Mr. Taylor cited the following authorities: 7 Bac. Abr. 507; Nisbit v. Smith, 2 Brown, Ch. 579; Baird v. Rice, 1 Call, 18; Rees v. Berrington, 2 Ves. Jr. 540; Ward v. Johnson, 6 Munf. 6; Ellis v. Galindo, 1 Doug. 250, note; Hill v. Bull, Gilmer, 149; English v. Darley, 2 Bos. & P. 61; People v. Jansen, 7 Johns. 332; Bull, N. P. 275; Wilson v. Lenox, 1 Cranch, [5 U. S.] 194; James v. Badger, 1 Johns. Cas. 131; Croughton v. Duval, 3 Call, 69; Chitty, Bills, (Amer. Ed. 1817,) 300; Duval v. Trask, 12 Mass. 154; U. S. v. Nicholl, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 510; McLemore v. Powell, Id. 554, 557; Moore v. Bowmaker, 6 Taunt. 379.

Mr. Lear, for plaintiffs.

Case No. 922.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES v. LEE et al.

[5 Cranch, C. C. 319.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov. Term, 1837.[2]

DEED OF TRUST TO WIFE'S SEPARATE USE — CONSIDERATION—AGREEMENT TO RELINQUISH DOWER —RECORDING.

1. An agreement by a feme covert to relinquish her dower in certain lands, and to mortgage to her husband's creditors other lands held in trust to her separate use, is a sufficient consideration to prevent a post-nuptial deed of trust to her separate use from being a voluntary conveyance; and the subsequent actual release of dower, &c., made it an adequate consideration. The real consideration of a deed is always examinable, and the parties are not estopped to show what was the true consideration.

[See note at end of case.]

2. The notice which will affect the validity of a first incumbrance must be notice at the time the money is advanced or paid by the second incumbrancer. It is not necessary that the first grantees should give notice of their claim of title to a second incumbrancer, if they did not know of the second incumbrance at the time of its execution, or before the money was advanced. Their silence afterwards, cannot justify a charge of fraud or collusion.

3. The joint possession, of husband and wife, of property conveyed to her separate use, is no evidence of fraud.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

[2] [Affirmed in 13 Pet. (38 U. S.) 107.]

4. A deed of conveyance of slaves in Virginia, for the separate use of the wife, loses nothing of its validity by the removal of the parties to the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia; and it is not necessary that it should be there recorded.

[See note at end of case.]

5. A power, reserved in a deed of trust, to dispose of any part of the property, with the consent of the trustee, and upon substituting an equivalent, is not evidence of fraud.

6. An executed consideration is a sufficient consideration for a grant—which is a contract executed—however it may be in regard to executory contracts. All our conveyances purport to be for a past consideration.

7. The subsequent conduct of the husband in disposing of some of the slaves without the consent of the trustees, and without substituting an equivalent, is not evidence that the deed was fraudulently made.

In equity. The bill in this case was filed by the Bank of the United States against Elizabeth Lee, widow of R. B. Lee, deceased, Edmund J. Lee, surviving trustee under a deed of trust for the separate use of Mrs. Lee, and Richard Smith, a trustee under a deed from R. B. Lee, to secure his debt to the Bank of the United States. The object of the bill is to set aside the deed of trust for the separate use of Mrs. Lee as being either a voluntary or a fraudulent deed, as to the plaintiffs, who are creditors of R. B. Lee, and to compel Mrs. Lee to surrender the property to Mr. Smith, so that it may be applied to the payment of the debt due to the plaintiffs. [Bill dismissed. This was afterwards affirmed by the supreme court in Bank of U. S. v. Lee, 13 Pet. (38 U. S.) 107. See note at end of case.]

The bill states that R. B. Lee represented himself, in 1817, to be the sole and lawful owner of the property, after mentioned, which was in his possession, as owner. That the bank lent him $6,000, upon the security of the property, and he gave his note, indorsed by E. J. Lee and W. Jones, and on the 11th of June, 1817, executed a deed of trust to Richard Smith, of twelve negroes, valued at $5,000, and all his household furniture, valued at $2,200, and a claim upon one John Hopkins. That the debt remains unpaid. That R. B. Lee died in 1827, intestate, insolvent, and no administration has been taken out upon his estate. That his widow, the defendant, Elizabeth Lee, has taken possession of all the property conveyed to Mr. Smith by the deed of trust, and refuses to deliver it up to him for the purposes of the trust. That by taking possession of the property she has made herself liable, as executrix in her own wrong. That she claims the property under a pretended deed of trust executed by her husband in January, 1809, which she has exhibited to the plaintiffs. That if any such deed was executed, it was a voluntary and fraudulent deed, and therefore void as against the plaintiffs, and as against W. Jones, the indorser of the note. That the considerations expressed in the deed are false, or, if true, insufficient to give it validity. That at the date of the deed, R. B. Lee was largely indebted, and incompetent, in law, to make the same. That if the deed was made, and upon legal and adequate consideration, it was executed in Virginia; that the trustees never had possession of the property, but suffered the said R. B. Lee to retain possession of the same, and to use, enjoy, and dispose of the same for his own use and benefit, as if he were the unqualified owner thereof. That it was never recorded in the county of Washington, nor any notice of it given to the public, or to the plaintiffs, in the lifetime of the said R. B. Lee, nor for many years subsequent to his death; but he was permitted to obtain credit upon it, and to sell and dispose of parts thereof. That the defendants, Mrs. Lee, and Mr. E. J. Lee, the only surviving trustee, knew that the plaintiffs had lent the $6,000 to the said R. B. Lee, in full faith that he was the real and unqualified owner of the property, and knew that he executed the deed to Mr. Smith, to secure the payment thereof, and never communicated to the plaintiffs, or to Mr. Smith, during the life of the said R. B. Lee, nor until several years after his death, the existence of the deed of the 9th of January, 1809, or any other claim inconsistent with the deed to Mr. Smith. All which actings and doings of the said Elizabeth and Edmund, and their omissions and negligences, as aforesaid, are, as to the plaintiffs, in contemplation of law, fraudulent, and preclude them, the said Elizabeth and Edmund, in law and equity, from asserting any right to any part of the said property against the plaintiffs. That the said deed of the 9th of January, 1809, for the reasons aforesaid, is fraudulent and void; and if it ever had any legal validity, it ought now, by a decree of this court, to be annulled. The bill then prays for a discovery, &c.; and that the deed may be produced and proved, and be decreed fraudulent and void, as against the plaintiffs; and that Mrs. Lee may be decreed to surrender the property to the plaintiffs, and to Mr. Smith, and to account for all that may be deficient, or disposed of; and that she may be personally responsible as executor in her own wrong, for the whole amount of debt, interest, and costs; and that Mr. Smith may be ordered to take possession of the property, and sell the same according to the deed of trust, &c.

Mrs. Lee, in her answer, admits the loan, but not the representations, &c., of Mr. R. B. Lee; admits the deed to Mr. Smith, of the 11th of June, 1817, but avers that she was ignorant of its execution until long after it had been delivered, and never consented thereto, and never waived her right to the property. Admits the judgments against R. B. Lee and W. Jones, and that they are unsatisfied. That R. B. Lee died in 1827, insolvent, intestate, and that no administration had been taken on his estate. She avers that on the 9th of January, 1809, she and her husband then dwelling, and having for a long time before dwelt in the county of Fairfax in Virginia, and the slaves and other property thereinafter mentioned, being in the said county, she agreed with her husband to relinquish her right of dower in certain Spotsylvania lands in which her husband held five eighths of eight thousand acres, and also to convey her right in certain Fairfax lands, containing twenty-one hundred acres, including the estate upon which they then resided, (and which were then held by certain trustees for her use,) to certain trustees to secure a debt of $1,034.-28 due by her husband to Judge Washington; in consideration of which, and of her execution of the conveyances, and relinquishment of dower, her husband agreed to convey to Edmund J. Lee, William Maffit, and Richard Colman, all the household and kitchen furniture, &c., then in their dwelling-house and kitchen, estimated to be worth $1,600, and thirty slaves, named in the answer, in trust for her use during her life, and to her heirs, &c. And that it was further agreed between them, that her husband should be authorized to dispose of, or sell any part of the said furniture, or slaves, with the consent of a majority of the trustees, &c., provided he should convey to them other property real or personal to the full value of the furniture or slaves which he should so dispose of or sell. And that if he should pay the debt to Judge Washington, without selling any part of the lands thus conveyed in trust to secure it, the conveyance to E. J. Lee and others should be void as to seven of the slaves, particularly named in the answer. And she avers that in pursuance of that agreement, and in consideration of the deed of the furniture and slaves to be made to the said E. J. Lee and others, in trust for her use, she joined her husband in the deed for the Spotsylvania lands on the 16th of July, 1809, relinquishing her dower therein; and on the 9th of January, 1809, executed the deed of trust of the Fairfax lands to secure the debt to Judge Washington; and that on the same day her husband executed the deed of trust of the furniture and slaves to E. J. Lee and others; which deed was fully proved and recorded, within eight months from its date, in Fairfax county court, in which county they still continued to reside, and in which the furniture and slaves still remained; which deeds are exhibited and marked No. 1, 2, & 3. That the agreement was bona fide and without fraud; and that she is a bona fide purchaser of the furniture and slaves according to the terms of the said deed. She admits that there was no sale of the Fairfax land, and therefore she does not claim the seven slaves, and that they are not in her possession nor subject to her control. She admits that her husband sold George, and substituted Peter; and she emancipated Peter before the institution of any proceeding of the plaintiffs against her for the slaves. That her husband sold Henry, Milly, Letty, and her two sons, and substituted nothing in their place, except some articles of furniture for Letty and her two children who were sold with the consent of the trustees. That John, Kitty, Frank, Harriet, and Caroline are in her possession. That a great portion of the household and kitchen furniture, &c., has been destroyed in the using, during the period of twenty-six years, and she annexes a schedule of what remains. That the seven slaves were not included in the deed of her husband to Mr. Smith. She denies her liability to account to the plaintiffs for the property conveyed in trust for her use. She admits that her husband was considerably indebted when he made the deed of trust for her use; but denies that it was, in law, a voluntary conveyance; and avers that it was made to procure for her husband the means of discharging a portion of those debts.

She denies that she concealed her title and claims to the furniture and slaves, or by any culpable silence induced or suffered the plaintiffs, or any persons to purchase or receive a conveyance of the same from her husband. She states that her husband died in 1827; that they lived together until his death. That her possession could not be separated from that of her husband, and was consistent with the deed. She admits that he sold some of the slaves, under the pressure of great necessity, without her consent or that of her trustees. She avers that at the time the plaintiffs lent the money to her husband she was not informed that it was intended to be secured, or was secured by the deed to Mr. Smith. That she was not informed that such security had been given, until a long time afterwards; but she cannot recollect the time at which such information was first received. That in addition to the said deed to Mr. Smith, further security was given by a deed from Overton Carr and her husband to Mr. Smith for certain lots in the city of Washington, and by the assignment of the debt due by John Hopkins, and by the conveyance of a tract of land called Langley. That the money lent by the plaintiffs to her husband, or some part of it, was applied by him to the purchase and improvement of the lots conveyed by him and Overton Carr to Mr. Smith. That she has no knowledge that at the time the securities were given any information was given to the plaintiffs, or to Mr. Smith, that her husband had executed any prior deed of any part of the property mentioned in the said deeds. That her husband had remained considerably indebted at the time of his death, but she does not know the names of his creditors, nor the amount of his debts. That she asserted her right to the slaves thus conveyed by her husband to Mr. Smith as soon as she was informed of the attempt of the plaintiffs to obtain possession thereof under the deed to the said R. Smith. She admits that the debt to Judge Washington has been paid, but she knows not out of what funds.

Mr. E. J. Lee, in his answer, states, that he and the other trustees never had possession of the property; but several times interfered to protect it from the creditors of Mr. R. B. Lee. That he never gave the plaintiffs notice of the deed of trust to him and the other trustees. That he did not know of R. B. Lee's deed to Mr. Smith until shortly before R. B. Lee's death. That he is advised that the deed of trust of 1825, from R. B. Lee and wife, to R. Smith, for further securing the debt, is an abandonment of all lien which the plaintiffs ever had by virtue of the deed to R. Smith, of 1817.

Mr. Richard Smith, in his answer, states that the property conveyed to him by R. B. Lee and Overton Carr, has been sold to the best advantage, and the proceeds have been applied towards the extinguishment of the debt; but that nothing has been obtained from the claim upon Mr. Hopkins, nor from the land called Langley, Mrs. Lee having claimed the same, and obtained an injunction, which is still pending in Virginia. That he had no notice of Mr. Lee's claim to the furniture and slaves, until all the other securities had failed, and he was about to execute the powers given him by the deed of trust of 1817.

The following facts were agreed by the counsel of the parties, namely: That R. B. Lee and wife were housekeepers and resided together in Fairfax county, in Virginia, on the 9th of January, 1809, and the said R. B. Lee then held the property mentioned in the deed of trust of that date, and that the property continued in their possession after, as before, the execution of that deed, and so continued until they removed to Washington city in 1814 or 1815, and brought the property with them. After which the household furniture was assessed to R. B. Lee; and four of the slaves were, for the first time, assessed to him in 1818. That prior to the 9th of January, 1809, R. B. Lee was seized in fee of five eighths of eight thousand acres of land in Spotsylvania county, in Virginia, which was conveyed by him and wife to Ludwell Lee in fee-simple. That the execution, due acknowledgment, and recording of the deeds and bills of sale exhibited with Mr. Lee's answer, are admitted; and also the execution and services of the notices referred to in Mr. E. J. Lee's answer. That the deed of trust of the 9th of January, 1809, was delivered to the trustees therein named; that they agreed to act, but never took possession of the property, or of any part of it.

The cause was set for hearing on the bill, answers, general replication, exhibits, and facts agreed, and was argued by Mr. R. S. Coxe, for the plaintiffs, and Mr. Marbury, for the defendants.

CRANCH, Chief Judge, (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent,) delivered the opinion of the court:

The principal question in the case is, whether the deed of the 9th of January, 1809, from R. B. Lee to E. J. Lee and others, in trust for the defendant, the wife of R. B. Lee, is valid against his subsequent creditors. The execution, due acknowledgment, and recording of that deed, as well as the deed of R. B. Lee and his wife to Ludwell Lee, of the 16th of July, 1809, and the trust-deed to Turner and others to secure Judge Washington, are admitted. The bill avers, that if the supposed deed of the 9th of January, 1809, was ever executed, it was a voluntary and fraudulent deed; and that the considerations expressed in the deed were false. To this allegation the defendant, Mrs. Lee, answers, in substance, that her agreement to relinquish her right of dower in five thousand acres in Spotsylvania county, and to mortgage other lands in Fairfax county, which were then held by trustees for her use, to secure a debt due by her husband, was the consideration of his agreement to convey to E. J. Lee and others, for her use, the property described in the deed of the 9th of January, 1809; and that in pursuance of that agreement the deeds were executed accordingly. This answer, being thus directly responsive to the allegations of the bill, is evidence of a sufficient valuable consideration to support the deed of trust of the 9th of January, 1809, under which Mrs. Lee claims. It was not a voluntary deed, and, therefore, it is immaterial whether Mr. R. B. Lee was, or was not, indebted at the time of executing it. The relinquishment of dower is as fair and meritorious a consideration as the payment of a sum of money. The payment of Judge Washington's claim did not impair the validity of the deed, but operated as a release only, of a certain portion of the slaves therein described.

The fact that the deed to Ludwell Lee, for the five thousand acres of Spotsylvania land, was not executed by Mrs. Lee and her husband until the 16th of July, 1809, although the recital in the deed of trust of the 9th of January, 1809, states it to have been then executed, does not make the deed void. The real consideration of a deed is always examinable; and the parties are not estopped to show what was the true consideration. The agreement to release the dower was a sufficient consideration to prevent the deed from being a voluntary conveyance; and the subsequent actual release of dower made it an adequate consideration. That agreement is proved by Mrs. Lee's answer, which is responsive to the allegation in the bill that the deed was without consideration. The recital is, or is not, an estoppel to the parties to deny that the deed to Ludwell Lee was executed on the 9th of January, 1809. If an estoppel, the recital must be taken to be true. If not an estoppel, the true consideration may be proved, namely, the agreement to release the dower; and that is proved by Mrs. Lee's answer. If it was not a voluntary conveyance, it can only be impeached on the ground of fraud; and if the consideration was adequate, there can be no pretence for a charge of fraud. Nor is there sufficient evidence to charge Mrs. Lee with any fraudulent concealment of her title; or collusion with her husband to deceive the plaintiffs before, or at the time, of their lending the money to Mr. Lee, or of their taking his deed of trust to Mr. Smith. Indeed, the bill does not charge it. It only avers that Mrs. Lee and Mr. E. J. Lee knew that the plaintiffs had lent the money to R. B. Lee, in full faith that he was the real and unqualified owner of the property; and knew that he executed the deed to secure the payment of the money, and never communicated to the plaintiffs the existence of the deed of the 9th of January, 1809. This charge relates to a time subsequent to the execution of the deed, when neither Mrs. Lee, nor Mr. E. J. Lee, was bound to communicate any such information to the plaintiffs. Nor can their silence, after the execution of the deed, justify a charge of fraud or collusion. The time when the money was advanced is that at which the notice is material. Lord Chancellor Thurlow in Beckett v. Cordley, 1 Brown, Ch. 358. But if the bill had charged them with a fraudulent collusion at the time of Mr. R. B. Lee's deed of trust to Mr. Smith, their answers expressly deny concealment of the claim and knowledge of Mr. R. B. Lee's deed to Mr. Smith, and of his intention to secure the plaintiffs by such a deed until long after it was executed.

It has been contended, that the continued possession of Mr. R. B. Lee after the execution of the deed of trust of the 9th of January, 1809, is evidence of fraud. But that possession was perfectly consistent with the use raised by the deed. As long as Mr. and Mrs. Lee continued to live together she could only enjoy the use of the furniture and slaves, jointly with him; and her possession would appear to be his possession. Her use of property, in that way, could not be evidence of fraud.

The deed was a contract made in Virginia, and was executed with all the formalities necessary to make it valid there. The title to the property was complete, and was valid between the parties wherever they might be. By removing to the District of Columbia, the title was not impaired. There is no ground for supposing it to be necessary that the deed should be acknowledged or recorded in this District. The power, reserved by Mr. Lee, to dispose of any part of the property with the consent of the trustees, and upon substituting an equivalent, it is said, is a badge of fraud. But it is only a general power of revocation which is a badge of fraud; whenever the consent of other independent persons is required, or an equivalent is to be substituted, there can be no objection to the power of revocation; it affords no evidence of fraud.

It is objected that if the recital is to be taken as true, and if the relinquishment of dower had been made before the execution of the deed of the 9th of January, 1809, the consideration was executed, and therefore was not sufficient to sustain the deed. But this objection, I apprehend, applies only to executory contracts, not to conveyances. An executed consideration may not be sufficient to sustain an executory contract, and yet a past or executed consideration may be a sufficient consideration for a grant; which is a contract executed in praesenti—not to be executed in futuro. If the objection is applicable to this deed, it is applicable to all our conveyances; for they also say "in consideration of" so much money, "at or before the sealing and delivery of these presents, in hand paid, the receipt whereof," the grantor "hereby acknowledges," &c. The money may have been paid a year before, or the consideration may be an old debt, and yet we have never heard an objection to such a consideration of a deed; and the deed under which the plaintiffs themselves claim, is given for a past or executed consideration, namely, the sum of $6,000 loaned on the day preceding the date of the deed, the receipt whereof the said R. B. Lee thereby acknowledged; and no other consideration is averred in the deed.

It is objected that the use which Mr. Lee made of the property, by disposing of some of the slaves, and mortgaging others, &c., without the consent of the trustees, or of Mrs. Lee, and without substituting an equivalent, was inconsistent with the nature of the deed, and therefore is evidence that the deed was fraudulent. But as between Mrs. Lee and him, or those claiming under him, (as the plaintiffs do), it is no mark of fraud. It is a matter entirely between her and him, or his assigns. If he has violated the rights of Mrs. Lee, and she chooses to acquiesce rather than quarrel with him, no third person has a right to interfere; the property was hers, and she had a right to do with it as she pleased; and, because she has submitted to some violation of her rights, it does not follow that she must relinquish what are left.

We are of opinion that the deed of trust of the 9th of January, 1809, to Mr. E. J. Lee, Mr. Maffit, and Mr. Colman, was a good and valid deed, made bona fide, and upon a valid and valuable consideration, and has not been impaired by any subsequent conduct or transactions of Mrs. Lee, or her trustees, and that the bill must be dismissed with costs. Bill dismissed.

[NOTE. On appeal to the supreme court this decree, dismissing the plaintiffs' bill was affirmed. The opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Justice Catron, and, in effect, it was held that the deed of 1809, vesting the property in Mrs. Lee's trustees, was effectual, according to the Laws of Virginia, to protect the title thereto against the subsequent creditors or purchasers from her husband, R. B. Lee, and that their removal into the District of Columbia with the property conveyed by the trust deed did not effect or impair the validity of such deed of trust. Mr. Justice Baldwin dissenting. Bank of U. S. v. Lee, 13 Pet. (38 U. S.) 107.]

Case No. 923.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES v. LONGWORTH et al.

[1 McLean, 35.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Ohio. July Term, 1829.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—OBLIGATION OF CONTRACTS—JUDGMENT LIENS—PRIORITIES.

1. A judgment is a lien on the lands of the defendant within the county, if execution on it be issued and levied within a year.

[Cited in Pence v. Cochran, 6 Fed. 275.]

2. But the judgment on which execution does not issue within the year, constitutes no lien against a subsequent bona fide judgment, on which execution is issued within the year.

[Cited in Pence v. Cochran, 6 Fed. 275.]

3. The purchaser under the judgment cannot be in a worse situation, than the plaintiff who claims the purchase money under a prior lien.

4. The construction of a statute by the supreme court of the state, forms a rule of decision for this court.

[Cited in Pence v. Cochran, 6 Fed. 271.]

5. A law which regulates the issuing of executions on judgments previously rendered, [Act Ohio, Feb. 4, 1824, § 17, 22 Stat. 114,] affects the remedy merely, and is not ex post facto, nor does it impair the obligation of the contract.

[See McClurg v. Kingsland, 1 How. (42 U. S.) 202; Bronson v. Kinzie, Id. 315; Gordon v. South Fork Canal Co., Case No. 5,621; U. S. v. Conway, Id. 14,849.]

[At law. Action by the Bank of the United States against Longworth and Wright to recover possession of certain real property. Judgment for defendants.]

This case was argued by Messrs. Caswell and Starr for the plaintiffs, and by Mr. Hammond for the defendants.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This action was brought by the Bank of the United States, to recover possession of a lot of ground in the city of Cincinnati, under a sheriff's deed. The judgment on which the lot was sold was rendered in April, 1818, in a writ in which Adam Demsey was plaintiff, John Gibson and Thomas Heckwelder defendants. Execution was issued 2nd October, 1828, and levied on the property in controversy, 6th October, 1828. The sale was made the 7th November, and the sheriff's deed was executed the 3rd of December following. The defendants also claim under a sheriff's deed, bearing date 16th January, 1822. The judgment under which this sale took place was rendered in August, 1820, against the same defendants, at the suit of Thomas Graham. Execution was issued on this judgment, returnable to December term ensuing, which was levied on the same lot, and it was sold on a pluries venditioni exponas, the 24th December, 1821. Where the highest judicial court of a state has given a construction to its statutes, such construction is considered by the courts of the United States, as a rule of decision, unless it be repugnant to the laws or constitution of the federal government. This course is sanctioned by sound policy, and a due regard to the institutions of the respective states. The question involved in this controversy depends on the construction of the different statutes which regulate judgments and executions.

By the act of the 24th February, 1820, [section 2, 18 Ohio Laws, 180,] it is provided, "that the lands, tenements and real estate of the defendants shall be liable to the satisfaction of the judgment from the first day of the term in which the judgment is entered," &c. This act limits the lien of the judgment to real estate within the county, and from the time of levying the execution, on lands without the county. This act is repealed by the act of the 1st February, 1822, which does not alter the lien of the judgment, but provides, "that in all cases where the party obtaining judgment shall neglect for one year after the first day of the term in which such judgment shall have been rendered to sue out execution thereon, and cause the same to be levied according to the provision of this act, such judgment shall not operate as a lien upon the debtor's estate to the prejudice of any other bona fide judgment creditor." The 16th section of this act provides "that no judgment heretofore rendered, on which execution shall not be taken out and levied before the expiration of one year next after the taking effect of this act, shall operate as a lien upon the estate of any debtor, to the prejudice of any bona fide judgment creditor." This law was repealed by the act of the 4th February, 1824, which in the 17th section provides, [22 Ohio Laws, 114,] "that no judgment heretofore rendered or which hereafter may be rendered, on which execution shall not have been taken out and levied before the expiration of one year next after the rendition of such judgment, shall operate as a lien upon the estate of any judgment debtor to the prejudice of any bona fide judgment creditor." Under this act the supreme court of the state have decided that the lien of any judgment, without reference to the time of its rendition, ceases to operate against a subsequent bona fide judgment creditor, if execution be not issued on it within the year. 2 Ham. [2 Ohio,] 65.

It is contended that the provisions of this act cannot be applied to judgments entered before its passage, as it would be destructive of rights which had become vested under previous laws. This effect, however, has been given to this act by the decision referred to; and in several cases subsequently, all of which are acquiesced in, and seem to be considered as settling the construction of the act. The provision in the constitution of Ohio that no ex post facto law shall be passed if it embrace civil as well as criminal cases, does not reach the case; and as the change in the law does not impair the obligation of the contract, but modifies the means of enforcing it, it has not been considered in the above cases, nor is it, repugnant to the constitution of the United States. Previous to the law of 1822, the lien continued on the judgment without limitation as to the time of issuing the execution. The law of 1824 transfers this lien on judgments previously entered, to judgments subsequently obtained on which executions have been issued within the year. Some doubt may exist whether the legislature can take away the right of any citizen fairly acquired under an existing law, and vest it in another individual, on account of acts done before the passage of the law, and which could have been in no respect influenced by its provisions. But if the power of the legislature be only doubtful, this court would incline to give effect to its acts; and still more will they be inclined to give effect to them, where by the highest judicial tribunal of the state they have been decided to be constitutional. Under the act of 1824, in the case of Shuee v. Ferguson, 3 Ham. [3 Ohio,] 136, the supreme court decided, that to continue the lien of the judgment on any particular piece of real estate, there must be a levy upon it within the year; that a levy on property releases all other property not levied on, from the lien of the judgment; and that such property may be taken in execution on a junior judgment. These decisions it is contended, were made on questions between judgment creditors, and cannot apply to purchasers of real estate under judgments. The court awarded the money, in the cases cited, to the judgment creditor who had the preferable lien; and does it not follow that the purchaser under the judgment having the preferable lien, would be protected? Is it not, in effect, the same question as if the plaintiffs in the two judgments claimed the money arising from the last sale, supposing the first sale of the lot not to have been effected? In this case it appears that from April term, 1818, at which the judgment was entered, under which the plaintiff claims, there was no levy on the property in controversy until the 6th October, 1828. In April, 1819, by the decision of the supreme court, the lien of this judgment ceased to operate on the property, and it was liable to be taken on any junior judgment, before the 6th October, 1828, when the levy was made. And that levy was voidable by any bona fide judgment creditor who obtained his judgment within a year preceding it. The judgment under which the defendants claim was rendered at August term, 1820; and execution issued within the year and was levied on the lot. No doubt can exist that the junior judgment creditor would be entitled to the money in the case supposed, under the decisions referred to, he having issued his execution within the year and fixed his lien on the property by the levy. But the sale of this property was made on the junior judgment, before the act of 1824 took effect; and it is contended that consequently the provisions of that act cannot reach the case. This might be admitted, if the elder judgment did not come within the provisions of that act. It is not denied that at the time the levy was made under the junior judgment, the elder judgment had the preferable lien, as the law at that time did not require execution to issue within any limited time to continue it. Had the property, therefore, been levied on by an execution issued on the elder judgment, at any time before the act of 1824 could affect the case, the proceedings would have been regular and a sale of the premises valid, notwithstanding the previous sale under the junior judgment. But such proceeding was not had.

[1] [Reported by Hon. John McLean, Circuit Justice.]

The act of 1824 had been in force several years when the levy and sale, under which the plaintiff claims, were made. The provisions of this act, therefore, apply to the case, and the question is, whether the proceeding on the junior judgment to a sale of the premises places the purchaser in a worse situation, than the judgment creditor would have stood, had the judgment remained unsatisfied after the execution was levied. That the purchaser at the sheriff's sale is entitled to all the legal and equitable rights, which could be claimed by the judgment creditor, will not be doubted. Has the sale of the premises weakened the right of the judgment creditor; and is this right less strong in the hands of the purchaser, under the execution? The right which the elder judgment creditor possessed by virtue of his lien, was taken away by the act of 1824; and is it not the same thing, whether this right was destroyed by a levy on the property within the year, under the junior judgment, or by a levy and sale? The plaintiff in the junior judgment was more diligent than the plaintiffs in the elder judgment, and it was the policy of the statute to protect the diligent. Would it not be absurd to say that a levy would fix the right of the junior judgment creditor, and that this right was not transferred to the purchaser at the sheriff's sale? Did this sale destroy or injuriously affect the lien of the judgment? Had the sale not been effected, the property was bound beyond all question, by the judgment and levy, and it was not liable to be sold under the prior judgment. The sale being made, would rather give additional force to the lien, than weaken it. The law of 1824 has a retrospective effect without limit, on any judgment which remained unsatisfied. Such is the effect given to it by the cases cited. Where a levy has been made on a junior judgment within a year from its rendition, and the levy under a prior judgment has not been made within the year, nor until the act of 1824 took effect, the first levy fixes the lien on the junior judgment, and the sale in no respect weakens it. The last levy is therefore void against the junior judgment creditor, and equally so against the purchaser of the property at the sheriff's sale. This construction of the act of 1824 is considered to come clearly within its spirit and effect, under the decisions of the supreme court.

I confess I entertain some doubts as to the correctness of the decision, which, in effect, transfers the lien from the judgment to the levy of the execution. If the lien of the judgment be limited to the property levied upon, the judgment, after the levy, has no binding force on other real property within the county. The policy of the act seems to require diligence by a judgment creditor, and prevents his holding a judgment over the property of the debtor, so as to prevent other creditors from reaching it. But, it would seem to me, that the policy of the act, as well as its letter, would be carried into effect by issuing an execution on the judgment in good faith, within the year, and pursuing it with diligence. That the lien of the judgment should not be limited to the property levied on, but should continue to cover all the real property of the defendant within the county, until the money was made. The supreme court, however, have decided this question, and as their decision, giving a construction to the statute, forms the rule of decision in this court, I am disposed to acquiesce in the decision. Any objection to the return of the sheriff, in not designating with accuracy the different lots or pieces of property sold on the execution, is obviated by the deed.

Case No. 924.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES v. LYMAN et al.

[1 Blatchf. 297;[1] 20 Vt. 666; 11 Law Rep. 156.]

Circuit Court, D. Vermont. May Term, 1848.[2]

CORPORATIONS—ORGANIZATION—BANK OF UNITED STATES—NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS PAYABLE TO CASHIER—EVIDENCE.

1. Where the act of incorporation of a banking company provided that notice of its organization should be given on or before a certain date, and the bank was found in operation afterwards under the act, it is to be presumed that it was organized as early as the time prescribed.

2. The Bank of the United States chartered by congress [Act April 10, 1816, 3 Stat. 266.] had no power to carry on banking operations after the 3d of March, 1836, though it continued in existence two years longer for the settlement of its affairs, &c. But on the 18th of February, 1836, [P. L. 36,] the state of Pennsylvania incorporated a banking company by the same name, in anticipation of the dissolution of the old one—the new company having, with one exception, the same stockholders and capital, the same name and style, and the same capacity, so far as a state institution could have the capacity of a national one. On the 10th of March, 1836, the defendants proposed "to purchase of the Bank of the United States the property of the office at Burlington, as it was upon the 2d day of March, 1836." This contract was perfected on the 1st of April, 1836: Held, that it was a contract with the new company.

[See Bellows v. Hallowell & Augusta Bank, Case No. 1,279.]

3. The acts and admissions of one of several joint contractors or promisors, are admissible, for some purposes, as evidence against all. And his acts and admissions while acting as the agent of all in the joint business, relative to anything within the scope of his authority, are binding upon all.

4. If the plaintiff's bill of particulars states his claim to be two particular promissory notes, he is confined to them, and cannot recover upon the pre-existing debt or original consideration. Per Prentiss, District Judge.

[See note at end of case.]

5. If a negotiable promissory note is payable to "S. J., cashier, or order," but is not endorsed by him, parol evidence is inadmissible, to show that the bank of which S. J. is cashier, is the real party in interest, so as to permit the bank to recover upon it, without its endorsement by S. J.

[Distinguished in Bank of Newbury v. Baldwin, Case No. 892.]

[See, contra, Commercial Bank v. French, 21 Pick. 486; Barney v. Newcomb, 9 Cush. 46; Eastern R. Co. v. Benedict, 5 Gray, 561; Folger v. Chase, 18 Pick. 63; Bank of U. S. v. Davis, Case No. 915; Blair v. First Nat. Bank, Id. 1,485; Mechanic's Bank v. Bank of Columbia, 5 Wheat. (18 U. S.) 326; Baldwin v. Bank of Newbury, 1 Wall. (68 U. S.) 234.]

6. In an action brought by the bank, such a note is not evidence of money had and received to its use, or of an account stated with it.

7. The note, however, having been given to Jaudon for property sold and delivered by the plaintiffs to the defendants, the plaintiffs could, perhaps, surrender and cancel the note, and recover on the original consideration, if the declaration contained a count founded thereon. Per Nelson, Circuit Justice.

[See note at end of case.]

8. If the bank, though not the payee, were the real owner of the note, and there had been an actual accounting with it or its agents, those facts might perhaps, with the note, constitute sufficient evidence to support an action by the bank for money had and received, or on an account stated; but an accounting with third persons, to whom the beneficial interest of the bank in the note had been assigned, in trust for specified purposes, would not.

[See note at end of case.]

9. Facts stated, from which notice to an endorser, of the presentment and nonpayment of a promissory note, will be inferred.

10. Questions of evidence examined, in regard to certain notes alleged to be included in the purchase by the defendants, and to have been controlled or discharged by the plaintiffs.

[1] [Reported by Samuel Blatchford, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

[2] [The judgment of the circuit court upon a subsequent trial of this cause was affirmed in 12 How. (53 U. S.) 225.]

[See note at end of case.]

[At law. Action by the Bank of the United States against Wyllys Lyman, George P. Marsh, John Peck, and John H. Peck. Verdict was given for plaintiffs. Heard on motion for a new trial. Granted. Thereafter plaintiffs had judgment, which was affirmed by the supreme court in Lyman v. Bank of U. S., 12 How. (53 U. S.) 225.]

In this case, a verdict was taken for the plaintiffs at a former term, subject to the opinion of the court on certain questions reserved at the trial. It appeared that the Bank of the United States, created by congress in 1816, had established a branch or office at Burlington, in Vermont, which was several years in operation, and continued to do business until September, 1835. On the 10th of March, 1836, the defendants made a proposition in writing, "to purchase of the Bank of the United States the property of the office at Burlington, as it was upon the 2d day of March, 1836," for the sum of $141,777.87, on an estimate made separately of the real estate, the good notes and demands, and the demands forming what was called the suspended debt. The proposition was accepted on the 15th of the same month; and on the 1st of April the contract was carried into execution, the defendants executing four promissory notes for the sum of $35,500 each, payable in one, two, three, and four years, and taking a conveyance and delivery of all the property, except certain bills or notes which had been paid into the office before the sale was consummated. In consequence of some of the bills or notes having been so paid, and to make up an even amount, the sum of $10,020 was paid in cash to the defendants, so as to make the exact sum of $142,000, the amount of the four notes. The other facts in the case, as well as the questions reserved, will sufficiently appear from the opinions of the judges.

Samuel S. Phelps, for plaintiffs.

Rufus Choate and Asahel Peck, for defendants.

PRENTISS, District Judge. The declaration in this case contains two counts, one for money had and received, and the other on an account stated. In support of the counts two promissory notes were given in evidence, with several accounts current, letters of correspondence, and other documents and testimony. Out of the evidence so given, various questions have arisen, some involving the admissibility, and others the effect or sufficiency of the evidence. The questions possess different degrees of importance, both intrinsically and in their bearing upon the case; and I shall notice them in such order and manner, as will enable me to dispose of them with as much brevity and as little repetition as practicable, entering no further into the facts than may be necessary to present, fully and intelligibly, the grounds of decision upon each particular point.

1. The plaintiffs were incorporated as a banking company, by the name of the Bank of the United States, by an act of the state of Pennsylvania, passed February 18th, 1836, [P. L. 36.] The contract which is the origin or foundation of the principal claim in question, was made sometime after the 10th of March, and was carried into execution on the 1st of April, in the same year. The precise day of the organization of the plaintiffs as a banking company not being shown, it is objected that it does not appear that they were organized, and competent to act as a corporate body, at the time the contract was made. To this, it seems to me, an answer was given by the counsel for the plaintiffs, which is quite sufficient. The act of incorporation having provided, that notice of the organization should be given on or before the 3d of March then next ensuing, and the bank being found in operation afterwards under the act, it is to be presumed that it was organized as early as the time prescribed, which was of course before the making of the contract.

2. It appears that the Bank of the United States, incorporated many years before by an act of congress, [Act April 10, 1816; 3 Stat. 266,] although it ceased to have any power to carry on banking operations after the 3d of March, 1836, continued in existence two years thereafter, for the purpose of suits, for the final settlement of its affairs, and for the sale and disposition of its estate and effects. As that company established the branch at Burlington, and was in existence at the time the contract for the purchase of the property of the branch was entered into, it is insisted that it must be taken, in the absence of direct proof showing it to be otherwise, of which it is said there is none, that the contract was made with that company; and consequently, that the plaintiffs, as to one and much the most considerable of the claims in question, are mere strangers, for anything that appears, without right or interest.

But it is to be observed, that the company established by the act of Pennsylvania, was established in anticipation of the dissolution, so far as banking powers were concerned, of the company established by the act of congress; the new company having, with one exception, the same stockholders and capital, the same name and style, and the same capacity, so far as a state institution could have the capacity of a national institution. It was the substitution of a new charter under the state government in place of the old charter under the general government, so that the banking operations which would cease under the one, might be continued, without intermission or interruption, under the new powers given by the other. Accordingly, the new company, as we have seen, was to come and did come into existence, as an organized corporate body, before or simultaneously with the termination of the banking powers and operations of the old company; and all the estate and effects of the old company were transferred to the new. The particular time of the transfer, it is true, does not appear. But it is obvious that it would naturally follow the organization immediately, in order to fulfil the purpose in view; and one of the witnesses states expressly that it included the estate and effects sold the defendants. This, therefore, connected with the bringing of the action and possession of the written evidences of the debt by the plaintiffs, is sufficient and very decisive evidence that the contract was in fact made with the new company.

3. To establish several material facts in the case, various letters, acts, and admissions of John Peck, one of the defendants, were given in evidence. This evidence, it is said, was inadmissible, at least so far as it concerns any of the defendants but Peck himself. The objection to it rests upon the ground that though the defendants were joint purchasers of the property, and gave their joint notes for the price, they were not partners, at least in such a sense as to make the acts and admissions of one evidence against the others. Admitting that the defendants are to be regarded, not as partners, properly and strictly speaking, but only as joint contractors or promisors, still the evidence, for some purposes, was undoubtedly admissible. It is a familiar rule of law that an acknowledgment by one of several joint debtors, either by word or act, is evidence to take the debt out of the statute of limitations as to all. Thus, "payment by one," says Lord Mansfield, in Whitcomb v. Whiting, 2 Doug. 652, "is payment for all, the one acting, virtually, as agent for the rest; and, in the same manner," he adds, "an admission by one is an admission by all." This principle, however, does not extend to the creation of a new substantive obligation, or a new additional liability; nor to anything which is necessary to be done by the party claiming, to perfect or give effect to a conditional or imperfect obligation or liability—such, for instance, as a demand of payment and notice of non-payment of a promissory note endorsed by several joint payees. There, the admission of one of the endorsers, either as to the demand or notice, is probably no evidence against the others; especially so, as notice is necessary to each. But, payment by one on a note, in pursuance of an existing joint liability, or an admission by one that the note is unpaid, or that a particular balance is due upon it, whether by stating an account or otherwise, is good evidence against all, in an action for the money due upon the note. That neither creates a new contract nor enlarges the pre-existing obligation or liability, but merely shows that that obligation or liability has not been discharged, or discharged but in part only.

But, however that may be, if it sufficiently appears that Peck was the agent to take care of the joint concern, and transact the business growing out of it, in behalf of the other defendants as well as himself, his acts and admissions while so acting, relative to any thing within the scope of his authority, are, undoubtedly, in law, the acts and admissions of all and binding upon all. Now, it very fully appears that the business was in fact conducted and transacted wholly by and through Peck. The original proposition for the purchase was signed, "John Peck for himself and others;" and this was ratified by the others, by their joining in the notes and completing the contract in pursuance of that proposition. As at the first, so throughout to the last, Peck acted as the ostensible manager, without the appearance, from any thing that is disclosed in the evidence, of any objection or interference on the part of the other defendants. It is obvious that it would be quite inconvenient, in a joint concern of such a nature, for all to take part personally in the correspondence, or to sign every letter and paper that passed, or for notices, accounts current, and other necessary communications, to be sent to and answered by all. It is usual, in such cases, to commit the transaction of the business and the charge of the correspondence to some particular one, and have it done by and through him for all. And where it is done by and through one, professedly for and in behalf of all, for a series of years, as in this case, without objection, all residing in the same neighborhood, and having daily intercourse and communication with each other, the assent of the others, they having adopted the first act, is to be presumed from their silence and acquiescence.

4. The bill of particulars filed by the plaintiffs having stated their claim to be two promissory notes particularly described, it is made a question, and it becomes necessary to decide, whether it was competent for them to give evidence of and recover upon the pre-existing debt or original consideration. According to the general rule of practice, as established by the authorities, it seems that the particulars are considered and treated as incorporated with the declaration, and the plaintiff is not allowed to give any evidence out of them. Thus, it has been held, that where the particular of the plaintiff's demand was a promissory note only, and on being produced it appeared to be improperly stamped, so that it could not be given in evidence, the plaintiff, though he might otherwise have gone into the consideration of the note, was precluded therefrom by his particular. Wade v. Beasley, 4 Esp. 7; Brown v. Watts, 1 Taunt. 353; 1 Tidd, Pr. 537. On these authorities, which are obviously directly in point, the plaintiffs in the present case were confined, by the terms of their bill of particulars, to the two notes specified, and were not at liberty to proceed upon the original consideration or cause of action.

5. The note first specified in the bill of particulars, and first given in evidence, if the plaintiffs could maintain an action upon it in any form, was undoubtedly admissible under either count in the declaration—not only under the count for money had and received, but also, being a liquidated debt, under the count on an account stated. To the admission of the note, however, an objection was made, arising upon the face of the instrument, which presents the principal and most important question in the case.

The note is signed by the defendants, and is in this form: "We jointly and severally promise to pay to Samuel Jaudon, Esqr., cashier, or order, &c." On the one side it is insisted, that Jaudon is the payee of the note; that the legal interest and right of action are in him; and that the plaintiffs, the note not being endorsed by Jaudon, can neither maintain an action directly upon it in their own name, nor an action in any form in their own name to recover the money due upon it. On the other side it is urged, that as it appears from the evidence in the case, that the note was given for a debt due the plaintiffs, and that Jaudon was their cashier, acting merely as their agent in taking the note, having no personal interest whatever in it, the plaintiffs are to be regarded as the real payee of the note, and, as such, may sue and recover the money in their own name. Upon this question I might content myself with a general statement of the conclusion at which I have arrived, with a summary reference to authorities and reasons; but the nature and importance of the question seem to entitle it to more full and particular consideration.

It seems now to be settled in England, whatever difference of opinion there may have formerly been in regard to it, that parol evidence is admissible to show, that a person not named in a written simple agreement is the real party to it, either for the purpose of charging him upon it, or enabling him to take the benefit of it, as the case may be; but not, however, to discharge a party who has contracted in his own name. Thus, the real principal, or a partner, from or to whom the consideration has moved, may sue or be sued upon a written simple agreement, though he do not appear upon its face to be a party to it. This was so decided in the court of exchequer, in the case of Beckham v. Drake, 9 Mees. & W. 79, afterwards affirmed in the exchequer chamber, in Drake v. Beckham, 11 Mees. & W. 315. But, however clear, undoubted, and now well established this doctrine may be as to mere written simple agreements, the question is, is it applicable to negotiable instruments?

In a very early case, (Evans v. Cramlington, Carth. 5, affirmed in the exchequer chamber, in Cramlington v. Evans, 2 Vent. 307,) it was determined, that where a bill is payable to A. for the use of B., the right of action and of transfer is only in A., he having the legal interest, and B. only the equitable or beneficial interest. This decides that the person named as the payee in a bill, and not the person for whose use or benefit it is made payable, is the party entitled to sue upon it. If this be so where the trust is expressed and declared upon the face of the bill, the case must be much clearer and stronger where neither the trust, nor the name of the party having the beneficial interest, appears at all upon the instrument. The observations of Buller, J., in Fehn v. Harrison, 3 Term R. 757, show very plainly, that, in his opinion, no person could be considered as a party to a bill, unless his name, or the name of his firm, if a partner, appeared upon it. In Siffkin v. Walker, 2 Camp. 308, where a person not appearing to be a party to a promissory note, was joined as a defendant in an action upon it, Lord Ellenborough said, that a note made and signed by one in his own name, could not be treated as the note of him and another person neither mentioned nor referred to. And in Emly v. Lye, 15 East, 7, the same eminent judge, with the concurrence of all his learned associates, held, that on a bill of exchange drawn by one only, it could not be allowed to supply by intendment the names of others in order to charge them; and that the plaintiff, if he would rest his claim on the bill, must confine it to the party who signed the instrument. In the case of Beckham v. Drake, to which I have before referred as settling the general rule as to written simple agreements, Lord Abinger said: "Cases of bills of exchange are quite different in principle from those which ought to govern this case. By the law merchant, a chose in action is passed by endorsement, and each party who receives the bill is making a contract with the parties upon the face of it, and with no other party whatever. That is a class of cases quite distinct in its nature from the present." And Parke, B., said, that where a contract in writing, not under seal, was made in another name than that of the real principal the real principal could sue and be sued. "But," he added, "the case of bills of exchange is an exception, which stands upon the law merchant; and promissory notes another, for they are placed on the same footing by the statute of Anne. In neither of these can any but the parties named in the instrument, by their name or firm, be made liable to an action upon it." Thus it appears, that negotiable instruments, according to these authorities, are exceptions to the rule which governs written simple agreements in general, and that this, for supposed good and sound reasons, is the established doctrine in England.

The same doctrine, I may safely say, prevails in general in this country, though there may have been, now and then, an occasional departure from it. There can be little doubt, I think, when we refer to the case of Van Ness v. Forrest, 8 Cranch, [12 U. S.] 30, how the rule of law on the subject is understood in the national court. There a note was executed to Joseph Forrest, president of the Commercial Company, for merchandize belonging to and sold as the property of the company. On the question whether an action could be maintained upon the note in the name of Forrest, Marshall, Chief Justice,[2] said: "The suit is instituted on a promissory note given, not to the company, but to Joseph Forrest, president of the company. Although the original cause of action does not merge in this note, yet a suit is clearly sustainable [maintainable] on the note itself. Such suit can be brought only in the name of Joseph Forrest. It can no more be brought in the name of the company, than if it had been given to a person, not a member, for the benefit of the company. The legal title is in Joseph Forrest, who recovers the money in his own name as a trustee for the company."

To notice particularly all the decisions in the various state courts, having a bearing upon the question one way or the other, would not only take up much time, but be assuming an unnecessary task. I have looked, however, into a very considerable number of these local decisions, and it will be sufficient for every useful purpose, without going further, to state the purport of such as have been made in the courts of some of the older and more commercial states. The decisions in the courts to which I refer present three classes of cases. The first is, where a promissory note is expressed to be payable, for instance, to A. B., agent of C. D., both agent and principal being named in the note. In such case it is decided, that the principal cannot sue, though named. It is held that a note payable to a person by name, though he is described therein as the agent of another, is a note payable to the person so described as agent, and that a suit upon it must be in his name, or in the name of his endorsee. The second class is, where a promissory note is made payable to the cashier of a particular bank, giving the name of the bank without the name of the cashier. In such case, it is determined, and very rightly, as I think, that the interest and right of action are in the principal who is named, rather than in the agent who is not named. The third class is, where a bill or note is made payable to, or is signed by, a person designated as agent generally, as A. B., agent, without naming the principal. In such case, it is held that the simple addition of agent, and of course the simple addition of cashier, without any specification whatever of the name of the principal, will not authorize the admission of parol testimony to show who the principal is, and make him a party to the instrument.

There may be, and indeed are, decisions in some of the state courts, not entirely reconcilable with the doctrine of the authorities which have been cited and referred to; but however much such local decisions may be entitled to consideration and respect, on account of the source from which they proceed, they can have no influence upon the question before us, so far as they are at variance with the general prevailing rule of commercial law. In suits in the courts of the United States, as is laid down in Swift v. Tyson, 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 1, the true interpretation and effect of contracts and other instruments of a commercial nature, are to be sought, not in the decisions of the local tribunals, but in the general principles and doctrines of commercial jurisprudence.

Upon the whole, it appears to me that the true rule of law, as deducible from the adjudged cases, American as well as English, is, that no person, although in fact a principal or partner, can sue or be sued upon a bill or negotiable note, unless he appears upon its face to be a party to it. A promissory note, according to the expression of very great judges, partakes in some measure of the nature of a specialty, importing a consideration and creating a debt or duty, by its own proper force. Being assignable, and passing by mere endorsement, it is necessary that the parties to it should appear and be known by bare inspection of the writing; for, it is on the credit of the names appearing upon it that it obtains circulation. It is for these qualities and on these considerations, that it is distinguished from written simple contracts in general, and made subject to a different rule.

The note in question here is a perfect instrument, without ambiguity in form or purpose, and must have operation and effect according to the terms in which it is expressed. It is made payable to "Samuel Jaudon, Esqr., cashier, or order." The promise therefore is to pay him, or the person to whom he shall order it to be paid; and it would be repugnant to the terms of the instrument to allow the Bank of the United States, or any one else without his order, to demand and enforce payment of it by suit. The bank is not named in the note at all, either as principal or otherwise; nor can it be inferred from anything contained in the note, that it was made even in trust for or for the benefit of the bank, or that the bank has any interest whatever in it. To let in parol evidence to show that the bank is the real principal, and hold that it may sue upon the note as such, would be to subject negotiable paper to the very uncertainty the law intended to avoid. It would be putting promissory notes on the footing of other written simple contracts, and prostrate entirely the distinction which sound policy, as well as the nature and purpose of negotiable securities, demands should be kept up between the two classes of cases.

[2] [20 Vt. 666.]

As the plaintiffs cannot be regarded as the payee of the note, it is almost superfluous to say that the note is neither evidence of money had and received to their use, nor evidence of an account stated with them. The note creates no privity whatever between them and the defendants; and we have already seen that, by the bill of particulars, they are limited to the note, and cannot go upon the antecedent cause of action, supposing they might otherwise do so under the declaration.

It is insisted, however, that there is evidence, aside from the note, of an actual stated account, showing the balance due, and that that, with the note, is sufficient to enable the plaintiffs to recover under either count. This might be so if the plaintiffs, though not the payees, were the real owners of the note, and there had been an actual accounting with them, personally or through their agents. But it appears that the accounting, whatever there was, was with Robertson and others, to whom the beneficial interest of the bank in the note, with the other effects of the bank, had been assigned in trust for certain purposes, and who, for aught that appears, are still owners of the property in the note. There is no evidence that the account of April, 1840, which was prior to the assignment, was ever delivered or sent to the defendants; and as to the accounts of April, 1842, and November, 1843, each is stated and rendered by the assignees, and each states the balance as due to them. The letter to Peck enclosing the account of April, 1842, is signed "Herman Cope, agent for J. Robertson et al., trustees," and states the account to be an account with them. The letter to Peck, of May, 1844, is signed in the same way, and speaks of the account of November, 1843, as an account with the same persons. The accounts being stated and rendered as accounts with the assignees, to whom the property in the note belonged, I do not well see how the accounts can be treated as stated accounts of money due and owing upon the note to the plaintiffs, or as evidence of indebtedness to them. Even viewed as implying a promise which would follow the right of action on the note, or simply as evidence of indebtedness on the note generally, it would not help the plaintiffs; for, as we have already seen, they are not the payees of the note and have no right of action upon it.

If there had been an account stated by the defendants directly with the plaintiffs while owners of the note, recognizing their right to be accounted with for the note, or such an admission of their title to the money due upon it as would amount or be equivalent to an express promise to pay them, so that a cause of action might be considered as having accrued to and vested in the plaintiffs before the assignment, I do not mean to say that, in such case, the assignees might not sue and recover upon such cause of action in the name of the plaintiffs. How that might be it is unnecessary to inquire, because the evidence presented, in any just view of it, falls short, as it appears to me, of making out any such case.

6. The other note given in evidence is the promissory note specified in the bill of particulars, executed by Lyman & Cole to the defendants, and by them endorsed to the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs being endorsees, and the defendants endorsers, the note was unquestionably admissible in evidence under the count for money had and received, if not under the other count. But the defendants can be chargeable only as endorsers; and this would be so, without any reference to the limited terms of the bill of particulars, whether the transaction be treated as a discount, and therefore a purchase of the note, or as a loan of money, taking the note in payment, or even as a taking of the note in payment of an antecedent debt. Viewed in either light, due presentment for payment and due notice of non-payment were indispensable to create any liability on the part of the defendants. There is proof sufficient of due presentment of the note for payment, but there is no direct proof of notice of non-payment. The only question, therefore, is, whether there is evidence from which notice may be inferred.

It has been often held, that part payment, a promise to pay, or an acknowledgment of liability by the endorser after the note becomes due, is prima facie evidence, not only of notice, but of presentment. Now, what are the facts in relation to the note in question? We have already seen that there is sufficient presumptive evidence that Peck was the agent of the defendants, acting for himself and the others, and that his acts and admissions, relating to the joint interest, within the scope of his presumed authority, which of course extended to this note as a part of the joint concern, are to be considered as the acts and admissions of all. It appears that after the note became due, several payments were made upon it; but as it does not appear but that these payments were made by the makers of the note, they will be passed by. What is material to be noticed is, that after the note had been duly protested for non-payment, it was charged and kept in a separate account, and that Peck, on a proposal to him to have it transferred to the general account, requested that it might continue, for the sake of convenience, to remain charged and kept, as it had been, in a separate account. In May, 1842, an account of this note, together with an account of the other note, separately stated, was rendered to Peck. He acknowledged the receipt of both accounts in June following, making no objection whatever to the account of this note, nor indeed any objection to the account of the other note, except that credit was not given the defendants for certain demands, called the Truesdell and Burrows notes, for which they claimed an allowance. Now, is not the request to have this note remain charged and kept, as it had been, in a separate account, coupled with the fact of an account so charged and stated being rendered, received, and retained without objection, an acknowledgment of liability to pay the note, and can it be at all material whether the acknowledgment was before or after the assignment, or whether to the plaintiffs or the assignees?

I have said that no objection was made to the account of this note; and such, I think, is the just inference from the letter of Peck. But if the objection was intended to apply to the account of this note as well as to the account of the other note, it was not an objection to the justness or correctness of any item in either account, but merely to the amount of the balance claimed. The objection was that a certain credit had not been given, thereby impliedly admitting that the note was a proper item in the account. In Campbell v. Webster, 2 Man. G. & S. 258, where the defendant, in answer to an account sent him by the plaintiff, admitted it to be all correct, except that the plaintiff had not credited him for a certain claim he had, and said he would pay the bill mentioned in the account if the plaintiff would allow that claim, it was held that this amounted to an admission of liability to pay the bill, a counter-claim being made the only objection to paying; and that an admission of liability amounted to an admission that all had been done which was requisite to constitute such liability. This is decisive, that the setting up, in the present case, of a claim for a credit as the only objection, with total silence as to the want of notice, is an acknowledgment of liability to pay the note in question, and thereby an admission that notice had been given.

7. The only remaining question in the case arises upon the claim set up by the defendants on account of certain demands, called the Truesdell and Burrows notes, alleged to have been included in the purchase from the plaintiffs, and to have been controlled or discharged by them.

The circumstances attending the Truesdell debt appear to be these: On the 10th of January, 1835, resolutions were passed by the directors of the branch bank, recommending a compromise of the debt, and an acceptance of an offer which had been made by the Truesdells to pay fifty per cent. as a composition. The resolutions were transmitted the same day to the parent bank, and the compromise so recommended was approved of by the parent bank on the 16th of the same month. The return made by the branch to the parent bank on the 1st of June thereafter, contains the debt in the list of the suspended debt, marked as "desperate," that is, of little or no value. The same return states that the compromise had been carried into effect. So it appears that the debt had not only been marked and returned as bad and hopeless, as early at least as the 1st of June, 1835, but had in fact then been compounded, and was so stated in the return, by the payment of fifty per cent. The debt, notwithstanding, still continued on the books of the branch bank, through some inadvertence or negligence, in the list of suspended debts, up to the 2d of March, 1836, to which time the contract of purchase had relation; the debt never having been transferred, as it is said it should have been, to the general loss account. The inference from all this is, that though the debt stood on the books, apparently as a subsisting debt for a balance of fifty per cent., it was not in fact a subsisting debt, but had been cancelled and discharged. If this fact was known to the defendants at the time of the purchase, the circumstance of the debt continuing on the books in the list of suspended debts can be of no real importance. It appears that two of the defendants, Peck and Lyman, acted as directors of the branch, from some time in 1834 to September, 1835, when the branch office closed. This of course included the time when the resolutions referred to were passed, and the compromise in pursuance of them was carried into effect. These two defendants, therefore, one of them being, as we have seen, the agent in making the purchase, must be presumed to have had knowledge of the facts in relation to the debt; and, if so, it would seem to be very clear that the defendants, especially as the purchase of the suspended debt was in the lump, on an estimate of its value in gross, and at a great discount on that estimate, cannot make the debt in question the foundation of a claim.

The other debt, the Burrows debt, consisting of two notes, also stood on the books of the branch, in the list of suspended debts, apparently a debt due, at the time of the contract of purchase. It appears that a compromise of this debt had been agreed upon by and between the parent bank and Burrows, and that the compromise was carried into effect on the 1st of May, 1835, by giving up the two notes to Burrows, and taking his note for 33⅓ per cent. of the amount. Burrows failed to pay the note so given by him, and the compromise, by its own terms, became null and void; but the two notes which had been given up were retained by him. In the return made by the branch to the parent bank on the 1st of June, 1835, before spoken of, this debt is mentioned, in a memorandum at the bottom, as having been compromised at 33⅓ per cent., which memorandum is signed by Mr. Lyman, one of the defendants, as director. The defendants, therefore, are to be taken as having full knowledge of the condition and circumstances of the debt at the time of the purchase. They purchased the claim, whatever it was, in the state in which it then existed, as they purchased the other claims composing the lump of the suspended debt. For anything that appears, the claim exists in the same state now as it did then. The plaintiffs have not discharged it, interfered with it in any way, or done anything to deprive the defendants of any right or benefit they could claim in or out of it under the purchase. The plaintiffs sold the debt as it was, as they sold the rest of the suspended debt, without any guaranty or representation whatever on their part; and the appearance of it, as presented by the books, could not have deceived or misled the defendants, two of them having officiated as directors of the branch at the time the compromise was effected. It must be presumed that these two defendants, one of whom, as before remarked, was the agent in making the purchase, knew the terms of the compromise, and all that had been done in pursuance of it. I am obliged, therefore, to say, that I see no legal grounds on which this claim, any more than the other, can be sustained.

Having thus disposed of all the questions raised in the case, I have only to say in conclusion, that the result from the whole is, that, for the reasons given on some of the points reserved, the verdict, in my opinion, [and such is the result of the opinion of the judge who presided at the argument,][4] ought to be set aside, and a new trial granted.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. 1. The plaintiffs cannot recover the amount of the large note made by the defendants on the 1st of April, 1836, and payable to Samuel Jaudon, four years after date, because they do not show a legal title to the same. That is in Jaudon. The addition of "Cashier" is but a description of the person. I find no authority which will authorize the admission of parol evidence for the purpose of showing that the note arose out of a transaction between the parties to this suit, in which Jaudon acted as agent, and took the note in his own name for the benefit of the bank. The parties to the note must appear upon its face. If the name of the principal appears there, that will be sufficient, though the note is taken in the name of his agent. It is then, in contemplation of law, taken in the name of the principal, and he is the payee. Any other rule would very much embarrass the negotiability of this species of commercial paper.

2. The legal interest in the note being in Jaudon as payee, the note is evidence under the money counts only of money had and received by the defendants from him, and not from the plaintiffs, and is not available to sustain the count for money had and received. If the declaration had embraced a count founded on the original consideration, it may be that on cancelling the note the plaintiffs could have sustained the suit. It is a note given to Jaudon for property sold and delivered by the plaintiffs to the defendants; and I do not see but that upon surrendering it the plaintiffs might have gone on the original consideration, the same as if the note had been given to themselves.

3. The plaintiffs cannot recover on the count for an account stated. The accounts were rendered to Robertson and others, assignees and owners of the demands by virtue of the assignment of the 14th of September, 1840. The accounts were stated between them and the defendants, and any promise, express or implied, arising therefrom, or to be predicated upon the rendering of such accounts is a promise to Robertson and others, not to the plaintiffs. No foundation is laid for implying a promise to the latter. Robertson and others were not their agents. They were owners, acting for themselves, as trustees for the creditors. The plaintiffs are neither the legal nor beneficial owners of the note.

4. The plaintiffs are entitled to recover in their name the balance due on the small note of $5,000, made by Lyman & Cole and endorsed by the defendants. The proofs in the case are full to show that John Peck acted as the agent of the other defendants throughout the transaction, both in negotiating the purchase, and in conducting and arranging the payments subsequently. This being so, his acts and admissions afford satisfactory evidence that all the defendants were properly charged as endorsers of the note. Payments were made and arrangements entered into, wholly irreconcilable with the idea that they or any of them had become discharged from their obligation by the laches of the holder or otherwise. The rendition of the accounts, also, including this note, and the claiming of a balance without any objection being made to this item, lead to the same conclusion.

5. The debt of Truesdell & Son was compromised conditionally at the branch office at Burlington for 50 per cent. on the 10th of January, 1845; the transaction was approved by the parent bank on the 16th of January; and the amount was paid before the purchase of the assets of the branch; all which was known to some if not all of the defendants at the time.

The S. E. Burrows debt of $2,766.57, including interest, was compromised on the 11th of April, 1845, for 33⅓ per cent. and his note was taken for that amount, $922.19, on the 1st of May thereafter, and the original paper given up. This was the Burlington debt, and the transaction was well known at the branch office. The compromise, as it regarded other debts due the parent bank, was afterwards annulled on account of the failure of Burrows to carry it into effect, and another was then effected with the bank; but it had nothing to do with the Burlington debt. That remained as it stood at the time of the purchase by the defendants. The defendants, or some of them, must have been fully acquainted with the situation of these debts, at the time of the negotiation for the purchase; and the bank has not interfered or changed the condition or character of them since. There was no guarantee of the amounts due; and as the demands had accrued at the Burlington office, where two of the defendants were directors, they, it is to be presumed, knew more about them, in every respect, than the officers of the parent bank.

[4] [From 20 Vt. 666.]

6. The proof is sufficient to show that the purchase was made by the defendants from the bank chartered by the State of Pennsylvania, and not from the old bank.

For these reasons, I think there should be a new trial, with costs to abide the event.

New trial granted.

This decision was affirmed by the supreme court at the December term, 1851. (See [Lyman v. Bank of U. S.] 12 How. [53 U. S. 225.]

[NOTE. This judgment was affirmed on writ of error by the supreme court, Mr. Justice Nelson delivering the opinion, in which it was held that the bank having become insolvent, and having made an assignment of its effects to trustees for the benefit of its creditors, it should be allowed to sue in its own name for the benefit of the creditors; the case being the same as if the law had permitted the suit to be brought, and the same had been brought in the name of such trustees.

[Although the bank had endorsed a note among its other assets to its trustees, yet, under the circumstances, it could maintain a suit upon the note, because, where the party who is a holder of a note has transferred it for the purposes of collection, and the same is not paid, but is found in the possession of the original holder, he can recover, as he is remitted to his original rights notwithstanding the endorsement, and if the note is not paid the plaintiff may give it up, and recover upon the original consideration.

[Before the defendants became indebted to the bank, the bank had made a compromise of a certain claim, which, among others, was the subject of a sale and purchase by the defendants. Two of the defendants had knowledge of the conditions of this compromise, and their knowledge must be considered as extending to the other defendants. It was a question of the jury to determine what the defendants purchased. Lyman v. Bank of U. S., 12 How. (53 U. S.) 225.]

Case No. 925.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES v. MACDONALD.

[4 Cranch, C. C. 624.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov. Term, 1835.

NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS—INDORSERS—NOTICE OF DISHONOR—DISCHARGE OF INDORSER.

1. In order to prove notice to an indorser who is a clerk of a printing-office, and who has a separate room in which he attends daily to the business of the office, it is competent for the plaintiff to show, by evidence, that a written notice was left at such room, although the indorser was not there at the time.

2. After a note is dishonored, and due notice has been given to all the indorsers, the defendant, the last indorser, is not discharged by the holders taking a new note at 60 days, from a prior indorser for the balance due upon the old note, and giving time to such prior indorser without the consent of the defendant.

[At law.] Assumpsit [by the Bank of the United States] against [Stephen Macdonald] the last indorser of William Prentiss's promissory note to John Agg, or order, at 60 days, from April 5, 1831, for $5,200, payable at the office of discount and deposit at Washington, indorsed by Agg and the defendant.

R. S. Coxe, for the plaintiffs, in order to prove demand and notice to the defendant, offered to prove, by Michael Nourse, a notary-public, that on the 7th of June, 1831, he called with the note at the office of discount and deposit, in Washington, and there demanded of the book-keeper, payment of the same, and was answered that there were no funds to pay the same; that on the next day he left a written notice of the non-payment of the said note, for the defendant, at the office of the National Journal, in which place he was employed as a clerk at the date of the note; and offered evidence further to prove that the defendant was clerk and book-keeper of the office at which the National Journal, a daily newspaper, was printed and published, in the city of Washington; that his room was near the front door of the office, and had bars or lattices, so that when he was not in his room, papers could be put into the room and dropped upon a table or desk; that the said notary-public had served other written notices to the defendant, by putting them into his room, in that manner, in his absence; and he believed that the notice in the present case, had been served in that manner; that the defendant's business required him to be daily at his said room; that he was not then a married man, but lived with his sister, who keeps a boarding-house, or was jointly concerned with her in keeping a boarding-house near the Journal office.

To the admissibility of which evidence the defendant's counsel (Mr. Marbury) objected.

But THE COURT overruled the objection; and the defendant took a bill of exceptions.

Mr. Marbury, for the defendant, then prayed the court, to instruct the jury "that if they believed from the evidence that after the note upon which this suit was instituted was due and payable, and after due notice given to the defendant of the non-payment thereof, the plaintiffs took the negotiable promissory note of John Agg, the payee and indorser thereof, payable at sixty days after date for value received, for the balance of principal and interest due on the said note in action without the consent of the defendant, and agreed with the said Agg to wait on said note in action in consideration of his promising to pay curtails and discounts on said new note, and to renew the same from time to time, he, the said Agg, continuing to pay such curtails and discounts until said balance and interest was paid; the said transactions, if found and believed by the jury, constitute a legal and binding obligation on the part of the plaintiff to give time to the said Agg in the payment of the note in action, and discharges the defendant from liability on the same."

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

Mr. Marbury cited the case of Cope v. Huntt, [Case No. 3,206,] in this court at March term, 1833, which was an action against the indorser of Mr. Houston's note, due July 7, 1829, for $500. The defendant offered evidence of a subsequent agreement between the plaintiff and Mr. Houston that he should assign to the plaintiff ten dollars a month of his pay as a clerk in the treasury department, in payment of the note; and that the plaintiff should wait for payment in that manner; that Houston continued to make such payments according to the agreement, until April, 1831; and that this agreement was made without the knowledge of the defendant. Mr. Marbury also cited Starkie, Ev. pt. 4, p. 289. Mr. R. S. Coxe, for the defendant in that case, cited Bank of U. S. v. Hatch, 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 250; 5 Vin. Abr. 527, pl. 17; and Bridg. Dig. Mr. Dunlop, contra, cited McLemore v. Powell, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 554, 556. The court, (Morsell, Circuit Judge, contra,) on motion of the defendant's counsel, in that case, instructed the jury that such an agreement, if proved, discharged the indorser (the defendant) from his liability. The jury, however, found a verdict for the plaintiff; and the court, (Morsell, Circuit Judge, contra) granted a new trial, on the ground that the verdict was against either the law or the evidence, in the case. A new trial, however, was never had in that case, and after continuance for several years, the suit was struck off by order of the plaintiff.

In the present case, THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, contra) refused to give the instruction prayed by Mr. Marbury, as above. See the case of Bank of U. S. v. Abbott, in this court at May term, 1827, [Case No. 906.]

Mr. Marbury then prayed the court to instruct the jury "that if they believe, from the evidence, that after the note in action became payable, and after due notice of its non-payment to the defendant, the plaintiffs took a new note in renewal therefor from Agg, the first indorser, the right of action upon the note in suit was thereby suspended against the said Agg, and the defendant thereby discharged."

Mr. R. S. Coxe, contra, cited Pring v. Clarkson, 2 Dowl. & R. 78; Gould v. Robson, 8 East, 575; Maltby v. Carstairs, 1 Man. & R. 552.

Mr. Marbury cited Chapple v. Ashley, 1 Dowl. & R. 26.

THE COURT (nem. con., but THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, doubting) refused to give this instruction also, there being no evidence that Agg's note was taken in renewal of the note of Prentiss's, indorsed by the defendant.

Verdict for plaintiffs, a new trial was granted by consent and at March term, 1836, the plaintiff struck the suit off, by consent, without costs.

Case No. 926.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES v. McKENNEY.

[3 Cranch, C. C. 173.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May Term, 1827.

JUDGMENT—MISNOMER—CORRECTION.

Upon a judgment rendered by mistake of the clerk against William McKenney, at the preceding term, the court refused to order the clerk to issue an execution against Samuel McKenney, although the writ, declaration, and pleadings were all in the name of Samuel, who was the person against whom the judgment ought to have been rendered. But the court ordered the judgment to be rescinded, the proceedings corrected, and the continuances entered up under the Maryland act of assembly.

The writ and declaration in this case were against Samuel McKenney, as indorser of William McKenney's note. Samuel was arrested, gave bail, appeared, and pleaded. The clerk, in making out the docket, had named the defendant, William, instead of Samuel; and Mr. Coxe, who was counsel for William, the maker, supposing the action was against William, confessed the judgment, which was entered up against William.

Mr. Lear, for the plaintiffs, first moved the court for leave to take execution against Samuel, considering it as a judgment against Samuel.

But THE COURT (nem. con.) refused.

Mr. Lear then moved the court to order the clerk to strike out the judgment against William, correct the docket, and enter up the continuances under the act of assembly of Maryland.

Which motion THE COURT granted, (MORSELL, Circuit Judge, absent.)

Case No. 927.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES v. M'KENZIE.

[2 Brock. 393.] [2]

Circuit Court, D. Virginia. May Term, 1829.

STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS — CORPORATIONS —RESIDENCE—BANK OF UNITED STATES—GOVERNMENT STOCK.

1. The 4th section of the act of limitations of Virginia, [Act Feb. 25, 1819; Rev. Code 1819, p. 488, § 4,] limiting the right of action in certain cases, to five years after the action has accrued, applies as well to corporations as to individuals. That section has reference, not to the character of the plaintiff, but to the nature of the action.

2. A note was discounted at the Branch Bank of the United States, at Richmond, and after it arrived at maturity, was regularly protested for non-payment. An action on the case being brought by the bank against the endorser to recover the amount of the note, more than five years from the date of the protest, the defendant pleaded the act of limitations. Held: That the right of action is barred by lapse of time, the plaintiffs not being, in the sense of the saving of the act, "beyond the seas, or out of the country." The contract having been made in Richmond, in their banking-house there, between the president and directors of the branch bank, and the defendant, the fact of there being an office of discount and deposit of the Bank of the United States, in Richmond, and of the residence of the president and directors of the branch being fixed there, must be considered, with reference to this contract, as fixing the residence of the corporation itself in Richmond, and not in Philadelphia, so far as the saving of the act applies to the locality of the plaintiffs.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

[2] [Reported by John W. Brockenbrough, Esq.]

3. It seems, that actions on the case, though not within the term of the proviso of the act of limitations, are within its equity: and that it should be so construed as to embrace actions on the case.

4. Though "The United States" is a stockholder in the Bank of the United States, and is, so far, a party in all suits to which the bank is a party, the doctrine of nullum tempus occurrit regi does not apply to exempt the bank from the operation of the act of limitations: for it is a well settled principle, that where a sovereign becomes a member of a trading company, it divests itself, with reference to the transactions of the company, of the prerogatives of sovereignty, and assumes the character of a private citizen.

At law. This was an action on the case, brought by the president, directors, and company, of the Bank of the United States, against Donald M'Kenzie, a citizen of Virginia, to recover the amount of a negotiable note, made by Michael W. Hancock, and endorsed by M'Kenzie. [On demurrer to rejoinder. Judgment for defendant.]

The note was for $4,000, and was discounted at the Branch Bank of the United States, at Richmond, and was regularly protested for nonpayment on the 26th day of December, 1821. This suit was brought in 1828. The defendant pleaded the act of limitations. [Act Va. Feb. 25, 1819; Rev. Code 1819, p. 487.] The plaintiffs replied "that they ought not, &c. to be barred &c. because the plaintiffs are and were at the time of the accrual of their action, a body corporate, duly constituted as such by an act of congress, &c., and by the said act so constituting them a body corporate with full capacity to sue and be sued as such, their said corporation was fixed and established in the state of Pennsylvania, beyond the limits of the state of Virginia, &c., and the president and directors thereof were, and are, citizens of the state of Pennsylvania, &c., and this they are ready to verify, &c." The defendant rejoined that at the time of the accrual of the plaintiffs' cause of action, the plaintiffs "had, and ever since have had, and yet have, an office of discount and deposit lawfully established at Richmond, in the state of Virginia, aforesaid, committed to the management and direction of managers or directors, annually and every year appointed, &c.. which said managers or directors of the said office of discount and deposit at Richmond, have always been members, stockholders, and joint corporators of the said company of the Bank of the United States, and have always been citizens of the United States, and residents and inhabitants of the state of Virginia; and the said defendant in fact avers, that the said promissory note, &c. was transferred and assigned to the said plaintiffs in the course of dealings of the said Michael W. Hancock, with the plaintiffs' said office of discount and deposit at Richmond, &c. And this he is ready to verify, &c. wherefore, &c." The plaintiffs demurred to the defendant's rejoinder, and the defendant joined in demurrer. Upon this demurrer, the following opinion was delivered by MARSHALL, Circuit Justice. The demurrer in this case makes the question, whether the plea of the act of limitations is a bar to the action? The fourth section of the act for limitation of actions, is copied from the English statute on the same subject, and enacts that "all actions of trespass, &c." "shall be commenced and sued within the time and limitation hereafter expressed, and not after, that is to say, the said actions upon the case other than that for slander," "within five years next after the cause of such action or suit, and not after." It has been observed by English judges, and if the observation had never been made, the truth would be obvious to all, that if the act had contained no other clause than this, it would have barred every action it enumerated, whatever might be the character or condition of the plaintiff. It would have barred the rights of infants, femes covert, persons non compos, or beyond the sea, as well as of corporations. The enacting clause does not contemplate the character of the plaintiff, but looks singly to the action itself. This being an action on the case, is within the enacting clause of the statute, and must be barred by it, unless the plaintiff can be brought within the exception. The twelfth section provides, "that if any person or persons, that is or shall be entitled to any such action of trespass, &c. be, or shall be, at the time of such action given or accrued, fallen or come within the age of twenty-one years, feme covert, non compos mentis, imprisoned, beyond the seas, or out of the country, that then, such person or persons, shall be at liberty to bring the same actions, so as they take the same within such times as are before limited," after such disability shall be removed.

The counsel for the plaintiff contends, 1. That this section limits the words of the enacting clause, so as to restrain them from operating on debts due to corporations. 2. That if this be against him, then the plaintiff is within the saving of the exception.

The argument in support of the first point, is substantially this. A corporation aggregate is not liable to any of the disabilities which are enumerated in the twelfth section; not even to that of being beyond sea, because being a mere legal entity, being entirely incorporeal, it can have no place of residence. Since it cannot be brought within the twelfth section, it ought not to be comprehended in the enactment of the fourth, because the savings of the statute must be construed to extend to every description of persons, who are the objects of the enacting clause. This argument is, I think, anticipated and answered in the observation made on the words of the fourth section. They do not take into view the character of the plaintiff, but of the action. In construing this section, it is entirely unimportant, by whom the suit is brought. The action is equally barred by length of time, whoever may be the plaintiff. The plain words of the statute are decisive. Nor does any reason of justice or policy exist, which should take a corporation out of these words. The legislature could have no motive for limiting the time, within which a suit should be brought by an individual, which does not apply with equal force to a suit brought by a corporation. We find no words in the exception, intimating the intention to make it co-extensive with the enacting clause, or to limit the general provision of the enacting clause to such general classes of persons, as may furnish individuals for whom justice would require the saving of rights, which are found in the twelfth section. An exception is not co-extensive with the provisions from which it forms the exception; and if a corporation cannot be brought within any of the savings of the statute, the inference is, not that a corporation is withdrawn from the enacting clause, but that the legislature did not think it a being whose right to sue, required a prolongation beyond the legal time, given for suitors generally.

2. The proposition that the plaintiffs are within the saving of the rights of persons out of the country, is one of more difficulty, which requires more consideration. The enacting clause, it has been said, looks to the action only. The proviso which gives further time to those whose particular situation was supposed by the legislature to require it, looks to persons only. Its language is, "if any person or persons, that is, or shall be entitled to any such action, be, or shall be, at the time of any such cause of action given or accrued, within the age of twenty-one years," &c. "that then, such person, or persons, shall be at liberty to bring the same actions, &c." The plaintiff, to come within the letter of the exception, must be considered as a person or persons. This, a corporation aggregate, in its capacity as a body politic, in which alone it acts, cannot be; but the statute of Virginia, is taken almost verbatim from the English statute, and, therefore, the construction which has prevailed in England, may be considered as adopted with the words, on which that construction was made. Long before the statute of Virginia was enacted, the courts of England had extended the construction of this very section, so as to embrace cases within its equity, though not within its words. This decision was not, indeed, made in a case relating to the character of the plaintiff, but in one relating to the character of the cause, which does not stand on stronger reason. In Chandler v. Vilett, 2 Wm. Saund. 117f, it was decided that an action on the case, came within the equity of the saving of the statute, though it is omitted in the enumeration of actions to which that saving applied.[2] The twelfth section of the act of Virginia, likewise omits this action; but I have no doubt that the courts of the state, would so construe that section, as to bring that action within it. The question, I believe, has never been raised, although the occasion for raising it, has frequently occurred. Upon this principle of liberal construction, I think, the twelfth section ought to be extended, so as to comprehend in its provisions, any plaintiff actually affected by the impediments it recites. If, then, the present plaintiff really comes within the equity of the twelfth section, I should be much inclined to allow him its benefits; but if the plaintiff claims the advantage allowed to persons, there is some reason for subjecting him to the consequences resulting from the character in which those advantages are claimed. The plaintiff, is a corporate body, acting by the name and style, of the President, Directors & Company of the Bank of the United States, and consisting of the original subscribers to the said bank, or their assignees. The president and directors, are to be stockholders, and are to be elected annually at the banking-house, in the city of Philadelphia, at which place, they are to carry on the operations of the said bank. They are authorized to establish offices of discount and deposit, wherever they may think fit, and to commit the management of the said offices, and the business thereof, to such persons, and under such regulations, as they may think proper. The president and directors, transacting the business of the bank at Philadelphia, have, in pursuance of the power given in the charter, established an office of discount and deposit, at Richmond, to transact the business of the bank at that place. At this office, as at every other, the whole business is necessarily conducted in the name of the corporation, and the president and directors of this office, as at every other, are as much the agents of the corporation, as the president and directors doing business at Philadelphia. The president and directors, at Philadelphia, are neither the nominal nor real plaintiffs. The nominal plaintiffs, are the president, directors and company; the real plaintiffs, are all the stockholders. The president and directors transact so much of the business of the company, as is proper for them, at their banking-house, in Philadelphia; but so much of the business of the company as is proper for the president and directors of the office at Richmond, is transacted at their banking-house, in Richmond. The contract, on which the present suit is founded, was made with the company, acting by its agents in Richmond.

[2] See, also, Rochtschilt v. Leibman, 2 Strange, 836. The proviso in the English statute, omits the action on the case generally, but embraces in its terms, actions on the case for words. The proviso in our statute, omits the action on the case altogether: yet, in the last case cited, the court held, that the equity of the saving, applied to an action on the case on a bill of exchange. The reason for extending the equitable construction of the saving clause of our statute to the action on the case generally, seems to be still stronger here than in England; for as the proviso of the English statute expressly comprehended one species of action on the case, while it omitted the action generally, it might be very plausibly argued, that every other species was excluded, upon the principle that expressio unius, exclusio alterius.

To bring the plaintiff within the letter, or the spirit of the saving in the twelfth section, locality must be given to the corporation. A place of residence must be assigned to it, and that place of residence, must be out of the commonwealth of Virginia. The counsel for the plaintiff contends, that the corporation resides in Philadelphia. How is this to be sustained? The corporate body consists of all the stockholders, and acts by a name, comprehending all the stockholders. These stockholders reside all over the United States; but being in their corporate capacity, in which alone they act, a mere legal entity, invisible, inaudible, incorporeal, they act by agents. It may be well doubted, and is doubted, whether the residence of these agents, or their place of doing business, can fix the residence of the corporation. If it can, these agents are divided into distinct bodies, residing in different states, and doing business at distinct places, in those different states. The banking-house of the president and directors of the office at Richmond, is as fixed and as notorious, as the banking-house at Philadelphia. The agents of the company, acting at Richmond, are as notoriously, and as completely its agents, as those who act at Philadelphia. If, then, the residence of the corporate body is fixed and ascertained, by the residence of its agents, or their place of doing business, it resides in Richmond, as truly as in Philadelphia. So far as respects this particular contract, it may, with entire propriety, be said to reside in Richmond. The contract was made here, with agents who reside here, at a banking-house established here, and is to be performed at this place. In equity and in reason, the plaintiff cannot, I think, as to this contract, if as to any, be placed in Philadelphia. When it is recollected that we resort to the equity of the statute to bring the plaintiff or the action on the case within the terms or the operation of the twelfth section, the reason is, I think, the stronger for considering this case as excluded from it, and within the enacting clause. The case of Bank of U. S. v. Deveaux, 5 Cranch, [9 U. S.] 61, 2 Pet. Cond. R. 189, decides this case, in principle. In that case, the court determined that it might look behind, or through the name of the corporation, and see the individuals who were the actual plaintiffs who constituted that legal entity in whose name the corporation acted. It is very much under the sanction of that decision, that the plaintiff is brought within the twelfth section of the act; and that decision makes the plaintiff a resident of every place where any member of the corporation resides. However difficult it might be to apply the principle of that case in reason and in justice to a contract made by an individual residing and sued in a state where no office or banking-house existed, and where a straggling corporator was to be found, no difficulty can exist in applying it to a case like this, where a suit is brought in the state in which the contract was made, in which it was to be performed, and in which the agents and members of the corporation with whom the debt was contracted, and to whom it was to be paid resided.

The plaintiff also insists, that the act does not apply to this case, because the United States, being a member of the corporation, is a party plaintiff. This argument has, I think, been fully met at the bar by the counsel for the defendant. In support of the argument urged at the bar, some decisions made by the supreme court, may, I think, be urged. It may well be doubted, on the authority of these cases, whether the privileges, the prerogative, if I may use the term, of the United States as a sovereign, belong to a case in which it does not appear in its sovereign capacity. In Postmaster General v. Early, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 136, 6 Pet. Cond. R. 480, the jurisdiction of the court was denied by counsel, although the suit was brought for a debt confessedly due to the United States. It was sustained, because in the opinion of the judges, it was given by an act of congress. If jurisdiction could not be maintained without an act of congress, much difficulty would certainly be felt in applying the prerogative of government to such a suit, so as to withdraw the bar of the statute of limitations. In the case of Bank of U. S. v. Deveaux, [supra,] it was not even alleged that the United States was a party, because a member of the corporation, and that jurisdiction could be taken on that ground. In Bank of U. S. v. Planters' Bank of Georgia, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 904, 5 Pet. Cond. R. 794, the defendant pleaded to the jurisdiction of the court, because the state of Georgia was a corporator. The judges of the circuit court being divided on the question, it was referred to the supreme court. In this case, the question, whether a sovereign, becoming a member of a trading corporation, carries its sovereign perogatives with it, was brought directly before the court. The court said:—"It is, we think, a sound principle, that when a government becomes a partner in any trading company, it divests itself, so far as concerns the transactions of that company, of its sovereign character, and takes that of a private citizen. Instead of communicating to the company its privileges and its prerogatives, it descends to a level with those with whom it associates itself, and takes the character which belongs to its associates, and to the business which is to be transacted. Thus, many states of this Union, who have an interest in banks, are not suable even in their own courts, yet, they never exempt the corporation from being sued. The state of Georgia, by giving to the bank the capacity to sue and be sued, voluntarily strips itself of its sovereign character, so far as respects the transactions of the bank, and waives all the privileges of that character. As a member of a corporation, a government never exercises its sovereignty; it acts merely as a corporator, and exercises no other power in the management of the affairs of the corporation, than are expressly given by the incorporating act. The government of the Union, held shares in the old Bank of the United States; but the privileges of the government were not imparted by that circumstance to the bank. The United States was not a party to suits brought by, or against the bank, in the sense of the constitution; so with respect to the present bank. Suits brought by or against it, are not understood to be brought by, or against the United States. The government by becoming a corporator, lays down its sovereignty, so far as respects the transactions of the corporation, and exercises no power or privilege which is not derived from the charter." This case has, I think, fully decided the question, whether any prerogative of the United States, is imparted to the bank. In Bank of Kentucky v. Wister, 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 318, it appeared that the state of Kentucky was the sole proprietor of the stock of the bank, yet, it was determined by the court, that the case was decided by the Case of Planters' Bank of Georgia, in 9 Wheat. [22 U. S. 904.] This point, then, is completely settled, as I think, in the supreme court. The law is for the defendant, and judgment is to be given for him.

Case No. 928.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES v. McLAUGHLIN.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 20.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. Term, 1810.

CORPORATIONS—DISSOLUTION—ABATEMENT OF SUITS—BANK OF UNITED STATES.

The expiration of the charter of the Bank of the United States on the 4th of March, 1811, abated all suits then pending in the name of the president, directors, and company of that bank.

[See Smith v. Frye, Case No. 13,049; First Nat. Bank v. Colby, 21 Wall. (88 U. S.) 609.]

F. S. Key, for the defendant, pleaded in abatement, that since the last continuance, the charter of the Bank of the United States had expired by the limitation contained in the third section.

To this plea, the plaintiffs demurred.

This action [by the president, directors, and company of the bank of the United States against McLaughlin's administrator] was brought on the 23d December, 1809. The charter expired on the 4th of March, 1811, previous to which time the bank had made a general assignment of all its effects to David Lenox and others, in trust, for the purpose of closing its concerns; and this suit had, by the clerk of this court, been entered for the use of the trustees before the expiration of the charter.

Mr. Caldwell, for the plaintiffs, contended that the corporation was not entirely extinct, as by the 10th section of the charter, its notes were still receivable in all payments to the United States.

THE COURT, however, (nem. con.,) was of opinion that the expiration of the charter abated the suit, there being no legal plaintiff.

Judgment for the defendant.

Case No. 929.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES v. MAGILL et al.

[1 Paine, 661.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Connecticut. April Term, 1824.[2]

BANKS AND BANKING—BOND OF CASHIER—LIABILITY OF SURETIES—BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

1. One gave a bond with sureties to the Bank of the United States, conditioned, that he should faithfully perform the duties of cashier of their office of discount and deposite at Middletown, during the term he should hold said office. The bank at Philadelphia hearing that he had been guilty of a gross breach of trust,—by a resolution passed on the 27th of October, 1820, suspended him from office till the further pleasure of the board, and directed the property of the bank to be taken out of his hands. This resolution was communicated to the cashier and carried into effect on the 30th day of the same month: Held, that the suspension did not take effect instanter on the 27th, but on the 30th, when it was made known to the cashier; and, that until then he was cashier within the letter of the bond, and the sureties liable for his acts.

[See note at end of case.]

2. Had the resolution been to remove the cashier from office, it would have taken effect and the sureties been discharged from their liability, from the time of its passage.

3. The resolution was sent by mail, and received by the president of the office at Middletown, on the morning of Sunday the 29th:

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

[1] [Reported by Elijah Paine, Jr., Esq.]

[2] [Affirmed in 12 Wheat. (25 U. S.) 511.]

Held, that its not being communicated on that day was not such a want of diligence as would discharge the sureties from their liability for frauds committed by the cashier on that day.

[See note at end of case.]

4. Where a bond with a penalty is given for the performance of covenants, although damages may have been sustained to a greater amount, yet the recovery must be limited to the penalty,—especially in a case of sureties. Contrariety of English authorities on this point.

5. It seems, that this is not the rule where bonds are conditioned for the payment of money.

[Cited in Lawrence v. U. S., Case No. 8,145.]

6. If there has not been a previous demand of the penalty or an acknowledgment that the whole is due, interest is recoverable only from the commencement of the suit.

[See U. S. v. Curtis, 100 U. S. 119.]

At law. This was an action of debt [by the president, directors, and company of the Bank of the United States] on a bond in the penalty of 50,000 dollars, made by Arthur W. Magill, Joshua Stow, Elisha Coe, and Nathan Starr, jun., the defendants, to the plaintiffs, conditioned, that said Magill should, during the term he should hold the office of cashier of the office of discount and deposite of the Bank of the United States at Middletown, Connecticut, execute the duties thereof with integrity and fidelity, and well and faithfully perform and fulfil the trusts reposed in him. The bond was dated the 27th of August, 1819. To the declaration on the bond the defendants pleaded performance; and the plaintiffs replied, assigning breaches.

At the trial the jury found a special verdict, stating circumstantially the following facts: That Magill, between the date of the bond and the 30th day of October, 1820, and while he was cashier of the office at Middletown, fraudulently, corruptly, and unfaithfully permitted overdrawings on the bank, and was guilty of other misconduct, by means of which the bank sustained losses to the amount, with interest, of 7,933 dollars 46 cents. That after the date of the bond, and before the 30th day of said October, 1820, and while he was such cashier, he embezzled monies and funds of the bank amounting, with interest, from the 29th day of October, 1820, to the sum of 58,614 dollars 94 cents: That 23,366 dollars 10 cents principal and interest was to be deducted from the amount of these losses, on account of monies paid by the defendants Starr and Coe, leaving a balance of 43,182 dollars 50 cents damages sustained by the plaintiffs. The verdict also found the amount of the penalty of the bond, with interest, and without interest, after deducting the said payments, in case the court should be of opinion that the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover more. The verdict also found that the president and directors of the Bank of the United States, on the 27th day of October, 1820, at Philadelphia, passed the following resolutions, viz.:

"Whereas it appears, by a report of a committee of the directors of the office of discount and deposite at Middletown, that Arthur W. Magill, cashier of that office, has been guilty of a gross breach of trust, in knowingly suffering overdrafts to be made by individuals, and also making overdrafts himself—Therefore resolved, that Arthur W. Magill, cashier of the office at Middletown, be, and he is hereby suspended from office, till the further pleasure of this board be made known." "On motion resolved, that the president of the office at Middletown be authorized and requested to receive into his care, from A. W. Magill, the cashier, the cash, bills discounted, books, papers, and other property in the said office, and to take such measures for having the duties of the cashier thereof temporarily discharged as he may deem expedient."

Which resolutions were immediately transmitted by mail from Philadelphia to the president of the office at Middletown, who received them on the morning of Sunday the 29th day of said October, and on the 30th, between the hours of four and five in the afternoon, communicated them to Magill, and then and there received into his own care the cash, bills discounted, books, papers, and other property in said office: That Magill, on the 2d day of November, 1820, sent to the president of the bank at Philadelphia a letter containing his resignation, and on the 7th the president and directors of the said bank unanimously dismissed him from his office.

D. Daggett and S. P. Staples, for plaintiffs.

R. M. Sherman and N. Smith, for defendants.

THOMPSON, Circuit Justice. This action is founded upon a bond in the penalty of fifty thousand dollars, given to the Bank of the United States for the faithful performance of the duties of cashier of the branch at Middletown in Connecticut, by Arthur W. Magill. The bond bears date the 27th day of August, in the year 1817, with a condition in the following words: "Whereas the above Arthur W. Magill has been duly appointed cashier of the office of discount and deposite of the said Bank of the United States at Middletown, Connecticut: Now the condition of this obligation is such, that if the said Arthur W. Magill, for and during the term he shall hold the said office of cashier of the said office of discount and deposite, shall execute the duties thereof with integrity and fidelity, and well and faithfully perform and fulfil the trusts thereby in him reposed, then this obligation to be void; otherwise to be and remain in full force and virtue." The case now comes before the court upon a special verdict by which the jury have found negligent, fraudulent, and unfaithful conduct in the cashier, in a variety of instances, which are particularly enumerated and set forth; by which the bank has sustained losses to an amount beyond the penalty of the bond. It is unnecessary for me to notice particularly the several specifications embraced by the verdict. The defendant's counsel upon the argument confined themselves principally to the embezzlement of the fifty-one thousand and eighty dollars sixty-four cents. I would, however, observe generally, that I entertain no doubt, that the losses found by the jury to have been sustained by the bank in the various other instances found by the verdict, are covered by the bond. They are all found to have been sustained by the fraudulent, corrupt, and unfaithful conduct of Magill, during the time he was cashier of the bank, and are therefore not only within the general scope and object of the bond, but within its express provisions.

The questions requiring examination in the case, may be embraced under the following heads. 1. Can the defendants, under the circumstances found by the special verdict, be made responsible for any part of the fifty-one thousand and eighty dollars sixty-four cents? And 2d. As to the extent of the recovery, that is, whether it can be beyond the penalty of the bond.

The precise time when this money was embezzled by the cashier is not found by the special verdict. It states it to have been after the date of the bond and before the 30th day of October, in the year 1820, while he, (Magill,) was cashier as aforesaid. It was suggested on the argument, that this finding had reference to the particular situation in which the cashier was placed by the proceedings of the directors of the mother bank in Philadelphia. But this conclusion is not warranted. It is the same language that is used in the finding as to every other default, and was manifestly intended to refer to the introductory part of the verdict, which describes him as cashier of the office of discount and deposite of the Bank of the United States at Middletown. The verdict, therefore, finds the embezzlement to have been committed by Magill while he was cashier, and before the 30th day of October, 1820; that being the day on which he was notified of his suspension. The jury have therefore found, that he continued cashier up to the 30th of October. If, however, this is a conclusion of law not warranted by the facts found by the special verdict, it must be rejected as not coming within the province of the jury. If the special verdict is defective as to the precise time of this embezzlement, and if it was material, and the evidence upon the trial would justify a finding, that it was previous to the 27th of October, a venire facias de novo might be awarded, and the verdict in this respect corrected. This, however, not having been asked for on the part of the plaintiffs, the defendants are entitled to all the benefit of the presumption, that the embezzlement might have been between the 27th and 30th of October; and this brings me to the consideration of the proceedings of the directors of the mother bank, in relation to Magill, and the legal effect of those proceedings upon the responsibility of the sureties. The special verdict finds, that the directors of the Bank of the United States, on the 27th day of October, 1820, at Philadelphia, passed the following resolution, (after reciting some misconduct of the cashier:) "Resolved, that Arthur W. Magill, cashier of the office at Middletown, be, and he is hereby suspended from office till the further pleasure of this board be made known;" and the president of the office at Middletown, was by another resolution, authorized and requested to receive from Magill, the cash, books, papers, and other property of the office, and to take such measures for having the duties of cashier temporarily discharged as he should deem expedient. These resolutions were sent by mail to the president, and received at Middletown on the morning of the 29th of October, (being Sunday,) and on the next day between four and five o'clock in the afternoon made known to Magill, and the books, papers, and property of the bank taken out of his possession.

The bond was given to secure the faithful discharge of the trusts reposed in Magill, for and during the term he should hold the said office of cashier; and the question is, when did that office and trust cease, within the true intent and meaning of the bond? Or when did the suspension take effect; whether on the 27th of October when the resolution was passed, or on the 30th when it was made known to Magill? The jury having found that the embezzlement was before the 30th, any neglect on the part of the president in not carrying into effect the resolution of suspension, until the afternoon of that day, may be laid out of view. And I cannot think, that not having done it on Sunday is to be imputed to the president, as that want of due diligence which ought on this ground to exonerate the sureties. If then, there has been no negligence which can affect the question, the single inquiry is, whether the sureties are responsible for any act of Magill's after the 27th of October. And notwithstanding the circumspection with which the law guards and protects the rights of sureties, from the best consideration I have been able to give to the question, I think the liability of the sureties did not cease instanter upon passing the resolution of suspension: But that a reasonable time must be allowed for the resolution to be made known and carried into effect. It was undoubtedly within the power of the directors of the mother bank so to have modified the resolution by express terms, as to have it take effect upon due notice thereof being given; and such is by implication the reasonable intendment of the law. The appointment and removal of the officers in the branches being under the authority and control of the mother bank in Philadelphia, time must necessarily be allowed for communicating such determination.

This was not a removal from office; Magill was still cashier, and so within the letter of the bond. Had he given satisfactory explanations respecting the complaints made against him, so that the directors had seen fit to continue him in office, no new appointment would have been necessary, and upon his restoration the liability of the sureties would unquestionably have attached without any new bond. The expression in the bond "during the term he shall hold the said office of cashier," must be construed to mean, so long as he shall have authority to act by virtue of his office. And Magill clearly had authority to act, until he received notice of his suspension; and the bank would until such time have been bound by his official acts. And if so bound, it must be because he was an officer of the bank, and having authority to bind it; which brings the case within the spirit and intention, as well as within the letter of the bond. The liability of the sureties must according to every reasonable intendment be co-extensive in point of time with the authority of the cashier to act, unless the plaintiffs or their agent are chargeable with want of due diligence in giving notice of the suspension and taking the affairs of the bank out of his hands, which in the present case I think they are not. So long as Magill was clothed with the official character of cashier, and legally left in trust with the property and concerns of the bank, and in a situation to enable him to do the mischief, against which the bond was intended as an indemnity, the responsibility of the sureties ought to remain. Had he been removed instead of being suspended he would not have had the official character of cashier, and a new appointment would have been necessary to give him such character, and a different rule of construction might perhaps have applied to the liability of the sureties. Whenever the cashier was so suspended, or placed in a situation that he could perform no official act binding on the bank, the responsibility of the sureties must also have ceased. But whilst the trust existed and was legally exercised, the sureties were bound to guarantee its faithful execution. I am accordingly of opinion that the bond covers the time up to the 30th of October, previous to which by the finding of the jury the embezzlement took place.

The next inquiry is, whether the recovery can extend beyond the penalty in the bond. On an examination of the English authorities upon this point, some contrariety of opinion will be found. Before the statute 8 & 9 Wm. III., it was held that the penalty of the bond was the debt, and payment of it might be pleaded in bar of the demand. And in many cases since the statute, satisfaction has been ordered to be entered of record on payment of the penalty of the bond and the costs. This practice, however, was not sanctioned by the court, in the case of Lord Lonsdale v. Church, 2 Term R. 388. And the court refused to stay the proceedings on the payment of the penalty into court. But in a later case of Wilde v. Clarkson, 6 Term R. 303, Lord Kenyon expressly lays it down, that the recovery cannot be beyond the penalty, and disapproves of the doctrine in the case of Lord Lonsdale v. Church. I am inclined to adopt as the better opinion, that where a bond with a penalty is given for the performance of covenants, although damages may have been sustained to a greater amount, yet the recovery must be limited to the penalty. That becomes the debt due, and upon which interest according to circumstances may be added. I the more readily adopt this rule in the present instance, because it is a case of sureties. In such cases it is peculiarly fit and proper that they should not be made liable for damages beyond the penalty. If the responsibility was without limitation, prudent and discreet men would be unwilling to become security, and expose themselves to such hazard. No judgment could be formed as to the extent of the risk; nor any calculation made as to the indemnity or counter security necessary for their protection.

I do not mean to be understood as extending this rule to bonds where the condition is for the payment of money only. Such cases might probably require the application of a different rule, and depend on different principles. Considering then the penalty as the debt due, the only remaining question is, whether interest is recoverable, and if so, from what time the calculation is to be made. The general principles of law will, I think, sanction the allowance of interest from the commencement of the suit, but no farther. Had there been any previous demand of the penalty, or any acknowledgment that the whole was due, interest might be recoverable from such time. But that not having been done, the defendants may not be deemed in default until the commencement of the suit. It may be considered somewhat analogous to an obligation to pay a certain sum of money on demand; in which case interest accrues only from the commencement of the suit, when no actual demand is shown. I am accordingly of opinion that judgment be entered for the penalty of the bond, deducting the payments proved to have been made, together with interest on the balance from the commencement of the suit. I reject the interest on the payments. Such payments were an admission of a breach of the condition of the bond, and damages sustained to that amount at least, and were of course made towards satisfaction of a demand admitted to be due. Judgment must accordingly be entered upon the special verdict, for such sums as shall, upon calculation, be found due upon the principles laid down in this opinion.

[NOTE. This judgment was affirmed by the supreme court in M'Gill v. Bank of U. S., 12 Wheat. (25 U. S.) 511. Mr Justice Johnson, in delivering the opinion, said: "We are unanimously and decidedly of opinion that the ground assumed by the defendants below cannot be maintained. What was there in the resolutions of the parent bank to discharge the obligors at all from their liability? The resolution was only to suspend, and this implies the right to restore. The cashier's salary went on; and, had the board rescinded their resolution, what necessity would there have existed for a redelivery of his bond? But there is no necessity for placing the decision on this ground, since, notwithstanding the resolution of the board is expressed in the present tense, a future operation must necessarily be given it, from a cause that could not be overcome,—the distance of the parties from each other. Time became indispensable to giving notice, and the day on which the communication reached the president of the Middletown bank was a day not to be profaned by the business of a bank. There was, then, no obligation to deliver the notice, and dispossess the cashier, until the 30th, and the law makes no fractions of a day."]

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES, (MARTIN v.) See Case No. 9,156.

Case No. 930.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES v. MOORE.

[3 Cranch, C. C. 330.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May Term, 1828.

NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS—SPECIAL INDORSEMENT—CHANGE TO BLANK INDORSEMENT.

The plaintiff, who is not an indorsee of the note, has no right, at the trial, to strike out the words of a special indorsement written over the name of the indorser, so as to convert it into a blank indorsement; and upon such an indorsement the plaintiff cannot recover, although he afterward obtain the indorsement of the indorsee to himself; because he can only recover in that action according to his right of action at the commencement of his suit.

At law. Assumpsit [by the Bank of the United States] against [John M. Moore] the indorser of Josiah Meigs's note for $250, indorsed in full to the president, directors, and company of the Bank of Columbia, but not indorsed by that bank to the plaintiffs. At the trial, the plaintiffs' counsel, Mr. Lear, without the knowledge of the defendant or the leave of the court, erased the words written over the name of John D. Moore, the indorser, so as to leave it a blank indorsement. But the court being of opinion that the plaintiffs' counsel had no right to strike out those words, a juror was withdrawn, and the cause continued; after which the plaintiffs obtained the blank indorsement of the Bank of Columbia, by its president, in this form:—"The President, Directors, and Company of the Bank of Columbia, by Nathaniel Frye, Jr., President." The declaration was amended with the leave of the court, by inserting an averment that Moore indorsed the note to the Bank of Columbia, who indorsed it to the plaintiffs.

THE COURT delivered the following opinion, (nem. con.):—

Upon the above state of the case, the court is of opinion that the plaintiffs cannot recover in this action. The indorsement to the Bank of Columbia, the then last indorsee, being filled up before the commencement of the suit, the Bank of the United States had no legal cause of action upon the note when the suit was brought. The subsequent indorsement by Mr. Frye, as president of the Bank of Columbia, (if he had authority to indorse it, on which point the court gives no opinion,) did not alter the plaintiffs' legal cause of action at the time the suit was brought. It could only authorize a new action; and, even if it would support this suit, it was not filled up when offered in evidence upon the last trial.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

Case No. 931.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES v. NORTHUMBERLAND BANK et al.

[4 Wash. C. C. 108;[1] 4 Conn. 333.]

Circuit Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. April Term, 1821.

FEDERAL COURTS—JURISDICTION—FEDERAL QUESTION—BANK OF UNITED STATES.

The plaintiffs are a corporation established by law of the United States; the defendants are a corporation established by an act of the legislature of Pennsylvania. This is a case arising under an act of congress which incorporated the Bank of the United States, and the suit may be maintained in this court.

[Cited in Fisk v. Union Pac. R. Co., Case No. 4,827.]

[See Osborn v. Bank of U. S., 9 Wheat. (22 U. S.) 816; Pacific Railroad Removal Cases, 115 U. S. 1, 5 Sup. Ct. 1113.]

[At law. Action by the Bank of the United States against the Northumberland, Union, and Columbia Banks. Judgment for plaintiffs.]

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. This cause comes before the court upon an agreement of counsel that judgment should be entered for the plaintiffs for $2,981 23 cents, subject to the opinion of the court on the question, "whether the plaintiffs, being a corporation established by congress, within the city of Philadelphia, can maintain a suit in this court against the defendants, being a corporation established by an act of the legislature of this state, within the jurisdiction of the same, and transacting business therein." By the second section of the third article of the constitution of the United States, it is declared, "that the judicial power of the United States shall extend to all cases in law and equity arising under this constitution, the laws of the United States and treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority; to all cases affecting ambassadors and other public ministers and consuls; to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction; to controversies to which the United States shall be a party; to controversies between two or more states; between a state and citizens of another state; between citizens of different states; between citizens of the same state, claiming lands under grants from different states; and between a state or citizens thereof, and foreign states, citizens, or subjects." The exercise of these judicial powers is, by the first section of the same article, vested "in one supreme court, and in such inferior courts as congress may from time to time ordain and establish." That portion of jurisdiction intended for the supreme court, is not left to be assigned by congress; but is bestowed upon it by the same article. As to the residue of the judicial powers, that was to be distributed amongst the inferior courts which congress might establish, in such proportions as that body, in its wisdom, should think best. The first judiciary act passed by congress, in the year 1789, created two courts, the circuit and district, within each state, on each of which a certain portion of the judicial authority was conferred. To the circuit courts was assigned original cognizance, concurrent with the state courts, of all suits of a civil nature, at common law or in equity, of a certain value, and the United States are plaintiffs, or an alien is a party, or the suit is between a citizen of the state where the suit is brought, and a citizen of another state. Cognizance in certain criminal cases is also conferred on the circuit court by this section, as well as in cases of appeals from the district courts respectively. It will be observed that this section bestows upon the circuit courts original jurisdiction only in civil suits at common law, and in equity, where the value in dispute exceeds the sum or value of $500, and where the parties to the suit are the United States, aliens, or citizens of different states. Cognizance of cases arising under the constitution, laws of the United States, or treaties, is not assigned by the act to either of the courts which it establishes; and, consequently, neither of them could take jurisdiction in those cases, since the article of the constitution, above recited, leaves to congress the distribution of the judicial powers, not assigned to the supreme court, amongst the inferior courts which that body might ordain. The power therefore not bestowed upon those courts by legislative provision, remained dormant, until some law should call them into action, by designating the particular tribunal which should be authorised to exercise them. Jurisdiction in cases arising under the constitution, laws of the United States, and treaties, is not limited by the above article either as to sum, or by the citizenship of the parties to the suit, but is independent of those restrictions, unless congress should impose them. Thus, if an act of congress should provide that all cases in law and equity arising under the constitution, laws of the United States, and treaties, should be heard and decided by the circuit, or district courts, without any qualification whatever; there could be no doubt in my mind that the court, to which this jurisdiction should be so assigned, might exercise it, though the plaintiff and defendant should be citizens of the same state, and let the sum in controversy be what it might. But congress might grant to those courts only a part of the general jurisdiction in those cases, by limiting it to a certain sum, or description of suitors, reserving the residue for future distribution, if it should so please that body to make the grant.

[1] [Originally published from the MSS. of Hon. Bushrod Washington, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, under the supervision of Richard Peters, Jr., Esq.]

It follows from what has been said, that when cognizance of cases arising under a law of the United States, is given to the circuit court without limitation, as it is in patent and copyright cases; the value in dispute, and the citizenship of the suitors, have nothing to do with the jurisdiction of the court. That this is a case arising under a law or laws of the United States, is unquestionable. It never could have arisen, if the legislature, in the exercise of its constitutional authority, had not incorporated the Bank of the United States.

The jurisdiction of this court over the case, is given by that section of the law of incorporation, which authorizes the corporate body to sue and be sued, &c., in all state courts having competent jurisdiction, and in any circuit court of the United States. I have thus endeavoured, in as few words as possible, to express, what is much better expressed by the circuit court of Kentucky in the case of this Bank of U. S. v. Roberts, [Case No. 934.] In giving this opinion upon the question of jurisdiction so arising in this case, I refer with great satisfaction to the opinion in that case upon this subject, for the purpose of declaring my entire concurrence. Judgment for plaintiffs.

Case No. 932.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES v. O'NEALE.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 466.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. April Term, 1824.

NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS—PLACE OF PAYMENT—DEMAND—DISHONOR.

If a note is payable at a bank, it is a sufficient demand of payment of the maker, if the holder, on the last day of grace, demands payment at the bank; and the note is dishonored if the maker has no funds there to pay it.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

[See Bank of Metropolis v. Brent, Case No. 900; Brent v. Bank of Metropolis, 1 Pet. (26 U. S.) 89.]

At law. Assumpsit [by the Bank of the United States] against [William O'Neale] the indorser of Benjamin G. Orr's promissory note for $7,660, due 26–29 May, 1821.

A verdict was taken for the plaintiffs, subject to the opinion of the court, upon a case which stated that the note and signature of the parties was admitted; that Michael Nourse, a notary public, on the 29th of May, 1821, (the last day of grace,) at the request of the plaintiffs, presented at their office of discount and deposit in Washington, where the note was made payable, the original promissory note, and there demanded payment of the sum of money therein specified, whereunto the teller replied, that he had no funds, and that on the 30th of May, 1821, he gave notice personally to the defendant, that the said note had been protested for non-payment, and that he was held liable by the plaintiffs for the payment of the same; that, on the 29th of May, 1821, Samuel J. Potts, the plaintiffs' book-keeper at their said office of discount and deposit examined the account of the said Benjamin G. Orr, on the books of the said office on that day, and found no funds at his credit, but his account overdrawn. And it was agreed that the note was discounted for the maker, at the plaintiffs' said office, on the day of its date, and was then delivered to them by the maker, indorsed by the defendant.

Upon the case thus stated, THE COURT rendered judgment for the plaintiffs.

Case No. 933.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES v. PETER.

[5 Cranch, C. C. 485.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov. Term, 1838.

DECEASED DEBTOR — SALE OF REAL ESTATE TO PAY DEBTS — RENTS AND PROFITS — RIGHTS OF HEIRS.

The only cases in which the court has permitted the heirs of a deceased debtor to have the rents and profits until the sale of real estate sold to pay the debts of the ancestor, are cases of sale under the act of Maryland for deficiency of personal assets.

[See Kurtz v. Hollingshead, Case No. 7,953; Ritchie v. Bank of U. S., Id. 11,863.]

[Suit between the Bank of the United States and the heirs of David Peter.]

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

Mr. Marbury, for the defendants, the heirs of David Peter, moved the court to order the interest of the proceeds of the sales of the lands and lots to be paid to the heirs, because if they had not been sold, they would have been entitled to receive the rents and profits until a sale under the will of David Peter. There had been an agreement that the property should be sold, and the proceeds stand in the place of the land; but no reservation was made of the interest for the benefit of the heirs.

THE COURT, however, (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent,) refused; and said, the only cases in which the court had permitted the heirs to have the rents and profits until sale, were cases of sale under the act of assembly of Maryland of 1785, c. 72, for deficiency of personal assets.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES, (RITCHIE v.) See Case No. 11,863.

Case No. 934.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES v. ROBERTS et al.

[4 Conn. 323.]

Circuit Court, D. Kentucky. 1822.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW — JUDICIAL POWER OF THE UNITED STATES — JURISDICTION OF CIRCUIT COURTS — PRACTICE — BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

[1. By the usages of this country and the rules of practice in the federal courts in Kentucky, it is not necessary in any case that a party should make out a warrant of attorney authorizing an attorney to appear for him, and in such courts a corporation may sue under its corporate style and character, and not by attorney.]

[2. The judicial power of the United States extends to two classes of cases: (1) Those in which the supreme court has original jurisdiction; (2) those in which it has only appellate jurisdiction. In cases of the second class the federal jurisdiction is dormant until its exercise is authorized by congress, and a circuit court can have no jurisdiction in such cases except as it is expressly granted by congress.]

[3. The provision of the constitution giving congress power to establish inferior courts, necessarily confers power to give to such inferior courts jurisdiction in all cases to which the judicial power of the United States extends, and as to which original jurisdiction is not given to the supreme court by the constitution.]

[4. The provision of the act incorporating the Bank of the United States, giving it power to sue and be sued, etc., in any state court of competent jurisdiction, or in any circuit court of the United States, authorizes the bank to sue and be sued in a federal circuit court in every case, and should not be construed so as to limit such power to cases wherein circuit courts have jurisdiction only by virtue of the judiciary act.]

[Cited in Bank of U. S. v. Northumberland Bank, Case No. 931.]

[5. Where the judiciary act is in conflict with the act incorporating the Bank of the United States in respect to the jurisdiction of circuit courts, the bank act, being of more recent date, should prevail.]

[6. The act incorporating the Bank of the United States, while it gives jurisdiction to circuit courts in all cases to which the bank is a party, contains no provision as to costs. Held, that if the bank recovers less than $500 in a circuit court it cannot recover costs, and may be adjudged to pay the whole costs of the suit in the sound discretion of the court.]

[7. The provision of the act incorporating the Bank of the United States, which gives concurrent jurisdiction to state and federal courts in cases to which the bank is a party, is fairly within the competence of congress, since state courts, if their jurisdiction were exclusive, might, by refusing to take jurisdiction in such cases, indirectly deprive the bank of its chartered powers and paralyze its operations.]

[At law. Action by the president, directors, and company of the Bank of the United States against Thomas Q. Roberts and Henry H. Roberts to recover upon a bill of exchange. On demurrer to the declaration. Overruled.]

PER CURIAM. The declaration in this case contains two counts. The first is on a bill of exchange drawn by the defendants, in Kentucky, upon Thomas Townley & Co. of New Orleans, in favour of William Bard, or order, payable ten days after sight. The bill, by the procurement of the defendants, was indorsed by William Bard to Samuel T. Beal, and by him indorsed, and the contents directed to be paid, to the plaintiffs; and afterwards, at the instance of the defendants, was discounted and purchased by the plaintiffs, at their office of discount and deposit, established at Lexington; and which bill, after thus becoming the property of the plaintiffs, was presented, and protested for nonpayment. The second count is in the usual form, for money had and received by the defendants, to the use of the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs sue, in their corporate character, in the name and style conferred on them by the act of incorporation, and not by attorney; and the declaration contains no averments as to the citizenship of the defendants, nor of the corporators, nor of any of the parties concerned in the transaction. The defendant, Thomas Q. Roberts, has demurred to the declaration, alleging "that the declaration and the counts therein contained are severally insufficient to authorize this court to take jurisdiction of the case, or render judgment thereon." The act of congress [3 Stat. 266] incorporating the subscribers to the Bank of the United States (section 7) provides, that the corporation, by the name and style of the "President, Directors and Company of the Bank of the United States," shall be able and capable in law to sue and be sued, &c., without requiring them to sue by attorney. By the usages of this country, and the rules of practice in this court, it is not necessary, in any case, that a plaintiff should make out a warrant of attorney, authorizing an attorney to appear and prosecute for him. In the case of Kentucky Ins. Co. v. Hawkins, 4 Bibb, 470, the court of appeals of this state held, that the proceedings were sufficient to enable the plaintiffs to recover, although in that case they sued in their corporate style and character, and not by attorney. We think there is no weight in the first cause of demurrer, and will dismiss it without further observation.

The other causes of demurrer call in question the jurisdiction of this court. Without going into a minute examination of each particular cause assigned, in detail, we will proceed to consider the question of jurisdiction upon general principles, tested by the constitution and laws. The constitution of the United States provides (article 3, § 1) that "the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one supreme court, and in such inferior courts as congress may, from time to time, ordain and establish." Section 2: 1st. "The judicial power shall extend to all cases, in law and equity, arising under this constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority; to all cases affecting ambassadors, or other public ministers and consuls; to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction; to controversies to which the United States shall be a party; to controversies between two or more states; between a state and citizens of another state; between citizens of different states; between citizens of the same state, claiming lands under grants of different states; and between a state, or citizens thereof, and foreign states, citizens or subjects." 2d. "In all cases, affecting ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, and those in which a state shall be a party, the supreme court shall have original jurisdiction. In all other cases before mentioned, the supreme court shall have appellate jurisdiction, both as to law and fact, with such exceptions, and under such regulations, as the congress shall make." The seventh section of the act of congress incorporating the subscribers to the Bank of the United States, enacts and provides, that "the subscribers to the Bank of the United States of America, their successors and assigns, shall be and are hereby created, a corporation and body politic, by the name and style of 'The President, Directors and Company of the Bank of the United States;' and, by that name, shall be, and are hereby made, able and capable in law (inter alia) to sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded, answer and be answered, defend and be defended, in all state courts having competent jurisdiction, and in any circuit court of the United States." Does this section of the act of congress confer on this court jurisdiction of the case before us? If it does not, it will readily be admitted, that there is a failure of jurisdiction. This case is not brought within any of the provisions of former acts of congress, declaring the jurisdictions of the circuit courts; nor does it belong to either class of cases, authorized by the act, entitled "An act to establish the judicial courts of the United States," to be brought in the circuit courts of the United States.

It must be admitted, too, that whatever may be the extent of the judicial power of the United States, as declared by the constitution, the circuit court can only exercise such portions of that power as are expressly conferred upon it by congress. This results, necessarily, from the nature of the power, and the provisions of the constitution. The judicial power of the United States, is, by the constitution, declared to extend to eleven enumerated classes. This may properly be said to be the potential judicial power; to be called into action, either by some subsequent provisions of the constitution, or by law, or by both. Hence we find, that the constitution proceeds afterwards to declare, that this judicial power shall be vested in one supreme court, created by the constitution, and in such inferior courts as congress shall from time to time ordain and establish. The constitution defines the portions of the judicial power vested in that supreme court, and leaves the residue to be distributed among the inferior courts, which might be established by law; and to be vested, or not vested, in them respectively, from time to time, according to the sound discretion of congress. It follows, that a court, created by law, can only exercise the jurisdiction, which the law confers upon it. It cannot assume jurisdiction, under the constitution alone, without legal power being superadded. It will be conceded further, that the circuit courts of the United States, will not, and cannot take cognizance, by implication. With these concessions, and under these circumstances, has the act of incorporation conferred upon this court jurisdiction?

That the words of the law are not sufficiently explicit to give jurisdiction, will not bear an argument. The charter declares the bank may sue and be sued in any "state court having competent jurisdiction, or in any circuit court of the United States." The right of appealing to the federal tribunals, is, by the charter, made reciprocal, between the bank and the people. If a citizen should appeal to this court for redress against the bank, we should turn him away with an ill grace indeed, by telling him, that although the law said he might sue here, it did not say we should entertain jurisdiction of the suit; and that, therefore, we would give him no redress. The declaration of the law, that the party may sue in a designated court, must, ex vi termini, include the idea, that the court shall be competent to entertain the suit. The law must mean that, or nothing; for it would be futile or ridiculous to send a party into court, for no other purpose but to be sent out again, for want of jurisdiction. We cannot hesitate to believe, that the letter of the charter is sufficiently explicit to give the circuit courts of the United States jurisdiction in all suits by or against the bank. But it is contended for the defendant, that although, by the letter of the statute, the court might have jurisdiction; yet, according to its sound construction, it is otherwise. This has been argued several ways. It was said, that wherever a corporation is erected, the very creation of the corporation, by operation of law, gives it the capacity of suing and being sued; and that therefore, as the words of the charter declaring the capacity of this corporation to sue and be sued only express that which would have resulted by operation of law, without them, they ought to be disregarded in the construction of the statute. This doctrine might have been tenable, if the charter had confined itself to a simple declaration of the corporation's legal capacity to sue and be sued, without designating in what courts that capacity should be exercised. In that case, it might safely be admitted, that the law expressed no more than would have been implied, without being expressed; and good sense would seem to dictate, that, in such a case, the construction should be the same, with or without the words. We think the principle urged in argument wholly inapplicable to the case before us. The statute does not, in its expressions, confine itself to what would otherwise have been implied. It not only declares the capacity of the corporation to sue, but expresses in what courts: "In any state court having competent jurisdiction, or any circuit court of the United States." Surely, it will not be contended, that these expressions, or the idea conveyed by them, would have been supplied, by mere intendment and operation of law. If so, there would be an end of the argument. We cannot, on this ground, be authorized to reject the words of the statute.

It has been argued, that the act incorporating the bank, and the general act establishing the judicial courts of the United States, should be construed together as statutes made in pari materia; that such construction should be given to the incorporating act as would make it consist with the judicial act; and that consequently, the general expression of the act of incorporation, should be qualified and restrained, so as to permit the bank to sue in the circuit courts of the United States, in those cases only, in which it might have sued in those courts, by the provisions of the judicial act. This argument will not bear examination. If, as was very properly urged in the argument for the plaintiffs, the two statutes are consistent in their provisions, they may very well stand together, without any violence to the expressions of either; but if they are inconsistent, the incorporating act being the last expression of the legislative will, must prevail. The constitution of the United States has divided the judicial power of the Union into eleven distinct classes. As already remarked, it vested a portion of that power in the supreme court, subject to limitations and regulations, to be imposed by congress, and left the residue of that power to be disposed of according to the sound discretion of congress. It is very clear, that the congress did not, in the judicial act, dispose of the whole of that residue, or, in other words, did not vest it in any court. An example or two will serve to prove this position. The judicial act makes no provision authorizing the patentee of a new discovery or invention to sue in the courts of the Union, for an injury done to his patent rights. This manifestly pertained to the judicial power of the Union. The first act of congress, passed on the subject of those rights, did not authorize the patentees to sue in the circuit courts; in consequence of which omission, they were compelled to resort to the tribunals of the states for redress; but, by a subsequent act of congress, they were authorized to sue in the circuit courts, in terms very similar to those used in the charter of the bank. Again, the judicial act did not authorize the assignee of a promissory note, or other chose in action, to sue in the courts of the United States, upon the ground of the plaintiff and defendant being citizens of different states, unless the assignor and the defendant were in the same attitude; although the judicial power of the United States extends, by the constitution, expressly, to all controversies between citizens of different states, whatever may be the subject of controversy. Congress might well, therefore, in any subsequent statute, as they have done in the charter of the bank, provide for a case not provided for in the judicial act, and give jurisdiction beyond the provisions of that act within the limits of the judicial power of the Union. This is a case of that sort; a case before unprovided for. It is a rule in the construction of statutes, equally dictated by the principles of law and good sense, that all the words of a statute shall have some operation, if by possibility they may. A decent respect for the legislature forbids us to believe, that when they speak, they mean differently from what they say, or mean nothing. It is a rule of construction, that a subsequent statute shall control a former; but a former shall not control a subsequent one. This rule results from the very nature of legislation. The last declaration of the public will must prevail. But these rules would be violated, by adopting the construction contended for, on behalf of the defendant, so far as the judicial act and charter of the bank are inconsistent in their provisions. It would require us to reject the expressions of the latter to make it conform to the former; to reject them, too, without necessity, when they are sensible and significant in themselves, and not repugnant to any other expressions used in the statute. No court can be at liberty to indulge such a license in the construction of statute. It was further argued, that the court ought not to take jurisdiction by the construction. This has been already admitted; but the words of the statute are explicit, as has been shown; and it is only by construction, that this court can excuse itself from the exercise of jurisdiction: a construction, too, not warranted by any known rules of interpretation.

The argument derived from the subject of costs is entitled to no weight. Costs are the creatures of statutes. The act chartering the bank is silent on the subject; there is, therefore, no repugnance between it and the judicial act; and consequently, its provisions, in relation to costs, will govern in suits brought by the bank, as in other cases. Although the bank may, from the provisions of its charter, sue in this court for any sum without limitation; yet if it recovers less than five hundred dollars, it cannot recover costs, and may be adjudged to pay the whole costs of suit, in the sound discretion of the court, as other suitors. On the whole, we entertain no doubt of the jurisdiction of this court, if congress possessed the constitutional power to confer it.

This leads to an enquiry of great importance to the bank, and to the good people of the United States: Is the provision in the charter, that the bank may "sue and be sued in any state court having competent jurisdiction, or in any circuit court of the United States," unconstitutional and therefore void? It is admitted, that the power of congress to give jurisdiction to the circuit courts of the United States, in suits instituted by the bank, can be maintained only under the first number of the second clause of the third article of the constitution, declaring that the judicial power of the Union "shall extend to all cases in law and equity, arising under the constitution, the laws of the United States and treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority." Is the case upon record one "arising under the laws of the United States"? We have felt the novelty and difficulty of the question. It has demanded, and received, our most anxious and deliberated reflections; and the result is, a conviction that we are bound to respond in the affirmative. In the case of McCulloch v. Maryland, [4 Wheat. (17 U. S.) 316,] in the supreme court of the United States, the court decided, that the act "to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States" is a law made in pursuance of the constitution. That court being the supreme judicial tribunal of the nation, expressly vested, by the constitution, with power to decide, in the last resort, all questions of constitutional law, growing out of the laws of the United States, in its decision, is authoritative and conclusive, in all the courts of the United States. The learned counsel, therefore, very properly made no question as to the constitutional power of congress to establish the bank. If congress had power to create the corporation, it would seem not to admit of a doubt, that congress must have power to maintain its existence, to protect its powers, to enforce its rights, and to furnish the means of carrying on its operations. The bank was established as a necessary instrument to aid the government in its fiscal concerns. Could this national object be certainly effected, without conferring jurisdiction on the national tribunal? We think not. The state tribunals might safely be left to exercise concurrent, but not exclusive jurisdiction. Whether they would entertain jurisdiction or not, would depend on the courts themselves, and the jurisdiction conferred on them by the constitution and laws of the states. If the tribunals of the states should refuse, or if the laws of the state should forbid them, to entertain a suit instituted by the bank, where in the constitution of the United States, is the power to be found, authorizing congress to compel the state courts to exercise jurisdiction? We would hesitate to pronounce, that the national government possesses such a power. We do not mean to say, that the state courts ought not, or cannot, entertain jurisdiction in suits between the bank and the citizens. We think they may do so, either with or without an express provision in the acts of congress; not as a matter of constitutional obligation, but upon those principles of comity, which authorize the courts of every civilized state to administer law and justice to suitors, although not citizens of the state. Whether congress possesses the power to coerce the state courts to entertain jurisdiction or not, we are satisfied, that an attempt to exercise such a power would justly give greater cause for alarm than the vesting of concurrent jurisdiction in the state and federal tribunals.

If it was competent for congress to create this corporation, to confer upon it the rights and powers, and to require of it the performance of the duties, expressed in the charter, it was clearly competent to submit these rights, powers and duties to the decision of the national tribunals. The powers of judicature must, of necessity, in every well organized government, be co-extensive with the powers of legislation. A government without the power of interpreting and enforcing its own regulations would not only be feeble, but must become contemptible. The framers of our admirable constitution, therefore, wisely extended the judicial power of the Union, to all cases arising under the constitution and laws of the United States. The only difficulty is, in ascertaining whether this be a case of that character. It was said in argument for the defendant, that the words "arising under" must be understood to mean "growing out of, created by, or brought into being by," the laws of the United States. Let the case before us be tested by this definition. The bank itself, its capacity to purchase the bill of exchange, its rights of property in the bill, and the sum of money therein expressed, all grew out of, were created and brought into being by, the act of congress creating the corporation. But for the act of congress, the cause before us could not have existed. It is palpable, that when the case involves the very right of property given and created by an act of congress, as in this instance, it is "a case arising under the constitution and laws of the United States." We are of opinion that, to bring the case within the judicial power of the United States, it need not be of an unmixed character. If the principal right, the right of property in the subject in controversy is given, or created, by an act of congress, made in pursuance of the constitution, it is sufficient. In this case, the principal right, the general right, of ownership in the bill of exchange, and the money for which it was drawn, is of that character. The interest and damages demanded on account of the protest are but incidents, that may follow the principal, as a shadow follows the substance, and may well be regulated by the lex loci. A distinction was attempted, at the bar, between the cases in which a general right is created by act of congress, and those in which a penalty, debt, or specific thing, or damages, are expressly created and given by laws of the United States; and it was insisted, that the latter class only ought to be regarded as cases arising under the laws of the United States. That the distinction attempted is wholly untenable is evident. The constitution uses the same expression, and in the same sentence, in relation to cases arising under the constitution, the laws, and treaties. The distinction can, in no instance, be applicable to a case arising under the constitution, and very rarely, if ever, to one arising under a treaty. The same words ought to receive the same interpretation; and where the distinction cannot possibly be applied to the constitution, it ought not to the laws. It was admitted, by one of the defendant's counsel, and we think, rightly, that the bank could, constitutionally, be authorized, by congress, to sue in the circuit courts of the United States, for a trespass committed upon its corporate rights or property. We are unable to perceive any well founded distinction between a suit brought to redress an injury done to the corporate rights in possession, and suits to redress injuries to the corporate rights in action. They are alike intended to maintain, protect, and enforce the rights of the corporation, conferred upon it by its charter.

A numerous train of decisions in the supreme court tend to prove, and indeed it was conceded in argument, that if this case had been brought originally in a court of the state, it would have been a proper subject of revision and adjudication in the supreme court of the United States, in the exercise of its constitutional appellate jurisdiction. But it was insisted, with great earnestness that it was not competent for congress to give original jurisdiction of the case to the subordinate federal tribunals. If we have taken a correct view of the constitution, this argument is not maintainable. The judicial power granted by the constitution, is granted to the United States; it is declared to extend to certain enumerated cases; and it is vested in the "supreme court, and such inferior courts as Congress shall, from time to time, ordain and establish." "In all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, and those in which a state shall be a party, the supreme court shall have original jurisdiction." "In all the other cases before mentioned, the supreme court shall have appellate jurisdiction, both as to law and fact, with such exceptions, and under such regulations, as congress shall make." As the constitution gives to the supreme court original jurisdiction in two only of the eleven cases enumerated in that instrument, it may be asked, was it the intention of the framers of the constitution to leave the residue of the original jurisdiction to be exercised exclusively, by the courts of the states? If so, the power of congress to ordain and establish inferior courts was worse than futile. The authority to establish inferior courts includes authority to confer on them judicial power. If congress can create inferior courts, and give them original jurisdiction, in any case of the nine enumerated cases to which the judicial power of the United States extends, and in which the supreme court has appellate jurisdiction only, it is equally competent for congress to clothe such inferior courts with original jurisdiction in all the other enumerated cases, or in so many, and so much of each of them, as from time to time shall be demanded by the exigencies of the government and the wants of the people. This case being one, in our opinion, "arising under" a law of the United States, decided by the supreme judicial tribunal of the nation, to be made pursuant to the constitution, our judgment is, that this court has jurisdiction, and that the demurrer ought to be overruled.

We have to regret, that we have had but few judicial decisions or former precedents to enlighten our path. We have been compelled to explore our way, chiefly, by the lights furnished by the constitution and laws themselves, and the general principles of law and reason. In the performance of this delicate and arduous task, we have received great assistance from the arguments we have heard from the bar, on both sides; and we shall be happy if we have been enabled to come to a conclusion as satisfactory to an enlightened and impartial community as it is to our own judgments and consciences.

Case No. 935.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES v. SMITH.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 319.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May Term, 1822.[2]

NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS—PLACE OF PAYMENT—DEMAND—PLEADING—DEMURRER TO EVIDENCE.

1. Upon a demurrer to evidence, the court cannot render judgment for the plaintiff, if the declaration be substantially defective.

2. In an action against the indorser of a note which, in the body of it, is made payable at a particular bank, the declaration must aver a demand of payment at that bank.

[See note at end of case.]

3. From the facts, that the note was discounted by the bank at which it was made payable; that the notary, at the request of the bank, presented the note at the store-house of the maker, and demanded payment of his clerk, and that the maker had no balance to his credit, in the bank, on the day the note became payable, the jury cannot infer that the demand of payment was made at the bank, nor that their officers were present at the bank, on that day, with the note, ready to receive the money and give up the note, nor that the officers of the bank, did, on that day, turn to their books to ascertain whether the maker had effects in the bank, to pay the note.

[See note at end of case.]

At law. Assumpsit [by the Bank of the United States] against [Joseph Smith] the indorser of Richard Young's promissory note, at sixty days, for $506.44, dated 17th May, 1817, payable to the defendant, or order, at the office of discount and deposit, at Washington. At the trial, in November term, 1820, when it appeared, in evidence, that the demand of payment was made by the notary at the store of the maker, and no evidence of any demand at the office of discount and deposit,

Mr. Taylor, for the plaintiffs, became nonsuit.

Mr. Lear, for the plaintiffs, at the same term, moved the court to strike out the nonsuit and reinstate the cause, and cited the following authorities: Chitty, 263, 264, in a note; Saunderson v. Judge, 2 H. Bl. 509; Berkshire Bank v. Jones, 6 Mass. 524; Woodbridge v. Brigham, 12 Mass. 403; Nicholls v. Bowes, 2 Camp. 498; Wild v. Rennards, 1 Camp. 425, note; Fenton v. Goundry, 2 Camp. 656; Lyon v. Sundius, 1 Camp. 423; Herring v. Sanger, 3 Johns. Cas. 71; Sanderson v. Bowes, 14 East, 500; Dickinson v. Bowes, 16 East, 110; Howe v. Bowes, Id. 112; Huffam v. Ellis, in the house of lords, 3 Taunt. 415; Bowes v. Howe, 5 Taunt. 30; Foden v. Sharp, 4 Johns. 183; Lang v. Brailsford, 1 Bay, 222; Parker v. Gordon, 7 East, 385; and Fenton v. Goundry, 13 East, 459.

Mr. Swann, contra, cited 4 Johns. 183, in notis, and the cases there cited.

---

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

[2] [Reversed in 11 Wheat. (24 U. S.) 171.]

THE COURT, (MORSELL, Circuit Judge, contra,) considering the question as very important, and that the cause could not be brought before the supreme court, upon a non-suit, reinstated the cause, without prejudice to the question intended to be argued upon the sufficiency of the demand to charge the indorser.

The cause came on for trial again at May term, 1821, when the defendant demurred to the evidence, and the plaintiffs joined in demurrer.

At November term, 1821, the demurrer was argued by Mr. Swann and Mr. Hewitt for the defendant, and Mr. Lear, for the plaintiffs.

Mr. Lear cited, in addition to the other cases, Ambrose v. Hopwood, 2 Taunt. 61; Sanderson v. Bowes, 14 East, 499; and, at May term, 1822, he cited Gibson v. Hunter, 2 H. Bl. 187, 211, as to the inferences which the jury may draw upon a demurrer to evidence; and Tidd, Pr. 914, that, on demurrer to evidence, no advantage can be taken of error in pleading; and, as to sufficiency of notice, Chit. Bills, 234; Reedy v. Seixas, 2 Johns. Cas. 337; Smith v. Whiting, 12 Mass. 6; and Bank of U. S. v. Norwood, 1 Har. & J. 423.

THE COURT, having taken time for consideration, delivered the following opinion, (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent:)

This is an action of assumpsit against the indorser of Richard Young's promissory note, "payable at the office of discount and deposit, Washington, without offset."

The declaration avers that Richard Young, on the 17th of May, 1817, "made his promissory note, by which he promised to pay, sixty days after date, to the order of the said Joseph Smith, 506 dollars and 44 cents, for value received, payable at the office of discount and deposit, at Washington, without offset," &c., and sets forth the indorsement in the usual form; and the plaintiffs aver that, at the expiration of the said sixty days, the time limited, that is to say, on the 19th day of July, 1817, they presented the said note to the said maker, for payment, who then and there refused to pay the same, of which said indorsement, so made on said note as aforesaid, and the said non-payment, he, the said defendant afterwards, to wit, on, &c., had notice, by means whereof, &c. Upon the trial of the general issue, the defendant demurred to the evidence, which was as follows: After setting forth the promissory note and the indorsement by the defendant, and that it was discounted at the office of discount and deposit of the Bank of the United States, at Washington, the demurrer states the protest, (the facts stated in which were admitted to be true,) and in which Mr. Nourse, the notary, stated, that on the 19th of July, 1817, at the request of the president and directors of the office of discount and deposit of the Bank of the United States, in the city of Washington, he presented, at the store of Richard Young, the original promissory note, and demanded payment of his clerk, whereunto he replied, that Mr. Young was not within, and that he could not pay it. That the plaintiffs then offered, in evidence, the deposition of the said Mr. Nourse, in which he testified, that on the 19th of July, 1817, he put into the post-office of Washington city, after the closing of the mail for that day, a letter directed to Joseph Smith, Alexandria, informing him that a note, drawn by Richard Young, dated 17th of May, 1817, for $506.44, and by him and W. M. Chick indorsed, was due and had not been paid. That the plaintiffs also offered, in evidence, the deposition of Samuel J. Potts, bookkeeper of the office of discount and deposit, at Washington, dated December 1st, 1820, in which he states, that on the 19th of July, 1817, when the note of Richard Young, indorsed by the defendant and W. M. Chick, became due, there was no balance to the credit of the drawer or either of the indorsers, on the books of the said office.

In the argument upon the demurrer, it was contended, on the part of the defendant, that it was not necessary for the plaintiffs to prove that the payment was demanded of the maker of the note at the office of discount and deposit, at Washington, where the note was, on its face, made payable; and that, from the evidence given at the trial, as stated in the demurrer, the jury could not infer a demand at that place. To this the plaintiff's counsel answered, that when a note is made payable at a bank, it is only necessary for the officers of the bank to turn to the books of the bank, and if they find no money to the credit of the maker, they need not make any demand of payment; and for this, he cited the case of Saunderson v. Judge, 2 H. Bl. 509, in which case there was a memorandum at the foot of the note, signed by the maker, in which he stated that he would pay it at the house of Saunderson & Co., with whom he had a cash account. Before the note became payable, it became the property of Saunderson & Co., who were bankers. No demand of payment was made of the maker. The court held, that as they, at whose house the note was to be paid, were themselves the holders of it, it was a sufficient demand for them to turn to their books and see the maker's account with them, and a sufficient refusal to find that he had no effects in their hands. The court also held, that, as the place of payment was not inserted in the body of the note, it was not necessary, in the declaration, to aver a demand at that place. He also cited the case of Berkshire Bank v. Jones, 6 Mass. 524, in which Mr. C. J. Parsons says, "The note was payable on a day and at a place certain; and the place is the bank—the plaintiff's bank. A demand of payment need not be made at any other place, and if the holder of the note is at the bank, on the prescribed day, ready to receive the money, if the maker be there, it is enough for him; and if the maker does not come to the bank, or direct the payment there, he has broken his promise, and no other notice to him is necessary. In the case at bar, as the plaintiffs held this note, we must presume it was in their bank, and there it was made payable. They were not to look up Gleson, (the maker,) or to demand payment of him at any other place. The defendant, by his indorsement, guaranteed that, on the day of payment, the maker would be at the bank and pay the note, and that if he did not pay it there, he agreed that he would be answerable in a suit at law, without previous notice of the default of the promisor." (The defendant had waived notice, but not demand.) "If, on the trial, the plaintiffs can show that, on the day of payment, the note was in the bank, and that the servants or officers of the plaintiffs were there during the usual bank hours, to receive payment and give up the note, they will be entitled to recover, as, by the terms of the note, they were not holden to demand payment but at the bank, which was impracticable, through the default of the maker; and by the defendant's waiver, he cannot claim notice." The plaintiff's counsel also cited the case of Woodbridge v. Brigham, 12 Mass. 403, which recognizes the law as laid down in the Case of the Berkshire Bank.

The court may admit the law to be correctly stated in these cases, and yet the plaintiffs may not be entitled to judgment in the present case. In order to support an averment of a demand at the bank, it may be sufficient to prove that, on the day for payment of the note, the plaintiffs turned to their books and found that the maker of the note had no effects in their hands, or that they were the holders of the note, on that day, and were ready, at their bank, during the usual bank hours, to receive the money and give up the note; but such evidence will not supply the want of an averment in the declaration that the demand was made at the bank. The judgment of the court must be given upon the whole record, and if the court see such a defect in the declaration as would be good ground to arrest the judgment, or as would be a fatal defect upon general demurrer, they must refuse to surrender judgment for the plaintiffs, upon the demurrer to the evidence. The declaration states that the note was made payable at the office of discount and deposit; at Washington. The demand alleged in the declaration is simply a demand on the maker. It is not averred to be according to the tenor and effect of the note; nor does the averment contain any words from which it can be inferred that the demand was made at the office of discount and deposit. In the case of Sanderson v. Bowes, 14 East, 507, it was decided, that when a note is (in the body of it) made payable at a particular place, a demand at that place is a condition precedent; and that the want of an averment of such a demand, in the declaration, is fatal upon the general demurrer, even in an action against the maker of the note. The same point was again decided in the case of Dickinson v. Bowes, 16 East, 110, and recognized by the house of lords, in the case of Huffam v. Ellis, 3 Taunt. 415, in 1811, upon a writ of error, where the bill was accepted, payable at a particular place, that is, at the house of certain persons using the names, style, and firm of Kensington, Styan, and Adams. The plaintiffs, in their declaration averred that "the said bill was shown and presented to the persons so using the names, style, and firm of Kensington, Styan and Adams, for payment thereof, according to the tenor and effect of the said bill, and the said acceptance thereof, and the several indorsements so made thereon." The judgment in the king's bench was for the plaintiffs; and, upon the writ of error, it was argued that the averment could not be true unless it was presented for payment at the place where, by the tenor of the acceptance, it was made payable; and is equivalent to a direct averment thereof, in terms. The judgment of the king's bench was affirmed, upon the ground that the declaration did substantially contain an averment that the demand was made at the place where, by the acceptance, it was made payable.

The court is further of opinion, that there is no evidence, stated in the demurrer, from which the jury can infer that the demand was made at the bank; nor that the plaintiffs, by their officers, were present at the bank on the day of payment, with the note, ready to receive the money and give up the note; nor that the officers of the bank did on that day turn to their books to ascertain whether the maker had effects in bank to pay the note. We are therefore of opinion that judgment, on the demurrer, must be rendered for the defendant.

This judgment was reversed by the supreme court of the United States, in 1826, 11 Wheat. [24 U. S.] 171.

[NOTE. In reversing this decision the supreme court held that, where recourse is had to the indorsers of a note made payable at a bank which is the holder thereof at the time the same is payable, it is a presentment, and, if the maker has no funds in the bank, it is a refusal of payment; also, that an averment in the declaration, or proof on the trial, of a demand of payment at the place designated, was unnecessary. Further, the court stated, per Mr. Justice Thompson, that, to entitle plaintiffs to recover, they "were bound to show that they were the indorsees and holders of the note; that the note was at the bank where it was made payable at the time it fell due; that the maker had no funds there to pay the note; and that due notice of the default of the maker was given to the defendant." Bank of U. S. v. Smith, 11 Wheat. (24 U. S.) 171.]

Case No. 936.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES v. SMITH.

[4 Cranch, C. C. 712.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. March Term, 1836.

NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS—APPLICATION OF SECURITY—DISTRESS—SET-OFF.

1. If a creditor takes a security, by deed of trust, of personal property, for a debt due to him by an indorsed promissory note, and the debtor becomes tenant of the creditor, and rent is in arrear, and the creditor, who is the landlord, distrains the goods conveyed to the trustee, as security for the payment of the note, and the same goods are sold under the distress, and the proceeds paid over to the landlord, he is bound to apply the proceeds to the payment of the note, although the goods were found on the premises, at the time of the distress, the same being there, by the consent of the landlord, as security for the note; and these facts are admissible, in evidence, on the part of the defendant, who is sued as indorser of the note.

2. But, at law, the amount of the set-off cannot exceed the proceeds of the sales actually received by the plaintiff.

At law. Assumpsit against [Fleet Smith] the defendant, as indorser of John Strother's promissory note, for $6,023.22, dated 1st October, 1830, payable to the defendant, or order, in one year, with interest from the date. The plaintiffs having given evidence of the execution and indorsement of the note, and of due demand and notice to the defendant, it was read in evidence to the jury.

The defendant then offered, in evidence, a deed of trust, dated 1st October, 1830, executed by John Strother, the maker of the note, to Richard Smith, cashier of the office of discount and deposit of the Bank of the United States, at Washington, of all the household furniture, &c., of the tenement called the City Hotel, in Washington, a schedule and appraisement of which was annexed to the deed, in trust, that if Strother should fail to pay the note when payable, the said Richard Smith should sell the property at public vendue, and apply the net proceeds to the payment of the note, and that Strother should, in the mean time, retain the possession; and Strother agreed to account for the goods, at the appraisement. The defendant also offered evidence that the goods were of the value therein stated; that the plaintiffs, by their proper officers and agents, might have taken the said property and applied it to the satisfaction of the note, immediately upon its protest; that the said Richard Smith, in all the proceedings respecting the said deed of trust, acted as the officer and agent of the bank, and with its privity; that, with the sanction and privity of the bank, he permitted the property to remain in the use and possession of Elizabeth W. Strother, wife of the said John Strother, after he had left the District of Columbia, and gone to the western country, from which he never returned; when the bank, by their duly-constituted agent, levied a distress on the same, for rent accrued after the execution of the said deed, and after the protest of the said note, under a demise from them to the said Strother, of the house, &c., wherein the said property was at the time of the execution of the said deed, and wherein it continued till the said distress.

That on the 5th of October, 1830, the plaintiffs had caused the said Strother to give two specific securities for the said rent; to wit, a deed from the said John Strother and wife, and Thomas R. Miller, to the said Richard Smith, of five slaves, and a deed of the same date, from Lucy E. Fendall, to the said Richard Smith, for three slaves, each of which deeds authorized the said Richard Smith to sell the said slaves, respectively, in case of the non-payment of the rent, when due. That all the property mentioned in the said deed of the 1st of October, 1830, remaining on the premises when the distress was levied, was sold under the said distress, by the bailiff of the bank, by their direction, and the whole proceeds paid over by him, to the bank; and that, on the 4th of October, 1831, when the said note was protested, and ever after, until such distress and sale, all the said property remained at the disposal of the bank and its proper officers and agents, and subject to their exclusive control and management; and that the bank, through such, its proper officers and agents, might, at any time after such protest, have caused the same to be disposed of, and the proceeds applied to the payment of the said note; that the leaving of the said property in the hands of the said Elizabeth W. Strother, and in her use, from the time of the protest of the said note, till such distress and sale for rent, was with the knowledge and consent of the proper officers and agents of the bank, legally acting in its behalf, in the matter.

To the admissibility of the evidence thus offered by the defendant, the plaintiffs objected; but THE COURT (nem. con.) overruled the objection, and permitted the evidence to be given to the jury; and the plaintiffs took a bill of exceptions. After some further evidence, given, both on the part of the defendant and of the plaintiff,

Mr. Coxe, the counsel for the plaintiff, moved the court to instruct the jury, that if they shall believe, from the evidence, that the note on which the suit is brought, was indorsed by the defendant, and that payment was duly demanded, and the said note protested for non-payment, and due notice thereof given to the defendant, as indorser thereof, then the plaintiff is entitled to recover; and that the circumstances given in evidence, as to the distress by the plaintiff, for rent due on the premises, and the sale under the said distress, of the property mentioned in the deed of trust of October 1st, 1830, and the receipt of the proceeds of such sale by the plaintiff, do not amount to payment, either in whole or in part, of the said note. Which instruction THE COURT refused to give, and the plaintiffs took their second bill of exceptions.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

The defendant's counsel, Mr. Jones, then claimed for him; first, a credit against the said note for the full value of all the said property upon which the said distress was levied, though such value should exceed what the property produced at the sale; secondly, a credit for the value of so much of the property conveyed by the said first deed of trust as the jury may, from the evidence, find that the plaintiffs might, with reasonable diligence, have had brought to sale, under the said deed, and which was lost or destroyed by the fault and negligence of the plaintiffs.

But THE COURT, at the instance of the plaintiffs' counsel, decided, and so instructed the jury, that the defendant was not entitled, at law, to any such credit for more than the money actually received by the bank, for the proceeds of the sales so made, under the said distress and deed of trust. To which instruction the defendant excepted.

Mr. Coxe, for the plaintiffs, in order to show that the plaintiffs had a right to distrain the goods conveyed to Mr. Richard Smith, in trust to secure payment of the note, cited Bradb. Dist. (2d Ed.) c. 4, p. 73; Comyn, Landl. & T. 382, 383; Newman v. Anderton, 2 Bos. & P. (N. R.) 224; Davies v. Powell, Willes, 46; and Buckley v. Taylor, 2 Term R. 600.

Mr. Jones and Mr. Dunlop, contra, contended that where goods are on the premises for a certain purpose, with the consent of the landlord, they are not liable to distress for rent. These goods were left on the premises, with the plaintiffs' consent, for the security of a certain debt for which the defendant was surety. Besides, the bank, which was in effect the trustee under the deed made to their cashier, was bound to preserve the trust-fund to pay the specific debt charged upon it. Fowkes v. Joyce, 2 Vern. 129; Tate v. Gleed, 2 Wms. Saund. 290, note 7.

The net proceeds of the sales under the distress were $1,262.04, which the jury deducted from the amount of the note, and gave their verdict for the balance, $5,087.51. No writ of error has been prosecuted.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES, (SWAN v.) See Case No. 13,668.

Case No. 937.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES v. SWANN.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 368.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov. Term, 1822.

NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS—DISHONOR — TIME OF NOTICE TO INDORSER.

Notice to the indorser, put into the post-office at Washington, for the defendant in Alexandria, on the day after the last day of grace, after the closing of the mail of that day, is too late.

[See Seventh Ward Bank v. Hanrick, Case No. 12,678; Fullerton v. Bank of U. S., 1 Pet. (26 U. S.) 604; Lenox v. Roberts, 2 Wheat. (15 U. S.) 373; Bank of Alexandria v. Swann, 9 Pet. (34 U. S.) 33.]

At law. Assumpsit against [Thomas Swann] the indorser of a promissory note due 11th–14th December, 1819.

The notice to the indorser, who lived in Alexandria, was put into the post-office at Washington, on the 15th of December, after the mail of that day for Alexandria had been closed.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent) said it was too late. Non-pros.

Case No. 938.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES v. VAN NESS et al.

[5 Cranch, C. C. 294.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. March Term, 1837.[2]

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA — JURISDICTION OF MARYLAND—EQUITY—DEED BY GUARDIAN AD LITEM.

1. On the 26th of October, 1801, after congress had, by the act of the 27th of February, 1801, [2 Stat. 103, c. 15,] exercised exclusive legislation over the District of Columbia, the chancellor of Maryland had jurisdiction to decree a conveyance, by an infant, of lands in that district, in pursuance of a contract made by the ancestor of the infant; the suit, for a specific performance, having been commenced before congress had exercised such exclusive legislation.

[See note at end of case.]

2. The chancellor of Maryland, on the 26th of October, 1801, decreed that the infant, Marcia Burns, should, in a certain event, by W. M. D., her guardian ad litem, convey to J. P. V., the purchaser, the property in question. Upon the happening of the event, a deed, purporting to be from the infant by her guardian, and concluding thus: "In witness whereof the said Marcia," (the infant,) "by W. M. D., her guardian in this case, hath hereunto set her hand and seal the day and year before mentioned," was signed by the said W. M. D., "guardian of the said Marcia Burns," and sealed with his seal. The commissioner who took the acknowledgment certified that the said W. M. D. acknowledged the instrument to be "his act and deed as guardian aforesaid, and thereby the act and deed of the said Marcia." Held, that this deed, thus signed, sealed, delivered, acknowledged, and duly recorded, was a good and sufficient execution of the decree, and a good deed to pass the title to the purchaser; and that if it be not, yet by the act of Maryland of 1785, c. 72, § 14, the decree itself stands as a conveyance.

[See note at end of case.]

At law. Ejectment [by the lessee of the Bank of the United States against John P. Van Ness and William Jones] for lots 6 and 7 in the square 226 in the city of Washington.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

[2] [Affirmed in 13 Pet. (38 U. S.) 17.]

Upon the trial the plaintiffs offered in evidence an exemplification of the record of the proceedings and decree of the chancellor of Maryland in a suit by Isaac Polock v. Marcia Burns, the infant heir at law of David Burns, deceased, for the specific execution of a contract entered into, in writing, in the lifetime of the said David Burns, for the sale of sundry house lots in the city of Washington to the said Isaac Polock; in which suit, which was commenced on the 17th of May, 1800, the chancellor, on the 1st of November, 1800, decreed that upon the complainant's securing to the satisfaction of the chancellor the sum of £10,471 18s. 1d., to be paid on the 17th of April, 1804, with interest annually, the defendant, by W. M. D., her guardian, should convey to the complainant, Isaac Polock, in fee, certain lots in Washington, particularly described in the decree, and including the lots now in controversy.

On the 15th of May, 1801, the complainant, Polock, filed a petition for a commission to certain persons to value certain lands, which he offered to mortgage as security for the purchase-money; which commission was issued on the 26th of May, 1801, and returned on the 21st of October, 1801. On the 26th of October, 1801, the chancellor, being satisfied of the sufficiency of the security offered, decreed, with consent of all the parties, that, upon the complainant's executing the mortgages, and paying up the interest, "the defendant, Marcia Burns, by William Mayne Duncauson, her guardian, shall execute a conveyance to the complainant, Isaac Polock, and his heirs, as directed by the decree in this cause, passed on the first day of November last." On the 12th of January, 1802, a deed was executed by the guardian, William M. Duncauson, to Polock, of the lots mentioned in the decree. It purported to be a deed from Marcia Burns, by her guardian, W. M. D., to Isaac Polock, in fee, and recited the substance of the proceedings and decree; and averred that the security had been approved, the mortgages duly executed, and the interest paid up. It concluded thus: "In witness whereof the said Marcia Burns, by William M. Duncauson, her guardian in this case, hath hereunto set her hand and seal the day and year above written." It was signed "William M. Duncauson, guardian of Marcia Burns," and was sealed.

The commissioner, Alexander White, Esq., who took the acknowledgment, certified that said William M. Duncauson, guardian of Marcia Burns, as aforesaid, acknowledged the instrument to be "his act and deed as guardian as aforesaid, and thereby the act and deed of the said Marcia." The deed was duly recorded. The plaintiffs claimed title under this deed.

The defendant's counsel, Mr. Marbury and Mr. R. S. Coxe, objected to the admission in evidence of the record of the proceedings and decree in the case of Polock v. Burns, and contended that after the 27th of February, 1801, when congress began to exercise exclusive legislation over the district, the chancellor of Maryland could not pass any decree which should affect lands in the district. That although the suit was commenced before this part of the district was completely severed from the state of Maryland, yet no decree, passed after that separation, could be executed here, except in the manner provided in the 13th section of the act of the 27th February, 1801, [2 Stat. 107,] "concerning the District of Columbia," namely, by execution issuing from this court upon an exemplication of the record of the proceedings in the suit in the court of chancery of Maryland. That the decree could not operate here proprio vigore. The deed from Duncauson to Polock was also objected to, on the ground that the guardian's authority had ceased by the transfer of the jurisdiction from the state of Maryland to the United States; for the same reason that letters of administration taken out in Maryland before the separation, did not authorize the administrator to sue in this court after the separation. Fenwick v. Sears, 1 Cranch, [5 U. S.] 259. It was also contended, that the deed was not executed in the name of the infant, Marcia Burns, but in Duncauson's own name; he signed his own name only, and affixed his own seal only, and acknowledged it to be his own deed only,—not the deed of the infant. An attorney who executes and acknowledges a deed for his principal, must execute and acknowledge it in the name of his principal, not in his own name for his principal. Clarke v. Courtney, 5 Pet. [30 U. S.] 320.

Mr. Redin, contra, cited the Maryland act of 1773, c. 7, § 1, by which it is enacted that "persons under age," "seized of any lands," &c., "bound by an agreement to convey," "on a suit for specific performance or execution of such agreement, shall, by direction of the court of chancery," "convey and assure any such lands," &c., "in such manner as the court shall, by such order, direct, to any other person or persons; and such conveyances and assurances shall be as good in law as if such infant" "were of age." He cited also the Maryland act of October, 1778, c. 22, § 2, by which it is enacted that infants, in such cases, shall "be bound and concluded by any deed or deeds, conveyance or conveyances, assurance or assurances, made by their guardian or guardians, (to be appointed by the said court,) in pursuance of the order of the court of chancery, and such deed," &c., "so made, shall be as good and effectual in law, as if such infant or infants were, at the time of making thereof, of full age, and had executed the same."

THE COURT (nem. con.) overruled the objections, being of opinion that the court of chancery of Maryland had jurisdiction and authority to pass the decree of the 26th of October, 1801.

THE COURT, also, (CRANCH, Chief

Judge, doubting,) was of opinion, that the deed of the 12th of January, 1802, made by the guardian, was a good execution of the decree, and passed the legal title to Polock.

THE COURT was also of opinion, (nem. con.) that if that deed did not convey the legal title of the lots to Polock, the decree itself, under the Maryland act of 1785, c. 72, § 14, stands as a conveyance, and passed the title.

One of the demises laid in the declaration was by the heirs of Benjamin Stoddert, under which the plaintiff offered in evidence two deeds from Isaac Polock to Charles Lowndes; one from Charles Lowndes to Walter Smith, in trust, and one from Walter Smith to Benjamin Stoddert. To the admission of which deeds the defendant objected, on the ground that the last-mentioned deed was not made in conformity with the terms of the trust.

But THE COURT (nem. con.) overruled the objection, and the deeds were read in evidence.

The verdict was for the plaintiffs. The defendants took their bills of exception, and carried the cause to the supreme court, where the judgment was affirmed on the 22d of January, 1839.

[NOTE. This decision was affirmed by the supreme court on the grounds, with others, that it was intended, by the agreement between the state of Maryland and the United States, that pending suits as to property in that portion of the District of Columbia ceded by the state should be proceeded with until decree, and that such decrees should have the same effect as if the sovereignty had not been transferred. Furthermore, the court held that the execution and acknowledgment of the conveyance were valid; Taney, C. J., stating that, as the deed substantially conformed, in the manner of its execution, to the directions contained in the decree, it was valid and effectual to convey the property therein mentioned. Van Ness v. Bank of U. S., 13 Pet. (38 U. S.) 17.]

Case No. 939.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES v. VOORHEES et al.

[1 McLean, 221.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Ohio. July Term, 1834.[2]

JUDGMENT PURCHASER — COLLATERAL ATTACK ON HIS TITLE.

1. A judgment of a court of general jurisdiction, having cognizance of a particular case, will protect the purchaser under the judgment, however erroneous it may be.

[Cited in Doe v. Litherberry, Case No. 13,251.]

[See note at end of case.]

2. The levy of a foreign attachment under the law of Ohio, gives jurisdiction to the court.

3. The court of common pleas is a court of general jurisdiction. Much may be presumed in favor of the proceedings of such a court.

[See note at end of case.]

4. A purchaser is not bound to look into the record, to see whether errors have not occurred, for which the judgment may be reversed. These matters are never examinable where the judgment comes before the court collaterally.

[See note at end of case.]

5. The court of common pleas having taken jurisdiction in an attachment by the levy of the writ, the subsequent proceedings cannot divest the jurisdiction, though erroneous. The purchaser under the judgment is protected by it.

[Cited in Doe v. Litherberry, Case No. 13,251.]

[See note at end of case.]

6. The deed of the auditors may be made to the purchaser at the sale, or to his order.

[See note at end of case.]

[At law. Action of ejectment by the Bank of the United States against John Voorhees and others. Judgment for plaintiff.]

Caswell & Starr, for plaintiff.

Mr. Chase, for defendants.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This action of ejectment is brought to recover a tract of land in Hamilton county. The title of the plaintiff is founded on the proceedings in a certain writ of attachment in the court of common pleas against Seth Cutter, commenced in Hamilton county, in 1807, and under which the land was sold in 1808, by auditors appointed, who made their return in 1808. And at the August term following the sale was confirmed by the court. The land was sold, as appears by the return, to William Stanley and the deed was executed to Woodward and Foster. And on the same day Woodward and Foster conveyed the land to Stanley. By sundry mesne conveyances the land was conveyed to the Bank of the United States. The defendants are in possession under Seth Cutter, the defendant in the attachment, and claim under conveyances from him. And the question for the decision of the court is, whether the proceedings under the attachment divested the title of Seth Cutter to the land attached.

On the part of the defendants it is contended that they did not, on account of manifest irregularities in the proceedings which rendered them null and void. The statute requires that before a writ of attachment shall issue, an affidavit shall be made of the debt due, and that the defendant has absconded, &c., or is not a resident of the state. An advertisement in some newspaper in the state, giving notice of the attachment, &c. is required to be published three months, before judgment can be entered on the attachment. No judgment can be rendered against the defendant until the third term, at each of which terms he is required to be called three times and defaulted. No sale, by the auditors appointed by the court, can be made, in less than twelve months from the return of the attachment. Before the sale of the land attached, the auditors are required to give notice by advertisement fifteen days.

[1] [Reported by Hon. John McLean, Circuit Justice.]

[2] [Affirmed in 10 Pet. (35 U. S.) 449.]

The defendants contend that it does not appear from the record that any of these essential requisites have been complied with; and consequently the judgment and sale of the land are void. That this is a proceeding in derogation of the common law, a special jurisdiction created by the statute, and that to render the proceeding valid it is necessary to show that every step has been taken as required by the statute. That nothing short of this can divest the title of the defendant in the attachment. And that as any essential defect in the proceeding vitiates the whole, advantage may be taken of it collaterally, when the record is offered in evidence.

It is true that there is a well defined distinction between the proceedings of courts which have a general and those which have a special jurisdiction. The latter must show their jurisdiction upon the face of their proceedings, but the former take jurisdiction of all cases as a matter of course, unless in due time, the want of jurisdiction shall be set up by plea. The court of common pleas, before which this proceeding was had, is a court of general jurisdiction. And the first question that arises when the judgment of such a court is offered in evidence as the foundation of title is, whether the court had jurisdiction of the case. The subject matter is embraced within the general powers of the court; but has the defendant been served with process, or has a notice been published, or such proceeding had, as authorized the court to take cognizance of the matter? This is not a proceeding against the person of the defendant, but against the property levied on by the attachment. It is substantially a proceeding in rem, and the property is bound from the service of the attachment.

But, it is objected that the statute provides, no attachment shall issue unless an affidavit has been made, and that in this record there is no affidavit. It is not material to enquire whether this affidavit should constitute a part of the record or not; the law provides that if the clerk issue the writ without an affidavit, "such writ shall be quashed, on motion, at the proper cost of the clerk issuing the same." And independent of the presumption which arises in favor of the regularity of the writ, from no such motion having been made, and the general powers of the court, it may well be doubted whether advantage can be taken of such a defect, except by motion as the statute provides. But if the omission to file an affidavit be an error, for which the judgment should be reversed, by an appellate court, still it does not follow that the judgment for this cause, is a nullity. The record states that the plaintiff "has sufficiently testified to the judges of our court of common pleas, that Seth Cutter, who is not now residing in the state is indebted, &c." This shows that the affidavit was made, and the substance of it contained in the record. What more can be required by the most technical rule? The court were the judges of the sufficiency of the affidavit. The levy of the attachment brings the case within the jurisdiction of the court. For the law so far as the property attached is concerned, has substituted it for a personal service.

The court having acquired jurisdiction of the case, it cannot be divested by any error in the subsequent proceedings. The judgment may be erroneous and reversible in a court of errors, but it cannot be treated as void. And unless it be void, the purchase under it is protected. It would be a monstrous doctrine, to hold a purchaser responsible for the errors of the court. He is a stranger, generally, to the proceedings; and in making his purchase, relies upon the judgment of a court of general jurisdiction. Such a rule would operate most injuriously to defendants, as the precariousness of the title, would take from their property, sold under a judgment, more than half its value. But the rule is well settled that errors of proceeding in the court, do not affect the title of the purchaser. The record does not show that the pendency of the attachment was advertised as the statute requires; but, if it were necessary, this might fairly be presumed. But it is not deemed necessary to examine minutely the objections made to the judgment. They are not now properly examinable. And the time has long since transpired when they could be examined on a writ of error. Simms v. Slacum, 3 Cranch, [7 U. S.] 300; Hylton v. Brown, [Cases Nos. 6,980-6,982;] Wheaton v. Sexton, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 506; Elliott v. Peirsol, 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 340; Tayloe v. Thomson, 5 Pet. [30 U. S.] 370; Hartshorn v. Wilson, 2 Ohio, 28; 6 Ohio, 268; 5 Ohio, 500; Allen v. Parish, 3 Ohio, 190; Ludlow v. Wade, 5 Ohio, 501; Ludlow v. McBride, 3 Ohio, 257. In the case of Thompson v. Tolmie, 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 157, the doctrine applicable to this case is examined. The court appointed the auditors, and directed the sale of the land, and on the return of the sale, they confirmed it, and authorized a deed to be executed. Now the court exercised their judgment on all these matters, and does not that afford evidence, that they were regularly transacted? The record does not show that the steps required were not taken; then is not the presumption fair that they were taken? at all events, on a collateral examination of the record. The statute does not provide that the title shall not be good, unless the requisites of the statute shall be complied with. And if the judgment be not a nullity, however erroneous it may be, the purchase under it is clearly good. In the case of Tayloe v. Thomson, 5 Pet. [30 U. S.] 370, the court held the title of a purchaser of a term of years, under a fieri facias, good, though the defendant was at the same time, and in the same case, charged in execution under a ca. sa. The doctrine is fully sustained in [Blaine v. The Charles Carter,] 4

Cranch, [8 U. S.] 328; [Wheaton v. Sexton,] 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 506.

The objection that the conveyance was made to Woodward and Foster, instead of Stanley, the purchaser at the sale, seems not to be entitled to much consideration. If this be a matter of contest, it must arise between the purchaser and the persons who received the conveyance. So Cutter was in no respect prejudiced by the act, it is not perceived how he can complain. He has received the consideration for which the land sold, and it can be a matter of no importance to him, whether the land was conveyed to the purchaser or to some other person. The title has passed out of the defendant by operation of law, and the right to it may be a matter of controversy arising out of acts subsequent to the sale. But no objection is perceived to the deed as made to Woodward and Foster. Whether it was so made on the order of the purchaser or not, is not material; as it appears on the same day the auditors executed the deed, Woodward and Foster conveyed the land to Stanley. From this fact it may be presumed that the conveyance was first made to Woodward and Foster with the consent or at the request of Stanley, and he immediately afterwards received the conveyance from them. No objection is perceived to the auditor's or the sheriff's making a deed to any individual at the request of the purchaser at the sale, provided the act is done in good faith. This case was taken to the supreme court on a writ of error, and the judgment of the circuit court was affirmed. [Voorhees v. Jackson,] 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 449.

[NOTE. The supreme court, per Mr. Justice Baldwin, in affirming this decision, assigned as its reasons that, the court of common pleas of Ohio, at the time of the proceedings, being a court of general civil jurisdiction, its record proved itself without reference to the evidence upon which the adjudication was made; that the judgment itself was evidence of the right of the plaintiff to the thing adjudged, and that any error of the court in rendering the judgment, however apparent, could only be examined by the appellate court, and not in a collateral proceeding; that the order of sale was a lawful authority to the auditors to sell, executed by virtue of the authority vested in the court, and the deed by the auditors passed the title to the premises in controversy to the purchaser. Voorhees v. Jackson, 10 Pet. (35 U. S.) 449.]

Case No. 940.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES v. WASHINGTON.

[3 Cranch, C. C. 295.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May Term, 1828.

BANKING—PAYMENT OF CHECK—EVIDENCE OF FUNDS—WITNESS—PRIVILEGE.

1. Payment of a check by a bank is prima facie evidence of funds, and that the apparent state of the funds upon the books of the bank justified the payment; and it is incumbent upon the bank to prove the error if there was any.

[See Bank of Alexandria v. McCrea, Case No. 849; Bank of U. S. v. Wilson, Id. 943.]

2. A bookkeeper of a bank is not obliged to answer a question, the answer to which, might charge himself with the loss.

At law. Assumpsit [by the Bank of the United States against George C. Washington] for money had and received by an overdraft paid by the bank by mistake, owing to wrong addition. The plaintiffs proved all the debit side of their account which consisted of checks drawn by the defendant and paid by the plaintiffs. They proved also that it was their usual practice to pay according to the apparent funds in their leger without examining further into the actual state of the funds.

THE COURT was of opinion that the payment of the checks by the bank is prima facie evidence of funds; and CRANCH, Chief Judge, and THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, were of opinion that the payment of the checks by the bank was also prima facie evidence that the apparent state of the funds upon the books justified the payment, and that it was incumbent on the plaintiffs to prove error in the account, upon the apparent balance of which the check was paid.

The plaintiffs then offered Mr. C. W. Forrest, (who was bookkeeper of the bank at the time,) and asked him whether, at the time a certain check for $1,900 was drawn, the account upon the leger showed a balance to that amount or more in favor of the defendant.

The witness objected to answer this question, because the bank had sued him upon his bond, intending to charge him with the balance of this account, so that he cannot answer, in one way, without charging himself.

THE COURT (nem. con.) refused to compel the witness to answer the question. Verdict for the defendant.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

Case No. 941.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES v. WATTERSTON.

[4 Cranch, C. C. 445.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. March Term, 1834.

NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS—NOTICE OF DISHONOR—MISTAKE IN DATE OF NOTE.

A mistake in [the recital of] the date of the note will not invalidate the notice given to an indorser.

[See Bank of Alexandria v. Swann, 9 Pet. (34 U. S.) 33.]

At law. Assumpsit [by the Bank of the United States] against [George Watterston] an indorser. The notice left by the notary with the defendant was of a note dated in 1832, when the true note was dated in 1830. In all other respects the notice was correct.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

THE COURT (nem. con.) was of opinion upon the authority of Mills v. Bank of U. S., 11 Wheat. [24 U. S.] 431, that the notice was sufficient.

Judgment for the plaintiff.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES, (WHITING v.) See Case No. 17,576.

Case No. 942.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES v. WILLIAMS.

[3 Cranch, C. C. 240.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. Term, 1827.

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS—PROBATE PRACTICE—AUDITOR'S REPORT — EVIDENCE — EXCEPTIONS.

The report of the auditor under the Maryland act of 1785, c. 80, is prima facie evidence of the amount due, upon the principles and evidence stated in the report; and if those principles, and that evidence, are approved by the court, so much of the report may be read to the jury, as shows the balance so stated, although before the jury is sworn, the defendant except to the evidence admitted by the auditor, and to his calculations, conclusions, and statements.

At law. Assumpsit [by the Bank of the United States against Brooke Williams, administrator of William B. Williams] for money had and received by the defendant's intestate, as second teller to the plaintiff's use. The cause had been referred to Mr. Redin, as auditor, under the act of Maryland, 1785, c. 80, § 12, whose report was filed on the 19th of December, 1825.

Mr. Jones, for the defendant, this morning, (December 31, 1827,) before the jury was sworn, filed what he called exceptions, which were as follows: "The defendant excepts to the auditor's report in this case, 1st. on the ground of the evidence and statement therein contained, and 2dly. on the ground of the calculations and conclusions drawn from the same. The defendant excepts to all and singular the evidence, examined before the auditor, both written and oral; and excepts to the auditor's statement, and report of the same. The defendant excepts to all and singular the statements, and calculations founded thereon as reported by the auditor. W. Jones, for defendant." Upon the trial he objected to the report as evidence.

But THE COURT (nem. con.) permitted the plaintiff to read the auditor's statement of the balance, which he found due upon the evidence and principles stated in his report, which evidence and principles the court is of opinion were correctly admitted and acted upon by the auditor. The part permitted by the court, to be read to the jury, was as follows: "The auditor finds and reports that the balance of loss and gain account, and the total deficiency in William B. Williams's accounts, as second teller from the 21st of May, 1818, when he commenced the duties of the office, to the 25th of August, 1819, when he ceased to perform them, is the sum of one thousand one hundred and ninety one dollars and three cents." Bills of exception were taken as in the case of the Bank of U. S. v. Johnson, at this term, [Case No. 919.] But the plaintiff became non-pros.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

Case No. 943.

BANK OF UNITED STATES v. WILSON.

[3 Cranch, C. C. 213.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. Term, 1827.

BANKS AND BANKING—PAYMENT OF CHECK—EVIDENCE—PRODUCTION OF ACCOUNT.

1. The defendant had settled his account with the plaintiffs, and paid the balance then claimed. The plaintiffs afterwards changed the entries in their books, so as to show a balance still due to the plaintiffs, and presented him an account thus stated, which the defendant refused to admit or receive as a true statement of his account, but received it only as containing the then aspect of the plaintiff's books. The court refused to compel the defendant to produce that account, at the trial, unless accompanied by the defendant's affidavit of those facts.

2. Payment of a check, by the bank upon which it is drawn, is prima facie evidence of funds; especially when the checks have been surrendered to the drawer.

[Cited in Bank of Alexandria v. McCrea, Case No. 849.]

[See Bank of U. S. v. Washington, Case No. 940.]

Notice had been given by the plaintiffs to the defendant, [James C. Wilson,] to produce his bank-book at the trial. The defendant made affidavit that no bank-book was kept for him, during the transactions; and that he paid the balance demanded of him by the bank. He admits that several years subsequently, changes were made in the entries, in the books of the bank, whereby a balance was made to appear against the defendant; that a statement of the accounts as then appearing, was tendered to the defendant, which he utterly refused to admit or receive, as a true statement of his account, and never did receive the same as such; but received it only, as containing the then present aspect of the books of the bank, and expressly denying that he owed a cent to the bank.

THE COURT ordered the account to be produced, but to be accompanied, if used in evidence, by the defendant's affidavit.

The defendant then demurred to the plaintiffs' evidence, and the plaintiffs joined in demurrer.

The plaintiffs read in evidence, to the jury, the checks drawn by the defendant on the plaintiffs, and by them paid; which checks had been cancelled by the bank, and delivered up to the defendant, upon the settlement of the account; and which had been produced by the defendant upon notice. The plaintiffs also produced evidence that it was the general practice of the bank, not to pay checks without funds; but that, sometimes, customers overdrew, and their checks were paid without funds.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

Mr. C. Cox, for the defendant, contended that acceptance of a bill or draft, is an admission of funds, prima facie; and especially when the draft is surrendered. He cited Vere v. Lewis, 3 Term. R. 182; Chit. Bills, 469, 470, 524.

Mr. Lear, contra, cited Tatlock v. Harris, 3 Term. R. 174.

THE COURT rendered judgment for the defendant, upon the demurrer to the evidence, at May term, 1827.

Case No. 944.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES v. WINSTON et al.

[2 Brock. 252.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Virginia. May Term, 1825.

JUDGMENT LIEN—SUBROGATION.

1. The lien on lands created by a judgment is given by the statute, which authorizes an elegit, and the lien depends upon the right to sue out an elegit.

[Cited in Shrew v. Jones, Case No. 12,818; Re Boyd, Id. 1,746; Massingill v. Downs, 7 How. (48 U. S.) 765; Morsell v. First Nat. Bank, 91 U. S. 360.]

[See U. S. v. Morrison, 4 Pet. (29 U. S.) 124; Burton v. Smith, 13 Pet. (38 U. S.) 464.]

2. Where money is paid by a surety for his principal, the surety is subrogated to all the rights of the creditor whose debt he has discharged. But quaere—Is this ever done in favour of a person not bound by the original security, who discharges it as a volunteer?

[Cited in Dooley v. Virginia Fire & Marine Ins. Co., Case No. 3.999.]

3. The lien of a judgment on which execution is stayed, dates, not from the rendition of the judgment, but from the time when execution may be sued out. Scriba v. Deanes, [Case No. 12,559.]

[Suit by the Bank of the United States against Winston's executors and others.]

MARSHALL, Circuit Justice.—This is an application on the part of Pleasant Winston, to be allowed the sum he has paid the commonwealth as surety for George Winston, on a judgment obtained by the commonwealth.

In the year 1818, the commonwealth of Virginia obtained a judgment against George Winston, for the sum of $17,999.24. No execution has ever issued on this judgment. Soon after its rendition, an act was passed directing that execution should be delayed, on George Winston's giving sufficient surety for the payment of the debt by instalments. In pursuance of this act, bonds for the whole amount were executed, with Pleasant Winston as surety. Before the first instalment became due, judgments were obtained by the Bank of the United States, and by several other creditors, against George Winston. He made a deed of his property for the payment of his debts, giving priority to the debt due to the state of Virginia, which has been set aside by a decree of this court as fraudulent. It being understood that the commonwealth asserted a lien on this property, under its original judgment, and also under the deed, and the commonwealth having declined becoming a party to the suit in this court, no sale was ordered, but the marshal was directed to receive the rents and profits, and to hold them subject to the order of the court. Afterwards, in the year 1824, the commonwealth instituted suit on the bonds given by Pleasant and George Winston, and obtained judgments, some of which have been paid by Pleasant Winston. He claims to stand in the place of the commonwealth, and to be paid his debt before those creditors who obtained judgments in the intervening time between the original judgment of the state against George Winston and the subsequent judgments against George and Pleasant Winston. He contends that the lien created by the original judgment still continues; that by paying a subsequent judgment on a bond given in consideration of the first, he is to be considered as having paid so much in discharge of the first, and, consequently, to be entitled to a preference over the other creditors. This claim is resisted by the other creditors on various grounds, some of which will be considered.

As the lien created by a judgment is given by the statute which authorizes an elegit, it is settled in this country that the lien depends on the right to sue out an elegit. [Eppes v. Randolph,] 2 Call, 125; 4 Hen. & M. 57.[2] This is not controverted; but it is insisted by Pleasant Winston that the commonwealth may now sue out an elegit, on the original judgment against George Winston, and that he is entitled to the priority which that right gives to the commonwealth. When this idea was first suggested, it occurred to me, and I stated to the bar, that the doctrine of subrogation or substitution was confined to sureties, and had never been applied to a mere volunteer. If an assignable instrument be transferred, its obligation

[1] [Reported by John W. Brockenbrough, Esq.]

[2] Nimmo's Ex'r v. Com. And however long the judgment may have been out of date, there is no doubt that, if susceptible of being revived at all, the lien upon the land, yet in the hands of the debtor, would be revived eodem flatu. Tucker, P., in Watts v. Kinney, 3 Leigh, 293. And where there are two judgments, and a surety, bound by the eldest judgment, pays it off, although the lien of the judgment is gone at law, equity will substitute him in the place of the creditor whose debt he has paid, and give him the benefit of his lien. The equity of the surety is superior to that of the second incumbrancer. Id.

at law and equity remains. If a security not assignable, be discharged by a surety whom it binds, equity keeps it in force in his favour, and puts such surety in the place of the original creditor. But I think there is no case in which this has been done in favour of a person not bound by the original security, who discharges it as a volunteer. I will not say that it may not be done, but if it may, equity will consider all the circumstances, and impose equitable terms. The decision of this point, is not, I think, essential to the cause.

Were it admitted that Pleasant Winston has a right to rank on the fund in the power of the court, according to the original judgment in favour of the commonwealth, the inquiry would be, whether that judgment is still a lien. The counsel for Pleasant Winston contend that it is:—1. Because the proceedings under that judgment, on the part of the commonwealth, do not amount to a stay of execution; 2. If they do, the execution may now issue, and will relate to the date of the judgment.

I shall not unnecessarily decide the first question. That may hereafter arise in a case which will depend entirely on it. I do not think this does. The second has already been decided in this court. In the case of Scriba v. Deanes, [Case No. 12,559,] this court determined that the lien of a judgment on which execution is stayed, dates, not from the time of its rendition, but from the time when execution may be sued out. I have not changed this opinion. If, then, Pleasant Winston could claim the lien created by the original judgment, his lien would be postponed to that of other creditors whose judgments were obtained before the expiration of the time, during which execution was suspended, unless it should be decided that the commonwealth could have sued out an elegit, notwithstanding the act of assembly under which the bonds were taken which bind Pleasant Winston. I have said that it is unnecessary to decide this point at present. My reason is this. I think it too clear for controversy, that the commonwealth, and those who claim under her, must abandon or abide by her original judgment. Equity cannot give all the advantages of both. If she, or her substitute, claim under the elegit, the party so claiming must be content with what the elegit will give. If, waiving the elegit, the commonwealth pursues her remedy on the bonds which she has taken, instead of her original judgment, and thereby obtains more than that judgment would yield, equity will not aid her in the attempt to come in under the original judgment also. Waiving every other objection to the claim of Pleasant Winston, this is insurmountable. The debt to the commonwealth is augmented by having recourse to the bonds which have been given in satisfaction of the judgment, and the fund for other creditors is diminished to the same amount, if she still claims her priority. Equity will not, to effect such an object, tack that priority to the subsequent judgments which augment the debt. I think, then, if every other objection to the claim of Pleasant Winston could be removed, it must fail, unless he could comply with the condition a court of equity ought to impose, the reduction of the claim of the commonwealth to the amount of its judgment.

The following order was made in this cause: "This cause came on to be further heard on the papers formerly read, and was argued by counsel; on consideration whereof, the court is of opinion that it can take no cognizance of the question: whether the commonwealth of Virginia has a lien on the lands of George Winston in virtue of the judgment, alleged in the answer of Pleasant Winston to have been obtained by the commonwealth against the said George, on the 19th of June, 1818, for $19,999.24, in the general court of this commonwealth, and that until that question be decided, no decree ought to be made for the sale of the lands comprised in the deed of trust from George Winston to Charles J. Macmurdo and James Winston, dated 21st of August, 1820: liberty is therefore granted to any of the parties to this cause, to proceed in the courts of this state, in such manner as may be deemed proper, to obtain the decision of that question from the competent tribunal, without prejudice to the claim of such party or parties in this cause; and all parties in this cause are enjoined from pleading the pendency of this suit, or from alleging the same in bar of such proceeding."

Case No. 945.

BANK OF UNITED STATES v. FREDERICKSON.

[Ingr. Insolv. 277.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. Oct. 14, 1821.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—OBLIGATION OF CONTRACTS—DISCHARGE OF INSOLVENT DEBTOR.

[Act March 26, 1814, § 14, providing that a majority in value of the creditors of an insolvent debtor may discharge him, for seven years, from liability on all previously incurred indebtedness, violates the obligation of contracts, and is void.]

[Action by Bank of United States against Frederickson. Defendant moves for "a rule to show cause why process issued in the case should not be set aside, with costs," in accordance with Act Pa. March 26, 1814, § 14. Denied.

[It is provided by Act Pa. March 26, 1814, § 14, that "it shall be lawful for the court by whom any debtor shall have been discharged under this act to make an order that, wherever a majority in number and value of his creditors residing within the United States, or having a known attorney therein, consent in writing thereto, he shall be released from all suits, and the estate and property which he may afterwards acquire shall be exempted from execution for any debt contracted, or cause of action created, previous to such discharge, for seven years thereafter; and if, after such order shall be so made, and a majority in number and value of the creditors shall have consented as aforesaid, any action shall be commenced, or execution issued, for such debt or cause of action, it shall be the duty of any judge of the court from which the process issued, to set aside the same, with costs."]

[1] [Nowhere more fully reported; opinion not now accessible.]

THE COURT. The law upon which the motion is founded is equivalent to a discharge of the debt, and to say the least of it, impairs the obligation of contracts, contrary to the decision of this court in Golden v. Prince, [Case No. 5,509,] and Sturges v. Crowninshield, [4 Wheat. (17 U. S.) 122.] If the legislature can constitutionally take away a creditor's remedy for seven years, they can for seventy; in either case the law impairs the obligation of contracts—they differ only in degree.

Case No. 946.

BANK OF UNITED STATES v. ROBERTS.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 15.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov. Term, 1810.

NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS—ACCOMMODATION—BLANK INDORSEMENT.

The plaintiff's counsel may fill up the blank indorsement, at the trial, although the defendant indorsed the note for the accommodation of the maker.

[See Vowell v. Lyles, Case No. 17,021.]

At law. Assumpsit [by the Bank of the United States] against [John Roberts] the indorser of Elisha Janney's promissory note.

Mr. Swann, for the plaintiff, was about to fill up the blank indorsement, "Pay the contents to the president, directors and company of the Bank of the United States, for value received."

Mr. E. J. Lee, for the defendant, objected that the defendant was an accommodation indorser, and never received value.

Mr. Swann and Mr. Caldwell, contra. The words "credit the drawer" are equivalent to a check, and show that the money would have gone to the credit of the defendant.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent) suffered the indorsement so to be filled up.

BANK OF UNITED STATES v. WILSON. See Case No. 943.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

Case No. 947.

BANK OF WASHINGTON v. BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

[4 Cranch, C. C. 86.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May Term, 1830.[2]

MONEY HAD AND RECEIVED—WHEN LIES—MONEY PAID ON ERRONEOUS JUDGMENT — LIABILITY OF AGENT.

1. Money paid upon an erroneous judgment, may, after reversal of the judgment, be recovered back in an action for money had and received; and if the money shall have been paid to an agent of the original plaintiff, and remains in his hands, at the time of reversal and demand it may be recovered of the agent.

2. If the amount of the judgment be paid to the plaintiff's agent, and he be notified, at the same time, that a writ of error will be taken out to reverse the judgment, and that he will be expected to refund it if the judgment should be reversed, if he then pay over the money to his principal, without security for his indemnity, it is at his own peril.

[See note at end of case.]

At law. Assumpsit [by the Bank of Washington against the Bank of the United States] for money had and received to the plaintiff's use, to recover back money paid upon an erroneous judgment. [Judgment for plaintiff. This was afterwards reversed by the supreme court in Bank of U. S. v. Bank of Washington, 6 Pet. (31 U. S.) 8. See note at end of case. For other opinions connected with this litigation, see Bank of Washington v. Triplett, 1 Pet. (26 U. S.) 25; Triplett v. Bank of Washington, Case No. 14,178; Bank of Washington v. Neale, Id. 951.]

The case was argued by Mr. Key and Mr. J. Dunlop, for the plaintiffs, and by Mr. Jones and Mr. Lear, for the defendants.

The counsel for the plaintiffs cited Ripley v. Gelston, 9 Johns. 201; Burrough v. Skinner, 5 Burrows, 2639; 1 Chit. Pl. 25; Esp. N. P. 6, 19; Frary v. Dakin, 7 Johns. 79.

CRANCH, Chief Judge, delivered the opinion of the court. This is an action brought January 12, 1830, to recover money paid by the plaintiffs to the defendants, upon a judgment of the circuit court which has been since reversed by the supreme court of the United States. The state of the case, as agreed by the parties, is this: "Triplett and Neale recovered a judgment in this court, at Alexandria, in April term, 1824, against the Bank of Washington, [nowhere reported,] which was afterwards reversed in the supreme court, [Bank of Washington v. Triplett, 1 Pet. (26 U. S.) 25.] The Bank of Washington, on the 2d of June, 1824, applied to one of the judges of the supreme court, to allow a writ of error to be prosecuted, (the matter in dispute being less than $1,000, so that the bank could not, of right, obtain a writ of error without the special leave of one of the judges of that court.) That judge did not allow the writ; but it was, afterwards, to wit, on the 15th of March, 1825, allowed by the chief justice. After the refusal of the writ, upon the first application, and before its allowance by the chief justice, to wit, on the 30th of August, 1824, Triplett and Neale sued out their execution on the judgment, and immediately sent the same, inclosed in a letter, to Richard Smith, cashier of the office of discount and deposit of the Bank of the United States, at Washington, with an indorsement thereon, in these words: "Triplett and Neale v. The Bank of Washington, 1824. Use and benefit of the office of discount and deposit, United States, Washington city. Charles Neale." That the said Richard Smith wrote an indorsement thereon, in these words: "Pay to Mr. Brooke Mackall. Richard Smith, Cashier." That the said Brooke Mackall, the runner in the said office, presented the execution, &c. to the Bank of Washington, and there, on the 9th of September, 1824, received the sum of $881.18, and signed the receipt thereon, in these words: "Received eight hundred and eighty-one dollars and eighteen cents. B. Mackall." And, at the time of signing the same, William A. Bradley, then cashier of the Bank of Washington, verbally gave notice to the said Mackall, that it was the intention of the said Bank of Washington to appeal to the supreme court, and that the said office of discount and deposit would be expected, in case of a reversal of the judgment, to refund the amount. That the said Mackall received the said sum, as the amount of principal and interest accrued on the said judgment, as appears by his receipt on the said execution; which sum he delivered to the said Smith, who entered it to the credit of C. Neale, one of the firm of Triplett & Neale, on the proper books of the said office. That before delivery of the said execution to the said Smith, as aforesaid, the said C. Neale had promised to appropriate the money, expected to be recovered from the Bank of Washington in that suit, to reduce certain accommodation discounts which he, the said Neale, had running in the said bank, upon notes drawn by him, and indorsed by indorsers as sureties for the due payment thereof, which discounts were still running upon such notes at the time and times the said execution was so delivered, and when the money was paid as aforesaid. That he, said Smith, received the said execution, with the said Neale's said indorsement thereon, as he understood and considered, for collection; and, when collected, he deposited the same in bank, to the said Neale's credit generally, and would have sent the same to him at Alexandria, if he had requested him to do so; and would have paid his check for the amount. That immediately upon the receipt of the said money, as aforesaid, the said Smith wrote a letter to the said Neale, in the words following: "Office Bank United States, Washington, September 9th, 1824. Christopher Neale, Esq. Dear Sir,—I have received the sum of eight hundred and eighty-one dollars and 18–100 cents from the Bank of Washington, in payment of your judgment against it, and have placed the same to your credit. Be good enough to give me specific directions of the way in which you wish it applied. Yours, respectfully, Richard Smith, Cashier." To which letter the said C. Neale returned the following answer: "Dear Sir,—In reply to your esteemed favor, I have to request that you will apply the money received from the Bank of Washington to the reduction of the notes indorsed by John H. Ladd & Co. and John A. Stewart, equally, after paying Thomas Swann and Walter Jones, Esq., $100 between them, or $50 each, as their fees. Yours, truly, Christopher Neale. September 10, 1824." That the said Smith applied the said money pursuant to the directions of the last-mentioned letter.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

[2] [Reversed in 6 Pet. (31 U. S.) 8.]

It is submitted to the court, upon the foregoing case agreed, whether the plaintiffs are entitled to recover of the defendants, the money, with interest, so received and applied by the said Smith as aforesaid. If the court decide in the affirmative, judgment to be entered for the plaintiffs for the sum of $881.18, with interest from the 9th day of September, 1824, till paid, and costs; otherwise for the defendants, with costs. (Any objections to the competency of the evidence as here stated, to be considered by the court.) N. B. The plaintiff also shows the record of the final trial at Alexandria court of November term, 1829, and it is to be considered as here inserted.

There can be no doubt that the money paid upon an erroneous judgment, may, after reversal of the judgment, be recovered back in an action for money had and received. And if the money shall have been paid to an agent of the original plaintiff, and remains in his hands, at the time of reversal and demand, it may be so recovered of the agent. In all the cases in the books, where money paid by mistake, has been paid to an agent, and he has had notice of the mistake before he has, bona fide, paid it over to his principal, he has been held liable to refund it. We do not perceive any difference, in principle, between the case of money paid by mistake, and money paid upon an erroneous judgment. If the assignee of an erroneous judgment is the absolute owner of it by purchase, without recourse to the assignor, and receives the amount from the defendant, he receives it as principal; and upon reversal of the judgment, is as much liable to refund it to the defendant, as if he had been the original plaintiff in the action, whether he had or had not notice, at the time of receiving it, that the original defendant intended to prosecute a writ of error. If he received the money as agent, and, at the time of receiving it, had such notice, he is put upon his guard; and, if he pays over the money to his principal, without security for his indemnity, it is at his own peril; for the notice makes him liable to refund it to the original defendant in case the judgment should be reversed. In the present case, the notice accompanied the payment. If Mr. Mackall was competent to receive the money, he was competent to receive the notice. It was sufficient for the Bank of Washington that the notice should accompany the payment. They could not tell, beforehand, who would demand payment of the judgment. They could not, therefore, give any previous notice to the bank. It is true that they might have given notice to Triplett & Neale, the original plaintiffs; but they were not bound to give it. It was sufficient for them to wait until payment should be demanded. We think that the notice to Mr. Mackall, the agent of the Bank of the United States, placed that bank on the same ground of liability as that upon which the original plaintiffs stood; and that they are equally bound to refund the money, upon the reversal of the original judgment.

THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent, but understood as agreeing in the result of this opinion.

Reversed by the supreme court. [Bank of U. S. v. Bank of Washington,] 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 8.

[NOTE. The supreme court reversed the judgment for the reason, with others, as stated by Thompson, J., that "no notice whatever could change the rights of the parties, so as to make the Bank of the United States responsible to refund the money. When the money was paid, there was a legal obligation on the part of the Bank of Washington to pay it, and a legal right on the part of Triplett & Neale to demand and receive it, or to enforce payment of it under the execution; and whatever was done under that execution while the judgment was in full force was valid and binding on the Bank of Washington, so far as the rights of strangers or third persons are concerned. The reversal of the judgment cannot have a retrospective operation, and make void that which was lawful when done. The reversal of the judgment gives a new right or cause of action against the parties to the judgment, and creates a legal obligation on their part to restore what the other party has lost by reason of the erroneous judgment; and, as between the parties to the judgment, there is all the privity necessary to sustain and enforce such right, but as to strangers there is no such privity; and if no legal right existed, when the money was paid, to recover it back, no such right could be created by notice of an intention so to do." Bank of U. S. v. Bank of Washington, 6 Pet. (31 U. S.) 8.]

BANK OF WASHINGTON, (BRENT v.) See Case No. 1,834.

Case No. 948.

BANK OF WASHINGTON v. BRENT.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 538.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. Term, 1824.

CONTINUANCE—FAILURE OF PARTY TO APPEAR.

In case of an attachment by way of execution, if there be no appearance of the principal debtor, or garnishee, or other proceeding at the return term of the writ, the attachment is discontinued.

[At law. Action by the Bank of Washington against W. Brent, Jr.]

Attachment, by way of execution upon a judgment of the court, laid in the hands of F. May and B. Thruston, and returnable to October term, 1822.

Mr. Wallach, for plaintiffs.

Mr. Hall, as amicus curiae, suggested that the suit was discontinued, as no appearance had been entered for the principal debtor or garnishees, nor any further proceedings had at the first term.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, not sitting) decided that the cause was discontinued.

Case No. 949.

BANK OF WASHINGTON v. ELIOT.

[Cited in Union Bank of Georgetown v. Gozler, Case No. 14,358. Nowhere reported; opinion not now accessible.]

Case No. 950.

BANK OF WASHINGTON v. KURTZ.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 110.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. June Term, 1813.

EVIDENCE—PRIMARY AND SECONDARY.

Parol evidence cannot be given of the contents of a letter from the notary public to the defendant, put into the post-office, without previous notice to the defendant to produce it.

[Cited in Underwood v. Huddlestone, Case No. 14,339.]

THE COURT refused to permit the notary public to give parol evidence of the contents of his letter to the defendant, who was the indorser of George Frank's promissory note, without previous notice to the defendant to produce the original letter, on the authority of Underwood v. Huddlestone, [Case No. 14,339,] June term, 1813. Quaere?

BANK OF WASHINGTON, (MAGRUDER v.) See Case No. 8,963.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

Case No. 951.

BANK OF WASHINGTON v. NEALE.

[4 Cranch, C. C. 627.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov. Term, 1835.

ASSUMPSIT — MONEY PAID ON JUDGMENT SINCE REVERSED—LIMITATIONS OF ACTIONS.

The cause of action to recover back money paid upon a judgment reversed for error, arises upon the reversal, although the appellate court, at the time of reversal, orders a venire de novo to be issued by the inferior court, and the cause is still there pending; and the limitation of the statute begins to run from the time of such reversal.

[See Bank of Washington v. Bank of U. S., Case No. 947.]

At law. This was an action for money had and received, to recover back money paid upon a judgment afterwards reversed for error. In May, 1824, Triplett & Neale, of Alexandria, District of Columbia, recovered judgment against the Bank of Washington, in the circuit court of the District of Columbia, sitting in Alexandria county, (the cause having been removed to that county, from Washington county,) for negligence in not collecting the amount of an inland bill of exchange deposited in that bank for collection. The bank paid the amount of the judgment to the agent of the Bank of the United States, upon the order of Mr. Neale, the acting partner of the firm of Triplett & Neale; and the Bank of the United States placed the amount to the credit of Mr. Neale. When the Bank of Washington paid the money, the cashier gave notice to the agent of the Bank of the United States, who received it, that the Bank of Washington would take out a writ of error to reverse the judgment, and that the Bank of the United States would be expected to refund the money, in case of a reversal. The Bank of Washington accordingly brought their writ of error, and the supreme court of the United States reversed the judgment at January term, 1828, and remanded the cause to the circuit court, with an order to issue a venire de novo. [Bank of Washington v. Triplett,] 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 25. On the 12th of January, 1830, the Bank of Washington brought an action against the Bank of the United States, to recover back the money paid on the erroneous judgment, and on the 24th of October, 1830, recovered judgment in the circuit court, [Bank of Washington v. Bank of U. S., Case No. 947,] which judgment also was reversed by the supreme court of the United States, at January term, 1832, and judgment ordered to be entered for the defendant, in the court below. [Bank of U. S. v. Bank of Washington,] 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 8. The original suit of Triplett & Neale v. The Bank of Washington, which was remanded by the supreme court, upon the reversal, with an order for a venire de novo, remained pending in the circuit court, in Alexandria, District of Columbia, until the 6th of November, 1829, when a verdict and judgment were rendered for the defendant, Bank of Washington. [Case No. 14,178.] After the judgment in the case of Bank of Washington v. Bank of U. S. [Id. 947] was reversed, the present action of the Bank of Washington v. Christopher Neale was commenced, on the 24th of March, 1832; to which the defendant pleaded the statute of limitations, more than three years having elapsed since the reversal of the original judgment in January, 1828, but not since the final action of this court, upon the mandate of the supreme court, in that original action; which was on the 6th of November, 1829, as before stated.

Mr. Jones, for the defendant, contended that the plaintiff's cause of action accrued in 1828, when the original judgment was reversed; and that the plaintiffs were under no obligation to wait the issue of the subsequent proceedings upon the venire de novo, in the original action. He cited Wilcox v. Plummer, 4 Pet. [29 U. S.] 182.

Mr. Key and Mr. Dunlop, contra, contended that, as the supreme court, upon the reversal of the original judgment, awarded a venire de novo, the plaintiffs could not ascertain how much they had lost, and to which they ought, in equity, to be restored, until final judgment in the original action. Until that time, they could only recover nominal damages. They cited Clark v. Pinney, 6 Cow. 297; Green v. Stone, 1 Har. & J. 405; Isom v. Johns, 2 Munf. 272; Id. 413; and Till. Lim. 86, note.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, doubting) instructed the jury (upon the prayer of the defendant's counsel) that the plaintiffs' cause of action accrued upon the reversal of the original judgment, in 1828, and therefore more than three years before the commencement of the present action.

Verdict for defendant.

BANK OF WASHINGTON, (PATRIOTIC BANK v.) See Case No. 10,806.

BANK OF WASHINGTON v. PEIRSON. See Case No. 953.

Case No. 952.

BANK OF WASHINGTON v. PELTZ.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 241.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. April Term, 1821.

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS—ACTION TO REDUCE CLAIM TO JUDGMENT — ASCERTAINED ASSETS.

There can be no judgment in Washington county, against an executor or administrator for a debt of the testator, or intestate, until the court shall have ascertained the assets, and assessed the sum for which the judgment shall be rendered against the executor or administrator, de bonis propriis.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

At law. Scire facias, to revive a judgment rendered at June term, 1818. The docket entry of that term was "judgment for $2,000 damages and costs; damages to be released on payment of $600 with interest from 12th December, 1815, till paid, and costs."

Mr. Wallach, for the defendants, moved to quash the scire facias, because the judgment was not complete, the court having never assessed the sum which the defendants (the executors) ought to pay in regard to the amount of assets in their hands, and the debts due to other persons, as required by Act Md. 1799, c. 101; Id. c. 8, § 8,—and contended that no execution could issue until that sum should be assessed, because the execution must in all cases issue de bonis propriis, as well as de bonis testatoris.

Mr. Caldwell, contra. It does not appear that the court did not assess the sum, &c. The defendant may have admitted assets.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent) said that there was no judgment against an executor or administrator, until the court has assessed the sum which the defendants ought to pay, according to the amount of assets in their hands. The docket entry is only an admission of the sum which the testator ought to have paid, if he had been living.

THE COURT quashed the scire facias, without costs, and made an order referring the original judgment to the register of wills, to ascertain the amount of assets, and the sum for which the judgment should be rendered.

Case No. 953.

BANK OF WASHINGTON v. PEIRSON et al.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 685.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May Term, 1826.

PRINCIPAL AND AGENT—POWER OF AGENT TO INDORSE A NOTE—CONTINUING POWER—REVOCATION BY DEATH OF PRINCIPAL—EVIDENCE.

1. An authority to indorse notes need not be under seal. A power from R. B. to sign, in his behalf, any note for the renewal of notes, of which he was then the drawer or indorser, is a continuing power to indorse notes subsequently given, to renew notes indorsed by the attorney for his principal.

2. The existence of the original note indorsed by the principal, may be proved by parol, without producing it, it having been cancelled and given up to the maker.

3. If the principal authorize his agent to receive notices for him, the authority ceases with his death; a notice given to the agent after the death of the principal, will not bind his executors.

[See Boone v. Clark, Case No. 1,641; Eagleton Manuf'g Co. v. West, etc., Manuf'g Co., 2 Fed. 774; Galt v. Galloway, 4 Pet. (29 U. S.) 344; Hunt v. Rousmaniere, Case No. 6,898; same case, on appeal, 8 Wheat. (21 U. S.) 201.]

[Compare Wylie v. Coxe, 15 How. (56 U. S.) 419.]

At law. Assumpsit [by the president and directors of the Bank of Washington] against [Joseph Peirson and R. Y. Brent] the executors of [R. Brent] the indorser of T. L. Washington's notes. The name of R. Brent, the defendant's testator, was writtten on the back of the notes by J. H. Reily; and to show his authority to indorse for Mr. Brent, the plaintiffs produced a written paper, not under seal, in the following words: "I hereby authorize and empower Mr. John Reily, of the Bank of Washington, to sign for me and in my behalf any note for the renewal of notes, in the said bank, of which I am the drawer or indorser. Given under my hand this 9th day of August, 1818. Rob. Brent. Witness: Robert Brent, William Brent."

Mr. Wallach, for plaintiffs.

Swann & Worthington, for defendants.

THE COURT (nem. con.) decided that it was not necessary that the power to indorse should be under seal; but that the paper might be read to the jury as part of the evidence to show the authority of Mr. Reily to indorse.

THE COURT also decided, (CRANCH, Chief Judge, contra,) that this was a continuing power to indorse notes subsequently given to renew notes indorsed by Mr. Reily in the name of Mr. Brent, to renew notes indorsed by Mr. Brent himself.

THE COURT also decided, (MORSELL, Circuit Judge, contra,) that parol evidence might be given of the existence of a note indorsed by Mr. Brent in the Bank of Washington, previous to the authority given to Mr. Reily; and that the present note was given to renew a note given to renew that note so indorsed by Mr. Brent himself; evidence having been given that the note with Mr. Brent's original indorsement had been canceled and given up to T. L. Washington, the maker, who was dead, and no administration was ever taken upon his estate; that he had no wife nor child; that his brother lived with him at the time of his death, but is also dead, and it did not appear who was in possession of Mr. T. L. Washington's papers; nor that the plaintiffs ever made any inquiry for that note, so as to produce it at the trial.

THE COURT also decided, (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, contra,) as they had twice before decided, namely, once in this cause, a few days before, and once in another cause between the same parties, at December term, 1824, [Brent v. Bank of Washington, Case No. 1,834,] that notice, of non-payment, given to Mr. Reily, after the death of Mr. Brent, did not excuse the bank for not giving notice at the late dwelling of the deceased, nor for not inquiring whether any administration had been taken upon his estate, &c. That the defendants, although they had not proved the will and obtained letters testamentary, at the time the notes fell due, yet, as they were executors, they were entitled to notice; and notice to Mr. Reily was not notice to them; they never having authorized him to receive notice for them.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

Verdict for plaintiff, $1,001.75. Bills of exception were taken, but no writ of error.

[For another case growing out of substantially the same facts, see Case No. 11,155.]

BANK OF WASHINGTON, (PIERSON v.) See Case No. 11,155.

Case No. 954.

BANK OF WASHINGTON v. REYNOLDS.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 289.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. April Term, 1822.

NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS — DEATH OF MAKER — DEMAND ON WIDOW — EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS—BURDEN OF PROOF.

If the maker of a note die before the note becomes payable, a demand of payment made upon his widow, at the last place of his abode, is, prima facie, a sufficient demand to charge the indorser, there being no evidence that there was an executor or an administrator; but if there be actually an executor or an administrator, the demand must be made upon him; the burden of proof, however, that there was an executor or administrator, lies on the defendant.

At law. The defendant was indorser of J. Huddleston's note at sixty days. Huddleston died before the note became payable. The notary, on the day after the third day of grace, called at his last dwelling place and demanded payment of his widow, who replied she had nothing to do with the settlement of the estate. The notary did not know whether there was an executor or an administrator; the defendant having offered no evidence that there was any administration upon the estate.

THE COURT (MORSELL, Circuit Judge, contra) was of opinion, that this was a sufficient demand.

THE COURT, upon the trial, on the motion of the plaintiff's counsel, instructed the jury, (nem. con.) that if they should believe from the evidence that Mr. Reynolds, the defendant, had been several years a resident of the city of Washington, previous to the protest of the note in question, and that several previous notes, upon which he was indorser, had been protested upon demand made on the day after the third day of grace, and had been renewed by his indorsement upon notice given to him on the day after the third day of grace, and that such demand and notice were according to the long existing usage and practice of the bank and its customers, the jury may infer from these facts, that the defendant had a knowledge of such usage in the said bank at the time he indorsed the note, and that he assented to such usage.

The defendant then offered evidence that, when the note became payable, there was an executor of the maker, qualified to act, and residing in this city.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, contra) was of opinion, that the plaintiffs were bound to inquire for the executor and demand payment of him.

Verdict for the plaintiffs.

The defendant's counsel moved for a new trial, because the verdict was against the instruction of the court upon the point of law.

But THE COURT refused to grant it.

[NOTE. The practice of demanding payment on the day after the last day of grace was changed by agreement of the banks of the District of Columbia, in 1818, to conform to the general commercial usage. See Bank of Alexandria v. Wilson, Case No. 856; Cookendorfer v. Preston, 4 How. (45 U. S.) 317; Adams v. Otterback, 15 How. (56 U. S.) 539.]

BANK OF WASHINGTON, (TRIPLETT v.) See Case No. 14,178.

Case No. 955.

BANK OF WASHINGTON v. WALKER.

[Hayw. & H. 53.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. 21, 1841.[2]

USURY—WHAT CONSTITUTES — DISCOUNTING—NOT A QUESTION FOR THE JURY.

1. Where there was an application to a bank for a discount upon a note to be secured collaterally, and the party applying drew checks upon the bank, which were paid before the note was actually discounted, and the bank treated the note, when discounted, as having been so discounted on the day of its date, instead of a subsequent day, on which its proceeds were carried to the credit of the party, it was held not to be usury.

2. It is incompetent for the jury, in case of a written contract or agreement, to pass upon the question of usury; it is exclusively for the decision of the court.

[At law. Suit by the president and directors of the Bank of Washington against John Walker on a promissory note. Tried by jury. Verdict and judgment for plaintiff. The defendant, by writ of error, subsequently took the case to the supreme court, where the judgment was affirmed in Walker v. Bank of Washington, 3 How. (44 U. S.) 62.]

J. Hellen, for plaintiff.

Brent & Brent, for defendant.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

[1] [Reported by John A. Hayward, Esq., and Geo. C. Hazleton, Esq.]

[2] [Affirmed in 3 How. (44 U. S.) 62.]

This action was brought upon the following note: "$10,000. City of Washington, May 9, 1840. Thirty days after date I promise to pay to Henry Walker, or order, ten thousand dollars, for value received, negotiable and payable at the Bank of Washington. Jno. Walker. Credit the drawer." It was indorsed by Henry Walker, Lewis Walker and John Walker. The defendant's plea was usury.

The facts of the case were, that: John Walker, the defendant, desired to obtain a loan for the purpose of purchasing cattle, and addressed a letter to the bank to that effect, assenting to assign as security an accepted draft of a certain navy agent. He executed a promissory note in favor of Henry Walker or order for $10,000. The note on which suit is brought is a renewal of it and dated as above. The plaintiff gave in evidence the note and proof of the handwriting of the defendant to the same.

The defendant then gave evidence tending to show that the note was given in renewal of a previous note similarly signed and indorsed, payable ninety days after date, which was discounted by the plaintiff at the request of the defendant, for his accommodation, as a loan, on the 18th of February, 1840, but not passed to his credit until the 22d of February, 1840, at which time an officer of the plaintiff deducted from the proceeds of said note the interest on the same, computing from the 6th of February, 1840, the date of said note, for the period of ninety-four days, and that said note nowhere appeared on the books of the plaintiff until the 18th of February, 1840; that the whole amount credited by plaintiff to the defendant, as the consideration of said note dated the 6th of February, 1840, and discounted only on the 18th of February, 1840, and passed to defendant on the 22d of the same month, was the sum of $9,843.33; and that the sum of $156.67 was taken by said plaintiff as the interest upon said note for the time said note was discounted, that said note of the 6th of February, 1840, was surrendered to the defendant upon the execution of the said note of the 9th of May, 1840, the last being but a renewal of the former, and that the plaintiff credited the defendant on account of said note of the 9th of May, 1840, only the sum of $9,843.33 and took as interest the sum of $156.67, which was exacted from the defendant.

The plaintiff then gave in evidence that on the 20th of January, 1840, the defendant had checked out of plaintiff's bank $1,224.93, on the 6th of February, 1840, $2,500, and on the 21st of February, 1840, $7,000, all of which were charged to defendant on the books of the plaintiff, and no moneys or funds appeared to his credit at the time of drawing out said sums of money; that on the 22d of February, 1840, the plaintiff credited said defendant with $9,843.33, as the proceeds of said note of the 6th of February, 1840, and the balance then appearing to be due to the defendant on the books of the plaintiff, after charging him with the several amounts so drawn out by him previous to the 22d of February, 1840, was $997.86.

The defendant gave in evidence that the said note of the 6th of February, 1840, was brought on or after the 11th of February, 1840, it being a discount day, by the president or a book-keeper of the plaintiff, to the discount clerk, a witness in the case, and given by him as a note not done, or not passed, by the board of directors, and that said note remained in the hands of said clerk until the 18th of February, 1840, when it was passed by the board, and on the 22d of February, 1840, the sum of $9,843.33 was passed to defendant's credit as the net proceeds of said note, and that interest at the rate of six per centum per annum on $10,000, computed from the date of said note, for ninety-four days, was reserved at the time of entering such credit by direction of some officer of the plaintiff; and that it was the usual practice of plaintiff to take on discounts only from the time of making the discount; and that it does not appear that defendant was credited on plaintiff's books with the interest computed from the 6th of February, 1840. The defendant asked the cashier whether the amounts drawn out of bank by the defendant previous to the 22d of February, 1840, were not charged on the books as overdrafts, and were not allowed as the personal credit of the defendant. The said cashier answered that he had no doubt but that the defendant was allowed to check upon said note of the 6th of February, 1840, before the same was entered to his credit on the books. And being asked further for the reasons of this opinion, he stated that he had no recollection of said note being in bank previous to the 18th of February, 1840, or of its existence, or of any arrangement with reference to it previous to that date, and that the amounts so checked out previous to the 22d of February, 1840, would not have been paid on defendant's checks, but for the knowledge, on the part of the cashier, that he, the defendant, had a large contract with the navy department for the supply of beef, and the defendant had given to the plaintiff good collateral security, from which, however, no surplus resulted after paying the defendant's antecedent liabilities, and that the said advances made to the defendant after the 6th of February, 1840, and previous to the 22d of February, 1840, were made on security given, or to be given, but he does not know of any security given during that time, except the defendant's letter of the 30th of January, 1840, a bill of sale by defendant to plaintiff of his barrelled beef, dated the 20th of February, 1840, and two acceptances of the navy agent dated respectively the 19th February, 1840, and the 2d of April, 1840, and the note dated the 6th of February, 1840, of which the said cashier has no recollection, until the 18th of February, 1840; and that he is satisfied that said advances were not made on the personal credit of defendant, and from all the above circumstances, he has no doubt that said note of the 6th of February, 1840, was in bank from the time of its date, and that defendant was allowed to check on said note from the day of its date. There was considerable evidence taken to show that the Virginia notes paid to the defendant by the plaintiff were depreciated, being ½ to 1 per cent. less than the notes of the banks of the District or notes of the banks of Baltimore, Maryland.

The following prayers, among others, were offered by the defendant:

1st. The defendant moved the court to instruct the jury that the facts mentioned by said cashier are evidence, but the inferences or opinions of said cashier are not evidence, but the court refused to give such instructions as prayed, but instructed the jury that inferences or opinions of said witness are not of themselves evidence of the facts so inferred, but that the facts stated by the witness, as the ground of his inference or opinion, are competent to be given in evidence to the jury, together with the inference or opinion of the said witness; from which facts the jury are to judge whether such inferences and opinion are justified by the facts stated. The defendant, through his counsel, excepted to the said refusal and to the instructions so given.

2d. If the jury believe, from the evidence aforesaid, that the plaintiff on the 18th of February, 1840, agreed to loan the defendant the sum of $10,000, and on the 22d of February, 1840, credited him with $9,843.33, on plaintiff's books, as the proceeds of a loan made on his note for $10,000, dated the 6th of February, 1840, and payable in 90 days, and the retained interest upon said $10,000 computed from the date of said note for the time it had to run, then the presumption of law is that there was usury in said transaction and the burden of proof is on the plaintiff to show mistake or inadvertence in the reservation of said illegal interest.

Which THE COURT refused to give as prayed by the counsel for the defendant, but instructed the jury, that, if they believe from the evidence aforesaid, that interest was taken by the bank officers from the date of said note instead of the day on which it appears to have been discounted for the purpose of obtaining and exacting thereby more than lawful interest from the defendant, then such taking and exaction would be usury. But if interest was so taken because the defendant had been, from the date of the said note, allowed by the plaintiff to check upon the credit of the said note and its accompanying securities for the amount of said note, deducting the regular discount therefrom from the date of the note; or if it was taken by the mistake or inadvertence of the officer who made the calculation or entry, or directed them to be made, without any intention to exact unlawful interest; or, if the jury believe that the clerks and officers of the plaintiff were uniformly directed and required by the plaintiff in all discounts and negotiations of the plaintiff, to demand and take no more than lawful interest, and that, notwithstanding such direction they (the officers) did take the interest on this note from its date, either from mistake or from believing that the defendant ought to be charged such interest, because they believe that he had been allowed to check for the proceeds of said discount from the date of the note, and that such calculation and charge of such interest was so done by said clerk or officer without the knowledge or consent of the plaintiff and against its direction as aforesaid, then such taking and charging such interest was not usury. To which refusal of the aforesaid instruction prayed by the defendant's counsel, and to the instruction so as aforesaid given at the prayer of the defendant's counsel, the defendant excepted.

3d. If the jury believe from the evidence aforesaid that the advances to defendant named in the evidence were not made upon the note of the 6th of February, 1840, and that the plaintiff, upon discounting the said note, received or reserved more than at the rate of 6 per centum per annum, then the said jury may infer usury from the whole evidence aforesaid in said note of the 6th of February, 1840, which was refused, the court having already refused an instruction covering the same point.

4th. If the jury believe from the evidence aforesaid that the note of the 9th of May, 1840, was given in renewal of a former note of the defendant dated on the 6th of February, 1840, payable in ninety days after date, and which last note was discounted by the plaintiff as a loan to the defendant of the 18th of February, 1840, but was not passed to the credit of the defendant until the 22d of February, 1840, and that the said plaintiff then charged and received interest upon the same from the date of the said note, to wit, from the 6th of February, 1840, it is the taking above six per centum per annum for the loan of the money made to the defendant upon said note, and is usury; and the defendant is entitled to a verdict in his favor upon said note notwithstanding the jury may find from the evidence that the defendant had overdrawn his account as stated in the evidence, unless they further find that the said interest reserved as aforesaid was credited to defendant's account as a credit to take effect from the 6th of February, 1840.

But THE COURT refused to give the above as prayed to which refusal the defendant, through his counsel, excepted.

5th. It is competent for the jury, from all the circumstances in evidence, to infer usury in the agreement or agreements on which the notes in suit were founded.

THE COURT refused to grant this last prayer, to which refusal the counsel for the defendant excepts.

Verdict for the plaintiff for $10,000, with interest from June 11th, 1840, till paid.

This case was taken to the supreme court of the United States by writ of error, and affirmed. See [Walker v. Bank of Washington,] 3 How. [44 U. S.] 62.

NOTE, [from original report.] The supreme court laid down this rule of law in [Walker v. Bank of Washington,] 3 How. [44 U. S.] 62: "The mere change of securities for the same usurious loan to the same party who received usury or to a person having notice of the usury, does not purge the original illegal consideration, so as to give a right of action on the new security."

Case No. 956.

BANK OF WASHINGTON v. WALKER.

[1 Hayw. & H. 60.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. 27, 1841.

DEPOSITION—OF MOTHER UNABLE TO ATTEND—WITHDRAWAL.

The deposition of a mother taken de bene esse, who is unable to attend, is proper to be read to a jury, and after being read may be waived and withdrawn, by the party offering the same, from the consideration of the jury.

[At law. Suit by the Bank of Washington against Henry Walker on a promissory note. Tried by a jury. Verdict for defendant.]

The declaration avers that a certain party promised to pay the defendant or order the sum of $6,000, sixty days after the date thereof, viz., 25th day of February, 1840, negotiable at the Bank of Washington, and delivered the said note to the defendant, who before the time limited in the note for the payment thereof, endorsed the said note to one Lewis Walker, and delivered it to the said Lewis, who before the time limited, &c., endorsed the said note to plaintiff and delivered, &c. That the said defendant promised to pay without the usual demand on the maker according to the tenor and effect of the said promise, and waived notice of the nonpayment by the said maker and promised the plaintiff to pay it in default of any such demand, and in default of notice thereof to the said defendant. The usual money counts were added. The plea of defendant was infancy.

The deposition of Dorcas Walker, mother of defendant, taken de bene esse, was read on the trial; the following interrogatories had been propounded to her: 1. Do you know the age of Henry Walker? 2. And if yea, state how you know the same, and what relation you bear to him, and when he was born?

In answer to the first, the deponent saith: He was born on the 1st day of October, 1819. In answer to the second: She is his mother. She answers further that there was a family Bible in which was entered the births of her children, but that the Bible has been lost and cannot now be found, although diligent search has been made for it. He was the youngest child and she remembers his age perfectly well.

In the trial the counsel for the plaintiff offered evidence tending to prove the defendant's handwriting on the note and to the waiver of demand, &c. The defendant, by his counsel, offered to read in evidence the certificate of the doctor as to the health of Dorcas Walker, which was admitted as if the witness was produced and the certificate was sworn to; and then offered to read in evidence to the jury the above deposition taken before the mayor of Washington city. To the production of which the plaintiff, by its counsel objected. The defendant then further proved by a witness then present that the said deposition was taken on the 14th of December, 1841, at the place and hour appointed by the said mayor, and that the said mayor retained the same in his own hands until he delivered the same, after being so taken, to the chief judge of this court, in open court, who delivered it to the clerk of this court, in open court, and further called on the said mayor as a witneess, who also proved the above facts, and stated that the date 1814 in his certificate was a mistake and should have been 1841. The plaintiff, by his counsel, objected to the said evidence as not admissible so as to make the said deposition evidence in this case, and objected to the same and to the said depositions as evidence. The court overruled the objections and allowed the said evidence to be given, and the said deposition to be read in evidence, and the defendant, after having read the said deposition to the jury, waived and offered to withdraw the answer to the third interrogatory and let it be considered as in evidence or not at the option of the plaintiff, and the plaintiff objected to said answer being so waived, and withdrawn by the defendant after having been read in evidence to the jury, which objection was overruled by the court, to which overruling plaintiff, by its counsel, excepted.

Verdict for defendant.

There was a bill of exceptions signed by the court. But no further action was taken in the case.

[1] [Reported by John A. Hayward, Esq., and Geo. C. Hazleton, Esq.]

Case No. 957.

BANK OF WASHINGTON v. WAY.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 249.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Oct. Term, 1821.

NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS — DEMAND — JOINT INTEREST OF MAKER AND INDORSER— ALTERATION OF INSTRUMENTS.

1. If a note be discounted by the plaintiff for the joint benefit of the maker and indorsers, or if they are jointly interested in the object for which the money is raised, it is not necessary, in order to charge an indorser, to demand payment of the maker, or give notice to the defendant, of the non-payment, although the parties should be interested in unequal proportions, and the defendant should have indorsed as surety for the other parties to the extent that the whole note exceeded his own interest therein.

2. If a note be made payable in sixty days, by the agent of the indorsers, for his and their joint accommodation, to be discounted at a bank, who refuse to discount it unless made payable in forty-five days, the maker may alter it accordingly, provided it be done at the request, or with the consent, or subsequent approbation of the defendant and the other indorsers, and they receive the benefit of the discount; but the burthen of proof of such previous consent, or subsequent approbation lies on the plaintiff, and is not to be inferred from the mere circumstance of the defendants afterwards participating in the benefit of the discount.

3. The maker of a note cannot be compelled to testify for the plaintiff in an action against the indorser, because the maker would be liable for the costs of the suit in case the plaintiff should recover against the indorser; but the maker's letter to the plaintiff, inclosing the note for discount, may be read in evidence.

[See Wood v. Steele, 6 Wall. (73 U. S.) 80; Angle v. Northwestern Life Ins. Co., 92 U. S. 330; Hartley v. Corboy, 150 Pa. St. 23, 24 Atl. 295. Contra, see Union Bank v. Cook, Case No. 14,349.]

At law. This was an action against an indorser of a promissory note made and signed by "John McGowan, Agent," for $3,000, payable originally at sixty days, to be discounted by the plaintiffs to raise money for a mercantile adventure in which all the parties upon the note were jointly interested. The bank (the plaintiffs) refused to discount it unless made payable in forty-five days; whereupon the maker, who was the agent of all the parties, in the management of that joint adventure altered the note accordingly, and it was discounted by the plaintiffs, for the joint benefit of the maker and the indorsers. It was contended by the plaintiffs that this alteration was made with the consent or approbation of all the parties.

THE COURT (nem. con.) at the prayer of Mr. Caldwell, for the plaintiffs, instructed the jury "that if they should be satisfied by the evidence that the note was discounted for the joint benefit of the defendant and the other parties on the note, or that the defendant was jointly interested with them in the gain or loss on the cargo, to raise the money for the purchase of which the note was given, it was not necessary for the plaintiffs to have made any demand of the maker, nor to have given notice to the defendant of the non-payment by the maker." To which instruction the defendant excepted.

Mr. Jones, for the defendant, then prayed the court to add to the instruction the following, viz.: "But if the jury believe from the evidence that the note was given and discounted for the aggregate amount of the individual and separate interests of the maker and indorsers, and that each indorser indorsed as security for the other parties to the extent that the aggregate amount of the note exceeded his own individual share of the adventure, then the plaintiffs cannot recover without proving due demand and notice."

But THE COURT (nem. con.) refused to make this addition to the instruction, and the defendant excepted.

Mr. Swann, for the plaintiffs, then prayed the court further to instruct the jury, "that if they should be of opinion from the evidence that the note was altered by McGowan, the agent of the parties to the note, so as to make it conform to the discount offered by the bank, it is not material whether the alteration was made before or after the note was offered to the bank for discount, provided the alteration was so made at the request, or with the consent of the defendant and the other parties concerned, or they subsequently acquiesced in it, and received the benefit of the said discount."

Which instruction THE COURT gave, and at the prayer of Mr. Jones, for the defendant, further instructed them, "that if the note was so altered after it was drawn and indorsed as aforesaid, and without the consent and authority of the defendant, before or after, the plaintiffs cannot support their said action on the said note." And further, "that the burden of proof lies on the plaintiffs to show such previous consent or subsequent approbation on the part of the defendant, and his knowledge of the fact of such alteration at the time he did any act or made any declaration implying a participation in such discount; and that such knowledge, consent, and approbation are not to be inferred from the mere circumstance of his afterwards participating jointly with others in the benefit of the said discount."

To these additional instructions the plaintiffs excepted.

Verdict and judgment, for the plaintiffs.

BANKRUPTCY CASES, FEES IN.

[See "Costs and Fees," Appendix; "Fees for Registering," Appendix.]

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

Case No. 958.

In re BANKS.

[1 N. Y. Leg. Obs. 274; 5 Law Rep. 371.][1]

District Court, S. D. New York. 1843.

BANKRUPTCY—DISCHARGE — FRAUD — OBJECTIONS TO DECREE—BOOKS OF ACCOUNT.

1. Objections which might have been urged to show that a decree ought not to have been granted, will be considered waived after the court have declared the petitioner a bankrupt.

2. To make out a case against a bankrupt to justify the court in refusing him his discharge and certificate, there must appear by indisputable evidence some act of fraud, willful concealment of property, &c., or facts, from which such a deduction would be plain and palpable.

3. It is not put upon the bankrupt to show that he has kept proper books of account, &c., it is for the creditor, impugning his right to a discharge and certificate, to make out, by satisfactory proof, such a case as will bar the bankrupt's right to an allowance thereof.

In bankruptcy. This case came before the court on objections to the allowance of discharge and certificate to [Mark Banks] the bankrupt, the circumstances of which sufficiently appear in his honor's adjudication.

Benedict and Belknap, for creditors.

Sandford and Marselis, for bankrupt.

Before BETTS, District Judge.

BETTS, District Judge. The objection to a certificate and discharge must rest upon the particulars designated by the statute as causes for refusing it to a bankrupt. Such matters as touch only the regularity or frame of the proceedings should be brought forward on the first notice, or after a decree of bankruptcy they will be regarded as waived. It would be grossest injustice to bind a party by the decree, and never allow his property to be rescued from it, and yet defeat all its beneficial effects to him by objections of mere form, tending to show that the decree ought not to have been rendered. Congress manifestly intended, by this double set of notices, to show cause to discriminate classes of objections that should be urged under the first, or the advantage of them be lost as to creditors.

I lay out of view all but two of the eight objections filed, because part belonged appropriately to the petition to be declared a bankrupt, and there is no evidence applicable to any except the 5th and 6th against the petition for a certificate and discharge; which are, that he has been guilty of a wilful concealment of his property or rights of property, and has admitted a false or fictitious debt against his estate. No direct proof is offered which supports these allegations in their terms or even spirit, and the counsel seeks to maintain them argumentatively, and by inference and presumption.

The concealment of property, or rights of property, attempted to be shown, relates to Virginia mining stock received by Benedict in satisfaction of a debt due the firm of which the petitioner was a partner.

It is to be remarked, that there is not, in the testimony or papers of the bankrupt, proof that the debt this stock satisfied, belonged in any respect to the petitioner, and if there be a legal interest with him in it, that he set up such right, or supposed he possessed it. A bond of $3,000, owned by the firm, had been assigned to one of their creditors as collateral security for a large debt, and this stock was afterwards accepted, with the assent of the bankrupt, in discharge of that bond, but the bearing of the transaction and subsisting interests of the parties import what the testimony most strongly tends to prove, that the payment of stock was for the benefit of the holder of the bond, and not of the bankrupt. Until there is clear evidence showing that he did not so understand the matter, there will be no foundation laid for imputing wilful concealment to him in the transaction. A similar observation may be made with respect to various choses in action transferred to other creditors as collateral securities. There must be, first, evidence of his scienter, that there could be a surplus, or of facts from which that deduction would be plain and palpable, before any presumption can be raised that he designed a fraudulent concealment. But this consideration is to be connected with the bearing and effect attributable to the evidences, that the bankrupt has given some statement of these assets, and, if only imperfect in form or precision, the exception should have been taken previous to the decree of bankruptcy. That would be sufficient cause to stay his petition for a decree until the petitioner had reformed his schedules, so as to furnish every particular demanded by the statute in a manner satisfactory in substance and form.

I cannot, with these principles in view, find just cause in the proofs for charging that the bankrupt has been guilty of wilful concealment of his property or rights of property. It seems to me, also, that there is no satisfactory evidence supplied of the admission of false or fictitious debts by the petitioner against his estate. Taking the insertion in the schedule of a spurious demand to be a violation of the statute in this respect, I do not find that fact made out by the proofs.

Great stress has been laid upon the debt set forth as owing to Benjamin J. Knapp, to the amount of $13,071.35, because the bankrupt has also stated, that large amounts of the assets of the estate were placed with this creditor to meet that debt, and also, because, when sued on that bond by the creditor, the bankrupt pleaded payment and verified the plea by his oath. The bankrupt does not state this as an absolute debt. He gives the date and amount of the bond, adding that a suit has been brought on it, and is now pending. He refers to notes deposited for its security, and in Schedule B particularizes those notes. Now, whether this method of describing the claim, and its actual condition as a demand upon the estate, be sufficient and allowable, is not the question raised by the objection. The point made is, that the debt is known by the petitioner to be false and fictitious. Clearly, that language of the act cannot embrace a claim admitted to be just in its origin, but against which the obligor insists upon rights of set-off, and, indeed, asserts that the debt itself is satisfied. The difference between stating a bond and debt unquestionably outstanding against a party, with his claim of defence to it, and fabricating a debt where none exists in fact, is too palpable to mislead any one. No creditor, reading over these papers, can suppose this entire debt is admitted as subsisting against the estate. The bond for its full engagement is admitted to be valid, and then the assets hypothecated for its satisfaction, greatly exceeding it in amount, are specified. This, in my opinion, entirely obviates the point of the objection.

[1] [5 Law Rep. 371, contains partial report only.]

Numerous criticisms were applied by counsel to other portions of the schedules, but they were mostly to matters of form. The only specific matter insisted on, covered by the objections, and not already considered, was, that the petitioner, being a merchant, did not keep proper books of account. It only appears upon the proofs, that the petitioner is by profession a merchant, not that he was at the time of his petition, or had been for several years preceding, engaged in the transaction of mercantile business. The proper books of account called for by the statute are those appropriate to the business pursued by the party, and such as will exhibit a full account of his dealings as a merchant. But the petitioner is not compelled to furnish evidence of the fact on his part. The creditor, impugning his right to be decreed a final discharge, must give satisfactory proof of the matter which is to bar such discharge. The creditors show no continued trading requiring the keeping of regular books, and, accordingly, the mere non-existence of books of account interposes no obstacle to the discharge prayed for.

The court, in disallowing, in this and various other cases, the objections offered by the creditors to a free certificate being granted, does not enter into the moral obligations subsisting between him and those who have given him credit. Nor is it intended, in any manner, to affirm that all such cases are clear of doubts and uncertainties as to the integrity of parties who are opposed. But the court limits its judgment to the facts in proof as applied to the charges preferred against the bankrupts. In this case, then, according to my view of the objections and the evidence, there is not enough shown to bar the discharge and certificate. Decree accordingly.

BANKS, (BACKSTACK v.) See Case No. 711.

BANKS, (COWEN v.) See Case No. 3,295.

Case No. 959.

BANKS v. GREENLEAF.

[1 Hughes, 261;[1] 6 Call, 271.]

Circuit Court, D. Virginia. Nov. Term, 1799.

INSOLVENCY — VALIDITY OF DISCHARGE IN OTHER STATES.

G., a citizen of Maryland, gave his bond, in Virginia, to B., a citizen of Virginia, and afterwards, in Maryland, became a bankrupt by the laws of Maryland, under which he was duly discharged by the competent tribunal of Maryland under a general direction with respect to his creditors. This did not discharge him in a suit afterwards brought upon the bond in Virginia.

[Cited in Green v. Sarmiento, Case No. 5,760.]

[See Hinkley v. Marean, Case No. 6,523; Baldwin v. Hale, 1 Wall. (68 U. S.) 223; Towne v. Smith, Case No. 14,115.]

[At law. Action of debt by Banks against Greenleaf. Heard on demurrer to plea. Demurrer sustained.]

Some years past, Greenleaf, a citizen of Maryland, became indebted, by bond given in Virginia, to Banks, a citizen and inhabitant of the state of Virginia. Afterwards, Greenleaf took the benefit of the bankrupt laws of Maryland; and being arrested for the foregoing debt in this court, he pleaded the discharge, under the bankrupt laws of Maryland, in bar of the claim. To this plea the plaintiff demurred; and the defendant joined in the demurrer.

Bennet Taylor, for the plaintiff, contended, that the plaintiff and defendant, not being citizens of the same state, the laws of Maryland did not bind the plaintiff. For the several states are sovereign and independent of each other, (2 Wash. [Va.] 298,) and therefore, the laws for one cannot, for transactions out of its limits, bind the citizens of another more than two unconnected countries can bind the subjects of each other, (Cooke, Bankr. Law, 243; Wythe, 133; James v. Allen, 1 Dall. [1 U. S.] 188.)

Randolph, contra.

The discharge, under the bankrupt laws of Maryland, is a complete bar to the plaintiff's action. All countries make laws against absentees; and, if they are improper, it is a state and not a judiciary question. Robinson v. Bland, 1 W. Bl. 258, takes the distinction between local and general statutes, making the latter to be obligatory in other countries. But Solomons v. Ross, 1 H. Bl. 131, is decisive; and proves the universal effect of bankrupt laws, with respect to personal actions, which is confirmed by Martin, Law Nations, 104. There is no difference as to the obligation, whether it be a judiciary or legislative act of a foreign country. Besides, in this case, the court of chancery in Maryland has acted with regard to the creditors at large of the bankrupt; and so far as it may be called judicial.[2] The articles of confederation between the United States give the inhabitants of one state all the benefit of the other states; and if they took the conveniences they should sustain the inconveniences. This, necessarily, results from the reciprocal rights of citizens of different states, because they are all, as it were, citizens of each state. The case of Miller v. Hall, 1 Dall. [1 U. S.] 229, is expressly like this, and ought to govern it. The constitution itself establishes the reciprocal respect due to laws of one state in another, and our doctrine is not repelled by the power of congress to make bankrupt laws; because what we contend for only applies until congress have acted on the subject. Cur. adv. vult.

[1] [Reported by Hon. Robert W. Hughes, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. The principles laid down by Huberus, and universally acknowledged, are, that the laws of every government have force within the limits of the government, and are obligatory upon all who are within its bounds, whether subjects or temporary residents. They have no effect directly with the people of any other government, but, by the courtesy of nations, to be inferred from their tacit consent, the laws which are executed within the limits of any government are permitted to operate everywhere, provided they do not produce injury to the rights of such other government or its citizens. This principle is universally admitted among all civilized nations, and has grown out of mutual convenience which they experience from it. "For," says the same author, "nothing would be more inconvenient in the promiscuous intercourse and practice of mankind, than that what was valid by the laws of one place should be rendered of no effect elsewhere by a severity of law." From these principles has arisen the doctrine admitted by all, that whoever makes a contract, in any particular place, is bound by the laws of that place as a temporary citizen. So a will or conveyance of movable property, executed according to the forms prescribed by law where made, has effect in every country, though not consistent with the forms or ceremony there observed. But there are certain exceptions from and modifications of these rules, some of which it may be proper to mention. As if a person shall go into a foreign country to perform a particular act, with a view to elude the laws of his own country in fraudem legis. So the effect of a contract, made in one place, will be allowed according to the laws of that country, if no inconvenience results therefrom to the citizens of the country where those laws are sought to be enforced, for the courtesy of nations could not be supposed to go so far as to admit the force of foreign laws to produce a prejudice to its citizens, to which they had, by wont of their own, submitted. So if the law of a place where a contract is made be contrary to the laws of our own country, in which a contract is also made inconsistent with a contract made in another place, we should observe our own law rather than the foreign one.

Let us proceed to examine this case, according to these rules: The contract in question was made in Virginia, by a citizen of Maryland with a citizen of Virginia. The contract is, therefore, subject to the laws of Virginia; and the question is, whether the laws of a foreign country (if Maryland be such) discharging a contract, can be admitted here? The rule is, that the laws of a foreign country prevail if not prejudicial to the country or its citizens, and this is merely gratuitous; but to admit them to prejudice its own citizens, would be a courtesy bordering on quixotism. No government would submit to it; no government can be presumed to have tacitly submitted to this. But if the citizens go abroad and submit to their [foreign] laws, as temporary subjects, they must be bound by them, though to their prejudice; if they make a contract there, the law of that country is to prevail. In this case it would be a matter of choice; if the laws of that country give effect to the contract, he must submit to their laws which discharge it.

If a will or deed is made abroad, or matrimony contracted, all the consequences follow. But if the parties have never so submitted, no government would permit a citizen to be prejudiced by foreign laws. Here are two conflicting laws. One giving validity to a contract, and governing it throughout to its discharge; and the other discharging it in a manner different from and in violation of the contract, and the appeal is made to our laws. Which is to prevail? The rule is, magis est ut in tali conflictu, ut jus nostrum, quam jus alienum, servemus. The contract in question obliges Greenleaf to pay Banks so much money. The law of Maryland says he may deliver himself by paying a part. If this be valid here, it would have been so if it had said he should deliver himself without paying any part. These laws are contradictory to each other. What, then, says the law of nations upon this subject? That the law of the country where the contract is made shall prevail; and if the law of a foreign country be inconsistent with ours, ours shall prevail.

I think the rule may safely be laid down, that if a foreigner come into our country, and there enter into a contract, the laws of his nor any other foreign country can, in our courts, be received to control, alter, or discharge it, unless the parties, by some act of their own, submit to the laws of such foreign country.

[2] This was merely the order of the chancellor with respect of the creditors in general of the bankrupt, and did not relate to this case in particular, nor was the petitioning or suing before him.

Let us examine the cases which have been cited at the bar, and see whether they throw light upon this subject. The first case which I shall notice is that of Warder v. Arell, in the court of appeals of this state, 2 Wash. [Va.] 298. In that the contract was made in Pennsylvania, and discharged under the laws of that state. That case lays down the rule as stated by Huberus, that the contract having been made in Pennsylvania, the laws of that state must govern, not as to the form, validity, or construction of the contract, but as to the discharge, for this was the only question. The expressions of all the judges in that case are remarkably strong to prove that the ground on which the laws of Pennsylvania, operating to produce the discharge, prevailed, was, that the contract was made there. Devisme v. Martin, Wythe, 133, was the case of British subjects altogether, but the chancellor states generally that the remedy of an American creditor against the bankrupt would not have been affected by the transfer of the bankrupt's effects to the assignee under the English law. Whether, if the contract has been made in England, he would have so decided, does not appear, nor was it necessary, since that was not the case before the court. In James v. Allen, 1 Dall. [1 U. S.] 188, it does not appear where the contract was made. If in Pennsylvania, I concur in the decision. If in New Jersey, I do not; because in such a case, the decision would go too far, if I am correct in the principles before laid down. Miller v. Hall, 1 Dall. [1 U. S.] 229, is obscurely reported, as to the state of the case, for it is doubtful whether the agreement, which is said to have been executed in Pennsylvania, was the one made by Miller and Hall with the owners of the goods, or the articles of copartnery between Miller and Hall. The suit, as I understand it, was brought by Miller to recover his proportion of the commission upon goods sold in Massachusetts; if it means the former, then unquestionably the cause of action arose in Massachusetts, and Hall had by no act of his submitted to the laws of Pennsylvania; if the latter, it might be a doubtful matter where it arose. The doctrine I admit is laid down very broad by the chief justice, and I do not know of any case which has gone so far as this. Emory v. Grenough, [Case No. 4,471,] was decided before Judge Iredell, in the circuit court of Massachusetts. The parties were citizens of Massachusetts, and the debt contracted there. The debtor afterwards became a citizen of Pennsylvania (not in fraudem), and obtained a certificate of bankruptcy, and pleaded it in Massachusetts, but it was not allowed. Judge Wilson, however, decided a similar case otherwise.

We come now to the British decisions. Solomons v. Ross, 1 H. Bl. 131; Jollet v. Deponthieu, Id. 132; Neale v. Cottingham, Id.; 1 Bac. Abr. 434,—are all alike. The debts were contracted, it is probable, in Holland, at all events it does not appear that the creditors had been in Holland, and there became the creditors of the bank. 1 H. Bl. 131. Sill v. Worswick, Id. 694, was a contract between British subjects, and the contract was made there. It is, in this case, that the doctrine was laid down, that personal property has no locality, and is subject to the law which governs the person of the owner, but the meaning of the judge, as to this general expression, is explained, for he says, as to the disposition of it, and its transmission by succession, or the act of the party. This is all true, all is consistent with the principles laid down. He does not contend that a contract made in St. Christopher should be governed by the laws of England, but that in such a case as the one he was speaking of, the government of St. Christopher, and all others, would give effect to the bankrupt laws of England, and so they ought. But the cases of Warring v. Knight, [Cooke, Bankr. Law, 1st Ed., 372,] mentioned by the judge, proves clearly that the place of contract would make a difference. He says that it does not appear whether the person was a resident in Gibraltar, prior to the bankruptcy, or the debt was contracted there, or whether he appeared to the suit, facts which would have materially altered the decision. In the case [Anon.] reported in [1] Brown, Ch. 376, of a payment made in Carolina, the chancellor relies upon the circumstance that the debt was contracted there. Thus, I think, it is clear that the cases which touch this point do in general support, and that there is not one which contradicts it, unless it be that of Sutter & Hart,[2] which I am not clear does so.

I will admit it is a hardship upon Greenleaf, but it would be equally hard upon Banks, and therefore it is more proper to observe our law than that of Maryland. This cannot be considered as a judgment of a Maryland court, which can bind persons residing out of that state; they are no parties to it; the claim of the plaintiff has not been litigated, after the plaintiff and defendant had submitted to the laws of that country, and had a dispute settled and adjudged. Admiralty causes bind all the world, because decided upon the laws of nations, and for the convenience of all nations. But the justice of other decisions may be questioned, and if a law of a foreign country were to declare that a decision of causes, without notice, should bind everybody, no foreign country would observe it. Our attachment law is fair and just, and would be regarded everywhere.

The next point is, whether Maryland, as to her municipal regulations, is to be considered foreign to this state? Although I am clearly of opinion that the general government derives its existence and power from the people, and not from the states, yet each state government derives its powers from the people of that particular state. Their forms of government are different, being derived from different sources, and their laws are different. Those of one state are as little obligatory upon another, as those of a foreign country. They are not as represented, and have no control over those who made them. They cannot be said to owe allegiance to any state in which they do not reside. What effect, then, has the 1st section of the 4th article of the constitution upon this subject? Read it as if it only said, full faith and credit shall be given in each state to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other state. But for this it would be foreign, and their validity might be questioned. But this clause forbids it. Full faith must be given. Therefore you cannot question the validity of the judgment. This is the construction given in the case of Armstrong v. Carson, [Case No. 543,] in the circuit court of Pennsylvania, by Judge Wilson, where the doctrine was so laid down by Bradford, and admitted by Ingersol. But if there be a doubt upon those words, those which follow remove it. Congress is to prescribe the manner in which they shall be proved, and the effect thereof. The demurrer is sustained.

[2] [Not found.]

Case No. 960.

BANKS v. KING.

[1 Cranch, C. C. 543.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. June Term, 1809.

SET-OFF—WHEN ALLOWABLE—NOTE EXECUTED BEFORE BANKRUPTCY.

In an action by an insolvent debtor for the use of his trustee, the defendant may set off the plaintiff's note to a third person, with a blank indorsement, upon proof that the note came to the defendants' hands before the insolvency; but he cannot set off a joint note of the plaintiff and another.

At law. Assumpsit [by Banks, an insolvent, for the use of his trustee, against George and A. King] for goods sold; non assumpsit, and discount pleaded in bar. The defendant offered to set off a note made by the plaintiff to John Templeman, and by him indorsed in blank.

Mr. Porter, for the plaintiff, objected that it did not appear at what time the note came to the hands of the defendants, and that the precise time must be proved. Dickson v. Evans, 6 Term R. 57.

THE COURT (DUCKETT, Circuit Judge, absent,) permitted the defendant to read the note in evidence, on proof that it came to his hands before the plaintiff's insolvency.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

Mr. Morsell, for the defendant, offered to set off a note due from Lowdermilk & Banks to Kunkle & Ghequere, and by them indorsed to the defendant, and offered to prove that the original debt was due from Banks alone for goods sold him by Kunkle & Ghequere.

Mr. Porter, for the plaintiff, contra, objected that they must be mutual debts, and due in the same right, and cited 1 Pow. Cont. 440; 1 H. Bl. 659; 1 Wils. 155; Bull. N. P. 179; and Cowp. 133.

And of that opinion was THE COURT, (DUCKETT, Circuit Judge, absent.) Verdict for plaintiff.

Case No. 961.

BANKS et al. v. McDIVITT et al.

[13 Blatchf. 163;[1] 8 O. G. 860.]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Oct. 29, 1875.

COPYRIGHT—INFRINGEMENT—COMPILATION FROM ORIGINAL SOURCES—NEW EDITION—PROVISIONAL INJUNCTION.

1. B. took a copyright, in 1871, for the "Rules of Practice of the Supreme Court of the State of New York," and one in 1874 for the "General Rules of Practice of the Courts of Record of the State of New York." The book of 1871 contained the rules adopted by the judges under the authority of a state statute, in 1870, with notes to each rule, stating the substance of the decisions of the courts in regard to such rule, giving the volumes and pages of the reports. The book of 1874 contained like rules adopted in 1874, with like notes. By law, the judges were required to revise the rules every two years. M. published in 1875 a book containing the rules adopted in 1874, with notes to each rule, referring only to the volume and page of the reports of decisions in regard to such rule. M., in compiling his book, copied the citations in B.'s book of 1874, and supplemented them by citations from B.'s book of 1871, and by results of his own research. In a large majority of the notes in M.'s book, the citations were the same, and placed in the same order, as in B.'s book of 1874: Held, that M. had infringed B.'s copyright of 1874.

[Cited in Johnson v. Donaldson, 3 Fed. 25.]

2. Compilers of books which contain facts derived from common sources of information, must investigate for themselves from the original sources which are open to all persons, and cannot use the labors of a previous compiler, animo furandi, and the subsequent compiler cannot save his own time by copying the results of the previous compiler's study, although the same results could have been obtained by independent labor.

[Cited in Johnson v. Donaldson, 3 Fed. 25.]

3. The publication by B. of the rules of 1874, with appropriate notes, was not the publication of a new edition of the rules of 1871, within the statute requiring certain words in regard to the copyright to be inserted in the several copies of every edition of a copyrighted book.

4. Where an infringement is palpable, and a provisional injunction will not be attended with serious injury, such injunction is not ordinarily refused as to so much of the work as is a plain infringement of the prior publication.

[In equity. Bill by David Banks and others against John R. McDivitt and others for a provisional injunction restraining an infringement of copyright. Injunction granted.]

[1] [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

Elbert E. Anderson, for plaintiffs.
Reed & Drake, for defendants.

SHIPMAN, District Judge. The plaintiffs are the proprietors of a book which was published in 1871, entitled, "Rules of Practice of the Supreme Court of the State of New York," &c., and are also proprietors of a book which was published in the year 1874, entitled, "General Rules of Practice of the Courts of Record of the State of New York." All the requirements of the statutes of the United States in regard to copyright have been complied with by the plaintiffs in respect to each of these books. The book which was published in 1871 contains the rules of practice which were adopted in general session of the justices and judges of the state of New York, on December 20th and 21st, 1870, with notes appended to each rule. The notes briefly state the substance of the decisions which had been made by the courts of New York in reference to the rules to which the notes are respectively appended, give the number and page of the volume in which the decision is to be found, and in like manner refer to the volume and page of the statutes which relate to the rule. A convention of justices and judges is required to be held biennially, to revise, alter, abolish and make rules which shall be binding upon courts of record in the state. The book which was published in 1874 contains the rules of practice which were adopted in the convention of the justices and judges on November 24th, 1874, and which took effect on February 1st, 1875, and also contains notes and references upon the plan of the book of 1871, but upon a much larger scale, the book of 1871 having seventy pages, while the book of 1874 is of one hundred and twenty pages. The plaintiffs published a similar volume in 1858.

In the year 1875, the defendants published a book entitled, "New Rules of the Courts, General and Special, 1875," &c. This volume contains the rules which had been adopted by the judges on November 24th, 1874, with notes appended to each rule, which notes refer only to the volume and page of the various statutes and reports of decisions which relate to the rule. The book also has an index of the general rules, and contains the special rules of the supreme and other courts of the state.

The plaintiffs brought, in February, 1875, a bill in equity, alleging that the introduction, the notes, and the index of the defendants' book were copied from the plaintiffs' book of 1874, in violation of the rights secured to them by the acts of the United States respecting copyright, and praying for an injunction, and also filed a motion for a provisional injunction. This motion has been heard, and is the only part of the case which is now to be decided. The plaintiffs do not claim that they have acquired any title to the rules, which are admitted to be common property, neither do they assert that there is anything novel in the plan, or system, or arrangement of their compilation, or of their index. The notes are mainly a digest of the decisions of the courts of New York and of the statutes of the state. The volumes which contain the decisions and the statutes are sources of information which are common and open to all, and to which each compiler can resort. But the plaintiffs complain that the defendants have not availed themselves of the original sources of information, but have resorted to the labor-saving expedient of copying the citations which the research of the plaintiffs had discovered, and that such a use of the labors of an author or compiler is an unauthorized violation of the rights which are secured by the acts of congress.

The rights and duties of compilers of books which are not original in their character, but are compilations of facts from common and universal sources of information, of which books, directories, maps, guide books, road books, statistical tables and digests are the most familiar examples, are well settled. No compiler of such a book has a monopoly of the subject of which the book treats. Any other person is permitted to enter that department of literature and make a similar book. But, the subsequent investigator must investigate for himself, from the original sources which are open to all. He cannot use the labors of a previous compiler, animo furandi, and save his own time by copying the results of the previous compiler's study, although the same results could have been attained by independent labor. The compiler of a digest, a road book, a directory, or a map can search and survey for himself in the fields which all laborers are permitted to occupy, but cannot adopt as his own the products of another's toil. "He may work on the same original materials, but he cannot exclusively and evasively use those already collected and embodied by the skill and industry and expenditures of another." 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 940. The rights of compilers of this class of works have been recently carefully considered by Sir W. Page Wood, vice-chancellor, in the cases of Jarrold v. Houlston, 3 Kay & J. 708; Kelly v. Morris, L. R. 1 Eq. Cas. 697, and Scott v. Stanford, L. R. 3 Eq. Cas. 718, and the rule which I have stated has been reaffirmed. In the case of Kelly v. Morris, the learned vice-chancellor says: "In the case of a dictionary, map, guide book, or directory, when there are certain common objects of information, which must, if described correctly, be described in the same words, a subsequent compiler is bound to set about doing for himself that which the first compiler has done." The rule is recognized or stated in Hogg v. Kirby, 8 Ves. 215;

Matthewson v. Stockdale, 12 Ves. 270; Longman v. Winchester, 16 Ves. 269; Wilkins v. Aikin, 17 Ves. 422; Lewis v. Fullarton, 2 Beav. 6; Hotten v. Arthur, 1 Hem. & M. 603; Gray v. Russell, [Case No. 5,728;] Folsom v. Marsh, [Id. 4,901;] Emerson v. Davies, [Id. 4,436;] and Curt. Copyr. 174–177. I do not understand that the rule prohibits an examination of previous works by the compiler before he has finished his own book, or the mere obtaining of ideas from such previous works, but it does prohibit a use of any part of the previous book, animo furandi, "with an intention to take for the purpose of saving himself labor." Jarrold v. Houlston, 3 Kay & J. 708.

A careful inspection of the plaintiffs' books of 1858, 1871, and 1874, and of the defendants' book, and of Lansing's Code and Rules, published by the plaintiffs, to which my attention has been directed by the defendants' counsel, has led me to the conviction, that the general course which was adopted by the compiler of the defendants' book, was to copy the citations in the plaintiffs' book of 1874, and, if necessary, to supplement them with other citations in the book of 1871, and with references which his own research had discovered; but his chief original source of information was the plaintiffs' book of 1874. The conclusion that he copied these citations, in the first instance, from the plaintiffs' compilation, is derived from the fact, that, in a large majority of the notes, the citations are not only the same which are given in the plaintiffs' book of 1874, but are placed in precisely the same order in which they were arranged by the plaintiffs. This peculiarity is manifested throughout the defendants' book. It is noticeable in the notes which are appended to nearly all of the ninety-seven rules, other than those which follow rules 20, 22, 33, 35, 37, 43, 45, 47, 51, 53, 56, 58, 61, 63, 66, 68, 69, 71, 72, 77, 78, 82, 85, 86, 87, 88, 92, 93, 94, 96, and 97. Thus, the citations under rule 7 are, "Rule 7, of 1871, amended; 2 How. 154; 1 Code R. 119; 3 How. 276; 1 Code R. 42; 5 Paige, 83; 4 do. 140." The citations under rule 8 are, "Rule 5, of 1858, amended; Rule 8, of 1871, amended; Code, sects. 193 to 197; 4 Bosw. 632; 1 Wend. 35; 2 East, 181; 1 H. Blk. 76; note at 7 Abb. 73; 15 John. 535; 20 John. 129; 1 Chitt. 713; 2 W. Blk. 799; 2 Strange, 889." These citations are the same as those which are contained in the plaintiffs' book, and are placed in the same order in each compilation. There are, in the defendants' book, under the 18th rule, sixty-two citations of decisions, all but one of which are the same, and are in the same order, as those which are contained in the plaintiffs' book of 1874. It is impossible to suppose that the defendants could, by accident, have placed their references in the exact order in which they are found in the plaintiffs' book. The inference is irresistible, that the plaintiffs' book was first resorted to for the purpose of saving the time and labor which must otherwise have been spent in an original examination of the reports. I presume that the defendants' compiler subsequently examined the reports, in order to verify the accuracy of the citations, and to conceal the errors which he may have found, and that he did correct errors; and it is apparent, that, in many instances, he added citations which his own investigations discovered; but, it is manifest, that he was, to a large extent, in the first instance, a copyist of the labor of the plaintiffs. He states, indeed, in his affidavit, that his notes and references were principally taken from the plaintiffs' books of 1858 and of 1871, and from Lansing's Code and Rules, published by the plaintiffs in 1872, but thinks that he did not draw materially from the plaintiffs' book of 1874.

The defendants' index, of ten pages, is almost a reprint of the plaintiffs' index, except that the former refers to the rule, instead of the page. This fact is not denied in the affidavit of the defendants' compiler, and an examination shows that his index was almost exclusively made with the scissors, and not with the pen. Three sentences of the plaintiff's introduction are also substantially found in the corresponding portion of the defendants' book; but I do not deem this resemblance to be important.

It follows, that the principle of law which I have stated has been violated, and that the plaintiffs are entitled to relief, unless they are debarred from any remedy by some other principle which may be invoked by the defendants. They insist, in this part of the case, that the provisions of the copyright act, which are now contained in section 4962 of the Revised Statutes of 1874, have not been regarded by the plaintiffs. This section provides, that no person shall maintain an action for the infringement of his copyright, unless he shall give notice thereof, by inserting in the several copies of every edition published, on the title-page, or the page immediately following, if it be a book, * * * the following words, "Entered according to act of congress, in the year , by A. B., in the office of the librarian of congress, at Washington." The proper page of the book of 1874 contained the entry, "Entered, &c., in the year 1874," but did not also contain the announcement that a previous edition had been entered in the year 1871; and it is contended, that, inasmuch as the book called "Rules of 1874" is another edition of the "Rules of 1871," the non-entry in the book of 1874 of the fact that the book of 1871 was entered, has destroyed the right to any action for an infringement. It is not necessary to consider the consequence of a non-compliance with this section in each edition of a book, for, I am of the opinion that a publication of the rules of 1874, with appropriate notes, is not a subsequent edition of the rules of 1871. The statute of New York provides that a convention of justices and chief judges shall be held at the capitol in the city of Albany, on the first Wednesday of August, 1870, and every two years thereafter, and such convention shall revise, alter, abolish, and make rules, which shall be binding upon all courts of record, so far as they may be applicable to the practice thereof. The rules of 1874 were adopted in pursuance of this statute, on November 24th, 1874, and were ordered to commence and take effect on February 1st, 1875, and were a new and revised set of rules. New rules had been added and old rules had been amended. They were virtually new rules of the courts, which were to take effect on an appointed day, and the publication of the plaintiffs was in no proper sense a new edition of the rules of 1871. [An "edition" is defined to be "a republication, sometimes with revision and correction; any publication of a book before published." Webst. Dict. The book entitled "The Rules of 1874" was not a republication or a publication of "The Rules of 1871."] [2]

It is also suggested that the plaintiffs are not entitled to protection, because they are also infringers of previous publications of like character. I have not been referred to any book which they have infringed, except the Rules of Practice published by W. C. Little & Co., in 1858, and, from my examination of this book, I cannot perceive that the plaintiffs have made any unjustifiable use of it.

Where an infringement is palpable, and a provisional injunction will not be attended with serious injury, it is not ordinarily refused, as to so much of the work as is a plain infringement of the prior publication. Let a provisional injunction issue restraining the defendants from the sale of any volumes or books which contain the notes which are appended to the "New or Revised Rules of 1875," other than the notes to rules 20, 22, 33, 35, 37, 43, 45, 47, 51, 53, 56, 58, 61, 63, 66, 68, 69, 71, 72, 77, 78, 82, 85, 86, 87, 88, 92, 93, 94, 96, and 97, and which contain the index now printed in said book.

Case No. 962.

BANKS v. The METROPOLIS.

[45 Hunt, Mer. Mag. 590; 1 Pars. Adm. 597, note.]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Nov. 8, 1861.

COLLISION—LOOKOUT—LIBELLANT'S DUTY TO ATTEMPT SALVAGE.

[The owner of a vessel sunk in a collision in the middle of Long Island sound, is not bound to attempt to save anything from the wreck, but is entitled to recover as for a total loss.]

[Cited in The Nebraska, Case No. 10,076.]

[2] [From 8 O. G. 862.]

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the southern district of New York.

[In admiralty. Libel by Simon Banks against the steamboat Metropolis for collision. The district court gave a decree for libellant, (unreported.) Respondent appeals. Affirmed.]

NELSON, Circuit Justice. The libel is filed in this case to recover damages against the Metropolis for a collision with the sloop Golden Rule, on the night of the 12th August, 1858, on Long Island sound, some five or six miles off Falkland's Island, and nearly midway between that and the Long Island shore. The sloop was laden with corn and feed and bound for Providence, Rhode Island. The Metropolis was on her usual trip from Fall river to the city of New York. The night was not very dark, the wind light, east southeast or southeast, the sloop going but one or two miles an hour, close hauled; she saw the lights of the steamer several miles off, and, when within some two or three miles, coming on a course apparently towards her, a bright light was hoisted by a hand standing on the deck; and afterwards, the steamer still continuing her course, he stood upon the top of the cabin, holding the light as high as he could with his arm.

The pilot of the Metropolis admits he saw a light of a vessel some two or three miles off on his port bow, but that it soon disappeared, and he did not again see it till the moment of the collision. No change was made in the course or speed of the vessel, which was sixteen miles an hour, after discerning the light; nor, for aught that appears, was there any attention paid to it. The look-out admits he saw no light, nor did he report any till just as the collision happened. The better opinion, upon the proofs, is that, with a competent and vigilant look-out on the steamer, the sloop might have been seen even without a light, as the night was not very dark; but, with the light exhibited on the sloop, of which we cannot doubt, as all on board testify to it, there is no excuse for not having seen her in time to have avoided the disaster. We consider the case a very plain one of fault on the part of the steamer. As to the damages, we agree with the court below that the libellant was entitled to recover on the basis of a total loss. The injury to the vessel and cargo was so great,—and both submerged near the middle of the sound, which, at the place of collision, was some sixteen miles wide,—he was not under obligation to encounter the hazard and expense of attempting their rescue, or to save anything from the wreck. If the attempt had resulted in the increase of his loss, which it probably would, the respondents would not have been liable for it. Decree affirmed.

Case No. 963.

BANKS v. MILLER.

[1 Cranch, C. C. 543.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. June Term, 1809.

DEPOSITION—RESIDENCE OF ADVERSE PARTY—PRODUCTION OF BOOKS AND PAPERS.

1. It is a sufficient averment of the residence of the adverse party, by the magistrate who takes a deposition under the act of congress, if he certifies that it appears to him that the party resides more than one hundred miles from the place of caption.

2. If books and papers are in court they may be called for after the jury is sworn.

[Cited in Wallar v. Stewart, Case No. 17,109.]

[See Merrill v. Dawson, Case No. 9,469; Edmonston v. Barrell, Id. 4,284; Patapsco Ins. Co. v. Southgate, 5 Pet. (30 U. S.) 604.]

A deposition, taken under the act of congress, was offered in evidence by the defendant. The magistrate who took it, certified that it appeared to him that the adverse party and his counsel resided at the city of Washington, upwards of one hundred miles from the place of taking the said deposition.

Mr. Caldwell, for the plaintiff, objected, that it was not a positive averment that the adverse party and his attorney were at the time more than one hundred miles, &c.

But THE COURT (DUCKETT, Circuit Judge, absent) overruled the objection.

After the jury was sworn, the defendant called on the plaintiff to produce his books of account, which were then on the table.

THE COURT thought it due notice, as the books were in court.

BANKS, (PAIGE v.) See Case No. 10,671.

BANKS, (SMYTH v.) See Case No. 13,134.

BANKS, (WADDINGTON v.) See Case No. 17,028.

BANNATYNE, (HERBERT v.) See Case No. 6,396.

Case No. 964.

BANNENDAHL v. REDFIELD.

[4 Blatchf. 223;[2] 40 Hunt, Mer. Mag. 75.]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Oct. 2, 1858.

CUSTOMS DUTIES — ACTION TO RECOVER PENALTY —ACT MARCH 3, 1851—ACT AUG. 30, 1842.

1. The 3d section of the act of March 3, 1851, (9 Stat. 630,) in regard to reappraisals of imported goods, applies to all goods, as well those imported by their manufacturer, as those imported by their purchaser.

2. The 17th section of the act of August 30, 1842, (5 Stat. 564,) authorizes the imposition of a penalty of 50 per cent., for the undervaluation of any goods imported, other than those purchased, which latter are provided for by the 8th section of the act of July 30, 1846, (9 Stat. 43,) which imposes a penalty of 20 per cent. on their appraised value.

At law. This was an action [by Conrad N. Bannendahl] against [Heman J. Redfield] the collector of the port of New York, to recover back a penalty of 50 per cent., imposed under § 17 of the act of August 30, 1842, (5 Stat. 564,) for the undervaluation of goods, and paid under protest. The plaintiff claimed to have been the manufacturer of the goods, and insisted that, for that reason, no penalty could be imposed on them under that section. He also claimed, that a reappraisal which was had in the case, under the act of March 3, 1851, (9 Stat. 630, § 3,) should not have been made under that act, but should have been made under the acts of March 1, 1823, (3 Stat. 734, § 13,) and May 28, 1830, (4 Stat. 410, § 4.) [Judgment for defendant.]

NELSON, Circuit Justice. The reappraisal was properly made under the act of March 3d, 1851. The 3d section of that act applies to all goods imported into the United States, as well those imported by their manufacturer, as those imported by their purchaser.

The 17th section of the act of August 30th, 1842, authorizes the imposition of a penalty of 50 per cent., for the undervaluation of any goods imported other than those purchased, which latter are provided for by the 8th section of the act of July 30, 1846, (9 Stat. 43,) which imposes a penalty of 20 per cent. on their appraised value.

There must be a judgment for the defendant, upon the questions reserved in the case made.

BANNER, The, (WARD v.) See Case No. 17,149.

Case No. 965.

The BANSHEE.

[Blatchf. Pr. Cas. 580.]

District Court, S. D. New York. Dec. Term, 1863.

PRIZE—VIOLATION OF BLOCKADE.

Vessel and cargo condemned for an attempt to violate the blockade.

In admiralty.

Before BETTS, District Judge.

BETTS, District Judge. The above-named steamer Banshee and her cargo were libelled in this court December 1, 1863, charged with being rightfully subject to capture as lawful prize of war. They were seized at sea, off the coast of North Carolina, while attempting to violate the blockade there imposed by the United States government, and were sent into this port for adjudication. Process of attachment and monition was regularly issued, returned, and published in the case, and a decree by default was ordered by the court, and registered therein December 22, 1863. It is quite needless to rehearse the contents of the numerous documents and vouchers submitted to the court and examined by it in the consideration of this case, as the direct and explicit testimony of the witnesses examined in the preparatorio demonstrates the culpability of the prize, and the court will avoid encumbering its files by repeating details which are of no service in establishing the causes for the conviction of the prize. The certificate of British registry shows that the vessel was of English build and ownership, and was registered in Liverpool September 14, 1863, to Toulin Lawrence, merchant, of Liverpool, Jonathan Walkden Steele being master. The shipping agreements found on board the vessel show that she had been employed under the said master, in October and November, 1863, in voyages from Liverpool to Nassau, N. P. and from Nassau to Confederate ports.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

[2] [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

[1] [Reported by Samuel Blatchford, Esq.]

The master, on his examination in preparatorio, states that the vessel was captured November 21, 1863, about ten or twelve miles to the eastward of Cape Lookout, North Carolina, for attempting to run the blockade; that she had a Confederate flag, and no other on board to hoist when going into a Confederate port; that the United States vessel Fulton made the capture; that she fired sixteen shots; that the Grand Gulf fired four shots; that the prize was owned by E. Lawrence & Co., of Liverpool, England; that the witness was master of the vessel, and was appointed by Lawrence & Co., at Liverpool; that the vessel came out of Nassau November 17, 1863; that her voyage was to have ended in Wilmington, North Carolina; that the bills of lading, bags of letters, and other papers on the ship were thrown overboard during the chase; that he knew Wilmington was under blockade and was at war with the United States; that the Banshee had run the blockade eight times under his command; and that they endeavored to escape from the capturing vessel, but were chased and brought to by being fired at. The chief mate says that the chase of the prize continued from four to five hours, and that she was taken while attempting to run the blockade and get into Wilmington. The second and third mates and the purser concur in the general tenor of the testimony of the master and first mate. No evidence is given by either witness exculpatory of the offence of attempting to violate the blockade of Wilmington charged and proved against the vessel.

A decree of condemnation and forfeiture is, therefore, upon the proofs, ordered to be entered against the steamer and her cargo.

Case No. 966.

BANTA v. McNEIL.

[5 Ben. 74;[1] 15 Int. Rev. Rec. 144.]

District Court, E. D. New York. March Term, 1871.[2]

JURISDICTION—HALF PILOTAGE—MARITIME CONTRACT.

1. A court of admiralty has jurisdiction over an action brought by a pilot to recover the half pilotage, declared by a state statute to be due to the first pilot who tenders his services to a vessel.

[Cited in Mason v. Ingraham, Case No. 9,238; Weaver v. McLellan, Id. 17,309.]

[See note at end of case.]

2. Cases, arising quasi ex contractu, pertaining to navigation, are cases in admiralty.

[In admiralty. Libel in personam by Alexander S. Banta against Alexander McNeil, owner of the bark Maggie Mitchell, to recover half pilotage, under the pilot act of New York. Decree for libellant. Subsequently the petition of Alexander McNeil for a writ of prohibition to the judges of the district court was dismissed by the supreme court in Ex parte McNeil, 13 Wall. (80 U. S.) 236.]

BENEDICT, District Judge. This case presents for a decision but a single question of law. It is an action by a pilot against the owner of the bark Maggie Mitchell, to recover half pilotage.

The evidence shows the tender of the service, as alleged, and also the refusal of the service by the master, and that the libellant was the first pilot who made such a tender. The only question in the case is as to the right of the libellant to maintain such an action in the admiralty, to recover the half pilotage, which he became entitled to demand upon the facts proved. This question is new in this court. If the demand be pilotage, or within the principles applied to pilotage, strictly so called, no doubt can be entertained as to the libellant's right to recover in this action; for it was long ago decided that pilotage is within the jurisdiction of the admiralty. But this demand is said to be simply a demand for a penalty created by a state law. The law referred to is the pilot act of the state of New York, which contains the usual provision for half pilotage, a feature so common in pilot laws, that it is unnecessary more fully to describe it here. This statute of the state has never been adopted as a national law by any statute of the United States. The act of August 7th, 1789, [1 Stat. 54, § 4,] only adopts the statute of the states then in force, and does not include the present act, and the declaration that "pilotage shall continue to be regulated in conformity with such laws as the states may respectively hereafter enact for that purpose," which is contained in the act, has no effect to adopt future laws of the states, but simply to manifest the understanding of congress, that the power to legislate upon the subject is not exclusive in the United States. Cooley v. Board of Wardens, 12 How. [53 U. S.] 320. Congress never having legislated upon this subject, the statute of the state of New York referred to is, therefore, a valid enactment, within the power of the state to make; and its legal effect is to render the defendant debtor to the libellant for the half pilotage here demanded.

[1] [Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

[2] [Petition for writ of prohibition denied in 13 Wall. (80 U. S.) 236.]

The half pilotage which becomes due and payable under such circumstances, has been distinctly held by the supreme court not to be a penalty, but a sum due on contract for services. In Steamship Co. v. Joliffe, 2 Wall. [69 U. S.] 450, it is decided, that, although half pilotage be given by the statute, it is only in consideration of services rendered, and that it is recoverable, notwithstanding the subsequent repeal of the statute, upon the ground that "where a right has arisen upon a contract, or a transaction in the nature of a contract authorized by statute, the repeal of the statute does not affect it."

Again, in a later case, Steamship Co. v. Port Wardens, 6 Wall. [73 U. S.] 34, it is declared, "that the right to recover half pilotage rests not only on state laws, but upon contract. Pilotage is compensation for services performed. Half pilotage is compensation for the services which the pilot has put himself in readiness to perform by labor, risk, and cost, and which he has actually offered to perform." According to these decisions, then, the defendants are liable to the libellant, upon a contract to pay him for his services in boarding the vessel, and making tender of his services to pilot their vessel to New York.

The only question remaining is, whether such contract be maritime, and within the jurisdiction of the admiralty.

And, first, it is to be remarked, that, although the state statute fixes the amount of compensation to be paid, this does not destroy or change the nature and character of the transaction. The amount due for wharfage is, in general, fixed by statute, but the demand is none the less within the jurisdiction of the admiralty. And so, too, it was held in Hobart v. Drogan, 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 120, in regard to pilotage proper, that the only effect of the state statute fixing the amount, was to limit the recovery in admiralty to the sum recoverable under the state laws, without affecting the jurisdiction. The jurisdiction depends upon the character of the contract.

Now, it is evident from the opinion of the supreme court, in Steamship Co. v. Port Wardens, 6 Wall. [73 U. S.], 34, that the contract for half pilotage is considered by that court to be similar in character to a contract for pilotage. Nor can I see how any distinction can be drawn between these two classes of demands, under the view taken by the supreme court. The service, the labor, and risk in reaching and boarding the vessel, for which half pilotage is paid, are clearly maritime in character; in fact, they form part of the service for which full pilotage is paid, when the pilot is taken. The liability to pay for these services is created in the interest of navigation. The safety of the vessel is the thing sought to be attained, and the ship actually derives the advantage of an opportunity to be piloted by an experienced pilot. These are the features of a maritime contract. But it is urged that, if the case be not one of penalty, it is no more than a case arising quasi ex contractu, and that such cases have not as yet been held to be maritime contracts, within the meaning of the constitution.

Cases arising quasi ex contractu, where the transaction, in nature and effect, appertains to navigation, are as clearly cases in admiralty as cases depending upon voluntary agreements.

It has been the constant practice of the admiralty to entertain proceedings arising either ex contractu or quasi ex contractu, or ex delicto or quasi ex delicto. The Mayurka, [Case No. 1,175.] As one instance, cases of salvage may be mentioned, which are not cases of contract, and certainly not of tort. The Eagle, 8 Wall. [75 U. S.] 23. Such cases, from the beginning of navigation, have been conceded to be within the jurisdiction of the admiralty. Moreover, salvage awards are not compensation for services rendered, and do not depend upon the quantum meruit. They are rewards which the maritime law, in the interest of commerce, declares shall be given under certain circumstances.

If, then, it were true that this action is simply to recover a penalty, there would not be wanting foundation to claim that it could properly be imposed by a court of admiralty. No reason is seen why, if salvage, which is a maritime reward, be within the jurisdiction, a maritime penalty should not be. Indeed, maritime penalties, imposed as punishment by maritime courts, are a common and characteristic feature of the jurisdiction. The three months' extra wages decreed for an unlawful discharge of a seaman is a statutory penalty, in part, at least, for the use of the government. Emerson v. Howland, [Case No. 4,441.] The forfeitures which are imposed upon seamen are mulcts for misconduct, inflicted by courts of admiralty in accordance with ancient rules of the maritime law. The Elizabeth Frith, [Id. 4,361.] The offences of drunkenness, theft, quarreling, and desertion, have all been thus punished by courts of admiralty, time and time again.

These instances are referred to here, not because I sustain this case as one of penalty, but because they tend to show that there is nothing new or strained in holding that a liability, arising from the law upon facts maritime in their character, may as well be enforced in a court of admiralty as a liability produced by the consent of parties.

Let the decree be in favor of the libellant for the amount claimed.

[NOTE. The petition of Alexander McNeil for a writ of prohibition to the judges of the district court of the United States was dismissed by the supreme court. Mr. Justice Swayne, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "The precise question we are considering came before this court in Cooley v. Board of Wardens, 12 How. (53 U. S.) 299. The suit was for half pilotage under a statute of Pennsylvania, substantially the same, in this particular, with the statute of New York. The plaintiff recovered in the lower court, and the supreme court of the state affirmed the judgment. The case was brought here for review by a writ of error under the 25th section of the judiciary act of 1867, (1 Stat. 85,) and was argued with exhaustive learning and ability. This court, after the fullest consideration of the subject, also affirmed the judgment. * * * The other objections taken to the judgment relate to the jurisdiction of the court. It is said there is no jurisdiction in admiralty to maintain a libel for a penalty. It was not a penalty that was recovered. There was a tender of services upon which the law raised an implied promise to pay the amount specified in the statute." Ex parte McNeil, 13 Wall. (80 U. S.) 236.]

BANTER v. McNEIL. See Case No. 966.

Case No. 967.

BANTZ v. ELSAS et al.

[1 Ban. & A. 351;[1] 6 O. G. 117.]

Circuit Court, S. D. Ohio. June Term, 1874.

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS—REISSUE OF LETTERS—NEW MATTER.

1. Letters patent for an "Improvement in Boiler-Furnaces, for Burning Wet Fuel," reissued to Gideon Bantz, February 6, 1872, and extended for seven years from June 22, 1872, examined and sustained.

2. The fact of reissue, raises a presumption, that the invention, claimed in the original and reissued patents, are the same, and, that the reissued patent has not been extended beyond the original invention.

[Cited in Dederick v. Cassell, 9 Fed. 307.]

3. Dead chambers were shown in the drawings of the original patent, but were not referred to in the specification: Held, that it was competent to describe them, point out their functions, and claim them, in a reissue.

[In equity. Bill by Gideon Bantz against Jacob Elsas and others for infringement of patent No. 20,616. Decree for complainant.]

John E. Hatch and Fisher & Duncan, for complainant.

Jacob Schroder, for defendants.

SWING, District Judge. The bill in this case, alleges that the complainant was the original and first inventor of an "Improvement in Boiler-Furnaces for Burning Wet Fuel," for which he received a patent, June 22, 1858; that he surrendered said letters patent, February 6, 1872, and obtained new letters patent therefor, which were afterward extended for seven years from June 22, 1872. It further alleges, that he is the sole owner of said reissued and extended letters patent; that he has expended large sums of money, in making and vending the improvement, and making it profitable for himself, and useful to the public; that many persons have been licensed to use the same, with great advantage to the public; that the public have acknowledged and acquiesced in his rights to said improvement; and, that he will realize large gains and profits therefrom, if the infringements by defendants, shall be prevented; that the defendants, well knowing the premises, without license and in violation of the rights of complainant, did unlawfully make and use boiler-furnaces, made according to, and containing his patented invention, and are threatening to use and make the same, in large quantities. The bill then prays, that defendants may be compelled to account for, and pay over the profits of the infringement, and may be enjoined from making, vending, or in any wise using the patented improvement. The defendants answer: 1. Denying, generally, the allegation of the bill. 2. Denying, specially, the infringement. 3. Denying that complainant was the first and original inventor of the patented improvement, and setting up a prior use, by several persons named in the answer. They also seek to attack the validity of the reissued patent of the complainant: 1. By showing that the original patent was for a combination of all the elements described therein, as a combination, while the reissued patent is for those elements, separately, or, for a combination of a less number than the whole. 2. That the reissued patent contains a new element, which is not found in the original, to wit, the dead-chambers.

The patentee, in his specification, claims to have invented "a new and useful improvement in furnaces for burning wet fuel;" and then proceeds to give a description of the invention, and says:

"I do not claim a furnace for burning wet fuel, broadly, nor the use of a series of fireplaces, connecting with the common flue, arranged between the furnace and boiler, as I am well aware this has been done before. Having thus described my invention, I claim:

"1. In a furnace for burning wet fuels, having two or more single fire-chambers, not arranged under the boiler, the combustion chamber or reservoir C, arranged above the top of said fire-chambers, and located directly under the front end of the boiler, essentially as described.

"2. The cyma-reversa bottom m n, of the combustion chamber or reservoir C, in combination with the narrow throats e, of the separate fire-chambers, and the narrow exit-flue o, of the bridge walls f, for the purpose essentially as described.

[1] [Reported by Hubert A. Banning, Esq., and Henry Arden, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

"3. In combination with the combustion chamber or reservoir C, arranged and located as described, I claim the side door or doors h', for the admission of atmospheric air, for the purpose described.

"4. In combination with a series of fire-chambers A, and the combustion chamber or reservoir C, located and arranged directly beneath the front end of the boiler, and above the crown of said fire-chamber, I claim a series of reverberatory-chambers D, provided with side-doors h, and a diving-flue E, at the rear end of the boiler, to hold the heat beneath the same throughout its entire length, and to arrest and deaden the sparks, as described.

"5. In a furnace for burning wet fuels, in which the fire-chambers are not arranged under the boiler, I claim the arrangement of the boiler upon the rear wall of the furnace, and the rear wall of the diving-flue E, for the purpose of obtaining the full advantage of the heat of the walls of the furnace, and of the diving-flue, as described.

"6. In a furnace for burning wet fuels, having a flat top, and supplied through openings therein, I claim the dead-chambers arranged between the floor and the arches of the fire-chambers, for the purpose of maintaining the top of the furnace cool for the workman, as described."

Complainant insists that respondents have infringed the first and third claims of this reissued patent. But one expert has been examined, and his testimony shows, that the furnace of the respondents, embodies, substantially, the invention of the complainant, as set forth in the first claim of his patent. That, it is a furnace for burning wet fuel, having two single fire-chambers, not arranged under the boilers, and a combustion-chamber, or reservoir, arranged above the top of the fire-chambers, and located directly under the front of the boiler, in the same manner and for the same purpose as complainant's invention, and also that it embodies substantially complainant's invention, as set forth in the third claim of his patent, to wit: In combination with the combustion-chamber or reservoir, the side-door, for the like uses and purposes, as in complainant's furnace.

It is claimed, however, by respondents, that there is no infringement of either of these claims, because the combustion chamber or reservoir of the complainant, is one having a cyma-reversa bottom, with a narrow throat, whereas, the combustion chamber or reservoir of the respondents, has not the cyma-reversa bottom, but, has one which is flat, and set inclined, and has a wide throat, instead of a narrow one.

If, the first and third claims of the complainant, are to be confined strictly to a combustion-chamber or reservoir with a cyma-reversa bottom and a narrow throat, then, the respondents do not infringe.

I think, however, that the leading idea of the complainant, is found, in a combustion chamber or reservoir, arranged in its relations with the fire-chamber and boiler, for a particular purpose, rather than, in the particular form of the back or throat of such chamber or reservoir. It may be true, that he supposed the one described by him, was best adapted for the purpose for which it was designed, but, there can be no doubt, that the defendants' combustion-chamber occupies substantially the same relation to the fire-chambers and boiler that the complainant's does, and, is for, and accomplishes, the same purpose, in the same way. The only difference is, in the shape or form of the bottom and size of the throat, and it is not claimed that there is any difference in the principle of the two. If this be so, shall the respondents by a mere change of form, be permitted to use the complainant's invention? I think not.

As to the question of first and original invention, the testimony of Gideon Bantz, and (by stipulation), that of John Duvall and Gideon Bantz, Jr., shows, that the invention of the complainant, dates back as far as 1854, while the testimony of J. C. Baum, who claims to be the first and original inventor, only reaches back to 1856. True, Mr. Baum testifies, that, in 1858 or 1859, complainant acknowledged that he, Baum, was the author of the invention, but, this is positively denied by complainant, and it is not likely that such conversation did take place. when, as the testimony shows, complainant's invention was made two years before Baum claims to have invented it.

As to the patent of Thompson, there is nothing to show its nature or character, nor that the invention was of the same character as the complainant's. Besides, no such defence is set up in the answer; neither is there any testimony, establishing a prior use of such a furnace.

If the validity of the complainant's reissued patent, was properly put in issue, I cannot, for any of the reasons assigned by the learned counsel for respondents, conclude, that such reissued patent is invalid.

1. The presumptions of the law are all in favor of its validity. The very fact of reissue raises a presumption, that the inventions, claimed in the original and reissued patent, are the same, and the presumptions of the law, are, that the complainant has acted rightly, and has not extended the reissued patent beyond the original invention.

2. But, aside from this, by a comparison of the original with the reissue, I do not find it extended beyond what I include in a fair and reasonable construction of the original. I do not think the original patent is for a combination; it is not, as described in the patent, specifications or claims, and, if it be not for a combination, the patentee had a right to a reissue for any of its valuable elements, separately or together.

3. But it is said the reissued patent embraces an element not within the original patent, to wit, the dead-chamber. It is true, that nowhere in the specification of the original patent, are these dead-chambers spoken of, or their functions described, but they are clearly shown in the drawings accompanying the specification, and the reissue does nothing more than describe them and point out their functions. This is certainly not going beyond what is shown in the original patent.

Decree for complainant.

[NOTE. Patent No. 20,616, was granted to G. Bantz, June 22, 1858; reissued February 6, 1872, (No. 4,731.) For another case involving this patent, see Bantz v. Frantz, 105 U. S. 160.]

Case No. 968.

BAPTIST MISSIONARY UNION v. TURNER.

[6 McLean, 43.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Michigan. June Term, 1853.

PRACTICE—NOTICE OF TRIAL—INJUNCTION TO STAY PROCEEDINGS.

Where an injunction has been applied for to stay proceedings at law in a bill to quiet title, on the ground that the remedy at law was not adequate; a notice by the complainant that he will insist on the trial at law, is necessary, so that the witnesses by [for] the plaintiff at law may be summoned.

[At law. Action of ejectment by the Baptist Missionary Union against Israel Turner.]

Frazer & Davidson, for plaintiff.

Patterson, Vanamringe & Gould, for defendant.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This is an action of ejectment where a bill has been filed to stay proceedings by injunction and quiet title on the ground that there was not adequate relief at law. The bill in chancery was continued at the last term with leave to amend. It is now insisted that the case at law shall be tried.

The plaintiff's counsel at law contends that without notice from the complainant in equity they cannot be ruled to a trial.

THE COURT held, a notice was necessary, as the party could not know that the complainant in equity would not insist on a hearing; that until notice, the plaintiff at law could not be expected to have his witnesses brought before the court.

Case No. 969.

BARBEE v. WILLARD et al.

[4 McLean, 356.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Indiana. May Term, 1848.

PLEADING — DECLARATION — AVERMENT OF COVENANTS PERFORMED — PARTIAL PERFORMANCE — DEMURRER.

1. The parties, plaintiff and defendants, entered into partnership and afterwards plaintiff selling out to the defendants his interest in the entire concern, dissolved, the [agreement] embracing personal and real estate. The defendants agreeing to pay Barbee $6,872.72. In payment the defendant French agreed to give his note for $3,000 with interest, payable three years after date; and the other defendant agreed to convey to plaintiff 800 acres of land and other tracts on or before the 1st May, 1842. Upon the execution of such deeds and the note for $3,000, at the above date of May, 1842, Barbee was to execute a conveyance to the defendants of his interest in the partnership, etc. The plaintiff avers he has always been ready. To the declaration there was a demurrer—which was sustained, [on the ground that it should have contained an averment of at least partial performance of the covenants, or should have shown a reasonable excuse for nonperformance.]

[2. The general averment of performance of all covenants, stipulations, etc., is not sufficient under which to show partial performance, or that defendant has received a partial benefit from the contract in suit.]

[At law. Action by Barbee against Willard and French on a contract for the dissolution of a copartnership. Heard on demurrer to the declaration. Demurrer sustained.]

Mr. Smith, for plaintiff.

Bradley & Hammond, for defendants.

HUNTINGTON, District Judge. The agreement set out in the declaration (the original being lost) shows that the plaintiff and defendants were partners at Oswego, Indiana. The agreement is dated 19th March, 1842, and is in substance as follows: 1. Barbee being a resident of Troy, Ohio, and the defendants of Oswego, Indiana, agree to dissolve their partnership, the dissolution to take effect from that day, March 1842. 2. Barbee, the plaintiff is admitted to be the owner of one entire half of the lands, mills, goods, and assets of the firm. 3. He agrees to sell his undivided half to the defendants, consisting of lands, mills, wagons, horses, goods, etc. In consideration of such sale, the defendants agree to pay the debts of the firm in New York and elsewhere, some of which debts are due to Barbee individually, on notes then in his possession—and also to pay Barbee, the plaintiff, $6,872.72, it being the sum agreed on as the value of Barbee's interest in the firm and in the property by him sold to them. In payment of this sum of $6,872.72, the defendant, French, agreed to give to plaintiff his note for $3,000, with interest, payable three years after date—and Willard was to convey to Barbee eight hundred acres of land in Wells county, estimated at $2,000; forty acres in Delaware county, estimated at $200; eighty acres in Shelby county, Ohio, at $600; and a bouse and lot in Cincinnati, at $1,600, and also four hundred acres of land more, in Wells county, which by the terms of the contract were to be deeded to Barbee by Willard, on or before the 1st of May then next, namely, May, 1842. Upon the execution of such deed by Willard, and the execution of the note for $3,000, by

[1] [Reported by Hon. John McLean, Circuit Justice.]

French, which, it is manifest from the general tenor of the agreement, were to be done at the same time, May, 1842, Barbee the plaintiff, was to execute a deed of conveyance to Willard and French, of his interest in the lands, etc., of the firm, upon the execution of which, Willard and French were to execute a mortgage of the whole premises, (with the exception of the Pearson tract, so called,) to Barbee, to secure the performance of their part of the agreement—Barbee giving to Willard and French two and three years for the payment of the debts, (by notes,) due to said Barbee, by the firm. The debts of the firm due to others to be secured before the expiration of two years, so that Barbee was not to be bound for them as a member of the firm. The agreement then states "possession is this day given by said Barbee of all the within described land and property, to said Willard and French, and said Willard and French do hereby give to said Barbee possession of said lands and lots to be deeded to said Barbee, and should said Willard decide to take back the twelve hundred acres of land in Wells county, at the end of three years from that date, he has the option so to do by paying said Barbee $2 50 per acre, and interest thereon, from this date," also the same option in regard to the lands in Delaware and Shelby counties, Ohio, and the house and lot in Cincinnati upon the same terms. This is the substance of the agreement set out. The plaintiff then avers that he has, 1. Faithfully kept his covenants. 2. That he has always been ready and willing to execute deeds, etc., for the lands by him sold. 3. That on the 12th of October, 1846, at Oswego, Indiana, and at the residence of Willard and French, he did duly tender and offer to deliver a good and sufficient warranty deed, with relinquishment of claim to the land described on the agreement, and by him sold, according to the true intent and meaning of his covenants, and demanded performance, etc., on their part—that they refused, etc.

He then assigns the following breaches: 1st. That the defendants have never yet paid the said sum of $6,872.72, or any part of it. 2d. That they have not settled up the liabilities of the firm, and especially the several notes due from the firm to the plaintiff individually, copies of which notes are set forth. 3d. That defendants are indebted to him the sum of $4,000, for which he held the notes of said firm, etc.

To this declaration the defendants have filed a general demurrer, and in support of the demurrer it is said that the covenants are dependent—that their deeds, notes, and mortgages are mutually to be executed on or before the 1st of May then next—that as neither did perform or offer to perform, their part of the agreement, on or before that day, neither party can sue upon the covenants in the agreement, in short, that after the expiration of the day, either party may, if he choose, regard the agreement as at an end.

I am inclined to think, upon a full examination of the terms of the agreement, that it was the intention of the parties that the deed, mortgages and $3,000 note should be executed and exchanged at the same time, that is, on or before the first day of May, 1842. This being the case, it is very clear upon authority, that neither party could sue for a violation of the agreement, without first having offered to perform his part of it, or show some excuse for not doing so, and that offer to perform must be made within a reasonable time. It is said in Ballard v. Walker, 3 Johns. Cas. 60, that the lapse of four years after the time of performance rescinds the contract. But it is said in answer to this objection that, by the terms of the agreement, possession was given of the mills, personal property, etc., to the defendants, that this was a part of the consideration of the agreement, and as he has received a partial benefit, it would be unjust that he should enjoy that part and not be compelled to pay anything for it; and this is the true doctrine undoubtedly. See 1 Chit. Pl. 334. But, according to the same authority, "it seems necessary to aver, in the declaration, performance of at least a part of that which the plaintiff covenanted to do, or to show, that otherwise the defendants have received a partial benefit." There is no such averment in the declaration. It is true, there is a general averment that the plaintiff has kept and performed all his covenants, stipulations, etc., but this is not sufficient. Demurrer maintained.

Case No. 970.

BARBER v. HALLETT.

[4 Ban. & A. 213.]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. April Term, 1879.

[See 10 Fed. 130.]

BARBER, (GUIDET v.) See Case No. 5,857.

BARBER, (MOWRY v.) See Case No. 9,892.

BARBER, (NEEDERER v.) See Case No. 10,079.

BARBER, (WASHINGTON v.) See Case No. 17,224.

Case No. 971.

BARBOUR v. RUSSELL.

[3 Cranch, C. C. 47.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. Term, 1826.

DEBT—BOND WITH COLLATERAL CONDITION—SPECIAL BAIL.

Bail will not to be required in an action upon a bond with a collateral condition.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

[At law. Action of debt on a bond by James Barbour, secretary of war, to the use of Roland Clapp, against Gilbert C. Russell. Heard on defendant's motion for leave to enter an appearence without special bail. Leave granted.]

Debt for $120,000, the penalty of a bond given by Nimrod Farrow, and the defendant, one of his sureties, under the act of congress of the 3d of March, 1825, "for the relief of Nimrod Farrow and Richard Harris," with condition that Farrow should appropriate the proceeds of the property in the act mentioned, towards the payment of the debts contracted by Farrow and Harris, in the erection of a fortification on Dauphin Island. The declaration alleged the breach of the condition to be in the non-payment of $6000 due by Farrow and Harris to one Roland Clapp, for supplies, &c., in and about the erection of the said fortification.

Upon the return of the writ, Mr. Jones moved for leave to enter his appearance for the defendant without special bail. 1 Petersd. Bail, 405, 411; Edwards v. Williams, 5 Taunt. 247; Bosanquet v. Fillis, 4 Maule & S. 330.

Mr. R. S. Coxe, for the plaintiff, objected and produced the affidavit of the said Roland Clapp, stating that the defendant, Russell, is indebted to him in $6000 due on a bond dated 19th April, 1825, entered into by the defendant to James Barbour, secretary of war, "for the use and benefit of this deponent and others in the penal sum of $120,000, conditioned for the performance of divers covenants, and for the payment of the said sum of $6000;" and cited Hobson v. Campbell, 1 H. Bl. 245.

The name of the said Roland Clapp is not mentioned in the bond or its condition, nor is any sum of money therein stated to be due to him.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent) permitted the defendant to appear without special bail.

BARBOUR, (WOODWORTH v.) See Case No. 18,010.

BARCLAY, (CAMPBELL v.) See Cases Nos. 2,352 and 2,353.

Case No. 972.

BARCLAY v. GOODALE.

District Court, D. Oregon. Aug. 17, 1872.

ARRESTS IN INDIAN COUNTRY—REMOVAL FOR TRIAL—ACT JUNE 30, 1834.

[Act Cong. June 30, 1834, (4 Stat. 733, § 23,) authorized arrests by the military force of the United States in the Indian country for certain purposes, and for removing for delivery to the civil authorities for trial, "provided that no person apprehended by military force as aforesaid shall be detained longer than five days after the arrest and before removal." Held, that the arrest and detention of a defendant, for more than five days before removal, renders the person making the arrest liable for false imprisonment, although he had no sufficient means wherewith to do otherwise.]

[Cited in Re Carr, Case No. 2,432, and Waters v. Campbell, Id. 17,265.]

[Note. Nowhere reported; no opinion on file at the clerk's office.]

Case No. 973.

BARCLAY v. GOVERS.

[1 Cranch, C. C. 147.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. Term, 1803.

GUARDIAN AD LITEM — APPOINTMENT ON MOTION.

The court, on motion, will appoint a guardian ad litem for an infant defendant.

[See Rhinelander v. Sanford, Case No. 11,739.]

At law. Case for goods sold.

On motion of Mr. E. B. Caldwell, alleging that the defendant was an infant, James Thompson was appointed guardian to plead for the defendant.

FITZHUGH, Circuit Judge, absent.

Case No. 974.

BARCLAY et al. v. HOLME.

[17 Betts, D. C. MS. 1.]

District Court, S. D. New York. Oct. 31, 1849.

CHARTER PARTY—ANTECEDENT VERBAL AGREEMENT.

[1. By the execution of a charter party, all antecedent verbal agreements inconsistent with its terms are waived, and the charter party becomes the only competent evidence of the contract between the parties.]

[2. By a charter party dated October 3, 1848, but not signed until October 23d or 24th, when bills of lading were signed and delivered by the master, it was stipulated that the charter should commence "when the vessel is ready to receive cargo at her place of loading, and notice thereof is given" to the charterers. The charterers brought action for damages by way of demurrage, alleging that respondent agreed when the charter party was entered into that the vessel should be ready to receive cargo on October 7th. The vessel was not ready to receive cargo until October 14th or 17th, the respondent having before the latter day given the charterers notice that the vessel was ready. Held, that the charter party was the only competent evidence of the contract between the parties, and that, as the charterers had failed to prove a breach thereof, they could not recover.]

[In admiralty. Libel by Delaney Barclay and Schuyler Livingston against John L. Holme to recover damages by way of demurrage. Libel dismissed.]

BETTS, District Judge. The respondent chartered the Norwegian brig Aural to the libellants for a voyage from New York to

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

Madeira to carry a cargo of eight thousand bushels of Indian corn in bulk and pipe staves to fill up. The charter party is dated the third of October, 1848, but was not signed by the parties until the 23d or 24th, when the bills of lading were signed and delivered by the master. One of the stipulations in the charter was that "it shall commence when the vessel is ready to receive cargo at her place of loading, and notice thereof is given to the party of the second part, or their agent." This action is brought for damages by way of demurrage. The libellants allege that the respondent agreed, when the charter party was entered into, that the vessel should be ready to receive the cargo on the 7th of October, and that he advised and sent word to the libellants she would be so ready at that time, and requested the cargo might be delivered on board; that lighters were employed which transferred the corn to the vessel on the 9th of October, but the master refused to receive it, and did not allow it to be laden on board until the 14th of October, his vessel not being made ready to receive it prior to that day.

The bill also claimed damages for loss on exchange by the depreciation of the rate between the 7th and 23d of October, when bills of lading therefor were signed by the respondent, averring the bills on the 7th and 9th of October would in market have produced $.58 more than was obtained for them when drawn after the bills of lading were delivered. There is a diversity in the recollections of the witnesses as to the representations between the parties in regard to the time and manner the agreement was to be fulfilled by the defendant, I think the weight of evidence, admitting that Mr. Balchen was his authorized broker, is that the understanding on the part of the defendant, previous to drawing up the contract, was that the vessel should be ready to take in her cargo on the 7th of October, and if the decision of the case turned upon the bearing and effect of the oral evidence, I should determine this point for the libellants. It is, however, to be borne in mind that all the negotiations and treaties between the parties antecedent to closing the contract, by executing the charter party under consideration, proceeded upon the understanding that the agreement adopted by them was to be in writing. The written contract, therefore, upon the soundest principles of the law of evidence, must furnish the proof of the actual understanding upon which the parties closed their negotiations relative to all matters which are the subject of stipulation in it.

The charter party bears date the 3d of October, but it was not consummated by the signature of the libellants until the 23d. By executing it then, the libellants ratified its terms as the true contract upon which the vessel was obtained and loaded by them, and they cannot be allowed to go back to antecedent propositions and understandings, and charge the respondent upon them, in contradiction to the terms of the charter party, which they so accepted. Accordingly, if the respondent originally engaged to have the vessel ready to receive cargo on the 7th of October, and was not in fact prepared to do so until the 14th, or even the 17th, before which last day it is proved he gave the libellants notice he was ready, and the libellants chose then to act under the contract and affix their signature to it, they must be held to have relinquished all propositions and understandings inconsistent with the stipulations of the charter, and to have accepted it according to its written terms. They thus bound themselves that the charter party should commence from the time they had notice the vessel was ready to receive cargo, and there is no pretence that the respondent did anything after that time violating his agreement. By receiving the charter party from the respondent on the 23d or 24th of October, and then signing it themselves, the libellants are precluded in law from setting up any anterior arrangements or understandings in respect to the bargain inconsistent with the written engagements. They cannot, therefore, maintain the action because the respondent failed to comply with his first proposals or promises, for they are not independent and outside of the charter party, but a stipulation is inserted covering that subject.

The remedy of the libellants, if any, would have been to reject the charter party as not fulfilling the agreement made between the parties, and then have recovered damages for the non-performance. No breach of the written agreement being proved, the libellants cannot maintain their action upon an alleged non-performance of an anterior agreement analogous to one in the charter party, but not included in terms in the written contract.

Libel dismissed.

Case No. 975.

BARCLAY et al. v. HOWELL.

HOWELL v. BARCLAY et al.

[4 Haz. Reg. Pa. 227.]

Circuit Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. April Sessions, 1829.[1]

EVIDENCE—IMPEACHING DOCUMENTS BY ORAL TESTIMONY—EJECTMENT — MUNICIPAL CORPORATION —IMPLIED GRANT—EASEMENTS—PRESUMPTION OF GRANT—DEEDS — CONSTRUCTION — ACCEPTANCE OF CONVEYANCE—EFFECT—USER—DEDICATION—DESCRIPTION OF PROPERTY — REQUISITE PROOF.

[1. Declarations made by a surveyor when laying off a town are incompetent to impeach the map of the survey which has been adopted by the proprietors.]

[See note at end of case.]

[1] [Reversed in 6 Pet. (31 U. S.) 498.]

[2. In ejectment, a municipal corporation must sustain its title by proof of as high an order as would be necessary by an individual.]

[3. Where anything is granted, the law implies a grant of those things without which the principal subject cannot be enjoyed, as incident thereto.]

[4. This right is confined strictly to the necessity upon which it is founded, and cannot exceed its just demands.]

[5. The right of the inhabitants of a city to access to a river over the land of the town proprietors is a mere right of way, and does not divest such proprietors of the fee to the land so used.]

[6. The presumption of a grant to the public furnished by the uninterrupted use of a way for convenience is raised by use for a much shorter time than in the case of use by an individual.]

[7. This presumption may be repelled by showing the owner's assertion of right, and denial of the use assumed by the public.]

[8. Ambiguity in the language of a deed requires it to be construed most strongly against the grantor.]

[9. In construing a deed, effect is to be given to every expression, if it can reasonably be done.]

[10. By accepting a conveyance without objection, and with knowledge that a street through the demised premises had been dedicated, the grantee takes subject to the easement thereof.]

[11. In determining the right to an easement of way acquired by user, the fact of user not only must appear, but likewise that the land was susceptible of such use.]

[12. A street dedicated to a municipal corporation vests in the public, subject to its regulation and improvement by the corporation, and cannot be treated or used as private property by that body.]

[See note at end of case.]

[13. In ejectment, it is sufficient to describe the locus in quo sufficiently to acquaint the defendant with knowledge of what is claimed, and to enable him to prepare his defense.]

[14. In ejectment, plaintiff must prove the length of defendant's enjoyment of the premises and their value.]

At law. This was an ejectment [by the lessee of R. H. Howell against Barclay, Florence, and Cotter, officers of the corporation of Pittsburg] to recover a messuage, lot, piece or parcel of land, lying between Water street and the Monongahela river in the city of Pittsburg. [The action was begun in the district court for the western district of Pennsylvania, and removed to this court, under Act March 3, 1821. Heard on objections to evidence. Objections sustained. Verdict for plaintiff. Motion for new trial denied, and judgment on the verdict. This was reversed by the supreme court in Barclay v. Howell's Lessee, 6 Pet. (31 U. S.) 498. See note at end of case.]

The title of the lessor was regularly deduced from Alexander Wilson, to whom the late proprietaries (the acknowledged owners of the manor of Pittsburg, of which the city of Pittsburg and the ground in question, made a part), on the 26th of September, 1814, conveyed all the ground in the above city, lying between Water St. and the Monongahela river. It appeared in evidence that, on the 22nd April, 1784, Mr. Francis, the agent and attorney in fact of the Penns, employed George Woods, a deputy surveyor, to lay off the town of Pittsburg. This duty he performed on the 31st of May, 1784, and returned to Mr. Francis a plan of the town, which he approved of and confirmed on the 30th of September, in the same year. On the diagram representing the survey or plan of this town was written, by Mr. Woods, the words "Water Street" on a space extending along the south front of the row of lots facing the Monongahela from Grant street to the junction of that river with the Allegheny river. This space was of different widths, from about 219 feet at Grant street to about 108 feet at West street, its breadth further west not being shown; and it extended from the row of lots before mentioned, to the Monongahela river, embracing a space of table land from 70 to 80 feet wide in the broadest part, to a few feet in the narrowest, and also embracing a steep bank of the river, and the river beach, which in time of freshes was nearly or quite covered with water.

The town, now city, of Pittsburg, was incorporated as a borough by an act of assembly passed in the year 1804, with the usual powers and privileges, and by various ordinances of the corporation, commencing in the year 1816, that body exercised acts of ownership over this slip of land bounding on the river, by authorizing the erection of wharfs, exacting tolls from all persons landing goods on the beach, etc.

The plaintiff gave in evidence a written agreement between the agent of the Penns and Craig & Bayard, by which the former agreed to sell and convey a certain parcel of the ground, afterwards embraced in Wood's plan of the town, lying in a point formed by the junction of the rivers Allegheny and Monongahela bounded on two sides by the said rivers, and on the third by the fosse of Fort Pitt. On the 31st December, 1784, a deed was executed by this agent to the said Craig & Bayard, for 32 lots, as marked and numbered in Wood's plan, bounded southerly by the Monongahela river; and on the 2d October, 1784, another deed was made to John Ormsby for two lots bounded by Front street on the north, and on the south by the Monongahela. A number of deeds from the Penns to different persons were given in evidence, bearing different dates, subsequent to the year 1784, for lots fronting the rivers Monongahela and Allegheny, the former bounding southerly on Water street, and the latter, on the river, no street having been marked between the lots fronting on that river and the river. Amongst other evidence offered by the defendant's counsel, was the deposition of Samuel Ewalt, for the purpose of proving various declarations of George Wood's, at the time he was engaged in laying off the town of Pittsburg in relation to Water street. This was objected to, as hearsay evidence of parol declarations to explain or to contradict a written instrument, by an agent acting under a limited authority to lay off the town, and nothing else. Cases cited: 1 Serg. & R. 526; 4 Serg. & R. 298; 4 Yeates, 100; 1 Yeates, 284; 2 Smith's Laws, 256, note; 3 Bin. 175; Mayo v. Murchie, 3 Munf. 358. On the other side were cited: 1 Pet. C. C. 205, [Wright v. Deklyne, Case No. 18,076;] [Mechanics' Bank of Alexandria v. Bank of Columbia;] 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 336; 8 Johns. 508; 16 Serg. & R. 396.

Chauncey & Baldwin, for plaintiffs.

J. R. Ingersoll and Charles Smith, for defendants.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. The evidence offered is altogether inadmissible. The authority of Woods was confined to laying off this town, which of course included the acts of surveying and plotting the lots and streets, so as to exhibit a plan of the town. His work, when completed, was binding upon no person until it received the confirmation of the owner of the ground, either expressly, or to be presumed from his subsequent acts. Woods so understood his authority, for he returned the survey, soon after it was made, to Mr. Francis, who by his letter to Woods in Sept., 1784, approved and confirmed the same. He might have rejected it altogether, had he chosen to do so, and directed another survey to be made upon a different plan. But having confirmed it, it afterwards became a muniment of title, to which the purchasers of lots, and all persons connected with this town, including the grantors, had a right to look, as evidence of title, and by which they were bound. To permit now the parole declarations of Woods to alter, or in any way to affect this delineation of the town, and this muniment of so many titles of which it is the evidence, would be to violate one of the best established rules of evidence, and to let in the most extensive mischief. It is one thing to prove acts tending to explain and point out the true boundaries of a survey, and quite another, to give evidence of the parole declarations of the officer who made it, which might be misunderstood, and of which purchasers as well as vendors looking at the plan, and relying upon it, could have no notice. Woods was the agent of the Penns; but he had no authority to bind them, even by his acts, until they were confirmed. How then could he bind them by his declarations, which forming no part of his report, accompanying the plan, could not be, and therefore were not approved and confirmed?

The great question in the cause, was, whether Water street extended from the range of lots fronting on that street along the entire range of them from Grant street to the river Monongahela, or whether the width of the street was unascertained, and was left to be afterwards laid out of a convenient width? Both sides referred to the case of Mayo v. Murchie, 3 Munf. 358; and the defendants' counsel relied much upon M'Donald's Case, 16 Serg. & R. 396; they also cited 1 Sandf. 323, to show that the corporation, or the inhabitants of the town, were entitled to this slip of land as an easement. They also cited 1 Conn. 103; 3 Mass. 284; 6 Mass. 332; 15 Johns. 447; 2 Starkie, Ev. 655, 656; 3 Starkie, Ev. 1216–1219; [Ricard v. Williams,] 7 Wheat. [20 U. S.] 109.

Charge: WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. Whether the surveys of the plaintiffs or of the defendants, in this controversy, will most subserve the interest and the prosperity of the inhabitants of Pittsburg, is a question which neither the court or the jury can very well answer.—This however is manifest to both, that it is not a question involved in that issue, which, and which alone you are sworn and affirmed to try and decide. That issue is whether the plaintiff has shown to your satisfaction, such a right to the property in dispute, as ought to enable him to recover the possession of it. Considerations such as have been pressed upon your attention by counsel can never tend to promote the ends of justice, and never will be regarded by a conscientious court or jury. The case which you have now to pass upon is by no means a complicated one. There is in truth but one question upon which the controversy mainly turns, and whatever difficulty may attend the decision of it, is to be solved by the jury, since it rests altogether upon the evidence which has been laid before them. The object of the court will be to clear away those matters which do not seem materially to affect the case, in order that that question may more distinctly be perceived. To do this, the claims set up by the defendants to the property in dispute, will be first examined.

The defendants are merely officers of the corporation of Pittsburg, and of course, assert no title in themselves to this property. But they set up a title in the corporation, and in case that cannot be maintained, still they insist that the plaintiff cannot recover in this action, upon the ground, that the entire space between the southern row of lots fronting the Monongahela and that river, was dedicated by the owners of this manor in the year 1784, to the public, as a street, or highway.

As to the title of the corporation, it is proper to premise, that this must, in all cases, be maintained by the same muniment of transfer as would be necessary in the case of an individual. In the year 1784, and down to the period of the conveyance to Alexander Wilson, this slip of land, if it was not wholly given to the public as a street, or so much of it as was not so given, was vested in the Penns, as the undisputed owners of it. It has not been shown in evidence that a grant or transfer of it was at any time made by them to the corporation, or the town before it was incorporated, or to any person for the use of that body, or the inhabitants thereof. No right of possession in the corporation has been proved, or even asserted, arising from length of time.

But it is claimed as appurtenant, or incident to the right of the inhabitants and lot owners, who cannot enjoy, it is contended, the property granted to them without the use of this slip of ground, whereby they may have free access to the river. Were this species of title to be admitted to exist in the lot owners and inhabitants of the city, it would nevertheless be difficult to discern, how this admission would maintain the claim of the corporation to hold and enjoy this property for their use and benefit in exclusion of the enjoyment thereof by the inhabitants. For if it belongs to the corporation, they may use it in any way most beneficial to the body corporate, and not injurious to the individual corporators or inhabitants of the town. But I cannot understand how one piece of land can be incident to another piece of land; and if it could, still it has not appeared in evidence that the corporate body is entitled to a foot of land within the limits of the city, or to any other right but that of governing the city. If the claim in behalf of the inhabitants be merely of right of way, or reasonable access to the river, that presents quite a different subject of inquiry, which will be attended to, after I have stated for your information the rule of law which applies to the subject. That is, that where anything is granted, the law implies a grant of those things, without which the principal subject cannot be enjoyed, as incident thereto; as if a lease be made of land with all the mines therein, and there be no mine opened upon the land, the lessee has an incidental right to excavate the earth for the purpose of obtaining the mineral, without which the grant in respect to them would be of no value. So and for the same reason, if a grant be made of a close surrounded by the lands of the grantor, the grantee has a right to a way or passage over the lands of the grantor. But this right is confined strictly to the necessity upon which it is founded, and cannot exceed its just demands. The grantee, therefore, cannot claim a right to as many roads as may suit his whim or convenience, nor can he exercise any privilege, but that of a right of way; if he go unnecessarily out of such way upon other parts of the grantor's land he is a trespasser. Now to apply these principles to the present case. A street or streets, it is insisted, leading to the river Monongahela, are necessary to the enjoyment by the inhabitants of their property in the town, derived from the persons under whom the plaintiff claims. If this be so, they are entitled to have them laid off over the land in dispute; if it be private property (which is the great question in the cause) of right, and not of favor; and the law points out a mode by which this right may be enforced. But the right of soil, is not, as I conceive, thereby divested out of the owner of the other parts of the ground, which beyond all question remain in him, as it was before the street shall have been laid out. The only difference in this respect between the city of Philadelphia and Pittsburg is that Wm. Penn granted expressly to the former this privilege of streets leading from Front st. to the river, which the law would have implied as an incident, and which may be implied in relation to the latter city. But the ground lying to the east of Front st. and between the streets running to the Delaware remained the undisputed property of the proprietor, and as such was used or granted away by him. If the ground in controversy then was not dedicated to the public as a street, it remained in the Penns, subject to the incidental right which has been spoken of; and the only right of the corporation would be to regulate and to preserve such streets as should be laid out running over it to the river.

This brings us to the great question in the cause; was the whole of the ground lying between the lots fronting on the Monongahela, and that river, dedicated by the Penns for a street, or only so much thereof as might be necessary for such an easement? And this leads to an examination of the plaintiff's title. The only direct evidence of such dedication is the survey and plan of George Woods returned to and confirmed by the authorized agent of the Penns. The survey was made on the 31st of May, 1784, and received the approbation of that agent on the 30th September, in the same year. The deed to Alexander Wilson bears date the 26th December, 1814, and it conveys to him all the land lying between the south line of Water street, and the low water mark of the Monongahela river from Grant st. to the confluence of the Allegheny and Monongahela rivers. That a street running south of the line of lots on that river was granted by the name of Water street is satisfactorily proved, not only by the plan referred to, but by the subsequent grants of those lots, all of which call for Water street as their south western boundary. The question which this plan gives rise to, is whether the whole of this slip of land to the river was dedicated to the public as a street, or whether a street of undefined width, but such as convenience might require, was intended to be appropriated.

The defendants' counsel insist that the plan itself furnishes direct proof that the whole space was laid out and intended as a street, the south line of it being distinctly marked, running along the margin of the river. This is denied on the other side, who insist that the line referred to, merely marks the margin of the river, and not the line of a street, and in confirmation of this assertion, they refer to the Allegheny river as it is laid down on the plan, where the same line is discoverable; and yet it is agreed by both sides, that no street was laid off or intended to be along that river, all the subsequent grants or lots facing it running across the vacant space bordering on the river, to the river. They further rely on the testimony of Vickroy, who made the survey under the direction of Woods, who states that no line was, in fact, run on the river Monongahela south of the lots facing the same. It will be for you to say, whether the appearance of this line on the river in connection with the other lot lines was intended to indicate or does indicate the southern boundary of this street or not?

The other evidence in the cause relied upon to strengthen and confirm that which is termed direct is of a presumptive character. The defendants insist that this evidence establishes a long and uninterrupted use and enjoyment of this slip of ground by the inhabitants of Pittsburg, not short of 45 years. They rely further upon the long acquiescence in the enjoyment and in various acts of ownership exercised by the corporation in authorizing the construction of wharfs into the river, imposing tolls, and the like; upon the evidence of Mr. Coates the agent of the Penns, since the year 1800, who was authorized by them to sell and survey all their lands in the state, that he had no knowledge that this slip of land belonged to the Penns; and lastly that although all the lots in the plan of this town were sold by the agents of the Penns, yet the ground in dispute was never laid off into lots or offered for sale by those agents.

There is no doubt, in point of law, that the uninterrupted use by the public of a way over the ground of an individual for public convenience, for a length of time, affords a presumption of a grant of it by the owner for that purpose; and that a much shorter time will suffice to raise this presumption than would affect the title of an individual in ordinary cases. But the presumption in these cases, as in all others, may be repelled by evidence tending to show an assertion of right by the owner, and a denial of the use assumed by the public. In answer to the acquiescence insisted upon by the plaintiffs, two grants have been given in evidence by the plaintiffs, both dated in the year 1784, the one from the Penns to Ormsby for two lots in October, and the other to Craig and Bayard for 32 lots in December, of that year, both of which call for the river Monongahela for their southern boundaries. The defendants' counsel endeavor to remove the weight of this evidence by insisting that although such are the calls of those grants, still as they refer in express terms, to the lots as numbered in Wood's plan, they were in reality bounded and were intended to be bounded by Water street, and not by the river. That the survey having been made, the plan completed and confirmed, and Water street marked on it, as dedicated to the public, the Penns had no right, nor did they intend to exercise any, to extend these grants beyond the north line of Water street.

Whatever weight the jury may give to these grants as evidence to refute the alleged acquiescence by the Penns, will be for them to decide; but the court cannot yield to the arguments of the defendants' counsel as to their legal effect. To do so, would in my apprehension be to subvert two of the best established rules for the construction of deeds. The one is that they are always to be construed most strongly against the grantor where there is an ambiguity in their language, and the other is, that a meaning is to be given to every expression in them, if it can reasonably be done. Now, the lots conveyed by these deeds are those marked on Wood's plan, but then they are to run to the river. If they are to be bounded by Water street, the intention, of the parties, as shown by the expression of the deed, will be frustrated. By extending the two lines of those lots pointing to the river, a meaning is given to every expression in those deeds,—and what is to prevent this extension? It is said, that by doing so, they must run across a public highway, or street which would split each lot into two lots. But this would by no means, be the case. The land on both sides of the street (if you should say the street does not cover the whole of the ground) belonged to the Penns, and they had a right to grant each of these lots as entire parcels to the river, subject only to the easement over it which they had previously granted to the public. These observations apply to the deed to Ormsby. But they apply with increased force to that to Craig and Bayard, who were equitably entitled to the ground granted them in December, 1784, in virtue of their written agreement with the Penns in the January preceding, by which the latter were bound to convey the same to them, bounded on one side by the Allegheny river and on the other by the Monongahela. After that agreement, it was not competent to the Penns to encumber that ground with a road or in any other way; without the consent of Craig and Bayard. By accepting the conveyance without objection, and with the knowledge that Water street had, in the mean time, been granted, (as may for the present be presumed) they consented to take the ground so encumbered, not by force of some new contract, of which not the slightest evidence has been given, save the grant itself, but as a fulfilment and execution of the old one.

As to the long use of this disputed piece of ground by the public, it will be for you to say, whether, in point of fact, such use has been proved. In point of law, you must be satisfied, not merely that it was used by the inhabitants of Pittsburg, or others, but that it was used as a highway, or street; and in weighing the evidence on this point, you will naturally inquire, whether, from the nature of the ground, it was capable of being so used.

As to acts of ownership, exercised, by the corporation in the way which has been stated, it is manifest, that they are altogether inconsistent with the right asserted in behalf of the public, since, if the whole of this ground to low water mark on the river, was dedicated for a street, it was vested as much in the public subject to be regulated and improved by the corporation, and could not be legally treated or used as private property by that body. If upon the whole you shall decide that this ground was granted or dedicated as a street, the plaintiff cannot recover in this suit. If otherwise, and that the spot in dispute in this suit constituted no part of the street, it passed to Wilson under the deed to him, and consequently to the plaintiff who has deduced his title to the same regularly from him.

Verdict for plaintiff.

On Motion for a New Trial.

Rule to shew cause why a new trial should not be granted; 2d, why judgment should not be arrested.

The following reasons were assigned for both rules:

1. Because the verdict is uncertain and insufficient, in not ascertaining a locus in quo, that being left uncertain by the declaration also;

2. Because, by the declaration and verdict, the whole question at issue between the parties is left uncertain, and the controversy remains undetermined;

3. Because there was no evidence to shew possession in the defendants in the land described in the declaration, if the description be at all applicable to any ground;

4. Because the declaration claims "one messuage, a lot, piece or parcel of land, lying between Water street and the river Monongahela, with the appurtenances, situate and being in the city of Pittsburg;" and the verdict is general, for the plaintiffs, without describing position, extent, boundaries or situation of the land claimed;

5. Because if the finding of the jury were intended to embrace part of the premises stated in the declaration, it should have designated particularly such part.

In support of these rules, the following cases were relied upon: 1 Ld. Raym. 191, 277; Cowp. 346; 11 Coke, 55; Yel. 118, 119; Poph. 197; 4 Mod. 97; 1 Term. R. 371; 3 Term. R. 481; 2 Burrows, 668; [Barr v. Craig,] 2 Dall. [2 U. S.] 151; [Chirac v. Reinicker,] 11 Wheat. [24 U. S.] 280; Tidd. Pr. Append. 479.

On the other side were cited the following cases: 6 Serg. & R. 189; 9 Vin. Abr. tit. "Ejectment," K; Runn. Ej. 470; 1 Burrows, 133, 629, 630; 1 Johns. Cas. 101; 5 Johns. 366; 4 Bin. 78; 3 Serg. & R. 418; 4 Serg. & R. 271; 7 Serg. & R. 101; Runn. Ej. 121; Adams, Ej. 20; Cro. Eliz. 458; Runn. Ej. 438; Adams, Ej. 328-332.

Binney, Baldwin & Sergeant, for plaintiff.

Charles Smith and Jos. Ingersoll, for defendants.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. The third reason assigns the only ground in support of the 1st rule, and that is unsupported by the facts in the case. It was clearly proved that the defendants were in possession of a wharf, and other parcels of ground (as officers of the corporation of Pittsburg) lying between Water street and the Monongahela river, in the city of Pittsburg, at the time this declaration in ejectment was served.

The only real question to be decided is, whether that declaration and verdict are so uncertain that judgment cannot with propriety be entered. The ancient rule was, that the sheriff was bound to deliver possession according to the writ of habere facias possession, which would of course confirm the judgment, and so long as this rule prevailed there was much reason in requiring such certainty in the description of the land sued for in the declaration or verdict, as would enable the sheriff safely to execute his writ without going out of it to obtain information of the particular parcel which had been recovered, and of which possession was delivered. But when this rule was relaxed, which it has long been, and a new principle introduced, by which the plaintiff was to point out to the officer the particular parcel of land which, in execution of the writ, he is to deliver possession of, and is to take possession, at his peril, of only that to which he has title, the reason for the strictness formerly required in describing the land sued for necessarily ceased, as did the rule founded upon it. And it may now be safely laid down, that it is sufficient so to describe the lands that the defendant may know whether he is in possession of, or claims title to, that which is sued for, or to some part of it, so as to prepare for his defence. That the declaration in this case is certain to this extent, cannot admit of a doubt. Indeed, I am by no means prepared to say that this declaration would not stand the test of the severity of the ancient rule. The location of the land, its position and width, are stated with all convenient certainty, and nothing is wanting to the most precise identification of it, but to describe its length and the number of acres contained in it, which have never been supposed to be necessary in this species of action, certainly not for more than a century past. The defendant can never be injured by an uncertainty in describing in the declaration the particular land sued for, unless he is thereby prevented from fully defending his title to that which he claims and is in possession of. If the plaintiff take possession, under his execution, of land which was not recovered, or of more than he has recovered, he thereby makes himself a trespasser; besides which, the defendant may be relieved in a summary way upon motion. Neither can the defendant suffer any injury from this uncertainty in the action for mesne profits, for, although the judgment is conclusive as to the title, yet the plaintiff can recover only the value of the profits received by the defendant in consequence of the ouster complained of in the ejectment.

As to the length of time the defendant has occupied, the judgment proves nothing, nor as to the value. The plaintiff must therefore prove how long the defendant had enjoyed the premises, as well as their value.

Both rules discharged.

[NOTE. Reversed by the supreme court, on the grounds with others, that if the land dedicated for the street was essentially connected with the town lots, and enhanced their value when they were sold by the proprietors, the increased value realized by them and their long acquiescence would estop them from asserting any claim, though the land dedicated was not designated on the map; that the declarations of the surveyor should have been admitted in evidence, because, under all the circumstances, they formed part of the transaction; that the court erroneously instructed the jury, in substance, that there could be no right to the street without its use; that the jury should have been instructed that the different calls ought to be taken together, and that the calls for the river might be controlled by the other calls in the deeds, if the jury were satisfied that such call had been inserted through inadvertence or mistake. Mr. Justice McLean, in delivering the opinion, stated: "Whether Water street extended to low or high water mark can be of no importance in the present controversy. If its southern boundary be limited by high water mark, it is clear that the proprietors parted with all their right. It is admitted by both parties that the river Monongahela, being a navigable stream, belongs to the public; and a free use of it may be rightfully claimed by the public, whatever may be the extent of its volume of water. If Water street be bounded by the river on the south, it is only limited by the public right. To contend that between this boundary and the public right a private and hostile right could exist would not only be unreasonable, but against law. * * * If the jury shall find that the ground in question was dedicated to the public as a street or highway, or for other public purposes, to the river, either at high or low water mark, the right of the city will be established, and the plaintiff in the ejectment must consequently fail to recover." Barclay v. Howell's Lessee, 6 Pet. (31 U. S.) 498.]

Case No. 976.

BARCLAY v. KENNEDY.

[3 Wash. C. C. 350.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. April Term, 1818.

USURY—INTEREST ON RUNNING ACCOUNTS.

Where there have been running accounts between parties, and one party has been in the habit of transmitting his accounts regularly to the other, striking a balance, and charging or giving credit for interest, as the balance might be, and no objections have been made to it; and [or] where this mode of stating accounts is shown to be the custom of trade; such manner of charging interest is legal, and will be supported. [Smith v. Shaw, Case No. 13,107, distinguished.]

[Applied in Denniston v. Imbrie, Case No. 3,802. Cited in Bainbridge v. Wilcocks, Id. 755.]

At law. This was an action to recover the balance of a stated account, sent by the plaintiffs, [Barclay & Co.,] merchants of London, to the defendants, [Kennedy & Co.,] of Philadelphia, in 1803. The plaintiffs and defendants had been for some years engaged in a commercial intercourse; the former purchasing and shipping goods, and making advances to the latter; and receiving from them, in return, remittances in various ways. The usage between these parties, was for the plaintiffs to state the accounts between them, generally, annually; sometimes, semi-annually, charging interest on the balance, on whichever side it might be, and adding it to the balance of principal, to bear interest from the day on which the account was so stated. These accounts, presenting a balance with the interest added to it, sometimes in favour of the defendants, and sometimes in favour of the plaintiffs, were regularly transmitted to the defendants, who never, until at the trial of this cause, objected to the mode of adding the interest to the principal. The plaintiffs examined one witness, who deposed, that the uniform usage of the trade, between the merchants of London, and of this place, in transactions of this kind, was to transmit their accounts at the end of the year, and sometimes oftener; and to add the interest to the balance, as part of the principal on which aggregate interest is charged.

This mode of charging the interest, was objected to by Rawle and Dallas, for the defendants, who relied on the rule laid down by this court, in the case of Smith v. Shaw, [Case No. 13,107.]

Binney and Tilghman, for the plaintiffs, contended, that the above case did not apply to one where a different mode of charging the interest was agreed upon between the parties, or was affected by the usage of the trade, which was tantamount to an agreement. That compound interest was not forbidden by the statute of usury; and, if agreed to by the parties, could not be impeached upon the ground of contract. That the transmission of accounts, by the plaintiffs to the defendants, at regular periods, with the interest added to the balance,—retained by the defendants, without objection,—was evidence of an agreement to make the interest principal; and that the usage, independent of such implied agreement, was tantamount to it. They cited 2 Ves. Jr. 15; 9 Ves. 223.

[1] [Originally published from the MSS. of Hon. Bushrod Washington, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, under the supervision of Richard Peters, Jr., Esq.]

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice, charged the jury. In the case of Smith v. Shaw, [Case No. 13,107,] this court decided, that the proper mode of charging interest, was to deduct the payments from the interest, and if any surplus remained, to apply it to diminish so much of the principal. This decision was grounded upon two well established principles of law; 1st. That interest is incapable of producing interest, inasmuch as it forms no part of the debt; and is a mere compensation for the detention of the debt, or principal sum, and is recoverable as damages, the rate of which is ascertained by the laws against usury; 2d. That where the creditor has different demands against his debtor, and a partial payment is made, if the latter does not make the application to the one or the other, the former may make it; and, as the interest does not, and cannot, upon general principles, carry interest, he will of course, and may, lawfully, apply the payment to the discharge of the interest.

But although interest cannot, as such, bear interest, there can be no doubt but that the creditor and debtor may agree to give it that capacity, either at the time the contract is made, or after it has become due. Whenever the creditor has a right to demand it, he may waive that right, and lend it to the debtor, as so much money due; and thus change its nature, by contract, into debt. In running accounts, the parties may agree, at stated periods, to settle their accounts, strike the balance, and convert the interest into principal. The general principle of law before mentioned, does not forbid such an agreement, nor is it opposed to the provisions of the statute of usury. In such a case, the credit expires, and the principal debt becomes due at the time the account is settled; and the creditor, or the party in whose favour the balance is, has a right to stipulate for a prolongation of the credit, upon the condition of making the interest principal, instead of insisting upon a payment of the whole. If such an arrangement may legally be made by an express agreement, it may be done by an implied one; and accounts, regularly stated and balanced, and the interest added to the balance, received by the debtor, and acquiesced in without objection, may fairly be considered by the jury, as evidence of such agreement. In like manner, a well established usage of trade, sanctioning such a mode of stating the account, may have the effect of an agreement. But, in such a case, the usage should be fully proved, and should appear to be sufficiently ancient and uniform, to leave no doubt of its being known by all persons concerned in that particular trade. Nevertheless, if this question rested upon the testimony of the single witness, who was examined in the cause, respectable as he is, we should not think it sufficient to establish such a usage; and we are, therefore, of opinion, that the only ground for admitting this contested charge, is the implied agreement between the parties; should the jury be satisfied that the accounts, adding the interest to the balance of principal and interest, were regularly transmitted to the defendants, and were acquiesced in by them.

Case No. 977.

BARCLAY v. LEVEE COM'RS.

[1 Woods, 254.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Louisiana. April Term, 1872.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES—COURTS.

1. The act of congress of [February 5,] 1867, [14 Stat. 385,] which authorizes the removal of suits from a state court to the U. S. courts either by the plaintiff or the defendant, who shall make oath that he cannot have a fair trial on account of local prejudice and influence, overrides the provision of the 11th section of the judiciary act, which declares that those courts shall not have cognizance of any suit to recover the contents of any note or other chose in action in favor of an assignee, unless suit might have been prosecuted in such court to recover said contents, if no assignment had been made.

[Cited in Deford v. Mehaffy, 13 Fed. 491.]

[See Hobby v. Allison, 13 Fed. 401, and note as to the right of removal under sections 11 and 12 of the judiciary act, and under act of 1867.]

2. The provisions of the 11th section of the judiciary act in regard to suits in the U. S. courts on notes or other choses in action held by assignment, was intended to prevent fraudulent assignments of choses in action, made for the purpose of giving the court jurisdiction; and was not founded on any constitutional principle.

[3. Cited in Woolridge v. McKenna, 8 Fed. 679, to the point that a petition for the removal of a cause from a state court to a federal court may be amended in the latter court to conform to the facts.]

Action at law [by James M. Barclay against the board of levee commissioners and the police juries of Madison and Carroll parishes, La.] Heard upon motion to dismiss the petition [for removal. Motion denied.]

E. T. Merrick, Geo. W. Race, W. H. Foster, and T. S. McCoy, for plaintiff.

S. R. & C. L. Walker, for defendants.

BRADLEY, Circuit Justice. This suit was originally commenced in the thirteenth judicial district court of Louisiana, for the recovery of the amount due on a large number of warrants issued by the board of levee commissioners, defendants, payable to the order of various persons, by whom they are indorsed. Suit was commenced by petition in 1867, and citation was duly served on the president of the board. In December, 1870, the police jury of the parish of Madison intervened, and prayed leave to defend the suit. The petition of intervention was afterwards withdrawn, and the plaintiff removed the suit to this court under the act of congress of February 5, 1867, (14 Stat. 385.) In the original petition, the plaintiff was described as a resident of the city of New Orleans. By a supplemental and amended petition filed in this court after the removal of the cause, he states that that was a mistake of his attorney; that he is, and for many years has been a citizen and resident of the state of Tennessee, and he furnished his own affidavit and the affidavit of others to show the truth of this allegation. By his amended petition he also makes the police juries of the parishes of Madison and Carroll, parties defendants in the suit, and prays for judgment against them, as well as against the board of levee commissioners.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William B. Woods, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

The defendants move to dismiss the petition on several grounds:

First. That the parties are not such as to give this court jurisdiction. The plaintiff has shown that he is a citizen of Tennessee, and was so when the suit was originally commenced, and the defendants being political, or quasi political corporations of Louisiana, are necessarily citizens of the latter state. So far as citizenship of the parties goes, therefore, the court has jurisdiction.

Second. It is urged that the form of the security sued on is such that this court has no jurisdiction of the case, and for this point the defendants rely on the 11th section of the judiciary act of [September 24,] 1789, [1 Stat. 79,] which declares that no district or circuit court of the United States shall have cognizance of any suit to recover the contents of any promissory note or other chose in action in favor of an assignee, unless suit might have been prosecuted in such court to recover said contents, if no assignment had been made. This case undoubtedly comes within the purview of that section. But the plaintiff contends that the act of 1867, [14 Stat. 385,] which authorizes the removal of suits from a state court either by the plaintiff or defendant, who shall make oath that he cannot have a fair trial on account of local prejudice and influence, overrides this provision of the 11th section of the judiciary act. And I am inclined to think that this position is correct. The provision referred to was intended to prevent fraudulent assignments of choses in action made for the mere purpose of giving the court jurisdiction, and was not founded on any constitutional principle. As the act of 1867 is general in its terms, and gives the right of removal in all cases without exception where the parties are citizens of different states, I do not think it necessary to import into it an exception grounded on the 11th section of the judiciary act.

Third. The defendants contend that as against the police juries of Madison and Carroll, the action is an original one, and therefore that the judiciary act applies as to them. If the original action was properly removed, and if the addition of these parties was a matter properly incident thereto, I think the objection cannot prevail. But I cannot see how those police juries are proper parties in the case. I do not see how one corporation can be made liable for the debts and obligations of another without a voluntary assumption thereof. But this is, perhaps, a matter more proper to come up on the trial of the cause, when the plaintiff may be prepared with evidence to show their liability. I shall not dismiss the cause as to them, if the plaintiff sees fit to continue them in it.

Some other objections of a technical nature were made, which it is not necessary to notice. If the defendant's existence as a corporation has ceased, the plaintiff's judgment will be a vain thing. I see no evidence, however, that it has ceased; nor any evidence which convinces me that process has not been properly served upon it. The motion to dismiss is denied.

[NOTE. Plaintiff recovered judgment in this action, June 19, 1872, (unreported; opinion not now accessible.) See Barkley v. Board Levee Com'rs, 93 U. S. 258, affirming decision of United States circuit court for district of Louisiana, denying plaintiff's application for a mandamus to compel the assessment and collection of a tax for the payment of such judgment.]

BARCLAY, (McMILLIN v.) See Case No. 8,902.

BARCLAY, (ST. LUKE'S HOSPITAL v.) See Case No. 12,241.

Case No. 978.

BARCLAY et al. v. THAYER et al.

[12 Blatchf. 107;[1] 1 Ban. & A. 267; 6 O. G. 2.]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. May 27, 1874.

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS—BRACELETS.

The invention covered by the claim of the letters patent granted to John Barclay, [August 24, 1869, reissued,] December 6th, 1870, for an "improvement in the manufacture of plated metal bracelets," which claim is, "The improved manufacture or bracelet, as made with the turned parts or beads, E, E, arranged with respect to the plates, C, D, in the manner substantially as represented and described," has relation only to bracelets in which the fellow piece is soldered to the base plate, and is not anticipated by a bracelet in which the fellow piece is not soldered to the base plate.

[In equity. Suit by John Barclay and Edward C. Knapp against Oscar S. Thayer and Peter B. Cushman for infringement of patent. Decree for plaintiffs.]

John Van Santvoord, for plaintiffs.

Carroll D. Wright, for defendants.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. This suit is brought on reissued letters patent granted to John Barclay, December 6th, 1870, for an "improvement in the manufacture of plated metal bracelets," the original patent having been granted to him, as inventor, August 24th, 1869. The specification says: "This invention relates to a bracelet which is made of base metal plates, coated with a more costly metal or other material, and the foundation plate of which is provided with beads at its edges, at such a distance apart that they hug closely the fellow piece of the bracelet, and that, after the two parts of the bracelet have been united, no uncovered portion of the base metal remains visible, thereby producing a bracelet superior in finish to similar bracelets as heretofore made, without any increase in the cost of manufacturing the same." The specification then goes on to state, that a bracelet made of metal plates, plated or coated with gold or other material, had been ordinarily constructed of two pieces, by soldering the upper portion of the body, or fellow piece, onto the lower portion, or base plate, (the upper portion being bent, so that its cross section presents the form of a U, before it is applied and fixed to the lower portion,) and then filing down the edges of the base plate, so as to make them even with the outer sides of the fellow piece, thus leaving the edges of the base metal exposed, without any coating or plating. It then states, that the patentee, in carrying out his invention, bends or turns up each edge of the lower portion or base plate, C, in the manner shown in the drawing, which is to roll it over upon itself, giving a rounded external surface, each edge of the plate, after the bending has been accomplished, resting upon, or being directly over, the upper or uncoated surface of the plate, the whole being so arranged as to form beads, E, E, on the flanks of the plate, and with the coating material on the external or exposed surface of the plate and of the beads. The upper portion or fellow piece, D, bent as in the old construction, and having the coating material on its outer surface, is then placed on the lower portion or base plate, and between the beads, and soldered to the base plate, the beads being made to fit closely to the sides of the fellow piece. The specification states, that, by these means, the edges of the baser metal are concealed, and, also that the beads stiffen and strengthen the base plate, and improve the appearance of the bracelet, and hide the solder from view, and enable it to effect a firmer union of the two plates. The claim is in these words: "The improved manufacture or bracelet, as made with the turned parts or beads, E, E, arranged with respect to the plates, C, D, in the manner substantially as represented and described."

[1] [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, District Judge; reprinted in 1 Ban. & A. 267; and here republished by permission.]

It is apparent, that the patentee's invention has relation only to bracelets in which the fellow piece is soldered to the base plate. He specifies, as advantages of his arrangement, that the beads not only conceal the base metal, and stiffen and strengthen the base plate, but hide the solder, and enable it to effect a firmer union of the two plates. The patent granted to John S. Palmer, March 19th, 1861, for an "improvement in constructing bracelets, &c.," and which is brought up as anticipating the invention of Barclay, sets forth, as a difficulty in constructing bracelets, that, when the fellow piece is soldered to the base plate, and the superfluous stock is trimmed from the latter, the baser metal thereof, when plated stock is used, will be exposed, and then states that Palmer turns over the edges of the base plate, so as to make an overlaying lip or slide on each edge of the outside of the bracelet. This turning over of the edges of the base plate leaves them with smooth round edges on the outside, and gives substantially the beads which Barclay has. But Palmer, instead of soldering a fellow piece to the base plate at the inside of the beads, slides bits of metal, with projecting lips, under the lips or slides of the base plate, and so makes his bracelet. This is a very different arrangement from that of Barclay. Palmer dispenses with solder, and uses two lips, with rivets passing through both of them. Barclay retains the use of solder. Palmer dispenses with a fellow piece in one piece, and substitutes therefor short bits of metal, each slid into place separately, and making, when arranged together, a fellow piece. Barclay retains the old fellow piece in one piece. It is of no consequence, that the defendant may so turn over the beads as to leave a space between them and the surface below, which space might be used for the insertion of a lip or slide. Such space is not so used by the defendant, and serves no purpose. The space which may be so left by the defendant is not used by the defendant for the purpose set forth by Palmer, and the defendant's arrangement is none the less Barclay's arrangement by reason of having such space, nor does such space cause the defendant's arrangement to be that of Palmer. The defendant, to enable himself to construct a bracelet having a fellow piece in one piece, and to still use solder for the attachment together of the two plates, has availed himself of the invention of Barclay, and has not followed the invention of Palmer.

There must be a decree for the plaintiffs.

[NOTE. Patent No. 94,064 was granted to J. Barclay, August 24, 1869, reissued December 6, 1870, (No. 4,192,) and has not, so far as ascertained, been involved in any other cases reported prior to 1880.]

BARCROFT, (CHESAPEAKE & O. CANAL CO. v.) See Case No. 2,644.

BARCROFT, (STEWART v.) See Case No. 13,422.

BARD, (RAPP v.) See Case No. 11,577.

BARENT v. DAY. See Case No. 836.

BARGE.

[Note. Cases cited under this title will be found arranged in alphabetical order under the names of the barges; e. g. "The Barge Called the Wilkesbarre Coal & Iron Co. 129. See Wilkesbarre Coal & Iron Co. 129," Case No. 17,661.]

BARGER, (CHAPMAN v.) See Case No. 2,-603.

Case No. 979.

BARGER v. MILLER.

[4 Wash. C. C. 280.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. Oct. Term, 1822.

EVIDENCE—DEED—POWER OF ATTORNEY—EJECTMENT—ADVERSE POSSESSION.

1. An exemplification of the record of a copy of a deed is not evidence.

[See Lemon v. Bacon, Case No. 8,241; Gregg v. Forsyth, 24 How. (65 U. S.) 179; Dick v. Balch, 8 Pet. (33 U. S.) 30.]

2. An exemplification of an agreement between A and B. executed only by B, can not be given in evidence against A.

3. A deed by an attorney, executed in his own name, is not the deed of his constituent.

[See Hanrick v. Barton, 16 Wall. (83 U. S.) 166, 173.]

4. The principal is not bound by any act of his attorney in fact, unless he acts within the scope of his authority.

5. In what case a defendant in ejectment may, and where he may not be allowed to take the possession of a prior occupant to his own, to bar the plaintiff by length of possession. The principle decided in Potts v. Gilbert, [Case No. 11,347,] explained [and distinguished.]

[See Walden v. Gratz, 1 Wheat. (14 U. S.) 292; Doswell v. De La Lanza, 20 How. (61 U. S.) 29; Shuffleton v. Nelson, Case No. 12,822.]

[At law. Ejectment by lessee of Barger, against Miller.] The lessor of the plaintiff claimed under a warrant and survey, dated in 1701, in the name of Daniel Falkner, styled the agent for the German purchasers, for upwards of twenty-two thousand acres, and a conveyance by Falkner in 1708, of the whole tract to J. H. Sprogle. The lessor of the plaintiff is one of the heirs of Sprogle, and claims one fifth of one eighth of the whole of the above tract. The defendant offered in evidence, in support of his title to the land now in dispute, an exemplification of certain articles of agreement, purporting to have been executed by the said J. H. Sprogle and V. Guiger on the 16th of April, 1718, by which Sprogle agreed to sell to Guiger two hundred and fifty acres, part of the above mentioned tract of land, for the sum of £50. This instrument was signed and sealed by Guiger only, and was admitted to record in the year 1746, upon the acknowledgment of Guiger, and his declaration that the counterpart of the agreement was duly executed by Sprogle, and was afterwards consumed by fire, and upon the certificate of Johanna Sprogle, widow of J. H. Sprogle, Jun. that an agreement was found by her amongst the papers of J. H. Sprogle, Sen. in the hand writing of her deceased husband, of which the paper so offered to be recorded was a just copy. This paper was objected to by the plaintiff's counsel.

BY THE COURT. The evidence is altogether inadmissible, either as an exemplification of a recorded deed, or on the ground of the antiquity of the instrument; since it is not the original instrument, but merely an asserted copy of it. As such, it could not be legally admitted to record, and consequently, an exemplification of it is no better than any other copy of it would have been; besides, it professes to be the deed of Guiger only, and is therefore totally inoperative for the purpose for which it is offered. The ex parte affidavit of Guiger, that the counterpart was executed by Sprogle, and was afterwards consumed by fire, cannot be regarded for a moment by the court.

The defendant's counsel then gave in evidence a deed of mortgage of seven thousand five hundred acres, part of the above mentioned large tract, by J. H. Sprogle to Henry Soames, bearing date the 20th of March, 1732, and another deed dated the 20th of December, 1733, by which, for the consideration of the mortgage debt, and of other sums, Sprogle released to Soames his equity of redemption in the mortgaged premises. The court was requested to note, that these deeds were furnished by the counsel for the plaintiff to the defendant's counsel. These instruments were offered, and admitted to record in the year 1749. The defendant's counsel then gave the following evidence:—A deed bearing date the 1st of December 1749, from Thomas Preston to V. Guiger, which, after reciting the above mentioned mortgage, and release of the equity of redemption, the will of Henry Soames, by which he devised all his estate to his son John Soames, the death of John Soames intestate and without issue, leaving Catharine Yaldwin and Mary Johns, his heirs at law, and a conveyance by them to the said Preston of two hundred and fifty acres of land, part of the above mentioned mortgaged premises; conveys the said two hundred and fifty acres by metes and bounds, to the said V. Guiger, in fee simple. A deed from V. Guiger, bearing date the 27th of October 1757, to George Burgart, for one hundred acres, part of the above mentioned two hundred and fifty acres. A record of the orphan's court in 1764, vesting in John Guiger, third son of V. Guiger deceased, the remainder of the above mentioned tract of land, being one hundred and fifty acres; he agreeing to take the same, and to pay to his brothers and sisters their proportions of the appraised value of the said land. A deed from John Guiger to George Burgart, bearing date the 4th of July 1766, for the said one hundred and fifty acres. The will of George

[1] [Originally published from the MSS. of Hon. Bushrod Washington, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, under the supervision of Richard Peters, Jr., Esq.]

Burgart, dated the 30th of July 1782, devising twenty-nine acres, part of the said two hundred and fifty acres, to his sons Tobias and George; and a deed dated the 26th of February 1788, between Tobias and George Burgart, sons of the said George Burgart, by which the former conveys to the latter his moiety of the said one hundred and twenty-nine acres. Lastly, a deed bearing date the 10th of May 1802, by the surviving administrator of George Burgart, the son, (made under an order of the orphan's court) conveying the said one hundred and twenty-nine acres to the defendant. The defendant then examined an ancient witness, who stated that about the year 1760, he remembered V. Guiger the elder in possession of this land. After him, he remembered old Mr. Burgart to be in possession, and living on the land. After his death, his sons Tobias and George lived on it, and George died there. After his death it was rented to different persons, and amongst others to the defendant. He thinks that the defendant has lived on the land near thirty years. It appeared by other evidence that Miller came into possession about the year 1799.

The plaintiff then gave in evidence a power of attorney executed by Henry Soames, bearing date the 1st of May 1740, authorizing Samuel Mickel to collect, sue for, and recover all moneys due to him in America, to give acquittances, and to settle and compromise the same as he might think right. Also to lease his lands in Pennsylvania, and to collect his rents, and to sell and convey all and every of his said lands, or any part thereof, and in the name of the said Soames, to execute any deeds or conveyances for the lands so sold. Also an instrument signed and sealed by Samuel Mickel, styling himself, in the body of it, attorney in fact for Henry Soames; by which he fully acquits John H. Sprogle, his heirs and assigns, from all obligations, bonds, mortgages or conveyances, touching the premises in Hanover or elsewhere, in the county of Philadelphia, having had a final settlement with his son J. H. Sprogle, Jun. July 1740, of all accounts with J. H. Sprogle and Henry Soames, "and all papers and parchments cancelled, having received satisfaction." There is no date to this instrument, but it was admitted to record in 1742. This paper, it was proved, was found a few months past amongst some old cast away papers in the garret of Mr. Say, one of the subscribing witnesses to it.

Phillips and J. R. Ingersoll, for the plaintiff, contended, that the only apparent blemish in their title being the mortgage and release of the equity of redemption by J. H. Sprogle in 1732 and 1733, it was completely removed by the deed executed in 1740 by the attorney in fact of H. Soames, and the delivering up of the said deeds by him to be cancelled, whereby the title to the 7500 acres of land became revested in the Sprogle family. That as to the length of possession relied upon by the defendant, it was in proof that he did not come into the possession until the year 1799, and this suit was brought in the year 1819, within the period of twenty-one years, fixed by the act of limitations of this state. And that he could not tack to his own possession that of the persons under whom he claimed; they relied upon the decision of this court in the case of Potts v. Gilbert, [Case No. 11,347.]

Kittera, for the defendant, insisted, that the deed of the attorney of Soames did not, in any manner, operate to revest the estate in the Sprogle family, and manifestly did not apply to the 7500 acres of land, nor was it so understood by the parties. That the plaintiff's title therefore was clearly defective. But that, at all events, the defendant had shown a regular continuing actual possession out of the lessor of the plaintiff, and those under whom he claims, for upwards of sixty years; and in the defendant, for more than twenty-one years before this suit was brought.

[Plaintiff suffered a nonsuit.]

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice, charged the jury. The first, and most important question for your decision is, whether the plaintiff has made out such a title to the land now in controversy as will authorise you to give a verdict in his favour? If he has not, your verdict ought to be for the defendant, however imperfect his title may be. The first question is one purely of law; and the opinion of the court is, that the title of the plaintiff is altogether defective. We go back to the year 1732, at which time the title of J. H. Sprogel to the large tract of land, of which that in question was a part, was unexceptionable. But in that year he mortgaged 7500 acres of that tract, including the land in controversy, to Henry Soames, for securing the payment of £75. The money not having been paid at the time stipulated, Sprogle, in the succeeding year, in consideration of the debt aforesaid, and of an additional advance, released to Soames his equity of redemption in the mortgaged premises, whereby Soames became entitled to the estate therein, both legal and equitable. The next inquiry is, whether, by any subsequent act of Soames, or of any person claiming under him, the estate became revested in the Sprogle family. It is insisted by the plaintiff's counsel that the deed executed by Samuel Mickel produced this effect. With respect to that deed, it is to be premised, that it makes its appearance before the court in a very questionable shape, if indeed it be entitled to all the importance which is attached to it by the plaintiff's counsel. It is not even dated; and so little attention seems to have been bestowed upon it, that the common and necessary form observed in the execution of deeds by an attorney, was disregarded. In the body of it, it is true, Mickel styles himself the attorney in fact of Henry Soames, but it is signed and sealed in his individual name, not as attorney of his constituent, nor with his name. This might answer very well to a paper which imported no more than a mere settlement of accounts, and an acquittance; but it cannot, upon any principle of law, be said to be the deed of Henry Soames. Where would we expect to find a deed of the importance attributed to this paper by the counsel, and where was it found? One would suppose amongst the title papers belonging to this estate, in the possession of the Sprogle family; since, without the evidence of a reconveyance, the title was forever gone, and vested in Soames by the deeds of 1732 and 1733. But instead of this, it was scraped out of the cast away papers in the garret of a Mr. Say, by one of his descendants, in the course of a few months past. It professes to be an acquittance of all bonds, mortgages, and conveyances, touching the premises in Hanover and elsewhere, and the cancelling of all papers and parchments. What became then of the deeds of 1732 and 1733? The plaintiff's counsel answer, that they furnished them on the trial to the defendant's counsel. This is true; but were they found amongst the title papers of the Sprogle family? No evidence of this kind was offered. But how happens it, that they were recorded in the year 1794, nine years after the time when Mickel's deed declared they were cancelled, if it be true that they were at all referred to, or in the contemplation of the parties when that deed was executed? They must have been offered for record, either by J. H. Sprogle, or Henry Soames. If by the former, it was surely an extraordinary mode of cancelling and destroying them, to perpetuate by record proof of the evidence of their being subsisting and valid deeds. If they were recorded at the instance of Soames, it proves that they still remained in his possession, the evidences of his title to the 7500 acres of land, which he deemed it prudent to perpetuate; and if so, they could not be conveyances to which Mickel's deed referred. But be it one way or the other, they never were cancelled, and Mickel's deed states that the papers and parchments to which it applied were so. But suppose the deed under consideration clear of all these difficulties;—what is its purport, and legal effect? It professes to amount to no more than an acknowledgment that all accounts between Sprogle and Soames had been finally settled. and an acquittance to Sprogle from all debts by bond or mortgage. It has not one feature of a grant of any land, much less of that, the equity of redemption in which had been released to Soames. It cannot be considered even as an agreement to reconvey the 7500 acres of land; and even if it could, it would not benefit the plaintiff in this action, who is bound to establish in himself a legal title to the land in controversy. If it were necessary to go further, it might be very safely laid down, that even if the deed in question were in fact a reconveyance of the 7500 acres of land, it was not warranted by the power of attorney to Mickel. That power referred to accounts and debts then open and subsisting; whereas the debt which was secured by the mortgage deed of 1732 had been finally closed and discharged seven years before the power was given, by the deed of 1733. It authorised Mickel to sell the lands of his constituent; but the deed under consideration does not even profess to be the evidence of a sale of any kind.

The title of the plaintiff being thus obviously defective, I should not deem it necessary to notice that of the defendant, founded upon length of possession, if the plaintiff's counsel did not seem to have misunderstood the decision of this court in the case of Potts v. Gilbert, [Case No. 11,347,] which was altogether different from the present. In that, the persons, of whose possessions the defendant sought to avail himself, were mere intruders, or squatters, as they are called, upon a vacant possession, without title or colour of title, between whom and the defendant there was no privity. The court laid it down, that the title of the plaintiff drew to it a constructive possession sufficient to bar the running of the act of limitations against him. That when that possession was disturbed by the actual possession of A, a continuance of such possession for twenty-one years would have divested the right of the owner to the particular part so possessed, and vested a right in A. But that if, after possessing the land for a number of years, short of those mentioned in the statute, A left the land and B took possession, the constructive possession of the owner revived. and B could not tack to his possession that of A the prior occupant, so as to make out a twenty-one years possession against the real owner of the land. These were the principles of that decision. In this case, Preston entered under a claim and colour of title derived under Soames, although the title papers recited in his deed to Guiger have not been produced; and in 1794 he conveyed the land, of which the tract in question is a part, to Guiger, from whom the title is regularly deduced to the defendant. No two cases therefore can be more unlike than Potts v. Gilbert, [supra,] and the present. Upon the whole, the defendant is clearly entitled to your verdict.

The plaintiff suffered a non-suit.

Case No. 980.

BARGH et al. v. PAGE et al.

[4 McLean, 10.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Michigan. June Term, 1845.

COURTS—JURISDICTION—DIVERSE CITIZENSHIP.

1. The citizenship of a person not served with process, who is a joint promissor, must appear in the declaration.

[See Smith v. Clapp, 15 Pet. (40 U. S.) 125.]

[Distinguished in Bank of Circleville v. Iglehart, Case No. 860.]

2. If he be a citizen of the same state as the plaintiff, the court can take no jurisdiction.

[At law. Suit by Bargh and Arcularius against Timothy Page and others. Motion to set aside verdict. Granted, with leave to amend declaration.]

Bates, Walker & Douglass, for plaintiffs.

Witherel & Buell, for defendants.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This is a motion to set aside the verdict obtained by the plaintiffs, for the reasons assigned. The second ground of the motion is, that there is no averment of citizenship of Timothy Page, one of the parties to the note, but who was not served with process.

By the plaintiff, it is contended that the non-joinder of a joint contractor can only be pleaded in abatement. Cabell v. Vaughan, 1 Saund. 290, 291c, note 4; Rice v. Shute, 5 Burrows, 2611; Minor v. Mechanics' Bank of Alexandria, 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 46; Gilman v. Rives, 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 298.

This was undoubtedly the rule at the common law, but the limited jurisdiction of this court will not admit of the same rule. The circuit court can take jurisdiction from the citizenship of the parties, only, when they reside in different states. By the act of 1839, if process shall not be served on all the defendants, the plaintiff may proceed to judgment against those who are before the court, provided it can be done without prejudice to those who have had no notice. But if the absent defendants live in the same state with the plaintiff, the court can not take jurisdiction, as between them and the plaintiff, as the suit would not be, as to them, between citizens of different states. But with this exception, the court may give judgment, though a part of the persons named as defendants have not been served with process. Against those who are served, the judgment will be good. In the special counts, there was an averment of non-residence as to T. Page, on whom process was not served, but those counts were discontinued, and in the general counts there was no such reference to his citizenship as to make the averment, in this respect, in the special counts, a part of the general. As this must appear on the face of the declaration, there was no necessity to plead an abatement, to take advantage of it as at common law. Upon the whole, we think the verdict must be set aside on the point reserved, and leave given to the plaintiffs to amend their declaration.

[1] [Reported by Hon. John McLean, Circuit Justice.]

Case No. 981.

BARING et al. v. ERDMAN et al.

[14 Hag. Reg. Pa. 129; Amer. Sent. Aug. 23, 1834.]

Circuit Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. Aug. 4, 1834.

INJUNCTION—TAKING PROPERTY WITHOUT AUTHORITY OF LAW.

[1. An entry upon lands for the purpose of diverting a stream which flows thereon is, if done without right, such a trespass as may be restrained by the decree of a court of equity.]

[2. Equity has jurisdiction to restrain such entry and diversion, though the persons making it be the agents of the board of canal commissioners of the state, if such agents have not authority of law to do the acts complained of. If they act without authority from the state, they are mere trespassers.]

[3. In construing the Pennsylvania statutes of 1825 to 1830 in relation to the construction of state roads and canals, the court must consider them as forming a connected series of legislation to effect an object of great public utility, and they must receive a liberal interpretation.]

[4. In construing the statutes, the court will consider the object of the enactments, and will not suffer it to be defeated, but will make them answer the intention which the legislature had in view, as collected from the cause or necessity of the statutes, though the construction seem contrary to the letter.]

[See Ogden v. Strong, Case No. 10,460; Hadden v. Collector, 5 Wall. (72 U. S.) 107.]

[5. The history and situation of the country will be recurred to, to ascertain the reason as well as the meaning of a statute, to enable the court to apply the rules of construction.]

[6. Although none of the Pennsylvania statutes of 1825 to 1830 on the subject of state railroads and canals contain any express provision authorizing the appropriation by the state of the property of the individuals on their sites, or the taking of materials for their construction, yet, in view of the facts that the state has expended on these improvements $20,000,000, that they extend through the most populous and highly cultivated portions of the state, and that the ground on which they are located, and the materials for their construction, are owned by individuals, without the appropriation of whose property the object must necessarily be defeated, such authority must be implied as necessary to effectuate the object of the statutes.]

[7. A bill in equity was filed which alleged that the plaintiffs were owners of certain lands; that the respondents, agents of the board of canal commissioners of Pennsylvania, entered upon said lands, diverted a stream of water thereon by constructing a dam across it, and dug a trench to carry off the diverted waters for the use of the engines on the inclined railway on the bank of the Schuylkill; and that such acts were done without authority of law,—and prayed for an injunction. The canal commissioners had authority to construct and repair the railway, and to take materials from the adjoining lands for that purpose, but the railway had been completed without a permanent appropriation of the water. Held, that the diversion could not be justified under the authority to construct and repair; nor could the diverted water be considered a material, within the meaning of the statute.]

[8. The word "material," in a statute authorizing the taking of materials from neighboring lands for the construction and repair of a railroad, refers to those things which are component parts of the road, and necessary for its completion in all its parts, and does not include the means or facilities of transportation upon it afterwards.]

[9. It did not appear from any of the laws prior to 1834 that it was any part of the original scheme of the Pennsylvania state system of canals and railroads to furnish engines for the purpose of transportation. In 1834 authority was conferred on the board of canal commissioners "to procure such locomotive engines or tenders for the use of passengers and merchandise as may be necessary for doing the whole or any part of the transportation," (Laws Pa. 1834, p. 508;) and by another act of the same session a heavy punishment was prescribed for breaking, cutting down, or destroying, in whole or in part, any water station, drain, or bank belonging to any railroad constructed by the state, or stopping up or obstructing any culvert, drain, pipe, water station, or well belonging thereto, (Laws Pa. 1834, p. 202.) Held, that these laws afforded evidence that the legislature regarded water stations, wells, etc., for the supply of the engines belonging to the railroad, as a part of its appendages, and that, in view of the doubt raised thereby, a preliminary injunction restraining the diversion of water for the supply of the engines as without authority of law would not be granted on a motion on the pleadings and affidavits.]

[10. Authority to take materials or divert water for the use of a railroad from lands contiguous to, adjoining, or near the railroad is not limited to the lands next to, and bounding upon, the railroad, but extends to lands in a reasonable vicinity, which must depend upon local circumstances.]

[11. "Near," in such a statute, does not necessarily mean next to, but a reasonable vicinity; and what that is must depend on local circumstances.]

[12. On motion for a preliminary injunction to restrain the taking of the water it was contended that the taking of the water was not necessary, inasmuch as there was a sufficient supply of water upon the tract of land through which the railroad passed, and affidavits in support of this view were filed. Counter affidavits were filed by the defendants, of apparently equal weight, to show that the diversion of the water was necessary. Held, that the affidavits raised an issue of fact which should not be determined by the court on the motion; that the necessity of diverting the water was, to some extent at least, within the discretion of the commissioners; and that, in the absence of anything to show an abuse of discretion, the court could not interfere therewith.]

[13. The acts complained of were begun May 19th, and the complainants had notice thereof on May 22d. On May 28th an attempt was made by him, with the assistance of a peace officer and some others, to take possession of the land, and expel the respondents and their workmen, but without success. The complainants notified the respondents not to proceed with the work, but took no further means to prevent its progress till the filing of the bill, on June 25th. In the mean time the dam was built to the height of eight or ten feet, a trench dug across the complainants' land, and the water of the stream conducted to a reservoir on adjoining land, whence it was conveyed through pipes to the engine house. The only act remaining to be done on the premises was the laying of pipes in the trench and filling it up. Held, that the acts complained of had practically been completed before the filing of the bill, and an injunction could not issue to restrain a completed act; and that the complainants, by standing by after notice of the commencement of the work until near its completion, when all the substance of the injury had been completed, had forfeited their right to a preliminary injunction.]

[See Webb v. Portland Manuf'g Co., Case No. 17,322; Cole Silver Min. Co. v. Virginia & Gold Hill Water Co., Id. 2,990.]

[14. On a bill to restrain an entry upon land by canal commissioners, on the ground that the entry is illegal and without authority of law, the question whether the entry is illegal because it has been made without compensation does not arise.]

[In equity. Bill for an injunction by Alexander Baring and Ann Baring, in right of the said Ann, and Henry Baring and Maria Baring, in right of the said Maria, all aliens and subjects of the king of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, against Frederick Erdman and William Williams, both citizens of the state of Pennsylvania. On motion for an injunction pendente lite. Motion denied.]

This was a bill in equity, praying for an injunction to restrain the respondents from proceeding in the erection of a dam, digging a trench, and diverting and using the water of a stream, on the estate of the complainants, called "Lansdowne," in the immediate neighborhood of Philadelphia. It appeared that the respondents were superintendents and agents under the board of canal commissioners, by whom they were directed to execute the works complained of, in order to supply the locomotive and stationary engines on the inclined plane with the necessary quantity of water. The motion for an injunction was resisted; affidavits on both sides were taken, and the case fully argued.

Jos. R. Ingersoll and Charles Ingersoll, for complainants.

G. M. Dallas, for respondents.

Before BALDWIN, Circuit Justice, and HOPKINSON, District Judge.

BALDWIN, Circuit Justice. The complainants, who are the subjects of the king of Great Britain, having filed their bill on the equity side of this court, setting forth that they are owners of a tract of land, on the western bank of the Schuylkill, of which they have long been in the quiet and peaceable possession, through which a stream of water has run from time immemorial until its diversion by the respondents, by means of a dam, erected across it, on the land of the complainants, and a trench made to conduct it to the Pennsylvania Railroad, for the supply of the engines thereon; that the injury thereby caused is permanent and irreparable, and committed under color of, but without any authority conferred by law on the canal commissioners or any agent or officer appointed by them; they therefore pray for an injunction to restrain the respondents from the commission of any further trespass on the premises, from the further use and diversion of the water of said stream, and the further prosecution of any works, which may in any manner interfere with the full and quiet possession of said land and the water flowing through in its accustomed bed, and general relief. That the title and possession of the premises is and has been for many years in the complainants is admitted; it is also admitted, that the respondents, under the authority and by the direction of the canal commissioners and their engineers, have erected the dam, dug the trench, and conducted the water from and across the premises to the railroad, for the use of the engines employed thereon, for the transportation of passengers and merchandise, up the inclined plane on the western bank of the Schuylkill. From the affidavits on both sides it appears that the work was commenced without notice to the agent or tenant of the complainants, but that as soon as the agent received information, he notified the defendants, not to proceed any further; they, however, persisted, notwithstanding all remonstrances and open opposition, and availing themselves of superior numbers, kept possession of the premises, till they had finished the dam and trench, so as to divert the water to its destination. On these admitted or uncontested facts, various interesting questions have arisen, which have been very fully and ably argued, and deserve our most serious consideration.

If the respondents had invaded the peaceable possession of the complainants, under any pretension of an adversary right, or had diverted the water course for their own individual benefit, by a sheer act of trespass, the nature of the injury would be a proper subject for an injunction. The owner of an estate has a right to use it without any control or interference by others. Whether he makes it the source of profit, pleasure or amusement, his right of property [is] equally protected. No man has a right to judge of the purposes to which the proprietor devotes his time, his capital or his estate, or the relative value and importance of its varied uses. The parks, the pleasure grounds, the shade, ornamental or forest trees, the springs, the water courses or fish ponds, are as much in his full dominion as his mansion house, his grain fields, his meadows or orchards. An immediate injury done to either will be redressed at law or in equity, on the same principles; in a court of law, the remedy depends upon the right of the complainants, and can be afforded only after the injury is committed, but a court of equity interferes to protect a possession held under a claim and color of right, and will prevent an impending or threatened injury, until the party out of possession shall establish his right at law, or otherwise be put into possession by some process which the law recognizes. So far then as the case depends upon the nature of the injury, we should feel it our duty to grant the injunction, if the respondents could be considered as mere trespassers on the possession of the complainants, by any assumed right in themselves, nor would the case be changed if the acts done by them or threatened to be done by them, under the authority of the board of canal commissioners, should appear to be clearly unwarranted by any act of assembly. Though they act as the mere agents of the board or the state, we should be bound to view them as mere trespassers, whom we should enjoin from any future acts, however deeply it might affect the interests of the state. The acts of its agents or officers cannot be permitted to transcend the authority conferred on them by law. They must be clothed with jurisdiction over the subject matter, and with power to do the act complained of, or their proceedings will be controlled by the same rules which restrain private persons from committing irreparable injury to the property of others, [Osborn v. Bank of U. S.,] 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 842. By the principles of the common law, confirmed by Magna Charta, and numerous statutes in England, no freeman could be deprived of his freehold but by the judgment of his peers on the law of the land, (1 Bl. Comm. 138,) or as it is expressed by Lord Coke, "verdict of his equals, or legal process, or due process of law," (2 Co. Inst. 45, 46,) due process of the common law, (Id. 50,) or the law of the land. The statutes provide that no man's land shall be seized into the king's hands against the form of the great charter and the law of the land, and if any thing be done against the same, it shall be holden for none. 1 Puff. Law Nat. 209, 263. All the writers on national law lay down the position that private property may be taken for public use, but that this right is subject to the concomitant obligation on the government, to make compensation to the owner. Vatt. Law Nat. 112; Ruth. Inst. 43; Burlam. Nat. 150; Puff. Law Nat. 829, 830; Gro. 333, 334. The ninth section of the ninth article of the constitution of Pennsylvania adopts the provision and language of Magna Charta. The fifth amendment to the constitution of the United States adopts the expression "due process of law;" it also declares that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation. The constitution of Pennsylvania is still more explicit: "Nor shall any man's property be taken or applied to public use without the consent of his representatives, and without just compensation being made." It is therefore clear that according to all the fundamental laws of society, the appropriation of private property for public use must be authorized by the law of the land, the judgment of peers, or due process of law, and by compensation to the owner. When such an appropriation is deemed necessary for the general benefit, the public is considered as an individual treating with another for an exchange; and the legislature may compel the owner to part with his property for a fair price. 1 Bl. Comm. 139, 140. This is ascertained either by the verdict of a jury on a writ of ad quod damnum, or by some other process prescribed by the law, making or authorizing the appropriation. Our inquiry must therefore be directed to the question, whether the state has by law authorized the disseisin of the complainants of any part of their freehold, or the taking or application of their property for public use. It would be a waste of time to examine whether the officers of the state can do it without law or legal process, in direct violation of the constitution and every principle of the common and public law held sacred in all governments, and which cannot be impaired in this without its destruction.

It is a matter of no little surprise to find that none of the acts of assembly of Pennsylvania in relation to the great system of national improvement by roads and canals at the expense of the state, contains any express provisions authorizing the appropriation of the property of the individuals on their sites, or the taking of materials for their construction. This omission is the more singular when we find this authority in all cases explicitly conferred on all corporations created for the construction of bridges, canals, turnpikes, or railroads, and a mode prescribed by which compensation is made to the owners. It cannot be owing to any opinion of the legislature that the constitutional rights of proprietors are less sacred when the state requires their property for the construction of public improvements at its own expense and for its general benefit, than when they are constructed by a company incorporated for that purpose. The whole course of legislation on the subjects of the canals and railroads which are the property of the state, repels an imputation so unworthy of its wisdom and justice.

After the canal commissioners had executed the duties enjoined on them by the act of 1825, the legislature by the act of 1826, (Pamph. Laws, 55,) authorized and directed them to commence the construction of the canal: the eighth section directed them to make agreements with the owners of the land through which it should pass, or if unable to do so, provision was made to summon a jury to ascertain the damages, to value the quantity and duration of the interest and estate which would be taken or injured thereby, also to ascertain the value of materials required for the canal or the works thereof, the dams, locks, feeders or any works appurtenant. By the second section of an act passed at the same time, (page 302,) the commissioners were authorized and directed to take and pay for materials for reparation of the works in the same manner as for materials for constructing such works which may be removed or taken away. The eighth section of the act of 1827 (page 196) made provision for compensation to any person who might be aggrieved by the canal passing through his land or in any wise interfering with his rights of property; the tenth section authorizes the commissioners to receive releases of damages to land or by the taking of materials. The eighth section of the act of 1828 providing for the commencement of a railroad, directed the commissioners, previous to its final location and putting under contract, to receive releases for the damages to the owners of land by its passing through it or the taking the materials to construct the same. Pamph. Laws, p. 224. The fifth section of the act of 1830 directed them to offer to the owners a reasonable compensation for damages to land or for materials, and if it was not accepted, the governor was by the sixth section authorized to appoint a board for their assessment. Pamph. Laws, p. 220. From these acts it is apparent that, in the opinion of the legislature, the canal commissioners were authorized to locate and construct the canals and railroads on private property, to take up and apply it for public use, as well as all materials necessary for its construction and repair, and that provision had been made for compensation to all persons who might be aggrieved thereby. Such opinion, however, is not of itself sufficient to confer the authority, if it was not given by the former acts; a mistaken opinion of the legislature concerning the law does not make the law, [Postmaster General v. Early,] 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 148, and the court is not bound by a legislative misconstruction of a former law, unless it is a positive interpretation of a former act, imposed by the legislature, in subsequent act, (16 East, 333, 334,) or the mistake is manifested in words competent to make the law in future, (4 Taunt. 841.) "If the law expresses the sense of the legislature on the existing law as plainly as a declaratory act, and expresses it in terms capable of conferring jurisdiction, the words ought to receive this construction. If this interpretation of the words should be too free for a judicial tribunal, yet if the legislature has made it, if congress has explained its own meaning too unequivocally to be mistaken, their courts may be justified in adopting that meaning." [Postmaster General v. Early,] 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 148–150. In construing these acts of assembly, we must consider them as forming a connected series of legislation, tending to effect an object of infinite public utility, which ought to receive the most liberal and benign interpretation, ut res magis valeat quam pereat,—to make the private yield to the public benefit. Such are the settled rules of construing all statutes made for public benefit in favor of public institutions and all establishments of piety, charity, education and public improvement. 11 Coke. 70–78; Hob. 97, 122, 157; 1 Lev. 55; 3 Dyer, 255; 5 Coke, 14b; 10 Coke, 28a; [Town of Pawlet v. Clark,] 9 Cranch, [13 U. S.] 331; [Inglis v. Trustees of Sailor's Snug Harbour,] 3 Pet. [28 U. S.] 140; [Trustees of Phila. Baptist Ass'n v. Smith, Id.] 481; [City of Cincinnati v. Lessee of White,] 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 436; 7 Johns. Ch. 340. The court will look to the object in passing the law, and, if it can be discovered in its provisions, will not suffer it to be defeated, but make it answer the intention which the makers had in view. This will be collected from the cause or necessity of making the statute, and will be followed though the construction seem contrary to the letter. A thing which is within the meaning of the makers of a statute, is as much within the statute as if it were within the letter, and a thing which is within the letter but not the intention of the makers is not within the statute. 15 Johns. 380, 381; 14 Mass. 92, 93; [U. S. v. Wiltberger,] 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 94; [Postmaster General v. Early,] 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 151; [Boyle v. Zacharie,] 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 644. When the whole context demonstrates a particular intent in the legislature to effect a certain object, some degree of implication may be called in to effect it. [Durousseau v. U. S.] 6 Cranch, [10 U. S.] 314.

The sense of the legislature, as apparent from the whole statute or other statutes passed before or after on the same subject, the general system of legislation in relation to it, must be taken into view, not according to the words of a statute, but its provisions will be extended beyond or restrained within them according to the apparent sense and meaning thus to be collected. 1 Pick. 254, 255. The history and situation of the country will be recurred to, to ascertain the reason as well as the meaning of a provision to enable a court to apply the rule of construction. [Preston v. Browder,] 1 Wheat. [14 U. S.] 121. In doubtful cases, the title or preamble of any act may be referred to, to explain it,—[U. S. v. Palmer,] 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 631; 4 Serg. & R. 166; and if by a view of the whole, a clear intention is apparent, such intention is the law. No principle is better settled than that in the constructions of all instruments, the necessary implication resulting from the language used, is equivalent to express words used to express the intention of the parties.

In examining the various laws on the subject of the railroads and canals, on which the state has expended twenty millions of dollars, it is impossible to mistake the object in view, or the intention of the legislature; they extend through the most populous and highly improved portions of the state; the ground on which they are located, and the materials for their construction, are owned by individuals, without the appropriation of whose property the object must be necessarily defeated. It would be unnecessary to go into a detail of the acts in which, during ten successive years, the legislature have authorized the board of canal commissioners to locate, contract for, construct, complete, and keep in repair the various works constructed under their authority, in order to extract from them evidence of an intention to authorize an entry on private property, and its seizure for all the uses contemplated. We must be judicially blind not to perceive at the first view that such were the object and intention of the law makers, and, being so convinced, are bound to give such exposition to their acts as to effectuate the great object designed —the completion of a great system of internal communication by which the whole country is benefited. The courts are bound to protect the property of individuals from all aggression not authorized by law, and to construe strictly and carefully all laws which authorize any men or body of men to appropriate the property of another to their use, so as to confine them within the jurisdiction and powers conferred. 2 Dow, 521, 534; 1 Burrows, 382; 4 Burrows, 2244; Lofft, 442; Cowp. 26; 3 John. Cas. 108; 7 Durn. & E. [Term R.] 363, 364. Yet this does not require us to overlook the intention, and regard only the letter of the law; this is not the rule in criminal cases, much less in cases in which the interest of the country is involved. [U. S. v. Wiltberger,] 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 94, 95. Were this therefore a case in a court of law depending upon strict legal right, we should not entertain a doubt of the general authority of the officers of the state to make the same use of private property for the completion and repair of the canals and railroads as if it were given in express terms; the intent is apparent—the words used are competent to give the power, and in our opinion do give it by necessary implication.

The only subject on which we could entertain a reasonable doubt, is the one which is the immediate cause of the present motion. The diversion of the complainants' water course was not for the purpose of constructing or repairing the railroad, or any of its appurtenant works; they could be and were completed without a permanent appropriation of this water; nor can it be considered as a material, within the meaning of the acts. This word refers to those things which are component parts of the road, necessary for its completion in all its parts, but not to the means or facilities of transportation upon it afterwards.

It does not appear from any of the laws prior to those of April last, that it was any part of their original object to furnish engines for the purpose of transportation. They seem only to have had in view the completion of a railroad, with locomotive or stationary engines. Laws 1827, p. 194. The commissioners had no authority to purchase or procure engines till they were authorized by act of last session. "To procure such locomotive engines or tenders for the use of passengers and merchandise as may be necessary for doing the whole or any part of the transportation." Laws 1834, p. 508. By an act passed at the same session, a heavy punishment was prescribed for breaking, cutting down, or destroying, in whole or in part, any water station, drain, or bank belonging to any railroad constructed by the state, or stop up or obstruct any culvert, drain, pipe, water station, or well belonging thereto. Page 202. Taking these two laws in connection, it seems to have been the opinion of the legislature that water stations, wells, etc., or the supply of the engines belonging to the railroad as a part of its appendages; they certainly are put on the same footing as to protection or destruction from injury, as the bed of the road. This goes very far to show that it was their intention to authorize their being made, though it may be doubted whether such intention can be so made out as to give the power to enter on private property for this purpose, and make a permanent appropriation of a water course. No provision is made for compensation to the owner in the other cases; nor is there any express direction to construct reservoirs or water stations, or to provide a supply of water for the engines by any other means,—these considerations have their weight on our minds though we are not prepared to decide that there is a want of, or an abuse of authority in doing the acts complained of, we are far from being so clearly of opinion that the law gives the commissioners this power, as that of constructing and repairing the road itself—on a case on the law side of the court it would be our duty to express a decided opinion on this question; so it may be when this case comes up for a final hearing, if the legislature should not in the meantime remove the difficulty; but on a motion for the injunction, we think it not proper to do it.

In the late case of Atkinson v. Philadelphia & T. R. Co., [Case No. 615,] we declared "that if the act complained of is done under color of authority conferred by law, the court will not interfere if there is any ground of doubt as to the authority, until the doubt has been removed, and the matter finally determined at law." Still retaining the same opinion and having the serious doubts as to the authority in this case, we do not feel at liberty to award the injunction on this ground in the present stage of the cause. We are less inclined to do it, as the effect would be to suspend the transportation on this important road; no appeal lies from our present decision; it would not be final, and infinite injury would result, if we should now give an erroneous one. The case must be a plain one to justify such consequences, and a reasonable doubt as to any material point, must be conclusive on a motion.

The counsel of the complainants assume another position, which, if tenable, is an important one,—that admitting the powers of the commissioners to conduct water to the engines; yet it must be done from land contiguous to, adjoining, or near the road, according to the words of the act of 1826, (section 8, p. 55,) and other acts making provisions for damages in taking materials. These words must have a reasonable interpretation, according to the subject matter, with reference to the object to be effected, of which the officers, to whom the power of taking materials is confided, must judge according to their discretion. Near does not necessarily mean next to, but a reasonable vicinity. 1 W. Bl. 20. What that is, must depend on local circumstances. That another tract of land separates the railroad from the premises of the complainants is therefore no objection to the exercise of the authority to take materials, or to direct water for the use of the road, if it is necessary for that purpose. On this subject there is great contrariety of opinion between the persons whose affidavits have been taken for our information. On the part of the complainants, it is contended that the diversion of their water course was not requisite, inasmuch as there was a sufficient supply of water upon the tract of land through which the road passes, which could be used with more convenience and at less expense, in which they are supported by the affidavits of very respectable persons, of competent capacity to form a judgment; on the other hand the respondents are sustained in the opposite opinion by the affidavits of persons equally respectable and competent, as far as we know. There is thus an issue of fact between the parties, which we cannot decide on a motion, when there is such a difference between the affirmants, both as to matter of opinion and fact. Should the case ultimately turn on the necessity of diverting the complainants' water course, in order to effect the object of the law, the verdict of a jury ought to be taken on suit brought, or an issue directed; it is not our province (at present, at all events) to judge of the credibility of witnesses, or weigh their respective opinions; it is enough for the purposes of this motion, that the fact is so extremely doubtful as to make it difficult for us to form an opinion on the question of the necessity. By awarding the injunction on the ground assumed by the complainants, we should pronounce a judgment on conflicting evidence: whereas, by referring to an issue, or the final hearing, we should not incur the hazard of doing an irrevocable injury, by a premature order which on more full information, it might be our duty to annul. Besides this is a matter so much of discretion, that we would interfere only in a plain case of abuse or a want of discretion on the part of the public officers, intrusted with the execution of the work. The canal commissioners are a tribunal constituted for this purpose, with power to appoint subordinate officers, who act under their supervision; the law has confided to the board a broad discretion which no other tribunal can assume to itself; while they act within their jurisdiction, and exercise their judgment on the matters confided to them in good faith, their acts are clothed with the authority of the law, and their judgment is conclusive, unless some mode of revision is provided for by an appeal to some other tribunal. [U. S. v. Arredonds,] 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 729; [Satterlee v. Matthewson,] 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 412; 2 Dow. 521; 20 Johns. 740; 7 Johns. Ch. 340; [M'Culloch v. State of Maryland,] 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 423; Atkinson v. Savage [Atkinson v. Philadelphia & T. R. Co., Case No. 615.] In the affidavits we can perceive no ground of imputation of bad faith in the commissioners or their agents; they profess to have acted in the exercise of their discretion, according to their judgment, and not from partiality or design to oppress the complainants or improperly favor others. Under such a state of things, if we differed in judgment with the commissioners, as to the necessity of diverting this water course, and were even of opinion that one equally convenient could be found without going on the complainants' premises, it would be no ground for an interference. So long as it is a mere question of discretion, depending on the relative conveniences and facilities to effect the authorized objects, it is intrusted to a tribunal over whose honest and impartial judgment we have no appellate power. We can prevent the effects of perversion or abuse of discretionary power, but not of their legitimate, honest exercise; the latter belongs exclusively to tribunals of appellate jurisdiction.

These reasons would induce us to decline granting the injunction, on motion, if there were no others, but we cannot omit noticing another which has powerful if not conclusive influence on our minds. The acts complained of, were begun on the 19th May, of which the agent of the complainants had notice on the 22nd. On the 28th an attempt was made by him with the assistance of a peace officer and some others, to take possession of the land and expel the respondents and their workmen, but without success; the complainants notified them not to proceed with the work, but took no further means to prevent its progress or completion, till the filing of the bill on the 25th June; in the mean time the dam was built to the height of eight or ten feet, a trench dug across the land of the complainants, and the water of the stream conducted to a reservoir on the adjoining farm, whence it was conveyed through pipes to the engine house. As the nature of an injunction is to prevent the doing of an act threatened or about to be done, it is too late to apply for one after the act is consummated; the dam is erected, the trench is dug, and water flows through it; we cannot order the one to be prostrated or the other to be filled up; by acquiescing in the commission of these acts, after ample notice, the complainant has rested on his legal rights and looked to his legal remedies, having suffered the thing to be done, his preventive cannot apply, and he must look to damages for his past injuries. Injunction is a remedy altogether prospective. It was in the complainants' power to have applied for one, either in court or to either of the judges, as soon as they had notice of the intended works. They had their election to apply for the preventive or wait for the compensatory remedy; as to acts committed before the filing of the bill they must look to the latter remedy, though it is not too late to apply for the prevention of any future injury which is in its nature an enjoinable one when impending or threatened. There is no allegation that any act of this kind is about to be done on the premises, unless it be the conducting the water from the dam through the trench in pipes to the reservoir. Taking this as the gravamen of the bill, we cannot perceive in it an irreparable injury to the complainants' property; it would redress one act complained of by filling up the trench over the pipes, leaving the surface of the ground unbroken, without in any way interfering with its use for tillage, or pasture, which would be much less injurious than an open ditch or trench. Whether the water sinks into the earth in the trench, or is conveyed to the reservoirs in pipes, matters but little to the complainants; its use is lost in either case; an injunction in using pipes would therefore be of no benefit to them in preventing the diversion of the water, while the dam and the trench remain, yet it might immediately suspend all operations at the inclined plane. Under such circumstances we cannot therefore consider the mere act of laying pipes to be such an injury as is the subject of an injunction, and the other act complained of having been done before the bill was filed, we think there has been such acquiescence, such reliance on the legal remedy, and such expenditures made on behalf of the state, as precludes the complainants from any present relief in equity. Had the application been made as soon as the work was commenced, the attention of the commissioners might have been directed to other sources of supply of water if they had been accessible, and thus have avoided the risk of a suspension of their operations; the conduct of the complainants may have led them to the belief that the only subject of controversy was damages for the injury sustained by the diversion of the water, and to the expenditure of money in the construction of the works. By standing by after notice of the commencement of the work, until near its completion, when all the substance of the injury had been committed, without calling for the interference of equity to arrest its progress, the complainants must now be content to abide by their legal remedy or be refused any equitable relief until a final hearing. 2 Dow, 536.

The complainants' counsel have considered the acts of the respondents to be illegal, because they have entered upon the premises without notice, or any offer to make terms with the complainants in relation to damages, as is required by several acts in relation to the canals and railroads of the state. This question would arise on an action of trespass for the entry, but not on a bill for equity, circumstanced as the present. It might have been a good reason for our interference to suspend the work, till all the requisites of the law had been complied with, and the effect of the omission may be to make the respondents trespassers, although their authority would have been ample after notice and an attempt to procure a release or adjust the damage, but the neglect to do it can have no bearing on the present motion on account of the lapse of time and the submission to the acts done.

It is also contended that the acts of the respondents are without any authority in law, because no compensation has been made for the property thus appropriated to public use, and we know no mode provided by law for assessing damages in a case like the present one. If the complaint of this bill was the want of any provision for compensation, or of its actual payment before taking actual possession of the premises, or applying the water to public use, and the prayer had been to order a suspension of all proceeding till it had been done, there might have been strong grounds for our interference; the obligation upon the state to make compensation is undoubtedly co-extensive with their power to take or apply private property to public use. As this obligation is a constitutional one, it is not impaired by the omission to provide for it by the law which authorizes the entry or seizure; it can be enforced by action for damages in courts of law and injunction in those of equity. We are far from saying that a law is void which gives the authority without directing compensation to be made in some way, or that the legislature may prescribe the mode in which it shall be done without a trial by jury, inquisition or writ ad quod damnum, nor that a party is not entitled to all his common law remedies if the law is silent on the subject. Whatever may be the decision of a court of law on the constitutional right of an owner of property thus taken on any question of damages, depending upon the strict principles of law, which would be imperative on the court:—a court of equity acting according to sound discretion on the principles of equum et bonum would not interfere, if a just compensation was offered, or the state was willing to make some equitable adjustment of the damages. This question is not, however, now before us. The right to take the property in question under any circumstances is denied on the ground of there being no law which authorizes it to be done for the purposes to which it is applied, even if compensation was provided, for the complainants do not offer to cede or relinquish their right on receiving compensation. The object of the bill is not money, but to retain the same full property and dominion over the lands as they have heretofore enjoyed before the entry upon it by the respondents. If they ask and receive compensation, their right to the water passes forever to the state, as the use to which it is applied is to be permanent. Should we now enjoin the agents of the state till compensation is made, the injunction would be dissolved on its payment:—when the complainants are willing to admit the right to take and use the water, and tender the prayer for other and general relief, or by an amended or supplemental bill, shall ask for just compensation for injuries sustained, the matter will be fully and fairly before us to award or refuse the injunction, as the justice and equity of the case may require.

At present there is no ground in which we can feel justified in granting the injunction. The complainants must be left to their remedy on a final hearing in an action at law.

Case No. 982.

BARING et al. v. FANNING et al.

[1 Paine, 549.][1]

Circuit Court, D. New York. April Term, 1826.

JUDGMENT—EVIDENCE.

1. A judgment or decree of a court can be used as evidence in another suit only as against parties and privies; and if in the second suit there are new parties, against whom the judgment could not have been used, had it been adverse, they cannot introduce it in their favour.

[See Patterson v. Gaines, 6 How. (47 U. S.) 550; Gregg v. Forsyth, 24 How. (65 U. S.) 179; Barr v. Gratz, 4 Wheat. (17 U. S.) 213; Drummond v. Prestman, 12 Wheat. (25 U. S.) 515; Fellows v. Pedrick, Case No. 4,724; Davis v. Forrest, Id. 3,634,—as to the exceptions to this rule.]

2. And it makes no difference that the new parties, as assignees of a chose in action, are endeavouring, together with the assignor, to enforce the same right that was established in the former suit in favour of the assignor.

3. And in such a case, where a court of chancery had ordered an account, and made a decree thereupon in favour of the assignor, it was held not to be a matter decided ex directo, by a court of competent jurisdiction, so as to bring it within the exception to the general rule.

In equity. At the hearing of this cause, it was referred to a master to take an account between the parties; and on the coming in of the report, exceptions were taken thereto by the defendants, and now argued. The case made by the bill was as follows: On the 20th December, 1809, Consequa, one of the complainants, a Hong Kong merchant, residing at Canton, shipped at that place, on board the Chinese, a ship belonging to the defendants, a cargo of merchandise, the cost of which was 43,025 dollars 87 cents, consigned to the defendants, [Fanning and Coles,] who were merchants of New-York, to be sold for the account of Consequa. The cargo having been received, on the 26th of September, 1810, Consequa assigned the cargo and its proceeds to the other complainants, William Baring, James Malony, and James T. Roberts, composing the firm of William Baring & Co., and on the 24th of December, 1810, advised the defendants of this assignment, by letter, and desired them, in case they had made any remittance to him on account of the shipment, or otherwise disposed of the funds arising from it, to make good to Baring & Co., or their agents, out of any other funds of his in their hands, the full nett proceeds of the shipment. Baring & Co. transmitted this letter to their agents, Willing & Francis, of Philadelphia, with an endorsement requesting the defendants to pay the contents to Willing & Francis. They communicated this letter to the defendants on the 27th of April, 1811, and on the 29th, the defendants replied, informing them that remittance had been made on the shipment, and that whatever balance should ultimately be found due to Consequa, would be paid to any one authorized to receive it. On the 24th of November, 1811, Consequa, by another letter, ordered the defendants to pay to the order of any one holding the before-mentioned assignment, any balance of any of his property, to an amount not exceeding 43,025 dollars 87 cents, which letter was in like manner delivered to Baring & Co., and by them endorsed, and transmitted through Willing & Francis to the defendants, and received by them on the 5th of August, 1811. The bill prayed an account of the proceeds of the shipment, and of the payments and remittances on account of the same, and of the balance in hand; and that the defendants might admit funds in their hands belonging to Consequa, to the amount of 43,025 dollars 87 cents, or render an account of the effects of Consequa, in their hands, at the time they were notified of the assignment, and of the disposition thereof. The cause was brought to a hearing on bill, answer, and proofs, and an order made, referring it to a master to take an account of the monies arising from the said shipment, and of the disposition thereof by the defendants, and of the amount due the complainants by virtue of the said assignment; and that if such monies should have been remitted to Consequa, or otherwise disposed of prior to the 5th of August, 1811, so that the same had not come to the hands of the complainants, that then an account should be taken between Consequa and the defendants to that time, so far as might be necessary to ascertain whether the balance, if any, due by the defendants to Consequa, for monies or merchandise, which might have come to their hands, was sufficient, with the remaining proceeds of said shipment, to make up the said sum of 43,025 dollars 87 cents. Upon the reference the complainants exhibited their charges, claiming the invoice cost of the shipment, with interest from the 5th of August, 1811; and in support of their charges, offered in evidence the decree and proceedings in the court of chancery of the state of New-York, in a cause between Consequa, the complainant, and the defendants, in which a balance was established against the latter of upwards of 100,000 dollars. This evidence was objected to by the defendants. In order to take the opinion of the court, it was, however, arranged by the parties, that the master should admit it, and report the whole amount of the complainant's charges.

[1] [Reported by Elijah Paine, Jr., Esq.]

Exceptions were taken to this report by the defendants, and now on the argument, it was agreed, that the decree and proceedings offered in evidence, were to be found in the report of the case, in 4 Johns. Ch. 587, and 17 Johns. 511.

R. Emmet for the defendants, insisted: That as Consequa was the only one of the present complainants who was a party to the suit in chancery, the proceedings and decree in that suit could not be given in evidence in this, because the other complainants were neither parties nor privies thereto, and if the decree had been against Consequa instead of in his favour, they would not have been bound by it; and that if such had been the case, the defendants could not have availed themselves of it as evidence in this suit: That therefore, as the decree could not have been used equally for the benefit of both, it was not evidence by the settled rules of law. Gilb. Ev. 34; Cas. t. Holt, (Farresley,) 135; Bull. N. P. 233; 16 Johns. 51; 1 Munf. 394, 398; Phil. Ev. 226–234. That this case could not be brought within any of the exceptions to this general rule of evidence. It was not like the cases of custom, toll, tithes, settlement of paupers, elections, &c. where the rule was dispensed with in favour of the settlement of rights of a public character. Nor was the decree in a court of exclusive jurisdiction, like the ecclesiastical courts, or the admiralty or exchequer courts, proceeding in rem, whose judgments directly upon a point, were conclusive upon the same point arising incidentally in another court. 4 Price, 154, note; Phil. Ev. 226, 234. That the indebtedness of the defendants to Consequa, as it resulted on the taking of the account, and appears in the decree, was not a matter of fact found ex directo by the court of chancery. A matter decided ex directo, is where the question admits of a simple negative or affirmative, such as devastavit vel non, marriage or no marriage, prize or no prize, adultery or no adultery, &c. Nor does the question of the defendants' indebtedness to Consequa arise incidentally in this cause. It is the very foundation of the suit. But if the decree and proceedings are admissible in this cause, they are not conclusive against the defendants; because the bill in that suit was filed for specific claims, and not for a general account, and a general accounting was not gone into.

T. L. Ogden for the complainants, contended: That the bill filed in chancery was to ascertain the state of accounts in reference to the property, of which the partial assignment had been made to Baring & Co. That it did not embrace any transactions subsequent to that assignment, but referred exclusively to those which were prior; and that decree therefore precluded the necessity of again litigating the same points which were involved and decided in the suit with Consequa. The objection that that suit was res inter alios acta cannot be sustained. The decree was of a court of competent and exclusive jurisdiction, deciding ex directo on the matters in controversy, and conclusive as to the same matters in any other court. The question was a single one, whether the defendants were debtors to Consequa to some and what amount. Bull. N. P. 243-245; 2 Bac. Abr. 630; Amb. 756; 2 Esp. 607. Again, the complainants, Baring & Co. claim under Consequa, and are on that ground entitled to the benefit of the decree. Bull. N. P. 243; 2 Bac. Abr. 629; 1 Phil. Ev. 230. Consequa is a mere trustee for them, and they would be entitled to file their bill claiming the benefit of the decree in his favour. 2 Madd. Ch. Pr. 408; 4 Brown, Parl. Cas. 33. The account before the master must be taken on the principles of that taken in the court of chancery, without any reference to the pretended counter claims of the defendants; for the existence of such claims was not set up when the assignment was notified to the defendants; no proof has been exhibited of their existence, and the order of reference does not authorize their admission. The result of a new account would therefore be the same as the former. [Exceptions sustained, and report set aside.]

THOMPSON, Circuit Justice. The question now presented for decision arises on an exception to the report of the master, under an order of reference. This order directed an account to be taken of the monies arising from the merchandise, shipped in the Chinese, in 1809, by Consequa, and consigned to the defendants; and of the disposition of the said monies, and of the amount due on said consignment to Baring & Co., by virtue of the assignment of Consequa to them, set out in the bill. And if the proceeds, or any part thereof, shall have been remitted to Consequa, or otherwise disposed of prior to the 5th of August, 1811, so that the same have not come to the hands or use of the said Baring & Co., that then an account be also taken, and stated between Consequa and the defendants, down to the 5th day of August, 1811, so far as the same may be necessary to ascertain whether the balance, if any, due by the defendants to Consequa, for monies or merchandise, which may have come to the hands of the defendants, be sufficient with the remaining nett proceeds of the said merchandise, to make up the original invoice value of the same merchandise, amounting to forty-three thousand and twenty-five dollars eighty-seven cents. Upon the reference, the complaints offered in evidence, a certain decree heretofore obtained in the court of chancery of the state of New-York, by Consequa, one of the complainants in this cause, against the above defendants, and the proceedings in the suit in which said decree was obtained. This evidence was objected to on the part of the defendants, but admitted by the master, as competent and conclusive in the present case. By that decree a balance was found due from the defendants to Consequa, of upwards of one hundred thousand dollars; and the master has accordingly reported in the present case, that there is due to Baring & Co. the whole balance claimed by them, including interest, amounting to eighty-seven thousand one hundred and forty dollars sixty-one cents, being the amount of the forty-three thousand and twenty-five dollars eighty-seven cents, assigned by Consequa to Baring & Co., and the interest on the same.

The objection taken to the admissibility of this decree is, that it was res inter alios acta. The general rule on this subject is, that judgments and decree are evidence only between parties and privies. But it is contended, that there are exceptions to this general rule, under which the decree in question was admissible, and the broad principle is assumed, that the final decree or judgment of any court of competent jurisdiction, deciding ex directo on any matter, is conclusive as to that matter, in any other court, between any other parties. This position, if admitted to embrace the present case, is not supported by authority, and cannot, I think, be sustained on any sound principle applicable to the rules of evidence. The matters in controversy in the court of chancery of this state, related to the mere private rights of the parties. The exceptions to the general rule, (which requires that verdicts or judgments should be admitted in evidence only between parties to the suit, or privies,) which are mentioned in the books, relate generally to some question of custom, right of common, right of way, right of election, &c. In such, and the like cases, a former verdict in an action between any other parties, is admissible in evidence, when the point there directly decided is in issue. But it is not in such case conclusive. The common reputation of the place would, in these cases, be evidence of the right; and the verdict of twelve men, upon oath, is considered at least of equal weight. Phil. Ev. 233.

Nor are the cases of judgments, or decrees in rem, or of courts of exclusive jurisdiction, applicable to the present case. The court of chancery of New-York had not exclusive jurisdiction of the matters in controversy, nor was the decree there rendered a decree in rem. There is nothing, therefore, in relation to the subject matter in controversy in that suit, or the nature and operation of the decree, that should take it out of the general rule. As between the same parties, it is right and proper that the verdict of the jury finding a fact, or the judgment or decree of a court on facts found, should be conclusive, and operate as estoppels. [Hopkins v. Lee,] 6 Wheat. [19 U. S.] 109. But such estoppels should be mutual, and no one be permitted to have the benefit of a judgment or decree, who would not have been prejudiced by it, had it been the other way. Gilb. Ev. 34; Cas. t. Holt, 135; Bull. N. P. 233. Had the decrée been in favour of the defendants, it would not have concluded the rights of Baring & Co. They not having been parties to that suit, had no opportunity to set up and maintain their claim against the defendants. There would, therefore, be no mutuality of benefit to the parties in the present suit. Paynes v. Coles, 1 Munf. 373. The case of Chapmans v. Chapman, 1 Munf. 398, is very analogous to the present suit. It was there laid down that a record in one suit cannot be read as evidence in another, on the ground that the defendant and one of the plaintiffs in the latter suit, were parties to the former, and that the same point was in controversy in both; another plaintiff, and the person under whom both the said plaintiffs jointly claimed, not having been parties to such former suit. Phil. Ev. 222-334, where most of the cases are collected. But if no well founded objection lay to the admission of that decree in evidence, by reason of the variance of parties in that and the present suit, I am unable to discover that the matters in controversy, in this cause, have been there decided. The bill, in this case, seeks a particular account of the proceeds of the shipment, by the Chinese, on the 2d of December, 1809, consigned to the defendants, and which had been assigned by Consequa to Baring & Co.; the first cost of which cargo amounted to forty-three thousand and twenty-five dollars eighty-seven cents, and also of the payments and remittances on account of the same. And that the defendants might admit funds in their hands belonging to Consequa, to the amount of forty-three thousand and twenty-five dollars eighty-seven cents, or render an account of all other goods, monies, and effects in their hands, belonging to Consequa, at the time of notice of assignment to Baring & Co., on the 5th of August, 1811, and of the sales, payments, and disposition of the same.

For the decree and proceedings in the court of chancery of this state, reference, by consent of counsel, is made to the report of the case, 3 Johns. 587, and 17 Johns. 511; by which it appears that the shipment of the 2d of December, 1809, was not at all in question, but was excluded from the account then taken. The report of the master, in that case, did not, therefore, purport to state an account of the proceeds of the shipment now in question, and of the payments and remittances on account of the same, which was a direct and particular subject of reference to the master in this case. In this case any inquiry into the state of the accounts between Consequa and the defendants, is by the order of reference made contingent, depending on the facts, whether the proceeds of that shipment, or any part thereof, had been remitted by the defendants to Consequa, or otherwise disposed of prior to the 5th of August, 1811, so that the same had not come to the hands of Baring & Co.; and if they had, then the master was directed to state an account as between Consequa and the defendants, down to the 5th of August, 1811. The proceedings in the case of Consequa against the defendants, do not ascertain these facts; the report of the master there states the balance as it stood on the 31st of January, 1818, and not as it stood on the 5th of August, 1811, as is required in this case; so that neither of the inquiries referred to the master, in this case, were directly decided in the case of Consequa against the defendants. The proceedings in that case were not offered in evidence, to show admissions by the defendants, of any particular facts necessary to be established in the present case; but to show a final and conclusive balance in favour of Consequa, to an amount sufficient to cover the plaintiffs' claim; and for this purpose, and to this extent, the evidence was received by the master, which I think cannot be sustained. The report must accordingly be set aside, and the cause referred again to the master, under the orders of reference heretofore entered in the cause.

Case No. 983.

BARING et al. v. LYMAN.

[1 Story, 396;[1] 4 Law Rep. 303.]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts, May Term, 1841.

NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS — LETTER OF CREDIT—PARTNERSHIP—AGENCY.

1. Where, by a banker's circular, a banking commission was named on credits or bills "used east of the Cape of Good Hope;" it was held, that the drawing of bills under a letter of credit, in favor of a third person, who, upon the faith of the letter of credit, takes and receives the same for value, and is entitled to hold and use them on his own account, is a use of the letter of credit within the terms of the circular, although the bills are never presented for acceptance or payment. Thus, the agent in Boston of certain London bankers, gave to A. a letter of credit, by which B., in Canton, was authorized to value upon them to the amount of £25,000 sterling at six months' sight, at Canton, the customary commission on bills, used under similar letters, being two per cent. The credit was obtained to furnish funds in part for loading the ship of A., which was consigned to B., at Canton. Bills were accordingly drawn in Canton by B. payable to C., but as there was no demand whatever at that time for exchange, the latter agreed to send the bills to his agent in Boston, and to give A. the option of replacing them, with other funds, or to have them forwarded to London, to the account of C. On the arrival of the bills in Boston, A. concluded to reimburse C. by remitting dollars to Canton, and the bills and letters to the London bankers were destroyed. An action, brought by the London bankers for the customary commission on the bills, was defended on the ground, among others, that they had never been used; but it was held, that the defence was not maintainable.

[1] [Reported by William W. Story, Esq.]

[Cited in Russell v. Wiggin, Case No. 12,165.]

2. Any partner in a firm may be the agent of a third person in drawing bills in favor of the firm, for advances made to such third person, under an express authority.

3. A firm may negotiate its own paper to one partner, and the latter will thereby become the owner thereof. So, a firm may take a separate negotiable security from one of its partners, and hold and use the same for its own purposes. A fortiori, where he acts as the agent of third persons.

At law. Assumpsit [by Francis Baring and others, comprising the firm of Baring Bros. & Co., against Theodore Lyman, as executor of T. Lyman, deceased] for the recovery of money, viz., five hundred pounds sterling, claimed as due to the plaintiffs for commissions, at the rate of two per centum, upon twenty-five thousand pounds, alleged to have been drawn for by Robert B. Forbes, in bills upon them, under a letter of credit, given by them to the defendant's testator, dated 7th of June, 1838. By that letter, Forbes was authorized to value upon them to that amount, at six months' sight at Canton, on account of the testator; the bills to be duly honored, when presented at the banking house of the plaintiffs, if drawn within twelve months from said date. And in case of accident to Mr. Forbes, whereby he should be prevented from attending to the business, Messrs. Russell & Co., of Canton, were authorized to use the credit for account of the testator. By a receipt in writing of the same date, the testator, in consideration of the said credit, agreed to provide in London, sufficient funds to meet the payment of whatever (bills) might be negotiated, by virtue thereof, at maturity of the bills, and also to give security therefor, here, at any time previous, if required; and that the property, which should be purchased by means of said credit, and the proceeds thereof and the policies of insurance, and bills of lading, were thereby pledged as collateral security for the payment as above provided, and held subject to the plaintiffs' order, on demand, with authority to take possession and dispose of the same at their discretion, for their security and reimbursement; that in all payments, settlements, and recoveries in the United States, growing out of the said credit, the pound sterling should be estimated at the current rate of exchange on London, existing at the time of such settlement. And the testator added a request and direction to his executors and administrators, that in the event of his decease, before maturity of all the bills, which might be drawn under the above credit, and the due provision for the same, as stipulated, they should provide promptly for them, as they should become payable, without regard to the probate laws of Massachusetts. The regular and customary commission charged by the plaintiffs, on bills used under similar letters of credit, east of the Cape of Good Hope, is two per cent. And if the whole amount authorized is not used, the commission is charged only on so much as is used. The credit was given to furnish funds in part for loading the testator's ship Vancouver, which arrived at Canton, December 1, 1838, consigned to R. B. Forbes, who became a member of the house of Russell & Co., 1st January, 1839. The consignment was agreed upon by him and the testator, before the credit was procured. The business of the ship was transacted by Russell & Co. On the 18th of March, 1839, Russell & Co. wrote to the testator, advising him of their determination to load the ship and despatch her directly for Boston; and that there being no demand whatever for exchange, even at the very unfavorable rate, at which they had concluded to place his bills, they had obtained a loan for the purpose of getting the ship away. But that as Mr. Forbes had no orders to resort to, he authorized them to draw the bills at the market rate, and to give him his choice of paying for them in London, or replacing the cost of the cargo in dollars, without delay, paying at the rate of nine per cent. per annum interest; and that they should charge their usual commission of one per cent. for drawing, and should send the bills and letters of advice to their agent in Boston, to be cancelled, upon his agreeing to replace the funds, or to be forwarded to London for their account, if he should conclude to meet them there. This arrangement was consummated on their part, by their loading the ship, and sending forward the bills drawn by R. B. Forbes, May 4th, 1839, in favor of Russell & Co., as proposed, and specially indorsed to their agent, J. M. Forbes, of Boston, with corresponding instructions. The testator died on the 24th of May, 1839, before the letter or ship arrived; and they were received by the defendant, who, without delay, notified J. M. Forbes, that he should remit dollars to reimburse Russell & Co., at Canton. Neither the bills and letters to Baring & Co., accompanying them, nor any advice thereof, were ever sent forward to London. But the bills were destroyed by the said Forbes, after the specie was shipped and received. The specie was shipped by the defendant, in the years 1839 and 1840, and received and credited by Russell & Co. in 1840 and 1841, the proceeds of which covered the amount of the advance.

The bills before mentioned were held by J. M. Forbes for Russell & Co., on the 11th of July, 1840. The case was submitted to the court on the above statement of facts, with liberty for either party to refer to certain letters and documentary evidence, which were in the case. Among these was a circular of the plaintiffs, dated January 1st, 1838, a copy of which was sent to the testator, in which it is stated, that "the banking commission on credits or bills used east of the Cape of Good Hope, to be two per cent." The other documentary evidence is sufficiently exhibited in the arguments of the counsel and the opinion of the court.

Charles P. Curtis, for plaintiffs.

The question is, whether the credit granted by the plaintiff, to the defendant's testator, has been used, or not; if it has, then the plaintiffs are entitled to the commission of two per cent. on the amount used. It is not denied, that R. B. Forbes, the agent of the defendant's testator, has drawn bills of exchange on the plaintiffs, in favor of Russell & Co., amounting in all to £25,000 sterling; and that Russell & Co. indorsed and forwarded them to J. M. Forbes, their agent in Boston. In point of form, the terms of the letter of credit have been strictly complied with, so that if the bills had been presented to the plaintiffs, at their banking house in London, they would have been bound by their contract to accept and pay them. What more was necessary to constitute a use of the credit? The letter of credit authorized R. B. Forbes to value on Baring Brothers & Co., London, at six months' sight, at Canton, for account of T. Lyman, Esq., of Boston, for any sums not exceeding £25,000 sterling; and by a subsequent clause, Russell & Co. were authorized to use the credit, in case of accident to Forbes. What is the mercantile meaning of the phrase, to value on a banker? To draw and pass bills on him, to negotiate bills on him. The authority given to R. & Co. in the event of Forbes' inability "to value" on the plaintiffs, is, to use the credit, as he was to use it, that is, by drawing and passing bills under it. The agreement of the testator, acknowledging the receipt of the credit, contains an engagement on his part, to provide funds in London to meet the payment of whatever bills might be negotiated by virtue of the letter of credit. These, then, are synonymous terms; to value, to draw and pass bills, to negotiate bills, is to use the credit. The use of such a credit cannot depend upon the subsequent use of the bill drawn under it. If the party, who grants the letter of credit, is for any period of time liable to accept the bills, the credit has been used, and the whole commission earned. The liability of the banker is fixed, as soon as a bill is negotiated, in conformity with the terms of the letter; for, by the law of the United States, the taker of a bill so drawn, who receives it on the faith of such a document, has a right to claim upon it as an accepted bill; and though this may not now be the law of England, (which is the place of performance of the contract in this case,) yet there a suit in chancery might be maintained by the holder of such a bill of exchange, to compel the specific performance of the banker's agreement. The bills drawn by R. B. Forbes, in May, 1839, and negotiated to Russell & Co., were held by them, in the hands of their agent, J. M. Forbes, for upwards of a year, as appears by his letter of the 11th of July, 1840; during all which time the plaintiffs were bound to honor them at any time, when they should be presented at their banking house. The act of the defendant prevented them from honoring the bills; but they were always ready to do so. And this is sufficient to entitle them to their commission, which does not depend on the actual acceptance and payment of the bills, but on their liability to do so. It might be contended with safety, if necessary, that the plaintiffs would be entitled to their commission on the amount of their credit used, as before stated, even if they had refused to accept the bills; for, in that case, the holders would have their legal remedies, as before stated, and the testator would have had a right to recover from them for all the damages he might sustain from their breach of promise. But the case does not require the assertion of this principle; the whole service stipulated by the plaintiffs, or at least as much of it, as was not prevented by the defendant, was performed by the plaintiffs, and they were always ready to perform the residue.

If it is contended by the defendant, that the bills drawn by R. B. Forbes, were not used or negotiated, the answer is found in R. B. Forbes's deposition, who says; "I drew bills for £25,000 sterling, on Baring Brothers & Co. at six months, dated Canton, 4th May, 1839, in favor of Russell & Co., and indorsed by them to J. M. Forbes, Esq., Boston." "The bills were held by Russell and Co. as their security for the advance they had made; they had no orders to advance funds for Mr. Lyman; but thinking it was for his benefit, they did it, and held the bills as their security. Mr. Lyman's instructions were merely to act in exchange." The letters of Russell & Co. to the testator, also, show, that the value of the bills was actually passed to his credit; the cargo was paid for by his agent, by bills on the plaintiffs, and was shipped to Mr. Lyman as his property. But Russell & Co., regarding his interest in the transaction, gave him the option of providing for the bills in London, or of redeeming them in the United States, by shipping dollars to Canton. Mr. Lyman, the defendant, elected the latter alternative, and the bills were held by J. M. Forbes, till the dollars were received in Canton. This was in effect a purchase by the defendant of his testator's bills, on better terms than the payment of them in London would have been. Mr. Lyman has availed himself of the benefit of the plaintiff's high credit; his cargo was purchased and shipped to him on the faith of it; he has had the opportunity of a more advantageous mode of remittance than he expected, when he took the credit; he has enjoyed the whole consideration for which the plaintiff's right to compensation accrued; and he is therefore legally bound to pay the stipulated price.

Charles G. Loring, for defendant.

What was the contract, and what was done under it? The contract is contained in three documents, namely, a letter of credit given by the plaintiffs, through their agent, Mr. Ward; the receipt given by the defendant, and the circular of the plaintiffs. By the letter of credit, Mr. Forbes, or, in event of accident to him, Messrs. Russell & Co. were authorized to draw upon the plaintiffs to the amount of £25,000, at six months sight, if drawn within twelve months from 7th of June, 1840; and the plaintiffs promised to honor the bills, when presented at their banking house. The obligation, therefore, was to accept the bills, if presented at their banking house, within the time specified, and nothing more. Consequently, they could be under no liability until such presentation. By the receipt, the testator promised to provide funds in London to pay whatever bills should be negotiated by virtue of the credit, at their maturity; and to give security in Boston previously, if required. And, that all property purchased by means of the credit, &c. should stand pledged as collateral security for such payment; that all settlements growing out of the credit should be at the current rate of exchange; and in the event of the death of the testator before the maturity of the bills, his executors, &c. should provide promptly for them as they should become payable. This is the whole contract on his part, excepting as to the compensation, which the plaintiffs were to receive, which was not specifically provided for, but left to the operation of the custom of the plaintiffs, which is set forth in their circular. By the circular, it was stated, that "the banking commission, on credits, or bills, used east of the Cape of Good Hope, was to be two per cent." The use, for which this compensation was provided, is clearly indicated, by the whole tenor of the circular, to be the negotiation of the bills and acceptance of them by the plaintiffs; corresponding precisely with the use, as described in the letter of credit itself, the gist of which is the promise to accept. And also, with the use described in the receipt, which provides for providing funds to meet such bills, as should be negotiated, at their maturity, which necessarily implies acceptance. Upon this contract, then, two things are clear. (1st.) That the use of the credit contemplated by both parties, was, the drawing and delivery of bills for the purpose of their being presented to the plaintiffs to be accepted by them, whereby they would assume the liability of acceptors; and that the compensation or commission was to be for such a use, and nothing short of it; for there could be no pretence, that the mere issuing of the letter of credit, if no bills were drawn, or that if the plaintiffs should refuse to accept any drawn, the commission would then be due. (2d.) While the contract was obligatory on the plaintiffs to accept all bills so drawn and presented, it was perfectly optional with the testator, whether to use the credit, or not to use it. He might have destroyed it, or kept it in his pocket until the expiration of the twelve months, with the right to use it at pleasure; but unless he had actually used it, he was under no liability to pay any compensation to the plaintiffs. The power and the right to use it, were, therefore, totally distinct from the actual use; and the testator might desire and enjoy great benefits from possession of the mere power; but such results from its mere possession, would give no right to the plaintiffs to claim compensation. Nothing short of the exercise of that power, that is, the actual use of the credit as stipulated for, could give them any claim to the compensation agreed upon.

The question, then, is, whether there was any such use of this credit, as was contemplated as the consideration of the commission. The facts are, that the letter of credit was delivered to Mr. Forbes, who became one of the firm of Russell & Co., who were the consignees of the vessel, and on whom the testator relied to furnish the cargo, before any steps were taken to procure one. Finding it difficult or impossible to negotiate any bills under this credit, in order to procure a cargo, in the manner directed by the testator, this firm negotiated a loan of money on their own credit, on his account, with which the cargo was procured. This being done without his authority, and not being binding upon him unless ratified, they gave him notice accordingly; and, in order to provide for the contingency of his refusing to ratify this proceeding, and reimburse themselves for their advance, Mr. Forbes, then being one of the firm, drew these bills in favor of his house, and sent them to their agent here, with a letter of advice to the drawees, to be forwarded to them at London for acceptance, if the testator should refuse to ratify and provide for the loan; but to be destroyed, if he should ratify and provide for it; and, in order to preserve the usual formal regularities in such cases, the bills were charged at the current rates in the books of the firm. But the bills were never negotiated, nor for a moment out of the possession or control of the firm. The testator did ratify the loan, and pay it; and the bills were consequently cancelled here, and the plaintiffs were never notified of their being drawn, and were never called upon to accept or provide for them. Upon these facts, it is denied, that there was any use of the credit, which entitles the plaintiffs to a commission. It is clear, that the right to use, or not to use, the credit, was entirely at the option of Mr. Lyman or his agent; and equally so, that it was optional with him to make the use of it dependent upon any contingency or condition to occur within the time limited. It is obvious, too, that any "use of the credit," which should vest a right in the plaintiffs, must be one that bound them, or made them liable to the party receiving or acting upon the credit or bills; for, unless they incurred some obligation or responsibility, their credit was not used. And, in this case, as the bills were payable at a given time after sight, it is clear, that the payees, Messrs Russell & Co., could have no claim on the bills until actually accepted; and that their only remedy, if they had finally resorted to this credit, must have been by a special action on the case, founded on the letter of credit, and their reception of the bills under it. So that the letter of credit, and not the bills, could alone give them any security.

Now, then, there is no pretence, that the cargo was purchased on the faith of this credit. It was quite otherwise. They expressly forbore to use it; they adopted other means of procuring the cargo, and pointed out other means for the testator's reimbursement of their advances. The utmost, that can be alleged, is, that Messrs. Russell & Co. would not have made the loan, but for the power they possessed of using this credit, if they should see fit so to do, on the testator's refusing to ratify the loan. But this was no more than a mere possession of the power to be used at their option, upon the happening of a contingency, but was not any actual exercise of it. Messrs. R. & Co. might well say; "We will furnish the cargo, but whether we shall use the credit, or rely upon other resources, we shall decide hereafter;" and they might be so far influenced in furnishing the cargo by the power to use the credit, that they would not otherwise have done it. And yet, as between them, or the testator, and the plaintiffs, there would have been no use of it. The benefit thus derived from the possession of the letter of credit to the testator, would have been incidental and collateral merely, not affecting the plaintiffs in the slightest degree, and not contemplated by the parties, as a subject of compensation.

Keeping in mind the distinction between the use of the credit and the mere power to use it, let us see, whether the facts show any actual use of it. It is apparent, that in the drawing and delivery of the bills to his firm, Mr. Forbes acted as the agent of the testator, as well as a partner of the house; so that there could be no possibility of misapprehension of the mutual understanding and intention of the parties. In the drawing and delivery of the bills, he was the agent of the testator, and had his power of absolute or conditional use of the credit. Did he, then, by his acts, create any actual liability or responsibility on the part of the plaintiffs, by the drawing of these bills? Or was such liability entirely contingent upon the happening of a future event? It will not be pretended, that the mere drawing of the bills, was a use of the credit; for if he had locked them in his desk, or delivered them to his firm for safe keeping merely, surely no one would say, that he had used the credit, and that the plaintiffs were entitled to their commission. What, then, were the circumstances and terms, upon which he drew and delivered these bills. He and his partners had already advanced funds for purchasing the cargo, and had elected to give the testator the opportunity of reimbursing them without using the credit. When, therefore, the bills were delivered to the house, it was upon condition, that they should not be used, and that the house should not have any claim under the letter of credit, unless the testator refused to ratify the loan, and otherwise reimburse the advances. This condition of the delivery was communicated in writing to the testator, and constituted a written contract between him and them. It is certain, therefore, that although the house were in possession of the bills and letter of credit, they could not use them, nor have any possible claim upon the plaintiffs, until the testator had made his election; and that upon such election to ratify the loan and repay the advances, the bills and letter of credit became, as blank paper,—a mere nullity. In other words, there had been no actual use of the credit, but something remained to be done, before it should be decided, whether the right of using it, should, or should not, be exercised; and the contingency, upon which it was not to be exercised, having happened, no use was ever made of it. Suppose a suit had been brought by Russell & Co., upon the credit, against the plaintiffs, before or after the testator had made his election, it is manifest, that the facts stated would prove a perfect defence. It would appear, that Russell & Co. so far from acting on the faith of the credit, or any liability of the plaintiffs, had in truth declined so to do; they had made their advances upon a different credit, and with a view to a different resource for reimbursement; and had, at the most, only a contingent right to resort to this upon the happening of an event, which had never taken place. Suppose, that Mr. Forbes had never drawn any bills, but retained the letter of credit in his possession, with the intention to draw, if the testator should not ratify the loan and reimburse the advance; could it be pretended, that the credit had been used, and that the plaintiffs were entitled to their commission? Clearly not. But the case at bar is essentially the same; for the delivery of the bills to Russell & Co., being upon the condition stated, would as effectually prevent their recovery during the continuance of the condition, as if the bills had not been drawn; for proof of the condition would defeat any intermediate claim; and the position of Forbes, as agent of the testator, and a partner of the house, rendered it as safe and easy for all parties to protect them, by this delivery of the bills on condition, as could have been done by his omitting to draw, until the condition should terminate. And it is plain, that the reason, why he did draw, was, not to give or create any security to the firm, for that already fully existed in his power to draw, he also being one of the firm; but his only object was to facilitate and expedite arrangements here, if the loan should not be ratified. It is substantially the same thing, as if he had retained the letter of credit and bills in his own hands, to await Mr. Lyman's decision. As to the alleged notice to the plaintiffs, of the use of these bills, none was given. Forbes or Russell & Co. withheld any, not intending to notify them, or put them to any liability or trouble, unless the testator should reject the loan, and they were the only persons to notify. The letter of the executor, after the testator's death, was no notice, that any bills were, or would be drawn; for he could not know, that any would be. It was no more that a notice, that any bills drawn under the letter of credit, which the plaintiffs, doubtless, had from their agent here, would be provided for.

To illustrate the position, we take, that the cargo was not furnished on the faith of this credit, nor any such use made of it, as entitles the plaintiffs to their commission, the following may be suggested as parallel cases. Suppose, that the testator had proposed to Forbes here, to purchase the cargo by an advance or loan, such as was made, and to be repaid in the same manner; and Forbes had refused, but would agree to do it, if the testator would furnish him such a letter of credit as this, to be used, if circumstances should render it inconvenient to make the loan, or more advisable to resort to bills of exchange; and this had been done, and his house had proceeded to procure the cargo without first determining, which fund they would resort to, but had finally determined to make the loan, and not to use the credit. There would be in such a case, a purchase of the cargo, on the faith of the credit, equal to that alleged here, and as much a use of it. But no one would pretend, that the plaintiffs would be entitled to a commission, for there was no purchase on the faith of the credit; nor was there any use of it, affecting the plaintiffs for an instant. Or, suppose, the testator had agreed with Forbes, that his house should furnish a cargo, to be paid for by a shipment to be made to them by the testator, if he would furnish such a credit as this, to be used, if the shipment should not arrive within a limited time, and the cargo was furnished before the arrival of the shipment,—which, however, was received within the time; and so no bills were drawn. There would have been precisely such a use of the credit in that case, as there was in this; but surely no commission would have been earned. The only distinction between those cases and this is, that in them, the contingency, upon which the use of the credit was to depend, was contemplated by the parties, when it was delivered to the agent, so that an absolute use was not then contemplated. But it is not perceived, why one might not be created by the agent, subject to the ratification of the principal; and be as effectual, if ratified, as if originally appointed. In either case, there would no actual use of the credit until the determination of the contingency.

The position, taken by the plaintiffs' counsel, amounts to this; that if the consignee or agent be influenced by the mere power of using the credit, this is such a use, as entitles the party, giving it, to his full commission. But it seems clearly untenable. The power to use, is created by the mere delivery of the letter of credit. Its exercise is entirely at the volition of the receiver. And neither he nor his agents are bound to any immediate or absolute decision, but may exercise the right of election at any time within the period limited, and upon any reasonable contingency; and it is the exercise, and not the mere possession of the power, which gives the right of compensation. As to the language of Mr. Forbes in his deposition,—wherein he states, that the house of Russell & Co. held the bills as collateral security,—we are to look to the facts to ascertain, what he means by those terms, and not to take this mere declaration as proof of a position inconsistent with these facts. Now, upon the facts appearing in the correspondence and deposition, it is manifest, that Russell & Co. did not hold the bills as collateral security; properly speaking they merely held the right to use them as such. The bills in their hands were in themselves of no avail, to bind the plaintiffs, being after sight, and if they would have been binding on the plaintiffs, if delivered, to be sent to them, they were not so here, for they were not delivered to Russell & Co., to be sent for acceptance, but to hold until a certain contingency should happen, which was to determine, whether they should be sent or not. Russell & Co. were not, therefore, in possession of those bills, with any right whatever to use them, and never could have acquired that right upon a condition, which never happened. In truth, therefore, the only security which Russell & Co. had in the possession of the bills, was the power to use the credit, if the condition should happen, upon which the use was to depend. But the same power existed, the moment the credit was delivered by the testator to his agent. And the mere possession of the power was surely no exercise of it. In order to say properly, that the bills were held as collateral security, it should appear, that the holder had elected to use them, by notifying the drawees, or taking the usual means to bind them. It is one thing to possess the power to use the credit, and quite another to use it by an actual exercise of the power. The mere drawing of the bills, as above shown, was no use of the credit; for they might have been locked up in Forbes's desk. Nor was the mere delivery of them into the hands of Russell & Co. such use; for the delivery was to them, as bailees, for safe keeping, merely until the happening of a contingency, which alone would authorize the use of them, and which never occurred. No moment has ever existed, when Russell & Co. could claim of the plaintiffs to accept or pay these bills. Any presentation for acceptance, would have been a violation of the trust, reposed in them by Forbes and the testator; and the facts existing would have exonerated the plaintiffs from all obligation to accept or pay, if Russell & Co. had attempted to induce or compel them to do so. The mere drawing and delivery of the bills, upon such a condition, is no more a use of the credit or the creation of a collateral security, than the intention of drawing upon such a contingency would be. Suppose, that instead of thus drawing and delivering the bills, the house had made the advance, relying on Forbes's power so to draw, in case the testator should not ratify the loan; and that it be admitted, that otherwise they would not have made the loan. There would have been just as much reliance on this credit, as collateral security, in that case as in this. In other words, the power to draw would be the collateral security, such as it was here. But would any one pretend, that it was a use of it, which entitled the plaintiffs to a commission?

The case has thus far been presented, as if Forbes and Russell & Co. were not partners, when the bills were drawn and delivered; but it is much strengthened by the consideration, that they were such. For the case, in that point of view, becomes the same, as if Forbes had merely drawn the bills and kept them in his own pocket. He and Russell & Co. were one person; and the drawing and delivery of the bills in the manner proved, amounts, in fact, to nothing more than the mere intention to draw, if the emergency should require it. It cannot be correctly said, that the contingency, upon which the bills were to be used, was a condition subsequent, and not precedent. For none of the acts, which were to be done, upon the drawing of the bills, for the purpose of creating any liability on the part of the plaintiffs, were performed. If the bills had been so drawn, the property, by the terms of the contract, was to be pledged to the plaintiffs; and bills of lading, &c., were to be made out, and forwarded to the plaintiffs in a particular manner; and they were to be notified of the drawing, &c. To constitute this a condition precedent, all the measures should have been taken to fix a present liability, with notice of the condition of defeasance; and the plaintiffs should have been informed of the drawing intended, and use of the bills, and that they should be held responsible, unless the testator should elect to ratify the loan. Instead of which, all these preliminaries were dispensed with, and the notice was deferred, until the plaintiffs' election was made. it was clearly, therefore, a condition precedent, and not subsequent. And such is the plain purport of the correspondence. [Judgment for plaintiffs.]

STORY, Circuit Justice. The first question naturally arising in this cause, is, as to the true construction of the circular of the plaintiffs, of the 1st of January, 1838, with reference to which the letter of credit in the present case was given and accepted by the testator, Lyman. By that circular, Messrs. Baring & Co. expressly stated, that "the banking commission on credits or bills, used east of the Cape of Good Hope (is) to be two per cent." The question is, what is to be deemed in the sense of this circular a use of the bill of credit? Is it the mere drawing of any bill under the letter of credit, in favor of a third person, who, upon the faith of the letter of credit, takes and receives the same for value, and is entitled to hold and use it on his own account? Or is it necessary to make the right to the commission attach, that it should be presented to Messrs. Baring & Co., and accepted and paid by them, or at least should be accepted by them? If it be necessary, that acceptance and payment, or, at least, that acceptance by them, should take place before the right to the commission attaches, it is very clear, that the present action is not maintainable; for there never has been any presentment of the bills, drawn in the present case. My opinion, however, is that neither presentment for acceptance to Messrs. Baring & Co., nor payment by them, is essential, under the terms of the circular, to give the right to the stipulated commission. In the sense of that circular, the bill of credit was used the moment any bills were drawn upon Messrs. Baring & Co. under the letter of credit to the testator, Lyman, and placed in the hands of holders, who took it for value upon the faith of the letter of credit, and thus became entitled, as such holders, to require an acceptance and payment thereof, according to their tenor, whether they were ever presented for acceptance and payment, or not. My reason is, that Messrs. Baring & Co. from the moment, that such bills were drawn and taken for value, became bound, as well to the holders, as to Lyman, to accept the bills upon presentment, and to pay them at maturity; and if they had refused, an action might have been maintained against them, upon the promise contained in the letter of credit, not only by Lyman, but by the holders. Indeed, if the bills were made payable at a certain time after date, instead of after sight, and were received by the holders upon the faith of the letter of credit, the holders might maintain an action thereon against Messrs. Baring & Co., as upon a virtual acceptance. Such was the decision of the supreme court in the case of Coolidge v. Payson, 2 Wheat. [15 U. S.] 66, following out the doctrine of the cases of Pillans v. Van Mierop, 3 Burrows, 1663, and Pierson v. Dunlop, 2 Cowp. 571, and Mason v. Hunt, 1 Doug. 296.

It is of no consequence, what were the nature and extent, or conditions, of the contract between the holders and Lyman, under which the bills were received, provided Messrs. Baring & Co. became for a single hour liable to accept and pay the same to the holders; for every such contract would be res inter alios acta, with which Messrs. Baring & Co. could have nothing to do, and of which they could have no power to avail themselves, not standing in privity with the parties thereto. The question is not, what were the duties or liabilities between Lyman and the holders, under the bills and contract connected therewith; but whether Messrs. Baring & Co. were liable thereon. The use made of the bills by the holders for value, after receiving them, was of no consequence to Messrs. Baring & Co., or whether any use was made by them at all; but whether any responsibility attached to them for a moment, to accept or pay the bills under the letter of credit. The commission is, by the very terms of the circular, to arise from the use of the letter of credit, and not from the use afterwards made of the bills drawn under it. Suppose the bills had been unconditionally transferred to third persons, so as to become their absolute property, and afterwards, upon a new negotiation, they had been delivered up and cancelled by the parties before acceptance, would not the right to the commissions have attached? Suppose the bills had been accepted by Messrs. Baring & Co., and afterwards and before the maturity, they had been taken up and paid by Lyman, would not the like right to the commission have attached? The commission was a commission, not accruing upon the payment of the bills, but designed as an indemnity and compensation for the risk run, and responsibility incurred by Messrs. Baring & Co. and their duty to accept and pay the bills, if drawn under the letter of credit. If ever there would be perfect justice in the application of the maxim, Qui sentit commodum sentire debet et onus, the present case, under such circumstances, would seem to furnish a fit occasion to apply it. I agree, that if Messrs. Baring & Co. were never responsible to the holders of these bills at all, and that no right attached in favor of the holders, for a moment, to bind them to the acceptance thereof, then they have no claim for the commission; for they have not earned it, and the letter of credit has not been used. On the other hand, if they are entitled to any commission, they are entitled to the whole commission, for there can be no apportionment of the contract at law. If the bills have been subsequently withdrawn, or paid by Lyman, that cannot vary the rights of Messrs. Baring & Co., if any rights once attached. It is a mere waiver by the holders and Lyman, of the right to require an acceptance and payment of the bills, instead of Lyman's providing for a subsequent reimbursement, after payment thereof by Messrs. Baring & Co. In the receipt of Lyman, of the 7th of June, 1838, he acknowledges the receipt of the letter of credit, and among other things, he promises "to provide, in London, sufficient funds to meet the payment of whatever may be negotiated by virtue thereof, at the maturity of the bills." Now, it seems to me, that the word "negotiated" is here used in precisely the same sense, as the word "used" in the circular. A bill is properly said to be negotiated, when it has passed into the hand of the payee, or indorsee, or other holder for value, who thereby acquires a title thereto.

In my judgment, therefore, the whole case turns upon the consideration, whether these bills were, at any time, in the hands of the holders, valid subsisting bills, taken by them for value, and held, either absolutely, or as security, for advances made to Forbes on account of Lyman; or whether they were merely lodged in the hands of Russell & Co., not to give a present title of any sort thereto, as security, or otherwise, but merely as a future springing, contingent title, dependent upon future occurrences, and in the meantime to be held as a mere special bailment in trust and for the benefit of Forbes or Lyman. In other words, the question seems to me (as I intimated at the argument), to resolve itself into this point, whether the bills were in the hands of Russell & Co. upon a condition precedent, or a condition subsequent. If the former be the true view of the facts, then they took no title whatsoever in the bills, except in the event, that Lyman should refuse to ratify the acts of Forbes, as to the advances and arrangements made for the benefit of Lyman, in lieu of the bills. On the other hand, if the latter be the true view of the facts, then a present title to the bills passed to Russell & Co., subject to be divested by the acceptance and ratification by Lyman of the acts and arrangements of Forbes. And to the consideration of this point I shall now address myself. It is not an unimportant circumstance, in examining this point, that Forbes, the agent of Lyman, and a partner in the house of Russell & Co., through whom the whole transaction was negotiated, and who certainly stands before the court as a disinterested witness, explicitly states in his deposition, that "the bills were held by Russell & Co. as their security for the advances they had made. They had no orders to advance funds for Mr. Theodore Lyman; but, thinking it was for his benefit, they did it, and held the bills then as their security." Now, if this statement is to be relied upon, as the true exposition of the transaction, it puts an end to the controversy; for if the bills were held by Russell & Co., as a present security for their advances, they had a present title to them, and a present right, against Messrs. Baring & Co., to demand the acceptance and payment thereof; otherwise they would be no security at all. Still, Forbes may mistake in the matter; and, therefore, we are led to examine, whether the actual transactions, as disclosed in the correspondence, and other transactions in Canton at the time, do, or do not, confirm his recollection and interpretation thereof. And I must say, that upon a full examination of all the acts and correspondence of the parties, it seems to me, that Forbes is fully borne out and confirmed in his statement by them; and that every other view thereof would be somewhat forced and strained, if not unnatural. In the first place, the bills were actually indorsed and sent by Russell & Co. to their agent in Boston, to await the final decision of Lyman, and if he did not confirm the proposed arrangement, then to be used and forwarded to London. Certainly, this would seem to be the exercise of a virtual authority and title over the bills, as owners, and could, in no just sense, be deemed a mere agency for the drawer, or for Lyman. It vested a title to the bills in favor of the agent at Boston, good against Messrs. Baring & Co., and against Lyman, and indeed against all the world, except Russell & Co. The natural effect of the indorsement, was that of an indorsement, conferring a present legal title to the agent, to hold and use the bills for the benefit of Russell & Co., and not a mere right to hold the same, as bailee, for the benefit of Lyman, until he had done some future act to transfer the title to Russell & Co. In point of fact, also, although Lyman's executor, (he having died on the 24th of May, 1839, before the advices were received,) assented to the arrangement, made by the agent, Forbes, when the advices were received, and this assent was immediately made known to the agent of Russell & Co., in Boston; yet the bills of exchange were not thereupon surrendered, but they remained in the possession of the agent of Russell & Co. in Boston, (as appears by his letter of that date,) up to the 11th of July, 1840; and, indeed, it is stated, that the bills were not cancelled until December, 1840, after the last remittance had reached Canton. Now, if the bills were intended to take effect solely in the case of Lyman's refusal to assent and confirm the arrangement of Forbes, and not before, as soon as Lyman had so assented to and confirmed it, they ought to have been given up. But the parties did not so act upon the case; nor did Lyman require the bills to be then given up. On the contrary, they were retained without any objection; and this can scarcely be accounted for, except upon the supposition, that they were retained as security for the due fulfilment on the part of Lyman, of the arrangement with Forbes by repayment at Canton, of the moneys advanced by Russell & Co. In this view, the retainer of the bills assumes a natural character. In any other view, it would seem inconsistent with the true rights and duties of the parties. Now, let us suppose, that after Lyman had acceded to the arrangement of Forbes, the moneys advanced by Russell & Co. had never been repaid to Russell & Co., either by the death of Lyman, or by the remittance being lost on the voyage, or in any other manner, would it not be clear, that the bills would be valid and obligatory against Messrs. Baring & Co., in the hands of the agent of Russell & Co., as well as against Lyman? If so, how can they be said not to be a security for the due fulfilment of the arrangement of Forbes? And if they were a security, must they not be so from the time they were actually drawn and delivered to Russell & Co. up to the time, when the advances were repaid in Canton by Lyman? If they were designed as a security in this way, is it not equally clear, that Russell & Co. were, in the meantime, holders of the legal title for value?

Let us, in the next place, see, how the case stands upon the correspondence. The first letter of Russell & Co. to Lyman, of the date of the 18th of March, 1839, at Canton, says; "Your funds, under the credit of £25,000 at five shillings per dollar, with proceeds of rice and specie, we estimate, after deducting expenses of the ship, at about $106,000, which will not fill the ship by about one hundred tons. Freight could not be procured at over twenty dollars per ton; and if we had authority to fill up with freight for Boston, at market rate, we should doubt the expediency of so doing, fearing it might interfere with her ultimate destination. There is no demand, whatever, for exchange at the very unfavorable rate at which we have concluded to place your bills; and we have obtained a loan for the purpose of getting your ship away. But as our Mr. Forbes had no orders to resort to this, he authorizes us to draw your bills at the market rate, and to give you your choice of paying for them in London, or returning the proceeds of the £25,000 to us in dollars, without delay, paying at the rate of nine per cent. per annum, interest, until the amount is refunded. We shall, in either case, charge our usual commission of one per cent. for drawing, and shall send the bills and letter of advice to our agent in Boston, to be cancelled, upon your agreeing to replace the funds, or to be forwarded to London for our account, if you conclude to meet them there." Again, on the 4th of May, 1839, they wrote to Lyman as follows: "In our letter of the 18th ult. (meaning the 18th of March), we indicated the course, which we then thought of pursuing with regard to your funds. The present aspect of affairs, and the prospect for the future, is much changed since that date, and a different disposition of your bills would now be much more for our interest. But we confirm, what we then said, and now recapitulate more distinctly the arrangement, which we authorize our agent, (Mr. John M. Forbes,) to carry into effect. Our R. B. Forbes has drawn on Messrs. Baring Brothers & Co. under this date, the following bills (enumerating them), proceeds to your credit at five shillings per dollar, making £25,000 sterling. These bills will be forwarded to Mr. T. W. Forbes, Boston, accompanied by the letters of advice. Should you determine to provide for them in London, they will be sent forward immediately. But should you prefer to replace the amounts to your debit, as per statement, annexed in this place, paying interest at the rate of nine per cent. per annum from this date, you can do so," &c. "When the remittance is realized in Canton at the market value, we shall consider your charge of interest at an end, and not till then." The letter of advice of Russell & Co. to their agent in Boston, of the same date, which accompanied the bills, also of the same date, says: "On receipt of this letter, you will please call on Mr. Lyman, or his agent, and offer him a choice of the two plans indicated in our letter to him, one of which is, to allow the bills to be disposed of, as you may deem most for our interest, by selling them in the United States, and investing the proceeds in specie for our account, or forwarding them to London, to be there invested in specie for our account; or on the other hand, to cancel the bills in the United States, upon Mr. Lyman's giving you full security, that the amount advanced to him, as per memorandum at foot, shall be returned to us in specie, the interest at the rate of nine per cent. per annum from this date, (May 4th,) to be charged, until the loan is realized in Canton, the dollars being disposed of at the market rate."

Now, it seems to me manifest, that this correspondence, in its very terms and imports, demonstrates, that the parties understood the bills to be in the hands of Russell & Co. as the true owners thereof for value, as a present, immediate, and continuing security, for the advances made by them under the letter of credit, and the instructions for the voyage; that an option was intended to be given to Lyman to reimburse Russell & Co., by a remittance of the amount, in specie, to Canton; and when that amount was received in Canton, and not till then, the interest was to cease, and the bills were to be cancelled. In this view, the correspondence amply confirms the deposition of Forbes, (the agent of Lyman,) that the bills in the intermediate time were in the hands of Russell & Co., as their security; and, of course, were their property, and were negotiated to them. Indeed, the language of the correspondence shows, that Russell & Co. treated the bills as their own in point of right and power of disposal, and only offered an option to Lyman to deliver them up, upon his acceding to another proposed arrangement, which was in the nature of a condition subsequent. It can make no legal difference in the case, that the drawing of the bills was never notified to Messrs. Baring & Co. That was not necessary to give them a legal validity, or to bind the latter to accept and pay them. It is sufficient, that they were bills drawn and negotiated for value under the letter of credit, and that the letter of credit was "used" for this purpose. Suppose, after the acceptance of the proposals by Lyman's executor, the terms had not been complied with, can there be a doubt, that Russell & Co. could have enforced their rights under the bills against Messrs. Baring & Co.? They had nothing to do with the new proposals to Lyman, nor with his acceptance or refusal of them. Nor would it have been any justification of their refusal to accept the bills, if Russell & Co. and Lyman had differed on the point, whether the proposals were accepted or not, or what was the true interpretation thereof. If the bills were once negotiated for value, to Russell & Co., conditionally or otherwise, as a present subsisting security, until they were actually cancelled by agreement of the parties, Messrs. Baring & Co. were bound by them. And I cannot but think, that the whole correspondence shows, that so all the parties understood the matter.

It was suggested at the argument, that R. B. Forbes, having become a partner in the house of Russell & Co. at the time, when the bills were drawn and delivered to Russell & Co., might vary the case favorably to Lyman. I am wholly unable to perceive, how any such effect can arise. R. B. Forbes was still Lyman's agent, and the bills were drawn as a security, not to Forbes alone, but to the firm; and the other members had a vested title in the same. There is nothing in the law, which disables any partner in a firm from being the agent of a third person, in drawing bills in favor of the firm, for advances made to such third person, under an express authority. A firm may negotiate its own paper to one partner, and the latter will thereby become the owner thereof; and on the other hand, a firm may take a separate negotiable security from one of its partners, and hold and use the same for its own purposes. A fortiori, the firm may do so, where he acts as agent of a third person.

Upon the whole, upon the best reflection which I have been able to bestow upon this subject, my opinion is, that the plaintiffs, upon the facts, are entitled to recover the full amount of the commissions; and that they ought to have judgment accordingly.

Case No. 984.

BARING et al. v. PUTNAM.

[1 Holmes, 261.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Maine. Oct. Term, 1873.

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS — ADMINISTRATOR DE BONIS NON—ACTION AGAINST FOR MONEYS PAID BY MISTAKE TO PREDECESSOR.

An action lies in favor of a banker against an administrator de bonis non, as such, to recover money credited by mistake to the intestate during his life, and drawn by, and paid to, the original administrator in his representative character, in the belief that it belonged to the estate.

[See Owen v. Blanchard, Case No. 10,628; Calder v. Pyfer, Id. 2,299.]

Action at law heard by the court upon an agreed statement of facts. The plaintiffs, [Thomas Baring and others,] who were foreign bankers having accounts with Charles Thompson of Kennebunk, Me., and also with Charles Thompson of Topsham, Me., by mistake, credited on their books to Charles Thompson of Topsham, the defendant's intestate, a considerable sum received by them, instead of to Charles Thompson of Kennebunk, to whom it belonged. Before either account was settled, Charles Thompson of Topsham died; and his original administrator, as such, drew from the plaintiffs all the funds standing on their books to the credit of his intestate, including the amount erroneously credited as above; neither party being aware of the error. Subsequently the original administrator resigned, and the defendant [William L. Putnam] was appointed administrator de bonis non. Afterwards, on settlement of the account of Charles Thompson of Kennebunk, the error was discovered; and thereupon the plaintiffs brought this action against the defendant, as administrator de bonis non, to recover the amount erroneously paid to the original administrator.

The defendant contended that the only claim of the plaintiffs was against the original administrator personally, and that the action did not lie. [Judgment for plaintiffs.]

S. C. Strout and H. W. Gage, for plaintiffs.

William L. Putnam, for defendant.

SHEPLEY, Circuit Judge. Whatever property or money is lawfully recovered or received by the executor or administrator, after the death of his testator, or intestate, in virtue of his representative character, he holds as assets of the estate; and he is liable therefor, in such representative character, to the party who has a good title thereto. This doctrine was established by the supreme court of the United States, after full consideration of the conflicting cases upon the subject, in the case of De Valengin v. Duffy, 14 Pet. [39 U. S.] 283, 290.

This money was deposited with the plaintiffs, and was placed on their books to the credit of the intestate prior to his decease, and so stood at and after his decease. No one but the personal representative of Charles Thompson could withdraw the funds; and it was the duty of his administrator to collect the balance which he found standing to the credit of his intestate. In the absence of any knowledge on the part of the administrator of the mistake, he acted lawfully and in the pursuance of his duty in the execution of his trust, and not tortiously, in collecting the money. He could only do this upon proof of his appointment and qualification as administrator. No credit was given to him personally, nor was any money paid to him in any other way than in his representative character. The old doctrine seems to have been that, upon any promise made after the death of the testator or intestate, the executor or administrator was chargeable, if at all, as of his own goods, and not in his representative capacity. More recent cases have settled that an executor or administrator may, in some cases, be sued in his representative capacity on a promise made by him in such capacity, and a judgment had against the assets of the estate. This, however, is limited to cases where the transaction which constituted the cause of action arose in the lifetime of the deceased, and does not extend to actions for goods sold and delivered to an executor, or work and labor done for him as executor. In such cases, the defendant is charged personally, and not in his representative character. If, after the decease of Charles Thompson, the Barings had by mistake placed this sum to the credit of H. P. Thompson as executor, and he had collected it, a different question would have been presented, which it is not necessary in the present case to decide, as the case of De Valengin v. Duffy, 14 Pet. [39 U. S.] 283, is in the opinion of the court conclusive, when applied to the facts in this case.

Judgment for plaintiffs, with interest from date of demand made upon the estate.

[1] [Reported by Jabez S. Holmes, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

Case No. 985.

BARING et al. v. WILLING et al.

[4 Wash. C. C. 248.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. April Term, 1820.

TRUSTS—ENFORCEMENT IN EQUITY—APPOINTMENT OF AGENT—LIEN OF AGENT.

1. Jurisdiction of courts of equity over trusts, and confirming the appointment of an agent made by a majority of the trustees, or in appointing an agent by the court.

[Cited in Curtis v. Smith, Case No. 3,505.]

[See Batesville Inst. v. Kauffman, 18 Wall. (85 U. S.) 151; Watson v. Jones, 13 Wall. (80 U. S.) 721; U. S. v. Hoyt, Case No. 15,410; James v. Atlantic Delaine Co., Id.

[1] [Originally published from the MSS. of Hon. Bushrod Washington, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, under the supervision of Richard Peters, Jr., Esq.]

7,177; Harrison v. Rowan, Id. 6,143; Ketcham v. Mobile & O. R. Co., Id. 7,737; Dias v. Brunell, 24 Wend. 9.]

2. In what cases the court will not direct an agent to deliver up the papers in his possession; as, if he has a lien.

[See Irvine v. Dunham, 111 U. S. 327, 4 Sup. Ct. 501.]

[In equity. Bill by Alexander Baring, Henry Baring, and others against Thomas M. Willing and Charles Willing Hare to confirm the appointment of an agent nominated by the trustees under the will of William Bingham, other than the defendant trustee Hare. Decree confirming nomination.]

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. The object of this bill is to obtain a decree of the court, to confirm the appointment of the agent nominated by the plaintiffs and the defendants, Thomas M. Willing, to transact the business of the estate of William Bingham deceased, and to execute the trusts created by his will so far as may be necessary, or to appoint some other person to act in that capacity; and also to compel the defendant, Charles W. Hare, to deliver over the papers belonging to the estate of the testator to the agent so to be appointed. The will of William Bingham, which is made an exhibit in the cause, devises the whole of his estate, real and personal, to the plaintiffs and to the defendants, in trust, after the payment of the debts and legacies, to divide the same into five equal parts, and to stand seised of two of the said parts, for the use of his son, then and still a minor, and of the other three for the use of his daughters, the wives of the plaintiffs Alexander and Henry Baring, the rents and profits, interest, and dividends, to be paid to them equally, and after their deaths to be divided equally amongst their children respectively. The interest, dividends, rents and profits of the two parts given to his son, to be employed for his maintenance and education, and the surplus, if any, to be invested in the American funds until the son should attain his full age. The will further empowers the trustees, who are also constituted executors, to sell and convey the whole, or any part of the real estate, and to invest the proceeds in the American funds in the names of the trustees, for the uses above mentioned. It further empowers them to appoint an agent or agents to transact all business necessary for the execution of the trusts, and declares that they shall not be answerable for the acts of their agent, nor should one trustee be answerable for the acts of the others. This will was duly proved, and the plaintiffs and defendants accepted the trusts. The bill states that the defendant, C. W. Hare, was appointed by the other trustees the agent under the will to execute the trusts, and that he continued to discharge the duties of that office until the 1st of January, 1819; having in September preceding addressed a letter to the other trustees, in which he declared his determination to withdraw from the agency after that period, and requesting that another agent might be appointed to succeed him, and to receive from him the papers of the estate, the entire custody of which had been with that defendant. In consequence of this intimation, the other trustees nominated John H. Powell to act as the agent, and to receive the papers. This nomination was disapproved of by Charles W. Hare; and he therefore refused to concur in the appointment of the agent, or to deliver over the papers to him. The bill further states, that the Messrs. Baring are subjects of the king of the United Kingdoms of Great Britain, &c. and resident there; that the other plaintiff is a resident of the state of Maryland; and the defendants of this state. That the defendant, C. W. Hare, refuses to have any communication or correspondence with the other defendant, T. M. Willing, or to deliver over to the agent so nominated by the other trustees, such of the papers as concern the duties of his agency; in consequence of which, and of the refusal of Mr. Hare to concur in the appointment of the agent nominated by the other trustees, the estate of Mr. Bingham is exposed to great embarrassment and loss, and the trusts of the will cannot be executed. These charges in the bill are in substance acknowledged by the separate answers of the defendants, and there is in reality no matter of fact material to the determination of this cause in dispute between the parties. The questions are, whether the plaintiffs are entitled to the relief prayed in the bill, or to any other, and what relief? It is in the first place to be remarked, that the bill contains no charge against the integrity or solvency of Mr. Hare, nor against his capacity to execute the duties of trustee and executor. In all these respects, and in any and every other which concerns his character and conduct generally, or in relation to the management of the affairs of this estate, he stands before the court free from all exception. The only charge is his refusal to concur with the other trustees in appointing the agent nominated by them to execute the will, and his refusal to deliver the papers to such agent; and the court can entertain no doubt but that this refusal has been induced by the best motives, and by a conscientious devotion to what this gentleman believes to be the real interest of the persons interested in the estate of the testator.

All this being admitted, the first question is, whether the court can, and ought to interfere in the appointment of an agent for the purposes mentioned in the will? The power of the court to appoint an agent, and the expediency of doing it in this case, are both denied by the defendant, Charles W. Hare. As to the power. Courts of equity have always claimed and exercised exclusive jurisdiction in cases of trusts and over the conduct of those appointed to execute them. This has never been disputed ground. No other tribunal can so properly direct the manner of executing them; or inquire into and correct abuses where there has been, or is likely to be, mismanagement by the trustees. No other court can so conveniently provide against those unforeseen casualties which may defeat the will of the party who created the trust. It would be a reproach upon the administration of justice, if a court of equity did not possess these powers, since it must be admitted on all hands, that they cannot be exercised by courts of common law. We are therefore of opinion, that upon the reason of the case, as well as upon authority, a court of equity has a power to enforce the execution of trusts in such manner as may be most likely to accomplish the object of the party who created them; in cases where, without such interference, the trust would be imperfectly executed, or not executed at all.

2. Is it expedient in this case that the court should interfere in the appointment of an agent to represent the trustees, and to execute the trust? The will authorises the trustees to appoint such an agent. Such a power was foreseen by the testator to be absolutely necessary to enable the trustees to act with effect. Two of them resided in England; one in the state of Maryland; and the other two in Pennsylvania. They had authority to sell the whole, or any part of his real estates, and to invest the proceeds of such sales, as also the income of the part given to the infant son, beyond what might be necessary for his education and support, in the American funds. The joint act of the trustees would be necessary for the performance of many of those duties, the difficulty and delay in obtaining which might frequently be productive of serious injury to the estate. The want of this co-operation of the trustees, and of an agent duly appointed, has given rise to this suit; and the obstacles to the execution of the trust charged in the bill, are examples of many others which might, and most probably would, occur, in the further discharge of the duties of the trustees, if the interference of this court should be withheld. It happens from an unfortunate misunderstanding between the two trustees who reside in this state, where the business is principally to be transacted, that they have no intercourse with each other, and one of them refuses to unite in the appointment of the agent selected by the others. The court cannot inquire into the cause of the difference which exists between these gentlemen, and most certainly imputes blame to neither. The consequences nevertheless are to be deplored, and so far as they do of necessity prevent the proper execution of the trusts, it is the duty of this court to avoid them.

3. The next question respects the person to be appointed the agent. If this subject came before the court, unaffected by any previous nomination of a majority of the trustees, it would be referred to the master to report to the court a fit person to execute this office, subject to the exceptions which any of the parties might choose to take. Upon such a reference, the choice of a majority of those whose agent the person appointed was to be, would unquestionably be respected, provided it should appear to the court, that he was in all respects unexceptionable. But no such reference is in this case necessary, since it appears that an agent has been nominated by four-fifths of the trustees, and that he continues to be the object of their choice. The objections stated by one of the defendants to this nomination are not, in the opinion of the court, such as ought to disappoint the wishes of so great a majority of the persons whose duty and interest it is to select a person in all respects fit for this office. A nomination so made ought to be decisive with the court.

4. As to the papers, there is no doubt but that all the trustees are entitled to free access to them, and that the agent ought to be put into possession of such of them as concern the business which he will have to transact. But the court is not disposed, unless it should hereafter appear to be necessary, to order the papers generally to be delivered over to the agent, until the claims of the defendant, who now has the custody of them, against the testator's estate, are settled and discharged.

This cause came on to be heard the twentieth day of April, in the year one thousand eight hundred and twenty, upon the bill, answer, replication and exhibits filed, and was then argued by counsel. Whereupon it is decreed and ordered, that the nomination of John Hare Powel, as agent for the estate of William Bingham deceased, in the bill mentioned by four-fifths of the trustees of the same, be, and the same is hereby confirmed. And it is further decreed and ordered, that the defendant, Charles Willing Hare, do permit the plaintiffs, and the other defendant, Thomas M. Willing, or either of them, and any person authorized in writing for this purpose by them, or either of them, at all reasonable hours, to have free access to the books and other papers in his possession, belonging to the estate of the said William Bingham deceased, for the purpose of inspecting and taking copies of the same if desired; and also that the same access be permitted to the agent aforesaid, and to any person appointed for this purpose in writing by the said agent. And it is further decreed and ordered, that the said Charles Willing Hare do deliver to John Hare Powel, the agent aforesaid, or to his order in writing, such papers of the said estate as may be necessary to enable the said agent to transact the business of the said estate, or as the honourable Richard Peters, one of the judges of this court, may direct to be so delivered, the said agent or person receiving the said papers giving a receipt for the same to the said Charles Willing Hare; and leave is reserved to the plaintiffs or defendants to apply to this court from time to time for such further order in the premises as may be necessary.

BARK.

[NOTE. Cases cited under this title will be found arranged in alphabetical order under the names of the vessels; e. g. "The Bark Princess Alexandra. See Princess Alexandra," Case No. 11,430.]

Case No. 986.

BARKER v. BARKER'S ASSIGNEE.

BARKER v. SMITH et al.

[2 Woods, 87;[1] 12 N. B. R. 474; 2 Amer. Law T. Rep. (N. S.) 386.]

Circuit Court, D. Louisiana. Nov. Term, 1874.

BANKRUPTCY — FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCE BY BANKRUPT — CONCEALMENT OF CONVEYANCE — WHO MAY IMPEACH—CREDITOR WITHOUT LIEN—ASSIGNEE IN BANKRUPTCY.

1. As a general rule, a voluntary conveyance, made by a grantor in easy circumstances and in no pecuniary strait, to his wife or children, cannot be impeached, because voluntary, at the instance of creditors who became such long after the execution of the conveyance.

2. To impeach a conveyance made under such circumstances, it must be shown to have been fraudulent, or made with a view to protect the property conveyed from future debts.

3. A deed not at first fraudulent may become so by being concealed from the public, so that the grantor gets credit by reason of his supposed ownership of the property conveyed.

[See Warner v. Norton, 20 How. (61 U. S.) 448.]

4. The Code of Louisiana gives no effect to an unregistered act of alienation as against bona fide purchasers or creditors.

5. But a general creditor of the grantor cannot proceed to set aside a conveyance, either really or constructively fraudulent, unless he has a lien on the property conveyed, or has reduced his claim to judgment.

[Cited in Re Gurney, Case No. 5,873.]

6. But this rule does not apply to an assignee in bankruptcy. The adjudication of bankruptcy arrests the proceedings of creditors to obtain judgments. The assignee may therefore proceed to impeach a deed of the bankrupt as fraudulent, although the creditors have not reduced their claims to judgment, and although they have no specific lien upon the property conveyed.

[Cited in Re Gurney, Case No. 5,873; Re Werner, Id. 17,416; Miller v. Jones, Case No. 9,575; Lloyd v. Hoo Sue, Id. 8,432; Platt v. Preston, Id. 11,219.]

[See Pratt v. Curtis, Case No. 11,375; Cady v. Whaling, Id. 2,285; Allen v. Massey, Id. 231; In re Dunkerson, Id. 4,156; Smith v. Ely, Id. 13,044.]

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of Louisiana.]

In bankruptcy. This was a bill in equity filed in the district court [by Abraham Barker against the assignee of Jacob Barker, a bankrupt, Samuel Smith, and others, to set aside a sale by the assignee to the defendant Smith,] and brought to this court by appeal. The case was submitted to the circuit court upon the pleadings and evidence for final decree. [Bill dismissed.]

John A. Campbell, for complainant.
A. Micou, for defendant.

WOODS, Circuit Judge. The facts of the case are these: On the 30th of September, 1857, Jacob Barker was seized in fee and was in possession of a certain parcel of real estate in the city of New Orleans. On that day, by his deed of that date, he conveyed the real estate to his son, Abraham Barker, the complainant. Although the deed was absolute on its face, yet the conveyance was made to Abraham Barker in trust for Elizabeth Barker, wife of Jacob Barker, and mother of complainant. The consideration, as claimed by complainant, was $8,000, made up by the cancellation of two notes for $1,300 each, with interest, made by Jacob Barker and held by Elizabeth Barker, the payee, by the payment by the trustee for Jacob Barker of a balance due Barker Brothers, and a credit for the remainder in favor of Jacob Barker on the books of the trustee.

The deed was not recorded until the 14th of July, 1869. In the meantime, about the year 1861, Mrs. Elizabeth Barker died, having provided by her last will that the whole income of her estate, or so much thereof as might be necessary, and, if required, the principal, or some part thereof, should be devoted to the support of the said Jacob, and such members of the family as might, in his discretion, require it.

Both before and after the death of Mrs. Barker, Jacob Barker collected the rents and paid the taxes upon the property, he being a resident of New Orleans, where the property was situated, and Abraham Barker, the trustee, a resident of Philadelphia.

In June, 1867, Jacob Barker was adjudged a bankrupt by the United States district court of Louisiana, and placed upon his schedules, through inadvertence and mistake, as he testifies, the parcel of real estate conveyed to complainant in 1857, and afterwards it was sold by the assignee to the defendant, Samuel Smith.

Jacob Barker, for many years prior to the date of his deed to Abraham Barker, had been a prominent business man and banker in New Orleans, of great reputed wealth, and so continued until the date of his bankruptcy in 1867.

The prayer of the bill is that the sale to Smith may be set aside and the property reconveyed to the complainant, or that he may receive the proceeds of the sale made to Smith.

Samuel Smith, one of the defendants, files an answer, in which he says he is willing to abide by the order of the court in the premises, and if the court shall decide that the sale to him should be annulled, consents thereto on the repayment to him of the purchase money.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William B. Woods, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

The assignee defends against the bill on two grounds: (1) Because the deed to Abraham Barker was simulated and intended to defraud the creditors of Jacob Barker; and (2) Because the failure to record the deed rendered it null and void; and as the assignee was appointed before the deed was recorded, he can, as the representative of the creditors, insist on the invalidity of the deed. These defenses present the points that demand our attention.

First. Is the deed of September 30, 1857, void because executed in fraud of creditors? There is not a word of evidence in the record to show that in 1857, Jacob Barker had a creditor in the world. On the other hand, all the facts in the case are consistent with the theory that, being a man of large means and independent fortune, in no pecuniary strait, and wishing to put in the hands of a trustee trust property held by him for his wife, he made the deed in question. As all the parties were members of the same family, it was not thought necessary to transact the business with the formality and precision usually employed when the transaction is between strangers. Had it really been the purpose of Jacob Barker to defraud his creditors, he would have been careful to see that the deed was executed and recorded in strict compliance with law. But it is not necessary to argue the question of fraudulent intent against creditors, because there is, as just stated, no proof that there were any creditors when the deed was executed and delivered.

Can those who were not creditors at that time, but who became so years afterwards, complain of the deed as fraudulent? It seems clear that generally they cannot. The doctrine established by the supreme court of the United States is, that a voluntary conveyance made by a person not indebted at the time, in favor of his wife or children, cannot be impeached by subsequent creditors on the ground of its being voluntary. It must be shown to have been fraudulent or made with a view to future debts. Sexton v. Wheaton, 8 Wheat. [21 U. S.] 229; Hinde v. Longworth, 11 Wheat. [24 U. S.] 199. See, also, Bennett v. Bedford Bank, 11 Mass. 421.

There is nothing in the record which tends in the slightest degree to show that any of the creditors of Jacob Barker, who are represented by the assignee, were such at the date of the deed to Abraham Barker, nor that the purpose of that conveyance was to defraud any of his present creditors.

If the present creditors have any right to complain, it is not because the deed of 1857 was made in actual fraud of those to whom Jacob Barker was then indebted, but because it was not recorded, and because they have given him credit on the strength of his presumed ownership of the property conveyed thereby.

A deed, not at first fraudulent, may become so by being concealed, because by its concealment, persons may be induced to give credit to the grantor. Sands v. Hildreth, 2 Johns. Ch. 35; Hildeburn v. Brown, 17 B. Mon. 779.

A deed concealed from the public, the grantor remaining in possession and acquiring credit on the strength of his supposed ownership of the property, is fraudulent. Worseley v. De Mattos, 1 Burrows, 467; Hungerford v. Earle, 2 Vern. 261; Leukener v. Freeman, Freem. Ch. 236; Constantine v. Twelves, 29 Ala. 607.

This brings up the second question, whether the failure to record the deed avoids it as to creditors.

The Code of Louisiana gives no effect to acts of alienation as against creditors or bona fide purchasers, unless they have been regularly registered. This is conceded; but counsel for complainant says that the creditors, as against whom an unrecorded deed is void, are those only who have obtained a judgment which created a lien or privilege on the land, and not general creditors. Whether the provision of the law is thus limited is the precise question now for solution.

The general rule is, that a creditor cannot proceed to set aside a conveyance of real estate, either really or constructively fraudulent, unless he has a lien thereon, or has reduced his claim to judgment, and the fraudulent conveyance is an obstacle to a sale on execution. Jones v. Green, 1 Wall. [68 U. S.] 330; Colman v. Croker, 1 Ves. Jr. 160; Brinkerhoff v. Brown, 4 Johns. Ch. 671.[2]

Conceding that a general creditor having no lien or judgment could not file a bill to set aside as void an unrecorded conveyance of real estate, and to subject the property to the payment of his debt, does this rule apply to an assignee in bankruptcy?

In the case of Carr v. Hilton, [Case No. 2,436,] a bill in equity was sustained by an assignee to subject property conveyed by the bankrupt in fraud of his creditors to administration for their benefit. In many other cases this has been done.

It would appear that an adjudication of bankruptcy removes the necessity for a lien or judgment before a bill can be filed to subject the property fraudulently conveyed, or when the transfer is for other reasons invalid. If the rule were otherwise, then no property conveyed by a bankrupt in fraud of his creditors, or by any void or invalid conveyance, unless the creditors had reduced their claims to judgment, could be subjected by the assignee in bankruptcy to the payment of debts. For after an adjudication of bankruptcy, no creditor whose debt is provable is allowed to prosecute to final judgment any suit at law or in equity therefor against the bankrupt, until the question of the bankrupt's discharge shall be determined. Bankrupt Act, [March 2, 1867, c. 176, 14 Stat. 526,] § 21.

[2] [See, also, Day v. Washburn, 23 How. (64 U. S.) 309.]

The question under consideration was decided by Woodruff, circuit judge, in Re Leland, [Case No. 8,234,] in the case of an unrecorded mortgage of chattels. The learned judge says: "It is claimed, because the mortgage is valid without being properly filed as against the bankrupts, it is, therefore, good as against their assignee in bankruptcy, and that no creditor but a judgment creditor can impeach or deny its validity.

"The proceedings in bankruptcy arrest the ordinary proceedings of creditors to obtain judgments, and thereby to secure an appropriation of the debtor's property to their use, and the assignee in bankruptcy represents them. He is trustee for them, and whatever right they might assert, if they had obtained judgments, he may, for their benefit, assert, whether it be to set aside conveyances by the bankrupts which are fraudulent and void as against creditors, or which are otherwise as against them invalid."

The case stands thus: Jacob Barker, in 1857, was seized of the real estate in dispute. He attempted to convey it by a deed which his grantee failed to record, and he remained in possession. This failure to record the deed made it inoperative as against subsequent purchasers and creditors. So far as their rights are involved, the title still remained in Jacob Barker until his bankruptcy in 1867. By the adjudication, the rights of the creditors were vested in the assignee. The want of judgments in their favor is supplied by the adjudication of bankruptcy, which authorizes the assignee to file a bill to subject the property to administration, just as if he were a judgment or lien creditor. But the property has been delivered to him without suit, and its proceeds are in his hands for distribution. If it is rightfully thus, if under the circumstances of this case by his bill in equity, he could have subjected the property, then it follows, his rights are superior to the rights of the grantee of the unrecorded deed to the property, and that the bill of the latter to set up his claim is without equity.

The bill must therefore be dismissed.

Case No. 987.

BARKER et al. v. BARKER'S ASSIGNEE.

[2 Woods, 241.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Louisiana. April Term, 1876.

EQUITY—BILL OF REVIEW—THE RECORD.

A bill of review can only be sustained upon the ground of error apparent on the record, and the record consists of the pleadings, proceedings and decree, and does not include the evidence.

[Cited in Irwin v. Meyrose, 7 Fed. 536.]

In equity. Bill of review [by the heirs of Elizabeth Barker against the assignee of Jacob Barker, a bankrupt.] Heard for final decree on bill, demurrer, plea and answer of defendant. The bill of review was filed for the purpose of reversing what was alleged to be an erroneous decree of the district court, after the time for appeal had passed by. The bill of review set out the substance of the original bill, and averred, that after service of process, the defendant had filed an answer which contained a general denial of all the averments of the bill; that upon the final hearing, the court had rendered a decree in favor of complainants against the defendant for the sum claimed by them, to wit, $7,300, and directed the defendant to place the complainants as ordinary creditors upon the tableau of distribution. The bill of review alleged, that Jacob Barker was seized before his bankruptcy of certain real estate in the city of New Orleans, on which complainants had a lien in the nature of a tacit mortgage for the amount of their claim; that the property was sold by the assignee of Barker, and the complainants were allowed by the order of the court to set up their claim to the fund, the proceeds of said sale. The error assigned by the bill of review was, in not recognizing the lien or privilege of the complainants on this fund, and in not directing the claim to be paid out of the proceeds of the property on which the alleged tacit mortgage rested, instead of simply directing them to be placed on the tableau of distribution as general creditors. [Bill dismissed.]

Henry B. Kelly and D. C. Labatt, for complainants.

John A. Campbell, for defendant.

WOODS, Circuit Judge. A bill to review can only be sustained on the ground of error in law, apparent on the record. 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 393. On a bill of review, nothing can be examined but the pleadings, proceedings and decree, which, in this country, constitute what is called the record. The proofs cannot be looked into as they can on appeal. Putnam v. Day, 22 Wall. [89 U. S.] 60. It is well settled, that a bill of review for error, apparent upon the decree, must be for error in point of law, arising out of facts admitted by the pleadings or recited in the decree itself, as settled, declared or allowed by the court. O'Brien v. Connor, 2 Ball & B. 146; Mellish v. Williams, 1 Vern. 166; Webb v. Pell, 3 Paige, 368; Tommey v. White, 1 H. L. Cas. 160.

The complainants, while conceding these to be the rules governing bills of review, claim that after allowing the debt of the complainant to be a valid claim against the estate of Barker, it was error to refuse to give it a lien and privilege on Barker's real estate, or the fund which was produced by its sale; that upon the record it appears that if the claim were allowed, the lien followed as a matter of law. I cannot assent to this conclusion. The lien upon the real estate of Jacob Barker claimed by the original bill is based upon the averment that the money which was the basis of the claim was the separate, dotal and paraphernal property of Elizabeth Barker, his wife, and as such, came into his hands under the law of Louisiana. This averment is denied by the answer. Besides, it is nowhere directly averred in the original bill that Jacob Barker ever had any real estate to which the tacit mortgage could attach. It is true, it is averred that Norton, his assignee, had sold and disposed of all the real estate in New Orleans surrendered by Jacob Barker. But this averment, and all others of the original bill are distinctly traversed by the answer. While, therefore, the court may have found that Jacob Barker's estate was indebted to the complainants, it may also well have found that he owned no real estate on which the alleged tacit mortgage could rest. We cannot look into the proofs. We must take the bill, answer, replication and decree to see whether there is any error apparent on their face. Excluding the evidence, it is impossible to say that there was any error in the decree. As it does not so appear on the face of the record, and can be made to appear in no other way, the bill of review must be dismissed at complainant's costs.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William B. Woods, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

Case No. 988.

BARKER v. DALE et al.

[17 Pittsb. Leg. J. 19; 3 Pittsb. Rep. 190; 8 Morr. Min. Rights, 597.]

Circuit Court, W. D. Pennsylvania. 1869.

MINING LEASE—FAILURE TO COMMENCE OPERATIONS.

[1. A mining lease "for the sole and only purpose of mining and excavating for petroleum, coal," etc., vests in the lessee a corporeal interest in the premises demised, to recover which he may maintain an action of ejectment.]

[2. A clause in a lease of lands for mining purposes that the lessee "shall commence operations by" a specified date is not a condition the non-performance of which determines the lessee's rights, or works a forfeiture of his interest under the lease.]

[See Price v. Nicholas, Case No. 11,415.]

[3. The time fixed in a mining lease within which the lessee must commence operations is of the essence of the contract, so far as to enable the lessor, after its expiration, to maintain an action against the lessee for the non-performance of his stipulation, but not so as to divest his interest under the lease.]

[4. A lease of land "for the sole and only purpose of mining and excavating for petroleum, coal," etc., subject to the lessor's "use of the same for the purpose of tillage," confers on the lessee the exclusive right of mining on the land for the substances and minerals specified.]

[At law. Action of ejectment by Barker against Dale.] On the 8th day of December, 1865, Alanson Clark leased to the plaintiff the land in dispute by written lease "for the sole and only purpose of mining and excavating for petroleum, coal, rock or carbon oil, or other valuable mineral and volatile substances; * * * to have and to hold the said premises for the said purposes only, unto the said Barker, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, for 25 years ensuing the said lease," for which Barker was to deliver to Clark "one half the oil, etc., found;" the said Barker "to commence operations by the first of April, 1866." The lessor warranted the title. Barker never took possession of or commenced to work on the land under the lease. Sometime after this, Clark leased one acre of the said land to Dale, the defendant, who obtained a large producing well, upon learning which Barker brought this suit in ejectment for the land. These facts were in substance conceded. The defendant requested the court to charge the jury in answer to the five following points.

C. B. Curtis, for plaintiff.
Geo. H. Cutler, for defendants.

McKENNAN, Circuit Judge, answered the points as follows:

1st. The right acquired by plaintiff under the agreement of December 8th, 1868, in the premises therein described, was an incorporeal right only, and upon such right ejectment will not lie, and therefore the plaintiff cannot recover.

Answer by the Court.—The first prayer is refused. We are of the opinion that by the lease, dated December 8th, 1865, a corporeal interest in the business therein described was vested in the plaintiff, which is the proper subject of an action of ejectment.

2nd. That the clause in the agreement that the plaintiff was to commence operations by the first day of April, 1866, is a condition subsequent, and his failure to perform this condition determined his right under the agreement, and hence he cannot recover.

Answer by the Court.—This prayer is also refused. The clause by which the plaintiff was to commence operations by the first day of April, 1866, is not a condition, the non-performance of which determined the plaintiff's rights, or worked a forfeiture of his interest under the lease.

3rd. The time mentioned in the agreement within which the plaintiff was to commence operations was of the essence of the contract, and the plaintiff not having commenced operations within that time, he cannot recover.

Answer by the Court.—The time fixed in the lease within which the plaintiff was to commence operations is of the essence of the contract, so far as to enable the lessor, after its expiration, to maintain an action against the plaintiff for the non-performance of his stipulation, but not so as to divest his interest under the lease.

4th. The agreement in question did not give the plaintiff any exclusive right of mining and excavating for petroleum on said premises, and hence the plaintiff cannot recover.

Answer by the Court.—This prayer is refused. The lease grants to the plaintiff, for a determinate term, the premises in dispute, for the purposes therein stated, subject to lessor's "use of the same for the purpose of tillage;" and this is exclusive of any right of the lessor to mine or excavate within their defined limits, for petroleum, coal, rock oil, carbon oil, or other mineral or volatile substances.

5th. If the jury believe from the evidence, that prior to the lease of September 14th, 1868, to West and another, the plaintiff had abandoned all his rights under the agreement, and all intention of mining or excavating for oil, etc., on the premises therein described, then he cannot recover.

Answer by the Court.—This prayer is allowed. The jury must be satisfied by the evidence that the plaintiff intended to surrender his lease, and to abandon altogether the commencement or prosecution of mining or excavating operations, and that his acts touching such alleged abandonment were perpetrated with such intention.

The jury, after a few minutes' consultation, returned a verdict for the plaintiff, with nominal damages and costs.

BARKER, (DOYNE v.) See Case No. 4,055.

BARKER v. HENRY. See Case No. 989.

Case No. 989.

BARKER v. JACKSON et al.

[1 Paine, 559.][1]

Circuit Court, D. New York. Oct. Term, 1826.

COURTS—FOLLOWING STATE PRACTICE—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—STATUTES—RETROSPECTIVE ACT.

1. Where a statute of the state of New York, affecting the title to lands, had been in existence for thirty years, and had been uniformly sanctioned by the decisions of the courts of the state: Held, that this court was bound by such decisions, it not being objected to the statute that it was repugnant to the constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States, but only to the constitution of the state.

[See Ohio Life Ins. & Trust Co. v. Debolt, 16 How. (57 U. S.) 431.]

2. The act of the state of New York of the 24th of March, 1797, entitled "An act to settle disputes concerning the titles to lands in the county of Onondaga," is in effect only a statute of limitations, and a valid and constitutional law.

3. The commissioners appointed under this act were not a court within the meaning of the 41st section of the constitution of the state. They acted in the character of arbitrators, to hear disputes that should be voluntarily submitted to them; and if their award was not specially agreed to by the parties, it had no binding effect upon the right. It was not necessary, therefore, that they should proceed according to the course of the common law or by jury trial.

4. This act is a law of the land within the meaning of the 13th article of the constitution, although it does not extend over the whole state, but is confined to lands in the county of Onondaga.

5. Being a statute of limitations only, it relates to the remedy and not the obligation of contracts, and therefore is not within the 10th section of the 1st article of the constitution of the United States.

[See Samples v. Bank, Case No. 12,278; Johnson v. Bond, Id. 7,374; Bacon v. Howard, 20 How. (61 U. S.) 22; Sturges v. Crowninshield, 4 Wheat. (17 U. S.) 206.]

6. Not being retrospective, nor taking away any existing rights, it is no sufficient objection that it does in some measure affect such rights. It affects them by hastening a party in the assertion of them. Most statutes of limitation are subject to the same objection.

Error to the district court of the northern district of New York.

At law. This was an action of ejectment brought [by Henry and others against Joseph Barker] to recover the possession of a part of lot number twelve, in the township of Hector. The premises were originally granted by the state as military bounty lands. At the trial in the court below, the jury found a special verdict, containing the following facts: On the 8th of July, 1790, a patent of said lot was granted by the state to John Folliard, a soldier, who conveyed the same to Abraham Nelson, a native of Ireland, who came to the United States in 1778, and resided here until 1798, when he died. The lessors of the plaintiff were his heirs; but they remained British subjects, having never been in this country. On the 12th day of April, 1800, the commissioners, appointed under the act of the state of New-York, entitled "An act to settle disputes concerning the titles to land in the county of Onondaga," passed March 24th, 1797, (1 Rev. Laws, 213,) made the following award: "Having heard the proofs and allegations, and having examined the titles of such of the parties interested in lot number twelve, in the township of Hector, in the county of Cayuga, as have appeared and exhibited claims to the said lot; and having also inspected the records and files remaining in the office of the clerk of the county aforesaid relative thereto, and due deliberation being thereon had, we, the commissioners appointed by and in pursuance of the act entitled 'An act to settle disputes concerning the titles of lands in the county of Onondaga,' do, in pursuance of the authority given us in and by said act, award and determine, that Benjamin Willard is entitled to and stands seised in his demesne, of an absolute estate of inheritance in and to one undivided moiety of said lot; and that Daniel Wells, James Wells, William Wells, and Israel Wells, children of Israel Wells, deceased, are entitled to and stand seised in their demesne, as of an absolute estate of inheritance in and to the other moiety of said lot, subject to the reservations, provisions, and conditions contained in the original grant." Which award was duly entered in a book provided for that purpose, and filed in the clerk's office, agreeably to the provisions of the third section of said act, and to which award no dissent has been entered. The lessors of the plaintiff did not appear personally before the commissioners at the time of making the award, nor did any one appear on their behalf, although duly cited, according to the provisions of the 6th section of said act, by a publication in the newspapers. The defendant was in possession of the premises in question, under a title regularly deduced from the title obtained under the award of the commissioners. The verdict also found the said law of 1797, and the 41st article of the constitution of the state of New-York, adopted in 1777, and the 2d and 5th articles of the bill of rights of that year. The court below decided, that the said law and the acts of the commissioners under it were unconstitutional and void, and gave judgment for the plaintiff.

[1] [Reported by Elijah Paine, Jr., Esq.]

A. Van Vechten and A. Gibbs for the defendants, contended: That the act appointing the commissioners is unconstitutional, and that all the proceedings under it are null and void.

1. That the act being retrospective in its operation, stands opposed to that part of the constitution of the United States which prohibits individual states from making any law impairing the obligation of contracts.

2. That the act is in contravention of the 13th article of the constitution of New-York, as it deprives the lessors of their freehold without the judgment of their peers, and without being called upon to answer by due course of law.

3. That the act is repugnant to the 41st article of the constitution of New-York, and also is prohibited by the 7th article of the constitution of the United States, as it institutes a new court, whose proceedings are not in accordance with the course of the common law, and inasmuch as it abolishes the trial by jury.

S. M. Hopkins and J. King for the plaintiff, insisted: That the act in question, so far as it regards the present action, is an act of limitation merely; that it only affects the remedy of the lessors of the plaintiff, without necessarily involving the question as to the validity of the award of the commissioners.

[Judgment of the district court reversed, and judgment for defendant ordered.]

THOMPSON, Circuit Justice. This case comes up on a writ of error to the district court for the northern district of this state. The judgment of the court below was given upon a special verdict found by a jury. By which finding and the judgment of the court thereupon, as appearing in the record, the only question presented to this court is, whether the act of the legislature of the state of New-York, entitled "An act to settle disputes concerning the titles to lands in the county of Onondaga," passed 24th March, 1797, (1 Rev. Laws, 213,) and the acts and doings of the commissioners under that law are void, as being repugnant to the constitution of the state of New-York, or of the United States. This act and the proceedings of the commissioners were adjudged by the court below to be unconstitutional and void. If this judgment is to be upheld and sanctioned, and the titles in that part of the state usually called the "Military Tract," again thrown open to litigation, it ought to be called for by the most cogent and unyielding considerations. This act has been in force for nearly thirty years, and the value of the lands settled and held under its provisions is almost incalculable. It is not undeserving of consideration, that this act, before it could become a law, must have received the approbation of the council of revision, composed of the governor, the chancellor, and judges of the supreme court of the state, whose peculiar duty it was to examine and guard against any infringement of the constitution. And what is of still more importance is, that whenever the validity of this law has been in any manner called in question, it has uniformly received the sanction of the courts of justice in this state; and indeed such has been the universal understanding in favour of its validity, that the opposite opinion has not been deemed worthy of an argument. The only case in which the point was directly made, was that of Jackson v. Griswold, 5 Johns. 139, decided in the year 1808. And this case was submitted without argument, and the point passed over by the court as not susceptible of a doubt.

But if the question was doubtful, and even if the weight of argument was against the validity of the law, after the lapse of thirty years, and the uniform sanction of the courts of the state, this court would feel itself bound by the construction of the state courts. This law, in its operation and application to the rights of parties, has never been considered by the state tribunals as any thing more than a statute of limitations; and such decisions upon a local law which forms a rule of property, have always been held by the courts of the United States in the highest respect, and in fact have been considered as having a decisive and controlling influence. This rule is very broadly laid down by the supreme court in the case of Elmendorf v. Taylor, 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 159, where it is said, "This court has uniformly professed its disposition in cases depending on the laws of a particular state, to adopt the construction which the courts of the state have given to those laws. This course is founded on the principle supposed to be universally recognized, that the judicial department of every government where such department exists, is the appropriate organ for construing the legislative acts of that government. Thus no court in the universe which professed to be governed by principle, would, we presume, undertake to say that the courts of Great Britain or of France, or of any other nation, had misunderstood their own statutes, and therefore erect itself into a tribunal to correct such misunderstanding. We receive the construction given by the nation as the true sense of the law, and feel ourselves no more at liberty to depart from that construction than to depart from the words of the statute. On this principle, the construction given by this court to the constitution and laws of the United States is received by all as the true construction; and on the same principle, the construction given by the courts of the several states to the legislative acts of those states, is received as true, unless they come in conflict with the constitution, laws or treaties of the United States." It is not here said in terms, that the courts of the United States will follow the construction given by the state courts to their statutes, when the objection grows out of a supposed conflict between the law and the constitution of the state, but the principle embraces such a case, and all the reasoning from it necessarily leads to the same result. As, therefore, the settled construction given to this law by the state courts is, that it is merely a statute of limitations, and in no manner repugnant to the constitution, I might dispense with any further examination of the question, so far as the state constitution may be involved; and indeed, if it is only a statute of limitations, the constitution of the United States can have no bearing upon the question. A due respect, however, for the opinion of the judge who has pronounced this law unconstitutional and void, may make it proper that I should give to the question some further consideration.

The principal ground of objection to this law, arises out of the 41st article of the constitution of New-York, by which it is declared, "that trial by jury, in all cases in which it has heretofore been used in the colony of New-York, shall be established and remain inviolate for ever. And further, that the legislature of this state shall at no time hereafter, institute any new court or courts, but such as shall proceed according to the course of the common law." The first inquiry that seems naturally to arise is, whether the board of commissioners appointed and organized under this act, was a court within the sense and meaning of the article in the constitution above referred to. If it was, it is very certain that their proceedings were not according to the course of the common law, and its institution was in violation of the constitution; if it was not a court, the constitution has no bearing upon it. It is very evident that the legislature did not consider it a court, nor that the commissioners were in any sense to be considered officers, any more than arbitrators or referees would be so considered; for they were named and appointed in the act; whereas if they were officers, they must have been appointed by the council of appointment, according to the provisions of the 23d article of the constitution; and to consider this board a court and its members not officers, would be contrary to all legal understanding of the character of the members of a court. Nor does the act in any part of it give to this board the title, or denomination of a court; or vest in the commissioners, the usual and ordinary powers of a judicial tribunal. They had no authority to compel parties to appear before them, nor are they required to give them personal notice; all appearances were voluntary, and optional in the parties interested in the land. The decision of the commissioners is called an award, or determination; and not a judgment or decree. No power is given to the commissioners to enforce their award or determination, by execution or otherwise. They were to cause their award to be entered in a book for that purpose to be provided; and with this ended their functions. And the act declares, that such award or determination shall, after the expiration of two years after the making thereof, become binding and conclusive to all persons, except such as, conceiving themselves aggrieved, shall within the two years dissent from the same, and give notice thereof to the commissioners, or file the same in the office of the clerk of the county of Onondaga; and shall also, if not in the actual possession of the land, within three years after such award, commence a suit either at law or in equity, to recover the land, or to establish his or her right to the same, and prosecute the same to effect; in which case the award shall not operate as a bar to the suit. The suit required to be commenced within the three years, was to establish the right. This of course could not have been settled by the award; nor can this suit so required to be commenced, with any propriety be considered an appeal from the determination of the commissioners. It is not so called in the act; nor is any mode prescribed for the appeal, or any tribunal designated to which it should be made. But an original suit is required to be brought; and if this is done, and the dissent entered within the time limited by the act, the award has no effect upon the rights of the parties.

That these commissioners were acting in the character of arbitrators, to hear and examine disputes and controversies respecting the titles to these military lands, that should be voluntarily submitted to them, and without any binding effect upon the right, unless specially agreed to by the contending parties, is very evident from the proviso to the 3d section of the act; "That if the parties in any case will enter into an agreement before the commissioners, to abide by their determination, then, and in every such case, the award and determination of the commissioners shall be final and conclusive, as to such parties, and their heirs for ever." Such an agreement entered into before a court, in the exercise of judicial inquiry into the rights of parties, would certainly be an anomaly in the administration of justice. That the award per se has no binding effect on the rights of parties, is further illustrated by the provisions of the 7th section, which declares that, "if the party dissenting shall be in the actual possession of the premises, then the award so dissented from shall, as to the party dissenting, be considered of no effect. And unless the party in whose favour such award shall be made, shall within three years commence a suit either at law or in equity, to recover the land, or to establish his right to the same, and shall prosecute such suit with effect; then such person in whose favour such award is made, and his heirs, shall be for ever barred of all right, title, or claim, to the land so awarded." Here, again, even the party having the award, is required to bring a suit to establish his right, and if he neglects so to do for three years, he is barred of all right. The range of examination which the commissioners were to make, shows they were not acting as a court, and judging upon the rights of parties litigating before them; for where no adverse claim appeared, they were required to make an entry to that effect in their books. They could not be considered as arbitrators, except in the cases coming under the proviso to the 3d section of the act; and are therefore denominated commissioners, to hear, examine, award, and determine, disputes and controversies respecting the titles to these lands. The powers here given are adapted to the various objects of inquiry committed to the commissioners. The peculiar state and condition of the titles to these military lands, rendered some special legislation on the subject indispensable. The evils existing, appear from the recitals in one of the laws in relation to these lands, which required all deeds which had been given for the same, to be deposited in a public office, (Act Jan. 8, 1794:) "Whereas it is represented to the legislature, that many frauds have been committed respecting the titles to the lands granted by this state as bounty lands to the officers and troops, &c. by forging and antedating conveyances, and by conveying the said lands to different persons, and by various other contrivances, so that it has become very difficult to discover in whom the legal title to some of the said lands is now vested," &c. To meet these evils as far as was practicable, the law now in question, among others, was passed; not instituting a court for this special purpose;—the existing courts of justice in the state were amply sufficient, so far as mere judicial proceedings were necessary;—but commissioners were appointed to hear, and examine into, the disputes and controversies respecting these lands; as a kind of preliminary step to the commencement of a suit to try the right. Their award or determination, however, had no influence upon the right, unless the parties entered into an agreement before them, that it should have a binding effect. A dissent suspended the award, and it became operative only in case of neglect to bring a suit within the time limited; and of course, the act is nothing more in its application to these lands than a statute of limitations. If these commissioners did not form a court within the constitutional, and common law sense of such a tribunal, it was clearly no violation of the constitution, that a jury was not called in to pass upon the matters of fact submitted to the commissioners. The constitution secures the trial by jury in such cases only, where it had been used in the colony of New-York. So far as these commissioners may be considered arbitrators, a jury would not be required; no such usage was ever heard of under the colonial government, and so far as respects their powers other than those of arbitrators, the commissioners formed a new tribunal, unknown to the colonial government; and no trial by jury could of course ever have been used in such case under that government.

A still more untenable objection against this law has been taken, as being in violation of the 13th article of the constitution; which declares, that "no member of this state shall be disfranchised, or deprived of any of the rights and privileges secured to the subjects of this state by this constitution, unless by the law of the land, or the judgment of his peers." The objection is, that the law in question is not a law of the land, because it is not general and extending over the whole state; but is confined to lands in the county of Onondaga. There is certainly no colour for this objection requiring any serious consideration. If well founded, it would strike at a great portion of the statutes of the state; and if this is only a statute of limitations, no one is deprived by the award, or has his freehold taken away without the judgment of his peers. All these rights remain untouched, if the suit be brought within the time limited by the act. And this is an answer to the objection, that the right of trial by jury as secured by the constitution of the United States, is taken away. The proceedings of the commissioners are not a trial within the meaning of the constitution. The act expressly requires a suit to be brought to establish the right: and where it is a suit at law, the right of a trial by jury remains unimpaired by this law.

Nor does this act violate that provision in the constitution of the United States, (article 1, § 10,) which prohibits the states from passing any law impairing the obligations of contracts. Statutes of limitation relate to the remedy, and not to the obligation of a contract. This distinction is well settled by the decision of the supreme court of the United States; and that the state legislature may pass such laws, under such modification as their wisdom should direct,—[Sturges v. Crowninshield,] 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 206,—without infringing the constitution of the United States.

No objection can be made to this law, because it does in some measure affect existing rights: It is not retrospective, and does not take away from a party any existing right: It only hastens him in the assertion of such right. But if he brings his suit within the time limited, his title is tried in the same manner as if this law had never been passed. This may be thought to be a rigorous statute of limitations, but that was a matter resting in the sound discretion of the legislature; and with which the courts of justice have no concern. The condition of the titles to the land in the military tract, called for some strong legislative measures. Most statutes of limitation do in some measure affect existing rights. Among others, the law of this state limiting the period for bringing claims and prosecutions against forfeited estates, (Act March 28, 1797, 1 Rev. Laws, 128,) is made in terms to apply to existing rights. It declares, that no persons who now have any estate, right, or title, to land supposed to have been forfeited, &c., shall, after the expiration of five years from the passing of the act, sue, or maintain any action for the recovery of the same. So the act requiring all deeds for military bounty lands to be deposited in the clerk's office, though not a statute of limitation, yet applies to existing deeds. It declares, that all deeds heretofore made for such lands, shall within a limited time be so deposited; and that all deeds not deposited, shall be adjudged fraudulent and void: And many other statutes of a like character might be referred to. Yet the validity of these laws has not been questioned because they affect existing rights: They are all prospective in their application to such rights, and the effect upon them grows out of a neglect to comply with some new duty, required thereafter to be performed.

I am accordingly of opinion, that the judgment of the district court be reversed, and judgment entered for the defendant in the court below.

BARKER, The JOSHUA. See Case No. 7,547.

BARKER v. LADD. See Case No. 17,352.

Case No. 990.

BARKER v. LADD et al.

[3 Sawy. 44;[1] 6 Chi. Leg. News, 280.]

Circuit Court, D. Oregon. May 7, 1874.

ABATEMENT AND REVIVAL—CONTINUATION OF ACTION BY ADMINISTRATOR—LIMITATIONS.

1. The right of an administrator to prosecute an action commenced by the deceased. [judiciary act of 1789,] (1 Stat. 8, [page 90,] § 31,) is upon the condition that the cause of action survives, and that depends upon the local law—in Oregon, upon sections 365 and 366 of the Civil Code.

[Cited in Butler v. Poole, 44 Fed. 587.]

[See Hatfield v. Bushnell, Case No. 6,211.]

2. Section 34 of the Oregon Civil Code, which limits the time to one year, within which the court may allow an action to be continued by the administrator, applies to actions in this court. 17 Stat. 197, § 5, [Act June 1, 1872.]

[3. Cited in Kelly v. Herrall, 20 Fed. 365, to the point that, where an executor voluntarily appears in the action, judgment may be given for or against him with the same effect as if he had been brought in by scire facias.]

At law. On September 11, 1871, Abner H. Barker commenced an action in this court against William S. Ladd, John C. Ainsworth, Simeon G. Reed and Robert R. Thompson, for the recovery of $55,860.96 damages, alleged to have been incurred by him in the sale of his stock in the O. S. N. Co. by reason of the misrepresentations of the defendants concerning the same, while acting as directors of said company, and died on March 14, 1872; and on April 6, 1874, Joseph Simon was duly appointed administrator of said Barker's estate. Upon these facts, on April 16, 1874, said Simon applied for leave to continue the action as administrator of the deceased. [Motion denied.]

Joseph N. Dolph, for the motion.

William Strong, contra.

DEADY, District Judge. This application is opposed by the defendants upon the ground that it was not made within a year from the death of the plaintiff, Barker.

It is admitted that under the law of the state (Code Or. §§ 365, 366), and section 34 of the judiciary act [of September 24, 1789,] (1 Stat. 81, [92,]) that this cause of action survived.

The right of an administrator to maintain an action for such a cause is given by the law of the state; and such law, by said section 34, is made "the rule of decision" in this court.

Section 31 of the judiciary act provides that upon the death of a party to an action in the United States courts, before final judgment, "in case the cause of action doth survive," the administrator of such deceased party may prosecute or defend, as the case may be.

Neither this or any other law of the United States declares what causes of action shall survive; therefore, under section 34 aforesaid, the law of the state furnishes the rule on the subject.

[1] [Reported by L. S. B. Sawyer, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

Under this section 31 the representative of the deceased party may voluntarily appear and make himself a party to the suit, and if he neglects or refuses to do so, the adverse party may, if he desire it, have a scire facias against him to compel him to do so. No time is limited within which these proceedings may take place. But the law of the state (Code Or. § 37) also provides that no action shall abate by the death of a party; and that "in case of the death of a party, the court may at any time within one year thereafter, on motion, allow the action to be continued by or against his personal representative."

This provision in relation to the time within which the application must be made, is a rule of practice, and under section 5 of the act of congress of June 1, 1872, "to further the administration of justice," (17 Stat. 197,) governs the practice in this court.

It is clear, then, that this motion comes too late and cannot be allowed. While both the law of the United States and the state authorize the administrator to become a party to the action in place of the deceased party, the law of the state goes farther, and in effect prescribes that this right must be exercised within one year, or else it is taken away or barred. It is a statute of limitations upon the right to maintain or continue this action.

Under a similar provision in the New York Code, (section 121,) in Re Borsdorff, 17 Abb. Pr. 171, it was held that the motion would not lie after the expiration of a year from the death.

The motion is denied, with costs.

Case No. 991.

BARKER v. LAWRENCE.

[Betts' Scr. Bk. 258.]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. May 25, 1852.

CUSTOMS DUTIES—GOODS OBTAINED BY BARTER—APPRAISAL BY DEPUTY APPRAISER.

[1. Under the customs duties acts of 1842 (Aug. 30; 5 Stat. 548) and 1846, (July 30; 9 Stat. 42.) the principal appraisers must act in person, and upon their own inspection, in every case; and an appraisal made by them on the inspection and certificate of a deputy appraiser only is inoperative and void.]

[Distinguished in Focke v. Lawrence, Case No. 4,894.]

2. In an action to recover back customs duties illegally exacted, it appeared that the importation consisted of goods obtained by barter on the west coast of Africa, for which the master, who had no invoice, made one after his arrival in port, which invoice was received by the customs officers. The deputy appraiser inspected the invoice, and from his knowledge of the articles imported, but without instructions, added more than ten per cent. to the invoiced value, and a penalty of twenty per cent. was consequently added and exacted. The deputy sent the invoice to the regular appraisers, two of whom sanctioned it by endorsement; and in this condition it was returned to the collector, who assessed the duties and imposed the penalty. Held, that the appraisal was void as being the act of the deputy and not that of the principal appraisers.

[At law. Action by James W. Barker against Cornelius W. Lawrence, collector of the port of New York, to recover back customs duties illegally exacted. Judgment for plaintiff.]

Before BETTS, District Judge.

This was an action to recover back an extra charge of duty, with penalty upon an importation of barwood and palm oil, made by the plaintiff in the bark Chancellor, from the west coast of Africa, in the month of March, 1849, at a time when Mr. Lawrence was collector of this port. The cargo was obtained by barter with the natives, and the master had not, therefore, any invoice upon his arrival in New York. He made one himself, however, after his arrival home, which was received by the officers of the customs, from the necessity of the case, and an entry of the cargo permitted, without any compliance with the second section of the act of March [1,] 1823, [3 Stat. 729.] The deputy appraiser, Mr. Phillips, upon inspection of the invoice, and from his knowledge of the articles imported, added to their invoiced value 351 dollars on the barwood, and 900 on the palm oil; and, as those sums increased the value of the invoice more than 10 per cent., the penalty of 20 per cent. was added and exacted, together with the regular duty on the increased value; the two sums, principal and interest, amounting to 928 dollars and 68 cents. Upon the trial of the cause. Mr. Phillips, the deputy appraiser, was called as a witness by the plaintiff, and he testified that he himself added the increased values to the invoice without instructions from Mr. Lawrence, the collector; that he (Mr. P.) had then sent it to the regular appraisers; two of them gave it their sanction, by endorsing their initials upon it; and in this condition, and thus perfected, it was returned to the collector, and in his office the duties were assessed, and the penalty imposed. Being asked by the plaintiff's counsel, why he increased the invoice value of the barwood and palm oil, he answered that he did not consider the invoice as exhibiting the fair market value of those articles at the principal markets upon the west coast of Africa, and that he increased the values, in obedience to the requirements of law, in order to bring them up to the usual standard.

The district attorney, in his defence, relied upon the appraisement as conclusive evidence of value, under the acts of 1846 [July 30, 9 Stat. 42] and 1842, [Aug. 30; 5 Stat. 548;] but Mr. Ely, for the plaintiff, contended that the appraisement was void, for irregularity, and that, therefore, the invoice exhibited the only value upon which the duty could be lawfully assessed. That a deputy appraiser has no authority for making appraisements in any case, and that, in this instance, the principal appraisers merely adopted the appraisement made by Mr. Phillips, the deputy, and that too without any personal examination of any kind by the principal appraisers, who relied exclusively upon the accuracy of the deputy's judgment.

These points having been argued, and the various acts of congress applicable to the subject referred to, by the counsel, His honor, Judge BETTS, ruled that the appraisement in this case was irregular and wholly void, and that Mr. Lawrence was not justified in increasing the value of the invoice, or adding the penalty to the duties. That the supreme court of the United States had decided in the case of Greely v. Thompson, 10 How. [51 U. S.] 225, that the principal appraisers must act in person, and upon their own inspection, in every case, and cannot adopt the certificate of a deputy, whether accurate or not, as their own, without a violation of duty; and, hence, that any appraisement made in this form must be inoperative and void. In this case the judge held that there must be a verdict for the plaintiff to the full extent of his demand. He added to his remarks, also, that under the present requirements of the law, as expounded by the supreme court, it would be generally impossible to assess the duties in this port in any manner, except by invoices. But over this matter, he said, the courts had no power, but, if there was an evil in the way, congress alone could remove it. The district attorney excepted to the ruling of the judge, stating that he would bring the case up for reversal upon a bill of exceptions.

Verdict for the plaintiff, $982.68.

Case No. 992.

BARKER v. MARINE INS. CO.

[2 Mason, 369.] [1]

(Circuit Court, D. Rhode Island. Nov. Term, 1821.

MARINE INSURANCE—SHIPPING—SALES—PURCHASE BY AGENT OF SELLER.

1. A master of a ship who sells a cargo at public auction, after an abandonment to the underwriters, and buys it in at the sale to prevent a loss, does not become owner of the property thereby, so as to acquire thereby an insurable interest.

2. A master of a ship cannot become a purchaser at a sale of the property, which is sold by his authority as agent of the owners.

[Cited in The Tilton, Case No. 14,054.]

[See Glover v. Ames, 8 Fed. 351.]

[See note at end of case.]

3. If property is put up at auction by a master of a ship as agent of his owners, and bid in by him to prevent a loss, it is in contemplation of law no sale of the property.

At law. Assumpsit [by James Barker against Marine Insurance Company] on a policy of insurance dated the 2d of June, 1821, whereby "Robinson Potter for account of James Barker, or Robinson Potter, or both, made assurance," &c. "lost or not lost, arrived or not arrived, 4000 dollars, at and from Bristol in England, to a port of discharge in the United States, on cargo on board the brig Tom Hazard." The loss alleged was a total loss by the perils of the sea, in foundering at sea. Upon the trial of the case upon the general issue, the following facts were admitted or proved. The ship Aristomenes and cargo, belonging 3-4 to Robinson Potter, and 1-4 to Robert Robinson, and commanded by the plaintiff, early in the year 1820, sailed on a voyage from Newport to New-Orleans, where she unloaded her cargo and took on board another cargo for Greenock in Scotland, and there she safely delivered this cargo, and sailed from thence to Stockholm with another cargo, and after delivery of it took on board a cargo of iron for account of the owners, and sailed from thence for the United States. In the course of the homeward voyage the ship met with heavy disasters, and in consequence of distress was obliged to make a port of necessity, and put into Bristol in England, in October, 1820. She was there surveyed, and found so disabled and injured, as not to be worth repairing, and was accordingly condemned and sold for the benefit of the owners and all others concerned. The master set up the cargo of iron for sale at public auction, deeming this the best for all parties, but finding it could not be sold without a sacrifice, he bought it in to prevent a loss by the public sale; and afterwards in April, 1821, shipped it, part in the brig Tom Hazard, and part in another vessel, for the United States. The Tom Hazard foundered at sea on her voyage home, the other vessel arrived safe. The plaintiff wrote to his owners an account of all his proceedings; and they in December, 1820, abandoned to the underwriters on several policies, which had been underwritten on the Aristomenes and cargo; and the abandonments were accepted by the underwriters long before the present policy was underwritten; and they have received on account all the salvage from the Aristomenes and cargo. The iron shipped on board the Tom Hazard was consigned to Messrs. R. Potter and R. Robinson, (the owners of the Aristomenes and cargo) and expressed on the bill of lading to be 3-4ths for the former, and 1-4th for the latter. Upon these facts a verdict was taken for the plaintiff, subject to the opinion of the court upon the question, whether on the facts the plaintiff had an insurable interest. If not, then the verdict was to be amended, and entered for the defendants. [Verdict amended, and entered for defendants.]

Pitman & Webster, for plaintiff.
Hunter & Searle, for defendants.

STORY, Circuit Justice, (after stating facts.) The sole question in this case is, whether the plaintiff has an insurable interest. It is contended, that the plaintiff has an insurable interest; 1. By virtue of his purchase at the sale at Bristol; 2. As trustee for the underwriters, and having a special interest in the safety, in consequence of his responsibility for the proper management of the property. I lay out of consideration, altogether, the question, whether there might not have been a valid insurance of this property for the underwriters, the abandonment having been accepted by them, and of course the property having vested in them, because this insurance purports only to cover the interest of the parties named in it; and is not made "for whom it may concern."

[1] [Reported by William P. Mason, Esq.]

As to the first point, it appears to me, that the sale wrought no change whatsoever in the title of the property. It was a merely inoperative act, leaving the property exactly where it found it. It is impossible, that a person can at the same time be buyer and seller; and a person, who acts as agent in selling, cannot upon the known principles of law become a purchaser at the sale. This doctrine was acted upon by this court in the case of Church v. Marine Ins. Co., [Case No. 2,711,] and the cases there cited; and I see not the slightest reason to change the opinion then expressed. In truth, it is clear from the facts of this case, that the master did not contemplate this as a purchase on his own private account (which by the rules of law he would be prohibited from making); but as a purchase for the benefit of the owners. He bought in the property with the sole view of preventing a sacrifice of it, and a loss to the owners, whoever they might be. In so doing, he did nothing more than his duty; but it is a misnomer of the transaction to call it a sale; it was the prevention of a sale by the master. The property never passed from the owners; and the case stands exactly the same, as if the property had been bid in by the owners themselves.

Then setting aside all consideration of the sale, how does the case differ from the ordinary case of a master entrusted with the property of his owners. It will not be pretended, that a master ex officio is entitled to make insurance for his owners; and if he is not, I do not perceive, how the case is varied in respect to underwriters, becoming owners by an abandonment in the course of the voyage. It is true, that the master was intrusted with the care of this property for the owners, and was bound to take all reasonable measures to preserve it, and that is exactly his duty in all cases. But, strictly speaking, he has no interest in the property. He is a mere agent, or carrier. If the property is lost in the course of the voyage without his fault, it is the loss of the owners, and not his loss. He has not an insurable interest, because he may be responsible for negligence; for this insurance is not against a liability to actions, but against loss of property. It purports to be an insurance on property; and here the property belonged to the underwriters, and not to the master. The case of a trustee entirely differs from this; a trustee has the legal title to the property in himself. He is the owner at law, whoever may be the cestui que trust beneficially interested.

Having said thus much on the case, the subject is, in my view of it, exhausted. Unless the court were prepared to say, that in all cases a master of a ship has an insurable interest, because he has the custody of it, it is impossible to sustain the plaintiff's claim. The verdict must therefore be amended, and a verdict entered for the defendants.

Judgment accordingly.

[NOTE. See Potter v. Marine Ins. Co., Case No. 11,332, apparently involving the same subject-matter, from which it appears that the owner recovered upon another policy.]

BARKER, (MARKS v.) See Case No. 9,096.

BARKER, (NELSON v.) See Case No. 10,101.

BARKER v. NEWHALL. See Cases Nos. 994, 995.

BARKER, (NORTON v.) See Case No. 10,349.

Case No. 993.

BARKER v. PARKENHORN.

[2 Wash. C. C. 142.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. April Term, 1808.

PLEDGE—COLLATERAL ATTACK—TENDER.

1. B. pledged a vessel to P. to secure a sum of money loaned, and she was afterwards attached by another creditor of B. in the state of Delaware, and there sold under legal proceedings, P. becoming the purchaser; and after repairing her at some cost, he brought her to Philadelphia, where the plaintiff instituted this action of trover, for her recovery. Held, that the regularity of the proceedings in Delaware, under which the vessel was sold, cannot be inquired into in this issue.

2. The tender made by P. [B.] of the amount of the debt and interest, for which the vessel was pledged, without also tendering the expense of her repairs, was not sufficient.

3. If, when a party is about to tender a sum of money, the person to whom it is intended to pay it, declares he will not receive it, it is not necessary that the money should be actually produced.

[See Blight v. Ashley, Case No. 1,541.]

At law. This was an action of trover and conversion, to recover the value of a vessel, pledged by plaintiff with defendant to secure a sum of money loaned. The vessel, after the pledge, and whilst lying in the state of Delaware, where she was at the time she was pledged, was sold under a judgment rendered by a magistrate of that state, upon an attachment of a Mr. Long against the plaintiff, and was purchased by the defendant. He found it necessary, before he could remove her, to lay out a sum of money in her repairs, after which he brought her to Philadelphia. Some time after the money was due to the defendant, the plaintiff came to Philadelphia and demanded his vessel, offering to pay the principal debt and interest due. The defendant insisted upon being paid the money he had expended on her repairs, and some other necessary sums laid out for her. The plaintiff, after some hesitation, said he would pay any legal demand, and called upon the defendant to produce his account, with the bills of what he had laid out. This the defendant refused to do, and left the house, saying he would have none of his money. A tender was made of the debt, but no money was produced by the plaintiff, for the advances of the defendant for the vessel. After this, and before the suit was brought, the plaintiff wrote to the defendant, that he had received his account, and found it extravagant, and requested a meeting on the subject. The meeting either did not take place on that day, or they met and could not agree; but no subsequent tender was made by the plaintiff. The suit was brought, after which the defendant sold the vessel. There was sufficient evidence in the cause to show, that the defendant purchased the vessel for whoever might be entitled to her, and considered himself trustee for the plaintiff.

[1] [Originally published from the MSS. of Hon. Bushrod Washington, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, under the supervision of Richard Peters, Jr., Esq.]

Levy, for plaintiff, cited Cro. Jac. 245, to show that after a tender of the money due, trover will lie against pawnee. He contended that defendant is to be considered as a trustee for plaintiff, if the sale in Delaware was regular; but he insisted that the justice did not proceed regularly.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. Do you admit that he had jurisdiction of the case?

Levy answered that he had some doubts, but could not prove that he had not jurisdiction.

BY THE COURT. Then you cannot, in a collateral action, object to its regularity, whilst it remains in full force.

Levy, to prove that the defendant was to be considered as a trustee, read 8 Ves. 345. In case of a pledge, if no time be fixed for redemption, pawnee cannot sell, but must obtain judgment, and levy execution on the property pledged. Plaintiff has all his life to redeem. Cro. Jac. 244. 5 C. Rob. Adm. 222. He contended, that a pawnee cannot lay out money on the pledge, so as to charge pawnor with it.

Hallowell, for defendant, admitted his client to be a trustee; but contended that plaintiff could not reclaim the property, without paying the advances made for the use of the property, as well as the original debt; and that a legal tender was not made in this case. [Plaintiff suffered a nonsuit.]

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. The most favourable light in which this case can be considered for the plaintiff, is, that the defendant, by the purchase under the execution, became a trustee for the plaintiff; and it is clear, that the plaintiff could not reclaim his property, without paying or tendering, as well all necessary and proper sums advanced by defendant, on account of the trust property, as the original debt and interest. The question then is, did he tender all that was due? He did not, on the first meeting, make a legal tender of anything but the debt and interest, for the money was not produced. But the defendant, by refusing to produce his account of the advances, and declaring that he would not receive the money, dispensed with the necessity of a regular tender; and of course, if the cause rested here, it would be proper to view the case as if a regular tender of all that was due had been made. But, at another day, and before suit brought, it seems that the defendant did furnish the plaintiff with his account, to which the plaintiff contented himself with objecting that it was extravagant, without objecting to opening the transactions of the former day again, and without making a new tender of what was really due, or what he thought to be so. Had he objected, on account of the former tender and refusal, we will not say what would have been the legal effect of it. But he made no such objection; and by his conduct opened the former transaction, and merely questioned the accuracy of the account. Under these circumstances, he ought again to have tendered at his peril, as much as the defendant was justly entitled to receive; and not having done this, he cannot recover in this action. Whatever is justly due to the plaintiff, he may recover in another form of action.

The plaintiff suffered a nonsuit.

BARKER v. SMITH. See Cases Nos. 986 and 987.

BARKER, (SMITH v.) See Cases Nos. 13,012 and 13,013.

Case No. 994.

BARKER v. STOWE.

SAME v. NEWHALL.

[15 Blatchf. 49;[1] 3 Ban. & A. 337; 14 O. G. 559; Merw. Pat. Inv. 169.]

Circuit Court, N. D. New York. July 11, 1878.

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS — BUCKETS FOR CHAIN PUMPS—EVIDENCE—WAIVER OF OBJECTION.

1. The claims of the re-issued letters patent granted to William C. Barker, July 6th, 1875, for an "improvement in buckets for chain-pumps," (the original letters patent having been issued to said Barker June 20th, 1871, and re-issued to him May 19th, 1874,) namely, "(1.) An elastic bucket for chain-pumps, adapted to fit and work in the bore of a pump-tube, to raise the water by suction, provided with a suitable orifice or outlet through which the water remaining in the pump-tube above the bucket is allowed to escape down to the source of supply, substantially as and for the purpose set forth; (2.) A solid elastic bucket, having an elastic bearing edge, and its upper portion convex or contracted from said edge, whereby the bucket will readily yield to any irregularities in the pump-tube, and admit of its being easily drawn up, while at the same time it will resist moving downward, substantially as and for the purpose specified," are infringed by the buckets for chain-pumps described in the letters patent granted to Deloraine F. Stowe, February 23d, 1875, for an "improvement in buckets for chain-pumps."

[1] [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, Circuit Judge; reprinted in 3 Ban. & A. 337; and here republished by permission. Merw. Pat. Inv. 169, contains partial report only.]

2. Mere applications for patents cannot be considered on the question of novelty, as a defence in a suit on a patent. To make the things described and shown in them available, there must be evidence that such things were actually constructed in working form.

3. The two claims of said re-issued letters patent are void for want of novelty.

4. In the proofs, W. gave evidence as to prior knowledge and use by him of the thing patented. His name and such fact were not set up in the answer. On the taking of the proofs the plaintiff objected to such evidence of W. "as incompetent under the rules of the court" and as "incompetent under the laws and rules governing practice in the circuit courts of the United States." At the hearing the plaintiff sought to exclude the evidence of W. because his name and the facts of his prior knowledge and use were not set up in the answer: Held, that the objection was waived because it was not distinctly made when the evidence was taken.

[Cited in Woodbury Patent Planing Mach. Co. v. Keith, Case No. 17,970.]

[See note at end of case.]

[In equity. Suit by William C. Barker against Deloraine F. Stowe, and by the same against Abner C. Newhall, for infringement of reissued letters patent No. 6,531. Bills dismissed. Motions to vacate decrees and reopen causes denied in Same v. Same, Case No. 995.]

George E. Buckley, for plaintiff.

Walter L. Dailey, for defendant.

BLATCHFORD, Circuit Judge. This suit is brought on re-issued letters patent granted to the plaintiff July 6th, 1875, for an "improvement in buckets for chain-pumps," the original letters patent having been issued to the plaintiff June 20th, 1871, and having been re-issued to him May 19th, 1874. The specification says: "Prior to my invention there was not, so far as I am aware, in use an elastic bucket provided with a means whereby the water remaining above the bucket could escape back into the well when the pump was not in use. The great difficulty heretofore experienced in that class of pumps where the water is drawn up by an elastic bucket tightly fitting the bore of the tube. has been the continued freezing in cold weather of the water remaining in the pump-tube when the pump was not in operation, which, in many cases, would split or otherwise injure the wooden tube and the working parts of the pump, to an extent that would render the same wholly worthless. To remedy this evil is the principal object of my invention; and it, therefore, consists in providing the bucket with a suitable outlet or opening, through which the water is allowed to escape from the pump-tube down to the source of supply, when the pump is not in use. My invention also consists of a solid bucket of India rubber or other similarly elastic material, convex or contracted upward from that part of its outer periphery which comes in contact with the interior of the pump-tube, by which I am enabled to present an elastic edge or bearing that will readily yield to any irregularities or slight differences in the interior diameter of the pump-tube, and admit of its being easily drawn up, while, at the same time, it will resist moving downward." The specification states, that the largest circumference of the bucket is somewhat greater than the bore of the pump-tube; that the bucket is convex or contracted upward from that part of its outer periphery which comes in contact with the interior of the pump-tube, thereby forming an elastic edge or bearing surface, that will yield sufficiently to be easily drawn through the tube, while, at the same time, if by any accident the operator releases his hold of the crank over which the chain runs, the bucket will not drop in the tube, but will remain where the accident left it, or, in other words, the shape or form described, together with the fact that its largest circumference is at that point where it comes in contact with the interior of the pump-tube, will readily allow it to be drawn upward, and prevent its being drawn downward, or forced in the latter direction, by the weight of water above it; and that it provides the bucket with an aperture or suitable outlet, so that, when the bucket is stationary, the water remaining above it is allowed to escape back into the well or source of supply, thereby preventing the possibility of the water freezing in the tube and splitting or otherwise injuring the same. The specification then sets forth the arrangement of a button or washer and loop link, to which the bucket is attached, to make it operative with the chain. It then adds: "I am aware that elastic buckets composed of a hollow sphere are not new, and I am also aware that it is not new to provide metal pail buckets with an opening, so that, when standing, any water remaining in them will be allowed to escape, for the purpose of insuring a fresh supply of water from the well when the buckets are raised. I do not, therefore, claim such construction of buckets." The first two claims of the patent are as follows: "1. An elastic bucket for chain-pumps, adapted to fit and work in the bore of a pump-tube, to raise the water by suction, provided with a suitable orifice or outlet through which the water remaining in the pump-tube above the bucket is allowed to escape down to the source of supply, substantially as and for the purpose set forth. 2. A solid elastic bucket, having an elastic bearing edge, and its upper portion convex or contracted from said edge, whereby the bucket will readily yield to any irregularities in the pump-tube, and admit of its being easily drawn up, while, at the same time, it will resist moving downward, substantially as and for the purpose specified." There are four figures of drawings accompanying, and referred to in, the specification. Figure 1 is a perspective view of the improved bucket, with its loop and button. Figure 2 is a plan view of the button. Figure 3 is a plan of the loop before insertion through the bucket and button. Figure 4 is a vertical section of the bucket, in position for use. The aperture or outlet for the water above the bucket is shown in the drawings as a perpendicular cylindrical passage through the body of the bucket, commencing in the outer curved surface of the bucket, which is shown as a hemisphere, at a point about one-third of the way from the highest point of the curve to its lowest point, the passage being parallel to the upright parts of the link which passes through the bucket. The passage is continued through the button or washer, which is held up against the horizontal face of the bucket by the turned-up lower ends of the loop link.

The defendant has made and sold buckets for chain-pumps described in letters patent granted to him February 23d, 1875, for an "improvement in buckets for chain-pumps." He has an india rubber shell, of a cylindro-conical form, that is, a small portion of the shell extending upwards from the outer lower circular edge is cylindrical, and fits the bore of the pump-tube, and the portion above the cylindrical portion is conical in form, receding upwards from the bore of the pump-tube, and has a hole through its apex. The bottom side of the shell is bevelled inwardly from a circle concentric with the circle forming the outer lower edge, and a short distance inward from it, the bevel extending to the inner surface of the shell. Thus provision is made for inserting in the shell a solid conical metal core, which is closely embraced by the inner surface of the shell, above the inner termination of the bevel, while the free part of the shell below the inner termination of the bevel forms a highly elastic skirting, which accommodates itself closely to the bore of the pump-tube. The skirting is formed substantially of the cylindrical part of the shell. The metal cone has an eye on each end, to attach the bucket to the chain links, and a small up and down passage is made through the skirting, to allow the water in the pump-barrel to pass down when the pump is not in operation. The patent claims the chain-pump bucket described, having the cylindro-conical elastic shell fitted to the solid cone, substantially as and for the purpose set forth.

It is contended by the defendant, that matter is found in the re-issue which is not in the original patent of 1871. The drawings are identical, and there is nothing either in the specification or the claims of the re-issue which is not justified by what is found in the description or drawings of the original patent.

The defendant's bucket infringes claims one and two of the plaintiff's patent. It is an elastic bucket for a chain-pump. It is adapted to fit and work in the bore of a pump-tube, to raise water by suction. It is provided with a suitable orifice or outlet, through which the water remaining in the pump-tube above the bucket is allowed to escape down to the source of supply. The fact that, in the defendant's bucket, the passage for the drip of the water is through the skirting outside of the metal core, or is a notch in the outer edge of the skirting, and thus will drain off more of the water than will be drained in the construction shown in the plaintiff's drawings, does not relieve the defendant's bucket from being an infringement of the first claim of the plaintiff's patent. Nor does the fact that a narrow ring of water below the upper end of the passage way in the plaintiff's bucket may remain between the outer surface of the bucket and the inner surface of the pump-tube, affect the validity of the plaintiff's patent. His object was to get rid of the column of water above the tightly fitting bucket, and he accomplishes that result substantially. It is not shown that, in fact, actual difficulty has resulted from the freezing of the narrow ring of water left in the plaintiff's construction, and, if that had been shown, the cutting of the passage way nearer to the inner surface of the pump-tube is an obvious suggestion, not involving invention, and within the scope of the plaintiff's construction, and to which he is entitled as the result of the practical working of his apparatus. The defendant's bucket is a solid elastic bucket, having an elastic bearing edge, in all the practical respects in which the plaintiff's bucket is a solid elastic bucket having an elastic bearing edge. The defendant's bucket has an elastic bearing edge in the cylindrical part of the india rubber shell, and the conical upper part of the shell is contracted from said edge, so that the bucket readily yields to any irregularities in the pump-tube, and can be easily drawn up, while it resists downward movement. It does not affect the validity of the plaintiff's patent or the question of infringement, that, in practice, the plaintiff's bucket may be used with a ratchet to counteract the downward movement of the bucket induced by the weight of the column of water in the pump-tube, or that, in practice, the defendant's bucket may be used with such ratchet. In each, the tendency and operation of the bearing edge, when the bucket is left free to descend with the pressure on it of a column of water above it, are, to resist and retard the downward movement.

The plaintiff's patent is attacked for want of novelty. The defendant offered in evidence, under objection from the plaintiff that they were incompetent, five several applications for patents, filed in the patent office—Edwin Gilbert, filed February 10th, 1849, rejected May 21st, 1849; A. G. Babcock, filed September 20th, 1851; J. Powers, filed January 26th, 1852; C. F. Baragar, filed June 30th, 1859; and Orin O. Witherell, filed November 10th, 1866. The defendant also put in evidence letters patent granted to Clark Polley, December 14th, 1852; to Edmund Morris, January 23d, 1855; to Arcalous Wyckoff, April 3d, 1855; to Birdsill Holly, July 14th, 1857; to John D. Clark, December 23d, 1862; and to Emmet R. Austin, October 2d, 1866.

Mere applications for patents cannot be considered on the question of novelty. To make the things described and shown in them available, there must be evidence that such things were actually constructed in working form.

The patent to Polley shows a ball bucket, with no bearing edge and no provision for drip. The patent to Morris shows a ring with no bearing edge and no drip hole. Wyckoff's patent shows no bearing edge and no drip hole. While Holly's pump has an escape for the surplus water, his arrangement is different from that of the plaintiff, and he has not an elastic bucket with a bearing edge, nor has he a water escape through an elastic bucket. Clark's patent shows no bearing edge and no water escape. Austin's patent shows no suction pump and no pump-tube.

I find among the papers a patent granted to Orin O. Witherell, October 13th, 1868. It is not mentioned in the answer, nor can I find that it was introduced in evidence. If it is to be considered, it has no bearing edge and no water escape.

Orin O. Witherell, the same person mentioned above, has given evidence as to pump buckets constructed by him prior to the plaintiff's invention. He introduces an exhibit, A, as representing a form of bucket which he made and sold for five months, in the year 1866. It has a thin india rubber disc placed loosely above a metal disc, and the edge of the rubber disc forms a flange, which extends downward and embraces part of the depth of the metal disc. The rubber disc has a hole in the centre, through which a metal eye, fastened to the upper part of the metal disc, passes. He testifies, that the settling down of the chain, when the pumping was stopped, allowed the water above to escape through the hole in the centre of the rubber disc. His application of November 10th, 1866, and his patent of October 13th, 1868, showed no device such as is shown in Exhibit A. They showed only a rubber or elastic plate, clamped tightly between two metal plates, and thus expanded to fit the pump-tube. Witherell testifies, that he put the buckets like Exhibit A particularly into worn pump-tubes, which had had only the metal plate buckets; that, between April and August, 1866, he put buckets like Exhibit A into between 50 and 100 wells, mostly in the southeastern part of New Hampshire; that he saw one of such pumps in successful operation with them, as late as 1869; that he never used less than three of such buckets for a well, and seldom more of them; that he never knew any of them to freeze; that the back motion of the chain, after pumping was stopped, was sufficient, even when a ratchet was used, to open a central space between the rubber and the metal plate, the rubber adhering to the sides of the pump-tube, and allowing the water to escape down through the centre; that he used the buckets like Exhibit A for the purpose of fitting closely in the tube, so as to cause suction; and that he generally succeeded in establishing a suction, unless the tube was too much worn or defective. There is no testimony in contradiction of this, or throwing doubt upon the truth of the facts testified to by Witherell, or showing that buckets like Exhibit A would not operate as he testifies. Exhibit A shows an elastic bucket for a chain pump, adapted to fit and work in the bore of a pump-tube, to raise water by suction, and provided with a suitable orifice or outlet through which the water remaining in the pump-tube, above the bucket, can escape down to the source of supply. The fact that Witherell made no mention of a structure like Exhibit A in his subsequent application or patent, cannot have the effect, in the present case, to destroy the force of his affirmative direct testimony. Nor can what he did in respect to buckets like Exhibit A be regarded as an abandoned experiment. It appears to have been a successful, practical, working apparatus. If it was an elastic suction bucket, with a drip, it is of no consequence whether Witherell devised it primarily with a view to the drip, or not. Nor is it of any consequence that the hole for the link served also as a drip hole. If it allowed the water to escape, it would do so as effectually as the extra passage in the plaintiff's bucket. It may be, perhaps, that the plaintiff is entitled to some claim in respect to a drip orifice in an elastic suction bucket, but, in view of the Witherell Exhibit A, the first claim of the plaintiff's patent is too broad, and is invalid.

The record states that the plaintiff objected to the testimony of Witherell, so far as it endeavors to set up prior knowledge, manufacture or use of the devices claimed by the plaintiff as his invention, "as incompetent under the rules of the court." Again, the record states that the plaintiff objected to the reception of the testimony of Witherell, on the ground that the witness is "incompetent under the laws and rules governing practice in the circuit courts of the United States." At the hearing, the plaintiff took the objection that the evidence of Witherell, as to prior knowledge and use, could not be admitted, because the name of Witherell, and the fact of prior knowledge and use by him, were not set up in the answer. The only objection taken on the face of the record is found in what is above referred to. I do not think that is sufficient to direct the attention of the defendant to the point that the objection was based on the omission of the name of Witherell from the answer. An objection of that kind may be waived, and it is waived unless it is distinctly made. The time to make it is when the evidence is taken, and not first at the hearing. Otherwise, the defendant is taken by surprise. The fact that the defendant took the evidence shows that he intended to rely on it, and if he had been distinctly notified on the record that the plaintiff intended to rely on an objection that Witherell was not named in the answer as having prior knowledge, it is to be presumed he would have taken steps to apply for leave to amend his answer.

Witherell also introduced, in his evidence, another form of bucket made by him, Exhibit B. He testifies that he made and sold buckets like Exhibit B, after he made them like Exhibit A, and from the fall of 1866 until the fall of 1873. Exhibit B has a rubber disc compressed between two metal plates by a screw and a nut. By lubricating with oil the iron washer on the lower face of the disc, the lower part of the disc was caused to expand more than the upper part, so as to give to the lower part a bearing edge, with the part above it receding from it inwards. Exhibit B shows such construction. He says that he never used less than three of Exhibit B for a set, and seldom more; that his practice was to have the bucket fit as closely as possible, and not have the pump work too hard; that the object of the bevelled edge was to have the rubber slide easily over any roughness in the tube; that the bucket operated both by lifting and suction; that, when the bucket fitted closely, it resisted the downward run of the chain; that he set them close enough, by expansion, to draw the water up readily, and yet leave room for the water to pass back on the inside of the tube; that the water in the tube, with Exhibit B, never froze, when the bucket was properly adjusted; that he made a considerable number with the bearing edge like Exhibit B; and that he used that form in tubes that were too large to be filled by expanding the disc equally from both of its faces. This Exhibit B is a solid, elastic bucket, having an elastic bearing edge, and its upper portion convex from said edge, whereby the bucket will readily yield to any irregularities in the pump-tube, and admit of its being easily drawn up, while, at the same time, it will resist moving downward. It answers, exactly the second claim of the plaintiff's patent. A provision for the escape of the water is no part of the second claim, and the elastic bearing edge is no part of the first claim. Although Exhibit A has no elastic bearing edge, it anticipates the first claim; and although Exhibit B has no water escape, it anticipates the second claim.

The bill must be dismissed, with costs, and a like decree must be entered in the suit against Newhall.

[NOTE. Patent No. 116,138 was granted to W. C. Barker June 20, 1871; reissued June 6, 1875, (No. 6,531.) For other cases involving this patent, see Barker v. Stowe, Case No. 995; Barker v. Shoots, 18 Fed. 647; Barker v. Todd, 15 Fed. 265, 13 Fed. 473; Barker v. Stowe, 11 Fed. 303.

[In the last-mentioned case, the disposition of the principal case was held to bar a subsequent suit between the same parties for another infringement of the same patent.]

Case No. 995.

BARKER v. STOWE.

SAME v. NEWHALL.

[4 Ban. & A. 485;[1] 16 O. G. 807.]

Circuit Court, N. D. New York. Sept. Term, 1879.

PRACTICE IN CIVIL CASES—SURPRISE—MOTION FOR REHEARING—AFFIDAVIT.

1. A motion for a rehearing, in a suit for the infringement of a patent, cannot be made after the term at which the final decree was entered.

2. The necessary averments of the affidavits, in support of a motion for a rehearing, discussed.

3. The proper practice, in a case where the complainant is surprised by testimony of which no notice has been given in the answer, explained.

[In equity. Suits by William C. Barker against Deloraine F. Stowe, and by the same against Abner H. Newhall, for infringement of reissued letters patent No. 6,531. The bills were dismissed on the trial, (see Barker v. Stowe and Same v. Newhall, Case No. 994;) and plaintiff now moves to vacate the decrees, and reopen the causes for the admission of further evidence. Motion denied.]

George E. Buckley, for complainant.

Walter L. Dailey, for defendants.

BLATCHFORD, Circuit Judge. These are motions to vacate the decrees in these causes and to reopen the causes for the admission of further evidence. The decrees were made in the June term, 1878. The plaintiff makes an affidavit that after the defendants had taken their testimony he "made every effort to obtain rebutting testimony, but was not aware that he could do so; that some time after the rendering of the decision herein he was up in the New England states, and there found the witnesses whose testimony is embodied in the accompanying affidavits;" that "two of the deponents are Mr. Witherill's brothers, and one (Mr. Woodbury) his brother-in-law; one, a former partner of Mr. Witherill—that is, of Orrin O. Witherill—upon whose testimony the bills in the above cases were dismissed; that, finding that the testimony of said Witherill was directly contradicted by all these deponents, he, (deponent,) thinking that Mr. Witherill's testimony must have been misunderstood, went to Mr. Witherill in Ohio, and the said Witherill gave to him the affidavit hereto annexed, which specifically defines all the uncertain facts of his former testimony, sets forth a radically different state of facts, and is such an affidavit as, if entered regularly upon the records of the case by way of evidence, would materially affect and change the judgment of this court;" that "this evidence is newly discovered by deponent;" and that "there was nothing in the evidence of Witherill, when upon the stand, to lead deponent to find this present evidence."

[1] [Reported by Hubert A. Banning, Esq., and Henry Arden, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

Rule 88 in equity provides that—"No rehearing shall be granted after the term at which the final decree of the court shall have been entered and recorded, if an appeal lies to the supreme court."

These are suits for the infringement of a patent, and, under section 699 of the Revised Statutes, appeals lie to the supreme court in them, without regard to the sum or value in dispute. The next term after the term at which the final decrees were entered was the term commencing the second Tuesday of October, 1878, and the motions now under consideration were not given notice of till March, 1879. These motions are motions for rehearings. This would be a sufficient reason for denying the motions.

But there is a further difficulty. The affidavits now presented by the plaintiff are those of Orrin O. Witherill, Edwin E. Witherill, of Chesterfield, Massachusetts, a brother of Orrin O. Witherill and associated with him, William H. Woodbury, and Otis C. Witherill in the chain-pump business around Plaistow, New Hampshire, Raymond, New Hampshire, and that section; D. L. Tobie, of Lewiston, Maine, who, for fifty-six years prior to 1869, lived in New Gloucester, contiguous to Lewiston, and removed to Lewiston in 1869, and has been engaged in the pump business in and about Lewiston for thirty years; Thomas Clark, of Lewiston, Maine, who was in the pump business in Lewiston for ten years before 1879; William D. Ladd, of Manchester, New Hampshire, who, from 1866 to 1878, resided in Raymond, New Hampshire; Henry S. Clark, of Toledo, Ohio, who went into the chain-pump business there with Orrin O. Witherill in 1868; A. G. Whittier, of Raymond, New Hampshire, who has resided there for fourteen years last past, and is a brother-in-law of Ladd; George W. Sellars, of Toledo, Ohio; Samuel Brackett, of Lewiston, Maine, who has resided there for thirty years last past; William Sellars, of Toledo, Ohio; William H. Woodbury, of Haverhill, Massachusetts, who resided at Plaistow, New Hampshire, when Orrin O. Witherill resided there, and was his agent in the pump business, and his brother-in-law; Otis C. Witherill, of West Hampton, Massachusetts, a brother of Orrin O. Witherill, and associated with him in the pump business from 1865 to 1871 about Plaistow and Raymond, New Hampshire, and at Lewiston, Maine, and all over that section of country; John H. Seaver, of Plaistow, New Hampshire, who has resided there for thirty-eight years last past; and Elbridge G. Tucker, of Plaistow, New Hampshire.

In regard to Orrin O. Witherill's Exhibit A, he testified that he commenced the manufacture of rubber-bucket chain-pumps at Plaistow, New Hampshire; that he used Exhibit A from April, 1866, to August, 1866; that he put it into from fifty to one hundred wells, wholly in the southeastern part of New Hampshire, one place being Raymond, New Hampshire; and that he put in one for a Mr. Ladd at Raymond. In regard to his Exhibit B, he testified that he made that kind at Plaistow, New Hampshire, from August, 1866, to April, 1867; that he then went to Lewiston, Maine, and made and sold them there for a year; that he put one prior to June, 1870, into a pump at Toledo, Ohio, in a hotel kept by one Sellars; and that Otis C. Witherill, of West Hampton, Massachusetts, Edwin E. Witherill, and William H. Woodbury, of Plaistow, New Hampshire, and Joshua Brackett, of Lewiston, Maine, had buckets like Exhibit B.

After this testimony was given there was opportunity and occasion for the plaintiff to make inquiries and investigations at Plaistow, Raymond, Lewiston, and Toledo, and there to obtain the evidence of Mr. Ladd, E. E. Witherill, O. C. Witherill, Woodbury, and Brackett. In the affidavits now produced, those relating to the doings of O. O. Witherill at Plaistow are those of E. E. Witherill, Woodbury, O. C. Witherill, Seaver, and Tucker; those relating to his doings at Raymond are those of E. E. Witherill, Ladd, Whittier, and O. C. Witherill; those relating to his doings at Lewiston are those of Tobie, T. Clark, Brackett, and O. C. Witherill; those relating to the hotel at Toledo are those of H. S. Clark, G. W. Sellars, and W. Sellars.

These comprise all the affidavits produced by the plaintiff except those of himself and of O. O. Witherill. There is nothing to show that the testimony contained in all of them could not have been produced, with reasonable diligence, on the first hearing. All that the plaintiff says is, that "he made every effort to obtain rebutting testimony, but was not aware that he could do so." He does not state what efforts he made, nor that he visited any one of the places named until after the decision, or saw any one of the persons named in O. O. Witherill's testimony, or caused any inquiry to be made at any one of such places, or of any one of such persons. In regard to the affidavit of O. O. Witherill, produced by the plaintiff, it is supplemented by a subsequent affidavit of his produced by the defendants, in which he says that his evidence, given when he was examined and cross-examined, is substantially true and correct.

If the plaintiff was surprised by the testimony of O. O. Witherill, his proper course was to ask for time to investigate in regard to it, on the ground that no notice of it had been set up in the answer. But he did not do that, nor did he set up in the record the want of notice, in such a way as to make it available to him. He made his election, and took the risk of the decision, and it is now too late, under the settled rules of practice, for him to obtain relief in this suit.

I pass over various defects in the affidavits, such as want of venue, want of notarial seal, verification before a justice of the peace, and verification before the plaintiff's counsel.

The motions are denied.

[NOTE. For other cases involving this patent, see note to Barker v. Stowe, Case No. 994.]

BARKER, (UNITED STATES v.) See Cases Nos. 14,516–14,520.

Case No. 996.

BARKER v. WHITE.

[11 Blatchf. 445;[1] 19 Int. Rev. Rec. 117.]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Feb. 13, 1874.

INTERNAL REVENUE—REASSESSMENT OF TAX.

1. Under section 20 of the internal revenue act of June 30th, 1864, as amended by section 9 of the act of July 13th, 1866, (14 Stat. 104,) an assessor has power to make a supplementary assessment, increasing the amount of tax to be paid by a distiller for a given month, even though the return made by the distiller for such month was correct, and the cause of the re-assessment is a mistake made by such assessor in the first assessment, and the amount of tax first assessed was paid.

[Cited in U. S. v. Black, Case No. 14,600.]

2. But, where the tax re-assessed is paid under protest, and a suit is brought to recover it back, the re-assessment cannot be upheld, unless it is shown that the assessor, before making the re-assessment, determined that an error had been committed in the first assessment, the record of the re-assessment not being evidence of that fact.

[At law. Action by James Barker against William B. White to recover the amount of an internal revenue tax paid by plaintiff under protest to the defendant, as collector. Judgment for plaintiff.]

Thomas Harland, for plaintiff.

John A. Goodlett, Asst. Dist. Atty., for defendant.

SHIPMAN, District Judge. This action is brought to recover the sum of $3,773.73, being a tax paid by the plaintiff, under compulsion and protest, to the defendant, as collector of the 6th internal revenue district of New York.

Not long after the act of July 20th, 1868, (15 Stat. 125,) was passed, the plaintiff entered upon the business of a distiller, and, in October, November, and December, 1868, and February, 1869, made the returns to the assessor required by the statute. The assessor made an assessment for these months, and returned to the collector a duly certified list or lists containing said assessment, which was paid by the plaintiff. Subsequently, in July, 1869, the assessor made, under instructions from the commissioner of internal revenue, a supplementary assessment for said months, increasing the tax for October and November, and decreasing it for one or both of the other months. There was a total increase of $3.773.73. It is conceded that the returns of the distiller were correct. The reassessment was made in consequence of the belief of the commissioner of internal revenue that the original assessments upon said returns were erroneous, through a mistake of the assessor. Whether that belief was well or ill founded, does not now appear.

The plaintiff proved that he paid the assessment originally made by the assessor, and contained in the first list returned to the collector, that he paid, under constraint and protest, the re-assessment, and appealed to the commissioner of internal revenue, which appeal was denied, and that this action, to recover the amount last paid, was brought in due season, and here rested his case. The government was able to show simply the reassessment made by the assessor, and duly certified to the collector, but did not show wherein the error in the first assessment consisted, or that it was ever determined or ascertained that there was an error.

Upon these facts, thus proved, two questions have been discussed: (1) Where the taxpayer has made a correct return, and the assessor has made an incorrect assessment thereon, which has been paid, has the assessor, under the statute, power to make a supplementary assessment? The decision of this question depends upon the construction to be given to section 20 of the act of June 30th, 1864, as amended by section 9 of the act of July 13th, 1866, (14 Stat. 104,) which is as follows: "And, in case it shall be ascertained that the annual list, or any other list, which may have been, or which shall hereafter be, delivered to any collector, is imperfect or incomplete, in consequence of the omission of the names of any persons or parties liable to tax, or in consequence of any omission, or understatement, or undervaluation, or false or fraudulent statement contained in any return or returns made by any persons or parties liable to tax, the said assessor may, from time to time, or at any time within fifteen months from the time of the passage of this act, or from the time of the delivery of the list to the collector as aforesaid, enter on any monthly or special list the names of such persons or parties so omitted, together with the amount of tax for which they may have been, or shall become, liable, and also the names of the persons or parties in respect to whose returns, as aforesaid, there has been or shall be any omission, undervaluation, understatement, or false or fraudulent statement, together with the amounts for which such persons or parties may be liable, over and above the amount for which they may have been, or shall be, assessed upon any return or returns made as aforesaid, and shall certify or return said list to the collector, as required by law. And all provisions of law for the ascertainment of liability to any tax, or the assessment or collection thereof, shall be held to apply, as far as may be necessary, to the proceedings herein authorized and directed." It is claimed that this section confers upon the assessor power to make a supplementary list and assessment, only in case there has been an omission in the original list of the name of the person liable to tax, or in case the taxpayer has himself made an omission, or understatement, or undervaluation, or false or fraudulent statement in his return; and that, when the person liable to tax has made an entirely correct return, and the assessor has made an assessment thereon, the assessor is functus officio, and has no power to correct his own errors in his list or assessment. If this construction is the correct one, the statute has omitted to provide any remedy for the mistakes, errors, or frauds of the assessor. The assessment of taxes upon distillers, under the internal revenue acts, requires care, an accurate knowledge of the statutes, and somewhat difficult arithmetical computations. An error might easily be made by an honest assessor, which ought to be corrected. If he has no power to do it, the act is seriously imperfect. I do not think that such imperfection exists. The statute provides, that, if the original list is imperfect, or incomplete, "in consequence of the omission of the name of any persons or parties liable to tax," it can be corrected. This certainly means any omission of the name, either by reason of the oversight of the assessor, or of the neglect of the taxpayer to make a return. The omission need not necessarily be an omission arising on the part of the taxpayer, but is an omission from any cause whatever. The act then provides, that, if the list is incomplete, by reason of "any omission or understatement, or undervaluation, or false or fraudulent statement contained in any return or returns," it may be corrected. The omission, or understatement, or undervaluation, mentioned in this clause of the act, is not necessarily limited to any omission, or undervaluation, or understatement contained in a return. If the incompleteness resulted from any omission, or understatement, or undervaluation, from whatever source it arose, or from whatever cause it happened, the power is given to correct; and if the incompleteness arose from an error in the taxpayer's return, then such incompleteness may be supplied.

[1] [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

But, the correctness of this construction still further appears from the clause of the section following the one already cited. The act provides, that the assessor may enter on any monthly or special list the names of such persons or parties in respect to whose returns there has been an omission, etc., together with the true amounts for which they are liable to tax. The omission, undervaluation or understatement is one in respect to the returns, relating to or growing out of the returns, and not necessarily contained in the returns themselves. The omission or understatement is one made either in the returns by the distiller, or made by the assessor upon or in respect to the returns.

Again, the returns contain no valuations, but a sworn statement of the amount of pounds or gallons of materials used for the purpose of producing spirits, and the number of gallons distilled, placed in warehouse or sold. The valuations in the case of distillers' assessments are made by the assessor. He determines the amount of the tax which ought to be assessed in accordance with the prescribed method of computation. There can, ordinarily, be no undervaluation in the distiller's returns, although there may be omissions, or understatements, or false and fraudulent statements. The undervaluation, so far as distillers are concerned, is an erroneous computation which the assessor has made upon or in respect to the facts stated in the return, or an undervaluation growing out of a false or fraudulent statement contained in the return. In either event, the word has reference to the assessor's, and not to the distiller's acts.

I am thus led to the conclusion that the assessor has power, within the time prescribed by the act, in case of any error committed by himself in his original assessment, to make a supplementary assessment and list, giving the true amount for which the distiller is liable over and above the amount previously assessed.

(2) The second point is, whether the reassessment is presumed to be correct, without affirmative proof, on the part of the government, that there was an error in the original assessment, or, at least, without affirmative proof that, prior to the re-assessment, it had been ascertained by the assessor that there was such error.

The assessor derives his power to make a re-assessment solely from the fact that it has been ascertained that the previous list was incomplete, in consequence of omissions, undervaluations or understatements. The existence of this fact is necessary to give him authority to make the re-assessment. If the fact does not exist, he has no jurisdiction. The assessor, before he can make a new assessment, must investigate and ascertain, at least to his own satisfaction, that the previous assessment is incorrect. It is not to be presumed, from the act of the assessor in making a new assessment, that he had ascertained that there was an error in the prior assessment; for, the existence of a fact necessary to give an officer authority to act, must always be affirmatively shown. The rule, omnia praesumuntur esse rite acta, does not apply to the facts necessary to give the court jurisdiction. King v. All Saints, 1 Man. & R. 663. When an officer has authority to act, he will be presumed to act correctly; but, where the existence of a fact is necessary to give him authority, that fact must be proved. Rudd v. Johnson, 5 Litt. (Ky.) 19.

The distiller makes out his prima facie case by showing that he paid the original assessment for the same months for which he was re-assessed, and by showing his payment of the re-assessment under compulsion, his appeal, and the fact that he brought his suit within the proper time after the appeal was taken. The government, to establish a defence, cannot rely solely upon the record of a re-assessment, but should prove the jurisdictional fact necessary to exist in order to enable the assessor to make a re-assessment. That jurisdictional fact is, in my opinion, the determination or the decision of the assessor that an error had been committed. In this case, by reason of the death of the assessor, or from some other cause, it is not in the power of the government to show either the supposed error in the original assessment, or that the assessor ever ascertained that any error existed.

In the absence of any evidence on the part of the United States, except the record of the re-assessment, let judgment be entered for the plaintiff, to recover $3,773.73, with interest from the date of payment.

BARKLEY, (RONALD v.) See Case No. 12,031.

BARKSDALE, (LEWIS v.) See Case No. 8,317.

Case No. 997.

BARLEY v. CHICAGO & A. R. CO.

[4 Biss. 430.] [1]

Circuit Court, N. D. Illinois. Jan. Term, 1865.

RAILROAD COMPANIES—TRACKS ON PUBLIC STREET—RATE OF SPEED—BACKING TRAINS—LOOK-OUT—MEASURE OF DAMAGES—FORMER RECOVERY.

1. Where a railroad company is rightfully running its trains on a public street, it must do so in such a way as to be consistent with the safety of persons and property on the street.

2. Irrespective of any city ordinance, the speed must be such as to permit the stoppage of the train within a reasonable time, and the train must be provided with all usual means and appliances for stopping.

3. When the engine is backing a train there should be a look-out to give notice of any persons or obstructions.

[See Whiton v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co., Case No. 17,597.]

4. If there is steam or smoke upon the track great care and vigilance is required.

[See Barron v. Illinois C. R. Co., Case No. 1,053; Holmes v. Oregon & C. R. Co., 5 Fed. 75; Maryland v. Baltimore & P. R. Co., Case No. 9,219.]

5. In allowing damages for the killing of a child the jury cannot allow anything for the suffering or wounded feelings of the parents: they can only allow for actual pecuniary loss. If the family is poor, the fact that the boy would probably have early commenced to assist in supporting the family may be taken into consideration.

6. A recovery in a former action for medical attendance, expenses, loss of service and time before his death, does not affect the damages recoverable under the statute for death.

At law. This was an action on the case under the statute by Patrick Barley, administrator of the estate of Benjamin Barley, deceased, [against Chicago & Alton Railroad Company,] to recover damages for the death of said Benjamin by the alleged negligence of the defendant.

The statute of Illinois is as follows:

"§ 1. Whenever the death of a person shall be caused by wrongful act, neglect or default, and the act, neglect or default is such as would, if death had not ensued, have entitled the party injured to maintain an action and recover damages in respect thereof, then and in every such case, the person who or company or corporation which would have been liable if death had not ensued, shall be liable to an action for damages, notwithstanding the death of the person injured, and although the death shall have been caused under such circumstances as amount in law to felony.

"§ 2. Every such action shall be brought by and in the names of the personal representatives of such deceased person, and the amount recovered in every such action shall be for the exclusive benefit of the widow and next-of-kin of such deceased person, and shall be distributed to such widow and next-of-kin in the proportion provided by law in relation to the distribution of personal property left by persons dying intestate; and in every such action the jury may give such damages as they shall deem a fair and just compensation, with reference to the pecuniary injuries resulting from such death to the wife and next-of-kin of such deceased person, not exceeding the sum of $5,000: provided, that every such action shall be commenced within two years after the death of such person." 1 Gross, St. p. 60; Rev. St. 1874, p. 582.

[1] [Reported by Josiah H. Bissell, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

In March, 1863, a train of defendant, consisting of an engine and three freight cars, was proceeding north on Beach street in the city of Chicago, and the son of the plaintiff, a boy between seven and eight years of age, was standing upon the track, having a bag of shavings on his arm. The engine was pushing the cars, and was on the south end of the train, so that the first car struck the boy and he was crushed under the wheels and finally died. [Verdict for plaintiff.]

A. W. Church, for defendant.

DRUMMOND, District Judge, (charging jury.) Under the statute in force in this state, the father, having taken out letters of administration, sues the defendant to recover damages for the loss which has been sustained, in the language of the statute, "by the next-of-kin" in consequence of the death of the child by the alleged negligence of the defendant.

The first question to be determined, therefore, is, Was it the negligence of defendant that caused his death?

Beach street was a public street and the defendant had a track laid on it. No law has been introduced on the subject, but it has been taken for granted that the defendant was rightfully on the street with its engine and cars. It being a public street, however, it is clear that it could be used by the defendant only in such way as to be consistent with the safety of persons and property. While the defendant has a right to use the street, the citizens of the town, and of the country also, have a right to use it in passing over it with their persons and property. There was no particular portion of the street upon which the track of the road was to be laid. The railroad company simply had the right to use it for the purpose of trains which might be going over the road. The right of the user must be consistent with that of the public on the street.

Without undertaking to determine whether the ordinances of the city could prescribe the speed of the engine and cars so as to render it binding upon the public and upon the defendant,—as by declaring that a certain rate of speed was or was not negligence,—still it is clear that in running an engine and cars upon a street, it should be only with such speed as might enable the engineer, in case of obstruction by persons passing, to stop his train within a reasonable time. The train should be provided with the usual means and appliances to stop it; there should be a proper and sufficient look-out kept upon the train, and I think that would be, in such a case as this, a person watching where the danger was. The locomotive was at the rear end of the cars, they preceding the locomotive. I think there should be a person watching the track so as to enable the engineer to know wnen there was an obstruction upon it, so that the train could be stopped in a reasonable time, if it should be such as could not leave the track. To take an illustration: If a person on the train were to see any one walking along the track or crossing, there would be a reasonable presumption that that person would get out of the way of the train, but if there was a drunken man lying on the track, who would not be presumed to get out of the way, in such a case it is clear that the conduct of those having the management of the train ought to be entirely different from what it would be in the other case.

We are to take the facts as they are at the time, in order to prescribe the true rule of diligence on the subject; so if there was a little helpless child on the track, the conduct of those having the management of the train should be different,—there should be greater caution.

The evidence shows that the train was running from seven to eight miles an hour. It seems to be thought that is a reasonable speed, fast enough, at any rate in a populous city, over a frequented thoroughfare. It is as fast as a train ought to be permitted to go, as it seems to me. But it is for the jury to determine whether the train was running at an unusual or improper speed. If it was, then the defendant was guilty of a wrongful act.

So in relation to the look-out. Were those on the train watchful and careful in observing the track? One of the witnesses, who was sitting down upon the top of the car, says he was looking eastwardly—not where the train was going. Another says he was in another car looking north. Was he under such circumstances as to enable him to see, and did he see, what was on the track? If there was negligence in this respect, did it contribute to the accident?

Then, after it was ascertained that there was something upon the track, was there proper skill and diligence used in order to arrest the train as soon as possible, and if not, did that contribute to the result?

These are questions proper for you to determine under all the circumstances of the case.

It is said that there was steam and smoke which shut out the view of those on the train and prevented them from seeing the track as they otherwise would have done. The only remark that the court would make in reference to that is, that if it were so, it was incumbent on them to redouble their diligence and to run the train with greater caution. They ought to know, I think, when they are running upon our streets, where they are going. They ought to see, so far as the circumstances of the case will permit, what they are going to encounter.

The next question is, was the boy himself guilty of any negligence which contributed in any substantial degree to the destruction of his own life?

There is a very embarrassing question in all cases of this kind. It is almost impossible for a court to lay down any fixed or permanent rule to guide you upon a subject such as this. The language of the law is, that the jury shall give such damages as have been sustained by the next-of-kin in dollars and cents by the destruction of the life of the person. It must be with reference to the pecuniary loss—I mean the loss which has been sustained in this case by the next-of-kin—that investigation is to be made and conclusion arrived at.

This was a boy of tender years. The pecuniary injury which was sustained must, of course, be with reference, almost exclusively, to prospective benefits which might have been derived by the continuance in life of the boy. At the time, he probably was rather a burden than a benefit pecuniarily to his family. The court has adverted to various illustrations during the progress of the cause, for the purpose of serving to some extent as guides to you in arriving at a correct conclusion upon the subject; for instance, as to what would be the pecuniary value of the services of a boy like this, taking his intelligence, his health, his chances of life, the amount which he could earn up to the time that he would arrive at the age of twenty-one years. The court refers to this, not as the only element in the case, but as a very important one, which may guide you. Of course this is, after all, a speculative view in relation to it. It is somewhat conjectural and must be in the mind of every man what may be the value of services of a boy like this. The difficulty in this case is that it is almost impossible for you to separate, as it is your bounden duty to do, the suffering and anguish which the friends have sustained; and the suffering which the victim has passed through, from the mere pecuniary consideration of the matter. You cannot allow anything for pain or mental anguish which these parties, or any of them, have sustained. You have nothing to do with that. It becomes simply a question of dollars and cents.

The family, it seems, is a poor family, living by the daily labors of the father. It is probable, in the natural course of things, that this boy, if he had lived, would have been employed by his father toward the support of the family, and it is proper for you to take all this into consideration. Taking into consideration all these various changes and chances of human life, health, sickness, and all these things, it is for you to say how much you think, as reasonable and intelligent men, on your consciences and on your oaths, has been the loss to these parties—the pecuniary loss—by the death of this boy.

As to the other action which was tried, [unreported,] I am of opinion that that does not prevent the plaintiff from recovering in this action. In that case the defendant strenuously resisted the right of plaintiff to recover anything beyond the loss of service for the child during his life and whatever expenses were incurred by the plaintiff, and for the loss of time, and so on; and the court sustained the view of the defendant, and confined the jury in damages to those elements. This action is not brought for the identical cause of action upon which the jury were permitted by the court to pass in that case. This action is brought to recover, as I have already said, the pecuniary loss which these parties have sustained by the death of the boy, and of course the court thinks that the result in that case does not prevent the plaintiff from recovering in this, and I hardly think that it can have any effect by way of diminishing the damages which might be recovered, because the damages in that case were confined to specific things, and the court must presume that the jury found damages in conformity with the instructions of the court. Those were, as appeared by the instructions of the court, for the loss of service of the child from the time of the injury until he died, for medical attendance, funeral expenses and the loss of time of plaintiff and wife, by reason of his accident, from the time of its occurrence until the commencement of the suit. It would not be proper for you to allow anything whatever for any of these things; you are not to take them into consideration at all. They have been allowed by a former jury. You cannot allow them a second time.

Verdict for plaintiff.

NOTE, [from original report.] See, further, as to the great caution required of railroad companies in passing along streets, Bellefontaine & I. R. Co. v. Snyder, 18 Ohio St. 399; Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Gregory, 58 Ill. 226. The law places no restriction upon the rate of speed at crossings; the company has the preference. Warner v. New York Cent. R. Co., 44 N. Y. 465. This was a country crossing. "In crossing ordinary roads, caution and care are chiefly demanded to avoid running against or over anybody else; in crossing railroads, it is exacted to avoid being run over yourself. In the former case the blame attaches prima facie to the party doing the injury; in the latter it attaches, in the first instance, to the party obstructing the track." Telfer v. Northern R. Co., 30 N. J. Law, 188. And as to the company's duty in keeping a lookout, see Bellefontaine & I. R. Co. v. Snyder, supra; Bannon v. Baltimore & O. R. Co., 24 Md. 108. That the same circumstances will create different degrees of negligence and duty, see Boland v. Missouri R. Co., 36 Mo. 484; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Dewey, 26 Ill. 255; O'Mara v. Hudson River R. Co., 38 N. Y. 445. Contra, Bannon v. Baltimore & O. R. Co., 24 Md. 108. For authorities as to computing damages, same as in the text, see Telfer v. Northern R. Co., supra; City of Chicago v. Major, 18 Ill. 349. For an exhaustive collection of authorities on the rule of damages in actions of this kind, see Sedg. Dam. 552, note 2. See, also, Brady v. City of Chicago, [Case No. 1,796.]

Case No. 998.

BARLOW v. BARNER.

[1 Dill. 418.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Kansas. 1871.

STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS—WRITTEN ACKNOWLEDGMENT.

The statute of Kansas respecting the written acknowledgment, required to take a case out of the statute of limitations, construed and applied.

[At law.] This was an action on a promissory note apparently barred by the statute of limitations. The statute of the state of Kansas provides, that "In any case founded on contract, when any part of the principal or interest shall have been paid, or an acknowledgment of an existing liability, debt, or claim, or any promise to pay the same shall have been made, an action may be brought in such case within the period prescribed for the same; but such acknowledgment or promise must be in writing, signed by the party to be charged thereby." Gen. St. 1868, p. 634. To show an acknowledgment in writing, of an existing liability, within the meaning of this statute, the plaintiff produced certain letters from the defendant to the plaintiff's attorney, as follows:

First Letter:—"Your favor is at hand. I was somewhat surprised to find you in possession of that somewhat celebrated note. Now have you got possession of that note? and if so, what are your instructions, and what is your authority in the premises? If you have the note, please state for what sum you are authorized to send it to me. Without going into detail, I just say to you that it will never be paid. I might suffer still further to have it up."

Second Letter:—"Yours in relation to Mrs. Barlow's claim is at hand. I have already written you that I would not pay it, but still, was willing to give something. I wrote Messrs. Grant & Smith, attorneys, at one time, that I would give $200.00, which they refused to accept. I thought then, and think now, that was, and is, all I ought to give. If she wants something, why don't she say how much, to be done with it?"

Third Letter:—"Yours of a late date, I found on my return, Saturday night. I leave again this morning, will answer you some of these days, but don't know what I can answer. That note took up a due bill previously given for money to loan for Mrs. Barlow, which was deposited in Cook & Sargeant's bank, just before their failure. I never got to the amount of one cent for it."

[Judgment for defendant.]

D. Brier, for plaintiff.

A. Williams, for defendant.

PER CURIAM, (MILLER, Circuit Justice, and DILLON, Circuit Judge, concurring.) Courts, by their decisions as to the effect of loose and unsatisfactory oral admissions and new promises, had almost frittered away the statute of limitations; and to remedy this, statutes similar to the one in force in this state have been quite generally enacted.

The statute of Kansas requires the acknowledgment to be in writing and signed by the party, and the acknowledgment must be of an existing liability with respect to the contract upon which a recovery is sought. The letters relied on by the plaintiff do not acknowledge an existing liability, but rather repel it.

Judgment for the defendant.

[1] [Reported by Hon. John F. Dillon, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

BARLOW, (UNITED STATES v.) See Case No. 14,521.

Case No. 999.

In re BARMAN.

[14 N. B. R. 125; 3 N. Y. Wkly. Dig. 111.]

District Court, E. D. Michigan. March 29, 1876.

BANKRUPTCY—UNRECORDED CHATTEL MORTGAGE.

[1. An unrecorded chattel mortgage for a sufficient consideration is valid, as between the mortgagor and mortgagee, although possession of the mortgaged property is not taken by the latter.]

[Following Sawyer v. Turpin, 91 U. S. 114.]

[2. A chattel mortgage made more than 60 days prior to bankruptcy, for a present consideration, but not filed for record until within 60 days of bankruptcy, is valid, as against the claim of the assignee in bankruptcy.]

[Cited in Platt v. Preston, Case No. 11,219.]

[See Coggeshall v. Potter, Case No. 2,955; Douglass v. Vogeler, 6 Fed. 53. Contra, In re Leland, Case No. 8,234; In re Eldridge, Id. 4,330; Harvey v. Crane, Id. 6,178; Moore v. Young, Id. 9,782.]

In bankruptcy.

[Petition by Sigmund Rothschild, assignee of a chattel mortgage made by Abram and William Barman to Barnard Barman August 9, 1873, filed December 8, 1873, but possession not taken thereunder until January, 1874, to compel the assignee in bankruptcy of Abram and William Barman to pay over the proceeds realized by sale of the mortgaged property. The bankruptcy proceedings were commenced Feb. 5, 1874. Barnard Barman filed proof of his debt April 27, 1874, and assigned the debt to petitioner June 17, 1875. Petition granted.]

F. E. Driggs, for petitioner.

Don. M. Dickinson, for assignee in bankruptcy.

BROWN, District Judge. It is conceded in this case that the mortgage was given in August, 1873, for a loan of money then made, and that it would have been valid, if then filed, as against bankrupt proceedings; but it is insisted that, as it was not filed until December, it must be regarded, as against creditors and the assignee of the bankrupt, as taking effect from that date. Had it been given in December, for money loaned in August, the mortgagor then being insolvent, and the mortgagee knowing the fact, it would, undoubtedly, have been void as against the assignee; but the mere failure to file it at the time it was executed would not make it invalid, unless intervening rights had accrued by attachment or subsequent conveyance or incumbrance of the property. I regard the case as settled by the opinion of the supreme court, in Sawyer v. Turpin, [91 U. S. 114,] where the court observes, with reference to a similar instrument: "Having bene executed more than four months before the petition in bankruptcy was filed, there is nothing in the case to show that it was invalid. True it was not recorded, and it may be doubted whether it was admissible to record. True no possession was taken under it by the vendee, but for neither of these reasons was it less operative between the parties. It might not have been a protection against attaching creditors, if there had been any, but there were none. It was in the power of Turpin to put it on record any day, if the recording acts applied to such an instrument, and equally within his power to take possession of the property at any time before other rights against it had accrued." In Mitchell v. Black, 72 Mass. [6 Gray,] 100, the court, in speaking of the registration of mortgages, says: "The time when the record shall be made is not specifically described by the statute, though it must, undoubtedly, precede the possession by others subsequently acquiring an interest in the mortgaged property; to prevent it passing to them, it will be sufficient that the record is made at any time before such possession is taken, though it be long after the execution of the mortgage." It was further held, in the first case above cited, that even if there had been an agreement between the mortgagor and mortgagee that the instrument should not be recorded, but should be kept secret, it would be of no importance. I think this case practically determines the one at bar, and that the prayer of the petitioner must be granted.

[NOTE. In re Oliver, Case No. 10,492, states that In re Barman was decided on the strength of Sawyer v. Turpin, 91 U. S. 114, as the supreme court had not then settled the construction to be given to the word "creditors" in the Michigan statutes, but that, the statute having since been construed in Fearey v. Cummings, 41 Mich. 376, 1 N. W. 946, the court will now follow the construction given by the state court.]

BARNABO, (UNITED STATES v.) See Case No. 14,522.

Case No. 1,000.

Ex parte BARNARD.

[4 Cranch, C. C. 294.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. March Term, 1833.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—EMINENT DOMAIN.

1. The act of Maryland of 1785, c. 49, respecting [the taking of land for] private roads or ways, is not repugnant to the constitution of the United States.

2. And [such act] is in force in the county of Washington, D. C.

[Petition by Robert Barnard and William Morton to condemn land for a private way under Act Md. 1785, c. 49. Surveyor's report confirmed.]

The surveyor having laid out a way according to a former order of the court, and having made his report, and a rule having been served on the possessors of the land through which, &c., to show cause, &c.

Mr. R. S. Coxe, for Mr. Mackall, objected.

The act of Maryland of 1785, c. 49, was passed before the amendment of the constitution of the United States, which forbids the taking of private property for public use without just compensation. The act of 1785 does not provide for just compensation, and being repugnant to the constitution of the United States, is void. But this land is not to be taken for public use. It is to be a private way, for private use; and it is not competent for any legislature to take the property of one man and give it to another, even with compensation. By that act, the court, and not the jury, is to ascertain the compensation; which is unconstitutional. Van Horn v. Dorrance, [Case No. 16,857.] Besides, the petitioners have not made out a case of necessity. The old way cannot now be lawfully stopped. It has been opened and used for forty years, and a grant may now be presumed. Aspindall v. Brown, 3 Term R. 265; 2 Dane, Abr. p. 256, c. 79, art. 4; Alban v. Brounsall, Yel. 163; Chichester v. Lethbridge, Willes, 71; Reignolds v. Edwards, Id. 282; Gayetty v. Bethune, 14 Mass. 49; 3 Dane, Abr. p. 250, art. 13; Campbell v. Wilson, 3 East, 294; Dexter v. Hazen, 10 Johns. 246; 3 Dane, Abr. p. 252, arts. 16, 17; 2 Johns. 424; Cincinnati v. White, 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 431.

Mr. Redin, for the petitioners, referred to the following act of Maryland respecting streets in Georgetown, namely, 1797, c. 56, § 6, and the acts of congress of March 3, 1805, § 12, (2 Stat. 334,) and March 3, 1809, § 4, (2 Stat. 538.) He also cited Greenwood v. Stoner, 3 Har. & J. 435; Howton v. Frearson, 8 Term R. 50; Dutton v. Tayler, 2 Lutw. 1487; Clark v. Cogge, Cro. Jac. 170; Staple v. Heydon, 6 Mod. 3, 4; 1 Rolle, Abr. p. 936, pl. 10.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

Mr. Key, on the same side.

The constitutional objection has been overruled in the cases of the Chesapeake & Ohio Canal Co. The act of 1785 has always been acted upon in Maryland.

THE COURT (nem. con.) confirmed the report of the surveyor, and allowed $130 for compensation, namely, 2½ acres at $30, and $55 for fencing.

BARNARD, (ADAMS v.) See Case No. 45.

Case No. 1,001.

BARNARD et al. v. CONGER.

[6 McLean, 497.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Michigan. June Term, 1855.

MEASURE OF DAMAGES—CONTRACT OF SALE.

1. Where a person has agreed to deliver a quantity of lumber at specified prices, and he fails to comply with his contract, the plaintiff is entitled to recover in damages the difference in price between the lumber contracted for, and the market price at the place of delivery.

2. If the market price at the place of delivery was as low, or lower, than the price agreed to be paid in the contract, the plaintiff will be entitled to no damages. The rule is, that no damages can be recovered where none have been sustained.

[At law. Action by Barnard and Lockwood against Conger for breach of a contract to deliver certain lumber. Verdict for defendant.]

Mr. Clark, for plaintiffs.

Emmons & Jones, for defendant.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This action is founded upon a contract for the delivery of five hundred thousand feet of lumber, at Albany, in New York, at certain prices stipulated, dated 19th of April, 1854; to be delivered the same year before the close of navigation, of the first and second quality. The defendant was permitted to deliver, at the prices stated, as he might choose. Thirty-two dollars for the clear, per thousand feet, and twenty-four dollars for the second quality. Two hundred thousand feet of said lumber, which may be delivered, shall be counted at two dollars per thousand feet less than the prices above named, in consideration that the said Barnard & Son advanced to said Conger on the contract the sum of three thousand dollars, they charging interest on said advance from the payment, until the money shall be repaid by the delivery of that amount of lumber. The delivery to be made at the plaintiff's wharf in Albany.

It was proved that in the summer and fall of 1854, the market price of clear lumber was thirty-five dollars per thousand feet; twenty-seven dollars per thousand for the second quality. Other witnesses stated that in September and October, 1854, lumber sold, first quality for thirty-four dollars per thousand, and second quality for twenty-four dollars. Boat loads sold, at first quality, thirty-two dollars, second quality, from twenty-two to twenty-three dollars per thousand.

The court instructed the jury, that if lumber embraced by the contract was worth more in the market in Albany than the prices stipulated in the contract to be paid to the defendant at the period within which the lumber was to be delivered, the plaintiff was entitled to recover, by way of damages, the difference. But if the price of lumber in the Albany market was as low or lower than the prices agreed to be paid by the plaintiff, he suffered no damage by the failure of the defendant. If the plaintiff with the money in hand, could, in the market at Albany, purchase lumber at the same price that he had agreed to pay the defendant, he was entitled to no compensation, as he sustained no loss.

A sale of lumber in small quantities or by retail, will not fix the prices in the present case; nor would prices paid for a much larger amount than is named in the contract, fix the price. This would bring down the price too low, while the retail price would place it too high. The true rule will be found in such quantities as provided for in the contract, and if you shall find that a purchase could have been made by the plaintiff, at the time the defendant should have delivered the lumber, at the contract or a less price than that agreed to be paid, at the place of delivery, the plaintiff is entitled to no damages.

The three thousand dollars advanced, with the interest, it is understood will be satisfactorily arranged. The jury found a verdict for the defendant.

BARNARD, (DILLON v.) See Case No. 3,915.

Case No. 1,002.

BARNARD v. FARWELL.

[Cited in Bradley v. Converse, Case No. 1,776. Nowhere reported; opinion not now accessible.]

BARNARD, (GIBSON v.) See Case No. 5,389.

Case No. 1,003.

BARNARD et al. v. HARTFORD, P. & F. R. CO. et al.[1]

Circuit Court, D. Connecticut. Oct. 14, 1878.

EQUITY—PARTIES—ASSIGNEE IN BANKRUPTCY—CROSS BILL.

[1. Under the bankrupt act of 1867, § 2, a circuit court has jurisdiction of a cross bill, filed

[1] [Reported by Hon. John McLean, Circuit Justice.]

[1] [Not previously reported.]

by an assignee in bankruptcy in a district other than that in which the decree in bankruptcy was made, to redeem mortgaged property in which the complainant has the legal title to the equity of redemption.]

[2. The jurisdiction acquired by a circuit court sitting in equity, by virtue of the character of the complainant as assignee in bankruptcy, is not lost merely because the complainant has parted with all his title pendente lite; and the court also has jurisdiction of a cross bill filed by a new defendant, irrespective of his residence.]

[3. Where a sole complainant parts with his interest pendente lite, the suit is not thereby forthwith abated, but no further proceedings can be had until his assignee is made a party, either by being cited in, or as successor to one of the original defendants.]

[4. Where a corporation has obtained the title of one of the original defendants pendente lite, it may properly become a defendant, and seek relief by a cross bill, although it has also acquired the sole complainant's title pendente lite, and could come in as complainant.]

[5. Where a cross bill setting up additional facts, and praying for affirmative and independent relief against the other defendants, introduces no distinct and separate matter, a decree dismissing the original bill (the complainant having no longer any interest) does not dispose of the cross bill, and the cross complainant may obtain the relief prayed for therein, notwithstanding such decree.]

[6. Where plaintiffs have lost their title to the equity of redemption of mortgaged property by operation of law, and it has become vested in the corporation which brings the cross bill, the only other party with a substantial interest being another defendant, the mere fact that pendente lite the plaintiffs have lost their interest, and consequently no decree is asked either for or against them, should not prevent the party entitled to redeem from gaining its rights.]

[7. The N. Y. & N. E. R. Co. had the apparent legal title to the equity of redemption of a mortgage on the H., P. & F. R. Co., which was held and operated by the mortgage trustees, and had raised $1,500,000 to pay off the mortgage, and had actually paid and canceled $850,000 of the mortgage bonds, and stood ready to pay the remnant. It also proposed to complete the road, and thereby enhance its value. A suit in equity brought by the stockholders of the H., P. & F. R. Co. was pending in a state court to render void the title of the N. Y. & N. E. R. Co. to the H., P. & F. R. Co. because of fraud. Held, that the N. Y. & N. E. R. Co. was entitled to possession pending the said suit as legal owner of the equity of redemption, and as, in equity, the owner of the mortgage which it had paid.]

[In equity. Bill by George M. Barnard, Charles S. Bradley, and Charles R. Chapman, assignees in bankruptcy of the Boston, Hartford & Erie Railroad Company, against the Hartford, Providence & Fishkill Railroad Company, George M. Bartholomew, Calvin Day, and Francis B. Cooley, trustees under a mortgage of the property of said railroad in Connecticut, certain trustees under a mortgage of the property of said railroad in Rhode Island, and William F. Hart and other trustees under a mortgage of all the property of the Boston, Hartford & Erie Railroad Company; praying that the plaintiffs might redeem the Connecticut mortgage, of which the bankrupt road had the equity of redemption. Pendente lite, Hart and his cotrustees, their mortgage having been foreclosed, conveyed to the New York & New England Railroad Company all their rights, including the equity of redemption of the Connecticut mortgage, which company subsequently acquired all the title of the assignees in bankruptcy, and was thereafter made a party defendant. A motion by Bartholomew and his cotrustees to dismiss the bill for lack of jurisdiction had been overruled. Heard on a cross bill by the New York & New England Railroad Company, praying that it might redeem the Connecticut mortgage, and have its title quieted. Decree for cross complainant, saving the rights of the stockholders of the Hartford, Providence & Fishkill Railroad Company.]

Charles E. Perkins, for plaintiffs.

Simeon E. Baldwin, for New York & N. E. R. Co.

John C. Day and Alvan P. Hyde, for trustees under the Connecticut mortgages, and for Hartford, P. & F. R. Co.

George W. Baldwin, for Berdell trustees.

SHIPMAN, District Judge. The Hartford, Providence & Fishkill Railroad Company, a corporation established by the legislature of Connecticut and of Rhode Island, mortgaged to Thomas S. Williams, William H. Imlay and David F. Robinson, as trustees, by deeds dated August 25, 1849, and March 20, 1855, its railroad, franchises, and, with certain exceptions, its real estate then owned, or thereafter to be owned, by it in the state of Connecticut, and also its cars, engines and personal estate then owned, or thereafter to be acquired, to secure certain bonds of said company. In the year 1858, there having been default in the payment of said bonds or of the interest thereon, said trustees or their successors took possession of the mortgaged estate, and either said trustees or their successors in said trust have ever since been in possession and have managed said mortgaged property, and have operated said road for the benefit of the bondholders. Calvin Day, George M. Bartholomew and Francis B. Cooley, all of Hartford, Connecticut, are now, and long have been, the trustees and are the duly appointed successors of the said Williams, Imlay and Robinson in said trust. On September 30, 1878, $1,574,500 of said bonds secured by said mortgage were overdue, outstanding, and unpaid. By a contract, lease and conveyance dated August 28, 1863, authorized by the states of Connecticut and Rhode Island, said company sold, leased and transferred, subject to its mortgages in Connecticut and Rhode Island, all its property and franchises to the Boston, Hartford & Erie Railroad Company, whereby the legal title to the equity of redemption in said mortgaged property passed to and became vested in the last-named company. On March 19, 1866, the Boston, Hartford & Erie Railroad Company mortgaged to Robert H. Berdell, Dudley S. Gregory, and J. Bancroft Davis, as trustees, all its railroad property, to secure $20,000,000 of bonds, which mortgage is usually known as the "Berdell Mortgage." Said mortgage purported to include and convey, and did convey, the rights and property acquired by the last-named company from the Hartford, Providence & Fishkill Railroad Company. A large amount of bonds were issued and were sold to sundry persons upon the faith of this mortgage. On March 2, 1871, the Boston, Hartford & Erie Railroad Company was duly adjudicated a bankrupt by the district court of the United States for the district of Massachusetts, and on March 18, 1871, George M. Barnard, Charles S. Bradley, and Charles R. Chapman were duly appointed assignees in bankruptcy of said company, and became qualified as such, and received an assignment of its estate in due form of law. On March 15, 1873, said assignees filed in this court their bill in equity against the Hartford, Providence & Fishkill Railroad Company, said Day, Bartholomew and Cooley, as trustees, William F. Hart, Charles P. Clark and George T. Olyphant, the existing trustees under the Berdell mortgage, and the trustees under a mortgage of said company of its real estate and property in Rhode Island, setting up all the foregoing facts, and praying that the Connecticut trustees account to the plaintiffs, and that said assignees might redeem said mortgaged property, and that the Connecticut trustees should be directed to deliver possession of the property which was mortgaged to them to said assignees. All parties appeared save the Rhode Island trustees. The Connecticut trustees, at the April term, 1874, of this court, moved to dismiss the bill, upon the ground that the court had no jurisdiction of the case by reason of the citizenship of the parties; this motion was overruled, for the reason that jurisdiction was conferred upon this court by the second section of the bankrupt act of 1867. Answers were thereafter filed by the defendants.

On July 1, 1870, the Boston, Hartford & Erie Company made default of payment of the interest due upon the Berdell mortgage. On September 13, 1871, the Berdell mortgage trustees took possession of all the property covered by that mortgage so far as they were able to do so, and continued in possession for the period of eighteen months. On April 2, 1872, the principal of the Berdell mortgage bonds became due. At the expiration of said eighteen months, said default continuing, the Berdell mortgage bondholders were duly constituted, agreeably to the terms of said mortgage, a corporation, by the name of the New York & New England Railroad Company, for the purpose of acquiring and holding the title by foreclosure of the mortgaged property. Afterwards, by acts of the legislature of Massachusetts, Connecticut, Rhode Island and New York, this corporation was fully incorporated. On April 24, 1873, the Berdell mortgage trustees, pursuant to decrees of courts having jurisdiction of the subject-matter, said mortgage having been duly foreclosed by said decrees, conveyed to the New York & New England Railroad Company the rights, franchises and estate conveyed by and included in the Berdell mortgage. This corporation thereupon entered into possession of said property, and still continues in such possession. On July 28, 1875, the assignees in bankruptcy of the Boston, Hartford & Erie Railroad Company conveyed to the New York & New England Railroad Company all their right in and to the railroad, rights, franchises and estates of said bankrupt corporation, subject to a proviso that nothing contained in said conveyance should be construed to affect the rights of stockholders, if any, of the Hartford, Providence & Fishkill Railroad Company, and stipulated that such disposition might be made of this bill as should carry out the intent of said conveyance. On September 2, 1878, pursuant to an application dated August 23, 1878, and an order of notice thereon, the New York & New England Railroad Company was admitted as a party defendant to said bill, with liberty to file such plea, answer or cross bill as it might be advised. Said company subsequently filed a cross bill, setting forth all the foregoing facts, and averring that they are ready and willing to pay the principal and interest of all the bonds secured by the Connecticut mortgages of the Hartford, Providence & Fishkill Railroad Company, and to redeem the property covered by said mortgages, and praying that all the parties to said bill save the trustees under the Rhode Island mortgages, who had never been served with process, might answer and show cause why the prayer should not be granted, and that said Connecticut trustees might account to the New York & New England Railroad Company, and might, upon payment of said bonds, deliver up the property covered by the Connecticut mortgages, and make such assurances and conveyances as might be deemed proper, and that its title might be quieted as against all the defendants in the cross bill. All said defendants have answered, and have substantially admitted all the facts hereinbefore stated to be true.

The Connecticut trustees and the Hartford, Providence & Fishkill Railroad Company, in their answer, aver that on or about December 30, 1875, the Boston & Providence Railroad Company, and Earl P. Mason, of Providence, Rhode Island, notified, in writing, Calvin Day, the president of the Hartford, Providence & Fishkill Railroad Company, that they, with others owners of shares in the capital stock of said company, claimed to be the then owners of the rights, property and franchises of said company, subject to certain mortgages thereon, and requested said Day, as an officer of said company, and in its name, to commence legal proceedings for the redemption of said mortgages, and to invalidate the pretended title of said Boston, Hartford & Erie Railroad Company and all persons claiming under them, which request was not complied with, and that on December 31, 1875, a bill in equity was filed in the supreme court of the state of Rhode Island, by the Boston & Providence Railroad Company, and sundry others, in behalf of themselves and such other owners and holders of stock of the Hartford, Providence & Fishkill Railroad Company as shall come in and contribute to the expenses of said suit, against the New York & New England Railroad Company, and the Connecticut & Rhode Island trustees under the mortgages of the Hartford, Providence & Fishkill Railroad Company; praying that the conveyances by said company to the Boston, Hartford & Erie Railroad company be declared to be void, and that the right and title of the New York & New England Railroad Company to the property and franchises of the Hartford, Providence & Fishkill Railroad Company be declared to be void, and that the plaintiffs be decreed to be entitled to the possession of the property of the last-named company upon the redemption of the valid mortgages thereon, and that said trustees may be restrained from delivering to the New York & New England Railroad Company the possession and control of said property, in which suit the trustees under the Connecticut mortgages were not served with process. Said suit is still pending. On September 30, 1878, a suit in equity in favor of substantially the same plaintiffs against the same defendants was commenced in the superior court for Hartford county in this state. The bill embraces substantially the same allegations and prayers as those contained in the bill which was filed in the supreme court of the state of Rhode Island, and the Connecticut trustees have been served with process. Upon the hearing in this court upon pleadings and proofs, it appeared that on or about July 1, 1878, the New York & New England Railroad Company gave public and general notice, by advertisement and otherwise, that the bonds issued under the Connecticut mortgages would be paid in full at the American National Bank in the city of Hartford on October 1, 1878, with interest to said date, and that interest would thereafter cease; that said company provided itself with funds sufficient to pay said bonds, and on October 1, 1878, commenced said payment at said bank; that about $850,000 of bonds had been presented, paid, surrendered and cancelled on October 9, 1878; that the money due upon about $500,000 of bonds held by the city of Hartford had been tendered its treasurer, who declined to receive the same until authorized by vote of the court of common council of said city; that money sufficient to pay all the outstanding bonds was on deposit for that purpose; and that the outstanding bonds were constantly being presented and paid. Said company offered to deposit in court money sufficient to pay the principal and interest of all said bonds, or otherwise comply with the order of court touching said payment.

Upon the foregoing facts, the trustees under the Connecticut mortgages present two questions for the consideration of the court;

1st. It being apparent that, prior to the conveyance of the assignees in bankruptcy to the New York & New England Railroad Company, the title of such assignees to the equity of redemption had become lost by foreclosure of the Berdell mortgage, and that no decree in regard to redemption or foreclosure is asked for or against the plaintiffs, can the court properly render any other decree than one of dismissal of the bill?

The original bill was brought by assignees in bankruptcy in a circuit court in a district other than that in which the decree of bankruptcy was made, to redeem a mortgage upon property in which the plaintiffs had an equity of redemption. Of this suit, this court had jurisdiction. Lathrop v. Drake, 91 U. S. 516. At the time suit was brought, the assignees had the title to the property subject to the various mortgages thereon, and had the right of redemption. Their title was subsequently lost by the foreclosure of the Berdell mortgage. If a sole plaintiff, suing in his own right, is deprived of his interest in the subject-matter in question by an event subsequent to the institution of the suit, his assignees or those succeeding to or having acquired his rights may have the benefit of the proceedings which have been already instituted by an original bill in the nature of a supplemental bill. Story, Eq. Pl. § 349. If the defendant, in a bill to foreclose or redeem a mortgage, conveys his interest in the property, pendente lite, to a third person, and that person desires to have the benefit of the title so gained for affirmative relief in respect to the matters charged in the original bill, as, for example, to redeem the mortgaged property, he must obtain such relief by filing a bill in the nature of a cross bill. Id. § 351. In this case the title of the plaintiffs became vested by operation of law or by decree of court, pendente lite, in the trustees of the Berdell mortgage, defendants in the original bill, all whose title, both original and that subsequently acquired, became vested, pendente lite, in the New York & New England Railroad Company. This company had a right to become a defendant, as assignee of the title of one of the original defendants, and properly filed a cross bill for relief simply as to the matters charged in the original bill. Inasmuch as it is properly seeking relief because it has succeeded to all the rights of a defendant, it is not important to inquire whether it could also have come in as plaintiff by reason of the acquisition of the plaintiffs' title through the Berdell trustees. The fact that the plaintiff has parted with his interest, pendente lite, does not forthwith abate the suit, but the assignee must be made a party before the suit can be proceeded with. "The proper course for the defendant, in such a case, if he wishes to have the suit proceeded in or put an end to, is to apply to the court for an order that the assignee file a supplemental bill, in the nature of a bill of review, within such time as shall be prescribed by the court for that purpose, or that the complainant's bill be dismissed." Sedgwick v. Cleveland, 7 Paige, 287. In this case the assignees of the plaintiffs' interest were already defendants, and therefore there was no necessity of citing them in. It does not harm the position of the new defendant that it also became vested by direct conveyance from the original plaintiffs of any shred of title which might have been left outstanding in them. The court has not lost jurisdiction of the case because the plaintiffs, by virtue of whose character as assignees in bankruptcy it obtained jurisdiction, have parted with all their title, pending the suit. "It is quite clear that the jurisdiction of the court depends upon the state of things at the time of the action brought, and that, after vesting, it cannot be ousted by subsequent events." Mollan v. Torrance, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 537; Clarke v. Mathewson, 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 164. Having jurisdiction of the original bill, it has jurisdiction of the cross bill, which may be filed by a new defendant, irrespective of his residence. The cross bill is auxiliary to the original suit. Jones v. Andrews, 10 Wall. [77 U. S.] 327.

But it is claimed, inasmuch as the New York & New England Railroad Company seek for no affirmative relief against the original plaintiffs, who have no longer any interest in the subject-matter, that no decree can be rendered in the case except that the bill be dismissed. If the decree dismissing the original bill disposes of the whole controversy between all the parties, the cross bill follows the fate of the original bill. Dows v. Chicago, 11 Wall. [78 U. S.] 108. In a very large class of cases, however, the cross bill sets up additional facts, and prays for affirmative and independent relief; in such cases, while the original bill may be dismissed, the defendant may obtain a decree upon his cross bill for the relief prayed for. The trustees claim that a dismissal of the original bill disposes of the cross bill, except in cases where the cross bill prays for relief against the plaintiff. While it is true that usually a cross bill is brought to obtain relief against the plaintiff, it is not indispensable that such should be its purpose. The substance of the authorities on the subject is, that a cross bill is properly brought by a defendant against the plaintiff in the same suit, or against other defendants in the same suit, or against both, as to the matters in question in the original bill. Its purpose is to obtain relief to all parties as to the matters charged in the original bill. New and distinct matters which constitute the subject of an independent suit, not embraced in the original bill, should not be introduced. A litigation between the defendants, with which the plaintiff is not concerned, should not be the subject of a cross bill. "It is auxiliary to the original suit, and a grant and dependency upon it. If its purpose be different from this, it is not a cross bill, though it may have a connection with the same general subject." Ayres v. Carver, 17 How. [58 U. S.] 591; Cross v. De Valle, 1 Wall. [68 U. S.] 1; Rubber Co. v. Goodyear, 9 Wall. [76 U. S.] 807. The cross bill in this suit strictly deals with the matters charged in the original bill, and introduces no distinct and separate matter.

But even if the general rule is as contended for by the trustees, the circumstances of this case are sui generis, and exceptional. The plaintiffs have lost their title by operation of law. It has become vested in the corporation which brings the cross bill. The only parties before the court who have a substantial interest in the subject-matter are the New York & New England Railroad Company and the Connecticut trustees. The mere fact that, on account of transfers pendente lite, the original plaintiffs have lost their interest, and consequently no decree is asked either for or against them, should not prevent the party which is entitled to redeem and to the possession of the mortgaged property from gaining its rights.

2nd. It is next urged that no decree should be rendered until the plaintiffs in the suits in the state courts shall have been made parties to this bill, and a determination shall have been had of the validity of their claim.

The suit of the stockholders of the Hartford, Providence & Fishkill Railroad Company is upon the ground that the conveyance to the Boston, Hartford & Erie Company was void by reason of fraud and misrepresentation on the part of said company. The New York & New England Railroad Company has the legal title to the equity of redemption. Whether its apparent title is void by reason of the fraud of its assignor is the subject of controversy. In addition to this apparent legal title, that company has now raised a million and half of dollars to pay the mortgage, has paid and cancelled $850,000 of the bonds, has tendered payment of the amount due the city of Hartford upon $500,000, and is ready to bring into court the sum necessary to pay the remainder. If its title to the equity of redemption shall be set aside, it will still be in equity the owner of the mortgage which it has paid, and will be, upon payment, subrogated to all the rights of the Connecticut trustees, one of which rights is the possession of the railroad for the benefit of the mortgagees. I do not consider in this connection any equitable rights which it may claim to have as the successor of the Berdell bondholders, but it is eminently proper that the corporation which, having the legal right to redeem, has paid the first mortgage, should have the possession of the property as against persons who have not yet substantiated either legal or equitable title. It is important that it can hardly be contended that serious injury will result to the claimants by reason of the possession of the New York & New England Company, which proposes to complete the western end of the road. If this is done, the value of the franchise and of the property will be enhanced.

Let there be a decree in general accordance with the prayer of the cross bill, but with a proviso that nothing in said decree shall affect or impair the right, title or claim of any person or corporation who claim to be stockholders of the Hartford, Providence & Fishkill Railroad Company. The terms and details of the decree will be settled upon hearing.

Case No. 1,004.

BARNARD v. HERBERT.

[The case cited under this title in Maynadier v. Duff, Case No. 9,349, is the same as Bernard v. Herbert, Case No. 1,347.]

BARNARD, (KELLOGG v.) See Case No. 7,661.

Case No. 1,005.

BARNARD et al. v. MORTON.

[1 Curt. 404.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. Term, 1853.

CUSTOMS DUTIES—DUTIABLE VALUE—ACT OF 1842—SALT IN SACKS.

1. The sixteenth section of the tariff act of August 30, 1842, (5 Stat. 563,) is not repealed by the tariff act of July 30, 1846, (9 Stat. 42,) and still prescribes the rule for ascertaining the dutiable value of merchandise, procured by purchase, on which an ad valorem duty is imposed.

[Followed in Kriesler v. Morton, Case No. 7,933. Distinguished in Forman v. Peaslee, Case No. 4,941.]

2. The expense of sacks, in which salt is packed for importation from Liverpool, is embraced under the words "all costs" in that section, and is to be added to the market value, to ascertain the dutiable value.

[Cited in Saxonville Mills v. Russell, Case No. 12,413.]

[See U. S. v. Clement, Case No. 14,815.]

At law. This was an action for money had and received [brought] by [George M. Barnard and others, composing the firm of] Barnard, Adams & Co., against Marcus Morton, late collector of the customs for the port of Boston, to recover a sum of money alleged to have been illegally exacted as duties. After introducing witnesses, the substance of whose testimony appears in the opinion of the court, the parties agreed, that, upon this evidence, and the law applicable thereto, the court should direct a verdict. [Verdict directed for defendant.]

Choate & Bell, for plaintiffs.
Hallett, Dist. Atty., for defendant.

CURTIS, Circuit Justice. On the third day of February, 1849, Messrs. Barnard, Adams & Co. entered, at the custom-house in Boston, 2670 sacks of salt, imported from Liverpool. The invoices specified, first, the cost of the salt; second, the number and cost of the sacks in which the salt was imported; third, the charges, consisting of river freight, dock and town dues, mats, cartage of sacks, and filling; and fourth, the commissions. The collector assessed the ad valorem duty of twenty per centum on the footing of the invoice. The plaintiffs protested against so much of the duty as was thus imposed on the cost of the sacks, and, having paid it, this action is brought to recover it back.

The plaintiffs have called witnesses, skilled in the trade, who have testified, that long before the tariff law of 1846, invoices of salt were accustomed to be made as these are made; that the cost of the sacks in which the salt is exported, had not usually or ever been included among the "charges." One witness, who had been extensively engaged in the trade for ten years, and had resided in Liverpool one half that time, testified, that the salt exported from Liverpool is chiefly made in the county of Cheshire; that the manufacturers have agents at Liverpool, who sell it, deliverable either at the works, or at the port of Liverpool. It is sold in bulk, by the ton, and the purchaser directs it to be packed in bleached or half-bleached sacks, the former for fine salt, the latter for coarse. Except some fine salt, known as "factory-filled salt," it comes down the Mersey in bulk, and is filled on board, or alongside the vessel in which it is exported, at the expense of the purchaser. The seller procures the bags for the purchaser, and makes a separate charge to him of their cost; and the invoices make the bags a distinct item. The charges in the invoices are the expenses incident to getting the article on shipboard. The seller of the salt procures the sacks, puts the salt in them, and charges the salt and the sacks to the purchaser; this is the cost of the salt; then the charges are added. The whole constitutes the cost of the cargo. The other witnesses, called on both sides, confirm this statement, so far as their knowledge extends; and they add nothing to it, except the fact that salt in bulk, and bag-salt, is each a distinct and well-known article of commerce in the United States.

Upon these facts, the question is, whether the cost of the sacks is to be added to the cost of the salt in bulk, in ascertaining the dutiable value of salt imported in sacks from Liverpool. The law, under which this duty was exacted, is the act of July 30, 1846, (9 Stat. 42.) This law does not contain any provisions directing the mode in which the dutiable value of articles, upon which it levies an ad valorem duty, shall be ascertained. And the first question raised, and to be determined, is, whether any, and what other law or laws, are so far left in force by this act, as to give the rule for ascertaining the dutiable value of merchandise on which the tariff of 1846 imposes ad valorem duties.

[1] [Reported by Hon. B. R. Curtis, Circuit Justice.]

It is argued, by the plaintiff's counsel, that this act has repealed the preceding tariff act of August 30, 1842, [5 Stat. 563,] including the sixteenth and seventeenth sections, which prescribe the mode of ascertaining the dutiable value of merchandise procured by purchase. The act of 1846 contains no other repealing clause than what is found in its seventh section. "That all acts and parts of acts repugnant to the provisions of this act, be, and the same hereby are, repealed." But this act imposes throughout ad valorem duties; and, as already observed, it contains no specific provisions as to the instrumentalities, by means of which the dutiable values of the articles it subjects to duties are to be ascertained, or the times and places in reference to which such values are to be computed, or the items which are to be reckoned as part thereof. Yet such provisions are not only proper, but, as has been shown by experience, are necessary parts of a just and equal system of laws, levying ad valorem duties, and have been so treated since the year 1823 in the legislation of congress. It follows, that the then existing provisions of law on those subjects, so far from being repugnant to this act of 1846, are needful, to carry it into practical effect; and, therefore, could not be considered as repealed by its eleventh section, even if there is found in it no express reference to existing laws, as affording rules on these subjects.

This question of repeal was argued as if it depended on the interpretation to be placed on the eighth section of the act of 1846; and the plaintiffs' counsel insisted, that this section was, throughout, applicable solely to cases of additions made to the invoice cost of imports by the owner, consignee, or agent; and consequently, that the reference made therein to existing laws, adapted them for such cases only. This section is in these words: "That it shall be lawful for the owner, consignee, or agent of imports which have been actually purchased, on entry of the same, to make such addition in the entry to the cost or value given in the invoice, as, in his opinion, may raise the same to the true market value of such imports in the principal markets of the country whence the importation shall have been made, or in which the goods imported shall have been originally manufactured or produced, as the case may be; and to add thereto all costs and charges which, under existing laws, would form part of the true value at the port where the same may be entered, upon which the duties may be assessed. And it shall be the duty of the collector, within whose district the same may be imported or entered, to cause the dutiable value of such imports to be appraised, estimated, and ascertained, in accordance with the provisions of existing laws; and if the appraised value thereof shall exceed, by ten per centum or more, the value so declared on the entry, then, in addition to the duties imposed by law on the same, there shall be levied, collected, and paid, a duty of twenty per centum ad valorem on such appraised value." Perhaps this is the true interpretation of the section. But it by no means follows that cases not within it are not to be subject to existing laws, both as to the mode of ascertaining the dutiable value, and the assessment of an additional duty of twenty per centum, in case that appraised value shall exceed the declared value ten per centum or more. It would be strange, indeed, if this penalty were to be inflicted when an attempt was made by the importer to correct the invoice value before entry, and were not to be inflicted when no attempt was made to correct it; and it would be still stranger, if the law pointed out a mode of ascertaining the dutiable value in the former class of cases, but left the latter, probably far the larger class, without any mode of ascertaining that value, save by the invoices made abroad. If, therefore, the eighth section is to receive the interpretation contended for, a point which I do not find it necessary to determine, the inference would be, that having made special provision for a particular class of cases of altered values, it was thought necessary, by express terms, to bring them under the same existing provisions of law, as all other cases were to be governed by; and that therefore it was, that in respect to them, there is an express enactment to that effect; while all other cases are left to be governed by those existing provisions which are not repugnant to the law of 1846, but are necessary to its just and equal execution.

The sixteenth and seventeenth sections of the act of 1842 were not designed to be applicable merely to cases arising under that law. The sixteenth section begins as follows: "That in all cases where there is or shall be imposed any ad valorem rate of duty, &c., it shall be the duty of the collector to cause the actual market value, or wholesale price thereof, at the time when purchased, &c., to be appraised, estimated, and ascertained," &c. And then follows a set of provisions to enable the collector to discharge this duty. This system, digested from former laws, with some alterations, was in force when the ad valorem tariff of 1846 was enacted; and the inference is irresistible, that it is to continue to operate upon all cases of ad valorem duties levied on merchandise procured by purchase, under this act of 1846, which has made no new provisions on the subject.

It was argued that, by the act of March 3, 1851, (9 Stat. 629,) congress has, in terms, made it the duty of the collector to cause the dutiable value of articles to be appraised, estimated, and ascertained; and that this shows it was not previously his duty, and proves that there was an omission in the law of 1846, which it was the object of this law of 1851 to supply. But a close examination of this last mentioned law, and of the circumstances in which it was enacted, will lead to an opposite conclusion. Just before this law was enacted, an interpretation had been put by the supreme court on the fifth section of the act of March 1, 1823, (3 Stat. 732,) and on the sixteenth section of the law of 1846, to the effect that the value, at the time of the procurement of merchandise imported from the country of its production, was the value to be ascertained. Greely v. Thompson, 10 How. [51 U. S.] 225; Maxwell v. Griswold, Id. 242. The practice at the custom-house, under instructions from the treasury department, is understood to have been to ascertain the value at the time of exportation. This law of 1851, in its first section, enacted—"That in all cases where there is or shall be imposed any ad valorem rate of duty, &c., it shall be the duty of the collector, &c., to cause the actual market value, or wholesale price thereof, at the period of the exportation to the United States, to be appraised, estimated, and ascertained," &c.

The purpose of congress clearly was, to repeal so much of the fifth section of the act of 1823, and of the sixteenth section of the act of 1842, as fixed the time of procurement as the period, in reference to which the value was to be assessed; and substitute therefor the time of exportation. This clearly implies that congress considered the sixteenth section as still in force. And in this law, also, no means of fixing the value are provided; and there is, therefore, a tacit but clear reference to the modes which theretofore had been provided for that end, by the sixteenth section of the act of 1842, in cases of imports purchased, and by the act of 1823, in cases of imports procured otherwise than by purchase. I say the modes provided by these two laws; because it seems, from the terms of the sixteenth section of the act of 1842, that it can be applied only to imports procured by purchase, and that if procured otherwise than by purchase, it is still necessary to recur to the provisions of the act of 1823, which required proceedings differing materially from those of the act of 1842.

It may be added, that though the question now made concerning the repeal of the sixteenth section of the Act of 1842, has not, so far as I am aware, been distinctly presented before; yet the case of Griswold v. Maxwell, [Case No. 5,838,] proceeds upon the ground that it is not repealed. And it has been treated as in force in many cases. Morlot v. Lawrence, [Id. 9,815;] Norcross v. Greely, [Id. 10,294.] It is a question of so much importance, that after it had been argued at the bar, I thought it proper to consider it somewhat more at large than its intrinsic difficulty, perhaps, required.

This section of the act of 1842 being in force, we must look to it for the rule governing this case, which is one of purchase. It requires the collector to ascertain the dutiable value of this import, by adding to its market value, "all costs and charges, except insurance, and including in every case a charge for commissions at the usual rate, as the true value at the port where the same may be entered, upon which duties shall be assessed." The object of the law is, to ascertain the true value of the article at the port where the same is entered; and the mode of ascertaining that value is, to add to the market price abroad, all costs and charges. The article entered was salt. But it appears there are two kinds of salt known in this market; salt in bulk, and bag-salt. The latter is what the plaintiffs entered. Their entry is, "2670 sacks salt." The question is, whether the price of the sacks is a cost or charge, within the meaning of this law. That it is, in point of fact, one of the expenses incurred, abroad, to give the article the character of bag-salt, is clear.

But it is insisted that it is not one of the charges, within the meaning of this law, because it has never been known as such to merchants. This may be admitted; but is it not one of the costs of the article known as bag-salt? It is argued that "all costs and charges" means no more than all charges. But it is the duty of the court, in construing a statute, to give effect to every word used by the legislature, if an appropriate meaning can be attached to it. And inasmuch as the cost of the bags is in fact one of the costs of the article entered, if it be true that it cannot come under the word "charges," an appropriate effect can be given to the word "costs." Among the items, denominated "charges" in the invoices, are the expenses of carting the bags. It is not denied in the protest, nor is there any ground to deny, that this is properly denominated one of the charges, and is to be added to the market value of the salt. If so, it would be strange, if the expense of the sacks themselves were to be excluded. Take the definition of the word "charges" given by one of the witnesses—the expenses of getting the article on shipboard; if the cartage of the sacks comes into the charges, it must be because the sacks are a component part of the article bag-salt; and if so, the cost of the sacks is one of the costs of that article.

This word "costs" is used for the first time, I believe, in this law, in addition to the word charges. See Acts 1823, (3 Stat. 732, § 5;) Acts 1828, (4 Stat. 273, § 8;) Acts 1832, (4 Stat. 593, § 15.) And I do not perceive any sound reason why it may not be so construed as to cover the expense of packages, in which imports usually purchased in bulk are placed, after the purchase, and before exportation. This expense is strictly one of the costs of the article as imported, and at the same time it does not enter into the market value of the article abroad, which is sold in bulk, as it would, if there sold in such packages. It differs, also, entirely from the case of a duty expressly levied upon the article in such packages, as upon wine in bottles; and from the case of a specific duty upon salt, as under the act of 1832. My opinion is, that the cost of packages, into which articles purchased in bulk are placed, before exportation, by means of which the article, when thus imported, has acquired in commerce a distinct character, as bag-salt, in contradistinction to salt in bulk, is one of the costs of that import, within the meaning of the sixteenth section of the act of 1842; and consequently, that the cost of the sacks was in this case properly included in the sum on which the duty was to be assessed.

Pursuant to the agreement of the parties, a verdict is to be directed for the defendant.

Case No. 1,006.

BARNARD et al. v. MORTON.

[1 Spr. 186.] [1]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. April Term, 1850.

CUSTOMS DUTIES—APPRAISAL—SUGAR FROM CUBA VIA HALIFAX.

1. Sugars were transported from Cuba to Halifax, and thence imported into the United States: Held, that under the tariff act of 1842, the duties were to be assessed upon the market value of the sugars in Cuba, at the time when they were shipped from Halifax, with the addition of the usual charges at Halifax.

[See Norcross v. Greeley, Case No. 10,294.]

2. Freight from Cuba to Halifax is not to be added.

At law. This was an action against the collector of the port of Boston. [Judgment for plaintiffs.]

The case came before the court upon a statement of facts, by which it appeared that two invoices of Havana sugars were consigned to the plaintiffs, by merchants residing at Halifax, N. S., subject to an ad valorem duty of 30 per cent. That upon arrival, they were appraised for the assessment of duties, by adding to the market value in Cuba, the charges incurred there, freight from there to Halifax, and the charges at Halifax. The plaintiffs, considering this mode of valuation unauthorized by law, paid the duties assessed, under protest, and brought this action against the collector, to recover so much as was unlawfully demanded.

C. G. & F. C. Loring, for the plaintiffs, contended, that upon a proper construction of the statute, August 30, 1842, § 16 (5 Stat. 563,) the valuation for the assessment of duties, when goods were imported from a place other than that of production or manufacture, should be the market value in the principal market of the country of production or manufacture, at the time of the exportation to the United States, with the addition of the charges at the place of such exportation, or otherwise at the place of production; and that in neither case, should the freight to the intermediate port be added. So that in the present case, the sugars should be taken at their value in Cuba, at the time they were shipped from Halifax, and to this should be added, for the assessment of duties, only the charges at Halifax, or at the place of shipment in Cuba.

Lunt, for the defendant, rested the defence principally upon the instructions of Mr. Walker, when secretary of the treasury, and subsequent confirmatory directions of Mr. Meredith, to whose attention the case was early presented by the plaintiff.

SPRAGUE, District Judge. It is plain, that the time when the valuation is to be made, is that of the exportation to the United States, and the standard, the market value in the country of production, at that time.

The only question is, as to what shall be added to such valuation.

The law says, to this value shall be added the usual cost and charges.

If it were not for the subsequent proviso in the statute, the valuation would be, in all cases, the market value at the place of exportation, which might include the charges at Cuba, and the freight thence; and to this should be added the charges at Halifax. But the proviso alters the standard of value, by declaring that, when the place of exportation is not that of production, the value shall be taken in the place of production, at the time of exportation. Nothing is said about costs and charges in the proviso, and therefore, only the costs and charges at the place of exportation should be added.

The principal question is, whether the freight from Cuba to Halifax can be added. This item constitutes no part of the value of the merchandize in Cuba, and it is not one of the costs and charges incurred at Halifax. If the standard were the market value in Halifax, it might be included; but as the standard is the market value in Cuba, it is necessarily excluded. It is admitted, that if the sugars had been shipped from Cuba to the United States, freight could not be added, and there is no more reason why it should be added in the present case.

[1] [Reported by F. E. Parker, Esq., assisted by Charles Francis Adams, Jr., Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

Upon examination of the statute, I cannot resist the conclusion, that the construction which has been given to it by the treasury department, and is now contended for, in behalf of the United States, is erroneous.

This opinion, I understand to be in accordance with the decision of the circuit court of the United States, in the recent case of Grinnell v. Lawrence, [Case No. 5,831.]

In the present case, the duties should have been assessed on the market value of the sugars in Cuba, at the time when shipped from Halifax, with the addition of the usual charges at Halifax; and for the excess, which was unlawfully demanded and paid, the plaintiffs are entitled to judgment.

Case No. 1,007.

BARNARD et al. v. NORWICH & W. R. CO. et al.

[4 Cliff. 351;[1] 14 N. B. R. 469; 3 Cent. Law J. 608; 5 Amer. Law Rec. 361; 22 Int. Rev. Rec. 312.]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. May Term, 1876.

RAILROAD COMPANIES—MORTGAGE—AFTER-ACQUIRED PROPERTY—LEASED LINES.

1. The Boston, Hartford, & Erie Railroad executed a mortgage, called the Berdell mortgage, and issued bonds for certain specific purposes, under which the individual defendants were trustees, and in possession of the leasehold interest. Afterwards the Norwich & Worcester Railroad Co. was leased to the Boston, Hartford, & Erie Co. Afterwards the Boston, Hartford, & Erie was declared bankrupt during the existence of the Norwich & Worcester lease. Bill in equity was brought by the assignees in bankruptcy of the Boston, Hartford, & Erie Road, praying that the trustees under the mortgage might be decreed to pay to the assignees all the profits and moneys received by them, and to deliver the leasehold interest of the said road; and that the Norwich & Worcester Road should pay over all moneys by it received under the lease. Held, the prayer of the bill must be denied, because the leasehold interest acquired by the lease passed to the trustees as after-acquired property.

[2. A mortgage of all the property of a railroad company then in its possession or thereafter acquired includes another railroad subsequently leased to the mortgagor, and the title to such leased road is good in the hands of the trustees under the mortgage, as against the subsequent assignees in bankruptcy of the mortgagor.]

3. In equity the rule is, that when parties intend to create a lien upon property, not then in actual existence, it attaches as soon as the person who grants the lien acquires the possession and title of the same.

[In equity. Bill by George M. Barnard, Charles S. Bradley, and Charles R. Chapman, assignees in bankruptcy of the Boston, Hartford & Erie Railroad Company, against the Norwich & Worcester Railroad Company, W. T. Hart, G. T. Oliphant, and C. P. Clark, trustees under a mortgage of the property of the Boston, Hartford & Erie Railroad Company, praying that respondents account for all moneys and profits received by them as lessees and managers of the property of the Norwich & Worcester Railroad Company, and that they be ordered to deliver to complainants their leasehold interests therein, and release and convey to complainants whatever title they may have to such leasehold interests. Bill dismissed.]

The complainants were the assignees in bankruptcy of the Boston, Hartford, & Erie Railroad Co., and the respondents were the Norwich & Worcester Railroad Co., and William T. Hart and Charles P. Clark, surviving trustees, under the indenture known as the Berdell mortgage. The first-named railroad company was incorporated on the 25th of June, 1863, under a law of the state of Connecticut, and by divers other laws of said state, and of the states of Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and New York. The said railroad company, on the 19th of March, 1866, executed the indenture known as the Berdell mortgage, under which the respondents, Hart and Clark, as the surviving trustees created by that indenture, were in actual possession of the leasehold interest which was the subject-matter of the controversy. Twenty thousand bonds, of $1,000 each, were issued by the said railroad company "for the purpose of paying the existing debts of the company and of completing and equipping their road." Interest at the rate of seven per cent. per annum was payable semi-annually on the first days of January and July in each year, on the presentation and delivery of the proper annexed interest-warrants. Payment of the principal was deferred until Jan. 1, 1900. To secure the payment of principal and interest, the railroad company executed an indenture known as the Berdell mortgage, under which the two individual respondents were the surviving trustees. By the terms of the instrument, the grantors conveyed all the railways of the corporation, commencing at the foot of Summer street, Boston, and running to Willimantic, in the state of Connecticut, through Thompson in that state, and commencing at Providence and running to Willimantic, and also commencing on the northerly side of the city of Boston, and running through Woonsocket, in the state of Rhode Island, to Willimantic, and thence through the state of Connecticut and a portion of the state of New York, to the western terminus of the location of the railway of the company on the east bank of the Hudson river, at Fishkill; also, running from Willimantic to New Haven; "also, from a point on said railway, in said Thompson, to Southbridge, in the state of Massachusetts. As said railways are now, or shall be located, constructed, or improved under or by virtue of any powers now granted, or that may hereafter be granted or obtained to locate, construct, or use a railroad on any of said indicated lines, with all the lands that are included, or may be included in the location of said railway, or acquired for the uses of said company within the terminal points aforesaid, but not including the lands at the termini at Boston and at Fishkill, which are outside of the location of said railroad, together with all their lands, tracks, lines, rails, bridges, ways, depots, stations, water-tanks, shops, buildings, piers and wharves, erections, fences, walls, fixtures, privileges, franchises, rights, leases, and charters; also, all the like estate, roads, railroads, and structures, and matters and things pertaining or belonging thereto, that may be hereafter acquired or constructed, or belong to or be controlled by the party of the first part. Together with all the tolls, income, issues, and profits to be had from the same, and all rights to receive and recover the same, and everything necessary for the complete use of the road; also all the locomotives, engines, tenders, cars, carriages, tools, shops, fixtures, and machinery, and all the coal, wood, and other fuel belonging or appertaining to said railroad, or that may at any time hereafter belong or appertain to the same, as it may be changed by use and new acquisitions; also all the estate, real, personal, and mixed, of any of the foregoing descriptions, or of any other kind which may be hereafter acquired by the party of the first part, and used or intended to be used in the construction and operation of the said railroad."

[1] [Reported by William Henry Clifford, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

An agreed statement of facts was filed, of which the following are the essential facts, so far as the same is related to the opinion of the court and the view of the case taken therein. At all times since the execution of said lease, the railroad of the Norwich & Worcester Railroad Co. has been used, among other purposes, for the transportation of passengers and freight between Boston and New York, by the line of the Boston, Hartford, & Erie Railroad from Boston to Putnam; thence by the Norwich & Worcester Railroad to Norwich; thence by that portion of the New London Northern Railroad, used under said lease (or by some other track used under said lease) to Long Island sound; and thence by the line of steamboats referred to in said lease; and said line has been used as a continuous through line from Boston to New York, operated by and under the control of the Boston, Hartford, & Erie Railroad Co., or the receivers or the trustees who have been in possession of the property of the Boston, Hartford, & Erie Railroad Co.; and the said leased property also forms a continuous through line from New York to Worcester, and connecting points north. It is also agreed that each of the roads herein referred to forms the usual railroad connections with the roads of corporations not owned by the Boston, Hartford, & Erie Railroad Co., or its successors or assigns, which intersect or touch its line, and among others with the Shore Line Railroad, so called, at New London, leading to New Haven, and there connecting with the New York & New Haven Railroad, forming a continuous line of rail to New York.

It is agreed that on the 21st of October, 1870, a petition was filed in the district court of the United States for the district of Massachusetts by Seth Adams, a creditor, praying that the Boston, Hartford, & Erie Railroad Co. might be adjudged bankrupt. [A motion to dismiss the petition was denied. Adams v. Boston, H. & E. R. Co., Case No. 47.] This petition was opposed, and the questions raised by it were pending in said court until March 2, 1871, when said company was adjudicated a bankrupt in said district, [unreported;] and at the first meeting of the creditors of said bankrupt corporation, held March 18, 1871, the plaintiffs were appointed assignees of said bankrupt's estate, and they derive powers and authority from the proceedings in said cause in said district. A petition in review was brought in the circuit court for said district, March 18, 1871; and the same, after a hearing, was dismissed, Sept. 7, 1871. [Sweatt v. Boston, H. & E. R. Co., Case No. 13,684.] On the 20th day of December, 1870, a petition was filed, seeking to put said Boston, Hartford, & Erie Railroad Co. into bankruptcy, in the district of Connecticut, by James Alden, a creditor of said company; and on the 31st day of December, a like petition was filed in the district court for the southern district of New York by the said Alden, and said corporation was adjudicated a bankrupt in said district of Connecticut, March, 1871; and in said district of New York by a decree filed March 3, 1871, and made, as stated in the opinion of Judge Woodruff, in 9 Blatchf. 409. [In re Boston, H. & E. R. Co., Case No. 1,678.] In the district of Connecticut, the complainants were also appointed assignees; and in the district of New York, the complainants were chosen assignees; but the district judge refused to confirm the election. [In re Boston, H. & E. R. Co., Case No. 1,680.] Petitions in review were filed in the circuit court in each of said districts of New York and Connecticut, asking for a stay of the proceedings therein, on the ground of the priority of the proceedings in the Massachusetts district; and in September, 1871, a decree was entered upon said petition in the district of Connecticut; and on the 22d of February, 1872, upon said petition, in the district of New York, by the circuit judge, sustaining the same, and staying the said proceedings in both of said districts; for a further statement of which, reference may be had to the opinions of Judge Woodruff, in 9 Blatchf. 102, 409, [In re Boston, H. & E. R. Co., Cases Nos. 1,677 and 1,678.]

Some time after the bringing of the bill, Oliphant deceased.

C. S. Bradley and J. J. Storrow, for complainants.

The first question is, whether this leasehold interest is included within the description of the property conveyed by that mortgage. The complainants submit that it is not. A well-known rule of law is, that general language, following clear words of specific description, does not extend beyond items ejusdem generis with those enumerated; it merely cures a defective enumeration of details constituting the class intended to be included in the specific description. Rooke v. Kensington, 2 Kay & J. 753; Jenner v. Jenner, L. R. 1 Eq. 361; City of Philadelphia v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co., 58 Pa. St. 253; Parish v. Wheeler, 22 N. Y. 494. Another rule of ancient origin, but frequently applied to railroads in recent cases, is founded upon the well-known distinctions as to grants of after acquired property. 2 Kent, Comm. 468. A conveyance by a railroad company, prima facie, at least, and in the absence of clear and unequivocal expressions of a contrary intention, will only embrace such after-acquired property as will come to the corporation under the powers conferred by its existing charter, or at most under amendments made to enable it to carry out and perfect the scheme embodied in that charter. Seymour v. Canandaigua & N. F. R. Co., 25 Barb. 284, and cases cited. Bath v. Miller, 53 Me. 308. So a grant to a railroad corporation of a right to use a patent, or of an exemption from taxation, relates only to the line of road within its existing charter, and does not cover extensions acquired by consolidation or otherwise in pursuance of laws afterwards passed. Emigh v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co., [Case No. 4,448;] Tomlinson v. Branch, 15 Wall, [82 U. S.] 464.

W. G. Russell and R. R. Bishop, for respondents.

That after-acquired property will pass, when apt words are used for its conveyance, under a railway mortgage, is now settled beyond controversy. For a statement of the principles of law on which this question has been settled, to which we may have occasion to refer in dealing with the construction and effect to be given to the Berdell mortgage, we cite Pennock v. Coe, 23 How. [64 U. S.] 117; Galveston, H. &. H. R. Co. v. Cowdrey, 11 Wall. [78 U. S.] 459; Willink v. Morris Canal & Banking Co., 3 Green, Ch. [4 N. J. Eq.] 377, 402; Phillips v. Winslow, 18 B. Mon. 431; Stevens v. Watson, 4 Abb. Dec. 302; Howe v. Freeman, 14 Gray, 577; Pierce, R. R. 530; Morrill v. Noyes, 56 Me. 458; and especially, as the leading case, in which the true principle has been most fully elaborated by C. J. Perley, Pierce v. Emery, 32 N. H. 484. To the point that subsequent legislative sanction renders valid a railroad mortgage of after-acquired property, Howe v. Freeman, 14 Gray, 577; Shepley v. Atlantic & St. L. R. R. Co., 55 Me. 407.

The lease in question is included and conveyed in express terms in the description of after-acquired property set forth in the Berdell mortgage. The description of the property conveyed first includes "all and singular the railways of said Boston, Hartford, and Erie Railway Company," and proceeds to describe those railways as then chartered and located within certain defined termini and on certain indicated lines; but enlarges the grant beyond their then existing location by adding the words, "as said railways are now or shall be located, constructed, or improved, under or by virtue of any powers now granted, or that may hereafter be granted or obtained, to locate, construct, or use a railroad on any of said indicated lines;" it then conveys all the lands included or which may be included in said locations made or to be made, and all lands which may be acquired within the same terminal points, with one specific exception, the purpose of which is obvious. Next follows what was evidently intended to be a specific enumeration of all the classes and descriptions of property which the railroad corporation might be supposed to own at the time, including and ending with its "privileges, franchises, rights, leases, and charters." Any existing lease held by the corporation then clearly passed under the mortgage. Then follows a less specific, but not less broad and comprehensive, series of terms, evidently intended to take the place of the above enumeration, and to include and apply it to after-acquired property of the corporation; viz. "all the like estate, roads, railroads, and structures, and matters and things pertaining or belonging thereto, that may be hereafter acquired, or constructed, or belong to, or be controlled by the party of the first part." The word "estate" is in itself, perhaps, the most broad and comprehensive word which can be used descriptive of property, the subject-matter of a conveyance, and beyond question includes a lessee's title. Boston v. Dedham, 4 Metc. [Mass.] 178; Bouv. Dict. tit. "Estate." In fact, the true rule of construction of the terms of grant of the after-acquired property is to treat them as a new and repeated enumeration of the terms in which the existing property was described, and therefore as if the word "leases" were again specified. Nor can the word "like" be held to limit and restrict the words which follow it so as to confine their application to property which may be acquired within the terminal limits set forth in the specific description of the existing property. This is apparent when we consider its force as applied to the word "railroads." The specific description already included all roads which were or could be located within those termini. The phrase "like railroads" can therefore only have effect at all by construing it to mean other railroads, which may be acquired or constructed outside the indicated lines and outside the specified termini.

An after-acquired lease is also within the plain and ordinary meaning of the subsequent terms of the grant, viz. "also all the estate, real, personal, and mixed, of any of the foregoing descriptions, or of any other kind which may be hereafter acquired by the party of the first part, and used or intended to be used in the construction and operation of the said railroad." Even if the after-acquired lease of the Norwich and Worcester Railroad was not designated in advance by specific and express terms of description in the mortgage grant, it passed under the general and broad signification which a proper construction will give to the terms used. It cannot be questioned that the words of the grant were intended (with the exception of terminal lands) to pass all the existing property, and, without exception, all the existing franchises of the corporation. It is equally clear that they were intended to include after-acquired franchises. They conveyed, in express terms, railways to be "located, constructed, or improved under or by virtue of any powers now granted, or that may hereafter be granted;" they conveyed "franchises, rights, and charters" and the like "estate, . . . matters, and things" hereafter acquired; and in the later clause of the grant, the right to receive and recover tolls, which is one of the main franchises of a railroad, followed by apt words to extend the grant to like after-acquired franchises. The better considered opinions of the judicial tribunals sustain the title to after-acquired property under railway mortgages upon the principle that an authorized conveyance of the franchise and corporate rights of such a corporation, with its road and other property, vests in the grantee a title to the after-acquired property as an incident and accession to the thing originally granted. "The right to take and hold property being one of the franchises mortgaged, the corporation would have no power to take or hold property, except by virtue of that franchise, and under the mortgage by which the franchise was covered." "If the directors made such a mortgage, as incident to the franchise and corporate rights mortgaged, subsequently acquired property, immediately upon its vesting in the corporation, would, as an incident and by accession, become part of the thing originally mortgaged, and of the mortgage security." Pierce v. Emery, 32 N. H. 484, 517. "But where the corporation, under competent authority, conveys by mortgage its road and all its property, with all its corporate franchises and rights, as one entire thing, including, among its other franchises, the right to acquire future property; and, in effect, conveys the corporation itself, subsequently acquired property will pass to the mortgagee as an incident and accession to the subject of the mortgage. The right to acquire the property being one of the franchises conveyed, it is included within the mortgage; and property acquired afterwards, by virtue of its exercise, is acquired and held subject to the conditions of the mortgage." Pierce, R. R. 530.

This principle has also received the sanction of the supreme court of Massachusetts in Howe v. Freeman, [14 Gray, 577,] cited above, where it is said of a vote authorizing the directors "to execute a mortgage of a road with all its franchises:" "The terms were very sweeping, and indicated a purpose to execute a mortgage of the broadest character." See, also, Phillips v. Winslow, ubi supra; Stevens v. Watson, ubi supra. It is, then, no objection to the title of the trustees under the mortgage, that, at the date when the mortgage was made, the franchise which would empower the Boston, Hartford, and Erie Railroad to hold or acquire the lease in question, did not exist. The corporation had the power and capacity to acquire future-added franchises as well as the power to acquire non-existing property which might come into existence. Neither subject of acquisition can be said to have been definitely and in specie a subject of intention or contemplation at the time of the grant, for neither existed.

But when by legislative grant a new and added franchise came into existence, and was annexed to the corporation, the property acquired and held under it became, by accession, an incident to the franchise, annexed to it and to the original franchise as an accession, and became part of the thing conveyed by the original grant, which included, in its express terms, future-acquired franchises, and by its general tenor the capacity and power to acquire them. Under the broad rule of construction adopted in the cases cited, the mortgage was a mortgage of the corporation itself: it conveyed the road and all its franchises existing, or to be acquired, as one entire thing, and, as an incident and accession, all after-acquired property of the corporation. The legislative sanction given to the lease either presumed or created the franchise to hold it in the corporation; and by that act it passed under the mortgage, if it had not already passed under it at its inception. Act Mass. 1869, c. 406, Record, p. 167; Act Conn. 1869, Record, p. 398; Howe v. Freeman, ubi supra; Shepley v. Atlantic & St. L. R. R. Co., ubi supra. The Boston, Hartford, and Erie Railroad Co., like all railroad corporations of modern date, held its charter subject to amendment, alteration, or repeal by legislative enactment. The legislature saw fit to enlarge its charter and its franchise, giving it an added power, and imposing upon it an added duty. Can it be contended that under a mortgage of its charter and its franchise, which mortgage has itself become part of the statute law, the enlargement of the charter and the franchise does not pass, but becomes severed from the original grant?

If we adopt the theory as to the passing of after-acquired property under railway mortgages, suggested by Mr. Justice Bradley in Galveston R. Co. v. Cowdrey, 11 Wall. [78 U. S.] 459, 481, viz., that the title passes by estoppel, the rule of construction to be adopted is none the less liberal. The plaintiffs take, and can enforce no better title than the bankrupt corporation could itself claim. Ex parte Dalby, [Case No. 3,540.] And all the considerations presented as to the broad construction of the language used in determining the general intent of the parties apply most strongly against the grantor in the deed.

CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice. Assignees in bankruptcy, except in cases of fraud, take only such rights and interests in the property of the bankrupt as he himself had, and could have himself claimed and asserted at the time of his bankruptcy, and they are affected with all the equities which would affect the bankrupt himself if he were asserting those rights and interests. No person can sell a thing he does not own, unless as the duly authorized agent of the owner. Nemo dat quod non habet. Nor can he convey in praesenti property not in existence, the rule being that every such deed or mortgage is inoperative and void. Authorities to support these propositions are not wanting, but the law will permit the grant or conveyance to take effect upon property when it is brought into existence, and comes to belong to the grantor, in fulfilment of an express agreement, if the agreement is founded on good and valuable consideration, unless it infringes some rule of law, or will prejudice the rights of third persons. Pennock v. Coe, 23 How. [64 U. S.] 117. Whenever the parties by their contract intend to create a lien or charge, either upon real or personal property, whether then owned by the assignor or contractor or not, or if personal property, whether it is in esse or not, it attaches in equity as a lien or charge upon the particular property as soon as the assignor or contractor acquires a title thereto against the latter, and against all persons asserting a claim to the same under him, either voluntarily or with notice, or in bankruptcy. Mitchel v. Winslow, [Case No. 9,673.]

Tested solely by the words of the instrument above referred to, it might well be contended that the grant must be limited to the railways then chartered and located on indicated lines within certain described termini, but the terms of the indenture go on immediately to enlarge the grant beyond the locations then existing by adding the words "as said railroads are now or shall be located, constructed, or improved under or by virtue of any powers now granted, or that may hereafter be granted or obtained, to locate, construct, or use a railroad on any of said indicated lines." Subsequent locations, if within the indicated lines, are clearly within the express words of the grant. Reasonable doubt upon that subject cannot be entertained, and the indenture proceeds to convey all the lands that are included, or which may be included in those locations, made or to be made, and all lands which may be acquired within the same terminal points, with one exception, to wit, the terminal lands at Boston and Fishkill which are outside the location, which it seems were reserved for a separate mortgage to secure an additional loan. Support to the view that the conveyance was intended to include railways to be located and constructed within the terminal points, of the most conclusive character, is derived from what follows in the same indenture, by which the grantors first enumerate as objects of present conveyance "all their lands, tracks, lines, rails, bridges, ways, depots, stations, water-tanks, shops, buildings, piers, and wharves, erections, fences, walls, fixtures, privileges, franchises, rights, leases, and charters," and then superadd, under the same words of grant, "all the like estate, roads, railroads, and structures, matters and things pertaining or belonging thereto, that may be hereafter acquired or constructed, or belong to, or be controlled by the" granting corporation. Search is made in vain for anything to limit or qualify that language. Instead of that, the succeeding paragraph of the grant confirms the theory that the grantors intended that the mortgage should include after-acquired property of the same kind as that they possessed, as well as everything owned by them, then in possession, belonging to the great enterprise in which they were engaged.

Evidence of that intent is also found in the sweeping paragraph which follows in the same instrument, in which the grantors, after having conveyed all the like estate hereafter acquired, proceed to add, "Together with all the tolls, income, issues, and profits to be had from the same, and all rights to receive and recover the same, and every thing necessary for the complete use of the road. Also, all the locomotives, engines, tenders, cars, carriages, tools, shops, fixtures and machinery, and all the coal, wood, and other fuel belonging or appertaining to said railroad, or that may at any time hereafter belong or appertain to the same, as it may be changed by use and new acquisitions; also, all the estate, real, personal, and mixed, of any of the foregoing descriptions, or of any other kind which may be hereafter acquired by the party of the first part, and be used, or intended to be used, in the construction and operation of the said railroad."

Arrangements of various kinds were made by the said railroad company, and on the 9th of February, 1869, they leased for the term of one hundred years the railway of the Norwich and Worcester Railroad Company, together with all lands on which said railway is or shall be located within the described terminal points, and which are connected with the uses of said railway, and all the rights, easements, franchises, and privileges, in connection therewith, or which are appurtenant thereto, and all the turnouts, branch tracks, depot grounds, stations, depots, superstructures, erections, and fixtures used therewith and belonging thereto, and the lands and premises on which the same are situate and standing, now used and belonging, and to be used or belonging, or in any wise appertaining to said railroad, together with all and singular the real estate, tenements, hereditaments, and appurtenances of the said railway company, together with and also the right to ask, demand, and receive, for their own use and benefit, all the tolls, profits, income, and rent, and charges which may or can be legally demanded or received, for the transportation of persons or property upon or over the said railroad, or any part thereof, or resulting in any wise from the operations and working of said railroad, or the use and occupation of the demised property, or any part thereof, together with the use of all the personal property of the said company, used or to be used upon or in connection with said leased railroad, with the dividends and profits of the steamboat stock owned by the said railroad company, and "the shares in the stock of said company."

Much discussion of the question whether the Boston, Hartford, and Erie Railroad Company had authority at the time to enter into that indenture is wholly unnecessary, as it is admitted that their act in so doing was fully ratified and confirmed by the laws of the states of Massachusetts and Connecticut. See Laws Mass. 1866, p. 142; Laws Conn. 1869, p. 264. Even the complainants concede that it was competent for the state legislatures to ratify and confirm the lease, and, the court being of the same opinion, the point may be dismissed without further consideration. Tested alone by the terms of the lease, wholly independent of the indenture of mortgage aforesaid, it is clear that the conclusion must be that the right of possession and use of the leasehold estate, real, personal, and mixed, passed to the respondent lessees named in the lease, which is a proposition virtually admitted by both the parties in this controversy. Intervening facts, however, are necessary to be considered in order to a complete understanding of the matters in dispute. Both parties concede that the Boston, Hartford, and Erie Railroad Company was adjudged bankrupt, and that the complainants, on the 21st of October, 1870, were duly appointed assignees of the estate of the bankrupt corporation, and the record shows that the complainants, as such assignees, claim that the estate of every kind acquired by the said lease passed to the corporation whose estate they represent under the bankrupt act. Opposed to that, the individual respondents claim that the leasehold estate, demised and leased to the bankrupt corporation, passed to them as the legal trustees of the bondholders under the indenture known as the Berdell mortgage. Pursuant to the theory of the bill of complaint, the complainants pray that the individual respondents and the respondent corporation may account to the complainants for all moneys, rents, issues, and profits received by them, and that they respectively may pay to the complainants all such sums as shall be found due on such accounting, and that they may be ordered to deliver to the complainants the said leasehold interests, and to release and convey to the complainants whatever apparent or nominal title they may have to such leasehold interests.

Service was made, and the respondents Hart and Clark appeared and filed an answer. They admit that the Boston, Hartford, and Erie Railroad Company was duly incorporated; that the corporation executed the indenture known as the Berdell mortgage; that the individual respondents are the sole surviving trustees under the same, and that the mortgage is a valid mortgage, duly authorized and ratified by the said several states; that the said corporation and the Norwich and Worcester Railroad Company entered into the agreement of lease as alleged in the bill of complaint; that the corporation lessee under that lease was subsequently adjudged bankrupt, and that the complainants were appointed assignees of the estate of the bankrupt corporation. Moneys, it may be assumed, were received by the lessors of that railroad, from the traffic, rents, and profits of the same, but the individual respondents deny that it was the duty of the said lessors to account for or pay over the same to the complainants, and they assert that they claim that the said lease and the benefit thereof passed to the trustees under the said indenture of mortgage, and that they, as such trustees, are entitled to require said lessors to account and pay all such moneys to them, as after-acquired property, under the indenture known as the Berdell mortgage. Other grounds of claim and of defence are set up in the pleadings growing out of the decree of the state court, but, in the view taken of the case, the whole merits of the controversy must turn upon the question whether the leasehold interest acquired by the lease passed to the trustees under the mortgage as after-acquired property. Plainly, if those interests did pass to the trustees as after-acquired property, the bill of complaint must be dismissed, and, if they did not, it is equally clear that the complainants are entitled to a decree, and in that view it follows that the other issues of law may be dismissed without further consideration. Argument to show that the parties intended to create a lien or charge upon property of the kind enumerated subsequently acquired, as well as upon property in existence and in actual possession, is hardly necessary, as the affirmative of the proposition is supported by the express words of the indenture of mortgage, the rule being that when parties intend to create a lien upon property not then in actual existence, it attaches in equity as soon as the person who grants the lien acquires the possession and title of the same. Mitchel v. Winslow, [Case No. 9,673;] Pennock v. Coe, 23 How. [64 U. S.] 117.

Privileges, franchises, rights, leases, and charters are included in the mortgage, as well as lands, tracks, lines, rails, bridges, ways, depots, stations, water-tanks, shops, buildings, piers, wharves, erections, fences, walls, and fixtures; and the instrument following that specific enumeration proceeds to provide "also all the like estate, roads, railroads, and structures, and matters and things pertaining or belonging thereto, that may be acquired or constructed, or be controlled by the granting party, together with all the tolls, income, issues, and profits to be had from the same, and every thing necessary for the complete use of the railroad." Language more explicit and comprehensive could not well be chosen, and the instrument proceeds to another enumeration, and specifies all the locomotives, engines, tenders, cars, carriages, tools, shops, fixtures, and machinery, and all the coal, wood, and other fuel belonging or appertaining to the said railroad, or that may at any time hereafter belong or appertain to the same as it may be changed by use and new acquisitions. More specific terms of inclusion, it would seem, could not be employed, and yet the grantors, as if to make certainty doubly sure, add as follows: "also, all the estate, real, personal, and mixed, of any of the foregoing descriptions, or of any other kind which may be hereafter acquired by the granting party and be used, or intended to be used, in the construction and operation of the said railroad." Leases are specifically named as matters conveyed by the mortgage, and the express words of the instrument are, that all the estate, real, personal, and mixed, of any of the descriptions mentioned, or of any other kind which may hereafter be acquired by the grantors, or be used or intended for use, in the construction or operation of the said railroad, shall also pass to the mortgagees under the mortgage. Suppose that is so, the rule established by the two leading cases already cited shows that the complainants cannot recover. It must be so, unless the rule promulgated in those cases is overruled, which cannot be done for at least two reasons, (1) because the rule is a sound one; (2) because it is supported by many other decisions, to a few of which only reference will be made. Dunham v. Cincinnati, P. & C. R. Co., 1 Wall. [68 U. S.] 267; Galveston R. R. v. Cowdrey, 11 Wall. [78 U. S.] 481; U. S. v. New Orleans R. Co., 12 Wall. [79 U. S.] 364; Butt v. Ellett, 19 Wall. [86 U. S.] 547; Willink v. Morris Canal & Banking Co., 3 Green, Ch. [4 N. J. Eq.] 395; Smithurst v. Edmunds, 1 McCart, Ch. [14 N. J. Eq.] 411; Pierce v. Emery, 32 N. H. 503.

Many other authorities support the proposition that, whenever parties by their contract intend to create a positive lien or charge, either upon real or personal property, whether owned by the assignor or contractor or not, or, if personal property, whether it is then in being or not, the contract attaches in equity, as a lien or charge upon the particular property, as soon as the assignor or contractor acquires a title thereto. Seymour v. Canandaigua & N. F. R. Co., 25 Barb. 284; Curtis v. Auber, 1 Jac. & W. 531; Langton v. Horton, 1 Hare, 556; Field v. Mayor, 2 Seld. [6 N. Y.] 185. Apply the established rule to the case, and it is clear that the complainants cannot recover, and in that view the court is of the opinion that it is not necessary to examine the other questions discussed at the bar.

Decree that the bill of complaint is dismissed, with costs.

BARNARD, (PHILADELPHIA & R. R. CO. v.) See Case No. 11,086.

Case No. 1,008.

BARNARD v. TAYLOE.

[5 Cranch, C. C. 403.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. March Term, 1838.

PLEADING—TROVER—LIMITATIONS.

Not guilty within three years, is a good plea in trover.

[At law. Action by Frederick Barnard against Benjamin O. Tayloe.] Trover; plea, not guilty within three years. General demurrer. [Overruled.]

Mr. Hoban, for the defendant, contended that the plea should have been actio non accrevit; and cited the case of Union Bank v. Chason, at November term, 1835, (unreported;) Dyster v. Battye, 3 Barn. & Ald. 448; and Richman v. Richman, 3 Hals. [8 N. J. Law,] 55.

Mr. Key, contra, cited the case of Bank of Columbia v. Ott's Adm'r, in this court, [Case No. 879;] Maryland Act of Limitations of 1715; and Evans' Harr. 48.

THE COURT (nem. con.) overruled the demurrer.

BARNARD, (WILKINSON v.) See Case No. 17,669.

BARNARD, The EDWARD. See Case No. 4,291.

BARNER, (BARLOW v.) See Case No. 998.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

Case No. 1,009.

BARNERT et al. v. HIGHTOWER et al.

[10 N. B. R. 157.]

District Court, N. D. Mississippi. May 29, 1874.

BANKRUPTCY—AMENDMENTS TO LAW—RETROACTIVE EFFECT.

[1. The amendment of the bankrupt law approved June 22, 1874, (18 Stat. 178,) provides that the petition filed in involuntary bankruptcy proceedings shall show that one-fourth in number and one-third in amount of all the creditors join in the petition, failing which the proceedings shall be dismissed; and that this provision shall apply to all cases commenced since December, 1873. Held, that this does not include cases in which the order adjudicating the debtor a bankrupt had been passed before the adoption of the amendment, and hence such proceedings will not be dismissed under this section.]

[2. But in so far as the amendment of June 22, 1874, affects any remedies not ripened into fixed rights before its adoption, they will be applied to cases in which the adjudication was passed before their adoption, as well as those since made.]

[In bankruptcy. Petition by Barnert Berry, Reed & Co. against Hightower & Butler. The respondents were adjudged bankrupts, and an assignee appointed. The petitioning creditor and others now petition that the proceedings be dismissed. Heard on demurrers by the defendant and certain creditors. Demurrers sustained.]

R. S. Smith, H. W. Walter, and L. P. Cooper, for petitioners.

H. A. Barr and Robert Taylor, for defendants.

HILL, District Judge. The petition of Barnert, Berry, Reed & Co., was, on the 29th day of May, 1874, filed in this court against the defendants, praying that they might be declared bankrupts and the regular proceedings had, by which they were, by the judgment and decree of this court, duly declared bankrupts on the 4th day of June, upon the charge of having, as merchants, suspended and not resumed payment of their commercial paper within a period of fourteen days. On the 7th day of July, an assignee was selected and a deed of assignment executed, conveying to him the estates of the bankrupts, both that held as copartners and as individuals; who took the same in possession and now holds it, except that portion which he has sold under the order of the court. The petitioning creditor, with other creditors of the copartnership now file their petition, praying that the proceedings be dismissed, upon the allegation that the said Barnert, Berry, Reed & Co., upon whose petition the declaration of bankruptcy was made, did not embrace the one-fourth in number, and whose debt did not embrace the one-third in amount of the debts due and owing by the defendants, as required by the amendments to the bankrupt law approved on the 22d day of June, 1874; and that one-fourth in number and one-third in amount cannot be procured to join in such petition, praying such adjudication. To this petition the defendant and individual creditors have interposed their demurrer, insisting, as cause of demurrer:

First. That congress, by the amendments stated, did not intend to embrace bankrupt causes in which judgments and decrees of adjudication had passed before the amendments went into effect.

Second. That if such had been the intention of the legislation, it would have been an interference with vested rights, and an attempted invasion by the legislative department of the government with that which alone belongs to the judicial department.

The questions thus presented have been ably, I may say exhaustively, argued by the distinguished counsel on both sides; who have read and commented upon a large number of authorities, especially upon the last question stated. These questions are of unusual importance at the present time, as affecting the interest of both bankrupts and creditors, and call for as speedy a settlement as may be consistent with a proper interpretation of the meaning of the amendments, and their proper application, involved in so much doubt and uncertainty, and upon which the ablest members of the profession differ. I have given to the subject all the examination and consideration which the pressure upon my time would permit, with the sole desire to give effect to the intention of congress in the passage of these amendments. It is admitted that the judgment of the court adjudicating the defendants bankrupts, was all regular and binding until the adoption of the amendments; and is still so if unaffected thereby. It is further admitted that as to all involuntary bankruptcies, commenced since the 1st December, 1873, and in which the question of bankruptcy was pending at the adoption of the amendments, they do apply. From the conclusion to which I have arrived, the second ground of demurrer stated, need not be considered only for the purpose of shedding light upon the first.

In considering whether or not congress intended to give a retroactive effect to cases in which judgments of adjudication had passed before the adoption of the amendments, it is necessary to consider the nature and effect of the judgment of adjudication. This involuntary or compulsory feature of the bankrupt law is in its nature a suit brought by the petitioning creditors on behalf of all the other creditors as well as of themselves, against the alleged bankrupt, their common debtor, for the purpose of obtaining judgment against him for the amounts respectively due them, to be satisfied as far as his estate will permit; first, out of the incumbered estate to those holding the incumbrance according to priority, and the remainder to be equally divided between the general creditors, according to the amount due them respectively. The effect of the adjudication, when made, is such a judgment in favor of the creditors against the bankrupt; the disposition of the estate is only the execution of this judgment.

The assignment made to the assignee relates back to the commencement of proceedings, and is a complete divestiture of the title of the bankrupt to his estate, and a vestiture of the same in the assignee for the benefit of the creditors. It, to my mind, is difficult to conceive any reason why this judgment shall have accorded to it less force and effect than a judgment or decree given or pronounced by a court of law or equity, creating a lien on the property of the defendant. If I am correct in this conclusion, can it be presumed that congress intended to annul and set aside these judgments by this legislation? I cannot believe they did. That body is composed mainly of able lawyers; this is especially so with the distinguished jurists comprising the judiciary committees of both houses, who digested and reported these amendments. Our government is complex in its nature; to give security and permanence, it is in its governing powers divided into three separate, distinct, and independent departments—executive, legislative, and judicial. So long as these different departments keep within their own sphere the government is safe, and the rights of the citizens are secure; but when either shall be permitted to invade and usurp the powers and jurisdiction pertaining to another, there is danger. An assumption of judicial powers by the legislative, or legislative powers by the judiciary, has uniformly met with the strongest condemnation by our wisest and best jurists and statesmen; and I must believe was not intended by those eminent jurists and statesmen who reported these amendments, and those who passed them.

The difficulty arises upon the language used in the section adopted as a substitute for section 39, in the original act [of March 2, 1867, 14 Stat. 536,] which creates the same causes denounced as acts of bankruptcy, as those in the original act, with this exception, that the time allowed the debtor in which to resume the payment of his commercial paper, is extended from fourteen to forty days. Under the original act, to give the court jurisdiction to proceed under the compulsory clause, the petitioning creditors were required to aver in the petition that the alleged bankrupt owed debts to the amount of three hundred dollars or more, and that he owed the petitioning creditor or creditors, provable under the bankrupt law, debts to the amount of two hundred and fifty dollars. These were jurisdictional facts, without the allegation of which the proceedings would be denied in the first instance, and, if averred and denied by the defendant, and not proved, the proceedings would be dismissed without inquiry as to whether the acts of bankruptcy had been committed or not. This amendment upon this jurisdictional question, changes the law in this, that it requires one-fourth in number and one-third in amount of the creditors to join in the petition, and requires that these jurisdictional facts shall be stated in the petition, and, if denied, and a sufficient number and amount shall not be procured within the time limited, the proceedings shall be dismissed. The question is, what proceedings? The answer is, the proceedings to obtain the declaration or judgment of bankruptcy and all the proceedings had, not disturbing rights of others, which may, in the meantime, have attached, growing out of the proceedings. It is provided that the provisions of this section shall apply to all cases commenced since the 1st day of December, 1873; this can well be given to all cases in which the judgment of adjudication had not been had before the adoption of these amendments; no judgment had been pronounced to be revoked, no rights had been fixed, the whole proceedings were in fieri; ample opportunity is given to permit the petitioning creditors to associate with them a sufficient number and amount to bring themselves within the provisions of the law, and also to do justice in relation to any action before that time had; so that it seems to me full effect can be given to the act and the intention of the lawmakers, without in any way affecting either the bankrupts or creditors in cases in which the rights of the bankrupt or creditors were fixed by the judgments and decrees of the court, properly made, before the adoption of the amendments. It is insisted by the present petitioners' counsel that the bankrupt court is constantly in session, and that, from the commencement to the final conclusion of a bankrupt cause there is but one term; that the adjudication of bankruptcy is but an interlocutory order, and may, in the discretion of the court, be set aside at any time, so as to every other order. In a certain sense this is so, but it is a judicial discretion, and must be based upon a proper proceeding and for a sufficient cause and in a proper time, and not by the arbitrary will of the judge or court.

Proceedings in bankruptcy are divided into separate parts, some affecting the bankrupt and the creditors, others affecting the bankrupt alone, and still others the creditor alone, or, rather, some relating to the creditors and bankrupt, and others the creditors alone, as but few questions can affect the bankrupt which do not interest the creditors. The first solemn judgment is the adjudication of bankruptcy, which fixes the status of the bankrupt, with his liabilities and rights as imposed and conferred by the law; this judgment cannot be disturbed or set aside only upon proper judicial proceedings, for sufficient cause, and within a reasonable time. The next is the granting or refusal of the bankrupt's discharge; this judgment, like the former, is final, unless set aside upon proper judicial proceedings, for sufficient cause, and within the prescribed time, if one is prescribed, if not, within a reasonable time, to be judged of by the court. The allotment of exemptions, the marshaling and disposition of the assets among the creditors, are all, in their nature and effect, judicial judgments and decrees, conferring and fixing rights, final and binding, unless reversed, set aside, changed, or modified by proper proceedings, and for sufficient reasons.. These proceedings are held at different times, and not necessarily dependent on each other, nor subject to the arbitrary will or discretion of the judge or court passing them.

It is further argued by counsel that unless congress intended to embrace adjudicated cases, nothing was meant, and this is not to be presumed; that it must have been known to the legislative mind that nearly all cases in which proceedings had been commenced since the 1st of December, 1873, have already been adjudicated; but such was not the case; under the law as it then stood, when opposition was made and a jury demanded, the cause could only be tried at a regular term of the court, which, in most districts, is held but twice in the year; but it will be remembered that when congress, immediately on assembling, entered into the consideration of the repeal or amendment of the bankrupt law, the house, with unusual haste, passed a bill repealing the entire bankrupt law; the senate, being more considerate and deliberate in its organization and mode of passing upon great national questions, did little else, before the Christmas recess, than to consider the question, which resulted in the passage of these amendments, which went to the house for their concurrence, and which, it was hoped and urged, should be adopted and become a law before the recess; and, had such been the case, very few cases commenced after the 1st of December would have passed into adjudication before the amendments would have gone into operation. These amendments were, to a great extent, produced by the financial panic then pervading over the entire country, and were intended to relieve its victims, either creditors or debtors. Had congress believed they had the power or intended to affect adjudicated cases, it would doubtless have extended it back to the commencement of the panic. These considerations, I am of opinion, answer these objections. These amendments, so far as they affect any remedies not ripened into fixed rights before their adoption, will, upon well settled principles, be applied to cases in which the adjudication was passed before their adoption, as well as those since or hereafter to be made; for instance, in granting or withholding the discharge. Under the former law the bankrupt's assets were required to equal fifty per cent. of the debts proved, or the written assent of the designated number and amount of his creditors, to entitle him to a discharge under the present law; this requisition is dispensed with, so that involuntary bankrupts, if otherwise entitled, will be entitled to a discharge without this requisition, although the adjudication of bankruptcy was passed before the new law went into operation so far as regards all other pending remedies. The discharge is a matter of grace, and not right, until after it is granted. This is so both as it affects the bankrupt and his creditors. The creditor, upon the judgment of adjudication, becomes entitled to his portion of the estate, whatever that may be; any further rights are held in abeyance until the question of discharge is determined; if granted, the debt is discharged; if refused, the creditor still holds his obligation against the bankrupt, to be satisfied out of his acquisitions obtained after the bankruptcy, for any balance due. It is not the province of the courts to determine whether these amendments are wise or unwise, but to determine the intent and purpose of the legislative mind in passing them, and to make a proper application of them according to that intention.

It has been urged with unusual energy by counsel, that the language used leaves the court no room for construction, that it positively and unqualifiedly says it shall embrace all cases commenced since the 1st of December, 1873. This, as a matter of course, would include cases in which the discharge has been granted and the estate closed up, of which there are quite a number in this state; but in reply to this it is ingeniously stated by counsel that this contains a provision that the rights already fixed shall remain; yet the case was commenced since the 1st of December and must be embraced within its provisions, as no excepuon is mentioned. So that in my opinion there is ground for construction, so as to determine what was the legislative meaning and intention; in other words, what class of cases was referred to when it is said "all cases commenced since the 1st of December, 1873." It was, as it appears to my mind, that in which was to be determined the question as to whether or not an act of bankruptcy had been committed. The only change made as to what constituted an act of bankruptcy being the suspension of commercial paper, extending the time necessary to constitute the act of bankruptcy, and this was the class principally desired to be relieved; and as no rights were fixed before the judgment of adjudication, congress could, without any invasion of the judicial department, provide that the party should not be adjudicated a bankrupt unless the suspension had continued for forty days or any other time congress might determine, or any other cause of bankruptcy might have been dispensed with or modified, but no new cause could have been added so as to have a retroactive effect. Having concluded that the cause under consideration is not embraced in the class of cases subject to the retroactive operation of these amendments, renders the consideration of the question as to the power of congress to give a retroactive effect to the amendments unnecessary, and consequently, any consideration of the numerous authorities read and commented upon by the learned counsel on both sides.

The result is that the demurrer must be sustained, the petition dismissed, and the cause proceed, so as to afford to both the bankrupts and creditors their respective rights under the law.

Case No. 1,010.

Ex parte BARNES.

[1 Spr. 133;[1] 9 Law Rep. 314.]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. April Term, 1846.

HABEAS CORPUS — ISSUANCE BY COMMISSIONER — HABEAS CORPUS AD TESTIFICANDUM.

1. A commissioner of the circuit court has not the power to issue a writ of habeas corpus, to take from jail a person committed by authority of the United States, and bring him before the commissioner, for the purpose of giving his deposition before such commissioner, to be used in a cause pending in the district court.

2. Whether a judge of a court of the United States can exercise the power of issuing writs of habeas corpus ad testificandum, in vacation, even for the purpose of bringing witnesses into court at the approaching session—quaere.

This was an application by the marshal to be allowed certain fees for bringing witnesses from jail. The point raised in the case will appear from the opinion of the court.

George T. Curtis, in support of the application.

SPRAGUE, District Judge. The question which has been argued by counsel, in the present case, is, whether a commissioner of the circuit court, has the power to issue a writ of "habeas corpus," to take from jail a person committed by authority of the United States, and bring him before the commissioner, for the purpose of giving his deposition before such commissioner, to be used in a cause pending in the district court. The first statute cited is that of 1812, [2 Stat.] c. 25, § 1, which authorizes the circuit court to appoint commissioners to take affidavits and bail. And the next is the statute of 1817, c. 203, [Story's Laws; 3 Stat. 350, c. 30,] which authorizes such commissioners to "exercise all the powers that a justice or judge of any of the courts of the United States may exercise, by virtue of the 30th section of the judiciary act" of 1789, [1 Stat. 88,] c. 20. By that section, power is given to "any justice or judge of any court of the United States, any chancellor, justice or judge of a supreme or superior court, mayor or chief magistrate of a city, or judge of a county court, or court of common pleas of any of the United States," to take depositions. "And any person may be compelled to appear" before them "in the same manner, as to appear and testify in court."

It is urged, that the clause authorizing the magistrate to compel the appearance of the witness, gives a power to issue a writ of "habeas corpus," to bring a prisoner from jail for that purpose. By the 14th section of the same statute, the supreme, circuit, and district courts of the United States, are authorized to "issue writs of scire facias, habeas corpus, and all other writs not specially provided for by statute, which may be necessary for the exercise of their respective jurisdictions, and agreeable to the principles and usages of law." And that either of the justices of the supreme court, as well as judges of the district courts, shall have power to grant writs of "habeas corpus," for the purpose of an inquiry into the cause of commitment, with a proviso, that the writ of habeas corpus shall not extend to persons in jail, unless they are in custody under color of laws of the United States, or necessary to be brought into court to testify. By the statute of 1833, [4 Stat. 634,] 2d Sess. c. 57, § 7, further power is given to the justices and judges of the courts of the United States, to issue writs of "habeas corpus."

The question is, whether the 30th section of the judiciary act, gives power to take prisoners from jail and bring them before the magistrate, merely for the purpose of giving depositions. If it does, then all the magistrates therein named, including the state judges, and mayors of cities possess it. And all the prisoners of the United States are subject to it, and may be carried to any part of the district, at the pleasure of the commissioner, or judge of a county court of the state, or the mayor of the city. Considering the danger and inconvenience of such a construction, and that the power to issue writs of "habeas corpus" is given to the courts and judges of the United States by other statute provisions, guarding and limiting its exercise, and that the words of the section relied upon, are satisfied by the usual modes of compelling attendance, I do not think that, by the true construction of the 30th section of the judiciary act, it confers the power to issue writs of "habeas corpus" now contended for. Judge Conkling, in his treatise [on United States Courts,] page 247, intimates the opinion, that the power to issue writs of habeas corpus ad testificandum is confined to the courts of the United States, and cannot be exercised by a justice or judge of such courts in vacation, although for the purpose of bringing witnesses into court, at the approaching session.

[1] [Reported by F. E. Parker, Esq., assisted by Charles Francis Adams, Jr., Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

Case No. 1,011.

In re BARNES.

[10 Ben. 79.][1]

District Court, S. D. New York. Aug. Term, 1878.

CUSTOMS DUTIES—REMISSION OF FORFEITURE—ENTRY OF DECREE.

1. A suit was commenced by the United States against V. & Co., to recover the value of goods alleged to have been entered by them in violation of the 1st section of the act of congress of March 3, 1863, [12 Stat. 737.] While it was pending, proceedings in bankruptcy were commenced against V. & Co., and B. was appointed assignee. Thereafter the attorney for V. &. Co. in that suit withdrew a plea in bar and filed a cognovit that judgment be entered, and it was entered accordingly for $99,951.25. At the first meeting of creditors, the United States district attorney appeared and filed a proof of debt, setting forth that judgment. The assignee excepted to the proof and on the matter being certified to the court, it was held that the claim was provable in bankruptcy, on the basis of the facts out of which the liability arose. The matter was referred to the register to take proof of the validity and amount of the claim. He reported, and on the 18th of August, 1874, the judge decided, that the United States was entitled to prove for the amount of the claim. No formal order to that effect was signed by the judge, but a minute to that effect was endorsed by him on the papers, and from that decision the assignee appealed to the circuit court, which affirmed the decision. The assignee then filed a petition for remission, and an order was made, referring it to a commissioner to inquire as to the facts of the case. After this order a formal order was entered nunc pro tunc, in conformity to the minute of the district judge of August 18th, 1874. The commissioner having made his report, and the same having been certified to the secretary of the treasury for decision, and having been by him returned to the commissioner for revision, the United States district attorney moved for an order dismissing the proceedings on the petition for remission, claiming that it was not competent for the secretary of the treasury to give a remission in the case. Held, that, the court having been informed by the judge, before whom the petition for remission came, and by whom the order of reference to a commissioner was made, that substantially the same ground was then taken by the district attorney and overruled by the court, that ruling, having been submitted to and never reversed, must be regarded as the settled law of the court, or at any rate, of the case.

2. That it made no difference that since that time the order had been entered nunc pro tunc on the minute of the judge, of August 18th, 1874.

3. That that minute under the circumstances of this case was to be held to have the same effect as if the order had been then entered on it.

4. That the motion to dismiss the petition must be denied.

5. The district attorney also moved that the petitioner be compelled to make the record of the case a part of his petition. Held, that the United States might prove the facts embodied in the record, but that this motion also must be denied.

[Proceeding by Demas Barnes, assignee in bankruptcy of Theodore H. Vetterlein, Bernhard T. Vetterlein, and Theodore J. Vetterlein, for remission of forfeitures incurred by the bankrupts for violation of the revenue laws. A reference was ordered, and the commissioner's report certified to the secretary of the treasury. By stipulation the case has been returned by the secretary to the commissioner for a revision of his findings, subject to an appeal to the district judge. Heard on motion by the United States to dismiss the proceedings. Denied. Heard also on motion by the United States to make the record of the case wherein the forfeiture was decreed a part of the petition. Denied.]

Roger M. Sherman, Asst. Dist. Atty., for the United States.

Henry T. Wing, for assignee.

CHOATE, District Judge. This is a motion to dismiss proceedings brought to procure the remission of penalties claimed to have been incurred by breach of the customs revenue laws.

Theodore H. Vetterlein, Bernhard T. Vetterlein and Theodore J. Vetterlein were partners in business, and were adjudicated bankrupts, upon a petition of their creditors, filed December 28th, 1870. Barnes, the petitioner, was appointed their assignee in bankruptcy, March 1, 1871. Prior to the time of the filing of the petition in bankruptcy, suit was commenced in this court against the Vetterleins, to recover the value of goods alleged to have been entered by them at the New York custom house, in violation of the 1st section of the act of March 3rd, 1863, [12 Stat. 737.] At the time of the bankruptcy the suit was at issue and undetermined. After the bankruptcy the attorney for defendants withdrew their plea in bar of the action, and filed a cognovit that judgment be entered for the amount of the claim, $99,951.25. The United States appeared by the district attorney at the first meeting of creditors and filed proof of the claim, setting forth the judgment as the basis of the claim. Exceptions were filed by the assignee to the proof, on the ground that the claim was not one provable in bankruptcy; but upon the matter being certified to the judge, he held [unreported] that the claim was provable in bankruptcy, but not on the basis of the judgment, and that the proof must be on the basis of the facts out of which the liability grew; and on the 22d of June, 1872, the matter was referred to the register to take proof of the validity and amount of the claim, and to report the evidence to the court. The register reported and the judge of this court decided on the 18th of August, 1874, [unreported,] that the United States was entitled to prove for the amount of the claim. No formal order to that effect was signed by the judge, but a minute to that effect was endorsed by him on the papers. From this decision the assignee appealed to the circuit court, and, after argument, Mr. Justice Hunt affirmed the decision. [In re Vetterlein, Case No. 16,- 929.] On the 25th of August, 1875, the assignee filed his petition for remission; and upon notice to the district attorney, and after hearing thereon, the district judge made an order referring it to a commissioner to make summary inquiry into the circumstances of the case.

[1] [Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and Benj. Lincoln Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

After this hearing before the judge and this order of reference, a formal order was entered nunc pro tunc as of April 20, 1872, the date of the original proof of debt, in conformity with the decision of the district judge, of August 18, 1874, and the affirmance thereof by the circuit justice.

The commissioner having made his report, and the same having been certified to the secretary of the treasury for decision, the case has by stipulation been returned by the secretary to the commissioner for a revision of his findings of fact on the evidence already taken, subject to the right of appeal to the district judge, if any such right of appeal exists. And the case being thus again before the commissioner, this motion is made by the district attorney.

The point made by the district attorney is, that it is not competent under the acts of congress for the secretary to remit a forfeiture after an adjudication by a court of competent jurisdiction, which necessarily involves a finding of fact against the defendants, that the penalty was incurred by them with actual intent to defraud the United States and not without such intent or gross negligence; that the decision of the district judge that the penalty was incurred necessarily involves, under the act of March 3d, 1863, a finding that they did the acts complained of with this guilty intent, since by the terms of that act, the wrongful entry of the goods must be made "knowingly" by the parties complained of. It is also claimed by the district attorney, that upon this question the United States is not concluded by the order of reference made Sept. 24, 1875, as a determination of the question of jurisdiction, since at that time no formal order had been entered in conformity to the judge's decision, declaring the debt due and subject to proof; that therefore there was at that time no adjudication of the guilty intent, and the question of jurisdiction now raised could not then arise. He also insists that the question of jurisdiction is always open and even if the point could then have been taken, that a motion to dismiss for want of jurisdiction is proper at any stage of the proceedings.

As to the question whether when the petition was first before the district judge, there had been a judicial determination or judgment upon the question of the intent, so far as the finding of the intent is necessarily involved in the judgment that the debt was due and provable, I am of opinion that the parties to this proceeding are estopped to deny that there was such a judgment. While it is true that as matter of practice it is customary in this court, following the analogy of the practice in the courts of the state of New York, always to enter a formal order to be signed by the judge, yet in other jurisdictions and in many of the states of the Union, the mode of entering a judgment or order of the court is to have a brief memorandum of the same minuted on the papers or on a docket by the clerk by the judge's direction, and this is deemed to be and treated as the record of the judgment or order of the court, until an extended record of the same is made by the clerk, often long afterwards, the minute so made serving as a sufficient basis for the issue of execution or other proceeding subsequent to judgment. I should hesitate, therefore, notwithstanding the practice that prevails, to hold that a minute on the papers by the judge, containing in itself the very substance of the order subsequently entered, was not to be deemed a judgment or order in the sense now in question. But, however this may be, both of these parties have in their dealings with each other and with the court assumed the existence of such a judgment or decision. The petition for remission recites such a "decision" by the district judge. The appeal from the decision by the assignee alleged such a decision as the basis of an appeal. The United States appeared and argued the appeal on the merits and procured its affirmance, thereby reasserting the existence of the judgment appealed from. The court must have been led to assume the existence of the judgment, and the entry of the order finally nunc pro tunc after the irregularity of practice was discovered, was made to conform the record to the fact as all parties had up to that time assumed it to be. It would be clearly improper, therefore, to allow either party any benefit from the fact that no formal order had been entered when the petition of remission was first before the court.

I am informed by his honor Judge Blatchford, before whom that petition came, that the point was then made by the district attorney that this was not a case in which it was competent for the secretary of the treasury to remit the forfeiture, substantially on the ground now taken by the district attorney, but that the court refused to hear argument of the question, on the ground, as then stated orally to the counsel, that although the intervention of the district judge at some stages of the case is made necessary by the statute, yet that the design of the statute was to make the secretary of the treasury the real judge in the case as well upon the merits as upon any question of jurisdiction that might arise, and that therefore it was not proper, unless in a case of want of jurisdiction so clear as not to admit of argument, for the district judge to deprive the secretary of his power to decide the case by refusing to entertain the petition or to certify the case for decision, by a determination against the jurisdiction. To assume such power to dismiss the petition, without any right of appeal to the secretary on that question, would virtually oust the secretary of the jurisdiction to determine the cause given him by the act of congress. See Gallego v. U. S., [Case No. 5,201.]

This ruling was submitted to and has never been reversed. It must be regarded as the settled law of this court, or, at any rate, as the settled law of this case. The motion to dismiss is therefore denied.

The district attorney also moves that the petitioner be compelled to make the record of the case which resulted in the decision that the debt was due and provable, including the testimony taken in that proceeding, a part of his petition, or, in default thereof, that the petition be dismissed. This motion must also be denied. It is true that the petitioner should set forth all the circumstances of the case in his petition. But if this record and the decision made upon this testimony are to be regarded as "circumstances" within the meaning of the statute, which is at least doubtful, yet, in case of a failure to set forth in the petition all the circumstances, the United States may prove them as facts and so have the full benefit of them; and if the petition is so defective as to call for the interference of the court to compel a fuller statement, the application must be made much more promptly than it has been made in this case. For these and other reasons, this motion is denied.

Case No. 1,012.

In re BARNES.

[1 Lowell, 560.] [1]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. March Term, 1871.

BANKRUPTCY—POWER OF ATTORNEY — ACKNOWLEDGMENT—PROOF—ACT MARCH 2, 1867, § 22.

1. A power of attorney to prove a debt in bankruptcy need not be acknowledged though drawn according to form twenty-six.

2. A creditor cannot prove by an attorney testifying upon information and belief, unless the creditor is prevented from giving the affidavit as provided by section 22 [of the act of March 2, 1867; 14 Stat. 527.]

[Cited in Re Watrous, Case No. 17,270.]

[In bankruptcy. In the matter of H. F. Barnes. On the register's certificate.]

LOWELL, District Judge. I understand two questions to be certified: 1. Whether a power of attorney drawn up according to form No. 26, of the general orders in bankruptcy, must be acknowledged? 2. Whether under such a power the attorney may make oath to the deposition in proof of his principal's debt, without showing that the creditor is absent from the United States, or prevented by some other good cause from testifying? I answer both questions in the negative. 1. I know of no law which requires powers of attorney of this sort to be acknowledged, and I can see no possible reason why any such law should ever be passed. It is true that form 26 of a letter of attorney to represent a creditor has a foot-note to the effect that it may be acknowledged before a judge, &c., but I suppose the supreme court would have prescribed some rule upon the subject if they had intended to make such action obligatory. In the form No. 14, which would have been sufficient for the purposes of this case, there is no such foot-note, and it has been decided that no acknowledgment is necessary where that form is used: In re Powell, [Case No. 11,354.] I understand that the forms are largely advisory; and duly executed writing which expresses the essential fact of the appointment of the attorney and the powers confided to him must be respected by the judge or register. Whether the foot-note in question was ordered by the supreme court to be appended to the form I do not know, but if it was, it must have been in anticipation that some question of acknowledgment might arise under the municipal law of some particular state, and it is therefore pointed out that in case of acknowledgment it may be before certain officers named. Section 23 of the act [of March 2, 1867; 14 Stat. 528] provides that any creditor may act at all meetings by his duly accredited attorney, and I cannot believe that the foot-note to form 26 is a rule that the letter appointing such an attorney must be acknowledged, nor even that it must be a deed.

The other question must also be answered in the negative. Section 23, just cited, refers to acts by creditors who have proved their debts, or made the proper deposition to prove them, and provides that all such acts may be performed by attorney; but section 22 [March 2, 1867; 14 Stat. 527] shows when a debt may be sworn to by attorney; and that is when the creditor is absent from the United States, or is prevented by some other good cause from testifying. This cause need not be stated in the letter of attorney, but is to be proved to the satisfaction of the judge or register before whom the debt is offered for proof. If the attorney be acquainted with the facts of his own knowledge, it has been held that he may testify without proving the creditor is absent, &c.; but I am speaking of one who proposes to depose only upon information and belief. The law requires the oath of some person having knowledge, and the creditor himself is presumed to have it, and unless he is absent or in some way prevented from testifying, no one can do so for him, unless it be a person having actual knowledge.

Certificate accordingly to Mr. Conkey, the register.

[1] [Reported by Hon. John Lowell, LL. D., District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

Case No. 1,013.

In re BARNES, et al.

[1 Wkly. Notes Cas. 21.]

District Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. Oct. 7, 1874.

BANKRUPTCY—DIVISION OF CLAIM—APPLICATION OF PAYMENTS—SCHEDULES—EXTRA SERVICES—ALLOWANCE.

[1. Where a creditor of a bankrupt proved a claim composed of a merchandise account and an accommodation note, and subsequently received payments from the bankrupt on account of the accommodation note, the creditor cannot divide the proofs into two parts, after objection by the bankrupt's assignee that such creditor had received a preference.]

[2. The book-keeper of a bankrupt should not be allowed compensation for making schedules of the bankrupt while in the employ of the marshall, and in receipt of his usual salary.]

[3. The claim of a bankrupt for rendering extraordinary services, beyond those required to make the property, rights, credits, and effects available, cannot be allowed by the court, but may be allowed by the creditors, of grace.]

[In bankruptcy. In the matter of Barnes, Brother & Herron.]

Exceptions to report of register, (Parsons).

1. J. E. Johnston & Co. proved a claim against the bankrupts; said claim was composed of two items: First, a merchandise account; secondly, an accommodation note for $1,573. After the failure of the bankrupts, and with a knowledge of that fact, J. E. Johnston & Co. accepted certain payments, amounting to over $1,400, on account of said accommodation note. Objection being made by the assignee that J. E. Johnston & Co. had received a preference, they claimed a right to divide said proof into two parts, to wit, merchandise account and accommodation note account. The register held that they could not so separate their account.

Russell, for Johnston & Co., thereupon excepted to the register's decision.

THE COURT sustained register's decision and overruled the exceptions, and quoted In re European Bank, 8 Ch. App. 41.

2. The book-keeper of the bankrupts claimed compensation for services rendered in making out schedules of bankrupt, he being in the employ at that time of the marshal, and in receipt of his usual salary. The register disallowed his claim, whereupon he excepted to the register's decision.

Rothermal, for Zebley, the book-keeper, and Barnes Brother & Herron, the bankrupts.

THE COURT sustained the decision of the register, and dismissed the exception.

3. The bankrupts having made a claim for services rendered the estate, the same was disallowed by the register, whereupon they excepted to the register's decision.

THE COURT said: "As to question of special allowance to the bankrupts, or any of them, the court perceives no sufficient reason for directing such an allowance. This does not, however, necessarily preclude the allowance of something under this head by the creditors, of grace, if the bankrupts have rendered extraordinary services, beyond those required in order to make the property, rights, credits, and effects available."

Case No. 1,014.

BARNES' HEIRS v. BARNES et al.

[3 Cranch, C. C. 269.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. Term, 1827.

TRUSTS—UNCERTAINTY—STATUTE OF CHARITABLE USES.

1. A devise in trust, to lay out $200 a year in wood, meal, and clothing, to be distributed among the poor and necessitous widows and orphans within the corporation of Georgetown, is void for uncertainty.

2. The statutes of mortmain are in force in Maryland, but the statute of charitable uses (43 Eliz. c. 4) is not, and was not when the county of Washington was separated from the state of Maryland.

3. If either the object of a legacy, or the person of the legatee or cestui que trust, be so uncertain that no one can show a title to claim the legacy, or to enforce the execution of the trust, the legacy and trust are void; even in case of an executory devise. If it be an executed, not an executory devise, it is void if there be no person competent to take at the death of the testator. An executory devise is void, if it be not necessarily to be executed within a life in being at the death of the testator, or within twenty-one years thereafter.

In equity. This was a bill in equity by Hannah and Susan Duryee, the heirs of John Barnes, late of Georgetown, D. C., against his executors and the corporation of Georgetown, to set aside certain legacies and trusts, given and created by his will. The will is dated 12th March, 1825, and the testator died on the 12th of February, 1826.

After providing for the payment of his debts and funeral expenses, manumitting his two negro women, Abigail and Nelly, providing them with an annuity and bequeathing them some small articles, and making a few specific bequests to some of his friends, he devises and bequeathes all the residue of his real and personal estate to his executors, in trust, for the purposes expressed in the will; with power to sell absolutely, and convey the same, and to invest the proceeds in stocks, at their discretion; with power again, from time to time, to sell and reinvest, &c., to answer the trusts and purposes of his will, as they should "think best, and most for the advantage of his estate, and the parties interested therein, and the objects contemplated by" him. And further, upon trust, to pay out of the interest and yearly dividends, or produce to arise from his estate, the annuities thereinbefore and thereinafter mentioned.

1. He then says:—"1. And I do will and desire that the sum of $200 per annum be yearly, and every year forever hereafter, expended by my executors, or trustees for the time being, out of the yearly interest, dividends, and produce of my estate, in wood, meal, and clothing, and that the same may be distributed by them, at the most suitable season of each and every year, amongst the poor and necessitous widows and orphans within the corporation of Georgetown."

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

From the preceding items of bequest it will be perceived, "that no provision is made for Hannah and Susan Duryee, the two daughters of my late grandson, George Clinton Duryee; and I have come to the conclusion of not suffering them, and their stepmother, Hannah Duryee, to partake of my estate, as I had intended they should, and had provided in my will of September last; first, because," &c., stating his reasons at large.

2. "And should my estate, in the course of a few years, after paying the several stipulated sums and charges hereinbefore made thereon, and all expenses attending the same, be such as to enable my executors to extend their views and my wishes to an object of great consideration, namely:—It has often occurred to me that the time was not far distant, (indeed it has already become urgently necessary,) when a poor-house, or bettering-house, for this county or town, (it matters not by what name denominated,) should be established; and, if proposed through the honorable and respectable corporation of Georgetown, I doubt not it would be ultimately successful, and thereby a good foundation would be laid towards perfecting a useful and meritorious work, worthy the enlightened, benevolent, and opulent inhabitants of the district and its vicinity, and the humane at large, of contributing to the comfort and improvement of the suffering objects of such institutions: Whenever any progressive proceedings towards such an end become certain and conclusive, a sum, not exceeding $1,000, as occasionally wanted and demanded, I freely bequeathe towards its establishment; and I do direct my executors, having regard to the bequests hereinbefore contained, to pay the same to the authorities having power and right to receive the same, for such a purpose."

3. "And as to the surplus annual proceeds of my estate, which may not be wanted for the purpose aforesaid, I do request my executors, and trustees for the time being, either to suffer the same to accumulate, and to invest the same from time to time, in bank or other stock, or, in their discretion, to distribute the same annually, or otherwise, amongst such of the poor and needy as may be deserving of the same, either in gifts of money or provisions, fuel or clothing, as my executors, or trustees for the time being may think best, and as they may suppose I would myself have given, or disposed of the same, if living."

4. "And as the establishment of a poor-house, hospital, or bettering-house for this county or town, is an object very near my heart, I do direct that if my executors, or trustees for the time being, shall, in the exercise of the discretion hereby vested in them, suffer the surplus annual proceeds to accumulate, then I give one other $1,000 out of such accumulations, in addition to what I have hereinbefore directed to be applied to that purpose, as aforesaid, in further aid of the establishment and maintenance of such poor-house, hospital, or bettering-house; but neither of such bequests is to be paid or applied until my executors, or trustees for the time being, shall perceive that such proceedings have been begun as will render the final accomplishment and completion of the said poor-house or hospital reasonably certain.

"And when the said several annuitants hereinbefore named shall die, and their said annuities shall sink into my estate and determine, I do hereby direct that my said executors, and trustees for the time being, do and shall stand and be possessed of the whole of the said trust-funds, then unapplied and undisposed of, in trust, to apply and dispose of the whole of the annual proceeds and dividends thereof, in such charities as are hereinbefore mentioned, and so as my desire, as hereinbefore expressed, for and towards the relief of the poor and distressed, and the establishment and maintenance of a poor-house, hospital, or bettering-house may be effected and fully accomplished.

"And I do direct that no part of my estate may be applied to any other than charitable purposes, and to such charitable purposes and objects as I have in this my will named, or as nearly thereto as may be; and that the same purposes may be carried on and continued forever."

After giving $100 to each of his two executors, Mr. Burnett and Mr. English, and rings to several of his friends, and providing for the expenses of the trust, he says:—

"And in order that the trusts, purposes, and charities of this my will may be perpetuated, and forever kept alive and in being, I do hereby direct that whenever either of them, the said C. A. Burnett or David English, shall die, the survivor do and shall immediately associate with himself some proper and respectable inhabitant of Georgetown, to act with him in the said trusts of this my will, and shall, by proper deeds," &c., "convey and assign the said trust property," &c. "And I do direct that the same course may be taken from time to time, whenever any one of the trustees for the time being shall die," &c., "so that the said trusts and charities may forever be preserved and kept alive, and not fail for want of a trustee or trustees at any time or times hereafter."

Mr. Marbury, for the plaintiffs, contended that the trusts for the distribution of "wood, meal, and clothing among the poor and necessitous widows and orphans within the corporation of Georgetown," was void for uncertainty, as to the objects of the bounty. So also the two legacies of $1,000 each, towards "the establishment and maintenance of a poor-house," and the trust to distribute the annual income of the residue of his estate "among such of the poor and needy as may be deserving of the same;" and that the executors held the same in trust for the testator's heirs, and next of kin. He contended, also, that the English statutes of mortmain are in force, but the statute of charitable uses of 43 Eliz. c. 4, is not in force in Maryland, and in this county; and cited Morice v. Bishop of Durham, 9 Ves. 399, 404–406, and 10 Ves. 522, 527, 528, 535, 537, 543; Pow. Dev. 418, 419; Widmore v. Woodroffe, Amb. 636; Trippe v. Frazier, 4 Har. & J. 446; Dashiell v. Attorney General, 5 Har. & J. 398; Trustees of Phila. Baptist Ass'n v. Hart's Ex'rs, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 1, 33; Case of Charitable School at Hillsborough, [Dashiell v. Attorney General,] 6 Har. & J. 1–4; 4 Com. Dig. 146, tit. "Devise," K. At the time of the death of the testator, the corporation of Georgetown had no authority to raise money to build a poor-house, or even to support the poor of the town, nor were they bound to support them. It obtained such authority afterward, but that does not help their case. It was necessary that there should be a competent cestui que trust at the time of the testator's death. Trustees of Phila. Baptist Ass'n v. Hart's Ex'rs, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 1; Godol. Leg. p. 290, § 2; Id. p. 444, § 4; Mann v. Mann, 14 Johns. 13; Attorney General v. Davies, 9 Ves. 546, 547; Chapman v. Brown, 6 Ves. 407, 410, 411; Declaration of Rights of Maryland, art. 3; Landholder's Assistant, 42, § 12; 32 Hen. VIII. c. 1; 34 Hen. VIII. c. 5; 43 Eliz. c. 4; 2 Bl. Comm. 375, 376; Chitty v. Parker, 2 Ves. Jr. 271; Pickering v. Stamford, 3 Ves. 492, 493.

Messrs. Key and Dunlop, for the corporation of Georgetown, contended that the testator's declaration that the plaintiffs should not have any part of his estate was a disposition of it, so as to exclude them as next of kin. That the statutes of mortmain were only applicable to conveyance of land, and non constat that the corporation of Georgetown, would, under this devise, purchase land to build a poor-house upon. That the bequest of funds for that object was not to take effect at the death of the testator, but only when "in the course of a few years" his estate should be such as to enable his executors to extend their views to the object. That in the mean time the corporation, by an amendment of their charter in May, 1826, obtained the power to raise money for the support of the poor, and thereby became competent to receive the legacy. That the trust cannot result to the next of kin contrary to the declared will of the testator. That if one object of the trust fail, the whole will result to any other valid object, by force of the concluding residuary devise. That if the corporation was not competent to take the legacy for the poor-house, yet the levy court of the county, whose duty it was to provide for the poor, had a right to receive and apply it, to the exclusion of the next of kin. Pow. Dev. 320, 323, 336, 422; Godol. Leg. p. 277.

CRANCH, Chief Judge. The complainants contend that the charitable trusts, intended to be created by this will are void for uncertainty, and that the defendants (the executors) are trustees for the complainants (who are heirs at law, and next of kin to the testator,) as to all the property of which the testator died intestate.

1. The first of these charitable trusts, is to lay out $200 a year in wood, meal, and clothing, to be distributed among the poor and necessitous widows and orphans, within the corporation of Georgetown. This trust seems to be admitted by the defendants to be void, under the authority of Trippe v. Frazier, 4 Har. & J. 446, and Dashiell v. Attorney-General, 5 Har. & J. 398, and I am of the same opinion. I think those cases are decisive, that the statute of Elizabeth (of charitable uses) is not in force in Maryland; and was not at the time of the separation of this part of the district from that state.

2. The second charitable trust is, that if the testator's estate, in a few years, should be such as to enable his executors to extend their views to a poor-house for the county or town; and any "progressive proceedings towards such an end should become certain and conclusive," he bequeathes "a sum not exceeding $1,000 as occasionally wanted and demanded, towards its establishment," and he directs his executors "to pay the same to the authorities having power and right to receive the same for such a purpose;" and he, afterwards, in case his executors should suffer the annual proceeds of his estate to accumulate, gives another sum of $1,000, out of such accumulations, to be applied to that purpose, in further aid of the establishment and maintenance of a poor-house; "but neither of such bequests is to be paid or applied until his executors shall perceive that such proceedings have been begun as will render the final accomplishment and completion of the poor-house reasonably certain." The corporation of Georgetown, who are made defendants to this bill, claim these two legacies of $1,000 each, and contend, that if they were not bound to support the poor of the town at the time of the death of the testator, yet they are now bound to do it, by an alteration of their charter; and, as incidental to that duty, they have power to build a poor-house; and have passed a by-law for that purpose, to which they refer in their answer; and they aver that such proceedings have been begun as render the final accomplishment and completion of the poor-house reasonably certain. The corporation of Georgetown also claims all the residue of the proceeds of the estate after the death of the annuitants Abigail and Eleanor, on the ground that all the other charitable trusts are void for uncertainty, and the testator has clearly expressed his intention and will to be, that the whole proceeds of his estate should be expended in such charities as he has named, or as near thereto as may be; and that if some of the trusts are void, the good ones shall take the whole fund. The statute of charitable uses (43 Eliz. c. 4) never was in force in Maryland. Trippe v. Frazier, 4 Har. & J. 446; Dashiell v. Attorney General, 5 Har. & J. 398, 403, and 6 Har. & J. 1. The English decisions, therefore, upon that statute are not applicable to the present case. The peculiar doctrines of the English law in regard to charitable devises, are founded altogether upon that statute. Trustees of Phila. Baptist Ass'n v. Hart's Ex'rs, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 33–48. This case, therefore, must be decided as an ordinary case of legacy and trust. If either the object of the legacy, or the person of the legatee, or cestui que trust, be so uncertain that no one can show a title to claim the legacy, or enforce the execution of the trust, the legacy, or the trust, is void, even in the case of an executory devise.

If the bequest for a poor-house is to be considered as an executed, not an executory, devise, it is void or lapsed, because there was no person competent to take, at the death of the testator. If it be an executory devise, it is also void, because it is not necessarily to be executed within a life in being at the time of the testator's death, or within twenty-one years thereafter. There is no limit to the time of its execution. The trust was to continue forever; and an hundred years might elapse before there should be "authorities having power and right to receive the same for such a purpose," and before "such proceedings shall have been begun as will render the final accomplishment and completion of the said poor-house or hospital reasonably certain." The time may never come, and yet the next of kin will be deprived of the property.

The same reason applies to the trust to dispose of the whole of the annual proceeds of the residue of his estate, in such charities as were thereinbefore mentioned, &c., and I think it is equally void for uncertainty.

I am, therefore, of opinion, upon the whole, that these charitable bequests are all void, and that the complainants are entitled to the relief which they have prayed.

THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, concurred. MORSELL, Circuit Judge, did not give an opinion.

Decreed, that all these charitable trusts and bequests are void, and that the executors and trustees shall invest $1,750 in the six per cent. stock of the corporation of Georgetown, in the names of the executors, to pay the annuities to Abigail and Eleanor, and after their death shall transfer the stock to the complainants, and shall transfer all the residue of the estate to the complainants immediately, in equal parts.

No appeal was taken.

Case No. 1,015.

BARNES et al. v. BILLINGTON et al.

[1 Wash. C. C. 29;[1] 4 Day, 81, note.]

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. April Term, 1803.

ACT OF BANKRUPTCY — CONCEALED DEBTOR—SERVICE OF PROCESS — CONFESSION OF JUDGMENT — EXECUTION—LEVY—LIEN.

1. A debtor concealing himself from, and being denied to his creditors, does not constitute an act of bankruptcy under the laws of the United States, unless the service of process is thereby prevented.

2. If the debtor order himself to be denied to creditors and others, and is in consequence thereof denied to an officer who comes to serve process, it is an act of bankruptcy; provided the officer comes to serve the process and not on other business, and the denial has taken place within six months of the issuing of the commission.

3. Giving a bond with warrant to confess judgment, to one creditor, upon the eve and in contemplation of bankruptcy, does not constitute an act of bankruptcy; unless the judgment entered on the bond, and the issuing of the execution was at the instance or by the procurement of the debtor. Such a bond would be a fraud on the general creditors.

4. Denial to an officer, whereby he is prevented serving process, must be really adversary, and not by concert between the creditor and the debtor to bring about an act of bankruptcy.

5. An execution executed upon the estate of the debtor previous to an act of bankruptcy, gives a lien to the execution creditor, provided the levy be real and bona fide.

[See Haughey v. Albin, Case No. 6,222; Goddard v. Weaver, Id. 5,495; Witt v. Hereth, Id. 17,921; In re Wilbur, Id. 17,633; Webster v. Woolbridge, Id. 17,340; In re Bernstein, Id. 1,350; In re Burns, Id. 2, 182.]

[6. The effect of a seizure under an execution is to change the property in the goods, and vest it in the sheriff.]

[Cited in Bayard v. Bayard, Case No. 1,129; Thompson v. Phillips, Id. 13,974.]

7. An execution is not levied so as to give a lien against purchasers or creditors, if the property is permitted to remain with the debtor. The lien is lost by suffering the property to remain with the debtor as his own until a subsequent execution is levied, or a bona fide sale is made.

8. To make a levy effectual, the property seized should be specially designated in the return of the execution, or by reference to a schedule accompanying it.

9. When a certificated bankrupt, and who has released all future claims upon his estate, is a competent witness.

At law. This was an action of trespass brought by [Barnes and others] the assignees [in bankruptcy of M'Claws] against Billington and Corless, at whose suit an execution had issued, and to satisfy which, the defendant, Israel Israel, the sheriff, had sold the goods of the bankrupt, after an act of bankruptcy committed, and notice of the title of the plaintiffs.

[1] [Originally published from the MSS. of Hon. Bushrod Washington, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, under the supervision of Richard Peters, Jr., Esq.]

The case is fully stated in the charge given to the jury by WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice, after a very full argument of two days.

Ingersoll, Lewis, and Dallas, for plaintiffs.
Tilghman and Ross, for defendants.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. The facts in this case, not disputed, are, that on the 9th of August 1800, Billington relieved M'Claws, a trader within the meaning of the bankrupt law, from being taken on a bail piece, by giving his note to the creditor. To secure Billington, M'Claws gave him his bond with a warrant of attorney to confess judgment, which was accordingly entered up on the 12th, on which day an execution issued, and was delivered to the sheriff. On the 13th of January 1801, M'Claws gave his bond to Billington and Corless, with a warrant of attorney to confess judgment, for about 5,400 dollars. This was given to secure them for certain notes which they had, in November and December 1800, given to judgment creditors of M'Claws, at sixty and ninety days, and which relieved him from those creditors. Judgment on this bond was entered up on the 14th of January, on which day an execution issued, which was delivered to the sheriff, and returned in the following words, viz: "levied on goods as per inventory." No inventory however was made or accompanied the return. The goods, by the permission of Billington and Corless, remained in possession of M'Claws, in his store in Chesnut street, where he continued to carry on his trade, buying and selling, until the 31st of May; when the sheriff, under the execution of the 14th of January, took possession of all the goods in this store, and put a lock on the door. On the 1st of June following, a capias issued against M'Claws, at the suit of Goodwin. The property seized by the sheriff to satisfy Billington and Corliss' execution, was advertised for sale on the 1st of June, and was sold on the 8th.

On the 5th of June, a commission of bankruptcy issued against M'Claws. On the 6th, a warrant of seizure was delivered to Hall, the messenger of the commissioners, who, finding the store in Chesnut street locked and in possession of the sheriff, put a padlock on the door, and then executed the same on the goods in the house in Market street, to which M'Claws had removed early in May preceding. At the same time, viz. on the 6th, Hall delivered a notice from the attorney of the general creditors to the sheriff, forewarning him from selling the goods, as they were claimed on their behalf. They were however sold as above mentioned.

Mathews, who was a clerk under M'Claws, swears; that in December 1800, M'Claws was much embarrassed in his circumstances, and gave him general orders to deny him to his creditors, keeping himself in his room; though upon his cross-examination, he admitted that M'Claws went out publicly into the streets in that month, and afterwards as usual. That creditors frequently called, and were denied. That Hartung, a sheriff's officer, called in December, and was denied. That after M'Claws removed to Market street, in May 1801, he kept his front door shut and locked. This was however not the case in Chesnut street, where his store door was open, and business carried on as usual.

M'Claws, the bankrupt, was examined as a witness, and although I admitted him as a competent witness, you will decide as to the credit to be given to his testimony. He states that he was embarrassed as far back as October 1800; that there was then a judgment against him, and an execution taken out and lying in the office. That the defendants Billington and Corless, with professions of friendship, and a desire to serve him, and after an examination of his books, proposed to give their notes at sixty and ninety days to satisfy all his creditors by judgment and execution. That this plan was actually carried into execution in November and December 1800, which produced the effect not only of discharging him from those pressing claims, but enabled him to go on again with his business as formerly, and quieted the alarm which his embarrassments had excited. He admits, that at that time he informed Billington and Corless that he could pay twenty shillings in the pound if he should be fortunate in collecting his outstanding debts. No security whatever was taken by Billington and Corless at that time, but on the 13th of January they pressed him for security, saying that it was desired on account of the wife and family of M'Claws, who were strangers. Though he considered this as giving them a preference, yet his gratitude for the aids they had offered him, induced him to acquiesce. He accordingly gave them, at their request, the bond with a warrant of attorney to confess judgment, as before mentioned. He says, that on the 31st of May he was informed by Billington and Corless, that they had ordered the goods in the store in Chesnut street to be sold to satisfy their execution, issued on the 14th, that he complained of this treatment, and offered to release them from their liability by security, if they would wait twenty days. They were inexorable, and on the same day he gave notice of this proceeding to his principal creditors. On the 1st of June, Suter, (as appears by his deposition) being a sheriff's officer, was applied to by Goodwin to serve a writ upon M'Claws. He desired Goodwin to go to the house and wait for him, and he would join him there in a short time. When he came, he found Goodwin there, the door of the house fastened, and admittance refused by some person from within, who said M'Claws was not at home. Shortly after, however, M'Claws raised up a window, and informed the officer he could not see him, and that he would not be arrested at that time. Upon quitting the house, Goodwin offered Suter two dollars, at which he was surprised, but at length said "I suspect you want to make M'Claws a bankrupt; if so, the fee on those occasions is eight dollars." Goodwin replied that he should be paid the eight dollars. Some time afterwards he applied to Goodwin for the six dollars, who replied, that M'Claws would pay him. This M'Claws refused to do, and Suter was obliged to warrant Goodwin for it.

Fisher and Stricker, two sheriff's officers, state, that M'Claws was publicly out as usual in December, and so on as long as he lived in Chesnut street; that he frequently came to the sheriff's office, and requested, if any thing should come against him, to let him know, and he would at once give bail; that he spoke of making arrangements to pay Billington and Corless' judgment, which Stricker says led them to postpone the sale of his property, as he thinks. Reed and Jones also speak of seeing M'Claws publicly in the street in December, and up to May, and discovered no difference in his conduct, or any attempt to withdraw himself.

Upon this evidence, the first question is, did M'Claws commit an act of bankruptcy on the 1st of June 1801, or at any preceding period, within six months of the 5th of June, when the commission issued. If he did, then, secondly, what effect would it have upon Billington and Corless' execution of the 14th January?

First. In examining the first question, we must proceed by steps. Did he commit an act of bankruptcy at any time before the 13th of January 1801?

M'Claws and Mathews give evidence of his embarrassments, of his orders to be denied to creditors, and it appears that he actually was denied. Other witnesses say that he went out publicly, and carried on business as usual. But, though it were clear that he did attempt to conceal himself from his creditors, and was denied to them, this would not constitute an act of bankruptcy under the bankrupt laws of the United States, though it would under the bankrupt laws of England. The first class of cases in our statute, which constitutes an act of bankruptcy, is going out of the state, remaining absent therefrom, concealing himself within the state, or keeping his house with intent to delay or defraud his creditors, so that he cannot be served with process. So that concealment from or denial to creditors, is not an act of bankruptcy, if it does not prevent the service of process. But it seems that he was denied to Hartung, a sheriff's officer, in December 1800. As to this, the law is, that if the debtor, with intention to delay or defraud his creditors, shall so conceal himself or keep his house, that he cannot be served with process, this is an act of bankruptcy. Mathews proved that this officer called and was denied, but does not say on what day in December. It is immaterial whether the order of M'Claws to his clerk was to deny him to creditors only, or to them and others; for, if in consequence of concealment from creditors only, a denial was made to an officer, who was thereby prevented from serving process upon him, it would have been an act of bankruptcy.

But there are two reasons why the refusal to Hartung did not constitute an act of bankruptcy: First, because it does not appear that he came to serve him with process, and secondly, if it did so appear, it should also be proved to your satisfaction that the circumstance took place on or after the 5th of December, within six months previous to taking out the commission. As to the first point, it is clear, that unless the officer goes to the house of the debtor to serve process, it cannot be said that the concealment prevented him from serving process. Upon the same principle it is, that in England, where denial to a creditor will constitute an act of bankruptcy, it must be a creditor coming to demand payment of a debt. The officer or the creditor might call as a friend or neighbour, and not with a view to serve process or to demand a debt.

The next period to be noticed is the 13th of January 1801. The bond executed on that day, it is said, was giving a preference to Billington and Corless on the eve of, and in contemplation of bankruptcy. If this were true, yet the preference would not constitute an act of bankruptcy, though it would be void, as a fraud upon the general creditors; but still it would be incumbent on the plaintiffs to establish an act of bankruptcy, to entitle them to recover. It is true, that the execution issued upon the judgment which this bond authorized, might amount to an act of bankruptcy, if it was done at the request, or through the procurement of M'Claws; as if at the time he gave the bond, it was agreed that judgment should be entered up, and execution taken out and levied immediately. But if the entering up the judgment and award of execution were acts of Billington and Corless, unsolicited by M'Claws, or not agreed upon when he gave the bond, it is not an act of bankruptcy. On the one hand, the unwillingness with which M'Claws gave this security, seems to discountenance the idea of his having requested or procured what followed. On the other, considerations of benefit to his family, thrown out by Billington and Corless, might have influenced him to wish it. This, however, is a subject more proper for the decision of the jury than of the court, and therefore it is left to them to say, upon all the circumstances given in evidence, whether the taking the goods of the defendant in execution, was or was not by his procurement.

We now come to the 1st day of June, when, prima facie, an act of bankruptcy was committed. Suter was at the house of M'Claws with process, and was prevented from serving it by the house being locked up, and M'Claws within, refusing admittance to the officer. If the jury should be of opinion that this was a fair, adversary transaction, between Goodwin and M'Claws, then there is no doubt, that on the 1st of June an act of bankruptcy was committed. If on the other hand they are of opinion, that it was a concerted measure between M'Claws and Goodwin, or between M'Claws and some of his creditors, then it is not such an act as will give validity to the commission against creditors not privy to the plot, because it cannot be said that he concealed himself, so that process could not be served upon him, with intent to delay and defraud his creditors, when it was done at the request and by concert with his creditors or some of them. The circumstances attending this transaction are, that on the 31st May, in consequence of Billington and Corless' determination to proceed to the sale of M'Claws' goods, he called that day upon his principal creditors and informed them of it. The next day, Goodwin carried the officer to serve process on M'Claws. Goodwin first got to the house, and had time to apprize M'Claws of the approach of the officer, so that the door might be fastened, if it was a concerted thing. The refusal to open the door; the offer to Suter of two dollars; his suspicions and demand of eight dollars as the fee on such occasions; the implied acknowledgment of the truth of these suspicions by Goodwin, in stating that he should be paid, and referring him to M'Claws for the money, are circumstances, which, taken together, afford strong ground to suspect that the whole was a concerted business. On the other hand, as most of the suspicious circumstances passed between Goodwin and the officer, not in the presence of M'Claws, it does not follow with any degree of certainty, that M'Claws was refused in order to favour the views of Goodwin or of the creditors. Upon the whole, this is a question depending so much upon evidence, that I leave it to the jury to say, whether the transactions of the 1st of June were adversary or concerted. If the latter, the verdict must be for the defendant, unless the jury should be of opinion that the execution of the 14th January was issued and levied by the procurement of M'Claws, in which case the act of bankruptcy will defeat the execution of Billington and Corless, however legal it might be in other respects. But if the jury should be of opinion against the plaintiffs upon that point, and should think that the proceedings of the 1st of June were adversary, the plaintiffs will have established the act of bankruptcy on that day; and then it will be necessary to inquire, secondly, what legal effect it will have upon the execution of Billington and Corless of the 14th of January.

The 31st section of the bankrupt law [of April 4, 1800, 2 Stat. 30] excepts from the general mass of creditors who are to come in pari passu under the commission, those who had obtained a lien by an execution, executed upon the estate of the bankrupt previous to the act of bankruptcy. The question is, was this execution legally executed before the 1st of June? The facts are, that after the execution was levied, the goods remained in the possession of M'Claws, by the permission of Billington and Corless; and he continued to exercise every act of ownership over them, until the 31st of May or the 1st of June.

It was strongly contended at the bar, by the defendants' counsel, that if an execution be once levied, a lien attaches, which will prevail against subsequent executions and subsequent purchasers, although the property seized has been re-delivered to the debtor, has remained in his possession for any length of time, and so continued at the time of such subsequent execution or sale. I was surprised at this doctrine, but the more so when the authority of the supreme court of Pennsylvania was quoted in support of it. I should certainly examine with great caution any question decided by the learned judges of that court, before I ventured to pronounce a different opinion. Although not bound by their decisions, they are and ought to be highly respected; but if there be a question which has long since been settled and at rest; if there ever was a point settled upon correct and solid principles, it is the present; and in direct contradiction of the argument for the defendants. Nothing could be more mischievous, than to permit a dormant execution to rise up, at any distant period, to defeat a subsequent sale fairly made, or a posterior execution. And in what does an execution in the sheriff's hands differ from one which has been levied, and the property redelivered to the debtor; enabling him thereby to acquire a false credit, and to defraud those with whom he may deal? Possession of personal property is the only indicium of property; and for this reason; if the vendor of such property remain in possession, it is fraudulent and void against creditors and purchasers. It cannot be said that an execution is really executed, where the debtor is permitted by the plaintiff to retain possession, and exercise the same acts of ownership over it which he before had done. The effect of a seizure is to change the property in the goods, and to vest it in the sheriff; but no change in this case was produced; no lien created; both were prevented by the fraud which the law implies; where the property being changed, possession remains with the former owner, and that with the consent of the person entitled. I am pleased to find that this opinion corresponds with that of the supreme court of Pennsylvania in the case of Chancellor v. Phillips, [4 Dall. (4 U. S.) 213,] although I do not yield my assent to the distinction, there taken, between household furniture and other goods. The decision in the late circuit courts in the case of U. S. v. Conyngham, [Case No. 14,850,] contains a full and able investigation of this doctrine, and is in perfect unison with the English decisions, and with my opinion. But there is another objection to the title of Billington and Corless under the execution, which is equally fatal, and that is the insufficiency of the levy. The sheriff must always designate the property seized under the execution, either in the body of his return, or by reference to a schedule accompanying it. The reason is obvious; the execution creating a lien, it should be known to others who may take posterior executions, or who may deal with the debtor, what property is affected by the lien, and what is not. In this case, the return is, "levied on goods as per inventory;" but no inventory was made, or returned with the execution. As M'Claws continued from January to June to sell and buy as usual, no person can say whether any, and which of the articles sold on the 8th of June, were levied upon on the 14th January.

Upon the whole, if the jury are of opinion that an act of bankruptcy was committed by M'Claws on the 13th or 14th of January, or on the 1st of June, they must find a verdict for the plaintiffs, notwithstanding Billington and Corless' execution; if otherwise, they must find for the defendants.

Case No. 1,016.

BARNES v. CHICAGO, M. & ST. P. R. CO. et al.

[8 Biss. 514;[1] 8 Reporter, 776; 11 Chi. Leg. News, 399.]

Circuit Court, E. D. Wisconsin. April Term, 1879.[2]

RAILROAD MORTGAGE — FORECLOSURE—EQUITY — PLEADING.

1. Where a railroad mortgage has been foreclosed and bought in for the benefit of the bondholders, most of whom united in organizing and carrying on a new corporation, and afterwards certain creditors by judgments subsequent to the mortgage succeeded in obtaining a decree on a bill filed to set aside the foreclosure and subject the property to payment of their judgments: Held, that the decree rendered the foreclosure invalid only as to the creditors who filed the bill; and the bondholders who voluntarily took stock in the new company cannot again claim under the mortgage, nor can the trustee under the mortgage maintain a new bill of foreclosure for their benefit.

[See note at end of case.]

[2. The new bill of foreclosure alleged that certain bondholders yielded under coercion to the demands of one S. and others, and exchanged their bonds for stock in the new company, believing that unless they did so they would forever lose all benefit of their security. Held, that the allegations were not sufficiently distinct to require a traverse.]

[1] [Reported by Josiah H. Bissell, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

[2] [Affirmed in 122 U. S. 1, 7 Sup. Ct. 1043.]

[In equity. Bill by William Barnes against the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad Company and others to foreclose two mortgages executed to complainant, as trustee, by the La Crosse & Milwaukee Railroad Company upon property now in possession of respondent. The hearing is now on the sufficiency of the pleas. First plea held valid, and second invalid. A replication was afterwards filed, proofs taken, and a reference ordered. The master's report was confirmed, and the bill dismissed. On appeal this decree was affirmed by the supreme court in Barnes v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co., 122 U. S. 1, 7 Sup. Ct. 1043.]

Joshua Stark, Francis Fellowes, and William Barnes, pro se, for complainant.

John W. Carey, for defendants.

DRUMMOND, Circuit Judge. This is a bill filed by the plaintiff to foreclose two mortgages, executed to him, as trustee, one in June, the other in August, 1858, by the La Crosse and Milwaukee Railroad Company, as still subsisting mortgages upon the property conveyed to secure the bonds issued under them; one mortgage was a supplement to the other.

Prior to the date of these mortgages, the railroad consisted of two divisions, called the Eastern and Western Divisions, and there were incumbrances upon the various parts of the railroad, consisting of mortgages, or deeds of trust, as well as of judgments, so that at the time the mortgages were executed to the plaintiff, there were prior incumbrances upon both divisions. This was a mortgage upon the whole railroad, from Milwaukee to La Crosse, as one entire road, subject of course to the prior incumbrances.

Under an act of the legislature of this state, the plaintiff foreclosed the mortgage, (we can speak of it as one mortgage, because the supplemental mortgage was made simply in connection with the first mortgage.) The act of February 8, 1859, (Laws Wis. 1859, c. 10, § 1,) provided that in case of the sale of a railroad in this state, by virtue of, or on foreclosure of any trust deed or mortgage, the trustee might himself bid a certain per centage on the property, and become the purchaser.

This, of course, was contrary to the general rule of law, which forbids a trustee, except under special circumstances, from becoming the purchaser under a sale made by himself.

But the second section of the law, provides, that, "The estate and title of any trustee named in such trust deed, or mortgage, acquired by purchase at such sale, shall be held in trust for the holders of such outstanding bonds, or obligations, in the same manner as if they had become the purchasers, in proportion to the amount of such bonds, or obligations, severally held by them."

The sale was made by the trustee under the authority of this act, the effect of which was that it operated only as a foreclosure of the equity of the La Crosse and Milwaukee R. R. Company, and paid, pro tanto on the debt due to the bondholders, the amount of the bid which was made by the trustee, and instead of holding a title subject to the equity of redemption, he became the owner and had an absolute title to the property, but still as a representative of the bondholders. The case turns upon the validity of this sale made by the trustee, and upon the effect to be given to it upon the allegations in the pleadings.

After the sale was made and the property bought in by the trustee, he and the bondholders availed themselves of another statute (Rev. St. Wis. c. 87, § 1828, par. 10) of this state, which authorized the purchaser at a railroad sale to organize a new company, and gave them the right to construct and operate a railroad, thus creating an entirely new organization springing out of the old one, and the result of the sale that was made.

Accordingly, the trustee and the bondholders under the trust deed of 1858, availing themselves of this act of the legislature, proceeded to organize themselves into a new company, known as the "Milwaukee and Minnesota Railroad Company," and formed a new organization, and as such operated some portions of the road, and it was treated by all parties and by the courts, including the supreme court of the United States, as a duly organized company, clothed with all the rights, franchises and privileges of a railroad corporation, under the laws of the state of Wisconsin.

Sometime [it is not necessary to be particular about dates][1] after this took place, certain creditors of the La Crosse Company, obtaining judgments after the date of the mortgage of 1858, filed a bill in the circuit court of the United States, for the district of Wisconsin, alleging that the sale made by the trustee under the act of the legislature of 1859, was fraudulent and void as against them.

A decree dismissing the bill was rendered by the circuit court, [unreported,] and an appeal taken to the supreme court of the United States, where the decree of the lower court was reversed, and the sale made by the trustee was adjudged fraudulent and void, and the case remanded to the circuit court, with instructions to enter a decree in the case in conformity with the opinion of that court. James v. Milwaukee & M. R. Co., 6 Wall. [73 U. S.] 752. A decree was accordingly entered declaring the sale fraudulent and void as against the judgment creditors; and also, declaring at the same time, in conformity with the opinion of the supreme court, that the mortgage was to remain as a valid security for the benefit of those who were bona fide holders of bonds under the mortgage, the amount being less than two hundred thousand dollars, although the amount claimed as due, and for which the property was sold by the trustee, was a much larger sum.

The supreme court found that a large number of the bonds were fraudulent and void, and for that reason set aside the sale. James v. Milwaukee & M. R. Co., 6 Wall. [73 U. S.] 752. It is because the supreme court rendered this decree, setting aside the sale, that the bill has been filed by the trustee in this case, alleging that the mortgage is in full force, and that he has a right to come in and ask for a foreclosure of it, and to redeem from any prior liens that may exist against the property mortgaged, after proper deductions are made in consequence of the rents and profits which have been received by the parties who hold the property, from the operation of the road and otherwise. As I have said, the Milwaukee and Minnesota Company, operating portions of road, was treated as a corporation, with all its franchises and privileges, and in the proceedings which took place afterwards for the purpose of foreclosing incumbrances upon the property, prior to the date of the plaintiff's mortgage, the Minnesota Company was considered as representing the plaintiff and the bondholders under the mortgage of 1858, and was made a party to all the proceedings which subsequently took place, how numerous soever they were, where it was necessary that a subsequent incumbrancer should be made a party.

The Minnesota Company being thus treated, and regarding itself as clothed with all the muniments and privileges arising from this sale, was called upon at one time to pay a large sum of money, in order to redeem the property from an incumbrance which was upon it, and under the order of the court, paid over four hundred thousand dollars.

This was done before the decree of the supreme court declaring the sale fraudulent and void. After the decision of the supreme court, in James v. Milwaukee & M. R. Co., supra, the Minnesota Company filed a bill for the purpose of having the money which had thus been paid, restored to it, on the ground that as a company it was destroyed by the decree of the supreme court, and that the money had been paid through mistake, and therefore it was entitled to recover it back.

A demurrer was put in to the bill filed in the circuit court of the United States, and the demurrer was sustained and the case taken to the supreme court, and the decree of the lower court was affirmed, the supreme court holding that the Minnesota company could not recover the money back. Milwaukee & M. R. Co. v. Soutter, 13 Wall. [80 U. S.] 517. It is mainly in consequence of these supposed to be conflicting opinions of the supreme court of the United States, that the controversy arises in this case. It is claimed on the part of the plaintiff, that the sale made by the trustee was an absolute nullity as to all the world—that it was the execution of a power in a way not authorized by the mortgage, and therefore was absolutely void, being in violation of the constitution of the United States, as the law. of 1859, passed by the legislature of this state, impaired the obligation of the contract.

[1] [From 11 Chi. Leg. News, 399.]

It is, perhaps, not necessary, in the view which the court takes of the case, to decide this last question.

I have said that the only effect of the sale was to foreclose the equity of redemption of the La Crosse and Milwaukee Railroad Company, and to pay pro tanto the amount of the debt owing by that company, to the extent of the bid made by the trustee. The trustee and the bondholders had the property which was covered by the mortgage. The sale had no other effect than that indicated.

They were left with an absolute title to the property, instead of having a title subject to the equity of redemption. And it is to be observed that the La Crosse Company has never made any complaint whatever in regard to the sale. No objection has been interposed by it so far as we know, during the twenty years since the sale, and nothing shows in any way dissatisfaction on the part of the La Crosse Company to the mode of foreclosing the mortgage, but it seems to have acquiesced in the proceeding.

These being allegations that appear in the bill, the defendants come in and allege by plea, that upon the sale which was made, the reorganization of the Minnesota Company took place and that the bondholders—all the bondholders—under the mortgage, relinquished their bonds, as they were authorized to do by statute, and took stock of the Minnesota Company in their place, and so that whatever view may be taken of the effect of the sale under some aspects, it was only invalid as against the judgment creditors who filed that bill; that it stood for all other purposes, and that it was entirely competent for the trustee and the bondholders, both agreeing to it, to convert the bonds into the stock of the Minnesota Company; that no one has a right to complain, not even the trustee, and consequently that the Minnesota Company was the proper representative of the trustee and the bondholders, in the litigation which took place in so many forms afterwards; and we think that is a sound position, if the facts are as stated.

If true, however irregularly the sale may have been made by the trustee, however fraudulent it may have been as against the judgment creditors who filed the bill, still, if the bondholders have voluntarily converted their bonds into stock, it is not competent for the trustee to file this bill.

The supreme court of the United States declared in its opinion,—James v. Milwaukee & M. R. Co., [6 Wall. (73 U. S.) 752,] (and the decree of this court conformed to that opinion,) that the mortgage stood as a valid surety for the benefit of the bona fide bondholders; and therefore I think that neither the act of the legislature nor of the trustee, nor the conversion of their bonds into stock by a majority of the bondholders, nor the fact that the trustee transferred all his interest to the Minnesota Company, impaired the validity of the bonds which were held by other parties who did not assent (if any did not assent) to this purchase, and who did not convert their bonds into stock. But it is to be observed, the plea alleges that they all did convert their bonds into stock, and so we hold that, if that be true, it is a valid answer to this bill, for the reasons already stated.

And we hold that the action of the supreme court and of the circuit court for the district of Wisconsin, in setting aside the sale by the trustee, had no other effect than to render it invalid as against the judgment creditors, and consequently if the bondholders all came in and converted their bonds into stock, that put an end to the mortgage.

That seems to be the opinion of the supreme court of the United States, in the case of the Milwaukee & M. R. Co. v. Soutter, [13 Wall. (80 U. S.) 517.]

The ground taken in the argument of that case by the counsel was, that the opinion of the supreme court and the decree of the circuit court following it, rendered the whole sale absolutely inoperative as to all persons, and that the Minnesota company had acquired no right, title or interest, by virtue of what had taken place.

The court said, that "the complainants (the Minnesota company,) are wrong in asserting that the property was not theirs (under the sale.) It was theirs. Their purchase was declared (in James v. Milwaukee & M. R. Co., [supra,]) void only as against the creditors of the La Crosse & Milwaukee Railroad Company.

"In other words, it was only voidable, not absolutely void. By satisfying these creditors they could have kept the property, and their title would have been good as against all the world. The property was theirs; but by reason of the fraudulent sale, it was subject to the incumbrance of the debts of the La Crosse Company. This was the legal effect of the decree declaring their title void. Therefore, they were, in fact, paying off an incumbrance on their own property, when they paid into court the money which they are now seeking to recover back.

"They are wrong also in asserting that they made the payment under a mistake of fact. If it was made under any mistake at all, it was clearly a mistake of law."

So that there is an opinion of the supreme court of the United States, declaring what was the legal effect of the sale, which that court declared to be inoperative and void in [James v. Milwaukee & M. R. Co., supra.]

[4] [The remaining question is whether or not the plaintiff, by proper allegations in the bill, has impaired the effect of the statement contained in the plea. In other words, has it confessed what is stated in the plea, and, by proper allegations in the bill, avoided it, so as to show that the plea is not a valid plea? There are certain statements in the bill, to the effect that some of the bondholders did not relinquish their bonds and take stock of the Minnesota Company, and, so far as those averments are concerned, it must be considered that the statement of the plea is a traverse of the allegations. The plea states that all did convert their bonds into stock. But there is an attempt on the part of the pleader to get rid of the fact which he admits; that some of the bondholders, and, as it is conceded a very large majority, did surrender their bonds and take stock; and it is claimed it is shown that these bondholders, or some of them, who surrendered their bonds and took stock, were laboring under coercion.

[4] [From 11 Chi. Leg. News, 399.]

[I will read two paragraphs in the bill, in order that we may clearly understand the allegations upon this subject: "And your orator saith, that from and after the said sale and organization, so called, Russell Sage and others, (but who "the others" are, is not stated,) professing to be, and acting as, officers and directors of the said Minnesota Company, had, or claimed to have, entire control and possession of the estate conveyed to him as aforesaid for the security of the said third mortgage bonds, subject to all the legal liens thereon, and excluded the holders of said bonds who had not subscribed said articles of organization, referring to the articles of organization of the Milwaukee & Minnesota Company, and surrendered their bonds, and paid their pro rata share of the expenses aforesaid, from all enjoyment of said estate, or of the fruits thereof, and from all participation in said company as stockholders or otherwise, and demanded that they should surrender their bonds to said company in exchange for capital stock thereof, and pay their said pro rata share, and threatened and declared that unless they should do so they should forfeit all right to said estate as security for said bonds, and be forever debarred from participation in the fruits of said sale supposed to have been made by your orator to said Minnesota Company, and from all benefit to be derived therefrom." "And your orator saith, upon information and belief, that sundry holders of said bonds, supposing and believing that unless they surrendered their bonds as required by the said Sage and others, and paid their said pro rata share, they would forever lose all benefit to be derived from said estate as security, yielded to the demands of said Sage and others, and surrendered their bonds in exchange for capital stock of said supposed company, and paid their said pro rata share of expenses, who otherwise would not have done so, and that in so doing said bondholders acted under coercion on the part of said Sage and others, and now insist, and your orator avers, that by reason of said coercion, and by reason of the facts aforesaid, their title to said bonds and to said estate conveyed to your orator as security therefor, remains unimpaired, and that in equity they are entitled to demand and receive payment of said bonds, and to have said security applied thereto." These are the only allegations in the bill upon this subject, and the question is whether they are sufficiently distinct and of such a character as to warrant the court in saying that the defendants are called upon to traverse them; and we think that they are not.

[It is to be observed that no man's name is mentioned except that of Mr. Sage. Now why should the threats of Mr. Sage affect the rights of other parties, who had nothing to do with them, who had no knowledge of them, and who did not participate in them in any way? It is not stated how many of these bondholders acted under these threats. It says only: "sundry holders of said bonds." If Mr. Sage made these threats, they could have no binding effect upon the bondholders, It was a simple opinion of his. It did not affect, in the slightest degree, the legal or equitable rights of the bondholders. What Mr. Sage said could not deprive them of any of their equities under the mortgage, and it does not necessarily follow, that because he may have used this language, that they did not of their own free will, and after a proper examination of the case, voluntarily surrender their bonds and take the stock. It is to be observed, that this took place before the supreme court had decided upon the effect of the sale. All parties I presume, certainly the trustee, acted in good faith, although he has now filed this bill. He asserts that he acted in good faith, under the authority of the act of the legislature, and under the instructions of the best legal advice. No doubt they all acted in good faith, even if Mr. Sage did not. If he did use threats, was the coercion here used of such a character, and are the allegations so specified that we can say there was a certain number of the bondholders who were compelled by the threats of Sage to surrender their bonds and take stock?

[Other persons besides Sage are interested in the sale, and in the property, and are to be affected by the bill that is filed in this case. They have become owners of the property as the result of the litigation which has been so long continued, and under the decrees which have been so often made. They hold under sales that have been made in foreclosure proceedings under mortgages and judgments, which confessedly were prior liens to the mortgage of the plaintiff of 1858. Under these proceedings the Minnesota Company was a party, and was assumed to represent Mr. Barnes and the bondholders under the mortgage, and those who acquired the property, it is presumed, acquired it in good faith. Mr. Sage is not the only one of them. There were many others interested in it. And, therefore, upon this allegation, loose, vague and indefinite, about coercion in consequence of something that might have been stated by Mr. Sage, we do not think that we can hold that it is sufficient to bind the parties to this bill. But it will be observed that the supreme court of the United States, in the case already referred to,—Milwaukee & M. R. Co. v. Soutter, [13 Wall. (80 U. S.) 517,] seems to have had its attention called to a state of facts somewhat similar to what is alleged here. The court says, in that case, "It is stated that Russell Sage, one of the defendants, who received a large portion of the money paid into court, was also a large holder of bonds under the Barnes mortgages, and advised and encouraged the sale by Barnes, and participated in the organization of the complainant's company (the Minnesota Company); all these facts may be true, but they do not show, nor is it alleged that Sage was personally a participant in the fraud which was committed in the sale under the Barnes mortgage." Nor does this bill make any such allegations.] [5]

We shall, therefore, without going further into the case, hold, that the first plea is a valid plea to this bill.

But we do not, in so holding, intend to foreclose the rights of any of the bondholders, either those who did not surrender their bonds and take stock, or those who did surrender their bonds and take stock, under the plan to organize the Milwaukee and Minnesota Railroad Company.

Of course it is a question of fact, whether or not they did surrender their bonds and take stock.

[We think that the true construction of this plea is, that they voluntarily—that is, in a legal sense—surrendered their bonds and took stock; that unless it was a voluntary act, it was not binding upon them.] [5]

And we think, as stated before, that those who did not surrender their bonds and take stock, if there are any such, were not bound by what occurred, and that this mortgage is valid as to all such bondholders.

[It will be a question to be determined upon a reference and proofs, whether or not the bonds that have been surrendered, as it is admitted much the greater portion of them have been surrendered, so that they are bound by the surrender. And it will also be a question how many of the bondholders have not surrendered their bonds; and whether or not they are bona fide holders of the bonds. The first plea will be held to be a valid plea, and the second as not being sufficiently full and explicit, invalid, and it will be ordered accordingly.] [5]

DYER, District Judge, concurring.

[NOTE. The supreme court affirmed the foregoing decision on the ground that the bondholders consented to the action of the trustee in their behalf, and that it was immaterial that some omitted to surrender their bonds for cancellation. As to the bonds not actually surrendered and exchanged for stock, Mr. Chief Justice Waite says: "We have no hesitation in deciding that, at the time of the foreclosure, they were held and owned by parties who in law consented thereto, and that the present holders took them with full notice of that fact. * * * Under these circumstances, we cannot do otherwise than decide that the silence of the holders of these few bonds, during all the time the Minnesota Company was acting in their behalf, is equivalent to actual consent to the sale under which the company got the right to represent their interests in the litigation with the prior lienholders. They are the only persons, so far as the record discloses, who did not actually surrender their bonds, and take certificates of stock therefor, and it is now too late for them to say that what their trustee did in their behalf was without authority." Barnes v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co., 122 U. S. 1, 7 Sup. Ct. 1048.]

[5] [From 11 Chi. Leg. News, 400.]

BARNES, (HOWENSTEIN v.) See Case No. 6,786.

BARNES, (INMAN v.) See Case No. 7,048.

Case No. 1,017.

BARNES v. LEE.

[1 Cranch, C. C. 430.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. 18, 1807.

RECORDS—ALTERATION—PLEADING.

1. The record of a cause, is the history of the proceedings in an action made out at full length, and in technical language; and when once made out and written in the record book the power of the clerk over it has ceased. It has become a public document and cannot be altered, unless by order of the court under certain circumstances.

[Cited in U. S. v. Walsh, 22 Fed. 648.]

2. The plea of nul tiel record refers to the time of the plea pleaded, and a subsequent amendment of the record does not affect the issue.

3. A material variance between the record of the recognizance and the recital of it in the scire facias, is fatal.

[At law. Action by John Barnes against David Easton. The hearing is now by the court on a plea of nul tiel record to a] scire facias against Mr. [Edmund J.] Lee, as especial bail for David Easton. [Interlocutory judgment for Lee. The writ was thereafter quashed, with leave to amend the record. Barnes v. Lee, Case No. 1,018.]

Mr. Jones, for plaintiff.

E. J. Lee and F. Lee, for defendant, cited the following authorities:—Com. Dig. tit. "Pleader," L, 3; Id. tit. "Bail," R. 2-7; Id. tit. "Record," C; Coy v. Hymas, 2 Strange, 1171; Vavasor v. Baile, 1 Salk. 52; Kilbourn v. Trot, Cro. Eliz. 855; Shuttle v. Wood, 2 Salk. 564; Ward v. Griffith, 1 Ld. Raym. 83, 84; Knight's Case, 1 Salk. 329, 2 Ld. Raym.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

1014; 21 Vin. Abr. 17, tit. "Trial;" Hillier v. Frost, 1 Strange, 401; Grey v. Jefferson, 2 Strange, 1165; 2 Cromp. Pr. 73.

CRANCH, Chief Judge, delivered the opinion of the court.

To this scire facias Mr. Lee has pleaded nul tiel record, upon which an issue is joined, which must be decided by the court upon inspection of the record. If there be such a record as that set forth in the scire facias the judgment must be for the plaintiff. But if there be a material variance between the record and the recital of it in the scire facias the judgment must be for the defendant.

The first question is, what is the record? The record as made up at large in the record-book is in these words: "Whereupon Edmund J. Lee came into court and undertook for the said defendant to satisfy and pay the condemnation of the court, if he should be cast at the trial of this suit, or render his body to prison in execution for the same."

The scire facias states, "Edmund J. Lee heretofore," "to wit, on," &c "came before the court and became pledge and bail for the said David Easton, that if it should happen that the said David Easton should be convicted at the suit of the said John Barnes in the action aforesaid, then the same bail granted that as well the said damages as all such costs and charges as should be adjudged to the said John Barnes in that behalf should be made of the goods and chattels of the said Edmund J. Lee, and to be levied to the use of the said John Barnes, if it should happen that the said David Easton, should not pay the said damages and costs aforesaid, or should not on that account render himself to the prison of our said county."

It is contended, by the defendant, that the undertaking, as stated in the record, is materially variant from that set forth in the scire facias, because the former does not show that the defendant "granted that the damages and costs should be made of his goods and chattels" in case Easton did not pay them or render himself to prison on that account. The undertaking of the defendant, as stated in the record, is only that Easton should pay or render himself to prison; it does not include the usual alternative "or that the bail will pay it for him," which is the very substance and essence of the undertaking upon which the scire facias is grounded. But it is answered, on the part of the plaintiff: 1st. That the obligation of special bail is well known and settled by law, and cannot be altered, and when the record states that he came into court and acknowledged himself to be special bail, it states in substance that he acknowledged himself to be bound by all the legal obligations of bail; and that when the record states that he undertook for Easton to pay or render himself to prison, in execution, it implies that if he did not, the bail would do it for him; so that the record states the substance of the whole legal obligation of special bail, and the scire facias has stated nothing more. 2d. It is also contended that the entry on the minute-book of the day, in these words, "Edmund J. Lee, special bail," authorized the clerk to make up the records of the recognizance of bail in the legal form, and in no other. That the true records of the court are the minutes extended into form, according to their legal import. That if the clerk has erroneously extended the minutes in this case, it is as if he had done nothing; and that the record may now be made up in due form, when it will exactly correspond with the scire facias. There is much ingenuity and seems to be some weight in this argument, and it brings us back to the question what is the record in this case?

The daily minutes, taken by the clerk and sanctioned by the court, are only memoranda to assist the memory of the clerk in making up the records of the court. The record is the history of the proceedings in an action made out at full length and in technical language. When the clerk has once made out this history and written it in the record-book, his power over it ceases. It has become a public document, and cannot be altered unless by order of the court, under certain circumstances. The record therefore to which the court is referred by the issue in this case, I take to be that which is entered at length, in the record-book, and although the court may perhaps order a clerical error to be corrected, yet such correction now made could not affect the issue in this case, which must be decided according to the record as it stood at the time of the plea pleaded. This principle seems to be settled by the cases of Coy v. Hymas, 2 Strange, 1171; Knight's Case, 2 Ld. Raym. 1014, and 1 Salk. 329; Hillier v. Frost, 1 Strange, 401; and Grey v. Jefferson, 2 Strange, 1165. If, then, the record in the record-book is that which we are to compare with the scire facias, the question remains whether there be a substantial variance between them. That there is apparently such variance seems to be admitted; but it is said that when a man undertakes that another shall do a thing, if this other fails to do it, there is an implied obligation on the part of the former that he will do it for him. This may perhaps be true in some cases of contract, and such implied obligation may perhaps support an action; but it does not therefore follow that such implied obligation can arise upon a recognizance, nor that it will authorize an execution to issue without a previous judgment. A recognizance is a solemn acknowledgment upon record, and contains all the terms of the obligation which the party takes upon himself. In the present case the court deems the omission of the usual alternative, ("or that he will do it for him") to be fatal. I have a doubt whether, if the plaintiff chooses to quash his scire facias and then apply to have the record amended, I should not think it ought to be amended; and that he might then bring a new scire facias upon the amended record. But upon this last point the court has not made up an opinion.

Case No. 1,018.

BARNES v. LEE.

[1 Cranch, C. C. 471.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov. Term, 1807.

RECORDS—AMENDMENT.

A clerical error in the record may be amended after the term.

[At law. Action by John Barnes against David Easton. A writ of scire facias against E. J. Lee, as special bail for Easton, was adjudged defective. Barnes v. Lee, Case No. 1,017. Heard on Lee's motion to quash the writ. Granted. Also, heard on plaintiff's motion for leave to amend the record. Granted.]

After THE COURT had given an opinion on the law, upon the issue of nul tiel record, [Barnes v. Lee, Case No. 1,017,] but before the judgment thereon was entered on the minutes,—

Mr. Jones, for the plaintiff, moved to quash the scire facias, which THE COURT granted, on payment of all costs. Mr. Jones then moved the court to direct the clerk to amend the record by the minute-book. On certiorari upon suggestion of diminution, the court below will order a clerical mistake to be corrected.

Mr. E. J. Lee, contra. Errors in the office can only be corrected at the next succeeding term. The court cannot correct even a clerical error after the term. The minutes of the district court of Virginia, are full and complete records at length.

Mr. Jones, in reply. This is a misprision of the clerk. The record is not made up during the term. The clerks make them up in vacation from the minutes, hence the minutes are directed by law to be signed. Laws Va. Dec. 12, 1792, § 46, p. 81; Id. § 28, p. 78; Laws Va. Dec. 3, 1792, § 35, p. 89; Norton's Case, Style, 110; Lovell v. Natchford, Id. 120; Frazier v. Crosbie, [Gordon v. Frazier,] 2 Wash. (Va.) 130; Poynes v. Francis, Style, 191; Saunderson v. Raisin, Id. 207; Dawkes v. Payton, Id. 218, 219; Pinder v. Dawkes, Id. 232; Freind v. Baker, Id. 339; Kitchinman's Case, Id. 374; Barker v. Elmer, Id. 412.

Mr. E. J. Lee. The minute-book, in this case, does not describe the form of the recognizance, so that there is nothing to amend by.

THE COURT gave leave to amend.

BARNES v. MILWAUKEE & ST. P. R. CO. See Case No. 1,016.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

BARNES, (PHILADELPHIA & R. R. CO. v.) See Case No. 11,087.

Case No. 1,019.

BARNES v. RETTEW.

[2S Leg. Int. 124;[1] 8 Phila. 133.]

Circuit Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. April 14, 1871.

ACT OF BANKRUPTCY — ASSIGNMENT FOR BENEFIT OF CREDITORS — FRAUD — CONSTRUCTIVE AND ACTUAL.

1. A debtor's assignment of all his estate, in trust for distribution among all his creditors equally, tends necessarily "to defeat or delay the operation" of the bankrupt law [of March 2, 1867; 14 Stat. p. 517, c. 176,] and, therefore, if executed after this law (on 1st June, 1867,) went into practical operation, and within the prescribed limit of six months before the commencement of proceedings against him under the 39th section, is an act of bankruptcy.

[See Ex parte Burt, Case No. 2,210; Ex parte Breneman, Id. 1,830; In re Croft, Id. 3,404; Globe Ins. Co. v. Cleveland Ins. Co., Id. 5,486; In re Frisbee, Id. 5,129; Jones v. Sleeper, Id. 7,496; Hutchins v. Taylor, Id. 6,953; In re Mendelsohn, Id. 9,420.]

[Contra, Ex parte Kintzing, Id. 7,833; Smith v. Teutonia Ins. Co., Id. 13,115.]

2. The assignment, though constructively fraudulent with such relation to the bankrupt law, is, in the absence of actual fraud, not void, but voidable, and not voidable otherwise than at the suit of the assignee in bankruptcy.

In equity under the auxiliary jurisdiction conferred by the bankrupt law. The bill, at the suit of the assignee in bankruptcy, of partners who had, within six months before the commencement of the proceedings, made a voluntary assignment to the defendant of all their estate in trust for the equal benefit of all their creditors, prayed an injunction, &c., and a final decree setting aside the assignment. On a motion for an injunction, &c., before answer, the case was heard interlocutorily, upon affidavits, before the district judge holding the circuit court. It was contended, first, that the assignment, being in itself an act of bankruptcy, was, on its face, notice to the party receiving it of its tendency to defeat or delay the operation of the bankrupt law; secondly, that the assignment was tainted with actual fraud, having been executed without consulting creditors, though there had been a previous meeting of them,—and the voluntary assignee having precipitately advertised the whole available effects for sale at auction, without notice to creditors who were proceeding adversarily in bankruptcy.

On the other side, it was urged that the sale advertised would have been a fair and advantageous one, that it had been suspended so soon as any objection to it was known, and that a great number of the creditors had, in writing, approved of the voluntary assignment since its execution. The judge said that the minority of the creditors, or a single dissenting creditor, had rights of which the others could not thus deprive him, but that if the true interests of the general body of the creditors would be promoted by refusing the injunction, it ought not, in this stage of the case, to be granted; that the present question could not be determined advisedly without an authoritative decision of the question, whether such an assignment was an act of bankruptcy, a point upon which some doubt had arisen from a reported note of two cases in the circuit court for the southern district of Ohio, 2 N. B. R. [Quarto,] 180, 181, [Langley v. Perry, Case No. 8,067; Farrin v. Crawford, Id. 4,686,] and that an argument on this point, ought, if possible, to be postponed until the arrival of the circuit judge, which would probably occur in a few days.

[1] [Reprinted by permission.]

The case therefore stood over, the defendant agreeing to do nothing without the knowledge and supervision of the complainant, who was to have unrestricted access to books, papers, &c. The question, whether the assignment had, in itself alone, been an act of bankruptcy, independently of any question of actual fraud, was afterwards argued before the circuit judge and the district judge, holding together the circuit court.

Mr. Miller, for the defendant, relied on the cases of Sedgwick v. Place, [Case No. 12,622;] Langley v. Perry, [Id. 8,067;] and Farrin v. Crawford, [Id. 4,686;] the last two of which had been mentioned, as above, on the former hearing of the motion. Mr. Miller urged considerations of the hardship and inconvenience likely to result from holding such an assignment, when fairly and honestly made, an act of bankruptcy.

R. C. McMurtrie and James W. Paul, for complainant.

E. Spencer Miller and W. W. Juvenal, for respondent.

Before McKENNAN, Circuit Judge, and CADWALADER, District Judge.

McKENNAN, Circuit Judge. The question is not new to me on the general grounds upon which it has been argued. There may also be special considerations applicable to it in Pennsylvania. Does not the legislation of the state, as to such assignments, tend necessarily to delay the creditors of a bankrupt, and to defeat or delay the operation of the act of congress? And must not the debtor who makes the assignment be legally understood as intending what is thus a necessary tendency of his act? We are desirous to hear whatever can be suggested for the defendant as to the effect of the laws of the state upon the question.

Nothing further was said by the defendant's counsel.

THE COURT said that they did not, at present, desire to hear the counsel for the complainant. The question was held under advisement for some days.

CADWALADER, District Judge. The following opinion is that of Judge McKENNAN and myself:

In England, the statute of 1604 (1 Jac. I. c. 15, § 2) made it an act of bankruptcy for a debtor to execute any fraudulent conveyance or transfer, to the intent, or whereby his creditors should or might be defeated or delayed; the meaning of which was, to the intent that they should, or whereby they might be defeated or delayed: 8 East, 487. This enactment was repealed and supplied by the statute of 1825, (6 Geo. IV. c. 16, § 3,) which simply made it an act of bankruptcy to execute any fraudulent conveyance or transfer with intent to defeat or delay his creditors. It was decided that notwithstanding the substitution of the conciser expression with intent, for the former words to the intent or whereby, the statutes were, in effect, the same, because, if the necessary consequence of a man's act is to delay his creditors, he must be taken to intend it: 1 Cromp. M. & R. 779, 780. The statute of 1849, (12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, § 67,) in force in England at the time of the enactment of the present bankrupt law of the United States, was, in this respect, the same as the statute of 1825. Upon these few words of English legislation, all questions, whether a conveyance or transfer was an act of bankruptcy, have depended. In St. 13 Eliz. c. 5, the same words had been only declaratory of the general law as between debtor and creditor. They had a more extended application in the bankrupt law, to effectuate its purposes, and prevent its intended operation from being frustrated, or impeded.

Conveyances or transfers constructively, though not actually fraudulent, were in general of two kinds; those which, independently of any legislative system of bankruptcy would, from their tendency to delay creditors, have been fraudulent under St. 13 Eliz. c. 5, the leading exposition of which is in Twyne's Case, 3 Coke, 80b, [1 Smith, Lead. Cas. 33,] and those which, in the absence of the legislative system of bankruptcy, would have been unobjectionable, but were fraudulent as against its manifest policy of equal and speedy distribution under the prescribed course of peculiar summary procedure. A sub-division of those of the latter kind was into, first preferences of favored creditors, and secondly, such dispositions of property as, though neither preferences, nor in themselves fraudulent under St. 13 Eliz. alone, put the property, nevertheless, "into a different course of distribution from what the bankrupt laws directed." There was no express enactment as to preferences, except the requirement of equal distribution. But the policy of equal distribution was founded in part upon a theory that equality is equity, and, in great part also, upon a motive to prevent the overtrading which would be inevitable where a failing debtor could at pleasure prefer a favoring or a favored creditor. Such a preference was therefore a fraud upon a bankrupt law. So the legislation was silent as to dispositions by a failing trader of property which put it out of the prescribed course of distribution in bankruptcy. But they were fraudulent as intended to delay or impede such distribution, because this was their inevitable tendency.

There were thus conveyances constructively fraudulent, which might have been classed under three heads: 1, conveyances fraudulent under St. 13 Eliz. alone; 2, fraudulent preferences; 3, conveyances in derogation of the prescribed jurisdiction. If this classification is, for certain purposes, adopted, it must not be forgotten that the first head is a general one, and the second and third are sub-divisions of another general head.

A failing debtor's disposition of his whole available estate for the benefit of one or more, but not all of his creditors, must be a preference, or partake of the nature of one, if the word is used in its popular sense. But such a conveyance or transfer may not be a fraudulent preference, that is to say, may not under the second of the three heads, be objectionable in bankruptcy as a preference, and yet may be an act of bankruptcy. It is one, if it either stops his business, or, without stopping it, puts his available means beyond his own legal control. Ex parte Bailey, (Ct. App.) 3 De Gex, M. & G. 534; Smith v. Cannan, (Exch. Chamber,) 2 El. & Bl. 35. His other creditors are necessarily delayed in either case; and whether the act should be classed under the first or under the third head, or under each of them, may depend upon circumstances.

As to a voluntary assignment of his whole estate for the equal benefit of all his creditors, the question was different. Such a disposition of the estate was not in any case a preference; and, except in reference to the bankrupt laws, did not objectionably delay creditors. 3 Maule & S. 371. The disposition, if an act of bankruptcy, was therefore to be classed under the third head. That it constituted an act of bankruptcy was, in Lord Eldon's opinion, settled beyond a doubt by decisions of which he recognized the reason to be that such an act placed a failing debtor's property under a distribution different from that ordained by the bankrupt laws. But Lord Eldon said that the direct and immediate object of such a deed was not to delay but to satisfy creditors. He thought that these decisions had therefore carried the reason to an extravagant length, although he acquiesced in their authority. (A. D. 1809,) 16 Ves. 148; (A. D. 1809–10) 17 Ves. 197. As to the soundness of his criticism of them, subsequent opinions have differed. If the voluntary assignment would, in effect, have promoted a speedy disposal and collection, and a prompt distribution, through the officer of a commercial tribunal who was always under its immediate supervision and summary control, it might have been a sound criticism. But the voluntary assignee was chosen by the debtor; and was, except under the general contentious equitable jurisdiction of trusts, an independent private functionary. The assignee in bankruptcy, on the contrary, was chosen by the creditors, and was an officer of the court of bankruptcy, (1 Atk. 91,) whose jurisdiction of all matters between him and the creditors was summary (Id. 88) and simple, with a peculiar consolidation of business otherwise judicially regarded as multifarious. In the contentious administration of the trusts of the voluntary assignment under a bill in equity, all parties interested might indeed, sooner or later, be represented or protected. But this expensive and formal, and comparatively complex proceeding would have been dilatory until the decree to account, and, in some respects, afterwards; and would, in every stage, be incongruous to the prescribed jurisdiction of the commercial tribunal. The judges whose decisions were criticized by Lord Eldon, had, therefore, with relation to this prescribed jurisdiction, considered such a voluntary assignment an act whose tendency was necessarily to delay creditors.

It was decided by Lord Mansfield, at nisi prius, in 1767, that an assignment by a debtor of all his effects, to two of his creditors, in trust for themselves, and all his other creditors, in consequence of a proposition made by him at a meeting of his creditors, and accepted by them, was an act of bankruptcy, as a fraud on the bankrupt laws, unless every creditor had concurred. Kettle v. Hammond, Cooke, Bankr. Law, 111, (100.) Seven years later, Lord Mansfield said, extra-judicially, that a debtor could not assign his effects even to be equally divided amongst all his creditors, because he could "not take his estate out of that management which the law puts it into." Cowp. 123. In 1799, and again in 1803, such an assignment was decided by the court of king's bench to be an act of bankruptcy: 8 Durn. & E. [8 Term R.] 140; 4 East, 230. All bankruptcies were then, in form, involuntary. But they were seldom such in fact. A concerted act of bankruptcy was indeed condemned. But a friendly proceeding in bankruptcy was not. The most experienced commissioner of the period wrote that ninety-nine out of one hundred bankruptcies were willing or friendly: 1 Christ. Bankr. Law, (2d Ed.) 188. It was then a frequent practice for a debtor to make such an assignment with an expectation of being, in consequence of it, adjudged a bankrupt upon the petition of a creditor, perhaps not unfriendly. The assignment was, in itself, only constructively fraudulent; and was, of course, in the absence of actual fraud, no objection to the bankrupt's obtaining a discharge from his debts, in the proper subsequent stage of the proceedings.

The revised statute of 1825 (6 Geo. IV. c. 16, §§ 6, 7) introduced the voluntary system of bankruptcy, by allowing a trader, with or without concert with a creditor, or other person, to become a bankrupt by filing a declaration of insolvency at the bankrupt office. The enactment of this statute, as to fraudulent conveyances or transfers, has been quoted. The court of exchequer, in 1835, decided that a trader's assignment in 1832, of all his property, in trust for the benefit of his creditors, was an act of bankruptcy, though there was no evidence of the intent to delay them except the deed itself. Lord Wensleydale said. "When a man assigns all his property, and puts it into a different course of distribution from what the bankrupt laws direct, he commits an act of bankruptcy." Stewart v. Moody, 1 Cromp. M. & R. 777. The statute of 1825, § 4, provided that such a deed of trust for the benefit of all the creditors should not, if certain prescribed conditions were observed, be deemed an act of bankruptcy, unless a commission should issue within six months, and the statute of 1849, § 68, provided similarly unless a petition for adjudication should be filed within three months, from the execution of the deed. These were legislative recognitions that it was, in itself, an act of bankruptcy, under the previous and continuing description of a conveyance with intent to delay creditors. This was the state of the English law upon the subject when the present bankrupt law of 2d March, 1867, [14 Stat. 517, c. 176,] was enacted by congress. Its words were, in most parts of it, wisely taken from the English statutes of 1849 and 1861, and from the insolvent law of Massachusetts. These were the acts of legislation which had undergone the most careful revision, on the respective sides of the Atlantic. In applying the rule that the interpretation of a law forms part of it, the construction of a statute by the courts of the country whose legislature enacted it is adopted. The supreme court has, more than once, applied this rule of decision where an American statute had been taken from a prior English one; and has followed its English construction where the meaning might otherwise have been doubtful. The rule thus often furnishes a useful standard of uniform authority throughout the United States; and, where the construction was prior to the declaration of independence, an undeviating standard.

The 39th section of the present bankrupt law, in defining or describing acts of involuntary bankruptcy committed by conveyances, transfers, or assignments, first specifies those made by a debtor with intent to delay, defraud, or hinder his creditors. If the section had contained no further specification, the enactment would, under the English judicial precedents, have been understood as applicable to conveyances or transfers under all of the above three heads, including, under the last of them, the assignment in question. But the enactment goes further. It adds words, which, if not those of English decisions, are of equivalent import, expressly specifying cases under the second and third heads. These additional enactments are, by prefatory words, restrained in their application to debtors, bankrupt or insolvent, or acting in contemplation of bankruptcy or insolvency; and provide, that any such debtor making, within the previous period limited, any conveyance or transfer, either "with intent to give a preference," or "with the intent, by such disposition of his property, to defeat or delay the operation of this act," shall be adjudged a bankrupt. If the previous words, "with intent to delay creditors," are impliedly limited so as to include only dispositions of property which would be actually or constructively fraudulent under the Statute of 13 Eliz. c. 5, if no bankrupt law were in force—this is so only because those general words are here followed by the twofold express enactment which covers what they would otherwise have additionally included. As the intent of the assignment in question is legally inferred from its necessary tendency, the additional words "with intent to delay or defeat the operation of this act," include such a conveyance. They are words of like import with "puts his estate into a course of distribution different from that prescribed by the act," which had been the substance of the language of Lords Mansfield, Eldon and Wensleydale. But congress decided the question legislatively, not leaving it to judicial construction, as had been done in England. This appears to have been a very general opinion throughout the United States: 2 N. B. R. [Quarto,] 69, cols. 2, 3, dictum; 3 N. B. R. [Quarto,] 4, 5, 41, 61, 62, 98, 127; 4 N. B. R. [Quarto,] 124; [Grow v. Ballard, Case No. 5,848; In re Randall, Id. 11,551; In re Goldschmidt, Id. 5,520; In re Pierce, Id. 11,141; In re Smith, Id. 12,974; Spicer v. Ward, Id. 13,241; In re Stubbs, Id. 13,557.]

There is nothing whatever to the contrary in the decision that such a voluntary general assignment is not invalidated, through the mere existence of the bankrupt law, where no proceeding in bankruptcy has been instituted, either by or against the debtor: 33 Conn., [Hawkins' Appeal, 34 Conn. 548.] The same remark applies to cases in which the debtor had been adjudged a bankrupt, but the proceedings in bankruptcy were not commenced until more than six months after his execution of the voluntary assignment; and the bankruptcy was voluntary, or, if involuntary, was for some other act. In these cases the limitation of time in the 39th section prevented the question from arising at all. The decisions were that the voluntary assignment, unless it had been actually fraudulent, or constructively fraudulent under St. 13 Eliz. c. 5, independently of the bankrupt law, could not be set aside under any proceeding at the suit of the assignee in bankruptcy: 1 N. B. R. [Quarto,] 195, 204, cols. 2, 3. [In re Arledge, Case No. 533; Sedgwick v. Place, Id. 12,622; Same v. Menck, Id. 12,616.] Nor is the question affected, in any wise, by the numerous cases in which bankrupts, who had made assignments within six months before the commencement of the proceedings, have nevertheless been discharged from their debts. A conveyance or transfer, not actually, but only constructively fraudulent, though an act of bankruptcy, is not a bar to a discharge. In England, an assignment like that in question, though an act of bankruptcy, has been considered morally unobjectionable, and sometimes an honorable act, as affording to any creditor an option to proceed in bankruptcy, or to all the creditors a right of obtaining a distribution without any bankruptcy: 1 Christ. Bankr. Law, (2d Ed.) 187–189.

These various cases have been stated, because, under a jurisdiction which is, in this country, novel to the present generation of lawyers, the questions have often been confounded with the one which is here properly to be considered. It should also be observed that, in the absence of actual fraud, the assignment in question, though constructively fraudulent under the bankrupt law, is not void, but voidable, and is voidable only at the suit of the assignee in bankruptcy. In a case like the present, if an injunction, with or without a receiver, is required in order to prevent the purposes of the bankrupt law from being frustrated, or impeded, the necessary interlocutory order may, of course, be made. The ordinary disability of a receiver to sell may create no embarrassment, because the trust of each opposing litigant is to sell and collect and distribute among the same beneficiaries in the same proportions. Sales may therefore be made by the assignee under the direction of the court, through a master, in a preliminary stage of the cause. The register having charge of the case in bankruptcy, may sometimes, perhaps, be appointed a special master in this court; and either the complainant, or the defendant, if a trustworthy person submitting himself to the jurisdiction, may be the receiver, or they may be joint receivers, with or without another. The estate cannot ordinarily be suffered to remain, even temporarily, under the control of the voluntary assignee, if the rights of distributees depend upon the litigation of questions peculiarly cognizable either in bankruptcy, or under the special auxiliary jurisdiction. Where no such conflict of right is apparent, a preliminary injunction, &c., will ordinarily be granted upon affidavit, after notice, unless the defendant will speed the proceedings in equity, by filing an early answer, so as to enable the complainant to set down the case for an early final hearing, on bill and answer, if he should be so advised. Until answer filed, it is, in this district, the practice to use any affidavits on file in the court of bankruptcy, without their being resworn. The defendant may answer immediately; and if, on answer filed, the complainant cannot safely dispense with testimony, the court will not, without great caution, interfere interlocutorily.

But, before answer, it is by no means, of course, to make, on motion, an order for a preliminary injunction. Cases have occurred in which the voluntary assignment protected equities which, without it, could not be protected under the bankrupt law itself. In one case, a judgment binding the debtor's land had, by due course of law, been obtained against him, between the execution of the voluntary assignment and the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy. In another case, the bankrupt's father, who was the largest creditor, had, with his own concurrence, been expressly excluded from the benefit of the voluntary assignment, which had created a trust for all the other creditors. In each case, the voluntary assignment had been an act of bankruptcy, but the assignee in bankruptcy, asking the aid of equity, was not, in either case, at liberty to disregard the palpable existing equities which could not be made available without the aid of the prior assignment. In such cases, if the defendant is not an untrustworthy person, whatever may be the proper decree at the final hearing, his trust may be usefully administered, in the meantime, in his own name. Of course it would not be administered without the permission and supervision of the court, or independently of supervision by the complainant, to whom, as the assignee in bankruptcy, the defendant must primarily or ultimately account. But the defendant's disposal of the estate, and collection of the assets, ought not, in such cases, to be embarrassed. Whether he should be permitted to make the distribution may be a different question. But, in every stage of proceedings, the pendency of the suit must, if the assignee in bankruptcy fulfils his duty, preclude any risk of sacrifice of property, or other loss by the creditors, or of delay. Lis pendens renders the sanction of the court necessary to enable the defendant even to dispose of the estate effectually. Where disposal by him is allowed, but distribution prohibited, he ordinarily receives, in this district, his reasonable charges, including an equitable proportion, usually one-half, of the commission which would otherwise be fairly chargeable.

Where no such specifically definable equity is thus protected by the previous assignment, its trusts may, nevertheless, have been so far executed, in good faith, and beneficially, that their further execution should not, in the primary stage of the cause, be impeded abruptly, if at all. In one case, this court suspended granting an injunction, and appointing a receiver, until the completion of a beneficial sale of real estate, which had been previously made by the defendant, who had already partly succeeded, and afterwards completely succeeded, in removing defects of title. In Sedgwick v. Place, in the circuit court for the southern district of New York, before Judge Nelson, the debtors had failed in business, and made the general assignment, in November, 1867. They became bankrupts voluntarily in February, 1868. The previous assignees having, in execution of their trust, collected a large amount of money which was in deposit, awaiting distribution, the case being untainted with any actual fraud, a motion for a preliminary injunction was denied: [Case No. 12,622.]

Enough has been said to explain that this decision, which was one of those relied on by the defendant's counsel in the present case, does not apply to the particular question, whether such an assignment was an act of bankruptcy. This question has been since answered affirmatively by the respective district judges in the northern and southern districts of New York, who certainly intended no disregard of any opinion of Judge Nelson. The other cases relied on by the defendant's counsel were decided, in the circuit court for the southern district of Ohio, by Judge Swayne. To understand the first of them it is necessary to recur to the 50th section of the bankrupt act of 2d of March, 1867, providing that the act should commence and take effect, as to the appointment of the officers, and the promulgation of rules and general orders, from the date of its approval, but that no petition or other proceeding under the act should be filed, received, or commenced, before June 1st, 1867. A judgment was obtained by a creditor, in a proper court of Ohio, on June 1st, 1867, which, under a statute of that state, was a lien upon the debtor's land from 27th May, 1867, which was the first day of the term. On the 25th of May, 1867, the debtor executed a general assignment for the benefit of his creditors. The judgment creditor, without offering to waive his lien, filed, on 17th of July, 1867, a petition that the debtor should be adjudged a bankrupt, on the ground that, by the assignment, he had committed an act of bankruptcy. The avowed theory and purpose of the proceeding was that an assignee in bankruptcy might afterwards annul or set aside the assignment, and hold the estate, not discharged of this creditor's lien, but subject to it. Judge Swayne was of opinion that such an assignment, unless made with intent to delay, defraud or hinder creditors, within the meaning of St. 13 Eliz. c. 5, or with intent to defeat or delay the operation of the bankrupt law, was not an act of bankruptcy, and that, upon the proofs, it had not been made with either intent, and was not an act of bankruptcy: Langley v. Perry, [Case No. 8,067.] We would have been of the same opinion. The purposes of the bankrupt law would have been frustrated unavoidably, and its operation defeated, by the petitioning creditor's judgment, if the prior assignment had not been executed. On 25th May, 1867, this law was not in operation for the purposes of the question whether the assignment had, in the absence of actual fraud, been an act of bankruptcy.

In the other case the question was different in respect of the time of the act. The debtor's assignment was executed on 4th December, 1868; and the adversary proceeding of creditors to make him a bankrupt was commenced in the following month. He was adjudged a bankrupt; first, because he had not, in the meantime placed all his monies, credits and effects, unreservedly in the possession or control of the assignee, which omission made the assignment fraudulent under St. 13 Eliz.; and secondly, because the payment of certain creditors just before the assignment, had been preferences. Under the first head, the judge is reported to have said: "I do not mean to impute any intention to defraud, or do any wrong, to either party; but here are the facts, and the legal result is inevitable." But this result was, according to the report, arrived at only through the consideration that "all assignments by debtors" are "subject to the general rule contained in the statute of Elizabeth, exemplified in Twyne's Case, [3 Coke, 80; 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. 33,] and the many other subsequent decisions following it, all of which render void, as to creditors, all assignments at all tainted with fraud." The judge is, however, reported to have emphatically held, that such an assignment, as this purported to be, was "valid and proper when made in good faith," though it was "to be subjected to the sharpest scrutiny." He said that "any badge of fraud that attaches itself, in the light of extraneous circumstances, will unless fully explained, be fatal to its validity, and the arm of the bankrupt law will sweep it away, and subject the person and the estate to its own provisions:" Farrin v. Crawford, [Case No. 4,686.]

Neither of these cases, on the point which was decided in it, affects the present question. If, however, the dicta, as well as the decisions, are correctly reported, and the dicta are to be followed, such an assignment would not, without actual fraud, be considered an act of bankruptcy. If so, very complex litigations on the question of fraud, would frequently arise. This, in itself alone, would not be a sufficient objection to following the dicta. They have, however, for other reasons, been deliberately disregarded in subsequent cases, in district courts elsewhere. The reasons probably were, that if the only conveyances or transfers, not actually fraudulent, which constitute acts of bankruptcy, are cases constructively fraudulent under the statute of Elizabeth, and intentional preferences,—English decisions, beginning more than a century ago, will be disregarded, and there will be no apparent subject matter for the application of the words "with intent to defeat or delay the operation of the act of congress."

In the United States, the reasons for considering such a general assignment an act of bankruptcy, are stronger than those which prevailed in England. During more than three-quarters of a century, since the constitution had enabled congress to establish uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States, there had not been such a law in force except in two short intervals; and the usages and legislation as to voluntary assignments for the benefit of creditors, had, in the meantime, become various in the several states. The abrogation of such local differences, at the election of any non-assenting creditor, was an essential part of "an act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States." In Pennsylvania there was, and, except as to a failing debtor who has been adjudged a bankrupt, still is, a peculiar legislative system, under which, as the supreme court has said, it is difficult to define the character of the procedure: [Shelby v. Bacon,] 10 How. [51 U. S.] 70. That court has said, that it "is not in the nature of a bankrupt or insolvent procedure:" Id. 71. Under the present bankrupt law of the United States, [Act March 2, 1867, 14 Stat. 517, c. 176,] there must, in the primary stage of the proceedings, be a carefully analyzed and explained schedule of debts. It afterwards undergoes revision by the assignee; and, independently of the required general notice by publication in newspapers, a special notice to every known creditor must be served, in a prescribed mode, in the primary stage, and in certain ulterior stages of the proceedings. The legislation of Pennsylvania requires no schedule whatever of debts; and does not prescribe any special notice even to creditors who are known. The omission of such a notice by the assignee, may, perhaps, on general principles, be considered a breach of trust; but, be this as it may, many estates have been finally distributed, and the assignees discharged, without any other notice than a publication in newspapers; and the adjudication of distribution of funds, or of discharge of the assignee, when made, is, in the local tribunals, considered conclusive. The trust may, at all events unquestionably be administered without any sworn, or other schedule of the assignor's debts by himself. Such an administration of such a trust, if independent of the jurisdiction in bankruptcy, would tend manifestly to defeat the operation of the act of congress. More manifest is the tendency of the Pennsylvania system to delay the operation of this act. The act requires a sworn inventory of the estate in the primary stage of the proceedings, and the normal course of distribution is a dividend in three months or earlier, and a final dividend in six months, or sooner; the funds to be, in the meantime, from the receipt of them by the assignee, deposited or invested under the control of the court of bankruptcy. Under the Pennsylvania system, the assignment need not be recorded, nor any inventory exhibited, nor security given, for thirty days, though the voluntary assignee may act unrestrictedly in the meantime. He is not compulsorily accountable for the extraordinary period of a year. The distribution of a deceased intestate's insolvent estate by the administrator, may, for necessary reasons, be thus delayed. But there is no proper analogy to the estate of an insolvent living debtor. It is observable that the auxiliary jurisdiction of the circuit and district courts of the United States, under the 2d section of the act of congress, cannot be exercisable unless there can be an adjudication of bankruptcy. If, as in Shelby v. Bacon, 10 How. [51 U. S.] 56, the jurisdiction of the circuit court in equity could be invoked by an alien, or a citizen of another state, this would be as objectionable as the general jurisdiction of the English chancery; indeed, much more so, because, except through the operation of the bankrupt law, the legislation of Pennsylvania could not be disregarded in a court of the United States. A Pennsylvania creditor could not sue there at all, and yet his rights in bankruptcy would be the same as those of such a complainant.

In Pennsylvania the assignment must, therefore, at all events, be deemed an act of bankruptcy. But it would have been one, in the opinion of the court, if there had not been any legislation of the state upon the subject. See the next case, [Burkholder v. Stump, Case No. 2,165.]

Case No. 1,020.

BARNES et al. v. RYDER et al.

[3 McLean, 374.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Illinois. June Term, 1844.

NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS — DUTY OF HOLDER — PARTNERSHIP—PERSONAL LIABILITY.

1. The holder of a bill of exchange, after the demand of the acceptor and notice to the drawer, is not bound to active diligence.

2. An administrator is not bound to pay over money to a creditor of the deceased partner of the person on whose estate he administers.

3. Had such a payment been made, the administrator could not have set up such payment in a suit brought by the representatives of the deceased.

[At law. Action on a bill of exchange by Barnes and Robinson against Ryder & Co. and others. Heard on demurrer to pleas. Demurrer sustained.]

Hardin & Smith, for plaintiffs.

Davis, Strong & Martin, for defendants.

[1] [Reported by Hon. John McLean, Circuit Justice.]

OPINION OF THE COURT. This action was brought on a bill of exchange drawn by Ryder & Co. on Julius Varrin, for six thousand five hundred eleven dollars and forty cents, payable to Reel, Barnes & Co., or order, four months after date. The bill was dated 10th January, 1837. Varrin accepted the bill. The defendants pleaded that Varrin had their funds in his hands to meet the bill when he accepted it, and also when it became due; that he was at all times during his life, liable to pay the bill, and that his executors since his decease, at the commencement of this suit were liable. That at his decease he left a large amount of assets, after paying all debts except this bill. That among other assets he left an unsettled co-partnership concern of Varrin & Reel, which partnership consisted of the said Varrin and one John W. Reel, who at the time of his death was a partner in the firm of Reel, Barnes & Co. That Barnes was duly appointed administrator of the estate of Reel, and as administrator settled the co-partnership of Varrin & Reel, paying the debts thereof; and that after paying the debts of that concern, and before the commencement of this suit, a large amount of money, to wit, the sum of $30,000, remained in the hands of said Barnes, of which he made distribution, by paying over one half, to wit, the sum of $15,000, to one Justus Varrin, executor of Julius Varrin, and retaining the other half as part of the estate of Reel. That the said Barnes, previous to paying over the said sum of $15,000, made no provision to pay said bill of exchange.

A second plea, substantially the same as the above, and in which it is averred "that before the commencement of this action the executor of Varrin directed the said Barnes in writing, to apply any funds in his, the said Barnes's hands, belonging to the estate of Varrin, deceased, in payment of the said bill of exchange; and that the funds are still in the hands and at the disposal of the said Barnes," &c. To the above pleas the plaintiff demurred. The money stated in the first plea came into the hands of Barnes as administrator of Reel, and could not have been appropriated in paying this bill, for which the estate of Julius Varrin, who had been the partner of Reel, was liable. Had the executor of Varrin sued Barnes as administrator of Reel for money in his hands, he could not have set up this bill due the partnership in his defence. And in regard to the second plea, with the consent of the executor, Varrin, the money in the hands of Barnes might have been applied to the payment of the bill, but as the plea states it was not so applied. Nor can the failure of Barnes to make this application prejudice his co-partners. In no sense was it a payment, and it is not pleaded as such. Barnes was not bound to active diligence. On the whole we think the demurrer must be sustained to both pleas.

Case No. 1,021.

BARNES et al. v. STEAMSHIP CO.

[25 Leg. Int. 196;[1] 6 Phila. 479.]

Circuit Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. June 19, 1868.

COLLISION—LIABILITY—MEASURE OF—ACT MARCH 3, 1851, c. 43.

1. The appointment of nautical assessors in collision cases approved.

2. The personal liability of owners of vessels in causes of collision measured by the value of their vessel immediately before collision and freight pending.

3. The owners [are] not exempted from such liability by loss of their own vessel in consequence of the collision.

4. Foreign attachment in admiralty lies in cases of tort.

5. The provisions of the 4th section of the act of congress of March 3, 1851, [1851, (9 Stat. 635, c. 43,)] authorizing ship owners to transfer their interest in the ship and freight to a trustee for claimants does not apply to a loss to another vessel by collision nor to injuries to cargo on board the vessel in fault by reason thereof.

[Cited in Wright v. Norwich & N. Y. Transp. Co., Case No. 18,087.]

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the eastern district of Pennsylvania.

[In admiralty. Libel for collision by Barnes and others, owners of the schooner Pequonnock, against Steamship Company, owner of the steamer Westchester. Maltritz, Baird & Company, owners of the steamer's cargo, brought suit, and attached certain policies of insurance which were paid into court. The district court entered decrees (nowhere reported) for both sets of libellants, allowing them to share proportionately in the fund. Barnes and others appeal. Decree giving appellants priority in their claim upon the fund.]

M. P. Henry, for the Pequonnock.

Charles Gibbons, for the Westchester.

J. Warren Coulston, for Maltritz, Baird & Company.

GRIER, Circuit Justice. The points involved in this case are well stated by the counsel of libellants. On the night of July 20, 1866, the schooner Pequonnock, owned by Barnes and others, was sunk by a collision with the steamer Westchester, owned by the respondent, off the coast of New Jersey. Shortly afterwards the steamer was found to be sinking and was run ashore on the coast of New Jersey below Absecom. She was insured in several offices in Philadelphia in valued policies in the aggregate amounting to $20,000. The vessel was abandoned to the underwriters. Very little in value was saved. The owners of the Pequonnock brought suit on the 3d August, 1866, and attached these policies. On the 21st August, 1866, Maltritz, Baird & Company, owners of cargo on board the Westchester, brought suit and attached the same policies. After decree for libellants, the policies, amounting to $17,863.07, were paid into court. The decree for Barnes et al. amounted to $14,825.00. The decree for Maltritz, Baird & Company amounted to $4,898.00. In decreeing these amounts the court below allowed the libellants to share proportionately in the fund.

[1] [Reprinted by permission.]

The questions are: 1. The liability of the owners of the respective vessels for the collision. 2. The claim of the owners of the Westchester to be discharged from all liability by reason of the loss of their vessel. 3. The right of the owners of the Pequonnock to priority of payment out of the fund. As it is intended to take this case by appeal to the supreme court, I do not feel called upon to vindicate my decision by any argument on the subject, but shall merely state the results of a careful examination of the case and the authorities cited.

1. Notwithstanding the objections, urged by the learned counsel for the respondents to the report made by the nautical assessors, on examination of the testimony I find it to be a clear and correct statement, both of the facts and questions of law involved in the case. It is a very judicious practice of the district court in this district, to supply the want of "Trinity Masters," by using the nautical experience and judgment of intelligent masters of vessels who have retired from the service, and judging from the able reports made by those persons in this and other cases, that court has been peculiarly fortunate in its selection. We fully concur in their report, and hold that the Westchester was in fault. The proceedings in this case throughout are in accordance with the established practice in courts of admiralty. Process of attachment in admiralty is governed by its own rules and principles, and is not borrowed from the custom of London.

2. The owners are responsible for the injuries occasioned by a collision to the extent of the value of their interest in the vessel and freight. The owner is not exempted from liability when by the same collision his own ship instantly founders. This liability is measured by the value of the vessel immediately before the collision. 14 Gray, 288; 15 Mees. & W. 391; Pars. Mar. Law, 391; 3 W. Rob. Adm. 101.

3. The owners of the Pequonnock have a right to priority of payment out of the fund without any deduction for or on account of bottomry, mortgage, pilotage, towage, seaman's wages, or other contracts of the master or owners of the Westchester.

4. If the property attached is more than sufficient to pay the Pequonnock, the libellants, Maltritz, Baird & Taylor will be entitled to the remainder, if any.

5. The 4th section of the act of congress of March 3, 1851, c. 43, [9 Stat. 635,] "to limit the liability of ship owners," has no application to either of these claims. 14 Gray, 288. Opinion of Judge McGrath, 8 Amer. Law Reg. 206, [In re Sinclair, Case No. 12,895.]

Let a decree be drawn with this difference from that in the district court, that the Pequonnock be entitled to its whole claim with interests and costs, the residue, if any, to be applied to the claim of Maltritz, Baird & Company.

Case No. 1,022.

BARNES v. STRAUS.

[9 Blatchf. 553;[1] 2 O. G. 62; 5 Fish. Pat. Cas. 531; Merw. Pat. Inv. 204.]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. May 23, 1872.

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS — CORSET SPRINGS—INFRINGEMENT.

1. The invention described in reissued letters patent granted to Frances L. Barnes, executrix of, &c., of Samuel H. Barnes, deceased, August 31st, 1869, for an "improvement in corset-springs," the original patent having been granted to said Samuel H. Barnes, as inventor, July 17th, 1866, is, the arrangement in a pair, combined by clasps, on a corset, of two springs, each spring consisting of two metallic plates, placed one upon another, and fastened together at their centres, but so connected, at or near each end, that they can play or move upon each other in the direction of their length, and be prevented from sliding off each other laterally.

2. Such arrangement did not exist before the invention of Barnes.

3. The claims of such reissued patent are valid, and claim, under the expression, "a pair or set of corset springs," two corset-springs connected by clasps, each spring being constructed as above mentioned.

4. The invention held not to have been anticipated by a carriage spring which existed before, or by a single corset-spring, composed of two plates, with provision for play, but with no means for combining it with a second spring.

5. The combination, consisting of the two springs connected by the clasps, exists, pro tanto, so as to be an infringement, when the springs and clasps are made, ready to be inserted in the corset.

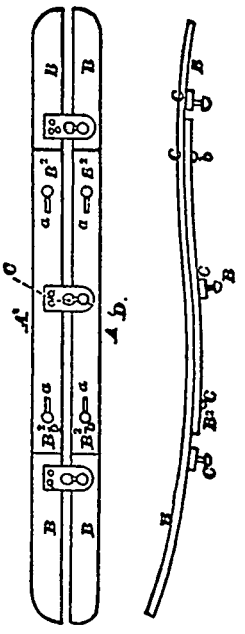
[In equity. Bill by Frances Barnes, executrix of Samuel H. Barnes, deceased, against Ferdinand Straus, for infringement of letters patent. Decree for complainant.]

George Gifford, for plaintiff.

Charles F. Blake, for defendant.

[Final hearing on pleadings and proofs. Suit brought upon letters patent for an "improvement in corset-springs," granted to Samuel H. Barnes, July 17, 1866; reissued to plaintiff as executrix of said Barnes, May 12, 1868; again reissued June 29, 1869; and again August 31, 1869. The nature of the invention and claims are fully set forth in the opinion.

[1] [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, District Judge, and by Samuel S. Fisher, Esq., and here compiled and reprinted by permission. Syllabus from 9 Blatchf. 553, and statement from 5 Fish. Pat. Cas. 532. Merw. Pat. Inv. 204, only contains partial report.]



[In the foregoing engravings, B represents the lower plate, and B^2 the upper; the two being connected by pins in slots, a, and the two parts of the corset-spring being connected by clasps, C, and buttons, D.] [2]

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. This suit is brought on reissued letters patent granted to the plaintiff August 31st, 1869, for an "improvement in corset-springs," the original patent having been granted to Samuel H. Barnes, as inventor, July 17th, 1866, and reissued to the plaintiff, May 12th, 1868, and again June 29th, 1869. In the specification it is stated that Barnes invented "a new and improved corset-spring." The specification says: "The present invention consists in forming the springs of corsets of two or more metallic plates, placed one upon another, and fastened together at their centre, but so connected, at or near each end, that they can play or move upon each other in the direction of their length, as the springs are bent, whereby their flexibility and elasticity are greatly increased, while at the same time much strength is obtained, and the springs rendered much more durable than the springs for corsets now in general use." There are two figures in the drawings, one giving a front view "of the two springs of the corset," that is, one spring of two plates on one side of the vertical opening in the corset, and another spring of two plates on the other side of such opening, "having the ordinary clasps for fastening the corset about the waist of the person who is to wear it." The specification states that the drawings represent two springs of a corset, properly bent in the direction of their length, to conform to the body or waist of a person, each spring composed of two metallic plates, placed one upon the other, the under one a little longer than the upper one, and secured at their centres, or midway between their two ends, this being done, in one of the springs, by the rivet which secures the ordinary corset clasp to the spring, and, in the other one, by a headed rivet on which such clasp is interlocked by its eye; that, at or near each end of each short plate, is a short slot, extending in the direction of its length, through which projects the rounded end or head of a pin fixed in the under plate; and that, by means of these slots, as the corset-springs are bent, the plates constituting the same can play or move, the one upon the other, the heads of the pins preventing the plates from springing apart from each other or sliding off laterally. The specification proceeds: "From the above description, it is plain to be seen, by forming the corset-springs of two plates, (one or more may be used, if desired, laid one upon the other, but so connected together, that the several plates constituting such springs can freely play upon each other in the direction of their length,) that the flexibility, pliability or elasticity of the springs is much increased, without in the least degree impairing their strength, rendering them much more durable and serviceable than the ordinary corset springs now in general use—an advantage and result of the utmost importance and utility. Although the springs have been herein above explained as formed of two metallic plates, laid one upon the other, and secured together as described, three or more may be used, but two are sufficient for ordinary corsets, it being distinctly understood that this invention is not limited to any particular number of plates which may be employed to form the springs, whether one or more, it simply consisting in so securing the several plates constituting the springs, to each other, that they can freely move or play upon each other. It may be stated that the terms "corset-steel," "corset-spring" and "corset-clasp," are each and all employed by the trade to designate a pair of springs, steels or stiffeners, connected by suitable clasps, whereby they are not only adapted to stiffen the front of the corset, but to fasten the two edges of the same together." The claims are these: "(1.) A pair or set of corset springs, each spring consisting of two or more metallic plates, placed one upon another, and fastened together at their centres, but so connected, at or near each end, that they can play or move upon each other in the direction of their length, and be prevented from sliding off each other laterally. (2.) A pair or set of corset springs, each spring composed of two or more metallic plates, placed one above another and fastened together at their centres, and so connected, at or near each end, that they can move or play upon each other in the direction of their length. (3.) A pair or set of corset-springs, each spring consisting of two or more metallic plates, placed one upon another, and fastened together at their centres, but so connected, at or near each end, that they can play or move upon each other in the direction of their length, and be prevented from sliding off each other laterally, the clasps by which the springs are combined, except the centre one, being attached to only one of the plates."

[2] [From 5 Fish. Pat. Cas. 532.]

The patent is attacked for want of novelty. The evidence shows that the arrangement in a pair, combined by clasps, on a corset, of two springs, each spring consisting of two metallic plates, placed one upon another, and fastened together at their centres, but so connected, at or near each end, that they can play or move upon each other in the direction of their length, and be prevented from sliding off each other laterally, did not exist before the invention of such arrangement by Barnes. The arrangement is useful, and Barnes invented it. Was the invention a patentable one, in view of what existed before?

The "ordinary" springs for corsets, referred to in the specification as "in general use," consisted of two springs, one on each side of the vertical opening in the corset, each formed of a single metallic plate, and the two springs being combined by clasps, the same as are referred to in the specification as the "ordinary corset-clasp," consisting of a clasp with an eye on one spring and a head on the other spring. The whole arrangement and combination constituted, as the specification says, a "corset-spring," embracing the two springs, one on each side of the vertical opening in the corset, connected by the clasps. In this arrangement, Barnes substituted, for the single-plate springs, double-plate springs. By having two plates he secured greater strength. But, in order to maintain the flexibility of the spring, and prevent danger of fracture to the metal, in the bending of it, in use in the corset, he fastened the two plates together at their centres, and made lengthwise slots in the upper plate, near its end, through which headed pins, fastened to the lower plates, projected, which allowed the two plates to slide along each other lengthwise, when bent, while the headed pins prevented the plates from slipping by each other sidewise or springing apart from each other facewise. This provision was necessary in order to develop the advantage of a spring made of two plates; and, in order not to prevent such sliding action of the plates, it was further necessary that the clasping devices, other than those at the centre of the length of the spring, should not be fastened through both plates. All this Barnes did, and this, in fact was his real invention. He did not merely substitute two plates for one plate.

It being thus seen what Barnes did, the claims of the patent must be construed, if that can properly be done, so as to cover his real invention. Although the specification, in one place, speaks of the invention as consisting in making a spring of two plates which can play upon each other in the direction of their length, as the spring is bent, and, in another place, speaks of it as consisting in so securing the plates constituting the springs, to each other, that they can freely play upon each other, yet, in view of the whole specification, and of the fact that it says that the term "corset-spring" is employed, by the trade, to designate a pair of springs, connected by suitable clasps, and thus adapted not only to stiffen the front of the corset, but to fasten its two edges together, the expression, "a pair or set of corset-springs," where it occurs, in each one of the three claims, cannot be construed to mean anything else but two corset-springs connected by the clasps referred to, each spring being constructed in the manner described. In this view, the claims of the patent are all of them valid.

A spring existed before, used in a carriage, which consisted of several metallic plates, placed one upon another and fastended together at their centres, the shorter ones above the longer ones, but so connected at or near each end, by headed pins playing in and through slots, that they could move upon each other in the direction of their length, and be prevented from sliding off each other laterally. I think the evidence shows that there was something more than the mere new use of an old article, and more than the mere use of an old article for a new purpose, and more than the mere use of two springs, one of which had been used before, in making the combination which Barnes made. The carriage-spring differed from the corset-spring in not having that flexibility at the centre of its length which the corset-spring has and must have, and in not curving in one direction at one end and in the other direction at the other end, as the corset-spring is shown in the drawings of the patent to do. In other words, the carriage-spring was not a corset-spring, and could not be used as such, without such a change as involved invention.

The French corset-spring put in evidence was a single spring, not a combined pair of springs; and, although it was composed of several metallic plates, placed one above another and fastened together at their centres, and free to move or play upon each other in the direction of their lengths, yet it had no such provision as the slots and fixed pins with heads, which Barnes introduced, nor any other provision for preventing the plates from becoming disengaged facewise or laterally. The French spring had no means of combining it with a second spring, when the two should be used one on each side of the vertical opening in a corset.

The pair of springs of the patent, that is, the two springs connected by the clasps, constitute, as a whole, a patentable combination. The two springs and the clasps connecting them are all required to make the article, as "a corset-spring," at all useful, in performing the functions which it performs when the springs are actually combined by the clasps when the corset is worn. The combination does not have its full effects developed until it is used in the corset, yet it exists pro tanto, so as to be an infringement, when the springs and clasps are made, ready to be inserted in a corset. The elements which make up the combination called "a corset-spring" co-operate mechanically to a common mechanical end, which end is developed in the use of the springs and clasps in the corset when worn. The fact that the clasps were used before with the single springs, does not destroy the novelty and patentability of the combination and arrangement made by Barnes.

There must be a decree for the plaintiff, for a perpetual injunction and an account, with costs, as the infringement is not denied.

[NOTE. Patent No. 56,345 was granted to S. H. Barnes, July 17, 1866; reissued August 31, 1869, (No. 3,624;) reissued January 7, 1873, (No. 5,216.) For other cases involving this patent, see Egbert v. Lippmann, Case No. 4,306; Egbert v. Lippmann, 104 U. S. 333.]

Case No. 1,023.

BARNES v. UNITED STATES.

[The case reported under this title in 12 N. B. R. 526, is the same as In re Vetterlein, Case No. 16,929.]

BARNES, (UNITED STATES v.) See Case No. 14,523.

BARNES v. VETTERLEIN. See Case No. 16,929.

BARNET v. DAY. See Case No. 836.

Case No. 1,024.

In re BARNETT.

[3 Pittsb. Rep. 559; 15 Pittsb. Leg. J. 73.]

District Court, W. D. Pennsylvania. 1868.

BANKRUPTCY—AFTER-ACQUIRED PROPERTY.

[Crops planted by a bankrupt after the filing of a petition in bankruptcy, under Act March 2, 1867, (14 Stat. 517, c. 176,) do not pass to the assignee as assets for the use of creditors.]

[See In re Patterson, Case No. 10,815; In re Levy, Id. 8,296.]

[In bankruptcy. In the matter of Joseph Barnett.]

Opinion by JOHN N. PURVIANCE, Register of the 23d Congressional District:

The question upon which the opinion of the register is desired, is whether the crop raised by the bankrupt in the year 1868, after the filing of his petition in bankruptcy, passes as assets to the assignee for the use of the creditors of said bankrupt. The petition in bankruptcy in this case, was filed on the 3d day of March, 1868, by the petitioner. The said Barnett was adjudged a bankrupt on the 8th day of April following. Assignment of his assets was duly made on the 15th day of May, 1868, to the assignee chosen by the greater part in number and value of the creditors who have proved their debts; said bankrupt has not been discharged. The 14th section of the bankrupt act [of March 2, 1867, (14 Stat. 522,)] providing inter alia for the assignment of bankrupt's effects and estate, is specific in its terms, in this, that it provides for the assignment and conveyance to the assignee of all the estate, real and personal, of the bankrupt, of which he was possessed, or in which he was interested, or entitled to have on the day of the date of filing his petition in bankruptcy, and declares that "such arrangement shall relate back to the commencement of said proceedings in bankruptcy." The assignment, therefore, does not relate to or take effect upon after-acquired property, earned by labor, as in this case. The whole proceedings as provided for by the law and as indicated in the forms prescribed, seem to contemplate the true condition of the bankrupt, as to his means and liabilities, at the time of the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy. Therefore, after-acquired property earned by labor or otherwise, pending proceedings in bankruptcy, and before final discharge, forms no part of the assets which under the bankrupt law passed by assignment to the assignee for the use of the creditors. Taking the facts to be as stated in the paper hereto attached, "that after the petition in bankruptcy was filed that Joseph Barnett, the bankrupt, put in a spring crop, consisting of corn, oats, buckwheat and potatoes," the register is of opinion that the said grain, &c., raised by the bankrupt after the filing of his petition, does not pass to the assignee as assets for the use of the creditor.

McCANDLESS, District Judge, confirmed the register's report.

BARNETT v. HIGHTOWER. See Case No. 1,009.

Case No. 1,025.

BARNETT v. LUTHER.

[1 Curt. 434.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. Term, 1853.

ADMIRALTY—JURISDICTION—NOMINAL DAMAGES.

The admiralty will not entertain suits for merely nominal damages in cases of personal torts, not involving any subject-matter beyond such a claim for damages.

[1] [Reported by Hon. B. R. Curtis, Circuit Justice.]

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of Massachusetts.

[In admiralty. Libel by Andrew Barnett against Daniel B. Luther for assault. The district court gave a decree for respondent, (unreported.) Libellant appeals. Affirmed.]

This was an appeal from the district court by the libellant, in a cause of damage. The libellant was a seaman on board the bark Mary R. Barney, and alleged in his libel an assault by the master and mate of that vessel, for which he claimed damages. The facts appear in the opinion of the court.

CURTIS, Circuit Justice. It appears, from the evidence in this case, that the libellant had been engaged in painting the mizzenmast head, and when he came down to dinner, left the paint-pot so carelessly secured, that by the motion of the vessel the paint was thrown down on the house. The master ordered the man to be called from the forecastle; and when he came on deck, the mate ordered him to go aloft and take his paint-pot down. The man went; but as he passed aft, he used insolent language towards the officers, who were all on deck. The master ordered him to be silent, and told him he would flog him if he did not obey; but he continued to grumble, as the witness expresses it, until he came down to the deck, and then he passed over to the weather side, where the master was standing, and stopped near him, looking at him, as the only witness who describes the occurrence says, with an insolent look. The master took the top-gallant brace, and struck him with the end of it over the shoulder; the man instantly seized the master, and they fell together on the deck. The man put his hand back, as if feeling for his sheath-knife; but he had left it below. The second mate then interfered; the master got up, the man rose to his feet, and immediately struck the second mate, who returned the blow; they seized each other, the second mate threw him down, and while down, struck him once or twice in the face. The man was then put in irons until the next morning, but not deprived of his food. The next day he was set at liberty.

This case has been argued upon the ground that a technical assault by the master is made out by the evidence; and that, since the act of congress of September 28, 1850, (9 Stat. 515,) abolishing the punishment of flogging in the navy and in vessels of commerce, the master cannot justify his act of striking the seaman, even though his insolence deserved punishment. And it was stated by the counsel for the libellant, that this appeal had been brought here to try that question. To determine what is the precise effect of this act of congress upon the authority of the master of a vessel to inflict punishment upon the crew, is a matter of no small difficulty, and of very great importance. It is a question which should be settled only after great consideration, when it shall become necessary to do so. This case does require it. For if it were admitted that in an action at law, this seaman could recover nominal damages for the blow inflicted by the master, it does not follow that the admiralty will award him nominal damages. A court of admiralty is a court of equity acting on marine affairs. As such, it regards and protects only substantial rights. Merely nominal claims, which do not amount to any substantial right, and are not so connected with any substantial right as to be necessary to its vindication, are not subjects of relief here. It is true that a claim for nominal damages may be so connected with a substantial right, as to present the only means of trying and vindicating it. And in such a case, though the damages are nominal, the subject-matter of the suit may be important, and a fit subject of litigation. Cases in which, by acquiescence for a length of time, an adverse right may be gained, are of this description. And at the common law, the prevailing party having a legal right to costs, which is of itself a substantial right, it is necessary to decide claims to nominal damages upon strict legal principles, even where nothing but a question of costs is involved. But in the admiralty the costs are in the discretion of the court, and do not depend upon the question whether the libellant recovers one dollar or nothing.

In this case, the libellant was, throughout, in the wrong. He was negligent, in not properly securing the paint-pot. He was grossly in fault for his insolence to the master, and his disobedience of his order to be silent; and still more for confining the master, and striking the second officer. He amply deserved quite as much punishment as he received. And if, which I do not intend to decide, there was a departure by the master from the strict line of his authority, when he struck the libellant with a rope, the provocation was so great, the blow so slight, and the conduct of the libellant so insubordinate and violent, that he could in no event recover more than nominal damages. These, for the reasons already suggested, I do not feel bound to award to him.

The decree of the district court is affirmed.

Case No. 1,026.

BARNETT v. MUNCIE NAT. BANK.[1]

[1 Cin. Law Bul. 45.]

Circuit Court, S. D. Ohio. March, 1876.[2]

USURY—PENALTY—NATIONAL BANKS—ACT JUNE 3, 1864.

[1. The words "legal representatives," as used in Act June 3, 1864. (13 Stat. 108,) § 30, pro-

[1] [The title of this case should be Muncie Nat. Bank v. Barnett, but, as it has been cited as Barnett v. Muncie Nat. Bank, it is here published under that title.]

[2] [Affirmed in 98 U. S. 555.]

viding for the recovery of twice the amount of usurious interest from a national bank by the "legal representatives" of the person paying such interest, must be construed strictly, and not to include the assignees in bankruptcy of such person. Barnits v. First Nat. Bank of Hamilton, Case No. 1,034, followed.]

[Overruled in Wright v. First Nat. Bank of Greensburg, Case No. 18,078.]

[Contra, see Crocker v. First Nat. Bank of Cheopta, Case No. 3,397; Barbour v. Nat. Exchange Bank, 45 Ohio St. 133, 12 N. E. 5.]

[See note at end of case.]

[2. The indorser of a bill of exchange is not the "legal representative" of the one for whose benefit the bill was discounted, and consequently is not entitled to be subrogated to his rights arising under Act June 3, 1864, (13 Stat. 108,) § 30, from the payment of usurious interest, on such bill.]

[Contra, see National Bank of Auburn v. Lewis, 75 N. Y. 516, 81 N. Y. 15; National Exch. Bank of Columbus v. Moore, Case No. 10,041; Cake v. First Nat. Bank of Lebanon, 86 Pa. 303.]

[See note at end of case.]

[At law. Action by the Muncie National Bank of Muncie, Ind., against David Barnett, the drawer, Barnits & Whitesides, acceptors, and Robert Marshall, the payee and indorser, of a bill of exchange for $4,000. dated November 18, 1873. David Barnett and Isaac E. Craig, assignees of Barnits & Whitesides, intervened. Heard on demurrer to the defenses and cross-petitions of the several defendants. Demurrers sustained, except as to one of the defenses of Robert Marshall and the second defense of the assignees, which was "that the bill in suit was the last of eight renewals; that illegal interest was taken upon the series to the amount of $1,116, which it was claimed should be applied upon the bill in question." Upon this issue the case was tried by a jury. Verdict for plaintiff, $4,080.31.

[Subsequently the case was taken to the supreme court on writ of error, and the judgment of this court affirmed. Barnet v. Muncie Nat. Bank, 98 U. S. 555.]

Hogans & Broadwell, for plaintiff.

Miller & Gilmore and Wilson & Craig, for defendants.

Before EMMONS, Circuit Judge, and SWING, District Judge.

This was a suit upon a bill of exchange drawn by David Barnits, and which had been accepted by Barnits & Whitesides, and indorsed by Robert Marshall, the payee, for $4,000, and which had been negotiated by Barnits & Whitesides with the Muncie National Bank. The assignees of Barnits & Whitesides came in, by leave, and set up, by way of defense and cross-petition, that they had had fifty-one transactions with the plaintiff, in which Barnits & Whitesides had paid to the bank $6,324, by way of interest, and which was more than the legal rate, and that they were entitled to recover back, therefore, under the provisions of national banking act, [Act June 3, 1864; 13 Stat. 108, § 30,] double that amount, and asked judgment that the bill sued on be liquidated out of that amount, and that they recover the balance against the plaintiff. The court made the same holdings with respect to this defense as in the Hamilton and Eaton National Bank Cases, reported above. [Barnits v. First Nat. Bank of Hamilton, Case No. 1,034.]

Robert Marshall, the indorser, set up, by way of defense, that the bill sued on was the last of a series of seven renewals, and that, under the said 30th section of the national banking act, he had a right to be credited with the forfeiture of the amount of the entire interest reserved on that series of renewals, on the ground of alleged usury in the transactions. To this defense a demurrer was interposed, which the court overruled, without deciding the question argued by counsel whether, under that section of the act which provides for a "forfeiture of the entire interest which the note, bill, or other evidence of debt, carries with it, or, which has been agreed to be paid thereon," Marshall had a right to a credit for a forfeiture of the entire interest reserved on the series of the seven discounts, or the interests reserved merely on the bill sued on, leaving the plaintiff to plead for the purpose of raising that question.

But another defense that Marshall made was that the bank, in the fifty-one transactions with Barnits & Whitesides, had received unlawful interest; that Barnits & Whitesides were entitled to recover under the act double the amount thereof, to wit, $12,648; and asked to be subrogated to their rights to an amount sufficient to discharge his liability on the bill. To this defense was also interposed a demurrer by the plaintiff, which was sustained, on the ground that the law conferred only on the person or his legal representatives, who had the transactions with the bank, the right to avail himself of the provisions of the act.

[NOTE. This case was taken to the supreme court by the assignees, where this judgment was affirmed, but upon entirely different grounds. Mr. Justice Swayne, in delivering the opinion of the court, did not touch upon the questions decided by the circuit court, but said that "the remedy given by the statute for the wrong is a penal suit. To that the party aggrieved or his legal representative must resort. He can have redress in no other mode or form of procedure. The statute which gives the right prescribes the redress, and both provisions are alike obligatory upon the parties. While the plaintiff, in such cases, upon making out the facts, has a clear right to recover, the defendant has a right to insist that the prosecution shall be by a suit brought specially and exclusively for that purpose, where the sole issue is the guilt or innocence of the accused, without the presence of any extraneous facts which might confuse the case, and mislead the jury to the prejudice of either party." Barnet v. Muncie Nat. Bank, 98 U. S. 555.]

Case No. 1,027.

BARNEWALL et al. v. JONES et al.

[14 N. B. R. 278.]

District Court, S. D. Alabama. June Term, 1876.

BANKRUPTCY—ASSIGNEE—SETTING ASIDE CONVEYANCES.

[1. An assignment by one member of a firm of all his individual property for the benefit of his individual creditors, and with directions to distribute the balance, if any, among partnership creditors, if made within six months before the filing of a petition in bankruptcy against the firm, may be set aside at the suit of the assignee in bankruptcy, under the thirty-fifth section of the bankrupt act. (Rev. St. § 5129; 14 Stat. 534,) as being made with intent to prevent the distribution of the property under that act.]

[2. Such an assignment does not come within that clause of the thirty-fifth section of the act, (Rev. St. § 512; 14 Stat. 534,) which allows only four months for the setting aside an assignment made with a view to give a preference to a creditor who knows the debtor to be insolvent.]

[Cited in Crump v. Chapman, Case No. 3,455.]

[3. The rights of the assignee in bankruptcy under this thirty-fifth section (14 Stat. 534) are not affected by the amendments thereto of June 22, 1874, (18 Stat. 180,) when the adjudication of bankruptcy was passed before the amendments were adopted.]

[Cited in Warren v. Garber, Case No. 17,196.]

[In bankruptcy. Proceedings by Henry Barnewall and William C. Gaynor, assignees of Crawford, Walsh, Smith & Co. and Walsh, Smith, Crawford & Co., and others, against William G. Jones, William D. Dunn, and James Crawford, to recover property passed by assignment by Crawford to Dunn and Jones, in trust—First, for the benefit of his creditors; and, second, for the benefit of the creditors of Crawford, Walsh, Smith & Co. and Walsh, Smith, Crawford & Co., of which firms he was a member. Heard on bill, answer, and agreement of counsel. Decree for complainants.]

E. H. Grandin, for complainants.

R. H. Smith, for defendants.

BRUCE, District Judge. The case is submitted for final decree upon bill, answers of defendants, Wm. D. Dunn, Wm. G. Jones, and James Crawford, and the agreement of counsel in writing, by which the complainants dismiss their bill as to the other defendants named therein, and no exception is taken to such dismissal or to the want of proper parties.

The important facts to be borne in mind are stated in agreement of counsel on file, and are, that the proceedings in bankruptcy were filed June 3, 1874, and the deed of assignment referred to in the bill of complainants was made, executed, and recorded January 31, 1874. The bankruptcy proceedings were commenced upon the petition of Henry Hall, against Crawford, Walsh, Smith & Co., of Mobile, and Walsh, Smith, Crawford & Co., of New York, of both of which mercantile firms James Crawford was a member, and an order of adjudication of all the persons composing said firms, bankrupts, followed upon the 12th day of June, 1874. The complainants were subsequently duly appointed and qualified as their assignees in bankruptcy.

The character of the indenture or deed of assignment of James Crawford to Dunn and Jones will be best determined by a reference to the instrument itself, which is found as an exhibit to the bill. It is clearly an assignment of the individual property and estate of James Crawford (except such as is by law exempt from execution) to said Dunn and Jones, in trust and for the uses and purposes therein mentioned. The question is as to what this transaction was in legal effect. It is not important, in the view I take of the case, to inquire what these parties intended. However good the motives of James Crawford in making the transfer, or of Messrs. Dunn and Jones in receiving it, and however free they may have been from any intention to commit an actual fraud upon any one is not material here. The question, however, remains as to the legal quality and effect of the transfer here in question. That James Crawford was insolvent at the time this transfer was made, and that it was made in contemplation of insolvency, is clear from the terms of the transfer itself, and William D. Dunn and William G. Jones, the transferees, must be held to notice and knowledge of everything stated in and plainly inferable from the terms of the instrument itself.

On the 3d of June following this conveyance or transfer of property, and about four months and three days thereafter, a petition in involuntary bankruptcy was filed in the district court of the United States for the southern district of Alabama, followed by an order of adjudication and the appointment of assignees, as before stated. The provisions of the bankrupt act contemplate a distribution, not only of the partnership property and assets of the bankrupts, but a distribution also of the individual property of each member of said mercantile firms. Section 36, Bankrupt Act, [14 Stat. 534.]

By the judgment of the court adjudicating James Crawford a bankrupt, the title to all his property, both real and personal, partnership and individual, except such as was exempt by law, vested, by operation of law, in his assignees in bankruptcy for the benefit of his creditors, both partnership and individual, and the conveyance or assignment by the register in bankruptcy related back to the filing of the petition in bankruptcy, to wit, June 3, 1874. See section 14, Bankrupt Act, [14 Stat. 522.] This then is the date at which the rights of the creditors of James Crawford attached to his property and became fixed and vested; and this brings me to the effect of the provisions of the 35th section of the bankrupt act, [14 Stat. 534,] upon the transfer or conveyance of the property in question.

The complainants' bill was filed December 6, 1875, long after the passage of the amendatory act of June 22, 1874, [18 Stat. 180,] but it was filed to assert the rights of the creditors under the bankruptcy proceedings which were instituted June 3, 1874. If the assignees, as the representatives of the creditors, have any rights here at all, they accrued June 3, 1874, and the question as to when they filed their bill to assert their rights is unimportant to this inquiry. If then the transfer or conveyance in question is void, under the provisions of the 35th section of the bankrupt act, then the assignees may recover the property or the value thereof as the assets of the bankrupt. There are two clauses in section 35 of the bankrupt act which may be designated as the four months' clause and the six months' clause, and it is important to inquire under which of these clauses this conveyance and transfer falls; for, if it falls within the four months' clause, it is protected because the transfer was made more than four months anterior to the institution of the proceedings in bankruptcy. If, however, this transfer falls within the six months' clause, it is not protected, because less than six months had elapsed from the making of the conveyance to the filing of the petition in bankruptcy; in fact, only a few days over four months had elapsed. How, then, shall we determine under which clause this transfer or conveyance falls? for it is admitted that it falls within one of them.

An analysis of the two clauses is necessary. In the four months' clause these words are used: "If any person, being insolvent or in contemplation of insolvency, within four months of the filing of the petition by or against him, with a view to give a preference to any creditor or person having a claim against him, or who is under any liability for him * * * makes * * * any assignment, transfer, or conveyance of any part of his property, either directly or indirectly, absolutely or conditionally, the person receiving such payment, assignment, transfer, or conveyance, or to be benefited thereby * * * having reasonable cause to believe such person is insolvent, and that such * * * assignment or conveyance is made in fraud of the provisions of this act, the same shall be void, and the assignee may recover the property, or the value of it, from the person so receiving it or so to be benefited." Now, the prominent idea here is that insolvent persons shall not prefer one creditor over another. If, however, they do it, the creditor takes the risk of losing what he has so acquired if proceedings in bankruptcy are instituted within four months from that time. If not instituted, he is protected in his right, though he got it by way of preference. This clause certainly contemplates transfers of property to particular persons for particular debts or liabilities, and does not contemplate such an assignment of property as we have in this case, which is a general assignment of the bankrupt's individual property for the equal benefit of his individual creditors first, and the excess, if any, to be applied to the payment of his partnership creditors.

This is an assignment with a view to a distribution of the bankrupt's property, providing for the means and mode of the distribution, which is a very different thing from a preference to a creditor or person having a claim against him, or who is under any liability for him, such as is implied by the language of the clause under consideration. It is claimed for the defendants that the case of Gibson v. Warden, 14 Wall. [81 U. S.] 244, is conclusive on this point, and settles the question that this conveyance falls within the four months' clause. It is to be first observed that no such instrument or assignment was before the court in that case as there is here. The transaction was entirely and essentially a different one. It was a claim secured by mortgage, and the court decided that it was valid under the laws of Ohio, and that being founded upon a past consideration, it fell within the first (or four months') clause of the bankrupt act, and was thereby protected. In that case the court says: "The language employed in the first clause (the four months' clause) imports clearly that the consideration must be one growing out of a former transaction, and that the recipient must stand in the relation thus created to the other party. It is equally clear that the second clause, enlightened by this construction of the first one, must be limited to cases where the transaction was original and complete in itself at the time it occurred, and had no reference for its consideration to anything between the parties which had gone before it."

In the case before us there is no pretense even of a preference to Dunn and Jones; there was no past consideration as to them, for the relation of debtor and creditor did not exist between them and the bankrupt. So far as they were concerned, the transaction was original and complete in itself at the time it occurred, and had no reference for its consideration to anything between them (the parties) which had gone before. If, then, this assignment does not fall within the four months' clause, it does fall within the six months' clause, as a very brief examination will show.

The language of the six months' clause is much the same as the language of the four months' clause. There is the difference as to time anterior to the filing of the petition in bankruptcy, at which transfers of the kind described are protected; also the idea of preference of a creditor by the bankrupt is not in the six months' clause; but sales, assignments, transfers, to persons other than creditors are within its provisions. The prominent and distinct feature, however, of this six months' clause which brings this case within its provisions, will be seen by a reference to the language used, as follows: "And that such payment, sale, assignment, transfer, or other conveyance, is made with a view to prevent his property from coming to his assignee in bankruptcy, or to prevent the same from being distributed under this act, or defeat the object of, or in any way impair, hinder, impede, or delay the operation and effect of, or to evade any of the provisions of the act, the sale, assignment, transfer, or conveyance shall be void, and the assignee may receive the property, or the value thereof, as assets of the bankrupt."

Apply that language to this case in hand. Has not the insolvent in contemplation of insolvency sought to prevent his property from being distributed under the bankrupt act? He ignores the act altogether. He seeks to prevent his property from coming to his assignee in bankruptcy, by the appointment of his own trustees. It is a clear case of an attempt to defeat the object of the act, to delay the operation of and evade the provisions of the act. And such a transaction the statute denounces as void. "And when not made in the usual and ordinary course of business of the debtor (which is the case here), the fact shall be prima facie evidence of fraud."

These two clauses of the 35th section of the bankrupt law [14 Stat. 534] have a common purpose to prevent fraudulent transfers of property by an insolvent, the object being to secure the equal distribution of the property and assets of the bankrupt among his creditors, which is the prime purpose and object of the bankrupt law. But while they have a common purpose, they have distinctive differences, which may be thus stated: The four months' clause has reference to transfers with a view to a preference of one creditor of an insolvent over another, which implies a past indebtedness. The six months' clause has reference to transfers of property by an insolvent to persons other than creditors, with a view to prevent his property from being distributed under the act, and with a purpose to defeat its operation and evade its provisions.

In this case, while, as to Dunn and Jones, there was no past indebtedness, yet as to the creditors for whose benefit the transfer purports to have been made, its consideration was past indebtedness; but the distinctive feature of the transfer and that which takes it out of the four months' clause and places it in the six months' clause, is that it is a general assignment of the insolvent's individual property for the benefit of his creditors, and contemplates a distribution of his property otherwise than as provided by the bankrupt law, and is an attempt to defeat its operation and evade its provisions, and is a fraud upon the bankrupt law.

The only remaining question which I deem it necessary to consider is the effect of the amendatory act of June 22, 1874, to the bankrupt law [18 Stat. 180] upon the questions here involved. This suit was brought within two years from the time the cause of action accrued. So that no question arises under the statute of limitation for the bringing of suits by assignees, which is limited to two years, by section 2 of the bankrupt act. If the assignees have any rights at all they accrued at the time of the filing of the petition in bankruptcy, as already stated, June 3, 1874, which was followed by an order of adjudication of June 12, 1874. The amendatory act was passed June 22, 1874. And the amendment to section 35 is prospective in its terms. Courts will not give a retrospective operation to a statute, unless it clearly appears from the language used that the law-making power so intended.

I am cited to the cases of Singer v. Sloan, [Cases Nos. 12,899 and 12,898,] decided by Judge Dillon, in which he holds that section 11 of the amendatory bankrupt act of June 22, 1874, amending section 35 of the original act, applies to cases brought after the amendatory act took effect, although the instrument creating the alleged preference was executed before June 22, 1874. He says: "Rights wholly given by statute are taken away by its unconditional repeal." This view of the subject and statement of the law are not satisfactory to my mind. A more correct statement of the legal proposition is found in Hamlin v. Pettibone, [Case No. 5,995,] thus: "Statutes affecting substantial rights divesting causes of action which have fully accrued, are not without express declaration or the strongest implication to be applied to past transactions."

The rule of law upon this subject is thus stated: "Where a right arises under, or is given by a statute, and it has been so far perfected that nothing remains to be done by the party, the repeal of the statute does not affect it, or an action for its enforcement."

In the head notes of the supreme court of the state of Alabama, in the case of State v. Moody,[1] December term, 1875, this is found: "The adjudication of bankruptcy is in the nature of a statute execution for all the creditors, and the assignee, as their representative, may enforce against the debtor every right a judgment creditor could enforce."

I conclude that the rights of the creditors of the bankrupt James Crawford, as represented by the assignees in bankruptcy, arose and became vested rights prior to the passage of the amendatory act of June 22, 1874, and stand independent of it, and unaffected by it. This suit is brought to assert their rights as to the property described in the transfer or conveyance to Dunn and Jones. And it appearing by the terms of the transfer that it was made by an insolvent, and in contemplation of insolvency, of which the transferees must be held to notice, the transfer is void under the 35th section of the bankrupt act. The decree is for the complainants, and will be drawn in accordance with this opinion.

[1] [This citation is probably intended for Steele v. Moody, 53 Ala. 418.]

Case No. 1,028.

The BARNEY EATON.

[1 Biss. 242.] [1]

District Court, D. Wisconsin. Oct. Term, 1858.

SALVAGE—WHO ENTITLED TO — PRIOR TO OTHER LIENS—MORTGAGEE MAY CLAIM SALVAGE.

1. Where the owners of a stranded vessel have abandoned all efforts to save her, and at their request a third party, at his own risk and expense, gets her off and repairs her, his claim is in the nature of salvage, and takes precedence of prior maritime liens.

2. The fact that the salvor held a mortgage upon the vessel not due, the mortgagors being the owners and in possession, does not deprive him of this preference. He cannot be considered in the light of an owner.

In admiralty. The libellant built this schooner and afterwards sold her to Peter Weber and Edwin Churchill, taking a chattel mortgage for the principal portion of the purchase money, leaving the mortgagors, the purchasers, in possession. They ran the vessel during the season of 1857; and in the month of November of that year, she was stranded on the Michigan shore of Lake Michigan. The owners failed in an effort to get her afloat, and so informed the libellant, who procured men and advanced funds in an effort to save her, and in the month of May following, he brought her to the port of Milwaukee. There she was repaired at his expense, with the consent of the owners, but soon afterwards libelled by several parties for debts contracted for supplies during the time Weber and Churchill were sailing her. This libel is subsequent to those libels, and a preference is claimed out of the proceeds of sale for the expenses and services incurred in getting the vessel afloat, and bringing her to Milwaukee, and for putting her in order for service. When she lay on the Michigan shore she was valueless, and she was so badly damaged as to require a thorough repair, both of the hull and rigging.

The owners, Weber and Churchill, make no defense. The other libellants object to the demand of this libellant, on the ground that being mortgagee, he was protecting and securing his own interest, by getting the vessel afloat and repairing her. And also that he by virtue of his mortgage is to be viewed in the light of an owner.

Emmons, Van Dyke & Hamilton, for libellant.

Butler, Buttrick & Cottrell, for respondents.

MILLER, District Judge. The questions are:

1st. Whether the nature of the demand is such as to give this libellant a preference.

2. Whether the fact of the mortgage to him defeats his claiming a lien on the vessel.

The vessel was abandoned by the owners after they had failed in getting her afloat, and after they had exhausted their means in the effort. At their instance the libellant succeeded, after a large expenditure of money and labor. When she lay on the Michigan shore of the lake, in her broken and wrecked condition, she was probably not worth the demands of those prior libellants. At all events they did not attempt to make their money out of her by a sale, or make an effort to put her afloat by the expenditure of time, money, or labor. They lay by from November, 1857, to this time, without making one effort to collect their debts, either from the owners or the master, or out of the vessel, until she has been got ready for service and made of value by the means and labor of this libellant. Now after she is brought to an accessible port, and restored to value equal to their demand, without any effort or merits on their part, they attempt to have appropriated the proceeds of her sale to their own demands. The demand of this libellant is for services in the nature of salvage service, and is entitled to a preference.

At the time the vessel was stranded, the owners, Weber and Churchill, were in possession. The libellant's mortgage was not then payable. He did not enter upon the work on his own account, but after the owners had abandoned the vessel and applied to him to undertake it. The vessel while lying on shore a wreck was liable to the admiralty liens created and contracted for by the owners; which were paramount to the mortgage. As against them the mortgage was of no legal validity. Until the mortgagee was put into possession under his mortgage he had no control over the vessel, nor could he be considered in the light of an owner. Abb. Shipp. 45 et seq.

A passenger may lawfully, except under peculiar circumstances, depart the ship. Should he voluntarily remain on board, at the risk of his personal safety, to assist her in her distress, he may be entitled to remuneration for his services. Abbott, 560. And part of a crew of a vessel who remain on board after abandonment by the master and the rest of the crew, and under such circumstances that the abandonment was justifiable, are entitled to salvage compensation, if they perform valuable services. The passenger's personal safety required him to work to save the vessel; and the contract of a sailor excludes salvage compensation; but in extreme cases salvage compensation may be allowed both these descriptions of persons. Such, I apprehend, should the libellant's demand be considered. The vessel was actually abandoned by crew and owners, and not libelled in her wrecked and disabled condition by maritime creditors. The libellant had no right or claim to possession, but at the instance of the owners he discharged the services propounded for in the libel. He procured men to get the vessel afloat. Those men could libel the vessel for their services. So could those whom he employed to tow the vessel into port. So could those who repaired her and restored her to value. Instead of all those persons filing libels, this libellant filed one in his own name, which is by no means objectionable.

[1] [Reported by Josiah H. Bissell, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

I am of the opinion that, under the circumstances, this libellant should not be deprived of the admiralty process and jurisdiction in enforcing his demand against this vessel. And I further think that equity and justice should postpone those libellants, who attached this vessel for debts contracted, while she was sailed by Weber and Churchill, her owners. The libellant should be considered entitled to recover for services as a salvor.

Decree accordingly.

NOTE, [from original report.] For cases on salvage and the measure of compensation, see Bee, 139, 170, 175, 178, 193, 201, 226, [Schultz v. The Nancy, Case No. 12,493; Stephens v. Bales of Cotton, Id. 13,366; Deliessline v. The Friendship, Id. 13,807; British Consul v. Twenty-Two Pipes, etc., Id. 1,900; Cross v. The Bellona, Id. 3,428; Bass v. Five Negroes, Id. 1,093; Jerby v. One Hundred and Ninety-Four Slaves, Id. 7,288;] 2 Bouv. Law Dict. 494; 2 Pars. Shipp. & Adm. 260–321. [See, also, Baker v. The Slobodna, 35 Fed. 537, and cases there cited.]

Case No. 1,029.

BARNEY v. BALTIMORE.

[1 Hughes, 118.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Maryland. March Term. 1863.[2]

COURTS — JURISDICTION — DIVERSE CITIZENSHIP — REAL PARTIES — PARTITION — DEDICATION.

1. Under the clause of the judiciary act of [September 24,] 1789, [1 Stat. 73,] giving United States circuit courts jurisdiction of certain causes between a citizen of the state where the suit is brought and a citizen of another state, citizenship of one of the suitors in the District of Columbia does not give jurisdiction.

[See note at end of case.]

2. Conveyances of the interests of non-residents made merely for the purpose of giving these courts jurisdiction, do not suffice that purpose.

[See note at end of case.]

3. Before complainant's bill for a partition of property can be entertained by a court, his title must be clear to the portion to be received from the partition.

[See note at end of case.]

4. Where an owner of land exhibits a map of it in which a street is defined, though not yet opened, and sells building lots with front or rear on the street, and makes no express reservation, he dedicates the street for public use; and. if in a city, surrenders it for all public purposes, and if the street runs to or binds on a river or bay, surrenders it for use as a wharf where vessels may load and unload; but yet the fee simple will not pass to the city.

[See note at end of case.]

[In equity. Bill for partition of land, by Mary Barney against the mayor and city council of Baltimore, William C. Ridgely, and others. Bill dismissed upon consideration of the merits. Subsequently, on complainant's appeal to the supreme court, the decree was reversed, and the case remanded to this court, with directions to enter a decree dismissing the bill for want of jurisdiction, and without prejudice. Barney v. Baltimore, 6 Wall. (73 U. S.) 280.]

GILES, District Judge. This cause is submitted for final decree on bill, answer, evidence, and admissions filed. The counsel for the respective parties have been fully heard, and in the very learned and able arguments that have been made, almost every case has been cited that could in any way sustain the positions and views of the respective parties. The original bill in this cause was filed on the 26th September, 1848. Various changes have taken place since, in reference to the parties, by death or otherwise, which it will not be necessary to notice; as on the 28th of June, 1860, this court passed the following order: "that the complainant have leave to file an amended and supplemental bill and bill of reviver, as prayed for by her petitions filed 5th July, 1859, and 16th June, 1860; said bill to be filed on or before the first Monday of July next; all questions touching the jurisdiction of this court, in this court, in the said case, either on the original bill or on the bill which may be filed under this order, and also all questions as to the complainant's right of relief in this proceeding, are reserved under the final hearing." The amended bill under this order was filed on the 30th of June, 1860, and the answer of the mayor and city council of Baltimore thereto, on the 21st July, 1860; and it is on the issues which this amended bill and answer present, that this cause has been argued, and upon which I am now to decide. The bill alleges in substance, that the complainant, as one of the heirs of Judge Samuel Chase, is tenant in common with the other defendants, his grandchildren, and with the mayor and city council of Baltimore, grantees of Samuel and Thomas Chase, sons of Judge Chase, of the fee in the bed of West Falls avenue (formerly called "Liffy Street,") and of the City Block, and as such, that she is entitled to a share of the wharfage collected by the city on the west side of Jones's Falls and on the City Block, and to one-sixth part of the City Block. And the bill prays for an account and for a partition between the parties entitled. The bill also states that three of the defendants, to wit, William G. Ridgely, Ann Ridgely, and

[1] [Reported by Hon. Robert W. Hughes, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

[2] [Reversed in 6 Wall. (73 U. S.) 280.]

Matilda Ridgely are residents of the District of Columbia; that since the filing of the original bill in this case, to wit, on the 8th day of June, 1858, they had conveyed all their interest in the property in question to their brother, Samuel Chase Ridgely; that said Samuel Chase Ridgely has since died, and by his last will and testament devised the said property so conveyed to him by his said brother and sisters back to them. All of the defendants, except the mayor and city council of Baltimore, have filed a joint answer admitting the facts stated in the said bill of complaint. The mayor and city council of Baltimore file a plea, demurrer, and answer, in which they allege that the conveyance made by the said William G. Ridgely and others to Samuel Chase Ridgely was without consideration, colorable and fictitious, and was executed with the intent to give jurisdiction to this court. And that the said grantors in said deed have no legal standing as devisees of Samuel Chase Ridgely to be parties to this bill.

There are also filed in the cause two papers, stating in detail the several facts which have been admitted by the parties. These relate principally to the relationship of the said parties to Judge Chase, and contain the agreement, that either party may offer in evidence the record of the ejectment suit brought by the complainant for this property against the mayor and city council of Baltimore in Baltimore county court; and that the plats, deeds, and evidences may be read from the record in said case, as evidence in the trial of this cause. The only parts of these admissions which it becomes necessary for me to notice particularly, are the following: "It is admitted in this case, that the deed of the 8th of June, 1858, to Samuel Chase Ridgely from William G. Ridgely and others, was made without valuable consideration, and to enable the court to dispose of the case, as if the grantors in the deed had no interest in the matter in question in the cause; it being further understood, that on request of the grantors, the property conveyed by that deed should be passed to the grantors."

Also, "the said William G. Ridgely, Ann C. Ridgely, and Matilda L. Ridgely executed a deed of all their property in Maryland to John G. Proud, Jr., bearing date the 5th of October, 1859; and it is admitted that no consideration was paid by Proud for the grant to him in said deed, but that the same was executed to remove a difficulty in the way of the exercise of the jurisdiction of this court." It is also admitted that Samuel Chase Ridgely died in the summer of 1859. John G. Proud, Jr., is not made a party to the amended bill. The first difficulty which we encounter on the threshold of this case is that in reference to the jurisdiction of this court. The bill shows that three of the defendants are residents of the District of Columbia, and this was also one of the allegations of the original bill. Resting on that statement, if these defendants are indispensable parties to the cause, the case would be one clearly without the jurisdiction of this court; for, by the eleventh section of the judiciary act of 1789, the circuit courts of the United States have jurisdiction in civil suits at common law or in equity only where the matter in dispute exceeds, exclusive of costs, the sum or value of five hundred dollars, and the United States are plaintiff or petitioners, or an alien is a party, or the suit is between a citizen of the state where the suit is brought and a citizen of another state. And the supreme court, as early as 1806, in the case of Strawbridge v. Curtiss, 3 Cranch, [7 U. S.] 267, decided that where there are two or more joint plaintiffs or defendants, each of them must be capable of suing or being sued in the courts of the United States to give the court jurisdiction. And this doctrine has never been departed from; for in 1854, in the case of Shields v. Barrow, 17 How. [58 U. S.] 141, the supreme court, in speaking of the act of congress of February 28, 1839, which had been supposed to have altered the rule, say, that "this act does not affect any case where persons having an interest are not joined, because their citizenship is such that their joinder would defeat the jurisdiction." And the court again affirm what they had before decided in Elmendorf v. Taylor, 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 167, that, "if the case may be completely decided as between the litigating parties, the circumstance that an interest exists in some other person, whom the process of the court cannot reach, as if such a party be a resident of another state, ought not to prevent a decree upon its merits. But if the case cannot be completely decided, the court should make no decree." And this seems to have been the opinion of the learned counsel for the complainant, for in July, 1859, they file a petition, stating the execution of the deed from William G. Ridgely and others to Samuel Chase Ridgely, and praying that the bill may be dismissed as to them; and by their subsequent petition, filed after the death of Samuel Chase Ridgely, they pray to make the three residents of the District of Columbia parties to the cause, as the devisees of Samuel Chase Ridgely.

Taking these facts, in connection with the written admission (to which I have referred) of the character and objects of this deed to Samuel Chase Ridgely, it shows, beyond any doubt, that the learned counsel felt that unless they could remove this difficulty they could hope for no relief in this court; for this is a bill for partition, and for an account of wharfage received by the mayor and city council of Baltimore. The complainant claims as tenant in common with the defendants. Judge Story, in his treatise on Equity Pleading, section 159, says: "So tenants in common must all sue or be sued in cases touching their common rights and interests;" and as this property, of which a partition is now claimed, was made at the sole expense of the mayor and city council, if complainant had any interest therein as tenant in common with the city, in making partition the city would be allowed for all expenses of said improvement. For, says the same learned author, in volume 1 of his treatise on Equity Jurisdiction, section 655, in speaking of a case where one party has laid out large sums in improvements on the estate, "Although, under such circumstances, the money so laid out does not in strictness constitute a lien on the estate, yet a court of equity will not grant a partition without first directing an account, and compelling the party applying for partition to make due compensation."

Now, is the question altered by the deed to Samuel Chase Ridgely of the 8th of June, 1858? It was, without consideration, made for the sole purpose of removing, if possible, this difficulty of want of jurisdiction, and with the understanding that Samuel Chase Ridgely was to reconvey the property to the said grantors whenever they requested him so to do. Now, the supreme court has decided that the conveyance of the interests of non-residents to give the circuit court jurisdiction must be real and not fictitious. For this principle, see McDonald v. Smalley, 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 624; Smith v. Kernochen, 7 How. [48 U. S.] 216. In this last case the supreme court says: "The true and only ground of objection in all these cases is, that the assignor or grantor, as the case may be, is the real party in the suit, and the plaintiff on the record but nominal and colorable, his name being used merely for the purpose of jurisdiction. The suit is then, in fact, a controversy between the former and the defendants, notwithstanding the conveyance; and if both parties are citizens of the same state, jurisdiction, of course, cannot be upheld."

Now, the admission is, in effect, that such is the character of this deed, and that the real parties to the cause remained the same. It will not be necessary for me to notice a similar deed made by these parties since the death of Samuel Chase Ridgely to John G. Proud, Jr., as the counsel have not relied on the same, and Mr. Proud has not been made a party to the cause. But even if this difficulty did not exist, and the courts, from the residence of the several parties interested, had jurisdiction of the case, there is another objection to the court's passing any decree of partition or for an account of wharfage at this time. The title of complainant is disputed, and that being a question of law this court would not undertake to decide it, but its duty would be either to dismiss the bill or retain it for a reasonable time, to give the complainant an opportunity to have it decided at law. In Adams, Eq. (Last Ed.) p. 519, in a note treating of partition, the rule is stated as follows: "But the title of the complainant must be undisputed, otherwise the bill will be dismissed, or else retained until the title is settled at law;" and in support of it the learned annotator refers to many authorities. In Boone v. Boone, 3 Md. Ch. 497, Chancellor Johnson says: "The court does not sustain a bill for partition unless the title be clear." In Straughan v. Wright, 4 Rand. [Va.] 493, the rule is given in the following language: "Where, in a bill for partition, if complainant's title is denied, and it depends upon doubtful facts or doubtful questions of law, a court of equity will either dismiss the bill or retain it until the right is decided at law." To the same point will be found the following cases: Wilkin v. Wilkin, 1 Johns. Ch. 111; Manners v. Manners, 1 Green, Ch. [2 N. J. Eq.] 384; Bruton v. Rutland, 3 Humph. 435; Hosford v. Mervin, 5 Barb. 52; and Cox v. Smith, 4 Johns. Ch. 271. Now all must concede that the title of complainant depends upon doubtful questions of law. I am justified in saying this because her title has already been submitted to a court of law of her own selection, and which court decided against her, and its judgment was affirmed by the highest court of the state. I speak of the decision of Baltimore county court in the ejectment case of Barney v. Mayor, etc., the record of which has been given in evidence in this case. It was an action brought to recover the identical property, of which a partition is now sought by the bill filed in this cause.

The defendants, in the trial of the case, presented several prayers to the court. The fourth is as follows: "The defendants, by their counsel, pray the court to instruct the jury that if they shall find from the evidence in the case that Samuel Chase, the elder, under whom the plaintiffs claim, made and executed and delivered the several leases and deeds offered in evidence by the defendants, and shall further find from the evidence in the case that at the time of the execution and delivery of the deed from Samuel Chase, the elder, to Samuel Chase, Jr., and Thomas Chase, no part of said street called Liffey street was made south of the southerly line of Lee street, and that no part of the City Block was then made, then the plaintiffs have no right in the suit to recover upon the evidence in the case any portion of Liffey street lying south of the southerly line of Lee street, nor any part of the property located on the City Block." On this prayer the court indorsed, "Granted, but not for the reasons therein stated, but because the plaintiffs have not shown any title to the City Block, and because, although they have shown title to Liffey street, yet, as it is a public highway by dedication and contract with the city, ejectment will not rely to recover it."

Now, as the court of appeals gave no opinion in the case, we do not know whether that court sustained all or what instructions of the lower court, which were fatal to the plaintiff's case; but this is clear, as a part of the block was not used as a highway, ejectment would have lain for that part; and the court of appeals must therefore have sustained the instruction of Baltimore county court, that as to that part, the plaintiff had shown no title. Now, in this cause, we have no evidence that was not before Baltimore county court, and if I had full jurisdiction in the case, I should feel it to be my duty to dismiss this bill, as it has been filed with full knowledge that the title of the complainant was disputed by the city, and after a court of competent jurisdiction had passed adversely upon the title to a part, if not to all of the property in question. But if the cause was free of these preliminary difficulties, from a careful investigation of the several grounds upon which the complainant's counsel have placed her claim to a share of the property in dispute, I am of the opinion that that claim cannot be sustained either at law or in equity.

Now, what are the facts of this case? Originally the waters of the northwest branch of the Patapsco river swept around the most western point of Fell's Point (east of where the drawbridge now stands), and first turning northeast ran until within about one hundred feet of Bond street, thence turning northwesterly ran nearly up to Wilk street, continuing westerly, passed on to Jones's Falls some distance above where Pratt street now crosses that stream, and thence flowed on westwardly to some distance beyond what is now Light street wharf. That on or about 1796, from the deposits of mud and sand brought down by Jones's Falls and deposited near its intersection with the river, the water of the basin only flowed at high water up to the south side of Pratt street at its intersection with Liffey street, but at low tides the ground was bare for some distance below. It was in this year that Judge Chase received his deed from Daniel Bowly for a lot of ground beginning at the intersection of the south side of Water street with the west side of Jones's Falls, extending south on the west side of the falls to the south side of Barre street, with a width of one hundred and seventy-three feet. Judge Chase then being the owner in fee and riparian proprietor of this lot, fronting one hundred and seventy-three feet on the water of the basin, under permission from the mayor and city council of Baltimore, granted by ordinance passed March 23d, 1802, extended his said lot to the south side of Lee street; and in 1804 he obtained the further permission from the corporation to extend his said lot from the south side of Lee street south three hundred and fifty-five feet, so as to include a bar which had been made by natural causes in the river, opposite to his wharf. This last extension was never completed by Judge Chase. Judge Chase being then the proprietor of this lot binding on the west side of Jones's Falls, laid out into lots first, that part lying between Water and Pratt streets; and subsequently, that part lying between Pratt and south side of Lee street, and along the whole eastern fronts of the lots, he so laid out and leased, and between said front and the west side of Jones's Falls, he laid out a street or wharf, which below Pratt street he called "Liffey Street." In his lease to James Clarke, in 1798, in describing the lot laid, he calls it "a public wharf" (forty feet wide), and the lines of the lot run to and bind on it. In his lease to Lewis Hart made in 1806, he described the lot leased "as running with Pratt street thirty feet to the west side of a street forty feet wide, laid off by the said Samuel Chase from Pratt street and adjoining the water, heretofore called Jones's Falls, to the south side of Lee street." And in his deed to Samuel Chase, the younger, in 1808, conveying to him in fee five lots, fronting one hundred and fifty feet on this street at the distance of ninety feet south of Pratt street, he describes them as binding on this (Liffey) street, which was delineated on the plat made by him of his said ground. Hart proves, that prior to 1811, he used a part of the head of Liffey street, below Pratt street, as a lumber-yard, and put a gate across it to protect his lumber, although it was then used as a public way; that in 1814 his gate was removed, and it is not denied that since that period it has been used as a public highway and street of the city. That, as it at present exists as a street and wharf, with the large space called the "City Block" at its southeastern extremity, it has been made by the city under various ordinances for the improvement of the "Cove," between the years 1817 and 1836.

There is also in evidence a deed from Thomas Chase and Samuel Chase, two of the children of Judge Chase, to the city in 1818, for the bed of Liffey street, as laid out by their father, Samuel Chase, the elder; but in the view I take of the law in this case, this deed is wholly immaterial, and I shall not further notice it. Now, the first question that presents itself is, was Liffey street ever dedicated to public use as a highway by Judge Chase? Of this I have no doubt. Such dedication may consist in a simple acquiescence, or in positive and unequivocal acts, signifying the owner's intention to give up the soil to this object. Where the dedication is claimed by mere acquiescence on the part of the owner, the use by the public must have been at least twenty years; but a less period will be sufficient where there is any positive assent on his part, showing an intention to appropriate the soil to that purpose. For this, see 3 Kent. Comm. 450, and 2 Smith, Lead. Cas., with Hare & Wallace's Notes, p. 142, the case of Dovaston v. Payne. In the note to this case all the authorities upon the subject are cited. They will be found to maintain this proposition: that if one owning land exhibit a map of it on which a street is defined, though not as yet opened, and building lots be sold by him with a front or rear on that street, this is an immediate dedication of that street for public use. Now the evidence in this case shows that Judge Chase laid out his property into lots, and bounded them on Liffey street, which he marked out on the plat as a street, and sold and leased his lots with that description. And Baltimore county court (Judge Archer), with the same evidence before it, decided that they constituted a dedication of this street to public use, which will appear by reference to the fifth instruction granted by that court in the ejectment case to which I have referred. Now the important question arises, To what extent is this dedication made? I grant it does not carry the fee to the public, for that remains either in the original owner (which I think is the true rule), or (as some authorities seem to maintain) to those who have purchased lots binding on it. Is it a dedication of only the bare easement of passing over the soil? I am of the opinion that where, in a city, a street which is laid out to bind on or run to the river, is dedicated or surrendered to the public use, it gives the public the right to use it for any purpose for which public streets are used in that city. It makes it public for all purposes, unless some express reservation is made in the act of dedication. Binding on the river it gives the public the right to use it as a wharf and to permit vessels to be loaded and unloaded at it. Angell, in his treatise on Highways, section 301, says: "At common law, a highway is simply an easement or servitude, carrying with it as its incidents the right to use the soil for the purposes of repair and improvement, and in cities for the more general purposes of sewerage, the distribution of light and water, and the furtherance of public morality, health, trade, and commerce."

The supreme court, in the case of City of Cincinnati v. Lessee of White, 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 437, says: "All public dedications must be considered with reference to the use for which they are made; and streets in a town or city may require a more enlarged right over the use of the land, in order to carry into effect the purposes intended, than may be necessary in an appropriation for a highway in the country." So the right to pass water and gas under the surface of streets, and to lay down railroads on them, has been sustained. Now I propose to show, that wharfage at the ends or sides of public streets belonged to the corporation of Baltimore, except in some few cases where, by the acts of assembly authorizing the improvement, the right to collect the wharfage was given to the parties making the said improvement.

By section 12 of the act of assembly of 1783, c. 24, it was enacted, "that the port wardens of Baltimore town shall be and they are hereby authorized to make such regulations from time to time respecting wharves and wharfage," etc., etc., and the city, which was incorporated in 1796, was vested with all the powers which had heretofore been given to the port wardens; and by the 8th section of the act of incorporation, among the general powers granted, was one to regulate the station, anchoring, and moving of vessels, and to provide for deepening and cleaning the basin and docks. I suppose that the right to regulate and to deepen and clean the docks would carry with it the right to collect wharfage, as a necessary means to give effect to and to enable the corporation to exercise the power especially granted. Whether this be or not, certain it is that the city exercised that right at a very early day in its history. For, by an ordinance passed on the 24th April, 1797 (not quite four months after the act of incorporation), which is entitled "An ordinance to preserve the navigation of the harbor of Baltimore, and to provide for the exercise of the powers heretofore vested in the Port Wardens by the act of assembly," it is enacted and ordained (by its 8th section) that the following wharfages shall be collected for the articles hereafter enumerated, landed at any public wharf within the city limits, etc., etc. And to show what was meant by the term "public wharves," by an ordinance passed March 19th, 1798, it is enacted, "that all wharves made out into the basin or harbor in front of any street or part of a street, and which street was heretofore laid out in the plan of the town as extending to the water, are hereby declared public wharves, and subject to the wharfage imposed and laid by the ordinance of 1797." And this power the city continued to exercise until it was taken away by the act of 1813, but it was restored to the corporation by the act of 1827, c. 162, by which the city was authorized to collect wharfage "on any wharf or wharves belonging to the said mayor and city council, or on any public wharf in said city, other than the wharves belonging to and rented by the state, and that part of Pratt street wharf heretofore used by the citizens of the state." Now there are certain public wharves in the city on which the proprietors of the adjoining property or other individuals collect wharfage, but in those cases the right to do so was expressly reserved to the parties making the improvement.

This was the case in reference to the making of Light street wharf; for by the act of 1796, c. 45, §§ 3, 5, the right to charge wharfage on said wharf was given to the parties, proprietors of lots binding on the same, whose duty it was to fill up and perfect the said improvement. And by the act of 1817, c. 148, in which provision is made for the improvement of Jones's Falls, by its 11th section it is enacted, "that should the mayor and city council succeed in rendering Jones's Falls navigable, they are authorized to collect wharfage upon vessels navigating the same or lying at the public wharves opened or constructed on its banks, provided, that the right to wharfage on Liffey street shall not accrue to the said mayor and city council until they shall have engaged to wharf and fill up said street and deepen said Falls on the side thereof adjoining said street, if the said street be given up to the said city." This proviso does not say, "if the fee in said street be conveyed to the said city," but, as I read it, if it be surrendered as a highway to said city.

This, I have endeavored to show, had already been done, and the city complied with its part of the said proviso, by filling up and wharfing at said street, and by deepening the said Falls. Now am I right in the view I have taken as to the effect of a dedication of a street to the public, where that street either runs to or binds on navigable water? Is it not reasonable? The corporation of Baltimore is bound to regulate and repair all the public wharves. The natural fund to defray this necessary expenditure is the wharfage, an income derived from those who enjoy the benefit of this expenditure. I am not without authority to sustain me. In the case of City of Newport v. Taylor's Ex'rs, [16 B. Mon. 699,] the right of the town to charge wharfage at the wharf erected at the side of the common, and to establish a ferry from that point across the Ohio, became the subjects of dispute. The common had been set apart for the public use when the ancestor of the defendant had laid out the town, and it was bounded by the Ohio river.

The court of appeals of Kentucky decided that the town of Newport had no right to establish a ferry, as the right to do so was a franchise grantable by the legislature, but that the dedication of the common extending to the Ohio river included the right of constructing wharves and charging wharfage. See court's opinion in this case, 16 B. Mon. 804. The great case of City of New Orleans v. U. S., reported in 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 662, involved the rights of the city to the made ground in its front on the banks of the Mississippi. The city claimed the same by virtue of the fact that all the space of ground which existed between the front line of the houses of the city and the river Mississippi was left by the king of France, under the name of quays, for the use and benefit of the inhabitants, as appeared by authentic copies of the original plans of the foundation of the city. The supreme court, in their opinion, say, on page 717: "If the dedication of this ground to public use be established by the principles of the common law, is it not of the highest importance that the accumulations of the vacant space, by alluvial formations, should partake of the same character, and be subject to the same use, as the soil to which it becomes united? If this were not the case, by the continual deposits of the Mississippi the city of New Orleans would, in the course of a few years, be cut off from the river. If the city can claim the original dedication to the river, it has all the rights and privileges of a riparian proprietor." Now does the case of Dugan v. Mayor, etc., in any way come in conflict with these authorities or with the view I have taken of the effect of the dedication of a street binding on the water? I think not. That was a contest between the parties in reference to which of them the right belonged to charge wharfage on the sides of the dock below Marsh market space, which sides were public streets.

The court of appeals, (5 Gill & J. 374,) decided that it belonged to the city, and (as I read the report of the case) on two grounds: 1st. Because "over wharfage collected at private wharves, or wharves other than those owned by the city, or made at the ends or sides of public streets, lanes, and alleys, the city officers have no power or control. Its imposition and collection is the exclusive privilege of the wharf-owners; with it the officers of the city have no control. It is otherwise with wharfage collected at wharves owned by the city, or at the ends or sides of streets, lanes, and alleys. All these are called public wharves, are common highways, free for the use of the public, but at which tolls were collected by the town, now city, officers." And 2dly, because the commissioners of Baltimore town, who (as proprietors of the market-house lot) had consented to the making of this improvement by Dugan and McElderry, on the express condition "that the said canal wharves and streets on each side of the said canal be a common highway, free for the public use, but subject to such regulations as the commissioners and their successors shall from time to time establish," were not to be held to have relinquished their right to charge wharfage on said wharves. That they meant only that the use of said wharves should be free as all the other public wharves of the city, and did not intend to surrender any right which belonged to them, either as proprietors or as trustees for the public, of charging wharfage on these wharves. Now if the right to regulate, carried with it the right to collect, wharfage, then that right was expressly reserved to the town commissioners in the permission. Again, the public by this dedication is the grantee, and the city for this purpose being its representative, could impose any incumbrance upon the rights of the public within the chartered power of the corporation. And the right of the city to make such a charge is admitted by the act of 1813. In the subsequent cases of Wilson v. Inloes, 11 Gill & J. 351, and Casey v. Inloes, 1 Gill, 430, no question arose in reference to the city's right to collect wharfage on the city dock. The city had made and filled up the property in dispute under their various ordinances for the improvement of the Cove, and the question was, to whose benefit these improvements enured, whether to the holders of parts of "Mounteney's Neck," or to the holders of parts of "Fell's Prospect?" The court of appeals decided that the right to improve this property, under the act of 1745, vested in those holding under the eldest patent (Mounteney's Neck), and that the improvement made by the corporation, under the ordinance of 1823, must enure to their benefit. But both of these cases decide a very important principle in reference to the act of 1745, which, in my opinion, shuts out the complainant from any part of the City Block. Judge Dorsey says, on page 368, 5 Gill & J., in speaking of the act of 1745: "The improvements authorized and encouraged were those made by improvers in front of their own lots, not of their neighbors." And Judge Stephen, in Wilson v. Inloes, 11 Gill & J. 358, quotes the language of Judge Dorsey in the former cases as announcing the settled law of the court. Now it appears from the plat in this case, that the City Block lies entirely east of the east line of Liffey street, and in no part in front of Judge Chase's original lot as purchased from Bowly, and which original lot he was authorized to extend in a southerly direction by the two permits from the city authorities.

I cannot for one moment suppose that, having extended his lot southerly according to the permission (even if he had completed his improvement), he would have any right to change his front and claim to extend his lot in an easterly direction. In this case such an extension would be for a large part of it in front of the lots on the east side of Jones's Falls. And it appears by one of the plats filed in this cause that, by the first plan proposed for the improvement of the Cove, the Falls was to have run south directly out into the basin, as it had always done, and a pier and drawbridge were to have been made at the foot of Albemarle street, but as this plan would have carried all the deposits of Jones's Falls out into the basin, and would rapidly fill the docks and water at its mouth, to the injury of all the property in that neighborhood, the plan was adopted of turning Jones's Falls eastwardly, connecting the Block with the side of Liffey street, and making the drawbridge at its present site. This plan saved the harbor, and was of great benefit to all those owning property on Liffey street. Now on the plot filed in this case, the line on the west side of Jones's Falls and east side of Liffey street, from the old port wardens' line to the basin, is shown by a line which runs from D to I. Judge Archer, in granting the 7th instruction, asked for defendants in the ejectment case, says: "The court believes that the plaintiff would acquire no right by permission to any land not in front of his lot, and therefore could not have title to the land east of the line from D to I." If, therefore, Baltimore county court was right in this instruction, and of this I have no doubt, the question is asked, In whom then is vested the title to this Block? Let the act of assembly of 1836, c. 63, § 2, answer. That act says "that the mayor and city council of Baltimore shall be and they are hereby vested with the right and title to any land made or to be made out of the water in making and completing the improvement of the city dock according to the plan heretofore adopted by them, provided nevertheless, that nothing in this act contained shall be construed to interfere with the vested rights of individuals." For these reasons I will sign a decree dismissing the bill filed in this case with costs.

[NOTE. On complainant's appeal, the supreme court reversed this decree, and remanded the case to the circuit court, with directions to enter a decree dismissing the bill for want of jurisdiction, and without prejudice to complainant's right to bring any suit she may be advised in the proper court. In the course of the opinion of the court, Mr. Justice Miller said: "If the conveyance by the Ridgelys, of the district, to Samuel C. Ridgely, of Maryland, had really transferred the interest of the former to the latter, although made for the avowed purpose of enabling the court to entertain jurisdiction of the case, it would have accomplished that purpose. McDonald v. Smalley, 1 Pet. (26 U. S.) 620, and several cases since, have well established this rule. But, in point of fact, that conveyance did not transfer the real interest of the grantors. It was made without consideration, with a distinct understanding that the grantors retained all their real interest, and that the deed was to have no other effect than to give jurisdiction to the court. And it is now equally well settled that the court will not, under such circumstances, give effect to what is a fraud upon the court, and is nothing more. In the case of Smith v. Kernochen, 7 How. (48 U. S.) 216, this court said: 'The true and only ground of objection in all these cases is that the assignor or grantor, as the case may be, is the real party in the suit, and the plaintiff on the record but nominal and colorable, his name being used merely for the purpose of jurisdiction. The suit is, then, in fact, a controversy between the former and the defendants, notwithstanding the conveyance.' And the court cites McDonald v. Smalley, already mentioned; Maxwell v. Levy, 4 Dall. (4 U. S.) 330; Hurst v. McNeil, Case No. 6,936."

[It was further held that the circuit court should render no decree on the merits of the case without having rightfully before it some person representing the interest of the Ridgelys. Barney v. Baltimore, 6 Wall. (73 U. S.) 280.]

BARNEY, (CAMPBELL v.) See Case No. 2,354.

BARNEY, (CATEAUX v.) See Case No. 2,511.

BARNEY, (COX v.) See Case No. 3,300.

BARNEY, (DALE v.) See Case No. 3,541.

Case No. 1,030.

BARNEY v. The D. R. MARTIN.

[11 Blatchf. 233:[1] 18 Int. Rev. Rec. 55; 5 Chi. Leg. News, 535; 8 Alb. Law J. 54; 8 Amer. Law Rev. 169; 21 Pittsbg. Leg. J. 10.]

Circuit Court, E. D. New York. July 2, 1873.[2]

CARRIERS—EJECTMENT OF PASSENGER—TRANSACTION OF PRIVATE BUSINESS ON PUBLIC CONVEYANCE.

1. A person who had, on board of a steamboat, which was a common carrier, pursued, against the remonstrance of the carrier, the business of an express agent, on board of such steamboat, came on board of her again for that purpose, having purchased a ticket for passage, and refused to desist from such business, when requested by officers of the boat, and was removed from the boat, by such officers, without unnecessary force: Held, that the removal was justifiable.

[1] [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

[2] [Appeal dismissed by supreme court in 91 U. S. 365.]

2. A common carrier is not bound to permit a business which interferes with his own interests to be transacted on his vehicles.

3. A carrier who waives his rights, in that respect, in regard to one person, is not bound to waive them in regard to another person.

4. The sale or leasing to individuals, by a carrier, of rights to transact on his vehicle such business as may be done thereon, and the exclusion of others therefrom, are reasonable regulations, which the courts are bound to enforce.

[5. Cited in The T. A. Goddard, 12 Fed. 184, to the point that a carrier by water is responsible for due care and diligence as to goods received on board his vessel independently of any bill of lading.]

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the eastern district of New York.

[In admiralty. Libel by David F. Barney against the steamboat D. R. Martin, her tackle, etc., (the Oyster Bay & Huntington Steamboat Company, claimants,) for damages for the ejection of the libellant. Decree for libellant (unreported) for $500. Claimant appeals. Reversed. Subsequently, libellant appealed to the supreme court, but his appeal was dismissed for want of jurisdiction. The D. R. Martin, 91 U. S. 365.]

J. M. Guiteau, for libellant.

Thomas Young, for claimants.

HUNT, Circuit Justice. On the trial before the district judge, the libellant recovered the sum of $1,000 as his damages, for ejecting him from the boat, on the morning of October 23, 1871. On an application subsequently made to him, the district judge reduced the recovery to the sum of $500. A careful perusal of all the testimony satisfies me that the libellant was pursuing his business as an express agent on board the boat; that he persisted in it against the remonstrance of the claimants; and that it was to prevent the transaction of that business by him on board the boat, that he was ejected therefrom by the claimants.

The steamboat company owing this vessel were common carriers between Huntington and New York. They were bound to transport every passenger presenting himself for transportation who was in a fit condition to travel by such conveyance. They were bound also to carry all freight presented to them in a reasonable time before their hours of starting. The capacity of their accommodation is the only limit to their obligation. A public conveyance of this character is not, however, intended as a place for the transaction of the business of the passengers. The suitable carriage of persons or property is the only duty of the common carrier. A steamboat company or a railroad company is not bound to furnish travelling conveyances for those who wish to engage on their vehicles in the business of selling books, papers, or articles of food, or in the business of receiving and distributing parcels or baggage, nor to permit the transaction of this business in their vehicles when it interferes with their own interests. If a profit may arise from such business, the benefit of it belongs to the company, and they are entitled to the exclusive use of their cars for such purposes. This seems to be clear both upon principle and authority. Story, Bailm. § 591a; Jenckes v. Coleman, [Case No. 7,258;] Burgess v. Clements, 4 Maule & S. 306; Fell v. Knight, 8 Mees. & W. 269; Com. v. Powers, 1 Amer. Ry. Cas. 389. These cases show that the principle thus laid down is true as a general rule.

The case of New Jersey Steam Nav. Co. v. Merchants' Bank, 6 How. [47 U. S.] 356, shows that it is especially applicable to those seeking to do an express business on such conveyances. It is there held, in substance, that the carrier is liable to the owner for all the goods shipped on a public conveyance by an express company, without regard to any contract to the contrary between the carrier and the express company. Although they may have no custody or control of the goods, they are liable to the owner in case of loss, if they allow them to be brought on board. It is the simplest justice that they should be permitted to protect themselves by preventing their being brought on board by those having them in charge. This rule would not exclude the transmission as freight of any goods or property, which the owners or agents should choose to place under the care and control of the carrier.

That persons other than the libellant carried a carpet bag without charge, or that such bag occasionally contained articles forwarded by a neighbor or procured for a friend, does not affect the carrier's right. The cases where this was proved to have been done were rare and exceptional, and do not appear to have been known to the carrier, nor does it appear that any compensation was paid to the agent. They were neighborly and friendly services, such as people in the country are accustomed to render for each other.

But, if the services and the business had been precisely like that of the libellant, the rule would have been the same. The rights of the carrier in respect to A. are not gone or impaired for the reason that he waives his rights in respect to B., especially if A. be notified that the rights are insisted upon as to him. If Mr. Prime was permitted to carry a bag without charge on the defendants' boat, or to do a limited express business thereon, this gives the libellant no right to do such business, when notified by the carrier that he must refrain from it. A carrier, like all others, may bestow favor where he chooses. Rights, not favors, are the subject of demand by all parties indiscriminately.

The incidental benefit arising from the transaction of such business as may be done on board a boat or a car belong to the carrier, and he can allow the privilege to one and exclude it from another at his pleasure. A steamboat company or a railroad company may well allow an individual to open a restaurant or a bar on their conveyance, or to do the business of boot blacking, or of peddling books and papers. This individual is under their control, subject to their regulations, and the business interferes in no respect with the orderly management of the vehicle. But, if every one that thinks fit can enter upon the performance of these duties, the control of the vehicle and the good management would soon be at end.

The cars or boats are that of the carrier, and I think exclusively are for this purpose. The sale or leasing of these rights to individuals and the exclusion of others therefrom come under the head of reasonable regulations, which the courts are bound to enforce. The right of transportation, which belongs to all who desire it, does not carry with it a right of traffic or business.

It is insisted that the libellant could not legally be ejected from the boat for any offence or violation of rules committed on a former occasion. It is insisted also, that having purchased a ticket from the agent of the company his right to a passage was perfect. Neither of these propositions is correct. In Com. v. Power, 7 Metc. [Mass.] 596, the passenger had actually purchased his ticket, and the chief justice says: "If he, Hall, gave no notice of his intention to enter the car as a passenger and of his right to do so, and if Power believed that his intention was to violate a reasonable subsisting regulation, then he and his associates were justified in removing him from the depot."

In Pearson v. Duane, 4 Wall. [71 U. S.] 605, Mr. Justice Davis, in giving the opinion of the court, held the expulsion of Duane to have been illegal, because it was delayed until the vessel had sailed. "But this refusal, he says, should have preceded the sailing of the ship. After the ship had got to sea, it was too late to take exception to the character of a passenger as to his peculiar position, provided he violated no inflexible rule of the boat in getting on board." The libellant in this case refused to give any intimation that he would abandon his trade on board the vessel. The steamboat company, it is evident, were quite willing to carry him and his baggage, and objected only to his persistent attempts to continue his traffic on their boat. He insisted that he had the right to pursue it, and the company resorted to the only means in their power to compel its abandonment, to wit: his removal from the boat. This was done with no unnecessary force, and accompanied by no indignity.

In my opinion, the removal was justified, and the decree must be reversed.

BARNEY, (ECHEVERRIA v.) See Case No. 4,262.

BARNEY, (FABER v.) See Case No. 4,601.

BARNEY, (FALLECK v.) See Case No. 4,625.

Case No. 1,031.

BARNEY v. GLOBE BANK.

[5 Blatchf. 107;[1] 2 Amer. Law Reg. (N. S.) 221.]

Circuit Court, N. D. New York. Nov. Term, 1862.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES —ORIGINAL JURISDICTION OF FEDERAL COURTS—ACT OF SEPT. 24, 1789—ORIGINAL PROCESS — FOREIGN CORPORATION — "A SUIT."

1. A suit commenced by summons in a state court of New York, under the one hundred and thirty-fifth section of the Code of Procedure of that state, against a foreign corporation having property in that state, followed by a warrant of attachment issued under section 227 and the following sections of the same Code, against the property of the defendants in that state, and duly served by attaching property, is "a suit," within the meaning of the twelfth section of the judiciary act of September 24th, 1789, (1 Stat. 79,) providing for the removal of suits into this court.

[Cited in Erwin v. Walsh, 27 Fed. 579.]

2. This court has jurisdiction of such a suit, if properly removed, although it could not, by reason of the provisions of the 11th section of the same act, have compelled the defendants, by compulsory process, to submit to its jurisdiction in a suit originally brought against them in this court.

[Cited in Winans v. McKean Railroad & Nav. Co., Case No. 17,862; Sands v. Smith, Id. 12,305; Warner v. Pennsylvania R. Co., Id. 17,186; U. S. v. Ottman, Id. 15,977; Moynahan v. Wilson, Id. 9,897; Kelly v. Virginia Protection Ins. Co., Id. 7,677; Eaton v. Calhoun, 15 Fed. 156; Fidelity Trust Co. v. Gill Car Co., 25 Fed. 740; Erwin v. Walsh, 27 Fed. 580; Rosenbaum v. Bauer, 120 U. S. 458, 7 Sup. Ct. 637; Kansas City & T. R. Co. v. Interstate Lumber Co., 37 Fed. 6.]

[See New England Screw Co. v. Bliven, Case No. 10,156.]

3. Such a suit can be removed by the foreign corporation under the provision of the said 12th section, which gives the right of removal to a defendant who is a citizen of another state than that in which the suit is brought.

[See New England Screw Co. v. Bliven, Case No. 10,156.]

4. A suit to recover damages from a corporation for its breach of an implied contract, in neglecting to protest and give notice in regard to certain drafts forwarded to it by a correspondent bank, such suit being brought by an assignee of the right of action, is not within the meaning of the 11th section of the said act, a suit to recover the contents of a chose in action in favor of an assignee.

[Cited in Simons v. Ypsilanti Paper Co., 33 Fed. 194.]

5. After the removal of a suit into this court from a state court under the said 12th section, an attachment of property of the defendant, made before the removal of the suit into this court, under a warrant of attachment issued by the state court after the commencement of the suit, will continue to hold the property to answer the final judgment of this court in the suit, as being, within the meaning of said 12th section, an attachment of such property by "the original process."

[1] [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

[See Act March 3, 1875, (18 Stat. 471,) § 4.]

[See note at end of case.]

At law. This was a suit originally brought in the supreme court of the state of New York. The plaintiff [Danforth N. Barney] was a citizen of that state, and the defendants were a corporation [the president, directors, and company of the Globe Bank of Boston] located in the state of Massachusetts. The action was brought by the plaintiff, as assignee of the Merchants' Bank, of Cleveland, Ohio, to recover damages for an alleged breach of an implied contract arising out of the course of business between the two banks. The alleged breach consisted in the neglect of the defendants to protest and give notice in regard to certain drafts, &c., forwarded to them by the Merchants' Bank. The action was commenced by summons, under the 135th section of the New York Code, which provides for the bringing of suits against foreign corporations having property in the state of New York. The defendants being non-resident and out of the state, no service could be made on them, except by the publication of the summons as provided for in that section. Subsequently, according to the provisions of the same Code, (sections 227 et seq.,) the plaintiff obtained a warrant of attachment against the property of the defendants in New York, which was duly served and property was attached. Afterwards, the defendants entered an appearance in the state court, and filed their petition, under the 12th section of the judiciary act of September 24th, 1789, (1 Stat. 79,) for the removal of the case into this court. The order of removal having been granted by the state court, and the case entered in this court, the plaintiff now moved to remand the case to the state court, for want of jurisdiction.

Benjamin D. Silliman, for plaintiff.

Augustus F. Smith, for defendants.

SHIPMAN, District Judge. It is supposed, by the parties to this controversy, that the national and state courts have laid down different rules of law, and come to different conclusions, in cases of like character, and that the result in this case may, therefore, depend to some extent upon the particular tribunal in which it shall be finally determined. This, although not affecting the grounds upon which it must be decided, renders, in their judgment, the disposal of this motion of unusual importance to the parties themselves. In coming, therefore, to the result which I have reached, I have not failed attentively to consider the very learned and elaborate argument presented in support of the motion. The more prominent features of this argument are:

1. That this is not "a suit," within the meaning of the 12th section of the judiciary act, but a mere special statutory proceeding in rem, and therefore not within this section providing for a removal;

2. That if it be such a suit, still it is not subject to removal, because no cases can be removed from a state court to the circuit court except such as could have been originally brought in the latter, and that this does not fall within that class of cases:

3. That the defendant, the Globe Bank, is not a citizen within the meaning of the 12th section of the judiciary act, and, therefore, cannot exercise the privilege of removal;

4. That the plaintiff sues as assignee of the Merchants' Bank, of Cleveland, Ohio, which latter could not have maintained a suit in this district against this defendant; that the plaintiff can bring no suit in this court as assignee, which his assignor could not have brought; and that, therefore, the jurisdiction fails.

Upon the first of the series of propositions I have enumerated, it may be remarked, that the proceeding by which the action was commenced in the state court, was, substantially, one of foreign attachment, the object of which is to take the property of a non-resident which is within reach of the process of the court, and apply it to the satisfaction of the claim that may be judicially established against him, although his person may be beyond the reach of that process. The form of the proceeding under which the attachment was made in this case differs somewhat from that used in some of the other states. The warrant of attachment did not form a part of, or accompany, the summons, when that was issued, but was subsequently granted, on application of the plaintiff. This, however, was merely optional with the plaintiff. The Code provides, that he may have the warrant "at the time of issuing the summons, or at any time afterwards." Now, there is a certain popular sense in which this may be said to be a proceeding in rem, inasmuch as it deals with the things or property of the defendant, whether it reaches his person by legal process or not. So is every proceeding by which the property of a defendant is attached and appropriated to the satisfaction of his debts. But how is this done, in actions at law? In all cases, by a judgment of a court of law pronounced in the progress of the cause, adjudging him liable to the plaintiff on the cause of action set out in the declaration. The judgment is against him, in personam, and not against a specific piece of property, or thing, like a decree against a ship, or a bale of goods, in a court of admiralty. The liability of the defendant does not rest upon the fact that he is the owner of certain specific articles of property proceeded against, out of which springs an obligation against him, to be enforced by a seizure and condemnation of the things, in a proceeding strictly in rem. The only substantial difference between the character or legal effect of a judgment obtained through process of foreign attachment, and one obtained after personal service, is, that the defendant is not concluded by it. The proceeding by foreign attachment is a suit, and a suit at law, within the meaning of the act of congress under consideration. The exemption of the defendant from being personally concluded by it is one which he can waive by appearing in the suit and pleading to the issue. His appearance does not change the nature of the action. It enlarges the legal effect of the judgment, so as to preclude him from further contesting it, except by way of revision, in the same, or some appellate tribunal.

The principle contended for in the second proposition, namely, that no case can be removed from the state court to the circuit court unless it could have been originally brought there, is not of universal application.

It is contended, that the Globe Bank, being neither an inhabitant of, nor found within, the district, at the time of serving the writ, could not be sued in the circuit court. This objection rests upon a clause in the 11th section of the judiciary act, which provides, that "no civil suit shall be brought before either of said courts" (circuit or district) "against an inhabitant of the United States, by any original process, in any other district than that whereof he is an inhabitant, or in which he shall be found at the time of serving the writ." A preceding clause of the same section confines the jurisdiction to suits "between a citizen of the state where the suit is brought and a citizen of another state." No question arises under the latter clause, in this part of the case. The plaintiff is a citizen of this state, residing in this district. The Globe Bank is an inhabitant of the state of Massachusetts, and was not found in this district at the time of serving the writ. It is clear that no compulsory process could force the Globe Bank into this court. The very object of the statute was to exempt parties defendant, who are non-resident and out of the district at the time of serving the writ, from liability to be sued in districts other than those of which they are inhabitants, or in which they are present at the time when suit is brought. The reason of this provision is, obviously, to prevent a plaintiff from subjecting a defendant to a litigation in a distant jurisdiction, within which he neither resides nor enters. Any other rule would be oppressive, in a country of such vast territorial extent as the United States. But this rule is established for the protection of the defendant, and is a personal privilege, which he can always waive. He may waive it in a suit of foreign attachment as well as in any other. Toland v. Sprague, 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 330, 331. It follows that, although the Globe Bank could not have been brought into this court by any compulsory process, it being non-resident and without the district at the time of serving the writ, yet, if this very suit had been originally instituted in this court, and the defendant had appeared and pleaded to the issue, it would have cured the error. The jurisdiction of this court would then have been complete over the person of the defendant, as it certainly would have been over the subject matter of the action.

But, the validity of this removal is to be tested by the 12th, instead of the 11th, section of the act in question. And it has been decided, by very eminent authority, that the objection that the defendant is not an inhabitant nor found in the district at the time of serving the writ, cannot avail in a case where he has appeared in the state court, and removed the cause to a circuit court. Sayles v. North Western Ins. Co., [Case No. 12,421.] This was an action brought in the supreme court of Rhode Island against a foreign corporation. The corporation was neither an inhabitant of, nor found within, the district, at the time of serving the writ. But its property was attached in the suit in the state court. Thereupon it appeared in the state court, and, by petition, in the usual manner, removed the case into the circuit court. It then moved to dismiss the case for want of jurisdiction, which motion was denied. Mr. Justice Curtis, in delivering the opinion of the court, says: "But the jurisdiction over this case does not depend upon the 11th, but on the 12th, section of the act. If it be a suit which that section authorized the defendant to remove, it empowers this court to take jurisdiction over it when removed. The question, therefore, really is, whether the suit was rightfully removed. If it was, the motion to dismiss must be overruled; if it was not, the action must be remanded to the state court." The result arrived at was, that the case was rightfully removed, and that the jurisdiction of the circuit court over it was complete. The motion to remand in that case was made by the defendant, who had procured the removal; and, in the present case, it is made by the plaintiff, who would have resisted the motion in the state court, had the proceedings on the removal not been ex parte. But this circumstance does not distinguish the legal grounds upon which the two motions rest. In both, the objection to proceeding in the circuit court is an alleged want of jurisdiction. It is true, that the consequences of allowing defendants to remove cases from the state to the federal tribunals, and then procure their dismissal from the latter for want of jurisdiction, would be of a different character from those which would result from allowing plaintiffs to prevent the removal of cases brought against non-residents who should not be personally served with process, but they would be equally mischievous and oppressive. In the former class of cases, the state laws, which provide for the attachment and sequestration of the property of non-resident debtors upon whom no personal service can be made, would be rendered inoperative whenever the sum demanded exceeded five hundred dollars. In the latter, every non-resident debtor, not served personally, and who has property in the district where his creditor resides, would be denied the privilege of transferring such a suit to the courts of the United States. The privilege sought by the act of congress to be secured, by giving the option of selecting the tribunal to the non-resident party, would be reversed. The resident party would possess that option, and thus the prime object of the statute authorizing the removal would be defeated, in a large class of cases. See, to the same effect, Bliven v. New England Screw Co., [Case No. 1,550.]

The third proposition, that the Globe Bank, a corporation, is not a citizen, within the meaning of the 12th section of the judiciary act, and, therefore, not entitled to the privilege of removal, is untenable. No good reason can be perceived upon which to rest a distinction of that kind. On the contrary, the reasons for holding corporations to be citizens, within the meaning of both the 11th and the 12th sections of that act, are stronger now than when the supreme court overruled the doctrine that they were not citizens under the 11th section. Corporations have largely multiplied; the capital of the country has, much of it, become merged in these artificial persons; and an immense amount of business is now transacted through their agency. This business is not confined to the particular states in which they were created, and where they are located, but is distributed over the whole country, in the same manner as the business of natural persons. To establish a distinction between their right to sue and their liability to be sued in the federal courts, and their right to remove to those tribunals suits brought against them in the state courts, resting upon no solid considerations, would produce only inconvenience and confusion.

The fourth consideration urged against the jurisdiction of this court, rests on the clause of the 11th section of the judiciary act which provides, that no district or circuit court shall "have cognizance of any suit to recover the contents of any promissory note or other chose in action, in favor of an assignee, unless a suit might have been prosecuted in such court, to recover the said contents, if no assignment had been made." If no assignment of the right of action upon which this suit is founded had been made, the Merchants' Bank of Cleveland alone could have sued upon it. That corporation could have maintained no action upon it in this district. No federal courts, except those of Ohio and Massachusetts, would have jurisdiction of such a suit. This, of course, follows from that clause of the 11th section of the judiciary act which limits the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, in this class of cases, to suits "between a citizen of the state where the suit is brought and a citizen of another state." The two corporations being citizens, within the meaning of that section, one can sue the other only in the district where one or the other is located. Neither of them being located in New York, no suit could have been maintained in this court by the Merchants' Bank against these defendants. Can the plaintiff, as assignee of this right of action, maintain it? This presents the real and only question involved in this point, which is: Is this suit, by the plaintiff, as assignee, which is founded upon the original right of the Merchants' Bank to recover damages from these defendants for their neglect to protest and give notice in regard to the drafts, &c., in question, "a suit to recover the contents of a chose in action?" This right of the Merchants' Bank, which they assigned to the plaintiff, is, undoubtedly, a chose in action. So would a right to recover possession of the drafts in question, or damages for their detention, be equally a chose in action. But a suit to enforce either of these two latter rights would not be one to recover the contents of a chose in action, within the meaning of this prohibition of the statute. The case of Deshler v. Dodge, 16 How. [57 U. S.] 622, is decisive on this point. The word "contents," in the statute, is significant, and its true import is to be sought in the connection in which it is found. The only choses in action (a term of broad and somewhat indefinite meaning) specifically designated in the act, are promissory notes and foreign bills of exchange, the former being included within the prohibition, and the latter excepted out of it. The word "contents" is easily understood, when applied to these instruments. It designates the specific sums named therein, and payable by the terms of the instruments themselves. The effect of the case of Deshler v. Dodge, 16 How. [57 U. S.] 622, already cited, is to confine the meaning of the term "chose in action," as employed in this section of the act, within narrower limits than those in which it is generally used. What choses in action, then, fall within the prohibition of the statute? We think those only are included in it, which may be properly said to have "contents." These are not mere naked rights of action, founded on some wrongful act, some neglect or breach of duty to which the law attaches damages; but they are rights of action founded on contracts, which contracts contain within themselves some promise or duty to be performed. A suit to compel the performance of that promise or duty, by securing to the plaintiff that which is withheld by the defendant, is a suit to recover the "contents" of the chose in action. Grant that, in the case before us, there was an implied promise or duty, the performance of which, the law merchant, as applied to the course of business between the parties, cast upon these defendants; but this suit is not brought to enforce the performance of that promise or duty. It is not to secure the protest and notice of this commercial paper. It is to recover damages for the failure of the defendants to take the proper steps to preserve its value. This suit, therefore, being founded, not on a chose in action, for the purpose of recovering its "contents," but upon a mere right of action to recover damages imposed by law for a delinquency, is not within the prohibition of the statute, and this objection to the jurisdiction of this court fails.

It was suggested, on the argument, that the clause of the 12th section of the judiciary act, which provides, in case of the removal of a suit from a state to a circuit court, that "any attachment of the goods or estate of the defendant, by the original process, shall hold the goods or estate so attached, to answer the final judgment, in the same manner as, by the laws of such state, they would have been holden to answer final judgment, had it been rendered by the court in which the suit commenced," would not protect the attachment made in this case. The suit was commenced, as already stated, by summons, and the warrant of attachment was issued afterwards. It is urged, that the warrant of attachment not having issued at the same time with the summons, it is not the "original process," and that, therefore, the lien on the goods will be lost if the jurisdiction of this court is maintained. But this view of the matter arises out of an erroneous interpretation of the term "original process." It does not refer merely to the first notice, or precept, by which the suit may be initiated, but includes, also, any mesne process issuing out of the state court, by which the property is seized, before the case is removed into this court. This attachment, therefore, comes within the saving clause of the statute, and will hold the goods attached, to answer final judgment in this court. See, contra, New England Screw Co. v. Bliven, [Case No. 10,156.]

The motion to remand the cause is, therefore, denied, on all the grounds.

[NOTE. The case of New England Screw Co. v. Bliven, Case No. 10,156, is referred to as holding that an attachment issued after the summons by which the suit was commenced is a separate and not an "original process," within the meaning of the twelfth section of the act of September 24, 1789, (1 Stat. 79.) This case was decided in 1854. The act of March 3, 1875, (18 Stat. 471,) § 4, provides that "when any suit shall be removed from a state court to a circuit court of the United States, any attachment or sequestration of the goods or estate of the defendant had in such suit in the state court shall hold the goods or estate so attached or sequestered to answer the final judgment or decree in the same manner as by law they would have been held to answer final judgment or decree had it been rendered by the court in which such suit was commenced; and all bonds, undertakings, or security given by either party in such suit prior to its removal shall remain valid and effectual, notwithstanding said removal; and all injunctions, orders, and other proceedings had in such suit prior to its removal shall remain in full force and effect until dissolved or modified by the court to which such suit shall be removed."]

BARNEY, (ISELIN v.) See Case No. 7,103.
BARNEY, (KAUPE v.) See Case No. 7,628.

Case No. 1,032.

BARNEY v. KEOKUK et al.

[4 Dill. 593.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Iowa. Oct. Term, 1876.[2]

DEDICATION OF STREETS — MUNICIPAL CONTROL — RAILWAY TRACKS AND DEPOT BUILDING IN STREET — STEAMBOAT DEPOT BUILDING ON WATER STREET.

1. The owner of lots in the city of Keokuk, fronting on Water street, owns the fee in the street to the river, subject to the public easement.

2. The same rule applies to the original street and the newly made portions thereof reclaimed from the river.

3. Under the legislation of Iowa, as construed by the supreme court of the state (which construction was followed by this court,) a railway company, with the assent of the municipal authorities, has the right to lay down its tracks over and upon Water street, in front of the plaintiff's lots, without the plaintiff's consent; but this right does not extend to the erection in the street of a permanent and substantial railway depot building in front of the plaintiff's lots, to the plaintiff's injury.

4. In view of the location and purpose of the dedication of Water street and the charter power of the city, it was held that the city might authorize a steamboat company to erect, for the shipment and receipt of merchandise, a building on or near the bank of the river in front of the plaintiff's lot, reserving municipal and police control over such structure.

5. Right to maintain ejectment subject to the public easement, quaere?

At law. Action in the nature of ejectment to establish plaintiff's right in Water street, Keokuk, subject to the public easement therein. The plaintiff, in his petition, described the locus in quo, as follows: "All the land lying and being in front of lots five and six, in block three, in the city of Keokuk, and extending from the front line of said lots to the Mississippi rivers, the full width of said lots." The plaintiff is the owner of said lots five and six, block three, which front on Water street, and he claims to be the owner of the street in front thereof, subject to the rights of the public.

The defendants are the city of Keokuk and several railway companies and the steamboat packet company, that respectively occupy the street in front of the plaintiff's lots, under the authority of the city. All the railway companies occupy part of Water street by railway tracks, but only one of the defendants (the Keokuk and Des Moines

[1] [Reported by Hon. John F. Dillon, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

[2] [Affirmed in 94 U. S. 324.]

Railway Company) has erected any building on the street.

The packet company use the street at the water line as a landing, and have erected on the street, as widened near the bank, in front of the plaintiff's lots, a building, in which to receive, shelter, and store merchandise received from or to be shipped on their boats. In the contract of the packet company with the city, dated March 28, 1870, it is provided that "the packet company shall not use and occupy said premises, otherwise than is customary for landing for steamers and storing merchandise, for shipping purposes, without reward, for the convenience of shippers and commerce, and said merchandise shall remain on said leased premises only for a reasonable time, to be governed by the police regulations for the government of the levee, according to the ordinances and resolutions now in force or that may hereafter be adopted and passed. Said building to be removed at the expiration of the ten years, at cost of packet company. In consideration thereof, the packet company agreed to fill in with earth the space leased and macadamize the same, under the direction of the city engineer, and to receive at par the wharf bonds of Keokuk in payment therefor."

The city of Keokuk, by its charter, has the usual municipal power over streets and their uses; but there is no special provision in the charter as to railway companies occupying the streets. This subject is regulated by the general legislation of the state, known as the right of way act, which has been frequently construed by the supreme court of the state to authorize railway companies to lay their tracks longitudinally upon the public highway (although the fee thereof is in the adjoining proprietor), and upon the streets of cities, without compensation to the abutters or adjoining owners.

As to wharves, the amended charter of January 22, 1853, section 7, provides as follows: "The said city council of Keokuk shall have the power to establish and regulate a wharf or wharves in said city, and more particularly to use the whole of Water street for said purpose, and to fix rates of landing and wharfage of all boats, rafts, water crafts, goods, wares, merchandise, produce, and other articles that may be moored at, landed, or taken from any landing, wharf, or wharves that have been or may be hereafter established by said city."

The other facts were mainly agreed upon, and appear in the report of the case on error, in [Barney v. Keokuk,] 94 U. S. 324, and are here omitted to save space.

The case was submitted to the circuit judge, originally, upon written arguments; after considering which he made the following order:

"In view of the important and difficult questions in this cause, it is ordered that it be set down for oral argument at the next term, upon the following points:

"1. Is the fee of the locus in quo in the plaintiff? And herein, whether there was any valid dedication of Water street, as respects the plaintiff's lots, prior to the decree of partition, and particularly whether the Galland map operated as an effectual dedication? And herein, as to the effect of the deeds of Marsh, Lee, Delevan, Galland, and others, of June 14, 1837, for lots on Water street, including a lot in block three, and elsewhere, in the town of Keokuk, 'as per plat thereof,' in connection with the fact that Marsh, Lee, and Delevan, trustees, afterwards drew the lots now owned by the plaintiff? Is the plaintiff estopped by these facts to deny a dedication of Water street prior to the decree of partition? Counsel will furnish an abstract of title of the plaintiff's lots from the beginning.

"2. If there was such prior dedication, what was the effect of it as respects the fee of the street, under the statutes then in force in that regard? And herein, see construction of statutes in Schurmeier v. St. Paul & P. R. Co., 10 Minn. 82 et seq., [Gil. 59,] affirmed [St. Paul & P. R. Co. v. Schurmeier,] 7 Wall. [74 U. S.] 272; and what has been the construction of the statutes, in this regard, in Michigan, Wisconsin, Illinois, and Iowa? And if the construction in Iowa is in conflict with the case in [St. Paul & P. R. Co. v. Schurmeier,] 7 Wall. [74 U. S.] 272, which construction should be applied in this case?

"3. If there was no effectual dedication prior to the partition decree, or none binding upon the plaintiff, and supposing that to leave the fee in Water street in the adjoining lot owners, subject to the public easement, can the city authorize the uses which have been made of Water street by the several railway companies and the packet company?

"4. If the right is with the plaintiff, is ejectment a proper remedy to enforce it?"

George W. & A. J. McCrary, J. L. Rice, and W. B. Collins, for plaintiff.

Craig & Collier, Gillmore & Anderson, Ingersoll & Puterbaugh, Seaton & Spaan, W. S. Bush, and John Gibbons, for defendants.

Before DILLON, Circuit Judge, and LOVE, District Judge.

DILLON, Circuit Judge, (LOVE, District Judge, concurring,) announced that the court had reached the following conclusions:

1. There was no completed statutory dedication of Water street under the town plat act of 1839, prior to the decree of partition, for the reason, among others, that all of the proprietors, i. e., the half-breed owners and their grantees, did not join in making a plat or in selling lots according to the Galland or other plat. What was done prior to the decree, was at most a common law dedication by those who platted or recognized the plat, and it was, therefore, competent for the decree of partition to provide, as it did, that

"lots on Water street should include all the land in front of the lots to the Mississippi river." This seems to have been the accepted view of the question. Milburn v. City of Cedar Rapids, 12 Iowa, 246; Haight v. Keokuk, 4 Iowa, 199. This leaves the fee of the land in Water street in the adjoining lot owners, including the plaintiff, subject to the rights of the public.

2. The additional ground made by filling in Water street by the city, outside of the original water line, partakes of the same character as the original street. The fee of the newly made ground in front of the plaintiff's lot is, therefore, in the plaintiff, but it is subject to the same public uses as the original street. Haight v. Keokuk, 4 Iowa, 199, 214; Wood v. San Francisco, 4 Cal. 190; New Orleans v. U. S., 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 662.

3. Under the legislation of Iowa, as construed by the supreme court of the state, railroad companies, certainly with the assent of the municipal authorities, have the right to lay down their tracks in the streets of a city, whether they were dedicated under the statute or as at common law—that is, whether the fee be in the city or in the adjoining proprietor. The cases in relation to railway tracks in common highways, and those relating to railways in streets in Dubuque and Burlington, establish this. Milburn v. City of Cedar Rapids, 12 Iowa, 249; Clinton v. Cedar Rapids & M. R. R. Co., 24 Iowa, 455; Tomlin v. Dubuque, B. & M. R. Co., 32 Iowa, 106; Chicago, N. & S. R. Co. v. Newton, 36 Iowa, 299; Cook v. Burlington, 36 Iowa, 357; Clinton v. Clinton & L. H. Ry. Co., 37 Iowa, 61; Ingram v. Chicago, D. & M. R. Co., 38 Iowa, 669. The court should adopt as a rule of decision, on such a question, the exposition of the state statutes by the supreme court of the state. Suydam v. Williamson, 24 How. [65 U. S.] 427; Leffingwell v. Warren, 2 Black, [67 U. S.] 599, 603; Christy v. Pridgeon, 4 Wall. [71 U. S.] 196; Nichol v. Levy, 5 Wall. [72 U. S.] 433; Shipp v. Miller, 2 Wheat. [15 U. S.] 316; Jackson v. Chew, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 162; Swift v. Tyson, 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 17.

4. This, however, does not give the railway company, even with the assent of the municipality, the right to erect a permanent and substantial depot building in the street. The right of way act of 1853 has never been thus extended by any judicial exposition of the state supreme court, nor, in our judgment, ought it to be, at least in cases where the fee is in the abutting lot owners.

5. In view of the location and situation of Water street, and the presumed intention of the dedication thereof to the public, and guided by the opinion of the supreme court of the state in this regard, in Haight v. Keokuk, supra, and the power of the city as to wharves, and the use of Water street for that purpose, given by the act of 1853, Water street may be used for levee and wharf purposes under municipal management and control. The building erected by the packet company, under the contract with the city of March 28, 1870, for the purposes therein mentioned, for the receipt and temporary shelter and storage of goods, etc., subject to municipal control, is a reasonable use of Water street as a wharf or levee as incidental to the requirements of navigation and shipping, and does not infringe the plaintiff's rights. Illinois & St. L. R., etc., Co. v. St. Louis, [Case No. 7,007.]

6. We have some doubt as to the right to maintain ejectment in such a case as this, but, under the practice in this state, we can adjudge the right even though we could not issue a writ of possession. The plaintiff may take a judgment as respects the railway depot building in such form as he prefers. Judgment accordingly.

NOTE, [from original report.] The judgment in this case was affirmed, [by the supreme court,] on all points, at the October term, 1876. [Barney v. Keokuk, 94 U. S. 324.]

Mr. Justice Bradley, delivering the opinion of the supreme court, makes this important statement concerning a distinction which has often been made the basis of measuring the extent of the rights of the abutting proprietors: "On the general question as to the rights of the public in a city street, we cannot see any material difference in principle with regard to the extent of those rights, whether the fee is in the public, or in the adjacent land owner, or in some third person."

In view of the facts of the case, this observation cannot fairly be considered as obiter, for the plaintiff's case essentially rested upon the proposition that he was the owner of the fee of the street in front of his lots, and that this gave him the right to recover—a right which it was clear, under the laws of Iowa, he did not otherwise possess. But whether the principle stated in the above extract was actually in judgment or not, it is the sound doctrine as applied to streets in cities and incorporated places, and will, eventually, be acknowledged as such, wherever the legislative will is silent and the courts are not tied down by previous decisions.

In St. Paul & P. R. Co. v. Schurmeier, 7 Wall. [74 U. S.] 272, (which, for a better understanding of it, should be read in connection with the same case below,—10 Minn. 82, [Gil. 59,]—which was similar to the principal case in all essential respects, a different result was reached. The supreme court of Minnesota held that the use of the "landing" and streets by the railway company was an additional servitude, of which the adjoining lot owner could not be deprived without compensation to him; and Mr. Justice Clifford, in the concluding part of his opinion, [Railroad Co. v. Schurmeier,]—7 Wall. [74 U. S.] 289,—seems to assent to the correctness of this view. In Schurmeier's Case, the result was that the railroad company was enjoined, at his instance, from constructing its road on the landing and streets in front of his lots. But in Barney's Case the railroad company was held to have the right thus to use the street. These opposite results, under statutes substantially the same, are in consequence of the supreme court of the United States adopting in each case, as a rule of decision, the conflicting construction of the state legislation by the supreme courts of Minnesota and Iowa.

BARNEY, (LATHAM v.) See Case No. 8,102.
BARNEY, (MOKE v.) See Case No. 9,698.
BARNEY, (MORRIS v.) See Case No. 9,826.

BARNEY, (NAPIER v.) See Case No. 10,009.

BARNEY, (OELRICHS v.) See Case No. 10,443.

BARNEY, (OGDEN v.) See Case No. 10,454.

BARNEY, (PARROTT v.) See Case No. 10,773.

BARNEY, (POWERS v.) See Case No. 11,361.

BARNEY, (RUSSELL v.) See Case No. 12,152.

BARNEY, (SCHMEIDER v.) See Case No. 12,462.

BARNEY, (TROOST v.) See Case No. 14,185.

BARNEY, (UNITED STATES v.) See Cases Nos. 14,524 and 14,525.

Case No. 1,033.

BARNEY v. WASHINGTON CITY.

[1 Cranch, C. C. 248.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. July Term, 1805.

PARTIES—MISNOMER—PENALTY—JUDGE—DISQUALIFICATION—INTEREST.

1. A warrant to recover the penalty of a by-law, must name the plaintiffs by their corporate name, and must describe the offence with reasonable certainty.

2. The mayor of Washington cannot exercise jurisdiction in a case in which he is a party.

[Cited in Hall v. Washington, Case No. 5,953.]

At law. Appeal from a justice of the peace on a judgment for a penalty for running a hack, not licensed.

Messrs. Key and Morsell, for appellant, contended, 1st. That the warrant to take Barney to answer to the "corporation," (not calling them by their corporate name,) is void. 2d. That the warrant ought to have stated that Barney was a person residing within the jurisdiction of the corporation.

Mr. Hewitt, for appellee, relied on the seventh section of the act of congress of May 3, 1802, (2 Stat. 195, charter of Washington,) and on the appearance of Barney, without objecting to the jurisdiction, or to the misnomer of the plaintiff.

The warrant was in these words: "District of Columbia, Washington County, to wit:—"You are commanded to take John H. Barney before me, or some other justice of the peace for said county, to answer unto the corporation for running a hack without license, and hereof make return on the 13th day of July. Given under my hand and seal, this 9th day July, 1805. Thomas Peter. (L. S.) To any constable in said county." Indorsed, "July 13th, 1805. Judgment is given in favor of the corporation for $20, and costs 33 cents. Robert Brent. Issue an execution on the above. Robert Brent. The Clerk of Washington County."

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

The judgment was reversed with costs, because the words "the corporation" are too uncertain; because the defendant is not stated to be the owner of a hack; because the offence is too generally laid; because the judgment is for a double penalty; because the day of the return is not certain, and because judgment was rendered by the mayor of the city of Washington, in a case in which he is a party.

BARNEY, (WESTFALL v.) See Case No. 17,447.

BARNEY, (WILLIAMS v.) See Case No. 17,713.

BARNEY, (WOODRUFF v.) See Case No. 17,986.

BARNEY EATON, The. See Case No. 1,028.

BARNHARDT, (UNITED STATES v.) See Case No. 14,526.

BARNITS v. FIRST NAT. BANK OF EATON. See Case No. 1,034.

Case No. 1,034.

BARNITS v. FIRST NAT. BANK OF HAMILTON.

SAME v. FIRST NAT. BANK OF EATON.

[1 Cin. Law Bul. 45.]

Circuit Court, S. D. Ohio. March, 1876.

USURY—PENALTY—NATIONAL BANKS—ACT JUNE 3, 1864.

[The words "legal representatives," as used in Act June 3, 1864, (13 Stat. 108, § 30,) providing for the recovery of twice the amount of usurious interest from a national bank by the "legal representatives" of the person paying such interest must be construed strictly, and not to include the assignee in bankruptcy of such person.]

[Followed in Barnett v. Muncie Nat. Bank, Case No. 1,026.]

[Contra, see Wright v. First Nat. Bank of Greensburg, Case No. 18,078, and note to Barnett v. Muncie Nat. Bank. Id. 1,026; same case, on appeal, 98 U. S. 555.]

[At law. Two actions by David Barnett and Isaac E. Craig, assignees of Barnits & Whitesides, one against the First National Bank of Hamilton, and the other against the First National Bank of Eaton, under Act June 3, 1864, (13 Stat. 108, § 30,) to recover double the amount of usurious interest alleged to have been paid on loans. Judgment for defendants, dismissing the causes.]

Miller & Gilmore and Wilson & Craig, for plaintiffs.

Mr. Brown, for First Nat. Bank of Hamilton.

Hogans & Broadwell, for First Nat. Bank of Eaton.

Before EMMONS, Circuit Judge, and SWING, District Judge.

These two cases were heard together upon questions arising upon the pleadings. The question determined arose upon the construction of the 30th section of the national banking act, [Act June 3, 1864; 13 Stat. 108.] Barnits & Whitesides had large lines of discount, principally with the National Bank of Eaton, upon which it was alleged Barnits & Whitesides paid, and the banks received, more than the legal rate of interest. The section of the national banking act referred to, provides that "the person by whom greater than the legal rate of interest has been paid, or his legal representatives may recover back in an action in the nature of an action of debt, twice the amount of interest thus paid from the association receiving or taking the same." After these transactions, Barnits & Whitesides made an assignment for the benefit of their creditors under the state law; and their assignees (the plaintiffs) brought these suits to recover double the amount of the alleged usurious interest so paid and received, amounting to several thousand dollars. The plaintiffs claimed that they were the legal representatives of Barnits & Whitesides, and therefore entitled to recover. But the court held that the term "legal representatives" must be defined according to the legal signification of the words; that under the national bankrupt act, which vests in the assignee all the estate of the bankrupt, it might well be that such assignee could maintain this action, but that no such consequence followed under the state laws; that inasmuch as this was a penal statute, and therefore to be construed strictly, the popular or other signification of these words could not be adopted, contrary to their strict legal acceptation; and that the definition claimed by the plaintiffs could nowhere be found in the law dictionaries, or in any decided cases, but that such authorities as were cited to the court very clearly omitted such description of a legal representative as that claimed. The counsel for the banks cited the case of Rice v. White, 8 Ohio, 216, where it was held that the words "legal representatives," in the act defining the duties of county auditors, meant the heir of a deceased person, and vested in him, and not the administrator, the title of a tax certificate. And EMMONS, Circuit Judge, who delivered the opinion of the court, sustained the views of the defendants' counsel by rendering a judgment to dismiss the causes.

Case No. 1,035.

BARNS et al. v. OMALLY et al.

[4 McLean, 576.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Michigan. June Term, 1849.

EQUITY PRACTICE—DISMISSAL OF BILL WITH COSTS.

1. A bill filed which the complainant can not sustain will be dismissed, at his costs.

2. No grounds of equity, real or supposed, at the filing of the bill can authorize the court to tax the costs against the defendant.

[In equity. Creditors' bill by Barns & Pharo against C. M. Omally and others. Bill dismissed.]

Barstow & Lockwood, for complainants.
Mr. Abbott, for defendant.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This was a creditors' bill alleging fraud against the defendant, in covering, by assignment, the property of C. M. Omally, against whom a judgment was obtained and execution returned, nulla bona. The answer denies the material allegations of the bill; and the plaintiff declines a further prosecution of the suit, and is willing that the bill shall be dismissed; but he insists that under the circumstances, the bill should be dismissed at the costs of the defendant. That there was reasonable ground for the creditors' bill. The court held that this could not be distinguished from an ordinary bill, where the plaintiff could not sustain it; and that it must be dismissed at plaintiff's costs.

BARNUM, (DIXON v.) See Case No. 3,928.

Case No. 1,036.

BARNUM v. GOODRICH.

Circuit Court, N. D. Illinois. July 2, 1873.

[Cited in Allis v. Stowell, 16 Fed. 788, and in Birdsell v. Hagerstown Agr. Imp. Manuf'g Co., Case No. 1,437, to the point that, to prevent a multiplicity of suits, the court may require the prosecution of suits between the patentee and the mere user of a patented machine to be suspended, and await the result of a suit pending between the patentee and the principal infringer, from whom the user purchased the machine.]

[In equity. Bill by Isaac W. Barnum against Herman B. Goodrich for infringement of a patent and for an accounting. Upon defendant's application, plaintiff was enjoined from prosecuting suits commenced, and from commencing new suits, against defendant's vendors, for other infringements, pending final disposition of the case at bar.]

[NOTE. Nowhere reported; opinion not now accessible.]

BARNUM, (HOPKINS v.) See Case No. 6,685.

BARNUM, (WILSON v.) See Cases Nos. 17,786 and 17,787.

BARQUE.

[NOTE. Cases cited under this title will be found arranged in alphabetical order under the names of the barques; e. g. "The Barque Unadilla. See The Unadilla." Cases Nos. 14,332 and 14,333.]

[1] [Reported by Hon. John McLean, Circuit Justice.]

Case No. 1,037.

BARR v. GALLOWAY.

[1 McLean, 476.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Ohio. July Term, 1839.

CURTESY—SEISIN DURING COVERTURE—ENTRY ON WILD LAND—PROFITS—STATUTE OF USES—ADVERSE POSSESSION—DEED—PRESUMPTION—VALIDITY.

1. By the common law seisin during coverture must be shown, to entitle the husband to claim as tenant by the curtesy. To this rule there are certain exceptions.

2. The law does not require that to be done which is unreasonable or impracticable.

3. In this country an entry on wild land is not necessary, to enable the husband to claim as tenant by the curtesy.

[See Davis v. Mason, 1 Pet. (26 U. S.) 503.]

4. A perception of the esplees is evidence of seisin, but this is presumed under a deed.

5. Under the statute of uses an entry was not essential to a complete title.

6. The party who seeks to invalidate or avoid a deed must impeach it. If there was an adverse possession at the time the deed to the defendant was executed, it is incumbent on the plaintiff to show it.

7. The court will not presume facts against a deed which, upon its face, has all the legal requisites to make it a valid instrument.

At law.

Scott & Leonard, for plaintiff.

Stansbury & Bond, for defendant.

OPINION OF THE COURT. The plaintiff [David Barr's lessee] gave in evidence a patent from the United States to Charles Bradford for the land in controversy, dated the 14th May, 1796. The patentee died without issue, leaving Henry G. Bradford, Charles H. Bradford, Elizabeth J. Bradford, and Fielding M. Bradford his heirs at law. Henry and Charles died intestate and without issue. Elizabeth intermarried with John Finley. They had two children, Henry Heath Finley and Elizabeth J. Finley. The latter intermarried with David Barr, the lessor of the plaintiff, and is now deceased. The plaintiff also gave in evidence a deed to him for the land from Henry Heath Finley, and here he rested his case.

The defendant [James Galloway, Jr.,] gave a deed for the land in evidence from Fielding M. Bradford and John Finley, the husband of Elizabeth J. Bradford, and father of Henry Heath Finley, and of the wife of the lessor of the plaintiff; which was executed the 29th November, 1815. The wife of the grantor John Finley, died before the execution of this deed. Possession was taken by the defendant a short time after the date of this deed, and there is no proof of a prior possession.

In the argument of the case it was insisted, that no interest passed under the deed from John Finley to the defendant; as it was made subsequent to the death of his wife, and there is no evidence of actual seisin, which is necessary to be shown by the husband to enable him to claim the land conveyed, as tenant by the curtesy. And it is also insisted by the plaintiff, if seisin in fact, by the husband, during the life of his wife, were not necessary, yet it is incumbent to show that at the time of the conveyance there was no adverse possession.

Before deeds or feoffments were used for the conveyance of land, livery of seisin was the only evidence of title. And this livery was required to be made by entering upon the land, and there in the presence of the vicinage to deliver the possession. The notoriety of the act afforded the only evidence of title, for the whole rested in the memory of the witnesses, called to observe the ceremony. And after the invention of deeds and other written evidence of title, the ancient principles of the common law were only departed from so far as to consider the instrument, not as the title itself, but as the evidence of title. And that it authorized an entry on the land, without which the grantee could not convey the land, nor bring an action against a trespasser. Nor would it descend to his heirs on his decease. Without an entry, except in cases which shall be hereafter noticed, he could not bring an action on the title of the land. 1 Co. Litt. p. 29, c. 4, § 35. "Tenant, by the curtesy of England, is, where a man taketh a wife seised in fee simple, or in fee tail general, or seised as heir in tail special and hath issue by the same wife, male or female born alive, albeit the issue after dieth or liveth, yet if the wife dies, the husband shall hold the land during his life by the laws of England." "And first of what seisin a man shall be tenant by the curtesy. There is in law a twofold seisin, viz: a seisin in deed, and a seisin in law. And here Littleton intendeth a seisin in deed, if it may be attained unto, as if a man dieth siesed of lands in fee simple or fee tail general, and these lands descend to his daughter, and she taketh a husband and hath issue and dieth before any entry, the husband shall not be tenant by the curtesy; and yet in this case she had a seisin in law; but if she or her husband had during her life entered he should have been tenant by the curtesy." "But if a man seised of an advowson or rent in fee hath issue a daughter who is married and hath issue and dieth seised, the wife, before the rent became due, or the church became void, dieth, she had but a seisin in law, and yet she shall be tenant by the curtesy, because she could by no means obtain to any other seisin. But a man shall not be tenant by the curtesy of a base right, title, use, or of a reversion or remainder expectant upon an estate of freehold, unless the particular estate be determined or ended during the coverture." 1

[1] [Reported by Hon. John McLean, Circuit Justice.]

Coke, 123. By the common law lands or tenements cannot pass but by solemn livery, or matter of record, or by sufficient writing, if the thing lies in grant.

The wife at common law was endowable where there had been no actual possession, and the reason is, that during coverture she could not take possession of the lands of her husband. 2 Co. Litt. p. 358, § 681. "For tenant in freehold in land is he who, if he be deprived of the freehold, may have an assize, but tenant in freehold in law before his entry, in deed shall not have an assize. And if a man be seised of certain land, and hath issue, a son who taketh wife and the father dieth seised, and after the son dies before any entry made by him into the land, the wife of the son shall be endowed in the land, and yet he had no freehold in deed, but he had a fee and freehold in law."

Under the common law, actual seisin was necessary, to enable the husband to claim as tenant by the curtesy. But this rule was not inflexible. It yielded to circumstances, as in the case of an advowson or rent, or where an entry is prevented by force. 2 Co. Litt. §§ 417, 418. In like manner if a man have a title of entry into lands, but dare not enter for fear of bodily harm, and he approach as near the land as he dare, and claim the land as his own, he hath presently, by such claim, a possession and seisin in the lands, as well as if he had entered in deed. 2 Co. Litt. § 419. And, under some circumstances, living within view of the land, will give the feoffee a seisin in deed, as fully as if he had made an entry. 1 Co. Litt. p. 29, c. 4, § 35. If an estate of freehold in seignories, rents, commons, or such like, be suspended, a man shall not be tenant by the curtesy, but if the suspension be but for years, he shall be tenant by the curtesy. As if a tenant make a lease for life of the tenancy to the seignories who taketh a husband and hath issue, the wife dieth, he shall not be tenant by the curtesy, but if the lease had been but for years he shall be tenant by the curtesy. And in 3 Atk. 436, the court say, lands on which there were leases for years existing and a rent incurred, descended on a wife as tenant in tail general, who survived three months after the rent day occurred, though she made no entry, nor received any rent during her life, yet this was such a possession in the wife as made the husband tenant by the curtesy. In Barwick's Case, 5 Coke, 94, it was held that letters patent under the great seal, do amount to a livery in law, and must give actual seisin. As where a livery is made of one parcel of land in the name of others in the same vicinity.

No livery of seisin is necessary to perfect a title by letters patent. The grantee in such a case takes by matter of record and the law deems the grant of record of equal notoriety with an actual tradition of the land in the view of the vicinage. The contrary is the fact as to feoffments. The deed is inoperative without livery of seisin. Green v. Liter, 8 Cranch, [12 U. S.] 229.

A perception of the profits, or, in more technical language, a taking of the esplees is evidence of seisin, but if seisin be established, this is presumed. Under the statute of uses the bargainee without entry or livery of seisin, has a complete seisin in deed. Harg. Co. Litt. 261, note. In most of the states of the Union statutes have been adopted, if not in the same language, to the same effect, as the statute of uses. The delivery of the deed is substituted for the ancient form of livery of seisin. And this is held to be a seisin in deed, where there is no adverse possession at the time.

The question in the present case is, whether wild and unappropriated lands, patented by the government, can descend, to a female out of possession so as to invest her husband, after her decease, with a tenancy by the curtesy, where there was no entry during coverture, either by the wife or husband. The reason on which livery of seisin was instituted, fails in this case. And it is a sound maxim that where the reason of the rule fails the rule itself can have no application. Why should a formal entry be made on land situated in a wilderness, remote from human habitation? Such an entry could not be notorious, as there is no vicinage to witness the act, or preserve the fact. If the law requires nothing in vain, it cannot require an entry under such circumstances. If an entry is dispensed with, where there is a lease for years, an advowson or rent, or where force is used to prevent, as above stated, is not the reason as strong, to excuse an entry on land in an uninhabited country? The law can never require an individual to do that which is either impracticable or unreasonable. And what could be more unreasonable or absurd than to require an entry on wild lands, to vest a complete title in the grantee?

In the case of Green v. Liter, [8 Cranch, (12 U. S.) 229,] above cited, the court held emphatically, that an entry was unnecessary. And the same doctrine is laid down in 4 Day, 294. And in the case of Jackson v. Sellick, 8 Johns. 208, the court say, where a feme covert is the owner of wild and uncultivated land, she is considered in law, as in fact, possessed so as to enable her husband to become a tenant by the curtesy. An actual entry or pedis positio by the wife or husband, during the coverture is not requisite to the completion of a tenancy by the curtesy. This is believed to be the correct rule as generally recognized in this country. Adhering to what they conceive to be the common law on the subject, the court of appeals of Kentucky hold that to sustain a writ of right, it is necessary for the demandant to show a pedis positio. And on this point that court holds a different doctrine from the supreme court of the United States. Applying this rule to all cases and under all circumstances, as the court of appeals are understood to do, they are unquestionably wrong. For it has been shown that there are exceptions to the rule. But it must be admitted that the rule is of general application, only subject, like most other general rules, to certain exceptions. And it is believed that wild and uncultivated lands in this country form as strong a case, for an exception to the rule, as any above stated. But admitting the rule here laid down as correct, the counsel for the plaintiffs insist that it is incumbent on the person claiming under a deed, to show, if not a pedis positio, at least that the land conveyed was wild and uncultivated, and that there was no adverse possession, when the deed was executed. That these being essential to the validity of the deed, the party who claims under it, must prove them.

An adverse possession cannot be presumed against a deed. If it exist, it must be shown by the party who impeaches the deed and endeavors to avoid it. In the case of Holt's Heirs v. Hemphill's Heirs, 3 Ham. [3 Ohio,] 238, the court say we have always held that a complete title may be executed, without an actual entry and where the grantee may never have been within hundreds of miles of the property granted. The delivery of the deed has been considered as giving possession in contemplation of law, and the grantor is presumed to have entered, unless that presumption is rebutted by facts wholly inconsistent with it, as where the premises at the time of the grant, are in the actual seisin of a third person claiming title adverse to the grantor. In the case of Green v. Watkins, 7 Wheat. [20 U. S.] 27, the supreme court observe, where the demandant shows no seisin by a pedis positio, but relies wholly on a constructive actual seisin, in virtue of a patent of the land as vacant land, it is competent for the tenant to disprove that constructive seisin, by showing that the state had previously granted the same land to other persons with whom the tenant claims no privity. And again in the same case, the court say in a writ of right, the tenant cannot give in evidence the title of a third person, with which he has no privity, unless it be for the purpose of disproving the demandant's seisin. In the case of Bush v. Bradley, 4 Day, 298, the court held that proof of an adverse possession does not prevent the estate by the curtesy from attaching. But it is unnecessary to consider this point, as it does not arise from the facts in the case.

We think that the four requisites to constitute a tenancy by the curtesy, which are marriage, seisin, birth of a child, and death of the wife, have been sufficiently shown by the defendant to sustain the deed from Finley to him. Indeed none of the requisites, except that of seisin, are disputed. And we are clearly of the opinion that there was seisin in deed in this case, which gave Finley a right to claim as tenant by the curtesy; and consequently that his deed to the defendant conveys a life estate in the premises in controversy.

NOTE. [from original report.] After the court had made up their opinion in this case, they were informed that the counsel had agreed to continue the cause to await the decision of the state court, in a case in chancery between the parties, which involves the validity of the contract between the heirs of Bradford and the defendant. But as the court had examined the case, and made up their opinion on it, it was thought proper to publish the opinion.

Case No. 1,038.

BARR et al. v. SIMPSON.

[Baldw. 543.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. Oct. Term, 1832.

COURTS—JURISDICTION—ACTION ON JUDGMENT OF STATE COURT—CITIZENSHIP.

This court has jurisdiction of an action of debt on a judgment obtained in a state court by a citizen of another state.

At law. The declaration in this case, was on a judgment obtained by the plaintiffs [Barr and Auchincloss] against the defendant, in the district court for the city and county of Philadelphia, to which there was a general demurrer and joinder in the demurrer. The only question raised was, whether this court had jurisdiction of the case. It was contended on the part of the defendant, that if there was a concurrent jurisdiction in both courts over the original cause of action, the plaintiffs were bound by having elected to sue in the state court, and could not proceed to enforce payment in any other, otherwise they could proceed by execution from both courts.

BY THE COURT. The subject matter of the suit in the state court, was a note which by the judgment became merged in the higher security. In this court, the subject of the suit was a judgment, which was conclusive evidence of a debt due the plaintiffs, who being citizens of New York, have a right to sue in this court, on any cause of action within its cognizance. We cannot discriminate between a debt due by judgment, or in any other way. An action of debt on a judgment is not like a scire facias, which must issue from the same court which rendered the judgment.

The demurrer is therefore overruled and judgment rendered for the plaintiffs.

BARR, (UNITED STATES v.) See Case No. 14,527.

[1] [Reported by Hon. Henry Baldwin, Circuit Justice.]

Case No. 1,039.

BARRAS v. BIDWELL.

[3 Woods, 5.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Louisiana. Nov. Term, 1876.

PLEADING—EXCEPTION TO PETITION — LOUISIANA PRACTICE — ANSWER — JUDGMENT OF ANOTHER STATE — ACTION ON—FRAUD — RECONVENTION—PRIOR ADJUDICATION.

1. Under the jurisprudence of Louisiana, an exception to the petition of a plaintiff who sues as administrator, to the effect that the plaintiff is not administrator, must be pleaded in limine litis; it cannot be pleaded after judgment by default or after the filing of a defense to the merits.

2. Such an exception cannot be embodied in the answer, and by the rule of the court it must be verified by affidavit.

3. The same rules apply to the exception of lis pendens.

4. Fraud practiced in the recovery of a judgment cannot be pleaded in an action on the judgment, prosecuted in another state, unless such defense could be made in the courts of the state where the judgment was rendered.

[See Westerwelt v. Lewis, Case No. 17,446; Hampton v. McConnel, 3 Wheat. (16 U. S.) 234.]

5. It is a good ground of exception to a claim in reconvention, that it has been substantially adjudicated in another suit between the same parties in another state, where it was pleaded as a counter-claim.

6. The fact that the claim in reconvention is somewhat broader than the counter-claim, though founded on the same contract, will not relieve it from the exception. The whole might and should have been litigated and decided in the issue raised on the counter-claim.

7. A claim in reconvention should be pleaded with the same precision and detail as an original cause of action.

Heard upon exceptions of the defendant [David Bidwell] to petition of the plaintiff [Hiram D. Barras] on plaintiff's motion to strike out defendant's answer, and on plaintiff's exception to the defendant's claim in reconvention.

W. W. Howe, for plaintiff.
R. De Gray, for defendant.

WOODS, Circuit Judge. I. The defendant has incorporated in his answer an exception to the plaintiff's petition whereby he denies that the plaintiff is or ever was the administrator of the estate of Charles M. Barras, and avers that he never has been appointed, recognized or qualified as such in the state of Louisiana, and, therefore, cannot maintain this action in this state. This exception cannot stand for several reasons. First, it is pleaded, as the record shows, after a judgment by default, which is forbidden by article 333, Code Pr. Second, even if there had been no default, it comes too late, for it should have been pleaded in limine litis: Id. Third, it is waived by the filing of defenses on the merits: Wingate v. Wheat, 6 La. Ann. 241. Fourth, it is embodied in the answer, which is expressly forbidden by article 333, Code Pr.: Pecquet v. Pecquet, 17 La. Ann. 232. Fifth, it is not verified as required by rule 6 of this court. The exception is, therefore, overruled. The second exception is lis pendens. This is open to the same objections as the exception just considered. It is also conceded not to be well founded in fact. It is, therefore, dismissed.

II. The action of the plaintiff is based on the record of a judgment recovered in a cause between the same parties in the superior court of the city of New York, on Feb. 2, 1876. One of the defenses to the action is, that the judgment was obtained by fraud and improper practices on the part of the plaintiff; that defendant had a good and valid defense against the claim on which the judgment was rendered, which had been made known to his attorney, and proof thereof put in his possession, with instructions to make said defense, and the plaintiff fraudulently and corruptly induced defendant's attorney to withhold said defense and absent himself from the trial of the cause, and withhold the evidence in his possession, and permit the plaintiff to obtain said judgment against the defendant. The plaintiff moves to strike out this answer. The question is thus presented, whether fraud practiced in the recovery of a judgment can be pleaded in an action on the judgment. Article 4, § 1, of the constitution of the United States, declares that "full faith and credit shall be given in each state to the public acts, records and judicial proceedings of every other state. And the congress may by general laws prescribe the manner in which such acts, records and proceedings shall be proved, and the effect thereof." Pursuant to this constitutional provision, congress has prescribed how the records and judicial proceedings of the courts of the states and territories, shall be authenticated, and has declared that "the said records and judicial proceedings so authenticated shall have such faith and credit given to them in every court within the United States as they have by law or usage in the courts of the state from which they are taken:" Rev. St. § 605. From this statement of the law, it is clear that the plea that judgment was obtained by fraud, cannot hold unless it would be good in the courts of the state where the judgment was rendered. See Hampton v. McConnel, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 234; Christmas v. Russell, 5 Wall. [72 U. S.] 290; Maxwell v. Stewart, 22 Wall. [89 U. S.] 77; Mills v. Duryee, 7 Cranch, [11 U. S.] 481; Hockaday v. Skeggs, 18 La. Ann. 682; McLaren v. Kehler, 23 La. Ann. 80. In the state of New York, in whose courts the judgment sued on was rendered, it is held that "the judgment or decree of a court possessing competent jurisdiction is, as a general rule, final not only as to the subject matter thereby actually determined, but as to every other matter which the parties might litigate in the cause, and which they might have had decided:" Embury v. Conner, 3 N. Y. 522; Le Guen v. Gouverneur, 1 Johns. Cas. 436; Etheridge v. Osborn, 12 Wend. 399; Gardner v. Buckbee, 3 Cow. 120; Burt v. Sternburgh, 4 Cow. 559; Wood v. Jackson, 8 Wend. 1; Wright v. Butler, 6 Wend. 284; Lawrence v. Hunt, 10 Wend. 80. As we are required to give the same force and effect to their judgment as would be given it by courts of the state of New York, and as the defense here set up could not be made against the judgment in those courts, it cannot be made here.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William B. Woods, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

III. The defendant, assuming the character of plaintiff in reconvention, sets up a claim to damages for the violation, by the plaintiff, of the same contract upon which the plaintiff's suit in the superior court of New York city was founded. The claim in reconvention alleges that the defendant contracted with the plaintiff, in consideration of certain sums of money, for the exclusive right to exhibit, within certain specified territory, a spectacular drama called the Black Crook, of which the plaintiff's intestate was the owner, and that the plaintiff, in violation of his said contract, both exhibited said drama himself and caused others to exhibit it within the territory for which the defendant had the exclusive right under said contract—whereby the defendant sustained damages in the sum of ten thousand dollars, for which sum he asks judgment against the plaintiff. To this claim in reconvention the plaintiff has filed three exceptions. First, that the same cause of action was set up by way of counter-claim, in a suit between the same parties, in the superior court of the city of New York, and decided by the final judgment rendered in said cause on the 23d of December, 1876, and, second, that said reconvention is the same set up in the answer of the same defendant to a suit by this plaintiff, in a case No. 8,053 in this court, [unreported,] which reconvention was excepted to by this plaintiff on the same grounds above specified, and said exceptions were sustained and the said answers in reconvention dismissed by this court; and, third, that said reconvention is not pleaded with sufficient particularity and detail. In support of the first and second exceptions, the records of the cause in the superior court of the city of New York and of this court are produced. The only difference between the counter-claim, set up in the suit in the New York superior court, and the reconvention set up in this case is, that the former avers that the plaintiff wholly neglected to protect and secure to the defendant the exercise of the sole right to exhibit said drama within the territory named in the contract, but on the contrary, permitted it to be performed in said territory by others, and the latter charges that both the plaintiff and his intestate themselves exhibited said drama and caused others to exhibit it within the same territory.

Now, whether these two causes of action, to wit, the counter-claim set up in New York and the reconvention set up in this suit, are precisely the same, it is not necessary to determine. The claim in reconvention may be somewhat broader than the counter-claim, but it might and should have been litigated and decided in the issue raised upon the counter-claim in the superior court of New York city. The defendant is, therefore, concluded by the judgment upon the counter-claim in that case: Embury v. Conner, supra; Voorhees v. Bank of U. S., 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 449; 2 Smith, Lead. Cas. tit. "Estoppel," 455, note; Outram v. Morewood, 3 East, 346. The claim in reconvention set up in the suit in this court, No. 8,053, and dismissed, is substantially the same as the one just passed on, and what has been said applies to it. It was also substantially disposed of by the judgment of the superior court of the city of New York. The reconvention under consideration appears to have been pleaded in too vague and general a manner: McMasters v. Palmer, 4 La. Ann. 381; Wilcox v. His Creditors, 11 Rob. (La.) 347; Jonau v. Ferrand, 2 Rob. (La.) 216. We think all the exceptions to the claim in reconvention, as pleaded, are well taken, and the reconvention must be dismissed.

BARRELL, (EDMONDSON v.) See Case No. 4,284.

Case No. 1,040.

BARRELL v. LIMINGTON.

[4 Cranch, C. C. 70.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May Term, 1830.

DEPOSITION—NOTICE—ACT OF 1789—ATTORNEY.

Notice of taking a deposition under the act of 1789, § 30, directed to the party himself, may be served on his attorney-at-law.

Mr. Coxe, for the defendant, objected to a deposition taken on the part of the plaintiff, that the notice, directed to the defendant himself, was served only upon his attorney-at-law in the cause.

THE COURT, however, (nem. con.,) overruled the objection.

Case No. 1,041.

BARRELL v. SIMONTON.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 657.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May Term, 1826.

MALICIOUS PROSECUTION — PLEADINGS—TERMINATION OF PROCEEDINGS—DEMURRER.

In an action for maliciously arresting and holding the plaintiff to bail without probable cause, the affidavit to hold to bail must aver that the suit in which the plaintiff was so maliciously holden to bail was determined; and a declaration for such malicious arrest and holding to bail must contain such an averment, or it will be bad on general demurrer.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

At law. Action on the case for maliciously causing the plaintiff to be arrested, imprisoned, and held to bail in Baltimore, without probable cause. Neither the declaration nor the affidavit to hold to bail contained any averment that the suit in Baltimore, upon which the arrest was made, was determined.

Mr. R. S. Coxe, for the defendant, moved for leave to enter his appearance without special bail, and contended that this was a local action, and would lie only in Maryland; and that the affidavit was insufficient in not averring that the action in Baltimore was determined, for until that suit was at an end no action would lie for the malicious arrest. That fact constitutes a necessary part of the plaintiff's title to recover. Morgan v. Hughes, 2 Term R. 232; Fisher v. Bristow, 1 Doug. 215; 1 Sell. Pr. 57; Sinclair v. Eldred, 4 Taunt. 7; Woodford v. Ashley, 11 East, 508; 8 Went. 319; Selw. N. P. 935; Farmer v. Darling, 4 Burrows, 1971; Rodriguez v. Tadmire, 2 Esp. 719; Kirk v. French, 1 Esp. 80; 1 Sell. Pr. 107, a, 2; 2 Chit. Pl. p. 225, note d, pp. 291, 299; Morgan's V. M. 404; Stennel v. Hogg, 1 Saund. 227; Selw. N. P. 936, 942; 2 Phil. Ev. c. 9, pp. 110, 116; Imlay v. Ellefsen, 2 East, 453; Archb. Civ. Pl. 52; Reynolds v. Kennedy, 1 Wils. 232.

Mr. Lear and Mr. Barrell, contra. It is only necessary to show a prima facie cause of action. There is a difference between an action for malicious prosecution, and for a malicious arrest. "Prosecution" means criminal prosecution. The courts have been more strict in the former than in the latter, because the former tends to prevent the punishment of crimes. In actions of conspiracy the declaration followed the writ, which contained the words, "legitimo modo acquietatus," and actions upon the case, in nature of conspiracy, followed, without reason, the same form. Malice, and the want of probable cause, are the gist of the action for malicious arrest. The determination of the prior action in favor of the present plaintiff, would be only a circumstance tending to prove the want of probable cause. The want of the averment of the determination of the former suit is aided by a verdict; and it is doubted whether it would be fatal on demurrer. Skinner v. Gunton, 1 Saund. 228, note; Smith v. Cattle, 2 Wils. 376. At this stage of the cause, the question, whether the former suit was determined, ought not to be raised. It is not necessary to aver it in the declaration. If the writ, upon which the arrest was made, was not issued by the proper clerk, or not returnable to the proper court, the plaintiff never could show that the suit was determined; and if the averment is necessary the declaration may be amended; and if the former suit should be determined in favor of the present plaintiff, before the pleadings in this cause are made up, it would be sufficient.

Mr. Coxe, in reply, admitted that these actions, for malicious arrest and for malicious prosecution, grew out of the old action of conspiracy; but no distinction is taken between actions for malicious prosecution and for malicious arrest. In either the declaration must show that the former suit has been determined in favor of the plaintiff. It is true, that after verdict the fact shall be taken to have been proved at the trial, because the plaintiff could not recover without that proof; but the same authorities show that the want of the averment is fatal upon the demurrer. The affidavit to hold to bail must show all the facts necessary to entitle the plaintiff to recover.

THE COURT took time, and upon full consideration of the following authorities, was of opinion, (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, doubting,) that the affidavit to hold to bail was insufficient, because it did not state that the suit in Baltimore had terminated in favor of the present plaintiff. Waterer v. Freeman, Hob. (17 Jac.) 267; Skinner v. Gunton, 1 Saund. 228; Stennel v. Hogg, Id. 226, note 1, by Serg. Williams; Martin v. Lincoln, Esp. N. P. 527; Farrel v. Nunn, Bull. N. P. 13; Parker v. Langly, 10 Mod. 145, 209; Brownl. Rediv. 61; Reg. Brev. 134, a; Shotbolt's Case, Godb. 76; Fisher v. Bristow, 1 Doug. 215; Morgan v. Hughes, 2 Term R. 225; Lewis v. Farrel, 1 Strange, 114; Lil. Ent. 15, 23, 35; Sutton v. Johnstone, 1 Term R. 497, 498.

The defendant was permitted to appear without special bail. At a subsequent term, he filed a general demurrer to the declaration; and at May term, 1827, the suit was struck off by order of the plaintiff.

Case No. 1,042.

BARRELL v. SIMONTON.

[3 Cranch, C. C. 681.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. Term, 1829.

DEPOSITION—REASONABLE NOTICE.

Notice at Washington to defendant's counsel, on Thursday, the 31st of December, that a deposition would be taken in Baltimore on the 2d of January, was not reasonable notice.

Mr. R. S. Coxe, for the defendant, moved the court for a continuance of the cause until the next term, because a deposition had been taken on the part of the plaintiff, in Baltimore, on Saturday, the 2d of January, upon notice given to the defendant's counsel here in Washington, on Thursday, the 31st of December, at eleven o'clock, A. M.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent) was of opinion that the notice was not reasonable, and continued the cause.

BARRELS OF.

[NOTE. Cases cited under this title will be found arranged in alphabetical order under the quantity or number of barrels; e. g. "Barrels of Rectified Spirits. See Ninety-Two Barrels of Rectified Spirits," Case No. 10,275.]

Case No. 1,043.

In re BARRETT.

[2 Hughes, 444;[1] 2 N. B. R. 533, (Quarto, 165;) 1 Chi. Leg. News, 202; 2 Amer. Law T. Rep. 182; 11 Int. Rev. Rec. 21; 1 Amer. Law T. Rep. Bankr. 144.]

District Court, D. West Virginia. Dec. Term, 1869.

BANKRUPTCY — ASSIGNEE — PARTNERSHIP—POWER TO BIND FIRM—VOTING FOR ASSIGNEE.

1. An attorney for a creditor of the bankrupt may be assignee of the bankrupt's estate.

2. One member of a firm or copartnership, on behalf of the firm, may execute a power of attorney to some third person, authorizing him to cast the vote of the firm in the choice of assignees.

[Cited in Re Sauls, 5 Fed. 719.]

[In bankruptcy. Joseph Barrett was adjudicated a bankrupt on the petition of Wynne & Co., of Cincinnati, Ohio. At a meeting of the creditors, Abraham Burlew, Esq., attorney for the petitioning creditors, cast the votes of a majority of the creditors in number and interest for himself for assignee, by virtue of a power of attorney, duly executed and acknowledged, on behalf of each of the respective creditor firms, by one member thereof. Burlew was declared elected assignee by the register. Heard on exceptions to this ruling. Decision of the register sustained.]

JACKSON, District Judge. In this case the register certified the following questions for the decision of the judge: First. Can the attorney for the petitioning creditor act as assignee? It appears from the certificate of the register that Abraham Burlew, Esq., the attorney for the petitioner, was the choice of a "greater part in value and in number of the creditors" who proved their debts, and that he is fully competent to discharge the duties of the position.

The first clause of the thirteenth section of the bankrupt act [of March 2, 1867, (14 Stat. 522,)] provides for the first meeting of the creditors and the election of an assignee. The party selected must be the choice of "the greater part in value and in number of the creditors who have proved their debts," otherwise he cannot act. This seems to be the only limitation prescribed by the statute, no particular qualification being required. It is obvious that the authors of the act supposed that creditors, in selecting an assignee, would, from prudential considerations alone, always select a capable and suitable person to discharge the duties of the position; hence it was not deemed necessary to require any particular qualification or to impose any other limitation than the one just referred to. The fourth clause of the same section invests the judge with the discretion to order a new election, but this discretion is to be exercised only when "needful or expedient," or, in other words, for cause. Should no cause exist, it is clearly the duty of the judge to confirm the selection made by the creditors. What, then, is cause sufficient to justify the judge in withholding his consent in such a case? Manifestly it must be for want of capacity or integrity in the party selected. In this case, all parties concede both capacity and integrity to Mr. Burlew. It may be suggested whether interest will not disqualify a party for the position of assignee. I think not, unless the interest of the assignee was or might become, in the progress of the proceedings, adverse to the general creditors, or that he was in a situation and manifested a purpose to use his position to their disadvantage. Ordinarily, the assignee who has an interest in the bankrupt estate cannot promote his own or injure that of another without being called to account for it at once. He is under the control of the court, and his conduct is always open to its supervision.

Under the provisions of the eighteenth section, for good cause he may be summarily removed. For these reasons I cannot see why a creditor of a bankrupt might not act as assignee; and such, I think, has been the practice in the courts. If a creditor can act, certainly his attorney may act, as far less objection exists to him on the ground of interest. The eighteenth section also declares who shall be ineligible as assignee, and in express terms inhibits any person from acting who has received any preference contrary to the provisions of the bankrupt act. There is no other provision in the act rendering a person ineligible for this position. It is not contended that the objection provided for in this section exists in this case. For the reasons stated I see no valid objection to the ruling of the register upon the first point.

Second. The power of attorney under which the said Burlew acted as attorney in fact, was not executed and acknowledged according to law. It should have been signed and acknowledged by each member of the firm, who are a creditor firm. It is a general and familiar principle that a partner cannot bind his copartner by a contract under sale, without his previous assent to a subsequent ratification. The principle is well established by authority, both in England and in this country. It does not appear, from the certificate of the register, whether the non-subscribing partners were aware of the execution of the power in this case, or whether they afterwards adopted it, knowing that it would bind them; nor do I regard this assent as necessary. The rule in bankruptcy seems to be different, and may properly be regarded as an exception to the general principle just stated.

[1] [Reported by Hon. Robert W. Hughes, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

Courts of bankruptcy invariably recognize the right of one partner to bind another for special purposes, such as proving debts and voting in the choice of an assignee. This exception grows out of the necessity of the case. It is often inconvenient to bring together all the members of a firm to execute a deed of this character. The general rule is relaxed to facilitate business, and if such were not the law, great injury might result to a firm in prosecuting their claims against a party in failing circumstances, when it was important to proceed without delay. In the proof of debts by a creditor firm composed of several members, it is to be treated as one creditor, any one of which may act for all in proving the debt or voting for an assignee. If, therefore, any one member of the firm may act and bind his copartners for these purposes, it is equally competent for him to delegate his powers for the same purposes and bind his copartners. Such has been the rule in the English bankrupt courts. In the case of Ex parte Mitchell, 14 Ves. 597, Lord Eldon lays down the rule that one partner may act for another in bankruptcy for various purposes, such as "to prove debts," "to execute powers of attorney for voting in the choice of an assignee." And the same judge, in the case of Ex parte Hodgkinson, 19 Ves. 292, reaffirms the opinion just cited, and states the law to be that "one partner, on behalf of all, may prove a debt, vote on choice of an assignee, and sign the certificate." No reported case from our own courts has been produced that rules the particular point in question; but as bearing upon it, we refer to a recent case before Judge Giles, who held that in the case of "joint creditors" who were partners, either party can vote the full amount of the debt, thus adopting the rule that prevails in the English bankrupt courts. See In re Purvis, [Case No. 11,476;] and as bearing upon this question, we refer particularly to 15 Johns. R. 159; 11 Pick. 400; Colly. Partn. [5th Ed.] 429.

For these reasons I am inclined to follow the learned judge in the case of Ex parte Mitchell. The law as there expounded has ever since been the established rule in the English bankrupt courts, and being so long sanctioned, I see no reason for departing from it at this day. I am therefore of opinion that the power of attorney being signed and acknowledged by only one member of a creditor firm, is sufficient to bind all of its members, and was therefore properly executed. The third point referred, being answered by the decision of the first and second points, it is unnecessary to notice it further.

Case No. 1,044.

In re BARRETT.

[11 N. B. R. 527; 1 Cent. Law J. 556.]

District Court, E. D. Texas. Oct. 22, 1874.

VOLUNTARY BANKRUPTCY—DISCHARGE OF BANKRUPT—TIME LIMITATION.

[A bankrupt whose estate has no assets cannot be discharged from his debts, under Act March 2, 1867, § 29, (14 Stat. 531,) unless he applies "for a discharge after the expiration of 60 days, and within one year from the adjudication of bankruptcy."]

In bankruptcy.

MORRILL, District Judge. The question for adjudication is whether the bankrupt, whose estate had no assets, is entitled to a discharge from his debts if he shall have neglected to apply for such discharge for more than one year from the time he was adjudged a bankrupt. The first paragraph of section 39 [29] of the bankrupt act [of March 2, 1867, (14 Stat. 531,)] provides: "That at any time after the expiration of six months from the adjudication of bankruptcy, or * * * if no assets have come to the hands of the assignee, at any time after the expiration of sixty days, and within one year from the adjudication of bankruptcy, the bankrupt may apply to the court for a discharge from his debts." The statute contemplates in this section two classes of bankrupts, the difference between them being the having, and not having, assets. To one class no limit is assigned as to the time the bankrupt may apply to the court for a discharge after the expiration of six months from the adjudication of bankruptcy; to the other it is provided that "he may apply at any time after the expiration of sixty days, and within one year from the adjudication of bankruptcy."

It must be considered that, as the bankrupt act does, by its provisions and effects, impair the obligations of contracts, and would, on that account, be unconstitutional, if not expressly provided by the constitution, the construction to be given to this act must be strict; and certainly, when the act expressly provides the way and manner, and within what periods of time a bankrupt may be discharged, the only question that can arise is, does the applicant come within the provisions. In this case the applicant seems to have realized the fact that he has not applied within the proper time, and has stated the causes and reasons for delay. If the act authorized a judge to extend the time in consequence of the sickness or other disability of a party, there would be a different case presented from the one now before the court. As the case now stands, since the statute says that "the bankrupt may apply for a discharge after the expiration of sixty days and within one year," and does not authorize the application to be made at any other time, a court cannot consider an application made at any other time than as provided by the statute. The court cannot extend, enlarge, or contract the evident and express provisions, meaning, and intent of the statute. The court has no more power to discharge an applicant who fails to comply with one provision of the act than another, or all others. The application is refused.

Discharge refused.

Case No. 1,045.

BARRETT v. APLINGTON.

[1 West. Law Month. (1859,) 53.]

Circuit Court, D. Illinois.

SUNDAY—USURY.

At law. This was an action [by Merriam E. Barrett against Zenas Aplington] on a promissory note for $875. The defendant pleads usury, and that the note was made on Sunday, to which plaintiff demurred.

S. A. Irwin, for plaintiff.

Geo. Scoville, for defendant.

Before DRUMMOND, District Judge.

1. THE COURT decided that the 4th section of the act of 1857, in relation to interest, absolutely repeals all conflicting laws, and all laws inflicting penalties. See Sess. Laws [Ill.] 1857, pp. 45, 46.

2. That therefore all forfeitures accruing under all acts prior to the one above cited, are inoperative and cannot be enforced;

3. That by the act of 1857, any person taking, or contracting to take, since the passage thereof, any higher interest than ten per cent., forfeits the whole amount of interest reserved.

In relation to the making of a note on Sunday, the court decided that it was not, for that reason, void—that the good order and peace of society were not disturbed thereby.

[See, also, King v. Fleming, 72 Ill. 21, and Richmond v. Moore, 107 Ill. 429.]

BARRETT, (BROWN v.) See Case No. 1,991.

Case No. 1,046.

BARRETT v. GODDARD.

[3 Mason, 107.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. Term, 1822.

SALE—DELIVERY—VENDOR'S LIEN.

Where goods were sold, lying in the vendor's warehouse, on a credit of six months, for which a note was given, and the goods were sold by marks and numbers, and it was a part of the consideration of the purchase, that they might lie, rent free, in the warehouse, at the option of the vendee, and for his benefit, until the vendor should want the room; held, that there was a complete delivery of the goods, so that, on the insolvency of the vendee, they would not be stopped by the vendor.

[Cited in Gibson v. Stevens, Case No. 5,401. Overruled in Parker v. Byrnes, Id. 10,728.]

At law. This was an action of trover, [by Charles Barrett against Nathaniel Goddard,] to recover fifty-one bales of cotton, alleged to have been converted by the defendant on 27 May, 1822. The cotton was part of an importation of eighty-two bales, numbered from 1 to 82, which the defendant had imported from New Orleans, in February, 1822. In the early part of March, the defendant employed a broker (Mr. Peter Coffin) to sell the cotton for him. The broker accordingly sold one half, viz. forty-one bales, consisting of the bales marked with even numbers, to a Mr. Perrin, at the cost and charges, on a credit of six months, with interest from 7th February preceding, that being the time of the purchase at New Orleans. The remaining forty-one bales, consisting of the bales with odd numbers, the broker sold on the 15th March, 1822, to one Silas Bullard, at the cost and charges, on a like credit of six months. At the time of the sale, the whole eighty-two bales were lying in the defendant's warehouse, near his dwellinghouse in Boston, being piled together without any regard to the numbers. During the negotiation for the sale, and as an inducement to the purchase, the broker stated to Mr. Bullard, that the cotton might lie in the warehouse of the defendant, free of storage, as long as Bullard might wish, unless the defendant should want the room for the storage of other goods, which event was not likely to happen until the ensuing summer. Upon the faith of this representation, and the understanding, that Bullard meant to avail himself of this privilege, the bargain was completed. Mr. Bullard gave his note for the amount of the cotton, dated 7th February, 1822, payable to defendant or order in six months, with interest, which was accepted by the broker, who thereupon gave him a bill of parcels, dated 15th March, 1822, which stated the numbers of the bales sold to Bullard, and acknowledged a receipt of payment by the note. The note was afterwards received without objection by the defendant. At the time of the sale, Bullard did not go to the warehouse of the defendant to examine the cotton, but he bought upon the examination of a few bales, which he saw on the wharf, while it was landing, and of samples of the other bales. The cotton remained in the same warehouse of the defendant, promiscuously piled up, until the month of June, when Mr. Perrin began to take away, as he wanted them, the bales purchased by him.

[1] [Reported by William P. Mason, Esq.]

They were, of course, then separated from the general mass of the bales.

On 25th May, 1822, Bullard became insolvent, and stopped payment; and on that day an indenture of three parts was prepared between Bullard of the first part, the plaintiff, who was a creditor of Bullard, of the second part, and Benjamin Rich and others, creditors of Bullard, of the third part; but it was not executed by the plaintiff till the morning of the 27th of May. The indenture conveys to the plaintiff, for the benefit of himself and other creditors, among other things, the forty-one bales of cotton, purchased by him of the defendant, by the description of "41 Bales N. O. Cotton at N. Goddard's store, Summer street." The failure of Bullard was not generally known until the morning of Monday, the 27th of May. On the same morning, after the execution of the indenture, the defendant went with the note aforesaid, to Bullard's countinghouse, and informed him, that in consequence of his failure, he, the defendant, would not deliver the cotton unless the note was paid or secured; and he offered to rescind the sale, and deliver up the note; and he then tendered the note to Bullard, who declined receiving it, or doing any thing. Immediately after this interview, and in the same countingroom, the plaintiff saw the defendant, gave him notice of the assignment, and demanded the cotton from the defendant. The defendant made the same offer to the plaintiff, that he had made to Bullard, but the plaintiff declined it; and the defendant then refused to deliver the cotton, as the note was unpaid, and said he should not give it up without a lawsuit. The note aforesaid became due since this action was commenced, and has not been paid. Bullard has continued insolvent ever since 27th May.

In August, 1822, the broker sold the forty-one bales of cotton in controversy, by the order and on account of the defendant, without any authority from the plaintiff. The cotton, up to the time of the sale, remained in the defendant's warehouse. The value of the cotton on the 27th of May, the day it was demanded by the plaintiff, was $3,011.60. No other delivery of the cotton took place, than what is to be inferred by law from the preceding facts. At the time of the purchase, Bullard was understood to be at full liberty to take away the cotton when he pleased; and there was no proposition made that the defendant should retain it as security for the note. Upon this evidence a verdict was, by consent, taken for the plaintiff, for the sum of $——, subject to the opinion of the court, upon the question, whether upon this evidence the defendant had a right to retain the cotton, or stop the delivery thereof, until the note of Bullard was paid or secured to be paid; either party to be at liberty to turn the case into a special verdict within —— days after the judgment was rendered by the court.

Mr. Bliss, for plaintiff.

Mr. Shaw, for defendant.

STORY, Circuit Justice. The right of the defendant to retain the cotton in this case, so as to defeat the action of the plaintiff, has been placed at the argument upon two grounds. 1. That there was no actual or constructive delivery of the cotton to Bullard, and the defendant retains a lien for the price. 2. That the defendant has a right of stoppage in transitu, which has been lawfully exercised by the defendant, in consequence of the insolvency of Bullard.

When a contract for the sale of goods is completed by the assent of both parties, the property in the goods is transferred to the vendee, and the price is due to the vendor; but the vendee cannot take the goods until he tenders the price agreed on. And if the price is tendered, and the vendor refuses it, the vendee may seize the goods, or have an action against the vendor for detaining them. Such is the doctrine laid down by Mr. Justice Blackstone, in his excellent Commentaries. 2 Bl. Comm. 448. The principle here stated must apply with equal force, whenever the terms of the sale are completely complied with on the part of the vendee. Therefore where goods are sold to be paid for by a note on time, and the note is given to the vendor, the property in the goods passes to the vendee in the same manner, and under the same circumstances, as it would if the contract were for cash, and the cash were paid. But this doctrine, however, is applicable only in cases where the goods are clearly designated and separated from all others, and according to the sense of the contract, are then deliverable, without any farther act on either side, and are in a state capable of delivery. But if there remains any thing more to be done to designate the particular property, or to complete the rights of the vendee, then the property does not pass, until such acts are done. In short, in such cases there can be no absolute delivery of the goods.

The principal question, in cases of this sort, is to ascertain, whether there has been an actual or constructive delivery; the latter is just as effectual as the former, and may be inferred from circumstances, as well as established by direct proof. In the case of Hanson v. Meyer, 6 East, 614, Lord Ellenborough laid down the true line of distinction. There the vendee agreed to purchase all the starch of the vendor, then lying at the warehouse of a third person, at so much per cwt. by a bill at two months; which starch was in papers, but the exact weight not then ascertained, but was to be ascertained afterwards; and fourteen days were to be allowed for the delivery; and the vendor gave a note, addressed to the warehouse keeper, directing him to weigh and deliver to the vendee all his starch; and the question was, whether the absolute property in the starch vested in the vendee before weighing. Lord Ellenborough delivered the opinion of the court in the negative. He said, that by the terms of the contract, two things in the nature of conditions or preliminary acts, on the part of the vendee, necessarily preceded the absolute vesting in him of the property contracted for; the first was the payment of the agreed price; the second was, the act of weighing, which, from the terms of the contract, was the means of ascertaining the amount of the price. The weight must therefore be ascertained, in order that the price might be known and paid; and unless the weighing preceded the delivery, it could never, for these purposes, effectually take place at all. And he proceeded to lay down the general doctrine, that "if any thing remain to be done on the part of the seller, as between him and the buyer, before the commodity purchased is to be delivered, a complete present right of property has not attached in the buyer." And he distinguished the case then before the court from that of Hammond v. Anderson, 4 Bos. & P. 69, because there the bacon was sold for a fixed price, and the weighing, there, was for the buyer's satisfaction, and formed no ingredient in the contract between the buyer and the seller. The doctrine of this case has never been denied. It may have been misapplied in Whitehouse v. Frost, 12 East, 614; but it was recognized and acted upon in the fullest manner in Austen v. Craven, 4 Taunt. 644, and White v. Wilks, 5 Taunt. 176, 1 Marsh. 2, and Busk v. Davis, 2 Maule & S. 397. The converse doctrine necessarily flows from the same principle; and that is, that if no farther act remains to be done on either side, and the thing sold is separated and distinguished from all others, as soon as the terms of the contract are completed and complied with, the property passes. See Rugg v. Minett, 11 East, 211; Stoveld v. Hughes, 14 East, 308; Lucas v. Dorrien, 7 Taunt. 278.

If we apply these principles to the present case, it seems to me, that they establish, that there was a complete delivery of the cotton to Bullard. Nothing remained to be done on either side. The bales were all marked and numbered, and sold by their marks and numbers. They were perfectly distinguishable from all the others; and the terms of the contract on the other side were fully complied with. The payment was made in the mode agreed on, by giving a note, payable at a future time. Neither party contemplated any farther act to be done. The vendee contracted for an immediate possession at his own option as to time and place; and the vendor sought no retainer. But it is argued, that the plaintiff never parted with the actual possession, and therefore there was no constructive delivery of the cotton to Bullard, because it remained under the plaintiff's care in his warehouse. If the warehouse had belonged to a third person, there would be no pretence to say, after notice and assent by the warehouse man, that the delivery was not complete in construction of law. For such a purpose no manual actual possession is necessary. It is sufficient, if, in the intent of all the parties, the one parts with, and the other receives the property, although there is no change of place. Thus, putting a mark on the goods bought, was in Ellis v. Hunt, 3 Term R. 464, held a delivery. So, weighing the goods by the vendee was held, in Hammond v. Anderson, 4 Bos. & P. 69, to be a complete delivery. In that case the goods were at the wharf of a third person, and the vendor was bound to pay the charge of warehousing for fourteen days after the sale, and before the end of the fourteen days the vendee failed. The court thought there was clearly a delivery. Mr. Justice Heath said, "though the goods continued in the warehouse of the defendant (the wharfinger) after the sale, they were no longer in the possession of the vendor for any purpose whatsoever." Mr. Justice Chambre said, "the payment of the warehouse room by the vendor can make no difference." See, also, Greaves v. Hepke, 2 Barn. & Ald. 131; Spear v. Travers, 4 Camp. 251. So the change of mark, from A to B, on bales of goods in a warehouse, by direction of the parties, has been held by the house of lords, to operate as an actual delivery of the goods. See Stoveld v. Hughes, 14 East, 308, 312.

There is nothing in reason or principle to make the present case different, simply because the bales of cotton remained in the plaintiff's own warehouse. It was a part of the bargain, that they should so remain, and a part of the consideration of the purchase. The warehouse must be deemed, after the purchase, to be virtually the warehouse of Bullard, for this purpose, or so much storage as virtually hired by him. In Stoveld v. Hughes, 14 East, 308, the goods had never been removed from the wharf of the vendor; but the court held, that this was not a circumstance obstructing a constructive delivery. In Elmore v. Stone, 1 Taunt. 458, where a horse was purchased and left in the stable of the vendor on livery, the court thought the delivery complete. Whether that case, upon its own circumstances, can be supported, or is open to the doubt suggested by Mr. Justice Bailey, in Howe v. Palmer, 3 Barn. & Ald. 321, is not material; the principle on which it was decided, is sound; that is, that a continuance of the possession of the vendor does not prevent the delivery being complete, if nothing farther remains to be done on either side, and the possession is by mutual consent. The case of Hurry v. Mangles, 1 Camp. 452, is in point. There the oil, which was purchased, to be paid for by an acceptance of six months, remained in the vendor's warehouse after the sale, and the vendee paid warehouse rent for it. Lord Ellenborough said, that the acceptance of warehouse rent was a complete transfer of the goods to the purchaser. If I pay, said he, for a part of a warehouse, so much of it is mine. So in Phillimore v. Barry, Id. 513, where goods were purchased at auction, which were in the warehouse of factors, for sale, and they agreed to give storage room for thirty days, Lord Ellenborough held, that the property vested absolutely in the purchasers from the moment of sale, the agreement, as to storage, being introduced for their benefit, and being part of the consideration for the purchase money. This last circumstance pointedly applies to the present case. Green v. Haythorne, 1 Starkie, 447, is to the same effect. The goods remained in the vendor's warehouse by consent, but the court held, that from the time of the sale, the defendant's warehouse was the warehouse of the purchaser. The case is exceedingly strong, as to the law of constructive delivery. See, also, Hunn v. Bowne, 2 Caines, 38; Allen v. Smith, 10 Mass. 308; Damon v. Osborn, 1 Pick. 476. White v. Wilks, 1 Marsh. 2, 5 Taunt. 176, proceeds upon the admission of the correctness of the same doctrine. I forbear to go farther into the cases, because there is no authority, that attempts to overthrow the doctrine.

Now what distinction can there be between the case of payment of rent, and an agreement for warehouse room for the benefit of the vendee, forming a part of the consideration of the purchase? Certainly none in point of law; and I, for one, am not prepared to admit, that if, in the case at bar, the agreement for warehouse room had been after the purchase, without charge, for the mere accommodation of the vendee, and without any agreed right of retainer by the vendor, it would have made any difference in point of law. My judgment accordingly is, that the delivery here was complete, and the property absolutely vested in the vendee.

The other point, as to the lien and right of stoppage in transitu, may be disposed of in a few words. The very contract itself repels the notion of a lien. The goods were deliverable immediately, at the option of the vendee. The payment was by a note on time. Now, giving such a credit for the price, under such circumstances, is decisive against any implied right of retainer or lien for the price. How then can the court assert one, when it is inconsistent with the very terms of the bargain? Besides, if the delivery was complete, there is necessarily an end of the lien. The transit would be ended, and the right of stoppage in transitu, once gone, could not be reassumed. Judgment must therefore be entered for the plaintiff.

Judgment accordingly.

Case No. 1,047.

BARRETT et al. v. HALL et al.

[1 Mason, 447;[1] 1 Robb, Pat. Cas. 207.]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. Term, 1818.

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS—JOINT PATENT—PATENTABILITY—COMBINATION—SEPARATE IMPROVEMENTS—METHOD NOT PATENTABLE.

1. A joint patent may well be for a joint invention, but not for a sole invention of one of the patentees. If each of the patentees obtain separate patents for the same invention, as his exclusive invention, and afterwards both obtain a joint patent for the same, as their joint invention, they are estopped by the joint patent to assert any title under the several patents.

[Cited in Butler v. Bainbridge, 29 Fed. 143.]

2. A patent may well be for a new combination of machines, whether the machines be old or new. But one patent cannot, at the same time, include an exclusive right in the combination and in each of the machines; and it is no infringement of a patent for the combination, to use either of the machines separately.

[Cited in Tyler v. Deval, Case No. 14,307; Olcott v. Hawkins, Id. 10,480; Smith v. Downing, Id. 13,036; Brooks v. Norcross, Id. 1,957; In re Boughton, Id. 1,696; Stimpson v. Woodman, 10 Wall. (77 U. S.) 126; Rees v. Gould, 15 Wall. (82 U. S.) 194; Craig v. Smith, Case No. 3,339.]

3. There must be several patents for several improvements of distinct machines.

[Cited in Wyeth v. Stone, Case No. 18,107; Emerson v. Hogg, Id. 4,440; Sessions v. Romadka, 21 Fed. 132.]

[4. Cited in Hogg v. Emerson, 6 How. (47 U. S.) 483, as supporting the point that patents may be united if two or more, included in one set of letters, relate to a like subject, or are in their nature or operation connected together.]

5. A patent for an improved machine must show in the specification, in what the improvement precisely consists; and the patent be limited to those improvements. If not specified, the patent is void for ambiguity; if broader than the improvements, it is void on other grounds.

[Cited in Hogg v. Emerson, 6 How. (47 U. S.) 483; Blake v. Stafford, Case No. 1,504.]

6. Where a combination of machinery exists up to a certain point, and the patentee makes an improvement, he should not include in his patent the whole machinery; but only the improvement.

[Cited in Hovey v. Stevens, Case No. 6,746; Potter v. Holland, Id. 11,330; Seymour v. Osborne, 11 Wall. (78 U. S.) 549; Hopkins & D. Manuf'g Co. v. Corbin, Case No. 6,695.]

[Cited in Ex parte Berry, Case No. 1,353, as to what constitutes a combination.]

7. If a party make an improvement on an existing machine, or invent a new machine, his patent should not be for a method, but for his machine, or improved machine.

[Cited in Potter v. Holland, Case No. 11,330; Rees v. Gould, 15 Wall. (82 U. S.) 187.]

[8. Cited in Valentine v. Marshall, Case No. 16,812a, and Smith v. Downing, Cases Nos. 13,035a and 13,036, to the point that the character of an infringement, as such, is not affected by a mere alteration in form and proportion, so as not to materially affect results, nor by the substitution of mechanical equivalents to attain the same end.]

[1] [Reported by William P. Mason, Esq.]

[9. Cited in Keene v. Wheatley, Case No. 7,644, to the statement that the doctrine of patents constitutes the metaphysics of the law.]

[10. Cited in Earth Closet Co. v. Fenner, Case No. 4,249, to the point that, on application for a provisional injunction in a patent case, proper expert demonstration of the patents or articles involved should, in the discretion of the court, be applied in the solution of the necessary questions of law governing the case.]

At law. Case for the infringement of a patent granted for "A new and useful improvement, being a mode of dying and finishing all kinds of silk woven goods," [by William Barrett and Abner Stearns against Hall and others.] Plea, the general issue, with a specification of special matter of defense. [Verdict for plaintiffs. Heard on motion for new trial. Granted.]

The patent was granted on the 9th day of September, 1818; and after reciting, that the plaintiffs had alleged, that they had invented "a new and useful improvement, being a mode of dying and finishing all kinds of silk woven goods," granted to the plaintiffs "the full and exclusive right and liberty of making, constructing, using and vending to others to be used, the said improvement, a description whereof is given in the words of the said Abner Stearns and the said William Barrett themselves, in the schedule hereto annexed, and is made a part of these presents," for the term of four years from the 12th day of May, 1818. The specification, annexed to the letters patent, contained a description of two machines; one a reel, on which spirally to wind and secure the silk, and put it into the dye; the other, a frame for the purpose of extending and finishing the silk, after it is dyed.[2] At the trial it was admitted, that the infringement of the plaintiffs' patent, if any, was by the use of the reel only; and that the defendant did not use the silk frame, either in connexion with, or separately from, the reel. The plaintiffs stated their improvements to consist, 1. In the spiral winding of the silk on more arms than four arms, so as to assume the shape of a circular spiral, instead of a square spiral. 2dly. In the use of small pins, obliquely placed on the arms of the reels, to hook the selvages of the cloth, and hold it in a spiral form. 3dly. In separating the opposite arms gradually, by the means of a screw, and thus gradually extending the silk. 4thly. In the use of side bars to sustain the screw, and prevent it from turning with the machine, when it was not wished. It appeared in evidence, that reels with four arms had been used before the granting of the patent, with tenter hooks (instead of pins) to wind the silk on in a square spiral. And the use of a screw, for the purpose of gradually separating the opposite arms, was described in a book printed in London, in the year 1789, entitled the "Art of Dying Cotton and Linen Thread; together with the Method of Stamping Silk, Cottons," &c. p. 501.—"Square vats are therefore constructed, about six feet deep, and three and a half wide, and about three feet in the ground, for the conveniency of the dyer. The cloth is then fixed by the selvages to two wooden frames, each composed of four bars, and of such a length, as to be easily moved backward and forward in the vat. These frames are held together by means of a screw, so as to be easily let out or taken in, according to the breadth of the cloth. The cloth is supported by little iron

[2] Specification. The reel is designed to extend the silk, when immersed in the dye-stuff, so that this may pass freely and come in contact with the whole surface of the silk or material to be dyed, and yet the silk, or material, shall occupy the smallest possible or convenient space in the dye-tub. This machine consists of two sets of arms, each resembling in form the hub and spokes of a wheel, without the rim or fellies. In the hub of one is formed a female screw; in the other, a smooth cylindrical hole, in which one end of the axle may freely turn. The axle consists of a male screw, except that one end thereof is turned smooth to adjust to the hole of the hub that is smooth, and the other end is for an inch or two square, to receive the eye of a winch or crank. It is about three or five feet long. The male screw of the axle is cut, to fit the female screw in the hub, having the same therein. The two sets of arms are besides connected with each other by two square bars of wood or metallic substance like the axle. One end of each is securely fixed to the hub having the smooth hole, and the other ends are adjusted to square holes made in the other hub, through which they slip or pass as the hubs or set of arms are made to approach each other, and thus prevent the hubs from turning, as the screw axle is turned round for the purpose of approximating or withdrawing the sets of arms, to or from each other. Thus it is easy to perceive, that with one set of arms held on to the smooth cylindrical end of the axle, by a pin and washer or otherwise, so that the axle may freely turn therein, or in the hub thereof; the other set of arms, having the female screw, will be made to approximate to or recede from this, as the screw axle may be turned to or from, by a handle or winch affixed to the square end of the axle. The utility of this movement will presently appear. The hub of the sets of arms may be made of any convenient size. The dimensions adopted in practice at present are as follows:—The material any metal or metallic composition. The last, however, has been adopted in practice. The hub is about five inches in diameter, and two inches through; is morticed to receive the arms, which are flat square about sixteen inches long, but tapering from the hub to the end; and upon the sides of these arms or spokes are secured small brass pins, which are so set in grooves, cut into the sides of these arms transversely and diagonally, that the pins point inward and upwards, and divergently from the axle. The distance between these pins is quite small, about three-sixteenths of an inch. The mode of applying the silk and immersing the same, is as follows:—Both sets of arms, being placed on the axle as above represented, the machine is supported by the axle on two standards outside of the arms horizontally. The set with the female screw is then approximated by turning the winch to a distance from the other, a little less than the width of the material to be dyed. One end of the silk is then attached by the operator to opposite arms upon the pins therein nearest to the axle, and then the operator turning the machine a little for himself, the silk is further attached to the next arms by the pins nearest to the axle, and so on successively till the whole is attached and wound round upon the machine in a spiral hooks, passed through the selvage at the opposite sides, to keep it as it were in folds throughout the piece. The whole thus arranged is suspended with a pulley over the vat, by means of cords fixed to each corner of the frame, and uniting in the middle, so that by slackening the pulley, the linen is dipped without being rumpled. When necessary to air and ungreen, by drawing the pulley the frame rises, and the cloth drains into the vat."

The witnesses at the trial gave different opinions as to the exact form of the machine, which was intended in this description; and all seemed to think it somewhat ambiguous. But the fact, that the screw was to be used, as in the plaintiff's reel, was agreed on all sides. The reels, in fact, used by the plaintiffs had eight arms. The reels used by the defendants had ten arms. Instead of pins, the defendants used on their reels staples, with a short barb to catch the silk in the first instance; and the silk was then secured on the reels by a rod running through the selvage, and through the holes in the staples. Instead of a screw, the defendants used a rack and pinion (which, it was admitted on all sides, was a different mechanical power) to separate the opposite arms after the silk was on the reel. In the spiral winding of the silk, the reels of the plaintiffs and the defendants were alike. Some of the witnesses were of opinion, that the reels were alike in what they called principle; others were of an opposite opinion. All of them, however, agreed as to the specific agreements and differences between them. It farther appeared in evidence, that in the year 1809, the plaintiffs severally obtained patents from the department of state for the same invention, each of them then claiming and swearing, that he was the sole inventor; and neither of these patents had ever been repealed. Stearns v. Barrett, [Case No. 13,337.]

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiffs.

And a motion for a new trial was made by Gallison and Prescott, for defendants, upon the following grounds:

1st. Because if the patent, which is declared upon in this action, be construed as a patent for the entire machine, called a reel, described in the specification, then the same includes parts, which at the trial were proved, and in the said specification are admitted to have existed, in combination in a machine for similar purposes, long before the supposed invention of the plaintiffs, to wit, in the reel composed of four arms, or two cross pieces, on which it was admitted, that the cloth was wound in a square spiral, which reel is described in said specification as before in use; and the judge, who charged the jury at the trial of said issue, did direct them, that merely increasing the number of arms was not an invention, that would in law entitle the plaintiffs to a patent, no certain number of arms being claimed in said specification; and did also direct them, that as it respected this patent, if the former square reel was believed to have been in use form. Then turning the screw axle by the winch, the set of arms having the female screw therein, recedes by a regular motion susceptible of the most accurate adjustment to the width of the silk; and thus it is held perfectly extended between the arms and by the selvages, in such a manner as not to be in contact with itself, but to leave free passage for the dye-stuff to apply itself equally to every part of the whole surface; and in this state of tension it is immersed by operation of a tackle and fall attached to one end of the axle until it is properly saturated or dyed.

---

It is obvious, that the silk by this means may be most conveniently rinced, and most readily drained. Also it is apparent, that the position of the pins on the arms, they inclining upwards and bending a little from the operator, as he applies the silk, must facilitate both the application of the material for dying, and the disengagement thereof after this operation is performed.

There has been, it is said, a reel heretofore in use for like purpose; but this, if it ever were so used, consisted of four arms or two cross pieces, adjusted to a square axle, and the set of arms were kept separate or fixed upon the axle, not by a screw, but by pins passing through holes in said axle. Instead of pins affixed to the arms, there were common tenter hooks driven into the inner side of the arms, and the whole so constructed as to be utterly inapplicable to the purpose of dying silk or other goods, without great injury. The machine for which these applicants claim a patent, is, in all material respects, an improvement upon this.

The design of the silk frame is to extend the silk for drying and finishing; and it is contemplated to use it for all kinds of goods, which, in the operation of dying, require to be so extended.

It is a wooden frame, consisting of fourteen posts, about four feet or more in height, connected by rails in such a manner, as to be perfectly solid and firm. The opposite posts are connected by two strong rails of about eight feet in length, one at the bottom, and one within a few inches of the top, well morticed and tenanted into the posts; while two strong pieces of plank lying upon the bottom connecting rail, leaving a space of about two feet more or less between them, one firmly secured to these said bottom rails. A strong rail is fastened to the posts throughout the whole length of the frame, and thus gives it all the requisite solidity and firmness. Upon the upper rail connecting the opposite posts, which are placed at a distance of ten feet from post to post along the length of the frame, are lain two pieces of plank sixty feet long, and about eight or ten inches wide. These are made to move or slide in these upper rails, so that when the silk is attached to their inner edges, they may be withdrawn from each other, till the requisite degree of tension is obtained.

The mode, in which the silk is attached to the edges of these cheeks, and then the cheeks withdrawn, is as follows:—The inner edges of the cheeks are covered by a thin plate of copper, about half an inch wide, nicely attached thereto. Sixty pieces of wood, cut from board or plank, say, from an inch to an inch and a half, or two inches thick, about a foot long on one side, and cut up in a triangular form, are adjusted to each cheek. The base being, as above, one foot in length, it is attached by hinges to the superior surface of the cheeks, in such manner, that the edge of the base will coincide exactly with the inner edge of the cheek, before the invention claimed in this patent, the defendants had a right to use the reel-head, resembling the hub and spokes of a wheel, and also the spiral form of winding the cloth; and that the said patent, if it extended to the whole machine, and went to secure the exclusive right to every part thereof, as the invention of the plaintiffs, was broader than their invention, and therefore void. And therefore the said jury, upon this construction of the patent, in returning their said verdict, must either have found, that the said square reel did not so exist, which is against the admission of the specification, and the admissions and evidence of the plaintiffs at the trial; or, admitting the above fact, they must have gone upon the supposition, that notwithstanding such prior use, the same might be secured by patent to the plaintiffs; and that their said patent was not thereby rendered void; in which case their said verdict is against the direction of the judge in the matter of law.

2dly. Because, if the said patent be construed as a patent for an improved machine, or for a certain combination, consisting of the machine known and used before, as set forth in the specification, and of certain improvements added thereto by the plaintiffs, then the right of the plaintiffs under their said patent, must be confined to that precise combination; and it was necessary, in order to support the plaintiffs' case, and the judge, who tried the cause, did so direct the jury, that the machine used by the defendants should, in all material and essential respects, be like the machine described in the plaintiffs' specification; otherwise the combinations would not be identically the same, and therefore there would be no infringement; and that, if the rack and pinion was an essentially different mechanical power from the screw, then there appeared a substantial difference between the two machines, which destroyed their identity; and therefore, inasmuch as it was evident on inspection, that the rack and pinion was employed in the defendants' machine to produce the same effect, for which the screw is employed in the plaintiffs' machine, and it was also proved by divers witnesses on both sides, and was not contradicted, that the rack and pinion is a mechanical power essentially different from the screw, the said jury must have returned their verdict in this particular, either against the evidence or against the direction of the judge, in the matter of law.

3dly. Because, at the said trial, it was clearly proved by the testimony of Allan Pollock, by the admission of the plaintiffs and by a public work, that hooks of different form and sizes, and of different degrees of finish and fineness, according to the nature of the cloth, had been used for the purpose of extending cloth upon frames, many years before the pretended invention of the plaintiffs; and this evidence was not contradicted by any other evidence in the cause. And it was also proved by the said public work, and by witnesses produced, both by plaintiffs and defendants, to show the meaning of the description contained in the said public work, when the piece rests on its base. On this too there is a copper edging, and thus, this copper edging, when these pieces are raised upon their basis, comes closely in contact with the copper edges along the line of the inner edges of the cheeks, and by firm pressure are made to hold the selvages of the silk, &c. To the outer side of these pieces, which are called lap-joints, are attached some iron stays, about six or eight inches long, being a little longer than the lap-joints are wide or high. These stays are attached by a staple, or eye, to the upper part of the lap-joints, and the foot of each is made to slide into a groove, cut in the superior surface of the cheek, and lined with copper, so that by forcing the foot of the stay into the groove, the lap-joint is made to press firmly upon the selvage of the silk, when lain upon the copper edge of the cheek. The silk is first secured by one selvage to one cheek; then the other cheek being approximated sufficiently, the operator in like manner applies the selvage to the other cheek edge, and secures it by successively raising up and securing the lap-joints. The former cheek is fastened to the upper rail by strong iron pins passing through this and the said connecting rails of opposite posts. The other cheek, which is called the front cheek, is then gradually withdrawn till the silk is perfectly extended. The mode of withdrawing the front cheek is thus: To this cheek opposite to each post, all of which, on this side, rise two feet above the cheeks, are attached several pieces of iron, long enough to pass through the posts, on which pieces of iron are cut screw threads, so that nuts, being set in wheels and applied to said pieces of iron, by the turning of all the wheels simultaneously and with equal velocity, the whole front cheek is gradually withdrawn till the proper degree of tension in the silk is obtained. These wheels are put in motion by a chain band carefully adjusted, so that the links thereof embrace projections in the periphery, and the power is applied indifferently to either wheel, by a pin six or eight inches long thereto attached, to serve as a handle or winch.

---

There may be other modes of withdrawing the front cheek, but the special subject of patent, for which letters are claimed, is the mode of securing the silk as above described by lap-joints, and the gradual and exact tension obtained by the withdrawing of the whole front cheek simultaneously and equally at one operation as aforesaid. In these and in all material respects, this frame is an improvement upon the pin frame formerly in use, and also a frame, that was constructed to hold the selvages by pieces of board lain flat upon the cheeks, and pressed by wooden screws attaching them to the cheeks. The copper edges being a very considerable improvement on this last mentioned frame, which had become useless by reason of the absorption of the dye-stuffs in the wooden edges of the cheeks, and slabs or boards above mentioned.

The silk being thus extended, the ends thereof are secured by a cross bar set with pins, or by a piece of wood split so as to hold the ends, and the whole is ready for the operation of drying and finishing, which is done thus: Upon the pieces of plank, which are described as fastened upon the lower cross rails, that connect opposite posts, is placed a moveable car running on four wheels, which is made to contain coals and move at pleasure beneath the silk, as the operator proceeds in the finishing. This being accomplished, the silk is delivered from the lap-joints by removing or sliding away the stays, and may be immediately folded for use.

and was not contradicted by any other evidence in the cause, that many years before the said supposed invention of the plaintiffs, the screw axis was known, and had been used and applied for the purpose of moving one frame from or towards another, according to the width of cloth attached to said frames to be dyed. And it also appeared, and was admitted by the said plaintiffs in their specification, that before their said supposed discovery, a reel was in use for like purpose, consisting of four arms or two cross-pieces; and it also appeared and was admitted, that on such reel the cloth was wound in a square spiral, by means of tenter-hooks set upon the arms; and there were no other improvements claimed to have been made in any essential parts upon the said square reel, admitted by the said specification to have been before in use, excepting only the increasing of the number of arms, (which the said judge directed the jury was not an invention, that would in law entitle the party to a patent, no certain number being set out in said specification; and as to which, it appeared from inspection of the machine used by the defendants, that it consisted of eight arms only, while the machine produced by the plaintiffs consisted of ten,) the using of finished curved hooks, placed diagonally in the sides of the arms instead of tenter-hooks formerly in use, and the aforesaid application of the screws. And the said judge directed the jury upon these facts, that if any or all of these improvements had been used by the defendants, yet if none of the same was new in its principle or mode of application, the plaintiffs could not, in point of law, support their action for such use; and therefore the said verdict, in this respect, is either against the evidence, or against the direction of the judge in the matter of law.

4thly. Because it appeared in evidence as aforesaid, and was not contradicted by any testimony, that the screw had been applied for stretching cloth between two frames, in the same manner as in the plaintiffs' machine, long before the supposed discovery of the plaintiffs; and the said judge directed the jury, that, taking this fact to be true, if the said patent was construed as a patent for the improvements made in said square reel by the plaintiffs, then the said patent included, what was not invented by the plaintiffs, to wit, the said application of the screw, and, therefore, upon this construction of the patent, the said verdict is against the evidence, or against the direction of the judge in the matter of law.

5thly. Because at the said trial it was proved by an inspection of the machines, that the power, which moved the moveable frame or reel-head in one was a screw, and in the other a rack and pinion; and it was also testified, and was not contradicted, that these are essentially different mechanical powers. And it also appeared, by inspection of said machines, and from divers witnesses, whose testimony was not contradicted, that the cloth upon the defendants' machine is secured to the arms by rods passing through staples, and through the selvages of the cloth; and that the purpose and design of certain small barbs, cut upon said staples, is merely to hold the cloth until the rods are pushed through; and it also appeared, that said staples and barbs resembled more the tenter-hooks admitted to have been long in common use, than the hooks or pinion of the plaintiffs' machine; and it also appeared, that in the plaintiffs' machine the cloth is attached and secured by means of curved hooks, or pins passing through the selvages, and holding the cloth through the whole operation of dying; and it also appeared, that these two parts of the machine were the only essential parts, which had been improved by the plaintiffs, no other improvement being set out in their specification. Wherefore the said verdict is against the weight of evidence and also against law, in finding the said defendants guilty of an infringement of the plaintiffs' rights.

6thly. Because the said judge, in charging the jury, did direct them, for the purposes of this trial, that the existence of two prior patents for the same thing, granted to the same patentees respectively, although both of said patents be still in force, did not affect the validity of the patent declared on. And did also direct them, for the purposes of this trial, that the oaths of said plaintiffs respectively made when they obtained the said prior patents, that they severally believed themselves to be true and original inventors of said machine, did not conclude them to show a joint invention of the same machine, and to claim as joint patentees therefor, both which directions the said defendants respectfully submit are incorrect in point of law.

7thly. Because the said jury, upon the whole weight of evidence produced at the trial, and upon the matters of law, in which they were instructed by the judge, ought to have returned their verdict, that the defendants were not guilty; yet, against the said weight of evidence, and against the said directions in matters of law, they have returned their said verdict, that the said defendants are guilty.

G. Sullivan, for plaintiffs, argued e contra.

Our statute differs materially from the statute of James. Under the statute of James the inventor applies for, and obtains a patent, in which is contained a description, comprehending his whole invention. But a proviso is inserted in the patent, requiring the inventor to file in chancery a specific and minute statement of what he claims as his invention. This specification is matter of record in chancery; and whether this describes less than is contained in the patent, may well be considered, in many cases, as mere matter of law. Hence it happens that the question, whether the patent is broader than the invention, is sometimes in England decided by the court. So also, under the statute of James, the court determines what is principle, or that character, which essentially constitutes the difference or identity of machines. But in both these particulars, the patent law of the United States makes express provision. In respect to the principle of a machine, the statute expressly defines principle or character to be that thing, what ever it may be, whether it be found in structure or operation, or modes of operation, whereby the alleged invention may be distinguished from all others. Hence the courts of the United States are not required to define principle. Nay, they have no power to direct the jury, that this, or that, or other structure, constitutes the character of a machine, whereby it is distinguished from all other inventions. The judges, as I apprehend the law, must admit all evidence offered by either party, from witnesses acquainted with the particular art or machinery in question, whereby the true character or distinguishing principle of the machinery may be proved. And then they are to put it to the jury as a mere matter of fact, to determine upon evidence, what constitutes the distinguishing principle of the machines in question before them, and whether that distinguishing principle, be it in structure, operation, or mode of operation, do or not exist in both machines, so as to constitute them essentially the same or different. If this were not so, the judges would draw to themselves the decision of matters of fact; for surely the question, what it is that constitutes the distinctive character of a machine, whereby it is distinguished from all others, is plainly matter of fact; and it cannot be disputed, that whether this same principle do or not exist in the plaintiffs' and defendants' machines, is also mere matter of fact. So, whether the patentee have invented any thing that is new and useful, is merely a question of fact; for otherwise the court must determine, what has existed before; for what has existed before must be shown in evidence, or the court must be presumed, nay required to know; and surely what has existed, is, beyond all controversy, matter of fact. Suppose the defendants insist, that the patent is claimed for a bare philosophical principle. This in like manner must be referred to the jury, unless mechanical philosophy be law, and as such be presumed to exist in the breast of the court. So if there be a question, whether the description specified be sufficient to enable artists to manufacture the machine, the sufficiency or insufficiency is matter of fact to be given in evidence by artists, or the court must assume to itself a paramount knowledge of all arts and manufactures, and in doing so, assume the decision of mere matter of fact. Nay, as I apprehend the law, if there be evidence on both sides, the court have not the power to determine on which side the weight of evidence appears, this being exclusively within the province of the jury; and the court have no power in such a case to set aside a verdict, merely because they think the verdict is against the weight of evidence. So also if there be a patent for an improvement in a patented invention, and the question arise under the second section of the patent law, whether the alleged improvement be simply a change in the form or proportions of a machine, this is clearly a question of fact to the jury. In like manner, all the questions arising under the sixth section, whether the specification do or not contain the whole truth relative to the discovery; whether it contains more or less than is necessary to produce the described effect, and so made for the purpose of deceiving the public; whether the thing described in the patent was or not originally discovered by the patentee, or had been in use before; whether the invention had been described in some public work, anterior to the supposed discovery of the patentee; all these are mere questions of fact, and such the statute expressly makes them, when it denominates the subject of these questions special matter, and provides that it may be given in evidence, if notice thereof be filed thirty days before the trial. Thus it appears, that whatever may be the practice of the English courts under the statute of James, in relation to the extent of the patent beyond the invention, it is clearly matter of fact here, whether the patent contain more than the invention, that is, in the English technical phraseology, whether the patent be or not broader than the invention. And this brings us to the other point of difference, between our act of congress and the statute of James, which respects the power of the court to decide, if the patent is broader than the invention. And here it is only necessary to remark summarily after what is said above, that if the decision of the question is drawn to the court in England, it is merely a question of fact in this country, and as such to be determined by a jury upon evidence.

In this place it may be pertinent to consider, what evidence is to be received, touching the difference or identity of machines. Certainly it is not to be expected, that the court should be informed upon all the principles of mechanics, nor, if they were, is it to be allowed, that their direction to the jury on these matters of fact can be regarded as more imperative than in other cases of fact. If there be a question of seaworthiness of a ship, the court may well lay down the rule, that the vessel must be capable of performing the voyage insured. But after it is proved the vessel was defective in certain of her timbers, it surely is competent to both parties to adduce evidence to show, that these defects do or not render the ship incapable of performing the voyage. And whatever may be the private opinion of the court, they must submit the question to the determination of the jury, upon the evidence produced. So in questions of deviation, and many others of the like kind.

Now in the case before the court, the question of the identity of the machines was a mere matter of fact. It was testified, that they had the same character, and were in principle the same. There was evidence to this point on both sides, and the jury found their identity. They were in fact the same. The substitution of the rack and pinion, it will appear, when the nature of mechanical powers is considered, makes no difference. What are mechanical powers? They are only the means of augmenting the force applied, and this is uniformly done in the inverse ratio of the velocity of that force. These powers are common to the whole mechanical world, and no patent can be obtained for the application of them as powers. But the patent goes for that new and useful structure of constituent parts, whereby the powers being applied, certain new and useful effects are produced. Now what was this structure of essential constituent parts in the machines before the court? It was the moveable set of arms sliding on the two square bars, passing through the hub of said moving set of arms, whereon this was made to traverse by means of a mechanical power applied. It was obvious to any mechanical mind, and so Col. Baldwin testified, that the screw, or the rack and pinion might be indifferently applied to the same structure. Indeed, the lever, the pulley and weight, and other powers, might be also applied to the same structure or constituent parts of the machinery. All these powers would subserve the same purpose, and by precisely the same means, that is, by augmenting the force in the inverse ratio of the velocity with which the force moved, and of course regulating the force by a gradual movement. Indeed, there can be no better test on earth of the identity of machines, than that their structure is such, that different powers may be indifferently applied to precisely the same constituent parts, and the operations of those parts, and the effects produced by the application of one or the other power be the same. At all events, whether the substitution of one power, instead of another, do or not constitute a difference, must be a question for the jury, which they are to determine upon the evidence of intelligent mechanicians. To test this yet farther, let it be supposed, that the defendant had applied for and obtained a patent as for an improvement on the plaintiff's machine, and had specified the substitution of the rack and pinion, it is clear, that in an action by the defendants against a party for an infringement, it would be competent for such party to raise the question, whether the application of the rack and pinion were any thing more than a simple change of form. From evidence disclosed in this case, it might be made to appear, that there was no difference in the effect, and no difference in the structure of the constituent essential parts of the machine, whereby the operation of stretching the silk is obtained. It would also appear that the force applied to give motion to the moving set of arms is augmented and graduated in the same ratio, and quoad these machines, if Col. Baldwin and others are believed, is the same. At all events, whether it were so or not, would be a question of fact to the jury; and if they were of opinion, that the substitution of the rack and pinion was simply a change in form, the defendants in such case could not hold their patent, because the statute says, simply changing the form shall not be deemed a discovery. Again, if on the contrary the application of a rack and pinion were not found to be simply a change in form, but an improvement, and this were the improvement specified, the defendants could not use the constituent parts of the machine, because the statute, second section, expressly enacts, that the patentee of the improvement shall not be at liberty to use the original discovery; and surely, if the defendants could not use the discovery of the plaintiffs, if the defendants were patentees of the application of the rack as an improvement, a fortiori they could not use the plaintiff's discovery now, that they are not patentees of an improvement. Here the defendants may contend, that the plaintiffs have not specified their original discovery, so that the same may be distinguished from what was known before; and whether they have or not, is next to be considered. Now the plaintiffs, in their specification, first describe the whole reel as used by them, and a machine in magnitude was produced. No objection was taken at the trial, as to the sufficiency of this description. It was fully admitted, that the whole machine, such as it appeared, was clearly described. Then the plaintiffs describe another reel, consisting of four arms and a square axle, through which axle some holes being made at certain distances, the moving set of arms could be secured at the requisite distance, according to the width of the material wound upon the reel. This also was so clearly and distinctly described, that the defendants therefrom constructed in model a reel, conforming exactly to the description. Whereupon the plaintiffs, in their specifications say, that the new reel is, in all material respects, an improvement upon the old reel, and for these material improvements they claim their patent. Now, whether there are any such material improvements was matter of fact to the jury, and what these improvements were, was also matter of fact. Nothing could be plainer, than that a material difference existed, both in the effect produced, and in the mode of operation to produce that effect. The jury were satisfied, both as to the difference of the new from the old, and that this difference made the new better than the old; and what is improvement, but being different and better? But, said the defendants, the patentees ought to have designated, in precise terms, the particular parts which constituted the difference. The answer to this doctrine is found in the statute. The inventor, says the third section, shall fully explain the principles and character by which the machine may be distinguished from other inventions. Now the new machine was fully described, so that artists could make one from the specification. The old machine was described, so that artists could make one like that from the description; and it was manifest on inspection and from the evidence, that they were in character materially different. Certainty, to a common intent alone, is required. No precise or technical language is necessary. The public derive all the benefit, that the patent law contemplated securing to the public, and the patentee has secured to him no more than his invention. The jury found it so; and surely the court cannot otherwise decide, without assuming the determination of matters of fact. In the case of Harmar v. Playne, 11 East, 101, it was held, that a description of the old and description of the new machine in the same patent, although the description of the old was merely by recital of the former patent, was description enough of the improvement for which the patent was obtained. In the case of Boulton v. Bull, [2 H. Bl. 463,] it was held, that the description was sufficient, although no precise form or proportion of the condenser was described, nor its relative position to the cylinder named, nor the means of communication between the cylinder and condenser distinctly mentioned. It is enough, said the court, if an artist can produce the designed effect from the description contained in the specification. It cannot be, that inventors are required to describe pin for pin, screw for screw, and all the numerous unpatentable differences, that must exist in every machine, however new, in common with other machines. There are shades of difference in machines, which result from their original character, and like the shades of difference in the social and professional habits of men, which depend on their predominant passions or qualities, are seen and understood, but yet are without a name, nor is it in the power of language to describe them.

It is enough for the public, if artists can see and understand these distinctive or essential qualities of the machine from the specification. It is enough for the parties at a trial, if the jury perceive and comprehend them, and find them, in their opinion, sufficiently described in the patent or specification.

It comes next in course to consider the novel doctrine assumed by the defendants, that the plaintiffs must be considered as claiming a patent for the combination, such as it was exemplified in their machine, or else they must be considered as limited to special improvements, and these they must designate. Having already considered the latter alternative, I proceed to consider the former. In the first place, there is not a word of combination in the plaintiffs' patent, nor would this be necessary to secure their invention, if this were in fact only a combination of such parts as, properly speaking, in relation to mechanics could be combined; for the inventors are entitled to their patent, if they fully explain their invention, and the principle and character thereof, so as to distinguish it from all others known or used before; and surely this might be done in Evans' Case, [Evans v. Eaton, Case No. 4,559,] without using the word combination. But what is combination, and what parts may be combined? Is driving a nail, or turning a screw into a piece of wood a combination? Is putting arms or spokes to a hub—is putting two wheels to an axis, a combination? It is obvious enough, what combination is not. Nor is it less plain, what it is. The connexion of several distinct machines together, like Evans's mill, so as to be operated upon by one power, giving co-operative motion to all, is clearly a combination. There each machine has its characteristic, constituent parts —a being, a life of its own; but the connexion of a thousand dead parts in one machine, having but one single simple operation, can never be considered a combination.[3] A watch is a combination; for the main-spring is one power, and puts the whole machine into operation, but the hair-spring is a power that regulates this motion. Here, then, are two distinct operations. So in the card machine of Whittemore, there is a combination of parts, each performing a distinct operation, and the whole acted upon and regulated by numerous powers. But in the plaintiffs' reel there is but one power, and one single simple operation, that of moving the traversing set of arms; and it is said, "that some machines are so simple, that they cannot be considered as combinations." The reel, therefore, of the plaintiffs cannot be regarded as a combination. But if it were, and the only alleged difference were the use of the rack and pinion instead of the screw, the question of difference is for the jury; and they are to decide, "whether, on the whole, there is any substantial difference between the machines, or whether they are substantially the same. Slight or colorable differences will not protect the defendants in their infringement, or defeat the right of the patentee;" and this brings us back to the general question of identity, which lies exclusively within the province of the jury; for infringement or not, of course identity or not, says Judge Rooke, is for the jury to decide.

I have now considered the several questions made at the trial, and have shown, as it is believed, that the questions, whether the plaintiffs jointly invented the reel, whether the patent is broader than the invention, and whether the improvement, as such, is sufficiently described for all the purposes of the patent law, are all purely questions of fact. And I have also shown, as it is believed, and the doctrine of combination does not apply to the plaintiffs' reel; but whether it does or not, that the question of the identity of the defendants' and plaintiffs' machine is still the same, and is merely a question of fact.

[3] [See Ex parte Berry, Case No. 1,353.]

In presenting this view of the subject, it will be perceived, that I have directly encountered all the objections taken in the defendants' motion, which are comprised in the first five causes assigned for a new trial. The first five causes are so involved with each other, that an attempt to give a special reply to each, would have left the whole subject in confusion. They altogether amount to this merely, that the plaintiffs have invented nothing; that if they have, their invention is not sufficiently described and distinguished in the specification; but if it is sufficiently described, the defendants have not used the plaintiffs' invention. All this is matter of fact, and as such, was properly submitted to the jury; and on all these points the evidence was either full for the plaintiffs, and uncontradicted, or else there was evidence on both sides; whence it follows, that the verdict for either of said five causes, or for the last, cannot be set aside as being against evidence.

As to the sixth cause, that the judge misdirected the jury touching the validity of the plaintiffs' joint patent, to wit, that it was valid, although patents for the same invention had been issued, in 1809, to each of the plaintiffs, as sole inventor of the same, and for aught that appeared, both the patents were in force when the action on the joint patent was commenced. The counsel for the plaintiffs is satisfied on authorities, that this direction was unexceptionable and correct. This is a new question in court, although a practice in the patent office has doubtless given many occasions of its being raised. But as this is not a point mainly in controversy now, I shall content myself with stating a few points of law, and citing the authorities, that support them.

It is a natural right, which every patentee hath, to surrender his invention, if the acceptance of it imposed no condition, which remained unperformed. In England a patentee may surrender his patent into chancery, (see Dyer's Case, 1 Dyer, 179, and notes,) and when the surrender is enrolled a vacatur is entered of course. This is by order of chancery according to ancient practice. But the circuit court of the United States has no cognizance in chancery of patents, nor has the law designated any mode, whereby a patentee may surrender his patent. In favor, therefore, of common rights, a court of common law will presume a surrender, wherever it is for the interest of a patentee, that he shall be considered as having surrendered. But the subsequent acceptance of a patent, which is incompatible with a former one, is in law an implied surrender of the former. The patents of 1809 are already inconsistent with the patent of 1818. Nay, the plaintiffs by their subsequent oath of joint invention, have utterly defeated all title under their precedent patents, independently of the surrender implied by the acceptance of the last patent.

Touching the plaintiffs' oaths as to their respective exclusive invention, it was regarded as clearly a matter of mistake, into which joint inventors might naturally fall when ignorant, as they each were, of the extent of the other's design and contrivance. In conclusion it is proper to observe, that this motion for a new trial is an application to the sound discretion of the court for an equitable interposition of its powers. To what equitable consideration are these defendants entitled? Were they not the clerk and apprentice of the plaintiff, Barrett? Did they not learn of him the use of the machines in question? Did they not employ a workman of his to take the measurement of his machines, and then, from the very outset, engage him in a suite of contrivances, to approximate to the plaintiffs' machines, and yet to save the appearance of invasion of their rights, while in fact the original design of the defendants was unquestionably, by slight and colorable differences, to conceal the infringement they consciously intended. Surely it must be admitted on all hands, that the plaintiffs have invented a most valuable method of extending the silk for dying; and if a jury of the country, selected from that public, for whose benefit the patent is granted, are in truth satisfied on all the material points, it cannot be justice to perplex and harass the plaintiffs with the necessity of further suit to obtain enjoyment of their just right and privilege. Besides, it must be remembered, that patents in England receive a strict construction, because they are there considered as being in derogation of common right. Whereas, in the United States, they are more justly regarded as bounties upon the productions of genius, and as means of great and extensive benefit to the public. As such, they ought here to receive the most liberal construction; and no patent should be held void, if it in fact fulfil the ultimate design of the patent law; if it furnish in the specification a description essentially certain, to enable the public to avail itself of the invention after the patent term shall have expired. This is the object of the law; and to this, as the great end of all its provisions, ought the attention of the judiciary and juries to be directed.

STORY, Circuit Justice. This case has been argued for the plaintiffs, as fully and as ingeniously as its merits will allow, upon the same principles and reasonings, which were pressed upon the court at the trial. If they have failed to convince the understanding of the court, it is because in some instances the premises, and in others, the conclusions are radically unsound and inadmissible. I pass over all the learned lecture, as to what constitutes matter of fact and what of law, and what are the relative rights of courts and juries as to matters of fact, because no novelty and no instruction can attach themselves to the discussion. The whole doctrine lies in the elements of the common law, undisputed and indisputable. As little do I think it necessary to discuss the question, what constitutes the identity or diversity of machines in the abstract; or to philosophize respecting the different mechanical powers. My humble knowledge does not permit me to venture on such difficult topics, and fortunately my duties as a judge do not require me to master them. I am content on these, as on other occasions, to learn from those, who can give the proper instruction, and then to apply it to the solution of such questions of law, as are fit to be entertained here. To be sure, I must continue to believe, until better instructed, that the different mechanical powers are not one and the same power; and that a motion, which is communicated by a screw is not communicated in the same way as that by a lever, a wheel, a wedge, or a pulley. As to the opinion of skilful witnesses, whether the principles of two machines are the same, no person doubts, that it is competent evidence to be introduced into a patent cause. But care should be taken to distinguish, what is meant by a principle. In the minds of some men, a principle means an elementary truth, or power; so that in the view of such men, all machines, which perform their appropriate functions by motion, in whatever way produced, are alike in principle, since motion is the element employed. No one, however, in the least acquainted with law, would for a moment contend, that a principle in this sense is the subject of a patent; and if it were otherwise, it would put an end to all patents for all machines, which employed motion, for this has been known as a principle, or elementary power, from the beginning of time. The true legal meaning of the principle of a machine, with reference to the patent act, is the peculiar structure or constituent parts of such machine. And in this view the question may be very properly asked, in cases of doubt or complexity, of skilful persons, whether the principles of two machines be the same or different. Now, the principles of two machines may be the same, although the form or proportions may be different. They may substantially employ the same power in the same way, though the external mechanism be apparently different. On the other hand, the principles of two machines may be very different, although their external structure may have great similarity in many respects. It would be exceedingly difficult to contend, that a machine, which raised water by a lever, was the same in principle with a machine, which raised it by a screw, a pulley, or a wedge, whatever in other respects might be the similarity of the apparatus. But, although the testimony of witnesses be admissible to prove the identity or diversity of machines in principle, yet, after all, it is but matter of opinion; and its weight must be judged of by all the other circumstances of the case. It is infinitely more satisfactory to ascertain, if we can, the precise differences and agreements; and when these can be subjected to the eyes, they almost supersede all the evidence of mere opinion. In all my experience I can scarcely recollect a single instance, in which the general question, whether the principles of two machines were the same or different, has not produced from different witnesses, equally credible and equally intelligent, opposite answers. This could result only from the different meanings attached to the word, and from confounding its various senses. And this has been completely shown, when the same witnesses came to explain the precise agreements and differences, in which they have almost uniformly agreed. The case now before the court is a perfect proof in point. The witnesses differed as to the identity or diversity of the principles of the machines; but they were all agreed as to what were the precise differences and agreements in fact. There seemed then nothing left for the jury to decide, but whether these differences were substantial or formal; if substantial, then the machines were not alike; if formal only, then they were alike. And the question, whether the principles were the same in both machines, was in reality, when all the facts were given, rather a matter of law, than of the opinion of mechanics; at least matter of law was necessarily mixed up with it, which mechanics could not be presumed to be acquainted with.

The opinion, however, which I shall express, will not turn in any material respect upon any facts controverted at the trial. I shall discuss the motion for a new trial, so far as facts are concerned, upon the admissions and statements, which the plaintiffs did not and could not deny. The doctrine of patents may truly be said to constitute the metaphysics of the law. The difficulty lies, not so much in the general principles, as in the minute and subtle distinctions, which occasionally arise in the application of those principles. I will endeavour, however, to lay down some general rules, which appear to me to embrace the whole merits of the present controversy, and then apply those rules more pointedly to the facts of this case.

In the first place, a joint patent may well be granted upon a joint invention. There is no difficulty in supposing in point of fact, that a complicated invention may be the gradual result of the combined mental operations of two persons acting together, pari passu, in the invention. And if this be true, then as neither of them could justly claim to be the sole inventor in such a case, it must follow, that the invention is joint, and that they are jointly entitled to a patent. And so are the express words of the patent act,—Act Feb. 21, 1793, c. 11, § 1, [1 Stat. 318,] —which declares, that if any person or persons shall allege, that he or they have invented, &c. a patent shall be granted to him or them for the invention. In the next place, a joint patent cannot be sustained upon a sole invention of either of the patentees; for the patent act gives no right to a patent, except to the inventor; and requires an oath from the party, who claims a patent, that he is the true inventor. In the next place, a joint patent for an invention is utterly inconsistent with several patents for the same invention by the same patentees. For it is impossible, that any person can be, at the same time, the joint and sole inventor of the same invention. If, therefore, each of the joint patentees obtains a several patent for the same invention, as his own exclusive invention; and afterwards, without surrendering the first patent, they obtain a joint patent for the same as a joint invention, either the former sole patents are void, or the joint patent is void. For, besides the apparent inconsistency of the patents, if all could be sustained then a recovery upon the joint patent would be no bar to a suit upon the several patents; and the parties might obtain a double recompense for the same infringement. There is an additional reason, which deserves great consideration; and that is, that if several and joint patents could be sustained by the same parties for the same invention, they might be successively taken out, so that the term of the exclusive right might be prolonged for a great length of time, instead of being limited to fourteen years. I am therefore clearly of opinion, that a grant of a subsequent patent for an invention is an estoppel to the patentee to set up any prior grant for the same invention, which is inconsistent with the terms of the last grant. And I have very great doubts, whether, when a patent is once granted to any person for an invention, he can legally acquire any right under a subsequent patent for the same invention, unless his first patent be repealed for some original defect, so that it might truly be said to be a void patent.

In the next place if several patents are taken out by several patentees for a several invention, and the same patentees afterwards take out a joint patent for the same as a joint invention, the parties are not absolutely estopped by the former patents from asserting the invention to be joint; but the former patents are very strong evidence against the joint invention. The reason of this doctrine is, not that estoppels are odious in the law, but that a party may innocently mistake, as to the extent of his own claims. And though a several and joint invention, by the same persons of the same thing, cannot exist in fact; yet a party may suppose, that he has invented, what in truth has been partly suggested by another mind.

In the present case, each of the plaintiffs (Barrett and Stearns) obtained, in the year 1809, a several patent for the present invention, as his sole invention; and the patent, on which this action is brought, is a joint patent granted in 1818. In this view, the doctrine already stated directly applies in the case. It is the same, as was stated to the jury at the trial, and on the most mature reflection, I adhere to it.

In the next place, a patent may be for a new combination of machines to produce certain effects; and this, whether the machines, constituting the combination, be new or old. But in such case, the patent being for the combination only, it is no infringement of the patent to use any of the machines separately, if the whole combination be not used; for in such a case the thing patented is not the separate machines, but the combination; and the statute gives no remedy, except for a violation of the thing patented. This was the doctrine of Mr. Justice Washington in his most able opinion in Evans v. Eaton, [Case No. 4,559;] and it has not been in the slightest degree shaken in the supreme court. Evans v. Eaton, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 454, 476, 506. I hesitate not one moment in adopting it, as established on solid foundations. It has indeed been said, that where there is a patent for the whole of a machine, whoever imitates it, either in whole or in part, is subject to an action at the suit of the patentee. Bovill v. Moore, 2 Marsh. 211. But supposing this doctrine to be true in any case and under any qualifications, (which may well be doubted,) it can apply, where the whole machine is entirely new, and cannot apply, where the patent is limited, by its very terms, to the combination of several machines.

Further. A patent under the general patent act, cannot embrace various distinct improvements or inventions; but in such case the party must take out separate patents. If the patentee has invented certain improved machines, which are capable of a distinct operation; and also has invented a combination of those machines to produce a connected result, the same patent cannot at once be for the combination and for each of the improved machines; for the inventions are as distinct, as if the subjects were entirely different. A very significant doubt has been expressed on this subject by the supreme court; and I am persuaded, that the doubt can never be successfully removed. Evans v. Eaton, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 454, 506.

Further. If a patent be for an improved machine, or for an improvement of a machine,—for I follow Mr. Justice Heath (Boulton v. Bull, 2 H. Bl. 463, 482) and the supreme court (Evans v. Eaton, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 454) in thinking, that the meaning of the terms is substantially the same,—then the patent must state in what the improvement specifically consists; and it must be limited to such improvement. If, therefore, the terms be so obscure or doubtful that the court cannot say, what is the particular improvement which the patentee claims, and to what it is limited, the patent is void for ambiguity. Macfarlane v. Price, 1 Starkie, 199. And if it covers more than this improvement, it is void for another reason, that it is broader than the invention.

Further. Where a combination of machinery already exists up to a certain point; and the patentee makes an addition or improvement to the machinery; he must confine his patent to the improvement; for if he takes a patent for the whole machine as improved, not distinguishing between the new and old, nor limiting his patent to the improvement, it is void, because, as so claimed, it is not his invention. Bovill v. Moore, 2 Marsh. 211.

Further. If an invention consist in a new combination of machinery, or in improvements upon an old machine to produce an old effect; the patent should be for the combined machinery, or improvements on the old machine, and not for a mere mode or device for producing such effects, detached from the machinery. This appears to have been the doctrine of all the judges in Boulton v. Bull, 2 H. Bl. 463, and was illustrated by several of the cases there put. And in a recent case, where a patent was obtained for "an improved mode of lighting cities," it was held, that it was not supported by a specification describing an improved street lamp; and that the patent ought to have been for an improved street lamp. Cochrane v. Smethurst, 1 Starkie, 205. So, where the patent was for "a new invented manufacture of lace, called French, otherwise ground lace," and the specification went generally to the invention of mixing silk and cotton thread upon the frame; it being proved, that, prior to the patent, silk and cotton thread had been used together and intermixed upon the same frame, the court held the patent bad, since the plaintiff claimed the exclusive liberty of making lace, composed of silk and cotton thread mixed, and not of any particular mode of mixing it; and the evidence proved it had been mixed before. King v. Else, 11 East, 109, note. This doctrine may not be of as extensive consequence under our patent act, where the specification forms a part of the patent, and may control its generality, as it is in England, where the specification is separated from it. But it distinctly shows the necessity of an exact description so that the patent may conform to the invention.

Let us now apply these principles to the case at bar. The patent is "for a new and useful improvement, being a mode of dying and finishing all kinds of silk woven goods." If these terms alone were to be considered as descriptive of the subject matter of the patent, it would be open to the objection in Cochrane v. Smethurst, 1 Starkie, 205, for the specification shows no other mode of dying and finishing silks, than by the use of an improved reel and an improved silk frame; and the patent ought to be for these improvements. But as the specification forms a part of the patent, and controls the generality of the preceding terms, it is to be construed a patent for a mode of dying and finishing silk woven goods, by means of an improved reel and an improved silk frame. The patent then is, not for a mode of dying alone, but of dying and finishing silks; and this, by means of the use of both machines, so that it is a patent for the machines in combination, and not separately. If so, then the defendants may use either of the machines separately, without infringing the patent right; for the exclusive right of the combination only is secured to the plaintiffs. In this view, there is an end of the present suit; for it is admitted by the plaintiffs, that the defendants did not use the silk frame, and that the only infringement, for which they seek a recompense, is the use of the reel. But if the patent could be construed, as a patent for each of the machines severally, as well as in the combination, then it would be void; because two separate inventions cannot be patented in one patent. And the same objection would lie against it, if it were to be construed as a patent for each of the machines severally, and not in combination. If, however, all these difficulties could be surmounted, and the patent were to be construed as a patent for an improved reel and an improved frame separately, there remain other insuperable objections. There is no pretence, that the patent can be sustained for the whole reel, as a new invention, although some part of the language of the specification might lead to the conclusion, that the plaintiffs so intended to claim; for reels were in use before for the same purpose. And if it were otherwise, the plaintiffs could not recover; for the defendant does not use precisely the same machine; and if he did, the patent would be broader than the invention, and so void. The patent therefore must stand, if at all, as a patent for the improvements only upon the old reel. And what the improvements claimed by the plaintiffs are, must be decided exclusively by the terms of their specification. The words of the specification, after describing the improved reel, are:—"There has been, it is said, a reel heretofore in use for the like purposes; but this, if it ever were so used, consisted of four arms, or two cross pieces, adjusted to a square axle; and the set of arms were kept separate or fixed upon the axle, not by a screw, but by pins passing through holes in said axle. Instead of pins affixed to the arms, there were common tenter-hooks driven into the inner side of the arms, and the whole so constructed, as to be utterly inapplicable to the purposes of dying silk or other goods without great injury. The machine, for which the applicants claim a patent, is, in all material respects, an improvement upon this." This is the whole statement of the improvements in the reel, in the plaintiffs' specification. And assuming, that it is not utterly defective, from omitting to specify the particular improvements, for which the patent is claimed, (for a general statement, that the patented reel is in all material respects, without stating what these are, an improvement on the old reel, is no specification at all,) the plaintiffs have bound themselves to the improvements so specified, and cannot now claim beyond them. Rex v. Cutler, 1 Starkie, 354. Now, the plaintiffs have specified no particular number of arms to be used in their machine, as among their improvements, and therefore no particular number of arms is patented. The machine is stated by themselves to consist "of two sets of arms, each resembling in form the hub and spokes of a wheel, without the rim or fellies." There is, therefore, nothing new in this particular; and, in point of fact, the plaintiffs use eight arms and the defendants ten arms in their respective reels. The two principal improvements, actually specified, are the use of a screw, to separate gradually and keep apart the opposite arms of the reel, instead of a pin passing through a hole in the axle; and the use of oblique transverse pins to hold the selvages of the silk, instead of tenter hooks. Now, in point of fact, the defendant does not in his reel use the pins described in the specification, but staples with a small barb, which are at least as different in form and effect from the pins, as the pins are different from tenter hooks. And pins or hooks of all sizes and finish were proved at the trial to have been used for at least thirty years last past, for the same purpose. There is no pretence, that the staples and barbs used by the defendants are exactly in size, shape, and direction like the plaintiffs'. Then, as to the screw; it is a sufficient answer to the plaintiffs, that by their own showing the defendant never used the screw in his reels; but used a rack and pinion, which, it is agreed, is a different mechanical power. The only two improvements, therefore, which are specified, are not used by the defendant, either separately or in combination. How then is it possible to contend, that he has violated the plaintiffs' patent?

This is not all. The pin or hook used for this purpose is not a new invention. It has been long in use, and, as was proved at the trial, at least for thirty years. I do not say, that a pin or hook was used exactly of the same shape, dimensions, and oblique position, as that used by the plaintiffs. But it is to be considered, that the mere change of the form or proportions of any mechanical apparatus is not, by the express terms of the patent act, to be deemed a patentable invention. And as to the screw, its use for the very purpose proposed by the plaintiffs, is completely described in the work cited at the bar, printed in 1789. The words are, "these frames are held together by means of a screw, so as to be easily let out, or taken in, according to the breadth of the cloth." If, therefore, the patent could be considered as a patent for each of those improvements separately, it could not be sustained; for neither of them is new in substance. If, for the combined improvements, then, in the first place, the defendant has not used them; and, in the next place, the patent is broader than the invention; for, up to a certain point, the improvements existed before. The screw was in use for the same purpose, as early as 1789. But, if we could go beyond the patent and specification, and consider the patented improvements to be such improvements, as the plaintiffs now claim, it would not relieve the case from a single difficulty. The plaintiffs now claim in addition to the improvements already specified, 1st. The use of more arms than four to wind the silk in a spiral form. The silk was wound in a spiral form before; and surely it cannot be pretended, that the use of more than four arms on a reel or wheel was not known as well before as since the plaintiffs' invention. Besides; the plaintiffs have not specified any particular number of arms as their invention, and they never used but eight; and if such use constitute a separate invention, the defendant is at least as well entitled to claim the use of his ten as his own invention. If adding a given number of arms be an invention, adding a different number is not less an invention. 2dly. The plaintiffs claim the use of the side pieces to support and steady the screw during the operation. This is not, as I recollect, used by the defendants for the same purpose; nor, if used separately with the screw, is it any thing new. If, therefore, the whole improvements, as now claimed, were specified in the schedule, the plaintiffs could not legally support a patent for them separately; and if they are claimed in combination, then the defendants have not infringed upon that combination; and if they had, the plaintiffs could not recover, because the combination up to a certain point existed (as they have shown) before. So that to sustain their patent in point of law, the plaintiffs are driven to construe it to be for the combination, and then the evidence of infringement fails them; and to sustain their suit in point of fact, they are obliged to construe their patent to be for the improvements severally, and then they fail upon the clearest principles of law applied to the facts.

I have thus gone over the whole grounds of this cause, and in every possible view, in which I can contemplate the law or the facts of the case, the verdict is wrong. Under such circumstances, to suffer it to stand, would be a mockery of justice. It would be surrendering the whole rights of the community to the mistakes or prejudices of juries. The public ought to know, that if a jury should be misled by the ingenuity or zeal of counsel, there is a redeeming spirit in the law itself; and that no judge in these times can be weak or wicked enough to abandon, what his duty plainly and peremptorily enjoins upon him. Let the verdict be set aside, and a new trial granted.

New trial granted.

Case No. 1,048.

BARRETT et al. v. KOELLA.

[5 Biss. 40.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Wisconsin. Sept. Term, 1857.

FRAUDULENT PURCHASE AND SALE — ASSUMPSIT — PRESUMPTIONS.

1. Where a merchant has, by means of false representations, purchased goods for his store on credit and then sells his stock in fraud of his creditors, and the goods sold cannot be found, the vendor may bring assumpsit before the credit has expired.

2. Where such goods cannot be found, the presumption is that they have been sold and for cash. If it is shown that he took notes for part, the presumption is that the notes were negotiable.

[See note at end of case.]

[At law. Action by Soramus L. Barrett and others against J. August Koella for money had and received. Tried by jury. Verdict for plaintiffs. Heard on motion for new trial. Denied.]

N. J. Emmons, for plaintiff.

Wm. P. Lynde, for defendant.

MILLER, District Judge. This suit is for money had and received. Plea non-assumpsit.

It was proven at the trial that the defendant, early in May last, applied to the plaintiffs, at their store in Chicago, to purchase goods upon credit to replenish his retail stock in Sauk City, in this state, representing that he was possessed of property worth twenty thousand dollars over and above all his debts and liabilities. On these representations, he obtained a bill of goods to the amount of five hundred and eighty dollars, on a credit of six months. The goods were shipped to defendant at Sauk City; and about the twenty-fifth of the same month he sold his stock of goods in fraud of his creditors, he being insolvent, taking in part payment a house and lot, and also two notes of the purchaser, for about fifteen hundred dollars. It was also proven that, upon search, these goods could not be found in the store; and the defendant, immediately after such fraudulent sale, absconded leaving his family in the premises so received by him in part payment of the stock of goods. The house was put in at six thousand five hundred dollars. This suit was commenced by attachment before the time of credit had transpired.

The court charged the jury that "if the jury found that the defendant procured the goods of the plaintiffs by fraud, and he soon afterwards sold out his stock of goods and received notes of the purchaser therefor in part payment, then this action would lie, although the time of credit had not expired; that the presumption was that these notes were negotiable, from the defendant being in mercantile business and from the circumstances attending the sale; and if the goods so sold by these plaintiffs could not be found in the store, the presumption is that the defendant had sold them; and that this suit for money had and received would lie."

A verdict being rendered for the plaintiffs, the defendant moved for a new trial.

This suit will lie if the plaintiffs' goods were sold by the defendant; if they were not sold, the suit would have to be in trover or replevin. Willet v. Willet, 3 Watts, 277; Putnam v. Wise, 1 Hill, 234; Osborn v. Bell, 5 Denio, 370; Jones v. Hoar, 5 Pick. [Mass.] 285. To sustain the action, the goods must have been sold for money, or something which was received as money. A mere exchange of commodities or articles is not sufficient. Doebler v. Fisher, 14 Serg. & R. 179. In regard to things treated as money, it has been held that this count may be supported by evidence of the defendant's receipt of bank notes, or promissory notes, or credit on account, in the books of a third person, or a mortgage assigned to the defendant as collateral security and afterwards purchased and bought in by him, or a note payable in specific articles or any chattel; but not where the thing received was stocks, goods, or any other article, unless in the understanding of the parties it was considered and to be treated as money, or unless it was intended to be sold by the receiver and sufficient time had elapsed for the purpose. 2 Greenl. Ev. § 118, and the cases there cited. Real estate is not a representation of money, and it not appearing that the real property was received as so much money, I did not allude in the charge to this portion of the consideration of the sale of the stock by the defendant. See Beals v. See, 10 Barr, [Pa. St.] 56–60.

It is well setttled that proof of the receipt of promissory notes by a defendant will support the count for money had and received, from their negotiability, they being representatives of money and compose part of the circulating medium. Ainslie v. Wilson, 7 Cow. 662; Rew v. Barber, 3 Cow. 272; Cumming v. Hackley, 8 Johns. 206; Beardsley v. Root, 11 Johns. 464; Lewis v. Lozer, 3 Wend. 79; Cameron v. Clarke, 11 Ala. 259. The proof is that two notes were given by the purchaser of the stock of goods to the defendant as part of the consideration. The defendant was in the mercantile business, where negotiable promissory notes pass as money and are constantly in use; and the defendant was putting off his property in fraud of his creditors, where he would the more readily take negotiable notes. For these two reasons, the court charged the jury that the fair and legal presumption is that the notes were negotiable; if they were not negotiable, the defendant might produce them at the trial. For the reasons above stated, and the non-production of the notes, I am of opinion that the verdict should not be disturbed for this reason.

[1] [Reported by Josiah H. Bissell, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

The receipt of money by the defendant may be proven by circumstances. It is not necessary that the proof should be positive. This is an equitable action, and is sustained upon equitable as well as upon legal principles. Where goods are left in a store for sale and the storekeeper would neither produce them nor pay the price, it has been left to a jury to presume that the storekeeper had received the price of them. Tuttle v. Mayo, 7 Johns. 132; Gray v. Griffith, 10 Watts, 431. In this case there was no legal sale by these plaintiffs to the defendant of the bill of goods; he was in law a bailee of the goods, liable to surrender them to the plaintiffs on demand. An action of trover and conversion would lie; and upon proof that the goods could not be found in defendant's store, their conversion would be presumed, they having been purchased for the store. Upon the same principle does the law raise the presumption of their sale and the receipt of their price by the defendant. They were procured to replenish the stock of the defendant, and they are presumed to have been put into the store; and if not there, the legal presumption is that they have been sold by the defendant and their price by him received.

Motion for new trial denied and judgment upon verdict.

NOTE, [from original report.] Consult Wigand v. Sichel, 3 Keyes, [*42 N. Y.] 120, where it is held the vendor on discovering the fraud may sue for goods sold and delivered before expiration of the credit. See, also, Kerr, Fraud & M. 327, 331, note by the American editor. Mr. Chitty says, "Where goods or other property improperly received by the defendant are saleable, it may under circumstances, and after a time, be presumed that he has sold the property and received money in return, provided that there be reasonable evidence that the defendant converted the same into money, but not otherwise." 1 Chit. Pl. 351, and notes.

Case No. 1,049.

BARRETT v. McPHERSON.

[4 Cranch, C. C. 475.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov. Term, 1834.

APPRENTICE—BINDING OUT BY TWO JUSTICES—APPROVAL OF PARENTS.

The binding out of an apprentice by two justices of the peace in Washington county, D. C., is of no effect, unless the parent or parents, if living, approve and indorse the indentures within two months.

This was a petition of an apprentice to be discharged. The petitioner was bound by two justices of the peace, with the consent of her mother.

It was contended that the indentures were good under the act of 1793, [Md.,] because under that act a parent may bind out a child. But that act authorizes a father, only, to bind out his child. It was then contended that this was a good binding out under the act of 1794, c. 47, [Md.,] by which any child who may be bound by the orphans' court may be bound by two justices of the peace when the orphans' court is not in session, provided the indentures be approved and recorded according to the sixth section of the act of 1793, c. 45, [Md.;] and that the parent, or parents, if living, shall approve and indorse the same within two months thereafter. The indentures were approved by the orphans' ccurt in the manner in which they are generally approved; but such approval is never indorsed.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent) decided that the indentures were void, because not approved and indorsed by the parent within two months after their execution.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

BARRETT, (MORRIS v.) See Case No. 9,827.

BARRETT, (POPE v.) See Case No. 11,273.

BARRETT, (STEARNS v.) See Case No. 13,337.

Case No. 1,050.

BARRETT et al. v. The WACOUSTA.

[1 Flip. 517;[1] 8 Chi. Leg. News, 194; 1 Cin. Law Bul. 44.]

District Court, N. D. Ohio Term. March 4, 1876.

WHAT ARE "GOING RATES."

1. Rate means price, value. Going rate as to freight, like market price for produce, means a fixed and established price. A rate for freight cannot be established by a mere offer of a shipper or demand of a carrier. It can only be done by an actual contract made in port, and the last one so made for the same port would fix the rate.

[See A Cargo of Malt, 10 Fed. 774.]

2. If on a given day the price varied, rose, lowered and rose again during the day the average for the day should be regarded as the going rate. But if no contracts had been made on that day, then the rate of the preceding day would continue until an actual shipping contract should be made at a different rate.

[In admiralty. Libel in rem by C. S. Barrett et al. against the schooner Wacousta for alleged breach of a charter party. Decree for libellants.]

[1] [Reported by William Searcy Flippin, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

Mix, Noble & White, for libellant.
H. D. Goulden, for defendant.

WELKER, District Judge. The libellants on the 15th of November, 1873, entered into a charter party with the defendant, whereby it was agreed that said schooner should carry a cargo for the libellants from the port of Cleveland to the port of Toronto, Canada, for two dollars and twenty-five cents in gold per ton, or the going rates, at the time the schooner should report for loading. The capacity of the vessel was four hundred tons. The vessel, through the master, reported for load on the 20th of November, 1873, to the libellants, and the master then claimed that $2.50 in gold per ton was the going rate, which was denied by the libellants; they asserting that $2.25 was then the going rate, and refused to agree to pay more. Thereupon the master refused to load the coal, which was then ready to be loaded, or take it upon the vessel, and the vessel did not carry the coal for the libellants; and they, after the refusal, contracted with the schooner Moss to carry the coal to Toronto at the rate of $2.50 in gold per ton, which difference in price they seek to recover in this suit. The contract was proven to be as above stated.

There was a good deal of evidence given on both sides to ascertain and settle what was the "going rate" at this port for the port of Toronto on the 20th and at the time the defendant reported, the libellants claiming it was $2.25, and the defendant it was $2.50. Several experts were examined and much difference of opinion was manifested as to how "going rates" were established and ascertained; some claiming that the prices fixed in the last charter party made at the port of Toronto determined the rate, and others, that whatever might be offered vessel owners by shippers made the "going rate." The testimony showed that in the forenoon of the 20th, and up to the time the defendant reported for load, the last contract for shipment for Toronto made between shipper and carrier was $2.25 in gold per ton. That before the master reported for load, he had been offered by Mr. Crawford $2.50 in gold per ton, and that when he reported to libellants, he informed them of the offer and proposed to carry for them at the same rate, which they refused, and said they would rely on their contract. Afterwards, on the same day, the master made a contract with Crawford at the rate of $2.50 in gold, which was the first contract for that price made on that date, and was followed by the one made by the libellants with the schooner Moss, at $2.50.

The question to settle is: What was the "going rate" at the time the defendant reported to take load? If $2.25, then the libellants are entitled to recover; if $2.50, then they must fail in their suit. It will be necessary, before determining the question, to understand what is meant by "going rate," and how it is established or ascertained in the port. Rate means price, value. "Going rate" as to freight, like "market price" for produce means a fixed and established price for the time. To make a market price there must be buying and selling, purchase and sale. The price of gold on 'change is fixed by sales made. A price cannot be established by a mere offer to sell, or an offer to purchase. Sales must be consummated by agreement to make a market price. The minds of the buyer and seller must unite on a price. So of a rate for freight. It cannot be established by a mere offer of a shipper or demand of a carrier. It can only be done by an actual contract having been made in the port, and the last one so made for the same port, would fix the rate. If, however, on a given day the price has varied, being raised, lowered, and raised during the day, the rate for the day would be an average of the rate, which should be regarded as the "going rate" for that day. If, on a given day, no contracts for shipments had been made, then those of a preceding day would constitute the "going rate" for that day, and would continue until changed by an actual shipping contract made at a different rate. If mere offers by shippers, or demand of carriers, could establish the rate, then there would be no certainty in the fulfillment of that large class of contracts made for freight at "going rates;" shippers would have it in their power to reduce freights at their pleasure, and carriers could increase them as might best subserve their interests.

The only safe, and the true rule is: that rates of freight are fixed and established by actual contracts in the market, and can only be changed by contract in good faith, made in the port for like services. The evidence in this case shows very satisfactorily that no contract had been made in this port before the refusal of the defendant to carry the coal for libellant for any higher price than $2.25 in gold, and that the defendant in fact, made the first contract after such refusal at the new rate of $2.50 per ton. This contract then changed the rate to $2.50, and the libellants had to conform to such increase in their contract with the Moss. The defendant, therefore, in refusing to carry the coal for the libellants at $2.25 in gold, per ton, as the contract bound the defendant to do, violated the contract of shipment, and for which the libellants are entitled to recover.

Another question is made on the hearing, which is not distinctly made in the answer of the defendant, and which it is claimed, prevents the libellants from a recovery in the case. The evidence shows that the libellants had sold the coal, to be carried on the vessel to a firm at Toronto by the name of Conger & Co., the freight to be paid by the consignees on its receipt. It also shows that the contract with Conger & Co. was that they should receive the coal chargeable with a freight of only $2.25 in gold per ton. It is also shown that the consignees paid the $2.50 in gold per ton freight for the coal shipped on the Moss on its receipt—that afterwards, and after this suit was commenced, the libellants settled with Conger & Co., and paid them the difference in the freight so paid by the consignees. On this state of facts, it is claimed the libellants had no right in these proceedings against the defendant, having no interest in the contract and sustaining no damages.

The answer to this claim is, that by this contract the coal sold only being chargeable with $2.25 per ton, to be paid by the consignees, any excess paid over that sum was necessarily a loss to that extent on the value of the libellants' coal and the price they were to pay for it, and therefore a damage to them in the amount their consignees were then compelled to pay.

Decree for libellants for $123.91.

BARRETT, (WILLIAMS v.) See Case No. 17,714.

Case No. 1,051.

BARRETT et al. v. WILLIAMSON et al.

[4 McLean, 589.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Ohio. Nov. Term, 1849.[2]

COLLISION—CONFLICTING TESTIMONY — USAGE OF RIVER—MEASURE OF DAMAGES — REPAIRS—LOSS OF TIME—INTEREST.

1. Where there is a conflict in the testimony, the jury must decide on the credibility of the witnesses. This may often depend upon the opportunity witnesses had to observe the facts which they have sworn to. In collision cases witnesses often become excited and alarmed, so as not to be in a condition to see and detail facts with entire accuracy.

2. The law of the river is established by usage, and this must govern those who navigate it. All are presumed to know an established usage, and are expected to conform to it.

[See Halderman v. Beckwith, Case No. 5,907.]

[See note at end of case.]

3. By this usage a descending boat is required to run in the current near the middle of the river, the ascending boat to keep near the right shore. This being the usage, if either turn out of her course, so as to run into the other, the owners of the boat leaving her track are responsible for the damages done.

[See note at end of case.]

4. The descending boat, by the usage, as appears from the testimony, on seeing the approach of the ascending boat, is required to stop her engine and float, leaving to the other boat a choice of sides. Under such circumstances, in view of the usage, it would be hazardous for the descending boat to back her engine, as that might bring her in contact with the other boat. The descending boat may act upon the presumption that the other boat does not intend to run into her. And any deviation from the established usage might create embarrassment, and, perhaps, cause a collision.

[See note at end of case.]

5. In such a case, the jury will give a remuneration for raising the injured boat, repairing her, and for her use during the time necessary to fit her for use.

[Followed in Jolly v. Terre Haute Drawbridge Co., Case No. 7,441. Cited in The Morning Star, Case No. 9,817.]

[Contra. See Smith v. Condry, 1 How. (42 U. S.) 28.]

[See note at end of case.]

6. The jury are not bound to give interest, but they will, if they find for the plaintiff, give such damages as they shall deem just.

[See note at end of case.]

[At law. Trespass on the case by Alexander B. Barrett, Robert Clark, Nathaniel D. Terry, Henry Lyne, James D. Donaldson, William Brown, and John B. Sprowle, owners of the steamboat Major Barbour, against Euclid Williamson, Thomas F. Eckert, and John Williamson, owners of the steamboat Paul Jones, for damages caused by collision between the two vessels. Tried by jury. Verdict for plaintiffs.

[Subsequently, the cause was taken to the supreme court on writ of error by the defendants, and the judgment of the circuit court was affirmed. Williamson v. Barrett, 13 How. (54 U. S.) 101.]

Taft & Mallon, for plaintiffs.

Fox & Lincoln, for defendants.

BY THE COURT, (charging jury.) This is a case of collision of two steamboats on the Ohio river. The plaintiff, who owns the steamboat called the Major Barbour, complains, that while his boat was descending the Ohio river, in her right place, the steamboat called the Paul Jones, in ascending the river, being in her right track, near the Indiana shore, left it, turning her bow across the river, ran into the Major Barbour, and crippled her so that she sunk to the bottom, etc., through the fault and negligence of the conductor or pilot of the Paul Jones. As usual in such cases, a great number of witnesses have been sworn, who were on the respective boats, and who contradict each other in their testimony. In order to refresh your minds in regard to the facts, I will state the substance of the testimony in as few words as possible.

Henry J. Spotts commanded the Major Barbour. He was asleep when the collision took place. From the shock he thought the Barbour was much injured. The pilot was directed to make for the Kentucky shore, that being nearest. The boat floated down, and sunk near the Kentucky shore.

John Braker has been a pilot for twenty years. To avoid a collision, the descending boat stops its engine, giving the ascending boat a choice of sides. When very close, it is the duty of both to do all they can to avoid a contact.

John Shalcroft, a pilot, says, if the Major Barbour was near the middle of the river, the Paul Jones hugging the Indiana shore, there was no occasion to stop the engine.

[1] [Reported by Hon. John McLean, Circuit Justice.]

[2] [Affirmed in 13 How. (54 U. S.) 101.]

William Richards, G. D. Frazer, and James Matthews, agree with Braker and Shalcroft.

Henry Smith is well acquainted with the river. The Paul Jones was hugging the Indiana shore; the Major Barbour was near the middle of the river, but nearest the Kentucky shore. The Paul Jones took a direction across the river, and struck the Major Barbour, near the middle of the river. Witness is well acquainted with the proper tracks of boats ascending and descending. The Major Barbour was as near right as could be. She stopped both her engines and floated. The Paul Jones was under a full press of steam. After the contact it was more than an hour before the Major Barbour settled on the bottom of the river, near the Kentucky shore.

William Wand was pilot on the Major Barbour, and was on watch when the collision occurred. He saw the Paul Jones pass over to the Indiana shore—turned the Major Barbour nearer the Kentucky shore. The Paul Jones ran square across from the Indiana shore—witness stopped the engine, rang the bell, hailed the boat, rang the big bell. The Paul Jones approached the Major Barbour with such force as to curl the water white at its bow. When very near the Major Barbour, the Paul Jones stopped her engine, made two escapements, but struck the Major Barbour with great force. The Paul Jones was near half a mile out of her course, and was managed unskillfully.

R. C. Slaughter says, the Paul Jones came from the Indiana shore almost directly across the river, bearing up a little. Witness was standing on the starboard side, and as the Paul Jones approached, he ran to the other side of the boat. Immediately after the contact, the Major Barbour commenced sinking—she floated and settled on the bottom near the Kentucky shore. When he first saw the Paul Jones, she was one hundred and fifty yards from the Major Barbour. The shock and crash by the contact were great. The bow of the Barbour pointed down the stream.

Charles C. Molly was on the Kentucky shore, saw the two boats, one ascending, and the other descending, and saw them come together, The Major Barbour was, or appeared to be near the middle of the river, but nearer the Kentucky than the Indiana shore. The Paul Jones seemed to be crossing the river. Her true course was near the Indiana shore. The river at the place was more than eight hundred yards wide.

R. F. Conway was a cabin passenger on the Major Barbour. It was a beautiful, star-light night. Saw the Paul Jones coming into her—hailed her—bells rang. The collision took place near the middle of the river—nearest the Kentucky shore. The Paul Jones was square across the river, rather pointing down it.

Washington Green, an engineer, was on the Major Barbour; saw the Paul Jones coming up the Indiana shore two miles off—laid down—heard the bells, the Major Barbour's engine was stopped. The Paul Jones was not stopped when within eighty feet of the Major Barbour. The latter was from the Kentucky shore, not more than one third of the distance across the river.

N. S. Moore says, at the place of collision, the river is about eight hundred yards wide. Witness saw the Paul Jones turn across the river. The Major Barbour descending near the middle of it. The Paul Jones was not quite square across the river. To the same effect is the statement of William L. Mitchell.

G. Ostend was an engineer on the Major Barbour, and was on his watch. He stopped her engine, floated some minutes head down stream. The Paul Jones approached nearly square across the river, pointing to the Major Barbour. Two women, one man and two children were drowned. The bell on the Major Barbour, to back did not ring.

John Nestlewood is a pilot; the rule of the river is, for the descending boat to stop its engine, the ascending boat to maneuver.

James Hammond is a pilot, and states the law of the river as stated by the above witness. In certain positions, both boats should stop their engines and back. But when a boat is approaching across the river, as was the Paul Jones, the descending boat could do nothing more than to stop her engine.

George Frazer is a pilot; the line of the descending boat is near the middle of the river; the track of the ascending boat near the Indiana shore. Witness saw the Paul Jones was approaching in a direction to run into the Major Barbour, nearly across the river, and she continued that direction until the collision.

M. Astrander, J. Vanmetre and another witness state the same as Frazer. J. Vanmetre heard the captain of the Paul Jones say, if he had been up the accident would not have happened. Some ten or twelve other witnesses unite in saying that the Major Barbour was descending nearer to the Kentucky than the Indiana shore, and that the Paul Jones turned from the Indiana shore across the river and continued that direction until the collision occurred.

On the part of the defendants several witnesses were examined.

J. McCamment was pilot on the Paul Jones, had stood his watch on steam boats nearly two years. He saw the Major Barbour was going to run into them. Was running near the Indiana shore—could see the stones. The Paul Jones was running straight up the river, when she was struck by the Major Barbour. It was a slanting lick—knocked down the clay and brick on the starboard of the Major Barbour. Witness was backing the Paul Jones when the collision occurred. At the time, the rudder of the Paul Jones was fast on the Indiana shore. If the Major Barbour had run her proper course, the boats would have passed fifty yards apart. He stopped the engine of the Paul Jones thirty feet before the collision—the engine of the Major Barbour could not have been stopped.

James Kelley was mate of the Paul Jones. He saw that the course of the Major Barbour was unsteady. She seemed determined to run inside of the Paul Jones, next to the shore. At the time of the collision, the Paul Jones was pointed up the river. The course of the Major Barbour was rather quartering. The Major Barbour's lights were so dim that he could not see the upper part of the boat. The boats were three hundred yards apart when the first bell was rung.

Charles Foulkner has been an engineer thirteen or fourteen years, on the Ohio. Was in bed on the Paul Jones when the big bell awoke him—then the bell rang to back the Paul Jones—did so. Heard a man say you will smash the rudder against the shore. The collision took place seventy-five or eighty feet from the Indiana shore. The Paul Jones was in the proper track for that stage of the water.

William Wathral was in his berth on the Paul Jones when the collision took place. He saw the Indiana shore when he first went out. The Paul Jones was in the ascending track. He heard the watchman say to the pilot of the Major Barbour, if you had backed the boat all would have been well. The pilot said he did what he thought was right. Said he was a little confused, but requested the watchman to say nothing about it. After the collision, the Paul Jones backed her stern against the shore. The collision was within fifty yards of the Indiana shore.

Edward Scull says, the Major Barbour came down the Indiana shore about one hundred yards from it. She struck the Paul Jones and then sheared; the bow of the Paul Jones pointed up the stream. She pushed the Major Barbour toward the other shore.

Elisha Marshall, was mate on the Paul Jones. Was called when the bell was rung; were within seventy-five or one hundred yards of the Indiana shore. As the Paul Jones backed she ran against the shore. From the direction of the Major Barbour witness thought she intended to run between them and the shore. Her bow was pointed across the river, and was running nine or ten miles an hour.

George Sutton, was a pilot; a passenger on board the Major Barbour. When the boats struck they were within a hundred yards of the Indiana shore. The Paul Jones was in the usual track. The blow was not heavy; thought the Barbour was not injured. The Major Barbour pointed to the Indiana shore and was within less than one hundred yards of it.

Henry Dayer, the Paul Jones was running within thirty yards of the Indiana shore. The Major Barbour ran against the bow of the Paul Jones; the engineer of the latter was backing his engine at the time. The Major Barbour was under considerable headway at the time. He thinks her engine was not stopped. After the collision the Major Barbour turned to the Kentucky shore.

John Chapman, was the carpenter on the Paul Jones. She was heading up stream. The Major Barbour ran near the Indiana shore. One minute after the collision the boats were within one hundred yards of the Indiana shore. The Paul Jones was backing.

L. Leister, was in the Paul Jones. She was close to the Indiana shore. She was in her right place, but the Major Barbour was not. The blow was not heavy. The Paul Jones did not back on the Indiana shore; she backed about one hundred feet. The Major Barbour was pointing down the river and was from one hundred to one hundred and fifty yards from the Indiana shore.

George Lesley, was asleep when the boats struck; about four rods from the Indiana shore. The Paul Jones pushed the Barbour to the place where she sunk. At the time of the collision the Paul Jones was backing her engines.

William L. Holbrook, was a passenger on the Paul Jones. Heard the bell ring, ran out on the star board side; took the boat to be lying up the river half a mile from the Kentucky shore. The Paul Jones was lying straight up the river, the Major Barbour across her bow.

N. Benby, when the boats struck, witness was in his berth, sprung up; saw Dr. Slaughter on board the Paul Jones, seemed not to be in his right mind. Two minutes after the collision the Paul Jones headed up stream, and the Major Barbour was quartering to the Kentucky shore.

William Hinton states that the place of the Major Barbour should have been, by the rules of the river, near the middle, and that of the Paul Jones near the Indiana shore.

Hugh Funk says, a short time after the collision, Wand, the pilot of the Major Barbour, said he was running down near the Indiana shore. Witness inquired why he did not keep the middle of the river, when Wand corrected himself by saying he thought he was in the middle. He said he did not ring the bell to back, that the Paul Jones pushed the Major Barbour to the Kentucky side.

Capt. Ross, who is a pilot, says, in the night an unpracticed eye is liable to be deceived as to the position of a boat in the river, from her lights.

Joseph Ross, has been a pilot for ten years. By the rules of the river the descending boat should float half a mile; the ascending boat takes choice of sides. Each boat should stop her engine under certain circumstances. The force of the engine would be lost in less than one-fourth of a mile. The current of the Ohio is about three miles an hour. A boat that had lost her headway would begin to back the first revolution of her engine. The proper place for the Paul Jones was from fifty to one hundred yards from the Indiana shore; the Major Barbour's track was near the middle of the river.

The above is a condensed statement of the facts, which will enable you to judge of the merits of this controversy, and to determine it as the justice of the case shall require. There is great conflict in the testimony. The witnesses differ so essentially in their statements, that by no rule of construction can they be reconciled. The conclusion is inevitable, that some of the witnesses have sworn falsely, if not corruptly. Great allowance may be made from the circumstances under which they testify, but this can not include facts stated, not as matter of opinion, as an estimate of distance, but facts under their own observation, and stated without qualification. And there are many such in the case, which have a most important bearing upon its merits. From the nature of the case, and the peculiar responsibility of those who were at the time engaged in navigating the respective boats, much feeling to exculpate themselves might very naturally be expected. But this should not close their eyes or stop their ears. It is the province of a jury to weigh the evidence and judge of the credibility of witnesses. All things being equal, the witnesses who, from their position at the time of the collision, had the best opportunity of seeing the occurrences to which they swear, are more entitled to credit than the relations of those whose opportunity of observation was less favorable. Some of the witnesses saw nothing of the direction of the respective boats, until the moment of collision. Others sprang from their berths under great excitement and alarm, and of course could not have been in a condition to see or relate facts with precision. There are some facts to which there is no contradiction. The Major Barbour was run into by the Paul Jones, so as to cause her to sink in a very short time. She appears to have floated a short distance, after the collision, sinking gradually until she reached the bottom. The place where she sunk was near the Kentucky shore. The river at the place is proved to be about eight hundred yards wide. Now these facts may well call in question the statements of the defendant's witnesses who say that the Major Barbour ran into the Paul Jones, which was very near the Indiana shore, so near that her stern struck the shore, in backing out from the Barbour. And that the Paul Jones had stopped her engine, and was backing at the time the collision occurred.

The consequences of this collision were serious, not only to the Major Barbour, as she was much injured, but to three of her passengers who were drowned. Having called your attention, gentlemen, to the evidence, the court instruct you, that if the Major Barbour was in her proper track, as proved by several of the witnesses, near the middle of the river, and the Paul Jones in ascending the river was in her proper track near the Indiana shore, and she turned out of her proper course across the river, or quartering, in the language of some of the witnesses, so as to threaten a collision with the Major Barbour, and that so soon as this was discovered the Major Barbour stopped her engine, rang her bell and floated down the stream as the custom of the river required, leaving the ascending boat the choice of sides, and this was the law of the river. That on the near approach of the Major Barbour she was not required to back her engine, as that might bring her in contact with the other boat, but might presume that the Paul Jones did not intend to run into her, and that for an injury done to the Major Barbour, under such circumstances, by the Paul Jones running into her, the plaintiff is entitled to recover such damages as appears from the evidence was done to the Major Barbour. That if the Major Barbour turned out of her course, running near the Indiana shore, and this turning out of her course contributed to the collision the plaintiff could not recover. That where both boats were in fault the plaintiff could not recover. That in such case the fault of the Major Barbour must have been such as to have led to or contributed to the collision. That if the collision was the result of an unavoidable accident, the plaintiff could not recover. That should the jury find for the plaintiff, they will give damages which shall remunerate the plaintiff for the expenditure necessarily incurred in raising the boat and in repairing her, and also for the use of her during the time necessary to make the repairs and fit her for business. That the jury were not bound to give interest as claimed by the plaintiff, but they would give such sum in damages as they shall deem just and equitable under the circumstances.

The jury found for the plaintiff $6,714.29 cents.

[NOTE. On writ of error, this judgment was affirmed, the supreme court holding that it would have been erroneous to instruct the jury that the master of the Major Barbour was bound, not only to stop her engines, but to back her, if by so doing the danger could have been avoided; for, before the neglect to make that movement could be charged as a fault, it should have appeared that the master knew the colliding boat intended to pass her bow. In the absence of such knowledge, her proper position was that which the usage of the river prescribed, namely, to stop her engines, and float, leaving the other the choice to pass across either her bow or stern. This was his plain duty, not only from the law of the river, but due, under the circumstances, to the other boat, as affording her the most favorable opportunity to extricate herself from the danger in which she had become involved by her own fault, in carelessly leaving her proper track. The opinion was delivered by Mr. Justice Nelson. Mr. Chief Justice Taney, Mr. Justice Catron, and Mr. Justice Daniel dissented on the ground that no damages should be allowed for the use of the injured vessel during the time necessary to make repairs. Williamson v. Barrett, 13 How. (54 U. S.) 101.]

BARRON, In re. See Case No. 1,057.

BARRON, (BOWMAN v.) See Case No. 1,738.

Case No. 1,052.

BARRON v. ILLINOIS CENT. R. CO.

[1 Biss. 412.][1]

Circuit Court, N. D. Illinois. Oct. Term, 1863.

DEATH BY NEGLIGENCE—INTENT OF ST. ILL. FEB. 12, 1853 — TO MAKE CARRIERS CAREFUL, AND REMEDY DEFECTS IN COMMON LAW — RULE OF DAMAGES—NOT NECESSARY TO SHOW PECUNIARY LOSS.

1. Under the statute of Illinois of February 12, 1853, it is not necessary that the declaration should contain a special averment, showing the manner in which the next of kin have sustained pecuniary loss.

2. The action can be sustained though the next of kin had no legal claim on the deceased for services or support.

3. The intent of the statute is not to deprive all persons of its benefits, except those who were dependent on the deceased; nor is it requisite in any case to prove present actual pecuniary loss.

4. As against common carriers, the policy of the law was to make them more circumspect in regard to the lives intrusted to their care. At common law they were liable for personal injuries resulting from their fault, but they escaped responsibility if death ensued; to remedy this evil, and provide a continuing responsibility, was the object of the law.

5. There is no fixed measure of damages, nor any artificial rule by which they can be computed. The jury are in no case to take into consideration the pain suffered by the deceased, or the wounded feelings of surviving partners; but are to form their conclusions upon proof of all the circumstances attending the death, and of the relations existing between the deceased and the widow, or next of kin.

6. Decisions in New York, and of the supreme court of Illinois, commented upon.

[At law. Action by William T. Barron, executor, against the Illinois Central Railroad Company, to recover for the death of William Barron. Heard on demurrer to the declaration. Overruled.

[Plaintiff subsequently had judgment, (Barron v. Illinois Cent. R. Co., Case No. 1,053,) which was affirmed by the supreme court in Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Barron, 5 Wall. (72 U. S.) 90.]

Clark, Cornell & Norton, for plaintiff.

McAllister, Jewett & Jackson, for defendant.

DAVIS, Circuit Justice. The declaration alleges that William T. Barron was a passenger for hire from Hyde Park to the city of Chicago; that he was killed by the fault of the defendant; that he left a will, and the plaintiff is his executor, and that he was never married, but had next of kin who are named. To this declaration the defendants have interposed a general demurrer. By the common law this action could not be sustained. In 1853, a statute—Sess. Laws 1853, p. 97; Gross, St. c. 17, § 5, [p. 60]—was passed in this state, giving a right of action wherever death is caused by the wrongful act of a person or corporation, where, if death had not ensued, the party injured would have been entitled to sue. The act also provides that the action shall be brought by the personal representatives of the deceased, and the amount recovered shall be for the exclusive benefit of the widow and next of kin, and that the jury may give such damages as they shall deem a fair and just compensation with reference to the pecuniary injuries resulting from such death, to the wife and next of kin, not exceeding the sum of $5,000.

The defendants insist that the declaration should have contained a special averment showing the manner in which the next of kin have sustained pecuniary loss; that the next of kin of the decedent, being his father and brothers, had no claim on him for support or services, and, therefore, no pecuniary loss could have been occasioned to them by his death. We cannot adopt this view of the law, but think there can be recovery if the deceased left no kin surviving him who had any legal claim on him, if living, for services or support. The cause of action is given in the first section of the act in clear and unmistakable terms. If the injured party by the common law had a right to sue, if he had lived, then, if he dies, his representatives can bring an action. Very few persons on whom an inheritance is cast under the term "next of kin," have any legal claim on their ancestor for support, or can be said strictissimi juris to suffer pecuniary loss by his death.

If the intent of the statute was to deprive all persons of the benefits of the law except those who were dependent on the deceased, why use the term "next of kin" at all. It would have been very easy to have used the word "children," and yet, if the defendant's construction of the law is correct, many children who are of age and not dependent on their parents for maintenance, could not recover. Courts must give effect to all parts of a law, if possible.

Here is a statute where the first section, in positive terms, gives the right to sue, and a construction is sought to be given to the second section which would render the right conferred in the first section a barren right in the majority of cases brought into court. Many individuals who lose their lives by the fault of persons and corporations are of age, unmarried, and have no next of kin dependent upon them for support. We cannot suppose that the statute intended to give the representatives of such persons the right to sue in one section, and to make that right nugatory in the second section, by depriving of all damages. The policy of the law was evidently to make common carriers more circumspect in regard to the lives intrusted to their care. They were responsible at common law, if through their fault, broken limbs were the result, but escaped responsibility if death ensued. To remedy this evil and provide a continuing responsibility was the object of the law. We do not think it requisite, in any case, to prove present actual pecuniary loss. It can rarely be done. If so, the opinions of witnesses would have to be substituted for the conclusions of the jury. The facts which the parties shall prove will generally enable the jury to decide on the proper measure of responsibility. Some cases are harder than others, and the law intends that the jury shall discriminate in different cases. There is no fixed measure of damages, and no artificial rule by which the damages in a given case can be computed. The jury are in no case to take into consideration the pain suffered by the deceased, or the wounded feelings of surviving relatives; but are to form conclusions as to the amount of pecuniary injury the widow or next of kin have sustained (subject to the limitations contained in the statute), upon proof of all the circumstances attending the death, and of the relations existing between the deceased and the widow or next of kin. These views are sustained, we think, by the court of appeals, and the supreme court of New York, on a similar statute enacted anterior to the statute of this state. Oldfield v. New York & H. R. Co., 14 N. Y. 310; Dickens v. New York Cent. R. Co., 28 Barb. 41. The case of Chicago & R. I. R. Co. v. Morris, 26 Ill. 400, has been referred to. That was a case where the declaration did not aver that the decedent left a widow or next of kin.

[1] [Reported by Josiah H. Bissell, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

The court decided that the averment was necessary, and remanded the cause, with leave to the parties to amend the declaration. There are some expressions in the opinion of the court which seem to imply that there must be an averment in the declaration showing the manner in which the next of kin have sustained pecuniary loss. This, as has been already seen, we do not consider necessary.

The demurrer is overruled.

NOTE. [from original report.] See, also, opinion on trial of this case. [Barron v. Illinois Cent. R. Co., Case No. 1,053.]

Case No. 1,053.

BARRON v. ILLINOIS CENT. R. CO.

[1 Biss. 453;[1] 2 Chi. Leg. News, 385.]

Circuit Court, N. D. Illinois. July Term, 1864.[2]

DEATH BY WRONGFUL ACT—ACTION FOR DAMAGES UNDER ST. ILL. FEB. 12, 1853—WHEN NEXT OF KIN MAY SUE—RAILROAD COMPANY LIABLE FOR ALL TRAINS ON ITS TRACK.

1. Under the Illinois statute of February 12, 1853, an action can be maintained for the benefit of the next of kin, even though they may have had no legal claim on the deceased for support. It is not necessary to prove actual pecuniary loss.

[See Barley v. Chicago & A. R. Co., Case No. 997.]

[See note at end of case.]

2. If the injured party would have had, by the common law, a right to sue if he had lived, then, if he dies, his representatives can maintain an action. The statute did not intend to give them a right of action in one section, and in the second render that right nugatory by depriving them of all damages.

[See note at end of case.]

3. What circumstances the jury may consider.

4. If a railroad company allows the trains of another company to run over its track, as to passengers on its own trains it is responsible in the same manner as if all the trains belonged to itself.

[See Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Barron, 5 Wall. (72 U. S.) 96.]

[See note at end of case.]

At law. This was an action under the statute of February 12, 1853, brought by William T. Barron, executor, to recover damages for the death of William Barron, who was killed on the 8th of January, 1862, between Hyde Park and Chicago, while a passenger on the cars of [the defendant] the Illinois Central Railroad [Company. A demurrer to the declaration was overruled. Case No. 1,052. The hearing is now on the merits. Verdict and judgment for plaintiff. This was afterwards affirmed by the supreme court in Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Barron, 5 Wall. (72 U. S.) 90.]

The statute reads as follows,—Gross. St. 1871, p. 60, [Sess. Laws, p. 97:] "§ 1. Whenever the death of a person shall be caused by wrongful act, neglect, or default, and the act, neglect, or default is such as would, if death had not ensued, have entitled the party injured to maintain an action and recover damages in respect thereof, then, and in every such case, the person who, or company, or corporation, which would have been liable if death had not ensued, shall be liable to an action for damages, notwithstanding the death of the person injured, and although the death shall have been caused under such circumstances as amount in law to felony." "§ 2. Every such action shall be brought by and in the names of the personal representatives of such deceased person, and the amount recovered in every such action shall be for the exclusive benefit of the widow and next of kin of such deceased person, and shall be distributed to such widow and next of kin, in the proportion provided by law in relation to the distribution of personal property left by persons dying intestate; and in every such action the jury may give such damages as they shall deem a fair and just compensation, with reference to the pecuniary injuries resulting from such death to the wife and next of kin of such deceased person, not exceeding the sum of $5,000; provided, that every such action shall be commenced within two years after the death of such person."

[1] [Reported by Josiah H. Bissell, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

[2] [Affirmed in 5 Wall. (72 U. S.) 90.]

Clark, Cornell & Norton, for plaintiff.

McAllister, Jewitt & Jackson, for defendant.

DAVIS, Circuit Justice, (charging jury.) By the common law this action could not be sustained.

In 1853 a statute was passed in this state giving a right of action wherever death is caused by the act of a person or corporation, where if death had not ensued the party injured would have been entitled to sue. The act also provides, that the action shall be brought by the personal representatives of the deceased, and the amount recovered shall be for the exclusive benefit of the widow and the next of kin, and that the jury may give such damages as they shall deem a just and fair compensation with reference to the pecuniary injuries resulting from such death to the wife and next of kin, not exceeding the sum of $5,000.

Barron was never married, and it is contended by the defendant, that the next of kin being his father, brothers and sisters, had no claim on him for support or services, and therefore there could have been no pecuniary loss to them by his death.

We cannot adopt this construction of the law, but charge you that there can be a recovery if the deceased left no kin surviving him, who had any legal claim on him, if living, for support. The cause of action is given in the first section of the act in clear and unmistakable terms. If the injured party, by the common law, had a right to sue if he had lived, then, if he dies, his representatives can bring an action. Many individuals who lose their lives by the fault of persons and corporations, are of age, unmarried, and have no next of kin dependent on them for support. We cannot suppose that the statute intended to give the representatives of such persons the right to sue in one section, and make that right nugatory in the second section, by depriving them of all damages. The policy of the law was evidently to make common carriers more circumspect in regard to the lives entrusted to their care. They were responsible at common law, if through their fault, broken limbs were the result, but escaped responsibility if death ensued. To remedy this evil, and provide a continuing responsibility, was, in the opinion of the court, the object of the law. We do not think it requisite to prove present actual pecuniary loss. It can rarely be done. The attempt to do it would substitute the opinions of witnesses for the conclusions of the jury. The facts proved will enable the jury to decide on the proper measure of responsibility. Some cases are harder than others, and the law intends that the jury shall discriminate in different cases. There is no fixed measure of damages, and no artificial rule by which the damages in a given case can be computed. The jury are not to take into consideration the pain suffered by the deceased, nor the wounded feelings of surviving relatives, and no damages are to be given by way of punishment. In this case the next of kin are the parties who were interested in the life of the deceased. They were interested in the further accumulations which he might have added to his estate, and which might hereafter descend to them.

The jury have a right, in estimating the amount of pecuniary injury, to take into consideration all the circumstances attending the death of Barron, the relations between him and his next of kin, the amount of his property, the character of his business, and the prospective increase in wealth likely to accrue to a man of his age, with the business and means which he had. There is a possibility in the chances of business that Barron's estate might have decreased rather than increased, and this possibility the jury may consider. The jury also have a right to take into consideration the contingency that he might have married, and his property descended in another channel. And there may be other circumstances which might affect the question of pecuniary loss, which it is difficult for the court to particularize, but which will occur to you. The intention of the statute was to give a compensation for the pecuniary loss which the widow, if any, or the next of kin might sustain by the death of the party, and the jury are to determine, as men of experience and observation, from the proof what that loss is. In order to render a verdict for the plaintiff, it is necessary that the defendant should have been in fault.

The Illinois Central Railroad Company engaged to carry Judge Barron safely from Hyde Park to Chicago, and, as a common carrier, was bound to the most exact care and diligence required for the safety of passengers. The facts in the case are few and uncontradicted. On the morning of the 8th of January, 1862, Judge Barron was a passenger from Hyde Park to Chicago. The train was from seven to ten minutes behind time, and the track was slippery. By contract between the Michigan Central and Illinois Central companies, the cars of the former were permitted to use the track of the latter, as far as Calumet. Proper time tables were arranged. The Cincinnati express of the Michigan Central, by these time tables, should have passed Hyde Park at least thirty minutes in advance of the train of the Illinois Central Railroad. On the morning of the 8th of January, the Cincinnati express train was behind time, and collided with the Illinois Central train at Kenwood, which was the immediate cause of the disaster. It is argued that the Cincinnati train caused the death of Barron, and that therefore the Illinois Central is not liable. The jury may believe, from the evidence, that the Cincinnati train was chiefly in fault, and that without its agency the calamity would not have happened; yet if they also believe from the evidence, that the misconduct or negligence of those in charge of the Illinois Central train contributed to the disaster, then the defendant was in fault, and the plaintiff is entitled to recover.

It is not a question which train was mostly in fault, but whether the train of the defendant was in fault at all. It is for the jury to say, from the evidence, whether the employes of the Illinois Central Road used the necessary degree of care and diligence in the management of their train on that morning. Their train was behind time; the track was slippery, and it was known to them that an express train was liable to come up at any minute. Should they not have indicated by flagging, or in some other way, that they were using the road? Can the jury say that if this had been done this accident would have occurred? If the proper degree of diligence did not require flagging, and if being out of time did not contribute to the accident, then the Illinois Central train was not in fault. And the court would further instruct you, gentlemen, that if you shall find that the death was caused by the joint fault of those who had the management of the Michigan Central and the Illinois Central trains, then the defendant is liable in this action; or if you shall believe from the evidence, that the Michigan Central train was running on the road of the defendant by virtue of a contract with it, and that the train was under the sole management of the agents of the Michigan Central Road, and that the death was caused entirely by their fault, then, under the conceded facts of this case, the defendant would still be responsible. We understand that the road on which the accident occurred belonged to the defendant, and, by its charter, was under its sole control to carry passengers and property; and if it allowed the trains of the Michigan Central to run over it under the management of the agents of the Michigan Central, it should be done in such a manner as not to interfere with the safety of the passengers of the defendant, and as to such passengers, the fault of the Michigan Central Road in running their train is the fault of the defendant Verdict and judgment for the plaintiff for $3,750 damages.

NOTE, [from original report.] Consult also opinion on demurrer. 1 Biss. 412, [Barron v. Illinois Cent. R. Co., Case No. 1,052.] A railroad company allowing another to run cars over its road is liable for injuries done. Colegrove v. New York & H. R. Co., 6 Duer, 382. A railroad company is liable for an injury occasioned by negligence of its agents in management of a train under their control, though belonging to another company. Fletcher v. Boston, etc., R. Co., 1 Allen, 9.

[NOTE. This judgment was afterwards affirmed by the supreme court. In delivering the opinion, Mr. Justice Nelson held, with the Illinois cases, that the owner of the road was not relieved of responsibility by giving to the Michigan Company the privilege of using such road. See Chicago, St. P. & F. D. L. R. v. McCarthy, 20 Ill. 385; Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Dunbar, 20 Ill. 623; Chicago & R. I. R. Co. v. Whipple, 22 Ill. 105; Nelson v. Vermont & C. R. Co., 26 Vt. 717; and McElroy v. Nashua & L. R. R., 4 Cush. 400. The statute, in respect to this measure of damages, remarked the learned justice, seems to have been enacted upon the idea that, as a general fact, the personal assets of the deceased would take the direction given them by the law, and hence the amount recovered is to be distributed to the wife and next of kin in the proportion provided for in the distribution of personal property left by a person dying intestate. If the person injured had survived and recovered, he would have added so much to his personal estate, which the law, on his death, if intestate, would have passed to his wife and next of kin. In case of his death by the injury, the equivalent is given by a suit in the name of his representative. There is difficulty, in either case, in getting at the pecuniary loss with precision or accuracy; more difficulty in the latter than in the former, but differing only in degree; and in both cases the result must be left to turn mainly upon the sound sense and deliberate judgment of the jury. Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Barron, 5 Wall. (72 U. S.) 90.]

Case No. 1,054.

BARRON v. LOCKE.

[7 Leg. Int. (1850,) 203.]

District Court.

ADMIRALTY PRACTICE—RULES OF COURT—WAGES—FORFEITURE—DEFENSES—EVIDENCE.

In admiralty. Libel by Barron against Locke, master of the schooner George S. Jones, for seaman's wages. [Decree for libellant.]

Libellant's counsel objected to evidence by respondent on the ground that no written answer had been filed, claiming right to do so under the rules of the supreme court, made under Act Cong. [Aug. 23,] 1842, [section 6, 5 Stat. 518.]

"The rules of the supreme court were not intended," THE COURT said, "to change the rules of the district courts as to seaman's wages. There can be no objection to hearing the defense without an answer."

The defense is that the seaman is not entitled to the small balance claimed, because he had not been discharged from the vessel, and that leaving without being discharged forfeited the wages due. On the other hand, it was in evidence that the seaman was sick, and unable to be on board ship. It would be hard and unjust, the court contended, to hold him to a literal performance. His sickness is an excuse, and therefore the balance of wages must be decreed, with costs.

Case No. 1,055.

BARRON v. MORRIS.

[The case reported under this title in 14 N. B. R. 371, is the same as Morris v. Brush, Case No. 9,828.]

Case No. 1,056.

BARRON v. NEWBERRY.

[1 Biss. 149.][1]

Circuit Court, N. D. Illinois. April Term, 1857.

MORTGAGES — DECREE OF FORECLOSURE AGAINST BANKRUPT DOES NOT EXTINGUISH EQUITY OF REDEMPTION—ASSIGNEE MUST BE MADE PARTY.

1. A decree of foreclosure against a man who had been duly adjudicated a bankrupt, his assignee not having been made a party, is insufficient to extinguish the equity of redemption.

[1] [Reported by Josiah H. Bissell, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

2. A bankrupt from the time of rendition of the decree in bankruptcy, is civiliter mortuus, so far as his property is concerned, and the equity of redemption having passed out of him into his assignee, neither the bankrupt nor any court other than the court in bankruptcy can by proceedings to which the assignee is not a party affect his title to the property.

[Cited in Taylor v. Irwin, 20 Fed. 617.]

[See Moore v. Young, Case No. 9,782; Oliver v. Cunningham, 6 Fed. 60.]

3. The mortgagee cannot plead a want of notice, all parties in the absence of fraud being chargeable with notice of proceedings in bankruptcy.

4. The property having been sold by the assignee, under order of the court, the purchaser is entitled to redeem.

5. Title by possession and payment of taxes under state law will not prevent such redemption.

[In equity. Bill by William Barron against Walter L. Newberry. Decree for complainant.]

This was a bill to redeem, filed by the plaintiff as owner of the equity of redemption in the premises described in the bill, situated in Cook county, Illinois, by purchase from Gordon Burnham, who claimed title thereto by deed from W. C. H. Waddell, the assignee in bankruptcy, for the southern district of New York. William L. Haskins, on the 11th day of July, 1836, purchased the premises in question of the defendant, Walter L. Newberry, and received a warranty deed of the same, vesting a title in him in fee simple, which was recorded in Cook county, on the 1st day of September, 1836. At the same time with the execution of said deed, Haskins executed a mortgage of the premises back to Newberry, to secure the payment of the sum of $12,000.00, the unpaid part of the purchase money, with interest at seven per cent., which was also recorded in said county, August 31st, 1836. On the 4th day of March, 1843, Haskins was by a decree in the district court of the United States, for the southern district of New York, declared a bankrupt; and W. C. H. Waddell was by order of said court made his assignee.

Haskins in his schedule of property attached to his petition, had the following entry: "One undivided half of forty acres of land in Chicago, Illinois, for which $4,000.00 principal and $420.00 interest have been paid by petitioner subject to mortgage to Walter L. Newberry for $12,000.00, part of the purchase money." After proper proceedings had upon the motion of Waddell, the assignee, a sale was ordered of the property, by the district court, and on the 15th day of July, 1845, it was sold at public sale to Gordon Burnham, for the sum of $5,00. On the 22nd day of October, 1845, a deed in due form was executed by Waddell, the assignee, to Burnham; but upon the petition of the assignee, the court made an order for another deed amending the description of the property, which order was executed by the assignee by deed, bearing date October 27th, 1855. On the 29th day of October, 1855, Gordon Burnham, in consideration of $2,000.00, conveyed the same premises to the complainant, William Barron. On the 1st day of March, 1848, long subsequent to the bankruptcy of Haskins, Walter L. Newberry filed a bill in the court of common pleas for Cook county, Illinois, to foreclose his mortgage upon said property. To this bill the only parties defendant were Haskins the bankrupt, and one Marcus Wilbur, and jurisdiction was sought to be obtained by publication under the statute of the state of Illinois. A decree was entered in this suit by default at the May term of the court, 1848, and the premises sold July 27th, 1848, to the present defendant, Walter L. Newberry, who received a master's deed on the 5th of July, 1851, and he now claims to hold the title by virtue of this deed, made to him as purchaser under the decree. Under this state of facts the complainant, William Barron, on the 8th of March, 1856, filed his bill in this court to redeem the premises from the mortgage of Newberry, and set forth therein the title of Haskins, his bankruptcy, the transfer by operation of law of the equity of redemption in the mortgaged premises to Waddell, the assignee, and a conveyance by Waddell, the assignee, to him. He also set forth a tender and offer to pay the amount due on the mortgage, and prayed leave to redeem and for an account, and reference to ascertain the amount due, and that Newberry be decreed to release by deed the said premises to him.

The answer admitted the title of Haskins and the bankruptcy, but denied that the equity of redemption was thereby conveyed to the assignee as against Newberry. It claimed that Newberry had no notice of the bankruptcy, or the title of the assignee, or of the deed of Burnham, and no such title appeared on record in the registry of deeds in Cook county, and nothing to show that Haskins was not the real owner, or held the title in trust for other parties who paid the purchase money. It was admitted that the title of record was vested in Haskins at the time of his bankruptcy, and no adverse interest had ever appeared on record, or been set up or established by any proceedings at law or in equity against Haskins' title. The answer further alleged fraud in obtaining the sale and deed by Burnham, but no evidence was offered to substantiate this charge. Title was also claimed by payment of taxes for seven years, &c., under the statute of the state.

C. Beckwith, for complainant.

It is a well settled rule that the mortgagee can not divest the equity of redemption without a proceeding to which the party legally entitled to such equity is made a party defendant; and if the mortgagor's interest has been transferred before the suit in such a way that the mortgagee was bound to know the fact, as by descent, or by operation of law, or by deed of record, or brought home to mortgagee's knowledge, a decree and sale under such foreclosure will not affect the right of redemption unless the person owning such right be made a party. Glidden v. Andrews, 10 Ala. 166; Chaudron v. Magee, 8 Ala. 570; Fenwick v. Macey's Ex'rs, 1 Dana, 276; Holt v. Alloway, 2 Blackf. 111, note; Evans v. Instine, 6 Ohio, 117; Miami Exp. Co. v. Brown, Id. 535; Gordon v. Hobart, [Case No. 5,609.] In Watson v. Spence, 20 Wend. 260, Cowen, Judge, in giving the opinion of the court, says: "Where the equity has been assigned under such circumstances that the mortgagor is bound to know of it, the sale will not pass the rights of the assignee, unless he be made a party." Shackleford v. Stockton, 6 B. Mon. 390; Glidden v. Andrews, 10 Ala. 166. "The bankrupt, from the time his petition is filed, is civiliter mortuus as to all suits at law or equity pending in which he is a party, and consequently after that time no judgment could be recovered against him. The court will inquire whether in fact the judgment was not entered after the petition was filed, and if so will treat the judgment as of no more validity than if entered against a deceased person." Ex parte Foster, [Case No. 4,960;] McLean v. Rockey, [Id. 8,891.] Subsequent incumbrancers should be made parties. Sherman v. Cox, 2 Freem. 13; Story, Eq. Pl. § 193; Coote, Mortg. 504; Draper v. Earl of Clarendon, 2 Vern. 518; Godfrey v. Chadwell, Id. 601; Morret v. Westerne, Id. 663; Hobart v. Abbot, 2 P. Wms. 643. In Adams v. Paynter, 1 Colly. 532, V. C. Bruce says: "Ever since I have known anything of this court, such intervening incumbrancers have always been considered necessary parties to a bill of foreclosure. I should act against universally recognized and established rules if I were to suggest a doubt upon the subject." The rule thus established in England has been universally recognized in this country, although some judges have doubted its propriety. Haines v. Beach, 3 Johns. Ch. 459; Cooper v. Martin, 1 Dana, 23; 4 Kent, Comm. 185.

The assignee in bankruptcy is a necessary party to a bill to foreclose a mortgage. Lowry v. Morrison, 11 Paige, 327; Coe v. Whitbeck, Id. 42; McLean v. Lafayette Bank, [Case No. 8,885;] Thorne v. Deas, 4 Johns. 84; Sedgwick v. Cleveland, 7 Paige, 287; Anon., 10 Paige, 20; Story, Eq. Pl. §§ 158, 349, note; 1 Daniell, Ch. Pr. 255. Lloyd v. Lander, 5 Madd. 282, demurrer on joinder of bankrupts, allowed. Fellows v. Hall, [Case No. 4,723.] It has also been held that unless an assignee in bankruptcy is made a party to a suit after a decree in bankruptcy, a decree of foreclosure will be a nullity as to him, and will not foreclose the equity of redemption in the premises. Johnson v. Fitzhugh, 3 Barb. Ch. 360; Fellows v. Hall, [Case No. 4,723;] Lowry v. Morrison, 11 Paige, 327; Coe v. Whitbeck, Id. 42; McLean v. Lafayette Bank, [Case No. 8,885;] Carr v. Gale, [Id. 2,435;] McLean v. Rockey, [Id. 8,891;] Ex parte Foster, [Id. 4,960.] Where jurisdiction is conferred under a special statute by constructive notice, unless such statute is strictly pursued, the judgment will be void. Lawlins v. Lackey, 6 T. B. Mon. 70; Butler v. Cooper, 6 J. J. Marsh. 29; Green v. McKinney, Id. 193; Green v. Breckenridge, 4 T. B. Mon. 541; Bond v. Hendricks, 1 A. K. Marsh. 440. The above are all cases under publication notices. Webster v. Reid, 11 How. [52 U. S.] 437, and cases cited in brief of counsel for plaintiff. "In every form in which the question has arisen, it has been held that a statute authority by which a man may be deprived of his estate must be strictly pursued." Bloom v. Burdick, 1 Hill, 141; Jackson v. Esty, 7 Wend. 148; Atkins v. Kinnan, 20 Wend. 240; Harris v. Hardeman, 14 How. [55 U. S.] 334; Mankin v. Chandler, [Case No. 9,030;] Kelso v. Blackburn, 3 Leigh, 299. The assignee of bankrupt has a right to redeem. Lloyd v. Lander, 5 Madd. 175; Spragg v. Binkes, 5 Ves. 587; Hitchcock v. Sedgwick, 2 Vern. 161; Pillow v. Langtree, 5 Humph. 389. No lapse of time, (without permission) and with it none short of twenty years, will bar the right to redeem. Dexter v. Arnold, [Case No. 3,857,] cited and approved in [Slicer v. Bank of Pittsburg,] 16 How. [57 U. S.] 579; [Dexter v. Arnold, Case No. 3,859;] 2 Story, Eq. Pl. 1028; Hughes v. Edwards, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 489; Ang. Lim. § 456. If the mortgagor continues in possession, no length of time will bar the equity. Ang. Lim. § 462; 1 Pow. Mortg. §§ 360–392, and notes.

Williams & Goodrich, for defendants.

The assignee must protect his rights by record or possession, like all other purchasers. He can procure an order for a deed from the bankrupt, which can be recorded, or he can record a certified copy of the decree. Such is the law in England. Eden, Bankr. 225–268; 2 Pow. Mortg. 591, note 5; 3 Pow. Mortg. 1085; 2 Sugd. Vend. 512; Story, Eq. Pl. § 1035, and note. Under our laws the conveyance was not perfected as to creditors without notice, until recorded. Doyle v. Teas, 4 Scam. 202; Martin v. Dryden, 1 Gilman, 187; Sturges v. Bank of Cleveland, [Case No. 13,571;] Choteau v. Jones, 11 Ill. 300.

The bankrupt had no interest to vest in his assignee; the mortgage was quadruple the value of the land,—therefore the bankrupt had nothing to pass to his assignee, nothing beneficial, to say the least. Ontario Bank v. Mumford, 2 Barb. Ch. 596; Eden, Bankr. 306; Camack v. Bisquay, 18 Ala. 286; Dwinel v. Perley, 32 Me. 197; Baker v. Vining, 30 Me. 121; Mitchell v. Winslow, [Case No. 9,673,] where it is said the assignee only takes the interest of the bankrupt, and that a possibility cannot be assigned. See, also, Ex parte Newhall, [Id. 10,159.] The assignee abandoned his interest in the land,—this he may do. Bourdillon v. Dalton, 1 Esp. 233; Smith v. Gordon, [Case No. 13,052.] To the same point are Paulding v. Lee, 20 Ala. 753; Rugely v. Robinson, 19 Ala. 404. Similar in principle, Choteau v. Jones, 11 Ill. 323; McGoon v. Ankeny, Id. 558; Fiske v. Hunt, [Case No. 4,831;] Ex parte Christy, 3 How. [44 U. S.] 292; Packard v. The Louisa, [Case No. 10,652;] Brentlinger v. Hutchinson, 1 Watts, 46; Dart, Vend. 46; 1 Pow. Mortg. 181, note L; McKnight v. Taylor, 1 How. [42 U. S.] 161; Bowman v. Wathen, Id. 189; Piatt v. Vattier, 9 Pet. [34 U. S.] 416; Follansbe v. Kilbreth, 17 Ill. 522; 2 Sugd. Vend. 515, note.

Before McLEAN, Circuit Justice, and DRUMMOND, District Judge.

McLEAN, Circuit Justice. Many points have been raised and most elaborately discussed by the various counsel who have filed briefs in this cause, but in the view taken by the court the decision of one or two points is conclusive upon the rights of the parties, and it will not, therefore, be necessary to intimate an opinion upon such other points as in the judgment of the court are not necessarily involved in settling the rights of the parties. Neither is it the intention of the court at this time to discuss at length the points about to be decided, but merely to indicate the opinion to which we have come, as briefly as possible.

The first and principal question to be settled is whether the defendant, Walter L. Newberry, by virtue of the foreclosure proceedings in the court of common pleas of Cook county, Illinois, extinguished the equity of redemption in the mortgaged premises, as to any and all parties who had a legal claim thereto. In order to determine this question it is necessary to ascertain, first, in whom the equity of redemption was at the time of the foreclosure suit, and second, whether those proceedings were sufficient to extinguish the right of that party to redeem.

The suit to foreclose was commenced March 1st, 1848, by Newberry. In whom was the equity of redemption vested at that date?

On the 4th day of March, 1843, five years prior to the commencement of the suit to foreclose by Newberry, Haskins, the mortgagor, was decreed a bankrupt by the district court of the United States, for the southern district of New York, and W. C. H. Waddell was by order of that court made his assignee.

At the time, therefore, of this decree of bankruptcy, Haskins, the mortgagor, was the owner and possessed of the equity of redemption, for no foreclosure had either been made or attempted at that date.

Section 3 of the bankrupt law of 1841 provides: "That all the property and rights of property of every name and nature, and whether real, personal or mixed of every bankrupt, shall by mere operation of law, ipso facto from the time of such decree be deemed to be divested out of such bankrupt without any other act, assignment, or other conveyance whatsoever, and the same shall be vested by force of the same decree in such assignee as from time to time shall be appointed, &c. And the assignee so appointed shall be vested with all the rights, titles, powers and authorities to sell, manage and dispose of the same, to sue for and defend the same, subject to the orders and directions of the court as fully to all intents and purposes as if the same were vested in, or might be exercised by, such bankrupt, before or at the time of his bankruptcy."

The words of this law are too clear to admit of any misconstruction. By the rendition of the decree, all the property and rights of property of the bankrupt, "of every name and nature," pass by operation of law to the assignee, and this too, in whatever district it may be situated. This construction has been sanctioned by repeated judicial decisions in the courts of the United States, and were it a question involved in any doubt, it would now be too late to discuss its correctness.

The bankrupt from the time of the rendition of the decree of bankruptcy is civiliter mortuus, so far as any of his property is concerned. No act of his can in any manner affect it. He is thenceforth an entire stranger so far as ownership is concerned. His release cannot cancel a debt or obligation due his estate, any more than his deed can convey title to land which he formerly owned. This equity of redemption then which Haskins before his bankruptcy owned, passed by the decree and became vested in Waddell, his assignee, and this some five years before the proceedings of foreclosure instituted by the defendant Newberry. What steps then has Newberry taken to extinguish this equity of redemption in Waddell, the assignee, or his grantees? Have any proper legal steps ever been taken to accomplish this end?

The defendant, Newberry, insists that the suit instituted by him in March, 1848, did extinguish this equity of redemption so far as Haskins was concerned, and that it was also an extinguishment of the title of his assignee and his grantees. But how was this done? Newberry brought suit against Haskins and Marcus Wilbur, and in that suit obtained a decree of foreclosure and sale against Haskins. These were the only parties defendant in that suit. But the court has already decided that the equity of redemption had already passed out of Haskins into Waddell, his assignee, and that no power existed in Haskins by any act either voluntary or by order of the state court, to affect the title of his assignee to this property. That as to that he was civiliter mortuus. How then can any decree against Haskins affect the right of the legal owner? The mere fact that the title came through Haskins, and that he once had the power to dispose of this property does not give him the power always to do so. His power of disposition ceased with the decree of bankruptcy, and the decree of the Cook county court of common pleas could not reinvest him with the title so as to pass it to the purchaser under that decree. The decree then was powerless so far as Haskins was concerned in regard to the property, and we are at a loss to understand how under these circumstances this decree of foreclosure could possibly affect the rights of third parties, strangers to the record. It is a familiar and well settled principle that no judgment can operate as a bar or foreclosure, excepting between the parties to the judgment and those who claim subsequently to them. As to all other parties it is res inter alios acta.

Applying this principle to the present case, it will be seen that the rights of Waddell, the assignee, and his grantees, Burnham and the complainant herein, were not affected in any degree by the suit instituted by Newberry against Haskins, to foreclose his mortgage. They were not parties to the suit, and their rights could not be determined thereby. As to them it was res inter alios acta.

The decision of these points settles this controversy, and it is not therefore necessary to indicate any opinion upon the other points discussed by counsel. The complainant being the owner of the equity of redemption unextinguished has the right to redeem the property, unless there are circumstances in the case which estop him from asserting his right. The court has been unable to see any thing in the conduct of the complainant or his grantors which would lead to such a result. Lapse of time, such as appears here, is not sufficient to estop the assertion of their right to redeem. The defendant has sold his land at his own price, and he will in the redemption receive his purchase money and interest. If he had taken steps to make the proper parties to his suit against Haskins, the result might have been the same, and he might have obtained his decree and sale in due legal form, but this can only be conjecture. The court cannot look at what might have been, but at the facts as they actually are, and in so looking at these facts we feel compelled to grant the prayer of the complainant to redeem. All parties are chargeable with notice of the proceedings in bankruptcy, in the absence of fraud, and hence the defendant cannot claim a want of notice. Neither do we consider the claim of title under the seven-year law of the state as affording any defense under the facts as proved. An order may be entered in proper legal form to this effect, and appointing a master to state an account, &c., as prayed by the complainant in his bill.

DRUMMOND, District Judge, concurring.

NOTE, [from original report.] By comparing the 14th section of the bankrupt act of 1867 [14 Stat. p. 517, c. 176] with this section of the act of 1841, [5 Stat. p. 440, c. 82,] it will be seen that the rights, powers, and duties of the assignee are essentially the same under both acts, and it is believed that the principle of this decision applies equally to the present bankrupt act. That an assignee appointed pendente lite is not a necessary party. See Cleveland v. Boerum, 7 Amer. Law Reg. 144. The purchaser, under a deed from the assignee of a bankrupt, can hold the title against a prior unrecorded deed from the bankrupt. Holbrook v. Dickenson, 56 Ill. 497.

BARRON COUNTY, (NORTH WISCONSIN RY. CO. v.) See Case No. 10,347.

Case No. 1,057.

In re BARROW. In re LOEB et al. In re WINTER.

[1 N. B. R. 481, (Quarto, 125;)[1] 1 Amer. Law T. Rep. Bankr. 63.]

District Court, D. Louisiana. April Term, 1868.

BANKRUPTCY—JURISDICTION—FEDERAL AND STATE COURTS—SALE BY ASSIGNEE.

1. The jurisdiction of the United States district courts sitting as courts of bankruptcy is superior [to] and exclusive [of the jurisdiction of state courts] in all matters arising under the bankrupt act.

[Cited in Re Vogel, Case No. 16,983; Re Vogel, Id. 16,982; Markson v. Haney, Id. 9,098; Re Mallory, Id. 8,991; Re Brinkman, Id. 1,884.]

2. The United States district court for Louisiana has judicial power to authorize the sale, by the assignees, of real estate surrendered by bankrupts, free and discharged of all debts secured by mortgage thereon.

[Cited in Clifton v. Foster, 103 Mass. 233; Markson v. Haney, Case No. 9,098; Giveen v. Smith, Id. 5,467; Re Brinkman, Id. 1,884; Sutherland v. Lake Superior S. C. R. & I. Co., Id. 13,643.]

[In bankruptcy. In the matter of R. H. Barrow; in the matter of Loeb, Simon & Co.; in the matter of W. D. Winter. Petition by assignees for orders to sell real property free of incumbrances. Granted.]

DURELL, District Judge. The assignees of the bankrupts have, in the above entitled cases, filed petitions praying for orders authorizing the sale of real estate surrendered by the bankrupts, free and discharged of all debts secured by mortgage thereon; thus transferring the security of the mortgage creditor and his right to priority of payment from the land to the proceeds of its sale. The judicial power of the court to issue orders in conformance with the prayers of the petitioners is called in question. The jurisdiction of a district court of the United States sitting as a court of bankruptcy, is superior and exclusive in all matters arising under the statute. The estate surrendered is placed in the custody of the court so sitting in bankruptcy, and the officer appointed to manage it is accountable to the court appointing him, and to that court alone. No court of an independent state jurisdiction can withdraw the property surrendered, nor determine, in any degree, the manner of its disposition. These principles have been settled in cases which have declared the relations existing between federal and state jurisdictions. Taylor v. Carryl, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 583.

[1] [Reprinted from 1 N. B. R. 481, by permission.]

The court being possessed of jurisdiction over the bankrupt's estate, and entitled to its exclusive administration, this question arises: How far does the power of administration extend? Does it extend to a suspension of proceedings taken for the purpose of subjecting portions of the estate surrendered to a sale under state process? The answer to this question is to be found in the general powers conferred upon the court.

Until sale is made, the bankrupt is not divested of his interest in the property under seizure. The assignee, appointed before sale is made, acquires the bankrupt's interest, and he acquires it for the general benefit of the creditors. The interest of creditors in a suit wherein property is seized, is represented by the debtor, who has a standing in court and a power to intervene at any stage of the proceedings of the case. But by bankruptcy a new class of rights and interests is created, and each and every creditor has, through the assignee, a direct claim upon the estate. To permit a single creditor to follow his personal claim without reference to the common interest, might work great injustice. The debtor, by his bankruptcy, is made incompetent to act. The law strips him of his property by a summary decree, and assumes the administration of his effects. It is in the nature of a bankrupt act to deal potentially (for the good of a class) with private and personal interests, and to uphold a general and just policy.

The bankrupt act of 1867 [14 Stat. 517, c. 176] undertakes to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy. Without such uniformity the bankrupt could receive but a partial relief; for the insolvent laws of a state operate effectively only upon creditors residing within, and upon property being within the state of the insolvent's residence. Baldwin v. Hale, 1 Wall. [68 U. S.] 223. A bankrupt law, operating upon creditors wherever resident throughout the Union, must have a perfect control over all the property of the bankrupt in order to fulfil its purposes. A creditor residing without the state in which the bankrupt resides, is brought involuntarily into a court of the United States, sitting as a court of bankruptcy, and a decree of that court discharging the bankrupt, binds the creditor. It is due, then, to the creditor, that the court should collect all the assets, adjust and liquidate all the incumbrances, and dispose of and distribute all of the effects of the bankrupt. And such are the powers given to the district courts of the United States, under and by virtue of the bankrupt act. In the case of Ex parte Christy, 3 How. [44 U. S.] 292, [321,] the supreme court says: "Prompt and ready action, without heavy charges or expenses, could be safely relied on when the whole jurisdiction was confined to a single court, in the collection of the assets; in the ascertainment and liquidation of the liens, and other specific claims thereon; in adjusting the various priorities and conflicting interests; in marshalling the different funds and assets; in directing the sales at such time and in such manner as should best subserve the interests of all concerned; in preventing, by injunction or otherwise, any particular creditor from obtaining an unjust and inequitable preference over the general creditors by an improper use of his rights and remedies in the state tribunals; and finally, in making a due distribution of the assets, and bringing to a close within a reasonable time, the whole proceedings in bankruptcy." The first section of the bankrupt act of 1867 is but a repetition of a portion of this extract from the opinion of the supreme court; and the whole of it is to be found in the act. The act says that the court has the entire direction of sales to be made and of accounts to be rendered; that it has full power and authority to compel obedience to all orders and decrees made by it in bankruptcy, by process, to the same extent that the circuit courts have in any suit pending in equity. Such being the origin of the law, the court must suppose that the expositions of the opinion upon which it is based have been recognized as correct.

The estate of the mortgagee, at common law, is a fee simple estate. A tender after the law day does not discharge a mortgage; a reconveyance is necessary. The mortgagee cannot be required to do anything in equity, other than submit to redemption. This right of redemption is, in equity, inherent in a mortgage. "Once a mortgage, always a mortgage." But no such qualities attach to, or are inherent in, a mortgage in Louisiana. Here the mortgagee is not entitled to possession; cannot claim profits until after seizure, and instead of foreclosure can only sell. After insolvency in Louisiana, the syndic sells, and all that the mortgagee can ask for is that the sale may be a sale for cash. The bankrupt does not, therefore, in Louisiana, impair any of those vested rights which in England and in America have a constitutional protection. It is not important in these cases to consider how far, in other states, vested rights are under the dominion of a bankrupt law; it is sufficient to know that in Louisiana a sale of the land is all that the mortgagee bargains for, and such sale is secured by the bankrupt act as fully as by the laws of the state. The bankrupt act places in the court a discretion to fix the time and place of sale; and precisely this discretion exists in the insolvent system of Louisiana. It has never been controverted as unconstitutional, and if not unconstitutional, congress may confer it. The same power is conferred upon the bankrupt court of France, to be exerted after the concordat is settled among the creditors, and a syndic is appointed; and the same power is conferred upon the bankrupt court of England, to be exerted in all cases of liens except those that convey a right in the land itself—a jus in re. The people of the thirteen original states, when they created the present general government, gave to congress the power to establish uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States; and when congress put in execution that power, all the state insolvent laws became necessarily silent, and the property of the bankrupt, even to the shadow of an interest in any estate whatsoever, was thereby subjected to the dominion of the courts of the United States.

Orders will, therefore, be made and issued in conformity with the prayers of the petitioners.

BARROWCLIFF, (UNITED STATES v.) See Case No. 14,528.

BARROWS, In re. See Case No. 1,057.

Case No. 1,058.

BARROWS v. CARPENTER.

[1 Cliff. 204.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Rhode Island. Nov. Term, 1858.

LIBEL AND SLANDER—PLEADING—TRUTH AS A DEFENSE.

1. In an action of libel, if the defendant intends to rely on the truth of that which he has published, either in bar of the action or in mitigation of damages, he must plead it specially; he cannot give in evidence the truth of the imputation without pleading such truth as a justification.

2. Where the charge is general in its nature, the defendant in a plea of justification must state some specific instances of the misconduct imputed to the plaintiff, but irrelevant matter will not vitiate, even on special demurrer.

3. It is sufficient if the defendant's plea answer the whole substance of the plaintiff's declaration.

4. The plea is required to state the substantial facts which constitute the elements of the charge when it is general.

At law. Action on the case for libel [by Ira Barrows against Benoni Carpenter. Heard on demurrer to plea. Demurrer overruled.]

The subject-matter of the complaint in the declaration was the republication, in a newspaper called "The Business Directory," published at Pawtucket, of an article which originally appeared in the "Boston Medical Journal." At the argument, it was agreed that the declaration was in the usual common-law form, with the usual and necessary innuendoes; and the court was furnished with a printed copy of the article which was the subject of complaint. As originally filed, the pleas were the general issue, and a special plea partaking of the nature of a plea of privileged communication. To the special plea the plaintiff demurred, and the court sustained the demurrer; but on motion to the court for that purpose, the defendant had leave to withdraw his special plea, and to file a substitute in its place. He availed himself of the leave granted, and filed a plea of justification which stated the particulars of the charge in the libel. To this plea the plaintiff demurred specially, showing twenty causes for its insufficiency. Some of the causes assigned were abandoned at the argument; others were overruled by the court, upon the ground that the objections set forth in them, being based upon merely verbal or clerical errors, such errors in the plea might be amended as of course. The character of the other causes set down in the demurrer sufficiently appears in the opinion of the court.

R. Mathewson and A. Payne, for plaintiff.
C. S. Bradley, for defendant.

CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice. In the first place, the plaintiff complains that the defendant, in the introductory part of his plea, has introduced and attempted to put in issue matters of fact not necessary to be alleged, and which are wholly impertinent and foreign to the cause. Various specifications are made under this head, but, in the view we have taken of the plea, they may all be considered together. Defences in actions of libel and slander, which go to a general denial of the whole declaration, must be tried under the general issue. Certain other defences must be pleaded specially, and cannot be thus given in evidence, even although they afford a conclusive bar to the action. Whenever the defendant means to insist that the imputation of the charge, as laid in the declaration, is true, he must plead such defence specially, for the reason that the matter which supplies the justification is collateral to the cause of action, and the proof of it does not contradict or repel any fact which the plaintiff would be bound to prove. On grounds of convenience and policy, also, it is obviously just and necessary that a party charged with the commission of an illegal or immoral act should be apprised of the nature and circumstances of the charge, in order that he may be prepared to meet it, and, if it be unfounded, to refute it. These considerations induced courts of justice at a very early period to adopt the rule that the defendant, if he means to rely on the truth of that which he has published, either in bar of the action or in mitigation of damages, must plead it specially. No rule can be more firmly established than that the defendant cannot give in evidence the truth of the imputation, without pleading such truth as a justification. Underwood v. Parks, 2 Strange, 1200; Smith v. Richardson, Willes, 20; 1 Chit. Pl. (12th Amer. Ed.) 494; Shepard v. Merrill, 13 Johns. 475. Confine the application of the rule to the precise case described, and the law is clear; but there are two kinds of defences, in actions of this description, which constitute a complete bar to a recovery. One is properly denominated a justification, and consists in showing the entire truth of the charge which is the subject of complaint, and therefore falls within the rule already stated, and must always be specially pleaded; but the other consists in showing that the utterance or publication was honestly made by the defendant, believing it to be true, and that there was a reasonable occasion or exigency in the conduct of his own affairs, in matters where his interest was concerned, which fairly warranted the publication. Proof of such facts go to negative the inference of malice, and, consequently, afford a defence to the action, unless express malice be proved by the plaintiff. Evidence to maintain a defence of this latter kind is admissible under the general issue, or the defence may be specially pleaded at the election of the defendant. Hastings v. Lusk, 22 Wend. 416; Lillie v. Price, 5 Adol. & E. 645; Swan v. Tappan, 5 Cush. 104; Fairman v. Ives, 5 Barn. & Ald. 642; Somervill v. Hawkins, 3 Eng. Law & Eq. 503; Toogood v. Spyring, 1 Cromp., M. & R. 181; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 421; Bradley v. Heath, 12 Pick. 163. On the other hand, it is perfectly well settled, as before remarked, that the defendant cannot be permitted to prove the truth of the words under the general issue, either in bar of the action or in mitigation of damages. 2 Greenl. Ev. § 424. Every plea of justification, setting up the truth of the charge, ought to confess the publication, as laid in the declaration, otherwise it will be bad on demurrer. Three rules are suggested by Mr. Chitty, which it would be well to follow in framing such a plea: 1. He says it is necessary, although the libel contain a general imputation upon the plaintiff's character, that the plea should state specific facts, showing in what particular instances and in what exact manner he has misconducted himself; 2. That the matters set up by way of justification should be strictly conformable with the charge laid in the declaration, and must be proved as laid, at least in substance; and 3, That, if the matter of justification can be extended to the whole of the libel or slander, the plea should not be confined to a part only, leaving the rest unjustified. 1 Chit. Pl. (12th Amer. Ed.) 495. Numerous cases are reported where the plea has been held bad, as wanting the requisites prescribed in the first rule, because the pleader had not shown the particular instances of illegal or immoral conduct imputed to the plaintiff, or in what exact manner they had occurred. Parke, B., said in Hickinbotham v. Leach, 10 Mees. & W. 363, that it is a perfectly well-established rule, in cases of libel or slander, that, where the charge is general in its nature, the defendant, in a plea of justification, must state some specific instances of the misconduct imputed to the plaintiff. His views in that behalf are nothing more than a repetition of the first rule prescribed by Mr. Chitty and other writers upon the law of pleading, and appear to be sustained by all the well-considered cases upon the subject. Newman v. Bailey, 2 Chit. 665; Holmes v. Catesby, 1 Taunt. 543; Jones v. Stevens, 11 Price, 235; J'Anson v. Stuart, 1 Term R. 748. In this last case, the objection to the plea was the opposite of the present one, and it was decided that the plea was bad, on account of its generality. Among other reasons given for the decision, it was said by Ashurst, J., that the charge laid in the declaration was the charge of the defendant, and the plaintiff was bound to state it as it was made, but it does not follow that the defendant ought to justify in so general a way..... When he took upon himself to justify generally, he must be prepared with the facts which constitute the charge, in order to maintain his plea; then he ought to state those facts specifically, to give the plaintiff an opportunity of denying them; for the plaintiff cannot come to the trial prepared to justify his whole life. Beyond question, the correct rule of pleading in such cases is stated by Mr. Starkie, when he says that a party charged with an illegal or immoral act has a right to be apprised, by means of a special plea, of the nature and circumstances of the charge, in order that he may be prepared to meet it. 1 Starkie, Sland. & L. 466. Similar views were held by the supreme court of New York in Van Ness v. Hamilton, 19 Johns. 368; and also in O'Brien v. Bryant, 16 Mees. & W. 170, where an amendment was allowed to the plea, stating the circumstances with greater latitude than is done in the present case. Applying these principles to the plea under consideration, it is obvious that the objection cannot prevail. Care should be taken, undoubtedly, both in framing the declaration and the plea responsive to it, not to allege the collateral circumstances too minutely, and not to allege more than is necessary; for where the actionable quality of the publication depends wholly on its connection with collateral matter, a variance in a material point in the proof of those matters might be fatal to the party committing the mistake. But suppose the rule were otherwise, and that the particularity of statement in this plea were unnecessary, still it could not benefit the plaintiff in the present state of the pleadings. Matter wholly foreign and irrelevant to the cause may be rejected, as surplusage in a plea, as well as in a declaration or an indictment. Such irrelevant matter will not vitiate even on special demurrer, it being a maxim of the law that utile per inutile non vitiatur. 1

[1] [Reported by William Henry Clifford, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

Chit. Pl. (12th Amer. Ed.) 228; Com. Dig. tit. "Pleader," C, 29. By these remarks we do not mean to admit that the plea contains any matter foreign to the issue. On the contrary, we are of the opinion, if the statements are true, they are no more than a proper explanation of the nature and circumstances of the charge; and in point of fact, that, if less had been stated, the plea would have been objectionable, on the ground of generality. If the statements of the plea are untrue, they may be denied by the plaintiff in his replication, and we have no doubt that such is his proper remedy.

Complaint is also made that the plea does not fully answer the declaration. None of the authorities, when carefully examined, require any more of the defendant than that his plea should answer the whole substance of the plaintiff's declaration. When the plaintiff has proved the substance of his declaration, he has made out his case; and upon the same ground, and for the same reason, when the pleadings and proofs of the defendant have substantially answered the charge, as laid in the declaration, the defense is complete. 1 Starkie, Sland. & L. 374.

Another ground of complaint is that the plea is wanting in the requisite certainty to apprise the plaintiff of the nature and circumstances of the charge. Courts of justice agree that a plea of justification, in actions of libel and slander, must contain a specific charge set forth with certainty and particularity; and it is sometimes said that the plea ought to state the charge with the same precision as in an indictment. To maintain an action of libel, however, it is not necessary that the publication should impute an actionable offense to the plaintiff. Any writing, picture, or sign which derogates from the character of an individual, by imputing to him either bad actions or vicious principles, or which tends to diminish his respectability and abridge his comforts, by exposing him to disgrace and ridicule, is actionable without proof of special damage. Cooper v. Greeley, 1 Denio, 363; Clark v. Binney, 2 Pick. 115. When the charge is general the defendant is required to state the substantial facts which constitute its elements; and when that condition is fairly fufilled, he has done all that the law requires to maintain his plea. Such a plea, says Spencer, C. J., in Van Ness v. Hamilton, 19 Johns. 368, must be certain to a common intent. It must be direct and positive in the facts set forth, and must state them with all necessary certainty. All the material facts set forth in the plea must be considered as admitted by the demurrer; and, assuming them to be correctly stated, it is difficult to perceive in what other manner the justification in this case could have properly been interposed. One of the specifications under this head is, the want of a more definite description of the territory claimed to be included in the "circle of professional business" embraced in the contract between these parties. That phrase is the one employed by the parties in making the contract, and the contract is fully set forth in the plea. Both parties having adopted that description as one suitable to express their intentions, it cannot now be held that it is insufficient to apprise the plaintiff of the nature and circumstances of the charge. Without entering more into detail, we are of opinion that the plea is sufficient, and the demurrer is accordingly overruled.

BARROWS, (UNITED STATES v.) See Case No. 14,529.

Case No. 1,059.

In re BARRY.

[The case reported under this title in Brunner, Col. Cas, 533, 7 Law Rep. 374, 11 Hunt, Mer. Mag. 265, and 136 U. S. 597, note, is the same as In re Barry, 42 Fed. 113. The decision was affirmed in 5 How. (46 U. S.) 103.]

[Cited in Bennett v. Bennett, Case No. 1,318.]

BARRY, (BANK OF THE UNITED STATES v.) See Case No. 907.

Case No. 1,060.

BARRY v. BARRY.

[3 Cranch, C. C. 120.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May Term, 1827.

ACCOUNT—PRACTICE—PARTNERSHIP—EVIDENCE.

1. When the accounts of the parties, in an action at law, are referred by the court to an auditor, the party excepting to the report will have the same benefit, at the trial of the issue, (to the extent of his exceptions,) as he would have had if he had formally pleaded or demurred before the auditor, according to the English forms of proceeding in actions of account. What is not excepted to, will be considered as admitted. The auditor's report is of no avail, but to ascertain the points really litigated by the parties.

2. The court will permit only so much of the report to be read to the jury as states the items claimed by either party, and objected to by the other, so as to show what is litigated by the parties.

3. Items of partnership account cannot be recovered in a suit at law by one partner against the other, if the joint concerns have not been settled. The accounts current rendered by each to the other are admissible in evidence, to show, by the admissions of the parties, that the items are not items of partnership account.

4. In an action upon an open account, the plaintiff may give evidence of any item of which the defendant has had reasonable notice; and the exhibiting and filing a claim for a particular item before the auditor, will be considered as reasonable notice of such claim.

5. The proceedings in equity, in a cause in which the present plaintiff and defendant are parties, may be read in evidence, to show that the defendant had charged to another account some of the articles charged against the plaintiff in the present action.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

6. If an account current be received and kept without objection, except as to particular items, the person so receiving it may still surcharge, and falsify as to other items.

At law. This was an action at law [by James D. Barry against Robert Barry] claiming $27,527.04, as a balance of account due by the defendant to the plaintiff. It was commenced by attachment, under the Maryland act of 1795, c. 56; but the defendant appeared and gave special bail, and dissolved the attachment. The accounts between the parties appearing to the court to be very complicated, the court referred the accounts to an auditor, under the 12th section of the Maryland act of 1785, c. 80, which authorizes the court "to order the accounts and dealings between the parties to be audited and stated by an auditor or auditors, to be appointed by such court, and there shall be such proceedings thereon as in cases of actions of accounts."

The auditor stated an account, showing a balance of $17,517.68, due by the defendant to the plaintiff. The defendant excepted to certain items of the statement.

THE COURT (MORSELL, Circuit Judge, absent) said that the defendant would have the same benefit at the trial of the issue, (to the extent of his exceptions,) as he would if he had formally pleaded or demurred before the auditor, according to the English form of proceedings in actions of account. That the auditor's report is of no avail, but to ascertain the points really litigated by the parties; and that what is not excepted to will be considered as admitted.

At the trial before the jury, at December term, 1826, Mr. Jones, for the plaintiff, offered to read the report of the auditor.

Mr. R. S. Coxe objected. The report is an award, which the auditor in "account" has no power to make. He was only to state the accounts, and ascertain what items were disputed. The practice of Maryland, under the statute, is like that in "actions of account." Mantz v. Collins, 4 Har. & McH. 65; Godfrey v. Saunders, 3 Wils. 113; Finney v. Harbeson, 4 Yeates, 514.

Mr. Worthington, on the same side, cited Com. Dig. tit. "Accompt," E, 15; Crousillat v. McCall, 5 Bin. 435, 438; De Sobry v. De Laistre, 2 Har. & J. 221; Consequa v. Fanning, 3 Johns. Ch. 587.

THE COURT (nem. con.) permitted only so much of the report to be read to the jury as states the items claimed by either party and objected to by the other, so as to show what was litigated by the parties; and refused to permit him to read arguments or statements of evidence, made by the auditor in his report.

The defendant having offered evidence that the plaintiff and defendant had been in partnership in a tan-yard, and it appearing that some of the items in the plaintiff's account were for leather, which the defendant suggested might be their joint property,

THE COURT (nem. con.) said that the accounts might go in evidence to the jury, and that it was competent for the defendant to prove that any items in the accounts were really for the joint concern, and, if the jury should so find them, and that the partnership concerns were not settled, they could not, in this cause, find for the plaintiff as to those items. One of the jurors being taken very ill, a juror was withdrawn by consent, and the cause was continued to the next term, May, 1827.

Upon the trial, at this term, it appeared that the plaintiff's account, filed as the foundation of the attachment in this cause, commenced with a balance of $4,234.08; whereupon Mr. Worthington, for the defendant, objected to the plaintiff's giving evidence of any item of account not constituting part of an account the balance of which should not appear to be $4,234.08.

But THE COURT (nem. con.) refused to restrict the plaintiff to such proof, and said that the plaintiff might give evidence of any item of which the defendant had had reasonable notice; and that the exhibiting and filing of claims before the auditor would be considered as reasonable notice that he meant to rely upon such claims.

The plaintiff had produced in evidence the accounts current of the defendant against him, and relied upon surcharging and falsifying; and, in order to show that a certain charge of $9,000 ought to have been made against the estate of one James Barry, of which the plaintiff was executor, and not against the plaintiff personally, he offered to read the proceedings in a suit in equity, by Rabourg, Hearne, and the present defendant, Robert Barry, against the present plaintiff, James D. Barry, as executor, and others, as heirs of the said deceased James Barry, in which the same sum of $9,000 was charged to the estate of the said James Barry, which

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent) permitted him to do so.

Mr. Coxe, for the defendant, prayed the court to instruct the jury, that if they should find, from the evidence, that the defendant transmitted to the plaintiff the accounts current which have been given in evidence by the plaintiff in this cause, at or about the time when they respectively bear date, and that the plaintiff retained these accounts without objection, or with objection only to particular items, it is not competent for the plaintiff, by any evidence at this time, to surcharge and falsify the said accounts, beyond such items specially objected to. Murray v. Toland, 3 Johns. Ch. 569.

But THE COURT (MORSELL, Circuit Judge, doubting) refused to give the instruction.

Mr. Coxe then prayed the court to instruct the jury, that it is incumbent on the plaintiff, in his attempt to surcharge and falsify the accounts current transmitted by the defendant to the plaintiff, to do so by the fullest and most distinct proof, and the inaccuracy of each item so sought to be falsified; and that the jury cannot by law, without such full and distinct proof, now reject any such item.

But THE COURT refused also to give this instruction.

Mr. Coxe then prayed the court to instruct the jury, in substance, that the plaintiff cannot recover, in this action, for partnership items, unless the partnership accounts were settled, and balance struck, and a promise to pay, before bringing this suit.

Which instruction THE COURT gave.

Whereupon Mr. Jones, for the plaintiff, prayed the court, in substance, that if the joint interest in any particular articles was severed before the bringing of the suit, the plaintiff might, in this action, recover for such articles.

Which instruction, also, THE COURT gave, (nem. con.)

The jury not being able to agree, a juror was withdrawn, by consent, and the cause was continued to the next term, December, 1827, when the plaintiff withdrew his action.

BARRY, (BIGGS v.) See Case No. 1,402.

BARRY v. EVERETT. See Case No. 1,061.

Case No. 1,061.

BARRY v. GUGENHEIM et al.

SAME v. EVERETT.

[5 Fist. Pat. Cas. 452;[1] 1 O. G. 382; Merw. Pat. Inv. 242; 2 Bench & Bar, 65.]

Circuit Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. April Term, 1872.

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS—SPECIFICATIONS AND MODEL—TIN CANS.

1. It is not sufficient that the parts or features of a machine which are essential to the production of the proposed result be shown in the patent office model. If the inventor desires to appropriate them, he must so inform the public by his specification; and if they are not so described, whether they relate to the construction or the mere adjustment of the machine, their use by others is not unlawful.

[Cited in Couse v. Johnson, Case No. 3,288.]

2. If the essential parts or features of a machine are such as the experience of a mechanic, skilled in the art, would devise or apply in the operation of the machine, a patentee can have no exclusive right to their employment.

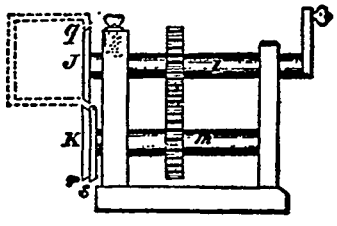
3. Where the seam between the body and the cover of a metallic can had been closed by compression between revolving swages, so adjusted that their beveled faces were parallel to each other: Held, that a change in the adjustment which destroys the parallelism of these faces, for the purpose of producing a wider and smoother seam, belongs to the category of mechanical skill.

4. Where one swage was described as having a beveled periphery, and the swage with which it operated as having "a corresponding beveled periphery," these terms import that the beveled surfaces were parallel.

5. Letters patent for an "improvement in machine for making tin cans," reissued to Christian Barry, October 6, 1868, are void for want of novelty.

[In equity. Bills by Christian Barry against Gugenheim, Dreyfus & Co. and against Horace Everett.] Final hearing on pleadings and proofs. [Bills dismissed.]

Suit brought on letters patent [No. 71,680] for "improvement in machine for making tin cans," granted to complainant December 3, 1867, and reissued October 6, 1868, [No. 3,143.] A suit by the same complainant against Horace Everett was argued at the same time. The nature of the invention is sufficiently stated in the opinion, and will be readily understood with the aid of the accompanying engraving, in which J and K represent the swaging rollers, and the dotted lines, a can passing between them.



T. A. Burton, for complainant.
J. B. Gest, for defendants.

McKENNAN, Circuit Judge. Both these cases present the same questions, and have been submitted upon the same proofs. They involve the consideration of only the third claim of the complainant's reissued patent. This claim is for part of a tool for closing the top and bottom, or the cover and the body of metal cans, so as to make them air-tight without the use of solder, and is in these words:

"3. The swage or die, J, having beveled periphery, q, and swage or die, K, having a corresponding beveled periphery, r, operating together, substantially as described, for the purpose specified."

The swages thus described are attached to the ends of horizontal shafts carrying cog-wheels working into each other, and having their bearing upon the standards of an upright frame. These shafts are made to rotate in opposite directions by a crank-handle attached to the upper shaft. By a preliminary process, the can-body and the top and bottom lids are prepared for the operation of the closing machine. The cylinder or can-body is flared outward, and the lids intended to close the ends of the can are countersunk to a depth corresponding with the flare of the body, with an extension of their rims so as to allow them to lap over on the outer side of the flared ends of the body. This extension is bent downward, forming a hook-shaped figure. The lid, thus prepared, is then put on the body, and the open seam thereby formed is placed between the swages of the closing-tool, and, by their rotation and compression, the flared part of the body and the hooked rim of the lid are brought into close contact, producing a tight, smooth joint, composed of three layers of the metal. It is the simple office of the closing-tool to make this seam, and it is effected by the inward and outward bevels of the periphery of the swages and their rotary compression of the parts to be brought into close contact. This is the essential purpose of the invention as described in the specification.

[1] [Reported by Samuel S. Fisher, Esq., and here reprinted by permission. Merw. Pat. Inv. 242, contains partial report only.]

The invention of this tool is claimed by the complainant, and, as before stated, is the subject of the third claim of his reissued patent dated October 6, 1868. Its novelty is denied by the respondents; and, as the proofs sustain this denial, it is necessary only briefly to advert to this point of the defense.

The complainant's original application was filed October 25, 1867, and the earliest period to which the proofs carry back the date of his alleged invention is October or November, 1865. This is the import of the testimony by Julius Zabel, who says he made wheels for the complainant, like those in his exhibit No. 6, for closing boxes, in one or the other of these months in that year. Aside from the general statements of several witnesses, that sunken head-cans closed from the outside were well known for years before the complainant's alleged invention, and that the tool for thus closing them was, in principle and operation, like his, one machine at least has been exhibited in evidence which disproves the novelty of the complainant. It is the machine made by Henry Diedricks for McCoy & Snell. There is no dispute that Diedricks made such machine for McCoy & Snell; and in both the principle and result of its operation it cannot be substantially discriminated from the complainant's. The most earnest contention has reference to the time when it was made and used. I do not propose to discuss in detail the evidence on this point, but only to state that it satisfactorily proves this machine to have been completed and worked in the early part of 1865, antedating the complainant's machine some nine months.

It is sought to invest the complainant's machine with the peculiar result of producing a wider and smoother seam than any of its predecessors was capable of producing, as the result of a want of parallelism in the beveled faces of its swages; and it is consequently urged that it is thereby to be distinguished as a novel invention from any other closing-machine. This suggestion seems to have originated with S. Lloyd Wiegand, an acute and intelligent expert, who was examined as a witness for the complainant, and elaborates it in his testimony. It is a sufficient answer to it to say that a difference in the taper of the bevels of the rollers is not stated or indicated in the complainant's specification as a part of his invention, or as essential, or even important, in producing the result proposed by him. Mr. Wiegand says it is shown in the model deposited in the patent office, but that will not supply the omission of a reference to it in the specification. If it is a peculiar feature of the complainant's machine, and he desires to appropriate it, he must have so informed the public by his specification, or he can not claim an exclusive right to it. The very object of the specification is to furnish the public with a description of the invention in such "full, clear, and exact terms" that any one skilled in the art to which it appertains may make, construct, and use it, and, without subtraction from or addition to the means specified, produce the precise result described by the inventor. It must, therefore, distinctly indicate the parts or features of a machine which are essential to the production of the proposed result. If they are not described, whether they relate to the construction or the mere adjustment of the machine, their use by others is not unlawful. If they are such as the experience of a mechanic skilled in the art would devise or apply in the operation of the machine (and to this category is to be assigned the peculiar adjustment of the rollers in the complainant's machine according to the clear import of Wiegand's testimony), the patentee can have no exclusive right to their employment.

But there is another reason why the suggested discrimination is unwarranted. It is inconsistent with the testimony of the specification. By the third claim the swage, J, is required to have a beveled periphery, q, and the swage, K, is to have a "corresponding beveled periphery, r." Can this mean anything else than that such bevel is to be made with the same inclination or angle? How can they be said to correspond unless their surfaces are parallel? But this is rendered clear by the drawing referred to and made part of the specification, in which the working faces of the rollers are shown to have a corresponding inclination and exactly parallel lines. It results, therefore, that deviation from parallel lines in the working faces of the rollers is not an appropriate feature of the complainant's machine, and that it can not for that reason be distinguished from the other machines exhibited in evidence.

The machine made for McCoy & Snell is constructed with an upper and a lower swage, correspondingly beveled, and is adapted to produce the same result as the machine described in the complainant's patent. As it was completed and worked before the complainant devised his, his alleged invention lacks essential elements of novelty.

The bills in both cases must, therefore, be dismissed with costs.

BARRY, (HEARNE v.) See Case No. 6,303.

BARRY, (McALLISTER v.) See Case No. 8,656.

Case No. 1,062.

BARRY v. MERCEIN.

Circuit Court, S. D. New York.

[The case cited under this title in Bennett v. Bennett, Case No. 1,318, is the same as In re Barry, 42 Fed. 113. Affirmed by supreme court in Barry v. Mercein, 5 How. (46 U. S.) 103.]

BARRY, (PANCOST v.) See Case No. 10,705.

BARRY, (PERRY v.) See Case No. 11,000.

BARRY, (RICE v.) See Case No. 11,751.

BARRY, (SACKETT'S HARBOR BANK v.) See Case No. 12,204.

BARRY, (THOMPSON v.) See Case No. 13,942.

BARRY, (UNITED STATES v.) See Case No. 14,530.

Case No. 1,063.

Ex parte BARSTOW.

[3 App. Com'r Pat. 268.]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. March 3, 1860.

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS — ANTICIPATION — COOKING STOVES.

[An improvement in cooking stoves, consisting in a chamber interposed between the fire box and the flues, and formed of two parallel plates, which extend clear to the top plate of the stove, except at the corners, where passages conduct the fire to the oven flues, the advantage claimed for which is economy of fuel, is not anticipated by an improvement covering a similar construction, save that the plates of the central chamber do not extend to the top plate of the stove, and that there was a central passage to the oven flues, the object of which is to utilize a cooking stove as a heater, by conducting the current of air passing through and heated by this chamber to apartments above, the oven being adapted to be converted into an auxiliary air chamber for heating purposes.]

[Appeal from the commissioner of patents.]

[Application by A. C. Barstow for letters patent for an improvement in stoves. The application was denied. Applicant appeals. Reversed.]

MORSELL, Circuit Judge. The appellant states his claim thus: "What I claim as my invention, and desire to have secured to me by letters patent, is the double plate extending from the bottom to the top plate, and throughout the width of the stove, forming a partition chamber, so arranged as to separate the fire chambers from the flues when said plate or chamber is provided at the top or thereabouts and bottom or thereabouts with apertures or openings, respectively for the admission to and evacuation from said chamber of external air, whereby a continuous and rapid circulation of fresh air is necessarily created and maintained through and by the heat of the chamber for the purposes herein specified; in combination with the flue passages near the top and at either end of said partition chamber, by which three or more boiler apertures can be used on the front of a stove, and over a comparatively small fire, and the heat be applied equally to each, and by which also, when the heat has passed from the fire chamber, it is first applied to the ends of the oven where it is most needed.

The commissioner, in his letter to the judge of the 12th of December, 1859, among other things, says: "The issue between the office and the applicant respects the novelty of the invention claimed;" and it is only deemed necessary to refer to the several letters of rejection and to the reports of the board of appeal for the ground of the official action, in so far as they are involved by the reasons of appeal.

The first of those documents referred to is that of the board of examiners to the acting commissioner, and by him adopted as of the 18th March, 1859. It states: "Several references are given by the examiner in his treatment of this case, but we see no necessity of alluding more particularly to any of them, except the patent granted to R. G. Cochran in 1840, which appears to us to embrace the precise conditions of Barstow's claim. Like Barstow's, Cochran's stove is provided with a chamber interposed between the fire box, and the forward flue, in the former, as in the latter this chamber extends from the bottom to the top plate of the stove, leaving on either hand only sufficient spaces for the passage over said chamber of the products of combustion, and, in the one as in the other, this chamber is provided with apertures or openings at its bottom and top for the direct ingress and egress of atmospheric air. In short, these chambers are precisely alike in construction; they are located in the same relative position; they operate precisely alike, and produce the same results. We cannot discover the slightest reason for impugning the action of the examiner, and it is accordingly recommended that his decision be affirmed, and a patent finally refused; this report is confirmed, and the application for a patent rejected by the acting commissioner, March 18, 1859." The next one is dated November 9, 1859, and states: "This is a renewal of the application filed by the same party, June 25, 1859, and which was rejected by the acting commissioner on appeal on the 15th of March, 1859. The amended claim is, however, nearly the same as that originally presented, the only difference being that in this, one of the conditions is that the heat, as it passes from the fire chamber, is applied first to the ends of the oven; and, after a careful review of the opinion formerly expressed by us, we can perceive no reason for changing its tenor. Cochran's stove, patented in 1840, a reference given on the rejection of the first application, but not in the rejection of this, is so nearly like Barstow's in respect of the devices claimed, including the feature in which the first and second claims differ, that they may be pronounced to be identical. A comparison of the model shows this conclusively. We cannot say the same of the reference now relied on by the examiner, viz. the rejected application of Thomas. We recommend that the patent prayed for be denied." This was confirmed, and patent refused by the commissioner on the 10th November, 1859.

From this decision there were five reasons of appeal filed. The first is a general reason that Barstow had complied with all the previous requirements of the statute. The others are as to the novelty, and particularly stating that the commissioner erred in deciding that his invention was identical with that of R. G. Cochran, patented October 10, 1840. Such was the case when all the original papers were laid before me by the commissioner for trial according to notice duly given, at which time and place Barstow, the appellant, appeared by his attorney, and filed his argument in writing and the case was submitted. The commissioner, in his last and final report, seems to rely on the invention of Cochran, patented in 1840, to show Barstow's claim to be nothing more than an analogous use. He says that it "is so nearly like Barstow's in respect to the devices claimed, including the feature, in which the first and second claims differ, that they may be pronounced to be identical. A comparison of the models shows this conclusively." The model and drawings ought no doubt faithfully and truly to represent the invention as claimed, but whether they do so or not must be tested by a comparison with the claim as described in the specification. That alone can be considered as conclusive.

The leading purpose and object of the appellant appears to be the economy of fuel to be used in the cooking stove, which he supposes may be reduced to a third less than what is now required by stoves according to the ordinary construction. This and other minor important advantages may be effected by peculiar arrangements and alterations in the construction as particularly stated and set forth in his specification, drawings and model. The principal means consists in suitably adapted and regulated drafts, for which purpose, as stated by him, instead of the mode heretofore used, he states the nature of his invention to consist in forming the partition which separates the fire place from the flues of a stove of a double plate or chamber, provided at the bottom and top with apertures or openings, respectively, for the admission to and evacuation from the stove of external air, whereby a continuous and rapid circulation of fresh air is necessarily created and maintained, through and by the head of the said chamber. By this means the plate or chamber and the parts contiguous thereto are effectually preserved from destruction or deterioration, and the use of a back plate extending to the top plate of the stove, without leaving a central space, between the said back and top plates, partitioned so that the exit flues of the fire chamber can be formed at the extreme ends of the same, thus admitting the apertures for boilers over the fire, and conducting the heat to the apertures at the ends of the stoves in the same degree as to those in the center, before it can pass into the flues for heating the ovens, etc. By this arrangement in a stove of a double fire plate, extending from the bottom to the top plate throughout its whole width, and having openings at the top and bottom for the direct admission and evacuation of external air in combination with the flue passages near the top of said plate at either end thereof, he is enabled to provide the top plate in front of the partition chamber with three boiler apertures arranged in one row laterally This in itself constitutes a novel and important feature, as in stoves of a different construction three boiler holes could not be used with advantage without a very long fire chamber, which necessitates the burning of a very large quantity of fuel.

Cochran's object and design, by his improvement in cooking stoves, appears to have been, according to what he himself states in his specifications, to make certain improvements in the manner of constructing a cooking stove by which it should be adapted to the heating of air and to the conveyance of the air so heated wherever it may be wanted, and for the warming of apartments in dwellings not heretofore practiced. He says that his improvement may be applied to stoves of various forms, and that he does not therefore intend to limit it to the one of the particular construction which he had represented in the accompanying drawing. His principal mode or manner is an air chest or hollow box situated between the fire chamber and the front oven flue, which flue descends in front of the ovens, extends under it, and passes up the back to the exit or smoke pipe, there being a flue also over the oven and valves operating, so as to govern and regulate the draft in the ordinary mode. C is an opening leading into the air chest to which opening is to be attached to conduct air from without the apartment into the air chest. In the drawing the opening C is represented at the side of the stove, but it will in most cases be found most convenient to make it through the bottom. D, D, is a tube or trunk for conveying the heated air from the air chest to the pipe or pipes by which it is to be distributed. Fig. 2 is a view of the top plate of the stove, with the holes for cooking utensils, E, the collar to receive the stovepipe. F is a heated air tube, shown also in Fig. 1. This tube is represented as rising from the trunk or tube, D, D, within the stovepipe, along which it may be continued to any required distance, and pass thence to any apartment to be heated. If desired, the heated air may be conveyed directly from the trunk, D, as through a pipe, G, which is supposed to feed from the opening G Fig. 1. In combination with the aforegoing arrangements of the air chest and its appurtenances for heating air, I constitutes the oven, a secondary air chest to be so employed when not used for the purpose of baking, &c. He further says: "What I claim as constituting my invention, and desire to secure by letters patent, is the manner in which I have combined and arranged the air chest for heating air with a cooking stove, rendering the oven or ovens of such stoves auxiliary thereto, by converting them into air heating chambers, and connecting them with the air chamber first named, in the manner and for the purpose herein set forth."

Having thus fully stated the inventions of the respective parties, A. C. Barstow, and the reference to Cochran's, by a careful examination and comparison I am satisfied there are several substantial differences between the claims of Barstow on this application and that of Cochran, patented in 1840.

First, the object and purpose of the respective parties. Barstow's object is to effect the economy of fuel by a saving of considerably less than that found necessary for the purpose of common cooking stoves by peculiar contrivances and arrangements in connection with the regulation and direction of the draft. For this end the construction is materially different. Barstow's back plate, as described, is joined to the top plate throughout its entire length and breadth, with the exception of two flues in each of the corners, thereby preventing the direct escape of the heat, which becomes continuous, and (after having heated the center) is directed to the corners, which are also sufficiently heated, &c.

2nd. Cochran does not pretend to aim at any such end; his particular object is not the saving of fuel, nor does his contrivance show any such purpose. In his own language he says: "The nature of his improvements, as shown, is the manner in which he has combined and arranged his air chest (which he fixes at the side of his stove) for heating air, &c., rendering the oven or ovens auxiliary, &c. He says his draught is regulated according to the ordinary mode, and what is that? The hollow back to the fire chamber stops short at the usual height in cooking stoves generally, so as to establish a quick and straight draught from the fire chamber to the oven flue in the rear, over the top of the back plate, nearly throughout its whole width. There are other material advantages accomplished by Barstow's peculiar arrangement and contrivances, as before stated, which need not be repeated.

For the aforegoing reasons, I think the commissioner erred in his decision, and that the same ought to be annulled and reversed, and a patent is hereby directed to be issued to the said Barstow for his improved invention, as prayed.

Case No. 1,064.

BARSTOW v. PECKHAM et al.

[5 N. B. R. (1873,) 72.]

District Court, D. Rhode Island.

BANKRUPTCY—PRIORITIES—JURISDICTION—PETITION.

[In bankruptcy proceedings it was adjudged that a certain creditor, by virtue of a mortgage to him, had a claim on the estate superior to that of the assignee, and the equity of redemption was ordered to be sold by the latter. Another creditor then filed a petition to the judge, setting up certain prior, but unrecorded, mortgages and bill of sale, also an attachment issued thereon before the bankruptcy proceedings, and praying that he be adjudged to have the superior claim on the property covered thereby. Held, that the petition should be dismissed for want of jurisdiction, the petitioner's remedy being by action at law or suit in equity.]

[Distinguished in Ferguson v. Peckham, Case No. 4,741. Cited in Re Marter, Case No. 9,143. Contra, see Norris' Case, Case No. 10,304.]

KNOWLES, District Judge. The respondents move for a dismissal of the petition of Barstow, as not within this court's jurisdiction, the movers contending that either by formal suit in equity or regular action at law should the petitioner have proceeded against them, and not, as he has done, by simple petition, invoking summary action on the part of the district judge, subject only to the revisory power of the circuit judge at chambers or in open court; the parties, of course, being thus precluded access to the circuit court as appellants or plaintiffs in error, besides being deprived of all benefit from the rules of evidence and from the established forms and modes of procedure, which parties to suits and actions are accustomed and required to respect and follow.

The question presented arises upon a state of facts somewhat peculiar, thus: One John Moore upon his petition, filed December second, eighteen hundred and sixty-eight, was on the twenty-ninth of December adjudged a bankrupt. It appearing from his schedules that the bulk of his debts were equally the debts of a copartner (one Joshua S. Drowne,) contracted on the firm name of Drowne & Moore, such proceedings were had under this court's orders, that the firm of Drowne & Moore was declared bankrupt, and on the seventeenth of May, eighteen hundred and sixty-nine, an assignment of their property was made to S. W. Peckham. The property consisted almost exclusively of the tools, machinery, implements and stock of a silver spoon manufactory, and a jeweler's workshop, which, in January, eighteen hundred and sixty-nine, several creditors of the firm (Barstow among them) had attached on writs from a state court, returnable in March, eighteen hundred and sixty-nine. This property the assignee found in the custody of the attaching officer, and therefore, on the twenty-sixth of May applied to the court for an order dissolving those attachments and also for license to sell the said property free from a mortgage incumbrance conceded by him to exist thereon in favor of Mary S. Browne of Brooklyn, New York, wife of said Joshua, for the sum of five thousand dollars, due by promissory note of the firm, dated July thirteenth, eighteen hundred and sixty-eight, (the date of the mortgage) and recorded in Providence registry, October fifteenth, eighteen hundred and sixty-eight. Upon the first of these applications the court ordered "that the officer deliver the attached property to S. W. Peckham, assignee, and that said assignee, from the proceeds thereof, when sold, pay said officer his reasonable costs and charges on the attachments and for keeping said property." Upon the second, a notice was ordered to issue to said Mary F. Browne, to appear on the second of June, to show cause against said application, on which day she made appearance filing her "petition in equity" wherein she set forth her claim to the property under her said mortgage, representing that said Peckham had taken possession of the property and refused to surrender the same to her, and prayed that "said assignee be directed to surrender possession thereof to her, to be disposed of under her said mortgage according to law."

After a full hearing upon this petition of Mrs. Browne (as also it is presumable upon the assignee's application for leave to sell,) a decree of the court was entered July fourteenth, eighteen hundred and sixty-nine, as follows:—

"I. That the petitioner has a lien upon the property described in and referred to in the petition, superior to the claims of the respondent subject to any equities the respondent may have for payments made or liabilities incurred in relation to said property while in his possession or otherwise.

"II. That the respondent may sell the equity of redemption in said property, at such time and in such manner as he may deem best for the interest of the general creditors, and may, at his direction, retain possession thereof until sale be made.

"III. That all questions of costs and of expenses paid or liability incurred in acquiring, holding and delivering over said property be and the same are hereby reserved for further consideration and disposition by the court."

At the hearing upon this petition certain of the attaching creditors (Barstow among them) as well as the assignee were represented by counsel and fully heard. Under this decree the assignee, within fifteen days, advertised a sale of his equity of redemption in the property by auction, to take place on the fourth of August, eighteen hundred and sixty-nine; whereupon, on the twenty-eighth of July, said Barstow presented to the judge at chambers his petition (the subject of the motion), in which he set forth claims to said property in virtue of certain unrecorded mortgages and bills of sale of earlier date than the said mortgage to Sarah F. Browne, and in virtue of his attachment of January, eighteen hundred and sixty-nine, and prays, among other things, that the court will adjudge his claims upon said property to be paramount in whole or in part to the claim of Mrs. Browne; that a portion of the property be delivered to him; that another portion be restored to the attaching officer; that yet another portion be sold, and that "meanwhile the assignee be enjoined from further complicating the title of said property by any sale of the equity of redemption thereof." The injunction prayed for was at once granted, the assignee not opposing, and a citation ordered to issue to said Peckham, and Sarah F. Browne and her husband to appear before the court on the fourth of August, to show cause against the petitioner. The injunction to the assignee embodied a provision that he might move its dissolution at any time on giving one day's notice to Barstow or his solicitor of record.

The several respondents entered appearance on the fourth of August, Peckham filing his answer on the eighteenth of August, the other respondents (by consent) deferring the filing of theirs until September seventh, eighteen hundred and sixty-nine. It appears from statements of counsel that before the filing of these answers, the propriety or legality of proceeding in a matter of this kind by petition simply was questioned in some quarters, and that the respondents proposed that by consent the aforesaid petition and answers be formally converted into and treated as equity pleadings to all intents and purposes, and that the petitioner declined to accede to this proposal. Also it appears that both parties afterwards manifested a desire to speed the cause as it stood by taking the needed testimony; and more than this, that in January or February, eighteen hundred and seventy, the respondents repeated their offer to the petitioner, expecting a change in the form of the pleadings, coupled, however, with a condition with which unfortunately, in part at least from accident and mischance, the petitioner failed to comply. At last the petitioner declaring or omitting to prepare for a trial of the petition, the respondents, on the twenty-ninth of March, eighteen hundred and seventy, filed the now pending motion to dismiss the petition for want of jurisdiction. As already stated, the assignee was, on the twenty-eighth of July, eighteen hundred and sixty-nine, forbidden to sell as authorized by the decree of the fourteenth of July. The property meanwhile remained in his custody deteriorating from disuse and subjecting itself or some party, or the assignee himself, to storage expenses of not less than seventy-five cents per diem, in view of which facts he early in March, eighteen hundred and seventy, filed his petition to the court praying leave to make sale of the property free from all incumbrances, the proceeds thereof in the registry to be subject to the claims of the antagonizing mortgagees and attaching creditors. Upon this petition of the assignee Barstow was fully heard, he claiming that the property should be sold in Providence in parcels to suit purchasers; the respondents, Browne and wife and the majority in interest of ascertained creditors, claiming, firstly, That only the assignee's equity of redemption be sold, and secondly, That if the property itself specifically was to be sold, it should be in bulk as an entirety, and in New York rather than in Providence. Prior to any decision upon this question of sale, the respondents filed this motion to dismiss the petition of Barstow, and thus in the most effectual mode possible, dissolve the injunction of which the assignee complained. Upon the motion to dismiss, no hearing was asked by either party or ordered by the court until the fifth of October, eighteen hundred and seventy, for the reason that his honor, Justice Clifford, had taken under advisement in June, eighteen hundred and sixty-nine, the case of Knight v. Cheney, [Case No. 7,883,] in deciding which it was confidently anticipated that he would give an authoritative exposition of those sections of the bankrupt act upon an assumed construction of which this motion to dismiss is based. The desired opinion of his honor, owing to the pressure of judicial duties of more importance he has not yet committed to paper, but of its tenor and import the parties and counsel in this cause, as well as those in Knight v. Cheney were fully informed by an oral communication at the September term, eighteen hundred and seventy, of the circuit court when its judgment in that cause was announced.

Any further delay in the disposal of the motion is earnestly deprecated by the respondents, and with reason as it seems to me. I am unable to concur with the learned and astute counsel of the petitioner, that until the opinion in writing of Justice Clifford shall be received, it is advisable to suspend judgment upon this motion. It may happen, as he suggests, that that opinion will contain some qualifying remark excepting the case at bar from the scope of the general principles he orally announced. This is possible, but is, in my judgment, so improbable that I cannot, in view of it, further delay action upon the question presented. That question, fully enough stated in my opening paragraph above, is not now a novel one. When first passed upon by a justice of the supreme court, (Justice Swayne,) his exposition of the law overruling a decision of the judge of the northern district of Ohio, was in harmony with the argument and positions of the learned counsel of the petitioner. In re Neal, [Case No. 1,406.] Subsequently, however, opinions and rulings directly adverse to those of Justice Swayne, have been given for the guidance of the profession by two of his associates of the supreme bench, by Chief Justice Chase, in Re Alexander, [Id. 160,] and by Justice Nelson, in Re Kerosene Oil Co., [Id. 10,206,] and in Re Bonesteel, [Id. 1,627,] whose rulings in this regard have been followed by Judge Blatchford in Re Ballou, [Id. 818.] Of the ruling of Justice Clifford upon this point in Knight v. Cheney, [supra,] in this district in September last, it is sufficient to say that I understood them to be in full accord with those of Justices Chase and Nelson. Such being the ruling of the judge of this circuit, sustained by two at least of his associates, I can but regard it as authoritative, and accordingly sustain the motion to dismiss.

In the analogous case of Knight v. Cheney, Justice Clifford gave the petitioner leave to convert his petition into a bill in equity if he saw fit, but admonished the parties that the only advantage to be gained by so doing would be a saving of the service of a new subpoena, as the answers filed and the testimony taken (if any) could not be used but by consent in the prosecution of the suit in its amended form. In thus ordering he was understood to exercise a discretionary power, and in that case it doubtless was wisely exercised. In the case at bar, however, I see no occasion for qualifying the order of dismissal. On the contrary, it seems desirable that the assignee and other parties be placed in the same position in which they were under the decree of my predecessor of July fourteenth, eighteen hundred and sixty-nine, before the filing of the petition of Barstow. That decree, for aught that appears, was satisfactory to all parties interested other than Mr. Barstow. The respective and relative rights of the assignee and of Mrs. Browne in the property were by that decree defined and settled satisfactorily to them and to the court. Mr. Barstow, so far as is shown, was in no sense a party to those proceedings otherwise than as a creditor of the firm, who had not seen fit to prove his claim, and of course is not bound by the court's adjudication. His rights in the property, however acquired or held, he is of course entitled to protect and enforce as he shall be advised, now being authoritatively informed that by an action at law or suit in equity, and not by a simple petition to the judge, is he to seek redress and relief.

I will add as not impertinent in this connection, that the thirteenth general rule, as amended, contains provisions which appear to be designed as well as suited to relieve claimants and assignees from some of the embarrassments, delays and expenditures to which the parties in this cause have been subjected. Whether in that rule is to be found anything of importance to the parties at this stage of this cause is for them, not the court, to inquire and determine.

The petition is dismissed for want of jurisdiction, and as a consequence, the injunction upon the assignee of July twenty-eighth, eighteen hundred and sixty-nine, ancillary to the petition, is dissolved.

Case No. 1,065.

BARSTOW v. SWAN.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. 1860.

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS—INTERFERENCE—PRIORITY—EVIDENCE.

[1. Cited in Law, Pat. Dig. 298, to the point that an assignor who has sold his invention is not a competent witness to prove priority upon an interference declared.]

[2. Cited in Law, Pat. Dig. 307, 516, to the point that, when the prima facie force of a patent as to priority of invention on the part of the patentee has been once destroyed by evidence of prior invention on the part of another, it cannot be restored by the patent itself, but only by specific testimony from witnesses.]

[Nowhere reported; opinion not now accessible.]

Case No. 1,066.

BARSTOW v. WILMOT.

[18 Betts, D. C. MS. 77.]

District Court, S. D. New York. March 22, 1851.

SHIPPING—LOSS OF GOODS—PERILS OF THE SEA—ROUGH PASSAGE—BILL OF LADING.

[1. A bill of lading of certain millstones provided that they should be delivered to the consignee in the like good order and condition as at the time of shipment, "all and every the dangers and accidents of the sea and navigation of whatsoever nature being excepted." It was shown that they were properly stowed, and that the ship had an extraordinarily rough passage, being thrown more than once on her beam ends, so that her cargo shifted. One of the stones was found to be broken when she reached port. Held, that the loss was within the exception of the bill of lading, and the ship was not liable therefor.]

[2. A provision in the margin of such bill of lading to the effect that "any extra expense of discharging at New York (the port of destination) to be paid by the consignee" makes him liable for such extra expenses as are necessarily incurred.]

[In admiralty. Libel by Thomas H. Barstow against Samuel D. Wilmot for freight. Decree for libellant.]

BETTS, District Judge. This action is brought by the master of the ship Mortimer Livingston to recover $171.80 for the freight of grindstones from Liverpool to New York, including $8 extra charge for unloading them. The respondent tendered before suit brought, and paid into court, $73.92, claiming he was entitled to damages equivalent to the residue of the demand because of the breaking and destruction of one of the millstones. The contestation between the parties has been as to who shall bear the loss, and no question has been raised as to the valuation put upon the stone not delivered. The bill of lading signed at Liverpool admits the shipment on shipboard of thirty grindstones, to be delivered in the like good order and condition at the port of New York (all and every the dangers and accidents of the seas and navigation of whatsoever nature being excepted) to the respondent. At the foot of the bill of lading was a note, in writing, "Weight unknown. Seven of the above chipped when shipped;" and in the margin, "Any extra expense of discharging in New York to be paid by the consignee." All the stones were delivered and accepted, except one, and that was broken on the passage, and for the purpose of this discussion is to be regarded as worthless.

The first mate testified to the stowage of the stones at Liverpool. Two persons, whom he supposed to be the shippers, requested them removed, after being first stowed and placed on their flats. They were removed accordingly to the place indicated, and so stowed. There was a thick body of coal under them, and boards were necessary to make them lie even, and fine coal spread over them and round them. Pieces of board were put between their edges, and a sufficient thickness of coal above to prevent injury from the cargo. No stones were placed so as to touch each other, and no one on top of another. He has had a good deal of experience in stowing and importing grindstones, and testified that the stowage in this case was good.

The ship had an extraordinarily rough passage, running under close-reefed top-sails nearly the whole time, and was several times blown on her beam ends, and shifted her cargo so much as to give her about two feet list. Two experienced shipmasters, one a port warden, and one a marine surveyor, testified that the stowage described by the mate was good and proper. The stevedore, who discharged the cargo, testified he had 15 years' experience in his business, had frequently unladen cargoes of grindstones, and that he found these stowed as described by the mate, and that the stowage was good. No part of the cargo placed above them came in contact with the stones. Mr. Noyes, an importer of grindstones, examined for the respondent, testified that he considered it safe stowage to lay stones on their flats if coal is under and over them. He should not suppose they would start by the rolling of the vessel, and did not think any extra expense was required for discharging this ship. Mr. Randolph, also examined by the respondent, says he is an importer of grindstones, and he generally finds them stowed standing on their edges, but sometimes laid on their flats, embedded in coal. He cannot account for the breaking of the stone in this case unless by the weight placed on it. A Mr. Chandler was examined to prove an admission by the libellant that he would satisfy the respondent for the damage done the stones. His testimony, however, shows no such admission, or any acknowledgment that he was answerable for the loss. I find, then, upon this testimony, that the grindstones were sufficiently and properly stowed, and that the damage was produced by causes within the exception of the bill of lading. The contract exonerates the master from liability for losses occurring otherwise than from his own negligence or want of due skill in performing his duties. He is not an insurer for the safe delivery of the cargo, nor for anything more than, so far as depends on himself and those connected with the ship, that it shall be safely stowed, in a proper place, and not subjected to injury by the omission of due care and attention on his part. 3 Kent, Comm. 324; The Reeside, [Case No. 11,657;] Abb. Adm. 347, [Baxter v. Leland, Case No. 1,124.] Under this special undertaking, the master is only answerable for misconduct, or the want of ordinary diligence. New Jersey Steam Nav. Co. v. Merchants' Bank, 6 How. [47 U. S.] 344.

The defence set up cannot, therefore, avail the respondent, and the libellant is entitled to recover the balance of his demand, with interest and costs. The testimony of the stevedore shows that extra expense was necessarily incurred by the libellant, to the amount of $8, in discharging the stones, and that, by the reservation in the margin of the bill of lading, is to be borne by the respondent.

A decree must be entered for the libellant for $97.88, with interest from the time the suit was commenced, and costs.

BARSTOW, The AMOS C. See Case No. 337.

BARSTOW STOVE CO., (FORBES v.) See Case No. 4,923.

Case No. 1,067.

BARTELSON et al. v. The CYNTHIA.

[25 Int. Rev. Rec. 384; 14 Phila. 411; 36 Leg. Int. 462; 8 Reporter, 773.]

Circuit Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. Oct. 31, 1879.

COLLISION—STEAM AND SAIL—CHANGE OF COURSE.

Circumstances justifying a sailing vessel in changing her course; it is the duty of a steam vessel, when about to pass a sailing vessel, to observe closely the course of the latter, as well as any conditions which may render a change of such course necessary, and to regulate her own movements accordingly. If she fails to do this she is derelict.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the eastern district of Pennsylvania.

[In admiralty. Libel by Bartelson and others against the tug Cynthia for collision. The district court entered a decree for libellant, (nowhere reported.) Respondent appeals. Affirmed.]

Finding of facts by the court: On the 25th of October, 1876, the steam tug Cynthia, with the loaded bark Haugesund in tow, was coming up the Delaware river from Girard point, on the ebb tide. She had reached the upper part of League island, when the schooner Bowdoin, bound to sea, crossed the bows of the bark, standing toward the Pennsylvania shore, with the wind W. S. W. When the schooner got in shore she tacked, and at this time the tug and bark were quite near her. The schooner lighted up her head sheets to enable her to luff, but she did not luff, and a collision resulted between the bark and her, by which both of them were considerably injured. The bark was in the charge and under the entire control of the tug, and from the poop deck of the latter there was an unobstructed view of the river, showing a clear channel toward the eastward or New Jersey shore. If she had changed her course in time, and had gone in that direction thirty or forty yards, the schooner would have had room to pass, and danger of collision would have been avoided. When the schooner tacked she was as near the western shore as it was safe for her to go, as, if she had prolonged her westward tack, and then had attempted to change to the eastward and had missed stays, she would have gone ashore.

A. L. Wilson and J. G. Johnson, for appellant.

Alfred Driver and J. Warren Coulston, for appellee.

McKENNAN, Circuit Judge. I have had some difficulty in coming to a satisfactory conclusion in this case, but, under all the circumstances, I think the decision of the district court is right. I do not assent to a broad assertion of the absolute right of a sailing vessel to change her course without reference to surrounding circumstances, nor can I affirm that a steamer is liable for the consequences of a collision with a sailing vessel, when she has observed all proper and necessary precaution to avoid it, simply because she did not foresee a possible change of the sailing vessel's course. But it is the duty of a steam vessel, when about to pass a sailing vessel, to observe closely the course of the latter, as well as any conditions which may render a change of such course necessary, and to regulate her own movements accordingly. If she fails to do this she is derelict. In this case, it seems to me, the change of tack by the schooner at the time when it was made, was not only proper but necessary. A prolongation of her westward tack, with the impending risk of being cast ashore, was not incumbent on her when the only reason for it was the possible danger of collision with the tug or her tow. Under the circumstances the probable occurrence of a change of tack ought to have been anticipated by the tug, and timely precautions adopted in view of it. To stop her, or slightly to change her course in time, would have been effectual. But she did neither of these until it was too late, and hence her dereliction was the primary cause of the loss. Whatever fault may be imputed to the schooner does not affect the primary liability of the tug, and is not therefore, as was said by the district judge, a practical question in the case. A decree must be entered, that the libellant recover of the respondent, Zacharias Williamson, and his stipulator, Philip Hammerschlag, his damages, to wit, the sum of $2,000, with interest from March 14, 1879, and costs.

Case No. 1,068.

In re BARTENBACH.

[11 N. B. R. (1875,) 61; 2 Amer. Law T. Rep. (N. S.) 33.]

District Court, E. D. Michigan.

BANKRUPTCY—INTEREST—MORTGAGES—PRIORITIES—COSTS.

[1. Where a note provides for the payment of interest thereon in semi-annual installments, but fails to make any provision for interest on the principal remaining due after maturity of the note, the creditor is entitled to interest after maturity by operation of law, but not by any provision of the contract.]

[2. A state statute allowing interest on unpaid installments of interest has reference to installments due by contract, and hence it does not apply to the interest so accruing by operation of law.]

[3. Where property subject to two mortgages is sold in bankruptcy proceedings, the senior mortgagee is as much entitled to payment of his mortgage in full, together with all proper costs and expenses, as he would be in case of regular foreclosure proceedings.]

[4. But money paid under the order of the bankruptcy court to procure the release of the wife's dower in the mortgaged premises, which could only be barred by sale under the power of sale contained in the mortgage, or by regular foreclosure proceedings, is an extraordinary expenditure, and, being for the benefit of both senior and junior mortgagees, should be apportioned between them.]

[5. Cited in Re Archenbrown, Case No. 505, to the point that the requirement of Act March 2, 1867, § 29, (Rev. St. § 5110, cl. 7,) that a bankrupt shall have kept "proper" books in order to be entitled to a discharge, is fulfilled by books from which a competent accountant could ascertain the bankrupt's condition. The form is unimportant.]

[In bankruptcy. In the matter of George A. Bartenbach.] On the application of the Michigan Health and Relief Society, a secured creditor, to review a computation by the register of the amount due upon its note and mortgage; and of C. J. Riley, the assignee, for the allowance and adjustment of the costs and expenses of the sale of mortgaged premises free of the incumbrances.

C. J. Riley, in pro. per.

Mr. Ward, (Ward & Palmer,) for the society.

LONGYEAR, District Judge. A portion of the assets of the bankrupt, certain city lots in Detroit, were subject to two mortgages—one, which is the senior mortgage, to the Michigan Health and Relief Society, to secure a note of the bankrupt, and one to Workum & Schloss, to secure a bond of the bankrupt—both being for the payment of money. The first named note and mortgage bear interest at the rate of ten per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually. They were given January 30th, 1869, for four thousand dollars, payable three years from date, with interest as above stated. The interest on this note and mortgage was paid, as stipulated, up to and including the time the debt matured, viz., January 30th, 1872; and on the 30th of July following, another six months' interest was paid, but no portion of the debt nor any interest thereon since July 30th, 1872, had been paid at the time of the bankruptcy. The property has been sold by the assignee under an order of this court made on the application of the holder of the bond and junior mortgage and notice to all persons interested, free from both incumbrances. The proceeds were sufficient to pay the first mortgage in full and all costs and expenses of the sale and leave a surplus to apply on the second mortgage, but nothing for the benefit of the general creditors; and the assignee was directed to apply the proceeds accordingly. It was referred to the register, Hovey K. Clark, Esq., to compute the amount due upon the respective mortgages, as a guide to the assignee in applying the proceeds. The register having made the computations, the Michigan Health and Relief Society objected, and complained that the register had not allowed interest on each installment of interest remaining unpaid at the end of every six months, as is claimed to be its right under the following statute of Michigan: "That when any installment of interest upon any note, bond, mortgage, or other written contract shall become due, and the same shall remain unpaid, interest may be computed and collected on any such installment so due and unpaid, from the time at which it became due, at the same rate as specified in any such note, bond, mortgage, or other written contract, not exceeding ten per cent.; and if no rate of interest be specified in such instrument, then at the rate of seven per centum per annum." Act Feb. 19, 1869; 1 Comp. Laws, 1871, p. 541, § 1637.

The costs and expenses of the proceedings to sell and of the sale have been considerable; and in addition to those of an ordinary character the assignee, under an order of court, paid one hundred dollars to obtain a release of the right of dower of the wife of the bankrupt in the mortgaged property. A dispute arose as to the payment of these costs and expenses, the assignee claiming that the same should be retained by him proportionately out of the respective amounts going to each mortgagee, and the Michigan Health and Relief Society, the said senior mortgagee, claiming that the proceeds being sufficient to pay such costs and expenses over and above its debt and interest, it is entitled to payment in full without any deduction on that account. The assignee thereupon reported to the court the said costs and expenses, and asked that the same be audited and allowed, and for an adjustment of the same as between the said mortgagees.

First. Interest. The note and mortgage in question are not set out in the papers, and are not before me; but I take it for granted that they contain no express stipulation for payment of interest on the debt after maturity, in case the debtor should fail to pay the debt by the time specified. The contract being silent as to interest after maturity, "the creditor" (say the United States supreme court) "is entitled to interest after that time by operation of law, and not by any provision of the contract." Brewster v. Wakefield, 22 How. [63 U. S.] 118, 127. This being the law and the debt being past due, the provision of the note and mortgage for payment of interest by installments had ceased. The interest up to maturity of the debt had been paid, and the only interest in question here is such as had accrued after that time by operation of law, and not by any provision of the contract. It was, therefore, not due by installments; but it was due at any and all times, as fast as it accrued. It is clear, therefore, that the above quoted statute of Michigan for computing and collecting interest on unpaid installments of interest, had no application and did not cover this case. In fact, I do not see how, in the absence of an express provision of the "note, bond, mortgage, or other written contract" for payment of interest at specified times after maturity of the debt, the statute can in any case have any application whatever to interest accruing after such maturity. For these reasons I concur with the register in his conclusion, and in his refusal to compute and allow interest on the interest accrued on the note and mortgage in question after the expiration of every six months, or otherwise; and the same is approved.

Second. Costs and expenses of sale. The mortgage in question was a first lien upon the property; and, by the terms of the mortgage, the mortgagee was entitled, in case of foreclosure, to payment in full, including all legal costs, to the full extent of the proceeds. The junior mortgagee was entitled only to the surplus, if any, and that could be ascertained only after payment in full of the prior lien and all legal costs and expenses of its enforcement. Such were the rights of these parties under their respective mortgages. Those rights are sacredly preserved by the bankrupt act, and must be enforced in this court the same as in any other. The proceeds were sufficient to pay the entire debt and interest secured by the note and mortgage of the Michigan Health and Relief Society and remaining unpaid, and all costs and expenses of the proceedings and sale, and leave a surplus to apply on the junior mortgage. That surplus is all the junior mortgagee can claim. The costs and expenses here spoken of, however, include only such as are usual in such cases, and not the one hundred dollars paid to obtain release of dower. That was an extraordinary expenditure, and stands upon a different footing from the other expenditures. It is true, the wife had joined with her husband in both mortgages; but, notwithstanding that, her right of dower could be barred only by a sale under the power of sale contained in the mortgage, or a decree of a court of competent jurisdiction, where she could be made a party to the foreclosure proceedings, and not by a sale free of the mortgages, as was here proposed to be done. It was therefore necessary, and for the benefit of all concerned, to obtain the release in order to a sale in this court to the best advantage, and thus avoid the delay and expense of a foreclosure; and the court, in fact, refused to allow a sale without such release. That amount must therefore be apportioned to the parties interested, according to the amounts which each is entitled to receive of the proceeds, after deducting, of course, all the other costs and expenses. It results that the assignee must pay to the senior mortgagee, the Michigan Health and Relief Society, the full amount of its debt, less its fair proportion of the one hundred dollars paid by the assignee for the release of dower, to be ascertained on the basis above indicated; that he must retain or be paid out of the remainder of the proceeds all costs and expenses of the proceedings to sell and of the sale, including the one hundred dollars paid for the release of dower, and pay over the surplus to the junior mortgagee.

Third. The assignee's account of costs and expenses. There being no opposition, and the items appearing to the court to have been necessary, and that they are reasonable in amount, the account of the assignee of the costs and expenses of the proceedings to sell and of the sale is allowed as stated.

Let an order be made embracing the foregoing conclusions and results.

Case No. 1,069.

BARTH v. MAKEEVER et al.

[4 Biss. 206.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Indiana. May Term, 1868.

LIEN OF JUDGMENT—MARSHALING OF ASSETS—JURISDICTION—CONFLICT OF AUTHORITY.

1. A judgment rendered in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Indiana, is a lien from its date on all the lands of the defendant situated within the district. And if, after its rendition, the defendant acquires other lands in the state, the lien of such judgment instantly attaches on these lands also; and a sale of them by the defendant, made before execution issues on the judgment, does not divest the lien. And, in such a case, the purchaser of the subsequently acquired land cannot, as against a prior purchaser of the land on which the judgment became a lien at the moment of its rendition, insist that the officer shall first levy on and sell the lands held by such prior purchaser before the subsequently acquired lands shall be levied on and sold.

[1] [Reported by Josiah H. Bissell, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

2. In a cause over which a national court has original jurisdiction solely by reason of the citizenship of the parties, if the rights and interests of third persons should become complicated with the litigation, either as to the original judgment, or any property in the custody of the court, or any abuse or misapplication of its process, and if no state court has power to determine and guard those rights and interests without a conflict of authority with the national court, the latter court will, from the necessity of the case, and to prevent a failure of justice, give such third persons a hearing irrespective of their citizenship, so far as to protect their rights and interests relating to such judgment or property and to correct any abuse or misapplication of its process, and no farther.

3. A bill is defective which does not give the full names of all the parties to whom it refers.

In equity.

Barbour & Jacobs, for complainant.
Wm. Henderson, for defendants.

McDONALD, District Judge. This is a bill in equity, filed by Sebastian Barth against John Makeever, Daniel S. Makeever, Ephraim Sayers, Thomas J. Sayers, Thomas Clark, Henry G. Ely, Edward E. Bowen, William H. McConnell, Ingram Little, Abraham Trounstine, Joseph Trounstine, and Charles Keiffer.

The defendant, John Makeever, has filed a disclaimer. The defendants, Daniel S. Makeever, Ephraim Sayers, and Thomas J. Sayers, have demurred to the bill. The other defendants have not yet entered an appearance.

The point now to be decided is whether the demurrer ought to be sustained.

Two points are made in support of the demurrer: first, that this court has no jurisdiction over the parties—second, that there is no equity on the face of the bill. We will examine these points in their order.

I. Has this court jurisdiction over the parties to the bill? The bill alleges that, on the 26th of June, 1858, said "Ely, et al," recovered in this court two judgments against said Clark—one for $771.90—the other for $760.24; that on the 20th of May, 1860, one "Day and Matlock" recovered in this court a judgment against said Clark for $2,278.86; that on the 22nd of November, 1860, said "Abraham Trounstine, et al," recovered in this court a judgment against said Clark for $1538.75; and that these judgments, from their dates respectively, were, and continue to be, liens on divers tracts of land situate in Jasper and Newton counties, Indiana, abundantly sufficient to satisfy said judgments, and then, and long afterwards, the property of Clark.

The bill avers that Clark, on the 3rd of May, 1861, became the owner by purchase of a tract of fifteen acres of land in Marion county, Indiana; and that he sold and conveyed the same, for valuable consideration, to the complainant, Barth, on the 4th of July, 1861.

The bill further alleges that, on the 9th of January, 1861, "Trounstine, et al," took out execution on their said judgment, and the same was returned replevied by "Wm. C. Pierce and M. P. Carr," as Clark's sureties; that on the 26th of June, 1861, another execution was issued on the same judgment which the marshal levied on several of said tracts of land in Jasper county; and returned the same not sold for want of bidders; that, on the 8th of December, 1863, a venditioni exponas was issued on the same judgment, and was returned "unsatisfied without a sale, having ascertained that Thomas Clark was and is not the owner of the land;" that, on the 16th of June, 1864, another fieri facias was issued on the same judgment, was levied on divers of said tracts of land in Jasper county, and was returned not sold; and that, on the 6th of February, 1865, another venditioni exponas was issued on the same judgment, and the return on it showed a sale of one of the parcels of land in Jasper county for $33.

The bill further states that, on the 26th of April, 1865, "Trounstine, et al," assigned their said judgment to the defendants, John Makeever, Daniel S. Makeever, and Ephraim Sayers; that, about the same time, said Ely assigned his said two judgments to said Ingram Little; and that thereupon all said assignees of said judgments, in consideration of $65, released the liens of said assigned judgments on a large portion of the land which had been levied on as aforesaid. But the bill does not state to whom the release was executed.

The bill, also, avers that in May, 1865, on the petition of John Makeever, Daniel S. Makeever, and Ephraim Sayers, this court set aside all said levies, except that on one tract of land.

The bill also avers that, on the 10th of June, 1865, another fieri facias was issued on the judgment in favor of "Trounstine, et al," to the marshal, who, at the same time, had in his hands two other executions on the two judgments rendered in favor of said Ely as above stated; and that by virtue of those three executions, the marshal levied on Barth's fifteen acres of land, and sold the same for $1150, to the said Ephraim Sayers, Thomas J. Sayers, and Daniel S. Makeever. But whether the marshal conveyed to them the land pursuant to this sale, is not stated in the bill.

The bill also charges that after the rendition of said judgments and before the said conveyance by Clark to Barth, the said John Makeever, Daniel S. Makeever, Ephraim Sayers, and Thomas J. Sayers became respectively owners by purchase from Clark of large portions of the lands, the levy on which had been set aside as aforesaid, of sufficient value to pay all said judgments; and that the obtaining of the execution of said release, and the procuring of said setting aside of levies, and the said levy on and sale of Barth's land, were effected by them in fraud of Barth's rights, and were fraudulently intended by them to screen their own lands aforesaid from liability to said judgments and wrongfully to subject Barth's to the payment thereof.

The object of the bill evidently is to show that the judgments in question became liens on all said lands in Jasper and Newton counties before they became liens on the after-acquired land of Clark which he sold to Barth; that therefore those lands ought to have been levied and sold to satisfy said judgments before resort was had to Barth's; that said order setting aside the first levy, as well as said release, was a fraud on Barth; and that consequently the levy and sale of Barth's land was, under the circumstances, an abuse of the process of this court, as well as a fraud on him.

The bill attempts to excuse the complainant's apparent negligence in not earlier urging these objections to said proceedings, by averring that he is a man of foreign birth, and speaks and understands our language very imperfectly, and was utterly ignorant of the existence of these proceedings till within a few days before he filed his bill.

The bill prays that said levy and sale of Barth's land be set aside, and for other relief.

The bill is silent as to the citizenship of the parties.

The complainant evidently founds his claim on the suppositions, first, that the release alleged frees his lands from the lien of the judgments, at least to the extent of the value of the property released; and, secondly, that the Jasper and Newton county lands were primarily liable for the satisfaction of the judgments, and therefore the sale of Barth's land under the circumstances, was a misapplication and abuse of the process of the court. As to the release, however, as the pleadings now stand, it is entitled to no consideration, because the bill does not show to whom it was executed. But as to the second ground of the claim, namely the primary liability of the lands in Jasper and Newton counties, if, under the facts stated, the law creates such primary liability, it becomes a very serious question whether the sale of Barth's land first was not such a misapplication and abuse of our process as to give us jurisdiction to redress the wrong even as to parties over whom we could not take original jurisdiction for the want of proper citizenship.

But, under the facts stated, does the law create a primary liability against the Jasper and Newton county lands, and only a secondary liability as to the Barth land? This question must be answered by a proper construction of the Indiana statutes relating to judgment liens on lands. For the acts of congress are construed as adopting those statutes. Simpson v. Niles, 1 Ind. 196; Doe v. Shrew, [Shrew v. Jones, Case No. 12,818;] Ward v. Chamberlain, 2 Black, [67 U. S.] 430.

Under the Indiana statutes, it is well settled that judgments not only bind the lands of the debtor owned by him at the rendition thereof, but also his subsequently acquired lands from the moment of their acquisition. Michaels v. Boyd, 1 Ind. 259.

If the judgment liens had attached on all the lands in question at the same moment, and if John Makeever, Daniel S. Makeever, Ephraim Sayers, and Thomas J. Sayers had purchased a part of them from Clark before Barth made his purchase, it would be clear that Barth's land would have to go first to satisfy the judgments. For it is a rule, both as to mortgage and judgment liens, that where a debtor sells portions of the lands bound by a lien to different persons and at different times, the parcels thus sold will be liable to discharge the lien in the inverse order of such sales. 4 Kent, Comm. 179, note b; Aiken v. Bruen, 21 Ind. 137. But it is insisted by the complainant that this rule is inapplicable to the present case; and he claims that another rule equally well settled does apply, namely, that when a judgment exists against a man, and after its rendition he acquires lands and sells them before any execution issues on the judgment, the purchaser takes them clear of any judgment lien. And it must be admitted that this rule is strongly supported by the cases of Colhoun v. Snider, 6 Bin. 135, and Roads v. Symmes, 1 Ham. [1 Ohio,] 281. But we can hardly consider these cases as authority on the point in question; for they were made on statutes materially different from the Indiana act touching judgment liens. Indeed, upon the authorities above cited, we must regard it as settled law in this state that judgment liens attach on subsequently acquired lands at the date of their acquisition. The question whether a conveyance of such lands by the debtor before execution issues on the judgment destroys the lien, however, has not been settled here; but it is a question which seems to us to admit of very little doubt. Surely when a judgment lien once attaches on subsequently acquired land, it vests such a right in the creditor as cannot, without his act or consent, be divested by the voluntary act of the debtor conveying the land to a stranger. The circumstance, therefore, that Clark conveyed this land to Barth before the execution issued cannot help the complainant.

But it is urged in support of the bill, that as the judgment liens on the Barth land are younger than those on the other lands in question, the latter lands must be deemed primarily liable to the satisfaction of these judgments, and must, therefore, be first levied and sold for that purpose, before a seizure and sale of the Barth land. This, however, seems to us to be a mere assumption. We have found no authority in support of it. We see no good reason for it. We see no good reason why, because a judgment lien attaches on one piece of land earlier and on another later, the former must bear the whole burden till it is exhausted, before the latter shall be touched.

Now, as the bill contains no averment touching the citizenship of the parties to it, it is obvious that our jurisdiction over the parties must, irrespective of their citizenship, depend upon the subject matter of the bill. And the point insisted on as this subject matter is, that the bill shows a misapplication and abuse of the process of this court which we have jurisdiction to correct without regard to citizenship. If, indeed, the bill does show such misapplication and abuse, we should entertain no doubt of our jurisdiction. In the case of Conwell v. White Water Valley Canal Co., [Case No. 3,148,] decided at the present term, we laid down a rule on this subject to which we are disposed to adhere. It is this: "In a cause over which a national court has acquired jurisdiction solely by reason of the citizenship of the parties, if the rights and interests of third persons should become complicated with the litigation, either as to the original judgment, or any property in the custody of the court, or any abuse or misapplication of its process; and if no state court has power to determine and guard those rights and interests, without a conflict of authority with the national court; the latter court will, from the necessity of the case, and to prevent a failure of justice, give such third persons a hearing irrespective of their citizenship, so far as to protect their rights and interests relating to such judgment or property, and as to correct any abuse or misapplication of its process, and no farther."

But does this rule reach the present case? Does it appear by the bill that there has been any abuse or misapplication of our process? From what has been already said we think these questions must be answered in the negative. In our opinion, the bill, as it now stands, so far from showing that Barth's land ought not to have been first seized and sold, really indicates a state of facts bringing the case within the rule established in the case of Aiken v. Bruen above cited. And, if so, Barth's land would be primarily liable to satisfy these judgments, also the other lands only secondarily liable. If this conclusion be just, Barth has no right to complain that there has been any abuse or misapplication of the process of this court.

II. In support of the demurrer, it is urged that, even if the court has jurisdiction of the parties, there is no equity on the face of the bill on which a decree could be rightly rendered in favor of the complainant.

We have already anticipated and sustained this objection to some extent. The bill, however, is defective in many other respects. It materially violates the twentieth rule in equity established by the supreme court. It infringes a fundamental rule of pleading by omitting to give the full names of all the persons to whom it refers. Thus it describes certain plaintiffs as "Abraham Trounstine, et al.," "Henry G. Ely, et al.," "Day & Matlock." It refers to no exhibits. And, in fine, it shows the marks of haste and the want of care, to such an extent that any decree which we might render in favor of the complainant would, in our opinion, be erroneous.

Although, as the bill now stands, we might perhaps be justified in dismissing it, at this stage, for want of jurisdiction, as it yet may be improved by amendment stating to whom the release in question was executed, indicating whether the marshal executed a conveyance of the Barth land, giving the full Christian and surnames of all the persons referred to in it, putting it in the shape required by the twentieth equity rule of the supreme court, and otherwise reforming it, we will, for the present, merely sustain the demurrer, and give leave to the complainant to amend. If he should not choose to amend the bill will be dismissed for want of jurisdiction.

BARTHOLEW, (KINSING'S ASSIGNEE v.) See Case No. 7,831.

BARTHOLOMAE, (GOTTFRIED v.) See Case No. 5,632.

Case No. 1,070.

BARTHOLOMEW v. SAWYER et al.

[4 Blatchf. 347;[1] 1 Fish. Pat. Cas. 516; 41 Hunt, Mer. Mag. 575; 16 Leg. Int. 316.]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Sept. 16, 1859.

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS—PRIORITY—FOREIGN INVENTIONS—PUBLISHED DESCRIPTION—ACT JULY 4, 1836.

1. As, on the trial, there was no proof that the patentee, at the time of his application, did not believe himself to be the first inventor or discover of the thing patented; and as, at the time of the application, he made oath that he did believe that he was such first inventor and discover, it must be held, that, at the time of such application, it satisfactorily appeared that he believed himself to be the first inventor and discoverer of the thing patented.

2. No description, in any printed publication, of the thing patented can avoid the patent, unless such description in such printed publication, was prior in point of time to the invention of the plaintiff.

3. It appears, clearly, by the latter part of section 15 of the act of [July 4,] 1836, [5 Stat. 117,] that by the terms "not known or used by others before his or their discovery thereof," in section 6 of the same act, was not meant to be included a use in a foreign country, but that such use by itself would not avoid the patent.

4. In section 7 of the act of 1836, the terms "prior to the application" for a patent, refer only to the public use or sale of the invention with the applicant's consent or allowance. They do not refer to anything else.

[1] [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, District Judge, and by Samuel S. Fisher, Esq., and here compiled and reprinted by permission. Syllabus is from 1 Fish. Pat. Cas. 516, and the statement and opinion from 4 Blatchf. 347.]

5. And the terms "prior to the alleged invention of the applicant" refer to an invention or discovery of some one, other than the applicant, in this country, and also to a patent, or description in some printed publication in this or some foreign country.

[Cited in brief in Bain v. Morse, Case No. 754.]

6. The publication to void the patent must be anterior to the discovery of the patentee. It is not sufficient that it should be anterior to the application to the commissioner for a patent.

[7. Cited in White v. Allen, Case No. 17,535, to the point that he who invents first, although his invention is imperfect and incomplete, has the prior right if he is using the reasonable diligence prescribed by section 15, 5 Stat. 117, in perfecting and adapting the same.]

[At law. Action by Frederick Bartholomew against Nathaniel Sawyer and William S. Carr, for infringement of letters patent No. 11,113, granted June 20, 1854. Verdict was rendered for plaintiff. Heard on defendant's motion for a new trial. Denied.]

This was an action at law for the infringement of letters patent granted to the plaintiff, June 20th, 1854, for a cock used in water-closets. At the trial it appeared that the invention was made by the plaintiff as early as June, 1850, and that his application for the patent was made in February, 1853. Prior to the plaintiff's discovery of it, the thing patented was not known in the United States. It was claimed, by the defendants, that it was known and in public use in England and Scotland, before such discovery of it by the plaintiff. It was not claimed, however, and no evidence was offered to prove, that the plaintiff, at the time of his application to the patent office, knew of such use, or believed at that time that he was not the first discoverer and inventor. It was not made to appear that the same, or any substantial part thereof, had, at any time before his application for a patent, been patented in any country. No evidence was offered by the defendants to prove that the same, or any substantial part thereof, had, before the plaintiff's discovery in June, 1850, been described in any printed publication, although it was claimed by them, and evidence was offered to prove, that subsequent to the discovery of the plaintiff, and before his application for a patent, an engraving of the patented device, and a printed description of the same, without date, accompanying such engraving, was publicly exhibited at the Crystal Palace Exhibition, in London, in the year 1851, and was soon thereafter, and in the same year, brought to this country. The patented device was known and in use in this country, to a limited extent, as early as the year 1852, having been imported from England. During the trial, it was ruled by the court, that the patent of the plaintiff could not be avoided by the mere fact that the invention patented had been known and used in a foreign country before the discovery of the plaintiff. The court also ruled, that no description, in any printed publication, of the thing patented, could avoid the patent, unless such description in such printed publication was prior in point of time to the invention of the plaintiff, and so charged the jury. A verdict was rendered for the plaintiff, for $3,000. The defendants now moved for a new trial, on the ground that the court erred in so ruling and charging the jury; and that the court should have ruled and charged the jury, that, if the thing patented had been described in a printed publication, before the application of the plaintiff for a patent, that would avoid the patent, though it might have been after the invention of the plaintiff.

Charles M. Keller, for plaintiff.
William Tracy, for defendants.

Before NELSON, Circuit Justice, and INGERSOLL, District Judge.

INGERSOLL, District Judge. As, on the trial, there was no proof that the patentee did not, at the time of his application for a patent, believe himself to be the first inventor or discoverer of the thing patented, and as, at the time of his application, he made oath that he did believe that he was such first inventor and discoverer, it must be held, that it satisfactorily appears that, at the time of such application, he believed himself to be the original and first inventor and discoverer of the thing patented.

The 6th section of the patent act of July 4th, 1836, (5 Stat. 119,) provides, "that any person or persons having discovered or invented any new and useful art, machine, manufacture, or composition of matter, or any new and useful improvement on any art, machine, manufacture, or composition of matter, not known or used by others before his or their discovery or invention thereof, and not, at the time of his application for a patent, in public use or sale, with his consent or allowance, as the inventor or discoverer," may, on application to the commissioner of patents, obtain a patent for the thing invented or discovered. If the thing discovered or invented by the applicant was known or used before his discovery or invention, within the meaning of these terms, as used by the patent law, then no legal patent can be granted, and, if granted, the same cannot avail the patentee. It appears clearly, by the latter part of the 15th section of the same act, that a use in a foreign country was not meant to be included within the terms, above recited, "not known or used by others before his or their discovery or invention thereof," and that such use will not, by itself, avoid the patent. For, it is expressly provided, by the 15th section, "that whenever it shall satisfactorily appear, that the patentee, at the time of making his application for the patent, believed himself to be the first inventor or discoverer of the thing patented, the same shall not be held to be void on account of the invention or discovery, or any part thereof, having been before known or used in any foreign country." In the present case, it appeared, on the trial, that the patentee did, at the time of making his application for a patent, believe himself to be the first inventor or discoverer of the thing patented. The patent of the plaintiff, therefore, could not be avoided by the mere fact that the invention or discovery patented had been known or in use in a foreign country before the discovery of the plaintiff. It also appears, by the 7th section of the same act, that the use meant by these terms was intended to be confined to a use, discovery or invention in this country, made prior to the discovery or invention of the applicant, the proof of which prior use must be so limited, provided the patentee, at the time of his application, believed himself to be the first inventor or discoverer. The 7th section makes it the duty of the commissioner upon the application of anyone for a patent, to make an examination of the alleged new discovery or invention, and then provides, that "if, on any such examination, it shall not appear to the commissioner that the same had been invented or discovered by any other person in this country prior to the alleged invention or discovery thereof by the applicant, or that it had been patented or described in any printed publication in this or any foreign country, or had been in public use or sale, with the applicant's consent or allowance, prior to the application, if the commissioner shall deem it to be sufficiently useful and important, it shall be his duty to issue a patent therefor." The terms, in this section, "prior to the application" for a patent, refer only to the "public use or sale" (of the invention) "with the applicant's consent or allowance." They do not refer to anything else. And the terms, "prior to the alleged invention or discovery thereof by the applicant," refer to an invention or discovery by some one other than the applicant, in this country; and also to a patent or description in some printed publication in this or some foreign country. The true meaning of this section, taken by itself, is, that a patent shall issue to the applicant and be valid, if he is the originator and author of a useful invention or discovery, unless the thing invented by him had, prior to the alleged invention or discovery by the applicant, been invented or discovered or used by some one else in this country; or, unless the invention of the applicant had been patented or described in some printed publication, in this or some foreign country, prior to the alleged invention or discovery by the applicant; or, unless said invention of the applicant had been in public use, or on sale, with the applicant's consent or allowance, prior to his application to the commissioner for a patent. This latter restriction was modified by the act of March 3d, 1839, (5 Stat. 354,) so that the public sale or use, with the consent and allowance of the applicant, must, in order to forfeit his right, be more than two years before his application.

Other portions of the act of 1836 confirm the view thus taken of the subject. In the 15th section, it is provided that, upon the general issue, with notice, certain matters may be given in evidence, to avoid the patent. Among those matters are, that the thing patented had been described in some public work anterior to the supposed discovery thereof by the patentee, (not anterior to the application for a patent,) or that it had been in public use or on sale with the consent and allowance of the patentee, before his application for a patent. The publication, to avoid the patent, must be anterior to the discovery by the patentee. It is not sufficient that it should be anterior to the application to the commissioner for a patent.

It has been urged, that the proviso to the 15th section gives a different rule on this subject. That proviso is as follows: "That, whenever it shall satisfactorily appear, that the patentee, at the time of making his application for the patent believed himself to be the first inventor or discoverer of the thing patented, the same shall not be held to be void on account of the invention or discovery, or any part thereof, having been before known or used in any foreign country, it not appearing that the same, or any substantial part thereof, had before been patented, or described in any printed publication." It is claimed, that the time referred to by the terms, "having been before known or used in any foreign country," is the time when the application for the patent was made; and that the terms, "had before been patented, or described in any printed publication," refer, also, to the time when such application was made, and not to the time when the original invention or discovery was made. If there be any doubt as to the construction which this proviso should receive when considered by itself, the true construction of it is free from doubt, when it is considered in connection with other sections, and with the whole scope of the act. Viewed in such connection, it must be held, that the time referred to by the terms above recited, is the time when the original invention or discovery of the patentee was made, and not the time when he presented his application to the commissioner. Any other or different construction of this proviso would be in conflict with the whole scope of the act, and with the plain and clear enactments of certain parts of it, and would make several of its sections irreconcilable with each other.

With this view of the case, the motion for a new trial must be denied.

Case No. 1,071.

BARTHOLOMEW v. WEST et al.

[2 Dill. 290;[1] 8 N. B. R. 12; 7 West. Jur. 441.]

Circuit Court, D. Nebraska. 1872.

HOMESTEAD—ST. NEB. JUNE 22, 1867, CONSTRUED—TENANCY IN COMMON — DELAY IN CLAIMING EXEMPTION.

1. Under the statute of Nebraska relating to the homestead exemption, [Code, § 525,] the head of the family need not be the sole owner of the fee; it is sufficient, if the other requisites concur, that he has such an interest in the land as may be sold on execution.

[Cited in Re Swearinger, Case No. 13,683.]

2. The right to the homestead exemption is not lost by the delay of the husband to claim it until an order is applied for by the assignee in bankruptcy to sell the property for the benefit of the estate.

[3. Cited in Re Pratt, Case No. 11,370, to the point that occupation by the wife and family is equivalent to occupation by the husband.]

[Petition for review of the decision of the district court of the United States for the district of Nebraska.

[In bankruptcy. In the matter of West & Lewis; Bartholomew, assignee.] This is a petition by the assignee under the second section of the bankrupt act, to review an order of the district court refusing the application of the assignee for an order to sell lot 3 in block 66, in the town of Blair. [Petition for review dismissed.]

The ground of the refusal was that the property was exempt as a homestead. The claim of the bankrupt to a homestead is based upon the amendment to section 525 of the Code of Nebraska, which provides:—

"A homestead consisting of a quantity of contiguous land not exceeding two lots, being within an incorporated town, city, or village, owned and occupied by any resident of the state being the head of a family, shall not be subject to attachment, levy, or sale, upon execution or other process issuing out of any court of this state, so long as the same shall be owned and occupied by the debtor as such homestead." Act June 22, 1867, §§ 1–3, (Laws Neb. p. 91.)

In January, 1870, a petition in bankruptcy was filed against West & Lewis, and they were subsequently adjudicated bankrupts. West, one of the bankrupts, makes the claim in this case to the homestead exemption.

At a prior term of this court a decree was entered in favor of the assignee, setting aside as fraudulent the conveyance of the property to the wife of the bankrupt, but reserving all rights of homestead.

The other necessary facts appear in the opinion.

[1] [Reported by Hon. John F. Dillon, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

William O. Bartholomew, for petitioner for revision.

James W. Savage and Carrigan & Osborn, for West.

DILLON, Circuit Judge.—In March, 1869, the firm of West & Lewis determined to remove to the new town of Blair, then just laid out, with a view to reside and do business. Their lots were purchased mostly on credit, and a title bond received. On one of the lots a store building was erected; on another Lewis erected a house for a home for himself and family; and on the other —the lot now in question—a house was erected in the summer of 1869 by West, who at once moved into it with his family, where they have since resided. In December, 1869, the title bond, which had been taken in the name of the members of the firm of West & Lewis, was assigned to West's father without consideration. The father thereupon procured the legal title from the town proprietor, and after the bankruptcy of West & Lewis, the father conveyed the lot to Mrs. West without any valuable consideration. In January, 1870, the firm was thrown into bankruptcy. At a former term the court decided that the assignment of the title bond and the conveyance to the wife were fraudulent as against the assignee, and a decree was entered to the effect that the property was subject to the payment of the debts of the bankrupts, reserving, however, all right to a homestead, such right not being put in issue in that suit. [Unreported.]

In that case the wife made an ineffectual attempt to show that the lot was purchased and paid for with her money. It appears that she was possessed of some property, that it was sold and the proceeds delivered to the husband, who also put them into the firm, and that when the cash payment was made on the lot, and some of the payments for the improvements, it was out of money or means drawn by the husband from the firm; but there is no satisfactory evidence that the property was otherwise purchased with her money, or that it was held in trust for her.

I find from the evidence, although the title bond was taken in the name of the firm, that in point of fact the understanding of the members of the firm was that Lewis should own in severalty the lot on which he built his house, and that West should own in severalty the lot in question.

The assignee resisted the claim to a homestead, first, on the ground that the lot or property was either partnership property, or held by Lewis & West as tenants in common, and that the statute of Nebraska does not give a homestead unless the party claiming it is the sole owner.

But I find that, in fact, it was not partnership property as respects the co-partners, nor was it held by them as tenants in common. But if it were owned by them as tenants in common, I do not admit that a homestead right could not be asserted to it in favor of the head of a family who would otherwise be entitled to the exemption. The authorities, however, are conflicting: 1 Amer. Law Reg. (N. S.) 652, 654, 655, and cases cited.[2] See, also, and compare Thurston v. Maddocks, 6 Allen, 427; Smith v. Smith, 12 Cal. 216; McQuade v. Whaley, 31 Cal. 531; Thorn v. Thorn, 14 Iowa, 49.

But it is not now necessary to decide the point, as I find Lewis & West were not tenants in common in respect to this lot, but that there had been an equitable partition of the lots purchased, and that this was West's.

When the statute speaks of property owned by a debtor, it does not mean that the ownership must be of the full legal title. It is sufficient that the interest be such as may be sold on execution or subjected to the payment of debts. And although the husband in this case had only a title bond, this made him the owner in such a sense as to entitle him, the other requisites concurring, to the benefit of the statute of Nebraska on the subject of homestead exemption: 1 Amer. Law Reg. (N. S.) 652, and cases cited;[2] Pelan v. De Bevard, 13 Iowa, 53. See, also, Stewart v. Brown, 37 N. Y. 350.

It is next insisted that if West were otherwise entitled to a homestead, the right has been lost by reason of the fraudulent assignment of the title bond to his father, and the subsequent conveyance to the wife. If it had appeared in the other suit that the property was exempt as a homestead, and that creditors had no claim upon it, the court would undoubtedly have dismissed the bill of the assignee. But I have elsewhere held that where a fraudulent conveyance is made and set aside at the instance of the assignee, the husband or head of the family is not estopped to set up the right to a homestead exemption: Cox v. Wilder, [Case No. 3,308.] To that view I still adhere.

I am of opinion that the right to the exemption has not been lost by delay. When the assignee applied for an order to sell the property, it was competent for the husband to resist it, as he did, on the ground that the property was his homestead and exempt as such.

The petition for review is dismissed. Petition dismissed.

NOTE, [from original report.] See Cox v. Wilder, [Case No. 3,308,] and cases cited in note; In re Cross, [Id. 3,426,] and note.

[2] [Deere v. Chapman, 25 Ill. 610; 33 Miss. 462; Peland v. De Bevard, (Iowa, 1862,) 13 Iowa, 53; Horn v. Tufts, 39 N. H. 478; Wolf v. Fleischacker, 5 Cal. 244; Reynolds v. Pixley, 6 Cal. 165; Giblin v. Jordan, Id. 416; Kellersberger v. Kopp, Id. 563.]

Case No. 1,072.

BARTLE v. COLEMAN.

[3 Cranch, C. C. 283.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. April Term, 1828.[2]

EQUITY—PARTNERSHIP ACCOUNTS—PARTIES—GOVERNMENT CONTRACT—CORRUPTION.

1. In a suit in equity, for the settlement of the accounts of a partnership consisting of three persons, one of whom is dead, insolvent, his next of kin, or other personal representatives, are necessary parties.

2. A court of equity will not sustain a suit to compel the settlement of the concerns of partners in a government contract, in the profits of which the agent of the government, who made the contract, was to participate.

[See note at end of case.]

[In equity. Bill by Andrew Bartle against George Coleman upon a partnership account. Bill dismissed. This was afterwards affirmed by the supreme court in Bartle v. Nutt, 4 Pet. (29 U. S.) 184.]

The bill charges that, in 1814, a contract was entered into between the complainant and the government of the United States, for rebuilding Fort Washington; that this contract was made, on the part of the United States, by Ferdinand Marsteller, a deputy quartermaster-general; that, when the contract was made, it was agreed between the complainant, the defendant Coleman, and the said F. Marsteller, that each should receive one-third of the profits of the contract; that, when the work was finished and measured, it was supposed that the profits amounted to $4,500, and the sum of $1,500 advanced to Coleman, the defendant, for his share; that afterwards frauds to a great amount, were discovered on the part of F. M., by means of the information of the complainant to the department of war, and that great deductions were made from the price of the labor and materials, so that, instead of a profit, the loss upon the concern was $10,538; one half of which the complainant claims against the defendant Coleman, as Marsteller had died totally insolvent, leaving no personal property nor personal representative. The bill seeks an account and general relief. The answer of the defendant denied the partnership, but admitted that he was agent for disbursing the money, and entitled to a commission for the same.

Mr. Taylor, for the defendant, contended that the personal representatives, or next of kin, of F. Marsteller, should have been made parties, as the bill admits him to have been a partner in the profits of the contract. Madd. Ch. Pr. 148, 154, 155; 1 Harr. Ch. Pr. c. 3, p. 76. That the court ought not to lend its aid to enforce a contract founded in a fraud upon the United States. The fraud is admitted in the bill itself.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

[2] [Affirmed in 4 Pet. (29 U. S.) 184.]

Mr. Jones, contra, contended that, as F. Marsteller died insolvent and left no personal representative, it was not necessary that his next of kin should be parties. The solvent partners are liable inter se, for the loss by the insolvent partner.

CRANCH, Chief Judge, after stating at large the evidence of the partnership of the defendant in the transaction, said:—

We think, therefore, that the fact of partnership between the plaintiff and defendant and F. Marsteller is established.

The next question is, whether the court can make a final decree, unless the personal representatives be made parties in the cause? We think we cannot. Mr. Marsteller was equally interested with the plaintiff and defendant in the profit or loss upon the government contract. The interests of his personal representatives are equally affected by the settlement of the account. But even if they were parties, we are of opinion that the copartnership was a fraud upon the United States, and that a court of equity ought not to lend its aid to either of the partners against the other. It is proved that Mr. Marsteller himself was the agent of the government in making the contract; and it is expressly averred in the plaintiff's bill, "that, when this contract was made, it was understood and agreed between George Coleman, the defendant, and Ferdinand Marsteller, now deceased, that they should share with your orator the profits of the contract; that is to say, that each should receive one third of the profits." If this be not fraud per se, it is such strong evidence of it that the court, in the absence of all exculpatory proof, must consider the transaction as fraudulent. No such exculpatory proof is produced; but the plaintiff himself avers that great frauds were committed upon the government by Mr. Marsteller. Under these circumstances, this court, as a court of equity, will not lend its aid to enforce this iniquitous agreement, but will leave the parties to their legal remedies. The bill must be dismissed, but without costs.

MORSELL, Circuit Judge, concurred. THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent.

[NOTE. This decree was afterwards affirmed by the supreme court on the ground that "public morals, public justice, and the well-established principles of all judicial tribunals" forbid the interposition of courts of justice to lend their aid to enforce a contract which began with the corruption of a public officer. The opinion was delivered by Mr. Justice Baldwin. Bartle v. Nutt, 4 Pet. (29 U. S.) 184.]

BARTLE, (UNITED STATES v.) See Case No. 14,531.

Case No. 1,073.

BARTLEMAN v. DOUGLASS.

[1 Cranch, C. C. 450.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov. Term, 1807.

PLEADING—ASSUMPSIT—RELEASE—FRAUD.

1. An agreement by the plaintiff to release the defendant upon his executing a deed, is a good defence in assumpsit, the deed being executed.

2. A promise by the defendant to pay the plaintiff an additional sum is a fraud upon the other creditors, and is void.

At law. Assumpsit. Non assumpsit and issue.

Mr. E. J. Lee, for the defendant, gave in evidence an agreement of the plaintiff and other of his creditors, to release him on executing a deed of his property to such trustees as the subscribers should appoint, and that he executed such a deed.

Mr. Swan, for the plaintiff, contended. 1. That the plaintiff never approved the trustees, or the deed. 2. That no release was ever executed by the plaintiff. 3. That the defendant promised to secure the plaintiff in another debt due from the defendant and another.

Mr. E. J. Lee, in reply, cited Cockshot v. Bennett, 2 Term R. 763, and Butler v. Rhodes, Peake, 238.

THE COURT (FITZHUGH, Circuit Judge, contra) refused to instruct the jury that the agreement and deed did not make a good defence at law; being of opinion that the agreement bound the plaintiff to give a release upon the execution of the deed, and a court of equity would have compelled him to execute it; and that in assumpsit it ought to be admitted in evidence on the general issue, it being a fraud upon the defendant as well as upon the other creditors that the plaintiff should refuse to execute the deed after the others had executed it. See Heathcote v. Crookshanks, 2 Term R. 24; Jackson v. Duchaire, 3 Term R. 551; and Jackson v. Lomas, 4 Term R. 166.

BARTLEMAN, (SCOTT v.) See Case No. 12,524.

Case No. 1,074.

BARTLEMAN v. SMARR.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 16.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. Term, 1810.

AFFIDAVIT TO HOLD TO BAIL.

[Cited in Clarke v. Druet, Case No. 2,850.]

Mr. Law, for the defendant, moved to appear without bail. There was an affidavit filed, charging the defendant in the following manner: "1809, Oct. 5. To goods per bill, $19.89," with an affidavit "that the above account is just and true."

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

THE COURT was of opinion that it was not a sufficient affidavit to hold the defendant to bail.

Case No. 1,075.

BARTLETT et al. v. BUDD et al.

[1 Lowell, 223.] [1]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. Feb. Term, 1868.

ANIMALS—CONVERSION OF DEAD WHALE—SALVAGE SET-OFF—DAMAGES.

1. A whale killed and taken into complete possession is the property of the taker, who may maintain an action against one who afterwards appropriates it, whether with or without knowledge of his title.

2. Held, that an alleged usage that a whale found adrift in the ocean is the property of the finder unless reclaimed by the owner before it is cut in, was not proved in this case. Quaere, whether such a usage would be valid?

[Cited in Swift v. Gifford, Case No. 13,696; Ghen v. Rich, 8 Fed. 160.]

3. Salvage cannot be given by way of set-off when the finder has throughout contested the title of the owner.

4. The measure of damages adopted in Bourne v. Ashley, [Case No. 1,699,] adhered to.

[Cited in Guibert v. The George Bell, 3 Fed. 585.]

In admiralty. Libel by [Ivory H. Bartlett and others] the owners of the bark Canton Packet, of New Bedford, against [John Budd and others] the owners of the ship Emerald, of Sag Harbor, for the value of a whale. [Decree for libellants.]

The first officer of the libellants' vessel killed several whales one afternoon in July, 1856, in a bay of the Okhotsk sea, and one of these he anchored in five fathoms of water, with an anchor which he borrowed from the mate of the Brunswick, and attached to the body what whalemen call a waif, that is, some article belonging to a whale-boat which may serve as a signal; in this case, a paddle and sail, and went on shore at some distance, for the night. The next morning two boats of the Emerald found the whale and towed it to their ship where it was cut in and boiled down. The witnesses on behalf of the respondents testified that they found the whale adrift, the anchor not holding, the cable coiled round the whale's body, and no waif or irons attached to it. The original taker swore that he notified them on the spot that the whale was his. This they all denied.

[1] [Reported by Hon. John Lowell, LL. D., District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

T. M. Stetson, for libellants.
J. C. Stone, for respondents.

LOWELL, District Judge. A whale, being ferae naturae, does not become property until a firm possession has been established in the taker. But when such possession has become firm and complete, the right of property is clear, and has all the characteristics of property. Upon the evidence, the right to this whale appears to stand on the same footing as the right to the anchor attached to it, which was very properly restored to its owner: Taber v. Jenny, [Case No. 13,720.]

The respondents here, as in Taber v. Jenny, set up a usage that a whale found adrift in the ocean is the property of the finder, unless the first taker shall appear and claim it before it is cut in. To this the libellants' witnesses reply that the usage only applies to whales found with no marks of appropriation excepting harpoons or "irons." And they give the very plausible reason for this distinction that irons are not in fact sure signs that the whale has ever been captured; because it may, and often does, escape after being wounded, and die at a very considerable distance of time and place from that of its being struck. These witnesses go farther, and affirm that the usage does not obtain at all in bays and harbors, but only off soundings. Without deciding the last point, I find the preponderance of evidence to be very strong in favor of the libellants' version of the usage in the matter of the definite marks by an anchor, or other sure sign of actual capture. And if it were not so, there would be great difficulty in upholding a custom that should take the property of A. and give it to B. under so very short and uncertain a substitute for the statute of limitations, and one so open to fraud and deceit. I do not, however, here pass upon the limits within which usage may reasonably vary, whether upon the one side or the other, the strict law of the pursuit and capture of whales and their appropriation, but decide that this whale was the property of the libellants.

This is not a case of salvage, because the conduct of the finders was inconsistent with the idea of a saving for the benefit of the true owners. Taber v. Jenny, ubi supra. A libel for a conversion of the whale is the true remedy, and that has been adopted.

For the reasons given by me in another case, I am unable to adopt the rule of damages which Judge Sprague followed under the peculiar circumstances of Taber v. Jenny, but pronounce for the value of the whale in the Okhotsk sea in July, 1856, to be ascertained in the mode laid down in my former decision [Bourne v. Ashley, Case No. 1,699] with interest and costs.

Case No. 1,076.

BARTLETT v. CRITTENDEN et al.

[5 McLean, 32;[1] 7 West. Law J. 49.]

Circuit Court, D. Ohio. Nov. Term, 1849.

LITERARY PROPERTY—DEDICATION — COPYRIGHT—INJUNCTION TO RESTRAIN INFRINGEMENT.

1. An author has a common law right in his manuscript, and is entitled to an injunction to restrain the publication of it.

[Cited in Boucicault v. Fox, Case No. 1,691; The Mark Twain Case, 14 Fed. 731; Henry Bill Pub. Co. v. Smythe, 27 Fed. 926. See, also, Wheaton v. Peters, 8 Pet. (33 U. S.) 591, 656; Little v. Hall, 18 How. (59 U. S.) 165; Keene v. Wheatley, Case No. 7,644; Parton v. Prang, Id. 10,784.]

2. But when the work is published, the author has not, by the common law, an exclusive right to re-publish it.

[Cited in Parton v. Prang, Case No. 10,784; The Mark Twain Case, 14 Fed. 730. See, also, Wheaton v. Peters, 8 Pet. (33 U. S.) 591; Keene v. Wheatley, Case No. 7,644; Keene v. Kimball, 16 Gray, 549; Pulte v. Derby, Case No. 11,465.]

3. Since the statute of Anne, the author has no exclusive right to republish his work in England.

4. The first publication is a dedication of the work to the public.

5. The common law gives protection to the author for his manuscript only.

6. But the 9th section of the copyright act of 1831, [4 Stat. 438,] also protects the author's right to his manuscript.

7. The whole of the manuscript need not be printed. If a substantial part of it be taken, chancery will enjoin its publication, on the application of the author, or his legal representatives.

8. The novelty of a work on book-keeping, must necessarily consist in the plan or mode of keeping accounts. The items of debt and credit are only used to illustrate the principle of the work.

9. Private letters are within the statute, and their publication will be restrained.

10. The author's property in the manuscripts may be transferred, or abandoned, like any other right of property.

[In equity. Bill by R. M. Bartlett to restrain A. F. Crittenden and others from infringement of copyright. Injunction granted.]

Walker & Kebler, for complainant.

Storer & Gwynne, for respondents.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This bill is brought to protect the copyright of the complainant, in a manuscript work on book-keeping, of which he claims to be the author; and the defendant is alleged to have published a work on the same subject, which the complainant charges was copied from his manuscript. For twelve years and upwards, the complainant has been engaged in teaching the art of keeping books, and has used his work, which is still in manuscript, in his school, with the view of rendering it more perfect, and with the intention of publishing it. The work of the defendant contains two hundred and seven pages, ninety-two of which are alleged to have been taken from the plaintiff's manuscript, with only colorable alterations. The answers deny the allegations in the bill.

A reference was made to a master, with special instructions, who reports, "that the book of the respondents contains a portion of plaintiff's manuscript, with only slight alterations; and he says that it is impossible that the book and the manuscript could have been composed by two persons, neither having for his guide the entries of the other. The balance sheets are the same in both. As regards the plan and arrangement, they are the same. The book contains explanations, which are valuable to the learner, that are not in the manuscript. Both works consist of a series of brief sets of mercantile books by double entry." The master reports, that the plan of the work in the manuscript and in print, is substantially the same; that in the book there are explanations interspersed through the series of sets, which the manuscript does not contain; that these explanations are of great use to the learner, but that they may be verbally given with equal advantage. The system in the manuscript, the master states, is superior to any he has seen, except that of the book published by the defendant, which is the same in substance, "that, unlike all the systems he had seen, the manuscript is made up of a few brief sets of mercantile books, which show the entire process of ordinary double entry book-keeping, and in a compass of very little magnitude;" and he says, that "he discovers in other treatises nothing bearing a resemblance to the manuscript plan. He therefore concludes that the plan is original." "The manuscript, in its present state, (the master says,) contains substantially a system of book-keeping, suitable to be used by a teacher in his school." "As the system, when published, becomes its own teacher, it should be accompanied with such precise explanations as may be necessary to a proper understanding and use of it by the uninitiated. It should also be accompanied with forms of the auxiliary books."

Jonathan Jones, of St. Louis, a witness, states, that in 1841 he opened a school in St. Louis, as the partner of the complainant, for instruction in book-keeping on Bartlett's plan, which consists "of eleven sets of books, with a balance sheet for each set, and an inventory attached, showing property on hand, and that Bartlett was the author of them; that his manuscript contains a perfect system of book-keeping, and differs from all others in arrangement, being composed of short exercises." The defendant, Crittenden, entered the school, ignorant of book-keeping; and after completing the course, he took charge of the writing department for a short time. In 1846, Crittenden called on the witness with a copy of his work, which, on examining, the witness found to be Bartlett's system. And Crittenden then told him, that when he was in Bartlett & Co.'s school, he took a precise copy of the manuscript, with the view of publishing it; and that he did publish it in 1845. And the witness says, if all of Bartlett's manuscript were struck from Crittenden's book, there would not be enough left for a title-page. A copy of Bartlett's manuscript was used at the St. Louis school, and witness never prohibited any of the learners from copying it. Crittenden knew that it was Bartlett's manuscript, and that he intended to publish it as soon as he could make the necessary arrangements. Witness has heard Bartlett frequently say so. Witness gave Crittenden a letter to Bartlett, referring to the published work, that Bartlett might see it. To Josiah Bliss, a witness, Crittenden said, that his system was the same as Bartlett's. Nine other witnesses, who are book-keepers, being sworn, state, that Bartlett's system of book-keeping is new; and that its plan and arrangement are preferable to any other. And they say that Crittenden's book is the same in substance.

[1] [Reported by Hon. John McLean, Circuit Justice.]

On the part of the defendant, James T. Annan was sworn, who says that he has been a book-keeper for fifteen years,—has examined Bartlett's system, and finds nothing new or original in it, either in the forms of stating the accounts, or in the arrangement, or in any particular; that the materials are not new in matter or form; nothing could be taught by it without rules and explanations, and auxiliary books; and that it is wholly unfit for publication; that a cash book is essential to a complete system, and that Bartlett substitutes for it a cash account. The individual who conducts the business is not named in the exhibit, and there are no indexes. Richard Miller, who has been a book-keeper for twenty-five years, agrees with the statement of Annan, and adds, that in Bartlett's plan, there is properly no day-book, only a waste-book, from which to make the day-book entries. John Gundry has been a book-keeper and teacher for seven years, and he agrees with Annan. He says Bartlett has more sets than usual; but he had used the same, or about the same number, more or less. Bartlett's plan contains no definition of terms, such as drafts, bills of exchange, acceptances, &c.,—no mercantile forms, such as bills receivable and payable, account of sales, account current, &c.,—no forms of calculations, viz: interest, discount, commission, equation of payments, reduction of currencies. But he says, that no work has come to his knowledge wherein the theory has been carried out to so great an extent as in Bartlett's, though many authors have recommended it. He never saw the identical entries until the spring of 1842, when he examined Bartlett's manuscript. In 1845, witness united with Bacon to teach book-keeping, who had been using Bartlett's system, and they continue to use it in the school.

The complainant claims relief on two grounds: 1. At common law. 2. Under the act of congress 3d February, 1831, [4 Stat. 438.]

In the case of Wheaton v. Peters, 8 Pet. [33 U. S.] 655, the supreme court say: "That an author, at common law, has a property in his manuscript, and may obtain redress against any one who deprives him of it, or by improperly obtaining a copy, endeavors to realize a profit by its publication, cannot be doubted." And again, page 661, "An author has, by the common law, a property in his manuscript; and there can be no doubt that the rights of an assignee of such manuscript would be protected by a court of chancery." In combating the argument in the same case, that an author had a common law right to republish his own works, and to prohibit others from doing so, the court showed that after the statute of Anne there was no such right in England, and that if such right were shown to exist there, it did not follow that it exists to the same extent in Pennsylvania. That the common law in this country exists in the different states, as modified by them by statutory enactments and judicial decisions. But the question under consideration is very different from the one decided in the above case. We have to say whether the writer has a right of property in his own manuscripts. That he has such a property in his own literary labor, until he shall relinquish it by contract or by some unequivocal act, would seem to be clear. This is laid down in Maugh. Lit. Prop. 74, 137; Webb v. Rose, 4 Burrows, 2330; Pope v. Curl, 2 Atk. 342; Manley v. Owen, 4 Burrows, 2329; Southey v. Sherwood, 2 Mer. 435; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 943. Lord Mansfield, and some others, distinguished for their great learning and ability, have considered the publication of a work not as such a dedication of it to the public by the author at common law, as to deprive him of an exclusive right to republish it. With the greatest respect for these opinions, we think there is a difference in principle between the right to republish a printed work, and the exclusive right of an author to publish his own manuscript. A man may write without any intention to publish. He may treat of principles and characters without restraint—with a view to his mental improvement, or from some other motive, without incurring any responsibility so long as the manuscript remains unpublished. It is, therefore, essential, in all proceedings for a libel, to prove publication. And there is no law which can compel an author to publish. No one can determine this essential matter of publication but the author. His manuscripts, however valuable, cannot, without his consent, be seized by his creditors as property. They are valueless to all the world except to the author and his representatives; or to such persons as he shall transfer them. But the author who publishes his work, dedi-cates it to the public. He voluntarily incurs all the responsibility of a publisher. His object is to instruct or amuse mankind, and the more his work is circulated, the greater is the compliment to his ability as a writer. There is no reason, then, against a republication of the work by any one, except that it may reduce the profits of the author. And, on this ground, he cannot complain, as he has failed to secure the right under the statute. If the common law protects the rights of an author, as contended for, the statute was useless. An action for damages and an injunction, would as effectually protect the rights of an author, as any provisions of the statutes. But there is another view, which is still more conclusive, against the exclusive right to republish a printed work. The statute limits the right to a term of years. The common law right, if it exist, is without limitation. To hold, then, that there is a common law right, independently of the statute, is to disregard the statute. Whilst the common law protects the right of the author to his manuscripts, it cannot be made to extend to the republication of a published work. As well might it be contended that the inventor of a machine, after it has gone into general use, by the acts of the inventor, may, by the common law, claim the exclusive right of making and selling it. But we think this case is within the act of congress referred to. The section 9 of that act—4 Pet. St. 438, [4 Stat. 438]—provides: "That any person or persons who shall print or publish any manuscript whatever, without the consent of the author or legal proprietor first obtained, shall be liable to suffer, and pay to the author or proprietor, all damages occasioned by such injury, to be recovered by a special action on the case founded on this act." "And the several courts of the United States empowered to grant injunction to prevent the violation of the rights of authors and inventors, are hereby empowered to grant injunctions," &c.

That the complainant is the author of the manuscript in question, is proved. And it also appears, from the statement of the experts, and by the reports of the master, that the manuscript contains a new and useful system of bookkeeping. The novelty consists in the mode of keeping accounts. It can consist in nothing else. The names and figures used in the items of debit and credit, are of no importance; as they are only used to illustrate the mode or principle of the work. The manuscript was contained on different sheets or cards, for the convenience of teaching; but this is immaterial. Its parts were necessarily connected. Three or four of the witnesses state that there is no novelty in the manuscript—nothing that had not been taken from, or might not be found in different works on book-keeping. But this is contrary to the views of the witnesses generally, and, especially, to the report of the master. The objection that the manuscript does not contain a complete system, as explanatory notes, &c., are necessary and usual in such works, to enable the student to learn the art of book-keeping without an instructor, is not sustainable. A surreptitious publication of an important part of the manuscript, is equally within the principle of the statute. But the notes are only explanatory of the system, as contained in the body of the work. They facilitate the progress of the learner, but they add nothing to the system. From the weight of the evidence, including the master's report, Bartlett's system may be said to be complete for the purpose of teaching. Was there a publication of the manuscript of the complainant by the defendant? He has denied in his answer, somewhat equivocally, the charge of publication, as made in the bill. He confessed to Jones, that he took a copy of the manuscript, with a view of publishing it, and that he did publish it in 1845. After the publication of his book, he admitted, to other witnesses, that the system of his work was the same as Bartlett's. It seems Crittenden became a student in the school of Bartlett and Jones, conducted by Jones at St. Louis, and in which he acquired his knowledge of bookkeeping. The manuscript of Bartlett was used in that school, and it was there that the defendant made out his copy.

Independently of this proof, a comparison of the book with the manuscript, will show that at least ninety-two pages of the book were substantially copied from the manuscript. The master says that they could not be the production of two minds. So nearly are they identical, that no one can read them without at once perceiving that one must have been copied from the other. The system is the same in both, and the discrepancies that appear only show the intent of the copyist. It is believed that there is no case in the books where the piracy is more palpable. The inconsistency of Jones in giving a letter to Crittenden, recommending him and his book to Bartlett; is explained in his testimony. He gave the letter to bring the fact of publication to Bartlett's notice. This act of the witness, though apparently inconsistent with his statements, does not destroy his credibility. He must have known, as he states, that the book contained Bartlett's system; but it was not for him to say, or to know, whether Crittenden, under the circumstances, was liable to an action for the publication. The facts of the case go strongly to show the probability that Crittenden told Jones, as he swears, that he copied Bartlett's manuscript.

It is argued, to bring the case within the ninth section, that the whole of any manuscript must be published; that the principle of law in relation to colorable alterations of a printed book, or a fair abridgment of it, does not apply under this section to a manuscript. If the whole of the manuscript must be published, will the omission of a line or a word, evade the statute? That it will, would seem to be the argument of the counsel. Under such a construction, the question might well be asked, of what value to an author is the statute? It purports to protect him against a fraudulent use of his manuscript; but practically it gives him no protection. It has been passed in mockery of his right. He is the sport of every man who has the disposition and the opportunity to pirate his manuscript. No such rule of construction is admissible. Has a substantial part of the manuscript been published? Does the book of the defendant contain Bartlett's system of book-keeping? Of this there can be no doubt. Such a publication is within the above section. It renders the manuscript valueless.

Was there an abandonment of the manuscript by Bartlett? This is the only remaining point to be considered, and it is the one most relied on in the defence. It satisfactorily appears from the evidence, that Bartlett intended to publish his manuscript. And this is only material on the question of abandonment. His right of property in no way depends on his intention in this respect. His manuscript was used in the school taught by himself in Cincinnati, and by the partnership school taught by Jones in St. Louis. In both these schools the manuscript was studied by the pupils, and they were required to copy certain parts of it, and were at liberty to copy the whole. These schools, and especially the one at Cincinnati, have been in operation several years. And under these circumstances, it is contended, there was an abandonment of the manuscript.

Bartlett's right of property in his manuscript may be transferred or abandoned, the same as any other right of property. Where the copy-right of a published work is secured, under the statute, the author, by using the work in imparting instruction to his pupils, or by disposing of it to a friend, does not thereby transfer his exclusive right to publish it, or incur a suspicion that he intends to abandon it. And how does this differ from the case under consideration? In both cases the law gives a right of property to the author, and a remedy to enforce that right. And in both cases he may transfer or abandon that right. The evidence of a transfer or abandonment must be as clear and as specific in the one case as in the other. An acquiescence in the publication of his manuscript, or in the republication of his printed book, would authorize the presumption of an assignment or of an abandonment. To make a gift of a copy of the manuscript is no more a transfer of the right or abandonment of it, than it would be a transfer or an abandonment of an exclusive right to republish, to give the copy of a printed work. In his treatise on Equity, (section 943,) Mr. Justice Story says, "In cases of literary, scientific, and professional treatises in manuscript, it is obvious, that the author must be deemed to possess the original ownership, and be entitled to appropriate them to such uses as he shall please. Nor can he justly be deemed to intend to part with that ownership by depositing them in the possession of a third person, or by allowing a third person to take and hold a copy of them. Such acts must be deemed strictly limited, in point of right, use, and effect, to the very occasions expressed or implied, and ought not to be construed as a general gift or authority for any purposes of profit or publication, to which the receiver may choose to devote them." And he says, to prevent the publication of manuscripts, without the consent of the author, an injunction should be issued. Even the publication of private letters by the person to whom they were addressed, may be enjoined. This is done upon the ground that the writer has a right of property in his letters, and that they can only be used by the receiver for the purposes for which they were written. So far as this, and, in justification or defense, an individual has an interest in letters received by him. Eden, Inj. c. 13, pp. 275, 276; Duke of Queensberry v. Shebbeare, 2 Eden, 329; Southey v. Sherwood, 2 Mer. 435, 436; Macklin v. Richardson, Amb. 694; Pope v. Curl, 2 Atk. 342; Lord Perceval v. Phipps, 2 Ves. & B. 19, 24; Gee v. Pritchard, 2 Swanst. 403, 415, 422, 425. "No length of time will authorize the publication of an author's original manuscript without his consent." In 1804, the court of sessions of Scotland interdicted, at the instance of the children, the publication of the manuscript letters of the poet Burns. Cadell v. Stewart, 1 Bell, Comm. 116n. Lectures, oral or written, cannot be published without the consent of the lecturer, though taken down when delivered. Manuscript reports were copied by the clerk of a gentleman, to whom the author had lent them, and the chancellor granted an injunction to restrain the publication. Forrester v. Waller, 2 Eden, 328; Eden, Inj. 322. The earl of Clarendon delivered to defendant's ancestor, the manuscript of the second part of his father's History of the Rebellion, with liberty to take a copy of it, and make what use of it he thought fit. Complainant, who was Lord Clarendon's representative, obtained an injunction from Lord Northington, who said, that it could not have been the donor's intention that the donee should print the work, though he might make every use of it except that. Duke of Queensberry v. Shebbeare, 2 Eden, 329. Lord Eldon refused to grant an injunction, until the right was tried at law, where the manuscript had been in the hands of a publisher twenty-three years, and had not been called for by the plaintiff. Southey v. Sherwood, 2 Mer. 435. Sparks had procured, from the representatives of Washington, the right of publishing his letters and other writings, and had done so in twelve volumes. Upham, in his Life of Washington, had taken many of these letters from Sparks, they never having been published before. On a bill filed, Mr. Justice Story said: "Unless there be a most unequivocal dedication of private letters and papers by the author, either to the public or some private person, I hold that the author has a property therein, and that the copyright thereof exclusively belongs to him." And he granted an injunction. Folsom v. Marsh, [Case No. 4,901.] The manuscript of Bartlett was used in his school at Cincinnati, and in the school at St. Louis, for the purpose of imparting instruction to the pupils, and it does not appear, from the evidence that copies were required or permitted to be taken of it for any other purpose. There is nothing in the testimony from which an implication can arise, that Bartlett consented to the publication of his manuscript by the defendant, or that he ever abandoned it. It seems he was much excited when he was informed of the publication of Crittenden, and, shortly afterwards, instituted this suit.

An injunction will be granted to restrain the defendants from a further publication of the first 92 pages of the work, or sale of it; and a reference is made to a master to ascertain the number of copies sold, and the number on hand, &c., and that he report at the next term.

[NOTE. For prior litigation between the same parties involving the same subject-matter, see Bartlette v. Crittenden, Case No. 1,082.]

BARTLETT, (GOODHUE v.) See Case No. 5,538.

Case No. 1,077.

BARTLETT v. KANE.

[Taney, 186.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Maryland. April Term, 1852.[2]

CUSTOMS DUTIES—APPRAISEMENT—POWER OF SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY—PRODUCTION OF DOCUMENTS — RECOVERY OF PENALTY PAID UNDER PROTEST.

1. In an action against the collector of customs, to recover duties paid under protest, on an importation of Peruvian bark, where it appeared, that the official appraisers, under instructions of the secretary of the treasury, had predicated their valuation of the bark on the quantity of sulphate of quinine produced by the several packages in the invoice: held, that the secretary of the treasury had no power to fix a chemical analysis of bark as the only test of its dutiable value.

[See note at end of case.]

2. The law of congress fixes the duties upon the market value at the port of exportation; the purchaser must and can only look at the fair market value of the article among those trading in it at the port of exportation; and he can only be required to adopt the methods usually adopted by merchants in making purchases.

3. But still the appraisers, when they suspect a wrong done to the government, have a right to employ this means as a test by which, with the other knowledge and information in their power, they may be able to arrive at a correct estimate of the true value of the article imported.

4. An appeal from the decision of the official appraisers to that of merchant appraisers was made by the importers; but on the official appraisers demanding of them the production of all documents connected with the importation, they refused to comply with the demand, withdrew the appeal, and paid the duties under protest: held, that the parties, by withdrawing their appeal, and refusing to produce the papers called for, had fixed the correctness of the appraisement.

[See note at end of case.]

5. The appraisers had the right to call for these papers, whether with the view of correcting their own judgment, if erroneous, or of laying them before the merchant appraisers, in the event of a prosecution of the appeal.

[See note at end of case.]

6. A refusal to produce papers admitted to be in a party's possession, raises the strongest inference that the papers, if produced, would operate against the person holding them.

7. The act of congress (30th August, 1842, [5 Stat. 564,] § 17) makes it, in such a case as this, conclusive proof, that the papers, when produced, would be demonstrative against the pretensions of the party having them in his possession.

8. A demand for these papers could properly be made by the official appraisers, even after their own decision had been given.

9. Where the penalty of twenty per cent. is imposed on an importation, because of the excess of the market value, over the invoiced value, which is paid under protest, and such importation, having only been entered for warehousing, is afterwards exported elsewhere for sale: held, that the importer was not, for this reason, entitled to recover back the amount of the penalty so paid.

[See note at end of case.]

[At law. Suit by Edwin Bartlett against George P. Kane, collector of the port of Baltimore, to recover customs duties alleged to have been illegally exacted. Verdict and judgment for defendant. This judgment was afterwards affirmed in 16 How. (57 U. S.) 263. See note at end of case.]

It is admitted that, in the month of September, 1849, the barque St. Joseph brought to the port of Baltimore, six hundred and fourteen seroons of Peruvian bark, shipped at Arica, in Peru, in January preceding, and consigned to the plaintiff, residing in New York, as appears from the invoice, a copy of which is herewith filed, marked A. That said bark belonged to Messrs. Pinto & Co., of Arica, and was obtained by them under the contract and circumstances shown by the testimony taken under the commission in the above cause. It is admitted that, on the arrival of the St. Joseph in Baltimore, Messrs. Birckhead & Pearce, the agents of the plaintiff, entered two hundred seroons, of the first quality, of said bark, for consumption, and the rest of the invoice for warehousing; and that subsequently, the defendant caused the whole of said importation to be appraised, and that the official appraisers, acting in obedience to instructions from the secretary of the treasury in reference to the appraisement of this article, proceeded to ascertain the quantity of quinine in said bark, by chemical analysis, in order to fix therefrom the dutiable value of said bark. It is admitted, that said appraisers, in accordance with said analysis, reported that the one hundred and thirty-four seroons of third quality, mentioned in the invoice, were not undervalued; but that upon the other two parcels, valued in the invoice and entry at $49,737 Peruvian, or $45,758 04/100 American currency, they reported a deficiency of dutiable value, in the amount declared in the invoice and entry, of $7339 56/100, upon which increased value, a duty of fifteen per cent., amounting to $1100 93/100, was exacted by the defendant, and likewise an additional duty, by way of penalty for undervaluation, of twenty per cent. on the appraised value, amounting to $10,799 40/100, was likewise exacted, making together the sum of $11,900 33/100, which, in addition to the duty of fifteen per cent. on the dutiable value declared in the invoice and entry, was paid by the plaintiff under protest, to obtain the possession and control of his said goods. It is further admitted that, of the two hundred and fifty-four seroons of first quality bark which were entered for warehousing, twenty-five were re-shipped to Amsterdam, by the plaintiff, from Baltimore, and one hundred and three were transported to New York (whence one hundred of them were also re-shipped), and thus said one hundred and twenty-five seroons became entitled to drawback, which was paid to the plaintiff, but the penalty of twenty per cent. for undervaluation on these seroons has never been returned. It is agreed, that the instructions of the secretary of the treasury, having reference to the questions involved in this case, may be referred to by either party, for whatever purpose they may be legally available, as well as all official documents from the custom-house. That the official appraisers, on the 6th of October, 1849, notified Messrs. Birckhead & Pearce that they should require the production of all papers or documents relative to said importation, and Messrs. Birckhead & Pearce notified the plaintiff, Mr. Bartlett, of this requisition of the official appraisers, whereupon Mr. Bartlett, by his letter of the 11th October 1849, declined the production of the papers, &c., demanded, and directed Messrs. Birckhead & Pearce to withdraw the appeal they had made, and to pay the duties and penalty required, under protest; and at the same time proposed, as a final settlement, to pay the additional duties, provided he was released from paying the penal duty of twenty per cent. This statement is subject to corrections by either party as to details or explanation, as the oral testimony in the case, at the trial, may require.

[1] [Reported by James Mason Campbell, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

[2] [Affirmed in 16 How. (57 U. S.) 263.]

Brown & Brune, for plaintiff.

The plaintiff prays the court to instruct the jury:

1. That until superseded by a valid appraisement, the dutiable value of the plaintiff's goods, mentioned in the invoice, duly verified, and declared on the entry, must be deemed the true dutiable value of such goods.

2. The plaintiff further prays the court to instruct the jury that the mode pursued by the appraisers, as stated in their evidence, of ascertaining the foreign dutiable value of the plaintiff's import and bark, per St. Joseph, was illegal, and their appraisement void.

3. That the non-compliance by the plaintiff with the requirements of the appraisers, contained in their letter of the 6th October 1849, did not make valid the illegal appraisement of the plaintiff's goods previously made and then still appealed from.

4. That the seventeenth section of the act of 1842, which declares that the refusal of a consignee to produce any papers which the permanent appraisers may call for, shall render the appraisement which they may make final and conclusive, applies only to appraisements made after such refusal, and therefore can have no effect in this case.

5. That the additional duty exacted and retained on the parcels entered for warehousing, and entitled to debenture and exported, was illegally exacted.

6. That under the contracts between the Messrs. Pinto & Co. and the Bolivian government, the plaintiff's goods are not to be considered goods "actually purchased," within the meaning of the eighth section of the act of 1846, and therefore, the penalty prescribed by that act, and exacted in this case, was illegally exacted, and may be recovered back in this suit.

Z. Collins Lee, Dist. Atty., for defendant.

Upon the statement of facts and other evidence in this case, the defendant, by his counsel, asks the following instructions to the jury:

1. That the plaintiff is not entitled to recover the amount claimed in this action, because he has not complied with the requisitions of the act of congress in such cases provided.

2. That the value of the bark imported and appraised in this case, was the true value, with the costs and expenses added thereon; and was ascertained by the official appraisers, in the mode authorized by law and the instructions of the treasury department to the collectors in such cases.

3. That the penal duty of twenty per cent., imposed by the act of congress of 1846, for an undervaluation of goods in invoices imported into the United States, is not a duty, in the ordinary meaning of duties or imposts, but a penalty or fine inflicted for a violation of the revenue laws of the United States, and is not, therefore, subject to drawback or debenture, upon a reshipment of the goods which have been subjected to this penalty.

4. That upon all the evidence in this case, the defendant acted in compliance with the laws of the United States and instructions from the treasury; and though the official appraisers of the United States examined the bark of the plaintiff, and also had it analyzed by a chemist appointed by the government, and compared its analysis and value with that of a similar cargo of bark imported from the same country by Wyman, Appeton & Co., and brought into the port of Baltimore about a month before the bark of the plaintiff was entered; yet, if from the evidence in this case that the plaintiff was duly notified, by the official appraisers, of the undervaluation of his bark, and their increase of the marketable value, after such examination, analysis and comparison, and that he was required by the appraisers to furnish papers, documents or other evidence, for the purpose of satisfying said appraisers as to the value of said importation, and refused to comply—and afterwards, or at that time, withdrew his appeal to the merchant appraisers, and then paid the duties under protest—he is not entitled to recover.

TANEY, Circuit Justice. The facts of this case are these: In the month of January, 1849, Messrs. Pinto & Co., of Bolivia, shipped from the port of Arica, in Peru, a quantity of bark, grown in Bolivia, but known under the name of Peruvian bark. These shippers had, in the years 1845 and 1846, contracted with the Bolivian government for a monopoly in the trade of this article, for the term of several years, for which they were to pay the government a certain price. One of these contracts states that "Tabla Calisaya bark, which is cut from the body of the tree, being of three times the value of Canato bark, which is cut from the branches, and this by reason of the greater quantity of the salts, the active principle, contained therein." The bark, thus procured, is sent to Tacna, and thence usually to Arica, a port in Peru, from which port it is shipped abroad; from this port are also sent quantities of this bark, which are obtained clandestinely, and brought to Arica; sometimes this bark is shipped from a Bolivian port, but this much increases its cost at the port of shipment.

The bark in question was, by Pinto & Co., dispatched from Arica, in the ship San Josef, destined for Baltimore, to the plaintiff, residing in New York; and he consigned it to Messrs. Birckhead & Pearce, of Baltimore, by whom it was here entered at the custom-house, in the month of September 1849. In the invoices accompanying this shipment, the first quality, or Tabla Calisaya, was invoiced at $70 per quintal.

About a month before the arrival of the San Josef at Baltimore, another invoice of bark had arrived in Baltimore, in the barque George and Henry, to different consignees, which had left the port of Arica, about two months after the date of the bill of lading of the cargo in question, and there was evidence that a rise, throughout the whole of 1849, had taken place in the price of this kind of bark in the ports of South America. The first quality of bark received by the George and Henry was invoiced, some at eighty cents and some at ninety. On the arrival of the plaintiffs' cargo, Messrs. Birckhead & Pearce entered it in the usual way, and samples of it were submitted to the appraisers for examination; neither of the appraisers was a good judge of the value of this article, but directed it to be subjected to a chemical analysis, by the government chemist, and having subjected the bark of the other shipment to a like process, they found the cargo by the San Josef, which was invoiced at $70 per quintal, to contain more sulphate of quinine than the bark received by the George and Henry, which was invoiced at a much higher price, this sulphate of quinine being the active principle of the bark. To this test the appraisers felt themselves bound to subject this bark, in consequence of the orders of the treasury circular of the 2d day of November 1848, in these words:

Copy 1.

Treasury Department, November 2, 1848.

Sir: I have to acknowledge receipt of your communication of the 21st ult., with the report of the U. S. appraisers, in relation to an importation by Messrs. Birckhead & Pearce, of Baltimore, per barque "George and Henry," from Arica. It appears from the documents submitted, that the valuation of the article in question, was predicated by the appraisers on the quantity of sulphate of quinine produced by the several packages in the invoice; a portion of the same, invoiced at $65, found, on analysis by Dr. Stewart, the special examiner, to produce 2 24/100 per cent. of quinine, being taken as the basis of the value of the others (with certain exceptions), which, by the analysis, produced an equal proportion of quinine.

It being the opinion of this department, that the course pursued by the U. S. appraisers was the true one, under the circumstances, and is sustained by law, you are directed to estimate and adjust the duties accordingly.

Very respectfully, &c.,

R. J. Walker, Secretary of Treasury.

William H. Marriott, Collector of Customs, Baltimore.

After calling for the bill of lading, which was sent to them, the appraisers determined that the duty upon the bark should be so increased, that it became liable to the additional or penal duty of twenty per cent., and made to the collector the following report:

Appraisers' Office,
Baltimore, October 3, 1849.

The undersigned report to the naval officer an addition to E. Bartlett, of New York's, invoice of bark, per barque St. Joseph, from Arica, entered by Birckhead & Pearce, on 21st ult., viz:

J. T. P. 454 seroons bark, weighing 681 quintals at $10 98.....is	$7204 98
J. P., 26 ditto. ditto. 39 quintals, $14 82.62.....	578 22
	$7783 20
Commissions 2½ per cent.	194 58
Peruvian currency.....$7977 78@92cts.	$7339 56
Duty 15 per cent.....	$1100 92

M. McBlair.

E. Bartlett, New York, per St. Joseph, entered by Birckhead & Pearce, 494 seroons bark:

681 quintals, at 70 cts., is.....	$47,670 00
Commissions 2½ per cent.....	1,191 75
	$48,861 75

The 13 seroons bark, per George and Henry, which cost 80 cents per pound, produced 2 76/100 per cent. of quinine.

The above bark, per St. Joseph, is invoiced at 70 cents, and produced 2 78/100 quinine per cent., and consequently—

Ought to have been invoiced.....	80 58
	70
Difference.....	10 58

If this addition be made, it will stand as follows:

681 quintals at 10 58-100 per quintal, is....	$7204 98
Commissions 2½ per cent.....	180 12
	$7385 10

J. P., 26 seroons, invoiced at 53 cents, produced 2 34/100 per cent. of quinine. In proportion to the above, it ought to be valued, viz:

39 quintals, at $14 82.63, is.....	$578 22
2½ per cent. commissions.....	14 16
	$592 68

$7977 78 at 92, is $7339 56, U. S. currency.
Duty, 15 per cent., is $1100 92.
Peruvian currency.....$7977 78

On the 4th October, the collector notified Messrs. Birckhead & Pearce of this decision; they, on the next day, asked to be furnished with the grounds of such decision, and on the 6th October, protested in writing against it and asked that the case should be submitted to merchant appraisers, as required by law. On the same day, and after such request of Birckhead & Pearce, the appraisers wrote to Messrs. Birckhead & Pearce this letter:

Appraisers' Office,
Port Baltimore, 6th Oct., 1849.

Gentlemen: In relation to your appeal, in the case of Mr. E. Bartlett's importation of bark, per barque St. Joseph, from Arica, we beg leave respectfully to notify you, that we require of this gentleman the production of all correspondence and letters and accounts in his possession relative thereto, and that he shall make a deposition before the collector of New York, that the papers he sends are all the documents he has received relating to this shipment.

Very respectfully, M. McB.,
H. W. E.

Messrs. Birckhead & Pearce.

The appraisers now state, that this letter was written to enable them to ascertain if they had committed any error or mistake in their opinion, and to enable them to review and correct the same, if erroneous.

On the 11th October, Mr. Birckhead declined to furnish the papers asked by the appraisers, in their letter of the 6th, directed the appeal to the merchant appraisers to be withdrawn, proposed to pay the additional duty, except the twenty per cent., as assessed by the appraisers, and if this were declined, instructed Birckhead & Pearce to pay the duties under protest. This is the letter:

New York, 11 October, 1849.

Messrs. Birckhead & Pearce, Baltimore.

Dear Sirs: I have yours of 9th and 10th instant. I return the debenture certificate endorsed. In looking more carefully to the requisition of your appraisers of bark, per St. Joseph, I find that I shall have to have copied and translated a mass of correspondence from January last, when it was shipped, to August; for reference is made to it in all my letters from Pinto & Co. and Alsop & Co., in order the more fully to explain Pinto & Co.'s mode of invoicing the bark. I shall have to present a series of documents, commencing in 1847, with their contract with the Bolivian government, proving its actual cost to be about $60 per quintal; all these are necessary to make out my own case, and I am unwilling to present anything less than all the documents. I do not see, however, what use they can be of, at present, to the appraisers, who have made up their valuation of the bark and made a return to the collector. I shall, therefore, defer the presentation of my documents for another tribunal, and, not to lose more time in delivering the bark to the purchasers, I wish you to inform the collector that, by my instructions, your appeal is withdrawn; and that you are prepared to pay, under protest, whatever duties may be exacted on the bark. You will then please send to me in bond what has been so directed, and deliver the remainder, as already ordered. At leisure, we can then test the question of this exaction.

The appraisers have been misinformed of the value of bark at Arica, in January last; after the large sales I made here in March and April were known, it never rose there above seventy-five to eighty cents, and if any small parcels were, at any time, smuggled to the coast and sold at that, or even a higher price, it was no guide to its value.

If a resort to the courts can be avoided, by having the valuation fixed at a rate not imposing the additional duty of twenty per cent., I shall be glad, for I have no disposition to engage in a law-suit. My immediate want, however, is the bark, and I will take my chance of having justice done, by paying all that is now asked, under protest. You can draw on me, at sight, for what funds may be required. I credit you $111 03, for proceeds of C. Keener's draft of $114 96.

Yours, Edwin Bartlett.

Some further correspondence occurred, in all of which the appraisers insisted upon the correctness of their views, and adhered to their original opinion. Some part of the cargo by the San Josef was entered for consumption, and some for exportation. Mr. Bartlett being desirous of having the latter portion trans-shipped to New York, the collector before he would permit this to be done, insisted upon receiving all the duties thereon, including the twenty per cent. additional, which was also paid under protest. The papers called for by the appraisers in their letter of the 6th October, have not been furnished, even upon the trial.

The counsel for the plaintiff contends:

1. That the invoice valuation of the goods is deemed the true value until evidence be offered to show this valuation to be erroneous.

2. That the only method of correcting this valuation is by showing a valid appraisement according to law.

3. That the appraisement, in this case, was not a valid one.

4. That the refusal of the said plaintiff to furnish the papers called for by the appraisers did not affect his interest, but that the appraisement was erroneous.

5. That having exported some of this bark, he is entitled to the debenture upon such exportation, including the twenty per cent. he paid as a penal infliction, for an attempt to defraud the revenue laws of the United States.

The first proposition may be conceded to the plaintiff, and the question occurs, was the appraisement in this case a valid one? I do not think the secretary of the treasury had the power of fixing a chemical analysis of bark, as the only test of its dutiable value, in the manner he attempted to do, in his circular of 2d November 1848; although the contract of Pinto & Co., regards this as one method of determining the relative values of bark. The law of congress fixes the duties upon the market value at the port of exportation; and this can certainly not mean that a purchaser of this commodity shall, when he goes to buy, carry with him a chemist to fix the exact quantity of sulphate of quinine contained in the thing purchased; but he must, and can only look at the fair market value of the article among those trading in it at the place of exportation; he can only be required to adopt the methods usually adopted by merchants in making purchases. Still, the appraisers, when they suspect a wrong done to the government, have a right to employ this means as a test, by which, with the other knowledge and information in their power, and to be procured by them, they may be enabled to arrive at a correct estimate of the true value of the article imported. Here, too, when the appraisers, having seen the two articles, are unable to form a judgment with regard to their value, they had a right to resort to this mode of ascertainment, and with this information before them, they could legitimately come to the conclusions they have reached.

But, supposing I am wrong upon this subject, the party by withdrawing his appeal, and refusing to produce the papers called for, has fixed the correctness of the appraisement. The appraisers certainly had the right to call for these papers, whether with the view of correcting their own judgment, if erroneous, or of laying them before the merchant appraisers, in the event of a prosecution of the appeal.

To refuse to produce papers, admitted to be in a party's possession, always raises the strongest inference that those papers, if produced, would operate against the person holding them. In government claims, this refusal almost amounts to evidence of fraud. The act of congress makes it, in such a case as this, conclusive proof that the papers, when produced, would be demonstrative against the pretensions of the party having them in his possession. The act makes no restriction as to the time when these papers may be called for; it does not designate who shall make the demand, and I see no reason why the demand made in this case was not properly made, and by the proper officers.

The next question then is, to what amount of debenture is the party entitled in this case, upon the bark which he had exported? Here there is an increase made by the appraisers of about fifteen per cent. upon the invoice value of the cargo. The consequence of this appraisement is, that a penal exaction of twenty per cent. is imposed upon this cargo, by way of punishment for the attempt upon the revenue laws of the country. Here are two distinct things, one is an ascertainment of actual value, the other the penal consequence flowing from this ascertainment of real value; the first fixes the actual value upon which, if the party had entered the goods at the price so fixed, the duty would have been paid; it fixes the value of the goods on which the ad valorem duty is to be charged; this duty is affected by the increase or decrease of such value. But the second is quite another affair; if the appraisers fix the increased value at $11 25, or fifty per cent. over the invoice, the same twenty per cent. can be charged; the one fluctuates according to the judgment of the appraisers, they have the right of determining what it shall be; the other is a fixed and settled per-centage established by the act of congress.

If upon this twenty per cent. assessment, a party would have a right to claim a debenture, the party offering might defeat this provision by an exportation of the articles in regard to which he had offended. I, therefore, think that the plaintiff is not entitled to any drawback upon the exportation of this bark, beyond the duty which would accrue if the goods had been entered at the price fixed by the appraisers as their true value.

Verdict for defendant.

[NOTE. Upon appeal the supreme court affirmed the judgment, upon the grounds, with others, that the appraisers had power to require the production, on oath, of all letters, accounts, or invoices relating to the goods imported; that the direction of the chemical examination, though perhaps improper, did not destroy the validity of the appraisement; that the importer having appealed, from its appraisement on withdrawal of the appeal, and refusal to furnish the letters called for, the appraisement stood good; and that the importer was not entitled to the 20 per cent. additional duty assessed under Act July 30, 1846, § 8, (9 Stat. 43,) as a drawback upon re-exportation. Bartlett v. Kane, 16 How. (57 U. S.) 263.]

Case No. 1,078.

BARTLETT v. MERCER et al.

[8 Ben. 439.] [1]

District Court, S. D. New York. June Term, 1876.

BANKRUPTCY—ACTION BY ASSIGNEE TO SET ASIDE FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCE—MORTGAGES—CONSIDERATION.

1. G. M. and his sister J. M., in 1864, conveyed a farm which they owned jointly, for $4,000. G. M., with the consent of J. M., received all the purchase money and invested a part of it in his own name in two bonds and mortgages and the rest of it in another farm. The two lived together for many years, keeping no hired help, and whatever money each expended being expended for the joint benefit and support of both. No accounts were kept between them, and J. M. had no evidence of indebtedness from G. M. In August, 1870, suits were brought against G. M., for debts growing out of a mercantile business which he was carrying on. He made up an account, treating J. M. as entitled to one-half of the $4,000, and to one half of $1,500 worth of personal property which he had in 1864, and to interest for six years and more, and to $600 for her labor and services for six years; and on August 20, 1870, he conveyed to J. M., in consideration of the amount due by such account, the two bonds and mortgages and the farm which he had bought. In April, 1871, G. M. was adjudicated a bankrupt, and the assignee filed a bill to set aside the conveyance of the bonds and mortgages and of the farm. Held, that, on the evidence, J. M. had always regarded G. M. as absolute owner of all the property, real and personal, which stood in his name, and over which he had exercised ownership and control and which he had treated as his own.

2. That, in the absence of any contract, that G. M. should pay her for her services, she had no claim on him for such services, while they lived together.

3. That the conveyances, therefore, were made without valid consideration and with intent to hinder and defraud the creditors of G. M., and must be set aside.

In equity. This was a suit in equity by [Ebenezer F. Bartlett] the assignee in bankruptcy of George Mercer, to set aside a conveyance by the bankrupt to his sister, Jane Mercer, of a farm in Columbia Co., N. Y., which conveyance was executed on August 20th, 1870, and to set aside two assignments made by him at the same time of two bonds and mortgages held by him. George Mercer was adjudicated a bankrupt on the 22d day of April, 1871. [Decree for plaintiff.]

Matthew Hale, for complainant.

S. L. Magoun, for defendants.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. There must be a decree for the plaintiff in this case. The testimony is satisfactory to the point, that the conveyance of the farm to Jane Mercer by George Mercer, who was her brother, on the 20th of August, 1870, and the transfer to her by him on the same day of the two bonds and mortgages, one for $1,500 and the other for $1,100, were made without valid consideration and with intent to hinder, delay and defraud his creditors. Although Jane Mercer held the title jointly with George Mercer to the farm which they sold and conveyed in 1864, yet she permitted George Mercer to receive the entire price of it, $4,000, and to invest a part of it, in his own name, in the two bonds and mortgages above referred to, and the rest of it, in his own name, in the farm which he so conveyed to her in 1870. From 1864, she made no claim to any interest in those bonds and mortgages, or in the farm, so far as appears. The interest on the bonds and mortgages seems to have been collected from time to time by George Mercer, and treated as his own. The farm seems to have been worked as the property of George Mercer, its produce sold and received by him, and his claim of ownership to it, he having the legal title to it, was asserted by him when he was inquired of as to his property. No accounts between himself and Jane Mercer were kept by either of them. She held no evidence of indebtedness against him, and he does not seem to have made known to any one that he was a debtor to Jane Mercer in respect of any matter. Suddenly, after suits had been brought against him for debts growing out of the mercantile business he was carrying on, he hurriedly makes up an account between himself and Jane Mercer, treating her as entitled to one-half of the $4,000, and to one-half of $1,500 of personal property which he had in 1864, and to $1,250 for six years' and more interest on such $2,750, and to $600 for her labor and services for six years, being a total of $4,600, for which he conveyed the farm to her at $2,000, and assigned the two bonds and mortgages at $2,600. At that time his debts in his mercantile business amounted to between $7,000 and $8,000. His assets in such business nominally exceeded that amount by a very small margin, and, besides that and the property he so transferred to Jane Mercer, he had only $1,300 of property, which he proceeded a few days afterwards to transfer to another relative, a nephew, by a transaction which is the subject of another suit, argued with the present one. There is no evidence that she had any title or claim to the one-half of the $1,500 of personal property. She and her brother had lived together for many years, keeping no hired help; whatever money each expended was expended for the joint benefit and support of both, with the assent of both; and there is no evidence that either considered any money that was expended by either as raising an indebtedness on the part of either to the other, or that Jane Mercer did not always regard her brother as the absolute owner of all the property, real and personal, which stood in his name and over which he exercised ownership and control, and which he treated as his own. So, too, in the absence of any contract, actual or recognized, during the time she lived with her brother, that he should pay her for any services, she had no lawful claim on him for any compensation for any services. It is quite apparent, from the evidence, that the moving cause for the transfers to his sister, was his apprehension of approaching pecuniary trouble and his desire to keep his property from going to his creditors.

[1] [Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and Benj. Lincoln Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

There must be a decree setting aside the conveyance and transfers, with costs, with a reference to a special master to take an account, as against Jane Mercer, of the property which she received, giving her proper credits and taking properly into account the $80 note she gave to her brother, and she must convey to the plaintiff such of the property as she still has.

Case No. 1,079.

BARTLETT et al. v. ROGERS et al.

[3 Sawy. 62.][1]

Circuit Court, D. California. June 8, 1874.

WILLS — FOREIGN PROBATE — OBJECTION—WHEN TAKEN — LIMITATION — NOTE PAYABLE ON DEMAND—ACCORD AND SATISFACTION.

1. The probate of a will and issue of letters testamentary in the state of New York, do not authorize the executors to maintain actions for the collection of assets of the estate of the deceased in the state of California.

2. The objection may be taken at the hearing, where it does not appear on the face of the complaint where letters are issued, and issue has been joined on the allegation of the complaint that letters testamentary have been duly issued to the plaintiffs.

3. A note payable on demand, whether with or without interest, is immediately due. An action may be maintained upon such a note without previous demand, and the statute of limitations begins to run from its date.

4. But if there be any exception in the case of a note bearing interest, a note which does not in terms call for interest, is not within the exception.

5. Where a debtor transfers specific property to trustees for the use of his creditors, under a mutual agreement signed by the creditors, whereby they accept the property in full satisfaction and discharge of their several demands, there is a valid accord and satisfaction.

6. Such accord and satisfaction held good as against the indorsee of a promissory note payable on demand, given by the debtor to one of the parties to said agreement, who held no other demand against the debtor, where it did not appear that the transfer of said note was made before the date of said accord and satisfaction.

[At law. Action by Robert S. Bartlett and another, as executors, etc., of Bartlett, against Henry S. Rogers and others, upon a promissory note. Judgment for defendants.]

Earl Bartlett, for plaintiffs.

Campbell, Fox & Campbell, for defendants.

SAWYER, Circuit Judge. The will of Bartlett was admitted to probate, and letters testamentary thereunder issued to plaintiffs by the surrogate's court in the county of Broome, state of New York. The will has never been admitted to probate, nor have letters testamentary ever been issued to plaintiffs in the state of California. It is well settled that the probate of a will and the issue of letters testamentary in one state, do not authorize the executors so appointed to maintain an action as such in another state. Doolittle v. Lewis, 7 Johns. Ch. 46; Morrell v. Dickey, 1 Johns. Ch. 156; Williams v. Storrs, 6 Johns. Ch. 353; Brown v. Brown, 1 Barb. Ch. 195; Vroom v. Van Horne, 10 Paige, 549; Mellus v. Thompson, [Case No. 9,405;] Caldwell v. Harding, [Id. 2,301;] Kerr v. Moon, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 566; Armstrong v. Lear, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 169; Vaughan v. Northup, 15 Pet. [40 U. S.] 1. It is claimed, however, that the objection ought to have been raised by demurrer, and if not so taken, should have been set up specially in the answer, and the objection not having been so taken, it is waived. But it does not appear on the face of the complaint that the will was proved, and the letters issued by a foreign court, or that there had been no probate of the will in the courts of California. The objection seems to go rather to the title of the plaintiffs to the debt sued on, than to their capacity to sue. Kerr v. Moon, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 572. But however that may be, the complaint is either wholly bad, as not stating facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action in their favor, or else the allegation "that said will was duly probated and letters testamentary duly issued to said plaintiffs upon said estate of said Bartlett," is a sufficient allegation that the letters were issued by the proper court to enable the plaintiffs to maintain their action, in the absence of an objection by special demurrer specifically pointing out the defect. In the former case, the objection may be taken at any time under section 434 of the California Code of Procedure. In the latter, issue is taken upon the allegation itself in the answer, and on that issue it is necessary for plaintiffs to show that they were duly appointed by a court competent to confer authority to maintain the action. In Armstrong v. Lear, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 169, the authenticity of the will was admitted, and the question of its effect submitted apparently without objection, yet the court refused to permit the action to be maintained. So in Doolittle v. Lewis, 7 Johns. Ch. 50, the court recognize the propriety of taking the objection "at the hearing," and in Kerr v. Moon, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 566, the objection was taken for the first time at the argument on appeal, although the defect appeared on the face of the bill, and it was argued by the respondent that the objection came too late. But the supreme court held otherwise, and reversed the decree. Id. 570–572. I think this point well taken by objection made to the introduction of the record when offered in evidence, under the issue raised by the answer.

[1] [Reported by L. S. B. Sawyer, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

The objection that the action is barred by the statute of limitations is clearly fatal.

The due bill sued on was executed more than twelve years before the death of Tompkins; and Tompkins had been in the state continuously, twelve years after its execution, and before his death.

The statute of California provides that all actions founded upon written instruments shall be barred in four years, and on those executed out of the state in two years. That a note or bill payable on demand, whether with or without interest, is due immediately; that an action may be brought on it as soon as it is made, without previous demand; and that the statute of limitations begins to run from its date, is the law of the state of New York, where the instrument in question was made, as settled by its highest courts there can be no doubt. Wheeler v. Warner, 47 N. Y. 520; Herrick v. Woolverton, 41 N. Y. 581; Howland v. Edmonds, 24 N. Y. 308. The law as settled in California is the same. Brummagim v. Tallant, 29 Cal. 506; Bell v. Sackett, 38 Cal. 409; Ziel v. Dukes, 12 Cal. 482. The statute begins to run as soon as the action accrues. If, then, an action can be maintained upon a note payable on demand, as soon as made, without a previous demand, the right of action must necessarily have accrued at that time, and the statute commences to run at the same point of time. But the note in suit does not purport by its terms to bear interest, and is, therefore, not on its face within the exception relied on, if any such there were. The claim is therefore barred, and the executors were forbidden by the statute to allow it. Code Civ. Proc. § 1499.

I also think the accord and satisfaction shown, is a good defense to the action. Certain property was delivered to trustees in satisfaction of the debts due the various creditors of Tompkins, upon a mutual written agreement among the creditors to receive the property as such and discharge Tompkins. Among the creditors executing the agreement was Denton, the payee of the due bill sued on. Plaintiff's theory, however, is, that the money on the instrument in suit was not due till actual demand was made, and that Denton could not make an agreement for accord and satisfaction, so as to find a holder who received it before due, without notice. But, as we have seen, the instrument was due immediately on its execution, and it does not appear when it came to the possession of Bartlett. It is only alleged that it came to the possession of Bartlett during his lifetime, and this may have been more than ten years after it became due. There was no other debt due from Tompkins to Denton, and there is nothing to show, either in the averments of the complaint, or in the evidence, that Bartlett received the note before the accord and satisfaction.

If I am right upon either of the points discussed, there must be judgment for the defendants, and I think them entitled to judgment on all.

Let judgment be entered for defendants with costs.

Case No. 1,080.

BARTLETT v. RUSSELL.

[4 Dill. 267; 16 N. B. R. 211; 9 Chi. Leg. News, 377; 6 Am. Law Rec. 13; 4 Law & Eq. Rep. 197; 24 Pittsb. Leg. J. 206.] [1]

Circuit Court. D. Colorado. 1877.

BANKRUPT ACT—OFFICE OF PETITION FOR REVIEW —LIEN OF FI. FA. ON GOODS AND CHATTELS.

The statute of Colorado provides that "no writ of fieri facias, or other writ of execution, shall bind the estate of the defendant but from the time such writ is delivered to the sheriff or other proper officer to be executed." Under this statute, an execution on a judgment is a lien on the debtor's property from the time it is delivered to the sheriff to be executed, which will be protected in bankruptcy, and will not be defeated by a petition in bankruptcy, filed after the delivery but prior to the levy of the execution.

[See In re Paine, Case No. 10,673; In re Hull, Id. 6,857; Crane v. Penny, 2 Fed. 187; also, In re Weeks, Case No. 17,350; Goddard v. Weaver, Id. 5,495; In re Wheeler, Id. 17,490.]

In bankruptcy. This was a petition for review, filed by [Albert E.] Bartlett, assignee in bankruptcy of Peabody, to reverse an order of the district court, in bankruptcy, in favor of the respondent, [Edward] Russell. [Unreported.] The material facts appear in the opinion, orally given, of the circuit justice.

[1] [Reported by Hon. John F. Dillon, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission. 4 Law & Eq. Rep. 197, contains partial report only.]

Blake & Jacobsen, for petitioner.
Thomas Macon, for respondent.

MILLER, Circuit Justice. I have given to this case all the consideration I shall have time to give it, and, although there are conflicting authorities upon the subject, I have arrived at a conclusion satisfactory to myself, and will proceed to announce it.

The case is this: The bankrupt was sued in the state court by Edward Russell, who obtained a judgment against him, and fearing that he would probably not make his money otherwise, he obtained an order from the court, and had execution issued and placed in the hands of the sheriff. In about an hour after that was done, the bankrupt filed his petition in bankruptcy, and in about an hour after that the execution was levied upon the personal property of the debtor. While the sheriff was taking an inventory, however, the marshal of the United States made his appearance, and claimed the property under the orders of the district court, and it was delivered to him. Afterwards a petition was filed in the United States district court by Russell, asking that the proceeds of that property, which had been sold, might, as far as was necessary, be appropriated to the payment of this debt, and the district court gave the order, directing that the debt be paid out of the assets, as far as the property levied upon would pay it.

For the reversal of that order, the assignee of the bankrupt had filed a petition here, and the first question is as to the jurisdiction of this court. I have some doubt about that—whether the order of the district court may be reviewed on petition in this way. I have concluded, however, to give the petitioner the benefit of the doubt, since the whole matter seems to have been conducted in a summary way; and I am rather inclined to the opinion that this is one of those questions which may be reviewed by this form of proceeding—which may be called the extraordinary jurisdiction of the circuit court under the bankrupt law.

The question then recurs, whether the order of the district court was correct, that the plaintiff, Russell, had established such a lien on the goods of the bankrupt, seized under the writ of execution, as required that they should be first appropriated to pay his judgment.

The question is one, or ought to be one, upon the local laws of this state, because it is a question whether, under the laws of the state of Colorado, the proceedings which the plaintiff in the original suit instituted for the purpose of making his debt, created such a lien that it should be respected in the bankruptcy proceedings.

But, while you have a statute in this state upon this subject, there are no decisions construing the statute. The counsel, in the argument, referred to no such decisions, and my associate says there have been none in this state upon it. But the statute is one which exists, and has long existed in other states, and is in precisely the same words as the statute of Kentucky and Illinois, and is said to have been copied from the statute of Illinois; and the counsel for the petitioner, in his argument, relies upon the decisions of the state court of Kentucky construing that statute. The statute is: "That no writ of fieri facias, or other writ of execution, shall bind the estate of the defendant or defendants but from the time such writ shall be delivered to the sheriff or other proper officer to be executed." This is a limitation of the common law, by which the goods and chattels of the party were bound from the time the writ was tested.

Now, I cannot go into all the authorities which were referred to the other day in the argument. The argument was an able and exhaustive one, and a great many authorities were cited. The English authorities are in conflict with the authorities in this country. I can only say, in view of the principle of our bankrupt law, that I am of the opinion that there was such a lien as gave to the plaintiff in the action at law the right to appropriate that money to the payment of his debt; and that there was a lien of some kind is not disputed.

Some cases were cited, showing that a subsequent execution, or an execution delivered to the sheriff subsequent to the first one, may appropriate property to the exclusion of the lien established by the first execution delivered to the officer. But that whole subject was reviewed by the supreme court, in the case of Waller v. Best, 3 How. [44 U. S.] 111. That was a case concerning the effect of this statute in the state of Kentucky, and that eminent jurist, Chief Justice Taney, after reviewing the decisions of the state court of Kentucky, uses this language in reference to the decision of the state court in the case of Addison v. Crow, [5 Dana, 271:] "This is the latest decision in the courts of the state to which we have been referred, or of which we are aware, and, as we have already said, it appears to have been well considered. And whatever doubts might before have been entertained, we must, under the authority of this case, regard it as the settled law of the state, that the creditor obtains a lien upon the property of his debtor by the delivery of the fieri facias to the sheriff; that it acquires no additional validity or force by being actually levied, but that the lien is as absolute before the levy as it is afterwards, and continues while the process remains in the hands of the sheriff to be executed."

It does not become me to overrule that decision, and it was upon decisions of the state of Kentucky that the counsel for petitioner rely to show that the lien was not an absolute one.

I read the above from Curtis's decisions of the United States supreme court, the chief value of which lies in the head notes, and his head notes, although brief, are entitled to great weight, as expressing the result of the case. He says, in the head notes to this case: "In Kentucky, the delivery of fieri facias to the sheriff creates a lien on the debtor's lands, which is as valid before as after a levy." Not only is this case an authority which I do not feel like overruling, but it meets my approval. I think that there is a lien established by the delivery of the execution to the sheriff. The construction of our bankrupt law by the supreme court has tended very much of late years to give effect to liens established by judicial proceedings, in which there was no collusion, no summary process, but a lien obtained by the orderly and regular course of judicial proceedings, and not by attachment; and such liens will be respected by the federal courts in the administration of the bankrupt law.

The judgment of the district court in this case is affirmed.

Affirmed.

BARTLETT. (UNITED STATES v.) See Case No. 14,532.

Case No. 1,081.

BARTLETT v. WILLIAMS.

[Holmes, 229.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Aug. Term, 1873.

COLLISION—SAILING VESSELS—CHANGE OF COURSE.

1. A schooner on the starboard tack overtook, and passed a short distance to leeward of, a brig, and when three or four lengths in front came in stays, which brought her across the bows of the brig, and rendered a collision inevitable. Just before actual collision the course of the brig was changed about a point. Held, that the schooner was in fault for coming in stays under such circumstances.

[See The Alaska, Case No. 130.]

2. That the brig was not in fault for changing her course, according to the best judgment of the master, after the collision had become inevitable through the fault of the schooner.

Admiralty appeal [by Enoch Bartlett, claimant of the schooner William G. Bartlett] from a decree of the district court of Massachusetts awarding damages to the appellees [Sheldon Williams and others, owners of the brig Richard and Torrey] in a case of collision. [Affirmed.] The facts are stated in the opinion.

R. H. Dana, Jr., and S. J. Thomas, for appellant.

J. C. Dodge, for libellants.

SHEPLEY, Circuit Judge. I find the facts in this case to be that the brig Richard and Torrey, the property of the libellants, on the 7th of July, 1871, was in the Vineyard sound on a voyage from Calais, Me., to Providence, R. I. The schooner William G. Bartlett, on the same day, was passing through the sound, bound for Philadelphia. The weather was clear. The wind was ahead for vessels passing through the sound to the westward. Before the collision, both vessels were beating, and both had been for some time on the starboard tack. The schooner had been astern of the brig, but she outsailed her, and overtook and got ahead of her. She, by reason of her rig, would lay a point nearer the wind than the brig, and worked to windward faster than the brig. The schooner passed the brig on her lee (port) side; and, after passing her a short distance, not probably more than four or five times her length, came in stays. This brought the schooner across the brig's bows, and made the collision inevitable. When the schooner tacked, if she saw the brig (about which there is much conflict in the testimony) she evidently intended to retain the advantage she had gained in distance, and to pass to the windward in a course which brought her across the bows of the brig. It is contended on the part of the schooner that she intended to go to the leeward and under the stern of the brig, and that the brig changed her course and fell off, and that, if the brig had kept her course, she would have ranged ahead of the schooner, and the collision would have been avoided.

I am not able, upon a careful review of the testimony, to come to this conclusion. The brig's wheel was put hard up immediately before the collision, and the brig fell off about a point; but this was not done until the collision would have been inevitable if the brig had kept her course. The schooner had wrongfully come in dangerous proximity to the brig, and across her bows. There was no time for deliberation. The course adopted was supposed to be the most judicious one under the circumstances; and if it were not so, as the order was given in the exercise of the best judgment of the master, and if he had kept his course there was no reasonable ground to believe the schooner would have passed her, I do not think, on the best consideration I am able to give the testimony, that the brig should be adjudged in fault; although I do not wish to give countenance to any relaxing of the rule, that the vessel whose duty it is to keep her course should not change it before a collision is inevitable. At the time of the change of the course by the brig, the schooner was in stays, and could not change her course, because she had no headway. She was helpless; and the brig saw that all that could be done to avoid the collision must be done by the brig.

Decree of district court affirmed, with interest from date of decree, and costs.

[1] [Reported by Jabez S. Holmes, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

Case No. 1,082.

BARTLETTE v. CRITTENDEN et al.

[4 McLean, 300.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Ohio. July Term, 1847.

LITERARY PROPERTY—DEDICATION—ABANDONMENT.

1. By the common law, a party had a property in his own manuscripts.

[Cited in Boucicault v. Fox, Case No. 1,691; Henry Bill Pub. Co. v. Smythe, 27 Fed. 926.]

2. And if they be in the possession of other persons, who are about to make an improper use of them, a court of chancery would inhibit such use.

[Cited in Boucicault v. Fox, Case No. 1,691; Henry Bill Pub. Co. v. Smythe. 27 Fed. 926.]

3. The principles in regard to a manuscript, may be applied to the invention of a machine.

4. It belongs to the inventor, and it will continue to be his property until he shall give it the public or abandons it.

5. Under our present law, a use of a machine for less than two years, before the application of a patent shall be made, does not invalidate the right.

6. A person who uses his own manuscripts for the purpose of instructing others, does not thereby abandon them to the public.

[Cited in Keene v. Wheatley, Case No. 7,644; Boucicault v. Hart, Id. 1,692.]

7. Nor does he abandon them, when his pupils are permitted to take copies.

[Cited in Boucicault v. Hart, Case No. 1,692.]

8. Such copies being intended for the purpose of instruction, as used, can be applied to no other purpose.

9. In the use, the intention of the owner of the manuscript can not be perverted or extended.

[In equity. Bill by R. M. Bartlette to restrain A. F. Crittenden and others from infringement of copyright. Injunction granted.]

Mr. Walker, for complainant.

Storer & Gwynn, for defendants.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This is an application to enjoin the defendants from printing, publishing, or selling a work denominated "An inductive and practical system of double-entry book-keeping, on an entirely new plan," on the ground that a material part of the manuscript, and the arrangement, were the work of the complainant, and were pirated from him by the defendants. It appears that the complainant for twelve years has been engaged in teaching the art of book-keeping, in the city of Cincinnati and other places. That he had reduced to writing the system he taught, on separate cards for the convenience of imparting instruction to his pupils; and that he permitted his students to copy these cards, with the view to their own advantage and to enable them to instruct others. That Jonathan Jones, being qualified in the school of the complainant, as a teacher, and having copied the manuscripts of the complainant, engaged, in connection with him, to teach a commercial school in St. Louis. While thus engaged, A. F. Crittenden, one of the defendants, entered the school at St. Louis as a student, and was permitted to copy the manuscripts of the complainant, in the possession of Jones; and from those manuscripts, with certain alterations, he made up the first ninety-two pages of the book, under the above title, which was published in Philadelphia, in connection with his brother, by E. C. & J. Biddle, two of the defendants, in the present year. The answers of the defendants either deny the allegations of the bill, or do not admit them, and call for proof of the facts stated. On this motion for an injunction the merits of the case have been discussed, with much research and ability.

This application is made under the 9th section of the act of congress of the 3d of February, 1831, [4 Stat. 438,] which provides, that "any person or persons who shall print or publish any manuscript whatever, without the consent of the author or legal proprietor first obtained, etc., shall be liable to suffer and pay to the author or proprietor, all damages occasioned by such injury," etc. And power is given to grant an injunction to restrain the publication. The first section of the act of the 30th of June, 1834, [4 Stat. p. 728, c. 157,] requires all deeds or instruments in writing for the transfer or assignment of copy-rights, to be acknowledged and recorded. At common law, independently of the statute, I have no doubt, the author of a manuscript might obtain redress against one who had surreptitiously got possession of it. And on general equitable principles, I see no objection to relief being also given, under like circumstances, by a court of chancery. But this is a proceeding under the statute.

The defendants contend that the complainant, by suffering copies of his manuscripts to be taken, abandoned them to the public. The principle is the same, it is alleged, in regard to copy-rights and patents. And that a consent or permission of the author to use the manuscripts, is as fatal to his exclusive right, as the consent of the inventor to use the thing invented. Rundell v. Murray, [Saunders v. Smith,] 3 Mylne & C. 711, 728, 730, 735; Millar v. Taylor, 4 Burrows, 186, [2303;] Barfield v. Nicholson, 2 Sim. & S. 1. To show the analogy between copy-right and patents, the defendants cited Whittemore v. Cutter, [Case No. 17,601;] Mellus v. Sillsbee, [Id. 9,404,] in which the question considered was, did the inventor suffer the thing patented to go into public use without objection? Walcot v. Walker, 7 Ves. 1; Platt v. Button, 19 Ves. 448; Wythe v. Stone, [Case No. 18,107.]

The 7th section of the act of the 3d of March, 1839, [5 Stat. 354,] declares that a purchaser from the inventor of the thing invented, before a patent is obtained, shall continue to enjoy the same right after the obtainment of the patent as before it; and that such sale shall not invalidate the patent, unless there has been an abandonment, or the purchase has been made more than two years before the application for the patent. Before this act, a sale of the right would have been an abandonment to the public by the inventor. The decisions, therefore, referred to, do not apply to cases arising under this statute. A sale of the right is not an abandonment, if made within two years before the application for a patent, as the law now stands; and it may be a matter of some difficulty, within the above limitation of two years, to determine what act shall amount to an abandonment. Where the act is accompanied by a declaration, to that effect, there can be no doubt; but if a sale be not an abandonment, a mere acquiescence in the use of the invention would seem not to be. Within the two years, to constitute an abandonment, the intention to do so must be expressed or necessarily implied from the facts and circumstances of the case. It is a question of intention, as to the extent of the license, of which we must judge, as we are called to do in other cases. But the limitation of two years does not apply in this case, should a copy-right be considered in principle identical with an invention of a machine, as more than two years have elapsed since copies of the complainant's manuscripts were taken with his consent.

[1] [Reported by Hon. John McLean, Circuit Justice.]

The question arises upon the facts stated, and must be decided on general principles. In the first place, there was no consent of the complainant, that his manuscripts should be printed. That they were not prepared for the press is admitted. They were without index or preface, although, as alleged, they may have contained the substantial parts of the complainant's system, which, in due time, he intended to print. Copies of the manuscripts were taken for the benefit of his pupils, and to enable them to teach others. This, from the facts and circumstances of the case, seems to have been the extent of the complainant's consent. It is contended that this is an abandonment to the public, and is as much a publication as printing the manuscripts. That printing is only one mode of publication, which may be done as well by multiplying manuscript copies. This is not denied, but the inquiry is, does such a publication constitute an abandonment? The complainant is no doubt bound by this consent, and no court can afford him any aid in modifying or withdrawing it. The students of Bartlette, who made these copies, have a right to them and to their use as originally intended. But they have no right to a use which was not in the contemplation of the complainant and of themselves, when the consent was first given. Nor can they, by suffering others to copy the manuscripts, give a greater license than was vested in themselves. In England, if an invention be pirated and given to the public, it prevents an inventor from obtaining a patent. But this is not the construction of our laws. If an inventor of a machine sell it or acquiesce in its public use, not within the limitation of the two years, he forfeits his rights. He must be diligent in making known and asserting his right, where it has surreptitiously got into the possession of another, or he abandons it. This was the settled rule before the act of 1839, and it would seem that cases which do not come within the provisions of that act, must be governed by the old rule. No length of time, where the invention does not go into public use, can invalidate the right of the inventor. He may take his own time to perfect his discovery, and apply for a patent. And the same principle applies to the manuscripts of an author. If he permit copies to be taken for the gratification of his friends, he does not authorize those friends to print them for general use. This is the author's right, from which arises the high motive of pecuniary profit and literary reputation. When the inventor consents to the construction and use of his machine, he yields the whole value of his invention. But an author's manuscripts are very different from a machine. As manuscripts, in modern times, they are not and can not be of general use. Popular lectures may be taken down verbatim, and the person taking them down has a right to their use. He may in this way perpetuate the instruction he receives, but he may not print them. The lecturer designed to instruct his hearers, and not the public at large. Any use, therefore, of the lectures, which should operate injuriously to the lecturer, would be a fraud upon him for which the law would give him redress. He can not claim a vested right in the ideas he communicates, but the words and sentences in which they are clothed belong to him.

It is contended that the manuscripts are incomplete, and if published in their present state, could not be protected by a copy-right. That an unfinished manuscript or book, which gives only a part of the thing intended to be written or published, can be of no value, and if printed no relief could be given, as no damage would be done. That the parts of a machine, in the process of construction, if pirated, would give no right to an injunction by the inventor. If the manuscript or machine referred to consisted of a mere fragment, which embodied no principle and pointed to no design, the piracy of it would afford no ground of relief. But such is not the character of complainant's manuscripts. They may not be complete for publication. Some explanatory notes may be wanting, to assist the reader in comprehending the system. This information was communicated by lectures, and for the purposes of instruction in that mode, the notes were unnecessary. But the cards contain the frame work of the system. The substratum is there, and so exemplified as to show the principle upon which it is constructed. That it was valuable, is shown, from the fact of the cards having been used by the defendants in teaching the system, and in publishing them as they have done.

The facts show the piracy beyond all doubt, and that it was done under circumstances which admit of little or no mitigation. The cards, as they well knew, had been, for a number of years, and were then being used by the complainant to instruct pupils. They had learned all they knew on the subject from the complainant. They probably knew that he intended to publish his plan. But this would, to some extent, at least, supersede the necessity of personal instruction. In disregard of these considerations, and of the obligations the defendants owed to the complainant, the publication was made.

The court will allow an injunction unless a satisfactory arrangement shall be made between the parties.

[NOTE. For subsequent litigation between the same parties involving the same subject-matter, see Bartlett v. Crittenden, Case No. 1,076.]

Case No. 1,083.

BARTLETTE v. The VIOLA.

[3 Chi. Leg. News, 245.]

District Court, D. Minnesota. April Term, 1871.

MARITIME LIENS — MASTER'S WAGES—PILOTAGE—SUPPLIES AND REPAIRS—MORTGAGE ON VESSEL.

[1. The master has no lien upon a vessel for his wages.]

[2. The remedy of the master of a vessel who seeks to enforce payment of wages as acting pilot, where he was not pilot in fact, but performed pilot's duties, is in personam, and not in rem. The Larch, Case No. 8,085, followed.]

[3. The remedy of the master for advances for supplies and repairs is also in personam. The Larch, Case No. 8,085, followed.]

[4. One who takes command of a vessel as master continues as such until the completion of the voyage, unless superseded, and cannot assert a lien for additional pay for standing on watch as pilot.]

[5. While a mortgage on a vessel cannot be foreclosed in equity, nor delivery of the boat decreed to the mortgagee, yet the proceeds of the sale may be applied in extinguishment of the mortgage.]

[In admiralty. Libel by L. D. Bartlette against the steamboat Viola for libellant's wages, for additional pay as pilot, and for advances for supplies and repairs. Libel dismissed.]

NELSON, District Judge. The libellant is endeavoring to assert a lien upon the boat for master's wages and also for additional pay in standing one watch as pilot, and for advances made for necessary repairs and supplies. There can be no lien upon the vessel for master's wages. The contract is made upon the personal responsibility of the owners. 1 Paine, 73, [The Grand Turk, Case No. 5,683;] 1 Newb. Adm. 176, [Dudley v. The Superior, Case No. 4,115;] Bee, 31, 348, [Castello v. Bouteille, Case No. 2,504; Forbes v. The Hannah, Id. 4,925;] 3 Mason, 255, [The Packet, Case No. 10,654.] Nor can the master enforce in a proceeding in rem, the collection of his wages as acting pilot. He was not the pilot in fact, but performed pilot's duties while master of the vessel. He must resort to a suit in personam for his pay as acting pilot, and has no lien on the vessel for the same. Advances made by the master for repairs and supplies are upon the same footing. The authorities are not altogether uniform upon this subject, but this court will follow the decision in The Larch, [Id. 8,085.] See, also, Ware, 104, [The Mary Anne. Case No. 9,195.]

In any view of the case the libellant was master of the "Viola" until the completion of the voyage and the return of the vessel to her home port, unless superseded. There is no evidence of his having been discharged. He was ordered to lay the boat up late in the fall at St. Louis, on account of the difficulty in returning to Hudson, from whence the vessel departed, and where she was owned. Ordinarily, being satisfied upon these points we should dismiss the libel and restore the boat to the party from whom she was taken by the marshal, but in this case we have some seven or eight claimants intervening. The boat has been appraised under the 10th admiralty rule, and restored to the claimant from whose possession she was taken. The appraised value was satisfactory to all parties, and a stipulation has been given. We must therefore order the payment into court of the amount of this stipulation, and distribute it to the intervening claimants that in our opinion are justly entitled to it.

Without commenting upon the claims of the other parties, and they are numerous, the owners of the boat being deeply involved, and the contest in the state courts for the possession of the property being vigorous and protracted—we are of the opinion that the First National Bank of Hudson, Wis., as trustee, represents a claim which is the earliest lien and entitled to be first paid out of these proceeds in court. This claim is a mortgage of the boat, executed by the owners on the 13th day of November, A. D. 1866, and filed on the same day in the office of the deputy collector of customs of the port of St. Paul, in this district, where she was enrolled. It was given for a valuable consideration, and the owners have defaulted in the condition upon which it was executed. It is true the admiralty court can neither entertain a suit to foreclose the mortgage, nor can it decree a delivery of the boat to the mortgagee; but the fund in the registry, representing the boat, which had been sold by authority, can be held under the mortgage, and we are bound to apply it towards extinguishing this lien. The money must, therefore, be appropriated towards liquidating this claim. [Schuchardt v. Babbidge,] 19 How. [60 U. S.] 239; 2 Woodb. & M., 118, [Deshon v. The Medora, Case No. 3,820.] The stipulators are ordered to pay into court the sum of $2,000, and the clerk will pay the same to the proctor for this claimant, after deducting charges of the officers of the court, if any exist against the boat, and the libel is dismissed with costs.

BARTON, In re. See Case No. 1,085.

Case No. 1,084.

BARTON v. ANTHONY.

[1 Wash. C. C. 317.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. Oct. Term, 1806.

MARINE INSURANCE — CUSTOM AND USAGE—ARBITRATION AND AWARD—EXCEPTIONS TO AWARD.

1. It is the custom in Philadelphia, that if an order be given to insure $12000, the agent should insure a greater sum, in order to cover the amount to be insured. By the custom, he cannot insure to cover premium, in the same policy with that to cover the value.

2. Evidence not laid before referees, cannot be exhibited to the court on exceptions to the report.

[See Hurst v. Hurst, Case No. 6,930; Frick v. Christian Co., 1 Fed. 250.]

[At law. Action by Seth Barton against Anthony for breach of an agreement to effect marine insurance. Plaintiff excepts to the award upon arbitration. Exceptions overruled and judgment upon the award.]

This case came on upon exceptions to the report of referees. The plaintiff, living in Baltimore, in May, 1798, wrote to the defendant in Philadelphia; ordering him to insure 12000 dollars on a certain vessel, she being valued at that sum; and 9000 dollars on the freight, valued at that sum; and to insure sufficient to cover the premium. The defendant effected an insurance, in Philadelphia, on the vessel, for 14100 dollars, the exact amount of the 12000 dollars, and the premium paid on it. Within a few days after this, the plaintiff came to Philadelphia, and went on to New York, where he effected insurance on the freight. There was no evidence laid before the referees, to show either that the insurance on the vessel was communicated to the plaintiff, or that he objected to the conduct of the defendant, until after notice of the loss in August. But the referees presumed that the plaintiff knew what the defendant had done, and acquiesced; although he had insured 900 dollars short of what he was ordered. Mr. Fitzsimmons, one of the referees, was examined and deposed to the above facts: he saw that the plaintiff's order was confused, but had it been laid before the office, they would have understood it. That to get at the sum which should have been insured, to cover the value and premium, you should say, if $80 : 100 : : 12000, the result of which would be 15000 dollars. That by the custom, you cannot insure to cover premium, in the same policy with that to cover the value. Evidence, not laid before the referees, was spoken of by the plaintiff's counsel.

BY THE COURT. In the case of Hurst v. Hurst, [Case No. 6,930,] it was laid down, that on exceptions to a report, no new evidence be received; and that the court will not set aside a report, unless for plain mistakes in matters of law or fact. In this case, the referees presumed, that after the defendant had effected the insurance on the vessel, the plaintiff must have known what he had done, and had acquiesced in it, and we think the referees had very strong grounds on which to build this presumption. Within a few days after the policy was effected, the plaintiff was in Philadelphia; that he inquired how his order had been executed, cannot be doubted; because, otherwise, he would not have himself insured the freight in New York. The inquiry having then most certainly been made, it is not to be doubted but that he was informed not only of what had not been done, as of that which had. He ought then to have objected, and not lie by, until he received notice of the loss. Exceptions overruled, and judgment on the award.

BARTON, (PRENTISS v.) See Case No. 11,384.

Case No. 1,085.

BARTON et al. v. TOWER.

[5 Law Rep. 214; 1 Pa. Law J. 209; 1 N. Y. Leg. Obs. 8.]

District Court, N. D. New York. July Term, 1842.

BANKRUPTCY — PETITION BY CREDITOR HOLDING CLAIM NOT DUE—ASSIGNMENT BY TRADER—ACT OF BANKRUPTCY.

1. It is not a valid objection to a petition in invitum, by a creditor, that his claim is not yet due.

[Cited in Linn v. Smith, Case No. 8,375; In re Alexander, Id. 161.]

2. An assignment by a trader of his property, whether made in contemplation of bankruptcy or for the purpose of giving a preference, or not, is void, and, of itself, an act of bankruptcy.

[Cited in Gassett v. Morse, Case No. 5,264.]

3. Where two partners made an assignment of their property, with a direction, that it should be distributed among their creditors by the assignment, "in the same manner as if the same were in the hands of an assignee under the bankrupt act of the United States, by virtue of proceedings duly had in bankruptcy," it was held, that such assignment was an act of bankruptcy, and was void.

[1] [Originally published from the MSS. of Hon. Bushrod Washington, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, under the supervision of Richard Peters, Jr., Esq.]

In bankruptcy. This was a petition by Elliphas B. Barton and William Osborn, that Julius Tower be declared a bankrupt. The petition set forth, that Tower was a merchant; that he owed not less than $2000; that he owed to each of the petitioning creditors, severally, not less than $500, to wit, the sum of one thousand dollars besides interest, for which they severally held his promissory note, made jointly with him and other persons. Both of these notes were stated to have been made before the commission of the acts of bankruptcy charged, and one of them was due, the other being payable in September next. The petition charged Tower with having, on the second and fifth of April last, executed three several fraudulent conveyances of certain valuable real property, and with having also, on the 30th day of the same month, in conjunction with Charlemagne Tower, executed a fraudulent conveyance or assignment of all his property for the benefit of his creditors. On the day appointed for the hearing, Tower filed his objection, under oath, to a decree of bankruptcy. He expressly admitted all the facts set forth in the petition, except that he denied that the several conveyances and assignment mentioned in the petition were fraudulent; the same having as he alleged, been executed in good faith. Annexed to the objections was a copy of the general assignment, which purported to be of all the joint property of Julius and Charlemagne Tower, as ex-partners in business, under the name and style of Reuben Tower & Sons, and of all the separate property of each of them for the benefit of all the creditors without preference. There was a direction in the deed of assignment, that all their property and the proceeds thereof should be divided and distributed among their creditors by the assignees, "in the same manner as if the same were in the hands of an assignee under the bankrupt act of the United States, by virtue of proceedings duly had in bankruptcy."

M. S. Myers, for petitioning creditors.
Mr. Bacon, for the debtor.

CONKLING, District Judge. One of the objections urged against a decree of bankruptcy in this case is, that the debt of one of the petitioning creditors is not yet due. Whatever doubt may have formerly been entertained in this court, in deference to decisions under the former bankrupt law of England, whether a creditor whose debt was not yet due, could become a petitioning creditor, I cannot now perceive any valid ground for such doubt. There is nothing in the language of the act which appears to me to require such a construction. The act declares that "all persons being merchants, &c., owing debts to the amount of not less than $2000, shall be liable to become bankrupts within the true intent and meaning of this act and may, upon the petition of one or more of their creditors, to whom they owe debts, amounting in the whole to not less than $500, to the appropriate court, be so declared," &c. A debt is not the less owing because it is not yet due; and my conviction is strong, that the legislature did not intend, that the act should receive the narrow construction contended for by the counsel for the debtor. The phraseology of the act in relation to the debt of not less than $500 to the petitioning creditor is the same in this respect, as that used in relation to the aggregate amount of debts, which the debtor must owe, of not less than $2000, and it will not be pretended, that these debts must be actually due. But at any rate the objection is inapplicable to the other petitioning creditor, whose debt alone is more than sufficient, and I think it is a mistake to suppose, that a petition by two creditors, one of whom would be entitled to petition alone, would be vitiated by the insufficiency of the debt claimed by the other.

It is in the next place objected, that no decree of bankruptcy can now be made, because the debtor has denied the fraud charged against him. There are three descriptions of fraudulent conveyances, assignments, &c., which bring a merchant, banker, factor, &c. within the operation of the first section of the bankrupt act. 1. Such as are fraudulent, or against the common law, or the provision of such English statutes as have been incorporated into the jurisprudence of this country; 2, (as I am now well satisfied, whatever doubts I may have originally entertained,) such as are voluntarily made, in contemplation of bankruptcy, and for the purpose of giving a preference to one or more of the creditors of the debtor over his other creditors. The making of a conveyance of this description has always been held to be an act of bankruptcy under the English bankrupt law, as being contrary to the policy of the law, without any express words in the statute. But in our act they are expressly declared to be "utterly void, and a fraud upon this act." 3. Assignments of all the effects of the debtor, whether upon trust for the benefit of his creditors or not, on the ground, first, that the debtor necessarily deprives himself, by such an act, of the power of carrying on his trade, and secondly, that he endeavors to put his property under a course of application and distribution among his creditors, different from that, which would take place under the bankrupt law. It is unnecessary to cite authorities to show, that such an assignment is an act of bankruptcy in England, because it has been a well settled and familiar rule. It is a sound and useful rule; and there is nothing whatever in the language of our act, which requires a different construction in this respect. In fact, the provision of the act in question is copied almost verbatim from the correspondent provision in the third section of the act of 6 Geo. IV. c. 16. With regard to the three conveyances of specific property, part of the debtor's property, which he is charged with having made on the second and fifth of April, although from the circumstances of the case, and especially from the fact of their having so soon been followed by an assignment of all the remaining effects of the debtor, the inference is strong, that they were made in contemplation of bankruptcy, and for the purpose of giving an unlawful preference; yet, inasmuch as they are denied to have been fraudulent, it cannot be said that they certainly carry with them intrinsic evidence of fraud. But with respect to the general assignment made on the 30th of April last, I entertain no doubt, that, according to the express admission of the debtor, it is an act of bankruptcy.

All assignments by a debtor, though but of a part of his effects, if voluntarily made in contemplation of bankruptcy, and for the purpose of giving a preference, whatever may have been the antecedent law of the state, when they are made, are, by virtue of the bankrupt act, utterly void; and all assignments by a merchant, banker, factor, etc., who owes not less than $2000, of all his property, or as was said by Lord Mansfield in the case of Hooper v. Smith, 1 W. Bl. 442. of "so much of his stock in trade as to disable him from being a trader," whether made in contemplation of bankruptcy or for the purpose of giving a preference or not, are void, and for themselves acts of bankruptcy.

A decree of bankruptcy must therefore be entered in this case; and also in the case of the same petitioner against Charlemagne Tower, which depends upon exactly the same principles.

BARTON, (UNITED STATES v.) See Cases Nos. 14,533 and 14,534.

BARTOW IRON WORKS, (MARTIN v.) See Case No. 9,157.

Case No. 1,086.

In re BARTUSCH.

[9 N. B. R. (1874,) 478.]

District Court, D. Massachusetts.

BANKRUPTCY—PROOF OF CLAIMS—POSTPONEMENT BY REGISTER.

[1. Under section 23 of the bankrupt act of March 2, 1867, (14 Stat. 528,) which authorizes the judge, at the first meeting of creditors before the election of an assignee, to postpone proof of any claim which he regards as doubtful, the register may exercise the same discretion.]

[2. Where, at such meeting, claims are objected to which the register regards as clearly valid, he can neither admit them as valid, nor postpone the proof merely because they are objected to, but he must apply to the court if the objections are not withdrawn.]

[Cited in Re Jackson, Case No. 7,123; Re Hunt, Id. 6,884.]

In bankruptcy. This case arose upon a certificate from T. W. Palfrey, Esq., register, [in the matter of Bartusch, a bankrupt,] and was argued by Oliver Stevens, Esq., and Messrs. Graves.

LOWELL, District Judge. The question arises, for the first time in this district, whether the register holding the first meeting has authority to postpone the proof of debts under section twenty-three of the statute, [Act March 2, 1867, 14 Stat. 528,] or whether he is merely to take the evidence and report it to the court, as in other issues of law or fact. Congress appears to have been of opinion that if the registers had judicial powers conferred upon them they would be judges, who must be appointed for life, under the first section of the third article of the constitution; and for this reason it was very careful to restrain the powers of these officers within narrow limits. Whatever may be the meaning of the constitution, it has always been the practice to confer a certain amount of judicial power upon commissioners and other magistrates who are not called judges, and who are not appointed and do not hold office as judges. There is very great convenience in this practice, and I do not know that its propriety has been doubted. Registers in bankruptcy have, and must have, certain judicial powers, such as the regulation of the course of meetings, and of the evidence given before them, and the ordering of many things which cannot be called ministerial. It seems to me they should have the power given by section twenty-three to postpone the proof of debts. The word used is "judge," but the register exercises many of the functions of the judge, especially in respect to the proceedings at meetings of the creditors. The purpose of this section is, that the choice of an assignee shall not be delayed by the litigation of doubtful claims. If such delay were once admitted it might be months before the choice could be made, and disastrous results would ensue. The reasons in favor of the register's exercise of this power are like those which prompted its adoption. He has the means for a prompt and careful decision, and he sees the witnesses. His discretion is not likely to be abused, and if in any case the indirect result should be the election of a person unfit to be assignee, it would be the register's duty not to confirm him. He must, of course, decide upon each debt separately, and upon evidence which satisfies him that there is a judicial doubt of its validity or of the right of the creditor to prove it. These are the only grounds mentioned in the statute.

I understand there is a standing rule in the southern district of New York giving this power to registers. A rule, however, is not necessary, if the statute, by the word judge, refers to the magistrate holding the meeting, and a rule would not avail to give the power unless the statute may be so construed. The registers have exercised this power in this district, and, so far as I know, in the other districts. Bump, Bankr., notes to section 23, and cases cited. The practice is open to this obvious remark, that if debts are objected to, and the register considers them not doubtful, but clearly valid and admissible, he yet cannot admit them to proof, against objection, because that would be the decision of a question which the statute gives him no power to decide. I agree that in such an event the court must be applied to, if the objections are not withdrawn. The register has not the power to proceed to a choice of assignee without the votes of all the creditors who wish to vote, if their votes can influence the result, unless the register himself considers their claims doubtful. He cannot postpone them merely because they are objected to; but we have found, in practice, that frivolous or unfounded objections usually are withdrawn after a summary hearing before the register. It was early seen that parties contending for choice of an assignee might make a dead lock at any time by each objecting to all debts offered by his opponent. I then passed a rule that the objections should be stated and tried on the spot, and reported to me at once, intimating that the propounder of frivolous objections might be visited with costs. This has put an end to these vexatious delays.

While, therefore, the register's powers are limited, and, as it were, one sided in this matter, yet I think he has, by law and practice, the right to postpone the proof of a debt which, upon the evidence, he judicially considers to be of doubtful validity, though he can neither admit nor disregard a contested claim which he deems valid, and which would have controlling weight, but must report it to the court. I do not mean to be understood that the court could not order the choice of assignee to proceed, notwithstanding an appeal to the circuit court.

Case No. 1,087.

BAS et al. v. STEEL.

[Pet. C. C. 406.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. April Term, 1817.

PLEADING — DECLARATION — AVERMENTS — DEMURRER — NONSUIT — SHIPPING — PORT REGULATIONS — CLEARANCE — MANIFEST.

1. If the declaration does not set forth a proper case, and in correct form, the defendant may avail himself of these defects by demurrer. But if a sufficient case be stated, then it is incumbent on the plaintiff to prove it, and if he fail to do so, he is not entitled to a verdict.

2. Want of proper averments in the declaration cannot be made the ground of a nonsuit.

3. Unless a manifest of the cargo on board of a vessel about to depart from a port in the United States for a foreign port, be sworn to, and delivered or tendered to the collector by the master, or person having command of the vessel, the collector is not bound to grant a clearance for such vessel.

At law. This was an action on the case, brought by the owners of the Dos Amigos, [Joseph Bas, Escardo, and others,] being subjects of his Catholic majesty, against [John Steele] the collector of the port of Philadelphia, for refusing to grant a clearance to the said ship and cargo from this port to Havanna, in July, 1813. In consequence of the refusal and the consequent delay, the cargo was so damaged as to render it necessary to dispose of it at auction at an enormous loss. The object of the suit is to recover damages for the injuries sustained by the plaintiffs, by reason of the conduct of the defendant. The declaration contained four counts, in all of which it was alleged, that Escardo, one of the plaintiffs, was master of the said vessel and the person having the charge and command of her. In two of the counts, it was stated, that he the said master, &c. delivered to the collector a manifest of all the cargo on board said vessel, and swore to the same (pursuing the requisitions of the ninety-third section of the duty law of [March 2,] 1799,—3 Laws U. S. p. 224,) [Bior. & D. Laws; 1 Stat. 698,] and that notwithstanding, the defendant refused to grant the clearance. In the other two counts, it was stated that the said master, &c. tendered the said manifest to the said collector, and offered to swear to it, but that the collector refused to receive the same or to grant the clearance. The plaintiffs proved that the defendant refused to grant the clearance; and, it appeared, that the ground of the refusal was a suspicion of the collector that the intention of the master was to supply the British fleet in Delaware bay, or off the coast, with provisions. He therefore required to be satisfied upon that point, before the clearance could be granted. The witnesses examined by the plaintiffs, proved that Escardo was part owner of the ship and cargo, and agent for the other part owners, but that he was not the master or person having the command of her.

The defendant moved for a nonsuit on the following grounds:—First, that the declaration does not aver, nor is it proved, that the inspection laws of the state of Pennsylvania had been complied with, and the fees paid, agreeable to the ninety-third section of the duty law. Second, that it is not proved that a manifest was delivered, or tendered, or that Escardo was the master or commander.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice, delivered the opinion of the court.

The only ground upon which this motion

[1] [Reported by Richard Peters, Jr., Esq.]

can with propriety be made, is, that the plaintiffs have failed, by their own evidence, to make out the case stated in their declaration, so as to entitle them to a verdict. If the declaration does not set forth a proper case, and in correct form, the defendant may avail himself of these defects, by demurrer. But, if a sufficient case be stated, then it is incumbent on the plaintiffs to prove it, and if they fail to do so, they are not entitled to a verdict. Whenever this is perceived, it saves time for the court to direct a nonsuit upon the plaintiffs' own showing. Upon this view of the subject, the defendant cannot make the want of proper averments in the declaration the ground of a nonsuit, and consequently the want of evidence to prove facts not averred. The first reason then which is assigned for this motion, cannot be maintained.

The second ground for the motion is of a different kind. The declaration states, that Escardo, "being the master or the person having the charge and command of the vessel, did deliver to the collector a manifest of the cargo sworn to by him;" or, as it is stated in some of the counts, "tendered a manifest to the collector and offered to swear to it, which was refused." It was essential that this averment should have been made in the declaration, as the collector was not bound to grant the clearance, unless the manifest was delivered according to the provisions of the ninety-third section of the collection law, or at least tendered to the collector. Being averred, the defendant could take no exception to the declaration by demurrer. But if it was necessary to aver it, it is equally so that it should be proved, for without such proof the plaintiffs have no case in court. So far from proving this fact, it appears by the plaintiffs' own showing, that Escardo, the person who is stated in the declaration to have been master or the person having the charge and command of the vessel, and who delivered the manifest, had nothing to do with the navigation or maritime command of the vessel; and it is perfectly clear to the court, that no other person is authorized under the law to swear to the manifest. The words charge or command, were clearly intended to apply to some officer of the vessel below the grade of the master, and not to an agent, consignee, or owner. Independent of this defect in the evidence, the plaintiffs have offered no proof whatever that a manifest was made out, sworn to, and delivered or tendered by any person; and yet this is a necessary part of their case.

It was contended by the plaintiffs' counsel that enough appeared to let the case go to the jury, because, as the defendant refused to grant the clearance upon another ground, the jury might fairly presume that the manifest was dispensed with, or that it was in fact produced. But, this would be to presume in favor of the plaintiffs, against their own averments and proof. For they say that Escardo was master, and swore to the manifest and delivered it, and then they prove that he was not master If the jury should presume that he was master, this would be against the plaintiffs' own proof; and if they should presume that the manifest was sworn to and delivered by some other person, being master, this would be against the plaintiffs' averment in their declaration. But the truth is, that because the defendant urged one reason for refusing a clearance, it does not follow that all other objections were removed. If the plaintiffs had removed his suspicions as to the object of the intended voyage, still it would have been necessary, that the master should deliver the manifest, before he could demand a clearance.

The plaintiffs agreed to be called.

NOTE, [from original report.] Upon a rule to show cause, the nonsuit was taken off and the plaintiffs permitted to amend their declaration.

[For the subsequent disposition of this case, see Bas v. Steele, Case No. 1,088.]

Case No. 1,088.

BAS v. STEELE.

[3 Wash. C. C. 381.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. April Term, 1818.

WAR—BLOCKADE—LICENSE TO NEUTRAL VESSEL—PORT REGULATIONS—CLEARANCE—TORTS—EVIDENCE OF PROPERTY—POSSESSION—REGISTRY OF VESSEL—DAMAGES.

1. The laws of the United States do not require a person, in order to entitle himself to a clearance, to produce to the collector, a certificate of his having complied with the inspection laws of the state; unless the law of the state requires it.

[See Boyden v. Burke, 14 How. (55 U. S.) 575.]

2. When one party in a cause wishes the production of papers, supposed to be in the possession of the other, he must give to him notice to produce them. If they are not produced, he may give inferior evidence of their contents; or may draw inferences from their non-production, unfavourable to the other side. But if it is his intention to nonsuit the plaintiff—or if the plaintiff, requiring the papers, means to obtain a judgment by default, under the 15th section of the judicial act, [1 Stat. 82,] he is bound to give the opposite party notice, that he shall move the court for an order upon him, to produce the papers; or, on failure to do so, to award a nonsuit or judgment, as the case may be.

[Cited in Dunham v. Riley, Case No. 4,155; Russell v. McLellan, Id. 12,158; Gregory v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. R., 10 Fed. 529.]

[See Maye v. Carberry, Case No. 9,339; Bank of U. S. v. Kurtz, Id. 920; Thompson v. Selden, 20 How. (61 U. S.) 194.]

3. No advantage can be taken of the non-production of papers, unless ground is laid, for presuming that the papers were, at the time the notice was given, in the possession or power of the party; and that they are pertinent to the issue. In either of the cases, the party to whom the notice was given, may be received, to prove, by his own oath, that the papers are not in his possession or power; which oath may be met, by contrary proof, according to the rules of equity.

[1] [Originally published from the MSS. of Hon. Bushrod Washington, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, under the supervision of Richard Peters, Jr., Esq.]

[See Garrett v. Woodward, Case No. 5,253.]

4. In an action for a tort to personal property, possession, accompanied by an assertion of ownership, is prima facie evidence of property. Documentary evidence, is only necessary when the ownership is denied, and the production of papers is called for.

[Cited in The Nancy Dell, 14 Fed. 747.]

5. The register of a vessel is not, per se, evidence of ownership.

[Cited in The Nancy Dell, 14 Fed. 747.]

[See U. S. v. The F. W. Johnson, Case No. 15,179.]

6. In an action against the collector of the customs for refusing a clearance, upon a count, stating that the plaintiff was the owner of the vessel—laden with a cargo, of a certain value, the allegation is sufficient, as to ownership of the cargo.

7. In actions of contract, or tort, damages, which materially and necessarily arise from the breach or gravamen, need not be stated; as they are covered by the general damages laid in the declaration. Special damages, not necessarily implied, cannot be recovered, unless specially stated; and, although the plaintiff has given evidence of special damages, without objection, by the defendant, yet the defendant may object to their allowance, on the trial.

8. The general nature of the cargo, being provisions—the blockade of the river Delaware, by the enemy, and a license to the plaintiffs, being neutrals in the war, from the blockading squadron, will not authorize the collector to refuse a clearance; there being no law to authorize such refusal.

9. Whether a neutral, within the territory of one belligerent, commits a crime against that belligerent by an intercourse with the enemy must depend on the nature of that intercourse.

10. If the owner contemplated an illicit intercourse with the enemy—such as to supply him with provisions, the clearance of the vessel might be withheld by the collector.

11. The collector must show probable cause for his suspicions; and if the party, having it in his power to remove the suspicions by evidence, fails to do so, he is not entitled to damages for the refusal of the clearance by the collector.

At law. This action was brought to October sessions, 1813, to recover damages from the defendant, [John Steele,] who was collector of the port of Philadelphia, for refusing a clearance to a Spanish vessel, owned by [Joseph Bas and Escardo] the plaintiffs, who were merchants residing at Havana. The vessel, called Les Dos Amigos, having on board a cargo of sugars, arrived at Philadelphia, early in March, 1813, consigned to Escardo, one of the plaintiffs, who came in her as a passenger. Soon afterwards the blockade of the Delaware, by the British, took place; and the Dos Amigos was detained. The owner of a Spanish vessel, also in the port of Philadelphia, with the consent of the proper authority, went down to the blockading squadron, to obtain permission to sail with a cargo of flour, for Havana; and he was requested by Escardo to ask permission for the Dos Amigos to carry a cargo of potatoes and onions to the same place. On his return, he informed Escardo that this permission was granted; but that it was a verbal license, the British commander having refused to give one in writing. A cargo, consisting of onions and potatoes, the growth of 1813, was immediately purchased by Escardo, the cost of which was 2,163 dollars, 53 cents; and, on the 21st of July, accompanied by the captain of the Dos Amigos, he went to the custom-house; where the captain delivered in duplicate a manifest of the cargo, in the usual form, one copy of which was signed by him, and, with the oath required by law, written out. A clearance was not granted, and the owner and master were informed by the deputy-collector, the defendant being absent, that from the nature of the cargo, it being composed of articles of a perishable nature, it was believed to be intended for supplies to the blockading squadron. It was stated by Escardo, that the vessel had a license from the British commander, to carry the cargo to Havana; and the evidence as to this admission, whether the license was declared to be verbal or written, was contradictory. The deputy-collector required the production of the license; and the plaintiff, Escardo, denied any intention to furnish supplies to the hostile vessels. Two or three interviews between Escardo and the deputy-collector took place; and the clearance not being granted, counsel were employed by the plaintiffs, who demanded from the defendant, a clearance for the Dos Amigos, and notified him of a claim for damages, should he continue its refusal. A correspondence took place on the subject; surveys were held on the cargo on the 27th and 28th of July, and it was found in a perishing state; and on the 2d of August, it was sold under the direction of an auctioneer, for 157 dollars 33 cents. The declaration contained four counts: 1st. For refusing a clearance to the Dos Amigos, laden with a cargo: 2d. For refusing the clearance maliciously: 3d. For refusing the clearance, and stating that the manifest was sworn to by the captain: 4th. For refusing it, and stating that the master was ready, and offered to swear to the manifest. The evidence of ownership of the vessel, was the possession of Escardo, in the name of the plaintiffs; and the reputation of such ownership, at Havana. The fact of the refusal of the clearance, was shown by the correspondence between the counsel of the plaintiffs, and the late A. J. Dallas, Esq., who was counsel for the defendant; in which this refusal was admitted, and the reasons for the same stated. The defendant's counsel had, soon after the suit was commenced, given the plaintiffs notice to produce certain documents and papers on the trial; and, on their being called for, it was stated by their counsel, that no such documents or papers were in their possession, or existed, with the exception of the log-book called for, which had accompanied the vessel, on her return to Havana; and an account of the particulars of the cargo, and the receipt of the persons from whom it had been purchased, for the cost thereof; which was offered as a bill of parcels.

C. J. Ingersoll, for the defendant, moved for a nonsuit, on the following grounds: 1. That the manifest delivered to the collector, by the captain of the Dos Amigos, was not sworn to. 2. That notoriety of ownership, and possession of the vessel by one of the plaintiffs, for all the owners, was not sufficient to support this action for damages, ex delicto. 3. That according to the provisions of the 15th section of the judiciary act,—2 Laws U. S. p. 65, [Bior. & D. Laws; 1 Stat. 82,]—the non-production of papers, after notice, gives the party calling for them, if defendant, a right to a non pros; if plaintiff, to a judgment by default.

The counsel for the plaintiffs opposed the nonsuit, alleging that one of the counts of the declaration, averred a readiness on the part of the master, to swear to the manifest; and that as the oath was subscribed by the master, the jury might infer that it was sworn to. That notoriety of ownership, and actual possession of a chattel, was the usual and sufficient evidence of ownership; and, certainly, sufficient to permit the question to go to the jury; and that the provisions of the act of congress, relative to the production of papers, applied only where a motion had been made to the court, for an order on the party, to produce the papers, followed by notice thereof, and some evidence that the party called on for them, had them in his possession, and that they were pertinent to the issue.

[Motion denied.]

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. With respect to the objections on account of the inspection laws, the answer of the plaintiffs' counsel is sufficient. The act of congress does not require the collector to interfere, unless it appears that he is called on so to do by some state law. As to the ownership of the vessel and cargo, it is a sufficient answer to this motion, that some evidence has been given, which may, in the opinion of the jury, be sufficient to prove this fact; and the rule of this court, and of every court is, that where such evidence is given, the court will not take the cause from the jury. As to the manifests, upon being reminded of the counts in the declaration, which aver a readiness to deliver a manifest, these difficulties disappear. The manifest is not sworn to: it is filled up and signed, but the oath was not administered; and it would not in this form be sufficient to support an indictment for perjury. But it is sufficient, under these counts, if the master did all in his power—if he showed himself in readiness to take the oath. The only question with us is, whether enough is shown, to allow the jury an opportunity to draw an inference. Two facts are made out now, which did not appear before. The master, with Escardo, was seen to go two or three times towards the custom-house, professing that he meant to go there; and, at that time, the manifest was in the possession of one of them. Taking these circumstances in connexion with the manifest having been left with the collector; and that the collector does not assign as a reason, why the clearance was refused, that the master would not swear to the manifest, —there is enough, from which the jury may infer, that the manifest was delivered to the collector, by the master, and that he was ready to take the oath; and the objection stated, is not that he refused the oath, but that there was a suspicion of an intended infraction of the law, by furnishing supplies to the enemy.

In the former case, the court stated that the assigning of one reason, did not exclude a right in the collector to give another, if the objections arising from the first should be cleared up. The case is now changed; because now it appears, that a manifest may have been signed and delivered to the collector—and, as another reason for refusing the clearance was assigned, this furnishes an additional fact, from which the jury may infer a readiness on the part of the master, to swear to the manifest. The remaining point is important and novel; and has not yet been decided in the supreme court, in this court, or in any other circuit court, so far as we are informed.

It is not difficult to give a construction to the section of the act of congress. When either party wants papers, he must give notice; and he has in view one of these objects: 1st. That if the papers called for, are not produced, he may be enabled to argue against the party not producing them to the jury: 2d. This object may be to obtain evidence from the contents of the papers called for: and, 3d. To move the court for a new suit, or for a judgment by default, as the case may be. But in either case, the party must entitle himself to the benefits of the section, by showing that the party was in possession of the papers called for; and he must also give evidence of the contents of the papers; for it will not do for him only to say what those contents are. The court will require reasonable proof of the possession, and of the pertinency of the papers. If the object of the party is to avail himself of the provisions of the section, so as to move for a nonsuit, or for judgment by default, he must put the party on his guard, and let him know the consequences of a refusal; and the party receiving such notice, will come prepared to meet it. In any such case, when the party is called on to produce papers, he may make oath that he has them not; and thus extricate himself from difficulty. This is the case in chancery, where the plaintiff charges the defendant with having papers to which he has a right, and the defendant relieves himself by his oath; and this may be met by contrary proof of two witnesses. In every case, the party claiming the papers must give evidence of the relevancy of the papers, and of the opposite party having possession of them. Whenever a judgment by default, or a nonsuit, is intended to be claimed, the notice to produce papers, must give the party information that it is intended to move for a nonsuit, or a judgment by default, as the case may be; and this must hereafter be considered as the rule of the court, under this section of the act of congress.

Nonsuit refused.

The nonsuit having been refused, and the case submitted to the jury, the counsel for the defendant contended—1. That the receiving a license from the enemy of the United States, by the owner of the Dos Amigos, destroyed the neutral character of the vessel, and justified the refusal of the clearance. 2. That as the declaration stated the plaintiffs to be owners of the vessel, "laden with a cargo," this was not a sufficient averment of ownership of the cargo, to authorize a claim for damages for its loss. 3. That there was no evidence to show a demand of a clearance from the collector, after the 21st and 22d of July, and subsequent to the explanations given in the correspondence; and that the failure to make such a demand, as it might have been granted, was an answer to this suit. 4. That a clearance is not a necessary document for a foreign vessel, sailing from a port of the United States; and therefore, the refusal of the clearance was not the cause of the damages sustained by the plaintiffs. The counsel for the defendant cited 1 Chit. Pl. 146, 147, 486, 487; 1 Condy, Marsh. Ins. 407; [The St. Nicholas,] 1 Wheat. [14 U. S.] 431; 4 C. Rob. Adm. 284; 6 C. Rob. Adm. 131; 4 C. Rob. Adm. 65; [The Sally,] 8 Cranch, [7 U. S.] 384.

On the part of the plaintiffs, it was argued —1. That a neutral, not an inhabitant of the place, has a right to obtain a license from the enemy of the nation, when he may wish to proceed to a port in his own country with a cargo, and that such an act was no forfeiture of his neutral character. 2. That the averment in the declaration, that the plaintiffs were owners of the vessel, laden with a cargo, was sufficient; and that if it was not, the jury might give damages for all the consequences of the detention of the vessel by the defendant, even without a direct averment of ownership in the cargo. It was also said, that as the defendant had not objected to the evidence, given by the plaintiffs, of ownership in the cargo; which evidence was intended to apply to that part of the declaration; they could not now object to the effect of such evidence. 3. That a new demand of the clearance was not necessary; and that had the defendant determined to grant a clearance after the explanations, he should have notified the plaintiffs of his readiness so to do. 4. That a clearance is necessary to every vessel sailing on the ocean, to protect her from molestation, and is the usual and proper document for that and other purposes;—that without a clearance, the Dos Amigos would have been arrested by the fort in the Delaware—by the officers of the customs in the district of Delaware—by the gun-boats stationed at the mouth of the harbour; and would have been interrupted by any cruiser she might meet on the ocean.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice, charged the jury. This is an action brought by the owners of a vessel, laden with a cargo, against the collector of the port of Philadelphia, for having refused the vessel a clearance, in consequence of which the cargo was lost; and damages are claimed, as a compensation for the same. We will lay the case before the jury, under the following heads, which will embrace all the arguments of the counsel on both sides, and we shall make such observations upon them as apply.

The first question is, was a clearance asked, and refused?

2. Are the plaintiffs the persons to complain of the refusal?

3. Did the plaintiffs perform all that by law they ought to have done, in order to entitle themselves to call for a clearance?

4. To what extent can damages be claimed, if the plaintiffs are entitled to any?

Lastly. Can they recover these damages from the defendant?

1. Was the clearance refused? The correspondence between the parties has been read repeatedly; and as it is the duty of the court to give a construction to written papers, they will observe upon it. The plaintiffs' counsel in their letter to the defendant, complain of the refusal of a clearance to the Dos Amigos; and the answer of the defendant acknowledges the refusal, and justifies it on certain grounds stated therein. This supports the charge of a refusal by the defendant, and that the plaintiffs complained thereof. But if there is any doubt on this subject, Mr. Wilson's acknowledgment removes it. He states, that two persons, one of whom was the master of the Dos Amigos, came to the custom-house, and applied for a clearance, and he having declined to give the explanations asked, the clearance was not granted; and O'Conway states, that at two interviews, the officer was asked if the vessel would be permitted to depart, and he answered that she would not; as the British vessels were in the mouth of the bay, and the cargo might fall into their hands. But it is said, that if the clearance was refused when first applied for, the subsequent negotiations, between the counsel of the plaintiffs and of the defendant, kept the affair in suspense until the 28th of July, when a new demand should have been made, and was necessary; in order to enable the plaintiffs to recover in this action. This is not the law; nor is it reason. Because, after the refusal of a clearance on the grounds stated, and the plaintiffs had said they would look to the collector for damages, if his suspicions had been removed, it was the duty of the defendant to say to the plaintiffs, I will give the vessel a clearance. If he was not satisfied with the explanations offered by the plaintiffs, to remove those suspicions, he must stand or fall before the jury, by the propriety of the reasons of his refusal. The plaintiffs had done enough.

2. Are the plaintiffs the persons entitled to complain of the refusal?—have they given satisfactory reasons to the jury, to show they are the owners of the vessel? The law has been correctly stated by the plaintiffs' counsel. Possession and assertion of ownership, are sufficient evidence thereof. Documentary evidence is not necessary, unless the asserted ownership is denied, and the party has been called on to produce such documents. The evidence in this case is, that Escardo was here, in possession of the vessel, and asserted he was the owner for all the plaintiffs; and he afterwards proceeds to manifest this, by instituting the suit in the name of all the owners. Longfausse was at Havana, saw the owners there, heard them assert that they were owners of this vessel; and he states, that it was there a matter of notoriety they were the owners. The register of the vessel, if it were produced, would not be sufficient evidence, and would be no more than this, but that it would be in writing; nor would it be equal to this, if it were not accompanied by possession. This is, however, a question of evidence, on which the jury must decide.

3. Did the plaintiffs do all that by law they ought to have done, in order to entitle the vessel to a clearance? What does the law require? That the master shall deliver to the collector, a manifest of the cargo on board the vessel, stating the articles of which the same is composed, and the prices thereof, to be signed and sworn to by him. What is the evidence on this subject? Mr. Wilson, the deputy-collector, states, that "on the 21st of July, 1813, the captain of the Spanish vessel, with a foreigner, not known to him, came to the custom-house. Two outward manifests were laid on the desk at which he stood, either by the captain or the gentleman with him. He took them up and examined them as was usual. He observed to the captain, and to the gentleman with him, that the cargo was of a very perishable nature, and that he doubted whether it could reach Havana in a state proper for use, and was therefore intended for the British squadron; and he referred particularly to the articles being the growth of that season. They declared they were bona fide destined for Havana, and they withdrew." From this, the following facts appear as applicable to the manifest. Two manifests, filled up, and signed, were placed on the desk of the deputy-collector; were examined by him, and no objections made to them; but he stated a suspicion, that the cargo could not reach Havana, and that, therefore, it was intended for the British squadron. Mr. Dallas states, in his letter, that this would be no obstacle to granting the clearance, if the grounds for suspicion of illicit intercourse were removed. This admits, that the manifest was tendered, and that the captain was ready to swear to it; and the court think it was the duty of the collector to require it to be sworn to, if he thought it necessary. Two manifests were laid on the desk: only one has been produced on notice; and the jury will judge why the other has not been produced. The court has no difficulty in saying, that these circumstances amount to evidence, that the manifest was sworn to, or that the master was ready to swear to it; and that the plaintiffs did all, or were ready to do all, the law required of them.

4. To what extent can the plaintiffs claim damages, in this case, if the jury shall be of opinion they are entitled to damages? The averment in the declaration is, that the plaintiffs "were the owners of a vessel, laden with a cargo;" and it is said, that this is an averment of the ownership of the cargo. This will not do. They ought to have stated the ownership of both vessel and cargo, and the averment in the declaration does not mean this. It would apply as well to a vessel laden with a cargo on freight; and ownership in the cargo does not follow from it. What is the rule of law as to damages? it has been admitted, on both sides, that, whenever the declaration claims damages, whether in contract or in tort, all the damages, which the jury can say arose out of the breach stated in the declaration, may be given, and such is the law. But if the plaintiff means to go further, he must state them specially, as well to give notice, as that, otherwise, the evidence will not fit the declaration, and these must always correspond. It was argued, but not relied on by the plaintiffs' counsel, that this is a rule of evidence and not of compensation; and the defendant having allowed evidence to be given of the value and loss of the cargo, he could not afterwards oppose its effect, in ascertaining the extent of damages. There are some instances, where, after evidence has been admitted, the court will not permit counsel to object to its influence. Thus, when the signatures to a note have been admitted, the party shall not say, you cannot claim damages for the note, because this would be a trick; and having suffered the note to go to the jury as proved, he shall not afterwards oppose its operation upon them. But whenever the case is, as in the present cause, the rule is otherwise. Does, or does not, the evidence fit the declaration? If it does not, it is now too late to inform the jury they ought not to regard it. What are the damages which arose out of the case stated in the declaration in this cause? The owners of a vessel sue the collector for refusing a clearance of a vessel with a cargo on board. Freight undoubtedly is lost by the prevention of the voyage. If the cargo belonged to any body else, or to themselves, the loss was sustained and may be recovered. The owners of a vessel are equally entitled to freight, to whomsoever the cargo may belong. As to the amount of this loss, it is properly within the province of the jury to ascertain it, and the court will not attempt to state it.

Lastly, can these damages be recovered from the defendant? The defendant has produced evidence of circumstances to justify his conduct; and various grounds of defence have been taken by his counsel. In the origin of of the case, but one objection was made to granting the clearance—a suspicion of illicit intercourse with the enemy; subsequently there was another—that the plaintiffs had in their possession a license from the blockading squadron, which it was their duty to produce, to show whether it was an authority for the vessel to proceed to Havana. The grounds of suspicion of illicit intercourse were, the general nature of the cargo, it being provisions;—the blockade of the Delaware, and sailing under a British license. All these are put together, because they admit of one answer; they did not justify the collector. A neutral vessel, in a blockaded port, takes a cargo on board, and asks leave to depart. The collector says no: you have a cargo of provisions and a license. The answer is, I have a right to go; and what is it to you if I have a license? The blockading squadron may prevent it; I have a right to run the risk, and you cannot interfere. The nation may prevent it, but an executive officer cannot. If congress did not think proper to make such a law, the collector could not make it, and say, you shall not go. As to the license, the plaintiffs had a right to take it; and the blockading squadron had a right to give it; and the reasons given by the supreme court, against an American citizen taking a license, do not apply in such a case. The American citizen, by taking a license, takes side with the enemy; and as, in time of war, every member of the nation is considered at war, he shall not be at peace. But these reasons do not apply to a neutral. He can go into a blockaded port, and can go out, if the blockading force will permit it; and it is not for any officer of the port to say, he shall not go. The act of congress, relative to licenses from the enemy, does not apply,—First, because it was passed after the cause of action arose. Secondly, because Escardo was not an inhabitant of this country, as no person is an inhabitant of a place, but one who acquires a domicil there; otherwise, all neutral trade would be destroyed. Going to a place to obtain a cargo, and coming away, does not give a neutral a domicil, or make him an inhabitant. If the circumstance of the blockading squadron having been at the time in the mouth of the Delaware, is a justification of the defendant, it would amount to this; that, although congress had repealed the embargo, the collector had the same powers he possessed when the embargo was in force. Suppose any citizen had attempted to go; could the collector stop him because he might fall in with the enemy? If no law has been produced to authorize the collector to refuse it, he ought to have granted the clearance. Intercourse with the enemy has been alleged against one of the plaintiffs, and this was never thought of by the collector, but is the suggestion of counsel. Intercourse with the enemy, by citizens of the United States, would have been improper; but in a neutral, it is not necessarily a criminal act. Such intercourse might be criminal, as giving information; but when it had been ascertained, that it amounted to no more than procuring a license to go to sea, with a cargo, it was not criminal. But, suppose it had been so; what had the collector to do with it? The vessel might have gone out, and Escardo have been indicted. The case of The Tulip, [Case No. 14,234,] has no application. There, the American vessel carried out important despatches from the British minister, which, if she did not, at sea, fall in with a conveyance for them, she was to land in some part of England or Ireland; and the court had no difficulty in condemning her.

The case comes to this:—the collector had two conflicting duties imposed upon him; one to the individual who asked a clearance; the other to his country. If the destination of the vessel was the enemy, he had a right to refuse a clearance; if not, and there were not circumstances to warrant his suspicions, he had no such right. He was to judge upon circumstances, and to proceed on such ground, as that any just man could say, there did exist reasons sufficient to authorize the belief, that this was the destination of the vessel; and if the jury, carefully and coolly examining all the reasons, think he had just grounds for the suspicion, they will find a verdict in his favour.

The court then went into a minute examination of the evidence which had been adduced by the defendant; and concluded by stating; that if, upon the facts, the jury thought the defendant had just and reasonable grounds for his conduct, he was not answerable; but if they did not think so, they would find for the plaintiffs.

After the court had concluded the charge, Mr. C. J. Ingersoll requested that the court would instruct the jury, whether, if the license to the Dos Amigos was or was not in writing, and the deputy-collector misunderstood the plaintiff Escardo in relation to it, it was not the duty of Escardo to explain the circumstance.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. If Mr. Wilson, the deputy-collector, said to Escardo, I understand you have a license in writing, and I ask you to show it, and he was silent and did not explain it, the consequences would be the same, and the defendant would have been justified. Still, the jury will have to determine on the accuracy of Mr. Wilson's recollection; not on his veracity, for that has not been doubted. The court say nothing about the point which was mentioned, whether the collector is answerable for the acts of his deputy. He is certainly answerable for all his acts.

Verdict for plaintiffs.

[NOTE. See Bas v. Steel, Case No. 1,087; motion for nonsuit.]

BASCADORE, (UNITED STATES v.) See Cases Nos. 14,535 and 14,536.

Case No. 1,089.

BASCOM et al. v. LANE et al.

[Brunner, Col. Cas. 348;[1] 4 Am. Law J. (N. S.) 193; 9 West. Law J. 162; 8 Leg. Int. 162.]

Circuit Court, D. New York. Nov. 11, 1851.

RELIGIOUS SOCIETIES—DIVISION OF CHURCH—DISTRIBUTION OF COMMON PROPERTY

A church conference may consent to the division of the church into two bodies, and such separation being in pursuance of proper authority will carry with it a division of the common property. Commissioners appointed by one of the divisions have power to file a bill against the trustees of the common property for a division of the same.

[See Smith v. Swormstedt, Case No. 13,112.]

[In equity. Bill by Henry B. Bascom and others, commissioners appointed by the general conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, against George Lane and another, agents of the book concern of the Methodist Episcopal Church, for a settlement and division of property of the church. Decree for complainants.]

Reverdy Johnson, Daniel Lord, and Mr. Johnson, Jr., for complainants.

Rufus Choate, George Wood, and E. L. Fancher, for respondents.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. The complainants state in their bill, that before and on the 8th day of June, 1844, there existed in the United States of America a voluntary association, known as the Methodist Episcopal Church, not incorporated, but composed of seven bishops, four thousand eight hundred and twenty-eight preachers belonging to the traveling connection; and, in bishops, ministers, and membership, about one million one hundred and nine thousand nine hundred and sixty, then being in the United States and territories thereof, united and holden together in one organized body, by certain doctrines of faith and morals, and by certain rules of government and discipline. That the general government of this church was vested in one body, called the general conference, and in certain subordinate bodies called annual conferences, and in bishops, traveling ministers, and preachers; and that the constitution, organization, form of government, and rules of discipline, as well as the articles of religion and doctrines of the church, were of general notoriety; but, for the more particular information of the court, reference is made to a printed volume, entitled "The Doctrines and Discipline of the Methodist Episcopal Church"; and the complainants allege that differences and disagreements have sprung up between what was called the northern and southern members, in respect to the administration of the church government, concerning the ownership of slaves by the ministry of the church, of such a character, and attended with such consequences, as threatened fearfully to impair the usefulness of the church, as well as permanently to disturb its harmony; and that it became a question of grave and serious importance whether a separation ought not to take place by some geographical boundary, so that the church should thereafter constitute two separate and distinct Methodist Episcopal Churches; and thereupon the complainants allege that at a general conference of the church, holden according to usage and discipline, at New York, on the 8th day of June, 1844, the following resolutions were duly adopted by a majority of over three fourths of the entire body. As the principal question in the case arises upon these resolutions, we copy them entire.

Resolved, By the delegates of the annual conferences, in general conference assembled: —1. That should the annual conference in the slave-holding states find it necessary to unite in a distinct ecclesiastical connection, the following rule shall be observed with regard to the northern boundary of such connection: All the societies, stations, and conferences, adhering to the church in the south by a vote of the majority of the members of said societies, stations, and conferences, shall remain under the unmolested pastoral care of the southern church; and the ministers of the Methodist Episcopal Church shall in no wise attempt to organize churches or societies within the limits of the church south, nor shall they attempt to exercise any pastoral oversight therein, it being understood that the ministry of the south reciprocally observe the same rule in relation to stations, societies, and conferences, adhering by a vote of a majority to the Methodist Episcopal Church; provided, also, that the rule shall apply only to societies, stations, and conferences bordering on the line of division, and not to interfere with charges which shall, in all cases, be left to the care of that church within whose territory they are situated. 2. That ministers, local and traveling, of every grade and office, in the Methodist Episcopal Church, may, as they prefer, remain in the church, or, without blame, attach themselves to the church south.

[1] [Reported by Albert Brunner, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

Resolved, By the delegates of all the annual conferences in general conference assembled, that we recommend to all the annual conferences, at their first approaching sessions, to authorize a change of the sixth restrictive article, so that the first clause shall read thus: "They shall not appropriate the produce of the book concern, nor of the charter fund, to any purpose other than for the benefit of the traveling, supernumerary, superannuated, and worn-out preachers, their wives, widows, and children, and to such other purposes as may be determined upon by a vote of two thirds of the members of the general conference." 3. That whenever the annual conference, by a vote of three fourths of all their members voting on the third resolution, shall have concurred in the recommendation to alter the sixth restrictive article, the agents at New York and Cincinnati shall, and they are hereby authorized and directed to deliver over to any authorized agent or appointee of the church south, should one be organized, all notes and book accounts against the ministers, church members, or citizens, within its boundaries, with authority to collect the same for the sole use of the southern church; and that said agents also convey to aforesaid agent or appointee of the south, all the real estate, and assign to him all the property, including presses, stock, and all right and interest connected with the printing establishments at Charleston, Richmond, and Nashville, which now belong to the Methodist Episcopal Church. 4. That when the annual conferences shall have approved the aforesaid change in the sixth restrictive article, there shall be transferred to the above agent for the southern church so much of the capital and produce of the Methodist book concern as will, with the notes, book accounts, presses, etc., mentioned in the last resolution, bear the same proportion to the whole property of said concern that the traveling preachers in the southern church shall bear to all the traveling ministers of the Methodist Episcopal Church. The division to be made on the basis of the number of traveling preachers in the forthcoming minutes. 5. That the above transfer shall be in the form of annual payments of $25,000 per annum, and specifically in stock of the book concern, and in southern notes and accounts due the establishment, and accruing after the first transfer mentioned above; and until the payments are made, the southern church shall share in all the net profits of the book concern, in the proportion that the amount due them, or in arrears, bears to all the property of the concern. 6. That Nathan Bangs, George Peck, and James B. Finley be, and they are hereby appointed commissioners, to act in concert with the same number of commissioners, appointed by the southern organization (should one be formed), to estimate the amounts which will fall due to the south by the preceding rule, and to have full power to carry into effect the whole arrangement proposed with regard to the division of property, should the separation take place. And if by any means a vacancy occurs in this board of commissioners, the book committee at New York shall fill said vacancy. 7. That whenever agents of the southern church are clothed with legal authority or corporate power, to act in the premises, the agents at New York are hereby authorized and directed to act in concert with said southern agents so as to give the provisions of these resolutions a legally binding force. 8. That all the property of the Methodist Episcopal Church, in meeting-houses, parsonages, colleges, schools, conference funds, cemeteries, and of every kind, within the limits of the southern organization, shall be forever free from any claim set up on the part of the Methodist Episcopal Church, so far as this resolution can be of force in the premises. 9. That the church so formed in the south shall have a common right to use all the copyrights in possession of the book concern at New York and Cincinnati, at the time of the settlement by the commissioners. 10. That the book agents at New York be directed to make such compensation to the conferences south for their dividend from the chartered fund, as the commissioners above provided for shall agree upon. 11. That the bishops be respectfully requested to lay that part of this report requiring the action of the annual conferences before them as soon as possible, beginning with the New York conference.

The complainants further allege that the said general conference had full and competent power and authority to adopt the resolutions, each and all of them, and that the same became of binding force and validity; and that in pursuance of said resolutions, such proceedings were afterwards had in the several annual conferences of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the slaveholding states, in general convention assembled by delegates (elected on the basis of the resolutions of the general conference of 1844) at Louisville, Kentucky. On the 1st day of May, 1845, the following resolution was adopted after mature and deliberate consideration:—

Be it resolved, by the delegates of the several annual conferences of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the slave-holding states, in general convention assembled, that it is right, expedient, and necessary to erect the annual conferences represented in this convention into a distinct ecclesiastical connection, separate from the jurisdiction of the general conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, as at present constituted; and, accordingly, we, the delegates of said annual conference, acting under the provisional plan of separation adopted by the general conference of 1844, do solemnly declare the jurisdiction hitherto exercised over said annual conferences, by the general conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, entirely dissolved; and that said annual conferences shall be, and they are hereby constituted a separate ecclesiastical connection under the provisional plan of separation aforesaid, and based upon the discipline of the Methodist Episcopal Church, comprehending the doctrines and entire moral, ecclesiastical, and economical rules and regulations of said discipline, except only in so far as verbal alterations may be necessary to a distinct organization, and to be known by the style and title of the Methodist Episcopal Church South. Yeas, ninety-four.

And that afterwards, on the 2d day of July, 1845, a council of the bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church met at New York (which council was composed of the northern bishops), and then and there adopted unanimously the following resolutions:—

1. Resolved, That the plan reported by the select committee of nine at the last general conference, and adopted by that body, in regard to a distinct ecclesiastical connection, should such a course be found necessary by the annual conference in the slave-holding states, is regarded by us of binding obligation in the premises as far as our administration is concerned.

2. Resolved, That in order to ascertain fairly the desire and purpose of those societies bordering on the line of division, in regard to their adherence to the church, north or south, due notice should be given of the time, place, and object of the meeting for the above purpose, at which a chairman and secretary should be appointed, and the sense of all the members present be ascertained, and the same be forwarded to the bishop who may preside at the ensuing annual conference; or forward to said presiding bishop a written request to be recognized and have a preacher sent them, with the names of the majority appended thereon.

And the complainants allege and insist, that by and in virtue of the foregoing proceedings, the Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States, as it had existed before the year 1844, became and was divided into two distinct Methodist Episcopal Churches, with distinct and independent organizations, powers, and authority, compounded of the several annual conferences, charges, stations, and societies, lying or being situated north and south of the aforesaid line of division.

And the complainants further allege, that, by force of the foregoing proceedings, the Methodist Episcopal Church South became and was entitled to its proportion of all the property, real and personal, and of all funds and effects which, up to the time of the separation, had belonged to the Methodist Episcopal Church; and that the church south was and is so entitled, without any change or alteration of the sixth restrictive article above mentioned. That before and on the said 8th day of June, 1844, the Methodist Episcopal Church owned and possessed a large amount of property in various parts of the United States, real and personal, which was in the hands of agents and trustees; and, among others, large interests therein belonged to the said church, in what was denominated the book concern, in the city of New York, consisting of houses and lots, machinery, printing presses, book bindery, books, papers, debts, cash, etc., amounting to about the sum of seventy-five thousand dollars, the whole of which property is now in the possession of the defendants, Lane and Scott, as book agents.

And the complainants further allege, that after the division of the Methodist Episcopal Church into two distinct churches, by virtue of the resolutions of the general conference of 1844, and the action of the annual conference of the south, as hereinbefore set forth, the agents of the book concern, since the year 1845, have utterly refused to pay the annual conferences south, or to the complainants for and in behalf of them, their said just proportion of the profits and income to the said book concern, and still continue to withhold the same. That the said general conference of the church south, holden at Petersburg, Virginia, in May, 1845, in pursuance of and in compliance with the plan of separation of 1844, proceeded to appoint the complainants, Bascom and Green, together with S. A. Latta, commissioners, to meet the commissioners appointed by the general conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church of 1844, and to settle and receive from said commissioners the just proportion of the property and effects due to the church south, according to the said plan of separation; and that the said Bascom, Green, and Latta afterward applied to Nathan Bangs, George Peck, and James B. Finley, appointed by the general conference, in 1844, as the said book agents, to meet them for the purpose of a settlement and division of the said property, and have repeatedly called on them for that purpose; but that the defendants have wholly failed and refused to act in the premises; nor have they been enabled to induce the said book agents, nor commissioners, nor church itself, to pay to the said church south its proportionate share of the said property and funds, as provided in the said plan of separation.

And the complainants allege that they are members of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

South; that Kelly and Allen are supernumerary preachers, and Tevis a superannuated preacher; and that they belong to the traveling connection of the said church; and as such have a personal interest in the estate, real and personal, now holden by the Methodist Episcopal Church, by the defendants, as agents and trustees appointed by the general conference; that there are about fifteen hundred preachers belonging to the traveling connection of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, each of whom has the same personal interest in the said property as the complainants; and that the great number of persons thus interested in the recovery sought by the said bill makes it inconvenient, if not impossible, to bring them before the court as complainants; that they are citizens of states other than the state of New York, and that their interests exceed the sum of two thousand dollars; that the defendants, Lane and Scott, have the custody and control by law, and by virtue of their appointment as agents of the book concern, of all the property and effects of the said concern, as above described.

The complainants further allege, that the entire membership of the Methodist Episcopal Church South is about four hundred and sixty thousand five hundred and fifty-three; and that the entire membership of the church north is about six hundred and thirty-nine thousand and sixty-six; and that it is therefore impossible to bring all the parties in interest before the court in this bill, either as complainants or defendants.

The defendants admit the adoption of the resolutions of the general conferences of the 8th of June, 1844, by a majority of over three fourths of the entire body; but allege that the said resolutions were, in respect to their operation and effect, provisional and contingent, and were intended to meet a future emergency, that it was supposed might arise in the church between the northern and southern members; and further, that the said resolutions, called the plan of separation, were not duly or legally passed; and that the general conference had no power or authority to pass or adopt the same, except that portion comprising the recommendation to the annual conferences to change the sixth restrictive rule; and that the last named resolutions, when adopted, were null and void, and without any binding force, except as a matter of recommendation. The defendants further insist, that even had the so-called plan of separation been constitutional and valid, it merely provided for a prospective plan, which without the happening of certain future conditions, or on the failure of which conditions, or either of them, could not, by its express terms, nor was it ever intended to have any force or validity, and is null and void. And that the same was never ratified by the annual conferences named therein; and that the southern annual conferences have, in all respects, as to the church south, acted on their own responsibility, without any authority from the general conference of 1844. The defendants admit that the resolutions set forth in the complainants' bill were adopted by the convention of delegates from the annual conference in the slave-holding states, assembled at Louisville, Kentucky, on the 1st of May, 1845; but they deny that the delegates comprising said convention were selected on the basis, or according to the authority of the provisional plan of separation of 1844. And they insist that the Methodist Episcopal Church South exists as a separate ecclesiastical connection, by the actions and doings of the individual bishops, ministers, and members attached to such church, proceeding in the premises on their own responsibility; and that such bishops, ministers, and members have voluntarily withdrawn themselves from the Methodist Episcopal Church, and have renounced all their rights and privileges in the communion and under her government. The defendants further admit that the council of bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church, called the northern bishops in complainants' bill, met and adopted the resolutions therein stated. They deny that this church, as it existed before the year 1844, or as it at any time existed, was lawfully divided into two distinct Methodist Episcopal Churches, as alleged in the said bill; but that the separation and withdrawal from the church of a portion of the bishops, ministers, and members was an unauthorized separation. The defendants admit that before and on the 8th day of June, 1844, the Methodist Episcopal Church owned and possessed large amounts of property in various parts of the United States, and that the property, consisting of the book concern, with all houses, lots, machinery, printing presses, etc., is now, and always has been, the property of the preachers belonging to the traveling connection of the Methodist Episcopal Church and their families; but that, if such preachers do not, during life, continue in such traveling connection, and in communion, and subject to the government of the said church, they forfeit, for themselves and their families, all their ownership in, and all claim upon, said book concern, and the produce thereof. They admit that all lands, property, and effects pertaining to the said book concern are in the possession of the defendants, Lane and Scott, as agents duly appointed by the general conference. They admit, also, that the said book concern was originally commenced by traveling members of the Methodist Episcopal Church, on their own capital, with the design, in the first place, of circulating religious knowledge, and by whom it was surrendered to the ownership of all the traveling preachers in full connection, and made subject to the control of the traveling preachers in their general conference; and that it was agreed, from time to time, the profits arising from the sale of the books should be applied to pious and charitable objects, but principally to the support of traveling ministers and their families, until, in the general conference of 1796, it was determined that the said moneys should in future be applied wholly to the relief of traveling preachers, including such of them as were deceased; and that it was resolved in that conference that the produce of the sale of the books, after the book debts were paid, and a sufficient capital provided for carrying on the business, should be regularly paid "for the relief of distressed traveling preachers, for the families of traveling preachers, and for the superannuated and worn-out preachers, and the widows and orphans of preachers."

We have thus stated what we regard as the material parts of the bill and answer. A good deal of documentary proof was read on the hearing; but upon the view we have taken of the case, it will not be necessary to refer particularly to it, except as stated in the course of this opinion, as most if not all of the facts material to be noticed are matters of serious dispute. Indeed, the bill and answer present most of the facts upon which our opinion will be founded. The complainants include traveling, supernumerary, and superannuated preachers belonging to the traveling connection of preachers in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, representing in this suit a numerous body in that connection, and claim their proportionate share in the profits of the book concern, which this description of persons were confessedly entitled to before the division of the Methodist Episcopal Church into two distinct organizations took place, under the plan of separation of 1844. This book concern was established at a very early day, by the traveling preachers in connection with that church, and the profits to be derived therefrom, devoted by them to the relief of their distressed supernumerary and worn-out brethren, their widows and orphans. The establishment was small at first, but at present is one of a very large capital, and of extensive operations, producing great profits, to be applied in behalf of the objects of charity. It has, doubtless, been conducted with great judgment, and prudence by the agents in the immediate charge of it; but its growth and present magnitude are not less owing to the labor and devotion of the body of the traveling preachers, who have always taken the principal charge of the circulation and sale of the books in the Methodist connection throughout the United States, accounting to the proper authorities for the proceeds.

The traveling preachers of this church were the founders of this charity, and have designated the objects and purposes to which it shall be applied; and if it is, at any time, wrongfully withheld by those in the immediate charge of it, or diverted from the objects designed by the founders, it is the duty of the court to interfere and enforce the execution of the trust. The foundation of this charity is peculiar and novel, differing essentially from the cases of this description that have heretofore fallen under the equitable jurisdiction of a court of chancery. The traveling preachers are both the founders and the beneficiaries. They are the proprietors of the charitable fund, and, according to the constitution under which the endowment was made, also entitled to its proceeds.

We do not perceive, however, that these considerations can in any way affect the nature or character of the interest of the complainants, or confer upon them a title to the enjoyment of their proportion of the proceeds, superior to that of beneficiaries of a pure charity, where a third person has made the endowment in the ordinary way for charitable and pious uses, or, that it can be administered upon any other principles than those governing courts of equity in this class of cases. For, according to the original constitution of this fund by the founders, who had a right to prescribe the terms and conditions upon which the proceeds or profits should be distributed, and the persons to whom and which when prescribed furnishes the law of the case for the court, these proceeds and profits have been devoted to the relief of distressed, traveling, supernumerary, and worn-out preachers in the connection of the Methodist Episcopal Church, their widows and orphans; and to entitle the complainants, and those they represent, to the enjoyment they must bring themselves within the description. We must add, however, that the connection of this body with the original establishment, and subsequent growth of this fund, as a portion of its founders give to their claims a peculiar merit, which cannot but impress upon the court an anxiety so to administer it as to secure to them the benefit of the fruits of so sacred a trust, if reasonably consistent with the rules and principles of equity, and intent of the original founders.

The bill brings the complainants clearly within the description of persons entitled to a distribution of the proceeds of the fund; and the main question in the case, therefore, arises upon the answer and proofs in support of it. It is insisted,—1. That the resolutions of the general conference of 1844, when properly understood, do not impart an unqualified assent of that body to a division of the Methodist Episcopal Church into two separate and distinct organizations or churches; that the assent thereby given was conditional and contingent, and that the conditions were not complied with, nor has the contingency happened. 2. That, if otherwise, the general conference was not possessed of competent power and authority to assent to or authorize the division. And, 3. That the division, therefore, that took place was a nullity; and the separate organization a wrongful withdrawal and disconnection from the membership, communion, and government of the church, by reason of which the traveling, supernumerary, and worn-out preachers composing the separate organization, are taken out of the description of the beneficiaries of the fund. There were some other matters brought into view in the course of the argument which we may notice hereafter; but the above petitions present the main grounds upon which the defense rests.

1. As to the resolutions, or the plan of separation, as they are usually called. The first one declares, that should the annual conference of the slave-holding states find it necessary to unite in a distinct ecclesiastical connection, the following shall be observed with regard to the northern boundary of such connection: All the societies, stations, and conferences adhering to the church in the south by a vote of the majority of the members shall remain under the unmolested pastoral care of the southern church; and then follows a mutual stipulation that each church shall abstain from organizing churches or societies within the boundaries of the other; and also from exercising any pastoral oversight therein. The second, that ministers, local and traveling, of every grade and office, in the Methodist Episcopal Church, may, as they prefer, remain in that church, or without blame attach themselves to the church south. The fifth resolution declares that all the property of the Methodist Episcopal Church, in meeting-houses, colleges, schools, conference funds, cemeteries, and every kind, within the limits of the southern organization, shall be free from any claim set up on the part of the Methodist Episcopal Church, as far as this resolution can be of force in the premises. The third is a recommendation to the annual conferences at their approaching sessions, to authorize a change of the restrictive article of the fundamental law of the church, which we shall have occasion to examine with some particularity in another branch of this case, and which prohibited the general conference from appropriating the produce of the book concern to any other purpose than for the benefit of the traveling, supernumerary, and worn-out preachers, their widows and orphans, without the concurrence of the annual conferences.

The change recommended was to add to the clause of limitation, "and to such other purposes as may be determined upon by a vote of two thirds of the members of the general conference." The object of recommending this change was to enable the general conference to proceed at once, and make an equitable division of the property and effects belonging to the Methodist Episcopal Church, as then organized between the two separate organizations. For this purpose, the next resolution provided that as soon as the annual conferences shall have concurred in the recommendation, the agents at New York and Cincinnati were directed to deliver over to the agent of the church south all notes, etc., against the ministers, members, or citizens within its boundaries, for the sole use of said church; and also to convey to such agent all the real estate and other property connected with the printing establishments at Charleston, Richmond, and Nashville, which then belonged to the church; and in the one following, that there should be transferred to the said agent so much of the capital and produce of the Methodist book concern as would, with the property and effects before mentioned, bear the same proportion to the whole property of the said concern that the traveling preachers in the southern church bore to all the traveling preachers of the Methodist Episcopal Church. The terms and mode of payment were then prescribed, and commissioners appointed to meet commissioners to be appointed by the southern organization to estimate and fix the amount that might fall due them according to the preceding arrangement. And in winding up, the bishops are requested to lay that part of the report (resolutions) requiring the action of the annual conferences before them as soon as possible.

Now it will be seen from this analysis of the plan of separation, that the only condition or contingency upon which an absolute division of the church organization was made to depend was the action of the several annual conferences in the slave-holding states. If these should find it necessary to unite in favor of a distinct organization, by the very terms of the plan, the separation was to take place according to the boundary designated. It was left to them to judge of the necessity; and their judgment is made final in the matter. And when the decision is made, and the church is divided into two separate bodies, it is declared ministers of every grade and office in the Methodist Episcopal Church may, as they prefer, remain in that church, or, without blame, attach themselves to the church south. The whole plan of separation confirms this view. As soon as the separation takes place in accordance with the first resolution, all the property, in meeting-houses, parsonages, colleges, schools, conference funds, and cemeteries, within the limits of the southern organization, is declared to be free from any claim on the part of the northern church. The general and common property, such as notes and other obligations, together with the property and effects belonging to the printing establishments at Charleston, Richmond, and Nashville, and the capital and produce of the book concern at New York, was referred for future adjustment. This was necessary, on account of the restrictive article upon the power of the general conference, in respect to the produce of the book concern and charter fund. Some delay was necessary to procure that authority from the annual conferences. But one mode of the adjustment was settled, depending only upon the action of the conferences in respect to the authority. The notes and book debts against persons within the southern church, together with the several printing establishments situated within its limits, were to be transferred to that church; and also so much of the capital and produce of the book concern, which, together with the aforesaid property, would bear the same proportion to the whole interest in that concern as the traveling preachers in the southern church bear to all the traveling preachers of the Methodist Episcopal Church. This perfected the adjustment of the common property between the two organizations.

It will be seen looking back to the plan of separation, that the only contingencies or conditions subsequent to be found in it are two. First, the separate organization was to depend upon the action of the annual conferences in the slave-holding states; and, second, the division of this latter portion of the common property of the church, upon the action of all the annual conferences in respect to the change of the restrictive article. When the annual conferences in the slave-holding states acted and organized a southern church, as they did, the division of the Methodist Episcopal Church into two organizations became complete. And so would the adjustment of the common property between them, if the assent of all the annual conferences had been given to the change of the restrictive article. The failure to give that has left this part of the plan open, the only consequence of which is to deprive the southern division of its share of the property dependent upon this assent, and leave it to get along as it best may, unless a right to recover its portion legally results from the authorized division into two separate organizations.

The argument against this view is, that the separation was to take place, not only in the event of the concurrence of the southern conferences, but also upon the assent of all the annual conferences to change the restrictive article. And the preamble to the plan of separation was referred to as countenancing this construction. We think otherwise. On the contrary, in our judgment, it confirms the view above taken. That preamble recites that a declaration had been presented to the general conference with the signatures of fifty-one delegates of that body from thirteen annual conferences in the slave-holding states representing that for various reasons enumerated, the objects and purposes of the Christian ministers and church organization cannot be successfully accomplished by them, under the jurisdiction of the general conference, as then constituted; and that in the event of a separation, a contingency to which the declaration asks attention, as not improbable, we esteem it the duty of the general conference to meet the emergency with Christian kindness and the strictest equity. Then follows the plan of separation, and it leaves the strongest impress throughout of the conviction and spirit so feelingly and impressively announced in the preamble. The question of separation is left to the judgment of their southern brethren in the church, where delegates had declared the necessity, and provision is made for the adjustment and division of the common property which, so far as we know, are founded upon principles of "the strictest equity," between the parties, and then the constitutional powers of the conference are exhausted in the endeaver to carry out this division. It is apparent, from the plan of separation, as well as from the whole course of the proceedings, that if this body had possessed the power, or had believed that they possessed it, to make an effectual division of the property, it would have been made at the time, dependent only upon the determination of the southern conference for a separate organization. They advanced as far as was supposed to be in their power, and took immediate steps to obtain the necessary authority to perfect it. The division of the property was not an element that entered into the consideration of the southern delegates to declare for a separate organization. They related to a different subject, and one of much more transcendent interest to the churches, north and south, and which during the present session had threatened to rend the vast and heretofore compact body of Christians in pieces. The agitation growing out of it had reached the highest authorities of the church, and had brought in conflict its chief functionaries and ablest members, and in respect to which opinions were entertained and expressed, deep and irreconcilable. In the judgment of a large portion of the body, separation was the only alternative to peace, the future Christian fellowship and usefulness of the church. The division of the property was but a consequence of separation, subordinate, and of comparative insignificance. Instead of the division of the church depending upon the division of the common property, the very reverse is the result of the true construction of the plan of separation.

2. As to the power of the general conference to authorize a separation of the church organization. The Methodist Episcopal Church of the United States was established in its government, doctrine, and discipline, by a general conference of the traveling preachers in the communion in 1784. Down to that time the Methodist Societies in America had been governed by John Wesley, the founder of this denomination of Christians, through the agency of his assistants. During this year the entire government was taken into the hands of the traveling preachers with his approbation and assent. They organized it, established its doctrines and discipline, appointed the several authorities, superintendents or bishops, ministers and preachers to administer its polity, and promulgate its doctrines and teaching throughout the land. From that time to this, the source and fountain of all its temporal power are the traveling preachers in this connection in general conference assembled. The lay members of the church have no part or connection with its governmental organization, and never had. The traveling preachers comprise the embodiment of its power, ecclesiastical and temporal, and, when assembled in general conference, according to the usages and discipline of the church, represent themselves, and have no constituents; and thus the organization continued until the year 1808, when a modification took place. At the general conference of that year, composed of all the traveling preachers, it was resolved to have thereafter a delegated conference, to be composed of one of every five members of each annual conference. These annual conferences are composed exclusively of traveling preachers. The ratio of representation has been altered from time to time, so that in 1844 the annual conferences were represented by one delegate for every twenty-one members.

The reason for the change to a delegated body, instead of the assemblage of the entire body of traveling preachers, was the great enlargement of the boundaries of the church, which had expanded with the settlement of the country, the consequent multiplication of the traveling preachers, the distance and expense of travel, and the deprivation of the field of their labors for too long a period of the Christian ordinances, and religious instruction. The general conference of 1808, which determined in favor of a delegated body for the future, imposed upon the powers of this body certain limitations, which, in the language of the proceedings of the church, are called restrictive articles, six in number. It is declared that the general conference shall have full powers to make rules and regulations for the church, under the following limitations and restrictions:—1. They shall not alter or change the articles of religion, nor establish any new standards of doctrine. 2. They shall not allow of more than one representative for every fourteen members of the annual conference, nor less than one for every thirty. 3. They shall not alter the government so as to do away with Episcopacies, or destroy the plan of itinerent superintendencies. 4. They shall not change the general rules of the united societies. 5. They shall not deprive the ministers or preachers of trial by committee, and of appeal, nor the members, of trial before the society or lay committee and appeal. 6. They shall not appropriate the produce of the book concern, nor the charter fund, to any purpose other than for the benefit of the traveling, supernumerary, superannuated, and worn-out preachers, their wives, widows, and children; provided, that upon the concurrent recommendation of three fourths of all the members of the annual conferences present and voting, a majority of two thirds of the general conferences succeeding, shall suffice to alter any of the above restrictions, except the first article. These comprise all the limitations upon that body assembled by delegates. That the general conference composed of all the traveling preachers, and who established the government, doctrines, and discipline of the church, possessed the power to reconstruct and reorganize the government, ecclesiastical and temporal, into two or more separate and distinct organizations, is a question about which we think no serious doubt can well be entertained. These traveling preachers represented the sovereign power of the government, and were responsible to no earthly tribunal for the mode and manner of its exercise. They were entirely free to exercise their own sense and judgment as to what was the best polity and organization of the church, to accomplish this great object and design of the master in whose service they were engaged, and which were, in the language of their own discipline, "to reform the continent, and to spread scriptural holiness over these lands." As they might have constructed any number of separate and distinct organizations in their first fraternal association and effort in the fulfillment of their mission, according, as it might seem to them best, so was it equally in their power at any subsequent period of their labors. The power remained unchanged.

The only argument urged against this view is the unity of the first organization of the church in 1784, which, as supposed, evinced a design that it should be co-extensive with the territorial limits of the United States, neither more nor less; and to remain and continue a united church within these limits in the exercise of its jurisdiction, spiritual and temporal; and further, that, if a power exists in any general conference to break up this organization and polity of the church, as originally designed and established, it belongs to an extraordinary general conference assembled especially for the purpose, and not to one assembled in the ordinary way, for the discharge of its mere administrative duties, as the chief legislative body of the church; and the history, ecclesiastical judicatories, practice, and usages of the church from its origin were ably and extensively received and examined, on the argument, for the purpose of sustaining these several positions. But the obvious answer to them is that the argument overlooks the source and fountain of the power belonging to the general conference. We must look to these, and not to the mere exercise of power in the administration of the sacrament, when seeking to measure its depth and extent. Where is the limit? And who has prescribed it? The traveling preachers assembled in general conference embody, in themselves, the sovereign power; and we have nowhere seen their consent to any limitation or restriction till all come down, in the history of their administration, to the conference of 1808. We must have some evidence that they have parted with a portion of their sovereign power that confessedly belonged to them at the first organization since that period; and that they assembled in the subsequent conferences, subject to the disability, before their power can be distinguished from those originally possessed. We have not been referred to any such evidence, nor have our own researches discovered any, nor do we believe there are any recorded acts or declarations of this body to the effect claimed. As jurisdiction and authority, spiritual and temporal, in each general conference, from 1784 to 1808 inclusive, were the same, unlimited and unrestrained, possessing all the power, which since the latter period has belonged to the general and annual conferences combined under the new organization, it necessarily follows that all the power and authority possessed by the annual conferences have been conferred upon them from time to time by the general conference.

The arguments that this body, previous to 1808, did not possess the competency to reorganize and reconstruct the government and the church, as they might think best for the great objects of its mission, goes the length of denying that power to the concurrent action of both the general and annual conferences since that period. And that there is something in this association and system of policy, differing so radically from all others of which we have any knowledge, that even the constituent and representative, although comprising every element of power appertaining to the government, can neither change or modify it. As the argument comes down to this, we cannot think it necessary to pursue this branch of the case any longer. As it respects the powers of the general conference since the modifications of 1808, it is the same as previously existed, subject to the six restrictive articles; and neither of them has any connection with or bearing upon the question we have been considering. They relate to the doctrine of one church, its representative in the general conference, the Episcopacy, discussion of preachers and members, the book concern and charter fund. These concern the exercise of the administrative powers of the conference, and are intended as limitations upon them, no less concurred in by the annual conferences. The powers conferred upon the general conference are broad and unlimited, subject only to those checks in regulating the doctrine, and perhaps discipline, of the church. In all other respects, and in everything else that concerns it, this body shall represent the sovereign power the same as before. The practice of the general conference since the change in 1828 confirms this view. The connection of the annual Upper Canada conference with the Methodist Episcopal Church was dissolved in 1828, and that body authorized to erect itself into an independent ecclesiastical establishment. The force of this precedent has been attempted to be weakened upon the allegation, that this connection differed from that of the annual conferences within the United States; and that it rested upon a sort of compact between that conference and this church, and therefore held a different relation to it. But on looking into the history and discipline of the church, this will be found to be a misapprehension of that resolution; and that the Canada conference was brought within its folds in the same way as those lying upon the frontier settlements within the United States. It will be found that as early as 1804, the Upper Canada districts were included in the New York annual conference, and continued as a part of it, the same as other districts, till 1812, when these districts, and also the Lower Canada districts, were included within the Genesee conference. In 1816, the Lower Canada districts were embraced within the New York and New England conferences. In 1820, both Upper and Lower Canada were again included in the Genesee conference; and in the same year, the bishops were authorized, with the concurrence of this conference, to establish an annual conference in Canada; and in 1824, the Canada conference included the whole of the Upper Province, and thus it stood in 1828, when erected into an independent establishment.

We have seen nothing in the history, discipline, or practice of the church restricting its organization or Christian labors to the territorial limits of the United States; but much to show that both have been steadily devoted to the accomplishment of the high and holy mission avowed in founding the church, namely, "to reform the continent, and to spread scriptural holiness over these lands." As early as 1840, the republic of Texas was incorporated into its bosom, and an annual conference established. And we doubt not but that, as the principles of civil liberty and religious toleration work their way in the advancement of cizilization over regions hitherto impenetrable to the missionary, unless of a particular faith, this great work of organization and Christian labor will be carried on regardless of territorial boundaries or forms of secular government. In referring to the practice of the church, we must not overlook the action of the general conference of 1844, in the instance now before us. The vote upon the first resolution stood one hundred and forty-seven to twenty-two, in a body representing more than four thousand traveling preachers in this communion; and among whom, it is fair to suppose, were included men of the greatest experience and knowledge in the administration of the polity of the church. Indeed, on looking into the report of the debates of this session, and into the discussions upon the report of the committee on the division of the church, and especially upon the all-absorbing subjects that led to its necessity, no one can fail to be impressed with the eminent ability and intelligence of the leading members of that body; nor for a moment doubt but that they were profoundly skilled in all the history, practice, and usages of the church government, spiritual and temporal, and in the nature and extent of their own powers, as the highest judicatory belonging to it. As it respects the action of this body in the matter of division, no one can pretend but that it proceeded upon the assumption of unquestioned power to erect the church into two separate ecclesiastical establishments. The only doubt entertained or expressed in the plan of separation, related to the division of the common property, on account of the sixth restrictive article, which we have conceded all along was not within its competence, but which we shall presently notice more particularly in another part of the case. Independently of this question of property, the power of severance is written upon every page of their proceedings. Having now arrived at the conclusion that the general conference of 1844 was competent to make the division, and that the only condition annexed to it has been fully complied with, we are prepared to apply the principles of law, which, in this posture of the case, must govern it.

We have held, in a previous part of this opinion, that the complainants must bring themselves within the description of persons entitled to the benefit of this charitable fund as prescribed by its original founder; and that, when they have done this, those who deny or withhold the charity must present a case to the court, taking them out of the description. This has been attempted by showing that they have wrongfully separated from the connection and communion of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and erected themselves into an independent ecclesiastical establishment, and have therefore deprived themselves of the character of beneficiaries of the fund. Having arrived at the conclusion that there is no foundation for this allegation, the ground of defense, of course, fails; and the complainants still continue clothed with the character and rights belonging to them previous to the separation. The separation having taken place in pursuance of the action of the competent ecclesiastical authority, by the action of the founders of the fund themselves, how can it be maintained that the beneficiaries, falling within the new organization, have forfeited the character which entitles them to its enjoyment? What act have they done to deprive them of the description of the persons for whose relief its proceeds have been permanently devoted? It is not pretended but that they are still traveling preachers in the Methodist Episcopal connection and communion, subject to its doctrines and discipline, and devoted to the accomplishment of that mission for which this church was planted in these United States; nor but that the field of their labors is within the domain covered by its original organization. A new construction of its polity, within this limit, has been determined upon by its highest judicatory, in order that the great mission may be more harmoniously and more effectually carried on. For this purpose two distinct ecclesiastical organizations, we may say identically the same, have taken the place of one, the same discipline, faith, and doctrine, and all united in spreading the same gospel and teachings throughout the land. Assume, therefore, that the general conference was disabled on account of the sixth restrictive article, from apportioning this fund; still, if the complainants bring themselves within the description of the beneficiaries, they are not thereby deprived of it. The law steps in and enforces the right. Holding this relation to it, and not having forfeited it by any wrong act of their own, or by any cause set up against them, it is not in the competence of the general conference and annual conferences combined to deprive them. Their right rests upon established principles of law and equity, which make it the duty of a court of chancery to interfere, and see that the fund is properly administered.

Looking at the position of these complainants and those they represent, on account of the action of the general conference of 1844, dividing the ecclesiastical organization and substituting in its place two distinct, independent judicatories, it is by no means certain that the distribution is in contravention even of the sixth restrictive article, that appropriates the fund for the benefit of the traveling supernumeraries and worn-out preachers, their widows and orphans. It is this description of persons to whom it is destined by the adjudication of the court. They are not only within the description, but are also the very persons heretofore in the enjoyment of it, and for whom it was originally intended. Granting that these persons have done no wrongful act, but are still laboring in the church as heretofore, except under a different merely territorial organization, they are covered by the spirit if not by the letter of the restrictive article.

Upon the whole, our conclusion is that the complainants are entitled to their share of the produce of the book concern, and a decree will be ordered accordingly. Whether the funds shall be administered by an application of produce pro rata, or by an apportionment of the capital, are questions reserved until the settlement of the decree. We had hoped that this unfortunate controversy would have been amicably adjusted by the parties, agreeably to the suggestion of each of the learned counsel, at the close of the argument, and in which the court cordially concurred. But if the views we have taken of the case, and conclusions we have arrived at, shall tend in the least degree to heal the unhappy divisions, and restore brotherly affection and Christian friendship among so highly useful and distinguished a body of Christians, we shall not regret the labor we have bestowed in deciding it.

Case No. 1,090.

In re BASHFORD.

[2 N. B. R. 73, (Quarto. 26.)]

District Court, S. D. New York. Aug. 6, 1868.

BANKRUPTCY — DEBT CREATED BY FRAUD — DISCHARGE OF BANKRUPT.

An objection to discharge of bankrupt, grounded on the fact that the debt was created by fraud, is not a valid one. Such debts are not discharged by the discharge of bankrupt.

[In bankruptcy. Application for discharge of Henry W. Bashford, bankrupt. Opposed on the ground that the debt of the opposing creditor was created by fraud. Granted.]

This case having been submitted on the specifications filed in opposition to the discharge of the bankrupt, the following decision is ordered on file:

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. The only specification filed as the ground of objection to the discharge of the bankrupt is, that the debt of the creditor was created by the fraud and embezzlement of the bankrupt, and while acting in a fiduciary character. The objection is not a valid one. It is not one of the grounds of objection specified in section twenty-nine of the act [of March 2, 1867, (14 Stat. 531,)] as a ground for withholding the discharge. If the debt in question is one of the character set forth in the specification, it will not be discharged by the discharge. Sections thirty-two and thirty-three especially except such a debt from the operation of the discharge. But the existence of such a debt is no ground for withholding a discharge, which will operate on such debts as are not excepted by sections thirty-two and thirty-three. A discharge will be granted in this case when the register shall have furnished a certificate in conformity.

BASHORE, (SHRYOCK v.) See Case No. 12,820.

BASKET, (CHANEY v.) See Case No. 2,595.

BASKET, (HASSELL v.) See Case No. 6,198.

BASKETS OF.

[Note. Cases cited under this title will be found arranged in alphabetical order under the quantity or number of baskets.]

Case No. 1,091.

In re BASS.

[3 Woods, 382;[1] 15 N. B. R. 453; 9 Chi. Leg. News, 303.]

Circuit Court, S. D. Georgia. April Term, 1877.

BANKRUPTCY — HOMESTEAD EXEMPTION — WAIVER BY BANKRUPT.

1. The homestead secured to the head of a family by the state law is excepted by section 14 of the bankrupt act (Revised Statutes, section 5045) from the operation of the conveyances made to the assignee, and is not subject to the jurisdiction of the bankrupt court, but must be pursued by those having claims against it in the proper state tribunals.

2. The fact that the bankrupt has in a particular case waived his right to the exemption, or that the homestead was not ascertained and set out in severalty before the proceedings in bankruptcy were begun, does not change the rule.

[Approved in Byrd v. Harrold, Case No. 2,269.]

In bankruptcy. This was a petition filed by [John F. Picket] the assignee in bankruptcy to review the decision [unreported] of the bankrupt court denying an order asked for by the assignee, directing him to "sell sufficient of the property of the bankrupt, [Miles Bass,] in which the homestead exemption had been waived, to satisfy the claim in favor of which the waiver had been made." [Affirmed.]

Mr. Allen Fort, for the assignee:

1. A waiver of the homestead exemption is valid and binding in Georgia, and the debt in favor of which the waiver is made may be enforced against the exempted property: Bush v. Lester, 55 Ga. 579; Simmons v. Anderson, 56 Ga. 53; In re Solomon, [Case No. 13,166.] 2. The assignee is only bound to set apart such a homestead as was exempt by law in 1871. At that date a waiver of the homestead was binding on the debtor. 3. The district court has jurisdiction complete in all matters relating to the bankrupt estate, as well for the purpose of enforcing liens and equitable mortgages on the bankrupt's exemption property as for the distribution of whatever surplus there may be, as assets.

Mr. Simmons, for bankrupt:

1. A waiver in law, to be valid, must be made with the same solemnities as are necessary to create an estate in land. There was no such waiver in this case. 2. The court has no jurisdiction of the matter. In re Hunt, [Case No. 6,883;] In re Lambert, [Id. 8,026;] In re Poleman, [Id. 11,247.]

BRADLEY, Circuit Justice. The only property possessed by the bankrupt in this case, beyond the articles exempted by the bankrupt act (amounting to five hundred dollars in value) was claimed by him as homestead property, under the constitution and laws of Georgia, and therefore exempt from the claims of ordinary creditors by the state law, and it is conceded that if this homestead claim is admissible, the property is covered by it. But only one creditor has proved under the bankruptcy, being a partnership firm, one of whom was appointed assignee. This debt is represented by several promissory notes of the bankrupt, each of which contains an agreement to waive and renounce the maker's right to homestead and exemption in his property as against that contract. The assignee applied for an order to sell the property in question, notwithstanding the claim of the homestead right, and free and discharged therefrom. The district judge refused so to order on the ground taken by the district court, of this and other districts, that the homestead secured to a person by the state law is excepted by the fourteenth section of the bankrupt act (Rev. St. § 5045), from the operation of the conveyance made to the assignee, and is not subject to the jurisdiction of the bankrupt court, but must be pursued by those who have claims against it, in the proper state tribunals.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William B. Woods, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

I think the position taken by the district judge is correct. Not only is all property exempted by state laws, as those laws stood in 1871, expressly excepted from the operation of the conveyance to the assignee, but it is added in the section referred to, as if ex industria, that "these exceptions shall operate as a limitation upon the conveyance of the property of the bankrupt to his assignee, and in no case shall the property hereby excepted pass to the assignee or the title of the bankrupt thereto be impaired or affected by any of the provisions of this title." In other words, it is made as clear as anything can be, that such exempted property constitutes no part of the assets in bankruptcy. The agreement of the bankrupt in any particular case to waive the right to the exemption makes no difference. He may owe other debts in regard to which no such agreement has been made. But whether so or not, it is not for the bankrupt court to inquire. The exemption is created by the state law, and the assignee acquires no title to the exempt property. If the creditor has a claim against it he must prosecute that claim in a court which has jurisdiction over the property, which the bankrupt court has not. Nor does it make any difference that the homestead was not ascertained or set out in severalty until after the proceedings in bankruptcy were commenced, or until after the conveyance to the assignee was executed. Whenever properly claimed and designated, the exemption protects it, and the exception created by the bankrupt act relates back to the conveyance and limits its operation. Though not designated when the conveyance was executed, it was capable of being designated, and on the principle that id certum est quod certum reddi potest, it is as much entitled to the benefit of the exception as if it had been designated and set apart before the bankruptcy occurred. And here it is proper to remark that the assignee in this case misconceived his duty and powers when he assumed to judge that the bankrupt was not entitled to a homestead. That is for the court to say, and not for him. It was his business to report to the court whether the property claimed as homestead was or was not within the limit of value which the laws of Georgia allow for that purpose. Unless the court has this information, it cannot determine whether the property claimed is fairly within the allowance for homestead or not, and whether it has jurisdiction over the property or not. What equities might arise if there were several creditors, and some of them had a lien or claim against the homestead property, and the others not, it is not necessary to decide. Those who had no such claim might, perhaps, properly object to those having such a claim being allowed to come in for a dividend against the general assets, until they had first exhausted their remedy against the exempted property, on the principle of marshaling assets. This would depend on the question whether the equity of the general creditors is superior to that of the bankrupt and his family in reference to the right of homestead and exemption. In some cases at least the equities might perhaps be equal, in which case the court would not require the assets to be marshaled. But even where the right to marshaling existed the bankruptcy court could not assume jurisdiction of the exempted property and order it to be sold, but would require the favored creditor to pursue his remedy against such property in a forum that could lawfully reach it. The decree of the district judge is affirmed with costs.

Case No. 1,092.

BASS v. DINWIDDIE.

[Brunner, Col. Cas. 190;[1] Cooke, 130.]

Circuit Court, W. D. Tennessee. 1812.

EJECTMENT — OCCUPANCY — QUESTION OF FACT — STATUTE CONSTRUED — OCCUPANT LAW — VALIDITY OF — TITLE — OLDEST GRANT AS EVIDENCE OF.

1. Occupancy is a question of fact for the jury. No person can claim the privileges of an occupant under the statute unless he has actually settled on land claimed.

2. The occupant law [1806] of this state, so far as it violates the compact with other states by giving preference to its citizens over those of the other states, is void.

3. The oldest grant is conclusive evidence of title at law, except in the single case of an elder legal entry.

At law. The plaintiff [lessee of Bass] is a citizen of North Carolina, and claimed the land in controversy by a grant, older in date than that under which the defendant claims. To obviate that the defendant produced in evidence an entry made on the 3d day of August, 1807, of an occupant claim, under the law of 1806, which was prior to the date of the plaintiff's grant. The plaintiff then produced an entry upon a military warrant made the 5th day of August, 1807. The offices for receiving and making entries were opened on the 3d day of August, 1807; but it appeared that no entry had been made until the 5th day of August, except as to occupant claims. The holders of warrants were obliged to have them listed, and then drew for priority of entry which was not done as to occupant claims.

[1] [Reported by Albert Brunner, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

The compact between North Carolina and Tennessee contains the following provision:—"That in the entering and obtaining titles to lands, no preference shall be given to the citizens of the state of Tennessee over citizens of any other state, claiming under North Carolina; nor shall any occupancy or possession give preference in entering or obtaining titles so as to injure or take away the right of any person now claiming by entry, grant, or otherwise, under North Carolina." This compact was ratified in the year 1804.

The section of the occupant law of 1806, under which the defendant made his entry, is as follows:—"That any person or persons who may have seated him, her, or themselves on any vacant and unappropriated land within the jurisdiction of this state, and who were in actual possession of the same at and before the 1st day of May in the present year, such person or persons shall be entitled to a preference of entering the same for three months after the first Monday in June next, upon any good and valid warrant."

Testimony was introduced to show an actual settlement at and before the 1st day of May, 1806; but this point was controverted by other evidence. [Judgment for plaintiff.]

Mr. Dickinson, for plaintiff.

Mr. Haywood, for defendant.

BY THE COURT.—The question of occupancy is a question of fact to be determined by the jury. One thing, however, is certain, that unless the occupant was seated on, and in actual possession of, the premises at and before the first day of May, 1806, he was not as such entitled to make his entry. The privilege given was intended in favor of the actual settler, and before any person can claim the extension of it to him he must show that he comes within the law. But it has been argued by the counsel for the defendant that his entry is good, independent of the occupant law. To this it may be replied that he can no otherwise claim. At the opening of the office the holder of a warrant, desirous of making an entry, was to have it listed, and then draw for priority of entry. This was not necessary upon the warrants which were to be entered as occupant claims, nor was it done in the case of the defendant's warrant. This was a preference allowed to the occupant claimants over the common holder of a warrant. It also appears that the first entry made upon the listed warrants was on the 5th of August, two days after the defendant's entry. And besides, the entry upon the face of it expresses it to be an occupant claim. From hence it follows that the claim of the defendant must be viewed as an occupant claim.

It has been contended that the claim of the defendant is void, being derived from an act of assembly expressly violating the compact. The court are also of this opinion. The compact expressly declares that the state of Tennessee shall give no preference to her own citizens over the citizens of any other state deriving title under North Carolina. The object of this was to place all claimants upon the same footing, and not to permit a fair and bona fide holder of a warrant to be postponed in favor of a citizen of Tennessee. The state of Tennessee has no power to perfect grants for land unless what is derived from the compact. If this be the case, how stand these claims? Both plaintiff and defendant hold warrants which they wish to enter. One of them is a citizen of North Carolina, and the other a citizen of Tennessee. The legislature of Tennessee pass a law declaring that an occupant who actually settles upon the land shall have a preference in entering the same at any time within three months from the first Monday in June, 1807. By virtue of this law the occupant enters the land at a time when the other holder of the warrant cannot make an entry because of the preference given to the occupant who is necessarily a citizen of Tennessee. Is this not giving a preference to the citizens of Tennessee over the citizens of any other state? There can be no doubt of it; and therefore the law in such respect is void. It may be also remarked that this cannot be called an act of the legislature in its sovereign capacity. The power to make any law on the subject is derived from a marked and designated authority. This authority cannot be exceeded, or the act will be void.

An attempt is made to liken this case to that of Ghilcrist v. Nixon, [unreported.] Without attempting to show all the distinctions that exist, we will remark that in that case both the entry and grant of Ghilcrist was of an elder date than that of Nixon. The real ground the court went upon in determinating in favor of Ghilcrist was that we would not permit the consideration of the grant to be inquired into in a court of law. We were of opinion that the oldest grant was conclusive evidence of the title at law, except in the single case of an elder legal entry. That was not the case there, because Ghilcrist's grant was older than Nixon's entry. We were of opinion, under these circumstances, that the consideration of that grant could not be inquired into. That case, therefore, is not similar to the present.

NOTE, [from original report.] Relation between Elder Legal Entry and Later Grant.—See Donegan v. Taylor, 6 Humph. 503, citing case in text.

Case No. 1,093.

BASS v. FIVE NEGROES.

[Bee, 201.] [1]

District Court, D. South Carolina. 1803.

SALVAGE—MARITIME SERVICE—COSTS.

[1. Rescuing runaway slaves, destitute of food or water, adrift at sea, 60 leagues from land,

[1] [Reported by Hon. Thomas Bee, District Judge.]

in a stolen canoe, providing them with food, and bringing them safely to land, is an important maritime service, which, though not attended with great risk, will entitle the rescuer to one-tenth the value of the property saved.]

[2. In such a case the costs of the proceedings are not properly chargeable to the owner of the canoe, but should be paid by the owner of the slaves.]

[In admiralty. Libel by Captain Bass against five negro slaves and a canoe. McCall claims the canoe. Decree for libelant, with costs against the owner of the negroes.]

[BEE, District Judge.] It appears that these five negroes had been driven out to sea in a canoe, and that they were picked up by Captain Bass in lat. 33, near the outward edge of the Gulf Stream, and about sixty leagues from land. They were destitute of provisions and water, and, according to the account given by the negroes, had been so for four days. Captain Bass went two or three miles out of his course to take them on board; and supplied them with provisions until he arrived with them in this port, fourteen days after he found them. There was no great risque in rendering this service; but it was very important in its effects, for, without it, these people would, probably, have perished. Their chance of meeting with vessels was small, and they could not have subsisted much longer without provisions and water. They were making, as they say, a West-India course, and could never have reached land without this, or some similar, assistance. The canoe and negroes may be valued at three thousand dollars. Every case of salvage must depend upon its own circumstances; but it is now agreed that courts ought always so to act as to afford encouragement to salvors in general. I have frequently, especially in cases of derelict, awarded one half of the property saved. At present, I shall be satisfied with decreeing one tenth. Let Captain Bass be paid that sum; and let the owner of of the negroes pay the costs, as it appears that they stole the canoe, which is the property of another claimant, Mr. M'Call.

BASS, (UNITED STATES v.) See Case No. 14,537.

Case No. 1,094.

BASSELL v. AMERICAN FIRE INS. CO.

[2 Hughes, 531.] [1]

Circuit Court, E. D. Virginia. Sept. Term, 1877.

INSURANCE — CONDITIONS IN POLICY — AGENT OF INSURED — CHARACTER OF INSURED PROPERTY — QUESTIONS OF LAW AND FACT.

1. The conditions annexed to a policy of insurance, in order to bind the insured, must be brought to his attention at or before the time of the contract of insurance.

2. If a solicitor of insurance by his acts makes himself the agent of the insurer, and the insurer contracts through him and by him, a clause in the policy declaring that persons so acting are agents of the insured and not of the insurer, is invalid to change the character of agent of the insurer held by the solicitor described.

[See Mohr & Mohr Distilling Co. v. Ohio Ins. Co., 13 Fed. 74.]

3. Whether certain classes of goods embraced in a stock of merchandise insured as "dry goods," were or were not "dry goods," is a question of fact for the jury, and not necessarily one of mere law for the court.

At law. Action on the case, on a policy of insurance. The plaintiff, John Y. Bassell, was a merchant in the town of Leesburg, Loudoun county, Virginia, and in the fall of 1876 set up a branch store in Middleburg, in the same county, and transferred a portion of his stock from his house in Leesburg to his branch store in Middleburg. Desiring to insure the stock of this branch store, and being sick and confined to his bed, he sent for one Peter F. Shroff, living in Leesburg and operating in insurance business, who, according to the pretensions of the plaintiff, was acting as the agent of the defendant and other companies. Shroff said he was well acquainted with the premises, and asked what stock the plaintiff proposed to keep and insure, to which plaintiff replied, "Dry goods, etc.; just such as I have in my store here." Shroff asked if he intended to keep kerosene oil, or anything of that character; to which plaintiff replied, "Only what I need for lighting my store." To which Shroff rejoined, "Of course, that is presumed; I only meant to inquire if you intended to keep it in stock for sale;" or words to that effect. Shroff then sent on the application, and in a few days the policy was received by him, and he notified Bassell that he had the policy, and would furnish it to him upon the payment of the premium. The plaintiff sent him, by plaintiff's clerk, the amount of premium required by Shroff, and received in return the policy sued upon. Shroff forwarded the premium to the defendant through Wise & Co., at Alexandria, Virginia; and its receipt was admitted. Wise & Co. were the agents of the defendant, for whom Shroff was a sort of canvasser.

The policy contained the following clauses; but it did not appear that they were brought to the knowledge or attention of the plaintiff, —to wit: At the beginning of the policy there were words making the conditions annexed to it a part of the policy, and also these words: "This policy of insurance witnesseth, that the American Fire Insurance Company have received of John Y. Bassell twelve dollars —— cents, premium for insuring (according to the tenor of their printed conditions hereunto annexed, which are hereby made a part of this contract of insurance)," etc. And also on the face of the policy, in red ink: "That any party, other than the assured, procuring the insurance, either at the office of the company or its agents, shall be considered the agent of the assured, and not of this company. Benzin, naphtha, petroleum oil, and other inflammable liquids, the storage or use of which is subject to legal restrictions, prohibited, unless permission is indorsed in writing on this policy." And on the back of the policy, under the head of "Conditions of Insurance," etc., in very small type, was the following: "XIV. This company is not liable for damages by lightning, or explosions of any kind, except by fire consequent thereon; nor where the fire heat is used in any process, to the articles damaged by such process; nor to goods in show windows, where the fire originates from lights in said windows; nor where camphine, pine oil, burning fluid, or any similar inflammable liquid is used for light or kept for sale, by the assured, without permission noted on the policy."

[1] [Reported by Hon. Robert W. Hughes, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

On the 15th day of September, 1876, a fire occurred in the aforesaid store in Middleburg, and the entire stock of goods was either destroyed or damaged by the fire; and the loss (testified to by the clerks, and by merchants of the town who had seen the stock) amounted to from $4000 to $4500. The inventories were destroyed by the fire; but the plaintiff forthwith made out his preliminary proof of loss as best he could, and it was forwarded to the defendant. Thereupon Thomas M. Alfriend, the general agent for defendant in Virginia, went to the scene of the fire, examined the premises and the damaged goods, and with the plaintiff agreed upon an estimated value for said damaged goods, leaving the loss far in excess of the amount of the policy. According to plaintiff's evidence, Alfriend expressed himself entirely satisfied with the preliminary proofs and the adjustment of the loss; and went away after giving the plaintiff to understand that the policy would be paid in sixty days, or sooner for a reasonable discount. Alfriend denied this statement in his evidence. The day this suit was brought the plaintiff received notice, from the Philadelphia office, of objections to his preliminary proofs, and requiring a bill of particulars, etc. It was proved also at the trial that the plaintiff's bills, invoices, etc., were destroyed by the fire, and it was therefore impossible for him to have furnished a bill of particulars (even if the defendant's agent, Alfriend, had not already waived it).

In the progress of the trial the plaintiff introduced the aforesaid Peter F. Shroff, whom he claimed to have dealt with as agent of the defendant; but who testified that he was not the agent of the defendant. There was no evidence to prove, or tending to prove, the cause or origin of the fire. It was not proved that the fire was caused by kerosene oil used in a lamp, or what sort of oil was in a lamp which was proved to be in the store.

The jury found a verdict at the July term of the court for the plaintiff. [Unreported.] A motion was forthwith entered for a new trial; and this motion was heard at the adjourned term in September. On the hearing of the motion the defendant's counsel read the affidavit of H. C. Ryon, containing material averments, as newly discovered testimony; and the plaintiff in reply read the affidavit of said Ryon, exactly the counterpart, in every particular, of his affidavit given to defendant, and also the affidavit of Ryon and others, to prove that the defendant's agent who was conducting the suit had had interviews with Ryon previous to the trial; besides affidavits of others as to Ryon's credibility, etc.

In support of its motion for a new trial, the defendant company relied upon the following grounds, to wit:

1. The verdict was contrary to the evidence.

2. The plaintiff has discovered evidence since the trial of the most material character (Ryon's), which by the exercise of extraordinary diligence the defendant could not have obtained and used at the trial. The defendant had no knowledge of the witness (Ryon) or of what he could testify to, and has only learned these facts since the trial. This evidence will be positive and direct, to the most material facts in the case, viz., the character and value of the stock of goods in the plaintiff's store at Middleburg at the time of the fire, the disposition of the fire in the store, the origin of the fire, the extent of the fire, the conduct of the witnesses, Crissy and Noland, the clerks of the plaintiff. The evidence will also establish the fact, that said clerks had lost the key of the store some days before the fire, and that the store (as they said) had been entered and robbed the night before the fire. That there never were any goods kept under the counter; that there were no shelves nor any other convenience for keeping goods under the counter; that there were no goods under the counter at the time of the fire. The affidavit of the witness is in the defendant's possession, and will be filed at the time of the hearing of the motion for a new trial.

3. For misdirection on the part of the court in this, to wit:

1st. That Shroff was the agent of the defendant. 2d. That the conditions attached to the policy and made a part of the contract by the very first paragraph in the body of the policy, did not bind the plaintiff unless his attention was directed to said conditions, before or at the time the policy was issued. 3d. That the jury was to determine whether or not boots and shoes, hats and caps, were dry goods.

4. For refusing to instruct the jury as follows, to wit: 1st. That every one may be presumed to remember some particulars though his books may be lost, and that a statement in gross, such as that furnished by the plaintiff, merely reiterating the description in the policy, was not such as the law required the plaintiff to make. 2d. That proof of loss was insufficient, and thereby leaving that question for the jury to pass upon.

[Motion denied.]

HUGHES, District Judge. I do not think that Ryon's affidavit makes a sufficient case for a new trial on the facts. Even if it did, his own subsequent affidavit is in direct contradiction to it. The objection on the score of misdirection of the court deserves more serious consideration.

1st. As to Shroff's relation to the parties. That Shroff was not the agent of the insurers or of the insurers' resident agents at Alexandria in general, is readily conceded. But in this case he contracted with Bassell for the insurance; he received the premium in person; which having been transmitted to the insurers in Philadelphia, directly or indirectly by him, a policy was returned through him, and the policy was by him delivered to the insured. Such is my recollection and understanding of the testimony. Now whether the insurers, or their resident agents, Wise & Co., or Shroff, or even Bassell himself, regarded Shroff as the agent of the insurer, he was nevertheless so in the eye of the law. A person may be the agent of another in law without intending it. He may be so, without that other person intending it. He may be so without either of the parties for whom he was the intermediary, intending it. See Ex parte White, (In re Nevill,) 6 Ch. App. 403. It is acts which constitute agency, and not intentions, or even disavowals, or denials, or even contracts of denial as that embodied in this policy. Shroff was by his acts the agent of the insurers in this matter, the agent pro hac vice; and he was so, notwithstanding the clause in the policy which he himself transmitted to the insured contracting that he was not. The agency had been established by his acts, and its functions performed before the unipartite policy was delivered.

2d. The second instruction was to the effect that the conditions of a policy indorsed in small type upon the back of it are not parts of it, to bind the insured, unless they are distinctly drawn to the attention of the insured at the time of the contract. Policies of insurance differ from ordinary contracts in this, that while ordinary contracts are signed by both parties, policies are unipartite in form, signed only by the insurer. In general they are transmitted to the insured after the agent and the insured have contracted; after the insured has paid a premium, and under circumstances which put it out of his power to object to such provisions inserted in it as were not in his mind or in the oral understanding which was had when he paid the premium; and policies are most of them loaded down with such provisions. My instruction seemed to be accepted by the defendant's counsel at the trial, who contended before the jury that the words in the very first paragraph of the body of the policy, making the annexed conditions a part of the policy, effected a compliance with the instruction. I thought so myself; but it was a question of fact left to the jury, and the jury differed both from defendant's counsel and myself. Union Mut. Ins. Co. v. Wilkinson, 13 Wall. [80 U. S.] 222. That the nonsigning party to a contract, unipartite in form, ought to have notice of conditions not in the body of the contract is too obvious a principle of law to be disputed. The jury thought that the words of reference in the body of the contract did not convey this notice, and I do not see my way to setting aside the verdict on that account.

3d. As to whether boots and shoes, hats and caps, were embraced in the term "dry goods," and whether that question ought to have been referred to the jury, I think the ruling of the court was right. If a term used in a contract is ambiguous, the court may resort to any rational and proper means of interpreting its meaning. It usually consults the lexicographers. If they are at fault, it resorts to other means of ascertaining the true purport of a word. At last, however, in case of doubt, it is the intention of parties to the contract which is the real point to be ascertained, and when this may be interpreted by usage and custom, especially by the understanding of a term in trade, the question may well be left to a jury largely composed of intelligent merchants, as this jury was, for their determination. In the case under consideration this course was peculiarly proper, and the court adheres to its ruling.

4th. That an insured person ought in general to be required to furnish a detailed statement of the particulars of his loss is not denied. If he shows by evidence that he was prevented from doing so by the consumption by the fire of his invoices, that requirement is satisfied. Dishonest men might endeavor to furnish the particulars from a fertile memory and invention, but it is an argument for the integrity of the insured person, if he declines this expedient, and confesses flatly his inability to furnish the particulars after his means of doing so are destroyed. I think there was in this case a waiver by Alfriend, general agent of the defendant's company, of further proofs of loss than those furnished, and that the notification from the Philadelphia office, sent simultaneously to bringing the suit, came too late to enable the insured to supply the omission. The motion for a new trial is denied.

BASSETT, (FRANCIS v.) See Case No. 5, 037.

Case No. 1,095.

BASSETT v. ORR et al.

[7 Biss. 296.][1]

Circuit Court, E. D. Wisconsin. Oct. Term, 1876.

CREDITORS' BILL—EXECUTION — RETURN OF MARSHAL PRESUMED TRUE—BURDEN OF PROOF—EVIDENCE—AMOUNT OF PROPERTY.

1. If it is apparent that there was no bona fide attempt made by the officer to find property to satisfy the judgment, a creditor's bill will be dismissed.

2. As the basis for a creditor's bill, an execution upon the judgment should be in good faith issued, and should be returned unsatisfied by the officer upon a reasonable and actual but ineffectual effort to find property. If the return of the officer on its face shows a failure in this respect then there is no foundation for equity jurisdiction.

3. The marshal is not bound to hold the execution the sixty days it might run before making a return, as the remedy at law might be exhausted before the expiration of the return day, and in that case the execution could be immediately returned.

4. When the return of the marshal is on its face complete and sufficient, the presumption is that the return is true and that the officer performed his duty; such presumption is not overcome by the fact that he returned the process on the day he received it, as he might have previous knowledge of the judgment debtor's property and situation.

5. The burden of showing the return false is upon the defendant.

6. The return is a sufficient basis for a creditor's bill.

7. The falsity of the return may be shown by establishing that the debtor had property liable to execution and which could have been levied on to pay the debt.

8. It is not necessary that there should be property sufficient to fully satisfy the execution in order to defeat the remedy in equity, and if there be property sufficient to satisfy a considerable portion of the debt a creditor's bill ought not to be sustained until such property is exhausted.

9. In this case, property being mortgaged and defendant's affairs complicated, the bill was sustained.

In equity. The complainants [Henry D. Bassett, surviving partner] recovered a judgment against the defendant Hunter Orr, in this court, April 15th, 1875. Execution was issued upon the judgment and delivered to the marshal April 16th, 1875, and was returned by him on the same day nulla bona. The defendant's residence was at Oconto, in this state. On the 17th of April the complainants commenced this action against the judgment debtor, and other parties, which was in the form of a creditor's bill, to reach property for the satisfaction of the judgment. A receiver was appointed in the action April 29th, and an injunction was issued and served November 6th, 1875. The bill was in the usual form.

Defendants pleaded, averring that the marshal made no attempt to find property from which to make the amount of the execution issued upon the judgment, and that he returned the execution without any effort to discover or levy upon property; that the judgment debtor at the time owned property consisting of lands and a saw mill, in the county of Oconto, of value more than sufficient to satisfy the judgment and execution.

Upon the issue thus made, and the testimony, the defendants insisted that the bill should be dismissed. [Denied.]

Tenneys, Flower & Abercrombie, for complainants, cited First Nat. Bank v. Gage, 8 Chi. Leg. N. 370.

John J. Tracy, for defendant, Orr; with whom was H. M. Finch, who cited Gibson v. Woodworth, 8 Paige, 131; McElwain v. Willis, 9 Wend. 549; Smith v. Thompson, 1 Walker, Ch. 1; In re Remington, 7 Wis. 643; Reed v. Wheaton, 7 Paige, 664; Voorhees v. Howard, *43 N. Y. 371; Crippen v. Hudson, 3 Kern. [13 N. Y.] 161; Cassidy v. Meacham, 3 Paige, 311; Riopelle v. Doellner, 26 Mich. 102.

DYER, District Judge. To permit a judgment creditor to issue an execution upon his judgment, and to procure its immediate return, "No property found," when in fact no effort whatever had been made by the officer to find property, and when in fact the debtor had tangible, visible property from which the amount of the judgment could be realized, and then to suffer the creditor to make such proceedings the basis of a creditor's bill, would be a perversion of the plainest principles of equity practice applicable to the subject. Upon such a state of facts being shown, I should not hesitate to dismiss the bill.

In this case it is claimed:

I. That it is apparent on the face of the marshal's return, considered in connection with the dates of the entry of judgment, of the issuance of execution, of the return itself, and of the filing of this bill, that there was no bona fide attempt made by the officer to find property.

II. That upon the testimony the court should conclude that the marshal was directed by the creditor to return the execution, "Nothing found," without any effort to discover property.

III. That to lay the basis for a creditor's bill the execution should not have been returned until the return day thereof, and that by its terms the officer had sixty days within which to look for property and to return the execution.

IV. That the judgment debtor owned visible property upon which the judgment was a lien and from which the amount of the judgment could have been made at the time the execution was returned.

It is insisted either that the bill should be dismissed, or that all proceedings subsequent to the filing of the bill should be set aside, and the bill be entertained only in aid of the execution.

[1] [Reported by Josiah H. Bissell, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

The testimony taken upon the issue formed by the bill and plea, hardly warrants the conclusion that the execution was returned by the marshal, "No property found," under direction of the judgment creditor's attorneys so to make return. The only testimony upon that subject is that of Mr. Tenney, one of the attorneys, who testifies that he presumes the marshal was instructed to make such a return in case he found he could collect nothing, and that he supposes the marshal made his return as it was made, because he was satisfied he could make nothing by levy.

I do not think the marshal was bound to hold the execution the sixty days it might run, before making a return. In other words, the remedy at law might be exhausted before the expiration of the return day, and in that case the execution could be immediately returned. There are cases to the contrary in New York, but they arose and were decided upon ancient statutes of that state. The cases cited upon the argument, Smith v. Thompson, 1 Walker, Ch. 1, and First Nat. Bank v. Gage, 8 Chi. Leg. N. 370, are in antagonism upon the point. The practice sanctioned by the courts of this state is against the theory that a creditor's bill cannot be filed until after the return day of an execution, although the execution should be actually returned before that time. The test is, and I think should be, has the remedy at law been exhausted before the exhibiting of the bill; and I understand that in this court under the established practice, such a bill may be presented, though the execution be in fact returned before the return day, if the bill is otherwise within the equity rules.

As the basis for a creditor's bill, an execution upon the judgment should be in good faith issued, and should be returned unsatisfied by the officer after a reasonable and actual but ineffectual effort to find property. In other words, the remedy under the execution should first be exhausted. If the return of the officer on its face shows a failure in this respect then there is no foundation for equity jurisdiction. As in the case of In re Remington, 7 Wis. 643, cited on the argument, where the officer made return by order of the attorney and returned only that there was no personal property whereon to levy, which was held insufficient to support proceedings in the nature of a creditor's bill. If there be collusion between the officer and the party and a false return is made, proof of the fact is of course fatal to a bill. Here the return of the marshal is on its face complete and sufficient. The presumption is that the return is true. The presumption is that the officer performed his duty. That presumption is not overcome by the fact that he returned the process on the day he received it. We do not know but that on some other process, or by some other means, he had previously had occasion to investigate, and had acquired knowledge of the judgment debtor's property and situation. In any event we have to presume the return true until the contrary is shown, and the burden of showing the return false is upon the defendant. Unattacked, and supported by this presumption, the return is a sufficient basis for a creditor's bill. Its falsity may however be shown by establishing the fact that the debtor had property liable to execution, and which could have been levied on to pay the debt. Such fact should be clearly and satisfactorily shown. In such event a creditor's bill could not be maintained. I do not regard it essential that there should be property sufficient to fully satisfy the execution in order to defeat the remedy in equity. If there be property sufficient to satisfy a considerable part of the debt, a creditor's bill ought not to be sustained until such property is exhausted.

The remaining question then is, does it clearly and satisfactorily appear from the testimony that the judgment debtor had tangible property and effects, real or personal, from which the debt or a considerable part of it could be realized? The defendant testifies that he owns a quantity of pine lands from which the timber has been cut off, and the amount and value of which he does not state, but which lands are incumbered by mortgage to the extent of between four and five thousand dollars. Then the firm of Hunter Orr & Co. owned a saw mill standing on leased land. The defendant Orr testified that the mill cost $22,000. In November, 1875, there was rent unpaid for the leased land amounting to about $700, and also some taxes. The yearly rent agreed to be paid was $600 or $700. In April, 1875, the mill was let to the sons of the defendant Orr, his firm having previously discontinued business; but those lessees in November, 1875, had paid no rent for the use of the mill. There was a judgment in favor of one Somers against Orr, upon which there was originally due about $5,200, but which had been reduced by levy and sale of property, to about $3,000; and for the payment of which the property of Orr seems to have been liable. Then Blanchard, Borland & Co., of Chicago, held a transfer of defendant's interest in the mill and leasehold, as security for a balance due to them on account of advances. Mr. Blanchard testifies that the value of the mill was much affected by the fact that it stood on leased lands, that there was a large amount of the rental and taxes unpaid, and that the owner of the lands would not permit the removal of the mill. With permission to remove the mill and after paying all delinquent taxes and rents, and securing the payment of the rent for the term of the lease, he thinks the mill might have been sold for between $3,000 and $4,000. Viewing the property just as it stood in April, 1875, and without special reservations touching removal of the mill, and payment of taxes and rent, he does not think the property had any salable value. Considering all the evidence bearing upon the circumstances of the judgment debtor, the character, value and situation of his property and the incumbrances upon the same, it is by no means clear that any part of the complainants' judgment could have been realized by ordinary proceedings upon the execution.

The testimony taken as to property possessed by the defendant, tends to the conclusion that there is slight basis, if any, so far as property is concerned, for a creditor's bill. The plea will be overruled as a plea, and as it presents the only issue in the case which the defendants seek to raise, it may stand as an answer to the bill, with the right to the parties of bringing forward all the merits of the case.

BASSETT, (UNITED STATES v.) See Cases Nos. 14,538 and 14,539.

Case No. 1,096.

BASSILL v. JEFFERSONVILLE.

[The case reported under this title in 3 Wkly. Law Gaz. 279, is the same as Case No. 1,449.]

Case No. 1,097.

BASTABLE v. WILSON.

[1 Cranch, C. C. 124.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. June Term, 1803.

PLEADING—ACTION ON JUDGMENT.

1. After not guilty and issue, to an action of debt upon a judgment in Virginia, suggesting a devastavit, the court will not suffer the defendant to plead nul tiel record, without showing sufficient cause why it was not pleaded before.

2. Nil debet is no plea to an action of debt on a judgment of another state.

At law. Debt [by Bastable against Wilson's administrator] upon a judgment of the Dumfries district court suggesting a devastavit; plea, not guilty and issue. Defendant moves now, when the cause is called for trial, to put in the plea of nul tiel record, without showing why he had not pleaded it before, or that it was now necessary for the justice of the cause.

Motion overruled by THE COURT.

The defendant then offered the plea of nil debet—refused without argument. Judgment confessed saving equity.

BASTABLE, (WILSON v.) See Cases Nos. 17,788 and 17,789.

BASYE, (VEITCH v.) See Case No. 16,909.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

Case No. 1,098.

In re BATCHELDER.

[1 Lowell, 373;[1] 3 N. B. R. 150, (Quarto, 37.)]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. July Term, 1869.

BANKRUPTCY—TRANSFER BY INSOLVENT—PREFERENCE — ASSIGNMENT UNDER DURESS — PROPER BOOKS OF ACCOUNT.

1. Where a trader transferred his whole stock and book accounts to one creditor, about three weeks before filing his petition, and had no other property, but owed many debts; held, a preference unless explained.

[Cited in Re Seeley, Case No. 12,628.]

2. It is no valid excuse for such an assignment, that it was made under threat of legal process.

[Cited in Strain v. Gourdin, Case No. 13,521.]

[See Rison v. Knapp, Case No. 11,861; Traders' Bank v. Campbell, 14 Wall. (81 U. S.) 87; Clarion Bank v. Jones, 21 Wall. (88 U. S.) 325; In re Jackson Iron Manuf'g Co., Case No. 7,153.]

3. If the necessary effect of an act is to prefer one creditor, the intent to prefer is presumed, though other motives may have co-operated to induce the act.

[4. The discharge of a bankrupt trader should not be refused for failure to keep proper books of account, when the books themselves are not produced, and parol statements regarding them are vague and inconclusive. The evidence as to the improper conditions of the books, and their bearing on the debtor's business, should be complete.]

[Cited in Re Frey, 9 Fed. 380.]

In bankruptcy. The examination of the bankrupt [Charles W. Batchelder] disclosed that about three weeks before he filed his petition, he assigned and transferred his whole stock in trade and book accounts to his father, in satisfaction of a pre-existing debt. He had no other estate or property, excepting such as is exempted from the operation of the bankrupt law, and he owed a considerable amount of debts, and was in fact insolvent. It appeared that his father came to his place of business with a sheriff's officer, and threatened to attach his stock and break up his business unless he made the conveyance, and it was under this pressure that the assignment was made. [Discharge refused.]

J. L. Colby, for opposing creditors.

W. H. Towne, for bankrupt.

LOWELL, District Judge. It is argued that this act was not a preference, because it was not voluntary. I have considered this question more than once, and am fully satisfied with my former decisions, that under the bankrupt act such a payment does not lose its character of a preference by being made under pressure. The English courts worked out the doctrine of preference from a consideration of the equities of the subject-matter. The word itself was not found in their statutes, but they held that the intent of the law being to distribute the assets equally among all the creditors, no unjust advantage ought to be given to any one creditor. But under their earlier statutes, [at the time this subject was given its legal shape,] [2] the title of the assignee related back to the act of bankruptcy, and in declaring a trader to be bankrupt by reason of a preference, they indirectly deprived, or tended to deprive, the preferred creditor of his title, and that without hearing him. It became necessary, therefore, to be very cautious not to create acts of bankruptcy which might prejudice honest creditors. A creditor has a right to demand and receive payment of his debt, they said; and from this starting-point they arrived at the rule that a payment made in pursuance of a lawful demand, should not be considered a fraud on the act. See In re Waite, [Case No. 17,044.]

[1] [Reported by Hon. John Lowell, LL. D., District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

But they never carried this doctrine to the extent of saying that a creditor might lawfully take an assignment of all the property of a trader. On the contrary, that was always and conclusively an act of bankruptcy, from which even pressure could not free it, because it must have been obvious to the creditor at the time that if he got the whole, no one else could get any thing. Accordingly the English law has two conclusive presumptions. One is that a trader who conveys his whole property to a pre-existing creditor, must have contemplated a preference of that creditor; and the other, that a debtor who pays an honest debt, with a part only of his assets, does not intend any [technical] [3] fraud, [which should render the payment void,] [3] if the payment was in consequence of the threats or demands of the creditor.

Our law adopts neither of these presumptions as conclusive. It defines a preference in the statute itself; or rather it has language which is inconsistent with the English definition. It makes the intent to prefer, or give an advantage to one creditor, the important thing; and this may evidently concur with pressure on the part of the creditor. For instance, in the leading case of Denny v. Dana, 2 Cush. 172, which is more important in construing our statute than the English decisions are, because the statutes are more alike, pressure was not allowed to avail in answer to a manifest preference. The doctrine of that case has been followed in many decisions under the bankrupt act, and denied, so far as I know, in none.

It must be remembered that by our law the assignee's title dates only from the filing of the petition, and that the bankrupt may be guilty of a preference which will subject him to the act, without involving the preferred creditor, unless the latter had reason to know or suspect the illegal intent.

On the other hand, the fact that the conveyance was of all the property will not perhaps in all cases conclusively show a preference. It is a very important circumstance, and almost decisive, but the presumption is still one of fact, and the question in every case is whether a preference was intended. It would be very difficult to explain so suspicious a fact, but I am not ready to say that there may not arise a case in which it could be explained.

No explanation is made in this case, and the discharge is refused.

[The other objection is overruled. It is not right to condemn a trader for not keeping proper books of account without full evidence of the facts, and of their bearing upon the business of the debtor. The books themselves are not produced, and the parol statements are vague and inconclusive. The case, on this head, is not made out.] [4]

NOTE, [from 3 N. B. R. 151, (Quarto, 37.)] See Wilson v. City Bank of St. Paul, [17 Wall. (84 U. S.) 473,] requiring intent to prefer to be shown.

Case No. 1,099.

In re BATCHELDER.

Ex parte LUCE.

[2 Lowell, 245.] [1]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. May Term, 1873.

BANKRUPTCY—SALE—VENDOR'S LIEN.

1. A., the owner of certain goods, deposited them with a warehouseman in the name of B., who was A.'s broker, and afterwards sold them to B., gave him a receipted bill of parcels, and took his note for the price. Held, that no further delivery of the goods was necessary, and that A.'s lien as vendor was lost.

2. Another parcel of goods was warehoused in the name of C., another broker, and was sold by A., the owner, to B., and a receipted bill given, and a negotiable promissory note taken for the price, which note was signed by B., and indorsed by D. for B.'s accommodation. B. and D. failed before the note became due. Notice of the sale had been given to C., the broker, but not to the warehouseman. Held, that the possession was not changed, and the lien of A. revived on the failure of B. and D.

3. As affecting the lien it was immaterial whether the note was taken as payment or security. A. was not bound to surrender the note, but might require the goods to be sold, and indorse the amount of the proceeds upon the note, and prove against the estates of B. and D. for the balance.

In bankruptcy. The petitioner, [D. W.] Luce, sold several lots of pickled salmon to [M. T.] Batchelder, at sundry times, and took his notes for the price, payable in four months from their several dates, indorsed by a third person. Both the buyer and the indorser failed, and became bankrupt, leaving the notes unpaid; and the petitioner proved for the full amount of the notes at the first meeting of

[2] [From 3 N. B. R. 150, (Quarto 37.)]

[3] [From 3 N. B. R. 151, (Quarto 37.)]

[4] [From 3 N. B. R. 151, (Quarto, 37.)]

[1] [Reported by Hon. John Lowell, LL. D., District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

Batchelder's creditors. He soon after filed his petition, averring that his proof was made unadvisedly, in the absence of his counsel, and that he was now informed that he had a lien on such of the salmon as remained in warehouse, and prayed that the goods might be sold, and the proceeds be applied to the payment of his debt, and that his proof should be so modified as to stand good only for any balance that might remain due him, after crediting the proceeds of sale. The parties agreed, in writing, to a statement of facts. Sixty barrels of the salmon were put by Luce into the hands of Beaman Brothers, brokers, for sale, and were by them stored in the warehouse of Lombard & Co., in their own names. When this lot was sold to Batchelder, a receipted bill of the same was given him, and Beaman Brothers were notified by Luce that the sale had been made, and were ordered to deliver the sixty barrels to Batchelder; but the latter never called upon Beaman Brothers, nor upon Lombard, the warehouseman, for the goods, or any part of them, and no transfer of them was made on Lombard's books. There were three other lots, all of which were stored with Lombard in the name of Batchelder, who was a broker as well as a dealer, and while so stored were bought by him; and parts of two of these lots were delivered, from time to time, by Lombard to Batchelder before his failure.

No notice was given by Luce to Beaman Brothers, nor to Lombard, of his intention to claim a lien, until three months after the failure of Batchelder, and after protracted negotiations for a settlement with him had resulted in nothing. The notes which Luce took for the price of all these goods were pledged by him to a bank as collateral security for a loan; but it was agreed at the argument that they were afterwards taken up by Luce, and were now held by him. He did not offer to cancel or surrender the notes, intending to prove them against the indorser's estate in bankruptcy. By consent of both parties an order was passed, a few days before the hearing, authorizing a sale of the goods, the proceeds to be held subject to the further order of the court.

C. G. Keyes, for Luce.
J. B. Harris, for assignee.

LOWELL, District Judge. It seems equally evident that Luce retains a vendor's lien upon the sixty barrels, and that he has none upon the other lots. If goods at the time of their sale are in the possession of a warehouseman or other bailee of the vendor, the lien is not lost by a simple notice to the bailee of the sale; but he must do some act, or come under some obligation, by which he is to be considered as having changed his relation to the vendor, and transferred his allegiance, so to say, to the vendee. Notice may be enough to put him on his guard, and to render him liable to an action if he does any thing inconsistent with the notice; and a notice silently received may be evidence of acquiescence, and it may even be conclusive evidence thereof, by way of estoppel, if third persons have been misled; but, as between the vendor and vendee, I understand that the possession is not changed until the warehouseman has in some way acknowledged the change, and has become the agent of the vendee. In the analogous law of stoppage in transitu, the carrier who receives goods very often has notice that the consignee has bought them, and is, in fact, their owner, and he is notified and directed to deliver to the vendee; but until he has either delivered them, or changed his relation in some way so as to become the exclusive agent of the vendee, they may be stopped, if the occasion arises. In short, such an order is revocable in the case of the failure of the vendee, unless it has been acted on.

This case, however, does not show that even notice was given to the warehouseman. The notice was to the brokers in whose name the goods were stored, which is one step further off. Such a notice could not be held to work a constructive change of possession. McEwan v. Smith, 2 H. L. Cas. 309. See, too, Dixon v. Yates, 5 Barn. & Adol. 313; Whitehead v. Anderson, 9 Mees. & W. 518; Griffiths v. Perry, 1 El. & El. 680; Donath v. Broomhead, 7 Barr, [7 Pa. St.] 301. It was argued with much earnestness that, after a payment for the goods by note, the right was lost, or rather had nothing to rest on. This would be so, if the debt were really paid; but when it turns out that what was accepted as payment does not bear the fruit of payment, the law does not insist on taking the word for the thing. The cases are all one way on this point. The special doctrine of the courts of Massachusetts which was insisted on, that a negotiable note is presumed to be payment, unless the contrary is proved, is of no consequence, because it is admitted in many cases decided by other courts that the notes in those cases were expressly received as payment; but the vendor has been permitted to assert his lien. It is enough to cite, upon this point, Arnold v. Delano, 4 Cush. 33, and Mohr v. Boston & A. R. Co., 106 Mass. 67.

The only remaining question as to this lot of sixty barrels is, whether the petitioner can prove for the remainder of his note after giving credit for what he may receive by the sale of the goods. One of the notes which he holds was given for the sixty barrels, and for one of the other lots which was sold at the same time, though for a distinct price, and was included in one receipted bill. This note was indorsed by Brown, Chickering, & Co., who are in bankruptcy. So far as appears, the indorsement was given for the accommodation of Batchelder. It was not insisted that the sale was so far one and indivisible that a delivery of part of the fifty-barrel lot ended the lien on the sixty-barrel lot; and the facts do not seem to admit of any such ruling. I therefore pass that point by. The argument is, that if the debt and lien are to be revived, the note must be given up and cancelled. I do not see any necessity for such action. When a suit is brought for goods sold, no doubt the vendor, before he can have judgment, must give up the vendee's note which he holds for the same debt; but when the note has been dishonored, and is in the possession of the vendor, I do not see what difference it makes in bankruptcy whether the money received from the realization of the lien be indorsed on the note or credited on the original debt, and whether the proof is made on the one or the other. Indeed, I think it more regular that the proof should be made on the note, for that really represents the debt. Again, I know of no reason why the vendor is obliged to lose any dividend he may receive from the indorser. In such a case it seems consistent with the rights of the parties to hold that the lien is held for the security of the note; else the vendor is put to the election between different securities, both of which he holds. Suppose the indorser to be a surety, as he is here, and to be nearly solvent, has not he or his assignee the right to require the vendor to obtain what he can out of his lien, and exonerate the surety's estate to that extent? I see no reason why the petitioner need surrender any of his security.

No reason has been assigned why the proof may not now be modified, as having been made under a mistake. In one case in Massachusetts a creditor was not permitted to change his proof after voting for the assignee and for the discharge of the debtor, though ignorantly. That was upon the ground that the rights of other creditors had been interfered with, or modified by the vote: New Bedford Sav. Inst. v. Fairhaven Bank, 9 Allen, 175. In most cases no such effect could fairly be attributed to a mere vote for assignee, and none is shown here. The other lots were already warehoused in the name of Batchelder when the sale was made. No notice or attornment was necessary or possible. There was nothing in the books of Lombard to show that Batchelder was an agent: his possession was Batchelder's; and when the latter bought the goods, and took delivery of a receipted bill, the possession and property coincided, and the lien was gone. It is the simple case of the vendee being in possession of the goods when he buys them.

I understand that the goods have depreciated in value in the lapse of time while the ownership was uncertain, and that they will not now bring enough to pay in full that part of the note which represents their price, and which is definitely shown and agreed to be $960.

The other lots were already standing in the name of the buyer, at the time of his purchase, and no further act was necessary or possible to complete the transfer than to receipt the bill.

The order is: That the sixty barrels be sold under the direction of the petitioner and assignee, as heretofore ordered, and the proceeds of sale, not exceeding the original price and any interest that may have accrued thereon, be paid to the petitioner and indorsed on the note, and that the proof heretofore made on said note in bankruptcy be reduced by the amount so indorsed. If the whole debt is paid, the proof to be cancelled, and if a surplus remains, it is to be held by the assignee. The remaining goods mentioned in the petition, or their proceeds, are to be transferred to the assignee, to be by him disposed of as assets in the bankruptcy.

BATCHELDER v. The SUCCESS. See Case No. 13,586.

BATCHELDER, (UNITED STATES v.) See Cases Nos. 14,540 and 14,541.

BATELSON v. The CYNTHIA. See Case No. 1,067.

BATEMAN, (GREENE v.) See Case No. 5,762.

Case No. 1,099a.

In re BATES et al.

[Betts' Scr. Bk. 574.]

District Court, D. South Carolina. Sept. 10, 1858.

CRIMINAL LAW—COMMITMENT—PRELIMINARY EXAMINATION.

[1. The crew of a brig were committed for piracy in engaging in the slave trade in violation of Act May 15, 1820, (3 Stat. 600,) c. 113, §§ 4, 5, upon a warrant issued on the affidavit of an officer of a United States vessel that his vessel had taken possession of the brig, and on examination had found her to be a slaver, having on board 300 Africans, with a crew composed of the persons charged. Held, on habeas corpus proceedings, that probable cause was shown for the issue of the warrant.]

[2. Stat. 1 & 2 P. & M. c. 13, and 2 & 3 P. & M. c. 10, in force in South Carolina prior to 1839, provided that, when a party accused was admitted to bail or committed, the officer before whom he was brought, previous to committing him, should take his examination and information of those that brought him, of the facts and circumstances, and the same, or so much thereof as was material to prove the felony, should be put in writing, etc. An act of South Carolina passed in 1839, concerning the office and duties of magistrates, provided, in section 9, that "it shall not be necessary for any magistrate, when any prisoner is produced before him for commitment to bail on a charge of felony, to examine such prisoner and those who bring him, as heretofore prescribed by law." Held that, notwithstanding section 10 provides that the "magistrate may take the examination of any witness on behalf of the state in the presence of the prisoner, allowing the prisoner the right of cross-examination," this act repeals the prior statute, and a commitment may be valid without any examination of prisoner or state witnesses.]

[3. The constitutional rights of the prisoner to be confronted by the witnesses against him, and to be represented by counsel, have reference to the trial only, and are not infringed by proceedings before the committing magistrate.]

[4. A commitment for further examination is valid, as well as a commitment for trial; and persons so committed under a valid warrant are not entitled to a discharge on habeas corpus, where the detention has lasted only 12 days, for it cannot be said that that is an unreasonable time for the purpose.]

[At law. On habeas corpus. Motion of R. T. Bates and others to be discharged from custody. Motion denied.]

MAGRATH, District Judge. In the matter of R. T. Bates and others. The return of the marshal of the United States for this district to the writ of habeas corpus, ordered to issue in this case, sets forth that the petitioners in whose behalf the writ has been issued, were taken, and are detained in custody by him as marshal, in the jail of Charleston district, for further examination on a charge of piracy, in violation of the 4th and 5th sections of the act of congress approved May 15, 1820, [3 Stat. 600, c. 113,] by virtue of warrants and commitments issued on 28th August, 1858, under the hand and seal of Robert C. Gilchrist, a commissioner of the United States for the district of South Carolina. The return then sets forth the warrant, which is directed to the marshal, requiring him to convey and deliver into custody of the keeper of the jail the bodies of said parties, charged before the commissioner on the oath of Lieut. Joseph M. Bradford, U. S. navy, with being of the crew or ship's company of the brig Echo, engaged in the slave trade, in violation of the act of 1820, [3 Stat. 600,] c. 113, §§ 4, 5. And the keeper of the jail is directed to receive the said parties into his custody in the jail, and them there safely keep for further examination. A motion is now made to discharge these prisoners; and the various grounds upon which this motion was urged, may be considered under two general propositions: 1. That the proceedings on the part of the commissioner were irregular and insufficient to justify a commitment. 2. That the commitment is, in itself, improper and illegal. These proceedings, it appears, were on affidavit of Joseph M. Bradford, a lieutenant in the U. S. navy, which states that on the —— day of August, 1858, the U. S. brig Dolphin took possession of the brig Echo; that on examination she proved to be a slaver, with a cargo of three hundred and twenty negro slaves on board, a crew of Spaniards and Americans, who gave their names, which are the same as are signed to this petition; and that he, with certain persons named, are material witnesses. The warrant which issued upon this affidavit, commanded the marshal to apprehend the said prisoners, and to bring them before the commissioner, to be dealt with and disposed of according to law. No return is endorsed on this warrant. Its execution appears only in the commitment already referred to and set forth in the return.

In countries which regard the personal liberty of the citizen, wherever laws have been passed for the suppression of crime and the punishment of offenders, it has been found necessary to provide certain preliminaries, operating as safeguards, which must precede either the arrest or the commitment or both. In the constitution of the United States it is thus provided: that no warrant shall issue but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched and the person or thing to be seized, (article 4, Amend. Const.;) and at other stages of the investigation, additional provisions have been made, intended to make the liberty of the citizen secure from unreasonable violation. In Ex parte Bollman, [Case No. 14,622,] it is said, "The cause of issuing a warrant is a crime committed by the person charged. Probable cause, therefore, is a probability that the crime has been committed by that person. Of this probability, the court or magistrate issuing the warrant must be satisfied by facts, supported by oaths or affirmation." The subject matter of the crime alleged in these proceedings is the prosecution of the slave trade. Is there probable cause to believe that the crime has been committed by the persons charged? They are found in a vessel, composing the crew or ship's company, with three hundred Africans on board. This is not conclusive; but at this stage of the criminal procedure, it is not expected to be conclusive. If a prima facie case is made out, it is sufficient. 1 Chit. Crim. Law, 106. The commissioner is to be satisfied of this probable cause before he issues the warrant, and it must be supported by oath or affirmation. In U. S. v. Johns, [Case No. 15,481,] it is laid down that upon a habeas corpus the only enquiry is whether the warrant of commitment states a sufficient probable cause to believe that the person charged has committed the offence. And in this state the law is thus stated by Judge Earle: "It is a great mistake to suppose that a warrant for apprehension, or a warrant of commitment, need contain any statement at all of the evidence on which it is founded, or need enumerate any of the facts and circumstances accompanying the offence." Dud. 300.

It is at the next stage of the proceedings that the objections have been most strongly urged. And the consideration of these objections is not only affected with the responsibility of deciding any question in a case of so much interest and importance; but it is moreover important as involving the direction of the criminal procedure of this court. It is objected that these parties have never been brought before the commissioner, nor examined, nor have the witnesses against them been examined in their presence, nor they allowed the cross-examination of their witnesses. That their commitment in the absence of these prerequisites and without the benefit of counsel, involves a denial of their constitutional and legal rights, and affects the whole proceedings subsequent to the arrest with such gross irregularity, that the commitment must be set aside. In the United States there is no law by which an established mode of criminal procedure is provided, and an uniform system of practice pursued. In the criminal as in the civil administration of justice, legislation, as far as it has gone, has professed to assimilate in each state the practice of the courts of the United States with that of the highest courts of law in that state. The act approved 24th September, 1789, c. 20, § 33, in cases of crime provides that "the offender may, by any justice or judge of the United States, or by any justice of the peace or other magistrates of any of the United States, where he may be found, agreeably to the usual mode of process against offenders in such state, and at the expense of the United States, be arrested and imprisoned or bailed, as the case may be, for trial before such court of the United States, as by this act has cognizance of the offence." 1 Stat. 91. By this act, if the proceedings are in the hands of an officer of the United States, he must conduct them agreeably to the usual mode of process against offenders in such state. And by the act of 23d August, 1842, (5 Stat. 516,) commissioners of the United States to take acknowledgments of bail and affidavits, and also to take depositions of witnesses in civil causes, shall and may exercise all the powers that any justice of the peace, or other magistrate of any of the United States, may now exercise in respect to offenders for any crime or offence against the United States, by arresting, imprisoning or bailing, under and by virtue of the 33d section of the act of 1789.

Previous to the act of assembly of the state of South Carolina, in 1839, the statute of 1 & 2 P. & M. c. 13, and 2 & 3 P. & M. c. 10, were among the English statutes retained in force after the Revolution; and their provisions governed the proceedings in criminal cases. By these statutes, when a party accused was admitted to bail, or committed, the parties before whom he was brought, previous to a commitment, were commanded to take his examination and information of those that bring him, of the fact and circumstance, and the same, or so much thereof as shall be material to prove the felony, shall be put in writing within two days after the said examination, and the justices shall certify the same. 1 Chit. Crim. Law, 74. It is true that it has been said, under this act, the accused may decline to testify; but it is also said that, in cases of felony, the examination of the accused must be taken. 1 Chit. Crim. Law, 83. And although it is declared to be a privilege operating in favor of the party accused, it may well be doubted how far that is the object accomplished, when we remember that by its provisions in certain cases these depositions may be given in evidence at the trial of the accused. How far the security of the accused was promoted by the statutes may be questioned, when, while it was professed to confront the accused and the witnesses, and allow the benefit of cross-examination, in practice the right of counsel for the accused to be present as a matter of right was denied, and at first not even the cross-examination was allowed to be under oath. This was an innovation upon the rule of the common law, that no one could be forced to criminate himself, a principle adopted in all its force in that provision of the constitution of the United States which declares that no one "shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself." Article 5, Amend. Const. These statutes may have secured the production, before commitment, of all the evidence which could be produced against the accused; but, in my judgment, that privilege was secured to him at the expense of others far more important. Be that, however, as it may, these statutes, until 1839, furnished a rule for criminal proceedings in South Carolina. By the act of the general assembly of the state of South Carolina, entitled "An act concerning the office and duties of magistrates," and passed in that year, it is in the 4th section provided, that when complaint on oath shall be made before a magistrate that a felony or misdemeanor has been committed, or that the informant has good reason to believe and does verily believe the same, or when such magistrate is reasonably satisfied thereof, he is required, under his hand and seal, to issue his warrant against the party charged, directed to any lawful officer within the state, wherein shall be plainly expressed the offence charged, and supposed time of commission, commanding him to arrest and bring such offender before himself or next magistrate, to be further dealt with as the law may direct; and in the 9th section it is provided that it shall not be necessary for any magistrate, when any prisoner is produced before him for commitment or bail, on a charge of felony, to examine such prisoner and those who bring him, as heretofore prescribed by law. Such magistrate may take the examination of any witness in behalf of the state, in the presence of such prisoner, allowing such prisoner the right of cross-examination, and reduce the testimony so taken to writing, read the same over to the witness and require him to subscribe; and the magistrate shall return the testimony so taken to the office of the clerk.

The counsel for the accused truly stated the point in this matter when they addressed themselves to the question whether the act of 1839 was a repeal of the statutes of Philip & Mary, and insisted that this act was the repeal of those statutes only so far as the examination of the accused was concerned, but that it virtually re-enacted the provisions of the statutes of Philip & Mary in relation to witnesses. I cannot so consider it in a case of felony. Indeed, the mode of proceeding directed in the 4th and 9th sections seems plainly intended, and is so expressed to be the change for that "heretofore prescribed by law," and which was the mode provided in the statutes of Philip & Mary; the 4th section of the act of 1839 requiring the magistrate to have the offender dealt with according to law, and the 9th section making it not necessary to examine the party produced for commitment. Indeed, there cannot be a doubt, so far as the examination of the accused is concerned, that the act of 1839 repealed the statutes previously in force. But is the provision of the statute of Philip & Mary changed as to the examination of witnesses? That is, must the witness be examined in the presence of the prisoner, with the right to cross-examine, before the accused can be committed? This seems to me to be equally plain, and the act appears to me also to express its manifest intention in relation to the witnesses to substitute that rule which it sets out, for that "heretofore prescribed by law."

The statutes of Philip & Mary are mandatory; they command the justice, "before he (or they) shall commit," "shall take examination of each prisoner and information of those that bring him." The act of 1839 directs that the warrant so issued, as already described, "shall authorize the arrest and detention of any person so charged," and that the magistrate before whom the prisoner is produced for commitment shall not hold it necessary to examine "such prisoner and those that bring him, as heretofore prescribed by law." It is true in the 10th section it is said, "The magistrate may take the examination of any witness in behalf of the state," and it has been argued with great zeal that "may," in this section, should be read as if written "must" or "shall." This is the rule where a statute directs the doing of a thing for the sake of justice; the word "may," in such cases, means the same thing as "shall." Dwar. St. 712. But the principle of the rule so stated has no application here. For what was formerly prescribed by law, that which, as has been seen, in the statute of Philip & Mary, it was said that the magistrate "shall" do, is the same thing which the act of 1839 declares it shall not be necessary for him to do. And the authority given in the latter part of the section, that the magistrate may take the examination of any witness in behalf of the state, provided it is done in the presence of a prisoner, is neither the re-enactment of the positive command of the statutes of Philip & Mary to take that examination, nor a qualification of the positive declaration in the first paragraph that such an examination, although formerly necessary, shall no longer be so. How far that examination of the witnesses permitted by the act of 1839 can make the deposition, so taken, competent evidence at the trial of the accused, I will not now discuss farther than to say that to be confronted with the witness at the trial of the case seems to me the constitutional right of the accused. 3 Story, Comm. § 1785. I have to regret that no adjudged case in the courts of this state has settled the construction of this section of the act of 1839. Had there been any such case it would have been our duty to have adopted its construction, and so to enforce it, unless there shall be special legislation by congress. In the absence of any construction by the courts of the state, I have been obliged to give it that construction which, to me, seemed not only proper, but in fact the only construction which could be given to it consistently with the admonition that judges "ought not to make any construction against the express letter of the statute, for nothing can so express the meaning of the makers of the act as their own direct words." Dwar. St. 725; 5 Rep. 118. And I feel more confidence in the opinion that the 4th and 5th sections of the act of 1839 repeal the statutes of Philip & Mary, and furnish a rule of procedure in themselves in all criminal proceedings, from the fact that such was the received opinion while I was at the bar; nor do I know of any case in the courts of the state where the practice did not conform to the construction which I have given. If this construction were exposed justly to the objection that by it the accused was not confronted with the witnesses against him, and had not the assistance of counsel for his defence, it would be inconsistent with the guaranty of the constitution in these particulars; and the provision, therefore, if rightly construed, would be void, because it would tend to impair a constitutional right. But it should be remembered, in the language of Judge Marshall, that, "before the accused is put upon his trial, all the proceedings are ex parte." [Ex parte Bollman,] 4 Cranch, [8 U. S.] 129. That these constitutional rights, which are supposed to be invaded by this construction, are rights which are not contemplated by the constitution in connection with preliminary proceedings; that the privilege of confronting the witness is a privilege which pertains to the trial in court; that it does not extend to all periods in the proceeding, is manifest in the fact that it cannot be claimed before the grand jury: a period, when, if allowed, it would be far more available for the accused than in the preliminary proceedings before the magistrate. And that the right to have the assistance of counsel is not invaded, since, if the statutes of Philip & Mary were in force, it is beyond dispute that, in proceedings under them, the accused was not entitled to the benefit of counsel as a matter of right. 3 Story, Comm. §§ 1785, 1786; 3 Cranch, C. C. 377, note 1. [Robinson v. Cathcart, Case No. 11,947.] That course of proceeding, then, which is usual in the state, under this act of 1839, is the proper course to be pursued by the commissioner of the United States. "My opinion (says Judge Curtis) is that it was the intention of congress by these words, agreeably to the usual mode of process against offenders in such state, to assimilate all the proceedings for holding accused persons to answer before a court of the United States, to proceedings had for similar purposes by the laws of the state where the proceedings should take place." U. S. v. Rundlett, [Case No. 16,208.] If anything were wanting in confirmation of what I have said it will be found in the 14th section of the same act, (1839,) in which any magistrate of the state may order arrest, imprisonment or bail of a person, charged with a crime or offence against the United States, alleged to have been committed within this state, at the expense of the United States, and to be tried in the courts thereof, according to the established forms of proceeding for offences against this state.

But it is said the commitment or detention for further examination is improper. Is it unlawful? The 4th section of the act of 1839 directs the accused to be arrested and brought before the magistrate, to be dealt with as the law directs. And in this case, the detention of the accused has been ordered for further examination. Now, it will be observed that the act of 1839 does not forbid any examination; it only provides that it shall not be necessary before commitment. There may be, as in this case, a number of persons accused; it may become a matter of duty for the magistrate to examine, and ascertain whether they are all equally guilty, and whether they shall all be committed for the same offense. Nor can I understand why, in this case, the accused complain of a commitment for further examination. If the warrant contains probable cause for commitment, and rests upon an oath for its support, the magistrate may commit for trial, or for further examination. But the commitment for further examination is not regarded as a proceeding of which the accused can complain, unless it is abused. "If (says Lord Eldon, in the house of lords) I understand the law upon the subject, a commitment for further examination is not a proceeding against the party, but a proceeding for his benefit. It is a proceeding with a view to protect him against a commitment for trial, if * * * it can be found that there is no ground upon which there ought to be a commitment for custody in order to trial." 3 Dow, 184. And where it appears that a party is detained, even without a warrant, for further examination, Abbott, C. J., expressed a doubt whether habeas corpus would be issued where the accused was held for further examination, and refused a discharge. Ex parte Krans, 8 E. C. L. 110. It was said in the argument that this detention was in jail. But it was overlooked that a detention elsewhere than in jail would not be lawful; for thereby the accused might be deprived of the benefit of the jail delivery. 1 Chit. Crim. Law, 73. I readily concede that commitment for further examination must not be so used as to operate in place of a commitment for trial; and this, or any other abuse of the power of the magistrate, will be corrected. The court will not only relieve, but the party will have his action against the magistrate. Is there in this case any evidence of an abuse by the commissioner of his authority? The arrest is said to have been made on the 28th August, and the accused from that day until the present time are held under a commitment for further examination. In the examinations under the statutes of Philip & Mary, it is laid down that there is no precise limitation of the time, which must depend upon the circumstances of each particular case; there are many instances, it is said, of prisoners being detained more than twenty days between their first being brought before a justice and their commitment for trial. 1 Chit. Crim. Law, 73. I am not to presume that the delay which has taken place is unreasonable; and if it were, and had continued so long as to induce me to think that the original cause of it could not be valid, or worthy of further investigation, I might discharge the accused, (8 E. C. L. 112,) or relieve them upon adequate security being given for their appearance, (1 Chit. Crim. Law, 130.) But within that period of time, which elsewhere, and for the purposes of an examination, has been held not unreasonable, I could not undertake to say that the delay which in this case has taken place is unreasonable.

It is true that the offense charged in the warrant is a felony, and is therefore excepted specially in 31 Car. II., c. 2; but in such case the common law gave relief. And in the constitution of the United States, the provision is broadly declared, "that the privilege of habeas corpus shall not be suspended unless when in cases of rebellion or invasion, the public safety may require it." Article 1, § 9. For whatever cause he may be imprisoned, one who is entitled to the writ may obtain it. But its end is not to assert an exemption from all imprisonment, which would be inconsistent with every idea of law and political society, (3 Bl. Comm. 132, Wendell,) but to relieve from "a confinement without lawful warrant, without legal cause, on vague, indefinite and uncertain charges," (Dud. 299.) If anything had been wanting in this case to secure for it my careful consideration, it would have been found in the zeal with which the motion for the discharge of the prisoners was urged. I do not see any ground upon which I could rest that exercise of the power with which I am vested. The motion, therefore, is refused.

BATES, (DEAN v.) See Case No. 3,704.

Case No. 1,100.

BATES v. DRURY.

[4 Mason, 118.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Rhode Island. Nov. Term, 1825.

CUSTOMS DUTIES—FEES OF COLLECTORS.

Where a collector's term of office expires under the act of 1820, [3 Stat. 582,] he is entitled to one half of the commissions upon bonds taken by him and then outstanding, and collected by his successor, as being a case within the equity of the [tariff] act of 1799, c. 129, [Bior. & D. Laws; 1 Stat. p. 704, c. 23.]

At law. Assumpsit [by Barnabas Bates against Luke Drury] for money had and received. Plea, the general issue. At the trial it appeared that the defendant was collector of the customs for the port of Bristol; and the plaintiff was his immediate predecessor in that office. The plaintiff was not removed from office, but his commission expired according to the provisions of the act of 15th of May, 1820, c. 102, Bior. & D. Laws; 3 Stat. 582,] the senate having refused to ratify his reappointment. The suit was for commissions upon bonds for duties taken by the plaintiff while in office, and outstanding at the time his commission expired, and since collected and received by the defendant. It was admitted, that the sums due for commissions on these bonds were in the hands of the defendant, and not claimed by the government.

Bridgham for the plaintiff, and Searle for the defendant, submitted the cause shortly on these facts, and a verdict was taken for the plaintiff for $681.93, being half the commissions, subject to the opinion of the court. It was afterwards delivered as follows.

STORY, Circuit Justice. Upon consideration we are of opinion, that the verdict for the plaintiff ought to stand. Before the act of [May 15,] 1820, c. 102, [Bior. & D. Laws; 3 Stat. 582,] the collectors held their office, without limitation of time, at the pleasure of the president. That act cut down the term of office to four years. The act of 2d of March, 1799, c. 129, [Bior. & D. Laws; 1 Stat. p. 704, c. 23,] provided for the only cases, except removals, in which one collector could take the bond, and another receive the money. The cases of death and resignation were expressly provided for; the case of removals, being presumed to be for good cause, was probably not thought fit, upon motives of policy, to be embraced in any universal rule. The act, in the second section, gives a commission to collectors of a certain percentage "on all moneys by them respectively received on account of the duties arising on goods &c. imported into the United States, and on the tonnage of ships and vessels." This section attaches the right to the receipt of the moneys, and of course would seem to give the whole compensation to the collector who receives, and to him only. But it is obvious, that great injustice and inequality would arise from such an universal provision. The collector who takes the bond, and does the other incident duties on the importation, incurs a great responsibility. He may be made liable for any loss occasioned not merely by malfeasance, but by negligence in taking the bond, as by taking insufficient sureties, by mistakes of calculation, by omissions in the bond, &c.; and the receiving collector may have incurred only the slight responsibility of a safe custody of the money after it was received. A rule that should always give it to the latter, excluding the former, would therefore be inequitable. It would deny compensation where there had been service, and give it for a service very slight. Under such circumstances the court would, if the section stood alone, be driven to the conclusion, either that this hardship was intended by the legislature, or that the section contemplated only cases where the same collector took the bonds and received the moneys. My own opinion would incline to the latter construction. But the fourth section, in cases of death and resignation, divides the commissions equally between the predecessor, or his representative, and the successor. This furnishes an equitable rule, applicable to all the cases, to which any distinct legislative policy could be presumed to apply before the act of 1820. We think the case of an expiration of the term of office under this last act falls within the equity of the act of 1799, or at least, that it furnishes the true rule to govern the court, in what we deem a casus omissus. The government interposes no objection to the allowance of these commissions; the fund is in the hands of the defendant, and may be justly considered as a sum left by the government to be distributed between the two collectors according to their proportion of services. Each has performed some service; each is entitled to some compensation; neither can justly claim the whole. Ex aequo et bono the money ought to be apportioned between them; and the act of 1799 having furnished a rule in analogous cases, we apply it to the present case, and affirm the verdict, because it has made an equal division between them. Judgment accordingly.

[1] [Reported by William P. Mason, Esq.]

Case No. 1,101.

BATES v. EQUITABLE FIRE & MARINE INS. CO.

[3 Cliff. 215.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Rhode Island. Nov. Term, 1868.[2]

FIRE INSURANCE—BREACH OF CONDITION—TRANSFER OF POLICY—CONSENT OF COMPANY.

1. A stock of sugars was insured under a time-policy, which contained the condition that if the property should be sold or conveyed in whole or in part, or if the policy should be assigned without the consent of the company, the risk should cease; but if the assured should sell the property, or part thereof, before the expiration of the policy, the same might be continued for the benefit of the purchaser, if the company gave their consent, to be evidenced by a certificate of the fact or by indorsement on the policy. Shortly after the date of the policy the assured sold the property to the plaintiff, and on the day of the completion of the delivery indorsed the policy to him as follows: "Payable in case of loss to Edward C. Bates." The policy was sent to the defendants with the request that they would approve the indorsement. It was approved in the following terms: "Consent is hereby given to the above indorsement." At the time of the loss the plaintiff had on hand a quantity of sugars equal to that which was owned by the assured at the date of the policy. Held, that the indorsements on the back of the policy were not a compliance with the conditions of the policy in case of sale. Under those conditions the policy would not continue for the benefit of a purchaser, and the consent of the company to the change of ownership must be evidenced substantially as required in the conditional clause.

[Cited in Sias v. Roger Williams Ins. Co., 8 Fed. 188.]

[See note at end of case.]

2. Upon sale of the property without the antecedent consent of the company the risk ceased, and the policy became void, unless the consent of the company thereto was subsequently obtained.

[Cited in Sias v. Roger Williams Ins. Co., 8 Fed. 188.]

3. The purchase was made, but the consent of the company to the transfer was not obtained, and they had no notice of it prior to the loss. They consented, in case the property of the assured was destroyed, they would pay the amount to the plaintiff, not that the policy should continue for the benefit of any one other than the insured.

[Cited in Sias v. Roger Williams Ins Co., 8 Fed. 188.]

[See note at end of case.]

[At law. Action by Edward N. Bates against the Equitable Fire & Marine Insurance Company.] Assumpsit upon a policy of insurance. Plea the general issue, and verdict for the plaintiff, subject to the opinion of the court upon questions of law, reserved at the trial. [Verdict set aside. This was afterwards affirmed by the supreme court in Bates v. Equitable F. & M. Ins. Co., 10 Wall. (77 U. S.) 33.]

The policy was dated October 11, 1861, and it was issued to William D. Philbrook in the sum of $3,000, for one year from date, on a stock of sugar, raw, wrought, and in process, contained in the frame building, with composition roof, occupied by the assured, for refining sugar, situated on Sargent's wharf, in Boston, Mass. The terms of the policy material to be noticed were, "that if the situation of the property or the circumstances affecting the risk should be during the existence of the policy altered or changed, by or through the advice, consent, or agency of the assured, or if said property should be sold, or conveyed in whole or in part, or if the policy should be assigned, without the consent of the company, ... then, and in every such case, the risk assumed should cease, and the policy become void. But the company agreed that if the assured should sell the property, or any part thereof, before the expiration of the policy, a proportion of the premium received should be repaid, upon receiving notice of such sale, before loss, reserving, however, three months' premium on the sum insured, over and above the amount which would be due at the time of receiving such notice; or the policy might continue for the benefit of such purchaser if the company gave their consent thereto. Consent was to be evidenced by a certificate of the fact or by indorsement on the policy. The execution of the policy was admitted, and the evidence showed that the assured was at that date the owner of $60,000 or $70,000 worth of sugars on that wharf, of the description specified in the policy. Shortly after the date of the policy the plaintiff purchased the sugars of the assured, and the same were all delivered to him, pursuant to orders of the seller, on or before November 23 following. Delivery of the sugars to the plaintiff was completed on that day, and on the same day the assured indorsed the policy to the plaintiff in the terms following, to wit, "Payable in case of loss to Edward C. Bates," and signed the same and delivered the policy to the plaintiff. The proofs also showed, that he made the indorsement in pursuance of the contract of sale, and that the premium for the unexpired portion of the term of the policy was taken into account between the parties in making the contract. On the 28th of the same month the policy with the indorsement thereon, signed by the assured, was enclosed to the president of the company, requesting him to approve of the indorsement; and on the following day the policy was returned indorsed, "Consent is hereby given to the above indorsement," and the same was signed, "Equitable Insurance Company, Fred W. Arnold Secretary." Subsequent to the purchase and delivery of the sugars, the plaintiff carried on the business of refining sugars at that refinery, substantially in the same way that the business prior to that time had been conducted by his vendor, and at the time of the loss he had on hand a quantity of sugars equal to that which was owned by the assured at the date of his policy, and of the same descriptions. During the night of the 24th of February, 1862, the entire stock of sugars in that refinery was destroyed by fire. Due notice was given of the loss by the plaintiff on the following day, and two days later the defendants admitted the receipt of the notice, but declined to pay the amount, upon the ground that the assured ceased to be the owner of the property before the loss, and that they had never assented to any change of ownership in the property insured. They set up the same defence at the trial, but the court overruled it and directed a verdict for the plaintiff, reserving the question for further consideration.

[1] [Reported by William Henry Clifford, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

[2] [Affirmed in 10 Wall. (77 U. S.) 33.]

E. Metcalf and C. B. Goodrich, for plaintiff.
Geo. H. Browne, for defendants.

CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice. Time-policies upon a stock in trade, especially where they cover a considerable period of time, and where from the nature of the business it appears that the parties must have understood that the stock would be continually changing, apply to goods in the place of business from time to time, as purchases are made to supply the place of goods sold in the usual and regular course of business within the lifetime of the policy. 1 Phil. Ins. §§ 489–491; Ang. Ins. § 203; Lane v. Maine Mut. F. Ins. Co., 12 Me. 44; Hooper v. Hudson R. F. Ins. Co., 17 N. Y. 426.

Partial sales of the stock, therefore, under such a policy, if the vacuum is regularly supplied by new purchases of equal value, and of the same description of goods, will not render the policy void, even though the entire stock may change before the loss occurs. Unless the rule were so, a policy of insurance upon a stock in trade for any considerable period of time would cease to be an indemnity against loss. Such partial sales in the usual course of business are not prohibited by the terms of the policy in this case. Both parties knew that the sugars on hand were to be manufactured and that the product was to be sold, and that the unmanufactured sugars were to be supplied by new purchases to keep the stock good, and it is not pretended by the defendants that any such sales and purchases had the effect to impair the right of the assured to recover on the policy. On the other hand, the plaintiff concedes that in case of the sale of the property, such as was made by the assured to the plaintiff, the risk would cease and the policy become void, unless the company gave their consent thereto within the true intent and meaning of that condition in the policy. Whether conceded or not, it is clear that without such consent the policy would not continue, for the benefit of the purchaser, and it is equally clear that the consent to be valid, must be evidenced substantially as required in that clause of the policy.

Parties make their own contracts, and courts are bound by their terms and conditions. The express words of the condition are, that "the policy (in case of a sale) may continue for the benefit of the purchaser if this company give their consent thereto," to be evidenced by a "certificate of the fact or by indorsement on this policy."

None of these views are directly controverted by the plaintiff, but he insists that the indorsement appearing on the back of the policy is a substantial compliance with the condition in that behalf, as before recited, which is the principal question between the parties.

Reference is made by the plaintiff to the case of Hooper v. Hudson River F. Ins. Co., 17 N. Y. 426, as supporting his views, that the indorsement on the policy in this case affords sufficient evidence that the defendants had notice that he had purchased the property of the assured. Careful examination of that case, however, will show that it is not analogous, and that it does not support the proposition as applied to the case before the court. The statement of the case shows that the entire stock in trade of the assured was sold at auction, and that the plaintiff in the suit on the policy became the purchaser, and on the same day he applied to the insurance company and obtained their consent in writing, indorsed on the policy that the interests of the assured in the policy might be assigned to him, and he subsequently took such an assignment in writing before the loss.

Right to the benefit of the policy was denied, because the purchaser did not disclose his interest when he applied to the company for their consent that the policy might be transferred, but the court held that the act of applying for consent that the policy might be assigned was notice to the company that the applicant had acquired or was about to acquire, some interest in the property insured.

Destitute as this case is of every feature of resemblance to that one, it hardly seems necessary to point out the differences. Suffice it to say, that in this case there was no application for consent that the policy might be assigned; no consent to that effect was ever given, nor did the assured ever execute any assignment of the policy.

Sale of the property by the assured without any antecedent consent of the company is proved and admitted, and of course the risk ceased and the policy became void at that time, unless the purchaser subsequently secured the consent of the company thereto, as required by the terms of the policy. Carpenter v. Providence Wash. Ins. Co., 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 502; Foster v. Equitable Ins. Co., 2 Gray, 216; Grosvenor v. Atlantic F. Ins. Co., 17 N. Y. 391; Loring v. Manufacturers' Ins. Co., 8 Gray, 29.

The next inquiry is, what is the true meaning and legal effect of the indorsement in this case, to which the defendants consented through their secretary?

In the case of Grosvenor v. Atlantic F. Ins. Co., 17 N. Y. 391, the direct adjudication was that where a fire policy names the owner as the person insured, and declares that the damages in case of loss shall be payable to another person, therein named as mortgagee, the latter cannot recover in case of a breach of the conditions of the policy by the mortgagor. In such case the contract is with the mortgagor, and for the insurance of his interest, and the mortgagee can recover only where the mortgagor could have done so, had the money been payable to himself instead of being payable for his benefit to the mortgagee. Howard F. Ins. Co. v. Chase, 5 Wall. [72 U. S.] 516.

The present case is no stronger than those cases where the appointée to receive money in case the property of the assured is lost, is named in the policy itself instead of being appointed by an indorsement on the back. Neither such a stipulation in the policy nor such an indorsement on the back of the policy amounts to an assignment of the policy, or operates as a transfer of the property insured.

Decided cases to this point are quite numerous, and they are all one way. Hale v. Mechanics' Ins. Co., 6 Gray, 169; Young v. Eagle F. Ins. Co., 14 Gray, 153; Fogg v. Middlesex F. Ins. Co., 10 Cush. 337; Ketchum v. Protection Ins. Co., 1 Allen, (N. B.) 136; Loring v. Manufacturers' Ins. Co., 8 Gray, 29.

The argument of the plaintiff is, that the application to the defendants for consent that the sum insured in case of loss should be payable to him, was notice of the sale of the property and of the assignment of the policy; but it is clear that neither branch of the proposition can be sustained. Fogg v. Middlesex Ins. Co., 10 Cush. 348; Howard F. Ins. Co. v. Chase, 5 Wall. [72 U. S.] 516.

Viewed in any light, the plaintiff cannot recover. Purchase of the property insured was made by the plaintiff, but he did not procure the consent of the company to the sale, and they had no notice of the transfer prior to the loss. They consented, in case the property of the assured was destroyed, that they would pay the amount to the plaintiff, but they never consented that the policy should continue for the benefit of any one except the insured.

Verdict set aside.

[NOTE. In the report of this case as heard in the supreme court on writ of error, the statement is made that the secretary of the company defendant swore that he had no knowledge of the sale until after the loss. There was no evidence that any other officer of the company had notice of it other than as implied from their consent to the indorsement. In the course of the opinion of the court, Mr. Justice Miller referred to the very common use of similar indorsements as a mode of appointing that the loss of the insured shall be paid to a third person, thus furnishing a species of security to a creditor, and said: "In the face of this frequent use of the two indorsements on the policy, it cannot be held that they imply of themselves a knowledge of the sale, or a consent to insure the purchaser." As there was no evidence of usage or a course of dealing recognizing such indorsements as evidence of a sale, the judgment of the circuit court was affirmed. Bates v. Equitable F. & M. Ins. Co., 10 Wall. (77 U. S.) 33.]

Case No. 1,102.

BATES et al. v. The NATCHEZ.

[Newb. 489.][1]

District Court, E. D. Louisiana. Nov. Term, 1854.

COLLISION — MISSISSIPPI RIVER — ASCENDING AND DESCENDING BOATS — RULES OF NAVIGATION.

1. The general rules of navigation of the Mississippi and the law of Louisiana require a descending steamboat to keep the middle of the river.

[Cited in Shirley v. The Richmond, Case No. 12,795.]

[See Sinnot v. The Dresden, Case No. 12,908; The Magnolia, Id. 8,958; Goslee v. Shute, 18 How. (59 U. S.) 463.]

2. Although a steamboat descending when near a bend, may have the right to run near the right bank, yet she is guilty of great imprudence in continuing to run near that shore, when she saw another boat ascending, apparently near the same shore.

3. When a boat ascending on the right bank, signals a boat descending, by two taps on her bell, that she intends keeping to the larboard, there is no necessity that the descending boat should run any risk in passing.

[In admiralty. Libel by Bates, Benson & Co., owners of the steamboat Pearl, against the steamboat Natchez, for collision. Libel dismissed.]

Wolfe & Singleton, for libelants.
Durant & Hornor, for respondents.

McCALEB, District Judge. In this case the libelants as owners of the steamboat Pearl, have filed their libel against the steamboat Natchez, to recover the sum of $16,500 damages, which they allege they have sustained in consequence of the sinking of their boat in a collision with the Natchez, at about half past two o'clock in the morning of the first of January, 1854. The collision occurred nearly opposite to what is known as Brusli Landing, in the parish of West Baton Rouge. The Pearl was descending and the Natchez ascending the river. The libel states that the Pearl sank in one minute after the collision, and the testimony of the witnesses shows that she sank almost immediately.

Without commenting at length upon the mass of testimony introduced in evidence, I shall present briefly the prominent facts upon which my conclusions on the questions put at issue by the pleadings and arguments of counsel, have been formed. Fortunately I have not been subjected to the usual difficulty of deciding the case upon the conflicting evidence of the officers of the two boats alone. Several disinterested witnesses have been examined. Some of these witnesses were attentive spectators of the collision, from the banks of the river, and give for the most part a clear and concurring account of the situation of the boats in the river and the circumstances of the disaster. Their testimony substantially agrees with evidence given by the officers of the Natchez, and has led my mind to the conclusion that the libelants have failed to make out such a case as entitles them to relief from this court.

[1] [Reported by John S. Newberry, Esq.]

In the first place, it is extremely doubtful whether the signals were given on the Pearl at all; and if they were I am satisfied they were not heard on board the Natchez. The witnesses on the latter boat concur in declaring that they heard no signal bells from the Pearl, and the witnesses who were on shore at the time of the collision, testify to the same effect. The witness Hart (the overseer on Mr. Stewart's plantation) says that he heard the "bell of the Pearl tap about three seconds before the collision. You could scarcely distinguish between the time of the tap and the crash." It is needless to say that a signal given at such a moment was too late to give the necessary warning to the other boat.

In the next place, I am satisfied from the evidence, that the Pearl was not descending in her proper place in the river. The general rules of the navigation of the river and the law of Louisiana on the subject, require a descending boat to keep in the middle of the river; but admitting that in this instance, she was, according to the opinion expressed by the witness Orr, entitled to run down the bend, and that she would have been in her proper place at the distance of 200 yards from the Brusli Landing, it is yet obvious that she was guilty of great imprudence in continuing to run so near to the right bank descending, when she saw another boat ascending apparently very near the same shore. The witness Orr testifies that at the point of collision there are 800 yards width of good navigable water, and there was certainly no necessity of running any risk in passing an ascending boat, whose signals of two taps repeatedly given, and indicating her determination to keep to the larboard, were distinctly heard: for while we are left in doubt whether any signals were given on board the Pearl, it is rendered perfectly certain by the testimony of the libelants, that the taps from the larger and louder bell of the Natchez were distinctly heard by the pilot of the descending boat. Instead of obeying those signals and keeping out in the middle of the river, we find the Pearl continuing to run so close to the right bank descending, that she came in collision with the Natchez so near to that bank that when the pilot of that boat turned her bow out at the moment of the collision, her stern was against the shore. This fact contained in the testimony of the pilot Dunboy, is corroborated by that of Hofroge, who was on shore at Brusli Landing, and by that of Sands, who was a passenger on the Natchez. It is furthermore corroborated by Lisk, who went to the place of the collision with his diving bell with the view of saving the wreck. This witness declares that he found that the bow of the Pearl was about fifty or sixty yards from the shore. The pilot of the Pearl, on the contrary, testifies that at the time of the collision, she was 150 yards from the Brusli shore. When we take into consideration the fact that she sunk almost immediately after the collision, it is difficult to believe that the testimony of this witness can be correct.

It is by no means clearly established by the evidence, that the engines of the Pearl were stopped before the collision. I am satisfied that she had headway, and that her sinking was the consequence of a concussion produced by her own motion; for the evidence is very strong to the effect that the Natchez had not only stopped her progress, but was actually backing at the moment of the collision. Much stress is laid by the proctors of the libelants upon the fact that the Natchez was running up near the left shore ascending before she reached the Brusli Landing. But the witness Orr examined on their behalf, shows that she had a right to cross from the bar shore, when she came up as far as the Brusli Landing; and if she was already over before the Pearl could reach that point, what just ground of complaint can the latter have? The evidence is clear that she was plainly visible running up close along the western shore—so close that the witness Dr. Vaughn, who was riding along the bank on horseback at the time, thought she had made a landing and was just getting under way again. The evidence is equally clear that she continued regularly on her course, without crossing the track of the descending boat, and that she repeatedly gave her signals in accordance with the rules established by the inspectors, indicating distinctly her determination to keep the shore on which she was running. There could be no mistake at any moment from the time she was first descried by the pilot of the Pearl, as to her real position in the river. After an attentive examination of all the evidence, I am unable to discover any fault on the part of the officers of the Natchez. They seem to have managed their boat with prudence and skill; and their exertions after the collision, in rescuing passengers and others from the sinking boat, entitle them to the commendation of this court.

The libel must therefore be dismissed, with costs.

Case No. 1,103.

BATES v. PAYSON.

[4 Dill. 265.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Colorado. 1877.

FEDERAL COURTS—ADMISSION OF COLORADO INTO THE UNION—DISPOSITION OF CAUSES OF A FEDERAL CHARACTER PENDING IN THE SUPREME COURT OF THE TERRITORY — ACT JUNE 26, 1876, CONSTRUED.

Under the act of congress [of June 26, 1876,] (19 Stat. 61, § 8.) establishing federal courts in the state of Colorado, and providing for the disposition of cases pending in the supreme and district courts of the territory at the time of the admission of the state into the Union, cases of a federal character pending on appeal or writ of error in the supreme court of the territory at the time of the admission of the state, may be heard and decided in the proper federal court created by said act, which may affirm the judgment below or reverse it and order a new trial in the federal court, and in either case enter final judgment.

[Followed in U. S. v. Lynde, 44 Fed. 216.]

At law. [Joseph R.] Payson, assignee in bankruptcy of the Republic Insurance Company, of Chicago, Illinois, sued [Joseph E.] Bates in assumpsit in the district court of Arapahoe county, to recover a balance alleged to be due from the latter on his subscription to the capital stock of the company. The suit was brought and judgment was entered against Bates under the territorial government, and he, pursuant to a law of the territory, removed the cause into the supreme court of the territory by appeal. This appeal was pending in that court on the 1st day of August, 1876, when the territory became a state. It appears that the record of the case then passed to the supreme court of the state, from whence it was transferred to this court by agreement of parties.

It was suggested that this court has not jurisdiction to review the record of a territorial court, or to give any judgment whatever respecting it. It was also urged that if this court can, in any case, review a record of a territorial court, as to a judgment at law, the proceeding must be by writ of error, and not by appeal, as in this case.

The eighth section of the act of [June 26,] 1876, (19 Stat. 61,) which, it was conceded, must govern, is as follows: "That in respect of all cases, proceedings, and matters pending in the supreme or district courts of the territory of Colorado at the time of the admission of said state into the Union, whereof the circuit or district courts" (of the United States) "by this act established might have had jurisdiction under the laws of the United States, had said courts existed at the time of the commencement of such cases, the said circuit and district courts, respectively, shall be the successors of said supreme and district courts of said territory; and all the files, records, and proceedings relating thereto shall be transferred to said circuit and district courts, respectively, and the same shall be proceeded with therein in due course of law."

Thomas Macon, for appellant.
J. W. Blackburn, for appellee.

MILLER, Circuit Justice, presiding, overruled the objection. It was admitted that the case was one which might have been brought in a federal court, if such courts had existed at the date of the commencement of the suit. As such, the case was within the eighth section of the act. By that section this court is declared to be the successor of the supreme court of the territory as to all such cases, with power to proceed therein "in due course of law." This means that this court may do all that was left undone in the supreme court of the territory. The cause was pending in that court for review, and we may proceed as that court would have proceeded if it had retained the case. The way in which, under the territorial statutes, the cause was taken to the supreme court of the territory, is not material to be considered. The act of congress applies to all cases of federal character pending in that court at the date of the admission of the state, and it matters not whether they were removed into that court by writ of error or appeal.

If it were necessary to remand the cause to the state court there would be a difficulty in disposing of it, but that was not required. Whether the judgment should be affirmed or reversed, we could enter the proper judgment here, and, if necessary, we could try the case again in this court.

Afterwards, and at this same term, argument was heard on the errors assigned, and the court finding no error in the record, the judgment was affirmed, and it was ordered that the said judgment be entered of record in this court.

Judgment accordingly.

[1] [Reported by Hon. John F. Dillon, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

Case No. 1,104.

BATES v. SEABURY et al.

[1 Spr. 433;[1] 21 Law Rep. 666.]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. Term, 1858.

SEAMEN—WRONGFUL DISCHARGE — DURESS—DAMAGES—ADMIRALTY PRACTICE—PROCTOR'S POWER TO COMPROMISE.

1. Where a seaman is induced to assent to his discharge, upon payment of a nominal sum, from just apprehension of future ill treatment, arising from the misconduct of the master, such assent is given under a species of duress, and is no bar to a recovery of the amount actually due to him, at the time of his discharge.

[Cited in Gove v. Judson, 19 Fed. 524. See, also, Mayshew v. Terry, Case No. 9,361; Jenks v. Cox, Id. 7,277; The Ringleader, Id. 11,850.]

[1] [Reported by F. E. Parker, Esq., assisted by Charles Francis Adams, Jr., Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

2. If, subsequently to such discharge, the seaman ships in another vessel, at an advanced lay, it is not a correct principle, in settling his claim against the first ship, to reckon full wages for the entire voyage of such ship, and to deduct therefrom his earnings in the second ship, during the time.

3. The amount due at the time of his discharge, from the first ship, is an absolute debt.

4. A seaman wrongfully discharged is entitled to an indemnity [for his loss of time and other damage subsequent to the discharge.]

5. In ascertaining such indemnity, subsequent expenses and earnings may be taken into the account.

6. A proctor in admiralty cannot release, or compromise, a debt due to his client, without special authority.

7. But he is authorized to receive payment. And an insufficient amount paid to a proctor, in settlement, is a discharge pro tanto.

8. Seamen, in the whaling service, discharged abroad, are entitled to the benefit of the statute giving three months' extra wages, [Act Aug. 18, 1856, § 26; 11 Stat. 62.]

[Cited in Frates v. Howland, Case No. 5,066; Gove v. Judson, 19 Fed. 524.]

9. A charge of 2½ per cent. commissions on sales of oil, was disallowed.

[Cited in Frates v. Howland, Case No. 5,066.]

10. So also were charges for fitting and discharging ship.

[Cited in Frates v. Howland, Case No. 5,066.]

11. Interest allowed from the filing of the libel.

[Cited in Frates v. Howland, Case No. 5,066.]

[In admiralty. Libel for seaman's wages by Bates against Seabury and others. Decree for libellant.]

The libellant was a boat-steerer of the ship Scotland, which sailed from New Bedford on the 20th of June, 1851, on a whaling voyage. After taking a considerable quantity of oil, he was, in the month of November, 1852, discharged, with his own consent, at Lahaina, in the Sandwich islands. The circumstances attending that discharge sufficiently appear in the opinion of the court. Some weeks after that discharge, the libellant shipped in the whale ship Orizimbo, at an advanced lay, and returned in her to New Bedford, in the spring of 1854. He then made a claim upon the owners of the Scotland, for his lay in that vessel. A suit was commenced, and settlement afterwards made by his proctor, in the absence of the libellant, and without any other authority from him than the retainer of the proctor. Upon this settlement, the proctor gave to the respondent a full discharge of all claims of the libellant. The grounds upon which that settlement was made are stated in the opinion of the court. Upon the libellant's return from another voyage, in 1857, he first learned of the settlement, and thereupon filed the present libel.

R. C. Pitman, for libellant, cited, upon the question of the basis of settlement, Hutchinson v. Coombs, [Case No. 6,955;] The Rovena, Id. 12,090;] as to the advance wages, Emerson v. Howland, [Id. 4,441;] Wells v. Meldrun, [Id. 17,402;] and to the authority of the proctor, Lewis v. Gamage, 1 Pick. 347; Jackson v. Bartlett, 8 Johns. 281; Wilson v. Wadleigh, 36 Me. 496; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 141; Betts, Pr. 10.

Wm. W. Crapo, for respondents, cited, as to the power of proctors, Ben. Adm. 188; Dunl. Adm. 105; The Frederick, 1 Hagg. Adm. 220; Mynn v. Robinson, 2 Hagg. Ecc. 169; The Whilelmine, 1 W. Rob. Adm. 340; Durant v. Durant, 2 Addams, Ecc. 267; The Harriett, [Case No. 6,096.]

SPRAGUE, District Judge. I have first to consider the agreement made at the time of the discharge. The libellant, a boat-steerer of the ship Scotland, was discharged, at a foreign port, upon payment of $5, and being released from what he owed to the ship. The terms upon which a seaman shall be discharged, before the completion of the voyage, are a matter of mutual agreement. A new contract is made in dissolution of the former. And such contract, or settlement, made by a seaman upon his discharge, will be binding on him, if he act freely, and be fairly dealt with. But, in this case, the seaman did not act freely. He was under a species of duress, and the agreement should not deprive him of what was actually due him. He had been treated with unjustifiable harshness, for a very trivial offence. The master, with language of violence and passion, had given orders to his mate to keep the libellant employed in duties not belonging to his office, nor suitable to his station, but which were degrading and humiliating. From the language and conduct of the master, he had good grounds to anticipate undeserved ill treatment, and for that reason he consented to his discharge, upon the terms prescribed by the master. Consent so given should not deprive him of what was actually due him at the time.

In regard to the subsequent settlement, in August, 1854, I have had some doubt. The rule at common law is well settled. An attorney has no power to compromise a claim that is left with him to prosecute. That is matter in the discretion of his client. A mere retainer gives no such power, but a special authority is often given. Have proctors in admiralty any greater authority in this respect? The citations made by the respondent's counsel give some countenance to the idea that proctors have the power he contends for. But I do not think they are sufficient to establish that doctrine. And not finding it established, I am not inclined to introduce it. It would be inconvenient, and not readily apprehended by clients. No one of the cases, or text-books cited, goes to the extent of saying that proctors may release the claim of their client, by receiving less than his due. They say that courts will not uphold settlements made behind the back of the seaman's proctor, under certain circumstances; also, that they are more satisfactory when made with the advice of the proctor, who is better situated to resist undue influence. All this is for the protection of seamen.

It is laid down by Judge Betts, in his Admiralty Practice, and by Mr. Benedict, in his treatise, that after a decree, the proctor cannot release the judgment for a part payment. This is an authority to the extent that, where a certain amount is known to be actually due to the client, the proctor has no authority to receive less, in full discharge. This applies in principle to the present case, there being here a certain amount really due. I am of opinion, that this settlement does not preclude the court from going behind it.

The mere fact of a settlement with the proctor is not, of itself, a sufficient defence. The court will go further, and inquire whether the settlement was such that it ought to be upheld.

In looking into this settlement, I think it proceeded on a manifest error. The proctor intended to receive all that the party could by law recover; he supposed that he had adopted a correct principle. The settlement really proceeds on a mistake. The basis of settlement was this: to allow the libellant his lay in the Scotland, his first ship, for her whole voyage, embracing as well the time after the libellant left the service of the ship, as that while he was on board of her, deducting therefrom what he had earned in the meantime in the Orizimbo. But as his lay on board of the Orizimbo was greater than his lay had been while on board of the Scotland, the result of this mode of settlement was to reduce the claim of the libellant below the sum which he had actually earned while on board the Scotland. This was an error. To that sum he was absolutely entitled. However great his earnings afterward, he would still be entitled to receive what was due him before. Another claim of the libellant, viz., for a wrongful discharge, stands on a different footing. That is a claim for damages consequent upon the discharge. Where such a claim is sustained, the court will give an indemnity; in ascertaining which, they will inquire what the libellant has suffered. If he has had to work or pay his passage home, then the court will pay him for his time and necessary expenses. All that he has lost in time, expenses, or suffering, by the wrongful discharge, he may recover. But if, in fact, he has immediately found another vessel, and earned full wages, then the court say, "You have not suffered any loss of time or wages." But this all goes to the question of damages. The antecedent wages are as much due as a promissory note; the libellant's success subsequent to this wrongful discharge, cannot extinguish or diminish that debt.

Considering, then, that the libellant's proctor had no authority to make the settlement, and that it proceeded upon an error, I must now give to the libellant what he ought, in law and justice, then to have received. In so doing, I shall take care that the respondents do not suffer from that settlement. I shall deduct the whole amount paid by them to the libellant's proctor. He was authorized to receive payment, and what he actually received is to be deemed payment pro tanto. That leaves the respondents in as good a situation as if that settlement had not been made.

As to the three months' wages, they were not taken into account in either of the settlements, but there is no sufficient answer to the claim. It is due by an absolute provision of the statute, [Act Aug. 18, 1856, § 26; 11 Stat. 62,] and the seaman may recover the portion that belongs to him, that is, two months' wages, in this suit.

There is a difficulty in fixing the rate at which his wages shall be estimated. The practice by consuls abroad, in the case of seamen of whale ships, has been to allow $12 per month; what it has been in the case of boat-steerers, or other officers, I do not know. In the present case, I see no better criterion than to take what his average earnings were per month; or, in other words, to extend his lay for two months. I do not mean to say that this rule would be applicable to all cases.

NOTE, [from original report.] After the delivery of the above opinion, objections being made by the libellant to certain items of the account furnished by the respondents, the court disallowed a charge of 2½ per cent. guaranty-commission on sales of oil, and the charges for fitting and discharging ship. The libellant claimed interest from the arrival of the Scotland; but the court only allowed it from the filing of this libel.

BATES, (UNITED STATES v.) See Cases Nos. 14,542–14,544.

BATES, (WHEELER v.) See Case No. 17,492.

BATES COUNTY, (HARSHMAN v.) See Case No. 6,148.

BATLEY, (COLE v.) See Case No. 2,977.

BATON ROUGE, (SPALDING v.) See Case No. 13,200.

Case No. 1,105.

BATTEN v. CLAYTON.

Circuit Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. Dec. Term, 1848.

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS—COMBINATION—NOVELTY—EVIDENCE—EXPERT WITNESS—PROVINCE OF COURT AND JURY—DISCLAIMER.

[1. Cited in 2 Whart. Dig. 408, to the point that a patent for a combination cannot be supported by evidence of novelty of one of its parts.]

[2. Cited in 2 Whart. Dig. 408, to the point that a combination, to be patentable, must effect a new result, or an old result by a new mode of action. There must be novelty either of product or of process.]

[3. Cited in 2 Whart. Dig. 409, to the point that the interpretation of the specification is for the court. Experts are examined only to aid in interpreting the language of art, as other translators are; and semble their evidence on this point is for the court, not the jury.]

[4. Cited in 2 Whart. Dig. 413, to the point that semble a patent under the act of 1836 is itself prima facie evidence of novelty and usefulness, and that plaintiff cannot give cumulative evidence on these points till they are controverted by defendant.]

[5. Cited in 2 Whart. Dig. 413, to the point that the seventh and ninth sections of the act of 1839, authorizing a disclaimer, do not apply where the patent is for combination of parts.]

[KANE, District Judge.]

[NOTE. This case has not been reported. It appears from the records of the circuit court of the United States for the eastern district of Pennsylvania that this was an action at law by Joseph Batten, patentee, and Samuel Batten, assignee, against Joseph Clayton and Enoch W. McGinnis, for infringement of letters patent. A nonsuit was awarded, subject to review by the court in banc on points presented. No further record of the case can be found.]

Case No. 1,106.

BATTEN v. SILLIMAN.

[3 Wall. Jr. 124.][1]

Circuit Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. Oct. Term, 1855.

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS —PRELIMINARY INJUNCTION BEFORE RIGHT ESTABLISHED AT LAW — IRREPARABLE INJURY.

1. Where an alleged infringement of a patented invention, consists in the use of some improvement in expensive machinery, which has been adopted in good faith by a defendant, and where the profit of the patentee consists not in the monopoly of selling his machine, but in the price of licenses given to others to use it; it being the interest of the patentee that all persons should use his improvement, provided they pay him his fee for a license; and the injury being, not in their using his invention, but in their not paying him for using it—this court, sitting in chancery—though it does not in such capacity necessarily act as auxiliary to a court of law, but may render a final decree on a patent—will not, before a right is established at law, grant a preliminary injunction except in a clear case; since it might ruin the defendant, without doing any corresponding benefit to the patentee; and since the main objects of an injunction can be obtained by making the defendant keep an account until the right is decided at law.

[See Morris v. Lowell Manuf'g Co., Case No. 9,833.]

2. The court distinguishes such a case as that just mentioned from the case of a medicine, for example, where the patentee's profit consists in a monopoly of sale, and the defendant has been at little or no expense, while his competition might be highly injurious to the complainant; and would refuse an injunction in the former case, when it might, perhaps, grant it in the latter.

In equity. This was an injunction bill filed by Batten, claiming to be the inventor of a machine—certain rollers for breaking and screening coal—against the defendant, Silliman, who, it was admitted, was using a machine similar in several respects to the one of which the complainant alleged himself to be the inventor. [Injunction denied.]

Most or all of the ordinary formal allegations (though not those usual in such bills, that the plaintiff had enjoyment and possession, and in consequence thereof had made sale of licenses or rights) were made in the bill; and it was further alleged that the validity of the patent had been tried at law, in this court, in three cases (one of them being Batten v. Taggert, reported in its conclusion, on a point of law, supra, [Case No. 1,107,] in which after ample preparation and numerous notices, no witness was produced or could be produced to impeach or disprove the originality of the invention; and that although these verdicts were afterwards set aside by the court, upon a technical question in no way affecting the originality of the invention, this decision was finally reversed in the supreme court of the United States, on error, and the patent sustained. See Battin v. Taggert, 17 How. [58 U. S.] 74.

Numerous ex parte affidavits were filed in behalf of the complainant, stating that the defendant had put into operation, and was still using, a machine constructed on the same plan and substantially like the machine described in the patent and bill of the complainant, of which patent, as these several deponents verily believe, the machine used by the defendant was an infringement.

The defendant, on the other hand, swore in his answer that he had a good defence both as to matter of law and matter of fact; that he was advised that the complainant never had such possession and enjoyment of the alleged invention as is required in applications of the sort now made by him; that he had never made sale of licenses, rights or interests in consequence thereof—a matter which, on an injunction bill, he ought, if he had so made sale, to aver,—but that on the contrary, machines substantially like the one described in his patent had been extensively and were still so used, and the complainant's right in almost all cases resisted or denied. The answer then went into a history of the suits alleged by the complainant to have been brought by him under his patent, and set forth some blunders and carelessness in his specifications at the patent office, and delays consequent thereon, and showed also that a much greater delay than was either indispensable or necessary had taken place on his part in urging trials at law of his rights; that in regard to these suits motions had been made by the defendant for continuances on the ground of evidence, the discovery of which was obtained at too late a period to be included in the notice of defence; but that these motions were unsuccessful, and that the causes were therefore submitted to the jury solely upon the question of damages; all evidence as to the want of novelty being excluded; and that the verdicts given for the plaintiff were given independently of any evidence on the point last mentioned; that moreover these verdicts were afterwards set aside and new trials granted in each case upon views of law applicable to the whole merits, and not, as the bill alleged, upon a mere technicality; that while, as the complainant alleged, it was true that on writs of error being taken by him, the decision of this court was reversed, yet, that the cases were remanded by the court above with directions to award a venire facias de novo; that no farther proceedings had been taken by the complainant in those actions at law; that notwithstanding the verdicts given, as mentioned by the complainant, in his favor, no judgments had ever been entered on them, and that therefore the complainant had failed to obtain a verdict and judgment, and that his right had in no wise been established by any legal proceedings, but on the contrary, was still unsettled and in dispute, and that the actions at law were still pending, and the defendants preparing to make defence in them.

[1] [Reported by John William Wallace, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

The answer alleged further that machines quite similar to that claimed by the complainant as his, had been extensively used for breaking coal before and since he obtained his patent; and that notwithstanding the granting of the patent, many such machines had been run and used by the workers of mines in consequence of the opinion generally entertained that the complainant, Batten, had no valid rights under such patent, also by reason of his apparent indifference in prosecuting such claims, together with his failure successfully to establish them in the suits in this court; and that the defendant believed and expected on a trial at law to prove an entire want of originality in the invention. The answer further stated that the defendant had not himself erected the machine now sought to be enjoined, but had bought it at Marshall's sale on an execution from this court, about five years ago, and had never any notice to desist from its use; and concluded with the allegations that he was competent to satisfy any damages which might be recovered against him by the complainant at law; that the breaking apparatus, its fixtures, &c., had cost him several thousand dollars; that he employs over one hundred operatives at his works, and that an injunction as prayed for, would produce great and irreparable damage to him.

The defendant on his side also, brought ex parte affidavits, to prove a want of originality in the complainant.

About two hundred machines which the complainant alleged were infringements of his patent, were in use in different places, in violation of his alleged rights. The patented machine formed but a small, though an important part of the combined machinery used for breaking coal; steam enginery and other apparatus, the cost of which is several thousand dollars, being requisite. The complainant did not desire an exclusive use of his machine; but desired to prevent the use of machines like it, except under his license; he being willing to let similar machines be used by others, they paying him one per cent. per ton of coal broken and screened upon them.

Mr. Porter and W. H. Rawle, for complainant.

Mr. Cadwalader, for defendant.

GRIER, Circuit Justice. The remedy by injunction in patent cases is given by courts of equity, on account of the insufficiency of that given by a court of law. It is in its nature preventive, where irreparable mischiefs are apprehended, or when the patentee is likely to be vexed by litigation and a multiplicity of suits against stubborn pirates of his invention. The circuit courts of the United States have original jurisdiction as courts of chancery in all patent cases. They do not act merely as auxiliary to courts of law, and may therefore render a final decree on a patent whose validity is contested, without sending the parties in law to try their rights. It is no reflection on juries or trial by jury to say that many disputes about the originality and infringement of patents depending upon complex mathematical calculations, upon a knowledge of the principles of chemical science, and of mechanical philosophy, cannot be satisfactorily decided by the verdict of twelve men, a majority, if not all of whom, have no knowledge or experience on the subjects they are called to decide on.

But while courts of equity will in some cases decide such questions on final hearing, without the assistance of courts of law, it does not follow that in every motion for preliminary injunction, the court will try and determine the whole case on ex parte affidavits, on five days' notice, like a court of "pied poudre."

In cases of waste, purpresture and nuisance, where the mischief done by their continuance till final hearing, may be irreparable; or where the injury or loss to the defendant by this interposition may not be of importance, or the delay in exercising his rights could be easily compensated; such preliminary interference may be necessary to the ends of justice, even where the equity of the bill is denied by the defendant. In the case of infringement of patents, such can seldom be the case, and such preliminary intervention can only be invoked in case of wanton and stubborn persistence in pirating an invention, the title to which has been clearly established either by trial at law, or by long and peaceable possession. Hence we have refused to grant a preliminary injunction where the defendant denies on oath either the originality of the invention or the infringement of the patent, leaving the decision of the question till final hearing. It must be a very strong case indeed, either of impending mischief to the complainant, or where the court, by having the machines or models before them, can see clearly that the defence set up is a mistake or a mere pretence, that the court will thus summarily interfere by granting execution before final judgment, where the defendant alleges under oath a valid defence, and denies the equity of the plaintiff.

There are cases, also, in which this preliminary injunction would cause irreparable injury to the defendant, with no corresponding benefit to the patentee.

Where the profits from a patented invention arise from a monopoly of the sale of the machine, medicine, or composition invented, and the competition of the defendant may be highly injurious to the established legal rights of the patentee, it may be a very proper exercise of the discretion of the chancellor to restrain the defendant from infringing till he has established his right, if he pretends to have any. But the case is very different where the supposed infringement consists in the use of some improvement in expensive machinery, which has been adopted in good faith by a defendant, and where the profit of the patentee consists, not in the monopoly of selling his machine, but in the price of licenses given to others to use it. In such a case it is the interest of the patentee that all persons should use his improvement, provided they pay him his fee for a license. The injury to him is not in using his invention, but in not paying for such use. It would be an abuse of the discretion of the court to stop a mill or furnace because it may have used some patented improvement in its machinery. It may ruin the defendant without any corresponding benefit whatever to the patentee. The only injury to him is the nonpayment of his license, which will be remedied by the final decree of the court, if the defendant shall be found a wrongdoer. The patent in this case is for certain rollers used in the machinery for breaking and screening anthracite coal; they form but a small, though important part of the combined machinery for the purpose. The steam engine and other apparatus necessary to the operation cost many thousands of dollars. The patentee has a fixed price for the use of his invention, one cent per ton. As between these parties alone, it is the interest of the complainant that the respondent should continue to use his invention, provided he pays the cent per ton. An injunction, by stopping the business of the defendant, may be ruinous to him. The only use to complainant would be an unjust one. It would deliver the defendant over to him with a rope around his neck, and compel him to accept any terms dictated by the patentee. The defendant has sworn to his belief that he has a good and sufficient defence. Witnesses have sworn that the patentee is not the original and first inventor of the machine. The defendant has a right to a hearing before he is condemned as a pirate or infringer of the complainant's rights. Yet the granting of this injunction would compel him to accept the complainant's terms, and buy his peace without a hearing. And not only so, but it is alleged, and not denied, that some two hundred others would be compelled to do the same.

"It seems to me," says Lord Cottenham, in Neilson v. Thompson, [Webst. Pat. Cas. 286,] "that stopping the works by injunction, under these circumstances, is just inverting the purpose for which an injunction is used. An injunction is used for preventing mischief; this would be using the injunction for the purpose of creating a mischief—because the plaintiff cannot possibly be injured. All that he asks, all that he demands, all that he ever expects, is one shilling per ton (and in this case, a cent per ton.) The injunction would be extremely prejudicial to the defendants, and do no possible good to the plaintiff, for the purpose for which it may be used. It may, by operating as a pressure upon the defendant, produce a benefit. But that is not the object of the writ. The object of the court is to preserve to each party the benefit he is entitled to, until the question of right is tried, and that may entirely be secured by the defendants undertaking to keep an account. If the plaintiff is entitled, the court will have an opportunity of putting him precisely in the position he would have stood in if this question had not arisen."

But it is contended that the court are bound to give the plaintiff the benefit of this interlocutory injunction, whatever use he may be disposed to make of it, because there has been a verdict of a jury establishing the validity of this patent, and a peaceable possession of the rights conferred by it.

Admitting the court would be justified for these reasons, to grant this motion, without any exercise of discretion founded on the reasons we have given, we do not think that these assertions are supported by the evidence. It is true there has been a verdict on a former trial between other parties. But that verdict was set aside by the court as contrary to law, and it moreover appears that the defence now offered to the validity of the patent, was not before the jury, nor passed upon by them. They were instructed by the court to assess the damages, without reference to any other question. In a subsequent trial, the same court decided against the validity of the patent, on questions of law, which were afterwards reversed by the supreme court. But in none of these trials did either the court or jury pass upon the defence, as to the originality of the plaintiff's invention, on the facts now submitted. The verdicts in the cases can therefore have neither a technical nor moral effect in the decision of the present motion.

Neither can the evidence of long possession benefit the plaintiff; for it has not existed.

On the contrary, after the decision of the circuit court against the validity of the plaintiff's patent, those who had previously agreed to pay the plaintiff for the use of his invention, have ceased to do so, and many others, acting in good faith, have used the invention in their coal breaking machines, in hostility and adverse to the plaintiff's claims. It has been admitted on the argument, that some two hundred machines are in use by persons who resist the claim of the patentee.

In every view I can take of the case, I think the granting of this motion would be an injudicious use of the discretion of the court, and wrong to the defendants, who, for anything that appears, may believe that they have an honest defence to this action, and are, therefore, entitled to full and final hearing before they are condemned.

If this motion were granted, they would be compelled to submit without a trial of their rights, which would be contrary to the first principles of practice, and an act of sheer tyranny in the court. Without intimating any opinion as to the validity of this patent, or the truth of the defence, the court must refuse this motion, with costs, and order an issue between the parties as to the validity of this patent, to be tried before a jury on the first Monday of April next.

Injunction refused, but defendant ordered to keep an account.

[NOTE. Patent No. 3,292 was granted to J. Batten October 6, 1843; reissued September 4, 1849, (No. 142.) For another case involving this patent, see Batten v. Taggert, Case No. 1,107.]

Case No. 1,107.

BATTEN v. TAGGERT.

[2 Wall. Jr. 101;[1] 8 Leg. Int. 126; 53 Jour. Fr. Inst. 96.]

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. Sept. 11, 1851.[2]

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS—DEDICATION OF AN INVENTION TO THE PUBLIC—SURRENDER AND REISSUE.

1. A description, by an applicant for a patent, of a machine in which he sets forth his invention to be for a combination of machinery, not giving notice that he claims any part as new, is a dedication of that part to the public.

[See note at end of case.]

2. After such part has passed into public use, the dedication cannot be revoked by surrender and re-issue of the patent, nor otherwise; neither the 13th section of the act of [July 4,] 1836, [5 Stat. 122,] nor the seventh section of the act of [March 3,] 1837, [5 Stat. 193,] relating to amending of patents, authorizing a new patent for an invention different from that originally patented.

[Disapproved in Hussey v. Bradley, Case No. 6,946. Cited in Smith v. Merriam, 6 Fed. 718.]

[See note at end of case.]

[At law. Action by Batten against Taggert for infringement of letters patent. Plaintiff heretofore had a verdict in his favor. Heard on defendant's motion for a new trial. Granted. Afterward, upon the new trial, defendant had judgment, but this was reversed by the supreme court in Battin v. Taggert, 17 How. (58 U. S.) 77. See note at end of case.]

Batten obtained a patent in 1843 for a machine, specifying his invention to be for the manner in which he had arranged and combined certain parts, and not specifying that he had invented any of the parts. In truth, he was the inventor of one or more of the parts. Accordingly in 1849, under the acts of congress hereafter quoted, he surrendered his patent of 1843, and took out a new one describing essentially the same machine as the former one did, but claiming as new a particular part. On this new patent he brought this suit, and having clearly shown great merit in his invention of this part, recovered heavy damages. A motion for a new trial was made, the strong ground for the new trial being that he had dedicated his invention to the public by his specification of 1843, not claiming it, and by making no claim of it otherwise until his specification of 1849.

One act of congress—July 4, 1836, § 13, [5 Stat. 122]—relating to patents, and above referred to, ordains, that whenever any patent shall be inoperative or invalid by reason of a defective or insufficient description or specification, or by reason of the patentee's claiming in his specification as his own invention more than he had a right to claim as new; if the error has arisen by inadvertency, accident or mistake, and without any fraudulent or deceptive intention, it shall be lawful for the commissioner, upon the surrender to him of such patent, to cause a new patent to be issued to the said inventor for the same invention. And another act—March 3, 1837, § 7, [5 Stat. 193]—ordains "that whenever any patentee shall have, through inadvertence, accident or mistake, made his specification of claim too broad, claiming more than that of which he was the original or first inventor, some material and substantial part of the thing patented being truly and justly his own, any such patentee may make disclaimer of such parts of the thing patented as the disclaimant shall not claim to hold by virtue of the patent or assignment, stating therein the extent of his interest in such patent. And such disclaimer shall thereafter be taken and considered as part of the original specification."

THE COURT, in an elaborate opinion by KANE, District Judge, held that the invention having been in use six years before Batten claimed it as his, had become public; and that having become public, he could not reclaim it by his patent of 1849; that the sections of the act of congress above quoted did not help his case; that the patentee under them might make his specification more accurate, or restrict the limits of his claim, but that his re-issued patent, taking the place of the one he had surrendered, could only be for the same invention. The invention of the part being very ingenious, the court reluctantly entered an order of

[1] [Reported by John William Wallace, Esq.]

[2] [The judgment rendered upon a subsequent trial of this cause was reversed in 17 How. (58 U. S.) 77.]

New trial granted.

[NOTE. Upon the new trial the defendant had judgment. This was reversed by the supreme court in Battin v. Taggert, 17 How. (58 U. S.) 77. Mr. Justice McLean, in the course of his opinion, said: "The plaintiff, by a surrender of that patent, and the procurement of the patent of 1849, with amended specifications, abandoned his first patent, and relied wholly on the one reissued. The claim and specifications in this patent, as amendatory of the first, were within the 13th section of the act of 1836. It is said with entire accuracy in the charge, in regard to the amended specification of the patent of 1849, that it 'described essentially the same machine as the former one did. but claimed, as the thing invented, the breaking apparatus only.' And this the patentee had a right to do. He had a right to restrict or enlarge his claim, so as to give it validity, and to effectuate his invention. * * * It was the right of the jury to determine from the facts in the case whether the specifications, including the claim, were so precise as to enable any person skilled in the structure of machines to make the one described. This the statute requires, and of this the jury are to judge. The jury are also to judge of the novelty of the invention. and whether the renewed patent is for the same invention as the original patent; and they are to determine whether the invention has been abandoned to the public. There are other questions of fact which come within the province of a jury, such as the identity of the machine used by the defendant with that of the plaintiff's, or whether they have been constructed and act on the same principle."

[For another case involving this patent, see Batten v. Silliman, Case No. 1,106.]

BATTEY, In re. See Case No. 14,169.

BATTIE v. TAGGERT. See Case No. 1,107.

Case No. 1,108.

BATTIN v. BIGELOW.

[Pet. C. C. 452.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. New Jersey. Oct. Term, 1817.

EJECTMENT—MESNE PROFITS—NOTICE TO DEFENDANT—ACKNOWLEDGMENT—AGE OF FEME COVERT—PRESUMPTION.

1. The plaintiff in an action of ejectment may recover mesne profits, on giving notice to the defendant that he means to proceed for them.

2. Where the certificate of a magistrate who took the privy examination of a feme covert, does not state that she was of the age of twenty-one years, the presumption is that the person examined was of full age until the contrary is shown by proof.

3. The grantor of land is presumed to be alive, until the contrary appear.

At law. Ejectment for five-ninths of a tract of land. Upon the death of Jacob Browning, who died seized of the tract of land in question, it descended to his three sons and three daughters. The title of the lessor of the plaintiff is derived under deeds from one of the sons, and from the daughters and their husbands. The plaintiff, after proving notice to the defendant that he should in this action claim mesne profits from the time of the demise laid in the declaration, proceeded to prove the value of the same.

It was objected by the defendant, that the plaintiff could not recover mesne profits in this action, or any thing more than nominal damages.

BY THE COURT. It is true, that in practice the plaintiff in ejectment only goes for nominal damages, and follows up his judgment in that action by an action of trespass to recover the value of the mesne profits. But if to avoid the expense of two actions, he chooses to proceed for mesne profits in the action of ejectment, there is no legal reason to prevent him from recovering them. The objection of surprise upon the defendant is removed by the notice to him that the mesne profits would be claimed.

The defendant acknowledged that he had no title at law, but he objected to the plaintiff's title on the following grounds: First, that the certificates of the magistrate who took the privy examination of the feme coverts, to two of the deeds under which the plaintiff claims title, do not state that they, the feme coverts, were of the age of twenty-one. Second, that the certificates do not state that the feme coverts acknowledged that they executed the deeds voluntarily, or that the examinations were taken privately. They merely state that they were examined apart from their husbands, and that they acknowledged that they executed the deeds freely, without any fear, threats, or compulsion of their husbands. Whereas the law of New Jersey requires, that the feme covert should acknowledge, on a private examination apart from her husband, that she executed the deed as her voluntary act, freely, &c.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice, delivered the opinion.

As to the first objection, there is nothing in it. The presumption is that the feme coverts were of full age, until the contrary is proved. It is a matter of defence if they were under age, and must be proved if the defendant would avail himself of the fact to defeat the conveyance.

As to the second objection, the court is of opinion that the omission of the word "voluntarily," is substantially supplied by the expressions that "she freely executed the deed, without the threats, &c. of her husband."

There is more difficulty in the other objection, and the court forbears giving an opinion upon it, being satisfied that, though upon a critical construction of the law, the examination must be private as well as apart from the husband, still the husbands were entitled to freehold estates in the lands of their wives and might convey the same without their wives, upon which titles the lessor of the plaintiff may recover in this ejectment. It is true that no evidence was given that the husbands are still living, but this must be presumed till the contrary is proved.

[1] [Reported by Richard Peters, Jr., Esq.]

The jury found a verdict for five-ninths of the land, and the mesne profits in damages. An exception was taken to the last opinion.

BATTIN v. TAGGERT. See Case No. 1,107.

BATTISTE, (UNITED STATES v.) See Case No. 14,545.

Case No. 1,109.

BATTLE v. MUTUAL LIFE INS. CO.

[10 Blatchf. 417.] [1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Feb. 12, 1873.

EQUITY—PLEADING—AMENDMENT—ADMISSIONS IN ANSWER.

1. A plaintiff, in a suit in equity, can recover only upon the case made by his bill, and not upon that made in the evidence.

2. An admission in the answer will be of no use to the plaintiff, unless it is put in issue by some charge in the bill.

3. On final hearing, the court announced, that, on the pleadings and proofs, as they stood, it was impossible to grant to the plaintiff the relief prayed for. The plaintiff then moved for leave to amend the bill. It appearing, that, by making the amendments proposed, the bill and the answer would agree in their statements, in the particulars covered by such amendments; that the evidence and the answer made out a case for relief to the plaintiff, but a case different from the one stated in the bill; that the purposes of substantial justice required that the amendments should be made; that the amendments did not change the subject matter of the bill; and that no decree had been passed: Held, that the motion ought to be granted, on payment of costs.

[Cited in Hardin v. Boyd, 113 U. S. 765, 5 Sup. Ct. 775; Maynard v. Tilden, 28 Fed. 703.]

4. Held, also, that, although some testimony on the part of the plaintiff might be in conflict with the amendments, yet, as the amendments harmonized with the allegations of the answer, and such testimony was not testimony sustaining the allegations of the answer, the point was immaterial.

5. The case of Neale v. Neale, 9 Wall. [76 U. S.] 1, commented on, and held to warrant the allowance of such amendments.

[In equity. Bill by Madeline C. Battle against the Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York. Heard on complainant's motion for leave to amend. Granted.]

Charles F. Sanford, for plaintiff.

Henry E. Davies, for defendants.

[1] [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, District judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. It is a well settled rule, in a suit in equity, that the plaintiff can recover only upon the case made by his bill, and not upon that made in the evidence. It is equally well established, that, if an admission is made in the answer, it will be of no use to the plaintiff unless it is put in issue by some charge in the bill. Hence, the plaintiff is frequently obliged to ask leave to amend his bill, although a clear case for relief is apparent upon the face of the pleadings. Thus, where a bill against an executor prays an account of the personal estate of the testator, on the ground that the executor has received assets, but does not charge any acts of mismanagement in the executor, no decree for an account can be had as to acts of mismanagement, although the answer discloses such acts, and shows that, in consequence of them, no assets were received. The reason is, that such matter is not matter in issue. Story, Eq. Pl. (8th Ed.) §§ 262a, 264.

In the present case, the answer admits and avers that the plaintiff duly made payment of the premiums on the policies in question in each year to and including the year 1861, (such payments for the year 1861 falling due on the 21st of May in that year. It also avers, that the appointment of McCoy, as agent of the defendants at Mobile, was revoked by the defendants on the 26th March, 1861; that notice thereof was given to McCoy and to the plaintiff; and that, since that date, the defendants have had no agent in the state of Alabama. The substance and effect of the allegations in the answer is, that the plaintiff had notice of the revocation of March 26th, 1861, whenever, after that date, she made, or attempted to make any payment of premium to McCoy, as agent of the defendants. There is, moreover, a distinct allegation, in the answer, that if the plaintiff, after the 26th of March, 1861, made any payments to McCoy, as the agent of the defendants, she made the same in her own wrong, with full knowledge that he had no power or authority to receive the same, or to act as such agent. Yet the answer admits that the plaintiff paid the premiums due May 21st, 1861. The bill avers that such payment was made to the defendants through McCoy, as their agent. The answer avers that such payment was made to the defendants by the plaintiff through McCoy, and that the defendants received the money from McCoy as the agent of the plaintiff.

The bill avers the due payment of premiums, by the plaintiff, to the defendants, through McCoy, as their agent, for the years 1862, 1863 and 1864. At the hearing, the counsel for the plaintiff stated that the plaintiff desired to abandon the position of the bill, that there was any payment of premiums made by her after the payment of 1861, and to accept the position of the answer, that the appointment of McCoy, as agent, was revoked in March, 1861, and that she had notice of such revocation, and, consequently, to admit, that no payment made to McCoy after the payment of 1861 was a valid payment to the defendants, and to claim the benefit of all the legal consequences flowing from such revocation and notice. But the court found it impossible, consistently with the principles before stated, to allow the plaintiff to take such a course, on the allegations found in the bill, for the reason, that the bill avers, that the plaintiff paid, through McCoy, as the agent of the defendants, on the 21st of May in each of the years 1862, 1863 and 1864, the premiums due on those days; that, on the 21st of May, 1865, she did not pay the premium then payable, because the agency of McCoy, as she was informed and believed, had been theretofore revoked, and no one had been appointed in his place; that the defendants pretend that the agency of McCoy was revoked on or before the 21st of May, 1862; that the contrary of such pretence is true; that she had no notice of any such revocation; and that she dealt with McCoy, as such agent, in good faith. The purport of these allegations is, that the payment for 1862, through McCoy, was valid, because his agency was not revoked on or before the 21st of May, 1862; that she had no notice, before that date, of any such revocation; that she dealt with McCoy, as the defendants' agent, in good faith, in paying the premiums due in 1863 and 1864 as well as in 1862; and that she failed to pay the premium due May 21st, 1865, because the agency of McCoy, as she had by that time been informed, had been before that time revoked, and there was no agent in his place. In other words, it is substantially alleged, in the bill, that the agency of McCoy was not revoked on or before the 21st of May, 1864, but was revoked before the 21st of May, 1865, and the plaintiff was informed thereof by the latter day; that the plaintiff made due payment, through McCoy, as the defendants' agent, for the years 1862, 1863 and 1864; and that such revocation and information, and the fact that there was no new agent in McCoy's place, was the reason why the plaintiff did not pay through McCoy, or through any agent of the defendants in Mobile, the premiums due May 21st, 1865.

The allegations of the answer, of which the plaintiff desired to take advantage as admissions, could not be regarded as admissions, because they were not alleged, as facts, in the bill. On the contrary, facts inconsistent with them were alleged in the bill to be facts of the case. The court, on the pleadings and the evidence, found it impossible not to say, that, as respected the plaintiff, the agency of McCoy, as agent of the defendants at Mobile, continued until after the 21st of May, 1863; that she could have made payment to him there of the premiums due on that day; and that, she having failed to do so, there was a default on her part in complying with the conditions of the policies, whereby they were forfeited. The court, therefore, announced, that, on the pleadings and proofs as they stood, it was impossible to grant to the plaintiff the relief prayed for.

The plaintiff now moves for leave to make sundry amendments to the bill, alleging, on affidavit, that the bill is in error in stating that she paid, through McCoy, the premiums for 1862, 1863 and 1864, and that the amendments which she desires to make accord with the admissions and averments of the answer, and with the facts of the case, and with the proofs heretofore taken in the cause.

The first three amendments proposed are these: The bill alleges that the plaintiff, "until the 21st day of May, in the year 1865," paid to the defendants, through McCoy, their duly authorized agent, the premiums as they became due, and so paid in each of the years 1862, 1863, and 1864, the sum of $403, making, with previous payments, a total of $4,836. By the amendments proposed, the bill will allege, that the plaintiff, "until the 21st day of May, in the year 1862," paid to the defendants, through McCoy, their duly authorized agent, the premiums as they became due, making an aggregate of payments, of $3,627. The answer alleges, that the premiums were paid until and including those for 1861, and that none were paid after those for 1[illegible]. It is true, that the answer, while admitting that McCoy was the agent of the defendants at Mobile, for certain purposes, from 1853, until March, 1861, and that he received from the plaintiff and forwarded to the defendants, the premiums she paid, from and including 1853, to and including the premiums due May 21st, 1861, avers that, in receiving and forwarding such premiums, he acted as the agent of the plaintiff. But, as the bill, with such three proposed amendments, and the answer, will agree in the statement that the plaintiff paid, and the defendants received, the premiums payable until and including those for 1861, and none after those for 1861, the question as to how those acknowledged payments were made, becomes immaterial. The bill and the answer will agree in the only statement that is material.

The next amendment proposed is this: The bill alleges that the plaintiff, on the "21st of May, 1865," and thereafter, was ready to pay all premiums as they became due, but that she did not, on or after the "21st of May, 1865," pay any of such premiums, because the agency of McCoy, as she was informed and believed, had been theretofore revoked, and no one had been appointed in his place. By the amendments proposed, the bill will allege, that the plaintiff, on the "21st of May, 1862," and thereafter, was ready to pay all premiums as they became due, but that she did not, on or after the "21st of May, 1862," pay any of such premiums, because the agency of McCoy, as she was informed and believed, had been theretofore revoked, and no one had been appointed in his place. The answer alleges, that the defendants, on the 26th of March, 1861, revoked the agency of McCoy, and gave notice thereof to him and to the plaintiff, and that if she, after that date, made any payments to him, as the agent of the defendants, she made the same in her own wrong, with full knowledge that he had no power or authority to receive the same, or to act as such agent. The defendants, in the answer, acknowledge the receipt of the premiums of 1861, through McCoy, not as the agent of the defendants, but as the agent of the plaintiff. The bill, with this proposed amendment, and the answer, will, therefore, agree in the statement that before the time for making the payments due May 21st, 1862, came around, the agency of McCoy had been revoked by the defendants, and notice thereof had been given to the plaintiff.

The next amendment proposed is this: The bill alleges, that the defendants pretend that the agency of McCoy had been revoked by them on or before the 21st of May, 1862. By the amendment proposed, the bill will allege, that the defendants pretend that the agency of McCoy had been revoked by them on or before the 21st of May, 1861. The answer, as before shown, alleges, that the agency of McCoy had been revoked by the defendants on the 26th of March, 1861. The bill, with this proposed amendment, and the answer, will, therefore, agree in the statement, that the defendants pretend that the agency was revoked on or before the 21st of May, 1861. The bill will then, if the above amendment is allowed, go on to say, that it is not true that the agency of McCoy was revoked on or before the 21st of May, 1861. One object of such amendment appears to be, to have the bill thus aver, that the agency of McCoy continued until after the 21st of May, 1861, so as to make valid the payments, through McCoy, of the premiums due on that day. As before stated, such averment is not material for such purpose. In this connection, the bill is further proposed to be amended, so as to deny that the plaintiff had any notice, until after the 21st of May, 1861, of any revocation made on or before the 21st of May, 1861. One object of this amendment appears to be, to have the bill deny any notice of any revocation of the agency of McCoy, which could invalidate the payments, through McCoy, of the premiums due May 21st, 1861. But, as before stated, such a denial is not material for such purpose. But, there is a point of view in which the last named two proposed amendments are material. The bill now avers, that it is not true that the agency of McCoy was revoked by the defendants on or before the 21st of May, 1862, and denies that the plaintiff had any notice of any such revocation. Changing this to an averment that it is not true that the agency of McCoy was revoked by the defendants on or before the 21st of May, 1861, and to a denial that the plaintiff had any notice of any such revocation until after the 21st of May, 1861, is a necessary change, so far as concerns the making the bill no longer aver that it is not true that the agency was revoked on or before the 21st of May, 1862, and the making it no longer deny that the plaintiff had any notice of such revocation, because, one of the previous amendments will have made the bill aver, that, on the 21st of May, 1862, the agency of McCoy, as the plaintiff was informed and believed, had been theretofore revoked. Such object will be effected by the statement, that the agency was not revoked on or before the 21st of May, 1861, and by the denial that the plaintiff had any notice of any such revocation until after the 21st of May, 1861. These two amendments, therefore, will be consistent with the other amendments, and with the allegations of the answer.

It is strenuously insisted, on the part of the defendants, that no case can be found where a plaintiff in an equity suit has been allowed to amend the bill at the stage of the cause which has been reached in this suit. But I understand the decision of the supreme court in Neale v. Neale, 9 Wall. [76 U. S.] 1, as fully warranting the allowance of the amendments now asked for. In that case, a bill was filed by a husband and his wife, against the father of the husband, alleging a promise by the father to give to the son or to his wife, a lot of land, so that a house might be erected on it, with her money, for their home, and the erection of the house with her money, and the refusal of the father to give a deed of the house and lot to her, and his occupation and possession of the same, and praying that he might make such deed to her and her heirs, or to some one in trust for her and their benefit, and account for the rents. The evidence showed a promise to give the lot to the wife, so that a house might be built on it with her money, and the erection of the house on the lot with her money, with the consent of the father, and on the faith of such promise; and the answer, in substance, set forth that state of facts. The case was heard, and, after hearing it, and after considering the proceedings, the court, of its own motion, and without assigning any reason, ordered that the plaintiffs have leave to amend their bill, on payment of costs. The bill was amended, so as to allege, that the father promised to give the lot to the wife, on the understanding that her money should be expended in building a dwelling house on it for herself and her heirs. On the amended pleadings, and on substantially the original evidence, the case was heard again, and a decree made, that the father should make a deed to a trustee, of the house and lot, for the sole use and benefit of the son's wife, and account for the rents since the filing of the bill. It is apparent, that the court considered that, although the answer and the evidence showed a case for relief, in favor of the wife, the relief prayed for could not be given on the bill as originally framed. The court considered the proofs, on the pleadings as they were, and made a decision, that, on the bill as it was, the relief asked could not be given. But, instead of entering a decree to that effect, it gave the plaintiffs, without a motion to that effect by the plaintiffs, leave to amend the bill. The defendant appealed from the decree of the supreme court, and it was there urged, for him, that the bill could not be amended, after publication had passed, and the case had been set down for hearing, in any other respect than by making new parties; that the original bill recognized the marital rights of the husband, and the amended bill set up a claim adverse to such marital rights; and that this changed the framework of the bill and made a new case. On this point, in its decision, the supreme court say: "It would seem clear, from the manner in which the court below, of its motion, and without assigning any reasons for this action, gave the complainants leave to amend their bill, that, on the original hearing, it was satisfied that the evidence made out a case for relief, but a case different from the one stated in the bill; and that, as the pleadings must correspond with the evidence, it was necessary either to dismiss the bill without prejudice, or to give the leave to amend. The court adopted the latter alternative, doubtless, with a view to save expense to the parties, and because such a course could not, by any possibility, work any harm to the defendant. It is insisted that this proceeding was erroneous; that, after a cause has been heard, the power of allowing amendments ceases, or, if it exists at all, cannot go so far as to authorize a plaintiff to change the framework of his bill, and make an entirely new case, although on the same subject matter, as, it is contended, was done in this instance, under the leave to amend. This doctrine would deny to a court of equity the power to grant amendments after the cause was heard and before decree was passed, no matter how manifest it was that the purposes of substantial justice required it, and would, if sanctioned, frequently embarrass the court in its efforts to adjust the proper mode and measure of relief. To accomplish the object for which a court of equity was created, it has the power to adapt its proceedings to the exigency of each particular case, but this power would very often be ineffectual for the purpose, unless it also possessed the additional power, after a cause was heard and a case for relief made out, but not the case disclosed by the bill, to allow an alteration of the pleadings on terms, that the party not in fault would have no reasonable ground to object to. That the court has this power and can, upon hearing the cause, if unable to do complete justice by reason of defective pleadings, permit amendments, both of bills and answers, is sustained by the authorities. Necessarily, in a federal tribunal, the matter of amendment, at this stage of the progress of a cause, rests in the sound discretion of the court. At an earlier stage, this discretion is controlled by the rules of equity practice adopted by this court, but not so upon the hearing, for there is no rule on the subject of amendments, applicable to a cause which has advanced to this point. As, therefore, the leave to amend, in this instance, was within the discretion of the court, we will proceed to dispose of the case on its merits. It is unnecessary, in the view we have taken of the power of the court over amendments at the hearing, to discuss the question whether the amended bill is materially different from the original bill. It is enough to know, if different, that the subject matter of both bills is the same, and that the contract, consideration, promise, and acts of part performance, stated in the amended bill, are stated with sufficient precision, and, if supported by proof, entitle the complainants to the relief which they seek at the hands of a court of equity." The court then, on the merits, affirm the decree.

In the present case, I was satisfied, on the hearing, that the evidence and the answer made out a case for relief to the plaintiff, but a case different from the one stated in the bill, and that the case was a proper one for an amendment of the bill. I did not grant the leave to amend at once, but left the plaintiff to move for such leave, and to suggest the amendments desired. I only stated that I could not, on the pleadings and proofs as they stood, grant to the plaintiff the relief prayed for, and I pointed out the difference between the allegations of the bill in the Hamilton case and the bill in this case, in reference to the facts attending the revocation of McCoy's agency, and the correspondence between the averments of the answer in the Hamilton case and the answer in this case, as to such facts, and the fact that the parties agreed, in their pleadings, in the Hamilton case, as to such facts, and that they did not agree, in their pleadings, in this case, as to such facts. The power of the court now to grant leave to make the amendments is none the less than if it had granted such leave at the hearing, and of its own motion. The purposes of substantial justice require that the amendments shall be made. The amendments do not change the subject matter of the bill, and no decree has been passed.

It is urged, that the proposed amendments are in conflict with the testimony on the part of the plaintiff; and that the plaintiff proved that premiums on the policies were paid to McCoy, at Mobile, on the 6th of May, 1862, and on the 30th of May, 1863, and also proved that she, or her agents, dealt with him as the agent of the defendants, and that he acted as such down to and including May 30th, 1863. The witness who made the payments at Mobile in 1861, 1862 and 1863 states, that he made them to McCoy, "then residing:

in Mobile, and acting as the agent of the company;" that the witness made such payments on account of the plaintiff's husband, (the moneys to pay them having been, as is shown, furnished by the latter;) and that the witness made the payments supposing that McCoy was the agent of the defendants, as he had been so for many years, and the witness had no knowledge of any change of affairs. This evidence was given under an averment in the bill that McCoy continued to be the agent of the defendants until after the alleged payment of 1864 was made, and, in the absence of proof that the letter of revocation was received by McCoy, or that the plaintiff had notice of such revocation, such evidence tended to prove such averment. An allegation that the agency terminated before May 21st, 1862, is, of course, in conflict with an allegation that it continued until after May 21st, 1864, and evidence to support the latter allegation is, of course, in conflict with the former allegation. But, as the amendments to the bill will perfectly harmonize with the allegations of the answer, it is of no consequence to the defendants that some testimony on the part of the plaintiff may be in conflict with the amendments. If the testimony referred to had been testimony sustaining the allegations of the answer, there might, perhaps, be some force in the objection. But, the answer maintains throughout that the agency terminated, with notice of the revocation to the plaintiff, before the payment of 1862 was due, and none of the testimony referred to, given on the part of the plaintiff, tends to sustain such averment of the answer.

As the case falls directly within the principle of the decision in Neale v. Neale, [9 Wall. (76 U. S.) 1,] I must grant leave to make the amendments, on payment of costs.

Case No. 1,110.

BATTLES v. MILLER.

[3 Cranch, C. C. 296.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May Term, 1828.

SLAVERY—IMPORTATION INTO DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

If a citizen of Virginia, the owner of a slave there, who had resided in Virginia three whole years, remove into the county of Washington with the bona fide intention to settle therein, and bring the slave with him, at the time of his removal or within one year thereafter, to reside in the said county, such importation is not contrary to law; but a sale of such slave, in the said county, within three years after such importation, may entitle him to his freedom; although such sale be made to a person residing out of the District of Columbia, and in a state wherein slaves are lawfully held, and intending to take the said slave out of the District of Columbia to the place of the purchaser's residence, and with that intent removing him from Washington to Alexandria, where he ran away and came to Washington and the sale was by mutual consent rescinded; and although the sale, (commenced in Washington,) was not consummated till the removal of the slave to Alexandria; and although the agreement for the sale was made in Alexandria, out of the county of Washington, and was not to be complete till the slave should be delivered by the seller to the purchaser at Alexandria, where the delivery, in fact took place; and although the agreement for the sale was made at Alexandria, out of the county of Washington, and was completed at Alexandria by the delivery of the slave, from the vendor to the vendee, there.

Petition for freedom [by the negro John Battles against Miller.]

Upon the trial, the defendant's counsel, Mr. Ashton and Mr. Jones, after stating the evidence, prayed the court to instruct the jury,

1. That if they should be of opinion, from the evidence, that James Richard Miller was a citizen of the United States, and came into the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia, with the bona fide intention of settling therein, and imported or brought into the said county, at the time of his removal into the said county, or within one year thereafter, the petitioner, to reside in the said county, and that the said petitioner was the property of the said James Richard Miller at the time of his said removal; and that the petitioner was at the time of his said owner's removal a slave who had resided in the state of Virginia, one of the United States, for three whole years next before such removal, then, and in such case, the petitioner was not imported, or brought into the said county, contrary to law.

Which instruction THE COURT gave as prayed.

2. The defendant's counsel then further prayed the court to instruct the jury, that if they should be of opinion from the evidence, that the petitioner was imported or brought into the said county, under the circumstances and in the manner aforesaid, then the subsequent sale of him by his said master, although within the county of Washington, and within three years next ensuing the time of such removal, would not entitle the petitioner to his freedom.

Which instruction THE COURT refused to give.

3. The defendant's counsel then prayed the court to instruct the jury, that if they should find, from the evidence, that the said sale was made to a person residing out of the District of Columbia, and in a state where slaves were lawfully held; and that the immediate and known intent and purpose of the purchaser, in making the said sale, were to take the said slave out of the said district to the place of the purchaser's residence; and that he did immediately, and in fulfilment of such original intent and purpose, remove the said slave from Washington to Alexandria, on his way to his ultimate destination; that the said slave, after being so purchased and removed to Alexandria, was never brought back, by his owner, to Washington; but while temporarily detained in Alexandria till the said purchaser was ready to proceed on his journey, absconded and returned to Washington of his own accord, and that the sale was then rescinded by agreement of parties, then the petitioner did not become entitled to his freedom in virtue of such sale.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

Which instruction was also refused by THE COURT.

4. The defendant's counsel, then, further prayed the court to instruct the jury, that if the said sale was not, in the opinion of the jury, from the evidence, consummated till the removal of the petitioner to Alexandria as aforesaid, though the treaty for the sale commenced before, then the petitioner became not entitled to freedom in virtue of such sale.

Which instruction was also refused by THE COURT.

5. Whereupon the defendant's counsel further prayed the court to instruct the jury, that if they should find, from the evidence, that the agreement for the said sale was made at Alexandria, out of the county of Washington, that in the terms of the said agreement the sale was not to be complete till the petitioner should be delivered by the seller to the purchaser at Alexandria, and that such delivery in fact took place there, then such sale and delivery do not entitle the petitioner to freedom.

Which instruction THE COURT also refused to give.

6. Whereupon the defendant's counsel further prayed the court to instruct the jury, that if they find from the evidence, that the agreement for the said sale was made at Alexandria, out of the county of Washington, and was completed at Alexandria by the delivery of the slave from the vendor to the vendee, there, the said sale is not competent to entitle him to his freedom.

Which instruction THE COURT also refused to give.

In all these opinions, except the last, the judges concurred. In the last THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, did not concur.

Upon the point that the sale within three years entitled the prisoner to freedom, THE COURT referred to the case of Dunbar v. Ball, [Case No. 4,128,] as conclusive. They also referred to Jordan v. Sawyer, [Id. 7,521.]

CRANCH, Chief Judge, was of opinion that if the slave was sold by the importer within the three years, the importer is not protected by the 2d section of the act of 1796, c. 67, from the prohibition contained in the first section. The 1st section contains the general principle—the prohibition to import slaves. The 2d section contains the exception in favor of those who come to reside. The 3d section is an exception to the second. If the case be within the 3d section, it is not within the 2d, and if not within the 2d it is within the first. He was also of opinion that it was immaterial whether the sale was made in or out of the county of Washington. Verdict for the petitioner.

Case No. 1,111.

BAUBIE v. AETNA INS. CO.

[2 Dill. 156.][1]

Circuit Court, E. D. Missouri. 1873.

INSURANCE—POWER OF LOCAL AGENTS—VERBAL CONTRACT TO RENEW INSURANCE.

A local agent of a foreign insurance company, empowered to solicit insurance, receive premiums, and to issue and deliver policies, has, in favor of third persons dealing with him in good faith, and without notice of any restriction on his authority, power to bind the company by parol as well as by written contracts for insurance, and may thus bind it by a parol contract to renew the policy from time to time during the plaintiff's ownership of the property.

At law. This is an action to recover the sum of $4,000, which the plaintiff alleges the defendant had verbally agreed to insure upon a hotel building, at Cameron, in this state, of which property the plaintiff held the title in trust. [Judgment for plaintiff.]

The principal question of fact controverted on the trial was whether there was any such contract subsisting between, and binding upon, the parties at the time the building was consumed by fire. The company denied that in point of fact any such contract was made by its agent, and denied, also, if its agent undertook to make such a contract, that he had any power or authority to bind the company thereby. It was admitted, or not controverted, that the local agent of the defendant for that part of Missouri where the property in question was situate, was, in 1869 and the early part of 1870, one McMichael, who resided at Plattsburg, and not at Cameron. It appears he was entrusted with blank policies, signed by the officers of the company, and was empowered to fill up and deliver such policies without first consulting the company. He was the company's agent for taking risks and making insurances within the district above referred to. It is also an admitted fact that on the first day of May. 1869, the company, through McMichael, did issue a policy of insurance, in writing, to the plaintiff, for $4,000, for six months, on the hotel building in question; that when this six months expired the policy was renewed for another term of six months; that there was no written renewal after that; and the property was destroyed by fire on or about June 21, 1870. The jury were instructed by the circuit judge as appears below.

Hitchcock, Lubke & Player, for plaintiff.
Mr. Clover and Mr. Eaton, for the company.

Before DILLON, Circuit Judge, and TREAT, District Judge.

[1] [Reported by Hon. John F. Dillon, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

DILLON, Circuit Judge. I. The plaintiff seeks to recover in this action not upon a written policy, but by virtue of an alleged parol or verbal contract, which he claims was made at the time the first policy was issued, to the effect that while the plaintiff continued to hold the title to the property, as trustee, the company would keep the same constantly insured, by renewing the policy at the expiration of every six months and drawing on plaintiff (who resides at a different place from the agent of the company) for the premium, unless notified by the plaintiff to the contrary before the expiration of any period of six months.

This contract being denied by the defendant, the burden of proof is on the plaintiff to establish its existence.

And in view of the fact that contracts of insurance are almost universally reduced to writing, and especially in view of the indefinite duration of the engagement which the plaintiff asserts the company made, we feel it our duty to say that not only is the burden upon plaintiff to establish the existence of the contract he sets up, but to make clear, precise, and satisfactory, proof of it. Bear in mind that it is a contract—that is, a definite and completed agreement, which the plaintiff alleges and must prove; a contract, binding upon both parties, and subsisting between them at the time of the loss, and which bound the plaintiff to pay the premium had the loss not happened, as well as bound the defendant to pay the amount insured if the loss did happen. Conversations or negotiations about expecting to renew during the period of the plaintiff's ownership, not resulting in a definite agreement, are not binding. It must be a concluded contract subsisting between and binding both parties which must be established. If you find from the evidence that the only agreement which the agent made was to make one renewal, to-wit: in November, 1869, and did not agree to continue to renew, without request, after that, then you should find for the defendant.

II. But if you find from the evidence that the contract set up by the plaintiff has been established as one which was, in fact, entered into between the local agent of the defendant and the plaintiff, then the next question to be considered is, whether the agent of the defendant had authority to bind the company by such a contract.

Now, in law, as settled by the supreme court of the United States, the powers of an insurance agent are presumed to be co-extensive with the business entrusted to his care, and will not be narrowed by limitations not communicated to the person with whom he deals. An insurance company establishing a local agency is held responsible to the parties with whom they transact business for the acts and declarations of the agent within the scope of his employment, as if they proceeded from the principal. Union Mut. Ins. Co. v. Wilkinson, 13 Wall. [80 U. S.] 222, 235.

We instruct you on this subject, that if the agent of the defendant, McMichael, was empowered to transact the business of insurance for it at his local agency, to solicit insurance, to receive premiums, to issue and deliver policies, then he would, in favor of third persons dealing with him in good faith, have authority to bind the company by parol contracts as well as by written contracts for insurance, unless notice of restrictions on his power in this respect is brought home to the persons dealing with him; and under these circumstances, and with these limitations, he would have authority to make (if he in fact did make, of which you are to judge from the evidence), such a contract as the plaintiff alleges, and such contract, if made, would be binding upon the company.

Judgment for plaintiff.

NOTE, [from original report.] There was a verdict for the plaintiff and judgment upon it. A bill of exceptions was signed. It has been decided by the court of appeals of New York that an agreement to the effect that until notice by the one party to the other, a fire policy of insurance shall be renewed from year to year, is not within the statute of frauds, and may be by parol. Trustees of Baptist Church v. Brooklyn Fire Ins. Co., 19 N. Y. 305, 28 N. Y. 153, reversing 18 Barb. 69. Parol contracts for insurance, see Hening v. United States Ins. Co., [Case No. 6,366;] Taylor v. Germania Ins. Co., [Id. 13,793.] Power of local insurance agents to act for and bind the company: Union Mut. Ins. Co. v. Wilkinson, 13 Wall. [80 U. S.] 222; Geib v. International Ins. Co., [Case No. 5,298.]

BAUDIN, (MORAN v.) See Case No. 9,785.

Case No. 1,112.

BAUDUY et al. v. UNION INS. CO.

[2 Wash. C. C. 391.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. Oct. Term, 1809.

MARINE INSURANCE—FRAUD—CONCEALMENT—TRADE WITH BELLIGERENT COUNTRY.

An insurance was made by R., a citizen of the United States, and a resident merchant of Philadelphia, on specie, from Cape Francois to Philadelphia, with a warranty of neutrality. Upon the happening of a loss, R. received from the defendants nineteen hundred and ninety-seven dollars, the amount of the specie shipped; but finding that of this sum, only eleven hundred and fifty-two dollars were his property, he returned the balance to the defendants, against whom afterwards the plaintiffs, resident merchants at Cape Francois, brought this suit for the money so returned by R. The plaintiffs being persons established, and carrying on trade in a belligerent country, cannot recover against the defendants, even if the insurance had been made for their account, as there was no disclosure of their belligerent character, at the time of the insurance, which was so obviously material, as to avoid the policy.

[1] [Originally published from the MSS. of Hon. Bushrod Washington, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, under the supervision of Richard Peters, Jr., Esq.]

[At law. Action by Peter Bauduy & Co. against the Union Insurance Company. Verdict for defendants.]

Mr. Ralston of Philadelphia, having consigned to the house of Peter Bauduy & Co., established at Cape Francois, two cargoes, on account of which he had received some remittances, but without account of sales, received a letter from a Mr. Hogan of the Cape, informing him that he had shipped, on his account, three thousand dollars in specie, in a certain vessel, for his government in making insurance. Ralston, not knowing on what account this shipment was made, and suspecting that the intention was to cover property in his name, determined not to insure it. But soon after, meeting with Peter Bauduy, one of the partners, residing in the state of Delaware, the said Bauduy informed him that Hogan was an agent for the house of Peter Bauduy & Co.; and he presumed that the three thousand dollars were the proceeds of the cargoes, which he, Ralston, had consigned to that house. Upon this, Ralston insured this money with the defendants, in his own name, and in the name of all persons concerned, (as usual,) with a warranty that the property was neutral. Only nineteen hundred and ninety-seven dollars were put on board, and the vessel was captured, and the cargo condemned at Jamaica. On notice of the loss, Ralston applied to the defendants for payment, and received from them the sum shipped and the policy was cancelled. Some time afterwards, Ralston was put into possession of the books of Peter Bauduy & Co., and then found, from the account of sales of his cargoes, that only eleven hundred and fifty-two dollars of this money belonged to him; upon which he repaid to the defendants, the balance of what he had received from them. This suit was brought to recover the sum so repaid, upon the ground that it was the property of the plaintiffs, and was covered by the policy. It was admitted, that the plaintiffs were all American citizens.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice, charged the jury. There are three questions in this cause, neither of which is involved in any difficulty. First; did the plaintiffs authorize Mr. Ralston to insure their part of the money shipped? secondly; did he insure it? and, thirdly; if he had insured it, can the plaintiffs recover in this action. The two first depend upon the facts proved in the cause, and nothing can be more clear, than that Mr. Ralston was not requested to insure any part of this money, as the property of the plaintiffs; and that he did insure it, believing it to be his own. He has stated, that whilst he supposed his name was intended to be used to cover the property of others, he declined insuring at all, and was only induced to do so, from the representation of one of the partners, that the money was his own. But if he had insured it as the property of the plaintiffs, still they could not recover in this action, inasmuch as the non-disclosure to the defendants, that it belonged to persons established and carrying on trade in a belligerent country, was so obviously material to the risk, as to avoid the policy.

Verdict for the defendants.

Case No. 1,113.

BAUENDAHL et al. v. HORR.

[7 Blatchf. 548.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Connecticut. Sept. 20, 1870.

CONDITIONAL SALE — MODIFICATION OF CONTRACT —REPLEVIN — CONNECTICUT STATUTE — CONDITIONAL DELIVERY.

1. Where a sale of merchandise was made on condition that payment therefor should be made in a certain manner, and, in accordance with a custom of the trade, the merchandise was delivered to the buyer before the terms of payment were complied with: Held, that the vendor could recover the goods from the buyer, by an action of replevin, under a statute of Connecticut, which gives such remedy whenever any goods are unlawfully detained, except by attachment, from the owner or other person entitled to possession.

[Cited in Re Binford, Case No. 1,411; The Marina, 19 Fed. 764.]

2. Where the vendor, after delivering the merchandise, proposed to the buyer a modification of the contract, in respect to the terms of payment, and the buyer did not accept such proposition: Held, that this left the original terms of sale in full force.

3. The sale, and the delivery having been conditional, and the condition not having been complied with by the buyer, it was not necessary to the vendor's right of reclamation, that he should return to the buyer a promissory note which the buyer had sent to him but which he did not accept in payment.

At law.—This was an action of replevin, brought [by Bauendahl & Co. against William L. Horr] under a statute of the state of Connecticut, which gives this remedy: "Whenever any goods shall be unlawfully detained, except by attachment, from the owner or other person entitled to possession." The property embraced in the suit consisted of certain bales of wool, the title and right to possession of which was claimed by the plaintiffs and denied by the defendant. The case was tried by the court, the parties having stipulated to waive a jury. The plea was the general issue. No question was raised on the pleadings. [Judgment for plaintiffs.]

On the evidence produced on the trial, and after argument thereon, the court found the following facts to have been duly proved: (1.) That, on the 19th of August, 1868, the plaintiffs, wool merchants in the city of New York, made a contract with the defendant, a manufacturer and consumer of wool, in

[1] [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

Brookfield, Connecticut, by which they agreed to sell him seventeen bales of wool, amounting, with the usual incidental charges, including interest on the same during the term of credit, to $3,396.19. (2.) That one of the express conditions of the contract was, that the defendant should pay for the wool by his own draft on Messrs. G. P. & B. W. Fay, accepted by the latter, and payable in four months. (3.) That the plaintiffs performed the contract, on their part, on the 20th of August, 1868, by forwarding the wool to the defendant, which the latter received, in due course of transportation, and accepted, and that the wool was so forwarded by the plaintiffs to the defendant on the condition above set forth. (4.) That the defendant never performed his part of the contract, by furnishing the plaintiffs with his own draft on G. P. & B. W. Fay, accepted by the latter, but wholly refused so to do. (5.) That, on the 26th of August, 1868, the defendant forwarded to the plaintiffs Messrs. G. P. & B. W. Fay's note for the amount of the purchase price of said wool, payable four months from the 19th of August, 1868, to the makers' own order, and by them endorsed, and endorsed by no one else, and that, in the letter of the defendant accompanying said note, it was stated, that the same was in settlement of the bill of wool, "as per your agreement." (6.) That, on the 27th of August, 1868, and immediately on the receipt of said note, the plaintiffs replied by letter, stating that this mode of settlement was not according to the contract, reminding the defendant that the same was to be by draft on G. P. & B. W. Fay, accepted by the latter, and adding: "Nevertheless, we will accept the settlement this time, but must hold you responsible for the payment of the note, which please confirm by return mail." (7.) That the plaintiffs received no reply to the last named letter, and, on the 3d of September, 1868, again wrote the defendant, and demanded settlement in accordance with the terms of the original contract, at the same time stating to the defendant, that they would return to him said note, or hand the same over to the Messrs. Fay, as he might desire; that the defendant replied to this letter only by insisting that the payment was, by the original agreement, to be made by the note of G. P. & B. W. Fay, instead of the defendant's own draft on, and accepted by, them; and that, thereupon, the plaintiffs again demanded a compliance with the terms of the original contract, or a return of the wool, both of which the defendant refused. (8.) That it is a custom of the trade, in contracts of this character, for the seller to deliver the goods before the terms of payment are complied with by the buyer.

Thomas C. Perkins and Charles E. Perkins, for plaintiffs.

Sidney B. Beardsley, for defendant.

SHIPMAN, District Judge. On the facts found by the court, this was a conditional sale. One of the terms of the contract was an express condition that payment was to be made by the defendant's draft on G. P. & B. W. Fay, with the latter's acceptance thereof. Upon this condition the goods were delivered, in accordance with a custom of the trade. This condition was never complied with by the defendant, but compliance therewith was steadily refused.

Nor was there any waiver of the condition by the plaintiffs. It is true that they offered, in their letter of the 27th of August 1868 to accept the note in settlement, if the defendant would hold himself responsible for its payment, by an acknowledgment to that effect by return mail. The defendant never accepted this proposed modification of the contract. This left the original terms of sale in full force. Their never having been complied with by the defendant, no title to the wool ever passed to him, and the plaintiffs had the right to reclaim it. It would seem, from the authorities, that they would have had this right as against attaching creditors and bona fide purchasers, provided there had been no laches on the part of the plaintiffs. But, as between the parties, there can be no doubt, I think, that the right of reclamation existed. Hill v. Freeman, 3 Cush. 257; Tyler v. Freeman, Id. 261; Coggill v. Hartford & N. H. R. Co., 3 Gray, 545.

It was claimed, on the argument, that the plaintiffs should have returned the note to the defendant, and that this was necessary before their right of reclamation could accrue. If there had been a mere fraudulent contract, by which the title had vested in the defendant, making it incumbent on the plaintiffs to return the consideration, in order to rescind the contract and revest the title in them, this claim of the defendant might be material. But here the sale was not absolute, with a taint of fraud in the contract. It was conditional, and the delivery under it was conditional. No title ever vested in the defendant, for the condition was never performed. No act of the plaintiffs was necessary to revest in them the title with which they had never parted.

The plaintiffs never accepted this note in payment. They, indeed, offered to accept it, but only on a condition with which the defendant refused to comply. The title and right of possession of this wool remained, therefore, in the plaintiffs, and judgment must be rendered for them.

BAUER, (UNITED STATES v.) See Case No. 14,546.

BAUERT, (ECKERT v.) See Case No. 4,266.

Case No. 1,114.

BAUGH v. NOLAND.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 2.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. June Term, 1810.

BAIL—INSOLVENT.

The defendant had been discharged under the insolvent law of Maryland, in 1809, since the cause of action. The bail produced a copy of the record of discharge, and an exoneretur was allowed.

Case No. 1,115.

BAULIGUY v. UNITED STATES.

[The case reported under this title in 1 La. Law J. 184, is the same as Bouligney v. U. S., Case No. 1,696a.]

Case No. 1,116.

In re BAUM.

[1 Ben. 274;[2] 1 N. B. R. 5; Bankr. Reg. Supp. 2; 6 Int. Rev. Rec. 28.]

District Court, S. D. New York. July Term, 1867.

PRACTICE — TIME TO FILE SPECIFICATIONS OF OPPOSITION—EXAMINATION OF BANKRUPT.

1. A creditor who has proved his claim may, at any time thereafter, and before the expiration of the time limited by rule 24 of the general orders in bankruptcy, file specifications of the grounds of his opposition to a bankrupt's discharge.

2. That rule is enabling and not prohibitory.

3. The filing of such specifications is not a necessary prerequisite to the making of an order, under section 26 of the bankruptcy act, [of March 2, 1867; 14 Stat. 529,] for the examination of the bankrupt, or of other persons.

In bankruptcy. In this case a register in bankruptcy certified to the court that a creditor had given notice of his intention to oppose the discharge of the bankrupt, and had handed in a list of objections to the discharge; that the bankrupt opposed the reception of the objections at that stage of the proceedings, it being the first meeting of creditors specially for the proof of debts and the choice of an assignee; and that the opinion of the court was desired on the question as to whether the objections could now be received. The register referred to section 31 of the bankruptcy act, which provides that any creditor opposing the discharge of a bankrupt may file a specification in writing of the grounds of his opposition, and the court may, in its discretion, order any question of fact so presented to be tried at a stated session of the district court. The register stated that in this case the petitioner represented no assets whatever in his schedule; that the creditor was not satisfied with this, and had declared his intention of applying, as soon as the appointment of the assignee, which had been made, was approved, for an order to examine the bankrupt and other persons, under section 26, with a view to finding assets, as well as proving the specific charges of fraud which the creditor had specified in the paper filed by him. The register stated that this seemed to suggest the following questions: (1) When shall a creditor so file his objections? (2) When the objections are so filed, may the register make an order that the bankrupt and others should appear to be examined? (3) Is it competent for the creditor to examine the bankrupt and others ad libitum to find property, as well as to establish his specifications of fraud and other objections to the discharge? The register observed that if the provisions of the act would permit, it would seem to be well if something of this kind could be done at an early period of the proceedings, first, to quiet all groundless fears, and second, to ascertain what facts and what issues it was worth while to bring before the court for trial; that such a proceeding would be quite in analogy with the provisions of section 391 of the Code of Procedure of the State of New York, which had at times a very healthy operation; that if, after such examination, the register could certify to the court the precise issues that existed between the respective parties, and which the court must try, very much labor and vexation would be spared to the court, which really has less conveniences for getting at such issues than the register, before whom the testimony is taken, and who fully knows the whole case; that the provisions of rule 24 of the "general orders in bankruptcy," to the effect that "a creditor opposing the application of a bankrupt for discharge shall enter his appearance in opposition thereto on the day when the creditors are required to show cause, and shall file his specification of the grounds in opposition in writing within ten days thereafter, unless the time shall be enlarged by order of the district court in the case, and the court shall thereupon make an order as to the entry of said case for trial on the docket of the district court, and the time within which the same shall be heard and decided," are not in antagonism with this view; that rule 24 contains nothing prohibitory, and may be fully operative on those who have not theretofore appeared; that the creditors who have filed objections and examined the bankrupt and other witnesses, and got out all the facts which they desire, may well come into court at the time prescribed in rule 24, enter an appearance, and file such specifications as they on the whole have concluded they will be able to sustain, and thereupon proceed as specified in rule 24; that he could see no objection to any creditor who may see fit to file objections with the register, or perhaps without that, proceeding at once to ex amine the bankrupt and other witnesses, and thereby fully preparing himself to take the steps prescribed in rule 24, and that the 26th section of the act would fail in having some of its specifications carried out if an opposite view were taken, as power is there given to the court "at all times" to require the bankrupt to attend and be examined.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

[2] [Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. I fully concur in these general views of the register. A creditor who has proved his debt may file at any time the specification in writing of the grounds of his opposition to the discharge of the bankrupt, referred to in section 31 of the act. Rule 24 of the "general orders in bankruptcy" is enabling, and not prohibitory. A creditor who does not file his specification by the time specified in rule 24 will lose his opportunity of doing so. But he has a right to file such specification at any time after he has proved his debt, and before the expiration of the time limited by rule 24. The filing of such specification is not, however, a necessary prerequisite to the making of an order, under section 26 of the act, that the bankrupt or other persons attend and be examined as to the matters specified in that section. Such order may be made, and such examinations may be had, on the application of the assignee, or of any creditor who has proved his debt, or on the suggestion of the register himself, and without any application, and without the previous filing of any specification under section 31 of the act. The bankrupt and all other persons are subject to examination at all times, at the instance of the assignee or of any creditor who has proved his debt, or of the court, or of the register, in regard to any of the matters specified in section 26.

Case No. 1,117.

BAUMAN v. UNION PAC. R. CO.

[3 Dill. 367.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Nebraska. 1875.

FEDERAL COURTS—JURISDICTION OVER UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD—ACT JULY 1, 1862.

Under the charter of the Union Pacific Railroad Company, it may sue and be sued in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Nebraska, without reference to the citizenship of the adverse party.

[See Pacific Railroad Removal Cases, 115 U. S. 1, 5 Sup. Ct. 1113.]

[Suit by Charles J. Bauman against the Union Pacific Railroad Company.] Motion by the defendant to dismiss the action for want of jurisdiction in the court. [Denied.]

A. J. Poppleton and E. Wakely, for the motion.

W. M. Francis, contra.

MILLER, Circuit Justice. The petition alleges that the plaintiff is a citizen of the state of Nebraska, and that the defendant is a corporation created by and existing under the laws of the United States; and the question is whether it is suable in this court by a citizen of the state of Nebraska. Under the charter of the defendant company, I have heretofore held that it was suable in this court by a citizen of another state,—Smith v. Union Pac. R. Co., [Case No. 13,121,]—and I am of opinion, on consideration of the provisions of the charter, that it may sue and be sued in this district, without reference to the citizenship of the adverse party—[Act July 1, 1862;] 12 Stat. 489.

See Turton v. Union Pac. R. Co., [Case No. 14,273, and Act March 3, 1875; 18 Stat. 470.]

[1] [Reported by Hon. John F. Dillon, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

Case No. 1,118.

In re BAXTER.

[5 Am. Law Reg. (N. S.) 159, note.][1]

Circuit Court, E. D. Tennessee. Jan., 1866.

EX POST FACTO LAWS — ATTORNEYS—TEST OATH.

[1. Act Jan. 24, 1865, (15 Stat. 424, c. 20,) provided that no person should be allowed to practice in the federal courts, by reason of any previous admission thereto, without having first taken an oath that he had never borne arms against the United States, aided its armed enemies, supported any pretended authority hostile thereto, nor sought or exercised any office under such hostile authority. Held, that the act is ex post facto and void; for the right of an attorney to practice his profession is his property, and the act declares a forfeiture of such property for offenses which were not so punishable when committed.]

[See Cummings v. Missouri, 4 Wall. (71 U. S.) 277; Pierce v. Carskadon, 16 Wall. (83 U. S.) 234.]

[2. The act cannot, however, be held to impair the obligation of a contract; for, even if the constitution prohibits congress from passing such laws, the admission of an attorney to practice is not a contract, within the meaning of the constitution.]

John Baxter and T. A. R. Nelson, for the objection.

Horace Maynard, opposed.

One John Baxter had been an attorney of the court, but, the authority of the United States in that district having been suspended during the part of the Rebellion, he was readmitted in May, 1864. On the 24th January, 1865, [15 Stat. 424, c. 20,] an act was passed by congress declaring that no persons should thereafter be admitted to the bar of the United States courts, or be allowed to be heard by reason of any previous admission, without having first taken the oath prescribed in the act of July 2, 1862, [12 Stat. 502, c. 128.] The terms of the oath are as follows: "I do solemnly swear that I have never voluntarily borne arms against the United States since I have been a citizen thereof; that I have voluntarily given no aid, countenance, counsel, or encouragement to persons engaged in armed hostility thereto; that I have neither sought nor accepted, nor attempted to exercise the functions of any office whatever, under any authority or pretended authority in hostility to the United States; that I have not yielded a voluntary support to any pretended government, authority, power, or constitution within the United States, hostile or inimical thereto. And I do further swear that, to the best of my knowledge and ability, I will support and defend the constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic; that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the same; that I take this obligation freely, without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion. So help me God."

[1] [Nowhere fully reported; opinion not now accessible. The statement of facts and of the holding of Trigg, District Judge, is taken from a note to Hughes v. Litsey, 14 Am. Law Reg. (5 Am. Law Reg. N. S.) 159.]

On the said Baxter attempting to address the court from the bar, at the present term, he was informed by THE COURT that he could not be heard until he had taken the oath above set forth, whereupon he objected that the said law was unconstitutional, and the court had therefore no right to compel him to take the said oath. The matter was subsequently argued by the objector in person, and T. A. R. Nelson against, and Horace Maynard in favor of, the constitutionality of the law. The ground first assumed for the objector was that the act impairs the obligation of a contract, because an attorney is examined in Tennessee by the judges of the state courts, and by them licensed to practice, and therefore to receive fees and emoluments of his profession. Upon this point, THE COURT, (TRIGG, District Judge,) after noticing the doubt whether congress has power to pass an act impairing contracts, and inclining to think that it has not, expressed the opinion that the admission of an attorney was not a contract, within the terms of the constitution.

It was further urged that the law was an ex post facto law, and therefore unconstitutional. Upon this point THE COURT stated the question to be, whether the act was to be considered as prescribing additional qualifications for office under the government, or as a criminal enactment inflicting a penalty upon those who refuse to comply with its terms. THE COURT then proceeded to show that an attorney is an officer of the court, but not of the government, and that, as to him, the act must be considered as penal. But an attorney has a right to practice his profession, and such profession is his property, within the protection of the constitution, and the law, therefore, punishing an attorney, by forfeiture of his property in his profession, for acts not so punishable when committed, is ex post facto, in its operation as to such cases, and therefore unconstitutional. Admitting the correctness of the assumption that his profession is an attorney's property, and the act requiring him to swear in his own case, the same conclusion as to the unconstitutionality of the law is reached by reference to the fifth article of the amendments, which declares that no person "shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law." For these reasons, THE COURT pronounced the law unconstitutional and void.

Case No. 1,119.

In re BAXTER et al.

[18 N. B. R. 62.][1]

District Court, S. D. New York. June 7, 1878.

BANKRUPTCY — PARTNERSHIP AND PRIVATE DEBTS —AGENCY.

1. The bankrupts were the general business agents of a corporation, and as such were authorized to receive and disburse all the moneys of the corporation "except subscriptions to its capital stock." B., one of the bankrupts, who was treasurer of the corporation, received subscriptions to the capital stock, which he paid into the business of his firm. It did not appear that any stockholder or director of the corporation, except B. and his partner, had any knowledge of the misappropriation of the funds. Held, that B. was liable personally therefor; that the firm, having taken the funds with knowledge that it was not entitled to receive the same, was equally liable; and that proof could be made against both estates. [Emery v. Canal Nat. Bank, Case No. 4,446, followed.]

2. The bankrupts, as such agents, consigned goods of the corporation for sale to an English firm, of which B. was a member. Prior to the receipt of the goods, said firm had accepted and paid drafts of the bankrupts to an amount exceeding the value of all their consignments, and on that account claim that they have accounted with the bankrupts, and paid over the proceeds of the goods to them. Held, that this was not a payment which would discharge said firm from liability, and that the claim for such proceeds, being for a partnership liability of B.. ranks in the distribution of his individual estate after his individual debts.

[In bankruptcy. In the matter of Archibald Baxter and Duncan C. Ralston.]

W. H. Arnoux and Mr. Macrea, for receiver.

W. A. Abbott, for assignee.

CHOATE, District Judge. Re-examination of claims under stipulation. One of the bankrupts, Archibald Baxter, was treasurer of a corporation, the International Packing Co. His firm, Archibald Baxter & Co., were the general business agents of the corporation, under an appointment by written resolution, authorizing them to receive and disburse all the moneys of the corporation "except subscriptions to its capital stock." Archibald Baxter, as treasurer, received subscriptions to the capital stock to the amount of one hundred and fifteen thousand four hundred dollars. which, notwithstanding this prohibition, he paid into the business of his firm.

[1] [Reprinted by permission.]

It needs no argument to show that he is personally liable to the corporation therefor, unless the corporation has acquiesced in and consented to the disposition which he made of the money.

There is an entire failure to prove such acquiescence. It is true that the fact was known to Baxter and his partner Ralston, who were both directors and officers of the corporation, and there were entries on the books of the corporation, which were kept by Baxter & Co., which might have led others to a discovery of the fact, but no proof is given that any other director or stockholder had any knowledge of the misappropriation of the funds.

The firm of Archibald Baxter & Co., having taken the funds with knowledge that they were not entitled to receive the same, are equally liable to the corporation with Baxter personally, and, on the authority of Emery v. Canal Nat. Bank, [Case No. 4,446,] I think proof can be made against both estates.

The goods of the corporation were consigned for sale by their agents, Archibald Baxter & Co., to Baxter, Steedman & Co., an English firm, of which Archibald Baxter is a member, and a claim is made against the separate estate of Archibald Baxter for the amount of these consignments. Baxter, Steedman & Co., received the goods with notice that they belonged to the corporation. Undoubtedly, so long as the proceeds remained in their hands, they would be liable directly to the corporation therefor.

It is claimed, however, that they have accounted with Archibald Baxter & Co. therefor, and paid over the proceeds of the goods to them. This would discharge Baxter, Steedman & Co., from liability to the corporation, as Archibald Baxter & Co. were its agents to receive the same. The only way, however, in which they have so paid over the proceeds is by the acceptance and payment, prior to the receipt of the goods, of the drafts of Archibald Baxter & Co. to an amount exceeding the value of all their consignments. This is not a payment which discharges Baxter, Steedman & Co. from liability. The transaction was, in substance and effect, not a payment to Archibald Baxter & Co. of the proceeds of the goods, but the application by Baxter, Steedman & Co. of the proceeds of the goods of the corporation to the payment of a debt due to them from Archibald Baxter & Co.

The receiver of the corporation has, in making proof of this claim, set it forth in his deposition as a claim for goods sold by the corporation to Baxter, Steedman & Co. He was evidently misled by the entries in the books. He should make new proof of the debt, setting it forth according to the fact. This claim being for a partnership liability of Archibald Baxter, will of course rank in the distribution of his individual estate after his individual debts.

Case No. 1,120.

In re BAXTER et al.

[18 N. B. R. 497; 26 Pittsb. Leg. J. 140.]

District Court, S. D. New York. July 3, 1878.

BANKRUPTCY—PROOF OF DEBTS—DRAFTS—PAYMENT BY ACCEPTOR.

[After certain drafts had been accepted, the drawer became bankrupt, and they were dishonored. The holder received 50 per cent. of their amount from the acceptor in full satisfaction of all claims against him, expressly reserving his rights against all other parties to the drafts. The acceptor then released the drawer from all liability to him. Held, that notwithstanding this release the holder of the drafts was entitled to prove for the whole amount of the drafts, and to receive a dividend —if the estate was able to pay it—which with the payment made by the acceptor, would equal that amount.]

[Cited in Re Hicks, Case No. 6,456. Distinguished in Re Hollister, 3 Fed. 455.]

[In bankruptcy. In the matter of Archibald Baxter and Duncan C. Ralston.]

Abbott Bros., for assignee.

Redfield & Hill, for creditor.

CHOATE, District Judge. Re-examination of proof of debt. The Canadian Bank of Commerce became the holder for value before maturity of two drafts drawn by the bankrupts on their correspondents in Liverpool, who accepted the same. Since the dishonor of the draft, the bank has received from the acceptors' fifty per cent. of the amount due on them, without prejudice to the rights of the bank against other parties. The drafts were drawn against consignments of merchandise, which the drawers undertook to make, but which they failed to make. It is claimed that the acceptor has released the drawer from all demands. It is now insisted by the trustee of the bankrupt that the holder of the draft can only prove for the amount thereof, after deducting the payment made by the acceptor, but the register allowed the proof for the whole amount.

The bankrupt is in this case the principal debtor, and the acceptor is the surety. It is conceded that, but for the release of the drawer by the acceptor, the creditor would have the right to prove for the whole amount. Downing v. Traders' Bank, [Case No. 4,046.] But it is insisted that in this case, as the acceptor has released all his claims against the drawer, the creditor cannot prove for the whole, because the acceptor has no claim on the surplus after the creditors shall be paid in full. There is no merit in this position. If the dividend which the creditor shall be entitled to shall, with the sum received from the surety, exceed the whole amount of the drafts, that may be a proper case for an application to the court to have this surplus disposed of, according to the equities of the parties, if the acceptor is then properly before the court; meanwhile, to reduce the amount for which the creditor is to prove would certainly prejudice his rights, contrary to the conditions under which he accepted the money from the surety. He is entitled to prove for the whole amount, and if there shall be a surplus it can then be determined to whom it belongs. The entry of a judgment does not affect the right to prove the debt. Petition dismissed.

[A rehearing was granted, and on August 10, 1878, the following opinion was rendered:]

CHOATE, District Judge. This case was submitted on briefs of counsel, and a further oral argument has been granted on application of the assignee, on acount of the very large amount involved in the decision. After a careful reconsideration of the matter, I am still of opinion that the bank has a right to prove against the bankrupts for the whole amount of the drafts held by it. The receipt by the bank from the acceptors of the drafts, who, on the facts shown, stood in the relation of sureties for the bankrupts, of fifty per cent. in release of all claims on them, did not operate to discharge any part of the debt of the bankrupts to the holder of the drafts. It was not accepted as payment in part of their debt to the holder, nor was the sum so paid endorsed on the drafts as part payment, nor was there any agreement to that effect. On the contrary, it was agreed to be received without prejudice to the rights of the holder as against other parties on the drafts. The rights thus expressly reserved certainly included the right to present their claim against the bankrupt for its full amount.

There is no question that the holder of commercial paper may prove for the full amount against all the parties liable, as he may maintain actions against them all. The holder was not bound to receive this dividend from the surety. He might have rested on his right to sue him, which would not in any way have prejudiced his right to prove the debt for the full amount against the bankrupt, unless and until the surety should have paid the drafts in full, in which case, by the terms of the bankrupt law, the surety would have been subrogated to the rights of the holder. Instead of suing the surety, the holder accepted fifty cents in full as against him, without prejudice to his rights against the bankrupt. Even without this reservation, the surety, having paid part of the debt only, would have no right to prove for that part against the bankrupt unless the holder should fail to prove the debt; but the right of the holder would still remain to prove for the whole debt, partly for himself and partly as trustee for the surety. Rev. St. § 5070. Now, the reservation of rights agreed upon in this case had no meaning, it seems to me, if it did not save the existing right of the holder to prove, for his own benefit, on the whole debt, until he received, with the payment made by the surety, full satisfaction of the debt. Such being the rights of the parties at the time the dividend was received from the surety, the subsequent release by the surety of all claims against the bankrupt cannot possibly affect the rights of the holder, who was no party to that release, except so far as those rights are held by him, not for his own use and benefit of the surety. The surplus that the holder may receive from the bankrupt, upon proof of the debt in full, after full satisfaction of the debt, would indeed, but for the release, belong to the surety; and this surplus the surety might, as against the holder, deal with as he chose; but the surety is not a party to this proceeding, and therefore what may be the effect to this surplus may and should be left till it appears that there will be such a surplus. As it is conceded in this case that there will be none, the point is not material; but the proper order to make in the matter is, that the holder be allowed to prove for the whole amount of the drafts, reserving all questions that may arise in case he should be entitled upon such proof to dividends, which, together with the sum received from the surety, will exceed the whole amount of the drafts and interest.

Case No. 1,121.

In re BAXTER et al.

[18 N. B. R. 560.]

District Court, S. D. New York. Aug. 30, 1878.

BANKRUPTCY—PROOF OF CLAIM—AMENDMENT—GENERAL ORDERS.

[The receiver of a corporation presented a claim in its favor against the bankrupts, which was disputed by the trustee, who objected that no deposition of an officer of the corporation was presented with the proof, as required by general order No. 34. The claim was re-examined, and held valid and provable, in the course of which proceedings the treasurer of the corporation was examined under oath, and his deposition then taken furnished part of the grounds on which the claim was sustained. Held, that the receiver was entitled, by leave of court, to file this deposition with the proof of claim, with the same effect as if it were originally made conformably to order No. 34.]

[In bankruptcy. In the matter of Archibald Baxter and Duncan C. Ralston.]

Abbott Brothers, for trustee.

Kelly & Macrae, for receiver.

CHOATE, District Judge. The receiver of the International Packing Co., having presented proof of a claim against the bankrupts, which was disputed by the trustee, the claim has been re-examined and held to be a valid and provable claim. One objection made by the trustee was that no deposition in support of the claim was presented with the proof conformably to general order No. 34. In the order sustaining the claim, leave was given to the receiver to amend his proofs by producing the deposition of an officer of the corporation, the International Packing Company, to whose rights the receiver has succeeded. It now appears by the petition of the receiver that he has applied to the proper officer of the corporation, who refuses to make the necessary deposition. In the course of the proceedings upon the re-examination of the claim, the treasurer of the corporation was examined under oath, and his deposition then taken was part of the case upon which the decision sustaining the claim was made. The ground on which the officer now refuses to make the deposition does not appear. It is suggested by the counsel for the trustee that it is because he cannot truthfully make it.

A motion is now made by the receiver that the deposition of the treasurer of the corporation, made on the re-examination of the claim, be filed, with the proof of claim, with the same force and effect as if originally made as a deposition conformably to general order No. 34. It is insisted on behalf of the trustee that this cannot be done; that the court cannot dispense with the requirements of the general order in this respect. The motion must be granted.

There can be no question of the power of the court, where it is impossible to comply with this requirement of the general order, to relieve the creditor so that he can obtain the benefit of the dividend to which he is entitled. The general rules and orders made by the supreme court, under authority of the bankrupt law, are designed to systematize and facilitate the practice of the bankrupt courts, and so far as they apply must be strictly followed. But they were not designed to create or declare, nor do they create and declare, the rights of creditors in the estate of bankrupts; still less do they abrogate and annul those rights. Many cases may arise where it is impossible to procure the deposition of the assignor to the claim. He may be out of the jurisdiction, or dead, or insane, with no legal representative within the jurisdiction competent to act for him in this matter. He may not be able truthfully and in good faith to make the deposition, as is suggested in this case. It would be a great stretch of authority to attempt to coerce him to swear to what he does not believe to be true. In all such cases to hold that the general order was peremptory and without exception, and absolutely excluded the proof, would be to hold that it deprives the creditor without just cause of his proper share in the bankrupt's estate, and divides it among the other creditors. In the particular case the leave to file the deposition of the officer of the corporation was given because it did not appear that it could not be obtained, and this permission seemed to meet this technical objection. Probably it was necessary because the proceedings taken amount to an adjudication of the court upon the creditor's claim, and it would seem that after such an adjudication in the very cause itself formal proof is unnecessary.

It appears now to be impossible to comply with the general order in this respect. Motion granted.

Case No. 1,122.

In re BAXTER et al.

[19 N. B. R. 295.]

District Court, S. D. New York. June Term, 1879.

BANKRUPTCY—COMMITTEE—MAJORITY VOTE—COUNSEL FEE.

[1. When a committee is appointed under Rev. St. § 5103, to assist the trustee in the management of the bankrupt's estate, unanimity of action by them is not required, but the act of a majority, where all have the right to be heard, is the act of the committee.]

[2. The question how much the trustee shall pay counsel for services is left by the statute in the discretion of such committee; and when they act in good faith they cannot review their decision, though the amount allowed is greater than would appear to the court reasonable. In re Cooke, Case No. 3,169, followed.]

[3. Cited in Re Hicks, 2 Fed. 854, to the point that the approval of the committee cannot affect or cure positively unlawful applications of the fund, nor inequality of distribution among creditors.]

[In bankruptcy. In the matter of Archibald Baxter and Duncan C. Ralston.]

Kelly & Macrae, for petitioner.

Abbott Bros., for trustee.

CHOATE, District Judge. This is an application by one of a committee chosen by the creditors to assist the trustee in the management of the bankrupt's estate under Rev. St. § 5103, for relief against the action of the trustee in the allowance of what are alleged to be excessive counsel fees for services rendered to the estate. It is not claimed that the allowances made by the trustee, and approved by the majority of the committee, are not made in good faith. It is claimed that they are grossly excessive for the services performed; that it is within the power of the court to correct such an error of judgment on the part of the committee; and especially that the committee can only act by unanimous vote, and that as one of them dissents from the allowances made, their action on this matter is thereby nullified, and of necessity the court must decide the question.

I think the question how much the trustee shall pay counsel for services is clearly one of those matters which under the statute are submitted to the discretion of the committee, and that the court cannot, if their discretion is exercised in good faith, interfere with their decision, even though the amount allowed is largely in excess of what the court would think reasonable. The purpose and construction of that part of the bankrupt law providing for an administration of the estate by a trustee, under the direction of a committee of the creditors, [Act March 2, 1867, (14 Stat. 529, 538, §§ 27, 28, 43,)] are so fully and carefully stated in the case of In re Cooke, [Case No. 3,169,] by Mr. Justice Strong, that it is only necessary to refer to that case as an authority on this point. The present case comes clearly within the reasoning of that decision. There is nothing in the statute indicating that the committee must be unanimous in all their directions to the trustee. The number to be appointed on the committee is not fixed by the statute. It may be larger or smaller, as the creditors at their meeting shall determine. The theory of the statute is, that they will represent the whole body of the creditors, giving the trustee the benefit of their advice, and restraining his action by their action in the management of the estate. It is to be presumed that they are fairly representative of the views of the creditors, or intended so to be. To require entire unanimity of them, either in opinion or direction on all the diverse matters they are called upon to decide, would in my judgment be impracticable, and go far to defeat the very purpose had in view by the statute. and unduly embarrass the administration of the estate, leaving many questions of administration insoluble, except by an appeal to the court, for which no provision is made by the act, and which seems to be contrary to its primary intent of an administration of the estate by the creditors themselves, through their own chosen agents. It seems, therefore, to be the intent of the statute, that the committee by a majority vote shall decide all questions duly submitted to them, and that the act of the majority, all having an opportunity to be heard, is the act of the committee. This application must therefore be denied.

Case No. 1,123.

BAXTER v. BIAYS.

[Brunner, Col. Cas. 254;[1] 4 Law J. 276.]

Circuit Court, D. Maryland. May Term, 1812.

BAIL—SURRENDER OF PRINCIPAL.

Bail cannot surrender their principal before a judge at his chambers.

Biays was bail for one Merrihu. After the scire facias issued, and within the time allowed by the rule for a surrender of principal, Biays surrendered Merrihu before HOUSTON, District Judge, during vacation, who ordered an exoneretur to be entered.

But by DUVAL, Circuit Justice: There is no law authorizing a surrender before a judge at his chambers, nor is there any rule of court to that effect. It was once attempted before Judge Hanson, and refused.

Case No. 1,123a.

BAXTER v. The DONA FERMOAS.

[Betts' Scr. Bk. 570.]

District Court, S. D. New York. May 14, 1858.

ADMIRALTY—PROCEDURE—FILING CLAIM—DEFAULT.

[The filing of a claim in admiralty proceedings does not stay proceedings ex parte by the libellant unless it is interposed on the return day of the process when the proclamation is made; and, when no one appears on the return day, it is proper to enter interlocutory and final decree in favor of libellant as upon default, although the claimant had theretofore filed his claim.]

[In admiralty. Libel by Samuel G. Baxter against the Dona Fermoas. There was a decree for libellants upon default, and claimant moves to set aside the default.]

Scudder & Carter, for libellants.

Beebe, Dean & Donohue, for claimant.

The vessel was seized under the process, and before the return-day the claimant appeared and filed his claim in court on Feb. 16, 1858. On the return of the process, Feb. 16, 1858, proclamation was made in open court, and no one appearing, interlocutory and final decrees were perfected in favor of the libellants. The claim alleges that after the filing of his claim no proceedings could be taken by the libellants without notice to him.

HELD BY THE COURT. That the fact of putting in a claim does not stay proceedings ex parte by the libellant, unless it be interposed on the return-day of the process, when the proclamation is made. Then the libellant must regard it as at his peril, although he receives no personal notice of its being filed. The libellants, therefore, have been regular in their proceedings, and the motion must be denied.

BAXTER, (LA SOCIETE ANONYME DES MINES v.) See Case No. 8,099.

Case No. 1,124.

BAXTER et al. v. LELAND et al.

[1 Abb. Adm. 348.][1]

District Court, S. D. New York. Nov. Term, 1848.[2]

SHIPPING—BILL OF LADING—PERILS OF THE SEAS—SWEAT—CARRIERS — LIABILITY — CUSTOM OF TRADE.

1. As between the original parties to a shipment. it is competent for them to show the actual condition of the goods at the time of the shipment.

[Cited in The Wellington, Case No. 17,384.]

2. The phrases, "the dangers of the seas," "the dangers of navigation," and "the perils of the seas," employed in bills of lading, are convertible terms.

3. A dampness or sweating of the hold of a vessel, shown to be the ordinary accompaniment of a voyage from southern to northern ports, and to result not from tempestuous weather, but from occult atmospheric causes, is not a "peril of the seas."

4. Wherever a cause of injury to a cargo lies very near the line which separates excusable perils of the seas from those dangers for which carriers are responsible, regard is to be had to the custom of the trade in determining whether it is to be classed with the perils of the seas or not.

[1] [Reported by Albert Brunner, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

[1] [Reported by Abbott Brothers.]

[2] [Affirmed in Case No. 1,125.]

[Cited in Barstow v. Wilmot, Case No. 1,066.]

5. Where there is a notorious custom in a particular branch of commerce, of stowing goods of a particular description on board ship in a certain way, shippers, who consider such mode of stowage hazardous, must notify carriers of their wish to have a different one adopted, or they will not be entitled to charge the latter with injuries received in consequence of its adoption.

[Cited in Barstow v. Wilmot, Case No. 1,066; The Cheshire, Id. 2,658.]

6. The propriety of the common-law rule respecting the liability of common carriers considered.

In admiralty. This was a libel in personam, by Sylvester Baxter and others, owners of the ship Cleone, against Horace Leland and others, to recover freight and primage on a cargo of flour. [Decree for libellants. This was afterwards affirmed by the circuit court in Baxter v. Leland, Case No. 1,125.]

The libel showed that the libellants had transported a cargo of 1076 barrels of flour in the libellants' vessel, from New Orleans to New York, which were consigned to the respondents at the latter port, and were duly delivered to them there. The libellants demanded $430.40 freight, and $21.52 primage. The answer set up that the flour was delivered in a damaged condition, and that the loss incurred by the respondents and chargeable to the libellants amounted to $531.50. It appeared upon the proofs in the cause on the part of the respondents, that on an inspection of the flour, when delivered at this port, 601 barrels were marked "B. bad," and 69 barrels were marked "xd. bad;" and it was further proved that the deterioration in price upon those marked "B. bad" was from seventy-five cents to one dollar a barrel; that upon the others was about twenty-five cents a barrel. For the libellants, evidence was offered tending to show that the flour was not put on board the vessel in good condition. Thus they showed that ten barrels were stained on the outside when shipped at New Orleans, though it appeared that the residue of the shipment was, so far as was indicated by external appearances, in good order. Evidence was also put in by the libellants, tending to show that by the method of transportation adopted for bringing the flour from the interior of the country to New Orleans, and also by exposure on the wharf at New Orleans, while waiting to be laden on board ship, the flour had been liable to get wet, and that it was taken on board under circumstances which might well cause its injury in the manner disclosed upon its arrival at New York. To rebut the inference sought to be drawn from these facts, the libellants gave evidence that the flour, when manufactured and put up, was perfectly sound and sweet, and that such care and attention were bestowed in forwarding it as to leave no ground to presume that it was put on board the ship in a damaged condition. It was manufactured at Ewing Mills, in the county of Muskingum, Ohio, and early in December, 1847, was forwarded by canal boat and flat-bottomed boats from the mills to New Orleans, where it arrived about January 20, 1848. The bill of lading, signed by the master of libellants' vessel, and dated February 1, 1848, contained an admission that the flour was received on board the ship in good order and well-conditioned; but a memorandum in the words "weight and contents are unknown," was added by the master before his signature. Other facts, especially such as relate to the usage prevailing amongst persons engaged in the business of shipping and forwarding like goods from New Orleans to the North, are stated in the opinion.

E. C. Benedict, for libellants.
A. P. Man, for respondents.

BETTS, District Judge. As between the original parties to the shipment, it is competent for them to show, by evidence outside the bill of lading, the actual condition of the flour at the time of shipment, (Howard v. Tucker, 1 Barn. & Adol. 712,) without the aid of this exception; and the reservation by the master, in executing the bill of lading, imposed on the shipper no obligation to give other evidence than the bill of lading itself, that the contents of the casks corresponded with the admissions in it, until affirmative evidence is furnished tending to show a mistake in the receipt in that respect.

The memorandum made by the master, that the contents and weight of the casks were unknown, does not change the character of the instrument. It operates as it would without that reservation, as prima facie evidence that the shipment corresponded with the representation, but subject to be rectified by proof that it was otherwise.

The libellants show that ten barrels were stained upon the outside when received on board, but they furnish no evidence raising a reasonable presumption that the contents of any part of the shipment were injured.

The gist of the controversy has been, on the part of the libellants, to show that the damage the flour had received arose from its inherent qualities,—from dangers of the sea,—or from the usual and ordinary damp and sweating of the ship on the voyage.

The struggle on the part of the respondents has been to make it appear that the cargo of the ship was improperly stowed, and that the injury received by the flour was occasioned by placing it in the hold of the ship on the top of hogsheads of new sugar, and laying over it sacks or bags of Indian corn.

The libellants deny their liability for the damage, should it be found to have been so occasioned, upon the assertion that the storage was in consonance with the common and well-known usage of ships engaged in freighting from New Orleans to the northern Atlantic ports.

I do not think a custom has been established in this respect, which, if the loss sustained by the respondents is owing to wrongful stowage of the ship's cargo, will, of itself, exonerate the libellants from their liability as carriers. As to the essential damage, the case hinges, then, in my view of it, on the point whether it is satisfactorily made out by the respondents that the injury to the flour was caused by stowing it in juxtaposition with the sugar and corn, and that such stowage was improper and unsafe.

There seems to be no essential disagreement in the evidence respecting the condition of the hold when opened to unlade the cargo. It was found heated to a high degree. The corn in some of the bags had sprouted, and the grain was so hot as to render moving it by hand painful. This part of the vessel was filled with a strong vapor and dampness. The flour in many of the barrels was found caked or coagulated, so that it could not be separated by the hand, and in others it was soured; and there is no reason to question, upon all the proofs, that the condition and temperature of the hold would ordinarily and probably produce the consequences found to exist in respect to the flour, had it been sweet and in good condition when laden on board at New Orleans. The disagreement in the testimony is as to the probable cause of that state of the hold of the vessel.

The ship, when she took in cargo, was in sound condition, and on her arrival here was found not to have leaked at all.

It is proved, by numerous witnesses of great experience in the New Orleans trade, that vessels running north will almost invariably sweat, or disclose an interior moisture or dampness, sufficient often to be productive of serious injury to goods on board, and that this condition of the ship, except as to degree, is irrespective of the cargo she carries. The cause of this cannot be ascertained with certainty, but it appertains in no way to the insufficiency of the ship; it is generally ascribed to the sudden change of climate, and augmented, as has been usually noticed, by rough weather, and also by any natural moistness in the cargo, yet exhibiting itself to the highest degree in the cold seasons of the year.

The libellants contend that if the damage to the flour is imputable to the state of the vessel, whether produced by the sweating of the ship or the character of the cargo, they are exonerated from liability;—on the first supposition, because their undertaking does not guarantee against loss; and on the second, upon the custom or usage of the trade, which justifies this method of stowage; and also on both, by the exception in the bill of lading, of "the dangers of the seas," in one copy, or "the dangers of navigation," as expressed in the other. It is to be remarked that this change of phraseology is not to be understood to indicate any different intent with the parties; and either mode of expression, standing without qualification in an instrument of this character, should be accepted as equivalent to "perils of the sea," and all are treated in the cases as convertible terms. In The Reeside, [Case No. 11,657,] and Aymar v. Astor, 6 Cow. 267, the exception was of "dangers of the seas," and in Fairchild v. Slocum, 19 Wend. 329, the "dangers of Lake Ontario;" and these exceptions were regarded by the courts as of the same significance as the common one of perils of the seas. It is, however, plain that the exception is not to be understood as embracing those losses flowing from culpable or negligent stowage of cargo,—2 Sumn. 568, [The Reeside, supra,]—or other improper acts of the master or owner, which are proximate causes of the loss,—Story, Bailm. § 512; Abb. Shipp. 384, 385; 3 Kent, Comm. 300.

So, also, upon the authorities referred to, the dampness or sweating of the ship cannot properly be ranked in the class of perils of the sea. Tempestuous and violent weather tends to increase this difficulty, but does not produce it; all the testimony showing that it occurs in smooth and quiet voyages, when there is no straining or unusual rolling or pitching of the ship. Its causes are probably atmospheric, but whether ascribable to that source or to others more occult, it is attended but imperfectly with those characteristics which might class it with perils of the sea. Story, Bailm. § 512; 3 Kent. Comm. 216, 217. It is of ordinary occurrence, scarcely failing to exist in any case of navigation from New Orleans to northern ports, in the cold seasons of the year. It does not result from, nor is it accompanied by, any irresistible force or overwhelming power, nor does it take the aspect of inevitable accident, in the sense of a sudden or violent occurrence, although it cannot be guarded against by the ordinary exertion of human skill and prudence. Story, Bailm. § 512. It is a quiet, secret exhalation, generated from the hold of the vessel, and in no other known way produced by winds and waves and navigation than that these are the agents and accompaniments of her transit out of a warm into a cold climate.

But although within the fair import of the exception in the bill of lading, the master or owners may not be protected from answering for such injury, I think they are not, in their capacity of carriers by water, absolutely responsible for the injury, in so far as the damage is not incontestibly traceable to faulty stowage; because, if occurring otherwise, or if the testimony leaves it doubtful whether the damage was not occasioned as well by other causes as the manner of stowage, they are entitled to the benefit of the known custom or usage of trade in this respect as a protection against liability for the loss.

The testimony in the cause proves a uniform and well understood usage in the trade between New Orleans and New York, that injuries received by goods from the sweating of the vessel should be borne by the goods alone.

Chancellor Kent says, what is an excusable peril depends a great deal upon usage, and the course and practice of merchants; and it is a question of fact to be settled by the circumstances peculiar to the case. 3 Kent, Comm. 217; Trott v. Wood, [Case No. 14,190.] And in the case of Gordon v. Little, 8 Serg. & R. 533, a general usage was admitted in evidence to lessen the responsibility of carriers.

In a case, then, hovering very closely upon the verge of the well-settled doctrine which would exempt the master from liability because the loss was incurred by a peril of the seas, I think there is just propriety, if the particular instance merely fails to fall within that rule, in applying to it the principle that the usage of the trade shall determine the question of liability. There is no evidence that the loss was ever claimed, in such cases, of the owners of the ship. It was, for a period of time, attempted to charge these losses upon the underwriters of the ship, under a special clause then inserted in policies, and supposed to cover this peril. Since that clause has been excluded, it is in proof that the uniform usage has been to charge the loss upon the goods as a peril belonging to them, and not covered by the responsibility of the carrier. I shall adopt that as the principle governing the question as to part of the damages claimed in this case. That will discharge the libellants from the claim of damages for the injuries to sixty-nine of the barrels, there being no evidence of any injury to them beyond what would probably be sustained from the sweating or dampness usually occurring in ships on such voyages. If, as is contended, the flour was soured by the steam arising from the sugar, that fact could be shown by its smell or taste, as in such case the flavor of the sugar, it is proved, is imparted to the flour. There is no proof that this was so affected. So, also, in respect to this portion of the cargo, the small damage occurring might be with much reason ascribed either to causes inherent in the article, or to those engendered in its consecutive changes of climate, in the transportation from the mills where it was manufactured to this market, although it was apparently merchantable and sound when delivered to the ship. The evidence shows that cargoes of flour thus circumstanced are so frequently found slightly deteriorated when delivered here, as to establish that to be a probable if not necessary concomitant of such course of transportation.

The remaining inquiry relates to the six hundred and one barrels, and involves two considerations:—

1. Whether the sugar and corn, or either, have been direct and active agents in producing the damage sustained by the flour.

2. Whether it was improper stowage to place the flour in proximity with those articles, in the manner in which this cargo was laden, so as to subject the master to answer for the consequences.

There is no evidence but that the sugar casks were sound and properly coopered, or that there was any actual leakage from them. I do not rehearse the proofs as to the effect of stowing flour in a close hold in connection with sugar and corn. Very many witnesses were examined, and the result of the testimony on this point must be taken as establishing that such stowage as was made in the lower hold of this ship would account for the damage received by the flour, and that these consequences would most probably follow from it. The stowage, itself, was every way proper in securing the hogsheads, barrels, and bags in their places; but the sugar and corn exposed the hold to an extraordinary heat and dampness by their exhalations, which would naturally be prejudicial to the flour exposed thereto.

Five hundred and fifty-three barrels were taken from the lower hold, all in a very bad state. These had been placed on hogsheads of sugar, and sixty or eighty bags of corn thrown in among the barrels, or on them, and then the hatch between decks was battened down. The rest of the flour was placed between decks, where cotton and corn were also stowed.

I do not find enough in the proof to satisfy my mind that any part of the flour between decks was injured by the evaporations or fumes from the sugar, and think whatever damage it sustained may be imputable to the ordinary sweating and dampness of a sound, tight ship on such voyage.

But it appears to me that the evidence very satisfactorily establishes that a moving cause, if not the proximate one, of the damage to the flour in the lower hold, was the placing it in tiers over hogsheads of sugar, and stowing amongst and over the barrels, bags of Indian corn. The proof is direct and full from persons conversant with like shipments, and employed in receiving such cargoes from New Orleans and storing them here, that the common consequence of placing sugar near flour, even in open situations, is to impart a smell and flavor to the flour, diminishing its value, and that the manner in which this cargo was stowed, in the lower hold of the ship, would naturally tend to communicate a like damage.

The testimony of several shipmasters of large experience, and also of marine surveyors and stevedores, has been given, all concurring that for many years past it has been the familiar usage with general ships, freighted at New Orleans, to lade cargoes in the manner done in this case; that the great bulk of shipments at New Orleans for this port, consists of cotton, sugar, and provisions, including flour; and that there is no objection raised by shippers, or hesitation on the part of stevedores and masters, in stowing flour in barrels properly dunnaged, over hogsheads of sugar, in any part of the ship, and that without regard to the time the sugar has been manufactured; and that this mode of lading cargoes in general ships at that port is notorious here and at New Orleans, to persons concerned in forwarding or receiving produce; and these witnesses are of opinion that such stowage does not of itself necessarily cause injury to flour laden in that manner.

The agents and shippers at New Orleans, and the respondents, are connected in business; and the bookkeeper of the respondents testifies that he wrote for them to their agents in New Orleans not to ship flour with sugar and corn on board.

Independent of the implied recognition of the course of business, this is direct evidence that the claimants were aware of the usage, and if they intended to have their goods carried in any other than the customary manner, it was incumbent on them to give the master specific directions.

A case involving a similar principle was decided in this court, in Sabbich v. Prince, [Case No. 12,192.] The agents of the respondents shipped at Bordeaux, in France, a quantity of mulberry trees on board of the libellant's vessel. The agents knew the vessel was laden with wines, and that the trees would be stored in the hold with the wines. No notice was given the libellant that such stowage would be hazardous to the trees. On delivery at this port they were all found to be dead; and it was contended by the respondents, on the proofs, that the destruction of the trees was occasioned by the effluvia and fumes generated in the hold by leakage or exhalations of the wines.

The decision of the court upon that branch of the case was, that the shipmaster was not liable for the destruction of the trees by that cause, for want of notice or caution to him, that the claimants would charge him with the risk, inasmuch as it appeared to be the usual and customary method of lading that description of cargo at the port of shipment.

The case of Faber v. The Newark, [Case No. 4,602,] decided in this court in February, 1844, turned in some measure upon the same doctrine; although in that case the additional particular was determined by the court, that the loss was occasioned by perils of the sea.

The action there was to recover damages to a lot of tobacco shipped with oil, grease and lard, and stained by the grease or oil which had leaked from the casks. The court intimated the opinion that the ship was discharged from liability by proving the casks to have been safely and properly stowed and secured by dunnage, and not so placed in relation to the tobacco as to expose the latter to be directly affected by the drainage or leakage of the casks, if such leakage had occurred as an ordinary incident of transportation.

So, also, I understand the rule to be laid down by Judge Story, in the case of The Reeside, [Case No. 11,657.] He rejects, to be sure, the proof of usage or custom in the trade, throwing, under like circumstances, the loss on the owners of the cargo, but only because it was offered in contradiction of and at variance with the express terms of the bill of lading.

The libellant, in that case, shipped on board the schooner several bales of carpeting, which were greatly injured on the voyage by oil which leaked from casks stowed contiguously to the carpeting. The libel alleged that the carpeting was improperly stowed near the oil casks. The judge says, in his opinion, "It would have been very fit and proper to have stowed the carpeting in a more prudent manner, in some other part of the vessel." But he determines that "there was no bad stowage in the case."

The decision against the vessel turned upon the fact that the master had taken the casks on board in very bad order, and very improperly coopered. 2 Sumn. 572, [The Reeside, supra.] The manifest implication is, that but for the positive fault of neglecting to cooper the casks sufficiently, the ship would not have been liable for a damage which was occasioned by the improvident proximity of the carpeting to the oil casks, and not to perils of the sea.

The question is one of great moment in relation to the mercantile navigation of this country, and viewed in connection with the common-law doctrine of the responsibility of common carriers, is not free from embarrassment and doubt.

The stringency of the common law, in respect to common carriers on land, is certainly relaxed in many particulars of importance, in its application to ships and ship-owners in the carriage of goods by water. Story, Bailm. §§ 509, 512, 513. If some of the English judges have recently indicated a disposition to fall back upon the rigor of the old doctrine, and enforce it against carriers by water, (Riley v. Horne, 5 Bing. 217,) and some American authorities have echoed the sentiment, (21 Wend. 190; 2 Story, 17, [Citizens' Bank v. Nantucket Steamboat Co., Case No. 2,730;] 3 Story, 349, [King v. Shepherd, Case No. 7,804,]) and have pushed it to the extremity that the liability cannot be restricted or qualified by notice of usage, (19 Wend. 234, 251; 21 Wend. 153, 354; 26 Wend. 591,) yet I think it is manifest that the gradual though slow advance in the amelioration of the ancient dogma in respect to common carriers, tends to place their implied responsibility on a footing, in its essential features, in harmony with that of other parties performing undertakings of trust for a reward, (2 McLean, 157, 540, [Maury v. Talmadge, Case No. 9,315; Hubbard v. Turner, Id. 6,819;] [Venable v. Bank of U. S.,] 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 115; [Stokes v. Saltonstall,] 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 181; 2 Brev. 178; 16 Vt. 52.) And, indeed, it is difficult to reconcile the anomalous severity of the liabilities imposed by law upon common carriers with the rational obligations of a hiring or trust, except upon the assumption that they undertake their employments with full assent to become insurers. If the rule and measure of their liability were now to be first introduced into our jurisprudence, it can scarcely be expected that it would be framed or sanctioned upon the implication that they were to be dealt with as common thieves and robbers; yet that seems the essential groundwork of the old rule.

No reason, very palpable to the understanding, exists for discriminating between the responsibility of a person undertaking to transport goods from place to place, and that of another who is the depositary of them. In the ordinary course of things there is an equal opportunity to the depositary as to the carrier to convert the goods, if such be his disposition, to his own use; and the same risk of having them lost to the owner through accident or exposure, involuntarily on the part of the depositary, and without any means of proving fault or negligence against him. Yet warehousemen, wharfingers, &c., are relieved of the operation of the rule governing the carrier who brings goods to or takes them from his charge. 2 Kent, Comm. 591, 600, 601, and notes.

In the decision of this cause, however, I do not intend to trench upon the rules fixing the liability of carriers, further than those rules may be claimed to bind them as absolute insurers of the goods transported, irrespective of the custom or usage of the business or trade with which the transaction is connected, and regardless of deterioration or loss of the goods by inscrutable natural agencies, without fault of the carrier.

I hold, in this case, that the flour was stowed conformably to the usage of the trade in freighting in general ships, known to the respondents; that the ship was sound and tight; that the shipment was delivered in apparently like condition to that in which it was received on board, except slight stains upon the barrels from mould or damp, which are not proved to have affected their contents; that the libellants are not responsible for injuries received by the flour in consequence of the mere sweating of the ship, or in consequence of exhalations or vapors arising from other parts of the cargo, which was well stowed and secured. I accordingly pronounce in favor of the libellants for the freight and primage demanded, and costs of suit to be taxed. Decree accordingly.

Case No. 1,125.

BAXTER et al. v. LELAND et al.

[1 Blatchf. 526.][1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Oct. Term, 1849.[2]

SHIPPING—STOWAGE—CUSTOM OF TRADE—CARRIER'S LIABILITY.

1. Where an established and well known usage exists in a particular trade, in regard to the stowage of a general ship, both as to the manner of stowing and as to the different articles to be stowed together, one who ships goods by such a vessel is chargeable with notice of the usage and must give special instructions if he desires a change in the mode of stowage.

[Distinguished in The Fanny Fosdick, Case No. 4,641. Cited in The Colonel Ledyard, Id. 3,027; The Free State, Id. 5,090; Fleishman v. The John P. Best, Id. 4,861.]

2. Where such usage exists, a shipper who is chargeable with notice of it, and gives no special instructions, and whose goods are stowed in accordance with the usage, is deemed to have assented to the mode of stowage, and cannot, in case his goods are injured on the voyage in consequence of the mode of stowage, set that up as a ground of complaint, or as a foundation for depriving the owners of the vessel of their freight.

[Cited in Goddefroy v. The Live Yankee, Case No. 5,496; Lamb v. Parkman, Id. 8,020. Distinguished in The Fanny Fosdick, Id. 4,641. Cited in The Colonel Ledyard, Id. 3,027; Fleishman v. The John P. Best, Id. 4,861; The T. A. Goddard, 12 Fed. 177; The Chasca, 23 Fed. 159; The City of Alexandria, Id. 829; The Keystone, 31 Fed. 414; Hills v. Mackill, 36 Fed. 704; The Dan, 40 Fed. 692.]

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the southern district of New York.

[In admiralty. Libel by Sylvester Baxter and others against Leland, Adams & Co. The district court rendered a decree for libellants. Baxter v. Leland, Case No. 1,124. Respondents appeal. Affirmed.]

This was an appeal from the district court, where Sylvester Baxter and others, owners of the ship Cleone, filed a libel in personam against Leland, Adams & Co., to recover the freight and primage on a quantity of flour transported for the respondents from New-Orleans to New-York in that vessel. The principal ground of defence was, that the cargo of the ship was improperly stowed, and that the flour was damaged during the voyage, in consequence of its being placed in the hold of the ship on the top of hogsheads of new sugar, and under sacks or bags of Indian corn. In reply, the libellants urged that the storage of the cargo was in consonance with the common and well known usage in the case of general ships engaged in freighting from New-Orleans to the northern Atlantic ports. The district court pronounced in favor of the libellants, and the respondents appealed to this court.

[1] [Reported by Samuel Blatchford, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

[2] [Affirming Case No. 1,124.]

Erastus C. Benedict, for libellants.
Albon P. Man, for respondents.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. The evidence is conclusive in favor of the libellants, that the stowage of the cargo was according to the well known and well established custom and usage in the case of a general ship in the trade from New-Orleans to New-York, carrying the products of the country which are usually shipped from that port; and this, in respect not only to the manner of stowage, but also to the different articles and products stowed together in the hold of the vessel—such as the stowage of barrels of flour and bags of corn upon the top of hogsheads of sugar. The most experienced merchants, surveyors, and stevedores in the trade, with scarcely an exception, affirm the usage. The respondents are chargeable with notice of this usage and custom, and consequently must have known that their flour would be thus stowed in the absence of instructions to the contrary.

But, besides being thus chargeable with notice, it appears that the respondents were in fact aware of the usage, and had sent orders to their agents not to ship flour stowed upon hogsheads of sugar, thereby, impliedly at least, conceding the usage; and also, that instructions to the ship-owner were necessary, to ensure a change in the practice of lading. Several witnesses, who state that experience has shown that flour when stowed with sugar is subject to particular damage from heat and vapor arising from fermentation occasioned by the mixing of the drainings of the sugar with water in the hold of the vessel, add, that they have given standing instructions to their agents at New-Orleans, not to ship their flour with hogsheads of sugar.

It further appears, from some of the witnesses, that it is within the past year the discovery has been made, that flour stowed in the way complained of is subject to special damage from the drainings and vapor of the sugar; and that it is only within this period that orders have been given by some of the houses in the trade to change the mode of shipment. Mr. Sherwood, of the house of Suydam, Sage & Co., largely engaged in this trade, says, that a great deal of the flour received from New-Orleans previous to the last year arrived in a damaged state; but that, since ordering it not to be shipped with sugar or corn, it has arrived in better order. It appears to me, therefore, that under the strong and very decided evidence that this cargo was stowed as every other cargo of the kind is stowed in a general ship in this trade, and it being, of course, well known and understood by the respondents that their flour would be thus shipped unless they gave instructions to the contrary, they must be taken and deemed to have assented to the mode of shipment, and are not now at liberty to set it up as a ground of complaint, or a foundation for depriving the owners of their freight. The flour was shipped in the way in which they must have supposed it would be shipped, and in which the flour of others had always been theretofore shipped from New-Orleans to New-York, unless special directions were given to the contrary. If there was any fault, it was that of the trade and of the dealers engaged in it, including shippers, as well as ship-owners, surveyors, and stevedores; in a word, of all persons connected with or concerned in it.

Without, therefore, enquiring into the origin or cause of the damage, or determining the particular head under which it would properly fall were it not attributable to the stowage of the articles of flour and sugar in juxtaposition, with a view to exempt the ship from responsibility, but assuming that even the principal part arose from the stowage, as upon the evidence it probably did, yet, on the ground briefly stated, it seems to me it cannot be chargeable to the ship, even upon the most stringent principles applicable to the common carrier, regard being had to the weight and force of the evidence concerning the usage in the stowage of the vessel.

Decree affirmed.

Case No. 1,126.

BAXTER et al. v. MAXWELL.

[4 Blatchf. 32.] [1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. April 21, 1857.

CUSTOMS DUTIES—PROSPECTIVE PROTEST AND SUBSEQUENT ENTRY—HEMP CARPETING.

1. Semble, that the term, "a manufacture of hemp," used in a tariff act, cannot properly include an article generally known in commerce as "hemp carpeting," but in the manufacture of which no material is used which is in fact hemp, or is so called in commercial parlance.

2. Where 30 per cent. duties were charged on an article, under Schedule C of the tariff act of July 30th, 1846, (9 Stat. 44, 45,) as being "carpeting," and, on the payment of the duties, a protest was made, claiming that the article was non-enumerated, and subject to a duty of 20 per cent. under the act, and, on the trial of a suit to recover back the excess, the jury found that the article was "a manufacture of hemp," on which, under Schedule E of the act, the duty was 20 per cent.: Held, that, as the jury found that the article was an enumerated one, the protest was insufficient.

3. A clause, in these words, "and hereby protest on all future entries of the same goods," added at the end of a protest, cannot have any effect as a prospective protest, to aid an insufficient specific protest, subsequently made.

4. Whether such a sweeping prospective protest ought to be held good, in respect to entries at such a port as New York, under the act of February 26th, 1845, (5 Stat. 727,) quere.

5. The case of Marriott v. Brune, 9 How. [50 U. S.] 619, was peculiar, and should not be extended.

6. Where the article in the entry in which such prospective protest was made, was described therein as "linens," "hemp covering," and "jute rove:" Held, that such prospective protest could not apply to a subsequent entry, without protest, of the same article, as "linens," or as "hemp carpet covering." or as "hemp carpeting;" but that it was sufficient to cover a subsequent entry, without protest, of the same article, as "jute rove," the two importations being within three weeks of each other, and no protest having been made on any intermediate importation of the article.

[1] [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

7. Where, after such prospective protest was made, five successive importations of the same article were made and entered, with specific protests, some of which were sufficient and some insufficient, and afterwards importations of it were made and entered without protests: Held, that such prospective protest could not extend to these last importations.

[Cited in Fauche v. Schell, 33 Fed. 343.]

8. A specific protest, which does not refer to or affirm a prior prospective protest, must be regarded as evidence of the abandonment of all grounds of objection.

At law. This was an action [by Edward Baxter and William E. Baxter] against [Hugh Maxwell] the collector of the port of New York, to recover back an alleged excess of duties, paid under protest, on an article known in commerce as "hemp carpeting." [Verdict was given for plaintiffs, subject to the opinion of the court on certain points in the case. Judgment for plaintiffs.]

It was shown, on the trial, before Betts, [District Judge,] that the article was generally known in commerce by that name; that it was sometimes bought and sold as jute carpeting; that it did not contain a single fibre of hemp, in the proper and ordinary signification of that term; that it was manufactured at Dundee, wholly from jute, the material from which gunny-bags and gunny cloth are made; that jute was extensively produced in Bengal, and was sometimes called "Indian hemp;" that, although it was the fibre of a plant which resembled the nettle family more than it resembled the article generally designated, in trade and commerce, by the simple name of "hemp," it was sometimes called "jute hemp;" and that it had been sometimes classed as "hemp" or "flax," at the custom-house. Reference was made to McCulloch's Commercial Dictionary, London edition of 1850, article "Hemp." The duties were assessed at 30 per cent. ad valorem, under Schedule C of the tariff act of July 30th, 1846, (9 Stat. 44, 45,) the collector claiming that the article was embraced in that schedule, under the description of "carpeting, being either Aubusson, Brussels, ingrain, Saxony, Turkey, Venetian, Wilton, or any other similar fabric." The plaintiff claimed that the article was chargeable with only 20 per cent. duty, either as falling within the description of "manufactures of hemp, not otherwise provided for," under Schedule E of that act, or as a non-enumerated article, under section 3 of the act. The entries of the article were eighteen in number, and were made at various dates between April 29th, 1852, and April 23d, 1853. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiffs for $1900, subject to adjustment at the custom-house, and subject also to the opinion of the court as to the sufficiency of the protests.

John S. McCulloh, for plaintiffs.
John McKeon, Dist. Atty., for defendant.

HALL, District Judge. Looking only to the testimony, as stated in the case, I should infer that the jury must have found that the commercial name of the article in question is "hemp carpeting," and not that it is "a manufacture of hemp." If it is, in fact, "a manufacture of hemp," it should be classed under Schedule E, which embraces "manufactures of hemp, not otherwise provided for," and be deemed an enumerated article, chargeable with a duty of 20 per cent. If it is not "a manufacture of hemp," (even though, by a long continuance of an original misnomer, it had acquired the commercial name of "hemp carpeting," and might be properly classed as such,) then it must be deemed a non-enumerated article, and be chargeable with a like duty of 20 per cent., under the third section of the act. If the verdict had found, in express terms, that it was "a manufacture of hemp," or that it was not a manufacture of hemp, but its commercial name or designation was "hemp carpeting," though manufactured wholly of jute, there would have been little ground for controversy. But I do not understand, from the language of the case, that the verdict was special upon these two points, and I am left to infer the finding of the jury in respect thereto, from the evidence stated in the case, the charge of the judge, the general verdict of the jury, and the admissions of the counsel upon the argument of the case.

The case sets forth, that the court, in charging the jury, stated that it was their province to ascertain the commercial name of the article in question, and how it was bought and sold in commerce; that they were to find whether it belonged to the 30 per cent. schedule, as Wilton, Brussels, Aubusson, or other carpeting of similar fabric, or to the 20 per cent. schedule, as a "manufacture of hemp;" that, if it was known as "hemp carpeting," and not by any other name, then it belonged to the 20 per cent. schedule; that, if the evidence did not satisfy the jury that the article came under the head of "a manufacture of hemp," nor under the head of "wool carpetings," then it was not known by any denomination in the act; that the case was resolved into a question of fact for the jury; and that, if the article was not known as "hemp carpeting," and if they found it had no commercial name, then they were to find it to be a non-enumerated article. The case then adds: "The jury, under the instructions of the court, rendered a verdict for the plaintiffs for $1900, subject to adjustment at the custom-house, and subject also to the opinion of the court as to the sufficiency of the protests."

The concluding portion of the charge is evidently not fully and correctly set forth in the case; and the verdict, if correctly set forth, is silent upon the question as to whether the jury deemed the article to be "a manufacture of hemp," and therefore properly classed under Schedule E, or to be "hemp carpeting," or "jute carpeting," and therefore properly dutiable as a non-enumerated article. It was, apparently, assumed, on the part of the defendant, on the argument, that the jury had found it to be "a manufacture of hemp," though no hemp entered into its composition; and the charge of the court, as stated, may, perhaps, justify the inference, that the jury understood the court as ruling, that if the true commercial name of the article in question was "hemp carpeting," they might properly find it to be "a manufacture of hemp," although it was incontestably proved that no hemp was used in its manufacture, and that they were simply to say whether it was "a manufacture of hemp," or embraced within the description of "carpeting" as defined in Schedule C. If the question were now before me for decision, I should, whilst recognizing the principle that the denomination of articles in tariff laws must be construed according to the commercial understanding of the terms used, and that, if the term "hemp carpeting" had been used in the tariff act of 1846, it would, under the evidence stated in the case, have included the article in question in this suit, although it had been conclusively proved that it was manufactured from a fibre entirely different from, and never classed as, hemp, have great difficulty in adopting the opinion, that when the term, "a manufacture of hemp," is used, it can properly include any article in the manufacture of which no material has been used which, in its raw state, or in the state in which it existed before its introduction into the particular manufacture, is, in fact, or in commercial parlance, embraced within the generic term, "hemp." But this question is not directly before me, and I am inclined to think that, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, and the course adopted by the counsel upon the argument, it is not even incidentally in controversy.

The only question reserved by the case is that of the sufficiency of the protests. On the argument, it was conceded by the counsel for the defendant, that the protests upon seven of the entries were sufficient. It was, in like manner, conceded by the counsel for the plaintiffs, that there were no specific protests in respect to seven others of the entries, and that the plaintiffs had no right of action in respect to the payment of duties on those entries, or any of them, unless the prospective portion of the protests on two of the first mentioned seven entries could be extended to and made to embrace entries subsequently made. The particular protests in regard to the sufficiency of which there was an argument at the hearing, were those made in the cases of the Lady Franklin, the Columbia, the Ocean Queen, the American Eagle and the Invincible.

In the case of the Lady Franklin, the entry was of eleven bales, containing linens; and, in the invoice presented at the time of the entry, two of the packages were invoiced as "padding," and the others as "carpeting." The custom-house marks on this entry and invoice indicate, (as I understand them), that the contents of all the packages were returned, or denominated by the appraisers, as "jute carpeting," and subjected to a duty of 30 per cent. The protest is "against paying 30 per cent. duty on the 'jute carpeting,' contained in this entry, claiming that, by the act of 30th July, 1846, [9 Stat. 44, 45,] said goods are considered a non-enumerated article, and, as such, liable to a duty of 20 per cent." This protest must, I think, be held to be insufficient. It claims that the article invoiced is non-enumerated, and that its true commercial designation is "jute carpeting," while the jury have, as I think I am bound to assume, found it to be "a manufacture of hemp." If they have found that it was "a manufacture of hemp," (as the counsel on both sides have assumed,) it was an enumerated and not a non-enumerated article. Indeed, the parties have, by their counsel, deliberately agreed, that the protests which claim the article to be "a manufacture of hemp," are sufficient; and this agreement necessarily involves the admission, for the purposes of the questions here presented, that it is a manufacture of hemp, and an enumerated and not a non-enumerated article. I therefore hold, that the protest in the case of this entry is not sufficient, and that the plaintiffs cannot recover in respect to any excessive payment made upon it.

The protest in respect to the payments under the entry by the Columbia, is based upon the claim, that the article is a "manufacture of jute;" and, for the reasons just given, this protest must be held to be insufficient.

The protest in respect to the payments under the remaining three entries are severally based upon the claim that the article entered is "manufactured hemp," which is a non-enumerated article. "A manufacture of hemp" and "manufactured hemp" are different articles, and there can be no pretence for claiming that the articles in question are properly designated as "manufactured hemp," either in common or in commercial parlance. These protests are therefore clearly insufficient, and the plaintiffs cannot recover in respect to these entries, unless they are covered by the prospective portion of the two prior protests before mentioned.

Those prior protests were conceded to be good in respect to the particular entries in which they were made; but it was insisted that they were insufficient to cover the subsequent entries. In the only one of the two prospective protests which is at all full and explicit, the plaintiffs, after stating their protest, and the grounds thereof, add: "We pay the amount exacted, in order to get possession of the goods, claiming to have the difference refunded, and hereby protest on all future entries of the same goods." In regard to the subsequent cases in which a specific protest was made, placing the objection to the payment of the 30 per cent. upon other and distinct grounds, I feel no difficulty in deciding that this prospective protest can have no effect. The fact that it has been held that such particular and specific protests were insufficient, because no good objection was distinctly and specifically stated therein, can make no difference. When these specific protests were subsequently made, without any reference to or affirmance of the prior prospective protests, the collector had a right to assume that all grounds of objection except those distinctly stated in the specific protest were abandoned; at least, in regard to the entry to which such specific protest applied. Therefore, the plaintiffs cannot recover any excess of duty paid on the entries as to which insufficient specific protests were made.

In respect to the cases in which no specific protests were made, and as to which the plaintiffs rely upon the prospective protest before mentioned, it appears that the articles entered in the case in which such prospective protest was made, are described in the entry as 2 packages of "jute rove," 12 packages of "hemp covering," and 13 packages of linens; and the claim in the protest is, "that, under the existing tariff, said goods are liable to a duty of 20 per cent. only, because they are manufactures of hemp." In the entries which are sought to be covered by this protest, the articles are described as 23 bales of "hemp carpet covering," 99 bales of linens, 7 bales of "hemp carpeting," 1 bale of "jute rove," 1 bale of "hemp matting," and 3 bales of "hemp covering." It may well be doubted whether such a sweeping prospective protest ought, under any circumstances, to be held good in respect to entries made at such a port as New York. The entries made there are so numerous, the necessity for the rapid transaction of business so pressing, and the number of persons employed in the custom-house so great, that such a prospective protest would not be likely to be kept in constant remembrance by the collector, or the subordinates having charge of his accounts, especially as such subordinates must be sometimes changed; and it certainly would not be a strict and full compliance with the act of February 26th, 1845, (5 Stat. 727,) which requires that the party protesting against the payment of duties shall set forth "distinctly and specifically the grounds of objection to the payment thereof." The case of Marriott v. Brune, 9 How. [50 U. S.] 619, was peculiar, and certainly should not be extended. Warren v. Peaslee, [Case No. 17,198.] Can it be possible that such a prospective protest, annexed to an entry of "linens" only, could be extended to all other importations of articles embraced within that very general and comprehensive term? I think not, and shall hold that this protest, as to the articles subsequently entered as "linens," is insufficient. The term "hemp covering" is a different term from "hemp carpet covering," and "hemp carpeting," used in the subsequent entries, and the collector was not bound to know that they were used to describe the same article, if such was indeed the fact. The "jute rove" is mentioned in one of the subsequent entries, and the two importations were within three weeks of each other, and no protest was made on any intermediate importation of the article. I am, therefore, inclined to hold, under the decision in Marriott v. Brune, [supra,] and the decisions in this circuit, that the protest in regard to the single bale of "jute rove," subsequently entered, is sufficient. In regard to the other subsequent entries, I shall hold the protest insufficient. The two entries next in order of date after the one in which the prospective protest referred to was made, were made without any protest, and, in regard to these, it may be assumed that the party relied on such prospective protest. These two entries describe the article as "hemp carpet covering," "linens," hemp carpeting," and "jute rove." On each of five successive importations thereafter a separate and specific protest was made, and I think the collector had a right to infer that the former prospective protest was not further relied upon. Two of those five specific protests were conceded to be sufficient, and the others have been adjudged insufficient. Following these five importations and entries with specific protests, four other importations and entries were made without any protest. Under such circumstances, it strikes me that the former prospective protests ought not to be extended to these last importations and entries, even though, in respect to them, no specific protest was made.

The plaintiffs must have judgment according to this opinion, unless the parties stipulate to reargue the matter, upon an amended case, or otherwise, which would seem to be the better course. Indeed, the case omits very many of the facts necessary to the determination of the questions reserved, and they have been decided upon the admissions of counsel made on the argument, and papers then furnished, which do not strictly form any part of the case. On the admissions of the counsel, and what I regard as an inaccurate statement of the charge of the court, I have held, (and I think necessarily,) that the jury found the articles in question to be "a manufacture of hemp"—a finding which, in my judgment, was wholly unwarranted by the testimony; and I have consequently ordered judgment for the plaintiffs on the ground that some of the protests are sufficient, whilst I am quite confident that, under a proper finding, they would necessarily be adjudged insufficient. I am, besides, clear, that the charge of the court is not fully and fairly set forth, and I entertain some doubts whether the verdict of the jury is properly stated in the case. If it was specific and distinct in regard to the character or true designation of the article in controversy, or if they found that it was "a manufacture of hemp," or that it was a non-enumerated article, known in commerce as "hemp carpeting," this should have been distinctly stated on the face of the case. For these and other reasons, I hope the case will be amended, and the cause again argued.

Case No. 1,127.

BAXTER v. NEW ENGLAND INS. CO.

[3 Mason, 96.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. Term, 1822.

MARINE INSURANCE—REPRESENTATIONS—TIME OF SAILING—RISK.

If the agent, in procuring insurance, represents, that the ship was not to sail until four days after another vessel, which came from the same port and had arrived, and, in point of fact, she had sailed four days before, and the difference of sailing is material to the risk, the policy is void.

At law. Assumpsit [by Robert Baxter against the New England Insurance Company] on a policy of insurance, dated on the 28th Sept. 1821, whereby Aaron Baldwin, "for whom it may concern, and payable to him in case of loss," procured insurance of "$4,000, on property on board the brig Robert, at and from Kingston, Jamaica, to St. Andrews, (N. B.) four per cent. on specie, and two per cent. on merchandise." Loss averred to be on the 24th of August, 1821, by pirates, of certain gold on board. Plea the general issue. [Judgment for defendant.]

At the trial the loss and interest in the plaintiff was proved or admitted; and the principal question was, whether there was not a misrepresentation avoiding the policy. On the 6th of August, 1821, the plaintiff (who was the master of the Robert) wrote to C. Curry (the agent in procuring the insurance through Baldwin), "I shall leave this on the 12th inst." On the 20th of September, Curry wrote to Baldwin for the insurance, and added in a postscript, "Mr. Patterson's brig James has arrived, with specie and produce, in thirty-two days." On the next day Curry wrote to Baldwin, "I am informed to-day by the master of the James, that she (the brig Robert) would not sail until four days after the James." Upon the communication of these letters, the insurance was procured. In fact the James sailed from Kingston on the 20th of August; the brig Robert sailed three or four days before that time; and the brig John and Robert was to sail three or four days after the James.

It was proved, that the difference of time, whether the brig Robert sailed before or after the James, whether on the 12th or 24th of August, was very material to the risk, as the very delay in her passage would give rise to suspicion of her being captured by pirates.

Mr. Shaw, for plaintiff.

Mr. Hubbard, for defendant.

STORY, Circuit Justice. I think upon this evidence, the plaintiff is not entitled to recover. There has been a material misrepresentation, and whether it be innocent or otherwise does not vary the legal result. It was represented in the first letter, that the brig Robert would sail on the 12th of August; in the second, that she would not sail until the 24th of August. In point of fact, she had sailed about the 16th of August. And this difference of time is proved to be material to the risk. See Fillis v. Brutton, Marsh. Ins. bk. 1, c. 10, § 2, p. 463. But see, also, Barber v. Fletcher, 1 Doug. 305; Marsh. Ins. p. 454; Bowden v. Vaughan, 10 East, 415.

Plaintiff nonsuit.

BAXTER, (WILLIAMS v.) See Case No. 17,715.

BAXTER, The EDGAR. See Case No. 4,278.

Case No. 1,128.

The BAYARD v. The COAL VALLEY.

[3 Pittsb. Rep. 165; 16 Pittsb. Leg. J. 204.]

District Court, W. D. Pennsylvania. Oct. Term, 1869.

COLLISION—EVIDENCE—REASONABLE DOUBT—DAMAGES.

[Where, in a collision case, the evidence leaves it open to a reasonable doubt as to which party was in fault, the loss must be sustained by the one upon whom it has fallen. The Grace Girdler, 7 Wall. (74 U. S.) 196, followed.]

[See Lucas v. The Thomas Swann, Case No. 8,588; The Nautilus, Id. 10,058; The Comet, Id. 3,050.]

[In admiralty. Libel for collision by the steamboat Bayard against the steamboat Coal Valley. Dismissed.]

Mr. Barton, for libelant.

E. P. Jones and Mr. Howard, for respondent.

McCANDLESS, District Judge. This is a case of collision of steamers navigating the Ohio river. The Coal Valley and the Arab, with a tow of eleven flats and barges, were ascending, when, at night, near Grave creek below Wheeling, they sighted the steamboat Bayard descending the river. They gave the authorized signals, indicating to the Bayard to take the starboard, or Virginia shore, which were properly and affirmatively answered by the Bayard. From this point of time there is a mass of conflicting and contradictory testimony, sufficient to unsettle the nerves of any admiralty judge, but from which I deduce this conclusion, that the lights required by law, were properly placed both upon the steamers and the tow; that both the ascending and descending boats designed to avoid a collision, and that it was caused by the defective steering apparatus of the Bayard. In any phase of the case it is not without doubt, and must therefore be decided upon the principle of The Grace Girdler, 7 Wall. [74 U. S.] 196, that where, in case of collision, with loss, there is reasonable doubt as to which party is to blame, the loss must be sustained by the one upon which it has fallen. The libel is dismissed with costs.

[1] [Reported by William P. Mason, Esq.]

Case No. 1,129.

BAYARD v. BAYARD.

[3 Pa. Law J. 261; 5 Pa. Law J. 160.]

Circuit Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. Nov. 15, 1845.

COURTS — FEDERAL AND STATE JURISDICTION — PROPERTY IN HANDS OF MARSHALL — LEVY BY SHERIFF.

1. Where the proceeds of goods levied on by the marshall under process from the United States' courts exceeds the amount of the executions in his hands, although a sheriff under process from the state courts cannot take possession of the property in the hands of the marshall, yet the defendant's interest in the surplus becomes vested in the sheriff, on the delivery to him of the execution from the state courts; nor can this be defeated by any process subsequently issued out of the United States' courts.

[Cited in Re Johnston, Case No. 7,424.]

2. The proceeds will be treated as if but one jurisdiction existed, and moneys paid into court will be awarded to the party who could have recovered from the marshall, had the money remained in his hands.

[At law. Action by R. H. Bayard against Henry M. Bayard. Judgment was given for plaintiff.] Sur rule to show cause why R. H. Bayard should not take money out of court, [the surplus of proceeds of defendant's property after satisfying prior judgments. Rule discharged. Heard also on motion by the Bank of Middletown for the same purpose. Granted.]

William Rawle, for R. H. Bayard.

Benjamin Gerhard, for the Farmers' Bank of Delaware.

Benjamin H. Brewster, for the Bank of Middletown.

RANDALL, District Judge. On the 23d of August, 1845, several writs of fieri facias were issued out of this court at the suits of various plaintiffs, against Henry M. Bayard, and were on the same day delivered to the marshall, who by virtue thereof, levied upon and sold the personal property of the defendant, situate in Dauphin and Lancaster counties; the sale commencing in Dauphin on the 8th and ending in Lancaster county on the 11th of September; the sales in Dauphin county not being sufficient to satisfy the executions then in the hands of the marshall, but the aggregate amount of both sales, producing a surplus of about $1500 after satisfying all the executions then in his hands. This surplus having been demanded by several claimants, the marshall has paid the money into court, where the several parties have urged their respective claims to receive it. On the 28th of August, 1845, the Farmers' Bank of Delaware issued a fieri facias on a judgment obtained against the defendant in the court of common pleas of Dauphin county, which was delivered to the sheriff of that county on the same day. On the 9th of September, 1845, two writs of fieri facias were issued on judgments entered in the court of common pleas of Lancaster county in favour of the Bank of Middletown, against the defendant, and delivered to the sheriff of Lancaster county on the morning of that day. Verbal notice of these last mentioned writs was given to the marshall on the 10th of September, by the sheriff of Lancaster county, who made return as follows: "September 11th, 1845, levied on a quantity of ore on the bank of the canal, near Columbia, a quantity of tools, &c., at the ore bank, subject to the levy made by the United States' marshall." On the 11th of September, R. H. Bayard issued a fieri facias on a judgment obtained by him in this court, which was delivered to the marshall at 1 o'clock p. m. of that day. To this writ the marshall returned, that "Before this execution came to hand, I had levied on property of the defendant under prior executions, and sold the same from the 8th to the 11th of September."

The plaintiff in this judgment (R. H. Bayard), claims the money paid into court, and contends that the executions issued from the state courts could have no effect, inasmuch as the property sold was in the custody and possession of the marshall, by virtue of his prior levy when these executions issued, and therefore not liable to any process issued from the courts of the state; and the case of Hagan v. Lucas, 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 400, is cited in support of this claim. In that case it is decided, that "property once levied on remains in the custody of law and is not liable to be taken by another execution in the hands of a different officer, and especially by an officer acting under a different jurisdiction." To this doctrine I most fully assent, and agree that "a most injurious conflict of jurisdiction would be likely often to arise between the federal and state courts, if the final process of the one could be levied on property which had been taken by the process of the other." The sheriff of Dauphin or of Lancaster county, could not therefore by virtue of the process placed in his hands, take the property levied on out of the custody of the marshall. The executions in his hands, vested the property in him to the extent of the debt, interest and costs on those executions, but no more: if he levied on property of the defendant exceeding in value the amount of the executions in his hands, then for the excess he was a trespasser. Wats. Sher. 175. It is true, the law does not require a marshall or sheriff to determine exactly the value of the property levied on by him, and if his proceedings appear to have been bona fide, will not visit him with vindictive damages, if the goods levied on produce more than the amount of the execution; but the property in the excess remains in the defendant, who may execute an assignment or transfer of such property, and the assignee would have a right to receive it from the marshall in preference to any subsequent lien; or if no subsequent change of property takes place, the defendant would be entitled to receive any surplus remaining in the hands of the marshall after satisfying the executions. The defendant then retained an interest in the property subject to the levy by the marshall, and although the sheriff could not take possession of the property levied on or remove it from the custody of the marshall, the delivery of the executions from the state courts to the sheriff, divested the interest of the defendant (whatever that may have been), and vested it in the sheriff for the use of the plaintiffs in the executions, as firmly as if he had executed a formal and voluntary assignment of such interest, —Act of 16th June, 1836, [P. L. 761,]—and this could not be defeated by any process subsequently issued by the courts of the United States,—Prince v. Bartlett, 8 Cranch, [12 U. S.] 431; Beaston v. Farmers' Bank of Delaware, 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 136. The sheriff could maintain an action to recover the amount of that interest before the return day, although no levy had been made by him. 2 Serg. & R. 157; 1 Wash. C. C. 29, [Barnes v. Billington, Case No. 1,015;] 3 Wash. C. C. 60, [Berry v. Smith, Case No. 1,359;] 1 Baldw. 246, [Thompson v. Phillips, Case No. 13,974;] 1 Pa. Law J. 317, [Ex parte Dudley, Case No. 4,114.] In this view of the law there can be no conflict between the federal and state courts; each will proceed within the limits of its prescribed jurisdiction, and if from any cause, property or its proceeds which is legally subject to the jurisdiction of the one, should come under the equitable control of the other, it will be disposed of as though there had been but one jurisdiction. And in the distribution of moneys paid into court, the court will always award it to the party who would have a right to recover it from the marshall or sheriff, had it remained in his hands. In the present case, the amount of money in court, not being sufficient to satisfy either of the executions issued from the state courts, prior to the fieri facias of R. H. Bayard, the rule to show cause why he should not take the money out of court, is discharged.

At a subsequent day, B. H. Brewster moved for leave for the Bank of Middletown to take the money out of court, the surplus having been raised by sales of the property in Lanacster county. This was opposed by Mr. Gerhard, who contended that the executions in Lancaster county had been prematurely issued. THE COURT said, if the executions were irregular, the court from whence they issued ought to have been moved to set them aside; they were not void, and the sheriff could have justified under them. [Blaine v. The Charles Carter,] 4 Cranch, [8 U. S.] 332. But time would be allowed to apply to the common pleas of Lancaster county; this was done, and that court refused to interfere, when Mr. Brewster's motion was granted and the money paid to the Bank of Middletown.

Case No. 1,130.

BAYARD v. COLEFAX et al.

[4 Wash. C. C. 38.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. New Jersey. April Term, 1820.

TRUSTS—ABUSE OF TRUST—REMEDY—EJECTMENT—PLEADING—PARTIES.

1. By the conveyance of the trustee in 1770, under whom the plaintiff claims the legal estate, the possession passed to him in like manner as if he had actually entered; and having been once in him, the law presumes it to have continued until a dispossession is shown.

2. The plaintiff is one of the cestui que trusts among whom the trustee made partition, and by deed conveyed the legal estate of the plaintiff's share to him. It does not lie with the defendant, who has no title, to question the conduct of the trustee. The trustee had a legal right to pass the legal estate to the plaintiff, and he has done so, which is a sufficient title in ejectment. If the trustee has abused his trust, he may be called upon to account for it by those who have been injured, in a court of equity, but not in a court of law, which can only notice legal titles.

3. The correct rule relative to joining parties in ejectment, is stated in 5 Johns. 278; that when two or more persons, holding separate and distinct possessions of the land sued for, are united in the same declaration, jointly enter into the same common rule, and plead jointly, judgment may be given against them separately, if their separate possessions are found by the jury; and there is no difference whether the separate possession of each defendant is found by the jury, or stated in the demurrer to evidence.

[Cited in Gibbons v. Martin, Case No. 5,381.]

At law. Ejectment [by the lessee of Bayard against Colefax and Schuyler] for a part of a certain tract of land lying in the county of Morris, called the Bog or Fly meadow. The cause came before the court upon a de-murrer to the evidence, taken by the defendants, and joined by the lessor of the plaintiff. [Judgment for plaintiff.]

[1] [Originally published from the MSS. of Hon. Bushrod Washington, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, under the supervision of Richard Peters, Jr., Esq.]

The facts stated in the demurrer are as follows:

The heirs and legal representatives of Anthony Brockholst, Aarent Schuyler, and Nicholas Bayard, who had died seised of the above tract of land, each entitled to one equal third part thereof, in common; finding it inconvenient, if not impossible, on account of their number, to settle and adjust various disputes which had arisen with persons who had taken possession of, and claimed title to parts of the said tract of land, deemed it best, (as the recital in the deed states) to vest the legal title to this land in certain trustees, to enable them to commence and prosecute suits for the recovery of the same. They accordingly executed a deed, bearing date the 26th of September 1770, whereby they conveyed the whole of the same bog to three trustees, and to the survivor of them in fee simple. This deed having by some means been lost, or destroyed, the demurrer states that its contents are set forth in the recital, in an act of the legislature of New Jersey, passed on the first of June 1786, [Sess. Laws, 320,] upon the petition of the cestui que trusts in the said deed, or a large majority of them in number and value; which prayed that the legislature would invest the trustees named in the said deed with additional powers, and would vest the title to the said bog, as far as the same was originally vested in Brockholst, Schuyler, and Bayard, in the said trustees in fee simple, for the purposes mentioned in the said deed of 1770, and for the further purpose of reclaiming, dividing and making partition of the property amongst those who should appear to be entitled to the same under the original owners. The act is in strict conformity with the petition.[2]

Ejectments were brought by the trustees against the intruders on the above land, and the boundaries of the bog were particularly ascertained and settled by a report of the referees, which was confirmed by a judgment of the court sometime in the year 1794. By another act of the legislature, dated the 28th of February 1806, [Sess. Laws, 597,] passed upon the application of the representatives of Henry Brockholst, one of the sons of the above mentioned Anthony Brockholst, all the estate whereof the said Henry died seised was vested in certain trustees, in trust to divide the same, or to sell it and distribute the proceeds amongst the devisees of the said Henry, and their legal representatives. These trustees took possession of two thirds of the bog, being, as they supposed, the right of the said Henry Brockholst, as the share of Anthony Brockholst, and another third, as the share of Nicholas Bayard, which they supposed had been conveyed by him to Anthony Brockholst. In point of fact, Henry Brockholst was entitled to only one fifth of the one third part which had belonged to his father, and the trustees were mistaken in supposing that Bayard's part had been conveyed by him to A. Brockholst. Acting however under this mistake, those trustees sold two third parts of the said land in the years 1809 and 1810, and upon the petition of the purchasers under those sales, the legislature, on the 18th of February 1813, passed an act to repeal the aforesaid act of 1786, and making certain provisions as to the money received by the trustees upon the above sales. Elias Boudinot, the surviving trustee under the deed of 1770, after due notice given in the public papers, proceeded to make partition of the bog, (except the part laid off for the payment of the costs and expenses,) amongst the legal representatives of the three original proprietors, allotting, by metes and bounds, one third part thereof to the representatives of each; and Stephen N. Bayard, the lessor of the plaintiff, being entitled in his own right, as one of the representatives of Nicholas Bayard, and as assignee of others of the said representatives of the said Nicholas Bayard to the quantity of two hundred and forty-four acres, Mr. Boudinot, by deed dated the 15th of September 1818, conveyed to him, in fee simple, the above mentioned quantity, by metes and bounds. This deed recites the trust deed of 1770, and the act of 1786; by virtue of which two instruments, the deed states, the said Boudinot and his co-trustees in their life time, were seised of the said bog as joint tenants. The demurrer to evidence further states, that the above deed to the lessor of the plaintiff, comprehends the premises in dispute; and that, at the time of the service of the declaration in ejectment in this action, the defendant Schuyler was in possession of part of the premises in dispute, holding the same by himself in severalty; and that Colefax, the other defendant, was in possession of another part of the premises, holding the same by himself and in severalty.

[2] The first section of this act vests in the trustees named in the deed of 1770, in fee simple, all the right and title of the original proprietors to this bog, and declares that the title of the said original proprietors shall be taken, and admitted in all courts of law and equity, as vested in the said trustees, subject, however, to the conditions, trusts and directions afterwards mentioned. The second section directs the trustees, as soon as might be, to ascertain according to due course of law, by compromise or arbitration, the boundaries of the bog, and to cause the same to be marked. The third section declares that it shall be lawful for the trustees to cause the said bog to be drained in such manner as they may judge most beneficial for its improvement, the expenses whereof, having been audited and allowed by the chief justice of the state, were to be a lien on the said land. The fourth section enacts that after the said charges have been so audited and allowed, the trustees should lay off so much of the said bog, as in their opinion would be sufficient for satisfying and paying all such charges and expenses, as well as such that might attend the partition of the property as thereafter mentioned, and thereupon the trustees are directed to sell the part so laid off, for defraying the said charges, &c. and after paying the same to divide the residue of the purchase money, if any, amongst those entitled to partition of the remaining part of the bog. The fifth section declares that thereupon the trustees shall proceed to examine into, and ascertain the title of each person claiming any part of said bog, under the original proprietors, and to make a just partition of the same among the claimants according to equity and justice, and to execute deeds to the several claimants for their respective shares so adjudged and determined by the trustees.

In support of the demurrer, it was contended by Ewing and Wall, for the defendants, that the plaintiff cannot recover:

1. Because it is not stated in the demurrer that the lessor of the plaintiff or those under whom he claims, was in possession of the premises within twenty years prior to the bringing of the action. See the act of limitations, (Patterson's Laws, 353, 354.)

2. Because the act of 1786 was repealed by that of 1813, and consequently Mr. Boudinot the trustee had no powers but what he derived under the deed of 1770; which gave him no authority to make partition and conveyances of the property. Or that, if it was not repealed, then under the act of 1786, the trustees were not authorized to perform those acts until the bog was drained and a number of other acts performed, none of which appear to have been performed.

3. Because the possessions of the defendants being stated to be several, they could not be jointly sued in one ejectment. Runn. Ej. 69.

In answer to the first objection, Griffith and Richard Stockton, for the plaintiff, contended that the deed of bargain and sale to the trustees passed the actual possession to them, which the law presumes continued in them, unless an ouster had been shown. Patterson's Laws, 6.

2. Admitting the act of 1786 to have been repealed by that of 1813, the legal estate continued in the trustees under the act of 1770, and they had a right to convey it to the cestui que trusts, who alone can question the validity of the deed to the lessor of the plaintiff, or any other of the acts or omissions of the trustees. The defendants who set up no title, have certainly no such right.

In answer to the third point, they relied upon 2 Johns. 438; 5 Johns. 278.

[Before WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice, and PENNINGTON, District Judge.]

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice, after stating the case, proceeded.

Upon the facts stated in the demurrer, the defendants' counsel have raised the following objections to the plaintiff's recovery:

1. That it does not appear that the lessor of the plaintiff, or those under whom he claims, was in possession of the premises at any time within twenty years prior to the bringing of this action, and consequently that his action is barred by the act of limitations of this state, passed in the year 1799, [Feb. 7; 23 Sess. Laws, 456.]

To this objection, it is a conclusive answer, that by the conveyance to the original proprietors Schuyler, Brockholst and Bayard, the possession passed in like manner as if the grantees had taken actual possession, and that the trust deed of 1770 operated in like manner to vest the possession in the trustees. The law of this state, passed on the 17th of March 1713, (Patterson's Laws, 6,) is express upon this subject. Independent of this, the demurrer states that in 1772, the trustees entered upon the land and took actual possession. The possession then having once been in the trustees, the law presumes it to have continued in them, until an ouster of dispossession is shown by the other side. There is nothing stated in the demurrer which can be construed into a disturbance of the possession then shown to have existed in the trustees prior to the years 1809 and 1810, when sales were made to certain persons under the act of 1806. But this was far short of twenty years prior to the bringing of this action, which was in 1818, and consequently the case is clear of this objection.

The next objection is, that the act of June 1786, having been repealed by that of the 18th of February 1813, the surviving trustee was thrown back upon the deed of 1770, which gave him no power to make partition of the land, or to execute conveyances to the cestui que trusts. Or if the act of 1786 was not repealed, then by force of its provisions, the trustees were not authorized to make partition and conveyances until after the bog was drained, the expenses paid, and the title of the several claimants under the original proprietors examined into and ascertained. Then these acts not having been performed, the deed to the lessor of the plaintiff passed no title to him. The view which I take of this objection will render it unnecessary to examine the arguments of the counsel, on the one side to maintain, and on the other to deny the validity of the repealing law of 1813; because, if the defendants' counsel be right in asserting its validity, it nevertheless does not follow, nor is it even contended that the trust deed was not in as full operation after the repeal, as it was at and previous to the passage of the repealed law. It is clear that the title of the trustees under the deed of 1770 to the legal estate in this property, was not, and could not have been divested by the act of 1786; and that no estate passed under that act to the trustees, which could impugn their former title, although it might operate as a statutory confirmation of it. This being the case, the right of the surviving trustee, clothed as he was with the legal estate in fee simple, to convey the same to whom, and in what manner he might think proper, cannot be questioned in a court of law, nor can the title of his grantee be impugned, unless it be by some person having a better legal title in himself to oppose to it. The defendants have shown no title, either legal or equitable; but did they even stand upon the high ground of cestui que trusts, they could not be permitted, in a court of law, to set up their equitable, against the legal estate of the trustee.

It is contended that the trustees had no authority, by the deed of 1770, to make partition of the land, and to convey the same to those entitled to the equitable estate. Let this be granted; still they were the legal owners of the estate, subject to the trusts declared in the deed; and if none were declared, they held for the grantors by way of a resulting trust. If they have exercised powers not conferred upon them, and performed acts in violation of their duty as trustees, it is in a court of equity only that they can be called to answer, and it is there only that their errors, or mal-administration can be scrutinized and corrected. The reason is, that before that tribunal, an equitable title may be opposed to a legal one; besides which, there is no other tribunal which can so conveniently investigate the conduct of trustees, and administer an adequate remedy to the parties. If they have conveyed away the trust property in derogation of the rights of the cestui que trust, the purchaser, if he had notice of the trust, is treated in that court as a trustee, in relation to the property so purchased; but he is nevertheless considered as the legal owner of the estate, for the use of those entitled to the equitable title. The case is in no respect varied, if we should agree with the plaintiff's counsel, that the act of 1786 was not repealed. For upon that supposition, Mr. Boudinot and his associates were constituted trustees for other purposes than those mentioned in the deed of 1770, but equally for the use of the grantors in that deed, and their representatives. I am aware of no distinction between a statutory trustee, and one who is so constituted by deed. Whether he be the one or the other, his legal title cannot, in a court of law, be questioned or opposed by an equitable claimant. In either case he is answerable to his cestui que trust for breaches of duty, before a court which places an equitable title upon as high ground as a legal one, and merely inquires which of the parties has the superior equity.

3. The last objection is formal. It occurred in the case of Jackson v. Woods, 5 Johns. 278, where it was decided, that when two or more persons holding distinct and separate possessions of the premises mentioned in the declaration of ejectment, are united in the same declaration, and jointly enter into the common rule, and plead; judgment may be given against them separately, if their separate possessions are found by the jury. With this opinion I concur; nor can I distinguish that from the present case, on the ground that the question there arose on a verdict, and here on a demurrer to evidence. The latter states that at the time of the service of the declaration, the defendants held their possessions in severalty, which is, in effect, the same as was found by the jury in the case referred to. It adds nothing to the objection in either case, that the particular parcels so severally held are not stated in the demurrer, or found by the jury. The plaintiff is to execute the writ of possession at his peril, and must take care that no more is taken from each defendant than he is entitled to.

PENNINGTON, District Judge. The case turns on the validity of the deed to Stephen Bayard, the lessor of the plaintiff, dated in 1818. The authority for making that deed is derived, as the recitals in it set forth, from the deed of 1770, and also from the act of the first of June 1786. This act had been repealed about five years before the deed to Bayard was executed; and I cannot perceive any constitutional objection to the repealing act. No rights to third persons had been gained under the repealed act. I cannot consider that act as any thing more or less than appointing the persons named in it commissioners, to perform towards this estate certain acts which it seems had not been done. The deed to Mr. Bayard then must rest on the authority of the deed of 1770. This, it is true, conveys a fee to Mr. E. Boudinot, and two other persons; in trust however to "to enable them to commence and prosecute suits, for the recovery of the land thereby conveyed; and to bring the same to an immediate settlement." The conveyance to Mr. Bayard was no part of their duty, and appears very extraordinary at this time, nearly fifty years after the trust was created. But it is contended that the legal estate being in Mr. Boudinot, and he leaving the same to Mr. Bayard, it is now vested in him, and I incline to think that this must be so, and that a court of law cannot take notice of a departure of a trustee from a strict adherence to the trust. In such a case the grantee must be considered as a trustee, for the benefit of the cestui que trust. I am not however satisfied, that in case of a conveyance fraudulently and collusively obtained from a trustee, a court of law would be compelled to carry it into effect. But if this character had been intended to be stamped on this deed, it ought to have been put to the jury to find the fact, and not left to the court to infer fraud. Judgment against Colefax for such part of the premises as is in his possession, and against the defendant Schuyler for the part in his possession.

BAYARD, (GRUBB v.) See Case No. 5,849.
BAYARD, (KONING v.) See Case No. 7,924.

Case No. 1,131.

BAYARD v. LATHY.

[2 McLean, 462.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Illinois. June Term, 1841.

NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS—ACCEPTANCE—WHAT CONSTITUTES.

1. A letter written within a reasonable time before, or after, the date of a bill of exchange, describing it, and promising to accept it, is a virtual acceptance.

2. An authority to draw several bills of exchange, payable at specified periods with an assurance that the bills should be paid, is an acceptance to the person who takes the bill on the credit of such an authority.

At law.

Cowles & Krum, for plaintiff.
Mr. ——, for defendant.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This was an action of assumpsit against the defendant, as acceptor of two bills of exchange, for $1,000 each, dated Dec. 13, 1838, drawn on the defendant, in favor of plaintiff, at Pittsburg, where plaintiff resides, by one James Gonsalis. [Verdict for plaintiff.]

Issue was joined on the defendant's plea of nonassumpsit, and a jury impanneled to try the same. The plaintiff gave in evidence to the jury the following letter, written by the defendant to the said Gonsalis, the drawer of the bills in question:

"Upper Alton, Oct. 12, 1838. James Gonsalis, Esq.: Dear Sir—You are hereby authorized to draw on me for one thousand dollars, at ten days sight; for one thousand dollars, at four months; for two thousand dollars, at eight months, and for one thousand dollars, at twelve months, and your drafts shall be duly paid. Yours, &c., H. K. Lathy."

Proof was made of the hand writing of Gonsalis, the drawer of the bills, and the bills then were permitted to be read to the jury.

It was contended by the plaintiff's counsel before the jury, and the principle so laid down by the court, that a letter written within a reasonable time, before or after the date of a bill of exchange, describing it in terms not to be mistaken, and promising to accept it, is, if shown to the person who afterwards takes the bill on the credit of the letter, a virtual acceptance, binding the person who makes the promise. In the case of Mason v. Hunt, 1 Doug. 296, Lord Mansfield said: "There is no doubt but that an agreement to accept, may amount to an acceptance; and it may be couched in such words as to put a third person in a better condition than the drawer. If one man, to give credit to another, make an absolute promise to accept his bill, the drawer, or any other person, may show such promise upon the exchange, to get credit, and a third person, who should advance his money upon it, would have nothing to do with the equitable circumstances between the drawer and the acceptor."

[1] [Reported by Hon. John McLean, Circuit Justice.]

It has been held, however, that this rule only extended to a bill in esse, at the time of making the promise. More recent decisions, made upon a careful review of all the adjudicated cases, extend the rule to a bill not in esse, at the time of making the promise to accept. McKim v. Smith, 1 Hall, Law J. 486; Payson v. Coolidge, [Case No. 10,860.] Which latter case was affirmed by the supreme court of the United States. [Coolidge v. Payson,] 2 Wheat. [15 U. S.] 66; 1 Gall. 630, [Van Reimsdyk v. Kane, Case No. 16,872;] McEvers v. Mason, 10 Johns. 207; 15 Johns. 6. In the case of Wilson v. Clements, 3 Mass. 1, it is held, "that an agreement to accept a bill when drawn, if shown to a third person within a reasonable time after the agreement was made, and he take a draft on the credit of it, such agreement is a virtual acceptance." In Pillans v. Van Mierop, 3 Burrows, 1663, it was held that "a promise to accept bills, to be drawn at a future day, was tantamount to an acceptance of them." Lord Ellenborough, in Clarke v. Cock, 4 East. 57, 70, says: "It has been laid down in so many cases, that a promise that a bill, when due, shall meet due honor, amounts to an acceptance, and that, without sending it for a formal acceptance in writing, that it would be wasting words to refer to books on the subject." An authority to draw a bill, is virtually an acceptance of the bill, drawn in conformity to it. [Sheafe v. O'Neil,] 9 Mass. 11; [Parker v. Grule,] 2 Wend. 545; [Trotter v. Grant,] Id. 414; [Ontario Bank v. Worthington,] 12 Wend. 593; Boyce v. Edwards, 4 Pet. [29 U. S.] 121; Parsons v. Armor, 3 Pet. [28 U. S.] 426; Townsley v. Sumrall, 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 182.

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff.

BAYARD, (LOMBARD v.) See Case No. 8,469.

Case No. 1,132.

BAYARD v. MANDEVILLE et al.

[4 Wash. C. C. 445.][1]

Circuit Court, D. New Jersey. Oct. Term, 1824.

FEDERAL COURTS—FOLLOWING STATE PRACTICE.

The rule of the supreme court of New Jersey, made in 1805, that after a cause has slept on the docket for twelve months, a term's notice of trial must be given, never having been adopted by this court, is not obligatory on the practice here.

[At law. Action of ejectment by Bayard against H. Mandeville and N. Mandeville.]

This cause being noticed for trial, Elmer, for the defendants, objected to the notice, 1. That it is signed by Griffith, as counsel, and Kinzey, attorney, in place of R. J. Coxe.

[1] [Originally published from the MSS. of Hon. Bushrod Washington, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, under the supervision of Richard Peters, Jr., Esq.]

2. Because this cause having slept for more than a year, a term's notice ought to have been given, according to the English practice, as well as the practice of the supreme court of this state; whereas this notice is dated on the 11th of last month.

Griffith, for the defendant, stated that he was the attorney as well as counsel of the plaintiff, and insisted that his signing the notice, in the latter character, is immaterial. As to the other objection, he denied that the practice of the supreme court existed until 1805, when a rule to the effect stated, was made by that court.

BY THE COURT. The rule of the supreme court having been made long since the year 1790, it of course could not have been adopted by this court, nor has the practice of this court ever conformed to it. As to the first objection, it is altogether untenable.

NOTE, [from original report.] The court made a rule, that where a cause has slept for eighteen months, notice of trial must be served sixty days at least before the sitting of the court to which it relates.

Case No. 1,133.

BAYARD et al. v. MASSACHUSETTS FIRE & MARINE INS. CO.

[4 Mason, 256.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. Term, 1826.

MARINE INSURANCE—WARRANTY OF AMERICAN PROPERTY.

Policy of insurance whereby the plaintiffs, for whom it may concern, insured "10,000 dollars, viz. 2326 dollars on the cargo, 1860 dollars on the freight, and 5814 dollars on the profits on board of the brig Dick, freight valued at 30,000 dollars, and profits at 25,000 dollars, premium included, at and from her port or ports of loading in Europe to, at, and from any port or ports, place or places, the risk to continue for the term of 18 months, and to attach on merchandise or specie, both or either. Warranted American property. It is understood, that the assured are owners of the cargo, but the valuation of freight and profits hereby agreed to, shall be binding, whether the lading of the vessel is the property of the assured or of others, or whether, at the time of the loss, there shall be any cargo on board or not." The warranty extends to all the cargo put on board, on which the policy was to attach. Quaere, whether it does not apply to all the subjects insured.

At law. Assumpsit [by William Bayard and others against the Massachusetts Fire & Marine Insurance Company] on a policy of insurance, dated 2d of April, 1824, whereby Leroy, Bayard, & Co. were insured, for whom it may concern, "$10,000, viz. $2326 on the cargo, $1860 on the freight, $5814 on the profits on board of the brig Dick, freight valued at $30,000, and profits at $25,000, premium included, at and from her port or ports of loading in Europe, to, at, and from any port or ports, place or places, the risk to continue for the term of eighteen months, and to attach on merchandise or specie, both or either. Warranted American property. It is understood, that the assured are owners of this cargo, but the valuation of freight and profits, hereby agreed to, shall be binding, whether the lading of the vessel is the property of the assured or of others; or whether, at the time of loss, there shall be any cargo on board or not. It is hereby agreed, that the captain or agent has leave to tranship the property hereby insured, in whole or in part, by any other American vessel or vessels, including vessels of war, British or American, upon which this policy shall attach, as if this insurance had been declared upon American vessel or vessels; and that this risk on any such transhipment to end on the arrival of the vessel or vessels in Europe or America." Premium 6 per cent. per annum, warranting 6 per cent. &c. &c.

The declaration in the first count stated, that the policy was made for the benefit and risk of one John O'Sullivan, late of New York, deceased, and that he was interested in the freight and profits to the amount insured, the goods being fully insured by prior policies; that the risk commenced at Cadiz on the 11th of September, 1824; that the vessel sailed from thence with goods on board on account of O'Sullivan, to Marseilles, and there took on board other goods, on account of O'Sullivan and other persons, and thence sailed on her voyage to South America; and then averred a total loss by shipwreck and perils of the seas, on the 11th of April, 1825. There were other counts, one stating the interest in the profits jointly, in the plaintiffs and O'Sullivan, and another the sole interest in the profits in the plaintiffs. There was also a count for money had and received. At the trial upon the general issue, the evidence was as follows.

A letter from the plaintiffs to William B. Swett & Co. dated March 24, 1824, inclosing the application for insurance, as follows:

"Gentlemen,—Will you be good enough to make inquiry at your offices, and let us know the result of the following application for insurance on freight and profits for the American brig Dick, Hudson, Master."

"Application.—Le Roy, Bayard, & Co. want insurance for twelve months, commencing from the period the Dick begins loading in Europe, to be extended six months longer if required, at the same rate of premium, at and from her port of loading in Europe, to any port or ports during said period, with liberty of touching and loading at, and to attach on merchandise or specie, both or either, taken in at, all or either ports, with a return for each entire month not used, for whom it may concern. The whole premium to be returned, should not the voyage go into effect. To give you an idea of this vessel, we state, that we have insured her at our offices for $20,000 for 18 months, at 9 per cent. to return a half for each entire month not used; $90,000 on her cargo for 12 months, at 6 per cent. to return a half, and, if required, for 6 months longer, at the same rate of premium. The Dick is coppered and copper fastened, just from the carpenter's hands, on which vessel nearly six thousand dollars has been expended in new sails, rigging, and on her hull; registers about 240 tons, destined from Cadiz and Gibraltar to South America, and will leave this for Europe in about two or three weeks, where her cargo will be waiting for her. We shall want from $15,000 to $20,000 covered on profits, valued at $25,000, and about $12,000 on freight, valued at $30,000, having done the rest here at the same rate as the cargo, which fills our offices, having insured here $130,000. We will thank you for as early a reply as possible."

[1] [Reported by William P. Mason, Esq.]

Also a copy of the letter of William B. Swett & Co. in reply to the above, dated Boston, 27th March, 1824, as follows:

"Messrs. Le Roy, Bayard, & Co.—We proposed to several of our insurance offices the risk on your brig Dick (the premiums 5 per cent. per annum, and even less on similar voyages.) They inquire the age of the vessel, and object to the interest on profits and freight; if your offices will take the interest you propose here, property or vessel, or a proportion of freight and profits, and part property, could be done here at about 5 per cent., provided your description of the vessel is satisfactory. If it is a simple trading voyage on American account, the rate would be less, than if there was a prospect of having foreign or belligerent property, as constituting the cargo on which the freight is to be at the risk of the insurer. Premiums to Batavia and Europe two and a half per cent.; Canton and United States or Europe, 3."

Also a letter from the said Le Roy, Bayard, & Co. to the said William B. Swett & Co. dated New York, March 29, 1824, which was as follows:

"Your favor of the 27th we have received. With respect to insurance on the brig Dick, we can state, that she is a first rate vessel, built at Baltimore in 1819, rates A 2 at our offices. The property that will be shipped in her is for American account; the object, a trading voyage. She is coppered and copper fastened, and commanded by an experienced master, who has been long on the South American coast. We have insured at our offices here, on cargo, $90,000, and want $10,000 more covered; also, on freight, $17,000, and want $13,000 more; valued at $30,000; and on commissions, $20,000, valued at $25,000. If you can effect these insurances agreeable to our application, say 6 per cent. for a twelve month, to return a half per cent. for each uncommenced month, please do it, with the privilege of extending it six months longer, if required, after that period, at the same rate of premium. What we want insured with you is as follows: $10,000 on cargo, $10,000; $13,000 on freight, valued at $30,000; $20,000 on profits, valued at $25,000. Your early reply will oblige your humble servants, Le Roy, Bayard, & Co.

"The reason, that we could not get a further amount done here, is, that all our offices are full on her."

Also a copy of a letter from the said William B. Swett & Co. to the plaintiffs, dated April 2, 1824, which was as follows:

"We have to day your valued favor of the 29th ult. and have effected the insurance on cargo, profits, and freight of the brig Dick. The large amount of freight and profits was considered as implying great risk in the expedition. We were therefore obliged to divide the amount among several offices, and give 6 per cent. per annum, with return as you presented."

Also a letter from the plaintiffs to the said William B. Swett & Co. dated New York, April 16, 1824, which was as follows:

"Gentlemen,—This will be handed you by our much respected friend, John O'Sullivan, Esq. the owner of the brig Dick, who visits Boston respecting the insurances we wrote you to effect for his account, which does not accord with the application we transmitted, nor the wording of the policies exactly meeting his ideas. He wishes some alterations made, which he will fully explain, and which, we trust, your offices will readily accede to, as they have all done here; the policies of which he takes with him to show you. He will also have to arrange for an excess amount of freight, which we did here during the interval that we wrote you for this insurance, which probably Mr. O'Sullivan may wish to have transferred to profits. After he has made his final arrangements, we will send you our notes for the premium, &c. We beg your kind attention and courtesies to our friend, which will greatly oblige your humble servants, Le Roy, Bayard, & Co."

The plaintiffs then called Tascar H. Swett as a witness, who testified, that he was one of the firm of William B. Swett & Co. who received the foregoing letters from Le Roy, Bayard, & Co. and who wrote the foregoing letters in reply; that he caused various policies of insurance to be underwritten at various insurance offices in Boston, as mentioned in the foregoing letter of April 2d, and among the rest a policy by the said Massachusetts Fire and Marine Insurance Company, which varied from the policy declared upon in this action, in the following respects: Instead of the words included between "assured, lost or not lost," and "whereof is master," the words were, "ten thousand dollars on the cargo, freight, and profits, on board the brig Dick, at and from her port or ports of loading in Europe, to, at, and from any port or ports, for trade and refreshment. The risk to continue for the term of eighteen months, and to attach on merchandise or specie, both or either. Warranted American property. Freight valued at $30,000. Profits valued at $25,000. On cargo $2326; on freight $3022; on profits $4652= $10,000." And the said Tascar further testified, that he sent the original policies to the said Le Roy, Bayard, & Co. and they were brought back to Boston by the said John O'Sullivan; that he went with the said O'Sullivan to the various insurance offices, where the original policies were written, and among the others to the office of the defendants. The said Swett did not precisely recollect the conversation that took place between the said O'Sullivan and the president of the said Massachusetts Fire and Marine Insurance Company, but the purport of it was, that the said O'Sullivan, in consequence of having been a long time in South America, had acquired advantages there which would enable him to realize a great profit, if he met with no accident in the voyage, and on this account he wished to be insured so large an amount on freight and profits. The new policies were then made in the form specified in this declaration, and the old policies were given up to the different offices.

The plaintiffs then gave in evidence a certified copy from the custom-house, where the said vessel was registered, showing her to be the property of the said O'Sullivan.

The plaintiffs also produced two letters of credit from the plaintiffs to the said O'Sullivan, dated ——, authorizing him to draw on them, on his arrival in Europe, for forty thousand dollars in the whole; one of which letters authorized him to draw on them generally, and the other, which was for $15,000, authorized him to draw on them to that amount, in the event of his not succeeding in getting funds in Europe, and to interest them in the voyage to that amount accordingly.

The plaintiffs also gave in evidence various letters to them from the said O'Sullivan, one of them dated Gibraltar, 3d June, 1824, stating his arrival there in the brig Dick; another letter, dated June 21, 1824, at Cadiz, in which the said O'Sullivan alludes to a certain contract he had entered into, and that he had arranged it to his satisfaction, and that he should despatch the brig in the course of the next month, loading her with more than a hundred thousand dollars. In another, dated August 24, 1824, he refers to various bills he had drawn on the plaintiffs, and states, that the brig will not be ready to sail before the middle of the next month. In another letter of the same date, he refers to other bills, drawn by him on the plaintiffs. In another letter, dated Marseilles, 4th December, 1824, he refers to a former letter, sent by him to the plaintiffs, of the 20th November preceding, requesting the plaintiffs to arrange the insurance to commence from the time of loading at Cadiz, 6th September, 3 P. M. civil account, that it may run equally with the cargo, freight, and profits. This letter contained a postcript, dated 23d January at Marseilles, in which he states, that he shall sail on the 27th of that month, with a cargo well assorted, and exceeding $100,000. The defendants admitted, that the said plaintiffs paid bills drawn upon them by the said O'Sullivan at Cadiz, amounting to $42,314 18. An invoice was also produced by the plaintiffs of sundry goods shipped on board the said vessel at Cadiz, on account of said O'Sullivan, in which the estimated value was $62,948 47. This was dated Sept. 11, 1824.

Another invoice was also produced by the plaintiffs of all the goods on board the vessel at Marseilles, including those shipped at Cadiz. The whole was invoiced as the property of the said O'Sullivan, and the nominal value thereof, including all charges and premium of insurance, was $104,444 75. This was dated January 31, 1825.

A bill of lading of the same was produced, in which the goods were stated to be shipped for account and risk of the said John O'Sullivan, in which the freight was stated to be nothing, being owner's property, but valued, as insured, at thirty thousand dollars.

The plaintiffs also produced in evidence the deposition of Francisco X. Harmony, of Cadiz, the merchant who transacted the business of the said O'Sullivan at that place. In this deposition he testified, that the real value of the goods shipped at that place was $35,071 05, and that he prepared and gave to the said O'Sullivan an invoice thereof, together with a simulated invoice, in which the goods were estimated at $62,948 47, and that he supposed that the latter invoice was intended to sell by. Also the deposition of Frederick Rabaut of Marseilles, stating, that he was informed, that various goods were laden on board the brig at that place, for the account of a Spanish merchant named Calvet, who took passage on board the brig. He states also, that he did not think Mr. O'Sullivan made any advances on the goods, for he the said O'Sullivan endeavored to procure himself, and requested also the said Rabaut to procure for him, freight to complete the loading of the vessel, having employed at Cadiz the disposable funds which he had, and he appearing disappointed in respect to more considerable funds which he expected to find.

The plaintiffs also admitted, that the said O'Sullivan acknowledged, at the time the said brig met with the accident which was the cause of the loss, that part of the goods on board the brig belonged to certain Spanish passengers, who claimed them at that time, and most of those that were saved were accordingly given up to them.

The defendants admitted, that the said brig and cargo were lost by the perils of the sea, without any fraud or negligence on the part of the master, or of the said O'Sullivan.

Webster & Hubbard, for the defendants, contended, that the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover, because the warranty of "American property," in the policy, had not been complied with. That warranty covers all the cargo, freight, and profits. The goods taken on board on Spanish account at Marseilles, was a breach of the warranty.

Nichols & Prescott, for the plaintiffs, contended, that the warranty applied to the goods insured, and not to the freight and profits. It was not warranted, that all the property on board should be American; but that the part of the cargo insured by the policy should be American.

STORY, Circuit Justice. My opinion, upon full consideration of this case, is, that upon the true construction of the policy, the property, on which the profits and freight were to accrue was warranted to be American property during the whole voyage. I think this would have been the true construction of the words of the original policy, for which the present was substituted. The prior correspondence might not be unimportant to ascertain the meaning of the parties, as to any words of doubtful interpretation used in the policy; and under this aspect of the case, that correspondence would show conclusively, that in the preliminary negotiations the insurance company contemplated a voyage exclusively on American and neutral account. But I found myself, upon the words of the policy, stripped of all aid from collateral sources. Let us examine the words. The insurance is "$10,000, viz. $2326 on the cargo, $1860 on the freight, and $5814 on the profits on board of the brig Dick, freight valued at $30,000, and profits at $25,000, premium included." Now stopping here, the construction must be, that the word "cargo" here means, not the property on board exclusively belonging to the ship-owner, but all the property constituting the ship's lading, all the property on which freight and profits were to accrue. The freight and profits were upon a valuation of them as growing out of the whole cargo, and not merely upon any small portion which might belong to the ship-owner. Then the policy proceeds, "at and from her port or ports of loading in Europe, to, at, and from any port or ports, place or places, the risk to continue for the term of eighteen months, and is to attach on merchandise or specie, both or either. Warranted American property." It is very probable, that this clause, so far as it speaks of merchandise and specie, was inserted to guard against a possible doubt, whether specie could be deemed "cargo," within the words of the policy. But it is unnecessary to place any stress upon this suggestion made at the bar. Suppose, for the sake of argument, the words of warranty were to be deemed a part of the preceding sentence, instead of standing by itself (as it in fact does in the policy and after a period), in an independent sentence, what would be its true interpretation? "The risk is to continue for the term of eighteen months, and to attach on merchandise or specie, both or either." On what merchandise and specie? Certainly on the merchandise and specie, which were on board of the ship, and constituted her cargo, and out of which the freight and profits were to grow; for these were at the risk of the underwriters. The term "risk," as here used, necessarily refers to all the subjects insured, for the risk is to continue for eighteen months, and plainly the risk on the freight and profits was designated to be coextensive in duration with that on the cargo. Then, if the words, "warranted American property," are to be connected with merchandise and specie, as the next antecedents, the warranty is equivalent to a warranty that the cargo, or all the merchandise and specie on board are American property. If, therefore, the warranty were construed in this limited sense, there would be a plain breach of it, for the Spanish property on board constituted a part of the cargo, and the warranty covers the whole cargo. But, in fact, the warranty stands as an independent sentence. I do not say, that this would be decisive against any connected interpretation. Instruments, like the present, are to be construed, so as to give effect to all the words, and in such a manner as fulfils the obvious intention of the parties. But the circumstance of a separate period intervening, entitles the court to look to the subject matter, to which it is appropriated. If the words had occurred immediately after the words in the first clause, "premium included," the natural interpretation would have been, that the warranty applied to all the subjects of the insurance, cargo, freight, and profits. The principal insurance was on the freight and profits, and to suppose that the warranty was intended to apply only to such goods on board as belonged to the ship-owner, would be to suppose, that the underwriters were solicitous to guard against belligerent risks as to what might ultimately be of very little value, and to expose himself, at a very moderate premium, to all the belligerent risks on freight and profits. For upon this supposition, the ship is not warranted American, and the ship-owner's goods on board only are warranted American, and if the principal part or the whole of the cargo were belligerent, and either on freight or on half profits, the underwriters must run all the belligerent risks on both. A construction leading to such obvious results ought not to be adopted, unless it be the natural and fair import of the language. The words, "warranted American property," may well be applied to all the subjects insured, for all of them are, in the common language of commercial life, "property." The premium leads to no conjecture, that belligerent risks were included; and perhaps it would not be improper to hold, that the warranty was, that freight, profits, and cargo are American property. It is sufficient, however, if the warranty extends only to the latter. And I cannot entertain a doubt, that the word, "property," here means the same thing as cargo in the preceding sentence. If the other parts of the policy are critically examined, they fortify this conclusion. The succeeding words are, "It is understood, that the assured are owners of this cargo; but the valuation of freight and profits, hereby agreed to, shall be binding, whether the lading of the vessel is the property of the assured or not, or whether at the time of the loss there shall be any cargo on board or not." Here the words cargo, lading, property, occur in the same sentence, and are applied to the same thing, as words equivalent and synonymous. It is the cargo, the lading, and the property, out of which the freight and profits are to arise. This cargo, lading, and property, are not such as may be on board belonging to the ship-owner only, but all on board, whether it belongs to him or to others. "It is understood that the assured are owners of this cargo," but it may belong to others. Whether the one or the other be the fact, it must be deemed, that the warranty of American property extends to it. We must otherwise hold, that in a voyage to South America, then in a belligerent state, the underwriters, knowing that other property than the ship-owner's might be on board, were content to take a warranty, which might be utterly nugatory as to the most material risks. The clause, as to the transhipment of the property in other vessels, leads to the same conclusion. But I forbear any further commentary. My judgment is, that the warranty has been broken, and that the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover.

There is another point of view, in which the cause may be considered, upon which, however, I do not dwell, because it has not been argued by counsel, but which appears to me equally decisive against the plaintiffs. I suggest it merely for consideration, if a superior tribunal should deem the other opinion erroneous. It is this. The assured in their correspondence, upon the faith of which the insurance was made, represented, that "the property, that will be shipped in her, is for American account; the object a trading voyage." If the warranty does not cover the whole cargo, as there is no pretence to say, that this representation was ever varied by the parties, the legal effect is, that pro tanto the representation remains in force, and it has been falsified by the event.

Verdict for the defendants.

BAYER, (UNITED STATES v.) See Cases Nos. 14,547 and 14,548.

Case No. 1,134.

BAYERQUE v. COHEN et al.

[1 McAll. 113.][1]

Circuit Court, D. California. July Term, 1856.

QUIETING TITLE—JURISDICTION—PLEADING—DEMURRER—TITLE.

1. A demurrer admits the allegations of the bill for the purposes of a motion on the bill and demurrer.

2. The circuit courts will entertain a bill filed by one in prior possession, accompanied by title, to remove a cloud upon title.

3. Where a state law authorizes a party in possession of real estate to sue for a settlement of an adverse claim, the circuit courts will look to it in aid of their general chancery powers.

4. Although the laws of a state cannot affect the equity jurisdiction of the circuit courts, when the former afford rules as to what shall be deemed clouds on title, the circuit courts of equity, in the exercise of an ancient chancery jurisdiction, may remove such clouds.

[Cited in Griswold v. Bragg, 48 Fed. 520.]

[5. The bill sufficiently shows complainant's title to the land when it alleges that his grantors and he were legally seised by virtue of a grant from a former governor of the territory of California, and that they have had possession thereunder for seven years.]

[In equity. Bill by Bayerque against Jacob S. Cohen and others. Heard on demurrer to the bill. Overruled.]

This bill is filed, to remove a cloud from complainant's title, for the cancellation of a deed, and for an injunction. The bill alleges, that complainant is lawfully seized and in peaceable possession of certain real property described. That plaintiff, and those under whom he claims, derive title under a grant made by Juan B. Alvarado, at the time governor of the then territory of California, to one Manuel Garcia, under date of 10th July, 1839; and alleges that complainant, and those under whom he claims, have been in peaceable possession of the premises under said grant for a period last past of seven years and upwards. That on the 9th day of September, 1850, an act of congress was passed admitting California as a state into the Union. That at the time of said admission, the premises in dispute were above high-water mark, and had been since filled in and built upon by those under whom complainant claims. That Jackson street, on which the premises are situated, was, at the time of the admission of California into the Union, a public street of the city of San Francisco, and a thoroughfare; and the block of which the premises in dispute formed a part, was bounded by various public streets, the whole of which block had been wholly reclaimed from the waters of the bay, and built upon. That on the 18th of May, 1853, the legislature of this state passed an act, by which the governor of this state was authorized to appoint five commissioners to sell and dispose of the interest of the state to certain property therein mentioned. That in pursuance of said act, one "Hermance," and four others, were appointed said commissioners, to ascertain the extent of the State's interest in said property, and sell the same. That on the 10th of September, 1853, various persons, among them David Beck and Robert Elam, grantors under whom complainant claims, commenced an action in the superior court of the city of San Francisco against the said commissioners, praying that the water-mark or line through said premises, should be settled as it existed at the time of the admission of California into the Union, to fix what portion of the premises had been then reclaimed, and that said commissioners might be enjoined from selling any portion thereof. That judgment was obtained in said action; and on appeal therefrom, said judgment was affirmed by the supreme court of this state. That by said judgment it was decreed, that said premises (including those now in possession of complainant, and the subject of the present controversy), at the time of the admission of California into the Union, formed no part or portion of the shores or waters of the Bay of San Francisco; that prior thereto they had been reclaimed, and that the state of California had no title to the premises; and said commissioners were enjoined from selling any portion of the premises as belonging to the state of California. That on the 1st day of May, 1855, the legislature of this state passed an act, supplementary to the previous act of 18th May, 1853, whereby the governor, secretary, and comptroller of the state were constituted a board to dispose of the interest of the state in all the property of the state authorized to be sold by the preceding act of 18th May, 1853, remaining unsold, and by it, it was provided that the said board should supersede the commissioners appointed under the previous act, from and after the time when the official term of said commissioners should expire; and that said board was authorized by said act to appoint an agent or agents to attend, from time to time, all such sales. That one Jacob S. Cohen was appointed agent of said board; that said board appointed under the last-mentioned act, were the successors of the commissioners appointed under the act of 18th May, 1853, and their powers limited and controlled by that act. That said Cohen, well knowing the premises, caused a sale of the property; and upon such sale the board, on the 10th day of October, 1855, executed and delivered a deed for the premises to two of the defendants, Calloway and Coryell, the former of whom, on the 8th day of November following, conveyed to the latter his interest in the premises; which deeds were duly recorded. That said sale was fraudulent: that the conditions prescribed by the act of 18th May, 1853, were not observed; that no consideration was paid, the said Cohen crediting as a payment the amount of a judgment held against the state, which was a nullity, as so much paid by said purchasers. That said Cohen holds an interest in said sale by and through the purchasers. That by the terms of the act of the legislature under which said sale was made the deeds given by the said board to the two co-defendants, are made prima facie evidence of title and right of possession, and thus cloud the title of complainant. The bill concludes with a prayer for the cancellation of said deed, and for an injunction. To this bill a general demurrer was filed.

[1] [Reported by Cutler McAllister, Esq.]

Parsons & Ganahl, for complainant.

Bigler, Thomas & Hempstead, for defendants.

McALLISTER, Circuit Judge. The demurrer filed to the bill in this case admits, so far as the present action of the court can extend, the facts alleged. Among these are the following: the legal seizin of the complainant; his peaceable possession of the premises in dispute, by himself and those under whom he holds, for upwards of seven years; that the premises had been reclaimed from the waters of the bay, prior to the admission of this state into the Union, and had been built upon and occupied by private persons, from some of whom the complainant claims; and which premises then formed a part of the city, bounded by public streets, and were above high-water mark. The demurrer also admits that those under whom complainant claims have heretofore obtained an injunction against the sale of the premises in dispute, upon the ground that the same formed no portion of the waters of the bay, and that the state held no interest in them. It further admits that such adjudication was, on appeal to the supreme court of this state, affirmed in all respects; that under a second act of the legislature of this state, directing a sale of its interest in said premises, a sale was made, and two of the defendants became the purchasers; that Jacob S. Cohen, who was agent of the state in the conduct of said sale, and also a defendant, is interested in the premises; that such sale was fraudulent, because no consideration was paid, and the conditions of the act of the legislature, under which said sale was made, were not complied with. Lastly, that a deed to consummate such fraudulent sale was made and delivered to the purchasers.

All the foregoing facts being admitted by the demurrer to be true, two questions arise: first, whether this court has the power to administer the relief prayed for; and, second, whether this case calls for such relief.

By the general principles of equity jurisprudence, a party who is in the peaceable and actual possession, accompanied by title, can invoke chancery jurisdiction to remove a cloud from his title. Independently of these principles, the legislature of this state has spoken upon this subject. Section 254 of the act entitled, "An act to regulate civil proceedings in the courts of justice in this state" (Comp. Laws Cal. 519), declares that "an action may be brought by any person in possession, by himself or his tenant, of real property, against any person who claims an estate or interest therein adverse to him, for the purpose of determining such adverse claim, estate, or interest." In Clark v. Smith, 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 195, the principle is enunciated that, although the laws of a state cannot affect the jurisdiction or mode of proceeding in equity in the courts of the United States, they may afford rules as to what shall be deemed a cloud upon the title, and the circuit courts of equity may remove such clouds. The supreme court of this state has enunciated in several cases the doctrine in regard to the removing of clouds upon title: Shattuck v. Carson, 2 Cal. 588; Guy v. Hermance, 5 Cal. 73. In this last case, the title of the plaintiff, in a contest between different parties, was passed upon and sustained. In this case, the demurrer admits seizin by complainant, accompanied by a title supported by the decision of the highest judicial tribunal in this state, and by a peaceable possession of seven years; and further admits the fraud alleged in the sale under which the deed was made to defendants. It is clear that the complainant has a standing in a court of equity, and is entitled to relief.

It has been urged by defendant's counsel that the complainant should have set forth his title, as non constat it is legal. The answer is, that the allegation in the bill is that his seizin is legal, accompanied by title to which a reference is made, and with possession during seven years; and these allegations are admitted by the demurrer to be true. Nor am I aware that even in a court of law a pleader is bound to set forth his seizin in more special terms than is done in this bill. In Christy v. Scott, 14 How. [55 U. S.] 282, the plaintiff alleged his seizin in his demesne as of fee. Defendant demurred. The allegation in the declaration was deemed sufficient; and it being admitted by the demurrer, the court considered defendants trespassers, and estopped from denying the title of plaintiff. The allegations, admitted as they have been, are amply sufficient to sustain the bill.

On the day of the argument of this case, a paper was filed, which has not escaped the attention of the court. It seems to be a statement of the argument on the whole case. Some of the matters embraced within it are such as would be more appropriately discussed on the trial of the case, when the issues will be raised and the facts developed by testimony.

The demurrer must be overruled, and costs paid by the defendants. An order to that effect will be entered accordingly.

Case No. 1,135.

BAYERQUE v. HALEY et al.

[1 McAll. 97.][1]

Circuit Court, D. California. July Term, 1856.

FEDERAL COURTS—JURISDICTION—CITIZENSHIP—HUSBAND AND WIFE.

1. An averment of citizenship equivalent in import to a direct allegation, is sufficient to give jurisdiction.

2. The doctrine at common law that the deed of a feme covert is void, does not apply to this case. The proceeding is for foreclosure of a mortgage. Until foreclosure it is a chose in action. Endorsement of note and assignment of mortgage by the husband alone would have been sufficient.

3. The act of the legislature of this state [California] of 17th April, 1850, [page 254, c. 103,] as to "husband and wife," has no application to this case, the parties having been married out of this state, and never having been within her limits.

4. Bills of exchange and promissory notes constitute an exception to the rule that choses in action of the wife, other than chattels real, are assignable only in equity.

In equity. In this case a bill was exhibited for the foreclosure of a mortgage, to which a demurrer was filed. The grounds assigned are given in the opinion of the court.

Parsons & Ganahl, for complainant.
J. B. Haggin, for defendants.

McALLISTER, Circuit Judge. The first ground taken in support of the demurrer is, that the averment of the citizenship of Samuel Moss, Jr., is not sufficiently made to give jurisdiction to the court. It is in these words: "That the said Samuel Moss, Jr., during his lifetime was a citizen of the United States and of the state of Pennsylvania." Although this averment might have been made with more precision, it still must be deemed sufficient. If during his life he was a citizen of Pennsylvania, the idea that he was a citizen of this state at the time of the commencement of this suit is excluded. The averment is equivalent in import to an averment of citizenship in Pennsylvania in more direct terms. In the case of Gassies v. Ballon, 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 761, the defendant was represented as "now residing in the parish of West Baton Rouge, where he caused himself to be naturalized an American citizen." On the ground that such description was of equivalent import to a more direct and precise averment, the description was held sufficient. At all events this case cannot be permitted to go off on that ground, for if decided against the plaintiff he would be permitted to amend instanter.

The second ground of demurrer is the principal point. It is, "that it appears by the bill that the complainant derives title to the note and mortgage set forth, by virtue of a certain instrument of assignment executed by one Zoe Mouroult and her husband, one

[1] [Reported by Cutler McAllister, Esq.]

P. L. Lefevre, by one Lucien Hermann, their attorney in fact duly constituted, when in law the said Zoe Mouroult, being a married woman, has no power to constitute an attorney, either with or without her husband, for that purpose, and that no title or right can be derived through such an assignment, and therefore complainant is not entitled to the relief prayed for."

The transaction to which the assignment refers claims attention. To secure the payment of certain moneys advanced by Zoe Mouroult, the wife of Pierre J. Lefevre, the defendants Haley and Thompson, in consideration of the sums of money received by them, on the 14th day of January, 1854, made and delivered their joint and several promissory note for the sum of $12,000, payable to the order of the said Zoe, the wife of the said Pierre L. Lefevre, in the sums and at the times mentioned in said note. To secure payment of the same, defendants at the same time executed and delivered a deed of mortgage to the said Zoe, her heirs and assigns. Subsequently, the said mortgagee and her husband, the said Pierre L. Lefevre, by their attorney, the said Lucien Hermann, for value received, assigned, sold, and transferred the said note and mortgage-deed to one Samuel Moss, Jr., from whom the plaintiff directly claims. Now, it is urged that no interest passed to Moss, because Zoe Mouroult, being feme covert, could not make a valid power of attorney to Hermann. To sustain this proposition, reliance is placed upon the act of the legislature of this state, passed April 17, 1850, entitled "An act defining the rights of husband and wife." In relation to this statute, the supreme court of this state have said, "We have repeatedly held that our statute does not change the relation of husband and wife, except in the particular cases expressly provided for by the statute." Rowe v. Kohle, 4 Cal. 285. Various provisions are made by the act of the legislature as to what shall constitute the separate property of the married woman, and what steps shall be taken to protect it. But for the purposes of this case it is only necessary to refer to the fifteenth section of the act. It extends the provisions of the law to persons who were married out of this state, and who had never resided within it. Upon the principle that "expressio unius est exclusio alterius," it is evident that the clear intent of the act was to exclude from its operations persons who were married without the limits of the state and never lived within them. It was eminently proper to exclude those who were married without, and never came within, the jurisdiction of the state. The facts of this case show, that Zoe Mouroult was not wedded to her husband in this state, that neither of them resided in this state at the time of the execution of said note and mortgage deed, nor has either of them at any time resided therein, but both of them have always been aliens, and citizens of the empire of France. This case cannot, therefore, be brought within the operation of the act of the legislature on which reliance has been placed by the counsel for the demurrer. The court has been also referred to the 2d, 19th, 21st, 22d and 23d sections of the act of the legislature of April 16, 1850, entitled "An act concerning conveyances." The second section prescribes the mode by which husband and wife by their joint deed may convey the real estate of the wife; and the remaining sections cited all refer to the mode of such conveyance. Whether all these sections have not been repealed, it is unnecessary now to decide. It is sufficient to say, that all the sections of the law which relate to married women are confined to real estate exclusively. But it has been urged for this demurrer that, independently of all statutory enactments, at common law a married woman could make no deed, and her act was deemed a nullity. It is true that a married woman could by that law make no conveyance of real estate except by fine, or common recovery, or some equivalent act of record. The proceeding by fine or common recovery never prevailed in this country. A common law grew up, which became a rule of property, by which a joint conveyance by husband and wife was held to pass the property conveyed. Then came statutory enactments in different states, providing for the security of married women by requiring from them examinations and acknowledgments separate and apart, when they joined in conveyance with their husbands. Such is the law in the different states. But in the view the court takes of this case, the doctrine that at common law the deed of a feme covert is void, does not touch it. The bill is filed to foreclose a mortgage to recover the payment of the note. Until foreclosed, the mortgage, as well as the note, is a mere chose in action; and the endorsement of the note and assignment of the mortgage by the husband alone, and his delivery, would be sufficient to transfer the interest, without the signature of the wife. A debt was due to the wife, a chose in action, —"debitum in praesenti, solvendum in futuro." A bona-fide assignment for valuable consideration of this debt by the husband, divests in a court of equity the interest of the wife. In the case of Cassell v. Carroll, 11 Wheat. [24 U. S.] 134, an agreement was entered into by certain parties; and among them was John Browning, the husband of Louisa Browning, and the committee of Louisa Browning, wife of John Browning, she being at the time a lunatic. By the agreement, certain quit-rents belonging to the wife were to be surrendered. It was contended that John Browning, the husband, as such, could not convey the title to these rents belonging to his wife, so as to bar her, in case of survivorship, from the right of recovery; and, she being a lunatic, no act done by her committee could affect her. In relation to these rents, the court say, "They were not future, contingent, or reversionary interests vested in her. How far, in respect to such interests, the husband or the committee of a lunatic is by law authorized, by a conveyance or assignment, to dispose of her rights, is a question which we are not called upon to decide, and upon which we give no opinion. The case here is of choses in action actually due to the wife. * * * It does not appear to us that it has ever yet been decided, that a bona-fide assignment for a valuable consideration, made by a husband to a third person, of a debt actually and presently due to his wife, does not divest, in equity, the title of the wife."

By the terms of the mortgage-deed in this case, it is provided that the whole amount of principal shall be deemed due, in case failure be made in the payment of any part of the interest as it shall grow due. The absolute sale, bona fide, of such a chose in action by the husband, amounts to a reduction of it into his possession. He has a qualified interest in the choses in action of his wife, as well as in her real chattels; but if he do not reduce them into possession during life, they survive to her. The difference between the two is, the chattels real are assignable at law; the choses in action, with the exception of bills of exchange and promissory notes, are assignable for valuable consideration, and the transfer will be sustained in equity. Clancy, Mar. Wom. 109, 110. The husband may bar the right of survivorship in the choses in action by a release. Thus he may release any wrong done or promise made to her alone, or to her and himself during marriage. He may discharge his wife's bond; as, also, not only the debt actually due, but even that which is not payable till a future day. So he may release any right or duty that may possibly accrue during marriage. Again, if the husband reduce his wife's choses in action into possession, her right is barred. And there are various acts of his falling short of a reduction into possession, which are deemed equivalent to it; as, if a husband alone, or with his wife, authorized a third person to receive her chose in action, who accordingly receives, the right of the wife is barred although the avails never reach the husband. Id. 111, 112. And where, on a bond executed to the wife, the husband gave a letter of attorney to another to receive, and who did receive it, the wife died, and then the husband deceased,—Held, the action was properly brought by the executor of the husband. Id. In the case of Bates v. Danby, 2 Atk. 207, where the husband was entitled, in right of his wife, to two mortgages, borrowed a sum of money from A, and agreed in writing that he had left them with plaintiff, and that he would assign them to him forthwith, the husband died before making the assignment. On a bill to foreclose the mortgages, it was insisted on the part of the wife that they were choses in action, and that not having been assigned by her husband, they survived to her. Lord Hardwicke held that the husband, being entitled to the trust of these mortgages, had the power to assign them for his own use, and that leaving them with the plaintiff, and promising that he would procure them to be assigned, amounted to a disposal of them for so much as to satisfy plaintiff's demand, but no more; for although he might have disposed of the whole in the manner he did, his intention was only to secure the plaintiff's debt, which being done, they belong to the widow as her choses in action. Clancy, Mar. Wom. 121. The correct rule deducible from the authorities is, that where the assignment by the husband is voluntary, without consideration, it will not bind her right should she survive him; but where the transfer is for a valuable consideration, the purchaser takes the interest assigned discharged from the wife's right of survivorship.

Again, we have seen that bills of exchange and promissory notes constitute an exception to the rule, that choses in action of the wife, other than chattels real, are assignable only in equity. Now, in this case, the note having been made payable to a married woman, the endorsement by the husband would effect a legal transfer, inasmuch as the note became his property. Shuttlesworth v. Noyes, 8 Mass. 229. As the joining of the wife was not indispensable to transfer the interest, it is useless to discuss the right of a married woman to execute a deed or other instrument under seal.

The demurrer must be overruled.

Case No. 1,136.

BAYERQUE v. JACKSON WATER CO.

[1 McAll. 85.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. California. July Term, 1856.

EQUITY — PRACTICE — DECREE BY STIPULATION OF PARTIES—PROCEEDING TO SET ASIDE.

1. When orders and a final decree have been taken in a case pending in a court of equity, in vacation, [in accordance with a stipulation of the parties, but] without the sanction or knowledge of the chancellor, the proceeding, including the decree, will not be set aside on summary motion.

2. When all the proceedings taken were in strict conformity with a written stipulation entered into by the parties, and filed in court, and there was no mistake or fraud, and moneys have been paid and received by the respective parties on the faith of the decree, and the property has changed hands, the proceedings are at least only voidable, not void.

3. If injury has accrued to a party, he must file his bill and bring the whole case on its merits before the court, so that a decree may be rendered on terms doing justice to both parties.

[In equity. Bill of foreclosure by Bayerque against the Jackson Water Company.] A motion was made in the case to set aside, or so amend a decree as to render it unavailable to the complainant. [Denied.]

[1] [Reported by Cutler McAllister, Esq.]

The circumstances disclosed by the record are as follows:—On the 26th February, 1856, process was served upon defendant. On the 3d March ensuing, an order upon motion was made, appointing a receiver, who gave bond and security. On first day of April ensuing, the bill was amended by adding new parties. On 23d day of April, 1856, a stipulation was entered into between the parties, in writing, and filed in the cause on the same day. Among other things it was agreed, that in addition to the sum of money to recover which this bill of foreclosure was pending, there should be added at the reference, which it was stipulated should take place, any and all sums of money paid or advanced by complainant at the sale of the works of the said Jackson Water Company, by virtue of a certain judgment against the said company, obtained in Amador county in this state; that the said sums of money should bear the same rates of interest, and be entered into the final judgment in this cause on the same terms, as the amount due on the mortgage to foreclose which this bill was instituted, the interest to accrue from the date of the advances; and the certificate of sale by said sheriff should be conclusive as to the amount advanced by complainant on said sale, and said amount should be entered by the master in his report. Such stipulation further provided, that complainant might enter in the final decree afterwards to be filed, in addition to all foregoing sums of money, the sum of one hundred and seventeen thousand five hundred and nine dollars, twenty-four cents; and that said master was authorized to insert in said decree said last mentioned sum of money, upon said terms, and to bear same interest as the amount due in said mortgage. It was further stipulated there should be entered in such decree all and every sum or sums of money that have been already paid, or may hereafter be paid by complainant on account of the said Jackson Water Company on account of taxes; such sums of money to bear interest from the date of the several payments thereof, at the same rate as the money due on said mortgage; and the said master was authorized to enter up the same in his said report and the final decree in this suit. It was further stipulated and agreed, that upon the filing of the stipulation, the bill of complaint should be taken pro confesso, and final decree in this suit should be entered in accordance with the prayer of the bill and this stipulation. And, lastly, it was agreed that defendants have six months, from the date of the final decree and sale, to redeem the mortgaged premises. A literal compliance with the provisions of this stipulation took place. On the 24th April, 1856, the bill was dismissed as to all the defendants save the present defendant, the Jackson Water Company. Against them the bill was taken pro confesso, and an order taken referring the whole matter to a master in equity. On his report, a final decree was entered in the clerk's office; also an order confirming the report of the master, and ordering a sale of the property. The decree was enrolled, and on the 7th July, 1856, by virtue of said decree and order, the mortgaged property was sold and purchased by complainant for the sum of one hundred and ninety-six thousand dollars. Lastly, at a term of this court, upon the presentation of the stipulation, orders, and decree, an order was entered confirming the sale of the mortgaged premises. Every provision of the stipulation was complied with by the complainant. In March, 1856, the defendant, by his solicitor, moved to set aside the orders and decree made subsequent to 3d March, 1856, on the ground that they were all taken in vacation (with the exception of the decree of 2d September, 1857, confirming the sale), in the clerk's office, although purporting to bear date in term-time; which motion was denied, and which motion is renewed at present term.

Parsons & Ganahl, for complainant.
H. P. Irving and T. Wise, for defendants.

McALLISTER, Circuit Judge. This is a motion to set aside a decree made by consent of parties in this court, on the ground that the orders which preceded it and the decree itself, were taken in vacation, although bearing date in term-time. It is true that there was no judicial action by the court in relation to such orders, save the signature of the judge to the final decree, and the order confirming the sale. After the return of the judge from a temporary absence from the city, upon a presentation of the documents on file in the case, the said decree, dated as of the preceding term, was signed by him, and an order confirming the sale. To ascertain the condition of the case at that time, it is necessary to fix a construction upon the written stipulation. It provides, that upon its being filed certain proceedings should take place. In strict conformity to this agreement, the complainant acted, he took the bill pro confesso, and pursued all the other steps prescribed. But what is more important than the conduct of complainant, is that of the defendants. On this motion the following facts are established by affidavits, and stand uncontroverted. That complainant, after promptly taking all the steps prescribed by the stipulation, relying on said stipulation, orders, and decree, paid to defendant, who received the same, the balance of the sum stipulated to be paid in agreement, and entered by virtue thereof into and forming a part of the decree, the sum of $117,509 34 over and above the amount mentioned in the mortgage. That said sum was paid immediately after the entry of said decree, and same was accepted by the defendant with full knowledge that said decree had been entered, and that the money so received by defendant was paid by complainant relying upon the said decree. That no portion of the moneys paid has been refunded. That defendant has become insolvent. That, although the time has expired within which by the terms of the stipulation, the defendant has a right to redeem, the complainant is willing to convey to defendant all the property he (the complainant) holds under the master's deed, on being reimbursed for the moneys advanced by him, on the faith of the stipulation and decree. Now, if it be assumed, that all the proceedings in this case were irregular and voidable, the utmost this court could do on a bill filed to set them aside, would be just what the complainant proffers to do. But defendant asks this court, on a motion summarily to set aside the decree, and sale of the property, and leave it together with the purchase-money paid to the defendant in the possession of the latter. The court would be lending itself to the propagation of a gross fraud, did it do so.

Another fact is developed on this motion, which is uncontroverted. It appears, that one James Creighton, on 12 Sept., 1856, subsequent to the proceedings and sale in this case, obtained a judgment against the defendant for the sum of $39,000 in the district court for the fifth judicial district of this state. That the claim on which said judgment was recovered, was a claim assigned to said Creighton by one John C. Harn, who was father-in-law of said Creighton, and the president and one of the trustees of the said Jackson Water Company, and who, as such, signed the said stipulation upon which the said decree was entered. That a suit was commenced in said court in August, 1856, which was discontinued. That a second suit was commenced on the same demand, and summons served upon the said John C. Harn, president of said company, and no answer having been filed, judgment by default was taken. Various charges of fraud are made, growing out of this transaction, with which on the present motion this court has nothing to do; it can only look to the facts as alleged in the bill and set forth in the affidavits.

In view of these facts the inquiry is, whether this court has the power to set aside the decree of this court on summary motion; and if it has the power, is this a case which calls for its exercise? Now, there is no positive or actual fraud suggested in this case. There is nothing to indicate anything further than can be inferred of a constructive fraud derived from the fact that the proceeding did not receive judicial sanction. It is not pretended that the terms of the written stipulation were not in good faith carried out by the complainant. It is not denied that he paid all the money he was legally bound to do; that said payments were made by him relying on the stipulation and the decree; that defendant received the moneys with full knowledge of the transaction, and the reliance placed upon it by the complainant. In view of all these facts, it is insisted that this court upon this motion should set aside the decree, or so amend it as to render it inoperative for all the purposes for which it was agreed on by the parties to be rendered. The practical result of which is to leave the property, and the money which complainant has paid for it, in the hands of defendant. Such is not the mode in which a court of equity administers justice. Equity always sets aside a deed upon other grounds than positive fraud on the part of the holder of it upon terms, and requires a return of the purchase-money, or that the conveyance shall stand as security for its payment. This constitutes the essential difference between relief in equity and that afforded in a court of common law. The latter can hold no middle course. The entire claim of each party must be determined at law on the single point of the validity of the instrument; but it is the ordinary case in the former court that a deed or decree, not absolutely void, yet under the circumstances inequitable as between the parties, may be set aside on terms. Coiron v. Millaudon, 19 How. [60 U. S.] 113. In this case, so far as the facts appear on this motion, the court can see nothing but irregularity. If on that ground it shall be deemed good cause for setting aside the proceedings, it must be done on terms just to both parties. This can only be done on a bill filed bringing the whole case upon its merits before the court, when equal justice may be done between the parties.

The motion must be denied.

Case No. 1,137.

BAYERQUE et al. v. SAN FRANCISCO.

[1 McAll. 175.][1]

Circuit Court, D. California. July Term, 1856.

NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS—CITY WARRANTS—PAYMENT FROM PARTICULAR FUND—TRADING CORPORATIONS:

1. A warrant issued by the controller of a city, whose payment is restricted to a particular fund, cannot be regarded as a bill of exchange.

2. Trading corporations may, independently of statute, issue negotiable paper in the course of their business.

3. If admitted in its broadest interpretation, it [this rule] cannot apply to a warrant issued by the officers of a municipal corporation.

4. It [such a warrant] is rather the conditional payment of a debt already created, than the creation of a new one, or the expression of a new promise.

At law. The present action is brought by the plaintiff as holder of certain warrants alleged to have been assigned to him for a valuable consideration. The warrants are in the following form:

"$1,000. City Comptroller's Office, San

[1] [Reported by Cutler McAllister, Esq.]

Francisco, ——, 1854. City Treasurer,—Pay to Jesse L. Whitmore, or bearer, the sum of one thousand dollars, for grading &c. Powell street from Washington to Bay, out of the street assessment fund. S. R. Harris, Comptroller."

The facts necessary to be set forth are given in the opinion of the court, on the demurrer filed to the complaint. [Demurrer sustained.]

Parsons & Ganahl, for complainants.
H. H. Byrne, for defendant.

McALLISTER, Circuit Judge. Various grounds of demurrer have been assigned. A consideration of the third and last will dispose of the case on the present pleadings. It is in these words, "That the instruments in law do not constitute any evidence of indebtedness, nor does it appear from the complaint that the defendant is otherwise indebted to plaintiff. Nor do the said instruments establish in law any obligation or liability on the part of the defendant."

The defendant is a municipal corporation, owing its existence to a charter, through which "it moves, and breathes, and has its being." It stands on a different footing from an individual. The latter, may do all acts and enter into all contracts not prohibited by law; the former, created for specific purposes, can make no contract forbidden by its charter, or into which it is not authorized to enter by that instrument. Nor is a corporation, when an action is brought against them on a contract, estopped from denying their competency to make it; for if so, the estoppel would apply equally to the other contracting party, and the limitations upon the power of the corporation would be of no avail. The authority of the city to issue the warrants in this case, is placed upon the third section of its charter. It is in these words. "Every warrant upon the treasury shall be signed by the comptroller, and countersigned by the mayor, and shall specify the appropriation under which it is issued, and the date of the ordinance making the same. It shall also state from what fund and for what purpose, the amount specified is to be paid." It will be observed, that these warrants, in addition to the signatures of the mayor and controller, and a statement from what fund and for what purpose the money was to be paid, must also specify the appropriation under which it is issued, and the date of the ordinance making the same. This cannot be regarded as matter of form. It is a substantial requirement, and inserted to carry out the policy contemplated to be pursued for the protection of the public from the recklessness of city officers, and the collusion with them of third parties. The 7th section of the charter inhibits the common council from issuing or putting in circulation any paper or design as a representative of value or evidence of indebtedness; and the 8th section declares, that no money shall be drawn from the treasury unless the same shall have been previously appropriated to the purpose for which it was drawn; and, with a view to enforce that provision and guard against the infidelity of officers of the corporation, and the fraud of third parties, the existence of the previous appropriation, and the date of it, must be specified in the warrant. In case at bar, while some of the warrants, amounting in the aggregate to $14,500, are issued in conformity to the act, the balance—and by far the larger amount—do not specify the appropriation under which they are made, or issued, or the date of the ordinance making the same. These cannot be deemed to have been legally issued, nor would the treasurer have been authorized to have paid them. They cannot be recovered on as warrants, even in the hands of the original holder. But the plaintiff takes a position, which, if sustainable, covers all the warrants. He sues upon them exclusively. There is but one count in the complaint. He does not sue upon them as agreements setting forth the consideration; but as negotiable, as bills of exchange, which imply a consideration. We do not regard them as such. The defendant is not a private, trading corporation, but a public, municipal one. In the distribution of its powers among its agents, the legislature has interposed a check upon the officer having the custody of the public money, by authorizing him to pay only such warrants as purport on their face to have been issued under some previous appropriation; and the date thereof must be given. None other could lawfully issue. They are merely what they purport to be when legally issued, warrants, or authority to the officer to pay out public money in his custody. They are drawn by one officer of a corporation upon another, and intended rather as a conditional payment of a pre-existing debt already audited, than as instruments creating a new debt, or expressing a new promise. They are designed to give facility, regularity, and security in the disbursement of the public money. They are intended as a check on the treasurer by forbidding any payment unless authorized in a particular manner, and to facilitate the transaction of the business of the corporation by defining strictly the duties of their functionaries. To the holder they are of use, by enabling him to draw money from the treasury when his debt has been allowed by the proper officer; and probably he might compel by mandamus the treasurer to pay the warrants in case, having funds, he refuses. But in no sense do they constitute a promise on the part of the city to pay, as the drawer of a bill of exchange. There are other considerations which conduct to the conclusion that these warrants cannot be treated as bills of exchange. A fatal objection is the fact, that upon their face the payments are restricted to, and must come out of a particular fund. It is true, that the mention of a particular fund out of which a payment is to be made, will not in some cases prove fatal to the character of the instrument as a bill or note. But it is confined to that class of cases where the mention of a particular fund is directory, and reference made to it with a view simply to enable the drawee to look to his reimbursement. But in all cases where the payment is expressly limited, and is to come out of a specific fund mentioned, however ample it may seem, it is fatal to the character of paper as a bill of exchange. Pars. Merc. Law, 87.

In Dawkes v. De Lorane, 3 Wils. 207, the court thus defines the essential qualities of a bill of exchange, "It must carry with it a personal credit given to the drawer, not confined to credit upon any thing or fund,—it is upon the credit of a person's hand who negotiates it; he who takes it, does so upon no contingency except the failure of the general credit of the person drawing or negotiating it." In Jenney v. Herle, 2 Ld. Raym. 1361, A drew on B, to pay plaintiff on demand a sum of money out of a particular fund mentioned,—held to be a mere appointment for the payment of money out of a particular fund; and where A drew on the agent of a regiment, to pay an amount out of his growing subsistence,—held not to be a bill of exchange, "because the money was payable out of a particular fund." In Yeates v. Groves, 1 Ves. Jr. 280, A drew a bill "payable out of the purchase-money of a house." This order, said the lord chancellor, "is not a bill of exchange, being payable out of a particular fund." In Van Vacter v. Flack, 1 Smedes & M. 393, the plaintiff sued on a bill made payable out of the notes left in drawer's possession. "This instrument," say the court, "is not a bill of exchange, because payable out of a particular fund; it is to be distinguished from that class in which the particular fund is mentioned merely as a direction to the drawee how he may reimburse himself." The case of Kelley v. Mayor, etc., 4 Hill, 263, illustrates the distinction between the two classes of cases. It was there held, that a draft signed by the mayor, and directed to the treasurer, was a bill of exchange. If this be law, it does not touch the case. The payment of the money was not confined to a particular fund. The words as to payment were "and charge to Bedford assessment;" the court say, "The bill was not restricted to the particular fund arising from the Bedford-road transaction, yet for reimbursement the treasurer was directed to charge that fund." On that ground the instrument was considered a bill. The form of the draft in that case was also decided to have complied substantially with the statute. This is unlike the case at bar. In Lake v. Trustees of Williamsburgh, 4 Denio, 520, a draft was drawn for a sum of money to be charged to the account of the Union avenue. The payment was not to come out of any particular fund; and the court say, "If it was not a sealed instrument it perhaps might be regarded as a bill of exchange." This intimation of a "perhaps" is sustained by a reference to Kelley v. Mayor, etc., 4 Hill, 263. When we turn to the latter case we find the following proposition: "Independently of any statute provision, a corporation may issue negotiable paper for a debt contracted in the course of its proper business." To sustain this proposition reference is made to the case of Moss v. Oakley, 2 Hill, 265; and in this case reliance is placed on the case of Mott v. Hicks, 1 Cow. 513, and to Barker v. Mechanic Fire Ins. Co., 3 Wend. 94. All these cases on which reliance was placed for the general proposition above stated, "that a corporation, independently of statute, may issue negotiable paper in the course of its proper business," are trading and business corporations; and the authorities above cited by counsel for plaintiff do not, for that reason, apply to the defendant, who is a public and municipal corporation, whose powers are confined strictly by its charter. But they are all unlike this case in the fact that in no one of them was the payment of the money restricted to a particular fund.

The demurrer in this case must, therefore, be sustained.

BAYLESS, (MANUFACTURERS' & FARMERS' BANK v.) See Case No. 9,050.

Case No. 1,138.

BAYLESS v. TRAVELERS' INS. CO.

[14 Blatchf. 143;[1] 6 Ins. Law J. 109; 9 Chi. Leg. News, 201; 23 Int. Rev. Rec. 111; 24 Pittsb. Leg. J. 140.]

Circuit Court, E. D. New York. Feb. Term, 1877.

ACCIDENT INSURANCE—DEATH BY MEDICAL TREATMENT—OVERDOSE OF OPIUM.

1. A policy of insurance against accident provided for the payment to the plaintiff of a specified sum within a specified time, after sufficient proof that the insured "shall have sustained bodily injuries effected through external, violent and accidental means," "and such injuries alone shall have occasioned death," "provided, that this insurance shall not extend to any death or disability which may have been caused wholly or in part by any surgical operation or medical or mechanical treatment for disease." A specified dose of opium was prescribed to the insured by his physician, to allay nervousness and restlessness. By inadvertence, he took more opium than he intended and his death was caused thereby: Held, that his death was caused wholly or in part by medical treatment for disease, and was not covered by the policy.

[Cited in Crandal v. Accident Ins. Co., 27 Fed. 45.]

2. Held, also, that the case was not one of bodily injury effected through external, violent and accidental means, occasioning death, within the meaning of the policy.

[Cited in Crandal v. Accident Ins. Co., 27 Fed. 45.]

[1][Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

At law.

Redfield & Hill, for plaintiff.

Mather & Ennever, for defendant.

BENEDICT, District Judge. This action is brought upon a policy of insurance against accident, issued by the defendants, whereby they agreed to pay to the plaintiff the sum of $10,000, "within ninety days after sufficient proof that the insured, William E. S. Bayless, at any time within the continuance of the policy, shall have sustained bodily injuries effected through external, violent and accidental means, within the intent and meaning of this contract, and the conditions hereunto annexed, and such injuries alone shall have occasioned death within ninety days from the happening thereof." The contract contained the following proviso: "Provided, that this insurance shall not extend to any death or disability which may have been caused wholly or in part by any surgical operation, or medical or mechanical treatment for disease." The cause was tried before the court and a jury, when, upon the evidence adduced, a verdict for the plaintiff was directed, subject to the opinion of the court upon the question whether the facts proved were sufficient to render the defendants liable upon their policy. The following are the facts, as derived from the evidence, and, in stating them, I adopt the conclusions of fact most favorable to the plaintiff, that the evidence will permit to be drawn. The insured died on the 20th of November, 1872. A week or so previous to his death he was suffering from influenza, the result of a cold, and was then treated therefor by his physician. He began to get better, when, on Friday night before his death, he had an attack of cholera morbus, accompanied with convulsions, which seemed to completely shatter his nervous system and left him in a wholly nervous state. On Monday following he was again better, proposed to go to his business, and asked his physician, on account of restlessness, to give him some opiate for a quiet night's sleep. The physician ordered a preparation of opium and directed him to take twenty drops of it before going to bed. He was at this time taking chloral, under the same medical advice, and the opium was directed to be taken in addition to a prescribed dose of chloral. That night the insured took the prescribed dose of chloral, and, as may be inferred from the facts shown, a dose of opium also. There is no direct evidence as to the quantity of opium he took, but I shall treat the case as if the evidence respecting the symptoms that followed and the actions of the insured was sufficient to warrant a jury in finding that, through inadvertence, the insured took more opium than he intended to take, and such a quantity that his death was caused thereby. It is by no means clear that such finding would be warranted by the evidence given, and it is certain that no conclusion more favorable to the plaintiff can be drawn from the proofs. I am, therefore, to determine whether, as matter of law, such a death is within the scope of the policy sued on. Upon this question, my opinion is adverse to the plaintiff. As I view the evidence, the death was caused by "medical treatment for disease," and, if so, it was excepted by the terms of the policy.

The contention in behalf of the plaintiff is, that the opium was not administered by the hand of a physician, and, moreover, was not the dose directed by the physician to be taken, but was a dose taken by the insured upon his own judgment, and that these facts take the case out of the exception in the policy. But, it must be conceded, that the opium which caused the death was taken by the insured with the object of allaying the nervous excitement from which he was suffering. Certainly, then, this was disease. The advice of a physician had been taken as to its cure. It is equally certain that there was a treatment of this disease, for, the remedy prescribed by the physician was taken, although in excessive quantity, and the opium taken was so taken because the physician had prescribed it to remedy the disease. The opium was taken with no other object than to effect the result which the physician had advised should be attained by using opium. Under these circumstances, the fact that the patient deviated from the direction given by the physician in the matter of amount, and, upon his own judgment, took a larger dose than had been directed, does not change the character of the act. The object of the insured in taking the opium he did was to cure or else to kill. The facts repel the idea of an intention to kill and prove the intention to cure. Death caused by such an act, done with such an intent, is, in my opinion, a death caused wholly or in part by medical treatment for disease and, therefore, is not covered by the policy. I am also of the opinion that the facts do not disclose a case of bodily injury, effected through "external, violent and accidental means," occasioning death, within the meaning of the policy. I do not consider that violence can fairly be said to be an ingredient in the act of taking a dose of medicine, although the medicine be destructive in its action, and death the result.

These considerations compel to a denial of the motion for judgment in favor of the plaintiff, and a direction that judgment for the defendants be entered.

Case No. 1,139.

BAYLEY v. DUVALL.

[1 Cranch, C. C. 283.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. Term, 1805.

CONDITIONAL SALE—PARTIAL PAYMENT—FORFEITURE.

If money paid in advance is to be forfeited in case the residue be not paid by a certain day, the party who is to pay must tender or use his best endeavor to tender the balance due on or before the day limited.

[At law. Action for] money had and received, to recover one hundred and eighty dollars paid in advance for the purchase of the horse Yorick. The plaintiff paid the defendant one hundred and eighty dollars, in advance, for the horse, which was to be delivered to the plaintiff at a future day, on payment of the balance, and if the balance should not be paid on or before that future day, the advance-money should be forfeited. The defendant's prayer in effect was that the plaintiff must prove an actual tender of the balance, or that he attended at the defendant's house on the last day ready to pay, and that the defendant was not at home, &c.

THE COURT was of opinion, that if it was understood by the parties that the money was to be paid and the horse delivered to the plaintiff at the defendant's house, it was incumbent on the plaintiff to prove a tender within the time, or that he attended at the defendant's house on the last day ready to pay, and that the defendant was not there. If no place was understood between the parties, the plaintiff should have used reasonable diligence and endeavors to find the defendant and tender him the money, on or before the last day.

BAYLEY, (LINGAN v.) See Case No. 8,370.

BAYLEY, (WATSON v.) See Case No. 17,276.

Case No. 1,140.

BAYLISS et al. v. LAFAYETTE, M. & B. RY. CO. et al.

[8 Biss. 193;[2] 10 Chi. Leg. News, 213.]

Circuit Court, D. Indiana. March Term, 1878.

CORPORATIONS—FRAUD OF DIRECTORS—RIGHT OF STOCKHOLDERS TO BE MADE PARTIES TO SUIT.

1. Where any fraud has been perpetrated by the directors of a company, by which the property or interest of the stockholders is affected, the stockholders have a right to come in as parties to a suit against the company and ask that their property shall be relieved from the effect of such fraud.

2. Whether they would have this right where it appears that there would be no surplus remaining after liquidating all the just claims against the property, quaere?

[Cited in Lafayette Co. v. Neely, 21 Fed. 741.]

[In equity. Bill by Abram B. Bayliss and others against the Lafayette, Muncie & Bloomington Railway Company and others. For further proceedings in this litigation, see Bayliss v. Lafayette, M. & B. Ry. Co., Case No. 1,141.]

H. Crawford and McDonald & Butler, for complainants.

Templer & Gregory and Harrison, Hines & Miller, for defendants.

DRUMMOND, Circuit Judge. This is an application made by certain stockholders of the road to be let in as defendants in a bill filed to foreclose the mortgage on the eastern division of the road. The application is based upon alleged frauds perpetrated by certain directors of the road in connection with the contractors who built the eastern division. It seems that in consequence, as is alleged, of an understanding between Mr. Eells, the contractor, and certain parties, directors of the road, a proposition was made by him to construct the road, which was accepted by the company. He was to purchase and lay the iron and furnish the rolling stock, and construct depots, round houses, etc.

The company was to grade the road, build the bridges and culverts, and get the right of way, etc. It is claimed that in consequence of this arrangement the contract was made with Eells, and it is also apparent that the consideration to be given to Eells for the construction of the road—that is, all the part of it which he was to construct—was greatly in excess of the value of the work to be done by him. It is also alleged that the parties who were directors, and had made a contract for the construction of the road, were to participate in the profits—in other words, they, as directors, made a contract in which they had a pecuniary interest, and, as is alleged, in fraud of the company. There is, therefore, a sufficient allegation that the parties who made this contract were directors, that they had a pecuniary interest therein, that some of the contracts were secret, and that they were in fraud of the company and of the stockholders.

I think, therefore, on this ground, that there is ample reason given for the interference of the stockholders, and for the application which they make to become defendants, so that they may have the right to prove, if they can, the allegations they have set forth.

It is, besides, alleged that $1,600,000 of stock and $1,600,000 of the first mortgage bonds were given to Eells, and that there was an arrangement made by which the bonds were to be sold at a certain price. It is also alleged that, in consequence of the agreement and understanding between Eells and those who were directors and parties to some of the contracts, when Eells proposed to the company that he should be released from his contract, they agreed to it, though he did not comply with his contract, and did release him from his contract, in fraud of the rights of the company. Taking all these various allegations together, I think the charge of fraud and conspiracy is sufficiently stated, or at least enough to show that, if true, a court of equity would not tolerate a contract such as is set forth in this case, made by the directors with themselves, in which they had a pecuniary interest. The court will make an order allowing these parties to come in and file an answer as defendants to the bill on the foreclosure of the mortgage upon their giving bond to secure the payment of the costs.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

[2] [Reported by Josiah H. Bissell, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

The only difficulty about the case consists in this: That whatever might be the result of the proposed litigation on the part of the stockholders who shall file an answer, and say that it is for the benefit of all the stockholders who will join them, that, in any event, whatever has been expended upon this road would have to be paid. This division of the road is about eighty-four miles long, and it may be questionable whether or not the amount that has been actually expended, and for which, of course, there would be a valid claim against the road on the part of the bondholders, if we consider the value of roads generally in this part of the state and the northwest, would not absorb it all, and whether, therefore, there would be anything left for these stockholders, and whether it is an application made to defend against a mortgage simply because in certain aspects of the case their pecuniary interests would be jeopparded.

This question was not argued before the court, and there is nothing said in the proposed answer as to the value of the stock after all the just claims are paid. The answer admits that some of the bonds are valid and should be paid, and it admits further that there has been about eight or nine hundred thousand dollars expended upon the road. Now, whether or not there would be anything in any event coming to the stockholders is a matter of very grave doubt; and, I think, before this litigation proceeds further, that issue had, perhaps, better be distinctly made, so that the court shall be informed whether or not there would be a pecuniary interest for any of the stockholders remaining after liquidating all the just claims against the property. If there is not, it would give rise to this question: Whether a court of equity would allow the stockholders to come in and be made defendants for the purpose of making an example of these directors and teaching a wholesome moral lesson as to transactions of this kind. I do not say absolutely that it may not be the duty of a chancellor to allow it; that is, set aside all fraudulent acts of this kind, even though the stockholders may not have any residuary interest in the property after the payment of claims against it, but it is doubtful whether or not a court of equity ought to permit the great labor, expense and litigation which must follow, and which will have no pecuniary results in favor of the parties who are applying to the court, even if they succeed in all they have undertaken to do, namely: to prove the fraud against the directors of this company and the contractor. Therefore, I have thought that I would submit this question to the parties in this case and let them inform the court distinctly whether or not they desire to proceed in that view of the case, and wish to be made defendants and defend against the mortgage, involving, of course, as it would, all the costs, counsel fees, and labor which may be connected with such litigation.

I think the authorities are very clear that where any fraud has been perpetrated by the directors, by which the property or interest of the stockholders is affected, the stockholders can come in as parties and ask that their property shall be relieved from the effect of such fraud; but in all cases which have been decided in the supreme court, and I think by other courts upon this subject, it is assumed that the stockholders will have an interest or property remaining after it is relieved from the effect of the fraud of the directors or the officers of the company.

Case No. 1,141.

BAYLISS et al. v. LAFAYETTE, M. & B. RY. CO. et al.

[9 Biss. 90;[1] 8 Reporter, 579; 11 Chi. Leg. News, 391; 25 Int. Rev. Rec. 280; 1 Month. Jur. 123; 4 Cin. Law Bul. 624.]

Circuit Court, D. Indiana. Aug. Term, 1879.

CORPORATIONS—COUNSEL TO RECEIVER—COMPENSATION OF—SURETIES ON APPEAL BOND.

1. A decree appointing a receiver for a railroad and giving priority to claims for "labor in operation of the road" will be held to include proper compensation for counsel to the receiver for services necessary to the successful management of the road.

2. Sureties on appeal bond will be protected by the court when they have acted in good faith.

[In equity. Bill by Abram B. Bayliss and others against the Layfayette, Muncie & Bloomington Railway Company and others. For prior proceedings in this litigation, see Case No. 1,140.]

Abram B. Bayliss filed a bill to foreclose, on the western division of the railroad, a mortgage of which he was the trustee. Afterwards Joseph Colwell filed a cross-bill to foreclose a mortgage of the eastern division of the railroad, of which he was trustee.

[1] [Reported by Josiah H. Bissell, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

The district judge appointed a receiver of the whole road, who operated it for a considerable time under the direction of the court. A decree of foreclosure was entered upon the original and cross-bill, and the road was sold, and the proceeds of the sale were paid into court; and thereupon various parties who had claims against the road applied to the court for their payment, out of the fund arising from the sale. The company was insolvent, and the road was sold for much less than the amount due on the mortgages. The various claims are referred to in the opinion of the court.

H. Crawford and McDonald & Butler, for claimants.

Templer & Gregory and Harrison, Hines & Miller, for defendants.

DRUMMOND, Circuit Judge. When the bill was filed asking for a receiver, the appointment was made by the court, subject to some conditions, one of which was that he should pay certain claims against the railroad. We have not the precise form of the order, but as I understand, it was substantially this: That he was to pay all claims existing on the pay-roll, for services rendered, and for labor and supplies subsequent to the first day of January, 1877. That being the condition upon which the receiver was placed in possession of the property, and the policy marked out by the court as a guide to all parties in interest, and it having remained as the order of the court without change, I must assume that it was, and is, still binding upon all parties. Therefore, I shall reject all claims that have been filed which go back of the first day of January, 1877, and hold that they cannot be paid, save upon a contingency which possibly may be found hereafter to occur, namely, the existence of funds in the hands of the receiver, arising from the operation of the road, after the payment of all claims allowed by the order appointing the receiver. If there shall be any surplus money in the hands of the receiver, after providing for all the claims allowed under this order, then it may be that the court would permit some of these claims to be paid. If we were to allow these claims, it would open a door to the presentation of a flood of claims as just as any now presented to the court. Take the claim of "the Bee Line" for ties. It is undoubtedly an equitable claim against the railroad, and ought to be paid. the only question being whether it should be paid out of funds belonging to the bondholders. I think, under the circumstances, it ought not to be—certainly not unless there should remain a surplus arising out of the income of the road, after providing for all the claims payable under the order of the court. So that all these claims will be rejected, as matters stand at present.

The claims for services rendered by counsel, are, perhaps, the most embarrassing among those presented for the consideration of the court, and involve questions of the greatest difficulty. I do not think it is possible for me to lay down any absolute rule upon the subject. I assume the order made by the court to be as stated, and proceed to dispose of the questions discussed.

It is objected that services rendered by counsel do not come within the term "labor." These services were not upon the pay-rolls, and must come within the meaning of the term "labor"—labor done subsequent to the 1st of January, 1877. It is, as I have said, rather difficult to lay down any absolute rule upon this subject, and I think I can only adopt this principle: that whatever may be said fairly to be work done in the operation of the road is comprehended by the word, "labor." It is not necessary that it should be manual, in the sense of an act done by a person who works with the spade, the pick, or the hoe. It is sufficient if it be labor, and this would fairly include all services performed by any employe of the company, for instance, in making out and keeping accounts, and in doing anything necessary in the operation of the road; and in that sense I think that the services rendered by counsel, not in all cases, but in many cases, may be said to come within the meaning of the term "labor."

They are partly physical and partly mental. Take the case of a bill being prepared for a railroad company. The drawing up of the bill consists as well of manual as of intellectual labor. It is a work of the hand as well as of the head, and, therefore, is of the same class of labor, in one sense, as that of the ordinary laborer who uses his hands with the hoe, or the axe. Of course there is something higher and more important than this last, but it constitutes one of the elements of the service. I think it may be said, therefore, to come within the term "labor," and if it shall be necessary for the operation of the road, then, I think, like a large class of services performed, as by an ordinary employe or clerk, it ought to be considered labor in running the road, and so entitled to compensation.

Now, to illustrate and apply it to one matter in hand, namely: the service that was performed by counsel in preventing the seizure of a portion of the road by force, as it was said. Undoubtedly that may be fairly considered as work performed in the operation of the road. It was to keep possession of the road, and to allow the company to operate it as much as any service or work done by brakemen, or engineers. If, for example, the company had not the power to operate the road, then it had ceased to perform the duty which devolved upon it under the law. I am not speaking of the various incidental and outside questions that undoubtedly arose in the case; but only of the matter as a fact which existed, and which the court must consider as bearing on the services so performed by the counsel.

So I think that species of labor is fairly within the terms of the order of the court, but in saying this, I am not prepared to admit that all the services performed by counsel were necessarily within the meaning of such language. It may be that some of the services performed were not, and that is one of the reasons for requiring the counsel to specify the character of the service in order that I may distinctly understand, and make the application of this principle to the various services performed by them.

Take the case, for example, of the services performed by counsel in obtaining the right of way on land for depots and other purposes. That may also fairly come within this class of service. It is said that it is part of the construction of the road. That is true in one sense, but it may also be a part of the operation of the road. After a road has its roadbed made, its iron down, and has run cars over it, it is not a finished road. There are always more or less things to be done besides, in order to make the road complete, and to enable the company to operate it successfully; and it often is necessary to obtain additional facilities for the purpose, and additional ground; and where it comes within that description, I think it is also fairly within the meaning of the term, "labor in the operation of the road," and for which the counsel is entitled to compensation. And so with any similar service performed by counsel.

There may be, and perhaps there are, in this case, services performed which do not necessarily come within the description I have given, and where I would not be willing to allow the compensation to be paid as coming within the term, "labor in the operation of the road."

It may be said this is a nice distinction, but one, I think, it is indispensable we should make in a case of this kind, and we must, for the purpose of doing equity, give to some extent a liberal construction to the language the court used on this occasion; and, it seems to me, under this view of the case, the labor performed by counsel may be just as important, indeed more important, than the labor performed by the ordinary laborer, or by the brakeman, engineer or fireman.

As to the claim of Mr. Heath for the payment of any amount due which he may have paid on an appeal bond, executed as security; whenever he pays that amount, I shall direct the master to pay it to him. Whenever a party in legal proceedings has become security for a railroad, in good faith, I think the court ought to protect him.

This disposes of all the various questions presented to the court.

BAYLISS, (MANN v.) See Case No. 9,034.

Case No. 1,142.

BAYLISS v. POTTAWATTAMIE COUNTY.

[5 Dill. 549.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Iowa, 1878.

DEDICATION OF PUBLIC SQUARE—IOWA STATUTE—ESTOPPEL.

The public square in the city of Council Bluffs held to be effectually dedicated to the public by force of the platting and acknowledgment thereof, and acts in pais by the dedicator.

[In equity. Bill by Martha Bayliss, devisee of Samuel S. Bayliss, deceased, and administratrix of his estate, against the board of supervisors of Pottawattamie county, (the city of Council Bluffs, intervenor.) Bill dismissed.]

This suit involves the right of the plaintiff and the city of Council Bluffs (since the county sets up no claim in its own behalf or as the representative of the public) to what is called the "public square" in that city. The plaintiff is entitled to it as against the city, unless her husband, in his lifetime, made a valid dedication thereof to the public. On September 26th, 1853 (while the title to the forty acres afterwards laid off as Bayliss' addition to Council Bluffs was in the United States), Mr. Bayliss, the occupant, caused a plat to be made of that forty acres, subdividing it into fifteen blocks, with streets and alleys in the usual form, near the center of which is an open, unnumbered block, not subdivided into lots, four hundred feet square, surrounded by streets; on the middle of which block are the letters "P. S." Indorsed on the plat is the following certificate of the surveyor, and the following certificates of acknowledgments:

"I, A. D. Jones, city surveyor, hereby certify that all the streets, alleys, and public square lie as above represented on the above plat of Bayliss' addition to the city of Council Bluffs, and that the lots, streets, and alleys are described as follows: "All the lots in blocks eight, nine, and fifteen are fifty feet in width by one hundred and two feet in length. * * * The public square is four hundred feet square. * * * Surveyed and platted by A. D. Jones, April 13th, 1853. Given under my hand this 13th day of June, 1853. A. D. Jones, City Surveyor of Council Bluffs."

"State of Iowa, Pottawattamie County: Know all men by these presents, that I, Samuel S. Bayliss, proprietor of Bayliss' addition to Council Bluffs, do hereby declare and acknowledge the above plat and surveyor's certificate of the survey of said addition, as surveyed and platted by A. D. Jones, June 12th, 1853, to be correct; and I further hereby give, grant, and donate all the streets and alleys as represented on said plat to the public as highways, and for general use and convenience. Given under my hand this 13th day of July, 1853. Samuel S. Bayliss."

---

[1] [Reported by Hon. John F. Dillon, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

"State of Iowa, Pottawattamie County: Before me, A. D. Jones, notary public in and for said county, appeared the above named Samuel S. Bayliss, personally known to me to be the identical person who subscribed the above conveyance, and as proprietor of said addition, and as grantor of said deed, and acknowledged the signing of said instrument to be his voluntary act and deed. Given under my hand and official seal, the 14th day of July, 1853. (Seal.) A. D. Jones, Notary Public."

"State of Iowa, Pottawattamie County: I, Frank Street, judge of said county, do hereby certify that on this day personally appeared before me Samuel S. Bayliss, and acknowledged that the description of the land as shown by the map or plat hereto attached is with his free consent, and in accordance with his desire. Given under my hand and the seal of said county, this 26th day of September, A. D. 1853. (Seal.) Frank Street, County Judge."

"To the Recorder of Pottawattamie County, Iowa: Sir:—Having, upon examination, become fully satisfied all the requirements of the law have been complied with in regard to the survey and plat of a town as shown by the map herewith attached, you are therefore authorized to record the same and the annexed certificate, in accordance with the law in such cases. Frank Street, County Judge. September 26th, 1853."

This plat, with all of the said certificates, was duly recorded September 26th, 1853.

Another plat was also made and recorded June 1st, 1854, on which the streets and the square in question were represented in the same manner. On this plat the following was indorsed:

"Know all men by these presents, that all the streets, and public square, and alleys, and lots, are of width and length as represented on the within plat by figures; all lots are one hundred and ninety-two feet in length by fifty feet in width, except where the length and width are noted on the respective lines. The lots in blocks eight, nine, and fifteen are one hundred and two feet in length. The variation of the needle, eleven degrees eleven minutes; course of lines north and south, eleven degrees; the upper regular lines are at right angles; and the irregular lines as represented on the plat as surveyed by A. D. Jones. In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand this —— day of May, 1854. Know all men by these presents, that I donate all the streets and alleys to the public for common use and benefit as highways. In testimony whereof, we have hereunto set our hands this —— day of May, 1854. (Signed) Samuel S. Bayliss."

"State of Iowa, Pottawattamie County: On the 1st day of June, 1854, personally appeared before me, the undersigned, a notary public within and for the state and county aforesaid, Samuel S. Bayliss, who is personally known to me to be the identical person who executed the above instrument or donation, and acknowledged the same to be his voluntary act and deed for the purposes therein expressed. Witness my hand and notarial seal, this 1st day of June, A. D. 1854. (Seal.) Jefferson P. Casady, Notary Public."

Under the act of congress entitled "An act for the benefit of citizens and occupants of Council Bluffs, in Iowa," approved April 6th, 1854, [10 Stat. 273,] Franklin Street, as county judge, entered this forty acres in trust. See chapter 88, Laws Iowa 1853, entitled "An act regulating the disposal of lands purchased in trust for town sites," approved January 22d, 1853. In disposing of this land, the above plats of Bayliss were recognized, and the square in question treated as public, and the occupants of lots were charged for their proportion of the purchase money paid to the United States on that basis. Bayliss was admitted to be the cestui que trust, and deeds were made to him and to his grantees, from time to time, by the county judge, for the lots in the addition. Bayliss sold and conveyed lots to purchasers according to the recorded plats.

Mr. Ballard testifies, in substance: "In the fall of 1853 or spring of 1854, Bayliss wanted to sell me lots in his addition on the public square, and then known as the public square. He urged them as desirable for residence lots because of their fronting on the public square. He claimed to own lots he was showing me, and spoke of their being on the public square. I have no recollection of his claiming any individual interests in the square itself." Mr. Rice testifies, in substance: "I knew Samuel S. Bayliss from 1853 to the date of his death. Am acquainted with the square in controversy, and have been since Bayliss' addition was laid out, in the fall of 1853. Bayliss showed me his plat on two occasions and took me on the ground several times, with a view to purchase a church lot on east side of the square; and afterwards he took me on the south and west sides of the square. On these occasions we conversed in relation to the square and the lots contiguous to it. He showed me lot four in block nine, with a view to my purchasing this for a church site. He represented it as fronting on the public square, and more desirable on that account. He pointed out the block bounded by Pearl, Willow, Court, and Center streets as the public square." Mr. Lewis testifies that, in 1853, Bayliss showed him the plat of his addition with the square in question shown thereon; that witness purchased of Bayliss lots on the square, Bayliss pointing out the square on the plat and speaking of the advantages of lots near the square, and of their value being greater than elsewhere, and he charged more for that reason for lots on the square. Cumulative evidence to the same general effect was also given by Mr. McBride, Mr. Dennis, Mr. Officer, Mr. John T. Baldwin, and Mr. W. H. M. Pusey.

The records of the city council show that, in 1857, the city improved the streets around the square, and in the same year the city council adopted a resolution providing for sealed proposals to fence the public square, in Bayliss' addition, provided the citizens around the square shall furnish the money and take city orders at par for the same; and many subsequent resolutions for the improvement of the square and regulating its uses, both before and after the present suit was brought, which was on July 13th, 1866.

In March, 1853, Bayliss entered into an agreement with the county judge of the county, by which he "agreed to deed to the county the ground for a public square in and for said county, as follows" (here describing the ground now in controversy). "Also another piece of ground as a site for the courthouse for said county" (here describing two lots fronting on the square). And also to make a certain donation to aid in the erection of the court-house. The county judge thereupon (March 11th, 1853) ordered as follows: "Therefore, ordered, that if the said materials shall be furnished and said lots donated according to the tenor and intent of the aforesaid bonds and instruments of agreement, the said square shall be, in that case, hereby located and established as the public square for said county, and the last described lot, in that case, be established as the site for the court-house in and for said county. T. Burdick, County Judge."

In 1866, the county definitely determined to build the court-house in another part of the city, and soon afterwards this suit was brought. But meanwhile, July 12th, 1855, on Bayliss' demand, the county judge reconveyed the court-house lots on the square to Bayliss, with this provision: "To hold the same in trust for the county of Pottawattamie until the same shall be needed to build a court-house on, or until a court-house shall be built upon the public square adjoining, and if the court-house should neither be built on said public square nor lot, then the lot becomes, absolutely, the property of the said Bayliss; and I, as such trustee, warrant the title against the claims of all persons whomsoever. Signed, July 12th, 1855. Franklin Street, County Judge."

Judge Street testified that "Bayliss never, at any time, demanded of me a conveyance of the public square." There are many minor facts in evidence, but the foregoing sufficiently show the essential features of the case.

Clinton, Hart, & Brewer, for the complainant.

L. W. Ross, solicitor for intervenor, and of counsel for the defendants.

DILLON, Circuit Judge. If the county were the only adverse claimant to the plaintiff, and were insisting that this square had been effectually dedicated to it, it may, for the purposes of this case, be conceded that the plaintiff would be entitled to the relief sought. But after the transaction with the county judge, in 1853, Mr. Bayliss made two separate plats of the property, on which this square was indicated as open and unnumbered, with the initials "P. S." therein, and containing words referring to it as a public square. It would seem, from a reference to his acknowledgment of July 14th, 1853, and to the latter part of the grant to the public of May, 1854, acknowledged June 1st, 1854, that Mr. Bayliss omitted all reference to the square. But in the surveyor's certificate indorsed on this plat, the surveyor twice refers to the square in question as a public square, and Mr. Bayliss "declares and acknowledges the above plat and surveyor's certificate to be correct;" and on September 26th, 1853, he acknowledged the plat in conformity with the statute on that subject. In the writing indorsed on the plat of 1854, the ground in question is referred to as a public square. This makes an effectual dedication under the statute—certainly when it is accepted by the city. The proofs sufficiently show such acceptance by appropriations of money for its improvement and by the exercise of legislative and municipal power over it as a public square. If Mr. Bayliss intended to exclude this square from the ground dedicated to the public, he failed to accomplish his intention.

A purchaser consulting the recorded plats, with the acknowledgments and certificates, would be justified in concluding (as several intelligent witnesses state they did in fact) that the square was dedicated to the public.

Whether we look at the recorded plats, with their certificates and acknowledgments, or to the extrinsic evidence as to Mr. Bayliss' repeated statements to persons proposing to purchase lots, that this was a public square, and that not only the immediate purchasers, but the public, have acted upon these plats and these statements, it is clear that Mr. Bayliss and his representatives are brought within the principle of equitable estoppel which so often applies to this class of cases. Cincinnati v. White, 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 431; Dill. Mun. Corp. §§ 493, 494. It is claimed, however, that, Mr. Bayliss being dead, his statements and declarations are not competent evidence against the plaintiff. Code Iowa 1873, § 3639. I do not stop to examine or determine the point, for, if well taken, it would not exclude evidence of acts of his testified to by many witnesses, such as that he charged and received more for lots fronting on the square (simply for the reason that it was public) than for lots elsewhere, which, in every other respect, were worth as much, and the other significant fact, that, although he demanded and received a deed for the court-house lots, he made no such demand in respect of the square.

The city was incorporated before either of the plats was recorded. The statute declares that "the acknowledgment and recording of such plat is equivalent to a deed in fee-simple of such portion of the land as is therein set apart for public use, or is dedicated to charitable, religious, or educational purposes." The city is the representative of the public rights in this square.

A decree will be entered dismissing the plaintiff's bill against the county, and also against the city, which, by intervention, also became a party to the suit. Decree accordingly.

Case No. 1,143.

BAYLOR et al. v. NEFF et al.

[3 McLean, 302.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Ohio. Dec. Term, 1843.

EJECTMENT—PRACTICE—DEATH OF LESSOR.

1. A demise in the name of a dead man will be stricken out on motion. And so, if the lessor of the plaintiff be dead, at the commencement of the suit.

2. The death of the lessor does not abate the suit. The title is supposed to be in the plaintiff.

3. A title acquired after the date of the demise, cannot sustain the action.

Mr. Douglass, for lessors of plaintiff.

Stansbury & Olds, for defendants.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This is a motion to strike out the demise in the declaration laid in the name of David Meade, Jun., of Kentucky, on the ground that the said Meade was dead at the time the suit was commenced, and when the declaration was filed. Also upon the ground that there was no subsisting title to the premises in controversy in Walker Baylor, John W. Baylor, Elijah Pritchard and David Meade, Jun., at the time of the commencement of the suit, and at the time of the service of the declaration in ejectment. A motion was also made to strike out another demise laid in the declaration, on the ground that the lessor of the plaintiff was dead at the date of the lease.

A demise laid in the name of a dead person is unsustainable. Although the lease is now a fiction, yet the party alleged to have executed it, must be in life and capable of making such a contract. The court order the demise referred to, to be stricken out.

The death of the lessor of the plaintiff will not abate the action, nor can it be pleaded puis darrein continuance; because the right is supposed to be in the lessee, the plaintiff; although he cannot obtain possession of the land. Till. Eject. 320. But, it seems that a plaintiff in ejectment cannot recover on a demise from a person who is dead, at the time of action brought. See v. Greenlee, 6 Munf. 303.

[1] [Reported by Hon. John McLean, Circuit Justice.]

The demise laid in the name of Baylor and others must also be stricken out. A title acquired subsequently to the demise laid cannot sustain the action.

Case No. 1,144.

In re BAYLY et al.

[19 N. B. R. 73; 26 Pittsb. Leg. J. 172.]

(Circuit Court, D. Louisiana. Feb. Term, 1879.)

BANKRUPTCY—COMPOSITION—DEFAULT—RIGHTS OF CREDITORS.

[1. Where, in bankruptcy proceedings, a composition is arranged and confirmed, the case is not thereby taken out of the jurisdiction of the court; and hence, where the debtor fails to carry out the terms of the composition, a creditor cannot thereupon claim the right to proceed against him for the collection of the whole debt, for the bankruptcy proceedings are still pending, and his remedy is to be sought therein.]

[Cited in Re Tifft, Case No. 14,034; Re Michel, 6 Fed. 709.]

[2. A creditor obtained a judgment against his debtor pending voluntary bankruptcy proceedings, in which a composition was effected and confirmed by the court, and thereupon an injunction issued against the enforcement of the judgment. The debtor failed to pay either of the installments provided by the composition, and the creditor moved to dissolve the injunction against his judgment. Held, that the debtor's default did not entitle the creditor to enforce his judgment, and it was proper to make an order that the injunction should only be dissolved in case the debtor should fail to carry out the composition, or go on with the bankruptcy proceedings, within 30 days.]

[Distinguished in McGehee v. Hentz, Case No. 8,794.]

[Petition for review of a decision by the district court of the United States for the district of Louisiana.]

In bankruptcy. On petition of review of Paul Fourchey. The case was this: On March 2, 1876, Bayly & Pond, a commercial firm in the city of New Orleans, filed in the district court their voluntary petition in bankruptcy, in which they proposed and prayed for a composition with their creditors. Notwithstanding the filing of said petition, the petitioner in review, Paul Fourchey, on March 13, 1876, instituted a suit, in the fourth district court of the parish of Orleans, against said firm of Bayly & Pond, to recover the sum of one thousand two hundred and thirty-seven dollars due to him on the promissory note of said firm. Bayly & Pond, on March 27, 1876, pleaded to said action the certificate of protection of said United States district court, and on April 10, 1876, they filed an amended answer, in which they set out that the creditors had held, in the bankruptcy proceedings, a meeting and accepted a composition proposed by them, to wit: The payment of twenty-five cents on the dollar, one-half on the confirmation by the court of the composition proceedings, and the other half in sixty days thereafter. Notwithstanding their defences, the state court rendered judgment in favor of Fourchey, against Bayly &

Pond, for one thousand two hundred and thirty-seven dollars, and interest, and the judgment was signed April 15, 1876. The debt due to Fourchey, on which the judgment was based, was never proved against Bayly & Pond in the bankruptcy proceedings.

On April 12, 1876, the U. S. district court, on the application of Bayly & Pond, issued an injunction restraining Fourchey from enforcing the collection of his judgment by execution. Bayly & Pond failed to pay Fourchey the first instalment of the composition, and also failed to pay Fourchey and other creditors the second instalment when the same fell due. On January 4, 1877, Bayly & Pond being still in default in the payment of their composition, Fourchey filed a motion for the dissolution of the injunction above mentioned. On this motion the district court made an order in these words: "Ordered, that unless the bankrupts forthwith carry out the composition, or within thirty days proceed with their bankrupt proceedings the injunction herein granted be dissolved." The petitioner thereupon filed this petition of review, in which he asked a reversal of said order and a dissolution of said injunction, because, as he claimed, 1. He is entitled to enforce his judgment for the full amount recovered, the said Bayly & Pond having never been adjudicated bankrupts, and having failed to carry into effect the said composition; and, because, 2. The right of the creditor to enforce his claim is an absolute right when the debtor does not seek to set aside the composition or offer an excuse for failure to execute the composition, and when the creditors do not seek to set aside the composition or to enforce it.

T. J. Semmes, for petitioner.
J. H. Kennard, contra.

WOODS, Circuit Judge. It is clear that Fourchey was in the first instance properly enjoined from proceeding to enforce the collection of his judgment out of the property of the bankrupts. Bayly & Pond filed their petition in bankruptcy March 2, 1876, in which they prayed for the benefit of the act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States, approved March 2, 1867. [14 Stat. 517.] The suit of Fourchey was not begun until March 13, and judgment was not rendered in his favor until April 10. The property of the bankrupts was by force of the bankrupt act protected from any interference by their judgment or execution issued thereon. See sections 5, 106, Rev. St.

The only question, therefore, for solution is: What is the effect of the composition proceedings, and the failure of the bankrupts to pay the composition, on the rights of the petitioner? Clearly as long as the bankrupts were paying the instalments according to the terms of their composition, the judgment creditor could not enforce the collection of his debt against the property of the bankrupt, for the act of congress providing for composition declares that the provisions of a composition accepted by a resolution adopted at a meeting of the creditors "shall be binding on all the creditors whose names and addresses, and the amount of the debts due to whom are shown in the statement of the debtor produced at the meeting at which the resolution shall have been passed." [Act of June 22, 1874.] 18 Stat. 183. And Fourchey's name, address, and the amount of the debts due him from the bankrupts, were shown in the list above mentioned.

Has the failure of Bayly & Pond to perform the composition according to its terms clothed Fourchey with the right to disregard the bankruptcy proceedings and sue for his whole debt? It seems to me that such a result does not follow the failure of the bankrupts to pay their composition. The bankruptcy proceedings are not determined and closed by the order of the court approving the resolution of the creditors accepting the composition. The case is still pending. Further steps in the case may be necessary. The law says: "The provisions of any composition made in pursuance of this section may be enforced by the court on motion made in a summary manner by any person interested and on reasonable notice, and any disobedience of the order of the court made on such motion shall be deemed a contempt of court." "If it should at any time appear to the court on notice, satisfactory evidence and hearing, that a composition under this section cannot, in consequence of legal difficulties, or for any sufficient cause, proceed without injustice or undue delay to the creditors or to the debtor, the court may refuse to accept or confirm such composition, or may set the same aside, and in either case the debtor shall be proceeded with as a bankrupt, in conformity with the provisions of law, and proceedings may be had accordingly, and the time during which such composition shall have been in force shall not in such case be computed in calculating periods of time prescribed by said act. 18 Stat. 184. It is clear from these provisions of the statute that when a composition is set aside by the court the proceedings in bankruptcy may be prosecuted without beginning de novo. No new petition is required. The case is taken up just where it was when interrupted by the composition. The bankruptcy suit is therefore pending all the time, and by its force protects the property of the debtor from seizure by any creditor who is bound by the composition resolution. If a composition fails and the court orders the case in bankruptcy to proceed, the court has it in its power to see that those creditors who have not received their pro rata shares, if any, shall be made equal to those who have, in the distribution of the assets of the bankrupt estate. To hold that a failure to pay according to the composition resolution authorizes the creditors who are not paid to seize the property of the bankrupt, would be to render vain and futile the bankruptcy.

The petitioner in review has attempted to sustain his views by the citation of cases under the English composition act. Edwards v. Coombe, L. R. 7 C. P. 519; Newell v. Van Praagh, L. R. 9 C. P. 96; In re Hatton, 7 Ch. App. 723. It is to be observed that these cases arose under section 126, 32 & 33 Vict., (see Blum. Bankr. p. 405,) which provides that "the creditors of a debtor unable to pay his debts may, without any proceedings in bankruptcy, by an extraordinary resolution, resolve that a composition shall be accepted in satisfaction of the debts due to them from the debtor. If it appears to the court in satisfactory evidence that a composition under this section cannot, in consequence of legal difficulties, or for any sufficient cause, proceed without injustice, or undue delay to the creditors or to the debtor, the court may adjudge the debtor a bankrupt, and proceedings may be had accordingly." The difference between the English act and ours is evident at a glance. Under the English act the composition may take place without any proceedings in bankruptcy, and if the composition fails, the court may, but is not required to, adjudge the debtor a bankrupt. Under the act of congress there can be no composition unless a petition under the bankrupt act is first filed; and if the proceedings in bankruptcy are arrested by a composition, and the composition fails, the law declares that the bankruptcy shall proceed. I therefore think that the authorities cited are not pertinent to the American statute. These remarks also apply to the cases relied on by petitioner, cited from Massachusetts Reports. National Mount Wollaston Bank v. Porter, 122 Mass. 308; Pierce v. Gilkey, 124 Mass. 300. On the other hand, in a well-considered case, the court of appeals of Maryland has decided, basing its decision on the peculiar form of our statute, that where a resolution of composition provides that the instalments shall be secured by the notes of the debtor, a creditor who has proved his debt cannot sue for his original debt in a state court, although the debtor has made default in payment of one of the instalments. Deford v. Hewlett, 49 Md. 51. The remedy for failure to comply with the terms of the composition, it seems to me, is clearly pointed out by our statute. It does not permit the creditor to sue for and recover his original debt, but provides for an application to the court for the enforcement of the composition, or, in case the composition cannot be enforced, that the proceedings in bankruptcy shall be resumed.

It results from these views that Fourchey was properly enjoined by the district court, and that the court was right in refusing to dissolve the injunction. Petition of review dismissed at petitioner's costs.

Case No. 1,145.

BAYLY et al. v. LONDON & L. INS. CO.

[4 Ins. Law J. 503.]

Circuit Court, D. Louisiana. 1875.

INSURANCE—CONDITIONS OF POLICY—ACTION—INSTRUCTIONS—EVIDENCE.

[1. Though one of the conditions of a policy on a stock of goods prohibits the storing or vending of saltpetre, on the premises, it is no breach of the condition to keep on hand a small quantity of saltpetre for the sole purpose of curing meat kept in stock.]

[2. In an action on such a policy the defendant pleaded the breach of this condition by the insured, and the court charged the jury that there could be no recovery if they found that the condition was broken by the storing and selling of saltpetre "in any considerable quantity." Held, that the use of the term "considerable" was not objectionable, where the meaning conveyed by the instruction, as a whole, was that there must have been a substantial violation of the condition.]

[3. Furthermore there can be no ground of objection to the use of the term "considerable quantity," where there is evidence that there was on the premises a keg of saltpetre, for that is enough to make the term applicable.]

[4. Where an additional defense, in such action, is that the premises were set on fire by the assured for the purpose of defrauding the insurer, and the court correctly charges as to the measure of proof required to sustain this defense, there is no error in failing to go further, and charge that, this being a civil action, the arson charged need not be proved beyond a reasonable doubt, as it would have to be in criminal proceedings.]

[5. The court cannot grant a new trial, where the evidence is conflicting, merely because the conclusions drawn by the jury from the evidence are different from those at which the court might have arrived.]

[6. Where the jury have assessed the damages at a certain sum in a case properly submitted to them, it is not competent for the court to inquire how they reached the result, if it is warranted by the evidence, or to make their reasons grounds of objection for the purpose of a new trial.]

[At law. Action by G. M. Bayly and Pond against the London & Lancashire Insurance Company. On motion for new trial. Motion denied.]

R. Hunt, T. J. Semmes, R. L. Gibson, J. & E. Austin, for motion.

J. H. Kennard and T. L. Bayne, contra.

WOODS, Circuit Judge. This action was a suit on a policy of insurance to recover for loss declared sustained by plaintiffs on their stock of groceries, by fire, on the 29th of May, 1874. The amount claimed in the petition was $9,195.35, and the jury returned a verdict for $8,714.87.

1. The first ground upon which the motion is based is as follows: That under the express provisions of the policy the plaintiffs were prohibited from keeping in their store, and selling, saltpetre, in any quantities whatever, and the evidence established clearly and beyond doubt that plaintiffs did keep in their store, and sell, saltpetre, in direct violation of their contract. I do not know that it is denied that the plaintiffs, under the terms of their policy, might keep in their store small quantities of saltpetre, not for sale, but for the purpose of use in preserving from taint meats and other articles which formed a part of their stock. The policy forbids the storing or vending of any of the articles specified as hazardous, of which saltpetre was one. Keeping saltpetre for the purpose just indicated would not be a storing, within the meaning of the policy. Dobson v. Sotheby, 22 E. C. L. 481; O'Niel v. Buffalo Fire Ins. Co., 3 Comst. [3 N. Y.] 127. The plaintiffs do not deny that a part of a keg of saltpetre, which was used for the purpose above stated, was upon their premises at the time of the fire. But does the proof establish clearly and beyond doubt that the plaintiffs kept saltpetre for sale?

The proof upon this point is confined to the evidence of two witnesses, Van Benthuysen and Pond, the latter being one of the plaintiffs. Van Benthuysen testifies that, as to the charge that the plaintiffs kept saltpetre in store upon their premises, there was nothing in it. Pond, in an ex parte statement under oath, taken by an agent of the North British & Mercantile Insurance Company, in answer to the question put to him by the agent, "Did you keep in store and for sale coal oil, saltpetre, powder, matches, and other goods of like character?" answered: "We kept saltpetre in small quantities; no powder; matches in small lots, and coal oil in cases." When on the stand as a witness in the case, Pond testified that they had in their store part of a keg of saltpetre, for use in preserving meats, but not for sale. This was all the evidence upon this point. It cannot be denied that there was evidence on both sides the question, whether saltpetre was kept in store for sale on the premises. When this is the case it is the province of the jury to decide upon the weight and credibility of the evidence, and the court, even should it disagree with the jury on these points, would not set aside the verdict of the jury for that reason. To do so would be to invade the premises of the jury. Ashley v. Ashley, 2 Strange, 1142; Swain v. Hall, 3 Wils. 45; Lewis v. Peake, 7 Taunt. 153; Hartwright v. Badham, 11 Price, 383; Carstairs v. Stein, 4 Maule & S. 192; Woodward v. Paine, 15 Johns. 493. The jury are the exclusive judges of the weight of evidence. Ewing v. Burnet, 11 Pet. [36 U. S.] 41; U. S. v. Laub, 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 1; Richardson v. Boston, 19 How. [60 U. S.] 263; Hyde v. Stone, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 170. As the question was first submitted to the jury, and they have passed upon it, and there was evidence to sustain their finding, the issue is not open for the consideration of the court. I therefore am of the opinion that the first ground for the motion is not well taken.

2. But it is insisted by defendants that there was an error in the charge of the court, to their prejudice upon defense set up, that the plaintiffs stored and sold saltpetre on the premises, contrary to the terms of the policy.

The charge of the court upon this point was as follows: "It is claimed by defendants that the plaintiffs kept and sold upon the premises, where the insured goods were stored, saltpetre, and that this by the very terms of the policy avoided the contract of insurance. On this point the policy provides as follows: 'And it is decreed and declared to be the true intent and meaning of the parties hereto, that in case the above mentioned property, or premises, or any part thereof, shall at any time after the making and during the continuance of this insurance be appropriated, applied or used to or for the purpose of storing or vending therein any of the articles, goods or merchandise in the conditions aforesaid denominated hazardous, extra hazardous, or included in the memorandum of special rates, unless herein otherwise specially provided for or hereafter agreed to by this company in writing, and added to or indorsed upon this policy, then and from thenceforth so long as the same shall be appropriated, applied or used, these presents shall cease, and be of no force or effect.' By a reference to condition 3, indorsed upon the policy, the article of saltpetre is found to be classed as extra hazardous. Upon this branch of the case I instruct you that insurance companies are not compelled by their employment to take risks except upon their own terms. They have the right to impose such conditions, not contrary to good morals, or public policy, as they may choose, and these conditions are binding upon the parties assenting to them. When it (an insurance company) says it will not insure premises containing gunpowder or saltpetre, and inserts a condition in its policy that if gunpowder or saltpetre is stored or sold on the premises, the policy shall be void, that provision is binding on the assured; and if he stores and sells upon the premises these articles, that fact avoids the policy. And in case of loss by fire, it makes no difference that the loss was not occasioned by the prohibited articles. The assured is bound by the terms of the contract, and the insurer has a right to stand upon the provisions of his contract. So if you find, from an inspection of the policy, that it was to be void and of no effect if saltpetre was stored and sold on the premises, and saltpetre was stored and sold on the premises in any considerable quantities without the assent of the assured, these facts avoid the policy, and there can be no recovery."

The criticism made by the defendants on this charge is confined to the use of the word "considerable," in the last clause. But taking the entire charge upon this subject into consideration, it seems to me there is no error in it, and the word objected to could not mislead the jury. The meaning intended to be conveyed, and it seems to me actually conveyed, is that there must be a substantial violation of the terms of the policy. To say that the storing of saltpetre in any quantity, however minute, would avoid the policy, would not be true. The storing or selling of half a pound of saltpetre would not avoid the policy; and it would not be a fair construction of the policy to so hold. The word "considerable," was therefore used as a qualifying word. The proposition submitted to the jury was that the storing or selling of saltpetre on the premises would avoid the policy; but there must be such a quantity as in the fair construction of the policy and intent of the parties would fall within its prohibition and amount to a substantial violation of the conditions of the policy. But a charge cannot be fairly considered or construed disconnected from the evidence to which it applies.

I have already referred to the evidence in this branch of the case, but must do so again. Van Benthuysen testified that no saltpetre was stored on the premises. Pond testified on the stand that part of a keg was kept on the premises for use in preserving meats. This, as we have already seen, was not a "storing," within the meaning of the policy. Now, if this had been the only evidence in the case upon this point, the defendants would have had no ground of complaint, for this charge would have been abstract, there being no testimony to show a storing or selling, to which the charge could apply. The plaintiffs might have complained, but the defendants could not. The only other evidence on this point in the case was the affidavit of Pond, already referred to, taken by the insurance agent and offered as an admission of one of the plaintiffs. Here are the questions and answers: "Q.—Did you keep in store and for sale coal oil, saltpetre, powder, matches, and other goods of like character? A.—We kept saltpetre in small quantities; no powder; matches in small lots, and coal oil in cans. Q.—Give an estimate of the quantities of these goods on hand at any one time. A.—We had at the time of the fire only five cases of matches, one keg of saltpetre and five or ten cases of coal oil."

Now, what is the effect of this evidence? Unquestionably, that matches, saltpetre and coal oil were kept on hand and for sale in substantial and considerable quantities. The plaintiffs are shown to be wholesale dealers, and that at the time of the fire they had a keg of saltpetre on hand for sale. Can any man say that it was not a considerable quantity? Now, what was the charge of the court as applied to this evidence? It was that if the plaintiffs stored or sold saltpetre in any considerable quantities, they violated the condition of their policy, and could not recover. What is there here of which defendants could complain? Where was the error of this charge, as applied to this evidence, and what was there in it to mislead the jury? In my judgment, there is no good ground of complaint against this part of the charge, either considered as an abstract proposition or as applied to the facts of the case.

3. It is stated as a ground for a new trial that one of the defenses being that the premises where the insured goods were stored was set fire to by the plaintiffs for the purpose of defrauding the defendants, the court did not charge the jury that, this being a civil action, the rule of evidence in criminal cases did not apply, and that it was not necessary to sustain the defence to establish beyond a reasonable doubt the fact that plaintiffs had fired their own premises.

What the court did say to the jury was as follows: "The defendant alleges that the fire in the premises, by which the plaintiffs allege their goods and stock in trade were lost and damaged, was caused willfully and maliciously by the plaintiffs, or others with their knowledge or connivance, and with intention of defrauding the defendant. It needs no judge to tell you that if these facts are established there ought not to be and cannot be any recovery on their policy. The burden of proof is on defendant to establish this branch of defense. The presumption of law is against the commission by plaintiffs of so great a crime, and to make out this defense the proof offered by defendants must be clear and satisfactory to your minds. You must be convinced from the evidence either that plaintiffs set fire to the premises, or that it was done by their procurement or connivance. Even if the evidence should convince you that the fire was set by the employees of the plaintiffs, that fact would not make good this branch of the defense, unless you were also clearly convinced that the fire was set by the direction, connivance or consent of the plaintiffs. The purpose of fire insurance is to indemnify the insured against incendiary as well as accidental fires, when the insured is in no way or manner chargeable with the fire. If you shall find that this defense is established by the proof, that will bring your deliberations to a close, and your duty will be to return a verdict for the defendants. But, if you should be of opinion that this defense is not proven, it will then be your duty to consider other matters of defense relied on." No objection is made to this charge as given, but it is said that the jury should have been told that it was not necessary to establish the firing of the building by the plaintiffs with the same strength and clearness of proof as required in criminal cases. In my opinion, it is usually sufficient to state to the jury what rules of evidence do apply, without stating also the rules which do not apply. I do not think it possible that the jury could have misunderstood the charge on this branch of the case, and I have not the slightest reason to believe they were misled. A labored and ingenious argument was submitted to the court in order to induce it to grant the motion for a new trial, to show that Bayly & Pond did in fact fire their own premises. It would be sufficient to say, in answer to the argument referred to, that substantially the same argument was made to the jury, and failed to convince them of the truth of the charge made. Even were I convinced that the proof sustained the charge, it would not be my province to set aside the verdict of the jury because I disagreed with them. But as the argument was pressed with great vigor upon the attention of the court, it is not improper for me to say that it failed to convince me, as it had already failed to convince the jury.

The fire was first discovered about 9 o'clock p. m., of the 29th of May, 1874. The theory of the defendants is that it was set by two employees of the plaintiffs. This theory is not sustained by one word of direct evidence; the defendants depend on circumstances, only, to establish it. These circumstances were, as the evidence shows, that it was the custom of the plaintiffs to close their stores for the day at about 6 p. m., and to warn the employees upon the premises that they were about to close by the ringing of a bell or gong. On the afternoon of the day upon which the fire occurred these employees, as they claimed, did not hear the bell ring, when their business called them to the third story, and were locked up in the stores. When they discovered the fact, which was not till later than half past 6, they descended to the ground floor, and finding themselves locked in they returned to the second story, got out upon the roof of the gallery, which extended over the pavement, and slid down one of the iron columns to the street. When the fire on the premises was discovered, about 9 o'clock that evening, the testimony tends to show that it was burning in three different places. The defendants claim that these employees, before they left the building, had laid and fired the match that about two hours subsequently fired the building. This theory strikes me as highly improbable. Both these men were examined as witnesses, and they appeared to be of ordinary intelligence. It certainly seems plain that no one, unless insane, having fired a building, after it was closed for the day for the purpose of fraud, would have left it in broad daylight, with the sun an hour high, and left it too in the most conspicuous manner, and upon the most frequented thoroughfare in this city. If the claim of the defendants is true, these men had, by the laws of Louisiana, been guilty of a capital offense, and they take pains to advertise the fact by leaving the scene of their crime in a manner calculated to excite the attention and surprise of all the passers-by upon the most crowded street of the city. Men who commit the crime of arson do not proceed in that way when they can just as easily protect themselves by secrecy and darkness.

In my judgment there is not only an utter failure of direct proof to implicate these men, but there are the most cogent probabilities against the truth of the charge laid at their doors. But suppose it were established that the two employees of the plaintiffs fired the building. That is not sufficient; for there must be proof that they acted by the procurement or connivance of the plaintiffs. Upon this point there is not one word of proof. An attempt was made, by proving the business embarrassments of the plaintiffs, to show a motive for burning their own premises and thereby securing the insurance money. But in my judgment the decided weight of the evidence was that plaintiffs were not embarrassed; and the proof is uncontradicted that if their insurance money had been promptly paid, nevertheless their loss by the fire, over and above their insurance, would have been a very large amount—Pond himself placing it at $100,000. The fact which defendants essayed to prove, that the buildings were fired purposely, by showing that the fire, when discovered, was burning in three places, does not prove or tend to prove that plaintiffs caused the fire to be set. There are incendiary fires which are not set by the owners of the premises. Buildings are often fired by incendiaries from motives of revenge, from hope of plunder, or for the wanton purpose of simply causing a great fire and making a great excitement.

It were easy for any one so evilly disposed, with false keys or by other means, to gain access to the premises and set them on fire. Whoever did it waited till after dark, and left the building in as secret and unsuspicious a manner as possible. My deliberate conviction is, therefore, that this branch of the defense had nothing to support it, and I entirely agree with the jury in the conclusion they must have reached upon it.

4. It is assigned as other grounds for a new trial that the plaintiffs, by false and fraudulent statements, tried to exaggerate their loss, and that the proof of the amount of loss was uncertain and unsatisfactory. The questions of the fraudulent practices and of the actual amount of their loss were fairly submitted to the jury. There was evidence to sustain the verdict of the jury, and their finding is conclusive.

5. It is insisted that the jury must have arrived at the amount of their verdict by allowing the plaintiffs' claim for profits resulting from illegally carrying on the business of rectifiers. In answer to this it may be said that the jury report a given sum as the amount of the loss. We do not know how they arrived at that result, and we cannot ascertain, nor is it competent for us to inquire. One juryman has herein used one method of calculation, and another another. We have no right to enter into their deliberations, and make their reasons or their methods a ground of objection, if they have reached a substantially just result. But it seems to me that, even if the plaintiffs had made large profits by an illegal traffic, it could not be said that they insured for illegal profits. They lost no "profits" by the fire, and they make no claim for "profits." The question of profits only came into the case as a factor in the problem to be solved, namely: How many goods were left in the store at the date of the fire, and what, therefore, was the actual loss, not of profit, but of property?

Lastly, it is said that by the process carried on in the premises of plaintiffs of reducing liquors by the mixing of water and the making of cocktails, etc., the risk was increased, and therefore there should have been no recovery. The proof upon this point was not so clear as to satisfy my mind that, as a question of law, the risk was increased. The high-proof spirits were passed into tubs and diluted with water. There was no fire or light in that part of the building, and smoking was prohibited anywhere in the premises. I am not able to say, as a question of law, that risks were by these precautions increased, and I was not asked to say so to the jury. I do not think a new trial should be granted for this last reason assigned.

I believe I have noticed all the matters stated in writing or orally upon the argument as reasons why a new trial should be granted, and am satisfied that none of them are well taken. The case was laboriously and ably tried by counsel for the parties. The jury was one of exceptional intelligence and experience in affairs, and in my judgment their verdict rendered substantial justice between the parties. The motion for a new trial must be overruled.

Case No. 1,146.

Case of BAYNE.

[Cited in U. S. v. Anderson, Case No. 14,452. Nowhere reported; opinion not now accessible.]

BAYNE, (MAY v.) See Case No. 9,331.

Case No. 1,147.

BAYSAND v. LOVERING et al.

[1 Cranch, C. C. 206.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. Term, 1804.

EXECUTOR DE SON TORT—LIABILITY.

An executor, de son tort, is liable for the value of the goods taken and used.

At law. Assumpsit on bill of exchange, [against Lovering and wife as executrix de son tort of Andrew White.] Pleas never executrix, non assumpsit, and limitations.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

Morsell, for plaintiff.

Mason, for defendant.

THE COURT instructed the jury that if they should be of opinion that the defendant took the goods of the deceased and used them as her own, and not for safe keeping, she is chargeable as executrix in her own wrong to the amount of the goods so used.

Case No. 1,148.

The BAY STATE.

[Abb. Adm. 235;[1] 6 N. Y. Leg. Obs. 198.]

District Court, S. D. New York. April Term, 1848.[2]

COLLISION—EXTRAORDINARY PRECAUTIONS IN HARBOR—SAILING VESSEL IN FOG—SIGNALS—CUSTOM OF LONG ISLAND SOUND.

1. A steam vessel running into harbor, or through the common thoroughfare of other vessels, is bound to take extra precaution against collision with sailing vessels; and in the night, or in case of a fog, must move with great circumspection, or even lay-to or anchor, according to the danger of encountering other vessels.

[Cited in The Rocket, Case No. 11,975.]

2. A sailing vessel at anchor or lying-to in a dark night or in a dense fog, is also bound to take such precautions as may be in her power, to give warning of her position to other vessels, whether steamers or vessels under canvas, which may be nearing her.

3. Under the usages of navigation upon Long Island sound, the blowing a horn, the ringing a bell, or the beating upon an empty barrel or upon an anchor, is a reasonable precaution which a sailing vessel lying-to in a fog is bound, as towards a steamer which may come in collision with her, to take, in warning off such steamer. (Since reversed.)

[Cited in Jones v. The Hanover, Case No. 7,466. Disapproved in The Rockaway, 19 Fed. 452.]

[See note at end of case.]

4. The rule of equal contribution should be applied in cases of damage caused by a collision for which both colliding vessels are mutually in fault.

[Cited in The Atlas, Case No. 633; The Comet, Id. 3,050; Vanderbilt v. Reynolds, Id. 16,839.]

In admiralty. This was a libel in rem, by Goldsmith Wells and others, owners of the schooner Oriana, against the steamboat Bay State, to recover damages for a collision between those vessels. [Decree for libelant. This was afterwards reversed by the circuit court in The Bay State, Case No. 1,150. The decree of the circuit court was affirmed by the supreme court in McCready v. Goldsmith, 18 How. (59 U. S.) 89.]

Francis B. Cutting, for libellants.

Daniel Lord, for claimants.

BETTS, District Judge. The facts directly pertinent to the merits of this case are these:

[1] [Reported by Abbott Brothers.]

[2] [Reversed in Case No. 1,150, and that decree affirmed in 18 How. (59 U. S.) 89.]

—The schooner Oriana, laden with coal, on a trip to New Bedford, was, at six o'clock, on the morning of August 13, 1847, at a point distant about six miles to the southeast of Watch Hill light, and about thirty-five miles from Newport. She had her sails up and was under way, but there was nearly an entire calm, and the vessel was making little or no progress through the water. There was a dense fog at the time, so thick that vessels could not be seen a distance beyond one hundred to two hundred feet off.

The steamboat Bay State had lain-to on account of the fog at Mount Hope, and left Newport between three and four o'clock, a. m., that morning. She was running at the rate of sixteen miles the hour, and came within one hundred to one hundred and fifty feet of the schooner before discovering her.

So soon as the steamer was discerned from the schooner, the crew of the latter cried out with all their force, and the cry was indistinctly heard on the steamer. The steamer was then pointing to about midships the schooner. Her engine was stopped as quickly as possible, her helm thrown aport, and all the sheer given her that the space permitted. She struck the schooner on her larboard quarter, twelve or fourteen feet from her stern; the schooner sank in a few minutes, and with her cargo was a total loss. The vessels were in effect on the open sea, being east of Block Island, and in the lower part of Narragansett bay, with nothing intervening on the east and south between them and the ocean.

It is the practice of this steamboat to run in the open parts of her passage, through fogs, at her full speed, determining her position by her course and time. On this occasion, the master and two pilots were in the wheelhouse, keeping a look-out, and a man was stationed at the large bell of the boat to ring it from time to time in warning to other vessels. The bell had been rung immediately before the collision. It was proved that the beating of her wheels, on the approach of the steamer, could be heard on the water, in a calm, fourteen or fifteen miles, and in ordinary weather from six to seven miles. The large bell is heard usually from one to four miles.

The schooner had anchored the night previous about four miles from Watch hill, on account of the fog, and lay there until 5 a. m. of this day. She was got under way with a light breeze, and ran by compass E. by N. about 20 minutes; and the breeze then having died away, she was hove to, heading S. S. E., the water being free from swell, and smooth. She lay about 20 minutes, when the steamer was seen approaching her from the eastward, about one hundred feet off. During the night, while at anchor, persons were kept on her deck, beating with sticks on empty hogsheads, at short intervals, to give warning to other vessels. The testimony shows that noises from pounding on empty casks and anchors on board vessels are heard in the night time, or in a fog, on board steamers under way, a sufficient distance off to enable them to keep clear of vessels giving the signal. In this case, it was proved that those on board the schooner heard the steamer approaching fifteen minutes before the collision.

It has been repeatedly decided that vessels propelled by steam, and running into a harbor, or through a common thoroughfare of other vessels, will be held chargeable with the consequences of collisions, when kept at high speed during the night, or in weather so thick that objects in their way cannot be discerned at a distance sufficient to afford time to escape them. Bullock v. The Lamar, [Case No. 2,129;] The Perth, 3 Hagg. Adm. 414; The Rose, 2 W. Rob. Adm. 1; The Neptune, [Case No. 10,120.]

No blame is, however, to be implied against steamers who use their full power out on the high seas, and when there is no indication of other vessels in their track, and when no circumstances are known to them importing the necessity of extraordinary caution.

The place of the disaster in question partook of both characters. It was strictly on the open sea, on the ocean, as distinguished from the navigation of the Sound; but it was only a few miles from land, and in the range of vessels seeking ports in Rhode Island or Massachusetts from the Sound, or coming into the Sound from those places, or going out to, or coming in from the sea.

The master of the steamboat is chargeable with knowledge of these facts, and he would have been bound to take proper precautions against meeting or overtaking sailing vessels in that vicinity, if the wind had been sufficient to enable them to run with their sails. Then the darkness and obscurity from fog would impose on him the necessity of moving with great circumspection, and so as to be enabled to stop or change the direction of his boat in the shortest time, or he might be required to lay her to, or anchor her, according to the danger or probability of encountering other vessels in motion. In such case, he could not discharge himself of all obligation to further care and watchfulness, by merely rendering the steamboat motionless. He would be bound to exercise every reasonable and appropriate means at his command to prevent other vessels running upon his, to warn them of his position by ringing his bell, blowing off steam, or giving other notice that would be equally advantageous to them. The same principles must apply to the conduct of all vessels.

A sailing vessel at anchor, or lying-to in a dark night in a harbor, or where other vessels may be expected to pass, must show a light, or collisions with her will be imputed to that neglect. When the darkness is occasioned by mist or fog, and a light will not aid to designate her position, there would seem to devolve upon her the duty of using correspondent means, for instance, as was done by the schooner the night before the collision, to give notice by noises sufficient to reach other vessels nearing her.

If, then, the schooner, at the time of the collision, is to be regarded as on the ocean, and excused from giving warning to other vessels in that position, the steamer would be equally freed from her obligation to keep at a low speed, and would be entitled to run as on the high seas, and a collision between the two vessels, under such circumstances, would be a common misfortune and an accident, without blame to either party.

But, in my judgment, this is a case of clear fault in both parties. The schooner lying-to in a calm, and having heard the steamboat approaching her for fifteen minutes, and knowing she was not discoverable from her by sight, was bound to give warning by such noises as might probably reach the steamer. She was not driven to devise something to that end in sudden alarm and confusion. She had passed the night in the use of the very precaution adapted to the occasion, and it was only necessary to repeat it on this emergency. Upon the evidence of the pilots and mates of the steamboat, that like noises were frequently heard by them in fogs, and the steamer was thus enabled to govern its course safely, it is fair to presume this accident might have been thus wholly prevented.

It was manifestly hazardous to run the steamboat in that state of the weather, when the darkness prevented her seeing any object more than a hundred yards ahead, and at a speed so great that with every exertion of her powerful engine she could not be stopped on the water in less than four or five minutes' time, during which her momentum must probably force her ahead a quarter or one third of a mile.

The doctrine commonly accepted and applied in this court is, that the libellant cannot recover for a collision, if it appear to have been caused in any manner by his own misconduct or fault, although he shows the other vessel to have been in fault also, (The Emily, [Cases Nos. 4,453, 4,452;] Abb. Shipp. 303, note 1,) and that the rusticum judicium recognized in many high authorities, which apportions the loss equally between both parties, (3 Kent, Comm. 231; Abb. Shipp. 305,) applies only to cases where it is undiscoverable upon the proofs where the blame actually lies. This is, however, the first case which has occurred in this court, where the question was distinctly propounded, whether in case of collision and loss of property by the mutual fault of both parties, the rule of contribution should be applied.

I confess myself better satisfied with the familiar doctrine of the common law, that in cases where both parties are to blame, no recovery of damages can be had by either. Kent v. Elstob, 3 East, 18; Vanderplank v. Miller, Moody & M. 169. The English admiralty has, however, distinctly laid down the opposite rule. The Woodrop-Sims, 2 Dod. 83. And that case has been constantly adhered to since. Abb. Shipp. 230; Story, Bailm. § 608a, note.

Judge Story regards it the settled law of modern maritime states, and he traces it to a high antiquity in the continental codes. Story, Bailm. §§ 608, 610. And it has been recognized in several American decisions of respectable character and weight. Reeves v. The Constitution, [Case No. 11,659;] Rogers v. The Rival, [Id. 11,867;] The Scioto, [Id. 12,508.] The case of Strout v. Foster, 1 How. [42 U. S.] 92, admits, by implication, the existence and validity of the rule, although that point was not embraced within the decision; and in the case of Waring v. Clarke, 5 How. [46 U. S.] 503, Mr. Justice Woodbury adverts to the rule of contribution between vessels, both of which were culpable, as one of the settled modes of exercising admiralty jurisdiction in cases of collision. The question, what is the proper rule of damages in such cases, is one deserving the solemn adjudication of our highest tribunal; but until it may be finally settled there, I shall adopt the rule of apportionment indicated in the authorities cited, and shall, accordingly, decree that a valuation of the schooner and cargo be made, and that the libellants recover one half that value. No costs are to be taxed by either party against the other.

The ordinary order would be, that the loss of both parties from the collision be valued, and that the equal moiety be borne by each; but the decree may be more simple and direct in this case, as there is no proof that the steamer received any injury. Decree accordingly.

NOTE, [from original report.] The case was appealed to the circuit court,—The Bay State, [Case No. 1,150,]—where it was held, as in the district court, that the steamer was shown to be in fault in her manner of navigating. But it was further held, that the proofs in the cause did not warrant the court to say, that as matter of fact, there was a usage of blowing horns, &c., on board of sailing vessels becalmed in a fog, under which the schooner was bound to take such precautions in warning off the steamer. The decree was, therefore, reversed, as to the point that the schooner was herself in part to blame; and a decree ordered for the libellants for the full amount of their damages. This reversal of the decision reported in our text, has been by some of the profession understood to proceed upon the ground, that as between a sailing vessel or steamer approaching in a fog, the whole duty of precaution to avoid collision rests upon the steamer, and the sailing vessel is free from obligation to employ any means or methods of giving notice of her proximity. We suggest, however, that the decision in the circuit court, fairly construed, goes no further than to hold that, as matter of fact, the evidence in the case showed that none of the precautions suggested as having been within the power of the sailing vessel — blowing horns, beating empty barrels, &c.—would have been of any practical avail in notifying the steamer of the danger; and so, that the sailing vessel was not to be held guilty of negligence in failing to employ means of notice, which, if employed, would in all probability have done no good. The general principle that a sailing vessel, aware of the approach of a steamer in darkness or fog, and having at command adequate means of giving notice of her proximity, is bound to use those means, does not seem to us to be impugned by the decision in the circuit court. She is not, however, it would seem, guilty of negligence in failing to use means, which it appears would be insufficient if used. The decree of the circuit court was affirmed by the supreme court, in December, 1855, upon the grounds assigned in the circuit court. The case in the supreme court is reported under the title of McCready v. Goldsmith, 18 How. [59 U. S.] 89. [See note at end of Case No. 1,150.]

Case No. 1,149.

The BAY STATE.

[3 Blatchf. 48.][1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Sept. Term, 1853.

COLLISION—VIOLATION OF HARBOR REGULATIONS—LIABILITY.

Where a steamboat was navigating the East river, opposite New York, not in the middle of the river, but near the piers built out from the shore next to the city, in violation of the state law of April 12th, 1848, entitled, "An act in relation to the navigation of the East river by steamboats," (Sess. Laws, 1848, c. 321,) and a collision ensued between her and another steamboat, which was in the proper track, and did every thing practicable to avoid the collision: Held, that the latter vessel was not liable for the damage caused to the former by the collision.

[Cited in The E. C. Scranton, Case No. 4,273. Approved in Lonan v. The C. H. Northram, Id. 8,473. Cited in The Amos C. Barstow, 50 Fed. 623.]

Appeal from the district court of the United States for the southern district of New York.

In admiralty. This was a libel in rem, filed in the district court, by the Norwich and New London Steamboat Company, owners of the steamboat Worcester, against the steamboat Bay State, to recover damages for a collision. In the district court, there was a decree for the libellants. The claimants appealed to this court. The facts are sufficiently stated in the opinion of the court.

John Leveridge, for libellants.

Daniel Lord, for claimant.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. The law of this state, passed April 12th, 1848, entitled, "An act in relation to the navigation of the East river by steamboats," requires steamboats navigating the East river to keep the middle of the river. This law is peremptory. The masters of vessels are bound to obey it, and have no discretion, except in cases of necessity. It is a mistake, on the part of those navigating vessels in this harbor, to suppose that they may indulge the exercise of their own judgment and discretion in regard to the proper mode of navigation. If they disregard the statute, they do so at their peril. In such cases, they are not only guilty of a crime, according to the statute, but they must take the hazard of the consequences to their vessel, when so out of the proper track and on an illegal course. The Worcester was here clearly in fault. She was navigating the river, not in the middle, but near the piers built out from the shore next to the city. She was navigating, therefore, in violation of the law, and, as a consequence of this improper navigation, she encountered water craft, which led to the collision. She met a sloop near the docks, and a towboat coming out of a slip, and, to avoid these, she was obliged to slow and sheer towards the Bay State, which was on a line with her, or nearly so, out in the middle of the river. The Bay State was in her true track. There is a little margin in the testimony of the witnesses, but they have to estimate the distance by the eye, and they place her substantially in the middle of the river. Vessels must keep as near the middle of the river as can be ascertained by the exercise of sound judgment and observation on the part of the master at the time. This is the only means of determining at the moment. The Worcester, being on a course in violation of the law, and, as one of the consequences, meeting the sloop and the towboat, and being obliged to slow and back and sheer, and the Bay State being nearly on a line parallel with her, upon the outer circle, in the middle of the river, there was, as a matter of course, immediate danger of collision. All that the latter was bound to do was to exert her power and skill faithfully to rescue the Worcester from the impending peril into which she had thus wrongfully brought herself. This she did. She slowed and ported her helm as soon as she saw the sheer of the Worcester. I consider the testimony of the officers on board of a vessel to be the better evidence of the measures taken, or the manoeuvres made at the time, on board of their own vessel. It is idle to say that she could have stopped. This she could not do short of three times her length. All she could do was to slow and port her helm, and, in doing that, she did all that was practicable, in the emergency, to rescue the Worcester from the peril. This law as to the navigation of steamboats will be strictly enforced; and it is high time that the masters of vessels should learn that they must obey it or take the consequences. The fundamental difficulty in the libellants' case is, that the Worcester was out of the track prescribed by law. She was obliged to sheer, to avoid the sloop and the towboat that she met, and this led to the collision. The Bay State was bound only to do all she could, in the midst of the peril, to avoid it; and, having done that, she is free from blame. The decree of the court below must, therefore, be reversed, and the libel be dismissed with costs.

[NOTE. The libellants took an appeal to the supreme court but failed to prosecute it, and it was therefore dismissed. Norwich & New London Steamboat Co. v. The Bay State, 15 Lawy. Ed. U. S. Sup. Ct. R. 42.]

[1] [Reported by Samuel Blatchford, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

Case No. 1,150.

The BAY STATE.

[11 N. Y. Leg. Ob. 297.]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York.[1]

COLLISION—SPEED IN A FOG—SIGNALS BY SAILING VESSEL — MUTUAL FAULT — APPORTIONMENT OF DAMAGES.

1. Held—That whether the speed of a steamer be excessive and culpable, depends upon the circumstances of the case. That the speed of sixteen or seventeen knots during a dense fog, and upon a frequented track, was grossly improper.

[See note at end of case.]

2. Held—That a vessel becalmed under canvass, in the track of a steamer, under such circumstances, was not culpable for omitting to use fog horns, or other measures, which the evidence showed would have been of no avail.

[See note at end of case.]

3. The rule of apportionment, where fault exists on both sides, is considered by the supreme court to be the admiralty rule to be adopted by the courts of the United States.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the southern district of New York.]

[In admiralty. Libel by Goldsmith, Wells, and others, owners of the schooner Oriana, against the steamboat Bay State, to recover damages for collision. The district court rendered a decree for libellants, and apportioned the damages between the two vessels. The Bay State, Case No. 1,148. The case is now heard on appeal from that decree. Reversed. The decree of this court was afterward affirmed by the supreme court in McCready v. Goldsmith, 18 How. (59 U. S.) 89.]

F. B. Cutting, for the Oriana.

D. Lord, Jr., for the Bay State.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. This case should have been decided at a much earlier day, but, after hearing the very able arguments of the counsel for the respective parties, I felt that it involved some principles of considerable practical importance, and deserved, therefore, the most careful and deliberate consideration. I admit, also, that I felt more doubt and embarrassment on the argument as to the side upon which the merits of the case lay, and hence desired to look more critically into the facts, than I now do after a more thorough examination. The difficulty my mind labored under, during the argument, was not so much in reconciling and settling the facts of the case, as in determining the force and effect to be given to them; for I have rarely met with a case of this class, where the material facts upon which it must ultimately turn, were less contradictory.

It is agreed, as respects the weather, that the fog was so dense that a vessel could not have been seen further than from one to two hundred feet; that the schooner lay helpless in the waters of the Sound, some four or five miles from Connecticut shore, off Watch Hill light; that the Bay State was coming down the Sound at the rate of sixteen or seventeen miles an hour when the collision occurred; and that the place where it happened, or rather the waters in which it happened, are frequented by vessels engaged in the coasting trade of the eastern states, to and with the city of New York and other ports upon the North river, embracing, also, as we see from this case, the coal trade with the state of Pennsylvania, the whole a trade through the Sound of no inconsiderable magnitude and importance. These are facts indisputable. Now I agree that it is not for the court to lay down any fixed and inflexible rule in respect to the rate of speed of steam vessels navigating these waters. That must depend upon circumstances as they appear, and are presented for its consideration in each particular case. These may warrant a rate deemed prudent navigation at one time, that might be wholly injustifiable at another. But I think I may say that, in a case circumstanced as the present is, a fog so dense that the most vigilant and experienced look-out would be unable to discover a vessel at a distance of more than 30 or 60 yards, navigating at the time in waters frequented with sailing vessels, engaged in the commerce of the country, as in the present instance, a rate of sixteen or seventeen miles an hour is altogether inadmissible as prudent or reasonably safe navigation. The pilot says it would take from four to five minutes to stop the Bay State at this rate of speed. At a reduced rate, of course, it would require a proportionally less period of time. This, in addition to the better opportunity for each vessel to make the proper manoeuvres to avoid the collision, affords strong ground for impressing upon those navigating these vessels the necessity of slackening their speed in thick weather, and in a track where other water craft are usually to be found. A passenger on board the Bay State, who witnessed the collision, seems to have been struck with the impropriety of her rate of speed at the time, and asked why they ran so fast in a fog, and was answered that they had to do so in order to keep their reckoning in going from place to place; and we learn from the pilot, and some others of the officers, that they never make any difference in the rate of speed in consequence of a fog—that they go slow when making land or light, or in narrow passages, or to heave the lead—as if the only precautions they were bound to serve in the navigation were in regard to the safety of their own vessel. I will only repeat the remark made in the case of The New Jersey and which was taken from the case of The Rose, 2 W. Rob. Adm. 1, in the English admiralty: "That it may be a matter of convenience that steam vessels should proceed with great rapidity; but the law will not justify them in proceeding with such rapidity, if the property and lives of other parties are thereby endangered." Newton v. Stebbins, 10 How. [51 U. S.] 606. I am satisfied, therefore, that this vessel was grossly in fault from the rate of speed upon her, under the circumstances, at the time the collision occurred.

[1] [Reversing Case No. 1,148. Affirmed in 18 How. (59 U. S.) 89.]

The next question is, whether or not the schooner was in fault. This depends upon another—namely, whether she omitted any precautionary measures which she was bound to observe under the circumstances—such as blowing a horn or beating empty casks; by which means notice might be given to vessels approaching her position. The proofs show that an outcry was made by the master and hands, immediately on hearing the paddling of the wheels of the steamboat and before she was seen through the fog.

The usage proved as to blowing horns on vessels in a fog is limited to occasions when there is sufficient wind for them to make head; as, in the case of a dead calm, the precaution would be unnecessary, as no danger of a collision could occur. This is doubtless true in respect to sailing vessels, but the reason for the omission would not apply upon waters navigated by steam vessels; but, in respect to these—especially in the instance of vessels of the size of the Bay State—I am not satisfied that this precautionary step could be of any avail, as the noise of the machinery and motion of the boat in the water would prevent the sound reaching them. I think this is the fair inference from proofs in the case, and accords with experience and observation. The witnesses on the part of the Bay State agree that the noise of the motion of the boat in the water could be heard at a much greater distance than their own fog bell, and some of them consider the bell on these occasions useless, for this reason; and one of them states expressly that he did not recollect ever hearing a horn on a steamboat while she was under way, but had after she stopped. A horn, it is said by some of the witnesses, cannot be heard over a mile and a half, at farthest; and if so, it certainly could not be heard anything like that distance, if at all, on board a steamboat in motion. The Bay State was moving at a rate, as we have said, of more than a mile in four minutes; and we are quite well satisfied that under these circumstances, if a horn could have been heard at all, it could not, in time, upon any reasonable calculation, to have materially influenced the result. The point was pressed in the case of The Europa, that the Charles Bartlett should have blown a fog horn or rung her bell at short intervals, and that she was therefore at fault for this neglect. But the omission was disregarded by Dr. Lushington and the trinity masters, and apparently, so far as we can learn from the report of the case, on the ground that these precautions would have been useless, from the noise of the Europa while under way. 2 Eng. Law & Eq. (Boston Ed.) 557. I must therefore reverse the decree of the court below, and direct a decree in favor of the libellants, and that the case be referred to the clerk to take proof of their damages and loss by reason of the collision.

NOTE, [from original report.] After delivering the above opinion, counsel suggested whether the rule of apportionment adopted by the court below was coincided with, and to be enforced in cases of fault on both sides. Judge Nelson observed that it had been before the supreme court, and by them the English rule was regarded as the one to be recognized by the admiralty courts of the United States. The rule of apportionment would seem to have been recognized as early as 1843,—Strout v. Foster, 1 How. [42 U. S.] 92,—and to be applied whenever the proper case was presented,—Stainback v. Rae, 14 How. [55 U. S.] 538; The Bay State, [Case No. 1,148;] The Jamaica, [Id. 7,173.]

[NOTE. This decree was affirmed by the supreme court in McCready v. Goldsmith, 18 How. (59 U. S.) 89. Mr. Justice Nelson, in delivering the opinion, adopted the language of the circuit court in the principal case, as to the negligence of the steamer in running at so high a rate of speed. In respect to the failure of the schooner to make her position known by signals, the learned justice said: "A good many witnesses have been examined as to the usage of vessels navigating the Sound, in respect to the blowing of horns, beating of empty barrels, and the like, in thick and foggy weather; but, on looking carefully into the testimony, it will be found that no such general or established usage has been proved. * * * Without much more evidence of the usage, and of its utility in preventing collisions, than is shown in this case, we cannot say that the omission to comply with it is of itself chargeable as a fault against the schooner. * * * Besides, we are not satisfied, upon the evidence, that the precautionary measure of blowing horns, or ringing a fog bell, would have been of any avail under the circumstances of this case. * * * The steamer, as we have seen, was moving at a rate of more than a mile in four minutes; and taking into view the size of the Bay State, with her powerful engines, together with this rate of speed, it is quite apparent, that, if a horn could have been heard at all, it could not, upon any reasonable conclusion, in time to have materially influenced the result."]

Case No. 1,151.

BAZIL v. KENNEDY.

[1 Cranch, C. C. 199.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov. Term, 1804.

SLAVERY—DEVISE—SALE FOR TERM—COMMENCEMENT OF TERM—FREEDOM.

Upon a devise that a slave should be sold for eight years, after which he should be free, the term of eight years shall begin to run from the time of the death of the testator or within a reasonable time thereafter.

This was an action to try the right of the plaintiff to his freedom under the will of Mrs. Turner, which was in these words: "I will that my slaves be sold by my executors, for the following terms: Bazil for eight years," (and others for other terms,) "and the money arising from the same I desire shall be applied in the following manner, to wit," (&c., giving sundry specific legacies, and the residue to her husband, Charles Turner, she having, by her marriage settlement, reserved the power to devise her estate.) "I will that after the above slaves respectively arrive at the completion of the above terms, they shall be free and their posterity after them at the age of thirty years."

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

C. Lee, for plaintiff, cited Dade v. Alexander, 1 Wash. (Va.) 30; Mayo's Lessee v. Carrington, Id. 45; New Rev. Code, 191, § 36. The testatrix died in 1796. Her husband suppressed the will. Bazil was sold as the property of the husband, by the marshal, to the defendant Kennedy, on the 27th of January, 1802. The will was found and proved June, 1804. This action was brought on the 22d of August, 1804. The defendant purchased without notice. This was a vested legacy. Roden v. Smith, Amb. 588; 2 P. Wms. 478.

Mr. Swann, for the defendant, contended that the term of eight years could not begin to run until the sale; and that the time of sale was left to the discretion of the executor.

But THE COURT decided that it was the intention of the testatrix that the plaintiff should be free after eight years' service after her death; and that the term began to run from the time of her death, unless some cause should be shown for extending it for a further reasonable time; and that as more than eight years had elapsed between the death of the testatrix and the commencement of this action, the plaintiff is entitled to his freedom.

BAZIN, (MARSHALL v.) See Case No. 9,125.

BAZIN v. RICHARDSON. See Case No. 1,152.

Case No. 1,152.

BAZIN v. STEAMSHIP CO.

[3 Wall. Jr. 229;[1] 5 Am. Law Reg. 459; 20 Law Rep. 129; 14 Leg. Int. 156; 37 Hunt, Mer. Mag. 449.]

Circuit Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. April Term, 1857.

CARRIERS — BILL OF LADING — LOSS OF GOODS — BURDEN OF PROOF — SHIPPING — CUSTOM—SEAWORTHINESS—DAMAGES.

1. The practice of all the lines of steamships between Liverpool and America, for three years—the lines being two in number—to ship goods in a certain way, is not such a legal custom as will at all affect the terms of a contract in which any other way is specified, though such other way was always set forth in all contracts of the company, it having been the way as set forth in a printed form, and in practice constantly departed from. Nor, though conceded to be a practice well known to persons in Liverpool, would it be regarded in law as probably known elsewhere, e. g., at Havre, nor, however, acted on by persons at Liverpool regarded as having been the implied basis of a contract, made at Havre by persons not from Liverpool, about a shipment to America, though from Liverpool.

[2. A carrier, shipping goods by a different vessel and at an earlier date than that specified in the bill of lading, is liable for loss or damage occasioned by shipwreck, notwithstanding the exception of "accidents of the seas," etc., in such bill of lading.]

[Cited in Marx v. National S. S. Co., 22 Fed. 682; The Bordentown, 40 Fed. 689.]

[3. The loss of goods committed to a carrier, and in possession of his servants, puts the burden of proof on him to show how the loss occurred, and that it was not by their fault, but in consequence of some of the unavoidable accidents excepted in the bill of lading.]

4. The fact that a vessel runs in a fog, and in calm weather, upon a well-known cape, is strong proof of her unseaworthiness, and not rebutted by the admitted fact that she was perfectly new, well built, well rigged and well manned, and in charge of a captain of reputed skill and experience. The conclusion remains that her compass had not been sufficiently tested, or that she was not well commanded, in fact, and for either of these wants she would be unseaworthy.

[Cited in Richelieu & O. Nav. Co. v. Boston Marine Ins. Co., 136 U. S. 424, 10 Sup. Ct. 938; The City of Para, 44 Fed. 690.]

5. On a claim of damages for goods lost by a common carrier, the rule is that the carrier shall pay their net value at the place of delivery, with interest from the day when they should have arrived. Anticipated business profits are not allowed.

In admiralty. This was an appeal from a decree in the admiralty [of the district court of the United States for the eastern district of Pennsylvania,] in which a party claimed compensation from ship-owners for his goods lost at sea, while on their vessel. The case was thus:

[Xavier] Bazin, the libellant, was a retailer of French perfumery, in Philadelphia. Being in Paris in 1854, he purchased a large stock of goods for his business in America, which was shipped from Havre to Philadelphia. The respondents [the Liverpool & Philadelphia Steamship Company] were the owners of a line of several steamships sailing between the ports of Liverpool and Philadelphia. For greater regularity and convenience of passengers and traders, the vessels sailed at regular intervals, from these ports; certain vessels being usually named for certain days, when it was convenient so to do; but there not having been, apparently, any contract with the public that special vessels should sail on special days. The steamship company had their agents stationed at Havre, authorized to receive goods meant to be sent from France to the United States, and to issue bills of lading. On the 28th of August, 1854, their agent at Havre gave the libellant a bill of lading, containing the following clause, viz.: "Received in and upon the steamship called the Shamrock, now lying in the port of Havre, and bound for Liverpool, eighteen cases of merchandise; to be transhipped at Liverpool on board the Liverpool and Philadelphia steamship City of Manchester, or other steamship appointed to sail for Philadelphia, on Wednesday, the 6th day of September, and failing shipment by her, then by the first steamship sailing after that date, for Philadelphia; and are to be delivered in like good order and condition, at the aforesaid port of Philadelphia." The bill of lading was quite formal in several other specifications, as to the mode of landing the goods, &c., and contained exceptions against loss by "the act of God, the queen's enemies, pirates, restraints of princes and rulers, fire at sea or on shore, accidents from machinery, boilers, steam, or any other accidents of the seas, rivers and steam navigation, of whatever nature or kind soever." The respondents also owned, as one of their line, another steamship called the City of Philadelphia, which was appointed to sail on the 30th of August, 1854, for the port of Philadelphia. The libellant's eighteen cases by the Shamrock, from Havre, arrived at Liverpool in time to put them on board of the City of Philadelphia, a week before the time that was provided for in the bill of lading, for a different vessel. The respondents accordingly shipped sixteen of them by the City of Philadelphia; the other two were afterwards shipped by the City of Manchester, on the 6th of September, 1854. The City of Philadelphia sailed on her first voyage, bound to Philadelphia, on the 30th of August, 1854, and on the 6th September struck the point of Cape Race, and was wrecked. Two of the cases on her were entirely lost, and the others much damaged; while the two cases not put on board her, arrived in the City of Manchester in due season, and in order.

[1] [Reported by John William Wallace, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

The evidence as to the seaworthiness of the ship, and as to the cause of the disaster, was that of the captain, and as follows: "She was a new ship. I saw her in course of construction. She was built of iron, of the very best description; the character of the workmen stood very high on the Clyde; the naval constructors and workmen were of high character. She was, in every respect, a seaworthy vessel, at the time she started on her voyage. No expense was spared in fitting her up properly. She was well rigged and well manned; she continued seaworthy. She struck the point of Cape Race—up to that time she continued perfectly seaworthy. If she had not struck, at the average rate of our passage, we would have been in Philadelphia in five days more. The steamer was wrecked. We backed off the point of Cape Race, and run her on shore to save the lives of the passengers, and to keep her from sinking. There was no tempest; she struck in a dense fog—and the sinking of the vessel, and the damage done, resulted from her striking the cape." No other account was given of the cause of the loss; and it was commonly supposed that the iron vessel had caused the needle to deflect; but this was not in proof. The vessel was between thirty and forty miles out of her proper course when she struck.

There was no proof, except as it was given by the bill of lading, that Bazin knew anything about the respective vessels, or that he had preferred one vessel rather than another. His libel, however, alleged that some time previous to the day of shipment, he had by letter directed his agent in France to send his goods by the City of Manchester, to sail from the port of Liverpool on the 6th day of September, 1854, knowing her to be a safe and reliable steamship, and under skilful management; and that, when in France, he had personally given the same orders, and made all his arrangements accordingly. The answer of the steamship company, stated that "the substantial and exclusive object of the contract, as understood between the parties, and as appears upon the face of the bill of lading, and as understood by the usages of trade, was to transport the eighteen cases of merchandise named therein, to Philadelphia, in the United States, in the shortest time, and in the earliest steamer, after the merchandise arrived from Havre." "The particular steamship," they answered, "which was to sail on the 6th of September, being named in the said bill of lading, was so named, inasmuch as the parties to the contract had reason to believe, from the usual facts which were incident to forwarding goods from Havre to Liverpool, that the first steamer to sail after the arrival of the merchandise would be the City of Manchester." They alleged, "that had the City of Manchester, which was advertised to sail on the 6th of September, been for any cause unable to proceed upon her voyage, they would, either by some other vessel to sail on that day, or by the first vessel sailing after that day, have shipped the said cases direct to Philadelphia. But that the cases arriving from Havre in time for shipment by the City of Philadelphia, which sailed on the 30th of August; the respondents, in the diligent and faithful discharge of duty, desiring that the libellant should receive his goods in the shortest possible time, and in compliance with the customary mode of the particular business of the respondents, and settled usage of trade in this respect, shipped sixteen of said cases, safely and in good order, upon the City of Philadelphia, rather than permit the same to lose an entire week by remaining on deposit in Liverpool, for the sailing of the vessel appointed for the 6th of September."

A witness was examined by the respondents, in order to confirm this view, and to prove a custom varying the obligation to comply with the terms of the bill of lading, and to show, that in forwarding the goods more expeditiously than they would have done by complying with those terms, they had acted in a usual and legal way, and one always desired by shippers. His testimony was thus: "According to the best of my knowledge and belief, there does exist at Liverpool, a general usage, custom and practice, amongst forwarding companies, as respects the time, order and manner of the shipment of goods sent to them, to be carried to the United States of America. Such general usage, custom and practice is, that the goods so sent for shipment, should be shipped to their place of destination with all dispatch, and, if possible, by the first vessel of the company then next sailing, in order to get the goods into the foreign market with every expedition, for the benefit and advantage of the shippers or consignees; I believe the British and North American Royal Mail Steam Packet Company, commonly called the Cunard Company, recognize and adopt this custom and usage, and I am not aware of there being any other British steam shipping company, having steamers for business purposes, between Liverpool and the United States of America. I am not aware of any other general rule, order, practice, usage or custom, other than what I have deposed to, which has existed ever since I have been in the employment of the company, about three years; it is not a secret practice, usage or custom, but, so far as I know, it is generally known to the shippers by the said steamship company's vessels. I first became aware of the fact that such custom existed at the time when I took charge of that department in the office of the company, which enabled me to have a knowledge of such custom by my intercourse with parties conducting business. I cannot state when this custom first arose, although I believe it has been of long standing, nor can I state, except as I have already done, amongst whom it prevails, nor whether it is subject to any, or what exceptions. I believe, and I have no doubt it is the fact, that shippers do frequently designate particular ships or vessels to carry their goods, but I say that I do not know, and I do not believe, that there is amongst shippers a preference sometimes for particular ships of the same line, or the masters commanding the same, and I have not known instances in which shippers have delayed sending goods by a particular ship when there was full opportunity to do so, in order that they might go or be shipped by some other vessel sailing at a subsequent time, which they, for any reasons, preferred, except in such instances where several ships belonging to different parties are destined for the same port, to sail about the same time, and in those instances, I believe, a preference is given to a ship of the first class, in preference to a ship of a minor class, although the ship of the first class should be advertised to sail some days after the ship of the minor class; but in the case of this company, all their vessels are of the first class, and are all commanded by masters of reputed skill and experience, and no preference is made by shippers as to whether their goods are to be shipped by the one vessel or by the other, and in all instances, as far as I know and believe, the shippers expect and rely upon their goods being shipped by the first vessel, regardless of her name or of the name of her master."

Upon this case, the district court decreed pro forma, in favor of the libellant, Bazin, for the original cost of the goods, adding expenses and cost of transportation, with seventy-five per cent., that being proved to be a fair sum or rate for "anticipated business profits."

David Webster and H. M. Phillips for the libellant, now made the following points:

1. That the bill of lading formed an absolute contract to ship libellant's goods by the City of Manchester, sailing on the 6th of September, 1854; and that any shipment of them by the respondents prior to that time, was at their own risk, and in violation of the contract.

2. That no usage prevailing at Liverpool could vary an express contract, more especially one made at Havre, where no knowledge of such usage was shown to exist.

3. That assuming that the respondents had the right to ship by the City of Philadelphia, they were nevertheless liable, since they had failed to show that she was lost through any of the perils excepted in the bill of lading.

4. That the measure of the libellant's damages was the market value of goods here, at the time they should have been delivered, in estimating which there was to be added to the original cost, not only duties and charges, but an allowance for the advance in value which they acquired in the market, the moment they were in condition to be sold, whether called profits, or by any other name.

On the part of the respondents, James Murray Rush contended:

1. That the receipt for the goods given in Havre, was not a maritime contract, but only an engagement preliminary to a maritime contract, and therefore not within the admiralty jurisdiction of the district court.

2. That the respondents were not bound to detain the goods in Liverpool to await the sailing of the City of Manchester, but under the law, as well as from usage, it was their right, as well as duty, to send them forward by the City of Philadelphia.

3. That anticipated profits could not be recovered, but only market value, or the amount it would take to replace the goods.

GRIER, Circuit Justice. The objection of the respondent's counsel, that the contract is not a maritime contract, cannot be supported. The case presents a bill of lading by which defendants bind themselves to carry goods received at Havre, and deliver them in Philadelphia. It is a contract for a maritime service, and it would be difficult to say what is a maritime contract if it be not one. If it had been merely an agreement by respondents with libellant, that if he would send goods by their line, they would receive and forward them for a certain consideration, and the breach of the agreement was in refusing to receive or transport the libellant's goods at all, or for the consideration stipulated, then this first objection of the respondents would apply. But when the respondents have received the goods on board their vessel, and given a bill of lading to transport them across the ocean, it can hardly be called a preliminary agreement to a maritime contract, and not the contract itself.

The case then presents these two questions on the merits:

1st. Are respondents liable?

2d. If so, what is the rule of damages, and how is their amount to be ascertained?

The reason given by the answer why the City of Manchester was named in the contract, may possibly have been the true one, or that assigned by the libel, to wit, that the libellant "directed his agent in France to send his goods by the City of Manchester," which was advertised to sail on the 6th of September, because he knew her to be a safe and reliable vessel, and under skilful management. But we need not search for any reason, "Stet pro ratione voluntas." The libellant may, in fact, have had no better reason than that he believed the City of Manchester to be a lucky vessel, or he may very justly have preferred a tried boat and crew to a new iron steamer, whose officer or whose compass had not been tested by a trip across the ocean. Reason or no reason, he had a right to have his contract fulfilled according to its stipulations, and the result has shown that if such had been the case, his goods would have arrived safely. If the goods had been sent by the Manchester, the risks accepted in the bill of lading would have been borne by the libellant. For them he was his own insurer, and the carrier of those not accepted. If the carrier changes the vessel and the time of dispatching the goods, he has substituted different risks from those stipulated by the parties, and should be held as insurer against, all loss from whatsoever cause. The loss to libellant is a result of defendant's breach of contract.

But, assuming that the libellant had no good reason for desiring his goods to be sent by a particular vessel, and that the insertion of the name of the City of Manchester was merely pro forma, to fill up the usual blanks in a printed bill of lading, is there any evidence whatever that the goods were not injured in consequence of any accident accepted in the bill of lading?

The respondents aver that the ship was seaworthy in every way; the libellant denies the fact in his replication. The testimony of the captain shows his steamboat to have been new, made of iron, tight and stanch, well rigged and manned. The only account given of the loss of the vessel, was as follows: "She struck the point of Cape Race; up to that time she continued perfectly seaworthy. If she had not struck, at the average of our rate, we should have been in Philadelphia in five days. The steamer was wrecked. We backed off the point of Cape Race and run her on shore to save the lives of the passengers, and to keep her from sinking. There was no tempest. She struck in a dense fog; the sinking of the vessel and the damage done, resulted from her striking the cape."

Here, then, we have no other reason given by the captain, nor any testimony whatever, as to how or why this great mistake of running against a cape occurred. The answer and the witness both seem to assume that running against a cape or a continent is one of the usual accidents and unavoidable dangers of the sea. That cannot be termed an "accident of the sea" within the exceptions of the bill of lading, which proper foresight and skill in the commanding officer might have avoided. If the compass on the new iron vessel was not sufficiently protected to traverse correctly, the vessel was as little seaworthy as if she had no compass—and this should have been carefully ascertained before she started on her voyage. If there was no fault in the compass, then it is very evident that the officer who is thirty or forty miles wrong in his calculation, and driving through a thick fog with a full head of steam, and first discovers his true position by running on an island, a cape, or a continent, has neither the skill nor the prudence to be entrusted with such a command—and for want of such an officer the vessel is not seaworthy.

The loss of the goods committed to a carrier, and in possession of his servants, puts the burthen of proof on him, to show how it took place, and that it was not by their fault, but in consequence of some of the unavoidable accidents excepted in the bill of lading.

The respondents have not alleged or proved any one fact tending to relieve them from responsibility. That a steamboat has been either ignorantly, carelessly or recklessly dashed against a cape in a thick fog, cannot be received as a plea to discharge the carrier. Yet for anything that appears such is the case before us. If there were any circumstances tending to lead to a contrary conclusion, they are not in evidence in the case.

II. The rule of damages in these cases is, that the carrier shall pay for goods not delivered, their net value at the port of delivery. He is not liable for any speculation or possible profits which the owner might have anticipated in his peculiar business. Thus, suppose the carrier liable for non-delivery of a hundred barrels of flour at Philadelphia on a given day, and on that day flour is worth five dollars a barrel, the amount of the owner's damage is clearly just $500, because he could have bought a hundred barrels of flour and supplied his loss for $500. The owner cannot be allowed to show that he was a baker and could in a few weeks have cleared ten dollars a barrel by manufacturing his flour into bread. The sum of money which represented the net value of the lost articles, with interest till paid, is all that can be recovered from the carrier when goods have been lost in the course of transportation. And as the owner would have paid freight as a deduction from the net value of his flour, so when the carrier pays its value, he will be entitled to have his freight deducted, if it has not been paid.

In all cases when the article to be delivered has a definite market value, the application of the rule is without any difficulty.

The libellant keeps a variety store in Philadelphia. The eighteen cases contained a selection of ten thousand articles of perfumery, &c., &c., to be found only in such shops. They are retailed generally at one hundred per cent. profit on the original cost in Paris. But few if any of these numerous trifles have any known wholesale or market value in Philadelphia, nor could libellant have supplied himself with the lost goods most probably in the Philadelphia market at any reasonable price. How, then, are we to arrive at a rule of damages to ascertain the amount of loss to libellant for the non-delivery of his articles? Certainly not as contended by his counsel, by taking the original cost, adding expenses and charges of transportation, and seventy-five per cent. "for loss of anticipated profits."

If these articles, like most other goods and wares, had a known value in market here, for which they could be purchased, the original cost and charges of transportation would have nothing to do with the calculation. But as such is not the case in the present instance, we must inquire what was the original cost and what the charges of transportation, &c., in order to arrive at their value here; or more properly, what would it cost to get other goods of precisely the same value in place of those lost. Now, we may assume (as nothing is pretended to the contrary) that a bill for the very same sort of articles which Bazin has purchased could be filled in Paris for the same sum of money. In less than sixty days, every article not delivered here by the carrier, could be put in Bazin's shop, for the same price which he has paid for them. But he will have lost only the interest of his money for sixty days longer. How much profit he might have made by retailing them, or what the amount of "anticipated business profits," being matters not capable of certain ascertainment, cannot make a part of the consideration. Legal interest is all that the law knows as the damage for detention of money. As the goods lost, therefore, have no market value here, and could not be purchased in our market, their value must be ascertained by adding costs and charges, and sixty days' interest on this sum. From this amount deduct freight, which is unpaid, and add interest on the balance till judgment.

If counsel can agree upon the amount of damages calculated on these principles, the decree will be entered for such amount; if not, the case will be referred to a master to report.

BEACH. (CITY BANK OF COLUMBUS v.)
See Cases Nos. 2,736 and 2,737.

Case No. 1,152a.

BEACH v. The NATIVE.

[Betts' Scr. Bk. 559.]

District Court, S. D. New York. July 7, 1857.[1]

MARITIME LIENS—SUPPLIES — PROOF TO SUSTAIN.

[Mere proof that a set of sails was furnished a vessel by the written order of her master, with directions to charge them to the vessel and her owners, is not sufficient to establish a lien for supplies; for an implied hypothecation of the vessel cannot arise from a credit to the master, given under circumstances that would not support a bottomry, and a bottomry hypothecation by the master upon the facts in proof would be void. Pratt v. Reed, 19 How. (60 U. S.) 359, followed.]

[See The Native, Case No. 10,054.]

[In admiralty. Libel by Henry C. Beach against the schooner Native (George Cornelius, owner) for supplies. Dismissed.

[Subsequently an appeal was taken to the circuit court, and a decree of reversal by default entered in favor of libellant. This was afterwards waived, and, upon the merits, a decree was entered in favor of libellant. The Native, Case No. 10,054.]

Dean & Donohue, for libellant.

Larned & Bell and Pratt, for claimants.

Before BETTS, District Judge.

This was a libel for supplies. The schooner was owned in New Jersey, and was supplied in this port with a set of sails, by the written order of her master, with directions to charge them to the vessel and her owners.

HELD BY THE COURT.—That it is not an open question to speculate upon, in regard to the general authority of the maritime law, when the text of an express decision of the United States supreme court stands in the way. Pratt v. Reed, 19 How. [60 U. S.] 359. The court say an implied hypothecation of the vessel cannot arise under a credit to the master, [under circumstances] less stringent than are required to support a bottomry. That there is no footing for argument in this case, but that a bottomry hypothecation by the master, entered into upon the facts in proof, would have been void. Libel dismissed, with costs.

[1] [Reversed in Case No. 10,054.]

BEACH, (PLATT v.) See Case No. 11,215.

Case No. 1,153.

BEACH v. TUCKER.

[3 App. Com'r Pat. 263½.]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Jan. 20, 1860.

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS — INTERFERENCE — APPEAL—EVIDENCE.

[1. When an interference is declared between an application for a patent and an existing patent, the patentee is as much entitled to appeal to the circuit court of the District of Columbia, when the question of priority of invention is determined against him, as the applicant for the patent would be had the priority of the existing patent been sustained.]

[2. Upon an application for a patent dated December 1, 1858, an interference was declared with a patent issued December 2, 1856. To sustain the applicant's claim to priority of invention, there was offered his own testimony, and that of another interested witness, that the invention was made in 1844 or 1845, and that drawings were made in 1856. It was also shown that he filed a caveat in 1848, which he renewed in 1857. On the other hand, it was shown that the patentee had been in the enjoyment of the rights conferred by his patent under such circumstances that the applicant was chargeable with notice of it. Held, on appeal to the circuit court of the District of Columbia, that the evidence was not sufficient to show priority on the part of the applicant, and the existing patent should be sustained.]

Appeal from the commissioner of patents, refusing to grant letters patent to Moses S. Beach for his invention of a new and useful improvement in printing presses, and awarding priority of invention to Stephen D. Tucker, for which said invention a patent was issued to him in 1856, and which said patent he was in the enjoyment of for a period of nearly two years. [The commissioner's decision was set aside.]

MORSELL, Circuit Judge. Beach says: "It has for many years been a leading object, particularly among the publishers of newspapers of extended circulation and power-press manufacturers, to contrive a method for printing on both sides of the sheet at a single operation, which at the same time should not retard or in any wise interrupt the high rate of speed already attained in printing, nor complicate the machinery of the press. My invention accomplishes this much desired end, almost without expense, and accomplishes it so completely and simply that it seems to leave nothing more to be desired in the field it occupies. It is peculiarly applicable moreover to book printing because of the perfect 'register' which it must afford, and opens to that kind of work the most rapid presses, all of which have been heretofore excluded on account of the necessary delay for printing. Printing sheets on the second side without the intervention of hand labor leads naturally to feeding them to the press by machinery in the first instance, by cutting them off when wanted from an endless roll of paper or otherwise, and it also leads (as the sheets are not thus liable to misprinting) to the application of contrivances which will fold them ready for the book-binder, the mail-man and the carrier before they leave the press. I do not, however, claim the printing of sheets on both sides at one operation. But what I do claim as my invention, and desire to secure by letters patent, is seizing the back or tail end of the sheet, and thus returning to the types for a second impression in the manner as substantially set forth." Tucker, in describing his claim, says: "I claim seizing the back end of the sheet of paper by finger or other equivalents, and transferring it after its first side is printed from one side of the groove to the other, substantially as described, so as to again pass it around the impression cylinder to print the second side, substantially as above described."

The commissioner adopts for his decision the report of the examiner, dated May 5, 1859, who says:

"In the matter of interference between the applications of Richard M. Hoe, Stephen D. Tucker, and the patent of Moses S. Beach for improvements in feeding paper to printing press, I have the honor to report:

"This is an interference of two applications with a patent granted to Moses S. Beach on the second of December, 1856. Had Hoe alone applied, I should scarcely have considered it an interference with Beach's patent, the devices being different, but performing the same operation. Tucker's devices are identical in substance with Beach's, and being an avowed improvement on Hoe's, and applied for on the same day, the interference was evident. Beach does not prove his invention to be prior to the summer of 1856, (see testimony of John E. Powers, 3d interrogatory; James H. P. Dawson, 3d interrogatory; and Thomas L. Scoville's answer to the 4th interrogatory, &c.) Hoe proposed his devices in 1848, (see Stephen D. Tucker's testimony, 4th interrogatory,) and completed drawing in 1858. Tucker, the third party, proves, by testimony of Richard M. Hoe, his invention to have been in the winter of 1844–5. Drawings were made in November, 1856, (Exht. B, 4 interrogatory, &c.) James Blair's testimony is corroboratory of Hoe's, and the argument of Beach's counsel seems to admit the fact of prior invention on the part of Tucker. The plea of abandonment of their invention by Hoe and Tucker cannot be entertained. A caveat filed in the secret archives of this office in 1848, and renewed in 1857, which has been received as testimony, is followed by the applications for patents on the first of December, 1858. Just one day within the limit of statute, a neglected or abandoned caveat is not an abandoned invention. It is not made public, like a withdrawn application, and cannot, in consequence, be considered public property. I respectfully suggest that patents be allowed to Richard M. Hoe and Stephen D. Tucker for their respective inventions."

"May 6, 1859. The foregoing report is confirmed; priority of invention is adjudged Messrs. Richard M. Hoe and Stephen D. Tucker, to whom patents for their respective inventions are hereby ordered to issue," &c. Signed by the acting commissioner.

There are various reasons of appeal filed which appear fully and particularly to cover all the objections suggested in the arguments before me against the decision of the commissioners. To these reasons the commissioner has made a very general reply, which is to be regretted. All he says in his note addressed to me is: "Herewith are sent all the papers and models connected with the matter of appeal by Moses S. Beach, regarding which a notice was sent to the parties on the 8th instant. The nature of the decision from which Moses S. Beach appeals is sufficiently explained in the examiner's report, approved on the 6th of May last, and the office rests the defence on the accompanying documents, a list of which is enclosed." This was the state of the case when presented with all the documents and evidence by the commissioner, on the day and place appointed by me for the hearing of said appeal. The respective parties by their counsel also filed their arguments in writing, and submitted the case.

In the argument of the appellee's counsel, the objection to the jurisdiction of the judge to hear this appeal is raised upon the ground that the statute gives no right of appeal to a patentee in a case like the present. I have considered the arguments pro and con, with the authorities relied on by each party, and must confess that I am not free from doubts on which side the question should be decided. Under the influence of the new light thrown on the subject by the various new decisions referred to in the argument on the part of the appellant, and that no legal right may be denied to the appellant, and for the sake of future uniformity of decision, I think I ought to overrule the objection.

The next question to be decided is who was the prior inventor in the matter now in controversy. On the first of November, 1856, Moses S. Beach, the appellant, in compliance with the requisites of the statute, made oath that he verily believed himself to be the original and first inventor of the said invention, the subject of the issue in this case. Letters patent were issued to him, under the authority of which he has ever since exercised the rights thereby conferred, publicly and openly, and known or which might have been known to the appellee. This, according to the settled rule of law, must be considered prima facie evidence of the truth of the facts sworn to, and to throw the burden on the side of the appellee, by strong and satisfactory proof to overcome. The witnesses and proof offered are two in number, and the caveat filed in the secret archives of the office in 1848, and renewed in 1857 by Hoe, (one of the witnesses,) and Tucker, (the appellee,) admitted in evidence in this case. As to the witness Hoe, it is objected in the argument, that he was an interested witness, and on that ground the credit of his testimony impeached, as before stated. The commissioner says: "Hoe proposed his devices in 1848, (see Tucker's testimony,) and completed drawings in 1858." It appears that Hoe's case, therefore, was supported by the testimony of Tucker, the appellee in this case; and Hoe seems to be relied on as the principal witness to support by his testimony of Tucker's claim in this case, in which patents are directed to issue respectively to them.

These circumstances, with some others, tend to show a community of interests in the subject matter of the two interferences unfavorably to affect the credit of the witness Hoe, and so the commissioner seems to think when he looks to the testimony of Blair to corroborate him. This testimony is also objectionable on the ground of uncertainty, and because the original scraps and drawings from them which he says he made were destroyed. Why were they not preserved and produced at the examination? As they were in writing, they were the best evidence, and not being produced, or the non production of them otherwise legally accounted for, the legal presumption is that if produced they would show the facts to be unfavorably otherwise. If, however, Tucker's invention, as stated in the testimony of Hoe & Blair, should be considered as proved, Beach shows an entire dissimilarity between the two methods three respectable mechanics, skilled and experienced in the nature and operation of such machines, (see testimony.) But suppose the testimony free from the afore-going objections, and sufficient to prove what is claimed for it, what are the principles of patent law applicable to it? The commissioner says Tucker proves his invention to have been in the winter of 1854–5. Drawings were made in November, 1856; his application for a patent December the 1st, 1858. Beach's patent dated December 2, 1856.

Has the appellee been guilty of such laches as to have incurred a statutory forfeiture? The commissioner says: "The plea of abandonment of their inventions by Hoe & Tucker cannot be entertained. A caveat filed in the secret archives of this office in 1848, and renewed in 1857, which has been received as testimony, is followed by the application for patents, on the first of December, 1858, just one day within the limit of the statute."

The commissioner does not say what statute he means. I suppose it to be the seventh section, c. 88, Act March 3, 1839. I have in several instances of appeal endeavored to give what I thought was the true construction of the provision of the statute to mean that the inventor might use, and vend to others to be used, the specific machine, &c., without liability therefor to the inventor, or any other person interested in the invention, and no patent shall be held invalid, &c., provided, &c. Now, this shows that the privilege granted is applicable only to the inventor or those claiming under him, &c., that this construction is the true one, I refer to the case of Pierson v. Eagle Screw Co., [Case No. 11,156.] Is there one particle of proof in the whole case or is it pretended that the appellee has ever, by purchase or sale or license or otherwise, authorized Beach to use or exercise the invention claimed by him Tucker? On the contrary, is not the claim set up by Beach as an independent inventor, without the knowledge even that Tucker claimed to be the inventor? How, then, can the provision have the least application to this case? If not, then here is a person sleeping on his rights for nearly two years after a patent granted to an independent inventor, who had been publicly and openly using it under circumstances stated in the proof, showing that Tucker must have known it, or that he might have known it, without offering any sufficient reason for the delay, and without on his part objecting, and from which it must be presumed he allowed or acquiesced in it, this then, in my opinion, was a statutory bar to his claim, and notwithstanding the caveat filed some time after the patent issued. Such being my opinion, there is error in the decision of the commissioner, and the same is annulled and set aside, and the appellant considered the first and original inventor.

Case No. 1,154.

BEACH v. WOODHULL.

[Pet. C. C. 2.][1]

Circuit Court, D. New Jersey. April Term, 1803.

TREASON—CONFISCATION—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—RETROSPECTIVE LAWS.

1. The act of the legislature of New Jersey of 1778, relative to the sale of the estates of persons attainted of treason, did not authorize a sale of forfeited estates free from incumbrances, and a lien on lands sold under that law continued, notwithstanding a sale.

2. The law of 1783 is a positive bar to the claims of a mortgagee on an estate sold under its authority. This law is retrospective and unjust, but it is not repugnant to the constitution, and the court will not declare it a nullity.

[See Miller v. U. S., 11 Wall. (78 U. S.) 268; Tyler v. Defrees, Id. 331.]

In equity. The bill stated that Stephenson made a mortgage of certain lands to [Richards] the testatrix of the plaintiff in March, 1773, which was duly recorded according to law, the mortgage having been made for securing a debt due to the testatrix. In 1777 the mortgagor died, leaving his heir at law, who under the laws of New Jersey was attainted of treason, for joining the enemy; and the commissioners of forfeited estates sold the mortgaged premises to the defendant. The bill prayed the foreclosure of the mortgage.

The defendant pleaded, that Stephenson, as a further security, did at the time of executing the mortgage, give his bond for the payment of the debt, in which bond he bound his heirs. That upon the death of the mortgagor, the estate descended upon his heir at law; an inquest was taken in 1779 finding the heir at law to have joined the enemy, which not being traversed, judgment was entered forfeiting all his estate according to the laws of the state. The commissioners sold the same, declaring that the same was sold free of all incumbrances, and it was purchased by the defendant. That the money paid by the defendant was more than sufficient to pay the plaintiff's debt; and that due notice according to law was given, calling upon all persons having claims against this estate to bring them in; but none was made by the plaintiff.

Mr. Stockton, for the defendant, referred to the act of this state of December, 1778, (Wilson's Ed.) p. 67, which forfeits all estates of those who have joined the enemy, upon an inquest found and final judgment entered. By the 16th section, the court of common pleas or two judges may receive demands, within one year against the former owners, which are to be tried in a particular way, and if admitted, to be paid at the treasury. By the act of December, 1783, (Wilson's Ed.) p. 384, any person having demands by mortgage or otherwise against forfeited estates, are to exhibit the same before two judges of the court of common pleas, who are to state and ascertain. the same. This demand is within the 16th section of the act of 1778. The words "just and equitable demand" mean mortgage debts; the word demand would of itself be sufficient. Co. Litt. 291, 508; 1 Ld. Raym. 115. If it should be argued, that the word "may" was not compulsory, the following cases may be cited: 2 Salk. 609; 1 Vern. 152; 2 Doug. 526; 2 Vern. 116, 117. It may be said that this was not a debt from the heir, but the following cases show, that when the heir is bound it is his debt at common law. 2 Atk. 205, 609; Vern. The debt descends upon the heir although he is not chargeable without assets. By the 10th section of the law it is declared, that the purchaser shall hold the estate, as the offender held it—now, substantially, the estate, after forfeiture, belongs to the mortgagee, and the mortgage is only a security, 2 Burrows, 978; 2 Doug. 610; 7 Term R. 418. A mortgagee has only a chattel interest. But whatever construction may be given to the law of 1778, that of 1783 is conclusive. The four first sections only apply, to demands which had been adjusted. The 6th section bars the foreclosure of all mortgages, unless the demand has been produced and adjusted. 1 Ves. Jr. 285.

On the other side it was contended, that by the express provisions of the 5th section of the law of 1778, the state acquired no better estate than the offender had, and this was an estate incumbered with the debt. The state therefore, could pass no better estate to the purchaser. The word "may," when directed to courts or officers is imperative, though otherwise when applied to individuals. What proves that it could not be intended to compel mortgage creditors to abandon their liens, and apply to the treasury is, that if the sum were insufficient to pay all the debts, the creditors were to be paid pro rata, which would have been iniquitous as to mortgage creditors. The fact stated, of the commissioners selling free of incumbrances, is immaterial, as it is not stated that the law authorised them to sell in that way, nor is there any such authority in the law. The act of 1783 is retrospective and unjust, and is therefore void. But, if it is not so, the lien of the mortgage is not destroyed, but in cases where the commissioners sold free from incumbrances. But as the law had not given them a power so to sell, the case never occurred, or could legally occur, where this law could operate. The 6th section only refers to demands which could have been made. Those only could be made, which were against the person, but this was against the land. As to the idea of the heir being bound without assets, the cases below were cited. 3 Bac. Abr. 465; 2 P. Wms. 664. A law which vests all a man's estate in trustees, does not without express words discharge his person. Andrews, 40. An attainted person is still liable to his debt. Cro. Eliz. 516. An equity of redemption is not legal assets, (2 Atk. 290, 294;) and the heir may plead rien per descent, (2 Vern. 61; Amb. 308.) It has been frequently decided in our courts, that when the sale was not made free of all incumbrance, the mortgagee was not barred. When the sale was made free of incumbrance the point has not been decided. But the case of Walter v. Perine, [Case No. 17,121,] in this court, before Judge Chase, was precisely like the present, and was determined in favour of the mortgagee.

[1] [Reported by Richard Peters, Jr., Esq.]

[Before WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice, and MORRIS, District Judge.]

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. It must be admitted, that the act of 1778, did not authorise a sale free of incumbrance, and that the lien, notwithstanding the sale, still continued under that law. But the mortgagee had an election to abandon his lien, and secure his money from the treasury of the state, if he pleased.

When we come to the act of 1783, it is plain that the four first sections, relate entirely to claims against the treasury only, and not to the right of the creditor against the estate. The legislature knowing that de jure, the commissioners could not sell free from incumbrances, knew also that de facto, they had done so in many instances, and therefore they say, to those having liens on forfeited estates, if you wish to readjust your demand, once given in, so as to have recourse against the treasury, you must first prove that the sale was free from incumbrance; under an idea perhaps that this having been publicly done, and acquiesced in by the creditor, who, by putting in his claims had consented to look to the state for payment, had abandoned his lien on the land. But the clause of the law has no effect, in my opinion, as to the construction of the fifth and sixth sections; that clause relating exclusively to claims against the treasury, and these to claims against the estate.

Upon the existence of the lien and the liability of the land, the law is positive, plain and unambiguous; no room is left for construction. It is a positive bar to the demand, whether the sale was made free of incumbrance or otherwise. But even if it be a bar only where the sale was free from incumbrance, this is exactly that case. To admit the course of reasoning of the plaintiff's counsel, that it meant cases where sales free from incumbrance were authorised to be made by law, would be to annul the law by construction, for it is admitted, that no previous law had authorised such sales. If a creditor had applied to the treasury he certainly would have been paid, on proving that the sale had been de facto made free from incumbrance, though such a sale had not been authorised, and it would have been no answer to say, that no such sale could legally have been made. How then can such an answer be made in this case, if the fourth clause is to control the construction of the fifth and sixth sections? The law is clearly retrospective and unjust in its operation, but it is not for this court to correct it, or to declare it a nullity. It is not repugnant to the constitution.

I am sorry to differ from the court which decided the case of Walter v. Perine, [Case No. 17,121,] but I must give such an opinion as I think right, not feeling myself bound by any decision given at a circuit court.

MORRIS, District Judge, considered the case of Walter v. Perine as precisely like the present, and that the decision in that case was right.

The court being divided, a case was stated for the supreme court, but no removal to that court took place.

BEACHAM, (TURNER v.) See Case No. 14,252.

Case No. 1,155.

In re BEADLE.

[5 Sawy. 351.] [1]

District Court, D. California. Jan. 4, 1879.

BANKRUPTCY—FRAUDULENT ASSIGNMENT—JUDGMENT LIENS OF CREDITORS.

[1. An assignment in trust, by an insolvent, with power to sell within two years for the benefit of creditors who will accept 60 per cent. of their claims, with a reservation in favor of the grantor of all property remaining after such settlement, is void at common law and under the bankruptcy act, as having been made with intent to hinder, delay, and defraud creditors.]

2. Where an insolvent made an assignment to trustees, with intent to hinder and delay his creditors, which assignment was by this court subsequently adjudged void, and the trustees conveyed the property to the assignee in bankruptcy: Held, that the latter took the property subject to the liens of creditors who had recovered and docketed judgments subsequently to the fraudulent conveyance and before the commencement of the bankruptcy proceedings.

[Cited in Re Estes, 3 Fed. 138.]

In bankruptcy.

Sawyer & Bell, for Wright & Co.

E. B. & J. W. Mastic, for assignee.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. It appears from the register's report, and the admissions of counsel, that on the thirteenth day of October, 1874, [Donald] Beadle, being then insolvent as an individual, and as a member of the insolvent firm of A. Chalfant & Co., executed to certain parties a conveyance of his real estate in trust for those of his creditors who should consent to accept sixty per cent. of the amounts due them, in full of their demands, and on the further trust to reconvey to the grantor all the moneys and property remaining in their hands after the payment of the creditors as aforesaid. The trustees were allowed to sell at any time within two years, and on such terms and conditions as they should deem most to the advantage of the parties interested—the property in San Francisco to be sold last.

Beadle was adjudicated a bankrupt on the petition of his creditors on the nineteenth day of February, 1877. Before the filing of this petition, several creditors who had not assented to the deed of trust had sued the bankrupt, and obtained judgments which were duly docketed. A suit was subsequently brought by the assignee in bankruptcy against the trustees to set aside the deed of trust. The trustees interposed no defense; and in pursuance of the decree of this court, they conveyed to the assignee all their right, title and interest in the property deeded to them. This property was subsequently sold by the assignee free of all liens, under a stipulation that the liens, if any, held by the judgment-creditors should attach to the proceeds. The latter now pray that their judgments may be satisfied out of the fund in the order of their dates. The cause has been very elaborately argued on in the briefs, but the questions presented are few and simple.

1. Was the deed of trust by the bankrupt a conveyance made with intent to hinder, dely and defraud creditors? Of this, there can be no doubt. It would not be easy to imagine a conveyance which would contain more of those features which the courts have always held to be indicia of fraud.

It was made by a person hopelessly insolvent. It embraced all his property. It was not for the equal benefit of all his creditors, but those of them who would consent to accept sixty per cent. of their demands in full satisfaction. It attempted to place the property beyond the reach of the creditors for two years, at the discretion of the trustees. And finally, it contained a reservation in favor of the grantor of whatever might remain after the payment of the sixty per cent. to those creditors who might agree to discharge the grantors.

No citation of authorities is necessary to show that this conveyance is in law conclusively deemed to have been made with intent to hinder, delay and defraud creditors, and is, therefore, void at common law, under the statute of Elizabeth, the civil code of this state, and United States bankruptcy act.

2. Could the judgment-creditors, by docketing their judgments against the grantor, acquire a lien on the land without previously bringing their bill in equity to set aside the fraudulent conveyance? This question must be determined by the law of this state; and it appears to have been settled ever since the case of Hager v. Shindler, 29 Cal. 47, that a conveyance of this description may be treated by the judgment-creditor as absolutely void ab initio, and as if non-existent. In that case it was held that the purchaser of land at a sheriff's sale may maintain a bill to set aside and annul as a cloud upon the title a deed of the land given before the judgment by the judgment-debtor without consideration and to defraud his creditors. This decision has been followed or approved in numerous subsequent cases, and it now stands as the established law of the state. 29 Cal. 190; 28 Cal. 649; 32 Cal. 263. Mr. Justice Sawyer in this last case observes: "As to the creditor the fraudulent conveyance was void. Notwithstanding this conveyance, therefore, so far as the rights of the creditor are concerned, the title never passed to the grantee until the sale under execution and the making of the sheriff's deed under which the plaintiff claims; until that time, as to the creditor, the title must be regarded as remaining in the debtor; and his grantee, who participated in the fraud, must be regarded as being in possession with the debtor's assent and not adversely to the creditor, his right being subject to being divested by a sale under execution against his grantor in favor of the creditor defrauded." It follows from this view of the law, as enunciated by the supreme court, that the judgment-creditors by docketing their judgments acquired a lien upon the property fraudulently conveyed, "the title to it being regarded as to them as remaining in the debtor." The register was of opinion that upon the setting aside of the fraudulent conveyance by this court, the title passed to the assignee, precisely as it existed in the debtor at the date of the fraudulent conveyance. This would no doubt be the case if the conveyance had been valid under the state law (as in the case of an assignment under the state insolvent law for the equal benefit of all the creditors), and only voidable by the assignee in bankruptcy in case bankruptcy occurred within the prescribed period. But the conveyance in question was absolutely void under the state law, as we have seen. The title as against his creditors remained in the grantor. The creditors could seize and sell the property under execution, and the purchaser could bring his bill to set aside the fraudulent conveyance as a cloud upon his legal title. If such were their rights the property passed to the assignee, subject to the liens which had already attached to it under the state law, and those liens must be respected and enforced in this court.

[1] [Reported by L. S. B. Sawyer, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

It is urged that the statutory period to which liens of this nature are limited has elapsed, and that the liens are therefore gone. But it had not elapsed at the time of the commencement of the proceedings. The liens were then valid and subsisting; and both the terms of the act and the uniform course of the decisions under it show that the assignee takes the property of the bankrupt as of the date of the commencement of the proceedings, and subject to all then existing liens upon it. The rights of all parties are fixed, and must be determined as of that time. New liens cannot be acquired, nor can existing liens be lost by the running of the statute of limitations, or the expiration of any statutory period fixed for their enforcement.

The judgment-creditors are, therefore, in my opinion, entitled to be paid in preference to the general creditors, out of the proceeds of the property on which they acquired liens, and in the order of the dates on which their judgments were docketed.

BEADLE, (ARMSTRONG v.) See Case No. 541.

Case No. 1,156.

In re BEAL.

[1 Lowell, 323;[1] 2 N. B. R. 587, (Quarto, 178;) 2 Amer. Law T. Rep. Bankr. 95; 1 Chi. Leg. News, 326.]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. May, 1869.

BANKRUPTCY—CONCEALED ASSETS—TITLE IN ANOTHER—JOINT ESTATE—SEPARATE ASSIGNEES.

1. If a bankrupt has property in his possession, and has the use of it as his own, and wilfully omits it from his schedules and keeps it from his assignee, it is no answer to a charge of concealment thereof that the property belonged of right to his assignees under an earlier assignment in insolvency, under the laws of the state of his residence.

[Cited in Shimer v. Huber, Case No. 12,787; Re Moses, 1 Fed. 847.]

2. If a bankrupt has the actual possession of joint estate and joint books of account, he must disclose them to his separate assignees, and if he wilfully fails to do so, is not entitled to a discharge.

[Cited in Re Leland, Case No. 8,228.]

[In bankruptcy. Heard on objections to the discharge of the bankrupt. Discharge refused.]

It appeared that in 1866 the bankrupt carried on business in Boston, in partnership with one Ricker; and in the autumn of that year he bought for the firm a large quantity of goods on credit, and disposed of them in various ways, which his creditors thought to be fraudulent, under the insolvent laws of Massachusetts; and upon their petition the firm was adjudged insolvent. Their books were never found by the assignees, and the goods were never accounted for, and no discharge was ever granted them. Ricker was then and since a resident of New York, and the business here was conducted chiefly by [J. H.] Beal. The judge said that although the law of this state, in most respects, so far as such acts as then alleged against the firm of Beal & Ricker were concerned, was substantially similar to the bankrupt law, yet none of those acts could be set up in bar of his discharge here, because they were all done before the bankrupt law was passed.

J. D. Ball, for the creditors. If we trace goods and books of account into the bankrupt's possession in 1866, and show that he did not in fact hand them over to his assignees in insolvency, or otherwise account for them, the presumption is that he still has them, and as he has made no return of any such property or books in his schedules, nor delivered them to his assignees in bankruptcy, he must now account for them, or be deemed guilty of concealment, and fail to obtain his certificate of discharge.

[BY THE COURT: This view was adopted for the purposes of the hearing, and all legal evidence that either party offered on these matters was heard subject to the ultimate decision of the questions of law as well as of fact upon full argument, which has now been had.][2]

E. Avery, for the bankrupt, contended that whatever estate he possessed or was entitled to, and whether concealed or not, passed to his firm's assignees in insolvency, and that they had full power to inquire into all his dealings, and to set aside fraudulent conveyances, and must be conclusively presumed to have done their duty, or whether they did or not, that nothing was left for the assignees in bankruptcy, and therefore nothing can have been wilfully concealed from them.

[1] [Reported by Hon. John Lowell, LL. D., District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

[2] [From 2 N. B. R. 587, (Quarto, 178.)]

[BY THE COURT: I cannot yield my assent to this argument.][3]

LOWELL, District Judge. The question is one of fact, whether this bankrupt had, at the time of his bankruptcy, any estate or effects, or any books relating thereto, which he has concealed. If he had such de facto, though by a defeasible title, he must set them out in his schedules, and give them to his assignees. It is not for him to rely on the title of a third person, which he has not himself respected. The presumption is that he surrendered all his property in 1866; but that is a presumption of fact, and if he did not, it is not important whether his motives were good or bad, whether his acts were done with the consent or against the will, and in fraud of the rights, of his then assignees. The possession of assets in the use and enjoyment of the bankrupt makes a sufficient title for his assignees in bankruptcy until the earlier assignees shall dispute it. A like argument applies to the books of account, though with somewhat greater force, because they are not so much assets as means of evidence, and might well be left in the bankrupt's possession after they had been inspected and made use of by the former assignees.

Again, it is said that the books and the property, if any there were, belonged to the firm of Beal & Ricker, and the firm is not in bankruptcy. But if this bankrupt had in his possession any of the joint estate, it would pass to his assignee, who would hold as tenant in common with the solvent partner. Whether the latter could take possession and control of it, subject to account, would depend on circumstances. Speaking generally, he could not; and, in any event, it must be disclosed in the bankrupt's schedules.

Finally, it was argued that these assignees, who happen to be the very same persons who were the assignees in insolvency, knew all that they now know long before the bankruptcy, and therefore there has been no concealment from them. As I state this argument, I fear that I must have misunderstood it; if not, it is easily answered. A concealment of property and books from a person entitled to their possession is not the less a concealment of them because he knows they are concealed, if he does not know where they are concealed. The facts in the case show a studied and protracted evasion on the part of the bankrupt of all information on the subject of his property and books. He seems to be very hostile in his feelings toward the assignees, and this may possibly account for his mode of meeting the necessary and proper inquiries which were made of him in his examination before the register; but the natural inference is that he was seeking to conceal the truth. He undertook, towards the close of the hearing, to account for his trade property by the payment of large debts by way of preference; but the explanation seemed to come very late. I do not feel by any means sure that he has any estate, but upon the evidence I can hardly say that he has not. There is every reason to suppose that he has the books of account of Beal & Ricker, unless he has destroyed them; and on the ground that he has concealed them from his assignees I refuse his discharge.

Discharge refused.

[3] [From 2 N. B. R. 587, (Quarto, 178.)]

BEAL, (WALKER v.) See Case No. 17,065.

Case No. 1,157.

BEALE v. BURCHELL.

[5 Cranch, C. C. 310.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May Term, 1837.

TAXATION—COLLECTION BY DISTRESS AND SALE.

1. The corporation of Alexandria has a right to collect taxes by distress and sale; and to raise taxes for purposes and works out of the town.

2. The court will not instruct the jury that the plaintiff has a right to recover, unless all the facts necessary to entitle the plaintiff to recover, are stated in the prayer.

THE COURT (MORSELL, Circuit Judge, contra) refused to give the following instruction to the jury, which was moved by R. J. Brent, for the plaintiff, [Thomas K. Beale:]

1. That if the jury should be of opinion from the evidence, that the defendant [Edward] Burchell forcibly opened and entered the outer door of the plaintiff's house to serve the process under which he alleges to have been acting, such entry was illegal, notwithstanding he may have authority, and the plaintiff is entitled to recover a verdict in his favor.

THE COURT (nem con.) also refused to give the following instructions, which were also moved by the plaintiff's counsel:

2. That the defendant had no authority to enter and distrain, and if he did, he is a trespasser. That the corporation has no right to distrain at all, nor to raise taxes for purposes out of the town.

3. That if the jury should be satisfied by the evidence that all, or any part of the taxes for which the defendant distrained, were assessed by the corporation for a work of internal improvement beyond the town of Alexandria, then, as to those taxes, so assessed, the distress was irregular, and the corporation had no authority so to distrain.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

4. That if the jury believe that the defendant procured the partial opening of the outer door by craft, and immediately entered with violence, injuring the wife of the plaintiff, who was holding the door, then the plaintiff is entitled to recover.

In support of his first prayer, Mr. Brent cited 2 Saund. Pl. & Ev. 691; 2 Petersd. Abr. tit. "Arrest," p. 326; Lee v. Gansel, 1 Cowp. 1. In support of his second prayer, he cited Loughborough v. Blake, 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 317, 4 Pet. Cond. R. 665; 2 Kent, Comm. 275, 339; 3 Wheeler, Abr. 457; Ellis v. Marshall, 2 Mass. 269; Rex v. Larwood, Comb. 316; 2 Wheeler, Abr. 470.

Verdict for the defendant.

BEALE, (CROCKER v.) See Case No. 3,396.

BEALE, (EMMERSON v.) See Case No. 4,469.

BEALE, (LINDENBERGER v.) See Case No. 8,359.

BEALE, (MEADE v.) See Case No. 9,371.

BEALE, (NUGENT v.) See Case No. 10,376.

BEALE, (PENNOCK v.) See Case No. 10,940.

Case No. 1,158.

BEALE v. PETTIT et al.

[1 Wash. C. C. 241.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. April Term, 1805.

MARINE INSURANCE—ABANDONMENT — INSURABLE INTEREST—OPEN POLICY—EVIDENCE.

1. Action on a policy of insurance. A certificate given by a supercargo, upon his return from the voyage injured, and who, at the time it is offered, is dead, is inadmissible to prove the plaintiff's interest in the return cargo. Evidence cannot be given to prove what the supercargo had declared on this subject.

2. In an open policy, the plaintiff must prove his interest, and the value of his property, or he cannot recover. The bill of lading of the outward cargo, is no proof of the interest of the plaintiff in the homeward cargo.

3. Quere, whether, when, at the time of an offer to abandon, the property was restored, the assured can recover for a total loss?

At law. Action [by Beale against Pettit & Bayard] on a policy of insurance, on goods from Norfolk to Aux Cayes, and on the return cargo. The outward cargo was carried safely. The vessel took in a return cargo; was captured and carried into Jamaica; and libelled. The vessel, and most of the cargo, was restored, on stipulation to answer the appeal; and the vessel arrived, with the cargo, in safety, at Norfolk. As soon as the plaintiff had notice of the capture, he gave notice to abandon; but at that time the cargo had been restored, and was on its return home; but this not known to the plaintiff. The bill of lading, invoice, or an account of sales of the return cargo, were not produced; nor did it appear that any had ever existed. The supercargo, after his return, gave a certificate, on oath, that he had sold the outward cargo, belonging to the plaintiff, and invested the whole in a return cargo. But the court refused to let this certificate be read, or hear evidence of what the supercargo, (now dead,) had declared in his life time, on this subject. The notice to abandon was given on the 6th of May, and the captain's protest, to prove the loss, was sent to the underwriters the 4th of November, at which time the vessel had arrived at Norfolk.

Ingersoll, for the defendants, objected to the recovery; 1st, because, at the time the abandonment was made, no proof of loss or property was made; 2d, because, at that time, the vessel was in fact in safety; 3d, no proof of property and value.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice, charged the jury. This policy is made in the name of one Leamy, for and on account of all persons concerned in the cargo. The plaintiff states himself to have been owner of a part of the return cargo; and if so, it is clear that he has a right to sue. But proof of his interest, and, (the policy being open,) of the value of it, must be made out to your satisfaction. It is of the very essence of this action, that he prove his interest. The protest of the captain is inapplicable to this point. The bill of lading, for the outward cargo, is no proof that the plaintiff was interested in the return cargo. The evidence most relied upon is, a paper delivered by the defendants to the plaintiff, in which they state, that no proof of property had been laid before them, but the declaration, on oath, of the supercargo; for which reason they refuse to pay. Now this paper does not make that declaration evidence, which we have declared is not evidence; particularly as the defendants state it as the ground of their refusal. Should the jury not be satisfied with the proof of property, they will find for the defendants. If otherwise, they will find, subject to the opinion of the court, in a case to be stated, so as to enable us to decide more deliberately, the question,[2] whether, under

[1] [Originally published from the MSS. of Hon. Bushrod Washington, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, under the supervision of Richard Peters, Jr., Esq.]

[2] This question is more difficult than I at first supposed it. Marsh. Ins. p. 484, says, that if the assured at the time he receives advice of the loss, or before he has abandoned, receives advice also that the property is recovered, he cannot abandon; because he can only abandon while it is a total loss, and he knows it to be so; not after he knows of the recovery. The rule, he says, is, that if the thing insured be recovered before any loss is paid, the insured the circumstances of this case, the plaintiff could abandon, and go for a total loss. The plaintiff agreed to be called, as soon as the jury returned to the bar, and suffered a nonsuit.

---

may claim for a total or partial loss, according to the final event; that is, according to the state of the case at the time he makes his claim. In the case of Hamilton v. Mendes, 2 Burrows, 1198, Lord Mansfield says, "the question is, whether the plaintiff, who at the time of his action brought, at the time of his offer to abandon, and at the time of his being first apprized of the accident, had only sustained a partial loss, ought to recover as for a total one?" It is repugnant to recover as for a total loss, when the final event has proved it only an average loss. "The assured cannot elect before advice of the loss; and if that advice shows the peril to be over, he cannot elect at all; for he cannot abandon, when the thing is safe." The present is the first attempt that has been made to charge the insurer as for a total loss, upon an interest policy, after the thing was recovered. "If the thing in truth be safe, no artificial reasoning can set it up for a total loss." "In case the ship be taken, the insured may abandon; provided the capture, or the total loss occasioned thereby, continue to the time of abandoning and bringing the action." He again lays down the principle in the following words: "That the plaintiff can only recover an indemnity, according to the nature of his case, at the time of the action brought, or at most, at the time of his offer to abandon." I give no opinion how it would be in case the ship and goods were restored in safety, between the offer to abandon, and the action brought, or between the commencement of the action and the verdict." Here the event had fixed the loss to be an average only, before the action brought, before the offer to abandon, and before the plaintiff had notice of any accident.

Parker, Ins. 145, says, that it may be collected from Roccus, that in order to entitle the plaintiff to recover for a total loss; it must continue total at the time the offer is made to abandon, at the time the action is brought, or at the time of the payment of the money.

From what is said above, it is clear, that if at the time of the offer to abandon, the assured had notice of the recovery, he cannot abandon. But the question is, if at that time the property was in fact recovered, and in safety, and this unknown to the assured, can he abandon, if afterwards the fact appears? In the case of Goss v. Withers, 2 Burrows, 683, and Hamilton v. Mendes, [supra,] the assured knew of the recovery before his offer to abandon. But the judge, throughout, in laying down principles, speaks of the fact of recovery, before action brought, or offer to abandon. From which I should conclude, that if before the action brought, or offer to abandon, it should appear, that the property was in safety, the assured can only recover as for a partial loss. But suppose at the time of the offer to abandon, she was still detained, by virtue of the capture, but liberated before action brought? This is the question which Lord Mansfield says he does not mean to decide. But I think it clearly proves, that the question depends upon the fact, not upon the assured having or not having notice of it. Indeed, I cannot see why that circumstance should make any difference in the principle, which certainly is intended to prevent a loss, partial in its nature, from being converted into a total one. In Marshall v. Delaware Ins. Co., decided in this court, [Case No. 9,127,] at a subsequent session, and affirmed in the supreme court, (4 Cranch, [8 U. S.] 202,) it was decided, that the right to abandon depends on the state of the fact, at the time of the offer, and not the state of the information received.

Case No. 1,159.

BEALE v. RAILWAY CO.

[1 Dill. 569.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Iowa, 1871.

GROSS NEGLIGENCE—EXEMPLARY DAMAGES.

Exemplary damages may be awarded against a railway company for an accident which happens in consequence of the gross negligence or drunkenness of their servants.

[Cited in Malloy v. Bennett, 15 Fed. 374.]

At law. This was an action for damages caused by a collision, and was tried before LOVE, District Judge. The negligence of the defendant's servants was admitted on the trial. The plaintiff suffered a severe and permanent injury. The jury found a verdict for $5,000 against the company, which moved for a new trial on the following grounds:

1. That the court erred in instructing the jury that a corporation might be rendered liable in punitive damages for the gross negligence of its servants.

2. That the court erred in instructing the jury that a single case of intoxication by a railroad engineer, when on duty, in the absence of countervailing proof, raises a presumption that he is a man of intemperate habits, and the superintending officer of the company is presumed to have knowledge of the character of its employes.

Nourse & Kauffman, for plaintiff.

Withrow & Wright, for defendant.

LOVE, District Judge, in overruling the motion for a new trial, held:

That on the grounds of public policy and for the better security of the rights of the public, punitive damages can, and in certain cases ought to, be awarded against railroad corporations. Punitive damages, it is true, are in the nature of punishment; and it is equally true that in ordinary cases it is contrary to our ideas of justice that the defendant should receive more than compensation for the injuries he sustained, but in cases like the one at bar, although the excess above the amount of real damages goes to the plaintiff, still, it is well settled that it is one of the means of securing more care and attention on the part of corporations having great rights and privileges, that in cases of injury arising from the gross misconduct or negligence of their employes, they are liable to punitive damages. It is a right and interest that the public have in every prosecution of this kind, that these companies shall be taught, so to speak, that they are held to exercise not only ordinary care, but extraordinary care in the transportation of passengers, and on these grounds, courts are inclined to uphold the reasonable verdicts of juries where punitive damages are awarded.

The counsel for the defendant have suggested to the court that railroad companies should not be held liable for punitive damages for the gross negligence of one of their employes, unless notice of the character of the employe is brought to the knowledge of the company. But the complete answer to this is that a railroad company acts only through its agents—the directors, the superintendent, and all the employes are the agents through whom alone the company acts, and unless the company are held liable for the acts of these parties, the public have neither a remedy nor security. The public have a direct interest in having these companies employ capable, honest, and reliable men, and it is the duty of the companies to see that their employes are of a proper character, or courts and juries will hold them to a strict accountability for misconduct. A railroad company employs a drunken engineer; the life and personal security of the travelling public is placed in his hands; the public can know nothing of his character, and if an accident occurs, occasioned by his negligence, inattention, or misconduct, and loss of life or limb results, the company should be held responsible for the accident thus occurring; not only in compensatory damages, but punitive damages for the want of the exercise of care in the character of the employes selected. And experience has long since demonstrated that merely compensatory damages is not sufficient to compel these companies to that care and attention that the personal safety and security of the travelling public demand.

---

[1] [Reported by Hon. John F. Dillon, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

Under the peculiar circumstances of this case the court is unable to separate the proof of the actual damages from the inference of punitive damages. The conduct of the agent of the company is so intimately connected with the proof of the circumstances connected with, and the character of the injury received, that one cannot be excluded without the other. So that the evidence, although in its nature tending to show a reason for punitive damages, would be still admissible as showing the actual damages. But under the rulings of this case heretofore stated by the court, it would, for other reasons, be admissible.

Judgment on the verdict.

BEALE, (UNITED STATES v.) See Case No. 14,549.

Case No. 1,160.

BEALE v. VOSS.

[1 Cranch, C. C. 179.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. July Term, 1804.

PRACTICE—VERDICT BELOW TWENTY DOLLARS—NON PROS.

If the verdict be reduced below twenty dollars by account in bar, there must be judgment of non pros.

[Cited in Hellrigle v. Dulany, Case No. 6,343.]

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

At law. Assumpsit for work and labor; an account in bar given in evidence; verdict for 45 cents; motion for non pros. See Laws Md. 1785, c. 46, § 7; Laws Md. Nov. 1785, c. 87, § 2; Laws Md. Nov. 17, 1791, c. 68, § 9.

Mr. Mason, for the defendant, and Mr. Key, for the plaintiff, admitted, that by the law in Maryland there should be a non pros.

Non pros. entered at December term, 1804.

KILTY, Chief Judge, absent.

Case No. 1,161.

BEALL v. BECK.

[3 Cranch, C. C. 666.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. Term, 1829.

LANDLORD AND TENANT — DISTRESS — BOARDING-HOUSE—PROPERTY OF LODGER—SLAVES.

1. The slave of a stranger, hired to, and in the service and employ of a lodger in a boarding-house, with the consent of his owner, and found upon the premises, is not liable to be distrained for rent due by the boarding-house keeper, being exempted by the broad principle of public convenience.

2. The distinction between an inn and a boarding-house is, that into the former all travellers have a right to enter and demand accommodation; but the keeper of a boarding-house has a right to select his guests.

3. A slave, hired as a servant to a lodger in a boarding-house, is not exempted from distress for rent, on the ground of his being in the actual use and personal service of his master, unless he is so at the time of the seizing of him by way of distress. It must be such an actual use, that the taking of the slave would be, or tend directly to a breach of the peace, even if taken from the tenant himself. The case is strengthened by the fact that the landlord rented the house to be occupied as a boarding-house.

At law. Replevin [by Walter B. Beall] for the plaintiff's slave William, hired to Mr. Easton, who was a boarder at Mrs. Rich's boarding-house, for whose rent, due to Mr. Archer, the slave was, by his order, distrained. The defendant made cognizance as bailiff of William Archer, for $90 rent arrear due by Mrs. Rich.

The plaintiff pleaded: 1st. That the slave was not, at the time when, &c., in the said dwelling-house of Mrs. Rich, as the servant, and in the employment of the said Ann E. Rich, but accidentally, and while in the service of one William C. Easton, to whom the said slave was hired by the said plaintiff; upon which issue was joined. 2d. The same plea with this addition, that there were, at the time when, &c., goods and chattels of the said Ann E. Rich in the said dwelling-house, &c., in which, &c., more than sufficient to satisfy the said rent-arrear, and then and there liable to distress for the said rent. To this plea there was a replication, demurrer, and joinder. 3d. That the said Ann E. Rich, during her occupation and enjoyment of the said dwelling-house, &c., in which, &c., by virtue of the demise in the said cognizance mentioned, used and followed the trade and business of a common public boarding-house keeper for travellers and strangers, and used the said premises in her said trade and business for entertaining, victualling, and lodging strangers and travellers, and that the said slave was in the employment and service of one William C. Easton, then in the said dwelling-house as a guest and lodger of the said Ann E. Rich, at the time when, &c., and this the said plaintiff is ready to verify, &c. To this plea there was a general demurrer and joinder. 4th. The fourth plea was the same as the third, only charging the locus in quo to be a common inn, instead of a public boarding-house. Upon this plea, issue was joined. 5th. That the slave being, at the time when, &c., hired by the plaintiff to one William C. Easton, was, at the said time, in the said dwelling-house and place in which, &c., in attendance upon the said Easton as his servant and waiting-man; and at the time when, &c., was actually engaged in performing for the said Easton, the duties and services of such servant and waiting-man, and in his, the said Easton's, actual use and personal service, and this the plaintiff is ready to verify. Upon this plea, issue was joined. 6th. That the slave was not the property of the said Ann E. Rich, but of the plaintiff; and that there were goods and chattels of the said Ann, in the place in which, &c., sufficient to satisfy the said rent; and that the said William Archer, knowing that the said slave was the property of the said plaintiff, fraudulently and maliciously ordered and caused his bailiff, the said defendant, to distrain the said slave for his said rent; and this the plaintiff is ready to verify, &c. To this plea also issue was joined.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

Upon the issues of fact a verdict was taken, subject to the opinion of the court upon the demurrers, and upon the facts in evidence; upon which, if the opinion of the court be in favor of the defendants, judgment to be rendered in his favor for $65, the rent in arrear, &c.

The facts stated were as follows: "That William Archer rented the premises to Mrs. Rich, to be occupied as a boarding-house, and that she publicly advertised to keep a boarding-house, for the entertainment of all persons, travellers and others, for one or more days, at the will of the guests. That William C. Easton was a lodger and boarder in the said house, and hired, of the plaintiff, the slave in question for his own exclusive service as a domestic servant, and took him into his service, and kept him in the said house, as his exclusive servant, without being under the control of Mrs. Rich, although, by permission of Mr. Easton, he occasionally rendered her services when not engaged in his master's business. That Mr. Easton paid for his hire, and clothed him. That when the bailiff came to levy the distress, he was informed by Mrs. Rich that the slave was not her property, but was the property of the plaintiff, and was the hired servant of Mr. Easton, and exclusively in his employment, and that there were goods enough, the property of Mrs. Rich, on the premises, to satisfy the rent."

Mr. Wallach, for the defendant.

All personal property on the premises, with a few exceptions, is liable for rent. It is immaterial whether there were sufficient goods of the tenant on the premises or not. The only excepted cases are upon the principle of trade and commerce. A coach at public livery, and goods of an inmate at a public inn, are not exempt. Francis v. Wyatt, 3 Burrows, 1498. The reason why a horse at an inn is not liable to distress for rent, is, that the innkeeper is bound to receive him and has a lien upon him for his food. Robinson v. Walter, 3 Bulst. 269; 8 Petersd. Abr. 424; Francis v. Wyatt, 3 Burrows, 1498; Gorton v. Falkner, 4 Term R. 568; 7 Serg. & L. 356; Ham. N. P. 375.

Mr. C. C. Lee, and Mr. Jones, for the plaintiff.

Originally, non-payment of rent or services, was a forfeiture. Afterwards the profits only could be seized, not any thing necessary to enable the tenant to perform the service or pay the rent, such as beasts of the plough, &c. Bradb. Dis. 211. Next came the principle of benefit to trade, such as meal at the mill, a horse at the market, or at pasture. 9 Vin. Abr. 144. Goods on a wharf, or in a warehouse on storage. Thompson v. Mashiter, 1 Bing. 283. Cheese in a cart stopping at a private house. Gisbourn v. Hurst [1 Salk. 250]. A loom in actual use, or if there be other sufficient distress. Simpson v. Hartopp, Willes, 514. Goods at auction. Himely v. Wyatt, 1 Bay, 102. A slave accidentally on the premises. Bull v. Horlbeck, Id. 301. A hair-dresser's apprentice. Phaelon v. McBride, Id. 170. But all these exemptions rest on the broad basis of public inconvenience. Gilman v. Elton, 3 Brod. & B. 75, 6 Moore, 243; 8 Petersd. Abr. 423, 425; and Van Ness v. Pacard, 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 137. The case of the goods of lodgers in a public boarding-house comes within the same principle; for the trade of keeping a boarding-house, so necessary for the accommodation of the public, especially at the seat of the government, would be broken up if the goods of the lodgers should be liable to distress for rent.

CRANCH, Chief Judge, delivered the opinion of the court, (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, dissenting.)

1. Upon the first issue, the jury has found "that the slave was not, at the time when, &c., in the said dwelling-house, as the servant and in the employment of Mrs. Rich, but accidentally, and while in the service of one William C. Easton, to whom the said slave was hired by the plaintiff." This finding, however, is subject to the opinion of the court upon the facts in evidence, which are agreed to be as before stated; and the question for the court upon this issue is, whether the verdict is justified by the evidence. We think it is not; because it does not appear that the slave was accidentally upon the premises, at the time of the distress, but was there as the servant of Mr. Easton, who was then a boarder and lodger in the house, and kept the slave there as his exclusive servant. This plea was probably drawn with a view to the case of Bull v. Horlbeck, 1 Bay, 301, where the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, the owner of the slave, against the opinion of a majority of the court, who instructed the jury, that the slave of a stranger found accidentally on the premises, is liable to distress for rent; and the reporter adds, that the verdict has been acquiesced in, and the case often relied upon since. In that case, a distinction was taken between cattle and slaves; because the master cannot confine his slaves, as he can his cattle; and it was also said that the common law never contemplated this kind of property. The principle upon which that case was decided by the jury was, the public convenience. The word "accidentally" in that case means without the license of the master; which was not the case with Mr. Easton's servant. He was not, therefore, in the house accidentally within the meaning of the case of Bull v. Horlbeck.

2. The second plea of the plaintiff is like the first, with this addition; that there were, at the time of the distress, goods and chattels of the tenant, in the house, more than sufficient to satisfy the rent in arrear, and then and there liable to distress for the same. To this plea the defendant replied; concluding with this traverse, namely: "Without this, that the said slave was not at the time when, &c., in the said dwelling-house, as the servant of the said Ann E. Rich, but accidentally, and while in the service of one William C. Easton, to whom the said slave was hired by the said plaintiff; and that there were, at the time when, &c., goods and chattels of the said Ann E. Rich, in the said dwelling-house, &c., more than sufficient to satisfy the said rent-arrear, and then and there liable to distress for the said rent, &c." To this replication there was a general demurrer and joinder. Upon this demurrer the court is confined to the facts stated in the pleadings. In considering the validity of the defendant's replication, the court cannot take the inducement to the traverse as true, because the defendant, by tendering an issue upon the allegations of the plaintiff's plea has prevented the plaintiff denying the matter of inducement to the defendant's traverse. The traverse is to a material part of the plaintiff's plea, and is well taken; there is, therefore, no fault in the defendant's replication; nor is there any suggested in the cognizance. We think, therefore, that the judgment upon this demurrer ought to be for the defendant.

3. The third plea, in substance, is that Mrs. Rich, during her occupation under the demise, used and followed the trade and business of a common public boarding-house keeper, for entertaining, victualling, and lodging travellers and strangers, and used the said premises in her said trade and business; and that the slave was on the premises, in the service and employ of one of her lodgers and guests, then in the house. To this plea there is a general demurrer and joinder. The question arising upon this demurrer is, whether a slave of a stranger, hired to and in the service and employ of a lodger in a boarding-house, with the consent of his owner, and found upon the premises, is exempt from distress for rent, there being no other property upon the premises liable to distress. All the exceptions to the general rule of liability are founded upon the public inconvenience which would attend its application in particular cases. The general rule itself was adopted to counteract the fraud of tenants, and to prevent that litigation which would arise if the question of title to the property was to be tried in every case of distress. One broad rule, therefore, was laid down, that every thing found upon the premises should be liable for the rent; and as every person was bound to know the rule, it would be his own fault if he permitted his goods to be in such a situation as to be liable to seizure. But there were cases of necessity and accident which would, sometimes, place a man's goods in that situation against his will. These ought to be provided for. Such is the necessity of sending corn to a mill to be ground. In this case the corn would not be voluntarily nor negligently subjected to the power of the landlord. The owner of the corn and his family must not starve for want of meal. The corn, therefore, is excepted from the general rule. The corn could not be carried without a bag, &c., nor conveniently without a horse. The bag and the horse, therefore, are equally protected under the plea of necessity. The case of a common inn is also a case of necessity. The weary traveller must have repose. He is obliged to place his goods upon the premises of some landlord. Other cases, although not of such apparent necessity, are excepted on the ground of public utility and convenience. Thus cloth sent to the tailor's to be made up into garments—a horse sent to the farrier's to be shod—a carriage at a coachmaker's to be repaired—goods at a market, or on the way, and the carriage and horses which convey them;—these, although bordering on the plea of necessity, are yet, more properly, arranged under the principle of public convenience. It is a great convenience to the public that these trades should exist, and that goods should be brought to market; but the privilege of the landlord would prevent people from employing these tradesmen, and from bringing goods to market. So far, therefore, that privilege is restrained by law. The instances cited in the books are only examples of the general principle of public convenience. Wherever the privilege of the landlord would destroy a lawful trade or occupation which is useful to the public, it is restrained by law. The same principle protects the tools of the mechanic and the books of the scholar, the averia carucae, and the implements of husbandry, so long as other distress may be had. It extends also to the protection of trade and commerce. Thus goods in the hands of a factor or broker, or vendue-master, to be sold, or in a warehouse upon storage, or upon a wharf on wharfage, are exempt from the distress of the landlord. It is said that the principle is confined to the benefit of trade and commerce; but trade and commerce are only instances of the application of the general principle of public convenience, which is the broad ground of all the exceptions. The keeping of a boarding-house is not only a benefit to trade and commerce in the more general acceptation of those terms, but is, of itself, a trade. One of the legal definitions of trade is, "a way of living." It is an honest and a lawful occupation, and is useful to the public, especially in a city like this, where there must of necessity be many temporary residents. If the trunks and clothes of the lodgers should be liable to distress for rent in common boarding-houses, it may be said in the language of Lord Mansfield, in Francis v. Wyatt, 1 W. Bl. 485, in regard to livery-stables, "they will all be deserted and undone; for no prudent man will make himself liable to such a hazard." So the privilege of the landlord, if not restrained in this respect, would destroy this lawful trade of keeping a common boarding-house—this way of living—which would be a great inconvenience to the public; for then all temporary residents would be obliged to depend on private hospitality, or to lodge at a common inn, where the innkeeper is bound to receive all sorts of guests. But the case of Francis v. Wyatt, 3 Burrows, 1499, is relied upon to show that goods of a lodger in a common lodging-house are liable to distress for rent. That was an action of replevin, for a chariot standing at livery in a coach-house belonging to a common livery-stable, distrained for rent due by the keeper of the stable. The case was twice argued by counsel of very high standing; and Mr. Blackstone, who argued on the side of the landlord, thought that he fortified his argument, by saying that the case did "not differ at all from that of goods put into a common lodging-house, and there distrained by the landlord for rent in arrear." That cause does not appear to have been actually decided; but the opinion of the court was intimated so strongly against the plaintiff that he declined a third argument, which the court would have granted him. In the report of the case, however, in 1 W. Bl. 485, it is said that judgment was rendered for the defendant, upon the ground of its being a "part of the profits of the premises;" following the idea suggested by Mr. Blackstone in his argument, that the owner of the chariot was to be considered as an under-tenant to the stable-keeper. However, the counsel for the plaintiff seem to have had the better of the argument upon principle; and the ground which they took has been supported by subsequent judges, as in the case of wharfage, (Thompson v. Mashiter, 1 Bing. 283,) and in the case of factorage, (Gilman v. Elton, 3 Brod. & B. 75.)

The opinion of the court in Francis v. Wyatt seems to have been founded rather upon the technicalities than upon the principles of the law. Lord Mansfield, in that case, said, "that whatever may be the law of the case, it is worth the defendant's while to consider the consequences of such a distress, which will ruin his estate. For if it should be determined that carriages and horses, standing at livery, are liable to be distrained by the lessor for rent, the livery-stables will be deserted and undone; for no prudent man will make himself liable to such a hazard; therefore let the case stand over for further argument, and let the defendant, in the mean time, seriously consider how far, in prudence, he ought to press the question." 1 W. Bl. 485. He could hardly have used stronger language to show that the case was within the general principle of public convenience; and if that case had happened after the case of Gilman v. Elton, [supra,] it would probably have been decided upon the same principles which governed the latter. He admits that the privilege of the landlord, if enforced, would ruin the trade; and it is upon that very ground that the exception rests in favor of trade and commerce. A man must have with him, wherever he goes, some articles of indispensable necessity, such as clothes, &c., things of daily use for his personal comfort and convenience; if he is not to be protected in the enjoyment of these, at a boarding-house, he must abandon it; and the trade, or occupation, as a means of living, will be destroyed. If these are protected, the trunk which contains them must share in the same protection. How far will this principle lead us? It would be difficult to draw the line around articles of necessity only; for what would be considered as necessary to one man might be considered superfluous to another. The line is not well defined between articles of necessity and articles of comfort. The principle which governs these cases seems to require that the line should extend to such articles of personal convenience and comfort, the property of the lodger, as are in his ordinary use. The principle of public convenience goes to the absolute exemption of all articles within its reach. Thus, the cloth at the tailor's, the horse at the farrier's, the corn at the mill, the goods at the factor's, or in the warehouse, or upon the wharf, are all absolutely protected, whether there be or be not sufficient goods of the tenant on the premises liable to distress. The plea states that the slave was in the service and employ of the lodger, at the time he was taken. In such case, we think the slave was protected by the general principle of public convenience, and that the case may even be brought within that branch of the general principle which relates to trade and commerce.

The case of Himely v. Wyatt, 1 Bay, 102, was decided by a superior court of South Carolina forty years ago. It was replevin for goods sent to a vendue warehouse for sale, and distrained by the landlord for rent. The court decided that they were protected under the principle of public utility and convenience; and Mr. Justice Waties, who delivered the opinion, said: "The reason why a stranger's goods are subject to distress is, because infinite frauds would be otherwise practiced upon a landlord; and his summary remedy, in this case, might at any time be defeated by a collusion between his tenant and a stranger. All goods, therefore, found on the premises, belonging to strangers or tenants, are generally distrainable. They are presumed to be the property of the tenant, because in his possession. There is no instance in which possession is regarded so much, as the evidence of property, as in this, to preserve the right of the landlord from fraud and imposition. This appears to be the sole object of the law, and therefore admits of exceptions when this mischief does not occur. For when the possession of the goods by the tenant holds out no fallacious security to the landlord, but they are known to belong to a stranger, in that case they are privileged from distress; as in the case of a horse at an inn, or in a smith's shop to be shod, cloth at a tailor's, and sacks of corn in a market or mill, &c., these are privileged and protected for the benefit of trade; but, in my mind, it is as good a reason that the property (notwithstanding the immediate possession is in the tenant,) is known to the landlord not to belong to the tenant, but to his customers. No presumption of property can arise from the possession, and therefore the landlord is not deprived of any security he may have trusted to in them for the payment of the rent. With respect to the present case, all the different reasons for an exemption apply with great force. The defendants, when they leased their house to a vendue-master, could never have had in contemplation any remedy they might have against the goods of various persons which might be lodged with him for sale. They must have known that these were not his property, and must have relied on other resources for the recovery of their rent. Considering then the well-known use of vendue stores as the depositories of the goods of strangers only, and which are placed there, as it were, by the authority of law; and considering also the public convenience and utility of them, there appear to me the strongest grounds for extending to them the protection of the law."

So also in the case of Phaelon v. McBride, in the year 1791, 1 Bay, 170, which was replevin for the plaintiff's slave, bound apprentice to a hair-dresser, and distrained for rent due by the hair-dresser to his landlord. "The court was unanimously of opinion that the negro boy was not liable to be distrained, upon the principle, that goods in the way of trade are exempted." And they said, that "the case of Himely v. Wyatt was adjudged upon wise and legal principles;" "and that it would be hard and unreasonable, under those circumstances, to make the property of a third person liable for the default of a tenant."

So also in the case before mentioned, of Bull v. Horlbeck, 1 Bay, 301, although a majority of the court (against the opinion of Judge Bay) decided that a slave of a stranger, accidentally found on the premises, was liable to a distress for rent, yet the jury found a verdict against the opinion of the majority, which verdict was acquiesced in, and has often been relied upon since.

So also in the case of Gilman v. Elton, 3 Brod. & B. 75, in which the court of common pleas, in England, decided in the year 1821, that the goods of the principal, in the hands of the factor, cannot be distrained for the factor's rent. Dallas, C. J., said—"The general right of landlords to distrain is clearly protected in point of law; and I agree that, whatever is found on the premises is, prima facie, taken as belonging to the tenant. The rule grows out of the relation of landlord and tenant, and out of the nature of the thing itself; for all such rules are of simple origin. But rules which are of simple origin, if very general, become in time, and from change of circumstances, inconvenient, and thence subject to exceptions. Exceptions to this general right of distress arose at a very early period, and have ever since been recognized by the courts." And after citing the words of Mr. Justice Ashurst, in Gorton v. Falkner, 4 Term R. 568, in which he states the foundation of the landlord's right to distrain the property of a stranger on the premises to be, "that the landlord is supposed to give credit to a visible stock on the premises;" and that it is founded, also, on public convenience and the prevention of fraud; and that "the exceptions out of the general rule are all of them tending to the benefit of trade and commerce, and general advantage;" he says—"The rule was evidently founded not on natural, but artificial arrangements. It was a rule to prevent a particular species of inconvenience, which would otherwise have arisen. But as it was found that this rule, when universally enforced, created another kind of inconvenience, extensive in its nature, exceptions were necessarily introduced. In like manner, therefore, and on the same principle of public convenience, a rule has been adopted in favor of trade and commerce; and, as the landlord is protected under the general right of distraining, so goods of a certain description, and in certain situations, are protected in favor of trade and commerce." Again, he said—"The public convenience runs through all the cases of exception. And, on general principle and analogy, this question comes within the scope of those decisions." Mr. Justice Park, in the same case, said—"The instances mentioned under the exception as to trade, by Lord Coke, are not put as limiting or comprehending the whole exception, but merely by way of illustration. The principle of the exception is admirably put by Lord Holt, in 1 Salk. 250; and his language shows that the exception was not established for the benefit of the individual, but of trade in general. The case in Cro. Eliz. 549, Read v. Burley, is strong to show that it is the trade which is favored, not the individual." Mr. Justice Burrough, in the same case, said—"This case is to be decided on principle; and on the principle of all the decisions. From the earliest times, these exceptions to the general right of the landlord to distrain, have existed; the question, therefore, is, whether this case falls within the principle of the exception in favor of trade." In none of the cases has that principle been put as if in favor of any particular trade, but for the advantage of trade in general. And Mr. Justice Richardson said—"The advancement of trade equally requires that goods should be placed in the hands of a factor for sale, as that they should be placed in the hands of a carrier for carriage." "The instances enumerated by Lord Coke, under the exception in favor of trade, are only put by way of example, and the present case falls clearly within the principle of the exception."

So in the case of Thompson v. Mashiter, 1 Bing. 283, where the goods of the principal, which had been put by the factor into the warehouse of Ramsay, a wharfinger, were, upon the same general principle, held to be exempted from distress for rent due for the wharf and warehouse. Dallas, C. J., said, "that the case is the same as if the owner had sent them immediately to Ramsay's, where, on the broad principle of public convenience, I think they were not liable to distress." Mr. Justice Park said—"The cases were all considered in Gilman v. Elton; and the general principle laid down in that case is applicable to the present. The principle there laid down was, that certain exemptions of goods from distresses were permitted, not on account of the character of the individual in whose hands the goods were deposited, but for the benefit of trade. On that general ground we now decide; and not on the ground that Ramsay was the servant, or stood in the place of the factor. The instances put by Lord Coke are merely illustrative, but they apply in principle, though none of them, perhaps, in terms." "Therefore, keeping to the broad and general principle of convenience, and benefit to trade and commerce, I think these goods ought not to have been distrained."

These cases show that the principle is broad enough to cover a slave, the personal servant of a lodger, at a common boarding house; and that the principle, if it applies at all, goes to the total exemption of the property thus situated, whether there be other sufficient distress or not. We are, therefore, of opinion that the demurrer to the third plea of the plaintiff ought to be overruled.

4. The fourth plea of the plaintiff was the same as the third, except charging the locus in quo to be a common inn. Upon this plea issue was joined, and found for the plaintiff, but subject to the opinion of the court, whether the facts justified the verdict. It is not clearly stated in the books what are the essential requisites of a common inn, commune hospitium, or what distinguishes it from a common boarding-house. It appears, however, by the Registrum Brevium, 105, (see Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 104, B, and Co. Ent. 347,) that common inns must be kept "ad hospitandos homines, per partes, ubi hujusmodi hospitia existunt, transeuntes;" that is, for the entertainment of travellers passing through those parts of the country where the inns are. Calye's Case, 8 Coke, 32. And "it is no way material that he should have any sign before his door or not, if he make it his common business to entertain passengers." 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 78, § 2, p. 452; Rex v. Collins, Palmer, 373. And, in section 4, c. 78, Hawkins says—"Also it seems to be settled, at this day, that any person may lawfully set up a new inn, unless it be inconvenient to the public in some of the respects taken notice of in the first section, and that he has no need of any license from the king for this purpose; for the keeping of an inn is no franchise, but a lawful trade, open to every subject. But if an inn degenerate into an ale-house, by suffering disorderly tippling, it shall be deemed as such." It is true that, by the act of Maryland, 1790, c. 24, ordinary keepers are required to take out an annual license; but the eighth section, by imposing a fine on any person "who shall presume to keep ordinary without a license," shows that an ordinary may exist without a license. The intent of the party, manifested by his acts, must decide whether the house is kept as a common inn, into which all travellers have a right to enter and demand accommodation; or a boarding-house, in which the keeper has a right to select his guests. The statement of facts shows that Mr. Archer rented the premises to Mrs. Rich, to be occupied as a boarding-house; and she publicly advertised to keep a boarding-house. It is, indeed, stated to be for the entertainment of all persons, travellers and others, for one or more days, at the will of the guests; but still she advertised it as a boarding-house, not as an inn, probably intending to reserve to herself a right to select her guests. We think, therefore, that the verdict of the jury upon this issue is not supported by the evidence.

5. The question arising upon the verdict found in favor of the plaintiff upon the fifth plea, is, whether the verdict is supported by the state of the facts. The matter found by the verdict, upon this issue, is, that at the time the slave was taken he was "in attendance upon the said W. C. Easton, as his servant and waiting-man, actually engaged in performing for him the duties and services of such servant and waiting-man, and in the said Easton's actual use and personal service." We think this verdict is not supported by the evidence; for it does not appear, by the statement of facts, that the slave, at the time of caption, was in the actual use of Mr. Easton. It is only stated that, "when the bailiff came to levy the distress, he was informed by Mrs. Rich that the slave was not her property, but was the property of the plaintiff, and was the hired servant of Mr. Easton, and exclusively in his employment." We do not think that it can be, from that, inferred that the slave was in the actual use of Mr. Easton at the time he was taken, within the meaning of the rule of law, that goods in the actual use of any person cannot be distrained. It is a rule which applies to the goods of the tenant himself, as well as to those of a stranger; and implies such an actual use, that the taking thereof would be, or tend directly to, a breach of the peace.

6. The verdict, on the issue joined on the sixth plea, finds that the slave was the property of the plaintiff; that there were goods of the tenant on the premises sufficient to satisfy the rent; and that the landlord, knowing the same, fraudulently and maliciously caused the defendant to distrain the slave. The question arising upon the verdict on this issue is, whether it is supported by the facts stated. We think it is not; for fraud and malice, which are the gist of this plea, are not to be presumed, but ought to be clearly proved. The only circumstance stated in this plea, from which fraud or malice could possibly be inferred, was the knowledge of the landlord that the slave was the property of the plaintiff, and that there were goods enough of Mrs. Rich's to satisfy the rent. But there might be other motives to induce him to distrain the slave; and that charity which the law itself demands, in respect to an allegation of fraud, requires us to presume the motive to be good until the contrary appears.

We have, so far, considered the case as it appears upon the pleadings, compared with the statement of the facts. But there is no one of the pleas which brings into view the whole merits of the case. The verdict for the plaintiff has been rendered, "subject to the opinion of the court upon the demurrer, and upon the facts in evidence; upon which, if the opinion of the court be in favor of the defendant, judgment is to be rendered in his favor for $65, the rent in arrear."

The facts in evidence were substantially as follows: That the landlord rented the premises to Mrs. Rich, to be occupied as a boarding-house, and that she publicly advertised to keep a boarding-house for the entertainment of all persons, travellers and others, for one or more days, at the will of the guests. That, at the time when, &c., W. C. Easton was a boarder and lodger in her house, and hired of the plaintiff, the slave in question, for his own exclusive service, as a domestic servant; and took him into his service, and kept him in the said house, as his exclusive servant; and that while the said slave was so in the said house, as the exclusive servant of Mr. Easton, and in his exclusive employment, he was, by the order of the landlord, distrained for rent due by Mrs. Rich to the landlord. That at the time of making the distress, the defendant was informed by Mrs. Rich that the slave was the property of the plaintiff, and was the hired servant of Mr. Easton, one of her boarders, and exclusively in his employment. The fact is also stated, that there were goods enough the property of Mrs. Rich, upon the premises, to satisfy the rent.

The question then is, whether, if these facts had been formally pleaded, the plaintiff would be entitled to recover in this action. It is evident that all the reasons which we have before urged, in support of the opinion expressed upon the demurrer to the third plea, are of equal weight upon the merits of the case as here stated; and in addition thereto are the important facts that there were other goods upon the premises, the property of the tenant, sufficient to satisfy the rent; and that the bailiff was informed, at the time of the distress, that the slave was not the property of the tenant, but of the plaintiff, and in the exclusive service of Mr. Easton, a boarder and lodger in the house. These additional facts, we think, removed all doubt, with respect to the plaintiff's case, even if the court should have erred in its opinion upon the demurrer to the plaintiff's third plea. The circumstance that the landlord rented the house to be occupied as a boarding-house is very important. It is prima facie evidence of his assent that the lodgers should place upon the premises such articles as were necessary for their comfort and convenience, and that he knew they were not the property of his tenant. They held out to him no deceitful evidence of security for his rent; and he could not, with a good conscience, have relied upon them as a fund out of which the rent was to be paid. Even if there had not been sufficient property of the tenant on the premises to satisfy the rent, it would have been unconscionable, if not fraudulent in him, to have distrained this slave, after having been informed that he was the property of the plaintiff, and was the personal servant in the exclusive employment of one of the lodgers and boarders in the house; and to do it with that knowledge when there was sufficient property of the tenant liable to his distress, was evidence from which the jury might have inferred malice, and perhaps fraud. It would be like the case of Fowkes v. Joyce, 2 Vern. 129, where a grazier, driving sheep to London, was encouraged by the tenant, to put his sheep into the close for one night, which he did, with the consent of the landlord, who distrained them for rent due by the tenant. This distress was adjudged valid at law, but the grazier was relieved in equity upon the ground of fraud; and the reporter says the court looked upon it as a fraud and contrivance in the landlord, to subject the sheep to his distress. Saunders, in his note on page 290, [3 Saund.,] speaking of that case, says, "And it should seem that, at this day, a court of law would be of opinion that cattle belonging to a drover, being put in a ground, with the consent of the occupier, to graze only one night, in their way to a fair or market, were not liable to the distress of the landlord for rent."

Upon the whole, therefore, we are of opinion that judgment should be entered up for the plaintiff upon the defendant's demurrer to the plaintiff's third plea; and that the verdict, not being supported by the facts in evidence, upon any one of the issues, must be set aside, with leave to the plaintiff to put in a plea embracing all the facts in evidence, showing the whole merits of the case, unless the plaintiff should choose to rely upon the judgment in his favor upon the demurrer; in which case he will be permitted to withdraw the pleas upon which the issues of fact have been joined, and take judgment upon the demurrer.

THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, dissented.

BEALL, (COOK v.) See Case No. 3,153.

Case No. 1,162.

BEALL v. DICK et al.

[4 Cranch, C. C. 18.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May Term, 1830.

EVIDENCE—OFFICIAL COPY OF MORTGAGE—EQUITY.

An official copy of a mortgage of real estate is sufficient evidence, in equity, in Washington county, D. C., of the existence of the original mortgage, and of the debt due thereon.

In equity. Bill to foreclose a mortgage of real estate in Georgetown, D. C., made by John Peter to T. B. Beall, the plaintiffs' testator. John Peter afterwards sold the land to Elizabeth Peter, who devised it to the defendants, Margaret Dick and others. The plaintiffs averred that the debt was still due and that the mortgage was a subsisting mortgage, and exhibited an office-copy. The debt and mortgage were admitted by the defendant, John Peter, the mortgagor, but not by the defendants, Margaret Dick and others, the devisees of Mrs. Peter, who called for proof of the execution of the mortgage and that the debt and mortgage were still subsisting and unsatisfied. The mortgage was made on the 4th and recorded on the 9th of August, 1809. The deed from John Peter to Elizabeth Peter was dated the 16th of April, 1810.

Mr. Jones, for the defendants, Dick et al., denied that the office-copy is evidence of the mortgage. There is a difference between mortgages and ordinary deeds of conveyance. A mortgage may be discharged by indorsement on the original deed; by acknowledgment of satisfaction, or tearing off the seal; or by destroying the instrument. Enrolment, in this country, is considered as implied notice in law, but not conclusive in equity. If the original is lost it should have been so averred in the bill, and that it was a subsisting security, and a subsisting debt; these defendants might then have denied the facts. They have had no notice that the plaintiffs meant to rely upon this copy. It is the common practice to exhibit copies in all cases, whether the originals are in the possession of the plaintiffs, or not; and the originals are produced at the hearing, and, if denied, may be proved ore tenus.

Mr. Marbury and Mr. Coxe, contra.

When a copy of a deed of lands from the record is produced, it is not necessary to produce the original deed, unless the original be particularly called for by previous notice, and then only when the execution of the original is put in issue. The copy is evidence of the existence of the original; and it is presumed to exist in full force until the contrary is shown. It is not necessary for the plaintiffs to aver that it is not cancelled; or not destroyed, or lost. But it is not a fact to be put in issue to the jury. It is a fact to be ascertained by the court, even at law; and a fortiori in equity as a ground for admitting secondary evidence. An exemplification of the record of the deed is as good evidence as the deed itself.

THE COURT (MORSELL, Circuit Judge, not sitting in this cause) was of opinion that the exemplification of the record of the mortgage was sufficient evidence of the existence of the mortgage and of the debt; and also permitted the affidavit of one of the plaintiffs to be read, as to the loss of the original deed. CRANCH, Chief Judge, however, very much doubting as to the propriety of admitting the affidavit, as the court was of opinion that it was not incumbent upon the plaintiffs to produce, or to show the loss of, the original mortgage. See Laws Md. 1785, c. 9, § 7, "or a full copy of the same from the record."

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

BEALL, (HALLER v.) See Case No. 5,957.

Case No. 1,163.

BEALL v. HARRELL et al.

[The case reported under this title in 7 N. B. R. 400 is the same as Jarrell v. Harrell, Case No. 7,222.]

Case No. 1,164.

BEALL v. NEWTON.

[1 Cranch, C. C. 404.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. June Term, 1807.

PLEADING — COVENANT — TRIAL — ARGUMENT OF COUNSEL — THE RIGHT TO BEGIN AND REPLY.

1. In covenant upon an issue on the plea of general performance, the plaintiff is not bound to produce the original covenant.

2. The party who holds the affirmative of the issue has the right to open and close the argument to the jury.

At law. This was an action upon a covenant in a mortgage for payment of money; plea general performance, general replication and issue.

Mr. F. S. Key, for the defendant, contended that the original covenant ought to be produced.

THE COURT (FITZHUGH, Circuit Judge, absent) said he could not demand the production of the original. He had admitted the execution of the deed and its contents. He had either had oyer or he had not. If he pleaded without oyer, he equally admitted the statement of it in the declaration to be true; if had oyer he has spread it on the record.

Mr. Key then contended, that there being a power of sale in the mortgage, the jury had a right to presume and ought to presume, that the land existed, that the title was good, that Beall had sold it, and received full satisfaction of the debt.

But THE COURT said that there was no such presumption, and that it was incumbent upon Mr. Newton to prove that Beall had sold the land, and that it had produced the money.

The defendant's witness had stated that he had heard that the land sold for one hundred and ten dollars. The plaintiff's counsel, Mr. Morsell, did not object to such testimony; and in arguing to the jury, stated it to be evidence. Mr. Key contended that it was not evidence; and so THE COURT decided.

Mr. Key claimed a right to open the argument to the jury.

DUCKETT, Circuit Judge, said that in his practice the plaintiff uniformly opened and closed.

CRANCH, Chief Judge, said that the practice of this court always had been that the party who held the affirmative, and on whom the burden of proof lay, had the right to open and close the argument to the jury; but if there were more issues than one, and the plaintiff held the affirmative in any one of the issues, the plaintiff had the right. 3 Bl. Comm. 366.

DUCKETT, Circuit Judge, acquiesced in consequence of CRANCH, Chief Judge, stating the practice to be so.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

BEALL, (O'NEALE v.) See Case No. 10,513.

BEALL, (TRAVERSE v.) See Case No. 14,153.

Case No. 1,165.

In re BEALS et al.

[9 Ben. 223;[1] 17 N. B. R. 107.]

District Court, S. D. New York. Oct. Term, 1877.

BANKRUPTCY — PARTNERSHIP — RESIDENCE.

A petition in involuntary bankruptcy against three persons as co-partners alleged, as the only ground of jurisdiction, that they had all of them resided in this district for a period of six months next preceding the filing of the petition. On an application by the three bankrupts, afterwards, for discharges, a creditor showed, on a proper specification, that one of the three bankrupts had not resided in this district for a period of six months next preceding the filing of the petition: Held, that the court did not acquire jurisdiction over all the copartners and could not grant a discharge to any of them.

[In bankruptcy. In the matter of Oliver B. Beals, Irving Holland, and Martha A. Smith.]

S. W. Fullerton, for bankrupts.

B. Low, for creditors.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. The petition in this case, one in involuntary bankruptcy, alleged as the ground of jurisdiction, that the debtors, all three of them, had resided in this district for a period of six months next preceding the filing of the petition. No other ground of jurisdiction was alleged, nor can any other be now urged, on the petition, to sustain it. The allegation of residence or carrying on of business, in the petition, is the allegation of a jurisdictional fact, and the petition must contain an allegation showing jurisdiction in that respect. But it is open to creditors, on an application for a discharge, to show, under a proper specification of objection, that the ground of jurisdiction alleged in the petition for adjudication did not exist. The bankrupt has an opportunity to meet and contest the specification. In the present case, it is clear that the allegation of residence, in the petition, is not true, and that one of the bankrupts had not resided in this district for a period of six months next preceding the filing of the petition, although the other two had. This defeats the jurisdiction of the court as respects all the debtors and the entire case, inasmuch as the proceeding is one against the debtors as copartners and their firm assets, and the petitioning creditors were creditors of the firm, and a discharge is sought by all the debtors from the debts of the firm. In such a case the court must acquire jurisdiction over all the copartners, in order to have jurisdiction over any of them. I regard the eighth specification as raising this question. The discharges are refused.

[1] [Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and Benj. Lincoln Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

BEALS, (SUYDAM v.) See Case No. 13,653.

Case No. 1,166.

In re BEAN.

[14 N. B. R. 182; 2 Wkly. Notes Cas. 432.]

District Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. July 21, 1875.

BANKRUPTCY—CLAIM BY BANKRUPT'S WIFE—COMPETENCY OF BANKRUPT AS WITNESS—PENNSYLVANIA STATUTE.

[1. Under Rev. St. § 858, state laws in force prior to December 1, 1873, are rules of decision in federal courts as to the competency of witnesses.]

[2. Under Act Pa. April 15, 1869, (P. L. 30,) and Rev. St. § 858, a bankrupt may testify to support a claim by his wife against the estate. Bechtel's Case, Case No. 1,204, distinguished.]

[In bankruptcy. In the matter of Levi Bean. This was an application by the bankrupt's wife to prove a promissory note given to her by the bankrupt in consideration of a loan made by her. The register, under the ruling in Bechtel's Case, Case No. 1,204, decided that both husband and wife were incompetent witnesses. The case is now heard on exceptions to the register's report. Exceptions sustained.]

Lewis B. Thompson, for applicant, cited Act Pa. April 15, 1869, § 1, (P. L. 30.)

Erdman, for assignee, cited Const. Pa. art. 11, § 8; Bechtel's Case, Case No. 1,204; Tioga Co. v. South Creek Tp., 75 Pa. St. 433; Bronson v. Bronson, 8 Phila. 261.

CADWALADER, District Judge. The testimony of the bankrupt was excluded by the register, on the supposed authority of my decision in Bechtel's Case, [Case No. 1,204.] At the time of that decision (16th December, 1871), the act of the legislature of Pennsylvania, of 15th April, 1869, was not considered in force in this court. The act of congress of 16th July, 1862, [12 Stat. 588, c. 189,] making the laws of the state the rule of decision as to the competency of witnesses, did not apply to a law of the state subsequently enacted. But the Revised Statutes, (section 858,) re-enact the law of 1862, so as to include all state laws on the subject, prior to 1st December, 1873. The state law of 15th April, 1869, [P. L. 30,] therefore, furnishes the rule of decision in the present case.

The case will be recommitted, in order that the bankrupt's testimony in support of the wife's claim may be taken. Whether the claim can be sustained upon his unsupported testimony is a question which it would be premature to consider, and which, indeed, may never arise. It will, however, perhaps be important to consider hereafter what proof, if any, of the time when the alleged note was signed can be adduced, and what proof, if any, that his cash in hand was increased at the time or times in question. The general views expressed by the register seem to be correct; and he will decide provisionally as to their applicability to the case.

NOTE, [from original report.] Register Chase subsequently examined the bankrupt, and in his second report disallowed the wife's claim, for the reason therein given (upon the evidence he found facts against the claim), which report was confirmed by the court, and the claim of the wife was disallowed.

BEAN, (ALKAN v.) See Case No. 202.

Case No. 1,167.

BEAN v. AMSINCK et al.

[10 Blatchf. 361;[1] 12 Am. Law Reg. (N. S.) 379; 8 N. B. R. 228.]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Jan. Term, 1873.[2]

BANKRUPTCY — PARTNERSHIP — COMPOSITION — FRAUDULENT PREFERENCE — SUIT BY ASSIGNEE OF PARTNER.

1. Where several creditors enter into a composition arrangement with their debtor, by deed, it is a constructive fraud on the other creditors signing the deed, for one creditor who signs to enter into a secret arrangement with the debtor, for an advantage over the other creditors, in respect to his debt.

[Cited in Bean v. Brookmire, Case No. 1,170; Re Jewett, Id. 7,306; Fairbanks v. Amoskeag Nat. Bank, 38 Fed. 634.]

2. Securing 50 per cent., in cash, at once, instead of 70 per cent. on time, is such an advantage, when obtained secretly, where the taking of the cash payment so embarrasses the debtor as to make it impossible for him to meet his payments to the other creditors, as they mature.

[Cited in Fairbanks v. Amoskeag Nat. Bank, 38 Fed. 634.]

3. Where such a fraud has been committed, and the debtor afterwards is adjudged a bankrupt, his assignee in bankruptcy may recover from the creditor receiving such cash payment, the amount so paid.

[1] [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

[2] [Reversed in 22 Wall. (89 U. S.) 395.]

4. In this case, it was held, that the fact, that the composition deed was, by its terms, not to be binding on any creditor unless all the creditors signed it, and all did not sign it, and the further fact, that the agent who signed it for the favored creditor was authorized to sign it only after all the other creditors had signed it, did not, on the facts of this case, exempt such favored creditor from his liability to repay the money to the assignee in bankruptcy.

[5. A partner in an insolvent firm executed a composition deed with the firm creditors, referring to them as "his creditors," and, in pursuance thereof, signed compromise notes in the firm name. The creditors regarded the firm as dissolved, and the assets as having been placed in his hands for settlement. He then made payments from the firm's funds in fraud of the rights of such creditors, and was afterwards himself declared a bankrupt. Held, that his assignee in bankruptcy can, in the interest of the firm creditors, recover the sums so paid in fraud of their rights.]

[See note at end of case.]

[In equity. Bill by William C. Bean, assignee in bankruptcy of Charles S. Kintzing, against Louis E. Amsinck & Co., for an accounting, and for the recovery of money alleged to have been paid in fraud of the rights of other creditors of Charles S. Kintzing & Co., of which firm Kintzing was a member until a short time before the commencement of the proceedings in which he was adjudged a bankrupt. Decree for plaintiff.

[Subsequently, on defendants' appeal to the supreme court, this decree was reversed, and the case remanded to this court, with directions to dismiss the bill of complaint. Amsinck v. Bean, 22 Wall. (89 U. S.) 395.]

Edward B. Merrill, for plaintiff.

Augustus F. Smith, for defendants.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. On the 15th of February, 1869, the firm of Charles S. Kintzing & Co., of St. Louis, Missouri, composed of Charles S. Kintzing and Malcolm S. Lindsley, was indebted to the defendants, who then composed, and still compose, the firm of L. E. Amsinck & Co., of New York, in the sum of $32,551 65. Kintzing & Co. were also very largely indebted to many other persons, and, having stopped payment, a meeting of their creditors was held at St. Louis, about that date, at which a statement of their financial affairs was presented, showing their condition on the 8th of February, 1869, in which their liabilities were placed at $179,299 54 and their assets at $204,602 80. In the latter amount there were only $77,344 26 of accounts considered good, merchandise and cash, while the rest of the assets consisted of $51,704 50 of suspended debts, $10,167 35 of doubtful claims, and $65,386 69, "due from Montana branch." The business of Kintzing & Co. was the wholesale grocery business. For the purpose of making a compromise with their creditors, an agreement in these words was prepared and presented for signature to such creditors: "Articles of agreement made and entered into this 15th day of February, A. D. 1869, between Charles S. Kintzing & Co., of the city of St. Louis, and his creditors, witnesseth, that we, the undersigned creditors of said Charles S. Kintzing & Co., for and in consideration of one dollar to each of us paid by said firm, and for divers other good and valuable considerations, agree to accept, in full payment and satisfaction, seventy (70) cents on the dollar, for the entire indebtedness of said firm to us respectively, as shown by the amounts set opposite our signatures hereto, to be divided up into three equal payments, at six (6), twelve (12) and eighteen (18) months respectively from the date hereof, without interest, and is evidenced by three (3) negotiable notes of Charles S. Kintzing & Co., of even date herewith, and, on the payment of which, said firm is to be released from all liability on account of said indebtedness; and be it further known, that we have entered into this compromise with said firm of Charles S. Kintzing & Co., after hearing and seeing a statement of Messrs. Kintzing & Co.'s books, assets and effects, and find that it is the best, in our judgment, that can be done for the interest of all concerned; and, further, that we have full confidence in the integrity of Charles S. Kintzing, and his ability to settle up the business better than any one we could appoint; but it is further expressly agreed and understood, that this composition is not to be binding on any one, unless agreed to and signed by all of the creditors of said firm. In witness whereof, we have hereto set our respective names, and desire the co-operation of all the creditors with us in this compromise." This composition agreement was ultimately signed by sixty-three of the creditors, including the defendants, the aggregate of whose debts, as set opposite their signatures, amounted to $153,558 21. The debt due to the defendants was more than double that due to any other one creditor. For the purpose of procuring the signature of the defendants to the agreement, Kintzing went to New York and had an interview with one of the defendants, and desired their assent to the compromise, to which the reply was, that, if he could obtain the assent of the other creditors, the defendants would not stand in the way, if Kintzing would afterwards pay them fifty cents on the dollar, on the amount of the indebtedness, in the manner stated in the letter of March 8th, 1869, hereafter referred to. An agreement to that effect being verbally made between Kintzing and the defendants, the latter, under date of New York, March 8th, 1869, wrote, and signed, and sent to the firm of F. A. Reuss & Co., of St. Louis, a letter, in the following words, addressed to that firm, at St. Louis, which they delivered to Kintzing, in New York, and which he carried to St. Louis: "We hereby authorize you to sign, as our attorneys, the agreement entered into by Chas. S. Kintzing & Co. with their creditors, accepting their extension notes for 6, 12, and 18 mos., for seventy per cent. of their indebtedness, under the following conditions: (1.) That all other creditors must have signed before us; (2.) That Chas. S. Kintzing & Co. discount their extension notes, upon your signing said agreement, paying for them $5,808 27 in cash, on or before the 15th inst., $5,233 78 in their new note due 1–4 April, $5,233 78 in their new note due 1–4 May—$16,275 83, say, sixteen thousand two hundred and seventy-five 83/100 dollars in all; (3.) That, upon your lawyer's advice, Chas. S. Kintzing & Co. have a legal right to enter into the above arrangement with us. Referring you, for further particulars, to our letter by mail, we remain," &c. F. A. Reuss & Co. received from the defendants, otherwise than through the letter so given to Kintzing, instructions the same in substance as those contained in that letter. After sixty-two of the creditors, representing debts put down at $121,006 56, had signed the agreement, F. A. Reuss & Co., on the 15th of March, 1869, signed it thus: "L. E. Amsinck & Co., by F. A. Reuss & Co., their Att'y, 32,551 65," that signature being the last one which appears appended to the agreement. Whether, at the time Reuss & Co. so signed, Kintzing gave to them, for the defendants, three notes, according to the terms of the agreement, payable in 6, 12, and 18 months, dated February 15th, 1869, for seventy per cent. of the $32,551 65, does not, perhaps, clearly appear; but, when Reuss & Co. so signed, Kintzing gave to them, for the defendants, $5,808 27 in cash, and two notes, each dated St. Louis, March 2d, 1869, each for $5,233 78, one payable thirty days after date, and the other payable sixty days after date, each signed Chas. S. Kintzing & Co., and each payable to the order of the defendants' firm, one to become due April 1–4, the other May 1–4. On the 16th of March, Reuss & Co. wrote a letter to the defendants, reporting thus: "Have signed in your name the list of K. creditors. Mr. K. came up last night, and brought us cash and notes as per agreement. Our lawyer satisfied himself so much that all K.'s cred. have signed the 70c. The 2 notes you find enclosed, you may return us the same properly endorsed, and, in case K. don't come up, we promise you to be after him again." The letter also accounted with the defendants for the $5,808 27 cash. The two notes were received by the defendants, and endorsed by them, each payable to F. A. Reuss & Co., or order, and returned by the defendants to F. A. Reuss & Co. Reuss & Co. received payment of the notes in full from Kintzing, and remitted the amount to the defendants, $2,500 being paid on the 3d of April, 1869; $2,733 78 on the 10th of April, 1869; $3,000 on the 4th of May, 1869; and $2,233 78 on the 11th of May, 1869. Thirty-three creditors, with debts to the amount of $2,313 53, did not sign the compromise agreement.

From and after time when the firm of Charles S. Kintzing & Co. so suspended payment, it seems to have been regarded by the partners in it, Kintzing and Lindsley, as dissolved. The assets, with the tacit assent of Lindsley, passed into the exclusive possession of Kintzing, for administration for the benefit of the creditors of the firm, as contemplated by the terms of the compromise agreement. Lindsley was largely in debt to the firm. Kintzing took the stock of merchandise, and, making new purchases on his own account, went on in business, in St. Louis, in his own name, from about the 1st of March, 1869, selling the old stock and the new stock, and mingling the funds arising from the goods and assets of Charles S. Kintzing & Co. with those arising from his new individual business, although he kept a separate set of books for each business. The moneys paid to the defendants were paid out of such mingled funds.

After so settling with the defendants, on the 15th of March, Kintzing proceeded to send to the other creditors who had signed the compromise agreement, six, twelve and eighteen months' notes, made by Charles S. Kintzing & Co., for the 70 per cent. The first of the six months' notes matured on the 18th of August. None of them were paid at that date. The amount of them maturing on that day was $24,768 39. The amount of the compromise notes outstanding on the 18th of August, to mature after that date, was $45,795 26. Kintzing continued to carry on business until the 18th of August, and, on the 21st of August, made a voluntary assignment of all his property, in trust for his creditors, to one Pritchard, under the laws of Missouri. Comparatively small sums were realized from the assets of Kintzing & Co., before mentioned. Of the $65,386 69 due from Montana branch, $200 in cash was received and $17,000 in notes. Of the $22,265 64, accounts considered good, Kintzing collected about $6,000. The stock of merchandise depreciated to some extent. Between February 15th and August 1st, Kintzing paid to creditors of the firm, other than the defendants, $5,836 02. From the 15th of February to the 18th of August, the total cash receipts by Kintzing were about $75,000, and the cash payments were $103,000. The amount of merchandise purchased by Kintzing after the 15th of February was about $32,000. The total amount of sales of merchandise by Kintzing from the 15th of February to the 18th of August, was $62,189 59. Of this amount he received about $54,000 in cash prior to the 18th of August. Kintzing did not, when the creditors signed the agreement, or when the compromise notes were delivered to such creditors, inform any of them of the arrangement made with the defendants, nor does it appear that any creditors knew of it, other than the defendants. There was turned over to Pritchard, under the assignment to him, a quantity of merchandise and notes and accounts, and a small sum in cash. He sold the merchandise, and collected some of the notes and accounts, and afterwards turned over to the plaintiff $11,199 in cash and the uncollected notes and accounts, amounting to $42,771 58, of which the plaintiff has been able to collect only $453 25.

On the 17th of September, 1869, creditors holding some of the six months' compromise notes, signed Charles S. Kintzing & Co., and dated February 15th, 1869, presented a petition thereon, to the district court of the United States for the eastern district of Missouri, alleging that they "are creditors of Charles S. Kintzing, a member of the late firm of Charles S. Kintzing & Co.," the indebtedness being the said notes, which are averred, in the petition, to have been given to the petitioners by Kintzing, and alleging various acts of bankruptcy to have been committed by Kintzing, and, among others, a preferential payment to the defendants of the sums so paid, and praying that "the said Charles S. Kintzing, doing business as aforesaid, under the style and firm of Charles S. Kintzing & Co.," be declared bankrupt, and his estate be distributed according to law. Kintzing was adjudicated a bankrupt on such petition, and an assignment, under the act, of "all the estate, real and personal, of the said Charles S. Kintzing, bankrupt aforesaid, including all the property of whatever kind of which he was possessed, or in which he was interested, or entitled to have, on the 17th day of September, A. D., 1869," was executed to the plaintiff, in due form, on the 4th of January, 1870.

The bill alleges, that the arrangement between Kintzing and the defendants was a fraudulent agreement, on the part of the defendants, with the intent of deceiving and cheating the other creditors of Kintzing, and with a view to obtain a fraudulent advantage over them; that the payments were made by Kintzing to Reuss & Co., as the agents of the defendants, in pursuance of the said fraudulent agreement, and in violation of the compromise agreement; that the defendants concealed the fraudulent agreement, and the payments, from the other creditors of Kintzing and of the firm of Charles S. Kintzing & Co.; and that said creditors were deceived, to their damage. The prayer of the bill is, that all the payments so made by Kintzing to the defendants may be decreed to have been made in fraud of the other creditors of Kintzing and of Charles S. Kintzing & Co.; that the defendants may be decreed to account for, and pay over, to the plaintiff the sums of money so paid to them by Kintzing, and to render a full account of all moneys paid to them by Kintzing, or by Charles S. Kintzing & Co., since February 15th, 1869; and that all the property and effects, both of Kintzing and of the said firm of Charles S. Kintzing & Co., may be decreed to have vested in the plaintiff, as such assignee in bankruptcy.

The answer denies that an agreement was made which was fraudulent, or made with an intent, on the part of the defendants, to deceive or cheat the other creditors of Kintzing, or with a view, on their part, to obtain a fraudulent preference over the said other creditors. It admits, that, subsequently to the 15th of February, 1869, Reuss & Co., by the authority of the defendants, signed, in the firm name of the defendants, the compromise agreement. It denies that any money paid to the defendants vested in the plaintiff. It avers, that the defendants received the payments, believing, after the compromise agreement was signed, that Charles S. Kintzing & Co. were solvent, and able to pay all their then debts; that the other creditors also so believed; that, in consideration of the payments, they discharged Charles S. Kintzing & Co. from all liability, which, under the compromise agreement, amounted to $22,786 15; that the transaction can, in no respect, be questioned by the plaintiff, in consequence of its being contrary to public policy, in respect to its infringement of the terms of the compromise agreement; that, at the time of the filing of the petition in bankruptcy, Lindsley was a partner of Kintzing, under the firm name of Charles S. Kintzing & Co., and the debts claimed by the creditors by whom said petition was filed, were contracted by said firm, so composed, the members of which were, both of them, liable, as such partners, to said creditors, on said debts, at the time the petition was filed, and afterwards; that Lindsley was not made a party to the bankruptcy proceedings, or adjudged bankrupt, although he was alive, and resided in the United States; that, therefore, the court in Missouri never acquired jurisdiction of the proceedings, so as to adjudge Kintzing to be bankrupt; and that the plaintiff, by his appointment as assignee, never acquired any title to any of the estate of said firm of Charles S. Kintzing & Co., or to the claim or cause of action set forth in the bill.

The principle upon which the plaintiff seeks a recovery, in this case, is well settled. Such a transaction as that in which the defendants engaged was a constructive fraud on the other creditors. Those who entered into the composition agreed, by its terms, to accept the seventy per cent. in full payment and satisfaction of their claims, relying on the statement which had been exhibited to them, of the books, assets, and effects of their debtors, and, in substance, constituting Kintzing their trustee, to take such assets and effects, and settle up the business, by applying such assets and effects to the payment of the compromise notes. Such an arrangement was necessarily based on the good faith of all the creditors entering into the composition, in their dealings with the debtors, and with each other; and there could be no good faith, either towards the debtors, or towards the other creditors, when one creditor obtained, by a secret arrangement with the debtors, [under circumstances] [3] which amounted to coercion and duress upon the debtors, the advantage of an early, certain cash payment of one-half of his debt, which resulted in making the debtors unable to pay to the other creditors any part of the seventy per cent. for which they bargained. They supposed the favored creditors were acting in good faith, in agreeing to the same terms they agreed to; whereas, it turns out that such favored creditors have been bribed to hold themselves out as agreeing to such terms. Secret agreements of that kind are held void, both by courts of law and courts of equity, and are not enforced, even against the assenting debtor, or his sureties, or his friends. Public policy, and the interests of unsuspecting and deceived creditors, forbid the enforcement of such secret agreements; and it makes no difference whether threats or oppression were used to induce the debtor to consent to the secret agreement, or whether he was merely a volunteer, offering his services, and aiding in the intended deception. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 378, 379, and cases there cited; Clarke v. White, 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 178, 199; May, Fraud. Conv. 86, and cases there cited; Russell v. Rogers, 10 Wend. 473, 479; Wiggin v. Bush, 12 Johns. 306, 309; Bean v. Brookmire, [Case No. 1,169;] Dauglish v. Tennent, L. R. 2 Q. B. 49, 54. Not only are such secret agreements not entorced, but money paid under them is allowed to be recovered back by the debtor, as having been obtained in violation of the principles of public policy, and affirmative relief is given to the debtor against such agreements, even where they are not forbidden by an express statute. Smith v. Bromley, Doug. 696, note; Jackman v. Mitchell, 13 Ves. 581; Wood v. Barker, L. R. 1 Eq. 139. Nor is it material, whether the secret agreement gives to the favored creditor a larger sum, or an additional security or advantage. Eastabrook v. Scott, 3 Ves. 456; Constantein v. Blache, 1 Cox, Ch. 287. The case of Cullingworth v. Loyd, 2 Beav. 385, shows, that, although there is no general meeting of creditors, nor any agreement entered into by the creditors generally, yet, if a proposition is made to the creditors at large to pay them all a composition on certain terms, no creditor can ostensibly accept such composition, and sign the deed which expresses his acceptance of the terms, and, at the same time, stipulate for, or secure to himself, a peculiar and separate advantage, which is not expressed upon the deed. In Leicester v. Rose, 4 East, 372, 383, it is said, that the fraud, in such a case, may consist in putting the favored creditor in a better situation than the other creditors; that it is not necessary he should stipulate to receive more money than the others; but the fraud may consist in receiving that which is meant to procure him more money, namely, a better security for the same sum; and that it is a fraud on the creditors at large, for a person to hold out that he will come in under the general agreement, by signing the deed when presented to him separately, and then to stipulate for a further partial benefit to himself.

The leading cases on the subject are reviewed in Breck v. Cole, 4 Sandf. 79, and the conclusion is thus stated: "It is the clear and inevitable result of the decisions, that, where a composition is made with creditors, every security given to a particular creditor, not provided for in the terms of the deed, and not disclosed, is void, as a fraud upon the creditors from whom it is concealed, and, where it is taken from the debtor himself, as a condition of his discharge, is void upon the ground of duress, as well as of fraud." It is also said, in that case, that it makes no difference, that the secret agreement does not have, and cannot have, the effect of depriving the other creditors of any portion of the amount they had agreed to receive; that it is sufficient if a fact is concealed which it was material for them to know, and the knowledge of which might have prevented them from assenting to the composition; and that, upon a composition deed, all the parties are supposed to stand in the same situation, and, if there is any one who refuses to do so, he must announce it at the time, it being impossible to say, that those who signed the deed in the confidence that, under it, the rights of all would be equal, would have signed it at all, if it had been known to them that a better security was to be given to any one creditor than that which, by the terms of the deed, all had consented to take. These views are approved by Judge Woodruff, in Carroll v. Shields, 4 E. D. Smith, 466. The case of Pinneo v. Higgins, 12 Abb. Pr. 334, is very much like the present one. There, the favored creditor held out to the debtor that he would unite in the composition, if the other creditors did. When all the other creditors had signed, he sought to obtain better terms, and then agreed to sign if those terms were complied with, and finally did sign because they were complied with. In that case, it was urged, that no creditor was induced to sign because the favored creditor had signed. But the court held, that it was of no consequence whether the name of the favored creditor was the first, that was signed to the composition agreement, or the last; that he, by signing, entered into an agreement with the other creditors, as well as with the debtor; and that the separate agreement was equally void, whether made after all the other creditors had signed, or whether before, or after, the creditor who made it had signed.

It is contended, for the defendants, that the present case does not fall within the principles thus settled, because it was expressly provided, in the composition agreement, that it was not to be binding on any one, unless agreed to and signed by all the creditors, and it was not signed by all the creditors; and because the defendants bargained for fifty per cent. only of their claim, and threw away twenty per cent. of it; and because Reuss & Co. were authorized to sign only after all the other creditors had signed, and there were creditors who did not sign at all, and such condition was not waived either by Reuss & C., or by the defendants. The ground taken is, that, as the composition agreement never had any binding force as against the defendants, the payment to them of fifty per cent. of their debt did not violate any rights of the other creditors under the compromise. The difficulty with this view is, that it overlooks the true relations of the defendants to the other creditors. The defendants and Reuss & Co. supposed, as is evident from the letter of the 16th of March, 1869, from the latter to the former, that all the other creditors had signed. They, therefore, acted on that view, in taking the fifty per cent., and pretending to assent to the compromise terms, and concealing from the other creditors the special arrangement. So, too, the other creditors, inasmuch as the deed, by its terms, provided that all the creditors must sign before the composition should be binding, had the right to suppose, in receiving their composition notes, that all the creditors had signed, and that all were to receive like notes, and nothing further. They acted on that view, in taking their notes. Hence, not only must the agreement, for the purposes of this case, be regarded as having been signed by all the creditors, but each creditor has a right to stand as if the defendants had signed before him.

[3] [From 8 N. B. R. 228.]

Nor does it make any difference that there may not, in fact, have been any manual tradition of the compromise notes to Reuss & Co., or to the defendants. The letter of the 8th of March, 1869, from the defendants to Reuss & Co., states, expressly, that the fifty per cent. is to be received as a "discount" of the compromise notes, and that those notes are to be discounted on the signing of the agreement by Reuss & Co. Therefore, the signing, the receipt of the compromise notes, and their "discount," were to be simultaneous acts; and the defendants, having accepted the "discount," and retained it, under that arrangement, are estopped from saying that the compromise notes were not received by them, or that Reuss & Co. had no authority to sign the agreement, or that it was not binding because all the creditors did not sign it. The defendants did not treat separately in respect of their debt, but as a part of the general creditors, all of whom were, as they knew, to be invited to accede to the same terms.

Nor is there any force in the fact that the defendants obtained only fifty per cent. of their claim instead of seventy per cent. By obtaining the fifty per cent. they substantially exhausted a large part of the resources of the debtors. They intended to make it sure that they should obtain the whole of their fifty per cent. before any of the compromise notes which the other creditors were to receive should fall due, and they further intended to make it sure, by signing last, that no creditor should be left free to proceed against the debtors on his original claim, so as to prevent the payment of the whole of the fifty per cent. It is to be assumed that other creditors would have preferred such an arrangement as the defendants made. At all events, it is to be assumed that others who signed would not have signed, had they known of the private arrangement with the defendants, which was to strip the debtors of a large part of their means of paying the six months' compromise notes. The amount of such notes, actually given, was $24,768 39. The amount of the defendants' first compromise note, at seventy per cent., would have been $7,595 38. Before half of the six months had elapsed, the defendants had exacted from the debtors $16,275 83. The position of the creditors who have been defrauded by the private agreement would have been no different from what it is, if all the creditors had signed the compromise agreement; or if, all signing it, the defendants had not signed last; or if, only a part signing it, including the defendants, the defendants had not signed last. Such position, too, is the same it would have been, if, all the creditors signing the compromise agreement, the defendants had signed it first; or, only a part signing it, including the defendants, the defendants had signed it first.

The suggestion, that, if the compromise at seventy cents had been carried out, Kintzing & Co. were solvent, has no force, except to show, that the defendants, by rendering it, through their fraud, impossible that the compromise should be carried out, made Kintzing & Co. insolvent.

It being clear, therefore, that the transaction was a fraud on the creditors, the right of the plaintiff to recover back the money, for such creditors, is equally clear. Whether the money could or could not be recovered back by the debtor, the 14th section of the bankruptcy act especially vests in the assignee all property conveyed by the bankrupt in fraud of his creditors, and authorizes him to sue for and recover the same. This applies to conveyances fraudulent at common law, and to transfers of property such as that in the present case. Knowlton v. Moseley, 105 Mass. 136; Bean v. Brookmire, [Case No. 1,169.]

It is contended, that the bankruptcy proceedings were against Kintzing alone, and not against Lindsley also, and not against the firm; that the plaintiff is the assignee only of Kintzing individually, and not of the assets of the firm; that the copartnership was never dissolved; that the plaintiff does not represent the interest of Lindsley in the claim sought to be recovered in this suit; and that Lindsley has an interest in it, which did not pass to the plaintiff. It is apparent, from the evidence, that the firm was regarded as dissolved by all parties concerned, by Kintzing, by Lindsley, and by the creditors, including the defendants, and that the assets and effects of the firm were regarded as being put into Kintzing's hands, in trust, to settle up the business, as the appointee of the creditors, and pay the compromise notes. Kintzing passed into the hands of the state assignee all that was left of such assets, as being part of the estate of Kintzing. From the state assignee they passed to the plaintiff, as the assignee of Kintzing, as part of the estate of Kintzing.

But, there is another view of the matter. The composition deed does not appear to have been assented to in any manner by Lindsley. He is not named in it, nor was he, so far as appears, a party to it, potentially. The deed is made between "Charles S. Kintzing & Co." and his creditors. There does not seem to have been any authority, so far as Lindsley was concerned, to sign the firm name to the compromise notes, so as to bind him by them. The compromise notes, therefore, signed by Kintzing with the firm name, were the individual notes of Kintzing. Having given them, he was to have the assets to administer, with which to pay them. This was the view of the creditors and of the bankruptcy court. The petition states, that the petitioners are creditors of Kintzing, a member of the late firm, and that his debts to them are two of these six months' compromise notes, signed in the name of Charles S. Kintzing & Co., but given by Kintzing, and that he committed all of the alleged acts of bankruptcy, one among them being the preferential payment by him to the defendants, as creditors of his, of the moneys before mentioned; and the prayer of the petition is, that Kintzing, so doing business as Charles S. Kintzing & Co., may be declared bankrupt. The defendants, as before shown, having really accepted the compromise notes, and received the fifty per cent. as a discount of those notes, and those notes, as well as all the other compromise notes, being really only the individual notes of Kintzing, and it appearing that the moneys paid to the defendants were paid by Kintzing out of the general funds of Kintzing, it follows, that, although those funds may have been, in part, the proceeds of the assets of the former firm, and although it may appear, on a calculation, that Kintzing was a debtor to such former firm, in respect of the assets he received and converted into money, to an amount sufficient to cover the payments to the defendants, yet the claim sought to be recovered in this suit is a claim belonging to the estate of Kintzing and recoverable by the plaintiff, as his assignee. How the plaintiff shall distribute the amount of the recovery, under the direction of the bankruptcy court, as between persons who were creditors of the former firm, (including those who received and those who did not receive compromise notes,) and persons who, though creditors of Kintzing, were never creditors of the former firm, is a question not involved in this suit.

There must be a decree for the plaintiff, for the several amounts of money paid to the defendants, with interest, and costs.

[NOTE. On defendants' appeal to the supreme court, this decree was reversed, upon the ground that the assignee of the senior partner had no such title as would enable him to call third parties to account for partnership property. In speaking for the court, Mr. Justice Clifford said:

["Money paid under such circumstances, if it can be recovered back at all, must be claimed by the partnership in whose behalf it was paid, or by an assignee duly appointed to administer the joint estate, as it is quite clear that neither an individual partner nor his assignee can call the party to whom such a payment has been made to an account for such a payment, any more than he could for any other debt due to the copartnership. If liable in fact, a voluntary payment to the appellee would not discharge the obligation, as the liability, if it exists, is to another party; nor would a judgment in this case, even if satisfied, be a bar to a subsequent suit in the name of the partnership or their duly appointed assignees.

["Two principal suggestions are made in support of the theory set up by the appellants: (1) That all the parties concerned in the attempt to effect a compromise between the debtors and their creditors proceeded as if the copartnership had previously been dissolved, and as if the assets and effects of the debtor firm had been placed in the hands of the senior partner in trust to settle up the affairs of the debtors with their creditors, and to pay the compromise notes. (2) That the other partner never assented to the compromise agreement, nor was he, in fact, a party to the final arrangement, and that the copartnership name was signed to the compromise agreement and to the notes without his authority.

["Issuable matters are certainly involved in those propositions, but, suppose they are fully proved, they are not sufficient to show that the other partner ever conveyed his interest in the assets and effects of the copartnership to the bankrupt partner, or that he ceased to be a joint owner of the same when the estate of the bankrupt partner was assigned and conveyed to the complainant below, as his assignee. Harrison v. Sterry, 5 Cranch, (9 U. S.) 302. Nothing is exhibited in the record to warrant the conclusion that the copartnership was ever in fact dissolved before the decree in bankruptcy against the senior partner, and, as the compromise notes were given in the name of the copartnership, the other partner remained liable for their payment."

[The case was remanded to the circuit court, with directions to dismiss the bill of complaint. Amsinck v. Bean, 22 Wall. (89 U. S.) 395.

[For other cases involving this bankruptcy, see Bean v. Brookmire, Cases Nos. 1,168–1,170; Bean v. Laflin, Case No. 1,172; Brookmire v. Bean, Id. 1,942; Kinsing's Assignee v. Bartholew, Id. 7,831; In re Kintzing, Id. 7,833.]

Case No. 1,168.

BEAN v. BROOKMIRE et al.

[1 Dill. 25;[1] 4 N. B. R. 196, (Quarto, 57;) 10 Am. Law Reg. (N. S.) 181; 4 West. Jur. 392.]

Circuit Court, D. Missouri. 1870.

BANKRUPT ACT—LIMITATION—THIRTY-FIFTH SECTION CONSTRUED.

1. The two clauses of the 35th section of the bankrupt act [of March 2, 1867, (14 Stat. 534,)] apply to transfers to two different classes of persons dealing with the bankrupt. The first clause applies to a creditor or a person having a claim against the bankrupt, or who is under a liability for him and who receives the money or property by way of preference; and the second clause applies to the purchase of property of the bankrupt by any person who has no claim against him and is under no liability for him.

[Cited in Ex parte Mendell, Case No. 9,418; Darby v. Boatman's Sav. Inst., Id. 3,571; Re Dow, Id. 4,036; Hall v. Hayner, Id. 5,933; Harvey v. Crane, Id. 6,178; Collins v. Gray, Id. 3,013; Coggeshall v. Potter, Id. 2,955; Gibson v. Warden, 14 Wall. (81 U. S.) 249; Bean v. Amsinck, Case No. 1,167; Bean v. Brookmire, Id. 1,170; Anibal v. Heacock, 2 Fed. 171; Matthews v. Westphal, 48 Fed. 665.]

2. The four and six months limitations in the 35th section of the bankrupt act considered; and it is held that where the transaction by the insolvent is with a creditor, the four months limitation applies, but where the transaction is with a general purchaser the six months limitation governs.

[Cited in Bean v. Brookmire, Case No. 1,169; Ex parte Mendell, Id. 9,418; Darby v. Boatman's Sav. Inst., Id. 3,571; Re Dow, Id. 4,036; Hall v. Hayner, Id. 5,933; Harvey v. Crane, Id. 6,178; Collins v. Gray, Id. 3,013; Coggeshall v. Potter, Id. 2,955; Gibson v. Warden, 14 Wall. (81 U. S.) 249; Bean v. Amsinck, Case No. 1,167; Bean v. Brookmire, Id. 1,170; Re Bousfield & Poole Manuf'g Co., Id. 1,703; Re Foster, Id. 4,964; Anibal v. Heacock, 2 Fed. 171; Matthews v. Westphal, 48 Fed. 665.]

3. Accordingly, where in an action by the assignee under the 35th section of the act the declaration alleged a payment by the bankrupt to the defendants, in liquidation of an existing debt and to have been made to them as creditors of the bankrupt, with intent to give a preference; and alleging that this was done within six months, but not within four months of the filing of the petition under which the bankruptcy was established, it was held to be demurrable.

[Cited in Bean v. Brookmire, Case No. 1,169; Harvey v. Crane, Id. 6,178; Collins v. Gray, Id. 3,013.]

4. All illegal or fraudulent transactions which are so by the common law, by the statute law, or by rules of law, other than the special limitations in the 35th section of the bankrupt act are governed by the limitation of two years upon the assignee in bringing the suit. (Arguendo per Miller, Circuit Justice.)

5. Purpose and policy of the bankrupt act stated by Miller, Circuit Justice.

[Cited in Darby v. Boatman's Sav. Inst., Case No. 3,571; Re Scott, Id. 12,518.]

[Error to the district court of the United States for the eastern district of Missouri.]

At law. This was an action, by [William C. Bean] the assignee in bankruptcy of Charles S. Kintzing, brought under the 35th section of the bankrupt act to recover of the defendants [Brookmire and others] the value of certain property alleged to have been conveyed by the bankrupt to them, in fraud of the bankrupt law.

The district court (TREAT, District Judge,) sustained demurrers to the declaration, [unreported,] and the cause came into the circuit court on a writ of error. [Affirmed.] The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion of the court.

Edmund T. Allen, for plaintiff.

George M. Stewart, for defendants.

Before MILLER, Circuit Justice, and KREKEL, District Judge.

MILLER, Circuit Justice. This case comes before us on a writ of error to the district court for the eastern district.

The plaintiff in error brings his suit to recover as assignee of the bankrupt the sum of $1,436.00 paid to the defendants within six months, but not within four months of the filing of the petition under which the bankruptcy was established. The declaration contains two counts intended to cover the two clauses of the thirty-fifth section of the bankrupt law, in one of which the transaction is described as a payment in liquidation of an existing debt, and in the other it is alleged to have been made to defendants as creditors of the bankrupt with intent to give a preference. In both counts, the insolvency of the bankrupt at time of the transaction is alleged, and also the knowledge or notice of that fact on the part of defendants, and that it was within six months of the filing of the petition in bankruptcy.

Demurrers were filed to both counts by defendants which were sustained by the district court, and this ruling is the error assigned here. The determination of the question here presented necessarily involves a construction of the section of the bankrupt act just referred to, or rather the first two clauses of it, which are in the following words: "And be it further enacted, that if any person, being insolvent, or in contemplation of insolvency, within four months before the filing of the petition by or against him, with a view to give a preference to any creditor or person having a claim against him, or who is under any liability for him, procures any part of his property to be attached, sequestered, or seized on execution, or makes any payment, pledge, assignment, transfer, or conveyance of any part of his property, either directly or indirectly, absolutely or conditionally, the person receiving such payment, pledge, assignment, transfer, or conveyance, or to be benefitted thereby, or by such attachment, having reasonable cause to believe such person is insolvent, and that such attachment, payment, pledge, assignment, or conveyance is made in fraud of the provisions of this act, the same shall be void, and the assignee may recover the property, or the value of it, from the person so receiving it, or so to be benefitted; and if any person being insolvent, or in contemplation of insolvency or bankruptcy, within six months before the filing of the petition by or against him, makes any payment, sale, assignment, transfer, conveyance, or other disposition of any part of his property to any person who then has reasonable cause to believe him to be insolvent, or to be acting in contemplation of insolvency, and that such payment, sale, assignment, transfer, or other conveyance is made with a view to prevent his property from coming to his assignee in bankruptcy, or to prevent the same from being distributed under this act, or to defeat the object of, or in any way impair, hinder, impede, or delay the operation and effect of, or to evade any of the provisions of this act, the sale, assignment, transfer, or conveyance shall be void, and the assignee may recover the property, or the value thereof, as assets of the bankrupt. And if such sale, assignment, transfer, or conveyance is not made in the usual and ordinary course of business of the debtor, the fact shall be prima facie evidence of fraud."

[1] [Reported by Hon. John F. Dillon, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

And I commence the examination into the true meaning of the section in its application to the question before me, by affirming what I am told was held in this same court at the last term, namely: that the two clauses differ mainly in their application to two different classes of recipients of the bankrupt's property or means. That is to say, that the first clause is limited to a creditor or person having a claim against the bankrupt, or who is under any liability for him, and who receives the money or property by way of preference; and the second clause applies to the purchase of property of the bankrupt by any person who has no claim against him and is under no liability for him. That the first clause is confined to persons of that character, cannot well be doubted, since the acts therein mentioned are acts done with persons of that character, and must be done with a view to giving such a person a preference over others of the same class. That the second clause has reference to another class of persons and is governed by other rules, seems to be strongly sustained by these considerations:

1. The sale or other transfer of property mentioned in it need not be in preference of a creditor or person liable for the bankrupt, to make it void.

2. It need not be made to a person of that character.

3. In the first clause the transfer may still be valid though within all the other conditions of the clause, if made more than four months before the filing of a petition in bankruptcy, while the transfer described in the second clause requires that it shall have been made more than six months before the filing of the petition, to have the same effect.

These are sufficient reasons to justify our conviction that the two clauses apply to transfers to two different classes of persons dealing with the bankrupt.

It is objected to this view that in the second clause payment is one of the acts described, as well as in the first, and that the word necessarily implies a transaction between debtor and creditor.

The force of this objection is fully met by the language of that part of the section which makes void the acts against which it is directed, and which, while declaring that such "sale, assignment, transfer, or conveyance shall be void, and the assignee may recover the property, or the value thereof," omits to make any such provision as to payment, while in the invalidating language of the first clause, that is the first word used.

The word "payment" may have been used in the second clause inadvertently, or in a loose sense to include some consideration advanced by the insolvent in some one of the transactions otherwise forbidden; but, however it came to be used, it is quite certain that it is intentionally omitted where the transactions are mentioned which are declared to be void.

The payment described in both counts of this declaration is not one covered by the second clause of the section. It is a payment of money to a creditor on account of an existing debt, and is a preference within the meaning of the law. It is clearly one of the transactions described in and forbidden by the first clause, and therefore not included within the second. We need, therefore, inquire no further concerning its relation to the latter.

In regard to the first clause, both counts would be good under that, if they contained the averment, that the transaction described took place within four months before the filing of the petition in bankruptcy. But this allegation cannot truthfully be made, and the principal question in this case is whether that is necessary to make the count good.

The language of the section is, that if any person being insolvent, or in contemplation of insolvency, within four months of the filing of the petition by or against him, with a view to give the creditor a preference by any of the acts therein mentioned, the act shall be void, and the assignee may recover the property from the person receiving it, if such person had reasonable cause to believe the party insolvent. It is very certain that the act described is not made void by this clause, or by any clause in this section, unless it was done within four months of the filing of a petition by or against the bankrupt, and it is as strong an instance as can well grow out of a negative pregnant, that no such act is void for any of the causes there mentioned that was done within the four months.

In opposition to this view of the subject, it is earnestly contended that one of the clauses of the thirty-ninth section of the act describes pretty nearly in the same language the acts mentioned in the thirty-fifth section, and concludes that section with the declaration that if the person doing such acts shall be declared bankrupt, the assignee may recover the property transferred contrary to the provisions of the statute, making no restrictions as to time; and that the two sections can only be reconciled in this regard, by holding that the special provisions of section thirty-five are to be taken as a rule of evidence, not imperative, but prima facie, that the transaction was fraudulent, if within the period therein mentioned.

Having thus stated the opposite opinions of this thirty-fifth section, maintained by counsel, I do not know that I can do better than to state my own views of the policy which governed congress in its adoption.

The acts mentioned in the section are not such as were forbidden by the common law, or generally by the statutes of the states. Nor are they acts which, in their essential nature, are immoral or dishonest. For a man who is insolvent, or approaching insolvency, to pay a just debt, is not morally wrong, nor was it forbidden by any law in this country previous to the bankrupt act. And though a preference of creditors by transfer or assignment of property by an insolvent, may sometimes be unjust to the other creditors, it was not forbidden by the common law, and is not forbidden by many of the states.

It is very certain that such a preference may consist with the highest obligations of morality, and under circumstances which any one can imagine it may be the dictate of the purest justice in reference to all concerned. The careful and diligent framers of the bankrupt act were fully aware of all that has just been said.

But they were about to frame a system of laws, one main feature of which was to provide for the distribution of the property of an insolvent debtor among his creditors, and they adopted wisely, as the general and pervading rule of distribution, equality among creditors. But they found that this general principle could not without hardship be made of universal application. When a creditor had obtained by fair means a lien on any property of the bankrupt, that lien ought to be respected. If he had so obtained payment of the whole or a part of his debt, the payment ought to stand. These exceptions to the general rule of distribution were however liable to be abused, and might be used to defeat the purposes of the bankrupt law. The bankrupt, knowing that he must soon be helpless, would desire to pay or secure favorite creditors. They knowing his inability to pay, and his liability to be called into a bankrupt court, would naturally desire to secure themselves at the expense of other creditors.

In this dilemma, congress said we cannot prescribe any rule by which a preference would be held to be morally right or wrong; and it would be fatal to the administration of the law of distribution to permit such a question to be raised. We will therefore adopt a conventional rule to determine the validity of these preferences.

In all cases where an insolvent pays or secures a creditor to the exclusion of others, and that creditor is aware that he is so when he receives it, he shall run the risk of the debtor's continuance in business for four months. If the law which requires equal distribution, is not called into action for four months, the transaction, if otherwise honest, shall stand; but if by the debtor himself, or any of his creditors, that law is invoked within four months, the transaction shall not stand, but the money or property received by the party shall become a part of the common fund for distribution.

Congress in this view seems also to have thought that in case of a creditor who had already parted with his money or property to the insolvent party, and whose reasons for such further dealing with him were more pressing, that he might be saved from an impending loss, the time which should secure the transaction from the effect of the bankrupt law should be less by two months, than in the case of one who, having no such incentive to action, became a volunteer purchaser of an insolvent's property, with knowledge of his insolvency.

It is in a similar spirit that the provision in section twenty-three, which forbids a person accepting such a preference, from sharing in the assets of the bankrupt, uses the qualifying phrase, "until he shall first have surrendered to the assignee all that he had received under such preference."

I do not see any necessary contradiction between section thirty-nine and this view of section thirty-five. The former is a very long one, and recites all the acts which subject a person to involuntary bankruptcy, and that is the main purpose of the section. Among the acts which constitute a man a bankrupt, are those of giving preference to creditors in contemplation of bankruptcy. And it is in conclusion of that section declared in general terms, that if the debtor shall subsequently be declared a bankrupt, his assignee may recover the money or other property which was the subject of the act of bankruptcy. But this general declaration of the right of the assignee to recover is not inconsistent with the limitation of the right in another section, to cases occurring within six and four months of the commencement of the bankrupt proceedings. The general declaration of a state statute, that a person shall recover land by an action of ejectment, is not inconsistent with the provision in the statute of limitations that such actions must be brought within ten years after they have accrued. Nor is it inconsistent with the still more comprehensive right of suit conferred on the assignee by the fourteenth section of the act.

The thirty-fifth section and the thirty-ninth section, having for the first time set up a rule by which certain payments and transfers of property shall be declared void (a rule at variance with the common law, and with the statutes of the states), very properly limits and defines the circumstances within which this new rule shall operate. These are, among others, that the recipient of the bankrupt's money or property must have had reasonable cause to believe he was insolvent, and that the transaction must have been recent when the bankrupt law was applied to the case,—with a creditor within four months and with the general purchaser within six months.

As to all illegal or fraudulent transactions which are so by common law, by statute law, or by any other recognized rule of law, other than these special provisions of the bankrupt law, that act has imposed the limitation of two years on the assignee in bringing his suit, and by that they are governed. But the case made by the plaintiff does not come within any such law known to us. Therefore, his declaration is bad, and the demurrer was properly sustained by the district court, whose judgment is affirmed.

Affirmed.

NOTE, [from original report.] Bankrupt Act —Construction of 35th Section, as to Limitations and Preferences. Affirmed, Gibson v. Warden, 14 Wall. [81 U. S.] 249. Followed, Maurer v. Frantz, [8 Phila. 505;] In re Dow, [Case No. 4,036;] Collins v. Gray, [Id. 3,013;] Anibal v. Heacock, 2 Fed. 171, 173; Coggeshall v. Potter, [Case No. 2,955;] Matthews v. Westphal, [48 Fed. 664;] Bean v. Brookmire, [Case No. 1,169.] Cited in Re Scott, [Id. 12,518;] Darby's Trustee v. Boatman's Sav. Inst., [Id. 3,571;] Bean v. Brookmire, [Id. 1,170;] Harvey v. Crane, [Id. 6,178;] Jordan v. Downey, 40 Md. 413. Doubted, Ex parte Mendell, (In re Butler,) [Case No. 9,418.]

[For other cases involving this bankruptcy, see Bean v. Amsinck, Case No. 1,167; Bean v. Brookmire, Cases Nos. 1,169 and 1,170; Bean v. Laflin, Case No. 1,172; Brookmire v. Bean, Id. 1,942; Kinsing's Assignee v. Bartholew, Id. 7,831; In re Kintzing, Id. 7,833.]

Case No. 1,169.

BEAN v. BROOKMIRE et al.

[1 Dill. 151;[1] 3 Chi. Leg. News, 378; 1 Leg. Op. 178; 5 West. Jur. 505.]

Circuit Court, D. Missouri. April Term, 1871.

BANKRUPTCY—RIGHTS WHICH PASS TO ASSIGNEE—JURISDICTION IN EQUITY, ETC.

1. The assignee in bankruptcy may recover money fraudulently paid by the bankrupt to the defendants in order to obtain their signature to a composition agreement.

[Cited in Bean v. Brookmire, Case No. 1,067.]

2. Equity will entertain such a bill by the assignee, although he might have maintained an action at law.

[Cited in Bean v. Brookmire, Case No. 1,170. Cited generally in Brookmire v. Bean, Id. 1,942.]

[1] [Reported by Hon. John F. Dillon, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

In equity. After the decision of this court in the cause reported above, [Case No. 1,168,] the assignee [William C. Bean] brought the present bill, in the district court for the eastern district of Missouri, to recover money alleged to have been fraudulently paid by the bankrupt to the defendants, [Brookmire and others.] The district court sustained the demurrer to the bill on the ground that no recovery could be had in equity, and that the remedy was exclusively at law, [unreported.] The assignee appeals. [Reversed. A decree was afterwards rendered for the assignee, and affirmed by this court. Bean v. Brookmire, Case No. 1,170.]

The necessary facts appear in the opinion of the court.

Edmund T. Allen, for assignee.

Stewart & Slayback, for respondents.

Before DILLON, Circuit Judge, and KREKEL, District Judge.

KREKEL, District Judge. This is a bill by the assignee of the bankrupt to recover of defendants fourteen hundred and thirty-six dollars, alleged to have been fraudulently paid by Kintzing, the bankrupt, to Brookmire & Rankin, the defendants, in order to obtain their consent and signature to a composition deed entered into by the creditors of Kintzing & Co., prior to the adjudication in bankruptcy against the said Charles S. Kintzing.

The defendants filed their demurrer, and for cause assign that complainant has no interest in the subject-matter of the bill, and want of equity.

The court below sustained the demurrer, on the ground that full and complete remedy exists at law, and that the action does not lie in equity.

The bill alleges that Charles S. Kintzing and Malcolm A. Lindsley were merchants doing business under the name and style of Charles S. Kintzing & Co.; and becoming insolvent, on the 15th day of February, 1859, applied to their creditors, among them defendants Brookmire and Rankin, for a compromise, and on the same day entered into a composition agreement with them, agreeing on their part to pay seventy cents on the dollar, in six, twelve, and eighteen months; that one of the conditions of said compromise was that the same should not be binding unless signed by all the creditors; that afterwards, on the 27th day of February, 1869, the said partnership of Charles S. Kintzing & Co. was dissolved by the withdrawal of Lindsley, who at the time was largely indebted to the firm. The bill charges that the consent and signature of said Brookmire & Rankin were obtained by Charles S. Kintzing, the bankrupt, conniving with the said Brookmire & Rankin to deceive and defraud the creditors of said Kintzing & Co., who had bona fide entered into this compromise; and that said bankrupt fraudulently paid, and the said Brookmire & Rankin, well knowing the deception and fraud to be practiced, and participating therein, received the sum of fourteen hundred and thirty-six dollars, now sought to be recovered.

In support of the first ground of demurrer, that the complainant has no interest in the subject-matter of the bill, it is argued that no provision of the bankrupt law, either directly or by implication, passes any title or interest in the subject-matter of this suit to the assignee, and the 14th and 35th sections of the act [of 1867, (14 Stat. 522, 534,)] are commented on by counsel. The former section, among other provisions has the following:—

"That the register shall, by an instrument under his hand, assign and convey to the assignee all the estate, real and personal, of the bankrupt; * * * and thereupon, by operation of law, the title to all such property and estate, both real and personal, shall vest in the assignee. * * * all rights in equity, choses in action. * * * And all his rights of action for property or estate, real or personal, shall in virtue of the adjudication in bankruptcy and the appointment of his assignee, be at once vested in such assignee."

The terms used in the foregoing extracts have a definite signification, and embrace all rights and estate a man may own or possess, without limitation or qualification, and seem to have been used on account of their well ascertained meaning, both in law and in common acceptation. The provisions cited, thus defined, are by the court deemed sufficient to vest in the assignee whatever of interest the bankrupt had in the premises.

It is next said that the bankrupt had no interest which could pass to his assignee; that the payment made to Brookmire & Rankin by the bankrupt was that of a just debt, which they had a right to receive. It is true that if such a payment had been made and received bona fide, and not attacked under the four months clause of the 35th section, no recovery could have been had, as was decided in this court by Justice Miller, in a case against these defendants at a former term. [Bean v. Brookmire, Case No. 1,168.] Can a payment made and accepted for the purpose, and with the intent to deceive and defraud unsuspecting creditors, as charged in the bill, be said to be made bona fide? Numerous authorities might be cited establishing that a compromise entered into under such circumstances avoids the composition deed, and that the creditors are not bound thereby; nor are authorities wanting to show that the law will not allow the enforcement of any obligations given to secure a preference. O'Shea v. Collier White Lead & Oil Co., 42 Mo. 397.

It is true the courts were slow in coming to the conclusion to interfere between the parties to the fraud, even when invoked to do so. They commenced, however, by permitting inquiry into usurious transactions, and upon close examination did not fail to see that the relations in which the lender and borrower stood to each other differed. The case of Darby v. Boatman's Sav. Inst., decided at this term, recognizes this distinction. [Case No. 3,571.]

The reasons on which this class of cases proceeds are of easy application in the cause now before the court. The bankrupt was seeking to compromise with his creditors, all of whom were to join, in order to bind them. Brookmire & Rankin refused unless they could obtain a preference, and having obtained it, pretended to come into the composition with other creditors on equal terms, when they had, in fact, by their preference, abstracted a share of the property to which the honest, confiding creditors, looked for the ultimate satisfaction of their claims. Under such circumstances the courts have finally held it to be the better policy to allow the debtor, though a participant in the fraud, to recover the amount paid. Atkinson v. Denby, 6 Hurl. & N. 778, 7 Hurl. & N. 934; Mare v. Sandford, 1 Giff. 295.

Such a recovery does not, however, interfere with the right of the creditors to seek satisfaction from those who have deceived and defrauded them.

A more serious question arises, and one about which the courts have differed, whether a recovery can be had in equity in a case such as is before us, the complainant having, as held by the court below, a complete remedy at law. Courts of chancery seem originally to have had exclusive jurisdiction of fraud, oppression, and deceit, but in time law courts also took cognizance thereof. While it may be admitted that the complainant might maintain an action at law, it does not therefore follow that this court, as a court of equity, is ousted of its jurisdiction. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. (10th Ed.) § 64i; Darby v. Boatman's Sav. Inst. supra, and authorities cited. The jurisdiction of law and equity in cases of fraud of this character is concurrent, at all events it exists in equity. The acts charged are oppressive and wrongful as against the debtor, and operate as a fraud upon the other creditors, and upon the bankrupt act.

The case being before us on the equity side of the court, and having, under the views entertained, power to grant the relief sought, we will reverse the order of the court below, and remand the case for further proceedings therein.

Reversed.

[NOTE. For other cases involving this bankruptcy, see Bean v. Amsinck, Case No. 1,167; Bean v. Brookmire, Id. 1,168; Id. 1,170; Bean v. Laflin, Id. 1,172; Brookmire v. Bean, Id. 1,942; Kinsing's Assignee v. Bartholew, Id. 7,831; In re Kintzing, Id. 7,833.]

Case No. 1,170.

BEAN v. BROOKMIRE et al.

[2 Dill. 108;[1] 7 N. B. R. 568; 5 Chi. Leg. News, 314; 2 Am. Law Rec. 222; 6 Am. Law T. Rep. 418; 7 West. Jur. 324.]

Circuit Court, E. D. Missouri, 1873.

BANKRUPTCY—COMPOSITION DEEDS—SECRET PREFERENCES—RECOVERY BACK OF MONEY PAID BY WAY OF ILLEGAL PREFERENCE.

1. Parties who sign composition deeds must do so in good faith.

[Cited in Brookmire v. Bean, Case No. 1,942; Fairbanks v. Amoskeag Nat. Bank, 38 Fed. 634.]

2. Secret preferences paid as inducements to obtain signatures of creditors to composition deeds, can be recovered by the debtor himself, or by injured creditors, or by an assignee in bankruptcy, who represents both debtor and creditor.

[Cited in Brookmire v. Bean, Case No. 1,942.]

3. Such recovery may be at law or in equity.

4. It is no defense to such an action that the composition deed was invalid, because not signed by all the creditors, pursuant to its terms, it appearing that the greater part of the creditors believed that the composition had been signed by all the creditors in good faith.

[Cited in Brookmire v. Bean, Case No. 1,942.]

In equity. This cause was before the court on a former appeal. Bean v. Brookmire, [Case No. 1,169.] After it was remanded, an answer and replication were filed, testimony was taken, the cause heard on its merits, and a decree entered in favor of the assignee [William C. Bean] for the sum of $1,436.02 and interest against the defendants Brookmire & Rankin. The bill was dismissed as to Laflin. To reverse the decree against them, Brookmire & Rankin now bring the cause here by appeal. [Affirmed.]

The plaintiff is the assignee in bankruptcy of Charles S. Kintzing, who was the successor of the firm of Charles S. Kintzing & Co., wholesale grocery merchants in St. Louis. Kintzing & Co. were largely indebted, and being unable to go on with their business, they called, on the 15th day of February, 1869, a meeting of their creditors. Many of their local and some of their non-resident creditors were represented at this meeting, but a large number of creditors was not present. An exhibit of their affairs was made showing liabilities to the amount of $179,299.54, and assets, nominally, to the amount of $204,602.80, which last sum included $51,704.50 of suspended debts, and $65,386.69 due from "the Montana branch."

Kintzing, acting for Kintzing & Co., proposed to pay their creditors seventy cents on the dollar in six, twelve, and eighteen months, and to give notes for the installments; and a composition agreement in the usual form was prepared accordingly, dated February 15, 1869.

This agreement, after providing that upon the payment of the notes given in settlement the firm should be released from all liability, contained the following: "We have entered into this compromise with the said firm of Charles S. Kintzing & Co., after hearing and seeing a statement of their books, assets, and effects, and find that it is the best, in our judgment, that can be done for the interest of all concerned. And further, that we have full confidence in the integrity of Charles S. Kintzing, and his ability to settle up the business better than any one we could appoint; but it is further expressly agreed and understood that this composition is not to be binding upon any one, unless agreed to and signed by all of the creditors of the said firm. In witness whereof, we have hereunto set our respective names, and desire the co-operation of all of the creditors with us in this compromise."

A question growing out of this agreement was before this court in Kintzing's Assignee v. Bartholew, [Case No. 7,831.] Creditors whose claims amounted to $153,558.21 ultimately signed the agreement; but creditors, over thirty in number, whose claims, mostly small, in the aggregate amounted to $2,313.53, never signed it. The last name appearing to the agreement was that of the firm of L. E. Amsinck & Co., of New York, creditors to the amount of $32,551.65. The circumstances under which they signed it appear in the case of Bean v. Amsinck, recently (January, 1873) decided in the United States circuit court for the southern district of New York. [Case No. 1,167.]

Kintzing & Co. were indebted to the defendants, Brookmire & Rankin, merchants residing also in St. Louis, upon a promissory note for $1,436.02, dated January 4, 1869, and payable thirty days from its date.

Brookmire & Rankin refused to attend the meeting of the creditors on the 15th day of February, and declined to join in the proposed compromise, but, on the contrary, had commenced suit on their note in the state court to recover the amount thereof from Kintzing & Co. This suit was pending at the time the negotiations for a compromise were going on. A committee of creditors waited on them to induce them to unite with the rest, but they refused, saying that they had no confidence in Kintzing, and that they thought they could collect the whole amount of their debt.

The next to the last name appearing to be signed to the composition agreement is that of the firm of Brookmire & Rankin, purporting to be creditors of Kintzing & Co. for $1,436.02. The defendants' names were affixed to the agreement by Sylvester H. Laflin, on the 17th day of March, 1869, under the circumstances stated in the opinion of the court.

On the same day (March 17), Kintzing enclosed compromise notes to various non-resident creditors representing that his articles of compromise had been completed. The compromise notes matured on the 18th day of August. Kintzing made a voluntary assignment, under the state law, and on the 17th day of September, 1869, was proceeded against in bankruptcy, and such proceedings were had that the plaintiff was appointed his assignee.

[1] [Reported by Hon. John F. Dillon, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

The present suit is brought to recover of the defendants the $1,436.02 paid to them on the 17th day of March, with interest. The substantial nature of the bill is stated in [Bean v. Brookmire, Cases Nos. 1,168 and 1,169.] The answer admits the payment, but denies the imputed fraud and all liability to account for or return the money. As before stated, the court entered a decree for the assignee, and the defendants, Brookmire & Rankin, appeal. No appeal is taken from that part of the decree dismissing the bill as to Laflin.

Edmund T. Allen, for appellee.
G. M. Stewart, for appellants.

DILLON, Circuit Judge. Kintzing was embarrassed, and on the 15th day of February, 1869, called a meeting of his creditors at his place of business in St. Louis. The defendants refused to attend. The creditors present, after an exhibit of his affairs, agreed to the proposal to take seventy cents on the dollar in notes at six, twelve, and eighteen months, without interest, and a composition article to that effect was drawn up. This was to be signed by all his creditors, and contemplated placing all upon an equal footing. This appears upon its face.

By the middle of March following this agreement had been signed by the great bulk of the creditors in number and amount. Those who had not signed it were the defendants; also, Amsinck & Co., who were creditors for over $32,000; Bartholew, Lewis, & Co. (defendants' local bankers) [Bean v. Brookmire, Case No. 1,169,] and sundry small creditors, over thirty in number, and whose claims in the aggregate amounted to something over $2,000.

It was known generally to the creditors in St. Louis that the defendants had not acceded to the compromise proposed, and that they declined to do so. The defendants had, indeed, made known their refusal to a delegation of creditors who had waited upon them and urged their concurrence. Not only had they thus refused, but they had a suit upon their note pending against Kintzing & Co. in the local courts. Kintzing found that the claim of the defendants stood in the way of completing the desired arrangements, and that the defendants must in some way be satisfied, or their names procured to the composition agreement. He pursued this course: He procured from Bartholew, Lewis, & Co., or drew upon his account at the bank, the full amount of the defendants' note, placed the money thus obtained in a package and left it at the bank, with directions to deliver it to Sylvester H. Laflin. He then requested Laflin (a friend of his, and a distant relative of Brookmire's) to act for him in negotiating with the defendants. He directed Laflin to call upon Bartholew, Lewis, & Co. for a package of money, and then go to the defendants and do the best he could with them. On the 17th day of March, 1869, Laflin accordingly obtained from Bartholew, Lewis, & Co. the package of money Kintzing had provided for him; he went at once to the defendants' store; said he had called to pay or take up the Kintzing note; was informed it was at the court house, and then requested that it be sent for, which was done. The note being produced, he made an appeal to the defendants to throw off part of their demand, saying (according to the weight of testimony) that the money had been raised by himself and Kintzing's friends, or by the latter, to help him through, and he wanted the defendants to make it as easy as possible. There is no evidence that this statement is true in point of fact, and Laflin denies that he stated that he had contributed to raise the money. Upon the proofs we find that the money was Kintzing's, and that no part of it had been furnished by any one else. Defendants refused to make any substantial deduction, but at length threw off one month's interest and agreed to pay the costs of court. The money was handed by Laflin to the defendants and counted by their book-keeper, who made an entry at the time in the books of the defendants to the effect that the note had been "sold" to S. H. Laflin.

As to what occurred at this time there is among the witnesses on some points much forgetfulness and conflict. But certain it is that when the note was finally delivered to Laflin (which was at the time he paid the money) it contained this material indorsement made upon it at Laflin's request by Rankin, one of the defendants: "We authorize S. H. Laflin to sign for us. Brookmire & Rankin."

The court is obliged to find upon the evidence, and does find, that this referred to the composition agreement, and that it authorized Laflin to sign that for the defendants. With this indorsement upon the note it was delivered to Laflin, who, upon the same day, took it to Kintzing and signed the composition agreement, with the words, "Brookmire & Rankin, $1,436.02," without indicating on the paper that it was signed by him as their agent.

Just underneath the name of the defendants appears the name of the firm of Amsinck & Co., signed by F. A. Reuss & Co. as their attorneys, for the sum of $32,550.65. These two were the last signatures ever procured to the agreement. On the same day, March 17, Kintzing wrote various non-resident creditors to the effect that his compromise was "completed," and enclosed notes pursuant to the composition agreement. The creditors received these notes in settlement, and Kintzing continued in business without interruption or disturbance for the next six months. His failure to meet any of his compromise paper called attention to his affairs, and the result was an assignment, and, subsequently, proceedings in bankruptcy against him.

It is a fair deduction from the testimony, that the creditors generally, in good faith, supposed the compromise had been fully completed, and were not aware that a portion had never signed it, nor were they aware of the circumstances under which the defendants and a few others had received the full amount of their debts, or of any fact which made the composition invalid. During these six months Kintzing seems to have wasted or squandered the assets, and very greatly impaired his ability to pay his debts. None of the composition notes were ever paid.

Under the circumstances, the question is, Are the defendants liable to the assignee in respect to the money so paid to them by the bankrupt through the agency of Laflin?

And first, as to the form of the action. We decided on the former appeal—1 Dill. 151 [Bean v. Brookmire, Case No. 1,169]—that equity had jurisdiction, although it might be true that the assignee could have sued at law. Upon the authorities there can be no doubt of the correctness of this view, and the point need not further be discussed. Adams, Eq. 180; Mare v. Sandford, 1 Giff. 295; Jackman v. Mitchell, 13 Ves. 581; Cockshott v. Bennett, 2 Term R. 763; Constantein v. Blache, 1 Cox, Ch. 287.

Next, as to the merits of the cause. The defendants made the endorsement on the note: "We authorize S. H. Laflin to sign for us," and it was under authority thus given that he signed their name to the composition agreement. The evidence favors the view that the defendants at first objected to making this indorsement, and finally did it without much reflection, and upon Laflin's assurance that it would be all right and he would answer that the note should never come back or give them any further trouble. They did not seek Laflin or Kintzing, but were standing aloof from the proposed arrangement for a compromise and pursuing their own remedy against their debtor. True, the circumstances of the debtor were such that they could not obtain payment under a judgment against him which would not be liable to be defeated by the bankrupt act; still we have felt that their passive conduct in this matter hardly deserves the warm indignation which it has called forth from the assignee's counsel.

A creditor is not bound to accede to a compromise, nor is he legally censurable merely because he refuses to unite with others; nor is he morally censurable if his refusal proceeds from a want of confidence in the debtor. And this seems to have been the case of the defendants; and if they had received the money in payment of their note, not knowing it was Kintzing's, and believing it to be that of his friends, and had merely surrendered the note, perhaps they could have retained it, or, though knowing it was Kintzing's, they could not be made to refund it, if he was not thrown into bankruptcy within four months thereafter. Bean v. Brookmire, [Case No. 1,168.]

But the defendants, unfortunately for them, were induced to empower Laflin to sign for them the composition agreement, and he did so. And the proposition must be true that the act of Laflin, thus authorized, is the same in legal effect as if the defendants had themselves signed the agreement with their own hands. It must be taken, then, that the defendants did sign the composition agreement, and that they agreed to do so as part of the transaction in which they received, less a trifling deduction, the full amount of their debt.

The rules of law respecting the good faith to be observed by all who unite in a composition agreement are well known and well settled, and rest upon the soundest policy and upon the clearest principles of equity, commercial morality, and fair dealing. The temptation to obtain undue or secret advantages is so great, that the necessity for the severe rules which have been declared by the courts to repress it, is undeniable. All must be open and fair. If a creditor, appealed to by his debtor, makes it a condition of his uniting in a composition, that he shall have any advantage not enjoyed or made known to the others, the transaction cannot stand either at law or in equity. It is a fraud upon creditors, and they can avoid it. It is treated as oppression or duress towards the debtor, and he may defend against any promise to pay made under such circumstances; or, if he has actually paid, he may recover back the amount, as the law does not consider the parties as being in pari delicto, nor regard the payments thus made as voluntary, and allows such recovery on grounds of public policy. Breck v. Cole, 4 Sandf. 79; Pinneo v. Higgins, 12 Abb. Pr. 334; Atkinson v. Denby, 6 Hurl. & N. 778; on appeal, 7 Hurl. & N. 935; approving, Smith v. Bromley, 2 Doug. 696, note; Clay v. Ray, 17 C. B. 188; Leicester v. Rose, 4 East, 372; Jackman v. Mitchell, 13 Ves. 581; Knight v. Hunt, 5 Bing. 432; Bradshaw v. Bradshaw, 9 Mees. & W. 29; Wood v. Barker, L. R. 1 Eq. 139; Howden v. Haigh, 3 Perry & D. 661, 11 Adol. & E. 1033; Higgins v. Pitt, 4 Exch. 322; Wells v. Girling, 1 Brod. & B. 447, 4 Moore, 78; In re Hodgson, 4 De Gex & S. 354; Mallalieu v. Hodgson, 16 Adol. & E. (N. S.) 689; Cullingworth v. Loyd, 2 Beav. 385.

Aside from the question as to the effect of all not signing, presently to be noticed, it is incontestible that if the defendants, with one hundred cents on the dollar in their pockets, yet signed an agreement with the other creditors that they would take seventy cents on the dollar in the future, this would be a fraud which would give a right of action both to the debtor and to the creditors thereby injured. And the assignee in bankruptcy represents both the rights of the bankrupt and of creditors who have been defrauded. Bankrupt Act, [1867; 14 Stat. 522,] § 14; Allen v. Massey, [Case No. 231,] affirmed in supreme court, [17 Wall. (84 U. S.) 351;] Bradshaw v. Klein, [Case No. 1,790;] Knowlton v. Moseley, 105 Mass. 139; Bean v. Amsinck, [Case No. 1,167.]

Now, with their debt substantially paid in full, the defendants signed, or authorized their names to be signed to, the composition agreement: and hence they are liable to the assignee unless there is some special ground of defense.

The defense relied on may be thus stated: By the terms of the composition agreement it is not to be binding upon any creditor unless it shall be signed by all; confessedly it was not signed by all, hence it never became a completed or effectual agreement, and therefore it was incapable, in the nature of things, of working any fraud upon the other creditors. And this position is sought to be strengthened by the argument that the defendants' conduct in signing the agreement in fact worked no fraud upon the creditors, because, at most, only one firm signed it afterwards, and there is no evidence that any of the creditors saw it or knew of it after the defendants' signature was placed upon it. We are compelled, however, to differ with counsel upon this point. It seems to us quite clear upon the proofs that the compromise would never have been regarded as completed without the defendants' signature. Other creditors knew they had refused to come in, knew they had a suit pending, and it is hardly probable that they would have accepted compromise notes and allowed Kintzing to proceed for six months, as if the composition agreement had been completed, if the transaction which led to the placing of the defendants' name to the paper had not taken place. Undoubtedly the local creditors were given to understand that the defendants had at length yielded, and come in with the rest, and the foreign creditors, as we have seen, were, on the same day that the defendants' name was placed upon the agreement, notified that it was completed, and they acted upon the truth of this statement, and received notes and gave time of payment in accordance with the terms of the composition article. We cannot agree, therefore, that the defendants' conduct has been innocuous; that it has, in fact, produced no injury. But still, the legal point above stated recurs; how can it be predicated of an instrument which by its own terms never became complete or binding, that it could operate to defraud or injure others? Plainly stated, the position of the defendants is this: The complaint is that we signed an agreement by which creditors have been defrauded; but how can an agreement which never became binding, operate to defraud or injure any one?

We have felt the force of this objection and own to some difficulty in satisfactorily answering it. Precisely the same point was made by Amsinck & Co. in the case of this plaintiff against them, and it was overruled by Judge Blatchford, on the ground that the defendants having acted under the agreement were estopped to deny its validity.

In this case we answer the objection as follows:—

1. The defendants' signature to the agreement having misled and injured other creditors, the defendants as against them are estopped to deny its validity.

2. The receipt of the debt in full, accompanied by an agreement to sign the composition article, was fraudulent, ab initio, and gives to the assignee, as representing creditors, the right to recover in respect thereto. See Alsager v. Spalding, 4 Bing. N. C. 407, and cases cited, supra.

3. The assignee represents as well any right of action the bankrupt would have had if bankruptcy had not supervened.

And as the defendants refused to take less than the full amount of their demand, and on receiving that actually did agree to sign the composition articles, or authorized them to be signed, it must be taken that the real contract between them and Kintzing, through his agent, was: "If you will pay us in full we will sign the compromise agreement," and if so, Kintzing would have had a clear right to recover back the amount paid, though the composition may have failed, and this right has devolved upon his assignee in bankruptcy. Atkinson v. Denby, supra, and other cases above cited.

The decree appealed from is therefore affirmed.

Affirmed.

NOTE, [from original report.] As to the presumption of law that all creditors who sign a composition deed are ignorant of any fact that would invalidate it, see Bean v. Amsinck, [Case No. 1,167;] Partridge v. Messer, (1859,) 14 Gray, 180; Ex parte Sadler, (1808,) 15 Ves. 59; Coleman v. Waller, (1829,) 3 Younge & J. 212; Pinneo v. Higgins, (1861,) 12 Abb. Pr. 343; Curran v. Munger, [Case No. 3,487.] As to the right the assignee to recover simply as representing the bankrupt: Wood v. Barker, L. R. 1 Eq. 139; Alsager v. Spalding, (1838,) 4 Bing N. C. 407; Smith v. Cuff, (1807,) 6 Maule & S. 160; Turner v. Hoole, Dowl. & R. N. P. 27, 16 E. C. L. 418; Cockshott v. Bennett, (1788,) 2 Term R. 763; Howden v. Haigh, 3 Perry & D. 661, (1840,) 11 Adol. & E. 1033; Higgins v. Pitt, (1849,) 4 Exch. 322; Breck v. Cole, 4 Sandf. 79; Carroll v. Shields, 4 E. D. Smith, 466. Notes or securities fraudulently obtained cannot be enforced. Wells v. Girling, (1819,) 1 Brod. & B. 447, 4 Moore, 78; Constantein v. Blache, (1786,) 1 Cox, Ch. 287; Jackman v. Mitchell, (1807,) 13 Ves. 581; Ex parte Oliver, In re Hodgson, 4 De Gex & S. 354; Mallalieu v. Hodgson, (1851,) 16 Adol. & E. (N. S.) 689. As to right of the debtor, if not bankrupt, to recover back money extorted from him in order to induce a creditor to sign a composition agreement: Atkinson v. Denby, 6 Hurl. & N. 778; on appeal, (1862,) 7 Hurl. & N. 935; Clay v. Ray, 17 C. B. (N. S.) 188; Smith v. Bromley, (1760,) 1 Doug. 697, note; Adams, Eq. 180; Mare v. Sandford, (1859,) 1

Giff. 295; Partridge v. Messer, (1859,) 14 Gray, 180; Doughty v. Savage, (1859,) 28 Conn. 146; Pinneo v. Higgins, (1861,) 12 Abb. Pr. 334; O'Shea v. Collier White Lead & Oil Co., 42 Mo. 397. As to forfeiture by creditor of entire demand if guilty of fraud, see In re Cross, (1848,) 4 De Gex & S. 364; Howden v. Haigh, 3 Perry & D. 661, (1840,) 11 Adol. & E. 1033; Mallalieu v. Hodgson, (1851,) 16 Adol. & E. 689; Doughty v. Savage, (1859,) 28 Conn. 146; Bankrupt Act, [14 Stat. 534,] § 35, last clause; Carter v. McLaren, (1871,) L. R. 2 H. L. Sc. 120.

[For other cases involving this bankruptcy, see Bean v. Amsinck, Case No. 1,167; Bean v. Brookmire, Id. 1,168, Id. 1,169; Bean v. Laflin, Id. 1,172; Brookmire v. Bean, Id. 1,942; Kinsing's Assignee v. Bartholew, Id. 7,831; In re Kintzing, Id. 7,833.]

BEAN, (BROOKMIRE v.) See Case No. 1,942.

Case No. 1,171.

BEAN et al. v. The GRACE BROWN.

[2 Hughes, 112.][1]

District Court, E. D. Virginia. May 10, 1841.

SALVAGE BY PILOTS—SHIP TEMPORARILY ABANDONED.

1. Regularly authorized and licensed pilots are entitled to compensation for salvage, where their services are extraordinary and beyond the strict line of their professional duty.

2. Where a master and crew voluntarily leave a ship while in peril of the sea, with the bona fide intention of returning to her, the ship is not derelict.

3. Where a ship, thus left by her crew, is found by pilots, after the weather has abated in violence, and is brought into port without danger or much difficulty, they are entitled to liberal compensation, say $2,400, when the ship and cargo are worth $38,000.

[Cited in The Ann L. Lockwood, 37 Fed. 237.]

[In admiralty. Libel by Bean and others against the ship Grace Brown, for salvage. Decree for libellants.]

The libellants are pilots, from Baltimore, duly authorized to act as such, and claim salvage, for themselves and their respective crews. They propound that while cruising off the capes of Virginia, on the lookout for vessels requiring their services, Captain Bean, on the 8th January, 1841, spied a ship on shore on Smith's Island flats, which proved to be the Grace Brown, of Baltimore. That finding himself unable to relieve her, he procured the assistance of the other libellants, and again boarded the ship at 1 o'clock on the morning of Saturday, the 9th of January; that there was no human being on board, and that the ship was abandoned and derelict; that she was in imminent peril, frequently striking the bottom, with a heavy sea surging over her, with eight or nine feet of water in her hold, and in danger of going to pieces. That by incessant labor and at the peril of their lives, and their three pilot-boats, they succeeded in rescuing her from her perilous situation, and brought her and her cargo in safety to the port of Norfolk, where they secured her at the wharf at 8 o'clock p. m. of the same day.

A claim is interposed by Henry Duff, master and part owner of the Grace Brown, in behalf of himself and the other owners of the ship. He alleges that his ship sailed from Liverpool on the 12th of November, 1840, bound to Baltimore, with an assorted cargo, and had uninterrupted voyage until the 7th January, when the ship struck, as he supposed, on the middle ground off Cape Henry, and sprung a leak; that he displayed the usual signal for a pilot without obtaining one; that after endeavoring to extricate her from the difficulties of her situation, at half-past 10 o'clock a. m. on the 7th of January, he hove out his anchor, by which he rode securely while he remained on board; that about half past 4 o'clock p. m. he left the ship with his officers and crew, in the long boat, to go ashore for assistance, with the intention of an immediate return to the ship with aid; that her danger arose from his ignorance of the localities, and mainly from the wind's blowing a strong gale from the S. E., or on shore. That the ship was not derelict, and when the services of the libellants were rendered, her situation was not imminently dangerous. That after using every effort, and all the dispatch which he could control, he returned on the morning of Saturday, the 9th, to the spot where he had left the ship at anchor, and found that she was not there. He became satisfied that he had seen her, on his way out, under sail to Norfolk; pursued, and at 11 o'clock p. m. found her at the wharf in possession of the libellants, who refused to deliver her up. That the libellants are pilots, and the ship at the time of the salvage service was within their pilotage-ground. The libellants claim the highest rate of salvage, on the ground stated, and the owners, admitting that although pilots, the libellants are entitled to compensation, contend that so small were their risk and service, that the lowest rate of remuneration should be adopted. The ship and cargo are appraised at $38,928.

MASON, District Judge.[2] The material facts in dispute between the parties are: 1. Whether the ship was abandoned by the officers and crew, and was in a state of derelict, when she was taken possession of by the libellants, or not? 2. Whether the situation of the ship and cargo was imminently perilous, at the time of the salvage, and in what degree?

The depositions of some of the libellants are taken and read as evidence in the cause. This is legal evidence; it forms an exception, from the necessity of the case, to the general rule, that a person interested in the result of a cause is incompetent to testify. The testimony of salvors is admissible, "but only admissible as to facts occurring at the time of the salvage service, and in weighing that with the other evidence, its force will be greatly abated by opposing testimony from persons belonging to the crew of the saved ship," and a portion from other disinterested witnesses. The Boston, [Case No. 1,673.] Sensible of the embarrassment and difficulty of deciding on conflicting evidence and controverted facts without the aid of a jury, I have attentively considered the able and elaborate arguments of the counsel, and have carefully examined and weighed the testimony in the cause. By the owners, it is proved that the ship securely rode by three anchors, in four fathoms water, from 10 o'clock a. m. to half-past 4 o'clock p. m., when the master and crew left her on the 7th; that during that time the wind was blowing a gale on shore, and the sea running high, but had not moved her from her moorings; that the ship's draft was less than 17 feet, and I consider that the weight of evidence leaves no doubt that, though leaking, water in her hold was never more than 4½ feet aft and 5½ forward; that the captain and crew went ashore for assistance, and though leaving the ship under strong apprehensions for her safety, he declared and evinced his purpose to be an immediate return to her; that he used every effort to procure aid, and on Saturday morning, with what he deemed the necessary aid, and all that he could command, he did return to the place where he had left her anchored, without any knowledge that the libellants were in possession of her; that the captain was a part owner, an experienced master, and a respectable man. The libellants rely on the condition in which the ship was found, the delay of the captain in his return, a supposed want of promptness in procuring the necessary aid, on the fact that no one was left on board, on the articles taken in the boat, and other circumstances, as showing that no intention to return existed at the time of leaving the ship, and no hope of recovering her or her cargo. Without entering into an argument, which has been conducted with great ingenuity on both sides, I am satisfied by the proofs that however imminent Captain Duff may have regarded the danger of his ship at the time of leaving her, he had then a fixed intention to return to her, whatever might be her fate. In the case of Clarke v. The Dodge Healy, [Case No. 2,849,] Justice Washington held, that in judging of the master's intention at the time of leaving his ship, great weight is to be given to his subsequent acts. "If," says he, "the intention were to leave her to her fate, and to use no further exertions to save, the master could have no motive for remaining on shore for the purpose of watching her motions and of discovering her situation the next morning." In that case the master and crew had actually left his vessel under most imminent peril, and declared that he had abandoned her. Yet the learned judge held that his conduct showed that such was not his purpose, and dismissed the libel. In this case the captain left his ship, on reaching the shore declared his purpose to be an immediate return, applied for, and as soon as he could, procured, aid, and did return to where he left and where he expected to find her.

[1] [Reported by Hon. Robert W. Hughes, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

[2] Hon. John Y. Mason, afterwards secretary of the navy, attorney general, and minister to France.

On the second point, more essential perhaps than the first in determining the rate of compensation to be made, it appears to me that the following facts are established: That the danger of the Grace Brown proceeded in the first instance from a want of that local knowledge which a pilot could have afforded, had the captain succeeded in getting one in time. That while the wind was S. E. her situation was more dangerous; that when the libellants commenced the work of salvage, the wind was N. N. W. and was favorable for getting her off; that she was got off by the rise of tide and the aid of her own sails; that she was prevented from going on shore by her anchors; that possessing the local knowledge belonging to their profession as pilots, the libellants incurred but little risk to their lives in the act of salvage; that as the weather was at that time, the pilot-boats were in no danger; and that in navigating the ship to Norfolk, the risk incurred was, under the circumstances existing, not considerable; that they commenced the act of salvage about one o'clock on Saturday morning, and arrived in safety at the wharf in Norfolk about eight o'clock in the evening of the same day. On these facts, the inquiry arises, Are the libellants entitled to salvage, and in what amount? Salvage is the compensation that is to be made to other persons by whose assistance a ship or its loading may be saved from impending peril or recovered from actual loss; and in fixing the rate of salvage the court has, usually, regard not only to the labor and peril incurred by the salvors, but also to the situation in which they may happen to stand with respect to the property saved; to the promptitude and alacrity manifested by them; to the value of the ship and cargo; and to the degree of danger from which they were rescued. And it is laid down as a principle which cannot be controverted, that where it is proved that no human force could have averted the danger, unless Providence kindly aided the exertions by which the object is attained, it does not deprive the salvors of merit, but may diminish the rate of compensation. It is for rescue from present impending perils, and not those which might possibly under subsequent contingencies befall the property, that compensation is made. The danger of the property saved, at the time of saving, its value, the extent of service, the danger incurred in rendering it, to the lives and property of the salvors, their character, and their local knowledge, by which the dangers to those not possessing it may be avoided, are all elements in making the delicate and difficult computation of the remuneration to be awarded as salvage. That the libellants are entitled to compensation for their services in this case is not denied. It is clearly established by repeated decisions, and especially by that of the supreme court of the United States, in the case of Hobart v. Drogan, 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 108, "that however a pilot while acting in the strict line of his duty may entitle himself to extraordinary pilotage compensation for extraordinary services, as contradistinguished from ordinary pilotage for ordinary services, he cannot, therefore, be entitled to salvage. But a pilot as such is not disabled in virtue of his office from becoming a salvor. On the contrary, whenever he performs salvage services, beyond the line of his appropriate duties, or under circumstances to which those duties do not justly attach, he stands in the same relation to the property as any other class, that is, with a title to compensation to the extent of the merit of his services, viewed in the light of a liberal public policy. Regarding pilots as a useful and meritorious class of men, eminently contributing by their skill, intrepidity, and local knowl edge to the success of navigation, the courts have not been disposed to impose on them duties beyond those appropriately belonging to their office, or to deprive them of the reward of dangers encountered in such extraordinary services. But as the peril incurred always enters largely into the estimate of remuneration to be made, their local knowledge will always be taken into consideration in estimating salvage services." On this principle, Sir William Scott decided the case of The Frow Margaretta, in 4 Rob. Adm. 84.[3] That was the case of a foreign vessel that had struck on a sandbank on the Essex coast, from which she was rescued by the master and crew of a fishing-smack. The court said that it would never be allowed that a claim of salvage should be ingrafted on the local ignorance of foreigners, who are, of course, not very likely to be well acquainted with the coast. The danger of the vessel arose from that ignorance; the salvors possessed the necessary local knowledge to extricate her without peril to themselves, and for their services fifty pounds were allowed them, and the service pronounced to be as low a degree of salvage merit as could be presented to the court. In the case of Hobart and Drogan, one-third of the appraised value of the brig and cargo was awarded as salvage. It is argued that there is a strong similitude between that and the case at bar. In many of the circumstances attending the adventure, in the means employed and in the character of the parties, there is. But, it seems to me, that in the circumstances which mainly regulate the salvage the resemblance is not strong. In that case the brig was in most imminent peril. In the hurricane which she encoun tered the masts and bowsprit were cut away, the water was making in her hold, her pumps were choked with coffee, and useless, and she was aground. The master and crew had abandoned her to save their lives. The salvors after unsuccessful attempts boarded her, with great danger to themselves. The wind was blowing in such a direction and with such violence that if the brig had not been taken possession of by the libellants she would have been drifted on the West Bank and become a complete wreck, so that the peril of the salvors and of the brig and cargo at the time of salvage was great and imminent. While the libellants are therefore entitled to compensation notwithstanding their character as pilots, no precise rule is afforded by that or any other case to fix the amount. What then is to be the compensation in this case?

II. The question of salvage, depending in all cases on the peculiar circumstances of each case, is subject to the legal discretion of the court. But in case of derelict, the merit is regarded as so great, the restoration of his abandoned property to the owner so entirely a clear gain, that the courts have established a very high rate of compensation with such uniformity, that, although the rule is admitted to be flexible, I should not be disposed under ordinary circumstances to depart from it. The general allowance has been of not less than one-third nor more than one-half of the entire value of the ship, cargo, and freight earned.

Was the Grace Brown derelict? I regard the law as well settled, that a mere abandonment of a ship on the high seas, with the bona fide intention of returning to her, when the impending peril shall have ceased, or the object of leaving her is attained, does not constitute the ship derelict. In the case of Rowe v. The Brig, [Case No. 12,093,] I do not understand Judge Story as contravening this doctrine. In the case of The John and Jane, 4 C. Rob. Adm. 216, Sir William Scott had intimated an opinion that if a vessel be captured and afterwards abandoned by the capturing enemy, it was not a case of derelict, because neither the owner nor those who were in possession as his agents had committed an act of dereliction. So that in this view there must be a voluntary abandonment by the master and crew. But "this opinion," says Judge Story, "has been silently retracted." If the abandonment shall be without the intention to return, it is derelict, whether voluntary or involuntary. In the case of The Aquila, 1 C. Rob. Adm. 37, Sir William Scott had held that a legal derelict is properly where there has been an abandonment at sea, without the hope of recovery. Judge Story adds that it might perhaps have been more accurate to have said an abandonment without an intention to return. On various cases cited at the bar this rule has been acted on, and I regard it as settled. I have already said that in this case, on the proofs, the master of the Grace Brown at the time of leaving her with her officers and crew, intended to return to her, and, therefore, this is no case of legal derelict. The allegation of the libel to that effect is not sustained by the proof. The compensation to be made to the libellants then is for relief given to a distressed vessel at sea, and it is to be regulated by the principles already laid down. When the ship was anchored the wind was blowing on shore and the sea running high. While that state of things continued it does not appear to me that it would have been possible for the libellants to have relieved her. With their local knowledge on a favorable change of the wind they conducted her into deep water, with the high tide and the aid of her own sails. To them this was a duty involving comparatively no danger. Cole, one of the libellants, says that as the "weather then was," the vessels of the salvors were in no danger, and it is for the actual danger incurred that they are to be compensated. Neither the adverse gales which endangered the ship before they went to her, nor the southeastwardly wind which sprung up after the ship reached Norfolk, can enhance the pretensions of the salvors. Finding the ship at sea without any one on board, the libellants had just ground for believing her abandoned, and lawfully took possession of her. But I have not clearly seen the necessity of their doing so, nor am I satisfied that the ship would not have made this port in safety, under her own officers and men, if the salvors had not interfered, so that neither the peril of life or property to the libellants in the adventure, nor the benefit to the owners by their services, has been very great. It has, however, been urged on the court, and with great propriety, that the interests of commerce and an enlarged commercial policy require that a liberal compensation should be made for such services; I acknowledge the full force of these considerations. But it must be borne in mind, that while for extraordinary services beyond the strict line of duty, pilots may receive the extraordinary compensation of salvage, theirs is a profession of peril and adventure; that in the season of tempest and danger their services are most necessary to vessels seeking a harbor, without the local knowledge in their officers to conduct them in safety, and that no inducement should be offered to pilots to withhold their services in moments of peril, that when the ignorant mariner is placed in imminent distress they may rescue him from a situation which their timely aid would have averted, and then demand the extraordinary remuneration of salvors. They would cease to be the guardians of commerce, pursuing their useful but hazardous profession as pilots, and become its worst enemies, permitting its distresses and prospering on its misfortunes.

[3] There is error in this reference. The case cited is in 6 Rob. 92; but has no bearing upon the subject. [The case intended to be cited in the text is The Vrouw Margaretha, 4 C. Rob. Adm. 103.]

Upon the whole case the merit of the libellants is not of a very high grade; as their services though promptly rendered were not very arduous, nor attended with great danger to them; as the ship was not in great and imminent peril at the time they took possession of her, or while in their possession, and as the value of their services to the owners was not considerable, as the master and crew were returning to her, and might have saved her with no great risk or trouble if the libellants had not taken possession of her. But the libellants are entitled to a liberal compensation for their services, and for them, their risk and expenses, I award to them the sum of two thousand four hundred dollars, clear of legal costs. In the language of Judge Hopkinson in the case of The Elvira, [Case No. 4,423,] I know of no probable or plausible calculation on which I can suppose that these pilot-boats and those on board could have earned half this amount while engaged with the Grace Brown, and certainly they could not have earned it with less labor, risk, and expense. I make no order of distribution amongst the salvors, as neither the proof nor the libel enables me to do so, and I presume it can be arranged amongst them.

BEAN, (KISSINGER v.) See Case No. 7,853.

Case No. 1,172.

BEAN v. LAFLIN.

[5 N. B. R. (1873,) 333.]

District Court, E. D. Missouri.

BANKRUPTCY—PREFERENCES—INDORSERS—CONTINGENT LIABILITY.

[1. The bankruptcy act (section 35) provides that if a payment is made by an insolvent "with a view to give preference to any creditor or person — who is under any liability for him, — the person to be benefited thereby — having reasonable cause to believe such person to be insolvent, — such payment is in fraud of the provisions of this act and the same shall be void," etc. Certain persons indorsed a note for the accommodation of an insolvent, who received the whole of the proceeds of its discount; and at the maturity of the note the insolvent paid it, without the knowledge or procurement of the indorsers. Held that, as their contingent liability never became absolute by default in payment of the note, it was not such a liability as is contemplated by the terms of the section; and, as the payment was not thus for their benefit, they are not liable to an action by the assignee in bankruptcy, as in case of an unlawful preference.]

[Cited in Corbett v. Woodward, Case No. 3,223. Distinguished in Blair v. Allen, Id. 1,483; Sill v. Solberg, 6 Fed. 477.]

[2. Even if there had existed on the part of the indorsers such a liability as is contemplated by this section, where only one of the three indorsers had the knowledge of the maker's insolvency which was required to make them amenable to its provisions, he could not have been forced to pay to the assignee in bankruptcy the whole face of the note.]

[Action by Bean, assignee in bankruptcy of one Kintzing, against Laflin, to recover money alleged to have been paid by the bankrupt for defendant's benefit in such wise as to constitute a preference. Heard on a motion for new trial. Motion granted.]

TREAT, District Judge. An incident pertaining to the misconduct of a juror, who, with full knowledge of the facts on the part of counsel, was discharged from the panel, has not escaped the consideration of the court. It is not presented by counsel as a ground for setting aside the verdict, inasmuch as the trial proceeded by consent; yet it indicates a condition of mind in the jury box at that time exacting more than usual scrutiny into the conduct of the cause. It may be that no other juror was affected in like manner, yet it is essential to the purity of jury trials that they should be beyond reasonable suspicion of being controlled by prejudice.

The various facts and circumstances connected with Kintzing's composition deed, whereby the same became void, it was seemingly necessary to prove in order to establish his insolvency at the date of the payment in question; and a knowledge of some one or more of those facts by the defendant seemed to be also necessary to bring home to him "reasonable cause to believe" Kintzing insolvent. It may be that the court suffered that class of inquiries to be pushed too far. It was clear from one fact established, viz.: that Brookmire and Rankin received full payment and then caused their names to be signed to the composition deed—that the deed was actually inoperative and void. Laflin knew the fact, although he may not have known its legal effect. It appeared also that all the other creditors did not assent thereto, for Hunt objected and threatened, and others state they had no knowledge thereof. The composition deed being actually void, Kintzing was insolvent. While Kintzing was proceeding under the deed as if valid, the defendant put his name, in connection with two others, on a note to be discounted for the accommodation of Kintzing. Instead of becoming joint endorsers, they became joint makers, and as between them and Kintzing were merely his sureties. If the notes were not paid at maturity, no protest and notice were necessary to fix their liability to the holder. Each of the three joint makers would then have been justly liable inter sese for one-third of the amount; and if any one of them paid the whole, he would have been entitled to contribution from the others. In that condition of affairs, Kintzing, for whose accommodation the note was made, paid the same at maturity to the holder, without consulting or referring in any way to the accommodation makers or sureties. The suit was originally by Kintzing's assignee to recover back from those makers jointly the whole amount so paid, on the ground that the payment was for their benefit and in fraud of the provisions of the bankrupt act, and that they had reasonable cause to know the insolvency of Kintzing and the fraud named. The suit now stands against Laflin alone.

Many difficulties arise as to the law of the case. It has been held by some judges that the payment before maturity by an insolvent maker of a note endorsed by a solvent person does not render the holder liable to refund, but does make the solvent endorser liable, because the payment was for "his benefit." To that ruling this court cannot assent. It is evident that the holder cannot be required to refund, for he could not refuse payment at maturity when tendered, and then protest and charge the endorser. The latter's liability is contingent, and until the note is dishonored and notice duly given, his legal liability is not fixed, and he cannot be legally called upon to pay. If, without any action whatever on his part, the insolvent maker pays the note at maturity, it is not easy to see how that payment is in a legal sense for his benefit, inasmuch as he never became legally liable to pay at all. To say that he might have become legally liable if certain contingencies had happened, which never did happen, does not alter the case. It suffices that he never was legally liable to pay, and that, through no procurement by him, his contingent never was converted into a present and absolute liability. One of the main objects of the bankrupt act, it is true, is to secure equality among creditors of an insolvent, and the law covers to some extent debts not due and existing liabilities; but it must be construed in the light of the general laws obtaining at the date of its enactment, and also of its own provisions with reference thereto. It does not contemplate that every endorser's contract shall be changed from what it was when made, merely because, by a subsequent event, viz.: the maker's insolvency, the latter cannot meet all of his obligations. That subsequent event does not of its own force convert a contingent into an absolute contract; does not dispense with non-payment, protest and notice. It is not to be held that the law merchant in that respect was designed to be thus wholly overturned. It is apparent on the other hand that if an insolvent who has outstanding obligations, secured by endorsements, can pay some and leave others unpaid, then some of the endorsers or sureties escape and others not, and thus a preference is wrought. Look at the question as we may, serious difficulties must arise; yet all that courts can do is to follow in the paths the law directs. The legal fact exists, that an endorser's contract is contingent. Until his liability is fixed according to the terms of his contract, payment cannot be exacted from him. An attempt to force him to pay what he is not bound to pay, on the ground that without his knowledge or procurement the maker paid what he (the maker) contracted to pay, could well be met by the answer "in haec foedera non veni"—such was not my contract. This line of investigation might be pursued at great length; but enough is said to indicate the reasons which influence this court in its refusal to follow the decisions referred to. The bankrupt act is not to be construed as subversive of elementary principles pertaining to the law merchant or the universal law of contracts, except where its provisions plainly require such rulings. The thirty-fifth section enacts that if a payment is made by an insolvent "with a view to give preference to any creditor or person having a claim against him, or who is under any liability for him," "the person receiving such payment" or "to be benefited thereby," "having reasonable cause to believe such person is insolvent," and that "such payment is in fraud of the provisions of this act, the same shall be void," &c. Does that section contemplate that an endorser who never receives a dollar, and whose contingent never became an absolute liability, shall pay to the bankrupt's assignee the amount of the note paid by the bankrupt to the holder? This court cannot so hold. In one sense the endorser was benefited by the maker's payment, but not in the legal sense in which the act uses the phrase. When other sureties exist and the debt is paid by the obligor at maturity, does not the same rule apply? The sureties' obligation is contingent, and if the debt is paid, at or before maturity, without any action on their part, how can it be said that they are made absolutely or immediately liable? These remarks apply only to cases where sureties or endorsers take no action, or are innocent of all participation in any scheme by the principal debtor to contravene the law.

The case as now before the court presents still another difficulty. Where a payment made has to be refunded, no one is liable to refund unless he had "reasonable cause to believe," &c. Here were three sureties, each equally liable, contingently, and entitled to contribution, &c. One, it is contended, had reasonable cause to believe, but neither of the other two; and therefore he is bound to refund to the assignee the whole amount. His contract was, in a contingency which never happened, to pay to the creditor the amount with right of contribution from his co-sureties. If he is to be held to pay the whole, what becomes of his right of contribution? The theory is, that he has been benefited by the payment, and because he had "reasonable cause to believe," and the other sureties not, therefore they cease, practically, to be his co-sureties, and the contract, as to him, is converted into a new and distinct contract; he is made absolutely liable as sole surety on a contingent contract with co-sureties, notwithstanding the contingency never happened and he assumed no new obligation in the premises. It might well be that, knowing the maker's embarrassed condition, he was originally willing to sign the paper in connection with others and share with them the probable loss. If the maker did not pay, the three would have to contribute equally. How is he to be compelled to pay the whole, and the others to be discharged? It is said, because the maker paid the demand, and by the new rule each who had reasonable cause to believe, etc., is converted into a surety absolute, and the co-sureties innocent of such reasonable cause are alone discharged. The case must be an extraordinary one, dependent on some active participation by a surety or endorser in a debtor's fraud, to justify any such ruling. In this case the money obtained on the discount went to Kintzing and was used by him. He paid the note at maturity, without calling on his sureties. He continued in business for some time thereafter, on the hypothesis that his composition deed was valid, or would be permitted to stand. Finally it was ascertained that not only was the composition deed void, but that Kintzing could not comply with its terms. This suit is to obtain from the defendant, one of three sureties, the whole amount of a note discounted for Kintzing's benefit, and paid by him at maturity, without any interference by them to induce him so to act. The views presented by Mr. Justice Miller as to the debtor's interest, under this act, must arrest the attention of courts and possibly of congress. At any rate it does not conform to established rules of interpretation so to construe this act as to work a subversion of elementary and essential principles governing the laws of contracts, and hold parties to obligations they never assumed or contemplated; to make them also liable for acts done by others without any participation by them in the alleged wrong. Payments made after liability fixed presents a very different question. These comments are made in full view of the many difficulties to spring up from whichever rule of construction is adopted. As the rulings at the trial were not in accord with these views, a new trial will be granted.

[For other cases involving this bankruptcy, see Bean v. Amsinck, Case No. 1,167; Bean v. Brookmire, Cases Nos. 1,168–1,170; Brookmire v. Bean, Case No. 1,942; Kinsing's Assignee v. Bartholew, Id. 7,831; In re Kintzing, Id. 7,833.]

Case No. 1,173.

BEAN v. SMALLWOOD.

[2 Story, 408; 2 Robb, Pat. Cas. 133; Merw. Pat. Inv. 312.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. Term, 1843.

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS —COMBINATION—NOVELTY.

1. A machine is only patentable, when it is substantially new; but the application of an old machine to a new purpose is not patentable.

[Cited in Le Roy v. Tatham, 14 How. (55 U. S.) 177; Winans v. Denmead, 15 How. (56 U. S.) 347; Bray v. Hartshorn, Case No. 1,820; Sarven v. Hall, Id. 12,369; Northwestern Fire Extinguisher Co. v. Philadelphia Fire Extinguisher Co., Id. 10,337; Alcott v. Young, Id. 149; Couse v. Johnson, Id. 3,288; Gottfried v. Crescent Brewing Co., 9 Fed. 766; Worswick Manuf'g Co. v. City of Kansas, 38 Fed. 248.]

2. In the present case the invention was held not to be patentable, because it was merely the application of an old apparatus to a new purpose.

[Cited in Teese v. Phelps, Case No. 13,819; Hebbard, Ex parte, Id. 6,313.]

[3. Cited in Smith v. Downing, Case No. 13,036, to the point that what is patentable is not an abstract principle, but the embodiment of the principle into a machine as described in the specification, and it is the invention, in conformity to that embodiment or representation of the working, that the acts of congress will protect.]

Case [by Samuel Bean against Thomas Smallwood] for infringement of a patent [No. 1,531, granted to S. Bean, and] dated 30th of March, 1840, for "a new and useful improvement in the rocking chair." The specification annexed to the patent stated as follows: "The principal feature of this invention and improvement consists in making the seat and stool of the chair in two parts, so that whilst the stool remains stationary, the seat is made to rock on the top of it; thus doing away with the long and cumbersome rockers on the common chair, which occupy a great deal of room, and are very destructive to carpets, and which also renders the back of this improved chair susceptible of being fixed in a reclining position at any angle to suit the wishes of the sitter, and at the same time rendered perfectly secure from being thrown off the stool."

Plea, the general issue, with a notification of special matters of defence. (1) That the invention was not new, but is described in certain books, naming them, and invented and used before by certain persons, naming them.

Mr. Sewall, for plaintiff.

B. R. Curtis, for defendant.

B. R. Curtis, for the defendant, at the trial, cited London Journal of Arts and Sciences, (of the conjoint series,) vol. 7. 1836, p. 161, describing an easy chair patented in 1833. The chair is in two parts, on curved surfaces; he also cited Phil. Pat. 102, 106. He also read the specification of Simmons's patent for "an improvement in rockers for chairs, cradles, or other things intended to be rocked," granted in 1819.

Sewall, for the plaintiff, admitted, that the first two parts in the claim in the plaintiff's specification of his invention were similar to those in Simmons's patent; but he insisted, that the third part in his claim in the specification was the plaintiff's invention, and under the patent act of 3d of March, 1837, [5 Stat. 194,] c. 45, § 9, he was entitled to maintain his present suit for an improvement thereof, as the patent was by the act good pro tanto. He added, that the third claim was new, and if not, it was an application to a new purpose.

Curtis, e contra, contended, that the section applied only to cases where the patent was broader than the invention, by mistake, accident, or inadvertence. He further insisted, that the plaintiff's patent was substantially, in all respects, like Simmons's patented invention, with unimportant differences of form. And he called a witness who established the facts; and his testimony was admitted by the plaintiff to be unimpeachable.

STORY, Circuit Justice. It seems to me, that, upon the evidence admitted by the parties, the plaintiff has no case. His patent is not (as the plaintiff admits) for a new combination of old materials, or for a new rocking-chair, framed in a manner unknown before. If it were, it seems admitted by the plaintiff, that, upon the evidence, it would not be maintainable. It would seem open to one of two objections; (1) That the defendant does not use precisely the same combination; but a modification thereof; that is to say, although he uses the two first specifications of the claim in the patent, he does not use the third; but an apparatus to accomplish the same purpose, of a somewhat different structure. Or, if the last apparatus be substantially like the plaintiff's, then that the same apparatus is not new, nor the combination in any part new. But he contends, and it seems to me that it may, perhaps, be deemed a fair interpretation of the words, in which the claim is summed up in the specification, that it is a claim for three distinct and several things, and that if either is new, pro tanto, he is entitled to maintain his suit under the 9th section of the patent act of 1837, c. 45. Now the summing up of his claim is as follows: "What I claim as my invention and desire to secure by letters patent consists, (1) In making the seat and stool of the chair in two parts, so that the seat shall rock on the top of the stool, instead of having the parts permanently united with rockers on the legs of the stool, as heretofore. (2) And also the mode of connecting together the seat and stool by the vertical plates attached to the seat, passing through the stool, with shoulders projecting from the sides thereof, which catch against the under side of the stool when the seat is rocked to or fro. (3) And likewise the manner of reclining the back of the seat at any angle required, by the lock plates and notches in the hanging plates, which receive them as before described."

[1] [Reported by William W. Story, Esq. Merw. Pat. Inv. 312, contains only a partial report.]

The first two specifications of claim are admitted to be the same as in Simmons's patent, and therefore are not new or patentable. The third and last specification of claim, upon the testimony of Mr. Eddy, which is admitted to be true, is equally unsupportable. He says, that the same apparatus, stated in this last claim, has been long in use, and applied, if not to chairs, at least in other machines, to purposes of a similar nature. If this be so, then the invention is not new, but at most is an old invention, or apparatus, or machinery, applied to a new purpose. Now, I take it to be clear, that a machine, or apparatus, or other mechanical contrivance, in order to give the party a claim to a patent therefor, must in itself be substantially new. If it is old, and well known, and applied only to a new purpose, that does not make it patentable. A coffee mill applied for the first time to grind oats, or corn, or mustard, would not give a title to a patent for the machine. A cotton gin applied without alteration to clean hemp, would not give a title to a patent for the gin as new. A loom to weave cotton yarn would not, if unaltered, become a patentable machine as a new invention by first applying it to weave woolen yarn. A steam engine, if ordinarily applied to turn a grist mill, would not entitle a party to a patent to it, if it were first applied by him to turn the main wheel of a cotton factory. In short, the machine must be new, not merely the purpose to which it is applied. A purpose is not patentable; but the machinery only, if new, by which it is to be accomplished. In other words, the thing itself which is patented must be new, and not the mere application of it to a new purpose or object. Under these circumstances, upon the admissions of the parties, it does not strike me that the action is maintainable.

The plaintiff submitted to a non-suit.

Case No. 1,174.

BEAN v. SMITH et al.

[2 Mason, 252.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Rhode Island. June Term, 1821.

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES—ACTION TO SET ASIDE—EQUITY—JURISDICTION OF FEDERAL COURTS—BONA FIDE PURCHASER — JUDGMENT FOUNDED ON NEGOTIABLE CHOSE IN ACTION.

1. The circuit court, notwithstanding the restrictive clause in the judiciary act of 1789, [1 Stat. 78,] c. 20, § 11, has jurisdiction in a suit in equity brought by a judgment creditor against his debtors and others, (they being citizens of different states,) to set aside conveyances made in fraud of creditors, although the ground of the judgment was a negotiable chose in action, on which, before judgment, a suit could not have been maintained in such court.

[Cited in Wood v. Dummer, Case No. 17,944; Dundas v. Bowler, Id. 4,140; Pratt v. Curtis, Id. 11,375.]

2. A bill in equity lies to set aside such fraudulent conveyances, for there is not in the proper sense of the terms, "a plain, adequate and complete remedy" at law, within the meaning of the 16th section of the judiciary act of 1789, [1 Stat. 82,] c. 20, which is merely affirmative of the general doctrines of courts of equity.

[Cited in Baker v. Biddle, Case No. 764; Tufts v. Tufts, Id. 14,233; Phillips v. Preston, 5 How. (46 U. S.) 290; Orendorf v. Budlong, 12 Fed. 25; Mann v. Appel, 31 Fed. 383.]

3. A bona fide purchaser without notice from a grantee, to whom property has been conveyed to defraud creditors, is entitled to hold the same against the creditors of the grantor.

[Cited in Wood v. Mann, Case No. 17,951; In re Estes, 3 Fed. 142.]

4. Where in Rhode Island a judgment debtor had conveyed his real estate to defraud his creditors, and had afterwards been committed to gaol, and been discharged from imprisonment on taking the poor debtor's oath under the laws of that state, which could only be obtained by a person having no property to support himself in gaol, or to pay prison charges, it was held, that a bill in equity lay to set aside the fraudulent conveyances, and to charge the real estate with the judgment debt, notwithstanding that by the laws of that state, while the debtor was alive and lived within the state, such real estate would not be directly liable to be taken in execution.

5. Where a conveyance has been made with the meditated intent to defraud creditors, it shall not be permitted to stand as security in the hands of the grantee for advances made on account of such conveyance to the grantor.

6. Notwithstanding a judgment, the court will, where the judgment creditor asks relief against such fraudulent conveyance, look into the original consideration, and give the creditor only, what on the whole appears due to him.

[Cited in Lawrence Manuf'g Co. v. Janesville Cotton Mills, 138 U. S. 557, 11 Sup. Ct. 402.]

In equity. This was a bill in equity brought by the plaintiff [Stephen] Bean, against Simon Smith, Ziba Smith, Ahab Smith, Simon Smith, Jr., Esther Stone, William Foster, and Elizabeth Foster, wherein he claimed to be paid, out of certain lands in the possession of the respondents, a debt due to him from Simon Smith, one of the said respondents. The facts which came out in the bill and answers, were as follows: On the 22d day of December, 1808, the plaintiff was the holder of bills of the late Farmers' Exchange Bank to a large amount; for the payment of these bills William Colwell, the cashier of the said bank, drew two bills of exchange upon one Andrew Dexter, Jr., in favour of the respondent Smith, one for the sum of $3,063, and the other $1,500. These bills were indorsed in blank by Smith, one of the respondents, and by one John Harris, and were received by the plaintiff in payment of the bank bills, which he held against the said bank as before mentioned. The said Smith and Harris were at the time directors and large stockholders in said bank. These bills of exchange were afterwards protested for non-acceptance and non-payment, and the endorsers Smith and Harris duly notified thereof. In March, 1809, two actions were commenced on these bills against Smith, and at the March term of the supreme court of the state of Rhode Island judgment was recovered in these suits against Smith for the sum of $5,052.37, debts and costs, and executions issued thereon, upon one of which he was committed to jail in May, 1810, and upon the other in September following. In the month of May, 1813, Smith took the poor prisoner's oath; gave his notes for the debt and costs, payable in two years, with interest, and was thereupon discharged from prison. The Farmers' Exchange Bank entirely failed in February, 1809, at which time Smith was indebted to the bank in the sum of $15,284. This debt to the bank he paid in their own bills in August, 1809, which were purchased for him for that purpose by one Seth Hunt for the sum of $2,273.80, for which last sum he gave his own notes indorsed by William Foster and Simon Smith, Jr., two of the respondents, who were afterwards sued on the same. After the commencement of the suits against Smith, and a few days before the sitting of the court, at which judgment was expected to have been obtained, the said Smith made conveyances of all his estate both real and personal, to his children. In September, 1809, he leased the Rounds and Wills farms, so called, to his sons-in-law William Foster and William Stone, (both of them made respondents,) for five years from 1st April, 1810, for the alleged consideration of $1,000. And on the same day he gave a deed of gift of the same farms to his two daughters Elizabeth and Esther, wives of the said Foster and Stone. No consideration was paid at the time, but they afterwards gave their notes to one Zephaniah Andrews for a part of a debt which the said Smith owed him, making themselves accountable to said Andrews in the sum of $483.48, each, or two-fifteenths of the debt due to said Andrews. On the 15th of September, 1809, Smith leased 54 acres of land in Smithfield, called the Waterman lot, to Ziba Smith, one of the respondents, for ten years, at the annual rent of $738, paid down. And on the same day he executed a deed of gift of the same lot to said Ziba in fee simple. He also conveyed to the said Ziba on the 18th of the same month of September 26 acres of woodland in Gloucester. On the 15th of the same month said Smith leased the Daniel Eddy farm, so called, to Darius Smith for five years from April 1, 1810, and three days after he conveyed it to the said Darius and Ahab Smith for the alleged consideration of $5,000, which they swear was paid to him. And the said Darius and Ahab afterwards conveyed the same to one Amasa Stone and one William Stone. On the 22d of November, 1809, the said Smith conveyed his homestead farm, the John Eddy farm, so called, to Ziba Smith and Simon Smith, Jr., for the alleged consideration of $8,000, which they averred, that they paid at the time by giving their notes for $4,000, each.

[1] [Reported by William P. Mason, Esq.]

Whipple, for respondents.

The first question, to which the respondents call the attention of the court, is a question of jurisdiction. The plaintiff Bean is an assignee of John Harris, a citizen of the state of Rhode-Island, at least it does not appear that he is a citizen of another state, and the want of such an averment may be taken advantage of by motion. [Sere v. Pitot,] 6 Cranch, [10 U. S.] 332; 1 Mason, 250, [Bullard v. Bell, Case No. 2,121;] [Montalet v. Murray,] 4 Cranch, [8 U. S.] 47.

It may be said, that although this court could not sustain a suit for the collection of the debts, that still they may give redress for any injury, which the orator may have received in his character of creditor by the conveyances complained of; that their right to a remedy for this injury is not derived from John Harris, but that inasmuch as the injury is direct from the respondents to the orator, so must their remedy be directly against the respondents. It is admitted, that a new promise made by the promissor of a note directly to the indorsee will confer jurisdiction on this court, although the promissor and a first indorser are both citizens of this state. But it may well be doubted, whether an act in fraud of the rights of an assignee, confer the same jurisdiction as a new promise made directly to him. In the latter case, the new promise is the gist of the action, but not so with the fraudulent act. The court must first decide, that the orator is a bona fide creditor, before they can listen to any complaints of fraud. But if the court have no jurisdiction over the contract, which clothes him with the character of creditor, how can they decide that he is a creditor? How can the court give relief indirectly, when the statute forbids their doing it directly? How can the court give the orator a remedy for an injury to his rights as creditor, when the power to judge, whether the orator is a creditor or not, is not granted to the court? We contend, therefore, that as this court have not a jurisdiction strong enough to enforce the payment of the debt, said to be due from Simon Smith to the orator, that consequently they have no power over it. And if they have no power over the debt itself, they can give no relief for any act in fraud of that debt. If it is said, that the question of jurisdiction must be decided according to the state of facts at the commencement of the action, and that the orator at the time of preferring the present bill was a judgment creditor of Simon Smith, I will admit the conclusiveness of the argument so far as it relates to Simon Smith. I will also admit, that the judgment is legal evidence against the respondents, who are not parties to them, for the purpose of proving the plaintiff to be a creditor of Simon Smith. But I do not admit, that the judgment of court obtained by the orator against Simon Smith six months after the obnoxious conveyances can at all affect the rights of those not parties to it. All the rights of the orator to prosecute the respondents accrued to him, when the conveyances of the real estates were made. And the question of jurisdiction must be settled according to the state of facts at that time. At that time the orator was assignee of John Harris, and it is submitted with some confidence, that if the orator could not maintain a suit in this court at the time the injury was committed, nothing which has been done since by Simon Smith and the orator, without the privity of the other respondents, will enable them to maintain a suit now.

We object, in the second place, to the jurisdiction of the court, because there is a plain, adequate, and complete remedy at law. In England, the courts of law and equity have concurrent jurisdiction in many cases. The case of fraud is emphatically one of the number. But the courts of the United States have not concurrent jurisdiction in any case, for the statute has confined the attention of courts of equity to cases, which cannot be heard in a court of law. The language of the statute is, where "plain, adequate, and complete remedy may be had at law." If, therefore, the orator has any remedy at law, this court cannot interfere, for the word "remedy" is as full of meaning when standing alone, as when accompanied with the words, "plain," "adequate" and "complete." It ceases to be a remedy the moment it ceases to be plain, adequate, and complete. The word "remedy" is technically confined to proceedings before judgment. Wherever a plaintiff can obtain judgment against another for any injury, he has a plain remedy. Whether he can obtain satisfaction of that judgment, depends on the ability of the defendant, and the local regulations of the state in which the judgment is obtained. 2 Bac. Abr. 685; Co. Litt. 289.

Has the orator, then, a remedy at law? In order to judge of this, we must take his case as it is stated. By the bill it appears, that Simon Smith has conspired with the other respondents to defraud the orator of his just debts. The conveyances are used as means only. Can there be any doubt, that at the common law a creditor can obtain judgment against those who conspire to defraud him of his just debts? Such actions are common in England and in this country. Not only are the conveyances void at law, but all parties to an actual fraud, whether in the sale of real or personal estate, are liable to an action on the case. A conveyance in fraudem legis merely, is subject to a different consideration. The circuit court of the United States, in deciding whether there is a plain remedy at law, is not to regard the statute laws of any particular state, nor suffer itself to be influenced by a regard to the practice prevailing in any of the courts of this, or any other state. If such considerations had weight, the jurisdiction of this court would not be fixed and established by a known and certain rule, but would change and fluctuate, in order to accommodate itself to the different rules prevailing in different states. This court, therefore, cannot regard the feeble jurisdiction of the courts in Rhode-Island, nor decide that the orator has not a remedy at law, because (except in certain cases) the laws of Rhode-Island do not allow the sale of real estate for the payment of debts. The language of the supreme court in [Russell v. Clark,] 7 Cranch, [11 U. S.] 89, is strong in affirmance of the doctrine here advanced. "It is true, (say the court) that if certain facts, essential to the merits of the claim, purely legally, be exclusively within the knowledge of the party against whom that claim is asserted, he may be required in a court of chancery to disclose those facts, and the court being thus rightly in possession of the cause, will proceed to determine the whole matter in controversy. But this rule cannot be abused by being employed as a mere pretext for bringing causes proper for a court of law, into a court of equity. If the answer of the defendant discloses nothing, and the plaintiff supports his claim by evidence in his own possession, unaided by the confessions of the defendant, the established rules limiting the jurisdiction of courts, require that he should be dismissed from the court of chancery, and permitted to assert his rights in a court of law."

By a reference to the cases before the court it will be perceived, that the deeds of the Rounds and Wells farms to the daughters of Simon Smith are deeds of gift, and void as against creditors both at law and in equity. The fee of the Waterman lot and the wood lot to Ziba is by a deed of gift. Can it be said, that as respects these conveyances the orator has not a plain, adequate, and complete remedy at law? Can they expect the respondents to disclose any facts "exclusively within their knowledge?" So far from this, the deeds are void on their very faces, and this court would not allow the respondents to offer any evidence in support of them. If a consideration had really been paid, parol evidence to prove the fact would be inadmissible.

Where, then, is the necessity of resorting to a court of equity to obtain relief against conveyances, which are void of themselves? If a necessity does exist, it arises not from any general defect in the laws, but from the peculiar statute in force in Rhode-Island, which does not allow the lands of a debtor to be seized or sold for the payment of his debts, so long as the debtor himself may be found. This is conceived to be the whole difficulty under which the orator labors, and this difficulty must be removed by the legislature of Rhode-Island, not by this court. It is very clear, that so far as respects the deeds of gift, the orator has derived no aid from the answers of the respondents, and that the "established rules limiting the jurisdiction of courts require, that he should be dismissed from the court of chancery, and permitted to assert his rights in a court of law." The same rule applies with equal force to the other conveyances. Whatever fraud the orator may imagine, none is proved by the answers of the respondents, and if the orator has evidence in his own possession to prove the fraud, that evidence will be heard with the same patience in a court of law as in a court of equity.

This last objection to the jurisdiction of this court, (whatever doubts may be entertained of the first) is made from a sincere conviction, that it applies unanswerably to this case. It is not made from any fears entertained by the respondents of the issue of a contest on the merits of the case. They do assert, and have always asserted, that the conveyances from Simon Smith to his sons and sons-in-law, were not made with any fraudulent intention, but bona fide and for a valuable consideration.

Snow and Searle, for the plaintiff, contended as to the jurisdiction of the court, that at the time the original debt was contracted and the bills of exchange drawn, both the indorsers of these bills were citizens of Rhode-Island, and that the indorsee then was and ever since had been a citizen and inhabitant of Massachusetts; that all, or nearly all, the facts involved in this suit, took place in the former state. And they argued, that no suit by the indorsers against the maker, or by the second indorser against the first, could be maintained in this court, whilst all the parties continued to be citizens and inhabitants of Rhode-Island. But that the indorsee might have maintained a suit against his immediate indorser, for as between them the indorsement created a new contract. And if the two indorsers had removed from Rhode-Island, and become citizens of different states previous to the suit, there was no doubt but that this court would have jurisdiction of any suit between either the indorsers, or the indorsee and indorsers, or drawer, and of a suit between the holder and an indorser, although the drawer and both indorsers were citizens of Rhode-Island at the time the bill was drawn, and at the time the right of action accrued, and although all the material facts arose in that state.

The present complainant has prosecuted in the state court his demand on the bill of exchange, against Simon Smith, and has recovered judgment, and there can be no doubt, but that he can pursue in this court any remedy either at law or equity, which he has against Simon Smith, to recover the amount of that judgment. At the time of committing the frauds charged in the bill, the complainant was the holder of the drafts, and the frauds (if any) were perpetrated to his immediate injury, and he could at all times maintain his suit in law or equity against the perpetrators of this fraud, who were all citizens of this state, except as to Simon Smith, who, as an indorser, could not in the first instance be sued in the circuit court. But Smith, being now liable in this court for that debt, or for any act he has done to defeat the payment of it, and all the other parties having been always liable in this court, I am at a loss to discover any legal objection to the jurisdiction. But we apprehend there can be no doubt, but that this complainant might, without having resorted to the state court on his bill of exchange, have filed his bill in equity in the first instance in this court against Simon Smith and all the present respondents. He could not, it is true, have sued Simon here as indorser of the bill, but he was still a creditor of Simon, and the bill would have been legal evidence of a debt on the trial of the bill in equity. The bill in equity charges a fraud, and a conspiracy, to defraud the complainant, and if the fact could have been made out on the trial, I apprehend, that the complainant would have been entitled to a decree, although his remedy at law against one of the conspirators, might have been prosecuted before the state court.

As to the present question, we can perceive no difference between an assignee creditor, and an original creditor, or one to whom a promise is directly made. If he be a real creditor at the time of the supposed fraud, his rights and his remedy are abundantly sufficient to hold the delinquent accountable. Indeed, it is not very material, whether the party litigating be a creditor, or not, at the time of the fraud. A subsequent creditor may set aside transfers to defraud prior creditors. And if the very debt, to defeat the payment of which, the fraudulent transfers were made, is demanded in the present suit, it can avail nothing to the fraudulent party, that the debt has since passed into other hands. As to the existence of the debt against Simon Smith, we believe no question can be made about it. It is now established by judgment of court, and that judgment proves it existed as a debt at the times when the alleged frauds were committed.

The second objection to the jurisdiction rests on as feeble grounds as the first. The supreme court of the United States in the case of Ammidon v. Smith, 1 Wheat. [14 U. S.] 447, which grew out of the same transactions as the present, directed that the plaintiff had no remedy at law upon the bond given for the liberty of the jail yard, nor did they intimate the existence of any other remedy at law. And when the chief justice remarks in that case, (pages 458, 460,) that there "was so much turpitude in the act confessed by the demurrer," and that the defence was so flagitious, the court found a difficulty in considering it as a naked point of law, and that the jurisprudence of Rhode-Island must be defective indeed, if it furnished no remedy for such a mischief, I presume he had a pretty direct reference to the kind of remedy we are now pursuing. The original demand is certainly merged in the judgment, the judgment as to all proceedings at law, seems to be satisfied by the issuing of execution, the commitment of the body, and the execution of the bond for the liberty of the jail yard. The only legal remedy, then, seems to be confined to the bond, and the court have decided, that there is no remedy at law against the parties to that bond.

If any right of action exists against these respondents jointly, it must be, I presume, a special action on the case, charging the defendants with a conspiracy to defraud, and, with having defrauded the complainants. But admitting this right of action to exist, it is no objection to the present suit. There are many cases, in which courts of law and equity have concurrent jurisdiction in relation to frauds, trusts, and contracts, and in perhaps three-fourths of the cases decided in equity, the complainant had some remedy at law, as in cases between co-partners for the settlement of their accounts. In almost every case of a bill filed for specific performance of a contract, the complainant might sue at law, and recover damages. In bills filed to compel the execution of trusts. In almost all those cases the complainant might sue at law. In numerous cases where accounts are to be taken, a bill is sustained, as a more convenient mode of settling them than by a jury. But where the bill is filed to set aside fraudulent conveyances, it seems to be peculiarly the right and duty of a court of equity to sustain it, and for one plain reason amongst many others, because a remedy or special kind of relief is asked, which cannot be granted at law, viz. that the fraudulent grantee be adjudged to re-convey, or convey to others, as the court shall direct, and that the fraudulent deed shall never after be set up as giving any title. This cannot be done in a trial at common law, for although a jury may incidentally find a conveyance fraudulent, yet the deed remains a subsisting deed, and the title is still in the fraudulent grantee, and the deed and the title under it may be re-asserted as often as the question of fraud is raised at law, but a court of equity sets the fraudulent deed aside, or directs a sale, or a re-conveyance by the grantee, and puts definitely an end to all dispute on the subject. And although some of the deeds are voluntary, and void on the face of them as to creditors, yet this is no objection to equity jurisdiction, but it seems to be equally at least the right and the duty of the judge in chancery, to set aside the deeds, and dispose of the property according to law and equity. But if the deeds, or any of them, are fraudulent and void, the grantee is undoubtedly accountable in equity for the rents and profits, and accounts may be necessary to be taken. I am not at present informed of any remedy at law, which the grantor or a creditor has against the fraudulent grantee, for these rents and profits. The grantee is concluded by his deed, and a creditor, or a purchaser on a creditor's execution, could not recover rents and profits accruing previous to his title. And it seems peculiarly the province of equity to decide all such questions, to the end, that full, adequate, and complete justice may be done to all parties. But suppose a deed should be partially or constructively fraudulent, and should be a valid security to a certain extent, but not to one quarter the value of the estate conveyed. In such a case, a court of law can pursue no middle course, but must treat the deed as entirely void, or as sufficient to convey the whole estate, and in either case injustice might be done. Equity, however, can reform, or rather conform, the deed to the justice of the case, by letting it stand as a security for the first amount, and decree it void as to the residue. In all these cases, I presume there can be no question as to the jurisdiction of a court of equity, and yet in all, or nearly all, of them, perhaps the creditor or creditors may have some kind of remedy, (adequate or inadequate) at common law.

There is nothing in the 7 Cranch, [11 U. S.] which militates against the positions we have stated, or the jurisdiction of the court in this case. All that the court meant to decide, was, that when the bill contains charges purely legal, and the complainant depends upon the defendant's answer to furnish proof of his equity claim, and the defendant denies every thing in his answer, the bill must be dismissed. And for a very plain reason, viz. there is no equity charged in the bill, and none disclosed in the answer. But the court never meant to decide, nor even to intimate, that where sufficient equity is charged in the bill, it is to be dismissed for want of jurisdiction, because the defendant denies the charges in his answer, but the case goes on to a hearing, and if the complainant proves his equity charges, he has a decree notwithstanding the denial in the answer, and if he cannot produce such proof, the bill is dismissed not for want of jurisdiction, but for want of proof. If, therefore, in this case the complainant has charged no matter in his bill entitling him to relief, and if the defendants in their answers have disclosed none, we admit the bill must be dismissed; but if the charges embrace matter entitling the complainant to relief if true, the case is no doubt completely within the jurisdiction of the court, and the decree must depend upon the proof. As to the evidence of fraud it is contended, that all the circumstances in the case prove, that the conveyances were made by Smith for the purpose of defrauding his creditors, and were not bona fide as they purported to be. He conveyed away all his estate both real and personal, and threw himself and wife, in their old age, upon the charity of the world. The conveyances were all made to his own children, and very nearly at the same time, and before witnesses who belonged to the family. These conveyances were made at the time suits were pending against Smith. There were no settlements, computations, or receipts, made or given at the time. These, and all the other features of the transaction, clearly demonstrated, that the conveyances were a mere cover to protect these lands from the creditors of Smith. If the court is satisfied, that the transactions were fraudulent, it can afford the plaintiff Bean, ample remedy, by setting aside the fraudulent deeds. 1 Johns. Ch. 478; 2 Johns. 297. It may order the property to be sold to pay the plaintiff. Sands v. Codwise, 4 Johns. 600; 3 Johns. Ch. 481, 507. If the land is sold to bona fide purchasers, the fraudulent grantee is liable for the value. 1 Mod. 260. Deeds fraudulent on the part of the grantor may be set aside, though bona fide as to the grantee. 2 Johns. Ch. 42; 14 Ves. Jr. 289. A bona fide purchaser from a fraudulent grantee, acquires no title by the conveyance, against the creditors of the fraudulent grantor. 3 Johns. Ch. 378; 1 Day, 527.

If the grantor was fraudulent the grantee must suffer the consequences, and is accountable for the rents and profits. Simon Smith, senior, in this case deposited his property in the hands of his children, so that he might be enabled to take the poor debtor's oath. Are they not, therefore, to be considered as trustees for the benefit of his creditors? The fee is in them not to their own use, but in trust for creditors. Equity will order the trust estate to be sold. In this case the court may order the estates conveyed to the children of Smith, to be sold to pay his debts, or may decree against them as trustees personally for the value of the estates and the rents and profits, or order the complainant's debts to be paid.

Whipple, in reply.

It is deemed unnecessary to answer most of the authorities cited. The principles are correct with some exceptions, but their applicability is denied. That a bona fide purchaser for a valuable consideration, should suffer for the fraudulent intentions of the grantor, is so repugnant to common sense, that it is extraordinary, that so great a man as Chancellor Kent, with all his attachment to authority, should, for a moment, have doubted about it. With his usual frankness, however, he corrects himself in 3 Johns. Ch. 378. The only question is, whether the deeds were taken by the grantees bona fide, and with a view to secure themselves, or to aid the grantor in delaying and defrauding creditors. This is a matter of evidence rather than law. That the grantor meant to prefer particular creditors cannot be doubted. That he paid, what he called his private debts, by transferring real estate at from ten to twenty per cent above its value, is fully proved. The residue he chose to give away rather than retain. That he had a right to prefer creditors whose debts originated in hard labor and money advanced, to those who speculated upon his misfortunes, and bought up Gloucester bills at from 60 to 70 per ct. discount, as they themselves prove, cannot be denied. Finch Prec. 105; 1 Fonbl. Eq. 277. The grantor in 1809, owed debts to the amount of $19,540. In payment of those debts he conveyed lands to the value of $13,500. The other conveyances were voluntary.

Can the court order a sale of the land conveyed by deeds of gift? It is difficult to tell, what a court of chancery can or cannot do. All the power which the chancery in England at present possesses has its origin in the decrees of the chancellor, not in the statutes of the realm or the usages of the people. And the boast of their learned writers, that common law is common usage, is just as true, as that the chancellor of England is bound by a fixed and stubborn rule. The power of the chancellor has been increasing from time to time, and every new chancellor establishes new rules in addition, and sometimes in opposition, to old ones, and at this day none but those, whose ardent attachment to the law blinds their better judgment, will contend, that the chancellors of England for the last century, have been bound by any rules but those of their own making. They have none of them as yet established the precedent of selling real estate for the payment of debts, unless by virtue of the contract of the parties. In this country it may be done by the chancellors of those states, the laws of which authorize such a proceeding. The laws of Rhode-Island are opposed to such a sale, and it is submitted with confidence, that the statute of the United States has not conferred the power on this court. General chancery powers are given in all cases, where a remedy may not be had at law. And it follows conclusively, that this court does not possess the power, unless the chancellor of England also does.

It is believed that no case can be found of a voluntary grantee's being made a trustee. It is a case of actual, not constructive fraud, that has called forth such strange decisions. It was formerly thought, that a man could not be made a trustee without his own consent. It has been often decided, that the court of chancery has no power to punish for a fraud, and yet they decide, that a grantee shall be made a trustee, and shall convey to creditors, and in default of complying with the decree, imprisonment follows. This would appear to be punishing a man for a fraud, although it is called punishment for contempt of court. This power in its operation would be very partial and unjust, as it would give to creditors in other states, control over the real estate of their debtors in Rhode-Island, which Rhode-Island creditors do not possess.

STORY, Circuit Justice. A preliminary objection has been taken to the jurisdiction of the court, upon two grounds, 1. That the plaintiff claims as assignee of a chose in action, on which, independent of such assignment, no suit could be sustained in this court. 2. That there is a complete and adequate remedy at law, and therefore no reason for the interposition of a court of equity.

The suit is between citizens of different states, and plainly within the general jurisdiction of the circuit court, unless it falls within the restrictive clause of the 11th section of the judiciary act of 1789, c. 20, which declares, that the circuit court shall "not have cognizance of any suit to recover the contents of any promissory note, or other chose in action, in favor of an assignee, unless a suit might have been prosecuted in such court to recover the said contents, if no assignment had been made, except in cases of foreign bills of exchange." The bills in which the transactions disclosed in the present case originated, were drawn by a person resident in one state, upon a person resident in another state, and whether they be foreign or inland bills in the sense of the statute, is a question worthy of serious deliberation, upon which much contrariety of opinion has been entertained. As this question has not been argued at the bar, and is not indispensable to a correct decision of this case, I pass it over with the single remark, that I do not wish to be understood as acquiescing in the doctrine, that bills drawn in one state upon drawees living in another state, are to be deemed inland bills. I entertain great doubts as to the correctness of that doctrine, and am not alone in these doubts, and before I come to a decision, I should choose to hear the question fully discussed with all the learning and principles that belong to it.

The present suit is not brought upon any bills of exchange, but at most upon a judgment rendered in favour of the plaintiff against Simon Smith, one of the defendants, upon certain protested bills of exchange, indorsed by Simon Smith, in the state court of Rhode-Island. The chose in action has therefore passed in rem judicatem; and so far as Simon Smith is concerned, is absorbed and extinguished by the judgment. The claim of the plaintiff is not now in virtue of any assignment, but of a direct judgment in his favor; and if the suit were now at law upon the judgment itself, there cannot be a doubt of the jurisdiction of this court to sustain it. In deciding on its jurisdiction, the court can only look to the immediate groundwork of the suit, not to any remote or collateral considerations in which it had its origin. It is no objection to the jurisdiction, that at some anterior period the transaction assumed a shape not within the reach of that jurisdiction. It is sufficient, if it has now become so modified by the act of the parties, or by the principles of law, that jurisdiction now rightfully attaches.

Taking, then, the case in the most favourable view for the argument of the defendants' counsel, it is a suit upon a judgment between citizens of different states, and does not fall within the statute of prohibition. But in truth, the suit is not, strictly speaking, founded solely upon a judgment. The judgment is collateral. It forms an ingredient, and an essential ingredient, in the case; but it is not the whole of the case. The plaintiff seeks for relief against fraudulent conveyances of property, executed by the defendant Simon Smith, to the other co-defendants, for the alleged purpose of defeating the plaintiff of his just rights as a creditor under the judgment. It is these fraudulent conveyances which constitute the immediate ground-work of the suit, and so far as respects all the defendants, except Simon Smith, the sole ground-work of the suit. They were never liable, either upon the original bills or judgment, nor had the plaintiff any claim against them, in his mere character as assignee. If they are liable to him at all, it is because they are parties to a meditated fraud to his injury, or as trustees holding property for his use. His right to sue them, is not a right which once vested in another person, and has passed to him by assignment. It is a right, which originally sprung up after the assignment to him, and from new transactions. And the same observations apply with equal force to Simon Smith. It is not his liability to the plaintiff under the original assignment of the bills of exchange indorsed by Simon Smith, that is now in question, and is now sought to be enforced; but a new right collateral to that, growing out of a direct judgment between the parties, and an asserted fraud injurious to the plaintiff, which has been devised to avoid the satisfaction of that judgment. It is perfectly clear, that the statute never contemplated an exclusion of jurisdiction in cases where a mere negotiable instrument, or chose in action, was mixed up in the ingredients of the case; but where that chose in action constituted the sole cause of action, and the assignment constituted the whole ground of the plaintiff's right. I have no difficulty, therefore, in overruling this objection to the jurisdiction of the court, for the reasons already stated, although the other arguments of the plaintiff's counsel would, in case of any doubt, have been entitled to great consideration.

The other objection is not so much to the competency of the court, as in the nature of a demurrer to the bill for want of equity. Much stress has been laid upon that clause of the judiciary act of 1789, [1 Stat. 82,]

c. 20, § 16, which declares, "that suits in equity shall not be sustained in either of the courts of the United States, in any case where plain, adequate and complete remedy may be had at law." I take this clause to be merely affirmative of the general doctrine of courts of equity, and in no sense intended to narrow the jurisdiction of such courts. It has been repeatedly held by the supreme court, that the equity jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, does not depend upon what is exercised by courts of equity, or courts of law, in the several states; but depends upon what is a proper subject of equitable relief in courts of equity in England, the great reservoir from which we have extracted our principles of jurisprudence. Robinson v. Campbell, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 212, 221; U. S. v. Howland, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 108, 115. If, therefore, a bill of this sort, states a case properly within the cognizance of courts of equity, according to the general doctrines of their jurisprudence, I should have no difficulty in overruling this objection, although the state courts of Rhode-Island, might afford some sort of remedy at law to aid the plaintiff. There are many cases in which courts of law and equity exercise a concurrent jurisdiction, and the judiciary act never intended to disturb that jurisdiction. In such cases, it is supposed that the remedy at law is not adequate and complete for all the purposes for which the plaintiff may claim relief. Herbert v. Wren, 7 Cranch, [11 U. S.] 370, 376. There cannot be a doubt, that this bill states a case, which is entirely fit and proper, if it be proved, for the interference of a court of equity. Nothing is more common, than for courts of equity, upon bills filed for the purpose, to set aside conveyances made to defraud judgment creditors. It is a case peculiarly belonging to its jurisprudence, and adequate and complete relief cannot be obtained at law. Coop. Eq. Pl. 148; 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. 77, pl. 13; Smithier v. Lewis, 1 Vern. 398; Mountford v. Taylor, 6 Ves. 788; Bennet v. Musgrove, 2 Ves. Sr. 51; 3 Bac. Abr. "Fraud," D; Com. Dig. "Chancery," 3, M; Id. "Covin," B, 2.

But I go yet farther in the case now before the court, and affirm not only that the bill presents a case of equitable jurisdiction; but that under the peculiar laws of Rhode-Island, which do not, except in a few specified cases, make lands liable for debts, there is no remedy, at least no adequate remedy at law; and that if the plaintiff be entitled to any relief, he must seek it exclusively in a court of equity. The case is wholly unlike that to which the supreme court alluded in the language cited at the bar, from Russell v. Clark, 7 Cranch, [11 U. S.] 69, 89. The language there used, supposes that the bill states no case for equitable relief, but only asks for a discovery on which to found equitable relief; and if the answer discloses none, then as neither bill nor answer shews any title to such relief, the parties must be dismissed to their remedy at law. Here, the bill does state a case for equitable relief; and though the answers of some of the defendants deny the facts on which that relief is sought, that is a question, not of jurisdiction but of proof. As to some of the parties the bill is confessedly true, for they claim under voluntary deeds of gift, which the law deems fraudulent as to creditors. We may then dismiss any farther consideration of the preliminary questions of jurisdiction, and pass to the merits of the case as they stand disclosed in the pleadings and evidence.

Before, however, proceeding to this discussion, it may be as well to dispose of another point urged at the bar, and which is of vast practical consequence; I mean the doctrine, that a bona fide purchaser for a valuable consideration, without notice, cannot protect the estate in his own hands, against creditors, where he derives his title to the estate through a grantee to whom it was originally conveyed for the purpose of defrauding the creditors of the first grantor. This doctrine is certainly supported by high authority of a recent date, and the cases cited at the bar are fully in point. Until I had perused these cases, I am free to confess, that I was not aware that there was in this respect any difference between the operation of the statute of 13th of Elizabeth, (chapter 5,) which avoids conveyances made in fraud of creditors, and that of the 27th of Elizabeth, (chapter 4,) which avoids conveyances made in fraud of subsequent purchasers. An unbroken current of authorities establishes beyond question, that a bona fide purchaser for a valuable consideration, without notice, shall hold the estate, notwithstanding he claims through a grantee to whom it had been conveyed in fraud of purchasers. 1 Fonbl. Eq. bk. 1, c. 4, § 13, note f, p. 278; Rob. Fraud. Conv. p. 496, c. 4, § 10; Prodgers v. Langham, 1 Sid. 133; Newport's Case, Skin. 423, 3 Lev. 267; Doe v. Martyr, 1 Bos. & P. (N. S.) 332. But Mr. Chancellor Kent has held, in Roberts v. Anderson, 3 Johns. Ch. 371, that the same doctrine does not apply, where there has been a conveyance to defraud creditors. If this be so it is certainly a departure from the general doctrine of courts of equity, on the subject of bona fide purchasers without notice. So solicitous are courts of equity to preserve the rights of persons in this predicament, that Lord Chancellor Loughborough, in Jerrard v. Saunders, 2 Ves. Jr. 454, 458, (Coop. Eq. Pl. 281; and see Bassett v. Nosworthy, Finch, 102; 2 Fonbl. Eq. bk. 3, p. 307, c. 3, § 3,) emphatically declared, that against them the court would not take the least step imaginable. They are not only treated as favourites of courts of equity, but the common law in many instances, holds their titles good, although in the hands of the original grantees, the titles were infected with the taint of fraud, or other analogous infirmity. Com. Dig. "Covin," B; Prodgers v. Langham, 1

Sid. 133; Woodcock's Case, 33 Hen. 6, 14; Shep. Touch. 66; Hob. 166; Bingham's Case, 2 Coke, 91, 94; Gibbs v. Chase, 10 Mass. 125; Jackson v. Henry, 10 Johns. 185; Jackson v. Walsh, 14 Johns. 407; 1 Fonbl. Eq. p. 268, c. 4, § 11, note Y. If, therefore, the doctrine is to stand, it must stand either as an exception founded upon public policy; or upon the positive provisions of the statutes of 13th and 27th of Elizabeth. As to public policy, it remains to be demonstrated that it would be essentially promoted by the alleged exception; at least it does not strike one, that there is any general reasoning on this head, which would not apply with equal force to subsequent purchasers, as well as to creditors. There is the same injustice and mischief in allowing a subsequent purchaser without notice from the fraudulent grantor, to be defeated in his rights by a prior conveyance to a like purchaser from the fraudulent grantee, as in the analogous case affecting creditors. The ground cannot be, that in the former case the conveyance is voluntary, and takes effect between the parties and their representatives, for that is equally true as to conveyances in fraud of creditors. The real ground of the doctrine must be, that where the parties are equally innocent and equally meritorious in their titles, the law will give a preference to that title which has a priority in point of time, upon the maxim "qui prior est in tempore potior est in jure." A conveyance to defraud purchasers, or to defraud creditors, is not "utterly void," as has been sometimes supposed; it conveys the estate effectually as between the parties and their representatives; and the estate may be maintained against all persons but those whom it was intended to defraud. The grantor himself cannot convey the same title to any mere volunteer, nor can he avoid his own grant in his own favour; nor can a mere stranger contest the validity of the conveyance. Rob. Fraud. Conv. p. 498, c. 4, § 10; Dame Burg's Case, Moore, 602; Fonbl. Eq. bk. 1, p. 273, c. 4, § 12, note. The estate, therefore passes toties quoties by every subsequent conveyance, and it is good against all the world, except creditors and purchasers, in the possession of every successive grantee, even with notice of the fraud. Mr. Chancellor Kent says (Roberts v. Anderson, 3 Johns. Ch. 371, 378) that "if the fraudulent grantee be enabled to sell, the grantor cannot call those proceeds out of his hands." This is very true; but neither can he recall the land itself, or avoid his own grant. He adds, "and the grantee can either appropriate them to his own use, or to the secret trusts upon which the conveyance was made." And he thence deduces the conclusion, that "there is more danger of abuse, and that the object of the statute could be more easily defeated in the one case (i. e. of creditors) than in the other," (i. e. of purchasers). It may be asked of that eminent judge, whether the doctrine, here asserted, be correct? Is it true, that the grantee can appropriate the proceeds of a sale to his own use, or to the secret trusts of the fraudulent conveyance against a judgment creditor? Will not a court of equity decree, that the fraudulent grantee shall account to the judgment creditor for the amount of the proceeds of the sale, considering them as a mere substitution for the original fund? It appears to me, that such a course is within the established doctrine and practice of the court. Equity will permit a creditor of an estate to sue the debtor, where there is collusion between the latter and the executor. Benfield v. Solomons, 9 Ves. 77, 86; Alsager v. Rowley, 6 Ves. 748; Doran v. Simpson, 4 Ves. 651. A fortiori it will sustain a suit where the very fund appropriated by law for the payment of the debt, is withheld by a fraudulent grantee. See Hendricks v. Robinson, 2 Johns. Ch. 283; and see Rob. Fraud. Conv. p. 502, c. 4, § 10; Gore v. Brazier, 3 Mass. 541; 3 Poth. Pand. lib. 42, p. 195, tit. 8, art. 3, § 24. If, then, the reasoning of the learned judge on this point, proceeds upon principles which are inadmissible, the conclusion drawn from those principles, may well be doubted. No peculiar principle of public policy has been shewn to exist in respect to creditors, which entitles them to a preference over other bona fide purchasers. They stand in truth in the character of purchasers for a valuable consideration, and not above them. The analogies of the law do not support any peculiar distinction in their favour. The policy of the law generally, is to support bona fide purchasers for a valuable consideration in the titles acquired; and this policy is at least as ancient as Woodcock's Case, in 33 Hen. VI. 14, where a conveyance from a fraudulent grantee to such a purchaser, was permitted to defeat highly meritorious and legal claims. The great object of the law is to afford certainty and repose to titles honestly acquired. It is of no public utility to destroy titles so acquired, on account of the taint of a prior secret fraud, which was unsuspected and unknown, and which probably no diligence could detect. If the creditor of the original grantor be cheated by holding such titles valid, the innocent purchaser would be no less cheated by holding them void. And, therefore, the common law which leans to equity, is unwilling to visit upon innocent persons, the consequences of fraud. It enables them to hold estates acquired bona fide for a valuable consideration, purged of the anterior fraud that infected the title.

Then as to the statutes of 13th and 27th of Elizabeth. In their most material provisions, they have, in modern times, been held as merely affirmative of the common law, (Cadogan v. Kennett, Cowp. 432, 434; Sands v. Codwise, 4 Johns. 536, 596; Hamilton v. Russel, 1 Cranch, [5 U. S.] 316;) and one should cautiously put upon them any construction, which implies a departure from that law. In the only case, where such a departure under the 27th of Elizabeth, has been tolerated, I mean in respect to the rights of a subsequent purchaser with notice, to set aside a voluntary conveyance, courts and jurists in modern times, have felt the difficulty of sustaining that doctrine upon any sound principles, where the voluntary conveyance is not a meditated fraud; and if the point were new, it would be, I had almost said, immoral to adopt it. It stands drily upon authority, and we bow to it neither with reverence nor affection. The statute of 13th of Elizabeth (chapter 5,) in the first section, declares, that all and every feoffment, gift, grant, alienation, bargain, and conveyance of lands, &c. goods, &c. made with intent to delay, hinder, or defraud creditors and others, of their just actions, suits, debts, &c. "shall be from henceforth deemed and taken only as against that person or persons, his or their heirs, &c. executors, &c. whose actions, suits, debts, &c. by such guileful, covinous, or fraudulent devices and practices as aforesaid, are, or shall, or might be in any wise disturbed, hindered, delayed or defrauded, to be clearly and utterly void, frustrate, and of none effect." The sixth section of the same statute, contains a proviso, that "this act, or any thing therein contained, shall not extend to any estate or interest in lands, &c. goods, &c. had, made, conveyed, or assured, or thereafter to be had, made, conveyed, or assured, which estate or interest is, or shall be, upon good consideration, and bona fide lawfully conveyed or assured to any person or persons, or bodies politic or incorporate, not having, at the time of such conveyance or assurance to them made, any manner of notice or knowledge of such covin, fraud, or collusion, as is aforesaid." It is observable, that this proviso does not use the expression, feoffment, gift, or grant, &c. but estate and interest, and that there is not a syllable in it, which points to any estate or interest derived directly from the fraudulent grantor, any more than from the fraudulent grantee. The language in its just interpretation, applies equally well to an estate derived from either. And it would be somewhat strange, if it were intended merely to apply to an estate or interest derived from the grantor. In the first place, if such estate or interest was before the fraudulent conveyance, it is manifest, that it could not be affected by it, in any manner whatsoever. In the next place, if it were after such conveyance, then by excepting such cases from the operation of the act, it would leave such estate or interest, exactly where the act found it, to be judged of according to the rules of the common law. And if the common law would give effect to such second grant as against creditors, (as would probably now be held) then the creditors would be just as much defrauded, as they would be by a second grant of the grantee, being held valid. For if the second grant of the grantor could convey a good title directly, and purged of the fraud, the public mischief would be quite as great, as if he conveyed indirectly through the medium of his fraudulent grantee. If, on the other hand, as it seems to be thought, the old law stood, (see Halsey's Case, Lane, 105; Upton v. Basset, Cro. Eliz. 445,) the second grant from the grantor could not avoid the first grant, then there would be still less reason to suppose, that the proviso meant to save only an estate or interest derived from the grantor, which the law held utterly defective and inoperative. There seems, then, no reason founded on the intent of the statute, why the language should be held less comprehensive in its operation than the terms import.

Then, as to the statute of 27th Elizabeth, c. 4. The first section declares all and every conveyance, gifts, grants, &c. of lands, &c. made for the intent to defraud and deceive such person or persons, &c. as have purchased, or shall thereafter purchase, in fee simple, &c. the same lands, &c. "shall be deemed and taken only as against that person or persons, &c. his and their heirs, &c. and against all and every other person and persons, lawfully having or claiming by, from, or under them, or any of them, which shall have purchased or shall thereafter so purchase for money, or other good consideration, the same lands, &c. to be utterly void, frustrate, and of none effect." Then comes a proviso in the 4th section, "that this act or any thing therein contained, shall not extend, or be construed to impeach, defeat, make void, or frustrate, any conveyance, &c. assurance, grant, &c. estate, interest, &c. of any lands, &c. heretofore at any time had or made, or hereafter to be had or made, upon or for good consideration, and bona fide to any person or persons, &c." And another proviso in the sixth section extends the same protection to every "lawful mortgage made or to be made bona fide, and without fraud or covin upon good consideration." Now it is observable, that these enactments are substantially like those of the 13th of Elizabeth, as to their objects. In each, the fraudulent conveyance is declared "utterly void," as to the persons intended to be defrauded, and is limited to those persons. In each, there is an exception of estates acquired bona fide, and upon good consideration; and the only marked difference of language is, that the proviso of the 27th of Elizabeth, drops the expression of the 13th of Elizabeth, as to notice of the fraud by such purchaser. In the proviso of the 27th of Elizabeth, there is no qualification or limitation as to the person, from whom the conveyance or estate is acquired; and it has been always held to apply equally to estates derived from the fraudulent grantor and grantee. And this, not upon any necessary construction of the statute, but upon the principles of the common law. Prodgers v. Langham, 1 Sid. 133, is a leading authority on this head. There the court agreed, that though a deed might be fraudulent in its creation, and voidable by the purchaser, yet it might be made good by matter ex post facto; as if one made a feoffment by covin, and the feoffee makes a feoffment for a valuable consideration, and then the first feoffor enters and makes a feoffment for a valuable consideration, the feoffee of the first feoffee shall hold the land, and not the feoffee of the first feoffor. The reason assigned by the court is, not that such is the construction of the language of the statute, forcing them to such a conclusion, but that such is the common law; for, say the court, though the estate of the first feoffee was in its creation, "covinous and so voidable; yet when he enfeoffs upon a valuable consideration, this shall be preferred before the last." Precisely the same reasoning applies to the case of creditors, under the 13th of Elizabeth. The estate is not utterly void as to all persons; but voidable, and voidable by creditors only; and a bona fide transfer by the grantee ought to convey the estate purged of the fraud.

I repeat it, that until I saw the case of Roberts v. Anderson, 3 Johns. Ch. 371, which professes, in no small degree, to be founded upon that of Preston v. Crofut, 1 Day, 527, note, the asserted distinction which we have been considering, between the operation of the statute of 13th Elizabeth, and that of 27th Elizabeth, was utterly unknown to me. I have searched with some diligence, to ascertain if that distinction has been recognized in any adjudged case, or in any elementary treatise in England. Hitherto my researches have been unsuccessful. In Wilson v. Wormal, Godb. 161, however, Lord Chief Justice Coke, than whom no man was probably better acquainted with the statute, or its true construction, lays down the doctrine that in terms denies the distinction. He says, that "if lessee for years assign over his term by fraud to defeat the execution (upon a judgment against him); and the assignee assigneth the same over unto another bona fide, that in the hands of the second assignee, it is not liable to execution." In Gore v. Brazier, 3 Mass. 523, 541, Chief Justice Parsons manifestly understood the law in the same way. He says, "a bona fide alienation for a valuable consideration by a devisee, has been compared by the counsel for the defendant to a case, where a fraudulent purchaser has afterwards bona fide, and for a valuable consideration conveyed, in which case the last purchaser shall hold the land purged of the fraud. But the two cases are not alike in principle, for the consideration money received by the devisee, cannot be personal assets in the hands of the executor." The like doctrine is directly asserted by the supreme court of Massachusetts, in a recent case, (Inhabitants of Worcester v. Eaton, 11 Mass. 368, 378; Trull v. Bigelow, 16 Mass. 406;) and I may be justified in asserting, that such has been in that state the received law of the land. The reasoning of the court in Jackson v. Henry, 10 Johns. 185, and Jackson v. Walsh, 14 Johns. 407, would have strongly led to the same conclusion, illustrated as the doctrine there is, in analogous cases. In the latter case, the doctrine is broadly laid down, that "it has been a long and well settled principle that a purchaser for a valuable consideration, without notice, has a good title, though he purchase of one, who had obtained the conveyance by fraud."

There is, too, the light of the civil law to guide our inquiries on this subject. The learned author of the treatise of equity has justly observed, that "by the civil law, whatever debtors do to defeat their creditors is void; and there is a great resemblance between the civil law in this matter, and the statute of 13th Elizabeth. But in each of them, there was this exception, that it should not extend to avoid any estate or interest made upon good consideration, and bona fide." 1 Fonbl. Eq. b. 1, p. 270, c. 4, § 12. And the learned author is well warranted in his assertion; and his reference to the civil law, where the very case now under discussion is put, shews, that he did not contemplate the existence of the present distinction. The case put in the Digest is, "Is qui a debitore, cujus bona possessa sunt, sciens rem emit, iterum alii bona fide ementi vendidit. Quae situm est an secundus emptor conveniri potest? Sed verior est Sabini sententia, bona fide emptorem non teneri; quia dolus ei duntaxat nocere debeat qui eum admissit. Quemadmodum diximus non teneri eum, si ab ipso debitore ignorans emerit. Is autem qui dolo malo emit, bona fide antem ementi vendidit, in solidum pretium rei quod accepit tenebitur." 3 Poth. Pand. lib. 42, tit. 8, p. 195, art. 3, § 25. I trust that the doctrine of this latter clause is equally the doctrine of courts of equity with that, which is so persuasively stated in the former. And the like doctrine is recognized by Voet in his commentaries. 2 Voet Com. lib. 42, p. 822, tit. 8, § 10.

The case has thus far been reasoned upon, as though it depended entirely on the statutes of Elizabeth; but in truth it turns upon the statute of frauds of Rhode-Island. If any doubt could rest upon the proposition, that both these statutes should receive the same construction, that doubt would vanish upon an examination of the Rhode-Island act; for that in the same enacting clause embraces both descriptions of persons, creditors and purchasers, and as to them avoids all fraudulent conveyances, and contains no proviso of any sort. St. R. I. 1798, p. 473, § 2. The case of a bona fide purchaser must, under this statute, stand purely upon the principles of the common law.

The great deference, which I feel for the chancellor of New-York, and the supreme court of Connecticut, has occasioned no small solicitude on my part respecting this subject. I have weighed the reasoning, which has directed their judgment with care; and, however reluctantly, I am constrained to declare, that it does not carry conviction to my judgment. I cannot persuade myself to desert the doctrine of Lord Coke, and the civil law, fortified as it is by the general analogies of the common law. If, therefore, it becomes material to the parties in this cause to establish the doctrine, that a bona fide purchase for a valuable consideration without notice, derived under a grant made to defraud creditors, is not a good title against creditors, I shall decide against the proposition, and leave the parties to their appeal to the supreme court.

There is another objection lying at the very foundation of this bill, which requires deliberate consideration. It is this. By the laws of Rhode-Island real estate is not subject to be taken in execution by a judgment creditor, except in a few cases specified in the statutes of that state. Where the debtor is alive and resides within the state, the laws do not authorize an attachment or levy upon his real estate, unless he conceals himself, so that neither his body nor personal estate can be come at to satisfy his debts. St. R. I. 1798, p. 202, § 5. The present case does not (as it is said) fall exactly within this description, and it is hence inferred, that however fraudulent may have been the conveyances sought to be set aside by the bill, the plaintiff is without remedy, since he had no lien on the real estate, and could not acquire any title to it by his judgment. If conveyances are acknowledgedly made in fraud of creditors, and in cases, circumstanced like the present, a judgment creditor can have no redress either at law or in equity, the jurisprudence of the country is most shamefully defective in the first principles of justice. Men must rely altogether upon the private honesty of their debtors for payment of their debts and not upon remedies by the law. A dishonest debtor may lock up a splendid fortune from the reach of his creditors, and by the facile contrivance of a conveyance to defraud his creditors secretly secure to himself or his family the whole profits of his corrupt conduct; and, if he can quiet his conscience, relieve himself afterwards from imprisonment under the plausible character of a poor prisoner. I am, however, of opinion, that the justice of the country does not deserve such a reproach. Here is a case, where the judgment creditor took the body of his debtor in execution, and had a right to retain him in imprisonment, unless he could discharge himself by taking the poor prisoner's oath, that he had no property to support himself in prison or to pay prison charges, and that he had not conveyed any part of his estate to any persons with intent to secure the same, or to defraud his creditors. The laws of Rhode-Island contemplate, that a false oath taken by the prisoner on such an occasion incurs the penalty of perjury. St. R. I. 1798, pp. 229, 231. If, then, the debtor cannot, while he possesses property, be relieved from imprisonment, but his body is security for the debt; and he makes a fraudulent conveyance of his property, (the natural fund for the payment of that debt) for the express purpose of cheating his creditors, and depriving them of every means of satisfaction, it cannot be possible, that the law will authorise the party or his coadjutors in such conduct to reap the fruits of their dishonesty. If the property be not directly subjected to the judgment, it is indirectly liable, since the debtor can never be entitled to a discharge, without yielding it up to his creditors. And if the debtor does procure a fraudulent discharge of his person by a fraudulent transfer of that property, the law will hold the latter a substitute for the former by his own consent. It is by no means universally true, that, because there is no lien directly created on land or other property by a debt or decree in favour of a creditor, therefore he can never be entitled to any relief in respect to them. Herne v. Meeres, 1 Vern. 465. He may acquire it by the conduct of the debtor himself. A sequestration upon a decree in chancery is only personal process, and does not affect the land immediately like an extent or a judgment. The contempt in not performing a decree is the foundation for a sequestration, for the decree acts only in personam, and not in rem. Bligh v. Darnley, 2 P. Wms. 620, 621. And yet a conveyance made in fraud of a decree or of a sequestration will be set aside in equity. Self v. Madox, 1 Vern. 460, and cases cited; Simmonds v. Kinnaird, 4 Ves. 735; Colston v. Gardner, 2 Ch. Cas. 43; 1 Har. Ch. Pr. p. 142, c. 26. If the debtor, with the intent to defeat a particular judgment creditor, lend his money, this, though a mere chose in action, and on which the judgment did not attach as a lien, may yet be followed in equity by the creditor. Smithier v. Lewis, 1 Vern. 398; and see 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. 132, pl. 15. I know, that there are cases, in which equity has refused to interfere to follow personal property into the hands of a fraudulent grantee, unless execution was first taken out, which should bind that property. But this is not universally true, any more than the rule requiring, as to lands, the suing of an elegit. Angell v. Draper, 1 Vern. 399, and Raithby's note 1; and 1 Vern. 463. In the case of collusion between an executor and a purchaser of leasehold assets, a creditor on a bond debt was permitted to reach the purchase money in the hands of the purchaser, and in default of payment the leasehold estate was decreed to be sold, and payment ordered out of the proceeds of the sale. Crane v. Drake, 2 Vern. 616, Raithby's note 1. See Hendricks v. Robinson, 2 Johns. Ch. 283. It is far from being necessary in all cases, that it should appear, that a creditor will sustain a loss unless a fraudulent conveyance be set aide. In Chamley v. Lord Dunsany, 2 Schoales & L. 690, 714, Lord Eldon in the house of lords declared, "it is every day's practice for a creditor, a puisne creditor, to have a conveyance of his debtor's estate declared fraudulent; and although the purchaser says, that there is sufficient to pay the creditor, still the plaintiff is not delayed for an inquiry into that effect; and if the conveyance is proved fraudulent, or a trust, the court declares it so, though it is plain, that the grantor may be benefitted much more than the plaintiff." But where there is a real injury to the creditor, where he does sustain a loss by the fraudulent conveyance, it would be a narrow obedience to mere technical rules to deny him relief. He must have a right to come into chancery and have the fraudulent conveyance set aside; and if the court be bound to go thus far, there is no reason, why it should not stretch out its arms to give him complete redress.

The principle is not new, that a party, who obtains an estate in fraud of the rights of another, shall be held the trustee of him, whom he has defrauded. The doctrine has been applied even to those, who claim as innocent parties, where it is directly through the fraud without any intervening acts or considerations of their own; for it is against conscience, that one person should hold a benefit derived through the fraud of another. Huguenin v. Baseley, 14 Ves. 273, 290. And the fraudulent procurement of the omission of an act has been visited upon the party with the same effects, as if the act had been done. Id., and cases there cited; Mestaer v. Gillespie, 11 Ves. 621, 638. It is familiar, that a person procuring a perfect legal title of property with notice of a prior title derived under the same party, and not yet perfected, shall be held a trustee of the prior purchaser, and compelled to surrender his own title. That is the common case of a second purchaser having knowledge of a prior unrecorded deed. The doctrine is carried yet further, so that a party enabling another to commit a fraud is made answerable for the consequences, either personally or in his estate, as the case requires. Evans v. Bicknell, 6 Ves. 174.

It appears to me that a court of equity may justly consider the grantees in this case, supposing the charges in the bill to be true, as holding the property conveyed to them in trust for the benefit of the judgment creditors, who have been defrauded by the conveyances. If the precedent were to be made for the first time, I should have no difficulty in holding this doctrine upon the eternal principles of justice and morality. The debtor, who conveys his property for the purpose of defrauding his creditors, and upon the ground, that he has no property, procures a discharge of his person, (that pledge, which the law had given them for their debt,) ought to be estopped from denying, that the property so conveyed stands bound for his debts, and that the person, in whose hands it is deposited, holds it in trust for this purpose. If the justice of the case could not be reached by this course, I should have as little difficulty in holding, that a fraudulent purchaser should be held to account to the creditors for the full value of the property without any allowance for any of the purchase money paid by him, upon the ground that such payment being fraudulent is void as to the creditors; and that the case would be the same, as if the whole purchase money still remained in his hands unpaid. In this latter case, there could be no doubt of the fitness of a remedy in equity in Rhode-Island; for certainly personal estate (and such would be the purchase money) is completely bound by a judgment and execution. By the civil law fraud may also create obligations, where there is no direct agreement. For if debtors pass away their goods or estates to defraud creditors, it is declared by that law, that he that receives them shall be forced to return them to the creditors. Woods, Ins. Civ. Law, bk. 3, p. 248, c. 6, § 8. If such doctrines be new here, they are not elsewhere; and they are so consonant with reason, with equity, and with conscience, that little effort can be necessary to persuade us to adopt them.

We have now discussed the principal questions of law applicable to this case, and may well return to a consideration of the facts. And the material question here is, whether the conveyances by Simon Smith to the other respondents are, as charged in the bill, fraudulent. It appears, that the plaintiff was on the 22d of December, 1808, the holder of certain bills of the Farmers' Exchange Bank, of which Simon Smith was a director; that he received in payment of those bills two drafts drawn on one Andrew Dexter by the cashier of the bank, in favour of Smith, and indorsed by Smith, and also by the president of the bank in blank, one for $3,063, and another for $1,500. These drafts being dishonored, the plaintiff afterwards on the 15th of March, 1809, brought two actions on the same drafts against Simon Smith in the state court of Rhode-Island, and at the March term, 1810, of the supreme court of that state recovered judgment in the same actions to the amount of $5,095, 34-100 damages, and $57.03 costs. Executions duly issued on these judgments, on which Simon Smith was committed to gaol in May, 1810, and afterwards on the 10th of May, 1813, he was discharged from gaol on taking the poor prisoner's oath according to the laws of Rhode-Island. That oath, as has been already stated, supposes the party to be utterly without property sufficient to support himself in prison, or to pay prison charges; and he is expressly required to swear, that he has not, directly or indirectly, sold, conveyed, or disposed of, or entrusted any person with any of his estate, real or personal, to defraud his creditors or to receive any profit for himself.

During the pendency of the plaintiff's suits, and before judgment, Simon Smith being then in possession of a very valuable real estate, by his own confession worth $12,000 or $14,000, conveyed the whole of his real and personal estate, including his household furniture, to his children, thus stripping himself at once of all his property and means of support. The material facts are as follows: On the 15th of September, 1809, Simon Smith, for the asserted consideration of $1,000, leased to his two sons-in-law, William Foster, (one of the respondents) and William Steere, (a respondent by the bill, but who died pending the suit, and it has not been revived against his representatives) for five years from the first day of April, 1810, two farms, one called the Wells farm of about 218 acres, and another called the Rounds farm of about 120 acres. On the same day he conveyed the reversion of the same farms in fee to his daughters Esther the wife of the said William Steere, and Elizabeth the wife of the said William Foster, for the asserted consideration of love, good will, and parental affection. The deeds are admitted to have been executed at the same time; and the respondents allege, that the consideration money of $1,000, was first secured and afterwards actually paid by them to one Zephaniah Andrews, to whom Simon Smith was indebted, and credited to his account. The testimony of the plaintiff's witnesses establishes, that these farms were at the time worth from $6,000, to $7,000. On the same 15th day of September, 1809, Simon Smith executed a lease for 10 years, of a lot of land called the Waterman lot, containing about 54 acres, to his son Ziba Smith, (one of the respondents) for the asserted consideration of $738, and on the same day conveyed the reversion of the same lot in fee simple to his said son for the asserted consideration of love, good will, and affection. Three days afterwards Simon Smith conveyed to the same son a lot of woodland, containing about 26 acres, for the like consideration of love, good will, and parental affection. The respondent Ziba Smith alleges, that upon these conveyances he paid about $1,800, and as part of this sum he gave his note, which he afterwards paid, to Zephaniah Andrews, for $1,500, on account of his father's debt. The plaintiff's witnesses establish the value of the Waterman lot to be about $1,350. The value of the wood lot does not appear; but was probably worth quite $800 or $1,000. On the same 15th of September, 1809, Simon Smith executed a lease to his son Darius, for five years from the ensuing April, of a farm called the Daniel Eddy farm, containing about 130 acres, for the asserted consideration of $500. Three days afterwards Simon Smith conveyed the reversion of the same farm for the asserted consideration of $500, to his sons Darius Smith and Ahab Smith, and "to the eldest male heir of each of them, and their eldest male heirs, and so to descend in that line in equal moieties." Darius died in March, 1816, insolvent, and on the 7th of February of the same year, Ahab and Darius (Thomas, the oldest son of Darius, joining in the deed) conveyed the same property to their nephews Amasa Steere and William Steere, Jrs., (the sons of William Steere, the respondent) for the asserted consideration of $2,000, and a lease was granted by them back to Ahab, of the premises, for and during his Ahab's life. The lease was executed on the same day, and purports to have been given in consideration of their uncle Ahab's having the same day executed a deed of gift to them of his estate in the same land, and for the further consideration of one dollar. It may not be unimportant to observe, that the execution of these deeds is witnessed by Simon Smith and William Steere, and that there is an express reference in the first deed to the title of the grantors, as derived under Simon Smith's deed of the 15th of September, 1809. The respondent Ahab alleges that his father was indebted to him, in the sum of $3,040,99, (a specific return of the items of which, under date of 1815 and 1816, is annexed to the answer) of which about one half is for services, and the other half is made up of items of a miscellaneous character, of which one item of $875, is sufficiently remarkable, it being the estimated rent of the Daniel Eddy farm, from the time of the original purchase by the father, to the time of the conveyance. This is claimed on the ground, that the father bought the farm originally for his sons in payment of their services; and the amount constitutes the payment made by Ahab to his father, for his moiety. The Messrs. Steere in their answer allege, that the $2,000 mentioned in the deed to them, was paid to Darius partly by the payment, with the assistance of their father, of debts due by Darius to his creditors, to the amount of $1,060, and partly by payment of a mortgage of Darius to a Mr. Barton, in January, 1816, for $300, and for the residue of $640, they gave their note to Darius, which since his death has been paid to his creditors. As the plaintiff seeks only to subject to his claim the moiety of Ahab, so far as his life estate extends, it is not necessary to consider how that of Darius is sustained. It is clear, that as the young Messrs. Steere claim through a voluntary gift of Ahab, by the very terms of their deed, they cannot be permitted to set up, as they now pretend, a different pecuniary consideration, (Bridgman v. Green, 2 Ves. Sr. 627; Clarkson v. Hanway, 2 P. Wms. 203; Watt v. Grove, 2 Schoales & L. 492, 501; Hildreth v. Sands, 2 Johns. Ch. 35, 42;) and they must be deemed as mere volunteers standing in the same predicament as if the estate were now in Ahab. But as they are not parties to this bill, and that of Dexter v. Smith, [Case No. 3,866,] and others, applies to them, I shall reserve all farther remarks for that case.

It is deserving of observation, too, in this connexion, that Simon Smith by a deed purporting to be dated on the 7th of March, 1807, but not acknowledged until 7th of March, 1808, in consideration of love, good will, and parental affection, conveyed to the same Darius Smith, "and to his eldest male born heir born unto him, and to his eldest male heir, and so to descend down to the eldest male heir, &c." a farm called the Lewis and Tinkham farm, containing about 93 acres. And yet the consideration set up to support the other deed in favour of Darius, is founded in a great measure upon services, which were unrequited by his father. On the 22d of November, 1809, Simon Smith, for the asserted consideration of $8,000, conveyed to his sons Ziba Smith and Simon Smith, Jr., (the respondent) in fee, his homestead farm, containing about 300 acres. Afterwards on the 30th of May, 1812, Ziba Smith conveyed his moiety of the farm excepting 31 acres, to Simon Smith, Jr., for the asserted consideration of $4,000, and thus Simon became possessed of the whole farm, with the above exception; and Simon Smith, Jr., on the same day conveyed his moiety of the 31 acres to Ziba Smith, for the asserted consideration of $784. Simon Smith, Jr., further admits, that he received at the same time all the personal estate that there was of his father's, consisting principally of household furniture worth about $200, and paid for the same. He does not, however, upon his original answer state the manner in which he paid, either for the personal or real estate so conveyed to him; and exceptions having been taken to it on this account, by his supplemental answer, he asserts, that on the first of October, 1809, he paid Zephaniah Andrews, on his father's account, $1,250; that on the 1st of August, 1809, he became bound to one Seth Hunt, for his father, (as it should seem) for the sum of $2,273,80 which he afterwards in July, 1810, paid. He paid to other creditors about $909,33; and he held notes against his father amounting to $595,72. Some of these notes were given to him in 1805, some in 1806, one in 1808, and one in 1809. He further states, that in 1805 or 1806, he assisted his father in building a vessel called the "Perseverance," and for this and other previous services, his father agreed to allow him one moiety of the price for which she should be sold; and that she was sold, as he believes, for about $6,000. That he took one moiety of the farm above mentioned in payment of the debts due to him; and that he and his brother Ziba gave their father their several notes for $4,000 each, for the purchase money, and that what was due him beyond the price of his moiety of the purchase money, was to be paid by Ziba's note. That Ziba afterwards being embarrassed, and unable to pay the note, he took the conveyance of the moiety of Ziba in 1812, in payment of the debt due to himself from his father; and about this time, (1812) he took up his own note given to his father, and made a settlement with him, and in that settlement $3,000 was allowed him on account of the sale of the Perseverance. He adds, that he has paid other sums for his father, but cannot recollect particulars, and is positive in this manner, that he paid $8,000 for the homestead farm; and that in 1810 and 1811, he was obliged to sell some of his own lands to the amount of $2,000, or $2,100, to pay debts contracted on his father's account. The answer of Ziba only states the purchase of his father, and his conveyance to his brother, for the reasons stated by him, and that thus his note given to his father was discharged. He says nothing as to the 31 acres retained by him, not even mentioning the fact of the retainer.

It is material to state, that previous to this fraud, on the 15th day of May, 1807, Simon Smith for the asserted consideration of $1,000, "and other good considerations him thereunto moving," executed a lease to his son Simon Smith, Jr., and "to his eldest male heir, and to the eldest male heir of him, and so to descend, &c." for a term of 1000 years, a farm called the Absalona Hill farm, containing about 335 acres. On the same day he conveyed to his said son in fee, another tract of land containing about 40 acres, for the asserted consideration of $2,000; and also by a third deed on the same day he conveyed to him another tract of land in fee of 25 acres, for the asserted consideration of $1,000. These three deeds being all executed at the same time between the same parties, must be considered as one transaction; and they convey about 400 acres of land for $4,000, worth, as one of the witnesses declares, from $12,000 to $15,000. It is apparent, therefore, that paternal love and affection must have constituted a material inducement to the conveyance. In respect to his son Ziba, too, there is no reason to suspect the father's want of liberality, for on the 12th of April, 1800, in consideration of $1,500, and "more especially for the good settlement, well being, and advancement of Ziba in this world," the father executed to him and his heirs male, a lease of three farms, containing about 380 acres, for the term of 1000 years. It may deserve a passing observation, that if, as the respondents now contend, the father was a man who had long been heavily oppressed with debts, and reputed much richer than he really was, and in truth having but little property beyond his debts, it seems somewhat extraordinary, that he should have been so very liberal to his children; and it would require more faith than I profess to have, to believe, that these prior conveyances did not meditate an evasion of the rights of creditors. No man has a right to be generous at the expense of his honest creditors.

We have now passed in review all the conveyances which were made during the pendency of the plaintiff's suit, with a few explanations of the character which is attempted by the respondents to be impressed on them. To these deeds with a single exception, some one of his children were witnesses, and among these witnesses were Darius Smith, Simon Smith, Jr., William Foster, William Steere, and Elizabeth Foster. The money considerations apparent on the face of these deeds, exceeds $15,000; and if the testimony of witnesses is to be believed, the property was at least worth $22,000. Connecting this with the conveyances previously made, the children were possessed of property derived from their father, worth at least $35,000. Some additional facts ought not to be omitted. Notwithstanding the great diligence exercised in this case, to obtain testimony in support of these conveyances, it does not appear, that Simon Smith at the time was indebted in any considerable amount, excluding the debts set up by his children, but to Zephaniah Andrews, to whom he was indebted not exceeding $4,500, and a debt due to the Farmers' Exchange Bank, of $15,284. The debt due to Andrews appears to have been discharged ultimately by the children of Simon Smith at various times between December, 1810, and May, 1813. Notes were given in small sums, payable in one, two, three, and four years, some of which were signed by the children only; and some were indorsed or signed by the father; and on all, excepting two or three notes of about $1,000, no payments were ever made except after suit and judgment at law against the parties. The debt due to the Farmers' Exchange Bank was paid between May and August, 1809, by bills of that bank, (which had failed in the preceding February) bought at a very great discount, and as seems admitted by the respondents' counsel, for a sum not exceeding $3,000; and from the other evidence in the case, probably for a sum considerably less. The greater part, if not the whole, was purchased for Simon Smith by a Mr. Hunt, who received for the bills two notes, one for $1,500, and one for $773.80, signed by Smith, and indorsed by his sons William Foster, and Simon Smith, Jr. These notes were afterwards sued by the holders, and judgment recovered against the indorsers in the summer of 1810. So that it is apparent, that neither of these debts were in fact discharged by the children at the time of the conveyances above stated; and that the father was not entirely exonerated from them; but as to a considerable part still remained liable as a party to the notes.

Upon the first blush of these transactions, it seems almost impossible not to pronounce the conveyances executed in September and November, 1809, as fraudulent; and made with the meditated design to injure and defeat creditors. The badges of fraud cluster about them in every direction. They were made pending suits brought for large sums of money due to creditors, after the failure of the bank, whose credit Simon Smith had lent his own personal security to support. They were all made to the children of Simon Smith, who appear to have been privies to all the conveyances. The consideration of several of the deeds is avowedly an inadequate consideration as against creditors, founded on mere love and affection; and the property disposed of in this manner is of great value. The conveyances embrace the whole property, personal and real of the father; thus reducing him to absolute beggary, and including even his household furniture. No money was paid at the time, all rested in confidence, and the utmost that the children ever became bound to pay to creditors, or ever did pay, was short of $7,000, though the property then conveyed to them, was in their own view worth more than double that amount; and beyond all question, upon the evidence, more than three times that amount. The remaining consideration for this property, was either love or affection or debts due, unliquidated debts due for services, from a father who had previously conveyed to the parties large and valuable farms, either confessedly or implicitly from parental affection, or for a very inadequate consideration. It is utterly impossible for a court of justice to sustain such conveyances as bona fide, unless it surrenders all judgment and discretion. The transactions can be viewed in no other light than that, which the father avowed to one of the witnesses who wrote several of the conveyances, as having no other objects but to give his estate to his children. The inference deducible from the facts, that this was the father's whole property, that the conveyances are professedly in part voluntary, and that he was then indebted beyond the amount of his whole estate would alone be conclusive of the fraud. And if fraud applied to any of these transactions, it infected the whole. In a legal point of view, the mala fides which justly applies to one, infects by its contamination the whole. I have no doubt, that they must be declared fraudulent upon this broad and general examination of the case; and if there were any doubt here, a more thorough and minute sifting of the facts accompanying each conveyance, and the answers made in their support, would irresistibly lead to the same conclusion. I forbear, however, to dwell on these facts, as I cannot escape from that which stands so prominent on the face of the transactions. I have omitted to take any notice of the exception to the competency of Thomas Smith and Amasa Steere as witnesses, not because I am against that exception; but because it is not necessary to decide it. See Roberts v. Anderson, 3 Johns. Ch. 371, 375.

Taking this, then, to be the state of the case, for the reasons that have been already suggested, there do not appear to me to be any persons standing before the court as bona fide purchasers for a valuable consideration without notice, and consequently none entitled to protection as such. The next question that arises is, whether the conveyances are to stand as securities for the sums which have been really advanced or paid by them for their father since the execution of these instruments. I agree to the doctrine laid down by Mr. Chancellor Kent, in Boyd v. Dunlap, 1 Johns. Ch. 478, and Sands v. Codwise, 4 Johns. 536, 549, that a deed fraudulent in fact is absolutely void, and is not permitted to stand as a security for any purpose of reimbursement or indemnity; but it is otherwise with a deed obtained under suspicious or inequitable circumstances, or which is only constructively fraudulent. At law, where a conveyance is found to be fraudulent, against a creditor, he comes in and avoids all without re-payment of any consideration. But it is said, equity can deal differently with it, and decree back principal and interest; and, therefore, in equity a lesser matter will in such a case set a conveyance aside. Herne v. Meeres, 1 Vern. 465, 2 Brown, Ch. 177, note to Heathcote v. Paignon; Attorney General v. Vigor, 8 Ves. 256, 283. Cases are not unfrequent in equity, where the court, upon setting aside a conveyance, has left some benefit to the grantee. But that is done only where there are circumstances, which do not immediately affect the party, against whom the decree is sought, with an original and meditated fraud; or if he holds a derivative title, where that title was attained without knowledge of the fraud. Such was the case of How v. Weldon, 2 Ves. Sr. 517, (see, also, Proof v. Hines, Cas. t. Talb. 111; Grove v. Watt, 2 Schoales & L. 492,) where an assignment of prize money having been obtained for an inadequate consideration, it was set aside even in the hands of a second assignee, but admitted, however, to stand security for the original purchase money. In Bennet v. Musgrove; 2 Ves. Sr. 51, Lord Hardwicke decreed a conveyance of land, which was made in fraud of creditors, void so far as respected a creditor, who had taken the same in execution on an elegit. And he is reported to have said, that "whether the party could recover (at law) or not, he is entitled to come into this court; the distinction in this court being, where a subsequent purchaser for valuable consideration would recover the estate and set aside, or get the better of a precedent voluntary conveyance, if that conveyance was fairly made without actual fraud, the court will say, take your remedy at law; but wherever the conveyance is attended with actual fraud, though they might go to law by ejectment and recover the possession, they may come in to this court to set aside that conveyance; which is a distinction between actual and presumed fraud, from its being merely a conveyance." I do not cite this case to shew, that the grantee was permitted here to retain a benefit; for Lord Hardwicke, (whose decision seems very imperfectly reported) did not intend such benefit, but he considered the conveyance void for meditated fraud, though he seems to have thought there might be some difficulty in establishing that at law. He set aside the conveyance, so far as respected the creditor, as void against him; and he having an elegit executed on the land, this was all that the case required; for it will not be pretended, that the conveyance was void as to third persons. What I cite it for is to show the distinction between actual and constructive fraud. The former makes the conveyance "utterly void," as to creditors and others, whom it intends to injure, and therefore it cannot be permitted to stand as to them as a security for advances. But if no such actual fraud was originally in contemplation, but the law adjudges the conveyance fraudulent on motives of public policy, as in cases of voluntary or other conveyances, which are void against creditors and purchasers, there, if any advances have been made, or any other equities arise, they may be enforced by the court in favor of the grantee. In the present case it appears to me, that the court is bound by the strict rule. The conveyances were in their very concoction fraudulent. They were, therefore, in the language of the statute "utterly void" as against creditors; and cannot be permitted to stand as a security for any advances subsequently made, or any pretended debts then due. All the reasons of public policy, so forcibly urged in Sands v. Codwise, 4 Johns. 598, against such an allowance, command the court to be rigid in denying to those, who are guilty of bad faith, any such indulgence. Let them reap the due reward of their own misconduct.

I have hesitated as to the nature of the decree, which ought to be made in this case, whether under all the circumstances to hold the respondents according to their respective interests liable to account to the plaintiff for the full value of the estates conveyed with interest, as a fund for the payment of his debt, leaving them in possession of their estates; or to decree the conveyances void, and the plaintiff's debt a charge upon the land, and the rents and profits, which have accrued since the conveyances, giving them an election to pay the debt really due him, and in default, to order the land to be sold, and an account to be taken of the rents and profits, and out of these funds to give the plaintiff a priority of payment. I have concluded to adopt the latter course, not meaning to imply any doubt of the propriety of the former.

The only further point, on which I have paused, has been as to the extent of the plaintiff's demand. It originated in Farmers' Exchange bills, which at the time of the giving the drafts, on which the plaintiff's judgment is founded, were at a great discount. At law I am aware, that the plaintiff might be entitled to the full amount of his judgment, notwithstanding any purchase of this sort. But I think a court of equity has a right to moderate his claim; and if he asks equity to compel him to do equity. All that in conscience he ought to claim under all the circumstances against Simon Smith is the value of the bills of the bank at the time he received them or bought them, with interest from that time to the present. I shall, therefore, direct an inquiry to be had before a master for this purpose, on which examination the plaintiff is to be examined in respect to this point on oath. A reference also must be made to the master to ascertain the rents and profits, making all proper deductions; and all further orders are reserved until the report is made.

MEM., [from original report.] Since this opinion was delivered, the doctrine in Roberts v. Anderson, 3 Johns. Ch. 371, has been overruled in the court of errors. [See Anderson v. Roberts, 18 Johns. 515.] See, also, Astor v. Wells, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 487.

DECREE. This cause came on to be heard on the bill, answer, pleadings, and evidence in the case, (the due execution of all the deeds in the case being admitted by the parties) and was argued by counsel, on consideration whereof,

It is ordered, adjudged, and decreed, as follows, to wit: That the conveyances made by the said Simon Smith mentioned in the bill and answers in this cause, bearing date the fifteenth day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and nine, to the said Esther Steere and Elizabeth Foster, and William Steere and the said William Foster, for two certain farms lying in Gloucester and Foster in the county of Providence, within said district of Rhode-Island, containing three hundred and thirty-five acres of land, one called the Wells farm, and the other called the Rounds farm; and also the conveyances, in the said bill and answers mentioned, made by the said Simon Smith to the said Ziba Smith, bearing date the fifteenth day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and nine, for a farm or lot of land, situate in Smithfield, in said district, and known by the name of the Waterman lot, containing fifty-four acres; and also the conveyances, in the said bill and answers mentioned, made by the said Simon Smith to Darius Smith, and to Darius Smith and the said Ahab Smith, bearing date the fifteenth and eighteenth days of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and nine, for the farm on which the said Darius then lived, situate in Gloucester aforesaid, called the Daniel Eddy farm, lying on both sides of the turnpike road; and also the deed, in the said bill and answers mentioned, made by the said Simon Smith to the said Ziba Smith, bearing date the eighteenth day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and nine, for a lot of land situate in said Gloucester, containing twenty-six acres; and also the deed, in the said bill and answer mentioned, made by the said Simon Smith to the said Ziba Smith and Simon Smith, Jr. bearing date the twenty-second day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and nine, for the farm whereon the said Simon Smith then lived, situate in said Gloucester, it being all the land he purchased of John Eddy, Elijah Cooke, and Abel Potter, and is about three hundred acres, were made by the said Simon Smith with the intent to defraud his creditors, and particularly the plaintiff, and are, therefore, as to the plaintiff, utterly void.

But inasmuch as it appears to the court, that the real estate so as aforesaid conveyed to the said Darius Smith, and to the said Darius and Ahab Smith, has, with the exception of a life estate therein still held by the said Ahab, been conveyed to persons, who are not parties to the present bill, and the plaintiff seeks no relief against them, it is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed, that the said life estate of said Ahab only be subject to the debt of the plaintiff in this suit, in manner as hereinafter stated, without prejudice to the rights of persons not parties to this bill.

And it is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed, that the said conveyances before mentioned, having originated in a meditated fraud upon the creditors of the said Simon Smith, cannot be permitted to stand as a security for any debts then due to the grantees, or for any subsequent advances by them made in furtherance of the original intention of the parties thereto.

And it is further declared, and decreed, that the plaintiff has a right to be paid the principal debt due to him, with interest up to the time of this decree, and that the same ought to be, and is decreed to be, a charge on the same lands, and on the rents and profits (making all proper allowances) which have accrued to the respective respondents, or might have accrued to them without wilful default, since the estates contained in the same conveyances have come to their hands, possession, and use; and it is declared, and decreed, that the said lands, rents, and profits, are specifically holden for, and charged with, the payment of the plaintiff's said debt.

And it is further declared, and decreed, that the respondents be permitted to pay in the proportion of the value of the estates respectively conveyed to them, to be ascertained by a master, the amount due to the plaintiff for principal and interest, with costs, if they shall elect so to do, within sixty days from the date of this decree, and in that event the plaintiff is to assign to them, by conveyances to be approved by a master, all his right and title to the judgments stated in his bill, and to the debts due, and his right and title under this decree; and the respondents shall be admitted to hold the same accordingly as a charge on the same lands; but if the respondents shall not pay the said debt and costs, within the period aforesaid, then the same master is to ascertain the rents and profits of the said estates as aforesaid, which are to be paid by the respondents respectively towards the discharge of the plaintiff's debt, and if this fund shall not be sufficient, or shall not be productive, then it is further declared, and decreed, that the master shall sell the lands so conveyed to the respondents by the conveyances aforesaid, or a sufficiency thereof, to pay the plaintiff's debt, interest and cost, at public auction to the highest bidder, in manner as shall hereafter be decreed by the court, and make due and legal conveyances thereof to the purchaser or purchasers thereof, and the respondents Simon Smith, Ziba Smith, Ahab Smith, Simon Smith, Jr., Esther Steere, William Foster, and Elizabeth Foster, shall respectively join in such conveyance or conveyances, releasing their right, title, and interest therein, and thereto, and covenanting against their own acts, in such manner as the master shall approve, and the proceeds of such sale shall be brought into this court to discharge the plaintiff's debt, and costs of suit.

And it is further declared, and decreed, that it be further referred to the same master to ascertain by an examination of the plaintiff on oath and otherwise, what was the value at which the plaintiff received the Farmers' Exchange bills for which the drafts, on which his judgments were founded, were given, at the time when he received or bought the same, and that the plaintiff is to be allowed that sum, the damages on said drafts at the rate allowed by law on the bills of the like nature, and his costs of suit, in the state courts of Rhode-Island, as his principal debt, and the interest is to be computed thereon as aforesaid; and the same master is to make his report as soon as may be, and in the mean time all further proceedings and orders are reserved for the consideration of the court.

BEAN, (UNITED STATES v.) See Case No. 14,550.

Case No. 1,175.

BEANE et al. v. The MAYURKA.

[2 Curt. 72.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. Term, 1854.

COLLISION—NEGLIGENCE IN ANCHORING—ADMIRALTY JURISDICTION—GENERAL AVERAGE.

1. The allegation of negligently anchoring so near to another vessel, as to come in collision in a storm, repelled.

2. There is no maritime lien created by a general average loss, and consequently the admiralty has not jurisdiction in rem.

[Cited in Oologaardt v. The Anna, Case No. 10,545; The Kate Tremaine, Id. 7,622; The John C. Sweeney, 55 Fed. 544.]

3. Where two vessels at anchor come in collision without fault, and it was necessary, to prevent the destruction of both, for one to slip the cable and go ashore, this gave no claim against the other for a salvage service.

[Approved in The John Perkins, Case No. 7,360.]

[4. The admiralty jurisdiction extends to actions ex contractu, quasi ex contractu, ex delicto, and quasi ex delicto.]

[Cited in Banta v. McNeil, Case No. 966.]

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of Massachusetts.

[In admiralty. Libel by Amaziah Beane and others against the schooner Mayurka for collision. The district court rendered a decree for libellants. (Unreported.) The cause is now heard on appeal. Reversed.]

CURTIS, Circuit Justice. This is an appeal from a decree of the district court in a cause of collision. The libel states that the schooner Sarah and Adeline being at anchor inside the breakwater at the mouth of the Delaware bay, on the night of the third of January, 1853, the Mayurka dragged her anchors, drifted foul of the Sarah and Adeline, and after the two vessels had been some time in collision, and while they were both in imminent danger of sinking at their anchors if not extricated, the Sarah and Adeline slipped her cable and drifted to leeward a short distance, let go her small and kedge anchors, held on by them for some hours, and then was driven on shore and wrecked.

The libel is framed in three aspects. First. It alleges that the collision occurred through the negligence of the people of the Mayurka in not having out, proper ground tackle, and not keeping a suitable anchor watch. Second. If there was no such negligence, and the vessels came in collision by inevitable accident, it insists that the cable and anchor of the Sarah and Adeline were voluntarily slipped, for the safety of both vessels, and upon the urgent request of the master of the Mayurka, as the only means of preventing the destruction of both, and that the stranding which followed was a direct and necessary consequence of the voluntary sacrifice of the cable and anchor, and therefore the entire loss should be borne pro rata by both vessels and cargoes as a general average loss. Third. That if this be not so, the libellants should be treated as salvors of the Mayurka.

Upon the first of these questions, the evidence derived from the officers and crews of the two vessels, and of another vessel called the Harbinger, which was anchored near, is even more than usually conflicting. I have carefully examined it, with the endeavor not to reconcile it, for that is plainly impossible, but to arrive at some leading facts, in a manner satisfactory to my own mind. To some extent I have been able to do so; and without detailing the evidence I will state what those conclusions are.

[1] [Reported by Hon. B. R. Curtis, Circuit Justice.]

First. I find that the Mayurka came into the harbor before dark and came to anchor, with her best bower; that she does not appear to have drifted before twelve o'clock that night; that just before twelve o'clock, her second anchor was dropped, and about twenty-five fathoms of chain was payed out.

Second. That the Sarah and Adeline came to anchor with her best bower, after dark, on the lee quarter of the Mayurka, and by reason of the scope of her chain, when she swung to her anchor, was somewhat astern of the Mayurka. But I am not satisfied, that any one on board either vessel saw the other vessel, when the Sarah and Adeline came to anchor, nor do I find it possible to determine, with any approach towards precision, how near together they were, when the Sarah and Adeline was first anchored.

Third. I do not attribute this failure to see each other, to the want of a light on board either vessel, for I am satisfied there was no neglect in this particular; nor do I find any want of due care in the selection of a berth, by the Sarah and Adeline. The testimony is direct and strong to prove, that the master had the helm, and the mate and all hands were on the look-out forward, to discern a proper place for anchorage. That they believed they had selected such a place is probable in itself, and, as already stated, there is not sufficient evidence to satisfy me, that in point of fact, the Sarah and Adeline was anchored in dangerous proximity to the Mayurka.

Fourth. I find that after twelve o'clock at night, the ground tackle of the Mayurka was sufficient, and was properly attended to, and that a suitable anchor watch was kept on board. Through what causes the two vessels came together, is the difficult question. The collision occurred in a dark night, a snow-storm, and a violent gale of wind. The Sarah and Adeline was found to be just astern of the Mayurka, heading, in nearly the same direction, and almost immediately struck the boat of the Mayurka with her bowsprit, then came with her bows on the quarter of the Mayurka, her bowsprit sliding along until it was caught between the mainmast and rigging, and in this position the two vessels lay until the chain of the Sarah and Adeline was slipped, and she drifted to leeward. On the one side it is asserted, that the Mayurka drifted on to the Sarah and Adeline; on the other, that the Sarah and Adeline, swinging at one anchor, was forced by a strong current, when the squalls lulled, in the direction of the Mayurka, and thus came in collision. There are very material facts sworn to in the case, which tend, and if they stood alone, would be sufficient to support either hypothesis. I will advert briefly to some of them. The mate of the Mayurka swears he observed the chains carefully after the small anchor was let go; that its chain at no time bore an equal strain with the chain of the best bower. There is much evidence to prove that the relative positions of the Mayurka and Harbinger were not materially changed during the night, and that the latter vessel had both anchors down, and sufficient chain out, and that her master, who seems to have been anxiously vigilant during the night, was not aware that his vessel drifted. The Sarah and Adeline, a vessel of nearly the same size, model, and burden of cargo as the Mayurka, had but one anchor down, and about the same scope of chain out as the Mayurka's best bower had, after twelve o'clock, and is not alleged, and does not appear to have drifted. On the other hand, it is difficult to believe that these two vessels were anchored so near each other, that the Sarah and Adeline could, in that gale, have come up into the wind far enough to reach the Mayurka; and it is very difficult to reconcile the fact, that as soon as her cable was slipped, she immediately went astern, with any other hypothesis than that she was then held by her anchor. I attach some weight, also, to the testimony of the mate of the Sarah and Adeline, concerning the manner in which the two vessels came together. It was also urged that the Mayurka did not drift after the collision. But more scope was given to her chains after the collision. How soon after, does not satisfactorily appear. If immediately after, it would have a tendency to prove, that her people thought she had been drifting and needed more scope to hold her. Some of them say, it was a considerable time after the collision, that more chain was let out. Length of time is a fact, extremely difficult to be judged of with accuracy, on such occasions, and I have not been able to allow much force to this circumstance. On the whole, I think the evidence so far preponderates in favor of the hypothesis that the Mayurka did drift, that I consider the Sarah and Adeline relieved from the blame which would be attributable to her, if it had sufficiently appeared that the disaster was caused by her anchoring so near the Mayurka, that she was carried by the tide in collision with her. The result to which I have come upon the best consideration I have been able to give to the evidence, relieves both vessels of blame, and attributes the disaster to a vis major merely. Of course the libellant cannot recover, treating this as a simple cause of collision, and in this respect the decree of the district court must be affirmed.

It remains to consider the other claims;—and first, that for a general average contribution. This is a novel question of much interest. Whether such a claim can ever exist save as between those who have voluntarily embarked their several property in a common adventure, is worthy of great consideration. But I do not feel at liberty to express any opinion upon it, because I consider there is not jurisdiction in the admiralty to try and determine it. In Stainback v. Rae, 14 How. [55 U. S.] 532, it was settled, that where a loss happens from a collision which is the result of inevitable accident, without negligence or fault of either party, each should bear his own loss. Viewed, therefore, simply as a case of collision, and damage proceeding therefrom, the libellants have no valid claim. The question is, whether in a proceeding in rem, the admiralty may examine, whether a voluntary sacrifice was made, to diminish the damage which would otherwise have been suffered, from a collision without fault, and may pronounce in favor of a lien, upon the vessel benefited by the sacrifice. I say, pronounce in favor of a lien upon that vessel, because it is clear, if there is not a maritime lien on the vessel proceeded against, for the amount due on contribution, there can be no decree against that vessel. I consider a proceeding in rem in the admiralty, to be a proceeding to give effect to a maritime lien arising either ex contractu or quasi ex contractu, or ex delicto, or quasi ex delicto, and that such a lien must always exist, to form the basis of such a proceeding. This is very clearly, and I think accurately stated by Lord Chief Justice Jarvis, in the case of Harmer v. Bell, 22 Eng. Law & Eq. 72, decided by the privy council in 1852. "A maritime lien is the foundation of all the proceedings in rem, a process to make perfect a right inchoate, from the moment the lien attaches; and whilst it must be admitted that where such a lien exists, a proceeding in rem may be had, it will be found to be equally true, that in all cases where a proceeding in rem is the proper course, there a maritime lien exists, to be carried into effect by legal process." See, also, The America, [Case No. 288,] and cases there cited. If, then, this rests upon the existence of a maritime lien on the vessel proceeded against, we must find such a lien here, or the process is misapplied. That no lien, or privilege to secure any thing, arose from the collision, is clear. There was no claim, whatever, growing out of the collision. The vessels being in collision without fault, and being relieved from it by a voluntary sacrifice of their property, it is maintained by the libellants that they have a claim for contribution. Suppose this admitted, does the maritime law create a lien on the claimant's vessel, to the extent of its contributory share. This is settled in the negative by the case of Cutler v. Rae, 7 How. [48 U. S.] 729. It was there held, that the maritime law does not confer a lien, to secure contribution in general average; that the only lien which existed, was a common law lien, dependent on possession, and lost when the possession was terminated. In this case, there never was any possession by the libellants of the vessel of the claimants, and it necessarily follows from this decision, that no lien of any kind ever existed. At all events, it seems to me, that without departing from this decision, I cannot say the libellants have a maritime lien on the vessel proceeded against, for the contribution due, for the relief of that vessel from collision; and, consequently, I must pronounce against the libel on this ground.

As to the claim for salvage, I am of opinion it cannot be maintained. These vessels were subject to a common peril, which threatened the immediate destruction of both. It is testified by all the libellants' witnesses, that if not relieved from it, they must both have sunk at their anchors. Finding this to be so, and that he could not otherwise release his own vessel, the master of the Sarah and Adeline slipped his cable. It was his imperative duty to do so, to save his own vessel and cargo, and the lives on board. To constitute a salvage service, there must be a voluntary interposition to save another's property, by one under no legal obligation to render the service. But this master was under a perfect legal obligation to do all he did, wholly independent of the safety or danger of the other vessel. In the case of The Branston, 2 Hagg. Adm. 3, where a passenger had successfully exerted himself to save the ship and cargo, and the lives of those on board, Lord Stowell denied his claim for salvage, upon the ground, that where there is a common peril, it is the duty of all, to contribute to the general safety. There are other cases, in which passengers as well as others standing in different relations to the ship, have been allowed salvage, but only when they have assumed responsibilities and rendered services, which could not be required of them in the performance of any duty. I do not consider that what this master did, under a clear legal obligation to his owners and to his crew, to save his own vessel, is in the nature of a salvage service, because it also benefited others. It may be that the property of others benefited, should bear some portion of the loss voluntarily incurred, but this rests upon the law of general average, if anywhere, and not upon a claim for salvage compensation; and to treat this as a salvage service, would so confound these distinct subjects, as to produce great confusion and mischief. As the claim for a general average contribution was allowed in the district court, the decree must be reversed and the libel dismissed, as to that claim, for want of jurisdiction, but without costs.

Case No. 1,176.

BEANE v. ORR et al.

[2 Ban. & A. 176;[1] 9 O. G. 255.]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. Term, 1875.

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS—INFRINGEMENT—PRELIMINARY INJUNCTION.

Where, upon a motion for a preliminary injunction, the affidavits of the contesting parties were contradictory and left in doubt whether the defendant had a license from the complainant, the motion was denied.

[1] [Reported by Hubert A. Banning, Esq., and Henry Arden, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

[In equity. Bill by Eben J. Beane against Thomas M. Orr and others to restrain infringement of a patent. Heard on motion for a preliminary injunction. Denied.]

Geo. L. Roberts, for complainant.

R. M. Morse, Jr., and C. W. Sumner, for defendants.

LOWELL, District Judge. The issues of facts upon which the motion for a preliminary injunction were argued are difficult, and I do not find that the plaintiff is so clearly right that the use of the machine should be prohibited before the hearing. There is no question of the validity of the patent, or of its infringement, but whether a license was granted to the defendants, and, if granted, whether the plaintiff was induced to give it by fraud.

It seems that the defendants had a license which required them to pay a fee or royalty of $100 each year in advance, and in default of such payment the license might be revoked. That on the 15th October, 1874, the parties came to a settlement and agreed to give and take a single sum of $818 in full satisfaction for past and future fees to the end of the life of the patent. The plaintiff took the defendants' note for that sum payable in four months, and soon afterward the defendants filed a petition in bankruptcy and made a composition with their creditors. The plaintiff has refused to receive his dividend, and insists that by the oral bargain the terms of the original license were only suspended for four months, and that upon the failure of the defendants to pay the note in full at maturity his right of revocation has revived. He gave notice accordingly, and brought this bill.

The defendants deny the plaintiff's version of the bargain, and produce his receipt for the note, expressed to be "in payment for machines." Putting this receipt into the scale of contradictory evidence, I must hold the case not to be made out. If the practice were to examine and cross-examine witnesses on these occasions, instead of filing affidavits, no doubt a more conclusive judgment might be arrived at. Then the question is whether the note was given fraudulently. The law of Massachusetts is, that if goods are bought with a distinct purpose not to pay for them, the purchase is fraudulent. The close proximity of the bankruptcy has a suspicious look, but here again the evidence is one affidavit against another, and the defendants' counsel did not fail to observe that the plaintiff's two statements are not quite consistent with each other. If it was a mere conditional grant, to take effect when the note was paid, then it is not probable that any misstatements would be made concerning the standing, etc., of the defendants, since they would be utterly immaterial. I do not mean to say that the stories are irreconcilable. No doubt the plaintiff might inquire into these things with a view to obtain a discount of the note, but it is much less probable that any great reliance would be given or expected to the mere solvency of the parties if the grant were conditional, and, on the other hand, its being conditional would seem to show some doubts of the solidity of the security. Motion denied.

Case No. 1,177.

In re BEAR et al.[1]

District Court, S. D. New York. Dec. 23, 1879.

BANKRUPTCY—ASSIGNMENT FOR BENEFIT OF CREDITORS — FAILURE TO FILE PROPER INVENTORY—EXECUTION CREDITOR—VALIDITY OF LEVY.

[1. A paper signed and verified by one of three partners, and purporting to be a schedule of all the creditors of the firm, and an inventory of all the estate of the copartners, both joint and several, but which fails to show the assets or liabilities of the signing partner, or the assets of one of the nonsigning partners, and which contains no statement that such liabilities or assets do not exist, and which does not purport to be made with the knowledge or consent of such nonsigning partners, nor to state the occupation, residence, or place of business of the members of the firm, or any of them, nor the residence of their assignee, does not comply with Laws N. Y. 1877, c. 466, as amended by Laws 1878, c. 318, relating to assignments for the benefit of creditors, and requiring the assignors to file an inventory or schedule containing the name, occupation, place of residence, and place of business of the debtor, the name and place of residence of the assignee, a true and full account of all the creditors, their residence, amount and consideration of their debts, etc., and a true and full inventory of the debtor's estate, together with an affidavit by the debtor that the same is just and true.]

[2. The statute further provides that, if the inventory prescribed shall not be made and filed within 30 days, the assignment shall be void. Held, that the failure to file a proper inventory rendered the assignment void as to execution creditors who had levied upon the property of the firm in the possession of the general assignee subsequent to the 30 days within which the statute required the inventory to be filed, and prior to the filing of a petition in bankruptcy by the assignors.]

[Cited in Hunker v. Bing, 9 Fed. 280.]

[3. The assignment being operative until the time within which the inventory might have been filed by the assignors had expired, there was no interest in the debtor, to give effect to a levy made within that period. In re Croughwell, Case No. 3,440, followed.]

[4. The assignment was void as to the firm property, as well as to the individual estate of the nonsigning members of the firm.]

[5. An adjudication in bankruptcy relates back to the filing of the original petition, and not to the time of an ancillary petition filed to correct an irregularity, and a levy after the filing of the original petition gives no lien.]

[In bankruptcy. In the matter of Isaac Bear, Philip Bear, and Samuel Bear, bankrupts.

[For subsequent proceedings on behalf of creditors of the bankrupts, see 5 Fed. 53; 7

[1] [Not previously reported.]

Fed. 583; 8 Fed. 428, 429. For accounting of the general assignee, see Hunker v. Bing, 9 Fed. 277.]

George Bell, for creditor.
F. W. Hinrichs, for assignee.

CHOATE, District Judge. The question in this case is whether an execution creditor has acquired a lien on the goods of the bankrupts, the proceeds of which have been paid into court subject to such lien, if it exists. The bankrupts, Isaac Bear, Philip Bear, and Samuel Bear, carried on business in New York city as copartners. On the 2d of January, 1878, the bankrupts made a general assignment of their joint and individual estates for the benefit of their creditors. This assignment is not objected to by the execution creditor, either in form or in substance, as being invalid under the laws of New York, except by reason of the alleged failure to comply with the statute in the matter of filing an inventory. See the statute, (Laws N. Y. 1877, c. 466, since amended by Laws N. Y. 1878, c. 318.) The statute requires the debtor making the assignment within twenty days thereafter to file an inventory or schedule containing the name, occupation, place of residence, and place of business of the debtor, the name and place of residence of the assignee, a true and full account of all the creditors, their residence, amount and consideration of their debts. etc., and a true and full inventory of the debtor's estate, and an affidavit made by the debtor that the same is in all respects just and true. In case the debtor shall omit to file such schedule or inventory within twenty days, the assignee may within thirty days after the date of the assignment make and file such inventory and schedule, so far as he can. The statute then provided that "in case an inventory shall not be made and filed within thirty days by the debtor or the assignee the assignment shall be void." On the 15th of January, 1879, a document purporting to be an inventory was filed. It was signed and verified by one of the assignees only, Samuel Bear. It purports to be and is sworn in the affidavit to be a schedule of all the creditors of the firm, as required by the statute, and an inventory of all the estate of the copartners, both joint and several. It contains a schedule of individual liabilities of Isaac Bear and of Philip Bear, and of assets of Isaac Bear. It contains no schedule of liabilities of Samuel Bear, nor of assets of Samuel or Philip Bear, nor does it contain any statement that such liabilities or assets do not exist, except so far as that may be inferred as to the assets from the affidavit of Samuel Bear above referred to. Between the 15th of January and the 9th of March, 1878, the creditor, having recovered judgment, levied his executions on the stock of goods formerly in the possession of the debtors, but which had been delivered to, and were at the time of such levies in the possession of, the assignee, and he now claims that these levies gave him a lien thereon, not affected by the subsequent bankruptcy. The petition in bankruptcy was filed March 11, 1878. The assignment has been set aside at the suit of the assignee in bankruptcy as being fraudulent under the bankrupt law; and, under the rule declared in the case of In re Beisenthal, the intervening levies give no liens as against the assignee in bankruptcy, unless the assignment was void by the law of New York as against the execution creditor. In re Beisenthal, [Cases Nos. 1,235 and 1,236.] It is claimed that the assignment is made void by the statute for the following defects in the inventory or schedule; that it was not signed or verified by Isaac Bear or Philip Bear, nor did it purport to be made with their knowledge or consent; that it did not state the occupation, place of residence, or place of business of the assignors, or any of them; that it did not state the residence of the assignee, nor contain a schedule of the individual creditors or estate of Samuel Bear, nor an inventory of the individual estate of Philip Bear; that, while stating the individual estate of Isaac Bear, it was not signed or verified by him. The 25th section of the statute provides that the court, where this assignment is recorded, "may exercise the powers of a court of equity in reference to the trust and any matters involved therein."

The question is whether the filing of an inventory defective in the particulars stated made the assignment void at the expiration of thirty days from its date. That it was not, in case it then became void, made void ab initio, by relation back, was held in the case of In re Croughwell, [Case No. 3,440.] There is no evidence of fraud, unless it is to be inferred from these defects in the inventory, and the care with which the inventory was in other respects prepared seems to show an intention to comply with the statute. It is urged that the general equity powers given to the court by the 25th section of the act are sufficiently large to allow all necessary amendments of the inventory, if it does not in all respects conform to the statute. I am unable to see, however, how the court, in the exercise of such a power, can dispense with or obviate the want of an inventory, where the statute expressly declares that if no inventory is filed the assignment shall be void. This would be to make of no effect this positive provision of law. The question, therefore, is whether there was an inventory filed, within the meaning of the statute. The inventory filed cannot be considered as a schedule of the debts of Samuel Bear. It does not purport to be so. In view of what it contains and what it omits, the fact that it is not sworn to by Philip Bear and Isaac Bear is fatal to the inventory as an inventory of those debtors' individual estates. It seems to me impossible to hold it is in substantial respects such an inventory as those assignors were required to file. It clearly was the intention of the statute that the debtor should verify the inventory. Among the separately enumerated things to be contained in it is the affidavit of the debtor to its truth. In no sense as to the individual estate of Philip and Isaac Bear can their copartner Samuel Bear be deemed to have had any authority whatever to verify the inventory for them, and I see no escape from the conclusion that as to their individual estates the assignment became void at the end of the thirty days because the debtors did not file such an inventory as the law requires, nor, upon their omission to do so, did the assignee file, as he might have done, an inventory such as he was able to make out for them. I think, upon the authorities, that the substantial requirements of the statute in such a case must be complied with, or the assignment will be held to be necessarily fraudulent as against creditors. The requirements of the statute are for the security of creditors against secret and fraudulent assignments. Juliand v. Rathbone, 39 N. Y. 369. The fair construction of the statute is that, if the assignee does not within twenty days file an inventory substantially such as is described, the assignee may have 60 days' further time to make and file the same as well as he can, otherwise the assignment fails. If this assignment is void as to the individual estates of Isaac and Philip Bear, can it be sustained as to the firm property? It seems not. Firm creditors have an interest under the assignment in the possible surplus of the individual estates, and it is impossible to uphold the instrument in part and avoid it in part, the rule being that where a statute in terms declares a deed or instrument void on account of some illegal or fraudulent provision contained therein, or some vicious element or fault in it, then it is void in toto, because the legislature has seen fit to make it so. O'Neil v. Salmon, 25 How. Pr. 255, and cases cited. The levies made, therefore, between the expiration of the thirty days and the filing of the original petition in bankruptcy, gave the execution creditor valid liens on the property.

It is also claimed that the adjudication in bankruptcy does not relate back to the filing of the original petition in bankruptcy, but only to the time of filing the ancillary petition, because it is said that one of the original petitioning creditors did not sign the petition, the name of the creditor in the petition being "A. Fleischmann & Co.," and the signature being "A. Fleischmann." There is nothing in the point. A. Fleischmann & Co., with the other petitioning creditors, appeared by their attorney. They were the parties petitioning, and, even if A. Fleischmann & Co. had not signed at all, it would be, at most, a mere irregularity in practice, not affecting the jurisdiction. The statute does not in terms require the petitioners all to sign in order to give the court jurisdiction to entertain the petition. Therefore, the levy after the filing of the petition gave no lien. As to the first levy, which was within the twenty days on the authority of Croughwell's Case, ut supra, the assignment was then operative, and there was no interest in the debtor to give effect to the levy.

Case No. 1,178.

In re BEAR et al.

[1 Cent. Law J. 607; 11 N. B. R. (1875,) 46.]

District Court, S. D. Mississippi.

BANKRUPTCY—INSURANCE POLICY—RIGHTS OF WIFE AND ASSIGNEE.

[1. Where the husband insures his life for the benefit of his wife, the legal title to the policy is in her; so that, upon his becoming bankrupt, it is not necessary that he should surrender such policy, or list it in his schedule of assets.]

[2. Payments of premiums thereon by the husband after he becomes insolvent, however, constitute a fraud on his creditors, whether made with fraudulent intent or not, to the extent that the assignee in bankruptcy is entitled to recover from the wife out of the proceeds of the policy, when it shall have been paid, the amount so advanced by the husband, with interest.]

[3. This claim on the part of the assignee, when its amount is ascertained, may be sold by him, and will pass to the purchaser a contingent right in the proceeds of the policy.]

[In bankruptcy. In the matter of the bankruptcy of Bear and Steinberg.]

Harris & George, for creditors.
Wharton & Johnstons, for bankrupts.

HILL, District Judge. This case is now submitted upon the exception of the creditors to the schedules of the bankrupts, upon the ground that they do not contain, and the bankrupts have not surrendered therein, a life policy taken out by each for the benefit of his wife. The question, upon examination, I find one of no little difficulty, and have postponed its decision for the purpose of obtaining all the light on the question attainable. But as it may be important to the parties in interest to have it settled without further postponement, I proceed to its examination. It is admitted that the policies are upon the lives of the husbands for the benefit of their wives; this being so, the question is, to whom do they belong? I am inclined to the opinion that the legal title is in the wife, and not the husband. The value of the policy depends upon the payment of the premiums as they fall due. This may be done by the wife out of her own means, or may be advanced by a friend other than her husband; if advanced by the husband it is but an advancement, settlement, or provision made by him for her benefit out of his estate, which, if solvent at the time the advance was made, he could do without any violation of the rights of creditors—provided it was reasonable in amount when considered in connection with his estate and liabilities—and certainly would be valid as to subsequent creditors; indeed, a suitable provision for one's household is not only not condemned, but sanctioned by law, both human and divine. I am of opinion that the title to a life-policy of the kind mentioned, both legal and equitable, is in the wife, and cannot be controlled or assigned by the husband. It is otherwise when taken out by him for his own benefit, or for the benefit of his estate, as in the case of Catchings v. Manlove, 10 George, [39 Miss.] 655, cited by creditors' counsel; hence the necessity of the assignment to his wife and children in that case, which, being made when the husband was insolvent, was properly declared void as against his creditors, but was valid as against other parties. Whilst I am satisfied the policies in the case now submitted belong to the wives of the bankrupts, and are not subject to be surrendered by the bankrupts, yet any payments which they may have made out of either their individual or partnership effects, after they became insolvent, were a fraud whether so intended or not, so far as to entitle the assignee to recover from the wife the amount advanced, with interest, out of the policy when it shall have been paid, and this claim when ascertained may be sold by the assignee, and will pass the contingent right to the purchaser. The Case of Erben, [Case No. 1,315,] referred to by counsel, was a claim upon the part of the bankrupt, for whatever interest he had in the policy to be set off as exempt under the statute of Pennsylvania, which was allowed, which, if it was property in the sense of the statute, was properly set off, and did not raise the question as between the creditors and right of the wife, and is not authority upon the question now presented. The other cases referred to by the distinguished and able counsel of the creditors, will be found when closely examined, I am of opinion, not in conflict with the conclusion above stated. The register will take proof as to the amount paid by the bankrupts, if any, after they became insolvent, and out of that fund paid, which claim, when ascertained, will be sold for cash by the assignee, as provided for the sale of other debts or choses in action.

Case No. 1,179.

BEAR v. LUSE.

[6 Sawy. 148; 12 Chi. Leg. News, 130.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Oregon. Dec. 10, 1879.

PUBLIC LANDS — TOWN SITE — SUIT TO AFFECT A PATENT—QUESTIONS OF FACT—DECISIONS OF THE LAND DEPARTMENT—QUESTIONS OF LAW.

1. The occupation of a tract of land as a town site for the purposes of business or trade, which is afterwards abandoned, does not impress upon the locality the character or quality of a town site, so that the same can not be taken up and held under the donation act as unoccupied public land.

2. Equity does not have jurisdiction to affect a patent except upon the ground of an antecedent equity in the plaintiff which was disregarded in the issuing thereof, and therefore a party who claims to have settled upon a tract of public land subsequent to the settlement and entry thereof by another who has received the patent for the same, upon the ground that the settlement and entry of the patentee were illegal and void, can not maintain a suit to set aside such patent or charge the patentee as his trustee of the premises.

3. Questions of fact decided in the land department are not subject to review by the courts, except for fraud or mistake other than an error of judgment; and where there is a contest in such department between one who claims to be a settler upon a portion of the public land, to cancel the entry of a prior settler upon the same land, the decision therein precludes further inquiry by the parties into any question of fact which might properly have been made in such contest, the same as if it had been actually so made and considered.

4. Whether a settler under the donation act upon unsurveyed lands could commute his residence thereon, under section 1 of the acts of February 14, 1853, and July 17, 1854, by the payment of one dollar and twenty-five cents an acre therefor, is a question of law, and therefore the decision of the land department thereon may be reviewed by this court upon the suit of a party having an equity in the premises prior to such entry, but not otherwise, except in a suit by the United States to cancel the patent issued upon such entry.

[In equity. Bill by John Bear against H. H. Luse to enjoin certain proceedings at law on the part of Luse to recover possession of certain lots in Marshfield. Bill dismissed.

[Bills were also filed against the same defendant, for the same purpose, by W. F. Deubmer, George Wolf, Frederick Timmerman, William G. Webster, A. Lobree, C. B. Golden, and William Temple. By stipulation the case of Bear against Luse was argued and submitted upon the understanding that the final determination therein should be followed in the other cases. These bills were also dismissed.]

Walter W. Thayer and William G. Webster, for plaintiff.

John Burnett and R. R. Strahan, for defendant.

Before FIELD, Circuit Justice, and DEADY, District Judge.

DEADY, District Judge. In the spring of 1877, H. H. Luse commenced actions at law in the circuit court for the county of Coos against a number of persons to recover the possession of certain lots in the town of Marshfield, in said county, the same being parts of lots 3 and 4 of section 26, in township 25 south, of range 13 west of the Wallamet meridian. Each of the defendants in these actions filed a complaint in equity in the nature of a cross bill, under section 377 of the Oregon Civil Code, against Luse, to stay the proceedings therein, and praying that he be enjoined from "asserting any right or title to the premises" or "interfering with the plaintiffs in occupying and holding" the same. Under said section 377, the effect of this was to stay the proceedings in the actions at law until the final disposition of the suit in equity. On account of the disability of the judge, the cases were removed by stipulation to the circuit court for the county of Marion. In November, 1878, they were removed by Luse to this court, upon the grounds that he was a citizen of California, and that the controversy therein arises under the donation and town-site acts of the United States, and were entered here on January 6, 1879. By stipulation, the evidence taken in this case was to be considered as taken in the others; and on August 21 it was argued and submitted, upon the understanding that the final determination therein should be followed in the other cases.

[1] [Reported by L. S. B. Sawyer, Esq., and here reprinted by permission. 12 Chi. Leg. News, 130, contains only a partial report.]

The material facts in the case are as follows: On March 24, 1877, the land office at Roseburg issued a patent certificate, No. 1,961, in favor of Wilkins Warwick, for a donation of one hundred and sixty acres, under the donation act of September 27, 1850, (9 Stat. 497,) upon a residence thereon from August 4, 1854, to March 10, 1856, and the payment on September 16, 1856, of one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, under the acts of February 14, 1853, (10 Stat. 158,) and of July 17, 1854, (10 Stat. 306,) amendatory of said donation act, in lieu of the remainder of the four years' residence thereby required, the same being lots 3 and 4 of section 26, the north one-half of the south-east one-quarter of section 27, all in township 25 south, of range 13 west of the Wallamet meridian; upon which certificate a patent for said premises was on May 6, 1876, issued to said Warwick, and the defendant, Luse, on and before the commencement of said actions at law, had, by means of sufficient conveyances, acquired all the interest of said Warwick in the premises. In 1869, proceedings were instituted in the local land office in the interest of the inhabitants of Marshfield, and with a view of entering the same for their benefit as a town site, to cancel and set aside Warwick's notification and entry upon the charge of "abandonment." The ground of this charge was, that the commutation entry of September 16, 1856, was void, the land being then unsurveyed, and therefore the failure to reside thereon, thenceforth, amounted to an abandonment. That office and the commissioner of the general land office decided the question against Warwick, holding that section 1 of the acts of February 14, 1853, and of July 17, 1854, providing for the payment of one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre in lieu of the last three years' residence upon the donation required by the act of September 27, 1850, did not apply to unsurveyed lands.

Upon an appeal to the secretary of the interior, that officer on May 29, 1874, reversed such decision, saying: "The language [of said section 1] is somewhat ambiguous, but it is undoubtedly susceptible of a construction to include unsurveyed land, and such a construction seems to be in strict conformity with the spirit of the act and the objects intended to be accomplished by its passage. The construction adopted is extremely technical, and I think contrary to the policy of the act, which was a benevolent statute, and as such had received, in all adjudicated cases arising under it, an exceptionally liberal interpretation. Stark v. Starr, 6 Wall. [73 U. S.] 402; Silver v. Ladd, 7 Wall. [74 U. S.] 219." The secretary also held that the entry of Warwick being, prima facie, regular and valid, the contestants, who had neither alleged nor claimed any prior interest in the land, could not maintain a proceeding to set it aside.

The present suit is sought to be maintained not only upon the ground passed upon in the land department, namely, the abandonment by Warwick of his residence upon the premises before he had complied with the requirements of the law, but also upon the ground that the premises included in the patent to Warwick are a part of the town site of Marshfield, which "was settled upon for the purposes of business and trade, and not agriculture, long prior to the date of the pretended settlement or occupation by Warwick," and that, relying upon this fact, the plaintiff settled upon the lot in controversy, expecting "that title thereto would be duly obtained in accordance" with the laws of the United States.

Briefly, it appears from the evidence that in March, 1854, Mr. J. C. Tolman, now surveyor-general of this state, went upon the ground with his family, and marked out a claim of three hundred and twenty acres, to which he gave the name of Marshfield, and built a double log house thereon, with the intention of acquiring the same as a donation under the act of September 27, 1850, and building a town thereon. About August 1, Tolman removed to Jackson county, where he settled upon three hundred and twenty acres of the public land and acquired the title to the same under the donation act, and never returned to Coos county. When he left he made an arrangement with one A. J. Davis to hold the claim thereafter together, Davis procuring Warwick to hold the north end of the claim for him, and one A. J. Gaskill the south end for Tolman. Just prior to leaving, Tolman gave Captains Crosby and Williams, who were in the bay with a vessel, two lots, on the marsh near the water, on condition that they would build a store and warehouse thereon, and occupy the same as a place of business. During the summer they caused a small frame house to be erected there, but never occupied it or returned to the place. On August 4, 1854, Warwick went into the log house built by Tolman, and resided there for over a year, claiming to be a settler under the donation act, during which time, on March 10, 1856, he filed a notification under the donation act for one hundred and sixty acres, including such dwelling house, and on September 16, 1856, per said Davis, made proof of such residence and cultivation, and entered the same at one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, under the donation act and section 1 of the acts of February 14, 1853, and July 17, 1854. In the fall of 1856 Warwick and Davis, left the country, and have not yet returned to it, and at the same time, James T. Jordan, by the permission of Davis, occupied the house built by Crosby and Williams as a store. Davis gave Jordan instructions to look after the claim and pay the taxes on it, which he did for about five years, when Luse assumed an oversight of the place as the agent of Davis and within a year thereafter as the owner of the same. On June 10, 1855, Tolman sold his supposed interest in the Marshfield claim to J. S. Hatch, who soon after took George C. Furber into the speculation as a partner. In the fall of 1856, Socrates Schofield, under the direction of said Hatch, Furber, and Davis, laid off a village upon the claim taken up by Tolman, the smaller portion of which was upon the tract patented to Warwick, and made plats thereof, which was the first attempt to lay off a town upon the premises. The first house built upon the Marshfield claim after the two built in 1854, was built in 1857, and occupied as a dwelling-house by a man named Hamilton. The next house was a saloon, built in 1866, and now occupied by the plaintiff. Soon after this, in 1866–67, a saw-mill was built at Marshfield, and people commenced to occupy the place as a town; and at the commencement of these actions at law there were from fifty to seventy-five houses on the portion included in Warwick's donation. On October 24, 1874, the town of Marshfield was duly incorporated, with the following boundaries: "Commencing at a point on the ship channel of Isthmus slough, ten chains north of the south-east corner of lot 2 in section 26 of township 25 south of range 13 west; thence west to the east line of section 27 of said township; thence north along said line forty chains; thence east to the inside channel of Coos bay; and thence southerly along said channel to the place of beginning." Sess. Laws, 162. These boundaries include the lots involved in this litigation. In November, 1873, and before the incorporation of said town, an application was made by G. Webster, acting on behalf of the inhabitants of the place, to enter land as a town site, including a portion of the Warwick donation. The contest to cancel Warwick's entry being then pending in the land department at Washington, the application and money were merely received by the officers as a deposit to await the result of such contest, and were returned to Webster in the same month. On February 19, 1877, the trustee of the town of Marshfield applied at the land office to make the same entry, but the application was rejected on the ground that it was not open to entry.

Upon this state of facts this suit can not be maintained. The place called Marshfield was not, as a matter of fact, occupied as a town site, or settled upon for the purpose of business or trade, prior to the survey of the same into lots and blocks in the fall of 1856, and probably not until 1866, and never within the meaning of the town-site act of May 23, 1844, (5 Stat. 657,) and section 1 of the act of July 17, 1854, (10 Stat. 305.) The act of July 17, 1854, supra, first extended the town-site act of May 23, 1844, over Oregon, and they are so far in pari materia, and therefore should be construed as one. Taken together, they provide that thereafter a donation claim shall not be surveyed so as to include lands settled upon and occupied as a town site. But this settlement and occupation must have taken place before the settlement under the donation act, and not been given up or abandoned. If any number of people had settled upon the Marshfield claim in 1854, as a town site, for the purposes of business or trade, and thereafter, and before the entry of the same, had left the place—abandoned it—the land would not thereby have had the character or quality of a town site indelibly impressed upon it, so that it could not afterwards be taken and held under the donation act. On the contrary, so soon as it was not occupied as a town site it was abandoned, and was open to settlement under the donation act as though it had never been occupied for any purpose. Lownsdale v. Portland, [Case No. 8,578.] Mr. Tolman's interest in the land as a town site, or otherwise, ceased with his occupation of it on August 1, 1854, and the next comer took it unaffected by the fact or purpose of such occupation. The agreements by which it was attempted to prolong his interest in the claim after he ceased to occupy it through the occupancy of others were clearly illegal, and could not affect the rights of any one. Donation Act, § 12. When Warwick's settlement commenced upon the Marshfield claim August 4, 1854, it was vacant land. There was no one else living upon or claiming it, and it was clearly open to settlement under the donation act; and, if any number of people settled on it thereafter for the purposes of business or trade, that did not make the place a town site, within the meaning of the statute, but such persons were either trespassers or occupants under the owner, Warwick. A settler under the donation act has the legal estate in his donation from the date of his settlement, and no number of people can deprive him of it by occupying it as a town site or otherwise. Chapman v. School Dist. [Case No. 2,607;] Fields v. Squires, [Id. 4,776;] Mizner v. Vaughn, [Id. 9,678;] Adams v. Burke, [Id. 49.] But it is alleged, and there is evidence tending to prove the allegation, that Warwick's settlement under the donation act was fraudulent and void because not made for himself, but for Davis or Tolman. But the plaintiff is not in a condition to question the legality of Warwick's settlement and occupation and the patent to him thereon. Equity does not have jurisdiction to affect or set aside a patent, or to hold the patentee as a trustee for another, except upon the ground of an antecedent equity in the plaintiff, which was disregarded or overlooked in the issuing of such patent. Stark v. Starr, 6 Wall. [73 U. S.] 410; Frisbie v. Whitney, 9 Wall. [76 U. S.] 196.

The interest of the plaintiff, if any, is subsequent to the settlement, occupation, proof, and entry of Warwick. Prima facie, the premises had become the property of Warwick before the plaintiff's occupation began. The legality of Warwick's settlement and occupation was then exclusively a question between him and the United States; and, until such entry was canceled by the latter, neither the inhabitants of Marshfield, nor any one for them, was entitled to enter the land as a town site. Rightfully or wrongfully, the land had been granted to another before there were any occupants of lots in Marshfield other than the donee thereof. The plaintiff is, therefore, without any established interest in or right to the premises, and therefore has no standing in a court of equity to question the legality of the patent to Warwick or the sufficiency of the grounds upon which it issued. But a contest was had in the land department between the inhabitants of Marshfield and Warwick upon the question of the validity of this entry, which was decided in favor of the latter. In the contest the only objection made to the donation entry was that, being upon unsurveyed lands, the settler was not entitled to commute the required residence thereon by paying for the land at the end of one year's residence, at the rate of one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre. And that question being one of law merely, depending for its solution upon the proper construction of section 1, of the act of February 14, 1853, which provides that settlers under the donation act, "who have located or may hereafter locate" public land, "of which survey shall have been made or may hereafter be had," shall, after one year's occupation, in lieu of the residence required by that act, be permitted to pay "one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre for the lands so claimed, located, and surveyed as aforesaid," this court might now, if the plaintiff had any interest in or right to the premises, review the action of the land department thereon and annul it, if erroneous. But, as it is, that action can only be reviewed in a suit by the United States to cancel and set aside the patent on the ground that it was illegally issued. But, even if the plaintiff could maintain a suit to affect this patent, yet no mere question of fact decided by the land department in the progress of the matter, or which might have been made therein, can now be reviewed by this court except for fraud or mistake other than an error in judgment in estimating the value or effect of evidence. Johnson v. Towsley, 13 Wall. [80 U. S.] 83; Shepley v. Cowan, 91 U. S. 340; Aiken v. Ferry, [Case No. 112;] Stevens v. Sharp, [Id. 13,410.] Therefore the question whether Warwick's settlement, occupation, and entry were in fact for himself or for Davis or Tolman, or whether the Marshfield claim was occupied as a town site or settled upon for the purposes of business or trade at or prior to Warwick's settlement thereon, can not be inquired of in this suit. For, although these questions were not specifically made in the contest in the land department, they were plainly within the scope of the inquiry, and might have been raised and decided if the contestants had desired. Impliedly, the decision of the secretary of the interior—that the Warwick entry was valid and lawful—included every question of fact that might properly have been raised and decided in the progress of the contest concerning it. If the rule were otherwise, this case is a good illustration of the intolerable vexation and delay which would attend the procuring of titles by settlers on public lands. As has been stated, the contest in the land department was made upon the single proposition that the Warwick donation, being unsurveyed, could not be purchased, and that Warwick's removal from it after a residence thereon of less than two years, and the payment of one dollar and twenty-five cents therefor, was, in effect, an abandonment of his settlement—a failure to perform the conditions subsequent of the grant, whereby the premises reverted to the United States and were open to settlement under the town-site law. The proposition that Warwick's settlement was for the benefit of another, or that the place was occupied as a town at and before Warwick's settlement, does not then seem to have been thought of, but they are brought forward at this late day and in this form to defeat and nullify the action of the land department in that contest. But it appears that even these questions were brought before the department prior to the issue of the patent, and considered by it as upon a motion for a new trial. On May, 11, 1875, the register and receiver forwarded the principal evidence relied on by the plaintiff upon these points to the commissioner, who, on May 29, 1875, submitted the same to the secretary, with a recommendation that the case be opened, which, on September 30, 1875, was refused by the acting secretary. Upon the whole, there is no equity in the bill, or any ground upon which it can be maintained. It is therefore dismissed, with costs. The same decree will be entered in the cases of the following-named plaintiffs against the same defendants: W. F. Deubmer, Nos. 489, 490; John Bear, No. 491; George Wolf, No. 492; Frederick Timmerman, No. 493; William G. Webster, No. 494; A. Lobree, No. 495; C. B. Golden, No. 496; William Temple, No. 497.

Case No. 1,180.

BEARD v. BOWLER.

[2 Bond, 13.] [1]

Circuit Court, S. D. Ohio. Feb. Term, 1866.

EQUITY PLEADING—PLEA—DEMURRER—SUFFICIENCY OF BILL—DEFECTIVE PARTIES—AMENDMENTS.

1. A demurrer to a plea presents the question of the sufficiency of the bill as well as of the plea.

2. Where a defendant is sued as the sole owner of a railroad, and the proof is that he is jointly concerned with others as a stockholder, the allegation of ownership is material, and unless the bill is amended no decree can be entered against defendant.

3. An objection to a plea that it is defective in not responding to all the allegations of a bill is not sustainable, for a plea may be either to the whole bill, or to a part only.

[In equity. Bill by Gabriel H. Beard against Robert B. Bowler for discovery, an account of profits, and an injunction, for the alleged infringement of a patent. Heard on demurrer to the plea. Demurrer overruled.]

George M. Lee, for plaintiff.

King & Thompson, for defendant.

LEAVITT, District Judge. The question before the court arises on a demurrer to the defendant's plea in bar to the plaintiff's bill in equity. The bill alleges that the plaintiff is the owner of the exclusive right to an improved claw-bar for drawing spikes from the rails of a railroad, and other like purposes, by a patent issued in June, 1861, and that the defendant has infringed the patent by its use on the Kentucky Central Railroad. The bill prays for a discovery, an account of profits, and an injunction restraining the defendant from the further use of said improved claw-bar. The bill avers that the defendant is the owner of said railroad, and as such is, at the time of filing the bill, in the unlawful use of said improvement. The defendant pleads in bar, that since January 1, 1861, the Kentucky Central Railroad has been owned by a joint stock company, the stock of which is divided into shares, held by individual shareholders, and that said company is under the control and management of five directors, of whom the plea admits the defendant is one. The grounds of the demurrer to the plea are in substance: 1. That there is no denial of the defendant's sole ownership of the road prior to January 1, 1861. 2. That the defendant, on his admission that he is a shareholder in the joint stock company, is liable individually to respond to the plaintiff for the alleged infringement.

Upon a familiar principle of pleading, the demurrer to the plea presents the question of the sufficiency of the bill, as well as of the plea itself. Is the bill sustainable on the facts as admitted by the pleadings? If this question is answered in the negative, it is clear that the demurrer to the plea must be overruled.

Without adverting to all the points brought to the notice of the court, there is one consideration that is decisive as to the bill as framed. The bill, as before noticed, avers that the defendant "owns and is the proprietor of the Central Kentucky Railroad, and as such proprietor has infringed the plaintiff's patent." The plea explicitly denies the averment of ownership, asserting that the road, since January 1, 1861, has been held and owned by a joint stock company. But the plea does not directly respond to the allegation of an infringement between June 12, 1861—the date of the patent—and the formation of the joint stock company. The demurrer to the plea admits all the facts set forth in it. And one of these facts is, that the defendant was not, at the filing of the bill, and has not been since January 1, 1861, the proprietor of the road. It is clear, therefore, that the plaintiff can have no claim against the defendant individually, for any infringement of the plaintiff's patent occurring after the joint stock company was formed. This proposition needs no argument or authorities to support it. It results, therefore, that the defendant is sued in a wrong capacity, namely, as the sole owner of the road, whereas he is jointly concerned with others, as a stockholder. No principle in equity practice is more indisputably settled, than that a plaintiff can obtain a decree only on the case made in the bill. The allegata and the probata must correspond. The allegation, therefore, of the defendant's ownership of the road, is material and must be sustained. It is explicitly averred that the defendant, at the time the bill was filed, was the sole owner. As before stated, on the pleadings this allegation is in direct contradiction of the fact. And it follows that unless the bill is amended to meet the fact, no decree can be entered against the defendant.

The objection that the plea is defective, in not responding to all the allegations of the bill, is not sustainable. Judge Story says (Eq. Pl. 537, 538:) "A plea may be bad in part and not in the whole;" and it "may be either to the whole bill, or to a part only." But "if the plea is to the whole bill, but does not extend to or cover the whole of the bill, it is bad." But if there is any doubt as to the sufficiency of the plea in the particular rererred to, the court, if requested, will grant leave to the defendant to amend his plea to meet all the allegations of the bill.

[1] [Reported by Lewis H. Bond, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

BEARD, (JOHNSON v.) See Case No. 7,371.

BEARD, (McCOMB v.) See Case No. 8,706.

Case No. 1,181.

BEARD et al. v. ROWAN.

[1 McLean, 135.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Kentucky. Nov. Term, 1831.[2]

ALIENS—CAPACITY TO HOLD AND TRANSMIT LAND—RETROSPECTIVE LEGISLATION—POWER OF STATE—EXECUTORY DEVISE—POWER OF EXECUTOR—LAND HELD IN TRUST.

1. An executor in a will has no power to convey lands. The lands had been devised to executors in trust.

2. An executory devise good, and takes effect on the happening of the contingency.

3. A state has power to give a capacity to aliens to hold lands within it.

4. An act which declares an alien, "which shall have resided in the state two years," shall be capable of holding and transmitting lands, the same as a citizen, applies as well to future as to past residence.

[See note at end of case.]

[At law. Writ of right by Henry Beard, William A. Beard, Lewis Hawkins, and Mary, his wife, demandants, against John Rowan, tenant, for 100 acres of land. Tried by jury. Verdict for the tenant.

[The case was afterwards taken to the supreme court, on writ of error, by the demandants, and the judgment of this court was affirmed. Beard v. Rowan, 9 Pet. (34 U. S.) 301.]

Mr. Pirtle, for plaintiffs.

Mr. Harden, for defendant.

OPINION OF THE COURT. The plaintiffs have brought a writ of right for one hundred acres of land, near to or adjoining the city of Louisville. The defendant in his plea sets up a claim to ninety-five acres of the premises, and disclaims as to the residue. And he puts himself on the assize and prays recognition to be made as to the better right. The parties both claim under the will of John Campbell. The demandants claim under a deed from Taylor, the surviving executor of John Campbell, dated the 21st of April, 1826. The tenant claims under a devise in the will of John Campbell.

The following facts are agreed to by the parties. 1. That John Campbell was born in the kingdom of Ireland; that he came to the United States of America prior to the Revolutionary War; that he continued to reside in the said United States, from the time of his migration thereto, until he departed this life, in October, 1799, in Fayette county, in the state of Kentucky, where he then resided; that the 25th July, 1786, he made and duly published his last will and testament, of that date, with an endorsement thereon, dated the 5th April, 1791; that said will and endorsement were duly proved and recorded the 13th January, 1800, in the county court of Fayette county; and that the said John Campbell was seised in fee simple at the time of his death of the premises in controversy, and that he was never married.

2. That Robert Campbell was born in the kingdom of Ireland; that he migrated to the United States of America before the Revolutionary War; that he continued to reside therein until his death, in August, 1805, near Louisville, Kentucky; that he had resided in Kentucky many years before his death; that he died intestate, was never married, and was a brother of the whole blood of John Campbell.

3. That Allen Campbell was born in the kingdom of Ireland, and was about twenty-five or six years of age when he died; that he migrated to the United States in 1796, and resided in the city of Philadelphia until he came to the state of Kentucky, in December, 1799; that he resided in Kentucky from that time until the 16th September, 1804, when he died, never having been married. He was a half brother on the father's side to John and Robert Campbell and Sarah Beard.

4. That the said Sarah Beard was born in the kingdom of Ireland, and migrated to Kentucky in 1800, where she resided until her decease, in October, 1806; that she was a sister of the whole blood to John and Robert Campbell, and sister of the half blood to Allen Campbell on the side of the father; that she was a widow when she came to Kentucky, and so continued until her death; that at her death she had three surviving children, to wit, William Beard, Joseph Beard, and Elizabeth McGowan, all of whom were born in Ireland; that William Beard came to the United States in 1790, was never naturalized, and died in 1813; that he was married, and had two children, issue of said marriage, at the death of the said John Campbell, to wit, Nancy C. Beard and Sarah Beard, who were his only children at that time; that the said Nancy C. Beard intermarried with Robert Byewaters, and is still living; and Sarah Beard intermarried with Hankerson Byewaters, and is still living; that the mother of the said Nancy and Sarah departed this life, and the said William Beard married a second time, and had the following issue of said marriage, William A. Beard, Catherine Beard, Mary Beard, John Beard, Charles Beard, and Joseph Beard, all of whom were born since the death of the said John Campbell; that the said Catherine Beard has intermarried with, and is now the wife of Henry H. Shepard; that the said Mary Beard has intermarried with, and is now the wife of Lewis Hawkins; that the said Charles Beard died in March, 1831, an infant, and without a child; that the said John, Charles, and Joseph Beard were born since the death of the said Sarah Beard; that the said Joseph Beard and Elizabeth McGowan, children of the said Sarah Beard, came with her to Kentucky, and are still living; that the following are the children of the said last named Joseph Beard, to wit, Henry Beard, Ann Daley, wife of Lawrence Daley, Isabella McLear, wife of Charles McLear, Sarah McLear, wife of Francis McLear, and Joseph Beard, Jun.

[1] [Reported by Hon. John McLean, Circuit Justice.]

[2] [Affirmed in 9 Pet. (34 U. S.) 301.]

5. That the said Campbell, Robert Campbell, Allen Campbell, and Sarah Beard, were the only surviving children of Allen Campbell the elder, who departed this life in Ireland, before the said John Campbell.

6. That Charles Simms and Richard Taylor survived the other trustees and executors of John Campbell; that said Simms departed this life in the District of Columbia about the year 1825 or 6, never having been in the state of Kentucky; that neither of the other trustees, except Taylor and Sullivan, were ever in the state of Kentucky after the decease of the said John Campbell; that said Taylor resided therein at the death of John Campbell, and so continued until his death in 1828; and that said Taylor alone qualified as executor of the said John Campbell in Kentucky.

7. That the said defendants were possessed of the premises in contest in this action at the time of the service of the process, and were in possession in April, 1826, and prior to that time.

The will of John Campbell contains the following devise—

"I do further direct that after the decease of my said father, all the profits of my lands within five miles of the mouth of Bear Grass, shall be annually paid to the guardian of my said half brother, Allen Campbell, during his minority, to be applied to his education and maintenance, if so much be required therefor; if not, then the surplus to be laid out on interest by my said trustees, till my said half brother shall arrive at the age of twenty-one years or marry; but upon either of the said contingencies happening, the aforesaid profits shall then and thenceforth be paid to my said half brother for and during the term of ——; and if within that time my said half brother shall become a citizen of the United States, or be otherwise qualified by law to take and hold real estate within the same, I then direct that my said trustees, or the survivors or survivor of them, shall convey to him, my said half brother Allen Campbell, his heirs or assigns, in fee simple, all the lands herein before described in this devise; but if my said half brother shall not within the time aforesaid become a citizen as aforesaid, I then direct that my said trustees or the survivors or survivor of them shall sell and dispose of the aforesaid lands hereby directed to be conveyed to him on two years' credit, with interest from the date, to be paid annually, and the money and interest arising from such sale to be transmitted to my said half brother, to whom I give and bequeath the same."

"It is my further will and devise that, in case my said half brother shall die before the expiration of the aforesaid term of five years, after his arrival at the age of twenty-one years, the land intended by the next preceding clause to be devised to him, shall be sold by said trustees on two years' credit, and the money arising from such sale, when received, shall be transmitted to the guardians of the children which my said half brother may leave, to be by the said guardians lent out on interest, and equal division shall be made thereof amongst them; but should my said half brother become a citizen of the United States of America, or be otherwise qualified to hold real estate within the same before his death, it is then my will and devise that he shall have the sole and absolute disposal of all the estate hereinbefore devised and bequeathed to him notwithstanding he may not have obtained deeds therefor, from my said trustees."

"It is my further will and devise that in case my said half brother shall die before he shall become qualified to hold real estate as aforesaid, and without child or children, my said trustees shall make sale of the lands hereby directed to be conveyed to him, as is before directed, on two years' credit, and that the money arising by sale be appropriated to the use of my said sister, Sarah Beard, and all the children which she hath," &c.

The demandants to sustain their right exhibited in evidence a deed executed the 21st April, 1826, by Richard Taylor, as executor of John Campbell, to Joseph Beard, Elizabeth McGowan, and the heirs of William Beard. This deed after reciting the devise to Allen Campbell with the conditions as above stated, declares, that "whereas the said Allen Campbell died in 1804 without having disposed of certain parts of said real estate, by which it again reverted to the estate of said Campbell, and became subject to the devises in his will, or so much thereof as was undisposed of by said Campbell during his life time." A deed was also given in evidence by the demandants from Joseph Beard to Henry Beard, Lawrence Daley and others, conveying all his interest in the estate of John Campbell, deceased.

On the part of the tenant a deed was given in evidence from Sarah Beard, sister of John Campbell the testator, to Fortunatus Cosby, dated 7th July, 1806, and other mesne conveyances, the last of which was from William Lytle to the tenant, dated the 17th February, 1822. In 1800 Allen Campbell was put into possession of the whole landed estate devised to him in the will, by the executor Richard Taylor, as the owner thereof in fee. He occupied the same as his own, selling a part of the land, until his decease. On the death of Allen Campbell the estate undisposed of by him, was claimed by his half brother and sister, Robert Campbell and Sarah Beard, and on the death of Robert Campbell, Sarah Beard claimed as heir to the whole estate. Being thus seised of the estate she conveyed the land in controversy with other tracts to Cosby in 1806, as above stated.

The counsel for the demandants contends that under the will the fee of the land was vested in Richard Taylor as trustee, and continued so vested until the conveyance was made by him to Beard and others, by the deed in evidence. That Allen Campbell could not take the fee in the land except by conveyance from the trustee. In answer to this it may be said, that Richard Taylor though named in the codicil to the will as one of the executors, is no where named as one of the trustees. These are James Milligan, Charles Simms, William Elliot, and Philip Ross, who are also named as executors. Now as an executor, Taylor had no power to convey the estate, as the fee was not vested in him. This defect of power in the executor is fatal to the plaintiffs' right, as their claim is founded on the deed of Taylor. But another view of the case is equally fatal to their right. It is clear from the will that Allen Campbell took the estate in fee simple, if by the laws of the state he was capable of holding real estate. That this was the intention of the testator, is as clearly expressed, as that Allen Campbell was, in any form, his devisee. And the testator used great caution in the will to secure the land devised to Allen Campbell, or its proceeds. And the great question in the case is, and on the decision of which, a very large amount of property in the city of Louisville, or adjoining to it, is understood to depend, whether Allen Campbell could take the land devised by the will, he never having been naturalized. Being an alien, it is not pretended that he was capable of holding and transmitting real estate, in Kentucky, unless he comes within the provisions of the statute of the 18th December, 1800. This statute provides, that "whereas, by the laws now in force in this commonwealth, aliens cannot hold lands therein; and whereas, it is considered the true interest of this state, that such prohibition be done away. Be it therefore enacted, &c. that any alien, other than alien enemies, who shall have actually resided within this commonwealth two years, shall, during the continuance of his residence herein, after the said period, be enabled to hold, receive, and pass any right, title, or interest, to any lands or other estate known within the commonwealth, in the same manner, and under the same regulations, as the citizens of this state may lawfully do."

Allen Campbell came to Kentucky in December, 1799, and continued to reside in the state, until his decease in September, 1804. Does this residence bring him within the provisions of the act? It is contended that it does not, as by the act a residence of two years, prior to its passage, is indispensable to claim a right under it; and the residence of Campbell did not exceed a year. The words of the act are "Be it enacted, &c. that any alien, &c. who shall have actually resided within this commonwealth two years," &c. Now, do these words refer as well to the future, as the past? We think they do. The act was designed to remove the prohibition from aliens, so as to enable them to hold and transmit lands within the state, while residing therein, the same as citizens. This being the policy of the state, as declared in the preamble, no reason is perceived why it should not operate in time to come, as well as in past time. Indeed, such is the inference to be drawn from the policy of the law, and a fair construction of its language will give this effect to it. "Shall have resided," embraces the future, unless there are words connected with these which show a different application of them was designed. We are clearly of opinion that the law gives the right to aliens, on two years' residence subsequent to the law, as well as prior to it, and that Allen Campbell under this law, after two years' residence in Kentucky, had the same capacity, though an alien, to receive and transmit the land devised to him, as a citizen.

An executory devise is good, to take effect in future, without any particular estate to support it. This was good, therefore, as an executory devise, and the title vested under the will so soon as the devisee, by the statute became capable of taking the estate. Or if the title vested in the trustees named in the will, it is equally clear, that it became divested on the happening of the above contingency. Allen Campbell, before his decease, became vested with the land in dispute, in fee simple, and on his decease, it descended to his heirs at law. The right, then, of the demandants fails on both grounds. First, the deed of the executor is inoperative and void; he not having authority to make it. And secondly, Allen Campbell took the land as devisee in the will, and on his decease it descended to his heirs at law. And the court so instructed the jury, the facts being admitted on the record. The jury on this instruction found "that the tenant has more right to hold the tenement as he now holds it, in the written count mentioned, than the demandants to have it as they now demand it."

Exceptions were taken to the charge of the court, and the cause was removed to the supreme court, by writ of error, where the judgment of the circuit court was affirmed. [Beard v. Rowan,] 9 Pet. [34 U. S.] 301.

[NOTE. In delivering the opinion of the supreme court, Mr. Justice Thompson said: "The preamble in the act may be resorted to, to aid in the construction of the enacting clause, when any ambiguity exists. That preamble evidently shows that the intention of the legislature was to make a general provision for removing the disability of aliens to hold real estate, and this, founded upon state policy, is doubtless for the purpose of encouraging the settlement of the country; and this object would be in a great measure defeated by restricting the act to aliens who shall have resided two years in the state before the passing of the act. The condition upon which aliens are placed on the same footing with citizens with respect to the right of holding and disposing of land is a two years' residence within the state; and the full effect and benefit of the act, and the clear intention of the legislature, require a construction which gives to it a prospective, as well as retrospective, application: and, under this construction, Allen Campbell became qualified to take and hold the title to the land in question, and pass the same, in the same manner as if he had been a citizen of the state. No constitutional objection can be made to this act. It does not profess to naturalize aliens. It is not necessary that they should be made citizens in order to hold and pass real estate, and the condition upon which this may be done is a matter resting entirely with the state legislature. We are, accordingly, unanimously of opinion that the judgment of the circuit court is correct, and it is accordingly affirmed." Beard v. Rowan, 9 Pet. (34 U. S.) 301.]

Case No. 1,182.

BEARD v. TALBOT.

[Brunner, Col. Cas. 201;[1] Cooke, 142.]

Circuit Court, D. Tennessee. 1812.

EVIDENCE—HEARSAY ADMISSIBLE TO PROVE BOUNDARIES.

Hearsay evidence is admissible for the purpose of proving boundaries, ancient land marks, pedigree, and prescription.

In the course of the trial of this cause it became necessary for the defendant to show where Julias Sanders and others crossed Elk river in 1781, it being the place of beginning called for both in the entry and grant of the defendant. The defendant introduced a witness, Joseph Greer, to prove what Alexander Greer told him had been said by Julias Sanders upon that subject. Both Sanders and Alexander Greer were dead. It also appeared that, at the time the statement was made by Sanders to Alexander Greer, another person was present, to wit, a man by the name of Waldin. It did not appear that Waldin was dead, or that the defendant could not get his testimony.

Haywood & Whiteside, for plaintiff.
Hayes & Cooke, for defendant.

BY THE COURT. It was determined in the case of Athol v. Ashburnham that, for the purpose of proving a pedigree, a witness might detail what another had told him he heard a third person say on the subject, both these persons being dead. Bull. N. P. 295. If that determination be law, and the court have no reason to doubt it, the evidence now offered is admissible. We admit that every remove which is made from Julias Sanders renders the testimony weaker, but it is still competent. The object is to prove where Sanders crossed Elk river. No doubt exists but that this may be done from evidence of what persons now dead have been heard to say. The same rule applies to all cases of pedigree, prescription, or ancient land marks. If Alexander Greer were living and present it would be competent for him to prove what Sanders had said; and he being dead, Joseph Greer may be permitted to prove what Alexander told him had been said by Sanders. It is equally competent, though weaker, testimony. The reason why, in cases of pedigree, prescription, and ancient boundary, the party may prove what persons, then dead, have been heard to say when living, is, that in such cases the party claiming the benefit of the evidence shall not be deprived of it by the death of the witness if he can in anywise show what knowledge the witness had on the subject. What he has been heard to say is pretty strong evidence of what he knew. But it has been objected that the defendant ought to produce Waldin, as he is now living. Perhaps Waldin's statement would be more satisfactory, but that does not render the evidence offered inadmissible. It might be contended, with the same propriety, that evidence direct of what Sanders has said would not be admissible testimony, because other persons were along with him when he crossed Elk river, who are now living, and capable of being produced. Let the witness be examined.

NOTE, [from original report.] Ancient boundaries may be proved by reputation, and hearsay evidence is admissible for that purpose. See Lamar v. Minter, 13 Ala. 39; Riley v. Griffin, 16 Ga. 149; McCloud v. Mynatt, 2 Cold. 165; citing above case.

[1] [Reported by Albert Brunner, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

BEARD, (UNITED STATES v.) See Case No. 14,551.

Case No. 1,183.

In re BEARDSLEY.

[1 N. B. R. 304, (Quarto, 52;) 1 Am. Law T. Rep. Bankr. 46.][1]

District Court, S. D. New York. 1868.

BANKRUPTCY—DISCHARGE—OPPOSITION — SPECIFICATIONS.

[1. Upon an opposition by creditors to the discharge of a bankrupt, specifications, as grounds thereof, that the debtor falsely set forth in his petition and schedules that he had no property, and that he has concealed his property with intent to defraud his creditors, are too vague and general to be triable, where they do not specify what other property he had and what property he concealed.]

[2. Such specifications are open to an additional objection where they do not state, as required by section 29 of the bankruptcy act of 1867, (14 Stat. 531,) that the omissions of property from the schedules were willful, fraudulent, or negligent.]

[In bankruptcy. Application by Alfred Beardsley for a discharge in bankruptcy, which was opposed by his creditor. Reference to the register to take testimony as to the ground of opposition specified.]

[1] [1 Am. Law T. Rep. Bankr. 46, contains only a partial report.]

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. The first, second, fourth, sixth, and seventh specifications filed as grounds of opposition to the discharge of the bankrupt, in this case, are altogether too vague and general to be triable. The first is, that the bankrupt has falsely set forth in his petition and schedules that he had no property. It ought to specify what property he had. The second is, that he had property rights and choses in action at the time of filing his petition. It should specify the property. The fourth is, that he has concealed and covered up his property, for the purpose of defrauding his creditors existing at the time of filing his petition. Unless it means all his property, it should specify what property: and if it means all his property, the time, place, manner, and circumstances of the concealing and covering up should be specified. The sixth is, that he has not set forth all his property in the schedules filed with his petition, and that the schedules are false in that particular, and that he had divers kinds of personal property, besides that at the place named in the third and fifth specifications. This is too general. It should specify what the omitted property was. The seventh is, that he has omitted to set forth all the debts owing by him in the schedules filed with his petition. It should specify the debts omitted. The first, second, sixth, and seventh are all of them open to the further objection, that they do not allege that the omissions referred to in them were wilful, fraudulent, or negligent. This is necessary under section 29 of the act. The eighth is, that the bankrupt omitted to set forth a debt owing by him to Hervey G. Law, of about $2,000, resting in account, and which was not outlawed. This specification is bad, for the reason that it does not aver that the omission was wilful, fraudulent, or negligent.

The third is, that "said Beardsley had an interest in the property in, and the business conducted at, the saloon at 36 Liberty street, city of New York, at the time of making and filing said petition, of the value of $3,000, and the said business was and is carried on for his sole benefit. The fifth is, that "the business at said saloon is pretended to be conducted in the name of one Pope, but really for the benefit of said Beardsley, with intent to defraud said creditors," that is, creditors existing at the time of filing his petition. Although the third, standing by itself, might be open to the objection that it does not aver any wilful, fraudulent, or negligent omission by the bankrupt, in respect to the property referred to, yet I think the third and fifth, taken in connection with each other and with the petition and schedules, present triable matters. The third must be read in connection with the fifth, and the omissions and acts referred to in them must be regarded as being averred to have been made and done with intent to defraud creditors existing at the time of filing the petition, and therefore fraudulently, within the provisions of section 29.

A reference is ordered to Register Allen, the register who has had charge of the case, in case either party desires to take any testimony in addition to what has already been taken, to take such testimony in respect solely to the matters set forth in the third and fifth specifications, and report it to the court. On the coming in of his report, the case can be brought on for hearing before the court.

[NOTE. Subsequently the discharge was granted. See Case No. 1,184.]

Case No. 1,184.

In re BEARDSLEY.

[1 N. B. R. 457. (Quarto, 121;) 1 Am. Law T. Rep. Bankr. 94.]

District Court, S. D. New York. 1868.

BANKRUPTCY—ASSETS—INTEREST IN PROFITS—DISCHARGE.

[1. The owner of a saloon entered into an arrangement with one B., by which the latter was to conduct the business in his own name, and receive one-half of the net profits as his compensation therefor. Held, that B.'s interest in the business was not property that he was bound to set out in his inventory as a bankrupt.]

[2. Before B. became a bankrupt, one of the purchase-money notes given by the owner for the saloon was, by his direction, paid out of the proceeds of the business. Held that, in order to claim an indebtedness on this account to B., who denied that any such indebtedness existed, the burden is on his creditors to show that the note was paid out of net profits in which B. had an interest.]

[3. Even if the note was paid out of net profits, and B.'s share thereby reduced, this would not give him any interest in the property itself with which the business was carried on.]

[In bankruptcy. On application of Alfred Beardsley for a discharge in bankruptcy, which is opposed by a creditor. Reference was made to the register to take testimony as to the ground of opposition specified. See Case No. 1,183. Opposition overruled, and discharge granted.]

Edward James, for bankrupt.
S. F. Higgins, for creditor.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. The petitioner set forth in his petition that he had no assets or property. His discharge is opposed by a creditor, who has filed eight specifications of the grounds of his opposition. Six of these have been heretofore held by this court not to be in proper form to be triable. The third and fifth alone are in issue. The third is that "said Beardsley had an interest in the property in, and the business conducted at the saloon at Liberty street, city of New York, at the time of making and filing said petition, of the value of three thousand dollars, and the said business was and is carried on for his sole benefit." The fifth is, that "the business at said saloon is pretended to be conducted in the name of one Pope, but really for the benefit of said Beardsley, with intent to defraud said creditors." These specifications are quite loosely drawn, but taken together and in connection with the allegation in the petition that the bankrupt has no assets, they may be regarded as averring that the bankrupt has concealed his interest in the property at the saloon, with a view to defraud his creditors, and has been guilty of fraud in not delivering such property to his assignee, it having belonged to him at the time he presented his petition and inventory. The evidence, however, falls entirely short of showing that the bankrupt had any interest in the property at the saloon, either the furniture or the lease of the premises. On the contrary the proof is satisfactory, that the lease and the furniture were bought from one Taylor by Pope on his own account and as his own property exclusively, under an arrangement whereby the bankrupt was to take charge of the business of the establishment and give it the use of his name, taking one half of the net profits as his compensation. This arrangement was made early in March, 1867. Pope paid $3,000 for the lease and furniture, giving $2,000 in cash and his three notes amounting to $1,000 in the aggregate. The notes were of two, four, and six months. Their several amounts are not stated, but it is assumed that each was for $333.33. The name of the bankrupt was used over the saloon. The petition was filed June 12, 1867. Only one of these notes fell due before the petition was filed. That note and the two notes which fell due after the petition was filed, were paid out of the receipts of the saloon by the direction of Pope. It is claimed by the creditor that the payment, out of such receipts, of the note which fell due before the petition was filed, had the effect, inasmuch as the one half of the money (it being assumed that such money was net profits of the establishment) belonged to the bankrupt, to constitute the bankrupt, to the extent of the one half of the amount of such note, an owner in the property of the saloon. But this is not so. If the $333.33 used to pay the note was net profits of the business, and if the one half of it, that is, $166.66, belonged to the bankrupt, and was thus used to discharge a debt of Pope's with the knowledge and consent of Pope, the effect of the transaction would merely be to make Pope debtor to the bankrupt for the amount. It would not give to the bankrupt any ownership in the property for the purchase of which the note was given.

The allegation that the bankrupt had an interest in the business carried on at the saloon is true, although it is not true that it was carried on for his sole benefit. But that interest was not property which he was bound to set forth in his inventory, unless it had resulted at the time in money or something tangible which he then possessed. The right to his share of the net profits was not property, any more than the right of a clerk who has a stated salary, to continue to receive such salary, is property, which he is bound to set forth in his inventory as a bankrupt. As to the allegation that the business at the saloon was pretended to be conducted in the name of Pope, but really for the benefit of the bankrupt with intent to defraud his creditors, the business seems to have been conducted, so far as the public could see, in the name of the bankrupt, his name being over the saloon. This would have led rather to the belief by the public and the creditors of the bankrupt, that the property at the saloon belonged to the bankrupt, when in fact it did not; and there was nothing in it calculated to defraud or showing any intent to defraud his creditors.

This disposes of the specifications. I have assumed that the note referred to was paid out of the net profits of the business. Unless it was, then no part of the property of the bankrupt went towards paying it, and Pope did not become thereby a debtor to the bankrupt, so as to be his debtor at the time the petition was filed, and make it incumbent on the bankrupt to set out such debt due from Pope as an asset in his inventory. But the only evidence is that the note was paid out of the receipts of the saloon. The creditor does not show that it was paid out of the net profits. It does not appear what was the state of the accounts between the bankrupt and Pope when the petition was filed. It is incumbent on the creditor to show that such debt from Pope existed as an asset. The bankrupt swears that he had no claims due him, that he knows of, at the time when he filed his petition. It is for the creditor to show that he had. These remarks are made as if there was an allegation in the specifications that the bankrupt had wilfully sworn falsely in the oath to his inventory, in omitting his debt from Pope. But there is no such allegation. The case is not a proper one for withholding a discharge, and one will be granted whenever the register shall certify that the bankrupt has in all things conformed to his duty under the act, and has conformed to all the requirements of the act, except as in the particulars embraced in such specifications.

BEARDSLEY, (GODFREY v.) See Case No. 5,497.

BEARDSLEY, (GRANNIS v.) See Case No. 5,688.

BEARDSLEY, (KIRBY v.) See Case No. 7,837.

Case No. 1,185.

BEARDSLEY v. LITTELL et al.

[14 Blatchf. 102;[1] 2 Ban. & A. 501; 23 Int. Rev. Rec. 226; 4 Cent. Law J. 270.]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Jan. 25, 1877.

WITNESS—ORAL EXAMINATION OUT OF COURT—FEDERAL PRACTICE.

1. In an action at law in a federal court in New York, a defendant cannot, before the trial, be examined as a witness for the plaintiff out of court, although such examination is provided for by the statute of New York, in suits in the courts of New York.

2. The whole subject of oral testimony in actions at common law in the courts of the United States is regulated by the statutes of the United States. Under the provisions of those statutes, the examination of an adverse party, as a witness, before trial, in a common law suit, cannot be had; and there is nothing in section 914 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which provides for the conformity of the practice of the federal courts, in common law suits, to that of the state courts, that supersedes those provisions.

[Cited in Re Hawkins, 147 U. S. 486, 13 Sup. Ct. 516. See, also, Easton v. Hodges, Case No. 4,258.]

[At law. Action by James H. Beardsley against John M. Littell and Russell W. Chace for damages for infringement of letters patent. Plaintiff applies for an order for defendant Littell to be examined as a witness before trial. Denied.]

Walter S. Logan, for application.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. This is an action at law to recover damages for the infringement of letters patent. It is at issue and ready for trial. The plaintiff now presents to the court his affidavit, setting forth that the testimony of the defendant Littell is material and necessary for the plaintiff upon the questions of the kind and description of the machine used by the defendants, and claimed to be an infringement of the plaintiff's patent, "the amount which he has used the same," and the profits resulting from such use; that these matters are peculiarly with the knowledge of said defendant, and cannot well be proved except by his testimony; and that it is necessary to take his examination before the trial, in order that the plaintiff may properly prepare for the trial. On this affidavit an application is made for an order that the defendant appear for examination as a witness before the trial.

Section 389 of chapter 6 of the Code of Procedure of the state of New York, provides as follows: "No action to obtain discovery under oath, in aid of the prosecution or defence of another action, shall be allowed, nor shall any examination of a party be had, on behalf of the adverse party, except in the manner prescribed by this chapter." Section 390 provides as follows: "A party to an action may be examined as a witness, at the instance of the adverse party, or of any one of several adverse parties, and for that purpose may be compelled, in the same manner, and subject to the same rules of examination, as any other witness, to testify, either at the trial, or conditionally, or upon commission." Section 391 provides as follows: "The examination, instead of being had at the trial, as provided in the last section, may be had at any time before the trial, at the option of the party claiming it, before a judge of the court, or a county judge, on a previous notice to the party to be examined, and any other adverse party, of at least five days, unless, for good cause shown, the judge order otherwise. But the party to be examined shall not be compelled to attend in any other county than that of his residence, or where he may be served with a summons for his attendance." It is provided by section 914 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, that "the practice, pleadings and forms and modes of proceeding in civil actions, other than equity and admiralty causes, in the circuit and district courts, shall conform, as near as may be, to the practice, pleadings and forms and modes of proceeding existing at the time in like causes in the courts of record of the state within which such circuit or district courts are held, any rule of court to the contrary notwithstanding."

The application now made is founded on the view that the practice of examining an adverse party before the trial, as a witness, in a suit at law, has become the practice of this court by virtue of the above section 914. This is not a correct view. Section 861 of the Revised Statutes provides that "the mode of proof in the trial of actions at common law shall be by oral testimony and examination of witnesses in open court, except as hereinafter provided." There is nothing in the constitution or statutes of the United States which sanctions any other mode of trial, in a common law action, than a trial by a jury, in the presence of the court, unless such a trial is waived. Therefore, when the statute speaks of the examination of witnesses in open court, in the trial of an action at common law, it means the examination of witnesses in the presence of the court and the jury, at the trial, and not before the trial. But, as some witnesses might be out of the jurisdiction of the court, or would probably be absent from such jurisdiction at the time of trial, provision was to be made for such cases. Hence the words, in section 861, "except as hereinafter provided." In pursuance of this view, section 863 makes provision for taking by deposition, de bene esse, before trial, by certain specified officers, out of court, the testimony of witnesses who, though within the United States, are beyond the reach of a subpoena, or who are bound on a voyage to sea, or who are about to go, before the trial, out of the

[1] [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, Circuit Judge; reprinted in 2 Ban. & A. 501; and here republished by permission.]

United States, or who are about to go, before the trial, to some place within the United States which is beyond the reach of a subpoena, or who are ancient and infirm. Section 866 makes provision for taking depositions under a dedimus potestatem, "according to common usage," that is, by commission, and for taking depositions in perpetuam rei memoriam. Sections 882 and following sections provide for documentary evidence. These are all the statutory provisions enacted by the United States on the subject; and it is quite clear that they cover the whole subject of oral testimony, in actions at common law, in the courts of the United States. There is nothing in section 914 which supersedes them; and, under them, the examination of an adverse party as a witness, before trial, in a common law suit, cannot be had. It may well be doubted whether there is anything in section 914 which applies to the subject of the evidence of witnesses, either as to its character or competency, or the mode of taking it. The expression "practice, pleadings, and forms and modes of proceeding," is well satisfied without including in it the subject of evidence. At all events, it cannot be regarded as covering matters connected with the subject of the evidence of witnesses, which are regulated by specific provisions of law found in the same title of the same statute.

In the case of Indianapolis & St. L. R. Co. v. Horst, 93 U. S. 291, the supreme court of the United States, in commenting on section 914, say that the language of that section, that the conformity mentioned in it is to be "as near as may be," means, "not as near as may be possible, or as near as may be practicable;" that the indefiniteness of the expression devolves upon the federal court the duty of construing and applying the provision in each case, and gives to the court the power to reject any subordinate provision in a state statute, which, in its judgment, would unwisely encumber the administration of the law, or tend to defeat the ends of justice, in the federal court; and that, while section 914 is, to a large extent, mandatory, it is also, to some extent, only directory and advisory. In the spirit of that language, it may be observed, that section 389 of the Code of Procedure of New York abolishes an action to obtain discovery under oath, in aid of the prosecution or defence of another action, and then section 391 allows an examination of an adverse party as a witness before trial, evidently as a substitute for a discovery before trial, in an ancillary action. But, a suit in equity, to obtain a discovery under oath, in aid of the prosecution or defence of a suit at law, is not abolished in the courts of the United States. The distinction between suits in equity and actions at common law exists in the courts of the United States. Such distinction is recognized by the constitution, and cannot be abolished by congress. It is also recognized in section 914. Therefore, one of the reasons for the practice, in the courts of the state of New York, of examining an adverse party as a witness before trial, in a suit at law, does not exist in respect to the federal courts.

It is also worthy of consideration, that section 391 of the Code of Procedure of New York provides that the party to be examined shall be examined before a judge of the court or a county judge, and shall not be compelled to attend in any other county than that of his residence, or where he may be served with a summons for his attendance. The examination, if allowed in the federal court, must take place before a judge of the court. There is no alternative officer, to take the place of the county judge. If the party cannot be compelled to go out of the county where he resides, the benefit of the provision would practically be confined to suits pending in the counties where the federal judges should happen to reside or to be present, unless the party to be examined could incidentally be found in such county. There would be no uniformity in such a provision, and such a practice could hardly be said, as a general practice, to conform "as near as may be" to the state practice.

Moreover, in view of the limited judicial force in the courts of this district in comparison with the amount of the business pending in those courts, and of the fact that the examination, if had, must take place before a judge of the court, it is quite clear that an allowance of the practice would "unwisely encumber the administration of the law," especially in view of the fact that a party may, at the trial, be called as a witness by the adverse party, in a suit at law, and may, if a case exists under section 863, be examined as a witness, before trial, on behalf of the adverse party, by deposition de bene esse. The application is refused; and I am authorized to say that the circuit judge concurs in the foregoing views.

Case No. 1,186.

BEARDSLEY et al. v. The METAMORA.

[N. Y. Times, April 16, 1864.]

District Court, S. D. New York. 1864.

COLLISION—STEAM AND SAIL—BURDEN OF PROOF.

[1. Where a steamer collides with a sailboat, and injures her, and, on libel for damages, fails to show that the sailboat was in fault, the steamer is liable, especially where there is no evidence that the steamer had a lookout forward.]

[2. It is immaterial that the steamer reversed her engines, or even that she had a backward motion, before the collision took place, where she wrongfully came so near the sailboat that the latter must inevitably have come against her by the current, suction, or other force beyond her control.]

In admiralty.

Mr. Frisbie and Mr. Donohue, for libelants.
Mr. Haskett, for claimant.

Before BETTS, District Judge.

This was a libel filed by [Charles G. Beardsley et al.] the owners of the sloop Catlin to recover the damages occasioned to her by a collision with the steamboat in the harbor of New York. The collision happened in full daylight. The sloop was going on a southwesterly course across the East river from South ferry toward Bedloes' island, the wind being light from the southwest by west. The steamboat was coming out of the North river into the East river, thus crossing the general line of direction which the sloop was pursuing. There was the usual conflict of testimony as to the circumstances of the collision.

Held BY THE COURT: That as there was nothing in the way to prevent either from seeing the other, it is a legal presumption that they, in the exercise of their nautical obligations, had knowledge of the facts respecting their relative positions, which were necessary to the fulfillment of their several duties.

That the sloop was the privileged vessel under such circumstances, and the responsibility was cast upon the steamer to be so guided herself as that no injury should be inflicted by her on the sloop which was not caused essentially by culpable acts of omission or commission on the part of the latter.

That the sloop had little, if any, more than drifting way on her, and there is nothing in the evidence favoring the notion that she was placed before the wind in a way to intercept or embarrass the steamer in her true direction up the East river. It was accordingly at the peril of the steamer to avoid her.

That it is neither averred in the answer nor proved that the steamboat had any lookout stationed forward.

That the question is of minor importance whether the headway of the steamer had been completely checked by the reversal of her engine, or even whether she had received a backward motion before the actual collision took place. The result was injurious to the sloop, and the consequences are as chargeable to the steamer, if derived from her wrongful act in being placed so near the sloop as that the latter must inevitably come against her by force of the tide, or current, or suction, or other propelling forces out of her control, as if the injuries came from the direct and aggressive act and movement of the steamer.

That in cases of collision between vessels meeting each other, the one under canvas and the other under steam, the prima facie obligation lies with the steamer to prove that the fault of the collision is attributable to the sailing vessel, if she would free herself from liability.

That there is nothing in the proofs relieving the steamer from this well-established and most serviceable doctrine of the law, and that she fails to prove that the fault was attributable to the sloop.

Decree for libelants, with a reference to compute their damages.

Case No. 1,187.

BEARDSLEY v. SWANN.

[4 McLean, 333.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Ohio. Nov. Term, 1847.

NEGLIGENCE—DANGEROUS PREMISES—EXCAVATION IN SIDEWALK—DAMAGES.

1. In the use of his own property, a man must be careful not to injure his neighbor.

2. An excavation of the sidewalk, opposite his own house, for a vault, being authorized, provided he kept it covered, but being left uncovered, the plaintiff at night fell into it, and was injured—held, that the defendant was responsible.

3. To sustain the action, the plaintiff must show that he used ordinary caution, and that the defendant was negligent.

4. In estimating the damages, the jury will consider the injury done, the pain endured, the time lost, and the expense incurred.

At law.

Ewing & Stanbery, for plaintiff.
Swayne & Andrews, for defendant.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This action was brought to recover damages from the defendant, for an injury suffered by the plaintiff, in falling into the defendant's cellar, which had been opened on a part of the sidewalk, and left carelessly, etc. It seems that A. Westwater, in April last, lived in Columbus, and about a quarter before nine o'clock in the evening, was walking along the street, and found the plaintiff down in the vault, which extended into the street from the defendant's house the width of the sidewalk. The depth was six or eight feet. Witness and another person helped him out. He complained that one of his arms was injured. There were no guards constructed around the excavation. A boy fell into it the evening after the plaintiff fell in. It was a moonlight night, but any person walking on the sidewalk was liable to fall into the vault. It had not remained open long. There was timber on the street, from three to five feet from the curb stone. The vault extended to the curb stone. The plaintiff wore glasses, his sight being somewhat impaired by age. There was no danger of falling into the vault in the day time. Mr. Sparrow, a witness, says there was no protection to the side of the vault. Witness fell into it the evening before the plaintiff's accident. The plaintiff's left arm was injured; six months afterward it was deformed, and he could use it but little. An objection was made to any evidence as to the suffering of the plaintiff from the injury. That it should be confined to time lost, expense incurred, and permanent disability. But the court overruled the objection, and said, that the bodily suffering was a part of the injury received, and should be considered by the jury in making up their verdict. The Doctors Thompson attended the plaintiff as his physicians more than a month. The radius, or large bone, of the plaintiff's left arm was fractured, and the smaller bone dislocated. Several of the witnesses stated that the arm of the plaintiff is somewhat deformed, and that his wrist is enlarged and remains stiff.

[1] [Reported by Hon. John McLean, Circuit Justice.]

By an ordinance of the city, dated July 25th, 1839, it is provided that one-third of the street may be occupied with building materials, provided, that the gutter and one-half of the pavement or side walk, be left free and clear of all incumbrance. And by an ordinance of the 30th of June, 1834, it is declared that vaults may be dug under the side walk, but they must be covered.

This action, gentlemen, is founded upon the principle that no one shall use his own property in such a way as to injure his neighbor. The owner of a carriage must so drive it as not to come in contact with his neighbor's carriage or person. And there must be negligence on the part of the person of whom damages are claimed, and the plaintiff must not himself be in fault. If he contributed to the accident, from which the injury resulted, the law will give him no compensation. For where two individuals are equally in fault, or even where the defendant may be more in fault than the plaintiff, yet if the acts of the plaintiff influenced the injury, there can be no recovery. It seems that in the present case, the defendant had a right to extend his vault to the curb stone as he did, but he does not appear to have regarded that part of the ordinance which required him to keep it covered. And if, from this negligence, any one was injured, who used ordinary care in walking on the side walk or street, the defendant is responsible. The vault, it seems, was in no way protected, and that passers by in the night, were liable to fall into it. Several, it appears from the evidence, actually fell into the vault, but it is not known that any were injured except the plaintiff. The counsel in the defense charge carelessness on the plaintiff, and say, had he used the ordinary caution of persons walking at night, he could not have fallen into the vault. There is no particular evidence showing the carelessness of the plaintiff, unless it be inferable, from the fact that he did fall into it. And this inference, it would seem, from the evidence, can not be drawn in the present case. Other persons had the same misfortune to fall into the vault. And the witnesses say, that any one passing on the sidewalk at all, would be liable to the accident. The inquiry is not whether the plaintiff, by the use of extreme caution, might not have avoided the vault. Who could presume that he threw himself into it, in order to sue the defendant and recover damages? This would be so strange a course of action, as not to be a matter of presumption, unless the evidence prove facts which render it probable. The amount of damages must depend upon the exercise of your judgments, on the facts. Neither this nor any other case of contract or of tort, is a matter for the exercise of the mere discretion of the jury. The amount of the injury received, the pain endured, the expense incurred, and the negligence of the defendant, are matters for your deliberation and decision. And every one of the items named will increase or reduce the damages, as you may believe to be just and proper under the circumstances.

The jury found for the plaintiff —— damages. Judgment.

Case No. 1,188.

BEARDSLEY et al. v. TAPPAN.

[1 Blatchf. 588.][1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Oct. Term, 1850.

MERCANTILE AGENCIES—SLANDER—INUENDO.

1. The office of the inuendo in a declaration for slander is to explain the words spoken and annex to them their proper meaning. It cannot extend their sense beyond their usual and natural import, unless something is put upon the record by way of introductory matter, with which they can be connected; then, words which are equivocal or ambiguous, or fall short, in their natural sense, of importing any libellous charge, may have fixed to them a meaning certain and defamatory, extending beyond their ordinary import.

[Cited in Pollard v. Lyon, 91 U. S. 233. See, also, Trussell v. Scarlett, 18 Fed. 214.]

2. Words spoken of a party, which do not necessarily import any thing injurious, may, when taken in connection with other charges made against the party at the same time, and if the whole be published of and concerning the party as a merchant, and with intent to affect his credit and standing as such, have a very different meaning attached to them; and a jury may so find, if they believe the words to have been spoken with such intent.

[See Trussell v. Scarlett, 18 Fed. 214.]

[At law. Suit for libel by Horace Beardsley and John Beardsley against Lewis Tappan, proprietor of a mercantile agency. Heard on demurrer to the declaration. Demurrer overruled, with leave to the defendant to amend.

[Subsequently, the case was tried by a jury. The charge was delivered by Betts, District Judge, (Case No. 1,188a,) and verdict given for plaintiffs for $10,000 damages. A new trial was refused,—Id. 1,189,—and defendant, by writ of error, took the case to the supreme court, where the final judgment was reversed, and a new trial awarded,—Tappan v. Beardsley, 10 Wall. (77 U. S.) 427.]

[1] [Reported by Samuel Blatchford, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

The first count recited, that the plaintiffs, before the committing of the grievances complained of, were engaged in business as traders and merchants, under the firm of H. Beardsley & Co., at Norwalk, Huron Co., Ohio, and had occasion to visit the city of New-York, for the purpose of purchasing and obtaining goods in the way of their trade and business, and had acquired the good opinion of the persons with whom their house was in the habit of dealing, &c., but that the defendant, contriving and maliciously intending to injure the good name, credit and mercantile standing of the plaintiffs and of the said firm in their trade and business as such merchants, &c., did publish of and concerning the said firm, and of and concerning them in their said trade and business, and as such merchants, the following false, scandalous and defamatory words, that is to say: "H. Beardsley & Co., Norwalk, Huron Co., Ohio," (meaning the said firm,) "July, 1848, have been sued; report says, J. Beardsley's wife," (meaning thereby the wife of the plaintiff John Beardsley,) "is about to apply for divorce and alimony; has put his property out of his hands; if so, their store will be closed soon;" (meaning thereby that the store of the said firm would be closed soon, and meaning and intending to have it suspected and believed, that the plaintiffs and the said firm were no longer worthy of credit, and that one of the partners of the said firm had put his property beyond the reach of the creditors of said firm, and that said firm would soon close their business, and not pay their debts.)

The second count, after referring to the prefatory matter in the first count, alleged a republication of the slander set forth in that count, and that, in addition thereto and together therewith, the defendant published of and concerning the said firm, and of and concerning them in their said trade and business, the following words: "August, 1848, confirms prior report to July," (meaning thereby that the words above set forth respecting the firm were confirmed,) "and say in addition, two more suits in court of common pleas, besides those commenced by Judge Baker," (meaning that two more suits had been commenced against the firm;) "Mrs. Beardsley's petition for divorce will soon be filed;" (meaning thereby the petition of the wife of John Beardsley, one of the plaintiffs, and a member of the firm;) "J. Beardsley," (meaning thereby the said John Beardsley,) "is putting his real estate out of his hands; I," (meaning thereby the defendant,) "do not doubt the firm," (meaning the firm of H. Beardsley & Co.,) "have the ability to do a prosperous business, so long as they are honest, which will be as long as suits their interest;" (meaning and intending to have it suspected and believed, that the plaintiffs and the said firm of H. Beardsley & Co. were no longer worthy of credit, and that the plaintiff John Beardsley, one of the members of the firm, had refused to pay his debts, and had put his property beyond the reach of his creditors, and that, although the members of the firm were able to pay their debts, they were dishonest, and would not do so, unless they deemed it suited their interest.)

The defendant demurred to both the counts, alleging that the inuendo subjoined in the first count to the words: "has put his property out of his hands; if so, their store will be closed soon;" and the inuendo subjoined in the second count to the words: "I do not doubt the firm have the ability to do a prosperous business, so long as they are honest, which will be as long as suits their interest;" materially varied, changed, enlarged and extended the sense of the words, and were not warranted by them or by anything before averred in the counts.

Ogden Hoffman, for plaintiffs.
William Allen Butler, for defendant.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. It is objected that the inuendo subjoined to the words in the first count: "has put his property out of his hands; if so, their store will be closed soon;" enlarges and extends the said words, and contains matters or charges not warranted by them, or by any of the words embraced in the count.

The office of the inuendo is to explain the words contained in the libel, and annex to them their proper meaning. It cannot enlarge or extend the sense of the expressions beyond their usual and natural import, unless something is put upon the record by way of introductory matter, with which they can be connected. Then, words which are equivocal or ambiguous, or fall short in their natural sense of importing any libellous charge, may have fixed to them a meaning certain and defamatory, extending beyond their ordinary import. Rex v. Horne, Cowp. 682; Hall v. Blandy, 1 Younge & J. 480; Van Vechten v. Hopkins, 5 Johns. 211; Miller v. Maxwell, 16 Wend. 9.

In this case, the only introductory matter set out, besides the usual recitals in an action of slander, is, that the plaintiffs are merchants, engaged in trade and business under the firm of H. Beardsley & Co., with the usual colloquium; and the inuendo, in giving explanation and meaning to the words, connects them with the business character and relations of the plaintiffs.

We must, therefore, take the words set forth in the first count in the declaration as published of and concerning the plaintiffs in their character as merchants, and enquire whether, in that connection and under the circumstances stated, the inuendo has carried the meaning imputed beyond that warranted by the libellous charge. And, in doing so, we must look to the whole and every part of the libel, in order to ascertain the full extent of the injurious imputations, and to see how they would naturally be understood by the neighbors and acquaintances of the plaintiffs, and especially by those with whom they were connected in business transactions. Looking at the libel, and the several injurious charges therein contained, with these considerations in view, we cannot say, as matter of law, that the words do not convey or could not have been intended to convey to those in whose presence they were published the meaning imputed to them. On the contrary, they may have been published under circumstances and in a way that would naturally convey to the hearer that meaning, especially if published with an intent to affect the credit of the plaintiffs as merchants, as charged in the declaration.

The counsel for the defendant selects a part of the words of the libel, and insists that they do not convey the meaning imputed. This might be admitted, and still the demurrer not be well taken. When the words are taken detached from the context, their meaning may be different from what it is when they are taken in connection with the text and the subject matter. The charge "has put his property out of his hands," and nothing else, might be very innocent; and the words "if so, their store will be closed soon" might not necessarily import anything wrong or injurious. But, when those words are taken in connection with the charge that the plaintiffs had been sued, and that the wife of one of them was proceeding against him for a divorce and alimony, and the whole is published of and concerning them as merchants, and with the intent to affect their credit and standing in the community, a very different meaning attaches; and, for aught that we can see, to the full extent charged. That is, the jury may so find, if they believe the publication to have been made with a view to affect injuriously the credit and standing of the plaintiffs as traders and merchants. The same view, we think, applies to the second count, which need not be more particularly referred to.

There must be judgment for the plaintiffs, with leave to the defendant to amend.

Case No. 1,188a.

BEARDSLEY et al. v. TAPPAN.

[Betts. Scr. Bk. 247.]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Dec. 17, 1851.

LIBEL — MERCANTILE AGENCIES — PUBLICATION — PRIVILEGE — MALICE — EVIDENCE — DAMAGES.

[1. In an action at law for libel, while plaintiff is not required to prove the exact words used in the alleged slander, he must show them in substance and effect, and whether he has done so is a question for the jury.]

[2. Although words injurious to a man in his trade are slanderous and actionable per se, the plaintiff must prove the special damages claimed.]

[3. In an action against the manager of a mercantile agency for libel in making a false report of plaintiff's business standing, publication of the libel is sufficiently shown by proof that the books in which it is contained were not in defendant's exclusive possession, but that others in his office had access thereto, and that they and a merchant in the city heard or read the alleged slander.]

[See Trussell v. Scarlett, 18 Fed. 214; Cossette v. Dun, 18 Can. Sup. Ct. 222.]

[4. Where plaintiffs in such case sue as a partnership, for injuries to their business, no damages can be allowed for individual slander, unless the jury find that injury to individual character affected the business of the firm.]

[5. Even if defendant, as manager of the agency, can claim a privilege as to the matter complained of, when communicated by himself to persons in good faith seeking information as to plaintiffs' business standing, the privilege fails to shield him when the alleged slanderous matter was placed upon his books, and within reach of the clerks employed by him in the general conduct of his business.]

[Contra, see Trussell v. Scarlett, 18 Fed. 214.]

[6. Furthermore, if the matter were privileged, but defendant was guilty of malice in connection with it, plaintiffs would be entitled to damages for any special injury suffered; and malice may be inferred from the fact that, after plaintiffs complained of the falsity of the matter, defendant persisted in keeping it on his books, on the strength of a confirmation by the same authority upon which it was originally entered, and, when notified that he would be sued for libel, transferred his business, including these books, to other persons.]

[See Trussell v. Scarlett, 18 Fed. 214; Cossette v. Dun, 18 Can. Sup. Ct. 222.]

[7. Where defendant, in taking depositions in support of his plea of justification, has asked questions tending to show whether or not the matter was true, and at the trial refuses to read the answers, this suppression will warrant the jury in inferring that the answers were to his prejudice.]

[8. Though defendant fails to show that the alleged slander was true, the fact that reports to the same effect were generally current in plaintiffs' place of residence before defendant published them may, under the laws of New York, be considered in mitigation of damages.]

[At law. Suit for libel by Horace Beardsley and John Beardsley against Lewis Tappan, proprietor of a mercantile agency. A demurrer to the declaration was overruled, (Case No. 1,188,) and the case tried by jury. Verdict for plaintiffs.

[Subsequently, a motion for a new trial was refused,—Case No. 1,189,—and defendant, by writ of error, took the case to the supreme court, where the final judgment was reversed, and a new trial awarded,—Tappan v. Beardsley, 10 Wall. (77 U. S.) 427.]

A number of witnesses were examined in open court, and the written testimony of more than sixty witnesses, residents of the same town with the plaintiffs, was offered in evidence; upon the admission of which evidence, a number of questions of law were argued by the counsel. The defence urged that the plaintiffs had failed to prove malice; that Mr. Tappan had received the alleged scandalous matter in good faith, and given it to subscribers of his agency applying for it, in confidence; that it was given in a lawful manner for lawful purposes; and that the defendant stood in a very different manner from one who would voluntarily proclaim it in a thoroughfare. They urged that a portion of the libel referring to J. Beardsley should have no weight, as the action was brought by H. Beardsley & Co., as a firm; that all they stated about the firm as fact was true, and the inferences drawn in the libel were the natural inferences from those facts; that Mr. Tappan had never seen the plaintiffs at the time of the libel, and could not have been actuated by malice. The defendant further urged that the plaintiffs had no claim for damages, because their credit at home was proved not to have been impaired by the libel, and in New York they were only refused a small amount of goods; that the report of suits being instituted against the firm was true, from the plaintiffs' own testimony, and that it was also true that Mrs. Beardsley was about to file a bill for divorce. It was also true that Mr. Beardsley had thought of putting his property out of his hands. The defendant urged that there was no publication, as only the clerks and subscribers to the agency had use of the alleged libel. On the other hand, the plaintiffs asked the jury to consider what inferences they could have drawn had they read the report in the books of Mr. Tappan; that it all tended to injure the firm; that, after stating a slander against Mr. Beardsley, they affirmed that their store would soon close. The attack was against them in their business capacity. The natural inference was that the house was embarrassed, which was entirely false. That Mr. Tappan persisted in keeping it on the books, after he was apprised of its falsity, and reiterated the libel by a subsequent slander. The publication was perfect, because, not only Mr. Tappan and his clerks read it, but all the subscribers and their clerks could have it. He received pay for this information, and he ought to be held responsible when it is slanderous. The plaintiffs said that it was most probable that $5,000 would not reimburse them before all the expenses of the suit were paid, and the jury ought to add enough to hold Mr. Tappan as an example to the community, as well as remunerate the plaintiffs for loss of business and injury to their feelings.

Ogden Hoffman and F. B. Cutting, for plaintiffs.

Mr. O'Connor and B. F. Butler, for defendant.

BETTS, District Judge, (charging jury.) The time occupied by this trial may seem disproportionate to the question in discussion. An apology can be found in the nature of the controversy. It is a question of importance to the commercial community, and new questions of law were to be decided. The care bestowed by eminent counsel shows their estimation of its importance. The whole case must be decided upon principles of law well established, and facts not novel in their nature. The action is for libel, for written slanderous words. Some time in July, 1848, the plaintiffs, represented by one of the partners, came to New York; there was an agency kept by defendant; that agency kept books, on which were entered these remarks:—"July 1848—Has been sued. Report says that J. Beardsley's wife has filed a bill of divorce, &c., &c." These plaintiffs were residents of Norwalk, Huron county, Ohio. On arriving here John Beardsley tried to discover whence these reports arose, and traced them to the books of Tappan. Suffice it to say, that an action for libel was instituted in this court. It gave the names, position of plaintiffs, and then the slander. The reading of the declaration as to the slander, and the report in books are not the same. The question arose from this—whether declaration was sufficient. The declaration was gathered from oral sources, and was sufficiently stated to be a foundation of a suit. Whether it was reported in substance and effect is for you to decide. In law, the plaintiff is not required to prove the identical words used by defendant in the slander. After alleging composition and publication, plaintiff sets his damages for the injury,—not only injured in law, but in special damages; that there were persons who refused to trust them. In words actionable of themselves, if plaintiff claim special damages, it is necessary to set forth how he has received injury. Those damages are in no way marked or defined. He must set forth the damages in declaration, and the averment must be followed by proof. The shape of the declaration is good, and entitles the party to answer. The plea was "Not guilty." In law a slander is a wrong. and the plea must be "Not guilty." If he shows that the words are used in such a way as justify him in the use, he may say, "Not guilty," or, if he shows that they are truth, he must so state specifically. The defendant pleads "General issue." He attaches to that a notice that the reports were circulated at Norwalk, and that they were true. Then he attaches another, that they were reports that he had received in good faith, and was privileged to give them to the community. Plaintiffs have shown, after proving the words were prima facie actionable, that they were published. It does not signify that they were in general circulation; but in law they are published if intentionally passed from the composer to any other person not entitled to them. The plaintiffs must show publication. One of the witnesses took it down verbatim, as it was read to him. They show that this writing was not in possession exclusively of the defendant; that it was not copied by him; that there were others in the office who had access to the book; that these either saw the report or heard it read. This is sufficient publication in law. If Mr. Douglas alone saw it, there is publication. Defendant is bound to lay anything before you to qualify this fact. Suppose this a naked slander, without justification; then, was it published? It need not be published by the defendant himself; if it was published by a person under him, it is enough; or, if he sanctioned the promulgation after it is done, it is enough. Here, then, is no fair question of doubt. The words are slanderous themselves—as the law says, "Words injurious to a man in his trade are slanderous, and actionable." The law protects the pursuits of men against imputation or statements injurious to those pursuits. It has been contended that if defendant prove there were reports circulated in their place of residence, it is a good defence; but the law requires more. A person who repeats these slanders must prove their truth. Upon principle it is not permitted to a man to be the medium of a slander. If he takes upon himself to repeat it, he must also take the responsibility. The fact that this report was in Norwalk is no defence; but can he give it to you in mitigation of damages is the only question?

The character of plaintiffs. They sue as a co-partnership, and for injuries to their business, and not injuries to them individually; and you cannot give damages for individual slander, unless you find that the injuries to the individual character affected the interests of the firm. If you find the charge against any one of them injured the credit of the business of the firm, then you must give damages for that. Is the defendant clothed with a privilege, and does that privilege embrace this particular act? This agency was established since twelve years ago. It is possible that this agency has done good, and has perhaps, so far, been conducted with propriety. The court has already said that it was commendable, and one for which defendant ought to receive a reward for services. The ordinary method in Europe was to obtain information from correspondents, or to send special messengers to the towns of their customers. This agency saves expense, and tends to promote the business of the country. Instead of waiting for a letter to be sent and replied to, this agency is supplied already with the information by correspondents, who keep them posted up with information as to traders. This is one feature of the plan. In the management of it, difficulties will occur like the present; and is the defendant shielded? All persons who subscribe to the agency can obtain information in respect to their customers. It is said that defendant cannot be protected, because he receives compensation. This does not seem a sound and fair view. It would not make a difference if a person was sent specially who received a compensation; nor would it matter if two merchants or more associated, and agreed to send one agent. The protection would be the same in both cases. So far as the plan of business is concerned, it matters not whether there was one, fifty or a hundred. The question is not, however, as to the plan, but as to whether this particular transaction is protected.

It is said that defendant stands as the agent selected by the merchant, who had been sent to Norwalk, and found these reports rife there,, and therefore he is privileged. The court must administer the law as it exists. The general agency may be as a particular agent in the application. One may make inquiries himself, or by his agent; and while the agent is executing that mission, he is protected, because the communication is confidential; and because, when the occasion is proper, it is given in such a way that no one is harmed by it. It is not published, although it may be in writing. The agencies must prove fully that they have not communicated the information to any other than those to be benefited by it. They have no right to give it to others. It seems to the court that the agency comes within general principles, and that the head stands as a special agent; but do the necessities of the business require that the principal and subagents should be protected? If the business itself, or its consequences tend to unlawful results, which the principal is not empowered to inflict, it ought not to be maintained. If it is necessary that the head must employ a number of clerks to carry on the business, it is no argument if it tramples on the law. The same ingenuity that invented the system may devise means to carry it on within the law; if not, it cannot be carried on without legislation. It has not been shown that it cannot be carried on without infringing a law. The principal, on receiving information, can decide, after deliberation, whether it will hurt any individual, and whether he will give it out. He might, on the receipt, send back for further information as to facts; if it is confirmed, he might fortify himself by statements of others. He could send to supervisors of the town, or men of standing. Ought he not to take pains to inquire? He might do more; the merchant is waiting for information, he may give it to him from his desk, as to be between them alone; but the law will not extend this privilege, and allow him to give it to others. When he handles dangerous material, he must see that it does not explode so as to injure any one. There is no case which tends in the slightest degree to extend the privilege. If one inquires of another the standing of a person, the other may answer with protection; but, if, answering by letter, he knows the letter will be opened by a clerk of the principal, it is a slander. The confidential clerk is entirely out of the range of protection. Has defendant limited himself to communicating this report to the merchant alone? Not at all. It was put on the book. Mr. Douglas saw it, and one clerk is proved to have commenced reading it. The law does not protect Mr. Douglas. It is a proved fact that this report was made known to one or more, if not all the clerks of the office, by the consent of defendant. If man and wife converse together, and speak slanderously of another, in presence of a third person, or where it is probable there is a third person, they are liable to an action. The legislature now protects the physician in some cases. Previously he was liable. The priest and laymen receive no greater privilege. All these secret establishments are invidious in their nature. These agencies are increasing. They may soon be conducted by men of no responsibility, and unable to respond to damages. The feature of secrecy must be so guarded as not to infringe on the rights of others.

In this discussion, has not the convenience of the principal been consulted, without sufficient regard to the rights of others? Are not the latter protected by the law as well as the former? My purpose is to lay before you the principles of law, and not discuss the evidence. The evidence is placed before you in an embarrassing manner, being for the most part in depositions taken under commissions. When thus taken, the party is privileged to use his legal rights, in withholding what he deems illegal or irrelevant. It ought not, therefore, to prejudice him generally. If he put questions, however, calculated to prove the truth, and then refuses to read the answer, it is a strong point against him. When he had got the proof in his hand, and refused to read it, it is a proper inference to submit to the jury as being against him. In this view only the suppression of evidence is against a party. If you find the defendant has communicated this information to the clerk,—that he honestly believed the report was true, and not for malicious motives,—there would seem no essential question but that of damages. Still, you have a right, and ought, to pass upon the first question.

The main question is one of damages. If this employment is not privileged, the plaintiffs are entitled to damages. Did the publication prevent their obtaining credit with the same facility as before? Did it effect any serious injury? If the publication can be regarded as a privileged one, but is false, they are entitled to the special damages. You must see that they are fully made good what they lose. Has this statement been reiterated by him after having been apprised of its untruth? Did he put himself on the inquiry or not? or did he persist in not giving redress? If he did, it is evidence of malice. If plaintiff gave defendant notice of the wrong, and he became thoroughly apprised of the want of truth, it is strong evidence of malice, and the jury are bound to take notice of it. The defendant put in his defence and notice of truth of the libel before this action was brought. We find that defendant was informed of the want of truth of the report of 7th July, and promised to write and ascertain more particularly. 'Afterwards, on 7th August, we find the report confirmed, and, in addition, states other reports. Was the defendant justified to rely on the authority of the author of the first reports, as to their truth, and then enter another statement confirming the first? This is an aggravation of the offence. When he takes this written communication, and makes it known, he becomes the author of it, although he does not exonerate the author. The defendant had notice that, if he persisted in keeping the matter on the books, he would be prosecuted. It is proved that he transferred his concern and all the evidence in the books to Mr. Douglas and another Mr. Tappan. This is re-publication to them and their clerks; the same as if he had written it all out again. It is evidence of unwillingness to do right towards the plaintiff, and is considered in law as proof of malice,—of doing what in law is inflicting injury to plaintiffs. You must find such a verdict for plaintiffs, with damages, as become upright men, not swayed by passion; nor allowing any man to deal with the character of others, and publish slander against them, unless they are prepare to prove the truth.

Assuming the defendant had proved these reports were in circulation throughout Norwalk, in respect of one or both of plaintiffs, can this be considered in mitigation of damages? The court has said this fact does not exculpate defendant; but does it affect the damages? There is some difficulty in this respect. When a party puts in his pleadings that the reports are true, but does not so prove it, can he put things tending to prove the truth, but not proving the truth, in mitigation of damages? In courts of this state the defendant has no such right. This, I apprehend, is a distinct rule of law. It first came up in a case of Cowen; it was afterwards confirmed in a case in Wendell.[1] According to the Code in an action of libel, the the defendant may allege the truth; and whether he proves the truth or not, he may give in evidence those circumstances which tend to prove the truth, to mitigate the damages. If he cannot prove the fact to be true, he may now prove facts which gave him ground to suppose the reports to be true. If he can show that there was reasonable ground for him to suspect that the plaintiffs were not in good standing, the jury must consider those grounds.

This publication was made early in July. A witness saw it on the 15th July. The defendant could have shown when he received it if he had chosen; he did not, and you have a right to infer it was seen before the 15th July. It should be evident to you that these reports were in circulation before they were concocted or sent from Norwalk, and not after they were returned from here. If they rely on those rumors as mitigation, they ought to satisfy you that they were really in circulation before they were known here. If they were in circulation, they must be more than merely whispered about or hinted at. To be rumors and reports, they must have reached the whole community,—they must be the neighborhood talk. For defendant to avail himself of this rumor, it must be a matter of public notoriety; then it will be no justification, but only go to mitigate damages.

[1] [See Cooper v. Barber, 24 Wend. 105; Follett v. Jewitt, 11 N. Y. Leg. Obs. 193.]

The defendant excepted to several points in this charge. Sealed verdict. $10,000.

Case No. 1,189.

BEARDSLEY et al. v. TAPPAN.

[5 Blatchf. 497.] [1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Oct. 10, 1867.[2]

MERCANTILE AGENCIES — LIBEL AND SLANDER — PRIVILEGED COMMUNICATIONS — EMPLOYES OF PRINCIPALS.

1. The defendant conducted a mercantile agency in the city of New York, the object of which was to procure information of the pecuniary ability and standing of merchants in the country for merchants in the city, to be communicated to the latter in a confidential manner. He had some twenty clerks to whom the information obtained, and which was recorded in a book, was communicated, and who participated in communicating it to the customers of the agency or to their clerks. The defendant communicated, through his clerks, to several customers and to their clerks, facts seriously affecting the credit of the plaintiff, as a merchant: Held, that the communication was not of a privileged character.

[Questioned in Erber v. Dun, 12 Fed. 535; Trussell v. Scarlett, 18 Fed. 216.]

2. The principle upon which privileged communications rest, which, of themselves, would otherwise be libellous, imports confidence and secrecy between individuals, and is inconsistent with the idea of a communication made by a society or congregation of persons, or by a private company or a corporate body.

[Contra, see Trussell v. Scarlett, 18 Fed. 214; Cossette v. Dun, 18 Can. Sup. Ct. 222; Locke v. Bradstreet, 22 Fed. 771.]

At law. This was a suit [by Horace Beardsley and John Beardsley against Lewis Tappan, proprietor of a mercantile agency] to recover damages from the defendant for having libelled and slandered the plaintiffs in respect of their credit as a mercantile firm, carrying on business at Norwalk, Ohio. [Demurrer to the declaration was overruled, —Case No. 1,188,—and the case was tried by jury,—Id. 1,188a.] The jury found a verdict for the plaintiffs for $10,000, and the plaintiffs now moved for a new trial. [Refused.]

[Subsequently the defendant took the case to the supreme court by writ of error, where the final judgment was reversed and a new trial awarded. Tappan v. Beardsley, 10 Wall. (77 U. S.) 427.]

[1] [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

[2] [Reversed in 10 Wall. (77 U. S.) 427.]

Daniel D. Lord, for plaintiffs.
Charles O'Conor, for defendant.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. The defendant resided in New York, and had established in that city a mercantile agency, the object of which was to procure information of the pecuniary ability and standing of merchants in the country for merchants in the city, to be communicated to the latter in a confidential manner. The defendant had some twenty clerks who participated in the business of the establishment, and were, of course, privy to the information obtained, whether favorable or unfavorable to the character and credit of the country merchant, and who participated in the communication of the information to their customers or customers' clerks. The defendant communicated, through his clerks, to several customers and to their clerks facts seriously affecting the credit of the plaintiffs' house; and the main question in the case, on the merits, is, whether or not he is exempt from the consequences of the publication, on the ground of its privileged character. The court charged the jury, that, if the defendant himself had communicated the information to a person applying to him for the purpose, in good faith, the communication might have been a privileged one; but that the publicity given to it by recording the libellous words in a book, to which others had access, and to whom they were communicated, though standing in the relation of clerks, deprived the communication of its otherwise privileged character. This is no doubt a very important question, and one involving, in its practical operation, whichever way it may be decided, interests of very great magnitude. On the one hand, to legalize these establishments in the manner and to the extent used by the defendant, is placing one portion of the mercantile community under an organized system of espionage and inquisition for the benefit of the other, exposed, from the very nature of the organization, to perversion and abuse; and, on the other, to refuse to legalize them, may be restricting injuriously the right of inquiring into the character and standing of the customer asking for credit in his business transactions. I am strongly inclined to think, that, if the establishments are to be upheld at all, the limitation attached to them by the court below is not unreasonable, to wit, that it must be an individual transaction, and not an establishment conducted by an unlimited number of partners and clerks. The principle upon which privileged communications rest, which, of themselves, would otherwise be libellous, imports confidence and secrecy between individuals, and is inconsistent with the idea of a communication made by a society or congregation of persons, or by a private company or a corporate body.

The other objections in the case are technical in their character, not involving the merits. I have looked into them, and am of the opinion that they are not available to the defendant. New trial denied.

[NOTE. On writ of error, the supreme court reversed this judgment, and awarded a new trial, upon the ground that the whole record in the divorce proceedings pending between John Beardsley and his wife was improperly introduced in evidence and read to the jury. Mr. Justice Miller, in delivering the opinion of the court, did not touch upon the points considered by the circuit court in the reported opinions. Tappan v. Beardsley, 10 Wall. (77 U. S.) 427.]

Case No. 1,190.

BEARDSLEY v. TORREY.

[4 Wash. C. C. 286.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. Oct. Term, 1822.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES—DIVERSE CITIZENSHIP—LANDLORD AND TENANT—EJECTMENT.

1. In an ejectment instituted in a state court of Pennsylvania by A, a citizen of Pennsylvania, against B, also a citizen of that state, tenant in possession, C, a citizen of Maryland, after a judgment by default against B, was upon his petition admitted as defendant in the suit, the petition stating that B was his tenant. The petition of the plaintiff further stated, that the land in dispute was worth more than $500; and it prayed that the cause might be removed into the circuit court, which was granted. This court remanded the cause to the state court, on the ground of want of jurisdiction; C being only a co-defendant with B, who, as well as the plaintiff, is a citizen of Pennsylvania.

2. In Pennsylvania the landlord cannot be permitted to defend alone in ejectment in the room of the tenant, without the consent of the plaintiff.

[Cited in Ex parte Turner, Case No. 14,245; Ex parte Girard, Id. 5,457.]

3. If there be two defendants in the state court, the cause cannot be removed into the circuit court upon the petition of one of the defendants.

[Cited in Smith v. Rines, Case No. 13,100; Ex parte Turner, Id. 14,245; Ex parte Girard, Id. 5,457; Sands v. Smith, Id. 12,305; Florence Sewing-Mach. Co. v. Grover & Baker Sewing-Mach. Co., Id. 4,883; Grover & Baker Sewing-Mach. Co. v. Florence Sewing-Mach. Co., 18 Wall. (85 U. S.) 580; Smith v. McKay, 4 Fed. 354; Fisk v. Henarie, 32 Fed. 422.]

[At law. Ejectment by Beardsley against Seymour Spafford and David Torrey.]

Rule obtained by the plaintiff to show cause why the record in this suit should not be remanded to the state court, from which it was sent to this. This was a writ of ejectment, brought under the act of assembly of this state, passed the 21st of March, 1806, (4 Smith, Laws, 332,) and the supplement thereto, ([13 April, 1807,] Id. 476,) by the plaintiff, against Seymour Spafford, the tenant in possession, for a tract of land in the county of Wayne. David Torrey, styling himself a citizen of Massachusetts, filed a petition in that court, stating that the land in dispute is his property, and that Spafford has no title thereto but as his tenant, and praying to be admitted a defendant in the action. The petitioner further states, that the land exceeds the value of $500, and prays that the cause may be removed for trial into the next circuit court of the United States for this district. The prayers of the petition being granted, Torrey entered into a recognizance to enter in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Pennsylvania copies of the process against him in the above action.

Rawle, for the plaintiff, in support of the rule, contended, that Torrey, having been admitted in the state court as a defendant with Spafford, a citizen of Pennsylvania, this court has not jurisdiction of the cause, the plaintiff being also a citizen of the same state. If it should be contended that, by admitting Torrey as a defendant, this court ought to consider him as the sole defendant, in the room of the tenant in possession, it is answered, that this is not the language of the record, and that the court had no power to order the substitution without the consent of the plaintiff. Emlen v. Hoops, 3 Serg. & R. 130. Another objection is, that the recognizance given by Torrey is only to enter in the circuit court, on the first day of the session, copies of the process, and does not bind him to enter also his appearance, as required by the twelfth section of the judiciary law.

Tilghman and Binney, for the defendant, insisted, that the only question in the cause being the title of the landlord, and Torrey having been admitted a defendant, and not a co-defendant with his tenant, this court ought to consider him as substituted for the tenant, who is in fact only a man of straw, after the landlord is admitted to defend. Runn. Ej. 168, 185. The courts of the United States have even taken jurisdiction in cases between citizens of the same state, where it appeared that the plaintiffs were only nominal parties. Browne v. Strode, 5 Cranch, [9 U. S.] 303. If, in a case like this, the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States is excluded, the privilege of removal provided by the twelfth section of the judiciary law may, and in almost every instance, in Pennsylvania at least, will, be rendered ineffectual in cases of ejectments, as the tenant in possession must necessarily be a citizen of the same state with the plaintiff. As to the other objection, the security for the defendant's appearance in the circuit court is required only in cases where special bail is demandable.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. The principal question which arises in this case is, whether this court has jurisdiction of the cause? And to enable us to decide this point, it is material to inquire who are the parties to the suit? Originally, they were Beardsley plaintiff, and Spafford the tenant in possession, defendant. After a judgment by default against that defendant; Torrey was, upon his petition, admitted a defendant, the judgment by default was set aside, and the suit was ordered to be removed into this court, where it has been docketed as a suit between Beardsley plaintiff, and Torrey defendant. It is contended by the defendant's counsel, that Torrey was the only defendant in the state court at the period of the removal; because, upon a correct construction of the record, he ought to be considered as having been admitted by that court to defend the action in the room of his tenant; and because he is in fact the only real defendant, his title alone constituting the subject of controversy.

[1] [Originally published from the MSS. of Hon. Bushrod Washington, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, under the supervision of Richard Peters, Jr., Esq.]

The court cannot yield its assent to either of these reasons. Not to the first, because it receives no countenance from the language of the record, which merely states that he was admitted a defendant, and because to have substituted him as the only defendant would have been inconsistent with the laws of this state, and with the decision of the supreme court of the state in the case of Emlen v. Hoops, [supra.] By the act of [March 21] 1772, (1 Smith, Laws, 372,) in cases of ejectments, as then in use, the courts were directed to suffer the landlord to enter himself a defendant, by joining with the tenant in possession in case he should appear; if he did not, whereby judgment was rendered against the casual ejector, execution was to be stayed upon such judgment, and the landlord to be permitted to defend alone. Under the act of 1806, (4 Smith, Laws, 326,) which substitutes the writ of ejectment for the ancient form of proceeding, and the supplement passed in 1807, (4 Smith, Laws, 476,) the landlord is admitted as theretofore to enter himself a defendant. The construction given to these laws by the supreme court of this state, in the case before mentioned is, that the landlord cannot be admitted to defend the suit in the room of the tenant, without the consent of the plaintiff; and this decision I consider as conclusive upon the state courts, and is to be received with the highest respect by this. This then being the law of the state, it forbids the construction put upon this record by the defendant's counsel, the language of which seems to be in strict conformity with the law.

The second reason is equally unfounded, since the tenant in possession has an interest in defending his possession of the subject in controversy, (which in cases of long leases, may frequently be of more value than the interest of the landlord), notwithstanding his defence may rest solely upon the title of the landlord. If then Torrey was merely a co-defendant with Spafford in the state court, it is perfectly clear that this court has not jurisdiction of the cause, and consequently that the record could not legally be removed from the state court to this. It has been decided by the supreme and inferior courts of the United States, and the law is considered to be perfectly settled; that where there are more than one plaintiff or defendant, each of them must be competent to sue or be sued in the court of the United States where the suit is brought. It is equally clear, that if this suit could not have been maintained against Spafford under the eleventh section of the judiciary law, [Act 1789; 1 Stat. 78,] if it had originated in this court; it cannot be removed into this court under the twelfth section, so as to subject that party to the jurisdiction of this court. If this be so, then the cause cannot be removed at all, because it is most obvious that it cannot be severed, and a part only be removed. Not only would such a doctrine be attended with absurdity and inconvenience, but it would be repugnant to the language, and to the clear meaning of the twelfth section; which provides that "where the suit is against a citizen of another state than that in which it is brought, and the matter in dispute exceeds $500, the state court shall proceed no further in the cause, but the same is to be proceeded in in the circuit court, in the same manner as if it had been brought there by original process." There is then an end of the cause in the state court; it being transferred, in the state in which it was there, to another tribunal. Spafford then is either a party defendant in this court, or he is not. If the former, then this court has not jurisdiction of the cause; if the latter, then the cause has not been removed, since the record shows that Spafford was a co-defendant with Torrey, in the state court. There is, indeed, another reason why this court can not take cognizance of this as a removed cause; which is, that Spafford did not join in the petition for the removal, and it is not competent to one defendant to remove the cause without the consent of his co-defendants.

We freely admit that the doctrine which this court finds itself compelled to sanction, may be attended by all the inconveniences pointed out by the defendant's counsel, and that it may be so used, in a great measure, to defeat the provisions of the twelfth section of the judiciary law. But the remedy, if indeed the subject be remediable, must be provided by congress. The judiciary cannot proceed upon grounds of expediency, but must execute the laws as they are found written. It is unnecessary to give any opinion on the other point made by the plaintiff's counsel. The record must be remanded.

BEARDSLEY, (TORREY v.) See Case No. 14,104.

Case No. 1,191.

In re BEARNS.

[18 N. B. R. 500.]

District Court, S. D. New York. Dec. 16, 1878.

SALE—STOPPAGE IN TRANSITU — GOODS IN BOND.

[Imported goods sold "to arrive" were entered at the custom-house in the name of the seller, and were stored in a bonded warehouse selected by the purchaser. He withdrew a portion of them upon an order signed by the seller, under the treasury regulation which requires such an order where goods in bond are drawn by any person other than the one in whose name they are entered; and he afterwards became bankrupt. Held that, as to the rest of the goods, the right of stoppage in transitu existed in favor of the seller; and his seizure of them would not affect his right to prove his debt on account of the purchase money of those withdrawn.]

[In the matter of the bankruptcy of William F. Bearns.]

A. J. Perry, for assignee.

H. Q. Wing, for creditor.

CHOATE, District Judge. This is a motion to expunge the proof of debt made by the firm of G. Lamothe & Co. for nine hundred cases of wine sold and delivered to the bankrupt. Lamothe & Co. contracted to sell to the bankrupt one thousand five hundred cases of wine, "to arrive," at a fixed price per case, less duties, and upon a credit of sixty days, for which the bankrupt was to give his promissory note. On the 2d of July, 1870, the ship having arrived, the wine was entered at the custom-house by Lamothe & Co. for warehouse. The bonded warehouse in which it was stored was selected by the bankrupt, but it was stored in the name of Lamothe & Co. The duties were liquidated at one thousand four hundred and thirty-three dollars and eighty-five cents, and the bankrupt gave his note for the amount of the purchase, and thereafter and before the failure of the bankrupt nine hundred cases were withdrawn from warehouse by the bankrupt in several parcels, Lamothe & Co. signing on the withdrawal entry an authorization to the bankrupt to withdraw the goods described in such withdrawal entry. This authorization is required by the regulations of the treasury department before any person except the party entering the goods can withdraw them. Afterwards the bankrupt filed his voluntary petition, and an assignee was appointed. In December, 1870, Lamothe & Co. withdrew the six hundred cases still remaining in warehouse, paying the warehouse charges on the whole one thousand five hundred cases, which remained till then unpaid. The note fell due after the failure of the bankrupt, and was not paid. It is still in the hands of Lamothe & Co. Lamothe & Co. have proved their claim for the nine hundred cases which were received by the bankrupt. This motion to expunge is made on the ground that they had no right to take the remaining six hundred cases from the warehouse; that the title and constructive possession had become vested in the bankrupt; and that the assignee can set off the value of the six hundred cases tortiously taken by Lamothe & Co.

The question is, whether, as to the six hundred cases, the right of stoppage in transitu still existed; and I am of opinion that it did. The goods never came into the actual possession of the bankrupt. His selection of the warehouse in which they were stored did not alter the facts that they were stored in the name of the consignee, Lamothe & Co., and that the only way in which the bankrupt could obtain actual possession was by means of an order signed by Lamothe & Co., upon making a withdrawal entry and paying the duties. It is true that, if insolvency had not intervened, Lamothe & Co. would have been bound to give this authority, and that nothing else remained to be done between buyer and seller with reference to the goods, and that the buyer had fully complied with his contract of purchase. It is insisted that this impediment to the complete control and possession of the buyer being imposed or reserved, not by the seller for his own security and benefit, but by the regulations of the secretary of the treasury, which are subject to alteration or repeal by him at any moment, and waived, dispensed with, or insisted upon by him or by congress, the vendor cannot take advantage of it to take back the goods. But the authorities do not sustain this claim.

The right of stoppage in transitu depends upon the fact that the goods have not come to the actual or constructive possession of the vendee, and it is not necessary that the obstacle which has prevented this, should be one that was purposely interposed by the vendor for this purpose, nor that it was one created by him directly or indirectly. If the existing regulation of the treasury department has prevented that possession being consummated, the nature of that regulation is of no more consequence on this question than the nature of any other fact or accident that may have led to the same result. It cannot be said that the goods were constructively in the possession of the buyer, when stored under a warehouse contract with the seller and in his name and under regulations having the force of law, which made it impossible for the buyer to get them without the written consent of the seller. Even where the seller has ceased to have any control of the goods, and they are in the custody of the government, awaiting the payment of duties, the right of stoppage in transitu remains. Northey v. Field, 2 Esp. 613; Burnham v. Winsor, [Case No. 2,180;] Mottram v. Heyer, 5 Denio, 629. In the case last cited, Chancellor Walworth indeed says that he thought that, if the goods had been placed in the public store under the revenue warehousing system, the right of the vendor would be gone. But in that case the goods were consigned to the vendee, and the case supposed by the learned judge is that of their being warehoused by the vendee, not, as in this case, by the vendor.

It is clear also that the giving of the authorization by the vendor to withdraw a part of the goods was such a separation by the consent of the parties of that part from the rest that the delivery of that part is not to be considered as a constructive delivery of the whole, or as affecting the right of stoppage in transitu as to the part remaining in warehouse. Tanner v. Scovell, 14 Mees. & W. 28. In fact, this right of stoppage in transitu is based on an equitable principle, and is highly favored; and the present case is clearly one where the right could be properly exercised. Motion to expunge denied.

Case No. 1,192.

BEARSE v. ROPES et al.

[1 Spr. 331;[1] 19 Law Rep. 548.]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. Nov. Term, 1856.

SHIPPING—CARRIAGE OF GOODS—DANGERS OF THE SEAS — LIABILITY FOR DAMAGE — BURDEN OF PROOF—RECOUPMENT FROM FREIGHT MONEY.

1. Under the common bill of lading, the carrier is not necessarily exonerated from liability for damage, although he take the usual care and precautions, and convey the goods in the usual manner.

2. Where goods shipped under such bill of lading, are damaged on the voyage, and the carrier claims to be exonerated, on the ground that the damage was caused by the danger of the seas, the burden of proof is upon him.

[Cited in The Wilhelmina, Case No. 17,658; Richards v. Hansen, 1 Fed. 61. See, also, Hunt v. The Cleveland, Case No. 6,885; Turner v. The Black Warrior, Id. 14,253; The Zone, Id. 18,220.]

3. Where damage to hemp was occasioned by oil, which had escaped from casks in the hold, and the escaping of the oil was not caused by the danger of the seas: Held, that the carrier was liable for such damage to the hemp. Semble.—Where hemp is damaged by water's "blowing" in the hold, the weather being good during the voyage, and there being no extraordinary occurrence, and no unusual quantity or motion of water in the hold, the carrier is liable.

[Cited in The Wilhelmina, Case No. 17,658; Richards v. Hansen, 1 Fed. 61. See, also, The Sabioncello, Case No. 12,198; The Sloga, Id. 12,955; Crosby v. Grinnell, Id. 3,422.]

4. The carrier ought to take adequate measures to protect the cargo against a common and ordinary occurrence, which might and ought to have been foreseen.

[Cited in The Antoinetta C., Case No. 491; Richards v. Hansen, 1 Fed. 61.]

5. In a suit by a carrier for freight, the respondent set up, in defence, damage to the goods. The court being of opinion, that the carrier was liable for such damage, and that it exceeded the amount of the freight, dismissed the libel.

[Cited in Kennedy v. Dodge, Case No. 7,701; Ebert v. The Reuben Doud, 3 Fed. 522; The Two Brothers, 4 Fed. 159. See, also, Snow v. Carruth, Case No. 13,144; Thatcher v. McCulloh, Id. 13,862.]

In admiralty.

S. J. Thomas, for libellants.

J. Codman, for respondents.

SPRAGUE, District Judge. This is a libel for freight of a quantity of hemp and iron, from New York to Boston, in the schooner Granite State. There is no question, that the freight was earned. The defence is, that the hemp was damaged on the voyage, by oil and sea-water. Of the fact of such damage there is no doubt, and that it exceeded the amount of the freight; the only question is, whether the carrier ought to be held liable therefor. The master of the schooner signed a bill of lading in New York, in the usual form, acknowledging the receipt of the goods on board, in good order, and promising to deliver them in like good order, to the consignees in Boston, danger of the seas only excepted. It is not contended, that the deterioration of the hemp, in this case, arose from the nature or character of the article itself, that is, from any inherent quality or principle, but the damage arose entirely from its coming in contact with oil and sea-water, in the hold of the vessel. The bill of lading contains a contract in writing. There being no doubt that the hemp was received on board in good order, and no suggestion of any inherent defect or decay, the only question is, whether the damage was occasioned by the danger of the seas. It is insisted, indeed, on behalf of the carrier, that if he took the usual care and precautions, and conveyed these goods in the usual manner, he is not responsible for damage, whether arising from the danger of the seas or otherwise. To this I cannot accede. In order to exonerate himself from liability, he must bring himself within the exceptions of the bill of lading, and show that the damage arose from the danger of the seas. It appears that part of the hemp was stowed in the after-part of the vessel, upon other cargo, and this received no injury. The hemp which suffered was in the forward part of the vessel. On the one hand, it is insisted that the damage to this arose from the perils of the sea; on the other, that it was occasioned by improper stowage, or some want of reasonable care or skill on the part of the carrier. The schooner was put up in New York for freight for Boston, and after filling up, she sailed during the latter part of June, and arrived in Boston early in July. Nothing unusual occurred on the passage; she met with no accident, no bad weather, and encountered no unusual wind or waves. The ship's company consisted of seven persons, and of these, the testimony only of one seaman is produced. He says, that in coming round the cape the vessel careened, and the master, for that reason, took in sail, but he does not say to what extent; and taking in sail is one of the ordinary occurrences of a sea voyage. And he says, in express terms, there was nothing extraordinary or unusual in the passage from New York. In such a passage, in summer, with no bad weather and no bad sea, and with only so much wind as to cause them once to shorten sail, it would seem that such an article as hemp ought not to have suffered damage, on board of a seaworthy vessel, if properly cared for.

[1] [Reported by F. E. Parker, Esq., assisted by Charles Francis Adams, Jr., Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

As to that part of the damage which was occasioned by oil, a considerable quantity of oil, in forty-gallon casks, was in the hold of this vessel, but not within twenty feet of the hemp; about 120 gallons leaked out, and with the water in the hold, came in contact with the hemp. There is nothing, whatever, to show that this leakage was occasioned by danger of the seas. The cooper at Boston testified, that the hoops were loose on two-thirds or three-fourths of the casks, and he is of opinion, that they could not have been in good order when taken on board. From one of the casks all the oil had escaped, except five gallons. How this oil was stowed on board, and whether properly secured or not, there is absolutely no testimony, the evidence as to stowage being confined to the hemp. The decision of Judge Story, in the case of The Reeside, [Case No. 11,657,] has a forcible application to this part of the case. Then as to the damage by water, it is suggested that this was occasioned by "blowing," as it is called, that is, by the water in the hold of the vessel being forced up through the seams of the ceiling, and thus thrown upon the hemp. It is not shown or contended, that there was any unusual quantity of water in the vessel, at any time, or any unusual motion. Indeed, the whole evidence is to the contrary; and it is said, that this blowing, when the ceiling is not caulked, is a common occurrence. Now, it would seem, that the carrier ought to take adequate measures to protect the cargo against a common and ordinary occurrence, which might and ought to have been foreseen. As to the stowage of the hemp, the evidence is not satisfactory. Of all the persons engaged in loading and unloading this vessel, the testimony of one only is produced, and he a common sailor, and he speaks only of what took place in New York. He says that he assisted in stowing, that the hemp forward was placed on a platform, with dunnage under it. When asked his opinion, whether it was properly stowed or not, he replied that he never stowed any better, but nowhere says that he had ever stowed hemp before, and on cross-examination says, that he never stowed any in the forward part of the vessel. Neither the mate, nor any other person engaged in unlading the vessel, is produced as a witness. The only evidence of the stowage, in Boston, comes from one of the port wardens, who expressed the opinion that the hemp was properly stowed. But he testified that he was not called upon to make any examination, until after a part of the cargo had been discharged, and that when he first went to the vessel, a part of the damaged hemp was on the wharf, and of that which remained in the hold, some appeared to have been moved, after the arrival of the vessel. Of course, he could not know from his own inspection, where it was during the passage, and must have relied for that fact upon the information of others, and they are not called as witnesses. He further says, that he saw no indications of there having been any unusual quantity, or uncommon motion of water in the vessel. On the whole, I am not satisfied that the damage to the hemp, either from the oil or the water, was occasioned by the danger of the seas, within the true meaning of the bill of lading, and as the amount exceeds the sum claimed as freight, the libel must be dismissed with costs.

NOTE, [from original report.] See The Martha, [Case No. 9,145;] Lamb v. Parkman, [Id. 8,020.]

Case No. 1,193.

BEARSE et al. v. THREE HUNDRED AND FORTY PIGS OF COPPER.

[1 Story, 314.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. Term, 1840.

SALVAGE—ACTION—GROUNDS OF APPEAL—BURDEN OF PROOF — COMPENSATION — ADOPTING CONTRACT.

1. Courts of admiralty will not encourage appeals in salvage upon slight or frivolous grounds, or, indeed, in any cases, except upon some plain, clear, and determinate mistake of law or fact in the court below, which is manifestly not justified by the circumstances; and the onus probandi of such mistake is upon the appellant.

[Cited in U. S. v. Juniata, 93 U. S. 339. See, also, Cushman v. Ryan, Case No. 3,515; Taylor v. Harwood, Id. 13,794.]

2. In salvage cases, where a contract is made between the parties under circumstances, where there is no such necessity, as to require immediate relief, at any expense or hazard, on the one side, and on the other there is no obligation to lend the required assistance, and no motive to take advantage of the urgency of the peril in driving an unconscionable bargain, the court will adopt and enforce the contract as just and conscientious.

[Cited in The A. D. Patchin, Case No. 87; The H. D. Bacon, Id. 4,232; The Independence, Id. 7,014; Pope v. The Sapphire, Id. 11,276; Harley v. Four Hundred and and Sixty-Seven Bars Railroad Iron, Id. 6,068; The Silver Spray, Id. 12,857; The Williams, Id. 17,710; The Dolphin, Id. 3,973.]

3. The maritime policy is to make a liberal allowance in salvage cases. The highest compensation, which is ordinarily allowed in the most meritorious cases, is one moiety, and that is rarely given. There are some exceptions, as where the property saved is very considerable, and the danger and difficulty of the service are so great as to require an extraordinary compensation.

[1] [Reported by William W. Story, Esq.]

[Cited in the Narrangansett, Cases Nos. 10,017, 10,020.]

4. Where several contracts for salvage services were made at various successive times, and a subsequent salvage service was performed, under no definite contract, the rule (of salvage) fixed in the prior contracts was held not to be imperative, but only to be an auxiliary circumstance in determining what was a fair allowance for such subsequent salvage service.

[Cited in The A. D. Patchin, Case No. 87.]

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of Massachusetts.]

In admiralty. Libel for salvage [by Joshua L. Bearse and others against 340 pigs of copper, of the cargo of the ship Mercury, (the Washington Insurance Company and others, claimants.) Decree for libellants, (unreported.) Claimants appeal. Modified.] The libel in substance stated as follows: That in February, 1837, the ship Mercury, owned in Boston, struck upon a reef, called Pollock Rip, near Monomoy Point, with a large and valuable cargo of wool and copper, and was totally lost, and abandoned to the underwriters. That the wreck went to pieces, and among other things, 4600 pigs of copper became imbedded in the sand, and so remained, and became derelict. That the libellant, by authority given by Thomas Lamb and Caleb Curtis, agents for the owners of the ship and cargo, recovered a large quantity of merchandise before the ship sunk, and received a salvage of 27½ per cent. on the net proceeds of some of the property, and 19 per cent. on the residue. That in August, 1828, the ship having sunk, the libellants and agents entered into a contract, by which 50 per cent. was allowed them, on all the copper they should recover; in pursuance of which, they did recover 108 pigs of copper, and delivered them to Lamb and Curtis, at Boston, and were paid one half the net proceeds. That they were afterwards authorized to watch for a favorable opportunity to recover more, which they did, during the whole of the last winter; and such favorable opportunity having presented itself, the libellants diverted their schooner Pearl from her occupation, as a fishing vessel, hired suitable persons, and procured machinery and apparatus at great expense, and proceeded to fish up pigs of copper from the sand. That through fear of forfeiture of the schooner, they surrendered the former license, and took out a coasting license, and devoted the vessel wholly to the business of getting up this copper. That, between the 1st of May and the 9th of June, they recovered, with great labor, 340 pigs of copper, laboring, on an average, 20 out of the 24 hours; and that the average depth of water was 11 feet, and at high tide, 16 feet. That the libellants could not get their vessel insured, while thus engaged; that the weather was rough, and Pollock Rip a dangerous place. That the vessel received great damage, and was much exposed, and that the labor was far greater than in recovering the former portion of the cargo. That the libellants supposed, that the former contract, allowing them one moiety of the proceeds, still subsisted, or if it did not, that the agent would carry out the spirit of that contract; without which belief, they would not have undertaken the labor. That these services were worth more than 50 per cent. of the property recovered. That, while thus employed, on or about the 20th of May, 1837, the said Lamb wrote to the libellants, that the owners would allow only one third of the proceeds as salvage, which letter was received while the libellants were employed, and had recovered considerable copper; and that they immediately wrote and refused to agree to take less than one moiety, and continued, by suitable apparatus, to fish up the copper, intending to claim such compensation as the court of admiralty should decree. That on the 9th day of June, the said Lamb ordered them not to recover any more, unless they were willing to accept one third of the net amount, which they refused. That the libellants alone have performed this service; and, in consideration of its danger and risk, that they are entitled to meet and competent salvage. That in consideration of the risk and danger, the respondents entered into a contract with one or more persons, to recover what portion of the copper they were able, for which they were to pay over to the said claimants, 25 per cent., and no more; and the libellants pray, that a true copy of such contract may be annexed to the answer.

The answer in substance stated the circumstances of the wreck and the cargo, and admitted, that on June 3d, the respondents made a contract with the libellants, allowing them 27½ per cent. for the merchandise recovered; and further stated, that in consideration of the greater difficulty of obtaining the copper during the winter season, and upon the representation of one Amariah Harnden, an agent of the respondents, that he had constructed certain machines, peculiarly well adapted for the recovery of the cargo, they entered into another contract on August 4th, 1838, allowing one moiety of the proceeds, for the ensuing three months, as recompense for salvage services, and that it was only for these reasons, and for this limited space of time, that the respondents would make such a contract. That the respondents paid the libellants, on September 1st, 1838, $1656, being the half of the proceeds of 108 pigs of copper, taken up in those three months, and that part of these pigs had been recovered before making this contract, and fraudulently concealed for some unlawful purpose. That 40 pigs only had been recovered during the month of August, and that the court should decree the whole $1656, to be paid to these respondents. That, on the 10th of November, 1838, the same contract was renewed, to run to March 1st, and that there were no other contracts. That the machinery, or apparatus used, was a pair of tongs, not exceeding six dollars in value, which was devised by A. Harnden, an agent of these respondents, and that the other apparatus consisted of a common coal-hod and a common scoop, of the cost of about two dollars. That the libellants made false and fraudulent representations, to induce these respondents to grant them a higher compensation, which ought not to be decreed. That the injury to the schooner Pearl arose from the eagerness and hurry of competition with other vessels, and not from the hazard and exposure; and that there could have been no difficulty in effecting an insurance; and that there was no exposure of life or property. That the libellants never had cause to believe, that any contract existed after March 1st, 1839. That by a letter of May 25th, 1839, these respondents offered the libellants one third of the proceeds as salvage money, which offer they refused; and that their continuance in their labors was a violation of the rights of these respondents; and they are, therefore, not entitled to compensation; and the respondents pray, that if the court decree any compensation, it shall not exceed one third of the last sum offered. That all the letters, show, that the libellants intended to act under the offer of the letter of May 25th, 1839. That a contract dated April 23d, 1839, and renewed for the term of a year, on March 5th, 1840, has been entered into between these respondents and James Davis, whereby the said Davis is, at his own expense, to recover as much of the cargo as he can; and the proceeds of the property recovered are to be divided in the proportion of one fourth to the respondents and three fourths to Davis. That the copper is less exposed and more embedded in sand; and that the said Davis has been at great expense. The answer prayed, that there should be a restitution of the copper, and that the libellants should be decreed to pay costs.

The case was argued in the district court by William Gray and C. G. Loring, for respondents, and B. R. Curtis and George T. Curtis, for libellants.

The district judge at the hearing, decreed to the libellants the sum of one moiety of the net proceeds of the copper.[2]

The points made and argued by the counsel for the respondents, and decided by the learned district judge, were, in substance as follows:

(1.) It was denied, that the property was derelict. The judge, declining to settle the question for any of the other cases, held it not to be a derelict as to these libellants, on account of the numerous acts of ownership exercised by the claimants, and known to the libellants.

(2.) It was denied, that the services had been of any great benefit to the claimants, but on the contrary, that the libellants were intruders, who had no right to intermeddle with the property. The judge cited the discussion by Domat of the general principle, that no person can intermeddle with the affairs of another, without some request; but said, that salvage services were an exception to this rule, and that our own law had its rules for governing cases of such service. He also held, that the evidence clearly showed, that when the libellants first began their enterprise, it was approved by the owners, and that this approbation was afterwards repeated, until the agent of the owners forbade them to proceed farther, unless they would agree to work for one third of the proceeds.

(3.) It was denied, that the libel could be maintained at all in rem, admitting that it might be in personam, because, as the respondents contended, where a service, which would otherwise be a salvage service, is performed by contract, the salvor has no right to retain the property, and so cannot proceed against it. But the judge held, that as the respondents had denied in their answer, that any contract subsisted between them and the libellants, at the time the property was recovered, which also appeared upon the evidence, the libel was rightly brought against the property, whether the principle contended for by the respondents was correct or not.

(4.) Certain charges of fraud were made by the respondents against some of the libellants, the principal one, noticed by the court, being, that Bearse and his brothers (the four principal libellants), who, with one Amariah Harnden, had, in 1838, made a contract with the owners, by which they were to have fifty per cent. of all that should be recovered of the Mercury's cargo, had, before the making of the contract, recovered a lot of copper, which they fraudulently brought into the settlement, and upon which they claimed and received fifty per cent. under said contract. But the judge refused to deduct any thing from the salvage compensation on account of this alleged fraud, being of opinion, that the evidence did not sustain it.

(5.) The case, then, not being one of derelict, the learned judge said, that the amount rested wholly in the discretion of the court. Although not derelict, yet the property was lost, in the sense of the distinction taken by some writers. It was in a hopeless condition, as appeared from the amount, which the owners had repeatedly been willing to give, and had once actually given. The court must have some guide to its judgment; and, upon the whole, no better rule could be assumed, than that proportion, which the owners by their own estimate had fixed and formerly paid; and he, therefore, decreed one moiety of the net proceeds of the property.

From that decree the claimants appealed to the circuit court, and filed the following causes of appeal.

[2] [Decree of district court unreported.]

(1.) Because the court erred in ruling, that the services of the libellants, alleged and attempted to be proved, were of the nature of a salvage service, entitling them to relief as salvors.

(2d.) Because the court erred in referring to the former contract, between the owners and some of the libellants, made in August and November, 1838, and the owners and certain other persons made in April, 1839, and renewed in March, 1840; and in assuming them to be a proper standard and criterion, by which to award compensation to the libellants; the court having stated, in the announcement of the decree, that these contracts were considered by the court, as a standard, furnished by the parties; and without which, the court would have been inclined to award a much lower compensation.

(3d.) Because, if the libellants were entitled to any thing, the court erred in decreeing, that they were entitled to more than one third part of the net proceeds of the copper recovered, because it was proved, that prior to the recovery of any, excepting one pig, the owners offered to them such one third, as a full compensation, and that the libellants proceeded to obtain all, which is libelled in this suit, after such offer, and without any refusal to accept the same.

(4th.) Because the court erred in allowing to the libellants any compensation, inasmuch as by the allowance of one half part of the net proceeds, the court must have found, that the libellants refused to proceed under the said offer of 27th of May; and if such refusal took place, the libellants, in proceeding thereafter to meddle with the copper, were unlawful intruders, or at most rendered a voluntary and gratuitous service, for which they have no legal claim for pecuniary reward.

(5th.) Because the amount decreed to be allowed to the libellants is disproportionate to the services actually rendered, and manifestly excessive.

(6th.) Because the decree of the court is otherwise erroneous, as appears by the pleadings and proofs.

The first, fourth, and sixth reasons of appeal were waived by the appellants.

George T. Curtis and B. R. Curtis, for libellants.

William Gray and Charles G. Loring, for appellants.

STORY, Circuit Justice. This is the case of a libel in rem for salvage of a part of the cargo of the ship Mercury of Boston, which was sunk on a reef called Pollock Rip, near Monomoy Point, at the extreme of Cape Cod, in February, 1837. The libel asserts the salvage service to have been performed by the libellants, in recovering the copper now in controversy, under the express or implied sanction of the claimants, between the 24th of May, 1840, and the 9th of June following. The general outline of the leading facts is accurately stated by the learned district judge in his opinion in the case; and to that I gladly refer. The cause has been very ably and elaborately argued in this court, both upon the general topics of law and fact, and the more exact and minute details of fact belonging to the salvage service. In the view, which I take of the matter, it becomes unnecessary for me to advert to many, and indeed to most of these topics and details, because it seems to me, that the merits of the case, so far as the same are now proper for the consideration of this court, lie in a narrow compass, and, although very properly examined and considered by the learned district judge, are not necessary to be here reviewed.

It is well known, that in salvage cases the appellate courts of the United States, sitting in admiralty, are not disposed to encourage appeals upon light or frivolous grounds, nor, indeed, in any case, except where there has been some plain, clear, and determinate mistake of law or fact, which has led to an erroneous and extravagant diminution or increase of salvage, beyond what the circumstances manifestly justify. The allowance of salvage rests in the exercise of the sound discretion of the court; and it would be most mischievous to the interests of all concerned, and would encourage protracted litigation, and in some cases ruinous expenses to the parties, if, where that discretion is fairly and reasonably exercised, the appellate court should entertain jurisdiction; and because it might not originally have arrived at exactly the same conclusion, as to the rate of salvage, in the exercise of its own discretion, therefore it should reverse the decree of the inferior court. If there ever can be any class of cases, to which the doctrine most emphatically applies, interest reipublicae, ut finis sit litium, that of salvage constitutes the class. The merits of such services rarely admit of any definite and exact computation; and it would be delivering over the whole subject to interminable doubts, to encourage the efforts of the parties to gauge the discretion of different courts, and to run a race for victory upon the chances of the possible differences of judicial opinion, necessarily connected with the accidental views, or the complexional habits of thought of different minds. In matters of mere discretion, the mind of man must ever be varium et mutabile. It is on this account, that it has become a general rule, I had almost said a fixed law, of our appellate courts, sitting in admiralty, not to change the decree of the court below, unless there is an exceedingly strong case made out of an abuse or palpable mistake in the exercise of its discretion in the decree of salvage.

Having made these preliminary remarks, my duty then is to ascertain, whether there has been, in the salvage awarded by the present decree, any such palpable mistake; for there is no pretence to suggest, that there has been any abuse in the exercise of the discretion of the court. And here the case, in the aspect, which it has assumed at the argument in this court, is reduced to the narrower consideration, whether the salvage ought to be one moiety, or one third of the net proceeds. The learned counsel for the appellants have not contended against the allowance of one third, but have candidly admitted, that they shall make no struggle in opposition to it. In looking at the facts of the present case, we at once see, that it is one of the few and excepted cases, in which there may be a private contract, fixing the rate of salvage, which will be, and ought to be, obligatory between the parties. The situation of the parties, the nature of the service, and the absence of all controlling necessities, requiring immediate relief, on one side, at any expense and hazard, in order to escape from impending perils and calamities; and on the other side, the absence of any duty to lend the required assistance, or any motive to take advantage of the necessities and urgencies of those perils and calamities, to drive a hard and unconscionable bargain; these circumstances make it a case, where the court not only looks with indulgence upon such a contract, but endeavours to fortify itself against the exercise of mere discretion, by adopting and enforcing such a contract, as equally just, moral, and conscientious.

Now, in respect to the salvage service, here in controversy, there is not, in my judgment, any ground to assert, that any fixed or definite contract for the service existed between the parties, as did exist in relation to other similar salvage services about the same property at prior periods between these salvors and other independent salvors. These latter contracts cannot, then, furnish a positive rule for the exercise of the discretion of the court upon the present occasion. They may furnish auxiliary grounds to assist the judgment of the court, as to what the parties thought, at different periods, was a fair allowance for services of the like sort; but they cannot properly control or direct its judgment, since the circumstances might not, in all respects, be the same; or the parties may, upon a more exact review, have changed their opinion as to the relative value and difficulty of the service.

The present salvage was begun about the 24th of May, 1840, (the particular day is not very material,) under the sanction of the claimants. As soon as it was made known to the latter, they at once promptly replied, and informed the salvors, that they should be willing to give one third of the value of all the property saved. This offer was not (as I think the fair result of the evidence shows) accepted; but it was deemed by the salvors too low. Still the salvors went on with their service, with the acquiescence of the agent of the claimants, expecting, without doubt, that subsequent negotiations would lead to an ultimate increase of the salvage. On the 7th of June following, the salvors were definitely informed, that no more than one third would be allowed, and that if they did not accede to the proposal, they might quit the service, and the enterprise would be carried on by others. The salvors refused to accept the proposal, and left the employment, and never afterwards resumed it. Their present claim is, therefore, limited to the mere question of a quantum meruit; there being no specific contract to regulate it. They certainly had a right to decline the offer of one third; and, on the other hand, the claimants had an equal right to refuse any increase thereof. The court is driven to the necessity of deciding, what is the proper allowance; not, indeed, upon the footing of a mere quantum meruit for labor and services, upon the dry principles of the common law, but upon the footing of a quantum meruit, upon the enlarged principles and policy of maritime jurisprudence in salvage causes, where many other ingredients enter into the question. Many of these ingredients were adverted to by this court, in the case of The Emulous, [Case No. 4,480.] To which ought to be added, the maritime policy of making the allowance liberal, in order to secure fidelity, honesty, and activity in the service, and to cut off the strong temptations to private plunder and embezzlement, in order to make up any supposed deficiency of compensation under the ordinary principles of the common law.

In a general sense, the highest compensation, which courts of admiralty are in the habit of awarding, in the most meritorious cases, is one moiety. There are exceptions, indeed; but they are, where the property saved is very inconsiderable, and the gallantry, and danger, and difficulty of the service have been so great, as seemed to require an extraordinary compensation, hardly to be measured in value. But except in such peculiar cases, a moiety has rarely been exceeded. See The Jonge Bastiaan, 5 C. Rob. Adm. 322, where two thirds of the value was given. But there it was a case of derelict, and of great peril and extraordinary merit in performing the service, and the property saved was not large. And, indeed, even a moiety has rarely been given, except in cases of derelict. See The Aquila, 1 C. Rob. Adm. 37, 43–46. The present case, certainly, does not fall within that predicament. The property has never been treated either by the owners or by the salvors as derelict; but all operations respecting it have been constantly under the advice, sanction, and superintendence of the owners, who have in the strictest sense asserted, as they had a right to assert, a continual claim over it. We may, therefore, at once dismiss all consideration of it either as a case of derelict or of quasi derelict.

I agree, that in the present case, the onus probandi is on the appellants to displace the allowance of the moiety by the district court, by some clear and important grounds of mistake in the application of the facts or principles of law. But when the allowance is the highest rate, which is usually allowed in the most favored cases, it seems to me, that the facts ought to show, that the case in judgment belongs to that category. If the case were one standing upon a fixed private contract, it would be wholly unnecessary to look to such considerations. But if the highest reward in ordinary cases is given, the court ought to see, that that reward was fairly earned by services, to which it is properly and usually applied; that is, to cases of extraordinary peril, or suffering, or gallantry, or long and continued services of an excessively exhausting and pressing nature. It is not enough to say, that the parties contracted at another period, and then estimated the value of the like services at the same high rate. If it were admitted, (and it has been denied at the argument,) that the circumstances were essentially the same, that fact would not govern the present case; because, the parties in matters of contract may agree according to their pleasure, and afterwards vary the same at their pleasure. If, in dealing with the same or with different salvors at one time, they estimate the value of the salvage services to be rendered at 27½ per cent. of the value of the property, at another time at 50 per cent., and at another time at 75 per cent.; and at the time, when other and new salvage services are required, at 33 per cent., it is not necessary or a natural inference, that the higher sums approach more nearly to a just equivalent for them, than the intermediate sums. And, if the local position of the property is such, that it is liable to be buried up in the shifting sands of a reef, exposed to the whole storms of the ocean, which sands are several feet deeper at some times than at others, it is very obvious, that a sensible change of circumstances, as to the depth of the sands, might induce the belief, that the enterprise of rescuing the property would be far more laborious and uncertain, and worth far more at the unfavorable, than at the favorable periods. There is, also, great difficulty in affirming in cases of this sort, that, at distant intervals of time, all the circumstances are treated by both parties, as precisely in their substance similar, throughout. Many ingredients of despondency or hope, of active preparation, or languid effort, may vary the judgment of the owners at different times, even if there be no essential change in the local state of the property. There was much ground for fluctuation of opinion on this point, on the part of the owners, since the property was, as has been forcibly stated by the district judge, adopting the language of Loccenius, always treated by them, not as derelict, but as submerged, non in derelicto, sed in deperdito.

It appears to me, then, that the court is not at liberty to adopt the rate of salvage, fixed in the prior contracts, as a positive or controlling rule, but merely to examine them as adminicular circumstances, to assist its own judgment. With the greatest deference for the learning and ability of the district judge, I cannot but think, that these prior contracts had too controlling an influence over his judgment. As I understand his opinion, but for these prior contracts, he would have been satisfied with awarding the sum of two fifths of the value of the copper to the salvors, not, indeed, as an exercise of what Cleirac denominates judicium rusticum (although I am far from thinking that such a rule may not in some cases be properly resorted to); but as an apportionment, just and equitable, under the circumstances of the present case, and not unfrequently awarded in admiralty suits for salvage. If he had done so, I confess, that I should have seen no reason to complain of his decree, and should have declined to interfere with it.

But the allowance of a moiety certainly stands upon a different footing; and, as has been already stated, is rarely awarded, except in cases of extraordinary peril, difficulty, and distress. Do any circumstances of that sort constitute ingredients in the present cause? It appears to me, that they do not. There was, in fact, no uncommon peril, or exposure, or difficulty in this salvage service. There was no hazard of life; no storms were encountered; and no excessive and exhausting labors, which either endangered health, or required unceasing nocturnal vigilance, and abstinence from rest. The season was mild; and if the weather became boisterous, there was a safe and easy retreat to the main shore, within three or four miles. I do not mean to say, that the labor and services bestowed were of an ordinary sort, and merely such as might be commanded by the common daily pay in nautical business. Far from it. They were of a much higher character, and are entitled to a more ample reward. The owners offered one third; the salvors demanded at least a moiety. It was clearly not a very tempting employment; for the salvors rejected the one third, and quitted it. The salvors, who succeeded them in the enterprise, under the auspices of the owners, were in effect paid one third; the crew of one of the salvor's vessels receiving that rate from the beginning, by contract; and the crew of the other salvor's vessel being at first hired upon daily wages, but, becoming dissatisfied with that compensation, they were afterwards allowed at the same rate. So, that I think, that I am at liberty to presume, that this was the lowest rate, at which any suitable persons could be hired to perform the like service. Indeed, I understand, from the argument, that under the contract of Davis and others with the owners, for which they were to receive 75 per cent., in consequence of the greater depth, at which the other copper lay in and about the bottom of the vessel, these latter salvors did not, in fact, taking into consideration the length of time, which they were employed, and the quantity of copper, which they saved, receive a proportionate compensation approaching to that, which the libellants would receive, by a salvage of one third. I do not, however, dwell on this; because, being performed under a special contract for a more protracted service, Davis and others must take it for better or for worse. The events might have turned up in their favor; and then they would have received a much larger compensation. It is said, that, when the owners offered the one third, they did so, because they expected, that the libellants, if they accepted it, would continue in the service, as long as it could be useful, or should be required. But no such terms were contained in the stipulation; and, indeed, the offer was manifestly of one third, so long as they should choose to remain in the employment. It was one third of what they should save, without any condition as to the length of time, or the extent of labor, or the amount of the property saved. In this respect all the other contracts with the libellants, (as well as this offer,) may perhaps be properly distinguishable from the contract with Davis and others, who certainly engaged for some positive efforts, and incurred some expenses, to accomplish the object, although they were not bound to continue those efforts for any certain length of time. But the contract of Davis and others cannot, as has been already suggested, govern the present claim, even though it may have turned out to be a losing or inadequate bargain; since we are not to judge of this salvage service by after events, in which other salvors were concerned.

The view, then, that I take of the case is this, that the former contracts may, in a great measure, be laid out of the case, at least, so far as they are supposed to furnish any positive rule for decision. In this respect I am compelled to come to a different conclusion from the district judge; and, as this seems to have formed the very foundation of his decree, I feel myself, with whatever reluctance, bound to state, that it is not maintainable. I cannot think, that the facts of the present case, calling for the exercise of the sound discretion of the court, would justify me in the allowance of one moiety; since that would be to award the highest compensation, given only under extraordinary circumstances, to a case, where no such circumstances are presented. On the other hand the proffered allowance of one third was in the present case treated as a suitable, but at the same time, as a strict measure of compensation by the owners, and does not exceed, what they gave to others, and, indeed, to strangers. Now, it seems to me, that the libellants are entitled to a more favorable consideration, because they were employed, from time to time, during a considerable portion of two years, to watch the shifting state of the property, and to communicate to the owners whatever favorable changes might take place. They undertook, and they performed this duty; and, in my judgment, with entire fidelity to the interests of the owners; and they have received no distinct compensation therefor. They were the first to ascertain, and to communicate to the owners, the favorable change of the state of the property in May, 1840; and they promptly availed themselves of the opportunity of engaging in the service, without waiting for the results of a tardy negotiation for compensation. Under such circumstances, it appears to me, that they are fairly entitled to a more favorable consideration from the owners than others, who came in at a later hour, and had bestowed no like watchfulness and effort. It is somewhat of a stern and harsh exercise of right by the owners, to put aside the claims of persons, who have been prompt to communicate intelligence, and to act with spirit for their interests, and to deal with them with the cold and reluctant caution of a bargain with mere strangers. I think, that the owners were bound to make a more liberal allowance, than one third, on account of these peculiar merits of the libellants. The sum of two fifths, which the district judge thought reasonable, independent of any contract, appears to me to reach the true equities of the case, not as a judicium rusticum, but as a just estimate of the aggregate merits of the libellants in the present case, under all the circumstances. I shall, therefore, reverse the decree of the district court, as to the allowance of a moiety, and shall allow two fifths of the net proceeds, as salvage to the libellants. The costs of the appeal ought, in my judgment, to be borne as a common charge on the whole property saved.

BEARSE, (UNITED STATES v.) See Case No. 14,552.

BEATAUGA v. NICHOLSON. See Case No. 1,194.

Case No. 1,194.

BEATAUGH v. NICHOLSON.

[19 Betts, D. C. MS. 215.]

District Court, S. D. New York. April 30, 1851.

SEAMEN—PILOTS—TRESPASS—DAMAGES—WAGES.

[1. A licensed pilot, employed to take a ship out of port, and remain with her, and bring her in on the return voyage for an agreed compensation, is as much subject to the authority of the master as to discipline as any member of the ship's company, though he is not liable to do ship's duty except when in charge of her as pilot.]

[2. Where such pilot was ordered by the master to leave the quarter deck, and refused to do so, and the master undertook to put him off, but used force enough to throw him on the deck, this is a trespass, for which the master is liable to the pilot in damages.]

[3. The master is not justified in ordering the pilot ashore thereupon, and leaving him; and he is entitled to recover his full agreed wages.]

[At law. Libel by Samuel Beataugh against John T. Nicholson for wages and damages for assault. Decree for libelant.]

[Before BETTS, District Judge.]

A licensed pilot, when on board a sea-going steamer, to take her out of this harbor, and go the voyage, remaining with her for the purpose of bringing her into port, for a compensation in gross of $80, is not liable to do ship's duty, except when in charge of her officially as pilot. Any command or request in respect to his services on board may be communicated to him through the mate or other subalterns of the ship, and need not be delivered him personally by the master; and accordingly a request to him, through the chief mate or carpenter, to stand a night watch, in a case of urgency, affords him no grounds for complaint or reproach to the master. If he goes on the quarter deck to make complaint therefor to the captain, and is ordered off the deck by the captain, he is bound to obey the order, and must take his place in such part of the ship as the master shall direct. The authority of the master in respect to the discipline and rules of the ship are the same over such pilot as over any other person on board. If he refuses to leave the quarter deck, or neglects to do so on the express order of the master, the latter is justified in applying so much force as may be necessary to compel obedience, but no more. The result of the conflicting evidence on this point shows that the master employed more violence than was necessary in removing the pilot from the quarter deck; and he is therefore guilty of a trespass. This violence consisted only in pushing the pilot forward, (in doing which both tripped, and the pilot fell on the deck, and the master partly so); and being accompanied with no other force or injury, the damages should be scarcely more than nominal. Decreed $10 damages for the trespass.

Held, that the master was not justified in thereupon ordering the pilot ashore, and leaving him at Chagres, and that he is entitled to recover his full agreed wages, and also the expenses to which he was necessarily subjected whilst at Chagres, and in returning home. Ordered, a reference to ascertain those expenses, and that a decree for the amount, with costs, be entered in his favor against the defendant.

*

END OF CASES IN BOOK 2.

INDEX.

[The references are to pages. The asterisk (*) indicates that the case has been reversed.]

ABATEMENT AND REVIVAL.

Page

The expiration of the charter of a corporation abates all suits then pending in its name 722

Suit is not abated by sole complainant parting with his interest pendente lite, but no further proceedings can be had until his assignee is made a party..... 832

Pendency of suit between same parties respecting the same subject-matter in a federal court in another state may be pleaded in abatement..... 503

But such plea must show that the court has jurisdiction..... 790

Where proceedings in bankruptcy are pleaded in abatement, all matters required to give jurisdiction must be averred..... 503

Action for infringement of patent survives 193

Case is not revived on death of party without order to that effect..... 193

The state statute limiting the time for the allowance of a continuance by an administrator (Civil Code Or. § 34) applies to actions in the federal courts..... 815

Where an executor voluntarily appears in the action, judgment may be given for or against him with the same effect as if brought in by sci. fa..... 815

ACCOUNT.

In an action upon an open account, plaintiff may give evidence of any item of which defendant has had reasonable notice..... 945

An account rendered is proper evidence before an auditor to whom a cause is referred to state the account..... 701

ACCOUNTING.

Bill to account does not lie on an executory contract where compensation for the breach can be had in damages..... 439

Equity will not sustain suit to compel settlement of partnership accounts under a government contract participated in by government agent..... 964

On a bill against a partner who has fraudulently suppressed books and falsified accounts, complainant will not be held to strict proof—Sufficiency of proof..... 31

ACCOUNTS STATED.

An account retained an unreasonable time without objection becomes an account stated, and bars a bill to account..... 439

An account current, received and not objected to within a reasonable time, will bear interest..... 407

An account current, received and kept without objection, except as to particular items, may still be surcharged and falsified as to other items..... 945

An account stated cannot be opened because an item of interest not illegal, which went into it, could not have been recovered by suit..... 407

ACTION.

Page

Consolidation of actions on notes, though parties are the same in all, not ordered.. 619

ACKNOWLEDGMENT.

The presumption is that the person examined was of full age, until the contrary is shown.....1032

ADMIRALTY.

Jurisdiction—In general.

Extends to actions ex contractu, quasi ex contractu, ex delicto, and quasi ex delicto 1161

Suits upon contracts regulated by the common law are "suits at common law," within Const. Amend. art. 7, and not cognizable in admiralty..... 410

Admiralty jurisdiction is referred to in the constitution as it was restricted in England at time of revolution, and as exercised by state courts before adoption of constitution 410

A judgment against the master of a vessel, recovered in an action for wages in a common-law court, cannot be enforced in admiralty 68

—— Persons and property.

Contracts of seamen for maritime services are governed by the maritime law, and enforceable in admiralty, (Act 1790).. 410

Accounts for traffic and dealings between master and mate not subjects of admiralty jurisdiction 115

—— Waters and places.

Has jurisdiction over navigable waters, irrespective of the fact of a tide..... 255

The waters of the Welland canal, being used for international commerce, are within American admiralty jurisdiction..... 255

—— Affreightments; charter parties, etc.

Has jurisdiction of matters leading to a charter party or stipulations and representations not embraced therein..... 506

—— Pilotage.

Has jurisdiction over action to recover half pilotage under state laws for services tendered and refused..... 764 —— Repairs and supplies to vessel.

An account for provisions furnished the owner or commander of a vessel, or for articles for her use when not on a voyage or in a foreign port, is not within the admiralty jurisdiction either as a substantive claim or set-off..... 410

—— Torts.

Admiralty will not entertain suits for merely nominal damages in cases of personal torts, not involving any other subject-matter 879

—— Wharfage.

The liability for wharfage of an agent to whom a vessel is consigned, created by a state law, (Laws N. Y. 1873, p. 430,) is maritime in its character, and enforceable in admiralty..... 135

Page

Procedure.

The proceeding in rem to enforce a lien for damages caused by a collision is not process, or a part of the lex fori..... 255

There is no maritime lien created by a general average loss, and admiralty has not jurisdiction in rem.....1161

AFFIDAVITS.

May be sworn to before affiant's counsel, though wholly in his handwriting..... 101

In a suit in equity, sworn to before bill filed, must not be entitled in the suit..... 510

AFFREIGHTMENT.

See, also, "Admiralty;" "Bills of Lading;" "Charter-Parties;" "Shipping."

"Going rate," as to freight, means the last actual contract, or, where the rate varies, the average of the day..... 928

Damage to goods may be set up in defense to suit for freight.....1191

Burden of proof as to damage to goods.. 86

The value of goods at place of delivery, with interest from the day when they should have arrived, is the measure of damages for their loss. Anticipated business profits are not allowed.....1097

ALIENS.

Ownership of real estate.

A state has power to give capacity to aliens to hold lands within it.....1172

An act giving capacity to aliens "which shall have resided in the state two years" applies as well to future as to past residence 1172

Naturalization.

The word "armies," as used in acts admitting enlisted aliens to citizenship, does not include "marines"..... 360

AMENDMENT.

A clerical error in the record may be amended after the term..... 868

Bill in equity amended to conform to proofs and admissions in answer, where subject-matter not changed.....1033

The record of a cause, when made out and written in the record book, cannot be altered, except by order of the court..... 866

ANIMALS.

A whale killed and taken into complete possession is the property of the taker, who may maintain an action against one who subsequently finds it adrift, and, without knowledge of the title, appropriates it.... 966

APPEAL.

Jurisdiction on appeal.

Appeals are allowed to circuit court from decrees in admiralty in all cases where sum in dispute exceeds $50. (Act March 3, 1803)..... 266

Taking and perfecting.

Circuit court obtains jurisdiction on appeal by filing and serving notice of appeal, and not by filing of transcript..... 526

Time for filing transcript on appeal in the circuit court may be extended by consent of parties beyond statutory time..... 526

Hearing and determination. Page

The appellee may continue the cause where the record is filed only a short time before the term..... 324

The hearing on appeal from the district court in admiralty is de novo, but, on questions of fact, burden is on appellant..... 266

Mere technical objections taken for first time in appellate court are unavailing..... 280

A decision on a question of fact, established with reasonable satisfaction, will not be disturbed..... 475

A decree of the district court, based wholly upon a question of fact, will not be reversed where the evidence raises only a doubt as to the fact..... 476

Circuit court, on appeal, cannot rehear a cause or admit a claim at a term subsequent to that in which the cause was finally decided..... 242

Bonds on appeal.

Sureties will be protected by the court when they have acted in good faith.....1080

Appellant not absolutely bound by condition of bond on appeal to supreme court to pay amount of original judgment..... 682

In an action on appeal bond to supreme court, plaintiff must aver damages sustained by defendant's not making his plea good 682

ARBITRATION.

Where a reference in a pending suit is made without order of court, it can only be enforced by separate action..... 584

ARMY.

An enlisted minor, who has not been mustered into the service, nor received any rations or clothing, cannot be held in custody as a volunteer, either under the United States or Massachusetts statutes..... 577

ARREST.

A person arrested in one district for an offense committed in another, if not indicted nor committed by a commissioner, is entitled to an examination in the district in which he is arrested..... 363

The power to remove an accused from the district of his arrest to the one of trial is in the district judge, and not the circuit judge 363

A commitment for further examination is valid, as well as a commitment for trial..1015

A commitment in South Carolina may be valid without any examination of prisoner or state witnesses.....1015

The constitutional rights of the prisoner to be confronted by witnesses, and to be represented by counsel, have reference to the trial only, and not to proceedings on commitment 1015

ASSIGNMENT FOR CREDITORS.

An assignment is void as to the firm property, as well as to the individual estate of the nonsigning members of the firm.....1164

Creditors levying after, but not those levying before, expiration of time to file inventory and schedule, under the New York insolvent law, acquire a lien where the inventory, etc., is not filed within the time..1164

Sufficiency of inventory and schedule by assignors for benefit of creditors, under Laws N. Y. 1877, c. 466, and Laws 1878, c. 318.....1164

ASSUMPSIT.

Trustee appropriating proceeds of trust property is liable in assumpsit..... 476

Page

Where deed is without covenants, assumpsit will not lie for failure of consideration on complete failure of grantor's title 518
An agreement to release a debtor upon his executing a deed is a good defense in assumpsit, the deed being executed..... 965

ATTACHMENT: GARNISHMENT, ETC.

To constitute attachment of personalty as against assignee in bankruptcy, officer must take actual possession..... 25
Assignment of the debt by defendant, with notice to garnishee before service of attachment, cannot be given in evidence on trial of issue of nulla bona. It must be specially pleaded 471
Government agent for payment of salaries and treasurer of the United States are public agents, and not liable as garnishees for employee's salary..... 239

ATTORNEY AND CLIENT.

Warrant of attorney to appear is not necessary 728
A proctor in admiralty cannot release or compromise his client's debt without special authority, and an insufficient amount paid in settlement is a discharge pro tanto.1025

BAIL.

Not required in debt on bond with collateral condition..... 769
Cannot surrender their principal before a judge at chambers.....1048

BANKRUPTCY.

Operation and effect of bankrupt laws: State laws.

A judgment confessed in contravention of the bankrupt act is void, though valid by the state laws..... 112
The assignee is not bound by proceedings against bankrupt to which he was not a party 100
A decree of foreclosure against one adjudicated a bankrupt, where his assignee was not made a party, will not extinguish the right of redemption, and a purchaser under sale by order of the bankruptcy court is entitled to redeem, notwithstanding title by possession and payment of taxes under state law..... 937
Assignee cannot have injunction against foreclosure in state court of mortgage against bankrupt where he appeared, and permitted the proceedings to final adjudication, and no injury is done thereby..... 212

Jurisdiction of courts.

The jurisdiction of federal courts in bankruptcy is exclusive in all matters arising under the bankrupt act..... 941
Nonresident, who has for six months preceding petition carried on business as agent and attorney for another within a certain district, may file his petition in such district 392
Where the allegation of residence within the district as the ground of jurisdiction is false as to one of the petitioning partners, the court is without any jurisdiction.....1119

Register—Powers and duties.

The register's power is limited only by express exception in the bankruptcy act..... 668
He has power to direct a sale of debts and choses in action belonging to the estate if creditors do not object..... 668
He may, of his own motion, inquire into delays, and indicate steps for a speedy settlement 668
He may, at first meeting of creditors before election of assignee, postpone proof of any claim which he regards as doubtful... 986
But, where claims objected to are clearly valid, he must apply to court..... 986
He has no power, against objection of parties, to require issues framed as to the re-examination of a claim until it appears that the claim ought to be expunged or diminished 63
Order made without objection cannot be revoked 63
On trial of charges against a register, the creditor may offer evidence to contradict the register as to facts called out by his examination 668

Commencement of proceedings—Voluntary bankruptcy.

The policy holders in a mutual life insurance company are "corporators," within Rev. St. § 5122, requiring them to be notified of the meeting called to authorize proceedings 168
A receiver of a mutual insurance company, appointed by a state court, may move the bankruptcy court to set aside bankruptcy proceedings as unauthorized by the members, but cannot show that the company was solvent..... 168
To defeat a voluntary petition, (Act 1841,) creditors must show concealment of property. Proof of ownership in past years, or dissipation or dishonest squandering of property, is not sufficient..... 358
Purchases of bankrupt's property by members of his family at judicial sales do not raise a presumption of ownership, requiring the bankrupt to account therefor.. 358 —— Schedule.

May be verified before a notary..... 359
Cannot be corrected on motion to record a resolution of composition, so as to show that the requisite number of creditors joined, but confirmation will be denied, with leave to renew motion..... 69

—— Involuntary bankruptcy.

Owners of a planing mill contracted debts as traders, but discontinued that branch of the business a few months before committing an act of bankruptcy. Held, that they must be considered merchants as to such debts..... 527
It is not a valid objection to petition in invitum by creditor that his claim is not yet due 984
Act June 22, 1874, requiring petition to show certain number and amount of creditors joining, how far retroactive..... 848
A general unsecured creditor has a right to intervene and contest an adjudication in bankruptcy 231

—— Acts of bankruptcy.

A preference in contemplation of bankruptcy, though coerced by creditor..... 100
A general mortgage to one creditor to hinder and delay others..... 527
A general assignment by a trader for the benefit of his creditors equally.....868, 984
A suspension of payment of commercial paper for 14 days, if availed of within six months of its continuance.....537, 558
Effect of act of July 14, 1870..... 558
A fraudulent conveyance subsequent to a judgment lien on the property is no cause of bankruptcy. The remedy is in equity to set aside the conveyance..... 250
Concealment of debtor from creditors does not constitute an act of bankruptcy unless service of process is thereby prevented 858
A bond with warrant to confess judgment upon the eve and in contemplation of bankruptcy does not constitute an act of bankruptcy; unless the judgment and execution thereon were at the instance of the debtor 858 Adjudication.

Page

Relates back to the filing of the original petition, and not to the time of an ancillary petition filed to correct an irregularity..1164

Objections not taken before adjudication considered waived..... 755

A decree declaring a corporation bankrupt cannot be impeached, after the lapse of a year, by a stockholder who had full knowledge of all the facts..... 572

Assignee—Appointment and removal.

An attorney for a creditor may be assignee of the bankrupt's estate..... 909

One member of a firm, on behalf of the firm, may execute a power of attorney authorizing him to vote for the firm in the choice of assignees..... 909

Property of bankrupt—What constitutes.

Crops planted by bankrupt after filing petition do not pass to the assignee..... 879

Bankrupt husband, who has insured his life for benefit of his wife, need not list the policy as assets.....1166

Interest in the business of another, which the bankrupt conducts in his own name, receiving half of profits as compensation, is not property to be set out in the inventory..1176

Proof of indebtedness arising out of disposal of proceeds of such business.....1176

A conveyance on condition of the payment of an annual sum to the grantor during life gives the grantee a title which will pass to his assignee..... 199

—— Exemptions.

Under the provision permitting the exemption allowed by the state law "existing in the year 1871," where there was a change in the law during the year the statute existing at the close of the year will control 351

The filing of a petition is an election to take the exemption allowed by the state law in force at the passage of the bankruptcy law..... 29

The homestead secured to the head of a family by the state law, though not ascertained and set out, does not pass to the assignee, and is not subject to the jurisdiction of the bankrupt court.....1004

Right to homestead exemption is not lost by delay to claim it until assignee applies for order to sell..... 963 —— Custody.

In the separate bankruptcy of one member of a solvent firm, an account will be ordered, and the joint property left with the solvent partners; but otherwise where the firm is insolvent..... 263

—— Liens.

Property held by purchasers from a bankrupt in fraud of the bankrupt act is subject to the lien of a judgment against the bankrupt 325

Property held by the bankrupt after the rendition of a judgment against him, but before commencement of bankruptcy proceedings, is subject to the lien of the judgment 325

An execution levied previous to an act of bankruptcy, if real and bona fide, gives a lien 858

Assignee taking property from trustee, who held under a void assignment for creditors, takes subject to the liens of judgment creditors accruing subsequently to the assignment, and before the commencement of bankruptcy proceedings.....1106

Page

The question as to the validity of an execution lien on bankrupt's property attacked as a preference cannot be settled by petition and answer, but only by bill in equity or suit at law..... 559

The remedy to have an unrecorded mortgage of the bankrupt's property declared and enforced as a prior lien is by action or suit, and not by petition..... 951

—— Sale by assignee.

The district court for Louisiana can authorize the sale of real estate surrendered by bankrupts, free and discharged of all mortgage debts..... 941

A claim against the wife of a bankrupt for payments made by him when insolvent, on a policy for the benefit of his wife, may be sold by the assignee, and will pass to the purchaser a contingent right in the proceeds of the policy.....1166

Proof of debts.

Damages for a tort are not provable until they have been assessed..... 362

A note given before the bankruptcy of the maker, but maturing after, and taken up by the indorser before, final certificate, may be proved..... 480

Rent for that portion of a term under a lease not expired before the adjudication not provable..... 376

Holder of a bill of exchange may prove his debt against all the parties, or against one, and proceed at law against the others.. 289

Attaching creditor who pays liens upon the attached goods, to save his attachment, must be repaid the same by the assignee of the debtor..... 433

Where a member of a firm, which is general agent of a corporation, misappropriates funds thereof to the uses of the firm, which is known by the firm, both are liable, and proof may be made against both estates 1044

Creditor holding security from a third person may prove his debt without surrendering it, but otherwise with security from the bankrupt..... 289

Holder of a draft may prove for whole amount against drawer's estates, though he has been paid in part by acceptor whom he has released, and who in turn released drawer 1045

Surety paying debt of bankrupt principal can only prove the difference between the debt and the amount realized on securities held by him as indemnity..... 508

Pledgee of notes, held to secure a debt in a smaller amount, may prove them against the maker's estate to their full amount, and receive dividends to the extent of his debt, though they are invalid in the hands of the pledgor..... 381

Recovery by assignee against a holder of the bankrupt's note, who has taken a preference, does not revive his right to prove the note..... 270

Where the holder of a note has forfeited his claim against the estate of the bankrupt maker, the guarantors have no right to prove it..... 270

Seizure of part of shipment of goods under right of stoppage in transitu does not prevent proof of claim as to those delivered.1191

Power of attorney to prove debt in bankruptcy need not be acknowledged..... 854

Creditor cannot prove by an attorney testifying upon information and belief, unless he is prevented from giving the affidavit, as provided by Act March 2, 1867, § 22... 854

Deposition by officer of creditor corporation, made after proof of claim, allowed to be filed.....1046

A bankrupt may testify to support a claim by his wife against the estate. (Act Pa. April 15, 1869).....1120

Page

Where, on a reference to take proof of a claim, it appears that the claim has already been proven, and not objected to, the reference should not proceed..... 507

Payment of debts: Priority: Dividends.

Creditors holding bank bills of a state bank adjudged a bankrupt are entitled to interest from the date of adjudication. (Reversing 666)..... 667

A creditor collecting money for his debtor, and failing to pay it over, has no priority over other creditors..... 647

The fact that the drawee had funds of the drawer when he refused to accept the draft will not give the holder priority over other creditors of bankrupt drawer..... 647

Senior mortgagee on sale of property in bankruptcy is entitled to payment of his mortgage in full, together with costs and expenses 956

Money paid to procure release of dower in mortgaged premises should be apportioned between the mortgagees..... 956

Landlord has no lien in Alabama for rent accruing after bankruptcy of tenant..... 376

The right to distrain for rent is a "lien," within the bankrupt act; and in Mississippi the landlord is entitled to a preference for rent out of proceeds of sale of property on demised premises, subject to his attachment. (Reversing 233)..... 234

Assignee may withhold dividend to creditor who is also debtor to a member of the bankrupt firm until determination of suit to recover the debt..... 104

Examination of bankrupt.

The filing of specifications in opposition to a discharge is not necessary prerequisite to making of order for examination of bankrupt or other persons.....1042

A bankrupt may be compelled to appear with his books before the register for examination as to a composition..... 6

Costs: Fees: Disbursements.

Registers' fees—Taxation and allowance.. 208

Where a petition to establish a right to payment in full has assumed the form of a regular suit, costs and a docket fee will be taxed 657

Bookkeeper of bankrupt not entitled to compensation for making schedules while in employ of marshal, and in receipt of his usual salary..... 855

Claim of bankrupt for extraordinary services cannot be allowed by the court, but may be allowed by creditors..... 855

Discharge—Proceedings to obtain.

Where there are no assets, bankrupt cannot be discharged, unless he applies after the expiration of sixty days and within one year from the adjudication..... 910

A creditor may consent to a discharge by his attorney in fact or counsel in open court 560 —— Opposition: Acts barring.

Creditor who has proved his claim may, except as limited by rule 24, file specifications of the grounds of his opposition.....1042

Creditors who have not proved their claims until after the day fixed for showing cause against a discharge can then object to the discharge only on the ground of fraud 560

Creditors executing releases under terms of voluntary assignment are to be considered as preferred over other creditors, within meaning of provision denying discharge 65

Discharge not refused unless fraud, willful concealment of property, etc., or facts from which they are plainly deduced, clearly appear..... 755

Specifications alleging concealment of property should specify the property, and that the omissions from the schedules were willful, fraudulent, or negligent.....1175

Page

It is no answer to a charge of concealment that the property belonged of right to assignees under an earlier assignment, under the state insolvent laws.....1107

A bankrupt having actual possession of joint estate and joint books of account must disclose them to his separate assignees....1107

Discharge not refused for failure to keep proper books of account, unless the fact is clearly shown.....1012

Bankrupt need not affirmatively show that he has kept proper books of account, etc. 755

Books from which a competent acountant could ascertain the bankrupt's condition are sufficient..... 956

—— Scope and effect.

A discharge does not operate on debts created by fraud, and an objection to a discharge on the ground that the debt was so created is not valid.....1004

Prohibited and fraudulent transfers.

Section 35 of act of 1867 applies both to transactions with a creditor or one under liability for the bankrupt, and with a purchaser not a creditor or under such liability 1127

"Contemplation of bankruptcy" means insolvency 15

"Contemplation of bankruptcy" means contemplation of inability to continue business, not of applying for benefit of bankrupt law 100

A preference is not a payment of creditor in the ordinary course of business, or under threats of suit..... 15

If the necessary effect of an act is to prefer one creditor, the intent to prefer is presumed, though other motives co-operated to induce the act.....1012

A sale by the bankrupt not in the ordinary and usual course of business is only presumptively fraudulent, and the presumption may be rebutted..... 283

Transfer of whole stock and book accounts to one creditor, three weeks before filing petition, held a preference, though made under threat of legal process.....1012

A sale out of the usual course of business of all one's stock in trade to a person with knowledge of the seller's insolvency is prima facie void, and a second purchaser with knowledge has no better title..... 285

Purchase by second vendee not fraudulent unless he knew or had reasonable cause to know of facts rendering the first sale fraudulent. Knowledge that the sale to the first vendee was of the entire stock of the seller not sufficient 283

An assignment in trust, by an insolvent, for creditors who will accept 60 per cent. of their claims, is void at common law and under the bankruptcy act 1106

A general assignment for distribution among all creditors equally is not void, but voidable only at the suit of the assignee.... 868

Confession of judgment is not fraudulent unless intended as a preference, and given in contemplation of bankruptcy..... 100

Where the debtor, in order to give a preference, allows his property to be taken on execution issued on a judgment against him, the transaction is void..... 559

The allowance of a judgment in favor of a brother by an insolvent debtor, to the exclusion of all other creditors, held a preference 437

The taking of sawed lumber, in settlement of a claim on a conditional sale of logs to an insolvent mill owner, in excess of the claim, creates a fraudulent preference.. 373

Payments made mala fide to a debtor after petition in bankruptcy filed against him are void as against assignee..... 280

Page

Payments, etc., by one knowing himself to be insolvent, are not in contemplation of bankruptcy if he fully expected to continue business and retrieve his losses..... 100

Payments by husband on policy on his life for benefit of wife after he becomes insolvent are fraudulent, and may be recovered from wife out of proceeds of policy, when paid, with interest.....1166

A secret arrangement by one of the creditors, entering into a composition for an advantage over other creditors, is fraudulent, and a payment made thereunder may be recovered by the assignee subsequently appointed, though the composition never became binding 1120

Transfer by brother to sister, whose money he had taken and invested without any account, held fraudulent..... 976

A sale to a creditor 13 months before filing petition, if bona fide and without knowledge of contemplated bankruptcy, though it may prevent discharge, is valid as to the creditor 15

An attachment by a creditor of the property of his insolvent debtor is not a fraud upon the bankrupt act 433

Chattel mortgage for a present consideration, made more than 60 days prior to bankruptcy, but not filed for record until within that time, is valid 830

Payment of note at maturity by insolvent maker, without knowledge or procurement of accommodation indorsers, is not fraudulent 1139

An indorsement upon a chattel mortgage, extending its lien to other chattels, made in fraud of the bankrupt act, is ineffectual for any purpose 433

After payment on account of one item of a claim proved, creditor cannot divide his claim so as to avoid in part the assignee's claim of preference by such payment..... 855

Prohibited and fraudulent transfers—Suit by assignee.

Assignee of one partner can, in the interest of firm creditors, recover sums paid out of the firm's funds in fraud of their rights.*1120

An assignment by one member of firm of individual property for benefit of individual creditors, with directions to distribute the balance among partnership creditors, may be set aside at the suit of the assignee of the firm 882

Assignee may proceed to impeach bankrupt's conveyance as fraudulent, irrespective of condition of creditors' claims..... 807

The rights of the assignee to sue to set aside conveyance by bankrupt are not affected by Act June 22, 1874, when the adjudication of bankruptcy was passed theretofore 882

Secret preferences paid as inducements to signing composition deeds may be recovered either at law or in equity.....1130, 1132

Such preferences can be recovered by the debtor or by injured creditors, or by the assignee 1132

It is no defense to the action that the composition deed was invalid, because not signed by all the creditors, pursuant to its terms 1120, 1132

The four-months limitation governs a transaction with a creditor, and the six-months limitation that with a general purchaser 283, 1127

An action by the assignee of a firm to set aside an assignment by a member for the benefit of his individual creditors is not limited to four months..... 882

A declaration in an action by the assignee must state that the transaction was had within the prohibited time.....1127

All transactions illegal or fraudulent by the common law, the statute law, or by rules of law, other than the special limitations in section 35. are governed by the limitation of two years.....1127

Where assignee continues defense of suit, the estate is liable to expense thereof, if the creditors impliedly consented..... 292

The bankruptcy proceedings are admissible to show appointment as assignee... 285

To annul a sale, the vendee must be shown to have had good reason to believe that the insolvent's intent was to evade the bankruptcy act 283

Arrangement with creditors: Composition.

Committee appointed to assist trustee in management of estate may act by majority vote 1047

Amount of payment to counsel for services is discretionary with committee.....1047

The trustees have no power to admit claims against the estate; such power is vested in the register..... 500

The approval of the committee cannot affect or cure positively unlawful applications of the fund, nor inequality of distribution..1047

Damages for a tort not assessed cannot be considered in ascertaining proportion of creditors voting for composition..... 362

Affidavit of husband that he had given his wife authority to vote in favor of a composition is a ratification and estoppel, validating the wife's act..... 362

Wards whose money has been loaned to a firm, from which their guardian, a member, took notes to himself as guardian, on coming of age, are entitled to vote in favor of a composition by the bankrupt firm.... 362

The confirmation of a composition, and the bankrupt's compliance therewith, suspend functions of assignee..... 208

A composition arranged and confirmed does not take the case out of the jurisdiction of the court.....1085

The amount due from the assignee to the bankrupt after composition should be determined on special order..... 208

Debtor's default under composition does not entitle creditor to dissolution of injunction against his judgment, obtained pending bankruptcy proceedings.....1085

BANKS.

Payment of check is prima facie evidence of funds.....607, 741, 742

A note deposited for collection and credited to depositor, is property of bank; and, on its bankruptcy, proceeds go to general creditors 657

The relation between a bank and its customer is not of a fiduciary character..... 657

The teller is not liable for losses during his absence..... 701

On the failure of a bank to pay specie, it may be forced into liquidation..... 624

Liability of stockholders of national bank is several, and a suit at law is the proper remedy to enforce a specific assessment ordered by the comptroller..... 382

Comptroller of currency, in winding up insolvent national bank, has authority to finally determine when a deficiency of assets exists 382

Special charter powers.

Congress has power to authorize the Bank of the United States to sue in the federal courts 728

The act incorporating the Bank of the United States confers the right to sue in the circuit courts, irrespective of their jurisdiction. .....726; contra, *692

Where the Bank of the United States recovers less than $500 in a suit in the circuit court, it cannot recover costs, and may be adjudged to pay all costs..... 728

Page

The relation of a branch of the Bank of the United States to another branch or to the parent bank which has forwarded paper for collection is simply that of principal and agent 694
Affidavit of president of Bank of Columbia on an order for an execution—Form and contents 629
An order for an execution by the president of the Bank of Columbia is not a judgment 628
Execution issued on order of the president of the Bank of Columbia—Form and contents 628
The issuing of an execution by the Bank of Columbia is the commencement of the action in regard to the statute of limitations 643
The suit is discontinued by failure to prosecute the execution..... 628
The court will permit defendant upon return of execution to plead the statute of limitations 629, 645
Bank of Alexandria may have its causes tried at the first term to which the writ was returnable 606, 619
The Bank of Alexandria may, upon discounting notes, deduct the whole interest to become due..... 607

BILLS, NOTES, AND CHECKS.

What law governs.

Where bills are accepted, payable in London, on a promise to provide funds to meet them, the contract is governed by the law of England..... 407
A bill drawn and indorsed in one state, but payable in another, is governed by the law of the former as to the liability of the indorser, but by the place of payment as to the amount of interest..... 649

Nature and requisites.

Warrant issued by controller of city, whose payment is restricted to a particular fund, not regarded as bill of exchange....1075
Cashier's certificate of deposit for a sum named, payable at a certain time, to the order of the depositary, is a promissory note 229

Validity.

Trading corporations may, independently of statute, issue negotiable paper in the course of their business.....1075
"Confederate Treasury Notes" are illegal because issued by organization of subjects in rebellion..... 378
A promissory note given in consideration of Confederate notes is void..... 378
The stipulation in a note for the payment of a reasonable attorney's fee on collection by action is valid, and binding on all indorsers 622

Acceptance.

A letter written within a reasonable time before or after the date of a bill of exchange, describing it, and promising to accept it, is a virtual acceptance.....1064
Authority to draw, with an assurance of payment, is an acceptance to one who takes bill on the credit of such authority.....1064
An accommodation acceptor of a bill of exchange is a surety as to the drawer, but a principal as to the holder, although he knew the facts..... 289
A letter of credit held to be used within the terms of the agreement giving right to commissions, though bill issued thereunder was never presented..... 794

Indorsement and transfer.

The possessor of a negotiable instrument is prima facie a bona fide holder for value in the usual course of business, without notice of facts impugning its validity..... 622

Page

Want of consideration in the making and indorsing of a note can be shown, against a remote party, only where he took with knowledge of such want between nearer parties 622
An accommodation indorser can show a want of consideration only as against the accommodated party.....622, 631
An indorsement, though for accommodation, is evidence of money had and received by the indorser..... 618
But otherwise where the indorser writes on the face of the bill, "credit the drawer." 621
An accommodation indorsement in blank may be filled up at the trial by plaintiff's counsel 745
Plaintiff, who is not an indorsee, has no right at the trial to strike out the words of a special indorsement..... 726

Rights of indorsers, generally.

A parol agreement, made at the time a note is indorsed, cannot affect the indorser's rights under the law merchant..... 601
One discounting a note for the joint benefit of the maker and indorsers, though in unequal amounts, need not make demand and give notice to recover against indorsers 754
Holder of bill of exchange, after demand and notice, is not bound to active diligence 874
An indorser is bound by the usage of the local banks as to demand, notice, and protest, known to him at the time of indorsing 639, 642
But not otherwise except upon his agreement 601
A blank indorsement does not discharge subsequent indorsers as such..... 622
Bank of Alexandria bound to make demand and give notice to charge indorser.. 621

Demand.

Where note is payable at a certain bank, need not be personal.....679, 727
At bank where payable, and which was holder, must be made, though maker had no funds to his credit.....*733
Must be made on the last day of grace.. 216
On the day after the expiration of the days of grace is in time, in the District of Columbia 618
But on last day of grace, after banking hours, is not too soon..... 684
Where maker of notes dies before maturity 750
May be made by notary's clerk..... 618

Notice.

An accommodation indorser is not entitled to notice unless he has actually sustained damages by its want.....*631
Agent to present a note for payment is not bound to give notice of dishonor to the indorser, but only to his principal, who in turn gives such notice..... 694
Due notice, as between any indorsers, is sufficient to charge such indorser in favor of all subsequent indorsers..... 694
The delivery of a note to a deputy notary is not per se notice to the notary who was indorser thereon..... 641
On the third day of grace, though after bank hours, held too soon..... 216
The next mail after protest held sufficient 229
If by mail, must be given on the last day of grace, where the mail does not close until six hours after the close of the bank..*615
Mailed after closing of mail on day after last day of grace held too late..... 737
On day following last day of grace held in time 684
Where indorser dies intestate, notice left with his son at intestate's place of business, before appointment of administrator, held sufficient 638

Page

By mail held not sufficient as to an indorser residing in the country where he had a house in town usually resorted to by him for business.....*639

Left in indorser's separate room, in a business house where he is a clerk, held sufficient 717

Left with a boarder at the same house with the indorser, with the request to hand it to him, held sufficient..... 699

Left at shop of indorser's son, though connected with his dwelling house, held not sufficient 690

Wrongly stating amount of note held ineffectual 615

A mistake in the recital of the date of the note will not invalidate..... 741

A verbal notice, on the day following the last day of grace, that payment had been demanded, and that the note would be protested if not paid, is not sufficient..... 686

The waiver of objection as to want of may be after, as well as before, the laches 641

The receipt of cannot be inferred from an agreement by the indorser not to take advantage of the statute of limitations, and to authorize an attorney to docket a suit.. 690

Protest.

Where the drawer has no funds in the hands of the drawee, no protest or notice is necessary. 461

Justice of peace in Mississippi is ex officio notary public for purpose of protest and notice 229

A protest which does not state that the notary informed the indorser of demand and refusal is insufficient..... 618

Payment.

The rate of exchange is not exclusively regulated by the expense of transporting specie from one place to the other, but rather by the current rates for drafts in specie 504

A landlord who also holds a note of his tenant with a deed of trust of personalty as security must apply the proceeds of such property distrained for rent to the note, as against an indorser..... 736

Discharge or release of indorser.

Indorser is discharged by holder's taking new security, and giving time to maker, without his consent..... 702

Agreement between the holder and drawer, which suspends the right of the holder to enforce payment, will discharge the indorser, for it suspends his rights..... 699

A contract to give time to the maker does not discharge the indorser unless it is valid and enforceable..... 501

After demand and notice, holder may give time to the maker, or take time note of indorser, without releasing subsequent indorser 685, 717

After demand and notice, a neglect to enforce security until it becomes inadequate by depreciation will not discharge the indorser 618

Maker, acting as agent for other parties to note in discounting it, may change date of maturity if agreed to by them..... 754

A representation by the holder of a note to the indorser that it has been paid will not discharge the indorser if he has not been injured thereby..... 501

Action—Right of.

Bank of Alexandria could sue indorser without first bringing suit against maker.. 617

Where the drawer has no funds in the hands of the drawee, and the bill is not accepted, action may be brought before it is payable 461

A note may be surrendered and canceled, and a recovery had on the original consideration, if the declaration contains a count founded thereon..... 709

—— Pleading.

In an action against the maker, it is not necessary to show a demand at the bank where the note is payable..... 690

Otherwise where action is against indorser 733

An indorsement to the cashier of a bank may be declared on as an indorsement to the bank..... 692

A note payable to a certain person, "cashier, or order," may be declared on by the bank of which he was agent without an indorsement *709

The omission of the payee to show protest, or that it was not required, can only be taken advantage of by special demurrer 461

—— Evidence.

Where the plaintiff bank's notary was the indorser, declarations of his son and deputy as to the giving of notice are inadmissible.. 641

The testimony of a notary that he demanded payment of a note on the third day of grace, and gave notice of nonpayment on the following day, is competent, although he cannot recollect the day of the month.. 685

BILLS OF LADING.

Act Pa. Sept. 24, 1866, making bills of lading negotiable, does not enable a wrongful taker to pass a good title..... 597

One who acquires bill of lading from rightful holder, though through his negligence, can pass good title to innocent purchaser 597

Purchasers of a bill of lading, who have reason to believe that the seller held it as security merely, acquire no better title.... 597

Lay days do not begin to run until the vessel has arrived at her place of discharge, and is ready to be unloaded..... 274

Running in a fog, in calm weather, upon a well-known cape, is proof of unseaworthiness, not rebutted by fact that vessel was new, and well built, rigged and manned, and in charge of a captain of reputed skill and experience.....1097

Injury to millstones properly stowed, where cargo shifted on voyage through vessel being thrown on beam ends, is within exception of dangers of navigation..... 954

Dampness or sweating of hold, the ordinary accompaniment of the voyage, resulting not from tempestuous weather, but from occult atmospheric causes, is not a "peril of the seas."..... 1048

"Dangers of the seas," "dangers of navigation," and "perils of the seas," are convertible terms.....1048

A carrier, shipping goods by a different vessel and at an earlier date than that specified, is liable for loss by shipwreck, notwithstanding exception of "accidents of the seas," etc.....1097

Failure of master to deliver cargo in accordance with terms of bill of lading renders vessel liable for agreed value less freight and charges..... 170

A provision that any extra expense of discharging is to be paid by the consignee makes him liable for such extra expenses as are necessarily incurred..... 954

A custom founded upon a constant departure from the terms of bills of lading used in the trade is not available to control such a bill of lading.....1097

Custom of trade will control where it is doubtful whether injury is caused by excusable perils of seas, or by dangers for which carriers are responsible.....1048

As between original parties, it is competent to show actual condition of goods at time of shipment.....1048

Page

A bill of lading is conclusive to establish the articles shipped unless fraud or mistake is shown..... 323
Burden is on carrier to show that the damage was caused by the danger of the seas 1097, 1191

BONDS.

A penal bond is not enforceable beyond the indemnity..... 660
Recovery on bond with penalty for performance of covenants must be limited to the penalty..... 722

BOTTOMRY: RESPONDENTIA.

Respondentia.

A bond to secure a pre-existing debt is valid 159
No fraud not participated in by the lender can affect the bond..... 159
The delivery to the lender of a bill of lading on the arrival of the vessel is equivalent to a direct consignment to him..... 159
The bond is not void because it was given and the loan made after the vessel sailed on the voyage risked..... 159
Rights of lender as to homeward cargo, how secured—Preference in United States. 159
The words "lost or not lost," omitted, may be supplied by equivalent expressions 159
All the papers connected with the bond and shipment will be construed together...159

CARRIERS.

See. also, "Affreightment;" "Bill of Lading;" "Shipping."

May grant exclusive privilege for transaction of business on its vehicles, and eject a person transacting business without its consent 892
Must take adequate measures to protect cargo against a common and ordinary occurrence, which might have been foreseen.1191
Liable for damage to hemp from oil escaping from casks, not caused by dangers of sea.....1191
Has burden of showing how loss occurred 1091, 1097
Not necessarily exonerated by the taking of the usual care and precautions, and the conveyance of goods in the usual manner..1191
Liable for loss of coin in a trunk with wearing apparel, though it had no notice, where the passenger pays for excess baggage 507
The liability as carrier continues after arrival of goods, notwithstanding restrictions in bill of lading, if the carrier fails to give notice of arrival..... 275
An express company which has limited its responsibility to ordinary care is not liable for a loss caused by the negligence of a railroad which carried its freight.....*650

CHAMPERTY: MAINTENANCE.

A cestui que trust may lawfully dispose of his trust estate, though his title is contested by the trustee..... 495

CHARITABLE USES.

The statutes of mortmain are in force in Maryland, but the statute of charitable uses is not..... 855
Devise in trust, to lay out $200 a year in wood, meal, and clothing, to be distributed among the poor and necessitous widows and orphans within the corporation of Georgetown, is void for uncertainty..... 855

CHARTER PARTIES.

Page

A charter party to load at a certain place is, in contemplation of law, made at such place 539
All representations as to carrying capacity are merged in a charter party stating the vessel to be of certain tons burden.... 483
No action will lie for breach of verbal agreements occurring between the date of a charter party and its signing..... 770
A failure to proceed "with all possible dispatch" from a certain port to the port of loading gives claim for damages, but no right to avoid contract, where object of voyage not wholly frustrated.....*590
Vessel owners not bound to sign unqualified bills of lading for cargo until lawful claim of demurrage, which is a lien thereon, is satisfied; and for delays caused thereby charterer is liable..... 539
Under a guaranty on an assignment of a charter party that the vessel is first class, it is necessary that she be actually classified 351
A delay to classify such vessel, where no damage is set up when she is tendered as ready, for want of a classification, will not excuse performance by the transferee..... 351
"Rainy days," as excepted from lay days for loading a cargo of grain, mean such rainy days as will prevent loading with safety and convenience in the particular port 539
Where master fails to object to port as a "safe port," owners cannot recover for injuries arising from its unsafeness..... 78
A vessel chartered "to load with a full cargo" of bamboo of certain size bundles, at a certain freight per bundle, may recover for a full load of the agreed size where those loaded were much larger..... 78
Where charterer absolutely refuses to accept vessel, owner need not keep her in readiness for delivery during all the lay days 351
Demurrage allowed where shipper caused his own vessel to be loaded before a chartered vessel which was first ready..... 170
A suit on a charter party, signed by the master, to whom the charter money is to be paid, is properly brought in his name alone 483
A suit is properly brought in the name of the managing owners, who signed the charter party in good faith as owners..... 590
Computation of damages on breach of contract by transferee of charter party to perform its conditions..... 351

CHATTEL MORTGAGES.

Unrecorded chattel mortgage valid, as between the parties, although possession not taken 830

CHINESE.

State statute prohibiting employment of Chinese by contractors upon public works held in conflict with the treaty with China, and void..... 472

CLERK OF COURT.

Entitled to commissions upon proceeds of interlocutory sales of prize paid into court.. 241

CLOUD ON TITLE.

Circuit court will entertain bill by one in prior possession, accompanied by title, to remove cloud upon title.....1069
Bill alleging seisin under state grant, and possession thereunder for seven years, is sufficient 1069

Page

A suit brought under the Iowa statute to quiet title is an equity suit..... 560

COLLISION.

Nature of the liability.

Exertions to avoid a collision will not relieve a vessel whose original wrongful maneuver made it inevitable.....1179

"Inevitable accident" means one happening after due care and caution and a proper display of nautical skill..... 564

Rules of navigation.

Steamer departing from statutory regulations assumes all risks of misunderstandings 177

Pilot rules of supervising inspectors are controlled by Act 1864..... 177

The law of the river is established by usage to which navigators must conform.. 930

Navigators on the Ohio river must conform to usage that descending boat must keep in the current, and ascending boat to the right shore..... 930

Descending boat in approaching ascending boat on Ohio river must stop her engines, and float, leaving other boat to choose her course..... 930

General rules of navigation of Mississippi river and the law of Louisiana require descending steamboat to keep the middle of the river, and to allow an ascending boat to choose her course.....1023

Sail vessels meeting.

A vessel sailing free, which mistakes the course of another closehauled, and causes a collision by luffing, will be held liable..... 227

A sail vessel is in fault for coming in stays across the bows of another sail vessel, which she has just passed..... 980

Steam vessel meeting sail vessel.

As between steamer and sail vessel, former is held to greater caution and vigilance, and must adopt necessary precautions to avoid collision..... 454

Sail vessel changing her course will be held in fault if steamer used all reasonable precaution to avoid collision..... 454

Sail vessel is justified in changing her tack when the circumstances render it expedient and proper..... 955

Burden of proof is on steamer to show fault in sail vessel.....1179

Vessels moored, etc.

Wrecking vessels anchored over a wreck, and fastened together, are substantially but one vessel, and should exhibit but one light 232

Steamer lying to or at anchor at night or in fog must take precautions to warn approaching vessels.....1091

Burden is on colliding vessel to show that vessel at anchor was at fault, or the collision inevitable..... 564

As against a vessel colliding with another moored at a pier, and unable to move, it is sufficient to aver that the former ran into the latter..... 4

River and harbor navigation.

Steamer running into harbor or through common thoroughfare must take extra precautions 1091

And in night, or in case of fog, must move with great circumspection, or lay to or anchor, according to danger.....1091

Steamer navigating near piers, in violation of harbor regulations, liable for collision with steamer in proper track, taking due precaution.....1094

Speed: Fogs.

Speed of 16 or 17 knots during dense fog, upon frequented track, grossly improper...1095

Where fog is so dense that vessel cannot avoid another at anchor, it should not proceed 563

Sail vessel becalmed in fog not culpable for omitting to use foghorns or other warnings, which would not have been of any avail. (Reversing 1091).....1095

Lights, signals, etc.

No maritime usage requires merchant vessels constantly to carry lights..... 454

Lookouts.

Want of a lookout will not be excused unless it is clear that it did not contribute to the collision..... 183

Steamer in backing out of slip in maneuvering for landing is negligent in not having a lookout on after deck..... 562

Particular instances of collision.

Between vessels at anchor in a storm...1161

Between steamer backing out of slip, swinging with tide, and ferryboat making adjoining slip..... 562

Between longboat hanging under bark's counter and barge breaking loose from pier by force of ice floe..... 253

Between vessel lying at end of pier, with stern projecting into ferry slip, and ferryboat making landing, carried by tide against it 564

Between ferryboat on foggy morning and brig anchored near track, in violation of ordinance 563

Between towboat and wrecking vessels anchored over wreck, and exhibiting wrong light 232

Between tow and tug of another tow, in the Kills..... 183

Between schooner and steam propeller in Long Island sound..... 266

Procedure.

Where a collision is joint act of two vessels, they may be joined as defendants; but otherwise where distinct acts of collision are charged, without privity..... 102

The appointment of nautical assessors, in collision cases, approved..... 875

Desertion without cause of vessel injured in collision may be considered as tending to show consciousness of fault..... 177

Where evidence leaves it open to reasonable doubt as to which party was in fault, the loss must be sustained by the one upon whom it has fallen.....1058

Rule of damages.

Personal liability of owners of vessel is measured by value of vessel immediately before collision and freight pending, and they are not exempted by its loss..... 875

Expenses of raising injured boat, of repairs, and for loss of time allowed..... 930

Jury not bound to give interest..... 930

Interest, at 6 per cent., on sum paid for repairs, allowed..... 565

To recover demurrage, loss of service and damages by such loss must be shown..... 565

Demurrage will be allowed where the vessel, while undergoing repairs by the owners of the colliding vessel, was offered a charter which the master in good faith refused to accept, because having no knowledge of when she would be ready, though he did not inform the claimants..... 567

Burden is on claimant to show that the making of repairs to the injured vessel was to be in full satisfaction of damages..... 567

Libelant entitled to full amount of damages, though he has received partial indemnity from underwriters..... 255

Owner of vessel sunk in middle of Long Island sound not bound to attempt to save property from the wreck..... 762

Division of damages.

Rule of equal contribution applied where vessels are mutually in fault.....1091, 1095

Page

Where both vessels are in fault, and only one injured, she may recover half damages and full costs 565

Where collision between two tows resulted from negligence of both tugs, and, on libel against one, opportunity given to make the other a party is not embraced, only half damages will be decreed 177, 183

A schooner admitting that she broke adrift from her tug because of her own defective hawser, is alone liable for collision with a vessel moored 4

The report of a commissioner in a case of mutual fault of a certain sum as "due to the libelant" will be amended so as to read "as the damages sustained by libelant." 565

Costs.

Libelant entitled to costs, though his vessel was equally in fault, and damages are apportioned 232, 565

Review.

A decree for damages for collision in favor of several libelants should be for the gross sum, so as to bring it within the jurisdictional amount for appeal 252

CONFISCATION.

Under Act N. Y. 1778, estates forfeited for treason are not sold free from incumbrances. But otherwise as to Act N. Y. 1783 1104

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

Act March 26, 1814, § 14, providing that a majority in value of creditors may discharge an insolvent debtor for seven years, is unconstitutional 744

The admission of an attorney to practice is not a contract, and an act declaring a forfeiture is not invalid as impairing the obligation of a contract 1043

The right of an attorney to practice his profession is his property, and an act (Jan. 24, 1865) declaring a forfeiture of such property for offenses not so punishable when committed is ex post facto and void. 1043

A statute of limitations, relating only to the remedy, and not to the obligation of contracts, though affecting existing rights, is not unconstitutional 811

A law regulating the issue of executions on judgments previously rendered, affects the remedy merely, and is not unconstitutional 707

Unconstitutional law no justification 71

CONTEMPT.

Creditor enforcing execution on state court judgment, in defiance of injunction of bankruptcy court, in which debtor has filed voluntary petition, is guilty of contempt 96

CONTRACTS.

A legislative act adopting certain school text-books, and providing that they shall be exclusively used by the schools, does not constitute a contract with the publishers, nor authorize state agents to contract with them 580

Note made on Sunday not void 911

Confederate treasury notes are unlawful currency, and cannot form a legal consideration to support a contract 678

The addition of the words "in gold," in a contract to pay a certain sum, will be treated as surplusage 483

Nonperformance of stipulation in mining lease to commence operations by a specified time does not work a forfeiture, but gives right of action 810

Page

Where covenants are mutually dependent, neither party can sue without having offered to perform or showing an excuse for for not doing so 768

In such case plaintiff cannot show partial performance under a general averment of performance 768

CONVERSION: TROVER.

Measure of damages for the conversion of a whale 966

COPYRIGHT.

An author is one who, by his own intellectual labor, produces an arrangement or compilation new in itself 195

A publication of revised rules of court is not a new edition of a previous publication of the rules before revision 759

Sale of book prior to deposit of copy of title-page will defeat copyright, as actual publication is presumed from a sale 478

Deposit of title-page, publication of notice, and delivery of copy of book, as provided by law, (Feb. 3, 1831,) are indispensable conditions 478

Where title-page was deposited in 1846, a notice stating entry as 1847 is fatal 478

A compiler of books must not copy results of another compiler's labor, but must resort to original sources of information 759

In printing court rules, it is an infringement to copy, from an annotated edition of such rules, citation of authorities contained in such annotations 759

Case, and not trespass, is the proper form of remedy to recover damages for violation of copyright 195

On motion for injunction, the affidavit of defendant is competent evidence against the oath of plaintiffs in the bill 478

Where an infringement is palpable, a provisional injunction will not be refused if not attended with serious injury 759

CORPORATIONS.

Due organization, in compliance with the statute, will be presumed 709

Where the charter reserves unconditional power to alter or repeal, the legislature may act arbitrarily; but otherwise where reservation is made for "misuse or abuse." 570

A contract entered into with the incorporators for the company before its incorporation, but not perfected until afterwards, is in effect a contract with the company 709

Change in charter, from "life and accident" insurance company to "fire, marine, and inland insurance," discharges nonassenting subscribers to stock 26

Forfeiture of stock for nonpayment of call defeats right to recover on note for previous unpaid assessment 26

A by-law prohibiting a transfer of stock by one indebted to the corporation is not in violation of the Missouri law 310

An unpaid subscription for which the subscriber's notes have been taken is a "debt," within the meaning of the by-law 310

The officers of a corporation cannot, as against creditors, relieve a subscriber from his unpaid subscription 310

Preferred stock certificates issued by a railroad company, construed as to the conflicting rights of holders of common and preferred stock to net earnings 371

Officer of corporation making transfer of stock, under authority of an assignment, acts as agent of assignor, and his laches are not chargeable to corporation 310

A decree against stockholders for a pro rata contribution to pay the debts of the company is several, and action will lie thereon against one stockholder 624

Page

Bill by stockholders to impeach judgment against corporation dismissed without prejudice 95
Stockholders may come in as parties to suit against company to be relieved from fraud perpetrated by officers of company in transaction in question.....1079
Individual bankruptcy of a stockholder and officer of a corporation does not incapacitate him to act as such, though by-laws require officers to be stockholders..... 187
Acceptance of an official bond of a bank officer can only be proven by the bank's record of the proceedings..... 691
Corporation may sue under its corporate name and style, and not necessarily by attorney 728

COSTS.

Where both parties except to commissioners' report in a collision case..... 565
Not allowed for illegible depositions..... 253
Not allowed if action is dismissed for want of jurisdiction..... 648
Not awarded on affirmance where both parties appeal..... 183

COURTS.

In general.

Government departments or agents, seeking to execute a law in an unconstitutional manner, as by taking private property for public use without making compensation as provided by law, may be restrained..... 245

Judicial power of United States.

A state legislature cannot suspend process in the federal courts as to its citizens.. 306
Jurisdiction of federal courts not derived from common law..... 410

Comparative authority of federal and state courts: Process.

There is no concurrent jurisdiction in rem in admiralty cases between the courts of the United States and of the several states 10
The admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the federal courts is exclusive of the state courts save as to the common-law remedy, which is by action, and not by proceeding in rem..... 10
An execution issued out of a state court is a lien, from its delivery to the sheriff, on surplus proceeds in a marshal's hands under prior process from the federal court...1059

Federal courts—Jurisdiction in general.

Federal court will retain jurisdiction of action, once acquired, to give remedy to all intervening and conflicting rights..... 957 —— Grounds of jurisdiction.

Citizenship of one party in District of Columbia cannot create a case of diverse citizenship 886
A corporation is not within the meaning of the constitutional provision giving jurisdiction in cases of diversity of citizenship..*692
A corporation cannot sue in the circuit court on the ground of diversity of citizenship, if any member is a citizen of the state with defendant..... 648
The words "civil suit," as used in section 11 of the judiciary act, do not embrace admiralty proceedings, and a libel may be filed against a foreign corporation, and property within the district attached to compel appearance .....76; contra, 80
Conveyances made merely for the purpose of giving federal courts jurisdiction are ineffectual for that purpose..... 886
The rule that federal courts have no jurisdiction of controversies between citizens of the same states does not apply to a suit suit by an assignee in bankruptcy..... 112
A creditor's bill, filed to obtain satisfaction of a judgment at law rendered in the same court, is not an original action, irrespective of parties..... 298
A mere "declaration of intention" by an alien to become a citizen is not sufficient to prevent his being a "foreign citizen or subject" within the constitutional provision giving jurisdiction to the federal courts.. 423
The citizenship of a person not served with process, who is a joint promisor, must appear in the declaration..... 784
If a joint promisor, not served with process, be a citizen of the same state with plaintiff, the court has no jurisdiction..... 784
The circuit court has jurisdiction of an action of debt on a judgment obtained in a state court by a citizen of another state... 905
The circuit court has jurisdiction of a bill in equity by a judgment creditor against citizens of different states, to set aside conveyances by the judgment debtor as in fraud of creditors, although the ground of the judgment was a negotiable chose in action, on which a suit could not have been maintained in such court.....1143
Union Pacific Railroad Company, under its charter, may sue and be sued in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Nebraska, without reference to citizenship 1043
An averment of citizenship equivalent in import to a direct allegation is sufficient to give jurisdiction.....1071

—— Circuit courts.

Have no jurisdiction except such as is expressly granted by congress..... 728
Circuit court of district other than that of bankruptcy proceedings has jurisdiction of cross bill by assignee to redeem mortgage property of which it is not deprived by sale of interest by assignee pendente lite 832
The concurrent jurisdiction conferred on the circuit court by the bankrupt act (1867, § 2) does not include an action to collect a simple debt—Its scope..... 314

—— District courts.

Have original jurisdiction of all cases and controversies between third persons and an assignee in bankruptcy, as such..... 314 —— Administration of state laws and decisions.

Decision of state court as to character of negotiable paper does not constitute a rule of decision for federal courts..... 229
Circuit court, in aid of its general chancery powers, may enforce right given by state law.....1069
Such court may remove a cloud on title as defined by state laws.....1069
A state court's construction of a state statute forms a rule of decision for the federal court.....707, 811
State laws in force prior to Dec. 1, 1873, are rules of decision in federal courts as to the competency of witnesses. (Rev. St. § 858.) 1120

—— Procedure.

Where there are several defendants residing in different districts of same state. (Act May 4, 1858.)..... 280
Rule of state court requiring term notice, not adopted by federal court, is not obligatory on it.....1064
The examination of an adverse party as a witness, before trial, as provided by state law, not followed by federal court.....1178

Territorial courts.

Causes of a federal character pending in supreme court of territory of Colorado at time of admission as state may be heard and decided in federal courts.....1025

Local courts.

Levy of a foreign attachment (in Ohio) gives jurisdiction..... 739

Page

The court of common pleas in Ohio is a court of general jurisdiction..... 739
Suit for specific performance of contract for sale of land in District of Columbia, instituted in state court prior to Act Feb. 27, 1801, may thereafter proceed to final decree 737
If verdict reduced below $20 by account in bar in circuit court of District of Columbia, there must be judgment of non pros...1111

COVENANTS.

Of title, not implied in a deed without covenants 518
No action lies against grantor on a deed without covenants..... 518

CREDITOR'S SUIT.

Cannot be maintained by general creditor to set aside a conveyance, unless he has a lien on the property, or has reduced his claim to judgment..... 807
Will be dismissed if it is apparent that there was no bona fide attempt made by the officer to find property to satisfy the judgment 1010
Sustained though defendant had property subject to levy, where it was mortgaged and his affairs complicated.....1010
Marshal's return of execution nulla bona is a sufficient basis for a creditor's bill, the burden of showing it to be false being on defendant 1010
Such falsity may be shown by establishing that the debtor had property liable to execution, and which could have been levied on, though insufficient to pay the debt..1010
The presumption in favor of the truth of the marshal's return of nulla bona is not overcome by the fact that he returned the process on the day he received it.....1010
A court of equity may control the custody of notes assigned as security so as to prevent their being negotiated, to the detriment of the judgment debtor of the owner 298
On bill by judgment creditor to set aside conveyance as fraudulent, the court will look into the original consideration, and give the creditor only what appears due him 1143

CRIMES.

A person who encourages, countenances, and supports another in a murder is an accessary 465

CURTESY.

Seisin during coverture must be shown, to entitle husband to claim as tenant by curtesy. Exceptions..... 903
Entry on wild land not necessary, to enable the husband to claim as tenant by the curtesy 903

CUSTOMS-DUTIES.

Customs laws.

Terms of tariff act must be construed according to commercial usage and understanding, which is a question for the jury.. 325
Specific description in act of 1846 must prevail over commercial designation known at time of passage..... 382

Rates of duty.

Coral cut into form of a cameo, but not set. (Act 1846, amended 1857)..... 382
"A manufacture of hemp" does not include "hemp carpeting" so called in the trade, which, in fact, contains no hemp...1054

Invoice: Appraisal.

Act Aug. 30, 1842, § 17, authorizes penalty of 50 per cent. for undervaluation of any goods other than those purchased.... 763

Page

Secretary of the treasury has no power to fix a chemical analysis of Peruvian bark as the only test of dutiable value..... 971
Ad valorem duties are paid on the quantity actually imported, (Act 1846,) and, where such quantity is measured by weight, a loss in weight will proportionally diminish duties, though value is not diminished.... 235
Expense of salt sacks is embraced in "all costs," and is to be added to market value of salt 837
Market value of sugars transported from Cuba to Halifax, and thence imported, how ascertained 840
In arriving at market value at port of exportation, purchaser can only be required to adopt methods usually adopted by merchants in making purchases..... 971
Rule for ascertaining ad valorem dutiable value of merchandise procured by purchase prescribed by Act 1842, § 16, not repealed by Act 1846..... 837
Values of imported goods subject to specific duties are ascertained in the same manner as those subject to ad valorem duties. (Act 1820) 369
The determination of appraisers as to the market value in the foreign markets of an importation subject to ad valorem duties (Acts 1823, 1851) is conclusive..... 369
Otherwise as to goods subject to specific duties 369
The principal appraisers must act in person. An appraisal on certificate of a deputy is void. (Acts 1842, 1846)..... 816
Merchant appraisers need not act in presence of importer..... 595
Act March 3, 1851, § 3, in regard to reappraisals, applies to goods imported by their manufacturer..... 763

Bonding: Warehousing.

Right of collector to enforce payment of half fees on entry and appraisal of goods in bond and storage in private warehouses 87
On the warehousing and re-exporting of imported goods the importer is not entitled to recover back amount of the penalty paid because of an undervaluation..... 971

Payment: Protest: Appeal.

Protest alleging that appraisers were prejudiced and incompetent, but failing to particularize, is ineffectual..... 595
Protest claiming article as nonenumerated. when in fact it was enumerated, though wrongly classed, is insufficient.....1054
Specific protest, which does not refer. to or affirm a prior prospective protest, must be regarded as evidence of abandonment of all grounds of objection.....1054
Sufficiency of prospective protest.....1054
Addition at end of protest, "and hereby protest on all future entries of the same goods," is ineffectual as a prospective protest to aid an insufficient specific protest..1054
Official appraisers. even after appeal taken, have right to production of all documents connected with importation..... 971
Importers, by withdrawing their appeal to the merchant appraisers, and refusing to produce the documents connected with the importation as called for by the official appraisers, fix the correctness of the appraisement 971

Collection officers.

Jurisdiction of surveyor for port of Eastport includes district of Passamaquoddy... 269
Commissions of collector under Act 1820..1020

DAMAGES.

In estimating damages for personal injuries caused by negligence, injury done, pain endured, time lost, and expense incurred will be considered.....1180

Page

Suffering or wounded feelings of parent not considered in estimating damages for loss of child, but only actual pecuniary loss 827

Exemplary damages awarded against railway company for accident happening in consequence of gross negligence or drunkenness of its servants.....1110

Special damages, not specially pleaded, and not necessarily implied, cannot be recovered, although evidence thereof has been given without objection..... 988

If amount of damages warranted by evidence, court will not inquire how jury reached result.....1087

DEATH BY WRONGFUL ACT.

Under Ill. Act, Feb. 12, 1853, action can be maintained for benefit of next of kin, though they had no legal claim on deceased for support. It is not necessary to allege or prove actual pecuniary loss.....934, 935

In such cases there is no fixed measure of damages, but it is a question for the jury 934

What circumstances the jury may consider 935

A recovery in a former action for medical attendance, expenses, loss of service and time before the death of a child, does not affect the damages recoverable under the statute 827

DEBT (ACTION OF.)

Will not lie on a decree for an unascertained contribution from stockholders to pay the debts of the company..... 624

DEBTOR AND CREDITOR.

A debt is discharged by a tender and acceptance of a less sum in full satisfaction.. 670

A transfer of specific property to trustees for the use of creditors, under a mutual agreement that the property shall be received in full satisfaction and discharge of their several demands, constitutes a valid accord and satisfaction..... 977

Parties who sign composition deeds must do so in good faith.....1132

Purchaser of lands subject to judgment lien cannot require officer to marshal debtor's lands in order of attaching of the lien.. 957

DEDICATION.

Of street for public uses includes its use as a wharf, if running to or bounded on navigable water..... 886

Selling building lots by map defining abutting street, not opened, is a dedication of the street for public use, but the fee simple does not pass to the city..... 886

The public square in Council Bluffs held to be dedicated to the public by the platting and acknowledgment thereof, and acts in pais by the dedicator.....1082

A street dedicated to a city vests in the public, subject to its regulation and improvement by the corporation, and cannot be treated or used as private property by that body..... 771

DEEDS.

Of bargain and sale by a person not in possession is void..... 686

Of release, if it cannot take effect as a release, may be construed in furtherance of the intention of the parties as a bargain and sale..... 495

In construing, effect is to be given to every expression, if it can reasonably be done.. 771

Page

Ambiguity requires deed to be construed most strongly against grantor..... 771

Mortgagee in good faith from grantee in deed deposited in escrow, and recorded by depositary without notice to grantor, will be protected..... 368

Deed absolute may be shown to be a mortgage.. 660

DEPOSITIONS.

Notice at Washington on Dec. 31, of taking of deposition in Baltimore on Jan. 2, is not reasonable 908

Where all parties reside in the place, a notice to take depositions on following day is not too short..... 101

Notice of taking, directed to the party, may be served on his attorney..... 907

Residence of adverse party sufficiently averred by certificate of magistrate that it appears to him that he resides more than 100 miles from place of caption..... 763

Where an issue is joined between plaintiff and garnishee, depositions must be entitled in the garnishee's name..... 471

Depositions sworn to before justice of peace, if taken under rule of court, may be read..... 583

A deposition, though merely to prove a pedigree, if taken by others than those named in the commission, cannot be read.. 583

It must be shown that witness whose deposition was taken de bene esse was served with subpoena, and is unable to attend..... 583

The deposition of a deceased witness as to pedigree may be read, though taken in another cause between other parties, and on a different subject..... 583

A deposition, after having been read, may be waived and withdrawn by party offering it..... 753

When filed for three years, motion to suppress for irregularities is too late..... 649

A suppression of answers to questions in a deposition warrants finding that they were prejudicial.....1183

DESCENT: DISTRIBUTION.

Heirs of deceased debtor not permitted to have rents and profits of realty until the sale to pay debts..... 728

DISCONTINUANCE.

An attachment by way of execution is discontinued if there is no appearance at the return term..... 747

DISCOVERY: INSPECTION.

Discovery will not be granted in aid of a suit at law not in the proper form of remedy..... 195

On bill for infringement of copyright, waiving forfeiture, discovery may be compelled in aid of recovery of damages..... 195

Bill does not lie if plaintiff has knowledge or means of proof, or the same means as defendant..... 439

Defendant cannot be compelled to make discovery to a bill seeking to enforce penalties and forfeitures..... 195

If relief not incidental to discovery, bill does not give power to make final decree where answer discloses nothing, or denies all equity 439

DISMISSAL: NONSUIT.

Where plaintiff cannot sustain his bill, it must be dismissed at his costs, regardless of grounds of equity..... 902

Page

Want of proper averments in declaration cannot be made ground of nonsuit..... 987

EASEMENT.

In determining the right to an easement of way acquired by user, the fact of user and susceptibility to such use must appear..... 771

Presumption of grant to public by uninterrupted use of way for convenience requires much shorter time than in case of use by individual..... 771

Such presumption may be repelled by showing owner's assertion of right, and denial of use assumed by public..... 771

The right of city inhabitants to access to a river over town proprietors' lands is a mere right of way..... 771

By accepting conveyance without objection, and with knowledge that a street through the demised premises had been dedicated, grantee takes subject to the easement thereof..... 771

EJECTMENT.

Title acquired after date of demise cannot sustain the action.....1085

A lease for the sole purpose of mining vests a corporeal interest sufficient to sustain ejectment..... 810

Joinder of parties holding separate and distinct possessions.....1060

Landlord not permitted to defend alone in ejectment without consent of plaintiff in Pennsylvania 1188

No person can claim privileges of an occupant (Act Tenn. 1806) unless he has actually settled on land claimed.....1005

When defendant allowed to take possession of prior occupant to his own to bar action by length of possession..... 781

Possession held to pass under conveyance in like manner as if grantee had actually entered.....1060

A presumption of title may arise from long possession under circumstances favorable to such presumption, but may be rebutted by positive proof..... 429

An equitable claim, however strong, cannot be set up to defeat the legal title.... 429

One seeking to invalidate or avoid a deed for adverse possession must impeach it... 903

Defendant who has no title cannot question conduct of trustee in conveying to plaintiff.....1060

Death of plaintiff's lessor does not abate..1085

A demise in the name of one deceased will be stricken out on motion.....1085

It is sufficient to describe the locus in quo sufficiently to acquaint defendant with knowledge of what is claimed, and to enable him to prepare his defense..... 771

Municipal corporation must sustain its title by proof of as high an order as would be necessary by an individual..... 771

The truth of recitals in deeds, offered only to show the transmission of the legal title, need not be proved aliunde..... 686

Plaintiff may recover mesne profits, on giving notice that he means to proceed for them.....1032

Plaintiff must prove the length of defendant's enjoyment of the premises, and their value..... 771

EMINENT DOMAIN.

See, also, "Waters."

Land may be taken for a railroad, under legislative authority, upon just compensation being made..... 574

Private property cannot be taken for public use until compensation is actually made. A provision for ascertaining and making compensation afterwards is not sufficient..... 245

Congress has no power to authorize a telegraph company to construct its line over private property without making compensation..... 176

Act Md. 1785, c. 49, respecting taking of land for private ways, is valid..... 831

Such act is in force in the county of Washington, D. C..... 831

Authority to construct and repair railway, and take materials therefor, does not give right to divert waters for use of engines..... 784

Authority to take materials or divert water for use of railroad from lands contiguous to, adjoining, or near the railroad, is not limited to lands bounding the road.... 784

Four days' notice of meeting of jury to fix damages is sufficient..... 574

EQUITY.

Jurisdiction.

Will not entertain jurisdiction if plaintiff has a plain, adequate, and complete remedy at law..... 439

One threatened with proceedings under a void act has an adequate remedy at law.. 472

Has no cognizance of executed trusts enforceable at law..... 439

An executed trust cannot be revived by nonexecution of trust arising from subsequent agreement relating to same subject.. 439

Has power to enjoin state officers from acting under a law impairing the obligation of a contract made with the state.... 580

Will not interfere to restrain an act done under color of authority conferred by law, until the right is determined at law..... 105

Will not entertain jurisdiction of defenses available in another court in prior case..... 486

An impediment to navigation by a bridge, causing sail vessels to strike their masts, may be adequately compensated in damages, and equity will not interfere..... 105

A suit may be brought to give effect to a decree where the conditions of the original decree are not appropriate to the powers of a court at law..... 624

Has jurisdiction of suit to set aside fraudulent conveyances by a judgment debtor 1143

There cannot be concurrent jurisdiction at law and in equity where the right and remedy are the same, but equity may proceed in aid of the remedy at law..... 439

The judiciary act of 1798, § 16, settles the law as to cases of equity jurisdiction in the nature of an exception to its exercise..... 439

Jurisprudence.

The vendee, coming into equity to obtain the legal title of a lot upon which the purchase money has been fully paid, must pay the balance due the vendor upon other lots.. 630

Courts of equity act upon the analogy of the limitations at law, and will refuse to interfere where there has been gross laches, and in some cases even short of the statutory period..... 331

In the case of concealed fraud, complainant must set forth and prove the particularities of the discovery..... 331

Staleness of demand may be relied on at hearing, though not presented by pleadings..... 439

Bill will be dismissed where answer positively denying matters charged is not overcome by testimony of two opposing witnesses, or of one witness corroborated by facts and circumstances..... 331

Page

Rule that transfers between persons occupying fiduciary relations will be carefully scrutinized applied..... 193
Changes since the Revolution in rules and principles in English chancery not followed by federal courts..... 439

EVIDENCE.

Presumptions.

The grantor of land is presumed to be alive until the contrary appear.....1032

Best and secondary.

Parol evidence cannot be given of contents of letter without previous notice to produce 747
A note paid by a renewal note, and given up to the maker, may be proved by the former holder by parol..... 749
The record copies of deeds are admissible without proving execution or loss of originals 686

Documentary.

Signature and seal must be sufficiently legible and distinct to be read and distinguished to entitle paper to respect as official document..... 121
The record in other suits between defendant and other plaintiffs cannot be read in evidence by plaintiff..... 614
A demurrer whereby a certain fact is considered in law as admitted is not evidence of the fact in another cause between the same parties.....215, 216
A deed recorded under a decree in chancery may be adduced in a subsequent action and identified, though it did not remain on file in the suit..... 686
A genealogical table, certified under the seal of foreign office, is not evidence..... 583
The exemplification of the record of a mortgage is sufficient evidence of the existence of the mortgage and the debt due thereon 1118
Exemplification of record of copy of deed not evidence..... 781

Parol, etc., affecting writings.

Parol evidence not admissible to explain writing unless its expressions are shown to be equivocal..... 215
The meaning of "rainy day" in charter party may be shown by surrounding circumstances, including usage of port or trade 539
Evidence is admissible to show that a cashier, in taking a note running to himself as "cashier," was acting as an agent of a certain bank..... 663
Parol evidence is inadmissible to vary the obligation of the parties in a contract under seal..... 660
The official character of the certifying officer, not appearing on the deed, may be proved by parol..... 686
A father and son had the same name but different residences. A patent for land bought with the father's money named the son as grantee. Held, that parol evidence was inadmissible to show mistake..... 300

Declarations; admissions.

Declarations made by surveyor when laying off town are incompetent to impeach map of survey adopted by proprietors.... 771
Acts and admissions of one of several joint contractors or promisors are admissible against all..... 709

Hearsay.

Is admissible for the purpose of proving boundaries, ancient landmarks, pedigree, and prescription 1175

Competency: Relevancy: Materiality.

The belief of a witness, together with the facts upon which it is founded, is admissible 642

Page

A memorandum by a bank's note clerk, since deceased, that he had delivered a certain notice, is admissible in favor of the bank 692

Weight and sufficiency.

In case of conflicting testimony, the witnesses having best means of knowledge are to be credited..... 266

EXECUTION.

Court will not order it to be issued in other than the name appearing in the judgment, though through mistake of the clerk there is an obvious misnomer..... 718
Is a lien (in Colorado) on the debtor's property from the time it is delivered to the sheriff to be executed..... 978
Is not levied so as to give a lien against purchasers or creditors if the property is permitted to remain with the debtor..... 858
To make levy effectual, property seized should be specially designated in return or by reference to a schedule accompanying it 858
The effect of a seizure is to change the property in the goods, and vest it in the sheriff 858
Marshal is not bound to hold execution for full sixty days.....1010
Issued more than a year and a day after judgment not revived by sci. fa., held void.. 278
Motion allowed to take money out of court levied to satisfy a judgment, to pay a prior judgment..... 278
Parties claiming a superior lien on property levied upon by a marshal may proceed by intervention, and ask judgment against the debtor..... 596
The deed of the auditors (in Ohio) may be made to the purchaser at the sale, or to his order 739
The creditor has a remedy by action against the officer for irregularities in proceeding under the execution..... 278

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS.

The executive power cannot be revised and corrected by the judicial..... 71

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS.

An executor in a will not named as trustee therein with others to whom land is devised in trust has no power to convey the land 1172
Administrator is not bound to pay over money to creditor of deceased partner of his intestate, and cannot set up such payment in defense of action by representatives 874
Administrator de bonis non cannot be charged as such with property fraudulently conveyed to him by deceased..... 316
Administrator de bonis non is liable to banker for money credited by mistake to the intestate, and paid to the original administrator 804
Executor de son tort is liable for value of goods taken and used.....1091
The ascertainment of assets must precede a judgment against an executor or administrator for a debt of his decedent..... 748
The auditor's report as to the amount due from an intestate is prima facie correct, and admissible in evidence..... 742
Executors appointed in New York under probate of will there not authorized to maintain actions for collection of assets of estate of deceased in California..... 977
The objection that plaintiffs are foreign executors may be taken at the hearing,

Page

where it does not appear on the face of the complaint 977
Jurisdiction and procedure of orphans' court of Alexandria county in fixing compensation of executors..... 114
Accusations falsifying probate accounts for fraud must be specific, especially after parties implicated are dead..... 331
In a suit against an administrator for an account, the commissioner to whom it is referred cannot admit an administration account settled in another jurisdiction without knowledge of plaintiff.....316

FALSE IMPRISONMENT.

The detention of a person arrested in the Indian country beyond the time allowed by law for removal is a false imprisonment.... 770

Frauds (Statute of.)

See "Sales."

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES.

See, also, "Bankruptcy."

The joint possession by husband and wife of property conveyed to her separate use is no evidence of fraud..... 702
The right in a chattel under a contract which does not give a right to possession is no badge of fraud..... 159
Power reserved in trust deed to dispose of trust property with consent of trustee, upon substituting an equivalent, is not evidence of fraud..... 702
A voluntary conveyance to wife or children by solvent grantor, not impeachable by subsequent creditors, if not actually fraudulent 807
Such deed may become fraudulent by concealment from the public, and credit by reason of supposed ownership..... 986
Postnuptial deed founded on release of dower in husband's lands and mortgage to his creditors of lands held in trust for the wife's separate use, is not voluntary..... 702
Failure of a first incumbrancer to give notice after a second incumbrancer has advanced his money is no evidence of fraud.. 702
A bona fide purchaser without notice from a grantee, to whom property has been conveyed to defraud creditors, is entitled to hold against grantor's creditors.....1143
The donee of slaves is liable to the creditors of the insolvent donor only for the slaves and their issue living at the time of the demand therefor, and their hire from such time, and the proceeds of sales by him..... 316
A conveyance made with intent to defraud creditors, not permitted to stand as security for advances made to the grantor on account of such conveyance.....1143

GRANTS.

Law implies a grant of those things without which the principal subject cannot be enjoyed, as incident thereto..... 771
The oldest grant is conclusive evidence of title at law, except in the single case of an elder legal entry.....1005

GUARDIAN AND WARD.

The court, on motion, will appoint a guardian ad litem for infant defendant.... 770

HABEAS CORPUS.

A commissioner has no power, by habeas corpus, to bring before him a committed person, for the purpose of giving his deposition to be used in a pending cause..... 851

HOMESTEAD.

See, also, "Bankruptcy."

Head of family need not be sole owner of fee; it is sufficient that he has an interest subject to execution sale. (Neb. Code, § 525) 963
A widow having charge of household and domestic affairs in the home of her brother, and making it her home, is a part of his family 367
A family engaged to live in a farm house with the owner, and work the farm on shares, subject to his management and control, are not a part of his family..... 367
Occupation by wife and family is equivalent to occupation by husband..... 963
Right to homestead exemption, held not abandoned by three years' residence in another place..... 367

HOMICIDE.

A person under reasonable apprehension of danger of life or great bodily harm, not arising out of his own act, has the right, in self defense, to kill the aggressor..... 465

INJUNCTION.

Granted to stay execution upon a judgment obtained against a garnishee by surprise 462
Granted to restrain an entry on land without authority of law to divert a stream thereon 784
Granted to restrain action on negotiable instrument by payee where note was given under agreement that it should be paid in services which maker has always been ready to perform..... 28
Will not issue to restrain a completed act 784
Not granted to restrain patentee from bringing suits on his patent before the patent is adjudged invalid..... 5
Temporary injunction against collection of taxes under state authority, granted, with leave to bring question, before full bench 365
On motion for preliminary injunction, court will not decide fairly disputable questions of law and fact.....391, 784
Complainants who delay until the substance of an injury is completed forfeit right to preliminary injunction..... 784

INNKEEPERS.

Whether a house is an inn or a boarding house is determined by the right of the proprietor to select his guests.....1111

INSOLVENCY.

A discharge of a debt under the laws of the state where contracted is good everywhere 306
A discharge under a state insolvent law does not bar a debt contracted in another state with a citizen there..... 756

INSURANCE.

Marine insurance.

Master who, to prevent loss, buys in cargo at a public sale after abandonment, does not become owner so as to have an insurable interest..... 817
Under an order to insure a given sum, agent cannot insure to cover premium in same policy with that to cover value..... 984

Page

A misrepresentation as to time of sailing, if material to the risk, avoids the policy...1058

Traders in belligerent country cannot recover on policy made with warranty of neutrality, where belligerent character not disclosed 1039

Warranty of American property held to extend to all cargo put on board on which policy is to attach.....1065

In an action against insurers, invoice on board at time of capture as enemy's property, and deposition of mate, competent evidence for defendant.....279

Plaintiff, to recover under an open policy, must prove his interest and the value of the property 1109

Bill of lading of outward cargo no proof of interest in homeward cargo.....1109

Interest in a return cargo cannot be proved by the certificate of a supercargo, since deceased, or by his declarations.....1109

Fire insurance.

Trustee appointed in place of one named in will, who declines to serve, has insurable interest 306

There is no privity of contract between consignor of goods shipped to be sold on commission and an insurance company with which the consignees for their own benefit insure their interest to the full value of the goods *674

Charging insurance brokers with a premium due, though not paid, renders company liable, notwithstanding condition that policy shall not be in force until premium is actually paid..... 585

Keeping saltpetre on hand to cure meat is not within prohibition of storing or vending it 1087

The storing or selling of an inconsiderable quantity of saltpetre is not within prohibition of storing or vending. But a keg of saltpetre is a considerable quantity.....1087

The conditions annexed to the policy, in order to bind insured, must be brought to his attention at or before the time of the contract of insurance.....1007

The consent of the insurer to a change of ownership in the insured property must be evidenced in the manner provided in the contract 1021

A consent to an indorsement on a policy, "payable in the case of loss to" a third person, is not a consent to change of ownership to such person, where such change was not known at the time.....1021

Whether goods embraced in a stock insured as "dry goods" were or were not "dry goods" is for the jury.....1007

An instruction that the arson charged against owner in defense of action or policy need not be proved beyond a reasonable doubt is not necessary where court correctly charges as to measure of proof required..1087

Life insurance.

Legal title to policy obtained by husband on his life for benefit of his wife is in her..1166

Accident insurance.

Death from inadvertent taking of overdose of opium prescribed by physician is not caused by external, violent, and accidental means, but by medical treatment, within exception of accident policy.....1077

Insurance agents.

Where the insurer contracts by and through the solicitor of insurance, a clause in the policy declaring that persons acting as solicitors are agents of the insured and not of the insurer, is invalid.....1007

Local agent of foreign insurance company has power to bind company by parol contract to renew policy with one having no knowledge of restrictions on his authority 1038

INTEREST.

Page

An account made up of principal and interest, when settled, bears interest on the aggregate balance 407

Is recoverable on bond with penalty only from commencement of suit, where no demand or acknowledgment is made..... 722

A state statute allowing interest on unpaid installments of interest has reference to installments due by contract, and does not apply to interest accruing by operation of law..... 956

Accrues by operation of law after maturity of note providing only for semiannual installments of interest..... 956

INTERNAL REVENUE.

Assessor has power to make a supplementary assessment, increasing amount of distiller's tax..... 825

In a suit to recover back taxes paid on a reassessment, for error in the first assessment, the record of reassessment is not evidence of the error..... 825

JUDGMENT: DECREE.

Rendition and entry.

Bank of Alexandria is entitled to judgment at the first term..... 600

A defendant arrested to appear at next term cannot come in and confess judgment before such term..... 37

Where the record is destroyed after verdict, plaintiff after seven years allowed to file transcript of record in his possession, and enter judgment thereon..... 517

Where defendant dies after verdict and before judgment, his personal representative must be made a party by direct proceedings 517

Operation and effect.

The regularity of proceedings under which a vessel was sold cannot be inquired into in trover in another district court for her possession 818

A judgment of a court of general jurisdiction, having cognizance of the case, however erroneous, will protect purchasers thereunder 739

Where a bill is dismissed on motion of complainant before testimony taken is published, and without a hearing on the merits, the record is no bar to another suit..... 327

New parties to a second suit, not privy to the parties in the first suit, cannot introduce the former judgment in their favor, though seeking to enforce the same rights. Exceptions 791

A judgment against a bank in a suit upon its teller's bond, is no bar to an action for money had and received by him for its use 701

A judgment without process is not a lien on personalty 325

The lien on lands created by a judgment depends upon the right to sue out an elegit 743

A judgment lien operates only upon such property as is subject to levy and sale under legal process issued for its payment... 325

A judgment lien does not operate upon property at the time in possession of the sheriff under attachments..... 325

The lien of a judgment on which execution is stayed dates only from the time when execution may be sued out..... 743

A judgment rendered in a federal court is a lien from its date on all lands of defendant within the district, and (in Indiana) on those subsequently acquired from such time 957

A judgment lien takes effect from the first day of the term, and is prior to the lien of a mortgage executed before such

Page
day, and recorded on a later day, when the judgment was entered..... 626
A judgment upon a verdict, subject to the opinion of the court upon a case stated, does not relate back to the date of the verdict as against an intermediate judgment.. 684
If execution is not issued and levied within a year, the judgment is no lien as against a subsequent judgment, as to which execution was duly issued and levied..... 707

Relief against: Opening: Vacating.

A judgment or order finally disposing of a case cannot be reviewed at a subsequent term on motion, but errors therein may be corrected 596
On motion of special bail on return of sci. fa., court will set aside original judgment against the principal, for irregularity, and all subsequent proceedings..... 217
Money paid on an erroneous judgment, may after reversal be recovered back in an action for money had and received. Such recovery may be had though a venire de novo is awarded.....745, 747

Of different jurisdictions.

The federal court in a suit by an assignee in bankruptcy will not examine into the validity of a judgment confessed by the bankrupt in a state court whose jurisdiction is not denied..... 112

Actions on judgments.

Fraud in the recovery of a judgment in another state cannot be pleaded in an action thereon unless such defense could be made in the courts of such state..... 906

JUDICIAL SALE.

Court will set sale aside, if not fairly made 617

LANDLORD AND TENANT.

One holding over under a written lease is bound for the rent therein stipulated... 476
Landlord evicting tenant from part of premises cannot distrain for rent..... 465
Where rent is payable quarterly, plaintiff cannot recover for a quarter unexpired at the time of an eviction..... 637
The same principle applies where the rent is payable yearly..... 637
Slave of third person, hired to lodger, cannot be distrained for rent due by boarding-house keeper.....1111

LIBEL: SLANDER.

Words not in themselves importing anything injurious may be shown, by other matter alleged, to have been spoken with intent to affect plaintiff's credit and standing as a merchant.....1181
Access by the clerks generally of a mercantile agency to books of mercantile reports prevents them from being privileged..1183
Communications made by a mercantile agency, through its clerks and agents, to its customers as to the pecuniary ability and standing of merchants are not privileged.....1187
It is no justification, that defendant received his information from his slave, as no action will lie against a slave..... 105
Malice inferred from persistency in keeping libelous matter on defendant's mercantile books after notice of its falsity.....1183
An innuendo cannot extend the sense of the words spoken beyond their usual and natural import except by connecting them with other matter alleged.....1181
The truth of the publication, when relied on either in bar or mitigation, must be specially pleaded..... 943
Page
Plea in justification must state the substantial facts which constitute the elements of the charge, when it is general..... 943
Irrelevant matter in a plea of justification will not vitiate it, even on special demurrer 943
Plaintiff, while not required to prove the exact words used, must show them in substance and effect.....1183
Standing publication of a libel contained in book of mercantile reports is shown by proof that the books were not in defendant's exclusive possession, but accessible to his clerks.....1183
Degree of proof required where the truth is set up in justification of a charge of crime *465
Although words injurious to a man in his trade are actionable per se, plaintiff must prove the special damages claimed.....1183
Plaintiffs suing as a partnership, for injuries to their business by libelous mercantile reports, cannot have damages for individual libel unless it affected the business of the firm.....1183
General current reports as to the truth of libelous matter may be considered in mitigation of damages.....1183

LIMITATION OF ACTIONS.

Nature and operation of statutes.

A British subject who, before the treaty of 1794, took a bond in the name of a citizen of the United States, cannot avoid the statute of limitations by claiming the benefit of the clause which removed all legal impediments in the recovery of British debts 216
The statute does not run against an equitable title, nor in favor of one..... 429
The fact that the United States is a stockholder does not exempt a corporation from the operation of the statute..... 718
Virginia limitations act of 1819 applies to corporations 718

Time of limitation; how computed.

The statute begins to run from the date of a note payable on demand..... 977
Cause of action to recover back money paid on an erroneous judgment arises upon reversal, although a venire de novo is ordered, and the statute commences to run from such time..... 748
Time of accrual of right of action for money received..... 70

Exceptions; suspension.

The county of Alexandria is not "beyond seas" as to the county of Washington in the District of Columbia..... 605
Where a contract is made by a branch bank within the state of the plaintiff bank, the exception in favor of one "beyond the seas or out of the country" is not applicable 718

Acknowledgment or new promise.

The statement by the maker of a note that he will "attend" to it is sufficient to remove the bar..... 600
Casual acknowledgment of debt to a stranger may be sufficient to take it out of the statute.....*643
An offer to compromise a debt will not take the case out of the statute.....7, 647
Written acknowledgment required to remove the bar in Kansas..... 830

Pleading.

In an action on a time note, non assumpsit infra tres annos is bad on general demurrer; it ought to be actio non accrevit.. 644

LITERARY PROPERTY.

An author has a common-law right in his manuscript, and is entitled to an injunction to restrain its publication.....967, 981

Page

It is not an abandonment to the public to use one's manuscripts to instruct others who are permitted to take copies..... 981
Copies so taken for purposes of instruction cannot be applied to any other purpose 981
The copyright act (1831, § 9) protects the author's right to his manuscript, which includes private letters..... 967
The common law gives protection to the author for his manuscript only..... 967
Where an author's manuscript work has been published, he has not an exclusive right at common law to republish it, for the first publication is a dedication to the public 967

MALICIOUS PROSECUTION.

Declaration must allege termination of proceedings 907

MANDAMUS.

A judgment in a federal court on municipal bonds may be enforced by mandamus compelling a levy of taxes, provided by law for their payment 67
A peremptory, instead of an alternative, mandamus will be granted where defendant has had ample opportunity to set up all defenses 67

MARITIME LAW.

The exclusion of the maritime law will not be inferred. The mere absence of a tribunal to enforce it is not sufficient evidence of an intention to exclude it..... 255
Where obligations growing out of international commerce are to be adjudicated with reference to the maritime law, the lex loci contractus, the lex rei sitae, and the lex loci delicti are inapplicable..... 255

MARRIED WOMEN.

Bills of exchange and promissory notes constitute an exception to the rule that the wife's choses in action, other than chattels real, are assignable only in equity.....1071
Indorsement of note to wife, and assignment of mortgage securing it by husband alone, is sufficient at common law.....1071
Act Cal. April 17. 1850, inapplicable to husband and wife married out of state, and never having been within its limits.....1071
It seems that a married woman cannot hold, to the exclusion of her husband or his creditors, a stock of goods purchased on credit, nor the proceeds or profits. (Wis. Act Feb. 1, 1850)..... 243
A married woman, living with her husband and carrying on trade in her own name, cannot, in Wisconsin, become his debtor, nor be garnished in proceedings against him..... 243

MARSHAL.

Entitled to full commissions on interlocutory sales of prize..... 241
Cannot enforce payment of fees by an order and an attachment..... 169
Not responsible for act of deputy not in the line of his duty..... 357
The deputy is an officer of the court, and may be held responsible as such..... 357
The deputy may be attached for disobedience of an order to pay over money received on a judgment after return of execution 357

MASTER AND SERVANT.

A mother cannot bind out her child..... 558
Binding out of apprentice in Washington county, D. C., is of no effect, unless parents approve and indorse indentures within two months..... 928

MINES.

A lease of land for the sole purpose of mining, subject to the owner's use of the same for tillage, gives an exclusive right of mining 810

MISTAKE.

A father who takes no steps to have corrected a patent erroneously naming his son as grantee is guilty of laches as against a bona fide mortgagee from the son..... 300

MONEY RECEIVED.

Money paid on an erroneous judgment to the agent of the plaintiff may, on reversal, be recovered from him if yet in his hands, or if he was given notice at the time of payment that he would be required to refund it *745

MORTGAGE.

The fact that no bond was ever executed is not fatal to a mortgage purporting to be executed to secure payment of a certain sum, according to the conditions of a certain bond..... 521
A mortgage cannot be sustained as given for an actual debt other than that stated on its face, except on clear proof..... 521
An assignment of a mortgage, with all sums due or to become due thereon, will include the note secured as an incident of the debt 521
Persons consenting to change of bonds for stock in new company, formed on foreclosure of mortgage on first, cannot have new foreclosure on claim of coercion..... 862
Legal owner of equity of redemption and of mortgage paid by it held entitled to possession pending suit to declare title void.... 832

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS.

A warrant to recover the penalty of a by-law must name the corporate plaintiff, and describe the offense with reasonable certainty 901
The mayor of Washington cannot exercise jurisdiction in a case in which he is a party 901
Right to lay railroad tracks and build depot or pier buildings in city (Keokuk) streets without consent of abutting owner.. 898
Owner of lots in Keokuk, fronting on Water street, owns the fee in the street to the river, and the portions reclaimed from the river, subject to the public easement.. 898
Authority to issue town bonds in aid of railroad under Illinois acts..... 504
Town bonds issued after, but authorized by vote before, the adoption of a new constitution, are not affected by it..... 504
Town bonds and coupons not sealed, issued under a law providing that they should be under seal, though their wording showed they were intended to be sealed, are void..... 251
A certiorari to review the decision of a county judge, that railroad aid bonds be issued, suspends the operation of his judgment, and the railroad company acquires no title to the bonds issued thereunder enforceable against the town on reversal of the judgment 374
Such reversal cannot invalidate the title of a bona fide purchaser..... 374
The purchaser from a railroad company of railroad aid bonds issued in fraud of the rights of the town must show that he purchased in good faith and for value..... 374

Page

NAVIGATION.

The right of the public for purposes of navigation is paramount to that of the riparian owner..... 245
Both federal and state governments may authorize alterations in navigable streams to afford greater facilities for navigation, and in so doing may take property of riparian owners, upon making compensation therefor 245
A law declaring a stream a public highway may be repealed or modified whenever the public convenience and common interests of the people require it..... 105
The construction of a railroad bridge across a navigable river, though authorized by state legislature, may be enjoined by federal court..... 427
But where congress subsequently gives authority to construct the bridge, the injunction will be dissolved..... 428
Where it appears that a proposed bridge across navigable inland waters is a common nuisance, the proper remedy is a prosecution by the state..... 105
The nation which constructs an artificial channel may annex such conditions to its use as it pleases..... 255

NEGLIGENCE.

An owner who leaves uncovered an excavation made by him in the adjoining sidewalk is liable to a pedestrian who, in the use of ordinary care, falls into it at night 1180

NEW TRIAL.

Not granted, where evidence conflicting, because court would have drawn different conclusion 1087

OFFICERS.

The bond of a teller of a branch Bank of the United States is not void because executed 14 days after he has entered upon his duties..... 688
The condition in a bond to well and faithfully behave and execute the office, does not render the surety liable for want of skill 688
The sureties on the bond of a cashier of a bank are liable for his acts pending the communication and carrying into effect of a resolution of suspension..... 722

PARTIES.

Having distinct claims against same defendant cannot maintain joint suit in equity 472
A corporation which has obtained the title of one of original defendants pendente lite, may become a defendant, and seek relief by cross bill, although it has also acquired the sole complainant's title pendente lite 832

PARTITION.

Bill will not be entertained unless claimant's title be clear to the portion to be received 886

PARTNERSHIP.

Any partner may be agent of third person in drawing bills in favor of the firm for advances made under express authority.... 794
Page
A firm may negotiate its own paper to one of its partners, or take his paper and and use it for the firm's purposes..... 794
A bill drawn by a partner in two firms, in the name of one, upon the other, payable to himself for his individual debt, and accepted, is enforceable in the hands of an indorsee without notice..... 302
In a suit for the settlement of partnership accounts, where one partner died insolvent, his next of kin or other personal representatives are necessary parties.... 964
Items of partnership account cannot be recovered in a suit at law between the partners if the joint concerns have not been settled 945
In an action at law between partners, accounts rendered are admissible to show that the items are not of partnership accounts 945
One who sells to a firm cannot maintain an action for the purchase price against a partner subsequently taken in..... 201
Debt may be maintained upon a firm note against a secret partner, who has not signed it, but he is not liable if the money obtained on its discount was not used for the firm 614

PATENTS.

Invention.

Combination of known tool with known machine, requiring only ordinary mechanical skill, not patentable..... 386
Features which a skilled mechanic would devise or apply in operating a machine not patentable 947

Novelty.

A machine is patentable only when substantially new.....1142
Application of old machine to new purpose is not patentable.....1142
There must be novelty, either of product or of process, to make combination patentable 1027
Patent for combination cannot be supported by evidence of novelty of one of its parts 1027

Who may obtain patent.

He who invents first, although his invention is imperfect and incomplete, has the prior right if he uses reasonable diligence in perfecting and adapting the same.. 960
A joint patent cannot be obtained for a sole invention of one..... 914

Prior public use or sale.

Use of an invention by public for 11 months will not bar right to patent..... 293
A prior use alone, in a foreign country, will not avoid the patent..... 960
Nor will such prior use in this country necessarily avoid the patent, unless with the patentee's consent or allowance..... 960
Devices employed in experiments will not, on their abandonment, defeat a patent to a new and independent inventor..... 217

Prior description.

Description, in printed publication, will not avoid patent, unless prior in point of time to the invention of the patentee..... 960
A prior description, to invalidate a patent, must be such as to show that the article described in the patent can be certainly arrived at.....141, 147

Abandonment: Laches.

Merely withholding an invention from the public does not amount to an abandonment 293
Concealment of invention, because of information that another had anticipated it, will not forfeit right to patent..... 271

Application and issue. Page

The embodiment of the principle into a machine as described, and not the abstract principle, is the patentable thing.....1142

A patent of one making an improvement on an existing machine, or a new machine, should not be for a method, but for his machine, or improved machine..... 914

Use of phrase "any suitable material," in patent for combination, shows claim to combination, limited to known materials, though not named..... 386

It is discretionary with patent office to determine whether specimens of the ingredients or of the compound in a patent product are necessary..... 339

Original model may be proved by specifications and drawings where certified model is broken, and parts lost..... 217

The essential features of the invention must be shown in the specification; their appearance in the patent office model is not sufficient 947

A patent cannot claim both the combination of machines and the machines themselves 914

A patent for an improved machine must specify in what the improvement precisely consists 914

A patentee making an improvement in a combination of machines should include in his patent only the improvement..... 914

There must be several patents for several improvements of distinct machines..... 914

Patents may be united if two or more, included in one set of letters, relate to a like subject, or are in their nature or operation connected together..... 914

The obtaining of a joint patent estops the patentees to claim under prior several patents for the same invention..... 914

Appeals from commissioner's decision.

A patentee may appeal from a decision against him on an interference declared between his patent and an application..293, 1102

The jurisdiction of the circuit court of the District of Columbia over the question of priority only arises where an interference is declared, and so determined..... 394

The interference coming up for review is only such as respects patentable matters 394

Objection to evidence waived where not distinctly made when taken..... 819

Sufficiency of evidence to show priority of invention.....1102

Suit to invalidate patent.

Parties in suit to invalidate patent granted by the commissioner after an interference not confined to evidence before commissioner, nor is such evidence in the case 97

Reissue: Disclaimer.

The act (July 4, 1836, § 13) authorizing reissues is to be construed liberally, and not literally, as restraining and limiting the right 550

A description claiming a combination. and not giving notice of a claim of any part, is a dedication of the parts to the public, which cannot be revoked by surrender and reissue 1031

Devices shown in the original drawings, but not specified, may be claimed in the reissue 766

The applicant has a right to restrict or enlarge his claim so as to give it operation, and effectuate his invention..... 550

A new function developed by combination of different elements is beyond the scope of a reissue..... 550

The right to reissue in two divisions, one for the process and the other for the product. illustrated..... 346

The model filed in compliance with the law is admissible as evidence of the scope of the invention and of the defects in the patent 554

The fact of reissue raises a presumption that the invention claimed in the original and the reissued patent are the same, and that the term has not been extended..... 766

Tests to be applied in considering whether a reissue is for the same invention as the original 217

Act 1839, §§ 7, 9, authorizing a disclaimer, do not apply where the patent is for combination of parts.....1027

Duration.

Act 1870, § 25, providing, in the case of foreign patents, that the United States patent shall expire at the same time with the foreign patent, is not retroactive, and does not apply to the reissue of a patent previously granted..... 346

Assignment.

A conveyance of an interest in a patent must be in writing, and a mere memorandum, in the hands of the patentee, is not sufficient 534

An assignment of all the grantor's right, title, and interest in and to a certain patent carries only the grantor's existing interest 24

An assignment made by the judge of probate under the Massachusetts insolvency law does not pass the insolvent's interest in letters patent..... 24

An unrecorded assignment of a patent is good as against subsequent recorded assignment to one with notice..... 24

Licenses.

To make and use a patented machine need not be in writing..... 534

To make and use a machine gives no power to authorize a third person to construct it..... 534

An agreement between owners of conflicting patents defining their rights, and providing for the purchase of outside patents for mutual protection, held to give only a license to use such purchased patents, and an action thereon is properly brought in the name of the purchaser alone..... 217

Sale of patented machine.

Deed construed as a conveyance of a single machine, without right to construct others 534

Infringement—What constitutes.

Subsequent discovery of peculiar value of material used by inventor does not give discoverer right to use it in the patented manner 386

A patent for a new product is infringed by its manufacture by any process whatever 346

A substitute for an ingredient in a patented combination does not cease to be an equivalent because it does something more and better.....135, 138

The substitution of known mechanical equivalents, or the changing of parts in a nonessential way, not producing a new result, is an infringement..... 391

The character of an infringement is not affected by a mere alteration in form and proportion, not affecting results, nor by the substitution of mechanical equivalents.... 914

It is no infringement of a patent for a combination of machines to use either of the machines separately..... 914

Rubber roller covered with cloth not an equivalent of a roller with an outer covering of rubber..... 386 —— Remedy, generally.

Circuit court may entertain a bill for an injunction and an account, or the repeal of an interfering patent..... 271

Infringement—Preliminary injunction. Page

Withheld on defendant's agreeing to accept a license..... 510
Not granted, where injury to defendant would be irreparable and profits to patentee are by licensing.....1028
Denied where affidavits contradictory, and question in doubt whether defendant had license 1163
Not refused where defendant has not been misled by plaintiff's conduct in allowing his suit to rest until a recovery in other suits by him, and then discontinuing, and bringing a new action..... 147
Pending suit in another circuit no ground of postponing, where patent has been declared valid..... 135
Where the evidence is the same as upon a prior case, the decision there will be followed 391
A decision in favor of the applicant on an interference declared between an application and a patent is sufficient ground for refusing injunction to senior patentee..... 5

—— Procedure.

It is discretionary with the court to order issues for a jury..... 271
To prevent multiplicity, suit between patentee and user of infringing machine suspended to await result of pending suit between patentee and principal infringer.... 902
The interpretation of the specification is for the court.....1027
On application for a provisional injunction, expert demonstration of the patents may be made..... 914

—— Evidence.

Burden of showing in defense that patentee was joint inventor is on defendant.. 22
A patent is itself prima facie evidence of novelty and usefulness. Plaintiff cannot give cumulative evidence on these points till they are controverted.....1027
The prima facie force of a patent as to priority of invention is absolutely destroyed by evidence of priority of invention by another 954
Mere applications for patents cannot be considered on the question of novelty..... 819
A patent will be sustained on testimony of patentee that he was sole inventor, corroborated by the circumstances, as against testimony of another claiming to be joint inventor 22
The applicant's oath, at the time of the application, that he believed that he was the first inventor, is sufficient evidence of that fact, where uncontradicted..... 960

—— Damages.

Plaintiff not entitled as damages to money paid counsel for services in the suit... 578

Decree—Construction.

A decision that a certain patent does not destroy the novelty of another is not necessarily a decision that the use of an arrangement in the latter is not an infringement of the former..... 307

Various inventions and patents.

Alizarine. No. 95,465, and reissue No. 4,321, for artificial alizarine, produced from anthracene, held valid and infringed by article produced under patent No. 153,536.... *339, 343, 346, 348
Boiler furnaces. No. 20,616, for improvement for burning wet fuel, held valid.... 766
Bracelets. Reissue No. 4,192, for improvement in plated metal bracelets, held valid 779
Cooking stoves. Barston's improvement held not anticipated..... 949
Corset springs. Reissue to Barnes, for improvement, construed, and held valid and infringed 876
Explosive compound. Reissue No. 5,799, for combination of nitroglycerine with an absorbent substance, held valid and infringed 135, 138, 141, 147
Harvesters. Reissues Nos. 2,608, 723, 724, 726, for improvements, held valid... 217
Hats. No. 33,978, for improvement in bonnets. Construed, and held valid, but not infringed 528
—— Such patent held infringed..... 510
Hats. Reissue to Modena Hat Company for an improved fabric for hats, bonnets, etc., held not infringed..... 528
Hats. Patent to Kendall and Trested, for compound for coating textile fabrics, held not infringed..... 528
Nonexplosive lamps. No. 57,245, to Beschke, held not infringed by Houchin's patent 23
Ovens. Reissue to Ball, for improvements, held invalid as broader than original 556
Printing presses. Award of priority for improvement 293
Pumps. Reissue to Barker, for improvements in buckets for chain pumps, held infringed by buckets made under Stowe's patent 819
Reaping machines. Ball held entitled to reissue of his reissue No. 832..... 554
Rocking-chair. No. 1,531, for improvement, held invalid.....1142
Rubber. Ayling's patent for improved treatment in caoutchouc held valid..... 271
Sewing machines. Reissue and extension of Bachelder, held infringed by machines constructed under reissues Nos. 346 and 414..... 307
Steam pumps. Patent awarded to Boardman for improvements..... 97
Steam safety valve. Reissue No. 58,962, as properly limited, held not infringed by patent No. 58,294..... 20
Telegraphy. Morse's claim (patent No. 6,420) for a new system construed, and held not to interfere with Bain's claim, (patent No. 6,328)..... 394
Tin cans. No. 71,680, for improvement in machine for manufacture, held void for want of novelty..... 947
Wringer rollers. Reissue of April 18, 1865, for improvement, held valid..... 386

PAYMENT.

Where, in the absence of fraud, etc., Confederate money has been received in exchange for property, the federal courts will not interfere..... 378
A payment by a bank to military authorities of funds belonging to the enemy, under coercion, discharges the bank..... 678
Where such funds are in Confederate notes, the payment may be made in Confederate notes 899
Goods consigned by an agent, with notice that they belong to his principal, are not paid for by the acceptance and payment of drafts drawn by the consignor on general account 1044
Purchase of notes by trustee for another held not to amount to a payment..... 501
The acceptance of new security without full knowledge of the facts, or induced by fraud or deceit, is not a discharge..... 458
At common law, a promissory note given for a simple contract debt is not payment unless so intended..... 458
In Massachusetts the presumption is that it was so intended..... 458
A bank must apply the proceeds of a note discounted by it as intended by the person offering it..... 615

PLEADING AT LAW.

Declaration. Page

In debt for "$103⅓, or 31 pounds Virginia," is not for a sum certain, and is bad on special demurrer 28

In trover for "a chest containing sundry tools," is sufficient to admit evidence of the value of the tools .....556; contra, 555

Allegation that plaintiff was owner of vessel laden with a cargo is sufficient allegation as to ownership of cargo 988

An affidavit charging defendant as follows: "1809, Oct. 5. To goods per bill, $19.89,"—is insufficient 965

Pleas.

Not guilty within three years is a good plea in trover 847

Nil debet is no plea to debt on a judgment of another state 1012

Plea of nul tiel record not allowed after plea of not guilty and issue, to debt on a judgment, suggesting a devastavit 1012

Defendant not permitted to plead the statute of limitations after the expiration of rule to plead 637

Where distinct defenses are pleaded, one one cannot be taken to help or destroy the other 313

Court will not order general issue to be stricken out to give defendant leave to plead in abatement 645

Replication.

Sufficiency to raise question of validity of contract set up in defense 121

Demurrer.

Defects in declaration in setting forth case may be availed of by demurrer 987

On demurrer to a plea, the court will consider defects in the complaint which otherwise would have been considered waived by the plea 649

A plea is not bad on special demurrer because misnaming plaintiff in marginal title. (Overruling 638) 644

Striking out pleas.

Plea not stricken out as frivolous if matter properly pleaded is included 313

Plea which expressly or in effect admits the cause of action cannot be stricken out as frivolous 313

Plea false on its face may be stricken out 313

Issues.

A subsequent amendment of the record does not affect the issue under the plea of nul tiel record 866

Upon an issue on plea of general performance, plaintiff is not bound to produce the original covenant sued upon 1119

PLEADING IN ADMIRALTY

Exceptions in an answer to a libel will be deemed waived if not determined before proof taken at the trial 227

PLEADING IN EQUITY.

Bill.

A bill is defective which does not give full names of all parties to whom it refers 957

Where all matters alleged in a bill are relevant to one defendant, he cannot object to it, as multifarious, because it is not relevant to the other defendants 195

A bill against infringers of a copyright, praying injunction and discovery in aid of a suit at law against one, though declared bad as a bill for discovery, is good on general demurrer, the remedy by injunction being independent 195

A bill seeking a discovery to enforce a forfeiture or penalty is bad on special demurrer 195

Page

Plaintiff can recover only upon the case made by his bill, and not upon that made in the evidence 1033

Where defendant is sued as sole owner of a railroad, and the proof is that he is jointly concerned with others as a stockholder, no decree can be entered against him unless the bill is amended 1171

An objection to jurisdiction for want of parties, of equity in the bill, or of there being a remedy at law, may be taken at any time 439

An exception (in Louisiana) that plaintiff, suing as administrator, is not administrator, must be pleaded in limine litis 906

Such an exception cannot be embodied in the answer, and it must be verified by affidavit 906

The same rules apply to the exception of lis pendens 906

Defects in pleadings not objected to at trial usually considered waived 486

Cross bill.

A decree dismissing the original bill does not dispose of cross bill, setting up additional facts, and praying affirmative relief 832

Demurrer.

A demurrer admits allegations of bill for purposes of motion on bill and demurrer..1069

A demurrer to a plea presents the question of the sufficiency of the bill, as well as of the plea 1171

A general demurrer to a bill will be overruled if any independent part of the bill is sufficient 195

Special demurrer to bill must specifically point out parts to which it applies 195

Inconsistencies of allegations as to authorship in bill for infringement of copyright no ground of objection on general demurrer, if other allegations are sufficient 195

The objection that a bill for infringement of copyright sets forth no title in plaintiff, and lays no legal foundation for a discovery, may be taken by general demurrer 195

Plea.

An objection that a plea is defective in not responding to all the allegations of a bill is not sustainable, for a plea may be to a part only 1171

Answer.

Answer in name of three defendants, but signed and sworn to by two only, will be stricken from files, but with leave to amend 390

Where bill sets up facts taking an oral agreement averred out of the statute of frauds, defendant will be required to respond by answer to such facts 385

Admissions in answer, not put in issue by some charge in the bill, are unavailing 1033

POWERS.

A deed of an attorney, executed in his own name, is not valid as the deed of his principal 781

Principal bound by act of his attorney in fact when he acts within scope of his authority 781

Under power of attorney from several persons to make a joint note in renewal of a joint and several note, a joint and several note made by the attorney, if beyond his power, is invalid only in part 679

A power to sign notes in renewal of existing notes gives authority to sign renewal notes given for renewal notes 749

PRACTICE AT LAW.

If books and papers are in court, they may be called for after jury is sworn 763

Defendant not required to produce an account rendered to him by plaintiff, except as accompanied by his affidavit as to the circumstances under which it was received. 742

Page

Nonproduction of papers not available as ground of nonsuit or judgment by default, except after order to produce, made on motion 702, 988
Evidence may be received to disprove possession of or power to produce papers.... 988
A prior ruling stated by the judge out of court to have been made by him, when unreversed, must be considered as the law of the case, when coming before another judge 852
After rule to plead expired, plaintiff not compelled to produce his cause of action.. 385
Effect of minutes of court upon which no order is entered..... 852

PRACTICE IN ADMIRALTY.

An entry on the record that on the return day a certain person "appears, * * * and has a week to perfect an appearance," does not show a waiver of objection to jurisdiction 80
Claim, to be available, must be interposed on the return day of process, when proclamation is made..... 1048
A defense to libel for seamen's wages may be heard without an answer..... 937
Practice in examining parties in admiralty 236
State statute admitting parties as witnesses does not apply in admiralty..... 236
Act March 3, 1861, § 4, authorizing transfer of owner's interest in ship and freight to a trustee for claimants, does not apply to a loss to another vessel by collision, nor to injuries to cargo on board the vessel in fault 875
Foreign attachment in admiralty lies in cases of tort..... 875
The regular proceeding against a surety in a stipulation for costs is by petition after notice, and the decree may be final and peremptory. Upon proceeding by motion after personal demand, a conditional decree only is awarded 569

PRACTICE IN EQUITY.

Orders and final decree taken under stipulation in pending case, in vacation, without sanction of court, not set aside on summary motion 1073
The original papers, documents, etc., in an equity suit, may be used in court as the record, where the proceedings have not been recorded at length..... 686
Necessary averments in affidavits on motion for rehearing 823
Motion for rehearing in suit for infringement of patent cannot be made after term at which final decree entered..... 823
Proper practice in case of surprise in testimony not noticed by answer..... 823
Rehearing after interlocutory decree granted upon filing supplemental bill, for newly-discovered evidence, if of such nature as to entitle party to relief upon bill of review after final decree, but not otherwise 486
Error of judgment or mistake of counsel as to effect of evidence no ground for rehearing 486
Rehearing not granted on ground of newly-discovered evidence of which the party, by reasonable diligence, might have obtained knowledge..... 486
Rehearing not granted if newly-discovered evidence is merely cumulative..... 486

PRINCIPAL AND AGENT.

Page

Authority to indorse notes need not be under seal 749
An agent to sell on credit, taking a mortgage as security, is not thereby authorized to foreclose the mortgage..... 226
An agent authorized to foreclose a mortgage, and bid in the property, who does so in his own name, holds for the benefit of his principal 226
Authority to receive notices ceases with the principal's death 749
Agent is not liable to suit on a contract made in behalf of a disclosed principal.... 663
A collecting agent, receiving Confederate notes in payment, without authority, is liable 678
Agent will not be directed to deliver up papers in his possession if he has a lien thereon 804

PRINCIPAL AND SURETY.

The creditor is not bound to use active diligence to enforce his claim against the principal debtor unless requested by the surety 660
A surety can require the creditor to proceed first against the principal, only when his suretyship appears on the face of the instrument, or when he offers indemnity.. 289
An application of payments once made will not be varied so as to affect the liability of a surety..... 665
A surety holding collateral security for his indemnity is a trustee for the creditor, where the debtor is insolvent..... 508
A surety discharging the debt of his principal is subrogated to all the rights of the creditor 743
The assignee in bankruptcy, having paid a debt for which the bankrupt was surety, is subrogated to the rights of the creditor.. 289

PRIZE.

American ship trading, under enemy's pass, without permission from home government, is confiscable..... 227
Where, upon ship's papers, enemy ownership is doubtful, condemnation will be delayed, though no claim is interposed.... 242
After a year and a day without claim made, condemnation is of course..... 242
A war vessel within signal distance of another, making a prize, is entitled to share, but is not a part of the "capturing force," so as to make it superior, and cause the prize to be divided equally with the government 116
When the "capturing force" is superior, within the act providing that in such case the prize shall be divided with the government 116
On interlocutory sales of prize, marshal must bring proceeds of sale into court, with a regular account..... 241
Vessel and cargo condemned for attempt to violate blockade..... 763

PUBLIC LANDS.

The occupant law of Tennessee, so far as it violates the compact with other states by giving preference to its citizens over those of the other states, is void..... 1005
Actual settlement consists in clearing, fencing, and cultivating the land, and erecting a house fit for habitation and actual residence 543
Mere improvement, without occupancy and bona fide intention to reside, does not constitute a settlement..... 543
Title to lands by settlement, survey, etc., under Act. Pa. April 3, 1792..... 543 Land once occupied as a town site, but abandoned, may be taken up and held under the donation act as unoccupied public land. 1167

Page

A certificate of location does not convey the legal title until the segregation of land is completed 429
Equitable title passes on entry and payment, though patent is not issued, and such land is liable to taxation..... 71
Grantees pendente lite from the original grantee of public lands are entitled to contest a survey, though the majority owners approve it 432
A patent for lands paid for by the father, but delivered to his son of the same name, who was described, by his residence, as the grantee, is valid until vacated for the mistake of description..... 300
Equity has no jurisdiction to affect a patent except upon the ground of an antecedent equity in the plaintiff, disregarded in the issuing thereof.....1167
Questions of fact decided in the land department are not subject to review by the courts, except for fraud or mistake other than an error of judgment.....1167
Whether a settler under the donation act upon unsurveyed lands could commute his residence under Act Feb. 14, 1853, and Act July 17, 1854, is a question of law, and the decision of the land department thereon may be reviewed at the suit of a party having a prior equity.....1167

RAILROADS.

Statutes relating to the construction of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad construed 574
A mortgage by a railroad of all property then in its possession or thereafter acquired includes railroad subsequently leased, and the title to such leased road is good in the hands of the mortgage trustees, as against assignees in bankruptcy of the mortgagor.. 841
A decree for plaintiff on a bill to set aside a railroad mortgage foreclosure, and subject the property to payment of their judgments, renders the foreclosure invalid only as to the creditors who filed the bill..... 862
Irrespective of city ordinances, speed of train across streets should be such as to permit stoppage within reasonable time... 827
When an engine is backing a train across city streets, there should be a lookout.... 827
Great care and vigilance is required where there is steam or smoke upon the track 827
A railroad company allowing trains of another to run over its track is responsible, as to its own passengers, in the same manner as if all the trains belonged to itself.. 935

REAL PROPERTY.

Act N. Y. March 24, 1797, to settle disputes as to titles to lands in Onondaga county, construed, and held valid..... 811
A perception of the esplees is evidence of seisin, but this is presumed under a deed... 903
Under statute of uses, entry not essential to complete title..... 903
A tenant in common cannot, without consent of his cotenants, grant permits to others to cut timber on the premises..... 495
A purchaser at a tax sale by a tenant in common in possession, who is an agent of the other cotenants, will be held to be in trust for them..... 495

RECEIVERS.

Counsel's services to receiver are included within decree giving priority to claims for "labor in operation of the road".....1080
Advances to pay wages of employes on condition of reimbursement out of first net earnings will be paid out of income in receiver's hands in preference to mortgage claims 90

REFERENCE.

Page

Evidence not laid before referees cannot be exhibited to the court on exceptions to the report 984
Effect of auditor's report on reference of accounts in an action at law..... 945

RELIGIOUS SOCIETIES.

A church conference may consent to division of church into two bodies, which will carry with it a division of the common property 994
Commissioners appointed by one of such divisions may maintain bill against trustees of common property for a division..... 994

REMOVAL OF CAUSES.

Right of removal.

In ejectment against a tenant. a nonresident owner, admitted as a defendant, is not entitled to a removal.....1188
A suit commenced against a foreign corporation in a state court by publication of summons as provided by law, followed by attachment of its property, may be removed, though the federal court could not originally have compelled submission to its jurisdiction 894
A suit against a bank to recover for neglecting to protest drafts forwarded by a correspondent bank, brought by an assignee of the right of action, is not a suit to recover the contents of a chose in action in favor of an assignee. (Act 1789, § 11)... 894
Act Feb 5, 1867, authorizing removal for local prejudice, overrides section 11 of judiciary act as to suits by assignee..... 778

Time for removal.

Petition filed before trial, and at first term after passage of act of March 3, 1875, is in time..... 472
Causes in Iowa being triable by law at the first term after service of process, such term limits the time for removal, though issue is not then formed..... 189

Proceedings to obtain.

A cause cannot be removed on petition of one of two defendants.....1188
Petition for removal may be amended in federal court to conform to facts..... 778
Cause will not be remanded because bond filed under Act 1875, and duly accepted by state court, was in terms as required by Act 1866 472

Effect of removal: Subsequent proceedings.

Filing of petition and bond, ipso facto, deprives state court of jurisdiction..... 1
Where removing party fails to file a copy of state court record, opponent may file it.. 1
An attachment of property made before the removal will continue to hold the property to answer the final judgment of the federal court..... 894

REVIEW.

Bill of review can only be sustained upon ground of error in the record, which does not include the evidence..... 809

SALES.

A contract to buy, made by a broker, on condition that the seller should get information as to the purchaser's financial standing, and, if unsatisfactory, accept security, is enforceable 103
Where the buyer does not accept a modification of terms of payment proposed by the seller after delivering the goods, the original terms remain in full force.....1040

Page

The right of stoppage in transitu exists in favor of the seller of imported goods "to arrive," entered in his name, and stored in a bonded warehouse.....1191

The indorsement and delivery by the consignee of a cargo of coal en route of a bill of lading to purchasers at a certain price per ton, and its acceptance by them, is a sufficient delivery to pass title.....201, 506

That goods sold on credit were allowed to remain in the seller's warehouse, at option of purchaser, does not prevent the delivery being complete, a note being given for the price..... 911

Goods were deposited in a warehouse in the name of one to whom they were afterwards sold. Held, that no further delivery was necessary, and the seller's lien was lost 1013

Held otherwise where goods deposited in the name of another were sold to a third person, and no notice given of that fact...1013

Seller of goods delivered, where sale not complete because payment not made as agreed, may maintain replevin under Connecticut statute.....1040

It is not necessary to the seller's right of reclamation that he should return the buyer's unaccepted promissory note.....1040

Seller may sue before expiration of credit where goods were procured by false representations, and sold in fraud of creditors.. 927

The presumption is that the goods were sold for cash, or that notes taken were negotiable 927

A purchaser from one who bought corporate stock on a sale under an invalid decree of confiscation, after notice of the corporation's claim of invalidity, is not a bona fide purchaser 254

Party paying money in advance, to save a stipulated forfeiture for failure to pay the residue by a certain day, must use his best efforts to tender the balance.....1079

Measure of damages for breach of contract to deliver goods is difference, if any, in price between the goods contracted for and the market price at the place of delivery 832

SALVAGE.

Right to salvage compensation.

Two vessels at anchor come in collision in a storm without fault. To prevent the destruction of both, one slipped the cable, and went ashore. Held not a salvage service 1161

Rescuing runaway slaves, destitute of food or water, adrift at sea, is a salvage service 1006

Regularly authorized and licensed pilots are entitled to salvage compensation where their services are extraordinary, and beyond the strict line of their professional duty 1136

Claim of one who floats and repairs abandoned stranded vessel is in the nature of salvage, and takes precedence of prior maritime liens, though such person held immature mortgage 885

Small tugs assisting, for less than an hour, a large tug in pulling off a steamship aground in a harbor, entitled to compensation as salvage service..... 463

Vessel is not liable for salvage services rendered under contract with a wrecking company in charge of the vessel..... 479

Forfeiture or reduction of salvage.

Wreckers who unnecessarily lighten a vessel, to magnify their services, forfeit all salvage 227

Salvage cannot be given by way of set-off when the finder of a whale adrift has throughout contested the title of the owner 966

Page

Negligence of salvors in failing to make sounding resulting in a vessel being heaved off one shoal, and onto another, will reduce salvage 14

Amount.

Moiety is usually the highest compensation allowed 1192

A contract in a salvage case, not made under pressing necessity, will be enforced..1192

Rule of salvage fixed by contract is not imperative as to subsequent services.....1192

Increased compensation will not be given on account of the employment of supernumeraries 14

Vessel is not derelict where master and crew voluntarily leave while in peril with bona fide intention of returning.....191, 1136

Moiety allowed where vessel abandoned and partly stripped was worked into port.. 9

Where vessel and cargo were of the gross value of $73,000, 15 per cent. of net value allowed 14

For saving cargo and material valued at $41,756, 30 and 50 per cent. allowed..... 75

For saving vessel and freight valued at $3,500, salvors allowed $1,200..... 191

For piloting into port brig found among dangerous shoals, worth, with cargo, $12,000, wrecking vessel allowed $900..... 209

Small tugs, assisting in pulling off steamship worth, with cargo, $500,000, aground in harbor, allowed $1,200..... 463

For bringing into port ship and cargo worth $38,000, left by master and crew in peril, with intention of returning, pilots awarded $2,400 1136

Costs.

The costs of the proceedings for salvage compensation in rescuing runaway slaves in a stolen canoe are not chargeable to owner of canoe, but to owner of slaves....1006

Appeal.

On appeals in salvage cases, onus to prove mistake of law or fact is on appellant.....1192

SCIRE FACIAS.

If some of the terre-tenants named in the sci. fa. are returned "nihil," an alias sci. fa. must issue..... 460

Material variance between record of recognizance and recital of it in sci, fa. is fatal 866

SEAMEN.

The contract of shipment.

Seamen are competent to bind themselves by contract as to rate of wages..... 121

Contract introducing unusual terms must be explained to seamen, or it will be set aside 236

The stipulation that compensation by share in earnings shall be proportioned to the time served in the voyage will be enforced 121

Contract of shipment not in writing is not binding, and seamen may quit at any time, and demand highest wages paid at port. (Act 1790) 236

Whaling voyage not within Rev. St. § 4520, requiring shipping articles to specify certain particulars 121

A hiring "for the season" of navigation is presumptively for the entire season..... 547

The "season of navigation" on the Great Lakes comprises the eight months commencing April 1st, and ending November 30th.. 547

A seaman receiving injury in performance of his duty is entitled to be treated and cured at expense of the ship, though compensation is by share in earnings..... 121

But such liability is usually limited to time necessary to enable him to return home 620

Page

Expenses of care and cure of seaman on shore chargeable to ship which has no means to care for him..... 303

Consul cannot order discharge of seamen in foreign port, except upon consent given, which consent must affirmatively appear when such discharge is set up in defense to suit for wages..... 121

Words which might imply a discharge, when spoken in anger, where seaman is ordered next day to do his duty, do not amount to a discharge..... 280

Where seaman proves unfit for service for which he was shipped, he may be degraded..... 236

Penalty on master for permitting use of spirits contrary to articles..... 303

Services required.

A mate whom the master refuses to allow to act in that capacity need not act in any other station..... 115

Licensed pilot, employed to remain on vessel to take her in and out of port, is subject to master's discipline, but not liable to ship's duty except when in charge as pilot 1198

Conduct of master or mate in respect to seamen.

Mate may be displaced by master for cause. Grounds..... 115

Master is not justified in ordering regularly employed pilot ashore, for failure to obey order to leave quarter deck.....1198

Use of force to compel obedience of pilot held a trespass.....1198

Master has authority to correct by corporal punishment the negligence or misconduct of any of the crew as such..... 587

Master has no authority to punish seamen creating ill feeling in another ship's crew, by false and malicious representations about their master..... 587

Mate is liable for striking in anger, and not as discipline, a boy, for using an opprobrious epithet in reply to a charge of theft 322

Wages—Right to.

A mate unlawfully or unjustifiably displaced by master may recover full wages for voyage..... 115

Commissions of 2½ per cent. for selling oil, and charges for fitting and discharging ship, disallowed in determining lay.....1025

Interest allowed from filing of libel for lay in whaling voyage.....1025

Seaman entitled to amount actually due at time of discharge where his assent was induced on payment of a nominal sum, from just apprehension of ill treatment.....1025

The amount he received by shipping in another vessel cannot be considered.....1025

A seaman wrongfully discharged is entitled to an indemnity, in ascertaining which subsequent expenses and earnings may be considered.....1025

Seamen, in whaling service, discharged abroad, are entitled to benefit of statute giving three months' extra wages.....1025 —— Remedies for recovery.

Seamen have lien on vessel, notwithstanding charter party bound charterers to pay crew..... 3

Lien will be held to have been waived by taking note from master, and nine months' delay..... 576

Lien lost by unexplained delay of four years, where rights of bona fide purchasers intervened..... 2

Incidental condition of contract to work on shore does not deprive seamen of lien.. 3

Mate may sue for wages the same as seaman..... 115

No set-off allowed on libel for wages, except a payment on account..... 410

Wages — Deductions: Extinguishment, etc.

Page

British seaman does not forfeit wages by coming on shore to legally demand payment 280

Leaving vessel before expiration of time of service, without consent of master, with intention not to return, constitutes desertion, and forfeits antecedent wages, unless reasonable excuse is shown..... 547

The fact that meat used on board was for a short time slightly tainted is no excuse for desertion..... 547

Sickness is an excuse for leaving vessel.. 937

Master of whaler has no right to charge commission on money paid to crew on voyage..... 303

SERVICES.

In the absence of any contract, between brother and sister living together, to pay her for domestic services, she has no claim on him for such services..... 976

Where value of extra work has not been fixed by arbitration, as agreed in building contract, evidence of such value may be given in action upon a quantum meruit... 464

SET-OFF: COUNTERCLAIM.

In an action by an insolvent for the use of his trustee, defendant may set off plaintiff's note to a third person, coming to his hands before the insolvency..... 759

It is a good ground of exception to a claim in reconvention that it has been substantially adjudicated between the same parties in another state, where it was pleaded as a counterclaim..... 906

A claim in reconvention should be pleaded with the same precision and detail as an original cause of action..... 906

SHIPPING.

Public regulation: Title to vessel.

Unless a proper manifest be tendered to the collector by the commander of the vessel, the collector is not bound to grant a clearance..... 987

Production of certificate of compliance with state inspection laws not necessary to entitle to clearance..... 988

Exportation of American produce in American vessels to British ports on the continent not enumerated as open ports not unlawful. (Act March 1, 1823)..... 132

It is not a foreign voyage if the delivery of the cargo is made within United States waters, though to a British subject residing on the British side of the stream..... 132

The register of a vessel is not, per se, evidence of ownership..... 988

Employment of vessels.

Vessel chartered by a person to carry out his agreement to transport cargo for a certain company is liable in admiralty for breach of the contract..... 170

Shippers must notify carriers of their wishes as to stowage where they consider the notorious custom of stowing such goods hazardous 1048, 1053

Passengers on steamship entitled to reasonable accommodations and conveniences, irrespective of the class in which they travel..... 383

Contract of carriage by second cabin, when considered broken by reason of overcrowding, and lack of reasonable accommodations, and damages therefor..... 383

The master.

Has no lien for wages..... 983

Remedy to enforce payment for services in performance of pilot's duties is in personam, and not in rem..... 983

Page

Remedy for advances for supplies and repairs is in personam..... 983
Cannot assert a lien for additional pay for standing on watch as pilot..... 983
Is liable for all injury caused by unlawful displacing of mate..... 115
Cannot buy cargo at his own sale as agent of owners..... 817
Cannot claim a lay in oil made by part of his crew, left behind after the ship is fully loaded, and brought home by another vessel 303
An agreement for a certain lay on securing a full cargo of oil is enforceable where a full cargo is secured, but not the number of barrels named 303
Master giving another ship-master, brought home by him, a receipt for passage money in a larger amount than actually received to enable the latter to charge the sum to his owners, liable for full amount of receipt 303
No account against a vessel is chargeable against a master unless presented within a reasonable time..... 410

Liens—Generally.

No court can by rule create maritime liens or change the order of existing liens.. 513
The general maritime law gives a lien for a maritime tort upon the offending vessel which travels with the vessel, into whosesoever hands she may go, and irrespective of the place of transfer..... 255

—— For repairs and supplies.

A vessel registered in New York was bought by a resident of Washington, D. C., for use on the Potomac river, and was repaired and supplied in Connecticut on the credit of the vessel. Held, that there was a lien as for repairs and supplies in a foreign port 515
Ships, whether domestic or foreign, liable for repairs, etc., furnished at express or implied request of owner or master, whether in home port or not. (Adm. Rule 12, as amended 1872.)..... *209
Ship carpenters employed by contractor have lien, unless there is express or implied notice that they must look only to the contractor 209
A libel by employes of a contractor, which fails to allege that the contractor had authority to make the repairs or to employ libelants, is insufficient..... 209
Mere proof that sails were furnished by written order of master, with directions to charge them to the vessel and her owners, is not sufficient to establish lien for supplies *1101

—— Priority and enforcement.

Mortgage lien (Rev. St. § 4192) is inferior to all strictly maritime liens, but is superior to subsequent liens given by state legislature for supplies in home port..... 513
Proceeds of sale of vessel may be applied in extinguishment of mortgage, though it cannot be foreclosed in equity..... 983
A remedy given by the general maritime law may be enforced against a vessel, although she was seized and sold under a state statute..... 10

—— Waiver, discharge, and extinguishment.

Notice to purchaser will keep lien alive if sufficient purchase money remains unpaid to meet it 73
Purchaser of vessel is bound to exercise reasonable diligence to ascertain nature and amount of existing liens..... 73
As against bona fide purchasers without notice, lien for repairs and supplies in foreign port, held not lost by eight months delay to enforce it..... 515

Liens—Under state statutes. Page

A state legislature cannot create a lien upon a vessel which shall have priority over one already existing under an act of congress 513
Sale of vessel under decree of state court, in satisfaction of lien under state law, extinguishes prior maritime liens, and is binding on courts of other states..... 238

SLAVES.

When deed of, not invalidated by removal 702
Importation from Virginia to District of Columbia held not contrary to law.....1037
Finding of 300 Africans on board a vessel held sufficient proof of probable cause for issuing warrant of arrest for engaging in slave trade 1015

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE.

Sufficiency of execution of deed of infant by guardian under decree for specific performance 737

STATES.

A state may by contract give certain persons exclusive privileges..... 580

STATUTES.

Act not void because its title misrecites the date of the act to which it is supplementary 574
Act not void because its title purports it to be an act supplementary to an act which expired by its own limitation, where such act was subsequently revived..... 574
Implied repeal not inferred by omission of short expression in repetition in supplemental act of section of former statute.... 37
Relating to construction of state roads and canals construed according to their spirit, though seemingly contrary to their letter 784
An authority to appropriate private lands will be implied as necessary to effectuate the object of the statutes providing for the construction of state railroads and canal 784

TAXES.

Individual property held within the state may be taxed by the state. The property of the Bank of the United States is no exception 692
Land purchased from the United States, and paid for, is liable to taxation, though patent not issued..... 71
Exemption of Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company from taxation under Mo. Act Dec. 25, 1852.....173, 365
Back taxes on realty (in Missouri) cannot be collected from the personal property of a subsequent purchaser..... 173
The corporation of Alexandria has a right to collect taxes by distress and sale and to raise taxes for purposes and works out of the town.....1108
Replevin lies for property seized by a tax collector under void assessment..... 173

TELEGRAPH COMPANIES.

Not authorized by acts establishing post roads, or Act July 24, 1866, to establish lines over right of way of railroad company without making compensation..... 176

TENDER.

A declaration by a person that he will not receive money about to be tendered excuses its production..... 818

Page

A tender to the pledgee of a vessel, who has bought her at an attachment sale, by another creditor, must include the expense of repairs made by him..... 818

TREATIES.

The right to reside in the United States, given by treaty, implies the right to labor there, which right the states have no power to restrict..... 472

TRESPASS.

In an action for a tort to personal property, possession, accompanied by an assertion of ownership, is prima facie evidence of property..... 988

TRIAL.

An action to recover for payments due under a railroad construction contract is not local 280

Plaintiff in an action at law cannot be ruled to trial without notice where defendant has filed a bill in equity on the ground that the remedy at law was not adequate.. 768

Where one of joint defendants offers ready for trial, plaintiff cannot continue until the other is taken, but may amend.... 637

Party holding affirmative of issue has right to open and close argument.....1119

On a plea of tender, etc., defendant has right to open and close..... 215

The court will not give an instruction unless justified by the evidence. Rules of determining such fact 601

Question of usury in written contract is for court 750

Court cannot, upon a special verdict, infer facts not actually found..... 615

Upon a demurrer to evidence, judgment not rendered for plaintiff if declaration substantially defective 733

TRUSTS.

Trustees under an assignment of assets for certain purposes cannot vary its terms and accept payment of debts in a manner not contemplated therein..... 687

The legal estate passes by a deed of bargain and sale made by a trustee, whether the terms of the trust are complied with or not 686

There can be no disseisin of a trust, though the exercise of an adverse possession for a great length of time may in equity bar it..... 495

Time begins to run against a trust only when its open disavowal is clearly and unequivocally made known to the cestui que trust 495

Jurisdiction of courts of equity over trusts, and of the appointment of agent... 804

Trustees are entitled to commissions of 5 per cent. on money passing through their hands 31

USURY.

Ill. Act 1857, in relation to interest and usury, construed 911

The statute of usury applies to contracts of corporations..... 607

The discount by a bank of a note made directly payable to itself is not usurious.. 679

Compound interest is not illegal, and may be recovered when a part of the contract.. 407

Charging interest on balances of running accounts, regularly transmitted according to custom of trade, is not usury..... 777

Taking 64 days' discount on a 60 days' note is not usury..... 691

Page

Treating a note as discounted on the day of its date, where proceeds were not carried to the credit of the party until later, is not usury where checks were previously drawn against it 750

Usury cannot be set up or bill to set aside mortgage unless it is alleged..... 521

Assignee in bankruptcy is not a "legal representative" within statute allowing recovery of penalty from national bank for usury 880, 901

Nor is an indorser of a bill of exchange such "legal representative"..... 880

WAR.

License from blockading squadron to neutral vessel carrying provisions will not authorize refusal of clearance unless illicit intercourse contemplated 988

Party failing to remove the suspicions by evidence in his power, is not entitled to damages for refusal of clearance..... 988

WATERS.

A riparian owner on navigable but nontidal stream is presumed to own the land to the center line of the stream..... 245

An alteration in the course of a navigable stream which deprives a riparian owner of its use as an incident to his land is a taking of private property for which compensation must be made..... 245

WILLS.

An executory devise held good, and to take effect on the happening of the contingency 1172

A general testamentary disposition of all one's "estate, real and personal," to his "heir at law," by one who has no realty, is not a disposition to the next of kin..... 37

"Heir at law," when used in context as a synonym with "lawful heir," does not create an ambiguity, and must be held to mean in Pennsylvania, where testator was technically domiciled, though resident most of his life in England, the person on whom the law of Pennsylvania casts an intestate's estate at the time of his death, though testator evidently meant otherwise 37

A bequest of slaves on condition that they be not carried out of the state or sold, in either of which events said slaves are to be free, is a conditional bequest of freedom, and valid as such..... 7

Upon a devise that a slave should be sold for eight years, after which he should be free, the term begins to run from testator's death, or within a reasonable time thereafter 1096

WITNESSES.

Maker of note cannot be compelled to testify for plaintiff in an action against the indorser, but his letter to plaintiff inclosing note for discount is admissible..... 754

When a certificated bankrupt who has released all future claims upon his estate is a competent witness..... 858

The assignor of the patent is not competent to prove priority upon an interference declared 954

Grantor in deed collaterally introduced, in cause inter alios, is competent to prove that the deed was fraudulently obtained.. 631

Maker of note is competent for indorser.. 631

A stockholder in a company which itself owns stock in plaintiff company is competent for plaintiff..... 614

Wife of one of defendants not competent for plaintiff, though husband has been discharged under insolvent act 614

	Page
A creditor of a firm is competent to prove its existence	614
The cashier of a bank is competent to prove that defendant has overdrawn his account	607
In an action by the indorsee against the maker of a note, the indorser is competent to prove an acknowledgment to remove the bar of the statute of limitations	600
One interested in result of suit is not competent	429
A witness may be competent to testify to general reputation of pedigree, though not one of the family or intimately acquainted with it	583
A bookkeeper of a bank is not obliged, in an action between the bank and a depositor, to answer a question, where the answer might charge him with a loss	741
Counsel may testify as to facts not communicated to them in confidence by their clients	631
Counsel for bankrupt cannot be required to disclose information as to affairs of bankrupt obtained from him or persons referred to by him	64
Witnesses can testify on affirmation only when members of a religious society professing to be conscientiously opposed to oath	647

WEST PUBLISHING CO., PRINTERS AND STEREOTYPERS, ST. PAUL, MINN.