A plea to the jurisdiction of the court was filed in this cause: and the question was, whether a shipwright might sue in the admiralty for his contract wages for building a ship or vessel designed for navigation on the high seas? After long argument, the judge gave his opinion as follows. The authorities which the libellants have urged in favour of the jurisdiction of this court, in the present case, are Croke, 296, and 1 Rolle, 533. All the other authorities adduced having reference to those, except one in 1 Strange, 707. In the first edition of Croke, 296, we find resolutions upon cases of admiralty jurisdiction subscribed by all the judges of both benches, in April, 1632; wherein, amongst other things, it is resolved that a shipwright may sue in the admiralty, provided his suit be against the ship. Rolle, as a faithful abridger, gives the law as it then stood under the authority of these resolutions. In article 19, he mentions the doctrine respecting shipwrights, and cites the case of Tasker v. Gale. And in article 21, he gives the law respecting charter-parties, adding these remarkable words: "As it was declared by the court to have been lately resolved by all the judges of England." So that those resolutions seem to be the only foundation upon which these doctrines rest. And it is very observable, that although Croke records the resolutions as they were subscribed in Hilary term, the eighth of Charles, yet he does not report the case of Tasker v. Gale, although adjudged (according to Rolle) in the ninth of Charles, which must have been but a few months after. Neither hath any other reporter of that period noticed this case. From which it seems probable, that those resolutions, and the judgment in the case of Tasker v. Gale, were not admitted as good law even in that day.

But it is further observable, that when Sir Harbottle Grimestone published Croke's Reports in the year 1657, he prefixed, even to this first edition, a declaration under the title Mantissa, that the resolutions of the judges in February, 1632, were not of authority: and for this reason (according to Comyns) those resolutions were totally omitted in the subsequent editions of that work. Since that time no instance can be found in the books, where either these resolutions, or the case of Tasker v. Gale adjudged thereupon, have been referred to either by the court, or in the pleadings in any adjudged case, except in the case of Wooward v. Bonithan, Sir T. Raymond, p. 3: and there the court declared, that those resolutions had been denied by several judges, and renounced by even some of those who had subscribed them. And of this, Danvers also takes particular notice. Page 271. Therefore the authority of these resolutions seems to have been abolished by general consent. But another case has been referred to as authority in point, viz. 1 Strange, 707. The report is very short, and in these words: "On a motion for a prohibition, it was held, that a carpenter may sue for wages in the admiralty." This report, however, is too slight and solitary to authorize a decision contrary to general established rules. The word "carpenter" doth not precisely indicate a shipwright, but may be applicable to a mariner on board a vessel; and as the cases referred to in the margin of this report, respecting the officers of a ship who sued in the admiralty as mariners, the probability is, that this also was an officer called the "ship's carpenter:" a doubt having arisen whether the subordinate officers of a ship, as well as the master, were not prohibited from suing in the admiralty for wages. If the resolutions of the judges in 1632, and the decision in the case of Tasker v. Gale, were admitted as law, and if the carpenter mentioned in 1 Strange, 707, was the shipwright or builder, how is it possible that the judges so lately as the year 1765, should declare in court, that no instance could be found where both the contract and service were to be done on land, within the body of a county, that the common law courts ever permitted the admiralty to have jurisdiction? I refer to 2 Wils. 265: and this opinion was given in the case of a pilot suing for services done, indeed within the body of a county, but in a case of a much stronger maritime complexion than the present.

There are several exceptions to the general rules of law respecting admiralty jurisdiction, as ascertained by the statutes: such as suits for mariners' wages, and on hypothecations made by the master in foreign parts, &c. &c. which have been so often contested, and so often allowed, for good and weighty reasons, that they have become confirmed law, and it would be in vain now to oppose the general rule to the general practice. But this does not appear to be the case with respect to shipwrights; neither are the same reasons applicable to them. Their contract is made with persons whom they know, or ought to know; their services are all executed within the body of the county, and mostly on dry land above high water mark; their wages have no reference to a voyage performed, or to be performed; the shipwrights have no interest or concern whatever in the vessel after she is on float, and the merchant hath paid for her; and lastly, the practice of former times doth not justify the admiralty's taking cognizance of their suits. Let the bill be dismissed, as not being within the jurisdiction of the court.

[1] [Reported by Hon. Thomas Bee, District Judge.]

Case No. 2,899.

CLINTON et al. v. MAYO.

[12 N. B. R. 39.][1]

District Court, E. D. Virginia. 1875.

PETITION IN INVOLUNTARY BANKRUPTCY — SUFFICIENCY—HEARING ON RETURN DAY—JURY.

1. On the hearing of a petition in compulsory bankruptcy, when the debtor defendant declines to appear and defend in form, but is personally present, the court will hear a suggestion from any creditor, though it is a creditor who is charged with having received a fraudulent preference, that an insufficient number of creditors have joined in the petition.

[Cited in Re Hatje, Case No. 6,215; Re Jonas, Id. 7,442; Re Austin, Id. 662.]

2. When such a suggestion has been made, the court, if the bankrupt is relied upon to prove the insufficiency of the number of petitioning creditors, will require him to make his statement in writing, under oath, and accompany it with a list of all his creditors, and of the amounts due them.

3. If the examination into the question, whether a sufficient number of creditors have joined in the petition, has not been completed at the hearing on the day to which the order on the debtor defendant to show cause has been made returnable, and is continued until the next day, the defendant having been previously served personally with the order, and being personally present on the return day, and having failed on that day to demand a jury for the trial of the charges of acts of bankruptcy; in such a case, the defendant will not be allowed a jury if he demand one on the second day; that not being an "adjourned day" within the meaning of section 41 of the bankrupt law. [14 Stat. 537;] Rev. St. § 5026.

4. In determining whether or not a sufficient number of creditors have joined in a petition, where it is proved that a preferred creditor had "reasonable cause to believe that the debtor was insolvent, and knew that a fraud upon the bankrupt act was intended," the court will throw out of the computation the claim of the creditor so preferred, at least as to a moiety of its amount.

[Cited in Re Currier, Case No. 3,492.]

[1] [Reprinted by permission.]

The petition was filed on the 17th of March, 1875 [by G. D. W. Clinton, and others]. It charged sundry acts of bankruptcy [against D. C. Mayo]. Amongst those specified was the confession of a judgment for twenty-four thousand seven hundred and sixty-three dollars to M. E. McDowell & Co., of Philadelphia, on the 23d of January, 1875. The usual allegations were made as to fraudulent knowledge on the part of the plaintiffs in the judgment, and of insolvency on the part of Mayo, the debtor defendant. A rule was given for a hearing on the 29th of March. On that day Mayo, though personally present, declined to enter a formal appearance, or to deny, by answer, the allegations of the petition. Thereupon, an order was entered treating as confessed, as to Mayo, the acts of bankruptcy charged in the petition, and leaving open only the question whether a sufficient number of creditors had joined in it. The judgment creditors, in the judgment that had been confessed, were present by counsel, and suggested that the number of creditors required by law had not united in the petition; and asked that Mayo might be examined as to who were his creditors and the amounts due them. It was contended by counsel for the petitioning creditors, that none could make the objection now made, of the lack of the required number of creditors as petitioners, save the debtor defendant himself. The court allowed the debtor defendant to be examined, and while he was preparing his denial in writing that a sufficient number of creditors had joined, and preparing his list of creditors and the amounts due them, the examination was laid over until the next day, the 30th of March. On that day, the debtor defendant having changed his mind, asked leave to appear and file, as his answer to the petition, the statement which he had prepared in writing, denying all acts of bankruptcy; denying that a sufficient number of creditors had joined, and setting forth the names of his creditors and the amounts due them; and furthermore filed in writing a demand that the charges of acts of bankruptcy might be tried by a jury. The court refused to allow the writing to be filed as an answer, and treated its denial of acts of bankruptcy as surplusage; but accepted it as his testimony as of a witness called upon to give evidence by a creditor who had suggested that a sufficient number of creditors had not joined in the petition. The court also denied the demand for a jury. The examination was then (on the 30th of March) continued until the 5th of April, and personal notice ordered to be served by the marshal on creditors not present, all of whom were residents of Richmond, except two whose claims were for less amounts than fifty dollars. On the 5th of April the examination proceeded, and was concluded. The statement in writing submitted by Mayo, and his oral testimony, exhibited the following facts:

Aggregate claims of petitioning creditors, which each exceeded $250.00	$ 4,572 34
Claims of petitioning creditors which were less than $250.00	1,785 52
Total claims of petitioning creditors	$ 6,357 86
Aggregate claims of non-petitioning creditors, each greater than $250.00	$21,158 31
Aggregate claims of non-petitioning creditors, each less than $250.00	287 37
Total claims of non-petitioning creditors	$21,445 68
Total of all claims	$27,803 54

The claim of the preferred creditors, M. E. McDowell & Co., was eighteen thousand and sixty-two dollars and eighty-nine cents; and the act of bankruptcy charged, was a confession of judgment which had been given by Mayo to them for twenty-four thousand seven hundred and sixty-three dollars, upon which execution had been taken out. The lien of an execution has the effect, under the laws of Virginia, of divesting the title of the debtor in all personal property, to the amount of the debt, subject only to his right to certain poor debtor and homestead exemptions.

The following was the opinion and decision of the court on the several questions which arose in the examination.

L. H. Chandler and James E. Neeson, for petitioning creditors.

H. A. & J. S. Wise and J. D. Christian, for the firm of M. E. McDowell & Co., creditors who had received a confession of judgment within three months of the filing of the petition.

HUGHES, District Judge. Before the amendment of June, 1874, there was substantially but one inquiry in adjudicating upon involuntary petitions in bankruptcy. It was, whether an act, or acts, of bankruptcy had been committed. The trial of that fact might be by jury, if seasonably demanded by the debtor defendant. The law in that respect remains as before. But the amendment of June, 1874, superadds another inquiry. It gives jurisdiction in involuntary bankruptcy only in cases where a fourth in number and a third in value of the creditors unite in the petition. Accordingly, there are substantially two charges in this petition: First. That certain acts of bankruptcy have been committed; and, second. That a fourth in number and a third in interest of the creditors have united in the petition. The debtor was called upon to answer these charges on the 29th day of March. He declined, though personally present on that day, to formally appear and defend. The court, therefore, had nothing to do as to the first charge, but to take it for confessed that the acts of bankruptcy charged in the petition were committed, and treat that part of the petition as adjudicated. But the amendment of June, 1874 [18 Stat. 180], now also requires that the court shall be "satisfied" that the number of creditors which has been stated shall have united in the petition; and provides that if the bankrupt deny the allegation of the petition in this respect, his denial shall be in writing; and he shall be required at once to file a schedule of all his creditors, and of the amounts due them. Then, if it appear to the court that the number having signed the petition is short of what is requisite, ten days are to be given the petitioners in which to add the proper number. I therefore required the debtor, Mayo, when called upon to testify as a witness, to put his denial in writing, under oath, and at once to file a list of his creditors and the amounts due them.

As to the point insisted upon by counsel, that the creditors who have received a confession of judgment giving them a preference, should not be heard to make the objection of insufficiency in the number of petitioning creditors; it is true that they are not yet regularly in court, and will not be until either they shall have proved their claim, or a bill in chancery shall have been filed to set aside their judgment; still, not only they, but any one may suggest at the return day of the order on the debtor to show cause, that the number of petitioners is not sufficient; and, either upon such suggestion, or ex mero motu, in order to be "satisfied" on that point, the court will call upon the debtor for a list of his creditors, and take any other evidence it can avail itself of on that subject. I accordingly did, at the suggestion of M. E. McDowell & Co., call upon Mayo for such a statement. The demand for a jury was not made by the debtor defendant, Mayo, on the return day of the order on him to show cause. He was present on that day, though he did not enter a formal appearance. The return of the marshal on the order was that he had been served with a copy of it on the 20th of March. When such service has been made, and the debtor is present, the terms of section 5025 of the Revised Statutes do not authorize an "adjourned day" for the hearing of the petition; and, therefore, the terms of section 5026 require that the demand in writing for a jury shall be made on the return day, and do not give that right on any other day. I therefore denied the demand for a jury in writing on the 30th, which the law expressly required to be made on the 29th of March.

The single question now left in this case is, whether the debt of twenty-four thousand seven hundred and sixty-three dollars, for which the confession of judgment given on the 23d day of January, 1875, for the purpose of preferring M. E. McDowell & Co., is provable in whole, or for a moiety, and to be computed as to the whole or only as to half, in this preliminary proceeding. Before the amended bankrupt act of the 22d of June, 1874, if the claim of a creditor were doubted by the judge or disputed, especially a claim for which a creditor had accepted a preference, it was postponed, and could not be proved until after an assignee was appointed. There was then no provision in the bankrupt law requiring that any specific number of creditors should join in a petition in involuntary bankruptcy; and no computation was necessary of the number of creditors, which could be affected by postponing the proof of the claim. Before the amendment of June 22, 1874, requiring a specific number of petitioning creditors to join in such a petition, there was no provision in the 39th section authorizing or requiring the court to pass upon the question, whether a preference had been given in fraud of the provisions of the bankrupt act, in adjudicating upon the petition in involuntary bankruptcy; because it was then unnecessary to give it that power. But when the amendment of June 22, 1874, was passed, an additional clause was added to the 39th section, immediately following the clauses requiring a specific number of creditors to join in the petition; which clause was, in fact, made necessary by that amendment. That clause empowers the court, at the time of ascertaining whether one-fourth in number and one-third in amount of creditors had joined in the petition, to decide, pro hac vice, whether the preferred creditor had had "reasonable cause to believe that the debtor was insolvent; and knew that a fraud upon the bankrupt act was intended." I say it was necessary to add this clause to the 39th section, and to give this power to the court, at least for the purposes of adjudication. I do not pretend that the decision of this court on this question, in this preliminary stage of the proceeding, is final and conclusive as against the parties to the preference; but a decision is necessary, and is final, so far as the preference affects the jurisdiction of the court to adjudicate upon the petition. If the court did not have this power, all that it would be necessary for any creditor and a colluding insolvent to do to defeat the proceeding in bankruptcy, would be to arrange a confession of judgment for a sum so large as to exceed by double the aggregate claims of bona fide creditors. The validity of the confession of judgment now under consideration being the only question left in this case, what are the facts in regard to it? The debtor defendant Mayo is made a witness and put upon the stand by M. E. McDowell & Co. He proves that M. E. McDowell, the senior partner, "was a whole week, till Friday, January 22, 1874, examining Mayo's affairs, and that it appeared upon the examination of his accounts, that his assets were less than his liabilities." He proves that this appeared at the examination in his factory, when Mayo's liability to McDowell & Co. was ascertained on that Friday, January 22, 1875, to be less than sixteen thousand dollars. He proves that on the next day, McDowell & Co. took a confession of judgment from him for twenty-four thousand seven hundred and sixty-three dollars. He proves, also, that on the day of confessing the judgment for this larger amount, he asked McDowell & Co.'s counsel, in the presence of M. E. McDowell, whether this confession of judgment would be an act of bankruptcy, and that this counsel (who did not seem to know of the previous examination of his affairs by McDowell, which had disclosed to him Mayo's insolvency), advised him to consult his own counsel; but stated that the amount for which the judgment was to be confessed was too large to allow of the remaining creditors taking steps in bankruptcy. Do these facts, proved by the witness whom McDowell & Co. themselves put upon the stand, show that that firm "had reasonable cause to believe that the debtor was insolvent, and knew that a fraud on the bankrupt act was intended?" Certainly they had reasonable cause to believe Mayo's insolvency, for they knew that he was insolvent by a long familiarity with, and a recent week's examination of his affairs. Did they also know that Mayo intended a fraud upon the bankrupt act? A fraud upon that act is an effort to defeat its objects. The leading object of that act is to secure a pro rata distribution among creditors, of the estate of the bankrupt. This confession of judgment could not but defeat that object, and could not but have been intended to defeat that object by Mayo; and M. E. McDowell could not but have known that that was Mayo's intention. If, then, it be a maxim of law that no man shall be allowed to take advantage of his own wrong; and if it be true that a fraud upon a statute cannot be allowed to defeat the purposes of the statute, am I at liberty to treat this claim of McDowell & Co. as a provable debt for the purpose of defeating the jurisdiction of this court in this proceeding?

It is not necessary for me in determining the question now before the court, to pass upon the question of "actual fraud." There is a distinction between fraud upon the bankrupt act, and "actual fraud." Taking a preference from an insolvent, knowing him to be an insolvent, is a fraud upon the act; though it may be honest in a merely moral point of view. But if a confession of judgment were taken in this case for twenty-four thousand dollars when the amount really due was only sixteen thousand dollars, then there would have been "actual fraud." I cannot at this stage of the case try the question of "actual fraud" in the meaning of the clause of the 39th section, running in these words: "And such person, if a creditor, shall not, in cases of actual fraud, be allowed to prove for more than a moiety of his debt." That question must be tried and determined at a future period, under a plenary proceeding in chancery; and I expressly disclaim passing now upon the question of "actual fraud." But, for the purpose of determining the jurisdiction of the court, I am obliged to deal with the confession of judgment at once, so far as to decide whether or not it was a fraud upon the bankrupt act. Upon the evidence of Mr. Mayo I feel bound to decide that it was. If so, it cannot be computed in estimating the aggregate provable claims against the debtor, at least as to half of its amount. The amendment of June, 1874, and section 23 of the original act, must be taken together. Section 23 does not use the word "fraud." It simply declares that a preference taken from a debtor, when reasonable cause existed for believing that he was insolvent, shall not be proved, etc., until the preferred creditor has surrendered the property received under the act of preference. The same section provides that where the validity of any claim is doubted by the judge, the proof of it shall be postponed until the appointment of the assignee; which is as much as to say that the debt is not provable at the date of adjudication, in whole or in part. The clause last quoted from the 39th section provides that a creditor guilty of "actual fraud" shall not be allowed to prove for more than half of his debt; but if the 23d section is to stand, this proof for the moiety of the debt is not admissible until after the assignee is appointed. I think, therefore, that this debt cannot be received or counted as proved or as provable until after the assignee shall have been appointed. A doubtful claim cannot be considered as provable until after it has been proved. For the purpose of determining the jurisdiction of the court, I must refuse to treat the claim of McDowell & Co. as provable until it is proved, in pursuance of the provisions of the 23d section. Whether it will then be provable in whole, or only for a moiety, is not material to the question now to be decided, inasmuch as the number of petitioning creditors is sufficient to give jurisdiction to the court to adjudicate upon this petition, in either event. I decide, therefore, that a sufficient number of creditors have joined in the petition, and that an order of adjudication must be made.

CLINTON (QUIRK v.). See Case No. 11,518.

CLINTON & S. R. CO. (SCOTT v.). See Case No. 12,527.

Case No. 2,900.

In re CLINTON BRIDGE.

[1 Woolw. 150;[1] 7 Am. Law Reg. (N. S.) 149.]

Circuit Court, D. Iowa. Oct. Term, 1867.[2]

EFFECT OF A STATUTE ON PENDING LITIGATIONS — SUCH A LAW IS NOT UNCONSTITUTIONAL — THE COMMERCIAL CLAUSE—INTERFERENCE WITH JURISDICTION OF COURT.

1. An act declaring a bridge a lawful structure, pending a suit to have it declared a nuisance, has the effect to remove the ground of complaint made against it. By its own terms it seems to do so; for it describes it as a bridge already erected, and congress must have known of the complaints made against it. It makes lawful the bridge which was before unlawful; and the court must be governed by the law as it is when it is called upon to act.

2. A law declaring lawful a bridge over the Mississippi, which obstructs the navigation of the river, is not unconstitutional because of the treaty with France, by which its free navigation is secured. Such questions are international and political in their character, and belong to the executive and legislative departments of the government.

[Cited in Buckner v. Street, Case No. 2,098; U. S. v. Tobacco Factory, Id. 16,528; U. S. v. Bridleman, 7 Fed. 902; Bartram v. Robertson, 15 Fed. 214; The Head-Money Cases, 18 Fed. 141; Edye v. Robertson, 112 U. S. 580, 5 Sup. Ct. 253.]

3. A law authorizing such a bridge to be built, and prescribing general rules for its construction and maintenance, is a regulation of commerce, and is within the powers conferred on congress by the commercial clause of the constitution. It was so held in the Wheeling Bridge Case, 18 How. [59 U. S.] 421.

4. Any means by which passengers and merchandise are transported is an element of commerce. This has been repeatedly held in respect of navigation, and congress has legislated on the subject accordingly. The railroad, as much as the steamboat, is a means of interchanging persons and property, which interchange is commerce itself. When railroads become portions of the great highways of our Union, acting an important part in a commerce which embraces many states, to regulate them is to regulate commerce. This is true of a bridge over a great river for the passage of such railroad.

[Approved in Union Pac. R. Co. v. Peniston, 18 Wall. (85 U. S.) 47. Cited in Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Railroad Commission of Tennessee, 19 Fed. 712.]

5. The act is decisive of the case, becase it furnishes a rule by which the action of the court is determined, not because it deprives the court of jurisdiction.

[See note at end of case.]

This was a bill in equity, filed by [Richard C.] Gray on the 2d day of March, 1861 [against the Chicago, Iowa and Nebraska Railroad Company and others], complaining of a bridge across the Mississippi river, on the ground that it presents a serious obstruction to the navigation of that river, and asking its abatement as a nuisance. The authority to build the bridge was derived from the state of Illinois, by an act incorporating the Albany Bridge Company, and from the state of Iowa, under its general law on the subject. On the Iowa side of the river, it was located at Clinton. To that point, from Chicago, a railroad was built and operated by the Chicago and Northwestern Railroad Company. Thence west to Cedar Rapids in Iowa, ran the Clinton and Cedar Rapids Railroad, which was already constructed and being operated; and from Cedar Rapids to Omaha, in Nebraska, the Cedar Rapids and Missouri River Railroad was in process of construction. At Omaha, the last mentioned road would, when completed, connect with the Union Pacific Railroad. So that from Chicago, through Illinois, Iowa, and Nebraska, a large and important commerce was being opened and carried on, all of which crossed the Mississippi upon this bridge. The defendant's answer to the bill came in on the 7th of November, 1864, and very voluminous proofs touching the business done at this point, the manner of the construction of the bridge, its effect upon the river and the navigation thereof, were taken. The testimony having been closed, the cause was set down to be heard upon pleadings, proofs, and exhibits. The cause being in this attitude, on the 27th day of February, 1867, congress passed an act [14 Stat. 412] declaring the bridge a post route, and lawful structure as follows:

[1] [Reported by James M. Woolworth, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

[2] [Affirmed in The Clinton Bridge, 10 Wall. (77 U. S.) 454.]

"Be it enacted by the senate and house of representatives of the United States of America, in congress assembled, that the bridge across the Mississippi river erected by the Albany Bridge Company, and the Chicago, Iowa, and Nebraska Railroad Company, under the authority of the states of Iowa and Illinois, between the towns of Clinton, Iowa, and Albany, Illinois, shall be a lawful structure, and shall be recognized and known as a post route, upon which also no higher charge shall be made for the transmission over the same of the mails, the troops, and the munitions of war of the United States, than the rate per mile paid for their transportation over the railroads or public highways leading to the said bridge.

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, that the draw of said bridge shall be opened promptly, upon reasonable signal, for the passage of boats whose construction shall not be such as to admit of their passage under the permanent spans of said bridge, except when trains are passing over the same; but in no case shall unnecessary delay occur in opening the said draw during or after the passage of trains.

"Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, that in case of any litigation hereafter arising from any alleged obstruction to the free navigation of said river, the cause may be tried before the circuit court of the United States of any state in which any portion of said obstruction or bridge touches.

"Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, that the right to alter or amend this act, so as to prevent or remove all material obstructions to the navigation of said river, by the construction of said bridge, is hereby expressly reserved." 14 Stat. 412.

The defendants now moved the court to dismiss the bill, on the ground that this act took away its jurisdiction to determine the questions involved in it.

Mr. Howe, for motion.

Mr. Grant and Mr. T. D. Lincoln, contra.

Before MILLER, Circuit Justice, and LOVE, District Judge.

MILLER, Circuit Justice. This is a bill in chancery to procure the abatement of the bridge as a nuisance, on the ground that it presents a serious obstruction to the navigation of the Mississippi river. The pleadings are at issue, the depositions all taken, and the case set down for hearing.

The defendants now present a motion to dismiss the bill for want of jurisdiction. This motion is founded on the act of congress of February 27, 1867 (14 Stat. 412), which, it is claimed, takes away the jurisdiction of the court to proceed further in this case. The complainant, on the other hand, maintains, that the act, rightly construed, does not dispose of the present suit; and that, if its true construction has such effect, it is unconstitutional. It is said, that because the third section provides for litigation about the bridge after the passage of the act, and vests jurisdiction thereof in the circuit courts, congress could not have intended to conclude the question raised by this bill, which was then pending. But the second section of the act makes certain regulations concering the use of the draw in the bridge, and contemplates that suits may grow out of their neglect or violation. It is to this litigation that the third section seems most naturally to refer. At all events, it is a species of litigation to arise after the passage of the act, to which alone that section, by its own terms, can apply.

The first section of the act, after describing a bridge already erected across the Mississippi river at Clinton, declares, that "it shall be a lawful structure, and shall be recognized and known as a post route." It cannot be doubted that congress was aware of the existence of the bridge, and that it had been complained of as an unauthorized and illegal obstruction to navigation. Undoubtedly, by this act congress intended, so far as it had the power, to remove therefrom the objection of illegality and want of authorization. The declaration that it shall be a lawful structure admits of no other interpretation. The language is almost identical with that used by the same body in reference to the Wheeling bridge, where the supreme court has held that such was its intent. [Pennsylvania v. Wheeling & B. Bridge Co.] 18 How. [59 U. S.] 421.

But it is not necessary to determine whether congress intentionally referred to this suit at the time of passing the act, or whether it was aware that such a suit was pending. If it had the power to make this bridge lawful, which before was unlawful, it has done so in this case; and the court must be governed by the law as it exists at the time when it is called upon to act.

The objections taken to the constitutionality of the act are these: 1. That it violates the obligations of certain treaties between the United States and foreign nations, which in effect declare that the navigation of the Mississippi river shall remain free and unobstructed forever. 2. That no power exists in congress to authorize or regulate bridges over the navigable streams of the United States. 3. That such special legislation, while a suit is pending in the courts involving the same matter, is an invasion of the rights of the judicial department of the government, as secured by the constitution.

1. In reference to the first of these objections, we need not inquire whether the treaties referred to were designed to affect such cases as the one before us or not; for we are of opinion that whatever obligation they may have imposed upon our government, the courts possess no power to declare a statute passed by congress and approved by the president, void, because it may violate such obligations. See The Amiable Isabella, 6 Wheat. [19 U. S.] 1.

Questions of this class are international questions, and are to be settled between the foreign nations interested in the treaties and the political department of our government. When those departments declare a treaty abrogated, annulled, or modified, it is not for the judicial branch of the government to set it up, and assert its continued obligation. If the court could do this, it could annul declarations of war, suspend the levy of armies, and become a great international arbiter, instead of a court of justice for the administration of the laws of the United States. See Georgia v. Stanton, 6 Wall. [73 U. S.] 50.

2. The second of these objections involves the consideration of the commercial clause, as it is appropriately called, of the constitution. If the determination of the circumstances under which a bridge may be built over a navigable stream, or the prescribing of general rules for its construction and maintenance, be a regulation of commerce, either with foreign nations or among the states, then the enactment under consideration falls within the powers conferred on congress by that clause.

It would be sufficient, in this court, to say that we are concluded on this question by the decision of the supreme court in the Wheeling Bridge Case, already referred to, in that part which expressly holds that the power to declare such a bridge a lawful structure is included within this clause of the constitution. That case was decided when it was first before the supreme court in 1852, and is reported in 13 How. [54 U. S.] 518. Its circumstances at that time were briefly these: A bridge over the Ohio at Wheeling being in process of construction, the state of Pennsylvania, alleging certain circumstances in which the bridge would operate to its special injury, commenced an original suit in the supreme court to have the structure declared a nuisance, and as such its erection enjoined, and it abated. Thereupon the state of Virginia passed an act declaring it lawful, and the validity of this enactment, among other things, was drawn in question. The court found that the state legislation conflicted with that of congress regulating commerce upon the river between the different states, adjudged the bridge a nuisance, and that it should be abated. Afterwards congress passed an act declaring the bridge a lawful structure, and a post road for the passage of the mails of the United States. A bill being filed to carry the former decree into execution, an injunction was allowed by Mr. Justice Grier against the renewal of work on the bridge, which being disregarded, motions were made in the court at its December term, 1858, for attachment for contempt, and for sequestration; and a counter motion to dissolve the injunction. This brought up the question of the validity and effect of the act of congress. The opinion delivered by Mr. Justice Nelson is found in [Pennsylvania v. Wheeling & B. Bridge Co.] 18 How. [59 U. S.] 421. On the subject of the competency of congress under the commercial clause of the constitution to pass the act, he says: "Since, however, the rendition of this decree, the acts of congress already referred to have been passed, by which the bridge is made a post road for the passage of the mails of the United States, and the defendants are authorized to have and maintain it at its present site and elevation, and requiring all persons navigating the river to regulate such navigation so as not to interfere with it.

"So far, therefore, as this bridge created an obstruction to the free navigation of the river, in view of the previous acts of congress, they are to be regarded as modified by this subsequent legislation; and although it still may be an obstruction in fact, is not so in the contemplation of law. We have already said, and the principle is undoubted, that the act of the legislature of Virginia conferred full authority to erect and maintain the bridge, subject to the exercise of the power of congress to regulate the navigation of the river. That body having, in the exercise of this power, regulated the navigation consistent with its preservation and continuation, the authority to maintain it would seem to be complete. That authority combines the concurrent powers of both governments, state and federal, which, if not sufficient, certainly none can be found in our system of government.

"We do not enter upon the question whether or not congress possess the power, under the authority in the constitution, 'to establish post-offices and post-roads,' to legalize this bridge; for, conceding that no such powers can be derived from this clause, it must be admitted that it is at least necessarily included in the power conferred to regulate commerce among the several states. The regulation of commerce includes intercourse and navigation, and, of course, the power to determine what shall or shall not be deemed, in judgment of law, an obstruction to navigation; and that power, as we have seen, has been exercised consistent with the continuance of the bridge."

There was great disagreement between the judges in their views of the case, in consequence of which the authority of the decision has been much questioned. But this court is bound by the law as the majority of the judges there held it. In the supreme court this would not be the case, the judges sitting there being left to review the ground.

But I will not rest on the authority of that case alone. I think that the proposition declared in it is well founded in principle. The power to regulate commerce is one of the most useful confided to the federal government; and its exercise has done as much as that of any other to create and foster that strongest bond of nationality—a community of interests among the states. The want of it was one of the most pressing necessities which led to the formation of the constitution. The clause has always received, at the hands of the courts and of congress, a construction tending liberally to promote its beneficent object.

The power to regulate commerce, is the power to regulate the instruments of commerce. In the case of Cooley v. Board of Wardens [12 How. (53 U S.) 299], the court says, that "the power to regulate navigation is the power to prescribe rules in conformity with which navigation must be carried on. It extends to the persons who conduct it, as well as to the instruments used." Navigation is here spoken of as one of the subjects of legislation included in the power to regulate commerce. In this view of the subject, congress has passed statutes regulating steamboats, their construction, equipment, officers, and crews, prescribing qualifications of pilots and engineers, limiting the number of passengers they may carry, and prescribing the signals they shall use in passing each other; in short, it has established a minute code for building and navigating those vessels. The right to do this depends wholly on the power vested in congress to regulate commerce, and has never been disputed.

Navigation, however, is only one of the elements of commerce. It is an element of commerce, because it affords the means of transporting passengers and merchandise, the interchange of which is commerce itself. Any other mode of effecting this would be as much an element of commerce as navigation. When this transportation or interchange of commodities is carried on by land, it is commerce, as well as when it is carried on by water; and the power of congress to regulate it is as ample in the one case as in the other. The "commerce among the states," spoken of in the constitution, must, at the time that instrument was adopted, have been mainly of this character; for the steamboat, which has created our great internal commerce on the rivers, was then unknown.

Another means of transportation, equal in importance to the steamboat, has also come into existence since the constitution was adopted. By it, merchandise is transported across states and kingdoms in the same vehicle in which it started. The railroad now shares with the steamboat the monopoly of the carrying trade. The one has, with great benefit, been subjected to the control of salutary congressional legislation [because it is an instrument of commerce].[3] Is there any reason why the other should not be? However this question may be answered in regard to that commerce which is conducted wholly within the limits of a state, and which is therefore neither foreign commerce, nor commerce among the states, it seems to me that when these roads become parts of the great highways of our Union, acting an important part in a commerce which embraces many states, and destined, as some of these roads are, to become the channels through which the nations of Europe and Asia shall interchange their commodities, there can be no reason to doubt that to regulate them is to regulate commerce both with foreign nations and among the states, and that to refuse to do this is a refusal to discharge one of the most important duties of the federal government. As already intimated, the shackles with which the different states fettered commerce in their selfish efforts to benefit themselves at the expense of their confederates, was one of the main causes which led to the formation of our present constitution. The wonderful growth of that commerce since it has been placed exclusively under the control of the federal government, has justified the wisdom of our fathers. But are we to remit the most valuable part of it to the control of the states through whose territories it must be conducted, and to all the vexations and burdens which they may impose? And must all this be permitted, because the carrying is done by a method not thought of when the constitution was framed?

For myself, I must say that I have no doubt of the right of congress to prescribe all needful and proper regulations for the conduct of this immense traffic, over any railroad which has voluntarily become part of any of those lines of inter-state communication, or to authorize the creation of such roads, when the purposes of inter-state transportation of persons and property justify or require it.

The bridge which we are now considering constitutes a part of an unbroken iron track from the Atlantic seaboard to the Missouri river, over which many thousand persons and millions of dollars' worth of merchandise are carried every year. Within two or three years, it is confidently believed, this track will be without break from the Atlantic to the Pacific ocean, and will carry the commerce of continents. Can it be seriously doubted that, in reference to this commerce, the magnitude of which we can hardly conceive, congress can prescribe the place where the bridge shall be built, over which it crosses the Mississippi, and can make such regulations concerning its character and its use as shall be best for the commerce of the river, as well as of the road? The commerce of the river, and the commerce across the river, are both commerce among the states, and may be regulated by congress, and when any regulation is necessary, should be so regulated.

[3] [From 7 Am. Law Reg. (N. S.) 149.]

And in these views I am confirmed by the language held by the federal courts on this provision of the constitution. In nearly every case the question was as to the force and effect of state legislation, when it conflicted, or was supposed to conflict, with congressional legislation. But the judges, in their opinions, often speak of the power of congress under the commercial clause.

The great case of Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 1, arose upon an act of the legislature of New York, granting to Fulton, the inventor, and Livingston, his associate, the exclusive right to navigate the waters of that state with boats propelled by steam; and the question was whether this act conflicted with the laws of the United States regulating the coasting trade. Chief Justice Marshall delivered the opinion of the court, and supported its decision by reasoning so cogent that it has never been questioned. He defines commerce in terms so comprehensive as to include within its meaning railroads, as well as steamboats, of which he is speaking. He says: "Commerce undoubtedly is traffic; but it is something more—it is intercourse. It describes the commercial intercourse between nations, and parts of nations, in all its branches; and is regulated by prescribing rules for carrying on that intercourse." Id. 189. And again, "These words comprehend every species of commercial intercourse between the United States and foreign nations. No sort of trade can be carried on between this country and any other, to which this power does not extend." Id. 193, 194. "In regulating commerce with foreign nations, the power of congress does not stop at the jurisdictional lines of the several states. It would be a very useless power if it could not pass those lines. If congress has the power to regulate it, that power must be exercised wherever the subject exists. If it exists within the states, if a foreign voyage may commence or terminate at a port within a state, then the power of congress may be exercised within a state." Id. 195. "The power of congress, then, comprehends navigation within the limits of every state in the Union, so far as that navigation may be connected with commerce with foreign nations or among the several states." Id. 197. And again, "It is the power to regulate, that is, to prescribe, the rule by which commerce is governed." Id. 196. "Vessels," said the chief justice, "have always been employed to a greater or less extent in the transportation of passengers, and have never been supposed to be on that account withdrawn from the control or protection of congress. Packets which ply along the coast, as well as those which make voyages between Europe and America, consider the transportation of passengers as an important part of their business. Yet it has never been suspected that the general laws of navigation did not apply to them." And again, "A coasting vessel employed in the transportation of passengers, is as much a portion of the American marine as one employed in the transportation of a cargo." Id. 215, 216.

U. S. v. Coombs, 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 72, was an indictment under the act punishing thefts of goods belonging to vessels in distress, although committed above high-water mark. Upon the question of the competency of congress to pass such act, Mr. Justice Story, delivering the opinion of the court, said, "But we are of opinion that under the clause of the constitution giving power to congress 'to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several states,' congress possessed the power to punish offences of the sort which are enumerated in the ninth section of the act of 1825 [4 Stat. 116], now under consideration. The power to regulate commerce includes the power to regulate navigation, as connected with the commerce of foreign nations, and among the states. It was so held and decided by this court, after the most deliberate consideration, in the case of Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 189–198. It does not stop at the mere boundary line of a state, nor is it confined to acts done on the water, or in the necessary course of the navigation thereof. It extends to such acts done on land, which interfere with, obstruct, or prevent the due exercise of the power to regulate commerce and navigation with foreign nations, and among the states. Any offence which thus interferes with, obstructs, or prevents such commerce and navigation, though done on land, may be punished by congress, under its general authority to make all laws necessary and proper to execute its delegated constitutional powers."

In Corfield v. Coryell [Case No. 3,230], Mr. Justice Washington, in the course of his opinion, said, "The first question is, whether this act, or either section of it, is repugnant to the power granted to congress to regulate commerce. Commerce with foreign nations, and among the several states, can mean nothing more than intercourse with those nations, and among those states, for purposes of trade, be the object of the trade what it may; and this intercourse must include all the means by which it can be carried on, whether by the free navigation of the waters of the several states, or by a passage over land through the states, where such passage becomes necessary to the commercial intercourse between the states. It is this intercourse which congress is invested with the power of regulating, and with which no state has a right to interfere."

In Cooley v. Board of Wardens of Port of Philadelphia, 12 How. [53 U. S.] 299, the supreme court, Mr. Justice Curtis delivering its opinion, held that a regulation of pilots and pilotage is a regulation of commerce within the grant to congress of the commercial power; and he says, "The power to regulate navigation is the power to prescribe rules in conformity with which navigation must be carried on. It extends to the persons who conduct it, as well as to the instruments used."

In Gilman v. Philadelphia, 3 Wall. [70 U. S.] 713, it was held, that "the power to regulate commerce comprehends the control for that purpose, and to the extent necessary, of all the navigable waters of the United States which are accessible from a state other than those on which they lie; and includes, necessarily, the power to keep them open and free from any obstruction to their navigation, interposed by the states or otherwise. And it is for congress to determine when its full power shall be brought into activity, and as to the regulations and sanctions which shall be provided."

And while conceding to the states the power to authorize the construction of bridges, turnpikes, streets, and railroads, in answer to the objection that such a concession to the states would arm them with a power potent for evil and liable to abuse, it was expressly said, that "congress may interpose, whenever it shall be deemed necessary, by general or special laws. It may regulate all bridges over navigable waters, remove offending bridges, and punish those who shall thereafter erect them. Within the sphere of their authority, both the legislative and judicial power of the nation are supreme. A different doctrine finds no warrant in the constitution, and is abnormal and revolutionary."

In these cases, the judges have been speaking of navigation. But the terms of the constitution are not confined to that mode of conducting commerce. Any other means of commerce are obviously within its terms, and the language of the extracts above given either distinctly state or clearly import such fact. I have shown that railways are now means of inter-state commerce as well as steamboats. Their iron tracks, extending from ocean to ocean, are no more limited by political boundaries than are the rivers which rise in one state and flow through others to the sea. Over the former, propelled by one application of the motive power of steam, roll many cars, laden with the products and fabrics of one section of the country for the supply of the wants of a distant section. Through the latter, propelled by another application of the same power, ply the steamers, laden in like manner, and discharging a like beneficent office. Where lies the difference between them? Why should not the power which regulates one extend to the control of the other?

Whatever might be my individual opinion, as a member of the supreme court, upon the proposition that the statute under consideration is an invasion of the judicial powers of this court, I am, while sitting here, bound by the decision in the Wheeling Bridge Case, already referred to, where this question was raised and decided.

The statement of this case above shows that the interference by congress there was even after the decree of the court. Mr. Justice Nelson, considering the objection urged, that the act of congress had the effect and operation to annul the judgment of the court, shows that the bridge was unlawful because its erection was a violation of the federal legislation, and that when this legislation was modified, it was unlawful no longer. He says, "If, in the meantime, since the decree, this right has been modified by the competent authority, so that the bridge is no longer an unlawful obstruction, it is quite plain the decree of the court cannot be enforced. There is no longer any interference with the enjoyment of the public right inconsistent with law, no more than there would be where the plaintiff himself had consented to it after the rendition of the decree."

The act of February 27, 1867 [14 Stat. 412], then, in our opinion, must finally dispose of this case. But it does so by furnishing a rule of law on which it must be decided, and not by depriving the court of jurisdiction. When reached for hearing, therefore, the bill must be dismissed, not for want of jurisdiction, but on the merits. For this and other reasons the present motion cannot prevail. Motion overruled.

The motion having been thus disposed of, the cause came on to be heard, finally, upon the record. The complainant, by his counsel, presented the depositions and other evidence which he had taken to support his bill, claiming that it showed that he had a special interest in the navigation of the Mississippi river at the point where the bridge was, and that the bridge was an obstruction to the navigation of the river by steamboats, and was specially injurious to him, as a navigator thereof by such boats. To the introduction of this testimony the defendants objected, because, they said, it was immaterial, since, by the act of February 27, 1867 [14 Stat. 412], congress had declared the bridge a lawful structure. It was admitted that the bridge formed a link in a chain of railroads extending from Chicago to the Missouri river. The court sustained the objection, and refused to hear the proofs offered. Thereupon a decree was made dismissing the bill. Bill dismissed.

[NOTE. Congress has power to interfere and legalize the bridge, under its authority to regulate commerce; it was evidently its intention to so legalize it by the act of Feb. 27, 1867 (14 Stat. 412), and the effect of the passage of the act pending the suit furnished a rule of decision for the court. Per Mr. Justice Nelson on the appeal of complainant from the decree herein to the supreme court; following the Wheeling Bridge Case, 18 How. (59 U. S.) 421. The Clinton Bridge, 10 Wall. (77 U. S.) 454.]

CLINTON LINE EXTENSION R. CO. (GRIFFIN v.). See Case No. 5,816.

CLINTON LINE R. CO. (LUDLOW v.). See Case No. 8,600.

CLINTON, The MARY. See Case No. 9,203.

CLIPPER MOWER, ETC., CO. (WHEELER v.). See Case No. 17,493.

Case No. 2,901.

CLIPPINGER v. MISSOURI VAL. LIFE INS. CO.

[1 Flip. 456;[1] 5 Ins. Law J. 310; 22 Int. Rev. Rec. 47; 2 Cin. Law Bul. 218; 8 Chi. Leg. News, 155; 4 Amer. Law Rec. 585; 1 Law & Eq. Rep. 138.]

Circuit Court, N. D. Ohio. Jan. Term, 1876.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES FROM STATE TO FEDERAL COURTS—CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTES—THE PARTY SEEKING TO REMOVE SHOULD DO WHAT IS NECESSARY—THE PROPER TIME.

1. No action of the state court can confer or take away the right of removal. No order of state court for the removal of the cause is necessary. The right is not dependent on the state court.

2. The party seeking a removal is to do all that is necessary to secure a removal. Whether the state court makes an order for removal or not, he can perfect the removal by entering in this court, at the proper time, copies of the proper papers, and his appearance and special bail, if necessary.

3. The proper time for entering in the circuit court "copies of the proper papers," etc., is on the first day of the next session after the filing of the petition for removal, affidavits, etc. But if the term of the circuit court, to which the same is removable, should commence within twenty days after the filing of the petition and bond in the circuit court, still the removing party is to have twenty days to file copy of record.

[Cited in Woolridge v. McKenna, 8 Fed. 667.]

[At law. Action by Elizabeth Clippinger, administratrix of the estate of John Crestead, against the Missouri Valley Life Insurance Company, to recover on a policy of insurance.] Motion by plaintiff to dismiss and remand to state court.

I. Pillars and C. M. Hughes, for plaintiff.

Marvin, Ballard & Richard and Hart & Squire, for defendant.

WELKER, District Judge. The plaintiff filed a petition against the defendant on a policy of insurance in the court of common pleas in Allen county, on the 28th day of December, A. D. 1872. On the 18th day of January, 1873, and before appearance, the defendant being a non-resident company, filed a petition for removal of the case to the circuit court of the United States, and at the February term, 1873, of said court filed the necessary affidavit, and offered surety as required by the statute; at which term the common pleas court refused to make an order of removal, and dismissed the petition, the defendant excepting to the ruling.

On the 19th of April, 1873, the defendant filed its answer in the common pleas to the original petition, on which issue at the October term, 1873, a trial was had, and verdict and judgment entered for the plaintiff. At the same term a second trial was demanded and allowed, and bond given therefor, as authorized by the statute of the state. Afterwards, on the 19th of February, 1874, an amended answer was filed by the defendant to the original petition in said court. On the 23d of February, 1874, in term time, a second petition for removal to this court was filed by the defendant, alleging non-residence in the state, with proper affidavit alleging local prejudice, and surety was offered, and bond given, as required by the statute, for removal. At the May term, 1874, answer to petition for removal was filed by the plaintiff, and on hearing the court dismissed the petition for removal. At the October term, 1874, a second trial on the issue made in the original case was had in said court; and a verdict and judgment rendered for the plaintiff.

On the 13th of March, 1875, the defendant filed a petition in error in the district court of Allen county to reverse the judgment so lastly rendered in the common pleas, alleging for error, among other things, the dismissal of the petition for removal as aforesaid; and at the April term, 1875, of said district court, that court reversed the common pleas for the assigned error of dismissing said petition for removal. At the May term, 1875, of the common pleas, in pursuance of the said judgment of the district court, that court made an order accepting the sureties, and ordered that no further proceedings be had in said court in the case.

Certified copies of the pleadings, etc., were filed in this court on the 26th day of August, A. D. 1875. The plaintiff files a motion to dismiss the case from this court, and remand the same to the state court. 1st—Because the petition, affidavit, and bond for the removal of the cause to this court were not filed in the court of common pleas until after the trial of the cause. 2d—Because the certified transcripts of the process, pleadings, etc., were not filed in this court within the time prescribed in the statute after the filing of the petition, affidavit and bond for removal. 3d—Because the removal of the cause to this court is contrary to law, and this court has no jurisdiction to try and determine the same.

In determining this motion it will only be necessary to examine the second ground of the motion in connection with the third. As to the time of the filing of the petition for removal to this court, it is conceded that the first petition was in time under the act of 1789 [1 Stat. 79], and the second under the act of 1875 [18 Stat. 472], which combines the preceding statutes on that subject in the revised statutes then passed. It would seem from the fact that the defendant, after having filed the first petition for removal, failed to file copies of the process, etc., in this court, and filed an answer in the state court, and there went to trial on the issue made, as well as the filing of the subsequent petition, affidavit, etc., for removal, in 1874, that it had waived any right to file the papers under that petition. Indeed, it is not claimed that it had such right.

[1] [Reported by William Searcy Flippin, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

The question then is, had the defendant the right to file copies, etc., in this court under the second petition? No question is made as to whether the case itself was a proper one to be removed, or that the defendant had not brought itself within the statute by the filing of a petition and affidavit and offer of surety in the state court, but it is claimed that it did not file the papers for removal in this court within the time prescribed by the statute.

Each of the statutes upon the subject of removal, in force at the time the last petition was filed, provide "that on filing such petition and affidavit, and offering good and sufficient surety for entering in such circuit court on the first day of its session next to be held, copies of the process, etc., it shall be the duty of the state court to accept surety and proceed no further in the case; and that when said copies are entered as aforesaid in the circuit court, the cause shall then proceed in the same manner as if it had been brought there by original process." Thus this court obtains its jurisdiction in such cases; and thus the jurisdiction of a state court is terminated; that is to say, by a compliance on the part of the party seeking to remove a cause with the provisions of the act of congress respecting such removals; and as the jurisdiction of this court in such cases is of a purely statutory character, the provision of the act of congress should be strictly followed or no jurisdiction is obtained.

But it may be urged that in the case at bar, although the petition for removal was duly filed, supported by the proper affidavits to bring the application within the provisions of the act of congress, and good and sufficient surety was offered, yet the court of common pleas defeated or obstructed defendant's right of removal by dismissing its petition and refusing to accept the surety, and that this operates to excuse the defendant for its failure to enter copies, etc., in this court on the first day of its then next session, and enlarge the time within which this may be done.

The answer is, the court of common pleas had no power to do this. Its "duty" is clearly defined by the act of congress, viz.: "To accept the surety and proceed no further in the cause." A failure or refusal to perform this plain duty cannot defeat the right of the defendant to remove the cause. On this point the language of an eminent jurist of New York is so clear and comprehensive that it is adopted here. Says Judge Blatchford: "No action of the state court could either confer the right or take it away. The discretion to be exercised by the state court in passing on the question as to whether the proper steps for a removal have been taken, and as to whether the evidence thereof is sufficient, and as to whether the surety is good and sufficient, is a legal discretion," i. e., a discretion to be exercised in a legal manner and in accordance with its "duty." "No order of the state court for the removal of the cause is necessary." "The right of the defendant to a removal is not dependent on the question whether the state court does or does not make an order for the removal. If it were so dependent, the refusal of the state court, in a proper case, to make such an order, would make it impossible for the defendant to secure the removal except by carrying the suit through the state tribunals," * * * and thence "to the supreme court of the United States." See 6 Blatch. 117, 118 [Hatch v. Chicago, R. I. and P. R. Co., Case No. 6,204]. This interpretation of the acts of congress stands uncontradicted so far as my researches have extended, and is believed to be the true one; and in the conclusions of the learned judge from the premises there laid down, I am forced to concur. He says: "If he (the party seeking a removal) does all that is necessary to secure a removal, then, whether the state court makes an order of removal or not, he can perfect the removal by entering in this court, at the proper time, copies of the proper papers, and his appearance and special bail, if necessary." As will have been seen, the proper time for entering in the circuit court "copies of the proper papers," etc., was on the first day of the next session after the filing of the petition for removal, affidavit, etc. In this case the last petition for removal was filed in the court of common pleas on the 23d of February, 1874. The first day of the then next session of this court was the 7th of April, 1874, and "copies of the proper papers" were not filed in this court until the 26th of August, 1875, a point of time too late to enable this court to obtain jurisdiction of the cause in the manner provided by the statute. Nor can the action of the court of common pleas of Allen county be held to excuse the delay, nor to enlarge the time within which the defendant might and should have completed the steps necessary to the removal of his cause to this court.

In the act of 1875 [supra], which takes the place of all preceding statutes on this subject, we have a legislative construction, that the time of entering copies, etc., in this court is material to the jurisdiction of this court. That act provides that, "If the term of the circuit court to which the same is removable then next to be holden, shall commence within twenty days after the filing of the petition and bond in the state court for its removal, then the removing party shall have twenty days from such application to file copy of record, etc."

The motion is sustained, and cause stricken from the docket, for want of jurisdiction.

CLOSE (LONGWORTH v.). See Case No. 8,489.

CLOSE (RICH v.). See Case No. 11,757.

Case No. 2,902.

The CLOTH CASES.

[Crabbe, 335.] [1]

District Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. Feb. Term, 1840.

FORFEITURE FOR FRAUDULENT IMPORTATION.

While these cases excited much attention at the time of their trial, both from the extensive character of the frauds perpetrated, and from the general acquaintance with the parties concerned, yet, on account of the paucity of legal principles developed, and the great similiarity of all the cases, it has not been thought advisable to report each in detail. The great struggle took place in regard to the cloths claimed by Taylor and the Blackburnes. This case, therefore, has been inserted at length; and a general history of the whole transaction, drawn from official sources, has been thought a sufficient notice of the other suits.

The goods in controversy in these cases, were all from the district of Saddleworth, in Yorkshire, in England, and had been entered at the custom-house by persons from that district, whose business in this country was the importation and sale of woollen goods. By far the greater portion of the cloths and cassimers of low and medium prices, imported into the United States for many years past, had been manufactured in this district of Saddleworth. It is inhabited principally, or to a great extent, by persons engaged in the manufacture of such articles. The goods made there, which are intended for the British market, are generally sold in the bauk or unfinished state, at the cloth hall in Huddersfield. The goods which are finished in Saddleworth, were generally sent to this country, the local sales being so limited that the district is rarely resorted to by purchasers from other places. With occasional exceptions, this appears to have been the state of things in Saddleworth in 1838 and 1839, when the goods in controversy were exported, and for many years previous. The high rate of duties in this country on imported woollens afforded a strong temptation to persons in Saddleworth, and their associates in this country, to resort to measures for the evasion or reduction of their amount. The character and extent of the measures to which they resorted for this purpose, will hereafter be stated. Their effect was to drive other importers out of the market, and secure a sort of monopoly to these parties—some of whom privately declared that they could import goods at such rates as to render competition with them impossible, even on the part of skilful and experienced importers, who had partners or agents residing in England, qualified in every manner to take advantage of the most favorable opportunities of purchasing. It was testified that a member of the house of William Blackburne & Co., a partnership of whom mention will be made presently, at a time when the duties on cloths and cassimeres were not less than 41 per cent. on their value, declared that he could buy them in England, and have them delivered at his warehouse in Philadelphia, in such a manner that only 25 per cent. duty should be paid on them, and no questions asked.

Early in the summer of 1839, the attention of then collector of New York was called, by the secretary of the treasury, to reported frauds in the importation of British woollens. In the same summer the case of U. S. v. Wood [Case No. 16,751], tried at New York, and that of U. S. v. Bottomley, at Boston [Cases Nos. 1,688 and 1,689], made it a matter of public notoriety that there had existed, for years, a combination, between certain parties residing in Saddleworth, and persons from the same district who were temporary residents in this country, to pass goods through the custom-house at New York, by means of fictitious invoices, most of them representing sales of the goods to have been made by the parties abroad to those in this country, at prices greatly below the market value of the goods in England. In the case at Boston it appeared that a corrupt understanding had existed between the importer and an officer of the revenue at New York; and there was some ground to believe that the success of the fraud had been facilitated by a lax practice in England of permitting the export duty to be paid upon a fictitious representation of the value of the goods exported, which corresponded neither with their actual value on the one hand, nor on the other hand with the value or price alleged in the invoice by which it was intended that they should be entered in this country. In the case of Wood at New York, however, the developments were of an astonishing character. The father of the importer had failed in England, and his assignees, under a commission of bankruptcy, had placed the counsel for the prosecution in possession of the letters from the son relating the course of his transactions, and referring incidentally to similar transactions on the part of other importers of the same class. Of the persons whom he thus incidentally named as parties to similar frauds, suspicion had for some time been entertained, on evidence which had occasionally transpired in the course of investigations previously instituted. But the disclosures on this trial rendered this a matter of certainty, and pointed out distinctly the manner in which the frauds were perpetrated. The invoices on which the importations of Wood had been entered, represented as sales what were in reality mere consignments from the father to the son as an agent or partner. The correspondence not only negatived the reality of the sales, as such, but showed clearly that the pretended prices in the custom-house invoices differed from the valuations in other invoices referred to by the parties, and were, indeed, regulated by no other criterion than that which had been ascertained as the minimum standard of successful deception of the examiners in the appraiser's department, by whom goods were ordinarily passed through the custom-house.

[1] [Reported by William H. Crabbe, Esq.]

Shortly after the decision of the two prosecutions at New York and Boston above-mentioned, the attention of persons in Philadelphia was turned toward certain commission and auction houses, of whom it was known, that their principal or entire business was the sale of goods imported into New York from Saddleworth. Private information was obtained that on a Sunday, in the early part of August, 1839, B. Broadbent, of Saddleworth, formerly an importer at New York, afterward in the employment of Mr. P. Brady, one of the agents referred to, and at that time a partner in the firm of Davis, Broadbent & Co., who were also concerned in similar agencies, had visited Jeremiah Adshead, formerly of Saddleworth, and stating his apprehensions lest the store of Davis, Broadbent & Co., should be visited and searched by custom-house officers, had requested the assistance of Mr. Adshead, who was a rapid writer, in altering the marks upon certain goods in their store. Mr. Adshead accompanied him, and assisted in making tickets with numbers different from those on the original tickets. On that day, these new tickets were, to a considerable extent, substituted for the original ones. It seems that Mr. Broadbent exercised a discrimination in altering the marks of goods received from certain importers, and leaving unchanged the marks of those received from others. It did not appear whether he used this discrimination in consequence of communications with any of the parties, or from a knowledge that some of them had already altered the marks in New York, as was the fact, or from what other reason. In the same and in the succeeding week, other goods were received by Davis, Broadbent & Co., from New York, of some of which the marks were altered in like manner. Adshead, the person who on the Sunday referred to had assisted in this operation, was one of the proprietors of an establishment to which the agents of the Saddleworth importers had been in the practice of sending cloths to be refinished, or cut and headed. With the privity of the same Mr. Broadbent, this person caused goods which had been sent to his manufactory to be secreted elsewhere. Some of these goods were placed in the upper story of a small grocery store; another portion in one of the bed-rooms of a tavern, in the cellar of which another portion was placed in an old oil cask, and covered with vegetables. Similar measures of concealment were likewise pursued by other agents of these importers. Batturs, Okie & Co., an auction house, sent some goods, of the importation of John Platt and William Bottomley, to a hardware store, with a request that they should be kept out of view. In all the places mentioned, when the officers of the customs afterward came to search for the goods, the persons in possession of them denied that they had any cloths or cassimeres in their possession. Persons privy to some of these measures of concealment, disclosed a portion of what had occurred, to parties through whom information was communicated to the district attorney, that certain goods, which had been fraudulently passed through the custom-house at New York on false invoices, were believed to be in Philadelphia in the hands of agents of the importers. He immediately made a requisition upon the collector of New York, to send to Philadelphia an officer by whom the suspected goods of New York importation might be identified. The collector of New York despatched upon this duty an officer, who arrived in Philadelphia on the 19th of August, 1839, and, under the direction of the district attorney, applied for instructions to Mr. Wolf, then collector of the port of Philadelphia. On the same day, under the direction of Governor Wolf, one thousand pieces of cloths and cassimeres, of New York importation, and thirty-one pieces, which afterward appeared to have been brought from Canada, and entered at Rouse's Point, were seized at the store of Davis, Broadbent & Co. Two days afterwards, on the 21st of August, a visit was made, by officers of the revenue collection service, to the store of William Blackburne & Co., in the same neighborhood. William Blackburne & Co. were the principal receivers and sellers in this city of goods which John Taylor, Jr., imported to a large extent through New York. John Taylor, Jr., was of Saddleworth, and received his importations thence through Abel & Thomas Shaw, a son of whom was a member of the firm of William Blackburne & Co., and to whom all the other members of this firm were related or connected by marriage. Mr. Taylor also received some goods from other parties in England. His annual importations were of very large amount. It appeared that Mr. Blackburne rented a store in Church alley, No. 24, in Philadelphia; that the adjoining store, No. 26, was rented by Mr. Worrell, and that the lower, or ground story, was occupied by him. The second story or floor of this store, which extended over the whole building, was in the occupancy of Mr. Blackburne, and the access to it was by a large opening or doorway from Mr. Blackburne's second story into it. This door was usually kept open, and was so in July and August, 1839, and up to the 20th of August, on the day when the seizure was made. On the morning of that day, the porter of Mr. Blackburne saw in a newspaper, or was informed by somebody, that a seizure had been made of Mr. Broadbent's goods. Whether Messrs. Blackburne had the same information or not, did not appear. On the same morning, the hour was not precisely fixed, at about eight or nine o'clock, this door or passage was completely blocked up, and concealed by boxes, &c., so that persons going into Mr. Blackburne's second story, saw nothing by which they could discover or suppose there was any communication between the two rooms. The officers on their first visit did not discover it; they went away; but on getting further information, they returned, and by introducing a stick between the boxes, they found where the passage was, removed the obstructions which concealed it, and went into the adjoining room. It was entirely dark, although Mr. Blackburne's porter says he had opened one of the windows that morning. In this room the goods in question were found, some in their cases, some lying on them. When the officers first came to Mr. Blackburne's store he was there. They told him their business; he said they might search. He said he had no goods in his possession but what were imported through the port of Philadelphia. The officers examined the cloths and cassimeres in the lower story, and then went up stairs of store No. 24. After looking at some cloths and cassimeres there, one of them asked Mr. Blackburne if they were all the cloths in his possession. He answered, "Yes, you have seen all." He was asked if he had no other store in the neighborhood. He answered, "No, you have seen all that we have." The officer did not on this visit discover the passage into the next store. They returned in the afternoon. One of them said to Mr. C. Blackburne that they wished to see the second story over Mr. Worrell's store. He replied, "You have seen all the rooms that we have." The officers went up stairs and searched for the entrance into the next room. He denied that there was any access to that room. They proceeded in their search to discover one, and at last he said, "The entrance is behind those boxes." The officers were thrusting a stick between the boxes. In the next room the goods were found, and Mr. Blackburne said he was the owner of them. The goods of New York importation, thus found concealed at W. Blackburne & Co.'s, seven hundred and thirty-nine pieces, were, of course, seized. On the next day an additional seizure was made at P. Brady's, of five hundred and fifty-eight pieces of New York importation, which had been received on consignment from parties, most of whom had consigned other portions of the same importations to Batturs, Okie & Co., or Davis, Broadbent & Co. Besides the seizure at Davis, Broadbent & Co.'s, Blackburne's, and Brady's, one hundred and sixty-nine pieces were found, in small lots, in the hands of other agents of the importers, and one hundred and seventy-six pieces in the hands of parties who afterwards alleged that they were purchasers of the goods for a valuable consideration. The whole quantity of cloths and cassimeres seized in August, 1839, was twenty-six hundred and seventy-three pieces, all from Saddleworth, of which it is believed that twenty-five hundred and eighty-four pieces had been imported into New York, fifty-eight pieces into Philadelphia, and thirty-one pieces, imported through Rouse's Point, had been originally brought into Canada.

Informations were filed in due course, alleging as causes of forfeiture, under several different counts, what may be resolved into the substantial charge of the goods having been falsely invoiced with intent to defraud the revenue. To the goods thus libelled forty-four several claims were interposed, under which as many distinct issues were joined. The parties making these forty-four claims were twenty-four persons, some of whom claimed goods at each of two or more different places. The result of the trials as to the twenty-five hundred and eighty-four pieces of New York importation was, that as to twenty-three hundred and forty-two pieces there were verdicts for the United States. Of the remaining two hundred and forty-two pieces, there were entries of nolle prosequi as to one hundred and twelve pieces in one case, and two pieces in another case. In regard to these one hundred and fourteen pieces, the claimants offered to admit on the record that there was probable cause for the prosecution; and the district attorney did not think that the evidence on the part of the United States, would have justified the asking for more than a certificate to this effect. It certainly was not so strong as to warrant the urging the condemnation of the goods. As to one hundred and eighteen pieces, embraced in nine cases, in each of which they formed a portion only of the goods in controversy, there were verdicts for the defendants, with a certificate of the court that there was probable cause for the prosecution. Of the fifty-eight pieces believed to have been imported at Philadelphia, forty-two pieces were condemned, and sixteen pieces acquitted, the court certifying, as to the latter, that there was probable cause for the prosecution. The thirty-one pieces imported through Rouse's Point, were the subject of a correspondence between the deputy collector at that place, and the late collector at New York. The person who had entered them was the same party claimant of one hundred and twelve pieces imported at New York, as to which a nolle prosequi had been entered as above; and upon an examination of the correspondence and other papers exhibited on his behalf, it was considered a proper case for a similar discrimination in his favor. Probable cause for the prosecution being admitted in like manner on the record, a nolle prosequi was, therefore, entered as to these thirty-one pieces, with the sanction of the court. The goods consigned to Philadelphia, were usually selections of parts of several importations; and, in most cases, portions of them had been sold, leaving on hand the goods in controversy. These goods had, in many instances, been so long in this country, that if really bought for exportation, according to the tenor of the invoices, the prices of them must have been remitted to England. Correspondence and accounts must, therefore, have been interchanged with persons in England, as well as with persons in Philadelphia. Before the trials, the counsel of the United States, adverting to these circumstances, gave timely notice to the several parties to produce all invoices, correspondence, accounts, and books of account, with the parties in England, from whom the goods in question purported to have been received. Under these notices, various calls were made, during each of the contested trials, for particular accounts and documents; of some of which, the existence and possession by the defendants were distinctly proved. These calls were not, in a single instance, responded to by the production of a letter, voucher, or other paper, or of a book containing an original or other account of their pecuniary transactions with the parties in England, and no excuse was given for withholding them.

The first case tried was that of a claim interposed by John Taylor, Jr., and William Blackburne & Co., to the goods concealed as above at William Blackburne & Co.'s, Mr. Taylor alleging himself to be the owner and importer, and William Blackburne & Co., as his factors, alleging that they had advanced to him fifty-nine thousand dollars upon the goods. Upon the trial, the United States proved the concealment of the goods, and attendant facts detailed above, and proved a variety of circumstances tending to show that Taylor was not really a purchaser of the goods in the fair and proper sense of the term, but had received them under some secret understanding or arrangement, the result of a combination between him and the parties in England, under which the goods of his importation were invoiced at prices lower than those of the English market. It was also proved by importers of cloths and cassimeres, as to the goods in question, that the prices mentioned in the invoices were generally much lower than those ordinarily paid by purchasers in England at the same period. There was other evidence tending to prove that there were fictitious deductions inserted in the invoices. A point was raised and insisted upon, as will be seen in the following report of the case, that the goods having been passed through the custom-house at New York, and duties assessed and paid on the footing of the invoices being correct, it was afterwards too late to allege the contrary as a cause of forfeiture. As regarded the law of the question, it was a sufficient answer, that if the invoice on which the importer had obtained a permit for his goods was a false one, and had been the means of practising a deception upon the officers who had passed the goods, the fraudulent party should not be allowed to take advantage of his own wrong, and rely upon the fraud itself as a shield and protection against the penalties imposed upon the very act on which he relied for his immunity. Of this opinion was the judge. He left the facts to the jury, who, after a protracted trial of several weeks' duration, returned a verdict for the United States. Shortly before this trial, some of the claimants had obtained at New York, from Chancellor Kent, an opinion, which was circulated extensively through the newspapers, that "when the duties have been paid and the goods fairly passed through the government offices into the general mass of the circulating commerce of the country," the collector had no right to seize goods for any of the causes of forfeiture set forth in the revenue collection acts. The context of that part of his opinion which contains this important word "fairly" was, by many persons, supposed to indicate the opinion of this eminent jurist, that a permit, though obtained by fraud, would operate as an irrevocable exemption of the goods from prosecution for any forfeiture previously incurred. This can scarcely have been his meaning; because, thus understood, his opinion would be opposed to the whole course of judicial decisions on the subject. Nevertheless, this view of the law had been pressed with such earnestness, that, after the trial, the judge acceded to a request on behalf of the claimants that the trials of the remaining cases should be postponed until after a decision of this point by the supreme court. After this, no case involving this precise point under the same enactments on which the informations were framed, came before the supreme court, until it was decided in Wood v. U. S., 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 342.

The opinion of the supreme court, delivered on the 7th March, 1842, resolved the doubt, if there ever was one, upon this subject. The court said: "The second instruction of the court is, in effect, that if the invoices of the goods now in question, were fraudulently made, by a false valuation to evade or defraud the revenue, the fact that they had been entered, and the duties paid or secured at the custom-house at New York upon those invoices, was no bar to the present information. This instruction was certainly correct, if the sixty-sixth section of the revenue collection act of 1799, c. 128 [1 Stat. 677], now remains in full force and unrepealed: for it can never be permitted that a party who perpetrates a fraud upon the custom-house, and thereby enters his goods upon false invoices and false valuations, and gets a regular delivery thereof upon the mere payment of such duties as such false invoices and false valuations require, can avail himself of that very fraud to defeat the purposes of justice. It is but an aggravation of his guilt, that he has practised imposition upon the public officers, as well as perpetrated such a deliberate fraud. The language of the sixty-sixth section completely covers such a case. It supposes an entry at the custom-house upon false invoices, with intent to evade the payment of the proper duties, and the forfeiture attaches immediately upon such an entry, upon such invoices, with such intent. The success of the fraud in evading the vigilance of the public officers, so that it is not discovered until after the goods have passed from their custody, does not purge away the forfeiture; although it may render the detection of the offence more difficult and more uncertain. The whole argument turns upon this, that if the custom-house officers have not pursued the steps authorized by law to be pursued by them, by directing an appraisement of the goods in cases where they have a suspicion of illegality, or fraud, or no invoices are produced, but their suspicions are lulled to rest, the goods are untainted by the forfeiture, the moment they pass from the custom-house. We cannot admit that such an interpretation of the objects or language of the sixty-sixth section, is either sound or satisfactory." Nearly two years had elapsed since the trial of the case against John Taylor, Jr., when this decision of the supreme court removed every obstacle to the trial of the remaining cases upon their fair merits. The report of most of them, however, would consist in stating that, on the examination and appraisement of the goods by persons conversant with the British markets, they had been found greatly to exceed in value the prices stated in the respective invoices; that the proceeds of goods of the same importations, sold before the seizure, had been such as more than verified the accuracy of the appraisements of the goods in controversy; that a similar confirmation was found in the limits affixed to the goods in controversy on their transmission to Philadelphia for sale, after making full allowance for the largest difference between limits and actual sales, apparent on a recurrence to the accounts of previous transactions through the agents in Philadelphia. In some cases it appeared that the prices of importation of goods received after the seizure had been considerably higher than those of previous importations, received by the same importer from the same parties in England, and there were cases where it also appeared that goods on their way from England to this country at the time of the seizure of the goods in question, were not entered upon the original invoices, but were allowed to remain several months in the public stores until new invoices were obtained from England, and were then entered at prices considerably higher than those of previous importations. In most of the cases the parties or their agents had resorted to concealment or other artifices, of the character of some of which a description has been already given. In all the cases it was fully in proof that the particular importations in question were not isolated or distinct transactions, independent of or unconnected with others, but were parts of a connected series of importations made under some general contract or arrangement.

The case of Joseph Wrigley at first appeared to involve peculiar considerations. A widowed mother, two daughters, and three sons, in Saddleworth, were said to have derived their support for about 20 years from doing journeywork in different branches of the woollen manufacture. The mother died in 1836 or 1837, and the sons, in partnership, continued the business in which they had been engaged in her lifetime—which was making cassimeres,—by doing a part of the work themselves, and getting the other parts of the manufacture performed by artisans in the neighborhood, as they could afford to pay for it—some of the members of the family working in the mean time, at intervals, for neighboring manufacturers. In January, 1839, the importer of the goods in question came to the United States, when it was arranged that the former establishment of the family should be broken up. Of the daughters, one married, and the other left the family residence. The other two brothers were to remain in partnership at the homestead, with a portion of the mother's furniture and effects, for which they were to be charged, and the rest were to be sold at auction. The brother who came to America left behind him his share of these effects, and a sum of money, in the hands of the two other brothers, the whole amount of which, except a small invoice of shawls, which he took out with him, was to be worked up into cassimeres, which he was to receive at the cost of manufacture, in payment of what should be found due to him upon the settlement of the concern, which was to take place after his departure. Accordingly, in April, 1839, an invoice was made out of 17 pieces of black cassimere, as sold by one of the brothers in England to the brother in this country, by whom they were entered, and passed through the New York custom-house, on the 28th May following, as purchased goods. Of these 17 pieces, 14, seized in August, 1839, at Davis, Broadbent & Co's., where he had placed them for sale, formed the subject of controversy. In October, 1839, the two brothers who had remained in Saddleworth, dissolved their partnership. One of them came to this country, and was sworn for the importer as a witness, to prove the entire fairness of the transaction, and the impossibility that there could have been any fraudulent motive in respect to the revenue. He proved the transactions, of which the above is an outline, and positively swore, that, except the shawls, there had been no goods previously sent by them to America. There were, however, many circumstances which attracted suspicion, and rendered necessary an extended and careful cross-examination of this witness. In the first place the goods were invoiced, certainly sixty per cent., and probably seventy-five per cent., below their market value, and doubtless, greatly below even their cost of production, to the brothers in England, who were the alleged manufacturers. The circumstance of these two brothers having continued their business on that side of the water, until the time when the news of the seizure of these goods would regularly have reached them, and having then abruptly closed it, compared with the fact that the package in which these goods were imported, was numbered W 100, and that the number 2,300, on the first piece of the goods contained in it, answered to an ordinary average of 23 pieces to a package; and that the shawls which he had brought with him, were in a package marked W 99, furnished strong ground for the belief that these importations were part of a connected series, of which 98 more or less had preceded the one in question; and more would have followed had not the course of business been arrested by the seizure. In cross-examination, the witness professed the most entire ignorance of everything relating to the goods, and to the business in which he had been a partner, alleging that he and the importer had always left everything like writings, accounts, and calculations, to their brother, who was still at home; and that he himself was so ignorant, as not to know the cost of a single process of the manufacture, although he had himself received wages in one of the processes at which he had worked in the neighborhood. As the cross-examination proceeded, however, it appeared that he had known the name of the ship-broker at Liverpool, and other matters not entirely reconcilable with such entire ignorance. He was closely questioned as to the handwriting of his two brothers. That of the importer, ascertained by his entry and signature of the oath annexed to it, was pointed out to him as on papers which he had said were written by the other brother now in England. Upon this he said that he was not sure which of them had written what was shown to him, but that the latter had usually made out the invoices.

On following rapidly with the questions, which naturally arose upon this observation, it appeared that for many years, in the lifetime of the mother, and subsequently, the family had been in the habit of occasionally sending goods to this country, some or all of which had been sold here for them, as he said, by an importer of Saddleworth, residing in New York, who had accounted to them for the proceeds. The whole theory of the supposed accidental character of the importation in question was thus destroyed, and the attempted explanation of the manner in which such low prices had been inserted in it, and of the reason for giving the transaction the form of a purchase, entirely failed. The court left to the jury the question whether they believed the invoice to have been made out at low prices with intent to evade the payment of a part of the duties to which the goods were justly liable, saying that if it was really a sale as between the parties, the small amount of the price was otherwise no cause of forfeiture. Under this instruction the verdict was for the United States. This case is since divested of all doubt, and therefore of all sympathy, by the ascertainment of what might have been anticipated from the evidence on the trial, viz.: that the same party in New York who was testified by the witness to have previously received consignments for account of this family, had in 1838 entered as sold by them to him at least two previous invoices of packages marked W 96 and 97, and it is highly probable that other importations of the series with this mark could be traced on a further examination in the custom-house at New York.

Another case, in which evidence of the actual purchase and price of the goods was offered, was that in which James Mallalieu was the claimant. The goods imported by him were invoiced as sold to him by different persons, four of whom were examined under a commission. Two were his brothers, the other two his brothers-in-law. Each of them testified that the respective goods were actually sold to him at the prices mentioned in the respective invoices, nine in number, which bore date at different periods in the winter and spring of 1838, '39, and that the witness had no interest, direct or indirect, in the goods or their proceeds, and had received the prices mentioned in the respective invoices, but had not received, and was not to receive anything more. In the interrogatories in chief, each witness was asked to "state under what contract or order from the said claimant, if any, or under what arrangement, if any, the said bale or bales of goods were sold or purchased," and to "state the manner of the sale or purchase as aforesaid of such goods, and whether for cash or on credit," &c.; and as to any verbal contract, order or arrangement, to which he might testify, was in a cross-interrogatory requested to state whether he was in person present when it was made, &c. In answer to these interrogatories, each witness testified that the goods mentioned in the respective invoices were sold upon credit, under a verbal contract made by the claimant with each of them personally some time before the dates of the invoices. It was clear that at these dates the parties were three thousand miles apart, and that the alleged antecedent verbal contract, made when they were together, was a general one, not applicable specifically to the particular goods in question alone. Yet neither witness testified what were its terms or conditions, or even stated on what credit the alleged sale under it was made. Two importers of New York, each of whom had passed a great portion of the last five years in England as a purchaser of Yorkshire cloths and cassimeres, two importers of Philadelphia, who had been in Yorkshire, and bought such goods there in 1839, another who for twenty years had had a partner residing in England, engaged in the same business, from whom he had been constantly receiving importations, and two others, who, without having been in England, had been importing with great facilities, and opportunities for doing so to advantage, in all, six experienced and skillful persons, together with the official appraisers of this port, had concurred in appraising these goods at rates from which it appeared that they were invoiced forty-five per cent. below their market value in Yorkshire, at the time of exportation; and upon evidence of the actual cost of the materials and wages required to produce them in England, it appeared that they exceeded the prices of the invoices, exclusive of any allowance for rent, taxes, wear and tear of machinery, superintendence, manufacturer's profit, forwarding, warehouse rent, interest, &c. It appeared that other goods included in the same invoices, had been sold in Philadelphia by the piece, with the factor's guarantee of sale, at an advance of one hundred and fifty-six per cent. on the prices mentioned in the invoices on which they had been imported, at a time when the ordinary advance on the invoice was eighty to eighty-five per cent., or about ten per cent. beyond cost and charges. The importer, Mallalieu, had come to this country in November, 1838, to succeed, as a resident at New York, a person, who, having returned to England in December, 1838, was one of the exporters by whom a portion of the goods in question were afterwards invoiced to him from England. It appeared that Mallalieu, while in England, had been in the practice of forwarding goods to this person in New York, in the same manner as sold by him, and that they had been entered accordingly, as purchased goods. These goods were in part traced to the hands of the factor, by whom they had been disposed of in Philadelphia, in the previous year, 1838. In that year goods of this description, fairly imported, had not commanded more than a barely saving price, say 75 to 80 per cent. advance on the invoice. Yet these goods sent out by Mr. Mallalieu, had commanded an advance of 126 per cent. on the prices at which he purported to have sold them, according to the tenor of invoices in his own handwriting, on which they had been entered by his brother-in-law, the alleged purchaser. A variety of other circumstances combined to induce a belief that the persons invoicing and receiving these goods, were concerned in a combination to defraud the revenue, of which these invoices of pretended sales were the machinery. This belief became equal to a conviction, on a careful examination, and comparison of the numerous invoices of all his importations. The numbers upon the goods were scattered in each invoice, in such confusion, as to indicate the reverse of any regular or progressive series. But, on arranging them in numerical succession, it appeared that the numbers on these goods, thus purporting to be bought at different times and places, from different persons, each of whom testified that he had no knowledge of any of the sales, other than those made by himself, formed parts of consecutive ranges of numbers, in which the goods of each party were connected in every possible form with those of each of the others. This coincidence was strengthened by the circumstance, that the numbers were not in a single progressive range, but formed a succession of ranges, with gaps or intervals, sometimes of several hundreds or thousands, each man's invoices taking a new start in each new succession or range of numbers. As each witness had sworn that he was himself the manufacturer, and had, himself, packed the goods for exportation, it was impossible to allege that a subsequent agent of the importer had placed the marks upon them; and an almost equally decisive negative was found in the circumstance, that in very many instances, the numbers which formed the subject of consideration, were not upon the tickets attached to the goods alone, but even the list number, or original weaver's mark, in many instances, corresponded with the ticket number. In this, as in the other cases, notice had been given to produce the party's books and papers, which were as usual pertinaciously withheld. The defendant's witnesses having stated that a bill of exchange had been remitted for the amount of each invoice, a call was made for the thirds of exchange of each of the party's remittances to the alleged sellers, but none were produced. However painful the result, the conscientious convictions of the jury compelled them to disbelieve the testimony of the witnesses under the commission. It is also to be observed, that the testimony produced under the commissions to Saddleworth, was apparently entitled to but little credit, because of the evident collusion and connexion between the witnesses. The words used, the forms of the answers, and even the method of evasion, being in many cases identical. In some of the cases, there was this difference, that while the invoice prices of certain of the goods were greatly below the appraisements, those of others were not at all below, or so little below them, as scarcely to justify the counsel of the United States in insisting upon the prosecution. A proposal was made on behalf of these parties to withdraw all opposition to the condemnation of those goods of which the appraisements materially exceeded the invoice prices, if it could be understood that the prosecution would not be pressed as to the others. The counsel of the United States replied, that if the books and accounts of the parties could be exhibited, and appeared to be fair, a nolle prosequi would be entered in each case as to the whole. The counsel of the claimants, not being authorised to exhibit the books and accounts, the counsel of the United States determined to insist upon the prosecution, as to all goods which were appraised more than ten per cent. above the invoice prices. On announcing this determination to the counsel of the claimants, they declined opposing any defence as to such goods, and submitting as to these to a verdict for the United States, contented themselves with asking a verdict of acquittal as to the others. In this manner a few pieces were acquitted, the court, in every such instance, certifying that there was probable cause for the prosecution.

In all the cases, except two, it was an undisputed fact, that the goods in controversy were still in the hands of the original importers, or their immediate agents. But two parties, namely, James Lynd, Jr. & Co., and Daniel Deal & Co., pleaded in bar of the informations, that they were purchasers of the goods claimed by them, respectively, for a valuable consideration, without any notice of the frauds of the importers. This plea was in neither case tenable in point of fact, as will appear presently. But, if true in fact, it could not avail the defendants in point of law. The plea in each case was, therefore, demurred to, and the demurrers were sustained by the court, on the authority of Wood v. U. S., 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 342, and previous decisions of the supreme court. Wood v. U. S. arose upon an information similar to the informations in question. On page 362, the court say that the 66th section of the act of 1799 [supra] "supposes an entry at the custom-house upon false invoices, with intent to evade the payment of the proper duties, and the forfeiture attaches immediately upon such an entry upon such invoices with such intent." And again, on page 365, that, under this section, "the forfeiture immediately attaches to every entry of goods falsely and fraudulently invoiced." In Gelston v. Hoyt, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 311, upon a question under the act of 1794 [1 Stat. 383], imposing a forfeiture of a vessel fitted out and armed, to be employed in the service of a foreign state hostilely against another foreign state, it was held to be the doctrine of the English courts, which had been previously recognised and enforced by the supreme court of the United States, that the forfeiture attached at the moment of the commission of the offence, and that the title of the party incurring it was completely divested from that moment. The previous decision referred to was U. S. v. Certain Bags of Coffee, 8 Cranch [12 U. S.] 398, where it was decided that the forfeiture of goods for the violation of the non-intercourse act of 1809 [2 Stat. 529] took place upon the commission of the offence, and avoided a subsequent sale to an innocent purchaser, although the duties had been paid, and the goods delivered under a formal permit. Thus the language of the court in 16 Pet. is traced back to a case in which the forfeiture was held to defeat the title of a purchaser. In delivering judgment on the demurrer, the court relied on these authorities, and cited English decisions to the same effect. But neither of the two cases in which this point arose, were instances of purchases, in the proper sense of the term. To constitute a party a purchaser, entitled as such to protection against what would be otherwise a better title, it is indispensable at law, and in equity, that the price or consideration should have been paid away and absolutely parted with before notice of the adverse claim. In one of the cases, James Lynd, Jr. & Co., the alleged purchasers, had bought the goods from William Blackburne & Co., on terms of credit which, as to about two-thirds in value of the sales, had not expired when the seizure was made, and, shortly before the seizure, had failed in business, indebted to William Blackburne & Co., the alleged sellers, in an amount greatly exceeding the price of the whole of the goods. The real parties interested were, therefore, William Blackburne & Co. and John Taylor, Jr., the importers, whose fraudulent practices in reference to the revenue, were not denied or deniable. The other case was that in which Daniel Deal & Co., the claimants, alleged themselves to have been purchasers of the same John Taylor, Jr., and William Blackburne & Co. Here, however, no part of the price had been paid for any of the goods.

Case No. 2,903.

The CLOTILDA.

[1 Hask. 412.] [1]

District Court, D. Maine. June, 1872.

VALIDITY OF BOTTOMRY BOND—REQUISITES—SALVAGE AGREEMENT—PRESUMPTION OF FAIRNESS—BURDEN OF PROOF—CONTRIBUTION—COMPENSATION.

1. An obligation is not strictly a bottomry bond and cannot be enforced as such, which the master of a vessel cast upon the shore gave for a loan to relieve his vessel and her cargo from distress, wherein he binds himself absolutely as well as his vessel and her cargo to repay the loan in a specified time, no voyage being set out upon which if the vessel and cargo should be lost by the perils of the sea, &c., the obligation is to become void.

[1] [Reported by Thomas Hawes Haskell, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

2. The master, in case of necessity, is justified in procuring such loan to relieve his vessel and cargo from the liens of salvors and prevent delay and expense in their enforcement, and for this purpose he can bind the vessel and cargo.

3. A salvage agreement between the master and salvors is presumed to be fair and equitable, and the burden rests upon the claimants to prove it contrary to equity and justice, or that it was procured by fraud and compulsion.

4. Such agreement to pay a specific price, proved to have been entered into under a mistake by both parties as to the value of the property to be saved, and manifestly inequitable, should be disregarded by the admiralty court in awarding salvage.

5. A vessel cast upon the shore and in imminent peril should bear an equitable proportion of the salvage awarded for landing the cargo, when the vessel is thereby lightened and enabled to pass to a place of greater safety.

6. Salvage for landing the cargo under such circumstances should be assessed ratably upon the value of the cargo and the value of the vessel after deducting the salvage chargeable to it.

7. A salvage of six thousand dollars is allowed for landing a cargo from a steamer cast upon Wells beach in December, and is assessed upon the property saved valued at $20,000.

In admiralty. Libels for salvage and to enforce a lien upon the vessel and cargo for money loaned the master to relieve his vessel and her cargo from distress. The owners appeared, claimed the vessel and cargo, and answered that the salvage claimed was exorbitant, and that the loan was unnecessary and illegal, and that no lien existed upon the vessel or cargo to secure its payment.

Henry B. Cleaves, Nathan Cleaves, and Joseph Howard, for libellant.

William L. Putnam, for claimants.

FOX, District Judge. Two libels are promoted against this ship and her cargo by Nathaniel L. Thompson, a merchant of Kennebunk in this district, one founded on an alleged bottomry bond, or hypothecatory obligation of the ship and cargo, executed to him by Young, the master of the ship, on the 19th day of January, 1871, as security for the payment of an advance of $10,000 in ninety days, made to the master by Thompson, and the other on salvage services rendered to the ship and cargo by Thompson and his assignor Cleaves, under a written contract for salvage made between Young and Cleaves December 15, 1870, and subsequently assigned to Thompson by Cleaves, after a partial performance of the salvage services.

The material facts are, that this vessel, an iron propeller of about 1,000 tons American registry, sailed from Newcastle upon Tyne in the fall of 1870, bound into the St. Lawrence. Her cargo consisted of about 100 tons of chemicals and glassware, together with the frame, plates and all other portions complete of an iron ferry boat, constructed for the Grand Trunk Railway by the Palmer Iron Shipbuilding Co., of Newcastle, who were also the owners of the "Clotilda." In the course of her voyage the ship fell into distress and went into Belfast, Ireland; she there took on board, according to the statement of her master, 100 tons of coal, which was thrown down among the iron to prevent any further shifting of the cargo, and the season being late, her destination was changed to Portland. H. & A. Allan were understood to be the consignees of the ship and cargo, but bills of lading were never received by them, as it is said, and they made no claim to the control or direction at any time afterwards.

On the morning of the 13th of December, the ship was stranded on Wells beach, about forty miles westerly from this port. The weather at the time was stormy, dark and foggy, and blowing a double reef top-sail breeze with a heavy sea. The beach is of sand, quite flat, affording very poor holding-ground, and is at the head of Wells bay, exposed to the full force of the winds and waves. The vessel went on at a low run of tides, near high water, and the sea broke heavily over her stern, she being fast in the breakers. The weather thus continued throughout nearly all of the 13th. The officers went ashore and took lodgings at the house of Mr. Davis, a respectable man living in that vicinity. At low tide the water left the forward part of the ship, so that on one side persons could pass freely to and from the ship. Her stern, rising and falling with the tide and sea, settled her in the sand making a bed for her. At low tide there were six or eight feet of water under the stern post. The master engaged Davis to procure men from the shore to go on board to clear up decks, get up cranes and other things necessary for discharging the cargo, and also to assist in pumping the ship; and eleven men were thus employed on board on the 14th.

A large crowd of people from the neighborhood collected on the beach near the ship on the 13th, including a number of experienced ship-masters, merchants and mechanics, and among them Robert Cleaves of Kennebunk, a place about ten miles from the ship. Cleaves has followed the sea for many years, has been in command of sailing vessels and steamships, and appears to have been a man of energy and readiness for emergencies, with funds at his command. He was introduced to the master of the "Clotilda," and offered his services if he could render any assistance. The master informed him that he had sent to Portland for Lloyds' agent, and to the Allans, and that he should probably act on their advice. Cleaves gave him references as to his ability and character and then left.

He returned the next morning to the beach; it was then clear, the weather had moderated and continued to moderate throughout the 14th, but the ship was still in the breakers with the sea breaking over her. Cleaves inquired of the master "if he wanted any one to contract to save the cargo and ship," to which the master replied by asking what he would undertake to take the cargo out for. There is some discrepancy as to Cleaves' reply, as given by him in different portions of his testimony, whether his offer was one-third of the value, or one-third of the invoice cost, freight added; but on the whole, I find that Cleaves' offer was to discharge the cargo for one-third of its value. This offer the master declined as too high, and he took counsel of Capt. Aird, a master of one of the Allan Line of steamers, who advised him it was too large. Capt. Cleaves persisted in his original demand, setting forth, as best he could, the possible difficulties he might have to encounter, such as building rafts with the risk of their destruction by the wind and tides; and, also, that he might be obliged to rig purchases from the mast-head to the shore, and that he had other business of importance requiring his attention, so that he was not inclined to undertake the enterprise unless he should be fully paid for his services. After considerable discussion of the matter, Capt. Young, as Cleaves states, proposed "to pay for the discharge of the cargo on the beach above the spring tides, one-quarter part of the invoice price of the cargo, freight added, assigning as a reason for fixing the compensation in this manner, that the duties were very high on manufactured iron, and that they would be included in the value when landed, and would thereby very much increase the amount to be paid for its salvage if it should be computed on its value after being landed. On the 14th a survey was called, of which Capt. Aird was a member, and by their report made the same day, the surveyors recommended "that the ship be immediately discharged with a view of getting her afloat." Cleaves accepted the master's proposal, and the same evening a written contract was drawn up by Cleaves and signed by the parties at the Falmouth Hotel in this city, by which Cleaves agreed "to discharge from said ship all the cargo, stores, &c., that it was practicable and convenient to discharge, in as good order as the circumstances will permit, and to place as many men to work as he can work to advantage, and to use all the dispatch in his power to get the cargo out, and to place it above high water, ordinary spring tides on Wells beach, and that when the ship is afloat he will, if requested, put in sufficient sand for ballast;" for all which Young agreed "to give Cleaves the free use of blocks, tackle, engines, cranes, coal, &c., and to pay him twenty-five per cent. in gold on the invoice cost of said cargo in England, with freight added, on all that portion of said cargo that Cleaves takes out of said ship, and twenty-five per cent. on all the stores, tackle, apparel, &c., of the ship so deposited by Cleaves; salvage to be paid in Portland or Kennebunk as soon as the cargo is out, or as much of it as is practicable and convenient for him to take out. The value of said cargo is represented by said Young to be about $35,000 gold, and said Cleaves agrees to pay the eleven men who have worked on board for their day's work."

Under this agreement Cleaves immediately went to work discharging the cargo. With the exception of procuring a steam pump, he was at no other expense than the hiring of the men and teams he employed, working principally at low tide in discharging on to the sand alongside, occasionally at full tide, employing a few hands in breaking out the cargo and getting it within reach of the ship's tackles. He used the ship's engines, winches, cranes, &c., constantly, but states that he kept no account of his expenditures, and is not able to testify how long he was employed in this business, or the number of his men and teams, or the amount paid by him; his impression is that he expended $3,000 in the operation.

From the testimony of Mr. Goodwin, we learn that he commenced work on the second day, and worked steadily all the time there was any thing done, and he was paid $2.00 per tide, receiving in the whole $32.00, the pay for one night's services as a watchman being included in that amount. The first week in January, the vessel being then filled with water, Cleaves concluded he had discharged all the cargo which was practicable without means of freeing her. At that time all the chemicals and glass, a portion of the sails, &c., and about three-fourths of the ferry boat had been landed. Young pressed upon Cleaves the importance of landing the balance, as it would add to the value of that already landed, and finally Cleaves agreed to procure a steam pump, if one could be had for a reasonable amount, to free the ship from water so that they could reach the balance of the cargo. Cleaves procured a pump at Portland for $325, which required some repairs, and before they were completed, and the balance of the cargo discharged, Cleaves assigned this contract to Thompson, who afterwards removed some of the sails, chains and anchors from the ship, and then surrendered her with the balance of the cargo on board to Hilton, who had been sent to Wells from New York by Barclay & Livingston, agents for the owners, and who claimed to act in their behalf. Barclay & Livingston had contracted with the Coast Wrecking Company to get the ship off for sixty per cent. salvage, and by the exertions of this company, after nearly four months' labor, the ship was finally taken off the beach, with the balance of her cargo in her, and brought to Portland in June last. $15,000 salvage was paid to the company in accordance with the contract, she being appraised with the cargo then in her at $25,000.

At the time Thompson gave up the ship and cargo to Hilton, it was on condition that he should receive the salvage on the cargo on board, that which he would have been entitled to under the contract with Cleaves if he had landed it, as he was prepared with the steam-pump, at a small additional expense to have discharged it. The ship on examination in the dock was found badly damaged, her stern-post cracked, and her plating and rivets started and broken. Nothing was done by the master or Cleaves to hold the ship in position on the beach. As she was lightened by the discharge of the cargo, she consequently moved further up the beach, in all probably 500 to 600 feet, and also swung round, so that she was nearly broadside to the sea. She was thus carried beyond the force of the sea and breakers, and was in a much safer position than if she had remained where she struck; but if she could have been held there in safety, she would probably have come off in a few days, as the tides were on the increase, and the vessel was daily becoming more buoyant by the discharge of the cargo. The bottom was however all loose sand, and it is exceedingly doubtful whether with only her own ground tackle she could have been kept in position if the attempt had been made; and if the boisterous weather had continued and she remained in the breakers where she struck, she must soon have become a complete wreck.

Whilst Cleaves was at work discharging cargo, he called upon Young for money, and Young procured from the Allans $2,000 which he paid to Cleaves. In January, Cleaves demanded of Young payment of the balance due him under the salvage contract, and it not being paid, he left his demand for collection with his proctors. Young called upon various parties in order to raise the amount, and among others upon Thompson, the libellant, stating to him, "that the Allans had called upon him to repay them their advances, and that he was in want of $12,000 to pay Cleaves and Allans, and to forward the cargo to Portland and save the ship, and that he wanted the amount on a credit of four months." Thompson declined making the loan, and advised him to go to Portland and see the Allans to get his money. He returned, stating "that he had been offered the money in Portland at thirty per cent. and that the Allans advised him to get the money of Thompson in Kennebunk if he could; that Allans' folks had promised to let him have $4,000 or $5,000, but that they had received a dispatch not to let him have another dollar."

The owners had in the meantime been advised of the condition of the vessel, and ship and cargo were abandoned to the underwriters, and from that time neither owners, underwriters nor the Allans, in any way, so far as it appears, rendered any assistance to the master, gave him any advice or instructions, or took any steps to provide him with the necessary funds or credit. But all parties interested appear to have abandoned the master to his fate to do what he should think proper, or might by circumstances be compelled to do, manifestly not intending by anything they might do to be committed by the actions of the master in any ulterior proceedings, unless they should prove to be for their advantage. There was not that frankness and fair dealing which a master had a right to expect from his owners when advised that he was in distress in a foreign country; they seemed to fear that if they should give any advice or assistance to the master, they would thereby compromise their own rights among themselves, and they therefore preserved a complete silence, and abstained from all communication with him after the abandonment to the underwriters, and so cautious have they been, that it has not been thought advisable to inform the judgment of the court in relation to the transaction, by the testimony of the master or owners of either ship or cargo, or of the consignees or underwriters. The defence is apparently presented by the original owners in their answer, charging most fraudulent practices on the part of Young and Cleaves, whilst it appears in evidence that Capt. Young has by the same owners been since advanced to the command of another and more valuable ship belonging to them, thus most pointedly discrediting the good faith of their answer in charging him with such fraudulent practices. Whilst the defence is nominally made by the owners, the court cannot but believe that in fact it is conducted in behalf of the underwriters, the answer being subscribed and sworn to by New York merchants, one of whom is the general agent for Lloyds, and who has most diligently and carefully watched over and protected the interests of his principals, in no way compromising them by any voluntary explanations when examined as a witness, but the rather withholding all information which might in any way disclose any agency for the underwriters in making this defence.

This bottomry bond, as it is termed, was given under peculiar circumstances, and although drawn by able counsel, and intended to have the effect of an ordinary bond of bottomry, it is conceded that such cannot be its legal effect, as no maritime risk for any particular voyage is assumed by it. It recites, "that the ship is now ashore on Wells beach, and the master binds himself, the ship, tackle, apparel and cargo, a part of which lies on said beach, and the remainder on board the ship, in the sum of $10,400, to be paid to said Thompson, his heirs, &c.;" and the consideration is "that whereas said Christopher H. Young has been obliged to take up and has received from said Thompson, for the use of said ship and for the purpose of paying salvors for saving cargo and lightening said ship and other expenses accrued by the stranding of the ship, the sum of $10,- 000, the sum loaned, and the said sum of $400 additional for interest on sum loaned for ninety days as a premium, which sum loaned to be and remain as a lien and bottomry on said ship, her tackle, apparel, furniture and cargo, at the rate of sixteen per cent. per annum, for the purposes aforesaid, in consideration whereof, all the risks of the seas, rivers, enemies, fires, pirates, are to be on account of said Thompson; and for the better security of the sum and premium, the said master doth by these presents hypothecate and assign over to said Thompson, his heirs, &c., the said ship, her tackle, apparel and furniture and cargo aforesaid; * * * if the just and full sum of $10,000, being the sum borrowed, and also the premium of $400, shall be well and truly paid by said Young, at or before the expiration of ninety days, then this obligation and said hypothecation to be void and of no effect, otherwise to remain in full force and virtue. This instrument is made subject to all salvage that Capt. Robt. Cleaves of Kennebunk may have for balance of salvage due on said cargo and stores, and the said master reserves to himself the right of sale of said property, subject to the conditions of forfeiture of this bond and the claims of said Cleaves as aforesaid."

By this obligation the master was absolutely bound for the payment of the amount at the expiration of the ninety days, and although it recites that all the risks of the seas, rivers, &c., are to be on account of said Thompson, yet no particular voyage is set forth for which they are assumed, nor does it stipulate that the obligation is subject to any such condition, and that it shall become null and void in case of loss of the property by such casualties. This is not strictly a bottomry bond, and the second article in the libel founded upon it as such an instrument cannot be maintained. The libel contains a further article claiming to enforce a maritime lien on the ship and cargo for $10,000, the same being a loan for supplies and advances necessary for their care and preservation, and for which a lien existed, and which was by the master thus expended for their benefit. Such a lien, if it exists, may be enforced in this court, and is within the decisions in the cases of The Hunter [Case No. 6,904]; The William and Emmeline [Id. 17,687]; and The A. R. Dunlap [Id. 513]. It appears that Thompson well knew of the salvage contract made by Cleaves with Young, and of all that had been done in performance of it. He is therefore chargeable with full notice and affected with all the equities and obligations in relation to it, to the same extent that Cleaves would be if he were now prosecuting a libel founded on said contract.

It is therefore incumbent on the libellant to establish a necessity for the advances, and that the same were for the common benefit of ship and cargo, if he would sustain his libel against them. The justification for the advances by Thompson depends first, upon the validity and extent of Cleaves' lien upon the ship and cargo for the salvage services rendered by him, and secondly, upon the authority of the master to hypothecate by a loan the ship and cargo to discharge such lien. Upon the latter point it is sufficient to observe that the master at this time was wholly abandoned by the owners and all other parties to whom he had a right to look for assistance and advice. It was very evident that they were not willing to assume any obligation, or to make any advances to him in his distress, or even to advise him as to the course he should adopt; but they left him to be governed entirely by his own judgment under the circumstances in which he was placed.

His alleged consignees repudiated the consignment, and had, as he stated, called upon him to repay the amount they had advanced to him, and which he had paid to Cleaves on account of the salvage. The claim for the balance due to Cleaves under his contract had been left with the counsel for collection, and the only means of relief at the command of the master was from the property, either by permitting it to be libelled and disposed of by a court of admiralty, or from a loan by its hypothecation. The master then contemplated a completion of the voyage, that his ship would be relieved and the cargo forwarded to its place of destination, if he could obtain funds to pay the claims upon them and other expenses on a credit of three months, and in the opinion of the court, any prudent owner would have adopted the course taken by the master as he was then situated; and the master was not only justified, but it was his duty to have obtained the loan at a moderate rate of interest, and for a reasonable time to relieve the property from the liens then existing against it, and not have subjected it to the expense and delay attending proceedings in admiralty, devesting him of all control or possession of the property, and greatly hindering, if not utterly preventing, his getting the ship off the beach or forwarding the cargo.

Of the $10,000 which was paid by Thompson to Young, $6,000 was paid to Cleaves, $3,183 to H. & A. Allan, and the residue was applied by the master in payment of officers, wages and other expenses. So far as these sums were paid in discharge of Cleaves' claims, which were a lien upon the ship and cargo, including the repayment to the Allans of the $2,000 which was paid to Cleaves, to that extent the court is of opinion that the libel may be sustained, and the libellant be subrogated to his rights. What then was the extent of Cleaves' lien? Was this contract valid and obligatory, and were ship and cargo chargeable therewith?

The written contract stipulates for the discharge of the cargo, stores and apparel, as far forth as practicable, at a compensation of twenty-five per cent. of the invoice value of the cargo, freight added, and a like proportion of the stores, tackle, &c. Nothing is said about the ship, or getting her off the beach; but it is quite evident that at that time the master expected the ship would be saved; and the discharge of the cargo was not only for the benefit of the cargo, but equally for the ship's advantage, as appears from the report of the surveyors, and the salvage services in unlading the cargo were for the common benefit of ship and cargo. If the ship had remained twenty-four hours longer in the breakers where she was when Cleaves commenced discharging, there can be but little question that her decks would have been stove by the sea, and she would have gone to pieces. By removing the cargo, she was enabled to pass beyond the reach of the breakers, and for the time being was removed to a place of safety. To effect this object, among others, the contract was made by Cleaves with the master. It proved successful, and all the property thereby benefited, both ship and cargo, was bound for the expenses thus incurred.

In defence, it is contended that this salvage agreement is invalid, being unconscionable in its amount, the sum claimed under it being greater than the actual value of the entire cargo. The rule in relation to such contracts as laid down in 2 Pars. Shipp. & Adm. 306, is that "if at the time of service, the salvors make a bargain with the owners of the property in peril or their servants as to the amount of salvage, this is enforced by the court only so far as it seems equitable and conformable to the merits of the case; and it is wholly disregarded if it be deemed unconscionable and oppressive to the owners of the property saved, or entered into under circumstances which amount to compulsion."

In Houseman v. The North Carolina, 15 Pet. [40 U. S.] 40, Taney, C. J., says, "In all such cases (of salvage contracts) unless the acts of the captain are ratified by the owners, his conduct will be carefully watched and scrutinized by the court, and his contracts will not be regarded as binding upon the parties concerned, unless they appear to have been bona fide and such as a discreet owner, placed in like circumstances, would have made. If he settles the amount by agreement, those who claim under it must show that the salvage awarded was reasonable and just." In The Emulous [Case No. 4,480], Judge Story says, "It is true that contracts made for salvage services are not ordinarily held obligatory by the court of admiralty upon the persons whose property is saved, unless the court can clearly see that no advantage is taken of the parties' situation and that the amount is just and reasonable."

This rule has repeatedly received the sanction of the high court of admiralty in England, and been recognized by this and other admiralty courts in this country. See The W. D. B. [Id. 17,306]. If the agreement is proved, it should be presumed to be fair and equitable, and the burden is clearly upon the claimant to satisfy the court that to carry it into effect would be contrary to equity and justice, or that it was procured by fraud or compulsion.

The evidence does not establish that any fraud was practiced by Cleaves, or that the contract was obtained by compulsion, or any advantage taken of the position of the property of the master. On the contrary, the agreement was made with deliberation, between parties fully competent to contract, after time for reflection, and as the court has no doubt, after the master had consulted with Lloyds' agent as well as Capt. Aird and other parties in relation to it. At the same time the court is equally well assured that the agreement was entered into under a mutual mistake of the real condition of affairs and of the consequences which must result from its enforcement, and that to sustain it will produce gross injustice.

The invoice value of the cargo, freight added, is admitted to have been in currency, $47,178.20, twenty-five per cent. of which sum, $11,794.55, is the amount of salvage claimed for discharging the cargo; and to this is added a further sum of $660, being one-fourth of the alleged value of sails, stores, &c., belonging to the ship and landed from her under the salvage contract. An appraisal in bond of the entire cargo has been taken by order of the court, by persons well qualified for that duty, who have under oath estimated its entire value on the wharf in Portland at $14,086.49. Deducting from this amount the expense of removal from Wells beach to Portland, $3,226.22 would leave the net value on the beach $10,860.27, whilst the amount claimed as salvage for its discharge is $11,794.55, being more than $900 beyond the value of the entire cargo. This appraisal, so far as it relates to the ferry-boat, is said to be erroneous and should not conclude the court, as the appraisers have considered it as of no greater value than scrap iron, and have not allowed its real value as the parts of a boat in readiness to be put together and completed. This was a matter entirely for the consideration of the appraisers, and courts of admiralty are never inclined to question the correctness of a valuation made by those it has selected for that duty. On the contrary, in England, such appraisal is always held conclusive as to value. I am not aware of any authority to that effect in this country, and without intending to decide whether the court is or not concluded by its valuation, I have no doubt that the appraisers in the present case have arrived at a just and correct result.

It must be recollected, that this portion of the cargo, the frame and plates of an iron ferry boat, is a kind of property designed for a particular, special purpose, constructed at a great expense, and valuable for the purpose for which it was designed, but not susceptible of being used for any other purpose. Few customers can be found for such property; it is very seldom that such a boat is needed; it was constructed for a ferry boat in connection with railroad trains, quite long and flat, and unless accepted by the party for whom it was manufactured, in all probability a purchaser could not be obtained for it. Such, in the present instance, is shown to have been the case. By reason of the great delay attending its transportation, the Grand Trunk Railway considered itself exonerated from its obligation to accept it, and took no steps to obtain possession of it, even at the valuation objected to by the libellant; and the reasonable inference from the conduct of this company is, that it has from some other source obtained a boat, so that it has no occasion for this. This property has been extensively advertised in New York, Boston, and western papers, and the only offer received has been one of $40.00 per ton, from which, if the duties and expense of transhipment are deducted, it would afford a valuation not very different from that given by the appraisers. This portion of the cargo has been examined by a skilled mechanic, who states that many of the frames and ribs, constituting about one-third of the entire quantity of the whole cargo, were broken or badly twisted, and that some of the iron plates were also broken so that they were only fit for scrap iron, which of course very much reduces its value.

The libellant states that he was offered $45,000 for the cargo, and so informed Hilton, the agent for the underwriters, and that when a week or two afterwards Hilton wanted him to take it he refused as the chance had gone. At that time the property was in the custody of the court, and on petition the court would at once have directed the acceptance of the offer; it is not referred to in any of the correspondence, and the court cannot but think that there is some mistake in relation to it, and that for the cargo, as it then was, no such amount would have been paid for it by any one after a careful examination of its condition.

Taking therefore the valuation as correct, and sustaining and enforcing this salvage agreement, the entire cargo would not pay for its landing, and it would require the further sum of $900 to be realized from the ship and freight, if the cargo was first applied to the payment. It is claimed that the ship should bear her proportion of this expense, as she was benefited by the discharge of the cargo and removed thereby from immediate peril to temporary safety. As I have before stated, I think this expenditure was for the common benefit and to the advantage of the ship, and she should bear her proportion of it according to the benefit rendered to her from the expenditure. She was rescued from the then impending peril of destruction from the breakers, but she was not then brought into safety and a condition to perform her voyage.

To accomplish this, a long delay and heavy expenditures were incurred, which, in my view, should be deducted from the value of the ship before she can be called upon to contribute to the expense of her discharge. She was valued at $20,000 in the dock at Portland, but this did not include her sails, spars, chains, &c., amounting to about $2,000 additional. Her whole value, therefore, when taken off the beach was about $22,000, on which sixty per cent. was paid the Coast Wrecking Company as subsequent salvors. Deducting the amount of this second salvage would leave a value of $9,000 in the ship to contribute to the expense of her discharge, which added to the net value of the cargo on the beach, $10,860.27, gives an aggregate of property of nearly $20,000 to contribute to the salvage claim of $11,794.55 for cargo, and $660 on sails, chains, &c., amounting to $12,454.55 to be borne by the $20,000.

Cleaves was engaged but about a fortnight in this enterprise; the labor was not very severe or perilous, as after the second day he found no difficulty in obtaining all the men he required at $2.00 per tide, and ox-teams including drivers at $4.00 per tide; the weather was cold but not stormy, with the exception of one day, and his expenses beyond his payments for men and teams and the steam pump did not exceed $100. His contract gave him the privilege of the ship's coal, engines, tackles and cranes, and by means of them he was enabled to discharge successfully a large portion of the cargo at an expense, so far as the court can discover from his own statements, not exceeding $2,000 or $2,500.

The principal part of the cargo was heavy, crooked and difficult to handle, but the hindrances were not very different from what they would have been at many of the wharves in this town. It was allowed to be dropped upon the beach, and in some instances by so doing was broken or bent, and its value greatly diminished; but it was necessary to use all expedition possible in this work, and the court is not inclined to make any great deduction on this account, although with more care and time it would undoubtedly have been landed in better condition. The salvage claim is four-fold the expenditure, without any risk of property, or any personal exposure to danger, or requiring of the salvors extraordinary skill and exposure in the business, and is more than fifty per cent. of the entire value of all the property benefited by the service, which is the usual amount allowed in cases of derelict at sea, attended with much risk and exposure of persons and property. I have stated that this agreement was entered into under mutual mistake, and it is very manifest that such was the case, as the parties would never have entered into an agreement to pay $900 more than the entire value of the cargo for merely discharging it on the beach above spring tides.

If both parties had then known that its value when landed would not have exceeded $11,000, it cannot be supposed they would have contracted that Cleaves should receive $11,794 for its discharge. Both believed that when landed it would be worth and would command nearly, if not quite, its full invoice value with freight. They do not appear to have contemplated any diminution of its value by reason of the damage it had sustained on the voyage, or which it might receive in process of landing, or from its not being a kind of property which at all times would command a purchaser at nearly its original cost. There was evidently such a mistake as would require a court of admiralty in the present instance not to hold this agreement obligatory upon the claimants.

In the opinion of the court a salvage contract similar to the one now under consideration ordinarily should not receive the sanction of the court, it being in conflict with the policy of courts of admiralty in matters of salvage. The value of the property as saved should always be a very important element in determining the amount, and an agreement to pay a fixed proportion of the invoice value and freight, entirely excludes any consideration of the present value of the property. Salvage services are only required when the ship or cargo is in distress; and when a vessel is stranded, it is almost certain to be the case that the cargo is more or less injured, and in most cases so as to materially affect its value and reduce it below its original invoice cost. Compensation for salvage services is allowed by reason of the benefit conferred, and ought to bear some proportion to such benefit. This can only be ascertained by an examination of the cargo, and if found damaged, the benefit being so much the less, the award for salvage should be affected thereby; but by the rule adopted in this agreement, the salvor is assured of his reward without any regard to the benefit he may render the owner. The cargo may from various causes, as in the present instance, not be of sufficient value to pay the price agreed, and yet if the agreement is to control the rights of the parties, the salvors will realize more than the whole value of the property.

It is for the interest of commerce and navigation that compensation for salvage services should usually be somewhat of a contingent nature, dependent on the value of the property rescued from peril by the services. The diligence and skill of salvors are thereby incited and promoted, and they will be much more likely to render valuable aid and assistance, and to rescue from peril a much larger amount of property, if they understand that their reward is dependent upon the value of the property saved, than they otherwise would, if they were sure of a certain amount, provided the property saved proves insufficient to realize such amount. Salvage services are generally required in storms and rough weather, are attended with more or less danger and exposure, and salvors would not be inclined to expose themselves to continued peril and danger in rescuing the balance of the property at risk, after they had saved enough to insure their own demand upon it, under a contract like the present. It is frequently the case, that the portion of the cargo which is in the lower hold of a ship in distress cannot be discharged without much more cost and peril than attends the discharge of that found between decks; and it is certainly not salutary or judicious for the court to approve of any practices by which salvors will be induced to abstain from saving that portion of a ship's cargo which is most difficult to rescue, and content themselves with taking care of that only which can be preserved without much trouble or exposure.

The agreement not being sustained by the court, it only remains to determine what is a reasonable award for the salvage services rendered, the property benefited thereby being of the estimated value of $20,000. The cargo is stated in the contract to have been of the invoice value of $35,000 in gold, so that the amount which Cleaves expected to receive was in excess of $10,000.

"Compensation as salvage is not viewed by the admiralty courts merely as pay on the principle of quantum meruit, or as a remuneration pro opere et labore, but as a reward given for perilous services voluntarily rendered, and as an inducement to seamen and others to embark in such undertakings to save life and property. Public policy encourages the hardy and adventurous mariner to engage in these laborious and sometimes dangerous enterprises, and with a view to withdraw from him every temptation to embezzlement and dishonesty, the law allows him in case he is successful a liberal compensation." The Blackwell, 10 Wall. [77 U. S.] 14.

In my view, the sum of $6,000 under all the circumstances of this case is a reasonable and just award for the salvage services. It is probably a somewhat larger sum than the court would have awarded if there had been no agreement in relation to the amount; but an inducement of a much larger compensation was thus held out by the master to Cleaves if he would undertake the service, and it is possible he might not have assumed it if he had not expected to be thus liberally rewarded. If these claimants, therefore, are required to pay more than they otherwise might have been, they must ascribe it to the conduct of their master, for whose proceedings they are to some degree thus held responsible. Decree for $6,000 and costs on the first libel. Second libel dismissed without costs.

Case No. 2,904.

CLOUD v. HEWITT.

[3 Cranch, C. C. 199.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov., 1827.

INSPECTION OF FLOUR—QUI TAM ACTION—PARTIES—PLEADING.

1. In an action for a penalty, under the Virginia act of 21st December, 1792, "regulating, the inspection of flour and bread," it is not necessary that the United States should be nominally a plaintiff, but the penalty may be recovered in an action qui tam.

[Cited in Winne v. Snow, 19 Fed. 508.]

2. In an action for the penalty for altering the inspector's marks on barrels of flour, it is necessary to set out the marks, and how altered.

3. The word "condemned" must be branded on the cask, or it is not within the fifteenth nor the tenth section of the act.

This was an action of debt qui tam, under the tenth and fifteenth sections of the Virginia act of 21st December, 1792, "regulating the inspection of flour and bread." Pages 229, 231. The declaration had two counts: 1st. Upon the tenth section, for lading on board a ship for exportation twenty barrels of flour, marked "condemned" by an inspector. 2d. Upon the fifteenth section, for altering the inspection marks on twenty-four barrels of flour. The defendant demurred to the declaration.

Mr. Hewitt, for defendant, contended that, under the act of congress of the 3d of March, 1801 (2 Stat. 115), supplementary to the act concerning the District of Columbia, section 2, it was necessary that the action should be in the name of the United States and of the informer, and that a qui tam action by the informer, who sues for himself and the United States, is not sufficient.

But THE COURT (nem. con.) overruled the objection.

THE COURT, however, was of opinion that the second count was bad, in not setting out what the marks were, which were altered, and how they were altered.

Mr. Swann, for plaintiff, had leave to amend his declaration, and the defendant pleaded nil debet.

Mr. Taylor, for defendant, upon the trial of the issue upon nil debet, contended that the evidence did not bring the case within the fifteenth section of the act. That the mark "condemned" contemplated in the statute, means a mark branded; whereas, the evidence is, the mark was only made with red chalk. In the tenth section the word is "marked;" in the fifteenth, the expression is "stamped" or "branded, condemned." It is a highly penal law, seven dollars a barrel, and should be construed strictly. The policy of the law requires that the word "condemned" should be as permanently marked as any other word which the inspector is required to put upon the barrel.

Mr. Swann, contra. The inspector, if the flour is unmerchantable, is, by the tenth section, to "cause the same to be marked, on the bilge, with the word 'condemned,' or secure it for a further examination, if required; which examination the owner shall procure to be made within twenty days." This shows that the mark was to be temporary, not permanent, and if upon such re-examination, the flour shall be found merchantable, "the inspector shall erase out the word 'condemned,' and put such brand on the flour as" the examiner shall direct. The degree of fineness only is to be branded.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, contra) was of opinion that the word "condemned" must be branded on the bilge, or it is not within the fifteenth or the tenth section of the act.

The verdict being for the defendant, upon both counts, Mr. Swann, for the plaintiff, moved for a new trial, on the ground of misdirection of the jury by the court upon the matter of law; and the case was again argued by Mr. Swann, for plaintiff, and Mr. Hewitt for defendant.

CRANCH, Chief Judge, delivered the opinion of the court (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, contra), as follows:

This was an action of debt, under the tenth and fifteenth sections of the act of Virginia, of the 21st of December, 1792, "for regulating the inspection of flour and bread." Rev. Code, 229. The first count was upon the tenth section, for lading on board a ship, for exportation from the town of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia, twenty barrels of flour marked "condemned," by an inspector in that town. The second count was upon the fifteenth section, and was for altering the mark "condemned," which had been put upon the barrels of flour by an inspector.

THE COURT, upon the trial of the issue upon the plea of nil debet had (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, contra) instructed the jury that the word "condemned" must be branded; or it was not such a mark as was contemplated by the statute. Upon this instruction the jury found a verdict for the defendant, the marks having been made with red chalk only; which was said to have been the invariable practice under the statute; and it was said that the inspectors had never used a brand for that word; but had always used brands for the four words indicating the four degrees of fineness of the flour, namely, "superfine," "fine," "middling," and "shipstuff."

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

Mr. Swann, for plaintiff, moved for a new trial, on the ground of misdirection of the jury, by the court, on the point of law. This motion has been argued, and the question now to be decided, is, whether the mark "condemned" must be branded on the cask.

The main object of the law was to prevent the exportation of bad flour, whereby the credit of the Virginia flour would be injured in foreign markets. The fourth section provides that all flour brought to a port "for exportation," shall be made of due fineness, &c. The fifth section regulates the size and quality of the barrel. The sixth requires every miller of flour "for exportation," to provide and keep "a distinguishable brand-mark," with which he shall brand every cask of flour and mark thereon the tare and net weight; and inflicts a penalty on any person, who shall remove any cask of flour from the place of manufacture, "not branded and marked as aforesaid." The carrier, who should have paid the penalty, might recover it from the miller, provided he informed him that he intended to carry it, and requested the miller "to secure and brand the said barrels." The seventh and eighth sections regulate the weight of flour which should be packed in the casks. The ninth relates to bread only. The tenth provides that any cask of flour brought to a port, to be from thence laden or shipped for exportation, shall be inspected by an inspector, and if he shall judge it to be well packed and merchantable, he shall "brand the cask in the quarter with the name of the place at which he is inspector, with a public brand-mark, to be provided for that purpose; and shall also brand and mark the degree of fineness which he shall, on inspection, determine the said flour to be of; which degree shall be distinguished as follows, namely, superfine, fine, middling, and shipstuff." "No inspector shall pass any flour which shall prove, on examination, to be unmerchantable, according to the true intent and meaning of this act, but shall cause the same to be marked on the bilge with the word 'condemned,' or secure it for a further examination if required; which examination, the owner shall procure to be made within twenty days." It then provides the mode of appeal to three persons, to be appointed by a justice of the peace; "and if they or any two of them, shall pass and declare the same to be merchantable; in such case, the inspector shall erase out the word 'condemned,' and put such brand on the said flour, as they or any two of them shall direct." "It shall not be lawful, for any person to export, or lade on board of any ship or vessel, for exportation out of this state, any cask of flour marked 'condemned' by an inspector; or to export or lade on board any ship or vessel, for exportation, from any port or place within this state, any casks or barrels of flour, not inspected or branded as aforesaid, on pain of forfeiting ten dollars for every cask or barrel exported, or laden on board any ship or vessel, for exportation." The eleventh section declares, that complaints have been made that evil-disposed persons have packed flour "in old casks which have been branded agreeable to this act," and provides a penalty for so doing. The twelfth provides for the inspection at certain mills. The thirteenth contains the form of the inspector's oath, by which, among other things, he swears, "that no flour shall be passed or branded by him, without inspecting the same; that he will not brand, nor cause to be branded as passed, any cask or casks of flour that do not appear to him" to be merchantable; "that he will mark on all casks of flour, the degree thereof, according to the directions of this act; that he will carefully examine the casks," "and that he will not pass or brand any such casks, unless they be of such size, goodness, and thickness, as by this act are required." The fourteenth section forbids inspectors to purchase flour, unless for their own use. The fifteenth section provides that, "if any person shall alter the mark stamped on any cask of flour, by an inspector, or shall mark or brand any cask of flour, which has not been inspected, with any mark or brand, similar to, or in imitation of any inspector's mark or brand, or after an inspector shall have passed any cask of flour as merchantable, shall pack, into such cask, any other flour; or after any cask of flour shall be branded 'condemned,' shall unpack, and re-pack the same in other casks, for exportation, such person shall forfeit and pay the sum of seven dollars for every cask."

These are all the parts of the act, which are believed to have any bearing upon the question in what manner the word "condemned," shall be marked upon the cask, within the meaning of the statute. It may be observed, that by the tenth section it is equally penal to export casks of flour not branded, as to export casks of flour "marked condemned," and therefore, it was not necessary that the word "condemned" should be branded on the cask; for whether branded or not, it could not affect the credit of the Virginia flour in a foreign market, because it was never to be exported. The tenth section does not say how the word "condemned" shall be marked on the cask; but it expressly provides that the degree of fineness of merchantable flour, shall be branded and marked; and if, upon appeal, flour, which the inspector shall have marked "condemned," should be determined to be merchantable, the inspector is to "erase out the word 'condemned,' and put such 'brand'" on the flour as the reviewers shall direct. The expression is not, such other brand, (which would have been used, if the legislature had intended, that the word "condemned" should be branded on the cask,) but the expression used is "such brand as," implying that it had not been before branded and marked. The degree of fineness is to be branded and marked; the word "condemned" is to be marked. The same section makes it penal to export casks of flour, not inspected or branded as aforesaid. If the casks of flour should have been inspected and branded "condemned," they would not literally have been within this penalty, if the act had required the word "condemned" to be branded upon such casks. Hence it may be strongly inferred that the legislature did not intend that the word "condemned" should be marked by branding. The eleventh section, surely, is not intended to guard against the mischief of packing flour in old casks marked "condemned;" yet it complains that evil disposed persons have packed flour "in old casks which have been branded agreeable to this act." If the word "condemned" was to be branded on the cask, it would be included in the expression "branded agreeable to this act," and therefore within the letter of the mischief complained of, although clearly not within its spirit. The legislature, therefore, in this section, seems to have considered the term "branded" as applicable only to the branding of merchantable flour.

This is believed to be the whole substance of the argument, on the part of the prosecution, upon this point; and if the question rested entirely upon the tenth and eleventh sections of the act, the court would be clearly of opinion that the penalty for lading on board of a ship, for exportation out of the district, a cask of flour marked "condemned" by an inspector, might be incurred, although it were so marked with red chalk, and not branded. But the question does not rest on those two sections only. The whole act must be construed together, so as to be consistent in all its parts, if possible. The tenth is the only section which requires that the word "condemned," should be marked upon casks of unmerchantable flour. When the fifteenth section says, that "if any person" "after any cask of flour shall be branded 'condemned' shall unpack and re-pack the same in other casks for exportation, such person shall forfeit and pay the sum of seven dollars for every cask," it evidently refers to the marking of the word "condemned," required by the tenth, and renders that certain, which the tenth section left uncertain, to wit, the manner of marking the word "condemned."

It is evident that the legislature took it for granted that, under the tenth section, the word "condemned" was to be branded on the cask; and, upon the principles of construction applicable to penal laws, no person would be liable to the penalty of seven dollars a barrel, under the fifteenth section, for unpacking and repacking condemned flour in other casks, for exportation, unless the word "condemned" had been branded on the cask. That the mode of marking was, by the tenth section, left to the discretion of the inspector, is only matter of inference; and we think that the inference, arising from the fifteenth section, is stronger than that arising from the tenth and eleventh sections. We think that the tenth and fifteenth sections must have the same construction, as to the mode of marking; and, if they conflict with each other, one must yield. But we do not think that there is any repugnance between them. One designates the mode; the other does not. The uncertain must be construed by the certain. This construction is corroborated by other sections of the act. The sixth requires every miller of flour, for exportation, to provide and keep a distinguishable brand-mark, with which he shall brand every cask of flour, and mark thereon the tare and net weight; and inflicts a penalty for removing the casks not branded and marked, as aforesaid; but the person removing the cask, and who may have paid the penalty, may recover it from the miller, if he shall have informed him of his intention to carry them, and requested him to brand the casks. He is not obliged to request the miller to brand and mark the casks, but only to brand; implying that the tare and net weight is to be marked by branding. The thirteenth section contains the form of the inspector's oath, by which he swears not to pass or brand any flour without inspecting it. Here the word "brand" may be applied, as well to unmerchantable as to merchantable flour. He is not to pass, nor to brand as condemned, any flour without inspecting it. He further swears that he will not brand, as passed, any flour not merchantable; implying that the flour may be branded, and not passed. He also swears that he will mark, on all casks of flour, the degree thereof. Here the word "mark" is used for brand; for, by the tenth section, he is to brand and mark the degree of fineness. Some stress was laid on the word "erase," in the tenth section, where it is said that, if flour which has been marked "condemned," should, upon appeal, be adjudged merchantable, the inspector shall "erase out" the word "condemned." It was said that the word "erase" was not the proper word to designate the obliteration of a brand-mark. But, in truth, it is the most proper word that could be used to express the idea. It is derived from the Latin word rado, which signifies to shave, to scrape, to make smooth. It is defined by Johnson, "to blot out by razure;" and razure is defined to be "the act of scraping, or shaving." Whatever argument, therefore, may be derived from the meaning of the word "erase," is against the construction which would permit the word "condemned" to be written with chalk; to the obliteration of which neither scraping nor shaving is necessary, as it is for that of a brand-mark.

Upon a comprehensive view of the whole act, we are still of the opinion which we expressed at the trial, that, unless the word "condemned" be branded on the cask, no person can be liable to the penalty, under the tenth section, for lading on board of a vessel, for exportation, flour marked "condemned;" nor to the penalty under the fifteenth section, for altering the inspector's mark.

Judgment for the defendant; but THE COURT ordered it to be certified that there was probable cause for the prosecution.

Case No. 2,905.

In re CLOUGH.

[2 N. B. R. 151 (Quarto, 59); 2 Ben. 508; 16 [Pittsb. Leg. J. 25.] [1]

District Court, S. D. New York. Oct. 3, 1868.

PROOF OF DEBT IN BANKRUPTCY — UNLIQUIDATED DAMAGES.

A creditor not on the bankrupt's schedules files a deposition setting forth a claim for unliquidated damages on a breach of contract by the bankrupt, but makes no application for assessment of alleged damages. Held such debt was not duly proved.

[In the matter of Oscar H. Clough, a bankrupt.

[On certificate of James F. Dwight, register in bankruptcy.]

I certify that in the course of the proceedings before me, the following question arose pertinent to the proceedings, and is referred to the judge under section 6 of the law, for his opinion.

On the return day of an order to show cause why the bankrupt should not be discharged, Patrick Murray appeared and filed the following proof of debt, viz:

"At New York, in the county of New York and state of New York, on the 11th day of September, A. D. 1868, before me, James F. Dwight, register, came Patrick Murray of Bergen, in the county of Hudson, and state of New Jersey, and made oath, and who, after being duly sworn and examined at the time and place aforesaid, upon his oath says that the said Oscar H. Clough, the person for whom a petition for adjudication in bankruptcy has been filed, at and before the filing of the said petition, and still is, justly and truly indebted to this deponent in the sum of fifty thousand dollars, being the amount of damage suffered by deponent by the violation, by the said bankrupt and others, of a certain agreement entered into by deponent, the said bankrupt, and Richard & Cyrus Butler, bearing date October 1, 1860, and also gains and profits made by the sale of plumbago thereunder, due and payable from the said Butler and Clough to deponent, the said claim of deponent being now in litigation and pending in an action in the supreme court of the state of New York, wherein he is plaintiff, and the said Butler and Clough defendants, for which said sum of fifty thousand dollars, or any part thereof, this deponent says that he has not, nor has any person by his order, or to this deponent's knowledge or belief, for his use, had or received any manner of satisfaction or security whatever.

"And this deponent further says that the said claim was not procured for the purpose of influencing the proceedings under the act of congress entitled 'An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States,' approved March 2, 1867 [14 Stat. 517]; that no bargain or agreement, express or implied, has been made or entered into by or on behalf of this deponent to sell, transfer, or dispose of said claim, or any part thereof, against said bankrupt, or to take or receive, directly or indirectly, any money, property, or consideration whatever, whereby the vote of this deponent for assignee, or any action on the part of this deponent, or any other person in the proceedings under said act, has been, is, or shall be in any way affected, influenced, or controlled. P. Murray.

"Subscribed and sworn to this 11th day of September, 1868.

"James F. Dwight, Register."

The said Murray does not appear as a creditor on the bankrupt's schedules, and had not appeared before, although the case has been pending since the 21st day of September, 1867, and the bankrupt, through his attorneys, comes and denies the debt set forth by the creditor, and objects to the proof of debt being received, and claims that the same should be rejected as not "duly proved." And the objections filed by the bankrupt are hereto attached. There has been no application by the creditor to have his damages assessed.

By JAMES F. DWIGHT, Register:

I believe the objection of the bankrupt to be well taken, and do not think the proof of debt can stand as filed on this deposition. The creditor was notified by me, when the proof was filed, that, being for unliquidated damages, the amount should be fixed by assessment, he pronounced himself satisfied to let it remain thus. I do not understand that the court is called upon by the laws to order an assessment of damages, unless the creditor applies for the same.

Objection of bankrupt:

"Oscar H. Clough, the above-named bankrupt, hereby denies the existence of any debt against him, either individually or jointly with others, in favor of Patrick Murray, who has made what purports to be a proof of debt against him in these proceedings, amounting to the sum of $50,000, and he hereby objects to the said proof of debt, and to the same being received by the court, the register, and the assignee, and alleges that said debt is not duly proved, and that the courts should 'reject' the same as not being 'duly proved' pursuant to section 22 of the bankrupt act. 1st. Because the alleged debt is for unliquidated damages as appears on the face of said proof of debt, and in such cases there must, under section 19 of the act, be an assessment of the damages by the court, before any debt arising therefrom can be proved, and no such assessment or application therefor has been had. 2d. If provable ex parte under section 22, as has been attempted, the proof of debt does not sufficiently set forth as required by said section 22, either the 'demand' or the 'consideration thereof.' Wherefore the said bankrupt objects to said debt and the proof thereof, and he denies such debt, and asks the register to certify the same to the court, that the court may, according to said section 22 (last clause), reject said claim as not duly proved, or grant said bankrupt such further relief as may be just. Cotterill Bros., Attorneys for Bankrupt."

[1] [Reprinted from 2 N. B. R. 151 (Quarto, 59), by permission. 2 Ben. 508, only gives a condensed report of this case.]

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. I concur in the views of the register. The clerk will certify this decision to the register, James F. Dwight, Esq.

Case No. 2,906.

CLOUGH v. GILBERT & B. MANUF'G CO. et al.

[3 Ban. & A. 523;[1] 15 O. G. 1009; Merw. Pat. Inv. 225.]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Oct. 14, 1878.

PATENTS — "GAS BURNERS" — CONSTRUCTION — EQUIVALENTS—COMBINATION—INFRINGEMENT.

1. The first claim in the patent to Clough, June 14th, 1870, for improvement in gas burners, includes the combination of the perforated burner with surrounding tube, irrespective of any method of regulating the escape of gas from the perforations, and is found in the patent to J. F. Barker, July 26th, 1870, who is the prior inventor of the same.

2. The employment of a slit extending down to the base of the burner, instead of small perforations at the base: Held, to be an equivalent, the structure and mode of operation of the combination being the same.

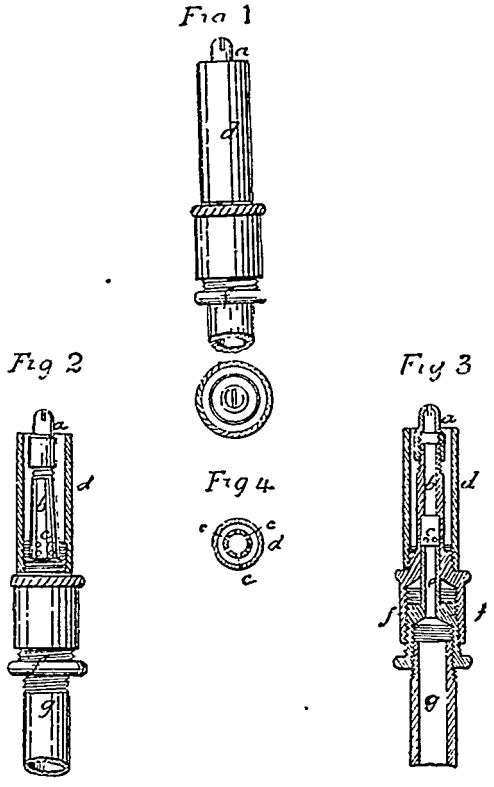
3. A combination, such as was embraced in the second claim of Clough's patent, being found to be old in the art, the claim was limited in construction so as to include the particular devices shown, and when so limited, the defendant's device did not infringe.

[See note at end of case.]

[In equity. Bill by Theodore Clough against the Gilbert & Barker Manufacturing Company and others for alleged infringement of letters patent.

[1] [Reported by Hubert A. Banning, Esq., and Henry Arden, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

[The following is a drawing of the Clough burner:]



George H. Yeaman, for complainant.
William Stanley, for defendants.

BLATCHFORD, Circuit Judge. This suit is founded on letters patent No. 104,271, granted to the plaintiff, June 14th, 1870, for an improvement in gas-burners. The specification says:

"My invention relates more particularly to burners for burning illuminating gas made by saturating gas with vapors of gasoline, commonly called air-gas. It has been found that common bat-wing or fish-tail burners are not adapted to burning this gas as ordinarily made, owing to the variable density of the gas coming from the generating apparatus.

"The object of my improvement is to adapt the slitted or bat-wing burner to the burning of air-gas.

"Said improvements consist, first, in perforating the base of the burner-tube with small holes or passages for gas to escape at the base of the burner, and surrounding the burner with a tube open at the top, but closed at the bottom, and united to the burner below the perforations in the burner-tube. It is more convenient to screw the tube to the burner, but it may be attached in any suitable manner. Second, in regulating the escape of the gas from the perforations at the base of the burner by a sliding tubular valve or cut-off, introduced into the burner-tube at the base and extending upward within it, the position of the tubular valve being regulated by a screw. These improvements, by furnishing a regulated supply of gas outside of the burner, but directed to the tip of the burner by the surrounding tube, give steadiness and increased illuminating power to the flame of the bat-wing burner, and make it a desirable burner for burning air-gas.

"The drawings represent a bat-wing burner as improved by me.

"Figure 1 represents an elevation of my improved burner attached to a short piece of gas-pipe; Fig. 2, a view showing the surrounding tube in section and the burner therein; Fig. 3, a vertical section through the burner and tube; Fig. 4, a transverse section through the base of the burner-tube.

"Letter a represents the burner-tip; b, the burner-tube; c, perforations at the base of burner-tube; d, the surrounding tube screwed to base of burner-tube; e, the tubular valve extending up in the burner-tube, and operated by an annular screw, f, attached to the lower end. Said annular screw, besides having a screw to work in the base of the burner, has an internal screw, by which it and the burner are attached to the gas-pipe, as clearly shown in Fig. 3 and the other drawings, the gasway being through the annular screw and tubular valve to the burner. As the burner is connected to the gas-pipe, g, by means of the annular screw, the adjustment of the gas escaping through the perforations of the burner-tube, is easily made by turning the burner upon the annular screw.

"I claim, as my invention and improvement in air-gas burners, the bat-wing burner perforated at the base, in combination with the surrounding tube, substantially as described. Also, in combination with the bat-wing burner perforated at the base and surrounding tube, the tubular valve for regulating the supply of external gas to the burner, substantially as described."

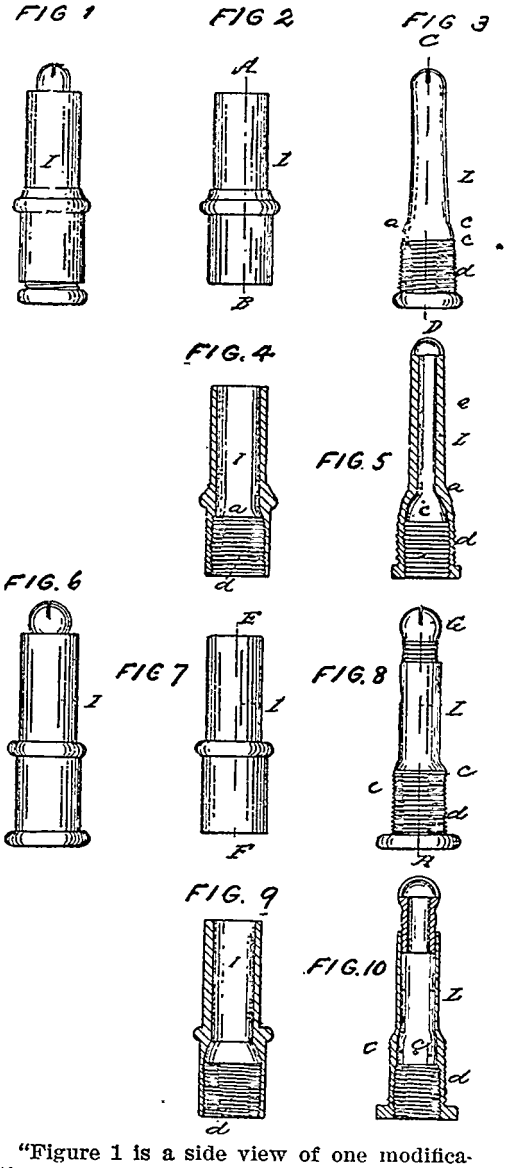
The defendants, in their answer, set up that they have not infringed the patent, and that it is void for want of novelty. At the request of both parties the court ordered a trial, at law, in this court, of two questions:

First. Whether or not the complainant is the first and original inventor of the improvement in gas-burners for which the first above-named patent has been granted to him.

Second. Whether or not the gas-burners manufactured by the defendants are substantially identical with those described in the complainant's patent and schedule thereto annexed, in their construction and mode of operation.

The issues were tried before Judge Shipman and a jury, and the jury answered both of the questions in the affirmative. Afterward, on a case made, the defendants moved before Judge Shipman for a new trial on the ground that the verdict was against the weight of the evidence. He denied the motion in a written opinion, in which he stated that the weight of the evidence on the question of infringement was not such as to justify him in granting a new trial, and that he was satisfied with the conclusion of the jury on the question of priority. He afterward signed and filed a certificate, that, in his opinion, the verdict, on both questions, was sustained by the evidence given.

The burners made by the defendants were made in accordance with the description of the first form of burner described in the specification of letters patent [No. 105,768] granted to John F. Barker, one of the defendants, July 26th, 1870, for an improvement in gas-burners. The drawings of that patent consist of ten figures, which are thus referred to in the specification:



"Figure 1 is a side view of one modification of my invention. Fig. 2 is a side view of the shell. Fig. 3 is a side view of the burner. Fig. 4 is a vertical longitudinal section of the shell through line A B of Fig. 2. Fig. 5 is a vertical longitudinal section of the burner through line C D of Fig. 3. Fig. 6 is a side view of another modification of my invention. Fig. 7 is a side view of the shell. Fig. 8 is a side view of the burner. Fig. 9 is a vertical longitudinal section of the shell through line E F of Fig. 7; and Fig. 10 is a vertical section through line G H of Fig. 8."

The specification goes on to say: "My invention relates to a device for regulating the flow of carburetted air or gas from the burner to its point of combustion; and it consists of a burner having a screw-thread made upon its lower part upon which is fitted, to turn freely thereon, a shell or tube, also having a screw-thread upon its interior lower part; and the bore of said tube or shell is somewhat larger in diameter than the diameter of the upper part of the burner upon which it turns. A series of perforations is made in the lower part of the burner, so that, when the burner is made or set for the combustion of carburetted air or gas of any certain quality, the flame may be increased or diminished by turning the shell either up or down, as the case may be; the shell, in its movements up or down, either closing or opening the holes or perforations, and letting out or stopping the flow of the gas through the said holes, as it is moved up or down. In the use of carburetted air for illuminating purposes it is almost always the case that, when the gasoline is first placed within the generator, it gives off a much greater amount of vapor, and the air, in passing through the generator, absorbs a greater amount of the carbon, and consequently becomes more thoroughly charged with, and is much richer in, the illuminating qualities of the gasoline than when the generator has been charged for a greater length of time; and, as a result, the carburetted air is sometimes too rich to make a desirable light, with the same amount passing out of the burner, and, at other times, as when the generator has been charged a longer time, the carburetted air flowing through the burner is deficient in illuminating power, and the light or flame produced is not uniform in its power or steadiness, and is sometimes liable to produce a smell of smoke, when too rich in carbon. My invention is designed to obviate all difficulty in this respect, as the burner is set, or made to let out at the tip the minimum quantity of gas that will produce a good flame, and, as the gasoline remains longer in the generator and becomes weaker in its illuminating qualities, the outer tube or shell may be turned so as to let out more gas and increase the flame, without liability to smoke.

"That others skilled in the art may be enabled to make and use my invention, I will now proceed to describe its construction and mode of operation.

"In the drawing, L represents the main part of the burner, which is made similar to the common burner, except that the lower part has a screw-thread made upon the outside and inside. Figs. 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5 represent one modification, in which L is the burner, having the usual screw-thread made upon the lower interior part, by which to secure it to the pipe. At a' is a conical shoulder or seat upon the exterior (shown in Figs. 3 and 5), and a screw-thread, d', made upon the exterior of the lower end, and the small holes c are made either at the seat a' or just below it. I is a shell or tube, the inside diameter of its upper part being somewhat greater than the outside diameter of the part L, and upon the interior of the tube at a is a conical-shaped seat, made to fit upon the exterior seat a' upon the burner L. A screw-thread, d, is made upon the interior of the lower part of the tube I, which fits the thread d' upon the exterior of the burner L.

"The operation of this modification is as follows: When the tube I is turned entirely on to the burner L, the inner seat, a, fits down upon the shoulder a' of the burner L, and the only place of egress for the gas is through the slot at the tip. When the gasoline is fresh or new this slot will be quite sufficient to supply the flame; but, as the gasoline becomes more exhausted of carbon, the tube or shell I may be turned up a little, so that the seat a shall be raised slightly from the shoulder a', and more or less of the gas will pass out through the holes c, and pass up between the tube I and the burner L as the tube I is turned up or down, and when the gas, which escapes through the holes c and passes up between the tube and burner, reaches the top, it unites with that passing out of the slot at the tip, increasing the volume and flame. In this device the gas, after passing out through the holes c, is prevented from passing down between the tube and burner by the screw-threads d and d' upon the inside of the tube and outside of the burner.

"In the modification shown in Figs. 6, 7, 8, 9, and 10 both the burner and the regulating-tube are similar to that already described, except that the thread d' upon the outside of the burner L is carried up higher and the holes c are made below the top of the outer thread but above the top of the inside thread. The thread upon the inside of the tube I is not so long as the outside thread upon the burner L, but is considerably less, so that when the tube I is turned entirely down on the burner the holes will be above the thread on the inside of the tube, and there is no inside seat in the tube I to operate upon a beveled or conical exterior shoulder upon the burner L, as in the other modification.

"The operation of this modification is as follows: If the flame be too weak, the tube I is turned down upon the burner L until the top of the inside thread of the tube begins to pass below the holes c, when the gas will escape and pass up between the tube and burner, and increase the flame as before. If it should be desirable to stop the escape of gas through the holes c, it is only necessary to turn up the tube upon the burner, and, when the thread inside the tube covers the holes c, then there will be no escape of gas.

"It will be seen that the principles of the operation of both modifications are very much alike, and are intended to accomplish the same object, although the tube turns up in the first case to let out more gas, while it turns down in the second case, both being equivalent, however, in their operation, and accomplishing the same result.

"I am aware that gas-burners have been heretofore made to give an additional supply of gas to the flame, but in those that I have seen they consisted of more pieces, and were considerably more expensive to manufacture, and in their operation the burner revolved with the tube, thus causing the flame to revolve also. This is very objectionable, as it is often desirable to have the flame stand in one particular direction. In this device the flame does not turn in the least, while the whole burner may consist of only two pieces, and is cheaply made, and its operation and effect are perfect."

The claim of that patent is: "An improved gas-burner, consisting of the burner or pillar L, having holes c c therein, and provided with the movable or adjustable shell or tube I, all constructed and operating substantially as and for the purposes herein described and specified."

After such certificate was signed and filed by Judge Shipman, the Gilbert & Barker Manufacturing Company, defendants in this suit, brought a suit in equity in this court, as owners of the said patent granted to John F. Barker, for the infringement of the same against Clough, the plaintiff in this suit, alleging as the infringement the making and selling of burners constructed exactly like the two forms described in the patent to Barker. The only testimony taken directly in the present suit brought by Clough is that taken on the trial before the jury, and embodied in a case made, on which the motion for a new trial was made. It is stated in the brief in this case, on the part of the defendants, that this case is brought to a hearing on the proofs and the verdict on such jury-trial, and on the proofs taken in the suit against Clough, and that such latter proofs are, by stipulation, used on this hearing. I am not furnished with any such stipulation, but I assume that both parties understand that there is one, verbal or written.

In the record in the suit brought against Clough I find the following entry:

"It is agreed by the counsel that upon the trial of this cause either party may read such parts of the testimony, as he wishes, given in the suit of Theodore Clough against the Gilbert & Barker Manufacturing Company, and contained in the printed case and exceptions in that suit, as evidence herein, subject to the same objections taken on the trial at law in that suit, and that, if the court will consent, the two causes may be tried together, when the case of Clough against the said company, or any motion for final decree therein, is reached and heard. This stipulation is without prejudice to the right of either party to take further testimony in this cause."

The stipulation contained in such entry is not a stipulation for the use, on this hearing, of any proofs taken in the suit brought against Clough, but I shall assume that all such proofs are to be regarded as used and read on this hearing, and, from the brief of the counsel for Clough in the two suits, I infer such to be his view.

The first claim of the Clough patent relates to the first of the two improvements set forth in the specification, and the second claim relates to the second of such improvements. The combination of the perforated burner with the surrounding tube, irrespective of any method of regulating the escape of the gas from the perforations, is the subject of the first improvement and of the first claim. The office of that combination is, as the specification states, to enable the surrounding tube to direct to the tip of the burner the gas which comes through the perforations, such tube being open at the top and closed at the bottom, and united to the burner below the perforations. The combination of the regulating-valve with the perforated burner and the surrounding tube is the subject of the second improvement and of the second claim. Moreover, if the means of regulation are to be regarded as entering as an element into the first claim, there is no difference between the two claims.

The two forms of burner, A and B, alleged to be infringements in this case, are both of them substantially like the first form of burner described in the patent to Barker. In both of them the outside tube turns up to let out more gas. It is very clear that each of these burners contains the combination claimed in the first claim of the Clough patent. It is a more serious question whether either of these two burners contains the combinations claimed in the second claim of the Clough patent. They have no sliding tubular valve or cut-off introduced into the burner-tube at the base, and extending upward within it. In them the tubular valve forms part of the surrounding tube. Such valve goes to or leave its seat by screwing up or down the surrounding tube. The surrounding tube cannot be permanently attached to the burner, but must be capable of movement, as it carries the valve. In the arrangement shown in the Clough patent the surrounding tube may be permanently attached to the burner, because the tubular valve is not carried by the surrounding tube, but is a third and separate instrument carried by an adjustable cylinder inserted within the burner from below. Moreover, in the arrangement shown in the Clough patent the burner and surrounding tube revolve together in adjusting their position in reference to that of the tubular valve, so as to let on or turn off the supply of gas through the perforations in the base of the burner, and by the revolution of the burner the flame also revolves. In the burners A and B the revolution of the surrounding tube regulates the supply of gas through such perforations, and the burner never revolves, nor does the flame.

The combination covered by the first claim of the plaintiff's patent is, I think, found in the Horace R. Barker burners, the existence of which prior to the plaintiff's invention is satisfactorily proved. In those burners the burner was a bat-wing burner perforated at the base. The perforations did not consist of small holes, but the stem of the burner was slitted all the way down to the base, allowing the gas to escape through the whole length of the slit. There was a surrounding tube united to the burner below the lower end of the slit. The burner-stem had a cone near its top, and when the surrounding tube was screwed so as to be in a certain position with reference to such cone, the effect was to direct to the tip of the burner the supply of gas coming through the slit below, the surrounding tube being open at the top and closed at the bottom, and the flame was thickened and a ring of flame was formed. The structure and mode of operation of the combination were the same as those of the combination covered by the first claim of the plaintiff's patent. The fact that the perforations in the Horace R. Barker burner existed not only at the base, but were continued in the form of a slit all the way up, makes no difference. Nor does it make any difference that the Horace R. Barker burner had a cone near its top. The first claim of the plaintiff's patent is broad enough to cover the Horace R. Barker burner, and that claim must be held to be invalid for want of novelty.

In respect to the second claim of the plaintiff's patent, it is shown that in the Horace R. Barker burner, by the screwing down of the surrounding tube-socket it impinged against the cone near the top of the burner; cut off the supply of gas which came through the slit below; and that the raising of the tube, so that it did not bear against the cone, allowed a supply of gas to come from below. Thus there was regulation, and by a valve arrangement. In view of the existence of that burner, which contained the combination of a bat-wing burner, perforated at its base, with a surrounding tube in substance like that of the plaintiff's patent, and a tubular valve for regulating the supply of external gas to the burner, the construction of the second claim of the plaintiff's patent must be such as to limit that claim to the form of tubular valve which he describes, namely, one in the interior of the burner-tube, and not forming part of the surrounding tube. Under this construction, the second claim of the plaintiff's patent is not infringed by the burners A and B, nor by any burner constructed in accordance with any description of a burner in the John F. Barker patent.

I have come to the foregoing conclusions after a careful examination of all the evidence given in this suit, and in the suit brought against Clough, and of the exhibits introduced, and with reluctance, because of the issue of the jury-trial, and of the expressed views of the judge who presided at it. But, being satisfied that the law and the evidence require a decree contrary to the verdict on the jury-trial, I am authorized and bound to pronounce such decree.

The bill is dismissed, with costs.

[NOTE. For another case involving this patent, see Clough v. Gilbert & B. Manuf'g Co., 106 U. S. 166, 1 Sup. Ct. 188.

[The complainant appealed to the supreme court, which reversed the decree dismissing the bill, and remanded the cause with directions to enter a decree for appellant for an account and injunction as prayed in the bill.

[The opinion was delivered by Mr. Justice Blatchford, and, after establishing the validity of the Clough patent, holds that the second claim of the same patent was infringed by defendants. Clough v. Gilbert & B. Manuf'g Co., 106 U. S. 166, 1 Sup. Ct. 188.]

CLOUTMAN (SWEENEY v.). See Case No. 13,685.

Case No. 2,907.

CLOUTMAN v. TUNISON.

[1 Sumn. 373.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. May Term, 1833.

SEAMEN'S WAGES — FORFEITURE FOR DESERTION — CONDONATION — ENTRY IN LOG-BOOK — END OF VOYAGE — UNLIVERY OF SHIP — DUTY OF OFFICERS AND CREW.

1. Desertion during the voyage is by the maritime law a forfeiture of all wages antecedently due. But a desertion, to work this effect, must be, not merely an absence without leave, or in disobedience of orders, but animo non revertendi, an intention to abandon the ship and the service.

[Approved in The Union v. Jansen, Case No. 14,348. Cited in The Rovena, Id. 12,090; The Crusader, Id. 3,456; The Swallow, Id. 13,664; The Philadelphia, Id. 11,084; The Moslem, Id. 9,875; The Osceola, Id. 10,602; Joy v. Allen, Id. 7,552; Burton v. Salter, Id. 2,218; The Merrimac, Id. 9,474; The Almatia, Id. 254; The John Martin, Id. 7,357. Distinguished in Graham v. The Exporter, Id. 5,667.]

2. If after desertion a seaman offer to return to duty in a reasonable time, and offer amends, and repent of the offence, the master is bound to receive him back, as a case fit for condona-tion, unless his previous misconduct would justify a discharge.

[1] [Reported by Charles Sumner, Esq.]

[Cited in Scully v. The Great Republic, Case No. 12,571.]

3. By the act of 1790, c. 56 [1 Story's Laws, 102; 1 Stat. 133, c. 29], a statute desertion and forfeiture of wages are created by forty-eight hours' absence without leave, if a proper entry be made, on the day of the absence, in the log-book.

[Cited in The Rovena, Case No. 12,090; The Quintero, Id. 11,517; Welcome v. The Yosemite, 18 Fed. 384. Criticised in The Union, Case No. 14,347. Approved in Coffin v. Jenkins, Id. 2,948.]

4. The effect of this provision is, that the absence for such a period is deemed conclusive evidence of desertion; whereas in the maritime law it would only afford a presumption of desertion.

[Cited in The John Martin, Case No. 7,357; Welcome v. The Yosemite, 18 Fed. 384.]

5. The due entry in the log-book is indispensable to inflict the statute forfeiture. If not made on the very day of the absence, there can be no forfeiture inflicted.

[Cited in The Quintero, Case No. 11,517; The Lilian M. Vigus, Id. 8,346.]

6. Desertion, to bring after it the forfeiture of wages, either by the maritime law or by the statute, must be during the voyage, and befor it is ended.

[Cited in Francis v. Bassett, Case No. 5,037.]

7. The voyage is ended, when the ship has arrived at her proper port of destination, and is moored in safety in the accustomed place, although her cargo is not unlivered.

[Cited in The Mary, Case No. 9,191; Francis v. Bassett, Id. 5,037.]

8. Officers and seamen are bound to remain by the ship, and unliver the cargo. If they do not, they are liable for damages and a compensation to the owner.

[Cited in The Hudson, 6 Fed. 830.]

9. A forfeiture of two months' pay, deducted for absence of a second mate without leave, during unlivery of the ship, under the circumstances.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of Massachusetts.]

Libel for wages [by Thomas Cloutman] as second mate of the ship America, in personam, against [George R. Tunison] the master of the ship. The district court decreed in favor of the libellant.

Mr. Peabody, for appellant.

David A. Simmons, for libellant.

STORY, Circuit Justice. This is a suit by libel against the appellant in personam, for wages asserted to be due to the libellant, as second mate of the ship America, belonging to the port of Boston. The voyage, as described in the shipping articles, is "from the port of Boston for Cuba; from thence to one or more ports in Europe; and back to her port of discharge in the United States." The voyage was duly performed, and the ship safely arrived on her return at Boston, and there duly discharged her cargo; and there is no question, that the libellant performed his duty on board, until after the arrival of the ship. The defence set up by the answer to the libel is, that the ship arrived at Boston, on Friday, the 4th of January, 1833; that after her arrival, to wit, on Monday, the 7th of January, the libellant, not having been discharged, "left the ship without any license or permission from the respondent, and without any license or permission from any other person to his knowledge; and that he (the respondent) is informed, and believes, that the libellant did not return, or offer to return on board, till Saturday, the 12th of January; and by so deserting the ship and his duty, this respondent suggests, that the libellant has forfeited his claim for wages." The answer farther alleges, that the respondent, with the consent of the owner, on Friday, the 4th of January, left the ship, and went to Salem, on a visit to his family, whence he returned on Monday following; and on going on board, he saw the libellant there; that the respondent immediately went into the cabin, where he had occasion to visit his trunk, which he found broken open; and that certain articles (naming them), of the value of $34, had been taken therefrom; and on his return on deck, the libellant had left the ship without his consent; and he has never since seen him on board of the ship. As to this latter allegation of embezzlement from the trunk of the respondent, during his absence from the ship, I do not perceive, in the actual form in which it is propounded, that it has the slightest bearing upon the merits of the case. It does not set up, that the embezzlement was either by the libellant, or by his connivance; or that it was occasioned by his gross negligence or failure in duty. And certainly without one of these ingredients, it is utterly impossible to maintain it, as an articulation of any matter of defence, or of set-off against the claim of wages. If it had been intended to present it to the court in either aspect, the answer should have been framed with suitable certainty and directness for this purpose; for in admiralty proceedings the cause must be heard upon the proofs, as applied to the allegations, secundum allegata et probata. No proofs are admissible of any facts not propounded in the allegations; and the decree must stand upon both. Whatever is not alleged is coram non judice. I dismiss, therefore, all consideration of this charge, as incapable of having any bearing upon the controversy before the court.

The other part of the defence requires a more full and exact consideration. By the general maritime law, desertion from the ship in the course of the voyage is held to be a forfeiture of the antecedent wages earned by the party; and this rule is equally as applicable to the officers, as it is to the seamen of the ship. It is believed, that this rule constitutes a part of the maritime code of every commercial nation, and is founded upon a universal principle of public policy. But, still, a very important question remains, upon which much loose and unsatisfactory opinion seems to pervade the community. It is, what in the sense of the maritime law constitutes desertion? It is commonly enough supposed, that an absence from the ship without leave of the proper officer, or in disobedience of his orders, constitutes desertion. But this is certainly a mistake. Desertion, in the sense of the maritime law, is a quitting of the ship and her service, not only without leave, and against the duty of the party, but with an intent not again to return to the ship's duty. There must be the act of quitting the ship, animo derelinquendi, or animo non revertendi. If a seaman quits the ship without leave, or in disobedience of orders, but with an intent to return to duty, however blamable his conduct may be,—and it is certainly punishable by the maritime law, not only by personal chastisement, but by damages by way of diminished compensation (see 1 Valin, Comm. lib. 2, p. 534, tit. 7, art. 3; The Mentor [Case No. 9,427]; 3 Kent. Comm. (2d Ed.) pp. 198, 199, lect. 46),—it is not the offence of desertion, to which the maritime law attaches the extraordinary penalty of forfeiture of all antecedent wages. And even in a case of clear desertion, if the party repents of his offence, and seeks to return to duty, and is ready to make suitable apologies, and to repair the injury sustained by his misconduct, he is entitled to be received on board again, if he tenders his services in a reasonable time, and before another person has been engaged in his stead, and his prior conduct has not been so flagrantly wrong, that it would justify his discharge. Upon this subject it is well known, that the maritime law encourages a reasonable indulgence to human infirmity, and especially to the known thoughtlessness and rashness of seamen. It favors repentance and condonation; and will not permit a master to insist upon the utmost stretch of authority, or forfeiture, unless there is a clear propriety in exerting it. My learned friend, Mr. Chancellor Kent, has, in his Commentaries (volume 3, 2d Ed., p. 198, lect. 46), put this doctrine on its right footing, and persuasively shown its justice and sound policy. But there must not only be a desertion, but the desertion must be in the course of the voyage, and before its termination in the home port, to justify an infliction of the forfeiture by the maritime law. It is not sufficient, that there has been a desertion after the voyage has ended; although it be within the period, for which the party is bound to do duty on board the ship. It must be during the voyage. Now, when is the voyage ended, in the sense of the maritime law? I answer, when the ship has arrived at her last port of destination, and is moored in good safety in the proper and accustomed place. I do not say, that the officers or seamen are then discharged from any farther duty, and are not bound to attend to the unlivery of the cargo. On the contrary, I maintain, that the seamen, and a fortiori the officers are bound to remain by the ship, and watch over her concerns, and assist in the unlivery of the cargo, if made in a seasonable time; unless there be some express or implied agreement, or established usage, to dispense with their farther services. There is a clause in the common ship articles, pointed to this very duty. "And whereas" (says the clause) "it is customary for the officers and seamen, on the vessel's return home, in the harbour, and whilst her cargo is delivering, to go on shore each night to sleep, greatly to the prejudice of such vessel and freighters, be it further agreed by the said parties, that neither officer nor seaman shall, on any pretence whatever, be entitled to such indulgence; but shall do their duty by day in discharging the cargo, and keep such watch by night as the master shall think proper to order for the preservation of the same." And this very stipulation is in the present articles, and constitues a part of the contract. But it is one thing to be responsible for a violation of the terms of the contract; and quite another thing to incur the visitation of the maritime penalty of forfeiture of the whole wages of the voyage. In the present case, it is, in my judgment, quite clear that the voyage was ended, so far as the maritime law is concerned, at the time when the asserted act of desertion took place. The vessel was not only safely moored, but had come to the wharf, and had been duly entered, and part of her cargo had been discharged. However reprehensible the act, then, was, it was not a desertion during the voyage; and therefore, so far as the forfeiture turns upon the principles of the maritime law, it was not incurred. Nor is there any thing novel in this doctrine. It is manifestly implied in the reasoning of that truly great judge, "princeps inter pares," Lord Stowell, in the case of The Pearl, 5 C. Rob. Adm. 224, which has been cited at the bar. But it is still more directly announced in the more recent case of The Baltic Merchant, Edw. Adm. 86. In this latter case, which turned upon the very point, whether the voyage was ended by a mere arrival in port, Lord Stowell on that occasion said: "By interpretation of law, the voyage is not completed by the mere act of arrival. The act of mooring is an act to be done by the crew; and their duty extends to the time of the unlivery of the cargo. There is no period at which the cargo is more exposed to hazard, than when it is in the act of being transferred from the ship to the shore; and therefore the law, not only the old law, but particularly the statute, by which the West India trade has been in later times regulated," (and the case before him was of a West India ship,) "has enjoined in the strictest manner, that the mariners shall stay by the vessel, until the cargo is actually delivered. I take this to have been always a part of the duty of the mariners; their contract is legally understood to go this length; and there never can have been a time, when the owner was not entitled to some consideration against the mariners, on account of the non-completion of the contract. This is a consideration not in modum poenae, but it is a civil compensation for injury received, existing in all reason and justice antecedently to any statute upon the subject." His lordship here points out the very distinction between cases of compensation for an imperfect performance of the contract, and cases of forfeiture for desertion, which are strictly in poenam. And he afterwards proceeded to decide, that the voyage in that case could not, upon the true construction of the statutes on the subject of the West India trade, be deemed to be ended, (not, until the cargo was unlivered, but) until the vessel was safely moored in the West India docks; and when so moored, he held the voyage complete and ended, so that the forfeiture for desertion would not afterwards attach. But, the desertion being before such mooring, he pronounced for a forfeiture in the case. It seems to me, that this decision is as fully in point as could be desired; and it affirms, what has always appeared to me to be the true import of the maritime law. See Abb. Shipp. pp. 463–472, pt. 4, c. 3, § 3, and Story's Notes (Ed. 1829); Frontine v. Frost, 3 Bos. & P. 302. I am therefore of opinion, that, upon the mere footing of the maritime law, no forfeiture of wages has been incurred; because, in the first place, I am not satisfied, that there was any quitting the ship animo non revertendi, with an intention to desert the service; and, in the next place, because, at the time of the asserted absence, the voyage was ended.

The next question is, whether there has been any statute forfeiture of the wages for the asserted desertion. The fifth section of the act regulating seamen in the merchants' service—Act 1790, c. 56 [1 Stat. 133, c. 29]—provides, "that if any seaman, &c., shall absent himself from the ship or vessel in which he shall have shipped, without leave of the master or officer commanding on board, and the mate, or other officer having charge of the log-book, shall make an entry therein of the name of such seaman, &c., on the day he shall so absent himself; and if such seaman, &c., shall return to his duty within forty-eight hours, such seaman, &c., shall forfeit three days' pay for every day for which he shall so absent himself, to be deducted out of his wages. But if any seaman, &c. shall absent himself for more than forty-eight hours, at any one time, he shall forfeit all the wages due to him, and all his goods and chattels, which were on board the ship, &c. &c., at the time of his desertion, to the use of the owners of such ship or vessel; and moreover shall be liable to pay to him or them all damages, which he or they may sustain by being obliged to hire other seamen or mariners in his or their place," &c. &c. This section has always been construed to apply to cases of unlawful absence during the voyage, after the vessel has left the home port, at which it commenced; as the second section of the same act has been also held exclusively to apply to such absence at the home port. See Cotel v. Hilliard, 4 Mass. 664. It supposes, therefore, that the voyage is still in transit; and can by no reasonable interpretation extend to any absence after the voyage is ended. Independent of this general ground, which at once, from what has been already stated, disposes of this part of the defence, there is another quite as decisive. The statute manifestly contemplates a distinction between absence without leave and desertion; and it supposes, that the former, if there should be a return to duty within forty-eight hours, would not incur the forfeiture of all antecedent wages by the maritime law; for it would be almost absurd, if such were the legal result, to declare the minor penalty of a forfeiture of three days' pay. It treats absence, therefore, without leave, to be an equivocal act, and not necessarily desertion, animo non revertendi. But, inasmuch as such prolonged absence might endanger the safety of the ship, or the due progress of the voyage, it deems forty-eight hours' absence without leave, to be ipso facto a desertion, and inflicts upon it a total forfeiture of wages. It thus creates a statute desertion, and makes that conclusive evidence of the fact, which would, upon the common principles of the maritime law, be merely presumptive evidence of it. It does not supersede the general doctrine of the maritime law; or repeal it; but merely in a given case applies a particular rule in poenam, leaving the maritime law in all other cases in full efficiency. But, to bring the case within the statute, there must be a strict compliance with all the statute requisites; for, in a case so highly penal, nothing is to be taken by intendment. Now, to work the statute forfeiture, it is made an indispensable condition, that the mate, or other officer having charge of the log-book, should make an entry therein of the name of such seaman, on the day on which he shall so absent himself; and the entry must not merely state his absence, but that he is absent without leave. Abb. Shipp. p. 468, pt. 4, c. 3, § 3, Story's Note (Ed. 1829). The entry on the very day is, therefore, a sine qua non. It is a just and reasonable precaution, to prevent all subsequent fraudulent entries, and all parol evidence of unlawful absences in the progress of the voyage, which may result from after thoughts and contrivances, from personal pique, or from the unavoidable deficiency of positive proof of leave. Whoever is much acquainted with maritime life, has had occasion to know, how many cases of this sort would arise from the common controversies between seamen and officers, if such solemn charges could be set up at any distance of time, without any other proof, than the quickening power of resentment, or the stimulated industry of memory, might supply by parol. Now, the proof is incontestable, and indeed it is admitted, that the entry of absence without leave in the log-book, was not made until the evening of the fourth day after the asserted absence without leave; and it was then made at the special application of the owner himself. Under such circumstances it is manifest, that it is not a compliance with the statute; and therefore the defence on this point cannot be sustained. Indeed, if the statute were out of the question, I should have thought, that the entry in the log-book, being after the case was put in controversy, post litem motam, would have been inadmissible upon general principles to found a penalty.

Whether the omission to record the entry of desertion in the log-book would have been equally fatal to an enforcement of the forfeiture of the maritime law for desertion, it is not necessary to decide. The present inclination of my opinion is, that it would not be. But, be this as it may, the omission would afford a strong presumption, that there was an express or implied leave of absence, unless the other circumstances of the case positively repudiated it. But, although I cannot pronounce for a forfeiture of wages in this case founded upon any desertion, statutable or maritime; yet I am entirely satisfied, that the absence in this case was without leave, either of the master or owners, and indeed was against the known will, if not the orders, of both. It is, therefore, a case of a criminal disobedience and departure from duty; and the more reprehensible, because it was done by an officer of the ship, who ought to know better, and owes a better example both to the seamen and to his employers. I cannot but feel also, that the evidence establishes, that the absence was the less excusable, because it was under some feelings of resentment for censures passed upon his inattention by the owner; and because it is, in an emphatic manner, the duty of the second mate to attend punctiliously to the discharge of the cargo, to prevent plunderage and damage, and to secure promptitude and care on the part of the persons employed in the unlivery. The excuses set up by him are in a legal point of view wholly unsatisfactory, and are matters of personal feeling, with which the court cannot intermeddle. I follow out the doctrine on this subject in the case of The Baltic Merchant, Edw. Adm. 86, and deem the owner entitled, not merely to a compensation for the loss of the services of the second mate during this period, but for something more, as a just admonition to officers having such high and responsible duties devolved upon them, and designedly departing from them. Of moral turpitude or blame I acquit the libellant, but not of studied omission of duty. The district judge came upon this subject to the same conclusion, which I have arrived at. He inflicted the penalty of a forfeiture of one month's pay for the neglect. If this were the case of a common seaman, I should do the same. But in the case of an officer, I think the good of the merchants' service requires a somewhat higher forfeiture. If the effect of this would be to deprive the libellant of his costs in this court, I would not upon so slight a difference of opinion change the decree. But, as under no circumstances I should allow the libellant's costs in this court, thinking, as I do, that the appeal was rightly and properly taken, I shall decree a forfeiture of two months' pay, instead of one month's pay, of the mate to be deducted (namely $36), and affirm the decree as to the residue. Each party is to bear his own costs in this court; and the libellant is to be entitled to his costs in the district court. Decree accordingly.

Case No. 2,908.

The CLOVER.

[1 Lowell, 342.][1]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. July, 1869.

COLLISION — VIOLATION OF STATE STATUTE REGULATING NAVIGATION—DIVISION OF DAMAGES.

1. The statute of Massachusetts of 1847, c. 234, § 2, requiring vessels in Boston harbor to rig in their jib-booms in certain cases, is valid, and binds all persons navigating that harbor.

2. A vessel whose jib-boom is standing contrary to the law must be held liable for a collision which happens in part or in whole by reason of the neglect.

3. Where a tug in such a case knowing the position of the first vessel, collided with her, when by the exercise of ordinary skill and care she might have avoided her, the tug must bear one-half of the damage.

[Cited in The Belknap, Case No. 1,244.]

The tug-boat Clover was engaged to tow the bark Sarnia from Clark's wharf in East Boston to another part of the same harbor. The bark was not fully rigged nor manned, and the whole movement was conducted by the master of the tug-boat, and no question was made that if either the tug or the bark was liable for the consequences of the collision which ensued, it was the former. The Sarnia was lying on the south side of the wharf with her bows up the dock, which was about one hundred and sixty feet wide. Across the end of the next wharf lay the bark Lord Palmerston, discharging into lighters, and with the extreme end of her jib-boom extending about seventy feet into the dock between the two wharves, thus leaving about ninety feet width of dock free for moving the Sarnia. The tug made fast to the port quarter of the Sarnia, and her master ordered the bow line of the Sarnia to be cast off; he then towed her stern a few feet beyond the edge of the wharf and cast off her stern line, and then went on at full speed. Finding that the Sarnia was sagging down with the tide and wind more than he had expected, and fearing that a collision with the Lord Palmerston was inevitable, he let go his tow-line to ease the shock, and the Sarnia drifted into the other bark and carried away a part of her jib-boom. He testified that the collision would not have happened if he had kept on. A statute of Massachusetts enacts that the master, &c., of every vessel shall, as soon as practicable, after having hauled to the end of any wharf that extends to the channel in said harbor, cause her lower yards to be cockbilled and her jib-boom to be rigged in, so that said jib-boom may not annoy any other vessel going in or out of the adjoining docks, &c., under a penalty not exceeding ten dollars. St. 1847, c. 234, § 2.

[1] [Reported by Hon. John Lowell, LL. D., District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

R. H. Dana, Jr., and L. S. Dabney, for libellants.

1. The statute does not apply to us. The claimants have not shown that this wharf extends to the channel, nor that our jib-boom did "annoy" vessels going in or out of the dock.

2. Even if we violated the statute we can recover. The cases of Arundel v. McCulloch, 10 Mass. 70, and Garey v. Ellis, 1 Cush. 306, were decided at common law, and besides turned on the fact that the wharf and bridge were obstacles to navigation. Here there was ample room to pass, and the law of admiralty is that a vessel which is out of her proper place must not be run down, but must be avoided if possible. The Bay State [Case No. 1,149]; The Batavier, 4 Notes Cas. 356; The Duna, 5 Ir. Jur. 384; Philadelphia, &c., R. Co. v. Philadelphia, &c., Towboat Co., 23 How. [64 U. S.] 218; The Marcia Tribou [Case No. 9,062]; Butterfield v. Boyd [Id. 2,250]; The Telegraph, 8 Moore, P. C. 167. And even at common law the modern doctrine is that an individual cannot abate a public nuisance unless such action is necessary for his reasonable use of the public way. Dimes v. Petley, 15 Q. B. 276.

G. O. Shattuck, for claimants.

1. This wharf extends to the channel line of Boston harbor, as shown by the statutes establishing that line. No other evidence is necessary.

2. State statutes which establish harbor regulations are constitutional and binding on all vessels resorting to the harbor. The New York v. Rae, 18 How. [59 U. S.] 225, per Nelson, J.

3. The violation of the statute is a fault for which the libellants are responsible, and it was one which contributed to the collision. Waring v. Clark, 5 How. [46 U. S.] 465, per Wayne, J.; The John Fraser, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 184; Chamberlain v. Ward, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 565; The Scioto [Case No. 12,508]; Amoskeag Manuf'g Co. v. The John Adams [Id. 338].

4. We say the jib-boom was a nuisance, and if, in the exercise of ordinary care and skill, we accidentally and not willfully ran against and injured it, the owner has no remedy. Brown v. Perkins, 12 Gray, 89; Arundel v. McCulloch, 10 Mass. 70; Mayor of Colchester v. Brooke, 7 Q. B. 339.

LOWELL, District Judge. Although the damage is small which is sought to be recovered in this proceeding, the parties have thought the points of law sufficiently important to warrant a careful and learned discussion. They are not altogether new to me, and I have given them renewed attention in the light of the arguments. The cases cited appear to establish the proposition that the states may lawfully make regulations concerning the harbors within their limits, and not repugnant to any act of congress, which will be binding on all persons resorting to them for trade. The libellants having failed to comply with such a regulation are in the wrong, if their delinquency caused or aided in causing the collision. The words "so that the said jib-boom shall not annoy" other vessels, do not qualify the express command to rig in the jib-boom, but only explain its purpose, or at most limit the law to those cases in which the jib-boom might possibly or probably interfere with navigation. The collision in this case, which was solely with the jib-boom, sufficiently shows that annoyance was to be apprehended, and that the fault of the libellants contributed to the result.

But the fault of the libellants does not excuse any want of due care and skill on the part of the tug. The doctrine of nuisance has little application here, because, in this case, the true mode of abating the nuisance, if it were one, would be to move the ship, which the evidence clearly proves could have been done in a few minutes and with great ease, by simply letting her drop down with the tide. The master of the tug testified that on former occasions a request for such a removal had sometimes been refused, but it is not fit that the rights of the libellants should be forfeited by the former misconduct of strangers. The tug, therefore, must share the loss, if the want of care or skill of her master contributed to the disaster. It was daylight, the state of the wind and tide, and the width of the dock were all patent, and no reason is given for the collision but the miscalculation of the master. Though he is a man of undoubted skill and prudence, yet it is plain that he did not, in this particular case, take all necessary and proper measures for safety. The theory of the defence is that the only mistake was in not keeping on at full speed; but this mistake would have been avoided by having a competent lookout on board the Sarnia to report whether she was dangerously near the Lord Palmerston. Instead of this the master trusted to his own more distant observation, and ran into unnecessary danger. Two cases in Judge Sprague's Reports closely resemble this. See O'Neal v. Sears [Case No. 10,530], and The Marcia Tribou [supra]. The ground for holding the libellants to bear a part of the loss is that by their illegal conduct they diminished the width of the dock; and the claimants are liable because, taking the dock as it was, they might by competent skill have taken the vessel out without damage to the Lord Palmerston, though not as easily as if the law had been complied with by the latter vessel. Decree accordingly.

Case No. 2,908a.

CLOWSER v. JOPLIN MIN. CO.

[4 Dill. 469, note.] [1]

Circuit Court, W. D. Missouri. April Term, 1877.

TENANCY IN COMMON OF MINERAL LAND—ACCOUNTING.

[Where a tenant in common of mineral lands exercises his undoubted right to take the common property, and has no other means of obtaining his just share than by taking at the same time the share of his cotenant, the value of the ore in place furnishes the just basis of account.]

[At law. Action of ejectment by Clowser against the Joplin Mining Company.]

DILLON, Circuit Judge (KREKEL, District Judge, concurring), charged the jury as follows in respect to the measure of liability for ores taken out of the land and sold by the defendant:

On this subject, no uniform rule applicable to all circumstances and all cases exists. Here is a case where (if the plaintiff is entitled to recover at all) the parties were in fact tenants in common, and where each party claimed the whole, and each denied any right in the other; where the defendants were rightfully in possession (for one tenant in common has as much right to the possession as another); where the plaintiff was absent, and for years had paid no attention to the land; where the defendants developed, if they did not discover, the lead mines and worked the same and took ore therefrom; the defendant company was organized and went into possession in 1874, the plaintiff appeared and set up a claim to the land in 1875, each party then claiming the whole. Under such circumstances, the court approves the rule laid down by the supreme court of Pennsylvania: Where "a tenant in common exercises his undoubted right to take the common property, and has no other means of obtaining his own just share than by taking at the same time the share of his companion, the value of the ore in place is the only just basis of account." Coleman's Appeal, 62 Pa. St. 278; Barton Coal Co. v. Cox, 39 Md. 1, and cases cited.

Under the statute of Missouri this rule may properly be applied in measuring the right to a recovery in respect to ores taken when one tenant in common recovers in ejectment against another. Wag. St. 560, § 13.

[NOTE. This case is reported in 4 Dill. 469, as a note to Bly v. U. S., Case No. 1,581.]

[1] [Reported by Hon. John F. Dillon, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

Case No. 2,909.

CLUM v. BREWER et al.

[2 Curt. 506.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. Term, 1855.

PATENTS—"ELECTRIC TELEGRAPH"—TEMPORARY INJUNCTION—PRACTICE—ENJOINING EQUITABLE OWNER—COMMISSIONER'S DECISION ON EXTENSION—CONCLUSIVENESS—SALE OF INVENTION—LICENSE BY CO-OWNER.

1. Since the decision of Poor v. Carleton [Case No. 11,272], the practice of this court has been settled, that the denial of the plaintiff's title in an answer does not prevent the court from awarding a special temporary injunction.

2. If a patentee has established his title under original letters-patent, he is entitled to a temporary injunction under an extension of those letters-patent, without a further trial of his right.

3. The act of the commissioner in extending letters-patent is conclusive evidence of all the facts, which he is required to find in order to grant such extension, in the absence of fraud and any excess of jurisdiction.

[Cited in Crompton v. Belknap Mills, Case No. 3,406; Jordan v. Dobson, Id. 7,519.]

4. Where the right to a temporary injunction does not depend upon any controverted and doubtful facts, but upon the interpretation to be put upon a written instrument, it is the duty of the court to interpret it and grant or refuse the injunction accordingly.

[Cited in Earth Closet Co. v. Fenner, Case No. 4,249; Hodge v. Hudson River R. Co., Id. 6,560.]

5. The inchoate right of an inventor to the exclusive privileges under an extension of letters patent is the subject of a sale.

[Cited in Newell v. West, Case No. 10,150; Emmons v. Sladdin, Id. 4,470; Hendrie v. Sayles, 98 U. S. 552.]

6. Semble, a sale of "an invention" does not necessarily carry this inchoate right; but such a sale may be so explained in the instrument, as to have that effect.

[Distinguished in Hodge v. Hudson River R. Co., Case No. 6,559. Cited in Jenkins v. Nicolson Pavement Co., Id. 7,273; Mowry v. Grand St. & N. R. Co., Id. 9,893; Gear v. Grosvenor, Id. 5,291; Waterman v. Wallace, Id. 17,261; Emmons v. Sladdin, Id. 4,470; Hendrie v. Sayles, 98 U. S. 552. Applied in Johnson v. Wilcox & Gibbs S. M. Co., 27 Fed. 690.]

7. One tenant in common of letters-patent has the same rights as another, to make, use, and sell the thing patented; and a license under one tenant in common cannot be enjoined on a bill by another tenant in common.

[Approved in Dunham v. Indianapolis & St. L. R. Co., Case No. 4,151.]

8. A court of equity will not enjoin the equitable owner of a patent, on the application of the legal owner.

[Cited in Whiting v. Graves, Case No. 17,577; Wright v. Randel, 8 Fed. 599.]

[1] [Reported by Hon. B. R. Curtis, Circuit Justice.]

9. Construction of the contracts and conveyances between S. F. B. Morse and F. O. J. Smith, respecting the electric telegraph invented by the former.

This bill was filed by the complainant [William B. Clum], who claimed to be the grantee under Professor Morse, of a certain sectional interest in the state of Massachusetts, under the extended letters-patent, originally granted to Morse, on the twentieth day of June, 1840, and renewed and extended by the commissioner of patents for seven years from the twentieth day of June, 1854 [against Charles H. Brewer and others]. The defendant Smith, by his answer claimed under certain instruments executed by Morse, set out therein; and the other defendants justified under licenses from Smith. As the decision of this motion for a temporary injunction, turned mainly on the construction of these contracts, they are here inserted.

"Deed.

"Whereas I, Samuel F. B. Morse, of the city and state of New York, am the sole and original inventor of a system of electro-magnetic telegraphs for the conveyance of intelligence by words and signs, or by either, and to secure my legal rights and property to said invention, I have filed a caveat and evidence of my said invention in the office of the commissioner of patents, in the city of Washington, to the end of obtaining letters-patent for said invention hereafter according to law. And be it therefore known to all to whom these patents shall come, that I, the said Morse, for a valuable consideration to me paid by Francis O. J. Smith, of Portland, Maine, the receipt whereof I do hereby acknowledge, have bargained, sold, and do hereby bargain, sell, and convey unto the said Smith, his heirs and assigns, one undivided fourth part of my said invention, and of all my rights and property therein secured by my said caveat or otherwise, that I have or may have from any letters-patent for the same, granted by the government of the United States, and within the limits thereof. Also five undivided sixteenth parts of all the right, title, and property which I have or may secure or otherwise derive from and in said invention, without the limits of the United States by letters-patent or otherwise, except in the republic of Texas, hereby making and constituting said Smith part and joint owner with myself, of said invention, and all property consisting therein, both within and without the limits of the United States, in the proportions already specified. And I further agree, that as soon as may be, after letters-patent for said invention shall be obtained from the government of the United States, or any other governments, I will execute and deliver good and sufficient deeds of transfer of said parts, and of all rights and property incident thereto, and to account from the date hereof to the said Smith in the proportions before named, for all the proceeds of sales of rights to use said invention in any place or country, that may accrue to me at any time, including also a right to share in like proportions in all improvements that may be made thereon by me.

"In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and seal, on this —— day of March, A. D. eighteen hundred and thirty-eight. Samuel F. B. Morse, (L. S.)

"Witness, Leonard D. Gale."

"Articles of Agreement.

"These articles of agreement made and concluded on this —— day of March, A. D. eighteen hundred and thirty-eight, by and between Samuel F. B. Morse, of the city and state of New York, of the first part, and Francis O. J. Smith, of Portland, in the state of Maine, of the second part, and Alfred Vail, of Speedwell, in the township and county of Morris, and state of New Jersey, of the third part, and Leonard D. Gale, of the city of New York, of the fourth part, witnesseth as follows, that is to say:—

"That in consideration of said parties being the joint owners, in unequal parts, of a certain invention of an electro-magnetic telegraph, for the conveyance of intelligence by sounds and signs, or by either, to wit: The said Morse as original inventor of said telegraph, and the other several parties named, as assignees of the said Morse, they have agreed each for himself, his heirs, and assigns, except so far as either heirs or assignees are incapable of rendering the personal services by these presents contemplated, and each separately and not for the other, as follows, and each with the other, namely:—

"1st. The said Smith hath agreed, and hereby agrees, to proceed as soon as may be, at and upon his individual expense and advance, to take all legal and necessary measures for procuring and securing by letters-patent, the ownership and control of said invention to the said Morse, and his associate proprietors therein, including the said Smith, from the governments of Great Britain and France, and their respective dependencies, and from such other foreign governments and potentates, excepting the republic of Texas, as shall be practicable for him to do by ordinary vigilance, and, in his opinion, of profit and advantage to said proprietors. And to this end, the said Smith shall, in the month of April next, as early in said month as convenient, sail for Europe, taking with him sufficient and necessary means to defray the expenses of travelling, and of government fees, and of other incidental services and charges, for the accomplishment of the purposes aforesaid—including the personal expenses of said Morse, in the manner hereinafter described.

"2d. That the said Smith shall use his best and utmost endeavors to negotiate and sell the right to use said invention, to any of said governments, or potentates, or to any person or associations of persons, for the benefit and common account of the proprietors thereof. And all proceeds of such sales, first deducting the aforesaid expenditures which the said Smith shall incur in the premises, or by way of advances, shall be divided and apportioned among the proprietors of said invention, in the ratio of their respective interests.

"3d. That in negotiating any sales as aforesaid, the said Smith, while out of the United States, shall be at liberty and authorized to exercise his best judgment and discretion, as to the price, terms, and manner of payment from purchasers, and in all things effect, and do what he shall judge to be for the best interests and advantage of the proprietors, but in no case to incur any expense or debt chargeable to them, without their previous authority, and assent, or otherwise than is in this instrument specifically provided.

"4th. That said Smith shall account to the proprietors severally for their respective shares of the proceeds of all sales that shall be effected by him, by virtue of these presents at any, and at all times on demand, to the extent that the same shall have been realized in money, or other property by him.

"5th. That unless the said Smith shall succeed in effecting sales of said invention, in the manner before described, from the proceeds of which to refund his expenditures in the premises; the other co-proprietors are not to be holden or liable to refund or contribute to the payment thereof, be the same more or less; but the whole shall in that event be borne by and remain the loss of the said Smith, to the extent that such proceeds shall be deficient.

"6th. That the said Smith shall and will at all times hereafter, during the continuance of said invention as a patent right, without other charge or compensation than the interest therein conveyed to him as aforesaid by said Morse, render his individual services as a counsellor and attorney at law, to the said Morse, and the persons associated with him in the ownership of said invention at the date hereof, as well in the managing, conducting, and transferring their individual interest in said invention, as in sustaining the validity, and repelling infringements of their titles thereto, and in the United States after his return from Europe, as elsewhere, while absent from the United States as before provided; but in all cases, wherein by rendering such services, the said Smith shall incur travelling, or other incidental expenses, he shall be repaid the same by the party or persons for whose benefit or at whose demand such services may or shall be rendered as aforesaid—and when such services shall be for the common benefit of the proprietors of said invention, then such incidental expenses shall be paid by them in the ratio of their respective interests.

"7th. The said Morse hath agreed, and hereby agrees, to accompany said Smith to Europe, and such governments without the limits of the United States, besides England and France, as he and the said Smith shall hereafter determine to visit together,—sailing with said Smith for that purpose in April next, as herein before provided, to aid and assist in exhibiting said invention, and sustaining the validity thereof as may be in his power, and devoting himself to the business of said proprietors in such foreign countries as he may visit with said Smith, for a term not exceeding three months after their arrival in Europe. But all of said Morse's personal expenses of travelling, and incidental expenses during said term, and so long as he shall be engaged with said Smith in such foreign countries in the business of said proprietors, and in returning to the United States, shall be advanced, and borne and paid by the said Smith, exclusively, at his individual risk and loss, until the same shall be refunded to and realized by him, deducting the same from the proceeds of sales that shall be made by said Smith, in the manner provided in the preceding articles of this instrument.

"8th. The said Morse is to furnish the said Smith the material and mechanism, of one complete set of telegraphs for use and exhibition in foreign countries, and provide another set for use and exhibition in the United States; and no charge or expense of the same shall be borne or paid by the said Smith; and the said Smith shall, also, be furnished with all necessary models and drawings that may be required abroad or without the limits of the United States, at the common charge and expense of said proprietors in the ratio of their respective interests abroad, to be refunded as before provided.

"9th. The said Vail hath agreed, and hereby agrees, to devote his personal services and skill in constructing and bringing to perfection, as also in improving the mechanical parts of said invention, until the same shall be made the property of the government of the United States, or otherwise be disposed of by said proprietors; and without charge for such personal services to the other proprietors, and for their common benefit; said services to be in accordance with the general direction and supervision of the said Morse.

"10th. The said Gale hath agreed, and hereby agrees, at all times hereafter, while said proprietors shall have an interest in said invention, to devote his professional services and skill, without charge or expense to said proprietors, in effecting improvements in the philosophical and physical qualities or properties of said invention, and in extending and perfecting the same, by such chemical and other scientific experiments as may be suggested as serviceable and proper to be made, by either of said proprietors, with a view to enhance the value of said invention, and of each proprietor's interest therein.

"11th. All expenses and charges incident to the perfection of said Morse's application for letters-patent from the government of the United States, and of obtaining said letters-patent, shall be borne and paid by the said Morse and Vail, exclusively—as are also all expenses incident to and growing out of the improvement and perfecting of the mechanism of said invention, until said letters-patent shall have been obtained.

"12th. And each of said parties agrees with the other, that all improvements, new discoveries, or other additions which he shall make, or in any other manner acquire, in the use, structure, philosophical properties, or other parts of said invention, or for telegraphic purposes of any description, or in any way affecting said invention, he shall communicate as soon as may be practicable to each of the said parties; and the same shall be held, esteemed, and owned as the property of each in the ratio of his property in the original invention; and all letters-patent that shall be obtained therefor of any government, shall be in that ratio, the property of each, and of his heirs and assignees, respectively. And the expenses of obtaining letters-patent for such improvements or additional discovery, shall be borne by said parties severally, in the ratio of their respective rights and interests therein, in all cases of the kind that shall hereafter arise.

"13th. It is also agreed by all parties herein before named, that all expenses that shall be incurred by either of said parties with the approbation of the proprietors of a majority of the property in said invention, and other than the expenses and services particularly specified in this instrument, and other than personal services, shall be borne by and assessed upon said proprietors in the ratio of their respective interests—so far as the same shall be incurred for the common benefit, and in managing and conducting the common interests of such proprietors, but the same shall be recoverable from, and payable only in proceeds of said proprietors' sales of rights to use said invention, and not otherwise; and until such proceeds shall equal such expenses of any proprietor, such expenses shall remain at the risk of him who shall incur them, unless a written assent thereto shall be given previously by each proprietor.

"14th. It is further mutually agreed by said parties, that all relations existing expressly or impliedly, between said Morse and the government of the United States, relative to the use and sale of said invention, to said government, shall be recognized and carried out in good faith by said parties conjunctively, in the full extent that said Morse is bound thereby, and for the common and joint benefit and interest of said proprietors in the ratio of their rights and property in said invention within the United States.

"15th. It is also agreed, that excepting the negotiations which may be conducted without the limits of the United States, by the said Smith as herein before provided, and during his first mission abroad; no negotiation or sale of rights to use said invention, to or by any government or individual, and no contract in any way affecting the manufacture or use of the mechanism of said invention, shall be made or entered into by any of the said proprietors, without the assent and concurrence of all the proprietors herein before named, or of their legal representatives.

"In testimony whereof, the said parties have hereunto interchangeably set their hands and seals, on the day and year aforesaid, at said city of New York. (Signed.) Samuel F. B. Morse, (L. S.) Francis O. J. Smith, (L. S.) Alfred Vail, (L. S.) Leonard D. Gale. (L. S.)

"These presents witnesseth, that Samuel F. B. Morse and Alfred Vail, by their attorney, Amos Kendall, of the first part, and Francis O. J. Smith, of the second, being sole owners of Morse's letters-patent of the electromagnetic telegraph in the United States, have agreed and hereby doth agree to and with each other for the better and more effective management of their joint interests remaining unsold, or not under contract for sale, as follows:—

"That said Smith shall have full and exclusive power to bargain, sell, and convey any and all routes for the construction and use of said Morse's above-named patents, and of all his improvements thereto, not hitherto sold or placed under contract, within the following territory, namely, in all of the territory of the United States bounded on the south by the route extending from Pittsburg to St. Louis, via Wheeling, Columbus, Cincinnati, and Louisville, thence to St. Louis by any route said Smith shall elect, and on the west and north by the western and northern boundaries of Illinois, Wisconsin, Michigan, and Ohio, and on the east by the eastern boundary of Ohio, to the intersection of the telegraph route from Wheeling to Columbus, opposite Wheeling; also all within the boundaries of New York and the New England states. And that said Kendall, in like manner, shall have full and exclusive power for and in behalf of the first party, to bargain, sell, and convey any and all other routes for the construction and use of said Morse's patent, not hitherto sold, or placed under contract within all the remaining territory of the several states of the Union now existing.

"And the sales of each party within his said territory, made pursuant to the provision of these presents, shall be ratified and concurred in, by the other party, from time to time, as may be required, and by due and legal process of conveyance.

"The manner of disposing of such lines and realizing cash therefor, shall be such as the respective parties shall in their discretion think best for the common interest; and each shall account to the other for money realized by him, whether from absolute sales or participation in the profits of construction, or in any other mode out of the common property: provided, that neither shall be bound to account to the other for more than fifty dollars per mile, on any route, as the aggregate belonging to the owners of the patents.

"The terms of payment for sales made, shall be twenty-five per cent. of the amount that shall be raised and paid as the first instalment, for construction purposes on the route sold, and a like proportion of every succeeding instalment until the aggregate shall have been paid. And no contract or sale shall be made to extend the omission of the first payment longer than nine months from the date of the contract, or to delay any succeeding instalment beyond the period of sixty days from the prior one. And no conveyance of the letters-patent for any route, shall be made, until the entire price of purchase has been paid.

"Neither of said parties shall charge for his personal services, or expenses of himself, or of any agent he may employ, nor incur any liability in behalf of the other party, in effecting such sales beyond the requisite terms of a conveyance.

"A report shall be made by each party to the other at the end of every September, December, March, and June, of all sales made by him during the quarter so ending. And of all payments received on sales, and such other particulars as either party may require. And payments shall then be made by each to the other, of all collections on the joint interests of said parties up to such periods, as follows:—

"Said Smith shall pay said first party three fourths of all such collections on sales as he shall have made, and of sums of money any way realized as aforesaid, deducting therefrom ten per cent. for commissions. And said Kendall shall pay said second party one fourth of all such collections on sales as he shall have made, and of all sums so as aforesaid realized, deducting therefrom ten per cent. for commissions.

"And it is agreed that the arrangement therein stipulated for the management of said interests within the territorial divisions herein described, shall continue in full force between said parties and their legal representatives, for the period of six years from the date hereof, unless sooner revoked by mutual consent.

"In testimony whereof, said parties have hereunto set their hands and affixed their respective seals, at the city of New York, in duplicate parts, on this twenty-second day of June, one thousand eight hundred and forty-seven. Samuel F. B. Morse, Alfred Vail, (L. S.) by their attorney. Amos Kendall, (L. S.) Francis O. J. Smith, (L. S.)

"In the presence of J. J. Speed, Jr., E. Cornell."

Mr. Parke, for complainant.

Mr. Choate and F. O. J. Smith, contra.

CURTIS, Circuit Justice. Upon the preliminary questions raised in this case, I feel no difficulty. The principal of these is, that, since the letters-patent were extended, there has been no trial of the right, and no such length of possession as lays the foundation for a presumption of its validity. It appears that during the original term of fourteen years, it was decided by the supreme court after full examination of the law and facts, that Morse was the original and first inventor of all that was claimed in his reissued letters-patent, save the subject-matter of the eighth claim, which is of no importance here, and that those letters-patent were valid. The act of congress of July 4, 1836, § 18 (5 Stat. 124), after providing for the extension of letters-patent and the making and recording of the necessary certificates thereof, declares: "And thereupon the said patent shall have the same effect in law, as though it had been originally granted for the term of twenty-one years." It is manifest therefore that the exclusive right now claimed is the identical, exclusive right adjudicated on, and held valid by the supreme court, and that the court is commanded in express terms, to consider it as if it had been originally granted for a period not yet expired, provided it was duly extended, according to the requirements of the act of congress. There is a suggestion of fraud in one of the answers filed in the case. But no evidence, in support of the suggestion has been produced, nor has it been relied on in argument. I cannot presume that any fraud existed. Of all matters necessary to a valid extension, there is not only a strong presumption, arising from the act of extension, but, in respect to the entire merits of the patentee, and the existence of the legal grounds for an extension, the law makes the commissioner the judge, and in the absence of fraud his adjudication is conclusive. I entertain no doubt therefore, that there is such a prima facie title to the exclusive right made out, as calls on the court to protect it by injunction, provided the defendants have not shown, that they have acquired some title to the use they make of Morse's invention.

It was urged by the defendants' counsel, that as this is an application for a preliminary injunction, it ought not to be granted, because the defendants have answered and denied the complainant's title, and asserted title in themselves. But the practice of this circuit has been settled since the case of Poor v. Carleton [Case No. 11,272]. A mere denial by an answer, of the equity of the bill, does not prevent the court from looking into the law and the facts of the case, when a special injunction is moved for, and granting or refusing it according to its discretion. And where the title to an injunction does not depend upon any controverted or doubtful facts, but upon the interpretation to be put by the court upon a written instrument, I consider it my duty to interpret it on such a motion and grant or refuse the injunction according to the result of that interpretation. There may be cases in which there is so much doubt what the parties to an instrument intended to effect by it, that the court may think it proper to suspend its judgment until the surrounding circumstances can be more fully and safely examined on a final hearing. It is possible also, that where there are grave doubts concerning the legal effect of an instrument, the court might decline to interfere by special injunction, even though, if compelled to decide, their decision must be in favor of the complainant. Probably the circumstances of the case, and the degree of mischief which would be suffered by refusing the injunction, compared with the inconvenience and loss occasioned by granting it, would control the action of the court in the case supposed. But in general, I apprehend that if the title to a temporary injunction depends on the construction of a deed, the court will construe it and act accordingly, whatever view of that question the answer may have presented. I have therefore looked into the documents on which the title of the respondents depends, and will now state my opinion thereon.

The defendants claim under Francis O. J. Smith. His title was originally granted to him by Morse, by a deed dated on the —— day of March, 1838. The subject-matter of this grant is thus described in the deed. (Here the judge read the clause beginning, "fourth part of my said invention," &c., to the end of paragraph.) At the date of the deed no letters-patent had been obtained. The deed could not convey, and does not purport to convey an interest in any particular letters-patent, or in any exclusive right secured by any particular letters-patent. It purports to convey "one undivided fourth part of the invention." As is said by the supreme court in Gayler v. Wilder, 10 How. [51 U. S.] 493, "the discoverer of a new and useful improvement is vested by law with an inchoate right to its exclusive use, which he may perfect and make absolute by proceeding in the manner which the law requires." It was one quarter part of this inchoate right, which the deed undertook to convey. But the inventor has not only an inchoate right to obtain letters-patent securing to him the exclusive right to his invention for the term of fourteen years, but also a further inchoate right to have the term extended, provided he shall fail, without fault, to obtain a reasonable remuneration for the time, ingenuity, and expense bestowed upon the same, and the introduction thereof into public use. Though it has not been expressly determined that this last right is the subject of a contract of sale, I conceive there can be no reasonable doubt that it is so. The reasoning of the court in Wilson v. Rousseau, 4 How. [45 U. S.] 646, assumes and indeed asserts that it is so. And there is nothing in the nature or incidents of such a right, to distinguish it as a subject of sale, from the inchoate right to obtain the original patent. Each appertains to the inventor by reason of his invention. Each is incomplete, and its completion depends upon the compliance by the inventor with conditions, and the performance by public officers of certain acts, prescribed by law. It is true, the title of an inventor to an extension is still further qualified by a further condition, of his failure to obtain remuneration from the enjoyment of the exclusive right, for the first term of fourteen years. But though this is an additional condition, which may render parties less willing to contract, its existence does not change the nature of the right, and it no more prevents it from being the subject of a contract of sale, than any other condition which is attached to it.

Considering, then, that the title of an inventor to obtain an extension may be the subject of a contract of sale, the inquiry in this case is, whether part of it was intended to be sold. I am inclined to the opinion that a sale of "the invention," before letters-patent are obtained, does not necessarily carry with it the exclusive right for the extended term. Because this right is not a mere incident of the invention. Its existence is made to depend, not only on matter which is subsequent to the invention, but exclusively personal to the inventor himself; and only he or his personal representatives can obtain it. This may distinguish the case from Carnan v. Bowles, 2 Brown, Ch. 80. See, also, Pierpont v. Fowle [Case No. 11,152]. But at the same time, it must be admitted, that where an inventor has in terms, sold to another person, a part of his invention, he has done that which is quite consistent with an intent to have that other person participate in all the rights which he, as inventor, can acquire by law; and that where the invention is the subject sold, it would be natural to expect to find in the instrument of sale, something showing an intention, that the purchaser should be interested not merely in the original letters-patent, but in any extension thereof securing the exclusive right to the same invention which was the subject of the sale. Taking the whole of this deed together, I think it quite clear such was the intention of its parties. It superadds to the words "my invention," the words, "rights and property that I may have from any letters-patent for the same." These terms are broad enough to include the extended letters-patent now in question. Passing over some intermediate clauses which are not decisive, though they tend to show that a community of the entire interest was contemplated, we come to the covenant of the grantor, "to account, from the date hereof, to the said Smith, in the proportions before named, for all the proceeds of sales of rights to use said invention in any place or country, that may accrue to me at any time." It can hardly be doubted that the accountability raised by this covenant was intended to be no more than co-extensive with the grant. It was manifestly inserted by reason of, and more perfectly to secure the benefit of the title conveyed; and so far as there is room for doubt upon the language of the granting part of the deed, this covenant may be resorted to, for the removal of that doubt. Looking at the deed from this point of view, I find the intention of the parties was, to have the grantee interested in the rights springing from this invention, not merely during the limited period of fourteen years from the date of letters-patent, but "at any time." This view of the rights of the parties is confirmed by the indenture, which bears the same date, and which had for its object, to settle the relative duties and powers of those who had become what it terms, "joint owners of the invention."

Without examining the different clauses of this deed in detail, it may be said that throughout its provisions, no expectation is shown, that they will cease to be in force or applicable at the expiration of any particular letters-patent; or that any thing less than what is denominated in the sixth article, "the continuance of said invention as a patent right," was considered to be the subject-matter upon which they were contracting. That it was the invention, and all rights to use it, which might at any time be acquired, which the parties had in view, seems to me clear, upon the whole instrument. Nor do I understand that Professor Morse has, at any time, or does now, take a different view of this matter. His letter of the 15th July, 1854, written soon after the extension, though it denies Mr. Smith's legal title, and is worded with a caution, quite consistent with the utmost fairness of intention on his part, certainly does not controvert the equitable title of Mr. Smith to participate in the proceeds of sales of rights under the extended patent. But I am of opinion that this cannot be conceded, without admitting at the same time that Mr. Smith became the owner of one undivided fourth part of the inchoate exclusive right, during the extended term. There was but one sale made by the deed of March, 1838. And if one undivided fourth part of the inchoate right to be secured under any and all letters-patent, was the subject of that sale, as I think it was, Mr. Smith owns the same interest under the patent after it was extended as he owned before it was extended. I do not think what he thus acquired, was merely a right to an account of the poceeds of sales. It is not necessary in this case to determine, whether the interest of Mr. Smith became a legal title to one undivided fourth part of the original letters-patent as soon as they were issued; nor whether he was one of the assignees or grantees provided for in the 18th section of the patent act of 1836. Gayler v. Wilder, 10 How. [51 U. S.] 493. That he was an equitable owner, and entitled to call for a conveyance of the legal title to whatever was intended to be secured to him, seems very clear. For the inventor not only bargains, sells, and conveys one undivided fourth part of all rights which he may acquire from any letters-patent, but he expressly covenants, to execute deeds of conveyance of such undivided part, as soon as may be after letters-patent shall have issued. If this, by operation of law, did not give Mr. Smith a legal title, a jus in re, it clearly conferred on him a jus ad rem, an equitable right to the thing itself, and was not a mere executory contract to account for proceeds. Under the original letters-patent, the indentures of March, 1838, and June 22, 1847, show that all parties considered and treated him as a joint owner of these letters-patent, and entitled to make sales of rights secured thereby. Whatever rights he acquired by force of the deed of March, 1838, under the original, I am of opinion he had by force of the same deed, under the extended letters.

As has already been said, it is not material in this case whether his title was legal or equitable, for a court of equity, upon a bill by the legal owner of a patent right, cannot enjoin the equitable owner from using the thing patented. It considers the equitable title the true title. This case, therefore, must stand as if Smith had that legal title which Morse is under covenant to convey to him. And in that case it could not be doubted that the suit must fail. One tenant in common has as good right to use, and to license third persons to use the thing patented, as the other tenant in common has. Neither can come into a court of equity and assert a superior equity, unless it has been created by some contract modifying the rights which belong to them, as tenants in common. No such modification appears here, and the motion for an injunction must be denied.

[NOTE. On the final hearing the bill was dismissed. Case No. 2,910.

[For other cases involving this patent, see note to Smith v. Ely, Case No. 13,043.]

Case No. 2,910.

CLUM et al. v. BREWER et al.

[Brunner, Col. Cas. 635;[1] 21 Law Rep. 390.]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. 1856.

COVENANT—INJUNCTION FOR BREACH OF.

A mutual and reciprocal covenant having been broken by one party, he cannot obtain the aid of a court of equity to restrain the other covenantor from its violation. Otherwise, where the covenants are independently or only collaterally connected, though contained in the same instrument; or where the breach is of such a nature that it may be fully repaired, and such reparation made a condition precedent to granting the relief sought.

[1] [Reported by Albert Brunner, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

[In equity. Bill by William B. Clum and others against Charles H. Brewer and others.]

George T. Curtis, for complainants.
Choate, contra.

CURTIS, Circuit Justice. When this case was before the court upon a motion for a preliminary injunction, a construction was put upon the deeds between the parties. See 2 Curt. 506 [Case No. 2,909]. Subsequently leave was given to amend the bill. Under this certain amendments were filed; but these amendments were not drawn into the original bill, nor are any places where they were designed to be inserted in any way indicated. They are filed in court by the complainant Morse alone, and not by him and Clum, in whose name alone the bill was originally filed; and they state a case which, if well founded, shows that Clum had no title. Under these circumstances I feel great difficulty in proceeding upon the amended bill. The case falls within the rule laid down in Shields v. Barrow, 17 How. [58 U. S.] 130; for the amendments not only state a totally new case, but one which is inconsistent with that set up in the original bill. But as no objection was taken to these amendments until the hearing, and they have been answered, and the case set down for hearing, without objection, on the bill and answers, I shall not refuse to adjudicate, though in point of practice the proceeding is open to very serious objection.

The questions of construction have been again argued. They are not free from difficulty; but I see no sufficient cause to change the opinion heretofore formed and expressed.

Another question has been raised upon the fifteenth article of the agreement, which is as follows:—"15th. It is also agreed, that excepting the negotiations which may be conducted without the limits of the United States, by the said Smith as hereinbefore provided, and during his first mission abroad, no negotiation or sale of rights to use said invention, to or by any government or individual, and no contract in any way affecting the manufacture or use of the mechanism of said invention, shall be made or entered into by any of the said proprietors, without the assent and concurrence of all the proprietors hereinbefore named, or of their legal representatives." It is insisted that though the complainant has himself broken this covenant by the license granted to his co-complainant Clum, he did so under a misapprehension of his rights, arising out of a construction of the deeds which differed from that placed upon them by the court, and that he can now have relief in the nature of a specific performance of that article, by a decree restraining Smith from its violation, and Brewer from acting under the title which Smith made to him, contrary to the covenant in that article contained.

It is a maxim that he who seeks equity must do equity. This mutual and reciprocal covenant having been broken by Professor Morse, he cannot obtain the aid of a court of equity to restrain the other covenantor from its violation. It is true that the court, on a bill for specific performance, does not inquire into breaches of other contracts between the same parties, even though they may be contained in the same instrument, provided they are only collaterally connected together. The law on this subject is very fully expressed by Sir James Wigram in Hanson v. Keating, 4 Hare, 1; and was applied in Gibson v. Goldsmid, 27 Eng. Law & Eq. 588. But here the covenants are mutual and reciprocal, and not independent. It is true, also, as may be seen in Sir James Wigram's opinion, that a court of equity will sometimes grant relief to a plaintiff who has not kept his part of the contract in question, when the breach is of such a nature that it may be fully repaired, and one of the conditions precedent for obtaining the relief may be such full reparation, as payment of the purchase money before receiving a conveyance. But upon this bill the court cannot enjoin Professor Morse from further breaches of this covenant, nor Clum from acting under the title which Morse has made to him in violation of the covenant. Yet Smith's title to such an injunction is precisely the same as Morse's under this covenant. If upon this bill I were to enjoin the defendants upon the footing of what is contained in the covenant, I should not only fail to see justice done to Smith, but I should, practically, be protecting Clum in the enjoyment of a title gained by a breach of the mutual covenant under which I should act. This I cannot do. The bill must be dismissed with costs.

Case No. 2,911.

CLUTE et al. v. GOODELL.

[2 McLean, 193.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Michigan. Oct. Term, 1840.

SHERIFF—RESPONSIBILITY FOR ACTS OF DEPUTY.

A sheriff is responsible for the acts of his deputy.

[Cited in The Laurens, Case No. 8,122.]

[At law. Action by Clute and Mead against Goodell.]

Frazer & Walker, for plaintiffs.
Witherell & Buell, for defendant.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This action is brought against the defendant, who acts as sheriff, for the misconduct of one of his deputies. It was proved that an execution was issued, on a judgment, for $3,898.09, and costs, the 25th November, 1837, which was, on the same day, placed in the hands of the deputy to levy and collect the amount immediately. A levy was made on a store of goods, amounting to thirteen or fourteen thousand dollars, which belonged to the defendant, named in the execution. But an arrangement was made with him by the deputy, under which the goods were sold, and only a small part of the proceeds of the sale was applied in satisfaction of the execution.

[1] [Reported by Hon. John McLean, Circuit Justice.]

THE COURT instructed the jury, that the sheriff was responsible to the plaintiffs for the acts of his deputy, and that, if the levy was made on a sufficient amount of goods to satisfy the execution, which the deputy failed to dispose of, as by law he was bound to do, they would find against the defendant, the amount due on the judgment, including interest. The jury rendered a verdict for the plaintiffs for $3,418.48. Judgment.

CLYBURN (STRACHEN v.). See Case No. 13,520.

CLYDE, The REBECCA. See Cases Nos. 11,621 and 11,622.

Case No. 2,912.

CLYMER v. CENTRAL R. CO.

[5 Blatchf. 317.][1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. May 26, 1866.

NEGLIGENT OPERATION OF RAILROAD TRAIN UPON TRACK OF ANOTHER COMPANY.

Where a railroad train, while moving on a track belonging to one railroad company, is in the exclusive charge of the servants of another railroad company, the former company is not responsible for the negligence of the servants of the latter company in conducting such movement of the train.

At law. This was an action to recover damages for an injury received by the plaintiff [William S. Clymer] in December, 1864, through the alleged negligence of the servants of the defendants [the Central Railroad Company of New Jersey], while in a car attached to a through stock train upon the track of the defendants' railroad. The train was made up at Harrisburg, Pennsylvania, and was on its way to the city of New York. The route was over several distinct railroads, the last one of the line being the road of the defendants. That road commenced at the eastern end of the bridge which spans the Delaware river, between Easton, Pennsylvania, and Phillipsburg, New Jersey. That bridge belonged exclusively to the Lehigh Valley Railroad Company. The train upon which the plaintiff was a passenger, with his stock, passed over the Lehigh Valley road, in charge of the agents and servants of that road, and crossed the bridge at Easton, and passed on to the track of the defendants' road. It followed on that track for about 200 rods, when a switch was turned by a switchman in the employ of the defendants, forming a communication to a side track upon which the train was to be backed, where it was to be left by the agents of the Lehigh Valley road, and from which it was subsequently taken by the defendants. There were one or two coal cars standing on the rear end of this side track, and of this fact the switchman gave notice to those in charge of the backing train. The presence of cars on this side track was a common occurrence. The conductor from the Lehigh Valley road backed his train, as usual, upon the side track, preparatory to unhitching his engine, and returning to Easton with all those servants of the Lehigh Valley road who had been engaged on the train. But, in backing down the train on the side track, he moved it too far, or too fast, or both, and came in contact with the coal cars referred to. The shock of the collision was not severe, but the effect on the plaintiff, who was lying down, with his head bent forward toward his breast, was such that it inflicted a serious injury on him, probably injuring his spinal marrow, to such an extent that he suffered severely in his general health, and had not yet recovered.

SHIPMAN, District Judge (charging jury). The circumstances proved are such as would warrant the jury in finding a verdict for the plaintiff, were the proper defendants before the court. But, in the view I take of the case, no recovery can be had, on these facts, against these defendants. The train in question was still in the exclusive charge of the agents and servants of the Lehigh Valley Railroad. They had brought the train over that road, and were on the road of the defendants with it, for the purpose of delivering it over to the servants of the defendants. The servants of the Lehigh Valley road still had charge of it, and controlled all its movements, and they, or that road, alone must be held responsible for injuries resulting from any negligence in conducting its movements. The bare fact that they were moving the train over a portion of the track belonging to the defendants cannot make the latter responsible for the negligence of the servants of the other road. It is for this negligence alone that the suit is brought, and not for any obstructions on, or defect in, the track of the defendants' road. Your verdict must, therefore, be for the defendants.

[1] [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

Case No. 2,913.

The CLYTIE.

[10 Ben. 588; 25 Int. Rev. Rec. 335; 14 Am. Law Rev. 85.] [1]

District Court, E. D. New York. Oct., 1879.

COLLISION IN NARROW CHANNEL — OVERTAKING VESSEL — RULES OF NAVIGATION — CHOICE BETWEEN DOUBTFUL MEASURES — TESTIMONY OF EXPERTS.

1. Where the C. and the V., two yachts of a squadron, beating out of New Bedford harbor, wind S. S. E., weather clear and all vessels in plain sight, being at one time on parallel courses about a hundred and forty feet apart and approaching a long tow crossing their then courses, went about so near together that the jib-boom of the one astern as she forged ahead caught the outer leach of the main-sail of the other then crossing her bows and just filling away on the other tack, and some slight damage was done, for which suit is brought: Held, that the C. was the overtaking vessel under rule 22 (Rev. St. art. 17, § 4233), but nevertheless it was the duty of the V., under the circumstances, to terminate her port tack in time to enable the C. to tack between the tow and herself, whether or not she was hailed so to do.

2. That the C. was justified in holding her reach, relying upon the V.'s shortening her tack if necessary, provided that she herself went as near the tow before tacking as was prudent for her to go.

3. That upon the evidence the C. might have gone much nearer the tow in safety, and as only six feet nearer was required to have enabled the yachts to pass each other clear, she must be held responsible for the collision and damage, and the V., having left her room enough, must be held not in fault.

4. That when of two doubtful measures to be decided on to avoid a collision, the one taken carries the vessel so nearly clear as six feet, it cannot be imputed to her as a fault that she did not take the other course. What a yacht is willing to do for the sake of winning a wager, she is, in a case of necessity, bound to do to avoid a collision.

5. Semble, that even where a case is governed by statutory sailing rules, the question being whether the circumstances are special and render a departure from the rule necessary, the testimony of practical seamen as experts may be taken.

Nath. Niles, for libelant.

H. S. Ledyard, for claimant.

BENEDICT, District Judge. This is an action involving an insignificant sum of money, which has been brought, as I must suppose, for the purpose of obtaining a judicial determination of certain nautical questions, both of law and of fact, that have come to be matters of dispute between the parties thereto. The earnestness displayed by the respective advocates, and the amount of time they have felt justified in consuming in the presentation of the case, indicate that, by the parties at least, these questions are deemed of importance.

The incident that gave rise to the controversy was the tearing of the mainsal of the yacht Volante by the yacht Clytie, while the two, together with the rest of the New York yacht squadron, consisting of some twenty vessels, were beating out of the harbor of New Bedford, on the 15th day of August, 1877. The parties to the controversy are, on the one side, Francis B. Hitchcock and Thomas Hitchcock, who, as owners of the yacht Volante, have filed their libel against the yacht Clytie, to recover the damages by them sustained by reason of the tearing of their sail; on the other side, William L. Brooks, who, as claimant of the yacht Clytie, appears in her defence. The facts attending the collision have been narrated to the court by some thirteen witnesses who saw the occurrence, and in addition expert testimony from several witnesses has been presented.

The vessels involved are described as follows: The Volante is a sloop, English cutter rigged, forty-five feet long with twenty feet of bowsprit out-board, making sixty-five feet in all. The Clytie is a schooner, eighty-five feet long, one hundred and thirty-five feet from the end of the main-boom to the end of the flying jib.

The account of the accident given by the parties in their pleadings, first deserves attention. According to the statement in the libel, the Volante was standing out of New Bedford harbor, close hauled upon the starboard tack, and near the middle of the channel, standing to the eastward at the speed of about three knots an hour, the wind being from the southward and eastward. While the Volante was in the situation aforesaid, the Clytie, on her way out of said harbor, was standing to the southward or southward and westward, and had been, for not less than half an hour, visible from the Volante's deck. The Clytie was to leeward of the Volante and bearing to the northward and westward, and was close hauled on the port tack, sailing as fast or faster than the Volante, and was heading so that she would strike the Volante on the Volante's quarter, or else would pass astern of the Volante. Thereupon, when so to leeward of the Volante and close aboard, the Clytie went in stays, and while in stays ran into the Volante on her port side near the quarter, while the Volante was in the position above described; and the libel charges that the Clytie should either have kept off so that she would go well astern of the Volante, or else have gone in stays sooner so as to allow for headreaching while in stays.

It will be observed that the case stated in the libel is that of two vessels under sail, close hauled, having the wind on different sides, and crossing so as to involve risk of collision. That is to say, the libel states a case where it was the duty of the Clytie, having the wind on her port side, to keep out of the way of the Volante. A violation of sailing rule 17 (article 12), is therefore the fault charged upon the Clytie in the libel.

[1] [Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and Benj. Lincoln Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission. 14 Am. Law Rev. 85, contains only a partial report.]

The Clytie in her answer denies the correctness of the account given in the libel, and gives an account of the accident in substance as follows: The Volante and Clytie were beating out of the harbor of New Bedford, the wind being about southeast and a fair working breeze. The channel at the place of collision was only about an eighth of a mile wide, and this distance, so far as the working room of the two yachts was concerned, was diminished by half, owing to a tug which was standing out of the harbor in the middle of said channel having two large yachts in tow, one astern of the other with a long hawser between them, and heading about south. The Volante was on the port tack, close hauled, and heading so that she would strike the tow unless her course was changed. The Clytie was on the same tack, close hauled, and a little to leeward and astern of the Volante, and heading so that she also would have to change her course before reaching the middle of the channel in order to avoid striking the said tow. Several other yachts were to leeward of the Clytie on the same tack, one of them being so close under her lee that the Clytie could not keep off without coming in contact with her. The Clytie was going faster than the Volante and was so close aboard of her that she could not luff up or go about without running into the Volante. The Volante kept her course unchanged until very near to the said tow, when she went about and filled away on the starboard tack. At the moment the Volante so went about the Clytie was still to leeward of her and had nearly caught up with her, and it was absolutely necessary for the Clytie then to go about to avoid running into the tow which was close aboard of her, and accordingly she went in stays; but being a much larger vessel than the Volante, it took her much longer to get around, so that while she was still in stays the Volante had got around on the starboard tack and was heading directly across her bow. Those on board the Clytie, seeing that there was no room for her to get around on the starboard tack without certainly running into the Volante, kept her in stays, so that the Volante, by luffing up a little, might allow the Clytie to pass astern of her; but the Volante, instead of luffing up, kept her course with sails full, and came straight across the Clytie's bow, so close that just as she was going past, the head boom of the Clytie caught in the Volante's mainsail, forward of the leach rope, and brought her up all standing. The answer expressly admits that at the time of the collision the Clytie was going fast enough to steer well and charges the accident to have been caused by the fault of the Volante in not going about on the starboard tack sooner than she did, and in not luffing up after she had got about on the starboard tack, so as to allow the Clytie to pass astern of her.

The case stated in the answer is obviously one to which sailing rule 17 (article 12) has no application, but is that of one vessel, close hauled, overtaking another vessel close hauled upon the same tack and to windward, under circumstances rendering it impossible for the overtaking vessel to avoid colliding with the leading vessel while tacking, because of a failure on the part of the leading vessel to give the following vessel room to make her tack. According to the answer, therefore, the case is one to which sailing rule 24 (article 13) applies, where, by reason of special circumstances, the general rule applicable to overtaking vessels is not to be applied, and the leading vessel is to be charged with fault for failing to make proper effort to prevent a collision otherwise unavoidable. The special circumstances are the narrow distance in which the yachts were compelled to work; the presence of the tow directly in the course of both yachts; the relative speed of the yachts and their position with reference to each other. It is thus seen that the pleadings of the respective parties state cases wholly dissimilar.

If this case were one in which to enforce the rule of the admiralty whereby the decree is required to be according to the averment in the pleadings as well as according to the proofs, and the enquiry was therefore limited to whether the collision occurred as stated in the libel, a short disposition could be made of it; for, although Mr. Hitchcock's statement upon the stand, in harmony with his account in the libel, is that the Clytie was upon the port tack at the time of the collision, the evidence of the other persons present does not permit it to be contended that the Clytie was upon the port tack at any time after the Volante had gathered way upon the starboard tack. But I have not been asked to dismiss this libel upon a question of pleading, and as the answer sets forth an affirmative case, in regard to which evidence has been given and argument made on both sides, I can properly consider the points thus submitted for decision. The Clement [Case No. 2,879]. It will aid to an understanding of these points to state here such facts as I find to be either admitted or proved beyond dispute. The collision occurred in broad daylight. The wind at the time was blowing a fresh breeze from the south-southeast. The weather was clear and the vessels were in plain sight of each other for a considerable period before they came in collision. As stated in the libel, the collision occurred near the middle of the channel, which was at that place obstructed by the tow described in the answer, then passing to the southward, somewhat to westward of the middle of the channel, and, so far as these two yachts were concerned, having the effect to narrow the channel by nearly one-half. The tide was flood. The Volante and the Clytie got under weigh with the rest of the squadron at the signal given. Their first tack was to the eastern shore, heading about for red buoy No. 16, on the eastern side of the channel, opposite Palmer's island. On this tack the Volante came abeam of the Clytie while the latter was getting away from her anchorage, and was to the windward as the yachts approached buoy 16. The Clytie was the larger and faster vessel of the two, and as they neared the buoy, hailed the Volante to go about. The hail was heard on board the Volante but disregarded, and the Clytie, to avoid the Volante, passed inshore of the buoy. While there coming about she caught her centre-board on the reef, stopped short for a moment and fell off some four points.

Before coming to her course by the wind on the port tack, she passed some distance to the eastward from the buoy. When she did come by the wind the Volante was to windward of her and ahead, the courses of the vessels upon the port tack being about parallel and some one hundred and forty feet apart, as stated by Mr. Brooks. The tow was in front of both yachts upon that tack, and it was apparent to both that a tack must be made by both vessels to eastward of the tow. As they drew near the tow the Volante first put her helm down and tacked quickly without losing her headway in any substantial degree. The helm of the Clytie was put hard down immediately after the Volante was seen to be tacking. As the Clytie came head to wind she forged ahead, and while head to wind, and as the answer expressly admits—therein contradicting the evidence of her sailing master—while "going fast enough to steer well," her jib boom caught in the outer leach of the mainsail of the Volante, then crossing her bows upon the starboard tack with sails all full. Had the Clytie been six feet further to the westward there would have been no collision. Twenty-five feet was a safe distance from the tow for the Clytie to be when head to wind. How far from the tow the Clytie was, in fact, when she came head to wind is a question over which the contest has been severe. The distance astern of the Volante at which the Clytie was when she came by the wind upon the port tack, is equally a matter in dispute.

Upon these indisputable facts it has been contended in behalf of the Clytie that inasmuch as the Volante started from her anchorage further up in the harbor and astern of the Clytie, the Volante was the overtaking vessel at the time of the collision and charged with the duty of avoiding the Clytie. But I cannot agree to this view. On the contrary, I am of the opinion that from the time when the Clytie was stopped near buoy 16, at which time the Volante was standing over to westward towards the tow, on her port tack, the Clytie was the overtaking vessel.

I next notice the contention of the Volante that the Clytie is responsible, because, being the overtaking vessel, she came in collision with the Volante in violation of sailing rule 22 (article 17), which provides that "every vessel overtaking any other vessel, shall keep out of the way of the last mentioned vessel." The responsibility of the Clytie does not necessarily follow from the mere fact that she was overtaking the Volante on the port tack. For sailing rule 22 (article 17), like all the other statutory sailing rules, is subject to sailing rule 24 (article 19), which provides that "in construing and obeying these rules due regard must be had to all dangers of navigation, and to any special circumstances which may exist in any particular case, rendering a departure from them necessary in order to avoid immediate danger." Accordingly it is contended on the part of the Clytie that in this instance the relative speed of the two yachts and their position with reference to each other and to the tow ahead, were circumstances that required the Volante to shorten her course upon the port tack sufficiently to enable the Clytie, on reaching the tow, to come to the wind between the Volante and the tow, and so pass to windward; and it is claimed in behalf of the Clytie that the sole cause of the collision was the fault of the Volante in continuing her port tack so near to the tow as to render it impossible for the Clytie to avoid collision at the tow.

Upon the evidence there is no room to doubt that, however the fact may have been at the time when the Clytie came on the wind on the port tack, there was a time after both vessels were on the wind when the Clytie had gained upon the Volante to such a degree that it was impossible for her either to luff clear of the Volante or to go upon the starboard tack under the Volante's stern, or to clear the tow by bearing away, or to slacken her speed, or to anchor; and that after that point had been reached by the Clytie it was still possible for the Volante, by shortening her port tack, to enable the Clytie to tack at the tow without hitting either the tow or the Volante, and so avoid collision. From that time forward the right of the Volante to keep her course without reference to the Clytie was at an end, and it became her duty to terminate her port tack in time to enable the Clytie to come to the wind in safety between the tow and the Volante. This obligation rests upon principle, for under the circumstances stated, if the Volante should fail to shorten her tack, it would not be possible for the Clytie to avoid striking the Volante except by running into the tow, while it would be entirely possible for the Volante to shorten her tack without any substantial loss of distance or increase of risk, and thereby to prevent a collision. The decisions are uniform that no vessel can properly insist upon adhering to a right given by any sailing rule when a collision will be caused by such adherence. This understanding of the duty of the Volante under the circumstances stated, derives support from the evidence given by experts as to the practice of seamen under similar circumstances. It has been said here that expert testimony is incompetent in a case governed by statutory sailing rules. But where the question is whether the circumstances are special, and render a departure from the general rule necessary to avoid immediate danger, it appears to me to be both reasonable and proper to consider the effect given to similar circumstances by practical seamen in actual navigation. It is the testimony of all the experts that under circumstances similar to those stated it is the practice among seamen for the windward vessel to shorten her tack with reference to the necessities of the vessel to leeward; but some intelligent seamen, differing from others equally intelligent, say that in practice, the windward vessel never goes about for the vessel astern, unless she is hailed to go about by that vessel. Manifestly, on this occasion, it was not supposed by those on board the Volante that a hail from the Clytie was necessary to render it obligatory on them to shorten their tack, for Mr. Center, a yachtsman of large experience, who was on board the Volante and part of the time at her helm, and who is called as a witness by the libellants, and who says that he heard no hail from the Clytie (as say all the others on board), when particularly interrogated in regard to the Volante's movements, gives the following testimony: "Q. What was your object in going about as you did? A. To give the other boat plenty of time; I saw the Clytie coming behind us, and in order to give him time. Q. You thought you had to do that? A. Always have to do it."

But whether a hail from the Clytie was or was not necessary in order to cast upon the Volante the duty to shorten her tack, is a question of no importance in this instance, because there is convincing evidence that the Volante while on the port tack was loudly hailed and beckoned to go about. It is true that no one of those on board the Volante who have been called as witnesses, heard the hail or saw the signal from the Clytie, but this negative evidence is by no means sufficient to overthrow the positive and particular testimony of the seaman on the Clytie who gave the hail and made the signal, the sailing master who ordered the hail to be given, and the witnesses on the Clytie who heard the order obeyed. The evidence for the Volante, in regard to not hearing the hail, can do no more than convict those on board of a want of proper attention. The Clytie was known to be coming behind them to leeward and on the same tack, that she was the faster vessel and that both were approaching an obstacle that would compel both to tack. If it be the practice under similar circumstances for the leeward vessel to hail, there was every reason for those on board the Volante to anticipate a hail from the Clytie which would require the Volante to go about, and it was the duty of those on board the Volante to be watching for the signal. Had they been watchful, there is no room upon the evidence to doubt that they would have heard the hail that was given or seen the signal that was made. The legal obligation of the Volante to shorten her tack is therefore the same as it would have been had she heard the hail.

The next question is, did the Volante so tack as to permit the Clytie to come to the wind between the tow and the Volante without hitting either? That it was the duty of the Clytie under the circumstances to hold on to her port tack as long as was possible without running into the tow is conceded by her; failure on her part to perform this duty must render her liable. On the other hand, if there was no such failure on the part of the Clytie, the fact that the vessels collided in the manner they did, convicts the Volante of a failure sufficiently to shorten her tack, and casts upon her alone the responsibility for the accident. It is thus seen that the vital question of the case is one of fact—a question of distance—namely, the distance from the tow at which the Clytie was when she came head to wind.

Before passing to the consideration of the question of this distance I turn back to notice the point made in behalf of the Volante, that whatever failure of duty there may have been on the part of the Volante after the Clytie had approached so near as to render it impossible for her to luff clear of the Volante's stern, the Clytie was guilty of fault for not either tacking under the Volante's stern as soon as she had come by the wind, at which time, as it is contended, it was possible for her so to do, or for not slacking her speed or casting anchor at that time, and so to avoid being afterwards placed in a position where she would be forced to run into the Volante or the tow unless the Volante afforded a way of escape by shortening her tack.

Here, too, the parties differ upon a question of fact. On the part of the claimant it is insisted that there was no time after the Clytie came to the wind when she was not too near the Volante to permit of her passing under the Volante's stern. But the weight of the evidence upon this question appears to be in favor of the Volante. Indeed, if at the time the Clytie did tack, she caught the Volante's mainsail with her jib-boom, she being then head to the wind and the Volante having then tacked and filled away to the eastward, it seems certain that if at an earlier period, when she was not so close to the Volante, and when the Volante was still moving to westward on the port tack, the Clytie had tacked, she would have cleared the Volante entirely. Such being the fact, if the Clytie had been a steamboat, able to stop at pleasure, or if the vessels had been in the open sea, it would be difficult to say that the Clytie was not in fault for not taking steps to avoid getting into a position of danger under the lee of the vessel ahead. But, considering that the Clytie did not get upon the wind until some distance over from buoy No. 16, and in view of the importance of keeping herself in full control when the working room was so narrow and so many other vessels were approaching from behind—the vessels then being opposite Palmer's island, and, according to Mr. Center, having only from four hundred to five hundred feet of working room—I am inclined to believe that the Clytie was justified in holding her reach, relying upon the Volante's shortening her tack when she approached the tow, in case the Clytie should then have approached so near as to render action on the part of the Volante necessary to avoid collision.

In reaching this conclusion, based as it is upon the peculiar situation of these vessels, I do not, as I conceive, trench upon the established rule applicable to the overtaking vessel under ordinary circumstances, nor do I go contrary to any adjudged case that I have been able to discover after careful search in the reports, not omitting the cases of The Nellie D. [Case No. 10,097]; The Charlotte Raab [Id. 2,622]; Whitteredge v. Dill, 23 How. [64 U. S.] 453; The Priscilla, 1 Asp. 469.

Manifestly the Clytie could not have borne away as soon as she had come by the wind without danger of becoming involved with some of the nineteen yachts that were beating out behind her, and surely she was not bound to heave to or anchor in mid-channel under such circumstances. That those on board the Volante did not at the time expect the Clytie under the circumstances to abandon her tack, but anticipated that she would hold on and rely upon having room left her by the Volante in which to come to the wind upon reaching the tow, is, moreover, quite evident.

I am thus again brought to the vital question of the case, namely, as to the distance at which the Clytie was from the tow at the time when she was in stays head to wind. The evidence bearing upon this question consists of estimates of the distance given by witnesses upon the stand, some of whom were on board the Volante, some on the Clytie, some on the tow, and some on other yachts in the squadron. Besides these estimates there are various facts proved in regard to position, bearing, speed and movements of the respective yachts which serve to show this distance. The testimony of Mr. Center goes to show that the Clytie came head to wind when over two hundred feet distant from the tow. Dayton, who was on board the yacht Rambler, in the tow, puts the Clytie one hundred and forty feet from the tow when head to wind. Thomas, who was also on the Rambler, makes the distance sixty feet. Mr. Brooks, the claimant, gives the distance at twenty-five or thirty feet. Belmont, the sailing-master of the Clytie, says twenty-five feet. Lyons and Adams, who were on board the Clytie, say forty feet, and Jones says thirty feet. In this variety of estimates it is forcibly argued in behalf of the Clytie that the judgment of the competent men who were on board the Clytie and charged with the duty of determining when it was necessary to come into the wind, is more reliable than estimates made after this lapse of time, and affords a sure foundation for the judgment of the court. But while the presumption certainly is in favor of the correctness of the judgment formed on board the Clytie in regard to the time when it was necessary to put their helm down, there are in the case facts proved by these same persons which show the judgment thus formed to have been erroneous, and that the Clytie did not stand as near to the tow as she could have done with safety. It has already been stated that the Clytie could go within twenty-five feet of the tow without danger. This fact is not open to be disputed by the claimant, for the sailing-master of the Clytie fixes that as the distance at which she was in fact, and Mr. Brooks himself believed that she would come head to wind within twenty-five or thirty feet of the tow. It is also in proof that the Volante put her helm down before the Clytie did, and tacked very quickly without losing her headway. The Clytie took some time—fifty seconds, according to the best estimate Mr. Brooks can give—to come head to wind, and then she forereached a considerable distance on a line parallel with the tow. While the Clytie was thus moving parallel with the tow, Mr. Brooks says he noticed the Volante to be on a course across the line of the Clytie's direction, about fifty feet away from the Clytie and coming with a heavy full, giving her a speed of three knots or more. This position of the Volante, after she had tacked, on the starboard bow of the Clytie, shows clearly that the Clytie came head to wind much more than twenty-five feet from the tow. Again, several of the claimant's witnesses show that the Volante made her tack and gathered headway between the tow and the line of the Clytie's direction as she was head to wind, and the Volante was sixty-five feet long including boom. Mr. Brooks also says, "If the Volante had kept on a little further and then gone about she would have been safe." The distance between the Clytie when head to wind and the tow was therefore more than sufficient for a vessel sixty-five feet long to tack and gather headway. This shows the distance to have been greater than is estimated by the claimant's witnesses.

Again, the sailing master of the Clytie says that the Volante should have luffed when she bore four points on the Clytie's starboard bow; at another place that she could have luffed when she was two or three points on the Clytie's starboard bow; and at another place, that the Volante ought to have luffed when she had gone about two lengths on her starboard tack. This testimony, by the claimant's sailing master, shows the distance in question to have been greater than the claimant supposes. So also Mr. Brooks says, that if the Volante, when she was two or three points on the Clytie's starboard bow, had luffed, there would have been no collision. If there was room for the Volante, being between the Clytie and the tow, and about fifty feet ahead, to bear two or three points on the Clytie's starboard bow and there luff, clearly the distance between the Clytie and the tow was more than one hundred feet.

In addition to these facts, proved by the claimant's own witnesses, there is the fact stated by the mate of the Active, a yacht to the leeward of the Clytie, that his yacht on her port tack passed the Clytie's stern when the Clytie was head to the wind, and went several lengths further to westward, and then tacked in the wake or rather to eastward of the wake of the last boat of the tow. It is true that this same witness says that the Clytie went close to the tow and near as he would dare to go, but his opinion is overthrown by his act, for he went with his own boat at the least one hundred and fifty feet nearer the line of the tow than the Clytie did. The Clytie having the ability, as she herself shows, to come to wind within twenty-five feet of the tow, and the position requiring that she should be only some six feet nearer the tow than she was, to enable her to clear the Volante, the facts above mentioned plainly show that the Clytie had room to tack at the tow without coming in contact with either the Volante or the tow. This conclusion is decisive of the controversy, for it follows that the Volante having by accident or design—and it matters not which—left room for the Clytie to come to the wind without hitting either the Volante or the tow, was guilty of no fault, and that the fault which caused the collision was the failure of the Clytie to go as near to the tow as she could with safety.

Another fault has been strongly urged against the Clytie, namely, that after she had come head to wind and when she saw the Volante gathering way across her bows and likely to be caught in passing, she did not swing to westward the six feet that was needed to avoid collision.

The Clytie's sailing master upon this point testifies that when his vessel was within a point of head to wind he steadied his helm and kept it steady a few seconds, and when he was head to wind he ported his helm a little. There may be room for the surmise that putting the helm hard-a-port at that time would have caused a failure to tack; but no witness, as I recollect, has testified that such a result would have been likely to follow such a movement of the helm. The only excuse for not putting the helm hard-a-port instead of porting it a little, given by the sailing master, is that the vessel's headway was then slow and the helm had no effect. But this excuse cannot be received in the face of the specific statement in the answer that at the time of the collision the vessel was going fast enough to steer well. It should also be noticed in this connection, as bearing upon this and other questions of the case, that these two vessels were yachts, subject of course to the sailing rules applicable to all sailing vessels, and to no other, but possessing ability to move rapidly and manoeuvre quickly, supposed to be fully equipped, and in the charge of skilful men. A prompt employment of their full capacity to avoid collisions may be justly required of such vessels in all cases of danger. What a yacht is willing to do for the purpose of winning a wager, she is in a case of necessity bound to do for the purpose of avoiding collision. While, therefore, it may be said to be requiring much of the Clytie to say that she could have avoided the collision by putting her helm hard-a-port after she had come head to wind, in view of the evidence and the answer, it is not easy to absolve her from fault in this respect.

There remains to consider the point made in behalf of the Clytie, that the Volante was in fault for not luffing up into the wind as soon as she filled on the starboard tack, and thus avoiding the Clytie, then coming head to wind. It is possible that the Volante, being a very quick vessel, could have done this. Such is the opinion of those on the Clytie. But whether the danger of collision then imminent would be lessened by luffing or keeping full on the part of the Volante was a close question. The decision made carried her within six feet of clear, and no one can say with certainty that by luffing she would have done better. It cannot, I think, be imputed to the Volante as a fault, that of two doubtful measures she adopted one that so nearly carried her clear.

I have now examined all the questions in this case as to which my opinion has been asked. The result of that examination is the conclusion that the collision mentioned in the libel was caused solely by the fault of the Clytie, and that the libellants are entitled to recover herein the damages sustained by reason thereof. There must therefore be a decree in favor of the libellants, with an order of reference to ascertain the amount.

Case No. 2,914.

The CLYTIE.

[The case reported in 8 Wkly. Notes Cas. 188, under the above title, is the same case as Peck v. Laughlin, Case No. 10,890.]

CLYTIE, The (HITCHCOCK v.). See Case No. 2,913.

COAL BARGES (JONES v.). See Case No. 7,458.

COAL BLUFF NO. 2, The (HARTUPEE v.). See Case No. 6,172.

COAL BLUFF NO. 2, The (McCASKEY v.). See Case No. 8,687.

COAL VALLEY, The (BAYARD, The, v.). See Case No. 1,128.

Case No. 2,915.

In re COAN & TEN BROEKE MANUF'G CO.

[6 Biss. 315;[1] 12 N. B. R. 203; 7 Chi. Leg. News, 260.]

District Court, N. D. Illinois. March, 1875.

BANKRUPTCY—SALE OF CONSIGNOR'S GOODS—LIEN.

A consignor whose property was sold prior to the bankruptcy, and the proceeds mingled with the general assets, has no lien or specific claim against the estate; he can only share with the other creditors.

[Cited in Illinois Trust & Sav. Bank v. First Nat. Bank, 15 Fed. 860.]

In bankruptcy. This was a petition by B. Manville & Co., and other creditors of the bankrupt, seeking to establish a trust fund, and asking payment in full of their claims from the money in the hands of the assignee. The bankrupt [Coan & Ten Broeke Carriage Manufacturing Company], a corporation doing business in the city of Chicago, as a manufacturer and dealer in carriages, was in the habit of receiving carriages on consignment from other manufacturers and dealers, keeping an open account with each one of them, selling for cash and on credit, or exchanging for material, and sometimes also paying in material. At the time of the bankruptcy, they were indebted to some of the petitioners for carriages thus sold, and among the stock coming to the hands of the assignee, were other carriages thus sent on consignment, all of which, however, were sold by the assignee, there being nothing at the time to indicate that they were not the property of the bankrupt, and the consignors having made no claim to any specific carriages. The proceeds of such as had been sold prior to the bankruptcy had not been kept as any special fund, but had gone into the general assets of the corporation.

F. C. Ingalls, for petitioners.

BLODGETT, District Judge. The controlling question in this case is, whether the proceeds of these consigned carriages came within the clause in the 14th section of the bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 522)], which provides that "no property held by the bankrupt in trust shall pass by such assignment." It is true that in examining the text-books and cases on the subject of trusts, we find many expressions like these,—that a factor or agent is a trustee for his principal, that a bank is a trustee for its depositors, and even that a debtor is a trustee for his creditor. The courts of New York and Massachusetts have frequently decided cases upon these principles, and, founded upon such expression, the counsel for petitioners has framed his argument, that they have a lien upon these proceeds as a species of trust fund, and are entitled to payment, to the exclusion of the general creditors of the bankrupt.

A proper construction, however, of this clause in the bankrupt act, will only apply it to property still held in specie, and which can be distinguished from the other property of the bankrupt, or where the proceeds constitute a separate and distinct fund, not to cases where they have become mingled with the general assets of the bankrupt, even by his wrongful act.

Here there is no consigned property in the hands of the assignee which the petitioners can claim as belonging to themselves, nor any distinct fund which can be recognized or traced as the specific proceeds of the property sent on consignment by these petitioners. The petition must, therefore, be dismissed.

[1] [Reported by Josiah H. Bissell, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

COATES (DUNDORE v.). See Case No. 4,142.

Case No. 2,916.

COATES v. MUSE et al.

[1 Brock. 529.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Virginia. June 4, 1821.

DECREE AGAINST ADMINISTRATORS—ENFORCEMENT—ACCOUNTING—POWER OF COMMISSIONER—TAKING UP REPORT—PRACTICE—OPENING DECREE.

1. A joint decree was rendered against T. M. and E. M. administrators, with the will annexed of H. M., and his principal devisees and legatees, for a considerable sum of money, being the amount of unadministered assets in their hands. Before this decree was satisfied T. M. died, having appointed his co-administrator, his own executor, who qualified as such. The plaintiff filed her bill, to revive the decree against E. M., both in his character of surviving administrator of H. M., and as executor of T. M. E. M. also died, without answering the plaintiff's bill, and a bill of revivor, was filed against his administrator, and also against the administrator, de bonis non, of T. M. These last defendants having answered this bill, the court directed them to settle their accounts of their administration of the estates of E. M. and T. M. respectively, and also of the administration of E. M. and T. M. of the estate of H. M., but did not require an account of the administration, of the estate of T. M., by E. M. his executor. The commissioner, after due notice to the defendants, proceeded to execute the decretal order of the court, the defendants failing to attend, and reported the proportions, by which the original decree ought to be charged on the estates of T. M. and E. M. At the same term to which this report was made, the report was affirmed, and the matter thereof decreed, no counsel appearing for the defendants. Subsequently R. B. one of the administrators, de bonis non, of T. M., applied for an injunction to stay proceedings under the last mentioned decree, so far as it affected the estate of T. M., assigning various errors in the proceedings above recited, and praying that the decree might be opened, and the alleged errors corrected. The court held: That there was no error in failing to direct an account of the administration of E. M., of the estate of T. M., such an account not being called for by plaintiff or defendants. Although in a suit against the representatives of an original debtor, the subject may be pursued further than those representatives, the plaintiff is not bound to do so. If E. M., as executor of T. M., is indebted to the estate of his testator, he is not distinguishable, so far as respects the claim of the plaintiff, from any other debtor.

[1] [Reported by John W. Brockenbrough, Esq.]

2. That the commissioner, in proceeding to act ex-parte, on the defendants failing to appear, adopted a course of very doubtful propriety. At all events, the defendants would, on motion, be allowed to repair their fault, especially if their non-attendance could be excused.

3. That there is no positive rule in this court, forbidding a report to be considered at the term to which it is made. The general practice has been, to permit a report, in any degree complex, to lie for a second term, for consideration and exception, on the motion of one of the parties. In plain cases, the report is generally taken up at the first term.

4. That the two administrators of H. M., being also his devisees and legatees, and having acted together in the collection, and payment of moneys, it is presumable that they arranged between themselves, their respective claims upon the estate of their testator, and (in the absence of testimony to the contrary) that each retained in his own hands, an equal share of the estate. And as they, knowing the state of their own affairs, permitted a decree to be rendered jointly against them, the just inference is, that each was bound for an equal portion of that decree. If either had paid off the whole of the decree, he, so paying, might have called on the other for a moiety of the decree so paid. And the subsequent decree of this court ought, therefore, to have been against the representatives of each, in the first instance, for a moiety only.

5. That this decree was not a final decree, so as to preclude the court from opening it to let in its real merits, which may have been excluded by any excusable misapprehension of the party, or error, or irregularity of the court.

MARSHALL, Circuit Justice. In 1805, the plaintiff in this cause, instituted her suit in this court, against Thomas Muse and Elliott Muse, who were administrators, with the will annexed, of Hudson Muse, deceased, and also, his principal devisees and legatees, to obtain payment of a considerable sum of money, due from Hudson Muse, in his lifetime, to the plaintiff's testator. Others of the legatees of Hudson Muse, were also made parties, but against them, no decree was ever given. The estate of Hudson Muse, except the sums which were disbursed in the payment of debts, and some small portions of the legacies, which had been paid, the amount of which is not ascertained, was retained in the hands of the administrators. Their accounts were referred, and the commissioner reported, that the sum of $7493.76, remained in the hands of the administrators, for which sum, a decree was pronounced on the 3d of June, 1811. In 1817, the plaintiff filed her bill in this court, for the purpose of reviving this decree, and carrying it into effect, against Elliott Muse, as executor of Thomas Muse, and surviving administrator of Hudson Muse. Elliott Muse, also, departed this life, without answering this bill, upon which, in June, 1818, a bill of revivor was filed against Zachariah Crittenden, the administrator of the estate of Elliott Muse, deceased, and Robert Blakey and Harry Gaines, the administrators, with the will annexed, de bonis non, of Thomas Muse, and against Richard Corbin, the executor of John T. Corbin, who was a surety in the administration bond of Thomas and Elliott Muse, executed by them, as administrators of Hudson Muse. In May, 1819, the defendants, Harry Gaines, and Robert Blakey, administrators of the estate of Thomas Muse, unadministered by Elliott Muse, filed their answer, stating, that on the books of Elliott Muse, the estate of Thomas Muse is debited with its proportion of the debt now claimed, and the whole is stated to be settled with W. C. Williams, the attorney for the plaintiff: that they had understood, that Elliott Muse executed a mortgage to W. C. Williams, for the security of the debt which, through negligence, was never recorded. They, therefore, claimed to be discharged. In July, 1819, Zachariah Crittenden, administrator of Elliott Muse, deceased, filed his answer, stating, that he had fully administered, before any knowledge of the decree rendered in favour of the plaintiff.

At the May term of this court, 1820, the court directed the defendants, Gaines and Blakey, to settle the account of the administration of Thomas Muse, of the estate of Hudson Muse, deceased, and also, an account of their own administration of the estate of Thomas Muse. The court also directed the defendant, Crittenden, to settle the account of the administration of Elliott Muse, of the estate of Hudson Muse, and his own administration, of the estate of Elliott Muse, before one of the commissioners of this court. In October, 1820, due notice having been given to the defendants, the commissioner proceeded to execute this decretal order, and the defendants having failed to attend, he reported the proportions, by which the original decree ought to be charged on the estates of Thomas and Elliott Muse. His report charges $5155.02, part of this decree, on the estate of Thomas Muse, and $2338.74, the residue thereof, on the estate of Elliott Muse. This report was filed on the 14th of October, 1820. It states the principles on which the commissioner proceeded, in thus apportioning the debt due to the plaintiff, and also states some other matters, supposed by him to shed some light on the situation of the defendants, with regard to each other. At the November term, 1820, this report was confirmed, and the matter thereof decreed, no counsel appearing for the defendants. In January, 1821, Robert Blakey, one of the administrators of Thomas Muse, deceased, applied to one of the judges of this court, for an injunction to stay, proceedings on this decree, so far as respected the estate of Thomas Muse, praying that the decree might be opened, and the plaintiff have the relief to which he might be decided to be entitled. The injunction was granted, to continue to the first day of this term, and the whole case now came on to be decided on its merits.

In his bill for an injunction, the plaintiff states sundry errors in the proceedings and decree, for which he thinks it ought to be opened, and set aside, and also, excuses his non-attendance on the commissioner, and his neglect of the case in this court. The errors alleged, are: 1st. That the decretal order for an account, did not direct an account of the administration of the estate of Thomas Muse, by Elliott Muse. 2d. That the commissioner has made his report ex-parte, not being authorized so to do, by the order under which he acted. 3d. That the court acted on the report during the term to which it was made, instead of leaving it to the next term for exceptions. 4th. That the decree is not warranted by the report, since it takes no notice of a sum reported to be due from the estate of Elliott Muse, to that of Thomas Muse, to an amount equal to the whole sum due to the plaintiff. These errors as assigned, will be severally considered.

1st. An account of the administration of Elliott Muse, of the estate of Thomas Muse, ought to have been directed. That this account might have been directed, especially as all the parties were before the court, will not be denied. That it ought to have been directed, is not so obvious. If Elliott Muse, as administrator of Thomas Muse, is indebted to that estate, he is not distinguishable, so far as respects the claim of the plaintiff, from any other debtor. Although, in a suit against the representatives of an original debtor, the subject may be pursued further than those representatives, I know of no case in which it has been decided, that the plaintiff is bound to do so.[2] In this particular case, the plaintiff, in her bill, has not required, that this administration account should be settled. It is impossible to say what delays might attend its settlement; and though the plaintiff would be bound to submit to these delays, had she made any demand on the representatives of Elliott Muse, in virtue of his administration of the estate of Thomas Muse, it would be unreasonable to impose them on her should they be considerable, when she makes no such demand. In the bill praying the injunction, this supposed error is more relied on, because, as is alleged, the defendants, in their answer, demand such account. Had this demand been really made, it would probably have been attended to, so far as was consistent with a just regard to the rights of the plaintiff, but might have been disregarded without error. In such a case, the court would be regulated by circumstances. But I understand the answer very differently. I can discover in it no claim for this account; nor was it claimed at the hearing. It would have been rather an extraordinary order, had this court directed an administration account to be taken, which was neither required by the plaintiff or defendant, and did not appear to be essential in the cause.

2d. The report, itself, being made by the commissioner ex parte, is considered as a nullity, because it was not authorized by the decretal order. Undoubtedly the decretal order directs the account to be made up by the defendants. They are to be the actors, and the order does not direct the commissioner to proceed ex-parte, on their failing to appear. Of the propriety of proceeding ex-parte, under such an order, without notice, therefore, to the defendants, I am not perfectly satisfied. Undoubtedly, the court would, on motion, have allowed the defendants, or either of them, to repair their fault, especially if their non-attendance could be excused, as it is in this case; and would feel much disposed, even after the report was acted on, to let in a just defence, if in its power.

3d. The court is also supposed to have erred, in taking up the report at the first term, contrary to its own rule. I believe no positive rule has been made on this subject. Perhaps one ought to have been made. There has been a practice, and the court ought, undoubtedly, to respect its own practice. That, to the best of my recollection, is to permit original reports, in any degree complex, to lie to a second term for consideration and exception. This is generally done on the application of one of the parties. In plain cases the report has frequently, I might say commonly, been taken up at the first term. I cannot pronounce it an error to take up a report at the first term; but I would listen with great favour to any objections made to a report so taken up, and to any excuse for not having made those objections in the proper time, if the cause were in a situation to allow me to listen to them. This is, undoubtedly, a case in which the report would have been permitted to lie, if desired.

4th. The fourth error assigned is in the decree. It is, that the whole sum is not decreed against the estate of Elliott Muse, since that estate appears to be indebted to the estate of Thomas Muse, in a larger sum than the plaintiff claims from both. The representative of Elliott Muse was not required to settle his administration of the estate of Thomas Muse, nor did he attempt to settle it. The representatives of those two estates were not directed to settle accounts between them, nor has either of them made the attempt. The commissioner, however, has, as a volunteer, reported the inventory and appraisement of the estate of Thomas Muse, and has supposed his executor to be indebted to the full amount, whatever debts he may have discharged; and that, without regard to the answer of the defendants, his administrators, in which they admit themselves to be in possession of part of that very estate. If the court had acted on the presumption, that this debt was actually due, its decree would have been equally without example, and without excuse.

[2] NOTE, by Chief Justice Marshall. It has been determined in this court, on full consideration, I think in a suit against Johnson's representatives (see Corbet v. Johnson's Heirs [Case No. 3,218]), that he is not bound to do so.

A much more serious objection to the decree has been made in argument. The report, and, consequently, the decree affirming it, is said to be erroneous in this, that it has adopted a principle in apportioning the debt, which is not authorized by any testimony before the commissioner. He has charged each administrator with the amount of his own purchase at the sale of the estate, and has divided the residue of the debts equally between them. I think this objection to the report, and the decree, well founded. Thomas and Elliott Muse considered themselves in the character of devisees and legatees, as well as administrators of Hudson Muse. They acted together, so far as the court can perceive, in the collection and payment of moneys. There is nothing unreasonable in the supposition, that they arranged between themselves their claims upon the estate of Hudson Muse, and that each retained in his own hands, computing his particular debt, as much of the estate as the other. If this is not extremely improbable, and is not contradicted by testimony, the situation in which the cause stood when it came before the commissioner, a situation in which it was placed by the parties themselves, required that this should be assumed as the basis of the report and of the decree. Thomas and Elliott Muse were acquainted with their own transactions. They must be supposed to have understood their own situation with the estate, and with each other. Possessing this understanding, and called upon to settle their administration account, the report states a balance in their hands, for which a decree is rendered, binding them equally. Had they been liable for this debt in different proportions, the court would have decreed against them severally, and according to their proportions. But they permit a report, stating a balance in the hands of both, and a decree upon that report, binding them equally. This decree constitutes a joint debt, of which either paying the whole, could recover a moiety from the other. In the absence of all testimony, showing that this decree ought to be satisfied in unequal proportions, Thomas or Elliott Muse, having satisfied it, could have called on the other for contribution, and this demand could not have been repelled by light presumptions. I am, therefore, of opinion, that the decree, in the actual state of the testimony, ought to have been revived equally, and that the representatives of each of the parties, at least in the first instance, ought to have been subjected only to a moiety of it. Upon these principles the decree ought to have made against the representatives of Thomas Muse for $3746.88, with the interest which accrued thereon. If it is final, and beyond the reach of the court, it ought to stand enjoined for the residue. If the court may now open it, the reasons for doing so, which are stated in the bill, and have been noticed in this opinion, and the excuse alleged in the bill for not appearing before the commissioner, are I think, sufficient to justify its being opened, and to induce the court now to make the order, which would have been made on the application of the party at the last term. I think, upon authority, the decree may be now opened. The case of Templeman v. Steptoe, 1 Manuf. 339, goes far in showing that this decree is not final. I had been rather inclined to think otherwise on the reason of the thing, but on that point, I give no opinion. I think the authorities quoted at the bar, and especially that from 1 Ves. 205, and that in Amb. 89,[3] are strong authorities for showing that a court of equity, may, on sufficient circumstances, open a decree, and let in the real merits of the cause, which have been excluded by any excusable misapprehension of the party, or irregularity, or error of the court. I shall follow those precedents in this case, and shall open the decree, and refer the accounts back to the commissioner, taking care to guard the plaintiff against unreasonable delay.

Decree: The court being satisfied that the decree pronounced in the first suit, at the last term, is erroneous in apportioning on the estate of Thomas Muse, a larger part of the debt due to the plaintiff in that suit, than ought to be charged on said estate: and being also satisfied with the excuse made by the said Robert Blakey for his non-attendance on the commissioner: and for his failure to make his objections to the report on its return to this court, doth open and set aside the decree, made in the said first cause, at the last term, and doth refer the cause to one of the commissioners, to execute the order made on the 5th day of May, 1820; and he is further directed to receive any proper evidence, which may be offered to show, that any part of the debt claimed by the plaintiff, in said first suit, has been paid, or that it ought to be apportioned on the estates of the intestates, respectively, of the defendants, by a different rule from that adopted in the report of the 7th of October last. The commissioner is directed to proceed ex-parte, if either of the defendants shall fail to attend. And the commissioner is directed to make his report to the court at the next term.

[NOTE. The commissioner reported, and a decree was pronounced directing Crittenden, as administrator, to pay the sum of $3,731.32 with interest, out of the assets in his hands, and reserved its decision as to the ultimate responsibility of the parties. Case No. 2,917. For subsequent proceedings herein, see Case No. 2,918.]

[3] Kemp v. Squire, 1 Ves. Sr. 205, and Cunyngham v. Cunyngham, Amb. 89.

Case No. 2,917.

COATES v. MUSE et al.

[1 Brock. 539.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Virginia. May Term, 1822.

DECREE AGAINST EXECUTORS—UNEQUAL LIABILITY—CONSTRUCTION OF STATE STATUTE.

1. Where a decree has been entered against two executors jointly, the effect of the decree is to charge each executor equally, whether it is so expressed, or not; but on an application, at a subsequent time, to carry the decree into effect, if it be shown by proof that the defendants were unequally indebted, the decree will be revived against each, according to his liability. But the fact, that the executors were debtors to the estate, in unequal sums, for purchases made at the sale of the estate, is no proof of their unequal liability.

2. Quaere: Is a joint decree against two persons, one of whom dies before the decree is carried into effect, within the influence of the Virginia act of assembly, "concerning partitions, joint rights, and obligations" (1 Rev. Code, c. 98, § 3), so that it may be revived against the representatives of the deceased defendant; or are those representatives discharged, notwithstanding the act of assembly?

3. The exposition of the acts of the several state legislatures, is the peculiar and appropriate duty of the state courts, and the federal courts will always feel great reluctance in breaking the way in the exposition of such statutes, and will not do so, unless really necessary for the decision of the cases before them.

[Cited in Beals v. Hale, 4 How. (45 U. S.) 54. Quoted in Johnston v. Straus, 26 Fed. 69.]

4. Construction of the 60th section (1 Rev. Code, c. 104) of the act "concerning executors," &c. B, the executor of A, commits a devastavit of the estate of his testator. C, the executor or administrator of B, is bound to pay the debts due to the estate of A, before any proper debts due to B's own creditors. Although the words of the section require the executor, or administrator of the executor, &c., to pay what shall be due to legatees, or distributees, of the first decedent; yet it is clear, that those debts may be paid to the executor, or administrator of the first decedent, as well as to his legatees, and distributees. And this superior dignity of debts due to the first decedent, attaches as well to the creditors of that decedent, as to his personal representative, and those creditors may sue the representatives of the last executor or administrator, and make him liable for the amount of their claims.

[Cited in brief in Johnston v. Straus, 26 Fed. 67.]

This is the same case reported in 1 Brock. 529 [Case No. 2,916], quod vide. In pursuance of the decree of the 4th of June, 1821, the commissioner made his report, and the court, reserving to a future day its decision, on the ultimate responsibility of the parties, in December, 1821, rendered an interlocutory decree, directing the administrator of Elliott Muse, to pay the sum of $3731.32 to the plaintiff, out of the assets of Elliott Muse's estate, unadministered by him. At the present term, the administrator exhibited to the court, the copy of the record of proceedings, in two suits then pending in a court of chancery of the state, and moved the court to set aside the interlocutory decree, of December, 1821, subjecting the assets in his hands, of the estate of Elliott Muse, to the payment of the claim of the plaintiff in this cause.

MARSHALL, Circuit Justice. The first question which arises in this cause is: In what proportion was the debt due to the plaintiff, originally chargeable on the estate of Thomas and Elliott Muse? By the decree of this court, at the May term, 1811, Thomas and Elliott Muse, administrators of Hudson Muse, deceased, were directed to pay to the plaintiff, the sum of $7493.76, that being the amount of the assets of Hudson Muse in their hands, to be administered. This decree is not expressed to be made by consent of parties; but there is much reason to believe that such was the fact. In general, one executor is not liable for the acts of his co-executor, and it is certain that this court would not have made a joint decree against the defendants, had not an acquiescence in such decree been expressed; or had not the court understood, that there would be so much difficulty in ascertaining their respective liabilities before a commissioner, that the defendants preferred making the adjustment between themselves. But, whatever may have been the motive for the decree, its effect certainly was to charge Thomas and Elliott Muse equally. It cannot, however, be doubted, that if, on an application to carry this decree into execution, it should be shown to the court, that the defendants were unequally indebted to the estate of the deceased, the decree would be revived against each, according to his liability. The commissioner has supposed, that this inequality of liability is proved by the fact, that Thomas and Elliott Muse, were debtors in unequal sums, for purchases made at the sale of Hudson Muse's estate. He supposes, that precisely the same amount of debts was collected by each, and that Thomas Muse is chargeable beyond Elliott Muse, in the sum which his purchases exceed those made by Elliott Muse. This supposition the court considers as inadmissible, because the defendants would have resisted a joint decree, had they divided the outstanding debts, without regard to their individual debts; and, because also, it is most probable, especially since they considered themselves as entitled to the estate of Hudson Muse, that each collected as much of the outstanding debts, as would place him on an equality with the other. The fact, then, that they purchased unequally at the sale, does not authorize any inference, opposed to the decree of 1811. The entry made by Elliott Muse, as representative of Thomas Muse, is undoubtedly satisfactory evidence, that he did not think the estate of

[1] [Reported by John W. Brockenbrough, Esq.]

Thomas Muse liable to him beyond the sum charged to it; but does not, perhaps, sufficiently prove, that the estate of Thomas Muse was indebted in that sum.[2] That entry shows the extent of Elliott Muse's claim, when he supposed himself entitled to the decree, but cannot demonstrate the justice of that claim. The sum charged to the estate of Thomas Muse, however, exceeds so little a moiety of the decree, with interest, as to make this an unimportant inquiry. I shall consider Thomas and Elliott Muse, as originally liable for this decree in moieties.

The second question, depends upon the construction of the "act concerning partitions, and joint rights, and obligations." Soon after the decree was pronounced, Thomas Muse died; and the question is, whether the decree survived, so that his representatives were discharged at law; or, whether it might have been revived as against them. At common law, the rule undoubtedly is, that a judgment or decree against two persons, is joint and not several, that it survives against the survivor, and cannot be enforced, at law, against the representatives of the deceased; nor in equity, farther than those representatives are equitably bound, in consequence of being equitable debtors. But the legislature of Virginia, has enacted, that, "the representative of one jointly bound with another, for the payment of a debt, or for performance or forbearance of any act, or for any other thing, and dying in the lifetime of the latter, may be charged by virtue of such obligation, in the same manner as such representatives might have been charged, if the obligors had been bound severally, as well as jointly." 1 Rev. Code, c. 98, § 3. The question is, whether this section of the act, extends to judgments and decrees, or is confined to obligations, created by the act of the party bound. This question, as I understand, is now, for the first time, raised in a court of justice. It is always, with much reluctance, that I break the way, in expounding the statute of a state; for the exposition of the acts of every legislature is, I think, the peculiar and appropriate duty of the tribunals, created by that legislature. Although, if a case depending on a statute, not yet construed by the appropriate tribunal, comes on to be tried, the judge is under the necessity of construing the statute, because it forms a part of the case, yet he will yield to this necessity, only where it is real, and when the case depends upon the statute. The reluctance with which he yields to it is increased, when, as in this case, the language of the act is sufficiently ambiguous to admit of different constructions among intelligent gentlemen of the profession. In such a case, he will be particularly anxious to avoid giving a first construction; and will avoid it, if the case can be otherwise decided. "The representative of one jointly bound with another," is the subject of the act; and this description is, certainly, broad enough to comprehend a person bound by act of law, as well as one who is bound by his own act. The statute proceeds: "May be charged, by virtue of such obligation, in the same manner as such representatives might have been charged, if the obligors had been bound severally, as well as jointly." These words may be considered as restraining the general term used in the first part of the sentence. It is true, that the words "such obligation," referring, directly, to the words "one jointly bound with another," may very naturally have been used in a sense co-extensive with the first words, and may, without violence, or departure from their usual sense, be understood to designate any obligation, whether created by the act of law or of a party; but the subsequent words produce more difficulty. The representatives of the person dying first, are to be charged in the same manner as they might have been charged "if the obligors had been bound severally, as well as jointly."

The word "obligors," in the last part of the sentence, was certainly intended to be co-extensive with the words "one jointly bound with another," in the first part of it. These different words were, unquestionably, introduced by the legislature, to describe the same persons and the same obligation; but the word "obligors" seems to me to designate, exclusively, those who bind themselves, the actors, in creating an obligation. Those bound by a judgment or decree, are never, I think, denominated obligors. The following words add strength to this construction. They are to be charged, as if the obligors had been bound "severally as well as jointly." Now, a judgment never, and a decree very rarely, binds severally as well as jointly. A judgment, or decree, against two, is a joint, and never a joint and several judgment or decree; unless, indeed, in a decree, this quality be particularly expressed. These phrases in the section, which are entirely adapted to obligations created by the act of the party, satisfy me, that such obligations, alone, were in the mind of the legislature, when the law was framed; and I should feel no difficulty in saying, that its provisions ought to be limited to them, were it not that the obvious and general intention of the act would be defeated by this construction.

The obvious intention of the act is, that all obligations, which are joint in their terms, should be several, as well as joint, in their legal operation and effect. This policy is beneficial and just to creditors, because they are not defrauded, by the death of one of the obligors, of any part of the security for which they originally stipulated; and it is justice to the obligors themselves, because it leaves the representatives of each, bound to precisely the same extent to which the original obligor probably intended to bind himself. The legislature stops short, without effecting its object, if the provision does not apply to the judgment, as well as to the contract on which that judgment is founded. It would be strange, if, in severing that which the parties themselves had made joint, the legislature had intended to leave the law in such a state as still to join, by its own operation, that which the parties had severed, or that which the act was made for the purpose of severing. If the legislature, when framing this law, had been asked: "Do you intend, that a judgment shall bind those jointly, and not severally, who had bound themselves severally, as well as jointly; or that the judgment shall be joint on contracts which this legislature intended to sever?" the answer, it is probable, would have been in the negative. It may, then, be urged with plausibility, and, perhaps, with truth, that this is a case in which the literal construction of an act is opposed to its spirit, and would defeat, in part, the object of the legislature; that it is a case in which words of some ambiguity are used, which, construed according to their common acceptation, would not reach a case within the mischief intended to be provided against. I feel the force of this reasoning, but my general rule of construction, and I think it a good one, is to adhere to the letter of the statute, taking the whole together; and I would not readily depart from that rule in this case. It is, however, no weak argument in favour of the more liberal construction, that no mischief can come from its adoption, and the consequence of a contrary construction, would, I think, be the multiplication of suits. Creditors would bring, in many instances, as many actions as there are parties to the contract on which they sue. Without expressly adopting either construction I shall inquire whether the one or the other may not lead to the same result. If the act of assembly so changes the law, that this decree may be revived against the representatives of Thomas Muse, then those representatives would be clearly liable for one moiety of it; but if, in consequence of transactions subsequent thereto, or of circumstances not known to the court when it was pronounced, the representatives of Thomas Muse ought to recover from those of Elliott Muse, the sum they pay to the plaintiff, or any part of it, then the court would decree, in the first instance, that the estate of Elliott Muse should pay to the plaintiff, the sum for which they would be liable to the estate of Thomas Muse, provided that might be done without delaying the plaintiff, or in any manner prejudicing him.

[2] In relation to this entry, see the last opinion of the chief justice, in 1 Brock. 551 [Case No. 2,918].

If the decree survives, and could not be regularly revived against the representatives of Thomas Muse, still the original equity of the plaintiff against him for a moiety of the decree, would not be destroyed. This equity may indeed be rebutted by equitable circumstances; but those circumstances must, I think, derive some of their force from the conduct of the creditor. Transactions between the debtors alone, might be a reason for decreeing in the first instance against the estate of one of them, but not for such a postponement of the rights of the creditor as would materially injure him. We should be brought, then, to the same result in whichever way the statute be construed, unless there are transactions between the parties, which ought to postpone the decree, as against the estate of Thomas Muse, under one construction, and not under the other. His counsel contends that there are such circumstances. On the death of Thomas Muse, Elliott Muse qualified as his executor, and has died greatly indebted to his estate. It is contended that as the representatives both of Thomas and Elliott Muse are before the court, and as the representatives of Elliott Muse, will be accountable to those of Thomas Muse, for the estate of Thomas Muse wasted by Elliott Muse, that this court will decree directly against those representatives, so far as they are liable to the representatives of Thomas Muse. This is undoubtedly the course of justice, and the course of the court, so far as it can be conformed to, without delays and perplexities injurious to the creditor. In a plain case, the court will never hesitate to decree directly against a party, who is ultimately responsible. But in a case where great delay must be encountered to establish this ultimate responsibility, the court does not think itself at liberty to impose these delays and difficulties on the creditor. If Elliott Muse were stil living, and the report of the commissioner were to be confirmed, the court could not hesitate to decree against him to the full amount of the debt, for he is shown to be the debtor of Thomas Muse in a still larger sum. But Elliott Muse is dead, and his representatives are responsible under any construction of the laws of Virginia, so far only as assets have come to their hands. Whether they are responsible to that extent, or not, depends upon the construction of the 60th section of the act (1 Rev. Code, c. 104) for regulating the conduct of executors and administrators, and on the operation of a paper given to Elliott Muse by William C. Williams, then the attorney for the plaintiff. The words of the act of assembly are, "The executors or administrators, of a guardian, of a committee, or of any other person who shall have been chargeable with, or accountable for, the estate of a ward, an idiot or a lunatic, or the estate of a dead person, committed to their testator or intestate, by a court of record, shall pay so much as shall be due from their testator or intestate, to the ward, idiot, or lunatic, or to the legatees or persons entitled to distribution, before any proper debt of their testator or intestate."

The question is, whether the priority given by this section, extends to creditors, or is confined to the claims of the ward, idiot, &c. and legatees or distributees of the deceased. In the case of a ward, or of an idiot or lunatic, the question cannot well arise; and I am not sure that this circumstance may not in some degree, affect the construction of the act, in its application to the case of legatees and distributees, who are thus connected in the same provision with the ward, and the idiot or lunatic. There are, however, some considerations, which powerfully oppose this construction of the act. The executor, or administrator, holds the estate of his testator, or intestate, as a trustee, first for creditors, and, then, for legatees, or distributees. This rule is so intermingled with all the principles of our law, its observance is so imperiously exacted by the most sacred injunctions of justice and morals, that the legislature cannot be supposed to impair it, unless the language be such, that the construction is inevitable. Express words, only, can change the order which debts and legacies, or distributive shares hold to each other. The executor of an executor, is often the executor of the first testator. The debt due from his immediate, to his original testator, represents the property converted by that immediate testator, to his own use, and is assets in his hands, first, to satisfy the claim of the creditors of the first testator, and then, the claims of legatees. In a contest between those creditors and legatees, all our experience, all our legal education, every thing we derive from observation or instruction, informs us, that the creditors must prevail. In such a state of things, the priority of a legatee over a creditor of the last testator, is, by an implication so necessary as to be inevitable, the priority of a creditor of the first testator, whose claim is so superior in dignity, to that of the legatee, as to enable him to wrest the property from the legatee, after it shall be delivered to him.

The case is not materially varied, if the representative of the administrator, or of the last testator, be not also the representative of the first. If an executor or administrator die, indebted to the estate of his testator, or intestate, that debt charges his estate in the hands of his representative. It is a debt, the dignity of which depends upon the law. This debt, in the regular course of things, is to be sued for, by the representative of the original testator. When it comes to the hands of that representative, it is assets to be paid in the course of administration, first to creditors, and then to legatees, or distributees. The law must be very clear, and very positive, indeed, which would make a difference between these assets, and those which had remained unchanged, and which came to his hands, as they came to the hands of the first representative. If we examine the section under consideration, it makes no such difference. It does not say, that the executor or administrator, shall pay to the legatees, or distributees, as much as shall be due from their testator, or intestate, before any other debts whatever. It does not reverse the long established order of things, and give a preference under any circumstances, to a man's legatees, or distributees, over his own creditors; but declares, that the executors, or administrators of any person, "who shall have been chargeable with, or accountable for," "the estate of a dead person, committed to their testator, or intestate, by a court of record, shall pay so much as shall be due from their testator, or intestate, to the legatees, or persons entitled to distribution, before any proper debt of their testator, or intestate." The words, "to the legatees, or persons entitled to distribution," are not connected with the word "pay," but with the word "due." The law does not command, that payment shall be made to the distributees, or legatees, but, generally, that payment shall be made of what is "due to the legatees, or distributees of the dead person," "before any proper debt of their testator, or intestate." Payment shall be made, to whom? The act does not tell us, but the answer must be, to the person authorized by law to receive it. This person is the representative of the original testator, in whose hands this debt becomes assets, not distinguishable from other assets; not more liable than other assets to the claims of legatees, or distributees, nor less liable to the claims of creditors; for the law does not give any priority, except over the proper debts of the last testator, or intestate. For these reasons, I think it impossible to resist the conviction, that this section gives a priority to debts due to the estate of a dead person, committed to the hands of the last decedent in his lifetime, over the proper debts of such decedent, but interferes no farther with the subject. If, then, this suit had been instituted by the representative of Thomas Muse, against the representative of Elliott Muse, the defendant could not, if the foregoing reasoning be just, have resisted the claim, by setting up the payment of the proper debts of his testator, but would have been liable, in like manner, as if the suit had been instituted by the legatees, or distributees of Thomas Muse, against the present defendants. Is the defence the stronger, when made to a suit brought by the creditors? I think it is not. The right of the creditors to bring the suit, cannot be questioned. It is every day's practice, and has not been controverted in this case. If the right to sue be admitted, and the act of assembly, as has been already shown, attaches the superior dignity it gives, to the debt, and not to the character of the plaintiff, it follows, that if the debt be still due, and its priority has not been lost by any act of the creditor, it is of superior dignity to any proper debt of Elliott Muse, and the assets, which have been disbursed in the payment of such debts, have been wasted, and must still be accounted for, by the representative of Elliott Muse.

Decree.—The defendant, Zachariah U. Crittenden, administrator of Elliott Muse, exhibited to the court the copy of the record of the proceedings, in a suit now pending in the supreme court of chancery for the Williamsburg district, in which Richard M. Segar, sheriff and committee of the estate of Henry Heffernan, deceased, and others are plaintiffs, and the said Crittenden, as administrator of Elliott Muse and others, are defendants, and moved the court to set aside the decree rendered in this cause, on the 19th day of December, 1821, subjecting the assets in his hands, of the estate of Elliott Muse, for the payment of the claim of the plaintiff in this cause. And the court, on consideration of the said motion, doth order, that the same be overruled. And the court being of opinion, that the said decree of the 19th of December, 1821, ought to have directed, that the sum of money therein mentioned, and decreed to be paid by the said defendant, Zachariah U. Crittenden, administrator of Elliott Muse, out of the assets of his intestate in his hands to be administered, if not paid out of the assets of said intestate in his hands to be administered, should be paid out of the proper goods and chattels of the said Crittenden, doth adjudge, order, and decree, as additional to, and amendatory of the said decree, of the 19th of December, 1821, that the sum of money therein decreed to be paid, by the said Crittenden, administrator of Elliott Muse, if the same be not levied of the goods and chattels of the said Elliott Muse, in his hands to be administered, be levied of the proper goods and chattels of the said Crittenden.

[NOTE. For subsequent proceedings had herein, see Case No. 2,918.]

Case No. 2,918.

COATES v. MUSE et al.

[1 Brock. 551.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Virginia. Nov. Term, 1823.

LIABILITY OF EXECUTOR — PRIORITY OF DEBT OF DECEDENT—EQUITABLE TRANSFER OF DECREE.

1. There having been a joint decree in 1811, against E. M. and T. M., administrators of H. M., and one of the said administrators, T. M., having died, the survivor, E. M., was appointed his executor. To secure to the plaintiff in the decree the payment thereof, the surviving administrator, E. M., executed in 1813, a deed of trust, or mortgage, on a tract of land, which deed the attorney of the plaintiff accepted, and acknowledged under his hand, that the said E. M. was entitled to the benefit of the decree. The said deed, though held by the plaintiff's attorney, was never recorded, nor enforced by him, but on the contrary, the said E. M. sold the land, and he then died. On the books of E. M., as executor of T. M., were found two entries, by which he gave credit to himself, as such executor, for T. M.'s proportion of that decree, which entries amount to an admission, that the estate was no further liable, and that he, E. M., should pay the residue of the decree. Held: That as E. M. sold the land, and did not account for the proceeds, he became liable to the plaintiff in the same sum, as if the transaction had never taken place.

2. As to the liability of the estate of T. M. to the plaintiff. A decree, though not assignable at law, is yet transferable for valuable consideration, and a court of equity will support the transfer. If, therefore, the estate of T. M. had been represented by any other person than E. M., and such representative had, without knowledge of the fraudulent sale of the land, paid to E. M., the transferee of the decree, his proportion of the decree, the court would have sustained the payment: but as no money was really paid to the creditor, by the representative of T. M., and as E. M., who committed the fraud, was the executor of T. M., the creditor ought not (notwithstanding the entry of the credit aforesaid), to lose his recourse against the estate of T. M. But, as it was ascertained by the report of a commissioner, that E. M., as executor of T. M., was indebted to the estate of the latter, in the full sum claimed by the plaintiff, from the estate of T. M., and as the debt so due from the estate of E. M., to that of T. M., is one of the first dignity, under the act of assembly, the plaintiff should stand in the place of T. M.'s representative, and be considered as a creditor of the highest dignity, and obtain a decree directly against the representative of E. M., for the full amount due from that estate, to T. M.'s estate.

3. As to the balance (over and above the aforesaid sum due to T. M.'s estate) of the decree of 1811, now to be decreed against the representative of E. M. The effect of the agreement between the attorney of the plaintiff, (with the concurrence of his agent, or attorney in fact,) was to transfer the decree to E. M., and to put the mortgage as a substitute for the decree. The plaintiff could not, thereafter, proceed against either E. M., or T. M., on the decree, but on the mortgage alone. The debt, therefore, lost its dignity, and became as between the creditor, and representatives of E. M., a debt by specialty alone, and is to be postponed, in decreeing against those representatives, to other debts of greater dignity than specialties.

MARSHALL, Circuit Justice. On the 4th day of June, 1821, the court considering a bill filed in January, 1821, as being both a bill enjoining the decree rendered at the November term, 1820, and a petition for a rehearing, opened the decree rendered in November, 1820, and referred the accounts to the commissioner for a resettlement, with instructions to settle, also, the administration of the estate of Thomas Muse, by Elliott Muse. [Case No. 2,916.] In December, 1821, the commissioner made his report, which was taken up a few days thereafter, and a decree pronounced, directing Z. U. Crittenden, administrator, &c., of Elliott Muse, deceased, out of the assets of his testator, in his hands to be administered, to pay the plaintiff the sum of $3731.32, with interest on $3171.42, from the 20th of November, 1821, till paid; and the court reserved, to a future day, its decision on the ultimate responsibility of the parties. [Id. 2,917.] In May term, 1822, the said defendant, Z. U. Crittenden, administrator, &c., produced two records of suits, pending against him as administrator, in the state court, in Williamsburg, on claims of the highest dignity, and prayed, that the interlocutory decree of the preceding term, might be set aside. The court overruled this motion, and directed that decree to be satisfied out of the private estate of the said Crittenden, if assets of his intestate could not be found. The cause comes on again to be heard on all the papers, and it is contended by the defendant, Crittenden, administrator, &c., of Elliott Muse, that the original decree, pronounced, in 1811, against Elliott Muse and Thomas Muse, administrators of Hudson Muse, has lost its dignity, as against the representatives of those defendants, in consequence of a receipt and agreement, in these words: "Elliott Muse, Esq., has adjusted with me, by securing the same to be paid, the amount of the decree against the administrators of Hudson Muse, deceased, and is entitled to the benefit of the decree, as to that part of the debt, but not as to the house and lot in Urbanna, which is the fund for payment of the residue of the plaintiff's demand. Wm. C. Williams, Attorney for Plaintiff. 18th March, 1813." It was admitted before the commissioner, by the agent for the plaintiff, that a deed of trust or mortgage was, about this time, executed by the said Elliott Muse, to secure the payment of the decree, but that the said deed was held by the plaintiff's attorney, was never recorded or enforced; and it is admitted by Z. U. Crittenden, that Elliott Muse afterwards sold the land.

[1] [Reported by John W. Brockenbrough, Esq.]

The principle on which the decree of November, 1820, was opened in May term, 1821, was that the decree of May, 1811, ought to be apportioned equally on the estates of Elliott and Thomas Muse, unless the representatives of one of those estates, could show that the other ought to be charged with more than a moiety of that decree. That principle is still believed to be correct. The accounts, as now exhibited to the court, furnish no evidence on this subject, other than two entries on the books of Elliott Muse, as executor of Thomas Muse, in which he credits himself as follows: "1813, March 9th, to cash in discharge of testator's proportion of decree, Coates's Executrix v. Muse's Administrators, including interest and costs of suit, $2411.54½. June 19th, to amount of your proportion of a balance not charged in a former account of a decree in fed. ct. Muse's Administrator v. Coates's Executors, $1602.90."

The respective liabilities of Elliott and Thomas Muse, having been known only to themselves, this is the only testimony now attainable on this point. The entries of Elliott Muse cannot increase the liability of Thomas Muse, but may diminish it. If, therefore, these two sums which were obviously intended to comprise Thomas Muse's part of the decree be less than a moiety of the decree with interest and costs, these entries amount to an admission on the part of Elliott Muse, that the estate of Thomas Muse was not liable farther, and that he ought himself to pay the residue. This conclusion is rendered irresistible, by the circumstance, that at the date of the last entry, Elliott Muse considered the whole decree as being transferred to him by the paper of the 18th of March, 1813, executed by the attorney of the plaintiff, and of course, charged the estate of his testator with the whole sum for which it was liable on the decree. The deed of trust, which is supposed to be referred to in this paper of the 18th of March, 1813, is prepared in blank in one handwriting, and afterwards filled up in another. It is dated the 18th of March, 1811, three months before the decree was rendered, and is filled up to John Gray, agent for the plaintiff. It was, obviously from the expressions of the deed, filled up in the year 1813, before the 3d of June, and was probably filled up and executed on the 18th of March, 1813, when the receipt or assignment was executed. This deed having never been recorded, and Elliott Muse having sold the land, and received the money, for which he has never accounted, it is obvious, that he must remain liable to the plaintiff in the same sum as if this transaction had never taken place. Were Elliott Muse alive and solvent, there could be no difficulty in decreeing him to pay the whole sum. But he is dead insolvent, and the whole difficulty of the case consists in determining, how far the representative of Elliott Muse is chargeable with a devastavit for having paid debts of inferior dignity to the decree of the 3d of June, 1811. A decree is not, in law, assignable, but is like any other chose in action, transferable for a valuable consideration, and a court of equity will support the transfer. If, therefore, the estate of Thomas Muse, had been represented by any other than Elliott Muse, and such representative had, without knowledge of the fraud, paid his part of the decree to Elliott Muse, this court would unquestionably have sustained the payment. But as no money was really paid by the estate of Thomas Muse, nor any injury sustained by his estate, in consequence of this credit in his account by Elliott Muse; as the person committing the fraud was the representative of Thomas Muse, it seems unreasonable to deprive the creditor of his recourse against Thomas Muse, for so much as was equitably due from his estate. Had Elliott Muse never made this entry in his accounts, it would be admitted, that the liability of Thomas Muse remained; and I cannot think, that this entry changes his liability, unless it should appear that he has sustained an injury from it. The question of dignity is unimportant in this part of the case, because the estate of Thomas Muse is solvent. In a suit instituted in a court of chancery for the state, an account was taken of the administration of Elliott Muse, of the estate of Thomas Muse, and the balance reported against the executor, is $314.54¾. But this report is understood to credit the executor for the sum charged, as being paid to the executor of Coates. Those sums are, therefore, to be added to this balance, and they will leave Elliott Muse indebted to the estate of Thomas Muse, in the full sum now claimed by the plaintiff from the estate of Thomas Muse. This debt, from the representative of Elliott Muse, to the estate of Thomas Muse, is, undeniably, a debt of the first dignity.

It is contended on the part of the representative of Thomas Muse, that as all the parties are before the court, the representative of Elliott Muse, ought to be decreed to pay to the plaintiff, the sum due from the estate of Thomas Muse: and the court is of that opinion. The plaintiff, therefore, is in the place of a representative of Thomas Muse, as to that part of the decree, and is in virtue of the rights of that representative, a creditor of the highest dignity. Z. U. Crittenden, the administrator of Elliott Muse, deceased, will, therefore be directed to pay to the plaintiff, the sum of $——, that being the sum the plaintiff has a right to demand from the estate of Thomas Muse, and which is due to that estate, from the representative of Elliott Muse. The decree which ought to be pronounced against Z. U. Crittenden, the administrator of Elliott Muse, deceased, for the residue of the decree of the 3d of June, 1811, remains to be considered. It is contended by the plaintiff, that the whole transaction between William C. Williams, the attorney for the plaintiff, and Elliott Muse, on the 18th of March, 1813, ought to be considered as a nullity, in consequence of the fraud committed by Elliott Muse, in selling the mortgaged property, and converting the money to his own use. I cannot concur in this opinion. There is certainly no positive evidence of the concurrence of the plaintiff's agent, in the arrangement of the 18th of March, 1813, but when it is recollected, that the name of the agent is introduced into the deed of mortgage, that the agent himself, states the deed to have been executed, about the time the paper of the 18th of March was signed, that there must have been a free course of communication between the attorney at law, and the agent, I must conclude, that the agreement of the 18th of March, was made with the knowledge and consent of the agent. The effect of that agreement was, to take the deed of mortgage in satisfaction of the decree, and to transfer the decree itself, so far as relates to the question now before the court, to Elliott Muse. The motives for making this arrangement were, at the time, satisfactory to both parties, and the court has no right to suppose they were inadequate. The contract was, then, at the time, a fair and valid contract, the obligation of which, neither could controvert. Had an attempt been made, immediately to enforce the decree of 1811, the court would not have enforced it; and if the plaintiff could have proceeded without the aid of the court, she would have been enjoined. Had the deed been recorded, or had Elliott Muse abstained from selling the property, the plaintiff could never, in the face of the agreement of March, 1813, have proceeded on the original decree. She could only have proceeded on the mortgage. Had the mortgaged property been insufficient to satisfy the decree, the plaintiff could not have proceeded against Elliott or Thomas Muse, or their representatives, for the sum remaining unsatisfied. The neglect of the plaintiff to record her mortgage, and the fraud of Elliott Muse, in selling the property, and misapplying the money, leave Elliott Muse responsible on the deed of mortgage, but not on the original decree. The debt, therefore, is a debt by specialty only; and as the suits instituted in the state court, are for debts of higher dignity, than a debt by specialty, the claim of the plaintiff, for the debt due from Elliott Muse must be postponed, to the claims of some of the plaintiffs in the state court. The decree of the third of June, 1811, comprehended the sum of £429. 9s., equal to $1431.50, not then collected, but in suit. This sum was considered as assets in hand, because the parties expressed a confidence, that it would be collected, and because the counsel for the plaintiff assured the court, of an arrangement being made, by which the decree would not be enforced, till this money should be received. Under these representations, the court gave, improperly, a decree for the whole sum, as if the assets had been in the hands of the administrators. If this money has not been collected; and if the failure to collect it, arises from no default of the administrators—if due diligence has been used, this error in the decree of 1811, ought not to prejudice them, but ought now to be corrected.

Final Decree: This cause came on to be further heard, on the papers formerly read, and two abstracts of records filed by the defendants, and marked, respectively, Z. and Y., and was argued by counsel: on consideration whereof, the court confirming the report of Commissioner Barton, of the administration of the defendant, Robert Blakely, on the estate of Thomas Muse, and the first statement of the said commissioner, of the administration of the defendant, Z. U. Crittenden, on the estate of Elliott Muse, and being of opinion: 1st. That the outstanding claims, amounting to £429. 9s., which were considered in rendering the decree of the 3d of June, 1811, as part of the assets of Hudson Muse's estate, in the hands of his administrators, were not assets, as they had not been reduced to possession, and that they ought not to be considered assets, chargeable to the defendants, or their intestates, because they have not been collected, and the failure to collect them is not imputable to culpable neglect, and, therefore, that the amount of those claims ought to be deducted from the said decree of 3d of June, 1811, and that the plaintiff is entitled to an assignment, without recourse, from the administrator of Elliott Muse, of the said claims. 2dly. That the estate of Thomas Muse, is still responsible to the plaintiff, for that part of said decree of the 3d of June, 1811, that ought to have been paid by the said Thomas Muse, but that the estate of Thomas Muse is not responsible for more than the two sums of $2411.54, of the 13th of March, 1813, and $1602, of the 19th of June, 1813, charged to that estate, by Elliott Muse, in his account of his administration, on the estate of Thomas Muse, as the proportion of the said decree, payable by that decree. 3dly. That as it manifestly appears, that the estate of Elliott Muse, is, on account of his administration of the estate of Thomas Muse, indebted to that estate in a larger sum than is chargeable on Thomas Muse's estate, for the proportion of the plaintiff's claim, payable by Thomas Muse; and the responsibility of Elliott Muse's, to Thomas Muse's estate, being a debt of the first dignity, the estate of Elliott Muse should, as far as the assets extend, be, in the first instance, subjected to the payment of the plaintiff's claim, to the exoneration of the estate of Thomas Muse. And it appearing by a statement made, from the papers in the case, (which statement is marked "statement for final decree," and is received as a statement made by a commissioner,) that the balance due the plaintiff, after deducting the said claims of £429. 9s., and subsequent payment is $4735.32, with interest from 20th November, 1821, till paid; that the responsibility of the estate of Thomas Muse, for the said two sums of $2411.54, and $1602, in 1813, exceed the said balance due the plaintiff; that the amount of assets, for which the administrator of Elliott Muse is chargeable, is $3608.35 with interest on $3218.36, from 20th November, 1821: The court doth adjudge, order, and decree, that the defendant, Z. U. Crittenden, administrator, do, out of the assets of his intestate, &c., if so much thereof he hath, and if not, out of his own proper goods and chattels, pay to the plaintiff, $3608.35 with interest, on $3218.36, from 20th November, 1821, till paid, and one moiety of the costs of this suit: that the defendant, Robert Blakey, administrator of Thomas Muse, do out of the assets of his intestate in his hands, &c., if not, then out of his own proper goods and chattels, pay to the plaintiff, the sum of $1126.97 with interest, from 20th November, 1821, till paid, and the other moiety of the costs. And the court doth further order, &c., that Z. U. Crittenden, administrator of Elliott Muse, survivor of Thomas and Elliott Muse, administrator, with will annexed, of Hudson Muse, do assign to the plaintiff, or her duly authorized attorney, the said claims, evidenced by the said abstracts of records, marked Z and Y; but the assets to be without recourse against Crittenden. And liberty is reserved to the plaintiff, to apply to the court for a further decree against the administrator of Thomas Muse, for so much of the amount hereby decreed to be paid by the administrator of Elliott Muse, as the plaintiff may fail to obtain on that decree, from that administrator, or those responsible for his due administration of the assets of his intestate.

COBANKS v. The MIDLAND. See Case No. 12,068.

Case No. 2,919.

COBANKS v. The ROSLYN.

[The case reported under above title in 23 Int. Rev. Rec. 176, is the same as Case No. 12,068.]

Case No. 2,920.

In re COBB.

[1 N. B. R. (1868) 414 (Quarto, 106);[1] 1 Am. Law T. Rep. Bankr. 59.]

District Court, D. Indiana.

BANKRUPTCY—EXEMPTION—"HEAD OF FAMILY."

1. Section 14 of the bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 522; Rev. St. § 5045)] must be so construed that over and above the necessary household and kitchen furniture, the assignee may, in his discretion, exempt, in favor of the bankrupt, "such other articles and necessaries" as he may think right, so that such exemption, together with the household and kitchen furniture allowed to be retained by him, shall not exceed $500.

2. The fact that the wife may have, as her separate property, household and kitchen furniture in use in the house in which the bankrupt resides, can make no difference as to the amount of exempt property to be allowed him.

3. The bankrupt is also entitled to retain $300 worth of real or personal property as the exemption allowed by the state where he resides.

4. The assignee must select the property to be exempt under the bankrupt law, and should refuse to set apart mere articles of luxury, as gold watches or pianos, &c.

[Cited in Re Steele, Case No. 13,346.]

5. The bankrupt may select the property exempt under the state law, and it is for him to choose or reject articles of mere luxury.

[6. Cited in Re Taylor, Case No. 13,775, to the point that, to constitute a head of a family, it is not essential that a man shall have either a wife or child; it is enough if his household consist of hired servants.]

In the course of proceedings in this case, the question arose upon the setting apart, by the assignee, property under the exemption clause of the bankrupt law, and came before the judge for his decision.

McDONALD, District Judge. In June last, Van Buren Cobb, of Morgan county, Indiana, was declared a bankrupt by this court. The matter was then referred to the proper register; and subsequently, at a meeting of his creditors, William B. Taylor was appointed his assignee. Under the 14th section of the bankrupt act, the assignee set apart to Cobb certain property, as being exempted from the provisions of that act. Cobb had other property which he claimed as being also exempted; but the assignee disallowed his claim. To this ruling of the assignee the bankrupt excepted, and the exception thus taken is now before this court for decision. The ruling of the assignee was substantially as follows: "I allow you to retain, as exempt from the provisions of the 14th section of the act, and also in connection therewith, and under and by virtue of an act of the legislature of the state of Indiana, to exempt property from sale in certain cases, the sum of $300. I allow you the necessary provision on hand, amounting to $51.50, as shown by the appraisement. I refuse to allow you to retain any more property of any description whatever, for the following reasons, to wit: 1. Because your wife is owner in fee of 80 acres of land in this (Morgan) county, of the value of $1,000. Also, she is the owner of a house and lot—your residence—in Martinsville, in said county, of the value of $2,000. Also, she is the owner of parlor furniture in your house of the value of $123; one bed and bedding, $40; one set of queen's ware, $7; one old bureau, table, &c. $10; to which add value of real estate, $1,000. Total, $3,180. 2. Because, in my opinion, your condition, under these circumstances, is much better than that of a number of your creditors." By the record it appears that the $300 allowed by the assignee to Cobb, was allowed under the state law, and consisted of a title bond for the conveyance of certain real estate. The record also shows that all the other property of the bankrupt turned over to the assignees was of the value of $267, including household and kitchen furniture appraised at $175. The record also shows that the bankrupt is a householder in this state; and that his family consists of a wife and three small children. Whether, under these circumstances, and on a fair construction of the 14th section of the bankrupt act, the decision of the assignee was right, is the question before the court. The provisions of the section in question, so far as they touch the points under consideration, are as follows: "That there shall be exempted from the operation of the provisions of this section, the necessary household and kitchen furniture, and such other articles and necessaries of such bankrupt as the assignee shall designate and set apart, having reference in the amount to the family, condition, and circumstances of the bankrupt, but altogether not to exceed in value, in any case, the sum of $500; and also the wearing apparel of such bankrupt, and that of his wife and children, and the uniform, arms, and equipments of any person who is or has been a soldier in the militia or in the service of the United States; and such other property as now is, or hereafter shall be, exempted from attachment or seizure, or levy on execution, by the laws of the United States, and such other property not included in the foregoing exemption as is exempted from levy and sale upon execution, or other process or order of any court, by the laws of the state in which the bankrupt has his domicil, at the time of the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy, to an amount not exceeding that allowed by such state exemption laws in force in the year 1864."

[1] [Reprinted from 1 N. B. R. 414 (Quarto, 106), by permission.]

As, in almost every case of bankruptcy, question must arise on the meaning of the language above quoted, I venture to lay down the following rules for the guidance of assignees: First. Every bankrupt, who is a householder in this state is absolutely entitled to have his necessary household and kitchen furniture exempted from the operation of the bankrupt act, to any amount not exceeding $500. It is true that, under this rule, the furniture so exempted must be "necessary" household and kitchen furniture. It cannot be necessary, in the sense of the law, unless the bankrupt is a householder—the head of a family. It is not important to this purpose that he should have a wife or children; his household may consist of a servant or servants, or any person residing with him or under his control. And, in any such case the assignee must, in the first instance, judge and decide what particular articles are "necessary" and what are not. The act evidently intends that every bankrupt householder shall be permitted to retain as much household kitchen furniture as may be reasonably necessary to enable him to keep house in a plain and convenient manner, provided that the value of the whole shall not exceed $500. And I suppose that, in such case, the fact that the wife may have, as her separate property, household and kitchen furniture in use in the house in which the bankrupt resides, can make no difference. By the statutes of Indiana, such separate property does not belong to him; he has no right to its possession or control; and she may, at any moment, and against her husband's will, remove and dispose of it. Now it is not to be believed that the bankrupt act ever intended to make a bankrupt dependent on his wife for the necessary means of keeping house. I think, therefore, that in this case, the assignee erred in refusing to the bankrupt his necessary household and kitchen furniture, because his wife was the owner of some real estate and of $180 worth of household property. But, even if the wife's household effects ought to have been considered by the assignee, still I think he erred in refusing to allow the bankrupt to retain any portion of his necessary household and kitchen furniture. The whole of it amounted only to $175. The wife's property in the house was of little value,—parlor furniture, worth $123; a bed and bedding, worth $40; a set of queen's ware, worth $7; an old bureau and table, worth $10,—that is all. A court may, I think, very well take official notice that these articles did not compose all the "necessary" to enable a man to keep house with a wife and three young children. If to this the assignee had added the $175 worth of furniture belonging to the bankrupt, it would together only have amounted to $355 worth of household and kitchen furniture—surely little enough for the necessary furniture in the house of such a family. And if to all this we add the $51.50, allowed by the assignee as "provision," the whole would amount to no more than $406.50—$93.50 less than the act contemplates as exempt. Second. The act must be so construed, that over and above the necessary household and kitchen furniture, the assignee may, in his discretion, exempt in favor of the bankrupt, "such other articles and necessaries" as he may think right, so that such exemption, together with the household and kitchen furniture allowed to be retained by him, shall not exceed $500. But, under this rule, the assignee must, in the language of the act, "have reference in the amount to the family, condition, and circumstances of the bankrupt." In relation to "such other articles and necessaries" as fall within this rule, the assignee has a discretionary power; but in no other case arising under the 14th section of the act. And even here his discretion must be a sound, legal discretion. He should look to the policy and spirit of the law; and, in my opinion, he should in no case allow the bankrupt, under the words, "such other articles and necessaries," anything of mere luxury or ornament. Gold watches, pianos, and the like, for example, I think are not embraced in the discretionary powers of the assignee.

In the case under consideration, the assignee did, in the exercise of this discretionary power, permit the bankrupt to retain "provisions" of the value of $51.50. In this he did right. And under the last rule announced, he committed no error. Third. Every bankrupt who is a householder in this state, is absolutely entitled, over and above the exemptions already noticed, to retain, free from all claims in favor of creditors, property either personal or real, to the value of $300. This right arises from the provision in the 14th section of the bankrupt act, which excepts from its operation such property as by state laws may be exempted from levy and sale on execution. The act of the legislature of Indiana on this subject provides: "That an amount of property not exceeding in value $300, owned by any resident householder, shall not be liable to sale on execution or any other final process from a court for any debt growing out of, or founded on, any contract, express or implied." 2 Gavin & H. St. 368. Under this provision of our state law, thus made a part of the bankrupt act, every bankrupt householder is absolutely entitled to retain property to the value of $300, and he may select any property to that amount, whether it be real or personal, and whether it be articles of mere luxury and ornament, or such as are useful and necessary to the comfortable subsistence of himself and family. In this case, I do not enter into an inquiry whether this provision of the bankrupt act embodying state exemption laws is unconstitutional as not giving a "uniform law on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States," as required by the eighth section of the first article of the federal constitution. This may become a grave question for the court. But as it has not been urged in the present case, I give no opinion concerning it. In the case at bar, it appears that under the provision of the bankrupt act adopting the state law, the assignee has set apart to the bankrupt property of the value of $300. So far as this matter is concerned, therefore, I decide that he has committed no error. Upon the whole, the only error committed by the assignee, is his refusal to turn over to the bankrupt his $175 worth of household and kitchen furniture. As to this point only, his decision is reversed; and he is ordered forthwith to deliver to the bankrupt that furniture.

COBB (BUCK v.). See Case No. 2,079.

Case No. 2,921.

COBB et al. v. GLOBE MUT. LIFE INS. CO.

[3 Hughes, 452; 6 Reporter, 515; 2 Va. Law J. 52.] [1]

Circuit Court, E. D. Virginia. Dec. 3, 1877.

PRACTICE ON REMOVAL.

1. In order to remove a suit from a state court to a United States court, under the judiciary act of March 3d, 1875 [18 Stat. 470], the mere filing of the petition and bond in the state court by the party entitled to remove the suit is sufficient; and the jurisdiction to determine whether or not the case was removable and was properly removed, and a sufficient bond given, is in the United States circuit court, and not in the state court.

2. The United States circuit court in which the copy of the record of the state court in a removed suit must be filed, and in which the party making the removal must enter his appearance, is the court held at the place in which the suit in the state court was brought, or the place of holding the United States court most convenient to that place.

[3. Cited in Woolridge v. McKenna, 8 Fed. 667, to the point that the right of removal is lost where the transcript of record is not filed within the time prescribed by law, although the removal be obstructed by the state court refusing it.]

In equity. On the 12th November, 1877, the defendant company filed its petition in this court, of which the following is the material part: "Your petitioner, the Globe Mutual Life Insurance Company, a corporation duly incorporated by the laws of the state of New York, would respectfully represent to the court that, on the 3d of August, in the year 1877, Cora A. Cobb, Richard H. Cobb, Annie L. Cobb and Caroline F. Cobb, by L. R. Edwards, their next friend, sued out of the corporation court of the city of Norfolk, a summons against the petitioner, wherein it was required that the said company should answer a claim alleged to be due to the said plaintiffs upon a policy of insurance which the company had issued upon the life of one Henry V. Cobb, which said policy was for the sum of $5,000, alleging also in their declaration that the said H. V. Cobb had departed this life, and, therefore, the said policy is due and forfeited. Your petitioner would further state to the court, that William C. Carrington was retained as counsel for the company to attend to its interests in this cause. That the case was duly proceeded with and matured in the said corporation court of the city of Norfolk. That the counsel, William C. Carrington, was notified that the case was set for trial on a certain day, to wit, the 14th of September, 1877. That the said Carrington was at that time confined to his bed by sickness, and had been so for more than two months previous to that time. That it was wholly impossible for him to attend the trial of the cause on that day. That in consequence thereof he requested a member of the Richmond bar to go to Norfolk and state the condition in which he was, and to ask the court for a continuance until the next term of said court. That the attorney went to Norfolk and stated that he appeared not for the company, but for Mr. Carrington, who was unable to attend. The court refused to continue until its next term, but set the cause for hearing on the 18th of said month. It is proper to state here that this last appointment was with the consent of Mr. Carrington's representative. That up to this time no plea of any kind had been put in by the company. When the 18th of September came, it was still impossible for Mr. Carrington to appear, he being still confined to his bed, and he sent instructions to Messrs. McIntosh & Brooke to appear for the company, and at the same time requested them to make a motion for the removal of the cause to the United States court, upon the ground that the said company was a foreign corporation, and, therefore, entitled to said removal. This motion the court overruled, upon the ground that the company having once appeared and agreed that the cause should be tried on a certain day, thereby submitted to the jurisdiction, and consequently lost its right to a removal."

[1] [Reported by Hon. Robert W. Hughes, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission. 6 Reporter, 515, contains only a partial report.]

The following is the clerk's memorandum of proceedings in the cause in the state court:

"1877. — August Rules — Declaration and policy filed and common order.

"September Rules.—Common order confirmed and writ of inquiry.

"September 14.—Defendant appeared by attorney, and motion for continuance overruled. Motion to file two special pleas. Motion of plaintiff to reject special pleas sustained, and cause adjourned.

"September 19.—Verdict, judgment, and four bills of exceptions.

"September 22.—Fifth bill of exceptions filed.

"September term, 1877, of the corporation court adjourned September 25th, 1877.

"October 9.—Order of judge in vacation, suspending execution for sixty days upon notice given and statement by defendant of intention to apply to court of appeals for writ of error.

"October 17, 1877.—Bond under above order of 9th October given by defendant. Date of delivery of record to defendant's counsel, D. T. Brooke, a few days before the 7th of November, 1877, when the same was paid for.

"Teste: W. H. Hunter, C. C."

Memorandum of defendant's counsel: "Our recollection is, that the copy of the record was delivered to us on Saturday, 3d of November, and one of the pleas being omitted, we returned the record for correction Monday, November 5th, which was done at once, we think, the same day. McIntosh & Brooke."

On 12th of November, 1877, a writ of certiorari was issued by the clerk of the United States circuit court, on application of the defendant, to the clerk of the corporation court of Norfolk, returnable at Richmond forthwith. The plaintiff now (December 3d, 1877) moves to quash the writ of certiorari and dismiss the defendant's petition.

HUGHES, District Judge. The constitution of the United States extends the judicial power of the United States to "all controversies between citizens of different states," so far as it shall be vested by act of congress in the United States courts. Section 3 of the judiciary act of congress of March 3, 1875, provides that any suit in a state court in which there shall be a controversy between citizens of different states, and in which the value in controversy exceeds $500, may be removed into the circuit court of the United States for the district where the suit is pending, on the petition of any party to such suit. The act directs, that if such party files his petition for removal in the state court at the term at which the suit could be first tried and before the trial, and also files therewith a bond, with sufficient security, for his entering in said United States circuit court, on the first day of its then next session, a copy of the record in such suit, and for paying all costs that may be awarded by the said United States circuit court if its decision should be against him—it shall then be the duty of the state court to accept said petition and bond, and proceed no further in such suit. It further directs that, on the said copy being entered as aforesaid in said United States circuit court, the cause shall then proceed in the same manner as if it had been originally commenced in the said United States circuit court.

Section 5 provides, that if it shall at any time appear to the satisfaction of said United States circuit court, etc., that such suit does not really and substantially involve a controversy properly within its jurisdiction, or that the parties to said suit have been improperly or collusively made or joined for the purpose of creating a case cognizable or removable under this act, the United States circuit court shall proceed no further therein, but shall dismiss the suit, or remand it to the court from which it was removed. Section 7 provides that in the event that the session of the United States circuit court held next after the filing, in the state court, of the petition and bond for removal, should commence earlier than twenty days thereafter, then the party obtaining the removal may have twenty days within which to present the copy of the record to the said United States circuit court. This is the latest enactment of congress on the subject and revises all previous acts, and repeals them so far as they are inconsistent with its provisions. It will be seen that the constitution of the United States gives either party to a controversy, in which the parties are residents of different states, the privilege of having his rights determined by a court of the United States; and gives congress the authority to prescribe, by law, how and under what conditions that right may be exercised, in those cases where the suit has been brought in a state court. Section 3 of the judiciary act of 1875 makes the mere filing in the state court, of the petition and the bond, all that is necessary to stay the proceedings of the state court, and makes it "the duty of the state court," on this filing, to suspend its proceedings. Section 5, in as plain terms as the English language affords, gives to the United States circuit court complete jurisdiction to determine whether the suit was one that could be properly removed; and to decide, after making such determination, what to do with the suit; whether to proceed in it, or to remand it to the state court, or to dismiss it outright. Such is the spirit, such the language, such the intention, and such the force and effect of the act of congress of March 3, 1875 (18 Stat. 470–473), which being passed in pursuance of the paramount organic law, is thereby, as to this particular subject, paramount to any law of state enactment or adoption, relating to the jurisdiction of the state court. By the filing of the petition and bond in the state court, showing that the controversy is one "between citizens of different states," the jurisdiction of the state court from that moment ceases, and all that that court may do in the matter afterwards is coram non judice, null and void. The question of the sufficiency of the bond itself, the competency of the petition, the validity of the removal, and each and all questions arising upon the petition, are taken away by this law from the state court, and reserved by section 5 for the United States circuit court, to be passed upon in the exercise of the unembarrassed and undivided jurisdiction which this act gives it, under the authority of the constitution, over all "controversies between citizens of different states."

Practically, the action of the corporation court of Norfolk defeated the constitutional right to which the defendant company in this suit was entitled,—to have its controversy tried and determined in a federal court. The motion for removal on the 18th of September, accompanied by petition and bond, was overruled by that court, although it was in time, being made at the term of the state court "at which it would be first tried, and before the trial." I suppose that court acted on some law of congress relating to removals of suits, of prior date to the act of 1875 now in force. The mere fact that counsel not regularly employed, and acting for the regular counsel, who was sick in another city, had moved for a continuance on or about the first day of the term, had no effect in law on a question of constitutional right, and could not deprive the client of the moving counsel of his right to avail himself of the privilege of removal which he still had upon filing petition and bond at that term and before a trial. The effect of the refusal of the state court to allow the removal though nil in law, yet practically resulted in putting the defendant to the care and labor and expense of preparing for and going through a trial, and afterwards of securing an appeal to the appellate state court, from the decision against him of the corporation court of Norfolk.

The defendant by counsel, in argument, avers that in consequence of being thus preoccupied and engaged with the defence and appeal, it neglected to file a copy of the record of the state court in this court within the twenty days prescribed by the judiciary act of 1875, § 5. The record of the state court was not filed, either on the 1st of October, which was the commencement of the term of this court at Richmond, or within twenty days from the 18th of September in the court at Richmond, or in this court on the first day of its fall term at Norfolk, which was the 5th of November. Not having been filed within the time allowed by law, the suit has not been removed to this court.

I will say a word passim as to the place to which the suit should have been removed. The suit having been brought in the state court at Norfolk, the proper place to which it should have been removed was to the United States circuit court at Norfolk; and the proper time at which to file the record there was at the November term, which commenced on the 5th day of that month. The case was not properly removable to the United States circuit court at Richmond, the fall term of which began on the 1st of October. The plaintiff in the suit had a right to have the suit heard in the United States circuit court at the place at which it was brought, if a United States circuit court was held there; and it would have been erroneous for the defendant to have removed it to the United States circuit court at Richmond. The copy of the record of the state court not having been filed in the United States circuit court at Norfolk before the first day of its November term, nor the defendant's appearance entered there on that day, it follows that the suit has not been removed in the manner prescribed by the judiciary act of 1875, and this court is, therefore, without jurisdiction to entertain or proceed in it.

The fact that the defendant lost his right of removal in consequence of the action of the state court, cannot operate in any way to confer upon this court a jurisdiction which was not secured to it by a compliance, on defendant's part, with the requirements of the act of 1875. He should have filed his record and entered his appearance on the first day of the November term of this court at Norfolk, independently of and notwithstanding the action of the state court. It is to be regretted that the defendant has lost a constitutional right; but there is no power of redress lodged in this court under the circumstances attending this case. The right of choosing the forum is given by the constitution and laws to either party to the controversy. It is the will of the party, expressed in the manner prescribed by law, which determines the forum; and his expression of that will ought not to be treated by the state court as an act invidious towards itself. Though in form the party chooses between courts, his choice is really a preference between a jury selected, as in the United States court, from a large district of country, and a jury selected, as in the state court, from a single county or town. It is the will of the party to the suit, I repeat, which determines the forum which shall try and decide the controversy. Unless that will is expressed to the contrary, the state court has full jurisdiction of the suit and of all questions incidental to it. After its expression, this full jurisdiction passes by the will of the petitioner, and not by any seeking of the federal court, to the federal forum. The federal court has then no more power to decline the jurisdiction than the state court to retain it. Nothing could be more unseemly than a struggle between the two courts for a jurisdiction which the law and constitution of the land makes subject alone to the bona fide volition of either party to the controversy. For a long time congress gave this right to the non-resident defendant alone—not exhausting the power and discretion intrusted to it by the national constitution. Now, however, that right is given to "either party" (18 Stat. 471, § 2,) to a controversy between citizens of different states, whether resident or non-resident, whether plaintiff or defendant. The enlargement thus of this right by congress is in pursuance of an express provision of the national constitution as it came from its illustrious framers in 1787, and is not a just ground of criticism or complaint by any state court. The motion to quash the writ of certiorari and to dismiss defendant's petition is therefore granted.

Case No. 2,922.

COBB v. HAMLIN.

[3 Cliff. 191;[1] 8 Int. Rev. Rec. 121.]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. Term, 1868.

CUSTOMS DUTIES—ACT OF MARCH 3, 1865—DUTIABLE VALUE—MARKET VALUE.

1. Under the act of the 3d of March, 1865 [13 Stat. 493], the dutiable value of imported merchandise is the actual market value, or wholesale price thereof at the period of exportation to the United States, in the principal markets of the country from which the same was exported, without any addition for commissions, brokerage, costs of transportation, shipment, or transshipment, or other like costs in placing the goods on shipboard.

2. Where goods are purchased in the foreign market in bulk, and subsequently to the purchase put into the packages, boxes, or coverings by the buyer for convenience or preservation, actual market value does not include such packing, under the act of March 3, 1865.

[Cited in Meyers v. Shurtleff, 23 Fed. 579. Explained in Oberteuffer v. Robertson, 24 Fed. 853.]

[3. Cited in Harding v. Whitney, Case No. 6,052, as to the rule for assessing duties under the provisions of the act of August 30, 1842, § 16 (5 Stat. 563), by which all costs and charges are to be included in the actual "market value."]

At law. Assumpsit [by Samuel C. Cobb against Hannibal Hamlin] to recover certain duties paid under protest. Facts agreed, of which the following are the material ones:—Five invoices of lemons and oranges packed in boxes were imported from Palermo, Sicily, into the port of Boston, and were duly entered for consumption or warehousing by the plaintiff, as consignee of the respective invoices. They were imported and entered at the custom-house between the 18th of November, 1865, and the 14th of April, 1866. The parties agreed that the lemons and oranges were purchased at Palermo by the shippers in bulk, at certain rates by the thousand, and were then "one by one" wrapped in paper and packed in boxes furnished by the purchaser, for the purpose of preserving the fruit, and for more convenient shipment. The net cost and value of the lemons and oranges in bulk, embraced in the five invoices, was, at the place of exportation, $8,549, exclusive of the cost of the boxes and packing; and all other costs and charges for the boxes, nails, packing-paper, charges of shipment, and other charges, besides the cost and value of the lemons and oranges imported, were $7,852 [as shown by the agreed statement].[2] The finding of the appraisers was, that the invoice value of the cost of the lemons and oranges was, as purchased in bulk, correct, but they added the sum of $7,872, as the costs and charges for the boxes and packing, etc., and for the other charges, which was agreed to be correct in amount, if it was properly to be added, in ascertaining the dutiable value of the merchandise. The amount of the duties assessed and collected was $3,836.75, of which $1,864.50 were assessed on the costs and charges, added to the invoice value. The plaintiff duly protested, and seasonably appealed to the secretary of the treasury, but the department affirmed the doings of the collector. Dissatisfied with the decision of the department, the plaintiff instituted this suit to recover back the duties assessed upon the costs and charges, which he insisted were illegally exacted. Judgment was to be rendered in favor of the plaintiff for that sum, if none of the costs and charges, as expressed in the invoices, were properly added to the invoice value of the lemons and oranges, in order to ascertain the dutiable value of the importation, with interest from such time as the court might determine to be just and right. But if the court should be of the opinion that the whole amount of the costs and charges was properly added to the invoice value of the oranges and lemons, as purchased in bulk, then the judgment was to be for the defendant.

[1] [Reported by William Henry Clifford, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

Jewell and Gaston, for plaintiff.

The words "actual market value" and "wholesale price" have received judicial construction, and this construction excludes costs, charges, and boxes, etc. Barnard v. Morton [Case No. 1,005]; Grinnell v. Lawrence [Id. 5,831]; Wilson v. Maxwell [Id. 17,824]; Wilbur v. Lawrence [Id. 17,635]; Belcher v. Linn, 24 How. [65 U. S.] 535; Knight v. Schell, 24 How. [65 U. S.] 530; Reg. Treas. Dept. 1857, p. 177, § 305; Id. p. 177, § 306; Id. p. 193, § 364. Under former laws which included costs and charges in the dutiable value, the "sacks, hogsheads, etc." were included in the costs and charges, and were added to the appraised value of the commodity. Belcher v. Linn, 24 How. [65 U. S.] 535, and other cases cited above. That it was the intention of congress to create a new and different rule, which should exclude all costs and charges from the dutiable value, is seen by comparing the phraseology of the seventh section of the act of 1865 with that of previous acts. 1. Compare first part of section 7, Act 1865 [13 Stat. 493], with section 1, Act March 3, 1851 (9 Stat. 629). 2. Compare same with section 16, Act Aug. 30, 1842 (5 Stat. 563). 3. Compare the rest of section 7, Act 1865, beginning at twelfth line, with section 23, Act June 30, 1864 (13 Stat. 226).

If a subsequent statute professes, or manifestly intends, to regulate the whole subject to which it relates, it repeals all former statutes so far as it differs from them. Daviess v. Fairbairn, 3 How. [44 U. S.] 636; Dexter & Limerick Plank-Road Co. v. Allen, 16 Barb. 15; Illinois & M. Canal v. Chicago, 14 Ill. 342. If the act of 1865 contained no repealing clauses, it would make a complete and perfect rule for assessing duties on the merchandise in question, excluding all costs and charges, and would by necessary implication repeal all previous statutes providing a different rule. Farr v. Brackett, 30 Vt. 344. But the act of 1865 goes further, and in express terms repeals the act of 1864; and all acts and parts of acts requiring duties to be assessed upon commissions, brokerages, costs of transportation, shipment, and other like costs and charges incurred in placing any goods, wares, or merchandise on shipboard, and all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with its provisions. All acts which provide a different rule for assessing duties are inconsistent with the act. The words "costs and charges" include boxes. Barnard v. Morton [Case No. 1,005]; Belcher v. Linn, 24 How. [65 U. S.] 535; Knight v. Schell, 24 How. [65 U. S.] 530.

"Laws imposing duties are never construed beyond the natural import of the language used, and duties are never imposed upon the citizens upon doubtful interpretations, for every duty imposes a burden upon the public at large, and is construed strictly, and must be made out in a clear and determinate manner from the language of the statute." Adams v. Bancroft [Case No. 44]; Powers v. Barney [Id. 11,361]. "Revenue and duty acts are to be construed according to the true import and meaning of their terms; and when the legislative intention is ascertained, that, and that only, is to be our guide in interpreting them." U. S. v. Breed [Id. 14,638]. "Statutes levying duties on citizens or subjects are to be construed most strongly against the government, and in favor of the citizen." U. S. v. Wigglesworth [Id. 16,690]; U. S. v. Morse [Id. 15,820]. "As congress wishes to foster an honest and honorable commerce by its laws, no less than to obtain revenue, it is neither the true policy nor the right of departments or of the courts, nor is it presumed to be their desire, to thwart the views of congress, or embarrass mercantile business when not attended by equivocation and fraud, or to throw doubts or difficulties over the liberal course proper to be pursued generally towards the community in any branch of trade." Marriott v. Brune, 9 How. [50 U. S.] 635.

[2][From 8 Int. Rev. Rec. 121.]

W. A. Field, Asst. U. S. Atty.

1. Some of the statutes relating to the dutiable value of merchandise and what are to be included in making up the value on which ad valorem duties were or are to be levied are the following: Section 17, c. 5, 1789 (1 Stat. 41); section 39, c. 35, 1790 (1 Stat. 167); section 3, c. 17, 1795 (1 Stat. 411); section 61, c. 22, 1799 (1 Stat. 673); chapter 51, 1817 (3 Stat. 369); section 4, c. 79, 1818 (3 Stat. 434); section 5, c. 21, 1823 (3 Stat. 732); sections 7, 15, c. 227, 1832 (4 Stat. 591, 593); section 16, c. 270, 1842 (5 Stat. 563); section 1, c. 38, 1851 (9 Stat. 629); section 28, c. 68, 1861 (12 Stat. 197); section 24, c. 171, 1864 (13 Stat. 217); repealed by section 4, c. 80, 1865 (13 Stat. 493); section 9, c. 298, 1866 (14 Stat. 330).

Up to 1823 the cost was the basis of dutiable value, a percentage was usually added, and the cost of outside packages was in general excluded; by the act of 1823 (section 5) the actual cost if purchased; the actual value if procured otherwise than by purchase, and at the time and place when and where the merchandise was purchased or procured; the appraised value if appraised, with all charges added, except insurance, made the dutiable value. Section 15 of act of 1832 is substantially the same as the section 5, Act 1823, except the addition of a percentage is omitted. Section 16, Act 1842, makes the dutiable value the actual market value or wholesale price, at the time when purchased, in the principal markets of the country, with all costs and charges, except insurance, added, including charge for commissions. Section 9, Act 1851, extends to all merchandise whether purchased or not, and makes the period of exportation the time, and no other material changes. Section 28, c. 68, 1861, makes day of actual shipment the time, the words "period of exportation" having been held to be the day of sailing. Section 24, c. 171, 1864, makes the actual value of such goods on shipboard at the last place of shipment the dutiable value, adding the cost of transportation from the place of growth, etc., of shipment or transshipment, and all expenses included by land or water to the vessel in which shipment is made to the United States, the value of the sack, box, or covering of any kind, commission, etc., brokerage, export duties, and all costs and charges paid or incurred for placing such goods on shipboard, and all other proper charges specified by law. Section 7, c. 80, 1865, makes the actual market value or wholesale price at the period of exportation to the United States, in the principal markets of the country whence exported, the dutiable value, and expressly repeals the section 24, of the act of 1864, and all acts or parts of acts requiring duties assessed upon commission, brokerage, cost of transportation, shipment, transshipment, and other like costs and charges incurred in placing the merchandise on shipboard, and repeals all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act. This act took effect on April 1, 1865, and the seventh section remained in force until the act of July 28, 1866, section 9 of which (14 Stat. 330) substantially enacts the section 24 of the act of 1864, except the one makes the actual value on shipboard at the last place of shipment the dutiable, and the other, the actual wholesale price or general market value, at the time of exportation, in the principal markets of the country from whence the same shall have been imported, the dutiable value. The main change in the law of 1865, from that of 1864, is a return to the system of valuation on the basis of the market values in the principal markets of the country, and not a valuation of actual value at the last place of shipment, made up of the actual value at the place of growth, with the charges of transportation and shipment added. There is no express repeal of either the act of 1851 or the act of 1842. General Regulations, pp. 76, 77; also section 370. And such are the decisions of the courts. Barnard v. Morton [supra]; Gant v. Peaslee [Case No. 5,212]; Warren v. Peaslee [Id. 17,198].

Excepting commission, brokerage, and insurance, there were two classes of costs and charges, the first being the costs and charges of putting the merchandise into the form in which it entered into trade and commerce, as putting lemons into boxes; and the second being the cost of transporting this merchandise to the place of shipment and putting it on board. In the law of 1865, it seems to have been regarded that the importation began when the merchandise began to be transported. Section 9 names commission, brokerage, cost of transportation, shipment, transshipment, and other like costs and charges incurred in placing any goods, wares, and merchandise on shipboard.

Repeals by implication are not favored, and are carried no further than direct and absolute repugnancy or inconsistency requires. The section 9, of the act of 1865, is not repugnant to either the act of 1842 or 1851, in the matter of adding the first class of charges in making up the dutiable value, and the language of the section 9, by a well-known rule of construction, excludes any such intention. The section 31, of the act of 1861, expressly repeals all acts and parts of acts repugnant to its provisions, and section 28 of the same act is, that the duty shall be estimated upon the value on the day of actual shipment; yet the practice of the department was, to regard the act of 1861 as only changing, in the specified cases, the time to which the valuation relates, from the period of exportation to the day of actual shipment, as the act of 1851 had changed the act of 1842, which in certain cases fixed the time when the merchandise was purchased as the time to which the valuation relates, and the department insisted upon the same addition of costs and charges under the act of 1861, as under the acts of 1851 and 1842.

This question is very different from one that arises under specific duties, that is, where the law imposes a duty of five cents per pound on merchandise. The law may establish an arbitrary tare for boxes, barrels, and bales, and then the rule established by law must prevail; but in the absence of all law expressly establishing the tare, it might perhaps be held that the five cents per pound is leviable only upon the net weight. See Wilson v. Maxwell [Case No. 17,824]. This case is also distinguishable from a case where the merchandise is for convenience packed in a box, which merchandise is not customarily bought and sold by the box, and a box of which has no well-known commercial meaning. Oranges and lemons in boxes are for commercial and tariff purposes like molasses in hogsheads, or liquors in casks, barrels, and bottles; the boxes, hogsheads, casks, barrels, and bottles are not regarded as independent importations, and are not dutiable as such, but as incidental and annexed to their contents, forming altogether well-known articles in commerce and trade.

CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice. Collectors of the customs within whose districts merchandise subject to an ad valorem rate of duty was imported or entered, were required by the act of the 3d of March, 1865, to cause the actual market value or wholesale price thereof, at the period of the exportation to the United States, in the principal markets of the country from which the same was imported into the United States, to be appraised, and the act provided that such appraised value should be considered the value upon which the duty should be assessed. 13 Stat. 493.

Throughout the period of these importations the act of the 3d of March, 1865, was in full force and operation. Reference to the ninth section of the act will show that it went into operation on the 1st of April after it was passed, and it continued in force until the 10th of August of the following year. 14 Stat. 328. Actual market value of imported merchandise subject to any ad valorem rate of duty was required by the sixteenth section of the act of the 30th of August, 1842, to be estimated, ascertained, and appraised as it was in the principal markets of the country from which the same was imported, and at the time when the merchandise was purchased, and the provision was, that to such value or price should be added, as the true value upon which the duties should be assessed, all the costs and charges, except insurance, and including in every case a charge for commissions at the usual rates. 5 Stat. 563.

The same provision was incorporated into the appraisement act of the 3d of March, 1851, except that the requirement in that act is, that the actual market value or wholesale price of the merchandise shall be appraised, estimated, and ascertained at the period and place of exportation. 9 Stat. 629. Costs and charges, as distinguished from the actual market value of the merchandise, were under those acts properly added to such market value, as the means of ascertaining the dutiable value of the importation at the port where the merchandise was entered. Knight v. Schell, 24 How. [65 U. S.] 531. Whenever a properly certified bill of lading is presented, showing the day of actual shipment, the twenty-eighth section of the act of the 2d of March, 1861, provides that the duty shall be estimated and collected on the day of actual shipment. 12 Stat. 197.

In determining the valuation of goods imported from foreign countries, the twenty-fourth section of the act of the 30th of June, 1864, provides that the actual value of such goods on shipboard at the last place of shipment to the United States shall be deemed the dutiable value, except in certain cases not necessary to be noticed. Such value, the same section provides, shall be ascertained by adding to the value of the goods at the place of growth, production, or manufacture, the cost of transportation, shipment, and transshipment, with all the expenses incurred from the place of growth, production, or manufacture, whether by land or water, to the vessel in which shipment is made to the United States, and the value of the sack, box, or covering of any kind in which such goods are contained, commission at the usual rate, in no case less than two and one half per centum brokerage, and all export duties, together with all costs and charges paid or incurred for placing said goods on shipboard, and all other charges specified by law. 13 Stat. 217. Comment upon that provision is unnecessary, as it is clear that if the respective importations in this case had been made under it, the plaintiff would have no claim to recover back any portion of the duties assessed by the collector. But the lemons and oranges in this case were imported under the act of the 3d of March, 1865, which required the collector within whose district the same were entered to cause the actual market value or wholesale price thereof at the period of the exportation to the United States, in the principal markets of the country from which the same was imported, to be appraised; and the same section also provides in express terms "that such appraised value shall be considered the value upon which the duty shall be assessed." Still the views of the department might be sustained if the twenty-third section had been continued in force; but that section is in terms repealed by the second provision of the seventh section of the act under which the respective importations were made. 13 Stat. 494. Section seven also enacts that all acts and parts of acts requiring duties to be assessed upon commissions, brokerage, cost of transportation, shipment, transshipment, and other like costs and charges incurred in placing any goods, wares, or merchandise on shipboard, shall be repealed, and expressly provides, in conclusion, that all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

Expressed, as the intention of congress is in that provision, in plain and unambiguous language, it furnishes the absolute rule of decision which is obligatory upon the court. Under that provision, therefore, the dutiable value of imported merchandise is the actual market value or wholesale price thereof at the period of exportation to the United States, in the principal markets of the country from which the same was imported into the United States, without any addition for commissions, brokerage, costs of transportation, shipment, or transshipment, or other like costs and charges in placing the goods on shipboard.

If any confirmation of this view be needed, except what is derived from the language employed, it is found in the fact that congress on the 28th of July, 1866, re-enacted in substance and legal effect the provision requiring that all such costs and charges should be added to the actual market value, as the basis for the assessment of the duties. 14 Stat. 330. Considered in any point of view, it is quite clear that the dutiable value of merchandise imported between the 1st of April, 1865, and the 10th of August of the following year, when the existing act went into operation, was only the actual market value thereof, to be appraised, estimated, and ascertained as before explained.

Such being our conclusion, it only remains to ascertain whether the costs and charges in this case are properly to be regarded as an element of the actual market value of the merchandise within the meaning of that act of congress. Some descriptions of goods are purchased and sold in the foreign market in bulk, and are subsequently to the purchase and sale put into boxes, packages, or coverings, by the purchaser, for the preservation of the merchandise and the convenience of shipping. Other descriptions are put into boxes, packages, or coverings by the producer, manufacturer, or wholesale merchant in the foreign country, and the merchandise is there purchased and sold for exportation in the boxes, packages, or coverings in which it is so placed by the producer, manufacturer, or wholesale merchant. The actual market value in the former case does not include the cost of the box, package, or covering within the meaning of that act of congress, as the boxes, packages, or coverings in such cases are purchased by the shipper, as the means of preserving the goods, and for the convenience of shipment. But no doubt is entertained that the words "actual market value," without more, would include the cost of the box, package, or covering in all cases where the merchandise in question was actually purchased in the box, package, or covering, and is usually so purchased and sold for shipment in the foreign market, and where the price includes the box, package, or covering as well as the goods therein contained. Barnard v. Morton [Case No. 1,005]; Grinnell v. Lawrence [Id. 5,831]; Belcher v. Linn, 24 How. [65 U. S.] 535; Knight v. Schell, 24 How. [65 U. S.] 530; Wilson v. Maxwell [Case No. 17,824].

The defendant as well as the plaintiff agrees, that the general custom of shippers of lemons and oranges at Palermo is, if the fruit is purchased in bulk, to have it packed in boxes for shipment in substantially the same manner as the lemons and oranges were packed in this case. All of the lemons and oranges in this case were purchased in bulk at a certain rate by the thousand, and were afterwards selected and packed "one by one" in boxes, and transported to the place of shipment. Evidently the expense of the boxes and the labor of selecting and packing the fruit were wholly separate from the price paid in the purchase of the same, and it is equally clear that it was incurred to preserve the fruit, and for the convenience of shipment. Undoubtedly such fruit is usually bought and sold here, by wholesale merchants and jobbers, in the boxes, and without any additional charge for the box, but that circumstance cannot affect the question under consideration, as the inquiry is as to the actual market value or wholesale price of the merchandise in the principal markets of the country from which the same was imported.

Judgment for the plaintiff for the sum of $1,864.50, with interest from the time of actual payment.

Case No. 2,923.

COBB v. HAYDOCK et al.

[Brunner, Col. Cas. 91;[1] 4 Day, 472.]

Circuit Court, D. Connecticut. 1810.

SET-OFF—JOINT DEBT AGAINST INDIVIDUAL DEBT.

Where a judgment has been obtained against one of two joint makers of a promissory note, by an indorsee thereof, the former cannot, either at law or in equity, set off a note given by the payee to him individually.

This was a bill in equity praying for a set-off. The case, as it appeared from the bill and answer, was as follows: "The respondents [Henry Haydock & Son] recovered judgment before this court, at this term, against the complainant [Judethan Cobb] in a suit in the name of Stephen Howard, brought on a promissory note for $1,016.68, executed by the complainant and Ashbel Stanley, dated the 24th of February, 1796, payable to Howard on the 1st of October following, with interest after six months. On the 22d of December, 1795, the respondents sold goods to Howard to the amount of £371 9s. 10d. New York currency, on credit; and on the 26th of

[1] [Reported by Albert Brunner, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

April following they received from him said note in payment, it being agreed that the surplus should be paid in goods at that time, which were accordingly delivered. Stanley was present at this transaction. One of the respondents asked him if the note was good, and would be paid, to which he answered in the affirmative, observing that he was as willing to pay it to them as to any one. Soon after the assignment of the note the respondents directed their clerk to give notice to the complainant, which they believe was done without delay. The complainant, however, denied having received notice of the assignment until October, 1796. On the 24th of March, 1796, Howard being justly indebted to the complainant in the sum of £100 lawful money of Connecticut, to secure the payment thereof gave his promissory note for that amount, payable to the complainant on demand, with interest after fourteen months. On the 1st of April, 1796, Howard became insolvent, and absconded, having never paid any part of this note. Stanley is a certificated bankrupt, and the complainant has no remedy at law that will be available. The respondents, at the time they received the note first mentioned, had no knowledge of Howard's indebtedness to the complainant, or that he had ever given him a note as above stated. They avowed their intention to sue out execution on the judgment against the complainant. The bill therefore prayed the court, as a court of chancery, to decree the said sum of £100, and interest may be set off and applied in part satisfaction of said judgment, and to grant an injunction for a stay of proceedings.

J. T. Peters, for complainant, contended that the court ought to decree a set-off in this case, on the principle that an assignee takes a note subject to the same equity to which it was subject in the hands of the assignor. Haydock & Son had no more right here than Howard would have had if he had retained the note. In that case there could not have been a question as to the complainant's right of set-off. The case of Mitchell v. Oldfield, 4 Term R. 123, was cited.

Mr. Daggett, for respondents, said that a note executed in Connecticut, and negotiated in New York, might, in the state of New York, be sued in the name of the assignee. Lodge v. Phelps, 1 Johns. Cas. 139. Stanley told Haydock & Son at the time of the assignment that the note was due, and he was willing to pay it. The declarations of Stanley are to be imputed to Cobb. The acknowledgment of one co-partner saves a debt out of the statute of limitations. Whitcomb v. Whiting, Doug. 652. Set-offs are made only in case of mutual debts between the same parties. This is true in chancery as well as in law. Ex parte Ockenden, 1 Atk. 237. If I have a note against B. and afterwards execute a note payable to him or order, that he may sell it and raise money, and yet neglect to deduct my own note against him, it is more equitable for me to pay the note thus sold, than for the assignee to lose it.

LIVINGSTON, Circuit Justice. In deciding this cause we shall have no reference to the case of Lodge v. Phelps [supra]. Who has the greatest equity to this money, Cobb or Haydock & Son? The note in question is a joint note against Cobb and Stanley. Before receiving an assignment Haydock & Son consult Stanley, and are assured that the note will be paid. Haydock & Son then sell their goods on the specific security of this note. Cobb stands in a different situation. He trusted to the personal security of Howard. The equity of the case is most clearly in favor of Haydock & Son. But if this case were to be decided at common law the result would be the same. Here is a joint note against Cobb and Stanley. Howard's note to Cobb alone could not have been set off at law against the note of Cobb and Stanley to him, if no assignment had been made. The note of Howard is not reduced to judgment, and therefore the case of Mitchell v. Oldfield [supra] does not apply. Bill dismissed with costs.

Case No. 2,924.

COBB v. HOWARD et al.

[3 Blatchf. 524.] [1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Sept. 23, 1856.[2]

ADMIRALTY — BREACH OF CONTRACT OF PASSAGE — SUIT BY TRANSFEREE OF TICKET.

1. It is every day's practice, in the admiralty, to allow suits to be brought in the name of the assignee of a chose in action.

[Quoted in The Sarah J. Weed, Case No. 12,350. Cited in Minturn v. Alexandre, 5 Fed. 119.]

2. The transferee of a passage-ticket can bring an action in personam in his own name, in the admiralty, for a breach of the contract contained in the ticket.

3. Where A. contracted, at New York, to have a vessel at Panama at a certain time, to carry passengers to San Francisco, and received their fare in advance, but the vessel, being disabled, by stress of weather, on her voyage from New York to Panama, did not arrive there by the time specified, held, that this was no excuse for the non-fulfilment of the contract, and that A. was liable to return the passage-money.

4. Until a passenger becomes connected with a vessel as a passenger on board, he is in no way subject to her casualties or misfortunes occurring through stress of weather or otherwise.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the southern district of New York.]

This was a libel in personam, filed in the district court, to recover the sum of $1,500

[1] [Reported by Samuel Blatchford, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

[2] [Affirming Case No. 2,925.]

and interest, for the breach of a contract, made at New York, to convey ten passengers in the steamship New Orleans from Panama to San Francisco, the vessel to leave on her trip in the month of April, 1850. The fare paid was $150 for each passenger, and an engagement was given for each passage in the form of a ticket. The ten purchasers presented themselves at Panama on the 1st of April, to take their passage; but the vessel had not then arrived, and did not arrive till the month of August following. She left the port of New York in February, but encountered rough and stormy weather, and was obliged to put into St. Thomas for repairs, where she was detained a long time; and this was probably known to the passengers at Panama. The brig Anna, belonging to the libellant [William Cobb] was at that place in April, and sailed from thence to San Francisco on the 3d of the month. The ten passengers took passage in her, and transferred their tickets to her master for their fare, and he transferred them to the libellant. The district court decreed in favor of the libellant [Case No. 2,925], and the respondents [John T. Howard and others] appealed to this court.

Welcome R. Beebe and Charles Donohue, for libellant.

Francis B. Cutting and John Sherwood, for respondents.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. It is objected that this suit is not brought in the name of the original parties to the contract; but it is every day's practice, in the admiralty, to allow suits to be brought in the name of the assignee of a chose in action. The libellant is the real owner of the tickets, and, therefore, the proper person to bring the suit, and in his own name.

It is also objected, that the disabling of the New Orleans by stress of weather excuses the fulfilment of the contract at the time provided for. How this might be in a case where the passenger was on the vessel at the time of the casualty which caused the delay in the voyage, it is not now necessary to determine. Certainly, until the passenger becomes connected with the vessel as a passenger on board, he is in no way subject to her casualties and misfortunes, occurring through stress of weather or otherwise. He is a stranger to her. The contract bound the owner to have his vessel at the place and time designated. He had stipulated that as part of the consideration for the price paid, and had assumed the responsibility of performance; and the failure operated as a breach of the engagement, and made him liable to return the price paid. The winds and waves, or the weather, are no excuse for the non-fulfilment of the contract as to the time of the commencement of the voyage. If those circumstances had been intended as elements of it, they should have been expressly provided for by the owner; and then all parties concerned would have understood it.

It is said that the passengers should have waited at Panama through the month of April, and that the owner had the whole month to furnish his vessel there. Admitting that he had the month, the utmost that can be claimed is, that the passengers took the risk, if the vessel arrived within the month, of losing their right to demand a return of the fare. There was no abandonment of the voyage, for the tickets for the passage-money were appropriated to the completion of it. The passengers doubtless knew the disabled condition of the New Orleans, and that she could not arrive at Panama in time to fulfil her engagement; and it would have been an idle act to have waited through the month, especially as there seems to have been no provision made by the owners for the substitution of another vessel, nor indeed, for aught that appears, any interest or concern taken in the matter.

The decree below was right, and should be affirmed.

Case No. 2,925.

COBB v. HOWARD et al.

[10 N. Y. Leg. Obs. 353.]

District Court, S. D. New York. April 30, 1852.[1]

ADMIRALTY—BREACH OF CONTRACT OF PASSAGE—SUIT BY ASSIGNEE OF PASSENGERS—JOINDER OF DEMANDS—PLEADING AND PROOF.

1. The assignee of a maritime contract, not negotiable, may sue upon it in admiralty in his own name; and may unite in one action several demands against the same defendant, although derived from different assignees.

2. A ticket issued by a ship owner, acknowledging the receipt of money for a passage in the ship, imports an engagement on his part to give the conveyance, and on failure to furnish it to the person paying the money, an action will lie for recovering it back in the name of his assignee.

3. Such contract made in New York, to convey a passenger in a specified steamship from Panama to San Francisco, in the month of April, is broken if the ship fails to arrive at Panama during that month.

4. The owner has the entire month within which to perform the undertaking; but an offer to furnish the passage in a different ship is not a satisfaction of the contract.

5. If the steamship does not arrive at that port until after the month of April, the passage money is recoverable, although the passenger did not wait in Panama the expiration of the month, but shipped therefrom on the 3d of April.

6. Neither party can give proofs against or out of the allegations of the pleadings.

7. Formal amendments may be allowed at any stage of a cause.

[In admiralty. Libel by William Cobb against John T. Howard and others for breach of a passenger contract.]

[1] [Affirmed in Case No. 2,924.]

BETTS, District Judge. The important traffic in the transportation of passengers, by steamships between New York and California, from its great extent and the numerous complications attending its execution, will doubtless present interesting questions for adjustment by the courts of law.

The defendants established a line of steamers in that trade, composed of vessels plying on this side of the continent, between New York and Chagres, and on the other, between Panama and California, designed to be so arranged that passengers arriving by either route would find a ship ready to receive and transport them to their destination on the other; and accordingly passages could be secured and the passage money paid at either place of departure for the entire water route between New York and San Francisco, the same as if not interrupted by any transhipment and land conveyance; or passages and berths might be secured at either place on board a particular ship from the Peninsula, without regard to the manner in which the passengers arrived at her place of departure. The defendants prepared an additional steamship, the New Orleans, which was to be added to their line, and to leave New York for San Francisco in February, 1850. She was to commence her trips at Panama and depart from that place in April thereafter with passengers to San Francisco. Tickets for passages and berths on board the New Orleans from Panama to San Francisco were sold in New York to a large amount. In January and February, 1850, the fourteen tickets mentioned in the pleadings, and produced by the libellant as the foundation of his demand in this case, were thus purchased here by individuals, and the sums of money specified in them respectively, were at the time paid to the defendants by the purchasers.

The tickets were printed forms, uniform in substance, having blanks filled in with writing to meet the facts of each particular case. The printed part was as follows:

First Cabin Ticket. Pacific Steamship New Orleans. J. Howard and Sons, Agents, 34 Broadway.

No. ——— Voyage ——— New York, ———
Received ——— dollars for the passage of ——— in the steamship New Orleans, from ——— in the month of ——— to the anchorage of ——— (Signed) J. Howard & Son.
State room ——— J. W. Corrington.
Berth ———

The first cabin ticket, filled up, reads:

No. 11 (printed reading as above). Voyage 1. New York, Feb. 11, 1850.
Received three hundred dollars for the passage of Mr. Kraft, in the steamship New Orleans, from Panama, in the month of April, to the anchorage of San Francisco.
State room 3. (Signed as above.)
Berth 8.

The second cabin tickets varied from that only in heading, "second cabin ticket," and in the amount of cash received, being $150 in each case, instead of $300.

The evidence is not direct and positive that each ticket was paid for by and delivered to the person whose name is written in it, but is sufficient to raise a satisfactory presumption that such was the fact, and that the purchaser proceeded with it to Panama, and was at that place, on the first day of April, to have advantage of the passage secured him by the ticket. The steamer New Orleans not being at Panama, ten of the persons named in the second cabin tickets took passage on the first day of April on board the bark Anna, owned by the libellant and commanded by Charles T. Robinson, and sailed in her for San Francisco on the third of April. Each of these persons paid for his passage with the ticket he had received from the defendants, which was accepted by Lane, the agent of the bark, at the valuation of $160, in full, for the passage money to San Francisco, to which place the passengers were transported by the vessel. These tickets were assigned by Lane to the libellant, in writing, on the 6th of August thereafter.

It is proved that tickets issued in New York for the same voyage on board the New Orleans, were sold in Panama to a large amount,—about $51,000,—and such sales were publicly made with the knowledge and approval of Folger, who was then there acting as general agent of the defendants in the business of their steamships, and that they were purchased and received in that market as evidence of money payable by the defendants to the holders. This evidence was objected to on the part of the defendants. The defendants had notice from their agent, Folger, by letter dated August 6, 1850, at Panama, that Mr. Lane was owner of the fourteen tickets now in question, and that the agent had promised him they would be redeemed in New York if sent there. This testimony was also objected to by the defendants. The defendants proved they had disavowed to Folger and repudiated his acts or declarations in relation to their responsibility for the tickets purchased at Panama. This evidence was objected to on the part of the libellant. The other two second cabin tickets and the two first cabin tickets were purchased in Panama by Lane, the agent of the bark; the consideration paid for them or the time of their purchase was not proved. They were bought of Garretson & Fritz, brokers at Panama. No direct transfer of the tickets by the passengers in writing was produced, and except in respect to ten given to the agent of the bark in payment for their passages by the persons named in them, is there any evidence who acquired the tickets from the persons to whom they were originally delivered.

The libellant places his right to a recovery upon the ground that the respondents having received the money specified in the tickets upon the promise to carry the persons paying it in the steamship New Orleans from Panama to San Francisco, they are responsible to those persons for the amount paid, having failed performing the contract upon which the money was paid. That the whole amount is in their hands, money had and received by them for the use of the persons respectively who advanced it, and that the libellant, as the lawful owner of the certificates acknowledging the receipt of the money, is substituted in their places and rights and is entitled to recover it in this court in his own name.

The defence to the action is placed upon various points, some of them purely technical, and others contesting the legal liability of the defendants to any party or in any form of action under the facts of the case; for it is insisted that if the persons to whom the certificates or tickets were issued had sued for the recovery of the money advanced, there is no breach of the contract between them and the defendants proved in the case upon which a recovery could be founded. This position, I apprehend, would not be found tenable. The receipt given on payment of the passage price to the defendants necessarily imports an engagement on their part for that consideration to supply the persons paying the money a passage in the steamship New Orleans from Panama to San Francisco, in the month of April, 1850, and the use of a particular berth on board her. A refusal or omission to furnish either would be a breach of the agreement by the defendants, and they would thereby render themselves answerable to the person they contracted with for the consideration money advanced, if not for consequential damages. A contract to transport passengers by sea binds the owner and ship, and in case of its violation in any important particular, the party with whom it is made may recover back his passage money advanced, without offering to go in the ship, although she performs the voyage agreed for. The Pacific [Case No. 10,643].

The contract in this case was entered into at New York and the money was paid there, but on the part of the defendants it was executory, to be entered upon at Panama in the month of April thereafter, by taking the persons contracted with, on board the ship New Orleans and transporting them thence to San Francisco. I think upon the terms of the engagement the defendants had the entire month of April within which to enter upon the execution of the contract. If their ship was at Panama, ready to fulfil the undertaking at any time during that month, they would have complied with their engagement, and would be no way answerable to the passengers who failed to be there to accept such performance. I do not accede to the construction put upon the contract by the libellants' counsel, that the agreement as to time was for the April trip, intending thereby its commencement at Panama on the first day of April, subject only to temporary and unavoidable delays. The ship had to make her voyage from New York to Panama, and although she entered upon it on the 25th day of February, yet obviously it was contemplated between the parties she might not fulfil the expectation that she would reach Panama by the first of April, and to avoid all controversy in respect to her punctual arrival the stipulation was made to embrace the entire month. The passengers left New York for Panama between the 15th of March and the first of April, and as the ship had left this port on the 25th day of February preceding, and as appears upon the pleadings, had been disabled and compelled to put into St. Thomas for repairs, it is no more than a reasonable presumption that those facts were known at Panama on the first of April. The conduct of the agent of the defendants at that place clearly indicates that the condition of the ship was notorious, and that it was then well known she would be unable to reach that port within the month. She did not arrive there until the 23d of August thereafter. The agent took no steps in regard to the passengers; tickets which were bought by them to Panama for that ship were sold to an amount exceeding $50,000, and the evidence is that the agent was cognizant of those facts, and although when applied to he refused to refund the money to the holders, because he was not supplied with means to do it, yet gave assurance that they would undoubtedly be redeemed in New York by the defendants if sent there.

Without entering into enlarged comments upon this branch of the case, I think the true interpretation of the transaction is, that the ship owners would be acquitted of their obligation if they had the ship at Panama ready to perform their contract at any time during the month of April. But it is manifest that the holder of a ticket was entitled to be conveyed in that ship, and could compel the owners to refund the passage money paid them on failure to furnish the passage agreed for in the ship New Orleans. The offer to furnish a passage in another competent and safe vessel might, in this court as in equity, acquit them of responsibility in damages for failing to supply the particular conveyance contracted for, especially if proved that the defendants were prevented meeting their engagement by other causes than their own refusal or negligence, but it would not authorize them to retain the money advanced and insist on transporting the passenger in a different manner. This principle is plainly covered by the decision in the case of The Pacific [supra]. The passengers had a right to abandon the voyage and demand and recover back their passage money, on the failure of the ship owners to furnish them the passage contracted for. It might be different had they entered upon the voyage on board the ship and she had become disabled during its progress. In that case the rule in respect to cargo might apply, and the ship owners be entitled to retain the money advanced on offering to transport the passengers in another vessel to their place of destination, and so also the reciprocal obligation on the owners might have arisen to forward the passengers at any expense.

The objection was raised by the answer and strenuously insisted on in the argument for the defendants, that this action could not be maintained in the name of the libellant, for two causes; first, that his demand rested upon choses in action and not upon any negotiable securities, and if the defendants are under any liability it is one personal to the parties taking the passage, and is not transferable to a third person; and secondly, if a debt accrues from the transaction to the passengers which is assignable, it is separate and distinct to each passenger, and the various demands when severally assigned cannot be united and compose one debt suable as an entirety by the assignee; and that the assignee in neither case can set up any title to the debt but by means of a written assignment. These exceptions resolve themselves into two heads—the form of the action and the sufficiency of the proof offered to support it. Under the first, the point is taken, that no right can be acquired to a chose in action by a third party without a formal written assignment transferring it; and that if legally transferred, an action upon it can be maintained only in the name of the obligee and assignor. In admiralty a party sues upon the right vested in him, and no distinction in the form of action is made between liabilities incurred directly to the libellant and those which came to him by assignment or succession, having been the property of others. The real parties in interest are the nominal ones in the proceedings. This is substantially so in equity. Story, Eq. Pl. § 153, note 1, p. 189. The action, then, is properly in the name of the party who owns the claim, and there is no necessity of distinct actions to enforce against the same party claims acquired from different sources, any more because the debts were originally created to different parties from whom they vest in the libellant, than if they had been incurred directly to the libellant, but upon diverse and independent considerations. The indebtment has become single, both in respect to the party demanding its payment and the one sought to be charged with it. Under such circumstances, the courts would compel a consolidation of the actions, had suit been brought upon each separate debt.

The other objection presents the point only, as to what is adequate proof of the transfer of a chose in action. The common and perhaps the simpler method is to make a written assignment; yet in principle no additional right is created by the assignment in writing. In some instances it may furnish a more easy and satisfactory mode of proof, whilst in others, it will impose embarrassing difficulties in the way of establishing the fact that an assignment was made. In this case the testimony is explicit, that ten of these tickets were transferred to the libellant by delivery to his agent or the captain of his vessel, by whom they were received as cash, each for the sum of $160, and the person owning and so delivering the ticket was, in consideration of that assignment, transported in the libellant's vessel from Panama to San Francisco. Each of those tickets was evidence of a debt of $150. The sufficiency of the consideration and its actual receipt by the person to whom the ticket was issued and who transferred it to the libellant's agent is thus proved beyond question. This point has been considered and directly decided in the state of Maine. The court held that a chose in action may be assigned for a valuable consideration by the delivery of the evidence of the debt, without any written transfer. Littlefield v. Smith, 5 Shep. [17 Me.] 327; Spafford v. Page, 15 Vt. 490. A mere delivery to another by the creditor of the evidence of debt due him by a third party, without explanatory proof, might be held to import no more than an authority to collect the debt for the benefit of the creditor; but in respect to the ten specified certificates, they thus became the absolute property of the libellant, and he is entitled to recover the debt acknowledged by them, by action in his own name. There is no evidence proving that the remaining four tickets (one to Kraft for $300, one to Fox for $300, one to Kloppensteen for $150, and one to Bessara for $150) were sold by those parties or transferred by them to the libellant, or to Garrison & Fritz, or Lane, his agents, or any other person acting for him, nor that any consideration was ever paid by the libellant for them. That he did so is inferred only from the fact, that he has them in his possession and received them from his said agents. No evidence is given that any consideration was paid for them to the original owners of those debts. The naked possession of those papers does not, accordingly amount to evidence of a legal ownership of the debts acknowledged by them, and those portions of the libellant's demand must be rejected.

It is insisted, both in the oral argument and the written brief submitted by the counsel for the responuents, that no recovery can be had upon the evidence before the court, because it does not conform to and support the libel, and also because of itself it fixes no responsibility on the respondents to the assignors of those tickets. It is a fundamental principle with courts proceeding according to the course of the civil law, that no remedy or defence can be accorded parties litigant out of their pleadings. Things not specifically alleged may be sometimes implied, and a decree be rendered according to the right, when that right is not specifically asserted in the pleadings; but if the proofs conflict with the allegations by setting up a different case, or show that whatever may be the right or equity of the party it is not as represented in the pleadings, then no decree can be had upon such proofs, and the rule, become nearly an axiom in this respect, that the decision will be secundum allegata et probata, takes effect in its full force. Nangatuck Nav. Co. v. The Rhode Island [Case No. 11,745].

On examining the libel critically it would seem to have been drawn up in a very hurried manner, or to have been copied most carelessly, as the language employed in some of the allegations is palpably opposed to the meaning intended to have been expressed, and in one instance, at least, renders the fact stated as the foundation of the claim wholly nugatory. For instance, in some articles it is averred that the defendants agreed to furnish the passenger named with two cabin passages in the ship New Orleans; in one it is asserted that the libellant made the engagement to furnish the passage, and in all the articles it is asserted that the respondents agreed to carry the baggage of the passenger; sometimes it is said in the ship, and in others in the cabin, and in several instances the agreement charged is, to furnish the passenger "with two cabin passages for himself and baggage," expressions well bearing the construction that the respondents were to furnish distinct or double accommodations in the cabin to such passengers. It is averred that all the contracts were in writing, and then it is asserted, "that of said persons above mentioned, or either of them respectively, were not at Panama when the vessel should sail as advertised, he who was absent should forfeit half the amount paid." The breaches of the contract are stated to be that, "putting faith and confidence in the said undertaking of the respondents, and impelled by the named forfeiture, the several libellants left the city of New York and arrived at Panama so as to meet the said steamship, which was to convey, in the month of April, to San Francisco, but though they arrived there before the time appointed, and remained there until long after the time appointed for the sailing of said steamer from Panama, and long after the time they were to be furnished with a passage as above stated, the said steamship New Orleans did not come there, nor did the respondents furnish the several persons above named with a passage on board said steamship, or any other steamer." The libel then avers, that the agent of the respondents at Panama not being able to send said persons by the steamship New Orleans or otherwise on his own account, applied to the libellant to furnish them passages to San Francisco and take therefor from them the said contracts, and that the respondents would, in consideration thereof, pay said claim to the libellant, and that the libellant in pursuance thereof did furnish said passages and took therefor the claims of said persons against the respondents. Yet the article containing this statement does not connect with it any averment or charge that the respondents failed to fulfil the agreement, and is therefor nugatory as a pleading; but the next article in the libel makes an independent charge, that the libellant, at the request of the respondents, furnished such passages and took in satisfaction thereof these claims on the respondents, and holds their contract, and has frequently demanded payment thereof which they neglect and refuse to make to him and if the proofs comport with these averments, it is sufficient to support the action without the aid of the antecedent allegation. The answer admits the issuing of all the tickets except one to Mr. Kraft, it denies that the respondents or their agent applied to the libellant to transport the passengers claimed from Panama to San Francisco, or to take the said contracts or claims in satisfaction of such passages, or that their agent or any one for them agreed to pay said claims to the libellant; and also denies all knowledge that the passengers were carried by the libellant on the terms stated in the libel.

The answer admits that the steamship New Orleans left New York the 25th of February, 1850, and did not arrive at Panama until the 23d of August thereafter, but asserts she was then ready and prepared to take said passengers to San Francisco. The answer further takes exception to the sufficiency of the libel as to certainty in respect to the grounds of this action or the items and particularly of the libellant's account, and as to the time and manner and under what circumstances the libellant became owner of the claims of said passengers, or what those claims were. The blunders in the libel in making the libellant engage to furnish the passage in the New Orleans; in averring that passengers were to have two cabins, and using "of" for "if" in article four, are not calculated to mislead the respondents in any respect, as the meaning of the libel is obvious, and therefore, according to the rules of practice in admiralty courts, the mistakes may be amended at any stage of the cause. Ben. Adm. §§ 358, 483. The same principle applies to a good extent to amendments in matters of substance. Id. But if the amendments allowed are of a character to change essentially the ground or mode of defence, the party receiving the favor will be put under equitable conditions towards the other. Upon these principles, the third article of the libel would, on the motion of the libellant, be amended by order of the court, so that the promise alleged to be made by the libellant to Abel Hall should be stated to be made by the respondents, and that wherever the term "two cabin passage" occurs in the 4th article of the libel, the same be amended to read "second cabin passage," and that the particle "of" said "persons," in the last paragraph of the same article, be amended by substituting "if," and also in the next article of the libel (likewise numbered "fourth"), the statement "the several libellants left," be amended to read "the said several persons left," and after the word "convey," in the same article, to insert "them." These errors are clearly clerical mistakes, and are so palpable as not to be calculated to mislead any one as to the meaning of the libel, and it would be entirely contrary to the usage of the court to turn the libellant round, or subject him to any delay on their account. Betts, Adm. p. 57; Sup. Ct. Rule 24. In disposing of the cause I shall reserve the right to the libellant to move those amendments of course, at any time before the final decree is entered. Various other particulars in the libel, objected to by the respondents as defective pleading, fall more appropriately under the class of variations of proofs from the allegations; such as the averments that all the contract was in writing; that the respondents engaged to transport the baggage of the passengers; that the passenger absent from Panama, when the steamer arrived there, should forfeit half the amount he had paid, etc., etc.

Upon the merits of the case, when the errors before specified, shall be amended, and considering the action to be the same as if prosecuted in the name of each passenger, the questions are whether the libellant claims upon the contract actually made by the parties, and whether he offers competent and sufficient proof in support of the action. The libellant may rightfully charge the contract according to its legal import, and he is not confined to stating it in the words of the written paper. It will then be for the court to determine whether his evidence sustains the agreement he counts upon. It is plain enough that an acknowledgment, in writing, by one party of the receipt of a sum of money from another for a consideration, to be afterwards rendered by the one receiving it, raises the implication of a promise to perform the condition on which the money was advanced, and in case of failure so to do, furnishes the promisee a right of action to be recompensed in damages for the breach, at least to the amount of the money paid, or to recover it back on suit for that object. The libellant, as the transferee of the claims of persons who paid the money, is clothed with their rights in this respect, and if the contract set up in the libel was no other than such implied one, there would be nothing in the way of his recovering those sums of money with interest, all demand of damages beyond that being disclaimed on the trial. It is, however, objected to his recovery in this case, that he has laid the contract in his libel, as containing the double engagement to transport the persons paying the money and also their baggage in the ship, and alleged the contract to be in writing, and that he cannot recover upon these allegations without proving the contract thus set forth. There is no evidence in the case, direct or implied, that the respondents engaged to transport the baggage of the passengers with the persons for the consideration paid. This might, probably, be presumed had any evidence been given that such was the usage of the trade, but the court cannot infer, as matter of law, that the passenger acquired by the contract he produces, anything beyond the right of a personal passage. But this objection, it appears to me, does not exclude the evidence offered nor prevent its availing the libellant so far as it is pertinent to the case.

It is to be observed that no specific issue is taken upon the averment of the form or contents of the contract. The answer puts in a general denial. This necessarily imposes on the libellant the obligation of supporting the averment in all its material parts, and charging that the contract included undertakings not proved to be embraced by it, does not necessarily prevent the libellant having the advantage of those which do exist. It might be otherwise if the action was by the respondents, for the carriage, and they averred they had carried the passenger and his baggage and only proved the carriage of the person, for the proof of part performance only would admit that the party had done less than he agreed to do, and might disable him from maintaining an action upon such imperfect execution of his agreement. But an averment that the defendants agreed to do two things by written contract, and when the contract is produced, it is found that only one was agreed to be done, does not destroy the right of the promisee to the performance of the actual contract. If the difference makes to the advantage of the respondents in any way, it is only in this, that the variance is of a character to estop the libellant making claim under the contract set up in the libel. It does not appear to me that this variance affects the merits of the case. The libellant proves the payment of the passage money and the promise of the defendants to supply the passage as averred, and that they have not fulfilled such agreement, but he fails to prove any further or additional undertaking on their part. The allegation of such other agreement may well be treated as mere surplusage on these pleadings, because if the respondents had proved a performance of the other part, or a satisfaction of the agreement, or any legal defence to it, manifestly the libellant could not maintain an action for not carrying the baggage. No engagement to do it is proved, but if the obligation may be regarded as incident to the undertaking to transport the person, it would be merged in and fall with the principal agreement when that should be defeated.

Upon the whole the right of the case appears to me to be clearly with the libellant as to the ten tickets given him by the passengers themselves, and for which he furnished them passages on board his ship from Panama to San Francisco, and I shall decree that he recover against the respondents the monies they received from those tickets amounting to $1,500, with interest on each from the time the money was paid them therefor, and costs of suit. The claim of the libellant as to the remaining four tickets, amounting to $900 and interest, is dismissed, but without prejudice to his suing and recovering for the same hereafter, on competent proof that they were acquired by him bona fide from or through the original owners. Order accordingly.

[NOTE. The respondents appealed to the circuit court, which affirmed the decree herein. Case No. 2,924, next preceding.]

COBB (HOWARD v.). See Cases Nos. 6,755 and 6,756.

COBB (HOWE v.). See Case No. 6,767.

COBB (McCLOSKEY v.). See Case No. 8,702.

COBB (UNITED STATES v.). See Case No. 14,820.

COBIN (OWSLEY v.). See Case No. 10,636.

Case No. 2,926.

COBLENS v. ABEL.

[1 Woolw. 293.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Missouri. Oct. Term, 1868.

OF THE LIABILITY OF INTERNAL REVENUE OFFICERS FOR ILLEGAL ASSESSMENTS, AND WHEN SUITS MAY BE BROUGHT AGAINST THEM THEREFOR.

1. It is but common justice to hold answerable in damages an executive officer who, under color of his office, commits an illegal trespass upon the rights of a citizen.

2. The internal revenue act of July 13, 1866 (14 Stat. 98), contemplates such cases and such prosecutions.

3. But the right to sue for such injuries may be, and in that act is, regulated, so that the action must be brought within, or shall not be brought until the expiration of, a specified time.

4. The object of the provision is to give to the commissioner, who is authorized "to remit, refund, or pay back taxes illegally assessed or collected," and to pay the costs and expenses of suits, and the judgments recovered therein, an opportunity to learn the facts of the case, and determine what is right to be done.

5. If he delays his decision six months after the appeal, the action may then be brought.

At law. On the 14th of May, 1867, Coblens sued Abel in the circuit court of the state of Missouri, for St. Louis county, in respect of a certain illegal assessment, as he alleged, made and collected by the defendant as collector of the internal revenue of the United States. On the 18th of November following, and before a trial of the said suit, Abel sued out of this court a writ of certiorari, for the removal of the cause, under the act of July 13, 1866 (14 Stat. p. 171, § 67). This being done, on the 9th of May, 1868, the plaintiff filed in this court his declaration in trespass on the case, in which he alleged that the defendant, on the 14th day of May, 1867, as collector of internal revenue of the United States for the first district in Missouri, issued to his deputy his distress-warrant, by virtue whereof the said deputy was about to seize sufficient of the property of the plaintiff, out of which to make $668.92, whereby he compelled the plaintiff to pay that sum, on account of an alleged tax due from the plaintiff to the United States. To which declaration the defendant pled the general issue.

At the present sittings of the court, the cause came on to be tried before the judges, a jury having been waived by the parties. The fact of the distress, and the payment under the same, and under protest, was admitted. The plaintiff introduced evidence to show, and he did prove to the satisfaction of the court, that the return of his income which he had made was an honest one; so that it followed that the assessment made upon him as if it were not honest, was improper. But he did not show, and in fact the record showed, that no appeal had been taken to the commissioner of internal revenue from the action of the assessor and collector, or either of them.

Mr. Krum, for plaintiff.
Mr. Noble, Dist. Atty., for defendant.

MILLER, Circuit Justice, held that the assessor and collector had unjustly and unlawfully collected from the plaintiff the amount alleged in the declaration; and that, but for the provisions of the act of congress, the right of action was made out. The learned judge then read the following sections of the "Act to reduce internal taxation, and to amend an act entitled 'An act to provide internal revenue,'" &c., approved July 13, 1866 (14 Stat. 98):

"That the commissioner of internal revenue, subject to regulations prescribed by the secretary of the treasury, shall be and is hereby authorized, on appeal to him made, to remit, refund, and pay back all taxes erroneously or illegally assessed or collected, all penalties collected without authority, and all taxes that shall appear to be unjustly assessed, or excessive in amount, or in any manner wrongfully collected, and also repay to collectors and deputy collectors the full amount of such sums of money as shall or may be recovered against them, or any of them, in any court for any internal taxes or licenses collected by them, with the costs and expenses of suit, and all damages and costs recovered against assessors, assistant assessors, collectors, deputy collectors, and inspectors, in any suit which shall be brought against them, or any of them, by reason of anything that shall or may be done, in the due performance of their official duties; and all judgments, and moneys recovered or received for taxes, costs, forfeitures, and penalties, shall be paid to the collector, as internal taxes are required to be paid: provided that where a second assessment may have been made in case of a list statement, or return which, in the opinion of the assessor or assistant assessor, was false or fraudulent, or contained any under statement or under valuation, such assessment shall not be remitted, nor shall taxes collected under such assessment be recovered, refunded, or paid back, unless it is proved that said list, statement, or return was not false or fraudulent, and did not contain any under statement or under valuation." Page 111.

[1] [Reported by James M. Woolworth, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

"No suit shall be maintained in any court for the recovery of any tax alleged to have been erroneously or illegally assessed or collected, until appeal shall have been duly made to the commissioner of internal revenue, according to the provisions of law in that regard, and the regulations of the secretary of the treasury, established in pursuance thereof; and a decision of said commissioner shall be had thereon, unless such suit shall be brought within six months from the time of said decision, or within six months from the time this act takes effect: provided that if said decision shall be delayed more than six months from the date of such appeal, then said suit may be brought at any time within twelve months from the date of such appeal." Page 152.

His honor then said, that it was but common justice that an executive officer, who, under cover of the authority with which he is by law invested, commits an illegal trespass upon the rights of a citizen, should be held to answer for the injury he has inflicted in a court of law. Actions of this nature are daily brought and maintained. We should be little inclined to sustain an act which overturned this principle. The sections of the law just read do not do so. The provision first cited clearly contemplates cases of "taxes erroneously or illegally assessed and collected," and "penalties collected without authority." And it also contemplates that suits will be brought against the internal revenue officers for injuries thus sustained, and that judgments for the damages will be recovered; for it provides that the commissioner may repay to them "the full amount of such sums of money as shall or may be recovered against them, or any of them, in any court, for any internal taxes or licenses collected by them, with the costs and expenses of suit, and all damages and costs recovered against assessors, &c., in any suit which shall be brought against them." The case before us is such a case against this plaintiff. Taxes have been "erroneously and illegally assessed and collected," "the full amount" of which he is entitled to "recover against" this defendant.

At the same time, this right of action may be regulated by the government whose officer has transcended his authority. It is competent for it to say how soon the action shall be brought; and equally so, how long a time shall elapse before the action shall be brought. It may provide, and it is highly proper that it should provide, that due time shall be allowed to its officers to inquire into the facts of the case, and determine whether restitution ought to be at once made, or whether the claim should be subjected to a judicial investigation. Especially is this the case when, as here, the restitution is to be made, or the means to satisfy the judgment are to be furnished, out of its own funds. Accordingly, congress has provided that no suit for the causes mentioned above shall be maintained in any court, "until appeal shall have been duly made to the commissioner of internal revenue," and his decision had thereon.

The object of the provision is to afford to that officer an opportunity to inform himself of the facts of the case, and determine what is right in the premises. He is the officer who is "to remit, refund, and pay back the taxes erroneously or illegally assessed or collected." Certainly, nothing can be more proper than that the aggrieved party should bring the facts fully before him, so that he may determine whether he will or will not subject the government to the expenses and costs of suit, which he is also authorized to pay, and which he ought to pay out of the funds of the government. That is what the last cited section required this plaintiff to do, before he subjected the government, whose officer the defendant is, and out of whose treasury the judgment would be paid, to the expenses and costs of this suit. He did not do so. He cannot maintain this action for that reason.

It is no answer to say that the decision of the commissioner may be withheld, and that, as the law requires it to be first had, the right of action, upon the construction which we have given the law, may never accrue. If upon the appeal duly taken to the commissioner, he withholds his decision more than six months, the action may then be brought. This is expressly provided in the act, which says, that "if the decision shall be delayed more than six months from the date of such appeal, then said suit may be brought," &c. The plaintiff has not, by the evidence submitted by him, sustained this action, because he has not appealed to the commissioner, and had his decision on the acts of the collector here complained of, or waited six months for the decision to be made.

The plaintiff took a non-suit.

Case No. 2,927.

COBLIDGE v. GUTHRIE.

[The case cited under above title in 2 Brightly's Dig. 352, is the same as Case No. 3,185.]

COBURN (CROPPER v.). See Case No. 3,416.

COCHECO MANUF'G CO (SPRAGUE v.). See Case No. 13,249.

COCHRAN (GERNON v.). See Case No. 5,368.

COCHRAN (LAKE SHORE & M. S. R. CO. v.). See Case No. 7,996.

Case No. 2,927a.

COCHRAN v. McLEAN.

[Betts' Scr. Bk. 114.]

District Court, S. D. New York. Jan. 22, 1839.

SEAMEN'S WAGES—FOREIGN VESSEL.

[The court will not entertain a libel for wages by seamen of a British vessel, where it does not appear that they have been discharged the ship, and disabled from performing their contract, or from seeking redress in their home tribunals, by any wrongful act of the master, and where the shipping articles provide that they shall not be entitled to their discharge or to wages until the completion of the voyage.]

[Cited in Wood v. The Infanta, Case No. 17,947a.]

[In admiralty. Libel in personam by William Cochran and others, crew of the British ship Colchester, against Allen McLean, her master, for wages.]

BETTS, District Judge. The libel demands wages earned on a voyage from Liverpool to New York. Another action is brought by the same libellants to recover the value of their clothing detained by respondent. The allegation of the libellants is, that they faithfully performed the voyage to this port, and that on the 5th day of September last, they were fully discharged the ship without being paid their wages. The answer excepts to the jurisdiction of the court over the subject matter, the vessel being a British ship, and the crew British subjects, and the matter only cognizable in the British courts. It avers that the libellants were guilty of mutinous conduct on the voyage, and of insubordinate and disorderly conduct in the port; and finally, on the 4th September, deserted the ship, and have since refused to return to their duty, although the respondent has offered to receive them and pay off their board bills in New York. It insists upon a forfeiture of wages and clothes for these causes. The shipping articles put in evidence show a contract by the libellants to perform a voyage from Liverpool to the United States or British America, and back to a port of discharge in Great Britain. It is stipulated in the articles, that 24 hours' absence from the ship during the voyage, under any circumstances, except by permission of the master, shall, if he elects, be deemed a desertion; that actual desertion shall forfeit all the clothes, effects, wages, and emoluments of the deserters; and that no seaman shall be entitled to his discharge or any wages, until the completion of the voyage. On the 4th September the libellants left the ship without permission of the captain or mate, and went to the consul's office to make complaints. The consul summoned the captain to attend at his office that day. He disregarded the summons, and the consul sent back the libellants to the ship with a note to the master to receive the crew. The master would not take the letter, but a very contradictory account is given of the cause and manner of that refusal by the libellants (in testifying for each other), and the custom house officer who was present. The men represent that the master tore up the letter and peremptorily ordered them on shore, telling them to go back and see what more the consul could do for them. The officer says one of the crew came upon the quarter deck, he seemed excited by liquor, and told the captain he had the consul's order to come on board, and he would be damned if the captain must not take him.

It appears by the testimony of the first mate that the libellants left at 9 a. m. on the 4th, declaring they would do no more work, and were all logged as deserters. Mr. Lester, the custom house officer, says it was understood, from conversations of all the crew, whilst the ship was unloading, that the men did not intend to return in the vessel. The vice consul says the crew preferred complaints when the ship came in, and indeed it is fully proved they left her at that time in a disorderly and mutinous manner, and that he ordered them to go back and discharge the cargo. On the 4th, after she was unladen, they came again, when he summoned the master, and then sent the crew back with a letter. All these facts tend strongly to support the answer that the master never discharged the crew, and that their leaving the vessel was without his consent, and wrongfully. When the master came to the consul's, the 5th, though he refused to pay wages or deliver up the seamen's clothes, the consul says he offered to take them home in the ship, but without wages. This then seems to me to dispose of the whole case. Whatever the consul might have found reprehensible in the temper or manner of the master, the latter has a right under the articles to refuse the seamen's wages until their return home, where the whole matter in dispute would be rightfully litigated and adjusted, and I must say no satisfactory reason is supplied by the consul for interfering with the men or master, and assuming authority to break up their engagement to the ship. If he could, under powers given by his own government, do this, the powers have not been disclosed to this court, and their sufficiency as a protection to the crew for leaving the ship and violating their articles can be more fitly passed upon in tribunals of Great Britain, where all parties owe allegiance, where it was contemplated in the contract that all questions respecting wages should be settled. It is manifest upon the authorities that courts of admiralty exercise a discretion in entertaining suits in behalf of foreign seamen against a foreign ship or master, and I cannot discern any principle of policy or national courtesy entitled to more serious regard in directing or influencing that discretion than that which goes to maintain the fidelity of seamen to their contract, and the preservation of the entire purposes of the voyage.

Wnen a voyage is broken up, and thereby the seamen are left destitute in a foreign country, or if they are put out of a ship by the wrongful act of the master or owners, it is consonant to the general usages of maritime courts, and seems to me every way fitting, that a remedy should then be afforded them in such foreign courts for the recovery of the moneys due them; but, independent of considerations of general policy which in my judgment very fully enter into the decisions of questions of jurisdiction of this character, it is plain that, giving effect to the agreements between the parties, no right of action exists until the performance by the seamen of the entire voyage. And this tribunal, by entertaining jurisdiction of a suit circumstanced like the present, where the opportunity was open to the parties to return to their own country, would not only sanction a violation of duty by the men, but would establish and enforce rights in their behalf in express contradiction of their own stipulations. It is furthermore to be remarked that, if their rights are to be measured by their own allegations, compared with the proofs, it is manifest that they had incurred a forfeiture of wages within the direct provisions of their articles, having been absent from the ship more than twenty-four hours without permission of the master. They aver that he discharged them on the 5th September, and probably their own testimony, which at first view seems to represent the interview on the 4th on their return from the consul's as their discharge, better comports with the averment of the libel, and that all the discharge actually given was the refusal announced by the master to the consul on the 5th, to receive the men back and reinstate them in their right to wages. The statement given by the crew of what passed on the 4th when they presented the consul's letter to the captain is not very connected or distinct. Dawson says, in his deposition taken the 20th September: "When the crew came to the ship a second time on the 4th, with another letter from the consul, the master took it up and tore it, and told us to go about our business, and go to the consul and see what more he had to do for us." McKenzie, examined the 22d, states the result of the interview in the same words, except he does not say the captain tore the letter,—he threw it down on the deck. Flaws, examined the 24th, says the crew gave the captain the letter and told him what the consul said: "The captain told us to go about our business and go to the consul, and see what more he had to say to us." After he read the note he tore it, and threw it on the quarter deck. Williamson, examined the 24th, says: "The captain told the man to put the letter on the chair. He then, a little after took it up, opened it, laughed, and tore it to pieces, and told us to go to the consul and see what more he had for us to do,—that he had nothing more for us to do."

Cochran, who seems a leading man with the crew, was examined and cross-examined on the 20th, and re-examined the 21st, and again re-examined the 22d September, and was again examined viva voce in court on the 27th December. On the 20th, he represents the particular interview on the 4th to be that the crew gave the letter to the captain; "and he told us to go about our business, and go to the consul again, and see if he had anything more for us to do. We told him the consul told us to go down to the ship again, as usual, and the captain told us to go to the consul again, saying, 'I have nothing more for you to do.'" On his cross-examination he said, when they left the ship in the morning, "we told the captain we were going to the consul's; he told us to go and stop there." Upon his second direct examination he stated that the crew were examined by the consul, and he decided they were to be discharged from the vessel and to have their wages, and on that cross-examination he says, "has never offered to the captain to come on board to do duty." On his examination in court, he says the captain would not take the letter, made witness lay it down on the companion way, and then took it up, tore it to pieces, ordered them all ashore, and pushed witness off, and told him to go about his business. The next day the captain came to the consul's office, and the consul told him to take the men on board, which he refused to do, or to pay wages. On his cross-examination he says, after the crew had been ashore about five weeks the captain offered to take them on board and pay their board bills ashore, but the crew would not go.

Taking the case as the libellants prove it themselves, it is not shown that there was any direct offer by the men to return to duty, or refusal by the captain to receive them, on the 4th September. He refused undoubtedly to acknowledge the authority of the consul, or to have anything to do with the men in obedience to that authority; but Cochran says expressly he never offered to go back to duty, nor is there enough in the statements of any of the libellants to justify the conclusion that all or any of them proffered themselves to the ship again, and to return immediately to their duties and subordination there. On the other hand, very forcible proofs are produced, showing that the men left the ship on the 4th September in open contempt of the orders of the mate and captain, and the evidence is clear that the opportunity was kept open for them to the last day the ship remained here, to return with her to their port of destination and discharge.

This court will proceed cautiously in passing upon the dealings between foreign consuls and the masters and crews of vessels belonging to their governments. It appreciates the delicacy of questions of that character. It will presume that the consul had sufficient reason for advising the crew not to go with the vessel, and for directing the master to pay their wages here; and that these reasons will satisfactorily excuse the proceeding to his own government, as also the maintaining the men here to this day. I am constrained, however, to say that no case has been disclosed to this court which demonstrates the necessity of such measures, or their propriety, to a degree that raises in behalf of these men a right of action, founded thereon, to demand and recover wages here, and thus have the breaking up of their contract pronounced proper and justifiable. This court does not inquire or decide whether the forfeiture set up by the answer and stipulated in the articles is absolute, or is to be construed only as a penalty, conformity to the rule usually applied to American articles. I leave the merits of the action and defence untouched as appertaining to the home tribunals of the parties, and I only pronounce that the libellants were not by any wrongful act of the master prevented returning in the ship and completing the voyage according to their contract, and that therefore no suit can be sustained here upon those open articles. I regard it as a settled rule, upon the whole current of authorities, that suits will not be entertained in admiralty courts on behalf of foreign seamen for the recovery of wages, unless it be made to appear that the voyage is broken up, and that they are discharged the ship, and disabled from performing their contract, and seeking redress in their home tribunals, by the wrongful act of the master. Judge Story collects the leading cases upon this subject which have occurred in this country and the English courts, and that controlling principle runs throughout the decisions on the multifarious combination of facts. Abb. Shipp. 478, note [Hoover v. Reilly, Case No. 6,677]; Willendson v. The Forsoket [Id. 17,682], is essentially this case as to all the prominent facts, and in that Judge Peters refused to sustain the sailors' suit. Vide Davis v. Leslie [Id. 3,639].

COCHRAN, The NEIL. See Case No. 10,087.

COCHRAN (SPARHAWK v.). See Case No. 13,203.

COCHRAN (UNITED STATES v.). See Case No. 14,821.

COCHRANE, In re. See Cases Nos. 6,109 and 6,110.

COCHRANE (BADISCHE ANILIN & SODA FABRIK v.). See Case No. 719.

Case No. 2,928.

COCHRANE v. SWARTOUT.

[47 Niles' Reg. 157.]

District Court, S. D. New York. Oct. 31, 1834.

MEANING OF "COAL" IN TARIFF ACT—WEIGHT OF EVIDENCE.

[1. In ascertaining whether or not coke is within the designation of "coal" in the tariff act, the intention of congress may be inquired into, as well as the commercial sense of the term, as understood by merchants.]

[2. While in some cases, a jury may decide a question of fact according to the number of witnesses, yet, when the testimony is mere matter of opinion, they must consider the intelligence of the witnesses, and the manner in which they testify.]

At law. This was a suit [against Samuel Swartout, collector of the port of New York] to recover the amount of certain duties paid by the plaintiff [Rupert J. Cochrane] on a quantity of coke imported from England, and on which the collector had charged a duty of 6 cents a bushel, the plaintiff contending that the article was free, as non-enumerated in the tariff. As there are some parts of this country where the article may not be known under the name of "coke," it may be proper to remark that it is charred coal, from which the bitumen, sulphur, ammonia and other volatile matter has been extracted by fire, and the article reduced to a sort of cinder. In this state it is better adapted for some particular branches of iron manufacture, than coal in its natural form, and in England immense quantities of coal are charred or coked in ovens to fit it for manufacturing purposes. Formerly the article was scarcely used in England except by smiths or iron manufacturers; but since coal gas has come into general use for lighting towns and cities, coke is produced in such large quantities and sold so much cheaper than coal, that the poorer classes in England use it as fuel for domestic purposes, which it answers tolerably well, producing a clear bright fire devoid of smoke or sulphur, something like anthracite, but not so intense or lasting.

A question was raised by Mr. Price as to whether the plaintiff could maintain the present suit, independent of the facts of the case, inasmuch as he had voluntarily paid the bond which he passed on the entry of the goods, instead of protesting against the legality of the duty and refusing to pay his bond. This question was reserved for further consideration by the court.

Several witnesses were examined on both sides, but nothing of a very decisive nature could be gleaned from their evidence, as regarded the character or denomination of the article in question. Some of the witnesses said the article was called "coke," or "charred coal," and that these terms were never considered to mean coal in its natural state. Other witnesses deposed that the article, though having gone through the process of charring, is still coal. It also appeared that, on one or two occasions when the article was imported here, it was invoiced by the name of "coke," though it paid a duty as coal. All the witnesses agreed that if they sent an order for coal, without specifying the quality, and were sent coke, they should not consider their order complied with.

Before THOMPSON, Circuit Justice, and BETTS, District Judge.

THOMPSON, Circuit Justice, charged the jury that they were to take it for granted that the plaintiff could maintain the present suit against the defendant,—the question on that part of the subject having been reserved by the court for further consideration. The only question then to be considered was whether the article in question, which had paid 6 cents a bushel, was subject to that duty; or whether it was coal, within the meaning of the tariff law. They had been told that they were to decide the question according to the greater number of witnesses. This proposition might hold good in some cases, but not where the question depended upon the opinion of witnesses. In reference to a fact, the jury might depend upon the number of witnesses, and in that case the evidence of the greater number would be a safe criterion to judge by; but, in a mere matter of opinion, the jury were to found their judgment on the intelligence of the respective witnesses and their manner of giving testimony, and by that means ascertain whether they could place more confidence on one side than the other. If the mere number of witnesses was to be relied on, the trial of a case might take up entire weeks, as a party might bring a thousand witnesses into court. Therefore the jury would judge from the intelligence of the witnesses, and from that source draw a line which would lead them to the truth.

With respect to the construction of the law, the general rule was that, if the jury entertained any doubt as to its meaning, they would then resort to collateral circumstances to assist themselves in ascertaining it, but the cardinal rule of inquiry was, what was the intention of congress in passing the law? The rule settled by the supreme court, and in which this court fully acquiesced, in relation to the law, was that they were to apply to it the practical commercial sense of the words, and use them as understood by merchants. But this rule had been pressed by the plaintiff further than the court was inclined to admit it. It was not because men were merchants that the jury were to be entirely bound by their opinions. The only reason why their opinions should have more weight than those of others was because they were supposed to be better acquainted with articles of commerce. The question to be considered was whether the article was known as a fair commercial article of trade, and imported and used as such. If the article had been imported here for many years as coke, the court would not hesitate to say that it was not coal; and that, as congress was presumed to be acquainted with mercantile terms, it intended that the article should be free. Was then the article known by the name of "coke," as contradistinguished from coal? If the jury were of that opinion, then it was not subject to duty; but if they thought that congress had included it under the generic term of "coal," then it was subject to duty. Nor would it be doing any violence to language to call it coal; some of the witnesses said it was coal, although it had been rendered pure, or nearly pure, by having gone through an operation by which the various particles were extracted from it by heat. A witness had been asked, at what point of the operation did it become coke? and he answered that, when it ceases to smoke, it becomes coke. Now they could not tell if this was the case with the article in question, nor was there any evidence to show them that this was the kind of article imported by the plaintiff. But, supposing that it was, did congress mean that it should be free? Was there anything in the law to induce them to believe that the legislature so intended; or was the article so advantageous to their manufactures, or anything else, as to be fair to assume that the legislature meant to class it under the generic name of "coal"? Witnesses had been asked whether, if they sent for coal, would coke be sent them. The court believed that men never do their business in that way, or send for coal without designating the kind; therefore, the jury could not infer anything from the answer given to that question.

On the whole, the question was one of fact, and the court submitted it to the jury. If they thought that the legislature meant to include coals of all kinds, and that this article came under the generic name of "coal," then the plaintiff could not recover; but, if they thought that the legislature did not mean to include the article under the generic name, then their verdict would be for the plaintiff.

The jury retired for nearly three hours, and, there being no likelihood of their agreeing, they were then discharged.

Case No. 2,929.

COCHRANE v. WATERMAN.

[1 McA. Pat. Cas. 52; Cranch, Pat. Dec. 121.]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov., 1844.

PATENTS—INVENTION—CAVEAT.

[1. The application of an endless screw working in the cogs on the periphery of a quadrant to the moving and holding of a rudder does not involve invention.]

[2. The fact that a patent is inadvertently granted while a caveat is pending does not of itself vacate the patent, or authorize the granting of a patent to the other party, unless he shows priority of invention.]

[Appeal from commissioner of patents.]

Interference.

The Commissioner:

1. There is no distinction between an "invention" and an "improvement," except in degree. If the alleged improvement be an improvement within the meaning of the law, it is indubitably the subject of a patent; but if it be an improvement simply because the screw works better than a pinion or a band, then it is not necessarily the subject of a patent. An improvement on an original invention is itself an invention, and must be such to authorize the grant of a patent; and the term "improvement," in the connection in which it is introduced in the law, has the same signification as if the law authorized the grant of a patent for an invention on an invention instead of for an improvement on an invention. Whittemore v. Cutter [Case No. 17,601]; Odiorne v. Winkley, [Id. 10,432]. All writers on the patent law admit the patentability of an improvement on an original invention, but limit this to such improvements as are inventions. No decisions on the patent law can be found that will sustain the position that the substitution of a mechanical equivalent is an invention.

2. The use of the endless screw as a means of communicating motion to a cog-wheel instead of a pinion is taught in all elementary works on mechanics. Borgnis' Traute de Mechanique Appliquee aux Arts, vol. 1; Gregory's Mechanics, art. "Screw," and others. It is only used in machinery generally, when a great multiplication of power is required, with little complexity, and when the loss of power by friction is not deemed very important; for it is admitted that the friction between the threads of the screw and the cogs of the wheel is much greater to produce a given result than by a combination of cog-wheels; but every constructor of a machine has the option to obtain a certain increase of power or velocity by the employment of either of the three equivalents—cog-wheels and pinions, band-wheels and bands, or cog-wheels and endless screw. They all have their advantages and disadvantages under different circumstances, and the machinist best shows his knowledge and skill who selects the one best adapted to the purpose in view in this selection; however, he does not invent, and is not therefore entitled to a patent.

3. As to the caveat, the only protection which the law guarantees to a person filing a caveat is a notice of an interfering application for a patent and for a withholding of all further action on the same application for the space of three months, to enable the caveator to complete an application for a patent; and then, in case of an actual interference, the two applications are to be referred for a hearing. This hearing has been granted in this case; and the only difference between the circumstances as they have occurred and what they would have been had the officer noticed the caveat, is that he is called upon to contest against a patent instead of an application; and had he proved priority of invention and obtained a patent, he would have been obliged to apply to the courts for a repeal, of Waterman's patent. Cochrane is in fact in a better position with reference to the controversy, as the practice of the office has always been, in contest between applicants and patentees, to give the applicant the benefit of every reasonable doubt; so that this oversight has been beneficial to him so far as this office could exercise a discretion.

4. There is no evidence to show that the patent was surreptitiously granted.

5. With reference to the applicant's claim to have a patent, on his statement that he made the invention at a certain time, unsupported by any evidence to show when he made the drawings, models, &c., and reduced the invention to practical form, it is evident that the rules furnish no warrant for such a proceeding. The commissioner is not bound to instruct parties as to what they shall submit in evidence; and any suggestion of the kind in the rules must be regarded as a suggestion merely, and not as a requirement upon a compliance with which a party can rely.

Oba Meeker, for Cochrane.

CRANCH, Chief Judge. John Cochrane appeals from the decision of the commissioner of patents refusing to grant him a patent for a machine for steering vessels, styled "The Spring-Tiller Self-Compensating Steering Machine." By the eleventh section of the act of March 3, 1839 [5 Stat. 354], c. 88, the revision of the decision of the commissioner of patents is to be "confined to the grounds of his decision, fully set forth in writing, touching all the points involved by the reasons of appeal." Mr. Cochrane, in his specification, says that the nature of his invention consists in applying the endless screw or worm, working in cogs on the periphery of a quadrant, to the moving or holding of the rudder; and also in the application of springs to compensate for the action of the sea on the rudder. The commissioner refused to grant the patent, because, as to the first supposed improvement, viz., the application of the endless screw to the cogs on the periphery of a quadrant, it was not the invention of an improvement; and as to the second improvement, viz., the springs on the tiller, it would interfere with a patent already granted to Henry Waterman. The reasons of appeal from the decision are, in substance, first, that the application of the endless screw, &c., is an invention of an improvement on the machinery of steering vessels, within the meaning of the sixth section of the act of the 4th of July, 1836 [5 Stat.

119], c. 575; and, second, that he was the first inventor of the spring-tiller, and therefore the patent ought not to have been granted to Waterman, and ought now to be granted to him (Cochrane).

The commissioner, in stating his reasons for his decision, contends that the substitution of a known mechanical equivalent is not an invention within the patent laws; and I think he is right. In some machines the moving power is communicated by a band. If I were to substitute a pinion for the band, I do not think it could be considered as an invention for which I could obtain a patent. The endless screw and wheel is a common mechanical power applicable to an indefinite number of machines; and the mere application of it to a machine to which it had never before been applied would not be an invention, although it might make the machine better than it would have been without it. There may be innumerable cases in which that mechanical power may be used with good effect, but it does not follow that the person using it is thereby entitled to a patent. The fact that it enables the helmsman to hold and stay the rudder with more ease, results from the nature of the power, and it is a property belonging to it wherever used, for the power of the helmsman is applied slowly at the long end of the lever against the power of the rudder, which works at the short end. This property is not now for the first time discovered. The application of it to the steering of a vessel seems to be no more entitled to a patent than if it had been applied to a kitchen jack for washing. It seems to be an ordinary power applied to an ordinary purpose, and that the application of it is not invention within the meaning of the patent law. Upon the first point, therefore, the decision of the commissioner is affirmed.

The second question is whether Mr. Cochrane was the first inventor of the spring-tiller, according to the evidence before the commissioner. Upon this point it is necessary to ascertain what that evidence was. 1. James Cochrane testifies, in his deposition taken on the 13th of March, 1844, at Baltimore, "that he knows that the compensating principle in the steering machine was invented by John Cochrane, the claimant, by the application of that spring to the rudder, prior to the 19th day of October, 1835." He heard him describe its position on the rudder and explain its use, which was to ease the action of the sea on the rudder, previous to the said 19th of October, 1835. 2. Richard Cochrane, in his deposition taken at Newark, N. J., March 16th, 1844, says "that the invention was made in the year 1835, but cannot now recollect any fact by which to ascertain in his own mind the exact date." That part of his deposition in which he says that he distinctly remembers that the inventor (John Cochrane) said, years ago, that it was on the 7th of February, at 10 o'clock at night, is not competent evidence in this cause. The deponent further testifies "that he was present when the invention was made, and recollects that it was at night." He further testifies "that in the month of October, 1835, he had a conversation with Captain Scott, of the brig 'Planter,' at Baltimore, Maryland, on the principle on which steering machines should act, for the purpose of ascertaining whether the springs were as important in steering as the said John Cochrane supposed; but that he (deponent) is certain that this invention was in existence before said conversation with Captain Scott." He further testifies that "the model deposited at Washington is the same in substance or principle as when first invented by John Cochrane." The letter of Captain Bunker of the 13th of February, 1843, a copy of which was inclosed in Mr. John Cochrane's letter of the 22d of March, 1844, to the commissioner of patents, is not evidence in this cause; and if it were, it does not give any information as to the priority of invention of the spring-tiller.

All the evidence in favor of the appellant upon that point is contained in the depositions of James and Richard Cochrane; and they do not carry back the date of the invention to any certain time prior to the 19th of October, 1835. The only evidence of Henry Waterman's priority of invention of spring-tillers is contained in the deposition of Stephen Waterman, who testified that in April or May, 1835, he had a conversation with his brother Henry in relation to the application of springs to the head of the rudder, and again in July, 1837; "that at both of said interviews said Henry Waterman described to said deponent his said invention, the same as the one patented to him in Washington;" that in February, 1843, the deponent being about to go to Washington, Henry Waterman furnished him with a model of his invention; that being in New York, they called to see Mr. Cochrane's model, and Henry Waterman showed his own model; that the deponent asked Mr. Halstead, who had charge of Mr. Cochrane's model, how long it had been invented, and the deponent thinks he stated in reply, seven or eight years. The deponent annexes to his deposition an original letter from himself to his brother Henry, but it is of no importance. This deposition appears to have been taken in the presence of Mr. Cochrane, and carries back the date of Waterman's invention of the spring-tiller to April or May, 1835, whereas the date of Mr. Cochrane's invention is not carried back with any degree of certainty beyond the 19th of October, 1835. The commissioner of patents, therefore, was bound, as the case appeared in evidence before him, to refuse to grant a patent to Mr. Cochrane. Mr. Cochrane, in stating the reasons of his appeal, has alleged that Mr. Waterman obtained his patent surreptitiously. There is no evidence to support this charge. The reasons of appeal are extended at great length, and for the most part are founded upon the assumption of facts of which there was no competent evidence before the commissioner: 1. There is no evidence that either of the applicants for the patent had reduced the invention of the spring-tiller to practice. The letter of Captain Bunker is not admissible evidence. 2. There is no evidence of the protest of W. W. Kingsley mentioned in the reasons of appeal. 3. There is no evidence that in the interview between the Watermans and Halstead in New York in 1843 Henry Waterman said that he invented the spring-tiller "four or five years ago;" nor that he had never tried it; nor that Mr. Halstead informed them "that this machine was then on board of two ships, viz., the 'Alabama' and the 'Vicksburg,' and was in operation about six months, and so far appeared to answer well." nor "that Mr. Cochrane had been at great expense in maturing the invention and reducing it to practice, and had it in actual operation;" nor "that Mr. Waterman had bestowed no labor and gone to no expense upon the invention." 4. There is no evidence that Mr. Waterman claimed to have invented this application of springs in 1838 or 1839. 5. There is no evidence that Stephen Waterman protested that if Ellsworth should take back the patent they would enter a suit for damages against him. 6. There is no evidence that Richard Cochrane had the books of the brig "Planter" examined to ascertain the date of the conversation with Captain Scott. 7. What Mr. John Cochrane says, in his reasons of appeal, he told his brother Richard is not evidence. 8. There is no evidence that James Cochrane stated as a reason for fixing the date of the invention before the 19th of October, 1835, that on that day he left Baltimore to reside in Richmond. 9. There is no evidence that Stephen Waterman stated in evidence that Cochrane's "machines were in operation." 10. There is no evidence that Richard Waterman was intentionally assisted by the patent office in disregarding the caveat, as insinuated in the reasons of appeal; nor is there any evidence that the evidence of one of Mr. Cochrane's witnesses was mutilated; nor that any important evidence was suppressed; nor that a portion of the evidence was passed over without notice, as charged in the reasons of appeal. All those reasons of appeal, therefore, which were founded on supposed facts, of which there was no evidence, must be disregarded. The fact that the patent to Mr. Waterman was granted while Mr. Cochrane's caveat was pending and in force does not of itself vacate that patent, nor authorize the commissioner to grant to Mr. Cochrane a patent, unless he should establish his priority of invention. The commissioner could act only upon the evidence before him, and I can act only upon the same evidence. If Mr. Cochrane had other evidence, and did not produce it, it was his own fault or misfortune; but perhaps he may yet file a bill in equity under the sixteenth section of the act of congress of the 4th of July, 1836, and establish his priority and obtain a patent. Upon consideration of the reasons of appeal, and the reasons of the commissioner of patents for his decision, I am of opinion that the decision is correct, and ought to be affirmed.

Case No. 2,929a.

COCKE v. HENSON et al.

[Hempst. 187.] [1]

Superior Court, D. Arkansas. July, 1832.

STAYING PROCEEDINGS FOR NONPAYMENT OF COSTS.

1. It is within the discretionary power of a court to stay proceedings in a second suit until the costs of the first are paid.

2. The rule, if granted at all, is always on the ground of vexation.

[At law. Action by John H. Cocke, assignee of Charles Fisher, against James W. Henson, Benjamin Johnson, and Ambrose H. Sevier.]

Motion to stay proceedings. Before ESKRIDGE and CROSS, Judges.

CROSS, Judge. In this case a motion is made for a rule to stay proceedings until the costs of a former suit for the same cause of action be paid. It appears that some two or three years ago the plaintiff brought suit on the instrument which forms the basis of the present action, and prosecuted the same against the defendants until the last term of this court, when he applied for and obtained leave to suffer a non-suit. Judgment was thereupon rendered against him, in favor of the defendants, for their costs. At the time of this proceeding, the pleadings had been made up, and the defendants had taken depositions to be used on the trial. The writ in the present suit has been sued out since the last term of this court. The motion involves a question of practice, in which there has been no former adjudication in the courts of this territory, of which we have any knowledge, and we have therefore taken something more than ordinary pains to investigate the subject.

Although questions of this kind have never, heretofore, been raised in the courts of this country, they have been of frequent recurrence in the courts of many of the states. There they have been regarded as an appeal to the discretion of the court; and such we consider the present motion. The exercise of discretionary power by judicial tribunals is not only essential to the ends of justice, but to their existence. Without it, the very object of their creation would in some degree be thwarted. When resorted to, however, it should be exercised with great caution, and in such a manner as is best calculated to promote the object of its existence. It has been urged that, although courts necessarily possess discretionary power in many cases, the rule asked for in the present motion is not embraced, and that, in the absence of statutory provision and the sanction of common law, the motion must fail. If the state of facts presented in the case before the court be such as to justify the exercise of the power, we can perceive no objection to its exercise. We have been unable to find any positive prohibitory enactment on the subject; nor have we found anything in our statutes restrictive by inference. In the court of king's bench, in England, the power is constantly exercised. In New York, the supreme court has recognized its existence in a case similar in principle to the one before us. So in Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, and, as is believed, in Tennessee. Such rules have, however, always been refused in the English courts, when the body is in custody for the costs for the prior suit. No delay in suing out execution, that we can find, has ever been allowed to have any influence in granting such rules. The rule, if granted at all, is always allowed upon the ground of vexation. 1 Tidd, Pr. 480. In the case before the court, the plaintiff prosecuted a former suit for the same cause of action for upwards of two years, and when the defendants had prepared their pleadings, and had been at the trouble of summoning witnesses and taking depositions to be used on the trial, and preparing themselves fully for trial, the plaintiff voluntarily, and without any apparent reason for doing so, asked for and obtained a dismissal of his suit, and a few weeks thereafter brought suit in the same court for the same cause of action against the same individuals. Whatever may have been the reasons by which he was influenced to pursue this course, we cannot but presume that justice might have been as well obtained in the first as the present action. The defendants are now driven to the alternative of submitting to his claim, or travelling over the same ground again, in defending against the second suit. Should the plaintiff choose to do so at any subsequent stage of the present suit, he may again suffer a nonsuit and proceed anew against the defendants, and they again be compelled to submit to the claim or defend against it.

[1] [Reported by Samuel H. Hempstead, Esq.]

In the mean time heavy bills of costs might, and would, doubtless, accumulate, if he were allowed to progress without their payment, and, in this state of things, insolvency or elopement might close the scene of vexation. Although such, we apprehend, would not be the case in the present instance, as the plaintiff is said to be abundantly able to meet any demands against him, yet in others it might be so. The principle is the same, regardless of the condition of parties, and we are therefore conclusively of the opinion that the question embraced by the defendants' motion is within the scope of the discretionary power of this court, and that the facts of this case fully justify its exercise. Rule ordered accordingly.

Case No. 2,929b.

COCKE v. KENDALL.

[Hempst. 236.] [1]

Superior Court, D. Arkansas. Feb., 1834.

PLEADING—VENUE—"LAWFUL MONEY."

1. A venue is technically necessary to every material traversable fact; and where one is laid in the count, all matters following refer to it.

2. Venue in the margin sufficient; and the want of one only reachable by special demurrer.

3. "Lawful money" of any state is equivalent to federal money.

Error to Pulaski circuit court.

[At law. Action by James B. Kendall, assignee of John Brown, against John H. Cocke. There was judgment for plaintiff. and defendant brings error.]

Before JOHNSON, ESKRIDGE and CROSS, Judges.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This case comes up on a writ of error to the Pulaski circuit court. The principal grounds relied upon for the reversal of the judgment in the court below, are: 1. That there is no place or venue stated in the declaration where the assignment of the writing declared upon was made. 2. That the judgment is rendered for federal money, when it should have been for lawful money of Virginia. 3. That the judgment is for more than was due. 4. That the court erred in sustaining the demurrer to the defendant's first plea,—of payment.

These objections will be considered in the order they are stated. And first, as to the want of a sufficient venue. The plaintiff in his declaration states a venue in the margin, and alleges "that on the 6th day of April in the year 1824, in the state of Virginia, to wit, in the county of Pulaski and territory of Arkansas aforesaid, and within the jurisdiction of this court, the defendant John H. Cocke, by this certain writing obligatory, acknowledged himself to be held and firmly bound unto one John Brown in the sum of 157 dollars and 75 cents, lawful money of Virginia, &c., to be paid to said Brown six months after the date of said writing obligatory, and that the said Brown, in the day and year last aforesaid, assigned his interest in the aforesaid writing obligatory to the said plaintiff by writing on the back of said writing obligatory in the words following, to wit, 'I assign,' of which the defendant had notice." The authorities are abundant to prove the necessity of a venue to every material traversable fact. 6 Com. Dig. tit. "Pleader," C 20; 10 East, 364; 1 Chit. Pl. 307. But, when there are several facts, the venue stated as to the first will apply to all the sentences connected by the conjunction "and." 1 Chit. Pl. 307. In the case of Skinner v. Gunton, 1 Saund. 229, it is decided that, when the venue is laid for the first matter in the count, all the matter which follows refers to it. In the state of New York, it has been decided that, where no venue is laid in the body of the declaration (if the action be transitory), the venue in the margin is sufficient. 9 Johns. 81. The courts of Massachusetts have said that the want of venue can only be reached by special demurrer. Briggs v. Bank, 5 Mass. 96. These authorities, we think, apply with great force to the case before us. The venue stated in the margin of the declaration alone would be considered sufficient, according to the rule that prevails in most of the states. It is also stated in the body of the count as to the execution of the writing and assignment alleged on the day of its date. The venue, therefore, as to assignment, must be considered the same with that stated for the execution of the writing declared on. We think, without considering the effect of a verdict, that the objection as to venue cannot prevail.

[1] [Reported by Samuel H. Hempstead, Esq.]

The second objection relates to the judgment, which is rendered for money, in the usual form. It is insisted that it should have been rendered for lawful money of Virginia, according to the expression used in the writing. This, we think, in substance has been done, as lawful money of the United States would be lawful money of Virginia, or any other state or territory. At all events, the attitude in which the question is now presented would preclude us from reversing the judgment for that cause. The third and fourth errors assigned have not been urged with much seriousness, and, indeed, they both present questions that have been heretofore settled by this court. Upon the whole, we see no cause for reversing the judgment of the circuit court. Judgment affirmed.

COCKE (MUNROE v.). See Case No. 9,928.

Case No. 2,930.

COCKER et al. v. FRANKLIN HEMP & BAGGING CO.

[1 Story, 169.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. May Term, 1840.

DEPOSITIONS—PRACTICE—WAIVER OF EXCEPTIONS TO INTERROGATORIES.

1. In cases of disagreement between parties in regard to interrogatories and cross interrogatories, they should be referred to a master in chancery to be settled by him, subject to the ultimate review of the court upon an appeal from such report.

[Cited in Zunkel v. Litchfield, 21 Fed. 197.]

2. Exceptions to interrogatories or cross interrogatories should be propounded as objections, before the commission issues, or they will be deemed waived.

At law. Assumpsit [by Robert Cocker and others against the Franklin Hemp & Bagging Company] for goods bargained and sold. Plea, the general issue. At a former term, upon a trial of the cause the jury disagreed, and no verdict was given. [Case No. 2,932.] At the present term, a commission was moved for by the defendants to examine witnesses in England, in support of their defence, and the motion was granted by the court. Interrogatories and cross interrogatories were filed according to the rules of the court. But exceptions were taken by the plaintiffs, to the second, fourth, fifth, sixth, ninth, tenth, eleventh, and twelfth interrogatories of the defendants; and by the defendants to the fifth, sixth, seventh, eighth, ninth, tenth, eleventh, and nineteenth cross interrogatories of the plaintiffs.

The exceptions were briefly argued by Mr. Bartlett, for defendants, and by Loring and Dehon, for plaintiffs.

STORY, Circuit Justice. Applications to review interrogatories in cases of this sort are rare in this court. And I wish, therefore, to say a few words as to the proper course of practice. In general, it seems to me, the most fit course is, that in cases of disagreement between the parties as to the form of the interrogatories and cross interrogatories, it should be referred to a master to settle the proper form of them, subject, of course, to an ultimate review by the court upon an appeal from his decision and report. In this way, by a hearing of the parties, as to the points in issue, the master will generally be able to direct the ultimate form of the interrogatories, so as to make them satisfactory to the parties. In reviewing interrogatories, it is impossible, in many cases, to decide, whether the interrogatory itself, or the particular form, in which it is propounded, is the proper one or not, without a knowledge of the general merits of the cause, or of the points in issue between the parties. Under such circumstances, it seems proper, that the court should reserve their ultimate decision until the trial in all doubtful cases, so that the party affected thereby may have a full opportunity to file exceptions to the ruling of the court, and thus to bring the matter under the review of the appellate court, or to move for a new trial. I shall deem it my duty generally to act upon this course of practice, as best adapted to secure the rights of all parties. When, therefore, exceptions are intended to be taken to any particular interrogatories or cross interrogatories, they should be propounded, as objections before the commission issues, otherwise they will be deemed to be waived. When objected to, if I entertain doubts as to their relevancy or propriety, I shall let them go, and reserve the matter for a final hearing at the trial. If I entertain no doubt, that they are irrelevant or improper, I shall not hesitate to overrule them, and order them to be struck out. In the present case I have varied the form of some of the cross interrogatories, and, with this alteration, I have allowed them. I overrule all the exceptions, taken by the defendants to the cross interrogatories, except to the nineteenth, which I allow, and direct the same to be suppressed. I overrule all the exceptions taken by the plaintiffs to the interrogatories of the defendants, except to the eleventh and twelfth, which I allow, and direct the same to be suppressed. I do not mean to be understood, as being perfectly satisfied, that some of the exceptions taken by the parties may not be good to others of the interrogatories and cross interrogatories. But I desire to reserve a final opinion thereon, until the hearing at the trial.

[1] [Reported by William W. Story, Esq.]

[NOTE. On the trial the jury rendered a verdict for plaintiffs. Case No. 2,931.]

Case No. 2,931.

COCKER et al. v. FRANKLIN HEMP & BAGGING CO.

[1 Story, 332.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. Term, 1840.

SALE AND DELIVERY — REASONABLE TIME—VARYING WRITTEN CONTRACT.

Where a contract was made to manufacture certain articles, and no time was specified in the contract, within which they should be completed and delivered; it was held, that the law imported, that the goods should be manufactured and delivered within a reasonable time; and that parol evidence was admissible, as evidence of what the parties considered reasonable time, but not for the purpose of varying or controlling the terms of the written contract.

At law. This was an action of assumpsit, brought by the house of [Robert] Cocker & Sons, extensive manufacturers of machinery and hardware in England, against the Franklin Hemp and Bagging Company, a corporation formerly engaged in the manufacture of cotton bagging in Boston, to recover damages, upon the refusal of defendants to accept certain copper gill stocks and steel pins manufactured by the plaintiffs, upon a contract in writing made by them with the defendants, in July, 1836. The articles ordered by the defendants were to be used as a part of the machinery in their factory. The contract, on which the action was brought, was in writing, and contained the agreements of the parties, as to the size, quantity, and construction of the articles ordered; the price and mode of payment for the same, and place of delivery, viz. at New York; but it contained no stipulation whatever, as to the time in which the articles were to be completed and delivered to the defendants.

The defence rested on two grounds: 1. That a specific time had been verbally agreed upon between the agents of the contracting parties, within which the articles were to be delivered, which time had elapsed before their delivery. And 2. That if that were not so, the articles ordered were in any event to be delivered within a reasonable time; and that there had been such an unreasonable delay in the execution of the order on the part of the plaintiffs, as to discharge the defendants from any obligation to accept and pay for the articles. It appeared in evidence, that the order for the articles was dated the 13th of July, 1836, and was received in England on the 27th of August of that year; that the manufacture of the articles was commenced about the last of October, or the 1st of November, and was completed on the 31st of December, 1836, and they were forwarded to New York by the first packet from Liverpool, which could take them, where, however, they did not arrive until March 14th, 1837, owing to an unusually long passage. Upon arrival there, they were tendered to the defendants, and refused by them. Evidence was also introduced by the plaintiffs, showing, that in the whole year, 1836, and more especially in the two months preceding the receipt of this order on England, there had been a very great press of business upon the plaintiffs, and a vast increase of orders for gill stocks and pins of the usual kinds. It was also proved by an inspection and examination of their order-book, which was sent out from England upon the requisition of the defendants, that the plaintiffs had not previously received any orders for an article of a pattern and construction like that ordered by the defendants. And several machinists were introduced, whose evidence tended to show, that the articles ordered by the defendants were of a very peculiar and unusual construction; which circumstances, as the plaintiffs contended, accounted reasonably for the delay in the execution of the order.

There was a direct conflict of evidence upon the other point, whether any specific time had been agreed upon by the parties as a part of the contract. Several witnesses testifying in behalf of the defendants, that it was distinctly agreed by the plaintiffs' agent, when the order was given, and as a part of it, that the articles should be delivered in four months, or by the end of November, at farthest. Upon the other hand, the plaintiffs' agent, Mr. James Cocker, testified, that he did not agree, that the articles should be completed and delivered within any specified time, though it was admitted, that he had stated (see 1 Story, 169 [Case No. 2,930]), he had no doubt, that the articles could be completed in thirty days, and delivered in ninety days or four months at farthest; and that such was his expectation at the time of entering into the contract; and he further testified, that he absolutely refused, when requested by the defendants, to fix a time as a part of the contract, because he could not know the state and condition of the plaintiffs' business, or their engagements, or their ability to execute the order in the time named. The written contract itself, and sundry letters of the parties relating to the contract, written before any controversy arose, and which were silent on the matter of time, as making a part of the contract, were strongly urged, and relied upon by the plaintiffs, as supporting and entirely confirming Mr. Cocker's testimony in this respect.

[1] [Reported by William W. Story, Esq.]

[On the first trial, the jury disagreed. Case No. 2,932. For a hearing on exceptions to the interrogatories and cross interrogatories, see Id. 2,930.]

C. G. Loring and Dehon, for plaintiffs.
Fletcher and Bartlett, for defendants.

STORY, Circuit Justice. Where parties have reduced their contracts to writing, the contract so written must be taken to contain all the agreement between them in relation to the subject matter thereof. And when no time (as in this instance) is mentioned in the contract, the law fixes that element of the contract, and declares it to be intended by the parties, that it is to be executed within a reasonable time. Under such circumstances, parol evidence is inadmissible to vary and control the written contract, by proving, that a specific time has been verbally agreed on by the parties, within which the contract should be executed. But such evidence may be admitted for the purpose of showing, what the parties considered to be a reasonable time, when they made the contract, and, as a fact, tending to show, what is a reasonable time. But for special reasons in this case, I shall leave it to the jury to find, whether or not any specific time was verbally agreed upon, as a part of the contract, within which the goods were to be delivered, as is contended for by the defendants. And, if they are satisfied, that a time was so agreed upon, I instruct them to find a verdict for the defendants.

The judge further instructed the jury, that what was a reasonable time in this case, was a question depending upon the peculiar circumstances of the case; and, after reviewing the evidence in the cause, applicable to that question, he left it to the jury to say, whether the plaintiffs had used due diligence, and executed the order, under all circumstances, within a reasonable time; or whether there was such delay in the execution of the order on their part, as discharged the defendants.

The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiffs, for the whole amount claimed and interest.

Case No. 2,932.

COCKER et al. v. FRANKLIN HEMP & FLAX MANUF'G CO.

[3 Sumn. 530.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. May Term, 1839.

SALE AND DELIVERY — REASONABLE TIME — CONTRADICTION OF WRITTEN CONTRACT.

1. If a contract or order, under which goods are to be furnished, does not specify any time at which they are to be delivered, the law implies a contract, that they should be delivered within a reasonable time; and no evidence will be admissible to prove a specific time at which they were to be delivered, for that would be to contradict and vary the legal interpretation of the instrument.

2. The question of reasonable time is determined by a view of all the circumstances of the case; and parol evidence of the conversations of the parties may be admitted to show the circumstances under which the contract was made, and what the parties thought was a reasonable time for performing it.

[Cited in Nunez v. Dautel, 19 Wall. (86 U. S.) 563.]

At law. Assumpsit [by Robert Cocker & Co. against the Franklin Hemp & Flax Manufacturing Company]. There were several counts in the declaration. (1.) On an account annexed, for $2,157.97. (2.) Money counts. (3.) Special count, for not accepting certain articles (gill pins), made by the plaintiffs at the request of the defendants. Plea, general issue.

At the trial, it appeared, that, on the 13th of July, 1836, an order or contract had been entered into at Boston, by the agent of the plaintiffs (who were manufacturers at Hathersage, Sheffield, England), with the agents of the defendants, a manufacturing company in Boston, for the manufacture for the defendants of certain gill pins. The contract was in the following terms: "Boston, July 13, 1836. The Franklin Hemp and Flax Manufacturing Company of Boston order from Cocker & Sons, Hathersage, Sheffield, the following copper gills, which are charged at sterling prices, and to be imported by Cocker & Sons, and charged forty-five per cent. advance for importation; all expenses of importation to be paid by Cocker & Sons. The gill pins will be charged as stated below, at net prices. The F. H. & F. M. Company paying cash on delivery of goods in New York, or drawn upon them at one day's sight." (The list of articles ordered is omitted.)

The principal ground of defense was, that the gill pins were not furnished within the period, at which it was agreed between the agent of the plaintiffs and the agent of the defendants, at the time when the contract was entered into. Parol evidence was offered by the defendants, to show, that, at the time when the contract was made, certain conversations were had between the respective agents, in which the agent for the plaintiffs expressly agreed to furnish the articles, deliverable at New York, within four months from the time of making the contract, that is to say, on or before the 13th of November, 1836. In point of fact, the articles were not begun to be manufactured until the latter part of October, or the beginning of November; and they were not completed, so as to be shipped, until the end of December, 1836. They arrived in New York about the 18th of March, 1837, and notice was immediately given to the company, who refused to receive them. In fact, on the 19th of January, 1837, the agent of the defendants had written to the agent of the plaintiffs, informing him, that the company did not hold themselves bound to receive them, as they were to have been delivered in the month of November. The manufactory of the defendants, in which the articles were to be used, was in a state to receive the articles for use in November and December, 1837; and the articles not having then arrived, other articles for the same purpose, of an inferior quality, were used as a substitute. The manufactory of the defendants was accidentally burnt down about the 14th of February, 1837. It was proved at the trial, that the sole reason of the delay in manufacturing the articles, was the unusual pressure of orders in the year 1836, and that it was impracticable, consistently with the other engagements of the plaintiffs, to have furnished them at an earlier period. Several witnesses swore, that there was this unusual pressure during that year; and that the shortest time to furnish such articles would be, if they were to be manufactured, from five to six months. And they stated, that they thought these articles were furnished within a reasonable time. The main defence at the trial being, that the goods were not furnished according to the agreement, a question was made, whether the parol evidence of the conversations between the parties, at the time of the contract, was admissible. It was ruled by the court to be admissible, not for the purpose of establishing the specific time when the contract was to be performed, for that would be to add to and vary the written contract; but to show the circumstances under which the contract was made, and what the parties then thought was a reasonable time for furnishing them.

[1] [Reported by Charles Sumner, Esq.]

The cause was argued to the jury by Mr. Dehon and Charles G. Loring, for plaintiffs and by Mr. Bartlett for defendants. The latter cited [Pearson v. Bank of Metropolis] 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 89. The former cited 2 Greenl. 249, and Ellis v. Thompson, 3 Mees. & W. 445.

STORY, Circuit Justice, in summing up to the jury, said:

The contract or order, under which these gill pins were to be furnished, does not specify any time at which they were to be delivered. The result of this omission is, that the law treats the contract, as if it had expressly stated, that they were deliverable within a reasonable time. No evidence, therefore, could properly be admissible to prove a specific time, at which they were to be delivered; for that would be to contradict and vary the legal construction of the instrument. But the parol evidence was admitted of the conversations, to show what, at the time, the parties understood was a reasonable time, within which, under ordinary circumstances, the contract might be fulfilled. In this view, the parol evidence did not contradict or vary the written contract, but went merely to show the opinions of the parties as to the reasonable time for executing it. I thought, and still think, that in this view the evidence was clearly admissible. And I am very glad to find, that this my view of the matter is confirmed by the opinion of the court of exchequer in Ellis v. Thompson, 3 Mees. & W. 445. Mr. Baron Alderson, (a very able judge), on that occasion used the following language, which I cite, as fully expressive of the very opinion, which I entertain on the same subject. "There is no specification," said he, "in the contract, as to the time when the delivery is to take place, and, therefore, the law would imply, that the delivery should take place within a reasonable time. And it is a question for the jury at the trial; and this was the question put to them: How the reasonable time, which is an implied part of the contract, is to be ascertained? It seems to me, that the correct mode of ascertaining it is, in such a case as this, by placing the court and jury in the same situation as the contracting parties themselves were in, at the time they made the contract; that is to say, by placing before the jury all the circumstances, which were known to both parties at the time the contract itself took place. By so doing, you enable the court and jury to form a safer conclusion, as to what is the reasonable time, which the law implies, and under which the contract itself took place." So far the learned judge has expressed himself on the very point of this case. The whole question now before the jury is, whether these articles were manufactured and offered to be delivered within a reasonable time. That reasonable time must be judged of by all the circumstances, and, of course, with all the natural calculations, which might fairly arise from the distance of the countries, the season of the year, the state of the markets, and orders, the pressure of business, and the common disappointments and retardations incident to the manufacture of any new article. The contract was made in Boston; the articles were to be manufactured in England. Of course, a reasonable time for the transmission of the order, for its due and faithful execution, and for the shipment and arrival at New York, was necessarily in the contemplation of the parties. Were the goods, then, delivered, or offered to be delivered, within such reasonable time? If they were, then the defendants are bound to pay for them. If not, then they ought to be exonerated. The conversations which have been admitted, as I have stated, are evidence, not of a contract to deliver at a specified time (four months), at all events, or otherwise the bargain was to be void. But merely as statements of opinion and probabilities, uttered by a young man, sanguine in his expectations, and, without doubt, honestly made. But the other side must be presumed to be as good judges as himself, of the time which might or would be required for the transaction of the order and the shipment and arrival of the goods, if not of the time required for the actual execution of the order. Opinions are not contracts, but expressions of belief; and must so be understood. They affirm what may be, not what will or shall be absolutely done.

Let us then see, how the evidence stands on this subject as to the reasonableness of the time and the diligence in executing the order. (Here the judge recapitulated the evidence. The case was then left to the jury upon the matter of fact.) [2]

The jury disagreed, and no verdict was found.

[NOTE. A new trial was had, and the jury rendered a verdict for plaintiffs. Case No. 2,931. For hearing on exceptions to interrogatories and cross interrogatories, see Case No. 2,930.]

COCKERILL (CONNER v.). See Case No. 3,112.

COCKREM (BIRD v.). See Case No. 1,429.

COCKRIN (UNITED STATES v.). See Case No. 14,822.

COCKRUN v. McLEAN. See Case No. 2,927a.

Case No. 2,933.

In re COCKS.

[3 Ben. 260.] [1]

District Court, E. D. New York. May, 1869.

BANKRUPTCY—BAKER—TRADESMAN.

A baker, who buys flour, which he makes into bread, and sells the bread to daily customers, is a tradesman within the meaning of the 29th section of the bankruptcy act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 531)], and is not entitled to a discharge, if he has not kept proper books of account.

[In the matter of John F. Cocks, a bankrupt.]

BENEDICT, District Judge. This case raises the question whether a person whose occupation is that of a baker, and who buys flour, which he converts into bread, and then sells the bread to daily customers, is to be deemed a tradesman, within the meaning of the 29th section of the bankrupt act, and therefore not entitled to a discharge, where it appears that he has kept no books of account whatever.

As neither counsel have referred to any authority bearing upon the question, I am justified in assuming for the purposes of this case that no authorities exist, either in this country or in England, which throw any light upon the subject. In the absence of any light from authorities, I incline to the opinion that the petitioner must be held to be a tradesman, and, therefore, not entitled to a discharge, for the reason that it appears that he has kept no books of account.

Case No. 2,934.

COCKS v. IZARD et al.

[4 Am. Law T. Rep. U. S. Cts. 68.]

Circuit Court, D. Louisiana. March, 1871.

ALIEN ENEMY — RIGHT TO SUE IN ENEMY COUNTRY—PRINCIPAL AND AGENT — EXECUTION SALE —PROMISE TO RECONVEY.

1. An alien enemy may sue and be sued in the courts of the enemy country.

2. The authority of an agent is not affected by war, and proceedings had against an agent during a state of war, to which the principal could not answer by reason of the existence of war, are valid, and hold the principal.

[3. An oral promise by a purchaser on execution sale to reconvey to the debtor, upon reimbursement of his advances and charges, is not enforceable in equity.]

[See note at end of case.]

WOODS, Circuit Judge. On the 24th day of March, 1863, Robert Anderson, a citizen of the state of New York, and a general in the United States army, brought an action in the United States provisional court for the state of Louisiana, against John G. Cocks. The plaintiff in that suit alleged that defendant was indebted to him in the sum of $8,840, being the balance due on certain promissory notes executed by defendant, and of which plaintiff was the holder, and including certain costs incurred by plaintiff for which defendant was bound. The citation was returned "served on defendant at his last place of residence, No. 192 Canal street." A citation was also served on Charles Hyllested, who the petitioner averred was the duly authorized agent of the said defendant, and authorized to represent him and stand in judgment for and against him. Defendant having made default on the 30th day of May, 1863, judgment was rendered against him in favor of the plaintiff for $8,440. Upon this judgment a writ of fieri facias was issued on the 25th day of November, 1864, which was levied on two improved lots in the city of [2] In Bottomley v. Forbes, 5 Bing. N. C. 127, the court held, that, where a doubt was raised by evidence upon the meaning of a mercantile contract, evidence was admissible of the usage or course of trade at the place where the contract was to be carried into effect, to explain or remove that doubt.

[1] [Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

New Orleans, of which the defendant was seized in fee, and after appraisement and advertisement, the same were sold at public auction, by the marshal of said court, to Charles Izard, one of the defendants in this case. By virtue of a subsequent judicial proceeding and sale, Paul H. Lewis, the other defendant, became vested with all the title of Izard to the premises. John G. Cocks, who, at the time of these proceedings against him, alleges that he was a citizen and resident of the state of Mississippi, files his bill in equity against Izard and Lewis, the object and prayer of which is that they may be compelled to convey to him the property sold under said judgment, that an account of the rents and profits may be taken, and if any balance shall be found due to plaintiff after deducting the amount paid by Izard for the property, he may have a decree therefor.

In support of prayer, the complainant in his bill alleges: 1. That the said United States provisional court was not a legal court, and that, therefore, the judgment and proceedings thereunder were absolutely void. 2. That no legal service of the citation in the case of Anderson v. Cocks was made on complainant. 3. That, at the sale of the property by the marshal of the provisional court, the defendant, Izard, gave out that he was bidding on said property on account of the complainant, for which reason persons who were in attendance refrained from bidding, because they did not desire to compete with complainant, whereby competition was prevented and the property sold at rates greatly disproportioned to its actual value. 4. That, after the sale, Izard promised to reconvey the property to complainant upon reimbursement of his advance and charges, which conveyance he has failed to make.

I do not understand that the first ground on which the prayer for relief is based, is still insisted on by complainant: that, in the case of The Grapeshot, 9 Wall. [76 U. S.] 129, the supreme court of the United States has held that the United States provisional court of Louisiana was a lawful and constitutional court. We may, then, consider that point as out of the case. But it is claimed that no service of the citation or summons was made upon Cocks, the defendant in the suit before the provisional court, nor upon his agent duly authorized to receive service by the state law. It appears from the record that the citation was twice served—once, as the return of the marshal shows, by leaving a copy at the last place of residence of said Cocks, No. 192 Canal street, and once by delivering a copy to Charles Hyllested, the agent of said Cocks. The attempted service at the domicil is clearly ineffectual and void. The Code of Practice (section 189) requires that when service of citation is made at the domicil, it shall be by copy left at the usual domicil or residence of the defendant. The return of the marshal does not show that the citation was so served, and the proof shows clearly that the house No. 192 Canal street was not the domicil or residence of Cocks. It is admitted, however, that service was made on Charles Hyllested, who, defendants aver, was duly authorized to receive service from Cocks. If Hyllested was the duly-authorized agent of Cocks to receive service or process, or to defend suit, the service upon him might be a good service. Section 196 of the Code of Practice provides that if the person absent has an attorney in fact, whose name appears in the petition, the sheriff shall make service on the attorney in fact. But complainant says that the procuration, or power of attorney held by Hyllested, did not authorize him to receive service, or appear and defend suits against his principal. I have examined this power with some care, and am clear that the authority to appear and defend suits against the principal is conferred upon the agent. It appoints Hyllested as the true and lawful attorney in fact of Cocks, giving him full power and authority to manage and transact, all and singular, the affairs, business, and concerns of the principal in the city of New Orleans and state of Louisiana, of every nature and kind, without any exception or reservation whatever; to open and answer letters, sign and indorse the name of the principal on promissory notes or bills of exchange; to appear before all courts of law and equity, there to do and prosecute, as occasion shall require, or to compromise, compound, or agree in the premises by arbitration or otherwise; and, generally, to do and perform all and every other act, matter, and thing whatsoever, as shall or may be necessary or requisite, touching or concerning the affairs, business, and concern of the principal, as fully, amply, and effectually, and to all intents and purposes and with the same validity as if all and every such act, matter, or thing were or had been particularly stated, expressed, or especially provided for, as he, the said principal, could or might do if personally present. It is difficult to see how broader powers could be conferred on an agent, or to escape the conclusion that Cocks intended to authorize his attorney in fact to appear and defend actions against him. In Fuselier v. Robin, 4 La. Ann. 61, it was held by the supreme court of this state that the power to represent a principal in the defence of actions must result from the express terms of the instrument, or from an implication so clear as to be irresistible. I think, in this case, the implication is irresistible. But complainant says that, at the time of service on his attorney in fact, he was within the confederate lines; that communication with his agent, who was within the federal lines, was forbidden, and, therefore, the agency ceased, and to support this view cites article 2996, Civ. Code.

This article provides that procuration expires by change of the condition of the principal, or the seclusion or interdiction of the agent or principal. I do not think that this article touches the question. By a change of condition is meant such a change of state as produces an incapacity in either party. Thus, if an unmarried woman should, as principal, execute a power of attorney, or give any other authority to an agent, and afterwards should marry, the marriage would ipso facto amount to a revocation of the power. This proceeds upon the principle that the derivative authority expires with the original from which it proceeds. The bankruptcy of the principal is another illustration of what is meant by change of condition. By seclusion I understand this article to mean religious seclusion—the taking of such religious vows as makes the party civiliter mortuus. It is strange that such a provision should be found in the Code of Louisiana. That it was inadvertently incorporated into the jurisprudence of this state from the civil law I think clear. Interdiction occurs when a party becomes non compos mentis, and the law interferes and places his affairs in the hands of a curator or guardian. This article of the Code does not therefore apply. Although the Civil Code does not, in my opinion, by its provision revoke the power of the attorney under the circumstances of this case, yet there remains the question whether or not the state of war operated to effect such revocation, the principal and agent being citizens and residents of the countries at war with each other. I understand the rule of law to be this:—That when before the declaration of war, or commencement of hostilities, a principal in one country creates an agent in another, the agency continues notwithstanding the subsequent outbreak of war between the two countries, for all lawful purposes not forbidden by the laws of war. The agent of an alien enemy is not authorized by the state of war to abandon, or destroy, or squander the property of his principal. It is his duty to preserve it and protect it. He may receive money due his principal, and give acquittances therefor, and he may carry out and fulfill any lawful contract of his principal. 19 Johns. 139; [Ward v. Smith] 7 Wall. [74 U. S.] 452; [U. S. v. Grossmayer] 9 Wall. [76 U. S.] 74. It has even been held that the subjects of an enemy nation, ordered away in consequence of war, are entitled to leave a power of attorney, and to collect debts by virtue thereof. Emerigon, Traité des Assurances, tom. 1, p. 567. The power of attorney given by Cocks to Hyllested was not revoked by the war.

But another question still remains in this branch of the case, namely: Can an alien enemy be sued in the courts of the country in which his own is at war? For, if a suit would not lie against Cocks on account of his enemy's character, if he were present in person, and personally served with process, a fortiori, it would not lie when the service was upon his attorney in fact. There has been some slight conflict of authorities on the question whether an alien enemy could sue in the courts of the enemy country. But it appears to be now well settled that he can sue, and, as a consequence, that he can be sued. In Sparenburgh v. Bannatyne, 1 Bos. & P. 163, it was held in the common pleas at Westminster that an alien under the king's protection, even if he were a prisoner, might sue and be sued. This point has long before been decided in Wells v. Williams, 1 Ld. Raym. 282. So in Clarke v. Morey, 10 Johns. 69, it was held by Kent, C. J., upon a plea of alien enemy, that an alien or subject of Great Britain, who came to reside in the United States after the breaking out of the war between the United States and Great Britain, might, during the war, sue and be sued, as in time of peace. If an alien enemy is served with process, or submits to the jurisdiction of the court, there is no rule of public policy which forbids a suit against him. The policy of the laws of war forbids any intercourse between the belligerents, or that money or other resources shall be transferred so as to strengthen the enemy. But when an alien enemy has left an agent upon whom process can be served, there is no reason why suit should not be brought against him; for it does not necessitate intercourse, nor does it tend to strengthen the enemy. On the contrary, its effect is in the other direction.

I am of opinion, therefore, that the power of attorney from Cocks to Hyllested continued in force, notwithstanding the war; that the power of attorney authorized Hyllested to receive service of process for his principal, and to defend actions brought against them, and that, under the Code of Practice of this state, the service upon Hyllested, the attorney, was a good service upon his principal. It follows, therefore, that the judgment of the provisional court in favor of Anderson, and against Cocks, was a valid judgment. Nevertheless, if Izard, being the tenant of Cocks, gave out and let it be understood that he was bidding for the property sold under the judgment of Anderson at the time of the auction, for account of Cocks and in his interest, and persons in attendance, who were ready and willing to bid more for the property than the price at which it was sold to Izard, refrained from bidding, not willing to compete in bidding with Cocks or any person who was understood to represent him, and thus competition was prevented and the property sold for a grossly inadequate price, then the sale was a fraudulent one and ought to be set aside. It has been so decided by the supreme court of the United States. Cocks v. Izard, 7 Wall. [74 U. S.] 559. So that the question is presented for decision: Does the proof establish the alleged fraudulent practice of Izard? The answer of Izard is under oath. It is true that the bill waives an answer under oath; but such waiver is not authorized by any rule of the United States courts sitting in equity, nor has there been any order of this court directing that the answer of the defendant be received without oath. Under these circumstances, the defendant has the right to answer under oath, and to make his answer testimony. To overcome the denial of the answer responsive to the bill, there must be the testimony of two witnesses, or one witness and strong corroborating circumstances. I have examined the evidence in this case, and am satisfied that the charge of fraudulent practices on the part of Izard with respect to this sale is not affirmatively established. As to the last ground on which the plaintiff bases his prayer for relief—namely, that Izard promised to re-convey the property to complainant upon reimbursement of his advances and charges—it is sufficient to say that this alleged contract not being in writing, even if satisfactorily proved, cannot be in force in a court either of law or equity. The complainant having failed to establish any of the grounds for the relief prayed, his bill must be dismissed at his costs. Decree accordingly.

[NOTE. On appeal by complainant, the supreme court reversed the decree of the circuit court, and remanded the case, on the ground, as set forth in the opinion of Mr. Justice Davis, that Izard, the tenant of complainant, obtained possession of the property by unfair practices which prevented intending purchasers from bidding at the sale, and enabled him to acquire the property at a sum hardly equal to its yearly rental value, and that the failure of complainant to apply summarily to set aside the sale, and for a resale, did not forfeit his right to redress in equity according to the prayer of the bill. Cocks v. Izard, 7 Wall. (74 U. S.) 559.]

CODDINGTON (HATCH v.). See Case No. 6,205.

CODMAN (ROBISON v.). See Case No. 11,970.

Case No. 2,935.

CODMAN et al. v. VERMONT & C. R. CO.

[16 Blatchf. 165.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Vermont. April 15, 1879.

GUARANTY—NEGOTIABILITY—FIXATION OF LIABILITY—INTEREST.

1. The trustees and managers of the Vermont Central Railroad Company and the Vermont and Canada Railroad Company issued notes, to the amount of $1,000,000, in sums of $1,000 each, by which they, as trustees and managers only, reciting that it was in accordance with the votes of the stockholders of the two companies, and by virtue of a decree of the court of chancery of the state of Vermont and of a special act of the legislature of Vermont, promised to pay to the order of the defendant the sum, 20 years from date, with interest at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum payable semi-annually, at their office in Boston, on presentation of the interest coupons attached. The notes were signed by the trustees and managers, as such, and interest coupons, payable to bearer, for each instalment of interest, were attached. On each note was this endorsement, signed by the treasurer of the defendant, under its seal: "For value received, the Vermont and Canada Railroad Company hereby guarantee the payment of the within note, principal and interest, according to its tenor, and order the contents thereof to be paid to the bearer." The notes were put on the market, and C. purchased 50 of them at par and ⅛, without notice in regard to them, beyond the general knowledge, open to all, of the location and situation of the railroads, and what appeared upon, and would be suggested by, the face of the instrument. C. sued the defendant to recover the amount of 2 coupons on each of the 50 bonds. The defendant admitted the "demand, notices and protest of said coupons, as they fell due." Held: The defendant became liable upon the notes, as guarantor, to any one to whom the guaranty would run and who would be entitled to sue upon it.

2. Whether the guaranty was negotiable, quaere.

3. The endorsement was a contract of endorsement, running to the bearer.

4. The admission as to demand, notices and protest, is sufficient to show that the liability of the defendant as endorser became fixed.

5. Interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, and no more, can be recovered on the notes, with interest at that rate, on such interest, as damages, from the time when payment should have been made.

[At law. Action by Robert Codman and Henry A. Johnson against the Vermont & Canada Railroad Company.]

Plaintiffs, pro se, and William G. Shaw, and Benjamin F. Fifield with them.

Francis A. Brooks and Edward J. Phelps, for defendants.

WHEELER, District Judge. This is an action of assumpsit against the defendant, as guarantor and endorser of fifty negotiable bonds, of one thousand dollars each, to recover arrears of interest thereon, and has been tried by the court upon stipulation of the parties waiving a jury, filed. The defendant leased its road, before it was built, to the Vermont Central Railroad Company, reserving semi-annual rent equal to eight per cent. annual interest on its cost, and, to secure payment, took a stipulation for reentry and a conveyance of the Vermont Central Railroad, to be operative on default, giving a right "to receive all tolls, fares and other lawful income receivable for the use of the said railroads," and, after paying expenses, to "apply the residue of its said receipts in and towards the payment of all rent then in arrear and unpaid." The Vermont Central Railroad Company also mortgaged its road by two successive mortgages, subject to the security for the Vermont and Canada rent. Default was made of the mortgaged debts, and also of the rent, and the roads were surrendered to the mortgage trustees. The Vermont and Canada Company brought a bill in equity, in the court of chancery of the state, to enforce its security for the payment of its rent, and the roads were by that court placed in the hands of receivers. Much question was made, in that proceeding, as to the effect and validity of the lease and conveyance to secure rent, but they were finally held valid and operative, by the supreme court of the state, on appeal, and the amount of the annual rent was fixed, but it was not decided that the possession of the roads should go to the Vermont and Canada Company, and they were left in the hands of receivers, to be operated, and to have the income applied in satisfaction of the rent, and, after that, of the mortgage debt, subject to the control of the court of chancery. Vermont & C. R. Co. v. Vermont Cent. R. Co., 34 Vt. 1. After that decree, an agreement was entered into between the Vermont and Canada Company and other security holders, sanctioned by a special act of the legislature of the state, by virtue of which a further decree was entered up in the cause, authorizing an increase of the stock of the Vermont and Canada Company to two millions of dollars, and providing for the payment of rent equal to eight per cent. annual interest on that amount, which was to "be paid by the trustees and receivers from time to time in possession of said roads and property, and from the income thereof," and, for the payment of the residue, after paying certain expenses, to the subsequent security holders, and for keeping the cause on foot, with liberty to any party to apply to the court for further orders therein. The trustees and receivers in possession, from time to time, with consent of the Vermont and Canada Company, and some of the other security holders and representatives of others, obtained orders of the court for, and negotiated, equivalent loans. In the fore part of 1871, they represented to the directors of the defendant, that they were under a large floating debt, incurred in building extensions of the Vermont and Canada Railroad, in improving the road-beds and superstructures of the Vermont Central and Vermont and Canada roads, and in procuring additional equipment for them, and proposed measures for relief. They adopted a resolution providing for new stock to pay for and represent the cost of the extension, and for a new loan of a million of dollars, to be endorsed and guaranteed by that company, and for a meeting of the stockholders to consider the subject. Meetings of the directors and stockholders were held on the 16th day of May in that year, and it was voted at each, that the company should endorse and guarantee the notes of the trustees and managers, to the amount of one million of dollars, payable in twenty years from date, and bearing interest at the rate of eight per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually, and the treasurer was authorized to execute the endorsement and guarantee. Application to the court was made immediately by the trustees and managers, for leave to the Vermont and Canada Company to issue new stock, and for them to issue their notes for the loan, which was granted, and that company was authorized to issue five hundred thousand dollars of new stock, on account of the construction of the branches, to meet a part of the floating debt, and the trustees were authorized to issue their notes, as stated, to the amount of a million of dollars, to be endorsed and guaranteed by the company, to meet the residue. The notes were issued in sums of one thousand dollars each, by which the trustees and managers, as trustees and managers only, reciting that it was in accordance with the votes of the stockholders of the Vermont Central and Vermont and Canada Railroad Companies, and by virtue of a decree of the court of chancery, as well as of a special act of the legislature of Vermont, promised to pay to the order of the Vermont and Canada Railroad Company, the sum, at the time specified, with interest at the rate specified, at their office in Boston, on presentation of the interest coupons attached, and signed by the trustees and managers as such; and interest coupons, payable to bearer, for each instalment of interest, were attached. On each was endorsed, by the treasurer, under the seal of the defendant company: "For value received, the Vermont and Canada Railroad Company hereby guarantee the payment of the within note, principal and interest, according to its tenor, and order the contents thereof to be paid to the bearer." The notes so executed and endorsed were put upon the market, and the plaintiffs purchased fifty of them at par and one-eighth, without notice in regard to them beyond the general knowledge, open to all, of the location and situation of these railroads, and what appeared upon, and would be suggested by, the face of the instrument. The coupons were paid by the trustees and managers to January 1st, 1876. Those falling due July 1st, 1876, and January 1st, 1877, were not paid. The "demand, notices and protest of said coupons as they fell due." is admitted in writing by the defendant. This suit is brought to recover the amount due upon them.

[1] [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

The defendant insists, that the agreement of guarantee and the obligations of endorser were, under the circumstances, wholly outside the scope of the corporate powers of the defendant and not binding; that it was mere accommodation paper as to the defendant, and that the guarantee was, therefore, not binding; that the endorsement is not sufficient in form to bind the defendant as endorser; that its liability as endorser would not become fixed by the demand, notice and protest admitted of the coupons; that, if the endorsement was sufficient and the protest good, the guarantee, coupled with the endorsement, would show that both were for accommodation and prevent liability of the defendant.

The statute law of the state then was and now is: "Every railroad corporation within this state, if it shall vote so to do, at a meeting of the stockholders, called for such purpose, shall have power to issue their notes or bonds, for the purpose of building or furnishing their roads, or paying any debts contracted for building or furnishing the same, bearing such a rate of interest, not exceeding seven per cent., and secured in such manner, as they may deem expedient." Gen. St. Vt. 237, § 97. "All notes or bonds which may be issued under and by virtue of the provisions of this chapter shall be issued for a sum not less than one hundred dollars, and shall be made payable in not less than three years, nor more than twenty years, from the time of issuing the same." Id. § 99. The form in which railroad companies should become parties to notes or bonds issued, whether as makers, guarantors or endorsers, would not seem to be important for bringing them within the provisions of these sections, if their object should be within the scope of the power conferred, and they should not be issued contrary to the provisions. The power extends to building and furnishing their roads and to paying debts for those things. In this case, no witness has testified directly to what the purpose was for which these notes were made and sold. All that appears on that subject is what appears from the corporate acts and conduct of the defendant in connection with, and upon the representations of, the trustees and managers. They were issued and sold to pay a floating debt. This debt was represented to be for construction of new road under the charter of the Vermont and Canada Railroad, and for improving the road-beds and superstructures and providing equipment for both roads. The defendant voted to issue its new stock to pay for the construction, and to endorse and guarantee the notes to pay the rest of the debt, upon these representations. The question of fact involved is to be found upon such evidence as is competent to bind the defendant. This corporate action is deemed sufficient to show, as against the defendant, that the debt was, and it is found to have been, a debt contracted for those purposes. This purpose was building and furnishing the roads, within the meaning of the statute. The power only extends, however, to building and furnishing their roads, and, if these were not the defendant's roads, this building and furnishing did not come within the statute. It is said, in argument, that the defendant has never actually had any railroad at all; for, it leased its road by perpetual lease, before it was built, reserving to itself rent, so that it had nothing left but a rent charge upon the roads of others. Litt. § 218; Co. Litt. 144a. This is true, except as to the stipulation for reentry into the road leased, and the conveyance taken of the other to secure the rent, and true notwithstanding them, until there was a default entitling them to the roads, and until it availed itself of its right to the roads. When their proceeding in equity to enforce the security produced a receiver of the roads and put them into the possession of receivers, the receivers were mere officers of the court, without any rights whatever of their own, and they held the property under the direction of the court, by the title of and for whoever should ultimately be entitled to it. The supreme court of the state held that the defendant was entitled to it to hold until the profits should pay the rent, but, under the then existing circumstances, left the roads in the hands of the receivers, and accorded to the defendant its rights, by requiring the profits to be paid upon the rent. The roads were, then, the roads of the defendant, and would continue to be so until the rent should be paid. The agreements and transactions which resulted in the compromise decree did not vary the title and right of the defendant to the property. By the express terms of the decree, it was provided, clause fourth: "That rent shall be paid to said Vermont and Canada Railroad Company, upon said sums of two millions of dollars, chargeable upon the whole property and income of said roads, as a first lien thereon," &c. There was no conveyance by anybody to the trustees and receivers. They were there in possession, under the orders of the court, without title of their own, and were merely left there without title of their own, and with no provision for them to acquire title. The ownership was that of the defendant, to the extent of its rent, then, in the mortgagees of the first mortgage, to the extent of the mortgage debt, and then in the mortgagees of the second mortgage, to the extent of that debt, and then in the Vermont Central Railroad Company. The arrangement, so far as its terms were concerned, was perpetual. If successful enough, it might work out a right in the Central Company to the possession of the roads, subject to the lien of the defendant, by paying off the mortgage, after satisfying the accruing rent, but that would never increase the rights of the trustees and receivers; they would all the while remain in possession for others. In this situation they were claimed to be, and for some purposes were held to be, receivers of the court. Vermont & C. R. Co. v. Vermont Cent. R. Co., 46 Vt. 792. When they asked for an order to sell the property as receivers, the supreme court of the state held that they were not receivers strictly, but rather managing agents. Id., 50 Vt. 500. It is no part of the present purpose here to do more than ascertain whether, under the laws of the state, and the procedure, as expounded by the courts of the state, the roads were the roads of the defendant for furnishing and equipment. For this purpose it is not necessary that they should belong to the defendant absolutely, to every intent and for all other purposes, but is enough if they so belonged for the present purposes needing the furniture and equipment. If agents, there must be a principal, and, in the transactions creating the agency, there was no party more prominent in the character of principal than the defendant. If receivers, they wanted the money got for these notes for the improvement of the defendant's property in their hands as receivers, in the manner authorized by the statute; if agents, they wanted it for the same purposes for the property in their hands as agents. They executed the notes in the character only in which they held the property, and not as individuals. That would only bind the right by which they held the property, which was all subject to the defendant's right, except so far as, if at all, they represented the defendant. So that, until the defendant's right to the property should be satisfied, the defendant was the sole party, in reality, to the notes, and the sole party to be benefited by the consideration of the notes. Without the furniture and equipment of the roads, the trustees could earn nothing for the defendant. Its interest was that of an owner, direct, and not remote. In this view the defendant became liable upon the notes, as guarantor, to any one to whom the guarantee would run, and who would be entitled to sue upon it.

This guarantee is not, in terms, negotiable. By it the defendant guarantees the payment of the note, principal and interest, "according to its tenor." The note being negotiable, perhaps these words draw that quality into the guarantee. If they do, the guarantee would seem to be negotiable. Story, Prom. Notes, § 484. If not, in Partridge v. Davis, 20 Vt. 499, Davis, J., seems to have thought such a guarantee would, in effect, be negotiable; while in Sanford v. Norton, 14 Vt. 228, and Sylvester v. Downer, 20 Vt. 355, the late Chief Justice Redfield was clearly of the opinion that, like ordinary simple contracts, such guarantees would not be negotiable. No case has been noticed in which this precise question has been settled by the decision of the highest court of the state of Vermont, where this contract was made. The plaintiffs are remote holders, and had no transaction directly with the defendant, and cannot recover upon the guarantee itself, unless it is negotiable. It is not, however, necessary to decide upon this here, unless the endorsement or protest is defective, for, the amount and effect of recovery would be the same upon the endorsement as upon the guarantee.

The endorsement was filled up by the endorser when it was made; therefore, it is not capable of being filled up by an implied authority to write what would be according to commercial usage and the presumed intention of the parties, or of being altered to that, as would have been the case if the endorsement had been in blank and been left so, or had been wrongly or defectively filled up by some one besides the defendant, afterward. It is what the defendant made it, and all that was made or authorized in that behalf, and must speak for itself. The notes were payable to the defendant or order; the defendant, by the endorsement, ordered the contents of the notes to be paid to the bearer. The language used is like that which would have been used by the defendant in drawing a bill of exchange in favor of the bearer, on the makers of these notes. In that case, the defendant would order them to pay the sum named in the bill to the bearer. In this case, the defendant orders them to pay the sums named in the notes to the bearer. In each case, by assuming to order the money to be paid, the party undertakes that it shall be paid, if due diligence, according to the law-merchant, is used. This endorsement seems to be ample and appropriate for the purpose of laying a foundation for liability, and not to be unusual. Story, Prom. Notes, § 138, note. Vincent v. Horlock, 1 Camp. 442, and the language of Lord Ellenborough used therein, have been referred to by counsel for the defendant, as showing that such an endorsement would create no liability, although it would carry the title to the note. One Jacks drew the bill payable to his own order and endorsed it in blank and delivered it to the defendants. One of the defendants, a firm, wrote over the signature of Jacks: "Pay the contents to Vincent & Co.," without signing it at all. So, the defendants' names were not on the bill at all. The point was, whether writing those words over the name of Jacks made the defendants liable as endorsers. As to that, Lord Ellenborough did say: "We see these words, 'Pay the contents to such a one,' written over a blank endorsement every day, without any thought of contracting an obligation; and no obligation is thereby contracted." That all would agree to.

The protest itself is not shown, but demand, notices and protest of the coupons, as they fell due, are admitted. The endorsements are upon the notes and not upon the coupons. The only question about this is, whether the case shows that the instruments endorsed are the ones protested. If not, the liability as endorser may not be fixed, for want of that connection. The notes ran, that interest should be paid on presentation of the coupons. The plaintiffs held both notes and coupons. The coupons themselves contain promises to pay, but there is no reference to the defendant in them. The notice admitted, which must have been notice to the defendant, could not have been given without production of the notes as well as of the coupons. So, the admission, in connection with the circumstances, is taken to mean, that the notes and coupons were presented together, and payment thereupon was refused, and that protest was made for that non-payment, whereby the liability of the defendant as endorser became well fixed.

These notes were issued in sums of not less than one hundred dollars each, and made payable in not less than three nor more than twenty years from the date of issue, and are in accordance with the provisions of the statute in all respects, except that their rate of interest is eight per cent., while the statute recited provides for a rate not exceeding seven. In Vermont, where this contract was made, stipulating for or taking interest at a rate greater than the law allows does not vitiate the obligation. If such interest is not paid, it may be recovered for at the legal rate; if it is paid, the excess may be recovered back. In Massachusetts, where the notes were payable, no rate of interest was unlawful. If the law of Massachusetts is to govern, this feature of the notes cannot affect the right of recovery at all; if that of Vermont, it can only affect the rate of recovery and the amount.

In ordinary cases, where there is no limitation upon the power to enter into such a contract, nor anything otherwise to affect its inherent validity, interest may be stipulated for, and is to be paid according to the law of the place of payment or performance. 2 Kent, Comm. 460, note c; Story, Prom. Notes, § 155; Andrews v. Pond, 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 65. But, where the power to enter into such a contract, or the validity of it when entered into, depends upon the law of the place where made, or the contract is made apparently with special reference to the law of that place where made, that law governs. De Wolf v. Johnson, 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 367; Andrews v. Pond, 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 65. In Cheever v. Rutland & B. R. Co., not reported, the notes were executed in Boston and payable there, but were made by a railroad corporation of Vermont, and were to bear interest at seven per cent., and, on their face, referred to the statute before recited, as authority for issuing them at that rate. The legal rate in Massachusetts was, at that time, six per cent., and the defendants contended that the law there should govern, and that only six per cent. could be recovered. The supreme court of Vermont held that the law and rate of Vermont must govern. Steele, J., in the opinion, (Pamph. p. 16,) said: "The situation of the parties and of the subject-matter of the contract may conclusively show that the parties contracted, in good faith, with reference to the law of the state where the security was located, and fixed upon some commercial centre as the place of payment, merely for the convenience of the holders of the loan, who, in such cases, are often widely scattered and continually changing." In Andrews v. Pond, 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 65, 78, Chief Justice Taney said: "The question is not which law is to govern in executing the contract, but which is to decide the fate of a security taken upon an usurious agreement, which neither will execute. Unquestionably it must be the law of the state where the agreement was made and the instrument taken to secure its performance."

These notes, on their face, are executed by trustees and managers, as such only, and refer to votes of stockholders of the Vermont Central Railroad Company, and of the Vermont and Canada Railroad Company, Vermont railroad corporations, to a decree of the court of chancery, and to a special act of the legislature of Vermont, as authority for their issue. The endorsement of the defendant was made expressly by virtue of a vote of the stockholders, at a meeting duly called. The whole life of the contracts, as well of that shown by the endorsement, as of that shown by the note itself, not only in fact depended upon the law of Vermont, but was upon the face of each instrument shown to so depend. The law which gave the authority limited the rate of interest to be paid. The law was as if a part of the contract, and the limitation was inseparable from it, and would follow it everywhere. The contract of endorsement is separate from that in the notes, and may be so as to interest, as well as in respect to any other feature. Slacum v. Pomery, 6 Cranch [10 U. S.] 221; 2 Kent, Comm. 460.

This action is upon the notes themselves, for a breach of the contract expressed there, to pay the interest on the notes, on presentation of the coupons. It is not exclusively upon the coupons, although they each contain an express contract, and would furnish ground for an action. So, the action is wholly for interest, as such, and the plaintiffs are entitled to recover for the interest at the rate allowed by law, and not more. The right to recover stands upon the same ground precisely as the right to recover interest, when due, upon ordinary contracts to pay interest annually or semi-annually, except that here the law allows seven per cent., while in ordinary contracts it allows only six.

There are two instalments of interest on fifty notes of one thousand dollars each, one of which was due July 1st, 1876, the other January 1st, 1877. On each the defendant became liable to pay seventeen hundred and fifty dollars at those respective times. Payment was not made. There was no agreement to pay interest on those sums if payment should not be made. The statute quoted did not fix a rate in the absence of a contract, but merely permitted a valid contract to be made up to that rate. As the defendant did not pay, it became liable for interest as damages, as in cases of the breach of ordinary money obligations, from the time when payment should have been made. The same question arose in Cheever v. Rutland & B. R. Co., before mentioned, upon this same statute, and was so decided there. Pamph. p. 19.

These conclusions make it unnecessary to decide the questions so fully and ably discussed by counsel, as to whether the defendant could be held, under the circumstances, if the undertaking had been without the scope of the corporate powers of the defendant. As great pains as have been practicable, and more space than usual, have been taken with this cause, as well on account of the large interests otherwise involved in these questions, as of the just rights of the parties to this suit. There must be a judgment for the plaintiffs, for the two instalments of seventeen hundred and fifty dollars each, with simple interest thereon, in all, $4,033.75.

[NOTE. Defendant subsequently moved for a new trial, and the motion was denied. Case No. 2,936.]

Case No. 2,936.

CODMAN et al. v. VERMONT & C. R. CO.

[17 Blatchf. 1.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Vermont. Aug. 5, 1879.

JURISDICTION—ACTION BY ASSIGNEE OF NOTE—PROTEST—NEWLY-DISCOVERED EVIDENCE.

1. The decision in Codman v. Vermont & C. R. Co. [Case No. 2,935] adhered to.

2. This suit being against the endorser of the notes, and the endorsement having been filled up when it was made, and ordering the contents of the notes to be paid to the bearer, and this having been done before the notes were put into circulation, the contract of the endorser was with the bearer, and no disability of the bearer to sue, as an assignee, could arise under section 11 of the judiciary act of September 24, 1789 (1 Stat. 79), now section 629 of the Revised Statutes.

3. It was of no consequence that the notary protesting the notes did not have the notes, as well as the coupons, to present for payment, at the time of making demand of payment.

4. Evidence which counsel did not, on a trial, think would be material, and did not know of and so did not obtain, although it might easily have been discovered, will not, generally, be allowed to furnish ground for a new trial, although its materiality may arise from the views of the court in deciding the cause.

[This was an action of assumpsit by Robert Codman and Henry A. Johnson against the Vermont & Canada Railroad Company.]

Plaintiffs, in person, and with them William G. Shaw.

Edward J. Phelps and Francis A. Brooks, for defendant.

WHEELER, District Judge. After the opinion heretofore filed in this cause was delivered, (16 Blatchf. 165 [Case No. 2,935]), and before judgment, the defendant moved for a new trial, for the purpose of introducing new evidence, to the effect that the notary making the protest conceded did not have the notes themselves, as well as the coupons, to present for payment, at the time of making demand of payment, and moved that the cause be dismissed for want of jurisdiction in this court. The cause has been further heard upon these motions.

The objection to the jurisdiction rests upon the proviso to section 11 of the judiciary act of September 24th, 1789 (1 Stat. 79, now Rev. St. § 629), which is: "That no circuit court shall have cognizance of any suit to recover the contents of any promissory note or other chose in action, in favor of an assignee, unless a suit might have been prosecuted in such court to recover the said contents if no assignment had been made, except in cases of foreign bills of exchange." These are not foreign bills of exchange. The makers and payee were citizens of the same state, the notes themselves were made payable to order and not to the bearer, so that no suit could be brought against the makers, upon them, by any one but the payee, without an endorsement, which would be an assignment, and, as to suits against the makers, they come precisely within the terms of that proviso. Gibson v. Chew, 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 315; Dromgoole v. Farmers' Bank, 2 How. [43 U. S.] 241. It was settled early, that notes payable to bearer were payable to any one, and not affected with the disabilities of the original holder, under this statute. Bank of Kentucky v. Wister, 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 318; Smith v. Clapp, 15 Pet. [40 U. S.] 125; White v. Vermont & M. R. Co., 21 How. [62 U. S.] 575. This suit is against the endorser and not the payee. The endorsement was filled up when it was made, and ordered the contents of the notes paid to the bearer. The evidence showed that this was done before the notes were put into circulation at all. The contract of the endorser was with the bearer, who might be anybody, so that no assignment of that liability would be necessary, and no disability of the original payee to sue would follow the cause of action arising upon that liability. This is expressly stated by Mr. Justice Clifford to be the law, in Lexington v. Butler, 14 Wall. [81 U. S.] 282, 293. The objection to the jurisdiction, although not out of time, even at this late stage of the case, cannot prevail.

The defendant professes to wish to introduce the new evidence to add to the facts conceded, and not to contradict the terms of the concession. The evidence itself is newly discovered in fact, but might easily have been discovered before trial, if it had been thought that such evidence would be material; but it was not so thought by those having charge of the defence. They claim that the views of the court make it appear to be material, and that, therefore, they ought now to have an opportunity to avail themselves of it. It is quite clear that the defendant has no right, upon any legal grounds, to have the case opened now for that purpose. If parties could first put in enough of their case to get the opinion of the court, and then have an opportunity to make a case to fit the opinion, the administration of justice would be much protracted and large opportunities opened for abuse, although it is but just to say, that, in this instance, no attempt to patch up the case in any improper way is seen. The only wholesome mode of trial is for the parties to put in, and be required to put in, their evidence upon all points upon which they are to put in evidence at all, before the judgment of the court is passed upon it. There are, probably, few cases tried but that the losing parties in which, or their counsel, are able afterwards to see, or think they see, some place where they could improve their side, if they had another opportunity. Still, it is better, in view of the whole, generally, that they should not have the opportunity. Nevertheless, there may be cases where the parties cannot bring themselves strictly within the rules for granting new trials, that the court might and, perhaps, ought, in the exercise of its discretion, while the matter is wholly under the control of the court, as in this case, before judgment, it is, to grant an opportunity to put in further evidence. In view of these considerations, the probable effect of the new evidence brought forward has been looked into. The evidence was full and clear that the plaintiffs owned and held both notes and coupons. The deposition of the notary tends to show that he had only the coupons. The action is upon the notes themselves, for not paying the interest, according to the contract in the notes, on presentation of the coupons. Ordinarily, the instrument endorsed should be presented when demand of payment is made, in order that, upon payment, it may be delivered up. Freeman v. Boynton, 7 Mass. 483; Shaw v. Reed, 12 Pick. 132. In this case nothing but the coupons were to be delivered up. The notes would be retained properly and necessarily. Notice to the endorser could not be dispensed with, but that was properly given, as is expressly conceded. The contract was, that payment should be made when the coupons were presented. They were presented and payment was not made, so there was clearly a default of the maker, of which the endorser had due notice, as is also conceded. This would seem to be sufficient, whether the notary learned whom to notify from the endorsements themselves, as was before inferred by the court, or otherwise. Gilbert v. Dennis, 3 Metc. [Mass.] 495.

[1] [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

Besides, on further consideration of the terms of this guaranty, it seems probable that the defendant might be liable upon that alone. The only question about that is, whether it would follow the note into the hands of the plaintiffs, as bearers merely, to whom the guaranty was not otherwise made. The guaranty and endorsement are placed together over one signature, and the defendant guaranteed the payment of the notes, and ordered the contents paid to the bearer, at the same time. Such contracts are construed according to the expressed intention of the parties, as it is to be collected from the words used. Good v. Martin, 95 U. S. 90. In view of the form and connection of the guaranty, it may well be understood, as suggested by one of the defendant's counsel on this argument, that the intention was that the notes should take the guaranty into circulation with them, and that the guaranty should run to the bearer, the same as the endorsement.

In arguing these motions it was still insisted, that the defendant became a mere accommodation guarantor or endorser, and that all its undertakings in that direction were ultra vires. But, for the reasons before stated, the consideration was adequate and moved directly to the benefit of the defendant, and the statute quoted, as well as the general principles of the common law without the statute, brought the giving such notes, or becoming parties to them in other forms to the same effect, clearly within the scope of the corporate powers of the defendant. So, the evidence, if in, would not be likely to produce any different result, and there is no just occasion for delaying the cause to receive it.

Case No. 2,937.

CODRINGTON v. ADAMS.

[Brunner, Col. Cas. 650;[1] 21 Law Rep. 586.]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. 1857.

BANK—DUTY OF, AS TO NOTE RECEIVED FOR COLLECTION.

A bank which receives a note for collection in the ordinary course of business, from a bank in another city, bearing the indorsement of the latter's cashier, is not bound to send notice of non-payment to any other party than its principal; and the fact that the first indorser resided in the same city with the first bank, even if known, would not change the duty of its agency.

This was an action on the case against [Charles B. F. Adams] a notary public for negligently omitting to give due notice to Theodore Otis, an indorser of a note which had been committed to the notary to be protested. The note was signed by William Blanchard, and payable to Theodore Otis or order, and indorsed by him, by the plaintiff [J. B. Codrington], and by F. W. Edmands, cashier. The plaintiff called the defendant as a witness, who testified that he received the note from Mr. Hall, the cashier of the Bank of North America, in the city of Boston; that F. W. Edmands was the cashier of a bank in the city of New York; that the witness had general instructions from the Bank of North America that when a note is indorsed by a cashier out of Boston, the notices to indorsers were to be sent to such indorsing cashier. That when he received the note at the Bank of North America he inquired if they knew the parties. The answer by Mr. Hall, the cashier, was, no; he must enclose the notices to the cashier in New York. That he went to the place of business of the maker in Boston on the maturity of the note, and demanded payment of the person in charge there. The answer was the maker was absent, and there was no one to pay.

[1] [Reported by Albert Brunner, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

He then inquired if they knew who Otis was; to which it was replied he was an out of town man. He did not inquire where he lived, nor look in the directory. He knew a Mr. Otis, but did not know his Christian name, nor that the person whom he knew was Otis, the indorser of this note. He put the protest of the note for non-payment and notices to Otis and the other indorsers into the postoffice the same afternoon, directed to Mr. Edmands, cashier, at New York. In point of fact, Mr. Otis was a member of the bar in the city of Boston, and his name was in the directory. Upon this evidence, which was all that was offered in behalf of the plaintiff to support the charge of negligence of the defendant, the court intimated that, in its opinion, the jury would not be warranted in finding a verdict for the plaintiff, and thereupon the plaintiff submitted to a verdict for the defendant. He now moves for a new trial, and assigns for cause that there was evidence which would have warranted a different verdict.

R. H. Dana, for plaintiff.
Mr. Fiske, contra.

CURTIS, Circuit Justice. I consider it to be settled, that the Bank of North America, which received this note for collection as an agent of the New York bank, was employed only to make due demand of payment, and if it should be refused, give seasonable notice to the New York bank, which was its principal; and that the fact that the first indorser resided in the city of Boston, even if known to the Bank of North America, does not change the duty of its agency. Bank of U. S. v. Goddard [Case No. 917]; Phipps v. Millbury Bank, 8 Metc. [Mass.] 79. Whether, if the Bank of North America had actually employed the defendant to do more than this, and he had neglected such additional employment, the plaintiff could have availed himself of the act of the Boston bank in contracting for such additional employment, it is not necessary to determine. I do not mean to express any doubt that he might, for I have not fully considered the question in all its bearings. But as the Bank of North America, so far as appears, received this note in the usual course of business for collection, and was not bound to give notice of non-payment to any party except the New York bank, which sent it bearing the indorsement of its cashier, there is no presumption that when the plaintiff was employed it was to do anything more than his employer was bound to do. And certainly there is no evidence that his employment extended further. The only witness testifies that his employment was expressly restricted to giving notice to the bank in New York, both by general instructions applicable to this note, and also by an express direction given when he received the note. The witness was called by the plaintiff, and though he is the party defendant, the plaintiff could not argue to the jury that he did not intend to testify truly.

The plaintiff's counsel urges that he might have argued to the jury there was no such absolute direction given to send the notices to New York, as the witness testified to, but only to send them there if it should be ascertained the indorsers were not residents; and that he might have so argued from the fact that the defendant inquired at the maker's place of business if Otis was known there. But the witness gives a satisfactory explanation of that; for he says that though he did not consider himself employed to give notices to the indorsers, save by sending them to the cashier in New York, he should, as a matter of courtesy have given Mr. Otis a notice, if he had known or been informed that he lived in Boston.

Undoubtedly, I should have formally submitted this case to the jury, with instructions as to the law, and left it for them to find the extent of the employment of the defendant, for it is matter of fact, if I had not understood the plaintiff's counsel, at the time, not to desire to have it so submitted. And I should set aside the verdict now, and allow the evidence to be submitted to a jury, were I not clearly of opinion that the intimation given at the trial was correct, that the evidence would not warrant, in point of law, a verdict for the plaintiff, and if I did not consider that if a verdict for the plaintiff were rendered, I must set it aside as against the evidence. The motion for a new trial is overruled, and there must be judgment on the verdict.

Case No. 2,938.

CODWISE et al. v. GLEASON et al.

[Brunner, Col. Cas. 33;[1] 3 Day, 3.]

Circuit Court, D. Connecticut. Sept., 1807.

JURISDICTION—CITIZENSHIP ESSENTIAL TO.

An action in favor of the indorsee of a promissory note, a citizen of one state, against the indorsor, a citizen of a different state, may be brought before the circuit court of the United States though the maker and payee of such note are citizens of the same state.

In the writ the plaintiffs [George Codwise, Jr., Peter Ludlow, and James Codwise] were described as being "all of the city and county of New York, in the state of New York, and citizens of said state of New York, late (viz., on or about the 1st of March, 1796, and for a long time before and since) merchants in company;" and the defendants [Chauncey Gleason, Elijah Cowles, Jonathan Cowles, Gad Cowles, Seth Cowles, and Martin Cowles] as being "all citizens of the state of Connecticut, resident in said state," and as being "lately, viz., on or about the 1st day of March, 1796, and for a long time before and since, merchants in company," etc. The declaration alleged "that on or about said 1st day of March, 1796, the defendants possessed a certain paper writing, purporting to be a promissory note, payable to them, the defendants, by one Erastus Gay, in the words and figures following, viz: 'On the 1st day of October next I promise to pay Gleason & Cowles, or order, at the Hartford Bank, nine hundred and forty-five dollars, value received, in the city of said Hartford, this 14th day of November, 1795. $945. Erastus Gay.' And afterwards, viz., on or about the said 1st day of March, 1796, the defendants (being so possessed of such paper writing, and the said sum of nine hundred and forty-five dollars being unpaid), did by their indorsement, by them made on said paper writing, by their said firm of Gleason & Cowles, order and appoint the contents of the said paper writing (being the said sum of nine hundred and forty-five dollars), to be paid to the plaintiffs, for value received, according to the tenor of said paper writing, by their indorsement thereon signed with their said names."

[1] [Reported by Albert Brunner, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

The plaintiffs then averred "that on the 1st day of October, 1796, and also on the 3d day of the same month of October, at the uttermost convenient time of said days, at said Hartford, they showed and exhibited said paper writing and indorsement at said Hartford Bank (being the place where said note was payable as aforesaid), and then and there, on said both days, demanded payment of the aforesaid sum of nine hundred and forty-five dollars, according to the tenor of said paper writing, and the indorsement thereon; but said Erastus Gay neglected to pay the same; and neither the same nor any part thereof hath ever been in any way paid, and said Erastus hath ever refused and still refuses to pay the same. Whereupon the plaintiffs, on the 4th day of October, 1796, gave notice of the premises to the defendants, and required of them payment of the said sum of nine hundred and forty-five dollars, mentioned in said paper writing; and afterwards, viz., on the 31st day of October, 1796, the plaintiffs caused an action to be commenced on said paper writing, in the name of the said Chauncey, Elijah, Jonathan, Gad, Seth, and Martin, against the said Erastus Gay, by writ of that date returnable to the city court, holden within and for the city of Hartford, in the county of Hartford, on the second Tuesday of December, 1796; and said writ was duly served and returned to said city court. And in the declaration in said action it was and is alleged that the said paper writing was a promissory note, under the hand of the said Erastus, by him well executed, within the limits of said city of Hartford, and that thereby the said Erastus promised the said Chauncey, Elijah, Jonathan, Gad, Seth, and Martin, by their said name of Gleason & Cowles, for value received, to pay to them at the said Hartford Bank (which then was and is in said city of Hartford), the said sum of nine hundred and forty-five dollars, on the 1st day of October next after the date of said writing; and that the said Erastus had never in any way performed the said promise. And such proceedings were had in the said action, that the same, by divers legal removes, came regularly before the superior court holden at Hartford, within and for the county of Hartford, on the second Tuesday of February, 1797, when and where said parties to said action appeared therein before said court, and the said Erastus pleaded thereto, that he did not assume and promise in manner and form, as in said declaration was alleged; on which plea issue was then and there joined, and said action, by legal continuances, came before the superior court holden at Hartford, on the third Tuesday of February, 1803, when and where the said parties to said action appeared therein before said court, and with their evidence and exhibits and by their counsel, were fully heard before said court and the jury attending said court, on the issue joined in said action, which issue being then and there by said court committed to said jury, said jury found a verdict thereon that the said Erastus did not assume and promise, in manner and form, as in said declaration was alleged, which verdict was then and there returned to and accepted by said court; and thereupon it was, by said court, at their said term, considered and adjudged that the said Erastus did not assume and promise, in manner and form as the plaintiffs had alleged, and that he should recover of the said Chauncey, Elijah, Jonathan, Gad, Seth, and Martin his costs of said suit, allowed and taxed at sixty-two dollars and ten cents, as by the files and records of said court, ready in court to be produced, appears; and in prosecuting said suit, the said Codwise, Ludlow & Co. incurred great charges and expenses, amounting to the sum of two hundred dollars, of which the defendants aforesaid, viz., on the 1st day of March, 1803, had notice." The plaintiffs further stated "that the said Erastus Gay never did, in and by the aforesaid paper writing (purporting to be a promissory note as aforesaid), assume and promise, for value received, to pay to them, the said Chauncey, Elijah, Jonathan, Gad, Seth, and Martin, the sum of nine hundred and forty-five dollars therein mentioned, nor any part thereof; and said paper writing never was the promissory note of said Erastus. But the plaintiffs received said paper writing as indorsees thereof as aforesaid; and paid therefor the full amount of the said sum of nine hundred and forty-five dollars as aforesaid, believing it to have been the promissory note of him the said Erastus, and believing that the said Erastus, in and by said paper writing, assumed and promised, for value received, to pay to the said Chauncey, Elijah, Jonathan, Gad, Seth, and Martin, the said sum of nine hundred and forty-five dollars, according to the tenor of said paper writing, and the defendants indorsed and assigned the same as aforesaid, as and for a good and valid promissory note, payable to them by the said Erastus according to the tenor thereof. And by means of the premises the defendants became liable to pay to the plaintiffs the aforesaid sum of nine hundred and forty-five dollars (specified in said paper writing), and the lawful interest thereon from and after the said 1st day of October, 1796, and also the aforesaid charges and expense of prosecuting the aforesaid suit against the said Erastus Gay; and being so liable the defendants, in consideration thereof, afterwards, viz., on or about the 1st day of March, 1803, at said Hartford, upon themselves assumed, and to the plaintiffs promised to pay to them the said sum of nine hundred and forty-five dollars, and said interest thereon, and the aforesaid charges and expense, within a reasonable time afterwards, when they should be thereto required. But the defendants, and each of them, their assumption and promise aforesaid not regarding, have never paid to the plaintiffs or either of them the aforesaid sum of nine hundred and forty-five dollars, and the interest thereon, and said charges and expense, or any part thereof, though they have been often by the plaintiffs thereto required, and though a reasonable time for that purpose hath long since elapsed." The damages were laid at three thousand dollars.

The defendants pleaded in abatement that Erastus Gay, named in the plaintiff's declaration, who made and executed the note on which, etc., was at the time he executed said note, and ever since has been, an inhabitant of Farmington, in the district of Connecticut, and the note was executed at Hartford in said district; and that said Gleason & Cowles, the defendants to whom said note was made payable, were at the time of making said note, and ever since have been, inhabitants of said district of Connecticut and there residing; and at the time of indorsing their names on the back of said note, the defendants were, and ever since have been, inhabitants of said district of Connecticut, and there residing; and that the defendants indorsed their names on said note at said Hartford, and there delivered said note to Peleg Sanford, then of said Hartford, since deceased, and thereby assigned said note to said Sanford. The plea concluded by alleging that this court had not jurisdiction of this action, and praying judgment that it should be dismissed.

To this plea there was a demurrer and joinder in demurrer.

Goodrich & Griswold, in support of the plea, relied upon the following clause of the 11th section of the act to establish the judicial courts of the United States: "Nor shall any district or circuit court have cognizance of any suit to recover the contents of any promissory note, or other chose in action in favor of an assignee, unless a suit might have been prosecuted in such court to recover the said contents if no assignment had been made, except in cases of foreign bills of exchange." 1 Stat. (Swift's Ed.) pp. 55, 56. It appears from the declaration that the note which is the foundation of this suit was made in Connecticut, and that the maker and payees belonged to Connecticut. If this note had not been assigned, it is clear that no suit could have been brought to recover its contents before this court. The restrictive clause of the act, therefore, is applicable to this case, and is decisive against the jurisdiction.

Daggett and E. Perkins, contra.

The plaintiffs in this case are citizens of New York, the defendants of Connecticut. This court has jurisdiction unless the defendants can bring their case within the restrictive clause of the 11th section of the judiciary act. The limitation of the general jurisdiction of the court is to be construed strictly. But that clause is not applicable, either in its letter or spirit, to this case. The suit is not brought to recover the contents of any promissory note or other chose in action. In the first place the declaration states expressly that the writing in question never was the promissory note of Erastus Gay. It, indeed, purported to be, but in truth was not.

EDWARDS, District Judge. The consideration that the note is stated not to have been a valid one, will not have much weight with the court. In the next place, if the note had been genuine and valid, still this suit might be sustained in this court. The defendants, by the assignment, entered into a new contract with the plaintiffs for the breach of which the present action is brought, not for the non-payment of the note by the maker. The contract between the maker and payee, and that between the indorsor and indorsee, are distinct and essentially different. To the latter the restrictive clause of the act does not extend. The reason of the law is that where a man enters into a contract of which this court has not jurisdiction, he shall not afterwards be subjected to its jurisdiction on account of such contract, by the acts of other persons. But this reason is applicable only to the case of the maker. But it may be said that if the plaintiffs recover in this case the rule of damages will be the contents of the note. Admitting this, it does not follow that this case is within the restrictive clause. It is surely too much to say that the clause extends to every case where the plaintiff, if he prevails, will recover the same amount with the contents of the note. Suppose a note executed by A. to B., both citizens of Connecticut. C., a citizen of Massachusetts, enters into a contract with A. by the terms of which he is to pay and take up A.'s note. It will not be contended that the clause in question would deprive the circuit court of jurisdiction over this contract; and yet if C. were to sue upon it and recover, the rule of damages would be the contents of A.'s note. Or, suppose C. in the case put should tortiously take the note from B., and B. should bring trover for it and recover; the rule of damages would be the amount of the note, but might not the circuit court have jurisdiction? But we deny that the rule of damages in the case before the court will be the contents of the note merely. The rule of damages will be the damages sustained by the breach of the contract implied by the indorsement, which may include the expenses of protest, of a suit against the maker, etc. At any rate the damages are not necessarily the precise amount of the note, which is sufficient for our purpose.

2. The averments in the plea are insufficient. It is not alleged that the original parties to the note were not citizens of different states. If they were citizens of different states, then a suit might have been prosecuted in this court before any assignment was made, and of course the statute has no bearing upon this case. Again, the plea is defective, as it does not show what court has jurisdiction.

EDWARDS, District Judge. I have no doubt as to the jurisdiction of the court in this case; but I am not prepared to give a formal opinion on a point of this importance, at this time. My opinion will be that the plea in abatement is insufficient. It appears to me that the argument in favor of the jurisdiction is irresistible.

On a subsequent day his honor delivered an elaborate opinion on this point, but the reporter heard only a part of it, and was not at that time in a situation which admitted of his taking any minutes.

The case was afterwards continued to the next term for trial on the merits.

NOTE [from original report]. Jurisdiction—Citizenship Essential to.—It is settled by the decisions that in an action by an indorsee against an indorsor of a note or bill, if they are citizens of different states, this citizenship is sufficient to give jurisdiction though the maker and payee be citizens of the same state. See Coffee v. Planters' Bank of Tenn., 13 How. [54 U. S.] 183; Evans v. Gee, 11 Pet. [36 U. S.] 80; Young v. Bryan, 6 Wheat. [19 U. S.] 146; Mollan v. Torrance, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 537; Campbell v. Jordan [Case No. 2,362]; Gaylord v. Johnson [Id. 5,285]; Dennison v. Larned [Id. 3,798].

[NOTE. On the trial on the merits, the jury rendered a verdict for plaintiffs. Case No. 2,939.]

Case No. 2,939.

CODWISE et al. v. GLEASON et al.

[Brunner, Col. Cas. 40;[1] 3 Day, 12.]

Circuit Court, D. Connecticut. April, 1808.

PROMISSORY NOTE—LIABILITY OF INDORSOR.

Though a note is void as against the maker, it may be good against an indorsor, in favor of indorsor of a note or bill, if they are citizens dorsement. The contract made by indorsement extends to all future indorsees, even where notes are not negotiable.

This case was argued on a plea in abatement at the last term; a respondeat ouster was ordered; and the case continued to this term for trial on the merits. The declaration having been already stated at length, it may be sufficient to refer to that statement (Brunner, Col. Cas. 33 [Case No. 2,938]), without repeating it here; but the case will be better understood by a statement of the following facts, in addition to those which appear on the declaration: Erastus Gay made a contract for a title to some Georgia lands with Peleg Sanford and another person, according to the terms of which he was obliged to give them a note for nine hundred and forty-five dollars, payable at the Hartford Bank, with a good indorsor. To comply with this contract Gay induced Gleason & Cowles to indorse the note in question, and after it was so indorsed he delivered it to Sanford. It was then sold to Timothy Burr, but without any indorsement; and by him it was again sold to Codwise, Ludlow & Co. for goods, and without any indorsement by Burr. It was afterwards indorsed by Codwise, Ludlow & Co. and sent to John Dodd of Hartford for collection, and by him indorsed and lodged in the bank. As it was not paid when it became due, demand was made of Burr as well as of Gay, and Gleason & Cowles. After the note was taken from the bank, the names of Codwise, Ludlow & Co. were erased, they having been entered merely for the purpose of collection. The suit in the name of Gleason & Cowles against Gay failed on the ground of fraud, and consequently of want of consideration in the contract to comply with which the note was given. An action was then brought against Burr by Codwise, Ludlow & Co., in which they claimed to recover of him as having sold, and thus become responsible for the note. His defense was that though he sold, he did not warrant the note, but that it was received by the plaintiffs entirely at their own risk. That suit also failed, and the present action was immediately commenced.

On the trial, after all the material facts alleged had been either admitted or proved, the counsel for the defendants offered evidence to prove, first, that this indorsement was not intended to give a general credit to the note; and secondly, that the plaintiffs were, in reality, remote indorsees.

[1] [Reported by Albert Brunner, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

Mr. Daggett, for plaintiffs, objected to the testimony.

This indorsement by Gleason & Cowles needs no explanation. It admits of none. No evidence as to the intention of the parties can alter the legal nature of the instrument. This note appears to have been sent into the world under the sanction of the names of Gleason & Cowles. So merchants would universally understand it, and so courts will consider it.

Before LIVINGSTON, Circuit Justice, and EDWARDS, District Judge.

LIVINGSTON, Circuit Justice. Evidence that Gleason & Cowles indorsed the note and gave it back to Gay, in order to give him credit, and that they never negotiated it, may have some important bearing on the case. Perhaps the same fraud which procured the note to be given was used in obtaining the indorsement; and if so it may be properly laid before the jury. The evidence may, therefore, be heard.

In the argument of the case, Ingersoll and Griswold, for the defendants, contended:

1. The plaintiffs cannot recover because the note has been decided by a competent tribunal to be void. The indorsement must of course be void. The indorsement is in the nature of security, and where notes are not negotiable it can be viewed in no other light. It is the same thing, then, as if Gleason & Cowles had signed this note with Gay, as his sureties. And it must be acknowledged that a surety cannot be holden when the obligation of his principal is void.

2. From the tesimony which has been let in, it appears that the plaintiffs are remote indorsees, and the defendants never indorsed the note to them. There is no privity of contract between the plaintiffs and defendants. To decide that upon these facts the defendants are liable to the plaintiffs would be giving to an indorsement all the efficacy which it has where notes are negotiable. On this principle, an indorsor can alter the nature of an instrument, and make that negotiable which was not so in its creation, which is absurd.

Mr. Daggett, for plaintiffs.

1. The contract of the indorsor is, in every case, that the sum contained in the note shall be paid when due, and for this payment he pledges himself to be responsible. It makes no difference whether the note is not paid by the maker because he is unable, or because the instrument is void, or on account of any other impediment in the way of collection. Let the cause of failure of payment be what it may, the indorsor is liable. If the note is forged the indorsor is still holden; and in a suit against an indorsor it is not necessary to prove the handwriting of the maker.

2. Nor is the contract made with the next indorsee only. It extends to all future indorsees. An indorsement in blank is a letter of credit to the whole world; and every man who trusts to it can recover of the indorsor. This principle is clearly illustrated and supported by the case of Russel v. Langstaffe, Doug. 514, where Lord Mansfield declared that the defendant, by indorsing blank copper-plate checks, gave a letter of credit for an indefinite sum; and that it did not lie in his mouth to say the indorsements were not regular. Indeed, this is a direct authority to both points, for it not only decides the general liability of indorsors on account of having given their names to the world, but declares further that the indorsor is holden though the paper indorsed was, at the time, a mere nullity.

LIVINGSTON, Circuit Justice, directed the jury that as to the first point, though he had had doubts, they were almost entirely removed. If a note were forged, the indorsement would bind the man who made it.

The second point he declared not to have altered the decision of the case from what it would have been, if the plaintiffs were the only indorsees, and the defendants the only persons through whose hands the note had passed. Gleason & Cowles gave the weight of their names to the world, and must be responsible to every man who trusts to the note relying on their credit, as every subsequent indorsee must be supposed to do, from the nature of the transaction. The case is, therefore, clearly with the plaintiffs on both points.

A verdict was accordingly found for plaintiffs to recover $1,599.20 damages.

Case No. 2,940.

CODY v. CENTRAL PAC. R. CO.

[4 Sawy. 114; 15 Alb. Law J. 52.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Nevada. Nov. 9, 1876.

RAILROAD—THROUGH TICKET—CONTINUOUS EMIGRANT PASSAGE.

1. M. purchased a through emigrant ticket from Baltimore to San Francisco, at reduced rates, over the Union and Central Pacific Railroads as a part of the route. The contract, containing certain limitations, one of which is, that it was not transferable, was signed by M. At Omaha the contract was taken up and an exchange check issued to M., which purported upon its face to call for "one continuous emigrant passage" from Omaha to San Francisco. M. traveled on the check to Palisade, in the state of Nevada, and sold it to C., who attempted to ride on the ticket upon the same train; Held, that he was not entitled to ride on that check.

2. A contract for "one continuous emigrant passage from Omaha to San Francisco," is not a contract to carry one person from Omaha to an intermediate station, and a second to another station, and so on, but only a contract to carry the same person through the entire route.

[1][Reported by L. S. B. Sawyer, Esq., and here reprinted by permission. 15 Alb. Law J. 52, contains only a partial report.]

Action at law to recover damages from the defendant [the Central Pacific Railroad Company] for ejecting the plaintiff [H. A. Cody] from its cars, upon the following state of facts:

August 10, 1875, the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company issued, from its office in the city of Baltimore, to one Michel Meur, a ticket or contract for a passage to San Francisco, Cal., in the words and figures following:

"Issued by the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company. Acting for itself on its own road and as agent only of the other companies owning portions of the route respectively. Good for one emigrant passage to San Francisco, Cal., only, on presentation of this ticket with checks attached. Not good unless dated and bearing official stamp of office at the point sold. Not transferable. Good only in forward car. Responsibility for the safety of person or loss of baggage on each portion of the route is confined to the proprietors of that portion alone.

"Contract.—In consideration of the reduced rate at which this ticket is sold, it will be forfeited if not presented to the Union Pacific Railroad Company, for passage, within ten days from date of sale, officially stamped on the back, with the same date in writing on the face, and signed by the purchaser. No stop-over check to be issued on this ticket, and the coupons hereto will not be received for passage if detached from the contract. This ticket is to be exchanged by the Union Pacific Railroad Company, at Omaha, for one limited to nine days from date of issue, on which baggage will be checked to destination only. I hereby agree that the purchase of this ticket with the coupons attached is made subject to each and all of the above conditions.

"Dated August 10, 1875.

"(Signed) Michel Meur."

Upon his arrival at Omaha the Union Pacific Railroad Company gave to Meur, in exchange for the ticket set forth above, another ticket, known as the Union Pacific Railroad emigrant exchange check, which, omitting the names of stations and marginal figures and letters not material here, is in the following words:

"Union and Central Pacific Railroad Line.

"Thos. L. Kimball,

"3442. Gen'l Ticket Agent U. P. R. R.

"One continuous emigrant passage from Omaha to station canceled. Good for nine days from date indicated in the margin, after which time it will be void. No stop-over check given on this ticket. Baggage checked only to destination. Whole, 1875. Half."

With this ticket Meur traveled to Palisade, a station on defendant's road, and there sold it to the plaintiff, Cody. Cody then took the same train which Meur had just left, and in turn traveled to Battle Mountain, fifty miles west of Palisade. The conductor refused to recognize the ticket purchased by Cody as entitling him to a passage, and demanded fare of him, which he refused to pay. Thereupon he was ejected from the cars, at Battle Mountain, without any unnecessary force or severity. It further appeared, from the evidence, that the rate of fare per mile for a through third-class or emigrant passage is much less than the rate on the same train from intermediate stations to San Francisco, or from one intermediate station to another; that one inducement for issuing these third-class tickets and running an emigrant train is the local travel paid for at the increased local rates; that, except this through emigrant train, there is no emigrant train run on the defendant's road between Ogden and San Francisco, nor are any third-class tickets sold by the defendant. Passengers who get on this through emigrant train at way stations along the defendant's road pay local rates of fare. The case was tried by the court without a jury.

Charles N. Harris, for plaintiff.

T. B. McFarland, for defendant.

Before SAWYER, Circuit Judge, and HILLYER, District Judge.

SAWYER, Circuit Judge. It is clear to our minds that the plaintiff had no right to ride on defendant's road upon the check purchased of Meur at Palisade, and that he was properly excluded from the cars on that ground. Meur made a contract for a through emigrant passage from Baltimore to San Francisco at a reduced rate in consequence of taking a through passage. His contract stated in terms that it was not transferable, and he signed the contract assenting to its conditions. The written contract was surrendered in pursuance of its provisions at Omaha, where Meur received from the Union Pacific Railroad Company the usual check given in such cases, known as the "Union Pacific Railroad Emigrant Exchange Check," which called for "one continuous emigrant passage from Omaha to station canceled," viz.: San Francisco. The contract entered into with Meur was to carry him through the whole distance as an emigrant, and not to carry him to one station, and some one else to another. And it was an express term of the contract that it was "not transferable." It does not affect the question, that the evidence of the original contract was surrendered at Omaha, and the exchange check given not fully expressing the terms of the contract. The check was, doubtless, evidence in Meur's hands that he was entitled to a "continuous emigrant passage" from Omaha to San Francisco. But it did not purport to give the terms of the contract. The fact that through emigrant rates are lower than rates for local travel from station to station is one of general notoriety.

The check had marks and numbers referring to the written contract at first executed, by which the connection of the two could be traced and identified. It was the duty of the purchaser to ascertain before purchasing what his rights under the purchase would be. If he did not understand the numbers and reference, as well as the other matter expressed upon the check, he should have ascertained what they signified. He knew, at all events, that the check only called for a "continuous emigrant passage" from Omaha to San Francisco, and that he was not an emigrant and not a passenger from one of these points to the other. But if the check is considered only as evidence of a right to a passage from Omaha to San Francisco, without regard to the previous contract in pursuance of which it was in fact issued, the result, in our judgment, would be the same. It is still evidence upon its face only of a right to "one continuous emigrant passage" from Omaha to San Francisco. The evidence showed that through rates from Omaha to San Francisco are considerably less than local rates from one station to another; that a railroad company can afford to carry cheaper on long through routes than on short local portions of the route; and that their tariff of fares is based upon this principle. It is evident that this must be the case. A contract, therefore, for one "continuous emigrant passage" from Omaha to San Francisco is not a contract to carry one man from Omaha to the next station, another to the next station, and so on through the entire line, but an entirely different contract, and one upon different terms, and for a different rate of compensation. If this experiment should succeed, parties could readily arrange privately for local travel at through rates without the consent of the companies. A party might as well contract to carry a ton of freight from Omaha to San Francisco, and then insist that he could have a ton carried to the first station, and transfer a right to another party to carry another and different ton of freight to the next station, and so on through the entire line. The inconvenience and loss to the company would doubtless be greater than in the case of a passenger, but the difference is only in degree, not in principle. In the case in hand, then, whether we regard the exchange check issued to Meur as a part of the original contract, or as an independent contract for one "continuous emigrant passage from Omaha to San Francisco," it was not a contract to carry Meur from Omaha to Palisade, and Cody or some one else to some other station on the road. The right to ride upon the road upon this check from Palisade could not be transferred to Cody without defendant's consent. And the fact that the contract was for one through passage appeared on the face of the check itself. Plaintiff, therefore, was not entitled to ride on the check, as the defendant never contracted to carry him on it. As he refused to pay the usual fare, he was properly ejected from the defendant's cars on that ground. Let judgment be entered for defendant.

Case No. 2,941.

COE v. BRADLEY.

[9 O. G. 541; Cox, Manual Trade-Mark Cas. 276.]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Feb. 17, 1876.

ACTION FOR BREACH OF COVENANT — PLEADING — SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE.

1. Where a covenant goes only to a part of the consideration on both sides, and a breach of it may be paid for in damages, it is an independent covenant, and an action can be maintained for a breach of the covenant, on the part of the defendant, without averring performance in the declaration.

2. Where the plaintiff's covenants, which form the consideration, be dependent, yet if part of the consideration be accepted and enjoyed by the defendant, and the plaintiff have no other remedy than on the covenant, and the breach on the part of the plaintiff can be compensated for in damages, the plaintiff may recover without alleging performance of the residue.

3. Courts of equity are still more liberal in their interpretation of contracts, allowing a specific performance of a contract, sometimes to be enforced at the suit of a party who has not punctually performed the contract on his own part, but has been in default, where the default on his part is such as admits of compensation.

[In equity. Bill by Andrew Coe against William L. Bradley for an accounting.]

George S. Boutwell, for complainant.

H. G. Parker, for defendant.

SHEPLEY, Circuit Judge. This bill is filed upon a written contract between the parties dated February 13, 1862. By this contract Coe assigns to Bradley the exclusive use for seven years of his trade-mark, "Coe's Superphosphate of Lime," reserving a limited right previously granted to the firm of Coe & Co. Coe covenants that he is the exclusive owner of said trade-mark, with the exception above named. He constitutes Bradley his attorney, irrevocable, with authority to prosecute any suits necessary to make his rights available, and protect himself in their full enjoyment. These are the only express covenants and agreements on the part of Coe. Bradley covenants to energetically prosecute the business of manufacturing and selling the superphosphate, and to continue to make it of as good quality as that before made by Coe; and, so long as the agreements above mentioned shall be kept by Coe, Bradley shall have the use of the trade-mark, to pay him one-third of the net profits of the business, and of other "bone business," first reserving out of the profits of the business, as his own compensation, three thousand dollars. This clause is also to be found at the close of the contract, "any breach of the agreements above cited by either party or his representatives shall be a release to the other party and his representatives from all obligations by him or them to be performed but for such breach." By a supplementary contract of May 2, 1862, between Coe and Bradley, and Russell and Coe, and Elmore Coe, the plaintiff's share of profits is reduced from one-third to one-sixth part. During the existence of this contract Coe, (in violation of his agreement, as implied from his conveyance of the exclusive right of the trade-mark to Bradley,) at Chelsea, and other places, manufactured and put on the market a fertilizer of an inferior quality, sometimes under the trade-mark of "Coe's Superphosphate of Lime," and sometimes "Andrew Coe's Superphosphate of Lime," which last name so nearly resembled the original trade-mark that it was calculated to deceive, and did deceive, purchasers, and, therefore, the use of it was as much a violation of his implied agreement with Bradley as the unauthorized use of the words "Coe's Superphosphate of Lime." A court of equity will examine to see if the differences are merely colorable. Dixon Crucible Co. v. Benham, Am. Trade-Mark Cas. 449; 2 Kent, Comm. (12th Ed.) 366, cases in note; Meriden Britannia Co. v. Parker, 39 Conn. 450.

It is claimed on the part of the defendants that such unauthorized use of the trade-mark by Coe himself, in violation of the letter and spirit of the contract, was such a breach of the contract as exonerated the defendants from any liability to account and pay over to the complainant one-sixth part of the profits of the manufacture under the contract. In support of this position, reliance is placed on the clause in the contract that "any breach of the agreements above cited by either party or his representatives shall be a release to the other party and his representatives from all obligations by him or them to be performed but for said breach." The effect of this clause in the contract is only to enlarge the right of rescission, and enable one party to discharge himself from the contract, and terminate his obligations under it, at his election, in case of the failure of the other party to perform some portion of the contract not otherwise regarded as an essential part of one entire act. Wallace v. Antrim Shovel Co., 44 N. H. 521. But, although Bradley well knew that Coe was manufacturing and selling under the trade-mark in violation of his implied agreements under the contract, and of an express agreement under a later and supplementary contract, he did not elect to terminate his obligations and abandon his rights under the contract by rescission, but continued to manufacture in great quantities, and to put the manufactured article upon the market under the trade-mark. No construction can be given to this clause which would enable one party to the contract to enjoy the fruits of it without compensation, upon the ground that the other party had failed to perform some stipulation on his part which was not so essential to the contract, but that the breach of it could well be compensated by damages. The claim of the defendant that the covenants broken by the complainant were of such a nature that no recovery can be had by him of the defendant cannot be sustained. The consideration of the promises of Bradley was the conveyance by Coe of the exclusive right to the trade-mark, and there is no question but that the conveyance was operative to vest in Bradley the exclusive right to it for the term of seven years, subject only to the exception in the contract itself. The express covenant of Coe was only of exclusive ownership in himself, and that no person besides the excepted party specified had been authorized to use it. There has been no breach of this express covenant. The implied covenant that he would not himself be a trespasser or infringer on the right and title he had vested in Bradley is the one which he violated, and Bradley had a right to elect to retain the title, and claim damages against Coe for infringement of his right, or to rescind the contract under the final clause enlarging his right of rescission. Where a covenant goes only to a part of the consideration on both sides, and a breach of it may be paid for in damages, it is an independent covenant, and an action can be maintained for a breach of the covenant on the part of the defendant without averring performance in the declaration. Where the plaintiff's covenants which form the consideration be dependent, yet if part of the consideration be accepted and enjoyed by the defendant, and the plaintiff have no other remedy than on the covenant, and the breach on the part of the plaintiff can be compensated in damages, the plaintiff may recover without alleging performance of the residue. Stevers v. Curling, 3 Bing. N. C. 355; Cutter v. Powell, 2 Smith, Lead. Cas. 28, cases in note; Pordage v. Cole, 1 Saund. 320, and Williams' note, 4; Campbell v. Jones, 6 Term R. 573; Carpenter v. Cresswell, 4 Bing. 409; Foster v. Purdy, 5 Metc. [Mass.] 442–444; Wallace v. Antrim Shovel Co., 44 N. H. 521. These are the well-settled rules applicable to proceedings in courts of law.

Courts of equity are still more liberal in their interpretation of contracts, allowing a specific performance of a contract sometimes to be enforced at the suit of a party who has not punctually performed the contract on his own part, but has been in default, where the default on his part is such as admits of compensation. In Hayward v. Angell, 1 Vern. 223, the lord keeper said: "In all cases where the matter lies in compensation, be the condition precedent or subsequent, he thought there ought to be relief." The defendant relies upon certain other contracts set up in his answer between himself and the complainant. Two of these are prior in date to the contract of February 13, 1862, and it is not perceived how that contract is affected by them. The subsequent contracts recognize the right to the trade-mark which Bradley has under the contract of February 13, 1862, but do not confer upon him such a right independent of that contract. The contract of August 1, 1862, recognizes the existence and validity of the previous contracts. The case should be referred to a master to report the amount to which the complainant is entitled for his one-sixth part of the net profits under the contract, and also to report what sum is to be allowed the complainant in reduction by way of compensation in damages for the infringement of the defendant's exclusive right to the trade-mark by the complainant by his use during the term of the trade-mark "Coe's Superphosphate of Lime," or of the trade-mark "Andrew Coe's Superphosphate of Lime."

Decree for reference to master in accordance with the opinion to be prepared and submitted to the court.

COE (KEYSER v.). See Case No. 7,750.

Case No. 2,942.

COE v. PENNOCK et al.

[6 Am. Law Reg. 27.]

Circuit Court, N. D. Ohio. July Term, 1857.[1]

RAILROAD MORTGAGE — SUBSEQUENTLY ACQUIRED PROPERTY — CONSTRUCTION OF CHARTER — LIEN FOR ROLLING STOCK FURNISHED — ADJUSTMENT OF LIENS.

1. A mortgage given on the entire property of a railroad, including future receipts for transportation, with an agreement that property on the road subsequently acquired, shall be bound, and a conveyance of it be duly executed, gives an equitable lien on property subsequently acquired, to the bondholders of bonds secured by the mortgage.

[See note at end of case.]

2. A charter must be construed according to the intent of the legislature, if such intent can be ascertained, by the language used.

[See note at end of case.]

3. A person who constructs cars, or other rolling stock, for a railroad, if he deliver the stock to the company, without any special provision to receive the payment, can claim no lien on the work. He may effect this lien while the work is in his possession. And if he obtain a judgment against the company for the work, an execution cannot be levied on the rolling stock on which a former lien exists.

[See note at end of case.]

4. Where there are liens on the property of a railroad company, the liens must be adjusted in chancery, where each claimant shall receive his proportionate share of the proceeds. The appointment of a receiver is generally ruinous, and a sale of such property should not be made, under a reasonable prospect of payment, by a faithful application of the profits of the road.

[See note at end of case.]

In equity. Bill by George S. Coe, trustee of the Cleveland, Zanesville and Cincinnati Railroad Company, against Joseph Pennock and Nathan F. Hart and the said company.]

Otis & Weyman, for complainant.

Spalding & Parsons, for respondents.

McLEAN, Circuit Justice. The questions arise in this case on a motion to dissolve an injunction which had been granted, to stay an execution on a judgment at law. The bill states that the Cleveland, Zanesville and Cincinnati Railroad Company, a body corporate and politic, created by the laws of Ohio, and having its principal place of business at Akron, in Ohio, and within the northern district, on the first day of April, 1852, for the purpose of borrowing money to construct a railroad from Hudson, in the county of Summit, to Millersburgh, in the county of Holmes, executed and issued five hundred bonds of one thousand dollars each, payable in ten years from date, with interest thereon at the rate of seven per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually, until the principal shall be paid. That the company sold the bonds for cash, which bonds were duly transferred to the complainant in trust, &c. And the company duly executed a deed to the complainant and to his successors in the trust, and thereby made him assignee of all the present and future to be acquired property of the company in the road to be made, including the right of way, and the land occupied thereby, together with the superstructures and tracks thereon, and all rails and equipments procured or to be procured with the proceeds of said bonds, together with all franchises, rights and privileges of said company; and all property connected with the road was pledged for the payment of the bonds and the interest. And in case of failure to pay the interest or principal, as stipulated, the complainant, or those who should succeed him in the trust, at the discretion or at the request, in writing, of one-half of the bondholders, then unpaid and unconverted into stock, might cause said premises or so much thereof as might be necessary to discharge the principal and interest of all said bonds as might be unpaid, to be sold at public auction, in the city of Cleveland or in New York City, giving at least forty days' notice of the time and place, and the specific property to be sold, etc., and execute a conveyance of the property sold, which should bar the company, &c. No advantage to be taken of stay laws or injunctions, &c. Several locomotives and tenders were purchased, and a great number of passenger and freight cars for the road, also baggage, platform and gravel cars. And the complainant represents that several of these cars have been levied on by the marshal of the northern district of Ohio, by virtue of an execution issued on a judgment obtained by the defendants, Pennock & Hart, against the company. And the company subsequently contracted a large amount of indebtment to various banking institutions and individuals, for money borrowed, and expended the same upon said road and for other purposes connected therewith; and afterwards, on the 1st of December, 1854, and after all the aforesaid locomotives, tenders, passenger cars, baggage cars, platform cars, gravel and freight cars, had been procured and placed upon said road, the company executed and issued bonds of that date, for various sums, amounting, in the whole, to the sum of seven hundred thousand dollars, payable in fifteen years from the date thereof, and also interest thereon at the rate of seven per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually, and delivered said bonds to its creditors, in some instances as collateral security for, and in other instances in payment of, said indebtment. And the company, by its deed, duly executed, conveyed and transferred to George Mygott and his successors, in the trust thereby created, its said equipments and appurtenances in the same manner, to the same extent, and upon similar trusts to those expressed in the deed to the complainant, &c. The said George Mygott accepted the trust, and caused the deed to be recorded. About twenty-five thousand dollars of these bonds have been used in payment to creditors.

[1] [Affirmed in Pennock v. Coe, 23 How. (64 U. S.) 117.]

The complainant alleges that the company made default in the payment of the semi-annual instalment of interest due in October, 1854, and has ever since failed to pay the interest in full, which has become due, by which the legal title to the locomotives and other property above specified on the road mortgaged or pledged as above said, became vested in the complainant, to be divested only on the payment of the semi-annual instalments of interest now due on said bonds, and in fulfilment of the deed to make any further assurance to complainant for more fully carrying into effect the object of the first conveyance,—and particularly for the conveyance of any property more perfectly acquired subsequent to the said deed, on the 7th of April, 1855, executed and delivered to complainant a further deed of said road, its equipments and appurtenances, embracing the property specified, which said deed the complainant had duly recorded. And the complainant represents that the whole of said property is an inadequate security for the interest and principal, as they shall become due, on the first bonds of five hundred thousand dollars; and that the company have no other means of payment than by the use of the machinery on the road, in the transportation of passengers and freight. And the complainant further states, that sixteen bonds, dated 1st November, 1854, came into the hands and possession of the defendants, Pennock & Hart, with full knowledge of the aforesaid conveyances made to the complainant and the said George Mygott, but they commenced suit on them, and on the 16th May, 1856, obtained a judgment for $17,765.50, with costs, against the said company. And that an execution, having been issued, was levied on the locomotives, tenders, passenger cars, platform cars, gravel cars and freight cars of the road, which have been advertised for sale by the marshal, &c. The Cleveland, Zanesville and Cincinnati Railroad Company, in its answer, admits the facts substantially as alleged by the complainant; and it alleges that the entire line of road proposed to be constructed by it, extended from Hudson, aforesaid, to Zanesville, in the county of Muskingum, at which place it would connect with the Ohio Central Railroad, and also with the Zanesville, Wilmington and Cincinnati road. And with the view of conforming the name of the corporation to these lines of road, application was made to the court of common pleas of Summit county, for a change of the name from that of Akron Branch of the Cleveland and Pittsburg Railroad Company, by which it was incorporated and known, to that of the Cleveland, Zanesville, and Cincinnati Railroad Company; and such proceedings were had, that at the March term of said court, 1853, it was ordered and adjudged that the name of the defendant should be changed as requested; which decree was filed in the secretary of state's office the 17th of March, 1853, and also published in a newspaper in general circulation in the county of Summit. The defendants, Pennock & Hart, admit in their answers, that the deed of 1852 was executed as alleged in the bill, but they deny the validity of that deed, as it was not made in pursuance of the authority conferred on the company by law. They admit the issuing of the five hundred bonds of one thousand dollars each, as charged in the bill, but they allege the bonds were void, not having been made legally. The power to construct a railroad from Hudson to Millersburgh is denied. When the deed of trust was executed, they say, the right of way was not procured by the company, and that the chattels on which the execution was levied had then no existence. They say the interest has not for three years been paid to the bondholders, or to persons for their benefit. They admit the execution of another trust deed in 1854, to secure seven hundred thousand dollars in bonds; and they admit the execution of another deed to the complainant in 1855, but they say that sixteen bonds, of one thousand dollars each, were issued under the mortgage of 1854, which came into the hands of the defendants in due course of trade; but they deny any notice of the mortgage to the complainant. These bonds were accepted by the treasurer of the company, and were payable in New York, in 1853 and 1854; but they were not paid when due, and were protested. They were received as cash in payment for making thirty-five house or freight cars, and forty platform cars. These cars were made and delivered to the company, between the 19th of May, 1853, and the 15th of February, 1854; and the levy complained of in the bill was made on these cars and others. As the motion was made by the defendants, Pennock & Hart, to dissolve the injunction formerly granted and dismiss the bill, the case must be considered on its final hearing. The merits seem to be fully presented by the pleadings and the deposition of Simon Perkins, the president of the company.

The first ground assumed in the defence is, that "the railroad company, by whatever name it may have been called, had no authority as a corporate body to make a railway from Hudson to Millersburgh; and as a necessary consequence, had no power to borrow money for that purpose. The charter authorizes the construction of a railroad between certain termini, to wit, "from some convenient point on the Cleveland and Pittsburg Railroad, in Hudson, Summit county, through Cuyahoga Falls and Akron to Wooster, or some other point on the Ohio and Pennsylvania Railroad, between Massillon and Wooster." The doctrine stated in the brief, "that corporate powers can never be created by implication nor extended by construction," is admitted. The act under which this company was organized, was unskillfully drawn, and some of its provisions require a careful consideration to ascertain the intent of the legislature. It is entitled "An act to amend an act to incorporate the Cleveland and Pittsburg Railroad Company, passed March 14, 1836." The first section provides, "that the Cleveland and Pittsburg Railroad Company be and they are hereby authorized to construct, under the provisions of their charter, and in the manner hereafter indicated, a branch railroad from some convenient point on the Cleveland and Pittsburg Railroad, in Hudson, Summit county, through Cuyahoga Falls and Akron, to Wooster, or some other point on the Ohio and Pennsylvania Railroad, between Massillon and Wooster, and to connect with said Ohio and Pennsylvania Railroad, and any other railroad running in the direction of Columbus; and for this purpose may increase their capital stock one million of dollars." The second section provides, that for the purpose of constructing and managing said Akron branch road, such persons as may have subscribed for the stock thereof, or for the major part of said stock, may organize by the election of not more than seven directors, who shall elect a president from their number; and, under the name of the "Akron Branch of the Cleveland and Pittsburg Railroad Company," be entitled to all the privileges, and subject to all the restrictions and limitations, granted or imposed by the charter of the Cleveland and Pittsburg Railroad Company, and the amendments thereto; and the Cleveland and Pittsburg Railroad Company may subscribe stock to said Akron branch road, and may aid the said Akron branch organization, by the sale or guaranty of its bonds or otherwise, as they may deem proper. And power was given to the Akron branch to make an arrangement with the Cleveland and Pittsburg Railroad Company, in regard to the use of their road, and with any other company: provided that the Akron branch and the Cleveland road might merge the same, so as to be under the direction of one company. The first section gives the power to the Cleveland and Pittsburg company to construct the Akron branch under their charter, designating the direction and limit of the branch. No other company or organization is referred to, in regard to the structure and management of the road. But the second section provides for a distinct and an independent organization. The subscribers to the stock of the Akron branch are authorized to organize by electing one of their number president, and under the name of the "Akron Branch of the Cleveland and Pittsburg Railroad Company," be entitled to all the privileges and subject to all the restrictions and liabilities granted or imposed by the charter of the Cleveland and Pittsburg Railroad Company, and the amendments thereto." This adopts the Cleveland charter, and applies to the structure and management of the Akron branch, the same as to the Cleveland and Pittsburg road. The provision in the fourth section of the act which authorizes the Cleveland Company to call a meeting of its stockholders at Ravenna, to act upon the amendments of its charter and for the organization of the Akron branch, in no respect conflicts with the second section. They were required also to call, at the same time, a meeting of the subscribers for the branch stock. Under the act, the subscribers had power to accept the amendment as an extension of the Cleveland charter, as the same interest, or to enter into a separate organization. The latter was adopted, and the road has been constructed under it from Hudson to Millersburgh. This construction of the charter seems to be clear of doubt. The organization was made the 17th of March, 1851, and was continued until the month of March, 1853. At the term of the court of common pleas held in that month, in Summit county, it was ordered, on application of the company, that its name should be changed to that of the "Cleveland, Zanesville and Cincinnati Railroad Company." The requisites of the statute seem to have been complied with, which authorized a change of the corporate name, as was decreed by the court. But it is objected that the company had no authority to construct a road from "Hudson to Williamsburg." The construction of the road was commenced at Hudson, the northern terminus named in the charter, in July, 1851. In 1852 it was extended by the way of the Cuyahoga Falls, to Akron, and it was made to Williamsburg in 1854. The distance from Hudson to Orrville, which is the point where the road intersects the Pittsburg, Fort Wayne and Chicago railroad, is thirty-eight miles; and from Orrville to Williamsburg, in Holmes county, it is about twenty-three miles, and this is the southern terminus of the road at present. The first section of the act provides that the road shall begin "at some convenient point on the Cleveland and Pittsburg road, in Hudson, Summit county, and run through Cuyahoga Falls and Akron to Wooster, or some other point on the Ohio and Pennsylvania Railroad, now called the Fort Wayne and Chicago Railroad, between Massillon and Wooster, and to connect with said Ohio and Pennsylvania Railroad, and any other railroad running in the direction of Columbus." All the points named in the charter are touched by the road, until it strikes Orrville, which is on the Ohio and Pennsylvania Railroad, and between Wooster and Massillon. Thus far there is an exact compliance with the charter. The Pennsylvania and Ohio road was not named in the charter as its southern terminus. It was to connect with that road and any other railroad running in the direction of Columbus. This language cannot be construed. Millersburgh it appears is twenty-three miles south of Orrville, in the direction to Zanesville, to which place it is the intention of the company to extend their road. At that point it will connect with the Central Ohio road, which leads to Columbus. I think the company was authorized by the charter to extend their road to Zanesville. No one can suppose that the connection with the Pennsylvania and Ohio road by the way of Crestline to Columbus, was intended as the terminus of the road, as the distance, if not double, would be much greater on that line than on a direct route. The same objection applies, in a less degree, perhaps, to the Steubenville and Newark road. The connection at Zanesville, on the Central road, was the most direct route to Columbus, and it is within a reasonable construction of the charter. I think, therefore, that Millersburgh, being in the direction from Orrville to Zanesville, the road was properly constructed to that point, with the view of its being extended to Zanesville. The first section of the act authorized the Cleveland Company, in view of the Akron branch, to increase its capital a million dollars; and under the second section of the act, this provision is applied to an independent organization, and gives to it all the privileges of the Cleveland and Pittsburg Company under its original charter, subject to all the restrictions and liabilities which it imposes. Here are corporate powers conferred to the extent of the charter referred to. From an act to revise and amend "An act to incorporate the Cleveland and Pittsburg Railroad Company," dated March 14th, 1836 (section 6), power was given to said company, by its proper officer duly authorized by the directors, to "mortgage, hypothecate or pledge, all or any part of said railroad, or of any other real or personal property belonging to said company, or of any portion of the tolls and revenues of said company, which may thereafter accrue, for the purpose of raising money to construct said road, or to pay debts incurred in the construction thereof." And in the act regulating railroad companies, passed February, 11, 1848, in the sixth section, it is provided, "Such company shall have power to borrow money on the credit of the corporation, not exceeding its authorized capital stock, at a rate of interest not exceeding seven per cent. per annum, and may execute bonds or promissory notes therefor, and to secure the payment thereof, may pledge the property and income of such company." To the same purport is the act of 1852. Swan, Dig. 199–203.

In the defence it is assumed, that the mortgage or trust deed made by the railroad company to the complainant is void, for the reason that it pledges property "thereafter to be acquired," at least so far as regards such after acquired property, and a number of authorities are cited to sustain this position. In 4 Comyn, Dig. "Grant," D, p. 310, it is said, "A man cannot grant a thing which he has not." Moody v. Wright, 13 Metc. [Mass.] 32, Chapman v. Weiner, 4 Ohio, 481, 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1021, and other authorities are cited as sustaining this doctrine. It is admitted that at common law, a man cannot grant or convey an effective title to land or anything else to which he has no right; but if this be done by general warranty, and he afterwards acquires a title to the land granted, the first deed operates as a good title by way of estoppel. The term "grant," in its largest sense, comprehends everything that is granted, or may be passed from one to another. It includes incorporeal as well as corporeal rights; but a feoffment was void without livery of seisin. In his treatise on Equity Jurisprudence, Mr. Justice Story says, in regard to property that may be mortgaged (volume 2, § 1021): "In equity, whatever property, personal or real, is capable of an absolute sale, may be the subject of a mortgage." Rights in remainder and reversion, possibilities coupled with an interest, rents, franchises, and choses in action may be mortgaged, but a naked possibility or expectancy, such as that of an heir, cannot be. By the civil law a party may mortgage property to which he has no present title, by contract or otherwise. But it is not necessary to consider, at large, whether the mortgage in question, in regard to the equipments of the road acquired subsequent to the date of the mortgage, is operative at common law; as, if it cannot be so considered, there can be no doubt it is good in equity, and the question comes before us on a bill in equity. It seems to be admitted, as it is not denied, that the future profits of the road are subject to the mortgage. And what difference in principle can there be in the future profits, and the necessary expenditure to produce such profits? Repairs, when necessary, of the rolling stock on the road, are not more within the mortgage than the purchase of the necessary supplies of such stock, as the public accommodation shall require. The mortgage was on a railroad in full operation, embracing every necessary equipment and accommodation to give to it the utmost efficiency. This entered into consideration of the parties to the mortgage, and anything short of this, would, in a great degree, impair the security of that instrument. Suppose a sheriff or constable had levied upon one or more of the passenger cars or of the locomotives, within a few days after the machinery on the road was in motion; can any one suppose that the mortgage could have been defeated or its security impaired by such a step. Will it not be said that in such a case the stock would be within the protection of the mortgage? This no one could doubt, as a withdrawal of the stock from the road would not only impair the obligations of the mortgage, but defeat its object. In this respect, a railroad in operation must be considered as protected in the capacity in which it was mortgaged; and this is so manifest that the public, and especially subsequent creditors, are bound to know it. But the protection by the mortgage of the equipments upon the road, in the case supposed, is not more indispensable than to keep them in repair, replace them when destroyed, or add to them when required by the public exigencies; these are all within the purview of the mortgage, the contemplation of the parties, and known to the public. Does this view impose any hardship on the manufacturer of a part of the equipments, subsequent to the date of the mortgage? Certainly it does not. He has a right to retain the possession of his work until it is paid for or the payment secured. Having delivered possession to the company in the ordinary course of business, without receiving the payment, he can assert no lien upon it either in law or equity; he stands in relation to the company on a footing with other creditors who have no security for their debts. In Mitchell v. Winslow [Case No. 9,673], Mr. Justice Story says, "Courts of equity give effect to assignments, not only of choses in action, but of contingent interests, expectancies, and also of things which have no actual or potential existence, but rest in mere possibility only. In respect to the latter, it is true, the assignment can have no positive operation to transfer, in praesenti, property in things not in esse; but it operates by way of present contract, to take effect and attach to the things assigned, when and as soon as they come in esse; and it may be enforced as such a contract in rem, in equity." The same doctrine is laid down by Lord Hardwicke. Also, it was held in Hobson v. Trevor, 2 P. Wms. 191; Carleton v. Leighton, 3 Mer. 667; 5 Maule & S. 228; Curtis v. Auber, 1 Jac. & W. 526, 532; 1 Mylne & K. 488; Langton v. Horton, 1 Hare, 549; Mitford v. Mitford, 9 Ves. 100. In his Equity Jurisprudence (section 1231), Mr. Justice Story says, "In equity there is a lien, not only on real estate, but on personal property, or on money in the hands of a third person, wherever that is a matter of agreement, at least against the party himself, and third persons who are volunteers and have notice. For it is a general principle in equity, that as against the party himself, and any claiming under him voluntarily or with notice, such an agreement raises a trust." The mortgage having been placed upon record in the three counties through which the road was to be constructed, and was in fact constructed, I suppose it must operate as a notice of its contents. See Hawthorn v. New Castle & N. S. Ry. Co., reported in Criss on Liens, Append. 408; Abbot v. Goodwin, 20 Me. 408; 2 Appl. & Shep. [20 Me.] 408; Macomber v. Parker, 14 Pick. 497.

The third ground assumed is, "that the trust deed is void for uncertainty as to the nature and extent of the grant." The instrument has been attentively read and considered, and no uncertainty is perceived in its conditions, or as to the objects on which it is to operate. If its language were so vague as not to specify these matters with at least reasonable certainty, the mortgage could not be specifically enforced. But as this objection does not seem to arise on the face of the instrument, and has not been shown in the brief of counsel, no further examination will be given to it.

In the fourth ground, it is contended that the mortgage is void under the statute of frauds. As the trust deed was entered into under the enactments of the legislature, it certainly cannot be said to be against the policy of the law; and it is not perceived that any of its provisions conflict with the statute of frauds, seeing that they are authorized by a law subsequent to that statute.

In the fifth and last ground, it is contended, "the plaintiff does not show himself entitled to call upon this court to stay the hand of the judgment creditors." The first mortgage to the complainant, Coe, was dated the 1st of April, 1852; the second to the same individual bears date in March, 1855. Prior to the execution of the second deed of trust to the complainant, a mortgage, similar to the one first executed to the complainant, was given to George Mygott, by the same company, and on the same road, its equipments, &c., dated 1st of November, 1854, to secure the payment of bonds to the amount of seven hundred thousand dollars, which it was proposed to issue for the completion of the road, &c. It appears that the company employed P. F. Geisse to build, for its use on the road, a number of cars, of different descriptions; and that in payment of the balance of his account, on the 20th of November, 1854, he received sixteen of the second mortgage bonds secured by the trust deed given to George Mygott. The judgment complained of was obtained on these bonds by Pennock & Hart. As the first mortgage of the complainant was executed the 1st of April, 1852, it is contended by the defendants' counsel, that the first mortgage cannot avail him, as to the two locomotives, the Hercules and Vulcan, and the passenger cars 3, 4, 5 and 6, none of which were in existence until the fall of 1853, and the spring of 1854, and that before the execution of the complainant's second mortgage, in March, 1855, this property had been conveyed to George Mygott, by the trust deed dated November 1st, 1854, to secure sundry bonds, of which the sixteen on which the judgment was entered, formed a part. This argument rests upon the hypothesis, that as the two locomotives and passenger cars referred to were received by the company after the date of the first mortgage, and before the second mortgage was given to Mygott, and as the bonds on which the judgment was obtained were secured by the second mortgage, the complainant can claim no lien on this property under his first mortgage. The passenger cars and the locomotives referred to were in possession of the company, and employed upon the road, some months before the mortgage was executed to Mygott. It appears that Geisse, before he received the sixteen bonds, had taken from the company a draft for the amount due, on New York or some other place, which was returned protested for non-payment. On the return of the draft, the bonds were paid to him as the only means of payment, within the power of the company. From this statement it is clear, that the defendants Pennock & Hart, as creditors of the company, stand upon no other ground and have no higher claim than any other holders of bonds issued under the second mortgage. Geisse, the builder of the cars, having delivered them to the company, without taking a special lien, if he continued to be the holder of the bonds, would have no better claim than the defendants, who are his assignees. The bonds, it is presumed, are payable to bearer, and pass by delivery. Pennock & Hart are purchasers in the market, the same as other holders of bonds, covered by the second mortgage. A part of the gravel cars levied on by the sheriff were sold, with the consent of the counsel in this case, and also of the complainant and the first bondholders; but the levy is understood still to include cars, &c., which belonged to the company when the first mortgage was given. In the first mortgage, for the consideration stated, the company covenanted to "execute and deliver any further reasonable and necessary conveyance of the premises, or any part thereof, to the party of the second part, his successors in said trust, and assigns, for more fully carrying into effect the objects hereof, particularly for the conveyance of any property acquired by said parties of the first part, subsequently to the date hereof, and comprehended in the description contained in the premises." It is presumed the third mortgage deed to the complainant was executed in 1855, under this covenant. Entertaining the opinion that the first mortgage, by virtue of the above and other covenants which it contains, operated as an equitable mortgage on subsequently acquired equipments for the road, which was not displaced by the second mortgage, it is not deemed necessary to inquire what, if any, legal effect can be given to the last mortgage. Holly v. Brown, 14 Conn. 255.

It is alleged in the bill, that the entire property of the road will be inadequate to the payment of the first mortgage. The wisdom of the first bondholders was manifestly shown, by permitting the road to remain under its present management, being satisfied that the directors had discharged their duties faithfully and economically. This seems to be the only course that can retrieve the affairs of the company. In most cases, to place such a concern in the hands of a receiver, involves it in hopeless ruin.

Had Pennock & Hart, as holders of the sixteen bonds, a right to bring suit on them at law, and having obtained a judgment, to sell on execution a part of the mortgage property without reference to the claims of other creditors under the same or other mortgages? Against such a procedure there are three insuperable objections: 1. A sale on execution would convey to the purchaser no exclusive right to the property sold. 2. Such a sale would not divest the equitable rights of other bondholders. The purchasers could receive only the same and no greater right than that which was vested in them by the bonds. 3. The claim must be prosecuted in equity, where all who have an interest in the subject matter may be made parties. In equity, only, can the rights of all the parties be properly adjusted. And this is especially the case where the property mortgaged is inadequate to the payment of all the creditors. In addition to these considerations, from the nature of the property levied on, it could not be separated from the road, without suspending, in whole or in part, its operations. And what could be more unjust than this, to the other bondholders? The operation of the machinery on the road, in the transportation of passengers and freight, constitutes its chief value. The railroad, like a complicated machine, consists of a great number of parts, a combined action of which is essential to produce revenue. And as well might a creditor claim the right to levy on and abstract some essential part from Woodworth's planing machine, or any other combination of machinery, as to take from a railroad its locomotives or its passenger cars. Such an abstraction would cause the operations to cease in both cases. As before remarked the proper mode of enforcing payment against a railroad company, on bonds secured by mortgage, is, to bring the creditors and the railroad company into chancery, where the earnings of the road, through a faithful agency, may be distributed equitably among the creditors. And in a case where such a course would not satisfy the reasonable demands of creditors, to sell the road and distribute among them its proceeds. Such an extreme procedure, however, should not be authorized by any court, except under circumstances of absolute necessity. 13 Serg. & R. 210; 9 Ga. 377; 9 Watts & S. 27. A stronger ground for an injunction than is taken in this case, could not well be conceived. The defendants, under a judgment at law, have levied upon a large part of the rolling stock on the road, which, if sold and removed, will stop its operations, while the same stock is under mortgage to creditors whose lien is prior to that of the defendants. Such a procedure, if carried out, in this and other cases, would defeat the liens of creditors, in such cases, to many millions of dollars, and put an end to the structure, if not the maintenance, of railroads. The court will perpetually enjoin the proceedings in the case at law, as prayed by the bill, at the costs of the defendants, Pennock & Hart.

[NOTE. The defendants Pennock & Hart appealed to the supreme court, where the decree of the circuit court was affirmed.

[The court (Mr. Justice Nelson delivering the opinion) substantially held that complainant's mortgage attached to the future acquisitions, as therein described, from the time they came into existence; that, the mortgage being a valid and effective security for the bondholders of prior date, they had the superior equity to have the property in question applied to the discharge of the bonds; that the individual bondholders under the second mortgage were properly restrained from proceeding at law to collect their debt, as such a course would not only give them a preference over their associates, but would also have the effect to prejudice the superior equity of the first mortgage bondholders; and that the extension of the road to the Ohio Central road at Zanesville was fairly within the terms of the charter requiring the connection with the Ohio & Pennsylvania Railroad, "and any other railroad running in the direction of Columbus." Pennock v. Coe, 23 How. (64 U. S.) 117.]

Case No. 2,943.

COE v. RANKIN et al.

[5 McLean, 354.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Michigan. Oct. Term, 1852.

ACTION ON INDEMNITY BOND—PLEADING.

1. No action can be brought on a bond of indemnity, unless the plaintiff has been damnified; and this must be shown in the declaration.

2. A promise to account and indemnify, will only require the defendant to respond to the injury shown.

3. A general averment of loss is insufficient.

[At law. Action by Israel Coe against Rankin and Prince.]

Mr. Howard, for plaintiff.
Mr. Emmons, for defendants.

WILKINS, District Judge. Action brought upon a bond, conditioned that the principal obligor should well and truly account to the said plaintiff, and indemnify and keep him harmless as the holder of certain stock which he had delivered to the said obligor. The declaration recites, that certain matters in controversy between the plaintiff and Rankin had been, by their covenant, submitted to arbitration; that the controversy was in relation to the liability of Rankin as acceptor of a certain bill of exchange drawn by one Thomas Bristol for $7,200; that the said Rankin had deposited with one Brown certain certificates of stock for the purpose—as mentioned in a certain letter from the said Rankin and Bristol to Brown—true copies of which certificates were then and there delivered to said Coe, who, as the holder of the said certificates then delivered the originals to the said Rankin, who, with his co-obligor and co-defendant, entered into the bond on which the action is instituted. The obligation of the bond is stated to be to indemnify and save harmless, and well and truly to account to the said Coe for the said certificates, the value of which is laid at $10,000.

The declaration avers that the said Rankin has been called upon to account for the said certificates of stock, and that he has refused either to account for the said stock, or redeliver the said certificates, and furthermore, that he has not indemnified or saved harmless the said plaintiff, in consequence of his having delivered to him the original certificates of the stock, but that he had sold the same, and converted the proceeds to his own use. The declaration concludes with the general averment that the said breaches of the bond thus exhibited entitled the plaintiff to demand the penal sum, &c. To this declaration the defendants have demurred, and assigned several reasons, one of which is sufficient, viz: That it does not contain or set forth in what manner, or to what extent the alleged failure upon the part of Rankin to account for the stock damnified the plaintiff, or show that any sum was rightfully due said plaintiff under the assigned breaches of the bond.

The recital of the provisions of the arbitration covenant which precedes the averment of the conditions of the bond clearly sets forth the nature of the transaction. The certificates of stock were deposited with Brown, the depositor not divesting himself of his interest in them, and Brown being but a stakeholder, having the custody, but not the proprietorship, which still continued in Rankin. The recital of the arbitration covenant exhibits very loosely the relation which the plaintiff bore to those certificates. But it is clearly inferable that they were but a trust deposit with Brown, to meet the exigency of the suit instituted on the acceptance of the bill of exchange. A holder of stock negotiable or otherwise is not like the holder of a bill of exchange which forms part of the commercial currency of the country, but the former may or may not be according to circumstances the owner or proprietor. Now, Coe was the holder of the certificates on the same principle (and with the same interest) that Brown held them. He held them then as a trustee. In case a recovery was had against Rankin on the acceptance, then, the certificates were to be appropriated to the payment of the sum recovered, but if there was no recovery against Rankin, and his defense to the action to the bill of exchange was sustained, then, the certificates of stock as a deposit, should be returned to the depositor, Rankin, who alone was entitled to them, the deposit having fulfilled its purpose, Coe, under such circumstances, stood in Brown's shoes, and had no proprietory interest; and, consequently, the declaration is defective in not averring that he had some such valuable interest in the stock, either as owner thereof, or having such a lien as would entitle him to transfer the same for a valuable consideration.

[1] [Reported by Hon. John McLean, Circuit Justice.]

The covenants to account as contained in this bond with the recital of the occasion of the obligation, is not equivalent to a promise to pay. To pay what? may be asked. To pay the value of the certificates? If so—to whom? No one is entitled to payment unless he has the right to demand payment. The holder of these certificates, under the circumstances stated in the declaration, had no right to demand payment at any time. A promise to him to account for them must be connected with the covenant to indemnify, and is not a distinct covenant. On the accounting for the stock, the defendants were only to pay whatever loss might have accrued in consequence of the stockholder parting with the security placed in his possession for the purpose defined at the time of the deposit.

The declaration avers no loss except in general terms; if there had been an averment that a recovery had been obtained against Rankin on his acceptance, and which formed the subject matter of the arbitration; and that the certificates of stock were needed for the purpose of meeting the demands of such recovery, and they not being re-delivered or accounted for when demanded, and that consequently the plaintiff had been compelled to pay the amount so recovered, and that a loss thereby had been incurred, the declaration would have set forth on the bond a sufficient cause of action. But such is not the case here, and the court give judgment for defendant on demurrer, with leave, &c.

COE, The MARY. See Case No. 9,204.

Case No. 2,943a.

COELLE v. LOEKHEAD et al.

[Hempst. 194.][1]

Superior Court, D. Arkansas. July, 1832.

AMENDMENT OF JUDGMENT.

Amendment made by adding the name of another person, four years after the rendition of judgment.

[At law. Action by John H. Coelle against Thomas D. Loekhead and James McFarland.]

Motion to amend a judgment.

Before JOHNSON and CROSS, Judges.

This day, the court, being sufficiently advised of the motion of the defendants in error to correct and amend the judgment rendered in this case at the April term of this court, 1828, it appearing that the said judgment should have been affirmed in the names of Thomas D. Loekhead and James McFarland, partners, under the name of Thomas D. Loekhead & Co., instead of in the name of Thomas D. Loekhead alone, sustained the motion, and ordered this amendment to be made nunc pro tunc.

Case No. 2,944.

The COERNINE.

[21 Law Rep. 343; 7 Am. Law Reg. 5; 39 Hunt, Mer. Mag. 197.]

District Court, S. D. New York. May Term, 1858.

MARITIME CONTRACT—LIEN BY STATE STATUTE.

1. A contract by parties, resident in New York, with a citizen of North Carolina, to furnish labor, materials, and stores for building and equipping a vessel in North Carolina is not a maritime contract within the admiralty jurisdiction of the federal courts, and no lien is thereby created which can be enforced in rem.

[Cited in Whitlock v. The Thales, Case No. 17,578; Smith v. The Royal George, Id. 13,102.]

2. It seems that no enactment by a state legislature can be administered as the foundation of any right or remedy in admiralty. It is therefore immaterial whether any lien is given by a state law, or whether such law is of any force out of the limits of such state.

[2]The libellants, ship-chandlers and traders, residents and doing business in New York, were in the habit of dealing on credit in the line of their trade with Gilbert L. Moore, a resident of Williamston, in North Carolina, engaged in building and sailing vessels, and other transactions, in that state. The correspondence between those parties proves that such course of dealing was in use between them anterior to the month of September, 1856, and was continued subsequently on open accounts of debit and credit. At that time, in an interview between them in New York, it was agreed that the libellants should supply the equipments and outfits necessary to complete the schooner Coernine, which Moore was about constructing at his residence in North Carolina, and that they should furnish whatever should be required to that end upon the written or verbal orders of Moore. On the 5th of March, 1857, Moore wrote the libellants from Williamston by Samuel D. Hines, introducing the latter as the intended master of the Coernine when completed, and requesting that his memoranda of materials and supplies should be filled by the libellants "at as low rates as possible," the large amounts of course on the regular times, "in order to give the vessel some time to make a port before it is due;" "the small memoranda of which I shall expect to pay between one and three months;" for instance "the bill for making sails, iron works, &c." The same letter had advised the libellants that Moore would, between July and September, pay them a considerable amount for the purchase of the sails and rigging for the Coernine; those, as it appears from the correspondence between the parties, being articles not dealt in by the libellants, but with some others were to be purchased by them in New York for Moore. By letters of dates of March 14 and 20, the libellants advised Moore that they were hastening to fulfill all Hines' orders; that hemp, sails, blocks, &c., had been purchased by them. On the 28th March they further wrote that all the goods were then ready, and requested a remittance of funds, as they had to make large purchases, and their payments for duck, &c., "then, for the next sixty days, will be heavy." By letters of April 8, the libellants informed Moore that the goods were all on board the vessel at New York, for transportation to North Carolina, and that they inclose "bill of lading and amount of supplies, amounting in all to $4,074.35," "the cash bills, amounting to $916.77," they desired him to remit immediately. On the 11th July, 1856, Moore executed at North Carolina, a promissory note to the libellants, or order for $600, payable at ninety days, and on the 31st of July, at the same place, another note for the same amount ($600), payable in ninety days thereafter to the libellants, or order; and on the 24th of September, following another promissory note, dated at New York, payable to libellants or order for $1,000, four months after date. These several promissory notes were produced in open court by the counsel for the libellants on the hearing of the cause, as having been given for the debt in prosecution, and were delivered up to be cancelled.

---

[1] [Reported by Samuel H. Hempstead, Esq.]

[2] [From 7 Am. Law Reg. 5.]

[It appeared in proof that the materials supplied by the libellants were necessary for the construction and use of the schooner, and could not have been procured at the place where she was built and fitted out. They were supplied for her service, and after her completion she was dispatched by Moore, her owner, from Plymouth, North Carolina, her port of registry, upon a series of foreign voyages. June 2, 1857, she sailed for Guadaloupe, thence to Marie Galante, thence to St. Pierre, Martinique, thence to the Island of Nevis, on trading voyages; thence to St. Thomas, where she was chartered for Porto Rico and New York, at which last place she arrived in the month of August, remained in the port fifteen days at quarantine, and eight days afterward in discharging and reloading, and on the 22nd day of September sailed again on round charters by the way of the West Indies back to New York, where she arrived Jan. 26, 1858, and the libel in this cause was filed the next day. The libellants were personally apprised of the vessel being in this port within two or three days after her first arrival here, and also knew the whole period of her continuance in port. The libellants charged that the schooner being in Wilmington, N. C., and in want of ship chandlery, sails, rigging, materials, labor and supplies, to render her seaworthy and fit to navigate the high seas and proceed upon a voyage to the West Indies, they furnished and delivered such articles to the vessel at that place, &c. These claimants intervened and set up a title to the vessel under an assignment of her in trust for the payment of debts made to them by Gilbert L. Moore prior to the commencement of this action; and by formal answer they denied every material allegation in the libel upon which the action is based. They especially denied the jurisdiction of this court over the subject matter, and insisted on the argument upon an explicit judgment upon that branch of the defence, because of its eminent importance to the interests of navigation and commerce in American vessels, and because it is supposed the law governing that subject is obscure or indefinite in its provisions, or has become seemingly so, under the rules by which it is interpreted and administered by the courts.

[There was also a separate intervention and defence to the action in the name of James C. Willett, sheriff of the city and county of New York, who interposed and claimed the vessel by virtue of process of attachment out of a state court in favor of a creditor of Gilbert L. Moore, the alleged owner of the schooner. This branch of the defence was disposed of at the last May term of the court, on an issue in law (24 MS. Dec. 40) and will not be further regarded in the report of this case.] [1]

N. Hoxie and E. C. Benedict, for libellants.

J. Gerard, Jr., and B. D. Silliman, for claimants.

[1] [From 7 Am. Law Reg. 5.]

BETTS, District Judge. The libellants place their right of action in this cause upon the grounds that the transaction between them and Gilbert L. Moore, in relation to the outfit and supply of materials for building and equipping the schooner Coernine, was a maritime contract concerning a foreign vessel and her employment in navigation and commerce, and that a debt was thereby created which became by implication of law a lien upon the vessel, accompanying her wherever she went; or that by the local law of North Carolina, under which she was built, registered and owned, and where the supplies were used, the schooner was made subject to a lien for that debt, which, by the principles of the general maritime law, is enforceable in this court. The position on the part of the claimants is, that this court has no jurisdiction over the subject matter of the suit, in any aspect of the case under which it is presented by the pleadings and proofs, and the cases of Pratt v. Reed, 19 How. [60 U. S.] 359, and People's Ferry Co. of Boston v. Beers [20 How. (61 U. S.) 393],[1] are relied upon as having settled, by the solemn adjudications of the supreme court, the law definitely to that effect. In view of the magnitude of interests depending upon the general question in this district, and its importance practically in the every-day business dealings within the port between mechanics and material men, and ship-owners and masters, it is deemed desirable that this specific point should be made the prominent subject of consideration and decision; especially if those judgments of the supreme court have worked any change in the rules heretofore applied to this class of cases, and have diminished the securities formerly enforced in this court in behalf of that order of creditors.

In the first place, it is important to consider what were the special features in the case of Pratt v. Reed [supra] adjudged upon by the supreme court, and what character was affixed by that decision to the contract or credit in regard to necessaries supplied a foreign vessel on a voyage, in order to give them a privilege or lien against the vessel. The steamboat Sultana was employed on the western lakes in the transportation of passengers and freight. She was enrolled and owned at Buffalo, and a debt was contracted at Erie, Pennsylvania, by her owner and master, for supplies of coal to her during the performance of a succession of trips, for a period of about two years. It was assumed by the court to have been necessary for the navigation of the vessel, that she should be furnished with coal on those occasions, although the proof on that head was held to be loose and indefinite. The libellant furnished her coal in that manner when demanded, from June, 1852, to May, 1854, and rendered a bill therefor, containing a running account of debits and credits. The owner of the boat usually navigated her as master, and was present when the supplies were furnished. When he was not present they were furnished at the request of the person in command. The answer denied that the supplies were furnished on the credit of the boat, and averred that they were furnished on the credit of the master. The court laid out of view the inadequacy of proof that the supply of coal was an actual necessity to the navigation of the vessel, within the admiralty rule, at the time it was supplied her, because of the more serious difficulty in the case of the libellant, in the entire absence of any proof to show that there was also a necessity at the time, of procuring the supplies, for a credit upon the vessel, which was asserted by the court to be as essential as that of the necessity of the article itself. "It seems to be supposed," the court remarks, "that circumstances of less pressing necessity for supplies or repairs, and an implied hypothecation of the vessel to procure them, will satisfy the rule, than in case of a necessity sufficient to justify a loan of money on bottomry for the like purpose. We think this is a misapprehension." The court proceeds to fortify the position of law taken by them on those facts, by reasoning against the sufficiency of the facts to authorize an implication of a lien in the case, and by an intimation strongly disfavoring the increase of maritime liens of this class, upon the lakes and rivers, as tending to perplex and embarrass business, rather than furnish facilities for carrying forward, and declaring that such liens should be strictly limited to the necessities of commerce which created them. The jurisdiction of the court over the question is one and the same when it concerns the business of commerce and navigation between ports and places in different states and territories upon the lakes and navigable waters connecting the lakes, as is possessed and exercised in case the vessels are employed in navigation and commerce upon the high seas or tide-waters within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the United States. Act Cong. Feb. 26, 1845 (5 Stat. 726).

The similitude, and indeed identity, of the present case with that of Pratt v. Reed, in their leading features, appear thus to be nearly exact. In both instances the supplies and necessaries were obtained in ports of states foreign to those to which the vessels respectively belonged, and were procured through the direct contract and orders of the owner, who also, in each case, was master of the vessel at the time. In neither case was there any stipulation for direct payment of the purchase prices at the time of purchase, nor any terms of credit agreed upon between the parties. The decision in Pratt v. Reed, therefore, in no way rested upon a question of implied authority in a master to pledge a vessel on such a credit, because the dealing was by the owner directly; but the controlling consideration which governed the case was, that however imminent the necessity of the vessel for the supplies might be, the case could not be brought within the cognizance of the federal court, unless it appeared that the necessity was equally urgent that the responsibility of the vessel should be pledged for payment. It seems to me, therefore, that the case of Pratt v. Reed is susceptible of no other interpretation than that an implied lien for stores, materials, supplies, or outfits of any kind, can never be raised against an American vessel in the courts of the United States upon the mere fact that they were furnished her on credit out of her home port and are necessary to her navigation and employment. The further fact must be shown, that the supplies could not be obtained on the personal credit of her owners. That principle covers and negatives every claim to a hypothecation of the schooner in security of the debt in the present case. It is unnecessary to go further, and say the doctrine of the decision significantly implies that the act of the owner of the vessel in personally incurring the debt and obtaining the credit has no higher effect in imparting a lien than the act of a master solely, for the entire dealing in that case appears to have been conducted or sanctioned personally by the owner himself. The particulars in which the present case is distinguishable from that, weaken, instead of strengthening, the presumption that both parties contemplated at the time of the sale and purchase of the materials furnished by the libellants any lien therefor upon the schooner; but for the reasons before suggested I do not recapitulate and press the considerations arising out of the pleadings and proofs tending to show that no liability against the vessel was in view of the parties at the time, and that the dealing was more probably on the footing of their accustomed transactions, and wholly one of personal credit. One distinction, however, ought not to be passed by, which is, that the materials, labor, &c., obtained in this case, were not for the necessary repair of this schooner, but were for her original construction, she then being on the stocks in a course of building. It is intended to dispose of this case in subordination to the judgment of the supreme court in the two recent cases referred to, and to restrain it carefully within the fair and plain import of the doctrines laid down in those decisions without any inquiry into the correspondence or disaccord of those judgments or either of them, with the rule of law antecedently prevailing in maritime courts upon those subjects. It is not the province of this court to canvass the reasons upon which those decisions are founded, or attempt to measure their validity by any supposed inconsistency or incongruity with prior doctrines of the supreme court. They stand the final existing law which governs analogous facts coming within their just scope and meaning.

[1] [From 7 Am. Law Reg. 5.]

People's Ferry Co. of Boston v. Beers was a case decided by the supreme court in December term, 1857 [20 How. (61 U. S.) 393.][1] A vessel, owned in New Jersey, was built and supplied with materials in that state by the libellants, residents in New York, on credit, and without any express pledge of the vessel for the debt. The propositions of law determined by the court, and the facts to which they are applied, are specifically stated by the judge who delivered the opinion of the court. "The only matter in controversy is (say the court) whether the district courts of the United States have jurisdiction to proceed in admiralty to enforce liens for labor and materials furnished in constructing vessels to be employed in the navigation of waters to which the admiralty jurisdiction extends." "We have the simple case," continues the judge, "whether these ship carpenters had a lien for work and materials that can be enforced in rem in admiralty." "The question presented involves a contest between the state and federal government. The latter has no power or jurisdiction beyond what the constitution confers. The contest here is not so much between rival tribunals, as between distinct sovereignties claiming to exercise power over contracts, property, and personal franchises." "What were meant in 1789 by 'cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction,' must be meant now. What was reserved to the states to be regulated by their own institutions, cannot be rightfully infringed by the general government, either through its legislation or judiciary department." "The contract (in the case) is simply for building the hull of a ship, and delivering it on the water. 'She was constructed and delivered according to the contract.' 'The admiralty jurisdiction is limited to contracts, claims, and services purely maritime, and touching rights and duties appertaining to commerce and navigation.' Judge Hopkinson, in 1781, declared, as respects ship-builders, that the practice of former times doth not justify the admiralty's taking cognizance of their suits. 'We feel warranted in saying that at no time since this has been an independent nation has such a practice been allowed.'" The judge adds: "It is proper, however, to notice the fact, that district courts have recognized the existence of admiralty jurisdiction in rem against a vessel to enforce a carpenter's bill for work and materials in constructing it, in cases where a lien had been created by the local law of the state where the vessel was built. Thus far, however, in our judicial history, no case of the kind has been sanctioned by this court." This adjudication very explicitly determines that a contract in a port of one of the United States, to construct a vessel in a port of another state by actually building her or supplying materials for such construction, is not a maritime contract creating a lien upon the vessel, for the value of the labor or supplies, which can be enforced in a federal court. That the debt or contract does not make a case of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction within the meaning of the constitution and laws of the United States; and if it may be any way cognizable in those tribunals, it is only by the force of state legislation, imposing the debt as a lien on the vessel, which obligation the national court executes and carries into effect; but the same judgment emphatically declares that no instance of such proceedings, which appear to have occurred in some of the inferior national courts, has been sanctioned by the supreme court. I had never supposed the jurisdiction of the United States district courts over this class of liens was imparted by state legislation, or that those tribunals could in any way derive judicial competency or jurisdiction from state grant; and without being restrained by the significant intimation of the supreme court, I should not be any way inclined to administer affirmatively, as the foundation of a right and remedy in admiralty, any enactment by a state legislature. Considering that the decision last referred to withdraws from the cognizance of this court the subject-matter of the present action, as not being one of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, I deem it wholly useless and extrajudicial to inquire whether the statute of North Carolina, put in evidence in this cause, is applicable in its provisions to the contract and debt now in suit, or is of any force out of the territorial jurisdiction of that state. The labor claimed by the libellants to have been furnished this schooner in North Carolina must be understood to be the work of builders, personally or by their agents, and falls directly within the judgment of the court, as not a claim of a maritime character.

[1] [From 7 Am. Law Reg. 5.]

The latest decision of the supreme court upon a legal question within its jurisdiction settles for the government of all inferior judicatories the practical meaning and force of the proposition so determined; and it is no part of the function of subordinate courts to adjudge, or even inquire whether such determination comports with, or subverts, antecedent judgments, of the same forum, upon similar questions. The last decision is, practically, the final one. Neither of the two cases last passed upon by the supreme court, in relation to implied liens in favor of material men and laborers, against American vessels in American ports, demanded the direct and broad answer to the inquiry whether those liens exist or can be enforced in the federal courts in any form, by virtue of the general maritime law; but the principles announced by the court, in those cases, render it quite palpable that scarcely another advance remains to be made in order to abrogate that remedy absolutely, and reinstate and restrict the admiralty powers of the judiciary in respect to those credits, in subordination to the rule of the common law as that was administered under the English jurisprudence, at the time of the adoption of the United States constitution. It is my province to accept and pursue the law as declared by the supreme court; and, in my opinion, the rule established by that tribunal, in those cases, determines that the claim put forth in this action, either for building or constructing, or outfitting or providing materials, supplies, labor, rigging, or ship-stores necessary to render this vessel sea-worthy, and fit for navigation at sea, is not within the jurisdiction of the court, and accordingly the libel must be dismissed with costs.

The amount in demand being sufficient to authorize an appeal of the case to the court of last resort, I put the decision specifically upon the question of jurisdiction, that being directly involved, and being a point of high practical moment to the mercantile, manufacturing and shipping interests of the country, and shall forbear discussing those other features in the case bearing strongly against the adequacy of the pleadings and proofs to sustain the action in this form, if the cases of Pratt v. Reed [supra] and People's Ferry Co. of Boston v. Beers [supra] had interposed no legal impediment to the suit. Decree accordingly.

Case No. 2,945.

COFFEE v. EASTLAND.

[Brunner, Col. Cas. 216;[1] Cooke, 159.]

Circuit Court, D. Tennessee. 1812.

PLEADING — NON-JOINDER OF PARTNER, HOW ALLEGED — PARTNERSHIP — NON-JOINDER OF PARTNER IN SUIT BY.

1. If one of two partners be sued upon a partnership demand, he must plead the matter in abatement and set out the names of the partners; defendant may take advantage of the non-joinder for the first time on the general issue.

2. Where one of two partners brings a suit upon a partnership demand, the defendant may take advantage of it at the trial of the cause.

At law. This was an action of assumpsit brought by [John] Coffee against [Thomas] Eastland to recover the price of locating five thousand acres of land. It appeared that the plaintiff and John Drake had entered into a partnership to locate lands, whereby the profits were to be equally divided between them. And it was also proved that to the location for the making of which this action is brought the names of John Coffee and John Drake were subscribed. On the part of the plaintiff evidence was introduced to show certain promises made by the defendant to him, with a view not only of supporting the action upon the merits, but also to establish that the plaintiff was the only person entitled to make a claim upon the defendant.

[1] [Reported by Albert Brunner, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

Grundy, Dickinson, and Cooke, for defendant, moved the court to instruct the jury that the action could not be supported, inasmuch as it was brought in the name of Coffee alone. And they cited 1 Esp. 116; 1 Saund. 291f.

Whiteside and Hayes, contra, endeavored to show that the evidence did not amount to proof of the existence of a partnership, particularly as it applied to the location in question.

M'NAIRY, District Judge (absent TODD, Circuit Justice). It is a question of fact for the determination of the jury whether a partnership existed between the plaintiff and Drake; but if they find the partnership to have existed it follows that Coffee alone cannot maintain the present action. It is no objection that advantage for the first time is taken of the partnership upon the plea of non-assumpsit, and upon the trial of the cause. The plaintiff declares upon a promise made to himself; if it turns out in evidence that the promise was made to him and another, it cannot be said that the defendant assumed upon himself "in manner and form as the plaintiff in declaring hath alleged."

As to the mode of taking advantage of a partnership in an action of assumpsit the rule is this: If one of two partners be sued upon a partnership demand he must plead the matter in abatement, and set out the names of the partners, so that the plaintiff may, if need be, sue them altogether. But if one of the two partners brings a suit upon a partnership demand, the defendant may take advantage of it at the trial of the cause; for he may not know until it comes out in evidence that the fact is so.

Verdict for the defendant.

COFFEE, The JOSEPH E. See Case No. 7,536.

Case No. 2,946.

COFFEEN v. BRUNTON.

[4 McLean, 516; 7 West. Law J. 59; Cox, Am. Trade-Mark Cas. 82; Cox, Manual Trade-Mark Cas. 52.] [1]

Circuit Court. D. Indiana. May Term, 1849.

INFRINGEMENT OF TRADE-MARK—INJUNCTION—DAMAGES.

1. Where a label or mark of another is used by an individual, with a fraudulent intent to recommend to purchasers an article similar in appearance to one favorably known in the market, an injunction will be granted.

[Cited in Walton v. Crowley, Case No. 17,133; Hostetter v. Vowinkle, Id. 6,714.]

2. In commercial transactions, good faith is required. And where a deception is attempted to be practiced, by recommending a spurious article as genuine, to the injury of a party, chancery will restrain the aggressor.

3. In such a case at law, nominal damages will be given where no specific injury has been proved.

4. In such cases, the inquiry is, whether the label or mark is so assimilated to the label or mark of the complainant, as to deceive purchasers. And it seems not to be essential that there should be a fraudulent intent proved.

[Cited in Hostetter v. Vowinkle, Case No. 6,714.]

5. This principle as well applies for the protection of foreigners as citizens.

[Motion for a preliminary injunction to restrain infringement of a trade-mark.]

Mr. Norton, for complainant.

McLEAN, Circuit Justice. In his bill, the plaintiff represents that he was the inventor of a certain medicine, called the "Chinese Liniment," at great labor and expense; that the medicine was found to be efficacious in the cure of many diseases; and on being made known to the public, was purchased extensively, so as to afford a great profit to the plaintiff. It was sold in small bottles, with a suitable label, and accompanied by another paper containing directions for taking and applying the medicine in various complaints. And the complainant represents that the defendant, in the early part of the year 1848, in combination with one John Loree and others, fraudulently issued to the public a preparation called "Ohio Liniment," having upon the bottles containing it, labels, with directions exactly similar to that used by the complainant for his "Chinese Liniment," and that the said Brunton pretends that Loree was the inventor of said liniment, and so represents by hand-bills and advertisements; and that by these representations, which are charged to be false, the defendant has induced the public to believe that the composition sold by him contains the same ingredients as the "Chinese Liniment," and that by such means it is extensively purchased and used to the injury of the complainant, and the great benefit of the defendant. All which representations are alleged to be false, etc.

The complainant has not obtained a patent for his alleged invention; and if, in this respect, the allegations of his bill be admitted in regard to the invention, yet this gives him no exclusive right of property in the medicine. Any other individual has a right to make and sell the same medicine. An exclusive right, as the inventor, can only be obtained under the patent law, by a compliance with its provisions. Nor has the complainant an exclusive right to the label, as it is not a book, within the provisions of the statute. On neither of these grounds can the complainant claim an injunction. But if there be found in the representations of the defendant that his liniment is the same as the "Chinese Liniment," which recommends it to the public to the injury of the complainant, it may be ground for the equitable interposition of this court. Suppose the article sold by the defendant is not only different from the "Chinese Liniment," but greatly inferior to it, the effect must be to destroy in the market the value of the plaintiff's liniment. And this is an injury for which a court of law can not give adequate compensation. However valuable the plaintiff's invention may be, yet if it be discredited by a worthless article, it would be impossible, in any reasonable time, to restore the public confidence in the genuine article. In this consists the injury; and the fraud arises from the false representations that the composition is the same. In Blanchard v. Hill, 2 Atk. 484, Lord Hardwicke said: "Every particular trader has some particular mark or stamp; but I do not know any instance of granting an injunction here to restrain one trader from using the same mark with another; and I think it would be of mischievous consequence to do it." And he further remarks: "It is not the single act of making use of the mark that was sufficient to maintain the action, but the doing it with a fraudulent design to put off bad cloths by this means, and to draw away customers from the other clothier." And in support of this doctrine he referred to Popham, 151, where it was held that an action at law would lie against a cloth-worker for using the same mark as another in the same trade. This doctrine of Lord Hardwicke is sustained by subsequent decisions. In Singleton v. Bolton, 3 Doug. 293, Lord Mansfield said: "If the defendant had sold a medicine of his own under the plaintiff's name or mark, there would be a fraud for which an action would lie." In the case of Sykes v. Sykes, 3 Barn. & C. 541, it was held that the defendant was liable for attempting to sell an article which he falsely represented as manufactured by the plaintiff. In Canham v. Jones, 2 Ves. & B. 218, it was held that the defendant had a right to sell the same kind of medicine, of as good or better quality, than the plaintiff's. The court decided in the case of Knott v. Morgan, 2 Keene, 213, that a company who run omnibuses, and who were named on their carriages, "The London Conveyance Company," had a right to call upon a court of chancery to restrain another company who called themselves "The London Conveyancer Company," as the words and devices were substantially the same, which would deprive the plaintiffs of profits arising from their established character. And in this case the doctrine of Lord Hardwicke, limiting the interference of the court to cases of fraud, is much shaken, if not overruled. In the case of Gout v. Aleploglu [6 Beav. 69, and 1 Chit. Gen. Pr. 721],[2] 7 Am. Jur. 277, "the vice chancellor granted an injunction restraining the defendants from manufacturing and vending watches with the word 'Pessendede,' in Turkish characters, or with the plaintiff's cypher engraved on them, the plaintiffs having been in the habit for many years of supplying watches for the Turkish markets with those marks and words upon them, although the defendants used such word and cypher with their own name, and not the names of the plaintiffs, and the word 'pessendede' signified in the Turkish language, 'warranted.' The court then held that in this case the principle of fraudulent representation applied." And in Millington v. Fox, 3 Mylne & C. 338, the court carried the doctrine further, for they granted an injunction where certain marks had been used in ignorance of any other right.

[1] [Reported by Hon. John McLean, Circuit Justice. Cox, Manual Trade-Mark Cas. 52, contains only a partial report.]

From the above, it would seem that an intentional fraud is not necessary to entitle the plaintiff to protection; but that where the same mark or label is used, which recommends the article to the public by the established reputation of another, who sells a similar article, and the spurious article can not be distinguished from the genuine one, an injunction will be granted, although there was no intentional fraud. And I am inclined to think that this is a correct view of the principle; for the injury will be neither greater nor less by the knowledge of the party. If he has adopted the same mark which will cause his article to be taken for another in the market which is known and approved of, it is an injury which the law will redress. In commercial dealings the utmost good faith should be observed, and no one is permitted to go into the market with a deception of this character, so as to profit by the ingenuity, good faith, or established reputation of another. "A man may have no abstract right to use a particular mark," as was remarked by Judge Creswell, in Crawshay v. Thompson, 4 Man. & G. 386, but when such a mark is used to deceive purchasers, to the injury of a third party, an action will lie. In Bell v. Locke, 8 Paige, 75, Chancellor Walworth held a fraudulent use of the mark was a ground for relief. Day & Martin, manufacturers of blacking, complained of Binning, who also manufactured blacking, and sold it in bottles similar to theirs, and labelled with this difference only: Day & Martin described their blacking as "manufactured" by Day & Martin, whilst Binning described his as "equal to Day & Martin's." The words "equal to" were printed in very small type. In that case an injunction was granted, on the ground that the label of the defendant would deceive the purchaser. It has been stated by Judge Story, that where one of our own citizens fraudulently uses the mark of a foreigner, to recommend an article of domestic manufacture, he is liable to an action. In this respect there is no difference between a citizen and an alien. In an action at law, Blofield v. Payne, 4 Barn. & Adol. 410, the declaration stated that plaintiff, being the inventor and manufacturer of metallic hones, used certain envelopes for the same, denoting them to be his, and that defendant wrongfully made other hones, wrapped them in envelopes resembling the plaintiff's, and sold them as his own, whereby the plaintiff was prevented from selling many of his hones, and they were depreciated in value and reputation, those of the defendant being inferior. And the court held that the plaintiff was entitled to some damages for the invasion of his right by the fraud of the defendants, though he did not prove that their hones were inferior, or that he had sustained any specific damage. Where a right is invaded by a fraudulent act, though no specific injury be proved, some damages, at law, must be given. In the case above cited, on a motion for a new trial, Judge Patterson said, "it is clear the verdict ought to stand." A publisher of a magazine or newspaper, can not assume the name of one previously published, or represent the new publication as a continuation of the former, when it is not so. Hogg v. Kirby, 8 Ves. 215.

[2][From Cox, Am. Trade-Mark Cas. 82.]

In the case under consideration, in his label, the plaintiff calls his medicine the "Chinese Liniment;" the defendant calls his the "Ohio Liniment;" but from the body of the label, and of the directions for the use of the medicine, it is clear that the language of the defendant is so assimilated to that of the plaintiff, as to appear to be the same medicine, the alterations being only colorable. There would seem to be no doubt that the intention of Loree, who prepared the liniment sold by the defendant, as his agent, was to avail himself of the favorable reputation acquired by the "Chinese Liniment," in the sale of his; and by most persons it would be received as the same medicine. From the hand-bill published by Loree, the medicine sold by him is asserted to contain the qualities or ingredients of the "Chinese Liniment," and some other ingredient which renders it more efficacious. In his bill the plaintiff avers that this allegation is false; and especially in saying that the "Ohio Liniment" contains the ingredients of which the "Chinese Liniment" is composed. The case is considered as coming within the principles above cited, and an injunction is granted to enjoin the defendant from using the label or directions accompanying the liniment he sells, as aforesaid, or other labels or directions, or any advertisements or hand-bills respecting the same words and sentences which are used by the complainant in his label and directions, and which tend to produce an impression on the purchaser and the public that the liniment sold by the defendant contains the same ingredients as the "Chinese Liniment," and is, in effect, the same medicine. On the filing of the answer, a motion will be heard to dissolve the injunction.

[NOTE. On the final hearing the court apparently refused to grant an injunction. See the denial of an application for rehearing, Case No. 2,947.]

Case No. 2,947.

COFFEEN v. BRUNTON.

[5 McLean, 256; Cox, Am. Trade-Mark Cas. 132; Cox, Manual Trade-Mark Cas. 60.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Indiana. May Term, 1851.

INFRINGEMENT OF TRADE-MARK—INJUNCTION.

1. A party is not entitled to an injunction to protect him against another person who has assumed the same label, as to a medicine or drug claimed to have been invented by the complainant, unless his right is clear.

2. If they were concerned in getting up the medicine, both contributing to the compound as a partnership action, neither can claim the exclusive right.

3. In such a case the court will leave the parties to their legal remedies.

4. Injunction should only be granted where the right is clear, and where, from its nature, a remedy at law would be inadequate.

[Bill to enjoin infringement of a trade-mark. Complainant obtained a preliminary injunction (Case No. 2,946), which was apparently subsequently dissolved, and a motion is now made for a rehearing.]

Smith & Yandes, for complainant.

Mr. Test, for defendant.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This bill was brought by the complainant to enjoin the defendant from using a label, or any other representation which would mislead the public in purchasing his liniment, for that which is manufactured and sold by the complainant. The charge in the bill is, that the label of the defendant is so assimilated to the plaintiff's as to lead to this imposition by which the defendant is greatly benefited, and the plaintiff injured. That the complainant, at great expense, has established his business, and that his medicine, called the "Chinese Liniment," is in great demand as an efficacious remedy in many cases of disease and injuries; and that the defendant is enabled to sell his liniment by assuming the false fact, that it is the same as the plaintiff's.

The defendant, in his defense, sets up, that John Loree, of whom he purchased, is the inventor of the "Chinese Liniment," having furnished the complainant with a recipe for making the same, except two ingredients which were added on their mutual consultation. That the complainant agreed to take the said Loree as a partner into the business, so soon as he could advance capital; until which time he was constituted the general agent of the complainant to sell the medicine, and was so designated in his handbills. But when he had procured the necessary capital, the complainant refused to take him as a partner. That Loree then made his liniment, called the "Ohio Liniment," which contains the same ingredients of which the complainant's liniment is composed, with the addition of two or three others, which make it more valuable.

[1] [Reported by Hon. John McLean, Circuit Justice. Cox, Manual Trade-Mark Cas. 60, contains only a partial report.]

A great number of depositions were taken on both sides, which show, on the part of the complainant, that in the early part of the year 1846 he went to Cincinnati, and remained there several weeks, to make what he called the "Chinese Liniment." He selected several of the ingredients from the store of Mr. Burdsell, a very respectable druggist, and concocted the liniment, and gave it the name of the "Chinese Liniment," procured vials, had labels and handbills printed, and thus prepared the article for sale. Neither Mr. Burdsell nor any other witness has stated of what ingredients this liniment is composed. The witnesses state they do not know of what the compound is made, but all of them agree in saying that it is a valuable medicine; and they give the same character to the liniment of the defendant.

The following letter, written by the complainant, is relied on, as sustaining the answer: "Blue Ball, Aug. 9th, 1845. Dr. John:—We had expected to have heard from you before this time. I got home in two weeks after I left your house. I made myself some acquainted with the prospect of selling the liniment we have been talking of. It appears to me the prospect is first rate, if the thing is properly managed. I divided the little I took with me among more than a dozen persons, who say they look with great anxiety for the thing to come out. If I had the receipt, I would take pains to ascertain what would be the cost of preparing it in quantity. Mr. Freeman says he would like, when he goes east, to bring any stock that we may want, which would make it come cheaper than to procure the stock in this country. I feel fully confident that a nice business may be done. The country is as ripe now as ever it was for a thing that is new. If you will send me the receipt, I will go to Cincinnati and ascertain, as near as I can, what will be the whole cost, including the necessary handbills, to accompany the articles; and also the expense of the vials; they ought to be done up in the neatest manner. It seems to me that they would look well of a square form, about four inches long, and holding three oz. By going to the glass factory any form can be obtained. When you send the receipt write out the names of the articles very plain, so as to avoid any mistake; as the whole list will not be shown to any apothecary. I think we ought to have always a supply of the article on hand. I have no doubt if I had a supply when I went to Kentucky, I could have sold twenty or thirty dollars worth." This letter was dated in August, 1845, and it appears, from the evidence, that the recipe was forwarded to the complainant by one of his daughters, in August, 1845, some months before he went to Cincinnati to prepare the medicine. And in regard to a small amount of the medicine referred to in the above letter, it is in proof that in June, 1845, Loree brought to the house of the complainant, a jug full, as he said, of the ingredients of which the liniment was made; and the daughter of the complainant assisted him in making the liniment. A part of this, probably, was taken by him to Kentucky. On the 28th of February, 1846, the complainant writes to the defendant from Cincinnati, that "every thing seems to be going as favorably as we can desire. There is one universal burst of praise in favor of the liniment," &c. "I have as favorable and flattering expressions from gentlemen of the highest respectability as I could desire, and shall append them to the bills I am now getting printed, of which I will send you some as soon as they are done," &c. "Our great object must be to move the thing, and give it notoriety. One hundred thousand bottles, I have no doubt, could be sold in the United States, if they were only in the market, in a year."

From these letters and other evidence in the case, it satisfactorily appears, that the defendant was engaged with the complainant in making this medicine. The recipe spoken of by Loree, obtained from a Doctor Diffendaffer, with whom it is alleged he studied medicine, named many of the materials out of which, in all probability, the compound was made. Two or three other ingredients, the defendant admits, were added to those named in the recipe; and, it is probable, though there is no positive evidence on the subject, that the complainant, at Cincinnati, when compounding the ingredients, may have added some others, and that this is the ground on which he declares the defendant is ignorant of the ingredients which compose the "Chinese Liniment." However this may be, I cannot doubt that the defendant was at first actually concerned in getting up and bringing out the medicine, and that a partnership between the parties was contemplated. Some time after the defendant had commenced his general agency in selling the medicine, the parties quarrelled, and afterwards had a compromise, in which, from some of the witnesses, the defendant seems to have relinquished his interest. But that compromise does not appear to have been carried out, and the defendant asserted his right, and prepared the "Ohio Liniment," and through his agents, handbills, &c., distributed it through the country. These facts are referred to, to show that in a case like the present, where rights are contested between the parties, chancery will not interfere and enjoin a party from using labels, or marks, to recommend his article, though it may, to some extent, be substituted for that of the plaintiff's. The matter, of right, must first be determined by an action at law or otherwise, and this is not the object of the present bill. Both medicines are highly recommended by those who have used them, and several of the witnesses think they are composed of the same ingredients. If the "Ohio Liniment" is the same as that of the plaintiff's, he having no exclusive right to it, is not injured by the representations of the defendant.

To entitle a complainant to protection against a false representation, it is not essential that the article should be inferior in quality, or that the individual should fraudulently represent it, so as to impose upon the public; but, if by representation, it be so assimilated, as to be taken in the market for an established manufacture, or compound of another, the injured person is entitled to an injunction. The injury is not the less, though the false representations be made without a knowledge of such interference. False marks or brands are generally fraudulently assumed. As where, in the manufacture of cotton cloth, a mark is assumed intentionally, of a manufacturer whose products stand high in the market, it will be considered as fraudulent. No one can interfere with another's business, injuriously, for his own benefit, with impunity. This is an important commercial principle, of extensive application. And, as in such cases, the damages cannot be ascertained at law, relief will be given by injunction. But where, as in the present instance, there is a controversy between the parties, whether both were not concerned in the establishment of the business, it is not a case for an injunction. The bill is not framed with the view of adjusting such a controversy. The right of the plaintiff who claims protection in this form, must be clear. If it be controverted, chancery will leave the parties to their remedy at law; or at least, to such a proceeding as shall present the whole merits of the controversy, and enable the court to decide it. I concur in the opinion of my brother judge, that the application for a rehearing must be overruled.

COFFIN (GODDARD v.). See Case No. 5,490.

Case No. 2,948.

COFFIN v. JENKINS.

[3 Story, 108.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. May Term, 1844.

WHALING VOYAGE — FORFEITURE OF LAY BY DESERTION—ADMIRALTY—PRACTICE — PLEADING — VERIFICATION—NEW MATTER ON APPEAL.

1. A lay or share in the proceeds or catchings of a whaling voyage does not create a partnership in the profits of the voyage, but is in the nature of seamen's wages, and governed by the same rules.

[Cited in Joy v. Allen, Case No. 7,552; Macy v. De Wolf, Id. 8,933.]

2. By the general maritime law, desertion is an unauthorized absence from the ship, with an intention not to return, and it creates a forfeiture of wages.

3. The statute of the United States [Act 1790; 1 Stat. 133] declaring any unauthorized absence of a seaman from his ship for forty-eight hours to be desertion, applies to all cases, where the seaman does not return within such time, although he may have been prevented by the sailing of the ship. For the ship is not bound to wait for him, but he is bound to rejoin the ship within that period, suo periculo.

[Cited in The John Martin, Case No. 7,357; Welcome v. The Yosemite, 18 Fed. 384.]

4. In the present case, it was held, that the circumstances showed, that the desertion by the plaintiff was the result of a previous and deliberate intention to desert; and at all events, an opportunity having been offered to him to rejoin his ship within the forty-eight hours, that his refusal to do so constituted a desertion, and he had thereby forfeited his wages.

5. The only cases where desertion does not carry with it a forfeiture of wages, are cases having mitigating circumstances, where the party deserting has a strong excuse, founded on gross misconduct or harsh usage towards him; or where, having a locus poenitentiae, he has acknowledged his fault, and offered to return to his duty within a reasonable time, and his services have been rejected; or cases of a similar nature.

[Explained in Swain v. Holland, Case No. 13,661.]

6. The doctrine in case of Cloutman v. Tunison [Case No. 2,907], affirmed.

7. In cases of appeal from the district court, this court is very cautious in admitting new matters of defence or allegation to be introduced, where the facts, on which they rest, are not new or newly discovered, but were perfectly known at or before the hearing in the district court.

[Cited in The Mabey, 10 Wall. (77 U. S.) 420; The Saunders, 23 Fed. 304; The Venezuela, 3 C. C. A. 319, 52 Fed. 875; Re Hawkins, 147 U. S. 486, 13 Sup. Ct. 521.]

8. The answer to a libel should be sworn to by the respondent, but the libellant is not bound to swear to the libel.

[Cited in The J. R. Hoyle, Case No. 7,557.]

9. A special replication by the libellant under oath is not admissible, unless it be demanded by the respondents, or ordered by the court, and then it is in the nature of a cross-bill or reconventio of the civil law.

[Cited in The Atlantic, Case No. 620.]

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of Massachusetts.]

Libel in the admiralty for the lay or share of the libellant, the second mate of the whaling ship Columbus, against the respondent [Peter Coffin], the master of the ship. The libel in substance stated, that in June, 1835, the libellant, John Jenkins, shipped on board the ship Columbus, of Nantucket, of which the respondent was master, on a whaling voyage from Nantucket to the Pacific ocean, as second mate, for a certain lay or share of the said voyage and of the oil which might be obtained; that he signed the shipping articles, and went aboard the said ship on the 10th day of the said June, and entered into the service of the same as second mate. That the ship proceeded forthwith, with the libellant on board, to the Pacific ocean, and obtained 41,948 gallons of sperm oil; that he continued on board, and in the service of the said ship until about the 10th day of June, 1838, when, without reasonable or sufficient cause, and without fault or neglect on his part; and while he was engaged in the performance of his duty, under the orders of the master, in looking after certain seamen, who had deserted from the said ship, he was abandoned and left at Talcahuana, on the coast of Chili, by the said respondent, and was prevented from rejoining the ship, as she never returned to the port. That the said Coffin, well knowing, that the libellant was engaged in the performance of his duty, after wilfully abandoning the libellant as aforesaid, cruised about for the space of two months for more oil, and then returned to the said Nantucket, where he arrived on the 30th day of November, 1838. That during all the time the libellant was on board, he well and truly performed his duty as second mate, according to his best ability, and was obedient to all the lawful commands of the said master, and is entitled to his lay, amounting to $512.33, with interest. The libellant then prays, that the aforesaid wages be decreed to him.

[1] [Reported by William W. Story, Esq.]

The answer admitted, that the libellant was hired, and that the ship proceeded to sea and put in to Talcahuana, as set forth in the libel, at which place it alleges, that the said libellant wilfully and without cause, or pretence for cause, deserted from the said ship. It then proceeds to aver, that the libellant did not well and faithfully perform his duty on board the said ship, but often neglected it, and slept upon his watch, and permitted the men to sleep, to the injury of the vessel and the voyage. That the said Jenkins was ashore with the respondent on or about the 15th of June, 1838, the latter being in quest of seamen, to supply the places of four seamen, who had deserted, and that, having shipped four men, he ordered the libellant to return to the ship, and direct the mate to heave in the slack of the chain, and be ready to take in the anchor as soon as he, the respondent, should return to the ship with the four men, and then to return to the shore in the boat, and to wait by it until the respondent should arrive with the four men. That the said libellant returned to the ship, and gave the said orders, and returned with the boat and two or three hands to the shore. That when he was on board, in pursuance of the said order, he procured from his chest his best clothing, which he tied up in a bundle, and took with him in the boat, without the knowledge of the mate. That when he reached the shore, instead of remaining with the boat, he took the said bundle of clothing, and went up to the town of Talcahuana, and that the said respondent did not again see him during the voyage. That when the said master arrived with the four men to the boat, not finding the said Jenkins, and learning where he had gone, he sent the hands in search of him, but that they could not find him, and that then the respondent returned to the ship with the men, and found it ready to sail. That the ship was to have sailed, as Jenkins well knew, as soon as the said master returned, and would have sailed forthwith, but for the absence of the said Jenkins. That when the respondent arrived aboard the ship, he returned to search for Jenkins, directing the mate to get under weigh and proceed to the entrance of the harbor, if the master did not return at night. That the said master then proceeded to the town, and in company with Benjamin F. Coffin and a person by the name of Bates, whom he employed, searched through the town for Jenkins, but without success. That they then proceeded to the office of Paul Delano, American consul at that port, and asked his advice, and that he advised him to proceed to sea. That the master then returned to the ship, and anchored at the entrance of the harbor in full sight of the town, and remained there till the next morning, for the space of thirty hours, in order that Jenkins might return, if he chose, and then commenced beating out of the harbor with a head wind. That he verily believes, that the said Jenkins did not mean to return, but intended to desert, and denies that the said Jenkins was left without sufficient cause. That after the said Jenkins deserted, the ship proceeded on her voyage, and arrived at Nantucket about the middle of November, 1838; that the said Jenkins remained at Talcahuana until September last past, when he might well have returned before, and that the said respondent verily believes, that the said Jenkins deserted with the intention of remaining and residing at that place. That after the return of the said Jenkins, the said respondent believes, that the said Jenkins transferred all interest in the voyage to George B. Elkins. To this answer, which was not sworn to, a special replication was made by the libellant.

The decree of the district judge at the hearing of the cause was for the libellant, that he recover the sum of $500 and costs of suit; from which decree the present appeal to this court was taken. The cause was now heard upon the original evidence, and also upon new evidence, and was argued by—

Charles P. Curtis, for appellant.
Crowninshield & Choate, for appellee.

STORY, Circuit Justice. This cause has been argued at great length; but after all, it turns upon a single inquiry, and that is, whether there has been a desertion on the part of the libellant, during the whaling voyage, by which he has, according to the principles of the maritime law, forfeited his right to his lay or share in the proceeds and catchings of the voyage. This lay or share does not, according to law, create any partnership in the profits of the voyage, as has been sometimes erroneously supposed; but it is in the nature of wages for seamen in the common merchants service, and is governed by the same rules. This opinion was adopted by Lord Alvanley in Wilkinson v. Frasier, 4 Esp. 182; and more recently in the court of exchequer, in Perrott v. Bryant, 2 Younge & C. Exch. 61; in Mair v. Glennie, 4 Maule & S. 240; by the court of king's bench, and by the supreme court of Massachusetts in Boston, in Baxter v. Rodman, 3 Pick. 435, in Rice v. Austin, 17 Mass. 197, 203, 206, and in Grozier v. Atwood, 4 Pick. 234. The same doctrine was held by Lord Stowell in The Frederick, 5 C. Rob. Adm. 8. Indeed, I consider it too well settled now to admit of any reasonable doubt. See Story, Partn. § 42.

In respect to desertion, there is no doubt, that it constitutes, by the general maritime law, a forfeiture of all title to wages, and to rights in the proceeds in the nature of wages. And by desertion, in the sense of the maritime law, is meant, not a mere unauthorized absence from the ship without leave; but an unauthorized leaving or absence from the ship, with an intention not to return to her service, or, as it is often expressed, animo non revertendi, that is, with an intention to desert. The statute of the United States, for the regulation of seamen in the merchants service—Act 1790, c. 56, § 5 [1 Story's Laws, 104; 1 Stat. 133, c. 29]—has created an auxiliary statute desertion, distinct from and independent of that of the maritime law, and it declares, that forty-eight hours' absence from the ship without leave, if a proper entry thereof is at the time made in the log book, shall be deemed a desertion and a forfeiture of all wages due to the party. This subject was fully discussed and considered in the case of Cloutman v. Tunison [Case No. 2,907], and to the doctrine there stated I adhere with unhesitating confidence. But I advert to it in this connexion simply to answer an argument, suggested at the bar, that, under this statute, if a seaman should, without leave, voluntarily absent himself from the ship at the time, when she is about to sail from the port on the voyage, nay, when she is about to weigh anchor, for the very purpose, and she should actually sail on the voyage before the forty-eight hours had elapsed, it would not, in the sense of the law, amount to a statute desertion; because he would not have the opportunity of rejoining the ship within the forty-eight hours. In short, the argument went to this, that it was not a desertion at all, either by the maritime law or under the statute, unless, at the time of the seaman's leaving, he left it with the intent absolutely to desert, or animo non revertendi. To this doctrine I cannot, in any manner subscribe. I understand the statute to declare, that an absence from on board the ship without leave is a forfeiture of his wages, and a desertion, unless he actually rejoins the ship within forty-eight hours; and that it is at his own peril, under such circumstances, to absent himself; and if he is unable to rejoin the ship, whether by reason of her sailing on the voyage or otherwise, within the forty-eight hours, the forfeiture is complete and absolute. The ship is not bound to wait for him; but he is bound to rejoin the ship within that period, suo periculo. But I should go farther and say, that if, upon the eve of the departure of the ship from the port on the voyage, a seaman should, with a full knowledge of the fact of her intended departure, voluntarily or secretly without leave quit the ship, that would of itself be strong prima facie evidence of a positive intention to desert, and it would require the fullest and clearest evidence of bona fides, and sincerity of intention, to displace the presumption.

Now, in the present case, it appears to me, that there are very strong circumstances, which go to establish a meditated intention to desert, and an effectual execution of that intention. I agree, that it is not to be presumed, that an officer of a ship does intend an act of such gross disobedience and departure from duty, which must weaken public confidence in his character, and take from him, in many cases, the means of future support. I agree further, that, in the present case, there was apparently a large lay or share due to the libellant, and that a very strong motive to desert seems to be taken away. I say apparently a large lay or share due to him, for, there is no direct evidence to show, satisfactorily to my mind, what his real interest therein was at the time when he left the ship. It is true, that no assignment was, in fact, made of his lay or share, until after his return home, two years or more after the supposed desertion. But then, of the facts and circumstances attending that assignment, the consideration actually given for it, and the occasion of making it, we have no strict or searching account. I should have been glad to know, whether the assignee was the agent of the libellant during his absence, and had made advances to his family during his absence upon the whaling voyage, and was entitled to reimbursement therefor out of the lay or share, and that the assignment was made on that account to him; or whether he made a bona fide purchase thereof at the time of the assignment, and what value, if any, he paid or was to pay therefor. There are circumstances in this case which imperatively require some explanations on this head. In the first place, the assignment was made at a time, when the owners had refused to pay the lay or share. There was not merely a controversy, but a defence founded upon the supposed desertion, intended to meet the lis mota, if a suit should be brought. Men do not ordinarily, under such circumstances, buy up law suits at a fair or reasonable price, but as a matter of desperate, even if it be lawful, speculation.

In the next place, certain declarations are asserted to have been made by the libellant, which point to his interest in the lay or share. Benjamin F. Coffin says, "While we were at Talcahuana, in the afternoon of the day before Mr. Jenkins left the ship, he told me, that if Captain Coffin would not discharge him, he should run away. He said, that it was of no use for him to go home; that he should have nothing to receive if he went home." Now Coffin's testimony has been assailed, with intense zeal and strength of expression, as false, and deliberately false. If it stood alone, it might perhaps not be sufficient to found a safe judgment upon it. But if the intention to desert is, as I think it clearly is, made out upon other independent evidence of acts and declarations, it certainly furnishes no reason to suspect, that Coffin has not here uttered the truth. Certainly, if the statement imputed to the libellant was false in point of fact, "That it was of no use for him to go home, that he should have nothing to receive if he went home;" he could have shown that by proofs of substantial, subsisting interest, before or at the time of the assignment. Yet he has left this part of the case a blank, although it was peculiarly within his privity and knowledge how the matter really stood. But passing from this, let us proceed to other important considerations in the case. In the first place, it is admitted, that the libellant, in consequence of some part, which the respondent took in some difference between the libellant and Swain, (the third mate of the ship), favorable to the latter, was discontented and dissatisfied with the respondent, and requested repeatedly to be discharged. The respondent refused, and advised the libellant to go home in the ship. In the next place, the libellant, on the morning of the sailing of the ship, went on shore with the respondent, and returned by his orders to the ship, with directions to the chief mate to heave short the anchor, or to get the ship under weigh. The ship was hove short and did get under weigh. The libellant returned to the shore, having put on a pair of new duck trousers over his others then on, and took also a bundle of clothing with him tied up in a handkerchief. He left on board a quadrant; and some few other things, which were, however, but of trifling value. When he left the ship, he bade Swain, (the third mate), "Good-bye," a circumstance, not of itself, ordinarily, of much significance, and yet not wholly without effect, under circumstances like those in the present case, especially considering, that there had been some difficulty between Swain and the libellant.

The question here naturally meets us, what did the libellant go ashore for, and why did he carry a bundle of clothing? His excuse or justification is, that he had sold the clothes to a person on shore, and that he was absent from the boat, hunting for deserters from the ship. Neither of these suggestions is, in my judgment, satisfactorily or probably made out. It was of little use, without the knowledge or consent of the master, who had hired other men in lieu of the deserters, who were then either on board or going on board, to search for deserters, when the anchor was a-trip for the voyage, or the ship under weigh. That was a time for speed and watchfulness, and not for fruitless searches. As little is there in the other suggestion. If the libellant was to go the voyage, he would or might want these clothes in the course of the return voyage, and if he had really sold them, he would seem to have left himself with scarcely a decent supply. Putting on the new duck trousers over those he then had on, could not be for sale, and scarcely for immediate use, if he was then about to go to sea. But if he intended to desert, both the clothes and the trousers might be important. I do not dwell on these facts, because, although they inflame every suspicion, they do not constitute the ground, upon which my judgment rests. Let us look to the subsequent acts and declarations of the libellant after he was on shore, and the ship was gone. He then said in the presence of Orpin, who belonged to another ship, in a billiard house, "That he did not intend to go out in the ship which he came in." This would almost seem decisive of his intention to desert, if he could not obtain his discharge. But turn to the other facts. The ship went below about eight or nine miles distance, and there came to anchor, and did not sail until the next day. Did the libellant make even the slightest effort to get on board the ship, although it is most clearly in proof, that boats could have been obtained, and were going down to the island where the ship lay? The answer, which is admitted on all sides, is, that he made no such effort. Nay, the masters of two other ships offered in their own boats to send him to the ship. But he declined. We have the testimony of one of these masters, and it is admitted to be above all exception; and he (Capt. Hussey), states a motive for the desertion, which cannot be misunderstood or winked out of sight. Capt. Hussey deposes to a conversation, which he had with the libellant a few days after the Columbus sailed. It occurred at the boarding house of a Mr. Bates. He says; "I said to Mr. Jenkins, I suppose you left Capt. Coffin with an expectation of joining my ship. (I was in want of a second mate.) Mr. Jenkins said, that he did. I told him, that I did not feel at liberty to ship him, because Capt. Coffin might think I enticed him to leave the Columbus." In addition to this, Capt. Hussey states, that while the Columbus was going down the harbor, not three miles off, and could have been easily reached by a boat, he, being in company with Capt. Shearman, of the ship Orozimbo, offered to send the libellant on board. His language is, "Both Capt. Shearman and myself advised Mr. Jenkins to go on board of the Columbus. We said that we did not think he was doing right to leave Capt. Coffin, and that we would man a boat, taking some of Capt. Shearman's men, and the rest of mine, and would put him on board of the Columbus, if he would go. He said he thought he could do as well there on shore, and declined our offer."

Now, what was the duty of the libellant upon this occasion, and under these circumstances? It clearly was, to seek to rejoin the ship, if he did not mean to desert. It was a duty, which he owed not merely to the respondent, but to the owners. His services might be most important and valuable to both, under certain exigencies, on the voyage home. He chose to remain behind. What pretence then can there, in reality, be for him now to say, that he did not mean to desert, when, in fact, he chose not to rejoin the ship? In truth, it is most manifest, that he left the ship and not the ship him. He chose to be a voluntary absentee, and even if, at first, he meant to return, or doubted whether or not he could return, his subsequent refusal to go on board pronounces it, ab initio, a desertion. We are to judge of men by their acts as well as their words; and if the libellant had, as he now suggests he had, no intention to desert, because he had an interest in the proceeds of the voyage, how happens it, that he did not rejoin the ship and take care of that interest? How happens it that he remained abroad afterwards for two years? He has no right now to say, I went from the ship, hoping and expecting to be left behind; and I was, by my own fault and with my own consent, left behind, contrary to my duty; and I meant to avail myself of this fault and dereliction of duty to escape the forfeiture, which is attached to desertion; and my acts are now to be construed as if I did not finally intend to desert, but simply never to rejoin the ship. I trust that the law is strong enough to inform him, that what a man does, at least where the act is voluntary, is presumed to be purely what he intended to do, ab initio. The maxim, "finis coronat opus," although not precisely intended to meet such a case, does not fail to illustrate it. It is, at best, absence consummated by desertion. But it is said, that if this is a case of desertion, it is one, in which the court is not bound to inflict a total forfeiture; but may mitigate it to a remunerative or moderated compensation. There are, without question, cases, where desertion will not be visited by a total forfeiture of wages, or quasi wages. But what are the cases to which the mitigation of compensation is applied? They are those, in which the party has a strong excuse, founded on gross misconduct or harsh usage on the other side; and where the party is, therefore, more in the situation of a victim than of a sinner; or where, having a locus poenitentiae, he has acknowledged his fault, and offered to return to duty within a reasonable time, and his services have been improperly rejected. It is to such cases, and cases of a similar nature, that the rule of compensation or mitigation is, in the benignity of the maritime law, fairly and justly and upon principles of public policy, applied. Here, there is a total absence of all exculpatory and alleviating circumstances. The opportunity for repentance or return was given, and was not embraced; but was deliberately and obstinately refused. Under such circumstances, it appears to me, that this court would ill perform its duty, if it did not pronounce for a total forfeiture. It is not the case of an ignorant seaman; but of an officer of the ship. My judgment accordingly is, that the decree of the district court ought to be reversed, and that the libel be dismissed with costs for the appellee, the original respondent.

Mem.—In the course of the present cause, the respondent asked leave to file an amendment to his answer, insisting upon a new point of defence in the circuit court, which had not been presented in the district court. It was, in effect, that no suit in a case of this sort, being in the whale fisheries, lay against the master; but only against the owners or other agents in possession of the proceeds of the voyage. The motion was opposed by the counsel for the libellant.

STORY, Circuit Justice. I do not think that, under the circumstances, the amendment ought to be allowed. The matter of defence must have been well known when the cause was in the court below, and ought then, if ever, to have been insisted on, as, if well founded, it disposed of the whole suit. This court ought, in all cases, to be very cautious in admitting any new matters, either of allegation or of defence, to be introduced here, where the facts, on which they rest, are not new or newly discovered; but were perfectly known at or before the hearing in the district court. We should otherwise constantly have appeals here entertained upon matters never brought to the notice of the district court, and might virtually exercise an entirely original jurisdiction instead of an appellate jurisdiction. The rule, "in appellatio a sententia de finitiva licet non allegata allegare et non probata probare," has many limitations, and requires many. See Combe, Pr. Adm. tits. 54, 60; 1 Browne, Civ. & Adm. Law, 499, 500; 2 Browne, Civ. & Adm. Law, 415, 416, 457. I observe, too, that there are some irregularities in the present case. The libel is sworn to, but not the answer. The reverse is the usual and proper practice, although there is no objection to the libel being sworn to, if the libellant chooses. But the answer should be sworn to, and indeed, I do not remember to have seen an answer before, which was not sworn to. Then, again, the libellant has put in and sworn to a special replication, without being called upon by the respondent to answer the allegations in the answer. This is irregular; according to the modern and correct practice, no special replication is admissible, unless the respondent requires the libellant to give an answer on oath to the matters propounded in his own answer, and then it is in the nature of a cross bill, or reconventio of the civil law. Story, Eq. Pl. § 402. It is, therefore, the privilege of the respondent to require such a reply, but not a right of the libellant to put it in, without its being demanded by the respondent, or specially ordered by the court. Motion to amend denied.

Case No. 2,949.

COFFIN et al. v. The JOHN SHAW.

[1 Cliff. 230.][1]

Circuit Court, D. New Hampshire. May Term, 1859.

BAR TO SALVAGE CLAIM—COMPENSATION.

1. The failure of libellants to refer their claim for salvage, as agreed, was held, under the circumstances of this case, to be no bar to the suit, and could only be taken into the account as evidence to reduce the amount which libellants were entitled to recover.

2. Nothing short of a contract to pay a given sum for the service to be rendered, or a binding engagement to pay at all events, whether successful or unsuccessful in the enterprise, will operate as a bar to a meritorious salvage claim.

[Cited in The Camanche, 8 Wall. (75 U. S.) 478; The Louisa Jane, Case No. 8,532.]

3. Obiter. A proposition by salvors that, in case they were unsuccessful in raising the vessel, they should have the privilege of stripping her, being made in advance of any effort by them to save the vessel, was highly objectionable, and must be regarded as detracting very materially from the merit of their service.

4. That the risk was slight, and the duration of the salvage service comparatively brief, affect the value of the same, and the amount to be allowed, but cannot be a bar to the claim.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of New Hampshire.]

This was an appeal in admiralty. The libel set forth that the schooner John Shaw, laden with hard-pine timber, and of the burden of about one hundred and sixty tons, was wrecked on the 12th of August, 1858, and in peril of being entirely lost on the high seas, west of Nantucket, near Nantasket; that the master and crew requested the libellants [George B. Coffin and others] to assist in saving the vessel and her cargo; that, at the risk of their lives, they commenced their efforts to save the vessel, and for forty-eight hours, during the most of which time a violent gale was blowing, and the sea running high, they continued their exertions, and finally succeeded in bringing the schooner and most of her cargo safely into the harbor of Edgartown, in the district of Massachusetts. It was further alleged, that without the aid of the libellants the schooner and her cargo would not have been saved, as she was in a dangerous position, with no anchors out, and her master and crew were throwing overboard the cargo for the purpose of lightening the vessel. The claimants of the schooner and cargo both filed answers to the libel. These answers were in substance the same. That the schooner was wrecked, or in danger of being lost, or was unmanageable, or that her master requested the assistance of the libellants, were denied in both answers. It was further set up in the answers, that the schooner was not near any reefs or breakers; that the water was of sufficient depth between the shoal on which she was aground and the land to float the vessel; that no signals of distress were set; and that the schooner was not considered by her master in peril of being lost. The answers allege that the libellants assisted in anchoring the schooner and getting her off under a contract, and that the libellants volunteered their services, which were in the first instance declined by the master, but were afterwards received upon condition that their compensation should be estimated by two referees, one to be chosen by the master of the schooner, and the other by the libellants. All the allegations of the libel concerning the violence of the wind and the condition of the sea were also denied, and it was alleged that the crew of the schooner shared in the labor and service performed by the libellants. The loss of twenty-three thousand feet of lumber, with which the schooner was loaded, was set forth; denial of any salvage service by the libellants was made, and the willingness of the respondents to account with the libellants, and pay them such sum as might be due, subject to any claim of respondents for the loss of lumber by the act or default of libellants, was averred in the answers. In the district court a decree was entered for the libellants in the sum of ninety dollars, to be equally divided among them, and for a further sum of twenty dollars to one of said libellants for the loss of his boat, without costs.

Horace Webster, for libellants.
W. H. Y. Hackett, for claimants.

CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice. According to the testimony, the schooner sailed from Savannah, in the state of Georgia, bound on a voyage to Portsmouth, in the state of New Hampshire. She was a vessel of about one hundred and fifty-six tons' burden, with a company of five men, consisting of the master and mate, two foremast hands, a cook, and steward. They had on board a cargo of hard-pine timber, measuring about one hundred thousand feet. It filled the hold of the vessel, and there was about thirty-five thousand feet on the deck. On the 11th of August, 1858, about ten o'clock at night, the schooner ran on to a sand shoal between Maskeget and Tuckernuck islands, and stuck fast at a point where the water at low tide is about six feet deep. After the vessel struck, she swung round stem off, heading south-southwest. Her master then trimmed her sails accordingly, and she remained in that position until the following morning. In the mean time he began to get off part of her deck load, supposing that he was on a reef at the new south shoal, and thinking that, by lightening the vessel, she might pass over the shoal as the tide rose. He threw over three sticks of hewn timber of about a thousand feet each, cutting one in two pieces because it was so long that he could not otherwise get it over the rail. Two or three smaller sticks were also thrown over during the night; but finding that the vessel lay without thumping, he ordered the crew to stop heaving the timber over till daylight, when he could see what was the position of the vessel. Seven large sticks of hewn timber still remained on board, and in the morning the master renewed the direction to the crew to commence heaving it over. Shortly after this order was given, and while the crew were employed in carrying it into effect, one of the libellants came to the schooner in a boat, and inquired of the master whether he wanted assistance, and the master told him he wanted a pilot. At the time the schooner ran on to the shoal the master says he was steering north by west, as ascertained by the compass. He had determined the longitude, however, by the chronometer, which made him forty miles farther east than he really was, and it does not appear that his mistake was in any manner corrected until he was visited by the libellants. The master inquired of the libellant, when he first went on board, whether he was acquainted with these shoals, and whether he could pilot the vessel out. Both of these questions were answered in the affirmative, and the libellant expressed the opinion that by lightening the vessel she might be got off during that tide. They then went to work heaving over the timber from the deck, and continued to do so until the tide began to slacken. When the tide slackened, they ran out the kedge anchor about one hundred and twenty fathoms, and the master also let the larboard anchor drop. During the time they were so engaged the other seven libellants arrived in a boat from Tuckernuck, and went on board. After some conversation, the libellant first named informd the master that they wanted fifteen hundred dollars in case they should assist in getting off the schooner, which the master declined to give. On hearing that remark of the master, five of the libellants left the schooner, and went and picked up several other sticks of the floating timber. They were absent about three quarters of an hour. Some further conversation ensued, during their absence, between the master and those who remained, which was renewed and continued after their return. As the result of these several conversations, it was arranged between the parties, as the master says, that the libellants should assist in getting off the schooner, and that they would leave the matter to two disinterested men, one to be chosen by each party, to settle the amount of the compensation, and with that understanding they went to work. Three of the libellants were examined upon this point. One of them testifies that the master, when asked the second time if he wanted assistance, answered in the affirmative, and that the arrangement was, if they got her off, and could not agree upon the amount of compensation, that they were to leave it out, and in case they failed, they were to have the privilege of stripping the vessel. Another says that the master, after the five men returned, desired them to proceed and get the vessel off, remarking, at the same time, that if they could not agree upon the price, they would leave it out. George B. Coffin testifies that the master requested them to take the vessel and proceed, and that they thought he could get her off, and that one of the libellants remarked that if they did not succeed they were to have the privilege of stripping her, and on these terms they proceeded in the undertaking. One of the seamen on board the schooner was also examined on this point by the respondents. He testifies that the master declined the offer first made by the libellants; but he admits that he afterwards heard him assent that they might go to work while he and one of their number went aft to converse about the terms. All the testimony shows that the master accepted the services of the libellants, and that no definite sum was agreed on as the measure of compensation for the service to be performed. They finally went to work under the arrangement, and on the terms that if successful, and they could not agree as to the price, the matter should be submitted to referees, to be chosen as stated in the testimony of the master. It seems that so much of the suggestion of the libellants as contemplated the stripping of the vessel, in case they were unsuccessful, was not acceded to by the master. That proposition, made as it was in advance of any efforts on the part of the libellants to save property, was highly objectionable, and must be regarded as detracting very materially from the merit of the service. That the schooner was in some peril cannot successfully be denied. Many other vessels have been stranded on this shoal, and few had ever found effectual relief. She was fast in her position, and the efforts of her officers and crew were insufficient to work her free. The master had lost his course; and being without any knowledge that his chronometer was imperfect or out of order, it is not probable that he would have discovered his mistake without other means than those he had at hand. Part of the cargo had already been thrown overboard, and the crew had become exhausted with continued labor, and stood in need of relief. Under such circumstances it is impossible to say that the vessel was in no peril. It is no sufficient answer to this state of facts to say, even if it were true, as is supposed by the respondents, that the risk and duration of the service were less than they would have been had the elements been more threatening and unpropitious. That argument is a proper and forcible one as affecting the value of the service, and the amount to be allowed, but it is wholly insufficient under the circumstances of this case as a bar to the claim for salvage. Forty-eight hours or more were spent in performing the service, and during some portion of the time there was a strong tide and considerable wind. As before remarked, some portion of her deck load had been thrown overboard before the libellants arrived, and after they took charge of the schooner they found it impossible to work her off by heaving at the windlass until her deck had been nearly or quite cleared. Two boats were used in carrying out the anchors, and one or more of the witnesses testified that the anchor and chain loaded them so deep that one or two men had to bail water nearly all the time they were carrying them out to prevent the boats from sinking. All the circumstances show, not only that the vessel and cargo stood in need of relief, but that the assistance as finally rendered, at the request, or at least by the assent, of the master, was not unattended with some danger and personal risk. In the first instance, it is true that the master only requested a pilot, and declined the proffered aid, hoping, doubtless, to get his vessel off by the efforts of his own crew; but the case clearly shows that he subsequently changed his mind, and set the libellants at work. They demanded unrestricted salvage compensation, which the master refused to allow. Efforts were then made to agree upon a definite sum; but the parties could not, and did not, agree. Finding they could not agree upon a fixed compensation, it was arranged that the libellants should render the service, and, in case they disagreed, the matter was to be submitted to referees. That stipulation was never carried into effect, and each party charges the other with fault in that particular. Propositions to that effect were made on both sides, and as often as they were made they were rejected by the opposite party. As compared with the arrangement between them before the service was rendered, no one of the propositions appears to be entirely free from objection. One or more of those made by the libellants were unreasonable, and their conduct in that behalf cannot be altogether overlooked in fixing upon the amount of the compensation they are entitled to receive. Their failure to refer, under the circumstances of this case, is no bar to the suit, and can only be taken into the account as evidence to reduce the amount they are entitled to recover. Nothing short of a contract to pay a given sum for the service to be rendered, or a binding engagement to pay at all events, whether successful or unsuccessful in the enterprise, will operate as a bar to a meritorious salvage claim. Hennessey v. The Versailles [Case No. 6,365]; The William Lushington, 7 Notes Cas. 361; The Centurion [Case No. 2,554]; The H. B. Foster [Id. 6,290]; The Independence [Id. 7,014]. Some of the timber was lost, but it is not perceived that there is any sufficient evidence in the case to show that it was by the neglect or through the default of the libellants. Salvors are allowed a liberal compensation for their services for two reasons: first, as an inducement to engage in the service; and, secondly, to withdraw from them every motive of unfaithfulness in the performance of their duties. Fraud or gross negligence is visited by the law with an entire forfeiture of claim to compensation. But the burden of proof, when any such imputation is made, lies on the party making it, and when not proved, of course the charge cannot be sustained. In view of all the circumstances, I think the libellants are entitled to a salvage compensation, but less than is usually allowed in cases of this description. Five hundred dollars I think a reasonable compensation. Accordingly, the decree of the district court is reversed, and let a decree be entered in favor of the libellants for that amount, with costs in both courts.

[1] [Reported by William Henry Clifford, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

Case No. 2,950.

COFFIN v. OGDEN et al.

[7 Blatchf. 61;[1] 3 Fish. Pat. Cas. 640; Merw. Pat. Inv. 669.]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Nov. 29, 1869.[2]

PATENTS—"LOCKS"—CONSTRUCTION — COMPLETED INVENTION—DEDICATION.

1. Where, in a suit for the infringement of a patent for an improvement in a lock, the defendant's lock contained the entire mechanical arrangement, in substance, which was found in the description of the plaintiff's patent, so far as the invention of the patentee was concerned, with only such variations as the skill of a mechanic would suggest: Held, that the plaintiff's patent ought, if possible, to be so construed as to make it valid with reference to the defendant's lock.

2. The claims of the reissued patent granted to Charles A. Miller, assignee of William S. Kirkham, the inventor, January 27th, 1863, for an improvement in locks and latches, on the surrender of the original patent granted to Kirkham, June 11th, 1861, namely: 1. So dividing the hub or follower, and so combining the same with a reversible latch, that the arms, or their equivalents, of the divided hub or follower, may be released, for the purpose of allowing the latch to be reversed or turned; 2. So constructing and arranging the individual parts of a divided hub or follower, that the reversal or turning of the latch is prevented only by the presence of the spindle within the lock—so construed as to relieve them from the objection that they claim results or effects or functions.

[1] [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

[2] [Affirmed in Coffin v. Ogden, 18 Wall. (85 U. S.) 120.]

3. The first claim is a claim to dividing the hub or follower in substantially the manner described by the patentee, and to combining the hub, so divided, with a reversible latch, in substantially the manner described by the patentee, the arms of the hub being released in substantially the manner described by the patentee, for the purpose of allowing the latch to be reversed.

4. The second claim is a claim to constructing and arranging the individual parts of the divided hub in substantially the manner described by the patentee, the reversal of the latch being prevented only by the presence of the spindle in the lock in substantially the manner described by the patentee.

5. The proper rule is to construe the claims in connection with the descriptive parts of the specification, and with reference to what is seen to be the real invention.

6. Where a lock containing a reversible latch, embodying the inventions covered by such claims, was, prior to the making of the invention by the patentee, made by E., and shown to three lock-makers, who examined it and understood its construction, and it was not put upon a door or put into use, or tested otherwise than by the exhibition of it and its working to the three lock-makers, but was a complete working reversible latch: Held, that it was a complete and perfected invention, and that such a knowledge of it, as a completed invention, was given to the public, before the patentee made his invention of the same thing, as to deprive the patentee of his right as first inventor.

7. The reversible latch of E. was a completed invention, although the lock containing in it was not actually put into use on a door.

[See note at end of case.]

In equity. This was a final hearing, on pleadings and proofs, of a suit [against James B. Ogden and Lucius Woodruff] founded on reissued letters patent of the United States [No. 1,390] granted to Charles A. Miller, assignee of William S. Kirkham, the inventor, January 27th, 1863, for an improvement in locks and latches, and assigned to the plaintiff [Paul C. Coffin]. The original letters patent [No. 32,521] were granted to Kirkham, June 11th, 1861.

George Gifford, for plaintiff.

Benjamin F. Thurston and Stephen D. Law, for defendants.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. The defences set up in the answer, that are relied on, are: 1. That the invention in question was previously made by one Barthol Erbe, at Birmingham, near Pittsburg, Pennsylvania; 2. That the claims of the reissued patent are not for any patentable invention, or for any device or mechanism arranged and operating for a particular purpose or to produce a particular effect, but are for an effect or function, irrespective of any particular mechanism, and that such patent is, therefore, void; 3. That, if the patent is valid, the defendants have not infringed it.

The object of the invention is stated, in the specification, to be, to render a door latch "readily applicable to either right or left hand doors." The drawings annexed to the patent represent a structure, the whole of which is called, in the specification, a door-lock, containing as well a bolt to be operated by a key, as a latch to be operated by a spindle attached to a knob or handle. The invention relates only to those parts of the structure which are connected with the operation of the latch. The specification states, that the invention is applicable to door-locks generally—as well to a lock let into the edge of a door, and consequently concealed from view, as to a lock secured to the outer surface of a door. The latch, which is operated by the turning of the spindle, has its head, that is, the portion which projects beyond the face plate of the lock, made square, and bevelled or rounded off at one end. The stem of the latch and the portion adjacent to the head are cylindrical. While the lock is in working order, the square portion of the latch fits snugly in a square opening in the face plate, but such portion is arranged to slide freely in such opening, and, when such portion is pulled so far forward that the cylindrical portion takes its place in such opening, the latch can be readily turned and its bevelled edge be reversed. The arrangement to allow of such reversal is as follows: At or near the centre of the cylindrical portion of the latch is a recess therein, in which fits the lower end of a lever, which has its fulcrum on a lug projecting from the inside of the upper edge of the case, a spring bearing against the short arm of the lever. A slide is connected by a pin to such lever, and on such slide are two projections or lugs, against which the arms of the hub or follower bear. This hub or follower consists of two parts. One of them is arranged to turn in both faces of the lock, and has a square opening for the reception of the spindle, and is partly cut away for the reception of the other part, a portion of which is also adapted to the spindle. It is this latter part of the hub that acts on the projections on the slide before mentioned, the points which bear against such projections being termed arms. When the spindle is out of the hub, this latter part of the hub can be slid in a direction away from the face plate, independently of the other portion of the hub, which remains stationary, as it is confined to the front and rear plates of the lock case. When the spindle is in the hub, the two portions of the hub become as one portion, and perform the functions of an ordinary hub, that is, on turning the spindle, one or the other of the arms acts on one of the projections on the slide before mentioned, and causes the slide to operate the latch. When the spindle is withdrawn, the two portions of the hub are released, from each other, and the arms are released so far as their action on such projections is concerned. When it is desirable to reverse the latch, the first thing to be done is, to withdraw the spindle, after which the latch can be pulled out from the face plate to a certain distance, which the presence of the spindle in the hub has hitherto prevented. On thus pulling the latch out, the lever and the slide move in the same direction, such movement being permitted by the yielding of the arms, which have been released on the withdrawing of the spindle. After the latch has been drawn out so far that its cylindrical portion takes the place before occupied by its head in the square opening in the face plate, the latch can be readily turned and reversed, and then be pushed back to its proper position, and the spindle can then be reinserted. A spring is arranged to restore to its proper position the movable portion of the hub. By this construction of the hub, its arms can be released, and the reversal of the latch be promptly accomplished, while such reversal is effectually prevented by the presence of the spindle in the hub. In this way, the lock is capable of being applied to either a right hand or a left hand door.

The claims of the patent are two in number: 1. So dividing the hub or follower, and so combining the same with a reversible latch, that the arms, or their equivalents, of the divided hub or follower may be released, for the purpose of allowing the latch to be reversed or turned; 2. So constructing and arranging the individual parts of a divided hub or follower, that the reversal or turning of the latch is prevented only by the presence of the spindle within the lock.

The lock made and sold by the defendants is, in its mechanical construction, substantially the same as the lock described in the plaintiff's patent, so far as the arrangement of the parts of its divided hub and their combination with a reversible latch are concerned. The defendants' hub is divided into three parts, one of which is movable relatively to the other two. The movable part carries the arms for operating the latch. When such movable part is released from the other parts, the latch can be moved the necessary distance to allow its bevelled head to be turned or reversed. The parts of the divided hub, thus arranged, are combined with the reversible latch. The presence of the spindle in the hub prevents the action of the movable part of the hub, while the withdrawing of such spindle releases such movable part of the hub, so as to allow of the reversal of the latch. There is no lever connecting the slide with the shank of the latch, but the slide is connected directly with such shank—a variation which is merely formal and does not concern the invention. So, also, the variation, by dividing the stationary part of the hub into two parts, is merely formal. The defendants' lock contains the entire mechanical arrangement, in substance, which is found in the description of the plaintiff's patent, so far as the invention of Kirkham is concerned, with only such variations as the skill of a mechanic would suggest. The invention of Kirkham is taken, in its mechanical construction and arrangement. This being so, and the invention of Kirkham, as described, being infringed, the rules of law require that the plaintiff's patent shall, if possible, be so construed, as to make it valid with reference to the defendants' lock—ut magis valeat quam pereat. Upon this principle, there is no difficulty in so construing the claims of the patent as to relieve them from the objection made, that they claim results or effects or functions. The first claim must be held to be a claim to dividing the hub or follower in substantially the manner described by the patentee, and to combining the hub, so divided, with a reversible latch, in substantially the manner described by the patentee, the arms of the hub being released in substantially the manner described by the patentee, for the purpose of allowing the latch to be reversed. The second claim must be held to be a claim to constructing and arranging the individual parts of the divided hub in substantially the manner described by the patentee, the reversal of the latch being prevented only by the presence of the spindle in the lock, in substantially the manner described by the patentee. The claims must be construed in connection with the descriptive parts of the specification, and with reference to what is seen to be the real invention. Case v. Brown, 2 Wall. [69 U. S.] 320. If the defendants' division of the hub, and their combination of such hub with a reversible latch, and their release of the arms of the hub, and their arrangement of the individual parts of the divided hub, and their prevention, by the presence of the spindle in the lock, of the reversal of the latch, were not all of them effected substantally in the same way, and by the same mechanical constructions, described in the plaintiff's patent, the question whether the claims of such patent could be so construed as to be made to embrace mechanical constructions not substantially described in such patent, for dividing the hub, and combining it with a reversible latch, and releasing the arms of the hub, and arranging the individual parts of the divided hub, and preventing the reversal of the latch by the presence of the spindle, would become an important one. In the present case, such question is unimportant, for, on the construction which the claims must receive, the defendants' lock is clearly an infringement.

The remaining question is that of novelty. The reversible latch claimed to have been invented and made by Erbe, prior to Kirkham's invention, undoubtedly embodied the inventions claimed in the plaintiff's patent, as above construed. The lock of Erbe, containing such latch, had a hub divided into three parts. The central portion of the hub was no thicker than the space between the walls of the lock-case, while the other two portions were like washers, and of the same thickness as the walls of the lock-case. The central portion was rendered movable by the withdrawal of the spindle, and was so combined with a reversible latch as to permit the movement of such central portion to a sufficient distance to allow of the withdrawal of the latch far enough to allow of its reversal. It possessed all three of the features which go to make up the reversible latch of the plaintiff's patent: 1. A reversible latch-bolt, capable of being reversed when pulled out from the face of the lock-case to a distance greater than the distance to which it is usually shot; 2. A hub so divided that the part carrying the arms can be detached at will from the other parts of the hub, and allowed to slide within the walls of the lock; 3. A spindle capable of being withdrawn from the parts forming the hub. The parts of the hub in the Erbe lock, and their combinations with the latch and the spindle, are, in mechanical construction and arrangement, substantially the same as the corresponding parts described in the plaintiff's patent and found in the defendants' lock. In the feature of having a hub divided into three parts instead of two, that is, one movable part, and two separated stationary parts embracing the movable part, when the latch is set, the Erbe lock is formally more like the defendants' lock than it is like the Kirkham lock. But, as this formal difference does not relieve the defendants' lock from being an infringement, so it does not destroy the identity between the Kirkham lock and the Erbe lock, in the features which characterize the patented invention. The fact that there is a permanent connection, in the Kirkham lock, between the two parts of the hub which enter the walls of the lock, has no relation to any of the arrangements or combinations through which the latch is made reversible.

The question, then, arises, as to whether the Erbe lock antedates, as a completed invention, the Kirkham lock. The weight of the evidence is, that Kirkham did not make his invention at an earlier date than the 1st of March, 1861. The testimony of Miller, as to the exhibition by Kirkham, as early as the 1st of September, 1860, of a drawing of the invention, is not to be relied on, in view of the testimony given by Allport and Hill, in reference to the circumstances attending the construction by Kirkham of the first lock which embodied his invention. Besides, the testimony of Miller as to when the drawing was exhibited is, in itself, vague and inconclusive and is not corroborated by any reliable fact or circumstance in the case.

What, then, is the date of the Erbe invention? Erbe himself testifies, that he first made a lock containing such invention in the latter part of the year 1860. A duplicate or counterpart of the lock so then made is in evidence, and contains the construction and arrangement of mechanism before stated as characterizing the Erbe lock. He made but one of such locks at that time. He was at the time foreman of a lock-making establishment at Birmingham. He exhibited such lock before the 1st of January, 1861, and about Christmas day, in 1860, to Bernhard Brosi, a lock-maker, who then resided at Birmingham, and worked in the same establishment with him. He also exhibited such lock on the 1st day of January, 1861, to Henry Masta, who was at the time a pattern-maker in the same establishment. He also exhibited it in January, 1861, to Andrew Patterson, who was at the time superintendent of the same establishment. Erbe showed Brosi how the lock worked, so as to be used either right or left, and showed him the hub or follower made in two pieces, one of them capable of being taken out when the knob was taken away, and the other part, being the main part of the follower, sliding forward in the case of the lock with the latch, so that the square part of the latch could be reversed. Brosi had, at that time, been a lock-maker for eight years. He examined the lock carefully at the time, and had never seen a reversible latch before. He says, that the lock which Erbe then exhibited to him was the same, in construction, as the duplicate or counterpart before referred to, and was a complete lock, capable of working, although the inside part of the latch was roughly made, of wrought iron. Erbe showed him the same lock on two other occasions, shortly afterwards, at the establishment where both of them were employed. Masta says, that he examined the lock at the time with the case open; that the hub was in three pieces, the middle one of which would slide between the plate and the case, and let the latch forward, when the spindle was pulled out; that the arrangement by which the latch was made capable of reversal, in the lock shown to him by Erbe, was the same as the arrangement for that purpose in the duplicate or counterpart before referred to; and that, when he first saw Erbe's latch, he had never before seen or heard of a reversible latch. Patterson says, that the reversible latch which Erbe showed to him was like the duplicate or counterpart before referred to; that the hub or follower was so constructed that, when the spindle was withdrawn, the hub would slide forward between the cases, and allow the head of the latch to protrude beyond the face of the lock, so as to be reversed, there being a swivel joint connection between the head of the latch and the yoke; that the movable part of the hub was a single piece with arms, like an ordinary follower or hub, and there was, in one side of the case, on the spindle, a shoulder or boss, which filled the spindle hole, and on the other side a ring or washer on the spindle, which centered the spindle in the hole in the case; that he, the witness, at the time, regarded the thing as a new invention; and that the latch part and its connections were complete.

Erbe did not make a second lock of the kind until he made one which was deposited in the patent office in connection with an application he made for a patent in 1864. Nor did he put any such lock into use on a door until after he had so applied for a patent. I am not satisfied, from the evidence, that the lock which Erbe so made in 1860 was put upon a door, or that any other lock of the kind made by Erbe was put upon a door, until after such application for a patent was made by Erbe. On this evidence, it is insisted, on the part of the plaintiff, that, as but one lock was made by Erbe before Kirkham made his invention and obtained his patent, and as the lock so made by Erbe was not put upon a door, or put into use or tested otherwise than by such exhibition of it and its working to the three witnesses to whom it was shown, before Kirkham made his invention and obtained his patent, the invention of Erbe was not one reduced to practice before the invention of Kirkham was made, but rested only in experiment, and was not a completed invention. I think this position cannot be maintained in reference to this reversible latch of Erbe's. It was no mere experiment. In the shape in which it was exhibited by Erbe, and is reproduced now in the duplicate or counterpart before referred to, it is a complete working reversible latch, requiring no alteration, adaptation, addition or improvement to fit it for use as a latch, and as a reversible latch. It was put into practical form, in working metal, as a latch, and was ready for practical use, in itself, and as a pattern or model from which any number like it could have been made by Erbe and the three other persons who saw it and understood its construction. It was, therefore, a completed and perfected invention, and the imparting of a knowledge of its construction by its exhibition by Erbe to the three persons, connected with the business of lock making, who saw it and understood its arrangement, was the giving to the public of such a knowledge of it, as a complete invention, before Kirkland made his invention of the same thing, as to deprive Kirkham of the right to be considered, in law, as the first inventor of such invention, even though he was an original and independent inventor of it. A putting of an invention into use is generally strong evidence of a reduction of it to practice. But it may be a completed invention, put into practical form, ready for practical use and reduced to practice, without being put into use, in the general acceptation of that word. If the adaptation to use, or even the use itself, is merely experimental, the invention is not perfected. But use is not necessarily required in order to show perfection or completion. In respect to most inventions, use, not merely experimental, is one of the best proofs of the reduction of an invention to practice. But the particular invention in question is an illustration of the fact, that a piece of mechanism may be shown to have been completed, and not to have rested in experiment, and to have been capable, from its structure, of working successfully, so as to deprive of the merit of novelty, in the patent law, a subsequent independent invention of the same thing, without its being shown that such piece of mechanism was actually used before the making of such subsequent invention. To put upon a door a reversible latch constructed like Kirkham's and Erbe's and the defendants', so that such latch shall be in working order and be used practically as a latch, is to deprive it of its active reversible character. The only occasion on which such a latch ever needs to be reversed or ever can be reversed, is when it is off from a door, and is not in use as a latch. So long as it is on a door and is in use as a latch, the mechanism for reversing the latch is dormant and inactive. It in no manner demonstrates the capacity for successful action of the mechanism for reversing, to put the latch in use upon a door. Such use is the mose effective way of depriving any observer of all opportunity of testing the capacity of the mechanism for reversing, and can only test the action of the latch as a latch not possessed of any capacity of being reversed. The only point of view in which the necessity for use on a door of a lock containing such a reversible latch can be urged is, that, until that is done, it cannot be seen or known that the latch with such reversible mechanism attached to it will work successfully as a latch, or that the reversing mechanism will not have to be regarded as an unsuccessful experiment, because attached to a latch not shown to work successfully as a latch with such attachment. In the present case, however, it is not pretended that the latch of Erbe, represented by the duplicate or counterpart before referred to, will not work successfully as a latch on a door, when the spindle is in position, or that any experiment or use was necessary to ascertain whether the presence of the reversing mechanism would or would not interfere with the action of the latch as a latch when on a door. The only use of the reversing mechanism is to enable the bevelled side of the projecting head of the latch to be turned to the proper position to suit the door on which the latch is to be put, as a right-handed or a left-handed door, and, when once the latch is arranged to suit a particular door and is put on such door, the reversing mechanism is of no more use or service, while the latch remains on such door, than if such mechanism had no existence. It can never again be of any use until and unless the same latch is required to be put upon a door differently hung, in respect to being right-handed or left-handed. Therefore, the principal scope of the use of such reversing mechanism is to release the house-builder from the necessity of exercising any choice as to selecting locks with latches made especially for right-handed or left-handed doors, and to relieve lockmakers from the necessity of making locks especially for each class of doors. In view of these facts, in reference to this invention, the exhibition of a lock containing it to persons versed in lock-making, who understood its construction and working, and who recognized it at the time as a completed thing, capable of working and effecting the result intended, as to reversing the latch, and who were shown how it worked, so as to be capable of being used for either a right-handed or a left-handed door, must be regarded as substantially a use of the reversing mechanism, which is the whole invention. Such use as Erbe put the lock to in showing Brosi and Masta and Patterson how the reversing mechanism practically worked, embodied as extensive and effective a use of such mechanism as it would have been likely to have had, if such lock had been sold to a purchaser who should have put it in use upon a door. These views are confirmed by, and result from, the most carefully considered cases and authorities which are to be met with on this subject. Reed v. Cutter [Case No. 11,645]; Bedford v. Hunt [Id. 1,217]; Curt. Pat. § 87; Whitely v. Swayne, 7 Wall. [74 U. S.] 685.

It follows, from these considerations, that the invention of Kirkham was fully anticipated by that of Erbe, and that the bill must be dismissed, with costs.

[NOTE. Complainant appealed to the supreme court, where the decree of the circuit court was affirmed.

[Mr. Justice Swayne who delivered the opinion, after reviewing the testimony, stated: "Here it is abundantly proved that the lock originally made by Erbe 'was complete, and capable of working.' The priority of Erbe's invention is clearly shown. It was known at the time to at least five persons, including Jones, and probably to many others, in the shop where Erbe worked; and the lock was put in use, being applied to a door, as proved by Brosi. It was thus tested, and shown to be successful. These facts bring the case made by the appellees within the severest legal tests which can be applied to them. The defense relied upon is fully made out." Coffin v. Ogden, 18 Wall. (85 U. S.) 120.]

COFFIN (PAYSON v.). See Cases Nos. 10,858 and 10,859.

Case No. 2,951.

COFFIN v. SHAW.

[21 Law Rep. 463.]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. May Term, 1856.[1]

SEAMEN'S WAGES — DESERTION BY MINOR — RIGHT OF FATHER — MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

1. Where a minor, with the assent and allowance of his father, signed shipping articles for a whaling voyage, in the course of which, after arriving at full age, he deserted, it was held that, at the common law in Massachusetts, such desertion did not work a forfeiture of the father's right to his wages during minority.

2. The effect of the father's assent is to make it a contract with himself to the extent of his legal interest, namely, the term of minority, after which neither father nor son is bound.

3. The measure of damages in such case is the value of the son's proportion of the oil taken during his minority.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of Massachusetts.

[In admiralty. Libel by Jesse Coffin against John H. Shaw. There was a decree for libellant (Case No. 2,952), and respondent appeals.]

Mr. Stone, for appellant.

Mr. Cushman, contra.

CURTIS, Circuit Justice. This libel was filed to recover the share or lay of the minor son of the libellant, earned in a whaling voyage on board the ship Alabama. The minor, with the assent and allowance of the father, signed a shipping paper at Nantucket, in the month of May, in the year 1846, for a whaling voyage to the Pacific ocean and elsewhere. The boy arrived at full age on the seventeenth of August, 1850, and on the twenty-first day of the following November deserted, while the vessel was lying at the Sandwich Islands. It is insisted that this desertion worked a forfeiture of the lay earned by the minor during his minority, and so the father cannot recover. The argument is, that the son contracted, by signing the shipping paper, to serve during the entire voyage: that, as he made this contract with his father's consent, he represented and bound his father, and, consequently, the express contract to perform the entire voyage being broken, the father's rights are forfeited. But this argument assumes several positions which I think untenable. A father is entitled to the earnings of his minor children, and if one of them enters into an express written contract for work and labor, at a certain rate, to be performed during his minority, in his own name, the father may recover a compensation for such work. If the father did not assent to the contract, or allow his son to make it, he can recover on a quantum meruit, which the law implies; if he did assent, the contract affords the measure and conditions of the compensation. And if the nature of the contract which the father assents to is such that there is to be no compensation if the entire work shall not be performed, then the father can recover nothing for part performance, because the employer has not agreed to pay any one any amount for part performance; and the law will not imply a promise to pay for that, for which, by an express contract it appears that there was to be no payment. So that the true inquiry in this case is, whether there was an express contract made by the son, and assented to by the father as binding his rights, by force of which no compensation was to be made if the son should desert the vessel after he became of age.

[1] [Affirming Case No. 2,952.]

To determine this question, it will be useful to consider what would have been the legal effect of this contract by the son, if he had been emancipated; or, as it is familiarly expressed in New England, if he had had his time given him by his father. In Vent v. Osgood, 19 Pick. 572, it was held, that if a minor, after the death of his father, ship himself in a whale ship, the contract is voidable; and is avoided by his leaving the vessel before the completion of the voyage; and he may thereupon recover in a quantum meruit for his services. In my opinion this case contains a correct exposition of the common law of Massachusetts, where the contract now in question was made. It follows that, if the minor in this case had contracted without the assent of his father, his desertion of the vessel, on the first opportunity which occurred after he became of age, would not have worked a forfeiture; his express contract would have been avoided, and he would have been remitted to his rights, independent of that contract. What then is the effect of his father's assent? Simply, that so far as it is a contract for service during minority, it becomes a contract with the father, which he may enforce, and by which he is obliged, and which is not voidable by the minor, not being for his account. But neither the father nor the son is bound by the contract any further than this. The assent of the father is only to a contract for service by his son during minority; further than that he has no legal interest, and no legal right. And the son is not bound to serve after he comes of age. His own agreement, independent of his father's assent, does not bind him; for, being under age, his contract is voidable, and his father's assent to it can have no operation after he becomes of age, and the parental control and right to his services no longer exist. It is true the father may contract that his son shall begin a voyage during his minority, and serve while he continues under age, and not desert before the completion of the voyage, though, it should not be terminated until after the son's majority. Under such a contract, what would be the legal effect of a desertion by the son, after his majority, upon the rights of the father to the stipulated compensation for his services while under age, may admit of doubt. So far as respects the service of majority, such a contract would be in the nature of a suretyship and the compensation for its breach might not be a forfeiture, but damages. But however this may be, the libellant has made no such contract. His assent to the contract made by his son cannot be carried further than his right and interest in that contract. Its legal effect was, that to the extent of the father's interest in the subject matter, that is, the services of the son during minority, the son contracted on the father's account, and as his representative. But beyond this the son did not represent the father; he acted for himself. My opinion therefore, is that there was no breach of any contract by the father; that so far as he was concerned the agreed service was fully performed and consequently there was no forfeiture.

It should be observed that this is not a case of statute desertion, the effect of which, by force of the act of congress, may be different from the effect attached to the same act by the principles of the maritime law. But upon that I give no opinion.

Another question has been made, whether the libellant should recover the value of his son's proportion of the oil taken during his minority, or only such a proportion of an entire lay as the time before he arrived at full age bore to the whole time spent in the voyage. The district court adopted the former rule. It is most consistent with the nature of the contracts of seamen in whaling voyages, and I think it the proper rule. The decree of the district court is affirmed, with six per cent. damages and costs.

Case No. 2,952.

COFFIN v. SHAW.

[3 Ware, 82;[1] 19 Law Rep. 146.]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. June 11, 1856.[2]

SHIPMENT OF MINOR — DESERTION AFTER MINORITY—FORFEITURE OF WAGES—RIGHT OF FATHER —GUARANTY.

1. A father shipped his son, a minor, under the age of seventeen, by a contract in the common form, for a whaling voyage to the Pacific ocean and elsewhere. The son faithfully did duty during the whole period of his minority, and afterwards deserted before the termination of the voyage.

2. Held, that the desertion did not forfeit the wages of the son during his minority, which were due to the father. The obligations of the father's contract terminated with his son's minority, and his responsibility for his acts ceased at the same time.

3. A simple promise, by one, of the act of another person who is sui juris is void. But a contract of guaranty or suretyship for the act of another, if on a sufficient consideration, is valid.

4. In this case no such guaranty being proved, it could not be presumed.

[In admiralty. Libel by Jesse Coffin against John H. Shaw.]

A. S. Cushman, for libellant.

J. C. Stone, for respondent.

WARE, District Judge. This is a libel brought by Jesse Coffin, to recover, against the owners of the ship Alabama, of Nantucket, the lay or wages earned by George M. Coffin, his son, in a whaling voyage described in the shipping-paper as a voyage to the Pacific ocean and elsewhere. There is no controversy as to the facts in the case. It is admitted that George M. Coffin was at the time of the contract a minor; that he was regularly shipped by the libellant, his father, for the voyage, on the 26th of May, 1846, as a cooper; that his lay or wages was to be one seventy-fifth of the proceeds of the cruise; that he proceeded on the voyage, and faithfully and with fully an ordinary share of ability performed the service for which he was engaged, and remained in the ship till the 21st of November, 1850, four years and within a few days of six months. It is also admitted that he then deserted, while the vessel lay at the Sandwich Islands, the voyage or cruise not being at the time completed. The cause or inducement to the desertion is proved by the libellant's own witness. Not long before that time the discovery had been made of the great mineral riches of California. The tempting prospect of sudden and easily acquired wealth was too strong for the young man, and he abandoned the ship for the purpose of seeking a fortune among the gold mines of this new El Dorado. He had no cause of complaint against the master of the vessel, and he deserted purely from motives of interest, on the calculation of finding a more lucrative employment. It was, therefore, a desertion not only without justification, but without palliation.

[1] [Reported by George F. Emery, Esq.]

[2] [Affirmed in Case No. 2,951.]

In every age of the maritime law, a wanton and wilful desertion before the termination of the voyage, has been held to work a forfeiture of all wages antecedently earned. In the case of Gifford v. Kollock [Case No. 5,409], I thought, though this was the general rule, that the law was not imperative on the court to inflict the entire forfeiture; but when the desertion was attended by extenuating circumstances, not amounting to a justification, these circumstances might be taken into consideration, and the penalty mitigated to a reasonable deduction from the wages, or even to a case of mere compensation and indemnity to the owners for the actual damage sustained. Perhaps when the desertion is proved precisely according to the requirements of the act of 1790, c. 29, § 5 (1 Stat. 133), it may be otherwise. It may be that the act makes it a statute penalty, and by its terms takes from the court all power of qualifying the offence, and reducing the penalty in consideration of palliating circumstances, that do not constitute a full justification. The facts of the case did not call for the expression of an opinion on that point. But to the doctrine held in that case, I still adhere. In the present, however, there were no extenuating circumstances. The desertion was not only without justification but without palliation. But there is another admitted fact to be adverted to in this case, and it is the only one that creates any difficulty in my mind. This boy was shipped by his father while he was a minor. During his minority he was earning wages for his father's benefit, and working out his contract. And while that continued, his father must be held so far responsible for his conduct; that any act in breach of the contract, which legally affected the right to wages, is imputable to him. But the desertion took place on the 21st of November, 1850, and the boy arrived at the age of twenty-one on the 17th day of the preceding August, and then ceased to be under the parental power. He then ceased to earn wages for his father, was entitled to his own earnings, and became alone responsible for his own acts. The shipping contract made by his father then terminated by operation of law, and up to that time there had been no forfeiture. The father had then acquired all the rights he could acquire under the contract, and as he had no longer any right of control over his son, he ceased to be responsible for his acts. How then could his rights be affected by any subsequent acts, or how can there be a breach of a contract that no longer existed, but which was dissolved by operation of law? It appears to me that there is but one possible condition of the contract by which he could be so affected.

It is a principle of common sense and natural justice, as well as of law, that contracts have their effects, both of benefit and burden of right and obligation, only between the parties. No one can stipulate or promise but for himself. A promise that another shall give a particular thing, or do a particular act, is simply void, conferring no right and producing no obligation. It is an exception to the rule, when the person whose act is promised is under the control of the promisor; as, if he promises the acts of a hired servant in his employment, the promise binds him as if he had promised his own act; or if he promises the act of a minor, being an apprentice or a child, as in this case. 6 Toullier, Droit Civil Francais, No. 136. The libellant, in his character of a parent, had the right of control over his son, and if he engaged, by this contract, that his son should faithfully serve the owners as a cooper in the voyage, as he must be considered to have done, he will be equally affected by a breach of this engagement by his child as if he had promised his own personal act and violated his promise, and must bear the legal consequences of such violation. But his responsibility lasted only as long as his contract, and that terminated with his son's minority. But though the simple promise of the act of another is merely void, and neither binds the promisor nor the person whose act is promised, by varying the form of the engagement, it may become binding on the promisor. The distinction is succinctly and clearly expressed in the Institutes of Justinian: "If one promises that another shall give or do anything, he is not bound, as if he promises that Titius shall give five pieces of gold. But if he promises that he will take care or cause that Titius gives it, he is bound." "Si quis alium daturum facturumve quid spoponderit, non obligabitur, veluti si spondeat Titium quinque aureos daturum. Quod si effecturum se ut Titius daret, spoponderit, obligatur." Lib. 3, 20, § 3. He then promises not for another but for himself, and as persons are not presumed to trifle in business transactions with nugatory promises, a person will easily be presumed to mean by such a promise, that he will be surety for the one whose act is promised, when the circumstances are such as to favor the presumption or not to bring it into doubt. Poth. Obl. No. 56. In stating the general principle, that one can stipulate or promise but for himself, I have borrowed the language of the Roman law, because it is put there into a neat and succinct formula. But the general rule is as true in our law as in that of Rome, for it is founded in the nature of things. There are exceptions in both, but they do not reach the present case. It was, doubtless, competent for the libellant to engage in the event that the voyage should not be ended when his son attained his majority, and to bind himself as a surety for him, that he should continue in the vessel and faithfully do duty until the final termination of the voyage, and to make himself responsible for any forfeiture his son might incur, and it is only by such an engagement that he could be affected by acts of his son after his parental authority ceased. The owners might have stipulated for such a promise, and it would have been binding on the promisor. But the circumstances must be peculiar to authorize the presumption of such an engagement without direct evidence, and surely it will not be presumed against probability. Are the circumstances of this case such that an engagement of this kind can fairly and reasonably be inferred? I think not. To authorize such a presumption, we must suppose that the parties, at the time of the contract, contemplated the contingency that the voyage might not be completed until after the son had passed his minority. But more than four years of his minority yet remained, and it is agreed that the ordinary length of whaling voyages in 1846 was three years, and that they never exceeded four. The supposition is, therefore, not only without probability but against it, and there is no direct evidence tending to show that the possibility that the voyage might outlast the boy's minority occurred to the minds of either party. The case then stands on the naked facts and the law applicable to them. My opinion is, that the obligations of the shipping contract made by the father terminated, by the understanding of the parties, as they certainly did in law, when the son attained his majority; and that the rights acquired by the father, during his minority, cannot be affected by any act of the son after the parental authority terminated, and he became sui juris.

Decree for libellant.

[NOTE. Respondent appealed to the circuit court, where the decree herein was affirmed. Case No. 2,951.]

COFFIN (SWEENEY v.). See Case No. 13,686.

COFFIN (UNITED STATES v.). See Cases Nos. 14,823 and 14,824.

Case No. 2,953.

COFFIN v. WELD et al.

[2 Lowell, 81.][1]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. Dec., 1871.

DISCHARGE OF SEAMAN FOR ILL-TREATMENT—DUTY OF CONSUL—CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTES — EXTRA WAGES—ONE THIRD TO UNITED STATES.

1. Seamen who are persistently ill-treated by their officers have the right to demand a discharge from their contract; and, if they leave the vessel, they are not deserters.

2. The statute of 1840, cl. 17 (5 Stat. 396), requiring consuls, when deserters are apprehended and brought before them, to inquire into the facts, and, if satisfied that the desertion was caused by unusual or cruel treatment, to discharge the deserter, who shall have three months' extra pay, is to be construed to give consuls the like power and duty when applied to by seamen who have not deserted.

3. Taking into consideration the other acts in pari materia, and especially the statute of 1856, § 26 (11 Stat. 62), one-third of the three months' pay mentioned in clause 17 of the act of 1840 is to go to the United States.

4. Where it appeared that the crew justly complained of cruel conduct on the part of the mate, and the consul at a foreign port effected a compromise, by which the master was to discharge the mate and the crew were to navigate the ship to the next port; and the crew went on board the ship again, but afterwards refused duty, upon a suspicion, which appeared not wholly unfounded, that the mate had not been discharged, and the consul then discharged them for disobedience,—held, they might recover two months' wages; because they were entitled to their discharge, and the consul had never adjudged that they were not.

[Cited in the Paul Revere, 10 Fed. 158; Gove v. Judson, 19 Fed. 524.]

In February, 1870, the libellant [F. B. Coffin] was shipped at Boston on the ship Fearless, belonging to the respondents [W. F. Weld and others], for a voyage to Batavia and other ports in the East Indies, and back to the United States. He was discharged at Batavia in May, and was sent thence to Singapore, where he took service on board another ship, at a less rate of wages, and arrived home in November, 1870. The Fearless reached this port in January, 1871. The libellant alleged that he was discharged by the consul at Batavia on account of ill-usage received from the master and mate. The answer insisted that eight of the men complained to the consul of the mate's harsh and cruel conduct, and made no charges against the master; and that it was agreed, upon the suggestion of the consul, that the mate should be discharged, and the men should return to duty; that the mate was discharged, and left the ship; but the men, on being required to get the ship under weigh, refused to do any duty, and were discharged by the consul for disobedience. The evidence tended to show that the original ship's company consisted of a master, two mates, a cook, a steward, a carpenter, and sixteen men before the mast; that the ship arrived at Batavia in May, and eight of the men insisted on seeing the consul, and complained to him of ill-usage, and that the others afterwards made a similar complaint. The consul testified, that, according to the best of his recollection, the mate only was accused of cruelty, and not the master; and he further said, that it was agreed that the first mate, who was the cause of the difficulty, should be discharged, that the captain should give an agreement in writing that the crew should be well treated during the further prosecution of the voyage to Singapore, and the men should return to duty; that these terms were fully carried out by himself and the master, but the eight men still refused duty, and were discharged by him for disobedience. Whether the complaint was solely against the mate, or included the master, and whether the libellant agreed to the compromise, were disputed points upon the evidence. It was proved that the men returned to the vessel either voluntarily or through fear or coercion, and that the vessel was ready for sea, and the order was given to weigh anchor; that the mate was then on board, and in his working-dress, and witnesses on both sides said that they inferred he had not been discharged. It was at this time the eight men refused duty. The mate afterwards left the ship, but when, or under what circumstances, did not appear. The second mate had already been discharged, with his own consent, and a man had been promoted to his place. The remaining seven men made the trip to Singapore, and were all discharged by the consul there; and for cause of discharge the consul entered on the articles against the name of each man some act of cruelty or some threats on the part of the mate. The mate was reshipped at the same port, with a new crew.

[1] [Reported by Hon. John Lowell, LL.D., District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

H. M. Knowlton, for libellant.

H. C. Hutchins and H. H. Currier, for respondents.

LOWELL, District Judge. The libellant and seven others of the crew of the Fearless were discharged at Batavia, with the consul's consent. Neither the libel nor the answer states the facts correctly. The man was not discharged for ill-usage, as he alleges; nor is it exactly true that the master agreed to discharge the mate, and did discharge him, and that the men agreed to return to duty, as the answer puts it. The agreement appears to have been that the men would serve as far as Singapore, and be discharged there, for causes already existing; but the mate was not to go on that trip. The master broke his part of the compromise, or at least appeared to break it, by permitting the mate to be on board the ship in his working-dress, though he afterwards sent him on shore. The consul tried, in vain, to induce the men to return to duty, and to induce the master to take them to Singapore in irons; and at last discharged them for disobedience. Two questions arise from these facts: 1. Is the action of the consul conclusive of the right of the master to dismiss the men without pay? 2. If not, is the libellant, on the facts, entitled to any thing? Fraud excepted, the consul's action is binding on all parties in those cases in which the law gives him a discretion. By the very terms of the act of 1803 [2 Stat. 203], the production of his certificate that a seaman was discharged with his consent is a compliance with the master's bond to return the seaman, or produce the consul's certificate of his discharge. Wilson v. The Mary [Case No. 17,823]. His order is held in this circuit to be a bar to an action against the master for causing the men to be imprisoned in a foreign port by the authorities thereof. Jordan v. Williams [Id. 7,528]; Chester v. Benner [Id. 2,660]. When seamen are sent home by the consul to be tried for a crime, their right to wages has been held to end with the arrest. Tingle v. Tucker [Id. 14,057]. And his certificate of the assent of the seaman to his own discharge is conclusive. Lamb v. Briard [Id. 8,010]. But the certificate of the consul must show clearly his jurisdiction and the grounds of his action. The Atlantic [Id. 620]. And, as a general rule, the right to wages after a discharge, which is not made at the request of the mariner, may be supported or contested on its merits, notwithstanding the action of the consul; because the statutes give him no express authority to remit wages, excepting in the cases mentioned in the ninth and subsequent clauses of the act of 1840, the fifth, sixth, and seventh clauses of that act having been repealed by section 33 of the statute of 1856 (11 Stat. 65). In other cases, settlements of wages and other terms of discharge made by or with the sanction of consuls may be inquired into, and varied. See Hutchinson v. Coombs [Case No. 6,955]; Jay v. Almy [Id. 7,236]; Brunent v. Taber [Id. 2,054]; The Atlantic [supra]; Foye v. Dabney [Case No. 5,022]; Jenks v. Cox [Id. 7,277]. The consul has jurisdiction, as will presently appear, to inquire into cruel treatment of the crew by the master and officers; and if the consul in this case had decided that there had been no cruelty, his finding might be conclusive: but he made no such decision at any time. Cruelty was admitted to have been used towards all the men; and all that the consul decided was, that they had broken a compromise, which he thought a fair one.

Coming to the facts presented by the testimony here, I may say that I know of no authority that the consul has to discharge a seamen for disobedience. I do not mean that he may not and ought not to advise the master, or that the latter may not discharge a man for willful and obstinate refusal of duty; but that, in a suit for wages, the ultimate responsibility rests on the master, and that the advice of the consul is only evidence, and not a judicial and conclusive finding, that the man ought to be discharged. U. S. v. Lunt [Case No. 15,642].

The evidence on both sides in this case proves beyond any doubt that the mate was unfit for his office, and that he had given the men just cause to demand their discharge. Indeed, this was conceded; and all the remaining foremast hands, excepting the one promoted to be second mate, were discharged for this cause at Singapore, three weeks after the time now under consideration, and that cause was certified upon the articles, but the cruelty had all been committed on the voyage out to Batavia.

The case for the respondents is, that the libellant and seven others who were discharged at Batavia had agreed to a compromise, by which they were all to go to Singapore and be discharged there; and that the master kept his part of the arrangement, but they broke theirs. This defence is not made out. The evidence is equally clear, and from witnesses on both sides, that the mate was not discharged, even for the three weeks; but that, when the men refused to go to sea from Batavia, the mate was on board, in his working dress, and apparently occupying his old position. Under these circumstances, the men were justified in refusing to go on. Mariners have a right to leave a vessel on which they are constantly and persistently ill-treated; and by the general maritime law such conduct is not desertion; and they may recover full wages notwithstanding. Brown v. The Independence [Case No. 2,014]; Knowlton v. Boss [Id. 7,901]; The America [Id. 286]. It appears to me that the statute of 1840 has introduced a most important modification of this doctrine; for by the seventeenth clause (5 Stat. 396), it is enacted, that in all cases where deserters are apprehended the consul or commercial agent shall inquire into the facts, and, if satisfied that the desertion was caused by unusual or cruel treatment, the mariner shall be discharged, and receive, in addition to his wages to the time of his discharge, three months' pay; and the officer discharging him shall enter upon the crew list and the shipping articles the cause of discharge, and the particulars in which the cruelty or unusual treatment consisted, and subscribe his name thereto officially. In construing this statute, it is impossible to maintain that its scope is limited to cases in which deserters are apprehended. The rights of the seaman and of the owners do not depend on the desertion, but on the treatment; else the master, by forcing the crew from the ship without permitting them to see the consul, and then refusing to apprehend them, might rob them of their wages, by treating them as deserters not worthy of being reclaimed. The consul at Singapore took the right course, and discharged the men for cruel treatment by the mate, and noted the cause of discharge upon the articles, though they had not deserted. The statute is a remedial one, and states a general rule under guise of a particular example, as is not uncommon with acts of congress. It cannot be read and understood in any other sense. The rights of the seamen may, in some cases, —perhaps in this case,—be abridged by this statute, for it gives a certain fixed measure of damages instead of wages to the end of the voyage; but that it applies to all cases of cruel treatment, by whomsoever the case is brought before the consul, I cannot doubt.

The libellant was clearly and confessedly entitled to his discharge; and, if he waived it for a time, which is very doubtful, it was upon conditions which were broken by the other contracting party. But even if that breach by the master were not made out, the only contract that the libellant broke was for a trip from Batavia to Singapore. I must therefore award him three months' pay, unless the meaning of the statute is that one-third of this is to go to the United States. Upon the mere language of this clause, it would be plain enough that the man himself is to have the full three months' pay; but a comparison of the several statutes on the same subject throws much doubt upon it. I am inclined to think, upon the whole that section 26 of the act of 1856 (11 Stat. 62), modifies the seventeenth clause of the act of 1840, if the latter means to give the man the whole of this sum. That section says: That in all cases in which a seaman is entitled to his discharge under any act of congress, or according to the general principles or usages of maritime law, there shall be a payment of three months' wages, excepting only as provided in the ninth clause of the act of 1840 (that is, where a voyage has been prolonged, &c., without any fault of the master); and that these extra wages shall be applicable to the same purposes and in the same manner as is directed by the act of 1803, which gives two-thirds only to the mariner, and that subject to certain charges, if he has incurred them. My decree, therefore, will be for two months' wages, or forty dollars, unless the libellant had received advances beyond the wages due him on the 23d of May, 1870, which I did not distinctly gather from the evidence, or unless there is a balance due him on that account to be added to the forty dollars. He is also to have his costs.

Interlocutory decree for the libellant.

COFFIN (WIGGIN v.). See Case No. 17,624.

COFFIN v. The WITCH QUEEN. See Cases Nos. 17,915 and 17,916.

COFFIN, The E. H. See Cases Nos. 4,309 and 4,310.

COFFMAN (GRAY v.). See Case No. 5,714.

INDEX.

[The references are to pages. The asterisk (*) indicates that the case has been reversed.]

ABATEMENT AND REVIVAL.

Page

Where a child, a passenger on a steamship, died, as was alleged, on account of negligence of the officers, the cause of action arose on contract, and survived to the administrator..... 761

An objection of lis pendens can be sustained only where the two suits are of the same character, and where plaintiff in both suits is the same..... 374

A suit will not be abated because of the pendency of another suit for the same cause where the other suit was dismissed after the plea in abatement was filed.... 415

ACTION.

Plaintiff cannot split up various promises in one contract, and sue upon them separately 634

ADMIRALTY.

See, also, "Pleading in Admiralty;" "Practice in Admiralty."

Jurisdiction.

A court of admiralty may execute the decree of another court of admiralty..... 369

Replevin or attachment in a state court against property does not affect jurisdiction of admiralty to proceed in rem against such property 374

In salvage cases the court of admiralty may proceed in personam as well as in rem 369

Courts of admiralty of the United States may apply the rule of the general maritime law in regard to the liability of owners of foreign vessels for collisions on the high seas..... 676

The district court of the United States may enjoin a suit against a ship and shipowners who have sought the benefit of the rule of maritime law limiting their liability 676

Federal courts, in the exercise of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, are governed by legislation of congress..... 680

Congress, by conferring admiralty and maritime jurisdiction on federal courts, has, by implication, adopted the maritime law 680

An information in rem on the admiralty side of the district court for forfeiture under the impost laws is proper..... 930

Where a court of admiralty in a proceeding in rem has jurisdiction over the thing, it is immaterial to whom it belongs..... 974

A contract of affreightment between two ports of the same state is within admiralty jurisdiction where the course of the vessel is in part on the high seas.... 109

A suit in admiralty may be brought in the name of the assignee of a chose in action 1133

The district court of Ohio has admiralty jurisdiction over the Ohio, as a navigable river 528

Page

Steam ferryboats used between two cities in different states are subject to admiralty jurisdiction, as comprising commerce among the states..... 528

Admiralty has jurisdiction of a suit for services of a tug in hauling off a vessel aground 832

The district courts and courts of admiralty may issue attachment against the property of foreign corporations found within their local jurisdiction..... 974

The admiralty has jurisdiction over charter parties for foreign voyages, and will enforce the lien thereof..... 374 —— Rights founded on state laws.

It seems that no enactment by a state legislature can be the foundation of any right or remedy in admiralty.....1179

The Wisconsin statute for the collection of claims against domestic vessels confers no lien, and therefore the district court of the United State in admiralty has no jurisdiction in rem against such vessel at the suit of a domestic creditor.... 338

A vessel seized under a state law is from that time under the exclusive control of the state court..... 338 —— Persons.

A shipwright cannot sue in admiralty for wages for building ship to navigate high seas..... 1056

Services of a stevedore are not maritime, and are therefore not within the jurisdiction of admiralty..... 702

—— Torts.

A suit in admiralty in personam will lie against the owner of a ship in favor of a shipper who paid salvage to wreckers with whom the master had fraudulently concerted to strand his vessel..... 674

Admiralty has jurisdiction of a libel by the owners of a vessel for collusive spoliation of it, when wrecked under an agreement between the master and a salvor... 669

Admiralty has jurisdiction in action by the wife of a passenger to recover damages for the death of her husband, caused by negligence of the officers of the vessel. 511

The admiralty has jurisdiction of personal torts to a passenger on the high seas, committed by the master of the ship, and it is immaterial whether such torts be by direct force or consequential injuries.... 413

AFFREIGHTMENT.

See, also, "Admiralty;" "Charter-Party;" "Shipping."

Where master ascertains that cargo specified in charter party cannot be obtained, he may sail immediately, and recover "empty for full."..... 948

It is the duty of the master to carry cotton under deck, in the absence of any contract, consent, or custom to the contrary. 1053

Page

Consignees who made advances on goods shipped may, on delivery of the goods, sue the shipowners for damages to the goods, though the bill of lading was not signed by the master.....1053

A ship is hypothecated to the shipper for any damages sustained by the insufficiency of the vessel, or the fault of the master or crew..... 242

ALIENS.

An alien enemy may sue and be sued in the enemy's country.....1154

APPEAL.

The circuit court on appeal from the district court is cautious in admitting new matters of defense or allegation, where the facts were known at the hearing in the district court.....1188

Appeal and writs of error at common law considered; and Act 1807 and Act April 17, § 50, construed..... 924

In a suit by an assignee in bankruptcy against a person claiming adverse interest no appeal lies but the final decree from the interlocutory decree of the district court 880

A finding of fact by the district court will not be reversed unless clearly erroneous 844

An appeal does not lie from an interlocutory judgment dissolving an injunction... 924

Where defendant takes an unauthorized appeal and gives a bond, plaintiff may maintain an action thereon..... 523

Where an assignee proceeded by petition to recover certain property as assets of the bankrupt, and the respondent answered without objection, the circuit court, on review, will not consider whether a more formal suit would have been proper. 844

APPEARANCE.

The voluntary appearance of defendant in a suit commenced by foreign attachment cures the defect of jurisdiction.... 642

The giving of a bond by a nonresident for the release of property seized under foreign attachment from a United States court is not a voluntary appearance..... 642

A voluntary appearance after the revival of a suit is a waiver of process... 154

APPRENTICE.

Under Act Md. 1793, an indenture made by one justice of the peace under the seventh section of the act will be enforced, though there were many objections to the form of the indenture..... 507

ARMY AND NAVY.

Under Act Cong. Feb. 13, 1862, the oath of a military recruit is conclusive as to his age 1054

Where oath was taken before military officer, it will be presumed that services of a civil magistrate could not be obtained....1054

ARREST.

The insolvent law of Massachusetts, which prohibits imprisonment in certain cases, is not a law for abolishing imprisonment for debt, or a law for allowing it, within Act Cong. Feb. 28, 1839, and therefore does not affect process out of the federal court 286

ASSIGNMENT.

Page

A creditor of an insolvent, believing him to be such, can assign his demand to a debtor of the insolvent whose debt is not yet payable 752

A decree, though not assignable at law, is transferable for valuable consideration in equity 1120

A check given by a railroad conductor for "one continuous passage" to a certain point on taking up a ticket which, by its terms, was not transferable, is also not transferable 1168

To enable a person, by assignment of a bond, to vest a legal title in the assignee, it must appear that he has the right to make the assignment..... 908

ASSIGNMENT FOR BENEFIT OF CREDITORS.

Where an assignment was set aside on petition of the assignee in bankruptcy, it transfers the title of the assignee to the assignee in bankruptcy as of the day of the filing of the petition; and the general assignee is not entitled to any expenses incurred by virtue of such transfer, but is entitled to expenses incurred in making sales of the property under orders of the court 898

An assignor may, by bill in equity against the assignee and the only unpaid creditor, compel an accounting of the assignee 111

An assignment valid by the law of the state where it is made, though void if made in another state, conveys property in such other state..... 271

ATTACHMENT.

A positive averment, in the words of the statute, that "plaintiff's debt was fraudulently contracted," is sufficient, under Laws Minn. 1867, c. 66, § 1..... 580

A foreign attachment for breach of stipulation in a charter party cannot be sustained where the amount of plaintiff's damages cannot, with propriety, be averred or sworn to..... 936

It is no objection to a foreign attachment that plaintiff has sued out an attachment in another state on the same cause of action 936

Quaere, whether a foreign attachment could be sustained where plaintiff has sued out an attachment in another state for the same cause, and defendant had given bail therein..... 936

Rights under an attachment depend on the state of the property when the attachment was levied..... 942

An attachment under mesne process is not, in strict sense of law, a lien on the property attached 539

BAIL.

The bail of an insolvent discharged under the law of Maryland will be exonerated. 809

Affidavit that account "is just and true as stated, and no part thereof has been paid," is sufficient to hold defendant to bail 952

An amendment conforming the declaration to the cause of action upon which the bail was given will not authorize the discharge of the bail..... 159

BAILMENT.

Where defendant had sold complainant a bill of exchange, and kept it as security for its price, and the drawers became bankrupt, and defendant failed to recover the dividends on the draft, he was liable for any loss resulting..... 622

Page

BANKRUPTCY.

Operation and effect of bankruptcy laws and proceedings.

Foreclosure of a mortgage on bankrupt's estate is not within summary jurisdiction of district court, under section 1 of the bankrupt act..... 259

One who prepares for market and sells lumber growing on his own ground is a manufacturer, within the meaning of bankrupt law 447

A bankruptcy court has jurisdiction to restrain the prosecution of the bill of a depositor to wind up a bank, though begun prior to the petition in bankruptcy.... 738

An attorney cannot act for a creditor at a meeting unless authorized by letter of attorney properly acknowledged..... 654

A third meeting of creditors should not be called, except for cause shown..... 850

Register.

A register, under general order No. 30 of the supreme court, is entitled to no fees except such are as provided by such order 192

The register can order an assignee to furnish him with all necessary information as to funds in his hands..... 850

A register properly refused to audit the accounts of the assignee filed at a second meeting, where no notice of such auditing had been given to the creditors..... 852

Countersigning checks by the register is a judicial duty..... 853

Where an examination of a bankrupt is adjourned at the instance of the creditors, the register is not entitled to his per diem for that day..... 938

A register's discretion in determining when and what meetings of the creditors shall be held will not ordinarily be interfered with by the district court..... 541

A register has power to adjourn a meeting of its creditors when, in his judgment, the interest of the whole body of creditors, or of sound policy, requires it..... 541

Acts of bankruptcy.

Where a merchant fails to pay, for 14 days, commercial paper given before, but falling due after, he became engaged in business, he can be adjudged a bankrupt... 193

The allegation of suspension of payment of commercial paper on a certain day, and that payment had been demanded at different times thereon, is equivalent to an allegation of demand on that day..... 502

Failure of an accommodation indorser to pay the note in 14 days after his liability has been duly fixed is an act of bankruptcy, if there is no defense, and if he is a manufacturer..... 447

Commercial paper mentioned in section 33 of the bankrupt law includes all negotiable paper..... 447

A negotiable note is not the "commercial paper" of an accommodation indorser thereof, within the meaning of section 39 of the bankrupt act of 1867.....1011

An assignment for benefit of creditors, made with intent to defeat and delay the operation of the bankrupt law, is complete on the day of its execution, and the intent existing at that time determines its character 410

An assignment for benefit of creditors will be deemed to have been made with intent to delay the operation of the bankrupt law, where the exercise of the powers granted by it would have that effect.... 410

The meaning of the word "future," in section 2 of the bankrupt law, is future with reference to the day on which the act was to take effect..... 398

Adjudication.

An adjudication entered on the 27th day of June, 1874, will be set aside on motion, if the act passed on that day was not complied with..... 149

Commencement of proceedings—Voluntary bankruptcy.

One who holds a debt in a fiduciary capacity is not entitled to the benefit of the bankrupt act, though he is also indebted individually..... 338

A provisional warrant in voluntary proceedings, on proof by affidavit of its necessity, will not be vacated, where such facts are not disproved..... 855

A voluntary petition will be received, notwithstanding a petition for a compulsory decree has been filed, and an order of notice of cause entered..... 8 —— Involuntary bankruptcy.

One who buys paintings from time to time, and sells them at auction, is not a merchant, within the bankrupt act..... 470

Where a voluntary petition in bankruptcy omits the names of some members of the firm which it is asked shall be declared bankrupt, proceedings against the nonjoining partners cannot be made by a creditor... 735

Where debtor in involuntary bankruptcy proceedings declines to defend in form, but is personally present, the court will hear suggestions from any creditor that an insufficient number of persons had joined in the petition.....1057

Bankrupt will be required to make statement in writing under oath, where he is relied on to prove insufficient number of petitioning creditors as suggested by a creditor 1057

Debtor who does not demand jury on return day after continuance cannot afterwards demand jury.....1057

Court, in determining whether sufficient number of creditors have joined in petition, will not consider names of preferred creditors 1057

Assignee—Appointment and removal.

A person residing out of the district, or having an interest adverse to the creditors generally, is disqualified to act as assignee... 810

Where, after an assignee has been appointed, a creditor has been added to the schedules, no new choice of assignee is necessary 172

A general creditor, or the attorney of one, is not necessarily disqualified to act as assignee..... 810

—— Powers and duties.

The repeal of the bankrupt act does not prevent the assignee from suing to reduce the property of the bankrupt to possession 134

The accounts of the assignee must be presented at the second meeting of the creditors, and audited by the register.... 838

The assignee may sue in a state court to recover money paid by the bankrupt in violation of section 39 of the bankrupt act.. 357

A judgment in a state court against an assignee in bankruptcy, directing payment out of the assets in the assignee's hands, does not, alone, furnish legal grounds to the district court, as a court of bankruptcy, for directing payment by the assignee..... 358

Creditors need not object to the assignee's account, except at the meeting called in the twenty-eight section of the act..... 853

Page

Property of bankrupt.

Property held in trust by a bankrupt passes into the control of the assignee until another trustee is appointed..... 123

Lands held for a bankrupt upon a trust resulting upon the payment of the price by him before the bankrupt act was passed belonged to the assignee..... 123

Lands conveyed to a third person by the bankrupt in a secret trust to defraud his creditors passed to the assignee, though conveyed before bankrupt act..... 134

Where a partner sued for a dissolution of the firm, and bankruptcy proceedings were begun against the firm, the amount claimed by the partner on dissolution would be his individual property, which would pass to the assignee for the payment of his separate debts..... 835

The property of the bankrupt passes to the assignee, and is distributable among his creditors, whether he obtains a certificate of discharge or not..... 539

—— Exemptions.

Exemption in favor of a bankrupt is not effected by the fact that his wife owns the household and kitchen furniture.....1123

Under section 14 of the bankrupt act, the assignee, in addition to necessary household and kitchen furniture, can exempt, in favor of the bankrupt, "such other articles and necessaries" as he may think right, the whole exemption not to exceed $500.... 1123

The bankrupt, in addition to the exemption allowed by bankrupt act, is entitled to exemption under the law of his domicile..1123

The assignee must select the property exempted under the bankrupt law, and should refuse to set apart articles of mere luxury.....1123

One need not have either wife or child, to constitute a head of a family.....1123

—— Liens.

A consignor whose property was sold before the bankruptcy of the consignee, and the proceeds mingled with the general assets, has no lien.....1112

A bailee who agrees with the bailor that he will hold the goods for a certain time, and afterwards sell, and pay his claim against the bailor, has a right to sell after such time, though the bailor had in the meanwhile become bankrupt..... 325

A deposit of goods under a contract which will result in a debt brings the goods within the mutual credit laws of the bankrupt act, so that the bailee can set off his debt against the value of the goods..... 325

A creditor's bill to subject defendant's equities to plaintiff's judgment creates a lien, where process was served before a petition was filed to declare defendant a bankrupt 978

Where a lien has been acquired before petition in bankruptcy was filed, enforcement of such lien in state court will not be enjoined, unless fraud is charged..... 978

Bailee of an insolvent's goods, who, before a petition in bankruptcy was filed, employed him to assist in the management of the goods, is entitled to a credit for the amount paid therefor, as against the assignee in bankruptcy..... 303

—— Sale.

Where a person intends to bid at a cash sale of a bankrupt's estate, he may agree to sell on credit to another, when he has no notice that such person has an intent to bid at the sale..... 733

A sale for a bankrupt's estate to the solicitor of the assignee will be set aside.. 733

Proof of debts.

Where a creditor with security makes proof of claim without mentioning it, through ignorance of the law, he will be allowed to withdraw his proof, and be restored to his rights..... 850

When written objections to a proof are filed with a register, and testimony is taken, he must, if requested, certify the same to the district judge for decision..... 851

Rev. St. § 5084, must be construed in connection with the clause of section 5021 prohibiting certain creditors from proving their debts..... 939

Illegally preferred creditor may prove his debt where the property is surrendered to the assignee without suit..... 939

A speculative option commonly called a "put," is a wagering transaction, and is not a debt provable in bankruptcy..... 443

Where, in eminent domain proceedings, a tenant has been paid on a basis of his obligation to pay rent, the landlord can prove up a claim for rent on the bankruptcy of the tenant..... 811

Creditor whose debt was created by fraud of bankrupt does not, by proving claim and taking a dividend, waive his right to sue for the balance.....1047

An order expunging a claim against the bankrupt is not such an adjudication thereof as to prevent the creditor from pleading it as a set-off in an action by the assignee... 303

A deposition filed by a creditor, setting forth a claim for breach of contract, but not asking for assessment of the alleged damages, is not due proof of the debt....1086

Semble, that proof of a debt before a register, and the rejection thereof by the district court and appeal to circuit court, are conditions precedent to creditor's right to sue assignee, but are not an adjudication for or against a claim..... 303

On the hearing of a motion to expunge a proof, the moving party is entitled to open and close..... 3

Where the testimony of the bankrupt is desired on a motion to expunge proof, he should be summoned as a witness..... 3

The answer to a petition to expunge a proof cannot be used as evidence..... 3

Papers annexed to an answer to a petition to expunge a proof must be proved in the usual manner, to be used as evidence.... 3

Payment of debts.

A judgment in favor of the people of the state of New York against a surety on a bail bond given for the appearance of a person indicted for a crime is a debt to the state, and is entitled to priority under the bankrupt law..... 422

Creditors receiving larger per cent. of their debt than the apparent assets justify must be careful that they do not obtain a preference 925

Examination of bankrupt.

Failure of a bankrupt to attend on the adjourned day of his examination cannot be punished as contempt..... 103

On an examination in bankruptcy, questions are proper which elicit an answer tending to show an interest of the bankrupt in property at the time petition was filed.. 172

Where the wife of a member of a bankrupt firm claims certain estate standing in her name, the bankrupt may be examined as to what property the wife owns, and the amount of money that she had at any time.. 848

A bankrupt who is in custody may be produced in court on habeas corpus whenever necessary for further proceedings in bankruptcy before the court or a commissioner 539

Costs—Fees—Disbursements.

On approval of the assignee, the counsel of a bankrupt may be paid from the estate for services in resisting the petition and settling conflicting claims..... 846

Page

The necessary expenses and disbursements of the United States marshal and assignee must be taxed by the register... 101

Review.

Order of district court in exercise of summary jurisdiction in bankruptcy (Bankr. Act 1867, § 1), cannot be reviewed by appeal to the circuit court under section 8.... 259

Order of district court in exercise of summary jurisdiction in bankruptcy is reviewable by petition to the circuit court setting forth proceedings in district court, and asking a review and reversal or modification of the order complained of, and a mere notice of appeal is not "proper process" for invoking a review..... 259

Semble, that the review of an order of the district court in exercise of its summary jurisdiction may be applied for at any time before the order is executed..... 259

A summary proceeding by order to show cause, asking the assignee to be directed to pay a mortgage debt out of the estate, is not a suit, within section 8 of the bankruptcy act, relating to appeals..... 259

The appeal provided for by section 8 of the bankruptcy act can be taken only from a final order..... 259

Discharge.

An involuntary bankrupt may be discharged, unless guilty of some act specified in Act 1867, § 29..... 840

An assignment for the benefit of creditors by debtors after the passage of the bankrupt law, or before it took effect, will not prevent their discharge under the act..... 398

A voluntary bankrupt, whose assets are less than 30 per cent. of the claims proved, and who has not obtained the consent of one-fourth of the creditors in number and one-third in value, is not entitled to discharge under the bankrupt act, as amended June 22, 1874..... 372

A baker who buys flour, which he makes into bread and sells to daily customers, is a tradesman (Bankr. Act 1867, § 29), and is not entitled to discharge unless he has kept proper books of account.....1154

A discharge will be refused where the confession of judgment was voluntarily made by the bankrupt, in order to compel a creditor to reduce his rent, and, if not, to defeat his debt..... 517

A discharge may be granted on an application made more than a year after adjudication 2

A discharge will be granted where the creditors take no steps to defeat the same on the grounds set forth under Rev. St. U. S. § 5110..... 855

The fact that a debt was created by fraud is not a ground for withholding a discharge, but such debt is excepted from the operation of the discharge..... 942

One who was imprisoned under an execution before a petition to declare him a bankrupt was filed is not entitled to a release as soon as he is declared a bankrupt, but he is entitled to be released when he has obtained a certificate of discharge in bankruptcy 539

Quaere whether a discharge in bankruptcy relates back to the commencement of the proceeding, and renders an intermediate imprisonment for debt unlawful..... 539

Prohibited or fraudulent transfers.

The giving of security on a loan is not an illegal preference..... 881

A creditor who enters judgment by confession, and levies execution when he has cause to believe that the debtor is insolvent, obtains an illegal preference..... 881

A creditor releasing the goods of a debtor from an execution, and taking other assets, when the debtor is insolvent, obtains illegal preference..... 881

Bankruptcy act, before the amendment of June 22, 1874, did not require the creditor to know that reasonable cause existed for believing the debtor insolvent..... 939

The existence of a financial crisis constitutes reasonable cause to believe men otherwise in doubtful circumstances to be insolvent 939

To set aside a preference made by an insolvent debtor, it must appear that the creditor receiving it had reasonable cause to believe that a fraud on the bankrupt act was intended..... 281

A conveyance by an insolvent debtor to his creditor, of property on which the creditor had a lien exceeding the value of the property, does not violate section 35 of the bankrupt law..... 307

A judgment against an insolvent, obtained without fraud or collusion, is not void under the bankrupt law..... 307

Notice to a creditor of an act of bankruptcy does not affect a transfer to him, except as tending to show that he had reason to believe the transfer was in fraud of the bankrupt law..... 307

A judgment by confession against an insolvent is a lien created with the implied consent of the debtor, and is in fact a transfer by him to the creditor, and is void under section 35 of the bankrupt law..... 307

A transfer of property by an insolvent which necessarily prefers one creditor is presumed to have been made for the purpose of such preference..... 307

Design to give a preference must be established as a fact..... 470

A pledge of part of the assets of a national bank to secure a loan made by one who knows its embarrassed condition is not a preference..... 262

The preference of creditors prohibited by the bankrupt law is a preference to secure or pay a pre-existing debt..... 262 —— Proceedings to recover property.

Where the property affected by a lien has passed to the assignee, summary proceedings in the bankruptcy court to restrain the enforcement of the lien are proper 841

A district court has power to prohibit any proceeding in a state court by a creditor to enforce a lien on the property of a bankrupt. 841

Where property in possession of an assignee as part of the estate is taken in replevin issued by a state court in a proceeding to which he is not a party, the district court will see that his possession is not forcibly displaced..... 844

An assignee is entitled to a judgment for the value of property seized on execution within four months before the petition by a creditor knowing of the insolvency..... 654

Arrangement with creditors.

Attachments are not dissolved by the acceptance and recording of a resolution of compromise..... 819

Mere delay, without laches, in obtaining requisite number of signatures to a composition, is not ground for refusing to record it 318

Resolution proposing composition of 70 cents, to be paid within 30 days, on condition that all the bankrupt's property be surrendered and all pending suits discontinued, is proper..... 318

BANKS AND BANKING.

The corporate name of the bank incorporated by Act Cong. March 3, 1817, § 23, is "The Central Bank of Georgetown and

Page

Washington," and not "The President and Directors of" said bank..... 357
A bank located in Columbus, Ohio, having power by its charter to deal in bills of exchange generally could deal in exchange through an agent in another city..... 739
Where moneyed capital was taxed $1.05, but a reduction of indebtedness was allowed before the assessment, a similar tax, without a deduction, on national banks, was invalid..... 755
An ordinance of a city imposing a tax nominally on all banks, but from payment of which the state banks had been held exempt, was invalid..... 755
Where different rates of taxation are imposed on different classes of moneyed capital, the rates of taxation on national bank shares should not exceed the rate imposed upon shares in state banks..... 755
The word "insolvency," as used in the currency act of 1864, is synonymous with the same word as used in the bankrupt act, and it is only necessary that insolvency should be in contemplation by the bank making transfers of its assets..... 251
Where a bank accepts stock and notes for which it was given as security, as collateral for a loan, it may sell the stock after the notes become due..... 11
An agreement by a national bank to pledge a portion of its assets to secure loan made to it by a firm is not affected by the fact that the president of the bank was a member of the firm..... 262
A national bank cannot repudiate an unauthorized contract, and at the same time retain the benefit thereof..... 262
The receiver of an insolvent national bank has no greater right to enforce collection of assets than the bank itself would have had..... 262
Where a sufficient fund has been realized from the assets of a national bank, which has been declared in default, to pay all claims against it, and leave a surplus, interest on the claims will be allowed during the period of administration, before appropriating the surplus to the stockholders..... 537
Interest is recoverable on the balance due a depositor in a national bank which has been declared in default by the comptroller of the currency, though he made no formal demand of payment..... 537
Assumpsit by the holder of a claim against a national bank, which had been declared in default, to recover interest during the period of administration, will not lie against the receiver or against the comptroller of the currency, but will lie against the bank 537

BILL OF LADING.

A limitation as to the amount of damages is ineffective against a loss arising from negligence..... 781
Vessel held liable for destruction of cargo by fire caused by a collision through the negligence of the vessel..... 780
Where the owner of a vessel, notwithstanding the charter party, makes special contracts through the master in respect to freight, the bills of lading govern the rights of the parties..... 76

BILLS, NOTES, AND CHECKS.

In an action on a note, where the plea is nonassumpsit, the defendant cannot show damages by a breach of the contract on which the note was given..... 544
A note not payable to plaintiff or order, as charged in the declaration, is inadmissible 159

Page

An assignment of a note must be proved, to entitle the assignee to judgment... 865
A declaration on a bill of exchange is sufficient where it avers that plaintiffs are the holders of a certain bill drawn by defendant's agent, and accepted by him, pursuant to an agreement between the parties; that the bill was drawn on a sufficient consideration; that it was duly accepted by defendant, and was protested for nonpayment. 359
Where a note is payable two years after date, on demand, in an action against the maker it is not necessary to prove special demand 632
In an action by an indorsee against a maker, where the maker has no defense against the payee, he cannot claim the indorsee should recover only so much as is due him from the payee..... 632
In an action on a note, interest need not be demanded in the declaration..... 634
A plea to an action on a note, which avers that the goods for which it is given are valueless, is not good..... 662
Where a bill was accepted by one of a firm without the knowledge of the partners, nor in the course of business, recovery can be had thereon under a count stating it was drawn on "B. & Co.," and accepted by B. by writing the name of "B. & Co." 744
It is no defense to a bank note taken in the usual course of business that it was stolen from the rightful owner..... 746
Where one of the firm accepts a bill of exchange for accommodation, without the knowledge of his partners, the drawer has a right to sell the same, and those taking it, though with knowledge, were bona fide holders 744
Letter written within reasonable time before or after date of bill of exchange, describing it, and promising to accept it, is a virtual acceptance..... 274
Indorsement on a bill of exchange, subsequent to that of the payee, made for the purpose of transmitting and collecting the bill, may be stricken out at the trial in an action by an indorsee..... 274
An action on a bill of exchange may be brought in the name of the owner, without regard to indorsements made for the purpose of transmitting and collecting the bill, though for value..... 274
Qualified acceptance of bill of exchange to amount of proceeds of certain property against which it was drawn, and subsequent application of such proceeds, is a satisfaction only pro tanto..... 274
A letter giving authority to draw bill of exchange at any time, but not referring to the particular bills to be drawn, is a promise to accept, for breach of which one who takes bill on credit thereof may sue..... 274
Where the notary does not find the indorser at home, and leaves a written notice with his family, it is sufficient..... 1
The bankruptcy of a mutual insurance company is no defense to an action by the assignee of a note given for the premium on a policy of insurance..... 60

BOTTOMRY AND RESPONDENTIA.

Where the consignee of a vessel employs her without accounting for her earnings, he cannot enforce bonds on the vessel for wages, insurance, and the like..... 888
A master has no authority to bottomry the ship, where he does not communicate with the owner, though he is able to do so.. 703
A bottomry bond executed by the master of a ship is invalid as to items for advances made without an agreement or reasonable expectation that they were to be secured by bottomry..... 703

Page

A captain cannot bind his owners and their vessel for the payment of mariners' wages for three months after their discharge 13
Where a vessel is liable on a bottomry bond, and the question whether it belonged to the government was doubtful, the question will not be disposed of before appearance, and on motion..... 231
A bottomry bond, made for a larger sum than is due, to defraud underwriters, is void 150

BOUNDARIES.

Courses and distances are controlled by fixed monuments 1003

CARRIERS.

No person is a common carrier who is not a carrier for hire, though the compensation need not be a fixed sum..... 719
Where the master of a vessel, who had taken passage on a steamer to rejoin his vessel, was carried past the place for which he had bought his ticket, he can recover his own personal loss, and damages for the detention of his vessel..... 1
Failure of a vessel to arrive at the port from which a ticket of passage was purchased is not excused by the fact that the vessel was disabled by stress of weather, and the passenger was entitled to recover the passage money paid by him.....1133, 1134
Until a passenger is on board the vessel, he is not subject to casualties or misfortunes occurring through stress of weather or otherwise 1133, 1134
A carrier is not liable for damages to cotton in bales for moisture previous to the time of lading of which the master had no knowledge 646
Where goods are lost after receipt by the carrier, and before delivery, presumption is that it was occasioned by the carrier's neglect 646
Carriers are not liable for damage to goods resulting from the act of the owner.. 646
The term "merchandise," in a charter incorporating a steamboat company for the transportation of merchandise, does not apply to mere evidences of value, such as notes, bills, checks, policies of insurance, and bills of lading..... 719
The transportation of passengers or of merchandise by common carriers does not necessarily imply that the owners are not common carriers of bank notes or specie.. 719
The knowledge of the owners of a vessel that the master carried money for hire will not affect them, unless the hire was on their account, or unless the master hired himself out as their agent in that business.. 719

CENTENNIAL EXHIBITION.

Act Cong. Feb. 16, 1876, appropriating $1,500,000 to the Centennial Exhibition does not require repayment to the United States before stockholders of the exhibition shall be repaid their subscriptions, but only requires repayment before a percentage of the profits is paid to the stockholders..... 352

CERTIORARI.

Certiorari cannot issue from a superior court to bring up from the county court a case for adjudication..... 146

CHARTER PARTY.

Page

Charter party to furnish cargo at certain place is broken where cargo could not be obtained, though it stipulated for purchase of cargo with vessel's funds..... 945
Nominal damages only are recoverable for breach of charter party where libellant fails to prove actual damages, though the agreement binds the parties to a penalty for its breach..... 403
Estimated profits of the voyage cannot be computed as an element of damages for breach of charter party 403

CHATTEL MORTGAGES.

Foreclosure of a chattel mortgage does not affect rights of third person in the mortgaged property 300
A mortgage allowing the mortgagor to retain possession and make sales, and receive the proceeds for his own use, is void in New York..... 31
The assignee in bankruptcy cannot claim that the mortgage is invalid because not renewed under the statutes of New York, if valid when bankruptcy proceedings were commenced 75

CHINESE.

Under the treaty of July 28, 1868, art. 6, Chinamen can reside in the United States on the same terms as the subjects of Great Britain and France..... 497

CITIZEN.

An American citizen may enter the military service of a foreign government without compromising the neutrality of his own, or divesting himself of his rights of citizenship 390
Quaere, whether a native-born American citizen can expatriate himself..... 390

CLAIMS.

Where property was seized and sold, and the proceeds paid into the United States treasury, under the captured and abandoned property act, the question whether the property was in fact captured or abandoned is not open to litigation in the courts, but the only remedy of the person claiming to be the owner is by a proceeding for the proceeds in the court of claims..... 421

COLLISION.

Nature of the liability.

An erroneous maneuver under imminent peril is not chargeable as a fault..... 464
Fault cannot be imputed in deciding on one of two doubtful measures for avoiding a collision which carries the vessel so nearly clear as six feet.....1106
A claim for damages by collision cannot be maintained against the bona fide purchaser of the vessel at mortgage sale..... 506
A movement by a schooner in extremis is no ground for holding her chargeable..... 788

Rules of navigation.

A tug with a line of barges in tow, which is unable to change her course in favor of a sailing vessel, is nevertheless in fault in not making such inability known to the vessel, as required by rule 24..... 385
A vessel will not be pronounced in fault for adhering to a rule of navigation, unless a very clear case for departure is shown..1015
Rule that vessel sailing free must give way to one closehauled applies to pilot boats and other vessels on bays and harbors, as well as on the high seas.....1015

Page

A towboat leaving a landing just outside of a ferry slip and crossing the course of an incoming ferryboat is in fault in not making at once for the center of the stream, as required by the local laws.... 868

Vessel whose jib-boom is standing, contrary to law, is liable for collision happening wholly or in part thereby.....1095

A vessel which goes about at the same time as another vessel on a parallel course, and endeavors to pass such other vessel, is an overtaking vessel.....1106

Article 10 of the regulations for preventing collisions, requiring that a bell shall be sounded at least every five minutes during the fog, means that the bell must be sounded as often as once in five minutes, and as much oftener as the case shall require.... 439

Between steamers.

A steamtug, meeting a steamboat end on, held in fault for starboarding instead of porting 769

A vessel who sees approaching vessel stop her engine is entitled to consider that such approaching vessel intended to allow her to pass her bows, and the sudden starting of the approaching vessel's engine was a fault 328

Owner of disabled ferryboat may recover the value of her use while disabled, though her place was supplied by a spare boat kept for that purpose..... 329

A vessel by whose fault a collision occurs is liable for damages consequent on the stranding of the disabled vessel, resulting from its disabled condition..... 344

Where a ferryboat was crossing the East river, and a steam propeller was coming down, and undertook to pass the bows of the ferryboat, the propeller was liable, as she had the ferryboat on her starboard side 560

Where a propeller coming down a river attempted to cross the bow of a ferryboat crossing the same, instead of going under her stern, she is responsible for the damages 557

Where a propeller coming down a river met a ferryboat crossing on her starboard hand, and the ferryboat kept her course, the propeller would be liable for a collision caused by crossing the bow of the ferryboat 557

Where a tug signaled another to cross, and, being unable to check her progress, a collision ensued, the signaling tug was in fault 519

A steamer, having placed herself in a position involving danger of collision, is responsible for the consequences..... 788

Sail vessels meeting.

Vessel sailing free, which collides with vessel closehauled, must show that all possible care and skill were used by her, and that the collision was the fault of the other vessel, or was inevitable.....1015

A vessel sailing free must get out of the way of one closehauled.....285, 1018

A vessel which is entitled to keep her course has a right to expect the other to be steered clear of her..... 285

A vessel with the wind free, attempting, without necessity, to cross the bows of a vessel closehauled, is liable if a collision ensues 829

Where the injured vessel was in stays, the burden of proof is on the colliding vessel to show she was not in fault..... 515

Steam vessels meeting sailing vessels.

Steamers must give way to sailing vessels with a free wind..... 160

It being shown to be the custom, it was not a fault of a pilot boat to put herself in the path of a steamer, and lower her yawl to put the pilot on board of the steamer.. 799

Page

In a collision in Hell Gate, between a steamer and a schooner, held, that the steamer was in fault in not waiting before turning into a narrow channel, until she knew whether the schooner was intending to turn into the channel or not..... 765

Where a steamer was seasonably seen, and a schooner was kept on her course, the steamer is liable for the collision, though the schooner had no lookout except her master, who was on the quarter deck..... 774

Where a schooner, on meeting a steamer, keeps her course, it is the duty of the steamer to avoid her..... 774

A sailing vessel which collides with a steamer is not in fault where she keeps her course until collision is inevitable..... 344

Where a schooner approaches a steamer having lights at her bow and stern, and luffs to avoid her, supposing her to be anchored, causing a collision, the schooner is in fault 463

Speed: Fogs.

A steamer moving eight miles an hour in a dense fog is not going at a moderate speed, ... 787

A steamship is liable to a sailing vessel for injuries caused by too great speed in a fog 762

Speed of vessel in a fog should be moderate 439

Lights, signals, etc.

A schooner at anchor is in fault where her light is in such position that it is hidden from view by her sails..... 778

Where there was no darkness sufficient to prevent an approaching vessel from seeing a vessel in tow of a tug, failure of the tug to carry lights showing that she had a tow was not a fault causing the collision.. 796

The burden is on the pilot boat to prove that the absence of the masthead light which she should have carried did not contribute to the collision..... 798

A schooner at anchor is in fault for not sounding a bell and blowing a horn on hearing the horn of an approaching ship during a fog..... 439

Lookouts.

Vessels are in mutual fault where collision is caused by failure of both to maintain a proper lookout..... 317

A ship which neglects to have a lookout stationed exclusively for that duty, and leaves the helm unattended, is in fault... 285

Tows: Tugs.

In a collision between a steamboat and a schooner in tow, held, that the steamer was in fault 763

It is the duty of a propeller towing a barge past a vessel at anchor to take great care not to go so near the anchored vessel that a sheer of the barge might cause a collision 351

A propeller which tows a barge past a vessel at anchor, passing so close as to cause a collision between the vessel and the barge, and without keeping a proper lookout astern, is in fault, and solely liable.... 351

Where a vessel in tow collides with another vessel when the tug saw the other vessel, and could have avoided the collision, the tug is liable for part of the damages 1095

Where an oil barge in tow of a tug sagged against the vessels at the end of a pier by force of the tide, they were not guilty of negligence 513

In the absence of instructions from the pilot in charge of a ship to the tug having it in tow, as to its course on approach of a schooner, it was the duty of the tug to navigate so as to avoid a collision..... 801

Page

In a collision between a schooner and a ship in tow, the ship must be regarded as under steam, as she was moving by steam alone, though it was 250 yards away..... 801

Where a tug tows a ferryboat on fire from her slip, the burden of proof was on the tug to show that she was not in fault in towing the ferryboat against a schooner at anchor 824

It is the duty of a ship in tow to keep away from a schooner under sail, which is keeping on its course..... 801

Vessels moored, etc.

Where a schooner breaks away from the pier, and runs into a canal boat and beaches her, and she is injured by a storm, the schooner is liable for the damages from a collision and from the subsequent storm.. 660

A steamboat under way, colliding with a schooner at anchor in a customary place, held presumptively in fault..... 778

Where a schooner moored for the winter at a pier broke adrift, and ran into a canal boat and beached her, she is liable for the damages 659

A vessel at anchor at a breakwater in a storm is in fault in not having a watch on deck, and cannot recover against a vessel for a collision..... 823

Where a vessel at anchor in a gale is run into by another vessel, having no person on board, the latter is liable, notwithstanding the custom in the harbor to leave vessels at anchor without any one on board 819

Particular instances.

A steamer meeting a schooner closehauled held in fault for failing to keep a proper lookout, or to slacken speed..... 71

Where a collision is caused by the misconduct of a pilot employed by the owner not under compulsion by the statute, the vessel is liable..... 100

The loss of a ferryboat, which, while in a sinking condition from a collision, collides with another vessel and sinks, was not increased by the second collision, and it is immaterial whether or not the second colliding vessel was in fault..... 387

Evidence in collision between a steamer and schooner in the night considered, and held that those in charge of the steamer were negligent in not seeing her sooner... 780

No reason being shown for the change of course of a steamer, thereby causing a collision, she was held in fault..... 786

Where a steamboat passes a tow without much reduction of speed, whereby the tow was damaged by the swell, the steamboat was liable 644

A steamboat meeting a tow, if she cannot pass at a safe distance, must reduce her speed to prevent injury to the tow by the swell 645

Evidence examined, and held that a collision between a steamer and a pilot boat was not due to the want of the masthead light on the pilot boat..... 799

Evidence in collision at a slip considered, and held that both parties are in fault.... 791

In a collision between a steamer and a pilot boat at sea, held the steamer was at fault, in not stopping still before she reached the pilot boat..... 798

The towing of a ferryboat on fire out of the slip, by a hempen hawser, which was likely to burn, was negligence on the part of the tug, and the drifting of the ferryboat against a schooner at anchor was the result of such negligence..... 824

Procedure.

Testimony of practical seamen, as experts, is admissible to show whether circumstances required a departure from the rules of navigation.....1106

Page

A libel must set out the facts relied on to charge the vessel with fault..... 464

Where the answer admits failure to have lights, the burden of proof is on the vessel to show freedom from fault..... 464

Opinion evidence as to the value of a vessel is admissible where she has no market price 326

Where the negligence of one of two vessels jointly liable is proven the decree may be against her alone..... 519

Libel caused by the joint negligence of two vessels may be maintained jointly against them 519

After a decree for libellants, and while a reference as to damages was pending, insurers who have paid the loss of the cargo may be made colibellants..... 791

The insurer of a cargo may be admitted as a party to settle its rights to a share of the recovery..... 792

A colliding vessel, which violated the law, must prove that the collision was not due to such violation..... 439

First question in a suit in rem for collision is whether the vessel sued was in fault, and until that fact is established the question whether libellant was in fault does not arise 439

Where both vessels were in fault, and an apportionment of damages was decreed, and no cross libel was filed, costs will be allowed to party who recovers..... 767

Rule of damages.

Where two steam vessels were held liable to the owners of a schooner, and the damages were apportioned between them, and one vessel was of less value than the amount of damages, the difference could not be recovered against the other vessel.. 771

Where both vessels are in fault, the damages will be apportioned..... 765

Where a steamer is liable for collision with a schooner, and two of the schooner's men jumped on board the steamer, the loss of the men, if crippling her, was chargeable to the steamer..... 762

Where ferryboat injured by collision was withdrawn for repairs, and its place supplied by another boat, evidence of the value of her use, based on the receipts, shows that she was valuable, though there is no evidence that she could have been chartered for any sum during the time she was laid up 326

The rule that the market value of the vessel is the criterion of her value does not apply where she has no market value..... 326

Owner cannot abandon vessel as being a total loss where she has been sunk, but could be raised for small sum, compared with her value..... 952

Owners of injured vessel, who make repairs, may recover as part of damages the usual additional charge for use of tools, etc., and also for the services of superintendent 326

Where damages were adjudged to be divided, insurance money received by one of the steamers was not to be deducted from the share which the other was adjudged to pay 18

Demurrage may be considered in estimating damages 18

Where two steamboats were both in fault, the damages would be divided..... 18

After a vessel has been repaired, additional work necessary to make the vessel good will not be allowed for..... 519

COMMISSIONERS.

The commissioners have no power to issue attachments returnable to the circuit courts of the United States..... 642

COMPOSITION WITH CREDITORS.

Page

Where the debtor compromises with certain of his creditors in consideration of his discharge, and gives a better security to one than to others, the composition is void.. 666

CONFLICT OF LAWS.

The law of the state in which is situated a railroad mortgaged to secure bonds governs as to the rate of interest, where it appears that the parties contracted with reference to such law, though the bonds were made payable in a larger city in another state 1157

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

Const. Mo. art. 11, § 4, exempting persons from liability for acts during the Civil War by virtue of military authority vested in them by the government, is valid..... 865

Act Cong. 1863, providing for the transfer of actions for personal trespass committed by virtue of military authority during the late war to the federal courts, is constitutional 865

Law declaring lawful a bridge over the Mississippi which obstructs navigation is not unconstitutional because of a treaty with France securing free navigation....1060

Law authorizing bridge over navigable river is a regulation of commerce.....1060

A law dividing the railroads in the state into different classes based on their earnings, and prescribing a rate of charges for each class, is not unconstitutional..... 594

Power of congress to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several states includes the power to regulate navigation 680

CONTRACTS.

Where one party refuses to do something necessary to enable the other party to perform the contract, the latter may abandon it 466

A party who abandons a contract on the failure of the other party to perform a material part is not liable..... 466

Where a contract provides that the estimate of an engineer as to the amount and value of the work shall be conclusive unless objected to within 20 days, an objection as to the quality alone waives an objection as to the quantity..... 101

Where plaintiff agrees to build certain bridges, to be paid partly in cash and partly in stock, he was entitled to pay in cash for extra work necessary to be done.. 630

Where a contract covers various undertakings, and plaintiff complains of the breach of one, he waives any right as to the others 634

An action on a charter party cannot be maintained by one who is not a party thereto, though it recites that one of the parties is the agent for such person, but the covenants are with the agent who executed it in his own name, without reference to the alleged party in interest..... 936

COPYRIGHT.

Copyright law is intended to encourage learning, and not mere industry..... 999

Literary production may be copyrighted, though printed on single sheet..... 999

A newspaper is not a subject of copyright 999

An inchoate intended publication is not the subject of copyright, as such right extends to the book only, and not to the subject 356

Where an officer of the British navy files a declaration of intent to become a citizen, but, trouble with Canada seeming imminent, he offers his services to that province, he is not a resident, within the meaning of the copyright act of 1831..... 58

The work must be published within a reasonable time after filing the title page.. 68

No suit can be maintained for infringement without evidence of copyright in complaint 521

Where the judges of the court prepared the headnotes to their opinions, the reporter has no copyright in the volumes he edits 521

Substantial damages cannot be allowed where the matters charged have not prejudiced complainant 521

CORPORATIONS.

Quaere, whether the misnomer of a corporation must be pleaded in abatement... 357

At common law the property of a foreign corporation cannot be attached to compel its appearance 974

A foreign corporation may sue in another jurisdiction 974

St. Mass. 1821, c. 28, relating to the individual liabilities of stockholders, applied, not only to debts in a strict sense, but liabilities incurred by the corporation..... 235

An assessment is necessary to the liability of a subscriber to stock in an incorporated company 459

An indorsement of a note by the president and cashier transfers the note to the indorsee 630

Where a corporation, in payment of a debt, takes its own stock, it has authority to sell the same..... 632

A creditor of a corporation cannot sue the directors thereof for gross negligence in the management of its affairs..... 888

The original subscribers to a corporation are bound by the alterations of a charter made with the consent of the corporation.. 569

Installments due by subscribers to the Chesapeake & Ohio canal may, under the Virginia statute, be recovered on motion, with costs 569

A bankrupt act does not furnish the sole remedy for winding up insolvent corporations 459

COSTS.

It is in the discretion of the court to stay proceedings in a second suit until the costs of the first are paid, but stay will only be granted on the ground of vexation.....1148

Security for costs will not be required on a libel for a seaman's wages, where the answer was "forfeiture for desertion," and an attachment was issued after hearing on the summons, but such defense was not then interposed 426

COUNTIES.

Counties in Iowa can issue bonds for borrowed money if authorized by a public vote 107

Bonds under the seal, and signed by the proper officers, of the county, reciting that they are issued under a vote of the people, are presumptively valid..... 107

In an action on county bonds, a holder need not allege compliance with the conditions on which the issue was authorized.. 598

COURTS.

In general.

Organization of the federal court by the judiciary act, and the purpose of congress

Page

in creating new circuit judgeships, commented on 714

Comparative authority of federal and state courts.

A circuit court will not enjoin actions pending in a state court..... 749

The sale of mortgaged property under foreclosure in a state court will not be enjoined at the instance of prior mortgagees not parties in the state court..... 72

Common-law courts of Massachusetts have no power to adjust maritime liens on a fund attached under the state law..... 92

A federal court cannot restrain prosecution of a suit pending in a state court, but may act upon the parties who are suitors in the federal court in relation to the same subject-matter 747

Where, pending an action for dissolution of a firm, it was adjudged a bankrupt, and the interest of the partner bringing the action passed to the assignee in bankruptcy, the federal court had no power to take the property from the possession of a receiver appointed by the state court in the action for an accounting, though the interest of both partners had passed to the assignee.. 835

Federal courts—Jurisdiction in general.

While one court of competent jurisdiction has custody of property, no other court of concurrent jurisdiction can acquire jurisdiction of it..... 692

An allegation that a party is a resident of a state is not sufficient to give the federal court jurisdiction, but it must be alleged that he is a citizen..... 291

It is not a fraud on the law to remove from one state to another for the purpose of acquiring a right to sue in the federal court, where there is no intention to return 291

One who leaves his domicile and goes to another state to obtain employment will not be considered a citizen of the latter state, so as to give the federal courts jurisdiction, in the absence of proof that he intended a permanent residence there..... 307

Averment of citizenship is necessary to give jurisdiction to the federal court, and must be proved under the general issue... 291

To constitute a person a citizen of the state, so as to sue in the United States court, he must have a domicile in such state 254

An indorsee of a note may sue the indorser, who is a citizen of another state, in the federal courts, though the maker and payee were citizens of the same state.....1164

Where a note is indorsed by the payee "to bearer" before the note is put in circulation, a holder who is a citizen of a different state from such indorser may sue him in a federal court, though he was a citizen of the same state as the maker.....1162

United States courts, under Rev. St. § 915, have no authority to institute suits of foreign attachment 642

It seems that if the payee of a note after maturity, and before suit brought, becomes a citizen of the same state as the maker, he cannot sue in the federal courts..... 415

The words in section 11 of the judiciary act of 1789, "unless a suit might have been prosecuted * * * if no assignment had been made," refers to the time when the suit was commenced..... 415

The assignee of a promissory note may sue on it in the federal court if the assignor might have done so at the time the suit was commenced 415

The payee of a note who was at the time a resident of the same state as the maker, but afterwards removed therefrom, may sue on the note in the federal court..... 415

Page

Bond given by city to railroad company in same state cannot be sued in federal courts 962

Interest coupons, though payable to bearer, cannot be sued on in federal court unless the bonds to which they were attached were suable in such court..... 962 —— Superior courts.

The superior court, since the act of October 22, 1828, has only appellate jurisdiction 923

—— Circuit courts.

The organization of the circuit court for the district of Missouri is peculiar, and is provided for by Act Cong. March 31, 1857.. 714

The circuit court has power to prohibit a nonresident plaintiff from prosecuting an action against a resident defendant..... 749

Where a bankrupt has possession of property claimed by the assignee, and the bankrupt claims to hold it as agent of a third person, the circuit court has jurisdiction.. 118

Trover by an assignee for property belonging to the bankrupt lies in the circuit court against the bankrupt and one claiming title 123

A circuit court has jurisdiction to review a judgment of the supreme court reversing a judgment of the circuit court, on proof that both judgments were obtained by fraud 874

The power of the circuit court to review proceedings in bankruptcy is not limited by the amount involved..... 844

The circuit court of the District of Columbia can discharge an apprentice on account of the cruelty of the master, and bind him out to another..... 18

Circuit court of the United States cannot entertain a bill of revivor where the parties are citizens of the same state, though the original parties were citizens of different states 972 —— District courts.

Act Cong. April 10, 1869, providing for the appointment of circuit judges, and declaring who should hold circuit courts, did not affect the right of the district judges in Missouri to sit in the circuit court..... 714

The district courts in bankruptcy have jurisdiction to grant injunctions without notice 86

The district court has exclusive jurisdiction of all controversies between the assignee and the bankrupt, depending on his relation as such..... 118

The district court has power to issue an attachment against a nonresident of the district 266

A district court of the southern district of Ohio has jurisdiction of a seizure on the Ohio side of the Ohio river at high-water mark 528 —— Administration of state laws and decisions.

Statute of New Hampshire relating to actions by administrator does not govern the federal courts in equity..... 218

A construction given by a state court to the act of limitations of the state will be enforced by the United States bankruptcy court 38

A federal court will give to a discharge under the insolvent law of a state the same effect it has in the state where granted... 462

Decision by state court that railroad was not built as authorized by its charter is binding on federal courts within the state, though no judgment or decree was rendered 1044

A federal court may enforce rights under state statutes as well as under acts of congress in any proceeding at common law... 925

Federal courts—Procedure. Page

No state law can, proprio vigore, affect the process of federal courts..... 286

A provision in a state attachment act that a motion to discharge property attached may be made in vacation is not applicable to the federal courts..... 807

Act Cong. May 19, 1828, § 3, assimilating the process of the federal courts to proceedings then used in the courts of the several states, applies only to existing state laws.. 286

COVENANTS.

A party may sue without averring performance, where the consideration has been accepted by defendant, and plaintiff has no other remedy than on the covenant, and any breach by plaintiff may be paid for in damages 1170

A covenant which goes only to part of the consideration on both sides, and a breach of which may be paid for damages, is an independent covenant, and an action for breach may be maintained without averring performance in the declaration..1170

CUSTOM AND USAGE.

A former course of dealing between A. and a broker is not admissible to explain a contract between A. and B., made through the same broker, if unknown to B., and not founded on a general usage of trade..... 325

Quaere, whether usages and customs can be introduced as evidence to control the construction of contracts and the principles of law 719

CUSTOMS DUTIES.

Customs laws.

Under Act Aug. 30, 1842, § 16, assessing duties, all costs and charges are to be included in actual market value.....1128

The commercial meaning of "blanket," in the tariff act of 1857, is to be traced only to the time of the passage of that act..... 651

The tariff act of 1857 operated simply as a reduction as to duties of the act of 1846 653

Act Cong. March 2, 1799, as amended by act of 1816, authorizing collectors to pay fees due to officers of the customs out of the revenue of the United States, creates no lien on money in his hands, arising from the revenue 438

An ex-collector cannot appropriate moneys of the United States in his hands in payment of fees due to officers of the customs (Act March 2, 1799), as such authority can be exercised only by the collector actually in office..... 438

Logs purchased for exportation are, while awaiting shipment, though still on land, "exports," within Const. art. 10, § 1, prohibiting imposts or duties on exports..... 943

Under the treasury regulations of February 17, 1849, an importer, before he can use his own store for the deposit of importations, must indorse on the entry an agreement to pay an amount equal to the salary of the inspector, or one-half storage..... 900

Where importations were deposited by the importer in his own store under Act March 28, 1854, the importer was liable for half storage 900

Rates of duty.

Value of goods purchased in bulk, and afterwards put in a packing house for convenience, does not include cost of packing..1128

Under Act June 30, 1864, § 8, "ribbons" must be read "silk ribbons."..... 500

Under Tariff Act July 14, 1832, § 2, subd. 2, worsted carpet bindings are not chargeable with the duty of 25 per cent..... 583

Rate of duty on wine imported in bottles, each containing more than a pint and less than a quart, is controlled by actual cost of the wine, and not by its cost estimated on the supposition that each bottle contained a quart 319

Under Act March 3, 1869, the dutiable value of merchandise is the actual market value or wholesale price at period of exportation in country from which it was exported, exclusive of commissions, etc.....1128

Payment—Protest—Appeal.

The protest, under Act Feb. 26, 1845, is insufficient, which does not set forth distinctly the grounds of objection to the appraisement, or wherein the appraisers were disqualified 652

Violations of law—Forfeiture.

Where goods, the property of a foreign manufacturer, are consigned to the party who entered them, the latter is not liable to a penalty for undervaluation, under Act March 30, 1846, § 8..... 652

Evidence is not sufficient to sustain forfeiture of vessel for smuggling where the only evidence was that of the seamen who were arrested in the act of smuggling, and promised immunity if they would testify against the vessel.....1029

Where there was, through mistake, an error in an invoice and entry, and a correct invoice was obtained, a penalty for undervaluation should not be imposed..... 90

Where property is forfeited, it does not vest in the government until after a seizure 909

A vessel receiving smuggled goods is not liable to forfeiture..... 909

DAMAGES.

Damages for breach of contract cannot extend to probable profits..... 466

DEDICATION.

A dedication to public uses by parties in possession prior to the donation act of September 27, 1850, does not affect such land in the hands of persons succeeding in such possession 487

A dedication alleged to have been made within the memory of living witnesses cannot be proved by reputation..... 487

DEED.

Where an instrument was signed, but left with a third person without any authority to deliver it to the grantee, there is no delivery 138

DEMURRAGE.

Where a charter party contained no provision as to the discharge of a cargo, and the usual time for unloading such a cargo was 15 days, no claim for demurrage could exist until the expiration of the 15 days.. 67

Where there is no contract that demurrage shall depend on the earnings of freight, demurrage for detention at an intermediate port is due at such port..... 94

Where a bill of lading provided for demurrage after lay days beginning 24 hours after arrival and notice, and the vessel, on account of ice, cannot land at the consignee's wharf, lay days begin to run 24 hours after notice to the consignee that she had been taken to another wharf..... 648

DEPOSITION.

Page

Service of notice of taking the deposition by leaving a copy at the place of abode of the adverse party is insufficient..... 159

A disagreement between parties as to interrogatories should be referred to a master in chancery to be settled by him subject to the review of the court on appeal from the report 1150

Exceptions to interrogatories are waived unless they are propounded as objections before the commission issues.....1150

A magistrate who takes a deposition under an act of congress (1 Stat. 73) need not certify that deponents subscribed it in his presence 368

Title of cause in which deposition is taken under act of congress (1 Stat. 73) must be truly stated in the certificate of the caption 368

DISCOVERY.

Defendant may be required to produce books and papers before trial for plaintiff's inspection 357

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

A ratification by congress of a charter granted the canal company by Virginia makes it an act of congress as to such district 563

EJECTMENT.

A purchaser at a sheriff's sale of an equitable estate has no title on which to maintain ejectment 174

Act Cong. July 1, 1862, granting a right of way to the Central Pacific Railroad Company 200 feet wide on each side of the track, gives an exclusive right of possession, for which the company may maintain ejectment 363

A person making a void entry on the Virginia military district of Ohio, having a patent, is entitled to improvements under the occupying claimant law..... 634

EMINENT DOMAIN.

To condemn land for the use of a canal is to take private property for public use.. 563

The company condemning the land is the sole judge of what interest will be necessary for its operations..... 570

An inquisition condemning more land than necessary will be set aside..... 569

A reference in the inquisition to the description of the land in the warrant is sufficient 561

It is not necessary that the inquisition contain the names of jurors summoned, but not sworn 561

The jury should describe the boundaries of the land, and the quality and duration of the estate in the same..... 570

Where several warrants have been returned with inquisitions, and each inquisition refers to the warrant returned therewith, it can be shown by parol which warrant is applicable to each inquisition..... 570

A day certain must be fixed in the warrant for the meeting of the jury, and the want thereof is fatal..... 563

The assessment of damages by a jury fulfills the requirement that no private property shall be taken for public use without compensation 563

Where a charter does not require notice to the party whose lands are to be condemned, the inquisitions need not state that such notice has been given..... 570

Page

It is not necessary that the inquisition state the value of the land separately from the damages 570

EQUITY.

A bill is multifarious which mingles independent claims of plaintiff with those which he has as administrator..... 218

A bill to cancel an agreement is defective which does not bring the proper parties before the court, and alleges mistake, without fraud, as a ground for relief..... 218

A deed of trust, which, by mistake, states that it secures a certain note, may be reformed so as to secure a bond..... 939

A bond given for the price of property will be canceled where the vendor, in default of the payment, conveys the property to a third person 282

Cause in equity, in which no appeal lies to the supreme court, may be reheard, if petition is filed before end of next term after final decree..... 987

Equity can control the manner in which one railroad shall cross another, when not regulated by statute..... 590

It is no ground for setting aside the subscription to corporate stock that defendant did not understand he was liable to installments on the stock..... 562

A bank is a proper party complainant to enjoin a collection of a tax upon its shares assessed against its stockholders..... 755

ESTOPPEL.

One who recommends an invention to another, disclaiming all interest therein, is estopped from claiming a prior invention.... 163

EVIDENCE.

A letter-press copy made at the same time cannot be received as an original paper.... 468

A bill of lading cannot be contradicted by parol 468

Where books produced under notice are not allowed to be used by the other side, parol evidence of their contents is competent 123

Parol evidence is admissible to show what is reasonable time for performance of written contract which does not specify any time 1151

Where the policy on the cargo was expressed to be on account of owner, parol evidence is admissible to show who were intended 291

Expert testimony is to be considered like any other testimony..... 195

Expert testimony is not admissible to prove that a rule of navigation does not exist in a particular locality.....1015

Witnesses experienced in the special business of ferriage without New York City may testify as to the value of use of ferryboat in such waters..... 329

Where the testimony in a case is mere matter of opinion, the jury cannot decide according to the number of witnesses alone, but must consider their intelligence, and the manner in which they testify.....1144

The record of a suit in admiralty brought by a trustee is admissible, in favor of the cestuis que trustent, to show the recovery, and the title on which it rested..... 674

A sworn copy of a paper is not evidence, unless the witness states that he compared it with the original..... 314

A duly-certified copy of the register of a ship, transmitted, on loss of the vessel, to the register of the treasury, to be canceled, is legal evidence 291

Page

As a surrogate acts in the capacity of clerk and judge, he must certify as to the authentication under the act of congress.. 314

Where a policy refers to representations of the assured, and provides that they are to be true, evidence outside the record is admissible to show that they were..... 889

An old entry in a memorandum book, stating the ages of the members of the writer's family, is admissible to prove age of a witness 829

An answer by one who is charged with a forfeiture under a law of the United States is not admissible against him in an action brought against him for a penalty under the same law 930

Declarations of a bankrupt were properly admitted in evidence on the trial of a suit between his assignee and a third person as to title to certain property..... 844

EXECUTION.

A sale of property under execution will not be enjoined where it is averred that no legal injury will result to the execution debtor from such sale..... 404

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS.

An administrator may sue in the circuit court of New Hampshire as a citizen of Maine, if he takes out letters of administration in New Hampshire..... 218

An execution de bonis propriis is the proper process against executor on a decree in equity for the balance of the administration account 291

Declaration by executor need not state by whom the letters testamentary were granted 322

An orphans' court cannot annex conditions to the payment of the dividend on a judgment recovered against the intestate.. 563

A defendant who pleads general issue in an action by executor appointed in another state on a cause of action arising in testator's lifetime cannot, on the trial, require plaintiff to produce letters testamentary... 436

FACTORS AND BROKERS.

Where a sale is made in disregard of instructions, the consignor may recover damages 468

FRAUD.

Where fraud is charged, evidence tending to prove it, though it be slight, is admissible 118

FRAUDS, STATUTE OF.

Goods in United States bonded warehouse, on which duties have not been paid, are in possession of the United States; and an order therefor from the owner, though accepted by the warehouseman, is not a sufficient delivery or receipt and acceptance, under the statute of frauds.....1050

A memorandum, "Received $1,000, to be accounted for if the parties shall furnish satisfactory security for certain lands, say 119,000 acres for $113,000, on or before Friday morning next, otherwise to be forfeited," is a sufficient memorandum of sale.... 858

A parol contract in Virginia in 1787 for land in Kentucky, where the consideration was paid, was not void..... 154

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES.

See, also, "Bankruptcy."

Page

Where a conveyance is absolute in form, but is in fact only a mortgage, the land is liable on execution, subject to the mortgage charged 613

A deed of manumission by a resident to his slaves pending a suit by his wife for alimony is fraudulent and void, if made to prevent her from recovering her claim.... 808

The question whether the sale of a vessel was fraudulent cannot be raised by third parties 819

A chattel mortgage is void, as against the creditors of the mortgagor, where it is the intention of the parties that the mortgaged property should remain in possession of the mortgagor, and to be used and disposed of by him 300

Leases of property of insolvent railroad company for indefinite time tends to hinder or delay its creditors.....1030

Deed by corporation to its directors is void as against creditors of corporation...1030

Conveyance by insolvent to his mother for expressed consideration of an account due to her, and conveyance by her immediately afterwards to her daughter in consideration of natural love and affection, are indications of bad faith..... 991

A conveyance by an insolvent to his mother, which recites an alleged account, as the consideration thereof, is fraudulent, where it had been running for 23 years without a demand for payment, and it appears that some of the items had been guessed at, and the account was first reduced to writing when the conveyance was made 991

A gratuity cannot afterwards be converted into a debt, so as to support a conveyance to the prejudice of the grantor's creditors 991

GAMING.

A sale for future delivery is not invalid, as a gaming contract, unless the intention that there should not be actual performance was mutual 955

A valid contract of sale for future delivery is not rendered illegal by a subsequent settlement by payment of difference..... 955

GENERAL AVERAGE.

If the cargo or ship, or any part of either, be voluntarily sacrificed or exposed to danger for the common safety, the part saved shall contribute to repair the loss sustained, provided the object for which the sacrifice was made be obtained..... 332

An intention to consign to inevitable loss goods thrown overboard is not necessary to authorize a claim for general average.

It is sufficient to justify a claim to contribution if the danger sought to be avoided is so imminent that the measure adopted may be beneficial to all..... 332

Where a ship is landed to avoid capture, and before she is boarded a large part of her cargo is saved, there can be no contribution, because the object for which the ship was being exposed was not obtained.. 332

GIFTS.

Choses in action may be the subject of gifts causa mortis..... 460

Money on deposit may be delivered as a gift causa mortis by delivery of the certificate of deposit 460

GRANT.

Mexican land grant held entitled to confirmation under United States v. Rodriguez, Case No. 16,184..... 283

Page

A grant by a political chief for the time being of Alta California was not invalid, though it did not receive the previous approbation of the territorial deputation.... 380

A Mexican land grant will be confirmed where the conditions as to cultivation and habitation annexed to the grant have been performed 387

Section 7, Act Cong. July 1, 1862, granting land to the Central Pacific Railroad Company, which required the company, within two years, to designate the route of the road and file a map, did not affect the grant of the right of way, but only furnished the means by which the land taken by the railroad could be withdrawn from private entry 364

Act Cong. July 1, 1862, granting land to the Central Pacific Railroad Company, was a present grant, operating immediately on the passage of the act..... 364

A grant by a political chief of Alta California was not invalid because the lands were not within the limits of a mission, or within 10 leagues of the seacoast, or because the approbation of the supreme executive did not appear, though it had been obtained... 380

Conditions in a grant that the grantee should build and inhabit a house within a certain time, and obtain judicial possession of the land, are conditions subsequent.... 380

The railroad companies to which land was regranted on the failure of original grantees to build the roads do not hold the lands subject to any trust in favor of the creditors of the state or of the former companies 417

GUARANTY.

Where notes issued by the trustee of two railroad companies are indorsed by one of the companies that it guaranties payment, principal and interest, according to its tenor, and orders the contents to be paid to bearer, such company is liable on the notes as guarantor 1157

HABEAS CORPUS.

Where an internal revenue officer is held under an indictment in a state court for an offense committed under color of the laws of United States, a petition for a writ must be brought under the seventh section of the act of March 2, 1833..... 171

Where a discharge is asked on the ground that the indictment did not aver an offense against the United States in the district in which an indictment was found, the indictment will be sustained unless so defective that it would be the duty of the court before which it was presented to refuse to take action on it..... 833

Whether, in a proceeding before a commissioner for release on habeas corpus, an indictment under which petitioner is held can be examined, quaere..... 833

HUSBAND AND WIFE.

A chose in action accruing to a married woman survives to her unless the husband reduces it to possession during his lifetime.. 503

Where a husband has reduced a legacy to a wife to his possession, a promise to pay to the wife a sum equal to the proceeds is not supported by the right of the wife to interpose in equity to prevent her husband from so taking possession..... 3

A note and check given by a husband to a wife do not support a trust, though the note bears the indorsement to the effect that it was given for money accruing to the wife from her father's estate..... 3

Page

A legacy to a wife of a share of the residue of her father's estate, including proceeds of lands and stocks, does not constitute a separate estate under the Delaware statute of 1865 3

INDIANS.

The territory of Alaska, under Act March 3, 1873, became, as to the introduction of liquors, "Indian country," and the military force of the United States may be employed for the arrest of persons violating the Indian intercourse act of 1834..... 115

No person arrested by military authority in the Indian country for selling liquors contrary to law can be detained more than five days before the delivery to the civil authorities for trial..... 115

INFANCY.

A contract by a minor to serve as a seaman with the assent of his father does not bind the minor or his father after he obtained his majority.....1200

In a suit against an infant, notice should be served on him and the guardian ad litem appointed 154

INJUNCTION.

One who has broken a mutual covenant cannot enjoin the other parties from violating the covenant.....1103

Injunction will not lie against equitable owner of patent on application of legal owner 1097

Where right to temporary injunction depends merely on the interpretation of a written instrument, the court should interpret it, and grant or refuse the injunction accordingly 1097

An injunction will lie to restrain a trespass causing irreparable mischief..... 497

Where complainant's equity is not clear, a preliminary injunction should not be granted unless the damage is irreparable.. 11

A projected publication will not be protected by injunction..... 356

Publication of a libel injurious to plaintiff's business will be enjoined only when it appears that the statement is malicious as well as false..... 345

A collection of a tax may be enjoined where the law authorizing it is invalid, or its enforcement would lead to a multiplicity of suits 755

Federal courts are prohibited by Rev. St. § 720, except in certain cases in bankruptcy, from enjoining proceedings in any court of a state 406

An injunction will be dissolved on bill and answer where the charges are denied, though in part on information, where that part was corroborated by the bill..... 204

Where a party acting under competent advice, and with no intention of disobeying the order of the court, violates an injunction, no fine will be imposed, but he will pay the costs of the application..... 191

INSPECTION.

In action for penalty for altering inspector's marks on flour, the marks and alterations need not be set out.....1083

Flour inspected under the Virginia act of December 21, 1792, must be branded "Condemned," or it is not within section 10 nor 15 1083

INSURANCE.

Mere expression of opinion does not constitute material misrepresentation..... 990

Page

A misrepresentation of a material fact is fatal, though made by an agent without the knowledge of the principal..... 105
False representation, to avoid policy, must be material, either in relation to rate of premium or as offering false inducement to risk 990
Where material facts are suppressed in representations made a part of the policy, the insurance is avoided..... 889
Where a material change is made in the mode of using property insured, and no notice is given at the time or before the renewal, old and new policies are void..... 889
Policy against loss "by fire originating in any cause except design in the insured" covers loss where building is left vacant, and is burned by intruders..... 310
Conditions are to be construed strictly against those for whose benefits they are intended, when they impose burdens on the other party 310
A recital in a policy that the premises insured are "to be occupied hereafter as a tavern, and privileged as such," is not a warranty that the house should be constantly occupied as a tavern..... 310
A clause avoiding liability in case of the death of the insured by his act or intent, whether sane or insane, is valid..... 481
Condition in policy of reinsurance that reinsurer shall pay pro rata at and in the same time and manner as the reinsured, means that the reinsurer shall have all the advantages specified in the policy of the reinsured, and does not refer to the insolvency of the reinsured 270
Condition, in policy of reinsurance, for immediate notice of loss, means that the notice must be given in a reasonable time under the circumstances..... 270
Service of copies of proofs of loss and notice is sufficient if not objected to at the time 270
Provision in policy requiring notice of loss and "a particular account of such loss or damage" requires an account of the articles lost, and does not refer to the manner and cause of the loss..... 310
Proofs of loss need not negative exceptions of losses from design, etc., which are matters of defense..... 310
Where the insurer refuses payment because the policy has been canceled, a proof of loss is waived..... 87
In assumpsit on a policy with accounts for money had and received, plaintiff can recover premiums paid, though the policy did not attach 889
The burden of proof is on the insurer to show willful burning..... 87
An adjudication of bankruptcy terminates the interest of a bankrupt in a policy, and it is void unless assigned to the assignee..... 101
Where a mutual insurance company was authorized to insure for premiums "to be paid in cash, as insurance companies not mutual are accustomed to do," the company could accept a note for such premium instead of cash..... 60

INTEREST.

Interest is not recoverable on a debt owing by an inhabitant of Oregon to an inhabitant of Arkansas while the latter state was in insurrection 503
Where the trustees on foreclosure allow time on the price at a reasonable interest, the debt secured by the deed continues to bear its original interest..... 194

INTERNAL REVENUE.

Act July 13, 1866, § 23, does not prevent the owner of goods seized unlawfully from suing the seizing officer for trespass..... 45
Under Act July 13, 1866, § 70, a retail or other dealer offering canned goods for sale after August 1, 1866, was to be deemed the manufacturer thereof, and such goods were liable to a duty..... 45
The court has power to authorize an assessor to amend his application for attachment for contempt against a taxpayer for not producing his books, and giving evidence concerning his liability for the income tax 401
An assessor has no right, in order to determine liability for income tax, to examine books of third persons who have had dealings with the taxpayer..... 401
On the application by an assessor for an attachment for contempt against a taxpayer for not producing his books and giving evidence as to his liability for the income tax, the court may issue an order to show cause, instead of proceeding ex parte..... 401
Certificates of stock representing the pro rata interest of stockholders in a railroad foreclosed by the corporation issuing the stock are not dividends, within Act July 1, 1862, the mortgage representing advances made 600
A tax of 1-24 of 1 per cent. each month on deposits subject to check is collectible under Act June 30, 1864, § 110, even though interest is allowed on such deposits..... 856
Act June 30, 1864, § 110, does not authorize a tax of 1-24 of 1 per cent. on money borrowed by a banking firm..... 856
A person having a license of a banker, who receives stocks, etc., and sells them, charging as a banker, is not liable to a tax imposed under ninety-ninth section of Act June 30, 1864, imposing a tax on brokers.. 872
A person purchasing stock for others in his own name, advancing his own money, and holding the stock as security, is liable to a tax as a broker..... 872

INTERNATIONAL LAW.

The island of St. Domingo is a dependence of France, within the non-intercourse act of March 1, 1807..... 932
If the island of St. Domingo was conquered by the British and given up to the blacks, the right of France would have revived, as a conqueror gains nothing but the temporary right of possession, and cannot, in the meantime, impair the rights of the former sovereign 932
Where a bridge is unlawful as obstructing a river, in violation of a treaty with a foreign country, it is an international question, to be determined by the executive and legislative department 1060

INTERPLEADER.

A bank may have relief by interpleader against adversary parties claiming money therein deposited 747

JUDGMENT.

Rendition and entry.

In an action on a joint contract against two, where one has suffered default, and the other has obtained verdict, judgment must be entered for both..... 436
An execution on a supersedeas judgment confessed two months after the original judgment will be quashed..... 560

Operation and effect.

A judgment of the United States court is a lien on lands throughout the district in which it is recovered..... 168
The lien of a judgment of the United States court on the lands of defendant cannot be restricted by state statutes..... 168

Page

A judgment is a bar to a new suit for the same purpose when substantially the same as the first, except for averments therein of immaterial matter 256

Grant of administration, with will annexed, to a husband of testatrix, is conclusive as to her right to make the will..... 277

In Virginia, a judgment by confession is equal to a release of errors..... 290

An adjudication by a surrogate that an administrator was decedent's next of kin, in a contest between him and another as to the grant of letters of administration, is not conclusive on the question of distribution.. 316

A decision of the supreme court, on appeal in a suit in equity, that plaintiff's remedy was by action at law, and remanding the cause for trial at law, is conclusive as to plaintiff's right thus to sue..... 359

Unless the same subject-matter was involved, and the same questions raised, judgment recovered is not res judicata..... 869

The federal courts will not entertain a bill by a nonresident stockholder of a domestic corporation, where the issues raised by the bill have been already adjudicated by the state court in a suit between the corporation and the proper adversary parties..... 408

Assignment.

In Indiana, judgments are assignable by indorsements on the record attested by the clerk 320

Judgments may be assigned otherwise than of record, but payment to the assignor before notice of the assignment is valid... 320

Amendment.

A judgment may be amended four years after rendition by adding the name of another person as to benefit.....1179

Satisfaction.

Agreement for full satisfaction of judgment in consideration of payment of less than amount of judgment is not a full satisfaction 320

Matter of defense, though not pleaded in action in which judgment was recovered, is, if the subject of cross action against party recovering such judgment, a sufficient consideration for agreement to satisfy the judgment 320

Burden is on judgment creditor who executed satisfaction of judgment to show that it was void..... 320

An administrator who gives a mortgage to secure a decree requiring him to pay money, and afterwards sells the land, the mortgage not having been recorded, is liable on the mortgage, and not on the decree..1120

Relief against.

The absence of a witness is no ground for an injunction to stay the proceedings on the judgment 496

Where fraud is charged in a bill to set aside a judgment, and positively denied in the answer, a decree for complainant cannot be rendered on the uncorroborated testimony of a single witness..... 874

JUDICIAL SALES.

A sale by a trustee under a decree of court will not pass title to land in the actual adverse possession of a third person at the time of the decree..... 162

JURY.

A juror who has a case at issue at the same term will be discharged..... 809

JUSTICES OF THE PEACE.

A creditor has no right to give a false credit on a note, so as to reduce it to the jurisdiction of a justice of the peace.....337

LIBEL AND SLANDER.

Page

Where a paper written to prevent the appointment of a party to office states that his reputation was bad, and there was probable cause for writing the paper, plaintiff could not recover for libel..... 868

LIENS.

Agreement by mill owners to improve water power, each party's share of the expense to be a lien on his estate, gives each party who pays more than his share a lien for the excess 981

One who builds cars for a railroad company has no lien on the cars for his work, in the absence of a special agreement.....1172

LIMITATION OF ACTIONS.

Where a bankrupt was a nonresident when the cause of action accrued, and had not resided more than three years in the state thereafter, the state statute of limitations was no defense to be set up by the assignee against the claim..... 38

To avoid the statute, complainant must allege ignorance of the fraud, and when it was discovered 137

After the act of July 13, 1861, declaring the inhabitants of Arkansas to be in a state of insurrection, the period during which such insurrection existed is not to be counted as a part of the limitations for suit in Oregon 503

Where the statute is pleaded to two counts in a declaration, it is sufficient if it is good as to one..... 587

Where a subcontractor was to receive his pay when the contractor received his, his cause of action against the contractor did not accrue until the contractor had made final settlement with the owner..... 587

It is a good replication to a plea of the statute that plaintiff has never been within the state where suit is brought..... 649

A bill filed after the two-years limitation has expired is not an amendment of a suit for the same cause of action, filed before the two years, and subsequently dismissed.. 874

Where statute of limitations is pleaded, plaintiff cannot obtain benefit of exception in favor of merchants' accounts without setting them up in his replication 973

Where mill owners agreed to improve the water power, each party's share of the expense to be a lien on his estate, such lien is not barred in less time by the local law in action to foreclose a mortgage..... 981

Even if there were no statutes of limitation, equity would not disturb a purchaser under a mortgage who had been in possession 15 years with knowledge of a junior mortgagee 1038

Ten years' limitation applies to foreclosure of mortgage where mortgagee knew the land had been sold under prior mortgages, and the purchaser was in possession claiming title 1038

Statutes of foreclosure and redemption are rules of property, and also laws of limitation, and will be applied to proceedings in equity in the absence of a special statute..1038

LOTTERIES.

The purchaser of a lottery ticket from one authorized by the city of Washington to conduct a lottery cannot recover from the city the prize drawn by his ticket..... 934

MANDAMUS.

On mandamus to compel levy of taxes to pay judgment against a county, no matter

Page

is available as a defense which was properly used in resisting recovery of judgment..1048

The fact that county commissioners have been enjoined by state court from assessing tax to pay judgment rendered by federal court is no defense to an application to federal court for mandamus to compel.....1048

MARINE INSURANCE.

Where a premium note is not paid at maturity, and the policy provides that it shall be void while it remains overdue, and, after dishonor of the note, the vessel strands, and the master pays the note, and a gale comes up and the vessel is lost, the insurer is not liable 48

In case of the total loss, the insurance is what the property insured was worth at the time and place of shipping, the expenses of lading included 178

The invoice price is not a proper test of value of the property lost..... 178

In a valued policy, the assured need not prove at the trial the amount of the loss... 178

Averment that plaintiffs have entire interest in the subject is not supported by evidence of the joint interest with others, nor can averment of a joint interest be supported by proof of the sole interest..... 291

Testimony of the captain that the vessel was condemned on his application after report by the surveyors that she could not be repaired except at too great expense, though not evidence of such proceedings, is evidence that he coincided with surveyors in opinion 291

A part owner of a shipment of specie, who had no interest in the insurance thereon, was appointed supercargo, his duties as such to commence when the voyage ended. The voyage was broken up, and the master delivered the specie to the supercargo, who invested it. Held, that such investment was not an act of ownership, but was as agent for the underwriters, and did not waive the abandonment 291

Where a stranded vessel, before abandonment, was gotten off, but was in the meantime sold at auction by the master and purchased by him, the owner cannot recover for total loss..... 667

A policy on a vessel is not rendered void because the ship took on board a chain cable smuggled by another vessel on loss by perils of the sea..... 909

If the voyage, as originally insured, be valid, any subsequent illegality in the course of the voyage will not affect the policy as to property not tainted with such illegality.. 909

Liability to forfeiture for smuggling does not avoid the insurance..... 909

Knowledge of loss before insurance by one who was not the agent of the insured for any purpose connected with the insurance is not notice to the insured.....1020

The burden is on the insurer to prove that the insured knew that the property was lost when he procured the insurance.....1020

In adjusting a loss under a policy on a cargo, the value is to be ascertained at the port from which the vessel last sailed before the loss; and if freight has there been earned, and not paid, it is not chargeable on the salvage, but is an addition to the original cargo 287

MARITIME LIENS.

Act March 3, 1855, § 15, providing that the penalties imposed by the provisions regulating the carriage of passengers shall be liens on the vessel, does not apply to a fine on the master, imposed for a misdemeanor.. 7

Persons employed to load and navigate a vessel plying principally for the transportation of stone, and licensed for the coasting trade, have a lien for wages..... 29

Where a contract of service is for the navigation of tide waters, and laying stone on wharves is incidental thereto, the whole service is maritime..... 29

A vessel being sailed by the master on shares does not affect the lien of the seamen 29

The lien for wages is not lost by delay where no interests of third persons intervene 29

Where the cargo is delivered unconditionally, the lien for the freight is lost..... 66

It is no defense to a suit to hold freight for mariners' wages that the consignee, before libels were filed, was summoned as a garnishee of the shipowner..... 92

When supplies have been furnished in a foreign port or a state other than that to which the vessel belongs, the liens are admiralty liens, unaffected by local law..... 164

A lien for supplies furnished in Virginia on a ship owned in Maine is not lost by taking bills in exchange on an owner, which bills were produced for cancellation..... 202

A lien for freight may be abandoned.... 374

Clause in charter party that freight shall be paid within a certain time after vessel's discharge does not waive a lien for freight, as the word "discharge" merely refers to the unlading, and not to the delivery of the cargo 374

Where a charter party provides for a gross sum as freight, payable on the close of the whole voyage, and the bill of lading declares that the return cargo shall be delivered to the shippers, they paying freight as per charter party, a lien attaches to the homeward cargo for freight due for the whole voyage, and the consignee, on receipt of the goods, becomes personally liable.... 374

By the law of England, no lien existed for supplies furnished domestic vessel before 3 & 4 Vict..... 427

A lien for supplies is divested by an assignment of the claim..... 428

Lien follows the ship wherever she goes, and may be enforced wherever there is jurisdiction to enforce it..... 428

3 & 4 Vict. relates to liens for supplies furnished foreign vessels, and is declaratory of the maritime law..... 428

There is a lien in Canada for supplies furnished American vessel, and a court of admiralty has the power to enforce it..... 428

There is no lien for services as ship keeper while the vessel is laid up during the winter 434

Where a vessel goes from a home port to another state to be repaired, a libel will lie against her at her home port for the balance due 661

A vessel is liable for authorized advances to a cook, made by the broker who shipped him, though the cook deserts..... 667

Vessels belonging to one state, but in the ports of another, are deemed foreign, within the rule of the general maritime law giving a lien for supplies..... 676

Liens for supplies, given by the general maritime law, cannot be affected by state legislation 679

Lien for supplies furnished to a foreign vessel is governed by the general maritime law, and not by the local law of any particular state 680

New York statute giving a lien for repairs and supplies to vessels is valid in regard to domestic vessels, but does not apply to foreign vessels 680

The effect, as a payment, of a note given for supplies furnished a foreign vessel, is governed by the lex loci, and the lien is not waived where the note was by the lex loci only a conditional payment..... 680

Page

The lien on a vessel must be enforced within a reasonable time, or it will not avail against a bona fide purchaser..... 680
The general maritime law does not give a lien for supplies furnished to a vessel in the state where she belongs..... 689
The new twelfth rule in admiralty, of 1872, does not revive a claim which is almost barred by limitation, and make it a lien on the vessel, so as to cut off titles perfected or acquired before such rule was adopted 711
Where a charterer becomes owner of a vessel for a voyage, his agent can bind the vessel for coal supplied in a foreign port... 777
Where the charterer hires the use of the vessel, and the navigation remains with the owner, and the master, on the credit of the vessel, procures coal in a foreign port, the vessel is chargeable 777
A master of a ship has a lien thereon for necessary disbursements abroad of his own money 832
A contract to furnish labor, materials, and stores for building and equipping vessel is not a maritime contract, and no lien is thereby created which can be enforced in rem 1179

MARSHALS.

Marshal cannot detain defendant on a ca. sa. for poundage, if plaintiff has received the debt and costs..... 317
A marshal is not entitled to compensation for custody of property under process in admiralty, beyond $2.50 per day..... 710
A marshal who holds property under several processes in admiralty is entitled to a per diem custody fee, to be apportioned among the cases in which the several processes were issued..... 710
Under Rev. St. § 829, a marshal is entitled to a commission as for the sale of property in a suit in rem against a vessel, where process issued and a bond was given, though the amount of the final decree was paid before execution 800

MASTER AND SERVANT.

The owner of a railroad track is not liable for negligence of the servants of another railroad company while operating a train on such track 1105

MINES AND MINING.

Placer claims may be located and occupied jointly 497
The locator of a mining claim need not take any steps to purchase the same unless he thinks proper..... 497

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS.

The city of Washington has no power to prohibit free colored persons from selling perfumery 62
Where a city was authorized to borrow a specified sum, and issue its bonds therefor, and the money was borrowed and the bonds issued, its power was exhausted..... 635
A city has no power to issue bonds, the consideration of which cannot be inquired into in the hands of a bona fide holder..... 635
A city is not bound, under all circumstances, to keep the sidewalks free from ice... 863
The existence of a step in a sidewalk is not such a defect as to render the city liable for accidents to passengers stepping from one elevation to another..... 863
Municipal corporation may change the grade of the street without becoming liable to the adjoining landowners for the consequential damage caused to them in adapting their land to the grade, and protecting it 534
Where a street of proper width has been duly laid out, and the damages assessed include remuneration for the land taken, for the deprivation of any right or privilege attached to it, and for the damages done to the land adjoining that taken, the owner is not entitled to further compensation because the sides of the street were cut down perpendicularly, whereby the adjoining land was caused to cave into the street 534
A municipal corporation, in opening a street, does not incur any liability for consequential damages necessarily done to the land adjoining that taken, where reasonable care was exercised..... 534

NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS.

Interest coupons attached to municipal bond are not negotiable instruments, but are mere evidences of interest due on the bond, and assumpsit cannot be maintained thereon 962
Quaere, whether a guaranty running "to the bearer" of a negotiable note is negotiable 1157
A protest of interest coupons is sufficient to charge the indorser of the notes from which they were cut, though the notary did not have the notes as well as the coupons to present for payment.....1162
A bank which receives a note for collection from another bank, indorsed by the cashier thereof, need not give notice of nonpayment to any other party than such bank..1163
A note may be good against an indorser, though it is void as against the maker....1167

NEUTRALITY LAWS.

Neutral rights are not violated by the grant of a commission of a neutral while within the territory of the belligerent.... 390
A colony in rebellion is within the law of nations relating to the rights of neutrals, without regard to its status as a state.... 390
Belligerent captures by privateers armed and equipped within the United States in violation of the neutrality of the United States may be restored to the injured belligerent, if brought within the jurisdiction of the federal courts..... 390
Quaere, whether a colony in a state of rebellion is embraced by Act Cong. 1794, prohibiting the enlistment of soldiers, etc., within the limits of the United States to enter the service of any foreign prince or state 390

NEW TRIAL.

A new trial will not be granted to contradict the witness by negative evidence, nor to impeach a witness..... 116
A party suppressed at the trial, who does not apply for a continuance, cannot have a new trial for that reason..... 116
It is not sufficient ground for a new trial that the evidence is conflicting..... 123
Where the verdict has done substantial justice, information given by one juror to the others is not ground for new trial..... 557
A verdict will not be set aside, as against the evidence, where it does not appear to be the result of passion or mistake..... 630
The statute of the state of Maine giving a party in default right to a trial on proof of a probably good defense within three years is not repugnant to the judiciary act of 1789, authorizing a new trial on motion after verdict 925

Page

One who suffers default, supposing the case was agreed to be continued, is entitled, under statute of the state of Maine, to a trial within three years, on proof of a probably good defense..... 925

A new trial will not be granted on the ground of newly-discovered evidence, where counsel did not think the evidence would be material, and did not know of it, though it might easily have been discovered.....1162

PARTIES.

Want of parties may be objected to at any time, even in the appellate court..... 179

Where no final decree can be made without prejudice to parties not before the court, the court will not proceed, even though the parties are beyond reach of its process.... 179

Where a debt is due to two persons, and a settlement with the executor of one made after the death of both, and notes given to him for the balance, he may sue in his own name, as the doctrine of survivorship does not apply 315

A misjoinder of parties is waived, unless taken advantage of by plaintiff in abatement 450, 1029

On a joint and several bond, plaintiff may sue one or all of the obligors, but not an intermediate number 450

PARTNERSHIP.

A partner is bound by the act of his copartner, within the scope of his business, though the act be fraudulent as between the partners 34

Partnership creditors have no lien of the firm property before obtaining judgment and execution 245

A simple contract creditor cannot sue to follow partnership property used to pay individual debts 245

In an action against two persons as partners, an account book containing entries made by both defendants is admissible as evidence of partnership..... 436

Where the surviving partner notified creditors that his brother's capital remained in the business, a joint creditor of the firm, who did not receive the notice, could require the joint property to be applied to his debts to the exclusion of separate creditors.. 814

The creditors of a firm may enforce in equity the application of the joint estate to the payment of the joint debts against the survivor 813, 814

The exchange of a note of a firm dissolved by the death of one partner, for a similar note signed by the survivor, does not convert the firm debt into the separate debt of the survivor 816

When one of two partners sues on a partnership demand, defendant may take advantage of it at the trial.....1183

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS.

See, also, infra, subtitle "Infringement."

Patentability—What constitutes.

Defendant cannot embody in his machine the patented discoveries held by the plaintiff, and add new inventions of his own or others thereto 140

Where the subject of the patent was already open to common use, the patent is invalid 140

A patent is valid which consists of a new combination, though composed of parts well known and in common use..... 140

A result or an effect cannot be patented.. 248

The utility of an invention need not be great in order to render it patentable..... 452

That there is a difference in construction which allows the use of an invention claimed in a different way from an invention patented, though seldom required to be so used, does not deprive the claim of the qualities of a useful invention..... 452

First inventor has the prior right to a patent if he uses reasonable diligence, though the second inventor has in fact reduced it to a perfect form..... 452

An invention is patentable if it appears to be capable of reduction to actual practical use, though it has not been so reduced.... 452

A patent will not be granted for a device differing only in form from one in prior use 526

A new combination of old mechanical devices producing new results is patentable.. 617

A hand mirror with a handle extension of wire covered with cement forming the handle and back is patentable, as distinguished from a brush, though the handles and backs of the two are made in the same way..... 917

To authorize a patent, some inventive skill must be exercised, but the degree of that skill is not material..... 987

Old instruments placed in a new and different organization do not prevent the new mechanism from being patented..... 987

To justify finding of anticipation the jury must find that the alleged anticipation embodied substantially the same organized mechanism operating in the same manner as that described in patents..... 987

On an issue as to anticipation it is a pertinent question why the mechanism described in the prior patent, and known to the whole world, was not applied to the same uses as plaintiff's..... 987

The application to the moving and holding of a rudder of an endless screw working in the cogs on the periphery of a quadrant does not involve invention.....1145

Who may obtain patent.

Where there was no product of the machine invented until after the maker had seen similar machines of another for the same purpose, he is not the prior inventor.. 205

Where an interference has been declared between an invention claimed and a patent granted, and the patentee fails to appear, it is error to refuse to grant the patent applied for because of failure to furnish unequivocal proof of the priority of the invention, where the applicant furnishes the best proof under the circumstances, his principal witness having died pending the hearing..... 452

Where an alien falsely represents himself as a citizen, the patent issued to him is invalid 613

The oath of citizenship and other duties required by Act July 4, 1836, § 6, are conditions precedent to the authority to issue a patent 613

Inadvertence in granting a patent while a caveat is pending does not authorize the granting of a patent to the other party unless he shows priority of invention.....1145

One who exhibits his invention of an improved lock to three lock makers, though he does not put it to any practical use, gives such a knowledge of it to the public as a complete invention as will deprive another person of his right as first patentor.....1195

Prior public use or sale.

Act 1839, § 7, providing that a patent shall be invalid where sales were made more than two years before application therefor, does not refer to sales made by persons claiming prior inventions..... 163

Manufacture for two years before application for patent, by person other than the patentee, avoids the patent.....1038

Page

Application and issue.

Failure of a patentee to mention in his specification an indispensable addition renders his title bad 140

Where a new party comes in on rehearing, he comes in subject to the testimony as to priority of invention previously taken... 205

Whether a patent is old or the specification indefinite, or whether the original and renewed patent are not for the same invention, are for the jury 235

A suit to limit a patent or to declare that it does not extend to certain cases, and pro tanto to have it adjudged void, can be maintained only by the attorney general on behalf of the United States 345

The commissioner cannot confirm a patent obtained by fraud 613

A new, original patent cannot be issued eight years after the invention has been in public use 613

Failure to prosecute an application for two years and eight months after it had been rejected is not an abandonment of the application 917

Where evidence as to priority of issuance is conflicting, its weight must govern..... 949

The proper rule is to construe the claims of the patent in connection with the descriptive parts of the article, and with reference to what is seen to be the real invention...1195

Appeal from commissioner's decisions.

A decision of the commissioner denying a patent to either party on interference is appealable 205

On appeal from the decision of the commissioner of patents the court will not refuse his action in intimating that a patent was an apposite reference, without stating grounds to support his possession..... 424

The rule requiring a commissioner of patents to set forth the grounds of his decision fully in writing must be strictly followed.. 452

The decision of the commissioner as to the existence of ground of reissue is conclusive.. 655

Reissue: Disclaimer.

The commissioner may allow the original specification to be amended in the reissue.. 49

Where an original patentee is dead, his executor may make a surrender and obtain a reissue 49

Where one paragraph in a reissue leads to a construction which would make the reissue void, explanation of its meaning may be sought in a succeeding one..... 49

New features or devices neither described nor indicated in the original specification should not be embodied in the new description 49

On an application for reissue, the patentee need not claim all things claimed in his original patent 235

The patentee in a reissue patent need not claim all that was claimed in the original patent 603

It is lawful to reissue a patent with claims to combinations of fewer elements than were contained in the combination of the claim of the original patent..... 655

Extension: Renewal.

Where the claim of the renewed patent was not for distinct improvements, but for additional parts of the same improvement, the same thing was patented in both patents 235

A renewal is for the benefit of the inventor, and an interest in it before the renewal must be specially assigned..... 258

A conveyance of an original patent, and "any further patent which he shall or may at any time hereafter procure for any improvements," conveys an interest in so much of a future extension as may be necessary for the use of the improvements..... 524

A contract to convey a local interest in a patent "to the utmost extent as to duration that he may be entitled to" transfers an equity in the same interest in an extension of the patent 524

Semble, a sale of an "invention" does not necessarily carry inchoate right of inventor to exclusive privileges under extension of patent 1097

Inchoate right of inventor to exclusive privilege under extension of patent is subject of sale.....1097

Extension of patents by the commissioner is conclusive as to all facts which he is required to find in order to grant the extension 1097

A patentee who establishes his title under the original letters patent is entitled to a temporary injunction under an extension of such letters patent without a further trial of his right 1097

Assignment.

Where a patent has, by the death of the patentee, devolved on his executor, and has been assigned by him, the assignee may take out the reissue in his own name..... 56

Record in patent office of assignment is notice to purchasers 258

Assignment need not be recorded in the patent office as between the parties or as against strangers 258

An ordinary assignment will not convey to assignee an interest in a renewed patent.. 258

An assignment of all inventions "for the manufacture of composition brush backs and handles" does not include an invention for hand mirrors, the handles and backs of which are made in the same manner as the brush, though applications for patents on both articles were pending at time of assignment 917

Licenses.

An agreement by an inventor, who was employed in defendant's factory, to make for defendant a certain number of machines, for which the inventor afterwards obtained a patent, at a certain price, using defendant's implements and materials therefor, raises a presumption of a license to defendant to make and use the invention.... 389

There is no principle of equity which requires the owner of a patent to give notice to a purchaser of a licensee's right, in order to enable him to restrict such purchaser to terms of the license..... 426

A license under a patent need not be recorded 426

One tenant in common of patent may give valid license to manufacture under the patent 1097

Infringement—What constitutes.

Where a patent is for a combination of several known parts, it is not an infringement to use any of them where the combination is not similar..... 195

The making or selling of a patented machine is infringement..... 195

Where a party avails himself of the former invention without such variation as constitutes discovery, there is an infringement 195

Where the patentee did not devise the various parts, but the whole combination, it is not infringement to use a part of the combination 248

The business of a manufacturer does not fall within the preventive scope of the patent laws, but only injuries to the right of the patentee 345

Where a patentee assigned to plaintiff all his interest in a patented machine except the right to manufacture said machine in a certain city, and plaintiff afterwards granted a license to one C. to use one of the machines within a certain portion of such city, and C. sold the machine to defendant, who removed it to a portion of the city outside the district described in the license, there is an infringement of the patent.... 426

Page

A person cannot used a patented device by constructing it in an imperfect manner.. 603
Any improvements made on a patented article do not entitle the maker to use the part patented..... 603
A patent is not infringed by a machine which attains the result by machinery of a radically different character..... 884
Use of patented invention as one of the elements of another combination is an infringement 1038

Infringement—Procedure.

In an action for infringement, the objection that another is interested with plaintiff must be taken by plea in abatement..... 76
To show violation of patent, declaration need only aver that defendant has constructed, used, and sold to others the things patented 258
One who holds the original right patented, and also an improvement, must assert his entire right in an action for infringement 258
A junior patentee cannot, by making the elder patentee a defendant, compel him to assert his right as against him..... 345
A patentee may sue any one of several alleged infringers, and omit the others, in his discretion..... 345
The assignee of an exclusive right to use, but not to make, the thing patented within a specified territory, may sue an infringer in his own name..... 426
Construction of a patent, like any other written or printed instrument, is for the court 987 —— Decree.

Where infringement is admitted, if the patent is valid, interlocutory decree should be entered for complainant, and the cause sent to a master to ascertain damages..... 49 —— Accounting: Damages.

Under Act July 8, 1870, complainant may recover, in addition to the profits of the respondent, damages sustained..... 49
Actual damages sustained, directly resulting from the infringement, can be recovered 195
Plaintiff can recover the profits realized by the wrongdoer from the infringement.. 195
On accounting for infringement, defendant must account for the entire profits realized 616

—— Injunction.

The owner of a useful invention has the right to sell it to all who will purchase, subject only to a restraint from some party having a conflicting patent; and he obtains under patent laws only the power to restrain another from unlawfully using or selling his invention..... 345
An injunction will be granted where complainant has been long in the enjoyment of his rights, and there was no doubt as to the infringement 526
Boiler and pipe coverings. Letters patent No. 55,598, granted June 19, 1866. to John Ashcroff, for "covering a steam boiler pipe or the heater with felt or other nonconducting material," is valid..... 410
Buckles. Patent May 26, 1863, is void for want of novelty..... 521
Bustle. The invention of Matthew Chambers for a framework for a skirt or bustle was not anticipated by the patent of Alexander Douglass, No. 17,082, nor by the English patent of Ozman, No. 20,513 of 1856.. 424
Elastic packing. Patent No. 3,579, granted August 3, 1869, for "improvement in the manufacture of elastic packing," includes only soft vulcanized rubber, and not hard rubber 965

Page

Flouring machine. The third claim in letters patent of February 27, 1849, for an improvement on a machine for separating flour from bran, is bad for uncertainty, and the fourth claim is bad as one to the legal result 139
Gas burners. First claim in patent granted June 14, 1870, for improvement in gas burners, includes combination in patent granted July 26, 1870, to a prior inventor..1087
Hand mirrors. Claim of patent granted July 27, 1869, for an "improved hand mirror," covers a mirror having two wires running from the body into the handle and concealed by cement, of which the handle and back are composed..... 917
Letters patent granted July 27, 1869, for an "improved hand mirror," are valid.... 917
Levels. The invention of Thomas A. Chandler for a level (patent No. 17,023) possesses patentable novelty, and is prior to the invention for which the patent No. 7,263 was granted to William G. Ladd, and to the invention for which Samuel Reed applied for a patent..... 452
Locks and latches. Claims of reissued patent granted to Charles A Miller, January 27, 1863, for improvement in locks and latches, so construed as to relieve the objection that they claim results or effects.....1195
Looms. The second claim of reissue No. 5,150, held not void for want of novelty..... 188
The first and third claims of reissue No. 5,150 held infringed..... 188
Reissue No. 5,150 held infringed..... 191
Nut making machine. Patent No. 13,118 is entitled to priority over patent No. 8,427.. 205
Printing presses. Patent No. 98,087 is valid 617
Pump filters. Reissue of letters patent No. 5,804 are valid as to the first claim.... 655
The second claim of reissue No. 5,804 is void 655
Seed planter. Patent No. 12,231 held not infringement 248
Slides for extension tables. Claim of reissue letters No. 40,317 examined and limited, and certain claims therein held not to show patentable invention..... 214
Vulcanized rubber. Reissued patent No. 3,531 did not embrace the invention of Charles Goodyear for the manufacture of vulcanized India rubber..... 49
The description under letters patent No. 11,608 as a process for working over vulcanized rubber is in substance the same as the description in the reissue No. 3,531.... 49

PAYMENT.

A payment in bank notes issued without authority of the bank is not valid where the party paying knew that fact at the time 272
"Lawful money" of any state is equivalent to federal money.....1149

PILOTS.

Pilot who takes charge of, and tows into port, an abandoned ship, at request of vessel which had been towing her, is entitled to greater compensation than the usual pilot fee 427
An abandoned bark, towed into New York, is not liable for the fees of a pilot who does not board her, nor control her navigation 481

PLEADING AT LAW.

Where the legal effect of an instrument would be the same whether the words constituting the variance be inserted or not, the variance is immaterial..... 18
A plea in an action on a bill of exchange alleged to have been given in payment of freight on property transported by plaintiff is insufficient where it alleges a failure of consideration by reason of the careless and tortious manner of transporting the goods, whereby defendant suffered damages in excess of the amount of the bills, but does not allege any nonperformance or tort in reference to the shipment..... 359

Page

A plea is demurrable where its structure is that of a plea in bar, but which avers by way of set-off a claim for damages for improper performance by plaintiff of the contract out of which plaintiff's cause of action arose 359

Defects reachable only by special demurrer at common law will be disregarded as special demurrers are abolished..... 450

A slight variation in describing a written instrument is fatal..... 908

Where a default has been opened the pleadings may be amended on the new trial.. 925

Plaintiff will not be permitted to amend after jury is sworn, if the justice of the case be against him..... 973

Objection that contract sued on was with defendant and another as partners can only be raised by plea in abatement.....1029

Venue is necessary to every traversable fact, and, where one is laid in the count, all matters following refer to it.....1149

Venue in the margin of pleading is sufficient where none is laid in the body of the declaration 1149

Want of venue is reachable only by special demurrer 1149

If one of two partners be sued on a partnership demand, he must plead the matter in abatement, and set out the names of the partners 1183

PLEADING IN ADMIRALTY.

An objection that another suit for the same cause of action is pending must be taken by special plea, in the nature of a plea in abatement, known in admiralty practice as a "declinatory exception"..... 374

In an action on an indemnifying bond, declaration must show that plaintiff has been damnified, and a general averment of loss is not sufficient.....1178

On dismissal of a libel with leave to amend, it is improper to file a new libel setting out a valid cause of action, but adding a second cause, which was substantially a repetition of the libel which had been dismissed 702

There is no technical rule of variance in admiralty causes.....1015

A special replication by the libelant under oath is not admissible, unless it be demanded by respondent, or ordered by the court 1188

The answer to a libel should be sworn to, but the libelant is not bound to swear to the libel.....1188

PLEADING IN EQUITY.

Applications to amend an answer are in the discretion of the court..... 280

A defendant who answers generally as to a matter of which he has no particular knowledge may file a supplemental answer after he has acquired particular knowledge.. 280

A bill by a railroad company, against a large number of persons, to determine the estate claimed by them in land over which the railroad was constructed, is not multifarious because it avers that defendants claim separate and distinct parcels, all of them being alike interested in the defeat of plaintiff's claim of prior right under a grant from the government..... 364

Page

Matter in abatement must be set up by plea 483

An allegation in an answer, however insufficient, if responsive, is not impertinent.... 483

Exceptions to an answer for impertinence will be allowed where the matter is immaterial, or stated at undue length..... 483

Leave to amend a bill for adding new parties defendant after replication was filed will be denied where plaintiff could have made the amendment before replication.....1053

PLEDGE.

Where a bank pledged notes to secure a loan, and, as they fell due, substituted others in their place, the pledge of the substituted notes is valid..... 262

It is doubtful, in Louisiana, whether indorsement as well as delivery is essential to the pledge of negotiable instruments..... 262

Where the giving of notice of the sale of a pledge has been rendered impossible by the act of the pledgor, neither the pledgee nor its agent in the sale of the collateral was liable for conversion..... 750

POST OFFICE.

Constitutional provision for establishment of post roads means such roads as are laid out by the authority of the state.....1044

Act of congress making all railroads post roads means only such as have charters from several states 1044

PRACTICE AT LAW.

A plaintiff who, on a rule to show his cause of action, files a positive affidavit, will not be required to submit to examination under oath at court, where there is no ground for suspicion that the debt was not due 436

PRACTICE IN ADMIRALTY.

A claim for damages for the breaking up of a voyage is not a claim for seamen's wages, and libelant must file security for costs 94

Where a seaman libeled a vessel, and obtained a decree by default, it will be set aside, where claimant shows that libelant had contracted personally with the master, who was navigating the vessel on a lay... 97

On appeal to the circuit court, either party can take new evidence..... 149

The right of a surety in a stipulation to be paid out of the proceeds of the boat, which has been sold under his execution, is subordinate to the claims of those who have established liens thereon..... 164

A claimant of a boat libeled for salvage, on giving a stipulation for her release, takes her subject to pre-existing liabilities..... 164

Right of libelant to summary judgment against surviving stipulator for value of vessel is not affected by the death of the other stipulator, or by the fact that libelant had not exhausted his remedy against the claimant of the vessel..... 386

A suit in admiralty will not be dismissed for neglect to prosecute, where it was placed on the calendar and noticed immediately after issue joined, but was not called for trial, by reason of the accidental absence of witnesses 426

Proceedings in rem and in personam cannot be blended in one libel..... 719

A decree against a stipulator, after his death, is void 829

Proceeding in rem in a case of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction is not a suit at common law, and does not require jury trial 930

Page

The record in a court of vice admiralty of the condemnation of the vessel is not evidence per se, but the seal of the court or the handwriting of the judge or clerk must be proved; and the certificate of the American consul is not sufficient to authenticate it 291

Allegations in libel not admitted or denied are not to be taken as true, but must be proved 949

The question as to which marshal first seized a vessel in waters over which both districts had jurisdiction should be raised by a petition by the marshal, and not on a plea to the jurisdiction by a party in whose favor the marshal held process..... 692

Whether custody of a vessel by a sheriff under a writ alleged to be void is such as to prevent a court of admiralty from acquiring jurisdiction should not be determined on motion 692

Where the report of the commissioner was not excepted to, it was not necessary that the minutes of his testimony should be brought up 792

Where a libelant unites a demand for contract wages unpaid with a claim for a short allowance, and obtains a decree for the wages, he will only obtain costs on that demand, and is liable for costs on the other branch of the litigation..... 619

PRACTICE IN CIVIL CASES.

A notice at the trial to produce a letter will not be enforced unless it is in the possession of the party or his counsel..... 468

PRACTICE IN EQUITY.

A motion to dissolve an injunction granted by state court of removal will not be considered without leave first asked and obtained 158

The statute of Nevada providing that an "action" may be brought by any person in possession against any person who claims an interest or estate therein adverse to him, for the purpose of determining such adverse claim, dispenses with the necessity of establishing a right at law before suing to determine such adverse claims, as the term "action" in that state includes proceedings both at law and in equity..... 364

A defendant will not be allowed, as a matter of course, to put in new pleas on the trial 628

In equity, evidence is not admissible as to matters not alleged in bill or answer..... 680

The testimony may be taken orally in open court 841

Executors against whom decree is rendered are presumed to be equally liable.....1112

There is no rule in the circuit court forbidding a report to be considered at the term to which it is made.....1112

A decree against administrators for money in their hands unadministered is not a final decree, and may therefore be opened to let in the merits which may have been excluded by mistake.....1112

PRINCIPAL AND AGENT.

An agent by virtue of a power of attorney cannot acquire title as against his principal..1038

The authority of an agent is not affected by war with the principal's country.....1154

PRINCIPAL AND SURETY.

Where R. D. imported goods in his own vessel, consigned to E. D., who gave bonds for the duties, the invoice showing the goods to be the property of R. D., the sureties of E. D. cannot recover the amount paid by them from R. D..... 628

PRIZE.

Page

Vessel and cargo condemned as enemy property, and for an attempt to violate the blockade 44

A district court cannot proceed against a captor into whose hands the proceeds of the capture have never arrived..... 175

A captor who has failed to enforce a decree of a superior court reversing the decree of a court of admiralty cannot claim as damages losses sustained by depreciation of the funds in which the proceeds of the capture were invested..... 175

Jurisdiction of the court is ousted in case of capture on the high seas, by a privateer lawfully commissioned, of the property of an enemy to the sovereign issuing the commission, though the capture was originally made by a proscribed privateer..... 278

Though the question of prize or no prize belongs exclusively to the courts of the captor, a neutral will restore a prize wrongfully taken by one of the belligerents in violation of the rights of the neutral..... 390

Captures under a commission to cruise are valid, if war existed at the time of the capture, though the commission was granted in time of peace..... 390

A vessel fitted out in a loyal state to cruise against the United States, and seized on the instance side of the court, is not a prize entitling the officers and crew of the United States man of war aiding in the seizure to a share of the proceeds..... 471

Neither were they entitled to such share under the act of August 5, 1861, as for a vessel fitted out for acts of piracy..... 471

Vessel and cargo condemned for a violation of a blockade 514

Co-operation in a blockade does not constitute the blockading vessels joint captors... 550

The transfer of an enemy vessel by an enemy to a neutral in an enemy port during the war is void..... 573

Neutral vessel with knowledge of a blockade has no right to proceed to a blockaded port to inquire as to its continuance..... 573

Where the owner of a vessel and her master are aware of a blockade when the vessel sails, the vessel has no right to approach the blockaded port to inquire as to its continuance 578

After the condemnation of a vessel and cargo, but before entry of the decree, a sale of the same will not be ordered, where it does not appear that they were perishable.. 578

If a vessel, after sailing with intent to break a blockade, abandons such purpose, and changes her destination, the original offense is condoned..... 712

The act of sailing for a blockaded port with knowledge of the blockade, and an intention to violate it, is an attempt which will authorize the capture and condemnation of the vessel..... 712

PUBLIC LANDS.

An actual settlement and survey is necessary to constitute an appropriation of land under a military warrant..... 174

Act May 23, 1844, known as the "Town-Site Law," was not enforced in Oregon before the passage of Act July 14, 1854... 483

Until the complete performance of the conditions subsequent to a settlement in the donation act, the estate granted is liable to revert to the donation by the failure to perform such conditions..... 483

The patent to the settler under the donation act is conclusive evidence of a performance of such conditions in a court of law, and primary in equity..... 483

An entry within the Virginia military district of Ohio before extinguishment of the Indiana title is void..... 634

Page

QUI TAM AND PENAL ACTIONS.

Qui tam action to recover penalty under Virginia act of December 21, 1792, "regulating the inspection of flour and bread," will lie without making the United States a plaintiff 1083

RAILROAD COMPANIES.

Under Act March 3, 1875, providing for the use of any cañon by more than one railroad, two railroads granted a right of way through a cañon can construct their lines irrespective of the width of way granted.... 23

Where a railroad company exhibits a copy of the profile of its line through the Grande Cañon, approved by the secretary of the interior, it will be considered as made in accordance with Act March 3, 1875..... 23

A certificate of an incorporation designating its place of business, and setting forth that it would be carried on in certain counties named, is a substantial compliance with Act Colo. 1876..... 23

A surveying and staking of a proposed line of road by the Denver & Rio Grande Railway Company did not amount to an appropriation of the right of way granted to that company by Act June 8, 1872, nor was the building of the road from Pueblo to Cañon City 23

The certificate of incorporation filed by the Denver & Rio Grande Railway Company under Rev. Sts. Colo. c. 18, was not such an appropriation of the right of way through the Grande Cañon as contemplated by Act June 8, 1872..... 23

Amendment of April 15, 1858, to Minnesota state constitution, authorizing the issuance of bonds by the state in aid of railroads, and the nature of the remedies by foreclosure and forfeiture, considered..... 417

Minnesota state railroad aid bonds issued under the amendment of the state constitution of April 15, 1858, are valid..... 417

Where a new road can at small expense cross an old one at a different level, equity will require it to be done, apportioning the additional expense between the roads..... 590

Where the state of Iowa accepted the grant of certain railroad lands from the United States, and gave them to a particular company, subject to the right to make necessary rules and regulations, it was an express reservation of the power to regulate the tolls 594

The state can regulate the tolls of a railroad company organized under the general law of the state 594

A city has no power, without express authority, to subscribe to the stock of a railroad 635

Where a city, without authority, subscribed for stock and issued its bonds, it was not estopped by the act of its officers, or any matter appearing on the face of its bonds, to deny their validity..... 635

A mortgage of the entire property of a railroad, including property subsequently acquired, gives an equitable lien to the bondholders on after-acquired property..... 1172

RECORDS.

A citizen of the United States has not an unlimited right to inspect all the records belonging to the federal courts, but only the books containing docket or minute entries of judgments or decrees 686

Page

A petition for leave to inspect "books containing docket and minute entries of judgments and decrees" of district and circuit courts is sufficient on general demurrer.... 686

REFERENCE.

Where the amount of a claim which defendant had against certain real estate was referred to a master to determine, he was not bound by the statement in defendant's answer 609

RELEASE AND DISCHARGE.

A bond under seal is not superseded by a subsequent parol agreement, of like terms and effect, as to which the promisee parts with nothing, and assumes no responsibility 228

REMOVAL OF CAUSES.

A suit in a state court cannot be removed under the act of 1866 as to some of the parties, where one as to whom it is not removed is a necessary party..... 32

A cause cannot be removed unless the controversy is so completely one between residents or citizens of different states that its termination will settle the whole suit..... 147

A portion of a case cannot be removed because the party interested in such portion is a citizen of another state from that of plaintiff 147

Where, after removal, plaintiff pleads anew setting up the removal, he cannot ask to remand the cause on the ground that it was not within the act..... 158

Act March 2, 1833, § 3, providing for the removal of prosecution in a state court against an officer of the United States, is not applicable to criminal indictments..... 171

To entitle defendants to remove a case brought by a firm under Act March 2, 1867, it must appear that all the plaintiffs were citizens of another state..... 255

A petition as an occupying claimant after judgment for plaintiff in ejectment under the statutes of Iowa is not removable, being a mere dependence on the original suit.. 477

A bill to reform a policy of insurance is an original suit, though an action at law was pending on the policy..... 516

A pro confesso taken by complainant at return term will not prevent a removal under the act of 1875..... 584

A bill by a citizen of Tennessee to cancel certain policies and a loan against an insurance company of Missouri is removable, though the trustee was a citizen of the same state with complainant..... 584

Where the real controversy is between a city and one of its citizens, a citizen of another state interested cannot remove the cause 588

A controversy is to be determined by the pleadings in the state court before the filing of the petition..... 606

To entitle to removal under Act March 3, 1875, § 2, cl. 1, there must be the controversy between citizens of different states, and all the parties on one side must unite in the petition, and be of different citizenship from the parties on the other side..... 606

The mere formal part is not to be considered in determining the right of removal.. 606

A citizen of the District of Columbia is not a citizen of a state, within the removal laws 717

A proceeding under an Ohio statute to compel an assignee for the benefit of creditors to allow a claim is a suit at law, within the removal act..... 806

Page

An attachment has the same effect after the cause is removed to a federal court as if it had remained in the state court..... 942
Proper time for entering in circuit court "copies of the proper papers" is on the first day of the next session after petition for removal 1066
Removal is effected by entering copies of proper papers in the federal court.....1066
No action of the state court can affect the right to remove a cause to a federal court..1066
Jurisdiction to determine whether a cause is removable and is properly removed is in the federal court.....1125
Mere filing of petition and bond in the state court by a party entitled to remove the cause to a federal court is sufficient to effect the removal.....1125
Right of removal is not lost where transcript of record is not filed within time prescribed by law 1125
Cause must be removed to federal court held at place where action was brought in the state court or place convenient.....1125
Where a cause has been removed from a state to a federal court, a party is not entitled to any costs except such as are taxable under Rev. St. §§ 823, 824, though such items would have been taxable in his favor in the state court 831

REPLEVIN.

Act Md. 1785, c. 34, forbidding replevin of goods restricted for tax, is not applicable to the corporation of the city of Washington 171

RIPARIAN RIGHTS.

The owner of lots in Washington lying on Rock creek is entitled to the compensation awarded for the condemnation of the water privileges in front of them..... 573

SALE.

Where a tailor has dealt with the customer on credit, he should notify the latter of his change to cash dealings before making up the goods..... 213
Where teas were sold to be selected by A., and were afterwards changed, the buyer can rescind, and refuse to accept them.. 544
On a contract to deliver teas, to be selected by A., if A. accepts an inferior quality there is an end to the warranty..... 544
To rescind a sale, the property must be returned 662
Contract for future delivery of goods which seller does not own, and has no means of obtaining, is not void for illegality.. 955
A contract to manufacture certain articles without specifying any time, means a reasonable time 1151, 1152

SALVAGE.

Right to salvage compensation.

The master of a vessel which, in the course of the voyage, falls in with a wreck, is authorized by the general customs and usages of the sea to employ his own vessel and crew in saving it..... 369
Service rendered in saving property in danger of being lost on the high seas, or when wrecked and stranded on the shore, is a salvage service..... 369
A passenger who advised the master to attempt the service, and was active in performing it, is entitled to an increased share 509
Passengers who refused to assist when solicited are not entitled to a share..... 509
Ferryboats in peril on the Ohio river are subjects of salvage..... 528
A salvor is not entitled to compensation for services rendered the vessel wrecked pursuant to an agreement between him and the master 669
Though a settlement by arbitration may be void, the salvors are entitled to reasonable salvage..... 669
Unloading a ship which is on fire, attended with danger to life, is a salvage service, —not simply stevedore services..... 702
Salvage will not be allowed unless goods are actually saved..... 949
Quaere, whether person taking forcible possession of ship exposed to danger, against will of commander, can claim salvage 949
Burden of proving that salvage agreement between master and salvors is contrary to equity and justice is on those attacking it.....1075
That the risk was slight, and the duration of the salvage service brief, affects the value of the same, but cannot bar the claim.1193
Nothing but a contract to pay a given sum for the services to be rendered, or a binding engagement to pay at all events, whether successful or unsuccessful, will operate as a bar to a meritorious salvage claim.....1193

Allowance to seamen.

Compensation to seamen for services in a shipwreck must be paid out of the proceeds of the property saved..... 228
The amount of wages seamen receive at the time of the shipwreck is a safe criterion in fixing the quantity of salvage they are to receive 228
In case of shipwreck, where seamen cannot earn wages, but perform meritorious services, they are entitled to salvage..... 228
All the crew of a vessel, who were ready and willing to engage in salvage service rendered by the vessel to a wreck in the course of the voyage, are entitled to a share of the salvage awarded, though they may not have gone on board of the wreck.. 369
Where crew rescue vessel, their wages from last port of delivery will be included in salvage 994

Forfeiture or reduction of salvage.

Seamen of a vessel which rescues a wreck during a voyage do not forfeit their claim for a share of the salvage by misconduct during such voyage, if they are guilty of no misconduct while engaged in the salvage.. 369
Those in possession are estopped from claiming as salvors if they requested the aid of those who save the property..... 528
An agreement by a salvor to pay the master 10 per cent. of the compensation may be lawfully performed, but in awarding a salvage it can be reduced by that amount. 669

Amount.

Where a canal boat cast adrift from a tow was picked up in Long Island Sound, a salvage of 50 per cent. was proper..... 44
A salvor will not be allowed the net proceeds as compensation, though his expenditures exceeded them, unless the owner abandons the property..... 84
In cases of salvage of derelict, the proceeds remaining after payment of all costs and disbursements will be equally divided between the salvors and the owners..... 322
In cases of derelict the rule is to award a moiety 509
For saving the cargo of a wrecked vessel, consisting of a locomotive and a quantity of railroad iron, court allowed one-half of the net value of the property saved..... 686
Where the crew of a captured vessel rescue her from the prize master, they will be allowed one-fourth of the whole value of vessel and cargo..... 994

Page

Allowance of $6,000 was made for lightening cargo worth $20,000 from steamer cast ashore in December.....1075

Apportionment.

Where, under a contract, a salvage of 50 per cent. was awarded to a schooner which came to the relief of the wrecked vessel, the court will not give the whole compensation to the master and owners, and leave the seamen to look to the other moiety for their reward..... 228

Vessel cast on shore should bear part of salvage by landing cargo, thereby lightening the vessel and enabling her to go to a place of safety.....1075

Remedies for recovery.

One of the crew of a vessel, for whose services salvage was awarded by arbitrators, and paid to the master without distribution, may maintain a libel in personam against the master for a share.....369

A master of a wrecked vessel cannot submit the question of compensation for salvage to arbitration, where he acts in bad faith 669

Failure of libelants to refer their claim for salvage, as agreed, held, under the circumstances of the case, to be no bar to an action therefor 1193

Costs.

There should be but one libel in ordinary salvage cases, and costs paid but for one.. 509

SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS.

School district No. 1, of the county of Multnomah, is not the successor of the "trustees of the schoolhouse of Portland.".. 487

The city of Portland is not the successor "of the trustees of the school and meeting house of Portland"..... 487

SEAMEN.

Where a seaman was injured in the home port so severely that he could not be removed to the ship hospital, the shipowners were liable for his expenses..... 9

A custom of having a watch on vessels in foreign ports at the expense of the sailors will not be sanctioned without strong proof 527

Where seamen were imprisoned in a foreign jail by order of the American consul, and there was no evidence of bad faith, the men must pay the charges of the imprisonment and the expense of substitutes, but not the charges of the consul..... 581

Where a ship has full supply of provisions, and the crew is insufficiently furnished, their remedy is an action for damages.... 619

Where a steamship ships a crew under articles executed before a notary public, it is a violation of Act June 7, 1872, and the ship incurs the penalty provided therein..... 773

Officers and seamen must remain by ship and unload the cargo, in default of which they are liable to the owner.....1091

The contract of shipment.

A seaman on a lake vessel, having shipped under a verbal agreement, may leave the vessel at any time..... 761

Act July 20, 1790, requiring a written contract on the shipment of seamen, is not repealed by Act June 7, 1872..... 773

Contract is suspended, as to claims for wages, by capture 994

Legal obligations of seamen do not continue after capture of vessel..... 994

An agreement for a share in the proceeds of a whaling voyage does not create a partnership in profits of the voyage, but is in the nature of a seaman's wages.....1188

Conduct of master or mate in respect to seamen.

Page

A master can, in cases of necessity, correct a disobedient seaman by reasonable corporal punishment 68

To entitle a seaman to damages for an assault by the master he must show that the punishment was excessive..... 68

Wages—Right to.

Where a seaman dies before the voyage is completed, his representatives are entitled to his wages up to the time of his death.. 59

Where a seaman leaves a vessel under permission of the mate, it is a discharge, and, if in a foreign port, he is entitled to three months' extra wages..... 98

A seaman who, unknown to the master, but with permission of the mate, leaves the vessel, is not guilty of desertion..... 98

Where libelant was to receive 1-42 part of the proceeds of the voyage, he receives his full share if he receives pay in whatever currency makes up the proceeds..... 217

A seaman who is sent ashore to get articles belonging to the ship, and does not return before the ship sails, but afterwards goes to the destination of the ship, and takes the articles to the vessel and demands his wages, is not a deserter, so as to incur a forfeiture of wages under Act Aug. 18, 1856, § 25 284

One who shipped as a seaman, and, after the season of navigation, remained on board the ship during the winter, keeping the ship, can recover as a seaman only for his services during the season of navigation..... 434

A seaman who shipped as an able man is not entitled to be treated at the expense of the ship, nor to wages, while he is disabled by disease brought on by his own vices... 449

A seaman who was engaged as a cook on a foreign voyage, and who performed extra services as stevedore, may recover for the extra services in admiralty..... 508

Double wages are allowed only where the provisions required by law are not supplies shipped 619

Where a seaman on a lake vessel ships under a verbal agreement, and draws wages promised, he cannot recover a larger amount under act July 20, 1840..... 761

In an action by a father for wages of his son as seaman on a whaling voyage under articles made during the minority of the son with the consent of the father, the measure of damages is the son's proportion of the oil taken during the minority.....1201

Seamen who are persistently ill treated by their officers are not deserters after refusal of a demand for a discharge.....1203

Consuls have authority to discharge seamen with three months' extra pay, where they have been cruelly treated, though they have not deserted 1203

Where a seaman is discharged with three months' extra pay (5 Stat. 396), one-third of such pay goes to the United States.....1203

—— Remedies for recovery.

The owners of a vessel are liable for wages if the vessel prove insufficient to pay them. 59

Where a foreign vessel is in the custody of the marshal on a claim made by an American citizen, the court may take jurisdiction of an intervening libel by one of the seamen, though his contract was made and performed in a foreign country, and all the parties are subjects thereof..... 434

A lien for seamen's wages existing under the general maritime law will be enforced by the courts of the United States, though the lien arose in Canada, where there are no admiralty courts 434

Where charterer of vessel is also owner of cargo, the freight, subject to the seamen's lien for wages, is the fair value of the transportation of the cargo..... 994

Page

Seamen of a British vessel, whose articles provided that they shall not be entitled to wages until the completion of the voyage, cannot sue in the United States courts for wages, unless it appears that they had been prevented from performing their contract, or seeking redress in the British courts, by wrongful act of the master.....1142

Wages — Deduction; extinguishment, etc.

A slave entered as a seaman, and escaped from the vessel, will not occasion a deduction from the wages of the rest by contribution 59

There is no forfeiture of a seaman's wages under Act July 20, 1790, § 5, where neither his name nor the fact that he was absent without leave is entered in the log book 284

Desertion to forfeit wages must be animo non revertendi 1091

By maritime law, desertion during voyage forfeits all wages antecedently due.....1091

Act 1790, c. 56, creates forfeiture of wages on 48 hours' of absence without leave, if proper entry had been made in log book 1091

If a deserting seaman offers to return to duty and make amends in a reasonable time, the master must receive him back, unless previous conduct would justify his discharge 1091

Desertion will not forfeit wages, either by maritime law or by the statute, unless it occurs before the end of the voyage, which is when the ship arrives at her port of destination, and is moored in the accustomed place..1091

Desertion forfeits wages in all cases except where there are mitigating circumstances 1188

Act Cong. 1790, declaring any unauthorized absence of a seaman from a ship 48 hours to be a desertion, applies to all cases, though the seaman has been prevented from returning by the sailing of the ship.....1188

Desertion by the general maritime law is the unauthorized absence from the ship with the intention not to return.....1188

Where a minor, with the consent of his father, shipped as a seaman, but deserted during the voyage after he had become of age, such desertion does not forfeit his father's right to wages earned during minority 1200

SET-OFF AND COUNTER-CLAIM.

A plea setting up a claim for damages against plaintiff, which shows that the alleged damage was for wrongs to property in which defendant was interested with others, is no response to a declaration setting out a breach of defendant's individual promise 359

An agreement between a member of a firm and his individual creditor that the claim should be set off against such creditor's liability to the firm is not available to the firm where it was not assented to by the other partners until after such creditor had made an assignment for the benefit of creditors, though before bankruptcy..... 928

One of two joint makers of a promissory note cannot set off against him a note given by the payee to him individually.....1132

SHERIFFS AND CONSTABLES.

Where a conflict arises between the sheriff and a United States marshal as to the right to the custody of property, the sheriff may apply either to the state court to be protected, or to the federal court to order its officers to withdraw..... 692

A sheriff is responsible for his deputy's act 1104

SHIPPING.

See, also, "Maritime Liens."

Where a shipper of goods received a rebate from the purchaser for damage in the suit by the shipper against the vessel for such damage, he must be charged with the rebate 76

Semble, that a shipper has a right, by the maritime law, to examine goods after they are unlivered, in order to ascertain whether they are damaged or not, before he makes himself liable for freight..... 374

Where a portion of the cargo is lost by a danger of navigation, the carrier is entitled to freight on the cargo delivered..... 663

By the general maritime law, material men have a remedy for supplies and materials against the vessel, the owner, and the master 680

Under the amended twelfth rule of admiralty of May 6, 1872, one who furnishes supplies, etc., to a vessel, domestic or foreign, may proceed in rem against the vessel, or in personam against her master or owner 689

The amended twelfth rule in admiralty of May 6, 1872, relating to the remedy where supplies are furnished a ship, does not apply to suits brought or supplies furnished before that date 689

One who purchases a vessel sold under process of state courts with knowledge that a proceeding in admiralty was pending against the vessel is not entitled to an order requiring the marshal to deliver possession of the vessel 692

A steamship in charge of a pilot is not liable for injury to a seine in such part of the channel that the steamship would have been in danger of grounding if she had attempted to go around it..... 760

Public regulations—Title to vessel.

The mere statement of the record owner of a vessesl, who had previously sworn that he was the owner, is not sufficient to show that he is not interested in her..... 266

The register of a vessel is the only document which need be on board in time of universal peace, in compliance with warranty of national character 291

The general owner of a ship is deemed the owner for the voyage, notwithstanding a charter party, if he retains the possession and control of the navigation of the ship during the voyage..... 374

In a libel for the forfeiture of a vessel, confessions of the consignee are not admissible to charge the offense on the owner or captain 548

A forfeiture cannot be enforced against a vessel except on pleading and proof that the acts charged were done by the master willfully 548

The statement of title of a vessel in the customhouse documents is not conclusive on third parties 609

St. Mass. 1847, c. 234, § 2, requiring vessels in Boston harbor to rig in jib booms in certain cases, is valid.....1095

The master.

Where the master is separated from the ship by death or other casualty, the mate succeeds to the command..... 150

A majority of shipowners may dismiss the master, though a co-owner, at any time without cause 624

Where one of the owners of a vessel gave his note for supplies furnished by libellant, and on a settlement charged the master, who was the other owner, with his portion thereof, the master was not thereby relieved from liability to libellant..... 680

Page

Master who is authorized to draw on a certain house for a certain sum, and instructed to "extend his drawing," should he not have funds to purchase a cargo, only authorizes him to draw on the house named..1025

Master may bind vessel and cargo for loan to pay liens of salvors, and prevent delay and expense in their enforcement.....1075

Cargo—Loss or injury.

The owners of a ship must show that missing portions of a cargo were discharged, and placed on that part of the wharf selected for the deposit of the consignee's goods.. 58

Loss by rats is not an act of God or a danger of the sea..... 76

Where owners of goods claim that they were damaged on the voyage by rats, the burden is on them to show such fact..... 82

The publication of the cargo list of a steamer was not such a notice to the consignee as to discharge the shipowner from liability under a bill of lading, the goods having been unloaded, and sold for storage.. 233

A vessel is liable in rem for damages caused to goods of one shipper by those of another..... 579

A vessel is liable for carrying goods on deck, though the bill of lading exempts him from liability for the perils of the sea..... 663

Limiting liability.

Statutes of the United States limiting the liability of shipowners does not limit the liability of a foreign shipowner for a collision between an American and a foreign vessel on the high seas..... 676

It is not necessary to jurisdiction of a petition to limit the liability under Act March 3, 1851, that the court should have possession of the vessel or of the proceeds, and the pendency of suits against the vessel and of stipulations of value is no reason why the proceeding should not be taken..... 782

Agreement of consortship.

Persons joining or becoming interested in a vessel during an agreement of consortship enter on the relation, and assume the risk of profit or loss..... 268

Change of owners, masters, or crew of one vessel without notice to the other party cannot affect an agreement of consortship.... 268

Though the interest of a vessel in a consortship may be small, this will never be presumed, but the general principle governs, that the interest of the vessel controls..... 268

In the absence of stipulation in an agreement of consortship, it can be terminated only by voluntary dissolution and notice.. 268

An agreement of consortship is for and on account of the vessels, though made by the masters..... 268

Burden of proving that an agreement of consortship is limited is on the party alleging it..... 268

Agreement of consortship by masters of vessels will be considered general unless limited by special understanding when made.. 268

SLAVERY.

A forfeiture of a vessel is not incurred by its building for the purpose of the slave trade, but only for the fitting out or causing her to sail for such purpose..... 90

An information against a vessel charging "that she was built, fitted, equipped, loaded, or otherwise prepared or caused to sail" is bad for uncertainty..... 90

Emancipation by will does not need the assent of executor..... 477

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE.

Page

A bond for a deed, on consideration that the obligors, "the trustees of the schools of Portland, and their successors in office," shall perform certain things, is a mere gratuitous promise until performed, and will not be enforced..... 487

Agreement by foreign railroad company with domestic company to build road different from that required by domestic company's charter will not be specifically enforced 1044

An oral promise by purchaser at execution sale to reconvey to the execution debtor on reimbursement is not enforceable in equity 1154

Specific performance may be enforced in favor of a party who has not punctually performed the contract, where his default admits of compensation..... 1170

STATUTES.

Act Cong. March 3, 1817, entitled "An act to incorporate the subscribers to certain banks in the District of Columbia," is a public law..... 357

Law declaring a bridge a lawful structure pending a suit to declare it a nuisance removes the ground of complaint.....1060

In order to ascertain whether "coke" is within the designation of "coal" in the tariff act, the intention of congress, as well as the commercial meaning of the word, will be inquired into.....1144

A charter must be construed according to the intent of the legislature, if such intent can be ascertained by the language used 1172

SUBROGATION.

A surety on a bond in admiralty, who pays the money, is subrogated to the rights of an original libellant..... 164

SUBSCRIPTION.

A promise, made publicly in church, to subscribe a portion of the indebtedness due from the church, is valid, where expenses were incurred on the faith of such promise.. 38

SUNDAY.

A notice cannot be lawfully served on Sunday 562

TAXATION.

Stock of the United States is not taxable.. 167

Lands purchased of the United States, and paid for, though not patented, may be taxed 167

A corporation is not bound to produce its books to the assessor on an inquiry into the income of its shareholders..... 401

A statute authorizing the issue of bonds by a city for the benefit of a private enterprise is void..... 737

An income tax is not a "capitation or other direct tax," within the prohibition of Const. U. S. art. 1, § 9..... 981

Congress has power to impose a tax on incomes 981

Quaere, whether uninhabited township owned in severalty is rightly included in a tax act which did not provide for the valuation of the land of the different owners.... 984

Statutory provision for enforcing forfeiture for nonpayment of tax must be strictly followed 984

Forfeiture for nonpayment of tax is waived by levy of another tax after title of state had become perfect..... 984

Page

Assessment by county commissioner of larger sum than is granted by legislature vitiates the whole tax..... 984

An act of legislature giving further time to pay a tax after forfeiture for nonpayment waives the forfeiture..... 984

Advertisement of delinquent tax as including an illegal county tax as part of the amount due is a fatal defect..... 984

TENANCY IN COMMON.

The liability of a tenant in common of mineral land, who takes ore therefrom, is the value of his cotenant's share of the ore in place.....1097

TOWAGE.

A tug which ran its tow aground is liable for the amount the tow was compelled to pay another tug as salvage for pulling her off 384

Owner of barge lost by negligence of tug may sue such tug therefor, though the barge was turned over to defendant tug by another tug, with which the contract for towage was made.....1008

A tug is justifiable in abandoning tow where towline breaks at night during severe storm, and attempts to regain it would be very dangerous to tug.....1009

Decision of master of tug, acted on in good faith, to abandon tow in storm, will not be impeached, unless clearly erroneous 1009

Burden is on tug which abandons tow in storm to show sufficient excuse therefor..1009

TRADE-MARKS AND TRADE-NAMES.

The use of one's label for the purpose of deceiving purchasers will be enjoined....1184

The owner of a label will be protected against the use by another person of a label so similar as to deceive the public, though no fraudulent intent be proved....1184

Nominal damages only will be given for infringing a label, where no specific injury has been proved.....1184

Injunction against use of a label will not be granted unless complainant's right is clear 1186

TRESPASS.

Where defendant pleaded that civil war existed, and that the alleged trespasses were by virtue of an order of the general commanding the army in that department, defendant is protected by Const. Mo. art. 11, § 4 865

An internal revenue officer, who, under color of his office, commits a trespass, is liable therefor; such cases being contemplated by the internal revenue act of July 13, 1866 1140

An action against an internal revenue officer for a trespass committed under color of his office (July 13, 1866) cannot be brought until the six months specified in the act had expired 1140

TRIAL.

Objections to testimony must point out a part to which the objection lies..... 118

On a difference of opinion between two judges, the court will refuse to give the instructions asked 868

Special finding of facts in action at law tried by court is not necessary to secure right to move for new trial or to appeal..1022

Page

Trial by court without jury is not concluded until formal findings of facts are made 1022

On trial of an action at law without a jury, it is discretionary with the court to make either general or special findings on the facts 1022

Procedure on trial in action at law by the court stated.....1022

Danger of prejudice to successful party by special finding of facts stated.....1022

TROVER AND CONVERSION.

In trover it is not necessary to prove a demand when there has been an actual conversion 118

Possession of goods by a bankrupt, and his removal and sale of it, in connection with a third person, is evidence of conversion 123

A demand and refusal or an actual conversion is necessary to sustain trover..... 468

TRUSTS.

In order to set aside a purchase of trust property from a trustee authorized to sell, on the ground of collusion, the fraud must be clearly proven..... 111

Where an officer of a bank, being a member of a firm, lends to it money of the bank, it cannot be followed into the hands of the firm 245

Interest will not be allowed against a trustee where he had received no interest, if there was no neglect or use of the money on his part..... 277

Where a husband, a trustee of land in which his wife has a life interest, conveys the same, the wife also signing the deed, and deposits the proceeds in a firm of which he was a member, the wife has no title in the money so deposited..... 640

Where a memorandum of sale recited a receipt of money from B. and C. on a contract of sale, parol evidence is admissible to show that C. did not advance any of the price, and that no resulting trust was created 858

Payment of a debt by a trustee to a receiver under a confiscation decree of a Confederate court is a breach of trust..... 869

USE AND OCCUPATION.

Plaintiff can recover only for the time of the actual occupation though there be a parol lease for a whole year at a fixed rent.. 162

USURY.

Usury must be pleaded and proved.....1038

VENUE IN CIVIL CASES.

An issue from the orphans' court to the circuit court of the District of Columbia cannot be removed to another county..... 213

WHARVES.

Where libellant was the owner of a part of a wharf, he can recover as wharfage only his proportionate share of the statutory rate 768

WILLS.

A bequest of "all my estate, and the proceeds thereof, to my daughters," gives a married woman, a residuary legatee, the proceeds of the sale, and not a share of stocks constituting the residue, disencumbered from the marital rights of the husband 3

Page

On an issue devisavit vel non, the party contesting the will has the right to open and close..... 149

A devise of real estate "after the payment of debts" is a charge on the real estate 477

A specific legacy will not abate or contribute if there be enough without..... 477

Where testatrix charged her land and her personalty with her debts and legacies, and emancipated her slaves, and her personal estate was not sufficient without the slaves, but with the real estate was more than sufficient, the slaves were entitled to their freedom 477

If there be a fund for the payment of debts and legacies, the executor may be compelled to assent to a specific legacy... 477

Where a partner, by his will, makes his copartner executor, and devises the residue of his estate in trust for certain purposes, and authorizes him to use the property in the business until wanted for distribution, the residue, only, can be used in the business 814

Page

Where a bequest is to daughter, with provision that her husband should have the income after her death, and on his death the property to go to her children, the limitation in favor of the children terminates on the death of the daughter's husband in her lifetime 968

WITNESS.

A witness will not be compelled to testify against his interest in a cause in which he is interested 89

A creditor of a bankrupt is not a competent witness for the assignee in a suit to increase the estate..... 137

Little reliance can be placed on the testimony of a witness who contradicted himself on cross-examination..... 160

An agent is a competent witness to prove what he did as agent..... 468

A release, in favor of a witness, of all actions and causes of actions or a particular cause of action which had happened before the time of the release, will discharge the witness from all liability pending on the event of the suit in which he is called to testify 719

WEST PUBLISHING CO., PRINTERS AND STEREOTYPERS, ST. PAUL, MINN.