to one of the crew that as he was passing the cabin door, he heard Captain Brazier repeat the words alleged in the master's answer. No blame can be attached to him for hearing, while he was in the performance of his duty, what he could not avoid hearing, and there is no direct proof that he stopped to listen at the door. Neither the officer who sent him, nor any of the rest of the crew, saw any thing of the kind; and the manner in which he mentioned the conversation when he returned, rather implies that he had not come to any stop; for he said that he heard it as he was passing the door. The only part of the evidence, from which it is inferred that he stopped to listen, is that of Van Buskirk, one of the crew of the Franklin, to whom he mentioned the conversation. According to his testimony, he said that he listened and heard the conversation. So far as an inference can be drawn against the libellant from this mode of expression, it is met and neutralized, at least, by the form of the expression used when he stated it to one of the crew of the Brutus, immediately after it was heard.

Assuming, then, the allegation of the master in his answer to be true, that the story told to the crew of the Franklin had no foundation in fact, but was fabricated and told for the purpose of producing discord and trouble in that vessel between the master and the men, the whole justification turns upon this point, whether the master is authorized by the maritime law to inflict corporal punishment on one of his crew for general immorality. The counsel of the master have placed his defence on this broad ground. It is contended that his authority to correct and chastise their moral delinquencies is coextensive with that of a parent over his children, and with that of a schoolmaster over his scholars. It is true that the text writers on maritime law, in treating of the authority of the master over his crew, compare it to that of a parent, and of a schoolmaster. But it does not follow, because the authority is similar, that it is identical. The objects and purposes, for which the law allows to one man an authority of control and discipline, over another, must determine the limitation and extent of that authority. The parental power has its foundation in natural relations, and its objects are the protection, the discipline, and instruction of the child during the period of infantile imbecility and youthful thoughtlessness and improvidence; and it is indispensable to the well-being of the child, through that period in which he is progressively acquiring the bodily strength and moral experience which are necessary for his support and for the government of his own conduct in life. It is a duty imposed by nature on the parent, who is under a natural and moral obligation to train up his child in such habits and in such modes of thinking and acting, as will make him a useful member of the community, and at the same time be a guaranty of his happiness in after-life. The understanding and the will of the parent are substituted for those of the child, until the intellect of the child is sufficiently matured and enlightened by experience to be safely relied upon as his own guide. A preceptor of youth is placed for many purposes in loco parentis, and the authority which he exercises over his pupils is a delegation of the paternal power. But the authority of the master of a vessel over his ship's crew, though it bears a certain analogy to that of a parent and schoolmaster, stands upon very different reasons, and is allowed for different purposes. The service in which he is employed is one of uncommon peril, not only requiring great skill, but often demanding great promptitude of decision and action, and admitting no time of delay for deliberation, reasoning, or expostulation. Upon him the obligation is imposed to meet and provide for these emergencies, and if there is not an instantaneous obedience to his orders, it may involve the loss of the ship and all who are in it. The law invests him, therefore, with the absolute power of command, and clothes him with all the authority which is necessary to enforce the most prompt obedience to his orders. The office of master is also one of great personal responsibility. He is answerable to those who have intrusted their property to his care, for losses and damage, which may happen not only from his own personal faults or neglect, but for such as arise from the negligence or unfaithfulness of the men, whom he employs. The law having rendered him responsible for the negligence and misconduct of his men, has given him a large discretionary authority to correct such misconduct in a summary manner; and as the general security of the vessel and cargo depends upon the general fidelity of the crew and the promptness of their obedience, it authorizes the master to enforce that fidelity and punctuality by the ministration of corporal punishments, when it becomes necessary for the maintenance of good discipline.

If then we measure the authority of the master by the reasons and purposes for which it is granted, we shall find that it is by no means coextensive with the paternal power; and when it is likened to the power of a parent, it is rather with reference to the nature and kind of punishments that may be inflicted, than to the extent of the authority. It extends to the correction of all acts of negligence or misconduct in seamen that are incompatible with the duties of their employment, with a proper care and attention to the safety of the ship and cargo, and with the good order and general discipline of the ship. All this the master has a right to require of them, and for all this they have contracted, but he has a right to require nothing more. The law does not invest him with the authority over his crew of a general praefectus morum, to correct and chastise them for general immoralities, that are not incompatible with a faithful performance of the service for which they engage. For such delinquencies, like all other men, they are responsible only to the law. Such we find to be the limitation of the master's authority, whether we look for the rule in the ancient sea ordinances or in the most approved modern writers on maritime law. In examining the old ordinances we find, in fact, that the authority of the master to inflict corporal punishment on his men, in any case, is rather an inference from the general provisions of those codes, than a right standing on any express text. But there is nothing in any of them that will by the most remote inference justify the master in the exercise of such authority, except in cases of misconduct that relate directly to their duties, or to the general police and good order of the ship. The Ordinance of the Marine of Louis XIV. liv. 2, tit. 1, art. 21, does in its terms authorize the master, with the advice of the mate and pilot, to punish mutinous, drunken, and disobedient seamen, and those who ill-treat their shipmates and commit similar offences. "It is of the last importance," says Valin, "that good order and subordination be preserved on board vessels. It is for this reason that obedience to the master has been perpetually recommended to the crew, with a power in him to inflict certain punishments on the mutinous, the drunken, the quarrelsome, and those who maltreat their companions; in one word, on all those who disturb the order and service, or who commit faults for which they may be expelled from the ship, and discharged without wages." 1 Valin, Comm. 447; Abbott, in his treatise on Shipping, (part 2, c. 3, § 4,) and Chancellor Kent, in his Commentaries, describe the authority of the master in similar terms. "Being responsible over to others," says Kent, "for his conduct as master, the law, as well on that account as from the necessity of the case, has intrusted him with great authority over the mariners on board. Such authority is requisite for the safe navigation of the ship, and the preservation of good order and discipline He may imprison, and also inflict reasonable corporal punishment upon a seaman, for disobedience to his reasonable commands, or for disorderly, riotous, or insolent conduct; his authority in that respect is analogous to that of a master on land over his apprentice or scholar. The books unite in the lawfulness and necessity of the power. Without it, authority could not be maintained, nor navigation made safe." 3 Kent, Comm. (3d Ed.) 181. The master of a vessel, says Casaregis, has no large jurisdiction in his ship, but only a kind of economical authority and power of discipline, extending to a slight chastisement, pro corrigenda insolentia et male morata vita, seu licentia nautarum et vectorum, such as a father has over his children, a schoolmaster over his scholars, or a master over his servants and domestics. Quoted by Valin, (volume 1, p. 449.)

These authorities are undoubtedly sufficient to justify the master in correcting by reasonable chastisement, administered on the spot, the misconduct of any seaman, which endangers the safety of the ship or cargo, or which tends to the subversion of the good order and discipline of the ship's crew, but they furnish no warrant for his assuming judicial authority, and in the quality of a domestic judge animadverting on the general moral misdemeanors of his men, which are not incompatible with the faithful performance of all those duties for which they engage by their contract. Such an authority is not necessary to the master for the safety of navigation and maritime commerce, and the law, in conferring this extraordinary power upon him, has justly limited the exercise of it to those cases which the exigencies of the service imperiously require. If, then, all the facts are conceded as stated in the master's answer, with the exception of listening at the cabin door, and this is not proved, they will not constitute a justification. Admitting the story told of Capt. Brazier to have been fabricated, though it ought to be observed that this from the evidence is far from being certain, whatever animadversion it may deserve as a breach of moral duty, it was no offence against Captain Little. It neither put in jeopardy property of which he had the care, nor had it any direct tendency to weaken his own authority, or subvert the discipline of his own crew, and therefore it was not within his authority to assume jurisdiction over the offence, whatever it might be. Decree thirty dollars damages and costs.

Case No. 840.

BANGS et al. v. LOWBER et al.

[2 Cliff. 157.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. Term, 1862.[2]

SHIPPING—CHARTER-PARTY — PROVISION TO PROCEED WITH ALL POSSIBLE DESPATCH.

1. A vessel, while on a voyage to Melbourne, was chartered by the managing owners to defendants, for a voyage from Calcutta to a port in the United States. The charter-party contained a clause that the vessel was to "proceed from Melbourne to Calcutta with all possible despatch." Before the master was advised of this engagement, the vessel had sailed from Melbourne to Manilla, seeking business, and did not arrive at Calcutta as soon as the parties had contemplated. The defendants refused to load the vessel; and upon suit to recover damages for a breach of the charter-party, brought by the managing owners, who were described therein as "owners" of the vessel, it was held, that although there were other owners, the suit was rightly brought in the names of those subscribing the charter-party in good faith.

2. It was also held, that the clause quoted above was not a condition precedent, but an independent stipulation, which gave the charterers a claim for damages, on failure of performance by the owners, but did not give them the right to avoid the contract, because it appeared that the object of the voyage was not wholly frustrated thereby.

[See Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. v. Howard, 13 How. (54 U. S.) 307; Dermott v. Jones, 23 How. (64 U. S.) 220.]

[At law. Action by Elkanah Bangs and others against William Lowber and others for breach of a charter-party. Judgment for plaintiffs. This was afterwards reversed by the supreme court in Lowber v. Bangs, 2 Wall. (69 U. S.) 728.]

This was an action of assumpsit, and came before the court on an agreed statement of facts, from which it appeared that on the 9th of June, 1858, while the ship Mary Bangs was on a voyage from New York to Melbourne, the plaintiffs, who were managing owners, entered into a charter-party with defendants, in which it was agreed, that the vessel should "proceed from Melbourne to Calcutta with all possible despatch," and there receive a full cargo, to be provided by defendants, and transport the same to a port of discharge in the United States; that, although the plaintiffs used due diligence in informing the master of the ship of this contract, the information, owing to an interruption of the mails, did not reach him until he had left Melbourne and arrived at Manilla with his vessel, in search of business. Upon receipt of this intelligence he sailed for Calcutta; where he arrived the 26th of February, 1859, and reported himself to defendants' agent as ready to receive cargo. Besides the Mary Bangs, the defendants, at about the same time, chartered two other vessels for a voyage from Calcutta to the United States, and placed their agents there in funds to lade them as well as the Mary Bangs. As soon as they learned that the Mary Bangs had sailed from Melbourne to Manilla, they instructed their agents at Calcutta that this deviation nullified the engagement, which they considered a fortunate circumstance, as freights had fallen; and, under their instructions, the agent declined to furnish a cargo for her, but took up another vessel, and loaded her with a cargo purchased after the arrival at Calcutta of the Mary Bangs, with funds originally provided by defendants to freight the latter vessel.

[2] [Reversed in 2 Wall. (69 U. S.) 728.]

The action was brought by the managing owners, who subscribed the charter-party, as "owners," to recover damages for breach of defendants' engagement to lade the vessel; and it was agreed that, if the court were of opinion they could maintain the action, an assessor should be appointed to ascertain the amount of damages they were entitled to recover.

B. R. Curtis and G. O. Shattuck, for plaintiffs.

It has been decided in a large number of English cases, that such clauses as "ship to proceed with all convenient speed," or "in a reasonable time," or "with all possible despatch," and similar clauses, are not, in charter-parties, conditions precedent, but are merely independent stipulations; and, unless the alleged breach goes to the whole root and consideration, it only gives a claim for damages. Clipsham v. Vertue, 5 Adol. & E. (N. S.) 265; Fothergill v. Walton, 8 Taunt. 576; Freeman v. Taylor, 8 Bing. 124; Tarrabochia v. Hickie, 1 Hurl. & N. 183; Hurst v. Usborne, 18 C. B. 144; Seeger v. Duthie, 8 J. Scott, N. S. [8 C. B. N. S.] 45; Dimech v. Corlett, 12 Moore, P. C. 199; Behn v. Burness, 5 Law T. (N. S.) 670.

In some cases, it was held in England, that a stipulation in a charter to sail on or before a day certain was a condition precedent; and such stipulations were distinguished from those containing the words, "all convenient speed," "within a reasonable time," and "with all possible despatch." Glaholm v. Hays, 2 Man. & G. 257; Ollive v. Booker, 1 Exch. 416.

In Boone v. Eyre, 1 H. Bl. 273, note, Lord Mansfield laid down the following rule: "When mutual covenants go to the whole of the consideration on both sides, they are mutual conditions, the one precedent to the other; but where they go only to part, where a breach may be paid for in damages, then the defendant has a remedy on his covenant, and shall not plead it as a condition precedent." See Abb. Shipp. 266; Davidson v. Gwynne, 12 East, 381; Mill-Dam Foundery v. Hovey, 21 Pick. 417, 437; Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. v. Howard, 13 How. [54 U. S.] 307.

The burden is on the defendants to show that the object of their voyage was frustrated. Dimech v. Corlett, 12 Moore, P. C. 199; Tarrabochia v. Hickie, 1 Hurl. & N. 183.

The action was properly brought in the name of the part owners, by whom the charter was made. Seeger v. Duthie, 8 J. Scott, N. S. [8 C. B. N. S.] 45.

S. Bartlett, for defendants.

It is clearly settled that having in the contract declared themselves "owners," the plaintiffs are not by law allowed to show that they were "managing owners and the ship's husbands," that is to say, agents of the other owners. Humble v. Hunter, 12 Adol. & E. (N. S.) 310.

It is unnecessary to consider what would have been the rights or form of action in behalf of the other owners, if the defendants had entered into the possession of, and used the vessel for the voyage. The fact that the contract has never been executed, and no change occurred in the position of parties disposes of that question. Rayner v. Grote, 15 Mees. & W. 359–365.

It is a well-established rule of construction, that the words added in writing to the printed formula, are to have a greater effect given to them, than the printed words (in case of any doubt upon the sense or meaning of the whole), as the written words are the immediate language and terms stated by the parties themselves for the expression of their meaning. Arn. Ins. 80; Robertson v. French, 4 East, 130; Coster v. Phoenix Ins. Co., [Case No. 3,264;] Delonguemare v. Tradesmen's Ins. Co., 2 Hall, 589–622; Wallace v. Insurance Co., 4 La. 289; Weisser v. Maitland, 3 Sandf. 318, 322.

In all mercantile contracts, and more especially in contracts of affreightment, time is not merely an essential element, but is of the essence of the contract itself. The merchant has this always in view in planning his voyages, ordering his cargoes, and calculating in regard to the markets of the different countries.

This each party had in view in making the charter, and we accordingly find that they inserted special clauses, in writing on this subject, viz. the words, "ship to proceed from Melbourne to Calcutta with all possible despatch," and "that the owners will use the most direct means to forward instructions to the master with copy of this charter, ordering it to be fulfilled, but should it so happen the ship should arrive at Melbourne before these instructions, and the master should have engaged his ship before receiving them, this charter shall be void."

It is material upon this head, to bear in mind, that this ship at the time of the charter was on a voyage to Melbourne, and that the only instructions which the master had were verbal, "to seek business, and do the best he could in getting freight at Melbourne or elsewhere."

On behalf of the defendants, it is maintained, that upon the true construction of the charter-party, having reference to the purposes and objects of the parties, and considering all its parts and clauses, the finding the vessel at Melbourne upon receipt of such despatches, and disengaged, is to be construed a condition precedent on which the whole contract was to depend.

In other words, that the plaintiffs did in fact warrant, so far as to make it a condition precedent to the vitality of the contract, that such should be the case.

In considering this matter, it is always to be borne in mind that the contract in suit is executory, and not executed; that the plaintiffs are seeking to recover damages for the breach, and not compensation for performance.

Whether or not a particular stipulation in an agreement shall operate as a warranty or condition precedent, the non-observance or performance of which will dispense with the performance of the contract by the other, or as an independent stipulation or agreement, is to be determined, not by any particular phrases, or any special collocation of words, but from the intent of the parties, to be collected from the language used by them, the subject matter of the contract, and the surrounding circumstances. Havelock v. Geddes, 10 East, 555.

If the non-performance of any particular agreement or covenant goes to the whole root and consideration of the contract, then such covenant or agreement is a condition precedent. Havelock v. Geddes, above cited; Davidson v. Gwynne, 12 East, 381; Stavers v. Curling, 3 Bing. N. C. 355.

In the case at bar, the breach of the agreement or covenant on the part of the plaintiffs did go to the whole root and consideration, and did deprive the defendants of the entire use of the ship. The authorities clearly support the position of the defendants in this matter. Shadforth v. Higgin, 3 Camp. 385; Shubrick v. Salmond, 3 Burrows, 1637; Glaholm v. Hays, 2 Scott, N. R. 471; Ollive v. Booker, 1 Exch. 416; Weisser v. Maitland, 3 Sandf. 318.

The words in the charter-party, "ship to proceed from Melbourne to Calcutta with all possible despatch," constitute a plain and clear warranty that the vessel should so proceed (if the contract attached); and the vessel having gone another voyage to Manilla, the defendants were released from the obligation to load the vessel.

This is manifest from the place which this clause occupies in the agreement, and from its peculiar language.

All the other clauses of the charter-party are found strictly and properly in the language of agreement only; while this is otherwise, showing that a difference was intended, and none can be suggested than that one sounds in agreement, and the other in condition.

The words themselves, "ship to proceed," &c., by common usage import the same as "conditioned to proceed," as the words, "on or before a given day," do by common usage import the same as "conditioned to sail or warranted to sail."

Looking at the subject-matter of the contract, without regarding the precise words, construing the words as a condition precedent, will carry into effect the intention of the parties, with more certainty than holding them to be matter of contract only, and merely the ground of an action for damages.

The defendant's case must not be confounded with the class of cases where the charterer has received the benefit of the charter, or given by his acts a construction to the contract, or waived the performance of the condition precedent. Such are Constable v. Cloberie, Palmer, 397; Bornmann v. Tooke, 1 Camp. 377; Davidson v. Gwynne, 12 East, 381; Havelock v. Geddes, 10 East, 555; Ritchie v. Atkinson, 10 East, 295; Boone v. Eyre, 2 W. Bl. 1312.

If these positions are wrong, still it must have been contemplated by the parties, that the vessel must have been ready to prosecute the adventure in a reasonable time, and the great length of time which elapsed, discharged the defendants from any obligation to load her.

The same doctrine in regard to deviation and delay, as affecting policies of insurance, apply to charter-parties; and whenever the delay or detention is such as would release an underwriter, a charterer will be discharged from his obligations under the charter. Mount v. Larkins, 8 Bing. 108; Freeman v. Taylor, Id. 124; Palmer v. Marshall, Id. 317; Abb. Shipp. (Ed. 1846,) 325.

The provision of the charter-party, that if the master should have engaged his vessel before receiving instructions, the charter should be void, is satisfied, by his having proceeded on another voyage, in search of other business.

The term "engaged" does not here mean merely that the vessel should have been chartered or taken up by freighters, for another business. It has a wide and more comprehensive meaning; that is, that the master of the vessel should not have embarked his vessel upon another voyage, whether a sailing or freighting voyage. This provision was not inserted merely for the benefit of the plaintiffs; it benefits the defendants as well. When, therefore, the vessel finally departed from Melbourne, whether in ballast or otherwise, she was "engaged" in other business. If the master, on arrival at Manilla, had found a freight, the matter would have ended. He went there to seek one, and the defendants' obligations are as well thereby discharged. Soames v. Lonergan, 2 Barn. & C. 564.

CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice. Suit is brought in the name of the managing owners; and it is objected by the defendants, that it cannot be maintained, because the other owners of the vessel are not joined; but the suit is upon the charter, and inasmuch as the other owners are not named in the contract, they could not be joined in the suit; so that, unless the action can be maintained in the present form, the owners are without remedy. Much reliance is placed by the defendants upon the case of Humble v. Hunter, 12 Adol. & E. (N. S.) 310, to sustain the objection; but it does not appear to support the doctrine for which it is cited. The charter-party in that case had been executed in the name of the son; but the suit was in the name of the mother, who was the sole owner of the vessel. Parol proof was offered at the trial to show that the mother was the real owner of the vessel, and that the son had signed the charter-party as her agent, and not as principal. Objection was duly made to the admissibility of the evidence, because the son was described in the charter-party as the owner of the vessel; but it was admitted, and the jury returned their verdict in favor of the plaintiff. Whereupon the defendant obtained a rule nisi to set the verdict aside; and, after argument, it was made absolute, upon the ground that the parol evidence went to contradict the written contract. Lucas v. De la Cour, 1 Maule & S. 249; Robson v. Drummond, 2 Barn. & Adol. 303. No such question, however, arises in this case, as is obvious from the first reading of the agreed statement. The managing owners and ship's husband executed the charter-party in their own name; and, having brought suit to recover damages for a breach of the contract, the defendants offer to prove that other persons are also part-owners of the vessel. They do not prove, or offer to prove, that the plaintiffs were not fully authorized to make the contract on which the suit is brought, or that the vessel was not rightfully in their possession and under their control. Where the minority in interest refuse to participate in the voyage, vessels are often employed by those owning the majority interest; and, if the latter have the lawful possession and control of the vessel, it has never been held that a charter-party executed by them was invalid; and, if obligatory upon the ship, no reason is perceived why it should not be equally so upon the charterers. Enough is not proved in this case to defeat the right of recovery, even if the objection under other circumstances would be a valid one; and upon that ground alone, it must be overruled; but I am of the opinion that a charter-party, executed in good faith in the name of the managing owners and ship's husband, is a valid instrument, binding upon all concerned, and that a suit for damages founded upon the same is well brought in the names of the owners expressed in the instrument. Seeger v. Duthie, 8 J. Scott, N. S. [8 C. B. N. S.] 55.

Two principal positions are assumed by the defendants to show that the plaintiffs ought not to prevail upon the merits.

They insist, in the first place, that, by the true construction of the charter-party, it was a condition precedent, that the owners should use the most direct means to forward instructions to the master; and that, upon the receipt of the same, the vessel should be found at Melbourne, and disengaged. Proper means, it is admitted, were used by the owners to forward the instructions; but the position is that, inasmuch as the vessel had left Melbourne before they were received, the stipulations of the charter-party did not attach at all, because the parties contemplated that the vessel would be at that port, ready to proceed to Calcutta with all possible despatch.

Secondly, they insist that if, by the true construction of the charter-party, its provisions attached to the ship wherever found, still it must have a reasonable interpretation as to time, and that the long period which elapsed before the vessel arrived at Calcutta discharged the defendants from any obligation to load her. Several other propositions are submitted by the defendants; but those already mentioned embrace the whole substance of the defence, as understood by the court.

Whether a particular covenant is to constitute a condition precedent, depends upon the intention of the parties, as it is to be collected from the instrument in which the covenant is contained. Such was the rule laid down by Lord Ellenborough, in Havelock v. Geddes, 10 East, 563; and it is one often cited and universally approved. Charter-parties are commercial instruments; and their construction should be liberal, agreeable to the intention of the parties, and conformable to the usage of trade in general, and of the particular trade to which the contract relates. Abb. Shipp. 326. Questions of this nature frequently arise; and there are few that are more difficult to solve, or of more practical importance. Intention is the primary rule; and when that is discovered, as was well said in the case of Stavers v. Curling, 3 Bing. N. C. 355, all technical forms of expression must give way. Undoubtedly, a particular covenant by one party may be a condition precedent, so that the breach of it will dispense with the performance of the contract by the other; and whether it is such, or is an independent covenant, is a question to be determined according to the fair intention of the parties, to be collected from the language employed by them; but an intention to make any particular stipulation a condition precedent should be clearly and unambiguously expressed. Where mutual covenants go to the whole of the consideration on both sides, said Lord Ellenborough, in Ritchie v. Atkinson, 10 East, 305, they are mutual conditions, the one precedent to the other; but when the covenants go only to a part, then a remedy lies on the covenant to recover damages for the breach of it; but it is not a condition precedent. Boone v. Eyre, 1 H. Bl. 273. Unless the nonperformance, alleged in breach of the contract, goes to the whole root and consideration of it, the covenant broken is not to be considered as a condition precedent, but as a distinct covenant, for the breach of which the party injured may be compensated in damages. Davidson v. Gwynne, 12 East, 389; Abb. Shipp. 342; 2 Smith, Lead. Cas. (Ed. 1855,) 26, 27; Seeger v. Duthie, 8 J. Scott, N. S. [8 C. B. N. S.] 45. Accordingly, it has been held in repeated cases, that such clauses in a charter-party as "ship to proceed with all convenient speed," or "in a reasonable time," or "with all possible despatch," or the like, are not conditions precedent in such instruments, but are clearly independent stipulations, unless it appears that the alleged breach goes to the whole root and consideration of the contract. Take, for example, the case of Clipsham v. Vertue, 5 Adol. & E. (N. S.) 265, where the stipulation in the charter-party was to load, and forthwith proceed to the port of destination. Charterer refused to load; and, upon suit being brought, pleaded to the action, that the vessel did not arrive at the port of lading until after an unreasonable delay. To that plea the plaintiff demurred; and the plea was held bad, because it did not show that the delay frustrated the object of the voyage. Fothergill v. Walton, 8 Taunt. 576. Where the charter-party contained a stipulation to proceed from one port to another "with all convenient speed"; and the master, instead of conforming to the stipulation, willfully deviated, causing a delay of six weeks; and, in consequence of the deviation, the agent of the defendants refused to load the vessel. Tindal, Ch. J., left it to the jury, to determine whether the deviation deprived the freighter of the benefit of the contract. Freeman v. Taylor, 8 Bing. 124.

"Sail with all convenient speed," were the words of the charter-party in Tarrabochia v. Hickie, 1 Hurl. & N. 183; and the jury found, in an action for refusing to load, that the vessel did not sail with all convenient speed; but the court held, that the finding was no answer to the action, unless it also appeared, that the object of the voyage was wholly frustrated by the breach of the stipulation. Hurst v. Usborne, 18 C. B. 144. Similar views were also expressed in Dimech v. Corlett, 12 Moore, P. C. 199, where the stipulation was, that the vessel, being tight, stanch, and strong, and properly manned, and every way fitted for the voyage, should, "with all convenient speed," proceed in ballast to a designated port; and it appeared at the trial that she was not then finished, and did not get ready to sail for more than a month. It was held, that the failure to sail as stipulated was no answer to the action, without proof of other loss than that occasioned by the falling of freights. Defendants suppose that the cases, Glaholm v. Hays, 2 Man. & G. 257, and Olive v. Booker, 1 Exch. 416, assert a different doctrine; but that opinion does not appear to find support in the later cases. Tarrabochia v. Hickie, 1 Hurl. & N. 183; Seeger v. Duthie, 8 J. Scott, N. S. [8 C. B. N. S.] 45; Dimech v. Corlett, 12 Moore, P. C. 199. Perhaps the latest case is that of Behn v. Burness, 5 Law T. (N. S.) 670, where the stipulation was that the ship, "now in the port of Amsterdam, shall, with all possible despatch, proceed to Newport"; and it was distinctly held that the description of the place where the vessel was supposed to be was not a warranty or condition precedent.

Both parties understood that the vessel was at sea, and that she might arrive at Melbourne and be engaged by the master before her instructions would come to hand; and they accordingly stipulated that, in that event, the charter should be void. The engagement of the ship before the instructions were received, was to render the charter void; but, in the view of the court, there is not a word in the instrument to warrant the conclusion, that the parties contemplated that any such consequence should flow from the arrival of the vessel at that port, and her temporary departure seeking business. Parties doubtless expected that the ship would proceed from Melbourne to Calcutta; but, when the provision in that behalf is compared with the one providing for the forwarding of instructions, it is evident that it was not intended as a warranty or condition precedent, as the latter is framed in the most general terms possible, clearly indicating that the parties contemplated that the instrument might reach the master at other ports than the one to which he was immediately destined. All possible despatch was required of the vessel, and the owners were required to use the most direct means to forward instructions to the master; but no provision was inserted to render the charter void, unless the master should have engaged the ship before the instructions came to hand. Support to this view of the case is derived from the fact, that no day is fixed for the departure of the vessel from Melbourne, or for her arrival at Calcutta. Unless the instructions were received by the master before the vessel sailed to seek business, it must have been understood by the defendants, that some delay would necessarily ensue in the departure of the vessel; and if, in that contingency, they had been unwilling to accept the contract, the reasonable presumption is, that they would have insisted that some more specific provision upon the subject should have been inserted in the charter-party. Provision was made to protect the plaintiffs, in case the vessel was engaged; and, as the parties appear to have understood the effect of a condition precedent, it may well be supposed, that, if they had intended that the contract should be null in case the vessel sailed from Melbourne before the master received the instructions, they would have said so in terms as explicit as those employed in respect to the engagement of the vessel.

Nothing of the kind, however, is to be found in the instrument; and I am of the opinion that nothing of the kind was intended.

Delay ensued, beyond question, for a longer time than the parties expected when the charter-party was executed; and the remaining question is, whether it was of a character, and for such a length of time, as to justify the defendants, under the circumstances, in refusing to load the vessel. When a day is appointed for the payment of money, or part of it, or for doing any other act, and the day is to happen, or may happen, before the thing, which is the consideration of the money, or other act, is to be performed, an action may be brought for the money, or for not doing such other act before performance; for it appears that the party relied on his remedy, and did not intend to make the performance a condition precedent; and so it is, where no time is fixed for the performance of that which is the consideration or other act. [Clerke v. Pywell,] 1 Wms. Saund. 319b. Moral wrong is not imputed to the plaintiffs in this case, and could not be, if attempted, with any success, as the whole evidence shows that the delay of the vessel was the result of an unforeseen accident, over which the plaintiffs could exercise no control. Under those circumstances, the rule is, that the delay is no answer to the action for a refusal to load the vessel, unless it appear that the effect was to frustrate the voyage. Additional authorities to this point are unnecessary, as those already cited are full to the point. Mill-Dam Foundery v. Hovey, 21 Pick. 439; Stavers v. Curling, 3 Bing. N. C. 355. Applying that rule to the present case, it is quite obvious what the result must be. Sufficient saltpetre, or its equivalent, for ballast, was to be furnished by the defendants; but their agent had not purchased any of the article when he wrote to them on the 27th of November, 1858, that he should consider himself at liberty to throw up the charter. Freight, per charter-party, was $13 for whole packages, and half price for broken storage; but, when the defendants refused to load the vessel, the rate had fallen more than one half; which, taken in connection with the letter of the defendants' agent, affords strong ground to conclude that the market rate of freight had more to do with the refusal to load the vessel than any delay which had ensued on her arrival. Full confirmation of that view of the case, if any be needed, is also derived from the subsequent conduct of the agent of the defendants in chartering another vessel to take the place of the Mary Bangs, and loading her with the funds provided to purchase a cargo for the vessel of the plaintiffs.

In view of the whole case, I am of the opinion that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover; and, according to the agreement of the parties, an assessor must be appointed to report the amount.

[NOTE. This decision was reversed in Lowber v. Bangs, 2 Wall. (69 U. S.) 728. Mr. Justice Swayne, in delivering the opinion of the court, said that the stipulation that the ship should proceed from Melbourne to Calcutta with all possible despatch should be construed to mean that she should proceed directly from one place to the other, and that to this extent, at least, it was intended to be made of the essence of the contract; that the stipulation was a condition precedent, and not a mere representation nor an independent covenant. Mr. Justice Clifford and Mr. Justice Nelson, dissenting.]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Dec., 1853.

CUSTOMS DUTIES—APPRAISERS—PROTEST.

1. The law does not require merchant appraisers, in reappraising goods, to act in the presence of the importer.

2. General allegations in a protest, that the appraisers were prejudiced or incompetent, need not be regarded by the collector, when the particulars constituting the disqualifications charged are not set forth specifically.

[See Steegman v. Maxwell, Case No. 13,344.]

3. Requisites of a protest against the imposition of duties, stated.

The plaintiffs imported into New York an invoice of books, which was raised in value, on appraisal and reappraisal, more than 10 per cent., and an additional duty or penalty of 20 per cent. was imposed. This was an action against the collector of that port, to recover back the excess of duties, the penalty, and the fees. It was commenced in the supreme court of New York, and was removed, by certiorari, into this court.

A protest in the printed form used in Goddard v. Maxwell, [Case No. 5,492,] was made by the plaintiffs, to which they added, in writing, that "the reappraisement was made in a private room, from which they were excluded."

Before NELSON, Circuit Justice, and BETTS, District Judge.

BETTS, District Judge. The law does not require the merchant appraisers to act in the presence of importers of goods, their agents, or consignees.

General allegations in a protest, that the appraisers were prejudiced, or incompetent, or not duly qualified, need not be regarded by the collector, when the particulars constituting the disqualifications charged are not set forth specifically. It is not alleged, in the protest, that the plaintiffs are not owners of the goods; nor that the owners are the producers, and not the purchasers of them; nor that the merchant appraiser was sworn by a public appraiser. Accordingly, none of those points can be now considered by the court, on the question of the misconduct of the collector in levying the duties or fees complained of.

BANK v. LABITUT.

[1 Woods, 11.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Louisiana. April Term, 1870.

COURTS — MOTION TO REVIEW JUDGMENT AT SUBSEQUENT TERM — INTERVENTION AND THIRD OPPOSITION.

1. Where the marshal had levied an execution on a crop of sugar and molasses, the intervention and third opposition of parties claiming a superior lien and privilege on the property, asking that the marshal be required to retain sufficient of the proceeds to pay the claim of the interveners and for judgment against the judgment debtor for the amount of said claim, is a proceeding upon the law side of the court, and the interveners are not compelled to resort to a bill in equity for relief.

[See In re Hathorn, Case No. 6,214.]

2. The judgment or order of a court finally disposing of a case, cannot be reviewed at a subsequent term on motion. The only relief for errors in law in such cases is by review, writ of error or appeal, as either may be appropriate.

[3. A court has power at a subsequent term to set right mere forms in the judgment, to correct misprision of its clerks, and any merely clerical error, so as to conform the record to the truth.]

At chambers. This cause came up at the April term, 1870, on motion to reinstate interventions and third oppositions which had been dismissed at a previous term. [Dismissed.]

J. Ad. Rosier, for the motion.

Edward Phillips, contra.

WOODS, Circuit Judge. Alex. E. Prewett and the Northern Bank of Kentucky each recovered judgment in this court on the law side against Jules Labitut, the defendant, on which executions were issued and levied on defendant's crop of sugar and molasses, made by him on his plantation in the year 1869. Before the sale under the execution, Octave Hopkins filed his intervention and third opposition in his own behalf, and an intervention and third opposition in behalf of a large number of other persons, of whom he alleges himself to be the agent and attorney in fact. In this intervention he claims that he and the persons whom he represents have a lien and privilege on said crop of sugar and molasses, superior to that of any other creditor of Jules Labitut, and prays that the marshal be directed to retain in his hands the proceeds of the sale of the crop, until the interventions and third oppositions can be heard, and that judgment against Labitut may be rendered in favor of interveners, and the marshal directed to pay first, out of the funds in his hands from the sale of said crop, the judgment in favor of interveners. On the 8th of March, 1870, during the last term of this court, these interventions and third oppositions were dismissed, without prejudice to the right of the parties to file a bill in chancery. On the 26th of April, during the present term of the court, a rule was taken on the plaintiffs in execution to show cause why the interventions and third oppositions dismissed on March 8th should not be reinstated and the order of dismissal rescinded. This is the rule now before the court for decision.

We think the interventions and third oppositions were improperly dismissed. That courts of common law as well as courts of equity and of admiralty possess a controlling power over money brought into these courts respectively by their process, is undeniable. It is every day's practice in the common law courts, upon rules to show cause or upon motion to examine and decide the claims of third persons to money made under execution and paid into court. These interventions and third oppositions, in a more formal and precise way, invoke a power of the law side of the court which in common law states is exercised upon motion or rule. They constitute a convenient and summary method of disposing of the rights of persons to property levied on under execution. And though the forms may differ in different states, the proceedings have always been considered to be on the law side of the court. In some states when property is levied on which is claimed by another, a summary proceeding is instituted by the claimant, called "trial of the right of property." After the property is sold and the money is in the hands of the officer of the court, it is reached by motion, and the rights of the contestants to the fund tried and adjusted by the court. A bill in equity may be filed in a case of equitable jurisdiction. We regard these interventions and third oppositions as proceedings on the common law side of the court. The act of May 19, 1828, provides that the forms and modes of proceedings in suits in the courts of the United States held in those states admitted into the Union since the 29th day of September, in the year 1789, in those of common law, shall be the same in each of said states respectively, as are now used in the highest court of original and general jurisdiction of the same. This is the law of this court to day. Interventions and third oppositions were in use in this state, on and long prior to May 19, 1828, and we think they are authorized by the statute just quoted. These interventions were therefore improperly dismissed. But we are clearly of the opinion that the motion to reinstate them, and to rescind the order dismissing them comes too late. They were dismissed March 8, during the term which commenced on the first Monday of November, 1869, and this motion is made during the term which commenced on the fourth Monday of April, 1870.

Nothing is better settled than this, that after a court has adjourned, it cannot set aside one of its own judgments; the judgment is binding until reversed on error. See Bank of U. S. v. Moss, 6 How. [47 U. S.] 31, where this whole subject is discussed and authorities collated. A mere error in law of any kind, supposed to have been committed in a judgment of a court at a previous term, is never sufficient justification for revising or annulling it at a subsequent term in this summary way on motion. A court has power at a subsequent term to set right mere forms in its judgments, to correct misprisions of its clerks, and to correct any mere clerical errors so as to conform the record to the truth; irregularities also in notices, mandates and similar proceedings, can in some cases be amended at a subsequent term, and in short, all amendments permissible under the statute of jeofails may be made at a subsequent term. But the only relief for errors in law in such cases is by review, writ of error or appeal, as either may be appropriate. The cases in which these interventions were filed, were completely disposed of at the last term of this court. The interventions were dismissed. That is the end of the matter. The cases cannot be heard again at a subsequent term by having them again placed on the docket. They have become res adjudicata, and can only be reached in one of the methods already indicated. Because this motion comes too late, it must be dismissed.

BANK v. SHAW et al.

[2 Wkly. Notes Cas. 542; 1 Law & Eq. Rep. 591.]

Circuit Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. April 6–12, 1876.[1]

NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS—BILL OF LADING—PENNSYLVANIA STATUTES.

[1. Act Pa. Sept. 24, 1866, (1 P. L. 1363,) making bills of lading negotiable, does not enable a wrongful taker of such a bill to pass to an innocent purchaser any better title than he himself has. But if the rightful owner has negligently parted with the bill of lading the wrongful holder may pass a perfect title to an innocent purchaser, who has no notice of such negligence.]

[2. Purchasers of a bill of lading, who have any reason to believe that the sellers held it as security for an outstanding draft, take no better title than such sellers had. And the fact that the purchaser telegraphed the carrier, to learn whether the shipment represented by the bill had actually been made, is competent evidence on the question of the indorsee's belief.]

[See note at end of case.]

[At law. Action of replevin by the Merchants' National Bank of St. Louis against Shaw & Esrey for the recovery of certain cotton which had come into defendants' possession by an alleged wrongful transfer of the bill of lading. Judgment was heretofore given for plaintiffs, but a new trial was granted, on the authority of National Bank of Commerce v. Merchants' Nat. Bank, 91 U. S. 92, on the ground that the evidence had not been sufficiently clear that the bill of lading had been held as security for the payment of a certain draft. Verdict and judgment are now given for plaintiffs.

[This decision was subsequently affirmed by the supreme court in Shaw v. Railroad Co., 101 U. S. 557. See note at end of case.]

The Merchants' National Bank of St. Louis agreed with Norvell & Co. of that city and Kuhn & Bro. of Philadelphia to make advances on bills of lading for cotton shipped by Norvell & Co. to Kuhn & Bro., and in accordance with this agreement discounted Norvell & Co.'s draft on Kuhn & Bro. for $11,947 payable 20 days after sight. The Merchants' Bank at the same time received the original bill of lading for 170 bales to the order of Norvell & Co. and indorsed in blank by Norvell & Co. The duplicate bill of lading marked "Not negotiable" was forwarded by Norvell & Co. to Kuhn & Bro. as notice of the shipment. The Merchants' Bank forwarded to its correspondent in Philadelphia, the Bank of North America, for collection, the draft, with the bill of lading attached. Kuhn & Bro. accepted both, as the collector supposed, and they were held by the Bank of North America until maturity. The draft was then protested, and it was found that Kuhn & Bro. had substituted the duplicate for the original bill of lading and kept the latter. The officers and servants of the bank testified that this was without their knowledge or consent. Kuhn & Bro., soon after getting possession of the original bill of lading in this manner, got an advance of $8,500 thereon from Miller & Bro., directing them to sell the cotton as soon as possible. It was accordingly sold by sample and for cash to Shaw & Esrey, who did not see the bill of lading or other written evidence of title. The carrier delivered the cotton to Shaw & Esrey under the orders of Miller & Bro. Whereupon the Merchants' National Bank of St. Louis replevied it.

A short time before Kuhn & Bro. wrongfully got possession of the original bill of lad-ing involved in this case, Miller & Bro. had advanced $6,000 to Kuhn & Bro. on an original bill of lading for 143 bales, drawn and endorsed as this one was. On the next day Kuhn & Bro. took back the bill of lading, giving their check for $6,000 in exchange. Later in the same day Miller & Bro. advanced $7,000 to Kuhn & Bro. on the same bill. On the morning of this day Miller & Bro. saw a notice in a newspaper warning the public that a bill of lading for 143 bales had been stolen. Miller & Bro., before making the second advance of $7,000, learned from the officers of the Farmers' & Mechanics' Bank that the bill had been wrongfully taken from the bank, but the matter had been adjusted and advances could now safely be made on it. The bank officers then informed Miller & Bro. that in case of such a wrongful taking they would have a right to seize the cotton wherever found.

After advancing $8,500 on the bill of lading involved in this suit, Miller & Bro. wired the agent of the carrier at St. Louis and learned that the bill was all right. Miller & Bro. had been in the habit of making advances to Kuhn & Bro. on duplicate bills of lading.

There was no testimony as to the good faith of Shaw & Esrey.

R. N. Willson and George Junkin, for plaintiffs.

W. H. Lex and J. E. Gowen, contra.

Before McKENNAN, Circuit Judge, and CADWALADER, District Judge.

CADWALADER, District Judge, [orally charging the jury.] The effect of these transactions and of the letters and other evidence was that the cotton was appropriated for the security of the bank, not merely until acceptance of the bill in exchange, but until actual payment of it. Such a stipulation is proved, and not disputed. Upon the effect then of what has been stated, the plaintiffs had a special property in the cotton in question for the security not only of the acceptance, but the payment of the bill of exchange. Until, therefore, the plaintiffs voluntarily parted, if they ever did so, with the bill of lading, or bill of exchange, or otherwise lost their title to it, they had a special property in this cotton which authorized them to maintain the present action. As this bill of lading was negotiable, it becomes very important to inquire whether the possession of it was wilfully or negligently parted with by the Bank of North America as agent of the plaintiffs, because if the true owner of property, through himself or his agent, wilfully or negligently allows the muniments of title, especially such a muniment as a bill of lading, to get out of his possession and into circulation, so as to enable a wrong-doer to impose himself upon others as the owner, the true owners of the property may be divested of their title, and the wrong-doer able to pass to innocent parties a better title than the rightful owner would then have. It, therefore, becomes very important to inquire whether the Bank of North America wilfully or negligently parted with the possession of the original bill of lading, and as that bank was the agent of the plaintiff, and as the means of knowledge were, we think, peculiarly within their reach, reason and common sense would induce us to expect that the proof of the truth as far as it could be ascertained would come from the party who thus had the means of knowledge. Accordingly, the plaintiffs have undertaken to prove how, as far as they were able to show, this bill of lading got out of their possession, and their proof is very simple, and may probably be very satisfactory to you. In the first place they produce the president and cashier, which is proper if it were a mere formality, and it is a proper formality, to say that there was nothing known to them to authorize any departure from the regular rules of business. They had no right to part with it as between them and the plaintiffs, but, lest innocent persons should suffer, the proof is made that they never authorized nor knew anything about it. Then the subordinates who would have knowledge on the subject are produced, and their testimony is to the same effect.

If the plaintiffs or their agents neither wilfully nor negligently parted with this bill of lading, but it was surreptitiously abstracted, the court is of opinion that Kuhn & Bro. could not transfer to Miller a better title than they themselves had. The facts of the particular case are with the jury; the law, as the court is at present advised, I have stated. A bill of lading is, in certain forms of it, negotiable at common law, and, in other forms of it, is negotiable by a law of Pennsylvania passed in 1866. [Act Sept. 24, 1866; 1 P. L. 1363.] Other states have passed laws which are somewhat different. Louisiana and Missouri have passed laws which use words making a bill of lading negotiable in the same way that a bank note or bill of exchange is negotiable. The Pennsylvania law omits those words, and the court is of opinion that their omission is to be considered in the interpretation of the act, and that while a bill of lading is to certain intents negotiable, so as to pass the legal title among parties rightfully concerned in it, and so as to enable a wrong-doer, under circumstances such as I have explained, to impose himself on the world as owner, yet the rule that applies to a bank note, or bill of exchange, or promissory note is not in Pennsylvania the standard by which to determine the present question. If the true owner through any fault, omission of duty, or carelessness of any kind, to say nothing of what is not, of course, a wilful parting, enables a wrong-doer to impose upon the world, then the true owner ought to suffer; but, where the bill of lading is merely stolen from him, the law does not shift the title through a mere possession of it alone.

The plaintiffs' case thus far, if we are right in the law as we state it, and in this view of the facts, stands on a very simple footing. The defendants of record—Shaw & Esrey—appear to have bought here through a broker the cotton in controversy, from Miller & Bro. Now it does not appear that, when the defendants bought, a bill of lading or any muniment of title or anything of the kind was exhibited to them. They bought on samples, and, while their purchase was an innocent and ordinary one in the market, there was nothing to show title by documents such as a bill of lading or anything else. Their case, therefore, if there was nothing intervening, is simply that of a party who innocently buys what did not belong to the seller, and every man knows that he can get no better title than the seller, so that, as far as the defendants' personal relations to the property in question are concerned, they could acquire no title as against the present plaintiff; but Shaw & Esrey have the full benefit of whatever title Miller & Bro., from whom they bought, may have had. If, therefore, Miller & Bro. had a better right than the plaintiffs, Shaw & Esrey have the benefit of that right, because whatever right Miller & Bro. had, they sold to Shaw & Esrey.

This brings us to inquire as to the title which Miller & Bro. set up. They allege that they have, by reason of what occurred between them and Kuhn & Bro., a better title than the plaintiffs, and they rest this allegation of title upon the possession by Kuhn & Bro. of the original bill of lading, and the exhibition of it to them, and transfer of it to them, as security for an advance of $8,500. The court is of opinion that if there was no wilful or negligent parting with the bill of lading by the true owners of the cotton, Kuhn & Bro. could transfer no better right than they themselves had. If you should find that there was on the part of the plaintiffs or their agents a negligent, not a wilful parting as alleged, but a negligent, parting with the bill of lading, then the title of Miller & Bro. requires consideration under a different light. Then, if there was nothing more in the case, Miller & Bro. would get a better title than the plaintiffs, and hence, it becomes necessary to consider a question which I will state thus: did Miller & Bro. know any fact or facts from which there was reason to believe that the bill of lading in question was held as a security for an outstanding draft? If they did, they were not innocent takers. I do not mean that they were not innocent, as between them and Kuhn & Bro. I do not mean that there was any moral fraud, but I mean innocent as regards a true owner. It is for you to say how far that transaction with the Farmers' & Mechanics' Bank, and another circumstance which I will mention, may rationally have contributed to induce in the mind of a reasonable person a distrust of the honesty of Kuhn & Bro., in respect of such transactions as that of which you find, in the evidence in question, this is a part. But there is another circumstance, which accordingly as you may view the facts, and they are entirely for you, may or may not induce you to believe not merely that Mr. Miller had reason to distrust, but that he actually did distrust Kuhn, in reference to the very shipment in question, because it appears that when he made the advance of $8,500 on the bill of lading here in question, he telegraphed to a person who represented the carriers to know if all was right. Now, as regards the carrier, a carrier could know nothing except the fact whether the cotton was shipped. I do not want to usurp your privilege: it is for you to say whether you so find, but I suggest for your consideration, that there was distrust on the question whether this cotton, any cotton, or the cotton represented by the bill of lading, had been shipped at all. Would Miller have made this inquiry if he had no distrust of Kuhn & Bro.? Those two circumstances, separately or together as you may think right, are for your consideration, and upon them, and upon the whole facts of the case, you will say whether you will find that Miller knew what gave him reason to believe that Kuhn's title was not all right. If you do so find, then it would be of no importance whether the Bank of North America was negligent or not, because they do not lose their title as between them and Kuhn, and would only lose it as regards an innocent unsuspecting purchaser. If Miller had reason to believe all was not right, then he took the risk; there was no fraud, but he was not a child under age, and he knew the risk that he ran, if he doubted the title. It did not impute any want of integrity in him. In fact, I do not know how it is with you, but I rather think all of us are very much in the habit of running risks of which we know we take the consequences. We take for granted that checks are not forged, and we do it perhaps with people we know nothing about, and we may think ourselves very foolish if we get into difficulty, but it does not affect our moral standing, and I say, I do not see anything in this case to raise a question affecting Mr. Miller morally, but the question is whether he has not taken a risk on himself, of which he ought to take the consequences.

You will find your verdict generally for plaintiffs or for the defendants.

The court requests the jury before their verdict is recorded to answer specially two questions: (1) Whether there was any negligence of the plaintiffs or their agents in parting with possession of the bill of lading. (2) Whether Miller & Bro. knew any fact or facts from which they had reason to believe the bill of lading was held to secure payment of an outstanding draft.

McKENNAN, Circuit Judge, concurred.

Verdict for plaintiffs. Answer to first question: No. Answer to second question: Yes. Thereupon judgment was entered for plaintiffs.

[NOTE. This judgment was affirmed by the supreme court in Shaw v. Railroad Co., 101 U. S. 557. Mr. Justice Strong, in delivering the opinion, said: "Bills of lading are regarded as so much cotton, grain, iron, or other articles of merchandise. The merchandise is very often sold or pledged by the transfer of the bills which cover it. They are, in commerce, a very different thing from bills of exchange and promissory notes, answering a different purpose and performing different functions. It cannot be, therefore, that the statute which made them negotiable by indorsement and delivery, or negotiable in the same manner as bills of exchange and promissory notes are negotiable, intended to change totally their character, put them in all respects on the footing of instruments which are the representatives of money, and charge the negotiation of them with all the consequences which usually attend or follow the negotiation of bills and notes. Some of these consequences would be very strange, if not impossible, such as the liability of indorsers, the duty of demand ad diem, notice of nondelivery by the carrier. etc., or the loss of the owner's property by the fraudulent assignment of a thief. If these were intended, surely the statute would have said something more than merely make them negotiable by indorsement. No statute is to be construed as altering the common law, further than its words import. It is not to be construed as making any innovation upon the common law which it does not fairly express. Especially is so great an innovation as would be placing bills of lading on the same footing in all respects with bills of exchange not to be inferred from words that can be fully satisfied without it. The law has most carefully protected the ownership of personal property, other than money, against misappropriation by others than the owner, even when it is out of his possession. This protection would be largely withdrawn if the misappropriation of its symbol or representative could avail to defeat the ownership, even when the person who claims under a misappropriation had reason to believe that the person from whom he took the property had no right to it. We think, therefore, that the rule asserted in Goodman v. Harvey, 4 Adol. & E. 870; Goodman v. Simonds, 20 How. (61 U. S.) 343; Murray v. Lardner, 2 Wall. (69 U. S.) 110,—and in Phelan v. Moss, 67 Pa. St. 59, is not applicable to a stolen bill of lading. At least, the purchaser of such a bill, with reason to believe that his vendor was not the owner of the bill, or that it was held to secure the payment of an outstanding draft, is not a bona fide purchaser. and he is not entitled to hold the merchandise covered by the bill against its true owner. In the present case there was more than mere negligence on the part of Miller & Bro.; more than mere reason for suspicion. There was reason to believe Kuhn & Bro. had no right to negotiate the bill. This falls very little, if any, short of knowledge. It may fairly be assumed that one who has reason to believe a fact exists knows it exists; certainly, if he be a reasonable being."]

BANK OF ALEXANDRIA v. CLARKE.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 464.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. April Term, 1824.

NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS — STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS—NEW PROMISE — INDORSER A COMPETENT WITNESS.

1. In an action by the indorsee of a promissory note against the maker, the indorser is a competent witness for the plaintiff, (without a release,) to prove an acknowledgment of the debt so as to take the case out of the statute of limitations.

[See Mason v. Masi, Case No. 9,244; Gaither v. Lee, Id. 5,182.]

2. The defendant said he thought the plaintiff had charged up the note to his account, if that was not the case he would "attend" to it; this is sufficient to rebut the plea of the statute of limitations.

At law. Assumpsit, by the [Bank of Alexandria] indorsee against [Edward W. Clarke] the maker of a promissory note for $64.25. [Judgment for plaintiff.]

A verdict was taken for the plaintiff subject to the opinion of the court, whether the deposition of C. Neale, the indorser of the note, be admissible as evidence in this cause, without a release from the plaintiff; and, if admissible, whether it be sufficient per se to take the case out of the statute of limitations. Judgment to be rendered for plaintiff or defendant according to the opinion of the court on the above points.

THE COURT, at December term, 1824, (CRANCH, Chief Judge, contra,) gave judgment for the plaintiff. See Barnes v. Ball, 1 Mass. 73, and Rice v. Stearns, 3 Mass. 225; Gaither v. Lee, in this court, at June term, 1820, [Case No. 5,182;] and Knowles v. Stuart, at April term, 1824, [Case No. 7,900.]

Writ returnable to this term.

THE COURT, some days ago, appointed yesterday for the trial of this cause under the law incorporating the bank.

Mr. C. Lee hoped that judgment would not be rendered by default until a rule had been laid, or notice given to defendant. The appearance-day is the day after the rising of this court.

The defendant being called, and not appearing, judgment by default was rendered and a writ of inquiry awarded.

Case No. 846.

BANK OF ALEXANDRIA v. DENEALE.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 488.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May Term, 1824.

NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS—SPECIAL USAGE OF DISCOUNTING BANK.

1. A party to a note discounted at a bank, is not bound by the special and particular usage of such bank, unless upon his agreement, express or implied.

[See Bank of Columbia v. McKenney, Case No. 874.]

2. Upon a prayer for instruction to the jury, the court, in considering the question whether the jury can, from the evidence, infer the facts necessary to justify the instruction prayed, must decide in the same manner as they would upon a demurrer to evidence, and will consider all those facts as proved which the jury could legally infer from the evidence.

3. But upon the question whether the instruction prayed be justified by the facts stated in the prayer, the court is bound to decide upon those principles which ought to govern them in deciding upon a special verdict. The ultimate facts upon which the party relies must be expressly and absolutely stated. The court can infer nothing.

4. If a case cannot be brought within the special usage of the bank, it must be governed by the general law of the land; and by that law the indorser is not liable, unless demand of payment be made upon the maker of the note.

5. By the law-merchant the rights and obligations of the parties to a negotiable bill or note are as precisely ascertained as if they had been expressed in so many words. The obligation of the indorser is an express, not an implied obligation. It is conditional, not absolute. No parol agreement made at the same time with the written agreement, can alter or control its legal import; nor can evidence of such parol agreement be admitted.

6. In a case stated, the court cannot infer any fact as they may upon a demurrer to evidence.

7. An understanding and expectation of the parties, does not, in a special verdict, or case stated, amount to a finding of an agreement.

At law. Assumpsit [by the Bank of Alexandria] against the executrix of the indorser of a promissory note for $4,000, made by one James Deneale by his attorney in fact, the defendant's testator, George Deneale, payable to the said George Deneale and by him indorsed to the plaintiffs, by whom it was discounted, and the proceeds placed to the credit of the maker, James Deneale. [Verdict and judgment for defendant.]

It was dated at Alexandria, on the 16th of June, 1818, and payable sixty days after date. No place of payment was stated in the note. James Deneale, the maker of the note, resided at Dumfries in Virginia, about twenty-five miles from Alexandria, and had never resided in Alexandria. George Deneale, who was his brother, resided in Alexandria. On the 18th of August, 1818, (being the 3d day of grace,) the notary employed by the bank, put a letter into the post-office at Alexandria directed to the said James Deneale at Dumfries, informing him that the note was due. George Deneale died on or about the 2d of July, 1818, before the note became payable. Notice of non-payment of the note was given to the defendant, his executrix, on the 19th of August, 1818. On the trial, the plaintiffs offered evidence that the bank did not demand payment from the makers of promissory notes, discounted by the bank, if the makers resided out of the town, and not in any town where a bank was established. That when a note is not paid by three o'clock on the last day of grace, it is delivered to a notary public, who, if the maker lives out of town, states that fact in his protest, and gives notice to the indorser, and returns the protest to the bank; and that this practice of the notary, and of the bank, was generally known to the dealers in the Bank of Alexandria. That some of the preceding notes of the same series had been protested in the same manner, and judgments had been confessed by the said James Deneale as maker, and by George Deneale as indorser; and that new notes had been given for the judgments. The power of attorney from James Deneale to George authorized him to sign notes for him to be negotiated in the Bank of Alexandria, and to renew the same from time to time.

Mr. Taylor, for the plaintiffs, prayed the court, in effect, to instruct the jury that if they should believe, from the said evidence, that it was the known and established usage of the banks in Alexandria to make no demand of payment on non-resident drawers of notes discounted in those banks, but to call upon and give notice to the resident indorsers of such notes; and that the note in question was indorsed by the said George Deneale with the understanding and expectation that if not duly paid by the maker, it was to be sent out from the bank to the notary and by him proceeded with conformably to the said usage, and in all respects as it was treated; and with the understanding and expectation that no further or other steps of diligence were, in that case, to be pursued by the bank for making demand of payment of the said note, or giving notice to the indorser of the non-payment of the same, than as aforesaid, then it is not necessary, in order to charge the defendant, as executrix of the said George, in this action, upon his indorsement aforesaid, to prove that any demand of payment of the said note had been made on the said James Deneale.

CRANCH, Chief Judge, delivered the opinion of the court as follows, (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent.) The court refuses to give the instruction prayed by the plaintiff's counsel.

1st. Because the evidence does not support the hypothesis upon which the instruction is prayed; and

2d. Because the hypothesis, if true, will not justify the instruction.

1. The hypothesis requires a known and established usage of the banks in Alexandria, to make no demand of payment on non-resident drawers of notes discounted in those banks; and a like usage of the banks to call upon and give notice to the resident indorsers of such notes. The evidence is, that it had never been the usage of the banks to demand payment from the non-resident drawers of discounted notes, but "that the universal usage of the banks was to deliver such notes to the notary public, on the day they fell due; if not paid in banking hours, without any special instructions or directions to the notary, expecting him to do his duty." The bank, then, had no usage on the subject of demand and notice in such cases, but depended upon the notary to do his duty according to law; leaving the responsibility with him, and, no doubt, holding him responsible if he did not. There is no evidence of any usage of the bank to call upon and give notice to the resident indorsers of such notes. Whatever may have been the usage of the notary, it was not the usage of the bank.

2. The hypothesis requires that the note should have been indorsed by George Deneale (the defendant's testator) with the understanding and expectation that if not duly paid by the drawer, it was to be sent out from the bank to the notary, and by him proceeded with conformably to the usage before described, and in all respects as it was treated.

Before the court can give the instruction prayed, they must be satisfied that the jury can, from the evidence stated, infer the facts which constitute the hypothesis upon which the instruction is prayed. That question must be decided in the same manner as the court would decide upon a demurrer to evidence, and the court will consider all those facts as proved which the jury could legally infer from the evidence taken altogether; for, in the present case, according to the prayer, the jury is to believe all the evidence to be true. If, then, from the whole evidence stated, the jury cannot infer that the note was indorsed by the defendant's testator, with the understanding and expectation, that if not duly paid by the drawer it was to be sent out from the bank to the notary and by him proceeded with conformably to the usage stated, and in all respects as it was treated, the court cannot give the instruction.

From an attentive consideration of the evidence as stated, the court is of opinion that the jury cannot legally draw the inference required by the hypothesis. For if the jury should draw the inference that the usage existed and was known to the defendant's testator at the time of his indorsing the note, yet from the whole evidence as stated, the jury might and ought to infer that the said note was drawn with the understanding and expectation that payment thereof, when due, should be demanded of the said George as the attorney and agent of the said James; and the circumstances which induce the court to think that such is the inference which the jury ought to draw, are the following:

1st. The power of attorney from James Deneale to George Deneale, dated October 13, 1800, lodged in the Bank of Alexandria before the drawing and indorsing of any of the said notes, by which the said George is authorized to draw notes in the name of the said James, negotiable in the Bank of Alexandria, and to draw and renew them from time to time, for the accommodation of the said James.

2d. That the bank notices which are usually sent by the bank, to the makers of discounted notes, informing them of the time when their respective notes would become payable, were, in regard to the previous notes drawn by the said George as attorney of the said James, and discounted by the said bank, sent to the said George; and that the said George, as agent and attorney of the said James, had usually paid, or provided the means of retiring the same.

3d. That whenever any of the preceding notes were protested, (and it was only in those cases that a formal demand became necessary; for in all other cases the notes were taken up before the expiration of the last day of grace,) payment thereof was first demanded of the said George, as agent of the said James, the drawer thereof; and that the said George never objected to such demand of payment so made upon him as agent of the said James; but in one instance confessed judgment in an action brought against him as indorser of one of the said preceding notes, of which payment had been demanded of him as agent of the said James as aforesaid, and paid, or provided the means of retiring the others.

4th. That evidence was given that it was the invariable custom of the notary in all cases of notes discounted in the banks in Alexandria, to give notice on the last day of grace to the non-resident drawer by the mail of that day if the note came to his hands in time for the mail; if not, by the mail of the succeeding day, that such was due, and in his hands for protest; but that, in regard to such of the said preceding notes as had been protested, no such notice was given, because payment had been demanded of the said George as agent of the said James, the drawer thereof. These circumstances and acts of the parties, are all inconsistent with the usage attempted to be proved in cases of non-resident drawers; and there is no evidence of any act done by any of the parties in reference to such usage, except this, that after the said George's death, the notary put a letter into the post-office at Alexandria, on the 18th of August, after the mail of that day for Dumfries had been closed, addressed to James Deneale, (the maker of the note,) at Dumfries, informing him that the note was due, and in his hands for protest. This act may have been done, by the notary, in compliance with the supposed usage, but is no evidence that the note was indorsed in reference to such usage; and if the note was not indorsed in reference to such usage, the hypothesis is not supported, and the instruction cannot be given.

3. The hypothesis further requires that the note should have been indorsed by the defendant's testator, with the understanding and expectation, that no further or other steps of diligence were, in that case, to be pursued by the said bank for making demand of the said note, or giving notice to the indorser of the non-payment of the same, than those stated in the description of the usage. The argument which shows that the jury cannot infer that the note was indorsed in reference to the usage, shows that they cannot infer that it was indorsed with an understanding and expectation that no further steps of diligence should be pursued by the bank. If the note was indorsed with the understanding that payment thereof, when due, should be demanded of George as agent of James (the maker,) then it could not have been indorsed with an understanding that no further or other steps of diligence should be pursued than those stated in the description of the usage, because such demand is not required by the usage. But it has been said that even if the note was indorsed with an understanding that payment should be required of George as agent of James, yet, as, by the death of George (which was the act of God,) it became impossible to demand payment from George, the bank is justified by its usage in not making any demand of payment from the maker of the note. But it is only by the agreement and consent of the parties that the usage of the bank can have any effect; and no agreement is stated in the hypothesis, or in the evidence, that in case of George's death before the note should become payable, demand of payment from the maker should be dispensed with. If the case cannot be brought within the special usage of the bank, it must be governed by the general law of the land; and by that law the indorser is not liable unless demand of payment be made of the maker of the note. The defendant is not bound by the special usage, unless at the time of indorsing the note, her testator agreed to be so bound; and there is no evidence of a special custom, that if it be agreed at the time of indorsing a note, that payment shall be demanded of the agent of the maker, and if the agent should die, before the day of payment, then no demand of payment should be made from the maker himself. For these reasons we think the hypothesis not justified by the evidence.

2. The second reason for refusing to give the instruction is, that it is not justified by the hypothesis. As, in considering the question whether the hypothesis was justified by the evidence, the court was bound to decide according to the principles which ought to govern them in deciding upon a demurrer to evidence; so, in considering the question whether the instruction is justified by the hypothesis, the court is bound to decide upon those principles which ought to govern them in deciding upon a special verdict. The ultimate facts, upon which the party relies, must be expressly and absolutely stated. The court can infer nothing. Nothing can, by inference, be added to the hypothesis. It is a serious question how far the special customs or usages of a bank or banker can limit, extend, or define the obligations and rights of the respective parties to a negotiable instrument which happens to be, or was originally intended to be, discounted by such bank or banker. We put out of the question all those special contracts which are made in reference to any particular trade, where the contracting parties are supposed to know the course and usage of such trade, and to have contracted in reference thereto; and all those contracts upon the face of which there is an ambiguity; and all contracts not negotiable, in which the assignee takes the paper subject to all its equity. This is the case of an instrument negotiable by the statute, or by the law-merchant; and by that law, which is only a branch of the common law, (Carth. 269; 1 Show. 127, 318; 12 Mod. 15; 1 Ld. Raym. 175; 6 Mod. 29; 2 Burrows, 1226, 1228; 3 Burrows, 1667; Hale, Com. Law, 24, 25; 1 Bl. Comm. 7, Christ. Note;) the rights and obligations of the parties are as precisely ascertained as if they had been expressed in so many words, (Farnum v. Fowle, 12 Mass. 92; 13 Mass. 558; Rowe v. Young, 2 Brod. & B. 184, Judge Best's opinion; and Id. 204, Burrough's opinion in the house of lords.) The obligation of the indorser is, that he will pay the money if the maker do not pay it when due, provided it be duly demanded of the maker, and due notice be given to the indorser of such demand and non-payment. It is an express, not an implied contract. It is conditional, not absolute.

We do not know that it has ever yet been decided that the custom or usage of a bank can convert the conditional obligation of an indorser into an absolute obligation; nor do we know that it has yet been adjudged that parol evidence can be received to contradict the legal import of a written contract. The indorsement is a written contract. Its words are "Pay the contents to A. B. or order." The legal import of that contract is perfectly ascertained, and is, as before stated, a conditional obligation to pay the money. Has any case yet gone the length to say, that parol evidence may be given to show that, at the time of the indorsement, the indorser agreed, by parol, that he would be absolutely bound to pay the money at all events? Our own decision, in the case of Renner v. Bank of Columbia, [Case No. 11,699,] has been pressed upon us, and it comes with tenfold weight since it has been affirmed by the supreme court, at its last term, (February, 1824.) 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 581. But in that case, the evidence of the usage of the banks to demand payment of, and protest, notes, and give notice to indorsers on the day after the last day of grace, was received without objection; and the object of the evidence was not to contradict or to vary the terms, or the legal import of the contract, but to ascertain whether due diligence had been used in making the demand, and giving notice of non-payment. What is due diligence, is a question compounded of fact and law. It depends very much upon the distance of the parties, the course of the mail, the usage of the post-office, and of bankers and mercantile men, and many other circumstances, all of which depend upon evidence. No material part of the contract was to be altered or varied by the evidence offered in that case. It was not, as in the present case, to change entirely the nature of the contract, and make that absolute which was only conditional. If the legal import of the contract of the indorser had been written out verbatim, "I will pay this note, if the maker, upon due demand, do not, and I have due notice," would the court have permitted evidence to be given, that, at the time he wrote and signed the contract, he declared, that, notwithstanding the express words which make the contract conditional, he would absolutely pay the money without any condition? A party may waive a condition inserted for his benefit, but this waiver must be a subsequent act. You may then give evidence of it, because such evidence could not contradict the original written contract; but you cannot give evidence that, at the time of executing the instrument, the contract was different from what it imports to be upon its face. No rule of law is better settled than this.

In all the cases which we have seen, in which the usage of banks has been permitted to be given, in evidence, in actions upon negotiable instruments, the object has been to show, and bring home to the defendants the particular usage of the bank in relation to a matter left undecided by the legal import of the contract, and which depended upon usage, namely, the time and mode of the demand and notice necessary to charge the indorser. The law-merchant, as a general law, only requires that the demand and notice should be in reasonable time. What is a reasonable time has not yet been decided by any rule applicable to all cases. What may be reasonable, in some circumstances, may not be reasonable in others; and it is competent for the parties, at the time of making the written contract, to agree, verbally, respecting those matters which are not provided for by that contract. In the cases to which we allude, the judges have been careful to recognize the rule, that the legal import of a written agreement cannot be contradicted or varied by parol, and say that the admission of the parol evidence offered, does not violate that rule, because it is to prove a parol agreement respecting matters not provided for by the written agreement. In the case of Jones v. Fales, 4 Mass. 251, which is the strongest case cited by the supreme court of the United States, in their opinion, in the case of Renner v. Bank of Columbia, [Case No. 11,699,] the point of law decided was, that, "if the defendant, when he indorsed these notes, agreed that, if the notes should be lodged in any bank in Boston, for collection, and if the bank should, according to its usage, notify the promisor, on the first day of grace, that the notes would be due on the last day of grace, and should request him to make payment, and should, afterwards, on the last day of grace, notify the defendant, the indorser, that the notes were not then paid, that he would be answerable on his indorsement," he was bound by his agreement, and could not require that the demand should be made in any other form, or at any other time.

Here, it will be perceived that the parol agreement was respecting a matter not provided for by the written, namely, the mode and time of the demand. It is intimated, by the court, that the condition of demanding payment of the maker, is a condition implied by law, for the benefit of the indorser. But the condition is no more an implied condition than the obligation of the indorser is an implied obligation; and parol evidence might as well be given to prove that, when he indorsed the note, he denied that he was bound, in any event, to pay the money, as to prove that he waived the condition, which was an original and essential part of the agreement. Mr. C. J. Parsons says, "Evidence of this kind, and for this purpose, is not to establish new law, but to prove that the defendant has waived a condition implied by law for his benefit, and has consented to other terms, to which, without question, he might have expressly agreed." But it does not follow because a man might have expressly agreed to other terms, that you may give parol evidence that he did consent to other terms than those expressed in his written agreement, according to its legal import. If the court meant to say that parol evidence may be given to contradict the legal import of the contract of indorsement of a negotiable instrument, we cannot concur with them; and as the case before them did not require them to go so far as that, we do not think that they intended it. But before we can give the instruction now prayed, we must go to that extent. The usage would convert the conditional into an absolute obligation to pay the money, at all events. The note would, in effect, become joint and several, and the transaction, instead of being a mercantile discount, would be a direct loan, and the bank, by taking interest in advance, would be chargeable with usury. It is only by maintaining the negotiability of the note, and proving the transaction to be what it purports to be, that the bank can avoid the charge of usury. The usage, of which evidence is offered, contradicts all that part of the transaction which discriminates it from a direct loan, and, therefore, would so materially vary the original written contract, that the admission of such evidence would be inconsistent with the rules of evidence and the principles of law to which we have before adverted. In the case of Lincoln & Kennebeck Bank v. Page, 9 Mass. 159, cited, also, in the opinion of the supreme court, in the case of Renner v. Bank of Columbia, [supra,] the parol evidence offered was not that demand and notice were entirely dispensed with by any usage or stipulation, but "modified as to time and manner." However broadly, therefore, the court has laid down the doctrine upon which they decided the cause, the case itself is within the limit within which we think the doctrine ought to be circumscribed; that is to say, that, although the parties have entered into a written agreement, yet parol evidence may be given of a parol agreement, made at the same time, in relation to circumstances not provided for in the written contract, but not to contradict or vary the terms of the written contract itself. The case of Renner v. Bank of Columbia goes no further. The principal question in that case was, whether demand and notice on the day after the last day of grace, was sufficient to charge the indorser of a promissory note. Evidence of the usage of the banks was received without objection, and, under that usage, the knowledge of which was brought home to the defendant under such circumstances as justified an inference of his assent to it, the verdict and judgment were for the plaintiff. Whatever inferences may be drawn from the reasoning of the court, in that case, we do not think ourselves justified in extending the doctrine further than the case itself will warrant. We are therefore of opinion that no parol agreement, made at the same time with the written agreement, can alter or control its legal import, and that no evidence of such a parol agreement can be admitted. If we do not stop here, we know not to what extent the doctrine contended for may not be carried. If the particular usage of any individual banker, or even of a bank, through whose hands a negotiable paper may have passed, is to control the rights and obligations of the parties, no man can be safe in receiving or passing away such paper. Courts and merchants have been, for ages, endeavoring to ascertain and fix, with precision, the rights and obligations of the parties to negotiable instruments, and it is highly important that they should be settled. But the doctrine contended for, will make every thing depend upon local or individual usage. It will produce a state of uncertainty which will lead to endless litigation. The instruction which the court is required to give to the jury is, that it is not necessary, in order to charge the defendant, as executrix of the said George, in this action, on his indorsement aforesaid, to prove that any demand of payment of the said note, had been made on the said James, provided the jury should believe the evidence stated, and should therefrom draw the inferences stated in the hypothesis.

Prima facie, the bank was bound to make demand of payment from the maker. Nothing could excuse them from making it but the agreement of the indorser to waive it. No direct evidence of such an agreement is stated, nor is the fact stated by way of inference in the hypothesis; but evidence is stated, from which it is supposed, by the plaintiffs, that the jury may, and ought, to infer that fact. Unless the jury find that fact, the instruction cannot be given—yet that fact is not contained in the statement of facts upon which the law is supposed to arise. An understanding and expectation that the note would be treated as it was, is something short of an agreement that it should be so treated. Connected with other circumstances, it may be evidence of such an agreement, but it is not the agreement itself, and the court cannot, upon a case stated, infer any fact as they can on a demurrer to evidence. Every prayer to the court to instruct the jury is grounded upon a supposed finding of facts by the jury; and before the court can say what the law would be upon such a finding, they must consider the facts as found. The same rule, therefore, is to be applied to the hypothetical statement, as to a special verdict. The court can draw no inferences of fact. Every thing relied upon must be explicitly stated. The fact of the agreement to waive the demand not being anywhere stated, and the court being of opinion that the evidence will not warrant the jury in inferring that such an agreement was made by the defendant's testator, we cannot give the instruction prayed. The jury found a verdict for the defendant. The plaintiffs' counsel took a bill of exceptions, but did not prosecute a writ of error.

BANK OF ALEXANDRIA v. DYER.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. March Term, 1838.[2]

STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS BEYOND SEAS—COUNTIES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The county of Alexandria in the District of Columbia, is not beyond seas, as to the county of Washington in the same district.

[See note at end of case.]

defendants [Edward Dyer and Francis C. Dyer] to the plaintiff's use. The defendants pleaded non-assumpsit, and the statute of limitations of Maryland, (1715, c. 23.) The plaintiffs relied, that at the time of making the promise "they were in the county of Alexandria in the District of Columbia, beyond the seas, and so in the county of Alexandria, beyond the seas, remained and continued until the day of the impetration of the original writ aforesaid, to wit, at Washington county aforesaid; and this they are ready to verify," &c. To this replication the defendants demurred. [Demurrer sustained. This judgment was subsequently affirmed by the supreme court in Bank of Alexandria v. Dyer, 14 Pet. (39 U. S.) 141.]

Mr. R. S. Coxe, for the plaintiffs.

Alexandria county and Washington county are governed by different laws; as much so as Virginia and Maryland. This point has always been so decided by this court, in the removal of slaves from one county to the other. When two places are under different sovereignties, they are beyond seas as to each other. The laws of Alexandria and Washington are derived from different sovereignties; and those laws are specially continued in force in the respective counties, by the act of congress of the 27th of February, 1801, (2 Stat. 103.) Shelby v. Guy, 11 Wheat. [24 U. S.] 361.

Mr. W. L. Brent, contra.

The savings in the statute do not apply to a bank; such as non-age, coverture, and imprisonment. A bank has no residence. The replication merely says that the plaintiffs were in Alexandria county when the promise was made.

Mr. Bradley, on the same side.

The judicial jurisdiction of the two counties is the same; and by the act of congress of the 24th of June, 1812, § 5, (2 Stat. 755,) executions may be served in either county. Scotland is not beyond seas in respect to England. Byles, Lim. 193; Le Roy v. Crowninshield, [Case No. 8,269.]

Mr. Coxe, in reply.

If this case had happened before the 27th of February, 1801, the replication would have been good. The act of congress of that date continues the laws of the two counties as they were before; if so, the plaintiffs have the same rights as if the jurisdiction had not been changed. If the replication was good before 1801, it is good now. It is no objection that the bank cannot have the benefit of all the exceptions of the statute; and it is no reason that the bank cannot have the benefit of some, because it cannot have the benefit of all. A corporation has a residence, a commorancy. U. S. v. Amedy, 11 Wheat. [24 U. S.] 392. The lex fori is the rule. If it depend upon the jurisdiction of the country, "beyond seas" could not be pleaded in any of the circuit courts of the United States, when the plaintiff resided in a different state. Upon a cession of territory the laws remain until changed by the new sovereign.

THE COURT (MORSELL, Circuit Judge, contra) sustained the demurrer, being of opinion that the replication was insufficient.

[NOTE. This case arose under the statute of limitations of Maryland, (1715,) which, with other laws, was continued in force when the territory on the north bank of the Potomac was ceded to the United States, and became the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia. Virginia ceded territory on the south bank, which was erected into the county of Alexandria, as to which the Virginia laws were continued in force. The decision in this case was affirmed in Bank of Alexandria v. Dyer, 14 Pet. (39 U. S.) 141. Mr. Chief Justice Taney, in delivering the opinion of the court, said that the words "beyond seas" were manifestly borrowed from the English statute James I. c. 21, which have always been construed to mean "without the jurisdiction," and such should be the construction in this case; that, although the county of Alexandria was unquestionably beyond seas, with respect to the county of Washington, before they were ceded to the United States by Virginia and Maryland, respectively, nevertheless, after the cession, when the District of Columbia was created, the two counties became parts of one political body, united under one government and jurisdiction, their relation being analogous to that of counties in a state, and not to that of states in the Union, and therefore one was no longer beyond seas with respect to the other.

[The county of Alexandria was subsequently ceded back to Virginia by Act July 9, 1846, (9 Stat. 35.)]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. June Term, 1804.

CHARTER OF THE BANK OF ALEXANDRIA.

The Bank of Alexandria, under its charter, had a right to have its causes tried at the first term to which the writ was returnable, if the note were made negotiable at the bank, and the writ was served ten days before its return day.

Motion by Mr. Simms, for the plaintiff, to try the cause at the first term, and that the marshal return the writ.

Mr. Jones, for the defendant. The return day of writs by the rule of this court, is the day after the last day of the term. The cause cannot be tried before the writ is returned.

(The writs are not made returnable to any particular day; but generally to the term.)

Mr. Simms. The intention of the act (the charter of the bank) is to give a speedy rem-

Both motions were granted. THE COURT being of opinion that they have a right to call upon the marshal now to return the writ; it being a necessary means of trying the cause.

BANKS AND BANKING—OVERDRAWAL OF ACCOUNT—EVIDENCE—CASHIER A COMPETENT WITNESS.

1. The cashier of a bank is a competent witness to prove that the defendant has overdrawn his account.

2. Payment of a check is prima facie evidence of funds.

[See Bank of United States v. Washington, Case No. 940.]

Assumpsit [by the Bank of Alexandria against John McCrea] for money overdrawn.

Mr. Swann, for the defendant, objected to the testimony of Mr. McKenna, the cashier of the bank, because he would be liable if he received the money and did not credit it.

THE COURT, however, (nem. con.) overruled the objection; because it was not attempted to be shown that the money was paid to him; and because, if it was paid to him, and he had not credited it, he would be liable to the defendant, or to the bank.

THE COURT also said, that they had decided at Washington, in Bank of United States v. Wilson, [Case No. 943,] that the payment of a check by the bank was prima facie evidence of funds in bank to the amount of the check.

[At law. Action by the Bank of Alexandria against Joseph Mandeville to recover on a promissory note. Heard on demurrer to the replication. Judgment for plaintiff.]

This cause was argued at the last term by Mr. Youngs and Mr. C. Lee, for the defendant, and Mr. E. J. Lee and Mr. C. Simms, for the plaintiff; and again at this term by the same counsel for the plaintiff, and Mr. Youngs and Mr. Swann, for the defendant.

CRANCH, Circuit Judge, delivered the following opinion. This is an action of debt brought by the Bank of Alexandria against Mandeville, to charge him as the secret partner of R. B. Jamesson, the maker of a promissory note for eight hundred dollars, payable sixty days after date, to the order of W. Herbert, in the Bank of Alexandria.

The defendant pleads,—

1. That on the 26th of May, 1806, it was corruptly agreed between the plaintiff and R. B. Jamesson, that the plaintiff should advance and lend R. B. Jamesson $791.60, and should give day of payment thereof until 60 days from the 26th of May, 1806, and also 3 days of grace thereafter, and that R. B. J. should give his note therefor with W. Herbert, an indorser, for 800 dollars, dated the 26th of May, 1806, payable 60 days after date, which said sum of $8.40 was for the interest and profit therefor, and for giving day of payment of the said 800 dollars for the said 60 days and the said 3 days of grace, which said sum of $8.40 exceeds the rate of 6 dollars for the interest of 100 dollars for one whole year, contrary to the form and effect of the statute in such case made and provided. The plea then avers that the note was so made and indorsed, and the plaintiffs advanced and paid to R. B. J. the sum of $791.60, by which the note, by force of the statute, is void in law, and this he is ready to verify.

2d plea. That on the 26th of May, 1806, it was corruptly agreed, &c., that R. B. J. should draw his note in the declaration mentioned in favor of W. Herbert, who should indorse the same, dated 26th of May, 1806, at 60 days after date, and the plaintiffs would pay him on the 27th of May, 1806, 800 dollars, upon condition that R. B. J. would, on the 27th of May, 1806, pay the plaintiffs the sum of $8.40, as interest upon the $800 for 63 days from the date of the note, which sum of $8.40 was, on the 27th of May, deducted from the $800, and the balance of $791.60 on that day paid to R. B. J., which sum of $8.40, the interest at 6 per cent. on 800 dollars for 63 days, for the loan of $800 for 62 days exceeds the rate, &c.

3d plea. That it was on the 26th of May, 1806, corruptly agreed that the note should be drawn, &c., and that the plaintiffs would discount 800 dollars on account of said note, which should be held for the payment thereof at the expiration of the 60 days and the 3 days of grace, upon the express condition that the interest upon the 800 dollars for the 63 days, amounting to $8.40, should be deducted from the 800 dollars, leaving the sum of $791.60 to be paid to the said R. B. J., which sum of $791.60 was, on the 27th of May, paid to R. B. J. by the plaintiffs. That only the sum of $791.60 was actually loaned to R. B. J., and for the forbearance of the said $791.60 for the 63 days the plaintiffs charged $8.40, which said sum of $8.40, the interest and profit charged for the loan and advance of $791.60 for 63 days, exceeds the rate, &c.

Replication to the 1st plea. Protesting that it was not corruptly agreed, &c., as stated in the plea, that the plaintiff should advance and lend to R. B. J. the sum of $791.60, and should give day of payment, &c., and that R. B. J. did not in pursuance of such supposed corrupt agreement execute the note, &c., to be held by the plaintiffs for the payment of 800 dollars at the expiration of the said 63 days; and that the plaintiffs did not in prosecution of such supposed corrupt agreement, advance and pay, &c. For replication says that R. B. J. offered the note to the plaintiffs, according to the usage and custom of the said bank, indorsed by W. H., to be discounted by the plaintiffs according to the usage, practice, and custom of the said Bank of Alexandria, and all other banking companies. "And the plaintiffs aver that they did not in pursuit of any corrupt agreement, or of any illegal contract, but in pursuance of the legal custom, practice, and usage of the said bank, discount the said note, and did in pursuance thereof pay over to the said R. B. J. the said sum of $791.60, detaining the sum of $8.40 as the discount for the said sum of $800 for 63 days, being at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, as they might lawfully do; and this they are ready to verify."

To this replication there is a general demurrer, which admits the facts as stated in the replication, if they are well pleaded. The question then is, whether those facts disclose an usurious transaction?

The facts stated in the replication are in substance: That R. B. Jamesson offered his note for 800 dollars, payable in 60 days after date, to W. Herbert's order, and by him indorsed according to the usage of the bank, to the plaintiffs, to be discounted by them according to their usage, and that of all other banks; and that the plaintiffs discounted it according to their usage, by paying to R. B. J. $791.60, and detaining the sum of $8.40 as the discount for the sum of 800 dollars for 63 days, being as they aver at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum. At the time of the first incorporation of the Bank of Alexandria, the Virginia statute of usury had enacted "that no person shall hereafter, upon any contract, take directly or indirectly, for loan of any money, wares, or merchandise, or other commodity, above the value of £5 for the forbearance of £100 for a year, and after that rate for a greater or lesser sum, or for a longer or a shorter time; and all bonds, contracts, covenants, conveyances, or assurances hereafter to be made for payment or delivery of any money or goods so to be lent, on which a higher interest is reserved or taken than is hereby allowed, shall be utterly void." The 2d section imposes a penalty on any person who shall take, accept, or receive more than the interest thereby allowed. And by the 3d section, any borrower of money may exhibit a bill in chancery against the lender, and compel him to discover on oath, &c. This was the law in the year 1792, when the Bank of Alexandria was incorporated, and although the interest of money generally was then limited by law to five per cent., the bank was authorized "to receive for discounts made at the bank at a rate not exceeding six per cent. per annum." In May, 1797, the lawful rate of interest was raised by act of assembly to six per cent.

It is contended on the part of the bank that the transaction disclosed by the replication is not usurious, upon two grounds.

1. Because the statute of usury does not affect bodies politic and corporate.

2. Because the use, custom, and practice of all banking companies in discounting bills and notes is to take interest upon the nominal amount of such bills and notes, and not upon the sum actually loaned by way of discount; and the word discount in the charter of the bank is to be explained by reference to such usage, and not to the common arithmetical rule of discount. In support of the first ground, that the statute of usury does not bind bodies politic, it is said that the statute is penal, and must be construed strictly. That the word person must be confined to natural persons, and although the act says that all bonds, &c., shall be void, yet it means all bonds, &c., made by such persons. But the court is not of that opinion. The taking of exorbitant interest by great moneyed institutions and corporations, was an evil as much within the mischief intended to be remedied as if the same should be taken by a natural person; and when by the letter of the law all bonds, &c., are made void, we think it as much within the spirit of the act as within its letter.

The second ground on which the plaintiffs rest the legality of the transaction is more substantial. The question which it raises, is, whether the bank, in discounting this note for $800 for sixty-three days, had a right to retain $8.40 as the discount therefor. If the agreement stated in the replication be such as the bank was authorized by its charter to make, the question of usury cannot arise. The preamble of the charter, (or rather of the act of assembly of Virginia, which incorporated the bank, and which has been decided by the supreme court [in Young v. Bank of Alexandria, 4 Cranch, (8 U. S.) 384] to be a public act,) in enumerating the benefits expected from the establishment of such an institution, and the objects which the legislature had in view, says, "and by discount rendering easy and expeditious the anticipation of funds." That kind of discount, therefore, which would enable a person to anticipate his funds, was a transaction which the legislature intended to authorize. In the body of the act, in section eighth, where certain powers are granted to the bank, it says, "and to receive for discounts made at the said bank, at a rate not exceeding six per cent. per annum." By allowing the bank to take six per cent. for discounts, when only five per cent. could be taken for interest on a loan, without taking notice of any repugnance between the two statutes, a strong presumption arises, that the legislature considered the discount by which funds could be anticipated, as a transaction very distinct from a simple loan of money. But this presumption does not rest alone upon the circumstance that the legislature did not notice a repugnance between the two statutes. The distinction between an anticipation of funds by discount, and a loan of money upon interest, exists in the nature of things. Suppose I ship a cargo of flour to a merchant in Boston, who in payment remits me a bill of exchange at sixty days sight, upon a merchant in Alexandria, who accepts it. I wish to anticipate this fund. I apply to the bank to discount it. Do I ask for a loan? Do I wish to borrow the money? No. I am entitled to receive a sum of money at the end of sixty days, but I wish to anticipate the receipt of it. I wish to receive it now instead of then. The bank discounts this bill. If it were a loan from the bank to me, I should be the principal debtor, and the first person liable to the bank; but in truth by indorsing the bill to the bank, I become only a collateral and conditional debtor. The acceptor is the principal debtor to the bank, and to him must they first apply for payment; if not paid, they must protest, and give notice to me of the non-payment as soon as possible under all the circumstances, and if they neglect to demand payment from the acceptor, or to give me due notice of his non-payment, they have no claim upon me. Can this then be a loan of money from the bank to me? Nothing can be more different. I am only liable as the indorser of a bill. If it were to be considered a loan at all, it should rather be a loan to the acceptor, the principal debtor in the transaction. But it is not a loan to any person; it is a mere accommodation in shortening the time of payment. It was said, in argument, that the transaction must be either a loan of money or a purchase of the note, and that it could not be a purchase, if the vendor guarantied the bill by indorsement, and that the bank was not authorized to trade in the purchase of bills, consequently it must be considered as a loan. This is clearly a petitio principii. It assumes the principle in dispute. There is a transaction which is neither a loan, nor a purchase of the note, and that transaction is discount. If it be not a loan, it cannot be the forbearance of a sum of money lent. If it be neither a loan nor the forbearance of a sum of money lent, it is not a transaction prohibited by the statute of usury.

A clear case, then, of mercantile discount, being the anticipation of funds, and not a loan of money, is not within that statute. Thus stands the case upon general principles of law and reason. Let us see how it stands upon authority. But here let me repel a suggestion that this court can set up the custom and usage of any trade or profession in England, or even in this country, in direct opposition to the express statutes of the land. We disclaim any such power, and we disclaim all discretion in deciding a point of mere law. It has been said that in considering this question, we ought not to regard English authorities—that we are competent to make and expound our own laws. It is true that English authorities, as such, are not binding on the courts in this country. But no prudent man, who is to decide a question, will shut his ears to reason or argument, from whatever part of the world it may come. Upon the present question, I hold it to be not only our right, but our duty, to look into the decisions which have taken place upon questions of usury in England, especially decisions made prior to the date of the statute of usury in Virginia; because that statute is copied almost, if not exactly, verbatim from the English statute; and it is fair to conclude that the Virginia legislature, when they adopted the words of the English statute, meant to use them in the sense in which they were used in England; and as they had been explained and settled by judicial decision in that country, I hold it also fair to conclude that when the legislature of Virginia were passing a law upon the subject of a banking institution, and used technical terms appropriate to the business of banking, they used them in the sense in which those terms were generally used among bankers, not only in this country, but in other parts of the world where that business is carried on. In order to ascertain in what sense such terms have been used, I deem it competent for the court to get information from the general history of a country, and especially from its judicial decisions. In this point of view then, the court feels itself bound to look into the English decisions, to see in what sense certain technical terms have been used in that country—and to see what cases have been considered as out of their statute of usury, from which ours is copied.

Let us then inquire whether a clear mercantile discount, being an anticipation of funds, and not a loan of money, is or is not usury under the English statute.

The first case which I find is that of Barnes v. Worledge, Noy, 41. This case was under the statute of Elizabeth, allowing ten per cent. The agreement was to pay five pounds for the first six months, and five pounds for the second six months, and it was adjudged no usury. "But by Popham, if the party had retained five pounds of one hundred pounds at the time of the leave, or that that five pounds was to have been paid before the six months, that clearly had been usury."

Worley's Case, Moore, 644. Popham, Gawdy, and Yelverton held, that although the loan was for a year, yet it was no usury to take half the interest at the end of half a year. "But it is otherwise if one deducts the interest out of the principal at first."

Barnes v. Worlich, Cro. Jac. 26. Popham, Gawdy, and Williams, held the principal case no usury: But said "if he had agreed to take his money for the forbearance instantly when he lent it, that had made the assurance void; for then he had not lent the entire sum for one year, and the other had not had the use of his money according to the intention of the law. And Williams said he knew upon this difference it hath been so resolved of late time."

Yel. 30. In Yel. 30, it is said that the court was divided as to the principal case, two of the judges being of opinion that upon a loan for a year one half of the interest could not be received at the end of half a year—but he says, "if one hundred pounds be lent for a year, and the lender within two days following takes back ten pounds, this is usury."

So in Dalton's Case, Noy, 171, it was said by Popham, "If a man lend £100 for a year and to have ten pounds for the use of it; if the obligor pays the ten pounds, twenty days before it is due, that does not make the obligation void, because it was not corrupt. But if upon making the obligation, it had been agreed that the ten pounds should have been paid within the time, that should have been usury; because he had not the one hundred pounds for the whole year, when the ten pounds was to be paid within the year; and verdict was given accordingly."

In Massa v. Dauling, 2 Strange, 1243, a note for two hundred pounds having three months to run was taken upon advancing one hundred and ninety-seven pounds, five per cent. per annum, being the legal interest; and at the end of the third month another note was taken for three months more upon the advance of three pounds for the other three months. Lee, C. J., held it to be usury.

In Fisher v. Beasley, 1 Doug. 235, Grindall borrowed of Beasley £100, and gave bond payable in six months with lawful interest; but he paid down two guineas as premium. There was no doubt that this was usury, but the question was at what time the usury was complete, whether at the payment of the two guineas, or at the expiration of the six months. It was decided that the penalty was not incurred till the end of the six months when the interest was paid.

In the case of Lloyd v. Williams, 2 W. Bl. 792, DeGrey and Blackstone inclined to think, that if a man borrows £100 for three months, and immediately returns to the lender £6 5s. 0d. by way of interest by advance, the offence of taking more than legal interest is complete, and it is not to be considered as a loan of £93 15s. only. This opinion of DeGrey and Blackstone, was against that of Gould. Nares gave no opinion. There is in that case, a dictum of Judge Blackstone, "That interest may as lawfully be received beforehand for forbearing, as after the term is expired, for having forborne. And it shall not be reckoned, as merely a loan of the balance. Else, every banker in London who takes five per cent. for discounting bills, would be guilty of usury. For if upon discounting a £100 note at five per cent. he should be construed to lend only £95, then at the end of the time, he would receive five pounds interest for the loan of £95 principal; which is above the legal rate."

In Gibson v. Fristoe, 1 Call, 73, the court of appeals of Virginia, say, that if it be apparent to the court that the matter is usury, the jury need not find the agreement to be corruptly made; and that an agreement by which a man secures to himself directly or indirectly a higher premium than legal interest for the loan of money, is usury.

In Floyer v. Edwards, Cowp. 112, Lord Mansfield says, "It depends principally upon the contract being a loan, and the statute uses the words 'directly or indirectly'; therefore in all questions in whatever respect, repugnant to the statute, we must get at the nature and substance of the transaction; the view of the parties must be ascertained, to satisfy the court that there is a loan and borrowing; and that the substance was to borrow on the one part and to lend on the other; and where the real truth is a loan of money, the wit of man cannot find a shift to take it out of the statute. If the substance is a loan of money nothing will protect the taking more than five per cent.; and though the statute mentions only 'for loan of moneys, wares, merchandises, or other commodities,' yet any other contrivance, if the substance of it be a loan, will come under the word 'indirectly.'" Speaking of the practice of the particular trade, to take a half penny an ounce on certain goods if not paid for in a certain time, he says, "It is true the use of this practice will avail nothing, if meant as an evasion of the statute; for usage certainly will not protect usury; but it goes a great way to explain a transaction; and in this case is strong evidence to show that there was no intention to cover a loan of money. Upon a nice calculation it will be found that the practice of the bank in discounting bills exceeds the rate of five per cent., for they take interest upon the whole sum for the whole time the bills run, but pay only part of the money, namely, by deducting the interest first; yet this is not usury."

These were all cases of loan, and not of mercantile discount. I can find no case in which it was ever made a question whether, in a clear mercantile discount, the taking in advance by way of discount the whole interest, upon the whole sum, for the whole time the bill has to run, was within the statute of usury. The cases which come nearest to that question, are those where the discount had been made in that manner, but the sum advanced was not all paid in cash, but partly in other bills having time to run, or in goods at a high price. The circumstance that although usury was pleaded in those cases, it was not attempted to support it upon the ground that the interest was calculated upon the face of the bill, and not on the sum actually advanced, is good ground to infer that the whole court and bar considered such a transaction alone, not to be usury. This inference is irresistible, when we reflect that as early as the year 1771, Judge Blackstone, uncontradicted by his brethren on the bench, in the case of Lloyd v. Williams, 2 W. Bl. 792, declared his opinion to be that bankers in discounting bills may lawfully receive the interest beforehand upon the whole amount of the bill; and when we find Lord Mansfield in the year 1774, in the case of Floyer v. Edwards, Cowp. 114, declaring from the bench, with the concurrence of the three other judges, that "the practice of the bank in discounting bills exceeds the rate of five per cent. for they take interest upon the whole sum for the whole time the bills run, but pay only part of the money, namely, by deducting the interest first; yet this is not usury."

The cases to which I alluded, as those in which the present ground for the allegation of usury existed, but was not relied upon, are, 1. Benson v. Parry, cited by Judge Buller in Auriol v. Thomas, 2 Term R. 52. The question there was whether country bankers could take more than five per cent. on inland bills payable at another place; and it was decided by the court of king's bench unanimously that they might. No question was made whether it was usury for them to take five per cent.

2. The case of Winch v. Fenn, cited by Buller in the same case; where the same question was decided; and no question made as to the five per cent. deducted.

3. The case of Auriol v. Thomas, 2 Term R. 52, in which the court says, "it is now clearly settled that the party is entitled to take not only £5 per cent. for legal interest, but also a reasonable sum for remitting and other incidental expenses." And Grose, J., says, "The line which has been taken is, that if the sum charged be not a color or a screen for usury, but is only fair and reasonable, it ought to be allowed."

4. The case of Hammett v. Yea, in the court of common pleas, 1 Bos. & P. 144, which was this: Haviland made his promissory note payable to Yea, the defendant, at four months after date, for £3,000, which Yea indorsed and returned to Haviland, who took it to the plaintiffs, who were bankers, to be discounted for the accommodation of Haviland, the maker of the note. The plaintiffs discounted it by deducting £50, being four months' interest on £3,000, and paying £2,950, the balance to Haviland, partly in a draft having thirty days to run, partly by crediting Haviland in account, and the residue in cash; and this mode of payment was directed by Haviland or his agent.

These facts were relied on in the plea of usury. But the judge (Eyre, C. J.,) at the trial, directed the jury that the charge of usury rested wholly on the plaintiffs having made no rebate of interest on the bill at thirty days which was paid to Haviland as cash, at the time of discounting the £3,000 note; and left it to the jury to say whether it was a pretence to evade the statute. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff; and on motion for a new trial, Eyre, C. J., says, "whether more than five per cent. be intentionally taken upon any contract for forbearance is a question of fact for the consideration of the jury, and must always be collected from the whole of the transaction." Again he says, "what is this case in matter of fact? Haviland applies to have his bills discounted to which the banker agrees, and calculates the interest upon the time the bills have to run, as is usual." "Had the banker told down the money, or tendered banknotes, and had Haviland put them into his pocket, or swept them into his hat, and then said, but I want to send money to London, will you take part of my money back and give me bills? and the banker had accordingly done so and given these bills, I cannot see that there would have been any color for calling it an usurious transaction." He here admits that the mode of calculating the discount and deducting it from the principal, upon discounting a bill or note, is the usual practice, and there is no color of usury in it. Again he says, "If all consideration of a loan were out of the case, a banker may lawfully take as much money as he can get for his bills without the least regard to the time they have to run." And again, "whether more than five per cent. be intentionally taken for the loan and forbearance of money is a question of fact to be decided by the jury." "It is for them to say whether it is a device or a fair agreement on good consideration." Heath, J., was of the same opinion. He says, "This was a transaction which commenced in discount and loan, and terminated in remittance. The subsequent transaction of remittance was no part of the antecedent contract; the bargain for the discount was complete." He considers the discount and loan clearly as a lawful transaction. Rooke, J., concurred. We find the whole court unanimous, not only that the original discount was lawful, but the subsequent payment in bills instead of cash.

5. The case of Maddock v. Hammett, 7 Term R. 184, which was decided in the king's bench about six months before the case of Hammett v. Yea. The facts relied upon to support the usury, were that Haviland made his note to Yea, for £1,000, at four months, who indorsed it. Haviland, the maker, took it to the defendants, Hammett and others, the bankers, to be discounted, who discounted it by paying

In cash	£183	6	8
Draft on London, at 7 days sight	500	0	0
	£983	6	8
Retained for discount	16	13	4
	£1,000	00	0

The only usury relied on "was stated to consist in calculating the draft of £500 as cash, when it had seven days to run, instead of deducting so much from the discount, as the draft had to run before it became payable." There the original discount of £16. 13s. 4d. was not contended to be usurious, although it was the interest of the whole £1,000 for the whole time the note had to run.

6. The case of Marsh v. Martindale, 3 Bos. & P. 154. The facts of this case upon the plea of usury, were these,—Wood, in consideration of £3,500 paid by Marsh, had granted him an annuity of £500 per annum, redeemable upon certain terms. Wood applied to Marsh to redeem. And it was agreed that Wood should draw a bill of exchange for £5,000 at three years, which Marsh should discount. The £5,000 bill was accordingly drawn and discounted by Marsh as follows:

Original purchase of annuity	£3,500	0	0
Arrears of annuity due	333	6	8
For redeeming without notice, according to original agreement	250	0	0
Cash paid to Wood	116	13	4
	£4,250	00	0
3 years' discount on £5,000, at 5 per cent	750	00	0
	£5,000	00	0

In this case it was contended and decided that the discount of a bill for three years was not a transaction in the usual course of business, and afforded a strong ground, in connection with the circumstance of the annuity and a bond given immediately after the discount of the bill, to presume that the whole transaction was a color for a loan and a cover for usury. And upon that ground the court set aside the verdict for the plaintiff, and ordered a nonsuit to be entered. The principle decided by this case, was not, that in ordinary cases of discount the banker has not the right to deduct interest upon the whole amount of the bill for the time it has to run, but that in extraordinary cases, where the time the bill has to run is unusually long, that circumstance with others may be evidence of a mere contract for a loan, and an evasion of the statute. The general principle is admitted by the counsel on both sides and by the court, that "it is lawful upon the discount of a bill of exchange to take interest upon the whole amount of the bill at the time when the money is advanced," but it was contended that this principle "must be confined to transactions upon bills in the ordinary course of trade." It was said that it "was too much to infer that because bills in the ordinary course of trade may lawfully be discounted in the manner above stated, a bill for any period of time may be discounted in the same manner." Lord Alvanley, C. J., in delivering the opinion of the court, says, "it certainly has been decided that such a transaction on a bill of exchange in the way of trade, for the accommodation of the party desirous of raising money, is not usurious, though more than five per cent. be taken." "If therefore nothing more has been done in this case than has always been done by way of accommodation among merchants, the transaction was not usurious." But he thinks that the discount of such a bill, (for three years) even not coupled with the transaction respecting the annuity, would have been almost sufficient to have afforded a presumption of usury; but coupled with the affair of the annuity and the bond, he thinks it appears to be a mere cloak for an usurious loan. He admits it to be completely established that, on the discount of bills, a banker may deduct more than the legal interest upon the whole sum for the whole time if the excess be only a reasonable compensation for the expenses and trouble of remittance. He concludes by saying that the only question in such cases is, "whether it be a real discount in the way of trade, or a mere loan of money." In the case then before him he is clear that "it was not a discount in the way of trade, but was merely employed as the means of obtaining more than legal interest."

7. In the case of Parr v. Eliason, 1 East, 92, a bill which had thirteen months to run was discounted. The bankers took the full discount, but gave their own acceptance at three months for part, without deducting from the discount the interest for three months upon their own acceptance. This was holden to be usurious, because they did not pay the amount in cash, but gave their own acceptance at a distant day for part; it was not contended to be usurious, because the bankers deducted the interest upon the whole sum in the bill for the whole time it had to run, and no question of usury would have arisen if the amount had been paid wholly in cash.

8. The case of Barclay v. Walmsley, 4 East, 55, where the acceptor of a bill discounted his own acceptance at eighteen days, deducting at about the rate of sixty per cent. per annum. This was not usury.

These cases satisfy my mind that in England a case of mercantile discount, by way of anticipation of funds, is not a case of loan within their statute; and they are a strong confirmation of the general principles of law and reason which I have before mentioned. Principles in themselves so strong, and so universally adopted as not to have been once questioned in a nation so commercial as that of England, are not to be easily shaken. In a country adopting the same law of usury, and the same principles of commercial law, the same principles of law and reason must equally apply. If then in this country as well as in England, a case of mercantile discount, by way of anticipation of funds, be not within the statute of usury, the question arises, is the case at bar a case of mercantile discount by way of anticipation of funds within the meaning of the charter of the bank? It would be difficult in practice for a bank to know whether a note or a bill offered for discount be a note or bill grounded upon a bona fide mercantile negotiation of sale or contract. If the right of the bank to recover upon a bill or note discounted were to depend upon their being able to prove at the trial that the bill or note was given for a real debt, they would have a very hopeless business. They would be liable to continual impositions, and even although the paper might have been founded upon a real transaction, the parties might so conceal or remove the evidence as to render it impossible for the bank to succeed. Again, if the bank was obliged to investigate nicely every transaction before they could safely discount a note or bill, it would be almost impossible for them to transact any business at all. The burden of proof must in reason rest upon the other party. It is sufficient for the bank that the paper offered bears the form and appearance of a mere mercantile negotiation. Nor do I deem it necessary within the spirit of the charter of the bank that a note to be lawfully discounted by the bank should be a note given in consequence of an actual sale of property. If one merchant chooses to give a credit to another, (whether gratuitously, or in consideration of a commission or other compensation,) by accepting bills, or drawing or indorsing notes payable at a distant day; such credit may strictly, in mercantile language, be called funds; and the discount of such acceptances, or such notes, is as much the anticipation of funds, as if the acceptances or notes were founded upon an actual sale of property. Again, if I have sold property, either verbally or by covenant under seal, the contract is not in such a form as to be the subject of discount. I get a friend who has confidence in that fund to accept my bills, or to indorse my notes, so as to enable me to anticipate that fund. Such acceptances and such notes would be clearly within the spirit of the charter of the bank, and would be fairly within the meaning of a mercantile discount by way of anticipation of funds, and the discount of such acceptances, or notes, could not be considered as a loan from the bank to me. If it can in any way be considered as a loan, it must be a loan from my friend who enables me to get the money on his acceptances.

What then is the case presented to us by the replication? Does it bear the form and appearance of a mercantile negotiation, by way of anticipation of funds? It is simply a note for eight hundred dollars by R. B. J., and indorsed by W. Herbert, payable at sixty days after date. The note in every respect has the usual appearances of a fair transaction, and there is no fact stated to show that it was not. The bank then had a right to presume it was so, and the court must so consider it until the contrary appears. Considering it then as a case of mercantile discount by way of anticipation of funds, I deem it a case clear of the statute of usury, and within the charter of the bank.

But an objection is made and strenuously insisted upon by the counsel of the defendant, that even if the bank has a right to deduct a discount at the rate of six per cent. per annum, upon the face of the note for the whole time it has to run, yet they have agreed by this note to take more than at that rate.

It is said that $8.40 upon $800 is at the rate of six per cent. per annum for sixty-three days and six tenths of a day, and they make it out by saying that sixty-three days is not two months and one tenth of a month, but is sixty-three three hundred and sixty-fifths of a year, that is, they do not allow that a month is to be considered as the twelfth part of a year, nor a day the thirtieth part of a month. The replication avers that $8.40 for the discount of a note of 800 dollars is at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, and whether it be or not I take to be a matter of fact for the jury, and not for the court. It is for the jury to say what is the usual mode of calculation in such cases, and to calculate accordingly. If, however, it were a matter of law, and not a matter of fact, I should most certainly calculate it according to the mode in which the clerks in the bank calculated it, because I know that to be the general, I may almost say the universal, mode of calculation, not only among bankers and merchants, but in our courts of justice. But if it were an error, I should leave it to the jury to say whether it were not a mistake; and not done with an intent to make more than the lawful discount.

Upon these grounds, I am satisfied that the transaction in the replication is not usurious, nor the note void. Judgment upon the demurrer for the plaintiff.

Case No. 851.

BANK OF ALEXANDRIA v. MANDEVILLE.

[1 Cranch, C. C. 575.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov. Term, 1809.

PARTNERSHIP—SECRET PARTNER—LIABILITY—EVIDENCE—COMPETENCY OF WITNESSES.

1. An action of debt, under the Virginia law, may be maintained upon a promissory note, against a secret partner who has not signed it.

2. A creditor of the firm is a competent witness to prove its existence.

3. The wife of one of the defendants is not a competent witness for the plaintiffs, although her husband has been discharged under the insolvent act.

4. A stockholder in a company who own stock in the plaintiffs' bank is a competent witness for the plaintiffs. [Alexandria v. Brockett, Case No. 181, followed.]

5. The record of other suits between the defendant and other plaintiffs cannot be read in evidence by the plaintiffs to show fraud in the dissolution of the partnership.

6. The secret partner is not liable unless the money obtained by the discount of the note came to the use of the secret partnership.

[Cited in Re Munn, Case No. 9,925.]

At law. Debt on a note signed by R. B. Jamesson, charging Mandeville as a secret partner. [See Bank of Alexandria v. Mandeville, Case No. 850.]

1st plea, nil debet. 2d plea, usury, upon which there was a demurrer and judgment at the last term. 3d plea, usury. Replication, it was discounted by the bank according to their usage; general rejoinder and issue. 4th plea, usury; same replication as to 3d plea; rejoinder, did not offer the note for discount according to the usage of the Bank of Alexandria and all other banks in the United States; upon which issue was joined.

Mr. C. Lee, for the defendant, objected to the note going in evidence. The action is debt on the promissory note. Debt does not lie on a promissory note at common law. This action is supposed to be founded on the Virginia statute of December 4, 1786, p. 36, § 3. The declaration upon a note given for account of Jamesson & Mandeville. This note does not state it to be on account of J. & M., and parol evidence cannot be given to prove that fact. The statute of Virginia gives an action of debt only against the person who signed the note. The action ought to have been assumpsit. The first count of the declaration states that R. B. Jamesson for and on account of Jamesson & Mandeville, by their note promised to pay, &c. The second count, that Jamesson & Mandeville, by their note promised to pay.

C. Simms and E. J. Lee, for plaintiffs.

The note is precisely such an one as is declared upon. If it will not support an action against Mandeville, it is a good cause for demurrer—and that is the course they ought to have taken. It is now too late. One partner may bind his copartner by a note. So the acceptance of one partner binds all, if on partnership account. If the note had been signed by one partner only for himself and partners, an action of debt under the statute might have been maintained upon it against all the partners. The statute means that an action of debt may be brought against any person bound by the note. The question is, who signed the note; we say that Mandeville & Jamesson signed it by R. B. Jamesson. The question then arises whether Mandeville & Jamesson traded under the firm of R. B. Jamesson. If you take the statute literally, only one of a mercantile firm (he who signed) is liable to an action of debt. Suppose it had been R. B. Jamesson and Co., we might show who the company was.

Mr. Swann, in reply. We cannot deny the consideration in an action of debt, on the statute. Here is no ambiguity either latent or patent. If the term company had been added, there would have been ambiguity which might have been explained. In assumpsit we can go into the consideration.

THE COURT was of opinion that there was no variance between the note declared upon and that offered in evidence; and that parol evidence was competent to prove the averment of partnership and the averment that the note was given by R. B. Jamesson, for and on account of the copartnership. If an action could not be maintained against Mandeville under the statute, because he had not signed the note, it was a defect apparent on the face of the declaration, and the remedy was by demurrer, or arrest of judgment.

The deposition of one Grogan was offered in evidence by the plaintiffs.

Mr. Youngs, Mr. C. Lee, and Mr. Swann, for the defendant, objected, that Grogan states himself to be a creditor of R. B. Jamesson, and is interested in fixing the partnership upon Mandeville.

THE COURT, without argument, said that it was an objection to the credibility, but not to the competency of the witness; although Jamesson is insolvent, and has been discharged under the insolvent act.

The plaintiffs offered the wife of R. B. Jamesson, one of the defendants, to charge the other defendant as a secret partner of her husband.

Mr. E. J. Lee. R. B. Jamesson himself would be a good witness, having been discharged under the insolvent law. In the case of Mayor, etc., v. Moore. [Case No. 9,359.] Moore was admitted as a witness. In the case of Governor of Virginia v. Evans, [Id.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

16,969,] Evans was admitted a witness; and in the case of Riddle v. Welch, [Id. 11,809,] Welch was admitted as a witness. The interest must be direct in the event of the suit in trial. 3 Williams, Cases, 398; Bent v. Baker, 3 Term R. 27. If the verdict or judgment cannot be used in his favor, he is a competent witness. So the wife is a good witness against the husband. Williams v. Johnson, 1 Strange, 504; Anon., Id. 527; Rex v. Azire, Id. 633; Baring v. Reeder, 1 Hen. & M. 154.

THE COURT refused to suffer Mrs. Jamesson to testify; her husband could not be a witness directly to fix a liability upon Mandeville; and she has all his disabilities. In the case of Mayor, etc., v. Moore, [supra,] Moore had been discharged under the bankrupt law, and was not liable. In the case of Governor of Virginia v. Evans, [supra,] Evans was permitted to prove a collateral matter in the issues joined on the pleas of the other defendants. So in Riddle v. Welch, [supra.] Here the evidence is to create the liability itself directly.

Thomas Vowell, Jr., was offered as a witness for the plaintiffs. The defendant objected that he was interested, being a stockholder in the Marine Insurance Company, which company is a stockholder in the Bank of Alexandria.

THE COURT, without argument, overruled the objection, on the authority of Common Council [Alexandria] v. Brockett in this court at November term, 1807, [Case No. 181,] considering it as a doubtful point. The plaintiffs offered to read the records in sundry suits in which Mandeville was a party about the time of the supposed dissolution of the firm of Mandeville & Jamesson, in which Mandeville's discharge under the English bankrupt law was questioned, to show a motive for an ostensible dissolution.

But THE COURT (CRANCH, Chief Judge, doubting) refused.

Mr. C. Lee then moved the court to instruct the jury that the defendant is not liable unless the money obtained by the discount of this note came to the use of the secret partnership,—

Which instruction the court gave.

Mr. R. J. Taylor, for the plaintiffs, prayed the court to instruct the jury that if the note was discounted for the use of the partnership, and received by R. B. Jamesson, one of the partners, the plaintiffs are entitled to recover, although the plaintiffs were at the time ignorant of the existence of the partnership, and discounted it on the credit of R. B. Jamesson and W. Herbert, the indorser, and although the money was applied by R. B. Jamesson to his own individual use, and not to the use of the partnership,—

Which instruction the court refused to give.

Mr. Swann, for the defendant, prayed, and the court instructed the jury that if the partnership was actually dissolved between Mandeville & Jamesson on the 10th of June, 1806, and did not exist on the 21st of July, 1806, (the date of the note) and the dissolution was known to the bank before that day, the defendant is not bound to pay it, although it was given to take up a partnership note.

Case No. 852.

BANK OF ALEXANDRIA v. SAUNDERS.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 183.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov. Term, 1819.

NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS—PAYMENT—APPLICATION BY CREDITOR TO SEVERAL NOTES.

If a bank discount a note, knowing that it was the intention of the party offering it, that the proceeds should be applied to discharge a particular note held by the bank, those proceeds cannot be applied by the bank to the discharge of any other note.

At law. Assumpsit [by the Bank of Alexandria] against [Peter Saunders] the indorser of a note made by John McPherson & Son for $3,000, upon which the bank had discounted $2,500 for the accommodation of John McPherson & Son, on the 18th of March, 1817, and which fell due on 20th of May, 1817; on which day the bank discounted a new note of John McPherson & Son, indorsed by the defendant for $2,500, and protested the note for $3,000, and applied the new discount to other claims against John McPherson & Son upon their notes indorsed by the defendant.

THE COURT, (MORSELL, Circuit Judge, contra,) at the prayer of the defendant's counsel, instructed the jury, that if they should be satisfied by the evidence that the note for $2,500, dated on the 20th of May, 1817, was drawn, indorsed, and offered to the bank for discount, with the intent to renew or pay the note for $3,000 falling due on that day, and that the bank discounted it, knowing that it was so offered with that intent, the bank was bound so to apply the proceeds of the new discount, and could not now recover upon the note for $3,000.

Verdict for the defendant.

Case No. 853.

BANK OF ALEXANDRIA v. SWANN.

[4 Cranch, C. C. 136.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. April Term, 1831.[2]

NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS—NON-PAYMENT—NOTICE TO INDORSER—SPECIAL VERDICT.

1. Upon a special verdict, the court cannot, from the facts found, infer other facts which the jury might have inferred, but have not found.

[See Barnes v. Williams, 11 Wheat. (24 U. S.) 415.]

[2] [Reversed in 9 Pet. (34 U. S.) 33.]

2. Notice of the non-payment of a note for $1,457, is not notice of the non-payment of a note for $1,400.

[See note at end of case.]

3. Notice of the nonpayment of a note, payable in the Bank of Alexandria, D. C., put into the post-office at Alexandria on the day after the last day of grace, addressed to the indorser in Washington, D. C., was too late, as the bank closed at 3 o'clock, P. M., and the mail for Washington did not close in Alexandria until 9 o'clock, P. M.

[See note at end of case.]

At law. Assumpsit, by [the Bank of Alexandria] the indorsee against [Thomas Swann] the indorser of the note of H. Peake, for $1,400, payable and negotiable in the Bank of Alexandria, dated 23d June, 1829, at sixty days after date.

Special verdict.

The jury find the note for $1,400 in the declaration mentioned, and that the defendant indorsed it for the purpose of having it discounted in the plaintiff's bank, to take up a note for $1,457, indorsed by the defendant, and due on the day of the date of the note in question. They also find that there was no other note drawn by H. Peake and indorsed by the defendant, discounted at the said bank, or in that bank for collection or otherwise. That the plaintiffs transacted their banking business in Alexandria, D. C., and the defendant resided in Washington, D. C., seven miles distant. That the mail for Washington closed in Alexandria at 9 o'clock, P. M., and arrived at Washington on the next day. That the banking hours were from 9 o'clock, A. M., to 3 o'clock, P. M. That notes not paid before 3 o'clock of the day on which they are payable are usually delivered out to the notary at 3 o'clock, and returned with the protest to the bank on the next morning. That on the 25th of August, 1829, being the third day of grace on the note, it was by the teller of the bank presented, at the bank, to the cashier for payment, who examined the books of the bank, and found that the maker had no funds there, and stated that fact to the teller, and that no other person appeared for him, at the bank, to pay the note. That on the closing of the bank on that day, it was taken out by a notary-public for protest, and was, on the morning of the 26th of August, 1829, (being the next day,) returned to the bank with the protest, which was drawn up on the said 26th of August. That on the same 26th of August, the notary, on behalf of the bank, put into the post-office at Alexandria, long before the closing of the mail of that day, a letter written by him, addressed to the defendant at Washington, intending by the said letter, to give him notice of the non-payment of the said note; which letter was post-marked at the post-office in Alexandria, "Alex'a. Ca. Aug. 26," and is in the words and figures following: "Alexandria, August 26, 1829. Sir,—A note drawn by Humphrey Peake, for fourteen hundred and fifty-seven dollars, dated Alexandria, 23d June, 1829, payable to you or your order, at the Bank of Alexandria, sixty days after its date, by you indorsed, and for the payment of which you are held liable, is protested for non-payment, at the request of the president, directors, and company of the said bank. Respectfully, your obedient servant, B. C. Ashton, Notary-Public. Thomas Swann, Esq., Washington City;" which letter was received by the defendant in due course of mail, on the 27th of August, 1829. The jury also find the protest in haec verba; which recites truly the note in the declaration mentioned, which was for $1,400, and not for 1,457 dollars, as stated in the notice, although the figures 1,457 are written on the margin. They also find that no part of the note has been paid.

The cause was argued for the plaintiffs, by Mr. Taylor, who cited Lenox v. Roberts, 2 Wheat. [15 U. S.] 377; Bussard v. Levering, 6 Wheat. [19 U. S.] 102; Lindenberger v. Beall, 6 Wheat. [19 U. S.] 104; Chitty, (Ed. 1822,) p. 402; Langdale v. Trimmer, 15 East, 291; Scott v. Lifford, 9 East, 347; Robson v. Bennett, 2 Taunt. 388; Bank of U. S. v. Carneal, 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 543.

And by Mr. Swann, pro seipso.

CRANCH, Chief Judge, after stating the substance of the special verdict, delivered the opinion of the court, (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent.) These seem to be all the material facts found by the jury; upon which two questions are made: 1. Had the defendant any notice of the non-payment of the note upon which the suit is brought? 2. If he had, was it due notice?

1. If the same variance had existed in the declaration, it would have been fatal to the plaintiffs' cause; the note could not have been given in evidence. The variance is substantial; a note for $1,400 is not a note for $1,457. The verdict states circumstances from which a jury might infer that the defendant understood it to be the note for $1,400 which he had indorsed, but they do not draw the inference; and the court is not permitted to draw any inference of fact from the facts found by the jury. The court cannot say, therefore, that the defendant had any notice of the non-payment of the note mentioned in the declaration.

2. But if he had any notice, we think it was too late. In Lenox v. Roberts, 2 Wheat. [15 U. S.] 373, it was decided, "that a demand of payment should be made upon the last day of grace, and notice of the default of the maker be put into the post-office early enough to be sent by the mail of the succeeding day. This was not done; and although it is found that it was the usage of the banks in Alexandria "to deliver out to the notary, on each day at 3 o'clock, all bills discounted by or to be paid at such banks, which became due on such day, for demand and protest; and for the notary to return such notes, with the protests for non-payment, to the said bank, on the morning of the succeeding day, soon after the bank opened," yet it is not stated, as part of the usage, that the notary should not give notice to the parties until after the return of the notes to the bank. The notice, in the present case, was given by the notary; and might as well have been given on the 25th as on the 26th. He knew that the note had been dishonored at 3 o'clock on the 25th, and the mail did not close until 9 o'clock in the same evening. According to the decision in Lenox v. Roberts, [supra,] therefore, we think the notice was too late. [Supra.] Upon both grounds, therefore, we are of opinion that the judgment on the special verdict should be for the defendant. Reversed. [Bank of Alexandria v. Swann,] 9 Pet. [34 U. S.] 33.

[NOTE. This decision was reversed in Bank of Alexandria v. Swann, 9 Pet. (34 U. S.) 33, —Mr. Justice Thompson delivering the opinion,—on the ground that notice of dishonor mailed in Alexandria on the day after the note was protested, being the day after the last day of grace, was given in due time. "The law does not require the utmost possible diligence in the holder, in giving notice of the dishonor of the note. All that is required is ordinary, reasonable diligence. and what shall constitute reasonable diligence ought to be regulated with a view to practical convenience and the usual course of business. * * * The law, generally speaking, does not regard the fractions of a day; and, although a demand of payment at a bank was required to be made during banking hours, it would be unreasonable, and against * * * the usage of the bank at that time, to require notice of non-payment to be sent to the indorser on the same day." Further ground of reversal was that a notice of dishonor, which describes a note as for $1,457, the true amount being $1,400, but the figures "1,457" being set down in the margin of the note, is sufficient, when the description is in other respects correct, and the defendant has indorsed no other note by the same maker, nor has any other such note been discounted by the bank. or placed there for collection or otherwise, since there is no room for any mistake by the indorser as to the identity of the note.]

Case No. 854.

BANK OF ALEXANDRIA v. TAYLOR et al.

[5 Cranch, C. C. 314.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May Term, 1837.

JUDICIAL SALE—MOTION TO SET ASIDE—SALE NOT FAIRLY MADE.

The court will set aside a sale made under its decree, if not fairly made.

Upon the return of the report of a sale made under a decree of this court, in this cause.

Mr. Semmes, for the Misses Herbert, heirs at law of the late Thomas Herbert, deceased, moved to set aside the sale of a house and lot at the corner of Cameron and Fairfax streets in Alexandria, on the ground of a misapprehension at the sale by which persons at the sale were induced not to bid for the property; and offered to sustain the motion by parol viva voce evidence.

Mr. Neale, for Mr. Corse, the purchaser, objected; that it was a novel motion in this country; and that according to the English practice, the whole purchase money must be brought in and deposited before the biddings can be opened.

Mr. Semmes, contra, cited Tait v. Lord Northwick, 5 Ves. 655; Anon., Id. 148; Chetham v. Grugeon, Id. 86; Upton v. Lord Ferrers, 4 Ves. 700; Rigby v. McNamara, 6 Ves. 117; West v. Vincent, 12 Ves. 6; Fergus v. Gore, 1 Schoales & L. 350; Wood v. Hudson, 5 Mun. 423; Quarles v. Lacy, 4 Mun. 251.

The evidence was, by consent, given viva voce, and reduced to writing; and showed that the bid of $1,510 made by Mr. John Corse was in his hearing declared to be for the benefit of the Misses Herbert, the heirs at law of the mortgagor, the late Thomas Herbert, deceased; which declaration was not denied by Mr. Corse, whereby the bystanders were induced not to bid against him; and that the property at the time was worth $2,000.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent) upon this evidence refused to confirm the sale, and ordered it to be set aside.

Case No. 855.

BANK OF ALEXANDRIA v. WILSON.

[1 Cranch, C. C. 168.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. June Term, 1804.

NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS—RIGHT OF HOLDER TO SUE INDORSER—CHARTER OF BANK OF ALEXANDRIA.

The Bank of Alexandria, under its first charter, could maintain an action against an indorser of a note made negotiable in that bank, without first bringing suit against the maker.

[See Yeaton v. Bank of Alexandria, 5 Cranch, (9 U. S.) 49.]

At law. [James] Wilson was indorser of the note of Ricketts, Newton & Co. and Alexander Henderson & Co. The note was discounted at the Bank of Alexandria for the benefit of Alexander Henderson & Co.

Messrs. Taylor, C. Lee, and Jones, for the defendant, contended, That the provisions of the charter of the bank respecting summary judgments, applied only to the party who was the real debtor. That in Virginia the maker must be sued, &c., before resort can be had to the indorser. The act of assembly does not alter the general law of Virginia respecting promissory notes. If the charter meant that all the parties should be sued at the same time, it would have had words to that effect. In the act giving an action of debt on bills of exchange, such words have been used. The remedy is against the person indebted—the defaulter. The indorser does not become indebted until the insolvency of the maker is made to appear by suit, &c. The indorsement does not create the debt. In a suit upon the indorsement of a bond, the same remedy is given; bonds and notes are put upon the same footing by the act. The statute only provides a new remedy. It does not prescribe a new mode of creating a debt. The indorsement does not of itself make the indorser the debtor. The persons liable to this remedy must be indebted to the bank on bonds, bills or notes given or indorsed by them, with an express consent in writing that they may be negotiable at the said bank, and must have refused to pay the same when due.

Mr. Simms, for the plaintiff. Every contract is to be carried into effect according to the intention of the parties at the time of contracting. That intention is shown by the general understanding and practice of persons dealing with the Bank of Alexandria, and of other banks. The charter is to be construed according to the intent of the legislature, to be collected from the whole act. The intent was to give a speedy remedy against the indorser as well as against the maker. The words of the charter are, "At the time the same may become due." If the indorser does not pay at that time he is liable to the speedy remedy. The debt arises at the time of indorsement. Kyd, Bills, 113, 114. Bonds would be on the same ground under this act of assembly, if the words "negotiable in the Bank of Alexandria," were inserted in them. The intention of the parties to the note and of the legislature in enacting the law, was that all the parties should be liable to the speedy remedy. The construction of the statute ought to be such as to remove the evil, and advance the remedy. A new remedy was not the only object of the legislature. They have prescribed the mode of creating the debt, by requiring the insertion of the words "negotiable at the Bank of Alexandria."

Mr. Swann, on the same side. It is said the law is unconstitutional; that by the bill of rights no exclusive privileges can be granted except for public services. This argument would go to destroy all the corporations in the state of Virginia, and would apply to all the cases of summary remedy given by statute, as in the case of sheriffs, landlords, judgments on motions, securities, fire insurance company, &c. The bank itself is liable to the same short process. The preamble of the act is a key to its construction. The object is punctuality of payment. The words "indebted by bond, bill, or note given or indorsed," show that a person may become indebted by indorsement. If indebted by indorsement, at what time is that debt to be paid? The law says the action shall lie if the money is not paid at the time the same, that is the bond, bill, or note, shall become due.

Mr. C. Lee, in reply. The summary remedy was not necessary. It is a private institution, trading for its own benefit. The statute only provides a remedy; it does not alter the relative liability of the parties. It does not adopt the statute of Anne. It puts bonds, having the words, "negotiable at the Bank of Alexandria," on the same footing as notes. The case of Lee v. Love, 1 Call, 497, decides, that between private persons those words make no difference. As it respects the bank, it only gives the summary remedy, that is, a speedy trial.

THE COURT was of opinion (nem. con.) that it was not necessary to bring suit against the maker of the note in order to create a right of action against the indorser. KILTY, Chief Judge, said, "As it is in other cases."

CRANCH, Circuit Judge, said his opinion was made up on the ground that no case had yet been decided that an indorsed promissory note, payable to order, was not a negotiable note; or a bill of exchange; and that he was of opinion that, upon such a note, no suit was necessary against the maker, in any case, to support an action against the indorser.

Case No. 856.

BANK OF ALEXANDRIA v. WILSON.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 5.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. July Term, 1810.

NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS — LIABILITY OF INDORSER—PROTEST—TIME OF NOTICE.

1. After an indorser is fixed by proper demand and notice, the neglect of a trustee to sell property conveyed to him as security for the notes, until by depreciation it becomes inadequate security, will not exonerate the indorser.

2. A protest which does not state that the notary-public informed the indorser that payment had been demanded and refused by the maker of the note, is not evidence of sufficient notice to charge the indorser.

3. The day after the expiration of the three days of grace is soon enough to make the demand, and give notice; and it may be made by the notary's clerk who has possession of the note, with the plaintiff's assent.

[See Bank of Metropolis v. Walker, Case No. 903; Brent v. Coyle, Id. 1,837; Hill v. Norvell, Id. 6,497; Lenox v. Wright, Id. 8,249. The usage of the banks in the District of Columbia was changed in 1818 to conform to the general commercial usage. See Cookendorfer v. Preston, 4 How. (45 U. S.) 317; Adams v. Otterback, 15 How. (56 U. S.) 539.]

4. The indorsement of the note is evidence of money had and received by the defendant for the plaintiff's use, although the note was indorsed by the defendant for the accommodation of the maker.

At law. Assumpsit [by Bank of Alexandria] against [W. Wilson] the indorser of A. & W. Ramsay's note.

Mr. E. J. Lee, for the defendant, contended that A. & W. Ramsay, having given a deed of trust to Ludwell Lee, with a power of sale in case of the note laying over for a year, and that the trustee not having sold the property until it depreciated, so as to become inadequate security, the defendant, the indorser, was discharged, although he had regular notice of non-payment.

But THE COURT (FITZHUGH, Circuit Judge, absent) was of opinion that this was no defence.

The plaintiff then offered the protest, which stated that the notary-public had, on the 17th of October, 1805, (the three days grace expired with the 16th,) demanded payment from the maker, who did not pay, and from the indorser, who did not pay; but did not state that he informed the indorser that a demand had been made upon the maker, and payment refused.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent) decided that the protest was not evidence of a sufficient notice. That the day after the expiration of the three days of grace was soon enough to make the demand and give notice. That a demand made by Alexander Moore, (a clerk of Cleon Moore, the notary-public,) he having possession of the note with a blank indorsement, with the assent of the plaintiff, was by a person sufficiently authorized to make the demand and give notice. That the indorsement of the note was evidence of money had and received by the defendant for the plaintiff's use, although the note was indorsed by the defendant for the accommodation of A. & W. Ramsay, who drew the money.

Verdict for the plaintiff.

Bills of exception were taken, but no writ of error prosecuted.

BANK OF ALEXANDRIA v. YOUNG.

SAME v. YEATON.

[1 Cranch, C. C. 458.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov. Term, 1807.[2]

NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS — CONSOLIDATION OF ACTIONS — BANK OF ALEXANDRIA — DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA — VIRGINIA LAWS.

1. The court will not order a number of actions of debt upon several promissory notes due at several times, to be consolidated, although the parties are the same in all, and each note was payable before any one of the suits was brought.

2. In an action by the Bank of Alexandria, upon a note made negotiable in that bank, the court will rule the defendant to trial at the first term, if the writ be served ten days before the return day.

[See note at end of case.]

3. Virginia had a right to legislate over this part of the district, until the 27th of February, 1801.

4. The charter of the Bank of Alexandria is a public act.

[See note at end of case.]

Mr. Youngs, for the defendant, moved the court to consolidate a number of actions of debt upon promissory notes, all the notes being due at the time of issuing the writs. Cecil v. Brigges, 2 Term R. 639. One action of debt, he said, might have included the whole; it is but one debt. The plaintiffs were not obliged to bring debt, they might have brought assumpsit for money had and received, and given the notes in evidence.

Mr. C. Simms, contra. This is a novel motion; there is no precedent for it in this District, or in Virginia. The English practice is founded upon a rule of their courts. Until this court has made a general rule on the subject, they will not depart from the former practice. The case cited was assumpsit; this is debt. That might have been on two items of one account. The declaration must have as many counts as notes. If the plaintiff should fail of supporting one note, he might fail for the whole, for he could not recover part of the debt. It is no oppression. The defendant ought to have paid the notes as they became due. How can they be consolidated? The defendant has given separate bail in each suit. There must be a new declaration which must conform to the writ, but to which writ? The court will not order these writs to be dismissed, and thereby discharge the bail; where successive actions are brought, the

[2] [Affirmed in 5 Cranch, (9 U. S.) 45; and Id. 49.]

English courts will not consolidate them. Tidd, Pr. 556, c. 25. The notes here became due at different times.

THE COURT refused to order these twenty-eight actions to be consolidated, because they were brought under the old practice, and no general rule had been made by the court on that subject. THE COURT said they would take into consideration the propriety of making such a general rule.

This was an action of debt against the maker of a promissory note, with an express consent in writing, that it should be negotiable in the Bank of Alexandria, according to the 20th section of the charter of the 23d of November, 1792, and the capias ad respondendum was served more than ten days before the return day of the writ; in which case, it is provided by that section, that "the court shall cause an issue to be made up in such suit, and a trial shall be peremptorily had at the first court to which such writ shall be returnable, and judgment rendered accordingly."

Mr. Simms, for the plaintiffs, moved for a rule on the defendant to plead on the next day.

Mr. Youngs, for the defendant, objected—1. That the charter of the bank is a private act, and the printed book of the laws is no evidence of it. 2. That the charter of the bank expired on the first of January, 1803, by its own limitation in the act of 23d of November, 1792, unless extended by the act of Virginia of the 21st of January, 1801, which authorized the stockholders of the bank to hold their elections, and remove and conduct their business out of the District of Columbia, within the county of Fairfax, in Virginia, and extended the charter to the 4th of March, 1811. 3. That the power of Virginia to legislate for this part of the District of Columbia, ceased on the first Monday of December, 1800, when, by law, and in fact, the District became the seat of the government of the United States, and consequently the act of Virginia of the 21st of January, 1801, extending the charter, was not a law in force in this part of the District on the 27th of February, 1801, when congress enacted [2 Stat. 103] that the laws of Virginia, as they then existed, should be and continue in force here. 4. That by the rule of this court, the return day of all writs returnable to this court, is the day next after the close of the session.

Mr. Simms, in reply. By the act of Virginia, of 3d of December, 1789, ceding this territory to the United States, it is expressly provided, "that the jurisdiction of the laws of this commonwealth, over the persons and property of individuals residing within the limits of the cession aforesaid, shall not cease or determine until congress, having accepted the said cession, shall by law provide for the government thereof under their jurisdiction, in manner provided by the article of the constitution before recited." And by the act of congress of 6th July, 1790, (1 Stat. 130,) accepting the cession, it is provided, "that the operation of the laws of the state shall not be affected by this acceptance, until the time fixed for the removal of the government thereto, and until congress shall otherwise by law provide." Congress did not provide for the government of the district under their jurisdiction, until the 27th of February, 1801. Virginia, therefore, had a right to legislate for this district until that day, and the act of Virginia, of 21st of January, 1801, was valid and effectual to extend the charter of the bank, until the 4th of March, 1811.

THE COURT refused, upon this motion, to decide the questions as to the existence of the bank, and as to the admission of the statute-book in evidence of the charter, but laid the rule on the defendant to plead by 10 o'clock, A. M., of the next day.

At the expiration of the rule,—Mr. Youngs and Mr. Jones, for the defendant, made the same objections to pleading which Mr. Youngs had made to the laying of the rule to plead; and, after argument by Mr. Simms and Mr. F. L. Lee, for the plaintiffs, and Mr. Youngs, Mr. Jones, and Mr. E. J. Lee, for the defendant,—

THE COURT was of opinion, that the defendant ought to be ruled into a trial at this term. It is not necessary for this court to decide the question, whether the legislature of Virginia could legislate for the District of Columbia, after the first Monday of December, 1800. Because it is the opinion of the court that the act of congress of 27th of February, 1801, (2 Stat. 103,) adopted and thereby re-enacted all the laws of Virginia, then in force in Virginia, so far as they were applicable to the circumstances, and to the inhabitants of this District.

There is nothing in that act which forbids such a construction. The act of 21st of January, 1801, if sufficiently authenticated, must be admitted to have been a law of Virginia, in force on the 27th of February, 1801, and therefore within the letter of the act of congress passed on that day; and inasmuch as it is a law applicable to the circumstances of this District, it is certainly within the spirit of that act. If the act of Virginia, of January 21st, 1801, be one of the laws of Virginia, adopted by the act of congress of 27th of February, 1801, it is the opinion of the court that it needs no other authentication than the other laws of Virginia adopted by the same act of congress, which in effect has re-enacted it as if in totidem verbis; and being thus re-enacted by a public act, it becomes itself a public act.

[NOTE. These cases were brought before the United States supreme court on writs of error. The state of Virginia, in 1792, had passed an act incorporating the Bank of Alexandria; giving it the privilege of summary process for the recovery of debts, and depriving its debtors of the right of appeal. This act was to expire by limitation in 1803, but the cession of Virginia territory including the town of Alexandria as a part of the District of Columbia was accepted by the United States, and the seat of the federal government was removed to the District in December, 1800. In January, 1801, Virginia passed an act continuing the charter until March 4, 1811, and authorizing the bank to transact business in the county of Fairfax. Congress, on February 27, 1801, passed an act that the laws of Virginia, as they then existed, should continue in force in the territory ceded by Virginia for the federal district. On a motion to quash the writ of error, (Mr. Chief Justice Marshall delivering the opinion,) the court held that the charter was a public act, and could be proved as such; that Virginia retained the right to legislate over that part of the District ceded by her until congress exercised its legislative power, and therefore that the Virginia act of January, 1801, continued the corporate existence of the Bank of Alexandria in the District of Columbia, which act, with the other laws of Virginia, was continued in force by congress, (Act Feb. 27, 1801.) But the portion of the act of incorporation taking away from debtors of the bank the right of appeal professed to regulate, and could regulate, only those courts which were established under the authority of Virginia. It could not affect the courts of the United States, or of any other state. Such a peculiar privilege, not necessarily belonging to the bank as a corporation, could not exist in the District, unless specially conferred by congress, so that debtors of the bank had the right of appeal from the decision of the circuit court. The motion to quash the writ of error was therefore overruled. Young v. Bank of Alexandria, 4 Cranch, (8 U. S.) 384. When the cases were heard on the merits, the judgment in Young's Case was affirmed. The opinion of the court, delivered by Mr. Chief Justice Marshall, was as follows: "The writ, being returnable to the court, is returnable the first day of the court. It was known to the legislature of Virginia that the appearance day, for all process, was the day after the term. When, therefore, they directed that a trial should be held at the return term, they must have intended that this case should be an exception to the general rule." Young v. Bank of Alexandria, 5 Cranch, (9 U. S.) 45. Mr. Justice Johnson delivered a separate concurring opinion, (page 54.) In Yeaton's Case, also, the judgment of the circuit court was affirmed. Marshall, C. J., in delivering the opinion of the court, said that by the law of Virginia, prior to the cession of the town of Alexandria to the United States, the indorser of a promissory note was liable only on the implied contract that he would pay the debt if, by due diligence, it could not be obtained from the maker; but if a usage by the bank existed, whereby the indorser was liable absolutely, and such was the understanding under which notes were discounted, the contract of indorsement might make the indorser absolutely liable, though the court did not pass upon this point authoritatively. The court held the indorser absolutely liable under section 20 of the bank charter, and that this applied to an accommodation indorser, for "the consideration moving from the bank to the maker of the note, on the credit of the indorser, charges both the maker and the indorser." Mr. Justice Johnson dissented on the ground that the words in the bank charter relied on by the majority of the court as making the indorser absolutely liable were not enacting words, but words of recital; that the courts of Virginia had decided that the bank could not sue the indorser without proving the maker's insolvency; and that the legislature had not intended to change the common law in this respect. Yeaton v. Bank of Alexandria, 5 Cranch, (9 U. S.) 49.]

Case No. 858.

BANK OF ALEXANDRIA v. YOUNG.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 52.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. July Term, 1812.

NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS—INDORSER'S LIABILITY—NOTICE OF DISHONOR.

1. If the indorser of a note write on the face of it these words, "Credit the drawer," the note and indorsement are not evidence of money had and received by the indorser to the use of the indorsee, who had discounted the note and applied the proceeds to the credit of the maker.

2. The Bank of Alexandria, in 1807, was bound to demand payment of the maker, and give notice to the indorser of the non-payment, before they could maintain an action against him.

[See Magruder v. Union Bank of Georgetown, 3 Pet. (28 U. S.) 87.]

At law. Assumpsit [by Bank of Alexandria] against [Robert Young] the indorser of the note of James and Alexander Smith, dated June 13th, 1807, at fifty-four days, payable on the 6th and 9th of August. Payment was demanded and notice given on the 9th of September. At the bottom of the note was this memorandum, "Credit the drawer."

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent) said that such a note, with such a memorandum on its face, was not evidence of money had and received by the defendant to the use of the plaintiffs, on the count for money had and received.

Mr. C. Simms, for the plaintiffs, contended that it was not necessary, in order to make the indorser liable, that he should have had notice of the non-payment by the makers. By the charter of the bank, (section 20,) the indorser was as much bound to pay the note, at the moment it became payable by the maker, as the maker himself was. The language of Chief Justice Marshall in Yeaton v. Bank of Alexandria, 5 Cranch, [9 U. S.] 49, is very strong to that effect.

Mr. E. J. Lee, contra. The only point decided in that case is, that it is not necessary to sue a solvent maker before suing the indorser. The charter of the Bank of Columbia has the same words as the charter of the Bank of Alexandria, and yet the supreme court, in the case of French v. Bank of Columbia, 4 Cranch, [8 U. S.] 141, have considered it as a case governed by the laws of bills of exchange.

THE COURT (FITZHUGH, Circuit Judge, contra) was of opinion that the bank was bound to demand payment from the maker, and, on his refusal, to give notice thereof to the indorser, before they could maintain an action against him.

NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS — INDORSEMENT — DEFENCES—DISCHARGE—ATTORNEY'S FEE.

1. The possession of a negotiable instrument imports, prima facie, that the holder acquired it bona fide, for value, in the usual course of business, without notice of any fact impugning its validity; and that he is the owner thereof and entitled to recover the contents from all prior parties thereto.

2. Inquiry into a consideration of a negotiable paper can only be made between privies or the immediate parties thereto,—as the maker and payee or an indorser and his indorsee; all other parties are called remote, and as between them a consideration for making and indorsing the same is conclusively presumed; but a want of consideration may be shown by a defendant against a remote party, if the latter took the paper with the knowledge that such want could be shown against a nearer party.

3. A party who makes or indorses a note without consideration, and for the purpose of thereby lending his credit to another, is an accommodation maker or indorser, and cannot show a want of consideration therefor against any one except the accommodated party.

4. A party to negotiable paper, who seeks to make the want of consideration a defense to an action thereon, must not only allege such want of consideration, but also show how and why he is entitled to make such defense, as against the plaintiff, in any aspect of the case made in the complaint.

5. An indorser's contract and liability is separate and distinct from that of the maker's: he agrees that the instrument will be paid by himself, if not by the maker, and as his own debt, and not that of another.

6. In the absence of anything to the contrary, an indorsement is presumed to have been regularly made after the making of the instrument and the indorsement of the same by the payee and before its maturity, and the indorser thereby becomes liable, as such, to any subsequent holder of the paper, whether he then had any interest in the same or not, unless there was an agreement that he should be liable only as guarantor, which was known to the holder at the time of acquiring the paper.

7. When the holder of a negotiable instrument makes an early blank indorsement payable to himself, he does not thereby discharge subsequent indorsers from their liability as such.

8. A stipulation by the maker of a negotiable instrument for the payment to the holder thereof of an attorney's fee in case the same is not paid without action is a valid promise, and passes with the instrument to each and every holder thereof: and each subsequent party to such instrument becomes thereby responsible in like manner for such fee to each and every subsequent holder thereof.

[At law. Action by the Bank of British North America against M. M. Ellis and others on promissory notes. Plaintiff demurs to answer. Demurrer sustained. Defendants subsequently had leave to file an amended answer, to which plaintiff also demurred. Demurrer sustained. 2 Fed. 44.]

Ellis G. Hughes, for plaintiff.

H. Y. Thompson, George H. Durham, and W. M. Gregory, for defendants.

DEADY, District Judge. This action is brought to recover the sum of two thousand and twenty-five dollars, alleged to be due the plaintiff on forty-three promissory notes, with interest, costs of protest, and an attorney's fee.

The complaint alleges that the plaintiff is a corporation organized in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and that the defendants are citizens of Oregon; that all of said notes were made on May 1, 1878, and eight of them are payable on October 1, 1878, and the remaining thirty-five on January 1, 1879; that each of said notes was indorsed by said defendants, and thereafter and prior to their maturity the plaintiff acquired the same in the regular course of business, and is now the owner and holder thereof; and that, "said notes falling due and remaining unpaid," the plaintiff procured the same to be protested.

The answer of the defendants contains sundry denials and three special pleas or defenses.

The first one alleges that the makers of said notes received no consideration for the same, and "these defendants, indorsers of said notes, * * * received no consideration for such indorsement," and that the plaintiff, at the time it acquired said notes, had knowledge of these facts.

The second one alleges that said notes were made in pursuance of an agreement between the makers thereof and the Dayton, Sheridan and Grand Ronde Railway Company, that the latter would construct and put in operation by October 1, 1878, a branch of its railway from a place called Broadmeads to the town of Dallas; and were placed in the hands of the defendants, R. S. Crystal, J. D. Lee, and H. C. Brown, as agents and trustees, to deliver the same to said railway company upon the completion by it of said contract; that afterwards said trustees, with the consent of said makers, delivered said notes to said railway company, upon its promise to perform said contract; but that said company has hitherto wholly failed to perform said contract, and the consideration for said notes has failed; and that the plaintiff had notice of these facts when it acquired said notes.

The third defense alleges that the defendants did not indorse such notes "until long after they were made;" that the same were made payable to the order of said railway company; that said defendants never had "any interest in said notes," or consideration for indorsing the same; and that the plaintiff, at the time of acquiring the notes, had knowledge of these facts.

The plaintiff demurs to each of these defenses because the same does not state facts sufficient to constitute a defense. Each of these defenses must stand or fall by itself, and without any aid from either of the others. Hall v. Austin, [Case No. 5,925;] Bachman v. Everding, [Id. 708.] The first defense merely alleges that the notes were made by the makers and indorsed by the defendants without consideration,—not that the consideration has failed, but that there never was any.

This is not a shadow of a defense to the action. The mere possession of a negotiable note imports, prima facie, that the holder acquired it bona fide, for value, in the usual course of business, without notice of any circumstance impeaching its validity; and that he is the owner thereof, entitled to recover the contents of the same from all prior parties thereto. 1 Daniel, Neg. Inst. § 812; 1 Pars. Notes & B. 184; Collins v. Gilbert, [94 U. S.] 754. Here, the plaintiff not only alleges that it is the owner and holder of these notes, but that it acquired them before maturity, in due course of business.

An allegation, then, that these notes were made or indorsed by the defendants without consideration, is no defense to its claim to recover. Inquiry into the consideration of negotiable paper can only be made between privies, or immediate parties thereto,—as the maker and payee, an indorser and his indorsee. All other parties to negotiable paper are called remote, and, as between them, a consideration for making or indorsing the same is conclusively presumed. But the defendant may make the defense of a want of consideration against a remote party, if he could have done so against a nearer party, and such remote party took the paper with a knowledge that it was open to this defense. 1 Daniel, Neg. Inst. § 174; 1 Pars. Notes & B. 175, 183. And to this qualification of the rule there is an important exception in the case of accommodation paper. A party who makes or indorses a note without consideration, and for the purpose of thereby lending his credit to another, is an accommodation maker or indorser, and cannot make the defense of a want of consideration against any one except the accommodated party. The note is supposed to be taken by third persons upon the credit given to him, and he is expected to pay it. 1 Daniel, Neg. Inst. § 189; 1 Pars. Notes & B. 183. A party to negotiable paper, who seeks to make the want of consideration a defense to an action thereon, must not only allege such want of consideration, but must go further, and show how and why he is entitled to make such defense, as against the plaintiff, in any aspect of the case made in the complaint. In this case it does not appear from the plea that the defendants are entitled to avail themselves, as against this plaintiff, of the want of consideration for either making or indorsing these notes. The makers are not sued, and the question of their liability in this respect is not in the case. An indorser's contract and liability is separate and distinct from that of the maker's. An indorsement is not merely a transfer of the note, but it is also a fresh and substantive contract, by which the indorser agrees, among other things, that the note will be paid at maturity by himself, if not by the maker, and as his own debt, and not that of another. 1 Daniel, Neg. Inst. § 669; 2 Pars. Notes & B. 23.

For aught that appears here, there is no privity between the plaintiff and the defendants, and therefore it is immaterial, in this action, whether the latter received any consideration for their indorsement or not, unless it further appears that the plaintiff gave no consideration for the notes, and that no holder, intermediate between the plaintiff and defendant, did so. Hoffman v. Bank of Milwaukee, 12 Wall. [79 U. S.] 191. Again, it would not be inconsistent with this defense, if the defendants indorsed these notes without consideration for the accommodation of the makers or payee or its indorsee, and therefore they may be liable thereon, notwithstanding such want of consideration. The plea, to be a good defense, must meet this phase of the case by denying directly that the defendants were accommodation indorsers, or by stating facts inconsistent therewith.

The second plea is still less material than the first. It only alleges, in effect, that the consideration for the making of the notes, to wit, the promise of the railway company to construct and operate a branch road to Dallas by October 1, 1878, has failed. This may be so; but, in an action by a holder of these notes against an indorser, such fact alone is wholly immaterial. Notwithstanding this, even the defendants may have indorsed these notes to the plaintiff, and received from it therefor their full value.

The third defense is also bad. The only fact which it contains, in addition to the others, is that the defendants did not indorse these notes "until long after they were made, and never had any interest in them."

In the absence of anything to the contrary, an indorsement upon negotiable paper is presumed to have been made after the making of the same, and before maturity; and, if such indorsement be made by any one other than the original payee, then after his indorsement. And, as between an indorser after maturity, and a subsequent holder of a negotiable note, the former is held liable as upon a note payable on demand, and even as an original promiser. 2 Pars. Notes & B. 9, 13; 1 Daniel, Neg. Inst. § 928; New Orleans Canal & Banking Co. v. Montgomery, [95 U. S.] 18. This allegation as to the time when the indorsement of the defendant was made only amounts to this, that such indorsement was made after the note was, which fact is consistent with the allegation of the complaint, and the defendant's liability to the plaintiff.

But upon this fact, and the allegation that the defendants never had any interest in the notes, it is argued by counsel that they are not in law indorsers, but guarantors, which is a collateral agreement and void unless made upon a distinct consideration.

What is the nature of the liability which a third person incurs who indorses a note before the payee thereof, has been a vexed question in the law, and has been settled differently in different states. In the supreme court of the United States, the rule is established that such person is either an original promissor, a guarantor, or indorser, according to the nature of the transaction and the intent and purpose with which the indorsement is made; which may be shown by parol, upon the theory that such an indorsement is irregular and ambiguous. Rey v. Simpson, 22 How. [63 U. S.] 350; Good v. Martin, [95 U. S.] 94.

But the allegations that the defendants did not indorse these notes until long after they were made, does not even imply that they indorsed them before the payee did,—before they were put in circulation,—but rather the contrary. Nor is it a sufficient allegation that they were indorsed after maturity.

The presumption is that the defendants indorsed the notes regularly,—after the payee,—and, although they then had no interest in them, they are still liable to the plaintiff as indorsers, unless there was an agreement or understanding at the time that they were to be liable only as guarantors, and that this was known to the plaintiff at the time of acquiring the notes. But in favor of the plaintiff the defendants are presumed to have indorsed as payees; and for the purpose of maintaining this action against them, as such, the plaintiff may write over the indorsement of the original payee, "Pay to the order of the defendants," naming them, or any other contract or direction not inconsistent with what it knew to be the purpose of such indorsement. 2 Pars. Notes & B. 2.

Besides, the defendants may have indorsed these notes for the accommodation of the maker, or the original payee, or its indorsee, and in such case the fact that they had no interest in the notes, and received no consideration for their indorsements thereon, is wholly immaterial, and would be just what every one, at all conversant with the subject, would ordinarily infer from the premises.

In the course of the argument for the defendants, it was suggested that, if their defenses must be considered separately, application would be made to amend the answer so as to state the three in one; and counsel for the plaintiff, as a matter of convenience, has considered this as already done. But such an amendment will make no difference in the result. The plaintiff, being presumed to be the bona fide holder of these notes, for value, before maturity, and such assumption not being negatived or contradicted by these pleas, prima facie, it is entitled to recover their contents from any and all of the prior parties thereto; and no plea is or can be a defense to this action unless it states facts sufficient to negative this conclusion, so far as the defendants are concerned, in any and every phase of the case made in the complaint.

Negotiable paper is the life-blood of commerce and business, and its circulation and usefulness would be seriously impaired if every maker or remote indorser thereof could set up a failure to keep the private understandings or agreements between himself and third persons, upon which he claims to have signed or indorsed the same, to avoid the payment thereof, according to his obligation as shown by the instrument, in the hands of a bona fide holder for value. Parties who put their names to or upon negotiable paper upon the faith of other people's expectations and promises must not expect, if they are thereby deceived or disappointed, to throw the loss upon those who in good faith have taken their paper for what they, or those whom they trusted, gave it out to be.

The demurrer is sustained.

Case No. 860.

BANK OF CIRCLEVILLE v. IGLEHART.

[6 McLean, 568.][1]

Circuit Court, N. D. Illinois. July Term, 1855.

BANKS AND BANKING — SUSPENSION OF SPECIE PAYMENTS— LIQUIDATION — ENFORCING DECREE FOR CONTRIBUTION BY STOCKHOLDERS.

1. On the failure of a bank to pay specie, it may be forced into liquidation under the laws of Ohio, and receivers are appointed to collect the debts and pay the liabilities of the bank.

2. If there be a deficiency of assets and the stockholders are required to contribute pro rata, on the amounts of stock they own, and to pay the whole amount, if necessary, on such a decree, an action of debt cannot be sustained. To maintain an action of debt, the sum decreed, must be certain so as to require no further action of the court.

[Cited in Carrol v. Green, 92 U. S. 509.]

3. In such a case, a mandate from the supreme court of Ohio, to the common pleas, requires it to carry out the decree, and to issue an execution, if necessary, for the whole amount of the stock debt against the stockholders respectively. An order for such an execution being made, the execution being issued and no property found, does not change the nature or effect of the original decree.

4. An action being brought on the decree as originally given, is subject to the condition expressed, and the facts must be shown to authorize an execution for the whole amount.

5. The original decree was not joint, but several, that contribution be made pro rata. In such a case, an action may be sustained against one of the stockholders, on the original decree, who is a citizen of Illinois.

6. A suit, in equity may be brought to give effect to a decree, where the conditions of the original decree are not appropriate to the powers of a court of law.

[In equity. Bill by receivers of the Bank of Circleville, Ohio, against Nicholas P. Iglehart, to enforce a decree of an Ohio state court. On demurrer to the bill. Overruled.]

Mr. Hunter, for complainants.

Arnold, Larned & Lay, for defendant.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This is a bill in chancery to enforce a decree entered against the defendant, in the state of Ohio. The defendant, with others, became a large stockholder in the Bank of Circleville, established at Circleville, in the state of Ohio, which bank, being in embarrassed circumstances, was forced into liquidation under the laws of Ohio, and William B. Thrall and two other persons were appointed receivers, to wind up the bank by collecting its debts, &c. Finding that the assets of the bank were wholly insufficient to pay its debts, a bill was filed against its stockholders to compel them to pay the amount, in full, of their subscriptions of stock. The defendant owed on his stock the sum of twenty-nine thousand seven hundred and fifty dollars. Other stockholders owed large sums on their stock, and the cause being certified to the supreme court in which a decree was entered against the stockholders, requiring them to pay to the receivers the full amount of their subscriptions of stock, with interest thereon from the date of the decree, "if in the process of closing up the affairs of said bank, by the receivers, it should be found necessary to require the full payment thereof." But if the whole amount should not be required, then the said defendants should pay to the receivers, such parts of the amounts due from them collectively, as with the other assets of the bank will be sufficient to pay its debts; the stockholders to pay a just proportion according to their respective balances due. But the decree was not to bind the stockholders to pay any demand against the bank which had not been previously presented, or reduced to judgment, or exhibited within one year after 1848. And the bill states that the demands against the bank amount to twenty-five thousand dollars, and may greatly exceed that sum. And the bill alleges that all the stockholders except the defendant, Baker, Crane, and Renich, are insolvent, and that it is necessary that these persons should pay the full amount of their installment, or at least so much thereof as shall be necessary to enable the receivers of the bank to liquidate its liabilities. The bill states the other stockholders are citizens of Ohio. The first receivers having resigned, others were appointed, who are now prosecuting this suit. The defendant is called to answer, as to the extent of the liabilities of the bank, and how much remains unpaid, and whether any assets belong to the bank except as aforesaid; and the complainants pray that an account may be taken of the amount due and owing by the defendant, and that he be required to pay to the receivers of the bank or their successors, the amount found to be due by said defendant, or such part thereof as may be necessary, with the other available assets of the bank, to enable the receivers to pay the liabilities of the bank, including costs and expenses. The defendant demurs to the bill, and for cause of demurrer says, that the complainants have not in their bill stated such a case as entitles them to any such discovery or relief as is prayed.

It is first objected that there is an adequate remedy at law. That an action of debt may be sustained on a decree for money, is admitted. And it appears from the decree, to enforce which this bill is filed, that the defendant was found to owe to the bank, on account of his stock, twenty-nine thousand, seven hundred and fifty dollars; and to this amount he was held liable to the receivers of the bank. But the decree was not absolutely for this amount. It was that he was liable on his subscription of stock to the above amount, and that he should pay, by way of contribution, with other stockholders, similarly liable, such amount, not exceeding the said sum, as with the other funds, will pay the debts of the bank. It is clear that on such a decree an action at law cannot be sustained. The sum is not certain, nor has a court of law the means of making it certain. The debts of the bank must be ascertained, the amount of the assets and what per cent. on the stock debts will make up the deficiency. And by looking into the bills it appears that these facts are called for in the answer of the defendant, and they must be ascertained, before the relief prayed for can be given. "A bill in equity will lie to carry a former decree into execution, when from neglect of the parties or other cause, subsequent events have intervened, making the further aid of the court necessary." Linton v. Potts, 5 Blackf. 396. It appears that the court of common pleas, of Pickaway county, Ohio, after the cause was remanded to it, by the supreme court, ordered the sheriff to collect the full amount decreed against the stockholders. The complainant claims nothing under that order, but relies upon the equity of the original decree. And we must take the case as made in the bill, and which is presented by the demurrer. The decree was remanded to the court of common pleas to be carried out, and if found necessary to pay the debts of the bank, it had power to award execution for the full amount of the stock indebtment. The court directed the execution for the full amount, under the authority of the mandate, but this was merely in the execution of the decree. The execution was returned without realizing any fruits of the decree. And the decree is now brought before this court, for execution, the same as it was before the common pleas of Pickaway county.

By the bill the decree is brought before this court for execution, and it becomes necessary that we should give effect to it, according to its terms, and we are not bound by an executing order of the common pleas of Pickaway county. It is no part of the decree, but a mode of giving effect to it, under which no amount was collected. It is urged, that from the bill, the liabilities of the bank do not appear to have been presented within the time limited in the decree. The decree embraced all demands presented before it was entered, and all judgments against the bank and all demands which might be presented within one year from the first day of January, 1848. From the notice of this decree it is seen, that it could not have been entered for a specific sum to be paid absolutely. The complainants allege that the costs chargeable to the bank will not be less than three thousand dollars, and that the liabilities of the bank, exclusive of interest, amount to the sum of $22,640, and that adding thereto the costs and expenses of winding up the affairs of the bank, the liabilities will be above the sum of fifty thousand dollars. Until a full exhibit of the debts of the bank shall be made, it will not be possible to designate, with precision, their amount. The decree entered by the court was the only one which could be given, before the exhibit of the debts was made. It graduated the charge on the stockholders so as to make their contributions equal, pro rata on the amount of the stock debts. We think this part of the bill is sufficient. The courts in Ohio which entered and sanctioned the decree, are courts of general jurisdiction, and this will be recognised by this court, without any allegation to that effect in the bill.

It is also urged that the bill is defective, for want of proper parties. That the other stockholders who were parties to the decree are necessary parties. These individuals in the bill are alleged to be citizens of Ohio, and cannot be made parties. No decree is asked against them, and they can, in no respect be prejudiced by any decision which shall be made in this case. And in addition to this consideration, the liability of the defendants under the decree is distinct and separate; each one being required to contribute pro rata on his debt for stock, so as to pay the liabilities of the bank. Each is liable on his own subscription for stock, and the only inquiry in this case will be how much of the stock must be paid to carry out the decree. If the whole amount shall be required, the other parties to the original decree cannot be injured, nor will they be injured if the court should find that the payment of less than the whole will be sufficient. No decree that this court shall make in this case, can affect injuriously the interests of other parties to the decree. The pro rata contribution by the decree is the rule of action of this court, in giving effect to it, the same as in the court of Ohio. This view is not in conflict with the case of Bargh v. Page, [Case No. 980.] In that case the suit was brought on a joint liability, one of the parties being a citizen of the same state with the plaintiff. But in this case the defendant is a citizen of Illinois, and his brother and partner died some years ago, insolvent; so that the present defendant stands on his individual responsibility, in no respect so connected with others, as to affect the jurisdiction of this court. As regards the question of distribution, the principle being fixed by the Ohio decree, it may as well be made, so far as the defendant is concerned, by this as the Ohio court. The report of a master can lay the facts before us. The act of [February 28,] 1839, [5 Stat. 321, c. 36,] authorizes this court to take jurisdiction on a joint demand, under the statutory provision, that a judgment against a joint obligor shall not prejudice his co-obligor.

Upon the whole, the demurrer is overruled and a rule for answer is entered.

BANK OF CLEVELAND v. STURGES et al.

[2 McLean, 341.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Ohio. Dec. Term, 1840.

JUDGMENT LIENS—MORTGAGE—PRIORITY—OHIO STATUTES.

A judgment was entered, 2d July, 1839, against Beebee, Vantine & Co., in this court. On the 28th June, 1839, Vantine executed a mortgage on a certain tract of land to secure the payment of a debt due the complainant. The mortgage was filed with the recorder of the proper county for record the 2d July. Held that the judgment lien was paramount, as it took effect, from the first day of the term, which was the first of July.

[In equity. Bill by the Bank of Cleveland to enjoin Sturges, Roe and Barker from selling on execution the property of Vantine in satisfaction of a judgment obtained against Beebee, Vantine & Co. Decree for respondents. The property was subsequently sold to Sturges, who brought ejectment against the Bank of Cleveland under his marshal's deed. See Sturgess v. Bank of Cleveland, Case No. 13,571.]

[1] [Reported by Hon. John McLean, Circuit Justice.]

Mr. Turner, for plaintiff.
Messrs. Swayne and Bates, for defendants.

LEAVITT, District Judge. The object of this bill is to obtain an injunction to stay a sale at law, on an execution issued from this court. The material facts, as stated in the bill, are as follows: On the 2d of July, being the second day of the July term of this court, in the year 1839, Sturges, Roe and Barker obtained a judgment against Beebee, Vantine & Co.; and an execution having issued on this judgment, certain real estate has been levied on, as the property of Vantine, which is about to be offered for sale by the marshal. The bill then asserts, in behalf of the Bank of Cleveland, a preferable lien on this real estate, in virtue of a mortgage, dated the 28th of June, 1839, executed by Vantine and wife, to secure the payment of a debt due to the bank from Vantine. This mortgage was filed for record, with the recorder for the county of Cuyahoga, on the 2d day of July following. It is insisted, by the counsel for the bank, that these facts call for the interposition of the chancery powers of this court, in staying the sale on the judgment, in favor of Sturges, Roe and Barker. The ground on which this position is based is, that a mortgage creates a specific lien on the mortgaged premises, from the date of its execution, and imports a preferable lien to that created by a judgment rendered prior to the filing of the mortgage for record. And a number of cases are referred to, from which it appears that this is the settled law in some of the states of the Union. Chancellor Kent, in laying down the law on this subject, as established in the state of New York, (4 Comm. 166,) says—"A mortgage not registered has preference over a subsequent docketed judgment." And, again; "an unregistered mortgage is still a valid conveyance, and binds the estate, except against subsequent bona fide purchasers and mortgagees, whose conveyances are recorded." But he adds—"the rule in Pennsylvania is different, and the docketed judgment is preferred, and not unreasonably, for there is much good sense, as well as simplicity, in the proposition, that every incumbrance, whether it be a registered deed, or docketed judgment, should, in cases free from fraud, be satisfied according to the priority of lien, upon the record which is open for public inspection." The only exception to the rule, thus approvingly referred to by the learned writer, is furnished in the case of a mortgage executed at the time of a conveyance of real estate to secure the payment of the purchase money. Under such circumstances the mortgage is properly preferred to a prior judgment.

The statutes of Ohio, declaring the effect of judgments, on the real estate of the debtor, and providing for the registry of mortgages, as understood and construed by the supreme court of the state, seem fully to sustain the position, that liens on land, whether by judgment or mortgage, in the absence of fraud, are to be discharged according to the order of time in which they respectively attached. And this time is not left doubtful under the statutory enactments of the state, but is clearly and definitely fixed. The second section of the statute regulating judgments and executions (3 Chase's St. 1709) declares that "the lands and tenements of the debtor shall be bound for the satisfaction of any judgment against such debtor, from the first day of the term, at which such judgment shall be rendered." And the amendatory act, concerning the registry of mortgages, passed March 16, 1838, (36 Ohio Laws, p. 62,) provides that "mortgages do and shall take effect, and have preference from the time the same are delivered to the recorder of the proper county, to be by him entered on record." The judgments of this court create a lien on all the lands of the debtor within its territorial jurisdiction; and, under the provision of the statute just referred to, that lien attaches from the first day of the term at which judgment is entered. In the case before the court the judgment became an effective lien on the real estate of Vantine, from the first day of July, 1839, that being the first day of the term at which it was obtained. The mortgage, though executed on the 28th of June, took effect from the 2d of July, the day on which it was deposited for record with the proper officer. The judgment, therefore, in point of time, has priority of the mortgage by the space of one day. And we think the rights of these parties must be determined in accordance with the principle embodied in the maxim, "qui est prior in tempore, potior in jure."

This principle forms the basis of the decision of the supreme court of Ohio in the case of Magee v. Beatty, 8 Ohio, 396. The facts in that case were substantially as follows: Magee had recovered a judgment against Beatty, at a term of the court of common pleas of Guernsey county, commencing on the 24th day of March. On the 27th of February, preceding, Beatty had executed a mortgage of the real estate in question, which was filed for record on the 14th of March, being ten days prior to the taking effect of the judgment. The judgment creditor filed a bill in chancery, asking the decree of the court, postponing the lien of the mortgage, and for the sale of the land to satisfy the judgment. In their opinion, the court say—"It is a case of two creditors contending for the priority of lien; and this priority must depend on the construction of the statutes relative to the subject." And, after an examination of the statutory provisions, the court arrive at the conclusion that the mortgagee has the preferable lien, solely on the ground that his mortgage was filed for record, and, therefore, took effect before the rendition of the judgment. There is no reference to, or recognition of, the doctrine, that a mortgage imports a superior equity to that created by a judgment; and, therefore, that the latter, though prior in time, must be postponed to the mortgage. We can perceive no reason to doubt the correctness of this conclusion. The application for the injunction is therefore overruled.

BANK OF COLUMBIA v. BAKER et al.

[3 Cranch, C. C. 432.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May Term, 1829.

WRITS—ORDER FOR AN EXECUTION—CHARTER OF BANK OF COLUMBIA—POWER OF PRESIDENT.

1. An order for an execution, by the president of the Bank of Columbia, under the fourteenth section of its charter, is not a judgment, and a second execution cannot be issued without a new order.

[Cited in Smith v. Bank of Columbia and Bank of U. S., Case No. 13,011.]

2. The execution is but the commencement of the suit, and, if not prosecuted, it is discontinued.

[See Bank of Columbia v. Bunnel, Case No. 863; Same v. Moore, Id. 875; Smith v. Bank of Columbia, Id. 13,011.]

At law. Scire facias, to show cause why execution should not issue [against Baker and Dawes] on an order of the president of the Bank of Columbia, made in December, 1825, returnable to May term, 1826, which was never delivered to the marshal, but remained in or was returned to the clerk's office, by the cashier of the bank. At May term, 1826, a new fi. fa. was issued, and ordered, by the plaintiffs, "to lie in the office." The present scire facias was issued on the 27th of April, 1829, returnable to this term.

Mr. Redin, for the defendant, moved the court to quash the scire facias. The order of the president of the bank is not a judgment. It is a mere statutory remedy, and a scire facias is not given by the statute. The execution is only the commencement of the suit. The scire facias has not been served. The defendant has had no notice. How can he plead? What can he plead? What would be the effect of an order of this court for an execution? Could the defendant plead to it as he might have pleaded to the first execution? By the fourteenth section of the charter, which authorizes an execution upon the order of the president of the bank, without a previous judgment, the execution must be made returnable to the court which "shall first sit after the issuing thereof." Five years have now elapsed since the order was made. That order was satisfied by the execution issued by the clerk. No new execution can issue without a new order, and upon a new affidavit, stating that the debt is now due. From the neglect to serve the former execution, a presumption arises that the debt has been paid.

Mr. Lear, contra. By the fourteenth section of the charter, (see Laws Md. 1793, c. 30, § 14,) it is enacted that the execution issued upon the order of the president of the bank "shall be as valid, and as effectual in law, to all intents and purposes, as if the same had issued on judgment regularly obtained in the ordinary course of proceeding in the said court." A scire facias is only a notice, or rule to show cause; and, by St. Westm. 2, (13th Edw. I, c. 45,) it is given after the year and day "upon those things which are found enrolled before" the justices, "whether they be contracts, covenants, obligations, services, or customs knowledged, or other things whatsoever enrolled, wherein the king's court, without offence of the law and custom, may execute their authority." The order of the president of the bank is a matter of record, and is to be considered as enrolled; and it is a thing wherein the court, without offence of the law and custom, may execute their authority. It is, therefore, a process lawfully issued, and cannot be quashed on motion.

CRANCH, Chief Judge, delivered the opinion of the court, (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent, but assenting.) The court is of opinion that, under the circumstances of this case, the clerk could not issue a new execution without a new order; which new order must be in writing, and accompanied by the same evidence as the first. The execution is but the commencement of the suit, which, if not prosecuted, is discontinued, and must be commenced afresh. The charter of the bank does not make the order of the president a judgment of the court, nor give it any other quality of a judgment than that it is an authority to the clerk to issue an execution. It does not say that the order of the president shall be as valid and effectual as a judgment of the court; but only that the execution "shall be as valid and effectual" "as if the same had issued on judgment regularly obtained." We are, therefore, of opinion that the scire facias must be quashed. Scire facias quashed, without costs.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 306.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. April Term, 1822.

WRITS — ORDER FOR EXECUTION WITHOUT JUDGMENT—NOTARY'S AND ATTORNEY'S FEES—CHARTER OF BANK OF COLUMBIA.

1. An execution issued by order of the president of the Bank of Columbia, without judgment, ought not to include the notary's fee for a protest, but if the bank releases the fee, the court will not quash the execution.

2. Such an execution may include five dollars for an attorney's fee, and the interest which has accrued upon the debt up to the time of ordering the execution.

[3. An execution issued by order of the president of the Bank of Columbia pursuant to Laws Md. 1793, c. 30, § 14, is the commencement of the action.]

[Cited in Bank of Columbia v. Sweeny, Case No. 881.]

[See Bank of Columbia v. Baker, Case No. 862; Same v. Moore, Id. 875.]

At law. Motion by Mr. Redin, for the defendant, to quash three writs of fieri facias against the defendants [Bunnel and Robertson] as endorsers of Edward Ford's note issued by order of the president of the Bank of Columbia under the 14th section of its charter of 1793, c. 30, which authorizes him, upon non-payment of a note made expressly negotiable at that bank, to order execution, "on which the debt and costs may be levied by selling the property of the defendant for the sum mentioned in the said note," "provided" the president shall "make oath" ascertaining whether the whole or what part of the debt due to the bank "on the said note," "is due." [See note at end of case.]

Mr. Redin made three objections to these executions:

1st. That each execution included five dollars for an attorney's fee;

2nd. That they included not only the debt, but the interest up to the time of ordering the executions; and

3rd. That each execution included $1.75 for cost of protest.

It has been decided by this court, and by the supreme court, that it is not necessary to protest a promissory note; and the notary's fee for protesting is no part of the legal taxable costs. No attorney's fee can be taxed upon an execution.

Mr. Key, contra. Although this is an execution, yet it is the commencement of a suit. Both parties may appear at the return and litigate the case. The bank could only appear by attorney.

THE COURT (nem. con.) decided that the fee for protest ought not to be included; and (Thruston, Circuit Judge, contra) that the attorney's fee might be included. But, upon the bank releasing the cost of protest, THE COURT (nem. con.) refused to quash the executions.

[NOTE. For a record of the levying of the writs of fieri facias on lands belonging to defendants Bunnel and Robertson in the subsequent course of litigation, see Smith v. Bank of Columbia and Bank of U. S., Case 13,011.]

Case No. 864.

BANK OF COLUMBIA v. COOK.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 574.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May Term, 1825.

WRITS — ORDER FOR EXECUTION WITHOUT JUDGMENT—OVERDUE NOTE — SUFFICIENCY OF AFFIDAVIT—STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS — CHARTER OF BANK OF COLUMBIA.

1. The affidavit of the president of the Bank of Columbia, made under the 14th section of its charter, stating that "the note was not paid when due, according to the best of his knowledge and belief," and that the sum of ——— remained due upon the note, is sufficiently certain, although he does not state that it remained due from the defendant, nor that the defendant is the person who signed the note.

2. Upon the return of an execution issued by order of the president of the Bank of Columbia, under the 14th section of its charter, the court will not quash the execution because it appears on the face of the note, upon which it was issued, that it had been due more than three years before the issuing of the execution.

3. The court will permit the defendant, upon the return of the execution issued by the president of the Bank of Columbia, to plead the statute of limitations.

At law. Upon the return of an execution issued by order of the president of the Bank of Columbia [against William Cook,] under the 14th section of its charter, (Act Md. 1793, c. 30, § 14,) Mr. Worthington, for the defendant, moved the court to quash the execution; 1st, because the affidavit of the president was too uncertain; and 2nd, because it appears by the face of the note that it is barred by the statute of limitations. The affidavit stated that the note "was not paid when due, according to the best of his knowledge and belief," and that the sum of ——— "remained due on the note," without saying that it was due from the defendant, and without stating that the defendant is the William Cook who signed the note. As the proceeding under the charter is in derogation of common right, it must be strictly pursued, and nothing left uncertain. The documents sent by the president to the clerk must show a prima facie debt; but, upon the face of the note, it is barred by the act of limitations.

THE COURT (nem. con.) stopped Mr. Key, who was about to reply, and refused to quash the execution; being of opinion that the affidavit of the president of the bank is agreeable to the provisions of its charter, and that the note, notwithstanding its date, (January, 1818, at 60 days,) is prima facie evidence of a debt. If the statute of limitations had been pleaded, the plaintiff might have replied a new promise, or some other bar to the statute. See Gould v. Johnson, 2 Ld. Raym. 838, and Puckle v. Moor, 1 Vent. 191.

Mr. Worthington, for the defendant, then offered to plead the statute of limitations.

Mr. Key, for the plaintiff, objected that the defendant had no right to plead the statute of limitations to this summary proceeding. The object of the act was to enable the bank to indulge their debtors, without danger of losing their debts by lapse of time. No laches can be imputed to a plaintiff who holds such a power. The note is equivalent to a judgment. The charter only permits defendant to show payments, or that he does not owe the whole of the debt. The defendant can only plead to the merits; and, before he can plead the statute of limitations, he must satisfy the court that it is necessary to the merits. The bank charter, which gives the remedy, does not limit it to any particular time; and this proceeding is not an action within the meaning of the statute of limitations.

Mr. Key urged the case of Ingle v. Hogan upon the court, decided at October term, 1822, [Case No. 6,583.]

THE COURT (CRANCH, Chief Judge, doubting) permitted the defendant to plead the statute of limitations.

BANK OF COLUMBIA v. DUNLOP.

[3 Cranch, C. C. 414.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. Term, 1828.

EQUITY—VENDOR AND VENDEE—HE WHO SEEKS EQUITY MUST DO EQUITY.

A vendee coming into equity to obtain the legal title of a lot upon which the purchase-money has been fully paid, must pay the balance due to the vendor upon other lots.

In equity.

CRANCH, Chief Judge, delivered the opinion of the court.

Under the decree of this court for the sale of the real estate of the late James Dunlop, deceased, for the payment of his debts, the trustee sold seventeen feet front on High street, being part of lot No. 88 in H. & B.'s addition to Georgetown. The sales reported by the trustee were all ratified by the court, except this, which was reserved for consideration, upon exceptions to the report filed by the purchaser and by the creditors of Abraham Wingard, who contended that this part of the lot was not the property of the said James Dunlop, but of the said Wingard. The facts were these. In 1803, this part of the lot was sold by the late Mr. James Dunlop to Mr. Abraham Wingard, who paid the whole purchase-money, but did not get a conveyance of the legal title, which remained in Mr. Dunlop, the vendor. In 1814, Mr. Dunlop sold to Mr. Wingard the residue of the lot, being thirty-nine feet front, for $3,000, and received $985 in part payment. In January, 1820, Mr. Wingard died insolvent, not having received the legal title to any part of the lot. Judgments had been recovered against him in his lifetime to a greater amount than the value of all his property. On the 31st of May, 1821, Mr. Dunlop filed a bill against Mr. Wingard's heirs and representatives, for the sale of the thirty-nine feet front, to pay the balance of the purchase-money; and claiming also a lien on the seventeen feet front first sold, in case the other should not be sufficient to pay that balance, which amounted to more than $3,000. A decree was obtained; and, on the 19th of February, 1822, Mr. Dunlop, at the sale under the decree, purchased the thirty-nine feet for $1,350, leaving a large balance of the purchase-money still due to him from Mr. Wingard's estate. On the 10th of October, 1821, Mr. Wingard's creditors obtained a decree for the sale of his real estate, for the payment of his debts; under which decree the trustee offered to sell the seventeen feet, but the sale was forbidden by Mr. Dunlop, on the ground that he had a lien upon it for the balance due upon the other part of the lot, and the sale was not made; but the whole lot, after the death of Mr. Wingard, and after the 19th of February, 1822, remained in the possession of Mr. Dunlop and his heirs. It is agreed, by the trustee for the sale of Mr. Wingard's estate, and by the trustee for the sale of Mr. Dunlop's estate, and by the purchaser, that the sale of the seventeen feet by the latter trustee shall be ratified; and that this court shall decide which of the trustees shall have the purchase-money.

It is one of the plainest rules of equity, that he who seeks equity must do equity. He who comes into a court of equity to redeem, or to obtain the legal title, must pay the defendant all that is justly due to him by the complainant, whether the debt be or be not strictly a lien on the property sought to be redeemed or conveyed; unless the rights of third persons, not having notice of the complainant's equity, shall have intervened. In Shuttleworth v. Laycock, 1 Vern. 245, it was decided, in 1684, that "where there is a debt secured by mortgage, and also a bond debt, when the heir of the mortgagor comes to redeem, he shall not redeem the mortgage without paying the bond debt too, in case the heir be bound. So if there are two mortgages, and one is defective; if he will redeem, he must take both." The same point was decided in Baxter v. Manning, 1 Vern. 244, where the court said:—"Although there is no special agreement proved in this case, that the land should stand as a security for the bond debt, yet the mortgagor shall not redeem without paying both." So in Purefoy v. Purefoy, 1 Vern. 29, it was said in argument, and not denied, that "where a bill is brought to redeem two mortgages, and there is more money lent upon one of them than the estate is worth, the plaintiff shall not elect one, and leave the heavier mortgage unredeemed, but shall be compelled to take both or none." This point is also expressly decided in Margrave v. Le Hooke, 2 Vern. 207, where the court said:—"He shall redeem both, or neither. And so if one mortgage had been deficient in value, and the other mortgage had been worth more than the money lent upon it, the heir should not be permitted to redeem the one without the other." So in Pope v. Onslow, 2 Vern. 286. The plaintiff, as assignee of a bankrupt, brought his bill to redeem a mortgage of the manor of Newington, made by the bankrupt to the defendant. The defendant, in his answer, stated that he had previously lent the bankrupt £200, on an insufficient mortgage, and, afterwards, £300 on the mortgage of the manor of Newington, which was of better value than the money due upon it. Per curiam:—"If the plaintiff will redeem one, he shall redeem both." See also the cases cited by the master of the rolls, in Jones v. Smith, 2 Ves. Jr. 376, 377, where he says, that "the case of the assignee is not better than that of the original mortgagor." He considered the case before him as a case of pledge, and not of mortgage; and, therefore, permitted the plaintiff to redeem one fund without the other, but his decree was reversed in the house of lords. 1 Madd. p. 528, says:—"Nor, where there are two separate mortgages of different estates to the same person, can the purchaser of the equity of redemption of one of them redeem that mortgage only; if he redeem at all, he must redeem both."

The case of a vendor, who sells two separate parcels of land to the same vendee, and retains the legal title, does not differ in principle from that of a mortgagee who holds two separate mortgages. The vendor has all the rights of a mortgagee. Even if he has parted with the legal title, he has a lien on the land in the hands of the vendee, and all claiming under the vendee, with notice, unless he has waived that lien. In such a case, however, if the vendor comes into a court of equity, to enforce his lien, he cannot, I apprehend, make one parcel of land answer for the debt of the other, if they have got into several hands, even with notice. But when the vendee comes into a court of equity, to get from the vendor the legal title, then he must pay off both debts; not because the vendor has a lien upon one parcel for the debt of the other, but because the court will compel him who seeks equity to do equity. This is the principle which governs all these cases, and to which they are all to be referred. We are, therefore, of opinion that the trustee for the sale of Mr. Dunlop's estate has a right to retain the purchase-money of the seventeen feet of land, for the purposes of his trust.

At law. Assumpsit [by Bank of Columbia against G. French's executrix] on a negotiable promissory note for 1,400 dollars, made October 10, 1798, by W. M. Duncanson, payable to, and indorsed by, G. French, due 9 and 12 December, 1798. On the 15th December, 1798, F. Munroe (a notary public,) demanded payment of Duncanson, and protested the note. The note was made for the accommodation of W. M. Duncanson. G. French died Friday, the 14th December, 1798, and was perfectly in his senses in the morning of that day. All the parties resided in Georgetown and Washington. Mr. Gantt, counsel for the defendant, was examined as a witness for the plaintiffs. He had had a conversation with the president of the bank, which he related to the defendant's agent, and he was requested by the plaintiff's counsel to state the reply of the defendant's agent. This communication was made by the president of the bank to the witness, as counsel for the defendant, and the answer of the defendant's agent to the witness was made to him as counsel, but he did not conceive the answer of the defendant's agent to be made in confidence.

[2] [Reversed in 4 Cranch (8 U. S.) 141.]

He did not recollect whether he even communicated the answer to the president of the bank, but did not consider himself as restrained from communicating it.

THE COURT admitted the evidence to be given; not considering it as a case within the rule respecting counsel and client.

W. M. Duncanson, the maker of the note, being called as a witness for the defendant, Mr. Mason, for the plaintiffs, objected, because no party to a negotiable paper is to be allowed to invalidate the instrument. Walton v. Shelley, 1 Term R. 296; Jordaine v. Lashbrooke, 7 Term R. 601; Esp. N. P. 708; Peake, Ev. 128. Mr. Gantt cited Esp. N. P. 708.

THE COURT admitted W. M. Duncanson to be sworn and give evidence, saying that Walton v. Shelley, was overruled by Jordaine v. Lashbrooke.

The plaintiff having introduced a deed from Duncanson to Ray to show the fact of Duncanson's insolvency, the defendant called Duncanson as a witness to prove that that deed was obtained by fraud, and without consideration, and so the inference derived therefrom not correct.

THE COURT admitted W. M. Duncanson to testify as to the grounds upon which that deed was given.

FITZHUGH, Circuit Judge, contra, said: It is a general principle, that a man is estopped to deny his deed. It is also a general rule, that a man shall not be permitted to do that indirectly which he is forbidden to do directly. There is no case in which it has beeen allowed as to a sealed instrument. The case of Jordaine v. Lashbrooke [supra,] was upon an accommodation note.

Mr. Mason prayed the court to instruct the jury, that if they should be satisfied that this note was indorsed by G. French, without any valuable consideration passing from him to any person for the same, merely to accommodate W. M. Duncanson, the maker of the note, and to give him a credit with the plaintiffs for the amount thereof, and that the plaintiffs received the same with a knowledge of its having been so drawn and indorsed; that if they are also satisfied that John Weems was the agent of the defendant, and that he had notice of the dishonor of the note in January, 1799, and then conversed with and endeavored to make arrangements with the plaintiffs for the same, and are also satisfied that G. French, in his lifetime, and his executrix, or his estate since his death, have suffered no loss or injury from the circumstance of this note not having been demanded of the drawer before the 15th December, 1798, or of notice not having been given to the indorser, or his executrix, of the dishonor of the note, other than as above stated, that such laches and neglect of the plaintiffs as to a demand on the maker, and in not giving other notice to the indorser of the said note, does not debar and take away their right to recover upon this note against the present defendant. De Berdt v. Atkinson, 2 H. Bl. 336, and Nicholson v. Gouthit, Id. 609; Chit. Bills, 86, 87, 89, 101. Mr. Mason admitted that the onus probandi of showing that the indorser has sustained no damage by want of notice, lies on the plaintiffs. Nicholson v Gouthit, 2 H. Bl. 609. An indorsed promissory note is a bill of exchange. If the drawer of a bill has no funds in the hands of the drawee, no notice is necessary to the drawer, of the dishonor of the bill. Chit. Bills, 17, 169, 170; Kyd, Bills, 125. The fact of insolvency, in the case of De Berdt v. Atkinson, does not differ it from this case, because the insolvency and knowledge of that insolvency by Atkinson was only a fact to show that he could not suffer by want of notice. In the present case it is expressly proved that the defendant received no injury by want of notice, and therefore is precisely within reason of the case of De Berdt v. Atkinson.

Mr. Mason attempted to reconcile the cases of De Berdt v. Atkinson [2 H. Bl. 336,] and Nicholson v. Gouthit, [Id. 609.] The defendant, Gouthit, actually sustained a loss in consequence of want of notice, because the funds which he held when the note became payable, were withdrawn before the demand was made, and therefore if compelled to pay the note he would be injured. Chit. Bills, p. 87, does not notice the cases as contradictory, although he cited both in the same page, and states the law of De Berdt v. Atkinson as absolutely settled. Christian's Notes to 2 Bl. Comm. 470, note 26.

Mr. Morsell, contra. The indorser is a surety, and liable only in a qualified manner. There is a difference between the acceptor of a bill and the maker of a note, and between the indorser of a note and the drawer of a bill. The indorser indorses on the credit of the maker; and the reason of notice is that the indorser may immediately resort to the maker and get security; but in the case of a drawer of a bill who has no funds in the hands of the drawee, the drawer has no right to expect the bill to be honored or paid. Esp. N. P. 34. In the case of a drawer of a bill without funds, the drawer is the principal debtor, and is not in the nature of surety. Robertson v. Vogle, 1 Dall. [1 U. S.] 252. Although it may be an accommodation note, yet there is the same reason for notice as if it were for a real debt. Tindal v. Brown, 1 Term R. 167.

Mr. Gantt, on the same side. This was an extraordinary transaction of negotiation at the Bank of Columbia. There is a difference between an indorsed promissory note and bill of exchange. Prima facie it is a bona fide transaction. Notice must be waived by some agreement. The maker of a promissory note is absolutely bound to pay. The contract of the indorser is conditional only. The holder undertakes to do certain things, and if he omits these he waives the liability of the in-dorser. Kyd, Bills, 109, 111, 117; 2 Bl. Comm. 470. In the case of De Berdt v. Atkinson, the decision was upon the ground of the insolvency of the maker being known to Atkinson at the time of the indorsement; so that Atkinson undertook to pay at all events. By not demanding the money of W. M. Duncanson, on the day it became due, the plaintiffs have given credit to W. M. Duncanson. The indorsement is only a conditional contract, and the conditions have not been complied with. To make him liable without demand or notice, is to create a liability on the defendant which he never assumed. The case of De Berdt v. Atkinson [2 H. Bl. 336] is overruled by that of Nicholson v. Gouthit, [Id. 609.] Notice must be stated in the declaration, and it is error if not stated; it must therefore be proved. There was no consideration between the plaintiff and defendant, unless the payment to Duncanson can be considered as a payment to French; and if the money was thus paid to French, and by French to Duncanson, then a consideration passed from French to Duncanson, and Duncanson had funds in his hands, upon which French could draw.

Mr. Mason. Until French repays the money to the bank, he cannot support an action against Duncanson.

THE COURT gave the instruction, as prayed by Mr. Mason.

CRANCH, Circuit Judge, contra, who delivered his opinion to the following effect:

This is undoubtedly a question of great importance as it regards the interests of the commercial part of the community; for it is of vast importance that the several obligations of parties to negotiable paper should be certain and well known; and I therefore regret, extremely, that I am obliged to give an opinion during the trial of the cause, without that degree of examination and reflection which it merits, especially as I am so unfortunate as to differ from my brethren on the bench. In these circumstances, I cannot say that I do not deliver my opinion with some degree of doubt, although the preponderance of my judgment is at present against giving the direction as prayed.

I had, at first, considerable doubt whether the strict rule of notice was not to be considered as summum jus, which could only be required in case of the failure or insolvency or death of the principal debtor, so that the loss must fall upon one of two parties who were contending de damno evitando. Some of the earlier cases seem to have been decided upon this principle, and in the greater number of cases respecting the liability of the drawer of a bill of exchange and indorser of a promissory note, the judges have qualified the rule with the proviso that some of the parties have become insolvent. Mogadara v. Holt, 1 Show. 318; Hart v. King, 12 Mod. 310; Borough v. Perkins, 1 Salk. 131; Tassell v. Lewis, 1 Ld. Raym. 744; Lambert v. Oakes, Id. 443; Gee v. Brown, Strange, 792; Heylin v. Adamson, 2 Burrows, 674. But from the expressions of judges in later cases, I am inclined to think that my first doubts on this subject were groundless, and that the necessity of notice is a part of the law merchant attached to a bill of exchange, or rather is a part of the contract itself. The question, on which side does the justice of this case lie, depends upon the question what was the contract of the indorser; for it is not just that any man (especially a mere surety) should be held liable upon a contract further than he has consented to bind himself. If his contract was conditional, he cannot be absolutely bound until the condition has been performed. What then was the contract which the defendant's testator entered into by indorsing the note? By the law of Maryland, which must decide this case, and which on this subject is precisely the same as the law of England, an exact analogy exists between an indorsed promissory note, and an accepted inland bill of exchange. When a promissory note, payable to order, is indorsed by the payee, it is, in truth, an inland bill of exchange drawn by the payee in favor of the indorsee, upon the maker, (his debtor by the note,) and by him accepted. Hence the law respecting both kinds of paper is the same.

The contract of the first indorser of a promissory note is the same with that of the drawer of a bill of exchange. It is an express, not an implied contract. An implied contract is that which the law (to prevent a failure of justice) presumes the parties to have made, where they have failed to make an express contract for themselves, and courts will vary the terms of such implied contract, according to the principles of natural justice. By writing his name on the back of the note, the indorser entered into an express contract, the terms of which are as well known by reference to the law merchant, as if they had been written at large on the note. He does not thereby bind himself to pay at all events. He only says to the holder, if you use due diligence in demanding the money of the maker and he refuses to pay it, and if you give me reasonable notice thereof, I will pay you. It being then a part of the express contract between the parties, that the holder should, in reasonable time, demand the money of the maker and give notice of non-payment to the indorser, before the latter can be charged, upon what principle can a court of justice dispense with the performance of those precedent conditions? There has been no case on a promissory note cited in which it has been dispensed with, except the case of De Berdt v. Atkinson, 2 H. Bl. 336, and there it was done because the maker of the note was known by all the parties to be insolvent at the time of making and indorsing the note, and therefore the contract of the indorser in that case was not conditional, but absolute. But the authority of that case although attended by such special circumstances, is shaken, if not overruled, by the case of Nicholson v. Gouthit, in the same book, [2 H. Bl. 609,] where notice to the indorser of a promissory note was held necessary, although the insolvency of the maker was known to the indorser before the note became payable, and although he had indorsed it for the accommodation of the maker, and merely to obtain him a credit. The latter is, in its circumstances, more like the case now before the court, than that of De Berdt v. Atkinson. It has been contended, for the plaintiffs, that the principle decided by that case was, that notice to Atkinson was not necessary, because it could be of no benefit to him, and that the insolvency of the maker was only a circumstance showing that such notice could not have been beneficial. But the court, in giving their opinion relied, not on the actual insolvency, but the knowledge of the insolvency, by all the parties at the time of making and indorsing the note, whereby it appeared that the defendant had not annexed the usual conditions to his contract as indorser, but had waived them, and that the waiver was also known to the plaintiffs.

It has also been contended, by the plaintiff's counsel, that in the case of Nicholson v. Gouthit, [supra,] it appeared that the defendant had suffered injury by the want of notice. The case was that Burton, the other indorser, had put into the defendant's hands funds to meet the payment of the note, but the note not having been demanded when due the defendant had paid away those funds. It may be answered that if the defendant was not entitled to notice, he paid away those funds in his own wrong, and therefore if any damage arose to him in consequence, it could not make notice necessary. It may also be observed, that the court, in giving their opinion did not notice this circumstance as a ground of that opinion, but the chief justice seems to exclude a presumption of that kind, because he says the justice of the case was with the plaintiff, which could not be true if the defendant had suffered a damage imputable to the laches of the plaintiff. The only ground upon which the court rested their opinion was that the form of guaranty which the parties had adopted required due notice to the indorser, and therefore, although the justice of the case was with the plaintiff, they could not dispense with such notice. Upon this ground the opinion is certainly inconsistent with the case of De Berdt v. Atkinson, [2 H. Bl. 336;] for in the latter case the same form of guaranty had been adopted, yet that circumstance was not deemed sufficient to render notice necessary. But in the other circumstances of the two cases there was a material difference. In De Berdt v. Atkinson the insolvency of the maker was known to all the parties at the time of making and indorsing the note; but in the other case it does not appear that the maker was insolvent, but only embarrassed, at the time of making and indorsing the note, although he became insolvent before the note became payable, which was eighteen months after date. It did not appear, therefore, that the indorser had, at the time of indorsing, waived the usual conditions annexed to the liability of an indorser. It may also be observed that in both those cases the question arose upon the insolvency of the makers of the notes. In the present case no such insolvency is stated in the prayer to the court. But if those cases will not support the plaintiff's action, they rely on the cases in which it has been decided that a person drawing a bill of exchange without funds in the hands of the drawee, is not entitled to notice. I admit that an analogy exists between an indorsed promissory note and a bill of exchange; but that analogy is not perfect until the bill of exchange is accepted. No case has been cited in which notice has been deemed unnecessary, if the bill has been accepted, and I recollect but one case of the kind, which is that of Walwyn v. St. Quintin, 1 Bos. & P. 652, which will be noticed presently. In all the prior cases acceptance had been refused.

It is admitted that cases have decided that if the drawer has neither funds in the hands of the drawee before the bill becomes payable, nor a right to draw, he is not entitled to notice; and the reason is because he cannot expect the bill to be accepted and paid, and therefore practises a fraud upon the holder, and because he cannot suffer any injury by the want of notice. These reasons extend simply to the case of a drawer who has no right to draw, and the bill is not accepted. For if the drawee has promised to accept the bill, then the drawer had a right to expect that his bill will be accepted; and he has practised no fraud upon the holder; and notice of non-acceptance, and a fortiori notice of non-payment, if the bill has been accepted, may be very material to the drawer, as he would thereby be liable for damages, interest and costs, which he would have a right to recover over against the drawee, who had thus violated his faith in not honoring the drawer's bill according to promise; and by the want of notice he may lose his remedy against the drawee by his insolvency. This may be the case where the drawer draws the bill for his own accommodation without funds, and the drawee engages to accept it to give the drawer credit. Even in that case then, the reasons given for dispensing with notice, in the cases cited, do not apply. But that is not the present case. It is contended that this is an accommodation note, that the indorser (the defendant's testator) never gave any valuable consideration for it, and therefore he stands on the same ground as a drawer without funds.

Let us then consider it as a bill of exchange. It is a bill drawn by the defendant's testator on W. M. Duncanson (and by him accepted for his own accommodation) in favor of the plaintiffs. It is not like the case of a bill of exchange drawn for the accommodation of the drawer which I have just stated, and if the reasons for dispensing with notice did not apply to that case, much less can they to this. If a bill of exchange be drawn to accommodate the drawee, the drawer has a right to expect it will be accepted, and if accepted has not only a right to expect but to insist, that it shall be paid, precisely in the same manner as if he had drawn upon funds in the regular course of mercantile transactions. He stands precisely in the same situation as if the bill had been so drawn. What is the situation of the drawer in a regular transaction? If his debtor (the drawee) after having agreed to honor the bill refuses acceptance, the holder can immediately call upon the drawer, who, upon taking up the bill, may commence suit against the drawee and recover the principal, interest, damages and costs. So in case of a bill drawn for the accommodation of the drawee; if not accepted, the holder can immediately call upon the drawer, who, upon taking it up, may commence suit against the drawee for the amount of the accommodation he received, with the costs and charges expended by the drawer for his accommodation. Immediate notice of non-acceptance is therefore equally necessary in both cases, a failure of the drawee in either case being equally prejudicial to the drawer. In a regular transaction, if, after acceptance, the acceptor refuse to pay, the drawer, after taking up the bill, may commence suit against the acceptor on the bill and recover the principal, interest, damages and costs. So in the bill drawn to accommodate the drawee, if after acceptance (which is the present case) the acceptor refuse to pay, the drawer, after taking up the bill may commence action against the acceptor and recover the principal, interest, damages and costs. If the acceptor in either case should fail, both drawers would sustain precisely the same injury; the one by being unable to withdraw his funds to get an indemnification for the interest, damages and costs; and the other by being unable to get a reimbursement of the principal as well as interest, damages and costs. No two cases can be more parallel. If, then, notice is necessary to a drawer on funds, it is equally necessary to a drawer for the accommodation of the drawee; for in pari ratione eadem est lex. To show that the indorser of an accommodation note is not entitled to notice the plaintiff's counsel cited Christian's note to 2 Bl. Comm. 470. But the writer of that note refers to no case but De Berdt v. Atkinson, [2 H. Bl. 336.] The principle may be right (considered in analogy to the cases of drawers without funds and without a right to draw,) when applied to the case of a note drawn to accommodate the indorser, because he is the person who is ultimately to pay without retribution; for if he is compelled to pay in the first instance he can never resort to the maker. Such is the case of the drawer without funds. If he is obliged to pay the bill in the first instance he never can come upon the drawee. In these cases the insolvency of the maker or of the drawee can make no difference to the indorser of the note or the drawer of the bill; and as they are the principal debtors on the note and bill, notice to them can be of no use. But if the principle should be applied to the case of a note indorsed for the accommodation of the maker, it will be applied without the support of any of the reasons which have been alleged to justify the want of notice in the case of a drawer without funds. The only case reported, within my recollection, which has decided that the drawer of an accepted bill is not entitled to notice, is that of Walwyn v. St. Quintin, 1 Bos. & P. 652, and in that case the bill was for the accommodation of the payee, and the action was by the indorsee against the drawer. The acceptor had funds of the payee but not of the drawer. I confess it is difficult to understand the reasoning of the chief justice in delivering the opinion of the court, in that case. He says,—"as far as concerns the drawer, it is what has been called, a mere accommodation." This is true, but it was not for his own accommodation, which seems to me to be the only kind of accommodation which will justify the want of notice. He then proceeds,—"and all consideration of effects of the drawer in the hands of the acceptor may be laid aside." This again is strictly and literally true. But the drawer had a fair pretence for drawing, and the acceptance was on the ground of a fair mercantile agreement. For it is stated that the drawee had actually accepted the bill on the faith of funds put into his hands by the payee to meet the payment. And in the next page his lordship says: "But it may be proper to caution bill-holders not to rely on it as a general rule, that if the drawer has no effects in the acceptor's hands, notice is not necessary. The cases of acceptances on the faith of consignments from the drawer not come to hands, and the case of acceptances on the ground of fair mercantile agreements, may be stated as exceptions, and there may be possibly many others." In the next sentence, also, he seems to admit that where the drawer has no effects in the hands of the drawee, yet if he has "a fair pretence for drawing" although it is for the purpose of raising money by discount for himself, yet he is entitled to notice. Here then seems to be a difference between the opinion and the judgment of the court which it is difficult to reconcile. He proceeds: "It seems clear that notice can be of no use to him (the drawer); his situation being this, that if the acceptor does not pay, he must; and may then, and not till then, resort to the acceptor to be reimbursed; notice, therefore, can amount to nothing, since his situation cannot be changed." So in the case of a real negotiation, the situation of the drawer is, that if the acceptor does not pay, he must, provided he has due notice. If the chief justice meant to say that the defendant, St. Quintin, was absolutely bound to pay if the acceptor did not, it was begging the question. But his argument seems to rest on the ground that the drawer could not resort to the acceptor until he (the drawer) had paid the bill. But notice was necessary to him, that he might know where to apply to take up the bill, before the acceptor shall become insolvent. Notice also might be of use to him, even before payment, as thereby he would take measures to get security from the acceptor, to indemnify himself when the bill should come back to him. His situation would certainly be very much changed by the want of notice, if the acceptor should fail after the bill became payable; for if due notice had been given he might have taken up the bill, and compelled the acceptor to repay him the money.

His lordship says: "Perhaps, indeed, it (notice) ought never to be dispensed with, since it is a part of the same custom of merchants, which creates the duty; especially as the grounds for dispensing with it, are such as cannot influence the conduct of the holder of a bill, at the time when he is to determine whether he will, or will not give notice; for ninety-nine times in a hundred, he cannot know whether the drawer have or have not effects in the hands of the acceptor, or for whose accommodation the bill was drawn. It has, however, been resolved in many cases, where the drawer has had no effects in the hands of the acceptor, that notice might be dispensed with." This last position seems to have been taken for granted; but I can find no such cases. In all the prior cases, the bill had not been accepted. He also says: "Where the drawer has no effects, and has no fair pretence for drawing, or where he draws without having effects intended to be applied in payment, and only for the purpose of raising money by discount for himself, and a fortiori for the acceptor, which is this case, it is fairly deducible from the cases which have been resolved, that notice need not be given." Where the bill is drawn and accepted (without funds) for the accommodation of the drawer, it may be admitted that the drawer is not entitled to notice, without affecting the present case; but it is difficult to conceive why there should be a stronger reason for dispensing with notice to the drawer, where the bill is drawn for the accommodation of the acceptor, than where it is drawn for the accommodation of the drawer. Indeed, in the former case, I can see no reason for dispensing with notice which will not apply to every possible case. But if this is to be taken as a bill of exchange, can it be said that French, the drawer, had not funds in the hands of Duncanson, the acceptor, before the bill became payable? This action is brought by the plaintiffs, the indorsers of the note, or payees of the bill, against their immediate indorser. They can only support their action, by showing the money to be paid to him or to his use. They paid the money to Duncanson, the maker of the note, or acceptor of the bill. Unless this payment can be applied to French, the indorser, there was no consideration between the plaintiffs and defendant. It is only by considering the money as paid by the plaintiffs to French, and by French to Duncanson, that the plaintiffs can maintain their action. The money, then, which was thus paid, was the funds of French in the hands of Duncanson, upon which French had a right to draw this bill in favor of the plaintiffs. The money in Duncanson's hands, was the fund out of which the note was to be paid, and the non-application of that fund to the object for which it was intended, was a sufficient reason why notice ought to have been given to French, in order that he might get the fund into his own hands, or secure himself against his responsibility. But, it is said, that in this case it is stated that French has received no injury, by want of notice. This may be truly said, for French has not yet been compelled to pay the money. It may be answered, that if French was entitled to notice, the fact that he had not received injury by the want of it, would not be sufficient to dispense with it; and such evidence ought not to be received, and if received, ought not to be regarded. Before the plaintiffs can be let in to give such evidence, they must show that French was in the situation of a drawer without funds and without a right to draw, and that notice could not have been of any use to him.

There is another reason why I cannot consent to give the direction as prayed. It appears, by the case stated for our opinion, that the last day of grace on the note was the 12th of December, and that no demand of payment was made upon the maker of the note until the 15th of December. This was giving a new credit to the maker; and although French might be responsible without notice, if due diligence had been used in demanding the money from the maker, yet it is certainly competent for the plaintiffs to release him from that responsibility; and I am not clear that they have not done so by giving this new credit. The case also states a negotiation between the defendant's agent and the plaintiffs for the adjustment of this note. If that is intended to be argued before the jury, or in the court above, as a waiver of the right to notice, I cannot let it go without also instructing the jury that if they should be satisfied that that negotiation was entered into by the agent without a knowledge of the fact of want of notice, and of the law arising upon that fact, it did not amount to a waiver of the right to notice.

Mr. Gantt then prayed the court to instruct the jury, that if the jury should be of opinion, from the evidence, that the plaintiffs neither paid nor gave any valuable consideration to the defendant's testator for the note, they could not recover. Kyd, Bills, p. 277.

THE COURT refused the instruction as prayed, but directed them, that if they should be of opinion that the note was drawn by W. M. Duncanson, and indorsed and delivered by G. French to the plaintiffs, and that thereupon the plaintiffs paid the money to W. M. Duncanson, with the knowledge and assent of G. French, there was a sufficient consideration as between the plaintiffs and G. French.

Mr. Gantt then prayed the court to instruct the jury, (in substance,) that the money so paid to W. M. Duncanson, was such a consideration moving from French to Duncanson, as to entitle French to due notice of the non-payment, and to make the laches of the plaintiffs in not demanding payment of Duncanson until the 15th of December, a discharge of French from his liability; and that such laches and want of notice, if proved, would discharge him accordingly.

But THE COURT refused to give the instruction. CRANCH, Circuit Judge, contra.

Verdict for the plaintiffs, $1,917.

[NOTE. This judgment was reversed by the supreme court in French v. Bank of Columbia, 4 Cranch, (8 U. S.) 141. Marshall, Chief Justice, in delivering the opinion, said: "By the general rule of law the omission to demand payment from the maker when the note becomes payable, and to give notice to the indorser that payment has been refused, discharges the indorser." As applied to bills of exchange, the rule "requires this notice, not merely as an indemnity against actual injury, but as a security against a possible injury which may result from the laches of the holder of the bill. * * * A drawer who has no effects in the hands of the drawee is said to be without the reason of the rule, and therefore to form an exception to it." But this is doubtful, "except in cases where, in point of fact, the drawer had no right to expect that his bill would be honored, and could sustain no injury by the neglect of the holder to give notice of its being dishonored. In reason, it would seem that in such cases only can the exception be admitted, and that the necessity of notice ought to be dispensed with only in those cases where notice must be unnecessary, or immaterial to the drawer." "However * * * the law may be with regard to the drawer of a bill of exchange who from other circumstances may fairly draw, but who has no effects in the hands of the drawer, it seems settled in England, * * * that the law with regard to a promissory note is different, and that if, in any case where the note is made for the benefit of the maker, notice to the indorser can be dispensed with, it is only in the case of an insolvency known at the time of indorsement. In point of reason, justice, and the nature of the undertaking, there is no case in which the indorser is better entitled to demand strict notice than in the case of an indorsement for accommodation, the maker having received the value."]

Case No. 868.

BANK OF COLUMBIA v. GALLOWAY.

[3 Cranch, C. C. 353.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. Term, 1828.

LANDLORD AND TENANT—RENT—EVICTION.

1. In an action for use and occupation, if the rent be payable quarterly, the plaintiff may recover rent to the end of the quarter preceding the eviction, but not for the part of the quarter during which the eviction was.

2. The same principle applies when the rent is payable yearly.

At law. Action on the case, for use and occupation.

THE COURT (nem. con.) instructed the jury, that if they should be satisfied by the evidence, that the rent was payable quarterly, the plaintiffs might recover rent to the end of the quarter preceding the eviction, but not for the part of the quarter during which the eviction was. And if the rent was payable yearly, the plaintiffs could not recover in this action for the year during which the eviction occurred; and that the plaintiffs could not recover rent which accrued after their assignment of the lease.

BANK OF COLUMBIA v. HYATT et al.

[4 Cranch, C. C. 38.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May Term, 1830.

LIMITATION OF ACTIONS—PLEADING—ASSUMPSIT—JOINT DEFENDANTS — CONTINUANCE — AMENDMENT

1. The defendant will not be permitted to plead the statute of limitations after the expiration of the rule to plead.

2. If one, only, of two joint defendants, be taken, who pleads non assumpsit, and issue be joined thereon, and the defendant taken offers ready for trial, at the trial term, the plaintiff has not a right to continue the cause until the other defendant be taken, but must amend his declaration by suggesting or averring that the other defendant is not yet taken; and upon such amendment the defendant may have leave to plead de novo.

At law. Assumpsit [by Bank of Columbia] against [Alpheus J.] Hyatt and D. Wilson upon their joint indorsement, in the name of the firm, of Harding's note for $172.50. Hyatt only having been taken, pleaded non assumpsit and the statute of limitations on the 4th of December, 1828, the rule to plead having expired on the first Monday of November, 1828.

Mr. Lear, for the plaintiffs, moved the court to reject the plea of limitations because it was too late.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent) rejected the plea.

The defendant then pleaded non assumpsit,

upon which issue was joined, and offered himself ready for trial.

The declaration was joint, and contained no suggestion that one of the defendants had not been taken.

Mr. Lear declined making the suggestion, and contended that he had a right to continue the cause until the other defendant should be taken, and moved for a continuance on that ground.

But THE COURT refused, and intimated that the plaintiffs were bound now to amend their declaration by adding the suggestion, or to become nonsuit; and that, if the declaration be now so amended, the defendant taken might have leave to plead de novo.

The plaintiffs then had leave to amend their declaration, and the defendant to plead de novo, who thereupon pleaded the statute of limitations; and the plaintiffs, at the next term, entered a non-pros. See Tidd, Pr. 326, 327; Barnes, Notes Cas. 396, 401; Tidd, 125, 362.

BANK OF COLUMBIA v. JONES.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 516.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. Term, 1824.

LIMITATION OF ACTIONS—PLEADING—MISNOMER OF PLAINTIFFS IN MARGIN.

If the plaintiffs are misnamed, in the title of the cause, in the margin of a plea of limitations, the plea is bad on special demurrer.

[Overruled in Bank of Columbia v. Ott's Adm'rs, Case No. 878.]

At law. The plea of limitations, in this cause, was entitled, in the margin of the paper, "The President and Directors of the Bank of Columbia v. Richard Jones."

The plaintiffs demurred, and assigned for cause, that the plaintiffs, stated in the said plea, and whose declaration the said plea purports to answer, are stated to be "The President and Directors of the Bank of Columbia," whereas the plaintiffs in this suit, and whose declaration the said plea ought to have answered, are, "The President, Directors, and Company of the Bank of Columbia;" so that the said plea does not reply to, and is no answer to, the declaration of the plaintiffs in this cause.

Mr. Key and Mr. Dunlop, for plaintiffs.
Mr. Marbury, for defendant.

THE COURT (CRANCH, Chief Judge, contra) was of opinion that the names of the parties stated in the margin were to be considered as part of the plea, and made important by the special demurrer, and that the titling of the cause in the margin would make a part of the record, and adjudged the plea to be bad.

This decision was, afterwards, at this term, overruled, in the case of Bank of Columbia v. Ott's Adm'rs, [Case No. 878.]

Case No. 871.

BANK OF COLUMBIA v. KING.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 570.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May Term, 1825.

NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS—DEATH OF INDORSER—NOTICE OF NON-PAYMENT.

1. If the indorser of a note payable on the 8th–11th of October die intestate on the 9th, notice of non-payment left with his son at the counting-house of the deceased on the 11th is sufficient.

[See Bank of Washington v. Reynolds, Case No. 954.]

2. If the note become payable on the 15th–18th of October, a like notice left on the 18th is sufficient, no administration having been granted before that day.

3. But if the note become payable on the 22d–25th of October, a like notice left at the same place on the 25th is not sufficient, the administrator having a separate place of business in another part of the town.

At law. Assumpsit [by Bank of Columbia] against the administrator of [George King,] the indorser of several promissory notes, made by Wharton & Grindage.

One of the notes became payable on the 11th of October, 1821, for $2,565; that being the last day of grace. George King, the defendant's intestate, died on the 9th, and was buried on the 11th, on which day notice of non-payment was left with a son of George King in the counting-house occupied by him as his place of business up to the day of his death. This was a warehouse in the lower story of the dwelling-house in which George King died, and in which his family continued to reside. The son, with whom the notice was left, was of full age, and had sometimes transacted business for his father in that warehouse.

THE COURT (nem. con.) said the notice was sufficient.

Another note became payable on the 15th–18th of October, 1821, for $1,026. A like notice was left in that manner at the same place, on the 18th and 19th of October. Administration was granted to the defendant on the 18th.

Mr. Marbury objected that this notice was not sufficient to charge the defendant, and cited the case of Bank of Washington v. Reynolds, in this court at April term, 1822, [Case No. 954.]

But THE COURT overruled the objection.

A third note became payable on the 22d–25th of October, 1821, for $950. The administrator kept a counting-house, in which he transacted the business of the estate, at another part of the town, but the notice was left in the same manner as the other notices.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

THE COURT (nem. con.) said it was sufficient notice to charge the defendant.

Mr. Marbury again contended, in regard to the note due 15th–18th October, that as a notice on the 19th, (the day after the last day of grace,) would not have been too late, and as administration had been granted on the 18th, notice should have been given to the administrator on the 19th.

But THE COURT (nem. con.) said that the plaintiffs, having done all that they were bound to do on the 18th of October, (the last day of grace,) were not bound to give a notice to the administrator on the 19th.

BANK OF COLUMBIA v. LAWRENCE.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 510.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. Term, 1824.[2]

NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS—INDORSER—NOTICE OF DISHONOR—PLACE OF BUSINESS—LOCAL USAGE.

1. If the endorser of a note dated at Georgetown, District of Columbia, and held by a bank in that town, resides in the country two or three miles from the bank, but has a house or place of business within half a mile of the bank, where it was generally known, and especially known to the runner of the bank, that he kept his account books and received his ordinary bank notices, newspapers and foreign letters, &c., a notice left for him at the post-office in Georgetown, and directed to him at Georgetown, although that was his nearest post-office, and the one from which he usually received his letters which came by the mail, is not a sufficient notice to charge him as indorser, unless conformable to a well-established usage of the bank known to the defendant at the time of his indorsement.

[See note at end of case.]

2. If, at the time of the indorsement of the note, which was made negotiable at the bank, it was the general usage of the banks and notaries in the District of Columbia to give notice to the indorsers on the day after the last day of grace, and such usage was known to the defendant, at the time of his indorsement, he is bound by such usage, and the notice so given is in due time.

[See Bank of Alexandria v. Wilson, Case No. 856.]

At law. Assumpsit [by the Bank of Columbia] against the indorser [Lawrence] of Joseph Milligan's promissory note for $5,000, at sixty days, negotiable in the bank of Columbia, payable on the 13th–16th of April, 1819, and dated at Georgetown.

By the bill of exceptions in this case, it appears that evidence was offered, that the defendant, who was a morocco leather-dresser, and owned a house in the city of Washington, where he had his shop, removed, in the year 1818, into the country, in the county of Alexandria, where he lived, at the time of indorsing the note, and when it became payable, and that the Georgetown post-office was the post-office nearest to his residence, being two or three miles distant, and the one at which he usually received his letters which came by the mail. That the notice of non-payment was put into the Georgetown post-office, addressed to the defendant "Georgetown," and that such was the generally known usage of the banks when indorsers resided out of the town; and that such usage was known to the defendant. That the defendant continued to own the house in Washington, which was only a quarter of a mile from Georgetown, where the plaintiff's banking-house was situated, and permitted his sister, Mrs. Harbaugh, to occupy it without rent, and came regularly every week, two or three days in each week, to the said house, where he kept his book of accounts, and received his ordinary bank notices, his newspapers, and foreign letters, and where he was employed in winding up his former business and settling his accounts; and that his so coming to town, and so employing himself, at such times, at the said house, was generally known to persons having business with the defendant, and to the runner of the Bank of Columbia.

Whereupon the plaintiffs prayed the court to instruct the jury, that it was not incumbent on the plaintiffs to have left the notice of non-payment at the house occupied by Mrs. Harbaugh, but that it was sufficient to leave it at the post-office in Georgetown; which instruction, the court, being divided, (CRANCH, Chief Judge, absent,) did not give.

And thereupon, the defendant prayed, &c., that the notice so given was not sufficient to charge the defendant; which instruction the court, (being divided,) did not give.

The case was, afterwards, in the same term, brought before a full court, when the following authorities were cited or consulted: Bank of U. S. v. Norwood, 1 Har. & J. 423; Lenox v. Roberts, 2 Wheat. [15 U. S.] 377; Bussard v. Levering, 6 Wheat. [19 U. S.] 102; Lindenberger v. Bell, Id. 104; M'Gruder v. Bank of Washington, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 600. The demand need not be personal; it is sufficient if made at his place of abode, or generally, "at the place where he ought to be found." Ireland v. Kip, 10 Johns. 490, 11 Johns. 231; Chit. Bills, 288; Freeman v. Boynton, 7 Mass. 483.

January 12, 1825, CRANCH, Chief Judge, delivered the opinion of the court, (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, dissenting.)

The first question is, would the notice, left at the post-office in Georgetown, if it had been left in due time, and if the defendant had not had a place of business or counting-house in Washington, have been sufficient? Upon this point we are referred to the case of the Bank of U. S. v. Norwood, in 1 Har.

[2] [Reversed in 1 Pet. (26 U. S.) 578.]

& J. 423, a case which I have not seen lately, but which I believe decided that notice, (to an indorser living in the vicinity of Baltimore, and to whom the post-office at Baltimore was the nearest post-office,) put into the post-office at Baltimore, was good, the indorser having no known place of business or counting-house in Baltimore, or elsewhere, near any other post-office; it having been proved to be the usage of merchants in Baltimore, to give notice in that manner, in like cases; and the knowledge of such usage having been brought home to the indorser, at the time of his indorsement. In general, if the holder and the indorser live in the same town, (and, by parity of reason, I should suppose, within the same post-office district,) notice left at the post-office is not sufficient. The general rule is, that the notice must be personal, or left at the defendant's usual place of abode, or place of transacting his mercantile business, or "the place where he ought to be found." M'Gruder v. Bank of Washington, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 600. In order to justify the leaving of notice at any other place than the usual place of abode, it must be a place which the defendant has agreed to substitute for his place of abode, pro hac vice, or for receiving notices; and his agreement may be inferred from circumstances, such as its being the place where he usually transacts his mercantile business, receives and pays money, keeps his accounts, &c. The post-office is not such a place. For the convenience of trade, his agreement has been presumed, to receive, at the post-office, all communications which come by mail, from a distance; but the same reason does not exist, as to communications from persons residing in the same place or neighborhood; and therefore his assent to receive such communications at the post-office cannot be inferred; and certainly no such inference can be drawn, if the defendant have another known and regular place of transacting such business elsewhere. The strictness with which notice is required by the mercantile world, is evidence of the importance which they attach to it; and if actual notice be important, it is dangerous to multiply constructive or implied notices. But it is important to the indorser to have notice as soon as possible; he is therefore presumed to assent that such notice, if coming from a distance, shall be given by mail, because that is, in general, the most expeditious and convenient mode of giving it; but with respect to notices from his own immediate neighborhood, where no mail runs, information left at the post-office, is not the most expeditious nor the most certain, nor always the most convenient mode of giving notice. In many post-offices the mail is received only once or twice a week, and it is only on mail days that it is expected that anybody will call for letters. A notice might remain uncalled for, in the office, several days, whereas, it might, perhaps, be given by a messenger in an hour.

Upon general reasoning, therefore, I should conclude that when the parties reside in the same place, (meaning thereby a place where the same post-office is the post-office nearest to the residence of both parties, and between whose respective places of residence there is no communication by mail,) it is not sufficient to leave a notice at the post-office. Such, however, is stated to be the usage of the plaintiffs' bank, and the other banks in this district, and the defendant having been a dealer in the plaintiffs' bank, may be presumed it is supposed, to have had a knowledge of such usage at the time of his indorsement of the note, and to have agreed to be bound thereby. But it is not clear that the usage, given in evidence, applies to a case where the indorser has a place of business known to one at least of the officers of the plaintiffs' bank, and generally known to persons having business with the indorser and in the immediate vicinity of the holder of the note. If it does not apply to such a case, then the usage that he assented to, does not embrace his case. It is only the defendant's consent to the usage that can bind him; and it is not material that one of the plaintiffs' officers did not know the fact which would exclude this case from the scope of the usage relied upon. If banks will rely on usages contrary to the general law of the land, they must do it at the risk of clearly establishing such usages, and bringing their cases clearly within them. It would be with extreme reluctance that the court would decide against a claim of such importance upon so nice a point of law. But established principles must be maintained; and we must not, because the debt is large, sanction a looseness of practice that may unsettle the system of mercantile law. Taking the general rule to be, that, when the parties reside in the same place, (understanding thereby the same post-office district, if I may use the expression, where the regular communication from one of the parties to the other cannot be by mail,) the notice must be personal, or left at the dwelling house, or place of business of the party to be charged by the notice. Ireland v. Kip, 10 Johns. 490, 11 Johns. 231; Freeman v. Boynton, 7 Mass. 483. The right of the plaintiffs to give notice through the post-office at Georgetown, must depend upon the agreement, express or implied, of the defendant to receive notice in that way; and

The court is of opinion, that if the jury should be satisfied by the evidence, that the usage of the Bank of Columbia, and of the other banks above referred to, was, at the time of the defendant's indorsing the said note, and for a long time before, such as is above stated in the statement of the evidence, notwithstanding the party to be charged, should have a place of business such as is stated in the said statement of the evidence, generally known as therein stated, and known to one of the plaintiffs' officers as therein stated, then, from the fact that the defendant was a dealer in the Bank of Columbia in the manner stated in the said statement of evidence, the jury may infer that he had, at the time of endorsing the said note, a knowledge of such usage; and from such knowledge, may, in the absence of contradictory evidence, infer that he assented to be bound by such usage, and to receive notice in that way; and if the jury should so infer, and should believe the other facts stated in the said statement of evidence to be true as therein stated, then the said notice so left at the Georgetown post-office as aforesaid, is sufficient to charge the defendant in this action as indorser of the note. But if, from the said evidence the jury should be satisfied that the said usage did not extend to indorsers having such place of business in the city of Washington, and known as aforesaid, and should believe the other facts to be as stated in the said statement of evidence, then the said notice so left at the Georgetown post-office as aforesaid, is not sufficient to charge the defendant in this action as indorser of the said note.

And the court further instructed the jury, that if they believe from the evidence, (evidence having been offered to that effect,) that it was at the time of the indorsement aforesaid, the general usage of the said banks and notaries, in the District of Columbia, to give notice to indorsers of the non-payment of a note or bill, on the day after the last day of grace, and that the defendant was a dealer in the said banks as aforesaid, then it is competent for them to infer that the defendant knew of, and consented to such usage; and that if the jury should be satisfied by the said evidence that such notice was given to the defendant of the demand and non-payment of the said note on the day next after the said last day of grace, it was given in sufficient time to charge the defendant in this action. To the refusal of the court (upon the division) to give the instructions prayed respectively by the plaintiffs and the defendant, as well as to the first instruction given, both parties excepted.

The verdict and judgment were for the defendant. Judgment reversed by the supreme court. [Bank of Columbia v. Lawrence,] 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 578.

[NOTE. This decision was reversed, and a venire facias de novo awarded by the United States supreme court. Bank of Columbia v. Lawrence, 1 Pet. (26 U. S.) 578. Mr. Justice Thompson, in delivering the opinion, said: "The evidence does not show that the defendant had a place of business in the city of Washington, according to the usual commercial understanding of a place of business. There was no public notoriety of any description given to it as such. No open or public business of any kind carried on, but merely occasional employment there, two or three times a week, in a house occupied by another person; and the defendant only engaged in settling up his own business. * * * The general rule is that the party whose duty is to give notice in such cases is bound to use due diligence in communicating such notice. * * * When the facts are ascertained and undisputed, what shall constitute due diligence is a question of law. * * * When the party to be affected by the notice resides in a different place from the holder, the notice may be sent by the mail to the post-office nearest to the party entitled to such notice. * * * If he were in the habit of receiving his letters through a more distant post-office, and that circumstance was known to the holder or party giving the notice, that might be the proper channel of communication. * * * In cases where the party entitled to notice resides in the country, unless notice sent by mail is sufficient, a special messenger must be employed for the purpose of serving it. And we think that the present case is clearly one which does not impose upon the plaintiffs such duty."]

Case No. 873.

BANK OF COLUMBIA v. MACKALL.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 631.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. Term, 1825.

NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS — NON-PAYMENT PROTEST—EVIDENCE OF NOTARY'S DEPUTY—WAIVER OF NOTICE.

1. The declarations of the notary's deputy cannot be given in evidence.

2. The defendant, who was a notary-public, was the indorser of a note for $3,000, made by his son B. F. Mackall, who had conveyed to him, in trust, sufficient property for his indemnity. The note was payable in the plaintiff's bank, but no funds were there to pay it when payable. The note was, on the last day of grace, delivered to the defendant's son Brooke Mackall, who was his deputy-notary, with other notes, for demand and notice, and was returned to the bank with the other notes. The defendant afterwards sold the property, under the deed of trust, for stock in the plaintiff's bank, and offered it to the bank, at par, in payment of the note. But the bank refused to receive it; held that the jury may infer notice, or waiver of notice; but the delivery of the note to the deputy-notary, was not, per se, notice to the defendant.

3. The waiver of objection to the want of notice may be after the laches, as well as before.

At law. Assumpsit [by Bank of Columbia] against [Leonard Mackall] the indorser of B. F. Mackall's note for $3,000, due 31st May, 1821, payable at the Bank of Columbia. The defendant was the notary-public generally employed by the plaintiffs to demand payment of notes and give notice to the indorsers. His son, Brooke Mackall, was his deputy-notary, and transacted most of his notarial business. The defendant's note was delivered to his said deputy on the last day of grace, for demand and notice.

Mr. Key, for the plaintiffs, offered to give in evidence the declarations of the deputy-notary at the time he returned the note to the bank as to his giving notice to the defendant.

But THE COURT (nem. con.) refused to permit them to be given in evidence.

Mr. Jones, for the defendant, prayed the court to instruct the jury, that the plaintiffs could not recover upon the evidence, which consisted of the making and indorsement of the note; the delivery of the note on the third day of grace to the defendant's deputy (who was also his son and lived in his family) for demand and notice; a deed of trust by the maker of the note to the defendant, of sufficient property to indemnify him. The sale of the property by the defendant, for stock in the plaintiff's bank, and his offer to pay the note in the said stock at par, which was not worth 30 per cent.; and the plaintiff's refusal to accept it. When the note became payable, it was in the bank, and the officers of the bank were there ready to receive payment, but there were no funds of the maker there to pay it.

THE COURT (nem. con.) refused to instruct the jury that the plaintiffs could not recover upon that evidence, and instructed them that if they believed the facts to be as stated, no other or further demand of payment was necessary to be made of the maker of the note; and that they might infer that due notice of the nonpayment was given to the defendant, or that he had waived the objection arising from the want of notice.

Mr. Jones, then prayed the court to instruct the jury, that it is necessary for the plaintiffs, in order to entitle themselves to recover in this action, to prove, in addition to the regular demand of payment of the said note at the said bank on the last day of grace, that the defendant was on that day, or the next, duly notified of the dishonor of the said note, and of the intention of the plaintiffs to hold him liable for the same as indorser; and further, that the delivery of the note to the deputy-notary for notice and protest (if such be found by the jury to be the fact,) was not, under the circumstances stated, notice to the defendant; but that it was still necessary, in order to charge the defendant as such indorser, that he should have received from his said deputy actual notice of the dishonor of the said note, and of his being held liable for the same.

Whereupon the court instructed the jury that the said delivery of the said note to the deputy of the notary as aforesaid, and under the circumstances aforesaid, was not per se, notice to the defendant of the non-payment of the said note; and the court refused to give the other part of the instruction.

Mr. Jones then prayed the court to instruct the jury, that in order to enable the plaintiffs to recover in this action, to prove such actual notice to the defendant; or that the defendant should, with a distinct knowledge of his right to require such notice, have at the time of the said note being demanded, or before, waived such notice, and discharged the plaintiffs from the duty of giving the same.

Which instruction the court refused to give; being of opinion, that it is competent for the plaintiffs to show that the defendant waived the objection arising from the want of notice, after laches of the plaintiffs had occurred; and that from the evidence aforesaid, the jury, if they should believe the same, may infer such waiver.

Case No. 874.

BANK OF COLUMBIA v. McKENNY.

[3 Cranch, C. C. 361.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. Term, 1828.

NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS — TIME OF PROTEST — USAGE OF BANK — KNOWLEDGE OF INDORSER — BELIEF OF WITNESS—ADMISSIBILITY.

1. The belief of a witness, together with the facts upon which that belief is founded, is admissible evidence to the jury.

2. In June, 1819, the practice of the Bank of Columbia was, not to give out notes for protest until 3 o'clock, P. M., on the third day of grace.

3. The time for demand, notice, and protest of a promissory note discounted at a bank, depends upon the custom of the bank; and a person who indorses such a note, with the knowledge of the custom, is bound thereby.

[See Bank of Alexandria v. Wilson, Case No. 856.]

At law. Assumpsit [by the Bank of Columbia] against [Samuel McKenny,] the indorser of a promissory note, dated June 24, 1819, at 60 days.

Mr. Coxe and Mr. Marbury, for the defendant, objected to the question proposed to the notary who protested the note, whether from his recollection of the practice of the bank in giving out the notes for protest on the third day of grace, the date of the protest as stated in his notarial book was not a mistake, the date being on the second day of grace. The practice of the bank was, not to give out notes for protest until 3 o'clock, P. M., on the third day of grace.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, contra) was of opinion that the belief of the witness, accompanied by the facts upon which that belief was founded, was admissible in evidence to the jury.

Mr. Marbury, for the defendant; when a custom is once clearly proved and established, it is not necessary to prove it again in a subsequent suit. Raborg v. Bank of Columbia, 1 Har. & G. 237; Bank of Columbia v. Fitzhugh, Id. 248.

Mr. Coxe, for the defendant, then prayed the court to instruct the jury, that they "must be satisfied by the evidence, that the note was protested and notice given to the indorser on the fourth day of grace."

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, contra) refused.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, doubting or dissenting) instructed the jury,

that if they should be satisfied by the evidence that before and until the June term of this court, 1818, it was the custom of the Bank of Columbia, and the other banks in this district, to demand payment of notes discounted in such banks, not before the fourth day after the day limited for the payment thereof on the face of the notes, and to give notice on the said fourth day, and that such usage was generally known, the jury may infer that this defendant, when he indorsed the note, had reference to such usage, and if they should so infer, then the said demand of payment of the said note by the maker thereof, and notice to the defendant of the nonpayment thereof made and given on the 25th and 26th of August, 1819, were too soon, and did not make the defendant liable in this action as indorser of the said note; unless the jury should be satisfied by the evidence, that the custom and usage of the said bank, after the said June term, 1818, was so changed as to require payment of such notes to be demanded on the third day and notice of nonpayment given to indorsers on the fourth day after the day limited for the payment thereof on the face of the said notes, and that such change of the said custom of the said banks came to the knowledge of the defendant before, and was known to him at the time of his indorsement of the note upon which this suit is brought; in which case he may be presumed to have so indorsed in reference to the said last-mentioned custom; and if the jury should so find, then a demand of payment on the third day, and notice as aforesaid made and given on the fourth day after the day of payment expressed on the face of the note, were not too soon.

BANK OF COLUMBIA v. MOORE.

[3 Cranch, C. C. 292.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May Term, 1828.

WRITS—EXECUTION WITHOUT JUDGMENT BY BANK OF COLUMBIA—LIMITATION OF ACTIONS—RUNNING OF STATUTE.

The issuing of the execution by the Bank of Columbia, under the act of Maryland of 1793, (chapter 30,) is the commencement of the action in regard to the statute of limitations.

[See Bank of Columbia v. Baker, Case No. 862.]

At law. This was a fieri facias issued [against James Moore] by order of the president of the Bank of Columbia under its charter of 1793, (chapter 30,) without a judgment. The defendant pleaded non assumpsit within three years next before the commencement of this suit.

Mr. Key, for the plaintiff, contended that the demand of payment, which was a necessary preliminary to the issuing of the execution, was the commencement of the suit The demand was made five days before the expiration of the three years, but the bank could not issue the execution until ten days after the demand, which was five days after the expiration of the three years.

THE COURT (nem. con.) said that the issuing of the execution was the commencement of the suit.

Verdict for the defendant.

Motion for new trial, for misdirection of the jury by the court upon this point, overruled, but a new trial was granted upon affidavit of newly-discovered evidence. [See Bank of Columbia v. Moore, Case No. 876.]

BANK OF COLUMBIA v. MOORE.

[3 Cranch, C. C. 663.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. Term, 1829.[2]

STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS — ACKNOWLEDGMENT TO A STRANGER.

The court refused to instruct the jury, that the casual acknowledgment of the debt to a stranger is not such an acknowledgment as was sufficient to take the debt out of the statute of limitations.

[See note at end of case.]

At law. Assumpsit upon the defendant's promissory note, payable to G. Docker, or order, and by him indorsed to plaintiffs. [For opinion at prior hearing, see Bank of Columbia v. Moore, Case No. 875.] Upon the plea of limitations, the plaintiffs' witness testified that he overheard the defendant [James Moore] say to his companions, who were no parties to the note, that he owed no debt, excepting one $500 note to the Bank of Columbia.

Whereupon Mr. Jones, for the defendant, prayed the court to instruct the jury, that the evidence aforesaid did not import such an acknowledgment of the debt in question, as was sufficient to take it out of the statute of limitations.

Which instruction THE COURT (CRANCH, Circuit Judge, contra) refused to give, and the jury rendered their verdict for the plaintiffs.

The defendant's counsel moved for a new trial, on the ground of error, in refusing the instruction; but the court, believing that the justice of the case was with the plaintiffs, refused to grant it.

The counsel for the defendant then applied to the chief justice, MARSHALL, and obtained a writ of error to the supreme court, where the judgment was reversed, in 1832. See [Moore v. Bank of Columbia,] 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 86.

[NOTE. The witness accidentally overheard the defendant say that he was clear of debt,

[2] [Reversed in 6 Pet. (31 U. S.) 86.]

"except one damned five hundred in the Bank of Columbia, which I can pay at any time." Mr. Circuit Justice Thompson, in delivering the opinion of the United States supreme court reversing this decision, (Moore v. Bank of Columbia, 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 86,) said: "The declarations of the defendant below were vague and indeterminate, leading to no certain conclusion, and at best to probable inference only; and, indeed, if unexplained by any other evidence, they were senseless. It is left uncertain even whether the conversation referred to the note in question. The evidence that this was the only five hundred dollar note of his lying over in the bank might afford a plausible conjecture that this was the one alluded to. But that is not enough, according to the rule laid down in Bell v. Morrison, 1 Pet. (26 U. S.) 352, nor is there any direct admission of a present subsisting debt due. The epithet which accompanied the declaration would well admit of a contrary conclusion, and that there were some circumstances attending it that would lead him to resist payment. The assertion of his ability to pay is no promise to pay. The whole declarations, taken together, do not amount either to an explicit promise to pay, made in terms unequivocal and determinate, or disclose circumstances from which an implied promise may fairly be presumed; one or the other of which this court has said is necessary to take the case out of the statute. The court below, therefore, erred in not giving the instructions prayed for by the defendant."]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. Term, 1824.

PLEADING—MISNOMER OF A CAUSE IN MARGIN OF PLEA

The title of the cause written in the margin of a plea is no part of the plea, but is only an intimation to the clerk in what cause he is to enter the plea; and a mistake in the name of one of the parties in the cause, made in the marginal title, is not fatal to the plea, even upon special demurrer.

The defendants pleaded the statute of limitations. [See subsequent hearing in such plea. Bank of Columbia v. Ott, Case No. 879.] The name of the plaintiffs, in the margin, or at the head of the plea, was "The President and Directors of the Bank of Columbia," whereas the corporate name of the plaintiffs was "The President, Directors and Company of the Bank of Columbia." The plaintiffs demurred specially to the plea, and assigned the same cause of demurrer as in the case of the same plaintiffs against Richard Jones, at the present term, [Case No. 870.]

Mr. Marbury, for the defendant, notwithstanding the decision of the court in that case, was permitted to argue the point again. He contended that the names of the parties in the margin do not constitute any part of the plea. 1 Chitty, 528; Dale v. Beer, 7 East, 333; Dyer v. Stevens, 6 Mass. 389.

Messrs. Key & Dunlop, contra, cited 1 Chitty, 527, 528, 645, 656; Roberts v. Moon, 5 Term R. 487.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, contra) decided that the plea was good, considering the titling as no part of the plea, but an indication to the clerk in what cause he is to enter the plea; overruling the case of Bank of Columbia v. Jones, [supra,] at this term.

NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS—ACTION AGAINST INDORSER—PLEADING—LIMITATIONS.

In an action against the indorser of a promissory note, payable sixty days after date, non assumpsit infra tres annos is a bad plea upon general demurrer; it ought to be actio non accrevit.

[See Ferris v. Williams, Case No. 4,750; Union Bank of Georgetown v. Eliason, Id. 14,355.]

At law. Assumpsit against the administrator of [John Ott] the indorser of a promissory note, payable in sixty days after date. The defendant had pleaded "non assumpsit infra tres annos," to which the plaintiff demurred generally. [See this case at last term. Bank of Columbia v. Ott, Case No. 878.]

Mr. J. Dunlop contends that the plea is bad upon general demurrer, because the note, being payable in sixty days after date, the plea ought to have averred that the cause of action did not accrue within three years, whereas it only avers that the defendant did not promise within three years. 2 Saund. 63c, which cites Gould v. Johnson, 2 Salk. 422, 2 Ld. Raym. 838; Puckle v. Moor, 1 Vent. 191; Birks v. Trippet, 1 Saund. 33, note 2; Bull. N. P. 151.

Mr. Marbury, contra. This is an action against the indorser, whose liability did not accrue until after the note became payable; and the declaration avers, that in consideration of that liability the defendant promised to pay. It was not debitum in presenti, solvendum in futuro.

Mr. Key, in reply. The plea does not relate to the implied promise which the law raises, and which is averred in the declaration as arising from the facts previously averred. The indorser makes a conditional promise at the time he indorses. The promise relates back to the time of the indorsement. The promise of the maker is stated in the same way, namely, "by reason whereof, and by force of the statute," &c. The liability of the indorser upon his original undertaking and the plaintiff's right of action did not accrue until sixty days after the promise; so that the promise may have been beyond the time of limitation, and the right of action within it.

THE COURT, after consideration, (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, contra,) was of opinion that the plea of "non assumpsit infra tres annos," pleaded by the indorser of a promissory note payable sixty days after date, was bad, upon general demurrer. It ought to have been actio non accrevit.

PLEADING—GENERAL ISSUE—GENERAL DEMURRER—PLEA IN ABATEMENT.

The court will not suffer the general issue to be struck out to give the defendant leave to plead in abatement.

On the day set for trial of this cause, Mr. Caldwell [for G. BANK OF COLUMBIA v. SWEENY.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 704.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May Term, 1826.[2]

WRITS—EXECUTION WITHOUT JUDGMENT—PLEA OF LIMITATION—CHARTER OF BANK OF COLUMBIA.

Upon the return of an execution issued by the president of the Bank of Columbia, without a judgment, under the 14th section of its charter of 1793, if the defendant disputes the debt, the court will order an issue to be made up, and will permit the defendant to plead the statute of limitations.

[See Bank of Columbia v. Cook, Case No. 864.]

At law. Upon the return of a ca. sa. issued by order of the president of the Bank of Columbia, under the 14th section of its charter, of 1793, c. 30, without a previous judgment, the defendant [George Sweeny] having disputed the debt, the court ordered an issue to be made up between the parties, and for that purpose required the plaintiffs to file their declaration within —— days, and the defendant to plead thereto within three days after notice of filing the declaration. Whereupon the plaintiffs filed their declaration in assumpsit as upon a wager that the debt claimed was due; to which the defendant pleaded the general issue, and offered to plead the statute of limitations, namely, that the defendant did not assume at any time "within three years next before the commencement of this suit;" and that the plaintiffs' cause of action "did not accrue at any time within three years next before the commencement of this suit." To the filing of the plea of limitations the plaintiffs objected. [Objection overruled. Plea of limitations subsequently filed. For opinion on hearing of plea, see Bank of Columbia v. Sweeny, Case No. 882.] By the 14th section of the charter of 1793, c. 30, "if the defendant shall dispute the debt, or any part of it," the court is required to "order an issue to be joined and trial had," at the return term of the execution. [See opinion of Chief Justice Marshall on application for a mandamus to compel the court to have issue joined. Bank of Columbia v. Sweeny, 1 Pet. (26 U. S.) 567.]

Mr. Key and Mr. Jones, for the plaintiffs, contended that the charter only allowed the defendant, at the return of the execution, to dispute the debt. The plea of limitations does not dispute the debt; it only goes to bar the remedy by certain forms of action. Pearsall v. Dwight, 2 Mass. 84; Esp. N. P. 563; [Lindo v. Gardner,] 1 Cranch, [5 U. S.] 343, [1 Cranch,] Append. 465. And this is not one of the forms of action to which the statute applies. Indeed, this is not an action; but if it is, it is not one of those enumerated in the statute. The debt remains for every purpose except that of supporting any of the forms of action barred by the statute. This is a new remedy given by the charter, and is obligatory upon those only who have voluntarily subjected themselves to it, by making their notes "negotiable in the Bank of Columbia." If this is to be considered as an action, the plaintiffs' right of action did not accrue until the president of the bank had made a personal demand upon the defendant, according to the forms prescribed in the charter. The charter only allows the defendant to plead to the debt, not to the action. The order of the president of the bank to the clerk of the court to issue the execution is equivalent to a judgment; and the charter declares that it shall be as valid as any execution issued upon a judgment of a court. The statute of limitations applies only to such forms of action as were then in existence; but this is a new remedy, and not within the prohibition of the statute.

[2] [Affirmed in 2 Pet. (27 U. S.) 671.]

Mr. Swann and Mr. Ashton, contra. The charter only meant to give a speedy trial at the first term, and to enable the plaintiffs to obtain security in the first instance, without waiting the slow process of the common law. It did not mean to deprive the defendant of any defence which he might have if sued in any other form. The statute is a bar to the debt. Hellings v. Shaw, 2 Taunt, 237, [7 Taunt. 608.]

CRANCH, Circuit Judge, after stating the case, and the provisions of the 14th section of the charter, delivered the opinion of the court, as follows, (nem. con.:)

The expressions in the 14th section of the charter seem to imply that there should be a declaration in some of the usual forms of action. The plaintiffs, in the present case, have selected the action of assumpsit. So far as regards the trial, it is not important by what sort of process the defendant is brought into court. There is nothing in the act of 1793, c. 30, (the charter of the bank,) which expressly deprives him of any ground of defence which he would have had, if he had been brought in by the ordinary process of capias ad respondendum, instead of that of capias ad satisfaciendum. When brought in he has a right to dispute the debt, and to have a full and fair trial. The object of the summary remedy is to prevent delay, and to enable the bank to obtain security; not to deprive the defendant of the means of defence enjoyed by other debtors. So far as it is summary it is in derogation of common right, and must be construed strictly.

It is true that by the 14th section of the charter, the execution is to be "as valid and effectual in law, to all intents and purposes as if it had issued on a judgment regularly obtained in the ordinary course of proceeding;" and so it is while it exists. But if, upon the trial, it should be found that the plaintiffs ought not to have the execution, the court has the power to quash it. The validity of the execution cannot affect the trial.

But it is said that if this execution be the commencement of an action as seemed to be admitted by Mr. Key, in arguing the case of Bank of Columbia v. Bunnel, in this court at April term, 1822, [Case No. 863,] and the case of Bank of Columbia v. Okely, in the supreme court, and as suggested by Mr. Justice Johnson, in delivering the opinion of the court in the latter case. 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 239,[3] it is not within the description of actions limited by the statute of limitations; which statute affects the remedy only; not the right. To this it may be answered, that no man ought to be deprived of a plain, common right, by doubtful implication or remote inference. The statute of limitations is a general statute. Every man has a right to claim the benefit of it; and some of the wisest judges have said it was a beneficial statute. The prohibition to use it in the present case is doubtful. It is supported only by doubtful inference. The issue to be tried is left to the discretion of the judges, who are required to see "that justice be done in the speediest manner." It cannot be just that a man should be deprived of a lawful defence, unless by his own neglect to avail himself of it in proper time. This is the first time the defendant has had an opportunity to plead the statute; and we cannot say that a defence which has been authorized by law, and in common use for more than a century and a half, is an unjust defence. If the plaintiffs had commenced their action by the usual process, which they had a right to do, this defence would have been clearly open to the defendant, and it is not probable that the legislature intended to leave it to the option of the plaintiffs, whether the defendant should or should not be permitted to avail himself of the statute of limitations. We think, therefore, that the defendant has a right to plead the statute, and ought to be permitted now to file the plea.

Verdict and judgment for the defendant.

[NOTE. This decision was affirmed in Bank of Columbia v. Sweeney, 2 Pet. (27 U. S.) 671. Mr. Chief Justice Marshall, in delivering the opinion, quoted the provision of the Maryland act of incorporation at length, and said: "The execution being the first process under this extraordinary act, its emanation must be equivalent, so far as respects the bar created by the act of limitations, to suing out original process in a suit commenced in the usual way. * * * The great object of the incorporating act appears to have been to give the bank the most expeditious remedy possible for the collection of the money due to it. * * * But the law did not intend, by this summary process, to deprive the debtor of all defense. Although all delay was cut off, he was permitted, on the return of the execution, to dispute the whole, or any part of the debt. But while the law allows him to dispute the debt, it still guards against delay. An issue is to be made up immediately, and tried at the same term. While the law thus carefully guards against procrastination, it does not interfere with the defense which the party is at liberty to set up. It does not prescribe the nature of that defense, or deprive him of any which might have been used, had the action been commenced in the ordinary way. Had the Bank of Columbia proceeded in the common course of law, the defendant could have pleaded the act of limitations in bar of the action. If we are correct in saying that the object of the section of the incorporating act which has been recited was expedition,

[3] See, also, 2 Wms. Saund. 6, note 1: "Whenever the defendant may plead to any writ, whether original or judicial, (as this is) it is in law an action."

not the ademption, of legal defenses, we think this a mode of disputing the debt, of which he might still avail himself."]

STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS—OFFER TO COMPROMISE.

An offer to compromise a debt by payment of one half without interest, is not sufficient to take the case out of the statute of limitations.

[See Ash v. Hayman, Case No. 572; Neil v. Abbott, Id. 10,088.]

This was an execution against the defendant [George Sweeny] issued by order of the president of the Bank of Columbia, under its charter of 1793, c. 30, without a judgment, the execution being the first process in the suit. The defendant pleaded the act of limitations. [See Bank of Columbia v. Sweeny, Case No. 881.] To rebut this plea the plaintiffs offered evidence that, seven years after the note on which the suit was brought, was barred by the statute, the defendant offered to give his note for one half of the amount of the original note, if the bank would relinquish all claim to the balance and interest, and permit him to pay as he should find it convenient. The bank said they would accept the proposition, but their acceptance was never made known to the defendant, and nothing further passed between the parties, until this suit was commenced by execution under the power given by the charter of the bank.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent) was of opinion, and so instructed the jury, that this evidence was not sufficient to take the case out of the statute of limitations.

BANK OF COLUMBIA v. WRIGHT.

WITNESS—OATH AND AFFIRMATION—LAW OF MARYLAND.

By the law of Maryland, witnesses can be permitted to testify upon affirmation, only when they are members of some religious society who profess to be conscientiously scrupulous of taking an oath.

[See King v. Fearson, Case No. 7,790.]

Mr. Daniel Kurtz, being called as a witness for the plaintiffs, objected to taking the usual oath; and said he held the doctrine of the Society of Friends upon that point; but could not say he was a member of that society, but he generally worshipped with them.

The defendant's counsel, Mr. Jones, objected to his giving testimony, otherwise than upon oath. He cannot be permitted to testify upon affirmation, unless he is a member of some society who hold it unlawful to take an oath. Such has been the construction of the law in Maryland. He cited the Bill of Rights of Maryland, § 36, and the Maryland act, 1797, c. 118.

Mr. J. Dunlop, contra. The judiciary act of the United States, § 30, (1 Stat. 73,) authorizes witnesses to be sworn or affirmed. There is no law of the United States, which directs in what cases they shall be sworn, and in what they may affirm.

THE COURT (nem. con.) said they felt bound by the decisions of the Maryland courts upon that statute, (1797, c. 118.) The witness cannot be permitted to testify on affirmation, unless he is a member of a society who profess to be conscientiously scrupulous of taking an oath. The parties agreed to continue the cause, to give time to apply to congress, to amend the law on that subject.

BANKRUPT ACT — MONEY HELD IN TRUST — EQUITABLE ASSIGNMENT—RIGHTS OF HOLDER OF PROTESTED DRAFTS OF BANKRUPT BANK.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the western district of Missouri.

[In bankruptcy. From an unreported decree sustaining a demurrer to the bill, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.]

The only question is as to the sufficiency of the bill of complaint. The allegations in the bill are in substance: That the firm of Leonard, Dunbaugh, & Co. has been duly adjudged bankrupt, and the said Russell duly elected and qualified as the assignee of said firm and of each of its members; that in the months of September and October, 1870, the complainant in the course of its banking business, sent certain notes, amounting in the aggregate to $826.53, to the firm of Leonard, Dunbaugh, & Co., then engaged in the banking business at Pleasant Hill, Missouri, for collection only; that said firm collected the money; that said firm had $2,000 in the Second National Bank in St. Louis, Missouri, on deposit, subject to their draft, and in part payment of the amount collected, sent complainant a draft on the said Second National Bank for $413.16 as a portion of the money collected; and that said draft was presented, payment demanded and refused, and protested; that said assignee has received from the estate of said firm of Leonard, Dunbaugh, & Co. the sum of $82,653, and has the same in possession, and that he has received and has in his possession the said sum of $2,000 so deposited in the said Second National Bank, on which said draft was drawn. It is further averred that the money so collected was collected and received by said firm as the agent of complainant, and in special trust and confidence, and was in no wise a part of the estate of said firm. It is also averred that all the members of said firm, as well as the firm, have been adjudged bankrupt, and that the assets are insufficient to pay the debts, and that complainant is without remedy at law. The prayer is that the said assignee be required to set apart and pay over to complainant the money so collected out of the assets of said firm of Leonard, Dunbaugh, & Co. and for general relief. The plaintiff appeals.

DILLON, Circuit Judge. The bank which files the bill seeks to maintain it on two grounds. The first is that the money collected for it by the bankrupts is money which they held in trust for it, and hence that it did not vest in the assignee.

I am of opinion upon the statements of the bill that this principle does not apply, and that the relation between the bankrupts and the plaintiff at the time of the bankruptcy was simply the relation of debtor and creditor. It does not appear that the identical money collected on the notes was kept by the bankrupts separate and distinct from their other money, and in that shape came into the hands of the assignee. We need not, therefore, consider what would have been the rights of the parties had this been shown.

It is next claimed that the draft drawn by the bankrupts for $413.16 on the Second National Bank, where they had at the time $2,000 on deposit, and which draft was protested, amounted to an equitable assignment of that amount in favor of the plaintiff, and that this equity should be judicially recognized and enforced as against the assignee. If it were assumed or conceded that under any circumstances such a draft can amount to an equitable assignment in favor of the payee of that amount of the drawers' funds in the hands of the drawee, such a principle can not be applied where it would contravene the purpose of the bankrupt act. The plaintiffs, as the holders of the draft drawn by the bankrupts, were simply creditors like other draft-holders, and it would scarcely do to say that when private bankers become insolvent, holders of their bills shall, to the extent of funds in the hands of the drawee, be entitled, as against other creditors, to priority.

Affirmed.

NOTE, [from original report.] An ordinary draft for part of a fund is not an assignment of the fund pro tanto unless assented to, or unless there be an obligation to accept, express or implied. Mandeville v. Welch, 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 277, 286. In relation to ordinary checks on bankers, the same doctrine has been frequently held. Bullard v. Randall, 1 Gray, 605; 2 Pars. Notes & B., 61. And this is the doctrine of the supreme court of the United States. Bank of Republic v. Millard, 10 Wall. [77 U. S.] 152. But as to such checks the contrary has been sometimes held: Fogarties v. President, etc., of State Bank, 12 Rich. Law, 518; Munn v. Burch, 25 Ill. 35; Roberts v. Corbin, 26 Iowa, 315; but it is expressly stated in this last case that the doctrine is limited to checks, and does not extend to bills of exchange: Id. 326. The cases on the subject will be found mostly collected in 2 Parsons on Notes and Bills, 61, and referred to in those above cited. The principle cases are also cited by Mr. Justice Davis, in his opinion in Bank of Republic v. Millard, supra.

land against Henry Willis] for non-payment of certain bills of exchange, drawn at Portland, by one George Willis; one payable to the order of William Willis, and another to the order of Mason Greenwood, on the defendant, and accepted by him. The declaration alleged that all the members of the corporation were citizens of Maine, and the defendant a citizen of Massachusetts. A plea in abatement was put in by the defendant, that one Charles Brooks, of Boston, and a citizen of Massachusetts, was the owner of ten shares of the capital stock, and a corporator of the said Cumberland Bank, at the time of the commencement of the said suit. Demurrer and joinder. [Judgment for defendant.]

Haines, for plaintiff, cited Strawbridge v. Curtiss, 3 Cranch, [7 U. S.] 267, and Gassies v. Ballon, 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 761, as showing, that the courts of the United States ought not to limit their jurisdiction by narrow constructions and limitations, beyond the adjudged cases.

William P. Fessenden, for defendant, cited 1 Kent, Comm. (3d Ed.) Lect. 16, pp. 346, 347; and Smith v. Rines, [Case No. 13,100.]

STORY, Circuit Justice. The plea in abatement in this case is certainly good. It has been repeatedly decided in the courts of the United States, that to entitle a corporation to sue in the circuit courts of the United States, all the members of that corporation must be citizens of some state of the United States, other than that state, of which the defendant is a citizen. And the averments must so be made in the declaration, in order to entitle the court to take jurisdiction of the case. The cases of Hope Ins. Co. v. Boardman, 5 Cranch, [9 U. S.] 57; Bank of U. S. v. Deveaux, Id. 61; Breithaupt v. Bank of Georgia, 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 238; Bingham v. Cabot, 3 Dall. [3 U. S.] 382; Turner v. Enrille, 4 Dall. [4 U. S.] 7; Turner v. Bank of North America, 4 Dall. [4 U. S.] 8; and Strawbridge v. Curtiss, 3 Cranch, [7 U. S.] 267,—are fully in point. Mr. Chancellor Kent, in his learned commentaries, in the passage cited at the bar, (1 Kent, Comm., 3d Ed., Lect. 16, pp. 343–347,) has stated the acknowledged result of the cases in his usual clear and satisfactory manner. It remains, therefore, for this court only to pronounce its judgment, that as it is admitted by the demurrer, that one of the corporators is a citizen of Massachusetts, the same state, of which the defendant is averred to be a citizen, the plea is good in point of law, and the suit must abate for want of jurisdiction.

The district judge concurs in this opinion, and, therefore, there must be a judgment, that the suit be abated, but without costs.

Mr. Walker, for plaintiff.

Mr. Talbott, for defendant.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This action is brought on a bill of exchange, drawn by Louis T. Jamison, dated 21st February, 1837, at Chicago, Illinois, on Richard Oakley, of the city of New York, four months after date, for value received, payable to the order of the defendant, at the Phenix Bank in the city of New York, for the sum of twenty-five hundred dollars—which bill was indorsed by the defendant to the plaintiff. The defendant pleaded, first, that suit was not commenced by the plaintiff as assignee against the drawer of the bill, as required by the statute of Illinois, and therefore that the plaintiff cannot sustain this suit. Second, that the time of payment was extended by the plaintiff for a valuable consideration. On the second plea, the plaintiff takes issue, and demurs to the first plea. As cause of demurrer, it is alleged that the bills of exchange set forth in the declaration were payable in the city and state of New York, and the validity, nature, and obligation of the defendant's indorsement thereof must be governed by the law of the state of New York, and not of the state of Illinois.

2d. That this court will take judicial notice of the laws of Illinois, and it appearing on the face of the declaration that the bill of exchange was drawn and indorsed in Illinois, the declaration should have been demurred to. There can be no question that the indorser is liable under the law of the state in which the indorsement is made. He undertakes that the drawer or acceptor of the bill shall pay it, at the time and place designated on the bill, and if he shall fail to do so, the indorser binds himself to pay the bill, with damages, provided the legal steps to make him liable shall have been taken. The indorsement is a new contract, and, like every other contract, is governed by the lex loci. The bill before us was payable in New York, and the law of New York consequently fixes the rate of interest which the holder of the bill may recover against all who are parties to it; but the character of the bill, and the liability of the defendant as indorser, are regulated by the local law. Story, Confl. Laws, § 314. The second section of the act of Illinois [St. Ill. 1834–37, p. 526] in relation to promissory notes, &c. gives the right to an assignee to bring an action in his own name against the indorser, "if he shall have used due diligence by the institution and prosecution of a suit against the maker or makers of such assigned note or other instrument of writing," &c. unless it be shown that such suit would have been unavailing. No such diligence is averred in the declaration, and it is consequently bad. The plaintiff, in the replication to the defendant's first plea, should have set out and averred this diligence.

In regard to the second cause of demurrer, although the declaration was defective, the defendant was not bound to demur to it. By pleading specially, the defendant waived the defect in the declaration; and had the plaintiff replied as above suggested, the case would have turned upon the issue thus joined. But the demurrer to the plea carries the court back to the first defect. The plea in bar is good upon its face. The demurrer is sustained.

Circuit Court, D. Kentucky. Sept. 3, 1872.[2]

LIABILITY OF AN EXPRESS COMPANY FOR MONEY ENTRUSTED TO IT FOR TRANSPORTATION — COMMON CARRIERS, OR ORDINARY BAILEES, FOR HIRE.

1. A common carrier who has not limited his responsibility, is undoubtedly responsible for losses, whether occurring on vehicles controlled by himself exclusively, or belonging to and controlled by others, because he is an insurer for the safe delivery of the article which he has agreed to carry. But when he has limited his liability so as to make himself responsible for ordinary care only; and the shipper, to recover against him, is obliged to aver and prove negligence, it must be his (the carrier's) negligence, or the negligence of his agents, and not the negligence of persons over whom he has no control.

[See note at end of case.]

2. If in his employment he uses the vehicles of others, over which he has no control, and uses reasonable care—that is, such care as ordinarily prudent persons engaged in like business use in selecting the vehicles; and if the loss arises from a cause against which he has stipulated with the shipper, he shall not be liable for the same, unless it arises from his want of care, or the want of care of his employees.

[See note at end of case.]

[2] [Reversed in 93 U. S. 174.]

3. A common carrier is bound to carry all articles within the line of his business upon the terms and conditions imposed by law, if the shipper shall so demand. He has a right, however, to charge in proportion to the risk assumed by him. But when he has undertaken to carry at a less rate than he would have a right to charge, and would charge, if he undertook to carry only upon the conditions imposed by law, and has by his receipt, delivered to the shipper, stipulated for a reasonable limitation of his responsibility, and the shipper has accepted the receipt without objection, the latter is as much bound by the contract thus made as any other party would be.

[At law. Action by the Bank of Kentucky against the Adams Express Company to recover damages for a package which was destroyed by fire while in possession of the defendant. Verdict and judgment for defendant. Heard on motion for a new trial. Overruled.]

J. M. Harlan and Barr, Goodloe & Humphrey, for plaintiff.

I. & J. Caldwell and G. C. Wharton for defendant.

BALLARD, District Judge. On a former day there was in this case a verdict and judgment for the defendant. At the trial the counsel for the plantiff took several exceptions to the rulings of the court and charge to the jury, and they have now moved for a new trial, assigning for cause that the court erred in refusing to give the instructions asked by them, and in giving the instructions which were given.

The learned counsel have submitted no argument on their motion. They stand on the argument made and the authorities cited at the trial.

As both that argument and these authorities received at the time the fullest consideration, I think I would be justified in overruling the motion, without adding to what was then said; but, as the opinion expressed by me on the main point in the case is apparently opposed to several respectable authorities, and is supposed to present a new and important question, I feel that I ought not to allow this opportunity to pass without attempting a vindication of an opinion, the correctneess of which has been confirmed by subsequent reflection.

The facts in the case are substantially as follows: The Southern Express Company and the Adams Express Company are engaged each in the business of carrying money and other articles from one part of the country to another for hire, at the request of any one who offers such articles to them for carriage. They do not use in their business any vehicles of their own, except such as are required to transport the articles intrusted to them to and from railroad depots, and to and from steamboat landings. They use railroads, steamboats, and other public conveyances of the country. These conveyances are not subject to their control, but are governed entirely by the companies and persons to whom they belong. The packages intrusted to them are at all times, while on these public conveyances, in the care of one of their own messengers or agents. These companies are engaged in carrying by the railroads through Louisiana and Mississippi to Humboldt, Tennessee, and thence over the Louisville and Nashville Railroad to Louisville, Kentucky, under a contract by which they divide the compensation in proportion to the distance the article is transported by the respective companies. Between Humboldt, Tennessee, and Louisville, Kentucky, both companies employ the same messenger, but this messenger, south of the northern boundary of the state of Tennessee, is subject entirely to the orders of the Southern Express Company, and north of that boundary, is subject entirely to the orders of the Adams Express Company.

These express companies are in the habit of charging one price when they undertake to insure the safe delivery of the articles intrusted to them—that is, when they do not modify their ordinary responsibility as common carriers, and of charging another and lower price when their responsibility is limited. The Louisiana National Bank was aware of these regulations, and had in its possession printed blank receipts, or bills of lading, showing in the body the conditions and exceptions upon which the companies would undertake to carry at the lowest rate, and in the margin of the printed blank for the rate at which they would insure. Having received a letter from the plaintiff, directing the forwarding by express of the sum of $13,528.15, the bank, by its teller, filled the blanks in that part of the bill of lading which contained the conditions and exceptions, and presented it to the Southern Express Company for its signature, and delivered the package of money addressed to the plaintiff without stating who was the owner. The bill of lading was signed and re-delivered to the teller of the Louisiana National Bank, and forwarded by him to the plaintiff at Louisville. It does not appear that the receipt was read at the time of its delivery, or that the attention of the officers of the Louisiana National Bank was called specially to the exceptions contained in it, but, as before stated, the bank was aware of these exceptions, and of the stipulations for the lesser rate of compensation.

This package was carried by the Southern Express Company from New Orleans to Humboldt, Tennessee, and there delivered to the joint messenger of the Southern and Adams Express Companies. While it was in the custody of this messenger between Humboldt and the northern line of the state of Tennessee, the car in which the package was contained was precipitated through a trestle-work on the line of the Louisville and Nashville Railroad, at or near Budd's creek, and the car and package were destroyed by fire. This was caused by the fallen locomotive, without any fault or neglect on the part of the messenger who had charge of the package.

So much of the receipt as is material to the present controversy is as follows:

"Southern Express Company, Express Forwarders. No. 2.—$13,528.15. July 26, 1869. Received from the Louisiana National Bank one package, sealed, and said to contain $13,528.15, addressed 'Bank of Kentucky, Louisville, Kentucky.' Upon the special acceptance and agreement that this company is to forward the same to its agent nearest or most convenient to destination only, and there deliver the same to other parties to complete the transaction, such delivery to terminate all liability of this company for such damage; and also, that this company are not to be liable in any manner, or to any extent, for any loss or damage * * * of such package, or of its contents * * * occasioned * * * by fire or steam. The shipper and owner hereby severally agree that all the stipulations and conditions in this receipt contained shall extend to and inure to the benefit of each and every company or person to whom the Southern Express Company may intrust or deliver the above described property for transportation, and shall define and limit the liability therefor of such other company or person."

Upon these facts the court charged the jury:

1st—That the Southern Express Company and the Adams Express Company are common carriers.

2d—That the Adams Express Company is liable for the loss of packages delivered to the joint messenger of the two companies at Humboldt, Tennessee, although the loss occur south of the northern[3] boundary of the state of Tennessee.

3d—That if the jury believe the facts above detailed in relation to the execution of the receipt, then it, thus signed and delivered, constitutes the contract, and all exceptions in it are a part of the contract, no matter whether each or all of them were known to the Louisiana National Bank or not; and the plaintiff is bound by this contract, whether it expressly authorized the Louisiana National Bank to make it or not.

4th—If the bill of lading contained no exception, it is clear that the defendant would not be excused because the accident occurred without its fault. It would be the insurer, and therefore accountable. But the bill of lading among other exceptions contained this: "That the company are not liable in any manner, or to any extent, for any loss or damage * * * of such package or its contents * * * occasioned * * * by fire."

Now, if you believe that the package was destroyed by fire, as above indicated, without any fault or neglect on behalf of the messenger, or the defendant, the defendant has brought itself within the terms of the exception, and it is not liable. It is not material to inquire whether the accident resulted from the want of care, or from the negligence of the Louisville and Nashville Railroad and its agents or not, since the uncontroverted testimony shows that the car and train in which the messenger of the Adams Express Company was transporting the package belonged to the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company, and were exclusively subject to its control and orders. A common carrier who has not limited his responsibility, is undoubtedly responsible for losses, whether occurring on vehicles controlled by himself exclusively, or belonging to or controlled by others, because he is an insurer, for the safe delivery of the article which he has agreed to carry; but, when he has limited his liability so as to make himself responsible for ordinary care only; and the shipper, to recover against him, is obliged to aver and prove negligence, it must be his negligence or the negligence of his agents, and not the negligence of persons over whom he has no control.

If in his employment he use the vehicles of others over which he has no control, and use reasonable care—that is, such care as ordinarily prudent persons engaged in like business use in selecting the vehicles, and if the loss arises from a cause against which he has stipulated with the shipper—he shall not be liable for the same unless it arises from his want of care, or the want of care of his employees. "Without, therefore, deciding whether or not the evidence adduced in the case tends to establish any want of reasonable or ordinary care on the part of the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company, I instruct you that such evidence is irrelevant and incompetent, and that you should disregard it—that is, give no more effect to it than if it had not been adduced."

The first and second instructions were not excepted to, but the third and fourth were. At the trial, the plaintiff insisted that it was not bound by the terms of the receipt, because it was not shown that the attention of the Louisiana National Bank was called to them at the time, or that it expressly assented to them, but I am of opinion that there was no error in this portion of the charge. The Louisiana National Bank was aware that the receipt contained some exceptions and conditions. It accepted the receipt without remonstrance or objection, and both authority and reason demonstrate that the receipt must under these circumstances be regarded as constituting the contract of the parties: Dorr v. New Jersey Steam Nav. Co., 1 Kern. [11 N. Y.] 485; Wells v. Steam Nav. Co., 4 Seld. [8 N. Y.] 375, and 2 Comst. [2 N. Y.] 204; Grace v. Adams, 100 Mass. 505; Holford v. Adams, 2 Duer, 480; York Co. v. Central Railroad. 3 Wall. [70 U. S.] 107.

It is now everywhere admitted that a common carrier may limit his responsibility by express contract, and if he may make an express contract with a shipper of goods, I can not see why the contract may not be shown by the same evidence which would establish a contract between other parties. I can not see why a writing delivered by a common carrier to an owner of goods intended by the former to express the terms and conditions of his contract to carry, and received by the latter as such, should not constitute the contract between them.

A common carrier, it is true, is bound to carry all articles within the line of his business upon the terms and conditions imposed by law, if the shipper shall so demand. He has, however, a right to charge in proportion to the risk assumed by him. It is upon this ground the authorities hold, that unless his responsibility is modified by express contract, his undertaking to carry is upon the terms and conditions which are imposed by law. But when he has undertaken to carry at a less rate than he would have a right to charge, and would charge, if he undertook to carry only upon the conditions imposed by law, and has, by his receipt, delivered to the shipper, stipulated for a reasonable limitation of his responsibility, and the shipper has accepted the receipt without objection, the latter is as much bound by the contract thus made as any other party would be.

The correctness of the propositions contained in the remaining portion of the charge to which exception was taken may, I think, be demonstrated in two ways:

1st—By the contract between the bank and the express company, it was agreed that the company should not be responsible for any loss or damage of the package which should be occasioned by fire. The loss of the package was occasioned by fire; hence the carrier, by the terms of the contract, is not responsible. It is not pretended that the contract was violated by using the cars of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company to transport the messenger and the package, or was violated in any other respect. It follows, therefore, that if the company is liable at all, it is not so by virtue of the contract, but in spite of it.

The contract, however, does not attempt to exempt, nor could it have exempted, the express company from loss occasioned by the neglect of itself or its servants; but when it is sought to charge the company with neglect, it must be such neglect as it is responsible for upon the general principles of law.

Now, upon these principles, no one is responsible for damage occasioned by neglect unless it be the neglect of himself or his servants, or agents. But the facts stated show that neither the company nor its servant was guilty of any neglect. It follows that the defendant cannot be charged on this account. Though the defendant used the Louisville & Nashville Railroad to transport its messenger and the package, the railroad company was not, in any legal sense, the servant of the defendant. The defendant had no control over the railroad company, or over its servants. The railroad company was no more the servant of the defendant than it is of any passenger whom it transports. It was no more the servant of the defendant than is the hack or cab the servant of him who hires it to transport him from one part of the city to another.

2d—All the authorities agree that when a common carrier has, by special contract, limited his responsibility, "he becomes, with reference to that particular transaction, an ordinary bailee—a private carrier for hire," or, "reduces his responsibilities to those of an ordinary bailee for hire." York Co. v. Illinois Cent. R. Co., 3 Wall. [70 U. S.] 107; New Jersey Steam Nav. Co. v. Merchants' Bank, 6 How. [47 U. S.] 382; New York Cent. R. Co. v. Lockwood, 17 Wall. [84 U. S.] 357.

I prefer the latter form of stating the proposition, because it is less misleading. I do not think that a common carrier by entering into a contract limiting his responsibility, changes his character. He still remains a common carrier, with his responsibility limited in respect to the matter embraced in his contract, to that of an ordinary bailee for hire. The authorities are equally clear that an ordinary bailee for hire is bound to only ordinary diligence, and responsible only for losses and injuries occasioned by negligence or want of ordinary care. The defendant did by special contract limit its responsibility, and neither it, nor its servant, the messenger, is chargeable with any neglect or want of care. The loss of the package was occasioned by fire. The contract provides that the defendant should not be liable for a loss so occasioned, and as neither [the defendant nor][1] the defendant's servant was wanting in care, it follows that it is not responsible for the loss.

Suppose the package had been lawfully intrusted by the Louisiana National Bank to a private person to be carried for hire, and delivered to the plaintiff, and it was contemplated by the parties that such person would transport the package and himself by the railroads, which, it was contemplated, the defendant would use, and the package had been lost under the same circumstances that the package delivered to the defendant was lost, would it, for a moment be contended that such private person would be responsible?

Suppose again, that a person should deliver to his friend, who contemplated coming from New Orleans to Louisville by the ordinary modes of travel, a watch, to be carried and delivered at the latter city, and that while such private carrier, without reward, was proceeding on his way in one of the cars of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company, the car should by the gross carelessness of those having charge of it, be thrown from the track, and the watch in charge of the carrier, without any neglect on his part, be destroyed. Is it conceivable that such carrier would be responsible for the loss? To hold that he would be responsible would not only violate the plainest principles of law, but would shock the common sense of mankind, and yet, not only the private carrier for hire, but the private carrier without reward is responsible for the loss of a package intrusted to him, under the circumstances supposed, if the defendant is responsible for the loss of the package claimed in this case.

The private carrier for hire is responsible for losses and injuries occasioned by want of ordinary care on his part, or on the part of his servants; and a private carrier without pay is responsible, if not for want of ordinary care, certainly for gross neglect. It cannot be maintained with the least show of reason that the Louisville & Nashville Railroad was any more the servant of the defendant in transporting the package sued for in this case than it was the servant of the carrier for hire, and the carrier without hire in the cases supposed, and if these last are not responsible for the neglect of the servants of the railroad company, it is impossible to conceive that the defendant is responsible for such neglect.

The counsel for the plaintiff attempt to escape this conclusion by insisting that, though the defendant limited its responsibility, it still remains a common carrier, and that such carrier is responsible not only for any want of negligence of himself and his servants, but for the negligence of any agency which he may employ in his business.

This proposition is misleading. It is not strictly correct to say that a common carrier is responsible for the negligence of any agency in his business, or even for his own negligence or that of his servants, in the sense in which his responsibility is distinguished from the responsibility of another person. A common carrier is bound to deliver goods intrusted to him, unless prevented by the owner, the act of God, or the public enemy. He is, as the law terms him, an insurer for the safe carriage and delivery of goods, subject only to the exceptions above mentioned. If he does not deliver goods intrusted to him, he is responsible, not because the goods were lost by his neglect, or the neglect of a servant, or by the neglect of some agency which he employed, but because he insured their delivery. His responsibility is wholly independent of the neglect of any one. If goods delivered to him to be carried are lost while in his or his servant's custody, or while in the custody of some other person who is not his servant, he is equally responsible, not because he is liable upon any principle of law for the negligence of any person who is not his servant, but because he is bound by law to carry and deliver safe all goods delivered to him unless prevented, as before stated, by the owner, the act of God, or the public enemy. If he has limited his responsibility by special contract, and the loss has been occasioned by the cause excepted in the contract, then the owner in order to charge him must show that, though the loss arose directly from the cause excepted, that cause itself was occasioned by the neglect of the carrier. But, when a public or private carrier is sought to be charged with a loss occasioned by his neglect, when neglect is the foundation of the plaintiff's claim, I am not aware that he is liable for any negligence except upon the same principles and under the same circumstances that any other person is liable. I am not aware that he, more than any one else, can be made responsible for the negligence of persons who are not his servants.

Undoubtedly the defendant did, notwithstanding its contract, continue to be a common carrier, but its responsibility was limited to that of an ordinary bailee for hire. Now, an ordinary bailee for hire is responsible for only ordinary care, and liable for the neglect of himself or his own servants, and not for the neglect of persons over whom he has no control. Consequently, he is not responsible for a loss occurring under the circumstances presented in this case. If it be admitted that the common carrier has by his contract limited his responsibility to that of an ordinary bailee for hire, then it cannot be consistently insisted upon that he shall be held liable as a common carrier who has made no express contract. To admit the contract, and to deny any effect to it, is too much for one proposition. The proposition of counsel, reduced to its essence, is simply this: that, though the defendant has, by special contract, limited its responsibility to that of a private bailee for hire, it is still responsible as a common carrier. A proposition involving so obvious a contradiction cannot require further exposure.

But obvious as the fallacy and error contained in the counsels' proposition appear to me, the proposition itself seems to be supported by the decision of the supreme court of California, in the case of Hooper v. Wells, Fargo & Co., 27 Cal. 11; by the supreme court of Minnesota, in the case of Christenson v. American Exp. Co., 15 Minn. 270, (Gil. 208;) and by the learned editor of the American Law Register, in his note to the former case, Amer. Law Reg. Nov., 1865, p. 30.

In the first case, the carrier made a contract stipulating that he would not be responsible except as forwarder. The court construed the contract as limiting the responsibility of the carrier to that of forwarder —that is, of an ordinary bailee for hire—but they held the carrier responsible for a loss occurring on a tug or lighter which plied between the shore and an ocean steamer, occasioned by the negligence of the managers of the tug, although they were not subject to the control or orders of the express company.

In respect to the responsibility of forwarders, the court say: "They are not insurers like carriers, but they are liable for losses of goods while in their custody, resulting from negligence of themselves and those they employ in their business of forwarders."

The correctness of the first part of this proposition cannot be disputed, nor do I question the correctness of the latter part, if by "those whom they employ in their business of forwarding," the court mean those who are the forwarders' servants, and subject to their control and orders. The court further say, the responsibility of a forwarder is the same as that of a warehouseman, and "if a warehouseman, instead of using his own warehouse and employing his own subordinates, should, for a stipulated sum paid to the owner, use in his business the warehouse of another person who employs and controls the subordinates, there can be no doubt that he would be liable for a loss of the goods intrusted to his care, occurring while in his possession, and resulting from the negligence of such subordinates, although not under his control."

If, by the words "intrusted to his care," the court mean to suggest a case where the warehouseman has a contract to keep the goods in his own warehouse, I entirely concur in the proposition stated. But if they mean that a warehouseman who violates no contract by removing the goods of his customer from his own warehouse into that of another prudent warehouseman is responsible for a loss of the goods resulting from the negligence of the subordinates of such other warehouseman, I cannot assent to it.

Suppose a warehouseman's warehouse should be destroyed by fire, it would be his duty to remove such of the goods of his customers as were saved, to the warehouse of some other prudent person, and it cannot be insisted that he would be responsible for the loss of goods occurring there, resulting from the negligence of servants of the latter warehouseman.

If a warehouseman contract to keep goods in his own warehouse, and he should remove them—in violation of his contract—to another warehouse, I suppose he would be liable for all losses there occurring, just as a bailee who hires a horse to go to a particular place is responsible for loss or injury to the horse, should he ride or drive him to a different place, and the horse be lost or injured in the prosecution of such other journey.

Again, the court say: "The fact that the defendants made use of various public conveyances, their messenger with the treasure traveling a part of the way by stage, a part by steam tug and lighters, and a part by ocean steamers, makes no difference as to their liability. For defendants' purposes, the managers of these various conveyances were their agents and employees."

If, as seems to be conceded, it was contemplated by both the plaintiff and defendants that the defendants would not use in their business their own vehicles, but the conveyances of others, not at all subject to their control or management, and that in the use of those other conveyances the defendants did not violate their contract, I can not admit that the defendants, who, by the admissions of the court, were liable only as ordinary bailees for hire, were responsible for losses occasioned by the negligence of the managers of those conveyances. I cannot admit that the managers of those other conveyances were, in any legal sense, their agents and employees. The relation of master and servant, principal and agent, does not and cannot exist where the master has no control over the servant, and the principal no control over the agent.

The court further say: "The defendants had the means of holding the proprietors of those various vehicles used in their business of expressmen responsible to them, had they chosen to do so. If they did not take the proper means to secure themselves, it was their own fault."

But I cannot see how any argument can be drawn from this to show that the defendants were responsible. Every bailee or depositary may hold any one responsible for destroying or injuring goods in his possession, but it cannot be maintained that he is responsible for such destruction or injury unless he, by his negligence, contribute to the same. Besides, the plaintiff had his remedy against the proprietors of those other conveyances, which occasioned the loss—see the New Jersey Steam Nav. Co. v. Merchants' Bank, 6 How. [47 U. S.] 382—and it might be retorted "that if he did not take the proper means to secure himself, it was his own fault."

In the Minnesota case, it was stipulated, that the carrier "was not to be held liable for any loss or damage, except as forwarder only, or for any loss occasioned by the perils of navigation and transportation." The goods were received at New York, and were to be delivered to Christenson & Brother, Mankato, Minnesota. When the goods reached St. Paul, they were placed by the carrier on board the steamboat "Julia," a boat belonging to the Northwestern Union Pacific Company, and managed entirely by its officers and servants, to be transported to Mankato. The goods remained in charge of the carrier's messenger. The boat at the time of the accident was strong, and in good condition. The carrier was guilty of no want of care in selecting the Julia to transport the goods, but, on the way, the Julia was, through the carelessness of its officers and managers, run against a snag and sunk, whereby the goods were damaged.

The court say, that the carrier is not exempt from the loss by reason of the stipulation in the bill of lading that "it was not to be held liable for any loss or damage except as forwarder," because, they say: "In our opinion * * * the effect claimed for this clause of the receipt by the defendants is inconsistent with and repugnant to the scope and intent of the result, viewed as a whole, and in connection with the fact showing the defendants' real character and mode of doing business."

In other words, the court held that the defendants were common carriers, and that this clause of their receipt did not modify their liability at all. If the court was correct in this, it is indisputable that this clause did not exempt the carrier from responsibility for the loss claimed.

In respect to the other exception, "perils of navigation and transportation," the court say: "The exception does not excuse the carrier for negligently running into perils of the kind mentioned. The proper constructions of such words is analogous to that which is put upon the words 'perils of the sea' in bills of lading. While thus it would seem very proper to hold that a snag in one of our western rivers is a peril of navigation, as appears to have been done in Tennessee, if a vessel is wrecked upon one through the negligence of the carrier or of those whom he employs * * * the carrier is not absolved. Under such circumstances the loss is properly attributed to the agency of man, not to a peril of navigation."

Here again, we have the same fallacies and misleading proposition which have been exposed in a former part of this opinion. The sinking of a boat by running on a snag in one of our western rivers is undoubtedly a "peril of navigation." It is none the less a peril of navigation though it occur by the fault of the person navigating the boat. It is wholly misleading to say that it is a peril of navigation when it results from accident and without fault, and that it is not a peril of navigation when it results from negligence. When goods are lost by reason of such peril, occasioned by the negligence of the carrier, the carrier is responsible, not because the goods were not lost by an accepted peril, but because he has brought about the peril through his own carelessness or negligence. He is made responsible for his negligence, not because he is a common carrier, but because he is guilty of negligence, and has occasioned loss thereby.

In the books which treat of common carriers, only those carriers are treated of who use their own conveyances; hence, it is we often find it stated that the exception, "perils of the sea," or "perils of the river," included in the carrier's bill of lading, does not include the losses arising from what would be generally understood to be "perils of the sea" when occasioned by the negligence of the servants of the carrier. In such case, the carrier being the owner of the vessel in which the goods are carried, and being responsible for its careful navigation, it is not material in effect whether it is held that a loss arising from an excepted peril, brought about by his negligence, is not a peril of navigation within the meaning of the bill of lading, or that the carrier is responsible for a loss occasioned by the negligence of his servants, but it is better and more correct to place the liability in such a case on the latter ground, because to place it on the former is misleading.

Certainly, as the court say: "The exception does not excuse the carrier for negligently running into perils, * * * nor shall he be heard to set up his own negligence to excuse him from responsibility." But, in the case before the court, no negligence was imputed to the carrier. He did not attempt to set up his own negligence to excuse himself from responsibility. He set up that by the contract he was not to be liable for losses arising from the perils of navigation, and he showed that the loss did arise from a peril of navigation without any fault on his part. He was not responsible for the negligence of the managers of the boat, as I have before shown, because he had no control or authority over them, and as he could be held responsible in the case only for negligence, it would seem he was not liable at all. I think that the court was misled by the definition of "perils of navigation" which it found in the books.

Clearly, that is none the less a "peril of navigation" or a "peril of the sea," because it is attributable to the agency of man. The very case which is generally used to define and explain what is a "peril of the sea," is that of a collision brought about by negligence. If a carrier's vessel should collide on the sea with another vessel, through the fault wholly of the latter, it is everywhere admitted that he would not be responsible for a loss arising from such a collision of goods which he was carrying under a bill of lading that exempted him from responsibility for loss arising from "perils of navigation" or "perils of the sea," and yet undoubtedly, the collision in such case is attributable to the agency—nay, to the negligence—of man.

I have a profound respect for the opinion of the learned courts which I have here noticed, but I think they are opposed to the general current of authorities; that they are founded on fallacious and misleading propositions, and that they disregard the well-settled principles of law.

The motion for a new trial is overruled.

[NOTE. This decision was reversed by the supreme court in Planters' Nat. Bank v. Adams Exp. Co., 93 U. S. 174. Mr. Justice Strong, in delivering the opinion, said:

["The railroad company, in transporting the messenger of the defendants and the express matter in his charge, was the agent of somebody,—either of the express company or of the shippers or consignees of the property. That it was the agent of the defendants is quite clear. * * * It is true the defendants had * * * no control over the company or its servants, but they were its employers. Presumably they paid for its service, and that service was directly and immediately for them. Control of the conduct of an agency is not in all cases essential to liability for the consequences of that conduct. * * * It is quite as important to the consignor and to the public that the subordinate agency, though not a servant under immediate control, should be held to the strictest care, as it is that the carrier himself and the servants under his orders should be. For these reasons, we think it is not admissible to construe the exception in the defendants' bills of lading as excusing them from liability for the loss of the packages by fire, if caused by the negligence of the railroad company, to which they confided a part of the duty they had assumed. * * * The defendants had an arrangement with the railroad company under which the packages of money, inclosed in an iron safe, were put into an apartment of a car set apart for the use of the express company. Yet the safe containing the packages continued in the custody of the messenger. Therefore, as between the defendants and the railroad company, it may be doubted whether the relation was that of a common carrier to his consignor, because the company had not the packages in charge. Had the packages been delivered to the charge of the railroad company, without any stipulation for exemption from the ordinary liability of carriers, it would have been an insurer both to the express company and to the plaintiffs. But, as they were not so delivered, the right of the plaintiffs to the extremest constant vigilance during all stages of the carriage is lost, if the defendants are not answerable for the negligence of the railroad company, notwithstanding the exception in their bills of lading. We cannot close our eyes to the well-known course of business in the country. Over very many of our railroads the contracts for transportation of goods are made, not with the owners of the roads, nor with the railroad companies themselves, but with transportation agencies or companies, which have arrangement with the railroad companies for the carriage. In this manner some of the responsibilities of common carriage are often sought to be evaded, but in vain. Public policy demands that the right of the owners to absolute security against the negligence of the carrier, and of all persons engaged in performing the carrier's duty, shall not be taken away by any reservation in the carrier's receipt, or by any arrangement between him and the performing company.

["Again, it is urged that, though the defendants remained common carriers, notwithstanding their contract, their responsibility was limited by their receipt to that of an ordinary bailee for hire; and, as such a bailee is not held liable for the neglect of persons over whom he has no control, it is argued that these defendants are not liable for the negligence of the railroad company. This also assumes what cannot be admitted. Although we are told all the authorities agree that, when a common carrier has by special contract limited his liability, he becomes, with reference to that particular transaction, an ordinary bailee, a private carrier for hire, or reduces his responsibilities to those of an ordinary bailee for hire, yet we do not find that the authorities assert that doctrine, if by the phrase 'that particular transaction' is meant the undertaking to carry. Certainly, those to which we have been referred do not. We do not deny that a contract may be made which will put a common carrier on the same level with a private carrier for hire, as respects his liability for loss caused by the acts or omissions of others. The consignor may, by contract, restrain him; may direct how and by what agencies he shall carry. Under such an arrangement, he may become a mere forwarder, and cease to be a carrier. But what we have to do with in these cases is whether the contract proved has that operation. We have already said we think it has not. The exception in the bills of lading has sufficient to operate upon, without being a cover for negligence on the part of any persons engaged in the service undertaken by the carriers. It exempts the defendants from responsibility for loss by fire, caused by the acts or omissions of all persons who are not agents or agencies for the transportation. That is a large restriction, and beyond that, in our judgment, the exception in the present case does not extend."]

Case No. 890.

In re BANK OF MADISON.

[5 Biss. 515;[1] 9 N. B. R. 184.]

District Court. W. D. Wisconsin. Jan., 1874.

RELATION OF BANK TO CUSTOMERS — COLLECTIONS —BURDEN OF PROOF—COSTS.

1. The relation between a bank and its customers is that of simple debtor and creditor—not principal and agent—and does not partake of a fiduciary character.

[Cited in Re Smith, Case No. 12,990.]

2. A note deposited for collection, and passed to the credit of the depositor, becomes the property of the bank, and on the bankruptcy of the bank, the proceeds go to the general creditors. The fact that the account was made good before the collection of the note does not make the bank a trustee as to the proceeds.

[See Bank of Commerce v. Russell, Case No. 884.]

3. A customer of an insolvent bank must make out a very clear case, before the court will allow payment of his claim in full.

4. Where a petition to establish a right to payment in full has assumed the form of a regular suit, costs and a docket fee may be taxed against the petitioner.

In bankruptcy. This was a petition by the Madison Manufacturing Company, praying that the assignee may be ordered to pay over five hundred and seventeen dollars and forty cents, claimed to belong to said company. On the 18th day of August, 1873, the said company took a note of E. W. Skinner, for five hundred dollars, due in September, to the bank for collection and got it discounted, and the proceeds passed to its credit on the bank books. The company's account was then overdrawn to an amount exceeding the avails of the note thus passed to its credit. The company indorsed the note in the usual form, and the bank transmitted it to its correspondent in Sioux City, Ia., for collection. Not being paid at maturity, it was protested. It was, however, finally paid in installments, and the proceeds transmitted, as paid, by drafts on the Third National Bank of Chicago, which were received after the bank had virtually suspended payment. The Manufacturing Company, before the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy, demanded the drafts, but the bank declined to give them up, and they were delivered up to the assignee after his appointment. Without the credit of the note the company's account remained overdrawn until the 6th of September. Deposits were made from other collections from time to time thereafter, so that when the drafts for this note were received the bank, exclusive of this credit, was indebted to the company. On the part of the company, it was shown, on the hearing, that the note was taken there for collection, and that the transaction took the form of a transfer, for the purpose of facilitating the collection, and that it was agreed or understood that the company was not to draw against the credit until it was collected. HOPKINS, District Judge. Notwithstanding the special circumstances shown by the petitioner, the fact, nevertheless, remains, that the note was credited to the company in the ordinary way, and subject to its order, like any other deposit, and the company had the benefit of it in the payment of its overdrawn account at the bank from the 18th of August to the 6th of September. The note and the avails belonged to the bank, during that period, at least, and if the note had been collected during that time the company would not have been entitled to these drafts, or the avails of the note. That being so, has the company, by making good its account on [after][3] the 6th of September, in the ordinary way of depositing, without any special agreement to that effect, changed its relation or condition so as to be entitled to the drafts as the proceeds of the note? And, further, does this case fall within the law governing or relating to principal and agent, so as to authorize the company, as principal, to follow the proceeds and reclaim them from the hands of the assignee in this manner? In case of the insolvency or bankruptcy of an agent, property consigned to him to sell, and notes left with him to collect, and the proceeds of such, whether in notes or money, so long as the same can be distinguished from the mass of the agent's or factor's property, do not pass to the assignee in bankruptcy, and if received by them may be recovered by the principal at law, or, in other words, the right of the principal thereto ceases only when the means of ascertainment or identification fail.

The petitioner's counsel contended for the application of this doctrine to this case, and claimed that no property or choses in action held by the bankrupt in a fiduciary capacity passed to the assignee, citing, in support thereof, Price v. Ralston, 2 Dall. [2 U. S.] 60; Denston v. Perkins, 2 Pick. 86; Taylor v. Plumer, 3 Maule & S. 562; 3 Pars. Cont. 478 et seq.; Rodriguez v. Heffernan, 5 Johns. Ch. 417.

As to the correctness of these general principles there can be no question. But for the decision of this case it becomes necessary to ascertain the nature of the business between bankers and their customers, and to see whether such business comes within these principles; if not, then we must look in some other rule for its determination.

In deciding this case, it must be borne in mind that the petitioner was a customer of this bank, and that the relation of banker and customer existed between him and the bank, and as a regular dealer with the bank, he had an open and running account, in which he was credited with all sums paid into the bank, and with the proceeds of all notes and bills discounted or collected, and was charged with all checks drawn on the institution. In Re Franklin Bank, 1 Paige, 249, 254, the chancellor says, Whenever money [or notes are][4] is specially deposited in a bank for safe keeping, it is at the risk of the depositor. If the same is stolen, lost or destroyed without the fault of the bank or its officers, the depositor sustains the loss. Not so with a general depositor. The money, checks, or bills which he deposits become the property of the bank, and he becomes a creditor; he has no claims upon the money or bills deposited. The officers may use them as they please, and he is to all intents a general creditor of the bank, and the bank may use them as it sees fit, and there is an implied assent to such use by the depositor. According to that doctrine, the relation of a bank with its dealers and depositors is that of an ordinary debtor, and must be governed by the law relating to transactions between debtor and creditor.

In Smedes v. Bank of Utica, 20 Johns. 372, which was an action for damages against the bank for omitting to duly present and protest a note left with it for collection, the bank set up a want of consideration for its undertaking to collect the bill. Woodworth, J., who delivered the opinion of the court, page 379, says: "It will be conceded that had this been an undertaking by an individual to demand payment and give notice, it would be a nudum pactum; * * * but the case of banking institutions is widely different. They are established to aid the commerce of the country, by giving facilities to the moneyed corporations of the community, * * * to enlarge the amount of actual capital. * * * The operations of a bank principally consist in loaning money and discounting notes, which are direct and immediate sources of profit. Incident to the business of a bank is the receiving of notes from their customers for collection; when paid, the money is placed to the credit of the depositor, and remains in bank until called for." And as profits might arise from such a transaction and deposit, it was held a sufficient consideration for the defendant's undertaking to collect the note. I cite this to show the great dissimilarity between the way an agent transacts the business of his principal, and the duties and obligations assumed by an agent towards his principal, and the way a banker deals with his customers, and the duties of such banker, in reference to the money collected for or deposited by his customers. It is the duty of an agent to pay over the money received or collected by him to his principal, not to use it for his individual benefit; whereas, there is an implied understanding that a banker may use and loan for the benefit of the bank the money of his customers, including that collected for them as well as that deposited.

That case shows, further, that there is an implied understanding that the money to be received from collections is to go on deposit in the bank, and in the absence of proof of an agreement that it was not to be passed to the account of the dealer, courts should give to such understanding the force of a contract that it was to be deposited in the ordinary way, and to be drawn out by checks as other money. Indeed the proof here is that the proceeds were to be deposited. The relation between bankers and their customers is most clearly laid down and defined in the case of Foley v. Hill, 2 H. L. Cas. 28, (decided in July, 1848.) It is there held to be the ordinary relation between debtor and creditor, with a superadded obligation to pay the customer's checks on demand, and it is there further held that it does not bear any analogy to the relation between principal and agent or factor, and does not partake of a fiduciary character. It is there said, that "money, when paid into a bank, ceases altogether to be the money of the principal; it is then the money of the banker, who is bound to return an equivalent by paying a similar sum to that deposited with him, when he is asked for it. * * * He is guilty of no breach of trust in employing it; * * * he is not bound to keep it or deal with it employing it as the property of his principal; * * * he is simply required to refund an equivalent sum."

That case distinguishes the relation of bankers and their customers from that of principal and agent, and shows that the obligation incurred by a banker, in the ordinary course of his business as such, with his customers, is not fiduciary in its nature, but, on the contrary, the liability is that of an ordinary debtor.

The case of Smedes v. Bank of Utica, supra, holds what we all know to be the fact, that the collection of notes is, in this country at least, a part of the ordinary business of a banker. Hence it follows that a banker, in receiving a note for collection from one of his customers, does not act as an agent, but is presumed to have undertaken the collection for the profit that might result to it from the deposit and use of the money as a banker. So that when a banker collects money for his dealers it is regarded as deposited and in the light of any other deposit, not as the money of the customer, nor is the customer entitled to it, but only to its equivalent as any other deposit.

This, it seems to me, is an answer to the claim of the petitioner in this case. These authorities show that the principle upon which the counsel rested the claim upon the hearing is not applicable, and cannot be invoked to authorize a recovery of this claim. But as hereinbefore stated the testimony does not sustain the position insisted upon, to wit: that the note was taken simply for collection. I think the transaction in its legal aspect widely different from such a case.

The note was, in fact, discounted, and the proceeds deposited and credited to the petitioner, and up to the time that its account was made good, belonged to the bank, and I cannot believe that the making good of the account afterwards changed the relation between the parties in contemplation of law. To grant the relief asked would be, in fact and in legal effect, paying the subsequent deposits of the petitioner in full. To do this under so thin a disguise as that put forth, to wit: that the petitioner was not to draw from the funds until after the collection of the note, when at the time the account was overdrawn to an amount exceeding the proceeds, would be sacrificing the substance to preserve the shadow.

One of the cardinal doctrines of a court of equity is that equality is justice, and in all cases in bankruptcy, whether heard in this court sitting in bankruptcy, or a court of equity, a creditor who claims a preference must show a clear legal right to it. Cases of extreme hardship cannot but exist in all cases of bank failures. In such failures the loss generally falls upon those least able to bear it—upon the poorer classes and laborers, the aged and dependent, the friendless and unprotected, whose little all has been left on deposit without the thought of the possibility of losing it, and who are wholly unprepared for such an event.

And it is not exacting too much to require that a party dealing with the insolvent bank in the ordinary way, as the case shows the petitioner was, should make out a very clear case before a court should sustain a preference in favor of such parties over the other creditors.

The petitioner, in order to avoid the effect of the overdraft, proved by Mr. Hudson, the superintendent, that he had, standing in his individual name and as his own money, more than enough to balance the deficiency in the company's account, and that he had previously told the bank officers that his account should stand as a guaranty for any amount due from the company. This I have disregarded altogether, for the reason that, if he had so stated, it would be void under the statute as being a promise to pay the debt of another, and not in writing. The bank charged the company with the money, and his undertaking, if made as he said, would be collateral and void under the statute, for the reason above stated. I therefore deny the prayer of the petition, and, as this matter has assumed the form of a regular suit or proceeding, and testimony been introduced as upon an ordinary trial, I think it just and proper that the petitioner should pay the costs to be taxed, including a docket fee of twenty dollars, to the attorneys of the assignee.

Many of these principles apply to the case of J. H. Rountree, who has filed and submitted a petition praying that the assignee be ordered to refund to him the amount of a draft drawn by J. Hodges & Co. upon the Second National Bank of Chicago, for forty-two dollars and forty cents, made payable to H. H. Rountree, his son, a minor, then a student in the University at Madison. The draft was dated on the 20th of September, 1873, and was presented to the bank to be cashed, and, as alleged in the petition, was not cashed, but was taken to be collected.

The bank received it to collect, and sent it forward, and the amount thereof, instead of being returned, was credited to the Bank of Madison by the Second National Bank, which was then a creditor of the Bank of Madison to quite a large amount, so, in point of fact, neither the bank nor assignee ever received the money upon it. The Second National paid it by crediting the overdrawn account of the Bank of Madison with the amount.

The officers of the bank must have known such would be the result when they received it to collect, and their conduct in so doing is deserving of the severest censure.

These facts are a sufficient answer to the petition of Mr. Rountree, and the prayer of his petition is therefore denied. But as no counsel were employed, or argument had by either party, no costs are charged to either party in his case.

Circuit Court, D. Ohio. July Term, 1832.[2]

PRINCIPAL AND SURETY — CONTRACT UNDER SEAL —ESTOPPEL—DISCHARGE OF SURETY.

1. In an instrument under seal, where the parties bind themselves as principals, they are estopped, at law, from showing that they were only bound as securities.

[See Sprigg v. Bank of Mt. Pleasant, Case No. 13,257.]

[See note at end of case.]

2. In ordinary cases of security, extending the time or varying the obligation, without the consent of the securities, will discharge them.

[See note at end of case.]

3. But principals are not bound to use active diligence, unless called on to do so, by the securities, through a court of chancery, or otherwise.

4. The doctrine of estoppel is founded on reason and justice.

5. A deed absolute upon its face, in equity, is often considered a mortgage, to prevent the perpetration of a fraud.

6. A penal bond is considered in the light of a security, and is not enforced beyond the indemnity.

[At law. Action of debt on a bond by the Bank of Mount Pleasant against Samuel Sprigg. On demurrer to the pleas. Judgment for plaintiff. Affirmed by supreme court in Sprigg v. Bank of Mt. Pleasant, 10 Pet. (35 U. S.) 257.]

This case was argued by Mr. Tappan for the plaintiff, and by Mr. Goodenow for the defendant.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This is an action of debt brought on the following instrument: "Know all men by these presents, we, Peter Yarnall & Co., Samuel Sprigg, Richard Symms, Alexander Mitchell and Z. Jacobs, as principals, are jointly and severally held and firmly bound to the President, Directors and Company of the Bank of Mount Pleasant, for the use of the said Bank of Mount Pleasant, in the just and full sum of twenty-one hundred dollars, lawful money of the United States; to the payment of which sum, well and truly to be made to the said President, Directors and Company, for the use aforesaid, within sixty days from the date hereof, we jointly and severally bind ourselves, our heirs, &c., firmly by these presents. Signed with our hands, and sealed with our seals, this 20th of February, A. D. 1826. Peter Yarnall & Co., [Seal.] Samuel Sprigg, [Seal.] Richard Symms, [Seal.] Alexander Mitchell, [Seal.] Z. Jacobs, [Seal.] The declaration is in the usual form and the defendant filed the general issue and six special pleas. And the questions now for consideration arise on the second and sixth pleas.

The second plea states that the plaintiff is an incorporated bank, and that the above sum was loaned in the ordinary way, for the accommodation of Peter Yarnall and Co., that the above instrument was given to secure the payment of said loan in sixty days, and that Sprigg, Symms, Mitchell and Jacobs were securities and executed the instrument as such, which was fully understood by the directors of the bank. That Peter Yarnall & Co. for their exclusive benefit, received the proceeds of the above bond; and the entry was so made on the books of the bank. That when the debt became due, the accommodation, on the payment of interest, was continued sixty days, without the knowledge or consent of the securities; and that when the debt again became due, on the payment of the discount it was again extended sixty days without the knowledge or consent of the securities, by reason of which the said Samuel Sprigg says that he is discharged from all liability, &c.

The sixth plea states, substantially, the second plea, alleging that the discounts of twenty-two dollars and forty cents were paid at each renewal, and that the said Peter Yarnall & Co. on or about the 24th March, 1829, failed in business, became insolvent and unable to pay their just debts. And that the securities had no notice of the non-payment of the said loan, or of the outstanding of the obligation from the time it became due until the bankruptcy of the said Yarnall & Co. To the second and sixth plea the plaintiff replied, that the said Samuel Sprigg together with Peter Yarnall & Co., Richard Symms, Alexander Mitchell and Z. Jacobs, acknowledged themselves to be jointly and severally held and firmly bound, as principals to the said President, directors and company of the Bank of Mount Pleasant in the sum of twenty-one hundred dollars as aforesaid. To this replication the defendant demurred. To the third, fourth and fifth pleas, the plaintiff demurred, but as the questions in the case arise fully on the second and sixth pleas it is not material to notice the other pleas.

It is not necessary to enquire whether the replication is not defective, for if this be admitted, the demurrer brings up the sufficiency of the second and sixth pleas. The defence in these pleas is, that when the writing obligatory became payable, the bank without the knowledge or consent of the securities or either of them continued the loan on the payment of the discount, from time to time, until the principals, Peter Yarnall & Co., became insolvent, and that the securities by reason thereof are discharged. It is a well settled principle, that where time is given to the maker of the note by the holder, after the note becomes due, which shall deprive the holder from, at any time, demanding and suing for the amount, the indorser is discharged. Tindal v. Brown, 1 Term R. 169; English v. Darley, 2 Bos. & P. 61; Clark v. Devlin, 3 Bos. & P. 365; Gould v. R[illegible]on, 8 East, 576; McLemore v. Powell, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 554; Barn. & C. 14; Walwyn v. St. Quintin, 1 Bos. & P. 654; [Bank of U. S. v. Hatch,] 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 252. And there are cases where ordinary sureties in a bond or other instruments, have a right to call upon the obligee in a court of chancery or otherwise, to bring suit against the principal. Hayes v. Ward, 4 Johns. Ch. 123, 131, 132; King v. Baldwin, 2 Johns. Ch. 554, 17 Johns. 384; 6 Ves. 734. But, in ordinary cases, the obligee is not bound to active diligence unless hastened by some act of the sureties. There are some cases of gross negligence on the part of the obligee, in using proper means to recover the money from the principal until he shall become insolvent, where the securities have been discharged. The renewal of the above loan, by receiving the discount and continuing the original obligation, seems to be the mode of doing business in the bank. And in order to bring up in all its force the principle relied on as a discharge, it may be admitted that in common cases of security the bank, by giving the extensions to the loan, as in this case, would exonerate the securities, yet the question arises whether in this case the securities, from the indulgence given, are exonerated. The facts set up in the pleas, and which if proved must be proved by parol, go directly to contradict the writing obligatory. In the writing the defendants, and the other securities, bind themselves as principals, yet they say they are not so bound, and did not bind themselves as principals, but as securities; and they must be permitted, if the plea be sustained, to introduce parol proof of the fact thus alleged. And we are now to inquire whether this may be done at law, not in chancery.

Without undertaking to decide whether equity can give relief or not, there seems to be no principle better established than that, at law, parol evidence cannot be received to contradict or vary a written agreement. Indeed the general rule is the same in equity; but parol evidence is sometimes admitted in equity to prevent the specific execution of a written agreement, where it has been rescinded, or executed, as varied by consent of the party. Paine v. McIntier, 1 Mass. 69; 10 Mass. 244; Snowden v. Hemming, 1 Dall. [1 U. S.] 83, 11 Mass. 27. It is said that under the statute of Ohio, which authorizes the court, on the rendition of judgment, to designate the principal and the securities, so that the property of the principal may first be taken to satisfy the judgment before the property of the securities is liable, the courts of Ohio hear parol proof, as to who is principal and who are securities. And that under this rule the Ohio courts would be bound, on rendering judgment, in this case, to make the enquiry. And that if they would be bound to do this, it follows, as a matter of course, that the matters alleged in these pleas might be heard and acted on. Such may be the rule under the above statute, and it may be a proper one; but it applies to instruments where upon the face of the obligation it does not appear who are principals or securities. To give effect to the statute this enquiry must be made, and it is not in contradiction to the instrument, but in explanation of its legal effect; an effect, known to the parties at the time they executed the contract. But in this instrument the parties have bound themselves as principals. Is not the defendant, therefore, and all the other parties to the instrument estopped from denying this fact which they have solemnly admitted under their seals? Hunt v. U. S., [Case No. 6,900;] 1 Chit. Pl. 634; Will. (Mass.) 9; 1 Saund. Pl. & Ev. 316, 325, note 4; [Conway v. Alexander,] 7 Cranch, [11 U. S.] 223; 2 Strange, 817; 7 Term R. 537; 2 Taunt. 278; Co. Litt. 252a; Com. Dig. Estop. This being the form of such instruments adopted by the bank, it was in its effect not a matter of form but of substance. Under this obligation the bank was not bound to give notice, nor was it bound to use active diligence. And it was under this view of the legal effect of this obligation and others, of a similar form, that the bank felt itself authorized to protract the period of payment from time to time, on the payment of the discount, without a renewal of the instrument.

If the defendant had bound himself as a security and not as principal; or had bound himself generally, without specifying in what capacity, he might show that he was security; and then the contract for extending his liability beyond the period contemplated in the contract, without his knowledge or consent, would, no doubt, discharge him. But all being principals, no extension of time for payment, or any other indulgence could operate to discharge any of the parties. It would indeed, be a singular rule of law, short of the statute of limitations, or lapse of time which raises a presumption of payment, which should discharge a principal from his bond. If the defendant were really a principal in the writing, the counsel would hardly contend for his discharge. The rigid technical rule is complained of, and the court are called on, in the spirit of modern reform and advancement, to give liberal views to the case. In short, that they should disregard the technical rule, which does not permit parol evidence, in contradiction to a written instrument, and which, it is contended is often the means of great injustice. Principles of law are adopted not with reference to particular cases, but with the view of preserving the rights of parties, and promoting the great ends of justice. And it is not improbable, that the most salutary rule may, under the peculiar circumstances of a particular case, fail to attain this end. But this rule has become an axiom in the law. It has stood the test of time and experience, and cannot be abandoned, without inconceivable danger. Now it does not appear to be unreasonable or unjust to hold an individual to his solemn contract. If this rule shall be relaxed, how shall he be bound. What certainty will there be in contracts. The rule is well settled, and we think wisely settled, that a man shall be estopped, unless fraud be shown, to deny that which he has admitted by an instrument of the highest dignity. The doctrine of estoppel is founded on reason and justice, and is abundantly sustained by authority. 1 Saund. Pl. & Ev. 316; [Conway v. Alexander,] 7 Cranch, [11 U. S.] 223; Chit. Eq. Dig. 393; 2 Ves. Jr. 542.

In cases of trust, equity will sometimes treat a deed absolute upon its face as a mortgage, but in doing this, parol proof is not heard in contradiction of the instrument, but in explanation of the transaction, to prevent a perpetration of a fraud by the mortgagee. The penalty in a bond is remitted, because it was intended by the parties, and such is the legal effect of the instrument, to operate as a security. And the penalty will have secured the object for which it was introduced, on the recovery of the indemnity. It is believed that no case can be found, where a party has been permitted, in the absence of fraud, to disregard his solemn obligation, or deny a material fact, admitted in it. If the bank had practiced a fraud in the instrument, the court on this ground, either at law or equity, might enquire into the facts establishing the fraud; and as in the case of an absolute deed, prevent the consummation of the fraud. But no such allegation is here made, and the facts in the case do not warrant such a presumption.

Upon the whole we are clearly of the opinion that the special pleas do not set up matter in defence, of which the defendant can avail himself in this form of action, and consequently the demurrers must be sustained to the third, fourth, and fifth pleas, and the court think the second and sixth pleas, under the demurrer to the replication must be held bad. And unless the defendant wishes a trial on the general issue, a judgment must be entered. The case was submitted to the court, and judgment was entered.

This case was removed to the supreme court, by a writ of error, and the judgment of the circuit court was affirmed. [Sprigg v. Bank of Mt. Pleasant,] 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 257.

[NOTE. This decision was affirmed by the supreme court in Sprigg v. Bank of Mt. Pleasant, 10 Pet. (35 U. S.) 257. Mr. Justice Thompson, in delivering the opinion, said: "It falls within the settled rule of law in relation to sureties, that extending to the principal further time of payment, by a new agreement, will discharge the surety. This, indeed, has not been denied on the argument. It has been contended that it appearing expressly on the face of the bond that the defendant acknowledged himself as principal, did not vary the question; for that all joint and several obligors in a bond are, in a judgment of law, considered principals. That is true, as a prima facie presumption of law, but is not conclusive upon a party when drawn in question before a proper tribunal. But, as matter of estoppel at law, it may stand on a different footing, and is, at all events, as matter of fact more conclusive. * * * In ordinary cases, when sureties sign an instrument without any designation of the character in which they become bound, it may be reasonable to conclude that they understood that their liability was conditional, and attached only in default of payment by the principal. And hence the reasonableness of the rule of law which requires of the creditor that his conduct with respect to his debtor should be such as not to enlarge the liability of the surety, and make him responsible beyond what he understood he had bound himself. But when one who is in reality only surety is willing to place himself in the situation of a principal by expressly declaring upon his contract that he binds himself as such, there cannot be any hardship in holding him to the character in which he assumes to place himself. As to that particular contract, he undertakes as a partner with the debtor, and has no more right to disclaim the character of principal than the creditor would have to treat him as principal if he had set out in the obligation that he was only surety."

[The defendant in this case then filed a bill in equity to enjoin the bank from further proceedings on the judgment. This bill was dismissed. Sprigg v. Bank of Mt. Pleasant, Case No. 13,257. Sprigg then appealed to the supreme court, which affirmed the decree. 14 Pet. (39 U. S.) 201.]

Case No. 892.

BANK OF NEWBURY v. BALDWIN.

[1 Cliff. 519.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. Term, 1860.[2]

BANKS AND BANKING—NOTE PAYABLE TO CASHIER — PAROL EVIDENCE TO EXPLAIN — PRINCIPAL AND AGENT.

1. Where a cashier of a bank took a note running to him as "cashier," without specifying of what bank, held, that evidence was admissible to show that, in taking the note, the cashier was acting as agent of a certain bank.

[See Bank of U. S. v. Lyman, Case No. 924.]

2. Between the original parties to a bill or note the general rule appears to be, that the facts are open to inquiry; and that an agent is not liable to be sued upon contracts made by him in behalf of his principal, if the name of the principal is disclosed to the person contracted with at the time of entering into the contract.

3. Where on the face of the note the person to whom it was given was designated "cashier," and it was furthermore agreed in the case that such person was in fact cashier of Newbury Bank, held, that the case must be viewed as if the words "Cashier of Newbury Bank" had been written on the note.

[See Bank of U. S. v. Davis, Case No. 915; Blair v. First Nat. Bank, Id. 1,485.]

At law. This case was in some respects similar to the preceding, [Hale v. Baldwin, Case No. 5,913,] being an action of assumpsit upon a promissory note signed by James W. Baldwin. [Judgment for plaintiff.]

The note was in the following terms:—"$3,500. Five months after date I promise to pay to the order of O. C. Hale, Esq., cashier, thirty-five hundred dollars at either bank in Boston, value received." The plaintiff bank was a corporation of Vermont, and the defendant, at the time of making the note and when the suit was brought, was a citizen of Massachusetts. As stated in the previous case, the defendant had, before the commencement of the suit, obtained a certificate of discharge from his debts in the insolvency court of Massachusetts, but the plaintiff in this case took no part in the insolvent proceedings. Defendant pleaded the general issue, and also the certificate of discharge in bar of the suit. It was agreed that O. C. Hale was the cashier of the Bank of Newbury at the time of the making of the note. The court said: "Two questions are presented for decision, but one of them is the same as that decided in the preceding case, and must be ruled in the same way;" and it was held, "first, that the power given to the United States to pass bankrupt laws is not exclusive; second, that the fair and ordinary exercise of that power by states does not necessarily involve a violation of the obligation of contracts; third, but where, in the exercise of that power, the states pass beyond their own limits and the rights of their own citizens, and act upon the rights of citizens of other states, there arises a conflict of sovereign power and a collision with the judicial powers granted to the United States, which renders the exercise of such a power incompatible with the rights of other states. Ogden v. Saunders, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 213; Boyle v. Zacharie, 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 635."

H. C. Hutchins, for plaintiff.
F. A. Brooks, for defendant.

CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice. Another question, however, is presented in this case which deserves to be very carefully considered. It is insisted by the defendant that, inasmuch as the promise is expressed to O. C. Hale, cashier, without any designation of the plaintiff corporation, that the law applicable to negotiable paper deems the promise to be made to O. C. Hale as the payee of the note, and that no one else can have the legal title without indorsement; and consequently it is immaterial in whom the equitable interest may be. Mere abstract propositions are of little utility in the determination of a case, unless they are based upon the actual facts, as proved or admitted by the parties. Hale was in fact the cashier of the plaintiff bank at the time the note was given, and that fact appears by the unconditional admission of the parties; and the defendant also admits, if the evidence is admissible, that, in taking the note, he was acting as the cashier and agent of the plaintiff corporation. It is clear, therefore, that the only question presented is, whether the corporation plaintiffs can be permitted to introduce evidence to show that the person named in the note in taking it acted on their account, and not in his private capacity. Under recent decisions in this country it cannot be doubted that if the payee had been described in the note as cashier of the Newbury Bank, the suit in this case would have been well brought in the name of the corporation. Assuming the fact to be so, the case would then fall directly within the decision in the case of the Commercial Bank v. French, 21 Pick. 486, and several other cases therein cited. Now it seems to me that the agreement made by the parties supplies the omission in the note, and brings the case within the principle of that decision.

Reference is made by the defendant to the case of Bank of U. S. v. Lyman, 20 Vt. 666, as asserting a contrary doctrine. But it should be observed that there was no agreement in that case showing that the person named as payee in the note was the cashier of the plaintiff corporation. On the face of the note in this case it appears that O. C. Hale was cashier, and with the agreement superadded to what is written, I am of the opinion that the case must be viewed precisely as it would be if the words "Cashier of the Bank of Newbury" had been written in the note, and on that state of the case no doubt is entertained that it would be competent for the plaintiffs to prove by parol evidence that the cashier, in taking the note, was acting as cashier and agent of the corporation. Banking corporations necessarily act by some agent, and according to the uniform usage the principal portion of their business is transacted through their cashier. There is some conflict in the authorities applicable to the particular question under consideration, and it may well be admitted that it is not easy to reconcile them, or to deduce from them a rule of universal application. Between the original parties to a note or bill of exchange, the general rule appears to be that the facts are open to inquiry, and consequently that an agent is not liable to be sued upon contracts made by him in behalf of his principal if the name of the principal is disclosed and made known to the person contracted with at the time of entering into the contract. Accordingly it was held in the case of Watervliet Bank v. White, 1 Denio, 608, that the indorsement of a note to "E. Olcott, Esq., cashier, or order," made upon it at the time of the purchase of the note by the bank of which the indorsee was the cashier, had the effect to transfer the same to the corporation, it appearing from the pleadings and proof that such was the design of the transaction. Folger v. Chase, 18 Pick. 63; Hartford Bank v. Barry, 17 Mass. 94. Where individuals subscribe their proper names to a promissory note, prima facie they are personally liable, although they add a description of the character in which the note is given; but it was held in the case of Brockway v. Allen, 17 Wend. 40, that such presumption of liability might be rebutted by proof that the note was in fact given by the makers as the agent of the corporation for a debt of the corporation due to the payee, and that they were duly authorized to make such a note as the agents of the corporation; and the court say that such facts may be pleaded in bar of an action against the makers averring knowledge on the part of the payee. Numerous other cases have been decided in this and other states which must have proceeded upon the same ground as that last cited, else the principle on which they rest cannot be sustained. Long v. Colburn, 11 Mass. 97; Mann v. Chandler, 9 Mass. 335; Episcopal Charitable Soc. v. Episcopal Church in Dedham, 1 Pick. 372; Emerson v. Providence Hat Manuf'g Co., 12 Mass. 237; Ballou v. Talbot, 16 Mass. 461; Rice v. Gove, 22 Pick. 158; Shaw v. Nudd, 8 Pick. 9; New England Marine Ins. Co. v. De Wolf, Id. 56; Medway Cotton M. Co. v. Adams, 10 Mass. 360; Thacher v. Winslow, [Case No. 13,863;] Taunton & S. B. Turnpike v. Whiting, 10 Mass. 327; Gilmore v. Pope, 5 Mass. 491; Inhabitants of Garland v. Reynolds, 20 Me. 45; Varner v. Nobleborough, 2 Me. 121; Irish v. Webster, 5 Me. 171. Morton, J., says in Commercial Bank v. French, 21 Pick. 490: "The principle is that the promise must be understood according to the intention of the parties. If in truth it be an undertaking to the corporation whether a right or wrong name, whether the name of the corporation or some of its officers be used, it should be declared on and treated as a promise to the corporation. Where the instrument appears to be executed in the name of the principal, the form of the words is not material." Wilks v. Back, 2 East, 142; Spittle v. Lavender, 5 Moore, 270; Pigott v. Thompson, 3 Bos. & P. 147; Combes' Case, 9 Coke, 77a; Frontin v. Small, 2 Ld. Raym. 1418; Taylor v. Dobbins, 1 Strange, 399; Mott v. Hicks, 1 Cow. 513. So also where a check was drawn by a person who was a cashier of an incorporated bank, and it appeared doubtful upon the face of the instrument whether it was an official or private act, parol evidence was held to be admissible to show that it was an official act. Mechanics' Bank of Alexandria v. Bank of Columbia, 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 326. That case is a much stronger one than the case at bar, because the promisor had signed his name to the check without any designation of his official character, and in disposing of the case Mr. Justice Johnson says, it is by no means true, as was contended in argument, that the acts of agents derived their validity from professing on the face of them to have been done in the exercise of their agency. In the more solemn exercise of derivative powers, as applied to the execution of instruments known to the common law, rules of form have been prescribed; but in the diversified duties of a general agent the liability of the principal depends upon the facts, that the act was done in the exercise and within the limits of the powers delegated. These facts, says the learned judge, are necessarily inquirable into by a court and jury. See, also, Hodgson v. Dexter, 1 Cranch, [5 U. S.] 345. Although it is stated that the defendant objects to the admission of the note in evidence, still it is evident that the question is not broadly presented for decision independently of the agreed statement, because the admitted fact that the payee of the note was the cashier of the Bank of Newbury at the time of the making of the note, is as much a part of the agreed case as the note itself; so that in determining the question, that fact must be superadded to the note, else the decision of the court would turn upon something less than the whole case; and indeed the agreed statement proceeds throughout upon the ground that nothing is wanting to make out the plaintiff's case under the general issue, except proof of the fact that, in taking the note, O. C. Hale was acting as cashier and agent of the plaintiff corporation; whether that evidence is admissible or not is the question submitted to the determination of the court, and nothing else is submitted under the plea of the general issue. Under the special circumstances of this case, I am of the opinion that the evidence is admissible, and, according to the agreement of the parties, the defendant must be defaulted.

[NOTE. This case was afterwards affirmed by the supreme court. In delivering the opinion of the court, Mr. Justice Clifford said: "The promise, as appears by the terms of the note, was to O. C. Hale, cashier, and the question is whether parol evidence is admissible to show that he was cashier of the plaintiff bank, and that in taking the note he acted as cashier of the corporation. Contract of the parties shows that he was cashier, and that the promise was to him in that character. Banking corporations necessarily act by some agent, and it is a matter of common knowledge that such institutions usually have an officer known as their cashier. In general, he is the officer who superintends the books and transactions of the bank, under the orders of the directors. His acts within the sphere of his duty are in behalf of the bank, and to that extent he is the agent of the corporation. Viewed in the light of these well-known facts, it is clear that evidence may be received to show that a note given to the cashier of a bank was intended as a promise to the corporation, and that such evidence has no tendency whatever to contradict the terms of the instrument. * * * Doubt cannot arise in this case that the person named in the note was in fact the cashier of the plaintiff bank, because the fact is admitted; and it is also admitted that the plaintiff can prove that in taking the note he acted as the cashier and agent of the corporation, provided the evidence is legally admissible. Our conclusion is that the evidence is admissible, and that the suit was properly brought in the name of the bank." Baldwin v. Bank of Newbury, 1 Wall. (68 U. S.) 234.]

BANK OF NORTH AMERICA v. MEREDITH.

[2 Wash. C. C. 47.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. April Term, 1807.

NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS—LIABILITY OF INDORSERS—APPLICATION OF SECURITY BY CREDITOR.

M. and R. had become, by separate engagements, liable to make up any deficiency of the proceeds of property assigned to the plaintiffs to pay the debts of another, for equal portions of which they were also liable as endorsers. After the deficiency was ascertained, an account was rendered, in which the proceeds of the sale were credited to both M. and R. R. having become insolvent, the court refused to permit the plaintiffs to apply the proceeds of the property to discharge the whole of R.'s engagement, and to claim the whole deficiency from M.; the plaintiffs having applied the proceeds, in the first instance, to the discharge of both debts.

[See Cremer v. Higginson, Case No. 3,383.]

This was a case stated for the opinion of the court. The Schuylkill and Susquehannah Canal Company drew a bill for 7,000 dollars on their treasurer in favour of Ruston, and another in favour of the defendant for 10,000 dollars, which they endorsed, and got discounted at the Bank of North America. These drafts were protested, and the canal company conveyed to the bank considerable property, with a declaration of trust, that if the above debt of 17,000 dollars was not paid in a certain time, the property should be sold to discharge it. Ruston and the defendant entered into separate engagements, to continue responsible for what might not be raised by this property. The bank sold the property, and rendered two accounts at different times, in which the canal company is charged with the 17,000 dollars, and interest, and credited with the sale of the above property as the money was received. Ruston having become insolvent before those accounts were rendered, the question reserved is, whether the proceeds of the property sold shall be applied first, to discharge Ruston's bill, and the residue to be applied to the defendant's; or whether they shall be applied to both, in proportion to their amount.

Lewis and Gibson, for the plaintiff, contended that the bank had a right to make the application; which was denied by Read, for defendant, and he cited 1 Vern. 34.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. Both law and equity are against the plaintiffs. Upon the strictest principles of law, the plaintiffs have lost their election. The deed from the canal company made a specific application of these funds to both debts; and the bank, by the two accounts, understood it in this way, and applied the proceeds to the two bills. To attempt to vary this application, after the failure of Ruston, cannot now be permitted. Those payments, therefore, must be applied to both, in proportion to their amounts.

[2 Hughes, 369; 10 N. B. R. 289, 290.]

District Court, E. D. North Carolina. 1874.[1]

BANKRUPTCY—STATE BANKS—RIGHT TO INTEREST ON BANK BILLS.

[A creditor holding bank bills of a state bank adjudged a bankrupt is entitled to interest thereon only from the time of filing proofs in bankruptcy, where no demand for payment has been made by him, and there is no evidence of when the bank bills came into his possession.]

In bankruptcy. The register (A. W. Shaffer) reported as follows: Question First. Are the creditors who have proved their claims against the foregoing estate, the principal of which has been paid in full, entitled to interest upon said proofs until the same were paid in full? Second. If the creditors are so entitled, shall the same be computed from the date of suspension of specie payment by the bank? Or, from the actual date of possession and ownership of the bills? Or, from the date of commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy? Or, from the date of filing the bills and proof of the debt before the register, and at what rate? And the said parties requested that the same should be certified to the district judge for his opinion thereon, and I do so certify the same. Inclosed herewith is a tabular statement, showing the dates and amounts of the proofs and nature of debt, by Wilson & Shober, and the dates and amounts of the respective dividends thereon, together with the briefs and authorities cited upon the subject of this claim.

Data: On the 31st day of October, 1868, was filed the petition upon which the Bank of North Carolina was, on the 5th day of November, 1868, duly adjudicated bankrupt. On the 7th day of December, 1868, was held the first meeting of creditors, whereat was proven debts amounting to two hundred and nine thousand two hundred and twenty-two dollars and fifteen cents, and Charles Dewey chosen assignee, and received assignment of the bankrupt's estate. Four several dividends have been declared on said estate, the fourth and last of which was made February 3d, 1874, and on all the debts proven up to this date, amounting in the aggregate to three hundred and twelve thousand one hundred and eighty dollars and eighty-four cents, there has been paid one hundred per cent., and there still remains in the hands of the assignee a surplus of about thirty thousand dollars, together with various suits pending and undetermined upon claims due to the assignee, for upward of forty thousand dollars more. No limitation has been set to the proof of debt, and small amounts of the bills of the corporation come in for proof at intervals. All which is respectfully submitted, this 4th of February, 1874.

Thomas B. Keogh, for Wilson & Shober.
B. F. Moore, for the assignee therein.

BROOKS, District Judge. Wilson & Shober, the creditors at whose instance this question was certified, were, as they allege, holders of a large amount in the bills of the bankrupt corporation, which were in the usual form of bank notes. The corporation was duly declared bankrupt on its own petition, on the 5th day of November, 1868. The first meeting of creditors was held on the 7th day of December, 1868, at which meeting Charles Dewey was chosen assignee, to whom a proper assignment was duly made. At said meeting, debts were proved against the estate amounting to the sum of two hundred and nine thousand two hundred and twenty-two dollars and fifteen cents, and the evidences of debt filed, much the largest portion of which consisted in the circulating notes of the bank, payable on demand. The complaining creditors filed proofs of debt at various times, the first, on the 5th of December, 1868, for two hundred dollars, the second, on the 31st of January, 1870, for thirty-eight thousand eight hundred dollars, more than twelve months after the filing of the first proof. More than twelve months after the filing of the second proof, a third proof was filed, amounting to three thousand eight hundred dollars; amounting altogether to the sum of forty-six thousand four hundred and sixty dollars. From these proofs and the notes filed therewith it appears affirmatively that this entire indebtedness of the bank was for the notes or circulating medium of the bank, payable as before stated. It appears further, that three several dividends were declared and paid to creditors: the first on the 24th of February, 1870, of fifty-five per cent.; the second, on the 19th of January, 1871, of thirty-five per cent.; and the third, on the 9th day of April, 1872, of ten per cent., amounting in all to the sum of three hundred and twelve thousand one hundred and eighty dollars and eighty-four cents. It is thus shown that these complaining creditors have received the full face value, or one hundred cents for every dollar, of the bills of the bank proved by them. Rare as this result is in the practical working of any bankrupt law, American or foreign, fortunate as all the creditors have been, these creditors are not yet satisfied, but they complain that they have not been paid interest on the forty-six thousand four hundred and sixty dollars, from some day in the year 1861, when, they say, the Bank of North

[1] [Reversed in Case No. 895.]

Carolina refused to pay specie in the redemption of its notes. They allege that there is still a large surplus in the hands of the assignee, out of which they are entitled by law to be paid interest from some day in 1861 to the date of the last dividend on this debt. They say, secondly, that if they are not so entitled, they are yet entitled to interest from the date of the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy. Thirdly. If this be not correct, they are entitled to interest from the day of the order of adjudication of bankruptcy; and finally, otherwise failing, they claim interest from the date of actual proof and filing before the register.

As to the first position taken by the complaining creditors, it needs only to be stated, and the absurdity of the claim sufficiently appears. If Shylock would have his pound of flesh, he should know that it must only be in strict fulfilment of the contract. What, then, was the obligation of the bank in regard to the payment or redemption of the bills proved by these creditors? It was simply this, that the bills or notes should be paid whenever presented or demanded at its office, at a place designated on the face of each note, and to such person as may make such demand. Was any demand ever made by any holder of the notes proved by these creditors? There is no evidence, nor even allegation, that any demand was ever made. We have the right, and indeed it is our duty, to presume that they held but two hundred dollars of these bills on the 5th of December, 1868, for why should they prove and file but two hundred dollars, if at that time they were the holders of forty-six thousand dollars of the bills of the bank? Whenever they may have become possessed of any of the bills of the bank, could they not have presented the same and demanded payment? Certainly they could; and if the notes so presented had not been then and there paid, it would have been the privilege of such holder to cause the same to be protested; and immediately such notes would not only become interest-bearing obligations of the bank, but such holder would have acquired the right to sue, and recover from the bank the amount of the bills so presented, and the interest from the date of such demand. And moreover, damages, provided expressly in the charter of the banks. What were these bank bills in the hands of these money-dealers? They were money in the sense in which bank notes payable to bearer are distinguishable from property. They bought them as money, and if they held them all before they filed them with their proofs of debt, they held them as money. It was their business to deal in money, current and uncurrent, and especially the uncurrent. It is not necessary for me to say whether the obligation of the holder to present for and demand payment at the place designated in the bills would be necessary, if at the time the corporation had ceased to do business at the place so designated; if it had closed its office and ceased to redeem on any terms its notes, for it is not my duty to decide hypothetical questions.

If bank bills be presented and payment demanded and refused, then, as before stated, the holder may cause protest to be made. Such demand and non-payment entitles such holder to sue for the amount of the bills and damages. The right to sue thus acquired is personal, and belongs exclusively to such holder. He may sell or pass to another the bills so protested, but so soon as he does so they become again a circulating medium, and the person who so receives them acquires no right by virtue of the previous demand and protest, but only such right as belongs to any ordinary holder. I do not mean to say that the holder of any interest-bearing obligation has not the same right to require payment of principal and interest from an estate of a bankrupt, if there should be sufficient to pay principal and interest, as such holder would have against an individual or corporation not in bankruptcy; but in neither case would the holder of non-interest-bearing notes be entitled to any sum beyond the face value of the bill until a demand, or refusal, or omission to pay by the debtor. In case of bank notes, it is especially required, to constitute a sufficient demand, that the person demanding payment should show at the place that he is prepared to surrender the bills or evidences of debt. I hold that the proofs in this case, as they are filed, as regards the time and amount, are equivalent to a demand, to the extent of entitling each creditor so proving to the full sum so proved, and interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum from the date of filing such proofs to the date of declaring the first dividend, then at the same rate on the balance of the principal sum to the date of declaring the second dividend, and in the same way until the principal and interest is paid.

And it is referred to A. W. Shaffer, Esq., register, to compute the interest due upon each proof according to the rule here prescribed. And if, upon such computation being made, it shall appear that the fund now in the hands of the assignee is insufficient to pay the whole sum to the creditors for interest, then such creditors shall be entitled to and paid such interest pro rata.

[In bankruptcy. Appeal from an order of the district court for the eastern district of North Carolina. Reversed.

[The Bank of North Carolina filed its petition in bankruptcy October 31, 1868, and November 5, 1868, was adjudged a bankrupt. Debts were proven, amounting to $312,180.-84, on which dividends amounting in all to 100 per cent. were declared, leaving a surplus in the hands of the assignee of about $30,000. The question as to interest on the amount of the bank bills held by certain creditors was certified by the register to the district judge. and. on his deciding (Case No. 894) against the contention of the creditors, was appealed to this court.]

BOND, Circuit Judge, delivered the following opinion, reversing the decision of the district judge:

This is a petition on the part of certain creditors of the Bank of North Carolina, an adjudged bankrupt, to be allowed interest on their claims from the date of the adjudication in bankruptcy, there being a surplus fund after payment of all the debts of the bank in full. The creditors who petition are the bill-holders of the bank. I can see no just reason why this claim should not be allowed; and a complete answer may be found to all objections made at bar to the allowance of interest, in the very able and elaborate opinion of Chief Justice Shaw in the case of Williams v. President & Directors of American Bank, 4 Metc. (Mass,) 317, and in the equally clear opinion of Judge Hubbard in the case of Brown v. Lamb, 6 Metc. (Mass.) 203, which exhausts the subject. The case will be sent to the district court with directions to proceed accordingly.

BANKRUPTCY—POWERS OF REGISTER.

[1. The bankruptcy act of March 2, 1867, (14 Stat. 519, § 4,) confers power upon the register to make all such orders as are proper to be made in any bankruptcy proceedings, except only such as the law provides in express terms, he shall not make, and such others as the law provides that the judge of the bankruptcy court shall make.]

[2. With these exceptions, wherever it is provided in the law that the court may exercise a power, the register to whom a case in bankruptcy has been referred may exercise that power, unless some person having some interest in the estate of the bankrupt shall make some objection to the exercise thereof.]

[3. The register in bankruptcy has power to direct a sale of debts or choses in action belonging to or being a part of the bankrupt's estate, upon a proper application, if there be no objection made by a person or party having some interest in the proper distribution of the bankrupt estate.]

[4. On a charge that an application to the register for an order of sale of the bankrupt's estate was caused by an improper solicitation or interference of the register, the strict rules of evidence applicable to the trial of causes should not be applied; and, if the party making the charge examines the register, he is not bound by the register's answers, so as to be precluded from offering other evidence, though such evidence may be offered to impair the force of his testimony, or even to contradict him.]

[5. The register to whom a case has been referred may, in case of delay in winding up the bankrupt estate, properly inquire why a settlement has not been made, suggest the propriety of making progress, and indicate what steps the assignee should take.]

[In bankruptcy. The assignee of the Bank of North Carolina, having applied for and obtained from the register an order for a sale of certain choses in action belonging to the estate of the bankrupt, which "could not be collected without inconvenient delay or expenses," now moves to expunge the order from the records on the ground that the register had no power to make such order. BROOKS, District Judge. There is but a single question presented by this motion, made by the solicitors for the assignee. They ask that the order heretofore granted upon the petition of the assignee for the sale of choses in action, belonging to the estate of the bankrupt corporation, be rescinded or revoked. This motion is made and filed, in writing, in conformity with the practice of the court, in which is set forth the reasons for which they ask that the order of sale shall be revoked. Whether the order the assignee now asks should be granted, depends upon the power vested by law in the register, to whom this case had been referred, to make the order which they now say should be annulled. It is insisted, in support of this motion, that Mr. Register Shaffer had no power to consider the application of the assignee or to make the order referred to. This question has been fully and ably argued by counsel, and carefully considered.

I conclude that the register in bankruptcy has power to direct a sale of debts or choses in action belonging to or being a part of the bankrupt's estate, upon a proper application, if there be no objection made by a person or party having some interest in the proper distribution of the bankrupt estate. It does not appear that any opposition was offered or expressed by any party to the entry of the order complained of. I have so concluded, for the following reasons:

First.—It has been the practice in this district for the register to hear these petitions and make such orders,—a practice so invariable as to be almost without exception; for, of the thousands of such orders as have been entered in bankruptcy proceedings in the district under the existing law, probably not more than eight or ten were ever considered or signed by me; and these were only so considered because I was, at the time, more accessible than the register to the assignee or their counsel, who desired such orders, and only for their convenience.

Second.—I am persuaded that such has not only been the practice in this district, but that it has been the almost invariable practice in every other district in the United States.

Third.—It is clear, I think, that the power is intended to be conferred (and in fact is conferred) by the law upon the register to make all such orders as are proper to be made in any bankruptcy proceedings, except only such as the law provides in express terms he shall not make, and such others as the law provides that the judge of the bankruptcy court shall make. Keeping these exceptions in view, wherever it is provided in the law that the court may exercise a power, the register to whom a case in bankruptcy has been referred may exercise that power, unless some person, having some interest in the proper distribution of the estate of the bankrupt, shall make some objection to the exercise thereof.

That a register in bankruptcy is not such a mere clerk, or servant, of the district judge as the counsel for the assignee insists he is, may be (at least) inferred from one of the qualifications required. I refer to the provisions of section 4994 of the Revised Statutes, which declares that "no person shall be eligible for appointment as register in bankruptcy unless he is a counsellor of the district court for which he is appointed, or of some one of the courts of record of the state in which he resides." Now if it was intended that the register should perform the duties of a clerk, merely, and had no power to do more than make calculations, and write that which the judge may direct, it would strike every lawyer at once that the requirement, that the register should be a lawyer, was not only useless and senseless, but one positively detrimental to the prompt progress of the business of the court (and I might add) to the comfort of the district judge. If a clerk only was required to write and compute figures quickly and correctly, I am sure that no judge of my experience would be apt to prefer lawyers as a class for that service, for we all know that lawyers, as such, are not distinguished for the legibility of their penmanship. What, then, was the object of the requirement, if it was not that the register is designed (as I hold the law declares he is) an assistant of the district judge? If the power was not with the register to examine such an application when filed in a cause pending before him, and to grant the order in any case in which there is no objection made, I can scarcely see what a register may properly do that may not be as well done, and perhaps better, by others than lawyers as a class.

I will remark here that the charge made by the counsel for the assignee, that the application for the order of sale was caused by any improper solicitation or interference of the register, I do not regard as sustained by the record, and certainly is not sustained by the testimony offered in support of this motion. The counsel for the assignee, when they offered to examine the register, stated that they were conscious that they would be bound by his answers as a witness tendered by them. If it had become pertinent as a question in this proceeding, I would not have agreed with the counsel in that opinion. Certainly they would be bound by his answers if that was the only evidence offered; but in my opinion they would not, in this case, have been so bound by his answers as to be precluded from offering other evidence, though such evidence may be offered to impair the force of his testimony, or even to contradict it. The strict rule applicable to the trial of cases generally, I think, should not be observed in cases of this nature; and if I should confine myself to the record evidence, and the testimony offered in this case (as I believe I must do if I perform my duty properly), then I must say that I see nothing which I believe would justify me in declaring that the assignee had been improperly influenced to file his application. It is a grave charge to make against any public officer that he has acted corruptly in the performance of, or when pretending to perform any official duty. Certainly no court should so declare unless such charge should be fairly shown to be true. The Bank of North Carolina was declared bankrupt in 1868, and the case was, by order of this court, referred to this register. Soon thereafter the meetings of the creditors, provided by law, were held, and Chas. Dewey was duly chosen assignee. Distinguished and able counsel of his own choice were assigned him by the court. Then nine years passed by. At the end of that time the estate was not settled; the assets are not fully distributed. It appears to me that it was quite time that some one should inquire why a final settlement had not been made. Must the district judge make that inquiry? I think he might do so without violating any rule of propriety. Could the register, to whose supervision the case had been referred, make this inquiry and even suggest the propriety of some progress—more than that, make some suggestion as to what the assignee should do? I hold that he may properly do all this. Has he done more? If so, it has not been shown. The motion to expunge the order of sale made by the register in this case is denied.

BANK OF NORTH CAROLINA v. DEWEY.

[19 N. B. R. 314.]

District Court, E. D. North Carolina. June 10, 1879.

BANKRUPTCY—VALIDITY OF COMPROMISE.

[If a debtor tenders to his creditor, and the creditor accepts, a sum smaller in amount than the debt as and for satisfaction in full, the debt is discharged.]

[See Henderson v. Moore, 5 Cranch, (9 U. S.) 11; Memphis v. Brown, Case No. 9,415.]

[In bankruptcy.] Application for re-examination of proof of claim. [Refused.]

A. W. Tourgee, for creditor.

Merrimon, Fuller & Ashe, for assignee.

Opinion of Register:

This is a proof of debt by Harriet J. Foy, daughter and administratrix de bonis non of Elizabeth Smith, deceased, of Newbern, N. C., for the sum of two thousand two hundred and seventy dollars, the consideration of which was money deposited with the bank in 1861–'62, being the balance to her credit therein since June, 1862, evidenced by the deposit or to the petition thereof in bankruptcy. This claim as proven was formally audited, passed, and allowed by the register and assignee, under their respective hands, after the withdrawal of exceptions to the form and sufficiency of proof, to wit: August 13, 1875, and the debt was entered by the register upon the dividend list for payment. On the 18th of August, 1875, the assignee informed the register that he had found upon the daily cash-book of the bank an entry purporting to be a settlement, compromise, and discharge of said debt, to wit: the check of Mrs. Smith to the bank for two thousand two hundred and seventy dollars, and the payment by the bank to Mrs. Smith therefor of the sum of seven hundred and twenty-six dollars and forty cents, or thirty-two cents on the dollar of said debt. This entry bears date June 4, 1866, and has never been posted or transferred from the daily cash to the deposit ledger of the bank, and the last-named book, together with the sworn schedules in bankruptcy, still show due to Elizabeth Smith the sum of two thousand two hundred and seventy dollars, without payment, compromise, set-off, or counter-claim. The assignee insists that the entry in the daily cash-book balances this account, and that the proof must be expunged.

To this demand the claimant answers as set forth in the annexed certificate.

Mr. Chas. Dewey, the assignee in bankruptcy of the bank, was cashier of the bank throughout the entire period of this transaction, and familiar with all its details. When this entry was exhibited by the assignee to the register, and while inspecting it, the register interrogated Mr. Dewey, as to how such a compromise, so favorable to the bank, was effected. Mr. Dewey replied: "The bank prepared a statement showing that it was able to pay only thirty-two cents, and exhibited it to the creditors, whereby the compromise was effected." "Did the officers of the bank regard it as insolvent at that time?" "No; but the stay laws were in force, and we could not collect." "Did your statement exhibited to the creditors set forth these facts as a reason why you were only able to pay thirty-two per cent.?" "No; it just stated that the bank was only able to pay thirty-two cents on the dollar of its debt." The deposit ledger of the bank shows that many persons having balances due them on deposits made in 1861–'62, including the highest officers and directors of the bank, checked them out, dollar for dollar, before and after this alleged "settlement," (June 4, 1866), and if any discount or compromise was obtained thereon the books of the bank do not show it as in this case. A schedule of the names of some of these is hereto appended, marked "B," showing date of drawing out, and the amount of balance so withdrawn.

At the same period of this alleged compromise certain persons, having intimate relations with the bank, and facilities for knowing its financial condition, purchased large quantities of its bills, and presented them for payment. They received fifty-five cents on the dollar, conditioned in writing between the bank and them that the bank would pay to them such additional sum or sums as it might from time to time pay to any of its most favored creditors, together with interest from date. These certificates or agreements covered one hundred and nine thousand dollars, composed of bills purchased, and in part of ante-war deposits, and they have, since bankruptcy, been paid in full, with stipulated interest. A statement of these, showing names of the creditors, the amount, and, so far as is possible, the date of the stipulations, is hereto appended, marked "A." Mrs. Smith was an aged widow lady, residing at a point remote from the bank, to which she could have no access for information, the books and financial condition of which she was supremely ignorant, leaving her to depend solely upon the representations of its officers. The statement exhibited to her was an official statement prepared, says Mr. Dewey, the cashier, in effect, for the purpose of promoting compromises with its creditors. Mr. Dewey says, under oath: "The bank concluded they were solvent," but, they said in their "statement" to the creditors, "we can only pay thirty-two cents on the dollar of debt!" If that meant only for the present time, while the disability to sue and collect the assets existed, then an acceptance of the thirty-two cents could not be construed into a compromise of the whole; it only meant: "We will pay you the balance when we are able; when the disability to sue ceases." But the bank did not inform their creditors that they were solvent, but in plain terms intimated the contrary in the "statement," the exhibition of which induced Mrs. Smith to accept a less sum of money for her debt than the debt amounted to. Such settlement between the bank and Mrs. Smith was obtained by misrepresentation, and was fraudulent, and void for want of consideration.

But the courts of North Carolina have gone beyond this, and held that the bare receipt of or agreement to receive a part of a debt in discharge of the whole is void for want of consideration. Bryan v. Foy, 69 N. C. 45; McKenzie v. Culbreth, 66 N. C. 534; Warren v. Skinner, 20 Com. 559; Hayes v. Davidson, 70 N. C. 573; Mitchell v. Sawyer, 71 N. C. 70; Wooten v. Sherrard, Id. 374; Love v. Johnston, 72 N. C. 415. Again, the check of Mrs. Foy on the bank was for two thousand two hundred and seventy dollars. The bank only paid seven hundred and twenty-six dollars and forty cents upon it, as admitted by all; therefore there remains due and unpaid upon her check the sum of one thousand five hundred and forty-three dollars and sixty cents. Since the date of this transaction the bank has been adjudicated bankrupt; paid all its known proven debt, amounting to upward of three hundred and seventy thousand dollars, with interest on the certificates heretofore described; all the costs of bankruptcy, including costs of collections, attorneys' fees, commissions, etc., amounting to several thousand dollars. It has compromised and compounded claims due the bank to a very large amount; has some thirty thousand dollars pending undetermined in the courts; a cash surplus of over thirty thousand dollars in the hands of the assignee, liable to two or three claims of this nature aggregating about eight hundred dollars, and to a claim for interest from adjudication of bankruptcy to final payment in full on debts proven. I am of the opinion that the alleged "compromise," if any, was fraudulent and void for want of consideration, and that the assignee should pay to the claimant the said sum of one thousand five hundred and forty-three dollars and sixty cents and interest from the time which all other creditors have received interest upon their claims allowed; the said sum of one thousand five hundred and forty-three dollars and sixty cents being the amount of said proven debt after deducting the sum actually paid upon her check, or order to the bank to pay the whole of said sum of two thousand two hundred and seventy dollars, together with ten dollars costs of this certificate. All of which is respectfully submitted.

A. W. Shaffer, Register.

BROOKS, District Judge. The deposition, or proof of debt, was filed in this case by Harriet J. Foy, as administratrix of Elizabeth Smith, on the 4th day of May, 1875, which was examined and approved as sufficient in form by the register. Subsequently, on the application of the assignee and certain creditors of the bank, the register reviewed his proceedings on said claim, under the provisions of the 34th rule, as amended, and again determined that the proofs were sufficient in form, and ordered that the claim be placed upon the dividend list for pro rata payment. To which ruling and order of the register the assignee and creditors excepted, and demanded that the questions arising on the exceptions, and the evidence taken, be certified to the district court. The certificate of the register and the evidence taken by him is before me, and other witnesses have been examined in behalf of each of the parties to this controversy. And I have been aided by able arguments of the counsel, and have now given the facts and the law involved in the case full consideration.

The facts are as follows: Elizabeth Smith, the intestate of the plaintiff, deposited with the bankrupt corporation—at a branch of that bank at Newbern—on the 14th of January, 1862, two thousand and ninety dollars, and on the 5th day of March following one hundred and eighty dollars, making two thousand two hundred and seventy dollars. That these amounts were entered to her credit by deposit, on the deposit ledger (a book kept by the bank), and also on the teller's journal (another book kept by the bank). That schedule A, No. 3, filed with the petition of the bankrupt corporation in this case, was made out from the deposit ledger, and upon that the only entries in Mrs. Smith's account were the credits before mentioned. On that book there was no charge or entry of payment made to her. Accordingly the sum so deposited was scheduled and reported as a debt due and owing by the bank; that on the teller's journal Mrs. Smith's account was balanced by a charge of her check on the 6th day of June, 1866, for the entire sum to her credit. The check so charged was produced on the trial, and the execution of it, by Mrs. Smith, was proved by the assignee in bankruptcy.

Mr. Dewey, the assignee, and Mr. Jones, were examined as witnesses. The former had been the cashier of the Bank of North Carolina, at the principal office at Raleigh, from a date anterior to the dates of the deposits mentioned, and Mr. Jones had been, from its origin, the cashier of the branch bank at Newbern. By Mr. Dewey it was shown that during the year 1866 the bank, not being able to redeem its circulation and pay other creditors by paying the full sums demanded, and as they were demanded, was then paying its debts by compromise, when demands were made, at the rate of twenty-five per cent. in gold—or its equivalent in the then currency of the country. That, in the month of June, 1866, the equivalent of twenty-five cents in gold was thirty-two cents in national currency. That Mrs. Smith's check for two thousand two hundred and seventy dollars was sent to the principal bank at Raleigh (the branch at Newbern having been discontinued in 1862), through Mr. Jones, who had been the agent of the bank at Newbern since the discontinuance of the branch. That a check of the bank on a bank in New York for thirty-two per cent. of the deposit debt to the credit of Mrs. Smith was forwarded to Mr. Jones for Mrs. Smith, and that the balance, say one thousand five hundred and forty-three dollars and sixty cents, was charged to profit and loss, and the check charged to Mrs. Smith for the full sum on the teller's journal, which balanced her account, and through inadvertence no entry was made of this transaction in the deposit ledger. That a large amount of the bills of the bank was redeemed at that rate, and some of the depositors were settled with at the same rate. That when creditors of the bank applied for information they were informed that the bank was settling with its creditors at that rate. By the evidence of Mr. Jones it was shown that he was the agent and confidential friend of Mrs. Smith—who was considerably advanced in years; that at her request he drew the check and witnessed the execution of it by her, forwarded the same, and received the check for thirty-two per cent., mentioned by Mr. Dewey; that amount, in money, he paid to Mrs. Smith in satisfaction of her claim, at which settlement she appeared to be and expressed herself as satisfied. Mrs. Foy was examined in her behalf, and other witnesses were examined, by whom it was shown that, after the payment to Mrs. Smith, other claims against the bank were compromised and settled by the payment of higher proportions of the debt than thirty-two per cent.; that other creditors of the bank, who refused to accept the compromise offered, subsequently received the full amount of principal of their claims from the assets of the bank.

The questions of fact, to be determined in this case, are these: First. Whether the payment of thirty-two per cent. of the sum deposited by Mrs. Smith was tendered by the bank and received by her as and for payment and satisfaction of her entire claim, or was that sum tendered and accepted only as a partial or pro tanto payment on that debt? Secondly. If the sum paid was offered and accepted as a compromise and full settlement of the debt, then was the creditor induced to accept, as full payment, a sum so materially less than her demand, by reason of any fraud or deception practised on the part of the agents of the bank? I hold it to be clear that the whole sum due Mrs. Smith was not satisfied and discharged upon the payment to her of less than the amount due, unless the sum paid was both tendered and accepted as and for payment and satisfaction in full of her demands, and was so understood by both debtor and creditor at the time of this transaction. Referring to the testimony of Mr. Dewey and Mr. Jones, I am well satisfied that the payment made was offered and accepted as a compromise and full settlement of Mrs. Smith's claim against the bank, and that it was so understood at the time by both parties. There can be no doubt as to the purpose of the bank; and as to Mrs. Smith, her confidential friend, her agent, that one with whom she had trusted, for years, her money, says that the information upon which she acted came to her through him; that he received for and paid to her the sum paid, and that she appeared to be, and expressed satisfaction at the settlement. The opinion of the supreme court of North Carolina in the case of McKenzie v. Culbreth, 66 N. C. 534, and, following that, the case of Witherington v. Phillips, 70 N. C. 444, are relied upon by the creditor to show that any payment of a less sum in money than the whole sum due will not discharge the debtor. If that court intended to declare that when the amount paid by the debtor was tendered by him for compromise, payment, and for full satisfaction of the debt, and the same was accepted by the creditor without fraud on the part of the debtor, then I do not concur in that opinion.

We may be able to discover some reason in a requirement that an obligation evidenced by a writing under seal shall only be released or discharged by an instrument under seal. And, again, that obligations of a certain character shall only be binding upon the parties when the same shall be reduced to writing. In this age of progress, of the wonderfully increased as well as changed dealings between men, arising from trade and commerce, accelerated and multiplied as these have been by the wonderfully increased facilities for intercourse and trade, which were never enjoyed until within the last half century, it must appear as strange as it would seem to be hard upon the commercial man if the courts shall hold that he must pay, under all circumstances, to the last dollar, all his obligations, and even with the consent of his creditor, obtained without fraud on his part, he cannot obtain a discharge by paying less than the whole sum due. It should be remembered that this is no construction of any statutory provision of the law, but the declaration by a high court of a principle of the common law. An accepted construction of a statute law must and will stand until its force is lost by its own limitation, or the same shall be altered or repealed. Not so, however, with the common law, which is only common custom as applied to any given transaction not provided for by special legislation. These customs or laws are not applicable to changed customs or to obligations contracted under altogether different circumstances. It should be remembered, too, that this is a bankruptcy court, charged with the duty and vested with the power of administering justice upon the principles of equity between creditor and debtor whose interests may be brought within the jurisdiction of the court. The late bankrupt law [Act March 2, 1867; 14 Stat. 517] was said by some to be a system of itself. If so, it was a system of compromises and discharges, many of the provisions of which are of much more doubtful propriety and justice than a rule can be which will discharge a debtor from his obligation when he shall tender a part, less than the whole sum due, as full payment, and the creditor accepts such sum offered as full payment, without being induced to do so by any fraudulent act or declaration of the debtor.

But for the clear statement of the learned judge who delivered the opinion in the case of McKenzie v. Culbreth, supra, it would not be seen that the question now being considered was presented in that case, for the positions stated in the syllabus of that case will scarcely be denied. The statement of that case is concise, and as follows: The plaintiff claimed on a single bill. The defendant answered accord, etc., and, in support of this defence, offered a receipt given by the obligee for a less sum than the note called for. His honor instructed the jury that the legal effect of the receipt was only a payment to the amount specified in it, and operated only as a discharge of the note pro tanto. It is not strange that his honor, the presiding judge, upon such facts appearing, should have instructed the jury as he did. It is not stated that the sum paid by the debtor was tendered, by him or accepted by the creditor in compromise, settlement, and full payment of the obligation; and surely, unless such fact was found or admitted, there could be no presumption that the payment was so tendered and accepted, but rather the contrary. Upon that statement of the case it would appear strange if his honor had not so instructed the jury. His honor, in delivering the opinion of the appellate court, says: "The question presented is, whether a payment by the debtor and acceptance by the creditor of a less sum than is due upon a bond, as a payment of the whole, is a discharge of the obligation, so as to preclude the creditor from recovering the remainder of the bond." The difference between the case stated as reported and the statement of the question by his honor, it will be seen, is essential. Those who have had the acquaintance with that learned justice that it has been my privilege to enjoy will readily conclude that he was correct in his statement of the question presented, and will not, without hesitancy and regret, withhold their assent to the conclusion to which he arrived.

Nor was the question now being considered distinctly presented in the case of Hayes v. Davidson, 70 N. C. 573, for in that case there had been no acceptance by the creditor of a less sum than the whole sum due. But it was only averred in the defendant's plea that the plaintiff had agreed with and promised the debtor that he would compromise the claim and take in full settlement a less sum than the whole amount due. The agreement was not one entered into with other creditors of the debtor; there was nothing whatever in this promise which distinguished it from a mere promise without any consideration whatever, either good or valuable. In the opinion of his honor, so manifestly correct, upon the question there presented, I only cannot concur in the approval given of the opinion in the case of McKenzie v. Culbreth, [66 N. C. 534.] The case of Bryan v. Foy, [69 N. C. 45] is not authority for the creditor in this case, for it is not only not alleged that there was any acceptance by the creditor; but, on the contrary, that the creditor refused to accept a sum less than the whole sum then due when tendered. The promise to accept, being nudum pactum, could not be enforced. Whether the motive prompting the creditor to refuse to comply with his promise is good or bad, in a moral sense, is not a question for the court. That will not alter the law applicable to a promise void for want of some good or valuable consideration. It is altogether a different principle that will control the conduct of a creditor when he agrees to accept, and does accept (without fraud, by word or in the conduct of the debtor), a less sum than the whole sum due, and then seeks to avoid both his agreement and results of his voluntary act.

It is seen that I do not rely upon any retrospective effect that may be claimed for the act passed by the legislature of North Carolina, Acts 1874–'75, c. 178. Nor, indeed, upon any force that may be attributed to that act. But it will appear by no means clear to the careful reader that the legislature did not intend by it to alter a well-established principle of the common law, by giving validity to and rendering binding upon a creditor a mere agreement with his debtor, to accept from him any part less than the whole of his debt in compromise, payment, and satisfaction of the debt. But when a creditor has not only agreed with his debtor to accept (with all his rights to seek and acquire information), but has received from him a less sum in full payment of his debt—and all this without fraud committed by the debtor—that such creditor should be bound by such agreement and acceptance is so manifestly supported by common sense, justice, and reason, that no statute is required to make it the law. It is but a principle of the common law. The learned counsel for the creditor, in their argument, laid much stress upon the authorities cited. Yet, in the carefully prepared brief filed by them, these cases are not even referred to. But they rest their case almost entirely upon the evidence, which they insist establishes fraud on the part of the agents of the bankrupt corporation, whereby, they say, the creditor was induced to receive the sum paid for the whole debt.

In my view of the testimony no fraud, by word or act, on the part of any agents of the bank, was committed which induced Mrs. Smith to accept the compromise offered; and while it is probably true that if she had correctly anticipated the ultimate results as to the assets of the bank, she would not then have sought or accepted such a settlement of her claim, the binding force of the settlement does not depend upon ultimate results or the correctness of the judgment exercised by her in that transaction. The fact is that the ultimate ability of the bank to pay a larger proportion, and, finally, to some creditors who "held off," the principal of their debts, was entirely due to compromises accepted by other creditors, as this was by Mrs. Smith—the results of suits against and in favor of the bank then pending, and collections about which, at the time of this settlement of this claim, no human foresight could be regarded as infallible. No understanding of the condition of the bank, however thorough, could enable any officer to say with reasonable certainty the proportion it would be able to pay. Nor would any desire to be truthful and correct on the part of these officers have exempted them from liability to err in any opinion they expressed. This claim is disallowed, and the register is directed to certify this order to the assignee.

MARINE INSURANCE—CONSIGNEE TO SELL ON COMMISSION—AUTHORITY TO INSURE FOR PRINCIPAL.

1. Where goods are shipped to consignees, to be sold on commission, and the consignees, for their own benefit, insure their interest to an amount equal to the value of the goods, and the goods are lost, there is no privity of contract between the consignor and the insurance company on which a right of action against the company could be founded.

2. Consignees of goods for sale on commission, being in advance to the consignors, or under acceptances for them, as in this case, may insure in their own name and on their own account to the full value of the goods, and apply the proceeds to their own benefit to the extent of their claims in respect of such advances and acceptances, and perhaps of their commissions. But though they have this insurable interest, they are not, merely in their character as such consignees, vested with any authority to effect insurance for their principal on the consignment while it is in transit.

[In equity. Bill by the Bank of South Carolina against Bicknell and Skinner and the Commercial Insurance Company on a policy of insurance. Bill dismissed. Reversed by supreme court in Bank of South Carolina v. Commercial Ins. Co., 17 Lawy. Ed. U. S. Sup. Ct. Rep. 241.]

Bill in equity praying, among other things, that the corporation complainant might be declared entitled to recover the amount of a certain policy of insurance from the corporation defendants, on a quantity of cotton, in the same manner as if the insurance had been effected in their name; that the insurance company might be ordered to pay the same accordingly; and that the other defendants might be enjoined from commencing any proceedings to collect the insurance money, except at the request and for the benefit of the complainants.

Most of the facts were either admitted by the pleadings or not made a subject of controversy.

Michael Lazarus of Charleston, South Carolina, purchased and owned forty-two bales of cotton, which he shipped from that port on the 1st of August, 1857, in the Emily Ward, to the first-named respondents, to be sold by them, as his agents, on commission. At the time of shipment he took a bill of lading from the agent of the vessel, and on the same day drew a bill of exchange on the respondents against the shipment for two thousand four hundred dollars, payable to his own order sixty days after sight, which sum was less than the value of the consignment. Immediately on drawing the bill of exchange, being otherwise unable to pay for the cotton, he indorsed the bill of exchange, presented it at the bank for payment, and, upon indorsing the bill of lading as security, obtained the money. The bill was forwarded to the drawees, and by them accepted on the 25th of the same month. On the same day the drawees insured the cotton in their own name for the sum of three thousand five hundred dollars in an open policy then held by them, executed by the corporation defendants, which policy bore date the 9th of January, 1857, and was taken out on that day. [By the terms of the policy the first-named respondents were insured "on all merchandise shipped by or to them at and from port or ports to port or ports of destination on the Atlantic ocean, and upon the waters connected therewith, including the North sea, to continue the same until notice is given by either party in writing to cancel this policy; the insured to give notice of all shipments on receipt of information, each ten bales of cotton, in successive numbers, subject to their own average. Rates of premium as per memorandum, on file of this date, against loss or damage on the high seas and elsewhere, as mentioned in the respective indorsements, * * * and to the amounts and in the manner therein set forth." Their proposal to enter the risk is as follows: "Forty-two bales cotton on board the tern Emily Ward, at and from Charleston to New York, and while there and from thence to this port as customary value, at thirty-five hundred dollars." And on the same day the insurance company made the following indorsement: "Under this policy we entered insurance for thirty-five hundred dollars on forty-two bales of cotton on board the tern Emily Ward, at and from Charleston to Providence via New York as customary, one-half per cent. less one and one-half per cent., $17.25."][3] Both vessel and cargo were lost by the perils of the sea. Before the maturity of the bill of exchange the first-named respondents became insolvent, and refused to pay. Demand was made upon the respondents, the bill of exchange and the amount of the premium being first tendered to them. The complainant alleged that the first-named respondents had endeavored to collect the policy in order to deprive the bank of all benefit from the insurance; that the bank had the right to collect and receive the money in the same manner as it would have been entitled to stop the cotton in transitu, or as it might, if the loss had not occurred, have recovered possession of the cotton upon returning the acceptance, and paying the charges and expenses of the consignment.

It was alleged in the answer, that the contract of insurance was made solely between the first-named respondents and the insurance company, without any instructions, express or implied, from the complainants; that the premium is a charge against the insurers, and must be paid out of their estate; that the insurance was effected upon their own interest in the cotton, growing out of their acceptance of the bill of exchange; and that complainant had no interest in the contract either at law or in equity.

T. A. Jenckes, for complainant.

The plaintiff, being a principal, may follow his property or the substitute, if it can be identified, into the hands of the defendants, Bicknell and Skinner, as they are agents, subject only to advance, commissions, and expenses. 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1258, note 2; Story, Ag. §§ 229–231; Veil v. Mitchell, Adm'r, [Case No. 16,908;] 1 Amer. Lead. Cas. 674; Thompson v. Perkins, [Case No. 13,972;] Yates v. Curtis, [Id. 18,127.]

The insurance money is the substitute of the plaintiff's property, insurance being a contract of indemnity or security. Ang. Ins. 1; 3 Kent, Comm. 320.

Bicknell and Skinner's only insurable interest in plaintiff's cotton being their liability to pay his draft against them, they are mere trustees of the insurance money, in case of loss, for this purpose; and if they are released from all liability on the draft, and their expenses are all paid, they are the unconditional trustees of the insurance money for his use. Lazarus v. Commonwealth Ins. Co., 2 Amer. Lead. Cas. 845, and note.

F. E. Hoppin and C. S. Bradley, for respondents Bicknell and Skinner.

A consignee, factor, or agent, having accepted bills of exchange upon certain goods (like these defendants), stands in the same situation as a mortgagee, and has an insurable interest in the goods entirely distinct from that of his consignor. 1 Phil. Ins. p. 166, §§ 289, 309; 2 Phil. Ins. § 1243; Wolff v. Horncastle, 1 Bos. & P. 316; Godin v. London Assurance Co., 1 Burrows, 490.

This policy, having been obtained by the defendants, as consignees, upon their interest, and with their money, and without the privity or direction of the consignor, belongs to the defendants only, and the proceeds of it, representing only the interest of the defendants, cannot be taken by the consignor or his assigns. Neale v. Reid, 1 Barn. & C. 657; 1 Ang. Ins. §§ 60a, 60b, 73; King v. State Mutual Fire Ins. Co., 7 Cush. 1; Dobson v. Land, 8 Hare, 216; White v. Brown, 2 Cush. 412, 417.

There is no analogy between this case and the right of stoppage in transitu as claimed by complainant's bill; and if there be any, it is fatal to the claim of the consignors if pretended to be exercised.

A court of equity has no jurisdiction in this case.

CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice. Marine insurance is a contract whereby one party, for a stipulated sum, undertakes to indemnify the other against loss or damage arising from certain perils or sea-risks to which his ship, merchandise, or other interest may be exposed during a certain voyage or for a certain period of time. 1 Arn. Ins. p. 2. Like other valid engagements between business men, it requires two parties to make the contract; and as a general rule no person can maintain a suit on the policy against the insurers, unless he is named in the instrument, or unless there is some privity of contract, express or implied, by assignment or otherwise, between himself and the other contracting party. Were there no other difficulty in the way of the complainant than the entire absence of all privity of contract between himself and the insurance company, that alone would be sufficient to defeat the right of recovery. Insurance on the goods in question was effected by the first-named respondents without instructions either from the consignor or the complainant, and without their knowledge or consent. They so allege in the answer, and every fact and circumstance disclosed in the record touching the transaction, goes to confirm the truth of the allegation. Neither the consignor nor the bank requested the cotton to be insured, or knew that the policy was in existence, until after the loss; and the whole record shows that, in point of fact, the insurance was effected for the sole and exclusive benefit of the first-named respondents. Their policy bears date more than seven months before the bill of exchange was passed to the bank, and the terms of the indorsement on the policy furnish no grounds to infer that any other interest in the cotton was included in the insurance than that held by the consignees. Whether we look, therefore, at the terms of the policy, or of the indorsement on the same, or at the entire circumstances of the transaction, there is an utter failure of proof to establish any privity of contract between the complainant or the consignor and the insurance company, or to furnish any ground of inference in that direction. Both the consignor and the complainant corporation respectively had an insurable interest in the cotton, and either or both might have protected that interest against the perils of the voyage. Having chosen to do otherwise, and to remain their own insurers to the extent of their respective interests, they must stand the consequences of their own election. King v. State Mutual Fire Ins. Co., 7 Cush. 5.

But another answer may be given to the claim of the complainant in its present form, which is equally decisive against it. When the first-named respondents received notice of the consignment and had accepted the bill of exchange drawn against it, they thereby acquired an insurable interest in the cotton, which they might properly insure for their own security. They accordingly proposed to enter the risk under their open policy, with the corporation respondents; and the answer alleges that the insurance was effected by them upon their interest in the cotton, and that the complainant has no interest in the proceeds of the insurance, either at law or in equity. Consignees who have a mere naked right to take possession of the goods consigned, without being either intrusted to sell the goods on commission, or having a lien upon them for their advances, cannot make a valid insurance of the same in their own names for their own benefit, for the reason that they have no legal property in the subject-matter of the consignment, and therefore can only effect insurance on account of those who are so interested, and must aver the interest in those on whose account the insurance was made. Wolff v. Horncastle, 1 Bos. & P. 316; 1 Arn. Ins. p. 246. But consignees who have a lien or claim on the property, in respect of advances, or as commission agents, to whom it is intrusted for the purposes of sale, or as indorsees of the bill of lading, to whom a general balance is due, may effect an insurance on the property in their own names and on their own account, to its whole value, and recover thereon, at least to the amount of their lien, claim, or balance, although they have received no previous instructions from the consignor to insure, nor any subsequent ratification of the insurance. Where goods were consigned by a merchant to his factor, to whom a general balance was due, it was held by Lord Mansfield, in Godin v. London Assurance Co., 1 Burrows, 489, that such factor had an insurable interest in the goods so consigned, to the extent of his general balance, and might recover thereon, averring the interest to be in himself; and this, though the bill of lading had been indorsed to another party. In the same case, the party to whom the bill of lading had been indorsed, and to whom the merchant was also indebted for advances to a greater amount than the value of the cargo, was held clearly to have an insurable interest, and to be entitled to recover, under a policy effected on his own account, the full value of the insurance. As a general principle, there can be no doubt that consignees of goods being in advance to the consignors, or under acceptances for them, as in this case, may insure in their own name and on their own account, to the full value of the goods, and apply the proceeds to their own benefit, to the extent of their claims in respect of such advances and acceptances. But a consignee to whom property is consigned to be sold by him merely as factor of the consignor, or other party, though he has himself an insurable interest of his own to the amount of his advances, and perhaps of his commissions, is not merely, in his character as such consignee, vested with any authority to effect insurance on the consignment for his principal, while it is in transit. Any insurance so made by him, without instructions, will therefore be a voluntary insurance, so far as the principal is concerned, and its validity will depend upon its being ratified by the party for whose benefit it was made. 2 Phil. Ins. (4th Ed.) § 1858. From the general principle, that any executor[4] having a claim on property has an insurable interest to the extent of his claim, it follows, says Mr. Arnould, that a mortgagee of a ship or goods has a distinct insurable interest in the mortgaged property, and may recover, in an action upon a policy effected for his benefit, averring the interest to be in himself, to the full amount of the debt, to secure which the mortgage was made. Mr. Phillips says that a consignee, factor, or agent, having a lien on goods to the amount of his advances, acceptances, and liabilities, stands in this respect precisely in the situation of a mortgagee; and as a general proposition we think his view of the subject is correct. 1 Phil. Ins. (4th Ed.) § 309. Applying these principles to the present case, it is clear that the first-named respondents had an insurable interest in the cotton to the amount of the acceptances they had made in that behalf, and, perhaps, also for such commissions as they would have been entitled to receive for the sale of the same in case it had not been lost on the voyage. According to the decision in Putnam v. Mercantile Marine Ins. Co., 5 Metc. [Mass.] 386, a commission merchant, to whom goods are consigned for sale, has an insurable interest in the goods, to the amount of his commissions on the sale, from the time the goods were shipped under the consignment; and the same court held, that he might make a valid insurance in anticipation of the consignment, and that the contract would take effect on the consignment being made, and the goods becoming subject to the risks insured against in the policy. Be that as it may, all the well-considered cases agree that a commission merchant or factor has a lien on the goods, to the amount of his advances, or acceptances, and that is sufficient to dispose of the case made in the bill of complaint. Courts of justice are not quite agreed whether the factor, in case the insurance exceeds the amount of his claim, may retain the excess to his own use, or whether he must be regarded as holding such residue in trust for the consignor. Some remarks of Mr. Justice Story, in the case of Carpenter v. Providence Wash. Ins. Co., 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 507, indicate that his opinion was in favor of the latter theory. That case arose on a policy of insurance against loss by fire. He admits, however, that both mortgagor and mortgagee may each separately insure his own distinct interest in the property; and that where the mortgagee insures solely on his own account, if his debt be paid, the policy ceases to have any operation from that time; and if the premises be subsequently consumed, the mortgagor can take no advantage of the policy, for the reason that he has no interest in it. Remarks are also to be found in the opinion of the court in Robertson v. Hamilton, 14 East, 522, favoring the same theory. On the other hand, the supreme court of Massachusetts, in the case of King v. State Mutual Fire Ins. Co., 7 Cush. 1, held, in an elaborate opinion upon the question, that a mortgagee, who, at his own expense, insured his interest in the property mortgaged against loss by fire, without particularly describing the nature of his interest in case of a loss by fire before payment of the mortgage debt, has a right to recover the amount of the loss to his own use, without first assigning his mortgage or any part thereof to the insurers. To the same effect, also, are the remarks of Bayley, J., in Neale v. Reid, 1 Barn. & C. 657. He says it has never been decided that a person not bound to insure, but who elects to insure in order to cover payments if the goods do not arrive, may not apply the proceeds of the policy to his own use. The premium for the insurance comes out of the general means of the party effecting it, and diminishes the fund applicable to the claims of general creditors. As between them and the seller of the particular goods, they certainly would be entitled to the money secured by the policy. It is not the produce of the goods, but is a substitute for it, and not liable to the same burdens. Dobson v. Land, 8 Hare, 216. Policies of insurance often contain clauses indicating the intention of the parties to include within the benefits of the contract other interests than those of the party therein named; and whenever such a clause appears in the instrument, courts of justice are always inclined to give it an equitable and liberal construction. Such was the case of De Forest v. Fulton Fire Ins. Co., 1 Hall, 84, where the policy was effected "on goods as well the property of the assured as held by them in trust, or on commission." Advances had been made by the commission merchant to only part of the amount insured, and the question was, whether they had an insurable interest to the whole amount of the policy. On this state of the case the court held that the consignees had an insurable interest in the goods, on account of their own interest and as trustees, to their full value, which was covered by a policy in this form: they being liable to account to their principals for the excess of the insurance over the amount of their own claims. Carruthers v. Sheddon, 6 Taunt. 14. None of these cases, however, decide that where the insurance was effected solely on account of the interest of the factor, and where the pleadings and proof show an entire want of privity of contract between the party complainant and the insurers, that the former can in any manner derive any benefit from the insurance. But that question, in the judgment of this court, does not arise in this case, on the present state of the pleadings; and for that reason we forbear to express any decisive opinion upon the subject. Bill dismissed with costs.

[NOTE. On appeal to the supreme court the decree of the circuit court was reversed. Mr. Justice Swayne delivered the opinion of the supreme court, Mr. Justice Clifford dissenting. The opinion is nowhere reported, and not now accessible, but the following is the order which was entered: "This cause came on to be heard on the transcript of record from the circuit court of the United States for the district of Rhode Island, and was argued by counsel; on consideration whereof, it is now here ordered, adjudged, and decreed by this court that the decree of the said circuit court in this cause be, and the same is hereby, remanded to the said circuit court for further proceedings to be had therein in conformity to the opinion of this court, and as to the law and justice may appertain." [4. [5. [See, contra, Planters' Bank of Tennessee v. Union Bank of Louisiana, 16 Wall. (83 U. S.) 483.]

At law. This was an action to recover a balance of $22,739, due the plaintiffs at the time of the occupation of New Orleans by the United States forces in 1862. General Butler prohibited the circulation of Confederate notes, and required the banks, including the defendants, to pay their depositors in United States legal-tender notes or specie, or in their own notes, redeemable in legal-tender notes. In 1863, by general order No. 202, General Banks directed the banks having in their possession funds belonging to enemies, &c., to turn over the same to the chief quartermaster of the department. The amount due the plaintiffs was so transferred by the defendants, together with funds of the same description belonging to other parties. All these funds were in Confederate notes.

DURELL, District Judge, charged the jury in substance as follows:—

"If the defendants saw fit, without authority from the plaintiffs, to receive in payment of drafts and notes forwarded by the plaintiffs for collection, Confederate notes or any other notes, the illegality or nullity of such notes does not discharge the defendants for their liability as bankers charged with the business of collection.

"Even if the jury should find that the plaintiffs had collected notes in Confederate currency, that they had forwarded Confederate notes to defendants, and that they knew that Confederate notes were largely circulated in New Orleans, these facts would not constitute proof of authority from the plaintiffs to the defendants to collect in Confederate currency.

"That the delivery by defendants to the military authorities of Confederate notes to the amount of their indebtedness to plaintiffs from general funds of the bank would not discharge the defendants, if the jury were of the opinion that the Confederate notes so delivered were not the moneys or funds standing on their books to the credit of the plaintiffs.

"If the jury should be of opinion, from the evidence, that the defendants paid over the amount which they held to the credit of plaintiffs to the officers of the quartermaster's department, in obedience to special order No. 202, and under coercion, then and in that case such payment was valid, and released defendants from all further claims of the plaintiffs on that account.

"If the jury should find, from the evidence, that the amount claimed by the plaintiffs in this suit was received by the defendants in Confederate treasury notes, issued by the so-called Confederate government, then in rebellion and at war with the United States, and that Confederate notes were so received by the defendants as a direct remittance from the plaintiffs, or in payment of assets belonging to the plaintiffs and collected by the defendants, with their knowledge and approval, express or implied, in the notes aforesaid, and the officers of the quartermaster's department therefore decided that the payment under special order No. 202 should be made in Confederate treasury notes, and that it was so made accordingly, then such payment was valid, and released the defendants from all further claims of the plaintiffs on account of the amount so paid over.

"That, under the constitution of the United States, no state can enter into any treaty, alliance, or confederation, or emit bills of credit; that the formation of the government of the so-called Confederate States was unlawful, and the emission of bills of credit by such government was unlawful; that the Confederate treasury notes issued by said government and circulated as money were bills of credit within the meaning of the constitution, and therefore an unlawful issue; and that by the law of Louisiana and under the constitution of the United States, all dealing in such notes was unlawful, and all obligations arising therefrom or founded thereon, are also unlawful and without legal consideration.

"If the jury find that the balance of account claimed by plaintiffs arose from dealings in such Confederate treasury notes, remitted by plaintiffs to defendants, or received by defendants for the account of plaintiffs, with their consent and approval, then the claim of the plaintiffs is without lawful consideration, and the jury should find their verdict for the defendants."

The jury returned a verdict for the defendants.

BANK OF THE METROPOLIS v. BRENT.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 530.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. Term, 1824.[2]

NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS—PLACE OF PAYMENT—DEMAND.

If a note be payable at a certain bank, and payment be there demanded, it is not necessary to make a personal demand upon the maker, in order to charge the indorser.

[See note at end of case.]

At law. Assumpsit against the executors of the indorser of George A. Carroll's note for $1,100. After verdict for the plaintiffs, as stated in [Brent v. Bank of the Metropolis] 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 89, the defendants moved in arrest of judgment because it did not appear by the declaration that demand had been made upon the maker. The declaration stated that the note was negotiable at the Bank of the Metropolis, and that it was demanded at that bank, "where it was payable."

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent) overruled the motion, and judgment was rendered for the plaintiffs, which was affirmed by the supreme court of the United States. 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 89. [For opinion rendered in action on defendants' appeal bond, see Bank of the Metropolis v. Swann, Case No. 902.]

[NOTE. This decision was affirmed by the supreme court in Brent v. Bank of the Metropolis, 1 Pet. (26 U. S.) 89. Mr. Justice Marshall, in delivering the opinion, said: "The circumstances that the indorsers were themselves active in procuring the accommodation for the maker of the note; that the accommodation had been continued for years without a demand on the person of the maker; that it was the invariable usage of the bank, when the maker of an accommodation note resided out of the city, to require, as a condition of the loan, a stipulation that a demand at the bank should be sufficient; that this accommodation would not have been continued, after the removal of the maker out of the city, but on this condition; that the note purports, on its face, to be negotiable at the Bank of the Metropolis,—are facts from which the jury might justifiably infer the agreement of the parties to dispense with a demand on the person of the maker. A verdict having been rendered for the bank, the defendants in the court below filed errors in arrest of judgment. The error alleged is that the first count in the declaration neither charges a personal demand on the maker of the note, nor excuses the omission to make such demand. The declaration certainly does not charge a demand on the person of the maker; but this was not necessary, if the parties had agreed that a demand at the bank should be substituted for a demand on the maker. The plaintiffs in error contend that the agreement is not alleged in the declaration, and we admit that the omission to make this averment would be fatal. In that event, the plaintiff below would have shown no cause of action. But the declaration avers a demand of the note 'at the Bank of the Metropolis,' where the said note was payable. The note is set out in the declaration, and does not purport, on its face, to be made payable at the bank. But the averment in the declaration that it was payable there cannot be true, unless there was an agreement of the parties to that effect. It is an averment which must have been proved at the trial, or the plaintiff below could not have obtained a verdict and judgment. After a verdict, it is, we think, sufficient to sustain the judgment."]

2. This discount, by a bank, of a note made payable directly to itself, is not usurious; such being the usage of the banks.

[See Bradley v. McKee, Case No. 1,784.]

[At law. Action upon a promissory note by the Bank of the Metropolis against Thomas P. Moore. Judgment for plaintiff. This was subsequently affirmed by the supreme court in Moore v. Bank of the Metropolis, 13 Pet. (38 U. S.) 302.]

Assumpsit upon the following promissory note: "$5,000. Washington, 16th February, 1837. Sixty days after date, we jointly and severally promise to pay the president and directors of the bank of the Metropolis, or order, at the said bank, five thousand dollars, for value received. Richard M. Johnson, Thomas P. Moore, P. H. Pope, by their attorney, George Thomas." The first count of the declaration states, that on the 16th of February, 1837, the defendant and one Richard M. Johnson, and one P. H. Pope, by George Thomas, their attorney, at Washington county, made their note, &c., and thereby, sixty days after the date thereof, jointly and severally promised to pay, &c. The second count avers, that the defendant, on the 16th of February, 1837, by George Thomas, his attorney, at the county aforesaid, made his certain note, &c., and thereby, sixty days after the date thereof, promised to pay, &c. To these were added the common money counts, one of which was for money had and received to the plaintiff's use. The cause came to trial upon the general issue.

Mr. Coxe, for the plaintiffs, offered in evidence the note of the 16th of February, 1837, and the following power of attorney to Mr. Thomas, who was also cashier of the plaintiff's bank. "Whereas we have a joint and several note of hand, discounted in the Bank of the Metropolis: Now, know all men by these presents, That we, Richard M. Johnson, Thomas P. Moore, and P. H. Pope, all of the state of Kentucky, do hereby nominate, constitute, and appoint, George Thomas, of the city of Washington, our true and lawful attorney in fact, and by these presents do authorize and empower him, for us and in our names, to sign our joint note to the president and directors of the Bank of the Metropolis, for five thousand dollars, for our accommodation, and the same to renew from time to time as it may become due, for the whole or any part thereof. Hereby ratifying and confirming all and every the act and acts of our said attorney, in and about the premises, so long as the bank shall continue the accommodation to us. In witness whereof, we have hereunto set our hands and seals, at the city of Washington, the 29th day of February, 1836. Richard M. Johnson, (Seal.) P. H. Pope, (Seal.) T. P. Moore, (Seal.) Witness, Samuel Stettinius."

Brent & Brent, for the defendant, objected to the plaintiff's counsel reading the note in evidence, because it appeared to be a joint and several note, whereas the power of attorney only authorized Mr. Thomas to sign a joint note. Every power must be strictly pursued. Bank of Columbia v. Patterson, 7 Cranch, [11 U. S.] 299.

Mr. Coxe, contra. The power of attorney recites that they had a joint and several note discounted by the bank, and the presumption is that the note which they authorized Mr. Thomas to sign was intended to renew that joint and several note, and was to be such a note as would effect that object; but a joint note would not have been satisfactory to the bank; they would not have received it in lieu of the former note. But the plaintiffs may recover upon the common counts. The only difference is in the form of the action. If the note is a joint note only, the defendant cannot object to reading of it in evidence. He can only plead the non-joinder of the other parties to the note in abatement.

The plaintiff also offered evidence to prove that on the 27th of March, 1834, the defendant, with Richard M. Johnson and P. H. Pope obtained a discount of their joint and several note payable directly to the bank by its corporate name for $5,000 at four months, and drew the proceeds by their joint check, amounting to $4,896.67; which note was not paid at maturity, but laid over until the 30th of January, 1836, when it was cancelled, the arrears of interest paid up and a new joint and several note given by the same parties for $5,000, payable to the bank or order six months after date, which was also discounted by the bank, and the proceeds, (namely, $4,836.67,) carried to the credit of the makers. That Mr. Thomas, professing to act under and by virtue of the power of attorney aforesaid, made the note upon which the suit was brought, which was also discounted by the plaintiffs, and the proceeds, ($4,946.67,) carried to the credit of the makers, and the arrears of interest being paid up, the note of the 30th of January, 1836, was cancelled; to the admissibility of all which evidence, the defendant, by his counsel, objected; but

THE COURT, (CRANCH, Circuit Judge, contra) overruled the objection and admitted the whole of the evidence (including the note upon which the suit was brought,) to be given in evidence; and the defendant took his bill of exceptions.

THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, was understood as being of opinion that it appeared to be the intent of the parties to authorize Mr. Thomas to make such a note as would be received by the bank in lieu of the old joint and several note; and that the bank would not have received a mere joint note in the place of a joint and several note; and that the power should be construed according to such intent.

MORSELL, Circuit Judge, was understood as being of opinion that if the power was defective, the note was only void to the extent in which the attorney exceeded his authority, and that it was good as a joint note, if not as a joint and several note.

CRANCH, Circuit Judge, was of opinion that the attorney, having exceeded his authority in making the note joint and several, it was altogether void, and was inadmissible upon the counts upon the note, if not upon all the counts; and that the court ought to reject it.

After the court had thus admitted the note in evidence, the plaintiff offered evidence, by the testimony of Mr. Thomas, the cashier, "that the money would not have been loaned but upon the joint and several note of the parties;" and that "the power of attorney was given for the single purpose of acting for said parties in relation to said last-mentioned note, and the renewal thereof," that is, the note of the 30th of January, 1836.[3]

The defendant's counsel, in addition to the evidence already stated, offered evidence tending to prove that the banks in Washington county in the District of Columbia, have been in the practice (some banks for less, and some for more than twenty years,) of taking and discounting notes in the form of the one now in suit, made directly to the banks or some of their officers for their use, whenever offered, and that the banks preferred to loan upon such paper; that the reason of this practice has been one of mutual convenience to the borrower and to the banks; the first being saved from the costs of protest; and the last being saved the risk of a failure to give notice to the indorser; and that it was very usual for the banks to lend money on a pledge of stock, taking in return the single note of the borrower payable to the banks or some of their officers without indorsement. That it had been the practice and usage of the said banks in this county, to discount, indiscriminately, paper on which there was an indorser or indorsers, or in which all the parties were drawers, and the paper drawn directly to the bank itself or some of its officers acting in its behalf; that both were considered equally the subjects of such discount, but that in all of the said banks the major part of the accommodation paper discounted was in the form of notes drawn by one party in favor of another person who indorsed it to the bank; and that the note in suit was discounted in the usual manner. The defendant then offered evidence that on the 27th of March, 1834, the plaintiffs discounted the joint and several note of R. M. Johnson, P. H. Pope, and the defendant, for the amount of $5,000, and reserved out of the proceeds thereof $103.33 as interest or discount upon the same for four months and four days; that the said note laid over unpaid, until the 30th of January, 1836, when the sum of $450 was paid on the same as interest in arrear; and that on the same day a second note was given by the same parties to the plaintiffs in renewal of the first described note, payable in six months after its date, which was discounted by the plaintiffs, who at the time of discounting the same received the sum of $153.33 as interest on the same for six months and four days. That this note also laid over until the 16th of February, 1837, when the sum of $166.67 was paid on it as interest in arrear from the 30th of July, 1836, to the 16th of February, 1837, on which day the note in suit was given in renewal of the last described note, and was on the same day discounted by the plaintiffs, who then received the sum of $53.33 as the interest in advance for sixty-four days.

Whereupon the defendant's counsel prayed the court to instruct the jury, as follows:

1. That if they should believe, from the evidence, that the note in suit was given in renewal of other notes previously given by the same parties to the plaintiffs, who received or reserved in advance, as discount, the interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum on the amount of the debt mentioned in said notes or any of them, for the times they or any of them had to run, then the receipt or reservation of said interest in advance, is evidence of usury, and the jury may infer usury from the same.

2. That if the jury believe, from the evidence, that the note in suit was given in renewal of other notes successively given by the same parties to the plaintiffs for the amount of $5,000 loaned to the said parties by the plaintiffs, and that at the time of the original loan the plaintiffs reserved the interest on the said sum of $5,000, at the rate of six per centum per annum for the time the original note had to run; or that at the time of renewing or discounting the note in suit the plaintiffs received of the makers thereof, or any one for them, the interest in advance for the period of sixty-four days, then said facts are evidence of usury in the transaction, and the jury may infer usury from said facts, in said note in suit.

3. That if the jury believe from the evidence, that the note in suit was given to the plaintiffs in renewal of a note, for the same amount, drawn by the same parties directly to the plaintiffs as payees, payable six months after date, which had been previously discounted by the plaintiffs for the accommodation of the said parties; and that, on said note

[3] Upon this evidence being given, Cranch, C. J., made the following memorandum in his note-book: "This evidence was given after the court had decided that the note should be read in evidence; and perhaps decides the case in favor of the plaintiffs upon error in the supreme court; but although the intent may have been so, yet the means are not sufficient in law to execute that intent. W. Cr."

drawn at six months, the plaintiff received, at the time of discounting it, the interest in advance, for six months and four days, at the rate of six per cent. per annum, on the amount of said note; the said facts are evidence of usury; and it is competent for the jury to infer usury in the note in suit.

4. That if the jury believe from the evidence, that the plaintiffs received, on the day of the date of the note in suit, the sum of $166.67 as and for interest alleged to be due from the 30th of July, 1836, to the 16th of February, 1837, (six months and seventeen days,) on a prior note for $5,000 given by the same parties to the plaintiffs, falling due on the said 30th of July, 1836, and that the note in suit was given in renewal of the said note falling due on the 30th of July, 1836, then the plaintiffs have taken illegal interest, and it is competent for the jury to infer that the note in suit was given in pursuance of an usurious agreement.

5. That the written power of attorney executed to George Thomas by the defendant, together with R. M. Johnson and P. H. Pope, gives no authority to said Thomas to execute a joint and several note in behalf of the said parties, and that the defendant cannot be charged in this action, by reason of any joint and several note purporting to be executed by the said R. M. Johnson, P. H. Pope, and this defendant, by the said Thomas, as their attorney under said written power.

But THE COURT (CRANCH, Circuit Judge, contra) refused to give any of the said instructions; and the defendant took his bill of exceptions.

CRANCH, Circuit Judge, dissented, because the transaction seemed to him,—from the evidence as stated in the prayer for the instructions,—to be a direct loan of the sum of $4,896.67, to be repaid at the end of the four months and four days, with the sum of $103.33 for the forbearance of the said sum of $4,896.67, for the said four months and four days, which was three dollars and thirteen cents more than at the rate of six per centum per annum, in direct violation of the statute of usury; and a practice in violation of the law cannot justify an illegal transaction. Interest in advance can only be justified in a regular mercantile discount of negotiable paper.

NOTE. [from original report.] The defendant carried the cause, by writ of error, to the supreme court, where the judgment was affirmed upon the money counts, without giving any opinion as to the admissibility of the note of the 16th of February, 1837. Upon the question of usury they would not permit the counsel for the plaintiff in error to argue; "the point being considered as settled;" but they did not say in what case. [Moore v. BANK OF THE METROPOLIS v. SWANN.

[4 Cranch, C. C. 139.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May Term, 1831.

APPEAL BOND — ACTION ON — MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

1. In an action upon an appeal-bond to the supreme court of the United States, in setting forth the breach of the condition, it must be averred that the plaintiff has sustained damages to a certain amount, by the defendant's not making his plea good.

2. The defendant is not bound by the condition of the bond, absolutely to pay the amount of the original judgment, nor even the damages and costs that may be awarded by the appellate court for the delay; but only to answer such damages and costs as the appellee shall sustain by the appellant's failure to make his plea good.

At law. Debt upon a bond given upon appeal to the supreme court of the United States, executed by Robert Y. Brent, Joseph Pierson, and the defendant, Thomas Swann, to the plaintiff, [the Bank of the Metropolis,] in the penalty of $2,500. dated 14th February, 1825, with the following condition: "Whereas lately, at a circuit court of the United States, for the District of Columbia, in the county of Washington, in a suit depending in the said court, wherein the Bank of the Metropolis was plaintiff, against Joseph Pierson and Robert Y. Brent, executors of Robert Brent, [Case No. 900,] a final decree was passed against the said Joseph Pierson and Robert Y. Brent, executors of Robert Brent, and the said Joseph Pierson and Robert Y. Brent, executors of Robert Brent, having entered an appeal from the said decree of the said circuit court to the supreme court of the United States, and obtained a citation," &c.; "Now the condition," &c., "is that if the said Joseph Pierson and Robert Y. Brent, executors of Robert Brent, shall prosecute their appeal to effect, and answer all damages and costs, if they fail to make their plea good, then the above obligation to be void, otherwise to remain in full force and virtue." The declaration, after setting forth the bond, (with profert,) and the condition, says: "Nevertheless, the said plaintiffs, in fact, say, that after the making of the said writing obligatory, to wit, at the term of January, 1828, the said cause came on to be heard before the said supreme court of the United States, and the said decree of the said circuit court was thereupon affirmed, with costs, to wit, on the 11th of February, 1828, at the county aforesaid, of which the defendant then and there had notice, whereby the said Joseph Pierson and Robert Y. Brent, executors of Robert Brent, did not prosecute their appeal to effect. And the said plaintiffs, for assigning a further breach of the said condition of the said writing obligatory, according to the form of the statute in such case made and provided, further say, that the said Joseph Pierson and Robert Y. Brent, executors of Robert Brent, did not, after making the said writing obligatory, namely, on the said 11th of February, 1828, or on any other day between that day and the day of the impetration of this writ, namely, at the county aforesaid, answer the damages and costs, if they should fail to make their plea good, but suffered and permitted the same, to a large amount, (namely, the sum of eleven hundred and one dollars and 75-100, with interest from the 29th day of July, (18—,) as also the sum of —— by the court adjudged to the said plaintiffs, for their costs and charges by them, about their suit, in that behalf laid out and expended; and also the further sum of thirty-two dollars and ninety-four cents, by the said supreme court likewise adjudged to the said plaintiffs for their costs and charges by them, about their suit, in that behalf expended,) to be, and remain due, and in arrear, and unpaid, whereby an action hath accrued to the said plaintiffs to have and demand of and from the said defendant, the said sum of two thousand five hundred dollars, above demanded; yet the said defendant, although often requested so to do, hath not yet paid the said sum of two thousand five hundred dollars, above demanded, or any part thereof, to the said plaintiffs, but the same to pay hath hitherto wholly refused, and still doth refuse, to the damage of the said plaintiffs, one thousand dollars, and therefore they bring suit," &c.

To this declaration, the defendant, after oyer, demurred, and assigned the following causes of demurrer: 1st. Because the decree of the circuit court, referred to in the declaration, is not set forth. 2d. Because the judgment of the supreme court is not particularly set forth. 3d. Because the bond only binds the assets of Robert Brent, deceased, and it does not appear, in and by the declaration, that there are assets wherewith the said judgment could be paid. 4th. Because it does not appear, by the declaration, that the defendants are, at this time, liable, personally, to the payment of the moneys claimed by the said declaration. 5th. Because the whole proceedings are erroneous and illegal.

Mr. R. S. Coxe, for plaintiffs, contended that the executors had, by this bond, bound themselves, personally, to pay the penalty of the bond; that it must be presumed that the judgment below was a judgment against them, personally, and for which they were personally liable, because, under the testamentary system of Maryland, (in force here,) no other judgment could be final, and no appeal lies, but from a final judgment or decree; that the defendant is bound to pay, not only the amount of the judgment below, but the costs in the supreme court, and the damages in that court, adjudged for the delay; and he cited 2 Tidd, Pr. 1082; and Laserre v. Johnson, 2 Strange, 745; 2 Ld. Raym. 1459; 16 & 17 Car. II. c. 8, § 3; 3 Jac. c. 8, as to Bail in Error; Act Md. 1789, § 22; Act Md. 1796, §§ 1, 2; 1 Hans. Ent. 22, 549; 2 Hans. Ent. 315; Smoot v. Lee, in this court, [Case No. 13,133.] See, also, Catlett v. Brodie, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 553; Baits v. Peters, Id. 556; 1 Saund. 117, and Tucker v. Lee, in this court, [Case No. 14,221.]

Mr. Swann cited 1 Hans. Ent. 20, and 2 Hans. Ent. 315.

CRANCH, Chief Judge, after stating the case, as aforesaid, delivered the opinion of the court, (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent.)

This is a bond with a collateral condition. The obligors are not bound as they were in the recognizance of bail in error, required in England, by the statutes of 3 Jac. c. 8, and 16 & 17 Car. II. c. 8, and in the appeal-bond required by the Maryland statute of 1713, c. 4, "to satisfy and pay, (if the judgment be affirmed,) all and singular the debts, damages, and costs adjudged upon the former judgment, and all costs and damages to be also awarded for the same delaying of execution;" but the condition of this bond is simply to prosecute the appeal to effect, and answer all damages and costs, if the appellants shall fail to make their plea good. To prosecute their appeal to effect, and to make their plea good, are equivalent expressions. If the appellants fail to prosecute the appeal to effect, they fail to make their plea good, and vice versa. The obligation, then, is simply to answer all damages and costs, if the appellants shall fail to make their plea good. They are not to pay any specified sum—they are not absolutely bound, as under the English and the Maryland law, to pay and satisfy the original judgment, or even the damages and costs that may be awarded by the appellate court for the delay, but to answer such damages and costs as the appellee shall sustain or incur by their failing to make their plea good. Before the obligee can have a cause of action upon the bond against the obligors, by reason of the appellant's not answering all damages and costs for failing to make their plea good, damages and costs must have been sustained and incurred, and must be ascertained and averred in the assignment of the breach of the condition of the bond; for, in contemplation of law, that which is not averred, does not exist. In this declaration, no damages are averred to have been sustained by the obligees in consequence of the failure of the appellants to make their plea good, or to prosecute their appeal to effect. In the case of Tucker v. Lee, in this court, at May [December] term, 1829, [Case No. 14,221,] this objection, after argument and great deliberation, was adjudged to be fatal in that cause. In the present case, the judgment is not set forth, either directly, or by reference to any record, so that the court can see what was the nature of that judgment, and whether it was a judgment at law or a decree in equity. It is, indeed, called a "decree," which in general, implies that it was in a suit in equity or admiralty; but whether it was a decree for the specific execution of an agreement, or for a perpetual injunction, or whether it was against the appellants in their representative character, or personally, merely describing them as executors, does not appear; so that it is impossible for the court to ascertain, judicially, that the obligees have sustained any damages.

Nor does the declaration aver that the original decree in the court below, has not been performed and satisfied by the appellants; nor does it state what was the decree or judgment of the supreme court. These appear to the court to be fatal objections to the declaration, and therefore it is not necessary to notice another objection stated as a particular cause of demurrer; namely, that the bond binds only the assets of the testator, Robert Brent.

The judgment upon the demurrer must be for the defendant. The plaintiffs had leave to amend on payment of the costs of the amendment. This cause was afterwards settled by the parties.

Case No. 903.

BANK OF THE METROPOLIS v. WALKER.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 294.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. April Term, 1822.

NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS—TIME OF DEMAND—NOTICE TO INDORSER.

If payment of a promissory note be demanded of the maker on the third day of grace, after banking hours, and notice of the non-payment be given to the indorser on the next day, the demand is not too soon, nor the notice too late.

[See Bank of Alexandria v. Wilson, Case No. 856; Lenox v. Wright, Id. 8,249; Read v. Carberry, Id. 11,604.]

[At law. Action upon a contract of indorsement by the Bank of the Metropolis against Joseph Walker. Verdict was given for plaintiff, subject to the opinion of the court upon a case stated. Judgment is now given for plaintiff. Thereafter a rule upon the marshal to show cause why certain moneys levied by him upon the defendant's land in another action should not be paid in satisfaction of the judgment in this case was discharged in Bank of the Metropolis v. Walker, Case No. 904.]

Assumpsit against the last indorser of Toppan Webster's note for $1,000, due 10th, 13th January, 1819. All the parties lived near the Bank of the Metropolis, in the city of Washington. Payment was demanded of the maker, by a notary public, on the 13th of January, the last day of grace, after 3 o'clock P. M., and notice of non-payment was given to the defendant on the next day, viz: on the 14th of January. A verdict for the plaintiff was taken subject to the opinion of the court, upon the said facts, whether the demand and notice were competent and sufficient in law to charge the defendant in this action with the payment of the said sum of $1,000, in the said note mentioned. The note was not made payable at any bank, and it was proved to be the practice of some of the notaries in this district to give notice on the day of the demand of payment, and of others to give notice on the next day.

Mr. Jones, for the defendant, cited Chitty on Bills, 318, &c. The note must be paid on the three days of grace, when demanded. If not then paid it is dishonored, and notice should be given immediately. All the parties lived within a few minutes' walk of each other. Notice should be given on the same day. Tassell v. Lewis, 1 Ld. Raym. 743. In Lenox v. Roberts, 2 Wheat. [15 U. S.] 373, the supreme court of the United States said, that notice must be given by mail on the third day of grace. See, also, 6 East, 3; 15 East, 291; and Chit. Bills, (Ed. 1821, by Cary,) 401.

THE COURT stopped Mr. Lear, in reply, and said that the demand and notice were sufficient.

BANK OF THE METROPOLIS v. WALKER.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 361.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. Term, 1822.

JUDGMENT LIEN—PRIORITIES — SPECIAL VERDICT.

A judgment upon a special verdict, or upon a verdict subject to the opinion of the court upon a case stated, does not relate back to the date of the verdict, [rendered at a preceding term,] so as to overreach an intermediate judgment against the same defendant in another cause.

[At law. Action upon a contract of indorsement by the Bank of the Metropolis against Joseph Walker. Verdict was given for plaintiff, subject to the opinion of the court upon a case stated. Thereafter judgment was given for plaintiff. Bank of the Metropolis v. Walker, Case No. 903. The hearing is now upon a rule that the marshal show cause why he should not satisfy the judgment out of funds obtained by him by a levy upon another judgment against defendant's lands in favor of King and Langley. Rule discharged.]

The plaintiffs (the Bank of the Metropolis) obtained a verdict against the defendant

at October term, 1821, subject to the opinion of the court upon a case stated. Before any argument upon the points reserved, the cause was continued to April term, 1822, and argued on the 2d of May. and also on a subsequent day. The court, on the 7th of June, 1822, rendered judgment for the plaintiff upon the case stated.

In the intermediate time, viz. on the 24th of April, 1822, King and Langley recovered a judgment against the same defendant, (Joseph Walker,) and the marshal levied the fieri facias upon the defendant's land, and made the money. The Bank of the Metropolis obtained a rule upon the marshal to show cause why he should not pay over to that bank the money which he had thus made out of the defendant's real estate upon the fieri facias in favor of King and Langley, and upon the ground that the judgment in favor of the bank, upon the case stated, related back to the time of the finding of the verdict at October term, 1821, and overreached the judgment in favor of King and Langley, rendered on the 24th of April, 1822.

In support of this idea, Mr. Ashton, for the bank, cited the case of Perry v. Wilson, 7 Mass. 395, where a case was ordered by the court to stand over for advisement, and the defendant died. The court said that they would take care that the plaintiff should not suffer by the delay of the court, and ordered the judgment to be entered as of the preceding term.

Mr. Morfit, contra, cited Taylor v. Harris, 3 Bos. & P. 549, and Welsh v. Murray, 4 Dall. [4 U. S.] 320.

THE COURT discharged the rule, being of opinion that the judgment did not relate back to the verdict; no argument having been had upon the case stated, nor had it been submitted to the court before the cause was continued, by consent from October term, 1821, to April term, 1822. It was not continued under cur. ad. vult.

BANK OF THE STATE OF SOUTH CAROLINA v. BICKNALL et al.

[43 Hunt, Mer. Mag. 586.]

Circuit Court, D. Rhode Island. June Term, 1858.

EQUITY — BILL TO COMPEL DELIVERY OF COTTON.

This was a suit in equity brought to compel the defendants [Bicknall and Skinner] to deliver up a quantity of cotton shipped to them for sale by Michael Lazarus, of Charleston, under whom the bank claimed, the complainants offering to deliver up to the defendants the bills accepted by them which had been drawn against the shipment. The bill sustained as to a portion of the specific cotton admitted to have been in the hands of the defendants at the date of the commencement of the suit; and decree for the plaintiffs accordingly.

[NOTE. The facts of this case were similar to those in Bank of South Carolina v. Bicknell, Case No. 898, except that the bill in that case was brought to recover upon a policy of insurance upon certain cotton lost by perils of the sea, while in this case the bill is brought to recover possession of the cotton itself. Nowhere more fully reported; opinion not now accessible.]

Case No. 906.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES v. ABBOTT.

[3 Cranch, C. C. 94.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May Term, 1827.

NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS—EXTENSION OF TIME—DISCHARGE OF INDORSER—EVIDENCE — DEMAND AND NOTICE.

1. After demand and notice to the indorser, the plaintiff may agree to give time to the maker of the note, without discharging the indorser.

[Cited in Bank of U. S. v. Macdonald, Case No. 925.]

2. The testimony of the notary, that he demanded of the maker payment of the note on the third day of grace, and gave notice to the indorser of the non-payment on the third and also on the fourth day, is competent evidence of demand and notice, although the witness does not recollect the day of the month on which such demand was made and such notice given.

[See Coyle v. Gozzler, Case No. 3,312; M'Lemore v. Powell, 12 Wheat. (25 U. S.) 557.]

At law. Assumpsit against the indorser of Rind's promissory note.

J. Dunlop, for the defendant, prayed the court to instruct the jury, that if they should find, from the evidence, that the bank, after the demand and notice to the defendant, agreed to give time to the maker, who had previously given a deed of trust to secure the bank, the defendant was discharged from his liability; which instruction THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, contra) refused to give.

The witness, Brooke Mackall, the notary, testified that he made the demand on the third day of grace, and gave notice to the indorser on the third, and also on the next day thereafter; but on cross-examination said he could not recollect the days of the month and year, without reference to his notarial book, which was in the hands of the plaintiffs, and was not in court, or to certain copies from that book, which were in the hands of the plaintiff's counsel; but he testified positively that he had a distinct recollection, independently of his book, that it was on the third and fourth days of grace.

Mr. Dunlop moved the court to instruct the jury, that the testimony of Mr. Mackall was not competent evidence of demand and notice; which instruction THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, contra) refused to give.

Verdict for plaintiff, $2,563.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 307.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. April Term, 1822.

NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS—DEMAND—INDORSER'S LIABILITY.

A verbal notice to the indorser on the 18th, (being the day after the last day of grace,) that payment had been demanded of the maker on the 17th, and that the note would be protested if not paid on that day, (the 18th,) is not a sufficient notice to charge the indorser.

At law. Assumpsit against [James D. Barry] the indorser of Thomas Foyle's note due 14th-17th of October, 1820. Payment was demanded of the maker on the 17th; and the notary on the 18th gave verbal notice to the defendant that the note was due and would be protested for non-payment, unless paid on that day; and that he had demanded payment of the maker of the note on the 17th.

A verdict was taken for the plaintiffs, subject to the opinion of the court upon the sufficiency of the notice to the defendant. The maker and defendant both resided in the city of Washington.

THE COURT (nem. con.) was of opinion that the notice was not sufficient. Non-pros.

5. The parties to deeds are estopped to deny the truth of the recitals therein; and if the deeds are offered only to show the transmission of the legal title, the truth of the recitals need not be proved aliunde.

6. If a deed of bargain and sale be made by a trustee, the legal estate passes whether the terms of the trust are complied with, or not; for if the bargainee takes with notice, he himself stands as trustee in place of the bargainor; if without notice and for valuable consideration, he takes an absolute title; for a trustee conveys by virtue of the legal estate vested in him, and not by virtue of a power.

7. A deed of bargain and sale by a person not in possession is void.

8. When the plea is not guilty, or defence on title, the defendant may give evidence of possession without warrant and location.

At law. Ejectment for the western moiety of lot No. 2, in the square No. 348, in the city of Washington.

It was agreed that the plaintiffs need not trace their title farther back than to the commissioners of the city of Washington. The plaintiffs claimed title by a deed from those commissioners to John Murdoch, December 19, 1801; from Murdoch to Walter Smith, April 5, 1805; and from Charles Lowndes to the said Smith, May 3, 1803; from the said Smith to Benjamin Stoddert, March 5, 1807; from Stoddert to T. G. Slye, March 5, 1807; and from Slye to the lessors of the plaintiffs, July 10, 1828.

Upon the trial, Mr. Key, for the plaintiff, offered to read these deeds from the copies in the land-record books of this county; except the deed from Stoddert to Slye, the original of which he produced, dated March 5, 1807, but not recorded until July 27, 1826, when it was recorded under a decree of this court as a court of chancery, in pursuance of the provisions of the Maryland act of assembly of 1792, c. 41, § 3, upon a petition by the Bank of Columbia, who then claimed under the deed. The record of that case not having been made out in full by the clerk, the plaintiffs' counsel offered to read to the court the original papers, docket-entries, and minutes of the proceedings and decree in that case; but the original deed, which had been filed with the petition and continued on the files in that cause until the passing of the decree for recording, had been taken from the files to be recorded in the book of land-records, with the decree, and after being recorded, was delivered to petitioners, who kept it till it was now produced here in court. No other evidence was offered of its execution, but the clerk had by an indorsement upon it certified that it was recorded by virtue of the decree of the court.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

It appeared by the recitals in some of the deeds, that the deed from Murdoch to Walter Smith was a trust-deed, and the defendants contended that the plaintiffs must show that the deed from W. Smith to Stoddert was in pursuance of, or in conformity with, the terms of the trust; and that the facts stated in the recitals must be proved aliunde, as the defendant not being a party to nor claiming under these deeds, is not bound by those recitals.

The defendant's counsel, Mr. Coxe and Mr. Jones, objected, that it did not appear by the certificate of the persons who took and certified the acknowledgment of the deed from W. Smith to B. Stoddert that they were then justices of the peace.

The plaintiffs' counsel then offered parol evidence of that fact, and that they were then known and acting as such, and also the record of their qualification as such by taking the oaths of office.

To all the evidence so offered on the part of the plaintiff the defendant's counsel objected.

But THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent) overruled all the objections, and permitted the evidence to go to the jury; (the defendant not having shown any title or color of title in himself;) CRANCH, Chief Judge, however, doubting whether the record-copies of deeds can be read in evidence without showing the loss of the original.

THE COURT also held and decided,

1. That the deed from Lowndes to Smith may be given in evidence without showing what sort of interest the grantor had, because the legal estate is not claimed through him.

2. That it was not necessary, in order to admit the deed from Smith to Stoddert to be recorded, that the certificate of acknowledgment should state upon its face, that Thomas Corcoran and Richard Parrott, who took and certified the acknowledgment, were justices of the peace at the time of that acknowledgment.

3. That the recitals in the deeds, are evidence as between the parties to those deeds, of the facts therein stated; that those parties are estopped to deny the truth of those facts; and that, as the purpose of offering those deeds on the part of the plaintiff is only to show the transmission of the legal title from the bargainors to the bargainees, it is not necessary for the plaintiff to prove the truth of those recitals.

4. That it is not necessary for the plaintiff to show, that W. Smith, the trustee, had precisely followed the terms of the trust; but that the legal estate would pass to the bargainee, whether the terms of the trust were complied with or not. If the bargainee took with notice of the trust, he would stand as trustee in the place of W. Smith; if without notice and for valuable consideration, then he took an absolute title; so that, in either event, the legal title would pass, and the cestui que trusts only could complain; and that, in a court of equity. W. Smith did not convey by virtue of a power; but by virtue of the legal title vested in him.

The defendant then offered evidence that he and those under whom he claimed, were in possession, under an adverse claim of title from the year 1816 up to, and at the date of the deed from Slye to the Bank of the United States.

Mr. Key, for the plaintiff, objected to evidence of possession without a warrant and location.

THE COURT overruled the objection; the plea being not guilty or defence on title.

THE COURT (nem. con.) was of opinion that as Slye was not seized of the lot at the date of his deed of bargain and sale to the Bank of the United States, the plaintiff could not recover in this action.

Verdict for the defendant. The plaintiff took a bill of exceptions, but no writ of error was issued.

Case No. 909.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES v. BOMFORD.

[1 Hayw. & H. 256.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. April 19, 1847.

TRUSTEES—POWERS—VARYING TERMS OF TRUST.

The Bank of the United States made several partial assignments of assets to different bodies of trustees, assigning to each a different class of assets and specifying the objects for which each assignment was made. In one class of these assignments it included the judgment in this case. The defendant tendered payment of this judgment in a manner not contemplated by the terms of the assignment, which embraced this judgment, to wit, payment in the paper of the bank which he had purchased at a large discount. Held, that the trustees could not vary the terms of this trust, and must accept payments as designated in the assignments of the assets to them.

At law. Scire facias to revive a judgment [against George Bomford.]

The following statement of facts was submitted to the court for its decision: The Bank of the United States, the above legal plaintiff, made several partial assignments of assets to different sets of trustees for different objects, and among them: (These assignments not to be considered by the court unless admissible in evidence in this cause.) 1st. To James Dundas et al., May 1st, 1841, to secure certain assets, including above debt. 2d. To James Robertson et al., of June, 1841, for other assets, to secure the holders of the bank's paper circulation, &c. Richard Smith was appointed agent for each set of trustees, and as such, on the application of defendant, agreed to receive payment of the above debt in paper of the bank, supposing at the time that the debt was included in the second assignment above, under which the trustees had authorized such payments to be received. Under this agreement the defendant purchased paper at a heavy discount and offered to pay with it; but Mr. Smith, having then discovered that the debt was included in the first assignment, under which such payments were not sanctioned, declined to receive payment in the paper, and thereupon the defendant sold the paper at an advance on the cost. The defendant now claims that he has still the right to pay in such funds, which is denied by the plaintiff. It is admitted that the assignment of the above judgment has not been entered on the docket, and that no notice of the assignment first mentioned was given to defendant by plaintiff until after said tender, and that when Mr. Smith agreed as aforesaid to receive payment in the bank's paper, his motive, as stated before, was not explained to the defendant. If on the foregoing statement the court shall be of the opinion that the plaintiff was not bound to receive payment in the bank's paper so tendered by the defendant under said agreement with said Smith, or in consequence of the subsequent sale of said bank paper by said defendant was relieved from the obligation to receive payment in like paper, as aforesaid, then judgment to be entered generally for plaintiff. If the court shall be of the opinion that under the circumstances the defendant was entitled to pay in such bank paper and has not lost the right in the sale thereof as aforesaid, then he shall have the like benefit of such opinion as he could have by bill in chancery, and judgment shall be entered for plaintiff on the terms that he shall be allowed to pay the same in paper as aforesaid, provided that such paper shall be tendered by such certain day, to be named by the court, as a court of chancery would in such case allow for such tender; and it is agreed that this cause shall be considered by the court as though the several pleas of payment tender and set off, were formally entered, &c.

Clement Cox, for plaintiff.
W. L. H. Smith, for defendant.

THE COURT (DUNLOP, Circuit Judge, not sitting) having considered this case, is of opinion that the plaintiff was not bound to receive payment in the bank paper tendered under the said agreement.

The following endorsement appears on the written opinion: "Mr. Smith desires this case should be considered by the court as if at the time of the submission and decision the defendant had purchased other bank paper, which he had in court to the amount of the plaintiff's judgment ready to be applied thereto; to which desire the plaintiff's attorney answered, 'I have no objection to this.'" THE COURT to this said, "It makes no difference."

Case No. 910.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES v. BRENT.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 696.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May Term, 1826.

BANKS—OFFICIAL BOND—EXECUTED AFTER SERVICE BEGINS—VALIDITY.

1. In an official bond, the words "well and faithfully executed the office, and in all things relating to the same, well and faithfully behave," mean the same as the words "faithfully perform the trust reposed in them." [and do not render the surety liable for want of skill on the part of the principal.]

[See Union Bank of Georgetown v. Forrest, Case No. 14,356.]

2. Quaere, whether the official bond of the teller of a branch bank of the United States, is void because not taken conformably with the 6th article of the rules and regulations for the government of the officers or discount and deposit of the Bank of the United States."

3. It was not void because executed fourteen days after the teller had entered upon the duties of his office.

At law. Debt [by the Bank of the United States against William Brent, surety] upon the official bond of Richmond Johnson, a teller of the office of discount and deposit of the Bank of the United States, at Washington, dated 21st September, 1819, in the penalty of $20,000, the condition of which was, that he should "well and faithfully execute the said office, and in all things relating to the same, should well and faithfully behave." [Heard on demurrer to pleas and demurrer to rejoinder. Judgment for defendant. Recovery was thereafter had by the bank in an action of assumpsit against the teller. See Bank of U. S. v. Johnson, Case No. 919.]

By the 14th article of the constitution of the bank, which is contained in the 11th section of the act of incorporation, the directors are authorized to establish offices of discount and deposit in the several states and territories, "and to commit the management of the said offices and the business thereof, respectively, to such persons and under such regulations as they shall think proper." Under that power the directors established "rules and regulations for the government of the offices of discount and deposit of the Bank of the United States," consisting of thirty-one articles, the sixth of which is in these words: "The tellers, clerks, and servants of the offices shall be appointed by their directors, and before they enter on the duties of their respective offices, bonds shall be given, with sufficient surety, (to be approved by the directors,) for the faithful performance of the trust reposed in them." The breach of the condition of the bond, alleged in the declaration was, "that the said R. J. did not well and faithfully execute the said office, and in all things relating to the same, well and faithfully behave," but at divers times, by virtue of his appointment of teller, received divers sums of money, amounting to $7,000, &c., "and hath not rendered nor paid to the plaintiffs the said sum of money, nor any part thereof, nor any just, true, or fair account thereof, or of any part thereof," but refused so to do, "contrary to the faithful execution of the said office, and to faithful behavior in relation to the same, and contrary to the form and effect of the said condition."

The defendant pleaded six special pleas; the pleadings upon which resulted in general demurrers, except the third and fifth pleas, upon which issues were joined. The demurrer to the first plea raised the question whether the bond was void because executed fourteen days after the teller had entered upon the duties of his office. The demurrer to the second plea raised the question whether an official bond, with a condition that the officer "shall well and faithfully execute his office, and in all things relating to the same, well and faithfully behave," be a valid bond, if required and taken under a color, and by pretence of a rule, regulation, or by-law which requires that bonds shall be given by the officers "for the faithful performance of the trust reposed in them." The demurrer to the fourth plea raised the question whether, under the condition of a bond "well and faithfully to execute the office, and in all things relating to the same, well and faithfully to behave," the defendant (a surety,) is liable for mistakes made by the officer, in his office, not through want of fidelity or honesty on the part of the officer. The demurrer to the rejoinder to the sixth plea raised the question whether the defendant, under the condition of this bond, (which was required and taken by the plaintiffs, in fulfilment and supposed pursuance of the sixth article of the rules and regulations for the government of the offices of discount and deposit of the Bank of the United States,) was liable for the casual, involuntary, and honest mistakes of the officer, in keeping his accounts, although the condition of the bond be that he shall well and faithfully execute the office. These questions may be reduced to two, namely: 1. Do the words "well and faithfully execute the office, and in all things relating to the same, well and faithfully behave," mean the same as the words "faithfully perform the trust reposed in them?" 2. If they do not, then, whether the bond is void because not conformable to the sixth rule.

Mr. Jones and Mr. Wallach, for the defendant, to show that the bond, if not taken agreeably to the by-law, is void, cited the case of Bank of U. S. v. Dandridge, [Case No. 914,] decided by Marshall, Circuit Justice, in Richmond.

They contended, also, that "well and faithfully," in the condition of this bond, refer only to his fidelity, not to his skill in executing the duties of his office. Such is evidently the intent of the by-law, and the condition ought to be construed in reference to the by-law. President, etc., of Union Bank v. Clossy, 10 Johns. 271; Miller v. Stewart, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 702, Mr. Justice Story's opinion.

Mr. Lear and Mr. Swann, contra.

The directors had a right to take such a bond, and therefore, whether it conforms to the rule or not, it is a valid bond. The case in Johnson was decided upon the particular words of the condition, and not upon any general principle. "Well" refers to skill, "faithfully" to honesty. The two words cover mistakes and fraud.

Mr. Jones, in reply.

The rule is equivalent to a statute, and, within its sphere of action, is as effectual; and the law is clear that a bond taken under a statute must conform to it. See Barton v. Webb, 8 Term R. 459; Shum v. Farrington, 1 Bos. & P. 640; 2 Chit. Pl. 633; Harris v. Mantle, 3 Term R. 307; Foster v. Pierson, 4 Term R. 617.

Mr. Lear cited Rhodes v. Vaughan, 2 Hawks, 167; Hughes v. Smith, 5 Johns. 168; Clap v. Cofran, 7 Mass. 98; Freeman v. Davis, Id. 200; Morse v. Hodsdon, 5 Mass. 314; Stevens v. Boyce, 9 Johns. 292.

November 28, 1826. THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, contra) rendered judgment, upon the demurrers, for the defendant; being of opinion that the words, (in the condition of the bonds) "well and faithfully executed the office, and in all things, relating to the same, well and faithfully behave," substantially mean the same as the words in the sixth article of the rules and regulations, "faithfully perform the trust reposed in them," and the defendant was bound only for the teller's fidelity, not his skill. President, etc., of Union Bank v. Clossy, 10 Johns. 271. The court gave no opinion upon the question whether a bond taken under color of the sixth article of the rules and regulations, &c., be void if it do not substantially pursue the requisition of the article. But upon this point see the cases cited in the argument, and Inhabitants of Nottingham v. Giles, 1 Penn. [2 N. J. Law,] 120; Speake v. U. S., 9 Cranch, [13 U. S.] 28; U. S. v. NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS—DEMAND AT PLACE OF PAYMENT.

In an action against the maker of a promissory note, it is not necessary to show a demand of payment at the bank in which it is made payable.

[See Wallace v. McConnell, 13 Pet. (38 U. S.) 136; Covington v. Comstock, 14 Pet. (39 U. S.) 43; Brabston v. Gibson, 9 How. (50 U. S.) 263; Chillicothe Branch of State Bank of Ohio v. Fox, Case No. 2,683; Kendall v. Badger, Id. 7,691.]

At law. Assumpsit against [Daniel Bussard] the maker of a promissory note, to the order of William King, for $10,255, for value received, "negotiable and payable at the Bank of Columbia."

Judgment was confessed, subject to the opinion of the court, whether the plaintiffs could maintain the action without averring and proving demand of payment at the Bank of Columbia.

Mr. Lear, for plaintiffs, cited President, etc., of Bank of U. S. v. Smith, 11 Wheat. [24 U. S.] 171.

Mr. C. C. Lee, for the defendant, cited Beverley v. Beverley, in this court, at Alexandria, [Case No. 1,376,] not then decided, and Rowe v. Young, 2 Brod. & B. 165, 2 Bligh, 391.

THE COURT (CRANCH, Chief Judge, doubting) decided that it was not necessary for the plaintiffs to aver or prove a demand of payment at the Bank of Columbia, in this action against the maker.

Case No. 912.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES v. CORCORAN.

[3 Cranch, C. C. 46.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. Term, 1826.[2]

NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS — NOTICE TO INDORSER — EVIDENCE — AGREEMENT NOT TO PLEAD LIMITATIONS.

1. Notice left at the shop of the indorser's son, is not sufficient to charge him, although the shop was in a room of the house in which the indorser resided; the entrance into the shop being separate from that into the dwelling-house; the indorser having no concern in his son's business, and, being postmaster, and having a separate office in which he transacted his public and private business, and the son having a separate dwelling-house.

[See note at end of case.]

2. An agreement by the indorser not to take advantage of the statute of limitations, and to authorize an attorney to agree to docket a suit upon the note, is not evidence from which the jury can infer that the indorser received due notice.

[See note at end of case.]

At law. Assumpsit against [Thomas Corcoran] the defendant as indorser of Daniel Reintzel's note, for $3,700. [Judgment for defendant. This was subsequently affirmed by the supreme court in Bank of U. S. v. Corcoran, 2 Pet. (27 U. S.) 121.]

The notice for the defendant was left at the shop of the defendant's son, kept in the dwelling-house of the defendant, but having a separate entrance, and unconnected with the part occupied by the defendant.

The defendant had no concern with the shop, and the son had a separate dwelling-house. The defendant was postmaster, and kept an office in which he transacted his private business as well as his public. The notary had been in the habit of leaving notices for the defendant at the shop of the defendant's son; but there was no evidence that the defendant had authorized, or acquiesced in, such notices so to be left.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, contra) instructed the jury that such notice, so left, was not sufficient to charge the defendant.

Mr. Key, for the plaintiff, then prayed the court to instruct the jury in effect, that if they should be satisfied by the evidence that notice had been duly received by the defendant, although it was so left, the notice was sufficient; and that the two papers (hereafter mentioned), were evidence from which the jury might infer such notice. The papers were, first, an agreement not to take advantage of the statute of limitations; and, second, a promise to authorize counsel to docket a suit upon the note.

But THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, contra) refused to give the instruction, because they thought the papers did not warrant such an inference.

Bills of exception were taken, and upon the writ of error, the judgment was affirmed by the supreme court of the United States upon both points. 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 121.

[NOTE. Mr. Justice Washington, in delivering the affirming opinion,—Bank of U. S. v. Corcoran, 2 Pet. (27 U. S.) 121,—said:

["It seems from the evidence that the store never was, at any period, the place appointed for the delivery of notices or any other communications to the defendant. But, if it had been, the note in question came to maturity some time in the month of July, 1819, and the proof was, that the defendant took charge of the postoffice some time in the year of 1818, after which that became the place at which notices and other communications to him were usually left, and where he transacted both his private and public business. Were it to be admitted that the service of a notice at a place not appointed by the defendant as the one at which notices to him were to be delivered would be sufficient in law to charge him, upon the ground that other notices had been previously left at the same place, it would surely be too extravagant to contend that a service at the same place would be legal, after another place had been appointed for that purpose, and where they had in point of fact been usually left.

[2] [Affirmed in 2 Pet. (27 U. S.) 121.]

["Let us now see what were the papers which the plaintiffs had given in evidence, which the court were called upon to declare to the jury were competent evidence from which the jury might make the inference insisted upon: The first is the letter of the defendant, dated the 8th of May, 1822, and addressed to the cashier of the Bank of Columbia, in which he declares that he will not take any advantage of the limitation act for his indorsement on this and another note; the blank authority sent to the defendant by the cashier of the Bank of the United States on the 14th of December, 1824, for the signatures of the defendant and of the maker of the notes, purporting to empower some attorney to docket suits against them on these notes, with a declaration indorsed thereon by the defendant that if the maker of the notes should not be able to satisfy the bank before court, and they should determine to bring suit, he would instruct a particular person to docket the case for him. Let it be admitted that these papers bound the defendant to abstain from making a particular defense to which the law entitled him, and to cause the action intended to be commenced against him to be docketed, so as not to delay the plaintiffs, could the jury from thence infer, with any legal propriety, either that the necessity of proving notice of the nonpayment of the notes would be dispensed with, or the fact that the notice left at the store of James Corcoran was received by the defendant at any time, much less in due time? If this was a question of inference fit to be submitted to the discretion of the jury, it seems to the court that the rules respecting this subject which have been laid down with so much care would no longer be fixed and certain, but would change with the varying conclusions which a jury might draw of the fact from evidence, however slight, given to prove it. What, for example, does the rule that notice must in certain cases be served personally upon the indorser, or be left at his dwelling house or place of business, signify, if a jury may from any evidence, however remote from the fact, presume that the notice, though left at any other place, might have found its way to the hands of the person whom it was intended to charge?"]

NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS—DISCOUNT—USURY.

THE COURT (nem. con.) was of opinion that it was not usury. The argument of counsel was very slight; and after the court intimated its opinion, the defendant withdrew the defence.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES v. DANDRIDGE et al.

Circuit Court, E. D. Virginia. 1824.

CORPORATIONS—OFFICERS—APPOINTMENT—EVIDENCE.

[This was an action of debt on an official bond, and was brought by the Bank of the United States against Dandridge as principal, and Carter B. Page, Wilson Allen, James Brown, Jr., Thomas Taylor, Harry Heth, and Andrew Stevenson as sureties. The bond was conditioned to be void if Dandridge should well, truly, and faithfully discharge the duties and trust reposed in him as cashier of the office of discount and deposit of the Bank of the United States at Richmond. The court (by Marshall, Circuit Justice) held that, although the bond was duly executed by the defendants, and Dandridge was appointed and continued as cashier, yet there had been no approval and acceptance of the bond as provided by the charter of the bank, and therefore the defendants were not bound thereby. The court also excluded evidence offered to prove the acceptance of the bond, on the ground that the record of the proceedings of the board of directors, or a copy of it, showing the assent of the directors to the bond, was necessary, and if such assent had not been entered on the records the bond was void. This was not because the record was primary evidence, which the plaintiff had it in his power to produce, but rather because a corporation aggregate can act only by writing, or by its duly-appointed officers, and such officers could be appointed only by writing.]

[On writ of error the judgment of the circuit court was reversed by the supreme court (Mr. Justice Story delivering the opinion) on the ground that the acts of artificial persons afford the same presumptions as the acts of natural persons. "If a person acts notoriously as cashier of a bank, and is recognized by the directors or by the corporation as an existing officer, a regular appointment will be presumed; and his acts as cashier will bind the corporation, although no written proof is or can be adduced of his appointment." Case No. 915.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES v. DAVIS.

[4 Cranch, C. C. 533.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. March Term, 1835.

NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS—INDORSEMENT TO CASHIER—EVIDENCE OF NOTICE.

1. An indorsement to the cashier of a bank is virtually an indorsement to the bank, and may be so declared upon.

[See Bank of Newbury v. Baldwin, Case No. 892; Blair v. First Nat. Bank, Id. 1,485; Bank of U. S. v. Lyman, Id. 924.]

2. A memorandum in the handwriting of a deceased note-clerk of a bank, that he had delivered a certain notice, may be read in evidence in favor of the bank.

At law. Assumpsit [by the Bank of the United States] upon R. Wright's draft on Jenkins, of Baltimore, in favor of the defendant, Richard Davis, by him indorsed in blank, and by Richard Smith, cashier of the office of the Bank of the United States in Washington, to —— White, cashier of the office of the Bank of the United States in Baltimore.

The declaration stated that Richard Smith indorsed the bill to the plaintiffs, (the Bank of the United States,) without noticing White, to whom the said R. Smith had indorsed it.

Mr. Redin, for the defendant, objected that there was no indorsement. But, it having been proved that Mr. Smith was merely the cashier of the plaintiffs' office here, and Mr. White the cashier of the plaintiffs' office in Baltimore,

THE COURT (nem. con.) was of opinion that the indorsement was virtually to the plaintiffs.

The plaintiffs then offered in evidence a notice signed by the Baltimore notary-public addressed to Mr. Richard Smith, the last indorser, upon the back of which was an indorsement to this effect: "A similar notice delivered to Richard Davis by me, John S. Nevius, January 2d, 1833," and proved that Nevius is dead. That on the said 2d of January, 1833, he was what is called a note-clerk in the bank, and occasionally delivered notices of this kind; but they were more generally given by other officers, called messengers.

The defendant's counsel objected that such memorandums are not evidence unless made by a person whose usual business is to do what he certifies he has done.

But THE COURT (nem. con.) permitted it to be read in evidence to the jury.

Verdict for the plaintiffs, $2,298.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES v. DEVEAUX et al.

[1 Hall, Law J. 263.]

Circuit Court, D. Georgia. May Term, 1808.[1]

FEDERAL COURTS—JURISDICTION—CORPORATIONS—BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

1. The president, directors and company of the bank of the United States, although citizens of the state of Pennsylvania, cannot communicate their right of suing to a corporate body of which they are exclusively members, so as to maintain action in the circuit court of Georgia.

[See note at end of case.]

2. The constitution takes no notice of corporate bodies in enumerating the cases in which the circuit courts have jurisdiction upon circumstances of the persons. Const. U. S. art. 3, § 2.

[See note at end of case.]

[3. Act Feb. 25, 1791, (1 Stat. 191, c. 10,) incorporating the first Bank of the United States, does not confer the right to sue in federal courts.]

[See note at end of case.]

[4. With the exception of imposts or duties on exports and imports, the several states retain all rights of taxing individual property held within their respective jurisdictions, including that of the Bank of the United States.]

[See note at end of case.]

At law. This was an action brought by the president, directors and company of the Bank of the United States (established, as they averred, under an act of congress, entitled, an act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States, passed the 26th of February, 1791, [1 Stat. 191, c. 10,]) [against Peter Deveaux, tax collector, and Thomas Robertson, sheriff] for the purpose of trying the right of the state of Georgia to impose a tax on the branch of the said bank established at Savannah. [Heard on demurrer to plea to the jurisdiction. Demurrer overruled. Judgment for defendants. This was afterwards reversed by the supreme court in Bank of U. S. v. Deveaux, 5 Cranch, (9 U. S.) 61. See note at end of case.]

Woodruff & Harris, for plaintiffs.

Leake, Sol. Gen.

Mitchell & Bullock, for defendants.

Before JOHNSON, [Circuit Justice,] and STEPHENS, [District Judge.]

PER CURIAM. The action in this case is trespass. The defendants plead to the jurisdiction of this court, the plaintiffs demur generally, and the case presents, for the consideration of the court, the single question of jurisdiction.

It is incumbent on the plaintiffs to give jurisdiction to this court by proper averments on the record; that jurisdiction must be founded on circumstances of the persons, parties to the action or circumstances of the case. The averments intended to give jurisdiction are, "that the president, directors and company are citizens of the state of Pennsylvania, and that the bank was incorporated or established by a law of the United States." Upon the first of these averments it is to be observed, that this action must be instituted by the plaintiffs either in their individual or corporate capacity. In the former, it could not be maintained, or if at all, they must have sued by their baptismal names. In the latter, the individual is so totally sunk in their corporate state of existence, that though it were true in fact, that the president, directors and company were all citizens of the state of Pennsylvania, still they could not communicate their right of suing in this court to the corporate body of which they are members. The constitution takes no notice of corporate bodies in enumerating the cases in which this court shall exercise jurisdiction upon circumstances of the persons. A corporation cannot with propriety be denominated a citizen of any state, so that the right to sue in this court under the constitution can only be extended to corporate bodies by a liberality of construction, which we do not feel ourselves at liberty to exercise. As a suit in right of a corporation can never be maintained by the individuals who compose it, either in their individual capacity or by their individual names, how is the citizenship of the individuals of the corporate body ever to be brought into question by the pleadings? With regard to the jurisdiction of this court, as founded upon circumstances of the action, it is necessary, in order to vest that jurisdiction, that the case should be brought within the description of actions arising under the constitution or laws of the United States. The general principle is, that the states retain all the powers of sovereignty, not expressly relinquished to the United States. The states have relinquished the right of taxing individual property held within their jurisdiction, under no possible circumstance, except where such a tax may come within the description of imposts or duties on exports and imports.

There is no question raised under the constitution; neither is it a question arising under the laws of the United States. No privilege or right created by the laws of congress is violated. The legal validity of the bank charter is not denied, nor any difference of opinion entertained of its effects. The act incorporating the bank contains no clause exempting the property of the bank from taxation, neither the construction nor constitutionality of any law of congress, arising under the law of the state of Georgia, in which we can see no clashing or interference with the laws or constitution of the United States. Counsel have argued, that it is a case arising under the laws and constitution of the United States, because we must look into the constitution and bank charter, to determine the question of jurisdiction; but if this prove any thing, it proves a great deal too much. For it would go to give this court jurisdiction in every possible case whatever. There would exist the same necessity of looking into the constitution and laws of the United States, in a case between citizen and citizen of the same state, or in the most ordinary question of state jurisdiction.

It is true, that this view of the subject may expose this valuable institution to some embarrassment; and it is to be regretted, that it cannot be better guarded, but it is to be hoped, that a just and temperate idea of the true policy of the individual states, with its real and extensive importance to the union, will always afford it ample protection; and if their rights are violated, the state courts are open to them.

It is also true, that there have been cases before the supreme court, in which corporate bodies were parties, that have undergone the review of that court, without any notice being taken of this question; but the answer is, that there were no pleas to the jurisdiction in those cases, and any objections that may have been raised upon the face of the record appear to have escaped the attention of the court and counsel. We are happy in understanding that this decision is to be reviewed in the supreme court; its importance in every point of view entitles it to the notice of the highest court in which it can be considered. Plea to jurisdiction sustained, demurrer overruled, and judgment for defendants.

[NOTE.

[This judgment was reversed by the supreme court in Bank of U. S. v. Deveaux, 5 Cranch, (9 U. S.) 61. Mr. Chief Justice Marshall, in delivering the opinion, said:

["The plaintiffs contend that the incorporating act confers this jurisdiction. That act creates the corporation, gives it a capacity to make contracts and to acquire property, and enables it 'to sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded, answer and be answered, defend and be defended, in courts of record or any other place whatsoever.' This power, if not incident to a corporation, is conferred by every incorporating act. * * * The court, then, is of the opinion, that no right is conferred on the bank, by the act of incorporation, to sue in the federal courts. * * *

["The jurisdiction of this court being limited, so far as respects the character of the parties in this particular case, 'to controversies between citizens of different states,' both parties must be citizens, to come within the description. * * * A corporation aggregate is certainly not a citizen; and consequently cannot sue or be sued in the courts of the United States, unless the rights of the members, in this respect, can be exercised in their corporate name. * * * Substantially and essentially, the parties, in such a case, where the members of the corporation are aliens, or citizens of a different state from the opposite party, come within the spirit and terms of the jurisdiction conferred by the constitution on the national tribunals. * * * If, then, the congress of the United States had, in terms, enacted that incorporated aliens might sue a citizen, or that the incorporated citizens of one state might sue a citizen of another state, in the federal courts, by its corporate name, this court would not have felt itself justified in declaring that such a law transcended the constitution. * * * If a corporation may sue in the courts of the Union, the court is of opinion that the averment in this case is sufficient. Being authorized to sue in their corporate name, they could make the averment, and it must apply to the plaintiffs as individuals, because it could not be true as applied to the corporation."

[FEDERAL CORPORATIONS—RIGHT TO SUE IN FEDERAL COURTS.

[In Osborn v. Bank of U. S., 9 Wheat. (22 U. S.) 738, the decision of the supreme court in the principal case was cited by counsel to show that federal courts had no jurisdiction of suits against the second Bank of the United States. The act of congress incorporating this institution provided that it should have power to sue and be sued in state courts, and in any circuit court of the United States. The supreme court, per Mr. Chief Justice Marshall, held that the incorporating act was a law of the United States, so that the judicial power granted to the United States by the constitution extended to cases arising thereunder, and that the clause conferring such jurisdiction on federal circuit courts was a valid exercise of that power, and applied to all cases in which the bank was a party. The power has been exercised from time to time by congress in respect to particular corporations or classes of corporations. Federal circuit courts now have jurisdiction of all suits by or against a corporation created by congress by virtue of Act March 3, 1875, § 2, (18 Stat. 470,) as suits "arising under the laws of the United States." Union Pac. R. Co. v. Myers, (Pacific Railroad Removal Cases,) 115 U. S. 1, 5 Sup. Ct. 1113.

[FEDERAL COURTS—JURISDICTION—CITIZENSHIP OF CORPORATIONS.

[The decision of the supreme court reversing the judgment in the principal case might be strictly construed as holding that a corporation whereof all the members were citizens of Pennsylvania could sue a citizen of Georgia in a federal court. But the language of Mr. Chief Justice Marshall was construed to mean that federal jurisdiction did not exist unless diversity of citizenship existed as between the defendant and all the members of the corporation. This construction was generally acquiesced in by the circuit courts, and followed by the supreme court in Commercial Bank of Vicksburg v. Slocomb, 14 Pet. (39 U. S.) 60. It was, however, overruled in Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Letson, 2 How. (43 U. S.) 497. That was a suit by a citizen of New York against a corporation created by the laws of South Carolina, but two of the members were citizens of North Carolina. The jurisdiction rested on the clause of the judiciary act of September 24, 1789, (1 Stat. 73,) conferring it when the suit is between a citizen of the state where it is brought and a citizen of another state. The jurisdiction was held to exist under that act and under Act Feb. 28, 1839, conferring on circuit courts jurisdiction of cases where there are several defendants, some of whom are not found within the district where the suit is brought. The court also took the broader ground that a corporation "is, substantially, within the meaning of the law, a citizen of the state which created it, and where its business is done, for all the purposes of suing and being sued." The members of a corporation suing in its corporate name are now, for purposes of jurisdiction, conclusively presumed to be citizens of the state which created it. National S. S. Co. v. Tugman, 106 U. S. 118, 1 Sup. Ct. 58.

[FEDERAL CORPORATIONS—TAXATION BY STATES.

[The remarks of the learned justice in the principal case, concerning the right of a state to tax the property of the Bank of the United States, should be taken with the limitation that this power of the state cannot be exercised to harass or control the lawful action of a corporation constitutionally created by congress. M'Culloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. (17 U. S.) 316. In that case a peculiarly burdensome tax laid by the state of Maryland upon banks not incorporated by the state legislature was declared unconstitutional and inoperative with respect to a branch of the second Bank of the United States, doing business in that state.]

NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS — NOTICE OF NON-PAYMENT — NOTICE FROM ONE INDORSER TO ANOTHER.

1. Where a note is made payable at a particular place, and the indorser resides there; if the holder remits it to his agent at such place for payment, and it is dishonoured; the agent is not bound to give notice of the dishonour to the indorser; but his duty is to give notice to his principal; who may then give notice to the indorser, and if given in due time after the principal has received notice, the indorser is bound.

[Followed in Codrington v. Adams, Case No. 2,937.]

2. If due notice is given by a holder to his immediate indorser, of the dishonour of a note, and the latter gives due notice to a prior indorser, the holder may recover against the latter, although he has never given him any notice; for due notice given by any party on the bill, is notice to charge in favour of all subsequent parties.

[3. The relation of a branch of the Bank of the United States to another branch, or to the parent bank, which has forwarded paper for collection, is simply that of principal and agent.]

At law. Assumpsit by the plaintiffs [the president, directors, and company of the Bank of the United States] as indorsers of a note, signed by one J. K. Pickering, and indorsed by the defendant [Samuel Goddard] dated at Portsmouth (N. H.), on the 1st of January, 1829, for the sum of 1,005 dollars, payable to the defendant or order, at the United States Branch Bank in Boston, in sixty days and grace. Plea, the general issue. [Verdict and judgment for plaintiffs.]

At the trial the material facts were as follows: In the winter of 1828–9, John K. Pickering, of Portsmouth, being deeply insolvent, owed the United States Branch Bank at Portsmouth a certain amount, for which they agreed to accept his note for $1,000, endorsed by the defendant. A note, of which the following is a copy, was accordingly given to the bank. "Portsmouth, Jan. 1st, 1829. Value received, I promise to pay Samuel Goddard or order, one thousand dollars, at the United States Branch Bank in Boston, in sixty days and grace." Endorsed, "Samuel Goddard." Mr. Wentworth, the cashier of the Portsmouth Branch, enclosed this note to Mr. Frothingham, the cashier of the Boston Branch, in a letter dated March 2nd, in which he says, "I enclose for collection J. K. Pickering's note for $1,000. P. S. I have notified J. K. Pickering here, of his note being at your bank." He afterwards, at the request of Pickering, wrote another letter to the cashier of the Boston Branch, under date of March 3d, which was received the 4th, in which he says, "I'll thank you to inform Mr. Samuel Goddard that J. K. Pickering's note is at your office, as I think he will pay it without protest." It also appeared from the evidence, that Pickering's insolvency was known to Goddard when the note was endorsed; that Pickering never expected to pay it, and that the note was made payable in Boston, where Goddard resided, for that reason. Pickering, about the time of making the note, put into Goddard's hands funds, which Pickering thought sufficient to pay this note and some other liabilities; but from the depreciation of property, and other causes, these funds proved to be wholly insufficient. Goddard had done business in Boston, without having a counting-room, during the last two or three years, though he resided principally in Brookline; but in November, 1828, he took a house in Boston, which, with his family, he has since occupied. It was shown, that William Stevenson, a notary public, who noted the protest on the note in the case, had also presented to Goddard, in February last, a draft or bill, directed to "Samuel Goddard, Merchant, Boston." It was also shown, on the part of the plaintiffs, that Goddard's name was not in the directory, and that his residence was not in fact known to the officers of the Branch Bank in Boston, but might have been ascertained by reasonable inquiry. And on the part of the defendant it was shown, that Nathaniel Goddard, Esq., a merchant in Boston, who was in the habit of doing business at the Branch Bank, was the uncle of the defendant. The note was not paid at maturity, and the question in the case was, as to the sufficiency of the notice of nonpayment to the defendant. The facts in regard to this question were these. On the 5th of March, the grace on the note expired. On the afternoon of the same day the protest and notices were put into the mail, which closed at Boston that evening, and should have arrived at Portsmouth the next morning. But owing to a severe snow-storm, the mail from Boston did not arrive at Portsmouth until late in the afternoon, and some hours after the mail had gone from Portsmouth to Boston. On the next day, that is, the 6th of March, Wentworth wrote to the defendant a letter, which was put into and sent by the mail of the same day, and which he received on the 8th, stating the non-payment of the note, and requesting him to pay it. No inquiry was made for the defendant by the officers of the Branch Bank at Boston, for the purpose of giving him notice of the nonpayment of the note. And no notice was in fact given, except as above mentioned.

Theophilus Parsons, for defendant.

Injury to the defendant is to be presumed from laches on the part of those, who should notify him. The endorser is entitled to notice, although perfectly conusant of the insolvency of the maker, and although he puts his name on the paper merely to give it a credit. Smith v. Becket, 13 East, 187. This case is confirmed and the principle established in its full extent, in Brown v. Maffey, 15 East, 216. The cases, which show this principle to be adopted in this country, are very numerous. There is a very full collection of them in a note to the 211th page of the last American edition of Chitty, on Bills. If the endorser has taken all the property and assets of the maker, or if he has received full indemnity for his indorsement, he loses his right to notice. But though he has at any time effects in his hands as indemnity, if they are afterwards withdrawn or disposed of, he has full right to claim notice; and this is our case. See Chitty, 206, and Clegg v. Cotton, 3 Bos. & P. 239. The defendant, then, being entitled to notice, the question comes up, whether the notice in the present case was sufficient. The law is now settled, that the holder of a note may have all of the day succeeding its dishonour, wherein to notify the endorser; but he can have no more. In this case the notice was insufficient, unless the agent or banker may always send his notices back to the holder, from whom they may go to the endorser. But this principle cannot possibly be adopted without qualification. It cannot be supposed, that a banker may always send notice of non-payment to the holder, however near to him the endorser may reside, however well he may know the domicil of the endorser, and however far from them the holder may live. No case whatever can be found to justify such a principle. The cases relied on by the plaintiffs go upon very different grounds. In the case in 5 Mass. 167, the court say, the agent of the holder is justified in sending him the notices, because "he may not have known the domicil of the defendant." In 3 Pick. 180, (Eagle Bank v. Chapin,) the court say, the notary did "the best thing for the defendant he could do." In the leading English cases, as in 9 East, 347, the agent and the plaintiff, who was principal, lived in London, and the endorser at a distance. Here the case is just the reverse. It is now perfectly well settled, that a question of this kind is a question of law; that the court must take into consideration all the facts, and determine, whether, on the whole, reasonable diligence was used in informing the endorser of non-payment. Here, it is not enough to say, that the Boston Branch Bank must have learnt at once, by the slightest inquiry, the residence of the defendant. The case goes much farther. The cashier of the Boston Branch was actually informed of it. Mr. Wentworth, living in Portsmouth, says to Mr. Frothingham, living in Boston, on the 2d of March, "I have informed Mr. Pickering here, that the note is with you," and on the 3d of March, "I will thank you to inform Mr. Goddard." Mr. Wentworth would have added nothing to the plain and unavoidable meaning of the letters, had he said, "I have notified Mr. Pickering here, because he lives here, and will thank you to inform Mr. Goddard, because he lives in Boston." Mr. Frothingham, then, was informed, that Mr. Goddard lived in Boston, and that the note was sent to him in Boston to be there paid by Mr. Goddard; and certainly, he cannot be justified by any reported case, or by any reason or principle, in sending the notices of non-payment, under these circumstances, to Portsmouth, that they might come back again to Boston.

Webster in reply.

The different branches of the Bank of the United States, have no connexion with each other; but treat each other as different institutions. The note was sent for collection. It was not the fund of the general parent bank, but of the Portsmouth Branch, and constituted part of specific funds of the latter. There was no request by Wentworth, in his letter to the cashier at Boston, to give notice of the dishonour of the bill to the defendant, after it was dishonoured; but only antecedently to its becoming due. Nor does it appear, by the letter containing the request, whether the notice was to be given to the defendant as indorser, or as having funds of Pickering in his hands. If the cashier at Boston had been requested to give notice of the dishonour, and his residence was pointed out, still the plaintiffs are entitled to recover. It is no part of the contract with the indorser, that he shall receive notice of the dishonour, at the place, where the note is made payable, or from the holder or his agent there. It is res inter alios acta. The agent is in no case bound to give notice to the indorser. He may contract so to do; and if he then neglects, he may be responsible to his principal; but the indorser has no rights from such a contract. The practice, in all cases of this sort, is, for the bank to return the note protested to the holder, and not to give notice to the indorser. (This was admitted on the other side.) If the indorser receives notice from the holder within the time required by law, he has no right to say, that an agent might have given earlier notice. The note here was returned according to the course of business; and it is admitted that the notice was in due time, if the agent was not bound to give notice.

The cases in Bayley, Bills, 173, 5 Mass. 167, and 2 Johns. Cas. 1, are in point. The cases, too, of the bankers in 3 Bos. & P. 599, 9 East, 347, and 15 East, 291, are decisive in our favour. The principle is quite as strong, where the agent, and holder, and indorser live in the same place, as if they live in different places.

STORY, Circuit Justice. I lay out of the case all consideration of the fact, that the note belonged to the Branch Bank at Portsmouth, and was remitted to the Branch Bank at Boston for collection, both these branches being but the agents of the Bank of the United States, the real holder of the note. In the first place, it is admitted, that the known course of business in each of the branches is, in respect to all notes transmitted from another branch, to deal with them in the same manner as if transmitted by a stranger bank, and to return their notes back, upon their dishonour, to the branch, from which they have been received. In the next place, the branches being established by the parent bank for its own particular purposes, their agency may be limited and controlled according to the pleasure of the parent bank. So that the present case does not at all differ from that of a private principal, who employs different agents in different cities to transact business, or negotiate, and discount, and collect, notes there upon his account. No distinction was pointed out at the argument, as growing out of this circumstance, differing the case from the common case of holder and agent, or holder and banker; and none is believed to exist. The case may, therefore, for all the purposes of this suit, be considered as if the Portsmouth Branch were the real holder of the note, and wholly unconnected with the Branch in Boston, and employing the latter as its agent to collect the note when due. The question, then, is, whether notice of the dishonour ought to have been given by the Branch Bank at Boston to the defendant, or whether the notice sent by the Branch Bank at Portsmouth to the defendant was in due time, and sufficient in point of law. It is admitted, that there is no objection to the notice on the account of the delay of its arrival to the defendant until the 8th of March, when it ought regularly to have arrived on the 7th. The snow-storm sufficiently accounts for that; and the notice was given as early by the holder, as, under the circumstances, it could or ought to be.

The case is narrowed down, then, to the consideration, whether by law the defendant was entitled to notice directly from the agent in Boston, which, by due inquiry and diligence, he might have given on the 6th of March; or whether a circuitous notice through the holder was sufficient. The argument of the defendant's counsel is this. The agent is bound to give notice of the dishonour, to a prior indorser, who is intended to be charged, if his residence is known to him, or if, upon reasonable inquiry, it can be ascertained, and it is in fact nearer to his own, than that of the indorser, and a notice will thereby reach him earlier than from the principal holder. Reasonable diligence is in all cases sufficient in giving notice; but what is such must be judged of by all the circumstances of each case. If the agent may in all cases omit to give notice to the indorser, then, although he resides in the same city with the indorser, and the principal holder resides at a great distance, the indorser would be held, although a circuitous notice from the holder might not reach him for a week or a month, which would be unreasonable. And it is said, that there is no case, which justifies such a doctrine. If there be no such case, then the question must be considered upon principle. Now it is very clear, that if the Boston Branch had been the holders of the note, they would, under the circumstances, have been entitled to recover against the defendant, since he received due notice from the prior holders, to whom due notice was sent by them, and to whom, upon payment of the note, the defendant would have been answerable over. It is laid down in Bayley, Bills, (4th Ed.) 163, and better authority can scarcely be, that "though a holder or any other party gives no notice but to the person, of whom he took the bill; yet if notice is communicated without laches to the prior parties, he may avail himself of such communication, and sue any of such prior parties. It is no objection, in such case, that there was no notice immediately from the plaintiff to the defendant." And this doctrine is fully supported by decided cases. Jameson v. Swinton, 2 Camp. 373; Wilson v. Swabey, 1 Starkie, 34; Stanton v. Blossom, 14 Mass. 116; and Stafford v. Yates, 18 Johns. 327,—are in point. The reason seems to be, that as the notice is sufficient to charge the defendant with the payment in favour of the person who gives it, it ought to charge him in favour of all subsequent parties, because he sustains no injury from want of notice. It is, as to him, due notice. If, then, as holders, they might affect the defendant with responsibility by such circuity of notice, what is the reason, why, as agents, they may not give their principal the same right? If there be any, it must be upon the ground, that the agent is in all cases bound to give direct notice to the indorser intended to be charged, in the same way, and within the same time, and in the same manner, as his principal ought, if there were no agency, and the bill remained in his hands. Such a proposition has never yet been maintained, as far as I know, by any court of justice. And in the argument it was admitted, that if the domicil of the party, to whom notice is to be given, be unknown to the agent, he is not bound to give any notice. And it has been decided, that when a holder transmits a note for payment to his agent, he is not bound to inform the latter where the prior parties live, so as to enable the agent to give them notice.

But how is it established, that in any case an agent to receive payment of a note is bound to give notice to any person, but his principal, of the dishonour? The nature of the transaction does not necessarily imply it. The authority to receive payment may be complete, without any incidental authority to give such notice. It is certainly competent for the holder to authorize his agent to do no more than to demand payment, and give him notice of the dishonour. If the agent actually gives notice in due time to the antecedent parties, that may be good in favour of his principal. If the latter requires his agent to give such notice, and he neglects to do it, he may be chargeable with any loss sustained by such neglect. But the question is not, what the agent may do, or ought to do, as between himself and his principal; but whether the other parties, to be charged upon notice, have any right to such notice from him, so as to be discharged by his neglect. As I understand the doctrine of law upon this subject, it is, that an agent, upon the dishonour of a note remitted to him to procure payment, is bound to give notice of the dishonour to his principal, and transmit to him the proper evidence of it; but he is not bound to give any notice to other parties on the note. That was manifestly the doctrine of the court in Haynes v. Birks, 3 Bos. & P. 599, 601, where a bill had been remitted to bankers, as agents of the holder, to procure payment; and the argument there was, that in such a case the bankers, being agents of the holder, the defendant (the indorser) was entitled to the same notice, as if the bill had remained in the plaintiff's hands. But the court overruled the objection; and said that it was the banker's business only to acquaint his principal of the dishonour. The same doctrine was held in Tunno v. Lague, 2 Johns. Cas. 1. That case is very strong, for the defendant, who was sought to be charged, lived in the city of New-York, the bill being drawn by him at Jeremie (N. J.) in favour of the plaintiffs, upon a house in New-York, and dishonoured by the latter. The notice was not sufficient in the opinion of the court, having been given at New-York, long after the dishonour, if the party giving the notice had been the holder; but being an agent only, it was held, that the notice was sufficient, because it was earlier than the defendant would have had it, if the bill had been sent back to the plaintiffs, and notice had been sent directly by them. And the court said, that the duty of the agent extended no farther than to give notice to his principal. The same doctrine is also asserted in Colt v. Noble, 5 Mass. 167. The bill was drawn in New South Wales, in favour of the defendant, and by him indorsed at Madras to the plaintiffs, who sent it to their agent in London, where it was dishonoured by the drawees. The defendant resided in Portsmouth, N. H. and the agent might have sent notice to the defendant at Portsmouth in three months; but he merely transmitted the bill and protests to his principal at Madras, who sent notice from thence to the defendant, who did not receive it until more than a year after the dishonour. The court held the notice sufficient. And Mr. Chief Justice Parsons, in delivering the opinion of the court, said, "A person appointed a factor to cause a bill to be presented is entrusted with no other powers, and it is his duty to notify his principal." It is true, that in that case it did not appear, that the agent knew the defendant's domicil; but that consideration was not relied on. And the court decided generally, that the holder was not bound to give information of the domicil of the indorser to his agent; nor was the latter bound to give notice to the indorser of the dishonour; and that it made no difference, whether the bill was remitted to the factor to procure acceptance, or in payment of a debt due to him. The case would seem, therefore, to travel on all-fours with the present.

It appears to me, also, that the cases, in which it has been holden, that a banker, who as agent receives the bill of a customer, is only bound to give notice of its dishonour to his customer, in like manner as if he were himself the holder, and his customer were the party next entitled to notice, confirm the doctrine. The legal effect of these cases is, that the customer has the like time to communicate such notice. as if he had received it from a holder; and therefore by placing a bill or note in the hands of a banker, the number of persons, from whom notice must pass, is increased by one. So it is laid down in Bayley, Bills, (4th Ed.) 173, and the cases of Haynes v. Birks, 3 Bos. & P. 599; Scott v. Lifford, 9 East, 347; and Langdale v. Trimmer, 15 East, 291,—fully support the position; and it has also been recognized in the recent case of Firth v. Thrush, 8 Barn. & C. 387. In all these cases, the bankers were agents; and if they were bound to give notice at all, they might have given it a day earlier than it was received from their principals. But the court treated the cases exactly as if the agents were holders, and necessarily repudiated the notion, that either as holders or as agents, they were bound to give notice to any other person than their principal. But it is said, that in neither of these cases did it appear, that the bankers knew the residence of the parties, to be charged by notice; or that the banker's residence was nearer to the parties, than that of the principals. If that be admitted, it is still a sufficient answer, that neither of these facts was treated as material; and the judgment of the court proceeded upon a principle, which comprehended all such cases. If the sufficiency of the notice depended upon the fact, whether the agent had no knowledge of the residence of the parties, or lived farther from them than his principal, that fact ought to have come from the plaintiff as part of his case; for the onus was upon him to show due notice. I am not satisfied, however, that the case in 3 Bos. & P. 599, was not a case, where the banker lived nearer to the indorser than to the holder. The latter lived at Knightsbridge, and both of the former lived in London. But it seems to me, that there is a far stronger reason for requiring that the banker should give notice, where he and the principal live in the same town, or at least that notice in such cases should be given as early, as the principal might give it, if the note were in his own hands, than where the principal resides in a different town, since the communication between them is so much more easy.

It appears to me, that the question now before the court has been closed by authorities; if not by direct adjudication, at least by necessary inference. The doctrine is laid down, without any exception, that the agent is not bound to give notice; and if any exception had existed, it could not for so long a period have been overlooked. But if it were otherwise, and there were no authority in point, my own judgment would be the same. It appears to me, that an agent is not bound to give notice to the indorser of the dishonour of any note; and that his agency does not naturally include such a duty. If he contracts with his principal to give such notice, that is a mere private contract between the parties, with which the indorser has nothing to do. It neither enlarges, nor limits his rights. It may be inconvenient for him to receive a circuitous notice; but that is not sufficient to change the law. I think it would be far more inconvenient to establish the doctrine now contended for in the defence. All that is required by law, is, that the holder should give notice to the indorser in a reasonable time after he has knowledge of the dishonour, and that there should be no laches in getting that knowledge, if an agent has been employed.

This view of the case renders it unnecessary to consider the point, whether, under all the circumstances, the defendant was entitled to notice, he having received security, originally supposed to be sufficient to meet the payment; as well as some other points suggested in the argument at the bar. Judgment must therefore be entered for the plaintiffs, according to the verdict. Judgment accordingly.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES v. HATCH.

[1 McLean, 90.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Ohio. July Term, 1830.[2]

NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS—NOTICE OF DISHONOR—DISCHARGE OF ENDORSER—EXTENSION OF TIME.

1. A notice to the endorser of the dishonor of the bill, left with a boarder at the same house with the endorser, with a request to hand it to him, is sufficient.

[See McMurtrie v. Jones, Case No. 8,905.]

[See note at end of case.]

2. Any agreement made between the holder of the bill and the drawer, which shall suspend the right of the holder to prosecute on the bill, will discharge the endorser.

[See note at end of case.]

3. Such an agreement also suspends the right of the endorser, to pay the bill and enforce payment from the drawer.

[See note at end of case.]

At law. This action [by the Bank of the United States] is a scire facias to make the defendant a party to a judgment, which was obtained by the plaintiff against Elijah Pearson. The writ was issued against Pearson and [William S.] Hatch, and being non est as to Hatch, a judgment was entered against Pearson. [Judgment for defendant. This was afterwards affirmed by the supreme court. Bank of U. S. v. Hatch, 6 Pet. (31 U. S.) 250. See note at end of case.]

Mr. Worthington, for plaintiffs.

Mr. Hammond, for defendants.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This proceeding is authorized by a statute of Ohio, and the defendant is permitted to make any defence which he could have made to the original action.

The jury found a special verdict, which states the facts of the case as follows: "E. Pearson made the bill of exchange, a copy of which is attached to the declaration of the said plaintiff in the original suit against Pearson, the drawer of said bill, and that the said bill was regularly endorsed by the present defendant, Hatch." "They also find that on the 25th day of July, in the year 1820, said bill of exchange was duly protested for non-payment; and that on said day last mentioned, and on the succeeding day, the said defendant, Hatch, was boarding at the house of Henry Bainbridge, in the city of Cincinnati; that on the 26th day of July, in the year 1820, the notary public, by whom said bill was protested, called at the house of said Bainbridge and enquired for said Hatch, and was informed by a Mr. Young that said Hatch was not within; the said notary then left a written notice of said protest with said Young, who was at that time in the house aforesaid, and requested him to deliver said notice to said Hatch; and that in the summer of said year 1820, said Young was a boarder at said house. They also find that a suit was commenced against said Pearson, the drawer of said bill of exchange, which suit stood for trial at the September term, in the year 1822, of the circuit court of the United States for the district of Ohio. They also find, that previous to the year 1822, one Griffin Yeatman was confined in the jail limits of Hamilton county, in said state, on a ca. sa., issued at the instance of, and on a judgment in favor of said Pearson. That said Yeatman was a material witness for the plaintiff in a number of suits then pending in said court; that one George W. Jones, who was then agent for plaintiffs, and one William M. Worthington, the then attorney for the plaintiffs, agreed with the said Pearson, that in consideration, he, the said Pearson, would permit the said Yeatman to leave the jail limits and attend said court during the term aforesaid, then the suit then pending in said court against said Pearson on said bill of exchange, should be continued without judgment until the term of said court next ensuing said September term, 1822. That in pursuance of this agreement, the said Pearson permitted the said Yeatman to leave said jail limits and attend said court; and that said suit against said Pearson was continued agreeably to said agreement."

On these facts two questions arise. 1. Whether the notice of the dishonor of the bill to Hatch was sufficient. 2. Whether the agreement to continue the cause of the Bank v. Pearson, under the circumstances, discharged the endorser.

The rule is well established, that a notice left at the usual place of abode of the endorser, is sufficient to charge him. The notice may be handed to a servant of the house, or to the landlord, if the endorser be a lodger. Or the notice may be left at his office where his principal business is transacted. In this case, the notice was not handed to a servant, or the landlord of the house where Hatch boarded, but to a boarder at the same house, with a request to hand it to Hatch. The boarder, it would seem, would be at least as likely to deliver the notice, as a servant or the landlord. And if the service of the notice come within the reason of the rule established as to other means of conveying it, it must be held sufficient. The very highest degree of diligence in conveying the notice is not required. Such steps must be taken to convey it, as in the ordinary course of things, will place it in the hands of the endorser. And we think, in the present case, that the notice being left with a fellow boarder, affords a reasonable presumption that it was delivered to Hatch, and, therefore, it was sufficient.

[1] [Reported by Hon. John McLean, Circuit Justice.]

The discharge of the endorser depends upon the extent of the agreement between the agents of the bank and Pearson. Did it suspend the rights of the bank, to prosecute the suit against Pearson? Would it have been a violation of the agreement, if the bank had discontinued the suit and brought another action? The agreement was that "the suit should be continued without judgment until the term of said court next ensuing said September term, 1822." And as a consideration on which this continuance was agreed upon, Pearson discharged Yeatman, the witness desired by the bank, from an execution. By this discharge, Pearson gave up what in law was a satisfaction of his judgment, and in all probability lost all further recourse against Yeatman for his debt. And this was done to benefit the bank. This constitutes a good consideration for the agreement. The agreement unquestionably suspended all right in the bank to prosecute the suit for the time specified, and also, as we think, all right to take any other step to enforce the payment of the note. An endorser has a right at any time to pay the bill and to be subrogated to all the rights of the holder. And if the holder enter into any agreement, which may be enforced, that shall suspend his recourse against the drawer, the endorser is discharged. He is discharged because his right, by paying the bill, to prosecute the drawer is also suspended. In the present case had the bank attempted to prosecute the suit, in violation of the agreement, there can be no doubt that a court of equity would have enjoined it; or, perhaps, on motion the court at law would have ordered the proceeding to be suspended. Here then was an agreement which suspended all right in the bank against Pearson on the bill, for a certain period; and this agreement could have been inforced at law, or in a court of equity. And as by this arrangement the right of Hatch to prosecute Pearson was also suspended, he is discharged from his indorsement. This principle is decided, substantially, in the case of McLemore v. Powell, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 554. In that case, however, the agreement between the holder and drawer of the bill to give time was voluntary and without consideration, which did not legally bind the parties; and therefore the court held, the indorser was not discharged. But if the agreement had been made on a valuable consideration, the court would have held, as appears from the opinion, that the indorser was discharged. This doctrine is clearly stated in the elementary writers, Bayley, Bills, 234, and others, as established by adjudged cases. 8 East, 576; 1 Bay, 177; [Robertson v. Vogle,] 1 Dall. [1 U. S.] 252; 1 Johns. Cas. 107, 131; 3 Taunt. 130.

[NOTE. On writ of error, this judgment was affirmed by the supreme court. Mr. Justice Story, in delivering the opinion of the court, said:

"In cases of this nature, the law does not require the highest and strictest degree of diligence in giving notice, but such a degree of reasonable diligence as will ordinarily bring home notice to the party. It is a rule founded upon public convenience and the general course of business, and only requires that in common intendment and presumption the notice is by such means as will be effectual. In the present case the notice was left at a private boarding house, where Hatch lodged, which must be considered, to all intents and purposes, his dwelling house. It was left, then, at the proper place; and if the delivery had been to the master of the house, or to a servant of the house, there could be no doubt that it would have been sufficient. Stedman v. Gooch, 1 Esp. 4. The notary called at the house, and, upon inquiry of a fellow boarder and inmate of the house, he was informed that Hatch was not within. He then left the notice with the fellow boarder, requesting him to deliver it to Hatch. The latter must necessarily be understood, by receiving the notice under such circumstances, impliedly to engage to make the delivery. The question, then, is whether such a notice, so delivered, does not afford as reasonable a presumption of its being received as if delivered to a tenant of the house. * * * Boarders at the same house may be presumed to meet daily, and to feel some interest in the concerns of each other, and to perform punctually such common duties of civility as this. In our large cities, many persons engaged in business live at boarding houses, in this manner. It is not always easy to obtain access to the master of the house, or to servants who may be safely intrusted with the delivery of notices of this sort. A person who resides in the house upon a footing of equality with all the guests may well be supposed to feel a deeper interest in such matters than a mere servant, whose occupations are pressing and various, and whose pursuits do not lead him to place so high a value upon a scrupulous discharge of duty. * * *

"The other question is one of more nicety, and not less important. * * * The true inquiry is whether the parties did or did not intend a surceasing of all legal proceedings during the period. We think that the just and natural exposition of the contract is that they did. * * * If the bank could not have any remedy on the bill to recover payments, but was bound to wait until the next term of the circuit court, the defendant Hatch, as indorser, could not, by paying the bill, place himself in a better situation. He would be liable to the same equities, under the agreement suspending the remedy, as the bank. * * * Upon the whole, we are of opinion, upon the ground of the agreement stated in the special verdict being a virtual discharge of the indorser, that the judgment of the circuit court ought to be affirmed, with costs." ACCOUNTS—REFERENCE TO AUDITOR—EVIDENCE—BANK OFFICER'S BOND.

1. Upon trial before a jury in an action at law, the report of the auditor to whom the cause had been referred, under the Maryland act of 1785, c. 80, § 12, to state the accounts of the parties, is prima facie evidence of the balance due, if the principles upon which the account is stated are correct, and the evidence properly received by the auditor. An account rendered by the defendant to the plaintiff is proper evidence for the plaintiff before the auditor. A teller of a bank is not liable for losses incurred during his absence from the bank.

[Followed in Bank of U. S. v. Williams, Case No. 942.]

[See Barry v. Barry, Case No. 1,060.]

2. Although the bank took bond and security from their teller for the faithful performance of the duties of his office, yet they may recover, in an action for money had and received, any balance of money remaining in his hands unaccounted for.

3. A judgment against the bank, in a suit upon the teller's bond, is not a bar to an action for money had and received by him for the use of the bank.

4. If evidence be given to the jury, without objection, which the court afterwards decides to be inadmissible, the court will instruct the jury that it is not evidence properly before them.

At law. Assumpsit [by the Bank of the United States against Richmond Johnson] for money had and received, being the balance of money in the defendant's hands as second teller, not accounted for. [Judgment for plaintiff. A former action of debt against the surety on the teller's official bond resulted in judgment for defendant. Bank of U. S. v. Brent, Case No. 910.]

This cause was referred to an auditor (Mr. Redin,) to state the account, under the Maryland act of 1785, c. 80, § 12. The auditor reported the evidence on which his statement of the account was founded, and the objections made to it before him, and the principles upon which he found the balance due. The report states that certain parts of the evidence were objected to by the defendant, and states the objections made.

Mr. Jones, for the defendant, contended that the whole account is to be proved now before the jury, in the same manner as before the auditor, and referred to the opinion of this court in the case of Barry v. Barry, at December term, 1827, [Case No. 1,060.]

But THE COURT (nem. con.) said that the exceptions to the proceedings of the auditor appearing, upon the report, to be confined to the admissibility of the evidence, and to the principles upon which the auditor acted in ascertaining the balance, and no exception having been taken to that balance, or to any item of the account, of which it is stated to be the balance, if the court should be of opinion that the auditor was right in receiving that evidence, and in the principles upon which he made up the account, his report of the balance is prima facie evidence that so much was due from the defendant to the plaintiff.

The next question was as to the admissibility of a paper, marked AA, which was a statement, made by the defendant, of his account as second teller, with the bank, and taken from one of the bank-books and presented to the board of directors by the defendant, as an account showing the deficit in his accounts. The fact that it was in the handwriting of the defendant, and was offered by him to the directors of the bank as a true statement of his account, was stated, in the report, to have been proved by the deposition of Mr. R. Smith, taken before the auditor, and which did not appear to be objected to.

THE COURT (nem. con.) decided that the paper AA was properly admitted by the auditor; and also that the defendant was not liable for losses which were incurred in his absence from the bank. The court, therefore, permitted the plaintiff to read to the jury so much of the auditor's report as shows the balance due from the defendant upon that principle; the auditor having stated the account in different ways, so as to meet any opinion of the court upon the question of his liability for losses during his absence.

Mr. Jones then contended, that the plaintiffs, by taking a bond with surety for the faithful performance of the duties of his office as teller, had thereby made an express contract upon the subject of his liability as teller, and therefore the law will not imply any other on that subject. In a suit on that bond the defendant pleaded that, although he had not accounted for all the money which came to his hands as teller, yet such default did not arise from want of fidelity; and upon demurrer to that plea, the court decided in favor of the defendant, being of opinion that the bond only required fidelity. It is agreed that this matter may be considered by the court as if it were a demurrer to a plea of a former judgment upon the same cause of action.

Mr. Swann and Mr. Lear, contra. This suit is not for the same cause of action. That was for a breach of the condition of the bond; this is upon the general liability, which the law raises, to repay money received by the defendant for the plaintiffs' use. The evidence to support this action would not have supported that; nor would the evidence in that support this.

THE COURT (MORSELL, [Circuit Judge,] contra) was of opinion that it was not the same cause of action. The bond, plea, and judgment of the court having been read to the jury by Mr. Jones, without objection, before the court had given that opinion.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

Mr. Swann, for the plaintiffs, moved the court to instruct the jury that the papers so read to them were not evidence properly before them; and

THE COURT (MORSELL, [Circuit Judge,] contra) so instructed them.

Verdict for plaintiffs, $5,743.26, with interest from 19th December, 1825.

Bills of exception were taken, but no writ of error was prosecuted.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES v. KURTZ.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 342.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Oct. Term, 1822.

PRACTICE—PRODUCTION OF PAPERS — PROCEDURE.

The plaintiff cannot be nonsuited, for not producing books and papers, upon a mere notice by the defendant to produce them at the trial. There must be a motion to the court, for an order to produce them; and notice of such a motion; and an order of the court, and if the motion be not made until the cause is called for trial at the last calling of the docket, the court will continue the cause until the next term.

[Cited in Gregory v. Chicago, etc., R. R., 10 Fed. 529.]

[See Thompson v. Selden, 20 How. (61 U. S.) 194; Macomber v. Clark, Case No. 8,918; Dunham v. Riley, Id. 4,155; Bas v. Steele, Id. 1,088; Maye v. Carberry, Id. 9,339.]

The plaintiff having been served with notice to produce the plaintiff's books, the defendant's counsel moved the court, just as the cause was called for trial, for judgment of nonsuit, under the fifteenth section of the judiciary act of [September 24th,] 1779, (1 Stat. 73,) for not producing the books.

Mr. Lear, for the plaintiff, objected that there had been no order of the court to produce them; nor any motion to the court for such an order.

Mr. Key, for the defendant, contended that he was yet in time to make the motion for an order to produce the books; and that notice of the motion was not necessary, as there had been a notice served on the plaintiff to produce them at the last term; he accordingly now made the motion; but it being the last time of calling the docket, and the cause being called for trial, the court continued it to the next term.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES v. LEE.

[3 Cranch, C. C. 288.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. April Term, 1828.

NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS—DISCHARGE OF INDORSER—EXTENSION OF TIME.

The indorser of a promissory note is discharged from his liability by the holder taking new security, and giving time to the maker without the consent of the indorser.

[See White v. Burns, Case No. 17,539; Cope v. Huntt, Id. 3,206; Varnum v. Milford, Id. 16,890; Morgan v. Tipton, Id. 9,809.]

The defendant [E. J. Lee] was the indorser of R. B. Lee's note discounted by the plaintiffs.

THE COURT, (nem. con.) on the motion of Mr. Taylor, the defendant's counsel, instructed the jury, in effect, that if they should find from the evidence that the plaintiffs, in consideration of new security given by the maker of the note, agreed with him, without the defendant's consent, to extend the time of payment of the debt for one year or more, the defendant was thereby discharged from his liability as indorser of the note.
