The rights of the contending parties grow out of several acts of congress to which we shall refer. On the 3d of March, 1871 [16 Stat. 470], an act was passed by the preamble of which it was declared, that it behooved the people of the United States to celebrate by appropriate ceremonies the centennial anniversary of the Declaration of Independence, and that it was fitting the completion of the first century of our national existence should be commemorated by an exhibition of the natural resources of the country and their development, and of its progress in those arts which benefit mankind, in comparison with those of other nations, and that as the exhibition should be a national celebration, in which the people of the whole country should participate, it should have the sanction of the congress of the United States. It was therefore enacted that a commission, consisting of not more than one delegate from each state and territory, should be appointed by the president of the United States, on the nomination of the governors of the states and territories respectively, whose duty it should be to prepare and superintend the execution of a plan for holding the exhibition in Philadelphia. The commission was also required to report to congress a suitable date for opening and closing the exhibition, a schedule of appropriate ceremonies, a plan or plans of the buildings, a complete plan for the reception and classification of articles intended for exhibition, and the requisite custom-house regulations for the introduction into the country of the articles from foreign countries intended for exhibition. Provision was also made for notice to the diplomatic representatives of foreign nations, and of the regulations that might be adopted by the commissioners by a proclamation of the president, in order that the time and place of holding the exhibition, and the regulations therefor, might be published in their respective countries. This act, though it declared the United States should not be liable for any expenses attending the exhibition, or by reason thereof, plainly recognized it as a national celebration, in which the whole country should participate, and gave to it the sanction of congress. 16 Stat. 470. It was followed by another act, approved June 1, 1872 (17 Stat. 203), which, after premising that such provision should be made for procuring the requisite funds, as would enable all the people of the United States to aid in the preparation and conduct of the exhibition and memorial celebration, created the complainants a body corporate, to be known as "The Centennial Board of Finance," to continue to have corporate existence until the object for which it was formed should be accomplished. The corporators were taken from every state and territory. A capital stock, not exceeding $10,000,000, divided into shares of $10 each, was authorised, and stock certificates, prepared by the secretary of the treasury, were directed to be issued to the subscribers for the stock. The proceeds of all such subscriptions were ordered to be used for the expenditures required in carrying out the objects of the act of March 3, 1871; and the corporation was empowered to borrow money, to issue bonds therefor, not in excess of its capital stock, and to secure the payment of the same, principal and interest, by mortgage upon its property and prospective income. By the 10th section it was enacted "that, as soon as practicable after the said exhibition shall have closed, it shall be the duty of said corporation to convert its property into cash, and, after the payment of all its liabilities, to divide its remaining assets among its stockholders, in full satisfaction and discharge of its capital stock;" and it was made the duty of the Centennial Commission to supervise the closing up of the affairs of the corporation, to audit its accounts, and to submit to the president a report of the financial results of the Centennial Exhibition. Thus, it plainly appears, not only that the exhibition was a national one, set on foot and sanctioned by congress, but that the Centennial Commission and the Centennial Board were made the agents of the government in preparing and conducting it. Under this legislation the corporation was authorised, and stock subscriptions, for which certificates were issued, to the amount of about $2,400,000 were made, which are still outstanding. The subscriptions were made in reliance upon the provisions of the act of congress. The number of subscribers was very large, and they are scattered all over the United States, holding the stock in various amounts, from one share to ten thousand; the number held by the state of New Jersey.

Such had been the action of congress, and such were the rights of stockholders when the act of February 16, 1876 [19 Stat. 4], was enacted, out of which arises the controversy in this case. Its preamble is significant. After referring to the act of March 3, 1871, and the act of June 1, 1872, and after reciting that the president of the United States in compliance with a joint resolution of congress, approved June 5, 1874 [18 Stat. 53], had extended to foreign nations, in the name of the United States, an invitation to take part in the international exposition to be held in Philadelphia, under the auspices of the government, and after reciting that the governments so invited, to the number of thirty-eight, had accepted the invitation, and were making extensive preparations to embrace the courtesy so extended to them, "thereby rendering proper arrangements for the coming ceremonies, on the part of the government of the United States, a matter of honor and good faith," the preamble asserted that the preparations designed by the United States Centennial Commission, and in part executed by the Centennial Board of Finance, were in accordance with the spirit of the acts of congress relating thereto, and on a scale creditable to the government and people of the United States. It was therefore enacted as follows: "That the sum of $1,500,000 to complete the Centennial buildings and other preparations, be and the same is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the United States treasury not otherwise appropriated, which shall be paid on the drafts of the president and treasurer of the Centennial Board of Finance, one-third immediately after the passage of this act, and the remainder in four equal monthly payments, provided, that in the distribution of any moneys that may remain in the treasury of the Centennial Board of Finance, after the payment of its debts, as provided for by the tenth section of the act of congress, approved June 1, 1872, incorporating said Centennial Board of Finance, the appropriation hereinbefore made shall be paid in full into the treasury of the United States, before any dividend or percentage of the profits shall be paid to the holders of said stock. Provided, also, that the government of the United States shall not, under any circumstances, be liable for any debt or obligation of the United States Centennial Commission or the Centennial Board of Finance, or any payment in addition to the foregoing sum."

The appropriation was avowedly made to complete the necessary preparations for a celebration and exhibition which congress had declared national, and under its sanction, in which other nations had been invited by the government to join, and the proper arrangements for which the preamble to the act declared to be a matter of honor and good faith on the part of the government of the United States. It was, therefore, meeting at least an honorable obligation, and that it was so considered may be inferred from the closing words of the section, which declared the United States should not be liable for any obligation or payment "in addition to the sum" appropriated. A careful inspection of this act, under which alone the United States asserts a claim to any portion of the funds in the hands of the complainants, makes it evident that congress did not intend thereby to create the relation of debtor and creditor between the Centennial Board of Finance and the United States. The language used is the ordinary language of an appropriation, not of a loan. No evidences of debt were required from the board. Bonds were not exacted for the return of the money, though by the act of 1872 the board was empowered to borrow money and give bonds therefor, and though the president of the board was required by the second section of this act to execute a bond with sufficient security in the sum of $500,000, conditioned for the safe-keeping and faithful disbursement of the sum appropriated. Were it not for the proviso relative to the distribution of any moneys that might remain in the treasury of the board, or (as they are called in the act of 1872) "remaining assets," after the payment of all its liabilities, there could be no pretence that the act was anything more than a mere appropriation demanded by the honor and good faith of the government. But even the proviso repels the idea that the board became a debtor by receiving the sum appropriated. It reserves no right to the United States until the debts of the board shall have been paid. It is only "after the payment of its debts," not after the payment of its other debts, but after all its debts shall have been satisfied, that any payment into the treasury of the United States is required to be made. If the appropriation was intended to be a loan merely, it created a debt, and was demandable as such, without adding the words, "after payment of its debts." It would be an absurd meaning to attribute to congress that they intended to say that after the payment of its debts the board shall pay another one of its debts. And if it had been intended the board should be a debtor for the amount of the appropriation, but that its payment should be postponed till the other debts were paid, the language used would have been, "after its other debts are discharged," or words equivalent. It seems plain, therefore, even from the reading of the proviso, that is was not the purpose of congress to assume for the government the position of a creditor. That was carefully avoided. Congress had in view the fact that at the close of the exhibition, its agent, the corporation, would wind up, and, after paying its debts, would distribute its remaining assets, and the proviso reserves nothing more than a right to be a possible distributee of a portion of those assets. It was not known how large they would be; whether they would suffice to repay what the stockholders had paid in, and profits on their investment, or not. It may have been supposed the exhibition would yield profits on the investment.

If then the appropriation was not intended to have the character of a loan, creating a debt of the board, and to be paid as a debt, the stockholders who subscribed for the stock have, by the tenth section of the act of 1876, a clear right to the "remaining assets," at least to the extent of their capital invested. The section enacted, as we have seen, that after the close of the exhibition it should be the duty of the board to convert its property into cash, and after the payment of all its liabilities (or debts as they are called in the act of 1876), to divide its remaining assets pro rata among its stockholders, in full satisfaction and discharge of its capital stock. The stockholders were thus entitled to a satisfaction of their stock out of whatever assets remained after the payment of the debts of the corporation. It is not to be assumed that congress intended to take away the right without the consent of the stockholders. The directors of the corporation could not bargain it away. And there are no words of repeal in the later act; nor is there any necessary implication of an intent to repeal. The proviso, therefore, must receive a construction, consistent, so far as possible, with the provisions of the act of 1872. Its direction is, that after the payment of the debts of the Centenial Board, the appropriation shall be paid in full, into the treasury of the United States before any "dividend or percentage of the profits shall be paid to the holders of the stock." What is meant by "dividend or percentage of profits"? It is observable that in all the legislation respecting the Centennial Exhibition, the word "profits" here first appears. In the act of 1872, the residue after payment of the liabilities, was called "remaining assets," and in a former part of this act it was called "moneys that remain." But when the fund is mentioned, to which the United States may resort, in case there is such a fund, it is called "profits." The phraseology is changed, and with it, we think, the meaning. So far as the United States has rights as a distributee, the subject for distribution is "profits," not "remaining assets," not capital. Before any dividend or percentage, or proportion of the profits may be paid to the stockholders, the appropriation must be paid into the United States treasury. If there are no profits the government has no claim. Now, what are the profits of a corporation that has a capital stock? Very plainly, only what has been gained beyond the stock. They are always acquisitions beyond the investment or expenditures. Nobody would think a tax on the profits of a bank or an insurance company, or, indeed, of any corporation, was a tax on its capital, or a tax on its entire property, if that property had been converted into cash in the process of winding up. Congress, in the proviso, is speaking of the profits of a corporation, and it is to them, and them only, it sets up a claim. But in this case there were no profits. The assets remaining after the payment of debts, and now for distribution, are only remnants of the capital, and insufficient to return what the stockholders paid in. We think the word "dividend," as well as the word "percentage," points to profits and not to capital. They are synonyms, as here employed. That the word "dividend" is sometimes used to describe a distribution of capital may be admitted, but such an use is abnormal. It is more commonly used to denote a division of profits, and very evidently it was so employed in this proviso. It was not said dividend unqualifiedly, or dividend of the remaining assets, or dividend of moneys that remain after payments of debts, but it was used in connection with profits, "dividend or percentage of the profits—that is, as we understand the phrase, dividend, portion, or percentage of the profits." If it was intended to embrace a division of all the moneys remaining in the treasury of the board why were the words "or percentage of the profits" added? If the amount appropriated was meant to be paid before the stockholders could get anything, those added words were totally unnecessary and unmeaning. The introduction of the word "profits" could have had no other object than to designate the subject of the dividend or percentage. If it was intended to give the United States a prior claim on the entire remaining assets, it would have been sufficient to have said before any dividend or division shall be made among the stockholders—and we are not at liberty to say the added words have no meaning.

For these reasons, we are of the opinion that the fund in the treasury of the Centennial Board of Finance should be distributed pro rata among the stockholders of the corporation as directed by the tenth section of the act of 1872 [17 Stat. 210], and as it is insufficient to pay the stockholders the full amount invested by them as stockholders, as no part of it is made up of profits, the case contemplated in the proviso has not arisen, and the United States is entitled to no part of the funds. Let a decree be prepared accordingly.

And now, January 19th, 1877, this case having been heard upon the bill and answers, and having been argued by counsel, whereupon, in consideration thereof, it is ordered and decreed that the complainants do pay and distribute the fund in their hands to and among the several and respective stockholders of the complainant, pro rata, according to the true intent and meaning of the act of congress, approved the 16th day of February, 1876, and it appearing that the said fund is not sufficient to pay to the said stockholders the full amount invested by them, it is ordered that no part of the said fund be paid into the treasury of the United States. And it is further ordered that upon such payment and distribution among the said stockholders being made, the complainant do stand discharged of and from all liability in the premises. And it is further ordered that the costs in this cause be paid out of the said fund.

[NOTE. George Eyster, the assistant treasurer of the United States at Philadelphia, appealed from the decree of the circuit court. The supreme court reversed the decree, and held, per Mr. Chief Justice Waite, that the act of 1876 did not change the order of distribution provided by the act of 1872, and that consequently, on distribution of the assets of the board on the closing up of its affairs, the United States was entitled to repayment of the congressional appropriation of $1,500,000 before there could be any division of the assets among the stockholders. CENTENNIAL CATALOGUE CO. v. PORTER et al.

Circuit Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. 1876.

COPYRIGHT NOT ASSERTABLE IN A PROJECTED WORK—INJUNCTION TO PROTECT.

[1. There can be no copyright of an inchoate intended publication.]

[2. The book is the subject of copyright, not the subject.]

[3. Injunction will not lie to protect a projected publication.]

An injunction was asked for to restrain the defendants, who, it was alleged, were about to issue a catalogue of the exhibitors at the Centennial Exhibition at Philadelphia. The bill set forth that the commission had partly written, and were causing to be written with as much expedition as possible, manuscripts of the official catalogues of the several departments of the exhibition; that on the 25th Sept., 1875, they deposited in the office of the librarian of congress the titles of separate books, in the following form: "United States Centennial Commission. International Exhibition, 1876. Official Catalogue of the Department of Mining, Metallurgy, Manufactures, Education and Science. All rights reserved. Philadelphia, 1876;" together with similar titles for the departments of agriculture, horticulture, machinery and art; the rights whereof they claimed as proprietors under the copyright laws of the United States; that on Nov. 1st, 1875, the centennial board of finance, with the consent of the commission, granted the exclusive right of publishing said catalogues to the assignors of complainants, and that portions of the catalogues had been already printed by complainants. The plaintiffs' book was in a form called a dummy, i. e., a book containing a few printed leaves followed by blank ones. The plaintiffs contended that although subject-matter open to all the world cannot be copyrighted, as a general principle, in this particular case it was different, because the information from which alone a catalogue could be prepared had been expressly reserved to the commission and their assigns, and all exhibitors and visitors were subject to the reservation by the published regulations. The objection was to the publication by the defendants of a list of leading exhibitors. They further maintained that by taking the initiatory steps in recording the title, they became entitled to protection, and the congressional librarian in his pamphlet of instructions declares that a copyright may be secured for a projected as well as for a completed work, and cited 2 Morgan, Lit. 232; Pulte v. Derby [Case No. 11,465]; Roberts v. Meyers, 13 Month. Law Rep. 401; Boucicault v. Wood [Case No. 1,693]; Abernethy v. Hutchinson, 1 Hall & T. 28; Prince Albert v. Strange, 2 De Gex & S. 674; Rev. St. §§ 4964, 4970.

CADWALADER, District Judge, considered that the plaintiffs were not in a condition to make such a book as shown in the application. It was something new to him that copyright was applicable to an inchoate and intended publication. Assuming that a manuscript could be copyrighted, the question was whether it must not be in the form in which it is to be printed. The difficulty was that the plaintiffs had no copyright in the subject but only in the work. If there is anything but literary piracy, their remedy is in the state courts. There is no remedy in the United States court until it comes to infringement of literary property. The plaintiffs go upon the ground of literary property, not in print and only partly in manuscript. The jurisdiction of the court is only over printed matter. The mere threat to print a book does not give it jurisdiction. The act says a book, not an intended book. The injunction was therefore refused.

BANKRUPTCY—RESTRAINING ASSIGNEE FROM PROSECUTING SUIT IN STATE COURT.

A petition was filed by a creditor to restrain the assignee in bankruptcy from prosecuting a certain action of law in the supreme court of New York state to recover the payment of money made contrary to the provisions of the thirty-ninth section of the bankrupt act, [14 Stat. 536], claiming to recover back the amount so paid. Held, that said act is the law of the state courts as well as of the national tribunals, and if by virtue of that act the state court has no jurisdiction in the action brought against the petitioners, it will so decide upon proper plea and that no reason appears to compel the assignee to resort to the national tribunals instead of those of the state.

In bankruptcy.

A. W. Gazzam, for Chatham Bank.

BENEDICT, District Judge. This case came before me on a petition filed on behalf of the Chatham National Bank, in which they seek to obtain from the court, an order restraining the assignee in bankruptcy of the Central Bank from prosecuting in the supreme court of this state, a certain action of law which he has there commenced against the petitioners, to recover of them the amount of a payment of money which the assignee claims to have been a preferential payment, made contrary to the provisions of the thirty-ninth section of the bankrupt act, and which he therefore claims to recover back by virtue of the provisions of the bankrupt act. The application is based upon the ground that the state tribunals are without jurisdiction to entertain such an action as the one referred to. I do not so understand the law. The provision of the second chapter of the bankrupt act does indeed confer upon the district and circuit courts jurisdiction of certain actions, but I have never supposed the effect of that section to be to oust the jurisdiction of the state courts. Moreover, in such a case as the one under consideration, the bankrupt act is the law of the state courts as well as of the national tribunals, and if by virtue of that act the state court has no jurisdiction in the action brought against the petitioners, it will so decide upon proper plea. I think the question of jurisdiction should be there decided, and that no reason appears for the exercising of the restraining power of this court over the assignee, to compel him in a case like this to resort to the national tribunals instead of those of the state.

CENTRAL BANK v. TAYLOE.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 427.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Oct. Term, 1823.

PRODUCTION OF BOOKS AND PAPERS—INCORPORATION OF BANKS IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA—MISNOMER OF CORPORATION—PLEA IN ABATEMENT.

1. Upon motion of the plaintiff, and notice, the court will order the defendant to produce books and papers on a certain day before the trial, that the plaintiff may have an opportunity to inspect them.

[Cited in U. S. v. Youngs, Case No. 16,783.]

2. The act of congress of the 3d of March, 1817 [3 Stat. 383], entitled "An act to incorporate the subscribers to certain banks in the District of Columbia, and to prevent the circulation of the notes of unincorporated associations within the said district," is a public law; and the corporate name of the bank incorporated by the 23d section thereof, is "The Central Bank of Georgetown and Washington," and not "The President and Directors of the Central Bank of Georgetown and Washington."

3. Quaere, whether the misnomer of a body corporate must be pleaded in abatement.

Assumpsit [by the Central Bank of Georgetown and Washington against John Tayloe] upon an open account, and for moneys lent and advanced.

Mr. Jones, for plaintiff, having given notice, now moved the court for an order on the defendant to produce his bank-book and surrendered vouchers, by a certain day before the trial.

Mr. Hay, for defendant, objected, that under the 15th section of the judiciary act of 1789 (1 Stat. 73), the party can only be compelled to produce books and papers in the trial, not before the trial. Geyger's Case, 2 Dall. [2 U. S.] 332.

THE COURT, however, on the 29th of December, 1823, ordered the defendant to produce his bank-book and vouchers on the 5th of January following, for the inspection of the plaintiff's counsel, in the presence of the defendant's counsel, if he wished to be present.

On the trial, Mr. Hay, for the defendant, contended that the plaintiffs had not sued by their corporate name, which he contended was "The President and Directors of the Central Bank of Georgetown and Washington," and not simply "The Central Bank of Georgetown and Washington," by which they had sued. He also contended that the act of March 3, 1817, was a private act, and must be shown and proved. He thereupon moved the court to instruct the jury that it was necessary that the plaintiffs, suing as a corporation, should show and prove that they had a legitimate existence, and by the name in the declaration mentioned.

Mr. Marbury, for the plaintiffs, suggested that if it was a misnomer it must be pleaded in abatement. 1 Chit. Pl. 440; Mayor, etc., v. Bolton, 1 Bos. & P. 40.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

THE COURT (nem. con.) instructed the jury that the act of congress of the 3d of March, 1817 (3 Stat. 383), entitled "An act to incorporate the subscribers to certain banks in the District of Columbia," &c., was a public law of which the court and jury were bound to take notice, and that the plaintiffs, by that law, were incorporated by the name in which they prosecuted the present action.

THE COURT did not decide whether, if it had been a misnomer, it could have been taken advantage of upon the general issue; but CRANCH, C. J., and THRUSTON, J., inclined strongly to the opinion that it must be pleaded in abatement. MORSELL, J., inclined to be of a contrary opinion. The court did not say whether it was necessary that the plaintiffs should prove that they were incorporated by the name in the declaration mentioned.

BANKRUPTCY—ASSIGNEE'S LIABILITY — JUDGMENT OF A STATE COURT.

H., having obtained judgment in a state court against the assignee of the bankrupt above named, in an action in which the assignee appeared and defended, the judgment providing that the judgment be paid out of the assets of the bankrupt in the assignee's hands; and having thereafter obtained a supplemental order in said action, directed to the bank which had been made the repository in which the funds of the bankrupt had been deposited, for the payment of such judgment out of the funds of the bankrupt on deposit in such bank, presented to this court a petition that this court would countersign the proper check for such payment by the assignee. On a reference being ordered, to take proofs, he produced a record of the judgment, and gave no other proof. Held, that such judgment did not furnish to this court legal grounds for directing the payment of the amount of it by the assignee.

The Central Bank of Brooklyn was adjudged a bankrupt on October 27th, 1870, and S. B. Dutcher was thereafter duly appointed assignee. On the 1st day of August, 1870, Joseph H. Havens, the petitioner herein, deposited in the bank a check for $3,125. On the 2d day of August, an injunction was issued against the bank as being insolvent, and a receiver was appointed. On the 3d of August, Havens demanded the return of the check, which was refused. On the appointment of the assignee in bankruptcy, the proceeds of the check were turned over to him, with the other property of the bank, and thereafter a suit was commenced in the supreme court of the state of New York by Havens against Dutcher, as assignee, to compel him to pay to Havens the amount of the check. The assignee appeared, and defended the action, which resulted in a judgment that Havens recover of the assignee the amount of the check, with interest and costs, amounting to $4,282.85, "the same to be paid out of the assets of said bank now in the possession of said defendant, as assignee, as aforesaid, or out of any assets that may hereafter come to his possession as such assignee as aforesaid." Thereafter Havens filed this petition in the bankruptcy court, praying that the court would countersign the proper check, to enable the assignee to pay him the amount of the said judgment. A reference was ordered to take proofs on the petition, and he produced as such proof only a record of the judgment.

E. L. Sanderson and John H. Bergen, for petitioner.

Tracy, Catlin & Brodhead, for assignee.

BENEDICT, District Judge. Joseph H. Havens presents to this court his petition, wherein he prays this court to countersign the proper check to enable Silas B. Dutcher, assignee of the Central Bank of Brooklyn, a bankrupt, to pay him the sum of $4,282.85.

In support of this petition, there has been exhibited to this court the record of an action, brought by the petitioner in the supreme court of the state of New York, wherein, on the 10th day of January, 1873, it was by said court adjudged that Havens, the petitioner, recover against Silas B. Dutcher, assignee as aforesaid, the sum of $3,657, together with the sum of $350.85 interest, and $275 costs, amounting in all to the sum of $4,282.85, "the said sum to be paid out of the assets of said Central Bank, now in possession of said defendant as assignee as aforesaid, or out of any assets that may hereafter come into his possession as such assignee as aforesaid."

The said record also shows that it was made to appear to the said supreme court that the National City Bank of Brooklyn held the moneys which had been received by the assignee of the Central Bank; whereupon, as also appeared by said record, on the 25th day of September, 1874, the said supreme court, in the action aforesaid, ordered "that the said National City Bank pay, within three days after service of a copy of this order, to E. L. Sanderson, the plaintiff's attorney, out of the twenty thousand dollars on deposit as aforesaid, the sum of four thousand two hundred and eighty-two dollars and eighty-five cents ($4,282.85), together with interest on that sum from the 22d day of May, 1874, amounting in the aggregate to the sum of four thousand three hundred and eighty-four dollars and fifty-three cents ($4,384.53); and upon said E. L. Sanderson delivering or tendering to said National City Bank a proper satisfaction of the judgment referred to in these proceedings, for which payment so to be made this order shall be the receipt and voucher of said bank."

The National City Bank, referred to in the above order, does not appear by said record to be a party defendant in the action brought by the petitioner; but that bank is a depository designated by this court, under the provisions of the bankrupt law of the United States, and of general order No. 28 issued by the supreme court of the United States, which requires the designation, by the district court of the United States, of a depository where all moneys received by the assignees shall be deposited, and which further provides "that no moneys so deposited shall be drawn from such depository unless upon a cheque or warrant signed by the clerk of the court, or by an assignee, and countersigned by the judge of the court, or one of the registers designated for that purpose, stating the date, sum, and the account for which it was drawn; and an entry of the substance of said check or warrant, with the date thereof, the sum drawn for, and the account for which it was drawn, shall be forthwith made in a book kept for that purpose by the assignee or clerk; and all cheques or drafts shall be entered in the order of time in which they are drawn, and shall be numbered in the case of each estate." This record is the only matter produced in evidence before me, and upon it the petitioner claims that he is entitled to ask the court to direct the payment to him of the amount of the said judgment out of the assets of the Central Bank. To this claim I cannot accede.

The judgment rendered by the supreme court of the state in the action brought by the petitioner, and upon which he makes his right to depend, is in excess of the jurisdiction of court of the state. The power of a state court to determine the liability of an assignee in bankruptcy by reason of his acts, where the assignee appears without objection and submits himself to the jurisdiction of the court, is not the question here; nor is the application by an assignee in bankruptcy for relief from the effects of a judgment against him, obtained in an action in the state where he properly appeared, and which he properly defended. Here the application is by a third party, who bases an application to be paid out of the funds of this court, as a court of bankruptcy, solely upon a judgment of a court of the state, directing that his demand be paid out of such funds. The proof of such judgment affords no legal ground for the action of this court. The prayer of the petitioner must therefore be denied.

CENTRAL OHIO RAILROAD et al. v. THOMPSON.

[2 Bond, 296.][1]

Circuit Court, S. D. Ohio. Oct. Term, 1869.

DECLARATION ON BILL OF EXCHANGE—SUFFICIENCY—NONRESPONSIVE PLEA—DUPLICITY—PLEADING TORTIOUS INJURY TO PROPERTY OF THIRD PERSONS.

1. A declaration, stating as the cause of action that the plaintiffs are the holders of certain bills of exchange, drawn by the agent of the defendant, and accepted by him, pursuant to a special agreement for that purpose between the parties, averring that the bills were drawn on a sufficient consideration, and were duly accepted by the defendant, and were protested for non-payment, is good on demurrer.

2. As the case in equity between these parties was appealed to the supreme court, and the decision by that court was that the plaintiffs' remedy was by action at law, and that the case must be remanded to this court for trial at law, the plaintiffs' right thus to sue can not be controverted.

3. It is no objection to the declaration, that the plaintiffs set forth, as the consideration on which the defendant agreed to accept and pay the bills, that the plaintiffs had agreed to transport mules and horses for the defendant, and had transported them according to agreement, and had drawn the bills in question as payment of the freight of the animals, whereby their right of action had accrued.

4. The material question in this case arises on the demurrer to the third special plea of the defendant, stating as a defense certain special agreements between the parties relating to the transportation of the animals, and averring a failure of the consideration on which the bills in question were drawn and accepted, by reason of the careless, negligent, and tortious manner of transporting the animals, whereby the defendant suffered damage in excess of the sum for which the bills were drawn. This plea is defective in not responding to the cause of action as set out in the declaration.

5. The cause of action set out in the declaration is substantially on the undertaking and promise of the defendant to accept and pay the bills as drawn, pursuant to the agreement between the parties, and his failure to perform that agreement.

6. Nothing is set forth in the plea in avoidance of the defendant's liability on his special agreement to accept and pay the bills; and as a commercial transaction his refusal to pay the bills, and suffering them to be protested, is a good cause of action against him by the holders.

7. The plea is also demurrable in that, while in its structure it is a plea in bar to the action, it sets up, by way of set-off, a claim to a judgment for a large amount, as damages sustained by the defendant for the alleged wrongful and tortious conduct of the plaintiffs in the transportation of the animals. This subjects the plea to the objection of duplicity.

8. If intended as a claim for unliquidated damages, it must be set forth in a separate plea.

9. The plea is also fatally defective in its showing that the alleged damage sustained by the defendant was for the wrongs or torts to property, of which he was only interested with other parties; and is no response to the declaration setting out a breach of the defendant's separate and individual promise.

10. If the parties who were interested in, or owners of, the animals have sustained the damages asserted, by the wrongful or tortious acts of the plaintiffs, their remedy must be by a separate action against the plaintiffs on that basis.

11. The defendant can not maintain his right to set up the defense that the plaintiffs were guilty of torts to the property of Thompson and Groom, and other parties, on the ground that he was the bailee of the property.

[At law. Action by the Central Ohio Railroad Company and the Steubenville & Indiana Railroad against Harrison Thompson, upon certain drafts given in payment for the transportation of stock for Thompson and Groom. The action was commenced in the state court, and was removed to the federal court by the defendant. In the latter court, complainants, having first obtained leave, filed a bill in chancery as a substitute for the petition filed in the state court. Defendant answered, setting up damages by reason of the negligent performance of the contract of transportation, and praying affirmative relief. Complainants replied, denying the negligence, sought discovery, and demurred to so much of the answer as sought affirmative relief. Defendant demurred to so much of complainants' pleading as prayed for a discovery, and on hearing in the circuit court the demurrer of complainants was sustained, that of defendant overruled, and a decree entered for complainants for the amount of the drafts. From this decree defendant appealed to the supreme court, which reversed the decree of the circuit court on the ground that complainants had mistaken their mode of procedure in the federal courts, and should have proceeded at law, and not in equity, there being nothing in the case to invoke equity jurisdiction; and the cause was remanded, with directions to dismiss the bill without prejudice. Thompson v. Central Ohio R. Co., 6 Wall. [73 U. S.] 134. Complainants, in accordance with this decision, recommenced their proceedings at law.]

A. F. Perry, for defendant.

OPINION OF THE COURT. The questions now before the court arise on a special demurrer to the third plea of the defendant. The declaration, in four separate counts, sets forth the grounds on which the plaintiffs seek a recovery. The first and second counts aver that the plaintiffs are the holders and owners of the drafts or bills described in said counts, alleged to have been drawn by the defendant through his agent on himself, payable at one day's sight at the Bank of the Metropolis, in the District of Columbia, with exchange on New York. These drafts, it is averred, were drawn on a sufficient consideration, and were duly accepted by the defendant, and not being paid, were protested, whereby the defendant became liable to pay to the plaintiffs the amount of said several drafts. The third count is on another draft or bill, drawn in the same manner as those described in the first and second counts, and for a like consideration; but not accepted or paid by the defendant. The fourth is a general count, averring an indebtedness to the plaintiffs for the transportation of horses and mules for the defendant, and at his request, with the usual averment of a promise to pay.

As introductory to the plaintiffs' right of action on the bills or drafts described in the first, second, and third counts of the declaration, and explanatory of their ownership of and legal right thereto, the declaration avers, in substance, that on October 1, 1861, in consideration that the plaintiffs, before that time, at the instance and request of the defendant, had transported a large number of mules from and to the places named in the declaration, the defendant was indebted to the plaintiffs in the several sums stated in the several counts, agreed and undertook to pay the same by drafts, to be drawn by his agent or himself, to be accepted by him as already stated. There is no averment, however, that the mules transported were the property of the defendant; and the basis of the plaintiffs' right to a recovery in this action, is the promise and undertaking of the defendant to accept and pay the bills or drafts drawn on him by his agent, and his neglect or refusal to do so. As the demurrer to the defendant's third plea, by a familiar rule of pleading, reaches to the declaration, it will be proper here to inquire preliminarily whether the plaintiffs, in the case made by them, have shown a right to maintain an action to recover the sums stated in the first, second, and third counts, on the several bills or drafts described, upon the averment that they are the holders and owners of the same, without indorsement to them. This can not be a question on this demurrer, for the reason that the supreme court of the United States, in the case in chancery between these parties appealed from this court, adjudged that the remedy of the plaintiffs was not in equity, but by action at law, and therefore remanded the case to this court to be tried in an action at law. [Thompson v. Central Ohio R. Co.] 6 Wall. [73 U. S.] 134. And there seems to be no room for a doubt that the averments of the declaration show a promise and undertaking by the defendant, creating a legal liability, for which an action may be sustained. There is set forth a promise, upon an alleged consideration, to do an act which the defendant has failed to perform, by reason of which a right of action has accrued to the plaintiffs.

The only inquiry for the court on this demurrer is, therefore, whether the third plea of the defendant sets forth legal and sufficient grounds to defeat the plaintiffs' right to a recovery in this action. Without reciting in detail the defendant's third plea, which is of great length, and seemingly obnoxious to the charge of prolixity, it will be sufficient to state its substance. It begins with an averment that the several causes of action stated in the declaration are all parts of one and the same transaction, growing out of the same contract, in which the promises of the defendant were conditional and dependent on obligations to be performed by the plaintiffs, which they did not, and would not, perform. The plea then avers that on August 30, 1861, and prior and subsequent to that date, the plaintiffs were two railroad companies, each constituting a part of a through line for the transportation of live stock and other property from Cincinnati, to Pittsburg, Harrisburg, Baltimore, and other places; that the joint agent of the two companies at Cincinnati on the said August 30, 1861, submitted a proposition in writing, by which the railroads offered to transport all the horses and mules that Thompson and Groom, and such other persons as they might be interested with, might wish to transport within the next forty days from Cincinnati, by way of Columbus, Steubenville, or Bellair to Pittsburg and Harrisburg, or Baltimore, at certain rates for each car-load, as named in the proposition. And after other stipulations, not material to notice, the written offer of the agent proposed, that for the transportation of horses and mules, William Stuart, as agent of the plaintiffs at Pittsburg, should be authorized to draw on the defendant at the Bank of the Metropolis, in Washington, D. C., at one day's sight for each shipment, separately, as forwarded from Pittsburg, the drafts to be paid promptly in exchange on New York. The plea then avers, that on the same day, and as a part of the same transaction, the defendant accepted in writing the said offer of the plaintiffs' agent, signing the name of Thompson & Groom. The plea then sets forth, that, at the same time, the defendant, in his individual name, signed a written stipulation to the effect that, in pursuance of the foregoing agreement, he authorized William Stuart, as his agent at Pittsburg, to draw on him at one day's sight, at the Bank of the Metropolis, Washington City, payable in exchange on New York, for each shipment by Thompson & Groom, as the same should be forwarded from Pittsburg. The plea then avers, that pursuant to this arrangement large numbers of horses and mules were offered to the plaintiffs for transportation and were received by them; and that, although some were transported under said agreement, in relation to other portions of the animals the plaintiffs were guilty of sundry wrongful acts of commission and omission whereby the animals were greatly injured, and the owners suffered damage to an amount exceeding $24,000, and largely in excess of the sum claimed in this action as due to the plaintiffs. These alleged tortious acts on the part of the plaintiffs are set forth at great length and with great particularity in the plea; but, for the purposes of the question on this demurrer, it is unnecessary to notice them in detail.

This statement presents, in brief, the grounds of defense set up in the third plea. It purports to be, in its main features, a plea in bar. It is certainly somewhat peculiar in its structure, and has not been drawn with a very strict reference to the rules of special pleading still in force in this court. It is not proposed to notice the numerous points made by the counsel for the plaintiffs in his very elaborate argument in support of the demurrer. There are two objections to the plea which seem to be decisive, and these will be noticed very briefly. The first is, that the plea, without denying the material allegations of the declaration on which the plaintiffs base their right to recover, avers, in avoidance of the defendant's liability, the failure of the plaintiffs to perform another agreement between other parties, the performance of which is alleged to be a condition precedent to any liability by the defendant on his promise or undertaking as set out in the declaration. As before stated, the contract obligation of the defendant, as averred, is, in substance, that in consideration that the plaintiffs had agreed to transport horses and mules at the rates stated, for Thompson & Groom and the persons with whom they might be associated, from and to the places named, the defendant authorized Stuart, as his agent, to draw on him for each shipment made from Pittsburg; the bills so drawn to be in exchange in New York. The declaration avers, that shipments were made from Pittsburg, in consideration of which the defendant's agent drew the several bills in payment described in the declaration, two of which were accepted by the defendant but not paid—the third not accepted or paid. Then follows the averment of the defendant's liability to pay these bills, in virtue of his agreement to accept and pay them. There would seem to be no ground for a doubt that the facts averred in the declaration show a good cause of action against the defendant. His promise to accept and pay the bills to be drawn by his agent is clearly a valid promise, and his failure to do so imports a liability to the plaintiffs as the owners and holders of the bills. The only question, therefore, arising on the demurrer is, whether the matters set forth in the plea are a legal and valid ground of objection to the plaintiffs' claim. And it seems clear, that the plea does not respond to the cause of action asserted by the plaintiffs. It does not deny that shipments of animals were made pursuant to the agreement between the parties, for which the bills were severally drawn; but avers that, under the agreement to transport horses and mules for Thompson & Groom and their associates, the plaintiffs failed to perform their agreement and were guilty of sundry torts, whereby they sustained great injuries. But there is no averment in the plea of any non-performance or tort in reference to the shipments for freight of which the bills were drawn. In a word, there is no averment in the plea of any facts in avoidance of the defendant's liability on his separate, individual promise that the bills should be drawn, accepted, and paid by him; that in making this promise the defendant incurred an individual responsibility distinct from any liability by him as a member of the firm of Thompson & Groom, is a legal inference from the facts set out in the declaration. In the written acceptance of the offer, by the plaintiffs, to transport stock for Thompson & Groom and the persons with whom they might be interested, he had signed the name of that firm of which he was a member. But as no mode of payment for freight was provided for in the plaintiff's proposition or the written acceptance of the firm, the defendant in his own name, took upon himself the responsibility of agreeing to accept and pay bills to be drawn on him for each shipment from Pittsburg.

It seems to the court, therefore, that the plea is defective in not responding to the allegations of the declaration, which assert the cause of action against the defendant. There is, also, as it seems to the court, another still more obvious objection to the plea. While it sets forth, as a bar to the action, substantially the non-performance of a condition precedent, it avers, by way of set-off, counterclaim, or recoupment of damages, a claim for a large sum, based on the alleged tortious acts of commission or omission by the plaintiffs in the transportation of the animals, and claims judgment for a large sum against the plaintiffs on that ground. The amount thus claimed, as before noticed, largely exceeds the sum claimed by the plaintiffs in this action. There is no rule of pleading known to the court, by which such a claim can be set up in a plea in bar of the action. If there is a basis for such a claim, it must be set forth in a separate plea of set-off, or by notice of special matter. Its insertion in this plea clearly subjects it to the charge of duplicity. And upon this ground, if upon no other, the demurrer must be sustained. But the court cannot perceive, that in any way the matter set forth in the plea can be available to the defendant, as a matter of set-off, counterclaim, or recoupment. The alleged tortious acts of the plaintiffs affect, not the property of the defendant, but the property of Thompson & Groom, and the unknown persons with whom they were associated. If, on the theory assumed by the court, the plaintiffs have set out a good cause of action against the defendant, it is clearly not competent for the defendant, in avoidance of his liability, to assert a claim against the plaintiffs for tortious acts affecting the property, not of himself, but of Thompson & Groom, and other persons. It needs no citation of authority in support of this proposition. It is not necessary to decide, whether, as a claim for unliquidated damages arising from alleged torts, it can, under any circumstances, be set up as a set-off to a claim founded on .contract. If Thompson & Groom, or other parties interested in the property injured by the torts of the plaintiffs, have a ground of action against the plaintiffs, their redress is open to them in a suit for that purpose. But, clearly, the defendant can not set off in this suit a claim for damages accruing to property of other persons. And this objection, as it seems to the court, is not obviated by the averment of the plea that the defendant was the bailee or factor of the owners of the animals alleged to have been injured, and as such had a qualified interest in them, and a right to maintain an action in his own name for the tortious acts of the plaintiffs. It is argued, that if he had such right to sue, he may defend in this suit by setting up the injuries sustained by the owners, on account of his interest in the property as bailee or factor. If such a plea were sustainable, it is not perceived how it could be available to the defendant, as asserted in this third plea. It would seem to be incongruous with other allegations and grounds of defense set up in the plea, and therefore subjecting it to the charge of duplicity. But if separately pleaded, it is liable to objection. In the first place, the defendant, as the partner of the firm of Thompson & Groom, had a proprietary interest in the property, and I do not perceive that in any legal sense he can be held to be a bailee or factor. And again, his liability to plaintiffs, as set forth in the declaration, is based on his individual contract, liability, or promise, in answer to which he can not assert, by way of set-off or otherwise, that he was bailee or factor for the owners, and that the property was injured by the wrongful acts of the plaintiff in its transportation.

These are all the points which it is deemed material to notice. In passing on this demurrer, I have not supposed it necessary to enter on a more elaborate consideration of the points adverted to, for the reason that the more important of them were brought to the notice of the court and decided when this case was before it, as a suit in chancery, prior to its removal to the supreme court. In that case, the court expressed the opinion, that if the allegations of misfeasance and malfeasance against the railroads, in the transportation of the animals in question, could be sustained by evidence, the owners had a plain remedy by suit for the injuries alleged, but that a recovery for these injuries is not available to the defendant, as a defense to his liability on the special contract or promise set up by the plaintiffs. The demurrer is sustained.

CENTRAL PAC. R. CO. v. BENITY.

[5 Sawy. 118;[1] 10 Chi. Leg. News, 147; 5 Reporter, 229.]

Circuit Court, D. Nevada. March 18, 1878.

EJECTMENT BY RAILWAY COMPANY FROM RIGHT OF WAY.

The act of congress of July 1, 1862 [12 Stat. 491], granting a right of way to the extent of two hundred feet on each side of its track to the Central Pacific Railroad Company, gives that company a right to the possession of the ground over which the grant extends, exclusive in its character, and the company may recover, in ejectment, the possession of a portion of the same from one who has wrongfully entered thereon.

This is a demurrer [by the defendant, Adolphus Benity] to a complaint in ejectment. The complaint states that by virtue of the act of congress of July 1, 1862 [12 Stat. 491], plaintiff is entitled to the possession of a certain tract of land (describing it) for railroad purposes, "being that portion of plaintiff's right of way, situated," etc. Section 2 of the act referred to provides: "That the right of way through the public lands be, and the same is hereby, granted to said company for the construction of said railroad and telegraph line; * * * said right of way is granted to said railroad to the extent of two hundred feet in width on each side of said railroad where it may pass over the public lands." The point raised by the demurrer is that the plaintiff's interest in the land is a mere easement, for the recovery of which ejectment will not lie.

J. B. Marshall and Harvey Brown, for plaintiff.

Boardman and Varian, for defendant.

Before SAWYER, Circuit Judge, and HILLYER, District Judge.

BY THE COURT (HILLYER, District Judge). We think it clear that the plaintiff, under his grant, has a right of entry upon and possession of the land in question, and that this right of possession is necessarily an exclusive right, as against all certainly, besides the United States, and gives the plaintiff such a legal interest in the land as enables it to maintain an action like the present, to recover the possession from one who has wrongfully entered thereon. The obstacles to this suit, such as they are, are entirely technical. If the plaintiff is entitled to actual possession of the land, for the purpose of effecting the object in view when the right of way was granted, it can recover such possession in some judicial proceeding. The mere form of the action has ceased to be of any importance in this court.

There is now but one form for all the common law actions. In every action the complaint contains a statement of the facts of the case, and is held sufficient, if the facts stated entitle the plaintiff to the relief demanded. We think this complaint does state a good case. It may be admitted that for the obstruction of a mere easement the recovery of the possession of the land itself would not be the proper remedy. But in order that the plaintiff in the case at bar may make such use of the land as the grantor intended it should under the grant of a right of way, it becomes necessary to take and keep an actual possession of the land. It must also be a possession exclusive of all other persons. This is obvious enough as to all the land upon which a track, a depot or other superstructure, is placed, and we think the same is true of the whole two hundred feet on each side of the track. The grant is a right of way to the extent of two hundred feet on each side of the track, and the plaintiff is entitled to possess and use the whole quantity.

This right of possession is a legal right, and will support an action to recover possession when there has been an ouster. It has been held that it would support such an action against the owner of the fee. City of Winona v. Huff, 11 Minn. 119 (Gil. 75); Dummer v. Den, 1 Spencer [20 N. J. Law] 86. On the other hand, it has been held that the owner of the fee could not recover the possession from a city entitled to use land as a public square, because the actual possession could not be delivered to him. Cincinnati v. White's Lessee, 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 431. This case does away with the idea that the owner of the fee may recover possession of the land dedicated to a public use, subject to the easement.

What has been said in reference to the character of the possession acquired by the plaintiff under its grant, is, if correct, an answer to the further objection of defendant to the complaint that it does not allege a present necessity for the use of the precise portion of the right of way occupied by the defendant. The right of the plaintiff to possess the land in dispute springs, not from an actual necessity for its use at any given point of time, but from the grant of the right of way to the extent of two hundred feet on each side of the track, a grant which, as we view it, carries with it necessarily a right to the possession of all the land within the limits named. Moreover, it might materially interfere with the plaintiff's enjoyment of the right granted, if obliged to permit third persons to occupy all such portions of its right of way as it was not at the moment using. Whenever needed, the delay necessary for ejecting an occupant might cause inconvenience.

Demurrer overruled.

Circuit Court, D. Nevada. Aug., 1871.

EQUITY PLEADING—MULTIFARIOUSNESS — ACTION TO DETERMINE ADVERSE CLAIM — RAILROAD GRANT—CONSTRUCTION.

1. The plaintiff, the Central Pacific Railroad Company, a corporation created under the laws of California, files a bill against a large number of persons, who are citizens of the state of Nevada, to determine the estate and interest claimed by them in land in that state over which the line of the railroad constructed by the company runs. In the bill the plaintiff avers, that on the first day of July, 1862, congress passed an act to aid in the construction of a railroad from the Missouri river to the Pacific ocean [12 Stat. 491], and by its provisions the plaintiff was authorized, after completing its road across the state of California, to extend its construction through the territories of the United States eastwardly until it should connect with the road which the Union Pacific Railroad Company, a corporation created by the same act, was authorized to construct westwardly from a designated point in the territory of Nebraska; that, by the same act, the right of way was granted to the plaintiff through the public lands of the United States for the construction of the road, to the extent of two hundred feet on each side of the track, with the right to take from the public lands adjacent all needed earth, stone, timber, and other materials, including all necessary ground for stations, buildings, workshops, depots, machine-shops, switches, sidetracks, turn-tables and water stations which the plaintiff might require for the use and maintenance of the road; that under the right and authority thus conferred, the plaintiff had laid out and constructed a railroad from the city of Sacramento to the eastern line of the state of California, and from that line eastwardly in the territory, now state of Nevada, a distance of forty-seven miles, and had expended in the construction of this portion of the road in Nevada, more than two millions of dollars; that all the lands through which it passes, were at the time of the passage of the act of congress, and the location of the road, public lands of the United States, and subject to the grant of the government for the use of the railroad; that the plaintiff is in its possession, maintaining and using it in the transportation of passengers, freight and the mails of the United States; that the plaintiff has erected near the line of the road and within two hundred feet of the track on either side, at convenient places and points, divers work-shops, machine-shops, sidetracks, turn-tables, water stations and depots; and has made various excavations and taken wood, stone, earth and other material, and has used the same in the construction of the road; that the defendants claim and each of them claims to own some estate or interest in the land over which the road passes and upon which the track is laid, and in the public lands adjacent thereto, and the portions upon which the work-shops, side-tracks, turn-tables and switches have been constructed, and the stations and depots have been established, adverse to the interest and title of the plaintiff, which estate and interest they claim, and each of the defendants claims to have acquired by purchase from the government of the United States, subsequent to the grant to the plaintiff; and that they claim the land over which the road passes, and their estate and interest in the same, in distinct parcels or quantities; but that the particular quantities claimed by each are unknown to the plaintiff; that they threaten and intend to bring distinct actions at law, based solely upon such pretended purchases, to recover damages from the plaintiff, for alleged trespasses upon and injuries to the property, and thus to involve the plaintiff in a multitude of suits; and that the estate and interest claimed by the defendants and each of them are invalid and subordinate to the grant to the plaintiff, and the rights the grant conferred: Held, on demurrer, that the bill was not subject to the objection of being multifarious because it averred that the defendants claimed separate and distinct parcels, all of them being alike interested in defeating the claim of prior right to the land made by the plaintiff under the grant of the government. The determination of the principal question involved, equally concerned all of the defendants.

[Applied in Gillespie v. Cummings, Case No. 5,434. Cited in The Debris Case, 16 Fed. 32.]

2. A statute of the state of Nevada declares that an "action may be brought by any person in possession, by himself or tenant, of real property, against any person who claims an estate or interest therein adverse to him, for the purpose of determining such adverse claim, estate or interest." The term "action" in that state includes not merely proceedings at law, but suits for equitable relief: Held, that the statute enlarges the class of cases in which the jurisdiction of equity was formerly exercised in quieting the title and possession of real property. It dispenses with the necessity of the previous establishment of the right of the plaintiff by repeated judgments in his favor in actions at law; and to that extent it confers upon the possessor of real property a new right, which enables him, without the delay of previous proceedings at law, to draw to himself all outstanding inferior claims. That right the national courts will enforce in the same manner in which they will enforce other equitable rights of parties.

[Cited in Wells v. Miner, 25 Fed. 536; A. & W. Sprague Manuf'g Co. v. Hoyt, 29 Fed. 428; Hyman v. Wheeler, 33 Fed. 630.]

3. The grant of the right of way to the plaintiff through the public lands of the United States, made by the second section of the act of congress of July 1, 1862 [12 Stat. 491], was a present grant, operating immediately upon the passage of the act, without reservation or exception, and was subject to no conditions except those which were subsequent, or necessarily such as that the road should be constructed within the period specified, and be afterwards maintained and used for the purposes designated. All acquisitions of land over which this right of way was thus granted, made subsequent to the passage of the act, were subject to the exercise of this right.

[Cited in Sanger v. Sargent, Case No. 12,319; Southern Pac. R. Co. v. Dull, 22 Fed. 493; Southern Pac. R. Co. v. Orton, 32 Fed. 479.]

4. The reservations and exceptions found in the third section of the above act apply only to the grants of the land therein mentioned, and do not apply to the grant of the right of way made in the second section.

5. The provision of the seventh section of the above act requiring the plaintiff, within two years, to designate the general route of the road as near as might be, and file a map of the same in the department of the interior, did not affect the grant of the right of way; it only furnished the means by which the secretary could withdraw the lands within a specified distance of such designated route from pre-emption, private entry and sale.

[1] [Reported by L. S. B. Sawyer, Esq., and here reprinted by permission. 6 Am. Law Rev. 385, contains only a partial report.]

This was a bill to quiet the title of the plaintiff to a portion of the land granted to it by congress in the territory, now state of Nevada, as a right of way for the construction of its railroad. The plaintiff was incorporated by the state of California in June, 1861. On the first day of July, 1862, congress passed an act incorporating the Union Pacific Railroad Company (12 Stat. 489), entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri river to the Pacific ocean, and to secure to the government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes."

The following are the second, third and seventh sections of the act:

"Sec. 2. And it is further enacted, that the right of way through the public lands be, and the same is hereby granted to said company for the construction of the said railroad and telegraph line; and the right, power and authority is hereby given to said company to take from the public lands adjacent to the line of said road, earth, stone, timber and other materials for the construction thereof; said right of way is granted to said railroad to the extent of two hundred feet in width on each side of said railroad where it may pass over the public lands, including all necessary grounds for stations, buildings, workshops, and depôts, machine-shops, switches, side-tracks, turn-tables, and water stations. The United States shall extinguish as rapidly as may be, the Indian titles to all lands falling under the operation of this act, and required for the said right of way and grants hereinafter made.

"Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, that there be, and is hereby, granted to the said company, for the purpose of aiding in the construction of said railroad and telegraph line, and to secure the safe and speedy transportation of the mails, troops, munitions of war, and public stores thereon, every alternate section of public land, designated by odd numbers, to the amount of five alternate sections per mile on each side of said railroad, on the line thereof, and within the limits of ten miles on each side of said road, not sold, reserved, or otherwise disposed of by the United States, and to which a pre-emption or homestead claim may not have attached, at the time the line of said road is definitely fixed; provided, that all mineral lands shall be excepted from operations of this act; but where the same shall contain timber, the timber thereon is hereby granted to said company. And all such lands, so granted by this section, which shall not be sold or disposed of by said company within three years after the entire road shall have been completed, shall be subject to settlement and pre-emption, like other lands, at a price not exceeding one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, to be paid to said company.

"Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, that said company shall file their assent to this act, under the seal of said company, in the department of the interior, within one year after the passage of this act, and shall complete said railroad and telegraph from the point of beginning, as herein provided, to the western boundary of Nevada territory, before the first day of July, one thousand eight hundred and seventy-four; provided, that within two years after the passage of this act, said company shall designate the general route of said road, as near as may be, and shall file a map of the same in the department of the interior, whereupon the secretary of the interior shall cause the lands within fifteen miles of said designated route or routes to be withdrawn from pre-emption, private entry, and sale; and when any portion of said route shall be finally located, the secretary of the interior shall cause the said lands hereinbefore granted, to be surveyed and set off as fast as may be necessary for the purposes herein named; provided, that in fixing the point of connection of the main trunk with the eastern connections it shall be fixed at the most practicable point for the construction of the Iowa and Missouri branches, as hereinafter provided."

The ninth section authorized the plaintiff "to construct a railroad and telegraph line from the Pacific coast, at or near San Francisco or the navigable waters of the Sacramento river, to the eastern boundary of California, upon the same terms and conditions in all respects" as were contained in the act for the construction of the Union Pacific railroad and telegraph line, and to meet and connect with said railroad and telegraph line on the eastern boundary. The tenth section authorized the plaintiff, after completing its road across the state of California, "to continue the construction of said railroad and telegraph through the territories of the United States to the Missouri river, including the branch roads specified" in the act, upon the routes therein indicated, on the terms and conditions provided in the act in relation to the Union Pacific Railroad Company, until said roads should meet and connect, and the whole line of said railroad and branches and telegraph was completed.

On the second of July, 1864, congress passed an act [13 Stat. 364] to amend the act of July 1, 1862, by increasing the grant of alternate sections made in the act of 1862, from five to ten, and extending the limits within which the sections were to be selected to twenty miles on each side of the road, and by extending the distance from the designated route of the road within which lands were to be withdrawn from pre-emption, private entry and sale by the seventh section of the act of 1862, from fifteen to twenty-five miles. 13 Stat. 358.

The defendants demurred to the bill of complaint for the want of equity, and for misjoinder of defendants. The latter point was argued on the ground that the bill averred that the defendants claimed separate and distinct parcels of land under separate purchases made by them.

Thomas H. Williams, for defendants.
Sunderland & Wood, for plaintiff.

Before FIELD, Circuit Justice, and HILLYER, District Judge.

FIELD, Circuit Justice. The plaintiff, the Central Pacific Railroad Company, a corporation created under the laws of California, brings the present suit against a large number of persons, who are citizens of the state of Nevada, to determine the estate and interest claimed by them in the land over which the line of the railroad constructed by the company runs, between the boundary of Nevada and the Big Bend of Truckee river in that state.

The plaintiff was incorporated in June, 1861, for the purpose of constructing and maintaining a railroad from the city of Sacramento, in California, to the eastern line of the state, where that line crosses the Truckee river, and to form a continuous railroad connection between the navigable waters of the Sacramento river and the Missouri river, and for that purpose to construct and maintain a railroad through the then territory, now state of Nevada, and other territories lying between California and the Missouri river.

On the first of July, 1862, congress passed an act [12 Stat. 491] to aid in the construction of a railroad from the Missouri river to the Pacific ocean, and by its provisions the plaintiff was authorized, after completing its road across the state of California, to extend its construction through the territories of the United States eastwardly until it should connect with the road which the Union Pacific Railroad Company, a corporation created by the same act, was authorized to construct westwardly from a designated point in the territory of Nebraska.

By this act, the right of way was also granted the plaintiff through the public lands of the United States for the construction of the road, to the extent of two hundred feet on each side of the track, with the right to take from the public lands adjacent all needed earth, stone, timber, and other materials. The right of way included all necessary ground for stations, buildings, work-shops, depots, machine-shops, switches, side-tracks, turn-tables and water-stations which the plaintiff might require for the use and maintenance of the road.

Under the right and authority thus conferred by the legislation of the state and of the United States, the plaintiff has not only laid out and constructed a railroad from the city of Sacramento to the eastern line of the state of California, but has extended the road through the state of Nevada and the territory of Utah to its connection with the road of the Union Pacific Railroad Company —thus forming a completed road between the navigable waters of the Sacramento river and the Missouri river. This we know as matter of history. The bill of complaint, however, only alleges, in addition to the construction of the road across the state of California, that the plaintiff has laid out and constructed the road from the eastern line of that state where it crosses the Truckee river, eastwardly, in the state of Nevada, along that river to what is known as the "Big Bend" thereof, a distance of forty-seven miles. With respect to this position of the road in the state of Nevada, the bill avers, in substance, that the plaintiff has expended in its construction more than two millions of dollars; that all the lands through which it passes were, at the time of the passage of the act of congress, and the location of the road, public lands of the United States, and subject to the grant of the government for the use of the railroad; that the plaintiff is in its possession, maintaining and using it in the transportation of passengers, freight and the mails of the United States; that the plaintiff has erected near the line of the road and within two hundred feet of the track on either side, at convenient places and points, divers work-shops, machine-shops, side-tracks, and turn-tables, water stations and depots; and has made various excavations and taken wood, stone, earth and other material, and has used the same in the construction of the road; that the defendants claim, and each of them claims, to own some estate or interest in the land over which the road passes and upon which the track is laid, and in the public lands adjacent thereto, and the portions upon which the work-shops, side-tracks, turn-tables and switches have been constructed and the stations and depots have been established, adverse to the interest and title of the plaintiff, which estate and interest they claim, and each of the defendants claims, to have acquired by purchase from the government of the United States, subsequent to the grant to the plaintiff.

The bill further avers, upon information and belief, that the defendants claim the land over which the road passes, and their estate and interest in the same, in distinct parcels or quantities, but that the particular quantities claimed by each are unknown to the plaintiff; that they threaten and intend to bring distinct actions at law, based solely upon such pretended purchases, to recover damages from the plaintiff, for alleged trespasses upon and injuries to the property, and thus to involve the plaintiff in a multitude of suits.

The bill further avers that the estate and interest claimed by the defendants and each of them are invalid and subordinate to the grant to the plaintiff, and the rights the grant conferred; and concludes with a prayer that the defendants may be required to set out the estate and interest claimed; that the same may be decreed invalid and subordinate to the right and title of the plaintiff; and that the defendants may be enjoined from setting up or asserting any right, estate or interest in the said lands, and from bringing any action for damages by reason of the construction of the road and the excavations within two hundred feet of the track, and the construction of the buildings and other works of the company; and for such further and other relief as the nature of the case may require.

The suit is evidently founded upon a statute of the state of Nevada, which declares that "an action may be brought by any person in possession, by himself or tenant, of real property, against any person who claims an estate or interest therein adverse to him, for the purpose of determining such adverse claim, estate or interest." Act March 8, 1869 (regulating proceedings in civil cases), § 256. The term "action" in that state includes not merely proceedings at law, but suits for equitable relief. It is for relief of that character that the present bill is filed.

The bill is in substance a bill of peace—its object being to quiet the title of the plaintiff, and to prevent harassing and expensive litigation from a multiplicity of suits. The jurisdiction of equity to afford relief in such cases is undoubted. The statute, it is true, enlarges the classes of cases in which the jurisdiction was formerly exercised in quieting the title and possession of real property. It dispenses with the necessity of the previous establishment of the right of the plaintiff by repeated judgments in his favor in actions at law. Curtis v. Sutter, 15 Cal. 259; Stark v. Starrs, 6 Wall. [73 U. S.] 409. To that extent it confers upon the possessor of real property a new right, one which enables him, without the delay of previous proceedings at law, to draw to himself all outstanding inferior claims. That right the national courts will enforce in the same manner in which they will enforce other equitable rights of parties. This was held in Clark v. Smith, 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 203, where the bill was filed to enforce an act of Kentucky, which authorized a person having both the title and possession of land to institute a suit against any other person setting up a claim to the property, and provided that if the plaintiff established his title, the defendant should be decreed to release his claim, and pay the costs of the complainant, unless by his answer he disclaimed all title to the premises, and offered to release to the complainant. "The state legislature," said the court, "have no authority to prescribe the forms and modes of proceeding in the courts of the United States, but having created a right, and at the same time prescribed the remedy to enforce it, if the remedy prescribed is substantially consistent with the ordinary modes of proceedings on the chancery side of the federal courts, no reason exists why it should not be pursued in the same form as it is in the state courts; on the contrary, propriety and convenience suggest that the practice should not materially differ when titles to lands are the subjects of investigation."

The jurisdiction would therefore exist in the present case if there were only one defendant asserting an interest or estate adverse to the plaintiff, but the fact that there are numerous defendants claiming distinct and separate parcels by a similar title, and threatening distinct actions for injuries to their respective parcels, furnishes a further ground for entertaining the bill. A court of equity will always interfere to prevent a multiplicity of suits, when the rights of the parties can be fairly determined by a single proceeding. Crews v. Burcham, 1 Black [66 U. S.] 352.

The objection taken by demurrer, that the defendants are improperly joined, or more correctly speaking, that the bill is multifarious, because it is averred therein that the defendants claim separate and distinct parcels, is not well taken. The bill alleges that the rights of the plaintiff come from the act of congress, and that the interests claimed by defendants come from pretended subsequent purchases from the government. The plaintiff asserts that upon the passage of the act, the lands through which the road passes were public lands, subject to the disposal of the United States for the purposes of the railroad. The principal question therefore, involved, upon the allegations of the bill, is when did the grant to the plaintiff take effect? and its determination equally concerns all the defendants. If the grant took effect immediately, the subsequent purchasers from the government must necessarily have taken the lands held by them in subordination to the rights which it conferred. They are all in consequence alike interested in defeating any pretentions of this kind.

In Mayor of York v. Pilkington, 1 Atk. 282, the plaintiff claimed the sole right of fishery in the river Ouse, and brought a bill to quiet the right against several riparian proprietors on the river claiming distinct rights. It was objected that the defendants ought to be considered as distinct trespassers; that there was no general right to be established against them; and that there was no privity between them and the plaintiff. But Lord Hardwicke sustained the bill, observing that the question was whether the plaintiff had a general right to the sole fishery which extended to all the defendants, and that the defendants were not precluded from taking advantage of their several exceptions or distinct rights.

In Gaines v. Chew, 2 How. [43 U. S.] 640, the bill was filed to set aside a will, and made the executors and all persons who had come into possession of the property of the alleged testator by purchase or otherwise, parties. The purchases were made at different times and for different parcels of the property. To the objection that there was misjoinder or multifariousness in the bill in making the defendants parties, the court said that the main ground of defense, the validity of the will attacked and the proceedings under it was common to all; that their interests might be of greater or less extent, but that constituted a difference in degree only, and not in principle; that in every fact which went to impair or establish the authority of the executors, the defendants were alike interested, and that the bill avoided multiplicity of suits without subjecting the defendants to inconvenience or unreasonable expense. The objection was therefore overruled. In considering the subject of multifariousness, the court cited the language of Lord Cotttenham in Campbell v. Mackay, 1 Mylne & C. 603, that "to lay down a rule applicable universally, or to say what constituted multifariousness as an abstract proposition, is upon the authorities utterly impossible," and observed that "every case must be governed by its own circumstances; and as these are as diversified as the names of the parties, the court must exercise a sound discretion on the subject. Whilst parties should not be subjected to expense and inconvenience in litigating matters in which they have no interest, multiplicity of suits should be avoided by uniting in one bill all who have an interest in the principal matter in controversy, though the interests may have arisen under distinct contracts."

As already intimated, the real question presented by the case is, when did the right of way to the extent of two hundred feet on each side of the road, vest, under the act of congress, in the plaintiff? The defendants contend that the grant of the right of way was subject to the same limitation which is prescribed by the act to grants of the alternate sections, namely, that the land designated was not reserved or otherwise disposed of by the United States, or that a pre-emption or homestead claim had not attached to it at the time the line of the road was definitely fixed; and hence it is argued that the bill, in averring that the defendants' claim, by purchases made from the government subsequent to the passage of the act of congress, does not negative all possible right in them, as they may still have acquired their interests before the definite location of the road.

The construction for which the defendants thus contend is clearly incorrect. The grant of the right of way is a present grant, operating immediately upon the passage of the act, without reservation or exception, and is subject to no conditions except those which are subsequent, or necessarily implied, such as that the road shall be constructed within the period specified, and be afterward maintained and used for the purposes designated. All acquisitions of land over which this right of way was thus granted, made subsequent to the passage of the act, were necessarily subject to the exercise of this right. The reservations and exceptions found in the third section, apply only to the grants of land therein mentioned, and do not apply to the grant of the right of way made in the second section.

The provision of the seventh section requiring the plaintiff, within two years, to designate the general route of the road as near as might be, and file a map of the same in the department of the interior, in no respect affected the grant of the right of way; it only furnished the means by which the secretary could withdraw the lands within a specified distance of such designated route from pre-emption, private entry and sale.

It follows that the objection to the bill founded upon this construction of the act falls to the ground. The demurrer must, therefore, be overruled, and the defendants be required to answer the bill by the rule-day in November next. Ordered accordingly.

DEPOSITION—CAPTION—CERTIFICATE OF MAGISTRATE.

The magistrate who takes a deposition under the act of congress, need not certify that the deponent subscribed it in his presence, but the title of the cause in which it is to be used must be truly stated in the certificate of the caption.

[Cited in Re Thomas, 35 Fed. 823.]

Mr. Taylor, for defendant, objected to a deposition taken under the act of congress (1 Stat. 73), that the magistrate did not certify that the deponent subscribed it in his presence, but that he subscribed it after it was reduced to writing by the magistrate.

But THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent) overruled the objection.

Mr. Taylor then objected, that it is stated in the caption that the deposition was taken to be used in an action in which Robert Centre & Co. were plaintiffs.

Mr. Swann, contra. This is evidently the same suit.

THE COURT supported the objection, and rejected the deposition; and said they could not judicially know it to be the same cause.

ADMIRALTY JURISDICTION — SALVAGE SERVICE — AUTHORITY OF MASTER TO EMPLOY VESSEL AND CREW — WHO ARE SALVORS — FORFEITURE OF COMPENSATION.

1. A court of admiralty has jurisdiction in cases of salvage to proceed in personam as well as in rem.

[Cited in The Williams, Case No. 17,710; Fox v. Patton, 22 Fed. 747.]

2. It has jurisdiction to carry into execution the decree of another admiralty court.

3. In a case in which the master and crew of a vessel had saved a wreck stranded on the shore, salvage was awarded by arbitrators. No distribution of it was made by the award, but the whole sum was paid to the master. It was held that one of the crew could maintain a libel in the admiralty for a share of the salvage.

[Cited in McConnochie v. Kerr, 9 Fed. 51.]

4. In all cases where services are rendered in saving property in danger of being lost on the high seas, or when wrecked or stranded on the shore, it is in the sense of the maritime law, a salvage service.

5. When a vessel in the course of a voyage falls in with a wreck, the master is authorized by the general customs and usages of the sea, to employ his own vessel and crew in saving it.

[6. Cited in McConnochie v. Kerr, 9 Fed. 54, to the point that by the maritime law the master has an implied discretionary authority to make such deviations in the interest of commerce and humanity, in order to save endangered life or property.]

7. In such a case, all the crew who are ready and willing to engage in the service, are entitled to a share of the reward, although they may not have gone on board the wreck.

In admiralty. This was a libel in personam against the master of the brig Frances Ellen for salvage. The libellant shipped on board the brig at Portland, September 3, 1837, for a voyage to the West Indies and back to the United States, in the capacity of cook and steward. In the prosecution of the voyage the brig arrived at Cardenas in the island of Cuba, and while lying in that port the master was informed that the brig Centurion, of Providence, was ashore in distress, on the coast, at a place about twenty miles distant; and was applied to by persons interested in the Centurion to go with his vessel to her relief, to which he agreed. The Frances Ellen was not then fully discharged, and as is alleged in the libel, and not denied in the answer, he urged the crew to make all the despatch they could in discharging her, in order to proceed immediately to the relief of the Centurion, encouraging them with the promise of a liberal reward as salvage, in case they should succeed. They accordingly proceeded to the Centurion and found her stranded upon a sand-bank. With the aid of some of her crew they took out part of her cargo, and having lightened her, got her off, and proceeded with her in tow to Matanzas. The claim for salvage was there submitted to arbitration, and the arbiters awarded one third of the net proceeds of the sale of the cargo, and one half of the net proceeds of the sale of the vessel; amounting in the whole to about 850 dollars. It does not appear that any distribution of the salvage was made by the arbiters, but the whole was paid to the master, and the distribution left to him, excepting that he was required to pay sixty-two dollars to such of the crew of the Centurion as aided in the salvage; and he paid also eighty-six to the pilot, leaving in his hands about seven hundred dollars. To each of his own crew, except the libellant, he paid seventeen dollars, this being at the same rate as was paid to the crew of the Centurion. Some difficulty arising between him and his owners on his return, he paid over to them the whole of the residue of the salvage money remaining in his hands, and refused any allowance to the libellant, who having frequently demanded his compensation in vain, brought this libel against the master for his share of the salvage.

[1] [Reported by Hon. Ashur Ware, District Judge.]

Codman & Fox, for libellant.
Mr. Preble, for respondent.

WARE, District Judge. The most familiar form, in which the jurisdiction of this court is exercised over the matter of salvage, is by process in rem; but there is no doubt that the court has authority to adjudicate upon it as well in a proceeding in personam as in rem. The only doubt which can arise in the present case is this; the general question of salvage having been already decided, and the money received by the master acting for all who are interested in it, whether the claim of the libellant is not now converted into a simple debt, for which a remedy lies only at common law. Although the admiralty has a general jurisdiction over maritime contracts and quasi contracts, and things done on the sea, it does not follow that the payment of a debt in every form which it may assume can be enforced in the admiralty, simply because it originated in a contract, or in the performance of a service which was within the jurisdiction of the court. While the original cause or consideration subsists and is in force, the party may have his remedy in this court, but when that is extinguished and the debt passes into a new form, by what in the civil law is called a novation, as when the creditor receives a bond for the sum due, or a negotiable note, or bill of exchange is taken as payment, and as an extinguishment of the debt, it will not be contended that the admiralty has jurisdiction to enforce the payment of the debt in its new form. Ramsay v. Allegre, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 611. In the cases of The Hope, 3 C. Rob. Adm. 215, and The Trelawney, 4 C. Rob. Adm. 223, after the property was saved from the peril, it was redelivered by the salvor to the owners, and a libel was brought against them personally for the reward. The whole question of salvage was therefore open and put in issue. But in this case that question has been already settled. If it had been decided by a regular decree of a court of admiralty by which a specific sum were awarded to the libellant, this court could have taken cognizance of the case, because a court of admiralty has jurisdiction to carry into execution the decree of another court of admiralty. 2 Brown, Civ. & Adm. Law, 120; Penhallow v. Doane's Adm'r, 3 Dall. [3 U. S.] 54; Jennings v. Carson, 4 Cranch [8 U. S.] 2. Whether this court has authority to carry into execution an award of arbitrators, in a matter peculiarly of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, it is not necessary to decide in this case, because it presents another ground upon which I think the jurisdiction of the court is free from doubt. The libellant in this case does not demand a specific sum which the master is alleged to have received to his use; he claims generally an unliquidated sum as a reward for his services as a salvor, the amount to be ascertained by a decree of the court. The libel is founded, therefore, strictly upon the maritime service, a consideration over which the court has an undisputed jurisdiction. The question at issue is, whether he performed such services as entitle him to a reward as a salvor or not. The sum in controversy in this case is inconsiderable, and it is understood to be contested by the master of the salvor ship, or rather by the owners, although the suit is nominally against the master, more on account of the principles which it is supposed to involve than the amount in controversy.

In the first place it is questioned, whether this be properly a case of salvage, within the proper import of the term, as it is understood in maritime jurisprudence. At the time when the master of the Frances Ellen was called upon to perform the service, the Centurion was lying aground upon a sand-bank, on the shore, in a state of utter helplessness. He proceeded with his vessel and crew to the place, and found her in this situation, and after some time spent, for the precise time does not appear, in taking out part of her cargo and transferring it to the Frances Ellen, they succeeded in lightening her so much that she was got off the sand and floated. They then took her in tow, and carried her to Matanzas. It does not appear that this business of saving the wreck was attended with any peculiar danger, but this was solely owing to the favorable state of the weather. Had the weather changed and become tempestuous, the peril might have been very great, not only to the salvor vessel, but to all who were engaged in the enterprise. This was a risk which the salvors took upon themselves. After the arrival at Matanzas, the claim for compensation or reward was submitted to arbiters. They manifestly treated it as a case of salvage in the strictest sense of the word, for they awarded not a specific sum as a quantum meruit for the service, but a certain proportion of the property saved. It is true that if a specific sum had been awarded, this would not at all have affected the character of the case, for it is not uncommon for courts to decree a compensation in that form. But the form of the award is referred to, as showing that the arbiters considered the case as one clearly of salvage, and not of affreightment, as is now pretended.

After all this has been done, a direct decision having been made upon this question by a tribunal of the parties' own choosing, and the master and owners having received the sum awarded, it is, to say the least, extremely doubtful whether the question can be brought into controversy in this collateral way, in a case in which the libellant is claiming his share of the reward. But if the question were open to be contested by the master, I have no doubt that the case is, both upon principle and authority, clearly a case of salvage in the strictest sense of the word. The cases, in which doubts have arisen of this kind, are those in which the service has been performed by pilots, or by the crew of the vessel lost; persons who were in the employment and pay of the owners, and bound by their relation to the vessel to contribute their aid in saving her. Such persons are ordinarily excluded from claiming as salvors; and they are allowed a reward in that character only in peculiar cases, as those of extraordinary peril or gallantry, or when their exertions pass beyond the limits of duty properly required by law. The Joseph Harvey, 1 C. Rob. Adm. 306; Le Tigre [Case No. 8,281]; Hobart v. Drogan, 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 121; Mason v. The Blaireau, 2 Cranch [6 U. S.] 268; The Two Catharines [Case No. 14,288]. But the salvors in this case were volunteers and were bound by no obligations to the Centurion. In all such cases, where services are rendered in saving property which is in danger of being lost on the high seas, or when wrecked, or stranded on the shore, it is, in the sense of the maritime law, a salvage service, The Emulous [Id. 4,480], and it is quite immaterial whether the salvors accidentally fall in with the wreck, and volunteer their services, or are called upon by the owners, or persons interested in the wreck, to aid in saving it. It is the place where the property is situated, and the circumstances of exposure and peril in which it is found, that determine the question whether it is a case of salvage or not.

But whether this case is considered as one of salvage or otherwise, the right of the libellant to maintain this libel would not be materially affected. He contracted to perform a particular voyage. The master had no right under this contract to change the voyage for another, nor to add to it an intermediate voyage, unless it was authorized by some usage of trade. He certainly had no authority under the contract, to require the libellant to proceed upon a wrecking enterprise. To such an order he might say "non in haec foedera veni." If he consented to go, he would be justly entitled to an extra compensation, as well upon the ground that it was a service of peculiar hazard, as upon the general principles which govern maritime courts in the distribution of salvage. And in fact such a reward was expressly promised by the master in this case. I do not mean to say when a vessel in the course of her voyage falls in with a wreck, and the master thinks proper to make an attempt to save it, that the seamen are not bound to obey him; on the contrary, I hold that they are. The customs and usages of the sea, silently assented to by the whole maritime world, appear to authorize the master in such cases to employ his vessel and crew in rescuing from destruction property thus exposed. The Boston [Case No. 1,673]. It is an authority that is allowed in the general interest of commerce; and the invariable custom of courts of maritime jurisdiction is to remunerate and encourage such services by a liberal and generous reward. But though the authority for engaging in such enterprises rests solely in the discretion of the master, yet he is considered as acting not for himself alone, but for the common benefit of all who participate in the risk. In the distribution of the salvage, the owners are compensated for the use of their vessel, and the crew for their share of the peril and labor. It is a service which is not contemplated in the contract with the crew, and which they are not by the terms of the contract bound to perform, but it is a duty imposed by the policy of the law, and the law compensates them for it by a liberal reward. In the present case, as the service in which their vessel was employed was not embraced within the contract with the crew, and was one which might have been attended with great peril, I am clear that the crew was entitled to a specific compensation beyond the rate of their wages for the time. The master himself so understood it at the time, for he promised the crew a share of the salvage as an inducement for them to engage in it.

Another ground of defence, particularly relied upon in the answer, is that the libellant actually performed no part of the service in saving this property; that he was never on board the Centurion; that he performed no part of the labor in removing her cargo to the Frances Ellen; but was employed during the whole time in his ordinary duty of cook and steward. This is the precise objection that was made to the claim of part of the crew of the salvor ship in the case of The Baltimore, 2 Dod. 132. Sir William Scott, in that case, said: "With respect to the contest which exists between those who went on board the Baltimore and became the immediate instruments of preserving her, and those who remained on board their own ship, I confess I can see no ground for making a distinction between them, and consider it but fair to hold that they are all equally entitled to be rewarded. All of them, it is true, did not go on board the Baltimore, but they were all, with one exception, ready to do so; and a selection of a part of them became necessary, which was accordingly made, and I have no doubt properly, by their commander. As all concurred in their readiness to go, they are all equally deserving of reward." The man who refused to go on board the Baltimore was of course excluded from all share in the salvage, but all who are willing to share in the labor were held equally entitled, and it appears to me for reasons perfectly satisfactory. It was necessary for some to remain on board the salvor ship, and the master selected such as he thought proper to go out of her to save the wreck. The same observations apply to the present case. The master proposed to the crew to go on this enterprise, to which they agreed, and when they arrived at the wreck he selected such as he thought proper to engage in the immediate agency of transferring the cargo of the Centurion to the Frances Ellen. The libellant was as ready as the rest of the crew to embark in the enterprise; nor does it appear that he refused to perform any duty that was required of him. It was the choice of the master that he should remain on board the Frances Ellen, and if he had not, prudence, I presume, would have required that another man should.

It is alleged as a third objection to the libellant's maintaining this suit, that he "conducted himself on board the said Frances Ellen in a disorderly and disobedient manner, refusing to perform his duty, threatening to poison the crew, breaking and destroying property, and finally wholly refusing to return in said Frances Ellen, so that this respondent was compelled to discharge him on account of his misconduct as aforesaid These are, without doubt, grave charges, and if they could apply to affect the claim set up in this case, would deserve to be carefully considered. But none of this disorderly conduct is charged as having occurred while they were engaged in the business of the salvage. Now without adverting to the insufficiency of the proof with respect to most of the charges, my opinion is, that the misconduct of the libellant in the course of the voyage, if proved, cannot be resorted to as a reason for forfeiting his claim for salvage, when no misconduct is proved during the time they were employed in this service. This was an enterprise apart from the voyage for which he shipped, and his previous offences, although they might affect his claim for wages, cannot be imported into this new and distinct enterprise, though springing up in the course of the voyage, to impair his claim for a share in the reward.

Upon the whole I can see no legal ground upon which the libellant can be excluded from the claim set up in this libel; no evidence has been introduced which goes to distinguish the merits of one man from another. The service does not appear to have been attended with any peculiar danger, nor to have afforded occasion for the display of extraordinary gallantry. The libellant remained on board the Frances Ellen. This was of course by order of the master. No evidence is offered to show that, during the period employed in saving the wreck and bringing her into port, he declined any duty which was required of him. As I see no reason for making a distinction between this man and the rest of the crew, I shall allow him the same sum which the master allowed to the others with costs.

DISCHARGE IN BANKRUPTCY.

A voluntary bankrupt whose assets are not equal to thirty per cent. of the claims proved against his estate, upon which he was liable as principal debtor, and who has not obtained the consent of one-fourth of his creditors in number and one-third in value, is not entitled to his discharge under the bankrupt act, as amended June 22, 1874 [18 Stat. 180].

[In bankruptcy. In the matter of Louis Cerf.]

MORRILL, District Judge. I have been requested to reconsider the decision heretofore made in this case, and accordingly have given it as much consideration as is consistent with other duties. The attorneys for the appellant admit that both the proceedings in bankruptcy and the debts of the bankrupt were subsequent to the 1st day of January, 1869, and previous to the 1st day of December, 1873, but insist that the clause in section 33 of the bankrupt act providing "that no discharge shall be granted to a debtor whose assets shall not be equal to fifty per cent. of the claims proved against his estate, unless the assent in writing of a majority in number and value of his creditors to whom he shall have become liable as a principal debtor, and who shall have proven their claims, be filed in the case, at or before the time of the hearing of the application for discharge," is repealed by the act of June 22, 1874, and that consequently the bankrupt is entitled to a discharge, without any regard to the amount of the assets.

The repealing clause relied upon is contained in the two last lines of the section 9 of the act, which is, "The provision in section 33 of said act of March 2, 1867 [14 Stat. 533], requiring fifty per cent. of such assets, is hereby repealed." We will take from the section what was expressly "hereby repealed," and the section would then read, "no discharge shall be granted to a debtor, * * * unless the consent in writing of a majority in number and value of his creditors, to whom he shall have become liable as principal debtor, and who shall have proved their claims, be filed in the case, at or before the time of the hearing of the application for discharge." This would virtually limit and confine the bankrupt to the performance of one thing for a discharge instead of allowing the option of one of two things, as before. And, of course, the bankrupt could not be discharged unless he should obtain the required number of creditors, even if he had paid the fifty per cent. of his debts, or a larger amount. But this construction of the section 9 would be so obviously erroneous that it does not require a moment's consideration. It is evident that the repealing clause did not receive any more attention than is usually given to those passed at the close of the session in great haste.

The congress, in the passage of the section 9, intended to draw a distinction between a voluntary and an involuntary bankrupt. They further intended to make the conditions of obtaining a discharge of a voluntary bankrupt less onerous than they had previously been, and attach no conditions whatever, except as provided in the general act, and particularly section 29, to the discharge of an involuntary bankrupt. As it was in the power of congress to repeal any part or the whole of this bankrupt act, or so to change it as to make the conditions of obtaining a discharge of indebtedness more or less onerous, both as to future cases as well as to cases pending in the courts, and as section 9 of the act of June 22 was inconsistent with the section 33, and pro tanto a repeal thereof, the cause of the repealing clause in the last lines is not obvious. It is possible that it was thought by some that the judiciary might construe the amended act as applying only to causes thereafter to be instituted, and from abundant caution added the repealing clause.

I see no cause to change the opinion heretofore rendered, that inasmuch as the applicant is a voluntary bankrupt, and has not assets equal to thirty per cent. of the claims proved against his estate, upon which he was liable as principal debtor, and has not obtained the consent of one-fourth of his creditors in number and one-third in value—his application for a discharge is refused.

CHARTER PARTY—RIGHTS OF THE PARTIES—ADMIRALTY—JURISDICTION—PLEADING—LIS PENDENS — PROCEEDINGS IN STATE COURT — LIEN FOR FREIGHT—WAIVER—RIGHTS OF SHIPPER — PERSONAL LIABILITY FOR FREIGHT.

1. The admiralty has jurisdiction over charter-parties for foreign voyages, and will enforce the lien thereof.

[Cited in Thatcher v. McCulloh, Case No. 13,862; New Jersey Steam Nav. Co. v. Merchants' Bank, 6 How. (47 U. S.) 420; U. S. v. The Reindeer, Case No. 16,144.]

2. An objection, grounded on the pendency of another suit, for the same cause of action, is preliminary in its character, and should be taken in admiralty by a special plea, in the nature of a plea in abatement, known, in the practice of the admiralty, as a dilatory or declinatory exception.

[Cited in Benary v. The Prince Albert, Case No. 11,426; The Grace Darling, Id. 5,651.]

3. The objection of lis pendens can be sustained only, where the two suits are of the same character, and where the plaintiff in both suits is the same.

[Cited in Atlantic Mut. Ins. Co. v. Alexandre, 16 Fed. 281.]

4. A suit in a state court by replevin, or by an attachment of the property in question, cannot supersede the right of a court of admiralty to proceed by a suit in rem, to enforce a right, or lien against that property.

[Cited in A Raft of Spars, Case No. 11,528; Ashbrook v. The Golden Gate, Id. 574; The Isabella, Id. 7,100. Dissenting opinion in Taylor v. Carryl, 20 How. (61 U. S.) 605. Distinguished in Taylor v. The Royal Saxon, Case No. 13,803.]

5. The general owner of a ship will be deemed owner for the voyage, notwithstanding a charter-party, if he retains the possession and control of the navigation of the ship during the voyage, and if the master is his agent, acting under his instructions. So also, if the intention of the parties, with regard to this point, seems doubtful on the face of the charter-party.

6. The lien on the cargo for freight is recognised by the common law and maritime law; but it may be displaced by particular circumstances, which denote a clear and determinate abandonment.

[Cited in Maxwell v. The Powell, Case No. 9,324; The Hyperion's Cargo, Id. 6,987; Duncan v. Kimball, 3 Wall. (70 U. S.) 43.]

7. A clause in a charter-party, providing, that the freight shall be paid "in five days after her (the brig's) return to and discharge in Boston" is not a waiver or displacement of the lien for freight; the word "discharge" merely referring to the unlading, and not to the delivery of the cargo.

[Cited in Sears v. Bags of Linseed, Case No. 12,589; The Bird of Paradise, 5 Wall. (72 U. S.) 557. Approved in Kimball v. The Anna Kimball, Case No. 7,772. Distinguished in The Santee, Id. 12,328.]

8. Semble. A shipper has a right, by the maritime law, to examine the goods after they are unlivered in order to ascertain whether they are damaged or not, before he makes himself liable at all events for the freight.

[Cited in Fox v. Holt, Case No. 5,012.]

9. Where by the charter-party the freight was a gross sum payable on the successful close of the whole voyage, and the bill of lading declared, that the return cargo should be delivered to the shipper or his assigns, they paying freight, as per charter-party; held, that a lien attached to the homeward cargo for the freight due from the whole voyage; also, that the consignee by his receipt of the goods, became personally liable, upon his implied assumpsit, for the whole freight.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of Massachusetts.]

In admiralty. This was the case of a libel in rem brought against a certain cargo, consisting principally of mahogany, claimed by the respondent and laden on board of the brig Sterling, owned by the libellants, to recover the amount of the freight due and earned on a foreign voyage under a charter-party, which, as the libellants contended, gave them, under all the circumstances, a lien on the same cargo for the amount of such freight, which they were entitled to enforce in the present proceeding. The charter-party was entered into on the 18th of October, 1836, at Boston, between G. P. Richardson, as agent and owner of the brig, and Thomas N. French, for a voyage from Boston to port or ports in the West Indies, from thence to the city of St. Domingo and back to Boston (not exceeding three ports used in all), where she was to be discharged, the dangers of the seas excepted. After the outward cargo was taken on board and before the brig sailed on the voyage French failed in business, and the cargo (which was shipped on his account), was attached by French's creditors. It was then agreed between French and the respondent, that he should relieve the cargo from the attachments, and that for his indemnification he should have the control and management of the cargo, during the voyage, and that the homeward cargo should be shipped and consigned to the respondent by the firm of Joseph Mansfield & Co. (which firm the supercargo, who had been previously appointed such by French, was a member), who were the consignees of the outward cargo. The written instructions for the voyage were given by G. P. Richardson for the owner, and were approved by the respondent. By the bill of lading of the outward cargo it was deliverable to Mansfield & Co. or to assigns, "he or they paying freight for the goods as per charter-party." The voyage was duly performed and the homeward cargo was shipped by Mansfield & Co., and by the terms of the bill of lading was made deliverable "to the order of the shippers or assigns, he or they paying freight as per charter-party;" and the bill of lading was afterwards sent endorsed by the shippers to the respondent. It was, under this consignment, made in pursuance of the original agreement with French, that the respondent claimed the homeward cargo for his indemnification for debts and liabilities exceeding its full value. Upon the arrival of the brig at Boston the libellants gave notice to the respondent, that they were ready to deliver the cargo to him upon his payment, or upon security for payment, of the freight due by the charter-party; otherwise they should proceed to discharge the cargo and detain the same until the expiration of five days from the discharge, and then take such steps as they should be advised in the law to obtain the charter money. The respondent, upon receiving the notice, declined to accede to the terms. The cargo was accordingly landed and put into the possession of Mr. Mackay, a wharfinger, as bailee for the libellants. The respondent immediately afterwards brought a writ of replevin, which was sued out of the state court by the respondent, against the wharfinger under which the cargo was replevied; and, the five days having expired, the present libel was filed against the cargo and the same was taken into the possession of the marshal, and afterwards delivered to the respondents, upon giving bail according to the course in the admiralty. Upon the answer and proofs a decree was rendered by the district judge in favor of the libellants [case not reported], and an appeal was taken from that decree by the claimant and respondent.

C. P. and B. R. Curtis, for libellants.

Henry H. Fuller, for claimant and respondent.

STORY, Circuit Justice. The answer of the respondent insists upon various grounds. In the first place, that the court, sitting in admiralty, has no jurisdiction over the case. But since the decision of this court in the case of The Volunteer [Case No. 16,991], the objection would be deemed unmaintainable; and it has now been waived at the argument. In the next place, the respondent relies on the pendency of the replevin suit, as a good defence against the libel, as it is substantially, as he contends, for the same cause of action; and the parties are not to be harassed with successive suits upon the same cause of action at the same time. To this objection several answers may be given, each of which is equally conclusive against it. (1) The objection is in its own nature a mere declinatory or dilatory objection in the nature of a plea in abatement; and not peremptory, as a bar on the merits. It being preliminary in its character it should have been taken, if at all, by a special plea in the nature of a plea in abatement, known in the practice of the ecclesiastical and admiralty courts by the appellation of a dilatory or declinatory exception, which is always brought forward before the contestatio litis, or general defence in bar, or general answer upon the merits. See 1 Brown, Civ. & Adm. Law, 464–470; 2 Brown, Civ. & Adm. Law, 361–369, 414, 415; Law, Forms Ecc. Law, pp. 167–170, tits. 78–81. (2) But, if this could be overcome, there is another objection to it, founded upon the different character of the two suits. The parties to the replevin are not the same, as in the present suit. The wharfinger is the sole defendant in that suit, and he is no party to the present suit. Then, again, the suits are not of the same nature; the replevin is founded upon a supposed tort; the libel upon a supposed contract. It is possible, nay it is probable, that many questions of the same nature may arise in each suit. But it never can be judicially affirmed, that all the questions in a suit founded in tort, and in the one founded in contract are, or must necessarily be the same; and that no others can arise. Then, again, the replevin, though in form in rem, acts in personam as to the judgment. But the libel is solely and exclusively in rem. The replevin is founded on the right of property in the thing. The libel insists upon no property, but upon a mere lien. (3) Then, again, a suit in a state court by replevin, or by an attachment under process, of the property, can never be admitted to supersede the right of a court of admiralty to proceed by a suit in rem to enforce a right against that property to whomsoever it may belong. The admiralty suit does not attempt to enter into any conflict with the state court, as to the just operation of its own process; but it merely asserts a paramount right against all persons whatever, whether claiming above or under that process. No doubt can exist, that a ship may be seized under admiralty process for a forfeiture, notwithstanding a prior replevin or attachment of the ship then pending. The same thing is true as to the lien on a ship for seamen's wages or a bottomry bond. 3. But if this objection also could be overcome, there is another entirely fatal; and that is, that the plea of a prior lis pendens applies exclusively to the case, where the plaintiff in both suits is the same, and both are commenced by himself; and not to cases, where there are cross suits by a plaintiff in one suit, who is defendant in the other. The slightest examination of the doctrines of the common law on this subject will satisfactorily establish the conclusiveness of this objection to the exception. See Bac. Abr. "Abatement," M; Sparry's Case, 5 Coke, 61; Com. Dig. "Abatement," H 24. I might add, that if the respondent had originally commenced a suit in the admiralty for the supposed tort, and afterwards for the same cause of action had sued out a replevin in the state court, upon the principles decided in the case of Dudfield v. Warden, Fitzg. 313, if applicable to our courts, the lis pendens in the admiralty could not in the state court have been urged as an objection to the replevin. In every view of the matter then, this exception is untenable.

We come, then, to the main or substantial ground of controversy upon the merits; and that is, whether there is a lien upon these goods for the freight earned. If there be, I have no doubt, that it is within the competency of the district court, as a court of admiralty, to enforce it upon the principles stated in the case of The Volunteer [supra], and what I cannot but deem the ancient and legitimate jurisdiction of the admiralty. Let us proceed at once, then, to the question of the lien. That there is generally a lien on the cargo for the freight, is not disputed; and indeed, it is equally acknowledged in the common law, and in the maritime law, as is abundantly shown in the authors cited in The Volunteer [supra]. If, then, the circumstances of the present case do not displace that lien, it must be treated as a subsisting lien. And I accede to the argument urged at the bar, that the onus probandi is on the respondent to establish a waiver, or extinguishment of the lien. Three grounds have been relied on for this purpose. 1. That by the charter-party, French, the charterer, became owner for the voyage. 2. That if not, the terms of the charter-party are repugnant to the notion of any existing lien, as the freight is not to be paid until after a contemplated delivery of the cargo to the respondent. 3. That at all events the homeward cargo is not liable for the freight due for the whole voyage; and, at most, only for the freight due on that cargo in the return voyage.

In the first place, then, was French, the charterer, upon the true interpretation of the charter-party, owner for the voyage? I shall not attempt to go over the authorities on this subject, since they are fully collected and their result stated in the case of The Volunteer [supra]; to which, therefore, I take leave generally to refer. There are two decisions, however, to which I wish especially to refer, the one English, the other American. In the case of Colvin v. Newberry, 6 Bligh, (N. S.) 189, Lord Tenterden, in moving for an affirmance of a judgment in the exchequer chamber upon the question, who is to be deemed owner for the voyage (and which judgment reversed his own in the king's bench), used the following language: "Two propositions of law are clear, as applicable to a case like the present. The first is the common case of goods shipped on board of a vessel, of which the shipment is acknowledged by a bill of lading, signed by the master, that, if the goods are not delivered the shipper has a right to maintain an action against the owner of the ship. The other proposition, which is equally clear, is this; that if the person, in whom the absolute property of the ship is vested, charters that ship to another for a particular voyage, although the absolute owner appoints the master and crew, and finds provisions, and every thing else, and is to receive from the charterer of the ship a certain sum of money for the use and hire of the ship, an action can be brought only against the person, to whom the absolute owner has chartered the ship, and who is considered the owner pro tempore, that is, during the voyage, for which the ship is chartered. In such a case the action cannot be maintained against the person, who has let out the ship on charter, namely the absolute owner." So that, according to this decision, the fact, that the absolute owner appoints the master and crew, and finds provisions for the voyage, will not alone control the other words, if there is by them a clear letting to charter of the whole ship; but the charterer will be deemed the owner for the voyage. On the other hand, the supreme court of the United States, in the case of Marcardier v. Chesapeake Ins. Co., 8 Cranch [12 U. S.] 49, where the same question arose, used the following language: "A person may be the owner for the voyage, who, by a contract with the general owner, hires the ship for the voyage, and has the exclusive possession, command, and navigation of the ship. But where the general owner retains the possession, command, and navigation of the ship, and contracts to carry a cargo on freight, the charter-party is considered as a mere affreightment, sounding in covenant, and the freighter is not clothed with the character or legal responsibility of ownership." Perhaps, there is no real discrepancy between the doctrines held in each of these cases; and, with reference to the facts, each may be perfectly correct. In the former case the master was the charterer, and not the absolute owner. In the latter the master was the absolute owner, and entered into the charter-party, he being to continue master during the voyage. The charter-parties too contained very different and special provisions. In the former case, although there were no express words of demise, yet the court thought, that, upon the whole terms of the instrument, taken together, there was in effect a letting of the whole ship to the master for the voyage, notwithstanding she was to be victualled and manned at the expense of the absolute owner. But, if there be any real discrepancy between these cases, I have no difficulty, independently of my official duty, to obey the decisions of the supreme court, in saying, that I deem the American decision built upon the more solid and satisfactory distinction. I agree, that it is not indispensable, to constitute the charterer the owner for the voyage, that express terms of demise and letting of the whole ship should appear on the face of the charter-party; but that it may be gathered, as a result, from the whole stipulations in the instrument. I also agree, that the clause, that the absolute owner shall appoint the master and crew, and victual, and provision, and equip the ship during the voyage, is not of itself necessarily conclusive, that he retains the ownership during the voyage; and that the provision is controllable by other stipulations, showing a clear intention, that the charterer shall be owner for the voyage. But I do consider such a stipulation, as very strong primâ facie evidence in favor of the absolute owner, that he is deemed to be the owner for the voyage, and that it will require very cogent circumstances to overcome it. In short, it appears to me, that, if the absolute owner does retain the possession, command, and control of the navigation of the ship during the voyage, and the master is deemed his agent, acting under his instructions for the voyage, though authorized and required to fulfil the terms of the charter-party, the absolute owner must, under such circumstances, be still deemed owner for the voyage, and be liable as such to all persons, who do not contract personally and exclusively with the charterer by a sub-contract with the latter, knowing his rights and character under the charter-party. This seems to me the natural, and, indeed, the necessary result of the doctrine stated in Marcardier v. Chesapeake Ins. Co., 8 Cranch [12 U. S.] 49, and McIntyre v. Bowne, 1 Johns. 229, and Gracie v. Palmer, 8 Wheat. [21 U. S.] 632, 633; Id. [Case No. 10,692]. The same view of this subject is taken by Mr. Chancellor Kent in his very learned Commentaries. See 3 Kent Comm. (3d Ed. 1836) pp. 137, 138, lect. 45. See, also, Abb. Shipp. (Story's Ed. 1829) p. 22, and note; Id. pp. 172–176; Christie v. Lewis, 2 Brod. & B. 410. And it stands confirmed by the decision in Taggard v. Loring, 16 Mass. 336, and in Clarkson v. Edes, 4 Cow. 478. My brother, the late Mr. Justice Washington, in his excellent opinion in the case of Gracie v. Palmer, has collected the main authorities, and commented on the true results to be deduced from them with his usual clearness and accuracy; and the supreme court on the appeal supported and approved his opinion. So that, whatever of minute differences or distinctions or discrepancies are to be found in the English cases on this subject, in America there is a general uniformity of decision upon the principles and distinctions already stated.

Let us now proceed to the consideration of the terms of the present charter-party, in order to ascertain, what is their true meaning and interpretation. If, upon comparing the various clauses, we are led to the conclusion, that it is doubtful, whether the charterer was intended to have the sole possession and control of the brig during the voyage, or to be constituted owner for the voyage, then the general owner must be deemed such; for his rights and authorities over the voyage must continue, unless displaced by some clear and determinate transfer of them. The charter-party purports to be between George P. Richardson, as agent and owner of the brig Sterling, of which one Treat was the master, and Thomas A. French; and witnesseth, that Richardson, for the consideration thereinafter mentioned, "hath letten to freight all the aforesaid brig, with the appurtenances to her belonging, for a voyage to be made from Boston to port or ports in the West Indies; from thence to the city of St. Domingo, and back to Boston, not exceeding three ports used in all, when she is to be discharged, the dangers of the seas excepted." It then proceeds to state, that Richardson covenants, that the brig shall be tight, staunch, and strong, and apparalled during the voyage; that it shall be lawful for French, his agents and factors, as well at one place as at another, to load on board of the brig a full loading of goods and merchandise, as they shall think proper, contraband goods excepted. In consideration thereof, French agrees to pay in full for freight or hire of the brig, "the sum of six hundred and fifty dollars per calendar month, payable in five days after her return to and discharge in Boston." Richardson further agrees "to pay the charge of victualling and manning the brig," and French "to pay all lighterage, port charges, and pilotage during the voyage, and to deliver said brig, on her return to Boston, to the owner aforesaid or his order." Then follows this clause: "It is understood, that one passenger in cabin the charterer has the liberty of putting in, he finding his own small stores. The charterer to load the vessel at Boston, and the owner to discharge the cargo on her return. Should any funds be required for disbursements in a foreign port, to be advanced the captain on account of the charter." The parties then bind themselves for the true and faithful performance of their covenants and agreements in the penal sum of two thousand dollars.

Such are all the material clauses in the charter-party. And it must be admitted, that they are somewhat indeterminate in their nature and character, so far as they affect the ownership for the voyage. The language in the beginning imports a present demise of the ship for the voyage. It is, that the owner lets to freight the brig for the voyage. But this does not necessarily import, that the possession is given up to, and taken by the charterer. Whether so intended, or so by operation of law, will essentially depend upon all the terms of the instrument taken together. This is very clearly established by the decisions cited by Lord Tenterden in his excellent treatise on Shipping (Abb. Shipp. pt. 3, pp. 173–178, c. 1, § 6). On the other hand, the clause of covenant by the owner (who had appointed the master,) that the ship should be tight, &c., and that he should pay for the victualling and manning during the voyage, is not necessarily decisive (as has been already intimated) the other way. The clause, that the charterer should have the liberty of putting a passenger on board in the cabin, does, indeed, favor the construction, that the owner was to retain the possession of the brig by his master during the voyage. So also the clause, that the owner should discharge the cargo on the brig's return to Boston. On the other hand, the clause, that the charterer should deliver the brig on her return to Boston, to the owner or his order, does strongly imply, that the charterer was to have possession during the voyage up to that time. So that, from the obscurity of the phrases, and the apparent contradictory presumptions arising from these various clauses, it is really somewhat difficult to say, what was the absolute intention of the parties. And, then, upon the doctrine already stated, on the footing of the doubt what the parties did intend, the owner must be deemed to continue owner for the voyage. It is not an unimportant circumstance, also, in the actual posture of the case, that the acts of the parties under the charter-party conform to this view of the matter, and put this construction upon it. It distinctly appears, that the sole instructions for the voyage were given by the owner, and not by the charterer; and that the respondent acquiesced in what the owner assumed to be his right and duty, the giving of the orders for the whole voyage to the master, as his agent, without any interference by the charterer. But it appears to me the less necessary to decide the case on this point, because it is manifest, that the owner, and not the charterer, was to have the possession of the brig immediately on her return to Boston, and was, as owner, to discharge the cargo; and the freight was not payable until five days after such discharge. So that, in the most unfavorable aspect of the case for the owner, the possession of the brig and cargo were to be in him upon the brig's arrival at Boston, and he was to discharge the cargo. And thus his possession became coupled with his lien for the freight, if it existed, in the same way and to the same extent, as if he had had possession of both during the whole voyage.

We are, therefore, led to the consideration of the second point already stated; and that is, whether there was, under the circumstances, a lien on the homeward cargo for the freight. That there was such a lien, unless waived or displaced by the agreement of the parties, has been already affirmed; and, indeed, is upon principle, as well as upon authority, incontrovertible. The clause, in the charter-party, relied upon by the respondent as a waiver or displacement of the lien, is that, which provides, that the freight shall be paid "in five days after her (the brig's) return to and discharge in Boston." The argument of the respondent is, that, by the word "discharge," as here used, is meant, not an unlivery or unlading merely of the cargo, but a delivery of the same to the charterer, or owner of the cargo. The argument on the other side is, that by the word "discharge" is meant a mere unlading or unlivery from the brig, without any reference to a delivery to the owner. And, certainly, in a general sense, as well as in a nautical sense, the proper meaning of the word "discharge," with reference to a cargo, is to unlade it from the ship. So it will be found stated in Johnson's Dictionary, and Falconer's Marine Dictionary. The word, therefore, in its appropriate sense, being perfectly significant in the place, where it occurs, that meaning is not to be departed from, unless a different use of it is manifestly intended in the clause in question. I see no reason for any such construction. On the contrary, it seems to me, that the appropriate sense is here, as matter of intention, to be presumed from the circumstances, rather than any wider or different sense. It is well known, that the goods of the shipper may not only be detained for freight, properly so called, but also for the hire agreed to be paid by the shipper under a charter-party for the use of the ship, if the owner of the ship retains possession of the cargo; and that the shipper cannot ordinarily insist on a delivery of the goods to him, until the freight or hire is paid or secured, according to the terms of the agreement. See Abb. Shipp. pt. 3, p. 168, c. 1, § 7; Id. pp. 246, 247, c. 3. But, then, the owner is not at liberty to insist, that the goods shall not be landed before such payment or security is made. On the contrary, the shipper has a right, as it should seem, by the maritime law, to insist upon examining the goods, after they are unlivered, in order to ascertain, whether they are damaged or not, before he makes himself liable at all events for the freight. Under such circumstances, an unlivery of the cargo becomes perfectly proper; and after it is made, the owner of the ship has a right to detain it in his custody, until the payment of or security for the freight. So the law is laid down in Lord Tenterden's Treatise on Shipping (Abb. Shipp. pt. 3, pp. 247, 248, c. 3, § 11); and it appears to be the general rule adopted by foreign maritime nations. In the marine ordinance of Louis XIV. (1 Valin, lib. 3, p. 665, tit. 3, art. 21), it is expressly prescribed, that the master shall not retain the merchandise on board his vessel for default of payment of the freight. But he may, at the time of the discharge, refuse to deliver it, or cause it to be held for the freight. Valin gives, as the reason, that it would be absurd to allow the master to insist upon the payment of his freight before the goods were examined, and the damage, if any, ascertained. The modern Code of Commerce of France (lib. 2, tit. 8, art. 306) contains a provision very similar in its purport and objects. It declares, that the master shall not retain the merchandise on board of his ship for default of the payment of freight. But he may, at the time of discharging, insist upon having them deposited in the hands of a third person, until the freight is paid. The commentators give the same reason for this provision, which is assigned by Valin. See Boucher, Instit. de Droit Marit. (1803); Santayra, Code de Comm. art. 306, note; Locré, Esprit du Code de Comm. art. 306, note (2 Lucré, p. 211); Pardessus, Droit Comm. pt. 3, tit. 4, c. 2, art. 719.

Now, I cannot but think, that the very object of the clause, that the brig should be delivered to the owner on her return to Boston, and that he should discharge her, was intended to fasten his lien for the freight or hire under the charter-party, by enabling him to discharge the cargo, and retain it, until the freight was paid. At least, this is a natural explanation of the object of the clause, which, in any other view, would seem either superfluous or of little legal importance. It is not at all improbable, that the commercial embarrassments of French were suspected at the time, when the charter-party was entered into. But, at all events, his known failure at the time, when the cargo shipped was put under the control of the respondent, and the owner's agreeing to allow the brig to go the voyage, without any farther security than that derived under the original charter-party, favor this construction, especially as it appears, from Capt. Treat's testimony, that there had been some objections made by the owner to proceeding on the voyage; and in reply to a suggestion made by the respondent, the owner said, "that there was no need of any misunderstanding; that he was willing, that the brig should go the voyage, provided they would pay him for it." This was said in the presence of the respondent, of French, and of Mansfield, the supercargo. So that the demur about proceeding on the voyage seems to have been occasioned by French's failure, and the consequent arrangements made with the respondent. It seems to me in a high degree improbable, that the difficulty about the freight could have been overcome without some collateral security, if it had not been already well understood by all the parties, that the cargo then on board was, and by the arrangements made, the homeward cargo also, would be, subject to the lien for the freight. It would be so subject, if the discharge of the cargo, referred to in the charter-party, was construed to be a mere unlading thereof, and not an unconditional delivery to the consignee or respondent. The bill of lading for the homeward voyage does, in my judgment, greatly fortify this interpretation of the understanding of the parties. By the terms of it, the homeward cargo was to be delivered at Boston, the dangers of the seas only excepted, "unto the order of the shippers or assigns, he or they paying freight for the said goods as per charter-party." By the very terms of the instrument, then, the delivery was not to be, until the freight was paid according to the provisions in the charter-party, that is to say, "in five days after (the brig's) return to and discharge in Boston." The natural interpretation of this language, taken together, is, that the shipper or his assigns will pay the freight or hire in five days after the cargo is unladen by the owner, if the latter will, at the time of the payment deliver the cargo to the shipper or his assigns. In this way, all the words in the charter-party and the bill of lading have their usual and appropriate meaning. But if "discharge" means delivery, there will be, at least, a seeming repugnancy between the two instruments. By the bill of lading, the payment of freight is to be a contemporaneous act with the delivery; but by the charter-party, it is to be five days after the delivery. I am aware, that this repugnancy may be avoided, or at least mitigated, by construing the words, that when the cargo is delivered, the payment of freight shall be in five days after such delivery. But this construction is less consonant to the just import of the words, and would defeat the right of the owner to any lien for freight; a lien, which is favored in law, and ought not to be displaced without a clear and determinate abandonment of it.

Then, as to the remaining point, to what extent the homeward cargo is liable for the freight or hire. The argument is, that the homeward cargo (if at all) is not liable for any freight beyond what accrued and is properly due from itself for the return voyage; and, therefore, the freight must be apportioned. I am of a different opinion. By this charter-party, the freight or hire was a gross sum, payable on the successful close of the whole voyage. The bill of lading declares, that the return cargo shall be delivered to the shipper or his assigns, they paying freight as per charter-party. The shipper and his assigns, therefore, agree to pay the whole freight, for the whole voyage, upon the delivery of the cargo to them, according to the terms of the bill of lading; and I am unable to see, upon what grounds they can escape the obligations of their own contract. It is common learning, that where goods are consigned to a party, he paying the freight stipulated in the bill of lading, the consignee, by receiving the goods, is bound to pay the freight; and the law charges him upon his implied promise to pay it. In this view of the matter, if there were no lien at all, still the respondent would, upon clear principles of law, be personally liable for the payment of the whole freight or hire due by the charter-party, upon his receipt of the goods, upon his implied undertaking, even if he were now to be treated as the absolute owner of them. But, so far as the transactions between him and French are disclosed, he seems to stand as a mere substitute of French, and as holding the title of the goods under him, as security for debts and liabilities incurred by him for French, and not as absolute owner; and a fortiori in such a case he is bound to pay, what French would be bound to pay, since he must accept the goods cum onere. On this account I have not been able to perceive upon what substantial grounds the respondent can rest his present defence: for if he should succeed here, he would still remain bound to pay the full freight of the voyage upon his implied assumpsit as consignee. It would, therefore (as was said by a great judge, on another occasion), only be changing postures on an uneasy bed. It seems to me, that on this part of the case the decisions in Faith v. East India Co., 4 Barn. & Ald. 630, and Small v. Moates, 9 Bing. 574, have a very strong bearing.

Upon the whole, my opinion is, that there is a lien for the whole freight or hire, due under the charter-party, on the return cargo; and, therefore, the decree of the district court is affirmed, with costs.

[3 Am. Law Reg. (1855) 745.]

District Court, N. D. California.[1]

MEXICAN GRANTS—VALIDITY — CONDITIONS—LIMITS OF MISSION—WITHIN LITTORAL LEAGUES.

1. A grant by the political chief for the time being of Alta California, was not invalid, though it did not receive the previous approbation of the territorial deputation. The grant conveyed a present and immediate interest, and the neglect to obtain such approbation, if it were the duty of the grantee at all, would have been only the breach of a condition subsequent, by which the title was not forfeited.

2. In the same manner, conditions in such a grant, that the grantee should build and inhabit a house within a certain time, and also obtain judicial possession of the land, are conditions subsequent; and where, in a particular case, after the time limited, the grantee actually took possession of the premises, and had lived on them and cultivated them for three years, when he obtained judicial possession, which he maintained till the time of suit, a period of twelve years, it was held that the title had not been forfeited.

3. It is also no objection to such a grant (made in 1836) that the lands comprehended by it were within the limits of a mission.

[See not at end of case.]

4. It is, finally, no objection to such a grant, that the land was within ten leagues of the sea-coast, and that the approbation of the supreme executive did not appear to have been obtained.

[See note at end of case.]

McALLISTER, Circuit Judge. "The board of commissioners to ascertain and settle the private land claims in the state of California," decided in favor of the validity of the claim of the appellant, from which decision the United States appealed to this court, by whom the decree of the said board of commissioners was reversed, and a decree entered declaring the claim of the present appellant to be invalid. [Case No. 14,768.] From this last decision an appeal was taken to the supreme court of the United States, by whom it has been remanded to this tribunal with instructions to permit certain amendments to be made in the pleadings. See Cervantes v. U. S., 16 How. [57 U. S.] 619. It now comes before us for decision on its merits, with the lights which have been shed upon some of the principles embodied in it by the decisions made by the supreme court in the recent cases of Freemont v. U. S. [17 How. (58 U. S.) 542], and U. S. v. Ritchie [Id. 525].

From the evidence in this cause it appears, that the appellant having complied with all the provisions of the Mexican government relating to colonization, obtained a grant from Don Nicolas Gutierrez, dated April 1st, 1836, in these words: "Nicolas Gutierrez, lieutenant colonel of the permanent cavalry, commandant general, inspector and superior political chief ad interim of the territory of Alta California. Whereas, Citizen Cruz Cervantes, a Mexican by birth, has applied, for his own benefit and that of his family, for the parcel of land known by the name of San Joaquin, bounded on the north by San Felipe, on the south by Santa Anna, on the west by the plain of San Juan, and on the east by the hills of the same name; and whereas, all the requirements of the laws and regulations in the matter have been complied with; now, by virtue of the authority in me vested, I have thought proper, by a decree of this day's date, and in the name of the Mexican nation, to grant to him the aforementioned parcel of land, declaring the same to be his property by these letters patent, subject to the approval of the excellent deputation and the following conditions: 1st. He will submit to such conditions as shall be made by the regulations hereafter to be made for the distribution of vacant lands, and that meanwhile neither the grantee nor his heirs shall divide or alienate that which is adjudicated them, nor shall they subject it to rent, entail, bond, mortgage, nor to any incumbrance whatever, even if it should be for charitable purposes, nor convey it into mortmain. 2d. He may fence it without obstructing crossings, roads, and servitudes, putting it to such use and culture as he may deem best, but within one year at farthest he shall build thereon a house and shall inhabit it. 3d. He shall solicit of the respective judge to give him judicial possession by virtue of this patent, by whom the boundaries shall be marked, at the limits of which, besides the landmarks, there shall be set some fruit trees or else wild ones of some usefulness. 4th. The land of which donation is made is of two sitios de ganado mayor (two square leagues) according to the plat annexed to the proceedings. The judge who may give possession will cause it to be measured agreeably to ordinance, leaving the excess, (sobrante) which may result to the nation for its purposes as may be deemed convenient. 5th. If he shall contravene these conditions he shall lose his right to the land, and it may be denounced by any other person. Wherefore I command, that holding this as a firm and valid title, the same be entered in the corresponding book, and be returned to the interested party for his own security and further ends. Given in Monterey on the 1st of April, 1836. Nicolas Gutierrez. F'co del Castillo Negrete, S'rio."

The parol evidence in the cause shows that Cervantes was living on and cultivating the premises "about two years after the revolution between Governor Chico and Gutierrez." This, then, must have been some time in 1838. Another witness deposes to the appellant's living on the premises in 1846, and "that the house looked to be several years old," and the continued occupation by him and cultivation of the premises down to the present time, is established. The genuineness of the grant and all preceding documents on which it is predicated is not disputed. The objections to the claim are: 1st. That the grant had not received the approval of the territorial deputation. 2d. That a house was not built within the time prescribed by the grant, nor judicial possession applied for. 3d. That the land belonged to a mission, and could not be granted. 4th. That the lands being within ten leagues of the sea coast, were not subject to colonization.

A reference to the first and immediately succeeding articles of the general regulations of 21st November, 1828, for the colonization of Mexican territories, of which Upper California was one, will show the power of granting lands was confined to the political chiefs of those territories. True it is, that by the fifth article, it is declared that the grants made "shall not be definitely valid without the previous approbation of the departmental assembly, to which the respective expedientes shall be referred." If this article treats the grant as void until such consent shall have been obtained, then is the granting power transferred from the political chief to the territorial deputation, for it would be their approval and not his grant, which conveyed an interest in the land. But the article itself does not consider the grant void without such approval, for in case such approval is not obtained by the political chief, it is made his duty by the sixth article, "to report to the supreme government with the record of the case for its resolution." Intermediate the issuing of the grant, and the approval of the departmental assembly, and that if that could not be obtained, the promulgation of the resolution of the supreme government, the grant is declared to be not definitively valid. It is then at least inceptibly valid—but to what extent, as the regulations are silent, we must look to the grant itself, the construction placed upon it by the supreme court of the United States, and the well established usage of the country for an answer. In the case of Fremont v. U. S., 17 How. [58 U. S.] 542, and in that of U. S. v. Ritchie, Id. 525, grants similar to that under consideration were reviewed by the supreme court. That tribunal declared in the former case, that the words of such grant "were positive and plain;" they purport to "convey a present and immediate interest." Now the consent of the territorial delegation could not vary the character of the grant. Passing by its terms, a "present and immediate interest," it presents the ordinary case of an estate or interest conveyed to the grantee determinable on the happening of a future event. The usage of the country also established this interpretation of the grant. One of the witnesses in the case, E. P. Hartnell, deposes, he has resided thirty years in California, has filled the offices of inspector general to the missions, collector of the port of Monterey, translator to the military government of California, and is now state translator; is well acquainted with the usages and customs which prevailed for eleven or twelve years prior to the acquisition of the country by the Americans, in relation to the granting of lands. He states the usage was for the grantee upon receiving the governor's grant, to consider himself entitled to enter into the granted premises, and so far from having to wait for judicial possession or the approval of the deputation, "I have known, (he says,) numerous instances in which neither the one nor the other was asked for many years." He further deposes, "it was always considered the duty of the governor to do that, (to obtain the approval of the assembly,) and I know, from my own knowledge, that whilst the deputation was held at Monterey, the governor always did so. I never knew of any grantee interesting himself about getting the approval of his title, until it was rumored that the Americans were coming to take possession of the country." On his cross-examination he is equally explicit as to the usage and the general opinion of the inhabitants as to its existence. Viewed then, as the grant has been construed by the supreme court, or as it has been interpreted by the well established usage in California, during the Mexican rule, the court considers that the failure of appellant to procure the approval of the departmental assembly, if it is to be deemed his duty so to have done, was the breach of a condition subsequent, for which the title of appellant cannot be forfeited.

The omission of appellant to build a house within the time prescribed by the grant, and to obtain judicial possession of the land, are clearly conditions subsequent. It has been urged, that the eleventh article of the general regulations declares the grant to be "null and void," in case of a failure to occupy and cultivate. But this section applies exclusively to pobladores, (settlers or colonists,) who shall have failed to cultivate the lands on the terms and with the number of persons or families agreed on. In such cases only, is the grant declared "null and void," and even in such cases the political chief is authorized to confirm the same in proportion to the part of the agreement fulfilled. The conditions then, to build a house within the time prescribed by the grant, and to obtain judicial possession of the premises being conditions subsequent, the breach of both or either of them cannot operate, under the facts of the case, a forfeiture of appellant's title. Arredondo's Case, 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 729; Fremont v. U. S., 17 How. [58 U. S.] 542.

The third objection to the validity of this claim is, that the lands granted were what are generally termed "Mission lands," and therefore not subject to colonization. This objection we deem to have been disposed of by the supreme court, U. S., in the case of U. S. v. Ritchie, 17 How. [58 U. S.] 525, in which it was decided not to be available.

The last ground taken against the appellant is, that the lands granted to him are situated within ten leagues of the sea shore, and therefore not the subject of grant without the previous approbation of the supreme executive power. "The principle, (say the supreme court,) which prevails as to all public grants of land, or acts of public officers in issuing warrants, &c., is, that the public acts of public officers, purporting to be exercised in an official capacity and by public authority, shall not be presumed to be a usurped, but a legitimate authority previously given, or subsequently ratified, which is equivalent." It is a universal principle, where power or jurisdiction "is delegated to any public officer or tribunal, over a subject matter, and the exercise is confided to his or their discretion, the acts so done are binding and valid as to the subject matter." Arredondo's Case, 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 729. In U. S. v. Clarke, 8 Pet. [33 U. S.] 453, the court say, "He who would contravene a grant executed by the lawful authority, with all the solemnities required by law, takes upon himself the burthen of showing that the officer has transcended the powers conferred upon him, or that the transaction is tainted with fraud." The principle under consideration, was extended to a case where a grant was issued by a governor of East Florida, reciting a royal ordinance which authorized the issuing of grants to foreigners, for the consideration therein mentioned; but the grant proceeded to concede lands to a citizen, for a consideration totally different from that mentioned in the ordinance. The court in such case, say, "although the order is recited, it (the grant,) does not profess to be founded upon it." This is apparent, (the court say,) from the fact that the land is granted to a citizen, and for a consideration entirely different from that mentioned in the ordinance, and although the ordinance is recited in the grant. the court proceed to predicate the power to make it upon the decree made by the governor on 3d April preceding. To sustain his power to make such decree and grant, they enter into a general consideration of the Spanish laws, and after enunciating the general principle, "that a grant made by a governor, if authorized to grant lands in his province, is prima facie evidence that his power is not exceeded," they state that the connection between the crown and the governor justifies the presumption that he acts according to his orders. His orders are "known to himself and to those from whom they proceed, but may not be known to the world. Such a grant, under a general power, would be considered as valid, even if the power to disavow it existed, until actually disavowed. It can scarcely be doubted, that in a Spanish tribunal, a grant having all the forms and sanctions required by law, not actually annulled by superior authority, would be received as evidence of title." 8 Pet. [33 U. S.] 451. We do not consider the relative position between the king and a governor, under the Spanish rule, unlike that which existed between the executive and the territorial chief, under the Mexican régime, as to absolutism on the one hand, and dependence on the other. It is upon such presumed relation, the supreme court rests its argument to some extent in the case cited, and sustains the grant. Now the argument against the validity of appellant's grant is, that the lands covered by it are within ten leagues of the sea coast, and without the previous approbation of the supreme executive power of Mexico, could not be granted. The general power to grant is not denied; but it is asserted that these specific lands were excepted from the granting power; and the 4th article of the colonization law of the 18th August, 1824, is relied on. For the present it may be admitted, that such is the clear import of that article, and the first reply to it is, that four years subsequently, in the year 1828, the supreme executive power did give its approbation as required. The act of 1824 did not express the form in which such consent was to be given. That was left to the discretion of the executive.

In 1828 the general regulations for the colonization of the territories of the republic were announced by the supreme executive power. By the first article the power to "grant vacant lands generally within their respective territories," was delegated to the political chief. There is no limitation in terms as to vacant lands, within ten leagues of the sea coast; but there is a reference to a class of lands, a portion of which is well known to lie within the ten littoral leagues, and that reference is to be found in the 17th article, where it is provided that mission lands are not to be colonized, not because of their vicinity to the coast, but because it was yet to be determined by the government whether they were to be considered the property of neophytes, catechumens, and of Mexican settlers. It is natural to suppose, that in the settlement of a new country, with a savage foe in the interior, with the ecclesiastical and military establishments on the coast, and a sparse population struggling into existence, that the lands first petitioned for, should be those immediately on the coast, affording safety from hostile attacks in the rear, and in front the means of escape in the hour of necessity. In truth the very object of the law, (the settlement of families and cultivation of the soil,) could only be effected by primarily reclaiming the frontier lands on the coast. Accordingly, the political chiefs—not one, but all—proceeded, to grant vacant lands without distinction. It has been well argued by the board of commissioners in this case, "that one political chief or governor, might have erred in the matter through ignorance, or from some improper motive, and so of one body of the deputation or junta; but that all should have done so through a series of years, and successions of terms, it is difficult to believe; and the evidence of this construction is heightened to the highest degree of moral and legal certainty by the acquiescence of the executive, after we must presume he had knowledge of this construction of his regulations, and never intimating, as far as we can learn, that there was any error in this uniform course of proceeding. His knowledge of all this is a presumption of law, from the requirement of quarterly returns to be made to him of all the grants that were made and the facts relating to them" (9th article, general regulation, 1828). In this case there was no fraud on part of appellant; no mistake on the part of the political chief. The former, in his first petition for a grant, gives the boundaries of the land, and in his second reiterates them, accompanying such petition with a map; and the proper functionary to whom the petition was referred, reported the land to be within the ten littoral leagues mentioned in the law of August 18th, 1824, and the report concludes "that the land may be granted to petitioner if the mission of San Juan Bautista, to whom it belongs has no objection." In face of the fact that the lands proposed to be granted were reported by the appropriate functionary to be within the ten littoral leagues, the governor proceeded to grant them. All other political chiefs before and since his time have exercised like power. All the Mexican functionaries recognized it—the most valuable portions of land were granted under its exercise, and the people of the territories acted upon it. Property conveyed under it passed from one to another by operation of law, and by act of the parties for years—all acted upon the belief of the right of the governors to grant, and of the correctness of the interpretation placed by them on the regulations. The usage and custom was well established, and the community to a considerable extent was built up under its operation. The supreme court have said "there is another source of law in all governments:—usage, custom, which is always to be presumed to have been adopted with the consent of those who may be affected by it. The court not only may, but are bound to respect general customs and usages as the law of the land equally with the written law, and when clearly proved they will control the general law." "We cannot impute to congress the intention to not only authorize this court, but to require it, to take jurisdiction of such a case, and to hear and determine such a claim according to the principles of justice, by such a solemn mockery of it as would be evinced by excluding from our consideration, usages and customs, which are the law of every government, for no other reason than in referring to the laws and ordinances in the second section, congress had not enumerated all the kinds of laws and ordinances by which we should decide whether the claim would be valid if the province had remained under the dominion of Spain." Arredondo's Case [supra]. This court consider that the exception sought to be established in this case to the general power of granting by the political chiefs, is not clearly made out against the legal presumption which exists in favor of a grant on a fair interpretation of the phraseology of the general regulations of 1828, and the well established usage of the Mexican local authorities, acquiesced in for a series of years by the supreme executive power. Opposed to all these, is a verbal criticism upon two articles of the regulations of 1828, in connection with the 4th article of the colonization act of Mexico, 18th August, 1824. The first act of the regulations, it is argued, authorizes the political chiefs to grant only in conformity to the act of the 18th August, 1824, and the third article directs the political chiefs to ascertain whether the requirements of that act are embraced in the petition, and whether the petitioner, as well as the land, possess the requisite conditions. Now, the act of colonization contained general provisions, which were designed to control the new system Mexico had recently adopted, and doubtless the general regulations of 1828 were intended to carry out the policy of that act. Among other provisions, it extended to all colonists certain guaranties—restricted the quantity of lands to be held by one person, directed certain distinctions to be made in the selection of grantees, and reserved to the government the right to take precautions, in certain cases against foreigners. The reference to that act by the regulations of 1828, may be regarded as simply adopting its general policy. The direction in the third act of the general regulations to the political chiefs to ascertain if the requirements of the law were embraced in the petition, and the persons as well as the land, possessed the requisite conditions, are but a repetition of the words in the first article, with the additional direction that he should ascertain if the persons who petitioned, if foreigners, applied with a view to settle in the country —if citizens, to live on and cultivate the soil, and that the land petitioned for was "vacant," such being requisite conditions of persons and land coming within the purview of the regulations themselves. But if this interpretation be deemed equivocal, and not a clear exposition of the intention to be gathered from the colonization act of 1824, and the general regulations of 1828, we consider there is such doubt on this point, that it cannot be successfully urged to defeat the claim of the appellant acquired under the interpretation of the granting power by all the political chiefs and lesser functionaries of the Mexican government, acquiesced in for years by the supreme executive power sanctioned by well established usage, and had thus become a rule of property under which large amounts of property have been acquired, held, and transferred during the existence of Mexican rule in California.

It has been strongly argued by counsel for the appellant that the colonization act of 1824 applies exclusively to foreign colonists, and is applicable to the states only, and does not extend to the territories of the republic. In the view taken of this case, it is deemed unnecessary to discuss these questions.

In this case the evidence clearly establishes the fact that at no time did the appellant abandon his claim. Within two years after receiving his grant he took actual possession of the premises, and lived on and cultivated them until 1841, when the Mexican authorities placed him in judical possession, which he maintained until the acquisition of Mexico by that country. It is true he did not attain judicial possession until some five years after the date of his grant, but subsequently in 1841 he did obtain from the authorities such possession and has continued to hold under it to the present time. Under these circumstances, we consider that his claim is to be held valid by the rules prescribed for our guidance in the adjudication of this and similar cases.

It is therefore hereby ordered, adjudged and decreed that the decision and decree of the board of commissioners for the ascertainment and settlement of private land claims in California made in this case be confirmed, and that the claim of the appellant, Cruz Cervantes, be, and the same is hereby confirmed to the extent of two square leagues or sitios de ganado mayor, and for no more; being the same land described in the grant and expediente referred to therein, and of which judicial possession was given to him as appears by the evidence, provided that the said quantity to him granted, and now to him confirmed, be contained within the boundaries called for in said grant, and map to which the grant refers; and, if there be less than two square leagues, or sitios de ganado mayor, within the said bounds then there is confirmed to him the said less quantity.

[NOTE. The United States appealed from the decree of the circuit court to the supreme court, where the decree below was affirmed on the grounds, as appears from the opinion delivered by Mr. Justice Grier, that under the decision in U. S. v. Reading, 18 How. (59 U. S.) 1, the objection that the grant had not been approved by the departmental assembly was untenable, as was likewise the objection that the land was within the 10 littoral leagues,—that restriction applying to foreign colonists, and not to Mexican citizens,—following U. S. v. Arquello, 18 How. (59 U. S.) 539; also, that the tracts appurtenant to missions never vested in the church or any one else by legal title, and that the lands, though formerly occupied by a mission, were not so occupied when the grant was made, the grant having been made with the assent of the mission, which set up no further claim to occupancy; therefore, that the 17th section of the regulations of 1828, forbidding the grant of lands "occupied" by missions for colonization, could have no application to unoccupied lands not made the subject of colonization. DAMAGES—TUG AND TOW—SALVAGE AWARD.

Where a tug towed a vessel aground and she was compelled to pay salvage to another tug to haul her off: Held, that the facts proved showing carelessness on the part of the tug, as the cause of the grounding, the vessel was entitled to recover from her as damages the salvage ordered by the court to be paid to the tug that drew the vessel off.

[3] [Affirmed in Case No. 2,561.]

BENEDICT, District Judge. This action is brought by the owners of the brig Homely, to recover of the tug C. F. Ackerman the damages arising from failure to perform a contract to tow the brig from sea into the port of New York. The evidence shows an employment of the tug and that she took the brig in tow upon a hawser; that shortly after passing the Hook, the brig, while in the tow of the Ackerman and following her, brought up upon the tail of the Romer shoal, whence the Ackerman was unable to pull her off that evening. On the next morning the tug Weed and the Ackerman, together, made fast to the brig and towed her off the shoal. For the Weed's share of that service the brig has been condemned by this court to pay the sum of $625.

The question in this action is whether the Ackerman is liable for this sum to the brig. I am of the opinion that she is liable, and for these reasons: It is quite plain, from the evidence, that the pilot, the master of the brig, and the master of the tug understood that, subject to the general instruction given by the pilot to keep her in deep water, as she drew 14 feet, the knowledge and skill of the tug was relied upon to keep the brig in the proper channel. The averment of the answer is, that a course by compass was given by the pilot; but the testimony, when fairly considered, does not support the averment. The amount of water the brig drew was given, with a direction to keep her in deep water. As to the general direction of the course, there was no choice and it was as well known to the tug as to the pilot. Knowledge on the part of the tug of where the water was deep enough to float a vessel drawing 14 feet, and ability to keep in such a channel, was taken for granted by all. So the tug proceeded, as she herself says, without any instructions as to the course, after the tug's hawser was taken at such a distance that it was not possible for the pilot of the brig to direct her course, and in water selected as a proper channel for a vessel drawing 14 feet. The brig followed behind the tug, and while so following in the course selected by the tug, she grounded. No one was on the stern of the tug to receive orders from the pilot on board the brig. No orders from the brig were given, and it is plain that no orders from the pilot were expected to be given or received. The tug was, therefore, bound to exercise care and skill in selecting a course which the brig could follow in safety, performing the duty she had undertaken and was bound to take. There is no doubt that care and skill on the part of the tug would have carried the brig into the harbor in safety, for the weather was still, the position of the vessels and shoals was known, the depth of water the brig was drawing was also known, and no reason, except carelessness on the part of the tug, can be assigned for the brig going upon the shoal. This carelessness renders her liable for damage resulting, and such damage is the sum necessary to get her off the shoal, namely $625, for which sum the libellants are entitled to a decree.

[NOTE. The claimant of the C. F. Ackerman subsequently appealed to the circuit court, where the decree herein was affirmed. Case unreported.

COLLISION IN LONG ISLAND SOUND—SAILING VESSEL AND STEAMER.

Where a schooner, the P., closehauled on a N. N. W. breeze, met a tug, the C. F. A., with three barges in tow, nearly head on, and keeping her course came in collision with the tow: Held, that the facts proved showed the tug to have been unable to change her course as required by rule 20 of the navigation rules (Rev. St. § 4233), but that she was in fault for not making known such inability to the schooner by the hoisting two vertical lights as required by rule 24.

Owen & Gray, for the schooner.

John J. Allen, for the steam tug.

BENEDICT, District Judge. These are cross-actions brought to recover the damages caused by a collision that occurred in Long Island Sound on the 31st of November, 1876, between the schooner Palestine and a tow.

The schooner was bound to the westward closehauled upon a north northwest wind. The tow was bound to the eastward, and consisted of the tug C. F. Ackerman with three heavily-loaded barges in tow astern. The allegation on the part of the schooner is that she held her course, and the tug failed to keep out of her way, as she was bound to do. The allegation on the part of the tug is that the schooner did not keep her course, but, when near the tug, luffed up, and by this change of course caused the collision. The evidence does not sustain the charge that the collision was caused by the schooner's luffing. On the contrary, the proof is that the schooner held her course until just before the collision. On the proof without regard to the pleadings it might be found that these vessels were approaching nearly head on, so that a collision could only be avoided by one or the other giving way; and perhaps also found that the capacity of the tug to give way, hampered as she was by three heavy barges in tow astern, and moving at a very low rate of speed, was far inferior to that of the schooner close-hauled, so that it was impossible for her to move herself and tow out of the way of an approaching vessel within any reasonable time. If such were the courses and situations of the two vessels, according to the principle of the maritime law lying at the foundation of the rules of navigation, the duty of avoiding the collision attached to the one able to do it, which in the case supposed would be the sailing vessel, as she could fall off, and not to the tug that could change neither way. But it must be noticed that the courts are now called on to apply a statute to cases of collision in this locality, and that by rule 20 of the navigation rules (Rev. St. § 4233), when proceeding in opposite directions so as to involve risks of collision, the duty of avoiding a sailing vessel is cast upon the steam vessel, in all cases, subject only to rule 24. Whether rule 24 could be resorted to in a proper case, to cast upon a sailing vessel in the open sound the obligation to avoid a steam vessel seen approaching, need not be decided here, because it is certain that, if the condition of the tug was such by reason of her tow as to render it impossible for her to discharge what, under ordinary circumstances, is the duty of the steam vessel, and entitled her by virtue of rule 24 to call upon approaching sailing vessels to perform the extraordinary duty of altering their courses to avoid her, it was manifestly great neglect on the part of the tug not to disclose her condition to approaching vessels, by displaying the two masthead vertical lights required by rule 4 to be displayed by steam vessels when towing other vessels. That the tug did not display such lights is proved, and the absence of such lights would cast upon her the responsibility of the collision, even were the case to be that I have supposed, instead of that stated in the pleadings.

The libel against the tug is therefore maintained, and the libel against the schooner is dismissed, with costs.

ADMIRALTY PRACTICE—SUMMARY JUDGMENT AGAINST SURVIVING STIPULATOR.

In a suit in rem against a vessel, brought in the district court, the vessel was discharged from custody, in that court, on a stipulation for value. On appeal, a decree was rendered by the circuit court for the libellant, with a direction that the two stipulators for value pay into that court the amount of such stipulation. One of the stipulators having died, the libellant applied for the entry of a summary judgment against the other stipulator, for the amount of the decree, and for execution against him. It was objected, that the libellant had not exhausted his remedy against the claimant of the vessel, and that the death of the one stipulator defeated the right of the libellant to execution against the survivor: Held, that the application must be granted.

[In admiralty. Libel by the owners of the brig Homely to recover of the C. F. Ackerman damages arising from a breach of contract of towage. There was a decree for libellants in the district court (Case No. 2,562), and the claimants appealed, to the circuit court, where its decree was affirmed (case unreported). The libellants now seek a summary judgment against the stipulators in the district court.]

Scudder & Carter, for libellants.

Butler, Stillman & Hubbard, for claimants.

BENEDICT, District Judge. This is a proceeding in rem, which has been carried by appeal from the district to the circuit court, and there decided in favor of the libellants. While the case was in the district court, the vessel was discharged from custody, upon a stipulation for value, which stipulation, accordingly, took the place of the vessel. Upon the determination of the case in the circuit court, it was there ordered, adjudged and decreed, that, in pursuance of the terms of the stipulation for value herein, given on the discharge of said steam tug from custody herein, Thomas Kenny and Erick P. Lindahl, the stipulators named therein, pay into this court the amount of their stipulation, and that the libellants have execution to enforce this decree. The libellants, now, upon proof of failure to pay the decree and of non-performance of the stipulation, upon due notice, ask for a summary judgment against Erick P. Lindahl, one of the stipulators for value, for the amount of the decree, and for execution against him to collect the amount. In opposition to the motion Lindahl appears and objects, upon the ground, that it does not appear that the libellants have exhausted their remedy against the claimants. The answer to the objection is, that the proceeding is in rem, and the libellants' right to proceed against the stipulators, upon the stipulation for value, became perfect upon the rendition of the decree. The stipulation for value represents the vessel, and the stipulators, by reason of their stipulation, are liable to a summary judgment against them, without other proceedings had, and without regard to the solvency of the claimants, or to any liability of the claimants, by reason of their intervention, if any such liability exists.

The only other question presented is, whether the death of one of the stipulators for value defeats the right of the libellants to execution against the survivor. It is to be observed, that, although the order of the circuit court does not, in terms, direct the entry of a summary judgment against the stipulators, it adjudges the stipulators liable to pay the amount awarded to the libellants, and authorizes execution to issue against them, in case of default. This order supposes authority to enter a summary judgment upon proof of non-compliance with the stipulation, and, such proof being made, requires the entry of judgment and the issuing of execution thereon. The right to give summary judgment upon a stipulation in admiralty has been long recognized, not only by the district courts, but also by the circuit courts, where such judgments have often been entered. It has also been recognized by the supreme court of the United States. This right appears to be expressly conferred, in actions in personam, by admiralty rules 3 and 4, of the supreme court, and the right to such a judgment, in actions in rem, is given by rule 66 of the district court of this district, under which rule the stipulation in question was taken. To the same effect is rule 144 of the district court for the southern district of New York, where that rule has been in existence and acted upon for many years. I do not doubt, therefore, the power of this court to direct the entry of a summary judgment upon the stipulation for value given in this case, against the surviving stipulator, who, by the terms of the stipulation, has made himself liable to pay the full amount of the decree. It is no answer to the engagement of such a stipulation, for him to say that another person, at one time bound with him, is now dead. What might be the libellants' rights against the estate of the deceased stipulator need not be considered, as the present application is only for a judgment and decree against the surviving stipulator.

The motion is granted.

The C. F. STARIN.

[10 Ben. 494.] [1]

District Court, E. D. New York. June, 1879.

COLLISION IN EAST RIVER—DAMAGE WHILE IN SINKING CONDITION.

Where a ferry-boat, already in sinking condition from collision with another boat, in attempting to go into her dock, came in collision with a canal boat in tow of a tug, and afterwards sank: Held, that as the sinking condition of the ferry-boat was an inevitable result of the first collision, and the loss which resulted was not increased by the second collision, the question whether the tug or the ferry-boat was in fault was immaterial.

In admiralty.

W. W. Goodrich, for libellant.
Peter Cantine, for claimant.

BENEDICT, District Judge. The evidence shows that the steamboat Stevens having been damaged in a collision with the John Cooker and her tow, left the Annex dock at Brooklyn, leaking badly, for the purpose of getting to a place of safety, if possible, and if not, to the beach of the Jersey shore or Governor's Island. After she was in the stream it was found that her pumps could not keep her free, and that she would necessarily sink, and accordingly she turned to get to a dock. In the effort to reach the dock she came in collision with a canal boat in tow of the propeller Charles F. Starin; she was in a sinking condition at the time. The injury she had already received in the collision with the John Cooker was of so serious a character as to render it impossible to keep her afloat. While it may doubtless be true that some wood was broken, and perhaps the leak increased by the collision with the canal boat in tow of the Starin, that collision did not prevent her from reaching the docks, nor materially increase the libellant's loss. His loss would have been precisely the same, if there had been no second collision, for his boat would have been sunk just as she did sink. Under such circumstances the libellant can recover nothing of the Starin, and the question whether the second collision was caused by the fault of the Starin or of the Stevens becomes an immaterial one. The libel is accordingly dismissed, with costs.

MEXICAN LAND GRANTS—VALIDITY.

This claim must be confirmed under the ruling of the supreme court in Fremont's Case [Fremont v. U. S., 17 How. (58 U. S.) 542.]

Claim [of the heirs of Anastasio Chabolla] for eight leagues of land [called the Rancho Saujon de los Moquelemes], in San Joaquin county, rejected by the board, and appealed by claimants.

A. P. Crittenden, for appellants.
S. W. Inge, U. S. Atty.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. The grantee in this case, on the seventeenth of May, 1843, addressed a petition to the governor, representing that he had, some sixteen months previously, applied for a grant of land designated on a map, which he inclosed. This application, he stated, had been referred to General Sutter and the juzgado of the pueblo, but had been wholly neglected by them; and that in the meantime grants had been made to Gulnac and other foreigners, less entitled than himself to favorable consideration. He therefore prayed the governor to make him the concession as originally solicited. The governor made the usual marginal decree or order of reference for information, and the juzgado of the pueblo of San José and the secretary, Jimeno, reported favorably to Chabolla's application. On the twenty-fourth of January, 1844, the governor made his decree of concession, granting to Chabolla "eight sitios of gañado mayor on the borders of the river Cosumnes southward, and on that of the San Joaquin," the possession to be measured two leagues on the bank of the river San Joaquin and the rest in the plain running to the east. The documento or title delivered to the grantee corresponds with the decree of concession, and the fourth condition states that the land is eight leagues in extent, to be measured as above mentioned, and according to the diseño. The foregoing facts appear in the expediente on file in the archives, and in the title produced by the party, the signatures to which are duly proved. No approval by the departmental assembly appears to have been obtained, nor was juridical possession of the land given to the grantee. The usual condition of cultivation and habitation was annexed to the grant, and the question arises in this as in the Case of Fremont, "whether there has been such unreasonable delay or want of effort on the part of the grantee to fulfill the conditions as will justify the presumption that he had abandoned his claim, and is now seeking to resume it from the enhanced value of the land." [Fremont v. U. S.] 17 How. [58 U. S.] 561.

The grant was issued in January, 1844. By the deposition of Antonio M. Pico it appears that in 1846 or 1847, there were upon the rancho three hundred head of cattle and forty or fifty horses belonging to Chabolla; there was also at that time a house on the place, in which an overseer lived, with Indian servants, and corrals had been built and land put under cultivation. The witness states that he believes the cattle had been taken to the rancho from San José in 1844. Henry J. Bee, a witness whose testimony was taken in this court, states that he saw Chabolla on his place in 1846; that he was then building a house; and that in 1845 he saw him driving cattle up there. The witness visited the rancho in 1848. A house had then been built. Sulinas, the steward of Chabolla was living there, and there were cattle and horses upon the rancho bearing Chabolla's brand. The witness adds that in 1845 he did not go to the place where in 1846 he saw the house. George F. Wyman, whose testimony has also been taken since the case was appealed, states that in 1844 he saw a man named Sulinas building a house on the rancho for Chabolla, as he said. The house was situated on the south side of the Cosumnes river. The witness also states that he was again on the rancho in 1845, and from time to time for three or four years, and that in 1848 he lived several months in Chabolla's house. In 1845 he saw cattle and horses there marked with Chabolla's brand; and in 1846–7 there were some twenty acres of land inclosed by a ditch, dug by Sulinas, who cultivated wheat, barley, etc., within the inclosure. No opposing testimony has been taken on the part of the United States. Under the facts as disclosed by these witnesses it is evident that the claimant has not only not been guilty of such a breach of the conditions as would justify the presumption that he had abandoned his claim, but on the contrary he seems to have proceeded to settle upon and cultivate his land with a diligence by no means usual with the grantees under the Mexican government. I think, therefore, that under the rules laid down by the supreme court in the case of Fremont, the objection that the conditions were not fulfilled cannot be maintained. This claim was rejected by the board for the nonfulfillment of the conditions; but one of the commissioners appears to have concurred in the decision on the ground that no proof was offered to show that the present claimants are the heirs and representatives of Chabolla, who is deceased. That objection, whatever force it may have had, is obviated by the testimony of Antonio Chabolla, a brother of the grantee, taken in this court.

The cause has been submitted without argument on the part of the United States, or the statement of any objection to the claim, except a reference to the opinion of the board as containing the grounds on which the United States rely for the rejection of the claim. It is not mentioned in the opinion of the board, or suggested on the part of the United States, that there is any difficulty as to locating the land. The grant mentions that the land is situated on the borders of the Cosumnes southward, and on those of the San Joaquin, measuring two leagues on the latter river, and the remainder of the tract on the plain to the east. The description of the land in the grant delivered to the party, in one respect differs from that contained in the decree of concession. In the former, the land is described as lying in the plain to the west of the San Joaquin. But this is evidently a clerical error, for the map of the country shows that the plain out of which the land could alone be taken lies to the east of the San Joaquin, the land to the west being a broad belt of marshy land covered with tule, and if located to the west, the grant would not touch the Cosumnes, on the borders of which to the south it is described as situated.

A decree of confirmation of the claim, to the extent of eight leagues, to be located and measured as set forth in the expediente, must therefore be entered.

PATENTS—LICENSE—CONSTRUCTION OF CONTRACT.

1. Complainant, while in the employ of defendant, conducted experiments in defendant's factory, and at its expense, which resulted in the production of the devices on which complainant afterward obtained a patent; but previous to his application he contracted with defendant to make for it, at a fixed price, five thousand machines equal to a specimen, selected as a standard, which contained the devices afterward patented—complainant to use defendant's factory, power, machinery, and materials, and any machinery or tools made or bought by complainant, at his own cost, for the purpose of facilitating the fulfillment of the contract, at the close thereof, to be the property of defendant at a price to be adjusted according to the terms of the contract. The contract having been executed, and complainant having meanwhile obtained his patent, upon a suit brought by complainant to restrain defendant as an infringer: Held—That under the rule laid down in McClurg v. Kingsland, 1 How. [42 U. S.] 202, the facts are sufficient to justify the presumption of a license to the defendant to make and use complainant's invention, and that this presumption is strengthened by the terms of the written contract.

2. The chief, if not the only value of a portion of the tools, which by stipulation defendant was to purchase at the termination of the contract, consisting in their special adaptation to the production of complainant's patented devices: Quaere, whether this stipulation did not import an understanding on both sides, that the defendant might employ their tools for the uses for which they were peculiarly adapted.

In equity. Final hearing on pleadings and proofs. Suit brought [by Cyprien Chabot] on letters patent [No. 77,715] for an "improvement in sewing-machines" granted to Cyprien Chabot, March 12, 1868.

Hector T. Fenton and Furman Sheppard, for complainant.

Chas. B. Collier and Theodore Cuyler, for defendant.

McKENNAN, Circuit Judge. The decision of this cause turns upon the applicability of a rule at law, settled by the highest authority, to the facts presented in the proofs. The defendant is a corporation, and has been for a number of years engaged in the manufacture and sale of sewing-machines. In 1866, the complainant went into the service of the defendant, as foreman. During that period of his employment, he was engaged in experiments with the tools and materials of his employer, which resulted in the production of the devices for which he obtained a patent on May 12, 1868, in pursuance of an application dated January 27, 1868. After he had invented these devices, and while he was in the service of the defendant, between October, 1866, and August, 1867, he made a number of sewing-machines for it, which embodied his subsequently-patented improvements. For his services during this period, he was fully compensated. On September 30, 1867, he entered into a written contract with the defendant, by which he stipulated to make for it, at a fixed price, not less than five thousand of its machines, known as the combination button-hole and sewing machines, to be in all respects equal to a specimen selected as a standard. This specimen machine had in it the devices for which the complainant afterward obtained a patent. The contract also provided for the free use, by the complainant, of the defendant's factory, machinery, and tools, and for the supply, by the defendant, of power, light, and all the materials necessary to be used in making these machines. It also provided that any machinery or tools bought or made by the complainant, partly or wholly at his own cost, for the purpose of facilitating the fulfillment of the contract, should, at the close thereof, be the property of the defendant, and be paid for at a price to be adjusted according to the terms of the contract. This contract seems to have been fully executed on both sides, and the relations established by it to have been terminated by the mutual consent of the parties.

Now the question is, do these facts amount to a "consent and allowance" by the complainant of the use of his invention by the defendant? In McClurg v. Kingsland, 1 How. [42 U. S.] 202, where the patentee was in the employment of the defendants, at a weekly compensation, and while so employed made experiments at their expense, which resulted in the discovery of an improved method of casting iron rollers, where he continued to use his new method in making rollers for them for four months, at increased wages, before he applied for a patent, proposed to the defendants to purchase his right and take out a patent, which they declined, and made no demand on them for thus using his improvement, nor gave them any notice not to use it, until a misunderstanding occurred between them, it was held that these facts "would fully justify the presumption of a license, a special privilege or grant to the defendants, to use the invention; that the facts amounted to a 'consent and allowance of such use,' and show such consideration as would support an express license or grant, or call for the presumption of one to meet the justice of the case, by exempting them from liability."

Now, it seems to me that the facts in this case call more imperatively for the presumption of a license than in McClurg v. Kingsland [supra]. The complainant's experiments were carried on in the defendant's factory, and at its expense, and while he was in its employment, in an advanced position. After he had brought them to a successful issue, he incorporated his new devices in machines which were constructed under his superintendence in the defendant's factory, and so he continued to do, for more than four months, until he made them their contract before referred to. If the rule stated in McClurg v. Kingsland is to be followed, these facts are sufficient to justify the presumption of a license to the defendant, to make and use complainant's invention. But that presumption is strengthened by the terms of the written contract. It provided for the manufacture of a large number of machines by the use of the defendant's factory, machinery, tools, and materials—the labor expended upon them and the complainant's services alone being supplied by him; and for these his compensation was fixed by the contract. These machines were intended to be, and were actually sold and distributed throughout the country as the defendant's machines. Whatever degree of popular favor might be secured for them as the result of their peculiar features of construction and operation, it is obvious that this was the expected source of profit to the defendant, and the inducing motive on its part to enter into the contract. When they had been introduced into general use by the defendant's efforts, were known distinctly as its machinery, and a growing market for them had been established, it is not a fair inference that the parties intended that the advantage thus gained by the defendant should be lost, when the number of machines contemplated by the written contract should be supplied. On the contrary, it was stipulated that the machinery and tools, bought or made by the complainant, should, at the termination of the contract, become the property of the defendant, upon payment to him of their value ascertained in the method provided for. The chief, if not the only value of a portion of these tools, consisted in their special adaptation to the production of the complainant's patented devices. Without the right to use them, there is no apparent reason why provision should be made for their transfer to the defendant, for a price measured by their real value. Does not this stipulation then, import an understanding on both sides, that the defendant might employ these tools, for the uses for which they were peculiarly adapted? Considering all these circumstances, in their just significance, I think the case is brought within the dominion of the rule stated in McClurg v. Kingsland, and that the complainant must be presumed to have consented to and allowed the use of his inventions by the defendant. The bill must therefore be dismissed, with costs.

CHACON v. EIGHTY-NINE BALES OF COCHINEAL.

[1 Brock. 478.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Virginia. May Term, 1821.[2]

JURISDICTION—PRIZE—VIOLATION OF NEUTRALITY—CITIZENSHIP—EXPATRIATION—EFFECT OF ENTERING FOREIGN NAVAL SERVICE—PIRACY—LAW OF NATIONS—AUGMENTATION OF FORCE—EVIDENCE—RESTITUTION OF PRIZE CAPTURED IN VIOLATION OF NEUTRALITY.

1. The question, of prize or no prize? belongs exclusively to the courts of the captor; and in no case does a neutral assume the right of deciding it. But offences may be committed by a belligerent against a neutral, in his military operations, which it would be inconsistent with the neutral character to permit; and which give to the other belligerent, the party injured by those operations, claims upon the neutral which he is not at liberty to disregard. In such a situation, the neutral has a double duty to perform; he must vindicate his own rights, and afford redress to the party injured by their violation.

2. If the wrong-doer comes completely within the power of the neutral, the practice of this government is, to restore the thing wrongfully taken.

3. Quaere: If a native born American citizen can expatriate himself? If he can, he divests himself, by the very act of expatriation, as well of the obligations, as of the rights of a citizen. He becomes, ipso facto, an alien; his lands are escheatable, and the rights appertaining to citizenship, once lost, cannot be recovered by residence, but he must go through the formula prescribed by law, for the naturalization of an alien born.

4. But whether the right of expatriation exists or not, an American citizen may, under the modern usage of nations, enter either the land or naval service of a foreign government without compromising the neutrality of his own, or divesting himself thereby of his rights of citizenship. The application of this general principle to the United States, is not affected by our treaty with Spain. Admitting the capturing vessel to have been a privateer, commissioned by the enemy of Spain, and the captured vessels to have been Spanish property: that a person (a native citizen of the United States,) holding a commission to cruize under the enemy of that power, might be deemed a pirate in the courts of the United States or Spain; still, he would not be so deemed by the rest of the world. Those two powers may bind themselves by treaty, but cannot bind foreign nations; and, though that treaty may affect the individual, (in the case supposed,) personally, it cannot affect the prize. The enemy of Spain had the right, like all other sovereigns, to grant the commission, and captures made under it, are as valid, and vest as completely in the belligerent sovereign, under whose flag they were made, as if the treaty between the United States and Spain had never been made.

5. Neutral rights are not violated by the grant of a commission to a neutral, while within the territory of a belligerent. A commission to cruize, granted in a time of profound peace, but in contemplation of war, may be used after war breaks out. It is sufficient to give validity to captures made under it, that war existed at the time of the capture.

[1] [Reported by John W. Brockenbrough.]

[2] [Affirmed in The Santissima Trinidad and The St. Ander, 7 Wheat. (20 U. S.) 283.]

6. Quaere: If a colony in a state of rebellion, and struggling to establish its independence of the parent state, is embraced by the act of congress of 1794, prohibiting the enlistment of soldiers, marines, and seamen, within the limits of the United States, to enter the service of any foreign prince or state?

7. However this may be, such a revolted colony, or section of a state, comes within the more ample provisions of the law of nations: and while neutrals concede to a people in such a situation, the character and rights of a belligerent, if they are in a condition to make war, they are as much bound to refrain from a violation of the rights of neutrals, as if they were an acknowledged state.

8. It seems, that the public, current declarations of a crew, that a large portion of them were enlisted for the cruize, in the United States, in a case where no motives existed for previous combination; and the testimony of the master of the captured vessel, that a portion of the crew spoke English, and that the mate told him, that the vessel was equipped and fitted out in Baltimore, cannot be entirely disregarded.

9. The principle has been well settled by the supreme court, that belligerent captures by privateers, fitted out, armed, and manned within the United States, in violation of the neutrality of our government, and the act of congress, in such case provided, if they are brought within the powers of our courts, may be restored by them to the injured belligerent.

10. And the same principle is applicable to the national ships of a foreign sovereign, whether the capture was made within the waters of the United States, or upon the high seas, and brought within the jurisdiction of the federal courts. The general principle is undeniable, that the national ship of a foreign sovereign, coming within the United States, is exempted from the jurisdiction of the United States, but this exemption is granted only on the condition that the sovereignty of our government shall be respected: and the gross violation of its neutrality by such foreign national ship, forfeits the condition, and subjects her prizes, made in fact through neutral means, to restitution to the original owner.

In admiralty. This was a libel, originally filed in the district court of Norfolk, by the consul of Spain, in April 1817, against eighty-nine bales of cochineal, two bales of jalap, and one box of vanilla, formerly constituting part of the cargoes of the Spanish ships, Santissima Trinidad and St. Ander, and alleged to be unlawfully and piratically taken out of those vessels on the high seas, by a squadron, consisting of two armed vessels, called the Independencia del Sud, and the Altravida, and owned and commanded by persons, assuming themselves to be citizens of the United Provinces of the Rio de la Plata. The libel was filed, in behalf of the original Spanish owners, by Don Pablo Chacon, consul of his catholic majesty, for the port of Norfolk; and, as amended, it insisted upon restitution, principally for three reasons: 1st. That the commanders of the capturing vessels, the Independencia del Sud and the Altravida, were native citizens of the United States, and were prohibited by our treaty with Spain of 1795, from taking commissions to cruize against that power. 2d. That the said capturing vessels were owned in the United States, and were originally equipped, fitted out, armed and manned in the United States, contrary to law. 3d. That their force and armament had been illegally augmented within the United States. A claim and answer was given in by James Chaytor, styling himself Don Diego Chaytor, in which he asserted that he was the commander of the Independencia, that she was a public armed vessel, belonging to the government of the United Provinces of Rio de la Plata, and that he was duly commissioned as her commander: that open war existed between those provinces and Spain: that the property in question was captured by him, as prize of war, on the high seas, and taken out of the Spanish ships, the Santissima Trinidad and the St. Ander, and put on board of the Independencia: and that he afterwards, in March 1817, came into the port of Norfolk with his capturing ship, where he was received and acknowledged as a public ship of war, and the captured property, with the approbation and consent of the government of the United States, was there landed for safe keeping in the custom-house store. The claimant admitted that he was a native citizen of the United States, and that his wife and family had constantly resided in Baltimore; but alleged, that in May 1816, at the city of Buenos Ayres, he accepted a commission under the government of the United Provinces, and then and there expatriated himself by the only means in his power, viz: a formal notification of the fact to the United States consul at that place. He denied that the capturing vessel, the Independencia, was owned in the United States, or that she was fitted out, equipped, or armed, or her force augmented in the ports of the United States, contrary to law. He denied, also, that the Altravida was owned in the United States, or that she was armed, equipped, or fitted out, in the United States, contrary to law; or that she aided in the capture of the vessel in question. He further asserted that the captured property had been libelled, and duly condemned as prize in the tribunal of prizes of the United Provinces, at Buenos Ayres, on the 6th of February, 1818. He denied the illegal enlistment of his crew in the United States; but admitted that several persons there entered themselves on board as seamen, in December 1816, representing themselves to be, and being, as he supposed, citizens of the United Provinces, or in their service, and then transiently in the United States: and that he refused to receive citizens of this country, and actually sent on shore, some who had clandestinely introduced themselves on board.

It appeared, by the evidence in the cause, that the capturing vessel, the Independencia, was originally built and equipped in the port of Baltimore, as a privateer, during the late war between the United States and Great Britain, and was then rigged as a schooner, and called the Mammoth, and was fitted out to cruize against the enemy. After the peace, she was converted into a brig, and sold by her original owners. In January 1816, she was loaded with a cargo of munitions of war, by her new owners, who were inhabitants of Baltimore, and being armed with twelve guns, part of her original armament, she was sent from that port, under the command of the claimant, Chaytor, ostensibly, on a voyage to the north west coast of America, but in reality to Buenos Ayres. By the written instructions given to the supercargo, on this voyage, he was authorized by the owners, to sell the vessel to the government of Buenos Ayres, if he could obtain a suitable price. She arrived at Buenos Ayres, having committed no act of hostility, but sailing under the protection of the United States flag, during the outward voyage. At Buenos Ayres, the vessel was sold to the claimant, and two other persons, and soon afterwards, in May 1816, assumed the flag and character of a public ship, and was understood by the crew, to have been sold to the government of Buenos Ayres; and the claimant made known these facts to the crew, asserting, that he had become a citizen of Buenos Ayres, and had received a commission to command the vessel as a national ship, and invited the crew to enlist in the same service, and the greater part of them accordingly enlisted. From this period, the public agents of the government of the United States, and other foreign governments, at that port, considered the vessel as a public ship of war, and this was her avowed character and reputation. No bill of sale to the government of Buenos Ayres was produced, but the claimant's commission from that government was given in evidence.

Upon the point of the illegal equipment and augmentation of force of the capturing vessels in the ports of the United States, different witnesses were examined on the part of the libellant, whose testimony was extremely contradictory; but it appeared from the evidence, and was admitted by the claimant, that after the sale in Buenos Ayres, in May 1816, the Independencia departed from that port, under his command, on a cruize against Spain; and after visiting the coast of Spain, put into Baltimore, early in the month of October, in the same year, having then on board, the greater part of her original crew, among which were many citizens of the United States. On her arrival at Baltimore, she was received as a public ship, and underwent considerable repairs in that port. Her bottom was new coppered, some parts of her hull was recaulked, part of her water ways replaced, a new head was put on, some new sails and rigging, to a small amount, and a new mainyard, were obtained; some bolts were driven into the hull, and the mainmast, (which had been shivered by lightning,) was taken out, reduced in length, and replaced in its former station. For the purpose of making these repairs, her guns, ammunition, and cargo, were discharged, under the inspection of an officer of the customs; and when the repairs were made, the armament was replaced, and a report made by the proper officer to the collector, that there was no addition to her armament. The Independencia again left Baltimore, in the latter part of December 1816, having at that time on board, a crew of 112 men; and on or about the 8th of February following, sailed from the capes of the Chesapeake, on the cruize, in which the property in question was captured. During the stay of the Independencia at Baltimore, several persons were enlisted on board her, and the claimant's own witnesses proved, that the number was about thirty. On her departure from Baltimore, the Independencia was accompanied by the Altravida, as a tender or despatch vessel. This last was formerly a privateer, called the Romp, and had been condemned by the district court of Virginia, for illegal conduct, and was sold under the decree of the court, together with the armament and munitions of war, then on board. She was purchased, ostensibly, for one Thomas Taylor, but immediately transferred to the claimant, Chaytor. She soon afterwards went to Baltimore, and was attached to the Independencia, as a tender, having no separate commission, but acting under the authority of the claimant. Some of her guns were mounted, and a crew of about twenty-five men put on board at Baltimore. She dropped down the Patuxent, a few days before the sailing of the Independencia, and was there joined by the latter, and accompanied her on her cruize.

The district court, upon the hearing of the cause, decreed restitution to the original Spanish owners [case not reported], and from that sentence, the claimant, Chaytor, appealed to this court.[3]

The following opinion was delivered by

MARSHALL, Circuit Justice. It is universally admitted, that the question of prize, or no prize, belongs solely to the courts of the captor. In no case, does a neutral assume the right of deciding it. But offences may be committed by a belligerent, against a neutral, in his military operations, which the neutral ought not to permit; and which give claims upon him, to the party injured by those operations, which he is not at liberty to disregard. In such a situation, the course to be pursued by the neutral, to assert his own rights, and perform his duties, by affording redress to the party injured by a violation of those rights, will vary with varying circumstances. If the wrong doer comes completely within his power, and brings that which will afford complete redress for the wrong done, the usage of nations, generally, as is believed, certainly the usage of this nation, is to restore the thing wrongfully taken. This act vindicates the offended dignity of the neutral, and gives to the injured party, the most ample redress, perhaps, which is attainable, or can reasonably be demanded. This ought to satisfy the sovereign, who claims reparation from the neutral, for his involuntary instrumentality in the war; and ought to be submitted to, by the sovereign of the offending party, whose duty it was, to restrain his officer from violating the rights of a friendly government, or to punish him for their violation. This usage, then, is recommended by the strong consideration of convenience and effectiveness. This principle having been adopted by the American government, two questions arise in the case under consideration. 1st. Has the capturing vessel so violated the neutrality of the United States, as to give this government the right, and impose upon it the duty, of restoring to the original owners, when brought within its power, the property which has been taken? 2d. By what department is this right to be exercised? this duty to be performed? Many points have been raised on both sides, and supported with great strength of argument, which on views, which might have been taken of the subject, by the court, it would have been necessary to consider and decide, but which, in the more narrow view that has been taken, need not be considered fully, because they are not necessary to the decision which will be made. These points, therefore, will be noticed very cursorily.

[3] The editor has adopted the accurate statement of Mr. Wheaton, in his report of this same case. See 7 Wheat. [20 U. S.] 283.

The right of Commodore Chaytor to make prizes, has been denied; because, 1st. he is an American citizen; and, 2dly. his commission does not authorize him to wage war.

1. The commodore, though a native American, insists, that he has expatriated himself, and has become a citizen of Buenos Ayres. I deem it unnecessary, in this case, to discuss the abstract question of this alleged natural right to dissolve the connexion between an individual and his country, and will only observe, that the principle is often of more serious consequence to those who would shield particular acts by its assertion, than they suppose. The individual who divests himself of the obligations of a citizen, if this be within the power of an individual, loses the rights which are connected with those obligations. He becomes an alien. His lands, if he has any, are escheatable. He cannot recover these rights by residence, but must go through that process which the laws prescribe for the naturalization of an alien born. Would Commodore Chaytor wish to place himself in this situation? I decline inquiring whether he has done so, because I think, that an American citizen may, according to the modern usage of nations, engage in foreign service, without compromising the neutrality of his government. I do not perceive any solid distinction between the land and naval service, in this particular. It is probable, that foreigners have less frequently obtained commissions in the marine than in the army; and for this it would not be difficult to account; but in cases where the subjects of the nation are supposed to be defective in maritime skill, as in the Russian service, foreigners are not unfrequently engaged. It has been supposed, that the application of this general principle to Commodore Chaytor, is prevented by our treaty with Spain. I do not think so; even admitting the Independencia del Sud to have been a privateer, and admitting the construction of the treaty, by the counsel for the libellant, to be right, (and I am very far from assenting to it,) the treaty may affect the individual, personally, but cannot affect the prize. Were it true, that a person holding a commission to cruize under the enemy of one of the contracting parties, might be prosecuted as a pirate, in their courts, he would not be deemed a pirate by the rest of the world. America and Spain may bind themselves, but they cannot bind foreign nations. They cannot bind the republic, if it be one, of Rio de la Plata. Pueyrredon had a right to grant this commission at his city of Buenos Ayres; and the world will respect it just as much as if the treaty between the United States and Spain had never been made. As between the government granting the commission, and the person to whom it is granted, it is valid. Captures made under it, will be deemed valid by that government, and by all foreign nations. Such captures vest the prize in the belligerent sovereign, under whose commission it was made; and, however his prize acts, or his edicts, may dispose of it afterwards, the world considers it as his property, taken by himself. We may punish the instrument, personally, if our law directs it; but this does not authorize us to seize the property of a belligerent sovereign, taken jure belli. The only principle on which this can be done, is, that our neutral rights have been violated. Now, the grant of a commission to a neutral, while within the territory of a belligerent, has never been considered as a violation of neutral rights.

2. Neither do I think, the objections to the commission have been sustained. Admitting that Rio de la Plata was not at war with Spain when it was granted, it is not doubted, that if a commission be given in contemplation of war, or in time of profound peace, that commission may be used when war shall break out. War existed at the time of the capture, and that is sufficient for the captor. The commission, in its terms, gives him the command of the Independencia, and so far as respects that vessel, is equivalent to a general commission in the navy; and the instructions authorize him to "cruize," which term strongly indicates hostile operations. But I think that a commission to command a ship of war, authorizes the officer holding it, if not interdicted by other circumstances, to attack and capture an enemy. It has also been contended that this vessel, which was originally the Mammoth of Baltimore, has not been transferred, with good faith, to the government of Rio de la Plata, but is, in truth, the property of an American citizen. The circumstances in support of this proposition, are certainly entitled to consideration, although they do not outweigh the positive testimony of the transfer. I shall therefore consider the transfer as unimpeached.

The court is now brought to the inquiry, whether the neutrality of the United States has been violated by any equipment, or augmentation of armament, or enlistment of seamen, within their territory? These acts are forbidden to a belligerent, by the law of nations; and are also forbidden by an act of congress. I will put out of the case the equipment in Baltimore, in 1815, for the voyage to Buenos Ayres, in January 1816, because I think the subsequent sale of the vessel authorised the purchaser, if unconnected with the original equipment, to make war upon the enemies of her flag.

I will consider the transactions of Commodore Chaytor, after his arrival in Baltimore, in October, 1816, and will first inquire whether he has enlisted any part of his crew, in violation of the neutral character, and of the laws of the United States.

The act of 1794 enacts, "that if any person shall, within the territory or jurisdiction of the United States, enlist or enter himself, or hire, or retain, another person to enlist or enter himself, or to go beyond the limits, or jurisdiction of the United States, with intent to be enlisted or entered, in the service of any foreign prince or state as a soldier, as a marine, or seaman, on board of any vessel of war, letter of marque or privateer," &c. 1 Story's Laws U. S. p. 352, c. 50, § 2 [1 Stat. 383]. To this clause is added a proviso, which is understood to authorize the enlistment of a transient foreigner to serve on board a ship of war of his own sovereign, not equipped or armed within the United States. The history of the day informs us, that this act was considered as declaratory of the pre-existing law of nations, and was intended to aid the executive in the enforcement of that law. However serious may be the doubt, whether a section of a nation struggling for its independence, may come within the prohibitions of the act, there can be no doubt that such a people come within the more ample provisions of the law of nations. Whether Buenos Ayres be a state or not, if she is in a condition to make war, and to claim the character and rights of a belligerent, she is bound to respect the laws of war; and the government which concedes her those rights, is bound to maintain its own neutrality, unless it means to become a party to the war, as entirely as if she were an acknowledged state. She has no more right to recruit her navy within the United States, than Spain would have, and this government is as much bound to restrain her from using our strength in the war, as to restrain her enemy. Therefore, if Commodore Chaytor has recruited any men within the United States, not being the subjects or citizens of Rio de la Plata, he has violated their neutrality.

The depositions of Henry, Irvine, and Pecker, are supposed by the counsel for the claimant, to have no bearing on the case, because they detail only what they have heard from others; and I readily admit, that their testimony, standing alone, would not be sufficient to establish the fact of an enlistment within the United States, prior to the capture of the cochineal, mentioned in the libel. But they prove, unequivocally, that Commodore Chaytor did enlist American citizens, within the United States, for his subsequent cruize; and certainly, positive evidence of this fact, gives, in such a case as this, strong probability to other evidence, which asserts, that the same fact took place, previous to the preceding cruize. They prove also, the current declaration of the crew, that a great number of them were concerned in the preceding cruize, and were enlisted for that cruize, in the United States. I feel some difficulty in totally disregarding these declarations. The private communications of an individual, would certainly be entitled to no consideration; but the public conversation of a ship's crew, relative to the transactions of a ship, in a case where no motives exist for previous combination, will give some belief. Of the same nature, is the testimony of the master of the captured vessel. He says, that the crew of the Independencia spoke English, and that the second officer told him, they had been equipped and fitted out in Baltimore. The testimony of John Davis, is positive; and, if true, establishes every thing for which the libellants contend. This witness is supposed to be discredited by others, who, in some respects, are said to contradict him. Let us examine this subject. Davis swears that he was born in New York, and that he was enlisted in Norfolk, by Hooper, for the Independencia. Currie swears that he is an Englishman, who deserted from an English merchantman, lying in the port of Baltimore, and secreted himself on board the Independencia, until she sailed. It also appears, that Hooper recruited in Baltimore, not in Norfolk. But who is Currie? and what gives him superior credit to Davis? But I waive this inquiry, and will consider how far the repugnancy between their depositions, discredits either. Davis says he was born in New York; and if this be untrue, nothing he says ought to be believed, because, he knowingly asserts a falsehood. Currie says that Davis is an Englishman; and states facts, which may be presumed to be the foundation of his assertion. They are, that he deserted from an English merchantman, and that he had been employed during our war, under the British flag. But seamen, born in England, are found in American merchantman, and seamen born in New York, may be found on board an English merchantman. The fact of his receiving prize-money, is much stronger, but not conclusive. We have the highest authority for saying, that many of our seamen were impressed, and Davis may be among them. The fact is susceptible of explanation, and might, perhaps, have been explained, had the deposition of Davis been taken, after the statements of Currie were known. But he states, himself, to have enlisted in Norfolk, when it is proved, that he came on board in Baltimore; and Hooper, by whom he says he was engaged, was employed in Baltimore. But how often is it, that the memory errs with respect to unimportant circumstances, but is correct with respect to the principal subject. That Davis was enlisted, and by Hooper, were facts which would make a much stronger impression on his memory, than the place at which he enlisted. Baltimore and Norfolk were equal to him; he was, probably, at both, and might very well have the impression that he enlisted at the one place, when, in truth, he enlisted at the other. A mistake in such a circumstance, when the mind is not called particularly to it, would not, perhaps, invalidate the testimony of a witness whose moral character is not impeached. But let it be, that Davis is to be rejected. The testimony which discredits him, must be believed. That testimony, as well as the admission implied in the questions put by Commodore Chaytor, shows, that Davis was enlisted within the United States; and shows, further, that he was not a subject of Buenos Ayres, but an Englishman. Joseph Smith is proved to be unworthy of credit, but the testimony which discredits him, shows, that he was enlisted with the United States, and is a European Spaniard. Isaac Berry, also proves the whole case; but he is said to have destroyed his whole testimony, by the contradictions beween his first and second depositions. What are those contradictions? In the first, he says that he was shipped by M'Donnel; in his second, by James. Both these men may have kept sailors' houses; both have recruited for Buenos Ayres; both have communicated with Berry; and, certainly, his not recollecting distinctly with which he shipped, the act not always of a sober man, does not prove that he was not shipped at all. The commodore might shake his testimony, on this point, by his muster-roll, or by taking the deposition of those who are alleged to have shipped him, or of some of the crew who would prove, that no such man was on board. But no such testimony is adduced. One Wood, is said, in one deposition, to have been second mate, in another, a midshipman. He might, in the course of the voyage, have been both. But this does not prove that Wood was not on board. He varies in his estimate of the number of the crew. He does not profess to be exact. I do not think these small variances affect the body of his testimony, especially, as he states a great number of facts which expose him to detection, if he spoke what was untrue. John Harris, also, proves the whole case; but he, too, is said to be unworthy of belief, because he speaks of a forty-two pounder, which had no existence; and because he speaks of eighteen pounders, instead of twelves. There may have been some large piece on board, which was not brought in, though it is not probable; but this man, who has probably sailed in many cruizers, may have confounded what was on board one vessel, with the guns on board another. This mistake, if it be one, might affect very seriously his testimony respecting the armament, but does not destroy his testimony respecting his having been on board, when we recollect that he gives, completely, the means of contradicting him, if he could be contradicted. He names the officers and many of the crew, and says by whom he was enlisted. The muster-roll, or James, or any seaman on board the Independencia, could disprove any untruth he may assert. I cannot, therefore, reject his testimony. John Lewis is discredited, because he says that he is a native American, and is proved to be a Frenchman. I admit that his testimony is to be disregarded, but, still, he was enlisted in the United States, and is not a subject of Buenos Ayres. Matthew Murray proves the case, but is said, in his second deposition, to speak only from hearsay. I disregard entirely the testimony of Edward M'Donnel. His reputation is such as to discredit him completely.

I proceed, now, to the examination of the claimant's testimony. Edward Currie was in the Independencia, while she lay in the port of Baltimore, in 1816, and could have contradicted the enlistments alleged to have been made there, had they been untrue. He speaks only of John Davis. Daniel James discredits M'Donnel. Why was he not examined as to the enlistment of the crew? It is said that he enlisted Berry; why was he not interrogated as to that fact? James Barnes, commander of the Mangoree, says, that the Independencia was fitted, equipped, and manned, as he has understood, in Buenos Ayres, in May 1816; that the ships cruizing under the flag of that republic, of which the Mangoree was one, are manned chiefly by foreign seamen. The Regent, another of these cruizers, he understood to be fitted out, and manned in the port of Baltimore. How the vessels of Buenos Ayres were manned, is, in some measure, stated by other witnesses. Alexander Hunter, a native citizen of the United States, was a sailor on board the Mangoree. Where did he enlist? He does not say, and it is of not much consequence in this case. But he enlisted in the Independencia, in Baltimore. How is this to be justified? He had served the republic in the Mangoree. But did this convert him into a subject of Buenos Ayres, who was not an inhabitant of the United States? Will it be contended that by enlisting on board one privateer, an American citizen acquires a right to enlist, within his own country, on board any other? The crew, he says, belonged to all nations. They did not belong exclusively to Buenos Ayres. Hugh Cagne says, that he is a native of Ireland, and has been many years in the service of South America. How in her service? He is a seaman, and the fair presumption is, that he served in her marine. What is her marine? We have no reason to presume that it consists of much more than such vessels as the Independencia, the Mangoree, the Altravida, and the Regent, fitted out in other countries, and manned by foreigners. At any rate, he does not state himself to have become a subject of Buenos Ayres, and he does not state himself to have enlisted in Baltimore. He says, that among her crew, were many North Americans, and most of the crew, who came in her from Buenos Ayres. Where did those of her crew, who were North Americans, and who did not come in her from Buenos Ayres, enlist? We are left to conjecture. But what was the condition of that part of the crew, which came into port with her? The greater number of them sailed in her from Baltimore, and were, we must suppose, engaged for the voyage. On their return to port, their engagements terminated, unless others more extensive were made at Buenos Ayres. William Amos has been examined, and gives us some information on this subject. After the sale of the vessel, he says, Captain Chaytor came on board, and told them, they were at liberty to continue in the new service, or to be discharged. They chose to continue. Not one syllable is said of changing their political character, and throwing off their allegiance to the United States. Not one syllable is said of their engaging for a longer time, than till the vessel should return to the United States. We must, then, suppose that they continued citizens, and we have the more reason to believe, that their engagements expired on their return to the United States, because, Amos says he then left the vessel, and because Roe, who shipped at Buenos Ayres, also says that he left her at the same place. The crew, then, which came in her from Buenos Ayres, were American citizens, who, most probably, re-enlisted in Baltimore. Such a re-enlistment, is equivalent to an original enlistment. If they engaged for a longer time in Buenos Ayres, I think it would have been stated. Cagne goes, not to prove the enlistment of strangers, indiscriminately, but that they said they were in the service of the patriots. How in that service? He does not tell us. He does not say, admitting they spoke the truth, that every seaman, who had made a cruize in a privateer, said to be commissioned by any of the patriot governments, did not think himself in the service of the patriots. About fifteen of the crew of the Mangoree, shipped on board of her. All we know of this crew, would lead to the opinion, that they were American, and such other sailors as are found in our ports. They had been in the patriot service, and Captain Chaytor supposed himself authorized by that circumstance, to re-enlist them. But in this he was mistaken. Cagne says, too, that when she left the capes, her crew consisted of about one hundred and twelve, among whom were twenty-eight or thirty new men. Who were they? Are they proved to be citizens of Buenos Ayres, transiently within the United States? He does not pretend that they were. The fair presumption from the whole testimony is, that they consisted of that class of sailors, who are usually employed in privateering. Whether those who had sailed in the Mangoree, were among the number of new men, is not certainly stated; it is probable they were. Cagne states a fact, which is certainly material, in the inquiry, respecting the character of the Independencia. It is, that her crew was enlisted, not for the cruize, but for the year, and were on wages. But he entered the vessel in Baltimore, and does not say, that these were the terms on which the original crew were engaged. It gives some complexion to this transaction, that Cagne says, there were two brigs fitting out in Baltimore, which sailed about the same time with the Independencia, which were said to be intended as cruizers. It illustrates the practice of the place, and aids in informing us, what is understood by being in the patriot service. John H. Speck appears also, to have entered the Independencia in Baltimore, and he agrees in everything with Cagne. About thirty men were enlisted in Baltimore, not one of whom is said to have been a subject of Buenos Ayres; though they all said they had been in the patriot service.

I think, then, the evidence is more complete, than could have been expected, in a case of violation of law, that nearly the whole crew of the Independencia was enlisted within the United States, in violation of the act of congress, and of the neutrality of this government. The prize goods in question, have been taken by a neutral force. I must consider the men who came in the Independencia from Buenos Ayres, and the thirty men engaged in the Chesapeake, as enlisted within the United States, and as being men who could not be lawfully enlisted. It is unnecessary to extend the inquiry to the equipment, or the augmentation of the armament. The enlistment being established, the law is the same, whether those charges be supported or not. It is equally unnecessary to extend the inquiry to the Altravida. The prize having been made, in truth, by neutral means, is it the duty of the government to restore it to the original owner, when it is brought within the power of the United States?

The reasoning in favour of an affirmative answer to this question, appears conclusive. The government is bound to maintain its neutrality; and to prevent a foreign belligerent, from preparing a military force within its territory, to operate against a nation with whom it is at peace. If its means of prevention have been eluded, and its force against its will, been employed by a belligerent, in a manner not authorized by public law, if it has been thus made an instrument of war, the injured belligerent has claims on the neutral government, which has corresponding claims on the aggressing belligerent. If, under such circumstances, the means of obtaining reparation from the one, and of making it to the other, are placed within the power of the neutral, the strongest reasons of convenience, and of justice, seem to require that he should use those means. When a ship of war, which has acquired her military capacities in a neutral country, brings her prize into that country, these plain principles require, that the prize should be restored. In conformity with them, the Grange, captured by the Ambuscade frigate, within the waters of the United States, was restored by the government.

A question of much more difficulty remains to be considered. By what department of the government is this restitution to be made. Without recapitulating much of what has been said at the bar, by stating the reasons on which my opinion is founded, I will acknowledge, that in my private judgment, this right, and this duty devolve on the executive, or legislative, and not on the judicial department. The exercise must be regulated by a discretion, which courts do not possess, and may be controlled by reasons of state, which do not govern tribunals acting on principles of positive law. If, therefore, this was a case in which my own judgment was alone to be consulted, I should, I believe, confine myself to the inquiry, whether any act of congress authorized the restitution sought by the libellants. But this court is not at liberty to decide for itself. It is bound, and ought to be bound, by the decisions of the supreme court, and its judgment must conform to those decisions. They are admitted to have settled the principle, that property captured by privateers, fitted out, armed, or manned, within the ports of the United States, and brought within the power of our courts, may be restored by them to the original owner. It is, however, contended that the same principle does not extend to captures made by national ships. That national ships are in many respects distinguishable from privateers, is not to be denied; is this a case in which a sound distinction can be taken between them? Ships of war and privateers, both cruise under a commission from their sovereign, and both make prizes under the authority of that commission. In both cases, the sovereign is the captor, and the prize vests absolutely in him. The cruizer, in both cases, is a mere instrument of war employed by his sovereign, and the particular interest which the agent may have in the thing acquired, depends on municipal regulations, of which this court can take no notice. The courts of the captor, will in both cases distribute the proceeds according to those municipal regulations, but foreign courts consider the property as the property of the sovereign, and the possession of the captor as the possession of the sovereign. In both cases, then, the foreign court which acts upon the prize, acts on property in the possession of a foreign sovereign, acquired by his authorized agent. In what then does the difference between the right of courts, to interfere with their prizes consist?

We are told that the national ship of war, carries upon its deck a portion of the sovereignty of his prince, and is, of course, inviolable. I am not prepared to say that a privateer, commissioned for the purposes of war, is not equally inviolable, at least so far as respects its military operations. But I will not enter into this inquiry. I will ask, how is this inviolability acquired, and how far does it extend? In the case of The Exchange, 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 116, the supreme court laid down the principle expressly, that this exemption from the jurisdiction of the nation, in which the national ship of a foreign sovereign is found, is derived, where there is no express compact, from the assent implied in the admission of such vessel into port. But the same case establishes this further principle: that this immunity is granted, on condition that the sovereignty of the place be respected. A breach of the condition, forfeits the immunity depending on it.

A national ship, openly and grossly violating the laws of a neutral government, enlisting a full crew, in opposition to those laws, forfeits the condition on which an exemption from those laws was granted. On this principle, the Grange was restored.[4] The government acts without being charged with a violation of faith. If the government acts, it acts by that department, which is entrusted with the power of inquiring, whether the belligerent has violated those neutral rights which forfeit his prize, and if the courts exercise this power rightfully, in the case of prizes made by privateers, they may, I think, exercise it in the case of prizes made by a national ship, and brought within our territory. If there is fallacy in this reasoning, I do not perceive it. But, supposing it to be applicable to a capture made within our waters, and immediately arrested, it is contended, that it is inapplicable to a capture made on the high seas, and brought within our waters. The violation of neutrality gives, it is said, a claim on the sovereign, whose power is an unit, and cannot give rights to seize prizes made by one vessel, more than by another. When the offending vessel comes again into port, she comes in with all the immunities originally attached to her. In theory, this argument is strong; but, practically, it would destroy the efficacy of the principle. It would deprive the neutral government of its power to give specific relief; and seems to me to be as applicable to prizes made by privateers, as by national ships.

Another idea was suggested by the counsel for the claimants, of which I feel the full force. It is, that this application to the neutral sovereign, to vindicate his neutral rights, and repair the wrongs done to a foreign sovereign, must be made by that foreign sovereign himself, through his authorized agent, and not by a private individual. Were I to admit this, the question immediately occurs—Does not this objection go as strongly to the restoration of prizes made by privateers, as to the restoration of prizes made by national ships? I am not sure, that I am master of that train of reasoning, which has conducted the supreme court, to the assertion of that jurisdiction over prizes made by privateers, which has been exercised. If I were, I should not attempt to give it, because it will be stated more ably by those who are themselves convinced of its propriety. I content myself with saying, that I think the principles on which prizes made by privateers, have been restored, apply to prizes made by national ships, who have violated the neutrality of the United States, and I, therefore, hold myself bound to restore in this case. The sentence of the district court is affirmed.

NOTE [from original report]. This cause was carried by appeal to the supreme court of the United States. It was argued with distinguished ability, both in the circuit and supreme court, and the sentence of the circuit court was unanimously affirmed by the supreme court. See [The Santissima Trinidad] 7 Wheat. [20 U. S.] 283.

[NOTE. Mr. Justice Story delivered the opinion of the supreme court, and after stating that the commission of the Independencia was complete proof that she was a public ship; that the production of the bill of sale was unnecessary; that Buenos Ayres was to be deemed a belligerent nation; that captures made by her public vessels were to be regarded as having the same validity and possessing the same immunities claimed by public ships under the law of nations; and that the arming and supplying the Independencia with munitions of war, and forwarding her for sale to Buenos Ayres, was a commercial adventure, contraband, but in no sense a violation of the laws or neutrality of the United States,—assigned the following grounds for affirmance: That although the testimony as to illegal equipment and augmentation of force adduced by libellant was unsatisfactory and contradictory, and evidently false in some particulars, yet there were other proofs, from independent sources, which clearly established the violation of neutrality beyond all reasonable doubt. That the enlistment of men for the Independencia at Baltimore was a clear augmentation of force within the United States, and consequently a violation of the neutrality laws. That the evidence clearly showed, as to the Altravida, an illegal outfit and enlistment of crew within our waters, constituting a like augmentation, was a violation of the law of nations as well as of municipal laws, a violation of the neutrality of the United States, and infected captures subsequently made with the character of torts, which justified and required a restitution to the parties injured by the misconduct. That while neither a public ship nor her officers are liable to arrest in a neutral court for illegal captures on the high seas, yet this exemption did not extend to prizes in our ports, as to which our courts had the right to exercise their jurisdiction; citing The Cassius (U. S. v. Peters) 3 Dall. (3 U. S.) 121; The Invincible, 1 Wheat. (14 U. S.) 238. That, in cases of violation of neutral territorial jurisdiction, there was no distinction between the capture of public and private armed ships; following The Invincible, supra. That the fact that the goods illegally captured were landed at Norfolk from the capturing public ship, by the express permission of our government, did not vary the case, since it involved no pledge that, if illegally captured, the goods should be exempted from the ordinary operation of our laws. And that the condemnation of the property at Buenos Ayres, during the pendency of this suit, even assuming it to have been regularly made and duly authenticated, could not oust the jurisdiction of the federal courts after it had once regularly attached itself to the cause.]

In re CHADWICK et al.

[5 Law Rep. 457.]

District Court, W. D. Pennsylvania. Sept., 1842.

BANKRUPTCY—ACT OF 1841—TIME OF TAKING EFFECT—WHO ENTITLED TO BENEFITS OF.

1. The meaning of the word "future," in the second section of the bankrupt act [5 Stat. 442], is future with reference to the day when the act was to take effect. See Hutchins v. Taylor [Case No. 6,953].

2. An assignment made by debtors subsequent to the passage of the bankrupt act [5 Stat. 440, c. 19], but before it was to go into operation, of all their property, in trust for certain preferred creditors, will not prevent their discharge and certificate under the act, on their voluntary petition.

In bankruptcy.

Hampton & Black, for bankrupt Chadwick.

Findly & Lowrie, for opposing creditors.

M'Candless & Black, for the bankrupt Leavitt.

Lowrie & Baird, for opposing creditors.

IRWIN, District Judge. On the 23d of October, 1841, the bankrupts, Hanson S. Chadwick and Hart A. Leavitt, merchants of the city of Pittsburgh, made an assignment of all their estate, rights and credits, to assignees, in trust for certain preferred creditors; and on the 19th and 25th of March, following, they severally presented their petitions for the benefit of the bankrupt act, and were subsequently declared to be bankrupts. Their petitions for discharge are opposed on the ground that the assignment was voluntarily given of all their property, rights and credits, in contemplation of bankruptcy, and is therefore fraudulent and void. On the part of the bankrupts it is contended that the assignment is not embraced in the bankrupt act; that the words, "all future payments, securities," &c., found after the enacting clause of the second section, which it is supposed to infringe, mean all payments, &c., subsequent to the time the act took effect; and that if the act does include the assignment, they are protected by the first and second provisions of the said second section. The act was passed on the 19th of August, 1841 [5 Stat. 449], and the seventeenth section declares "that this act shall take affect from and after the first day of February next." Until the time last mentioned, the act had no legal existence or power, except as to such parts of it as, in express words, are retrospective, or which declare that certain provisions shall take effect from "and after the passage of the act." The rights which it creates, its disabilities, and obligations began on the 2d day of February, 1841, except where it otherwise provides in words, the import of which cannot be mistaken, as in the retrospective clause of the second section, which prevents the discharge of a bankrupt, who has made an assignment with preferences, subsequent to the first of January, 1841, or at any other time, in contemplation of the passage of a bankrupt law, unless assented to by a majority in interest of the unpreferred creditors, and in that part of the 4th section which declares that the bankrupt shall not be entitled to a discharge and certificate "who shall not have kept proper books of account, after the passage of this act, nor any person who, after the passage of this act, shall apply trust funds to his own use." These words are not found in any other part of the act, from which it may be inferred that, where congress, in any other case, intended to give the act effect from its passage, the same language would have been used; yet, if equivalent words are used, and the context and the scope of the act indicate the same purpose, they must receive the like construction. One leading and important object of the act is to place the creditors of a bankrupt upon an equality in the distribution of his assets; and to effect this, in the first section, "any fraudulent conveyance, assignment," etc., is made an act of bankruptcy, and in the second section, all "payments, securities," etc., with preferences, in contemplation of bankruptcy, are declared to be a fraud upon the act. The words "any fraudulent conveyance," &c., in the first section, embrace the fraudulent acts mentioned in the second section, and they are alike void, and a fraud upon the act, and subject to the same action in case of both voluntary and involuntary bankruptcy. They are, with the other enumerated cases in the first section, acts of bankruptcy It has become material to inquire, from what time they are so? No argument need be used to show that the "persons liable to become bankrupts within the true intent and meaning of the act," are only such as committed acts of bankruptcy from the time it took effect. This is too obvious to be denied. The great aim and object of the law is to declare what shall be acts of bankruptcy, and who are to be bankrupts; all the rest is but details of proceedings in bankruptcy, and these proceedings must necessarily begin to operate at the time when the subject matter of them can be reached. Unless, therefore, an exception is made of a particular class of bankrupts, whose acts are void, from the passage of the law, there can be no decree of bankruptcy made which will have relation back to that time. It is contended that this exception is made by a fair construction of the second section of the act; that though it may be admitted that the first four classes of persons mentioned in the first section as liable to become bankrupts could only become so after the law took effect, yet that the fifth class, such as make "any fraudulent conveyances, assignments," &c., from the natural meaning of the words "future payments," &c., in the second section, which only define the frauds referred to in the first section, must be deemed bankrupts from the passage of the act. It must be admitted, that where a statute requires something to be done in future, or forbids that which was lawful before to be done in future, and there should not be found in any other part of it language to restrict, qualify, enlarge, or show another meaning than the words naturally import, it takes effect from its passage, however inconvenient or injurious the consequences. The second section, unconnected with any other part of the act, would involve those who made "payments, conveyances, &c." in bankruptcy from the passage of the act, so that all such "payments, conveyances, &c." from that time would be fraudulent and void, and the person making them could not receive a discharge, while from the operation of the first and seventeenth sections all other acts of bankruptcy are created such at a future day, the act as to them not going into effect until more than six months from its passage. In the first section those liable to become bankrupts are ranged in classes, the fifth being such as "make any fraudulent conveyance, assignment, &c.," and but for the words "future payments, &c.," in the second section, this class as well as the first four could not be known as bankrupt before the day on which the act was to take effect. Can it be that the legislature intended to discriminate between them, so that one class should be the immediate subject of notice and punishment while the other classes are protected for more than six months longer? In the nature and in the degree of frauds they are all placed by the statute upon the same equal ground, but they were not so before the statute was passed, for the first four always bore a character of fraud, while the fifth, as defined by the second section, makes that fraudulent which was before sanctioned by general usage among merchants and by the laws of the state. It might be supposed therefore, that if it was designed to apply the law to one act of bankruptcy at one period, and to another at a later period, the longest notice was due to the persons whose assignments and transfers, by long usage and the statutes of several of the states—Pennsylvania among the number—were valid and sometimes meritorious, and who, if the bankrupt law took effect from its passage, could not in distant parts of the union, and after they had made bona fide transferances of property, know that they had subjected themselves to its provisions. It is a mistake to suppose that such assignments had any character of fraud.

In the case of Brashear v. West, 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 614, Chief Justice Marshall says, "that a general assignment of all a man's property is, per se, fraudulent, has never been alleged in this country; the right to make it, results from the absolute ownership which every man claims over that which is his own, and where no bankrupt law exists for setting aside a deed honestly made for transferring the whole of a debtor's estate for the payment of his debts the preference given to favored creditors, is the exercise of a power resulting from the ownership of property which the law has not yet restrained. It cannot be treated as a fraud." This doctrine had before repeatedly received the assent of the supreme court of this state. While such assignments were thus protected and were often considered as meritorious, a law that would suddenly change their character, and convert them into frauds, without promulgation, or, which is the same thing, without reasonable notice, would be harsh and unjust, and it would be going too far to attribute such an intention to the legislature, unless expressed in language free from doubt, and which could not be rationally misconstrued. Probably no statute can be found, affecting rights so pervading and important, and subjecting them to changes so material, which is made to take effect from its passage. The bankrupt act of 1800 [2 Stat. 26], contained a provision against fraudulent conveyances of property similar to that found in the existing law; but the legislature guarded against any injustice in its operation. It passed on the 4th of April, but was not to take effect until from and after the first day of June following. A statute ought to receive such a construction, if the words and subject matter will admit of it, as that the existing rights of individuals shall not be infringed; and it is a general rule in construing them, that they are to be considered as prospective, and not to prejudice or affect transactions, unless such intention be manifestly expressed, especially if it tend to produce injustice or inconvenience. "Where rights are infringed, where fundamental principles are overthrown, where the general system of the laws is departed from, the legislative intention must be expressed with irresistible clearness to induce a court of justice to suppose a design to effect such objects." U. S. v. Fisher, 2 Cranch. [6 U. S.] 390.

With regard to the first four acts of bankruptcy mentioned in the first section, no rights would be infringed, or no injustice done, if the law went into operation from its passage, for they are not protected by the usage or statute of any state; but the fifth act, so far as it relates to assignments which were not frauds per se was not repugnant to the law and usage of the state, and if the law intended to discriminate between them, as to the time of its operation upon each, the fifth would have been the last to go into effect. But it is manifest that these several acts of bankruptcy were intended to go into effect at the same time, and that that time was from and after the first day of February 1842. The fifth class includes, if not in precise words, every kind of transfer, security, gift, &c., mentioned in the first clause of the second section, and the latter part of the clause declares that "the assignee under the bankruptcy shall be entitled to claim, sue for, recover and receive the same as a part of the assets of the bankruptcy." The third section vests all the property and rights of property of the bankrupt, from the time of the decree, in his assignee, for the benefit of his creditors. Now, it is clear, that the right of the assignee to the bankrupt's property, created by the decree, in involuntary cases, cannot go farther back than the act of bankruptcy, and that that act could not be committed before the law went into operation. There is nothing in the law which designs to reach the property of the bankrupt before an act of bankruptcy; in that respect it pursues the policy of all bankrupt laws as well as the plain dictates of justice; the assignments spoken of in the second clause of the second section, made subsequent to the first of January, 1841, or at any other time, create no exception, as they are not void, but merely prevent a discharge, unless assented to by a majority in interest of the creditors not preferred.

In giving a construction, then, to the words "future payments," &c., in the second section, every part of the act is to be considered, and the intention of the legislature to be extracted from the whole; and where great inconvenience will result from a particular construction, that construction is to be avoided, unless the meaning of the legislature is plain, in which case it must be obeyed. Now, it is acts of bankruptcy which the law only intends to reach; there can be no frauds upon the law but the acts themselves eo nomine, and as such acts can only happen by force of the statute, which, as has been shown, took effect, except such parts thereof as have been before noticed, from the second day of February, the "future payments, securities, &c.," mentioned in the second section must be such as were made and given future to that day; otherwise we should involve ourselves in the anomaly of decreeing, in involuntary cases, certain matters to be frauds upon the law, which were not by any of its provisions acts of bankruptcy. If the words "future payments, &c.," should be construed to mean future to the passage of the act, in most cases the enactment would defeat itself; the debtor being then in failing circumstances, and intending to apply for the benefit of the act, would be deterred from giving preference by assignment, and his property might all be exposed to the creditor or creditors who should be most vigilant in obtaining judgments and executions. The other creditors, meanwhile, between the passage and operation of the act, could make no movement under it; and after its operation, if the judgments and executions were not by the procurement of the debtor, they would be without remedy. Where the law was intended to have effect from its passage, it employs language not to be mistaken, as in the parts quoted "from and after the passage of the act, &c." If it has been shown that there could be no act of involuntary bankruptcy until after the law took effect, the reasoning which leads to that conclusion, applies with as much force to cases of voluntary bankruptcy. The right of the creditors to the property of either bankrupt is secured by the law from the same time, and with the single exception in the last clause of the second section, which is retrospective in its effects, they are both equally subject to its provisions. There can be no reason given why the matter in dispute should apply to the one and not to the other, and none has been attempted.

Looking into every part of the act, its object and its consequences, the intention of the legislature in using the words "all future payments," &c., cannot be doubted: they must be construed to mean all payments, securities, &c., which were made and given after the act took effect. The assignment of the petitioners is therefore not embraced by the bankrupt law, and they are entitled to their discharge. Decree accordingly.

Case No. 2,570.

In re CHADWICK.

[1 Lowell, 439; 11 Int. Rev. Rec. 126, 133.][1]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. April, 1870.

INTERNAL REVENUE—ASSESSMENT OF INCOME TAX—EXAMINATION OF TAX-PAYER—PRACTICE—PRODUCTION OF BOOKS—EXTENT OF INQUIRY.

1. Upon an application by an assessor of internal revenue for an attachment for contempt against a tax-payer, in not producing books and giving evidence concerning his liability to assessment for income, the court has power to issue an order to show cause instead of proceeding ex parte, and the defendant has no ground of complaint if such an order is granted.

2. The court has power to authorize the assessor to amend his application.

3. The books which the assessor has the right to examine are those of the person whose assessment is in question, and not those of third persons who have had dealings with him.

4. A corporation is not bound to produce its books to the assessor on an inquiry into the income of its shareholders.

[Cited in U. S. v. Anon, 21 Fed. 768.]

Petition for an attachment by the assessor of internal revenue for the third collection district of Massachusetts, within which the respondent resides; alleging that the respondent [J. H. Chadwick] was a shareholder in an incorporated company, called the Boston Lead Company, of which he was likewise treasurer and agent, having charge and custody of the books of said company; that the respondent rendered his income return for 1869, and was duly assessed thereon: that the petitioner afterwards issued a summons, of which a copy was annexed to the petition, requiring the respondent to appear before the petitioner at his office and produce the books of the company, and give evidence respecting his own "liability to an income," for the years 1865, 1866, 1867, and 1868. Upon this petition being filed in court, a rule to show cause was issued, and the respondent appeared and moved to dismiss the petition for sundry supposed defects, apparent upon its face. Afterwards the petitioner moved to amend, and the respondent filed an answer insisting on his former objections and on others which affected the merits of the case.

J. C. Ropes, Assist. Dist. Atty., for petitioner.

H. W. Paine and J. Ritchie (B. F. Butler with them), for respondent.

LOWELL, District Judge. The statute of 1866, amending section 14 of that of 1864, is found in 14 Stat. 101, and enacts that if any person shall deliver or disclose to any assessor any list, statement, or return, which in the opinion of the assessor is false or fraudulent, or contains any understatement or undervaluation, it shall be lawful for the assessor to summon such person, his agent, or other person having possession, custody, or care of books of account containing entries relating to the trade or business of such person, or any other person he may deem proper, to appear and produce such books, and answer interrogatories, &c. It then provides for the service of the summons, and that if any person so summoned shall neglect or refuse to obey such summons, or to give testimony or answer interrogatories, the assessor may apply to a judge or commissioner for an attachment against such person as for a contempt, and the judge or commissioner shall hear the application, and if satisfactory proof be made, shall issue an attachment, &c.

Under this section it is objected that the judge should in all cases proceed to hear the application ex parte, and issue or refuse the attachment, as may appear to be just on such a hearing. But I am of opinion that I have power to pursue the course taken in this case, and issue a rule to show cause. The power to issue the attachment includes a power to notify the respondent to appear and show cause against it, whenever such a course seems most reasonable. It is and always has been the practice in chancery to make such a rule in cases which required it. It is done every day in the circuit court in patent causes, and is a practice most beneficial to the supposed contemners. The respondent has no valid ground of objection that he is permitted to be heard on the application. If he does not care to be heard, he need not appear. Again it is said that no amendment is within the power of the court. The argument, if I understand it, is that this is a quasi criminal proceeding, or at least is of such an anomalous character as not to be within the law and practice of amendments as applied in the federal courts. The act is remedial, not penal. It provides for cases like those which are of constant occurrence in chancery and in bankruptcy. A bankrupt is required to submit to examination before the register, or a witness to testify before an examiner; and if in the course of the examination a question is asked which he is advised he need not answer, and he refuses to reply to it, I know of no effectual remedy for the examining party excepting to move for an attachment. I decide a great many such motions every year; but I never supposed that in doing so I was engaged in trying criminals. This is the only mode by which the assessor can perform a duty which the law casts upon him. The tax-payer has a simple remedy, if he considers his rights are invaded, by refusing to appear, or to answer, as the case may be, and the assessor has no alternative but to omit to do his duty, as he understands it, or to apply for an attachment. No doubt the court has power to punish a wilful neglect or refusal to testify in this as in all other cases, but no judge would ever fine or imprison a person for vindicating his supposed rights, in good faith; and it would be as appropriate to call a motion to attach any witness an indictment, as to give that name to this application. Power seems to me to be given by the statute of jeofails, namely, the thirty-second section of the judiciary act of 1789, as well as by the general authority vested in the courts.

We come now to the merits of the case. It seems that the respondent obeyed the summons of the assessor, so far as to appear at the time and place appointed therein, but that he refused to produce the books of the Boston Lead Company; and the most serious point of contention has been whether the statute requires such production. It seems to me entirely clear that it does not. The subject-matter of inquiry by the assessor, according to the summons, and according to the fact, is the income of the respondent, for one or more years, and the books of a manufacturing corporation of which he happens to be a shareholder are not books relating to his trade or business, and are not alleged to be so in the summons. The application is not based upon his being treasurer of the company, and the question does not concern the amount of his salary; but the broad ground is taken that these books are the defendant's books. The statute appears to be very simple. It authorizes the assessor to examine the tax-payer's books. This is its whole scope and purpose so far as the present case is concerned. To effectuate this object, it adds agents and all other persons having care or custody or even bare possession of the books. This is the whole of the enactment. It is impossible to misunderstand it. No doubt the books of every person with whom the tax-payer deals contain some entries which relate to his business, and if every such person were summoned, it might be within the bounds of possibility to make up his income more or less accurately from a detail of all the bargains which he had made with others. But the law does not contemplate any such absurd mode of proceeding. The trade of each person is to be shown by his own books, and he or his agent, or other person having custody of them, must produce them; but it is not the intention of the law to require A. to produce his own books in order to discover, incidentally, the trade or business of B., C., and D., who may have dealt with him.

It was strongly urged that by the statute of 1867 (14 Stat. 478), the income of every person shall include his share of the gains and profits of all companies, whether incorporated or partnership, and whether the gains are divided or otherwise, excepting of certain institutions and corporations, "whose officers, as required by law, withhold a per centum of the dividends made by such institutions, and pay the same to the officer authorized to receive the same;" and that it may be very difficult for assessors to ascertain the undivided profits of an incorporated company (not being one of those whose officers make returns) unless he can examine their books by virtue of this section, and that this section therefore may be so construed as to effect this object, and enable the assessor to examine the books of such companies, precisely as if they were partnerships. It is not consistent with any sound canon of construction with which I am acquainted, to interpret a law passed in 1866 by reference to one passed in 1867. In 1866, the income of any person included the dividends of all companies of every kind, without exception (13 Stat. 480); so that the argument must reach to the production of the books of all corporations when the income of any one shareholder is the subject of inquiry, or it is insufficient. Now I agree that in some cases this might be very convenient; but I doubt whether this convenience would make up for the very great inconvenience which the companies and their officers must suffer by having their books liable to be called for and taken and detained whenever the income account of any shareholder is to be made up. The argument from convenience may fairly enough be said to be balanced, but not so the argument from the construction of the statute itself. There is nothing in the statute which makes corporations partnerships or the books of a corporation the books of the individual shareholders. The law at section 14 assumes that a person's income will appear in his books, and although it may be found that by another part of the law some undivided profits not shown by his own books, are made a part of his income, yet this does not alter the law concerning his books, which are to be produced when called for, but only proves that the law may to some extent, and in some cases, fail to furnish full evidence. A person may keep no books, or may fail to make certain entries in them, or may omit, by design or accident, to collect all his dues. In such instances, the books will not fully disclose his taxable income. In the majority of cases, and in the long run, it is probable, the books will show the real state of the tax-payer's affairs; and it is to give the assessor the aid and advantage which the tax-payer himself has, and to verify his lists and statements by the record, that the statute is made.

This being so, it is unnecessary to pass upon the objections taken to the form of the assessor's summons. My impression is that the summons should state, with reasonable certainty, the cause of its being issued; as, that the assessor is dissatisfied with the returns, or the like, and the subject-matter of the injury. It is not like a mere subpoena to an ordinary witness to appear and give evidence in court, because that writ refers to the case pending in court, which enables the witness to ascertain what is required of him. The summons in such a case as this should be sufficiently explicit to enable the person summoned to decide whether he is bound to appear or not. In the present instance it may perhaps be that all defects of form were waived by the respondent's appearing and taking the oath, but the most important defect is one that goes to the essence of the case, and could not be cured, because it involves the very point that I have been considering. It is that the summons does not and cannot state that the books called for are the books of the respondent or of his agent, &c., containing entries concerning his trade or business within the statute. Petition dismissed without costs.

CHADWICK et al. v. The ADELAIDE.

[Hoff. Op. 459.]

District Court, N. D. California. Oct. 20, 1859.

ACTION FOR BREACH OF CHARTER PARTY—PROOF OF DAMAGE—PENALTY—ESTIMATED PROFITS.

[1. In an action on a charter party, for a breach thereof, by reason of the refusal of the master to commence the voyage, nominal damages only are recoverable, where the libellant fails to prove some actual damage suffered, notwithstanding the agreement binds the parties to a penalty for its breach.]

[2. The sum mentioned in the penal clause of the instrument will be regarded as a penalty, and not as liquidated damages.]

[3. The due performance of the voyage being subject to many future contingencies, estimated profits cannot be computed as an element of damage. The Tribune, Case No. 14,171, followed.]

In admiralty.

J. B. Manchester, for libellants.

Gregory Yale, for claimant.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. The libel in this case is for the breach of a charter party. The execution of the instrument, and the refusal of the master to sail on the voyage, are admitted. By the terms of the charter party, the libellants agreed to furnish at Johnson's islands, in the Pacific, a full cargo of guano, in bulk or in bags, and also bags enough to line the ship. They were also to place on board three lighters, and all their men, on their arrival at the islands, were to be employed in loading the vessel, and, in case the crew were required to assist, they were to be paid $1 per day each. Ninety lay days were allowed for taking in the cargo, and, for every day's detention beyond that time, $150 was to be paid the ship. There were other stipulations in the charter party not material to be noticed. No proof whatever was offered on the part of the libellants that they were ready and willing to furnish the cargo proposed, or to provide the bags to line the ship as agreed upon. Neither did they show that they were ready to furnish three lighters, nor that they had any men on the islands to assist in loading the vessel.

No testimony as to the damages sustained by the ship's refusal to sail on the voyage was offered, except the statement of Mr. Landswert, a chemist in this city, that guano of the quality of that found on these islands would be worth in New York $30 or $35 per ton. He did not, however, assert this on knowledge or information of any sales; but it was an estimate of the value of the guano founded on an analysis by himself. The libellants, on this testimony, seek to recover the sum of $35,000, being the amount mentioned in the penal clause of the charter party. This sum is claimed in the libel as "the stipulated sum agreed upon between the parties to the said charter party, as damages for a breach or violation of the same." This claim is evidently based on the idea that the amount is mentioned in the charter party as liquidated damages, and not as a penalty. But such a construction of that instrument is inadmissible. The sum mentioned is called in the charter party "the penal sum of $35,000," in the usual form in which the penalty is stated in that clause of the instrument by which the parties bind to each other, respectively, the vessel, freight, etc., and the merchandise to be taken on board, for the true performance of their covenants. I am not aware that it has ever been doubted that the sums so stated in charter parties were to be considered penalties, and not liquidated damages. In all such cases, the recovery of the party suing on such penal clauses is restricted to the damage actually sustained. Abb. Shipp. p. 364. It does not appear that any damage was actually sustained by the libellants. The expected profits which might have been realized on the voyage cannot be computed as proper items of damages.

In a somewhat similar case, Judge Story says: "The due performance of the voyage was subject to many future contingencies, and the item of profits is too uncertain in its nature to form any basis of damages, even if, in a case like the present, there was no other objection to it." The case in which these observations were made was much stronger than the case at bar, for the goods which the libellant was under contract to deliver to the government of Cuba, were actually put on board of the vessel, and relanded by the master in breach of the charter party. But in the case at bar the vessel never reached the place where her cargo was to be laden. It is not shown that the libellants could have furnished a cargo, nor that they would have had men or lighters to place it on board; nor does it appear what time would have been required for the purpose, nor whether the ship might not have been entitled to damage at the rate agreed,—$150 for a greater or less period,—nor whether in loading the ship the services of the crew might not have been required.

To allow as damages estimated net profits of the sale of a cargo of guano at New York, deducting only the freight, is to presume without any proof that the vessel would have safely arrived at the islands; would have obtained a full cargo of guano; that it would have been put on board within the time limited in the charter party; that the services of the crew would not have been required; and therefore that the one dollar per day agreed to be given would not have been due; that the libellants would have furnished three lighters for loading the cargo, and would have had men to assist in the operation; and, finally, that the vessel would have safely made the voyage to New York, delivered and been paid for her cargo, at rates such as a chemist of this city thinks would represent the value of the guano, samples of which he analysed. If in the case of The Tribune [Case No. 14,171] the estimated profits were too uncertain to be admitted as an item of damages, a fortiori the rule must be applied to the case at bar.

The libellants have not shown that they incurred any losses or expenses in and about the voyage, or in procuring lighters, or making preparations for it—contemplated—nor in endeavoring to procure another vessel. That another vessel could readily have been obtained, provided security for the charter money were furnished, is clear. But the masters and agents of ships at this port seem to have been distrustful of the security which would have been afforded by the proposed cargo, and perhaps were doubtful whether a cargo would be furnished them—doubts which the refusal of the Adelaide to sail on the voyage tended to confirm. I cannot, therefore, perceive how I can award any damages, except nominal, for the breach of contract complained of. A decree to that effect must therefore be entered.

CHAFEE v. COGGSHALL.

[6 Leg. Gaz. 342.]

Circuit Court, D. Rhode Island. June 2, 1874.

CORPORATIONS — LEVY ON INDIVIDUAL PROPERTY OF MEMBER—PRELIMINARY INJUNCTIONS.

1. Under the act of the legislature of Rhode Island concerning manufacturing corporations, a levy upon the individual property of a member of the corporation involved in this suit is allowed.

2. The granting of a preliminary injunction being a matter entirely in the discretion of the court, and it appearing to the court that no legal injury will result to the complainant by the sale of his property, the injunction asked for is refused.

In equity. Sur motions for injunction against a sale by Coggshall, United States marshal, of certain bank and manufacturing stocks levied on as the property of William Sprague, Amasa Sprague, and Edwin Hoyt, respectively, in virtue of an execution issued from the circuit court in favor of James v. Mr. Markland, for Franklyn.

Parsons & Jenckes, for Coggshall.

KNOWLES, District Judge. Three motions for a preliminary injunction are to be disposed of in consonance with the views of this court, touching its powers and duties as heretofore expressed. In Earth Closet Co. v. Fenner [Case No. 4,249], said the court: "A motion for a preliminary injunction is one of the class addressed in technical parlance to the discretion of the court. For precedents, in any recognized sense of that word, it is therefore idle to search. By one judge an injunction may be granted to-day under a given state of facts and by another be refused to-morrow, upon identically the same state of facts, and yet neither functionary be chargeable with even error in judgment. The law makes the judge's discretion the rule, not unheedful that, in the qualities of mind which give character to an exercise of discretion, individuals differ scarcely less than in form and features. The judge is bound to decide a question of this kind as in his judgment, upon the particular case before him, the principles of equity and the practice of its courts warrant or dictate, and this whether his decision be in accord or at variance with that of his brother officer, of whatever grade or whatever locality. The largest liberty imaginable is his, practically, 'with no rules to restrain, no after reckonings to dread.' Neither upon appeal, nor by writ of error, nor even by petition for revisory action, can a judge's rulings or orders upon a motion for a preliminary injunction be subjected to correction or even criticism on the part of his superiors in official position or in judicial acumen." And more recently, in James v. Atlantic Delaine Co. [supra], said the court, adopting the language of Chancellor Kent: "The power of injunction is too peremptory and powerful in its effects to be used in such a case as this without the clearest convictions. I shall better consult the stability and utility of the powers of this court by not stretching them beyond the limits prescribed by the precedents."

The first of these motions is that of Zachariah Chafee, trustee. To the argument in its support, and the argument against it, I have given all needful consideration, arriving at the conclusion that the motion must be denied. Granting for argument's sake that the jurisdiction of the court as to parties is not to be questioned, that the bill is ancillary to the Delaine suit, and not an original bill, and also, that the parties respondent have been duly cited, and have appeared (all points upon which I express no opinion), still my conclusion is that the motion must be denied. The complainant's case, as stated in his bill, is not, in my judgment, one which warrants an exercise by the court of its power to restrain a sale under the respondent's levy upon her execution. She is shown to have done nothing as yet that affords just cause of complaint to the complainant,—nothing that is not justifiable in view of the court's decree, and of the execution it awarded,—and what is more important, nothing that is not sanctioned and contemplated by the act concerning manufacturing corporations cited in the bill, and exhaustively discussed at the hearing. Under that act, a levy upon the property of a member of the company is allowed, not to say prescribed; and if the marshal charged with the service of an execution, under directions from the creditor or his attorney, or without directions, makes a levy upon the property of a person not a member, he does so at his peril. There may be ground for an action of trover, trespass, replevin or debt, against the officer and his sureties, and his aiders and advisers, but no ground, it is believed and held, in view of recognized principles and sound precedents, for an injunction against the officer or his employer. Again, that the officer's proceedings are throwing a cloud over the complainant's title, a leading allegation in the bill, is a proposition to which the court can give little heed, until it can be shown that clouds upon title to personal property are clouds upon title "in equity parlance;" a task not even attempted by the learned counsel of the complainant. And, finally, the court fails to see in the allegations of the bill any reason whatever for apprehending that any injury, in the legal sense of the term, much less any "irreparable injury," would be inflicted upon the complainant by a sale of the attached property. This is not property, it is to be remembered, of which the purchaser can take possession at the moment of sale, and thus compel the aggrieved owner to commence proceedings to recover it, but property of which the owner practically retains possession, compelling the purchaser to show his title to possession by some proceeding at law or in equity. For any supposable damage to the owner, the law is presumed to have prescribed all needed means and modes of redress. The statute referred to may be impolitic or defective, but it does not follow that the courts of equity, state or federal, are bound to supply its defects by an exercise of their power of injunction. The federal court of equity has, by decree, awarded to the respondent administratrix an execution, to be levied in accordance with the laws of Rhode Island, upon the property of Rhode Island citizens; and it may well leave it to be determined by suits in Rhode Island courts, whether or not her laws are outraged or infringed in the service of that execution. Says the supreme court of New Hampshire (N. H. Reports, page 272), treating of an application for an injunction to stay a sale of real estate: "In many cases equity would decline to interfere, but leave the parties to their remedy at law. This would ordinarily be the case where a creditor had levied his execution upon land of his debtor which had been previously conveyed by him, but which the creditor proposed to impeach as fraudulent." The motion for an injunction in the case of Chafee, complainant, must be denied.

Of the motion in the case of Fannie Sprague, complainant, it needs only be said that as this bill is in all essentials similar to that of Chafee, that also must be dismissed.

The third and last of these motions, is that of Charles G. Franklyn et al., embodied in their petition in equity. In this case it is contended in the interest of the respondent, by counsel who appear (as they set forth in writing), simply to protest against any action upon the motion by the court, and to move to take the petition off the files, that the court has no jurisdiction over the matter to which the petition relates, and in support and in denial of this proposition, learned and elaborate arguments were submitted by the counsel respectively. My conclusions upon this point, it seems, it is not necessary here to state, inasmuch as, upon other grounds, I arrive at the determination that the petition must be dismissed, in so far as relates to the issue of an injunction of the sale of the attached property therein specified and referred to. Granting for the argument's sake, that the petitioners' standing in court is unexceptionable as relates to their residence and interest in the matter,—nay, granting that Mr. Hoyt himself were the petitioner,—I should still be constrained to adjudge that no sufficient ground is shown for the issuing of an injunction as prayed. From the organization of the company, in 1851, it is conceded he had been a leading member, at one time president, and for a long period a director, enjoying all the advantages, whatever these were, incident to the transaction of business under the manufacturing act of Rhode Island. It is conceded, too, that he was active in the management of the prolonged suit which resulted in the decree in favor of the respondent administratrix; that he was apprised of the issue of the execution and of its levy upon his property, on the 20th of April, and lastly, until about the 12th of May, he was in full life, and actively engaged in managing his business, daily in conference with gentlemen of the legal profession. The gentlemen now petitioning are the persons named as the executors in his will, not at the date of the filing of the petition approved by the probate court of the city of his residence; their rights and equities, surely, can be nowise superior to his. Besides, the grounds upon which a stay of the sale under the levy is asked, are not of the character recognized by a court of equity, as demanding or warranting a stay of an execution as to personal property issuing from a court of law, even much less to warrant a stay of an execution, based on a decree of its own, after a litigation of fifteen years' continuance. That injury of any kind or grade is likely to result from a sale of the property, as advertised, is not even alleged in the petition, nor indeed in the argument. The allegations of fact and of law embodied in the petition, however truthful, and however pertinent they might be in certain imaginable connections, must be regarded as of inconsiderable weight, in this application for a preliminary injunction, by persons merely the representatives of Mr. Hoyt. For his failure or neglect to move in this matter between the 20th of April and his decease on the 15th of May, no sufficient reason is shown or suggested, a circumstance not without weight and significance in this connection. As already indicated, the prayer for a preliminary injunction must be denied; but the petition itself, having been regularly filed, on the 29th of May, must stand upon the docket, as a petition filed, but of the filing of which the principal respondent, Mrs. James, has, as yet, no notice, other than by service of citation upon her attorneys of record in the suit in equity, James v. Atlantic Delaine Co. [supra], in which a final decree was rendered as long since as February 19th, 1874. The three motions are severally disallowed.

Circuit Court, E. D. Missouri. Dec. 18, 1876.

INJUNCTION TO STAY PROCEEDINGS IN A COURT OF A STATE—CORPORATIONS—SUIT BY STOCKHOLDER.

The federal courts are prohibited, except in certain cases in bankruptcy, from granting "the writ of injunction to stay proceedings in any court of a state" (Rev. St. § 720); and in this case such injunction was refused at the instance of a stockholder in a corporation where the state court had determined the questions sought to be litigated in a suit against the stockholder's corporation, without objection from the stockholders.

[Cited in Hutchinson v. Green, 6 Fed. 838. Explained in Dillon v. Kansas City S. B. Ry. Co., 43 Fed. 113.]

On motion for a temporary injunction Edwin Chaffin, a citizen of the state of Massachusetts, and the owner of one hundred and twenty-five shares of the capital stock of the St. Louis Gas Light Company, files his bill of complaint on behalf of himself and all other stockholders of said company against the city of St. Louis, the St. Louis Gas Light Company, and each of the directors thereof, as also the Laclede Gas Light Company. The bill purports to be brought for the purpose of removing a cloud upon the title of defendant to his stock in the St. Louis Gas Light Company, which has been created and caused, as is alleged, by the unlawful and unauthorized acts of the directors of the company in making and entering into certain contracts, dated, respectively, 1846 and 1873, as also for an injunction to prevent further threatened injury by the recognition of those contracts by the directors of said company—the first with the city of St.

Louis, and the other a tripartite contract between the St. Louis Gas Light Company, the city of St. Louis, and the Laclede Gas Light Company. The relief sought is the cancellation by decree of court of the alleged illegal and unauthorized contracts, as also the restraining of defendants, during the pendency of this suit, from doing any further acts prejudicial to complainant's interest, or making further claim to any rights under said illegal contracts, and particularly to restrain the directors from in any manner recognizing or ratifying the illegal contracts heretofore made, or from making settlements based thereon, and that the Laclede Gas Light Company be restrained from exercising any of the rights or privileges claimed by it under said "tripartite agreement" of 1873; as also that the city of St. Louis be restrained and enjoined from further claiming rights or title under said pretended contracts until this suit is heard and determined.

Frank J. Bowman and James O. Broadhead, for the motion.

Leverett Bell, contra.

DILLON, Circuit Judge. This cause is before me on a motion by the complainant, a single stockholder in the St. Louis Gas Light Company, for a temporary injunction. On a preliminary application of this character, it is not advisable to express any opinion upon the rights of the city or of either of the gas companies, except so far as may be necessary to decide the application. It appears from the bill and exhibits, that in 1870 the city of St. Louis, as plaintiff, commenced a suit in the St. Louis county circuit court against the St. Louis Gas Light Company, to enforce, inter alia, an alleged right to purchase the works and property of that company, under the charter thereof, and the fifth clause of the contract between the city and the gas company, dated January 9th, 1846, which clause undertook to give to the city the right to make such purchase beyond the end of twenty-five years from January 1st, 1840, viz.: at the end of every five years thereafter.

On the 28th of February, 1873, the so-called tripartite agreement was made between the city and the two gas companies, which undertook to settle and compromise their respective disputes—dividing the territory to be lighted between the two gas companies, and containing stipulations as to furnishing the city with gas, and the price thereof, until January 1st, 1890, if the said gas companies shall so long exist. This contract also contained an agreement between the city and the St. Louis Gas Light Company that the litigation between them shall cease, and all suits pending between them are to be dismissed, and all causes of action between them be considered settled. Afterwards an amended and supplemental bill was filed by the city against each of the companies, still seeking to enforce its right to purchase the property of the St. Louis Gas Light Company, and insisting upon the validity of the contract in that respect made in 1846, and upon the invalidity of the tripartite agreement of 1873.

The Laclede Gas Light Company answered, insisting upon the validity of the contract of 1873, under which it had acted and expended large sums of money. The answer of the St. Louis Gas Light Company denied the validity of the above mentioned fifth clause of the contract of 1846, giving the city the right to purchase beyond the year 1865, and insisted upon the validity and binding force of the compromise contract of 1873. On the 1st day of June, 1876, an interlocutory decree was entered in the suit by the state court, holding that the contract of 1846 was valid and the contract of 1873 was not binding or effectual to defeat the right of the city to purchase the property and works of the gas company.

That court accordingly decreed a specific performance of the contract of 1846; that is, decreed that the city had the right to purchase the property and works of the company, appointed commissioners to ascertain the value, placed the property in the hands of a receiver, and perpetually enjoined the St. Louis Gas Light Company from manufacturing or selling gas in St. Louis. Now, after all this had been done, the complainant herein, Mr. Edward Chaffin, in the right of a stockholder in the St. Louis Gas Light Company, filed the present bill in the circuit court of the United States against the city, and the Laclede Company and his own company and the directors thereof, the prayer of which appears in the statement of the case.

Without pronouncing upon the validity of the contracts of 1846 and 1873, there are several reasons why the injunction asked cannot be allowed:

1. The plaintiff does not inform us when he became the owner of his stock, nor show that he has not, all along, been aware of the proceedings in the state court, and just what was being done and omitted to be done therein. By the answer his company denied the right of the city to enforce the purchase, and there is no evidence before me that the directors did not resist to the best of their ability the claim of the city to enforce a purchase of the property. On the plainest principles, a stockholder who stands by, awaiting the result of a litigation, cannot, on that result proving unfavorable to his company, draw the litigation into another court in a suit between himself and the litigants in the state court. If such a rule had its foundation in the law, there would be no end to a suit against a private corporation, so long as any one or more stockholders should see fit to re-litigate the same controversy in their own names. So far as an injunction is sought on the ground that the directors of the St. Louis Gas Light Company did not resist the right of the city to make a compulsory purchase of its works and property, it is not sustained by the record of the cause, so far as it has been called to my attention.

It is also urged as a ground for the injunction, that the directors ought to have insisted in the state court that the contract of 1873 was invalid, whereas, in the answer filed, they maintained its validity. However this may be as to the duty of the directors, it is plain that no injury has been wrought thereby to the complainant, for the state court decreed in this regard in accordance with the view for which the complainant contends.

2. The complainant has amended his prayer for an injunction by striking out the words which ask that the city be enjoined "from further prosecuting its said suit" in the state court, but notwithstanding this, it is evident that to grant the injunction sought, would, if it were effectual for any purpose, be so only because it would in some way interfere with the progress of the litigation in that court. This a federal court is prohibited from doing directly, for the Revised Statutes of the United States (section 720) enact that "the writ of injunction shall not be granted by any court of the United States to stay proceedings in any court of a state." And on the case made by the bill, it is not justified in doing this indirectly, at the instance of a stockholder. Memphis v. Dean, 8 Wall. [75 U. S.] 64; Peck v. Jenness, 7 How. [48 U. S.] 612. The motion for the allowance of a provisional injunction is denied.

Case No. 2,573.

CHAFFIN v. ST. LOUIS.

[4 Dill. 24;[1] 23 Int. Rev. Rec. 330; 5 Cent. Law J. 284; 25 Pittsb. Leg. J. 34; 2 Cin. Law Bul. 237.]

Circuit Court, E. D. Missouri. 1876.

JURISDICTION OF UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT —STOCKHOLDER'S BILL.

The United States circuit court will not entertain a bill in equity by a non-resident stockholder of a domestic corporation, where it appears that the issues raised by the bill have been already adjudicated in a suit brought in the state court between the corporation and the proper adversary parties, and litigated there without fraud or collusion.

This is a bill in equity by complainant, a citizen of Massachusetts, and the owner of one hundred and twenty-five shares of capital stock in the St. Louis Gas Light Company, on his own behalf and that of other stockholders who may join him, against the St. Louis Gas Light Company and the directors thereof, and the Laclede Gas Light Company, and the city of St. Louis, to procure the cancellation of certain contracts, to which said corporations are parties. 4 Dill. 19 [Case No. 2,572].

The amended bill of complaint states that, under the charter of the St. Louis Gas Light Company, the city was entitled to purchase the works, etc., of the said company, at a price to be determined by arbitrators, in 1860 and 1865, if it elected at either of said times so to do; and that by a contract between the city and the company, of January 9th, 1846, the city relinquished its right to purchase in 1860; and said contract thereupon further provided that if the city should not exercise its right to purchase in 1865, it might purchase in 1870, in the same manner and to the same effect as is provided in the charter; and it is charged that said contract is and was invalid, illegal, void, and of no binding force, etc.

It is further alleged that in 1870 the city instituted an action in the circuit court of St. Louis county, to enforce said contract and acquire said works, etc., thereunder, and that the directors of the St. Louis Gas Light Company did not properly and in good faith defend said action, and that during its pendency, in 1873, another contract was entered into between the city and the gas light companies, which was also illegal and void, and that said suit resulted adversely to the St. Louis Gas Light Company, and thereby, and by said illegal contracts, said complainant's shares of stock therein have suffered great depreciation in value, and, as against the city, it is prayed that said contracts of 1846 and 1873 be declared void and be cancelled, and that the city be enjoined from claiming or exercising any rights thereunder.

The separate answer of the city of St. Louis, to which exceptions have been taken and are now urged, is as follows:

"And further answering, said defendant says that on the 21st day of May, 1870, the city of St. Louis instituted an action in the circuit court of St. Louis county (being the suit mentioned in the amended bill herein), against the St. Louis Gas Light Company, for a specific performance of said contract of January 9th, 1846, which said action was entitled: The City of St. Louis, plaintiff, against the St. Louis Gas Light Company, defendant; and said St. Louis Gas Light Company duly appeared in said action, and defended the same, and alleged in its answer to plaintiff's petition therein, that said contract of January 9th, 1846, was invalid, for the same reasons now herein urged by complainant in his amended bill of complaint; that said suit was proceeded with in said county; and thereafter, upon August 4th, 1875, the Laclede Gas Light Company was joined as a party defendant therein, and thereupon it also appeared by counsel and defended; that said suit was thereafter duly tried and heard by said court upon evidence and witnesses adduced and heard on the part of plaintiff herein, the city of St. Louis; also, on the part of said St. Louis Gas Light Company and said Laclede Gas Light Company; and such further proceedings were had therein, that, on June 1st, 1876, an interlocutory decree was rendered in said cause by said court, in which it was, amongst other things, adjudged and decreed by said court that said contract of January 9th, 1846, was and is a valid and lawful contract, and binding upon the St. Louis Gas Light Company; and said gas light company was forever enjoined and restrained from manufacturing or selling gas in the city of St. Louis, or its suburbs, or prosecuting the business of a gas light company; and a receiver was appointed of all the property and effects of said gas light company; and said receiver thereafter duly entered into the possession of the same, and now holds the same, and is manufacturing and selling gas in St. Louis, under the order and direction of said court; that further proceedings being had, a final decree in said cause was entered on the 12th day of February, 1877; that thereupon the said St. Louis Gas Light Company filed a motion for a new trial and for a rehearing in said cause; which motion is now pending and undetermined in said court.

"And herewith is presented and filed a certified copy of the original petition in said cause, the answer of the St. Louis Gas Light Company thereto—to amended and supplemental petition of plaintiff therein; the demurrer of the St. Louis Gas Light Company thereto; also the demurrer of the Laclede Gas Light Company, and a judgment of said court overruling said demurrers; the answer of the St. Louis Gas Light Company; and the replications of the city of St. Louis thereto; the interlocutory decree of June 1st, 1876, therein; and the final decree of February 12th, 1877 [therein, which said certified copy is marked 'Exhibit A,' and this answer, and is herewith filed].[2]

"And said defendant alleges that said cause—so instituted as aforesaid in the circuit court of St. Louis county—is still pending in said court; and that the same identical matters, questions, and issues were presented for trial, adjudication, and determination in said case, in said circuit court of St. Louis county, as are here presented for trial, adjudication, and determination, to this honorable court, by the amended bill of complainant herein; that said circuit court of St. Louis county had full, ample, and complete jurisdiction to hear and determine said matters, questions, and issues, and each and all of them, in said case; and that it did hear and determine the same, and all of them, and perpetually enjoin the St. Louis Gas Light Company from manufacturing and selling gas in St. Louis; that the said St. Louis Gas Light Company is now bound by said injunction, and subject to the further order of said circuit court of St. Louis county in said cause; that the St. Louis Gas Light Company and the directors thereof, in good faith, defended said action in the circuit court of St. Louis county, by counsel learned in the law, duly employed by them for that purpose, and they are now defending the same; that the proceedings, orders, and judgments of said circuit court of St. Louis county in said cause are now in full force, and unreversed, and binding upon the St. Louis Gas Light Company, its directors and stockholders, including the complainant herein, if he be a stockholder, as alleged in his amended bill of complaint."

A certified copy of the record, including the proceedings, pleadings, and decrees in said cause in the state court, is filed with the answer as an exhibit.

The complainant excepts to the above parts of said answer, on the ground that they fail to state facts sufficient to constitute a legal defense to his amended bill of complaint; and the questions presented by said exceptions are now here to be determined.

F. J. Bowman, for plaintiff.

L. Bell and E. T. Farish, for St. Louis.

DILLON, Circuit Judge. The answer sets up the suit of the city of St. Louis, commenced in May, 1870, in the state court, against the St. Louis Gas Light Company (in which the present plaintiff is a stockholder), to enforce the right of the city to purchase the works and property of the gas company, conferred by the legislature of the state in that behalf, and by the contract of January 9th, 1846. This alleged right of the city to make such purchase was denied by the gas company, and the record of that suit shows that such right was vigorously resisted at every step of the progress of that suit. After a hearing on the merits, that court, June 1st, 1876, entered an interlocutory decree declaring that the contract of January 9th, 1846, was valid, and that the city had the right to purchase the works and property of the gas light company; and afterwards, on the 12th day of February, a final decree was rendered effectuating such right, and declaring that all the estate, interest, and claim of the gas light company to its works and property be vested in the city of St. Louis; which decree is alleged in the answer to be in full force and unreversed. The present suit by a stockholder in the said gas light company was brought in this court November 23d, 1876, which was after the interlocutory decree above mentioned was rendered in the state court.

One of the main objects of the present bill is to have the contract of January 9th, 1846, declared null and void as respects the gas light company. But the state court having jurisdiction of the suit of the city against the gas light company, upon pleadings presenting that precise issue, has judicially determined that said contract, in the respect here involved, was a valid contract, and the answer which pleads this decree avers that the gas light company and the directors in good faith defended said action in the state court, and are now defending the same, and further avers that the decree in the said suit, which is in full force, is binding upon the gas light company, its directors and stockholders, including the complainant. A decree thus rendered upon adverse proceedings, and without fraud and collusion, is binding upon the gas light company, and upon its stockholders; and the latter cannot as we said when the injunction asked for was denied, afterwards draw the litigation into a federal court in a suit between themselves and the litigants in the state court. If this could be done, there would be no end to a suit against a private corporation so long as any stockholder should see fit to re-litigate the same controversy in his own name.

The exceptions to the answer are disallowed. Ordered accordingly.

Charles B. Collier and W. W. Ledyard, for defendants.

McKENNAN, Circuit Judge. There is no substantial contest here touching the infringement of the complainants' patent by the defendants. Indeed, there is no denial of infringement in the answer as charged in the bill. The defence is rested upon the alleged invalidity of the patent, for the reason that the patentee was not the first and original inventor of the thing claimed; and various patents are referred to and allegations of prior use are made, which are charged as anticipatory of the patentee's invention. A careful consideration and comparison of the patents referred to and of the devices proved, although indefinitely and unsatisfactorily, to have been used experimentally before the date of the patent in controversy, have led me to the conclusion that they are substantially distinguishable, and that the assault upon the patent must be regarded as having failed. I do not propose to assume the burden of stating in detail the reason for this conclusion, but to express it generally, and to direct that a decree for an injunction and an account be entered in favor of the complainants.

BANKRUPTCY—FRAUDULENT PREFERENCE—EXCLUSION OF PREFERRED CREDITOR FROM CHOICE OF ASSIGNEE.

1. Whether a creditor who had received a conveyance of property made with intent to defeat or delay the operation of the bankrupt act [14 Stat. 534], having reasonable cause to believe a fraud on the bankrupt act was intended, may prove his claim and vote for assignee? At the time of the delivery of the bond and mortgages, an act of bankruptcy was close at hand, the mortgagee, of the firm Allan Shelden & Co., being well apprised of the facts. The assignment was not general, for the benefit of all the creditors, but conditional; the mortgagee having no power whatever over the real property for six months, and the personal property encumbered by a specific reservation. The motion was to exclude the firm of Allan Shelden & Co., and other creditors who had expressed themselves satisfied with the transaction, from participation in the choice of assignee, and to postpone the proof of their claims. Held, it is the character of the instrument which is the subject of discussion; and if the exercise of the powers granted by it would defeat or delay the operation of the bankrupt act, then such would be presumed to have been its intention.

[Cited in Re Union Pac. R. Co., Case No. 14,376.]

2. The disposition of property under it was complete on the day of the execution and delivery of the bond and mortgages; and the intent existing at that time determines the character of the transaction.

3. The proof of the claim of Allan Shelden & Co. should be postponed until after the choice of an assignee.

4. The motion to exclude the other creditors mentioned from participation in the choice of assignee, ought to be denied.

On certificate of register in bankruptcy. [In the matter of Eli B. and Owen P. Chamberlain.]

Before Mr. Hovey K. Clarke, register in bankruptcy:

I, the said register, do hereby certify that in the course of proceedings before me at the meeting of creditors for the choice of an assignee of said bankrupt's estate, the attorney for the petitioning creditors moved that the proof of the claim tendered by Allan Shelden & Co., and the proofs of the claims filed by Beatty, Fitzsimons & Co., A. C. McGraw & Co., W. D. Robinson, Burtenshaw & Co., E. Lieberman, and Geo. B. Kelley & Co., be postponed until the assignee is chosen, on the ground that said claimants had received a conveyance of the property of said bankrupts, made with intent to defeat or delay the operation of the bankrupt act, having reasonable cause to believe that a fraud upon the bankrupt act was intended, and that said bankrupts were insolvent. The said claimants being present and insisting upon their right to vote for assignee, questions of fact and law were presented and stated by the parties, Mr. Dickinson appearing for petitioning creditors and Mr. Driggs for the claimants whose rights to vote were objected to, and thereupon witnesses were examined relative to the facts in controversy between the parties.

In April, 1869, the bankrupts, then doing business as partners in Brockway, St. Clair county, finding themselves in embarrassed circumstances, sought an interview with Mr. Allan Shelden, of the firm of Allan Shelden & Co., and stated to him that their stock had been attached; that one of their creditors would probably take a judgment against them the next day, and, as Mr. Shelden thinks, the other creditors would take judgments against them at the same term of court. That this statement truly represented the then existing condition of the affairs of the Chamberlains is not controverted. This interview resulted, after consultation with counsel, in the execution by the bankrupts and the delivery to Mr. Shelden of a bond, bearing date April 22d, 1869, in the penal sum of eighteen thousand dollars, reciting the indebtedness of the Chamberlains to various persons and firms, in divers sums of money—neither names of persons nor sums of indebtedness being specified—amounting in the aggregate to about nine thousand dollars, as near as they could estimate the same, and which they further recite "they are desirous of securing." The condition of the bond is declared to be the payment within six months or sooner, if they should be able to do so, of all just debts which they were then owing and liable to pay, with interest; and also to pay any future indebtedness which they may incur to the firm of Allan Shelden & Co., for goods or merchandise which said firm may advance to them. The performance of the condition of this bond was secured by two mortgages, one upon a considerable quantity of real estate in the counties of St. Clair and Sanilac, and a chattel mortgage of all the personal property of the Chamberlains in their store at Brockway, of a quantity of lumber and saw logs, and some other specified articles. The chattel mortgage contained the further condition that the mortgagors "may sell any or all of the property above described in the usual course of business, the avails of such sales to be applied in accordance with the condition of the bond above referred to. The party of the second part may at any time take possession of the property hereby mortgaged." The trust created by these instruments was accepted by Mr. Shelden; the greater part of the personal property has been sold, and a considerable portion of it converted into money. No subsequent advances have been made by the firm of A. Shelden & Co., as provided for in the bond. It does not appear that any of the creditors whose right to vote for assignee is objected to, had any knowledge of the transaction between the Chamberlains and Mr. Shelden previous to the execution and delivery of the papers. They all, however, in terms more or less explicit, have since the transaction expressed themselves satisfied with it.

By Hovey K. Clarke, Register:

It is clear that at the time of the interview with Mr. Shelden the Chamberlains were insolvent. They were unable to pay their debts in the ordinary course of business, and this inability was of a character, as the proof shows, which would result in the eventual breaking up of their business. Their goods were attached, several suits were pending against them, on one of which it was expected judgment would be entered the next day, and on the others during the same term of the court. In these circumstances, it is evident, an act of bankruptcy was close at hand. If they remained inactive, they had reason to expect that an execution would be levied on their property within forty-eight hours. To remain thus inactive would be to "suffer their property to be taken on legal process," which would justify a proceeding by their creditors against them to have them adjudicated bankrupts. In re

Black [Case No. 1,457]; In re Dibble [Id. 3,884]. They could prevent this by filing a voluntary petition to be adjudged bankrupts. By one or the other of these methods an act of bankruptcy seemed inevitable. By resorting to the voluntary method they could have effectually precluded the involuntary, and they would have submitted all their property to be distributed as provided by the law of the land, and under the control and guaranties that the rights of all creditors will be protected, which those laws afford. For some reason which is not stated, and which therefore can only be inferred from their acts, they do not resort to the method prescribed by the bankrupt act to prevent the preference which the judgment creditors were likely to obtain. They state their condition to Mr. Shelden, so that he becomes well informed as to all the essential facts affecting their liabilities and their duties, and, after consultation with counsel, the method of the bond and mortgages which have been proved in this case, was adopted to prevent the levy of the impending execution. It is insisted that this was done to protect the property for the benefit of all the creditors, the proceeds of which were to be distributed among them equally without preference.

It is to be observed, however, that the conveyance to Shelden was not a general assignment for the benefit of the creditors, such as would authorize him to proceed at once to convert the property and distribute the proceeds. The conveyances are conditional—one mortgage on the real estate, and the other upon personal property—conditioned to pay all the mortgagors' creditors, and also what they may in addition become indebted to A. Shelden & Co. within six months; during which period Shelden could exercise no rights whatever over the real property, and his right to take possession of the personal property was encumbered by a reservation of the mortgagors' right to continue to sell the property mortgaged in the usual course of business. If this were a general assignment for the benefit of creditors, it is difficult to see how it could be sustained under the well settled principles which require such an assignment to fix definitely the rights of the parties and of those to be benefited by it, and especially to be free from all control whatever by the assignor of the property assigned. The reservation of the right to continue to sell the mortgaged property, and the agreement that the security should embrace any subsequent indebtedness of the Chamberlains to the firm of A. Shelden & Co., are clearly inconsistent with the principles above referred to, and which are supposed to be well settled as applicable to the construction of assignments for the benefit of creditors. Instead of making an unconditional surrender of their property for the benefit of their creditors, they seek to convert it into a special trust, by which, at the option of the parties, it may be employed indefinitely as a basis on which to continue their business; and if they were doing an unprofitable business, the property which ought to be distributed to creditors, existing at the time of the transaction, may be used to protect the interests of the firm in which the trustee was a partner, against loss from the business thus continued. It is no answer to this to say that this power was not actually exercised—that no further advances were made. It is the character of the instrument which is the subject of discussion; and if the exercise of the powers granted by it would defeat or delay the operation of the bankrupt act, then such will be presumed to have been its intention. The disposition of property under it was complete on the day of the execution and delivery of the bond and mortgages; and the intent existing at that time determines the character of the transaction.

As mortgages, however, the same objections recur with increased force, and establish the inconsistency of such conveyances with the general policy of the bankrupt act not only, but the provisions of section 39 of that act in particular. [14 Stat. 536.] The general policy of the bankrupt act demands that the property of an insolvent shall be taken charge of by the officers of the bankrupt court, where all creditors have an opportunity to assert their rights, where the utmost publicity as to all proceedings is secured, and where the bankrupt's estate is to be converted and distributed by public officers, directed and controlled by a statute which provides speedy and summary methods to enforce it and protect the rights of all parties. In this case, the Chamberlains were in circumstances that inactivity merely would expose them within forty-eight hours, probably, to the compulsory process of the bankrupt court. They might avoid it by becoming voluntary petitioners to be adjudicated bankrupts. They decline to do this, and execute instead certain mortgages, which if valid, not only set their creditors at defiance for six months, but secure for them the right, with the consent of a party selected by themselves, to continue their business, including the purchase of more goods, until a breach of the condition of the mortgages. If they can do this legally for six months, it is difficult to see how in principle they can be restrained from securing like immunity for six years by the same method. Its effect, unquestionably, is not only to delay the operation of the bankrupt act, but if sustainable at all, may be employed to defeat it altogether. The involuntary clauses of the bankrupt act may as well be repealed—for a time mortgage will be always effectual to set them all at defiance. Such is the practical and necessary effect of such a disposition of property as is proved in this case; and the law conclusively presumes that such effect was intended by the parties to it.

Who were the parties to it? The two

Chamberlains, the bankrupts, and Mr. Allan Shelden. All the facts which give character to the transaction are shown to be known to Mr. Shelden before he took the bond and mortgages. The intent of the mortgagors is thus brought home to the mortgagee, and the consequences, as declared by the last sentences of section 39, that a creditor having "reasonable cause to believe that a fraud on the act was intended, and that the debtor was insolvent, shall not be allowed to prove his debt in bankruptcy," the petitioning creditors contend exclude the proof of the debt due to Allan Shelden & Co., and at any rate are sufficient to justify the postponement of the proof of the claim until after the choice of an assignee. I do not understand that any point has been made that the objections which might exist to the proof of a claim by Allan Shelden, on account of his participation with the bankrupts in the purpose to defeat or delay the operation of the act, do not apply to Allan Shelden & Co. If proved at all, it must be proved in favor of all the partners—as creditors they cannot sever. The penalty therefore which the act imposes cannot be visited upon Mr. Shelden unless his partners are also involved in its effect. It is unnecessary, however, to discuss this question, for whatever there may be in it, enough I think appears to require the postponement of the proof of the claim of Allan Shelden & Co., until after the choice of an assignee.

The motion to exclude the other creditors named, to wit: Messrs. Beatty & Fitzsimons, A. C. McGraw & Co., W. D. Robinson, Burtenshaw & Co., E. Lieberman, and George B. Kelley & Co., rests upon the proof that they have expressed themselves as satisfied with the arrangement entered into between the bankrupts and Mr. Shelden. It does not appear that they had any knowledge whatever of the facts that make up the intent to defeat the operation of the bankrupt act, until after the bond and mortgages were given, nor that they were consulted concerning it, or in any way accepted it, except to declare that they were satisfied with it. In no sense can it be said that they have received the conveyances which it is alleged were given, with the intent to defeat the operation of the bankrupt act. The conveyances were not to them directly or indirectly; they were complete before these creditors had any knowledge of them. There is, therefore, not only no proof of the alleged intent, but there is no fact proved from which any such intent on their part can be inferred.

I am of opinion, therefore, that the motion to exclude them from participation in the choice of an assignee ought to be denied.

LONGYEAR, District Judge. I fully concur in and approve of the foregoing views and conclusions of the register.

CHAMBERLAIN et al. v. CHANDLER.

[3 Mason, 242.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. Term, 1823.

ADMIRALTY JURISDICTION OF TORTS.

1. The admiralty has jurisdiction of personal torts and wrongs committed on a passenger, on the high seas, by the master of the ship.

Distinguished in McGuire v. The Golden Gate, Id. 8,815.]

2. It is immaterial whether such torts be by direct force, as trespasses, or consequential injuries.

[Cited in Waring v. Clarke, 5 How. (46 U. S.) 468; New Jersey Steam Nav. Co. v. Merchants' Bank, 6 How. (47 U. S.) 432; The Highland Light, Case No. 6,477. Distinguished in The David Reeves, Id. 6,625.]

This was a libel in the admiralty, brought by the libellants, (being husband, wife, and children,) who were passengers on board of the ship Pearl, on a voyage from the island of Woakoo to Boston, against the defendant, who was master of the ship, for the voyage, for damage, for asserted ill-treatment and injuries to them during the voyage. The defendant put in, by way of answer, an allegation denying the ill-treatment and injuries. The cause came to be heard upon the evidence.

Hubbard and Webster, for libellants.

T. Fuller, for defendant.

STORY, Circuit Justice. No exception has been interposed against the jurisdiction of the court in this case. I wish however that it should be understood, that the point has not passed sub silentio; but that it has attracted the consideration of the court. The contract itself is a maritime contract, for the conveyance of passengers on the high seas, and the wrongs complained of, are gross ill-treatment and misconduct in the course of the voyage, while on the high seas, by the master, in breach of the stipulations necessarily implied in his contract, of the duties of his office, and of the rights of the libellants, under the maritime law. The jurisdiction of courts of admiralty over torts, committed in personam on the high seas, has never, to my knowledge, been doubted or denied by the courts of common law, and has been often recognised by adjudications in the admiralty. 2 Brown, Civ. & Adm. Law, 108; 3 Bl. Comm. 106. In 4 Inst. 134, the common law judges admitted, in the fullest manner, that "of contracts, pleas, and quereles made upon the seas, &c. the admiral hath and ought to have jurisdiction; and no precedent can be shown that any prohibition hath been granted for any contract, plea, or querele concerning any marine cause, made or done upon the sea." As to the competency of the admiralty to award damages for personal wrongs in cases of captures, as prize, Le Caux v. Eden, 2 Doug. 594, is directly in point; and farther, that in such cases (i. e. of prize), it is exclusive. 2 Jenk. p. 774. See, also, Caton v. Burton, Cowp. 330; 2 Brown, Civ. & Adm. Law, 108, 110; 3 Bl. Comm. 106; Zouch. Adm. 104. No distinction has been recognized between torts to property and torts to persons, on the high seas; and in Le Caux v. Eden, the court seemed to think that none existed. In the case of Lindo v. Rodney, 2 Doug. 613, note, the court held, that the operation of the statutes of Richard was only "to confine the admiralty by the locality of the thing done, which is the cause of action; it must be done on the high seas." Indeed, a tort on the high seas is strictly, within the words of those statutes, a plea or querele, arising on the high seas. And it cannot make any difference in point of principle, whether it be a direct or consequential wrong, whether it be an assault and imprisonment, or a denial of all comforts and necessaries, and a course of brutal insult and mal-treatment, whereby the health of the party is materially injured, or he is subjected to gross ignominy and mental suffering.

The admiralty has been accustomed to deal with subjects of this nature from early times. In the case of The Ruckers, 4 C. Rob. Adm. 73, a civil suit for damages was brought in the admiralty, for an assault by the master of the ship on a passenger on the high seas, and on full consideration the jurisdiction was sustained. On that occasion the court directed the records to be searched, and the registrar reported, "that many instances were to be found of proceedings on damage on behalf of persons described as part of the ship's company, against officers or others belonging to the same ship; and several against persons belonging to other ships; and that there were other instances of proceedings on the part of A. B. against C. D. without any specification of the capacity, in which the persons stood." Sir William Scott said: "Looking to the locality of the injury, that it was done on the high seas, it seems to be fit matter for redress in this court." Doctor Godolphin (a very learned admiralty judge) in enumerating the various subjects of admiralty jurisdiction includes "all affairs relating to mariners, whether ship officers, or common mariners, their rights and privileges respectively; their office and duty; their wages; their offences whether by wilfulness, casualty, ignorance, negligence, or insufficiency, with their punishments." See, also, Exton, Adm. Jur. 70. My judgment accordingly is, that the libel is well founded in point of jurisdiction; and that if the injuries complained of are established in evidence, the plaintiffs are entitled to redress, constituting in the technical phrase of the admiralty "a cause of damage."

In respect to a case like that before the court, a suit by passengers (a husband, wife, and family) against the master of the ship, for continued, wanton cruelty, and ill treatment, it is certainly entitled to be listened to with attention. The authority of a master at sea is necessarily summary, and often absolute. For the time he exercises the rights of sovereign control; and obedience to his will and even to his caprices, becomes almost indispensable. If he chooses to perform his duties, or to exert his office in a harsh, intemperate, or oppressive manner, he can seldom be resisted by physical or moral force; and therefore in a limited sense, he may be said to hold the lives and personal welfare of all on board in a great measure under his arbitrary discretion. He is nevertheless responsible to the law; and if he is guilty of gross abuse and oppression, I hope it will never be found, that courts of justice are slow in visiting him, in the shape of damages, with an appropriate punishment. In respect to passengers, the case of the master is one of peculiar responsibility and delicacy. Their contract with him is not for mere ship room, and personal existence, on board; but for reasonable food, comforts, necessaries, and kindness. It is a stipulation, not for toleration merely, but for respectful treatment, for that decency of demeanor, which constitutes the charm of social life, for that attention, which mitigates evils without reluctance, and that promptitude, which administers aid to distress. In respect to females, it proceeds yet farther, it includes an implied stipulation against general obscenity, that immodesty of approach, which borders on lasciviousness, and against that wanton disregard of the feelings, which aggravates every evil, and endeavors by the excitement of terror, and cool malignancy of conduct, to inflict torture upon susceptible minds: What can be more disreputable, and at the same time more distressing, than habitual obscenity, harsh threats, and immodest conduct, to delicate and inoffensive females? What can be more oppressive than to confine them to their cabins by threats of personal insult or injury? What more aggravating than a malicious tyranny, which denies them every reasonable request, and seeks revenge by withholding suitable food and the common means of relief, in cases of sea-sickness and ill health? It is intimated that all these acts, though wrong in morals, are yet acts which the law does not punish; that if the person is untouched, if the acts do not amount to an assault and battery, they are not to be redressed. The law looks on them as unworthy of its cognizance. The master is at liberty to inflict the most severe mental sufferings, in the most tyrannical manner, and yet if he withholds a blow, the victim may be crushed by his unkindness. He commits nothing within the reach of civil jurisprudence. My opinion is, that the law involves no such absurdity. It is rational and just. It gives compensation for mental sufferings occasioned by acts of wanton injustice, equally whether they operate by way of direct, or of consequential, injuries. In each case the contract of the passengers for the voyage is in substance violated; and the wrong is to be redressed as a cause of damage. I do not say that every slight aberration from propriety or duty, or that every act of unkindness or passionate folly, is to be visited with punishment; but if the whole course of conduct be oppressive and malicious, if habitual immodesty is accompanied by habitual cruelty, it would be a reproach to the law, if it could not award some recompense.

Let us now proceed to the consideration of the evidence in this case so far as it applies to the libel, which is not confined to mere acts of wanton cruelty and misconduct, but embraces in its gravamen what the law in its strictest sense deems assaults and batteries.

(The judge here went into a full examination of the evidence; and came to the conclusion, that the libel was sufficiently proved to entitle the libellants to damages, and he accordingly decreed, that the defendant should pay $400 damages—being the amount of his share of the passage money received for the passage of the libellants—and costs of suit.)

Decree accordingly.

CHAMBERLAIN v. ECKERT.

Circuit Court, N. D. Illinois. April, 1869.

PLEA IN ABATEMENT—SUIT PENDING IN STATE COURT.

To a suit on a promissory note, defendant pleaded in abatement the pendency of a suit in the state court; plaintiff replied that since the filing of the plea, the suit had been dismissed. Held—a good replication.

This was a suit upon a promissory note. Defendant pleaded in abatement that at the time of commencement of this suit an action was pending in the circuit court of La Salle county upon the same note, and between the same parties, which action was still pending. Plaintiff replied that on the 6th of March, after the filing of the plea in abatement, but before the replication, the suit in the state court had been dismissed. Defendant demurred to replication.

J. Milton Peters, for plaintiff.

Elliott Anthony, for defendant.

DRUMMOND, District Judge. I am inclined to think that this replication ought to be held good; and, in the absence of any express authority to the contrary, I shall so hold. There is an opinion given by Chief Justice Parsons, proceeding on the ground that a suit pending at the time of the commencement of the second suit is a good plea; but this, I think, is not the present doctrine. At any rate, it is not the doctrine in this state; and I think it ought not to be because, when a suit has once been commenced, and is dismissed, the fact that it was pending at the time the second suit was brought is no reason why the court in which the second suit was commenced should not go on and adjudicate on the rights of the parties, because, although there was a difficulty once, it is removed. When the suit was commenced there was an obstacle in the way. When the plea was pleaded there was the same obstacle. But now, when the replication is filed, that obstacle is removed.

Demurrer to replication overruled.

Plea of lis pendens in another state not good. Smith v. Lathrop, 44 Pa. St. 326, and cases there referred to.

[NOTE. Subsequently, and without leave of the court, defendant filed a demurrer to the declarations, and on motion of plaintiff the demurrer was stricken from the files. See Case No. 2,577, next following.]

CHAMBERLAIN v. ECKERT.

[2 Biss. 126.][1]

Circuit Court, N. D. Illinois. April, 1869.

CIRCUIT COURTS—JURISDICTION—CITIZENSHIP—ACTION BY ASSIGNEE OF PROMISSORY NOTE.

1. The assignee of a promissory note (being otherwise competent) may maintain an action upon it if the assignor might have done so at the time of the commencement of the suit.

[Cited in Jones v. Shapera, 6 C. C. A. 423, 57 Fed. 461.]

2. The payee, a resident of the same state with the maker at the time the note was given, but having removed therefrom, may maintain an action in this court.

3. The words in the eleventh section of the judiciary act of 1789 [1 Stat. 78], "unless a suit might have been prosecuted * * * if no assignment had been made," refer to the time when the suit was commenced, not the time of the assignment.

4. It is not necessary that it should appear that the assignor could have brought suit upon it before assignment. Thaxter v. Hatch [Case No. 13,866], approved.

5. It seems that if the payee after the maturity of the note and before suit brought had become a citizen of the same state, the federal courts could not sustain jurisdiction.

Suit upon a promissory note by an assignee, the declaration alleging that the plaintiff is a citizen of Vermont, the assignor a citizen of Missouri, and the defendant a citizen of Illinois. Defendant pleaded pendency of a former suit—replication that said suit had been dismissed. Demurrer to replication filed and overruled. See preceding case [No. 2,576]. Defendant then, without leave of court, filed a demurrer to the declaration, and this was a motion to strike it from the files.

J. Milton Peters, for plaintiff.
Elliott Anthony, for defendant.

DRUMMOND, District Judge. The plaintiff, when the demurrer to the replication was overruled, was entitled to judgment upon the demurrer. Before the defendant could rejoin to the replication or take any action in relation to the case, leave must have been granted by the court. The proper judgment of the court would follow upon the demurrer, as a necessary consequence. It is known, however, that as a general thing the court is very liberal in the exercise of its discretion and allows a demurrer to be withdrawn and issues of fact to be taken. But in this case no rejoinder was put in, but the defendant demurred to the declaration. I have however, as it is a question of jurisdiction and might come up hereafter, examined the declaration. It is upon an assigned promissory note, and avers that the plaintiff is a citizen of Vermont, and that the assignor of the note is a citizen of Missouri, and that the defendant is a citizen of Illinois. I am satisfied that the court has jurisdiction of the case.

The ground taken by the defendant is, that it must appear upon the face of the declaration, where an action is brought upon a promissory note by an assignee, that the assignor could have brought suit upon the note before he assigned it. The question is, whether that is correct? The clause in the eleventh section of the judiciary act is: "Nor shall any district or circuit court have cognizance of any suit to recover the contents of any promissory note or other chose in action in favor of an assignee, unless a suit might have been prosecuted in such court to recover the said contents if no assignment had been made, except in cases of foreign bills of exchange." 1 Stat. 78.

The question is, to what time does the language "might have been prosecuted" apply. Does it apply to the time when the assignor held and owned the promissory note, or to the time when the suit is brought? If a promissory note is made by a citizen of Wisconsin to a citizen of the same state, and as such assigned by him to a citizen of New York, at the time that the assignor held the note he could not bring a suit in a federal court of Wisconsin, against the maker, because he was a citizen of the same state with the maker; neither could the assignee, a citizen of New York, bring a suit in the federal court of Wisconsin, while the assignor remained a citizen of Wisconsin, but if the assignor ceased to be a citizen of Wisconsin, then, as I take it, a suit could be brought in the federal court of Wisconsin, by the assignee and holder of the note, because, then, being in the position as "if no assignment had been made," he, a citizen of New York, could bring a suit. The assignor, who had ceased to be a citizen of Wisconsin, could, while he was holder of the note, bring suit in the federal court of Wisconsin, because he had changed his residence and his citizenship, and become a citizen of another state.

But if the rule contended for by the defendant is the true rule, then no change in the status of the payee, after the assignment, could ever enable a party to bring a suit, and it might happen, where the note was executed by the maker to the payee of another state, and at the time of the commencement of the suit in the federal court, he was of the same state with the maker, the suit could be maintained by the assignee, a citizen of another state, because you have to look according to the view of the defense, to the status of the parties at the time that the assignor held the note. And if he ever could have prosecuted the suit, the assignee could prosecute it, although at the time when the suit is brought the payee and maker are citizens of the same state. That would be the necessary consequence, and the question recurs; what does the language of the statute mean, "unless the suit might have been prosecuted in said court, if no assignment had been made?" I think it means at the time the suit was prosecuted, so that if it appears then that the assignor could have maintained the suit if no assignment had been made, the assignee being a citizen of another state, can maintain the suit.

The only authority mentioned contrary to this view is to be found in the cases of Rogers v. Linn [Case No. 12,015], and Fry v. Rosseau [Id. 5,141]. I admit that those two cases seem to imply that the question is, what is the status of the assignor at the time he held the chose in action, the promissory note. But these cases are not very fully reported, and apparently proceed upon an erroneous view of this clause of the eleventh section of the judiciary act. It should be observed, however, that the attention of the court was not drawn to the distinction between the status of the assignor at the time he was the owner of the note and at the time the suit was brought. It does not seem that point was at all considered by the court, in order that the proper discrimination might have been made, and therefore I cannot say but that if the attention of the court had been directed to the point which is now presented, it might have used different language from that we find in the reported cases.

In this case, admit that the maker and payee were citizens of Illinois. The plaintiff, a citizen of Vermont, sues in this court. Now what is his status? Suppose there had been no assignment of this promissory note. It appears upon the face of the declaration that the assignor at the time the suit was brought could have maintained an action in this court, in the contingency named. He is averred to be a citizen of the state of Missouri, so that the language of the act, (unless the suit might have been prosecuted in such court if no assignment had been made,) applies to him. It cannot be pretended that when a note is made by a citizen of one state to a citizen of the same state that the payee cannot remove to another state, and after he has so removed and become a citizen thereof, bring a suit in a federal court against the maker in the district where he resides. That can scarcely be claimed. So that the maker and the payee both being citizens of Illinois at the time this note was made, by the removal of the payee, Le Roy D. Dewey, to Missouri, he certainly could have maintained a suit on this note against the maker in the federal court of the district in which the maker resides, if no assignment had been made, and that being so, this plaintiff can maintain the action. The opinion now given accords with one reported some years since. Thaxter v. Hatch [supra].

A further illustration may be suggested by considering the time of the maturity of the note. If the maker and payee of the note sued on, in this case, were both citizens of Illinois when it was made, then the right of the assignee to sue in this court would depend, if I understand the argument of the defendant, upon the fact whether the payee was a citizen of Missouri when the note matured and was the owner, and so himself had the right to sue; in other words, that the payee must have first become a citizen of Missouri and allowed the note to mature before assignment, for both must concur to enable the assignor to sue in this court. And this, I think, demonstrates the error of the argument, because the claim is, if the payee, after the maturity of the note and after the assignment, became a citizen of Illinois at the commencement of the suit by the assignee, the court would still have jurisdiction, whereas, according to my reading of the statute, the fact that the assignor of the note is a citizen of Illinois at the commencement of the suit, would be fatal to the jurisdiction of the court.

The motion must be sustained and demurrer stricken from the files.

NOTE [from original report]. Where a judgment has been rendered in a state court between citizens of different states, and the judgment has been since assigned to a citizen of the same state as the original plaintiff, the circuit court has jurisdiction to sustain a bill in equity in favor of the assignee, although the original ground of the suit, on which judgment was rendered, was a negotiable chose in action, on which the circuit court could not have held jurisdiction under the restrictive clause of the eleventh section of the judiciary act of 1789. Dexter v. Smith [Case No. 3,866]. If the payee change his domicile to another state bona fide, before maturity of note, he or his indorsee in such state may sue in the federal court. Kirkman v. Circuit Court, D. Minnesota. Dec. Term, 1873.[2]

LAND GRANT TO RAILROADS — MINNESOTA STATE RAILROAD BONDS—CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT —REMEDIES.

1. The present railroad companies, to which the land grant of congress was re-granted on the failure of the old companies (upon which the benefit of the grant was first conferred) to build the roads, do not hold any of the said lands, not even the first 120 sections, subject to any trust in favor of the creditors of the state, or of the former companies.

[See note at end of case.]

2. Power of the state over the disposition of the railroad aid land grant considered.

3. Minnesota state railroad aid bonds, issued under the amendment to the state constitution of April 15, 1858, held valid.

4. Construction of said constitutional amendment and the nature of the remedies by foreclosure and forfeiture considered.

On the 3d day of March, 1857, congress granted to the territory of Minnesota, lands to aid in the construction of certain lines of railroads therein. 11 Stat. 195. By the act it is provided, inter alia, that "the lands hereby granted for and on account of said road and branches severally, shall be exclusively applied in the construction of that road for and on account of which such lands are hereby granted, and shall be disposed of only as the work progresses; and the same shall be applied to no other purpose whatever." Section 4 enacts: "That the land hereby granted * * * shall be disposed of by said state only in the manner following: that is to say, that a quantity of land not exceeding one hundred and twenty sections for each of said roads and branches, * * * may be sold; and when the governor shall certify * * * that any twenty continuous miles of any of said roads, etc., is completed, then another quantity of land not to exceed one hundred and twenty sections, * * * for each of said roads * * * may be sold," and so on. The territorial legislature of Minnesota, passed an act, approved May 22, 1857, entitled "An act to execute the trust created by an act of congress, entitled 'An act,' etc.;" and by chapter 3 of said act, the Root River Valley & Southern Minnesota R. R. Co., a corporation created and then existing under the laws of said territory (the name of which corporation was soon after changed to the "Southern Minnesota R. R. Co."), was authorized to construct two of the lines of said road mentioned in the said act of congress, being the lines since severally constructed by the two companies, defendants in this action. That, by sections 3, 7 and 12, of said chapter 3, of said territorial act, it was provided that said railroad company, upon the construction of said lines of road, as in said act and the act of congress provided, should have the lands to aid in the construction thereof, in and by said act of congress designated.

On the 15th day of April, 1868, an amendment to the constitution of the state was adopted by the people, authorizing the issue of state bonds, not to exceed $5,000,000, to the land grant railroads, "for the purpose of expediting the construction thereof." By this amendment the provision was, that state bonds to the amount of $100,000 should be issued to each company for every ten miles of road made "ready for placing the superstructure thereon," and $100,000 for each ten miles completed with cars running thereon. "Said bonds thus issued shall be denominated 'Minnesota state railroad bonds,' and the faith and credit of the state are hereby pledged for the payment of the interest and the redemption of the principal thereof." By this amendment, also, the state bonds were to be made payable to the order of the company to which they were issued, and transferable by the endorsement of the president thereof. Then follows this provision: "Each company shall make provision for the punctual payment and redemption of all bonds issued and delivered to it, and for the punctual payment of the interest which shall accrue thereon, in such manner as to exonerate the treasury of this state from any advances of money for that purpose; and as security therefor, the governor shall demand and receive from each of said companies, before any of such bonds are issued, an instrument pledging the net profits of the road for the payment of said interest, and a conveyance to the state of the first 240 sections of land, free from prior incumbrances, which said company is or may be authorized to sell in trust for the better security of the treasury of the state from loss on said bonds," etc. And by the said constitutional amendment it was also provided that as a further security, each company should transfer to the state its own first mortgage bonds, corresponding in amount to the said state bonds so issued to such company; and in case of default of such company to pay the interest on the state bonds so issued to it, the governor was authorized, in such manner as should be provided by law, to sell the said first mortgage bonds of such company so transferred to the state, or require a foreclosure of the mortgage executed by said company to secure the same. And it was further provided, that in consideration of the loan of the state credit to such companies, and as a condition thereof, each company should complete not less than fifty miles of its road on or before the 31st of December, 1861, and not less than 100 miles before the year 1864, and four-fifths of the entire line before the year 1866;. and any failure so to complete within the said several times, should forfeit to the state all the right, title and interest of any kind whatsoever, in and to any lands together with the franchises connected with the same pertaining to the portion of the road so uncompleted. Said proposed amendment was submitted to the people, for approval, at a special election, held April 15, 1858, and was approved by a vote of about five to one. But said proposed amendment was not submitted to congress, or referred to in the act admitting Minnesota as a state. The said Root River Valley & Southern Minnesota R. R. Co. accepted the provisions of said amendment.

In October, 1858, the Southern Minnesota R. R. Co. (being the new name for the Root River Valley & Southern Minnesota R. R. Co.) executed to the state an instrument, pledging the net profits of the road for the payment of the interest on the state bonds that should be issued to it, and also a conveyance of the first 240 sections of land which it was or might be authorized to sell, for the better security of the state against the payment of interest on the state bonds so to be issued to the said company. And, on October 1, 1868, the company made a trust deed to Pringle & Chatfield, trustees, on the road, lands, franchises, and property of every description, to secure $2,000,000 of the bonds of the company. In July, 1857, the route of the Southern Minnesota R. R. Co. was located. In 1858, and early in 1859, the plaintiff constructed roadbed and received therefor from the companies, state bonds endorsed by the companies, to the amount of $575,000. In 1859, the railroad company became insolvent and never completed a mile of road, nor did anything beyond the grading, and made default in the payment of interest on its bonds and on the bonds of the state.

In 1860, the constitution was amended by "expunging" the amendment of April 15, 1858, under which the state bonds were issued, "saving to the state all rights, remedies and forfeitures accruing under said amendment;" and by providing that "no law levying a tax or making other provision for the payment of interest or principal of the bonds denominated 'Minnesota state railroad bonds' shall take effect, or be in force, until such law shall have been submitted to a vote of the people of the state, and adopted by a majority of the electors of the state voting upon the same." By an act of the legislature of the state, of August 12, 1858, and March 6, 1860, provision was made for the foreclosure of the mortgages, by order of the governor, of such companies as should be in default in payment of the interest on the state bonds that should be issued to it, and also in default in the payment of the interest of its own bonds, which should be held by the state as indemnity, as provided in said loan amendment, and upon such foreclosure to bid the property in, in the name and for the use of the state.

The original Southern Minnesota R. R. Co. having made default in payment of interest both on its own bonds and the bonds of the state, the governor duly caused the deed of trust to the state to be foreclosed and all lands, etc., were sold to and purchased for and in the name of the state, and a conveyance made to the state therefor, and the state continued to hold all the lands, property and franchises, thus acquired, until the 4th day of March, 1864. On March 4, 1864, the legislature of the state passed an act, whereby the present railroad companies, defendants in this action, were created, and all rights acquired by the state by virtue of said foreclosure proceedings, or by any forfeiture to the state, done or suffered by said old or original Southern Minnesota R. R. Co., were granted to the new companies thereby created, free and clear of all liens whatsoever, with further provisions that said new companies should have and receive severally, the lands pertaining to the line of the road which each was empowered to construct, upon the construction and completion of the same as provided in said act, and in said act of congress. The said railroad companies, defendants, severally went on under said act and completed their several lines of road, and received therefor, as the same were constructed, the lands from the state appertaining thereto under said congressional grant; said congressional grant having been amended so as to allow the lands to be disposed of by the state, as the lines were constructed in sections of ten instead of twenty miles, as originally provided. The said defendants, the railroad companies, to raise the means to construct said lines of road, issued their bonds severally, and mortgaged their roads, franchises and lands, to secure said bonds, as set forth in the answers of the trustees in this action. That said defendants acquired no title, right or license, in regard to the right of way from, through or under the old company, but procured the right of way from the individual land owners, over and upon which the old grading was done, so far as they used the same.

The present bill is by the plaintiff [Selah Chamberlain], as the holder of $500,000 state bonds, and is brought, not against the railroad companies to which they were issued, and which endorsed them, but against the new companies created in 1864, and to which the state re-granted the lands and property, and against the trustees in mortgages executed by the present companies to secure bonds issued to borrow money to build the roads, and as to the lands (particularly the first 240 sections granted to the said roads) and franchises conferred upon the present companies by the legislature of 1864, seeks to charge them with a trust for the payment of the plaintiff's bonds. The bill, in substance, prays for discovery and answer to special interrogatories; for a receiver; for an account of value of franchises and road beds at time of conveyance to defendants; for the value of all lands sold for cash; that defendants pay over all moneys by them received, and deliver all bonds, mortgages, contracts or evidences of indebtedness, for sale of lands to the receiver; convey to him all the lands remaining unsold; all to be by him converted into cash and applied to the liquidation of said state bonds and interest; and for general relief.

Gordon E. Cole and F. R. E. Cornell, for complainant.

Gilman, Clough & Wilder, E. C. Palmer, Gilfillan & Williams, and H. F. Horn, for defendants.

DILLON, Circuit Judge. The plaintiff, who was a contractor on certain railroads, to which the state originally gave the benefit of the land grant of congress, holds bonds of the state of Minnesota, issued pursuant to the constitutional amendment of April 15, 1858, to the amount of half a million of dollars, upon which no interest has been paid since 1859, and which, by the expunging amendment to the constitution of 1860, if valid, the state legislature is disabled from paying or making provision to pay, until a law for that purpose shall be approved by a popular vote. These bonds were endorsed by the original companies to which they were issued, and which, as between them and the state, are the principal and primary debtors. The present defendants, the St. Paul & Sioux City R. R. Co., and the Southern Minnesota R. R. Co., are not the companies with which the plaintiff contracted and for which he did work, but are companies created by the state in 1864, and to which the state then re-granted the lands and property, which it had obtained by foreclosure or forfeiture, or both, from the old or original companies. The bill proceeds upon the theory that the plaintiff's bonds are legal and subsisting obligations of the state; that the companies to which they were issued are the principal debtors, and the state their surety; that the lands, particularly the first 120 sections to each road, became by the act of the legislature of May 22, 1857, the property of the companies; that the only interest the state afterwards acquired in these lands, was the right to hold them to secure itself against loss by reason of its issue of state bonds; that the plaintiff, a creditor of the main debtor, has a right in equity to be subrogated to the rights of his surety (the state) in respect to all securities belonging to the principal debtor, and that the present companies not being bona fide purchasers of the lands for value and without notice, are open to the same trusts which might have been fastened upon them had they still remained in the hands of the state. That the bonds held by the plaintiff are the legal obligations of the state, and binding upon it in law, honor and justice, I have no doubt. Indeed, counsel have not seriously contended that these bonds were not valid. They were issued pursuant to an amendment of the constitution of the state, adopted by a popular vote of about 35,000 for, to 8,000 against the project; and have been repeatedly recognized as valid by subsequent legislation of the state, and by the foreclosure proceedings. Under these circumstances, the fact that it does not appear that the acting governor signed the bill, providing for the submission to the people of the loan amendment to the constitution, is a matter of no consequence. In the amendment to the constitution "the faith and credit of the state are pledged for the payment of the interest and the redemption of the principal" of the bonds; they are signed by the governor and bear upon their face the seal of the state; they were issued to the plaintiff and others for grading and work actually done upon the roads at the rate specified in the constitutional amendment, and the state obtained the benefit of the securities it took for its indemnification, and re-granted the property it acquired, free from all liens, to the present companies; under these circumstances, if the state were suable in the courts, there can be no doubt that the bonds would be legally enforceable against it. Justice and honor alike, require the state to recognize these bonds as binding upon it, and in the end the court cannot doubt that the people of the state will so ordain. A state with such a future before it as the state of Minnesota, cannot afford to bear the odium of repudiation, and if there are no other difficulties in the plaintiff's way, except the suggested one that his bonds are invalid, he will be entitled to the relief demanded.

The main purpose of the bill is to charge the first 120 sections of land granted by the state to the original companies, and by the act of 1864 re-granted to the present companies, with an equitable trust in favor of the plaintiff, for the payment of his state bonds endorsed by the old companies. It is admitted that the old companies, after doing a large amount of grading, became insolvent, and that they never completed any part of their line of road, and hence under the act of congress never became entitled to any lands, unless it may be the first 120 sections to each of the roads. These, the plaintiff contends, the state, under the act of congress of March 3, 1857, making the grant, had a right to sell in advance of construction; that the act of the territorial legislature of May 22, 1857, was a sale of the 120 sections to the companies, by force, whereof, they became absolutely their property by a title not subject to be divested by their subsequent failure to build the roads; that being the property of the companies they had a right to pledge them to the state to indemnify it against liabilities it assumed for them; and that the plaintiff has the right to follow these lands into the hands of the state or its grantees, with notice, and subject them to payment of his bonds. The lands granted to the state by congress were held by it in trust to be "exclusively applied to the construction of the road for and on account of which such lands were granted, and the same should be applied to no other purposes whatsoever." Said lands "shall be disposed of," says the act of congress, "by the state only, in the manner following, that is to say, that a quantity of land not exceeding 120 sections for each of said roads and branches * * * may be sold; and when the governor shall certify that any twenty continuous miles of any said roads, etc., is completed, then a quantity not exceeding 120 sections * * * for each of said roads, may be sold," and so on. This comprised the extent of the power of the state over these lands. The state was a trustee whose powers were strictly limited by the congressional enactment. The state might, I am inclined to think, have sold the 120 sections in advance of construction, and conveyed a good title; but I doubt whether the act of the legislature of May 22, 1857, was a sale to the original companies so as to confer a title not subject to be defeated, if they failed to construct the roads as required by the act of congress; and I am clear, that under the act of congress it was not competent for the state, acting as a trustee, to acquire any lien on or right in these lands, inconsistent with the unfettered execution of its trust duties under the act of congress. The state sustained to the old companies a double relation, one as trustee under the land grant act of congress; the other as the sovereign which had created these companies, and was undertaking to aid them in their enterprise by a loan of its own credit. Now it is clear that if the state became a creditor of these companies, it could not lawfully stipulate for security out of lands which it held in trust, if this would be inconsistent with its duties under the act of congress.

In this view, I have serious doubts as to the validity of the security for its bonds which the state sought to obtain by the constitutional amendment upon the lands or any of them, which had been granted by congress, and which had never been earned by the completion of the required section of 20 (subsequently reduced to 10) miles of road. But I need not decide the point; for assuming that the 120 sections became the absolute property of the company, it was then competent for the state to take security, upon it for its indemnity, and to provide for the forfeiture thereof to the state in case the roads were not completed as required by the constitutional amendment. The companies made default in the payment of interest, and their rights were foreclosed, and the property purchased by the state. The companies failed to build and complete the roads, as required by the constitutional amendment; and the legislation of 1864 shows that the state elected to take advantage of the forfeiture. Foreclosure and forfeiture were cumulative and concurrent remedies. The main object of the mortgage was pecuniary indemnity to the state. The principal purpose of the provisions for forfeiture was to secure the completion of the roads by the stipulated time. By foreclosure or forfeiture, or both, the rights of the old companies in those lands became vested in the state. It need not be denied in this case, that if these bonds were still in the hands of the state, or a voluntary grantee or a purchaser with notice, that the plaintiff, as the holder of unpaid state bonds (to indemnify the state against which the companies had conveyed to it the lands) might fasten an equitable trust upon them. Undoubtedly, he could do this, if these lands were in the hands of the state, discharged of any trusts under the act of congress. But upon the failure of the old companies, the state, in 1864, in order to secure the completion of the roads, created the present companies, and granted to them all the lands and franchises which had been granted to the old companies, "free of all claims or liens," and on the faith of this legislation, the new companies have built, completed the lines of road, the one at a cost of $5,000,000 and the other at a cost of $3,000,000. The money to accomplish this was raised upon deeds of trust and mortgages yet outstanding, made by the present companies to secure issues of bonds, preferred stock and land certificates. After all this is done, the present bill is filed, and it would, in my judgment, be inequitable as against the present companies and their creditors, to hold that the plaintiff could subject to the payment of his bonds the land or other property which the defendant companies acquired from the state by the legislation of 1864.

A decree will, therefore, be entered, dismissing the bill with costs. Decree accordingly.

WAR — CAPTURED AND ABANDONED PROPERTY — PAYMENT TO FRAUDULENT CLAIMANT — REMEDY OF REAL PARTY—LIMITATIONS.

1. During the late war between the United States and the insurgent states, a quantity of cotton was seized in one of the insurgent states by an officer of the government, under authority of the captured and abandoned property act, was sold, and its proceeds paid into the treasury. Held, that the question whether or not the cotton was in fact captured or abandoned property was not open to litigation in the courts.

2. When parties not entitled to said proceeds, within two years after the suppression of the Rebellion, brought a fraudulent suit in the court of claims to recover the same from the United States, and, by means of false allegations, false testimony and fraud, recovered judgment and received said proceeds from the treasury, a bill filed by the real owners against such persons, more than two years after the suppression of the Rebellion, praying for a decree against them for the amount of said proceeds, was dismissed on demurrer for want of equity.

[In equity. Bill by Julia L. Chamberlain and others against Huldah L. Stanton and others to recover moneys received by the latter from the United States, as the proceeds of the sale of alleged captured and abandoned property, which property in fact had belonged to plaintiffs. Defendants demurred for want of equity.]

T. J. Semmes and George S. Sawyer, for complainants.

D. C. Labatt and J. Aroni, for defendants.

WOODS, Circuit Judge. The case made by the bill is as follows: The complainants say that during the late war between the United States and the states in rebellion, they were the owners of one hundred and ninety-six bales, and one-half a bale of cotton; that during the war the cotton was seized by a subordinate officer of the United States, without orders from any competent authority; the cotton was sold as captured or abandoned property, and its proceeds, amounting to $51,969, paid into the treasury of the United States; that the cotton was never in fact captured or abandoned property; the United States never acquired any interest in it or its proceeds, but acted in the matter simply as an ordinary depositary or bailee of this specific fund for the benefit of the true owner. The bill further alleges that the defendants, having no title to said cotton, nevertheless prosecuted a suit for the proceeds thereof against the United States in the court of claims, and by means of false allegations, false testimony and fraud, on the 7th day of March, 1870, recovered a judgment for said proceeds, and the amount thereof was paid to them by the officers of the treasury of the United States.

The prayer of the bill is for a decree against the defendants for the said sum of $51,969, the proceeds of said cotton received by the defendants, and five thousand dollars for special damages sustained by complainants by reason of the premises. To this bill, defendants have filed a demurrer for want of equity. On this demurrer the cause has been argued and submitted.

The complainants have made no case for the intervention of this court. According to the averments of the bill, the proceeds of this cotton found their way into the treasury of the United States as the proceeds of captured or abandoned property. Whether the cotton was really captured or abandoned is not now an open question. There was but one way of recovering the money after it had been paid into the treasury as such, and that was by bringing suit in the court of claims. See act of March 12, 1863 (12 Stat. 820). The statute declares, that "any person claiming to have been the owner of any such abandoned or captured property may at any time, within two years after the suppression of the Rebellion, prefer his claim to the proceeds thereof in the court of claims, and on proof to the satisfaction of said court of his ownership of said property, of his right to the proceeds thereof, and that he has never given any aid or comfort to the present Rebellion, may receive the residue of such proceeds after the deduction of any lawful expenses attending the disposition thereof," etc. The law never contemplated, that a party claiming to be the owner of captured or abandoned property might recover the proceeds thereof after his claim was barred by the limitation of the statute, or without proving his ownership and loyalty to the satisfaction of the court of claims, by bringing suit therefor against a party who had, by fraudulent practices, received said proceeds from the United States treasury.

If the averments of the bill are true, the United States is entitled to the proceeds of the cotton claimed by complainants. The title of the United States became absolute upon the expiration of two years from and after the close of the Rebellion, unless suit therefor was brought within that time by the real owner. According to the bill no such suit was brought, and the right of the real owner was forever cut off. The fact that some person, not the real owner, has by fraud and perjury cheated the United States out of the proceeds of the cotton, does not confer any new rights upon the former owner of the cotton. If the defendants have fraudulently got from the treasury of the United States, money which did not belong to them, the United States has a right of action to recover the same, but the complainants have no such right, and they cannot acquire any such right by adopting the frauds and perjuries of the defendants. BANKRUPTCY—PRIORITY OF DEBT TO STATE—COMPOSITION—ADJUDICATION.

1. A judgment recovered by the people of the state of New York against a surety in a bail bond given for the appearance of a person indicted for a crime, is a debt to the state, entitled to a priority in payment in full out of the assets of a debtor who files a petition in voluntary bankruptcy, and, without being adjudged a bankrupt, institutes proceedings for a composition.

2. But payment in full of the judgment by the debtor otherwise than out of his assets will not be made a condition precedent to the paying anything to a general creditor, under the composition.

[1] [Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

3. The state is entitled to have the debtor adjudged a bankrupt, and to proceed to realize his assets for application on the judgment.

[In bankruptcy. In the matter of John F. Chamberlin.]

P. B. Olney, for the state.
L. H. Arnold, Jr., for debtor.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. On the 29th of January, 1877, John F. Chamberlin filed a voluntary petition in bankruptcy in this court. In his schedules to such petition, he set forth as a debt to be paid in full, or entitled to priority, under the statute, the following: "Name of creditor—the people of the state of New York; residence and occupation—Charles S. Fairchild, attorney general of the state of New York, Albany, New York; amount—$10,000; contracted in the year 1874, at the city of New York; debt as surety on two bail bonds for William Hennessy Cook—judgment recovered on the said two bonds, on the 18th May, 1874, for $5,000 on each bond—said bonds were made by the said Cook as principal and the petitioner as surety." He did not set forth any creditor as holding securities. By his schedules his creditors were 87 in number and his debts amounted to $243,330.28, while his assets consisted of clothing of the value of $185 and 131 shares of the capital stock of three corporations, of the nominal value of $13,100. On such petition, the petitioner has never been adjudicated a bankrupt. On the same 29th of January, he presented to this court a petition, proposing a composition to his creditors of one per cent. of his indebtedness, to be paid in money within ten days after the final order on composition. The proper proceedings were had, and the composition was confirmed by 60 of the creditors, representing debts amounting to $170,944.01. The said debt to the people of the state of New York was not proved at the first meeting of creditors on the composition. In the statement of assets presented to that meeting, the only assets set forth are the said shares of stock, and it is stated therein that none of them are of any real value. All of the 60 creditors except one (whose debt was $260) appeared and signed by the same person as their attorney in fact. At the second meeting of creditors on the composition, the attorney-general of the state of New York filed, in behalf of the people of the state of New York, a proof of the said debt for $10,000 on the said two judgments, as a debt due to the people of the state of New York. The proof was not objected to. On the application to the court for the confirmation of the composition, the attorney-general applies to the court for an order that the people of the state of New York be paid the amounts due on the said two judgments in full, before the proposed compromise is carried out, or that the compromise be subject to the said debts.

The composition statute provides, that every composition shall, "subject to priorities declared in said act, provide for a pro rata payment or satisfaction, in money, to the creditors of such debtor, in proportion to the amount of their unsecured debts in respect to which any such security shall have been duly surrendered and given up." The priorities referred to are those provided for in section 5101 of the Revised Statutes, which enacts, that, "in the order for a dividend, the following claims shall be entitled to priority, and to be first paid in full, in the following order:" The third in the list is this: "All debts due to the state in which the proceedings in bankruptcy are pending, and all taxes and assessments made under the laws thereof."

It is contended for the state, that the proper construction of the composition statute is, that a debt due to the state must be paid in full before anything can be paid to any general creditor under the composition. The priority secured by section 5101 is priority in payment out of the assets of the bankrupt, priority in the division of the proceeds of such assets. Such proceeds are to be devoted towards paying the preferred claims, and in full, if sufficient, in the order designated, before the general creditors can receive anything out of such proceeds. This priority is preserved by the composition statute. But there is nothing more given to the preferred creditor. He can only have, under the composition statute, a priority in payment out of what assets the debtor has which would go to his assignee in bankruptcy. The statute does not give him more than such priority. It does not impose on the debtor, as a condition precedent to a composition, that he shall pay in full all the claims which, under section 5101, are entitled to priority.

If the debtor in this case has any assets, those assets must be devoted by him to the payment of the debts which are declared by section 5101 to be entitled to priority, before any part of such assets can be devoted to paying any part of the composition to the general creditors. So far as now appears, the assets set forth by the debtor have no value, and the money wherewith the composition will be paid, if paid, is to come from some source other than any assets which would go to an assignee in bankruptcy in this proceeding. Yet, if the debt to the state is a preferred debt, the state is entitled to have those assets so administered that they will be applied towards paying its debt, and is entitled to have the debtor adjudicated a bankrupt, and to have an assignee appointed. So, also, if there be other assets of the debtor, not yet disclosed. To this end the state is entitled to examine the debtor in the composition proceedings, and also to examine witnesses, to show that the debtor has other assets. This is necessary, to enable the court to determine whether the composition "is for the best interest of all concerned," including the state, and the examination may now be had.

If it should turn out that the debtor has no assets of any value, the fact that the state would be entitled to priority, in payment out of the assets, if there were any, will be no impediment to the confirming of the composition; and the composition, if confirmed, will bind the state equally with other creditors whom it will bind. If it should turn out that there are assets of value, the state will be enabled to take measures to secure its priority in respect to such assets, while the question of confirming the composition will remain to be determined.

It is contended, for the debtor, that the debts in this case are not due to the state, although the judgments are in favor of the people of the state, because, under some provisions of the state statutes, the money, when collected, may go into the treasury of the county of New York. But, neither the county of New York, nor its county treasurer, nor its treasury, is the creditor. The state is the creditor. The state may direct what shall be done with the money, when collected. It may do so, in advance of the collection, or it may make such disposition of the money, as it pleases, after the collection. Until the money is collected, the debt is the property of the state and the money is due to the state. Any and all laws now in force in regard to the disposition of the money when collected may be repealed before the money is collected, and a new law be before that time enacted, directing that the money be paid into the state treasury. The state is the real creditor, having supreme control over the debt, and the right to say what shall be done with its own property. The bonds on which the payments were recovered were given in the course of the administration of the criminal laws of the state, as security for the appearance of an indicted person to answer to the indictments. A decision that judgments in the name of the state on such bonds are debts due to the state, does not necessarily require a decision that other bonds to the people of the state, in respect to matters not exclusively of public concern, but really to secure private rights, where the state is not the real creditor, but only the nominal creditor for the use of the real creditor, create debts due to the state, within section 5,101.

The proof of debt filed by the district attorney of the city and county of New York on these judgments, being shown to have been filed under a misapprehension and in ignorance of the fact that one had been previously filed by the attorney general, may be withdrawn.

The question as to the constitutionality of the provisions for composition is disposed of by the decisions of this court and of the circuit court for this district in Re Reiman [Cases Nos. 11,673 and 11,675].

PATENTS—"FRAMEWORK FOR SKIRTS"—ANTICIPATION—REVIEW OF COMMISSIONER'S DECISION.

[1. On appeal from a decision of the commissioner of patents, the court will not review his action in intimating that a certain patent is an apposite reference, without stating grounds to support his position, in deciding an application finally by simply reaffirming former action, and without reconsidering the application, and in deciding that if, upon appeal to a commissioner, the case is rejected upon an entirely new reference, the applicant is not entitled to have his case re-examined on his former claim, or a claim substantially similar, as such questions properly address themselves to the consideration of the commissioner in connection with the internal discipline and routine or practice of the office.]

[2. The invention of Mathew Chambers for a framework for a skirt or bustle is not anticipated by the patent of Alexander Douglass, No. 17,082, nor by the English patent of Osman, No. 2,513, of 1856.]

[Appeal from the commissioner of patents.

[Application by Mathew Chambers for letters patent for an improved framework for skirts or bustles. From a decision of the commissioner of patents rejecting the application, the applicant appeals. Reversed.

[The patent was subsequently granted to Chambers, July 12, 1859, and is numbered 24,720.

[The appellant assigned the following reasons of appeal:] First. Because on an examination of the alleged new invention or discovery it did not appear that the same improvement in bustles had been discovered or invented by any other person in this country prior to the alleged invention or discovery thereof by the applicant, the said Mathew Chambers, or that it had been patented or described in any printed publication in this or any foreign country, or had been in public use or on sale with the applicant's consent and allowance prior to the application, or that the improvement such as this is not sufficiently useful and important to be worthy of a patent. Second. Because in deciding against the said Chambers' application for a patent for improvement in bustles, by simply intimating that a certain English patent (Osman's) is considered to be an apposite reference, without giving any grounds to support such a position—which amounts to an ipse dixit—he departed from the correct practice of the patent office and acted contrary to the spirit of the law. Third. Because he decided finally upon the appellant's case, by simply reaffirming the former action, without reconsidering the application. Fourth. Because he decided that if upon appeal to the commissioner a case be rejected, not upon the same references that had been given by the examiner, (said references having been declared by the commissioner to be not in point, and therefore void and invalid,) but upon an entirely new reference, the applicant is not entitled to have his case re-examined on his former claim or on a claim substantially similar; thus deciding in effect that, because the examiner had erred (according to the commissioner's own opinion) in deciding adversely to the applicant's claim, the applicant should be deprived of the privilege of a second examination or reconsideration of his claim, as provided by law. Fifth. Because he decided that the appellant's claim of invention is covered by Osman's patent, contrary to the express language of the two specifications and claims. Sixth. Because he decided that the objects and purposes intended to be accomplished by and derived from the appellant's invention might or could be accomplished by Osman's; whereas his arrangement, on the contrary, is not at all available or serviceable for distributing the weight of the skirts in order to relieve the waist from over-pressure, which is the main object of the appellant's invention.

A. Pollok, for appellants.

MERRICK, Circuit Judge. In considering the reasons of appeal filed in this case, the second, third, and fourth appear to me to present questions more properly addressing themselves to the consideration of the commissioner in connection with the internal discipline and routine of practice of the office, not involving matters cognizable before a judge of the circuit court upon appeal. The law undoubtedly requires of the commissioner to aid the inventor by information and suitable references in remedying a defective specification or claim, and to assist his judgment in determining whether he should withdraw or persist in a rejected application; but the manner of so doing is of necessity left to the sound discretion of the commissioner; and whether the duty be well or insufficiently performed in a particular instance, is not the subject of review, and from the nature of such cases cannot be passed upon by a judge on appeal. I therefore dismiss those three objections from further inquiry.

The first, fifth, and sixth reasons of appeal amount to but one, viz., that his invention has not been anticipated by any other, and particularly that the English patent of Osman (described in the thirty-first volume of English specifications for 1856, No. 2,513) does not embrace his claim. The examiner originally in charge of the case rejected the claim upon reference to the patent of Alexander Douglass of April 21st, 1857 (No. 17,082); but upon review of his decision upon two successive modifications of the claim, the commissioner, confirming reports of the board of review, declared that reference inapplicable, upon the ground that Chambers relied upon a combination of a corset band with the frame-work of a hooped skirt, and that this was not to be found in Douglass' invention, but that the essential features of his invention were embraced by Osman's patent. Upon comparing Osman's patent with Douglass', I have not been able to discover the combination of a corset band furnished with distributing stays upon the back, sides, and front thereof, any more than in Douglass'; but in the element of usefulness and novelty most relied upon in the present claim, to wit, the distribution of weight and compression upon the parts of the body best adapted to sustain weight and compression, the advantage appears to me to be with the Douglass patent, in this: that Osman's transfers the weight from the circle of the waist by three perpendicular strips of metal, forming the heads or fulcrums of the three springs which make the bustle, while the cords or adjustable metallic bands marked in Douglass' drawings CC distribute that same weight much more perfectly and on a much larger surface of the lower back and hips of the wearer. If, therefore, Douglass' invention is not in the way of the combination claimed by Chambers, neither is the patent of Osman. If the application of Chambers extended no further than to a partial relief of the waist of the wearer, by distributing a portion of the weight of the dress upon the strong parts of the back, I should feel obliged to reject the claim upon that reference; but the claim goes not only to the relief of weight upon the waist, but to the relief of the waist from the ill effects of the necessary confinement and compression along the front of the circle of the waist; and this is accomplished by the continuation of the corset and its arrangement in such a way as to operate as an abdominal supporter, and making the weight and stricture, which might prove injurious if limited to the waist, beneficial, by distributing them, by means of the stays and lacings of the corset, over the whole abdomen. In this way, it appears to me that he has introduced a new feature of general distribution of weight and compression over the abdomen, loins, and back not found in the other patents, and sufficiently distinctive to entitle him to a patent for his combination of a bustle with a corset, in the manner described in his specifications. The vital element of Douglass' invention, although, as I have just said, it embraces some parts of Chambers' claim, consists in the admirable adaptation of the adjusting cords CC, which give lightness and form to the article and enable the wearer from time to time to change the arc of its curvature in obedience to the demands of good taste. And looking to this as the controlling idea in Douglass' patent, I cannot think that the invention of Chambers materially conflicts with it, and hence conclude that each should receive from a discriminating public the appropriate rewards for his ingenuity.

[2. Security for costs will not be required on a libel for wages, when the answer is "forfeiture for desertion," and an attachment issued after hearing upon summons, but such defense was not then interposed.]

[In admiralty. Libel by Thaddeus Chambers and others against the sloop Henry Kneeland.] Motion [by the claimants] for security for costs and to dismiss libel for want of prosecution.

Before BETTS, District Judge.

It appearing to the court, upon the proofs, that this cause was noticed by the libellants, and put upon the calendar, immediately after issue joined, and with intent to try the same, and that the failure to bring the same to trial was accidental absence of the libellants' witnesses from court when the case was called, and it appearing that the claimants did not notice the cause on their part, as authorized to do by rule 123, it is therefore considered that the libellants have been guilty of no such neglect in the matter as to entitle the claimants to have the libel dismissed under the authority of rule 136. And it further appearing that the defence to the libellants' suit for wages is "forfeiture by desertion," and that the attachment was issued after hearing upon summons, when such defence, if available, might have been made, therefore, it is considered that the motion on the part of the claimants that the libellants file security for costs in the cause be denied; but, upon the facts and equities of the case, it is ordered that no costs be allowed to either party against the other on these motions.

3. The act of congress makes no provision for the recording of a mere license, and therefore it is not required. If recorded, it would not affect the rights of any one.

4. In the absence of any statutory provision, there is no principle of equity which requires the owner of a patented invention to give notice to a voluntary purchaser of a licensee's right, in order to enable him to hold such purchaser to the restricted use and enjoyment of the invention stipulated in the license.

5. It is the duty of the purchaser to inform himself of the nature of the licensee's ownership, and the extent of his right; if he fails to do this, he can not complain that the patentee has misled him, or set up his own remissness to secure to himself a larger interest than was granted to his predecessor in the ownership.

In equity. Final hearing on pleadings and proofs. Suit brought [by Maris Chambers against Frederick V. Smith and Stephen G. Smith] upon letters patent [No. 40,221] for an "improvement in brick machines," granted to Cyrus Chambers, Jr., October 6, 1863.

H. R. Warriner and W. F. McElroy, for complainant.

Andrew Zane and Theodore Cuyler, for defendants.

McKENNAN, Circuit Judge. The plaintiff seeks by this bill to enjoin the use of a patented brick machine beyond certain defined limits, within which its use was licensed to William M. Clark. The bill alleges that Cyrus Chambers, Jr., was the original inventor of a new and useful brick machine, for which letters patent were duly granted to him by the United States. That the patentee, by writing dated March 28, 1862, duly recorded in the patent office, assigned to the plaintiff all his right to and interest in said invention, except the right to manufacture said machines in the counties of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, and Camden, New Jersey. That the plaintiff, by writing dated December 27, 1862, granted to William M. Clark, his personal representatives and assigns, a license to use one of said machines, and to sell all bricks or tiles made thereby within a part of the city of Philadelphia, specifically defined in said license. And that the defendants, claiming to be the owners of the machine licensed to Clark, had removed it beyond the district described in his license, and were manufacturing large quantities of brick upon said machine without any authority from the plaintiff. All these allegations are fully sustained by the proofs; and the plaintiff would, therefore, seem to have made out a complete title to the relief prayed for.

The defendants, however, oppose a decree in favor of the plaintiff, on two grounds:

1. That this suit ought to have been brought in the name of the patentee, and can not be maintained by the plaintiff. The alleged infringement was carried on within the city of Philadelphia, and it is only the use of the machine therein which is complained of. This is covered by the patentee's assignment to the plaintiff, whereby an exclusive right to use the invention was secured to the plaintiff, which might be enforced against the patentee himself. By the settled construction of the act of congress of July 4, 1836 [5 Stat. 123], an assignee can maintain a suit in his own name for an invasion of such exclusive right. Wilson v. Rousseau, 4 How. [45 U. S.] 646; Gayler v. Wilder, 10 How. [51 U. S.] 477.

2. That the license to Clark not being recorded, and no notice being given of any restriction of his right to use the machine, a purchaser at a marshal's sale of his interest in it would have the right to use it anywhere. The act of congress makes no provision for the recording of a mere license, and therefore it is not required. Brooks v. Byam [Case No. 1,948]. And although the license here was recorded in the patent office, May 1, 1863, that would not affect the rights of any one, because it was unauthorized. In the absence of any statutory provision, there is no principle of equity which requires the owner of a patented invention to give notice to a voluntary purchaser of a licensee's right, to enable him to hold such purchaser to the restricted use and enjoyment of the invention stipulated in the license. It is the duty of the purchaser to inform himself of the nature of the licensee's ownership and the extent of his right. If he fails to do this, he can not complain that the patentee has misled him, or set up his own remissness to secure to himself a larger interest than was granted to his predecessor in the ownership. It is a familiar rule that a purchaser at a judicial sale acquires only the title of the defendant in the execution to the property sold. Here Clark's ownership of the machine was qualified by an express restriction as to the place in which it should be used. He could not convey any greater interest. And to hold that a judicial sale could pass to the purchaser a larger interest, would make it operate to divest the patentee of a right and property which he had not voluntarily parted with, and which he is not, by any principle of equity, estopped from claiming.

Let a decree be entered for a perpetual injunction, and for an account as prayed for, with costs.

SALVAGE—BY PILOTS—TOWING ABANDONED VESSEL.

[In admiralty. Libel for salvage by Lane and others against the schooner Champion.]

W. Q. Morton, for libellants.

W. & B. Cutting, for claimants.

Before INGERSOLL, District Judge.

The schooner Champion, coming in collision with the brig Arcadian, was immediately abandoned by her crew, who went off to another vessel because the Arcadian had yellow fever on board. The Arcadian took the Champion in tow, and towed her towards New York for about twenty-three hours, when she was fallen in with by the libellants, who are pilots, and came to the Arcadian in answer to a signal for a pilot. They refused, however, to take charge of the two vessels for pilotage compensation, but put a pilot on board the Arcadian, and were willing to take charge of the Champion by herself. The master of the Arcadian accordingly cast her off, and the libellants took charge of her. The weather was favorable, and they towed her for twenty hours, and then employed a steamtug for $70 to tow her to the city, which was about fifty-four miles.

HELD BY THE COURT, that the services rendered by the libellants were not of a salvage character, nor strictly towage, nor pilotage, but partake of the three qualities, and the authority of the court to recompense maritime services is not limited to any special denomination or classification within which they may be arranged. That, when the schooner was cast off by the Arcadian, she stood in respect to the libellants as if then first fallen in with by them requiring towage and nothing more. That the libellants were not bound in their character as pilots to take charge of the Champion. They could render her no aid simply as pilots. That a proper compensation for the labor, exposure and cost incurred by them, is the foundation upon which their reward must be computed, and that $20 per hour is such compensation. That they are also entitled to their regular pilotage. When a pilot is called to and undertakes the business of towage, he is not bound to become pilot also of the vessel relieved.

Decree for libellants for $550, with legal outside pilotage and costs.

MARITIME LIEN — SUPPLIES FURNISHED IN CANADA—RIGHT OF ASSIGNEE TO SUE.

[See note at end of case.]

In admiralty. This was a libel in rem by James O'Leary for wood supplied the tug Champion by the libellant at Lampton, on St. Clair river, in the province of Ontario, in October and November, 1871. The tug was a vessel of the United States, and owned and registered at Detroit, in this district. The libellant was a citizen of Ontario and a subject of Great Britain. Before the suit was brought, O'Leary had assigned his claim to Johnson & Co., brokers and bankers, of Port Huron, in this district, and the suit was brought at their instance and for their benefit. The claim was evidenced by drafts drawn by the master of the tug upon the owner. After the suit had been commenced, and before the hearing, Johnson & Co. withdrew the drafts from the hands of their proctors, and, without further consultation or co-operation with them, made a settlement with and received payment from the owner of the tug, but not including costs, and without any reservation as to costs, and delivered up the drafts. The proctor's costs have not been paid. Libellant's proctors now ask for a decree for the same.

This is opposed on behalf of the owner of the tug, on three grounds: First. That by the laws of the province of Ontario, where the supplies were furnished, there was no maritime lien for the same; and that therefore libellant had no right of action in rem, and the court was without jurisdiction in the premises. Second. That any lien which may have existed in favor of libellant ceased on the assignment of his claim to Johnson & Co. Third. That in any event, the proctors having voluntarily delivered up to Johnson & Co. the evidences of claim, and thus enabled them to make a full and complete settlement with the owner, the proctors cannot now, without proof of collusion, look to the tug or her owner for their costs, but must look to Johnson & Co. alone. Upon the question of lien, it is conceded that if a maritime lien for supplies had an existence in Ontario in any case, it had in this. There are several other suits against the tug in behalf of Canadian parties, for supplies, depending substantially upon the same questions as the present case; and the decision in this case was to determine the others.

L. S. Trowbridge, for libellant.

(1) The question of jurisdiction in cases of supplies furnished in Canada is conclusively settled in the case of The Maggie Hammond, 9 Wall. [76 U. S.] 451. It is not a question of jurisdiction, but of comity. This case was followed by the circuit judge of this circuit in that of The Avon [Case No. 680].

(2) The question of assignment is not free from doubt. The authorities are conflicting, but upon principle the lien should be preserved. In other cases an assignment of the debt carries with it the security, as in case of indorsement of note secured by mortgage. Conceding the lien to be a personal right, why should it be lost by assignment? The want of power to assign by so much lessens the value of the lien. Bossieux, 15 Grat. 98; Tuttle v. Howe, 14 Minn. 145 [Gil. 113]; Goff v. Papin, 34 Mo. 180. It is a general rule well settled that whatever rights of action survive to an executor are assignable. ver, 34 Barb. 330; Hoyt v. Thompson, 1 Selden [5 N. Y.] 320.

F. H. Canfield, for claimant.

(1) This being a proceeding in rem, the jurisdiction depends upon the existence of a lien in favor of the libellant against the tug. The Rock Island Bridge, 6 Wall. [73 U. S.] 213; Gardner v. The New Jersey [Case No. 5,233]; Harmer v. Bell, 7 Moore, P. C. 267; 2 Pars. Shipp. 172 (note 2), 322. A maritime lien is defined in The Young Mechanic [Case No. 18,180]. If the debt in these cases created a lien, that lien existed and was in full force at the moment the supplies were placed on board the vessels while they lay in the Canadian port. If the liens did not exist then and there, they never existed. The Two Ellens, 1 Asp. 208–211. This action being founded in contract, the existence of the lien depends upon the law of Canada—the lex loci contractus. Story, Confl. Law, §§ 321, 322b; Whiston v. Stodder, 8 Mart. (La.) 95, 134; The Avon [supra]; The Peerless, Lush. 30. Whether there was a lien created depends upon the intention of the parties; they contracted with reference to the law of the place, and that law became part of the contract. By the law of Canada no such thing as a maritime lien for supplies exists. It is not merely the want of a court capable of enforcing it. The only expert sworn so testifies. The fact that no such lien exists is fully shown by the authorities. By the law of England no such lien existed till 1840. The Neptune, 3 Knapp, 94; Abb. Shipp. 142–144, and cases cited; The Two Ellens, 1 Asp. 40, 208, 210. By virtue of the conquest, and subsequent acts of the British government, the law of England, as it then existed, became the law of Canada. 1 Cooley, Bl. 108; Baldwin v. Gibbon, Stu. K. B. p. 72; Hamilton v. Fraser, Id. 21; 1 Chit. Commer. Law, 638; Blankard v. Galdy, 4 Mod. 222; 16 Am. St. P. 36; Campbell v. Hall, Cowp. 204; Mitchell v. U. S., 9 Pet. [34 U. S.] 748. The recent English statutes do not apply to Canada. The act of parliament under which the government of Canada was organized, expressly provides that the English statutes shall not apply to the Canadas unless they are named or referred to by necessary intendment. These colonies have full power of local legislation upon this subject. 1 Cooley, Bl. 109; 7 & 8 Wm. III. In 1791 Canada was divided, and in October, 1792, the legislative council of Upper Canada, by express enactment, declared the laws of England should be the rules of decision in all civil cases. See Consol. St. Up. Can. p. 30. The recent English statutes on this subject do not apply to the upper province. It would seem, also, they do not apply to the lower province. See The Australia, Swab. 480–488, where it is held the jurisdiction of the vice-admiralty courts remains as it was previous to 1840. By the law of Canada, full power of legislation is given to its parliament in respect to navigation and shipping. Debates on Confederation of Provinces, p. 1029; Laws Up. Can. 448, 456, 535. The English courts of admiralty, in cases arising in the colonies, are bound by the local law. The Peerless, Lush. 30.

(2) If any lien ever existed it was divested by the assignment of the claim to Johnson. Cross, Liens, 48; The Yankee Blade, 19 How. [60 U. S.] 82; Logan v. The Aeolian [Case No. 8,465]; Rusk v. The Columbus, 23 Mo. 232; The White v. Levy, 5 Eng. (Ark.) 411. Same rule applies to mechanics' liens. Lovett v. Brown, 40 N. H. 511; 2 Kent, Comm. 635, note. The right of stoppage in transitu can only be enforced as between the buyer and seller. Pars. Mer. Law, 60; Siffken v. Wray, 6 East, 371.

L. S. Trowbridge, in reply.

Claimant's counsel assumes the position that by the conquest of Canada the French or civil law was superseded by the law of England. If this position be untenable his whole argument falls to the ground. While under the dominion of France, there is no question that the general maritime law prevailed there, and that by it a lien existed in favor of material-men. The conquest did not alter this, and the same general maritime law prevails there, unless changed by positive enactment. Blackstone, in speaking of the colonies of the mother country, makes a nice distinction between colonies that are established by discovery and those which are gained by conquest. As regards the former, all the laws of the mother country in being at the time of the establishment, are immediately in force in the colonies. "But in conquered or ceded countries, that have already laws of their own, the king may, indeed, alter and change those laws, but till he does actually change them the ancient laws of the country remain, unless such as are against the law of God, as in the case of an infidel country. Our American plantations are principally of this latter sort, being obtained in the last century either by right of conquest and driving out the natives (with what natural justice I shall not inquire), or by treaties. And therefore the common law of England, as such, has no allowance or authority there, they being no part of the mother country, but distinct though dependent dominions." 1 Cooley, Bl. pp. 107, 108. While the opinion of the learned author might be questioned, as to the statement that American colonies (i. e., those not included in the United States) were obtained by conquest, instead of discovery, no question can arise as to the Canadian colonies. The case cited by counsel from Stuart's Lower Canada Reports (page 72), does not conflict with the above. It was there held that the French law was suspended by the conquest, and the establishment of an admiralty court, the very thing which Blackstone says the king can do, but until he does it the ancient law remains. There has been no such act regarding Upper Canada, and the conquest alone would not have the effect to supersede the French law.

(1) The lien exists by the general maritime law, even in the absence of a remedy in rem for its enforcement. Farmer v. Davies, 1 Term R. 109; Rich v. Coe, Cowp. 639; Abb. Shipp. p. 157; The Rebecca [Case No. 11,619]; 3 Kent, Comm. (8th Ed.) 281; The Phoebe [Case No. 11,064]; The China, 7 Wall. [74 U. S.] 68; Dupont de Nemours v. Vance, 19 How. [60 U. S.] 171. (2) The contract of the master here is governed by the general maritime law, and not by the lex loci. Pope v. Nickerson [Case No. 11,274]; Story, Confl. Laws, § 286b; The Nelson, 1 Hagg. Adm. 169, 175, 176.

(3) The act of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, enlarging admiralty jurisdiction, extends to the colonies, though not named, and impliedly repeals the statute of 1792. The Wataga, Swab. 165.

LONGYEAR, District Judge. The argument of respondent's advocate in support of the first ground of defense—that there was no lien by the lex loci contractus, and therefore no right of action in rem in this court—is based upon the following propositions: First. That the laws of France which prevailed in Canada at the time of its conquest by England, and by which there was a lien for necessaries supplied to a ship, had been superseded by the laws of England. Second. That a lien for necessaries supplied to a ship, whether domestic or foreign, never had an existence in England until it was created by act of parliament. Third. That the act of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, § 6 (in 1840), creating a lien in such cases, had no operation in Upper Canada, now province of Ontario, because not so expressly named and provided. Fourth. That such was the state of the law in the province of Ontario in October and November, 1871, when the cause of action in this case arose. The arguments were confined to these propositions, and were conducted on both sides with commendable zeal and ability, and elaborate research. I have also received much aid from an instructive brief of Messrs. H. H. Swan and J. W. Finney, proctors and advocates for libellants in another suit now under advisement, and in which this same question is involved.

It will be seen that the second proposition lies at the foundation of the entire argument; because it is only by maintaining it that the others are of any consequence. The second proposition will therefore be first considered. In considering this proposition, it must be borne in mind that the Champion was a vessel of the United States, and therefore foreign to the place where the necessaries were supplied.

It is too well settled and understood to need citation of authorities or admit of discussion, that, as to domestic vessels, jurisdiction to enforce the lien accorded by the maritime law to material-men, by action in rem in the admiralty or elsewhere, was long since overthrown and denied in England, and the lien itself held never to have had any existence there. Such has hitherto always been the rule in the United States also, where the maritime law was at first adopted as it was administered in England, together with all its inconsistencies and incongruities as applied to the condition of things here. The incongruity of limiting the jurisdiction to tide water has already been abandoned, and has ceased to mar the harmony of the system; and, judging from the recent amendment of admiralty rule 12 by the supreme court, and certain foreshadowings by recent enunciations from the bench of that court, and to which may be added a recent decision by the district court for the eastern district of Missouri, it is evident that this other is about to meet the same fate. Wilson v. Bell, 6 Chi. Leg. N. 261; Taylor v. Com. [Case No. 13,788]. But it is by no means so well settled, although seemingly so understood, that the denial of jurisdiction in the admiralty to enforce liens of material-men extended to necessaries supplied in England to foreign vessels, and much less so in regard to the existence of the lien in such cases. It is true it seems to be assumed by Mr. Abbott, in his excellent work on Shipping (pages 142 to 150), and it was no doubt held by the court of king's bench, that the denial went to that extent, both as to the jurisdiction and the existence of the lien. To my mind, however, it is apparent from the notes to those pages of Abbott, and the cases there cited and commented on, in both text and notes, that the controversy in this respect between the admiralty and common law courts of England, never was entirely settled and determined, the one way or the other; that, in fact, that controversy continued as to foreign vessels, until it was finally disposed of and determined in favor of the admiralty, by the statute of 3 & 4 Vict., supra. The high court of admiralty did not understand the denial to have gone to the extent claimed, certainly as late as 1834. In that year, in the case of The Neptune, 3 Hagg. Adm. 129–140, 8 Eng. Adm., Sir John Nicholl, delivering the opinion of the court, says: "In England, then, the law of nations, of which the lex mercatoria is a branch, forms part of the common law, unless it be altered or controlled by parliament or the municipal courts. It is clear that, by the civil law, and by the general law of other nations, when uncontrolled, persons who have furnished materials for the fitting out of a ship, have a lien upon the ship itself, and, if so, upon the proceeds of the ship. If an English ship were repaired in France or in Holland, material-men might there arrest and enforce payment against the ship itself. How far a foreign ship repaired here might not be subject to the same right is a question into which it is not necessary now to inquire, for the Neptune is a British ship, and in such case the municipal courts of this country have so far departed from the rule of the civil law that they have held that the lien does not extend to the ship itself; and so far, therefore, this court is restrained; but they have not gone further." It is true the Neptune, being a domestic ship, and the repairs having been done in England, and the application in that case being to participate in surplus proceeds, and not a proceeding against the ship itself, the point thus discussed was not directly involved; but what was said none the less shows that, in the opinion of Sir John Nicholl at least, the question of lien for necessaries supplied to a foreign vessel in England had not then passed beyond controversy in her courts. The judgment in that case was afterwards reversed by the privy council (2 Knapp, 84), on the ground that it allowed a party to participate in proceeds who had no lien upon the vessel itself. It became a leading case, and was deemed a final determination of the question of lien for necessaries supplied in England, so far as it related to domestic ships.

The statute of 3 & 4 Vict., supra, must be regarded, I think, as declaratory, or at least as a recognition merely, of what the maritime law then was, so far as concerned the question of lien for necessaries supplied to a foreign ship, whether within the body of a county or upon the high seas, and not as introducing a new principle into English jurisprudence. This, I think, is abundantly evident from the language of the enactment itself, which is as follows: "The high court of admiralty shall have jurisdiction to decide all claims and demands whatsoever in the nature of salvage for services rendered to or damage received by any ship or sea-going vessel, or in the nature of towage, or for necessaries supplied to any foreign ship or sea-going vessel, and to enforce payment thereof, whether such ship or vessel may have been within the body of the county, or upon the high seas, at the time when the services were rendered or damage received or necessaries furnished in respect of which such claim is made." Abb. Shipp. 150. It will be noticed that the act does not purport to create a lien. It leaves that question just where it stood before, and, of course, to be determined by the maritime law. It seems to assume the existence of the lien, and then simply restores to the admiralty a jurisdiction in relation to it, of which it had been deprived by the municipal courts. That this is the light in which that act was regarded by the high court of admiralty is evident by the subsequent decision of that court in at least two cases—one, The Alexander, 1 W. Rob. 288, soon after the act went into operation [holding that the jurisdiction conferred by the act was not confined to cases of necessaries supplied after it went into operation][2] and the other, The Wataga, Swab. 165, at a later period (1856), holding that the jurisdiction conferred by the act extended to claims for necessaries supplied to a foreign vessel in colonial as well as in British ports. In the case of The Alexander the libel was in rem against a Norwegian ship, for necessaries supplied to her in England in 1835, five years before the act went into operation. The jurisdiction of the court was contested on the ground that the act did not affect past claims; but the court held the contrary, and maintained the jurisdiction. In the course of the opinion (page 294), Dr. Lushington said: "Now the action in the case is brought in virtue of the particular statute recently enacted, and without that statute the court would not have been justified in entertaining the suit at all; for, although the subject-matter clearly falls within the original scope of the maritime law, before the passing of the statute, the court might have been prohibited from proceeding in the cause, on the ground that the common law had narrowed the general jurisdiction originally belonging to this court. Such prohibition is now taken off by the statute; but looking to the words of the act, I do not find any expressions limiting the jurisdiction of the court to cases accruing subsequent to the period when the act came into operation." The learned doctor treated the statute simply as an act of delivery of the admiralty from the thraldom in which it had been held by the common law courts; and he maintained the jurisdiction, not because the statute created a lien, or that the claim or cause of action had any foundation in it, but because the lien, claim, and cause of action clearly fell "within the original scope of the maritime law," and had their foundation in it. I consider the learned doctor's position entirely sound, and am not aware that its soundness has ever been questioned. In the case of The Wataga, the application was for payment out of the proceeds of an American ship for necessaries supplied to her in 1856, at the Cape of Good Hope, a British possession—the case being, in its incidents, almost identical with the one now under consideration. The application was opposed on the ground that the statute of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, § 6, was not intended to apply to the case of necessaries supplied to a foreign ship in a port at a distance from England, though a British possession. But Dr. Lushington, by whom this case was also decided, held otherwise, and maintained the jurisdiction. The decision in that case would maintain the jurisdiction in this in that same court. At the close of the opinion (page 167), and after quite fully discussing the object and purposes of this act, he throws out the following significant intimation: "This claim must be maintained; but I am by no means clear, even if I am mistaken on the point of colonial ports, that it could not be supported under the narrower interpretation."

The high court of admiralty seems in fact never to have relinquished its claim, that under the general maritime law there was a lien for supplies, whether to domestic or foreign vessels, or whether within the body of a country or upon the high seas, only so that they were necessary and were furnished upon the credit of the ship. It simply surrendered to the superior jurisdiction and powers of the common law courts, and ceased to exercise the jurisdiction to enforce the lien. When parliament in part took off the prohibition imposed by the common law courts, by the statute of 3 & 4 Vict., the high court of admiralty to that extent simply resumed that which it had all along claimed as its right, and proceeded at once to enforce a lien which it assumed, and no doubt rightfully, had simply been in abeyance. That the lien for necessaries supplied to a ship, recognized by the general maritime law, always existed in England as to foreign ships, before as well as after the act of 3 & 4 Vict., was assumed by our courts from the earliest period of the exercise of admiralty jurisdiction here, for while adopting in the main, the admiralty jurisprudence of England as there exercised, the supreme court of the United States from the beginning assumed and fully recognized the existence of the maritime lien for necessaries supplied to a foreign ship in all cases, and the jurisdiction of the federal admiralty courts to enforce it. See General Admiralty Rule 12. This rule, from the beginning, and all through its various modifications by amendments or otherwise, has always assumed the existence of the lien, and provided for its enforcement. This has always been true of it as to foreign ships, and recently it has been so amended as to drop all distinction in that regard. Maritime liens for necessaries supplied in England to a foreign ship, I am satisfied, have always had an existence there. Jurisdiction to enforce them was alone prohibited. It is well settled, however, that want of jurisdiction to enforce a lien in any particular locality is not fatal to the existence of the lien itself. The lien exists by virtue of the maritime law, and it follows the ship wherever she goes, and may be enforced wherever there is a jurisdiction to enforce it. The Maggie Hammond, 9 Wall. [76 U. S.] 435, 451; The Avon [Case No. 680]. And this applies as well to the objection that there is no jurisdiction to enforce a maritime lien in the province of Ontario, where the cause of action arose. The question of lien in this case, therefore, in the absence of any positive enactment to the contrary, must be determined by the general maritime law, and by that law there was a lien, and also jurisdiction in this court to enforce it. No object on was made that the necessaries in question were not supplied upon the high seas, or upon tide water, as those terms are understood in English admiralty jurisprudence, and that therefore there could be no lien; it is therefore unnecessary to consider it. The omission of learned counsel to make that objection was undoubtedly for the very good reason that since the decision of the United States supreme court in the case of The Eagle, 8 Wall. [75 U. S.] 15, and of the United States circuit court for the northern district of Ohio, by Emmons, circuit judge, in the case of The Avon [supra], that objection has no longer any force in our court. This may be said to be especially so under the authority of the supreme court in the case of The Eagle, supra, in a case like the present, arising upon the great boundary waters between this country and British North America, constituting as they do great national thoroughfares, international in their character, and common to the vessels of both countries. There are many decisions of the admiralty courts of the United States which have a bearing upon the questions presented by the defense here under consideration; but it would serve no useful purpose to enter into an analysis of them here. A few of the leading ones, as far as I have taken the time to examine them, are, however, here cited: The Eagle, 8 Wall. [75 U. S.] 15; The Maggie Hammond, 9 Wall. [76 U. S.] 435, 451; The Avon [supra]; The Rebecca [Case No. 11,619]; The Phebe [Id. 11,064]; Dupont de Nemours v. Vance, 19 How. [60 U. S.] 171; The Boston [Case No. 1,669]; The Siren, 7 Wall. [74 U. S.] 156, 158; The Jerusalem [Case No. 7,394]; The Chusan [Id. 2,717]; Pope v. Nickerson [Id. 11,274]. See, also, Abb. Shipp. 142–150; 2 Kent, Comm. (8th Ed.) 281; 2 Pars. Shipp. & Adm. 322; Story, Confl. Law, § 286c.

The second proposition of the argument in support of the first ground of defense, viz., that there was no lien, and therefore no right of action in rem in this case, is not sustained; and with that the whole superstructure of the argument in support of that defense falls.

2d. The lien and jurisdiction to enforce it being maintained in favor of the original creditor, was the lien divested by the assignment of the claim? Upon authority, I am clear that this question must be answered in the affirmative. It has been so held in every case in the federal admiralty courts to which my attention has been called, in which the discussion was not evidently influenced by special circumstances. In the case of The Patchin [Case No. 10,794], Judge Conklin, in a well-reasoned opinion, so held in regard to mariners' wages. He notices a distinction between liens for wages and upon bottomry bonds and bills of lading, which are assignable, on the grounds that the bond is an express hypothecation, and binds the ship to the lender and his assigns; and that the bill of lading is negotiable, made so by law for the benefit of trade, and its transfer carries with it the title to the goods shipped, and of course the right to maintain a suit upon it in case of their loss; while, on the contrary, the right of the mariner to proceed against the ship in specie, is conferred upon him for his own exclusive benefit, and arises by implication merely. He held that liens of the latter character are strictly personal. He recognizes that the claim or debt may be lawfully transferred, but holds that the lien does not follow. In the case of Reppert v. Robinson [Id. 11,703], the libel was in personam for repairs and supplies. In delivering his opinion, Chief Justice Taney said: "But if it appeared upon the proceedings that when the suit was brought Hamilton held this due bill as assignee, and the proceedings were instituted for his benefit, I do not think the admiralty jurisdiction could have been maintained; the right to sue in admiralty upon claims of this description is personal, and is maintained upon principles and for reasons which do not apply to the assignee." Certainly if no jurisdiction in personam, there can be none in rem. In the case of Sturtevant v. The George Nicholaus [Id. 13,578], the libel was in rem for salvage, and Judge McCaleb held that the same rule applies to liens for salvage as to those for wages, and that they are not assignable, citing, with approbation, Judge Conkling's opinion in The Patchin, supra. In the cases of Logan v. The Aeolian [Id. 8,465], and Rusk v. The Freestone [Id. 12,143], the libels were in rem for wages, and Judge Leavitt held the same as Judge Conkling in The Patchin and Judge McCaleb in The Freestone. These are all the cases in the federal admiralty courts in which this doctrine has been maintained, to which my attention has been called, or that have fallen under my notice. There are, however, several cases in state courts, arising mostly under state statutes, conferring liens where none existed by the maritime law, and in favor of mechanics and others, in which the same doctrine has been held. Pearsons v. Tincker, 36 Me. 384, 386; Hays v. The Columbus, 23 Mo. 233; Lovett v. Brown, 40 N. H. 511; The White v. Levy, 5 Eng. (Ark.) 411.

The cases in the federal admiralty courts which seem to hold the opposite doctrine will now be considered. In the case of The Boston [Case No. 1,669], the libel was in rem for repairs, and Judge Betts held that an assignee of the debt for a full consideration, who became such at the express instance of the master, was entitled to all the legal remedies possessed by the original creditors, including the right to proceed against the vessel. There can be no doubt that the fact that the transfer was made at the express instance of the master, had its influence, although it is not so stated in the opinion. At all events, it affords a reasonable explanation for the difference of opinion between the learned judge and the others whose opinions have been cited. In the case of The General Jackson [Id. 5,314], the libel was in rem for supplies, and Judge Sprague held that "the assignment of the claim, as security for a debt which has since been paid, would not of itself be a waiver of the lien." What his opinion would have been [if the debt had not been paid, or][3] if the assignment had been absolute instead of for security merely, the case does not inform us. These are all the cases in the federal admiralty courts to which my attention has been called, or which have fallen under my notice, which even seem to hold that the lien is not divested by the assignment of the debt; and as to each of these cases it is to be observed that the decision was evidently influenced by special considerations.

As on the other side of the question, so here there are also several state decisions, based in like manner on state statutes, holding the same way as the judgments last cited. Hoyt v. Thompson, 5 N. Y. 320, 327; Sears v. Conover, 34 Barb. 330; Sorley v. Brewer, 1 Daly, 79; Iaege v. Bossieux, 15 Grat. 83, 88; Goff v. Papin, 32 Mo. 180; Tuttle v. Howe, 14 Minn. 145 [Gil. 113]. It is seen, therefore, that the decisions of our own admiralty courts upon this question are substantially all one way; and they fully sustain the position that the lien which a material-man has is strictly personal to himself, and does not pass to his assignee; that it is, in fact, extinguished by the assignment of his claim, so that neither he nor his assignee can come into a court of admiralty for its enforcement. I have not the time to devote to a discussion of the soundness of those decisions. It has, however, been so fully done by the learned judges in the opinions I have cited that there really does not appear to be much left to be said upon the subject. Even if I doubted the soundness of those decisions, I should hesitate long before venturing an opinion in opposition to so formidable an array of experience, learning and ability. At all events, I should not do so except for cogent and conclusive reasons. Until overruled by higher authority, the rule of those cases will be the rule of decision in this court. In England the question does not seem to have been much discussed as applied to maritime liens; at all events not sufficiently to have established a rule upon the subject. See Cross, Liens, 48 (18 Law Lib.), as to assignments of liens in general, and The Wasp, L. R. 1 Adm. & Ecc. 367, as to assignments of maritime liens.

The proofs in this case showed that before this suit was brought, libellant had sold and transferred his claim to Johnson & Co., and that the suit was instituted by them, in libellant's name, but for their benefit. The lien was thereby lost, and the suit cannot be maintained. In this view of the case a consideration and decision of respondents' third ground of defense has become unnecessary. Libel dismissed.

[NOTE. The question of the assignability of maritime liens is examined at length by Judge Lowell in the case of The Sarah J. Weed, Case No. 12,350, and upon principle and authority he dissents from the doctrine of the principal case, and those upon which it is based, and maintains that such liens are assignable. In that case, too, the lien was one for supplies. Prior to that time an assignment of a lien for advances had been sustained by Judge Betts, in The Panama, Id. 10,703. The Sarah J. Weed was followed in the case of The American Eagle, 19 Fed. 879, which involved a lien for supplies, and in The M. Vandercook, 24 Fed. 472, which was a case of lien for salvage. See, also, to the same effect, The Norfolk, Case No. 10,297; Murdock v. The Emma Graham, Id. 9,940; and The Liberty No. 4, 7 Fed. 226, in which, however, in addition to the assignment, there was held to be a right of subrogation. In the case of The Woodland, 104 U. S. 180, the supreme court seems to assume that parties who discount a draft given by the master or owners in payment for repairs, etc., furnished to his vessel in distress, would be entitled to enforce the same against the vessel; but the court decided as a matter of fact that the drawee had been reimbursed by sales of cargo, that the drafts were fraudulent, and that consequently no lien had ever existed. Upon this subject the court says: "It is incumbent on the libellants to prove a debt from the vessel to Niles [the drawee], and its amount. Until this proof is made they cannot recover. If the settlement between the master and Niles had not been impeached, that would have been enough, for the master is the agent of the owner for all purposes. But it has been impeached," etc. In The Pride of America, 19 Fed. 607, it was held that where a maritime lien attaches to a vessel, and her owner gives a draft for the debt, the draft in terms recognizing, confirming, and continuing the lien, an assignee of the draft and claim can enforce the lien against the vessel; citing, as authority, The Woodland, supra.]

SEAMAN'S WAGES—FOREIGN VESSEL—SHIPKEEPER'S LIEN.

1. Where a Canadian vessel is in custody of the marshal, upon a claim made by an American citizen, the court will take jurisdiction of an intervening libel filed by one of her seamen, notwithstanding his contract is made and performed in Canada, and all the parties are British subjects.

2. As the lien of the seaman exists by the general maritime law, the courts of this country will enforce such a lien arising in Canada, notwithstanding the absence of admiralty courts there.

3. There is no lien for services as shipkeeper while the vessel is laid up during the winter.

[See The A. R. Dunlap, Case No. 513; The Amstel, Id. 339. But, contra, see The Windermere, 2 Fed. 722; The Erinagh, 7 Fed. 231; The Hattie M. A. 313, 57 Fed. 224; The Hattie Thomas, 59 Fed. 297.]

4. Where a party shipped as seaman in the spring, served as such during the season of navigation, and then remained on board during the winter, keeping the ship: Held, that he could recover as seaman, only for his services during the season of navigation though no new contract was made.

In admiralty. The libel claimed for services as seaman and cook for one year, at the rate of sixteen dollars per month, but it appeared that, after the close of navigation and until libellant was discharged, his services were those of a shipkeeper. The answer set forth that the Champion was a Canadian vessel; that libellant and the owners of the vessel were residents of Ontario; that the contract was made in Canada, and insisted that the same was to be construed and governed by the laws of that dominion, and that no lien exists under these laws for services as seaman; that these services were rendered upon the sole credit of the owner of the vessel; that there is no admiralty court in the province of Ontario, and that the laws of said province do not recognize a lien for any of the services set forth in the libel. The facts were, that libellant was employed from March 26th, 1874, to March 26th, 1875; that he served as deck hand three weeks, and during the remainder of the season of navigation as cook, and occasionally as deck hand; and after the vessel, laid up, without discharge or change of wages, he continued on the vessel as shipkeeper to the end of the year. All the services were rendered under a single contract of hiring. The services were continuous, and small sums were paid from time to time, amounting altogether to twenty-five dollars. The contract of hiring was made in Canada, and the vessel plied between Canadian ports, touching occasionally at American ports.

Moore & Moore, for libellant.
F. H. Canfield, for claimants.

BROWN, District Judge. At the time this libel was filed, the vessel was in custody of the marshal upon another libel, filed by an American citizen for repairs put upon her in this state. Although libellant would not have been entitled to this remedy in Canada, and although as a general rule, I should decline to take jurisdiction of controversies between Canadian subjects, especially where the contract was made and performed in Canada, I think there is no objection to doing so, (at least in the absence of a consular protest), where the vessel is already in custody, and the libel is filed to enable the seamen to obtain pay from the proceeds of sale; in such case, it would be manifestly unjust to send the seaman back to a foreign country, when the court which has taken possession of the vessel is able to afford him relief here.

The principal defense to this claim was made upon the theory that inasmuch as there are no admiralty courts in the province of Ontario, it follows that the seaman has no lien upon his vessel; that liens are creatures of local law, and that he can obtain no lien by proceeding in the admiralty courts of this country. I think this objection, however, is completely disposed of by the reasoning in the case of The Maggie Hammond, 9 Wall. [76 U. S.] 435, and in The Avon [Case No. 680]. A distinction is taken in both these cases between liens existing by the law maritime, and those which are mere creatures of local legislation. The former are held to exist everywhere, unless expressly excluded by statute, and the absence of local admiralty courts will not prevent the courts of another country from exercising admiralty jurisdiction, and enforcing them, but, as observed by the supreme court in the former case (page 451), "Where the lien exists only by some local statute, and is not given by the maritime law, admiralty courts in another jurisdiction can no more take jurisdiction of a case, not within the local statute, than the courts of the country could do where the cause of action arose; but where the lien is given by the maritime law, the question in such a case, in the admiralty courts of the United States, is not one of jurisdiction, but of comity," etc. Again, "maritime liens are of little or no value, in a country where there are no appropriate tribunals for their enforcement, as they must remain dormant and unavailable, but the denial of such jurisdiction to her admiralty courts, by one country, whether it be by legislation or by the prohibitions of her common law courts, cannot have the effect to impair or diminish the jurisdiction in such cases of the admiralty courts of any other country, if they are legally clothed with the power and authority to enforce such remedies for the breach of a maritime contract." In this case, the court enforced the lien of the owner of a cargo upon the vessel, under the maritime law, notwithstanding the libellant and claimant were both foreigners; the place of shipping and of consignment foreign ports, and the whole ground of libel a matter which occurred abroad. In the case of The Avon [supra] a libel in rem was sustained for a collision in the Welland canal, notwithstanding the fact that a lien for such a cause of action could not be enforced in any of the Canadian courts, and it was denied that any such lien existed. The case was reasoned with great elaborateness, and contained all the authorities up to that time, bearing upon the question. See, also, The Champion [Case No. 2,583]. In the subsequent case of The Moxhan, L. R. 1 Prob. Div. 107, also 3 Asp. Marit. Law Cas. 191, it was held by the court of appeals, reversing in that respect the decree of the high court of admiralty that the question of liability of a ship owner proceeded against in an English admiralty court, for an injury done by his ship to a pier projecting into the sea, but standing upon the soil of a foreign country, is governed by the lex loci, and not by the English law; and where an English ship, by negligence of her master and crew, ran into and damaged a pier on the coast of Spain, and the owners of the pier proceeded against the ship for the damage in an admiralty court, and the defendant pleaded that by the law of Spain a ship owner is not responsible for damage occasioned by the negligence of the ship master and crew, the plea was held good. This case was not only in tort, but it appeared affirmatively that there was not a mere absence of a court to enforce a lien, but that the courts of the country had expressly excluded the existence of a lien for this cause of action, although a lien was given in such cases by the local law of England, the same rule would undoubtedly obtain here. Indeed, it was decided by this court, in the case of The Ottawa [Case No. 10,616], that no lien existed for damage done to a pier. But inasmuch as the lien of the seaman exists, by the general law maritime, and the defense is set up, not that the laws of Canada exclude such lien, but simply that they have provided no court for its enforcement, I deem it a clear inference, from the cases above cited, that the libellant may enforce his lien upon the vessel in this court.

Notwithstanding some conflict of authority, I think the better rule is, that a shipkeeper, particularly of a domestic vessel, has no lien upon her for wages, by the general maritime law. It was so decided by Judge Lowell in the case of The Island City [Case No. 7,109], following in this respect Phillips v. The Thomas Scattergood [Id. 11,106], Gilpin, J.; Weaver v. The S. G. Owens [Id. 17,310]. See, also, The John T. Moore [Id. 7,430]. In the case of The Trimountain [Id. 14,175], the court allowed a watchman for his fees before she was taken into custody by the marshal, giving as a reason that that constituted one of the privileged demands of the maritime law, as administered under the ordinance of Louis XVI., and was so ranked in the Code de Commerce. In the case of The Dolphin [Id. 3,973], I held that the underwriter had a claim on that vessel for his premiums, following in this respect French law. But the supreme court had already determined the contract of insurance to be a maritime contract, and it seemed to me the lien followed naturally upon this decision, and inasmuch as the civil law conferred the lien, I considered myself at liberty to adopt it. I did not intend, however, to decide that the courts of this country, would give a lien in every case where it was given by the Commercial Code of France; indeed, many of these liens, particularly those for the wages of the master, for supplies furnished for domestic vessels, and for the expense of building and equipping, have been held by the supreme court not to exist in this country. Where the contract is maritime, I should be very reluctant to deny the lien, but where, as in this case, the services are rendered, not in aid of the navigation of the vessel, but while she is laid up for the winter, it seems to me the service is not maritime, and consequently that the party is not entitled to his lien.

Nor do I think the lien is saved in this case, because no new contract was made, but the party remained on board during the winter, without having been paid in the fall for his services, as cook. Had his services as watchman been performed merely as an incident to the navigation of the vessel, and while she was lying up in some port, it would have been saved, by the rulings in such cases as The Gazelle [Case No. 5289]; Pittman v. Hooper [Id. 11,185]; Brown v. Lull [Id. 2,018]; The Jane and Matilda, 1 Hagg. Adm. 187; The Sloop Canton [Case No. 2,388]. But the contract as a cook and seaman terminated with the season of navigation and with the discharges of the crew, and if libellant remained on board while the vessel was laid up in winter quarters, he must be held to have remained, by implication, under a different contract, although no new contract was actually made, circumstances had intervened, which put an end to the first contract, and he must be held to know that if he remained on board during the winter, it was not in the capacity of a seaman or cook.

Inasmuch as the time when the vessel was laid up, does not clearly appear, the libellant is entitled to recover for his wages as seaman and cook, at sixteen dollars per month, from the 26th of March to the 1st of December, which, in absence of evidence to the contrary, I would hold to be the close of navigation.

PRACTICE—RULE TO SHOW CAUSE OF ACTION.

On a rule on plaintiff to show his cause of action, who thereupon files a positive affidavit of the debt, the court will not order the party making the affidavit to be examined on oath in court; no ground appearing to the court to justify a suspicion that the debt was not due.

Rule on the plaintiff to show cause of action, and why the defendant should not appear on common bail.

Mahany, for plaintiff, showed cause, by reading the positive affidavit of the plaintiff, that the action is founded on certain promissory notes due by the defendant to the plaintiff, as assignee.

Scott, for defendant, moved to examine the plaintiff in court, as he doubted the fairness of the assignment.

BY THE COURT. The affidavit of the plaintiff, being positive, and no ground appearing to the court to justify the suspicion entertained by the counsel, the rule must be discharged.

CHAMPLIN v. TILLEY et al.

[1 Brunner, Col. Cas. 71;[1] 3 Day (Conn.) 303.]

Circuit Court, D. Connecticut. 1809.

FOREIGN EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS — RIGHTS AND POWERS OF—EVIDENCE — ADMISSIBILITY OF LETTERS TO DENY PARTNERSHIP — PARTNERSHIP—BOOK ACCOUNT AS EVIDENCE OF —JOINT CONTRACT—EFFECT OF JUDGMENT ON.

1. Letters testamentary issued under the authority of one state are not available in another. But if to an action brought by an executor, on a cause of action arising in the lifetime of the testator, the defendant plead the general issue, the plaintiff cannot be required on the trial to produce any letters testamentary.

2. In an action against A. and B. as partners on a contract executed in the partnership name, A. suffered a default, and B. pleaded the general issue; held, that letters written by A. in the partnership name could not be read in evidence by B. to show that he was not a partner with A.

3. In such case an account book containing entries made by A. and B. may go to the jury as evidence of a partnership.

4. In an action on a joint contract against two, where one has suffered a default and the other has obtained a verdict, judgment must be entered up for both.

The plaintiff [Christopher Gibbs Champlin, as executor of Christopher Champlin] in his declaration stated "that at New Port the defendants [James Tilley and William Tilley], by said William Tilley, purchased of said deceased a quantity of hemp, to be manufactured at their rope factory in New London, on a credit of four months, and to secure payment thereof the defendants, at said New Port, by said William

Tilley, one of said firm and company, and then joint mechanic and trader with said James Tilley as aforesaid, made, executed, and to said deceased, then in full life, delivered a certain writing or promissory note, in the words and figures following, viz:—"We, William Tilley & Company, of New London, promise to pay Christopher Champlin of New Port, or his order, within four months from the date hereof, five hundred and eighty dollars, value received. Witness our hands, New Port, January 31st, 1804. William Tilley & Co. Witness, George G. Whitehorne." When the cause came on for trial, William Tilley, who had failed and absconded, was defaulted; James Tilley, the father of William, and a man of property, appeared and pleaded non assumpsit.

Daggett, for defendants, called upon the plaintiff's counsel for evidence that the plaintiff was executor to the deceased. He said that unless this were shown there was no propriety in proceeding any farther in the cause. He stated, at the same time, that no letters testamentary issued by any authority out of the state of Connecticut could be admitted as evidence before the courts of this state, according to the decision of the supreme court of errors, at their last session in Hartford. Vide Riley v. Riley, 3 Day, 74.

Goddard, for plaintiff, replied that he was somewhat surprised by the motion, though he apprehended that the defendant was too late with it, and that advantage ought to have been taken by plea in abatement, as the want of lawful appointment to be executor is a disqualification to sue in this case.

Before LIVINGSTON, Circuit Justice, and EDWARDS, District Judge.

LIVINGSTON, Circuit Justice, having inquired whether there was a profert of letters testamentary, was answered in the negative and that it was not common in our practice to make such a profert, the mere naming the plaintiff as executor being considered as sufficient to enable the defendant to plead ne unques executor.

His honor then observed that it must undoubtedly be good law that letters testamentary should be used only within the jurisdiction under which they were issued, and that he should have no doubt, in a proper stage of the proceeding, as to requiring the production of such letters issued under the authority of the state of Connecticut; and he did not see but the plaintiff in this case must produce his claim to the character of executor, if the defendant required it.

At the request of the plaintiff's counsel, the question was permitted to rest till afternoon, as he wished to look at authorities, that he might be able to show that the defendant was too late in his motion. This was assented to by the court.

At the opening of the court in the afternoon, Goddard proceeded to show that on a plea of non assumpsit, when the case is entered upon before the jury, it is too late to call for letters testamentary. He cited, as in point, Peake, Ev. (Last Ed.) 342, and Marsfield v. Marsh, 2 Ld. Raym. 824.

Daggett, in reply, stated that in Edwards v. Stapleton, Cro. Eliz. 551, Browning v. Fuller, Cro. Jac. 299, and Cutts v. Bennet, Id. 409, it was decided that a profert of letters testamentary is matter of substance. The reason of these decisions must be because the plaintiff may be called upon to prove them to be legal and genuine.

THE COURT said that they were satisfied by the authorities read by Mr. Goddard that the plaintiff could not be called upon in this stage of the proceeding to prove his claim to the character of executor.

LIVINGSTON, Circuit Justice, said that he was of a different opinion in the morning, but was convinced by the authorities. As to the cases read by Mr. Daggett from Cro. Eliz. and Cro. Jac., it might well be matter of substance that profert of letters testamentary should be made; that the plea of ne unques executor may be tendered, while, nevertheless, the plaintiff could not be compelled to prove himself executor on trial to the jury.

In the course of the trial to the jury, the counsel for the defendant read several letters from the testator, Christopher Champlin, to the defendant, from which it appeared that the testator did not consider the defendant, James Tilley, as a member of the firm of William Tilley & Co. In one of these letters, six other letters purporting to be written by William Tilley & Co., and promising payment, were enclosed; and with them, the note on which this action was brought. The counsel for the defendant were proceeding to read these enclosed letters; but an objection being made,

THE COURT said that the letters, whether written by William Tilley or not, were entirely irrelevant; though the letters of the testator were good evidence to prove that he did not suppose James Tilley to be a partner.

An account book was produced by the plaintiffs to prove that James Tilley was connected with his son William in business. In this book two entries were found in the handwriting of James Tilley, many in the hand of William Tilley, and some in the hand of other persons.

The counsel for the defendant objected to reading to the jury any charges made in the hand of William Tilley.

BY THE COURT. The book must go to the jury, as it has been proved, and indeed conceded, that James Tilley made a few entries in it. The jury are to decide whether the book, as it is, amounts to any proof of partnership.

The jury found a verdict for the defendant.

His counsel then moved that judgment should be entered up for both defendants, though one of them had been defaulted.

THE COURT said this was the correct mode of proceeding; for if the jury had found that one defendant assumed and promised, and the other did not, judgment must have been entered up for both, the declaration being founded on a joint promise only.

NOTE. Parties—Objection to, When must be Made. Any objection to the character of the parties must be made, if at all, at an early stage in the cause; it is of a preliminary nature and cannot be raised on the general issue. See Bank v. Ford, 27 Conn. 289; Bank v. Church, 29 Conn. 148, citing case in text. As to foreign administrators and executors as parties, and their rights and powers, see Curtis v. Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. May Term, 1841.

FEES OF CUSTOMS OFFICERS—PAYMENT BY COLLECTOR—ACT OF MARCH 2, 1799.

1. The act of 2d of March, 1799 [1 Stat. 627], c. 129 (amended by the act of 1816 [3 Stat. 306], c. 95), authorizes the collector to pay the fees due to the officers of the customs, out of the revenue of the United States. Held, that this act creates no lien or specific claim on moneys in his hands, arising from the revenue.

2. That an ex-collector, who is not in office, cannot lawfully appropriate the moneys of the United States, in his hands, to such a payment; for the act is an official act, and the authority can be exercised only by the collector actually in office.

At law. Assumpsit for money had and received. The case came before the court upon a statement of facts agreed upon by the parties. It was as follows: The plaintiff [John Champney] was a weigher and gauger in the custom house at Boston, before and from January 1st, 1838, to March 31st, 1841. The defendant [George Bancroft] was collector during that period. From January 1st, 1838, to July 7th, 1838, the plaintiff was paid $125 a month, besides his official expenses, as his fees, and the defendant refused to pay him any more. If his compensation during that period was to be measured by the acts of 1799, c. 129, § 2, and 1816, c. 95, he would have been entitled to receive $724.96 6-7 in addition, and this sum he demands. From July 7th, 1838, to the close of the year, the plaintiff was paid for his fees, $125 a month, besides his official expenses. The plaintiff claims $750 in addition, to make up the sum of $1,500, for that period. More than that sum would have accrued under the acts of 1799 and 1816. In the year 1839, no act was passed, limiting the fees of weighers and gaugers, and the plaintiff was paid according to the two acts of 1799 and 1816, which exceeded $1,500, after deducting official expenses. From the 1st of January, 1840, to the 21st of July, in that year, the plaintiff received his fees, according to the acts of 1799 and 1816, which exceeded the rate of $1,500 per annum, after deducting official expenses. From the 21st of July, 1840, to the close of the year, the plaintiff was paid $125 monthly, besides official expenses. He claims a further payment of $513.45 3-7, for that period. The plaintiff rendered quarterly accounts, charging the fees at the rate at which they were paid to him, and yearly abstracts, which were sent to the comptroller, and the defendant regularly rendered his accounts for the years 1838, 1839, and 1840, to the comptroller, containing the same payments, which were regularly audited and passed. The plaintiff gave monthly receipts for said payments "on account" or "towards" his compensation, and made no protest of his demand for further compensation. But it is agreed, that the defendant had refused to allow anything more than was paid. The defendant resigned his office, and the resignation took effect March 31st, 1841. On the 31st of March, 1841, the plaintiff made an abstract of his services, for the period between January 1st, 1838, and June 7th, 1838, and demanded the balance of $724.96 6-7, upon which the defendant certified in writing as follows:—"Collector's Office, District of Boston and Charlestown. I hereby certify, that the foregoing abstract is a true copy from the records of this office. On a strict construction of the law, the collector would seem to have been authorized to pay the whole amount. I prefer, however, to leave it for the decision of the comptroller. The law of limitation did not pass till after the above balance had accrued. Signed, George Bancroft, Collector." Upon the foregoing facts, the case is submitted for the opinion of the court; and judgment is to be entered accordingly.

Mr. Rantoul, for plaintiff.

Mr. Dexter, Dist. Atty., for defendant.

Mr. Rantoul cited U. S. v. Duvall [Case No. 15,015]; U. S. v. Dickson, 15 Pet. [40 U. S.] 161; and Act April 26, 1816, c. 95.

STORY, Circuit Justice. The act of March 2, 1799 [1 Stat. 627], c. 22, amended by the act of 1816, c. 95, authorizes the fees, due to the officers of the customs, "to be paid by the collector out of the revenue, and to be charged to the United States." But upon the statement of facts, I am very clear, that the present action for money had and received is not maintainable for several reasons. In the first place, the defendant (Bancroft) is not now in office; and even if he had moneys of the United States in his hands, he could not now lawfully appropriate them to the payment of the fees, if any are due to the plaintiff, since it is an official act, and can be properly done only by the collector, who is actually in office. In the next place, the moneys of the United States in the hands of the collector, arising from the revenue, are not specifically appropriated by law to the payment of these particular fees, so as to create a lien or claim thereon in favor of any officer; but a mere authority is given to the collector to pay them out of the moneys of the United States, arising from the revenue, in his hands. If he does not pay the fees, the claim remains valid against the government, and the new collector is now at liberty to pay them, if they are properly chargeable. I give no opinion whatsoever upon the question, whether the claim of the plaintiff for fees is valid or not. That is not a point necessary for the present decision. Plaintiff nonsuited.

COLLISION AT SEA — SHIP AND FISHING VESSEL—VESSEL AT ANCHOR—FOG—SIGNALS—SPEED.

1. The schooner B., an American fishing vessel, while at anchor on the Grand Bank of Newfoundland, was run down in a dense fog by the ship C. and sunk, on the 22d of September, 1866. The ship was going at the rate of about six knots an hour, under full sail except studding sails, and a fog horn was being blown upon her, at intervals of about ten seconds. No horn was blown or bell rung on the schooner during the day of the collision, till after the horn of the ship was heard, when a horn was blown, and, on hearing a second blast from the ship's horn, the horn was again blown and then a bell was rung. On hearing the horn from the schooner, the ship's wheel was ordered to be put to port, and had been got about half over to port, when the bell was heard, and it was ordered to be put hard-a-starboard, but before it was got half way over to starboard the collision occurred: Held, that usually, in a suit in rem for collision, the first question is, whether the vessel sued was in fault, and not till that fact is established does the inquiry arise whether the libellant's vessel was in fault.

2. The schooner being at anchor was grossly in fault, in not sounding her bell, as required by article 10 of the regulations for preventing collisions, and in blowing a horn on hearing the horn from the ship.

[Cited in The Scotia, Case No. 12,513.]

3. In view of the sounds she heard from the schooner, the manoeuvres of the ship were the proper ones.

4. These violations of the law by the schooner being shown, the burden of proof was upon her to show that the collision was in no degree owing to them.

5. The requirement of article 10, of the regulations for preventing collisions, that a bell shall be sounded at least every five minutes, whenever there is a fog, means, that, in any case, the bell must be sounded as often as once in five minutes, and as much oftener as the special circumstances of the case shall require.

6. The speed of vessels in a fog should be moderate.

[Cited in The Hansa, Case No. 6,037.]

7. The burden of proof was upon the schooner to show that the collision was owing to too great speed on the part of the ship; and, this not being shown affirmatively, the schooner alone was liable for the collision.

[In admiralty. Libel by the owners of the schooner Bride against the ship Chancellor for damages for the loss of the schooner by collision.]

J. H. Choate, for libellant.

W. R. Beebe and C. Donohue, for claimant.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. The schooner Bride, an American fishing vessel, owned by the libellant and one Henry B. Taylor, who was her master, and was on board of her, as such, at the time, was at anchor on the Grand Bank of Newfoundland, on the 22d of September, 1866, in the pursuit of her business as a fishing vessel, in a dense fog, when, at about twenty minutes past four o'clock in the afternoon of that day, she was run down and sunk by the ship Chancellor, then on a voyage from New York to Liverpool. The starboard side of the schooner was struck by the stem of the ship, and, of ten persons composing the company of the schooner, all perished but one. This suit is brought to recover the sum of $8,400 as damages for the loss of the schooner and her outfit, and of the fish and oil on board of her at the time. The interest which belonged to Taylor has become vested in the libellant.

There are several facts in the case which are undisputed. The wind at the time was from south south-west to south-west, blowing a moderate breeze. The ship was heading east by south half south, the wind being, therefore, from half a point to two points and a half abaft the beam of the ship on her starboard side. The fog had been prevailing for four or five days, and was so thick that nothing could be seen more than half the length of the ship ahead. The ship was on her starboard tack, under all her canvas except her studding sails, and going about six knots an hour, and a fog horn was being blown upon her at intervals of about ten seconds, by a lookout man who was stationed on the top gallant forecastle. There were two men at her wheel, the master was standing on the starboard quarter near the wheel, and had been there for about half an hour before the collision, and the officers and crew were all of them on deck. There were four officers and twenty-eight men before the mast. The latitude of the ship, at noon that day, was 45° 30′ north, and her longitude at the same time was, by dead reckoning, about 49° west. The schooner had anchored at the place where she was struck, on the previous evening. She was in about thirty fathoms of water, and at a point between thirty and forty miles to the southward of the eastern shoals of the Grand Bank of Newfoundland.

The libel avers, that, as soon as the proximity of the ship was known or suspected on board of the schooner, the master of the schooner blew loud blasts upon a horn, and her mate rang loudly a bell upon her forecastle. The answer avers, that it is the custom, on the Grand Banks, in fogs, for vessels under way to blow, at intervals of fifteen or twenty seconds, a fog horn, and for vessels at anchor to sound, at intervals of a few seconds, a bell, and in that way give notice to approaching vessels as to whether they are under way or at anchor; that the ship had a full watch on deck, with two men at the wheel, and a competent lookout; that a fog horn was sounded on board at intervals of from ten to fifteen seconds; that, while the ship was sailing through the fog, a horn was heard ahead, and, as the sound indicated, a little on the starboard bow; that the wheel of the ship was then put to port, no object being at the time visible ahead; and that, by the time the wheel had been put half way down, a bell was heard, and almost immediately the schooner loomed up ahead in the fog and at anchor, and the wheel was at once ordered to be put hard a-starboard, but, before the order could be fully obeyed, and the course of the ship be changed, she came in contact with the schooner.

Ordinarily, in a suit in rem for a collision, the first inquiry to be made is, whether the vessel sued was in fault, and not until it is established on the part of the libellant, that the vessel sued was in fault, does any inquiry arise, as to whether the libellant's vessel was in fault. But, in this case, the facts are such, that the determination of the question whether the ship was in fault, must depend upon the determination of the question whether the schooner was in fault. The 10th article of the "regulation for preventing collisions on the water," contained in the act of April 29th, 1864 (13 Stat. 60), provides as follows: "Whenever there is a fog, whether by day or night, the fog signals described below shall be carried and used, and shall be sounded at least every five minutes, viz: (a) Steamships under way shall use a steam-whistle placed before the funnel, not less than eight feet from the deck. (b) Sailing ships under way shall use a fog horn. (c) Steamships and sailing ships, when not under way, shall use a bell." In this case, the evidence shows, that the company of the schooner were all of them on deck, except the cook and the captain; that four of them had their lines out, fishing; that no bell had been rung or any horn blown on the schooner during the day, although she had a bell hung on a post near the windlass, and several horns convenient of access, one of them being hung in the companion way leading to the cabin from the deck; that, suddenly, a blast from the ship's horn was heard on board of the schooner; that the captain of the schooner then came on deck and blew a horn; that then the sound of a horn from the ship was again heard on board of the schooner; that the captain of the schooner then blew a horn a second time, and the bell of the schooner was rung, and the ship was heard and seen close upon the schooner; that the lookout on the topgallant forecastle of the ship heard and reported the sound of the horn from the schooner, nothing being visible through the fog, but it does not appear, that the sound of more than one of the blowings of the horn on the schooner was heard on the ship before the collision; that, immediately on the hearing of the horn from the schooner, the wheel of the ship was ordered by her master to be put to port, the sound of the horn being heard faintly by him from ahead but a little on the starboard bow of the ship; that the helm of the ship had been got about half to port, when a bell was heard from the schooner; that thereupon the helm of the ship was ordered by her master to be put hard a-starboard, but, before it was got half over to the starboard, the collision occurred; that, when the master of the ship heard the horn from the schooner, he, from the course of the sound and the direction of the wind, took it to be from a vessel under canvas, under way, on her port tack, and, therefore, crossing his bows from his starboard to his port side; that he, therefore, ported his helm, to let her pass on his port side; and that, on hearing her bell, he concluded she was at anchor, and a little on his starboard hand, and, consequently, tailing to his port hand, and, therefore, he then starboarded, to pass under her stern. It is quite apparent, from the proofs, that, when the horn of the schooner was first heard on board of the ship, the ship was so close upon the schooner that a collision was almost inevitable; that there was no substantial, if there was any, change in the course of the ship, by either the porting or the starboarding of her helm; and that the manoeuvres of the ship were the proper ones, in view of the sound she heard from the schooner. Now, on all these facts, it is impossible to deny that the schooner was grossly in fault. She violated the law of navigation by lying at anchor without sounding her bell at all. When aroused to a sense of her danger and her duty, by hearing the fog horn of the ship, she violated the law again by sounding a horn instead of a bell, and by not sounding a bell until after she had heard the horn of the ship a second time. These violations of law being shown, the burden of proof is upon the schooner to show that the collision was in no degree owing to any such violation. Waring v. Clarke, 5

How. [46 U. S.] 441, 465. In this case, the schooner has, I think, failed to show that the collision was not in some degree attributable to the violations of law by the schooner. She has not shown that, if she had sounded a bell from time to time, and as often as was demanded, in view of the thickness of the fog, and of the location of her anchorage, and of the state of the wind, prior to her having heard the fog horn of the ship, such bell would not have been heard by the ship, and thus have indicated a vessel at anchor, and tailing, with the wind, towards the port side of the ship, in season for the ship to have had a chance of avoiding the collision, by starboarding the moment the bell was heard, and passing under the stern of the schooner. Nor has the schooner shown, that if, when she sounded a horn, after hearing the horn of the ship, she had sounded a bell instead, there would not have been time for the ship to have, at least, mitigated the collision, by starboarding instead of porting. As the schooner was motionless, it is apparent that but a slight change of direction in the heading of the ship towards the stern of the schooner, a comparatively short distance away, would either have caused her to clear the schooner, or to strike the schooner a glancing or angular and, probably, less disastrous blow, near the stern of the schooner. I think, on the evidence, that, with the vigilance and promptitude of movement which are shown to have existed on board of the ship, the proper and timely use of the bell by the schooner, both before and after the fog horn of the ship was heard, would have changed the state of things materially. In regard to the use of the bell by the schooner before the horn of the ship was heard, it is to be observed, that the requirement of article 10 is, that the bell shall be sounded at least every five minutes, whenever there is a fog. This does not mean that it shall be a sufficient compliance with the law to sound the bell as often as once every five minutes, in any fog. It means that it shall not be a sufficient compliance with the law to sound the bell less often than once every five minutes, in any fog. The 20th article declares that nothing in the rules shall exonerate any vessel from the consequences of the neglect of any precaution which may be required by the ordinary practice of seamen, or by the special circumstances of the case. In any fog, the bell of a vessel at anchor must be sounded at least once in every five minutes, and as much oftener as the thickness of the fog, or the fact that she is anchored in a route frequented by other vessels, or the state of the wind or weather, or the ordinary practice of seamen at the locus in quo, or the special circumstances attending the case, may require, as a proper precaution, the neglect of which there is reasonable cause to believe may prove disastrous. It is shown, by the proofs in this case, that it is the custom, on the Grand Banks, in a fog, for a vessel at anchor to ring a bell every ten or fifteen seconds, and for a vessel under canvas, under way, to blow a horn at the same intervals. Such a custom is a reasonable one, and is one of the precautions required by the ordinary practice of seamen, referred to in article 20, and is to be rigidly enforced by the courts. It is a custom in harmony with the requirements of article 10. The bell must be sounded, or the horn must be blown, or the steam whistle must be used, as much oftener than once in every five minutes, as is required by the use of reasonable precaution under the circumstances of each case. In the present case, the fog was of extraordinary thickness, the schooner was lying in the track of merchant ships running from New York to Liverpool, and the vessel under canvas, which struck her, was using a fog horn every ten seconds. Yet the schooner was guilty of such gross neglect as to sound no bell at any time before hearing the horn of the ship. The schooner was, therefore, in fault, and responsible for the collision, at least, in part.

Was the ship in fault? The general charge made in the libel against the ship is, that she was recklessly, negligently or carelessly managed by those navigating her. There is, in the libel, no specific allegation as to what the faulty management on the part of the ship was. As already stated, no fault can be found with what was done on board of the ship, after the proximity of the schooner was made known. The ship was manoeuvred as she ought to have been, in view of the indications given by the sound from the schooner. A fog horn, a little on the starboard bow of the ship, with the wind just abaft the beam of the ship on her starboard side, indicated a vessel under canvas, under way, crossing from the starboard side to the port side of the ship, and, therefore, the helm of the ship was properly put to port. The bell indicated a vessel not under way, and probably at anchor, and, with the wind as it was, if at anchor, tailing to the port side of the ship, and, therefore, the helm of the ship was properly put to starboard. Nor was any thing left undone on board of the ship, after the sound from the schooner was heard, which ought to have been done. The only serious charge against the ship is, that she was sailing at too great a speed, in view of the thickness of the fog. The testimony is, that the breeze was a moderate one, that the ship was going about six knots an hour, and that she had all her canvas on except her studding sails. In the case of The Itinerant, 2 W. Rob. Adm. 236, 243 (decided in 1844), Dr. Lushington says: "It is unquestionably the duty of every master of a ship, whether in an intense fog or great darkness, to exercise the utmost vigilance, and to put his vessel under command, so as to secure the best chance of avoiding all accidents, even though such precautions may occasion some delay in the prosecution of the voyage.

It may be that for such purpose it would be his duty to take in his studding sails; but such is the constantly varying combination of circumstances, arising from locality, wind, tide, number of vessels in the track, and other considerations, that the court cannot venture to lay down any general rule which would absolutely apply in all cases. In the present instance, the opinion of the court is, that it might have been prudent for the Itinerant to have taken in her studding sails; but the court is also of opinion, and so were the gentlemen by whom it was assisted at the hearing of this case, that the collision was not occasioned by the omission of the Itinerant so to do, but that the state of the weather was such that the accident would have occurred, even although this precaution had been adopted." In the case of The Lord Saumarez, 6 Notes Cas. 600 (decided in 1848), Dr. Lushington says, addressing the Trinity masters: "It appears that shortly previous to and up to the time of the collision, the Lord Saumarez was proceeding under all her sails set, with the exception of having taken in her lower studding sails; and it has been contended, on the one side, that, considering the state of the wind and weather and the locality, the Lord Saumarez ought not to have carried so large a press of sail; while, on the other hand it is said, that, whatever might be the quantity of sail she carried, it was not at all instrumental to the collision and to the damage in question. In support of the latter averment, the case of The Itinerant was cited. Now it is most important that this question should not be subject to misapprehension, and you will excuse me for referring to what took place in The Itinerant, and showing what is the real principle which the court adopted, sanctioned by the gentlemen of the Trinity House, in this matter. Perhaps I had better first state the general principle. When a ship is carrying a great press of sail, it does not necessarily follow, though it may be an act of imprudence, that it contributes to the collision itself; and, if it is not the cause of the collision, but simply an act of imprudence, not promoting the collision, it is a circumstance to be entirely laid out of the case. But if, on the other hand, looking to the state of the wind and the weather, an improper press of sail was contributory to the collision, then it is a misdemeanor for which the party so acting must suffer. In the case of The Itinerant * * * the court pronounced that the collision was the result of inevitable accident. * * * Now, in that case, the fog was of the very densest character, so that the two vessels could not descry each other until they were in almost immediate contact; and, although the gentlemen by whom I was then assisted were of opinion that the Itinerant was, in one sense of the word, to blame in carrying so great a press of sail, yet, looking at the whole case, they considered that the carrying such sail was not contributory to the collision, and, under these circumstances, I could not hold that vessel to blame. But let it not go forth, as by your authority, that, whatever may be the circumstances of the case a vessel is at liberty to carry a great press of sail, to the imperilling the safety of other ships. That never was a doctrine laid down by this court or by your board. In the present case, looking at all the circumstances and at the locality, considering whether it was a track in which it was likely to meet other vessels, you will have the goodness to state to me presently, whether you are of opinion that the carrying so large a press of sail, was or was not contributory to this collision; whether, if less sail had been carried, some time would have been allowed, after the discovery of the vessel, to adopt those measures which ought to have been taken to avoid the collision." The decree was against the Lord Saumarez, because it was held that the primary cause of the collision was her putting her helm to starboard, contrary to the rules laid down by the Trinity House, but the Trinity masters remarked, that, in the situation in which that vessel was, it would have been more prudent for her to have had no studding sails at all. I have cited these eminently just and practical views of Dr. Lushington, not only because of their applicability to the present case, but for the purpose of showing how little countenance is given by courts of admiralty, to such views of the duty of the masters of vessels which are sailing in a fog, as were advanced by the witnesses examined on the part of the claimant in this case. One of them stated that he never shortened sail, in all his experience, in a fog, his view being, that the faster the ship goes, the quicker she will answer her helm, and, therefore, the less the danger of colliding with another vessel. Another witness stated, that the proper course, in a fog, is, not to shorten sail at all, but to go as fast as you can, and take the chances, using every prudent precaution. Another stated, that he never made less sail on account of a fog, and that the rule is to go as fast as you can, consistently with wind and weather. Another stated, that it is prudent to go as fast as you can, through a fog, as long as the masts hold in. Another stated, that he never diminishes his speed in a fog on the Banks, his object being to get through the fog as quickly as possible, lest he should be run into. Another stated, that he always crosses the Banks in a fog as fast as he can, and that it is not more dangerous to a vessel, at anchor there, in a fog, for another vessel to go fast than to go at less speed. One of these witnesses is the master of a steamer plying regularly between New York and Liverpool. He says, that, while crossing the Banks in a fog, it is not his custom to diminish his rate of speed at all; that he generally goes ten or eleven knots an hour, through a fog, on the Banks; and that from three hundred to four hundred yards is the furthest distance at which you can hear a fog horn or a bell. This practice, if it be one, of not diminishing speed in a fog on the Banks, is directly, so far as steamers are concerned, in the face of the 16th article of the sailing rules, which provides that every steamship shall, when in a fog, go at a moderate speed. The rule that there must not be too much speed in a fog has also been applied to sailing vessels, under varying circumstances, depending upon the particular facts of the case. The Virgil, 2 W. Rob. Adm. 201; The Victoria, 3 W. Rob. Adm. 49; The Pepperell, 1 Swab. 12; The Robert & Ann v. The Lloyds, Holt, Rule of the Road, 55. Two prominent ideas were advanced by the witnesses for the claimant in this case, as justifying undiminished speed in a fog on the Banks. One was, that the danger to any vessel in a fog is greater the longer she remains in the fog. The other was, that the faster a vessel is going the more quickly will she mind her helm, and thus the better will she be able, on a signal of danger, to avoid colliding with another vessel, in a fog. Neither of these ideas has any sanction in the law, and any vessel which acts upon them takes upon herself the consequences of recklessness. The first idea disregards wholly the rights and the safety of other vessels. The other idea presupposes that a signal of danger, proceeding from a vessel unseen in a fog, to another vessel, will necessarily be heard so seasonably, and acted upon so intelligently, by the latter, as to secure, by a proper movement of her helm, the avoidance of a collision. The true rule of law is laid down by Dr. Lushington, in the case of The Virgil, 2 W. Rob. Adm. 201, 205. He says: "If a vessel charged with having occasioned a collision, should be sailing at the rate of eight or nine miles an hour, when she ought to have proceeded only at the speed of three or four, it will be no valid excuse for the master to aver that he could not prevent the accident at the moment it occurred, if he could have used measures of precaution that would have rendered the accident less probable. It may undoubtedly be important that a voyage should be completed in the most speedy manner, but such speed must be combined with safety to other vessels sailing in an opposite course. This is the doctrine of the courts of admiralty, in cases of this kind."

I have made these observations because of the character of the testimony introduced on the part of the claimant in this case, and because no sanction is intended to be given, by the decision in this case, to the doctrines advanced on the part of the claimant, through his witnesses, as to the rule by which vessels have a right to govern themselves, in regard to the proper rate of speed in a fog. Each case must be judged of by its own circumstances, for, what would be not too great a rate of speed in a fog, under one state of facts, would be too great a rate, under another state of facts. Yet, there are general rules for the government of vessels, as to their rate of speed in a fog, based upon uniformity of principle and leading to uniformity of decision. The Itinerant, 2 W. Rob. Adm. 236, 242.

In the present case, in view of the fault on the part of the schooner in not sounding her bell at all, while at anchor, before she heard the horn of the ship, and in view of her further fault in misleading the ship, by sounding her horn, instead of her bell, after she had heard the horn of the ship, and in view of the fact that, the burden of proof being on the schooner, to show that the collision was not the consequence of such faults, she has not so shown, and in view of the fact, that the burden of proof is on the schooner, to show that the collision was owing, in any degree, to the too great speed of the ship, I cannot come to the conclusion, on the evidence, that it is shown affirmatively that a too great speed on the part of the ship contributed to the collision. On the contrary, the weight of the evidence is, that, if the schooner had not committed the faults she did, the ship would not, even at the speed she had, have collided with the schooner. The evidence does not show any such actual known proximity of other vessels, in the vicinity of the place of collision, at or about the time of the collision, or any such probability of meeting other vessels there, either under way or at anchor, as to make the actual speed of the ship at the time, in view of the wind, and of the sail she had on, and of all other attending circumstances, a reckless one. Therefore, I cannot pronounce the ship in fault. The libel must be dismissed, with costs.

BANKRUPTCY—PROOF OF DEBTS—WAGER CONTRACT.

A speculative option where the object of the parties is not a sale and delivery of the goods, but a settlement in money on differences—commonly called a "put,"—is a wagering contract and void, either as within the statutes against gambling or as against public policy, and is not a provable debt in bankruptcy.

[Cited in Re Green, Case No. 5,751; Clarke v. Foss, Id. 2,852.]

[The question in this case arises on the report of H. N. Hibbard, Esq., one of the registers of this court, on an application by the assignee of the bankrupts for an order to expunge the claims of the parties named, as well as a large number of other claims, depending on substantially the same facts. It appears from the testimony submitted with the register's report that in the month of May, 1872, and for several years prior thereto, the bankrupts, Peyton R. Chandler and the firm of Chandler, Pomeroy & Co., were engaged in the business of buying and selling grain on the Chicago market, and as members of the board of trade of this city; that Chandler, Pomeroy & Co. were brokers and commission merchants, and Peyton R. Chandler dealt mainly on his own account, as a capitalist, through Chandler, Pomeroy & Co., who acted as his brokers.] [2]

The bankrupts, Peyton R. Chandler, and the firm of Chandler, Pomeroy & Co., were engaged in buying and selling grain on the Chicago market, and as members of the board of trade of that city. In May, 1872, Peyton R. Chandler conceived the idea of making a corner in oats for the month of June then ensuing, and with that view he purchased all the "cash oats" as they arrived in the market, and took all the "options" offered him for June delivery—his purpose being to own all the oats in the market, and compel those who had sold "options" for June to pay his price; or, in other words, to settle with him by paying such differences as should exist between the prices at which he purchased the options and the price he should establish for cash oats on the last day of June, when his options matured. In pursuance of this plan, he purchased, between the 15th of May and the 18th of June, two million five hundred thousand bushels of cash oats, being all, or substantially all, the cash oats on the market, and also bought June "options" to the amount of two million nine hundred and thirty-nine thousand four hundred bushels. The total amount of oats in store in Chicago on the 18th of June was only two million seven hundred thousand bushels, and the total amount received during the remainder of the month was only eight hundred thousand bushels. As incidental to and part of the machinery of this corner, Chandler also sold what are called "puts," or privileges of delivering to him oats during the month of June for forty-one cents a bushel. These "put" contracts read as follows: "Received of E. F. $50, in consideration of which we give him, or the holder of this contract, the privilege of delivering to us or not, prior to 3 o'clock p. m. of June 30th, 1872, by notification or delivery, 10,000 bushels No. 2 oats, regular receipts, at 41 cents per bushel, in store, and, if delivered, we agree to receive and pay for the same at the above price. Chandler, Pomeroy & Co. P. R. Chandler. Chicago, June —, 1872."

The amount paid by the purchaser of these "puts" was one-half cent per bushel for whatever quantity was named in the contracts. The total quantity of oats called for by these "puts" amounted to about three million seven hundred thousand bushels. When Chandler commenced to buy oats with a view to the corner, the price in the Chicago market was about thirty-nine cents a bushel. After he took possession of the market he put the price to forty-one cents and upwards, and held it there until the 18th of June. In the meantime the price had declined in New York and other markets, so that oats to ship were not worth over thirty-three to thirty-five cents, and July options for this market were not worth over thirty-six cents. On the 18th of June, P. R. Chandler and Chandler, Pomeroy & Co. failed, and the price declined before the close of business that day from forty-one to thirty cents, and continued to decline during the remainder of the month, so that at one time they were as low as twenty-six cents per bushel. Between the time of the failure and three o'clock on the 30th of June, the holders of the "puts" claim to have made tender to the bankrupts of the quantity of oats called for by their respective tickets, and the oats not being accepted and paid for, they sold them upon the market that day or the next, under the rules of the board of trade, and proved their claims for the differences between the price named in the "put" and that for which they sold. The total amount of claims thus proved was about four hundred thousand dollars, and the total amount received by the bankrupts for these puts was less than nineteen thousand dollars. The assignee of Chandler moved to expunge the claims of this kind from the list of debts proved.

BLODGETT, District Judge. The proof shows conclusively that the plans of Chandler and the fact that he was manipulating the market with express reference to a corner in oats for June, were well known and understood on the board of trade, while the number of these "put" claims, about one hundred and twenty-five, all, or substantially all, in favor of members of the board, show that the struggle between Chandler, who was endeavoring to hold up prices, and the sellers of "options" and holders of "puts," who were endeavoring to break the price, was quite generally participated in by members of the board. In other words, it was notorious that Chandler was endeavoring to keep the price at forty-one cents or upwards, while the sellers of "options" and holders of "puts" were endeavoring to break down the price. It is true that in this testimony some of the claimants say there was no "corner," or that they did not know that there was a corner, but the cross-examination shows that they knew Chandler was trying to make a corner, and they say he did not do it because he failed before the end of the month, so that by their own admission, they knew what he was attempting, knew the reasons for his purchase of such large quantities of "cash oats," and options, and knew he did not sustain his corner because the "short" interest broke him down, and the moment a man bought a "put," he became identified with the short interest—his interests were antagonistic to Chandler.

The assignee attacks these claims upon the ground that they are fraudulent as against the other creditors of the bankrupt, the main ground, and the only one which I shall consider, being that they are wager-contracts, and therefore void. Without taking time to discuss all the points raised by the able arguments which have been adduced, and the various reasons urged for and against these claims, it is enough to say that it seems to me that the contracts in question partake of all the characteristics of a wager. It is in substance an assertion by the seller of the "put" that oats cannot be purchased on that market before three o'clock p. m. of the 30th of June for less than forty-one cents a bushel, and an undertaking to pay the difference between forty-one cents and any market price. If he, Chandler, sustains the price at forty-one cents or above, he wins the half-cent a bushel paid for the "put," because the holder will not deliver, while if the price goes below that named he is to pay the difference. This is practically the contract. It is manifestly a bet upon the future price of the grain in question, as any which could be made upon the speed of a horse or the turn of a card. The evidence in this case shows that in nearly all the cases of settlements on "put" or "option" contracts, the grain is never delivered nor expected to be delivered, but the parties simply pay the difference, as settled by the prices. But, if that were not so in all cases, it is clear that in this case no delivery of the grain was intended by these "put" holders, because they knew that Chandler controlled all the oats in the market and fixed the price, and that their only expectation for success depended on their being able to break the market before their time for delivery expired. Some of them say—Bensley, I think—that they intended to deliver the oats, but it is absurd to suppose that they intended to deliver, unless they could do so for less than forty-one cents. They intended to deliver if they could break Chandler, or prevent his "corner" from culminating, as the jockey may intend to walk his own horse over the course after he has poisoned or lamed that of his competitor. They did not intend to deliver, if Chandler succeeded. Thus a struggle inevitably ensued between Chandler and the holders of this immense amount of "puts" and "options," Chandler alone on one side attempting to hold up the price, and all the rest seeking to put it down. The fact that the sellers of "options" and holders of "puts" were able to get resolutions through the board of trade, making new warehouses, where oats had never been stored before, "regular" for the performance of these contracts, shows the intensity of the contest and the overwhelming influences with which Chandler had to contend. I do not mean to be understood as saying that the fact that Chandler sold "puts" to so many as to create an overwhelming opposition, makes the transaction any more or less a wager than if he had only sold one "put," but it shows the notoriety of the whole proceedings. From the very nature of the transaction the interest of the holder of the "put" is to break down the price and that of the seller is to maintain it. The number engaged in this transaction, and the quantities involved, demonstrate that neither party expected any grain to be delivered. Chandler expected to hold up the price, in which event no grain would be offered him, and the other parties must have known they could not get the grain to deliver unless they first broke Chandler, as he held all the grain, and then, although they might tender, he could not receive, so that in payment no actual delivery was anticipated. They made their tenders only as a method of establishing differences after he had failed, and was powerless.

That transactions of this kind are only wagers is abundantly established by authorities. Grizewood v. Blane, 11 C. B. 538; Brua's Appeal, 55 Pa. St. 298; Kirkpatrick v. Bonsall [72 Pa. St. 155], MS. Op. Sup. Ct. Pa.; Ex parte Marnham, 2 De Gex, F. & J. 634; Cassard v. Hinman, 1 Bosw. 207. It is true those cases arose under statutes making such transactions void as gaming contracts. But the test applied was: Did the parties intend to sell on one side and buy on the other the stocks which purported to be the subject matter of the transaction, or did they only intend to adjust the differences? And as it was found that they only meant differences when they said shares, the contracts were held to be essentially gambling contracts, and therefore void. It is said, however, that there is no statute in this state expressly prohibiting contracts of this kind, as there is in England and Pennsylvania; and, as the supreme court of this state has decided that wagers are not necessarily void, therefore, these contracts—not being inhibited by any express law of this state—are not void. There is no dispute that contracts of wager are valid at common law, unless affected with some special cause of invalidity. Ball v. Gilbert, 12 Metc. [Mass.] 397. But wagers which are contrary to public policy have always been held by the courts to be essentially void, without statutory prohibition, and cannot be made the ground of an action. Hartley v. Rice, 10 East. 22. And a high authority in the profession has stated the law on the subject of the validity of wagers with great force and clearness, when he says: "As the moral sense of the present day regards all gaming or wagering contracts as inconsistent with the interests of the community, and at variance with the laws of morality, the exception necessarily becomes the rule." [Godsall v. Bolder] 2 Smith, Lead. Cas. 306. Indeed, any one rising from a full examination of the law applicable to wagers, as expounded by the courts, would undoubtedly testify that while he has found in the books, and especially among the older text writers and cases, general expressions to the effect that wagers were valid at common law, he has found the cases where they have been enforced to be extremely rare, and the courts have been astute to find reasons for not enforcing them.

Following this general current of authority, the supreme court of this state, under the statute prohibiting gaming, has decided that the wagers upon horse-races are void, and cannot be enforced; and that money paid on such wagers can be recovered back. [Tatman v. Strader] 23 Ill. 493; [Garrison v. McGregor] 51 Ill. 473. The language of the Illinois statute on which these decisions are based, is, in substance, that all promises made, &c., where the consideration or any part thereof shall be money won by gaming, &c., shall be void. The language of 8 & 9 Vict., on which Grizewood v. Blane and other English cases were decided, is: "All contracts or agreements, whether by parol or in writing, by way of gaming or wagering, shall be null and void." The precise question made in this case has never been before the supreme court of this state, to my knowledge, and I am not aware that it has ever been raised at the circuit, except in a late case before his honor Tree, J., of this city when he held that "option contracts for grain, when the parties intended only to pay the differences and not to deliver grain, were void, as wagering contracts." I quote him as reported in the daily papers of this city. But it hardly seems possible that any court called upon to construe the Illinois statute in the light of the expositions already made by our courts and of the English decisions upon a statute so substantially similar, could hesitate to pronounce these contracts wagers, and void as contrary to the statute. But even if not within the letter or spirit of the statute of this state, the common law authorities quoted, show that all wagers contrary to the public policy are void without reference to any statute. And, as the contracts under consideration are essentially nothing but bets upon the price of oats in this market within the time limited, and as it is obvious that the effect of such transactions is to beget wild speculations, to derange prices to make prices artificially high or low, as the interests, strength and skill of the manipulators shall dictate, thereby tending to destroy healthy business and unsettle legitimate commerce, there can be no doubt of the injurious tendency of such contracts, and that they should be held void as against public policy. As is most cogently said by the learned judge who delivered the opinion in the case cited from 55 Pa. St. 298: "Anything which induces men to risk their money or property without any other hope of return than to get for nothing any given amount from another, is gambling, and demoralizes the community, no matter by what name it may be called."

The financial disaster and ruin which followed "Black Friday," in New York, and the scarcely less damaging local consequences which followed the various "corners" which have either succeeded or been attempted in this city, furnish conclusive proof, if proof were needed, that such gambling operations should be held void, as contrary to public policy. The total amount paid by the claimants in these cases was less than nineteen thousand dollars, and yet the amount they claim is within the fraction of four hundred thousand dollars—a disparity between the consideration paid, and the sum demanded which strikes the mind at once as so grossly inequitable that the judicial conscience is shocked, and revolts from being made the instrument for enforcing such outrageous injustice. I do not intend to be understood as holding that every option contract for the delivery of grain or stock, or that every "put" is necessarily void, but only that all these contracts, in the light of the testimony before the court, were, in their essential features, gambling contracts. The parties, when they made them, did not intend to deliver the grain, but only at the utmost to settle the differences. They knew they could not obtain the grain to deliver if Chandler sustained his "corner," and their action in buying a "put" was virtually a bet on their part that he could not accomplish what they all knew he was endeavoring to do, that is, keep up the price through June to his own figures, and virtually a bet on his part that he could do so.

It is shown in the proof and urged in the argument, that the "put" is in itself a very harmless contract—that dealers frequently resort to them as a method of insuring prices. It is answer enough to this to say that the proof fails to show that such was the object of any of these claimants. Chandler was taking all the cash oats offered at the price named in the "puts" and upward, and none, with the exception of Bensley, claim that they had any oats to fill the "puts," at the time they bought, or bought for that purpose till after Chandler's failure. It is perhaps possible to imagine a dealer with a stock of grain on hand which he wishes to hold for an advance, who may take a privilege of this kind to insure himself against a decline while waiting for an advance. But the very act of offering to sell a "put" either implies that the seller has control of the market, so that he expects to make his own price, or else it is a mere reckless assertion of the seller's opinion that the price will be maintained, either of which partakes of the character of a bet.

"A wager," says Bouvier, "is a contract by which two or more parties agree that a sum of money or other thing shall be paid or delivered to one of them on the happening, or not happening, of an uncertain event." To say that these contracts were taken for the purpose of insurance is too far-fetched an excuse, and evidently an afterthought. In what I have said I do not intend to vindicate Chandler. His conduct was as reprehensible as that of the claimants. All were engaged in an immoral and illegal transaction, and this court ought not to allow its powers to be prostituted to the enforcement of these contracts for either party. Money lost at play or in gaming cannot be recovered except where an action is given by statute; but, as I have already intimated my opinion that these cases are within the statute of this state on the subject of gaming under which money paid may be recovered back, I shall allow the claimants to prove their claims for the amounts actually paid by them respectively, which is a half cent per bushel on the grain named on their tickets.

BANKRUPTCY—"MANUFACTURER"—ACT OF BANKRUPTCY—SUSPENSION OF PAYMENT OF COMMERCIAL PAPER.

1. One who prepares for market and sells lumber, the growth of his own land, is a manufacturer within the meaning of the bankrupt act as amended by the act of July 14, 1870 [16 Stat. 276].

2. The commercial paper mentioned in section 39 of the bankrupt act [14 Stat. 536] includes not only the notes, bills, &c., given by a merchant or other person mentioned in the section in the ordinary course of his business, but all negotiable paper. The terms are descriptive of the kind of paper, and not of the mode in which it was in fact issued or used in the given case.

[Cited in Re Stevens, Case No. 13,393; Re Clemens, Id. 2,877.]

3. The failure of an accommodation indorser to pay the note for fourteen days after his liability has been duly fixed, is an act of bankruptcy, if there is no defence to the note in the hands of its holder, and if the indorser is a manufacturer.

[Cited in Re Carter, Case No. 2,470; Re Clemens, Id. 2,878; Whiting v. Wellington, 10 Fed. 815.]

Petition in invitum heard by the court on an agreed statement of facts with some supplementary evidence admitted by consent. The defendant was a member of the bar, but had of late retired from active practice and carried on, among other things, a steam sawmill, in which he prepared, by his agents, boards and shingles from lumber grown on his own land, and sold them in the market. He was liable on a large number of negotiable notes which he had indorsed for the accommodation of H. Woodman, and Woodman was liable on a less number indorsed for the accommodation of the defendant. The petitioner held one of the former notes which he bought for value before its maturity, and which had been dishonored and duly protested more than fourteen days before the petition was filed.

H. D. Hyde, for petitioner.

The defendant is a trader by reason of his lumber business, and of his practice of raising money by exchange of notes. If not a trader he is a manufacturer. The note held by the petitioner is commercial paper.

G. S. Hillard, for defendant.

There is no evidence of trading. The English cases, which are very numerous and perhaps not entirely harmonious, yet all agree that one who merely sells the produce of his own land is not a trader. The note set out in the petition is not commercial paper within the true intent of section 39. In re Lowenstein [Case No. 8,574]; In re McDermott Patent Bolt Manuf'g Co. [Id. 8,750],—which decide that the paper must not only be given by a merchant, but in the course of his business.

LOWELL, J. I am disposed to agree with the argument of the defendant's counsel that one cannot be a trader unless he buys as well as sells, but is not Mr. Chandler a manufacturer? [But this rather strengthens the second position of the petitioner, that such a person may be a manufacturer, because it shows a reason for the recent amendment by which manufacturers were added to the traders, etc., in the statute.][2] One who works up lumber on a considerable scale is popularly called a manufacturer of that article, and such lumber is spoken of as manufactured in our tariff acts and treasury regulations, and in the lately repealed [reciprocity][2] treaty regulating commerce with Canada. If so, the fact that the manufacturer uses only lumber which he grows himself does not appear to be material. It is not like the case, put in argument, of a farmer making cider or cheese, for two reasons: These products when made by the farmer exclusively from his own farm, are not usually made on so large a scale as to be called a manufacture, as the word is now commonly used, and the making is one merely incidental to the cultivation of his land, like curing his hay, &c. But in the case of the lumber business, the land may be almost said to be incident to the lumber, which usually forms its chief value, and the manufacture itself is the main source of profit, independently of any cultivation or other use of the land. In this respect the business of the defendant seems more analogous to that of a miner, who is made subject to the act, and as to whom it would hardly be contended that the ownership of the land was material.

If, then, the defendant is a manufacturer, has he suspended payment of his commercial paper? Upon this point I am referred to two cases [in the southern district of New York,—In re Lowenstein [Case No. 8,574]; In re McDermott Patent Bolt Manuf'g Co. [Id. 8,750],—in which Judge Blatchford ruled][2] that the paper mentioned in the statute is such as is given by a merchant or trader in the direct course of his business, and not for a mere loan of money, though the money may have been used in his business, and still less for any dealing outside of his trade. Some cases that were not cited are of a different tenor: Heinsheimer v. Shea [Case No. 6,328]; In re Nickodemus [Id. 10,254]; In re Hollis [Id. 6,621]. In these cases the term commercial paper is said to be descriptive of a certain sort of contract [or security].[2] Thus in Nickodemus' Case, Judge Withey expresses the opinion that it refers to bills of exchange, promissory notes, and negotiable bank checks, paper governed by the rules which have their origin and are established upon the custom of merchants. "Such paper," he says, "is usually denominated commercial paper, and we must presume congress used the term in its common acceptation, rather than in a more restricted sense." Similar opinions are given in the other cases cited. Judge Withey finds support for this construction in the fact that bankers, who are not engaged in commerce, strictly so called, are within the act, and this view is much strengthened by the amendment, which adds brokers, manufacturers, and miners to the persons the dishonor of whose obligations is an act of bankruptcy. It is of the utmost consequence to preserve the uniformity which the constitution and the law intend should be established in this important branch of commercial jurisprudence, and this uniformity will in so far fail to be attained as the statute is differently construed by different tribunals. In this case, however, since I find the diversity already existing, I must choose between the opposing views, and after the most careful deliberation I consider the more enlarged construction to be the true one. Bills of exchange have their origin and derive their peculiar properties from the custom of merchants. Thomas Malynes, merchant, writing in 1629, before promissory notes had come into use in England, thus quaintly expressed himself: "The nature of a bill of exchange is so noble and excelling all other dealings between merchants that the proceedings therein are extraordinary and singular, and not subject to any prescription by law or otherwise, but merely subsisting of a reverend custom used and solemnized concerning the same." Lex Mercatoria, pt. 3, c. 5. And he explains at great length how different the rights and duties of the parties to such a contract are from those arising under any contract known to the common law of England. It is familiar learning that the mode of declaring on a bill of exchange was, that it had become due and payable to the plaintiff according to the custom of merchants, and this was a necessary allegation. When notes of hand became common, similar declarations were framed upon them, but the courts refused to admit the validity of a custom to pay a note to the indorsee without an express promise to that effect, because, they said, it would tend to defraud the promisor, who might have already paid the note to a former holder, and they denied to the holder the right to sue according to the custom of merchants. Clerke v. Martin, 2 Ld. Raym. 757. Immediately after this last decision, the statute 2 & 3 Anne, c. 9, afterwards made perpetual, was passed, which recited the fact of such a decision, and proceeded for the encouragement of trade to place negotiable notes, for the payment of money, upon the same footing as inland bills of exchange, and declared that they should be assignable to and suable by the holder according to the custom of merchants. This phrase is used repeatedly throughout the act. This statute has been copied in many of our states, and adopted in others as part of their common law. Story, Prom. Notes, § 6, and note 2; 3 Kent, Comm. 72, and note a.

Such negotiable paper therefore stands by usage and by statute upon the custom of merchants, and is controlled and regulated by such custom. And these regulations are always treated as part of the law merchant. Now in saying that any person belonging to one of certain designated classes should be deemed a bankrupt if he failed to pay his commercial paper, it seems to me that congress simply referred to a well known and very conclusive test of insolvency. If a trader allows his paper to go to protest, he is said to have failed or suspended. The expressions are used as equivalent. It is like the closing of the counting-room and denying one's self to creditors of the old English bankrupt law [and it will be observed that while congress has not, thought fit to say that every insolvent person may be made bankrupt against his will, yet any one who has shown by certain conclusive acts or neglects like avoiding process, buying in person, and suffering paper to remain dishonored, that he cannot hope to pay his debts, may be proceeded against].[2] In this point of view, it makes no difference in reason that the particular note which is dishonored was not given in the regular course of the business of the promisor; the obligation to pay and the inference from neglect are equally stringent. In the bankrupt court we have occasion to know that accommodation notes are often so made as to simulate notes given for merchandise, because the latter command a higher price in the market, but the rights of the bonâ fide holder are the same in both cases. It seems more just and reasonable to conclude that congress intended to designate a certain kind of promise, well known to and governed by the law merchant, and not to give a peculiar sanctity to such as happens between the first parties to it to have originated in a particular way, thus instituting an inquiry which appears wholly immaterial to the purpose in hand, and not admissible in any other form of action, and unjust to the holder of the paper. It is as if the law had enumerated the various kinds of promise, instead of designating them by a comprehensive term, which Judge Withey says is commonly used to designate such paper. While, therefore, I agree with the defendant that commercial means mercantile, and that merchandise means pertaining to trade, yet I can by no means adopt the conclusion that the particular bill or note must be in any way connected with commerce or trade, but rather that it must be of that class which commerce introduced and still deals in. If congress had said that when a merchant, &c., had stopped payment, he should be deemed bankrupt, unnecessary litigation might have arisen out of the non-payment of open accounts which are much used of late years, between wholesale dealers and their customers in trade, and they therefore fixed upon that kind of promise which is payable on a day certain, and the dishonor of which is a sure test of insolvency. The defendant testified to his understanding that "commercial paper" was used in State street in contradistinction to "accommodation paper." Judge Withey, on the other hand, in the passage already twice cited, says the phrase is commonly used to mean such paper as comes within the purview of the law merchant. No doubt a distinction is made in the market between these classes of notes or bills, but I do not profess to be acquainted with [or to have been shown][2] any usage so general throughout the country as to enable me to construe the phrase used in the statute as a term of art intended to distinguish between them, or as having any other technical meaning. In the books on trade the term used is "real bills," to designate those given in a genuine transaction between dealers, and I have heard the expression "business paper" applied in the same way. But I am not satisfied that the phrase in the statute is intended to have that meaning, or that it in fact has it according to any wide-spread usage. It seems improbable, because such paper is equally sacred in the hands of the bonâ fide holder, and the failure to pay it is as sure a test of insolvency, and an inquiry into the origin of such contracts is never admissible for any purpose or in any court in a suit by such a holder. If there is any defence which affects the holder, the remedy is ample, because the failure to pay such a note would not be a suspension of payment; but beyond that the inquiry would be unreasonable and embarrassing, and would often present advantages to a defendant whose dealings have been somewhat irregular and unusual, which I do not believe the statute intended to give. Many, perhaps most, of those traders who are obliged to suspend payment, have been injured by speculations beyond the legitimate line of their trade, but their failure is equally certain, and the rights of all classes of their creditors are the same as if they had continued to deal in the course most familiar to them. One of the judges has intimated, though it was not necessary for him to decide, that accommodation paper might perhaps be excluded by the word his of the statute. But upon further reflection I think it would appear to him, as it does to me, that his commercial paper, as applied to one proceeded against in bankruptcy, merely means paper which he is bound to pay, without reference to its origin. If a banker, &c., has indorsed a note, the indorsement is his; and if he has received due notice of dishonor, he is liable to pay the note; and if he has thereafter failed to pay it the failure is his; and this although some one else, who was bound to save him harmless, has failed to do so, and thus has broken two promises, while the indorser has broken but one. The one is sufficient to establish his failure to meet his obligations.

I must therefore hold that the act of bankruptcy alleged in the petition is proved. It is a great satisfaction to me to know that this decision can be reviewed in the circuit court, and I hope the respondent will take the necessary steps to that end. A recent rule of the circuit court points out the time and manner of applying to the general supervisory power of that court.

Petition sustained. Defendant adjudged bankrupt. Warrant not to issue for ten days unless appeal is waived.

CHANDLER v. The ANNIE BUCKMAN.

[21 Betts, D. C. MS. 112.]

District Court, S. D. New York. May Term, 1853.

SEAMEN—DISABLED BY DISEASE.

[A sailor is not entitled to be treated at the expense of the ship, nor to wages, while disabled by disease brought on by his own vices, nor when, being in a diseased state unknown to the master and owners, he ships as an able man.]

[In admiralty. Libel in rem by Stephen Chandler against the ship Annie Buckman, for wages.]

[Before BETTS, District Judge.]

(Cause submitted on written argument by libellant's proctor.)

(1) The libellant seeks the recovery of a balance of $54, wages on a voyage from China to New York. The master offered him as gratuity $44, denying he was entitled to recover anything. But the libellant refused to accept the offer.

(2) The testimony of the master is competent, and, being the only evidence in the cause, must govern the decision.

CHANDLER v. BYRD et al.

[Hempst. 222.] [1]

Superior Court, D. Arkansas. Jan., 1833.

MISJOINDER OF PARTIES — WAIVER OF DEFECT — ACTION ON JOINT AND SEVERAL BOND.

1. On a joint and several bond, the plaintiff may sue one or all of the obligors, but not an intermediate number.

2. But an error of this kind is waived unless taken advantage of by plea in abatement.

3. Defects in pleading only reachable by special demurrer at common law, must be disregarded, special demurrers having been abolished by statute.

In error to Pulaski circuit court.

Before ESKRIDGE, CROSS, and CLAYTON, Judges.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This is a writ of error to the circuit court of Pulaski, to reverse a judgment in an action of debt, wherein Sarah Chandler was plaintiff, and Richard C. Byrd and John H. Cocke defendants. The declaration alleges "that Richard C. Byrd, John H. Cocke, and A. W. Cotton, (now deceased,) by their certain writing obligatory, signed with their own proper hands, and sealed with seals, a certified copy of which writing obligatory is now here shown to this court, the original on file among and belonging to the records of the superior court for the territory of Arkansas, and cannot be produced to this court," etc. The defendants filed a general demurrer to the plaintiff's declaration, which was sustained, and final judgment rendered against the plaintiff for costs.

Two questions present themselves for the consideration of this court; first, whether the action was correctly brought against R. C. Byrd and John H. Cocke, there having been a third obligor to the instrument upon which the suit is founded. The supreme court of the United States, in the case of Minor v. Mechanics' Bank of Alexandria, 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 46, has settled this point. That court says, that on a joint and several bond the plaintiff may sue one or all of the obligors, but in strictness of law no intermediate number; he must sue all or one. But if an error of this kind is not taken advantage of by plea in abatement, it is waived by pleading to the merits. "The reason is, that the obligation is still the deed of all the obligors who are sued, though not solely their deed, and therefore it is no variance in point of law between the deed declared on and that proved." The same doctrine is clearly illustrated in the case of Cabell v. Vaughan, 1 Saund. 291, note 4. The act of 1816 (Geyer, Dig. 241), it is conceived, does not change the common law in this particular. The object of that act was chiefly to establish the liability of the representatives of deceased joint obligors.

The second question is, whether there is a proper profert of the instrument upon which the action is founded. Admitting the declaration in this respect to be defective according to the rules of the common law, it is an objection of which the party could only avail himself by special demurrer, and special demurrer having been abolished by act of the last legislature, the objection taken to this declaration in this respect is no longer tenable. Judgment reversed.

CHANDLER v. DODGE COUNTY.[1]

Circuit Court, D. Nebraska. May Term, 1879.[2]

MUNICIPAL AID BONDS—VALIDITY—TOLL BRIDGE.

At law. This was an action brought by George B. Chandler to recover the amount of certain coupons attached to certain bonds issued by the board of county commissioners of the county of Dodge, in the state of Nebraska, on behalf of the precinct of Fremont in said county. The plaintiff (now defendant in error) purchased the coupons sued on before maturity, and for a valuable consideration. The controversy in the case relates to the validity of the bonds and of the plain-tiff's title to the coupons. By a law of the state of Nebraska, passed February 15th, 1869, it was enacted that any county in the state should be authorized to issue bonds to aid in the construction of any railroad or other work of internal improvement, the amount to be determined by the county commissioners of such county, not exceeding ten per cent. of the assessed valuation of all taxable property in said county: provided, the county commissioners should first submit the question of issuing such bonds to a vote of the legal voters of said county, in the manner provided by chapter 9 of the Revised Statutes of Nebraska for submitting to the people of a county the question of borrowing money. By a subsequent section, it was enacted that any precinct in any organized county of the state should have the privilege of voting to aid works of internal improvement, and be entitled to all the privileges conferred upon counties and cities; and that in such cases the precinct election should be governed in the same manner, so far as applicable, and the county commissioners should issue special bonds for the precinct.

In the present case, the bonds purport on their face to have been thus issued. The following is a copy of one of them:

"United States of America, State of Nebraska. It is hereby certified that Fremont precinct, in the county of Dodge, in the state of Nebraska, is indebted unto the bearer in the sum of $1,000, payable on or before twenty years after date, with interest at the rate of ten per cent. per annum from date. Interest payable annually, on the presentation of the proper coupons hereto annexed. Principal payable at the office of the county treasurer, in Fremont, Dodge county, Nebraska. Interest payable at the Ocean National Bank, in the city of New York. This bond is one of a series issued in pursuance of and in accordance with a vote of the electors of said Fremont precinct, at a special election held on the 11th day of November, A. D. 1870, at which time the following proposition was submitted: 'Shall the county commissioners of Dodge county, Nebraska, issue their special bonds on Fremont precinct, in said county, to the amount not to exceed $50,000, to be expended and appropriated by the county commissioners, or as much thereof as is necessary, in building a wagon bridge across the Platte river, in said precinct; said bonds to be made payable on or before twenty years after date, bearing interest at the rate of ten per cent. per annum, payable annually;' which proposition was duly elected, adopted and accepted by a majority of the electors of said precinct voting in favor of the proposition. And whereas the Smith Bridge Company of Toledo, Ohio, have entered into a contract with said county commissioners to furnish the necessary materials and to build and construct said bridge referred to in the foregoing proposition; therefore, this bond with others is issued in pursuance thereof, as well as under provisions of an act of the legislature of the state of Nebraska, approved February 15th, A. D. 1869, entitled 'An act to enable counties, cities and precincts to borrow moneys on their bonds, or to issue bonds to aid in the construction or completion of works of internal improvements in this state, and to legalize bonds already issued for such purposes.' In witness whereof, we, the said county commissioners of said Dodge county, have hereunto set our hands, this first day of September, A. D. 1871." (Signed and sealed by the county commissioners.)

It is conceded that the precinct regularly voted for an issue of bonds to the amount named therein, to be appropriated for building a bridge across the Platte river; but the defendant, in its answer, set forth the notice of the election, by which it appears that the proposition submitted to the people was to build a toll-bridge and not a free bridge; and that the bridge was accordingly built and operated as a toll-bridge. The notice of election further declared that the tolls were to be used for the purpose of raising a sinking fund to pay the principal, interest, repairs and expenses of the bridge, and were to be regulated from time to time by the county commissioners.[3]

Plaintiff demurred to the answer on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a defense. Demurrer sustained.

Before DILLON, Circuit Judge, and DUNDY, District Judge.

Upon the consideration of said demurrer, final judgment having been rendered thereon for the plaintiff, the opinions of the judges holding said court, namely, the circuit judge and the district judge, were opposed upon the following questions thereon arising, to wit: 1st. Whether the said answer sets up a sufficient defense in law to the causes of action stated in the petition. 2nd. Whether the recital in the bond charged the holder thereof with notice of the proposition which was in fact the one submitted to a vote of the people as contained in and shown by the records of the county. 3rd. Whether the facts that the bonds were issued for a toll-bridge of the character of the one set forth in the proposition submitted to the voters of said Fremont precinct, as shown in the answer, makes them invalid in the hands of a holder thereof for value before due, without other notice than that imparted on the face of the bonds. And said points being at the same time stated under the direction of said judges, it was ordered that said points should be certified to the supreme court of the United States, according to the statutes in such case provided.

Case No. 2,593.

CHANDLER v. LADD.

[1 McA. Pat. Cas. 493.]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. March, 1857.

PATENTS — "LEVEL" — INTERFERENCE — NON-APPEARANCE OF PATENTEE — COMMISSIONER'S DECISION ON PATENTABILITY—PRACTICE ON APPEAL —INVENTION—PERFECTING — UTILITY — REDUCTION TO PRACTICAL USE.

[1. The rule of law requiring the commissioner of patents to lay before the judge the grounds of his decision, fully set forth in writing, touching all the points involved by the reasons of appeal from his decision, should be strictly followed.]

[2. The practice of the patent office in deciding as to the patentability of the invention before declaring an interference is proper, and such a decision, being important as to the subsequent steps to be taken by the parties, should be made with deliberation.]

[3. That, as between an invention claimed and an invention patented, there is a difference of construction which allows the use of the former in a different way from the latter, although it may rarely be required so to be used, does not render such difference fictitious, nor deprive it of the quality of a useful invention.]

[4. It is not necessary that the utility of a patented invention should be great. If the invention is an improvement at all, it is sufficient if it is of a different construction from former articles of the same kind, and of any use. Morgan v. Seaward, 2 Mees. & W. 544, followed.]

[5. It is not necessary that the thing for which a patent is sought should be the best of its kind, but if its intended use is practicable the invention is patentable. Many v. Jagger, Case No. 9,055, applied.]

[6. Although an invention has not been reduced to actual, practical use, yet, if it appears to be capable of such reduction, other things not opposing, it is patentable.]

[7. Where an interference has been declared between an invention claimed and a patent theretofore granted, and the patentee, although notified, fails to appear or take testimony, it is error for the commissioner to refuse to grant the patent applied for because of failure to furnish unequivocal proof of priority of invention, and because that granting the application might restrain the patentee from making and selling his patented article, as the action of the commissioner could in no wise affect the patentee's rights, where it appears that the applicant furnished the best proof under the circumstances, his principal witness having died pending the hearing.]

[8. The first inventor has the prior right to a patent, if he uses reasonable diligence in adapting and perfecting his invention, although the second inventor has in fact perfected the same, and reduced it to practical, positive form.]

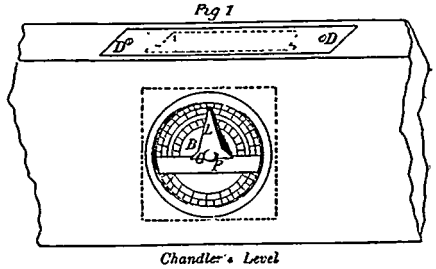
[9. The invention of Thomas A. Chandler for a level having a graduated circle with a rotating pointer (for which patent No. 17,023 was subsequently issued) possesses patentable novelty, and is prior to the invention for which patent No. 7,263 was granted to William G. Ladd, and to the invention for which Samuel Reed applies for a patent.]

[10. "Graduated," in connection with said invention, has the meaning of "to mark with degrees, regular intervals, or divisions."]

[Appeal from the commissioner of patents.

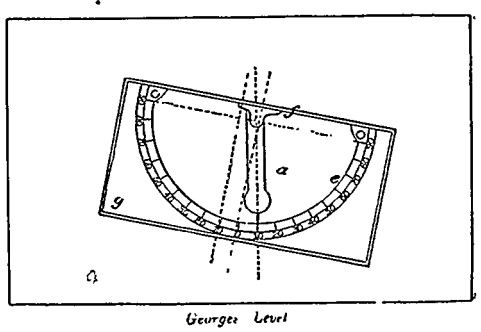
[On interference. Application by Thomas A. Chandler for a patent for a level having a graduated circle with a rotary pointer. Interference declared with patent No. 7,263, granted to William G. Ladd, Jr., April 9, 1850, and with the claim of Samuel Reed for invention of a similar level. From a decision awarding priority of invention to William G. Ladd, Jr., and to Reed, the applicant, Chandler, appeals.]

The question of the patentability of Chandler's device was reopened by the commissioner in his reply to the reasons of appeal. The discussion upon this subject will be readily understood by reference to the subjoined cuts, showing Chandler's level and the level patented to M. Georges, figured in the Brevet d'Invention, first series, vol. 52, p. 16, (plates,) which was principally relied upon by the commissioner as an anticipation of Chandler's alleged invention.



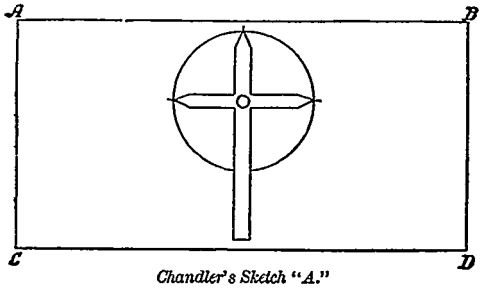
Chandler's Level

In Chandler's level, a graduated circle with a rotating pointer or index finger L is placed on one of the sides of the stock and wholly within the faces of the level, so that either the top or bottom face of the instrument can be applied to the surface to be tested. By this arrangement the index can be caused to face front or back, as circumstances require, by simply turning the level on its longitudinal axis.



Georges Level

In the level figured in the Brevet d'Invention, the pendulum is hinged near the upper face of the instrument, and sweeps over a graduated semi-circle, so that the bottom face of the level must necessarily be applied to the surface whose inclination is to be determined. It was contended in behalf of Chandler that by reason of this difference in construction and arrangement his instrument can be used to greater advantage and under circumstances where it would be impossible to use Georges' device. As an illustration of the increased capacity of the instrument, a case was supposed where the level is placed in a confined space, from which it cannot be removed, and within which it cannot be turned around end for end. If, now, the spectator is at the back of the instrument, there will be no way in which he can obtain a view of the index on the Georges device so as to take the inclination. In the case of Chandler's device, however, he may apply the other face of the instrument to the surface by turning the instrument upon its longitudinal axis, thus bringing the index to the rear, so as to be visible to him in that position. The commissioner contended that the circumstances supposed had no real existence in practice; or, in other words, that they would so rarely occur that they could not affect the essential identity of the devices as ordinarily used. He further contended that the claim was not in any event properly limited to express the difference developed by this example. Upon the merits of the case, the commissioner contended that, with this understanding of the restricted nature of the invention, the proofs failed to show with sufficient clearness that Chandler had in view at the time he made his sketch A, upon which he relies to show his invention, the feature of novelty. The sketch in question was substantially as here represented.



Chandler's Sketch "A."

The commissioner contended that this sketch does not necessarily show that Chandler had an entire graduated circle to be used as he now claims. There are only three graduation marks upon the sketch, and the commissioner described a variety of ways in which such an instrument might be used without involving the idea of the present invention. He noticed the fact, also, that the circle is eccentric to the sides, and that the index would extend below the face if the instrument were reversed. Ladd's patented level had other features of construction which rendered it independently patentable in the opinion of the commissioner. The patent subsequently issued to Chandler, in accordance with the decision of April 14th, 1857, No. 17,023. The patent to Ladd was granted April 9th, 1850, No. 7,263.

P. H. Watson, for appellant.

Examiners Lane and Baldwin, for commissioner.

MORSELL, Circuit Judge. On the 30th of September, 1851, the above-named Thomas A. Chandler filed his petition and schedule. The amended specification is dated the 27th day of May, 1852. It contains a full and particular description of the invention, and states the claim as follows: "What I claim is the combination of an entire graduated circle, provided with a pendulum and index, with the two parallel sides of the level stock, whereby I am enabled to apply either side of said stock to the surface whose direction is to be ascertained, and at the same time have the index facing the operator in whatever position he may be placed. I do not claim the level stock with its opposite sides parallel, nor the graduated indicating circle or dial, nor the indicator with two horizontal and one vertical pointer, nor the knife edge bearing upon which the indicator and pendulum are mounted, nor the pendulum, because separately and for other purposes they are well known; but they have never before been combined to form a level, nor has a level of any kind ever before been made capable of performing the functions of this combination. Therefore, I claim the level composed of the before-enumerated parts, in combination, whereby, among other things, either edge of the instrument may be used uppermost with its face or dial towards the operator, and when any two of the pointers are screened from sight by an intervening body, the third will indicate the inclination of the surface to which the instrument is applied, and the angles at the head and foot of a rafter will be indicated at the same time." Interferences were afterwards declared with the patented claim of the said William G. Ladd, Jr., and with the claim of Samuel Reed. Mr. Ladd's claim, as appears from his specification, is in the following words: "What I claim as my invention, and desire to have secured to me by letters-patent, is a level for determining a horizontal and perpendicular line and the inclination of any slope with the same, constructed substantially as hereinabove set forth—that is, with a shallow cylindrical vessel or a tube in the shape of an entire ring, half filled with quicksilver, or other liquid, in combination with a graduated annular dial, whether a floating needle or indicator be used or not, the whole arrangement being substantially as hereinabove set forth." Patented April 9th, 1850. For the purpose of deciding said issue made by the said interference, the said parties were allowed to take testimony, upon the return of which the commissioner, on consideration thereof, on the 21st of January, 1853, decided as follows: "This case came up for hearing on the 17th instant. The claim of said Chandler and Reed is for the combination of an entire graduated circle, furnished with a pendulum and index, with the two parallel sides of the level stock. On examination of the evidence produced on the part of said Chandler to show that the said improvement was used by him as early as the year 1840, it is found that the graduation of the circle was not made to appear in that evidence, and that, therefore, the invention of the combination claimed, of which that graduation is an essential element, is not proved therein. The evidence on the part of said Reed being unaccompanied with proof of notice to the other parties of the time and place of taking the same, as required by the rules prescribed in such cases, is necessarily excluded. On the part of said Ladd, no evidence has been produced. By the records of this office, it appears that the application of the said Ladd for his patent—the same being for a level containing the equivalent of the combination claimed by the said Chandler and Reed—was filed on the 1st day of February, 1850; that the application of the said Chandler was filed on the 30th day of September, 1851, and that the original application of said Reed, of which his present application is a renewal, was filed on the 30th day of December, 1851. In view, therefore, of the evidence before the office, the priority of invention as between the parties to this interference is hereby awarded to the said William G. Ladd, Jr." From this decision the said Thomas A. Chandler hath appealed as aforesaid and hath filed his reasons of appeal. The first of which is because upon the examination of the said application it does not appear that the improved pendulum level, claimed by this applicant as his invention, had been invented or discovered by any other person in this country prior to the invention thereof by him, or that it had been patented or described in any printed publication in this or in any foreign country, or had been in public use or on sale with this applicant's consent or allowance prior to the date of his said application, or that the said invention is not useful and valuable. Second. Because the level of William G. Ladd, Jr., was invented subsequent to that of this applicant, as is shown by the testimony in the case, and the honorable commissioner therefore erred in ascribing to said Ladd the priority of invention. Third. Because it fully appears from the testimony that the invention of this applicant was anterior to that of Samuel Reed, and the honorable commissioner therefore erred in deciding priority of invention in favor of Reed. Fourth. Because no pendulum level known prior to the date of this applicant's invention possesses all the advantages or is capable of performing all the functions of his level.

In the commissioner's report dated 5th January, 1857, after the reasons of appeal in this case were filed, he says: "For the reasons of decision in this case, the office will refer to the accompanying copies of letters addressed to the applicant, such only being copied as are deemed sufficient to give all the grounds assigned by the commissioner for his decision. Little need be said here in addition to what has been said in these letters, the copies of which are made a part of this document. I will only add here the suggestion that the reason which may fairly be assigned why in the level referred to in the Brevets d'Invention more than a semicircle was not used was that the maker saw that the instrument would conveniently do all that was required of it without it. In fact, the first question that always arises in getting up any instrument of the class is, How long an arc do I want?—do I need the whole circle?—or, can I do with only a portion of it, and what portion? If these questions are not formally stated and dwelt upon, they are still practically and in effect necessarily asked and answered. In the old plumb-line quadrant of altitude, they resulted in the adoption of a quarter of a circumference. In the level cited in the Brevets d'Invention, for good reasons half the circumference was used, and for equally good reasons the other half was not used. In this point of view, the greater or less extension of the graduated arc upon the rectangular level stock, as in other instruments of the general class, seems to the office to be clearly a matter for the exercise merely of arbitrary choice and discretion, not involving any new invention. It will be seen that one of the official letters here copied proceeds on the supposition that a level in Rees' Cyclopaedia had been referred to in a former letter of the office. This was an oversight—the one really referred to being that in the Brevets d'Invention; and that part of the argument which is not appropriate to the last mentioned is of no special importance, though it would be regarded as having its weight in the absence of the closer reference given. The commissioner desires that this, and the letters to which he refers as a part, shall be taken for his reasons of the decision." The rule of law declares that it shall be the duty of the commissioner to lay before the judge the grounds of his decision, fully set forth in writing, touching all the points involved by the reasons of appeal, to which the revision shall be confined. The irregularity of the course which it is desired thus to be pursued will at once be perceived by the commissioner to be something more than mere form. I have, however, examined the letters and their effect on the point of novelty, as far as it is understood to be in question in connection with any part of the issue, which is as much as under any circumstances ought to be here noticed. During the pendency of the application, the various objections and the nature of them were stated and insisted on by the commissioner. It seems, however, to have resulted, on the 24th May, 1852, in submitting the matter in controversy to the examination of four examiners, two of whom reported in favor of a claim according to the amendment and disclaimer suggested, which was afterwards substantially adopted by the appellant. The decision of interference followed shortly afterwards in these words: "In the matter of your (Chandler's) pendulum level, the feature in question covered by your claim has been decided to be patentable, and on the 18th instant notice was given to the party who filed the rejected application mentioned." This decision as to the patentability of the invention has always, in the practical course of the office, been pursued before declaring an interference and putting the parties to the trouble and expense of obtaining proof; and certainly it was reasonable and right, and the decision should be with a deliberation becoming the subsequent important step necessarily to be taken by the parties to maintain their claims to priority of invention. There are a few letters subsequent to this event. The only one which it is important to mention is the one of the 22d of January, 1853, which awards priority of invention to William G. Ladd, Jr. It is difficult to understand what the commissioner meant by the letter of 11th of February, 1853. It seems to consider the patentability of the claim still open. Upon this state of the case, according to notice duly given of the time and place of hearing, the commissioner laid before the judge his decision and reply to the reasons of appeal, with the said reasons of appeal and the original papers and the evidence in the cause; on which occasion, an examiner appeared on behalf of the office, and the appellant by his attorney; and for the purpose of explaining the nature of the said invention, Mr. Lane and Mr. Baldwin, two of the examiners of the office aforesaid, were examined on oath before me; which evidence on said examination was reduced to writing, and will be sent with my decision. The parts only which are deemed most material will be here stated. Mr. Lane, in defining the term "graduated," says: "It is a general term, used to signify the dividing of a line into parts which can be read off." He states what he considers to be the difference between the graduated semi-circle and the entire graduated circle; that the difference of function in the latter is not of such importance, especially when considered in connection with the obvious nature of the means of producing it, as to constitute more than a colorable difference. His answer to the eleventh interrogatory is: "Both levels are in the same box; it is equally difficult to get both out into the air; and the fact about applying the level is partly owing to the fact that one has the entire graduated circle and the other only a graduated semi-circle, and partly to the fact that they are boxed up so that they cannot be got out." The substance of the same question is repeated in the fifteenth interrogatory. In answer, he says there is no other material difference.

Mr. Baldwin, being next examined, is asked to state the principle of the two levels. He answers: "The principle of operation is the same; that is to say, each will determine the inclination of a plane, by marking with the pendulum the degree of inclination on a graduated scale; but the instrument, with the entire circle graduated, will always show to the operator occupying one position the degree of inclination, while the semi-circle must be reversed in determining the inclination of the same planes—the two opposite sides of a pyramid for example, and to see this registration the operator would be compelled to change his position, or the operator would be obliged to reverse the ends of the level in the case last supposed; and in some positions, where the level would be useful, this might be found impossible, as, for example, in a shaft or tunnel." In answer to a question propounded for the purpose, he says: "If the invention of the entire graduated circle made the instrument operative, where the instrument with the semi-circle would not be, it would seem to present a patentable invention beyond question; and even if it operated better in some particulars than in others, the graduated circle, or an improvement on the semi-circle for the specific purpose to which the improved operation referred, might also be patentable." To a question propounded for the purpose, he answers: "The model of Samuel Reed does not seem to have contemplated the use of the opposite edges of the level as parallel planes, but to have used sights on the top to determine the plane for long distances. If he did contemplate such use of his instrument, it is the same invention substantially as that of Chandler, with the exception of the substitution of the mercurial indicator for the pendulum. In William G. Ladd, Jr.'s patent, this instrument is substantially the same as Chandler's. Both of these cases would probably embrace the combination constituting the first clause of Chandler's claim. The model of James Eames does not involve the invention claimed by Chandler's first claim. M. Georges' level is limited to the semi-circle, and will of course not operate under all circumstances like that of either of those having an entire graduated circle, for the reasons given in my first answer." He is asked: "Please examine the drawing marked 'Exhibit A,' and annexed to the deposition of M. L. Dunlop, and state whether it represents the combination claimed by the appellant in his first claim." Answer: "The drawing represents a level having parallel sides, and a circle graduated by a marked division into parts—three of which indicate quarters of the circle—and a pendulum indicator, and of course it involves the combination embraced in the first clause of Chandler's claim." Written arguments were made by the counsel for the appellant and on the part of the office, and the case was submitted. Regularly, and according to the usual practice, the only question which the present issue would present on this appeal, as arising before the commissioner, would be that of priority. The argument before me on behalf of the commissioner is on two grounds: First. That the invention as claimed is not patentable, for want of invention. Secondly. Because of priority in William G. Ladd, Jr.

The first reason of appeal involves the consideration of the question under the first head. It is in proof that the construction of the appellant's level is different, and capable of performing functions of which no level known to the commissioner was capable. This does not seem to be denied; but it is contended that this difference is not invention; that it is formal, not substantial; merely colorable. The argument of the commissioner seems to be intended to show that the objections are sustained. The commissioner takes the position that the office has stated that the level with the graduated semi-circle, the other elements of the combination being the same, enables the operator to measure the angle of inclination of any surface with the index facing him, in whatever position he may be placed. This, in point of fact, seems to be inconsistent with what Mr. Lane, the examiner, has said in his testimony as a witness, in which he says that of two levels in all respects precisely alike, except that one has a semi-circle and the other an entire circle, the one with the circle can be applied to a given surface in a given place with the index facing towards the operator, so that he may see whether or not the surface is level; and the other level with the semi-circle cannot be so applied. The next position is that the appellant's description of his claim does not set forth the particular functions of the level, or any indication that it refers to aught else than a definition of the natural capabilities of the level in regard to the variety of positions it can assume; that it does not refer to the application of the level under obstacles or confinement, since, certainly, obstacles could readily be contrived to prevent its application to a given surface. The conclusion to which the commissioner comes on this point is: "It is certainly fair to apply the same rule of construction to the language which the office has employed to define the extent to which the level with a graduated semi-circle is capable of assuming different relative positions." To make his meaning more clear, the commissioner has given a very full amplification. He says: "The difference between the two levels is thus completely defined by this language, when taken in connection, as it was intended to be, with that of the claim, as also it is in the statement made by Mr. Lane before the court; and this difference or distinction between the two levels, so defined by the different extent to which, without obstruction, they are capable of assuming different relative positions," he says: "I will for greater clearness call A; and aside from the question of the meaning of former language of the office, it is plain now what is meant by A. * * * Another point arises, and that is the advantage which the level with the entire graduated circle has, by virtue of the difference A (the principal element of which difference, as defined in the claim, is that it can be applied, supposing no obstruction, with either side of its stock to the surface) over the level with the graduated semi-circle, when we come to have the level confined in a space (a tunnel, for instance) from which it cannot readily be taken out, and in which it has so little room that it cannot be turned end for end. The special occasion of this kind I will call B. Now, the advantage which arises out of A when the occasion B occurs is palpable, and the office is by no means disposed to ignore it, supposing B to have a real existence. * * * If the occasion B do have to a material extent a real existence in practice, it shall impart importance to A; but if B do not have a real existence in practice, and is only a fictitious occasion, then A shall not receive importance from it."

The point of the argument thus far appears to be for the purpose of showing by a construction fairly applicable to both levels, (for the reasons stated by him,) that in giving the description and definitions at the various times when he has been called upon to do so, he has been entirely consistent as to the semi-circle, intending to mean a limitation of its application to instances without obstruction. I have stated this part of the argument, not with any view to criticise it, but to show that a due respect has been paid to it. As to the question to which the commissioner considers himself finally brought—"that the feature of the invention in its combination is not real, but fictitious, because not known in fact in practice; that the occasion has not arisen in actual practice; and that it would not occur once in the lifetime of one level in a hundred or a thousand"—and as to the reply to the instance of the aqueduct and tunnel, the principles involved in this part of the argument cannot be acceded to. The fact of the difference of which the invention consists is certainly not fictitious. It has been looked upon; it has occular demonstration; nay, it has been admitted by the commissioner; and although it may not be an ordinary occurrence, that it is required to be so used, yet, even if used in the admitted rare instance, that would be no sufficient reason to deny useful invention. So with respect to the little difficulty a skillful workman would have in making it, one thing is certain—it never has been made or used in its present combination; and why, therefore, is it not a useful invention? The commissioner himself on a former occasion, and some of the examiners, have said the feature is patentable; and the able Examiner Baldwin has fully examined it, and has pronounced it, under the circumstances stated by him, to be patentable. And now I will state a rule of patent law which directly, in my judgment, bears on the case. In Norm. Pat. p. 23, § 4, quoting from Baron Alderson's opinion in the case of Morgan v. Seaward [2 Mees. & W. 544], it is said: "It is not necessary that the utility should be great; it is sufficient if the invention is an improvement at all. If it is of a different construction from former articles of the same kind, and of any use, that is sufficient. If a new description of steam-engine could be used where other engines would not answer, that would be sufficient; it need not be likely to come into general use." This case seems to me to run on all-fours with the case before me, and I cannot help thinking that it may satisfy the commissioner that he has been in error on this point. There is still another case applicable to this point, to be found in Curt. Pat. (New Ed.) p. 37, footnote,—a decision of Mr. Justice Nelson in the case of Many v. Jagger [Case No. 9,055], in which the judge says: "To maintain a patent, it is not necessary that the thing should be the best of its kind; but if the use for which it was intended is practicable, that is sufficient to sustain it as a useful invention." I will add, in addition, that the law is well settled that, although the invention has not been reduced to actual practical use, yet if it appear to be capable of being so reduced, it will be sufficient (other things not opposing) to entitle the party to a patent.

It now only remains to consider the question of priority of invention between the appellant and Ladd and Reed. With respect to Reed, he has offered no testimony legally, and therefore he may be considered out of the question. With respect to the other defendant (Ladd), he can carry his invention back only to the time of filing his specification on the 1st day of February, 1850.

In considering the testimony, it will be proper to notice the affidavit of Chandler, in which he states that he had relied upon the testimony of Calvin D. Bristol, late of the county of Dupage, Illinois, to substantiate his claim to said improvement in levels; but, by a dispensation of Providence, the said Bristol departed this life in the month of September last past, and in consequence he was under the necessity of relying upon the testimony of M. L. Dunlop, who during the years 1837, 1838, and 1839 was head clerk for the contractors, Messrs. Hugunin & Brown, on the Illinois and Michigan canal, where his said improvement was first used, and who was frequently on the work and familiar with the machinery during the year 1840, after he had retired from the principal charge of the work, and is now acting justice of the peace in the said county of Cook. He has carefully examined the sketch marked "Exhibit A," drawn by the said M. L. Dunlop, and purporting to represent his said improvement in pendulum levels; that this pen sketch is substantially a correct representation of a level constructed by him for the purpose of leveling the drilling-machines on the works of said Brown in the year 1840. The deposition of said M. L. Dunlop, which appears to have been regularly taken 22d of December, 1852, is as follows: That during the years 1837, 1838, and 1839, he was principal clerk for Messrs. Hugunin & Brown, contractors on the Illinois and Michigan Canal, at Rupotors, Illinois; that he was familiar with all the machinery used in their said work; he became acquainted with Thomas A. Chandler, the preceding deponent, in the fall of 1837, and the said Chandler was machinist and superintendent of the mechanical department in said work most of the time, until the deponent left the work in the month of September, 1839; and after that time, and during the year 1840, he was frequently on the work aforesaid, and frequently saw the said level as claimed to have been constructed by the said Thomas A. Chandler, of which the pen sketch annexed, marked "Exhibit A," is a correct representation of said level as was used by the said Chandler to level the drilling-machines on said work—P P P being arms or pointers, C the circle. The stock was made of wood, while the pin and pointers were of iron. He understood at the time that said Chandler was the maker and inventor of said level, and that he fully believes that such is the fact. He was knowing to C. D. Bristol having charge of one of the drilling-machines on which said levels were placed. It is generally understood that the said Bristol died of cholera at his residence in Dupage county during the month of September last.

The decision on the subject of the evidence, as before stated, is placed upon the ground that the graduation of the circle was not made to appear in the evidence; and the rule which he, the commissioner, says in his argument should be adopted is that the testimony on the part of Chandler ought to exhibit the most unequivocal proof that in the level described therein he had the difference A distinctly in view before the grant of a patent would be proper. Such proof, on a careful examination of the testimony, is clearly wanting. And this very rigid rule should be adopted because of the peculiarity of the case in this particular—that granting the patent for the appellant's claim might have the effect of restraining Ladd from the right of making and selling his level. Now, in this, I think the commissioner is mistaken, because it is a well-settled principle of law that after the commissioner has granted a patent, and delivered it, nothing he can do afterwards can affect the patentee's rights under the patent. Ladd is a patentee. Again, Ladd is in the issue against the appellee, and, although duly notified, has failed to take any testimony, or even to appear and cross-examine the witness; nor does it appear that he was before the commissioner—certainly not before the judge—contesting or denying the sufficiency of the evidence on that or any other of the various grounds stated by the commissioner. What is then (not to say the legal but) the common-sense inference? Again, as before said, the act of the commissioner cannot affect Ladd's title under the patent, but the rejection against the appellant would be fatal. Again, it appears from his affidavit that during the protracted investigation in this case he lost by death his principal witness. Further, Ladd's title, which it is admitted can be only carried back to the time of filing his petition, which is comparatively recent, is supported by only his own oath, and this, with the patent, is prima facie evidence only of his right, which may be repelled by a greater weight of evidence, whether offered as in the original order or otherwise. Better evidence than the nature of the case will admit of ought not to be required. The evidence in its nature as to this particular point is not so much for the purpose of showing that the instrument showing the invention was perfected and matured, as for showing the particular periods of the conception of the idea embracing the invention, and showing that it was then known. For perfecting and maturing the instrument, by which it could be reduced to practice, he had a right to make his experiments, if necessary, even for a greater length of time than taken in this case before filing his petition and specification, which, when done, should have relation back, so as to protect his priority. In the familiar case of Reed v. Cutter [Case No. 11,645], the plaintiff was a patentee suing for an infringement of his patent, and in which the court, among other things, decides as follows: "The clause of the fifteenth section now under consideration seems to qualify that right, by providing that in such cases he who invents first shall have the prior right, if he is using reasonable diligence in adapting and perfecting the same, although the second inventor has in fact perfected the same and reduced the same to practice in a positive form. It thus gives full effect to the well-known maxim, that he has the better right who is prior in point of time, namely, in making the discovery or invention."

In this case the evidence offered in defense to show another to be the prior inventor was evidence in its character tending to prove the fact of prior invention, because it might be deemed sufficient by the jury. I trust I have thus shown that if the evidence would be sufficient were it as an original question, it certainly ought to be so considered in this case; and then I have the concession of the commissioner that it would be deemed sufficiently suggestive to the mechanic or instrument-maker of any such pendulum level as that, for instance, in the Brevets d'Invention. "In other words, the office would say, as an original question, that it was sufficiently suggestive of a pendulum level in general." The subject has been placed upon still stronger grounds—that the evidence does show unequivocally the entire graduated circle, and instances of the practical use of the instrument successfully. That the instrument about which the witness testified, and a rough sketch of which he gave, had been in useful operation for some time, is positively proved. As to the meaning of the term "graduated," Craig's Etymological, Technological, and Pronouncing Dictionary is referred to, which gives it this definition: "To mark with degrees, regular intervals, or divisions." It is contended in argument that Mr. Lane admits that the circle in Exhibit A is marked off into divisions by three marks (the fourth mark being screened from view behind the pendulum). It is plainly to be seen that it is; and it is thence concluded that, according to said definition, Chandler's original level did contain the feature of an entire graduated circle. The commissioner in his argument says that there is no proof to show that the sides of the pendulum bar were truly adjusted, so that the mean of their two readings would give a correct result. He says further: "This, then, is a level that manifestly presents no idea of using it with either side up; that is, with either side applied to the surface whose direction is to be ascertained." The commissioner, in respect to this, is mistaken as to the facts. The Exhibit A represents the two parallel sides of the level stock. This is plainly shown by inspection and actual measurement, and demonstrated by a model level made in accordance with that sketch, and now before me. And it very satisfactorily shows, also, that it can be used with either side up; that is, with either side applied to the surface whose direction is to be ascertained. This error in point of fact no doubt contributed in a great degree to the incorrect conclusion of the commissioner's argument on this most important point of evidence, which would have been avoided if at the time of writing this part of the argument the sketch had been before him. To show more clearly that the rough sketch made by the witness, and a part of his testimony, has not been duly appreciated by the commissioner, see the testimony of Mr. Examiner Baldwin, hereinbefore recited, and a part of which I will here again repeat. He says: "The drawing Exhibit A of Chandler's testimony represents a level having parallel sides and a circle graduated by a marked division into parts (three of which indicate quarters of the circle), and a pendulum indicator, and of course it involves the combination embraced in the first clause of Chandler's claim." And if I may be allowed again to repeat another part of the testimony of the same learned examiner as to the points of novelty and patentability of the claim in this case, having before him the various levels exhibited in this case, with the graduated circles and semi-circles, respectively, he said both were alike as related to the general principal upon which their operation depends—that is, the stability of the indicator under the influence of gravitation—while the stock and graduated circle are turned to accommodate themselves to the varied surfaces whose inclination is to be observed.

With the views which have been taken, I think the testimony fully supports the priority of the appellant in his claim aforesaid. And, upon the whole case, I think the invention aforesaid patentable, and that the decision of the commissioner in this case is erroneous, and ought to be reversed.

BANKRUPT ACT—INSOLVENT CORPORATIONS—RECEIVER'S POWER TO SUE—LIABILITY OF STOCKHOLDER.

1. The bankrupt act does not furnish the sole remedy for winding up insolvent corporations or companies.

2. Power of a receiver to sue in the courts of another state considered.

[Cited in Holmes v. Sherwood, 16 Fed. 727; Olney v. Tanner, 10 Fed. 104.]

3. A call or assessment, or some equivalent action, held essential to the liability of the defendant on his contract to purchase shares of stock in an incorporated company.

[Cited in Glenn v. Soule, 22 Fed. 418.]

Action at law. The plaintiff alleges that he is the receiver of the Lamar Insurance Company, of Illinois, appointed by a court of chancery, in Chicago, in a suit in which two persons who are named were plaintiffs, and the said insurance company was defendant—the exact nature of which does not appear. It is alleged that the said company had, before said suit in Illinois was brought, become insolvent and ceased to do business. The petition herein also alleges that on August 15, 1873, the said court of chancery in said cause made an order as follows: "And the said receiver is hereby authorized and empowered to compromise with any one or more of the stockholders of the said corporation defendant, and to take and receive from him or them such sum of money or such percentage on the amount due from such stockholders as in the judgment of said receiver will be just and equitable, and a fair proportion for such stockholder to pay toward discharging the debts of the corporation. And upon such payment and settlement said receiver is hereby directed to give up and surrender to the party or parties so paying, the stock, bond, or obligation of said parties, and to release and discharge the same. And it is further ordered, adjudged and decreed that in case said receiver shall bring any suit to enforce the payment of any stock or other obligation due to said corporation, he shall bring said suit for and enforce such claim for the full amount of the debt or demand due, and the said decree of this court entered on the 18th of January, 1873, and the matters therein contained, so far as the same relate to the assessment of twenty per cent, the call of fifteen per cent, and the collection of such per cent, and call, be and the same is hereby, as to all future and further proceedings, vacated and declared to be of no force or effect, and said decree shall not operate as a bar to such recovery, nor shall said decree, or the matters therein contained, defeat or bar any suit which said receiver may hereafter bring to enforce payment of any debt due to said corporation." The present suit is brought by the receiver to collect eighty per cent, the balance alleged to be due from the defendant on a contract to purchase ten shares of stock in the said insurance company. The contract is in writing, and is in substance that the defendant promises to pay for said stock, $1,000, in this manner: five per cent down, and three installments of five per cent, in three, six and nine months. "The balance being subject to the call of the directors as they may be instructed by majority of the stockholders represented at any regular meeting." It is this balance that the receiver seeks to recover. The charter of the company is not set forth in the pleadings, nor the powers and authority of the receiver, otherwise than appears above.

The defendants demurred to the petition, and, on argument, the points below mentioned were ruled.

[1] [Reported by Hon. John Dillon, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

Parker & Twomey, for receiver.

James T. Lane, Gatch, Wright & Kennedy, for defendant.

MILLER, Circuit Justice, orally delivered the opinion of the court, holding: 1. That proceedings in bankruptcy are not an exclusive method of winding up insolvent corporations or companies. The bankrupt act does not, ipso facto, suspend state laws for the collection of debts. The act of congress of February 13, 1873 (17 Stat. 436), is a complete answer to the position that the sole remedy against an insolvent insurance company is in the bankruptcy court.

2. It is, perhaps, true, that where duly appointed and authorized, a receiver may, ordinarily, sue in another state. This power, when it exists, arises from comity, in the absence of special statute regulations, and it is, in general, subordinate to the right of local creditors as respects property within the jurisdiction where such a suit is brought. The effect of the bankrupt act on the general doctrine does not arise on the record before me. And in view of the uncertain nature of the proceedings in which the present plaintiff was appointed, I give no definite opinion concerning his powers in respect of suits brought in this district. See Booth v. Clark, 17 How. [58 U. S.] 322.

3. In this action at law, in which neither the corporation nor its stockholders other than the defendant are before the court, and in which the suit is on the contract of subscription for the entire eighty per cent alleged to be due, I am of opinion, considering the terms of that contract, and that no call or assessment is alleged, either by the company before the insolvency or by the court since, that the petition does not state a cause of action. In other words, in this action at law on the contract, there must be a call or assessment, or something standing in the place thereof, and equivalent thereto, either by the company or by a proper court, in order to make the defendant liable. This does not appear either by the averments of the petition or on the exhibits thereto, and hence the demurrer must be sustained, but the plaintiff may amend, and, in doing so, I advise him to set forth the charter of the company and the nature of the chancery proceeding in Illinois. Ordered accordingly.

CHANEY v. BASKET et al.

[6 Reporter, 769.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Indiana. Oct. Term, 1878.

GIFT CAUSA MORTIS—CHOSES IN ACTION—MONEY ON DEPOSIT—DELIVERY OF CERTIFICATE OF DEPOSIT.

1. Choses in action, whether negotiable or not, may be the subjects of gifts causa mortis.

2. Money on deposit may be delivered as a gift causa mortis by a delivery of the certificate of deposit; but there must be at the time on the part of the donor an intention to transfer to the donee the present dominion and ownership of the money, subject, of course, to the usual condition attached to such gifts.

Bill by the administrator of one Chaney, deceased, to obtain a certain certificate of indebtedness for $23,514.70. The defendant, Basket, claims that sixty days before his death, Chaney, in full possession of all his mental faculties, but in apprehension of death from a disorder with which he was then suffering, with his own hand wrote and signed the following certificate, to wit: "Pay to Martin Basket, of Henderson, Ky., and no one else, then, not till my death. My life seems to be uncertain; I may live through this spell, then I will attend to it myself. (Signed.) H. M. Chaney." And delivered the said certificate so indorsed to the defendant, Basket; that Chaney died of said disorder, and said certificate so indorsed remained in his (Basket's) possession until he placed it in the hands of his counsel, the defendants, Shackelford and Richardson; and that the certificate was a gift to him in trust, as well for himself as his brothers and sisters, at his option. The money represented by the certificate was on deposit with the Evansville National Bank, Indiana. During the sixty days that elapsed from the delivery of the indorsed certificate to Basket, until his (Chaney's) death, in January, 1876, he was generally up about his premises, looking after his business, as he had been for months previously. It appears from a post mortem that he had also suffered from consumption. The testimony conclusively shows that at the time the certificate was delivered by him to Basket the said Chaney was not in extremis, and that he did not act in the apprehension of immediate death. On this point there was no serious controversy. His domicil being in the state of Tennessee at the time of his death, the laws of that state determine the succession to his personal property.

A. & J. E. Inglehart and T. T. Foreman, for complainant.

Shackelford & Richardson, Denby & Kumler, J. W. Gordon, and J. J. Turner, for respondents.

GRESHAM, District Judge (after stating the facts). Gifts causa mortis must be of personal property or choses in action actually delivered by the donor to the donee, in apprehension of approaching death from an existing disorder or other impending peril, and death must ensue from such existing disorder or other impending peril without any complete intermission. But without further effort to define such gifts, it is sufficient to say that they are not good and are never upheld without certain essential requisites, one of which is delivery, actual or constructive, to the donee, or some one in trust for him, of the subject-matter of the gift. If the subject of the gift be capable of actual delivery, the delivery must be actual. Such gifts afford tempting opportunities for fraud, and therefore the Roman law requires them to be executed in the presence of five witnesses. And, inasmuch as delivery lessens the opportunity for fraud, it has always been held an absolute requisite to their validity. Money on deposit may be delivered by a delivery of the certificate of deposit, provided there be the intention at the time to transfer to the donee the dominion and ownership. It is now settled that choses in action, whether negotiable or not, may be the subjects of gifts causa mortis. Brunson v. Brunson, Meigs, 633; Brown v. Moore, 3 Head. 671; Meach v. Meach, 24 Vt. 591; Hanson v. Millett, 55 Me. 184; Cutting v. Gilman, 41 N. H. 151. The money itself was not delivered to Basket, nor was the certificate so assigned to him as to enable him to get possession of it. With the certificate, as indorsed, he had no right to demand the money from the bank. If on his demand the bank had paid the money, such payment would not have protected the bank against another demand by the donor. The indorsement was not of such a character as to enable him therewith to reduce the money to his possession. He could not, by virtue of the indorsement, have compelled the delivery of the money to him by the bank during the life of the donor. The donor, by the indorsement, had not parted with the possession or dominion of the property. It was still under his control. The language of the indorsement is certainly inartistic, but its meaning is patent. In legal effect it is, "if I die in my present illness, it is my intention that the money evidenced by this certificate of deposit shall belong to Martin Basket. When I thus die, and not before, it shall be paid to him." With this clear intention of the donor not to part with his money as long as he lived, it will not do to say that delivery of the certificate was a constructive delivery of the money evidenced by it. But it is said that the subject of a gift causa mortis vests in the donee only at the death of the donor, and that therefore the conditions expressed in the assignment would have been implied, if the certificate has been delivered, with a blank indorsement, or no indorsement at all. It must be conceded that some of the authorities seem to support this view. A will is the disposition of one's estate, to take effect after his death. Any disposition of property to take effect upon the death of the owner or donor is testamentary. It is the essence of a bequest that it take effect on the death of the testator. It appears by the very terms of the assignment that no present title or interest in the money could pass to the donee during the life of the donor. No instrument of writing can be both a last will and testament, and a gift causa mortis. The indorsement was testamentary in character, and if it has been properly executed according to the statutes of Tennessee, it doubtless might have been probated as the donor's will.

There is a wide difference between a legacy and a gift. Both possession and title must pass to the donee to constitute a gift. This applies as well to gifts causa mortis as to gifts inter vivos. The title must pass inter vivos, or it never can pass, but will go to the donor's legal representative. In a gift inter vivos, the donor reserves no right of revocation; in a gift causa mortis he does. The donee of a gift causa mortis holds the thing given not as a bailee of the donor, but as present owner on the condition attached to such gifts. A gift causa mortis vests in the donee a present but inchoate or defeasible title until the happening of the event necessary to render it absolute, and therein it differs from gifts testamentary and inter vivos. This question is discussed in Gass v. Simpson, 4 Cold. 293. "The property," say the court, "must pass at the time, and be intended to pass at the giver's death. * * * At the death of the donor the title becomes complete and absolute by relation from the date of the gift, and that without any consent or other act on the part of the executor or administrator; consequently the gift is not inter vivos." Duncan v. Duncans, 5 Litt. [Ky.] 12. In Parish v. Stone, 14 Pick. 198, the transfer of choses in action as gifts causa mortis is discussed. "These cases," said Chief Justice Shaw, in delivering the opinion of the court, "all go on the assumption that the bond, note, or other security is a valid and subsisting obligation for the payment of a sum of money, and the gift is in effect a gift of the money, by a gift and delivery of the instrument which shows its existence and affords the means of reducing it to possession." In the case at bar, the certificate was delivered, as the language of the indorsement clearly shows, with no intention of a present gift of the money, with authority to the donee to reduce it to possession. On the contrary, the indorsement was of such a character as to absolutely prohibit the donee from claiming any present title to the money, or any right to reduce it to his possession during the life of the donor. Decree that the certificate of deposit be delivered to the complainant, and that the money evidenced by it be paid to him.

CHANNING v. REILEY.

[4 Cranch, C. C. 528.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. March Term, 1835.

FOLLOWING STATE DECISION.

This court will give to a discharge under the insolvent law of a state the same effect here as it would have in the state in which it was granted.

Bayard Smith, for defendant, moved to enter his appearance without special bail, the defendant having been discharged under the insolvent law of New York.

Mr. Wallach, contra, stated that this action was brought upon a judgment recovered in Ohio by the plaintiff, who was then a citizen of Connecticut. The discharge produced by the defendant was under the insolvent law of New York.

Mr. Wallach cited White v. Canfield, 7 Johns. 117; Sicard v. Whale, 11 Johns. 194; Hayton v. Wilkinson [Case No. 6,272]; Whittemore v. Adams, 2 Cow. 626; James v. Allen, 1 Dall. [1 U. S.] 188; Peck v. Hozier, 14 Johns. 346; S. P. 2 Wash. C. C. 157 [Webster v. Massey, Case No. 17,336]; Sherrill v. Hopkins, 1 Cow. 103; Sturges v. Crowninshield and McMillan v. McNeill, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 122, 209; Van Raugh v. Van Arsdaln, 3 Caines, 154; Campbell v. Claudius [Case No. 2,356].

Mr. Smith cited [M'Kim v. Marshall] 1 Har. & J. 101; Richmond v. De Young, 3 Gill. & J. 66; and Penniman v. Meigs, 9 Johns. 325.

[Before CRANCH, Chief Judge, and MORSELL, Circuit Judge.]

CRANCH, Chief Judge. The decisions in the several state courts and in the circuit courts of the United States have been various. This court has always uniformly followed the decisions in the state courts of Pennsylvania and Maryland, as they stood at the time of the first case in which the court was called upon to decide upon the effect of a discharge under the insolvent law of one of the states. The rule adopted by this court, and from which it has never departed, is to give the discharge the same effect here that it would have in the state in which it was granted. The court thought that this rule was not only sanctioned, but required, by the first section of the fourth article of the constitution of the United States, which declares that "full faith and credit shall be given in each state to the public acts, records and judicial proceedings of every other state;" and by the act of congress of the 26th of May, 1790 (1 Stat. 122), which declares that they "shall have such faith and credit given to them in every court within the United States, as they have by law or usage, in the courts of the state from whence the said records are, or shall be, taken. This court, to be consistent, must adhere to the rule thus adopted, and sanctioned by thirty years' practice, until a different rule shall have been authoritatively settled by a superior tribunal.

The question then, is, whether this discharge, under the law of New York, which is now produced by the defendant, would have protected him from arrest, or would have entitled him to appear without special bail, if this action had been brought in that state. None of the cases cited by Mr. Wallach show that it would not. They were all, except Sherrill v. Hopkins and Campbell v. Claudius [supra], cases of discharge under laws of other states; not of the state in which the defendants were arrested and sought to avail themselves of the benefit of the discharge. In the case of Sherrill v. Hopkins, the question was not whether the defendant should appear without bail, but whether the contract itself was discharged. Neither that case, nor the case of Sturges v. Crowninshield, nor McMillan v. McNeill [supra], touches the present question. In the case of Campbell v. Claudius [supra], Mr. Justice Washington said: "It is true that the courts of the state where the discharge is given may be bound to discharge on common bail, no matter where the debt was contracted; but the federal courts, or the courts of other states, are under no such obligation; and they ought not, on the ground of comity, to give it effect in their courts. The state laws as to rights, furnish rules of decision for the federal courts, under certain qualifications; but as to remedies, they have no binding force in those courts." This decision applies only to the court in which it was made, and is no authority elsewhere. What he says of the obligation of the state courts, is but a dictum; and it only denies the obligation, not the discretion of those courts, to admit the defendant to appear on common bail.

The cases, referred to by the plaintiff's counsel, are cited to show that the long course of cases in which this court has uniformly decided that they will give the same effect to a discharge under the insolvent law of a state which would be given to it by the courts of the state in which it was obtained, should be overruled. Some of the cases cited show that the creditor cannot be affected by an insolvent law of a state to whose jurisdiction he has not subjected himself, so far as the rights of the creditor are concerned; but none of them go so far as to say that if he resorts to the courts of that state, he is not bound by its laws, so far as his remedy is concerned. Nor is it denied in any of them that it is competent for a state court, or for this court, which exercises jurisdiction analogous to that of a state court, to permit a defendant to appear on common bail, who has surrendered all his property, and whose person has been thereupon discharged under an insolvent law of one of the states. In Byrne v. Carpenter [Case No. 2,271], this court at December term, 1807, or 1808, decided upon demurrer, that the discharge of the principal under the insolvent law, before the return of the ca. sa. was a good discharge of the bail. See, also, Sears v. Noon [Id. 12,590] June, 1820; King v. Sim [Id. 7,805]; Jones v. Lear [Id. 7,476] April, 1824; Robert Bailey's Case [Id. 731] 1821; and the cases cited in King v. Sim [supra].

We are informed also that the supreme court of the United States, at its last session, decided, in a case not yet reported, that the circuit courts of the United States are bound to give the same effect to an insolvent discharge which a court of the state in which the circuit court sits, would give to it. But however this may be, the rule of this court, as before stated, has been long established; and as there is no reason to doubt that if this suit had been brought in a state court in New York the defendant would have been permitted to appear upon common bail (9 Johns. 325), we must permit him so to appear in this court. When arrested in New York he was obliged to surrender all his property, wherever situated, before he could be discharged. An arrest is no satisfaction in itself. It is only the means of compelling the defendant to do what he has already done, that is, to surrender his property. If he cannot avail himself of this surrender, and if he should be arrested in a place where there is no insolvent law, as he would have neither property nor credit, the consequence might be perpetual imprisonment. I am, therefore, of opinion that the defendant should be permitted to appear without special bail.

MORSELL, Circuit Judge, concurred with the chief justice in the result of his opinion, but stated it as his opinion that where the discharge was not obtained in the state where the contract was made, the courts of another state could not permit the defendant to appear without special bail.

COLLISION—LOOKOUT—LIGHT.

[1. Though a doubt exists as to the presence of a proper lookout on a colliding steamer, yet, if it is apparent that everything possible under the circumstances was done, and that the failure to have such a lookout did not contribute to the collision, the steamer is not in fault for that reason, as, by the rule laid down in The Genesee Chief, 12 How. (53 U. S.) 443, the absence of a proper lookout is only prima facie evidence of negligence.]

[2. A schooner approaching a steamer having lights at her bow and stern at right angles, and those on board supposing the steamer to be a vessel at anchor, luffed to avoid her, thereby causing a collision. Held, that the schooner was in fault.]

In admiralty. This libel was filed by [Chester W. Chapin] the owner of the steamboat Traveller, to recover the amount of damages occasioned to her by a collision with the schooner on the morning of the 20th of November, 1853, about the break of day, near Riker's island. The Traveller was on her regular trip from New Haven to New York, and the schooner was bound through the Sound from New York.

Mr. Leveridge, for libellant.

Mr. Morton and Brainard & Rice, for claimants.

Before INGERSOLL, District Judge.

BY THE COURT. Some facts in this case are not disputed, and there are some about which the witnesses differ very much. The position of the vessels at the time of collision admits of no doubt. The schooner struck the Traveller on her larboard side, about 30 or 40 feet from the stem, at an angle of about 45°. The witnesses from both vessels state that to be the case, and there can be no doubt that such was the position. Just before the collision, the helm of the schooner was turned, so that she fell off. It appears very clearly that previous to such change of course, she must have been going about at right angles with the course of the Traveller. I think any man must come to that conclusion upon the evidence. The position in which the Traveller was, appears manifest by looking at the chart. She had passed Hunt's Point, and the pilot states that she made a direct course from Hunt's Point to the northern end of the North Brother. The schooner claims that she kept near the South Brother, but it seems to me conclusive that if the schooner was between the South Brother and Riker's island, and near the flats, as she claims to have been, it was impossible that they could have come together at an angle of 45°; she must have been in a different position to have met the steamboat as she did. But if the schooner was in the position described by those on board the Traveller, I can see that she might have met her as she did, in consequence of her luff. If the collision took place near the flats between the South Brother and Riker's island, it could not have happened as it did. It must have been therefore when she was in a different position from that now claimed by her. If it was when the boat was near to the North

Brother, then I can see how the vessels could have met each other at the angle of 45°.

It is claimed by the respondents that the steamer was in fault in having no proper lookout. The rule as laid down in the case of The Genesee Chief [12 How. (53 U. S.) 443] is, that unless a steamboat has forward a careful and faithful lookout, whose special business it is to look out, the absence of such lookout shall be deemed prima facie evidence of negligence. But it is only prima facie evidence, and may be removed by other evidence. It is doubtful whether there was on the steamboat such a lookout as is required by the case of The Genesee Chief, but if there had been it would not have helped the case. Nothing more could have been done on board the steamboat than was done. It is also claimed that the steamboat had not proper lights. The evidence is clear that there was a light at her bow, and another at her stern. The light at the bow was so placed as to throw its light forward, so that, if the schooner was going at right angles, it might easily have been unseen from her, while such was her direction. After she passed the South Brother, she luffed. It seems, from the evidence, that, for some reason or other, the light which was seen on board the Traveller was supposed by those on board the schooner to be a light on a vessel at anchor. The light was in motion, and the vessels were moving at right angles with each other. How, then, they could have supposed that the light was on a vessel at anchor, is unaccountable to me. But it appears, from the evidence, that they luffed to avoid this vessel at anchor, as they supposed it to be, and only discovered that it was a steamboat when it was too late to save themselves from the danger into which their luff had brought them. The steamboat does not appear to have been in fault, but the collision was caused by the fault of the schooner.

Decree, therefore, for libellants, with a reference.

[In admiralty. Libel by Charles E. Chapin and others, owners of the brig Tornado, against the schooner Hattie Ross, for damages sustained by collision.]

SHIPMAN, District Judge. This libel is prosecuted to recover damages for the loss at sea of the brig Tornado in consequence of a collision with the schooner Hattie Ross. The collision occurred on the Atlantic ocean in latitude about 34° north, and longitude about 70° west, on the 18th of May 1865, between 12 and 1 o'clock in the morning. The pleadings in the cause are inexcusably imperfect and meagre. The libel is barely sufficient to warrant the court to found a decree upon it. Had exceptions been filed by the claimants to its sufficiency, the court would have at once ordered it amended, and the particular facts upon which a decree is asked for by the libellants set forth with proper fullness and precision. The principal material fact alleged is that the collision occurred in consequence of the omission of the Hattie Ross to carry the lights required by law, or any lights whatever. It is not alleged in the libel that the night was dark, nor is the state of the weather described at all. Neither the direction or velocity of the wind, or the course of the vessels, or their manner of approach or contact, is set forth. The libel does not even aver that the Tornado had the lights required by law, or any lights. It does charge that the schooner struck the brig amidships, cut into her and sunk her, and that the disaster was wholly owing to the failure of the schooner to carry lights. The answer admits the collision and its destructive consequences, denies that it was owing to the cause set up in the libel, and avers that it was wholly the result of negligence on part of the Tornado. The answer is quite as general as the libel.

The burden of proof in this case is clearly on the claimants. The Hattie Ross confessedly had no lights set. In cases of collision, where an ordinary and proper measure of precaution has been omitted, the burden of proof is on the vessel guilty of the omission to show that the collision was not caused by her neglect. The Lion, Spr. 44. This is emphatically the case where the omitted precaution was one required by statute. Waring v. Clarke, 5 How. [46 U. S.] 441. In the latter case the respondents had neglected to carry the lights required by the act of congress of July 7, 1838. See, also, The Margaret v. The Tascar, 15 Law T. (N. S.) 86. The evidence for the libellants rests on the statements of the master, mate, and lookout on the Tornado. They all appear to have been on deck from the time the Hattie Ross was discovered till she collided with the brig. Saunders, who was at the wheel, was not examined as a witness. The night was rather dark, though stars were visible. Some clouds hung on the horizon. The wind was in the neighborhood of S. E.,—the witness on neither side being very exact on this point. The wind was moderate,—not stronger than a five or six knot breeze. The Tornado was bound from Philadelphia to New Orleans, and the Hattie Ross from New York to Porto Rico. The Tornado was on her port tack on a course southerly and westerly, and the Hattie Ross on her starboard tack and a course southerly and easterly. As already stated, the Tornado had four men on deck,—the captain, mate, lookout, and wheelsman. The Hattie Ross had two men on deck,—the second mate, who was at the wheel, and a man on the lookout. The three witnesses who were examined on part of the Tornado, and who were on deck at the time the Hattie Ross was discovered, all swear positively that she had her lights set (both green and red) in their proper places. This point is controverted by the witnesses from the Hattie Ross; but only the two in charge of the deck saw the Tornado until near the moment of collision, and they did not see her until she was quite near. That they did not see the lights of the brig, is not sufficient to overcome the evidence of the libellant's witnesses on this point. It is alleged by those on the Hattie Ross, that after the brig sunk, and her officers and crew were transferred to the former, they admitted that they had no lights. This is explicitly denied. On the whole evidence on this point, the court is satisfied that the Tornado had her colored lights set in conformity to the requirements of the act of congress. It is conceded that the schooner had no lights set.

It appears from the concurrent testimony of the master, mate, and lookout on the Tornado that they discovered the Hattie Ross, some time before the collision, to starboard, and supposed she was running with a free wind. That after watching her some time they saw she was standing towards the brig, when the captain of the brig ordered the wheel hard down and her head sheets let go, when, almost immediately, the schooner struck her and she soon sunk, all hands escaping to the schooner. There is considerable discrepancy between these witnesses in their estimates of the time which elapsed after they discovered the Hattie Ross till the collision. But estimates of time on such an occasion can never be exact. An attempt to make them so usually excites suspicion, and tends to discredit the witness who assumes to measure time with accuracy under such circumstances. The court is entirely satisfied that, while the schooner was discovered a considerable distance off, her course was mistaken by those on the brig, and this mistake was not discovered till it was too late to prevent a collision; or at least not till the vessels were so near as to excite great alarm on the Tornado. It was insisted on the argument that the captain of the brig ordered his wheel hard up instead of hard down, and that if he had not done so no collision would have taken place. The court will not stop to inquire into this alleged erroneous maneuver. Assuming it to have been an error, it was done under circumstances which make its consequences chargeable, not upon the Tornado, but on the Hattie Ross. Had the latter exhibited colored lights as required by law, there is every reason to believe that her course would have been made out by the Tornado, in ample time to have prevented a collision. The Tornado was not able to make out the course of the schooner until the vessels were very near each other, and then as the schooner was discovered to be approaching, and very near the brig, a movement must be made at once to avert the collision. The change had to be made by the brig instantly, with no opportunity for deliberation, and in the midst of more or less alarm and confusion. As was remarked by Chief Justice Taney in the case of The Genesee Chief v. Fitzhugh, 12 How. [53 U. S.] 443, "if an error was committed under such circumstances, it was not a fault." See, also, 1 Conkl. Adm. (Ed. 1857) pp. 388, 400, and cases there cited. The cases referred to by the author arose out of collisions between steamers and sailing vessels, but the same doctrine is applicable to the latter class of vessels colliding with each other.

If there were any doubt on the evidence for the libellants that the vessels were very near each other before the course of the schooner was made out by the brig, that doubt would be wholly dissipated by the testimony of the second mate of the schooner who was a witness for the claimants. He was in charge of the deck at and before the collision. In his examination in chief he says: "All I have got to say about the collision between the schooner and the brig Tornado is that I was at the wheel at the time, and the man on the lookout reported this vessel. I told him to take the wheel from me that I might go and see how she was. The minute I saw how the brig was I sung out to the man at the wheel of the Hattie Ross to put his wheel hard down. He jammed his wheel hard down, and I jumped on to the topgallant forecastle and sung out to them on board the Tornado to put their wheel hard down. The captain of the Tornado * * * sung out to the man at his wheel to heave his wheel hard up. Well we were shaking in the wind at the time those vessels came together." On being further questioned by the counsel for the claimants, this witness, when asked how near the Tornado was when he saw her, replied "She was pretty close; I could not say how far off she was." This is not very clear or exact, but, on the cross-examination, this witness was asked, "How far from you was the Tornado when you got forward?" To which he replied: "Well, I could not exactly tell you. She was pretty close. I could not exactly say. I suppose, to my best judgment, she might be twice her length. She might be a little more or less. I could not say for certain." It is quite certain that, although the brig discovered the schooner some distance off, she could not make out her course till the vessels were in a most dangerous proximity. She appears to have ascertained the course of the schooner at about the same instant that the latter first sighted the br g. Had the Hattie Ross shown her colored lights as the law requires, there can be no doubt that the Tornado would have ascertained her course in ample time to have avoided the collision, as her officers and lookout were watching her, and endeavoring to make out the direction in which she was moving.

It was insisted on the hearing that the Tornado had no sufficient lookout. This is true. The man stationed for that purpose was a green hand—young and inexperienced. He was not such a lookout as the law requires. But as the schooner was discovered in time to have been avoided, and was narrowly watched by the officers of the Tornado for the purpose of ascertaining her course, but in vain, till it was too late, it is evident that the collision is not chargeable to the incompetence of the lookout. The schooner neglected a plain requirement of the statute, enacted for the very purpose of enabling her to disclose her course to an approaching vessel. Her fault in this respect was gross and inexcusable, and tended directly and immediately to produce the disaster. She has wholly failed to exculpate herself, and must be condemned to bear the consequences of the disaster.

Let a decree be entered for the libellants, with an order of reference to a commissioner to report the damages.

Case No. 2,599.

CHAPIN et al. v. NORTON et al.

[6 McLean, 500.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Michigan. June Term, 1855.

CONTRACT—RIGHT TO ABANDON—DAMAGES FOR BREACH—ACCOUNT STATED.

1. Under a contract made by the complainants with the defendants, the complainants agreed to purchase all the lumber sawed by the defendants on Grand river, on the terms specified, taking it at the mill and transporting it to Chicago, &c. Among other conditions, the complainants agreed to furnish supplies for the hands of the defendants, &c., which, after about a year, they refused to do; on which the defendants abandoned the contract.

2. Where one party refuses to do a certain thing, under the contract, which was necessary to enable the other party to perform his part of the contract, he may abandon the contract. And in such case the party first refusing, is liable to the other for damages.

3. But such damages must be limited to the immediate consequences resulting from the refusal to perform the contract, and cannot extend to probable profits which might have been realized if the contract had been carried out.

4. The party who abandoned the contract on the failure of the other party to perform in a material part, is not liable for damages.

5. A large quantity of the lumber being in possession of the defaulting party, it would seem that he, having repudiated the contract, cannot afterwards claim the benefit of the contract, in disposing of the lumber on hand. Under any circumstances he would be entitled to a reasonable compensation for selling the lumber.

6. In the process of a continuing contract, if accounts are received and adjusted without objection, it is too late to make an objection at the trial.

7. And where an inconvenience is suffered by the delay of the other party, notice should be given.

Willing & Gray, for complainants.
Mr. Lathrop, for defendants.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This is a bill in chancery, in which the complainants ask the foreclosure of a mortgage. On the 20th of February, 1850, the parties entered into an agreement substantially as follows:—The complainants are lumber merchants and reside in Chicago, and they entered into an agreement with the defendants, who owned a steam saw mill on Grand river, in the state of Michigan, and were engaged in sawing lumber, to purchase all the lumber that they should manufacture at their mill, for five years, on the following terms: 1. Five dollars per thousand feet was to be paid for merchantable; two dollars fifty cents for culls, and one dollar per thousand for pine laths. 2. The complainants were to receive the lumber at the mill and sell it in Chicago, and in addition to the above prices, were to pay the defendants one-half the net profits. 3. They were to procure vessels to take the lumber from the mill to Chicago, the amount to be ascertained by tally on delivery at Chicago. 4. The complainants were to furnish to the defendants all the supplies needed to carry on their mill. 5. The lumber to be paid for on the receipt of the price of sale. 6. For all moneys advanced by complainants, they were to receive interest at ten per cent. 7. The expense of the transportation and all other expenses of sale, &c., were to be deducted out of the proceeds, before the division of the profits. 8. At the close of each month an account of sales was to be rendered to the defendants, and at the close of the year a settlement was to be had. At the date of the agreement, the complainants loaned to the defendants two thousand dollars and took from them a mortgage for the payment, with interest at ten per cent., in one and two years; and also conditioned for the repayment of all advances made under the contract, and also for the performance of the contract. In November, 1851, the defendants refused to deliver any more lumber under the contract, alleging that the complainants had broken it by a refusal to furnish supplies. In February, 1852, the defendants commenced an action at law against the complainants, in Ottaway county, to recover damages for the alleged breach of the contract. That suit, under the act of congress, was removed to this court, and is still pending. In the fall of 1852 this bill was filed, to foreclose the mortgage. The answer admits the execution of the mortgage, but alleges that complainants first violated the contract, which released the defendants from all obligation under it. And they claim damages from the complainants.

In order that the decision of this case may finally settle the controversy, it was agreed by both parties that the matter between them, arising under the contract, shall be finally settled in this suit, and a decree entered against either party as the court shall decide. The complainants claim the mortgage and interest, amounting to the sum of two thousand eight hundred and sixty-six dollars and sixty-six cents; and also a balance on the account current, including interest, amounting to the sum of one hundred and seventy-nine dollars and forty-seven cents. These items make the sum of three thousand forty-six dollars and thirteen cents. And a large amount is claimed as damages for the failure of the defendants to perform the contract. The defendants claim damages from the complainants for breaking the contract, by refusing to furnish the necessary supplies, which compelled them to sell their lumber at a lower price than was stipulated in the contract, in order to continue their manufacture. And they allege that at the close of the fourth quarter, as appears by their own account, the complainants had on hand 573,122 feet of lumber, for which they have never accounted. And they say the interest and discounts have been regularly charged by them. The expenses charged are, they aver, unreasonable, and ought not to be allowed. And in the answer damages are claimed for stopping their mill by an injunction, obtained by complainants. Breaches of contract are also set up, as a ground for damages, in not sending for the lumber in proper time, by which means large amounts of it were piled upon the wharf at the mill, which caused great inconvenience and damage to the defendants. The accuracy of the accounts rendered by the complainants are questioned, and damage was suffered by the defendants, it is averred, by the complainant's selling at a longer time than was agreed on.

Before the question of damages is considered, it is important to ascertain whether the complainants or defendants are responsible for breaking up the contract. On this point the evidence is clear. Every one acquainted with the business in which the defendants are engaged, must be aware that it requires a large expenditure. A large number of hands must be constantly employed in procuring the logs and bringing them to the mill, and in sawing the lumber. Teams and vehicles must be used in the business. All these must be supported and wages paid to the hands. It appears thirty-five hands were employed in the above business, and sometimes, it is supposed, a greater number. Supplies, it appears, could not be purchased at Grand river, nor its vicinity, and the nearest market where the necessary articles could be purchased was Chicago. These supplies consisted of provisions for the hands, food for the cattle, and several expensive articles used in running the mill. And in the agreement the complainants undertook to furnish these supplies. We see from the account rendered that in the course of a year they required a large expenditure. From the nature of these supplies, the manufacture of lumber must stop if they were withheld. And, as appears from the evidence, they were withheld by the complainants. The pretence assigned was, that they had already made large advances under this head and could make no more. At this time, it appears, they had in their possession lumber that would more than cover the amount of the advances. And it also appears that large quantities of lumber were piled up at the mill, which it was their duty to remove. They must have known that withholding supplies at the beginning of winter, without notice, must stop the mill and greatly embarrass, if not ruin, the defendants.

From the evidence it appears, that the complainants were desirous, not only to get rid of the contract, but to possess themselves of the defendants' property. This motive was so often expressed to various persons at Chicago, and elsewhere, and so carried out by their acts that, reluctantly, we are brought to the conclusion that such was their intention. And to bring out this result, the defendants were to be led on unsuspectingly by certain devices, so that the refusal to furnish supplies would be most injurious to the defendants and beneficial to the complainants. The facts proved, necessarily lead to this conclusion. It is unnecessary to say, that in all contracts where certain things are to be done by the parties, a failure by one party will justify the other in abandoning the contract. But in a matter where the performance of the one party was necessary to enable the other party to perform, as in this case, the contract may be considered as abrogated. This view settles the question against the complainants' claim for damages, by reason of the acts of the defendants. They must stand upon their mortgage and matters of account.

The complainants claim mortgage money and interest together, with a balance on account current of one hundred and forty-seven dollars and interest—the latter item may be affected by some other items in the account current, which are disputed. The other claims, except the one for interest, are cut off by the breach of the contract on their part. In their answers the defendants claim damages on account of the injunction in this case, which necessarily suspended the operation of their mill, and the cutting or removing of timber from their lands. This was no doubt very injurious to their interests, but it was an injury for which no redress can be given. The suspension resulted from the allowance of the injunction; and although the complainants were active in procuring the writ, yet they are protected by the act of the court. The counsel for the defense yields this point. Nor are the defendants entitled to damages for the reduction of the lumber received at Chicago, by the tally at that place. This claim is also very properly yielded by the defendants' counsel. The contract stipulates that the Chicago tally shall fix the amount of lumber received, and this amount must stand, unless a mistake or fraud shall be made to appear in taking it. It seems to be usual at Chicago to make a deduction in the lumber for shrinkage, and several witnesses think the amount deducted on this account not greater than usual. It does not appear that the charges of expense of the transportation of the lumber to Chicago, or in the tally and sale of it at that city, was objected to by defendants, when the monthly or quarterly accounts were rendered; and it is too late to raise the objection at the hearing, unless fraud or mistake can be shown. On the 1st of December, 1851, it appears the complainants had on hand 738,508 feet of lumber, and 98,450 pieces of lath; and the defendants insist that as complainants refused to go on with the contract, by a failure to furnish supplies, they are not entitled to the advantage arising, under the contract, for the sale of this lumber. There is much force in this suggestion. But the complainants could not be required to sell the lumber, without a reasonable compensation. It would seem proper that, as the complainants refused to perform their part of the contract, so as to authorize an abandonment of it by the defendants, in regard to the lumber on hand, they could not go on under the contract. This point is not now finally decided, but reserved.

There can be but little doubt that the defendants are entitled to damages for the refusal of the complainants to furnish supplies. But these damages must be limited to the act of refusal, and the immediate consequences resulting therefrom. The injury cannot be extended to the profits arising from the contract, if it had been performed by the complainants. Such damages are remote and contingent. But the contract was abandoned by defendants, which, under the circumstances, would limit their claim, as stated. The damages claimed on account of the large amount of lumber which accumulated at the mill, covering the wharf to the great inconvenience and damage of the defendants, by reason of the complainants' neglect to remove it, might have constituted a ground for allowance had the complainants been notified of the fact and requested to remove it. But, without such notice, there seems to be no ground for an allowance. The loss by fire of sixty thousand feet of lumber, at the mill, cannot be charged to the complainants, or any part of it. Interest is charged, in the current account, for payments made under the contract. If these payments were made in advance, the charge is a proper one; but if they were made on a sale of the lumber, as the contract required, no interest should be charged. The account current is not before me, but a succinct statement of items taken from the account. Without that account, a final decision is impracticable. Nothing more can be done than to require a report from a master on the items allowed to the defendants. It appears from the briefs, that from the 20th of February to the 1st of May, 1852, no account of sales was rendered, but only a statement of the profits. This would be unsatisfactory, if the complainants shall be required to account for the sale of this lumber under the contract.

It is therefore ordered that the account current and all the evidence in this case, be referred to a master in chancery, who shall report at the ensuing term, on the claims for damages as above stated. And the master will specially report: First. What would be the proceeds of the lumber on hand on the 1st December, 1851, at the current prices in Chicago, after allowing the usual per cent. for selling, the cost of transportation, and the money paid by the complainants under the contract. Second. What amount of damages was sustained by the defendants, under the restrictions stated, for refusing to furnish supplies. Third. What, if any, deductions should be made from the items of interest charged in the account current. Fourth. Any items incorrectly charged in the account current, through mistake or otherwise.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This is an action of trover for two hundred and three barrels of flour, which belonged to plaintiff. Plea, not guilty. A jury being sworn, Jeremiah S. Littlejohn was offered as a witness, and was objected to by defendants' counsel, on the ground of interest. He and his partner were shippers of the flour, and if he shall now be permitted to prove a conversion of the flour by the defendant, it may relieve the witness from responsibility. But the court held, that the witness and his partner acted as agents in shipping the flour, and there was no preponderating influence which would exclude him from giving testimony. In England the doctrine has been departed from, so far as to admit a witness interested, if not a party on the record, leaving his credit with the jury. But this witness has no interest which can exclude him. The witness states that he was acquainted with the firm of Siger, Brown & Co., of Buffalo. The two hundred and three barrels of flour were shipped from Detroit, to defendants, 19th November, 1846, on board the propeller St. Joseph. The witness was asked who was the owner of the property; which question the defendant objected to, because the ownership is shown by the bill of lading. 2 Starkie, Ev. 283, "where goods are shipped on account of the consignee, the property must be recognized as being in him." 2 Camp. 36. Goods shipped to consignee, consignor can not maintain an action for them. [Creery v. Holly] 14 Wend. 26; Abb. Shipp. 249; 4 Cow. & H. Notes, 1439. The court held that the bill of lading can not be contradicted. The property was shipped by Littlejohn & Co.; but the court permitted evidence that the consignee had notice the property belonged to Chapin, and that a corrected bill of lading was forwarded, which was admitted in evidence, requesting defendants to enter the flour on account of Chapin. In January 7, 1847, the defendants were told by witness that they had sent the shippers an account of the sales of this identical flour, and they admitted the fact; but witness objected, because it was in pursuance of orders given. Defendants admitted that they had received a letter informing them that Chapin owned the flour. In March or April, 1847, heard Chapin make a demand of the flour, 203 barrels, on a ware-house receipt; this was at Detroit; defendant said he was away from home, and did not know whether such a shipment had been made. Chapin demanded satisfaction; Siger refused to pay. This was before suit was commenced. Witness never did, in any way, satisfy the sale of the flour. At Buffalo, witness told the defendants that the flour belonged to Chapin, who had instructed witness, etc., not to have it sold, but to store it until better prices. Defendants said in the multiplicity of business they had overlooked the instruction. The letter of defendants giving an account of sales, was dated the 14th of December, 1846. The defendants admitted that the account included all the flour sent by the St. Joseph, 19th of November, 1846. Flour, in 1846, at Buffalo, was worth from $3.75 to $4. Some sales were made for $5. A letter press copy was offered in evidence, of a letter dated 31st December, 1846, to defendants. Notice was given to the defendants' counsel to produce the original. The counsel averred that they had not the original, and had never seen it. The court held, the notice was not reasonable, and that the defendants were not to be required to produce the original, unless it were in their possession, or in possession of their counsel, under such a notice. And that a letter-press copy, though written at the same time, could not be received as an original.

The defense made, was, that before the bill of lading was corrected, showing that the 203 barrels were owned by Chapin, defendants accepted on the shipment, bills drawn 19th November, 1846, exceeding the receipts for the sale of the flour, several hundred dollars. A bill, amounting to two thousand seven hundred and fifty-two dollars, was drawn on the shipment, the day it was made, which was accepted and paid, before the letter, correcting the error, was received. Afterward an advance was made on the same flour, on claim of Chapin. Depositions were offered to be read to impeach the statements of Littlejohn, by proving certain conversations with the defendants, respecting this transaction. The plaintiff's counsel objected, because, Littlejohn, when under examination, had not been asked in regard to these conversations. The court sustained the objections, but permitted Littlejohn to be called by the defendants, and the questions were asked him. The account rendered was proved to be correct; and that Littlejohn asked an advance, and, adding a few barrels, he obtained $650. Littlejohn said that they would be safe in making a further advance, as flour had risen, and that he was authorized to dispose of the 203 barrels. Another witness states that the draft of $2,750 was accepted before the error was corrected. On the part of the defendants it is insisted, to sustain this action, the plaintiff must show a demand of the 203 barrels of flour. 2 Saund. Pl. & Ev. 414 and 883; 1 Camp. 429. And that the party on whom the demand is made must have it in his power to deliver the property. 2 H. Bl. 135. That excuses for not delivering, is not a conversion—the refusal to deliver must be absolute, or there must be a tortious conversion. 5 Barn. & C. 248. It is also contended if the defendants were in advance when the two hundred and three barrels were received, defendants had a lien on the flour, and they could retain it against the plaintiff. That the factor has a general lien for any balance.

The court instructed the jury that, to support the action, there must be a demand and refusal, or an actual conversion of the property, and that they must find the right of property was in the plaintiff. And the court said to the jury, that it did not appear, from the evidence, that any draft had been drawn against the two hundred and three barrels of flour, or that Chapin had received the proceeds of the same. From the defendants' letters, dated the 12th and 19th of February, 1847, the draft for $2,752, was drawn against other property, which was received about the same time, and perhaps, in the same vessel, with the two hundred and three barrels. If the jury shall find the facts as suggested by the court, and they are referred to the evidence, and they shall be satisfied that there was a demand and refusal to deliver the property, and that it was not sold by the plaintiff's orders, the defendants being notified that the plaintiff was the owner of the flour, and that they were not in advance to the plaintiff, their verdict would be for the plaintiff for such damages as shall be equitable. That the plaintiff would be entitled to the rise in the market, for a reasonable time after the demand was made. That if the sale was wrongfully made, at a time when the article was depressed, the defendants having no right or authority to sell, would not fix the rule of damages for the plaintiff.

The jury found for the plaintiff. A motion for a new trial was made and overruled.

DISCHARGE — MERCHANT UNDER BANKRUPT ACT—BOOKS OF ACCOUNT—PREFERENCES.

1. One who buys from time to time paintings, but not in the course of his regular business, is not a merchant within the meaning of the bankrupt act [14 Stat. 534], although he places such pictures in a public gallery and sells them at auction; and he is not required to keep books of account.

2. When the bankrupt testifies that the occasion of his going into bankruptcy was an unforeseen increase of indebtedness occurring subsequently to payment in full made to certain creditors, the fact that he was actually insolvent at the time of making such payment does not compel the inference that bankruptcy was then contemplated. The design to give a preference must be established as a fact.

[In bankruptcy. In the matter of Henry T. Chapman.] Creditors of the bankrupt opposed his discharge, upon the ground that, being engaged in the purchase and sale of pictures for profit, he was a merchant and trader within the meaning of the bankrupt act and as such had kept no books of account, and on the further ground that he had, in contemplation of bankruptcy, made transfers of property to certain creditors, with the intent to prefer such creditors. It appeared upon the bankrupt's examination that, at the time he filed his petition in bankruptcy, he had for two years been a clerk with a mercantile house, and that prior thereto he had been for nineteen years in the employ of a bank, occupying every position except that of president. During a portion of this period the bankrupt was in the habit of buying, collecting, and selling oil paintings, at one time making a large sale of pictures at auction at a public gallery in New York.

B. F. Tracy, for bankrupt.

BENEDICT, District Judge. The bankrupt, whose discharge is opposed, was a bank cashier and clerk in New York City. The evidence in respect to his purchase and sale of oil paintings, does not, in my opinion, constitute him a merchant within the meaning of the bankrupt act. The objection to the discharge upon the ground, that, being a merchant, he failed to keep proper books of account, cannot therefore be sustained.

The objections founded upon the preferences alleged to have been made in contemplation of bankruptcy, must likewise fail for want of sufficient proof that they were so made. The payments complained of were made some two years prior to the filing of the petition. The bankrupt testifies that when they were made he had no intention of going into bankruptcy, and the circumstances attending the payments as disclosed by him, while they show an actual insolvency at the time, do not necessarily compel the inference that any act of bankruptcy or resort to proceedings in bankruptcy, was then contemplated. "To infer a design to give a preference to a favored creditor, and in the immediate expectation of bankruptcy from the mere fact of insolvency, is by no means a certain inference. The evidence must go further and establish as a fact the design to give the preference, a fact too important to be left upon conjecture." Jones v. Howland, 8 Metc. [Mass.] 385.

The unexpected increase of the bankrupt's liability in August, 1876, caused by the entry of a judgment for deficiency of over ten thousand dollars by one of the creditors now opposing the discharge, with the attendant circumstances, affords a reason for going into bankruptcy which did not exist at the time of the payments under consideration, and the bankrupt testifies that this was the circumstance that led him for the first time to contemplate proceedings in bankruptcy.

Upon the evidence before me I am therefore unable to hold it proved that the payments referred to in the specifications were made in contemplation of bankruptcy. The objections to the discharge must therefore be overruled.

PRIZE OF WAR—PIRACY.

1. Where a vessel was fitted out within a loyal state, for the purpose of cruising against the commerce of the United States, under a letter of marque, issued by the government of the so-called Confederate States, and was seized, libeled and condemned on the instance side of the court: Held, that the officers and crew of a United States man-of-war, who aided in the seizure, were not entitled, under the act of April 23, 1800 [2 Stat. 52], to a share of the proceeds as prize of war.

2. Neither were they entitled to such share under the act of August 5, 1861 [12 Stat. 314], as of a vessel fitted out for the commission of acts of piracy—the piracy referred to in that act being piracy under the laws of nations.

[In admiralty. Libel by the officers and crew of the United States vessel Cyane to recover one-half of the proceeds of the schooner Chapman.]

W. H. Sharp, U. S. Atty., and Alex. Campbell, for claimant.

B. S. Brooks and J. McHenry, for officers and crew.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. Late in the month of February, 1863, the revenue officers at this port were informed that certain persons in this city were engaged in fitting out the schooner Chapman as a privateer, to cruise under the flag of the Confederate States, against the commerce of the United States. A search for the schooner was at once instituted, and on ascertaining where she lay, detective officers were placed on watch, with instructions to report everything that took place on board of her either in the daytime or during the night. She shortly afterward commenced receiving cargo, amongst which were some very heavy cases, subsequently ascertained to contain guns.

On the fourteenth of March the vessel was cleared at the custom-house, and the authorities became satisfied that her preparations were completed and that she was about to sail. Fearing that she might attempt to get to sea at high tide in the evening, a steam-tug was chartered and placed, with fires banked, in an adjoining slip, ready to start at a moment's notice. On board of her were the collector, the naval officer and the surveyor, together with Mr. Lees, a detective officer, and a squad of policemen. No movement was made by the schooner during the night, but a large number of persons were observed to go on board of her and conceal themselves in the hold. About daylight, the crew of the schooner commenced loosening her fasts and hauling out beyond a vessel that lay near. She shortly afterward went further out into the stream, and began to hoist her jib and mainsail. About ten days previously, information of what was going on had been communicated by the revenue officers to Colonel Drum, adjutant-general of this department, and an order had been obtained from him, directing Captain Winder, commanding Fort Alcatraz, to receive and hold as prisoners any persons whom the revenue officers might bring to the island. There being no revenue cutter then on this station, Captain Shirly, of the United States ship Cyane, was also applied to by the collector and surveyor, and a written order to his executive officer was obtained, directing him to furnish two boats' crews of armed men at any hour of the day or night that they might be called for by the custom-house authorities. An arrangement was accordingly made between the officer of the deck of the Cyane and Messrs. Farwell and McLean, who visited him for that purpose on the night of the fourteenth, that if the vessel should drop out from the slip, and there should be no indications of the presence of the custom-house officers, the boats should be dispatched and the vessel seized.

The schooner having dropped out, as has been stated, and the steam-tug not having moved, the boats of the Cyane were manned and started for the schooner. These proceedings were observed from the tug; but at that moment a person appeared on the wharf and hailed the schooner, and the custom-house officers, being desirous of arresting all the persons concerned in the enterprise, delayed, for a short time, the steam-tug, in order to give an opportunity to this person to get on board. Not having heard the hail, the Cyane's boats continued their course, and arriving first at the schooner, boarded and took possession of her. About ten or fifteen minutes afterward, the tug, with the custom-house officers and police officers, came alongside. A search of the vessel and of the persons of the crew was immediately made, and the vessel was towed by the tug to Fort Alcatraz. These proceedings seem to have been conducted under the exclusive direction of the custom-house officials, who assumed entire control. The Cyane's boats returned to the ship, leaving, however, an officer and four men on board the Chapman. On reaching Alcatraz, the prisoners were landed and turned over to Captain Winder. The vessel was then unladen, and was subsequently towed up and anchored under the guns of the Cyane.

At the next term of the circuit court, indictments against the prisoners were found, and three of the principal offenders were tried, convicted and sentenced. The vessel was also libeled in the district court as forfeited to the United States, under the acts of August 5 and August 6, 1861. No claim was interposed, and she was condemned by default, sold, and her proceeds brought into the registry for distribution. At this stage of the proceeding, the commander of the Cyane, Paul Shirly, intervened, claiming for himself and his officers and men a share of the fund.

Without dwelling on the somewhat peculiar circumstances under which the seizure of the vessel was effected, or on the fact that no proceedings to condemn her or her cargo as a prize of war have been instituted, I proceed to consider the grounds on which the alleged captors base their claim to a moiety of the proceeds. These are: 1. That the vessel and cargo were enemies' property, and, therefore, good prize of war; and, 2. That the captors are entitled to a moiety of the proceeds under the provisions of section 1 of the act of August 5, 1861, entitled "An act supplementary to an act entitled an act to protect the commerce of the United States and to punish the crime of piracy."

1. Is the vessel and cargo to be considered enemies' property? It is not to be questioned, since the recent decisions of the supreme court, that a civil war, with all the consequences to the residents of the seceded states of a public territorial war, or a bellum inter gentes has existed in this country since the act of July, 1861 [12 Stat. 283], by which its existence was recognized. The minority of the judges dated its commencement from that time, as they deemed an act of congress essential, under the constitution, to create a state of war, and that until the legislature acted, the hostile proceedings were to be regarded as an insurrection, for which the guilty parties alone were to be held personally responsible. The majority of the judges held that civil war was a material fact which the court was bound to notice, and that the proclamations of blockade by the president were a recognition of a state of war as actually existing. But the court was unanimous in regarding the war as existing in a legal sense, with all the consequences of war, both as respects the belligerents and neutrals from the date of the act of congress referred to. In the exercise of the belligerent rights thus created, the United States have established blockades, exercised the right of search, authorized the capture and condemnation of neutrals carrying contraband or attempting to run the blockade, and declared liable to seizure and confiscation the property of the de facto residents of the so-called Confederate States as enemies' property, irrespective of the personal conduct or sentiments of the owners. The rules of war have also been applied to the conduct of military and naval operations—the prisoners captured have been held as prisoners of war, and a cartel has been agreed on providing for their exchange, and including those taken on regularly commissioned privateers, as well as in the land forces of the enemy.

But while thus yielding to the inexorable fact, and conceding the rights of belligerents to the insurgents, in this deplorable civil war, it cannot be pretended that they or their adherents have any other or further rights than those of belligerents in an international war or a bellum inter gentes. All persons who voluntarily reside within the dominions of a sovereign and accept the protection of his laws, owe to him an allegiance. If they conspire against his authority and levy war upon him, or give aid and comfort to his enemies, they are traitors, not enemies, and are punished, not jure belli, but by the exercise of the municipal right inherent in every sovereign within his own territory over those who receive his protection. The persons, therefore, who in this case, in a loyal state, and within the undisputed territory of the United States, set on foot a hostile enterprise, and engaged in the existing rebellion, were justly dealt with as traitors, not enemies, and the instruments intended to be used in the prosecution of their guilty design were properly libeled on the instance side of the court as forfeited to the United States for breach of its municipal laws. It is therefore clear that the claim of the petitioners, under the act of April 13, 1800, which gives to the captors a portion of the proceeds of all vessels and goods "which shall be adjudged good prize," is wholly inadmissible; for the Chapman and her cargo have not been so adjudged, nor could they have been, had a proceeding for that purpose been instituted.

2. But it is contended that the petitioners are entitled to a moiety of the proceeds under the first section of the act of August 5, 1861. That section provides, that "any vessel or boat which shall be built, purchased, fitted out in whole or in part, or held for the purpose of being employed in the commission of any piratical aggression, search, restraint, depredation, or seizure, or in the commission of any other act of piracy, as defined by the law of nations, shall be liable to be captured and brought into any port of the United States, if found upon the high seas, or to be seized if found in any port or place within the United States, whether the same shall have actually sailed upon any piratical expedition or not, and whether any act of piracy shall have been committed upon or from such vessel or boat or not; and any such vessel or boat may be adjudged and condemned, if captured by a vessel authorized, as hereinafter mentioned, to the use of the United States, and to that of the captors; and if seized by a collector, surveyor, or marshal, to the use of the United States, after due process and trial in like manner as is provided in section four of the act to which this act is supplementary, which section is hereby made in all respects applicable to cases arising under this act."

The act of March 3, 1819 [3 Stat. 512], subjected to capture only those vessels or boats which should commit or attempt any piratical aggression, search, restraint, depredation or seizure, while the supplementary act of 1861 subjects to capture on the high seas, and to seizure in port, vessels built, purchased, fitted out, in whole or in part, or held for the purpose of being employed in the commission of any such piratical aggression, search, restraint, etc. It is plain that the piratical acts contemplated in both statutes are the same, the only difference between the acts being, that the earlier statute extends only to vessels which have committed or attempted them, while the later statute includes vessels intended to be employed in committing them. That the offenses thus referred to are such only as would be deemed piratical under the laws of nations, is, I think, evident from the language of both statutes.

The second section of the act of 1819, authorizes the capture of any vessel which shall have committed or attempted any piratical aggression upon any vessel of the United States, or the citizens thereof, or upon any other vessel. The authority here given is not merely over vessels of the United States, or over citizens of the United States, but it is extended over all vessels guilty of piratical aggressions upon vessels of the United States, or the citizens thereof, or upon any other vessel. It cannot be presumed that congress meant to direct the capture of a foreign vessel and crew, for an aggression on the high seas upon another foreign vessel, unless the aggression was piratical under the laws of nations—an offense of which any nation may take cognizance.

The third section, while it authorizes the commander and crew of any merchant vessel of the United States to resist any piratical aggression made upon her, and to retake any United States vessel which may have been unlawfully seized, expressly excepts seizures by public armed vessels of nations in amity with the United States, thus indicating that the seizures referred to are piratical seizures jure gentium, and not seizures by commissioned national vessels, however irregular or unlawful the latter may be.

The fifth section provides that "if any person or persons whosoever shall, on the high seas, commit the crime of piracy, as defined by the laws of nations," etc., every such offender shall, on conviction, be punished with death. The piracy here referred to is thus expressly declared to be piracy, "as defined by the laws of nations," and it is reasonable to suppose that it is the same crime as those referred to in the preceding sections for the commission, or attempt to commit which, vessels were made subject to capture, either by public or private vessels of the United States.

The act of 1861 describes the vessels which it makes liable to capture or seizure, as those which shall be built, purchased, fitted out, or held for the purpose of being employed in the commission of any piratical aggression, search, depredation, or seizure, or in the commission of any other act of piracy, as defined by the laws of nations. This act is expressly declared to be supplementary to the act of 1819, and the description of the piracy in the last clause of the section cited, when taken in connection with the language of the earlier statute, indicates that the aggressions, seizures, etc., referred to, were such only as under the laws of nations would be piratical. It is to be noted, also, that the vessels described are those built, fitted out, etc., for the purpose of being employed in the commission of any piratical aggression, etc. It is not necessary that they should have been fitted out by American citizens, or in American ports, nor that the intended aggression should be upon American vessels or citizens. In thus authorizing the capture on the high seas of all vessels, whether American or foreign, fitted out or held for the commission of piracy, congress must be presumed to have referred to vessels designing to commit crimes, of which, if consummated, the United States could have taken cognizance. This they clearly could not do of an act not amounting to piracy under the laws of nations, committed by foreigners, in a foreign vessel, on the high seas, in regard to another foreign vessel. It is probable, however, that the fitting out, etc., referred to is a fitting out within the United States, or of an American vessel; for it is not perceived, by what authority the United States can direct the capture, on the high seas, of a foreign vessel, which has been fitted out and held in a foreign port, for piratical purposes, unless she is, at the time of her capture, on a piratical cruise, and is a pirate under the laws of nations.

Construing, then, the act of 1861 to refer to aggressions, depredations, etc., which are piracies, as defined by the laws of nations, the inquiry arises, was the enterprise in which the Chapman was engaged of that character? It appeared in proofs that the parties who originated the plan were provided with a blank letter of marque, issued by the authorities of the so-called Confederate States. Their design was to sail from this port with guns, ammunition, etc., on board their vessel, and a crew sufficient to man a privateer. They were first to proceed to the island of Guadalupe, where the guns, ammunition, and men were to be landed. The vessel was then to go to Mazatlan, for which port she had been cleared at the custom-house; and, having delivered her cargo, filled up her letter of marque, and transmitted a copy of her crew list, etc., to the rebel authorities, to return to Guadalupe, take her armament on board, hoist the Confederate flag, and proceed on her cruise against the vessels of the United States.

In the celebrated argument by Mr. (afterward Chief Justice) Marshall, in the Robbins Case [Case No. 11,878], it is said: "In truth, the right of every nation to punish, is limited in its nature to offenses against the nation inflicting the punishment. This principle is believed to be universally true. It comprehends every possible violation of its laws on its own territory, and it extends to violations committed elsewhere, by persons it has a right to bind. It extends, also, to general piracy. A pirate, under the laws of nations, is an enemy of the human race. Being the enemy of all, he is liable to be punished by all. Any act which denotes this universal hostility, is an act of piracy. Not only an actual robbery, therefore, but cruising on the high seas without commission, and with intent to rob, is piracy. This is an offense against every nation, and is, therefore, alike punishable by all. But an offense, which in its nature only affects a particular nation, is only punishable by that nation. It is by confounding general piracy with piracy by statute, that indistinct ideas have been produced, respecting the power to punish offenses committed on the high seas. A statute may make any offense piracy, committed within the jurisdiction of the nation passing the statute, and such offense will be punishable by that nation. But piracy, under the law of nations, which alone is punishable by all nations, can only consist in an act which is an offense against all. No particular nation can increase or diminish the list of offenses thus punishable."

In the case of U. S. v. The Malek Adhel [2 How. (43 U. S.) 210], a construction of the word "piratical," used in the act of 1819, and repeated in that of 1861, was given by the supreme court: "Where the act uses the word 'piratical,' it does so in a general sense, importing that the aggression is unauthorized by the laws of nations, hostile in its character, wanton and criminal in its commission, and utterly without any sanction from any public authority or sovereign power. In short, it means that the act belongs to the class of offenses which pirates are in the habit of perpetrating, whether they do it for purposes of plunder, or for purposes of hatred, revenge, or wanton abuse of power.

"A pirate is deemed, and properly deemed, hostis humani generis. But why is he so deemed? Because he commits hostilities upon the subjects and property of any or all nations, without any regard to right or duty, or any pretense of public authority. If he willfully sinks or destroys an innocent merchant-ship, without any other object than to gratify his lawless appetite for mischief, it is just as much a piratical aggression, in the sense of the law of nations and the act of congress, as if he did it solely and exclusively for the sake of plunder—lucri causa. The law looks to it as an act of hostility, and, being committed by a vessel not commissioned and engaged in lawful warfare, it treats it as the act of a pirate, and of one who is emphatically hostis humani generis." 2 How. [43 U. S.] 232.

In Palmer's Case, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 610, it was held by the supreme court that the crime of robbery, committed by a person who is not a citizen of the United States, on the high seas, on board of a ship belonging exclusively to subjects of a foreign state, is not piracy under the act, and is not punishable in the courts of the United States. It was also held that when a civil war rages in a foreign nation, one part of which separates itself from the old established government, and erects itself into a distinct government, the courts of the United States must view such newly constituted government as it is viewed by the legislative and executive departments of the government of the United States. If that government remains neutral, but recognizes the existence of a civil war, the courts cannot consider as criminal those acts of hostility which war authorizes and which the new government may direct against its enemy.

In a subsequent case (U. S. v. Klintock, 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 152), it was held that robbery committed by any persons on board of a vessel not at the time belonging to the subjects of any foreign power, but in possession of a crew acting in defiance of all law, and acknowledging obedience to no government whatever, is within the meaning of the act, and is punishable in the courts of the United States. "The general terms of the act," says Mr. Chief Justice Marshall, "ought not to be applied to offenses against the particular sovereignty of any foreign power, but we think they ought to be applied to offenses committed against all nations, including the United States, by persons who, by common consent, are equally amenable to the laws of all nations."

This distinction between piracies under the laws of nations, which are everywhere justiciable, and those offenses to which that term has been arbitrarily applied by the municipal codes of particular nations, and which are therefore only cognizable before the tribunals having jurisdiction either territorial, actual, or implied, or over the person of the offender, is recognized not only in numerous cases, but by all writers on international law. See Lawr. Wheat. 247, in notis.

All agree that piracy, under the laws of nations, is the offense of depredating on the seas without authority or commission from any sovereign or belligerent state. It is the act of outlaws and rovers, in defiance of all law, and acknowledging no law whatever. A person, therefore, who commits hostilities under a commission from a party to a recognized civil war, is not guilty of piracy. He stands in the same position as if he held a commission from an established government, so far, at least, as regards all the world except the other party to the contest; nor will even any irregularity as to acts done jure belli, fix the character of a pirate upon him. "His acts may be unlawful; when measured by the laws of nations or treaty stipulations, the individuals concerned in them may be treated as trespassers, and the nation to which they belong may be held responsible; but the parties concerned are not guilty of piracy." Op. Mr. Butler, 3 Op. Atty. Gen. 121.

It is to be observed that this opinion was given in a case of capture, by a Texan armed and commissioned schooner, of a United States vessel engaged in supplying contraband goods to the army of Mexico, at a time when a state of civil war existed between Texas and Mexico, but before the independence of the former had been recognized by the United States. The principle thus laid down is in entire accordance with the claims and the concessions of the United States in similar cases—and with the practice of foreign nations. Thus, even before our own formal declaration of independence, France and Spain opened their ports to the North American colonists and treated them as an independent people. Their private as well as their public cruisers were not only admitted into the ports of those countries, but the same friendly disposition was manifested by all the other European powers except Portugal. Ann. Reg. 1776, p. 182.

In 1779 the states general refused to deliver up to England prizes brought into the Texel by Paul Jones; and for many years afterward compensation was persistently demanded from Denmark by the United States for three prizes carried by Paul Jones into a port of Norway, then under the government of Denmark, by whom they were delivered up to England. So, too, during the existence of the civil war between Spain and her colonies, and previous to the acknowledgment of the independence of the latter by the United States, the colonies were deemed by them belligerent nations, and entitled to all the sovereign rights of war against their enemy. U. S. v. Palmer, already cited; The Divina Pastora, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 52; The Santissima Trinidad, 7 Wheat. [20 U. S.] 287.

During the Greek revolution the same course was pursued by England. To a complaint of the porte against allowing the Greeks belligerent rights, Mr. Canning replied that "the character of belligerency was not so much a principle as a fact; that a certain degree of force and consistency acquired by a mass of population engaged in war entitled that population to be treated as belligerents, and even if their title was questionable, rendered it the interest of all civilized nations so to treat them."

The same principles are emphatically recognized by the supreme court in the recent cases of The Hiawatha, Amy Warwick, etc., 2 Black [67 U. S.] 638. "War," says Mr. Justice Grier, delivering the opinion of the court, "has been well defined to be 'that state in which a nation prosecutes its right by force.' The parties belligerent in a war are independent nations. But it is not necessary to constitute war that both parties should be acknowledged as independent nations or sovereign states. A war may exist where one of the belligerents claims sovereign rights as against the other. * * * When the party in rebellion occupies and holds, in a hostile manner, a certain portion of territory, have declared their independence, have cast off their allegiance, have organized armies, have commenced hostilities against their former sovereign, the world acknowledges them as belligerents and the contest a war. * * * The laws of war as established among nations have their foundation in reason, and all tend to mitigate the cruelties and misery produced by the scourge of war. Hence the parties to a civil war usually concede to each other belligerent rights. They exchange prisoners, and adopt the other courtesies and rules common to public or national wars. 'A civil war,' says Vattel, 'breaks the bands of society and government, or at least suspends their force and effect; it produces in the nation two independent parties, who consider each other as enemies and acknowledge no common judge. Those two parties, therefore, must necessarily be considered as constituting at least for a time, two separate bodies, two distinct societies. Having no common superior to judge between them, they stand in precisely the same predicament as two nations who engage in a contest and have recourse to arms. This being the case, it is very evident that the common laws of war—those maxims of humanity, moderation and honor—ought to be observed by both parties in every civil war. Should the sovereign conceive that he has a right to hang up his prisoners, the opposite party will make reprisals, etc., etc.; the war will become cruel and horrible, and every day more destructive to the nation.'" The court further observes: "It is not the less a civil war with belligerent parties in hostile array, because it may be called an 'insurrection' by one side, and the insurgents be considered as rebels and traitors. It is not necessary that the independence of the revolted province or state be acknowledged in order to constitute it a party belligerent in war according to the laws of nations."

The same principles are also recognized in the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Nelson: "In the case of a rebellion or resistance by a portion of the people of a country against the established government, there is no doubt that, if in its progress and enlargement the government thus sought to be overthrown sees fit, it may by the competent power recognize and declare the existence of a state of civil war, which will draw after it all the consequences and rights of war between the contending parties, as in the case of a public war. Mr. Wheaton observes, speaking of civil war: 'But the general usage of nations regards such a war as entitling all the contending parties to all the rights of war as against each other, and even as respects neutrals.'"

In the case of the privateersmen of The Savannah, tried in New York under a charge of piracy [case unreported], it was observed by the presiding judge, that "if it were necessary on the part of the government to bring the crime charged in the present case against the prisoners within the definition of robbery and piracy as known to the common law of nations, there would be great difficulty in doing so; perhaps under the counts, certainly upon the evidence. For that shows, if anything, an intent to depredate upon the vessels and property of one nation only, the United States, which falls far short of the spirit and intent that are said to constitute essential elements of the crime." It has already been stated that the prosecutions for piracy against these and other privateersmen were subsequently dropped, and they were admitted to the rights of war, and included in the cartel for the exchange of prisoners.

From the foregoing it is, I think, evident that when a civil war exists, hostilities committed by vessels upon the high seas, under a commission or letter of marque from the insurrectionary government, against the sovereign or citizens of the government against which they have rebelled, are not, by the laws of nations, acts of piracy. A fortiori when the existence of a state of civil war has been recognized by the sovereign through the executive, legislative and judicial departments of his government, and when he has claimed and exercised the rights of war, not only against the insurgents, but in respect to neutrals, by establishing blockades, searching vessels, capturing contraband of war, and condemning jure belli property owned by persons domiciled within the revolted territory, as enemies' property.

It follows that the enterprise for which the schooner Chapman was fitted out was not piratical, within the meaning of that term as defined by the laws of nations. The crime committed by the persons concerned was treason; not merely treason in the sense in which it is committed by those who, within the limits and subject to the de facto authority of the so-called Confederate States government, adhere to the rebellion, but aggravated by the fact that it was committed by persons two of whom were citizens of this state, and the third a foreigner, but all of whom were residing within the undisputed territory of the United States, and receiving the protection of the laws of the Union. Their crime would none the less have been treason if the Confederate States had been a foreign and independent nation, with whom the United States was at war. But the projected enterprise was not, in my judgment, piratical, under the laws of nations, or within the meaning of the act of August 5, 1861.

It follows that the seizure and condemnation of the Chapman and her cargo could not properly have been made under that act, and that the petitioners are not entitled to a share of the proceeds as therein provided. The act by which the vessel was made liable, is the act of August 6, 1861, by which all property intended to be used in aiding, abetting or promoting the existing insurrection, etc., is made liable to seizure and condemnation. The third section provides that in case any person shall file an information with the district attorney, the proceedings shall be for the use of such informer and of the United States in equal parts. The claims of the informer in this case are recognized by the district attorney, and the contest has in effect been between the informer and the officers and crew of the Cyane, who claim half of the proceeds as prize.

For the reasons given above, I am of opinion that the latter are not entitled; but that the proceeds should be divided, after paying the seamen, between the United States and the informer, as directed in the act of August 6, 1861. A claim has been put in by the seamen shipped on board the schooner for their wages. There is no reason to suppose that these men had any knowledge of the guilty nature of the voyage. They were shipped as mariners, and had no connection with the persons placed on board and secreted in the hold of the vessel during the night preceding her departure, and who were to form the crew or fighting force of the privateer. The men were on board the vessel before her seizure. They were detained as prisoners on board the Cyane for a few days, and subsequently as witnesses. But for this latter detention they have been paid as provided by law. I think that they should be allowed one month's pay—to this I understand the United States make no objection.

CHAPMAN v. BARGER.

Circuit Court, D. Iowa. 1877.

REMOVAL—EJECTMENT — PETITION BY OCCUPYING CLAIMANT.

The statutes of Iowa allow an "occupying claimant," who is an unsuccessful defendant in an ejectment suit, the right to retain possession of the land after judgment against him, until the value of his improvements (if made under color of title and in good faith) are ascertained, provided he files his petition therefor after judgment against him, but before the plaintiff causes the same to be executed, which petition must be filed in the main action. After judgment for the plaintiff in the main action, the defendant, under the Iowa statutes, filed his petition in the suit as an "occupying claimant," to have the value of his improvements ascertained, etc.; whereupon the plaintiff in the main suit filed his petition, under the act of congress of March 3, 1875 [18 Stat. 471], for the removal of the cause to the circuit court of the United States: Held, not removable, being a mere dependence upon the original suit.

[Cited in Webber v. Humphreys, Case No. 17,326; Pratt v. Albright, 9 Fed. 637; Buford v. Strother, 10 Fed. 409; Filer v. Levy, 17 Fed. 613; Poole v. Thatcherdeft, 19 Fed. 51.]

This cause was removed to this court by the plaintiff in the main suit (Chapman), under the act of congress of March 3, 1875. The defendant (the "occupying claimant") moves to remand it to the state court.

Mr. Hawley, for plaintiff.

Duncombe & Springer, for defendant.

Before DILLON, Circuit Judge, and LOVE, District Judge.

DILLON, Circuit Judge. Action of ejectment in state court, and judgment for the plaintiff. Under the Iowa statute relating to occupying claimants, the defendant filed his petition to be allowed for his improvements, in that suit, after judgment in favor of the plaintiff. After the petition of the occupying claimant for improvements was thus filed, the plaintiff in the main action filed his petition for removal of the cause under the act of March 3, 1875. We hold that the petition of the occupying claimant cannot be removed, as it is, under the Iowa statute, and decisions of the supreme court of the state, essentially part of and ancillary to the main suit. The main suit is at an end, and a judgment has been rendered therein in the state court. That judgment must remain in the state court. It cannot be brought here. The petition of the occupying claimant (whose rights are wholly statutory) is a dependence of the main suit, and cannot be separately removed. Under the legislation of Iowa in respect of occupying claimants, as construed by the state supreme court, and in view of the relief to which each party is entitled, it is apparent that the rights of the parties must be adjudicated in one and the same court. Case remanded.

[4 Cranch, C. C. 431.][1]

MANUMISSION OF SLAVES — PREJUDICE OF CREDITORS—CHARGING DEBTS ON REALTY.

1. A testatrix charged her lands, as well as her personal assets, with the payment of her debts and legacies, and by her will manumitted certain of her slaves, to take effect at her death. The personal assets were not sufficient, without the slaves, but with the real estate were more than sufficient, to pay the debts. Held, that such manumission was not in prejudice of the creditors, and that the slaves were entitled to their freedom.

[See note at end of case.]

2. If the manumission is to be considered as a specific legacy, the assent of the executor was given by suffering the negroes to go at large as free for a period of eight years after the death of the testatrix.

3. If there be a fund for the payment of debts and pecuniary legacies, the executor may be compelled to assent to a specific legacy.

4. A specific legacy shall not abate or contribute, if there be enough without it.

5. A devise of real estate, "after payment of the debts," is a charge of the debts upon the real estate.

6. An assent to a legacy cannot be revoked.

7. Emancipation by will stands on stronger ground than a specific legacy, and does not need the assent of the executor.

8. The burden of proof lies on the creditors to show that an emancipation by will is "in their prejudice."

This was a petition for freedom [by two negroes, Eliza and Kitty Chapman] under the will of Mrs. Frances Edelin, and the act of Maryland of 1796 (chapter 67, § 13).

Mr. Key, for petitioners, cited two cases decided by this court, namely, Thompson v. Clarke, June, 1817 [Case No. 13,951], and Fidelio v. Dermott, June, 1807 [Id. 4,754]; Gains-borough v. Gainsborough, 2 Vern. 252; 2 Fonb. 291.

W. L. Brent, for respondent [Robert Fenwick], cited and relied upon the case of George v. Corse's Adm'r, 2 Har. & G. 1.

CRANCH, Chief Judge (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent). Mrs. Frances Edelin, the then owner of the petitioners, on the 2d of November, 1825, made her will, in which she says, "After my debts and funeral charges are paid, I devise and bequeath as follows: I give and bequeath to my nephew John B. Edelin the store-house and lot," &c. (describing it). She then goes on to make sundry other devises of real estate, the last of which is to her nephew Richard James Edelin, of a small house and lot, "with the proviso that the negroes which are hereinafter mentioned to be free to live in the back room of the said house." She then bequeaths to the same nephew a mulatto man named Henry, and to her nephew John B. Edelin, she gives a negro boy named John; to her brother George, a black man named Bill; and to her niece Eliza Queen, a negro girl named Harriett, and a locket and ring. Then follows this clause: "Item, negro woman Letty, her daughter Kitty, a mulatto, with her three children, to wit, Eliza, Robert, and Kitty Jane, with future increase, and an old woman named Lucy, I do hereby declare them free at and after my death; and they shall have the right to live in and occupy the back-room in the house and lot I have given and bequeathed to my nephew, Richard James Edelin. To the two older negro women I give them and bequeath ten dollars a year to each of them as long as they live; and ten dollars a year, during two years after my death, exclusive of the year in which I die, to mulatto Kitty." She then charges the land, devised to her nephews, with annuities of ten dollars to each of the negroes, Lucy, Letty and Kitty. Exclusive of the specific devises and bequests, her estate was insufficient to pay the testatrix's debts; and it is admitted that the personal estate alone, exclusive of the value of the petitioners, was also insufficient without the aid of the real; but that the real and personal estate, exclusive of the value of the petitioners, was sufficient. From the death of the testatrix, in November or December, 1825, until July, 1833, the petitioners have been suffered by the executor to go at large, and act as free. On the 16th of July, 1833, upon the ex parte petition of the executor, stating that the testatrix, by her will, directed that certain of the negroes contained in the inventory, should be free, after her death; that he has since discovered that there will not be assets enough to discharge her debts, and praying that the negroes may be sold; the orphans' court ordered the executor "to sell all the personal estate." By the executor's account, settled with the orphans' court on the same 16th of July, 1833, in which he is charged with these negroes, valued at $805, the balance against him appeared to be $745.90, which, by a subsequent account rendered on the 12th of November, 1833, he appears to have accounted for to the satisfaction of the orphans' court; so that, if the petitioners obtain their freedom, he will have overpaid the sum of $752.27. But the executor had, between July and November, 1833, sold the petitioners to the defendant, Robert Fenwick, so that, if the petitioners obtain their freedom, the executor will have to refund the purchase money to the defendant, and look to the real estate.

The question for the decision of the court is whether, under these circumstances, the manumitting clause of the will be, or be not, "in prejudice of creditors?" By the act of Maryland of 1796 (chapter 67, § 13), it is enacted, "That it shall be lawful for any person or persons competent, in law, to make a valid will, to grant freedom to, and effect the manumission of, any slave or slaves belonging to such person or persons, by his or their last will; and such manumission may be made to take effect at the death of the testator, or at such other periods as may be limited in such will; but no manumission, hereafter to be made by will, shall be effectual to give freedom to any slave or slaves, if the same shall be in prejudice of creditors." If the manumission is to be considered as a legacy, the the assent of the executor is necessary to perfect the title of the petitioners. For, as the executor is liable for the debts of his testator, to the full extent of the assets, and, as the debts must be paid before legacies, unless the assets are sufficient for both, it is necessary, for his own protection, that he should have the power of withholding the legacies until it is ascertained that the residue of the assets will be sufficient to pay all debts. "But, if there is a fund to pay the debts, and the executor then refuses his assent to a legacy, he may be compelled to give it, either by the spiritual court" (in England), "or by a court of equity." March, 96; Jac. Law Dict. tit. "Legacy." In case of deficiency of assets, however, all the general legacies must abate, proportionably, in order to pay the debts; but a specific legacy is not to abate at all, or allow anything, by way of abatement, unless there be not sufficient without it. Webb v. Webb, 2 Vern. 111. If a manumission by will be a legacy, it is a specific legacy; for it can admit of no satisfaction but the thing itself.

A testator has a right to dispose of all his personal estate in specific legacies, and charge his lands with the payment of his debts. The creditors have no right to anything but payment of their debts. It is wholly unimportant to them out of which fund they are paid; and they have no right to compel the executor to sell the property specifically bequeathed, if the fund provided by the will be sufficient. Their remedy at law is against the executor, to charge him de bonis testatoris, in the first instance. It is true the executor could not plead plene administravit in consequence of delivering to the legatees their respective legacies; but he might raise the money out of the lands, and pay the debts; and it would be his duty to do so; for the will is his law, and he is bound to execute it according to the intention of the testator. And when lands, devised to an executor, for payment of debts, are sold by the executor, the money in his hands will be assets at law. Hawker v. Buckland, 2 Vern. 106; Greaves v. Powell, Id. 248; Anon., Id. 405. It seems to us clear, that, by this will, the testatrix has charged her real estate, as well as her personal, with the payment of her debts. She commences her will, thus: "After my debts and funeral charges are paid, I devise and bequeath as follows: I give and bequeath to my nephew, John B. Edelin, the store-house and lot," &c.; and this devise is followed by other devises of real estate to other nephews, and, among others, to Richard James Edelin; and she makes those two nephews her executors, together with John Brown. These devises were to take place only after her debts and funeral charges should be paid; and she makes two of her devisees her executors. The word "devise" is exclusively applicable to real estate. In the case of Trott v. Vernon, 2 Vern. 708, the lord chancellor says: "It is but natural to suppose that all persons would provide for the payment of their just debts; and, directing them to be paid in the first place, imports, that, before any devise by his will should take place, his debts, etc., should be paid;" and he seemed to lay some stress upon the word "devise," and decreed the real estate to be liable to the payment of the debts. See, also, Beachcroft v. Beachcroft, Id. 690. When the real and the personal estate are both liable to the payment of the debts, it is entirely immaterial to the creditors whether either of them be or be not insufficient, by itself, if both together are sufficient; and, in such case, the bequest of a specific legacy cannot be said to be in prejudice of creditors. A will must be so construed and so executed as to carry into effect the whole intention of the testator. Here it was as clearly the intention of the testator that the petitioners should have their freedom, as that the debts should be paid.

If emancipation by will is to be considered as a specific legacy, to which the assent of the executor is necessary, that assent was given when the petitioners were permitted by him to go at large and act as if they were free; which they did, from the death of the testatrix, in 1825, to the year 1833. Much slighter circumstances than this have been considered sufficient evidence of the assent of an executor to a legacy. Went. Off. Ex'r, 225, says, "There may be an assent implied as well as express; for if, in the devise or bequest, the legatee be appointed to do some act, as in respect of the legacy, and the executor doth accept the performance thereof, this amounteth to an assent." "So, if a horse be bequeathed, and one, offering to buy him of the executor himself, he directeth him to go and buy the horse of the legatee; or if the executor himself offer money to the legatee, for the horse, this implieth an assent that it should be the legatee's by the will." And in Bac. Abr. "Legacy," L, it is said that "any expression or act done by the executor which shows his concurrence or agreement, to the thing demised, will amount to an assent." Godol. 148; Plowd. 525; 1 Vern. 90; Id. 460; 2 Vern. 358. And Wentworth, in pages 226 and 227, says: "If the executor do once declare his assent that the legatee shall have his legacy, he may then enter into it, or take it, notwithstanding the executor's countermand or revocation of his assent after." And in Bac. Abr. it is said that, "as an assent is but a perfecting act, the executor cannot, after he has once given it, revoke the same; neither can it be given on condition, or on any limitation or restriction whatsoever. March, 136; Cro. Jac. 614, 615; 2 Vent. 360; 1 Leon. 130, 131." And in Burnley v. Lambert, 1 Wash. [Va.] 312, the court of appeals of Virginia say: "After the assent of the executor, the legal property is completely vested in the legatee, and cannot, at law, be divested by the creditors." If the emancipation be a specific legacy, and if the assent of the executor has not been given, inasmuch as the real and personal estate are both equally charged by this will, and as that fund is admitted to be sufficient without the value of the petitioners, he may be compelled to assent. But emancipation stands on stronger ground than a specific legacy. The assent of the executor is not necessary to the perfection of the title. By the general provision of the 13th section of the Maryland act of 1796 (chapter 67), the manumission is complete and perfected; but liable to be defeated if it be "in prejudice of creditors;" a fact which is to be proved by the party denying the validity of the manumission. There is, in this respect, a marked distinction between the language used in the act of 1752, and that used in the act of 1796. The language of the fifth section of the former act is, "that any deed or writing whereby freedom shall be given," &c., "shall be good," &c., "so that such deed or writing be not in prejudice of creditors." The words, "so that," are here equivalent to "if;" and the construction would be the same as if the language had been "any writing," &c., shall be good, if it shall not be "in prejudice of creditors," and then the party claiming title to freedom would be obliged to show that the writing was not in prejudice of creditors. But the language of the act of 1796, after expressly repealing the act of 1752, is, "it shall be lawful for any person capable in law to make a valid will to grant freedom to, and effect the manumission of, any slave, &c., by his last will;" "but no manumission, hereafter to be made by will, shall be effectual to give freedom to any slave or slaves if the same be in prejudice of creditors." Here the same rule of construction, which, under the act of 1752, would require the party claiming freedom under a writing, to show that the manumission would not be in prejudice of creditors, requires of the party denying the efficacy of the manumission, under the act of 1796, to show that the manumission is in prejudice of creditors. The words, "so that," in the act of 1752, and the word, "if," in that of 1796, create a condition. Under the first, the manumission itself is conditional; under the second, the inefficacy of the manumission is conditional. Hence, the burden of proof, under the former act, was upon the claimant of freedom; under the latter, it was upon the other side. It is not, however, material, in the present cause, on which party the burden of proof lies; for the fact is admitted, that the real and personal estate are sufficient, without the value of the petitioners, to pay all the debts, so that the manumission cannot be in prejudice of creditors.

But here we are met by the judgment of the court of appeals in Maryland, in the case of George v. Corse's Adm'r, 2 Har. & G. 1, in which it was decided by three of the judges that in a suit by negroes against the executor of the will of a testator who manumitted the negroes by his will, and expressly directed his real estate to be sold by his executor for the payment of his debts, if the personal estate, exclusive of the negroes, should be insufficient to pay all his debt, the question could not be decided whether the manumission was in prejudice; because the executor was not competent to admit the fact, that the real and personal estate, exclusive of the negroes, was sufficient to pay all the debts; and the reason, given by one of the judges, is, that "it would be an issue to which the creditors are no party, and to protect whose interest nobody appears." That, "as far as relates to the personalty, the executor is competent to act for all who are concerned; but in trying the facts whether there be assets by descent in the hands of the heir, and what is the amount thereof, he has no interest, either personally or in right of representation. Virtute officii he is neither bound to acquire, nor presumed to possess, any knowledge upon the subject. With the title he is unacquainted; with the value of the land, equally uninformed." In this opinion we are unable to concur. When lands are devised to the executor to be sold for the payment of debts, or when the lands are charged with the payment of the debts, and a power is given to the executor to sell them, the lands are as much a fund in his hands for that purpose, as the goods and chattels; and he represents the creditors, in regard to the lands, so far as their interests are concerned, as much as he does in regard to the personal estate; and the creditors are as much a party to the issue in respect of the lands, as they are in respect of the goods and chattels. When he is charged with the sale of his testator's lands, for the payment of debts, he is as much bound to inquire in regard to the lands as he is in regard to the personal estate; for it is his duty to execute the whole of his testator's will; and in such a case the creditors have as good a right to look to the land, through him, for the payment of their debts, as they have to look to the goods and chattels through him. If under such a will, the sufficiency of the real estate for the payment of the debts cannot be tried in a suit against the executor, and if the negroes are bound to show that the manumission is not in prejudice of creditors, how can they obtain their freedom? Their only remedy is by petition, in a court of law, against the person who claims them as slaves. Neither the heirs nor the creditors can be made parties; for neither of them claims title to the petitioners; and if the executor does not represent the creditors, are they represented by the vendee of the executor? and will his admission of the sufficiency of the real estate be more prejudicial to the creditors than that of the executor?

If every manumission, by will, is taken to be prima facie in prejudice of creditors, and if the burden of proof be on the petitioners, nothing seems to us more clear than that it is competent to them to show, either that there are no creditors to be prejudiced; or that, if there be creditors, they cannot be prejudiced; whoever may be the person claiming to hold them under the testator. It would be strange indeed, if, in a suit against the only person claiming title to them, and the only person against whom they can maintain a suit to vindicate their right, they should be forbidden to give evidence of the fact which it is contended they are bound to show before their title can be complete. Can it be said, that they are to wait until some creditor shall have obtained judgment against the executor de bonis testatoris, and have seized the petitioners as a part of those goods? This would put it in the power of the executor to postpone, indefinitely, the enjoyment of their right, in case the fund provided by the testator for the payment of the debts should be sufficient. It would, however, probably, be admitted by the judges of the court of appeals in Maryland, who decided the case of George v. Corse's Adm'r, that in such a suit it is competent for the petitioners to show that there was a sufficiency of personal estate, but not of the real, although the fund provided by the testator for the payment of the debts should be the proceeds of sales of real estate to be made by the executor for that purpose. But, for the reasons before stated, we think there is no difference, in this respect, between the right of the executor in such a case, and in such a suit, to represent the creditors, in regard to the real estate, and his right to represent them in regard to the personal estate.

Upon the whole, therefore, we are of opinion, that in the present case the testatrix, by her will, bound her real estate, as well as her personal, for the payment of her debts, and that, as it is admitted by the defendant, who is the vendee of the executor, that the real and personal estate of the testatrix, exclusive of the petitioners, was, at her death, sufficient to pay all her debts, the manumission of the petitioners, by the will, was not in prejudice of her creditors, and that the judgment, upon the case stated, must be rendered for the petitioners.

[NOTE. Respondent brought error, and the supreme court affirmed the judgment of the circuit court upon the grounds, as set forth in the opinion delivered by Mr. Justice Wayne, to wit: That the evident intention of the testatrix, as gathered from the will, was to manumit the slaves, as far as she had power by the Maryland law so to do; that such manumission was not in prejudice of creditors, within the Maryland statutes; that by the words of the will the debts became a charge upon the real estate after exhaustion of the personalty; that, the executor having permitted the slaves to go at large, his assent could not be recalled, nor could it be revoked under an order of the orphans' court for the sale of the testatrix's personal estate; and that it appearing that testatrix left sufficient real estate to pay all debts, without the sale of the manumitted slaves, they were entitled to their freedom, although there was a deficiency of personalty. PILOTAGE.

[An abandoned bark towed from Norfolk to New York is not liable for the fees of a pilot who does not board her, nor exercise control or direction of her navigation.]

In admiralty.

Before BETTS, District Judge.

This suit was brought [by Daniel C. Chapman against the bark Lucerne] to recover the sum of $30.50, alleged to be due the libelant as pilotage. The bark, on a voyage from the coast of Africa to this port, put into Norfolk in distress, and was there abandoned by her owner to the underwriters. By their direction a steam-tug was sent from here to her, with a pilot and four seamen, to tow her to New York, the owner having no privity with that proceeding. The pilot who went did not go on board the bark at all, but remained on board the tug, which towed the bark to this port, and for those services he brings this suit.

HELD BY THE COURT. That the bark being unnavigable and brought home solely by the power of the tug, was not in a condition bringing her within the provisions of the state statute under which the libelant claims. Laws 1857, c. 243, § 29. That the libelant, on the facts, was employed by the underwriters, and not by the owner or master of the bark; and that he performed no service to her, but remained on board the tug. Though told by the master of the tug off Barnegat to take charge of the bark, his charge only consisted in remaining on board the tug without having any control or direction of her navigation, and the libelant could not exercise in behalf of the bark, being towed as an inert body, his functions as pilot, nor even attempt to undertake them. That the libelant, upon the facts and law of the case, fails to establish any right of action against the bark. Libel dismissed with costs.

CHAPMAN v. REPUBLIC LIFE INS. CO.

[6 Biss. 238;[1] 4 Ins. Law J. 511; 7 Chi. Leg. News, 186; 5 Bigelow, Ins. Cas. 110.]

Circuit Court, N. D. Illinois. Nov., 1874.

INSURANCE—SUICIDE—INSANITY—"ACT"—"INTENTION."

1. It is competent for an insurance company to restrict its liability by a clause avoiding liability "in case of the death of the insured by his or her own act or intention, whether sane or insane," and in such case no degree of insanity will avoid the condition.

2. The words "act" and "intention" mean the same as the word "act" alone, for act implies intention.

This was an action at law [by Emeline L. Chapman] upon a policy of insurance issued by the defendant [the Republic Life Insurance Company], dated on the 23d day of July, 1873, whereby said company insured the life of Dennie Chapman in the sum of twenty-five hundred dollars, for the use and benefit of his wife, the plaintiff. The declaration was in the usual form, and alleged that the said Dennie Chapman, after the issue of the said policy of insurance, and while the same remained in force, to wit, on the sixteenth day of September, in the year 1873, died, and that due notice and proofs of death were furnished to the defendant, as required by said policy; and that the defendant, notwithstanding its said obligation and undertaking to pay said sum in the event of the death of the said Dennie Chapman, had refused and did still refuse so to do. To this declaration the defendant pleaded among other pleas, that the said policy of insurance contained the following provision: "In case of the death of the said insured, by his or her own act or intention, whether sane or insane, or of death in consequence of the violation of law * * * then and in such case it is stipulated by all the parties in interest that the company shall not be liable for the sum insured," and averred that the death of said Dennie Chapman, mentioned in the said declaration, was caused by his own act and intention; that said death was caused and produced by a pistol-shot fired by the said Chapman into the head and face of him, the said Chapman, with the intention and for the purpose of then and there causing his own death. To this plea the plaintiff replied in substance, that at the time when the said Dennie Chapman came to his death, as stated in the said plea, he was mentally insane, and in consequence and by reason of such mental insanity, was wholly incapable of exercising any intention in reference to the act which caused his death, and that said deed was wholly the result of his mental insanity, and that he was impelled thereto without any volition of his own by an insane impulse which his mental and physical faculties were unable to resist, and that from his mental insanity he was wholly unable to comprehend the natural character, effect and consequence, of the act which resulted in his death.

To this replication the plaintiff demurred [raising thereby a question of law as to the effect to be given to the portion of the policy set out in the plea].[2]

Clarkson & Van Schaack, for plaintiff.

Bennett, Kretzinger & Veeder, for defendant.

BLODGETT, District Judge. It was contended on the part of the plaintiff that this case differed essentially from that of Bigelow v. Berkshire County Life Ins. Co. [unreported], decided by this court in favor of the defendant several months since, in this: That the policy in that case provided that "if the assured should die by his own act, sane or insane," the policy should become void, while in this policy the provision is "in case of the death of the insured by his or her own act and intention, whether sane or insane," the policy shall become inoperative. And much stress is laid by the plaintiff upon the interpolation of the word "intention" into this policy, which was not in the policy in the Bigelow Case.

To my mind, the use of the word "intention" in the policy before us, does not essentially vary or strengthen the legal meaning of the sentence from that of the policy in the Bigelow Case. The word "act" necessarily implies intention, and it seems to me the policy in this case differs in no material import from the one already decided by this court; that is to say, you get just as strong a sentence, and it means practically just as much, to say that the company shall not be liable if the assured comes to his death by his own act, sane or insane, as if you say the company shall not be liable if the assured comes to his death by his own act and intention, sane or insane. The real question in this case is, what was the clause in question intended to protect the insurance company against, and was it lawful for it to so attempt to protect itself?

The supreme court of the United States, in Life Ins. Co. v. Terry, 15 Wall. [82 U. S.] 580, had construed the clause in a policy of life insurance, providing that the company should not be liable if the assured should die by his own hand, to mean, in effect, that if the insured being in the possession of his ordinary reasoning faculties, should from anger, pride, jealousy, or a desire to escape the ills of life, intentionally take his own life, there would be no liability; but, when the reasoning faculties of the assured were so far impaired that he was not able to comprehend the moral character, the general nature, consequences and effect of the act he was about to commit, or when he was impelled thereto by an insane impulse which he had not the power to resist, such death was not within the clause, and the insurer was liable. Evidently with a view to guard itself against the effect of this decision, the defendant has resorted to the clause in question, avoiding its liability in cases of death by the hand of the assured, in cases where the suicide was committed while the insured was insane, as well as sane.

I have no doubt of the right of an insurance company to thus protect itself against liability. Certainly it is competent for an insurance company to say that it will not hold itself responsible for the acts of the insured when in a state of insanity; and the real question is, can the court, with such a contract as this before us, attempt to measure the degree of insanity?

It is agreed by this contract, that the defendant shall not be liable for the death of the assured, by his own act, when insane. The plaintiff, by his replication, admits that the assured came to his death by his own act when in a state of insanity, but claims that because the insanity was so extreme and complete as to entirely overthrow the moral and mental faculties, therefore the defendant remains liable. Will the court attempt to measure the degree of insanity under which the assured was laboring at the time he took his own life? It seems to me not. It is enough for the purposes of relieving the defendant from liability on this contract, that the assured took his own life as is admitted by the pleadings. The degree of insanity makes no difference.

There are but few adjudged cases bearing directly upon this question, the cause in this form being comparatively new. The one nearest in point is the case of Pierce v. Travelers' Ins. Co., 34 Wis. 389, where the language of the condition was that the company should not be liable if the assured died by a suicide, felonious or otherwise, sane or insane, and the court hold that the intention manifested by the words of the policy was so plain as to seem incapable of further explanation, and unless there was something in the policy of the law that forbids such a stipulation, the court had nothing to do but to give effect to the contract.

As the court in that case found nothing in the policy of the law forbidding such a stipulation, and as nothing is seen in this case or has been suggested, making it incompetent for the defendant to protect itself against the insane act of persons holding its policies, we think effect must be given to the condition, and the replication must be held to be bad. Demurrer sustained.

NOTE. To the same effect see Knickerbocker Life Ins. Co. v. Peters [42 Md. 414]. Where the provision in a policy was that it should be void "in case he (the insured) should die by his own hand, sane or insane," it was held that the words, "death by his own hand" had reference to the criminal self-destruction, and that the words "sane or insane" could have no further effect than to hold the policy void if the assured intended self-destruction while in a state of insanity, and not in case of death by accident. Case No. 2,607.

CHAPMAN v. SCHOOL DISTRICT et al.

[Deady, 108.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Oregon. Jan. 9, 1865.

EQUITY PLEADING—EXCEPTIONS TO ANSWER—IMPERTINENCE—MATTER IN ABATEMENT—TOWN SITE LAW OF 1844—ENTRY UNDER—DONATION ACT OF 1850—EFFECT—RIGHTS OF SETTLER—PATENT AS EVIDENCE OF COMPLIANCE WITH ACT.

1. Exceptions to an answer in equity for impertinence are only allowed where it is apparent that the matter excepted to, is not material or relevant, or is stated with needless prolixity.

2. An allegation in an answer, however evasive or insufficient, which is responsive to the bill, is not liable to exception for impertinence.

3. The act of May 23, 1844 (5 Stat. 657), commonly called the "Town Site Law" was not in force in Oregon prior to the passage of the act of July 17, 1854 (10 Stat. 305), and an entry and patent in pursuance of it, to land settled upon prior to that time under the donation act of September 27, 1850 (9 Stat. 496), is simply void.

4. The donation act was the first law of congress affecting the public lands in Oregon, and it is a grant in the present and gives the fee simple to the donee thereunder from the date of his settlement; but, until the complete performance of the conditions subsequent to such settlement, the estate granted is a base or conditional fee and liable to be defeated and revert to the donor by a failure to perform such conditions.

[Cited in Fields v. Squires, Case No. 4,776; Lamb v. Davenport, Id. 8,015; Bear v. Luse, Id. 1,179; Sanger v. Sargent, Id. 12,319. Followed in Fitzpatrick v. Dubois, Id. 4,842.]

5. A defendant in a suit in equity cannot by means of his answer, obtain any relief concerning the subject matter of the suit, and a prayer therefor in such answer is impertinent.

6. Matter in abatement of a suit in equity cannot be alleged by way of answer, but must be set up in a plea.

[Cited in Dowell v. Cardwell, Case No. 4,039.]

7. The right of the settler under the donation act to the land claimed by him, ultimately depends upon the settlement and the performance of the subsequent conditions of residence, cultivation, and proof.

[Cited in Wythe v. Haskell, Case No. 18,118.]

8. The patent to the settler is conclusive evidence of the performance of such conditions in a court of law and primary in a court of equity; but such patent cannot limit or restrain the estate granted by the act, which vests in the donor independently of and prior to the issuing thereof.

9. An exception for impertinence must be allowed in whole or not at all.

William W. Page, for complainant.

Joseph N. Dolph, for city of Portland.

Lansing Stout, for school district No. 1.

DEADY, District Judge. This is a suit in equity to quiet title to real property, and was commenced October 22, 1864. The complainant alleges for cause of suit against these defendants, that he is seised in fee simple of the undivided one fourth part of lot 3, in block 29 of the town of Portland, in the district of Oregon—the defendant Stark being seised in fee simple of the other three fourths of said lot. That the defendants—school district No. 1, and the city of Portland—wrongfully claim and pretend to have an interest or estate in the premises, adverse to the complainant and the defendant Stark, and that such claim impairs the value of the plaintiff's estate in the premises, in the market, and prays a decree of the court to quiet his title, etc. The defendants—school district No. 1 and the city of Portland—were duly served with process, and appeared and answered the bill—the latter on December 5, 1864. The defendant Stark has not been served or appeared in the suit. To the answer of the city of Portland, the complainant excepts for impertinence. The exceptions are eleven in number and include all the answer, except so much of it as is in direct response to the allegations of the bill, and also the Exhibits A, B, C and D. Exceptions for impertinence are only allowed when it is apparent that the matter excepted to is not material or relevant, or is stated with needless prolixity. If it may be material, the exception will not be allowed, as that would leave the defendant without remedy, but the allegations excepted to, will be allowed to remain in the answer, and the effect thereof, if found to be true, determined on the final hearing.

The first exception is taken to that portion of the answer which alleges the occupancy of the Portland land claim, including the premises in dispute, by Daniel H. Lownsdale and Stephen Coffin, on and prior to November 26, 1849, and until about December 13, 1849, when W. W. Chapman was admitted into the possession, jointly with said Lownsdale and Coffin; and that during the period of their possession these occupants laid off and sold blocks and lots upon said land claim, with the avowed intention of obtaining title from the United States, and making to the purchasers of such blocks and lots sufficient deeds therefor. This allegation standing by itself would be clearly impertinent, as it nowhere appears by the answer that either Lownsdale, Coffin or Chapman, ever had or now have any legal or equitable interest in the premises. They had the bare, naked possession before the passage of the donation law, but subsequently parted with it, before the passage of that act. But this allegation is proper matter of inducement to the matter contained in the two following exceptions, and will depend upon the disposition made of them.

The second exception is taken to that portion of the answer which alleges the execution of a bond for a deed to the premises in controversy, by Lownsdale and Coffin, on November 26, 1849, to the citizens of Portland, or some association thereof, to be thereafter organized; that the conditions of the bond have been performed by such citizens, and that they have ever since remained in possession thereof. Standing alone, the matter contained in this exception would be impertinent, for the reasons applicable to the first exception—the want of interest in the premises by either of the obligors in the bond, Lownsdale and Coffin. But this is also proper matter of inducement to what follows in the next exception, and may be passed over until that is considered.

The third exception is taken to that portion of the answer which alleges, that Daniel H. Lownsdale being in San Francisco, on the first of March, 1850, there entered into an agreement with the defendant Benjamin Stark, by which he released to said Stark the possession of a portion of said Portland land claim, including the premises in controversy, which agreement was ratified by the co-occupants of Lownsdale, namely, Coffin and Chapman, on April 13, 1850, and that the defendant Stark by the terms of said agreement and for a valuable consideration, bound himself to ratify and confirm all sales and conveyances of blocks and lots, including by name and special description the premises in controversy, in the part of said claim to him released, and made prior to the date thereof; and that said Stark subsequently occupied said land with the avowed intention of obtaining title from the United States, and ratifying and confirming the prior sales therein, as in said agreement specified, and that during this time and up to the time Stark obtained a patent from the United States for such land, the citizens of Portland were in the possession of the premises in controversy and made valuable improvements thereon, with the assent of said Stark. This exception is not allowed, and therefore neither the first nor the second ones. Several important questions arise upon the allegations, which will be reserved for the final hearing, and determined by the final decree. This ruling only goes so far as to decide that I do not deem this matter clearly immaterial or irrelevant.

The fourth exception is taken to that portion of the answer which alleges that Stark claims to be the owner in fee of an undivided three fourths of the lot in question, by virtue of a patent to him from the United States, dated December 8, 1860, and that the complainant claims by virtue of some conveyance from Stark. This exception will be disallowed. I do not think the matter immaterial. It is some kind of an admission or statement of the right of the complainant and his co-tenant, Stark. It is true it is made in an evasive manner, not being a direct averment or admission, made by the defendant as he asserts or admits the fact to be, but only the defendant's statement of what Stark and the complainant claim. For this reason it may be insufficient, but not impertinent.

The fifth exception is taken to that portion of the answer, which alleges that the conveyance from Stark to the complainant, is without consideration and sham, and that the complainant, at and before the execution thereof, had notice of this defendant's equities as before stated. This exception will be disallowed. So far, the answer of the defendant is substantially that it has the equitable estate in the premises—at least I suppose this is the conclusion which the defendant will seek to deduce and maintain from the allegations embraced in the exceptions already passed upon and disallowed. In this view of the case it is material for the defendant to aver and show, that the complainants received the conveyance from Stark, the owner of the legal title, without consideration or at least with notice of the defendant's prior equity.

The sixth exception is taken to that portion of the answer, which alleges the occupancy of the Portland land claim at, prior, and since September 1, 1844, as a town site by divers people, citizens of the United States, and otherwise; that the city of Portland was incorporated on January 23, 1851, and that on February 1, 1858, the corporate authorities of said city, caused an entry to be made in the proper land office, of 307.49 acres of the Portland land claim and town site, including the lot in question; and that in pursuance of said entry on December 7, 1860, a patent issued to said city for said lands from the United States, and for the use and benefit of the occupants thereof. This portion of the answer is based upon the assumption, that the law of congress, of May 23, 1844, and commonly called the "Town Site Law," was in force in Oregon prior to the time it was specially extended here, by act of July 14, 1854. In Lownsdale v. Portland [Case No. 8,578], I had occasion to pass upon this question. Time and reflection have only confirmed in my mind, the correctness of the conclusions arrived at in that case.

The donation law of September 27, 1850, was the first and only law affecting the right to or interest in public lands in Oregon, until the special extension of the town site law to this country. This entry by the city, and patent to it in pursuance thereof, being without color of law or authority, are simply void, and no right to the premises in controversy can be upheld by them. Although the town site law was in force in Oregon in the years 1858-60, when these proceedings took place, no land could be appropriated under it, for the benefit of occupants of town sites, which had already been granted to others by the terms and conditions of the donation law. The donation law is a grant in the present, and gives the fee simple to every settler who avails himself of its provisions from the date of his settlement. Lessieur v. Price, 12 How. [53 U. S.] 76; 11 Opin. 29. True, until the completion of the subsequent conditions of residence and cultivation and proof thereof, it is an estate upon condition—what is known at common law as a base or conditional fee, subject to be defeated or lost by a failure to perform the conditions upon which it is held. But it is an estate in fee nevertheless, and upon the completion of the residence and cultivation or other conditions, it becomes absolute and unqualified. Such was the grant to Stark and other settlers under the donation act, and proceedings under the town site law could not affect the right to lands settled under the donation act prior to that time. Whether a corporation like the city of Portland or any corporation, could hold as an occupant under the town site law, is very questionable, but not necessary to decide. This exception is allowed.

The seventh exception is taken to that portion of the answer which alleges that on November 4, 1857, Daniel H. Lownsdale and his assignees, Thomas Carter and Joseph S. Smith, conveyed the lot in question to J. T. Holmes and Wm. L. McEwan, and that on November 19, 1857, Wm. M. King, assuming to act for the subscribers to the building on said lot, made a conveyance thereof to said Holmes and McEwan, and that under these conveyances these grantees took possession of the lot and held the same adversely to the city, at the time the patent was issued under the town site law; and that sometime in 1860, Holmes conveyed an undivided half of the lot to the city of Portland. This exception is allowed. As neither Lownsdale, Carter nor Smith, are shown or averred to have had any interest in the premises, either legal or equitable, Holmes and McEwan took nothing by their conveyance to them; and consequently Holmes had no interest to convey to the city, and conveyed none. The allegation concerning the deed from King, is that he assumed to act as agent for the subscribers to the building. He might as well assume to act for anybody else. No authority is shown, nor is any averred; nor does it appear how these subscribers themselves could convey property to the city of Portland, which the defendant claims they or other citizens of Portland received for certain public uses and trusts, and none other. If the city of Portland is the legal successor of the persons to whom this property was sold, dedicated or covenanted to be conveyed, as alleged by the defendant, then this King deed could, at best, be only a conveyance from itself to itself; and if it was not such successor, then it does not appear how it could become so by force of a conveyance, executed by an assumed agent of some particular persons who are not shown or averred to have had any authority to convey themselves.

The eighth exception is taken to that portion of the answer, which alleges that the patent to Stark purports to be based upon certificate No. 69, and that said Stark falsely and fraudulently procured the proof to be made to the surveyor general of the residence and cultivation in such certificate mentioned; and that said Stark never did perform the residence and cultivation aforesaid; and that there is a reservation in the patent to Stark in favor of the rights of occupants of town lots under the city of Portland, and Stark occupied said patent with the avowed purpose of confirming the seisin of the occupants of such lots.

Before proceeding to consider this exception, I will state the ninth one, and consider them together. The ninth exception is taken to the prayer of the answer, and to that portion of it which alleges that Stark refuses to ratify and confirm the rights of the defendant to the lot in question, but brings this suit to defraud the defendant in this particular; and that in pursuance of such purpose, he caused a conveyance to be made to some real or fictitious person, the complainant in this suit. That said certificate 69 and patent in pursuance thereof are fraudulent and void as against this defendant, with a prayer that said patent to Stark and conveyance from the latter to the complainant, may be set aside and held for nought, and that said complainant and defendants, school district No. 1 and Stark, be compelled to release to the city of Portland all right and title to the lot in question, and be forever restrained from setting up any right to the said lot by means of the premises, and for such other relief, etc.

It will be noticed that so much of the answer as is contained in these two exceptions, is in direct contradiction and inconsistent with that portion of the answer to which the exceptions have been disallowed. The former assume at least that the legal title is in Stark, but that the equitable estate is in the defendants, by virtue of certain contracts and agreements binding upon Stark. But the parts of the answer now under consideration, allege in effect, that Stark has no title, and that his certificate and patent are void, and should be so declared, because procured by fraud. Thus the defendant seeks to impugn the validity of the very source from which it seeks to derive its own alleged interest. But waiving this matter, it is plain that these exceptions must be allowed. The function of an answer is to make a defence to the case made in the complaint. A defendant by means of an answer cannot become a complainant and seek affirmative relief, either against the complainant or his co-defendants. The complainant in this suit alleges his legal title to the lot in question, and avers that the defendant, the city of Portland, pretends to have some estate or interest therein, and prays, that the defendant may answer in respect to this, and that the court would decree against such pretended estate or interest of the defendant. The defendant may answer and disclaim any interest or claim of interest in the premises, and that is the end of the suit; or, it may answer and set forth what estate or interest it has or claims to have in the premises, and upon the final hearing, the court must determine and decree concerning the nature and validity of such estate or interest. But by means of such answer the defendant cannot become a complainant and seek affirmative relief, as a specific performance of an agreement to convey, or a decree cancelling the patent of the defendant Stark, for fraud or mistake in procuring or issuing it, or a decree cancelling the conveyance of the defendant Stark to the complainant, or affirmative relief against a co-defendant, as a decree against such defendant restraining it from claiming any interest in the premises in question. Further, in the matter contained in the ninth exception, there is an allegation that the complainant is a "real or fictitious person." If this alternative allegation is allowed to have any effect, it amounts to an attempt to plead by way of answer in abatement of the suit, that the complainant is a fictitious person. Matter in abatement of the suit, as that the plaintiff is not a citizen of another state, or that there is no such person, as the alleged complainant, must be alleged by way of plea, and not answer. Equity Rule 39. The allegation concerning the reservation in Stark's patent, in favor of persons, occupants under the town site law, is of no more force in law than the patent to the city for the use of such occupants. Like the latter, being without authority of law, it is void. Ultimately the right to land under the donation law, depends upon the settlement and the performance of the subsequent conditions; of this performance the patent is conclusive evidence in a court of law, and primary in a court of equity. But the patent cannot limit or restrain the estate granted by the law, and which vests in the donee independent of the patent.

The tenth exception is to the Exhibit A, and is disallowed of course, the allegation referring to it having been allowed to remain in the answer.

The eleventh exception is to the Exhibits B, C and D. The exception to Exhibit B is not allowed because it is a necessary part of the allegation referring to it, which has been allowed to remain, at least a large portion of it is so necessary and the exception must be allowed in toto, or not at all. The Exhibit C, is the patent to Stark, and is referred to in the allegations embraced in the fourth exception. This exception is disallowed, but the matter excepted to, is simply an evasive admission of Stark's interest or estate in the premises in controversy, by virtue of the patent to him of December 8, 1860. In this connection and for all the purposes of the allegation, this reference to the patent is sufficient, and the exhibit is impertinent, and a needless addition to the bulk of the answer. This exception is allowed. The Exhibit D is the certificate 69, upon which it is alleged the patent issued. The exception to the allegation referring to this exhibit has been allowed, and the exception to the exhibit is allowed also, of course. The Exhibits B, C and D, being separate and distinct, I have treated the exception to them (No. 11), as a separate exception to each exhibit, and disallowed the one to B, and allowed the other two. This is necessary, as an exception for impertinence must be allowed in whole or not at all. In form, the exception is entire, but substantially it is separable into the number of exhibits excepted to.

Order that the exceptions to the answer of the defendant, the city of Portland, numbered one, two, three, four and five be disallowed at the costs of the complainant, and that such exceptions, numbered six, seven, eight, nine and ten be allowed at the costs of the defendant, and that exception number eleven as to the Exhibit B, be disallowed at the costs of the complainant, and as to the Exhibits C and D, that it be allowed at the costs of defendant.

Case No. 2,608.

CHAPMAN v. SCHOOL DISTRICT et al.

[Deady, 139.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Oregon. Feb. 27, 1866.

DEDICATION — PROOF — DONATION ACT OF 1850— BOND FOR CONVEYANCE—PUBLIC POLICY.

1. A dedication of land to public uses by parties in possession thereof, prior to the passage of the donation act of September 27, 1850 (9 Stat. 496), does not affect such land in the hands of other persons who may succeed them in such possession.

2. Although by the terms of the donation act, the land is granted to the settler, in consideration of his occupation thereof, prior, as well as subsequent to the passage of such act, the grant itself does not take effect prior to, or relate back beyond such passage, and therefore, a parol dedication or quitclaim to public use of a portion of such land by such settler, prior to the passage of such act, does not affect the after acquired estate in the premises.

[Cited in Myers v. Reed, 17 Fed. 405.]

3. A dedication by parol, being an attempt to pass an interest in lands, contrary to the statute of frauds, should not be allowed, unless plainly proven, and ought not to be inferred from facts not inconsistent with a contrary conclusion.

[See Robertson v. Wellsville, Case No. 11,930.]

4. A multitude are no more meritorious in the eyes of the law, than a single person, and it ought not to be presumed that the latter has parted with his property, without benefit to himself, because a whole community, however numerous, lay claim to it.

5. A dedication to public uses, alleged to have been made within the memory of living witnesses, cannot be proved by reputation.

6. A bond made by Lownsdale and Coffin, on November 26, 1849, for a deed to a lot, upon the sole consideration that the obligors therein—"the trustees of the school and meeting house of Portland, and their successors in office"—should do and perform certain things in the condition thereof written, is a mere gratuitous promise, until performance or an accepted promise of performance of such condition, and therefore will not be enforced against the obligors in equity.

7. School district No. 1 of the county of Multnomah, is not the successor of "the trustees" aforesaid, and therefore cannot claim any interest in such bond, or enforce it.

8. A condition in said bond that "the trustees" aforesaid, should be incorporated by legislative enactment, and thereby authorized to hold the lot aforesaid, for the use of the town of Portland, for school and meeting house purposes, "exclusive of any restrictions of any school law," is not void, as being contrary to public policy.

9. The city of Portland is not the successor of "the trustees" aforesaid, and is not authorized by law to take and administer the trust proposed in the condition of said bond, and therefore, cannot claim any interest in or enforce it.

10. There is no privity between Stark, the complainant's grantor, and the obligors in said bond, and he is not bound by it nor his grantee, the complainant.

In equity.

W. W. Page, for complainant.
Joseph N. Dolph, for city of Portland.
Lansing Stout, for school district No. 1.

DEADY, District Judge. This suit was before this court at the term of January, 1865, upon exceptions for impertinence to the answer of the city of Portland. Chapman v. School District [Case No. 2,607]. It is brought to quiet title to the complainant's interest in lot 3, in block 29, of the town of Portland. The bill alleges that the complainant is seized in fee simple of an undivided one fourth of said lot, and Benjamin Stark the other three fourths thereof; that the defendants—school district No. 1, and the city of Portland—wrongfully claim, and pretend to have some interest or estate in the premises, adverse to the complainant and defendant Stark, and prays a decree quieting his title, etc. Stark was not served with process and did not appear. The other two defendants filed separate amended answers on January 9 and 13, 1865, respectively.

The defendant, school district No. 1, denies the allegations of the complainant, and for further answer avers, that on November 26, 1849, Daniel H. Lownsdale and Stephen Coffin, they being then in the joint possession, under the laws of the provisional government of Oregon, of about 640 acres of the public lands, known as the Portland land claim, and including the lot in controversy, did sell to the citizens of Portland, lot No. 3, in block No. 29, and put them in possession of the same, for a valuable consideration, and did at the date last mentioned, also agree in writing to convey said lot to said citizens. A copy of this agreement is attached to the answer and marked "Exhibit A." That in accordance with such agreement the said citizens took possession of the lot and built a school house thereon, elected trustees and caused the same to be used as a public school for the education of the youth of Portland; that afterwards the said citizens were by law organized into school district No. 1, with power and authority, through directors, to conduct a school in the town of Portland; and that said school district did elect directors, who, in pursuance of an agreement with the trustees of the citizens of Portland aforesaid, made on November 24, 1852, did on behalf of such district, enter upon and occupy said lot and house for a public school, and thereafter such trustees ceased to occupy such lot and house for school purposes, "except by and through the defendant"—school district No. 1; that the defendant occupied the premises until 1857, when one McEwan entered upon them and excluded the defendant, and in 1863, gave the possession to the defendant Stark, for the purpose of defrauding the district of its use; that the defendant continued to act as school district No. 1, by virtue of the general school law of October 17, 1862, and is exclusively authorized to take charge of all property belonging to the citizens of Portland for school purposes, and is willing and now ready to maintain a school at the place in question; that Stark, at the time of the execution of the Exhibit A, claimed a portion of said land claim, including the premises in controversy, adversely to Lownsdale and Coffin, under the same laws, and in 1850 said Stark, and Lownsdale and Coffin, compromised their conflicting claims to the said land claim, and thereby established the boundary between them, so as to leave the premises in question within the land claim of said Stark, and that Stark, in consideration of the premises, agreed with Lownsdale and Coffin to recognize and confirm the acts and doings of the latter, concerning lot 3, in block 29, and with full notice of the same did then and there ratify and confirm the same; that afterwards Stark obtained the land conceded to him by the establishment of boundaries, as aforesaid, from the United States, as a settler under the donation law of September 27, 1850. That at the date of the compromise aforesaid, and after making claim as a settler under said donation law, said Stark did also set apart and dedicate the premises in controversy, to the citizens of Portland for the uses of a public school for the education of the youth of said town, and continued to recognize said dedication and public right from the time when he took possession of the same as aforesaid; and that Stark, in making claim under the donation law, claimed to be a settler on such land during all the period herein referred to, and prior to the time of the settlement of the conflicting boundaries between himself and Lownsdale and Coffin.

The amended answer of the city of Portland is substantially the same as that of the school district, except that it avers that the corporation of Portland, is entitled to the trust alleged to have been created by the bond of November 26, 1849, and the proceeding thereunder, and not the school district, and that all the conditions upon which said bond was made, have been performed by or on behalf of the citizens of Portland, and that the municipal corporation is legally entitled and capable of taking such trust and administering it.

The cause was heard upon the amended bill, answers, exhibits thereto and proofs. Upon careful consideration of these, I find the following conclusions of fact to be satisfactorily proven:

1. That on May 22, 1849, certain persons subscribed a writing whereby they agreed to pay severally, certain sums of money, to such persons as a majority of the subscribers should designate, for the purpose of building a school and meeting house in the town of Portland; and that such subscribers, at a meeting of the same, held at Portland, June 5, 1849, did elect William M. King, Stephen Coffin and William Warren, Sen., trustees, to carry into effect the purpose of such subscription, and did then and there authorize such trustees to purchase a lot and provide for the building of such school and meeting house in Portland.

2. That on July 2, 1849, the trustees aforesaid, by the name and description of the "trustees of the subscribers of the Portland school and meeting house," did agree in writing with William Warren, Jr., for the construction of "a house for the purpose of a school and meeting house," for which the contractor, Warren, was to receive from such trustees the sum of twenty-two hundred dollars.

3. That on November 26, 1849, Daniel H. Lownsdale and Stephen Coffin, were in the actual possession of the public land, commonly called the Portland land claim, which included the premises in controversy, and that being so in possession, the said Lownsdale and Coffin, did make and sign the following bond for a deed to said premises: "Know all men by these presents that we, Stephen Coffin and Daniel Lownsdale of the town of Portland, in the territory of Oregon, are bound and firmly held, in the penal sum of three hundred dollars, good and lawful money of the United States, unto the trustees of the school and town meeting house, in the aforesaid town of Portland, who now act as such, and to their successors in office, for the punctual payment of which, we bind ourselves, our heirs and administrators or executors firmly by these presents, in witness whereof, we have hereunto set our hands and affixed our seals, this 26th day of November, A. D. 1849. The conditions of the above obligation are such, that having this day sold unto the citizens of the town of Portland all that lot or parcel of land, known on the plat of said town, as lot number three in block twenty-nine, being fifty feet in front on First street, and running one hundred feet back, and lying on the western side of said street, and by these presents given possession of the same—Now, know you, that if the people of this beforenamed town of Portland, shall elect any number of trustees to frame a constitution for a body corporate, and they the said trustees, shall be authorized thus, as trustees of said property to hold the same for the use of the town of Portland, exclusive of any restrictions of any school law, and if they shall be thus constituted trustees by the legislative body of the territory of Oregon, and they be limited to use and keep the same for a school, or for holding town meetings, or holding such meetings for the improvement of youth, the advancement of science or such other purposes as they, the people of said town shall see fit; provided, however, that nothing but holding courts (in the absence of a more suitable place being provided by the county), shall interfere with the holding schools in the same, except in case of public emergency, for holding public meetings. And if the said Stephen Coffin and Daniel H. Lownsdale, shall make or cause to be made, a quitclaim deed to the beforenamed lot, then this obligation shall be null and void, and of no effect, otherwise to remain in full force and virtue. (Signed) D. H. Lownsdale, Agent for Stephen Coffin. (Seal.) D. H. Lownsdale. (Seal.)" And that the foregoing instrument was received for record in the clerk's office of Multnomah county, on September 6, 1864, and there duly recorded.

4. That during the autumn of 1849, the "trustees of the subscribers to the Portland school and meeting house," caused to be built upon lot number three, in block number twenty-nine, described in the bond aforesaid, the house, as per contract with William Warren, Jr.

5. That on August 8, 1851, a large portion of the original "subscribers to and proprietors of the Portland school and meeting house," executed a writing, whereby they authorized William M. King, one of the trustees aforesaid, to sell at auction said house and lot, and to divide the proceeds between such subscribers.

6. That from the erection of the house, in 1849, until November 4, 1852, it was occupied from time to time for public meetings, both religious and secular, holding courts and private schools, under the express or implied sanction and permission of the trustees aforesaid, or some of them.

7. That on November 4, 1852, the directors of school district No. 1, took a lease in writing of the premises in controversy from William M. King and Z. C. Norton, acting on behalf of "the owners and proprietors" of the house aforesaid, for the term of twelve months, for the purpose of keeping a common school for the district therein, at the monthly rent of ten dollars.

8. That school district No. 1 has never been in the possession of the premises in question, or used, occupied or controlled them, otherwise than as above stated; and that the city of Portland has never been in the possession of the premises, or used, occupied or controlled them in any manner, although during all the time from the erection of the house to the year 1855 or 1857, the inhabitants of Portland, or some portion of them, did hold meetings there from time to time as above stated.

9. That the defendant, Benjamin Stark, was a settler upon a portion of the Portland land claim aforesaid, containing about forty acres, and including the premises in controversy, from September 1, 1849, and for four years thereafter, under and by virtue of the provisions of the act of congress, approved September 27, 1850, commonly called the donation law, whereby he became the donee and owner in fee simple of such forty acres, including the lot in controversy, and that in pursuance of such settlement, and the proper proof thereof, a patent therefor issued to the said Stark, from the United States, bearing date December 8, 1860, which patent was received for record in the clerk's office of Multnomah county, November 16, 1865, and there duly recorded.

10. That on September 12, 1864, the defendant Stark, by his duly authorized attorney in fact, William Cree, did convey by deed of quitclaim and release, the undivided one fourth part of the lot in controversy to the complainant, for a valuable consideration, which deed was received for record, in the clerk's office of the county of Multnomah, September 13, 1864, and there duly recorded; and that the complainant was at the commencement of this suit a citizen of the state of Maine, one of the United States, and had the legal estate in the undivided one fourth part of the premises in controversy.

11. That on March 1, 1850, and prior to the settlement on the Portland land claim by Lownsdale or Coffin, the defendant Stark claimed to be entitled to the possession of an undivided half of the whole of such claim, but that on the date last aforesaid, the said defendant Stark entered into an agreement in writing with said Lownsdale, whereby the said Stark and Lownsdale compromised and settled their conflicting claims to the possession of the land claim aforesaid, so that, among other things, the said Lownsdale released and quitclaimed to the said Stark the forty acres of said land claim above mentioned, in consideration of which, the said Stark among other things, agreed with the said Lownsdale to ratify and confirm the conveyances "made by the said Lownsdale previous to January 1, 1850," of the lot in controversy; and that subsequently Stephen Coffin ratified and assented to this agreement and settlement of the conflicting claims.

12. That said defendant Stark never made any dedication of the lot in question to either of his co-defendants, or to any public use whatever, although on several occasions since the year 1855, he, in casual conversation, expressed a purpose or willingness to convey the same to the city or public, provided they would reimburse him the expenses he had incurred in improving the property and the streets and walks around it, but that nothing was done by either party to carry out such purpose or intention.

13. That since the commencement of this suit, the defendants, "school district No. 1, and the city of Portland, have each, through the agency of the officers of such corporation, assessed the lot in question to said Stark as the owner thereof, and collected and received from him the taxes properly leviable upon said assessment."

14. That the town of Portland, including the Portland land claim aforesaid and the land claim of John H. Couch, was first erected and constituted a city corporate, by the name of the "City of Portland," by act of the legislature of the territory of Oregon, passed January 23, 1851. That by said act it was provided, that the "mayor, recorder and council of said corporation shall be a body corporate and politic, * * * and shall be capable in their corporate name and capacity to acquire property, real, personal and mixed, for the use of said corporation, with power to sell and convey the same;" but that by such act no provision whatever was made, whereby the city of Portland or the inhabitants thereof could or might accept the trust specified in the bond from Lownsdale and Coffin, nor does such act contain any provision by which such corporation is authorized or permitted to receive, hold or use land for the purpose of education or religious meetings, or in anywise to provide for, conduct or carry on any such scheme or enterprise. This act was superseded by the act of January 31, 1853, which latter act was in turn superseded by the act of January 24, 1854. This last mentioned act was amended by acts passed respectively January 15, 1858, October 17, 1860, and October 17, 1862. The act of January 24, 1854, and the amendments thereto, were superseded by the act approved October 14, 1864, which still remains in force; but none of these acts, subsequent to the first, changed or enlarged the powers of the corporation, with reference to the subjects above mentioned.

15. That the defendant, the school district No. 1, is a public corporation existing under the laws of Oregon, now and since November 4, 1852, but at what time prior thereto it was organized and established does not appear. The first act passed in Oregon in relation to common or public schools, and authorizing and providing for the establishment and organization of school districts, was passed September 5, 1849. This act authorized and required the county school commissioners of the respective counties, before January, 1851, to lay off their respective counties into school districts, and allowed the people of any town or neighborhood, until this was done, to form school districts for themselves, "and perform all acts and duties therein, in accordance with the provisions of this act." The directors of a district constitute a corporation, and as such corporation might receive for the use of the district, lands whereon to build a school house. This act was amended by acts passed respectively January 15, 1852, and January 31, 1853. The act of September 5, 1849, and the acts amendatory thereof, were superseded by the act passed January 12, 1854. This latter act was also amended by the acts passed respectively January 31, 1855, and January 17, 1857. The act of January 12, 1854, and the acts amendatory thereof, were superseded by the act of October 17, 1862. All of these acts subsequent to the first, contain similar provisions for the establishment and organization of school districts, declare them to be corporations, and authorize them to purchase and hold lands, whereon to build school houses for the use of district schools, subject to the limitations and restrictions of the school law. But none of these acts authorize or permit a school district to hold lands generally, or to maintain any particular or special description of school. The school district is independent and separate from any town organization. It is established and its boundaries defined by a county officer, and these may be wholly changed and modified from time to time to suit the wants and convenience of the public interested, including that of the neighboring districts.

16. That the complainant had notice of the foregoing facts, at the date of the conveyance to him, by Stark.

Upon this state of facts, what is the law of the case, or what are the legal or equitable rights of the parties, to the premises in controversy, is the question for the court now to determine. The claim of the defendants before the court, or either of them, that Stark dedicated this land to public uses, being found untrue in point of fact, is thereby disposed of. But as this point was insisted upon in the argument with some degree of earnestness, it is proper to give it a more extended consideration. To do this properly, it is necessary to lay out of view such matters as have no legal bearing on the question. And first, this is not a case like some cited in the argument, where the particular public claiming a dedication, have been long in the uninterrupted use and enjoyment of the property. In such cases, the use or possession itself, though not sufficient to constitute a title under the statute of limitations, is treated as evidence of a dedication, and by the aid of indirect evidence, deduced from other independent facts and circumstances, may be sufficient, in the absence of proof to the contrary, to warrant a court in presuming that a dedication had actually been made. But this fact is wanting in this case—neither of the defendants before the court have ever been in the use and occupation of these premises, except in the solitary instance of the school district above mentioned, and that was as a tenant, and not adversely to Stark. There is no presumption then in favor of the claim of defendants, on the ground of user or occupation.

Again, upon the question of dedication by Stark, the acts and doings of Lownsdale and Coffin are not to be considered—they have no legal relation to the subject. As to this matter, Stark and these parties are strangers, without privity of any kind. By this is meant, that a dedication or promise of a dedication by Lownsdale or Coffin, does not bind Stark and is immaterial with reference to the present inquiry. The reason of this—as has been suggested, is because there is no privity of estate between Stark and these persons. At the date of the bond from Lownsdale and Coffin, they only had the naked possession of the land, under the laws of the provisional government of Oregon, without any estate or interest in the premises whatever. Their acts and doings in no way bound the lands in the person who might succeed them in the possession. This state of things remained unchanged at the time of the agreement of March 1, 1850. The land was public domain—the title was in the United States, and congress passed no law by which any person could acquire any interest in this land, until September 27, 1850. Lownsdale v. Parrish, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 293. At the time of the agreement of March 1, 1850, Stark claimed to be entitled under the local law, to the possession of the undivided half of the whole claim of 640 acres, and in consideration that he would abandon such claim, Lownsdale thereby agreed and did abandon to Stark the exclusive possession of the forty acres of the claim, including this lot. Whatever, out of abundance of caution, may be the technical language of the agreement, this is the legal effect of it, because at that time, the possession, subject to the right of the United States, was all the parties had to bargain about or dispose of. This possession then, Stark took unencumbered by the previous acts and doings of any one—"as though the foot of man had never been on the land." Lownsdale v. Portland [Case No. 8,578]. Subsequently, by virtue of his settlement under the act of September 27, 1850, Stark acquired the legal estate in the premises from the United States. This estate, although upon condition at its inception, the commencement of the residence and cultivation, on September 1, 1849, became absolute and indefeasible upon the completion of the performance of these conditions, on September 1, 1853, four years thereafter. Since the passage of the act of September 27, 1850, Stark being then in possession, and having the legal estate in the premises, any dedication to public uses, by him or his authority, will bind him or those claiming under him with notice. It is also claimed by counsel for the school district, that a dedication prior to that time, and subsequent to September 1, 1849, made by Stark, is binding upon the after acquired estate, for the reason that the act of September 27, 1850, granted the land to the settler on account of his residence and cultivation prior thereto, as well as subsequent. That this would be the proper construction of the law, in the case of a conveyance with covenants of warranty, or any express stipulation or agreement from which it would reasonably appear, that the parties dealt or bargained with reference to the possibility or contingency of the grantor or vendor acquiring title from the United States, I am well satisfied. But a simple quitclaim by Stark, during his occupancy and before the passage of the act granting the land, would in no wise affect the after acquired estate in the premises. Although the act of congress grants the land, on account of the prior residence and cultivation, the grant itself, cannot be said to take effect before it was made—the time of the passage of the act. A grant of land by statute, for considerations transpiring years before, as for military services, takes effect from the date of the grant, and not the performance of the service. In point of time, the grant and the cause or consideration of it, may be identical or widely separated. This was a grant on account of residence and cultivation, on grounds of public policy—as to the future, to promote the settlement of the public lands, and as to the past, to reward those who had settled and held the country for the United States, amid extreme privation and suffering, against the dangerous and savage Indian, and in the face of a foreign power, early and strongly intrenched upon the soil, in the persons and people of the Hudson Bay Company.

I am inclined to hold that a parol dedication to public uses, rests upon no different ground than a quitclaim deed, and if made before September 27, 1850, although by a party then in possession, who afterwards took the legal estate under the act, it would not bind the afterward acquired estate. Doubtless, where a clear case of dedication, so far as the act is concerned, was made out, under such circumstances, a court of equity would be warranted in finding that the party had confirmed the act, after acquiring the estate, from evidence which in itself would be insufficient to establish the fact of an original dedication, or even might presume such a confirmation, in the absence of evidence to show that the donor had disavowed it at once, upon receiving the legal estate. Subject to these rules or principles, did Stark ever dedicate this lot to either of these defendants for public uses? Under the testimony, I am constrained to answer the question in the negative, and if necessary to go further, and say that he is not shown to have dedicated it to any public use whatever. A mere intention to make a dedication to public uses, does not constitute a dedication. Where it is claimed that a dedication has been made by parol, it ought to be shown plainly and distinctly, and not left to be inferred from facts and circumstances, at best indifferent in themselves, and not inconsistent with a contrary conclusion. Irwin v. Dixon, 9 How. [50 U. S.] 30, 31, and the cases there cited. A dedication by parol is an exception to the general and salutary rule of the law, which provides that no interest in lands shall pass without a writing. To allow this exception, except upon clear and satisfactory proof, that the dedication had received the clear assent of the owner—was actually and deliberately made—would be subversive of the policy of the law, and dangerous to private rights. A multitude, or a public corporation are no more meritorious in the eyes of the law or justice than a single individual. A man ought not to be presumed to have parted with his property, without benefit or consideration to himself, because a community, however numerous, lay claim to it. The owner of real property may rest upon his title, and is not required to be always upon the premises, asserting his right, as against the world or any less number of persons, whom he may permit or suffer from time to time to be in the temporary occupancy or enjoyment of it. Particularly is this the case, where a private lot, laid out and marked upon the map as private property, is afterwards claimed for some special public use, like a site for a school or meeting house. Such a dedication, is in the nature of things, altogether more improbable than that of streets and public squares. The latter are entirely consistent with the donor's interest, being essential to the sale of lots, and conducive to the building up of the town—in fact, are paid for by the sale of the adjacent lots at enhanced prices. What might be satisfactory proof of the dedication of the one, would be altogether insufficient to prove the other. A person may be presumed to do what is manifestly just to the public and promotive of his own interest, as to dedicate streets to the public, as an inducement for them to buy the adjacent lots; when he ought not to be presumed to do what is not demanded by justice to the public and is contrary to that interest—as to dedicate his private property for a school or meeting house site. No adequate motive is shown to have induced such a dedication, and it ought not to be allowed unless upon clear and unequivocal proof of the fact.

The testimony upon this point only goes so far as to show that upon several occasions, in casual conversations with acquaintances, Stark expressed a willingness or readiness to convey this property to the city or the public of Portland, upon certain terms and conditions. But this was never done, for the sufficient reason, if no other, that the city or public never took any steps to obtain this conveyance, upon these or any other terms. But these conversations, construe them as you will, are no evidence of a dedication; on the contrary, they are an assertion of Stark's present title to the lot, coupled with a proposal to convey the same upon terms. They are not even evidence of a proposal to the public to convey, but are mere casual remarks to private persons. Again, if Stark, in early times, was in doubt as to what his legal rights were concerning this lot, on account of his agreement of March 1, 1850, he might very properly say, as it is claimed that he did, that he intended to maintain his right to this property, as against any private person, without thereby admitting that it was the property of the city, or that he had or would dedicate it to public uses of any kind. If the city had an interest in the premises, or was entitled to a conveyance of the lot, by reason of the agreement of March 1, 1850, that was a matter of law, and beyond Stark's control or decision, and he was not called upon to express his opinion in the premises, in the statement attributed to him by Shattuck's testimony. That writing speaks for itself, and if by force of it the city is entitled to the premises, it is so entitled, independent of any alleged dedication by Stark, and no pretence of a subsequent dedication by Stark will help it. These are the only facts, which have been proven, to show a dedication by Stark, and they are wholly insufficient for that purpose.

On the hearing, the defendants also offered the depositions of some witnesses, residents of Portland, to prove that by common reputation the property belonged in some way to the city. This testimony, besides being very meagre and unsatisfactory of its kind, was clearly inadmissible, and therefore ruled out. The matters testified to by these witnesses, are their own opinions of the controversy, or what they understood to be public opinion. They all relate to a transaction, within the memory of living witnesses, and the opinions and understanding—public repute, to which they refer, are subsequent to the commencement of this controversy, and appear to have grown out of it. Of its kind, even, it was very meagre and indefinite. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 130; McEwan v. Portland, 1 Or. 300. In this latter case, decided in 1860, the question of the admissibility of this testimony arose in an action for the possession of this same lot. Mr. Justice Stratton delivered the opinion of the court, and maintained the inadmissibility of the testimony, beyond all question, upon both reason and authority. To speak somewhat colloquially—if such hearsay testimony were allowed to be heard in courts of justice, it would be very easy (if not common), for a few active and interested persons to make a reputation on the subject of who was entitled to a particular property, and then prove it in court, by their own oaths. Such a proceeding might fitly be denominated—not improving but talking a gentleman out of his estate.

I next proceed to consider what right, if any, the defendants before the court, or either of them have or can claim, by virtue of the bond to convey, from Lownsdale and Coffin, of November 26, 1849. This bond is for a quitclaim deed to the lot in controversy. It is given, not to the public generally, nor to either of these defendants, but to the "trustees of the school and town meeting house of Portland, and their successors in office." True, the condition of the instrument recites, that the obligors had that day sold this lot unto the citizens of Portland, but the obligation is to these trustees. Indeed, no persons are specially named trustees, and the complainant's counsel objects that the bond is invalid on this account for uncertainty. But I think if such persons as are therein described, did in fact then exist, with the relation or office imputed to them by this description, that the designation is sufficiently certain. Looking back of the bond, we are enabled to find the causes which led to the execution of the instrument, and to identify certainly, the persons intended by the description—trustees of the school and meeting house of Portland. What was the condition of the infant settlement, since grown into the city of Portland, in the spring of 1849? From the testimony in this case, and the admitted history of that period, it is evident that the population did not exceed one hundred persons, and that there were not to exceed ten or twelve houses of any kind in the place. Under these circumstances as shown by the subscription paper of May 22, 1849, and the minutes of the meeting of the subscribers thereto, dated June 5, 1849, some of the residents of the place and the adjoining neighborhood, agree to pay money to build a school and meeting house for their own use—the enterprise to be under the sole control and management of such persons as the subscribers, or a majority of them, may choose. These subscribers, on June 5, 1849, choose three trustees, and authorize them to purchase a lot and provide for the erection of the building. On July 2, 1849, these trustees let the contract to build the house, for the sum of $2,200, of which only $1,900 was ever raised and paid, and a portion of this amount was subscribed and paid after that period. Whilst the project was in this condition, the bond was executed, and I think it apparent, nay, beyond doubt, that the persons described in the bond as the "trustees of the school and meeting house of Portland," were the trustees of the subscribers to the school and meeting house, named in the minutes of the meeting of such subscribers, dated June 5, 1849. At the date of the election of these trustees, there was no such corporation in existence as a school district or the city of Portland. These trustees were appointed to represent and act only for the private individuals—the subscribers aforesaid. Under these circumstances, they purchased and took a bond for a deed to lot 3, from the then holders and occupants of the land claim, Lownsdale and Coffin—the former executing the instrument for himself and the latter. The penalty of the bond is three hundred dollars, but no consideration for the sale is mentioned or recited. The seal to the instrument imports a consideration, but, by the laws of this state, this presumption is disputable. From the nature of the transaction, the situation of the parties and the purpose intended, and from the absence of all evidence to the contrary, I am forced to the conclusion that the instrument was given without any pecuniary consideration —and without a consideration in law, this agreement could not be enforced. The only consideration which can be implied from facts in this case, to support this agreement, is that the trustees to whom it was made, should perform or procure the performance of the conditions upon which the contemplated conveyance is proposed to be made. The bond itself is a mere voluntary promise, and one sided; and until a performance of its conditions by the trustees, or perhaps an accepted promise of performance, it was in law only a proposition, revocable at the pleasure of those who made it. "Uses or trusts, to be raised by any covenant or agreement of a party in equity, must be founded upon some meritorious or valuable consideration, for courts of equity will not enforce a mere gratuitous gift (donum gratuitum), or a mere moral obligation." 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 973.

The object of the obligor in the bond, Lownsdale, was evidently to facilitate and assist the trustees of the subscribers in their enterprise, and assist in founding a school on his property. But he has his own peculiar notions of how this should be done, and he provides that these shall be complied with, as a condition precedent to his making the conveyance. These conditions were substantially, that the people of Portland should elect trustees, and form a constitution for their government, in the management of this property and the conduct of the proposed institution, which trustees, with this form of government, were to be also incorporated by an act of the legislature of Oregon territory, and thereby authorized to hold and manage the proposed trust, subject to the limitations and restrictions in the bond specified. As it appears that the trustees of the subscribers went into possession at once, and built the house upon it, and that on March 1, 1850, Lownsdale still contemplated the proposition as in force; by the covenant which he took from Stark concerning the lot, the court may be warranted in presuming, as a matter of fact, that in the meantime there had been an undertaking on the part of the trustees to perform the conditions of the bond, and that such undertaking was a sufficient consideration to support the agreement on Lownsdale's part. As it is not necessary that the decision in this case should turn upon any doubtful question of law or fact, I will assume, that in this way there arose a sufficient consideration to support the bond. Then the question arises, has there been a compliance with that undertaking, by a performance of the conditions of the bond, by either of the defendants before this court, so as to entitle either of them to the trust proposed by the bond?

To begin with school district No. 1; is this the corporation contemplated in this bond? To this question it seems to me there can be but one answer—that it was not. It is impossible to come to any other conclusion, in the face of the express provisions in the bond, that the trustees or corporation to be constituted for the management of this property, were to hold the same for school or meeting house purposes, "exclusive of any restrictions of any school law." At the very date of this bond, the first school law in the territory passed, September 5, 1849, under which school district No. 1 was organized and constituted a corporation, was in full force and effect. To exclude the operation of this or any other school law, in the management of this proposed trust, this condition is inserted in the bond. School district No. 1 is a public corporation of the state, the creature of this law, and can only take and hold real property as a site for school houses, wherein a common school is to be kept as provided by the general law. The trustees or corporation here intended was simply a private corporation, to hold and manage this trust, according to their own constitution of government, subject only to restrictions provided in the bond, and the principal of these, is that they are not to be subject to or controlled by the public law governing public schools—the very life of school district No. 1, and its only and exclusive authority to act in any matter.

Counsel for the school district admits the force of this objection, but seeks to avoid it, by claiming that this provision in the bond is void, as contrary to public policy and law. This claim cannot be supported by reason or authority. The restriction was only to the effect that this proposed institution should be governed by its own constitution or act of incorporation, and not otherwise, which is the case with every private school or college in the state. But if this condition be contrary to law or public policy, then the proposed trust would fail, and the property remain with the donor as though no agreement had been made concerning it. If the agreement was void in this respect, it was void in toto, for this was the first condition of it. A deed which purports to convey an estate contrary to law, is void, and nothing passes by it. So the objection of the counsel goes too far, because if well taken, it would follow that there is no valid agreement to convey this property to any one. It is also claimed by counsel for school district No. 1, that the neglect of the legislature, to enact the law contemplated by the bond, is not to be allowed to work a defeat of the proposed trust. But this assumes that the legislature were in some way bound to sanction this project, for a particular school in the town of Portland, which assumption conflicts with the freedom of the legislature. The legislature was not bound to create this particular corporation described in the bond, and if they had done it, there could be no pretence, that another corporation, school district No. 1, was intended or authorized to act as the trustee of this proposed trust. The legislature may have deemed it unwise or impolitic to provide for the establishment of this peculiar kind of a school, with special endowments, in the town of Portland, independent of and in conflict with the general system of common schools, already provided for throughout the territory by the act of September 5, 1849.

It seems to have been the policy of the legislature, to provide for a uniform system of public schools, all completely subject to the authority and control of one general public law. This policy appears since to have become fixed in the constitution, which prohibits the assembly from passing any special or local law—"providing for supporting common schools"—and also enjoins upon the assembly the duty of providing "by law for the establishment of a uniform and general system of common schools." Code Or. 107, 117. But the legislature had the power and the right to judge in the premises, and whether they acted wisely or unwisely, this court is not authorized to review their action, or supply the necessary legislation, by means of a judicial decree. But the fact undoubtedly is, that the people of Portland were offered this trust, upon the condition that they would select the trustees, and form a constitution of government for the school, and procure the legislative sanction to the same, by an act creating these trustees a body corporate for that purpose. That the people of Portland, or any one on their behalf, ever undertook or attempted to accomplish, or perform any of these conditions, there is not an iota of evidence, but the contrary is necessarily inferred from all the facts and circumstances. This also involved the consent of the subscribers to the building fund, or their trustees, who were a special association of individuals, and not the people at large of Portland. That they never assented to this trust, or agreed that their organization and subscription should be merged in or transferred to this proposed corporation or trustees, is plainly deducible from the fact, that on August 8, 1851, a large number of them signed a writing, authorizing one of their trustees, to sell the building and lot, and divide the proceeds among the subscribers, in proportion to the amount paid by each.

Again, school district No. 1 does not necessarily represent the people of Portland in any particular. To-day, its territorial limits may coincide with those of the city of Portland, and to-morrow they may include other territory, or new districts may be created within these limits, leaving district No. 1 to include only a small portion of the people of the town. School district No. 1 is a public corporation subject to be changed, modified or abolished by the legislature of the state, without reference to the conditions or purposes of the trust specified in the bond of Lownsdale and Coffin. From these premises and for these reasons I conclude, that school district No. 1 has no interest, either legal or equitable, in the lot in controversy, because it is incapable of receiving or managing the proposed trust, nor in contemplation of the agreement was it ever intended that it should.

What are the rights, if any, of the city of Portland, by virtue of this bond? At the outset, I admit that the bond may be construed without doing violence to its terms, so as to permit a municipal corporation, created and organized for civil and political purposes—such as the government of the town of Portland, to take and administer the trust therein proposed. But I do not think such construction the most reasonable one, and it appears altogether improbable, when we take into consideration the facts and circumstances attending and immediately preceding the making of the bond. But supposing all this to be otherwise, has the city of Portland ever been authorized to take and administer this trust as proposed in the bond? Certainly not, expressly. In all the legislation concerning the municipal corporation of Portland, from the first to the last, it cannot be pretended that there is any express language which covers this case, or even recognizes the existence of the proposed trust. Is such a purpose or authority to be fairly implied from these acts, or any of them? Not that I have been able to ascertain. The purposes for which land may be acquired and held by the corporation of Portland, are expressly enumerated, and they are all in aid of some municipal power expressly granted to the city. The subjects of education, secular or religious, public or private, the advancement of science or the improvement of youth are not even hinted at in any of these acts, and they contain no general grant of power from which this particular power or authority can be implied or inferred.

It seems to have been the policy of the territory as of the state since, to exclude towns and cities, as such, from the control and management of public education, and reserve that power to the organization called the school district, subject to the control of the legislature. The corporation of Portland is not authorized or empowered to keep or maintain a school of any kind, and this trust is proposed upon this condition expressly. If accepted or claimed by the city, it must be taken upon the terms and conditions prescribed. The bond, even if made for a pecuniary consideration, was a voluntary act. The obligor had a right to impose the conditions that he did. There was no law to compel him to sell or give his property for the use of a school. Whoever claims the benefit of this obligation, as trustee, must show at least a capacity in law to take and hold it upon the conditions which accompany it. The property cannot be held or claimed under the bond for any other purpose than that therein specified. From these premises and for these reasons, I conclude that the city of Portland has no interest, either legal or equitable, in the lot in controversy, because it is incapable of receiving the proposed trust, and in contemplation of law it was never intended that it should.

What then appears to be the condition of the subject matter of this proposed trust, considered with reference to the bond, and the facts which led to and followed its execution? The truth of the matter seems to be this—sundry individuals in and about Portland, being about to build a private school and meeting house, (for however public in point of fact the intended use might be, yet in contemplation of law it was a private enterprise, just as an association to build and manage a wharf or market house would be,) the occupant of the land claim gave the trustees of this enterprise a bond for a deed to lot 3, provided they would modify their plan, and thereafter proceed according to the conditions prescribed therein. The house was soon built by these trustees, and used from time to time for private schools, religious meeting and public meetings, but no attention was paid to the conditions of the bond or any steps taken by any one to procure the appointment of the trustees and the creation of the corporation contemplated. In other words, the project proved abortive and was abandoned. A portion of the original subscribers, whose money built the house, authorized its sale, and on that authority one of the original trustees transferred or attempted to transfer the propety to some private parties. The house being practically vacant, McEwan entered under this sale and occupied until ousted by Stark in 1859, who has maintained the possession of it to this day. In the meantime, about 1857, the city was induced to set up a claim to it, on the ground of its being in some way public property, but never succeeded in obtaining possession of it. The trust never took effect—the purpose for which the bond was made was never carried out—the conditions were never complied with. Until this was done, not even the trustees of the original subscribers to whom the bond was made, could demand the performance of its obligation—the execution of the deed. The bond itself conveyed no interest in the land, it was only a promise to convey upon conditions, and the title or estate in the premises, if he had any, remained with the obligor. Near seventeen years have elapsed since the date of the bond, and nothing has been done or attempted to be done, towards accepting or carrying on this proffered trust. It probably came soon to be regarded as a visionary matter, and was abondoned for the public or common school system provided by law.

But admitting that one or the other of these corporations is entitled to take the trust specified in this bond, does the right affect the land as against the owner, Stark? The covenants between Stark and Lownsdale in the writing of March 1, 1850, are not to the obligees in the bond, and Stark is not personally liable upon them to either of these defendants, even if they were entitled to a performance of the bond as against Lownsdale and Coffin or their legal representatives. But independent of any covenant, if Stark had purchased this land of Lownsdale and Coffin, with notice of a prior contract to convey to others, equity would compel him to perform the contract of the vendor. The original purchaser would have a lien upon the land for the purchase money as against the second vendee, Stark, which equity would enforce by decreeing a conveyance or a sale of the land to reimburse the first purchaser, unless in the meantime other controlling equities had intervened. Champion v. Brown, 6 Johns. Ch. 402; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 784, 788. But this doctrine only applies where there is a privity of estate or of representation. If Stark derived title from the obligors in the bond, then this case would come within the rule, unless the long delay of his co-defendants to assert their supposed rights, would induce a court to refuse a decree for a conveyance. But there is no privity of estate between Stark. and Lownsdale and Coffin. Lownsdale and Coffin, at the time they abandoned the possession of the forty acres to Stark, were mere occupants of the public land. They had only the naked possession, which terminated with their occupancy and the commencement of Stark's possession. They had no estate in the land to convey to Stark, and conveyed none. Lownsdale v. Portland [Case No. 8,578]. Stark took the land as an original settler, under the act of September 27, 1850, and derives his title directly from the United States, by virtue of such settlement. Therefore, if this bond had been a deed for lot 3, and made directly to the defendants or either of them, and there was no question as to their capacity in law to take such a trust, yet they would be without interest in the premises, because Lownsdale and Coffin had none to convey. There being no privity of estate between Stark and the grantors in such a deed, the grantees therein could not claim the land as against Stark, or those claiming under him. On the other hand, the defendants are not parties to the covenants between Stark and Lownsdale, and therefore he is not personally liable to them, or either of them, on account of them.

So, upon every aspect of the case, it appears to me that the well settled rules of law are against the claims of the defendants, school district No. 1 or the city of Portland. Nor does it seem to me inappropriate, in a suit of equity, considering the allegations of the defendant's answers, for the court to declare, that as against these defendants or either of them, who seek at this late day, after the property has become valuable, to entitle themselves to the benefit of this supposed trust, the right of the defendant Stark coincides with the equity and justice of the case. These defendants appear to me to be not only without right, but without merit. Their claim seems to be an afterthought, put forward long after the really meritorious parties, the original subscribers, had abandoned the scheme as visionary and impracticable.

Decree in favor of the complainant, according to the prayer of his bill, quieting his title against the claims of the defendants or either of them, and that as against such defendants, he be taken and held to be the owner in fee, and have the legal estate in one undivided fourth part of the lot in controversy, and for the costs and disbursements, one moiety thereof to be paid by each of the defendants, before the court.

CHAPMAN et al. v. SCOTT.

[1 Cranch, C. C. 302.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. March, 1806.

ENJOINING PROCEEDINGS ON JUDGMENT.

The absence of a witness at the trial at law, is no ground of equity to obtain an injunction to stay proceedings at law on the judgment.

Injunction [by Chapman and Wise against Scott] to stay a judgment at law.

CRANCH, Chief Judge. The simple and only ground of equity stated in the bill is, that the complainant had a good defence at law, and duly summoned his father as a witness to prove it, ("which will appear from the annexed summons.") But that when the cause came on to trial, the complainant's father was so much indisposed, that he could not, in time, attend as a witness for the complainant, and judgment was obtained at law against him. The summons was served not by a marshal or other officer, but by the son of the witness. The answer denies the ground of defence at law, but does not say any thing of the absence of the witness at the trial. If, therefore, the equity of the bill is sufficient to warrant an injunction, it cannot be dissolved. The mere fact of the absence of a material witness at the time of trial, is not of itself a sufficient ground for an injunction, because the court of law who tried the cause, was fully competent to give relief, by a continuance or a new trial. The bill does not even aver that an application was made to the court of law for that relief; and if it had, and the court had erroneously refused it, or had improperly exercised its discretion in refusing it, it is not competent for a court of equity to revise and correct the errors of a court of law in a case in which the latter had complete jurisdiction, equitable as well as legal. There being therefore, no ground of equity in the bill, the injunction must be dissolved.

CHAPMAN et al. v. TOY LONG et al.

[4 Sawy. 28;[1] 1 Morr. Min. Rep. 497.]

Circuit Court, D. Oregon. July 31, 1876.

EQUITY—MINING CLAIM—PLACER CLAIMS—WASTE, INJUNCTION TO RESTRAIN—INJUNCTION TO RESTRAIN THE WORKING OF A MINING CLAIM—LOCATOR OF MINING CLAIM—CHINAMEN, RIGHTS OF, IN THE UNITED STATES.

1. A person who seeks the aid of a court of equity to protect his interest in a mining claim located under the mining laws of the United States, must show a substantial compliance with such laws.

2. Placer claims may be located and occupied jointly.

3. The technical distinction between waste and a mere trespass, has been long disregarded by courts of equity, and the rule now is, that wherever a trespass is attended with irreparable mischief or a multiplicity of suits or vexatious litigation, an injunction will be allowed the same as if it were a case of waste.

4. An injunction will be allowed to restrain the working of a placer gold mine located by the complainants under the United States mining acts, while in the possession of persons not qualified to take and hold such lands.

5. Under the mining laws of the United States, the locator of a mining claim becomes the assignee of the United States, and so long as he complies with the conditions imposed by them and the license to occupy remains in force, the right of the locator to the possession of the land, and to appropriate to his own use the minerals therein, is full and complete; and he need not take any step to purchase the same unless he thinks proper.

[Cited in U. S. v. Nelson, Case No. 15,864.]

6. Article 6 of the treaty of July 28, 1868, with China, in effect secures to Chinamen the right to reside in the United States upon the same terms as the subjects of Great Britain and France, and this implies the right to follow any lawful pursuit or calling not prohibited to the subjects of these two powers.

In equity.

Motion for a provisional injunction.

B. F. Dowell and Addison C. Gibbs, for complainants.

Walter W. Thayer, for defendants.

DEADY, District Judge. The complainants, Matthias Chapman, Aaron B. Klise, James Herd, Lorenzo A. Sturgis, and John M. Chapman, allege in their amended complaint that they are citizens of the United States, and that Toy Long and his four co-defendants are "yellow alien Chinamen, who have not declared their intention to become citizens of the United States;" that on February 21, 1875, the miners of Poorman and Jackass creeks district, situate in Jackson county, state of Oregon, duly established rules and regulations for the mines in said district, by which a "claim was declared to be one hundred yards square," and every citizen of the United States allowed to hold one creek and one bank claim by location; that said rules and regulations were duly recorded in said county on February 24, 1876; that on February 28, 1876, the complainants, acting under said rules and regulations, and the act of congress of May 10, 1872 [17 Stat. 91], "to promote the development of the mining resources of the United States," duly located and caused to be surveyed by the proper United States surveyor, certain mineral lands particularly described by metes and bounds on said Poorman creek, lying in township 38 south and 3 range west, of the Wallamet meridian, constituting a parallelogram 20 chains in length and 9-10 chains in width; that on February 29, 1876, the complainants duly posted a notice of their claim to said lands, and caused a copy of the same to be recorded in said county, and a certified copy of such record to be duly posted on said premises on April 15, 1876, of all which the defendants had due notice; that the legal title to the premises is in the United States, and the complainants are entitled to the possession of the same for the purpose of mining for the gold therein, and that such possessory right is of the value of $600. That the defendants, on said February 28, and divers times between that time and the commencement of this suit—May 1, 1876—trespassed upon said premises by mining thereon and carrying away the gold from the same under a claim of right to do so, to the depreciation of the value of said premises; that the defendants are prohibited, by the act of congress and the mining regulations aforesaid, from mining said lands; that they are insolvent and of "bad reputation for truth and veracity;" that the complainants have no means of proving the amount of gold taken from the premises "by these untruthful defendants" except their own testimony, and that said defendants, unless restrained by the order of this court, will do irreparable damage to the premises. The complainants therefore pray for an account, the appointment of a receiver, a decree that the pretended claim of the defendants is illegal and void, and that they be perpetually enjoined from trespassing upon said premises. On June 6 a motion for a provisional injunction was argued and submitted by counsel, upon the complaint.

The occupation and purchase of mineral lands of the United States is regulated by chapter 6 of title 32 of the Revised Statutes, the same being a compilation of the pre-existing acts of July 26, 1866 [14 Stat. 251], July 9, 1870 [16 Stat. 217], May 10, 1872 [17 Stat. 91], and March 3, 1873 [17 Stat. 607], upon that subject. Section 2319 of the Revised Statutes declares that "all valuable mineral deposits in lands belonging to the United States" are "free and open to exploration and purchase, and the lands in which they are found to occupation and purchase by citizens of the United States and those who have declared their intention to become such, under regulations prescribed by law, and according to the local customs or rules of miners in the several mining districts, so far as the same are applicable and not inconsistent with the laws of the United States." Section 2324 of the Revised Statutes also authorizes "the miners of each mining district" to make rules "not in conflict with the laws of the United States or the state * * * governing the location, manner of recording, amount of work necessary to hold possession of a mining claim," subject to certain requirements, which are briefly these: 1. The location must be marked on the ground so that its boundaries can be traced; 2. The record of the claim must contain the date of the location, "the name or names of the locators," and such a description of the claim, by reference to some natural object or permanent monument, as will identify the same; 3. The performance of $100 worth of work or improvement on each claim located after May 10, 1872, yearly, until the issuing of a patent therefor. But when claims are "held in common," such expenditure may be made upon any one claim; and upon the failure of any one of several co-owners to contribute his proportion of these expenditures, his interest shall "become the property of his co-owners who have made the required expenditures."

The law of the state (Code Or. p. 687, §§ 5, 6) provides that the county clerk shall record the notice of a miners' meeting organizing a mining district, and empowers miners "to make local laws in relation to the possession of water rights and working of placer claims * * * subject to the laws of the United States."

The mining laws of the district in question provide that each person shall be allowed to hold one creek and one bank claim of one hundred yards square by location; that one day's work in each week shall be done on each claim as long as there is "a ground sluice-head of water in the creek; provided, if the claims are together, the work may be done on any one of them;" that no "Mongolian or alien who has not declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States," shall hold or work any claim; that if any person shall employ any Mongolian or such alien to work on a mining claim for one month, or shall employ any Chinaman who was not in Oregon at the adoption of the state constitution, to work such claim "for ten days before the entry of the same at the land-office," he shall forfeit the same, and it shall be open to relocation by "any eligible" person.

The reference to the adoption of the constitution of the state grows out of section 8 of article 15 of that instrument, which reads as follows: "No Chinaman, not a resident of the state at the adoption of the constitution, shall ever hold any real estate or mining claim, or work any mining claim therein." This constitution was adopted by the popular vote on November 9, 1857, but did not go into effect until the admission of the state into the Union, February 14, 1859.

Counsel for the defendants object to the allowance of the motion because it appears that the location includes too much ground —nearly ten claims of one hundred yards square, instead of five—and is therefore illegal. As already stated, the complaint describes the premises by metes and bounds, showing them to be in form a parallelogram of about one hundred and ninety-eight yards in width and four hundred and forty yards in length, and lying on the right or west bank of Poorman creek. But it contains no allegation, as it should, concerning the character of the claims inclosed within these limits, as to whether they are all creek or bank claims, or of both kinds, and if so, in what proportion. Neither does it appear that the plaintiffs are in the actual possession of the premises, but rather the contrary. Their rights then are merely such as result from having located the premises as mineral lands, under the mining laws and regulations, and that, too, over the heads of others already in the actual occupation of them. When parties, under such circumstances, seek the aid of a court of equity—even if the alleged trespassers are Chinamen and not expressly authorized to occupy or enter mining lands—they must bring themselves within the law authorizing the location and show a substantial compliance with its terms.

In this case, it being apparent that the land located includes more than one claim to each locator and complainant, while the local law only allows a person to locate one claim, except where one is a creek and the other a bank claim, there ought to have been a distinct allegation in the complaint, to the effect that the premises comprised an equal number of such claims. And if there is not otherwise enough in the complaint to enable the court to ascertain this fact the location must be treated as an illegal one and the motion for an injunction denied. But it is manifest, from the description of the premises, that this location is equally composed of creek and bank claims, and therefore may contain two to each locator. A creek claim is a tract of one hundred yards square, one side of which abuts on the creek, or rather extends to the middle thread of it, while a bank claim is a tract of the same size lying back of and abutting upon a creek claim. This being so, all the land in this location between the creek and a line parallel thereto, and one hundred yards distant therefrom, is creek land, while that lying west of such line is bank land.

The complainants being each entitled to locate a creek and bank claim, together they might have included a tract on the creek two hundred yards wide and five hundred yards long. As it is, they have only taken about ninety-seven thousand yards, or nine and one-half claims, instead of the one hundred thousand yards, or ten claims, which the law in its wisdom allowed them.

For this act of self-denial "the heathen Chinee," who appear to have no rights on Poorman creek that a miner is bound to respect, and who had probably bought this ground and long worked it as their own, are doubtless duly thankful. Yet, to compare small things with great, if at some distant day the moral of this predatory transaction should be called in question, the defendants will hardly have cause to exclaim with Lord Clive, when charged in the house of commons with helping himself to the treasury of Bengal after the signal victory of Plassey: "I am astonished at my own moderation."

On the argument of the motion it was also objected to the location, that parties could not locate placer claims jointly. But I find nothing in the law or regulations, or the nature of things to support this proposition. On the contrary, section 2324 of the Revised Statutes makes express mention of "co-owners" of mining locations, without reference to the fact of whether they are upon "placers" or rock in place; and provides for forfeiting the interest of any of such co-owners who may fail to contribute his share of the expenditures required by law, while section 2330 expressly provides for the joint entry and patent of contiguous placer claims owned by two or more persons, which necessarily implies that they may be located and occupied jointly before such purchase.

It is also insisted that the complainants must first obtain possession of the premises by an action at law before a court of equity will interfere to restrain the defendants from committing the threatened trespasses. The remedy by injunction was once confined to waste, or cases of trespass between parties who were privies in title, such as landlord and tenant, mortgagor and mortgagee, tenant of the particular estate and remainder man, and in those cases the complainant was of course not in possession. But the distinction between the trespass technically called waste, and the ordinary trespass between parties who are strangers or claiming adversely to one another, has been gradually disregarded by courts of equity, until it cannot now be said to exist. Wherever a trespass is attended with irreparable mischief or a multiplicity of suits or vexatious litigation, the remedy by injunction will be applied the same as if it were technical waste Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 918, 928; Adams' Eq. 109. An injunction is now allowed in all cases of trespass upon mines, upon the ground that the acts complained of are, or may be, an irreparable damage to this particular species of property. Id. § 918; Livingston v. Livingston, 6 Johns. Ch. 499; Mining Co. v. Fremont, 7 Cal. 320. And this doctrine is particularly applicable to the case of a continued trespass upon a placer gold mine—the value of which consists wholly of auriferous deposits, that may be worked out and removed without leaving any evidence of their quantity or value upon which to base an estimate or account, as in the case of coal, stone, and other minerals not precious. If, then, the complainants, by their location, have acquired a right to possess the premises and appropriate the minerals contained therein, the defendants can have no such right, and the exercise of it by them is an irreparable injury to the interest of the complainants, and the latter are entitled to the injunction asked for. Prior to the passage of the acts aforesaid concerning the mineral lands, strictly speaking, all persons who occupied them for the purpose of mining, were naked trespassers, at least as against the United States. As between the first occupants and third persons, from the necessity and convenience of the case, the courts held that the former were not trespassers, and were entitled to the protection of the law as persons in the possession of portions of the public domain, with the assumed assent of the owner. Mining Co. v. Fremont, Id. 319; People v. Shearer, 30 Cal. 655. But under the mining laws of the United States now in force, the locator of a mining claim, as to the right to the possession of the premises and to appropriate the minerals therein, becomes and is the assignee of the United States so long as the law remains in force and he complies with the conditions imposed by it. Until congress withdraws this license by a repeal of the law, the right of the locator to the possession of his claim and to appropriate to his own use the mineral deposits therein is full and complete, and he need not take any steps to purchase the land or obtain a patent for it. That is a matter left to his own option or sense of self-interest.

It is admitted that the complainants have taken all the steps necessary to make a technical location of this ground as placer mining claims. It is not necessary that they should show that they have done any work upon it. As the law stands, they have until next February to make the required expenditure upon it for the first year. Their right, then, under the law and regulations to the possession of the ground, and to appropriate the minerals found in it, is perfect, unless the occupancy of the defendants, at the time of the location, had the effect to exclude the premises from the operation of the mining acts, and therefore preclude the complainants from taking it up as mining land "belonging to the United States." With every desire to reach such a conclusion, I cannot see how such an effect can be given to the prior occupation of the defendants, without disregarding the plain letter and purpose of the law. The license contained in section 2319, supra, to explore, occupy and purchase any of the lands of the United States containing mineral deposits, is confined to citizens of the United States, and those who have declared their intention to become such. The defendants, being aliens, are not within the purview of the law, and by an almost necessary implication, are prohibited from the exercise of the rights conferred by it. When there was no legislation upon the subject, the assumption that the occupant was in possession with the consent of the United States applied as well to aliens as citizens, and to Chinamen, as others. But since the passage of the acts prescribing who may occupy the public lands containing mineral deposits, there can be no presumption as against a person making a location under such acts, that a person not included therein is occupying any of such lands with the consent of the United States. As has been said, a locator under these acts, as to the possession of the soil and the appropriation of the minerals therein, for the time being, is the assignee of the United States, and as against an unqualified occupant of the premises he is entitled to the same remedies to which his assignor would be entitled. Nominally, these acts discriminate against the alien generally, but in fact against the dreaded Chinaman only; because all aliens, including the Congo negro, except the Mongolian, are permitted to become naturalized, and therefore qualified to locate and occupy mining lands under them.

Article 6 of the treaty with China, of July 28, 1868 (U. S. Pub. Treat. 148), provides that citizens and subjects of the two nations shall respectively enjoy the same privileges, immunities or exemptions, in respect to travel or residence "within the country of the other," as may there be enjoyed by the citizens or subjects of the most favored nation.

The right to reside in the country with the same privileges as the subjects of Great Britain or France, implies the right to follow any lawful calling or pursuit which is open to the subjects of these powers. Therefore the provisions in the mining regulations of Poorman creek, which, in effect, forbid Chinamen from working in a mining claim for themselves or others, as well as the clause of the state constitution, supra, to the same effect, seem to be in direct conflict with this article of the treaty; and if so, are therefore void. Practically the latter has always been a dead letter. Both it and the similar prohibition in relation to free negroes (section 35, art. 1, Const. Or.) were generally regarded, at the time of the formation of the state constitution, as a mere piece of brutum fulmen, intended to quiet the fears and placate the prejudices of a certain class of voters who were supposed to stand in dread of being overslaughed by an influx of these black and yellow people.

But whether the treaty reaches the point involved in this case, is a question that has not been argued by counsel, and therefore will not now be passed upon. Assuming that it does not, I am constrained to hold that the complainants, by their location, have, for the time being, become entitled to possession of the premises, and the right to appropriate the minerals therein to their own use; and that, therefore, the defendants, although in the peaceable possession of the claims when located by the complainants, are now in law trespassers upon the legal rights of the latter. Let an injunction issue commanding defendants to desist from working the premises until the further order of this court.

CHAPON v. SMYTHE.

[11 Blatchf. 120.] [1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. April 25, 1873.

CUSTOMS DUTIES—"RIBBONS."

In construing the eighth section of the act of June 30, 1864 (13 Stat. 210), which imposes a duty of sixty per centum ad valorem on "all dress and piece silks, ribbons, and silk velvets, or velvets of which silk is the component material of chief value," that clause must be construed in the same manner as if the word "ribbons" read "silk ribbons."

At law. This was a suit [by Jules Chapon] against [Henry A. Smythe] the collector of the port of New York, to recover back duties paid under protest.

Sidney Webster, for plaintiff.

Henry E. Tremain, Asst. Dist. Atty., for defendant.

After the close of the evidence, SMALLEY, District Judge, said:

This is an action of assumpsit, to recover back duties alleged to have been illegally exacted by the defendant, as collector of the port of New York, on various importations of ribbons made by the plaintiff. The controversy is, as to whether the goods should have paid a duty of sixty per centum, or fifty per centum, ad valorem. The defendant claims that the law imposed the duty of sixty per centum, which he levied. The plaintiff claims that the law imposed only fifty per centum. The most important question in the case is one purely of law. There is only one question of fact for the jury to pass upon.

The eighth section of the act of June 30, 1864 (13 Stat. 210), provides, that, on and after the 1st of July, 1864, a duty of sixty per centum ad valorem shall be imposed on "all dress and piece silks, ribbons, and silk velvets, or velvets of which silk is the component material of chief value." It is claimed by the defendant, that the word "ribbons," as so used, means all ribbons, no matter of what material manufactured, whether of silk, or of silk and cotton, or entirely of cotton. The word "ribbon" was first introduced into tariff acts in the sixteenth section of the act of March 2, 1861 (12 Stat. 186), which enumerates, among silk goods, "silk ribbons." The same expression, with the same context, is renewed in the second section of the subsequent act of August 5, 1861, (12 Stat. 293). In the act of June 30, 1864, fabrics made of different materials are classified in different sections. Thus, the sixth section of that act, which is a cotton section, contains an enumeration of various manufactures of cotton, the general duty imposed thereon being thirty-five per centum ad valorem. The seventh section of that act provides for linen goods; and the eighth section, which relates to the question before us, is a silk section.

It is conceded, in this case, by both parties, that there are three kinds of ribbons made, of one or both of two different materials. There are many fancy names given to such ribbons, but these are of no consequence here. There are ribbons made entirely of silk; others made of silk and cotton; and others made entirely of cotton. If the language of the statute is clear and unambiguous, it must, unquestionably, govern. If, however, the language in which the intention of congress is expressed is capable of two constructions, we must look at previous legislation, together with that of the same session of congress in relation to other articles. It is alleged, on the part of the defendant, that the word "ribbons," as used in the clause of the eighth section of the act of 1864 which is under consideration, means every description of ribbons. But, it must be borne in mind that the eighth section is a silk section, in which silk is the material, and the only material, specifically named. The defendant contends, however, that the word "ribbons" includes every description of ribbons, no matter of what material made, and that cotton ribbons would be included, at a duty of sixty per centum ad valorem. But, can it be supposed that congress intended to make cotton ribbons pay more than any other description of cotton goods? Other cotton fabrics pay thirty-five per centum. The court will not give to the clause such an interpretation, unless the language is clear and explicit. Is the language thus clear and explicit, or is it fairly capable of two constructions? My own conviction is, that the clause should be read as though the word "silk" was inserted before the word "ribbons," as it is before "velvets." I am by no means clear that this is not the only grammatical construction. But if it be not, the clause is fairly susceptible of this construction, if we consider the evident purpose of congress to make cotton goods pay one rate of duty, linen goods another rate, and silk goods another, and a still higher, rate.

It may be said, that the words, "or velvets of which silk is the component material of chief value," includes velvets of silk and cotton. That is true, but the inclusion is by express terms. If, therefore, congress intended to include ribbons "of which silk is the component material of chief value," as well as velvets, the words, "or ribbons," would have been inserted after the words "or velvets." The omission to do so indicates, I think, that congress did not intend to include ribbons, as "velvets of which silk is the component material of chief value."

I decide, therefore, for the purpose of this trial, that it was the intention of congress that only silk ribbons should pay a duty of sixty per centum, and that silk and cotton ribbons, with silk as the component material of chief value, should pay a duty of only fifty per centum, and that cotton ribbons should pay a duty of thirty-five per centum. Such a construction harmonizes all the sections of the act of 1864, which the construction contended for by the defendant does not, because, if the word "ribbons" includes every description of ribbons, it necessarily embraces cotton ribbons.

Much evidence has been offered, as to what article is known or called a ribbon. But, it is agreed, on both sides, that the fabrics in controversy were known to trade and commerce as ribbons; and, therefore, the word must apply to them. It is urged, that the construction which I have announced is in conflict with the opinion of the learned judges who decided the case of Lane v. Russell [Case No. 8,053]. Perhaps it is, but I think not necessarily so. In that case, there was an "agreed statement of facts;" and it does not appear that anything was said about cotton ribbons. It does not appear that the existence of such an article, in trade and commerce, as ribbons composed wholly of cotton, was made known to the court. No reference is made to such an article, either in the agreed statement or in the opinion of the court. If it had appeared to the learned judges that there were cotton ribbons, as well as silk ribbons, and silk and cotton ribbons, I am inclined to think they would have come to a different conclusion. But, whether they would or not, their decision is not necessarily binding upon this court. This court decides the law as it understands it; and so does the circuit court for Massachusetts. If either is wrong, there is a higher tribunal, a common superior, to correct either that court or this.

I am the more confirmed, however, in my conclusion, for another reason. The subject has attracted the attention of the secretary of the treasury, and he has examined it, and called upon his law advisers for their opinion. The solicitor of the treasury is the special law adviser of the treasury department, and one of the highest law officers of the government. He appears to have come to the same conclusion as the one I now announce, to wit, that the section should be read as though the word "silk" were inserted before the word "ribbons." Not satisfied, however, with this opinion of the solicitor, the secretary applied to the attorney general, the highest law officer of the government. He gave the subject a careful examination, and, in an elaborate and well considered opinion, came to the same conclusion, to wit, that the clause should be read as if the word "silk" were written before the word "ribbons." In respect to every description of ribbons but velvet ribbons, duties are now levied, as I understand, in compliance with the construction thus given to this statute by the attorney general.

Therefore, the only question for the jury is this—How were the ribbons in question known in commerce in 1864, and when they were imported, which was in 1867? Were they known in the trade as silk goods or as silk and cotton goods? If they were known in the trade as silk ribbons, although they were not in point of fact made wholly of silk, they were liable to a duty of sixty per centum. It is conceded that these ribbons are not manufactured entirely of silk, but are made of silk and cotton, with silk as the component material of chief value. The evidence being that the ribbons were manufactured of silk and cotton, it is for the defendant to show, to the satisfaction of the jury, that they were known, and bought and sold in trade, in 1864, and at the date of their importation, as "silk ribbons." If the jury shall find that they were so known and bought and sold, at those dates, they will find a verdict for the defendant. If, on the contrary, the jury shall find, that, upon the evidence, the ribbons in controversy were not known in trade and commerce as silk ribbons, they will find a verdict for the plaintiff. These are the general propositions of law which will be given to the jury for their guidance, and I announce them in advance of the arguments to the jury, in order that the counsel may know to what questions of fact the testimony is to be applied, and what facts the jury will be directed to pass upon.

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff.

ACT OF BANKRUPTCY—SETTING UP SUSPENSION OF PAYMENT OF COMMERCIAL PAPER.

1. The allegation of stoppage and suspension of payment on a certain day, upon commercial paper which was made and dated within the six months next preceding the actual filing of the petition, connected with the allegation that payment of the commercial paper (a due bill) had been demanded at different times, and that the respondent had failed to make such payment, was equivalent to an allegation of a demand for payment on that day.

2. Order of adjudication granted.

In bankruptcy.

Audley W. Gazzam and George Wadsworth, for petitioning creditors.

George Gorham, for bankrupt.

HALL, District Judge. This was a motion on the return of an order to show cause for the adjudication of the bankrupt on the grounds that he had committed an act of bankruptcy by suffering his property to be taken on legal process within six months next preceding the commencement of bankruptcy proceedings. And also on the ground that the bankrupt had suspended payment of his commercial paper (a due bill), and had not resumed payment of the same within a period of fourteen days, etc. It appearing that the allegation setting forth the act of bankruptcy as suffering the bankrupt's property to be taken on legal process, did not allege any specified day, but that the said act was committed on the —— day of ——, 1870, and that the only other allegation of the time of its commission, was, that it was committed within the six months next preceding the date of the petition, which was not dated, but which had been sworn to three days before it was filed, the court held the petition defective in this respect. As to the allegation that the bankrupt committed an act of bankruptcy on the 28th day of September, 1870, by suspension and non-resumption of his "commercial paper," within a period of fourteen days, the same not being a note, but a due bill, bearing date within the six months next preceding, and payable on demand, upon which there seemed indorsed several partial payments, objection was urged to adjudication on this specification, on the ground that there was no allegation of demand.

The court held that the allegation of stoppage and suspension of payment on the 28th of September, 1870, upon commercial paper which was made and dated within the six months next preceding the actual filing of the petition, connected with the allegation that payment of the due bill had been demanded at different times, and that the respondent had failed to make such payment, was equivalent to an allegation of a demand for payment on that day. Order of adjudication granted.

CHAPPELLE v. OLNEY.

[1 Sawy. 401;[1] 4 Am. Law T. Rep. U. S. Cts. 30.]

Circuit Court, D. Oregon. Dec. 31, 1870.

LIMITATION DURING TIME OF INSURRECTION — AUTHORITY OF PRESIDENT TO DECLARE THAT INSURRECTION HAD CEASED—EXCEPTIONS TO STATE OF INSURRECTION IN ARKANSAS — RIGHT OF ACTION NOT TO SURVIVE TO WIFE—INTEREST DURING STATE OF INSURRECTION.

1. From and after the act of July 13, 1861 (12 Stat. 257), and the proclamation of August 16, 1861 (12 Stat. 1262), pursuant thereto, declaring the inhabitants of Arkansas to be in a state of insurrection against the United States, and until the termination of such insurrection, an inhabitant of Arkansas could not maintain an action in the courts within the state of Oregon against an inhabitant of the latter state, and therefore the period during which such insurrection existed is not to be counted as a part of the time limited for the commencement of such an action.

2. The act of July 13, 1861, impliedly authorized the president, so long as congress did not otherwise provide, to declare by proclamation that the insurrection before declared to exist by him, had ceased, as to the inhabitants of any state or section thereof.

3. The president having declared the inhabitants of Arkansas in a state of insurrection, the court does not judicially know that any portion of them, then or afterwards, were within the exceptions in the proclamation because they in fact maintained a loyal adhesion to the Union, or inhabited a portion of the state occupied and controlled by the forces of the United States.

4. A chose in action accruing to a woman during coverture survives to her, unless the husband reduce it to his exclusive possession during his life time; therefore, when a legacy was given to the wife, and she and her husband joined in a power of attorney authorizing O. to collect and receive the same for her use and benefit, the receipt of the money by O. during the life of the husband was not the possession of the latter, except for the use of the wife, and the right to recover the same from O. survived to her.

5. Interest is not recoverable upon a debt owing by an inhabitant of Oregon to an inhabitant of Arkansas during the period the inhabitants of the latter state were in a state of insurrection against the United States.

[At law. Action by Martha Chappelle against Cyrus Olney to recover moneys received by defendant to plaintiff's use.]

E. C. Bronaugh, for plaintiff.

W. Lair Hill, for defendant.

DEADY, District Judge. This action was commenced August 17, 1870. From the complaint it appears that the plaintiff is a resident and citizen of the state of Arkansas and the defendant of Oregon, and that the plaintiff has resided in Cross county, in the state of Arkansas, continuously since December 10, 1859. That in the year 1854, the plaintiff, then being one of the legatees in the last will and testament of Philip Thompson, deceased, late of Oregon, did, together with her late husband, Elisha W. Chappelle, constitute and appoint the defendant their agent and attorney to collect and receive for plaintiff's use and benefit, all sums of money accruing to plaintiff from the estate of said Thompson, and to hold the same subject to the order and demand of plaintiff and her said husband; in consideration whereof, the defendant undertook and promised plaintiff and her said husband to transmit to said husband for the use and benefit of plaintiff all such sums of money received by him as aforesaid, whenever he should be thereunto afterwards requested. That the defendant as agent and attorney as aforesaid received from said estate for plaintiff's use the sum total of $6,146 in gold and silver coin; and that on November 30, 1860, the sum of $4,950.54 of said moneys was remaining in the hands of defendant; and that upon said last mentioned date, said Elisha W. Chappelle requested defendant to forthwith transmit to him for plaintiff's use and benefit all such moneys then in his hands; and that the defendant neglected and refused to transmit or pay over the sum of money then in his hands or any part thereof, and still so neglects and refuses, to the damage of plaintiff $9,756.71.

On August 17, the defendant appeared and demurred to the complaint, and for cause of demurrer alleged: 1. That the action had not been commenced within the time limited by law. 2. That the facts stated are not sufficient to constitute a cause of action. On September 5 and 13 the demurrer was argued by counsel and submitted.

It appears from the complaint that the plaintiff's right of action did not accrue within six years next before the commencement of this action, but that a period of 9 years, 8 months and 17 days elapsed between the demand for the money and the bringing of the action. By the law of this state such an action as this is barred if not commenced within six years; but when the plaintiff is "an alien, subject or a citizen of a country at war with the United States, the time of the continuance of the war shall not be a part of the time limited for the commencement of the action." Code Or. 141, 144. It follows that the demurrer as to the first cause alleged is well taken, unless the plaintiff's right to sue the defendant was suspended at least 3 years, 8 months and 17 days by reason of the hostilities or war carried on between the United States and the states of the so-called "Southern Confederacy"—including Arkansas—between November 30, 1860, and the commencement of this action. If the right to sue was so suspended for any length of time, that period is not to be counted as a part of the six years within which the action may have been commenced.

By section 5 of the act of July 13, 1861 (12

Stat. 257), congress authorized the president, under certain circumstances therein mentioned, to declare by proclamation that the inhabitants of any state or section thereof were in a state of insurrection against the United States; "and thereupon all commercial intercourse by and between the same and the citizens thereof, and the citizens of the rest of the United States shall cease and be unlawful so long as such condition of hostility shall continue; and all goods and chattels, wares and merchandise, coming from said state or section into the other parts of the United States, and all proceeding to such state or section, by land or water, shall, together with the vessel or vehicle conveying the same, or conveying persons to or from such state or section, be forfeited to the United States."

This act was passed with direct reference to the rebellion or insurrection then being organized and maintained in certain states—including Arkansas—against the authority and government of the United States. In pursuance of this act the president on August 16, 1861 (12 Stat. 1262), by proclamation, declared the inhabitants of certain states—including Arkansas—to be in a state of insurrection against the United States, excepting, among others, the inhabitants of such parts of such states as "may maintain a loyal adhesion to the constitution and the Union, or may be, from time to time, occupied and controlled by forces of the United States engaged in the dispersion of said insurgents."

On April 2, 1866, the president by proclamation declared "that the insurrection which heretofore existed in certain states—including Arkansas—is at an end;" and on August 20, 1866, another presidential proclamation was issued declaring that the insurrection was at an end in Texas—this state not having been included in the proclamation last mentioned—and that the "said insurrection is at an end, and that peace, order, tranquillity and civil authority now exist in and throughout the whole of the United States of America."

From and after the date of the proclamation of August 16, 1861, all commercial intercourse was prohibited between the inhabitants of Arkansas and the people of the United States, and the transportation and removal of property to or from Arkansas to other parts of the United States not declared to be in a state of insurrection, was punishable by forfeiture thereof. For the time being the plaintiff was a citizen or inhabitant of a country at war with the United States, and therefore could not maintain an action in the courts within this state against the defendant to secure this money. 1 Kent, Comm. 66. The plaintiff's remedy was suspended until the cessation of hostilities and the restoration of peace and lawful intercourse between the people of the two countries. Id. 68.

The next question to be considered is, when did this state of insurrection or hostilities cease? Without stopping to consider whether the president has any power to declare the beginning or ending of an insurrection, except in pursuance of legislative authority, and conceding that all power over questions of war and peace, domestic or foreign, is vested by the constitution in congress, except that vested in the treaty making power, I am of the opinion that the authority conferred upon the executive by the act of July 13, 1861, to declare Arkansas in a state of insurrection, impliedly authorized him, if the state of things amounting to such insurrection should cease or change, to then declare it at an end, unless in the mean time congress had otherwise provided. Assuming that the insurrection, as to Arkansas, was at an end from and after the proclamation of April 2, 1866, the remedy of the plaintiff—the right to sue defendant for this money—was suspended for 4 years, 7 months and 16 days. Deducting this period from the time between the accruing of the right of action and the commencement of this action, leaves 5 years, 1 month and 1 day—a period of 10 months and 29 days less than that allowed by law within which to begin the action. This view of the matter is the most favorable one that can be taken for the defendant, for there is no ground upon which the court can assume that the insurrection, including the prohibition of intercourse between the people of the United States and Arkansas, terminated at an earlier date. Actual war—the marching of hostile forces and the conflict of opposing armies in battle—may have ceased sooner, but this proclamation is the earliest act of the government to which the attention of the court has been called which purports or has the effect to relieve the inhabitants of Arkansas from the status of insurrection and consequent non-intercourse, in which they were placed by the proclamation of August 16, 1861.

In U. S. v. Anderson, 9 Wall. [76 U. S.] 56, the question arose, when was the rebellion entirely suppressed? The circumstances were these: What is called the captured and abandoned property act, passed March 12, 1863 (12 Stat. 820), gave to the loyal owners of such property a right to bring suit against the United States in the court of claims to recover the proceeds thereof, "at any time within two years after the suppression of the rebellion." Anderson, a resident of Charleston, South Carolina, on June 5, 1868, commenced an action to recover the proceeds of certain cotton seized and sold by the United States. The defense was, that the action was barred by the limitation in the act of March 12, 1863, or in other words, that the action was not commenced "within two years after the suppression of the rebellion." By an act of congress passed March 2, 1867 (13 Stat. 422), it was declared that the act passed June 20, 1864 (13 Stat. 144), to increase the pay of the army should "be continued in full force and effect for three years after the close of the rebellion as announced by the president of the United States, by proclamation bearing date August 20, 1866."

The court held that the limitation of two years did not commence to run until the rebellion was suppressed throughout the whole country, and that the proclamation of August 20, 1866, was the first official declaration on the part of the executive that the rebellion was wholly suppressed. The court also held that the act of March 2, 1867, was so far a legislative recognition of the proclamation declaring the insurrection at an end throughout the United States on August 20, 1866, and that that day would be considered as the day when the rebellion was suppressed, as respects the rights intended to be secured by the captured and abandoned property act.

The court also expressed the opinion that there is no reason why this declaration of congress should not be received as settling the question of when the rebellion was suppressed, "wherever private rights are affected by it." But the court premised this dictum by the declaration that it did not intend to decide anything more than the question: When was the rebellion entirely suppressed within the meaning of the limitation clause on the captured and abandoned property act?

The conclusion of the supreme court upon this question does not conflict with the opinion already expressed in this case, that for the purpose of enabling an inhabitant of Arkansas to maintain an action in the courts of Oregon, the insurrection and consequent disability of the plaintiff to sue were at an end, from and after the proclamation to that effect of April 2, 1866. For this purpose it was only necessary that the insurrection should have been declared at an end as to the inhabitants of Arkansas, and whether it still continued in Texas or not, did not affect the plaintiff's right to sue the defendant.

But as to this case, it makes no difference whether the insurrection as to the inhabitants of Arkansas, was at an end from and after the proclamation of April 2, 1866, or that of August 20, of the same year. In either case, after deducting the time during which the remedy of the plaintiff was suspended by the state of war or insurrection, the limitation of six years would not have run against her right of action.

On the argument counsel for defendant did not seriously question the correctness of these conclusions, but maintained that the action was barred unless it affirmatively appeared from the complaint that the plaintiff was not within the exception contained in the proclamation of August 16, 1861, or in other words, that the particular locality in Arkansas—Cross county—in which the plaintiff resided during the existence of the insurrection did not "maintain a loyal adhesion to the Union and the constitution," or was not "occupied and controlled by forces of the United States."

The plaintiff is not required to anticipate the defense of the statute of limitations, nor could the defendant at common law claim the benefit of it unless he pleaded it. But under the Code, when it appears from the statement of the cause of action in the complaint, that it did not accrue within the limitation prescribed by law, the defense may be made by demurrer. In such case I suppose the plaintiff should anticipate the defense by stating in the complaint any special matter which he relies upon to take the case out of the statute, or otherwise the demurrer will be sustained. But, as in this case, if such special matter is within the judicial knowledge of the court, it need not be stated in the complaint.

Here it appears upon the face of the complaint that the action was not commenced within six years from the time it accrued. If this were all, a demurrer that the action had not been commenced within the time limited would be a good defense. But it is also judicially known to the court that the inhabitants of Arkansas—which description includes the plaintiff under the allegations in the pleadings—were in a state of insurrection against the United States for a sufficient period after the action accrued to take the case out of the statute. But at this point the defendant asks the court to assume that Cross county was during this time within the exception in the proclamation,—that is, was either loyal to the Union or occupied by the forces of the United States, and therefore not in a state of insurrection. Now this is a matter of which, if true, the court cannot take judicial notice. The proclamation declares the whole state to be in a state of insurrection. No particular exceptions to this condition are recognized as then existing. The exceptions made, relate to no particular person or place, but only to such persons or places as may possibly then or thereafter—particularly thereafter—"maintain a loyal adhesion to the Union and constitution," or be "occupied and controlled by the forces of the United States." The exception in regard to the state of Virginia is positive and definite. It relates to the "inhabitants of that part of the state lying west of the Alleghany mountains." If then the particular portion of Arkansas in which the plaintiff resided during the hostilities between the United States and the Southern Confederacy was, as a matter of fact, loyal to the Union or occupied and controlled by United States forces, and therefore not in a state of insurrection, and the defendant relies upon these facts to bring the case within the bar of the statute, he should plead them and be prepared to prove them on the trial.

Upon the argument of the second cause of demurrer it was contended for the defendant that the chose in action—the legacy—was reduced to possession by the husband of plaintiff in his lifetime, and therefore the right to the same did not survive to her, but to the administrator of the husband. Upon a careful examination of the facts and authorities I am clear that the demurrer in this respect is not well taken. The husband was entitled to reduce this legacy to his possession in his lifetime, and then the property in it would have become absolutely his, and upon his decease gone to his administrator. But if he did not so reduce it to possession, his property in it being in the meantime only conditional, it would survive to his wife. 1 Bac. Abr. 700; Hayward v. Hayward, 20 Pick. 520; Schuyler v. Hoyle, 5 Johns. Ch. 196. In Hayward v. Hayward, and Schuyler v. Hoyle, supra, the questions raised by this branch of the demurrer are thoroughly examined and discussed, and the decisions of both the learned courts were in favor of the right of survivorship of the wife, and that, too, under circumstances not so strongly in her favor as are those of this case.

If the power of attorney given to defendant had been given by the husband alone, as it might have been, there would be force in the argument that the act itself evinced an intention to reduce the property to his own possession. But the power was from the wife as well as the husband. This fact itself shows a want of intention on the part of the husband to acquire the property for himself; and the possession of the defendant acquired under this joint power of attorney was not the separate possession of the husband, but of him and his wife.

It is well settled that if the husband sues alone, as he may, for money to which he is entitled in right of his wife, and recovers, the property thereby vests in him, and the right of ownership in the wife is cut off; but if the husband and wife sue jointly, and the husband dies, the wife as survivor would take the benefit of the recovery. 5 Johns. Ch. 210. The joining of the wife in the suit is held to be sufficient evidence of an intention on the part of the husband not to reduce the property to his own possession or recover it for the benefit of himself.

In this case, in addition to the wife's joining in the power of attorney, there is the express declaration therein, that the defendant was to receive and transmit this legacy to the husband for the use and benefit of the wife. This circumstance alone shows that it was not the intention of the husband to acquire possession of the property otherwise than for the plaintiff. Under these circumstances, the receipt of the money by the defendant was not the receipt of it by the husband otherwise than for the use and purpose mentioned in the power, and upon his death, whilst the money was still in the hands of the defendant, the right to sue for and recover it to her own use, survived to the wife.

This debt being payable directly to the plaintiff, interest is not recoverable upon it while she was an inhabitant of the district of country in a state of insurrection against the United States. Ward v. Smith, 7 Wall. [74 U. S.] 452.

COLLISION—LACHES OF LIBELANT—1863.

[In admiralty. Libel by Rufus J. Chard against the schooner Kate L. Bruce for damages caused by collision.]

Before HALL, District Judge.

This is a case of collision. The collision occurred near Turtle island, at the west end of Lake Erie, on May 16, 1858. The Bruce continued to run on the lakes between Chicago and Buffalo, until about the 10th of May, 1859, when she was sent down the St. Lawrence and taken around to Boston, Mass. While at Montreal she was taken into possession by parties holding a mortgage upon her, and on the 3d of August, 1859, she was sold under the mortgage as free from incumbrances, and for her fair value, to a bona fide purchaser, without notice, who afterward, and before notice of any claim, paid the purchase money. The notice of the sale under the mortgage was published in Buffalo, where the libelant resided, in a daily paper, from the 8th of July to the 1st of August, but no notice of this claim was given at the sale. The libelant claims as assignee of the owner of the vessel injured by the Bruce.

As a general rule, I have held that admiralty liens on vessels navigating our western lakes must be prosecuted within one year after such liens could have been prosecuted, or that they will be considered as stale, and will not be enforced against a bona fide purchaser for value without notice. Under all the circumstances of this case, I think the claim should be considered a stale claim, which ought not to be enforced against the present owner of the Bruce. Libel dismissed, with costs.

CHARLES v. MATLOCK.

[3 Cranch, C. C. 230.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec., 1827.

ENFORCEMENT OF INDENTURE OF APPRENTICESHIP.

Under the Maryland act of 1793 (chapter 45, § 6), a mechanic may take as an apprentice any male child until he arrive at the age of twenty-one years; and an indenture made by one justice of the peace only, for five years' service of the boy, was, under the seventh section of the act, enforced by the court, after the boy had been some time with the master, (who was a tailor,) and was able to earn eight or nine dollars a week by working at the trade; although one justice of the peace had no authority so to bind him, and although the age of the boy was not specified in the indenture, and although the indenture was not seen by the orphans' court, nor recorded, nor signed by the boy or his mother, who was his only living parent, nor was her approbation thereof notified by an indorsement on the same.

This was the petition of an infant [Edward Charles], to be discharged from the custody of the respondent [Simeon Matlock], who claimed him as his apprentice, under an indenture made by one justice of the peace only, for five years' service. The indenture did not specify the age of the boy, and was not recorded in the orphans' court, nor seen by that court, nor its approbation, or that of the mother, who was the only living parent, indorsed thereon.

The sixth section of the Maryland act of 1793 (chapter 45, § 6), is in these words:—"That it shall and may be lawful for any manufacturer or mechanic to take, as an apprentice, any male child until he shall arrive at the age of twenty-one years; provided, always, that the contract so made shall specify the age of the child at the time of making the said contract, and that the parent or parents of such child, if living, or, if an orphan, the orphans' court of such county as the child shall reside in, shall see the contract within two months after its execution, and notify their approbation thereof by indorsement on the same; and that the said contract shall be recorded among the records of the orphans' court, and the sum of three shillings shall be paid by the master of the said apprentice therefor; and, when so recorded, the said contract shall be of the same validity as if the same had been originally made with the parents of the said child, or with the orphans' court." By the seventh section of the same act it is, among other things, enacted, that "in case the contract, whether defective in form or not, hath been partly executed, the said county or criminal court, may award and compel the terms, or any part of the terms, to be performed by the master or mistress, or by the apprentice, as justice and equity may require; and the master or mistress of any apprentice may detain the said apprentice in his or her service till such apprentice is or shall be discharged by the court aforesaid; and the said master or mistress may maintain such action against strangers, as if such apprentice had been legally bound to serve."

Mr. Beale and Mr. Hellen, for the petitioner, contended that the indenture was void, and constituted no contract: 1st. Because one justice of the peace alone has no authority whatever to bind out a child as an apprentice, nor to make a contract for him. The law of Maryland only gives the power to the orphans' court, or to the father of the child, or to the trustees of the poor, (whose authority is limited to the children under their care in the poor-house of the county,) or two justices of the peace, when the orphans' court is not in session. The authority given by the sixth section, to a manufacturer, or a mechanic, to take as an apprentice any male child, is to take with the consent of the child, who is thereby authorized to enter into such a contract for himself, with the approbation of his parents, if any, or of the orphans' court, if he is an orphan. To make this a contract under that section, it must be shown that the boy made the contract on his part; that it specified his age; that his mother, or the orphans' court, saw the contract within two months after its execution, and notified their approbation by an indorsement on the same, and that it was recorded among the records of the orphans' court. At common law, he could make no such contract. His authority is entirely under the statute, and can be exercised only in the manner, and to the extent designated in the statute. Recording is all-important to the validity of a contract; as much so as the recording of a deed for land. The statute says: "And, when so recorded, the contract shall be of the same validity as if the same had been originally made with the parents of the said child, or with the orphans' court." There must be two parties to a contract. The parties to the contract, contemplated by the sixth section, are the mechanic and the boy. Here is no evidence whatever, that the boy entered into any contract. The indenture purports to be made between the justice of the peace and the mechanic; and it does not appear that the assent of the boy was ever asked. In the case of Ballard v. Edmonston, in this court, at October term, 1823 [Case No. 817], the indenture was signed by the mother of the boy, and by Ballard, who was a tailor, but not by the boy. The indenture did not specify the age of the boy, but he was to serve nine years. He had served part of the time, and Mr. Ashton contended that it was a contract which the court could and ought to enforce under the seventh section of the act. Mr. Coxe, on the contrary, contended that that was not a contract defective in form only, and therefore within the seventh section, but it was no contract at all, as the mother had no right or authority to bind out her child. And of that opinion was the court, (Thruston, J., absent.) So in the case of Handy v. Brown, in this court, at December term, 1809 [Id. 6,019], this court (Fitzhugh, J., absent,) decided that an indenture entered into and signed by a boy of sixteen years of age, without any evidence of the assent of his parents, or of the orphans' court, was not a binding indenture under the Maryland law; and, if it could be considered as a contract for necessaries, yet it did not create the relations of master and apprentice.

Mr. Key, contra, considered the objection as going to the form of the contract only, except the assent of the mother, within the two months after the execution of the indenture, which he was ready now to prove, although her approbation had not been indorsed upon the contract.

CRANCH, Chief Judge. I think there was no contract binding the boy, because the age was not inserted; because neither the approbation of the father, nor mother, nor orphans' court was indorsed on the contract; because it was not recorded in the orphans' court; and because one justice of the peace had no authority to bind out an apprentice in any case whatever. These requisitions of the statute, I think, are necessary to the validity of the contract, agreeably to the decision in Ballard v. Edmonston [supra]. Whatever is necessary to the validity of the contract is matter of substance. An infant cannot contract under seal, but in the manner and to the extent prescribed by statute. A limited power must be strictly executed. The acts not having been done, which I deem necessary to the validity of the contract under the statute, I am of opinion that there was no contract.

THE COURT, however, considered the objections as objections to form only, except that to the want of the assent of the mother; but were of opinion that such assent may now be proved, although not indorsed within the two months; that the sixth section does not require the recording in any limited time, and that it may now be done, (upon this point, however, MORSELL, Circuit Judge, dissented), and that the time of service, being limited to five years, is equivalent to the insertion of the age of the child.

The petition was dismissed.

SEAMEN—EXTRA SERVICES.

A seaman who was shipped as cook on a foreign voyage, and who performed extra services as stevedore in a foreign port, may proceed in the admiralty for compensation for the extra services, though his wages as cook have been paid in full.

[Cited in The Artisan, Case No. 568.]

In admiralty. The libellant shipped at New York in January, 1870, on board the Charles F. Perry, for a voyage to Rosario, in South America, and back to Boston, at thirty dollars a month. At the foreign port he did the work of a stevedore, by the request of the master, and thus saved a considerable sum to the vessel, besides paying a man to do his work as cook. His services as stevedore were much more laborious and valuable than those of a cook. The special bargain alleged in the libel was not found by the court to be proved, but he was considered, on the facts, entitled to a quantum meruit.

C. G. Thomas, for libellant.

H. C. Hutchins & H. H. Currier, for claimants.

The court has no jurisdiction to enforce payment of a stevedore's wages. The Amstel [Case No. 339]; Phillips v. The Thomas Scattergood [Id. 11,106].

LOWELL, District Judge. I do not care to criticise the cases cited for the claimants, though I doubt their soundness. This is not a libel by a stevedore for stowing a vessel, but of a cook demanding extra wages for work done on board the vessel beyond the limits of his original contract, and not so sharply distinguished from it that he is obliged to split his bill into two parts, and proceed for one here and for the other at common law. This case is much like those in which Judge Sprague held that where the principal contract was maritime, the jurisdiction of the admiralty would not be defeated by the fact that some incidental services were performed on land. The Mary [Case No. 9,188]; The Canton [Id. 2,388]; The Brookline [Id. 1,937]. There are many voyages in which the seamen perform more or less work on shore, as in a trading voyage to the west coast of America for hides, made famous by Mr. Dana's book; or in the pursuit of seals and sea elephants, voyages which I have often settled in this court. So captures in time of war made on land by boats' crews sent from a public ship are held to come within the province of the prize courts. Lindo v. Rodney, 2 Doug. 613, note. It is true that the admiralty courts in England, before the year 1861, were prohibited from entertaining suits upon special contracts, and they were accustomed to strike out of the libel any items of charge which had such an origin. But this illiberal and inconvenient course which was forced upon those courts by superior authority, against their protest, has never obtained in this country, and has now been abrogated in England.

I am clearly of opinion that where a seaman is entitled to payment for incidental services performed in the course of the voyage, whether by virtue of his original contract or not, his whole demand may be recovered in a suit against the vessel in this court, though a part of the work done, taken by itself, would not be considered of a maritime nature. I cannot see that it makes any difference whether the original contract or some additional and supplementary contract is appealed to. After the bargain is made the parties have the same rights as if it had been agreed in the beginning.

It is suggested, indeed, that here the contract wages have all been paid, leaving only those as stevedore to be recovered. But this is a mere accident. It may with as much truth be said that a sum equal to the wages has been paid, on account. The mode and time of payment cannot sever the demand and oust the jurisdiction, if the whole cause of action were fairly within the cognizance of this court before the payment was made.

District Court, E. D. New York. Oct., 1865.

PRINCIPLE OF SALVAGE—DERELICT—DISTRIBUTION—PASSENGERS—LIBELS BY DIFFERENT SALVORS—COSTS—COUNSEL FEE.

1. Where a vessel fell in, off Cape Henlopen, with a wreck, which, on being boarded, proved to be a derelict, and the master put on board her a crew, consisting of his mate and cook and two men, who were being carried to New York at the expense of the owner of the salving vessel, who brought her in safety to New York, the value of the vessel and cargo being $3,700. Held, that the spirit of the rule which governs salvage awards, requires that while they should not be extravagant, they should always be generous.

2. That the rule in cases of derelict is to award a moiety, the burden being on the claimant to show that a different measure should be applied.

[Cited in The W. D. B., Case No. 17,306.]

[See note to The Cayenne, Case No. 2,532.]

3. That the rule allowing compensation to the owners of the salving vessel is too firmly established to be shaken, and the habit of courts of admiralty is to award them a third.

4. That the responsibility thrown upon the master and his rank are to be considered in fixing the share to be paid to him.

5. That a passenger who was bold in advising the master to attempt the service, and active in helping to perform it, was entitled to an increased share on that account.

6. That passengers who refused to volunteer to assist when solicited, are not entitled to share in the award.

7. That there should be but one libel filed in ordinary salvage cases, and costs paid for but one.

8. That part of the costs might be paid out of the remaining share of the proceeds, but that there were no circumstances which called for an award of a counsel fee.

9. Ordered that the clerk's and proctor's fees be first paid out of the fund, and that half the remainder be divided into twenty-one shares, of which the owners were to have seven, the master five, and the passenger three. The remainder to be divided among the crew and the other passenger according to their wages. The passenger to rank with the mate. Marshal's fees and commissioner's costs to be paid out of the remaining proceeds.

In admiralty. The libel in this case was filed by John C. Rahming, the owner, and the master and crew of the schooner Georgiana, in behalf of themselves and all others interested against the schooner Charles Henry and her cargo, to recover salvage. The Charles Henry as well as her cargo was seized, under process, issued according to the prayer of the libel, and thereafter John Dempster Cousins, who was a passenger upon the Georgiana, not fully satisfied with the presentation of the case as made in the libel of the owner, appeared by his own proctor, and asked and obtained from the court leave to set forth his services and demands with more particularity in a supplemental allegation. Subsequently, Dominick Buckley, another of the passengers upon the Georgiana, filed a libel, setting forth his services in effecting the salvage, and process was issued in his behalf. Subsequently, by order of the court, the two causes were consolidated. No one appearing on the part of the Charles Henry or her cargo upon the return of the process, it was accordingly adjudged that the schooner and her cargo be condemned to pay salvage, and a reference was ordered to a commissioner, to take such testimony as the respective parties appearing might offer in support of their allegations, and report the same to the court.

Upon the coming in of the testimony taken before the commissioner, the various libellants appeared before the court, by their respective advocates, and presented their views upon the question of the amount of salvage to be awarded, and its distribution among the salvors.

There was little or no dispute as to the circumstances attending the saving of the vessel proceeded against, or the part taken by the parties who claimed to be the salvors. The proofs showed that about midday on the 24th of August last, when the Georgiana, bound to New York, was about thirty miles from Cape Henlopen, a wreck was descried, lying in her course. Upon coming up with it, the libellant, Cousins, proposed that it be boarded, and overcoming some slight objection on the part of the master, on account of the sea running, went into the stern boat, which was lowered, and with the master, the cook and two seamen, proceeded to the wreck. It proved to be the schooner Charles Henry, laden with coal, water-logged and abandoned. She was found to be in great disorder, full of water, with one pump choked, and the sea making a clean breach over her. She was, in fact, a derelict in a sinking condition, and, in the opinion of some of the witnesses, would have gone down within six hours if no aid had been afforded her. After trying the pumps, it was determined, upon a consultation between the master and Cousins, to make an effort to free her, and bring her into port. The effort proved successful. By active pumping she was freed from water, and sails were set. A crew, consisting of the mate of the Georgiana, two passengers, Cousins and Buckley, and the cook, were put in charge, with orders to follow the Georgiana, which latter vessel, by slackening sail, kept her in sight, and led the way, until, after the expiration of two days and eight hours, both vessels arrived safely in the port of New York.

The value of the Charles Henry and cargo amounted to about $3,700.

Benedict, Burr, & Benedict, for libellant Rahming.

Charles Edwards, for libellant Cousins.

J. J. Rogers, for libellant Buckley.

BENEDICT, District Judge. The facts of this case presents all the elements of a salvage service as frequently declared in courts of admiralty, and entitle the libellants to be rewarded as salvors according to the settled rule of the maritime law. This rule rests upon an enlarged view of public policy, and declares it to be for the interests of commerce, that when property at sea, and in danger, is saved by exertions voluntarily rendered, a suitable reward for such exertions should be given out of the property saved. It is for the safety and interest of commerce that this rule be always enforced in the liberal spirit which originated it, to the end that whenever disaster occurs upon the sea, all persons having opportunity to afford relief, shall feel assured that efforts expended in behalf of property in peril, if shown in a court of admiralty, will not fail to bring returns more advantageous to the salvors, than can be obtained by plunder of wrecks; and that time expended in salvage services, receives more ample reward than the ordinary recompense of freight or charter money. The spirit of the rule requires that salvage awards, while they should not be extravagant, should always be generous.

These considerations are not new. They have long been acted upon by foreign, as well as American courts of admiralty; and by merchants and underwriters in many cases, never brought before the courts. Indeed, I think it might be added that the merchants have generally applied the rule of the maritime law with a generosity more liberal than that sometimes exhibited by the courts.

The facts attending the saving of this wreck do not require at my hands any extended examination to enable me to determine the amount of salvage to be decreed. It is a case of a derelict, and no one appears as claimant. I content myself with adopting the language of Judge Story in the case of Rowe v. The Brig [Case No. 12,093]: "In cases of derelict, the old rule should still be considered as a subsisting but flexible rule, that, prima facie, the salvors are entitled to a moiety; and it is incumbent on the claimant to establish that, under the special circumstances of the case, a different measure ought to be applied."

I therefore award to these salvors one half the proceeds of this vessel and cargo, as their salvage reward in this case; and as the value of the property is not great, and no one has appeared to claim it and avoid the expense of the proceedings by payment or tender, and inasmuch as the expenses of the custody and storage of the cargo and of taking proof of the facts have been considerable, I shall direct that the proctor's and clerk's costs only, be deducted from the gross proceeds, and that the marshal's and commissioner's fees be paid out of the proceeds remaining, after payment of the salvage as awarded. It was urged upon the argument, that a counsel fee should also be awarded out of the fund, if not to each advocate, at least to the one originating the proceedings; but I see nothing in the case to call for such additional allowance.

There remains to determine in what proportions the salvage shall be distributed among the salvors. Upon this question it has been urged in behalf of the passengers, that the owner of the Georgiana should receive but a small, if any, part of the award, inasmuch as he did not personally partake of the risk or share in the labor. But I cannot give to this proposition my assent. Were such a doctrine established, it would defeat the object of the law; for let owners understand that they derive no benefit from the performing of salvage services by their vessels, and orders to their masters to avoid rendering the services will soon follow.

The contrary rule is too firmly established to be now shaken. Courts of admiralty in all cases not only give consideration to the claim of an owner to participate in salvage awarded, but in the distribution give him a liberal share. As to what this share should be, while there is no rigid rule, there is in the court of admiralty a well established "habit."

In ordinary cases, the habit of the court is to give to the owners one-third of the amount —The Henry Ewbank [Case No. 6,376],—and no reason is seen for deviating from the rule in the present case. One-third of the salvage awarded will accordingly be paid to the owner of the Georgiana. The claim of the master of the Georgiana, Captain Foster, stands next in rank. The proof shows that the salvage service in question was performed under the immediate orders and superintendence of the master. He boarded the wreck, and directed the labor of preparing it for a successful voyage to a port of safety. He detailed his chief mate to navigate the wreck, and was thereby compelled to take upon himself double duty on his own vessel. He kept the wreck in sight until it was anchored in New York. The responsibility of the adventure from beginning to the end was upon him, and to this element in his case I give much consideration. As a class, the masters of our commercial vessels receive no extravagant compensation, while they are compelled to assume great responsibilities, and the full weight of this responsibility they are often made to feel when a voyage or adventure, although undertaken and conducted according to their best judgment, under the circumstances, proves in the end disadvantageous to the owner. I consider, therefore, not only the labor of this master, but his rank and responsibility, in fixing the portion to be given him, and shall give him a liberal reward. There remain the claims of the passengers and crew. It appears from the proofs, that the Georgiana had on board, in addition to her crew, six persons who were in the employ of the owner, and were being transported by him to New York at his expense. Two of these, Cousins and Buckley, formed part of the crew which navigated the wreck into port. On the part of Cousins, it is insisted that he is entitled to an original and liberal portion beyond that of any person composing that crew. I have examined the evidence touching the services of this libellant with care, but do not find that it discloses any extraordinary labor performed by him. So far as navigating the vessel into port is concerned, all on board shared in the labor alike, and little weight can be given to the fact that he helped to lower the stern boat, or was first on the deck of the schooner. Nor was any especial skill as a navigator at any time displayed or required on the part of this passenger. It is, however, shown that he had acted as chief mate on other vessels, and his counsel was sought by the master of the Georgiana, as to undertaking to save the schooner. He boldly urged action, and sustained his advice by taking the lead under the master, in the measures adopted to effect the salvage. A timorous opinion expressed by him, or less vigorous action on his part, might have led the master to avoid taking the responsibility of attempting to get the vessel into port, and for this reason a larger portion should be awarded to this passenger than can be claimed by the passenger Buckley, or even the mate. Cousins and Buckley were the only persons out of six passengers who took any part in effecting the salvage. The boat returned from the wreck for volunteers to form a crew, and none of the passengers would volunteer but Buckley. Because of their refusal to volunteer when solicited, I refuse these persons any portion of the reward. The Baltimore, 2 Dod. 132. The remainder of the salvage is to be distributed among the crew of the Georgiana. Buckley, however, should be included, and rank with the mate. I should refuse all costs of his libel to Buckley if there were not some special circumstances which justified an additional libel in his behalf. In ordinary cases, but one libel should be filed, and costs allowed for but one.

Let, therefore, the clerk's and proctor's costs, when taxed, be first paid out of the proceeds in court, and one-half the remainder be divided into twenty-one equal shares. Let the owner have seven shares. Let the master, Foster, have five shares. Let Cousins, the passenger, have three shares; and let the remaining six shares be divided among the crew, including Buckley, making six in all, according to their respective rates of wages as proven. Buckley to be rated with the mate, and the crippled sailor, who was upon the articles at nominal wages, to be rated at $10 per month. And let the costs of the marshal and the commissioner's fees, when taxed, be paid out of the remaining proceeds.

[See Armstrong v. Beadle, Case No. 541, note.]

In admiralty. This was an action in rem by the widow of Edwin Rusk against the steamboat Charles Morgan, to recover damages for the death of her husband. The libel alleged that her husband was a passenger upon said boat from New Orleans to Cincinnati, and that owing to the negligence and carelessness of the master and officers of the boat, in leaving the hatchway open at night, without light and guard, he fell through one of the hatchways into the hold of the vessel and was instantly killed. Prayer for damages. Claimant files a plea to the jurisdiction in the form of exceptions to the libel, on the ground, that in admiralty, as at common law, no action is maintainable for the wrongful death of another, either in personam or in rem.

P. J. Donham, for exception.
Henry Hooper, for libellant.

SWING, District Judge. From an examination of the English authorities, it is very clear, that no right of action existed at common law for the death of a human being. This doctrine is first announced in the case of Higgins v. Butcher, Yel. 89, which was an action brought by the husband for the death of his wife. Then came the celebrated case of Baker v. Bolton, 1 Camp. 493, which was also an action brought by the husband, to recover damages for the death of his wife. These are all the cases we have been able to find prior to the passage of Lord Campbell's act in 1846. But that this was the recognized doctrine is shown by the preamble of the act, which recites that "whereas no action at law is now maintainable against a person who, by his wrongful act, neglect or default, may have caused the death of another person," etc., and the act then proceeds by its provisions to give such right of action. This is further shown by the case of Glaholm v. Barker, 1 Ch. App. 226, in which Lord Justice Turner said: "Lord Campbell's act first introduced into the law of this country a remedy in case of injuries attended with the loss of life. The law up to the time of the passing of this act stood thus, that in case of death resulting from an injury, the remedy for the injury died with the person." The same doctrine is maintained in Osborn v. Gillett, L. R. 8 Exch. 88, and in Bac. Abr. "Master and Servant," O; Blake v. Midland Ry. Co., 18 Q. B. 93. In fact we have not been able to find a single reported case in which a contrary doctrine has been held. The English courts and law writers may not have founded this doctrine upon such principles, as may now appear sound to us; but, nevertheless, it cannot be disputed that such was the doctrine of the common law.

In the United States this principle is not so well settled, and yet the weight of authority is to the same effect, as will be seen by reference to the following cases: Carey v. Berkshire R. Co. and Skinner v. Housatonic Ry. Corp., 1 Cush. 475; Kearney v. Boston & W. R. Corp., 9 Cush. 109; Hollenbeck v. Berkshire R. Co., Id. 480; Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Henderson, 1 P. F. Smith [51 Pa. St.] 322; Whitford v. Panama R. Co., 23 N. Y. 470; Green v. Hudson River R. Co., 2 Keyes [*41 N. Y.] 294; Connecticut Life Ins. Co. v. New York & N. H. R. Co., 25 Conn. 265; Eden v. Lexington & F. R. Co., 14 B. Mon. 165; Worley v. Cincinnati, H. & D. R. Co., 1 Handy, 481; Hyatt v. Adams, 16 Mich. 180.

On the other hand, there is the case of Ford v. Monroe, 20 Wend. 210, in which, however, this question was not made; but it has since been overruled by the New York courts. See cases cited. The case of James v. Christy, 18 Mo. 162, is usually cited as maintaining the opposite doctrine, but it will be found that the decision of the case turned upon a special statute of Missouri. In Shields v. Yonge, 15 Ga. 349, the question was clearly made and decided, but none of the American cases seem to have been referred to by the learned judge who delivered the opinion of the court. And in Sullivan v. Union Pac. R. Co. [Case No. 13,599], the circuit judge made a vigorous assault upon the common law doctrine and refused to follow it; but this case was taken to the supreme court of the United States, and dismissed for want of jurisdiction, at the October term, 1877. As no opinion was delivered by the court, we are unable to say whether this point was considered. So that there is only the Georgia case, which seems to directly deny the common law doctrine. But that this principle or doctrine, that no such right of action existed, has been generally accepted in the United States, is further shown by the fact that in a large number of the states, such a right of action is expressly given by legislative enactment.

But it is urged on the part of the libellant, that whatever the common law principle may be, that the civil law permitted the action, and that the admiralty courts of the United States are not bound by the decisions of the common law. The decisions of the federal courts are not uniform upon this point, although the majority of them sustain it.

In Plummer v. Webb [Id. 11,234] it would seem that the direct question was not determined, but jurisdiction in admiralty was maintained by the United States district judge. The case was appealed to the circuit court, and after amendment of the libel, the action was dismissed by Justice Story for want of jurisdiction.

In Crapo v. Allen [Id. 3,360] it was held that actions in admiralty, for mere personal torts, did not survive the death of the person injured. But in Cutting v. Seabury [Id. 3,521] the judge said it was not the settled law, that no action could be maintained for damages occurring upon the death of a human being, and that such right ought to exist; but the precise point was left undecided. It was held in the case of The City of Brussels [Id. 2,745], where a child had died from the negligence of the officers of the vessel, that this action could be maintained in rem, as arising upon the contract of passage. And in The Sea Gull [Id. 12,578] Chief Justice Chase decided that an action in rem could be maintained in admiralty by the husband for the death of his wife; and in The Highland Light [Id. 6,477] he affirmed the same doctrine. In the latter case the widow and son filed their libel in rem to recover damages for the death of the father and husband, and the same judge held, that while the action could not be maintained in rem, the action would lie in personam, and that the admiralty court had jurisdiction. This case seems to have been decided wholly upon the construction of the statute; while the former was based entirely upon the general right to maintain such an action in the admiralty court.

In Coggins v. Mary Helmsley [Case No. 14,109] it was held in an action by the wife of the chief mate of a schooner, which was run down by a steamship, causing the death of the husband, that an action in rem would lie in the admiralty court, to recover damages for his death; following the decision of Chief Justice Chase. I find, upon reference to the records of this court, that at the June term, 1870, the district court dismissed the libel of Thomas v. Sherlock [unreported] which sought to recover damages for the death of the husband of libellant, for want of jurisdiction. The case was appealed to the circuit court, and by consent of both parties the decree of the district court was affirmed. There is nothing in the record, however, to show that this point was raised and decided.

So far as I have been able to ascertain, these are all the cases in which the question at issue has been raised and determined. In Steamboat Co. v. Chase, 16 Wall. [83 U. S.] 522, Justice Clifford discusses the question, and after noticing the cases of Crapo v. Allen [supra] and The Sea Gull [supra], adds: "Difficulties, it must be conceded, will attend the solution of this question, but it is not necessary to decide it in this case."

As the case at bar will probably go to the supreme court of the United States, it will be better for all parties that the appeal should be taken after a trial upon its merits. I shall therefore overrule the exceptions to the jurisdiction of the court.

NOTE [from original report]. See on same subject and on cognate questions, The Ruckers, 4 C. Rob. Adm. 74, and note; De Lovio v. Boit [Case No. 3,776]; Domat, Civ. Law, 1550; 1 McQueen, 750; The Highland Light [Id. 6,477]; The Sea Gull [Id. 12,578]. In the last named case, the wife brought a libel in rem for damages, alleging that her husband was killed while rowing in Baltimore bay by reason of a collision with the vessel libelled. The court decided that it had jurisdiction, and that she was entitled to recover. See, also, 6 Ben. 317 [The Civilta, Case No. 2,775], and The Towanda [Case No. 14,109]. The case of Thomas v. Sherlock [unreported] was finally settled by paying the libellant an amount agreed upon between the parties, after which the decree as stated in the opinion was affirmed. See The Garland [5 Fed. 924]; Brown, J., (February 21, 1881,) holding the doctrine of the text. See, also, the opinion of Deady, J., sitting in admiralty for the district of Oregon, in Holmes v. COLLISION AT PIER—TUG AND TOW—HARBOR NAVIGATION—NEGLIGENCE.

1. Where a large oil-barge in tow of a tug, the C. R. S., which was endeavoring to turn her in the East river, sagged against vessels lying at the end of a pier, and the force of the blow drove one of the vessels, a tug with a flaring bow, on and over the bulwark of another tug, doing her damage: Held, that the oil-barge and her tug, having only sagged against the vessels by force of the tide and against their own efforts, were not guilty of any negligence.

[Distinguished in The Harry, 15 Fed. 161.]

2. That it is the duty of every vessel lying at a pier to be prepared to withstand such contact, it being one of the necessary incidents of harbor navigation; and that the negligence that caused the damage in this case was in allowing a tug with an unusually flaring bow to lie against the midships of another in such a position that, when pressed together, the strain must all come on the bulwarks of the inner vessel.

[Cited in The Echo, 19 Fed. 455; The N. B. Starbuck, 29 Fed. 798; The Howard, 30 Fed. 282; Mould v. The New York, 40 Fed. 902.]

[2] [Affirmed by circuit court (case not reported).]

In admiralty.

Knox & Woodward, for claimants.

BENEDICT, District Judge. This action is brought to recover for injuries sustained by the tug Union, while lying at pier 19 in the East river, on the 15th day of April, 1876. The Union was moored at the end of the pier, and adjoining thereto, alongside of her, heading the same way, lay the tug Starbuck, while still outside of the Starbuck lay a large bark the Queen of the Sea.

The tug Chas. R. Stone was engaged in towing a large oil-barge, the Sweepstakes, alongside. While endeavoring to turn the barge in the East river, so as to head the strong flood tide then running, the Stone and Sweepstakes sagged up against the vessels at the end of pier 19. The Stone's engine was stopped at the time, and the vessels were borne by the mere force of the tide. When the Sweepstakes brought up no injury at all was sustained by the Sweepstakes or the Queen of the Sea, against which she sagged, but the Union lying inside was injured by the Starbuck being forced against her.

The Starbuck had a very flaring bow, and as she lay with her bow opposite the Union's midships, when the Queen of the Sea pushed the Starbuck, the bluff of the Starbuck's bow struck the bulwarks of the Union and broke the top timbers and rail, which is the damage complained of. If the Starbuck's bow had not been unusually flaring there would have been no damage, nor would there have been any injury if the bow of the Starbuck had been below the Union's water way; but the Starbuck's bow being higher than the Union's water way, and very flaring, the bow was pushed against the rail, which proved unable to sustain the pressure, and gave way.

The weight of the evidence shows that the force with which the Sweepstakes came up against the bark was not great. She simply sagged by force of the tide, and cannot be held guilty of negligence for so doing. Such a contact of vessels is one of the necessary incidents of harbor navigation, against which it is the duty of every vessel lying at the piers to be prepared; and the negligence that caused the injury in question consisted in permitting the Starbuck, with her unusually flaring bow, to lie in such a position in regard to the Union's midships, that when the vessels were pressed together by the action of the Sweepstakes, the strain came upon the bulwarks of the Union.

The libel must accordingly be dismissed, and with costs.

The decree was afterwards affirmed by the circuit court (case not reported).

PRIZE—VIOLATION OF BLOCKADE.

Vessel and cargo condemned for a violation of the blockade.

BETTS, District Judge. The above vessel and cargo were captured, as prize of war, by a squadron of United States vessels-of-war, January 20, 1865, in Cape Fear river, off Smithville, North Carolina, and were brought into this court for adjudication. They were here arrested by the marshal, January 28, 1865, under process of monition and attachment, returnable in court February 14. Due notice was given thereof by public proclamation made in open court on that day; and, no person appearing to answer to such attachment, monition, and proclamation, it was, on motion of the United States Attorney, ordered by the court that an interlocutory judgment of condemnation by default be rendered against the said prize vessel and her cargo, pursuant to the course and practice of the court. The pleadings, the documentary proofs, and the depositions in preparation, were submitted by the United States attorney to the court, to ascertain and determine the legal liability of the prize to condemnation and forfeiture.

The vessel was of English build, and when arrested carried on board of her a British certificate of registry, issued at the custom house in London, bearing date August 26, 1864, with a further certificate indorsed thereon, by the custom house registrar at Halifax, November 17, 1864, that Thomas Edwin Cocker had then become master of the vessel. It thus appears prima facie upon the ship's title papers, produced from her, that she was a neutral vessel; which had departed from her home port and was arrested in the mouth of a blockaded port. The prize-master who brought the captured vessel into this port received with her no other papers than the aforesaid registry, and reports that he does not know that she had any papers on board.

Thomas E. Crocker, the master of the prize vessel, George Turner, the second mate, and Alexander Crawford, the ship's engineer, were examined in preparatorio, by the prize commissioner, on the second day of February, 1865. The master testifies that he is a subject of the queen of England; that he was present at the capture of the vessel on the 20th of January last, about 12 o'clock at night, at Smithville, in the Cape Fear river; that she was brought, immediately after her capture, to this port; that she carried English colors; that she also had a Confederate flag, which was usually hoisted at the mast-head in going up Cape Fear river, when coming in; that the circumstances of the capture were, that the vessel was bound from Bermuda to Wilmington, North Carolina, and had passed the blockading squadron there, as she supposed, and ran right into Smithville, and was there intercepted and ordered to anchor by the United States squadron; that the capture was made, he supposes, by all four of the American vessels; that the owners were British subjects, resident in England; that he was appointed master at Halifax, by the owners in England, for the voyage; that there were no bills of lading for the cargo of the vessel, to his knowledge; that he signed none; that he knows of no papers on the vessel except the register; that all private papers on the ship were burned or destroyed on board as soon as it was discovered she was in the enemy's hands; that her cargo, amounting to about 150 tons burden, consisted of miscellaneous merchandise, composed principally of materials for wearing and military supplies; that the vessel had, under his command, made a previous voyage from Bermuda to Wilmington and back, bringing cotton out of Wilmington; that he supposes the cargo in this case belonged to the owners of the vessel; that he knew that Wilmington was held under blockade by the United States forces before he attempted to enter the port on this occasion; and that the vessel had previously entered the port of Wilmington, and come out while it was under blockade, and was making the attempt to violate the blockade again when captured.

The other two witnesses concur substantially in the evidence given by the master, with the exception that the first engineer states that a portion of the cargo which the prize had on board when captured was composed of goods contraband of war. It is unnecessary to repeat the evidence in full detail, as the evidence given by both of the witnesses fully supports the charge of violating the blockade by the prize in running into the port of Wilmington when arrested.

It is ordered and decreed that the vessel and cargo be condemned and forfeited for the cause in the libel alleged.

COLLISION—VESSEL IN STAYS—BURDEN OF PROOF.

1. If an injured vessel is shown to have been in stays at the time of the collision, the burden of proof is upon the colliding vessel to show that she was not in fault.

[Distinguished in The F. W. Gifford, Case No. 5,166; The James Bowen, Id. 7,192.]

2. The master of a vessel approaching another while in stays, has no right to speculate upon the chances of her coming completely about, getting under headway and avoiding him.]

[Cited in The Clytie, Case No. 2,913.]

This was a libel for a collision in the straits of Mackinac, between the schooner Charles Wall, of 691 tons, and the Charlotte Raab, a small three-masted schooner. The collision occurred about ten o'clock in the evening. The night was dark and somewhat cloudy, but not foggy, and the outlines of either vessel could be seen from the other at some distance. For an hour before the collision, both vessels had been sailing upon a course northeast by north, close-hauled upon the starboard tack, the Raab being about three points upon the weather quarter of the Wall, and about half a mile distant from her. The wind was due east, and the speed of both vessels was from 5 to 6 miles per hour. While sailing in this manner, the watch of the Wall discovered ice, as they supposed, on their lee bow, and immediately put their ship in stays to come about upon the port tack. While coming about they exhibited a torch to the Raab, and as she came near, shouted to her to keep out of the way. She came on, however, without changing her course, and a collision ensued by which the jibboom and head gear of the Wall were carried away, as well as the foremast and mainmast of the Raab. On the part of the Wall, it was alleged that the collision occurred while she was in stays, helpless and nearly motionless, while the cross-libel of the Raab charged that the Wall was under headway on the port tack, and that her duty to keep out of the way of the Raab, under the 12th article, had become operative.

H. B. Brown, for the Charles Wall.

W. A. Moore, for the Charlotte Raab.

LONGYEAR, District Judge. In the case of The Sea Nymph, Lush. 23, Dr. Lushington laid down the following rule: "A vessel proceeding in a cause of collision, and alleging herself to have been in stays at the time of the collision, and therefore helpless, is bound to prove in the first instance that such was the fact. The burden of proof then shifts, and the other side must then show that the collision was occasioned by the vessel proceeding being improperly put in stays, or was an inevitable accident." It is undisputed that the Wall did go into stays and came about, and that the Raab did not avoid her. But it is contended: 1. That the Wall was improperly put in stays, and 2, that she had in fact filled away, and was actually under way on the port tack before the collision, and that it had therefore become her duty, under article 12, to keep out of the way of the Raab.

First. There is no allegation of fault in the answer or cross-libel upon which to base the first-named defense. But even if there were, it is not sustained by the proofs. The course of the Wall, while on the starboard tack, was toward a shoal, and while it is clear that in the absence of any other cause for coming about, she had not run out her tack, it is rendered reasonably certain by the proofs that there was a field of ice in such proximity to that course, if continued, as to justify the master of the Wall in his apprehensions of danger, and in arriving at and acting upon his determination to come about when he did. Neither were the proximity and relative position of the Raab such as to render it improper for the Wall to come in stays, the Raab, by all the testimony, with a single exception, being at least half a mile behind, and from two to three points to the windward of the Wall, affording her ample space, time and means of avoiding the Wall, either by keeping away or coming about herself.

Second. That the Wall had some headway at the time of the collision I think is reasonably certain from the character of the injury inflicted upon the Raab. But whether it was the result of her sails having filled on the port tack, or whether of her not having entirely lost her headway in stays, is not so easy to determine, the proofs being somewhat complicated. But I do not consider it necessary to a decision to determine that point, because, even if it be true that her sails had taken the wind on the port tack before the collision (as to which, to say the least, there is very grave doubt), it was so short a time before, and the Wall had gained so little headway on that account, that it was impossible for her by that means to have avoided the Raab, on account of the nearness to which the latter had then approached, and therefore the Wall had not come within the operation of article 12 when the collision occurred. I regard it of no consequence whether the Wall did or did not exhibit a light just before or at the time of coming in stays, because it is clear to my mind, from the proofs on the part of the Raab, that the Wall's coming in stays was reported to the master of the Raab, and that the latter fully comprehended the situation in ample time to have avoided the Wall. The master of the Raab chose to take the risk of the Wall getting around on the port tack in time to keep out of his way. The result shows he was mistaken. It is not a sufficient answer to this that the Wall was longer in coming about than vessels of her size usually take, as attempted to be shown by the experts, because her slowness does not appear to have been the result of her not being in ordinary trim or of want of good seamanship on the part of those in charge of her navigation. On the contrary, it does appear that she was in ordinary trim, and that her slowness was the result rather of her not being ordinarily handy or quick in coming about, which we have high authority for holding cannot be attributed as a fault. The Argo, Swab. 462; 1 Pars. Shipp. & Adm. 575. In any view of the case, I am satisfied that the master of the Raab was not justified in taking the risk he did. It results that, under the rule laid down by Dr. Lushington, in The Sea Nymph, just quoted, in which I fully concur, the Raab must be held wholly in fault. See, also, The Priscilla, L. R. 3 Adm. & Ecc. 125; The Nellie D. [Case No. 10,097]; Lown. Col. 61. Decree for the Charles Wall.

REMOVAL—ORIGINAL SUIT.

Where a suit at law was brought, in a state court, on a policy of re-insurance, and, while it was pending, the plaintiff brought a suit in equity, in the same court, against the defendant to reform the policy, for mistake, and to prohibit the defendant from setting up, in defence, certain specified matters, and the defendant removed the suit in equity into this court, under the 12th section of the act of September 24th, 1789 (1 Stat. 79): Held, that the suit in equity was an original suit, and was properly removable under said section.

[Distinguished in Ladd v. West, 55 Fed. 354.]

This was a suit in equity [by the Charter Oak Fire Insurance Company], commenced in the superior court of Connecticut, for Hartford county, and removed into this court by the defendants [the Star Insurance Company], under the 12th section of the judiciary act of September 24, 1789 (1 Stat. 79). The plaintiffs now moved to remand the suit to the state court.

Before NELSON, Circuit Justice, and SHIPMAN, District Judge.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. The plaintiffs brought a suit at law, in the superior court of Connecticut, for Hartford county, against the defendants, a corporation created under the laws of New York, its place of business being at Ogdensburg, St. Lawrence county, New York, on a policy of re-insurance. The defendants appeared, and, on the trial, moved for a nonsuit, which, according to the practice, reserved the question for the advice of the supreme court of errors. Pending this case, the same plaintiffs filed a bill before the same court sitting in chancery, to reform and correct the policy of re-insurance, claiming certain mistakes in it, and praying that the contract might be reformed, and the defendants be prohibited from setting up, in defence, certain specified matters. On the appearance of the defendants to this suit, the proper steps were taken by them to remove the cause to this court, they being non-residents, and coming within the 12th section of the judiciary act. The plaintiffs, with a view to obtain a decision of this court, as to the legality of this proceeding, have made this motion to remand the cause.

It is understood that the state court refused the application for the removal, on the ground that the case did not come within the act of congress. The argument is, that this suit is ancillary to, or in aid of, the suit at law, and is not an original suit, in the sense of the 12th section, but is supplemental to, and dependent on, the suit at law, pending in the same court, the court possessing jurisdiction both at law and in equity. We think this a mistaken view of the case. The remedy sought by this bill is founded on a familiar rule of equity jurisdiction, namely, accident and mistake, and which is the appropriate subject of an original bill in equity; and the fact that it is intended to aid a court of law, or to prevent a party from availing himself of an inequitable suit or defence in a court of law, in some other action, does not deprive the bill of its character as an original bill. Bills of a kindred character, such as bills for removing impediments to a trial at law, or advantages gained by fraud, and the like, bills of discovery, creditors' bills, &c., all in aid of suits at law, are the constant subjects of original jurisdiction in equity. If this bill had been brought in the superior court before the suit at law, and which it might have been, and, indeed, most fitly should have been, there could have been no doubt as to the character of the bill; and the circumstance that the plaintiffs chose to bring their suit at law first, can hardly be said to change such character. The jurisdiction of the court cannot depend upon the mere will, or choice, of a plaintiff, as to which suit he will commence first.

We perceive no difficulties in the execution of any decree that may be rendered in this court. If the contract shall be reformed, it will be competent evidence before the court of law, the reform will be as effective as if it had been decreed in the superior court, and the defendants will be as subject to the control of this jurisdiction as of that.

Upon the whole, we are of opinion that the cause has been properly removed.

District Court, D. Vermont. Oct. Term, 1844.

BANKRUPTCY—ACT OF 1842—WHEN DISCHARGE REFUSED.

Where it appeared that a bankrupt was insolvent on the first day of February, 1842, the day the bankrupt law went into operation, and that he made a voluntary confession of judgment on that day, in favor of one of his creditors, for a sum in damages exceeding the value of all his attachable property, and that all his property was taken the same evening, by virtue of an execution upon such judgment, and afterwards was sold thereon, and that this was done by the bankrupt for the mere purpose of compelling another of his creditors to make a deduction in the rent of a certain farm, which the bankrupt then occupied as his tenant, and which rent was to become due March 1, 1842, and if that could not be effected then to defeat entirely the debt of that creditor, the debtor contemplating bankruptcy as the ultimate resort, and the petition in bankruptcy was filed March 30, 1842, the district court refused to grant to the bankrupt his discharge, notwithstanding the debt, upon which the judgment was confessed, was actually due at that time to the creditor in whose favor the confession was made.

In bankruptcy. This was a petition filed by Ephraim Chase, who had been duly decreed a bankrupt, for his discharge.

S. H. Hodges, for petitioner.

E. Edgerton, for creditors.

PRENTISS, District Judge. The case, without going into unnecessary details, is shortly this: The bankrupt, on the first of February, 1842, as appears from his schedule, was deeply insolvent, being indebted to various creditors to the amount of four thousand dollars, or more. Among the creditors was the firm of A. R. Vail & Co., to whom the bankrupt was indebted in a large sum. In the afternoon of the first of February the bankrupt confessed a judgment to A. R. Vail & Co. for the sum of $1,624.71, embracing the amount of certain notes given originally to them, and two or three notes executed to other persons and indorsed to them. Execution was immediately taken out on the judgment, and in the evening of the same day was levied on all the property of the bankrupt liable to attachment, or execution. The property was sold on the execution for $1,124.71, besides the costs of levy and sale. It is to be borne in mind, that the confession of judgment by the bankrupt was without any previous attachment, and for a sum sufficient to cover all his property, with the power to issue immediate execution. Execution was immediately issued, and all his property, except household furniture and other property exempt from attachment, was immediately taken upon it. From the manner of the transaction, the suddenness and haste with which the proceedings were begun and carried through, the transaction, from the very statement of it, connected with the fact of the utter insolvency of the bankrupt, is liable to very strong suspicion.

But let us see how the case stands on the testimony; for it is proof, and not suspicion without proof, that is to decide it. There is no reason to doubt that the debt of A. R. Vail & Co. was a bona fide debt, and it is true that Aron R. Vail, one of the company, says he called on the bankrupt for security, and that the judgment was confessed on his request, as a means of saving cost. This testimony might be material, if the judgment had been for an amount covering only a part of the bankrupt's property; but the judgment being for an amount sufficient to absorb the whole of his property, and he being necessarily conscious that it must take the whole to satisfy it, it is immaterial whether it was given on the request and at the instance of the creditors, or not. But admitting it to be material, and that the request was accompanied with such a degree of urgency and importunity on the part of the creditors as would, under ordinary circumstances, repel the presumption of confession being voluntary, yet the question is whether the confession was really made in consequence of that importunity, or with a view entertained and acted upon altogether independent of it, defeating the rights of other creditors. This is a question of intention, and the intention is to be collected from all the circumstances of the case. If they clearly indicate an intention, on the part of the bankrupt, to give a preference, or to have all his property put beyond the reach of his other creditors by means of the judgment, the request or importunity of the creditors can avail nothing.

We have already stated the manner of the transaction; now let us look to some other circumstances which attended it. Besides there appearing to be no unwillingness to make the confession, but a very ready acquiescence and compliance on the part of the bankrupt, it is evident that he knew, at the time of the confession, that the execution would be levied the same evening. He told Harrison Ballard, in the evening, before the officer came, that he wanted to pay him, as he expected his creditors would break upon him; and he accordingly forthwith turned out to Ballard a cow, and at the same time turned out to his brother forty bushels of corn in the ear. After the officer had arrived, he told Marcus Bartlett that he had expected him, and had tried to give Bartlett a hint of it before. And Aron R. Vail, one of the creditors, says he thinks the bankrupt might have understood that the execution was to be levied the same evening after the execution of the judgment. But farther, the bankrupt told William B. Haskins, who went to see that the officer did not take some grain the bankrupt had turned out to him, that the creditors would not take anything he did not want they should take. He also told Ballard at the time he turned out the cow to him, that the creditors would not take any property, which was turned out to him, or his brother, though it remained there. The testimony, thus far, gives the transaction the appearance, at least, of being a very amicable one; for it shows that the bankrupt supposed, and acted under the belief, that there was a very good understanding subsisting between him and the execution creditors. Indeed, the transaction seems to have very little of an adverse character about it. When the officer came, who, as we have seen, was not an unexpected, and, I should judge, not an unacceptable visitor, the bankrupt, anticipating the wishes of this usually unwelcome functionary of the law, very promptly lighted his lantern and went with him to the barn, lighting him to where the property was. This, to be sure, of itself, is not a very important circumstance, but, being one of the characteristics of the transaction, disclosed by the testimony, is not unworthy of notice with the others. But the most material part of the testimony remains to be stated. It appears that the bankrupt, at the time of the confession of judgment, held a lease from Caleb Paris of a farm in Danby, for the term of six years from the first of March, 1837, at an annual rent of $700. Besides the rent for the year 1842, which was unpaid, he was indebted to Paris in the sum of $500, for cattle received from him by virtue of the lease. When the latter sum would be payable does not appear; but the rent would become due the first of March, and the lease would not expire until one year from that time. Now, Stephen Roberts testifies that, before the property was taken in execution, the bankrupt told him that unless he could make an arrangement with Paris, and get a reduction of the rent, he should not pay him, though he could; and after the property was taken, he told the witness, he expected to have the property back, if he succeeded in making an arrangement with Paris, which he thought he should be able to do. Allen Roberts also testifies that the bankrupt told him that he did not know but he should have all the property back, if he could make an arrangement with Paris. And Caleb Buffum says that, after the property was taken, the bankrupt told him that he could not afford to pay so much rent for the farm; that he would give $350 for the year's rent then due, and had the money in his pocket to pay for it, and would give $400 a year for the remainder of the term. On the witness' inquiring how he could carry on the farm without the stock and tools, he replied that he could have back the property, which had been taken, whenever he pleased. Now, upon this testimony, can any one be at a loss concerning the motive and object of the bankrupt in giving the confession of judgment? Was it not to bring Paris to terms, and force him to reduce the rent of the farm, by presenting to him the alternative of doing so or getting nothing?

The testimony of Vail, one of the execution creditors, goes rather to confirm this view of the case, than otherwise. He says there was no understanding with the bankrupt that he should have back the property levied upon except through an arrangement proposed by A. R. Vail & Co. to Paris, that if he would reduce the rent of the farm to three hundred and fifty or four hundred dollars, they would become responsible for the rent, and the property might go back into the hands of the bankrupt; which proposition, Vail says, was made at the suggestion of the bankrupt after the levy of the execution. This proves that after the execution was served, and all the property of the bankrupt was secured by seizure upon it, a proposition to reduce the rent, and have the property go back into the hands of the bankrupt, was in fact made to Paris. Now, was this proposition a mere afterthought, first suggested after the levy of the execution, or did it originate in a preconceived design, existing at or before the confession of the judgment? If no such design is proved to have been entertained by the creditors, the presumption is strong, from the testimony, that the bankrupt had the matter then in contemplation; for, before the property was taken, and, we may conclude, before the confession of judgment, for one followed the other almost immediately, he told Stephen Roberts, as we have already seen, that unless he could make an arrangement with Paris, and get a reduction of the rent, he should not pay him. Taking, then, the declarations of the bankrupt before and after the confession of judgment, and putting them together, I think it must be inferred that he consented to the judgment willingly, knowing that all his property would be immediately taken in execution, and expecting by that means to get the rent reduced, and then have the property restored to him. There is another part of the testimony, which ought not to be omitted. It appears that thirteen cows seized on the execution were afterwards returned to the bankrupt, kept by him ten or twelve days, and then sold by him to a clerk in the store of one of the execution creditors. The bankrupt, on his examination, says the cows were returned to him in consequence of a question arising, whether the cows belonged to him or to Paris; that he sold them to make a payment on the execution; and that after the sale they were driven away in the night time, for the purpose of concealing from Paris where they were.

From all the circumstances of this case, I repeat, I am forced to the conclusion, that the confession of the judgment was voluntary on the part of the bankrupt, and was given for the purpose of compelling Paris to reduce the rent of the farm, and, if that could not be effected, then to defeat his debt entirely, contemplating bankruptcy as the ultimate resort. The confession of judgment was on the first of February, the day the bankrupt law went into operation; the rent became due to Paris the first of March, and the petition in bankruptcy was filed the thirtieth of March, all following in regular succession, and all taking place within the space of two months. From the view I have taken of the case, it follows, that the bankrupt is not entitled to a discharge; and a discharge is accordingly refused him.

[7. Speculative and uncertain testimony as to the depreciation of a vessel damaged by collision is insufficient to sustain an allowance therefor.]

In admiralty. This libel was filed by [Sylvanus G. Chase and others] the owners of the lake boat Frank Carver, against [Humphrey H. Crary and others] the owners of the steam tug Catherine, and the owners of the steam tug Geo. Birkbeck, Jr., to recover the damages occasioned to the Carver while in tow of the Catherine by a collision with a lumber barge in tow of the Birkbeck on the 8th of November, 1854, in the East river. The Carver was on the larboard side of the Catherine, and the barge was on the starboard side of the Birkbeck, her bow projecting beyond the steamboat's stern. The Catherine was coming from the Atlantic docks, bound to pier No. 17, East river, at the rate of about three miles an hour. The Birkbeck was bound to a pier in Brooklyn, and when first seen appeared to be coming across the Catherine's bows. When about ten yards apart, the pilot of the Catherine gave orders to slow and back. The Birkbeck had slowed and stopped before; and about the time when the Catherine slowed, the Birkbeck backed her engine, but her forward progress was not stopped, nor was her course changed. The Catherine had been stopped in the water, but when about fifty feet apart, the pilot of the Birkbeck motioned her to go ahead, which was done; but notwithstanding, the barge struck the Carver head on, a little aft midships;—and the libel is filed, alleging joint negligence and fault on the part of the two steamboats. The respondents took the exception that there can be no joint negligence on the part of two steamboats, and that they would not be jointly liable even in rem.

C. Van Santvoord, for libellants.

D. McMahon, for claimants and respondents.

HELD BY THE COURT (INGERSOLL, District Judge): That the case of The Sampson [Smith v. The Creole, Case No. 13,033] is a case where a libel had been filed against two vessels in rem, without any such exception having been taken either by the counsel or by the court, which could hardly be if there were any validity in the exception, and that the case of The Moxey [Case No. 9,894], decided by Judge Betts in 1847, was different from this, in that the libel did not allege a joint negligence. That it must therefore be held that a libel against two vessels for joint negligence can be sustained. That, where the collision is occasioned by the joint negligence of those who have charge of the vessels as servants of the owners, then a libel may be sustained against the owners jointly, as well as against the vessels. That, as in the case of The Samson a charge of joint negligence may be made against two vessels, and the proof show negligence against only one; and in such a case the decree must be against that one, and in favor of the others. That, on the evidence in this case, there was negligence on the part of the Birkbeck, in not changing her course; and if, as her pilot says, her engine was not strong enough to back against the wind which was blowing, he was negligently exposing other vessels to be run down, by having so weak an engine. That there is no evidence of fault on the part of the Catherine. She slowed and stopped in time to enable the Birkbeck to avoid the collision, and had good reason to believe that the engine of the Birkbeck was strong enough to give her stern way against the wind, and that she would change her course, if necessary. That her going ahead was not the cause of the collision, which would have equally happened if she had not done so. That there was no fault on the part of the Carver, either in not having a man at her helm, or in not properly using fenders. The pilot of the Catherine told the man at the helm that he was not wanted there, and that the best was done with the fenders that could be done under the circumstances.

Libel dismissed as against Crary, the owner of the Catherine; and, as against the owners of the Birkbeck, decree for libellants, with a reference.

On the reference as to the damages, the libellants proved that they had never fully repaired the vessel. The witnesses proved the amount of repairs actually put on, and also testified that, to make the vessel as good as she was before, she would need some brace clamps on the opposite side from the injury, which would cost $67.40; while witnesses for the respondents testified that she would not need such clamps. The commissioner reported that the libellants should recover the amount of the repairs actually put on, and the cost of the brace and clamps, and $100 for depreciation in the market value of the vessel, and $25 for her detention. To this report the respondents excepted.

The matter, on exceptions, was argued by

Mr. Van Santvoord, for libellants.

Mr. McMahon, for respondents.

HELD BY THE COURT (INGERSOLL, District Judge): That, to enable the libellants to enforce their right to be made good, they must submit such evidence as will enable the court to say what sum will make them good. That the most satisfactory way of determining whether the brace clamps would be required would have been to repair the boat fully. This, however, was not done, and the evidence is not sufficient to satisfy the court that they are required. That the evidence of depreciation given is not sufficient to support that item. It is too speculative and uncertain. That the report must therefore be so modified as to strike out those two items.

PATENTS—"BUCKLES"—VALIDITY.

The reissue patent granted Lucius C. Chase, May 26, 1863, for improvement in buckles, held invalid for want of novelty in the invention described and claimed.

[In equity. Bill by Lucius C. Chase against Charles W. Sabin and others for alleged infringement of reissued letters patent No. 1,483, of May 26, 1863; the original patent, No. 26,013, having been granted to L. C. Chase, November 8, 1859.]

George E. Betton, for complainant.

James B. Robb, for defendants.

SHEPLEY, Circuit Judge. The invention described and claimed in the patent of the complainant, for an improvement in buckles, reissue No. 1,483, dated May 26, 1863, is for "confining a buckle to a strap or other article, by means of one or more rivets or screws passing through one or more wings or flanges, substantially as set forth, and for the purpose described." The specification describes the invention as laying a buckle, provided with one or more wings having one or more holes through it or them, flat upon the strap or material to which it is to be confined, and punching in it one or more holes corresponding with the hole or holes in the wing or wings, and putting through each one a rivet, and heading it. The defendants' answer to the bill of complaint alleges, among other things, that this invention was not new, but, before the date of the alleged invention, was known and used, among others, by Kasson Fraser, of Syracuse. The evidence in the case shows, conclusively, the use, by Fraser and others, as early as 1853, at Syracuse, of buckles provided with such a wing or flange as is described in the complainant's patent, and attached to a strap in the described manner. This is a perfect defence to the claim in the patent of the complainant, as the evidence proves an extensive use of the Fraser buckle since 1853. Bill dismissed, with costs.

CHASE v. SANBORN et al.

Circuit Court, D. New Hampshire. Oct. Term, 1874.

INFRINGEMENT OF COPYRIGHT — INJUNCTION — PROOF—NEW HAMPSHIRE STATE REPORTS—DAMAGES.

1. Under a bill for an injunction, and an account for the infringement of a copyright, substantial damages cannot be allowed, where it appears that the matters charged have not worked any prejudice to the complaining party.

[Cited in Hanson v. Jaccard Jewelry Co., 32 Fed. 204.]

2. No suit can be maintained against a party for infringement in a case where no evidence of copyright is introduced by the complainant.

3. The complainant must show, under the old copyright law, that a printed copy of the title-page of the book was deposited in the clerk's office of the district wherein the author resided, and also that this was done before publication, as required by section 4 of that act. He must also prove that within three months from the publication of the book, a copy thereof was delivered to the clerk of the said district court.

[Cited in Donnelley v. Ivers, 18 Fed. 594.]

4. The burden is on the complainant to prove his title to the copyright as well as the infringement.

5. Authors, as well as inventors, must comply with the conditions congress has seen fit to annex to their acquiring the exclusive privileges allowed them by law.

6. In New Hampshire the judges of the superior court prepare the head-notes to the opinions which they respectively deliver. The reporter, therefore, has no copyright in the volumes he edits, and can convey no exclusive right to any one else.

[Cited in Banks v. Manchester, 23 Fed. 145; Banks & Bros. v. West Pub. Co., 27 Fed. 61.]

Bill in equity [by William S. Chase, assignee, against Benning W. Sanborn and others], praying for an account and an injuction for the infringement of an alleged copyright on certain volumes of New Hampshire reports and a digest of decisions in the same state.

The claim of the complainant was that Gardner F. Lyon, deceased, became, by purchase of the authors, the proprietor of the copyright of the judicial reports mentioned, and also of the copyright of the digest; and that by means of the said purchases he became the true and lawful owner of the exclusive right and liberty of printing, reprinting, publishing, and vending the same; and that the complainant subsequently, and by the means alleged, became and was the true and lawful owner of the said several copyrights; and he charged that the respondents had infringed the same (as fully set forth in the bill of complaint), which, as he claimed, was contrary to equity and good conscience. He therefore prayed for process, and for an account, and for an injunction. Process was issued and served, and the respondents appeared and filed an answer. They admitted that the original purchaser of the copyrights of the judicial reports published the digest mentioned in the bill of complaint; that he caused what purports to be the proper entry to be inserted in the title-page thereof, but they did not admit that the required formula was ever entered in the clerk's office of the district court, as required by the act of congress. Certain other defences were also set up as follows:—

1. That the digest in question was made up almost exclusively of the language of the head-notes of the cases included in it, and that it followed the language of the head-notes. That the state law made it the duty of each justice of the superior court of that state to prepare for the press correct reports of the decisions of the court thereafter pronounced by him, and that the state statute also created the office of a state reporter and made it his duty to edit the reports so furnished, and to provide for their sale by selling the copyright or by such other means as he might deem expedient, and directed that he should pay into the treasury of the state the net proceeds of such sale. Rev. St. N. H. 405. All of the reports mentioned, the answer alleged, were published at the several times stated in the bill of complaint, but the respondents alleged that they had no knowledge of what the arrangement was between the publishers and the reporters, though they believed that the former acquired all the rights of the state and of the reporters, and that the complainant purchased from them, or their executors, whatever rights he acquired under that arrangement.

2. That the title-page of the digest contained a statement that the required entry was made in the clerk's office of the district court, but they did not admit that such an entry was ever made in the clerk's office.

3. That the respondents published the digest as charged in the bill of complaint, but they denied that it was any infringement of any copyright secured by the complainant for several reasons:—Because the digest in question was made by the author upon an examination by him of each case in relation to which the respondents are charged with infringement, and that it was a new, separate, independent, and much-needed work. Because the head-notes, in the digest published by them, if in any instances they were the same as in the digest of the complainants, were taken from the opinions of the courts from the head-notes of the opinions prepared by the judge who delivered it, as the author had a right to do, even if the proprietor of the older digest had a copyright of the same, which was denied; and they denied that the digest published by them had incorporated any part of the former digest, except as herein stated.

Evidence was taken on both sides, when the complainants moved the court to send the cause to a master; but the respondents resisted that motion, insisting that the complainants showed no equity in their bill of complaint; and that the same should be dismissed. Hearing was had; but inasmuch as the usual course in such cases is to send the case to a master before determining the merits, the court came to the conclusion that it was not proper, in this case, to depart from the ordinary practice. Accordingly the cause was sent to a master, with directions to report, as set forth in the decretal order. The master made his report and the parties were again fully heard upon all the questions in the case. Among other things the master was directed to report whether the use, in the respondent's book, of the parts or features was taken from the complainant's books, and original therein, tended to prejudice, and if so, to what extent, the sale of the complainant's books. Opportunity for a full hearing was granted to the complainants; but the master reported that no evidence was introduced by him tending to show any such prejudice, and the court was of the opinion that the report of the master was correct, and it was confirmed.

Samuel C. Eastman and Asa Fowler, for complainant.

Charles R. Morrison, for respondents.

CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice. Authors of any book or books, map, chart, or musical composition, if citizens of the United States, shall have the sole right and liberty of printing, reprinting, publishing, and vending the same for the term of twenty-eight years from the time of recording the title thereof, as directed by law. 4 Stat. 436. Besides that it was required at that date that a printed copy of the title of such book or books, &c., should be deposited in the clerk's office of the district court of the district wherein the author or proprietor resided, and it was made the duty of such clerk to record the same in a book to be kept for that purpose, in the form prescribed in section 4 of that act. Such author or proprietor was also required, within three months from the publication of the book or books, &c., to deliver a copy of the same to the clerk of said district court. He was also required to give information that copyright was secured of the book, by inserting in the several copies of each edition published the formula prescribed in section 5 of that act, and the provision was that no person not complying with such requirement should be entitled to the benefit of the act. Instead of delivering a copy of the book, &c., to the clerk of the district court, the requirement now is that the author or proprietor shall transmit such copy free of postage within one month of the date of publication to the library of congress for the use of said library. 13 Stat. 540.

(After a reference to the master's report the court proceeds to say:—)

Viewed in the light of that report, it is clear that the complainant is not entitled to an account nor to an injunction. Nothing remains for consideration except the question whether the complainant is entitled to nominal damages, as it is very clear that substantial damages cannot be allowed in a case where it appears that the matters charged have not worked any prejudice to the complaining party. Nominal damages may perhaps be allowed, unless some one or more of the defences are sustained, which remains to be considered.

Evidence to show that the vendor of the complainant ever had a valid copy of the digest which it is charged the respondents have infringed is entirely wanting, which is all that need be said upon the subject. Damages cannot be recovered of a party for having used the matters published in a book which was never copyrighted, nor can a suit be maintained against a party for infringement in a case where there is no evidence of copyright introduced by the complainant.

Sufficient evidence was introduced by the complainant to show that a printed copy of the title-page was deposited in the clerk's office of the district court of the district wherein the author or proprietor of the several volumes of reports mentioned in the bill of complaint resided; but there is no evidence in the case that such deposit was made before publication, as required by section 4 of the copyright act. 4 Stat. 437. Proof was also introduced sufficient to show that the author or proprietor did deliver or cause to be delivered a copy of the said several volumes to the clerk of the said district court; but there is no evidence that the same were, in any case, so delivered within three months from the publication of the book, nor are there any facts or circumstances from which the court can supply, by inference, the want of direct evidence upon the subject, as there is no evidence whatever when publication was made. Persons claiming that they own the copyright of a book, in a suit for infringement, must prove their ownership by competent evidence, else their suit cannot be maintained, as the burden is upon the complainant to prove his title to copyright, as well as to prove infringement. Power is vested in congress to secure to authors and inventors, for limited times, the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries; and congress having exercised that power, authors, as well as inventors, must comply with the conditions which congress has seen fit to annex to the enjoyment of such exclusive right. Deposit of a printed copy of the title of the book must be made, before publication, in the clerk's office of the district court of the district wherein the author or proprietor shall reside, and he, the author or proprietor, must deliver a copy of the book to the clerk of said district court within three months from the publication of the same, else he is not entitled to the benefit of the act. Such are the abstract requirements of the act of congress; nor is it competent for the circuit court to disregard the requirement. Wheaton v. Peters, 8 Pet. [33 U. S.] 653; Reade v. Conquest, 9 C. B. (N. S.) 755.

3. Suppose it were otherwise, still the court is of the opinion that the complainant is not entitled to recover even nominal damages, as, by the statute law of the state, the judges of the court respectively were the authors of their opinions. Reporters of the decisions of the superior court were appointed by the governor with the advice of the council; but the second section of the same statute provides that each justice of said court shall prepare for the press, and furnish to the reporter, concise reports of the cases in which the judgment or opinion of the court, in matters of law pending at the law terms, was pronounced by him, within six months after the same is pronounced. Rev. St. 405. Section 5 of the same statute enacts that said reporter shall edit said reports as early as practicable, provide for the sale thereof by disposing of the copyright, or otherwise, as he may deem expedient, and the direction is that he shall pay into the state treasury the net proceeds, after deducting the reasonable and necessary expenses of publishing and selling. Of course, the judges respectively prepare the opinions, and the proof is equally full and decisive that they also prepared the head-notes to each of the cases reported in the several volumes of reports in question. Even grant that the copyright is not defective, still it cannot secure to the complainant what he does not own, nor could their vendors convey to them what they never owned. "Nemo dat quod non habet." Persons, therefore, who buy from one not the owner, acquire no property whatever in the thing purchased, as no one, in such a case, can convey any better title than he owns; unless the sale is made in market overt or under circumstances which show that the seller lawfully represented the owner. Foxley's Case, 5 Coke, 109a; 2 Bl. Comm. 449; 2 Kent, Comm. (11th Ed.) 224; Marsh v. Keating, 2 Clark & F. 260; Benj. Sales, 4; 1 Pars. Am. Law (5th Ed.) 520; Mitchell v. Hawley, 16 Wall. [83 U. S.] 550. None of the reporters were the authors of the opinions nor of the head-notes, and of course they had no copyright in the same, and it follows that, inasmuch as they had no such copyright in the opinions or head-notes, they could not convey any title to the grantor of the complainant, and that the latter acquired nothing in that regard by virtue of the several conveyances under which he claims. Having come to this conclusion, it is not necessary to decide whether the proofs introduced by the complainant show an infringement or not, as it is quite plain that the bill of complaint must be dismissed.

Bill of complaint dismissed, with costs.

of a jury, yet, if the defendant does, in fact, appeal and give an appeal-bond, the plaintiff may maintain an action upon that bond.

Debt on an appeal-bond given upon an appeal from the judgment of a justice of the peace, upon the verdict of a jury. The declaration set forth the condition of the bond, which was in the usual form, except that it stated that the judgment was rendered upon the verdict of a jury before the justice. The breach assigned was the not prosecuting the appeal with effect; and not satisfying the judgment of the justice.

Z. C. Lee, for defendant, demurred to the declaration, without oyer of the bond; contending, that inasmuch as the condition of the bond, set out in the declaration, showed that the judgment was upon a verdict before the justice of the peace; and as this court, upon the appeal in the same case, decided that this court had not jurisdiction by appeal where the judgment of the justice was upon a verdict, the bond was void.

But THE COURT overruled the demurrer.

2. The words "said letters patent," apply as well to the letters patent as extended as to the original term.

3. Where a patentee conveys an original patent and "any further patent which he shall or may at any time hereafter procure for any improvement or improvements upon the invention patented," he must be understood to convey so much of an interest in any future extension of his original patent as may be necessary to the beneficial use of the improvements.

This was a bill in equity filed [by Irah Chase, Jr., and Albert Clark, partners as Chase & Co.], to restrain defendants [Matthew Walker, Sr., and Daniel S. Walker, partners as M. Walker & Son], from infringing letters patent [No. 5,006], for "improvement in the process of manufacturing wire grating," granted to Henry Jenkins, March 6, 1847, reissued June 28, 1859 [No. 7,471], and extended for seven years from March 6, 1861. The bill alleged that after the extension of said patent the same was assigned by Jenkins, the patentee, to the New York Wire Railing Company, and by them conveyed to Chase & Co., the complainants.

The answer averred that prior to the assignment to the New York Wire Railing Company and during the original term of the letters patent, Jenkins, by his written contract, had conveyed to Daniel S. Walker the exclusive right, under said letters patent, within the state of Pennsylvania, except certain counties. It was alleged that this contract also conveyed an equitable interest in the extension of said letters patent, and that defendants had never used said invention except within the territory so conveyed. The answer further alleged that the conditions set forth in the contract had been fulfilled and that by proper assignments, all of the defendants were entitled to protection. This state of facts, it was claimed, constituted a license. The cause was heard on bill and answer. The contract between Jenkins and Walker, upon the construction of which the controversy turned, was as follows: "Whereas, Henry Jenkins, of Pottsville, Pennsylvania, did obtain letters patent of the United States of America for certain improvements in the process of manufacturing wire grating, etc., which letters patent bear date the 6th day of March, A. D. 1847, and also certain other letters patent of the United States of America for certain improvements in machinery for weaving wire grating, which said last-mentioned letters patent bear date the 7th day of March, A. D. 1847, now it is hereby agreed by and between the said Henry Jenkins and Daniel S. Walker, of the county of Philadelphia, in the state of Pennsylvania, as follows, that is to say: that the said Henry Jenkins, upon the payment of the following notes hereby acknowledged to be delivered to him, to wit: four notes drawn by Wickersham and Walker, in his favor, all dated this day, one for two hundred dollars payable at six months from date, another for three hundred dollars payable at nine months from date, another for the sum of six hundred and fifty-five dollars and twenty-eight cents at twelve months from date, and the other for six hundred and fifty-five dollars and twenty cents at eighteen months from date, that he, the said Henry Jenkins shall and will forthwith, by proper deed or assignment, assign and transfer unto the said Daniel S. Walker, his executors, administrators and assigns, the full, free, entire, and exclusive right, title, and privilege of using, exercising, and enjoying all and singular the powers, rights, benefits and advantages conferred upon and vested in him, the said Henry Jenkins, under and by virtue of all the letters patent hereinbefore recited and mentioned, in and for the state of Pennsylvania, to the utmost and fullest extent as to duration, manner of enjoyment, or otherwise, howsoever that he is or may be entitled to, under the said letters patent, excepting, nevertheless, the right in and for the counties in the said state, viz.: Allegheny, Beaver, Mercer, Huntingdon, and Erie, and also excepting the right as applicable to and for screens for anthracite coal, and for no other use or purpose whatever in and for the following-named counties in said state, viz.: Schuylkill, Lehigh, Carbon, Pike, Luzerne, Wayne, Wyoming, Columbia, Northumberland, and Dauphin. And the said Henry Jenkins doth further covenant and agree that upon the payment of the aforesaid notes he will also forthwith assign and transfer unto the said Daniel S. Walker and his legal representatives aforesaid, any further patents or patent rights which he, the said Henry Jenkins, or any person for him, shall or may at any time hereafter procure for any improvement or improvements upon the invention patented as aforesaid, and also any and all renewals thereof in and for the said state with the like exceptions as are herein before expressed. Witness the hands and seals of said parties this twentieth day of January, A. D. 1849. It is furthermore agreed and understood that until there shall be default made in the payment of the aforesaid notes, that the said Daniel S. Walker and his assigns shall have and exercise the rights above agreed to be conveyed in the manner and form above expressed, exclusively. Witness the hands and seals of the said parties as above expressed. Henry Jenkins (seal.) Daniel S. Walker (seal.)"

This agreement was recorded in the patent office, April 20, 1849.

Before GRIER, Circuit Justice, and CADWALADER, District Judge.

CADWALADER, District Judge. It is Judge Grier's opinion, in which I concur, that this is a very clear case for the defendants. As the proceeding is in equity, it is immaterial whether the instrument of January 20, 1849, vested a legal or an equitable interest in the local privilege which it was intended to transfer.

The question is, whether this instrument sufficiently indicates an intention to transfer an interest which might endure beyond the original term of fourteen years. If such intention is in anywise apparent, the effect must be to transfer the local interest for the term of the extension of seven years, afterward obtained. The question may be resolved by considering two clauses of the instrument. They will be examined separately, and afterward together.

In the first, the patentee grants the exclusive local privilege to the utmost and fullest extent, as to duration, that he is or may be entitled to under the said letters patent. If the words "under the said letters patent" had been omitted, the effect of this clause could scarcely have been questionable. Independently of the contingency of an extension, the term could be neither less nor greater than the original fourteen years. Therefore, independently of this contingency, there could be no such comparative duration as to satisfy the words "utmost and fullest extent." The applicability of this remark is not excluded by the addition of the words "under said letters patent." In the reports of cases which have been cited in the argument, the original patent is, after an extension, considered as having been, from the first, for certain purposes, a patent for the extended term.

What is in one part of the act of congress [5 Stat. 117] called an extension is, indeed, in another part of the act called a renewal of the patent. But the practice of the patent office, prescribed expressly by the act, is not to issue a new patent, but merely to certify the extension upon the original patent.

In the second clause, the patentee covenants to assign any further patents or patent rights, which he may, at any time afterward, procure for any improvement or improvements upon the original invention, and also any and all renewals thereof in and for the said state. Independently of the arguments upon the context of this clause, and upon the different meanings which may be attributable to the word renewals, the substance of the provision for the transfer of subsequent patents for improvements must be considered. Any such subsequent patent would be for a term of fourteen years, which, whether it should be extended or not, must necessarily continue after the expiration of the term of the former patent for the original invention. Now the patentee can not be understood as having intended either to deprive himself of the right of applying for an extension of the original patent, or to reserve this right so as to frustrate the subsequent local use of the patented improvements under the transfer in question. But the subsequently patented improvements could not be used without the use of the original invention; and the parties can not have intended that, as to such improvements, he should be able to restrain the use of the original invention after the expiration of the original term. There was thus one purpose, at least, for which the local privilege must have extended beyond the original term.

Lastly, the two clauses will be considered together. Here the second, as a glossary to define the words of the first, will remove any doubt which might otherwise remain, as to their import. The words of the first clause

"utmost and fullest extent as to duration," are shown by the second clause to have extended for a specific purpose beyond the original term of fourteen years. If so, as the words of the first clause are not specific, but general, their intended application, as to the local privilege transferred, must have been the same for general purposes, including the extension in question. Notwithstanding the decree under which the bill was taken pro confesso, the cause was heard, by consent, as upon bill and answer. Moreover, the documents under which the parties respectively deduce title, were, by consent, read in evidence at the hearing.

The decree must be opened and set aside, and the bill dismissed, with costs.

INFRINGEMENT OF PATENT—INJUNCTION.

A preliminary injunction was granted where the complainant had been long in the enjoyment of his rights under his patent, and there was no doubt as to the defendants' infringement, and the evidence failed to satisfy the court of the existence of articles alleged to have been in use before the date of the patented invention.

[Cited in Hat-Sweat Manuf'g Co. v. Davis Sewing Mach. Co., 32 Fed. 402; Carter & Co. v. Wollschlaeger, 53 Fed. 575.]

In equity. Motion for preliminary injunction to restrain [Edward Wesson and others from] infringement of reissued letters patent [No. 1,514] granted the complainant [L. C. Chase] July 28, 1863, for improvement in halter-rings [originally granted April 30, 1861, and numbered 32,180].

George E. Betton, for complainant.

George L. Roberts, for defendants.

SHEPLEY, Circuit Judge. Limiting the first claim in this patent to that only which was invented by the patentee,—i. e., his device, as described in his specification, of such a mode of attaching a halter-die or other harness-ring to a halter or harness-strap by means of rivets, in the described mode, passing through holes in the described flanges of the die or ring without the necessity of sewing, and dispensing with the use of any other material to form the "lap," in the mode and for the purpose described,—the patent is for a different invention from that described in the patent to Samuel C. Hawkins, No. 21,674, granted Oct. 5, 1858, which is relied upon to prove want of novelty in complainant's invention.

No exhibit is produced of any such harness-ring with two flanges, as some of the affiants on the part of defendants testify were in use before the date of the complainant's invention. The affidavits introduced by the complainant throw very grave doubt upon the question of the existence of any such devices at the dates indicated. These doubts are greatly confirmed by the omission to produce as exhibits in the case any such harness-rings as the witnesses describe, which could easily have been produced if they had existed and been in use for so long a time. It is not, therefore, at this stage of the case, necessary to decide what effect they would have upon the complainant's patent if the court were satisfied of their prior use.

As the complainant has been long in the enjoyment of his rights under the patent, and there is no doubt upon the question of infringement, the injunction will issue as prayed for in the bill, until the further order of the court. Order accordingly.

PATENTS—NOVELTY.

[A patent will not be granted for a device differing only in form, but not in principle, from a device in prior use.]

[Appeal from the commissioner of patents.

[Application by Chatfield and Dutcher for letters patent for a device for elevating water by buckets. From a decision of the commissioner of patents rejecting the application, the applicants appeal.]

MORSELL, Circuit Judge. They say in their specifications: "Having thus fully described our invention, what we claim and desire to secure by letters patent of the United States is the endless chain of buckets, C, c, in combination with the driving wheels and pinions operated by weights and pulleys, and regulated by the fan, N, for the purpose of elevating water, the whole being constructed substantially as set forth."

The commissioner in his decision adopts the report of the examiner of the 4th of November, 1858, which is in these words: "The device in this case consists in the application of clock work to elevate water by means of an endless chain of buckets. The examiner in charge has referred to B——, Architecture, Hydr-Alique, pl. 6, &c., as showing an anticipation of means employed by the applicant for this purpose. The reference shows a series of buckets operating by clock work, the mechanism of which, after a careful examination, we are unable to discover differs in any essential particular from the device claimed by the applicant. We must therefore recommend that the application be finally rejected." The commissioner adds: "The aforegoing report is confirmed, and the application rejected. November 5, 1858." To this decision there were three reasons of appeal filed. The first is that the reference upon which our application for a patent has been refused is substantially different from our machine, and incapable of performing the functions or work for which our machine is intended, and to which it is peculiarly adapted.' The second and third are general, &c.

The commissioner's report reaffirms the report of the examiner adopted as the decision of the commissioner, as before said, saying: "The parties in the case claim a combination of mechanical devices for drawing water from wells or cisterns, which, in the judgment of the office, is substantially the same as shown in the reference upon which the application for a patent was rejected," &c. Upon due notice of the time and place appointed for the hearing of said appeal being given, all the original papers with the decision, reasons of appeal and report of the commissioner were laid before me. And the said appellant, by his attorney, appeared, filed his answer in writing, and submitted his case. I have paid every attention in carefully examining and weighing the argument of the appellants' counsel in this case, but its force has not been sufficient to satisfy me that there is any error in the commissioner's decision. I think that, although there is some difference in the form of the two devices (the one referred to and the one in this case), yet there is no substantial difference in the principle.

Case No. 2,632.

CHATFIELD v. The WOLGA.

[3 Law Rep. 387.]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. Dec. Term, 1840.

WATCH ON VESSEL IN PORT—CHARGING EXPENSE TO SEAMAN—CUSTOM—PROCESS IN REM WITHOUT NOTICE TO OWNERS.

1. The court refused to sanction a custom, not supported by strong proof, of having a watch on board vessels in foreign ports at the expense of the sailors.

2. Where process in rem is commenced without notice to the owners who reside within the district, no more costs will be allowed than in the case of a monition to show cause.

This was a libel in admiralty against the barque Wolga. The libellant was a seaman on board the vessel, on a voyage from New York to Antwerp and back to Boston, and claimed to recover the sum of forty-six dollars and thirty cents as wages. Thomas Richardson made answer in behalf of the barque and owners, in which it was admitted that the libellant had a just claim for nearly the whole sum demanded, deducting two dollars paid in Antwerp by the master for a watch on board the vessel; in regard to which, the answer set forth that it was customary and lawful for all masters of vessels that arrive in said port of Antwerp to hire people from the shore to watch the ship, at night, instead of compelling the seamen to keep such watch; and to charge a proportionate part of the expense of said watch to each of the seamen on board such ship, and to deduct the same from their wages; and that the same was a reasonable and general custom, and well known to both merchants and mariners; and that the master of said barque Wolga did, while in the port of Antwerp, hire such a watch during the night, and paid therefor a reasonable price, and that the said libellant well knew that such watch was hired, and never objected to the same, nor offered to keep watch himself, nor did in fact keep such watch; and that the just share and proportion of the expense of said watch, chargeable to the libellant, was the said sum of two dollars. Evidence was introduced in support of the alleged custom, and several masters of vessels testified to the existence of the custom, and that they had conformed to it, sometimes with the previous consent of the seamen, sometimes without; but had uniformly deducted the amount paid for a watch from the wages of the men, without objection on their part. Some captains, however, did not hire any watch.

Charles H. Parker, for libellant.
Mr. Dexter, for respondent.

DAVIS, District Judge, said, that in order to establish such a custom as the one contended for, it was necessary that the proof should be strict, and the custom uniform. The evidence in this case had satisfied neither of the requisitions. It appeared that the custom was sometimes observed, and sometimes departed from—the express assent of the crew sometimes obtained, and sometimes not. In this case, no express assent was set up, and the custom, not being uniform, could not bind the crew without such express assent. He further observed that the custom of permitting the men to be absent on shore, at night, was exceptionable and of immoral tendency, and if it were to be admitted at all, should be admitted only upon very strict proof. Wherefore he decreed that the libellant should recover his whole claim, with costs.

At a subsequent day the counsel for the respondent submitted to the court, that as the owners of the vessel lived in Boston, and process in rem issued without any previous notice to them by monition to show cause, whether any costs ought to be allowed; and thereupon the court ordered that costs should be taxed for the respondent as if the hearing had been upon a monition to show cause, and that the additional expenses of the arrest be paid by the libellant.

The CHEESEMAN et al. v. TWO FERRY-BOATS.

[2 Bond, 363.][1]

District Court, S. D. Ohio. Oct. Term, 1870.

JURISDICTION OF DISTRICT COURT — OHIO RIVER — REGULATION OF "COMMERCE AMONG THE STATES" — STEAM FERRY-BOATS — SALVAGE — COMPENSATION.

1. The district court of the United States for the southern district of Ohio, as a court of admiralty, has territorial jurisdiction in case of a seizure on the Ohio side of the Ohio river, at high-water mark.

2. The court also has admiralty jurisdiction over the Ohio, as a navigable river, by virtue of section 9 of the judiciary act of 1789, as construed by the supreme court of the United States.

3. Ferry-boats propelled by steam, and used as such between two cities in different states, are within the scope of congressional legislation, under the grant of power to regulate commerce "among the states," and are subject to the jurisdiction of the national courts in the exercise of their admiralty powers.

[Cited in Murray v. Ferry-Boat, 2 Fed. 90; The St. Louis, 48 Fed. 313.]

4. Ferry-boats, or any other property of value, adrift on the Ohio river and in peril, are the subjects of a salvage service.

[Cited in Salvor Wrecking Co. v. Sectional Dock Co., Case No. 12,273; Maltby v. Steam Derrick-Boat, Id. 9,000; The Old Natchez, 9 Fed. 477. Approved in same case, Id. 479.]

5. To constitute a good salvage service, it is enough to show that the property rescued was exposed to danger greater than is incurred in ordinary navigation, and it need not be proved that the danger was imminent or immediate.

6. The claim that the property was in possession of prior salvors is not sustained, if it appear that their efforts to save it had not been and would not be successful.

7. Those in possession are estopped from claiming as salvors, if they requested the aid of those who interposed and saved the property.

8. Where the facts in a case show a legal salvage service by the libellants, but not of the highest order of merit, they are not entitled to a high rate of compensation.

In admiralty.

Lincoln, Smith & Warnock, for libellants.
D. T. Wright, for claimant.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This is a libel in rem, in behalf of the steamboat J. W. Cheeseman and owners, to recover a salvage compensation for assistance and relief to two ferry-boats and their floats, alleged to have been in a condition of peril on the Ohio river. The libel contains the usual averments, and need not be recited at length. An answer has been filed by Samuel Wiggins, the owner of the ferry-boats and their appendages, in which he denies, in substance, that any salvage service has been rendered by the libellants, and insists, if such service was rendered, it is not a case within the admiralty jurisdiction of this court, and that no decree can therefore be rendered for compensation.

There is no controversy as to the material facts in the case, except as to one point, which will be noticed in the progress of this opinion. These facts, as alleged in the libel, and substantially sustained by the evidence, may be briefly stated as follows: These ferry-boats, with the floats attached, were lying at a wharf or landing on the Ohio side of the river, a short distance above the city of Cincinnati, in charge of a watchman placed on them by the owner. They had been built as ferry-boats to run between Cincinnati and the city of Covington, Ky., on the opposite side of the river. They were of the largest class of ferry-boats, intended to be propelled by steam power, and were well and strongly built. The engines and other necessary equipments were in position, and the boats were ready for service, but had not been in actual use. Their value is estimated at from $25,000 to $30,000. The Ohio river at the time was at a high stage, then being more than forty feet in the channel, and was rapidly rising. At an early hour in the morning, the ferry-boats, with their attachments, being lashed together, were loosed from the wharf or dock to which they were fastened by some object coming in violent collision with them from above. With the watchman and another person on board, they drifted out into the stream, and were rapidly carried down by the force of the current. There was an anchor on board of considerable weight and strength, which was thrown out shortly after the boats reached the current of the river, with the hope of stopping them in their descent, which broke and wholly failed of its purpose. As the boats progressed, several persons at different points, in the whole some eight or nine, came off from the shore in skiffs to aid in stopping and landing them. Some four or five different attempts were made for this purpose, by carrying out lines or hawsers and making them fast to stumps or trees on the shore, all of which were unsuccessful. In some instances the lines broke from the great strain upon them; in others they slipped over the stumps to which they were fastened, and in one the stump or tree was pulled out of the ground. As the boats were floating swiftly down the stream—at a point just above Taylorsville, some sixteen miles below Cincinnati—the steamboat J. W. Cheeseman, a boat duly licensed and enrolled under the laws of the United States, was coming up with a heavy and valuable cargo, destined for Cincinnati and places above. The master of the steamer, seeing the ferry-boats adrift not far from the Kentucky shore, hailed the persons on board, and inquired if they needed aid in stopping and landing them. To this inquiry there was an affirmative reply, and the proper order was given for rendering this aid. The first attempt was to get the steamer between the ferry-boats and the shore, with the purpose of pulling them to the shore. This attempt failed, and the steamer then changed her position so as to come in contact with the ferry-boats from the outside, and push them in. After drifting down some three miles, the steamer was successful in landing and securing the boats. One of the ferry-boats had lost its rudder in its descent by striking against the shore, and this was the only injury sustained by them. The ferry-boats, with their machinery, were of great weight, and were rendered the more unwieldy from the quantity of drift which had accumulated under and around them. The Cheeseman was occupied in the service about three hours, and in the opinion of some of the witnesses, was exposed to some danger of injury from her interposition. Being heavily laden, and not having sufficient power of engine to tow the boats to Cincinnati, they were left in charge of persons placed on board by the master of the Cheeseman, with a view, as stated, of coming down the next day and towing them to the city. In the meantime the owner of the ferry-boats employed another steamer to take them up, and this service was not therefore performed by the libellants. Soon after the ferry-boats were brought up, and while lying at a wharf on the Ohio side, a little distance above Cincinnati, they were attached by process from this court in this suit. On this state of facts, it is insisted by the proctor for the respondent: 1. That this court, as a court of admiralty, has no jurisdiction. 2. That upon the merits, the libellants are not entitled to a decree as for a salvage service.

1. The jurisdiction of the court is challenged mainly on the ground that these ferry-boats, when seized in this suit, were lying at the shore on the Ohio side of the river, and not therefore within the territorial limits and jurisdiction of this court. This point has been urged at great length in the argument, and requires the notice of the court. It is insisted in its support that the district court of the United States for the southern district of Ohio can not take cognizance in admiralty of any case occurring on the Ohio river, for the reason that there is no express legislation by congress which authorizes it. The first and most obvious reply to this objection is, that these boats when seized were at the Ohio shore, when the Ohio river was at a high stage of water, and were clearly therefore within the state of Ohio and within the territorial limits of this district. The act of congress of February 10, 1855, dividing the state of Ohio into two judicial districts, after fixing the line separating the northern and southern districts, provides that all that part of the state lying south of that line shall compose one district, to be called the southern district of Ohio. There can be no doubt, therefore, that the boundary of this district on the south is the same as that fixed by the old constitution of the state of Ohio, which declares that the state shall be bounded "on the south by the Ohio river to the mouth of the Great Miami river." And this was regarded as in accordance with the deed of cession by the state of Virginia of March 1, 1784, of all the territory lying "northwest of the Ohio river."

It is not necessary, nor is it intended, to discuss the question whether from the terms used in the deed of cession, and the constitution of Ohio, the boundary of the state on the south extends to low-water mark in the Ohio river, or to a medium line between high and low-water mark. The state of Ohio has heretofore claimed, and will doubtless continue to claim, the latter as her true southern boundary. It is certain she will never concede to the states of Kentucky and Virginia the extension of their boundaries to the high-water line on the Ohio side. In this view the want of jurisdiction in this case, on the ground stated, has no basis on which it can rest, for the reason that these ferry-boats, when arrested, were within the jurisdictional limits of this district. This must be viewed as a conclusive answer to the argument against the jurisdiction of this court in this case. Since the decision of the case of The Genesee Chief, in 1851, 12 How. [53 U. S.] 443, there is no room for a doubt that the district courts of the United States have admiralty cognizance of all cases arising on the navigable rivers of the West. The supreme court, in that case, settled the doctrine—unalterably as I trust—that this jurisdiction does not depend on the ebb and flow of the tide, but on the navigability of the river. And they base this claim of jurisdiction on section 9 of the judiciary act of 1789 (1 Stat. 83), which provides that the district courts "shall have exclusive cognizance of all civil causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, including all seizures under the laws of imposts, navigation, or trade of the United States, where the seizure is made on waters which are navigable from the sea by vessels of ten or more tons burden, within their respective districts, as well as upon the high seas." Remarking on this provision, the court say: "The jurisdiction is here made to depend on the navigable character of the water, and not on the ebb and flow of the tide. If the water was navigable, it was deemed to be public; and, if public, was regarded as within the legitimate scope of the admiralty jurisdiction."

It may be remarked here, that since the decision in the case of The Genesee Chief, this court, without doubt or scruple, has taken cognizance of admiralty suits occurring on the western rivers, when the boats proceeded against were brought within its jurisdiction and seized by its process. And among these cases there have been many in which damages were claimed for collisions, and some founded on claims for salvage services. The same course has been pursued, it is believed, by all the admiralty courts in the West. Several of the cases in which jurisdiction has thus been taken by the western courts have been appealed to the supreme court, and adjudicated there without a question of the rightfulness of its exercise. [Fretz v. Bull] 12 How. [53 U. S.] 466; [Walsh v. Rogers] 13 How. [54 U. S.] 283; [The New World v. King] 16 How. [57 U. S.] 469; [Ure v. Coffman] 19 How. [60 U. S.] 56; [New York & V. Co. v. Calderwood] Id. 245.

I will briefly refer to some other cases, in which the question of admiralty jurisdiction on the western waters was involved, and has been distinctly decided by the supreme court. The case of The Magnolia, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 296, was a suit for a collision on the Alabama river, above tide-water, and within the body of a county. The court say, in their opinion, in reference to the act of 1789: "If the flux and reflux of the tide be abandoned as an arbitrary and false test of a navigable river, it required no further legislation of congress to extend it to the Mississippi, Alabama, and other great rivers, navigable from the sea. If the waters over which this jurisdiction is claimed, be within this category, the act makes no distinction between them."

The ruling of the supreme court, in [Commercial Trans. Co. v. Fitzhugh] 1 Black [66 U. S.] 576, is clear and explicit on this question of jurisdiction. The suit was for a collision on the Hudson river, within the territorial limits of the northern district of New York, but the seizure was made in the southern district. The case was taken by appeal from the decree of the circuit court for the latter district to the supreme court. Exceptions were there urged to the jurisdiction of the lower courts: First, because it did not appear that the colliding boats were engaged in foreign commerce, or commerce between two states; second, because the collision took place within the body of a county; and third, because, if the case was properly cognizable in admiralty, the jurisdiction pertained to the northern district of New York. These exceptions were distinctly overruled by the supreme court as unsustainable on principle or authority. In their opinion the court say: "When the district courts were organized, they were authorized by congress to exercise exclusive original cognizance of all civil causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, including all seizures under laws of imposts, navigation, or trade of the United States, where the seizures are made on waters which are navigable from the sea by vessels of ten or more tons burden, within their respective districts, as well as upon the high seas. That provision of the judiciary act remains in full force, and unrestricted, as applied to the navigable waters of the Hudson, and all the other navigable waters of the Atlantic coast, which empty into the sea, or the gulfs and bays that form a part of the sea. All such waters are in truth but arms of the sea, and are as much within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction as the sea itself." And again, the court say: "If it appears, as in cases of collision, depredation on property, etc., that it was committed on navigable waters within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the United States, the case is one properly cognizable in admiralty." The court, after distinctly setting aside the objection that the collision took place within the body of a county, also hold that the jurisdiction of the district court for the southern district of New York is not affected by the fact that the collision occurred within the northern district. And the doctrine is strongly asserted as to marine torts, that they may be sued for, either "in personam, in any district where the offending party resides, or in rem, wherever the offending thing is found within the jurisdiction of the court issuing the process." The source and extent of the jurisdiction of the district courts being thus clearly defined, this court has no hesitancy in taking cognizance of the case now before it. True, the claim in this suit is for a salvage service; and in the cases referred to, the suits were for collisions, sounding in tort. But there can be no question, that where the proceeding is in rem for salvage, the principles settled by the supreme court apply with the same force as in torts. Torts are said to be local in contradistinction to cases of maritime jurisdiction arising ex contractu; but they are only local in the sense that they must have been committed on the sea, or on some navigable water within the pale of admiralty cognizance. This fact being established, any district court within which the thing proceeded against is found and seized, has rightful jurisdiction. It follows, necessarily, that claims for salvage services may be prosecuted in the admiralty under the grant of admiralty jurisdiction as conferred by the act of 1789, as construed by the supreme court. The right to enforce such claims in the maritime courts dates back to the origin of such courts, and was unquestionably within the contemplation of the act just referred to.

The sole inquiry as a test of jurisdiction in this case seems, therefore, to be: Was the service, for which compensation is sought in this action, performed on a navigable stream? And this question does not admit of a doubt. The Ohio river, in fact, as well as by judicial decision, is a navigable river. There is no force in the argument urged in opposition to this conclusion, that there are portions of the season when, from low water or ice, it can not be navigated. The supreme court, in the case of Nelson v. Leland, 22 How. [63 U. S.] 48, have decided, that the temporary interruption of the navigation of a river does not destroy its character as a navigable stream. The court say in that case: "Many of our leading rivers are sometimes unnavigable, but this can not affect their navigability at other times." And in the case of the Wheeling Bridge, 13 How. [54 U. S.] 561, the court, in their opinion, say: "That the Ohio river is navigable, is a historical fact which all courts may recognize."

2. But it is urged as a further objection to the jurisdiction of the court in this case, that these ferry-boats, not being intended for use in carrying on commerce and navigation, are not subject to the commercial power of the general government, and not, therefore, subject to the maritime law, or within the range of its protection. It is insisted that, on this ground, a court of admiralty can not take cognizance of a claim for a salvage service rendered to them, and that a claimant for compensation for such service must be remitted to the laws of the state within which the service was rendered for his indemnity. The decision of this point is not perhaps material, as the jurisdiction of the court is sustainable on another and a broader ground, to which I shall presently advert. But I am by no means ready to concede the point insisted on in the argument. On the contrary, I incline to the opinion that these ferry-boats, when in use as such, are within the legitimate range of congressional legislation under the constitutional grant of power to regulate commerce "among the several states," and therefore within the scope of the admiralty jurisdiction of the national courts. They are costly in their construction and equipment, are propelled by steam, and designed for the transit of persons and property across a navigable river, which constitutes a boundary between two states. Why are they not within the control of congress, and subject to such commercial regulations as they may prescribe, to be exercised, of course, so as not to interfere with, or detract from, the right of the states to regulate the ferries within their limits? This question is answered by the fact that congress have exercised such a power in the laws passed requiring all vessels or boats propelled by steam, and to be used for the conveyance of passengers, to be inspected and licensed. It can not be questioned, that a steam ferry-boat, carrying thousands of persons daily, is within both the letter and the spirit of these acts of congress. But without intending to discuss this question, I will refer very briefly to the celebrated case of Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 1, as sustaining the conclusion indicated. I can not quote the whole of the luminous argument of Chief Justice Marshal in that case, nor will I do him the injustice of attempting to state an outine of the process by which he reaches his conclusions. His definition of commerce, as used in the constitution, is nearly equivalent to a demonstration. He says: "Commerce undoubtedly is traffic—but it is something more, it is intercourse." Is it not clear, that if a ferry-boat is used in carrying on both traffic and intercourse between states, it is fairly within the scope of such congressional legislation as does not conflict with the admitted rights of the states?

But it is further objected in this case, that there can be no decree in favor of the libellants for a salvage service, for the reason that the maritime law recognizes no service as a subject of admiralty cognizance, unless rendered to a boat or vessel, or the cargo of a boat or vessel, in peril of loss or destruction. The claim in the argument is, that no other property afloat on a navigable stream, however great its value or imminent its peril, can be the subject of a salvage service, in the sense of entitling the salvors to compensation by the decree of a court of admiralty. This question has not been directly passed upon by the supreme court, for the reason, probably, that such an objection has never before been made in any case in which it could have been urged. There are several cases which substantially involve this principle, and which, by fair inference, settle the question. I refer to those cases instituted in the district courts for injuries by steamboats on western rivers, by collisions with flat-boats and their cargoes, which have been taken by appeals to the supreme court. In none of these cases is there a doubt intimated, that they were properly cases of admiralty cognizance. The case of Fretz v. Bull, 12 How. [53 U. S.] 466, is one of the cases referred to. It was a suit for damages against the owners of a steamboat for running into and sinking a flat-boat on the Mississippi, laden with a valuable cargo. The cases of Culbertson v. Shaw, 18 How. [59 U. S.] 585, and Nelson v. Leland, 22 How. [63 U. S.] 48, are of the same character.

If, in collision cases, jurisdiction in admiralty can be maintained, when the injury is not to a vessel or the cargo of a vessel, it results inevitably that it may be maintained for a salvage service in saving property not within either of those categories. The principle involved is the same in both of these classes; but as a matter of policy and expediency there is a stronger reason for upholding this jurisdiction in suits for salvage than for collisions. In most cases, the common law courts of the states are competent to give a full remedy for injuries by collision, but in salvage services they can only award compensation on the ground of quantum meruit, and can not regard those elements of a salvage service which it is the peculiar province of admiralty to consider, and which enter largely into the estimate of the allowance to be made.

Some references have been made in the argument to several writers of distinguished reputation, whose definitions of a salvage service restrict it to a service rendered to a vessel or the cargo of a vessel. It is not strange that English and American authors, with reference to the doctrine that admiralty jurisdiction was limited to the ebb and flow of the tide, should have stated the law of salvage in this restricted sense. Upon that theory such services would necessarily be rendered on the sea, or rivers within the ebb and flow of the tide, where it could rarely happen that the property saved was not either a vessel or its cargo. But since, in this country, this test of admiralty jurisdiction has been repudiated, it would seem necessarily to result that a salvage claim may be enforced in any case where valuable property in peril is saved on a navigable river, over which maritime jurisdiction extends. The American decisions fully sustain this view. In the case of The Emulous [Case No. 4,480], decided by Judge Story in 1832, nearly twenty years before the decision of the supreme court in the case of The Genesee Chief [supra], he does not limit a salvage service to a vessel or cargo, but expressly says, it extends to all property saved "on the sea or wrecked on the coast of the sea." The learned judge, in the light of the decision of the supreme court before referred to, would doubtless have added to his definition the words, or on any navigable river. In the case of The Emblem [Case No. 4,434], decided by the learned Judge Ware, in 1840, there is no intimation that a salvage claim is to be understood in the restricted sense contended for. In that case, salvage was awarded for saving the trunks of a passenger, containing a quantity of silver coin. The coin in the passenger's trunk was certainly no part of the cargo of the vessel, but it was property, and as such a proper subject of a salvage service. The judge says: "A person who preserves goods which are lost, or in danger of being lost by the fortunes of the sea, is entitled to a reward for that service." To the same effect is the doctrine as stated by Judge Curtis, late of the supreme court of the United States, in the case of Hennessey v. The Versailles [Id. 6,365]. That distinguished judge says: "The relief of property from an impending peril of the sea, by the voluntary exertions of those who are under no legal obligation to render assistance and the consequent ultimate safety of the property, constitutes a technical case of salvage." And Judge Marvin, in his late treatise on Wrecks and Salvage, gives the following definition: "Salvage is a compensation for maritime services rendered in saving property, or rescuing it from impending peril on the sea, or wrecked on the coast of a sea, or on a public navigable river or lake, where inter-state or foreign commerce is carried on." See, also, Abb. Adm. 293 [Raft of Spars, Case No. 11,528]; 1 Spr. 323 [Taber v. Jenny, Case No. 13,720].

This view of the law of salvage, as applicable to western rivers, must be adopted. The protection of the vast commerce on those waters requires it. It is well known that every year property of the value of millions is afloat on these channels of trade, in flatboats, barges, and other craft, not required to be enrolled or licensed, and which in no proper sense can be designated as ships or vessels. And there is no reason why the rights of salvors rendering meritorious services in saving such property from injury or destruction, should not be recognized and enforced in admiralty. Upon any other principle the interests of western commerce will suffer material injury. It is not to be expected that prompt and effective salvage services will be rendered without the expectation of such liberal compensation as a court of admiralty alone can award. The laws of the states, so far as they relate to property adrift which is of small value, are sufficient to meet the cases for which they are intended. But as to property of value, they make no provision for indemnity for the time, labor, and hazard required in its rescue when in peril. This service, in general, can be only effectively rendered by steamboats employed in their regular trips, and navigated at a heavy daily expense; and it is idle to suppose that owners or masters will lend their aid in saving property in danger of destruction, if they are to be turned over to the drift laws of the states for compensation, or are obliged to resort to the local courts for that purpose.

The only inquiry which remains is, whether upon the facts before the court there is evi dence of a legal salvage service which will sustain the libellants' claim. Their right to a decree on the merits is denied on two grounds: 1. That the ferry-boats, at the time the alleged salvage service was rendered, were in the possession of prior salvors, having the means to save them without the aid of the steamboat. 2. That the ferry-boats were not in such peril as to render the service of the steamboat a salvage service.

1. It is clear from the evidence, that neither the persons on board when these boats were first adrift, nor those who afterward came aboard before the interposition of the steamboat, were salvors in any proper sense of the term. It is of the essence of a legal salvage service that it should have been successful in saving the property. The proof in this case is entirely satisfactory, that after repeated trials by the persons on the ferry-boats, with all the means in their power, they wholly failed to land the boats or materially to check their progress. Nor do the facts justify the conclusion that any subsequent efforts would have proved more successful. But on this point there is a fact proved which is conclusive. The master of the Cheeseman, when approaching the ferry-boats, inquired of those on board, if they needed his assistance in stopping and landing them, and in reply was informed that such aid was needed. This was a distinct admission that those on the ferry-boats had not the ability to stop and land them, and also proves that the steamboat did not interpose against the wishes of those aboard the ferry-boats.

2. As to the peril of these boats. On this point, it is proper to remark that the law in relation to the degree of danger to which saved property is exposed, has been recently a good deal modified by writers and judicial decisions on the subject. It was formerly held that it was an essential element of a good salvage service that the property should be in immediate and imminent peril. It is laid down by a distinguished writer on maritime law in a recent work, that "if the peril encountered be something distinctly beyond ordinary danger, something which exposes the property to destruction unless extraordinary assistance be rendered, it is enough to found a claim for salvage." 2 Pars. Mar. Law, 611. And in the case of The Independence [Case No. 7,014] the court say: "To be in a condition to have a salvage service rendered, a vessel must be subject to something more than the ordinary peril of the sea." And the learned judge distinctly affirms that it is not necessary that the peril should be such that escape without aid is impossible, or nearly so. The same doctrine has been laid down by the English admiralty courts. 3 W. Rob. 68; 1 W. Rob. 174; 3 W. Rob. 138.

There can be no question that the dangers to which these ferry-boats were exposed, though perhaps not imminent or immediate, were beyond those ordinarily attendant on river navigation. From the high stage of water and the swiftness of the current, they were in continual peril of being thrown violently against the shore, and of striking against trees, stumps, and rocks, and by these means of suffering essential injury, if not total wreck. But it is not material to inquire into the degree of danger to which the ferry-boats were exposed. By the request for assistance made by those on board, the owner is estopped from denying that the boats were in peril. The law, as stated by Judge Parsons, is, "that if the assistance of the salvors is requested by and rendered to the persons in charge of another vessel, they can not plead that they are not bound to pay for the services rendered, on the ground that the vessel would have been saved if left in her former position." 2 Pars. Mar. Law, 612.

Having no doubt as to the law on the points indicated, I have now only to fix the amount of compensation to be awarded to the libellants. On principles of public policy, as also in justice to meritorious salvors, judges and courts, both in England and in this country, have evinced no disposition to measure the rewards for such services on a stinted scale. But there is no unbending rule applicable to every case; and between the highest and the lowest order of merit, there is a wide range for the discretion of the judge. The law on this subject is well stated by Judge Curtis, in the case of Hennessey v. The Versailles [Case No. 6,365]. He says: "The value of the property saved, the degree of peril from which it was delivered, the risk of the property, and especially of the persons of the salvors, the severity and duration of their labors, the promptness of their interposition, and the skill exhibited by them, are all to be considered." It is clear, from the facts in this case, that there are no elements in the service rendered by the libellants entitling it to the highest, or even a high rate of compensation. There was no peril of life to any of the parties, nor was there any severe or long-continued labor, or any unusual personal hardship. Nor is it certain that there was any immediate danger of great injury to, or destruction of the ferry-boats. The witnesses for the libellant, it is true, swear that the steamboat was put to great hazard in rendering this service. On this point there is conflict in the evidence adduced by the parties. The respondents' witnesses say that the steamboat was in no danger. The truth no doubt lies between these extremes. The steamboat undoubtedly encountered some risks beyond those of ordinary navigation, but with skillful management it is impossible to conclude that there was any serious danger. Yet there were some elements in the service which entitle it to a measure of compensation beyond that of a mere quantum meruit. The ferry-boats, as already stated, were of great value, and the steamboat and cargo are valued at $30,000. The boat was engaged in its business of carrying freight and passengers. The river was at a high stage, and the current consequently rapid. A detention for even a few hours was a great loss to the boat. The service necessarily required high steam, involving a more than usual strain on the boat and the machinery The ferry-boats, with their floats and the accumulation of drift under and around them, were unwieldy, and not easily moved or controlled. And it was only upon a second trial, that the steamboat succeeded in stopping and getting them ashore.

Upon the whole, it seems to the court that an award of twelve hundred dollars to the salvors will fully meet the justice of the case. A decree for that sum will be entered, to be apportioned among the owners and officers and crew of the steamboat, as the court, by a future order, shall direct.

CHEEVER v. SHEDD et al.

[13 Blatchf. 258.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Vermont. Feb. 28, 1876.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — OPENING AND GRADING STREETS—INJURY TO ADJOINING LAND.

1. A street 50 feet in width was laid out by the proper authority through the land of C., and the damages to C. were assessed. Such damages included remuneration for the land taken, for the deprivation of any right or privilege attached to it, and for the damage done by the lay out to the land connected with that which was covered by the street. A street of 50 feet in width was a fit and proper width for the public necessities at the locus in quo, the grade was a proper grade, and too much earth was not excavated. But, the public officers charged with doing the work cut the land at the extreme sides of the street perpendicularly, in a manner which would cause the adjoining land of C. to cave into the street, and subject him to expense and damage. On a bill filed by C. to restrain such officers from excavating in such manner, on the ground that they were doing the work without reasonable care, because they were not either providing a proper slope in the 50 feet width, or building a retaining wall in such width at their own expense: Held, that they had the right to excavate in such manner.

2. In the absence of statutory provisions, a municipal corporation or its agents are not liable for the consequential damage which is necessarily done, in the exercise of reasonable care, to adjoining land not taken for public use, in the execution of a public work imposed by the legislature upon the corporation, for the public benefit.

3. A municipal corporation may grade and change the grade of streets, from time to time, when it is necessary so to do, without protecting the earth or embankments of the adjoining proprietors, and is not liable for the consequential damage caused to them in adapting their land to the grade and protecting it.

[In equity. Bill by John H. Cheever for an injunction to restrain James A. Shedd, the superintendent of streets, and the street commissioners, of the city of Burlington, from constructing a highway in such a manner as to cause injury to complainant's land.]

Americus V. Spalding and Edward J. Phelps, for plaintiff.

Romeo H. Start and Torrey E. Wales, for defendants.

SHIPMAN, District Judge. In the year 1872, a new highway, of fifty feet in width, was duly laid out and established in the city of Burlington, by the proper court having jurisdiction over the subject, which highway said court directed should be completed on or before October 15th, 1873. The highway is 1,175 feet in length, extending from College street to Pearl street, and is an extension of a previously existing street, called Union street, so as to form a continuous street with Maiden lane, which last two named streets are also of fifty feet in width. The new street is within about fifty rods of the business centre of Burlington, a city of 18,000 inhabitants, and intersects two important streets, and will be considerably used for public travel. About —— feet in length and fifty feet in width of the land of John H. Cheever, the complainant, being a portion of a tract of several acres belonging to him, are taken for the street. The court which directed the lay out, the complainant appearing, and being heard thereon, adjudged that he was "entitled to no land damages in consequence of laying out and establishing said highway, the benefit to said Cheever's premises, through which said highway is laid out, being a full compensation for the land taken for said highway." It is necessary that said street should have the usual sidewalks, curbs and gutters which are customary in city streets, and it is fit and proper for the full accommodation of the public travel, that the whole street, including roadway and sidewalks, should be of fifty feet in width. The natural surface of the plaintiff's land, and of the other land over which this street passes, is uneven, being traversed by ravines or hollows, and by knolls or bluffs, and it was necessary, in order properly to construct the street, and to make a proper grade, that the knolls should be cut through and that the hollows should be filled. The city street commissioners, who had, by statute, the care and superintendence of the highways in the city, and whose duty it was "to make and repair all highways," in order to put the street in a proper condition for public use and travel, established a grade, which grade required three cuts on the land taken from the plaintiff, one of 168 feet in length and 10.2 feet in depth at the centre, one of 60 feet in length and 2.3 feet in depth at the centre, the third of 61 feet in length and a centre depth of 1.35 feet. The form of all the cuts was that of a knoll, sloping evenly each way. This grade is a proper one for the purposes of the street. All the earth which was taken from these cuts was used to fill the hollows in the street, but other earth could have been hauled for the same purpose from a greater distance. The street commissioners, in making these cuttings, cut down intentionally the soil and turf upon said street perpendicularly, or very nearly so, up to the extreme boundaries or lines of said street, and claimed and exercised the right to cut said highway perpendicularly up to the limits thereof. The soil is clay and quicksand, and the effect of the perpendicular excavation, unless the bank is protected, is, that the adjoining soil will slip, and be gradually sloughed off by the action of the rain and frost, until a slope has been formed sufficiently inclined to prevent further slipping. An unprotected perpendicular embankment of ten feet in height would be encroached upon, in two or three years, to an extent of five feet, before a proper slope was formed. This result has already commenced upon the land of the complainant. If the city authorities have no right to cause this incidental injury to the adjoining land, their proper course is to use only such a width as will leave a sufficient slope, or to use the entire width and build a retaining wall. If the complainant is remediless, he must grade his land in conformity with the street line, or build a retaining wall himself. A suitable retaining wall would cost $500. Grading the land would probably be less expensive, and would be more advantageous to the owner of the land, in the event of any future disposition or sale of the property. The land of the complainant which has been taken for the street, is part of a large tract belonging to the complainant, used heretofore, with the buildings upon it, as a gentleman's mansion. Where the deep cut is made, the land is not ornamented with shrubbery and shade trees, as is the case with the portion adjacent to the house. The present suit is a bill for an injunction to restrain the defendants, who are the street commissioners and the superintendent of streets, from excavating in such a manner as to cause the injury to the adjacent land which has been mentioned. The superintendent has, by the city charter, the immediate care and supervision of the streets, and his duty is to see that they are properly constructed and kept in repair. After the bill was filed, a provisional injunction was granted, which is still in force. The bill proceeds upon the idea that the defendants are acting in the premises without reasonable care.

From the preceding statement, it will be seen, that the proper authority has directed the construction of a street of fifty feet in width, and has assessed the damages which will arise to the complainant from the taking of his land, which damages include all those which are immediately incident to and consequent upon the construction of the highway. An assessment of damages is for the direct and immediate damage resulting from the laying out of the highway. The owner is to be remunerated for the land taken, for the deprivation of "any right or privilege attached to it, and for the damage done by the lay out to the land connected with that which is covered by the highway, and of which it was a part." Clark v. Saybrook, 21 Conn. 313. When a part only of the land of the owner is taken for a public work, the damage which will necessarily result, from the use of the part which is taken, to the land which is not occupied by the public, is to be estimated. When the remaining land is separated by the new highway from outbuildings, or from a supply of water, or is left in unsalable condition, or unfit for occupancy, or is divided by high embankments which cause inconvenience, the effect of these and similar circumstances, and the effect which the appropriation will have in benefitting the remaining land, are to be taken into consideration in the estimate of damages. In the case of a new highway, the general grade which must be adopted, so as to conform to the existing grade of connecting streets, and so as to make a convenient highway, are obvious to the appraisers of damages, who inspect the premises and can see the injury and the special benefit which the opening of a highway must necessarily cause to the whole land. The presumption is, that the appraisal is for the value of the property taken and the damage which will specially result to the residue by such taking. But, it is truly said, that the appraisal assumes and presupposes that the highway is to be constructed with reasonable care, and if, "for want of reasonable care and skill in the construction of such work, unnecessary damage is caused, it is not warranted by the right of eminent domain." Sprague v. Worcester, 13 Gray, 195. Consequential damages which result to the remaining land, from want of reasonable care in the construction of the highway, are not included in the estimate of damages. It is contended that this highway was not constructed with reasonable care, by reason of the fact that it was excavated upon the extreme limits of the land taken, so as to cause the adjoining land to be deprived of its lateral support, and so as to inflict an actionable injury.

In order to determine whether reasonable care has been taken, it becomes necessary to consider the powers which municipal corporations possess in regard to the construction of highways, and in regard to the grade, and the alterations in the grade, of streets, whereby a consequential injury is caused to adjoining land. The defendants are public officers, and the duty has been imposed upon them by the legislature, of making and constructing highways in the city of Burlington. The law, while it imposes this duty upon public officers, also requires them to construct public works so as not wantonly or maliciously to injure adjoining proprietors, and so as to cause no unnecessary damage. They are not exempted from the obligation to use reasonable care. Mersey Dock Cases, 11 H. L. Cas. 713. The work must be done in such a reasonable and proper manner as to cause no damage which is not necessarily incident to the prosecution of the work. Thus, municipal corporations are required to build highways over water-courses in such a manner as not unreasonably to set the water back upon adjoining proprietors. Although a strip of land of seventy-five feet in width should be condemned to be taken for a street, yet, if the whole width should be excavated so as to injure adjoining proprietors, when a strip of fifty feet would amply accommodate the public needs, and such damage was not necessarily incident to a reasonable performance of the public work, such an excavation would be an unreasonable exercise of power. If the public officer "should abuse his authority, by digging down or raising up where it might not be necessary for the reasonable repair and amendment of the road, he would be amenable to any suffering party for his damages." Callender v. Marsh, 1 Pick. 418. The public work should not be planned and should not be executed so as to inflict unnecessary damage; and, therefore, if a work is carried on in such a manner as unduly to injure the adjoining proprietor, the prosecution of such a work may be restrained by a court of equity.

But, the principle seems also to have been established, that, in the absence of statutory provisions, a municipal corporation or its agents are not liable for the consequential damage which is necessarily done, in the exercise of reasonable care, to adjoining land not taken for public use, in the execution of a public work imposed by the legislature upon the corporation, for the public benefit, although an individual who executes such an improvement upon his own land for his private benefit, might strictly be liable for such consequential injury. Sutton v. Clarke, 6 Taunt. 29; Boulton v. Crowther, 2 Barn. & C. 703; Mersey Dock Cases, 11 H. L. Cas. 713; Smith v. Washington, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 135; Radcliff v. Brooklyn, 4 Comst. [4 N. Y.] 195; Callender v. Marsh, 1 Pick. 418; O'Connor v. Pittsburgh, 18 Pa. St. 187; Hollister v. Union Co., 9 Conn. 436; Reynolds v. Shreveport, 13 La. Ann. 426; Murphy v. Chicago, 29 Ill. 279; Richardson v. Vermont Cent. R. Co., 25 Vt. 474. This doctrine is based upon the theory, that the act is done in the discharge of a duty which is imposed by the supreme power of the state upon the municipal corporation, and is done for the public benefit and not for private emolument. It is absolutely necessary for the public accommodation that streets should be raised and lowered. "Streets cannot be opened and kept in repair, or made safe or convenient for public use, without being made level, or as nearly so as the nature of the ground will permit. Hills must be cut down and hollows filled up, or in other words, the road must be 'graded' or 'reduced to a certain degree of ascent or descent,' which is the proper definition of the verb 'to grade.' If the duty imposed on the corporation requires this to be done, the power must be co-extensive with the duty." Smith v. Washington, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 148. This work, especially in a city, where population is crowded and land is valuable, will cause some damage to adjoining proprietors, and inflict hardship upon individuals. Such damage, when it has not been caused unnecessarily, is "damnum absque injuria," from the fact that the work which causes the damage is for a public benefit, and "private interests must yield to public accommodation. One cannot build his house on the top of a hill in the midst of a city, and require the grade of the street to conform to his convenience, at the expense of that of the public." Smith v. Washington, cited supra.

It is not intended that this principle should be considered as applicable to the acts of private corporations who are authorized by the legislature to construct works of a public character, such as canals or railroads, for, although such corporations are empowered to take land, upon the ground that the taking is for the public use, and although the works are to be used by the public, yet they are constructed primarily for the benefit and emolument of the private corporations who have them in charge, and who are not public agents. Hooker v. New Haven & Northampton Co., 15 Conn. 312.

In the application of these principles to the present case, it is to be observed, that it has been found that a street of fifty feet in width was a fit and proper width for the public necessities, at the place where the street was constructed, that the grade was a proper grade, and that, owing to the unevenness of the land, all the soil which was taken from the cuts was necessarily used to fill the hollows. The city was not, therefore, using an unnecessary or unreasonable quantity of land, or excavating too much earth. But, it is urged, with great force, that the defendants were not constructing the street with reasonable care, in this, that they were cutting the land at the extreme limits of the street perpendicularly, the inevitable effect of which method of construction is to cause the adjoining land to cave into the street, and to subject the owner to expense and damage; that, if an individual or private corporation excavates in such a manner that the adjacent land is deprived of the lateral support of the soil, and of adequate protection, such private person or corporation inflicts thereby an actionable injury upon the adjoining proprietor, and that, if the city desired to use their entire fifty feet of land, when such use caused an injury to the complainant, they should prevent the injury by building, at their own expense, a retaining wall, and the neglect to provide a protection is a want of reasonable care.

While all the decisions admit the doctrine that a public work must be constructed with reasonable care, the question of the extent of authority which a municipal corporation can exercise in respect to the grade of streets, whereby a consequential damage is caused to adjoining land, has been frequently before the courts. The strong weight of authority in this country is to the effect that such a corporation is authorized to grade and change the grade of streets from time to time, when it is necessary so to do, without protecting the earth or embankments of the adjoining proprietors, who are often subjected to expense in adapting their land to the grade, and in protecting their property from the consequential damage which is incident to the lowering of the street. The injury which is done to adjoining proprietors most frequently results from the changes of grade which become necessary, as a city increases in population and business, and the needs of the public become more urgent, but not unfrequently results from the original grade upon which the street is constructed. Necessary grades and changes of grade are constantly being made in our cities, under the power to construct and repair streets, with no protection of the adjoining soil, by the municipal authorities, and such exercise of authority has been, with some exceptions, sustained by the courts of the different states. The justification has been upon the principle which has already been stated, viz., that a public officer is justified in inflicting consequential damage in the necessary prosecution of a public work imposed by the legislature upon a municipal corporation and prosecuted for the public benefit. The leading authorities have already been cited.

It may be said, that nearly all of the decisions which have been quoted refer to the regrading, or alteration of the grade, of a street. But, if there is no duty upon a city to protect the landowners against the consequences of a new excavation which is made after the street has been constructed, and after it has been long used, it is difficult to see why another standard or rule should be imposed when the street is first made passable for the public, and is to be brought to a proper level.

Although I am impressed with the seeming injustice and hardship of a method of constructing and repairing streets which throws upon the individual proprietor, if he has not been compensated for this consequential injury, a burden which would be onerous for the corporation to bear, I am constrained by the decisions of courts whose opinions are justly entitled to great weight, to hold, that a municipal corporation can properly construct and repair streets in this manner. It follows, that the defendants were constructing this street with the ordinary care which the law demands.

Let the bill be dismissed, without costs.

NELSON v. SAME.

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. April 1, 1875.

NATIONAL BANKS IN DEFAULT—INTEREST ON CLAIMS—REMEDY OF DEPOSITOR.

1. Where a national bank is declared in default by the comptroller of the currency, and a receiver of it is appointed by him, under the fiftieth section of the act of June 3, 1864 (13 Stat. 115), and a sufficient fund is realized from its assets to pay all claims against it and leave a surplus, the comptroller ought to allow interest on the claims, during the period of administration, before appropriating the surplus to the stockholders of the bank.

[See, also, Nat. Bank of Commonwealth v. Mechanics' Nat. Bank, 94 U. S. 437.]

2. An action of assumpsit, by the holder of a claim against the bank, to recover such interest, will not lie against the receiver of the bank, or against the comptroller of the currency, but will lie against the bank.

3. In such an action, interest is recoverable upon all demands originating in contracts conditioned for the payment of interest, and on all demands for money due and unpaid, by way of damages for the non-payment, after such demands became due.

4. Interest is recoverable on a balance due a depositor in such bank, although he has made no formal demand of payment.

WALLACE, District Judge. It is stated by counsel, that these actions are brought to determine whether, when the comptroller of the currency has declared a national bank in default, and appointed a receiver under the provisions of the act under which such banks are organized, and a sufficient fund is realized from the assets to pay all claims against the bank and leave a surplus, the comptroller should, or should not, allow interest on the claims during the period of administration, before appropriating the surplus to the stockholders of the bank. It is to be assumed, from this statement, that the claims in question were due and payable when the comptroller took control of the affairs of the bank. If they were not, of course, no interest should be allowed upon them, except from such time as they may have become due, unless they were for demands conditioned for the payment of interest.

The equity of the creditors to receive interest on their claims for the time during which they have been precluded from receiving their principal, is obvious. On general principles, and by adjudications in point, their right is clear. Interest is allowed not only on strict legal grounds, where there is a contract for the payment of interest, or by way of damages, where there is a wrongful detention of a debt, but upon considerations of equity and natural justice, which always arise where a party is entitled to a payment of money and cannot obtain it, except by resort to a fund created by operation of law, the distribution of which is attended with delay. It is upon this ground that, when, by statute, preference is given to one class of creditors over another, in the distribution of an estate, the preference includes interest on the preferred class of claims. In re Shultz, 11 Serg. & R. 182.

There is nothing in the provisions of the act under which this fund is to be distributed in conflict with this general rule. While the comptroller is not directed, by express terms, to allow interest to creditors, the act contains no language which, in terms, or by implication, prohibits him from doing so. The fiftieth section of the act of June 3, 1864 (13 Stat. 115), authorizes him, on becoming satisfied that an association has made default in the payment of any of its circulating notes, to appoint a receiver of its affairs, and place him in possession of its assets. The receiver is required to pay over all moneys realized from the assets to the treasurer of the United States, subject to the order of the comptroller, and it is the duty of the comptroller, from time to time, to make ratable dividends from such moneys, upon "all such claims as may have been proved to his satisfaction, or adjudicated in a court of competent jurisdiction," and to distribute the remaining proceeds among the stockholders. His position in reference to the distribution of the fund confided to him is analogous to that of an assignee of an insolvent estate, or an administrator of the estate of a deceased person. Where an insolvent law provides that, after the payment of all debts proved, the assignee shall pay any surplus to the debtor, or his legal representatives, the creditors are entitled to interest on their debts during the period of administration, and without regard to the fact whether the debts are those upon contract conditioned for the payment of interest, or not. Brown v. Lamb, 6 Metc. [Mass.] 203; Atlas Bank v. Nahant Bank, 3 Metc. [Mass.] 581. Claims proved to his satisfaction are to be paid by the comptroller, as debts proved against an insolvent are to be paid by his assignee; and, in the one case as in the other, the interest is an incident of the debt or claim, and to be paid before distribution of the surplus.

Thus far the general question of liability for interest has been considered. It remains to consider other questions presented by the record, which are necessary to the proper determination of these actions in the form in which they have been brought. In each action the complaint counts in assumpsit, and a general demurrer has been interposed, alleging that the complaint does not state sufficient facts to constitute a cause of action. The practice of the courts of this state now prevails in actions at law in this court, and, by that practice, judgment may be rendered for or against one or more of several defendants.

It is clear, that this action cannot be maintained against the receiver or the comptroller. The receiver has no control over the assets, except to pay their proceeds to the treasurer of the United States, and would, therefore, not be liable to the plaintiff in any form of action. If an action could be maintained against the comptroller, it would be one to enforce a proper distribution of the fund, and, for this purpose, the action of assumpsit is not an appropriate remedy. As against these defendants, therefore, no cause of action is alleged in the complaint, and, as to them, the demurrer is well taken, and judgment must be ordered in their favor. As against the defendant the National Bank of the Commonwealth, the demurrer must be overruled. The corporation continues to exist for the purpose of being sued, notwithstanding the comptroller has intervened pursuant to the provisions of the act under which it was organized; and demands against it can be prosecuted to adjudication in any court of competent jurisdiction. Bank of Bethel v. Pahquioque Bank, 14 Wall. [81 U. S.] 383. In such an action interest is recoverable upon all demands originating in contracts conditioned for the payment of interest, and on all demands for money due and unpaid, by way of damages for the nonpayment after such demands became due. It is urged, that interest is not recoverable upon debts against the bank, because it has been prevented by law and by superior authority from paying the principal. It is a sufficient answer to this argument to say, that this proposition is not applicable, because the bank, by its own default, subjected itself to the proceedings of the comptroller, and it does not lie with the bank to assert any exemption from liability by reason of its own acts or defaults.

In one of these cases, a portion of the plaintiff's demand is for a balance due upon deposits made in the ordinary way with the bank, and it does not appear that any demand was made for the amount until a long time after the receiver had taken possession. Ordinarily, an action cannot be maintained by a depositor, against a bank, until a formal demand has been made; and, of course, no interest can be recovered except that arising after the demand. The bringing of an action does not amount to a demand, in such cases. Payne v. Gardiner, 29 N. Y. 146. But, if the bank, by words or conduct, denies the depositor's right to his balance, it becomes presently liable to an action, without formal demand, and interest would be recoverable, as damages. All the facts are set forth in the complaint, which justified and led to the action of the comptroller. The bank, by its default, initiated proceedings which resulted in a transfer of the moneys of its depositors to a receiver, and thus put it out of its own power to pay its depositors, when called upon to do so. A demand, under such circumstances, would have been an idle ceremony. The bank cannot be permitted to say that the depositor should have made a demand, when, if made, it would have been nugatory and useless. It has been held, that, in cases of insolvency, where a debt is payable on demand, and no special demand is shown, interest is to be computed from the first publication of the proceedings in insolvency. Brown v. Lamb, 6 Metc. [Mass.] 203. Reason and analogy favor the application of the rule to the present case. Judgment is accordingly ordered for the plaintiff in each action, as against the bank.

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. March 19, 1842.

IMPRISONMENT OF BANKRUPT ON EXECUTIONS—EFFECT OF DISCHARGE—HABEAS CORPUS—ATTACHMENT UNDER MESNE PROCESS — EFFECT OF DECREE OF BANKRUPTCY.

1. One who has been declared a bankrupt is not entitled, as of course, to be discharged from imprisonment under an execution which issued and was served upon him, and under which he was committed, before the petition in bankruptcy was filed.

2. But, when the bankrupt has obtained his certificate of discharge, he is entitled to be released from imprisonment for the debt by the district court of the United States, and also by the state courts.

3. Whether the certificate of discharge relates back to the time of the commencement of the proceedings, and renders an intermediate imprisonment unlawful, thereby founding an action for false imprisonment,—quaere.

4. All attachments of the property of the bankrupt upon mesne process, after the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy, are avoided by the decree of bankruptcy; the property of the bankrupt being devested out of him, and vested in the assignee, when appointed, by mere operation of law.

5. Whether the bankrupt obtains a certificate of discharge or not, the property passes to the assignee, and is distributable among his creditors.

6. An attachment upon property under mesne process, is not, in the strict sense of the law, a lien on the property, although it bears a resemblance to it.

7. When a bankrupt is confined in close custody, he may be produced in court, by a writ of habeas corpus, whenever his presence is necessary for further proceedings in bankruptcy, before the court or a commissioner thereof.

This was a case of a petition by Jonathan H. Cheney to the district court of the United States, in which he set forth that, on the eighteenth day of December last past, he was committed to jail in the city of Boston on an execution sued out of the court of common pleas for the commonwealth of Massachusetts, holden at Boston aforesaid, in and for the county of Suffolk, by one Edward Flood, of said Boston, hair dresser; that, on the said eighteenth day of December, one Frederick Kidder, of Cambridgeport, in said district, became bail for the petitioner, and that afterwards, to wit, on the first Tuesday of March instant, the petitioner was, by a decree of this honorable court, declared to be bankrupt, on his petition, duly filed; that the ninety days, for which, by the laws of Massachusetts, poor debtors may be bailed for the jail limits, expired on Friday, the 18th of March instant, and the said Kidder then surrendered the petitioner to close jail in said Boston, wherein the petitioner was then confined; that he was and would be thereby prevented from attending to the property belonging to his creditors in bankruptcy, and rendering any assistance to his assignee, or preparing for his own examination, as by law is required. Whereupon, he prayed to this honorable court that such relief might be granted to him as should to the court seem fitting to his case, and, moreover, that the keeper of the jail in Boston, and the sheriff of the county of Suffolk, and his deputies, as well as the said Flood, be by said court ordered to discharge said petitioner, or cause said petitioner to be discharged, from said confinement and jail, and that the petitioner might have such further and other relief, in law and equity, as to this honorable court might appear meet. Upon hearing the petition, the district court passed a decree that the following questions be adjourned into the circuit court of the United States, to be there heard and determined, namely: "Whether the said sheriff and his deputies, and the keeper of the said jail and the said Flood, or any or either of them, shall be ordered to discharge the said Cheney from confinement in said jail; and whether any and what other relief shall be granted to the said petitioner?"

Edward G. Loring, for petitioner.
A. H. Fiske, for creditor.

STORY, Circuit Justice. The short state of the case is this: The petitioner, Cheney, was committed to gaol on an execution issuing against him from the state court of Massachusetts, in favor of the execution creditor, Flood, on the 18th of December, 1841. On the same day he gave bond, with sureties, in conformity to the state laws, to surrender himself to close gaol within ninety days, if the execution were not otherwise discharged. On the eighth day of March, 1842, upon his petition, Cheney was decreed to be a bankrupt; and he has since been surrendered, in discharge of his bond, and is now in close gaol on the execution. The prayer of his petition is, to be discharged from his imprisonment, or to have other relief, adapted to his case, in order to enable him to act in and submit to all proper proceedings under the bankruptcy.

The question, then, turns upon this,— whether the bankrupt is, immediately upon his being decreed a bankrupt, entitled, as of course, to be discharged from imprisonment under an execution which issued and was served upon him, and under which he was committed, before the petition in bankruptcy was filed. The argument is that his personal presence and assistance are necessary to enable the assignee to wind up his affairs, as well to accomplish the purposes of the act, by enforcing his attendance and examination upon interrogatories, under the proceedings in bankruptcy. And it is said that in England, under the bankrupt system, the bankrupt is held entitled to a discharge from imprisonment on execution for a limited period, to accomplish these very objects. But it is to be taken into consideration that this authority is derived, not from general principles, but from the positive provisions of the statutes of bankruptcy. No correspondent provisions exist in our statute. And the question, therefore, is reduced to this: Whether the district court, sitting in bankruptcy, and having the full powers of a court of equity in all cases of bankruptcy, has authority, in virtue of that jurisdiction, to order the discharge of the bankrupt in this stage of the proceedings. I say in this stage of the proceedings, because it would be a very different question, if the bankrupt had obtained his certificate of discharge from all his debts; for then he would be entitled to be released by the district court, by injunction or other process, as well as by the state court upon a writ of habeas corpus, from farther imprisonment; and any subsequent imprisonment of him for the execution debt, if discharged by the certificate, would be illegal, and subject all the parties concerned therein to an action for false imprisonment. My opinion is, that no such right or jurisdiction attaches to the district court to order the discharge of the bankrupt from the execution, in the present stage of the proceedings. This is not the case of a debtor in execution under process from any court of the United States, over which the court may possess a power (I do not mean to say, that, if it were, it would, under the circumstances of the present case, make any essential distinction) to prevent its process from being used oppressively, or abused contrary to the general requirements of the laws of the United States. But, here, the execution is from the state court, and the party stands committed under that execution, and he must be treated, notwithstanding his intermediate liberty, upon giving bond, to be at large within the gaol limits, to have been upon his surrender at all times in custody, under and in virtue of that execution. A debtor in execution is not less in custody upon execution, who is at large within the prison limits, under bond for the liberty of such limits, than if he were in close custody. In each case he may commit an escape; and if he goes beyond the gaol limits, having given bond, it is an escape, which is a breach of the bond, for which he and his sureties are liable. It is not like the case of bail upon mesne process, where the debtor, although in one sense in the custody or power of his bail for the purpose of a surrender, is deemed for all other purposes lawfully at large. Certainly the courts of the United States gave no authority to intermeddle with state process, except in cases, where, either expressly, or by necessary implication, such an authority is given by law. The state sovereignty is supreme within its own sphere; and the process thereof must have full effect and operation, until displaced by some other constitutional authority, which controls or qualifies it.

Now, upon what ground can it be said, in this case, that the bankrupt has a clear title to be released from imprisonment? He has not as yet obtained any certificate of discharge from the debt, or his other debts. Non constat, that he ever will obtain such a certificate. If he never does obtain it, he must still remain liable for the debt, and be bound by the execution to satisfy it. How then can he now be entitled to be discharged from imprisonment under the execution, since the debt is not satisfied and discharged, and it rests in contingency, whether it ever will be by any proceedings under the bankruptcy? The case is not so strong as that of an arrest in execution, issued after the proceedings in bankruptcy have commenced, and are in progress; and yet it might not perhaps, in such a case, make any difference in the application of the doctrine, unless, indeed, where the bankrupt was at the time of the arrest in attendance upon the court, or going to or returning from the court; for then, like the parties and witnesses in common suits in other courts, the bankrupt would be entitled to the common privilege and protection granted by law to all such persons, eundo, morando, et redeundo. The case, too, is not affected by the same considerations as apply to attachments of the property of the bankrupt, made after the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy upon mesne process, or upon execution; for in such cases, clearly upon principle (whatever may be the rule in cases of prior attachments, on which I give no opinion), all such attachments are avoided by the decree in bankruptcy, by relation from the time of filing the petition; and all the property then possessed by the bankrupt is divested out of the bankrupt and vested in the assignee, when appointed, by mere operation of law, from the same period. And it is wholly immaterial, as to the invalidity of such attachments, whether the bankrupt subsequently obtains a certificate of discharge or not, since in either event the property is divested out of him and passes to the assignee, and is distributable among his creditors. The attachment cannot and ought not to be permitted to create any obstruction to the full exercise of the powers and authorities of the courts in bankruptcy over the property; and the court may by injunction prohibit any interference of the officer and attaching creditor therewith. An attachment upon property under mesne process is not, indeed, in the strict sense of the law, a fixed lien on the property, although it may in some respects bear an analogy or resemblance to it. It is but a mode of executing process, giving contingent rights and contingent interests, and liable to be affected or displaced by many other subsequent operations. But from the moment a petition in bankruptcy is filed, the property of the bankrupt is, in contemplation of law, surrendered by him to the custody of the court; and the court will not permit its rights or duties or functions in regard to it to be interfered with or controlled by private creditors.

But it is asked, how, if the bankrupt is confined in close custody, he is to be produced in court, whenever his presence is necessary for farther proceedings in bankruptcy, before the court or a commissioner thereof? The true answer is, by a writ of habeas corpus, which the court is competent to grant, in virtue of its general powers, for the purposes of justice; and when these purposes are answered, the party is, toties quoties, to be remanded to the lawful custody of the gaoler. It may be inconvenient; it may be dilatory; it may be expensive to resort to this course; but the inconvenience, if practically found to be great, may be overcome by an act of congress. At present, I do not apprehend, however, that much practical inconvenience will arise under this head. In the first place, the creditor will not be permitted to prove the debt in bankruptcy, unless he consents to discharge the bankrupt from custody; and, indeed, the fifth section of the act of congress of 1841, c. 9 [5 Stat. 444], contemplates the proving of the debt in bankruptcy to be a waiver of all right of action and suit against the bankrupt, and a surrender of all proceedings already commenced, or judgments obtained against him. It is true, that the creditor may, if he has not proved his debt in bankruptcy, under some circumstances, independently of and not governed by the statute of Massachusetts (Rev. Laws, 1835, c. 97, § 59), by a voluntary discharge of his debtor, who is in execution, from imprisonment, release his debt, unless the debtor assents to the discharge, with an agreement that it shall not be a discharge of the debt. But the debtor will rarely or never withhold such assent; and certainly the court would not aid him in withholding it. On the other hand, there is a question, which may arise upon this subject, important for the consideration of the creditor (upon which, however, I give no opinion), which is, whether, if the bankrupt should obtain his discharge, it will not relate back to the time of filing his petition, and affect all debts proved under the bankruptcy, so as to make the intermediate imprisonment of the execution debtor unlawful, and thereby found an action for false imprisonment against the creditor. This difficulty can readily be avoided by the creditor, if he chooses, either by an agreement with the debtor, or by a voluntary proof of his debt in bankruptcy.

These are the most material considerations, which appear to me to be important to suggest upon the present occasion. Upon the whole it is my opinion that the petitioner is not entitled to any discharge from imprisonment, or to any other relief, in the present stage of the proceedings in bankruptcy; and I shall order it so to be certified to the district court. Decree accordingly.

District Court, E. D. Michigan. 1879.

POWERS OF REGISTER IN BANKRUPTCY—ADJOURNMENT OF MEETING OF CREDITORS.

1. A register has power to adjourn a meeting of creditors when, in his judgment, the interest of the whole body of creditors, or of sound policy, requires it.

2. Creditors, when duly convened, have power to choose assignees—to declare dividends—to consider and act upon propositions for a composition. But it is for the register primarily, or for the district judge, on the register's certificate, to determine when and what meetings shall be held. The register's discretion in such action will not ordinarily be interfered with. A register who, against the remonstrance of the bankrupt's counsel, adjourned a composition meeting in order that creditors might be afforded the option of electing an assignee, was held to have exercised a proper discretion.

In bankruptcy. The register certifies that this cause is pending before him under a general order of reference entered on the 2d day of February last; that in obedience to such general order of reference he entered an adjudication and issued a warrant to the marshal to give notice of a meeting of creditors for the choice of an assignee on the 28th day of March; that, accompanying said general order of reference, a special order of reference was delivered to him, directing him to call a meeting of creditors for the purpose of considering a composition to be proposed by said bankrupts; that he fixed the 28th day of March for such meeting, and gave notice accordingly; that the marshal returned the warrant, certifying thereon that he had caused printed notices to be given, and "that the notices to the creditors were withheld by order of solicitors;" that he stated to the meeting it would become his duty, under the provisions of section 5033, to adjourn the meeting and direct that a new notice be given as required. He further stated that he thought there was an important object in having both meetings held at the same time, and that unless objection was made he would adjourn the composition meeting to the day to be fixed for the choice of an assignee. Mr. Moore objected on behalf of the bankrupts, and Mr. Warner on behalf of the creditor he represented. No objection was made by Mr. Campau, representing the other two creditors, unless it was to be inferred from his silence that he assented to the objection made by Mr. Moore. These objections, in his judgment, presented a question for determination by the district judge. He therefore adjourned the composition meeting to the earliest day which, as agreed by the parties, would afford time to obtain the determination of the district judge, namely, to April 1st, and the meeting for the choice of an assignee to April 17th.

G. W. Moore, for bankrupts, presented the following points:

I. (1) In this cause, a "case in bankruptcy was pending," a voluntary petition having been filed by the insolvents. (2) The debtors filed a petition for a composition, and had called a meeting, in accordance with section 5103, Rev. St. (3) On receiving this petition the register, solely of his own motion, assumed the right to make, and had entered, an adjudication upon said petition, and called a meeting for the election of an assignee in the cause to be held the same day as composition meeting. (4) The warrant for the meeting to elect assignee was not served, for the reason that no deposit had been made to secure fees and costs. The marshal stating in his return, it was by order of the solicitors of the debtors.

II. At the day and hour appointed to consider the composition, the register, without request from any creditor or the debtors, refused to permit any proceedings to be had, for the reason that the warrant for the meeting for the election of an assignee had not been executed, and thereupon, solely of his own motion, proceeded to adjourn the meeting, against the objections of the debtors and creditors there represented.

To this the following objections are made by the debtors and all the creditors represented: (1) That the composition meeting and proceedings thereupon are absolute rights given by section 5103 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, the sole condition precedent being that "a case in bankruptcy shall be pending." (2) That a first composition meeting is between the creditors proving claims and the debtors, and the duty of the register is simply to preside and record the proceedings then and there had. (3) That the meeting to elect an assignee has no necessary connection with a meeting to consider composition, and the register erred in so ruling. (4) That in the absence of well-founded objection made by some creditors authorized to make it, the call for the meeting having been regular, the refusal of the register to proceed was an arbitrary exercise of an assumed power, entailing needless and injurious delays and useless costs.

By HOVEY K. CLARKE, Register:

The question whether a register has power to adjourn a meeting of creditors, when, in his judgment, the interest of the whole body of creditors, or of sound policy, requires it, I should be willing to submit with the briefest possible statement of my views concerning it. I have supposed that it was unquestioned that, when presiding at a creditors' meeting, he has all the power of the court in conducting the meeting. So far as it concerns the acts which the law authorizes the creditors themselves to perform, he is simply their chairman. He takes and authenticates their votes. But when and where meetings of creditors shall be held, when they shall be adjourned, to what time, and for what reasons, these are questions which I have always supposed the creditors had no power to determine. As to these they were suitors only; not a court, as they are when electing an assignee, directing the amount of a dividend, or voting upon compositions. Questions of the order of proceeding, adjournment, and the like, primarily must be determined by the register, or, if any party requires, by the district judge, when presented to him by the register's certificate. Such has always been my practice, and so far as I know the practice elsewhere.

Other questions, however, in their practical application of much more importance than this, are presented by the issue raised before me, especially as they have been expanded by the "points" presented by Mr. Moore. These were prepared in response to my request that he should state in writing the grounds on which he denied the power of the register to adjourn the composition meeting with the object named, but they cover a wider field than I anticipated, not, however, without a proper bearing on the subject; and they require of me a fuller treatment than I supposed would be necessary when I authorized him to expect my certificate would be sent in to-day.

I have heretofore, and perhaps more than once, taken occasion to refer to what may be deemed the administrative duties of a register in bankruptcy. Beyond those which may be deemed judicial duties, he is required, as I suppose, to exercise a certain degree of supervision in the conduct of proceedings before him; he is to take care, especially in the important matter of notice to creditors, by every power which the law or general orders give him, that they are duly informed of all proceedings in which their rights or interests may be involved; and that he is not precluded from taking such action as will promote or secure their interest, because such action is not asked for by the creditors who happen to be represented at the meeting. I think, therefore, that it does not strengthen the objection to the register's action in this instance that it was taken "on his own motion." This objection is first stated in the following form: "(3) On receiving this petition the register, solely of his own motion, assumed the right to make, and had entered, an adjudication upon said petition, and called a meeting for the election of an assignee in the cause to be held the same day as composition meeting."

The statement that the order of adjudication was entered on receiving the petition for the composition meeting under the provisions of section 5103, would probably not have been made if the record had been carefully examined. The adjudication was not made upon the petition for a composition meeting, but upon the general order of reference which was delivered at the same time with the special order, and which expressly directs the register to make adjudication thereon. It will further appear how unreasonable the allegation is that the call of a meeting for the election of an assignee was the assumption of a right by the register when section 5019 requires the warrant to be issued "forthwith," and general order IV. commits to the register the conduct of the proceedings.

Quite as unreasonable, I think, is the allegation that the refusal of the register to proceed to take the votes of the three creditors present upon the proposition for a composition "was an arbitrary exercise of an assumed power." The excitement of counsel must be great when he is unable to restrain the expression of such a charge as this, and with the deliberation also which putting it in writing implies; for if this was "an arbitrary exercise of an assumed power," the counsel who so charges has precluded himself from conceding that the register acted from a mistaken sense of duty. I should be sorry to think that this was intended, but I must be allowed to insist however, that if I have exceeded my duty it has been from no purpose or desire to wrong the bankrupts in this case. It so happens that I know nothing but good of either of them. I have no reason to doubt that their purpose to obtain a composition with their creditors is actuated by entirely honest motives. But I am unable to see that this should allow me to apply any other rule in the conduct of the proceedings, so far as I am able to control them, than I would apply to any and all similar cases. And this leads me to consider the reasons why I deem it important that creditors, when called to consider a proposition for a composition, shall have the alternative, if they choose to exercise it, of electing an assignee, either for the purpose of defeating the composition, or of obtaining the aid of an assignee appointed by themselves, by whose investigations they may be able to judge of the fairness of the offer. There are, however, two preliminary considerations to be noted.

1. It requires but small observation of the course of composition cases in bankruptcy, to be convinced that the positive provisions of the law for the protection of creditors against unfair or dishonest compositions are few and weak; and it therefore becomes the duty of the court to exercise not only its power but its ingenuity in conducting the proceedings, so as to afford ample opportunity for the creditor to be heard, and under circumstances which will secure to them the freest action. The court, therefore, ought not to permit a practice, if the law affords power to prevent it, which will put the creditors at a disadvantage, the key to which is held in the hands of the bankrupt.

2. It must be expected that attorneys for bankrupts will seek to gain for them all advantages possible under the law; and if they can so load the issue or present embarrassing alternatives to operate in favor of their clients, of course they will do it. That is what they are employed for; and in some cases all they are employed for. It is the business of the court, as I view it, and especially of the register, to see that no sinister advantage is allowed to either party.

With these preliminary considerations in view, I think the court never will construe the language of section 17, Act 1874 [18 Stat. 182], § 5103a, which authorizes composition proceedings in cases where an adjudication has not been had, to require the entry of an adjudication in a voluntary case to be suspended, and all the proceedings consequent upon an adjudication in such a case as directed by sections 5019, 5033, and 5034 to be stayed. The clause, "whether an adjudication in bankruptcy shall have been had or not," could only have been intended for involuntary cases, to authorize composition proceedings in the interval between the filings of a petition for compulsory bankruptcy, while its allegations were denied, and the time was running for a hearing upon them. I do not understand that even in such a case, it is a statutory right of an alleged bankrupt to have a composition meeting called. That must be in the discretion of the court. But it is going much further to affirm that, in a voluntary case, it is the right of the bankrupt to have the proceedings which the statute directs suspended--such, for instance, as the requirement to issue the warrant "forthwith"—while the composition proceedings go forward. But the claim on behalf of the bankrupts here goes beyond even this. Their solicitor claims the right to countermand the order contained in the warrant to send notice by mail to the creditors named in it. Such is the return of the marshal as it stands. Nor is it substantially changed if the return be amended to show the bankrupts only refused to furnish the marshal with necessary fees to perform the service he was required by his warrant to render. That would be only an indirect mode of accomplishing the fact just as it now stands in the return. And if the court have no other power to prevent this unauthorized interruption of the service of its process, it can at least prevent the advantage sought to be gained by such interference. How much this advantage is worth to a body of creditors—of having an alternative before them of choosing an assignee or accepting an offered composition—it may not be easy to estimate. I have seen cases where I thought it was highly appreciated; cases, too, where, by the investigation of an assignee, the composition offered was in the end accepted; another, where a proposition for a composition was withdrawn on the exhibition of opposition to it by the creditors, who immediately proceeded to the choice of an assignee, under whose management the dividend paid was more than double the composition offered. That there is an advantage to bankrupts seeking a composition to have that proposition presented by itself I am assured by the efforts made so to direct the proceedings that the meetings shall be separate; and the advantage is greatest when a composition meeting is held before the meeting for the choice of an assignee is called. There is an element of uncertainty in point of time as to when an assignee can be obtained, which operates to influence creditors to accept the composition offered, even while expressing dissatisfaction with it. I have observed that sometimes the effort to separate the meetings is attempted in one way, and sometimes in another. The saving of expense, which is alleged as the reason in this, as it has been in other cases, for holding the composition meeting first and by itself, does not strike me as entitled to the force which is assumed for it. That expense in this case, in addition to that actually incurred by a partial service of the warrant, would have been from eight to ten dollars. I am persuaded that attorneys for bankrupts seeking composition see, as I do, the advantage of this method of procedure. It is an advantage properly, perhaps, within their professional duty to their clients to gain if they can; as it is, in view of what I think to be the evils of it, and, as I understand my duty, to prevent it if I can, I am not sorry that the question has been presented, that the practice may be settled in this district; and that all officers of the court may be informed whether or not it is competent for them to accept from the attorneys of a bankrupt directions as to the manner of performing duties specifically directed by the statute or by the general or special orders of the court.

BROWN, District Judge. I think the register presents strong reasons why the ordinary proceedings in bankruptcy should not be stayed on account of the pendency of a petition for a composition. The cases of In re Proby [Case No. 11,439], and In re Holmes [Id. 6,632], are authorities for holding that the register has power to adjourn a meeting, and, in view of the facilities for fraud afforded by composition proceedings, I am not disposed to deny the power or interfere with the discretion of the register in directing a meeting at which the creditors may exercise their option of accepting a composition or electing an assignee.

In issuing a warrant "forthwith," the register simply obeyed the mandate of the law (section 5019), and I am loth to say that the bankrupt may defeat the election of an assignee, and at the same time compel the creditors to pass upon the propriety of a composition, by neglecting to provide for the expense of serving the warrant.

There may be cases where the absence of all suspicious circumstances, and the probable rapid depreciation of property, may suggest to the register the propriety of overlooking the mistake of counsel, and of holding the composition meeting before the general meeting called for the election of an assignee, but I would not interfere with his discretion in that regard. The order and opinion of the register are affirmed.

[3 Wash. C. C. 359.][1]

Circuit Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. April Term, 1818.

ATTACHMENT—PLEA IN ABATEMENT — ACTION ON PROMISSORY NOTE—DEFENSES — CONTRACT FOR SALE OF GOODS — PERFORMANCE—WARRANTY—REMEDIES FOR FRAUD.

1. The defendant cannot plead a foreign attachment, levied by him in his own hands, in bar to an action against him, by the defendant in the attachment, so as to set off damages against the plaintiff; he must plead the attachment in abatement. If judgment be obtained in the attachment levied in his hands, he may offset the amount.

2. In an action upon a promissory note, where the plea is non assumpsit, the defendant cannot give evidence of damages sustained by a breach of the contract upon which the note was given.

3. Upon a Canton contract to deliver teas, the quality of the sample chests to be selected by A; If A select and accept of chests of an inferior quality, in performance of the contract, there is an end to the warranty; and the Hong merchant could only be liable for a fraud, in imposing on the defendant teas apparently of a particular quality, but actually inferior. He could not be bound to deliver the selected teas, which might be very inferior, and bound also to deliver teas of a better quality.

[1] [Originally published from the MSS. of Hon. Bushrod Washington, Associate Justice of the supreme court of the United States, under the supervision of Richard Peters, Jr., Esq.]

4. If the teas selected by A, were afterwards changed, the buyer was at liberty to rescind the contract, and refuse to take the teas, as soon as the fraud was discovered—even at Amsterdam, the place of their sale; and to recover back what had been paid; and also to refuse payment of the note given on the contract, on the ground of a failure in the consideration of the note; or he might affirm the contract, and claim damages.

The declaration contained three counts: 1, On a promissory note, subscribed by the defendant [William Jones], dated 26th November, 1805, at Canton, by which he promised to pay the plaintiff, by the name of Mr. Cheongwo, 9,102 dollars, for value received, in teas, twenty months after date; and if not paid at maturity, to pay at the rate of one per cent. per month interest, until paid: 2, goods sold and delivered: 3, an account stated. The defendant pleaded non assumpsit and payment, with leave to give in evidence, the following special matters: 1st. Failure of consideration; the goods for which the note was given, not having been delivered in quality according to contract: 2. A foreign attachment issued by the defendant against the plaintiff, in this court, to October sessions, 1811.

The defendant offered evidence to prove that he had sustained damages, by a breach of the plaintiff's warranty, of the quality of the teas, which constituted the consideration of the note; as well as for 8,000 dollars, paid to him when the note was given; and also, that the teas sold to him by the plaintiff, had not been delivered to him; but the plaintiff had delivered another parcel of an inferior quality. This evidence was rejected by the court, as inadmissible upon the pleadings, as damages could not be proved to have been sustained by a breach of the plaintiff's warranty, in order that the same might be offset against the note. The court stated, that in the case of Graigle v. Notnagle [Case No. 5,679] the only question decided by the court was, that a creditor might lay a foreign attachment in his own hands, and might proceed to obtain a judgment. There is no doubt but that this judgment might be pleaded in bar, by way of offset, or might be given in evidence, on notice. But the attachment itself cannot be pleaded in bar. Where it is pleaded by a garnishee, in a suit depending against him, it must always be in abatement. As the defendant could not, upon the general issue, give evidence of damages sustained by the plaintiff's breach of contract, in diminution of the debt for which the suit is brought, so neither can he be allowed to give such evidence, under his plea of foreign attachment. The parties then filed an agreement, in writing, that the defendant should be at liberty to give the evidence offered; and that the jury might deduct the amount of damages to which they might think him entitled, from the debt, for which suit was brought.

It appeared in evidence, that some time in November, or. December, 1805, the plaintiff entered into a verbal agreement with the defendant, then at Canton, that he would furnish him with 800 quarter chests of tea, one-half to be hyson skin, and the other congo, at stipulated prices; the quality of which should correspond with the samples which should be selected by Edward Gray, the defendant's supracargo, who should be the judge thereof; and upon his selection of the samples, the contract was to be carried into effect. Muster chests were accordingly sent to Mr. Gray, who, after examination, made his selection; and he declares, that he considered the quality of the samples to have been excellent. He afterwards examined and marked the chests, in the plaintiff's packing-house; and he states, that the qualities of the teas so examined, were excellent. The plaintiff delivered on board of the Eugenia, the number of quarter chests of tea stipulated by the above agreement to be furnished, which were carried to Amsterdam, and placed, in the usual manner, in the warehouses of the Asiatic Company, for sale; and which were disposed of at the public sales of the company, which took place in 1807. Mr. Gray stated, that he saw the teas at Amsterdam, when they were inspected by the servants of the company, and that their quality was most infamous. The hyson teas, in particular, were black, and the quality so inferior, that he thought they would not have sold in the United States for the duties. He was clearly of opinion, that the teas delivered on board the Eugenia, were not the same with those which he had examined and marked in the packing-house of the plaintiff. The boxes he believed to have been the same; but from the difference in the quality and size of the leads, which at Amsterdam were too small for the boxes, he was satisfied that the teas had been changed. It appeared from the public sales, made by the Dutch Company, in 1807, of different cargoes of teas, that the defendant's teas sold at prices very far below those of other teas of similar denominations, and of the best qualities. In 1807, Mr. Gray returned to Canton, and stated to the plaintiff the bad quality of the defendant's teas. The plaintiff entered into a written agreement, reciting this representation by Mr. Gray, of the bad quality of the teas; and promising to settle with the defendant, upon the same terms that other respectable houses at Canton had done; and, in case of a difference of opinion between the parties, to submit the same to arbitration. Mr. Gray, who was personally a sufferer by the bad quality of teas he had purchased from the plaintiff, effected a settlement at the same time with the plaintiff, upon the principle, as was contended by the defendant's counsel, of being allowed the difference between the sales of his teas, and those of other teas, of the same denomination and quality of the teas stipulated to be delivered. This was denied by the plaintiff's counsel; and no settlement was effected by Mr. Gray, relative to the defendant's teas. It was proved, on the part of the plaintiff, that the quality of the tea crop, of 1805, was generally indifferent; and that the contract between these parties, was made at a very late period of the season, when the market was much exhausted. A witness, examined on the part of the plaintiff, also stated, that he had lived at Canton for ten years, and that it was very difficult for a person who had not, for a length of time, resided in China, to judge of the qualities of teas. That instances had sometimes occurred, of a few chests of teas being changed on board the Hong boats, by the mariners; but that he had never heard of an instance of a cargo being changed by the merchant who had sold it. The witness who testified to these facts, had been extensively engaged in business at Canton.

Rawle and Gibson, for plaintiff.

Mr. Binney, C. J. Ingersoll, and Mr. Dallas, for defendant.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice (charging jury). This is an action on a note of hand given at Canton, the signature of which is acknowledged by the defendant. But his counsel place his defence upon the two following grounds: 1st. That the consideration for which the note was given, was 800 quarter chests of tea, designated and marked, lying in the plaintiff's warehouse, which the plaintiff undertook to deliver on board of the Eugenia. That these chests were not delivered; but a different parcel of teas, not purchased by the defendant, were substituted, and put on board of the vessel. 2d. That if the identical teas, purchased by the defendant, were delivered, still they did not correspond in quality, with the samples selected by Mr. Gray; and, therefore, the defendant claims damages, for the breach of the warranty, to be offset against this note.

(The judge here stated the evidence in relation to the contract at large.)

Upon this evidence, it may not be improper, at this time, to make two general observations: 1st. That a Canton contract, for the purchase and delivery of teas, is always understood to mean, a delivery on board of the vessel which is to transport them, at Wampoa, or wherever the vessel is lying in the river. This not only results from the peculiar situation of the contracting parties, but is known to be the common understanding; and was so proved by a witness, who was examined, and who was well qualified to testify on the subject. 2d. The other observation is, that Gray was appointed by the parties the judge of the samples, with which the cargo was to correspond; but having made the selection, his judgment as to the correspondence of the cargo with the samples, was not to bind either of the contracting parties. This observation is made, in answer to an argument urged by one of the defendant's counsel.

If the argument in support of the first point, made by the defendant's counsel, be well founded, then it is immaterial whether the teas delivered on board of the Eugenia, corresponded with the samples or not. The complaint is not that the quality of these teas was inferior to that of the sample; but that the identical teas, purchased by the defendant, and for which this note was given in part payment, never were delivered. But what part of the contract, bound the plaintiff to deliver any particular parcel of teas? The agreement was to deliver teas, which should correspond in quality and denomination with the selected samples; and if he did that, his warranty was fulfilled. If he did not, then he exposed himself to a claim for damages, for his failure. But he did not stipulate to deliver such teas as Mr. Gray might select; and there is no proof, that the teas selected and marked by Gray, in the packing-house, were the identical chops to which the selected samples belonged. All that is stated on this subject, is, that the teas so selected and marked, were of excellent quality. There is no doubt but that Mr. Gray might, as the agent of the defendant, if empowered to bind the defendant by the act, accept of the particular chests, which he marked, as a performance of the plaintiff's contract. But, in that case, there would be an end to the warranty; and the plaintiff could only be liable for a fraud, in imposing upon the defendant teas apparently of a particular quality, but really of a different and inferior quality. It would be monstrous to say, that he was bound to deliver the teas which Mr. Gray might select, and which might be very inferior to the samples; and that he was also bound to deliver teas of a better quality, or to answer for the consequences. If Gray's selection did not bind the plaintiff, the teas which he did select, were not the identical teas sold, and for which this note was given; and the plaintiff was therefore at liberty, notwithstanding the selection, to deliver other teas more correspondent, in his own opinion, with the quality of the samples. If the plaintiff was bound by Gray's selection, then he was unquestionably discharged from his warranty; because the teas were accepted in performance of the contract. The claim asserted, to the chests selected, and the claim for damages, for not delivering on board of the Eugenia teas of a particular quality, are totally inconsistent and inadmissible.

But, admit that the plaintiff was bound to deliver the teas which were selected and marked, is the evidence such as ought to satisfy the jury that these teas were afterwards withdrawn from the chests, and other teas substituted? This is a fact of which the jury must judge, upon the evidence given on each side. Mr. Gray does not state that he examined all the chests, either at Canton or Amsterdam; nor does it appear in what manner he examined them. Whether he could decide with accuracy as to the size of all the leads, without having had the boxes emptied of their contents, is a question for the consideration of the jury. As a further evidence of the incorrectness of the memory, as well as of the judgment of this witness, in relation to the alleged change of the teas, the plaintiff's counsel rely upon the testimony of Mr. Bleight, who deposes, that, in the course of the ten years he resided at Canton, he never heard of an instance of such a fraud being committed, either by one of the Hong, or by any out-door merchant. Should the jury, however, be satisfied, that the teas were selected by the defendant's agent, and were afterwards changed, the next inquiry is, what were the defendant's rights, in consequence of these acts, and how did he exercise them?

There can be no question, but that it was competent to him to rescind the contract, and to refuse to take the teas, even at Amsterdam, as soon as the breach of contract was perceived. In that case, he might recover back the money paid to the plaintiff, and exonerate himself from the payment of this note; upon the ground taken by his counsel, that there was a failure of the consideration for which it was given. Or, if he did not choose to take this course, he might affirm the contract, and claim damages for a breach of it. Did he do any act to rescind the contract? If he meant to do so, the teas ought to have been sold at Amsterdam, as the property of the plaintiff; whereas, they were sold as the property of, and for the account of, the defendant. But this is not all. In 1807, when his agent, Mr. Gray, returned to Canton, he made no complaint to the plaintiff, that the teas were changed, nor did he ask for a return of the money which had been paid by the defendant to the plaintiff, and also, that this note might be given up; but his objections were confined to the bad quality of the teas, for which reason he demanded compensation; and the plaintiff agreed to settle with him upon the same terms that other merchants had settled similar claims. These facts are stated at large in the written agreement, signed by the plaintiff and accepted by Gray, and must, therefore, be considered as conclusive on the defendant. Thus, it appears, that the defendant never thought of rescinding the contract, nor ever charged the plaintiff with the fraud now alleged; but, on the contrary, acted throughout in a manner to affirm the contract, and to confine his claim to a compensation in damages for a breach of it. It would be too much for the court to permit him now to change his ground, and to treat the contract as one made without consideration, or of which the consideration had failed.

2. The next question is, whether the contract between the parties has been fulfilled? The contract was to deliver teas, which should correspond in quality with the samples selected by Mr. Gray. This gentleman has deposed, that the quality of the samples which he did select was excellent. This is his expression; and the jury must decide on its correct meaning, when used by merchants in describing the quality of an article, which they are about to buy or sell. In common parlance, it certainly imports a quality of a high grade, if not the highest.

The next inquiry is, what was the quality of the teas delivered? Mr. Gray has sworn, that at Amsterdam he examined them, and that the quality was most infamous. It also appears, from the sale made of these teas by the Dutch Asiatic Company, that they sold for prices very inferior to other teas of the same denomination, and of a high grade of quality. But, after all, the quality of the samples selected by Mr. Gray, and, consequently, of the 800 quarter chests, which the plaintiff warranted should correspond with the samples, must be decided by the confidence which the jury may place, not only upon the veracity of that gentleman, (which has not been questioned,) but upon the accuracy of his memory and judgment, both of which have been.

It is contended, by the plaintiff's counsel, that the teas at the Canton market, of the crop of 1805, were generally of bad quality, and that the defendant's teas were purchased when the market was nearly exhausted, which would render them still worse; consequently, that Mr. Gray must be mistaken, when he states, that the samples, and the teas which he examined in the plaintiff's warehouse, were of an excellent quality. How far these facts impeach the credit of Mr. Gray, the jury must decide. But, if they believe that the quality of the samples has been correctly stated by this witness, then the circumstances just mentioned, afford no excuse to the plaintiff for delivering teas inferior in quality to the samples. If the market would not enable him to deliver teas of that quality, he ought not to have sent these samples; and if Gray refused to select inferior samples, the contract was at an end; because it was not to be concluded until the samples were selected. But when samples of a superior quality were sent and accepted, the plaintiff agreed to deliver 800 quarter chests, to correspond with them; and he cannot excuse himself, by alleging that he was unable to comply with this contract.

If the contract has not been fulfilled, the last inquiry is, what is the compensation to which the defendant is entitled? The rule laid down by this court in former cases like the present, is, to take the differences between the prices given for the teas of the injured party, at the Dutch sales, and other teas, of the quality which, by the contract, he was entitled to have, and of the same denomination, and to make that difference the rate of the injury sustained, to be applied to the first cost of the article, at Canton; to which is to be added the premium of insurance, duties, and all other usual expenses and charges.—Thus, if the defendant's teas sold for 50 or 25 per cent. less than other teas, which would be designated as excellent, or thereabouts; the defendant is entitled to claim of the plaintiff, the same rate of this sum, which he gave for the teas at Canton, with the charges as before mentioned. The reasons for this rule are explained at large, in Gilpins v. Consequa [Case No. 5,452]; Youqua v. Nixon [Id. 18,189]; and Consequa v. Willings [Id. 3,128]. But if the parties have agreed to settle by any other rule, they are bound by it, and it is for the jury to decide, upon the testimony of Mr. Gray, taken in connexion with the agreements of the 27th November, 1807, whether any other, and what rule, was established between these parties.

As to the interest, I have only to repeat what was laid down by the court, in all the cases before mentioned, that the law does not sanction the allowance of interest upon unliquidated damages. Verdict for plaintiff.

Case No. 2,639.

The CHEROKEE.

[12 N. Y. Leg. Obs. 33.]

District Court, S. D. New York. Dec., 1353.

REMOVING TIMBER FROM PUBLIC LANDS—FORFEITURE OF VESSEL—PLEADING AND PROOF.

1. Forfeiture cannot be enforced [against a vessel, the master of which has taken on board timber removed from public lands, in violation of act of March 2, 1831 (4 Stat. 472)], except upon averment in the libel, and proof that the acts charged as a public offense were done by the master of the vessel wilfully, or with knowledge of their culpability.

2. That the confessions of the consignee of the vessel of his knowledge in the premises are not admissible to charge the offense on the owner or mate of the vessel.

3. That if such proofs could be received, it was less doubtful upon the evidence whether the portions of land upon which the timber was cut, at the time belonged to the United States, and if they did do so, whether the consignee cut or removed the same thereupon, or acquired it knowing that fact.

Charles O'Conor, Dist. Atty., for the United States.

George F. Betts, for the schooner.

BETTS, District Judge. This is a libel of information, demanding the forfeiture of the schooner for removing timber from the public lands in Florida, contrary to the prohibitions of the act of congress of March 2, 1831 (4 Stat. 472, §§ 1, 2). The first section of the act imposes a fine and imprisonment on any persons committing the offenses therein declared "on any lands of the United States, which in pursuance of any law passed, or hereafter to be passed, shall have been reserved or purchased for the use of the United States, for supplying or furnishing therefrom timber for the navy of the United States or from any other lands from the United States acquired, or hereafter to be acquired," without being authorized by order in writing, by a competent officer and for the use of the United States. The second section supplies the immediate foundation of this prosecution. It enacts, "that if the master, owner, or consignee of any ship or vessel shall knowingly take on board any timber cut on lands which have been reserved or purchased as aforesaid, without proper authority, and for the use of the navy of the United States, or shall take on board any live oak or red cedar timber cut on any other lands of the United States, or to export the same to any foreign country, the ship or vessel on board which the same shall be taken, transported or seized, shall with her tackle, apparel and furniture be wholly forfeited to the United States, and the captain or master of such vessel, wherein the same shall have been exported to any foreign country against the provisions of this act, shall forfeit and pay to the United States a sum not exceeding $1,000."

The libel consists of six counts. In the first, the cause of forfeiture is, that the master of the Cherokee knowingly took on board her without proper authority, on St. John's river, East Florida, on the 20th of June, 1851, a quantity of red cedar timber which had been cut on public lands of the United States in East Florida, reserved for supplying timber for the use of the navy, which timber had not been cut for the use of the navy, and that the same was taken on board by him with intent to transport it to New York. The second count is the same as the first, except that it does not charge that the master did the act knowingly. The third count varies from the second in averring that the master took the timber on board "with intent to export, dispose of, use or employ the same in a manner other than for the use of the navy of the United States, and in omitting the allegation that the timber was cut or taken from the land reserved," etc. The fourth, fifth and sixth counts are substantially the same with the first; the sixth averring, in addition, that the schooner sailed from Florida with the timber, and arrived with it on the 1st of July, 1851, in this port. The answer is interposed by the owners, and denies the liability of the vessel to forfeiture for the cause alleged, being in effect tantamount to a demurrer. A commission was executed in Florida and the testimony of witnesses taken under it on the part of the United States. The claimant examined the master before a commissioner out of court.

The libel does not designate the locus in quo by any more specific description than that it was some point on the St. John's river in East Florida, to the plaintiffs unknown; and it is urged that they make sufficient title to the premises under the treaty of cession by Spain of February 22, 1819 (8 Stat. 254, art. 2). But the cession is qualified upon its face. It cedes "all public lots and squares, vacant lands, public edifices, fortifications, barracks and other buildings, which are not private property." And affords full proof that the territories were occupied by a resident population, and also that grants of lands, of indefinite location and extent, had been previously made by Spain. Arts. 6 and 8. All rights of private property remained unaffected by the treaty.

The legislation of congress, and the adjudications of the United States courts from the period of cession to the present time, are judicial notice in this cause, that the United States did not become proprietors of the whole of Florida by the cession; on the contrary, that very large portions of both territories have been always claimed and occupied as private property, under title paramount to that of this government. It is, accordingly, necessary for the plaintiffs to prove that the premises from which the timber in question was cut or taken, were at the time public property.

The plaintiffs, on the hearing, and by their proofs, allege that the timber in question was taken from sections 31 and 32 of township 10 south, range 24 east. The only evidence offered to the fact is, that these lands were surveyed by the United States surveyor, and have been recently watched, occasionally, by their timber agents, to prevent trespasses, and that on the 11th of June, 1851, entries were made by an individual, of parts of two lots in each of these sections. The further proof that it is generally understood in that region of country that the United States own lands adjacent to the St. John's river or its tributaries, is too loose and indefinite to aid a claim to these particular lots.

No legal evidence, affecting the owners of the vessel is given, that the timber transported by her was taken from either of these lots. Indeed, there is no proof whatever to that fact, other than the declaration of one J. W. Pearson. It is unnecessary to criticise the version of these declarations given by different witnesses, because I hold them inadmissible to create a forfeiture of the vessel as against the interests of other parties. The vessel went out from a port in New Jersey, under a charter from the master to a Mr. Grier, and was by him consigned to Pearson to load her with a cargo of timber. The charterer accompanied the vessel. Pearson was no way the agent of the master or owners in loading the schooner. He, on his own account, supplied the timber to the charterer, without other interference by the master than his repeated warning not to put any United States timber on board. The charter contained the usual qualifications to the engagement to take a full lading, and that it should be lawful cargo. Pearson was not the agent of the owners, nor was he authorized to bind them or the vessel by his declarations or admissions. The general principle is, that the admissions of agents affect even their direct principal only when made during his continuance of the agency in regard to a transaction then depending, "et dum feret opus." 1 Greenl. Ev. (6th Ed.) § 113, and notes; Rouse, Cr. Ev. 54. Under this doctrine the declarations or admissions of the charterer himself that he received on board an unlawful cargo knowingly would not be permitted to implicate the vessel or her owners in an illicit transaction, because he had no direct or implied authority so to employ the vessel.

In this case the offense charged in the libel is, that the master committed the unlawful act, and the proof offered to support the charge is the admission of an agent of the charterer. The statute subjects a vessel to forfeiture by acts committed by her consignee; but it is doubtful if in such cases, the corpus delicti could be proved, by his declarations or confessions alone. Rouse, Cr. Ev. 37. The testimony is direct and positive that the master forbade any United States timber being laden on board, and was assured by the consignees that none of this cargo came from the public lands. I think, on these points, the defense to the libel is complete. But further, supposing the timber in question was taken from the public lands without proper authority, and that the consignee, knowing the fact, loaded it on board the vessel, and that such a transaction might subject the vessel to forfeiture, this libel is not so framed as to entitle the plaintiffs to that decree upon its allegation. The rules of pleading require libels for forfeitures to set forth distinctly the ground and causes upon which a forfeiture is demanded, and they must bring by plain averments the supposed offense within the provisions of the statute on which the action is founded. Sup. Ct. Rules Adm. 22; The Merino, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 401; The Palmyra, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 18.

The allegation is, that the offense was committed by the master, whilst the proof goes no further than to implicate the consignee in acts which would legally forfeit the vessel,—for, in my judgment the second and third counts or allegation of the libel are not within the provisions of the statute, and no decree of condemnation can be rendered on them if fully proved. These counts assume, that the offense is committed by the act of taking the timber on board and transporting it to New York, although the master was ignorant that it had been taken from public lands. I do not accede to this interpretation of the statute. The second section of the act creates two classes of offenses. The first is transporting any timber cut on the lands of the United States reserved for the use of the navy; and the other, transporting any live oak or red cedar timber, cut on any other lands of the United States. These two clauses of the sections are separated in punctuation by a semicolon: the term "knowingly" is prefixed to the first branch, and is not repeated in the second. The argument on the part of the United States is, that the offense under the second clause is consummated by the commission of the prohibited act, without regard to the scienter of the accused party. It seems to me, this construction of the law is not sanctioned by the arrangement and connection of the two sentences, nor by their general design and purport. In the first instance, where it is admitted, a scienter must be charged in the libel and proved on trial, in order to establish an offense; the prohibited act embraces live oak and red cedar equally with the other clause, for it interdicts cutting and carrying away any timber; and as it relates to lands reserved by the United States for the use of the navy, would seem much more to justify an implied notice or knowledge, in the whole community of the United States title, from the fact of such reservation for public use, than in the second instance, where no specific act need be done by the United States, beyond accepting the cession of the lands, in order to bring the lands within the protection of this statute. It must, accordingly, be far less likely that the community, as matter of fact, is apprised that sections 31 and 32 in this case, not reserved, belonged to the United States, than if they had been surveyed, reserved and set apart for the use of the navy. On this state of the facts there is a strong improbability that congress would impose the penalty of forfeiture of vessels engaged in carrying away timber which had been cut on the lands generally and unreserved, without any knowledge of or notice to, the owner, master, or consignee of the vessel, and would forbear to inflict the same penalty for the offense on lands reserved for the use of the navy, unless it be averred and proved that the owner, master or consignee of the vessel knew that the timber came from those lands, and had been obtained without proper authority. The reason of the case stands strongly opposed to such an interpretation of the law. Besides, the arrangement of the two clauses and the rules of syntax would naturally carry the qualification of "knowingly," from the first paragraph to the second, particularly considering that a common penalty was imposed in both, and in the second instance for acts committed anywhere within the two territories and irrespective of any reservation or special appropriation of the lands.

It appears to me that the government in taking to itself a protection for its lands within these territories against trespasses, higher and different from what at that day it enjoyed elsewhere in the United States, intended to exact these extreme penalties only in case of wilful depredations upon the public property; and that the forfeiture of a vessel employed in transporting timber cut on lands of the United States, cannot be enforced without proof that the wrong was done knowingly.

The libel in this case must be dismissed. First. Because the action cannot be sustained except upon the averment and proof that the acts charged as a public offense, were done by the master wilfully or with knowledge of their culpability. Second. Because the confessions of the consignee of the vessel of his own knowledge in the premises, are not admissible to charge the offense on the owner or master of the vessel. Third. Because, if such proofs could be received, it is left doubtful upon the evidence whether the portions of lots No. 31 and 32, on which the timber in question was cut, at the time belonged to the United States, and if they did so, whether Pearson, the consignee, cut or removed the timber therefrom or acquired it knowing that fact.

JOINT CAPTURE OF PRIZE—CONSTRUCTIVE CAPTURE—PRIZE ACT OF 1862—CONSTRUCTION.

Joint capture of a prize. Who are entitled to share. Co-operation in a blockade does not constitute the blockading vessels joint captors. Discussion of the English doctrine of constructive captors. Construction of the prize act of 1862 [12 Stat. 606].

In admiralty.

R. H. Dana, Jr., U. S. Atty., for the actual captor.

No counsel appeared for any other party, but suggestions were made in communications from some of the vessels claiming as joint captors.

SPRAGUE, District Judge. The steamer Cherokee and cargo were captured on the 8th of May last by the United States ship-of-war Canandaigua, and sent into this port. They have both been condemned. The question now arises, how shall the proceeds be distributed?

It is the duty of this court to determine what ships shall participate in the proceeds of a prize; but it is the province of the secretary of the navy, under the statutes, to ascertain and decide, at least in the first instance, what persons constituted the officers and crews of such ships, and the flag officer of a squadron, and the share which each shall receive. I mention this because communications have been received, founded on the erroneous supposition that this court was to decide upon the claims of individuals as flag officers or otherwise, and it is desirable that it should be known that such claims must be presented to the navy department.

Applications to be allowed to share in this prize have been presented in behalf of the following vessels: New Ironsides, Stettin.

Wamsutta, Flag, Paul Jones, Lodona, Marblehead, Huron, Powhatan, and Housatonic. Some of these applications are quite informal. But I shall treat them all as petitions duly presented. Since the decree of condemnation, the depositions of one or more of the officers of each of the above-mentioned ships have been taken. These have been examined with the other evidence in the case. It appears that the Canandaigua and the petitioning ships composed the blockading squadron off Charleston. All, excepting the Lodona, were stationed at different places immediately off the city, so as to guard the more direct approaches. The Lodona was stationed at Bull's bay, to guard that channel of communication to Charleston, and was about sixteen miles from the rest of the squadron.

On the evening of the 5th of May last, the Cherokee ran out of the port of Charleston. She was first discovered by the steamer Flag, who fired one or more guns at her, as she was passing by, and also threw up a rocket. She was then discovered by the Canandaigua, a steamer lying outside of the Flag, which immediately got under way in pursuit. This was about eleven o'clock at night. The pursuit was continued about three and a half hours, when the Canandaigua, having come within cannon range, fired a gun, and the Cherokee hove to and surrendered. The commencement of the chase was seen by several of the blockading vessels, but no one of them started in pursuit. All remained at their anchorage. Both pursuer and pursued were entirely lost sight of about one hour after the chase began; and the place where the capture was actually made was thirty-five miles from the blockading squadron. No vessel of the squadron was within signal distance of either the Canandaigua or Cherokee at the time of the capture.

All prizes made by our ships-of-war belong primarily to the United States, and any person who claims to participate therein must show a grant from the government. There have been three acts of congress making such grants: that of 1799, c. 24 (1 Stat. 715); that of 1800, c. 33 (2 Stat. 52); and that of 1862, c. 204 (12 Stat. 606). The first of these three acts remained in force about a year. Its provisions are so similar to those of subsequent acts that they need not be here recited. The fifth section of the act of 1800 says "that the proceeds of all ships and vessels, and the goods taken on board of them, which shall be adjudged good prize * * * when of inferior force, shall be divided equally between the United States and the officers and men making the capture." The sixth section provides that "whenever one or more public ships or vessels are in sight at the time any one or more ships are taking a prize or prizes, they shall all share equally in the prize or prizes." The statute of 1862 (section 2) copies the first of the foregoing provisions verbatim. But it does not preserve the phraseology of the second. In section 3 it says, "When one or more vessels of the navy shall be within signal distance of another making a prize, all shall share in the prize."

This appears to be a substitute for the corresponding provision in the act of 1800. But it is unnecessary to consider whether it be so or not, it being immaterial in the present case whether the former is superseded by the latter, or whether both may stand and be enforced together. These petitioning vessels do not come within either clause. No one of them was within either sight or signal distance of the Canandaigua when she was taking or making this prize. This is not contended for. They rest their claim wholly upon the fact that they, together with the Canandaigua, composed the blockading squadron. Does that fact bring them within the first provision of the statutes of 1800 and of 1862; which has already been quoted? The question, then, is reduced to this: Are the officers and men who were on board these vessels to be deemed "officers and men making the capture," within the meaning of the statute? That the capture was actually made by the Canandaigua when and where no other vessel was in sight or in a condition then to render any aid whatever, is certain.

Those on board the other vessels, therefore, were not actual captors. The question is, are they to be deemed captors by construction of law, by reason of their being a part of the blockading squadron? If we look only at our own statutes, the present question might be solved without much difficulty. They manifestly provide for two classes of ships:—First. Those making the capture. Second. Those within signal distance of a vessel making a capture. The second section of the act of 1862 gives one-half to the "officers and men making the capture." The third section gives a share to any vessel of the navy which "is within signal distance of another making a prize."

Thus the statute, in the first place, gives half of the prize to those making the capture, and then provides that another class shall share with them; viz., vessels not themselves making the prize, but within signal distance of those that do make it. From this it seems clear that the first class are those who actually make the capture, and that none others can participate except those provided for in the second class. This construction would be adopted without hesitation, were it not for certain English doctrines, which have been supposed by some to have a direct and even controlling application to our law. It becomes necessary to bestow some attention upon the decisions in which those doctrines are to be found.

It must be borne in mind that we are not discussing a question of general jurisprudence, or endeavoring to ascertain a rule of the unwritten law to be determined by judicial precedents or considerations of justice and policy. But we are endeavoring to ascertain the true meaning and intent of a positive legislative enactment. Of course we do not look to British decisions for any direct exposition of our own statutes, to which they can, at most, have but an indirect application. Those decisions are under the English prize acts; that is, they give construction to their own positive enactments. Now, if the language which describes those who are to share in the prize be the same in our statutes as in the British, then English decisions may have some application.

If such language of the British statutes had received a judicial interpretation, and had thus acquired a settled and well-known meaning, and our legislature had then adopted the same language, it might well be supposed that they intended it should bear the same interpretation. We must, therefore, endeavor to ascertain what was the provision of the British statutes, and how far there had been any settled and well-known construction thereof at the times when our statutes were passed.

The prize acts of 6 Anne, c. 16, 43 Geo. III. c. 160, 45 Geo. III. c. 72, and of 55 Geo. III. c. 160, give the prize to the officers and crew by whom it "shall be taken." There was a prize act in 33 Geo. III., which is noticed as expired, but not printed in the British statutes at large. There can be no doubt, however, that it gave the prize to those who should take it; for, in the year 1799, Sir William Scott, in the case of The Vryheid, 2 C. Rob. Adm. 21, says, "The act of parliament and the proclamation give the benefit of prize to the takers." In the corresponding provision in our prize acts, instead of the word "take," the word "capture" is used. I do not think that there is any difference in the import of these two words, in the connection in which they are used; and I proceed to consider the effect of the British interpretation of their statutes in the same manner as if our own had, in this first provision, adopted their language without the change of a word.

In construing their prize acts, the English courts have divided the takers or captors into two classes,—the actual captors, and the constructive captors. As to who should be deemed actual captors, there seems to have been little question. But there has been much doubt and difficulty in determining who should be permitted to share as constructive captors. Judicial decisions have admitted two classes of king's ships. The first is those in sight at the time of the capture. This rule of construction, doubtless, grew out of the difficulty of defining the limits of actual assistance by joint action or cooperation. If two ships were engaged in the combat with the enemy, it is manifest that both actually contributed to the result. So where several vessels placed themselves in such positions and proximity to an enemy's ship that she could not escape, and she struck without resistance, because resistance to such numbers would be useless, it is manifest that all were at the time directly instrumental in effecting the result. Then come cases of ships being present, or within sight, at a greater or less distance from the actual captor, creating doubts whether they gave efficient aid, or contributed in any and what degree to the capture, which doubts it would be impossible satisfactorily to solve; and to avoid them, and the litigation and uncertainty which would attend each of the numerous cases that might arise, the courts adopted a general rule that a king's ship being in sight should constitute her a joint captor by construction of law, upon the ground, that it must be presumed that the actual captor was thereby encouraged, and that the enemy was intimidated. The rule required that she should be in sight not only of the capturing ship, but also of the enemy. There were some exceptions. The Robert, 3 C. Rob. Adm. 195.

The doctrine, that a king's ship being in sight entitled her to share in the prize, was firmly established. This rule had the advantage of being well defined, and of resting on an intelligible reason. A second class of constructive captors has been introduced by judicial decisions. They are those who, not being in sight at the time of the capture, are nevertheless permitted to share in the prize by reason of some association with the actual captor.

These petitioners claim to come within this class, by reason of their being associated with the Canandaigua in the same blockading squadron. It becomes necessary, therefore, to inquire how far, at the several times when our respective prize acts were passed, there was any settled and well-known construction by which such association conferred the rights of constructive joint captors, Our earliest prize act was in 1799. That, as already stated, has been repealed. The next was in 1800. What was the state of the British adjudications at that time? There is no doubt that they recognized two classes of captors, one the actual, and the other the constructive; and that they had determined, that a vessel in sight at the time of the capture should share in the prize as constructive captor. But the question is, how far had the doctrine of association been then established? There were doubtless many decisions before that time; but, for the want of trustworthy reports, our means of ascertaining what they were are very imperfect. We have to rely mainly upon such glimpses as we obtain from fragmentary statements made by the court or counsel in the trial of subsequent cases. Of the earlier cases thus referred to, the one most in point is The Mars, decided by the lords 1760, and cited in The Vryheid, 2 C. Rob. Adm. 22. It is thus stated in a note: "This was a case of a French ship taken by one of three king's ships, which, being apprised of the design of the enemy to escape from Port au Prince, had taken their station at different outlets to intercept them. The capture was made by one ship. A claim was given on behalf of the other two, to share as joint captors, though not present at the capture; but it was rejected."

In 1800, the knowledge of previous decisions seems to have rested in a great degree, upon tradition, or upon the recollection of the judges and counsel who had been engaged in the trials. We learn something of the state of the law in 1799, by what is said by Sir William Scott in The Vryheid. After remarking that that was a case of joint capture, that is, a claim to participate as constructive captors, he says: "The court has to lament that cases of this nature are, in general, attended with much difficulty, as they depend frequently on very minute facts, on which the court has to decide between contradictory representations; and it is to be regretted that the decisions of the courts on this subject have not always been so uniform as it is highly desirable they should be." Again, on page 23, he says: "The being in sight, generally, and with some few exceptions, has been so often held to be sufficient to entitle parties to be admitted joint captors, that, where that fact is alleged, we do not call for particular cases to authorize the claim; but, where that circumstance is wanting, it is incumbent on the party to make out his claim by an appeal to decided cases, or at least to principles which are fairly to be extracted from those cases."

There does not appear to have been any decision inconsistent with that in The Mars, much less any one that could control it; and it cannot be said, that, in the year 1800, the English courts extended the doctrine of constructive capture by association to cases of blockade, much less that there was any such settled and well-known rule in that respect as to create a presumption that congress intended to adopt it, even if it had copied the provisions of the British statute. In such case, it might have been inferred that it was satisfied with the decisions that had been made in regard to ships in sight, and approved of the rule thus adopted. But its intention in this respect was not left to inference. It introduced a new provision, giving to ships in sight the rights of joint captors, thus expressly declaring how far it intended to adopt the doctrine of constructive capture, and repelling the presumption that it intended to sanction it in other cases.

But it has been said, that, previous to the passing of our prize act in 1862, the doctrine of constructive capture by association had been fully established by judicial decisions, and especially in case of blockade. There have been no such decisions in this country. No such construction, therefore, had been given to our own statutes. All the adjudications relied upon were made in England in giving a construction to their own prize acts. Those decisions require some attention.

The case of The Vryheid, which was decided in 1799, has already been referred to. The claim of a ship to share in a prize made by a fleet of which she had been a part was rejected, upon the ground that she had been temporarily detached upon a separate service before the chase began. There are subsequent decisions to the same effect. See The Island of Trinidad, 5 C. Rob. Adm. 92.

In The Fortsigheid, 3 C. Rob. Adm. 315, 316, the ship-of-war Director being one of a fleet which was blockading the Texel, was sent to look out, and, while out of sight of the rest of the fleet, made the capture. "The captured ships were not seen by the fleet till they were in the possession of the actual captor." Sir William Scott decided that the whole fleet was entitled to share in the prize. This decision was on the 17th of June, 1801.

On the same day, in another case, The Harmonie, 3 C. Rob. Adm. 318, it appeared "that the Scorpion and the Fox were sent by Captain M'Doual, commander of a squadron employed in the blockade of the Texel, as small vessels that drew less water, to cruise for the purpose of keeping up the blockade nearer in upon the coast, where large ships could not safely venture on account of the shoals. It was admitted that the capture was made ten leagues from the fleet, after a chase of three or four hours, and completely out of sight." Sir William Scott held that the fleet were constructive joint captors.

In the Genereux, decided by the lords in 1803, referred to by the court and counsel in The Guilliaume Tell, Edw. Adm. 9, 16, the capture was made by the Foudroyant and two other ships. The Lion claimed to be admitted as joint captor. It appears that they all belonged to a squadron under command of Lord Keith, who, having received information that a French squadron consisting of four ships was on the way for the relief of the French garrison at La Valette, immediately made such disposition of his ships as would be most likely to intercept them. "The Foudroyant and two other ships-of-the-line were ordered to look out for the enemy in the south-south-east, and the Lion was ordered to take a station off the passage between Gaza and Malta," and the rest of the vessels were stationed in another place or places to prevent the enemy from entering La Valette. The Foudroyant, and the two vessels with her, fell in with the enemy and captured the Genereux on that side of the island which is opposite to La Valette. At the time of the capture, the Lion was sufficiently near to hear the report of the guns during the engagement. The Lion and the other stationed ships formed a part of the same squadron with the Foudroyant and her two associates. All were under the same commander, and took their respective stations, by his order, to intercept the enemy. Such were the allegations in behalf of the Lion. The court held that the allegations were insufficient; that is, that, if all the facts thus alleged were true, still the Lion was not entitled to share, because she was not in sight at the time of the capture.

In The Guilliaume Tell (decided in 1808) Edw. Adm. 6, the Northumberland and Culloden were part of a squadron blockading the port of La Valette, in which were known to be two French ships-of-war. The capture of these ships was a special object of the squadron, they having also the general purpose of preventing the escape of other vessels and of taking the place. One of them, which attempted to escape in the night, was pursued and captured by some of the fleet. The petitioning vessels had taken an active part in the preconcerted measures to prevent the escape, but did not join in the pursuit nor leave their anchorage. It does not clearly appear, from the statement of facts by the reporter, whether the capture was made within sight of the petitioning vessels or not.

Sir William Scott, at the close of his judgment, states the grounds upon which it rested, as follows: "Now, in this case, there was not only an actual sight, not only a perfect connusance of what was going forward, but as complete and uniform and persevering an association in this particular object, as well as in the general objects of the blockade, as can be imagined. I am therefore of opinion, that the Culloden and Northumberland are entitled to share." It is to be observed that the judge states, as a material circumstance, that these vessels were in sight. I do not think that it is to be inferred that they were in sight at the time of capture, but only at the beginning of the chase; and this, I suppose, was relied upon to distinguish it from The Genereux. There is another circumstance which is emphatically dwelt upon by the judge. It is that the vessels of the squadron were associated not only in the general object of a blockade, that is, to prevent the ingress or egress of any vessels, but in the special purpose of preventing this French ship-of-war from escaping. After having spoken of these ships as being part of a squadron associated for the express purpose of making the capture, he says: "The whole fleet were acting with one common consent, upon a preconcerted plan, for the capture of this prize;" and again, in the quotation before made from the concluding part of his opinion, we notice this explicit language: "There was * * * as complete and uniform and persevering an association in this particular object, as well as in the general objects of the blockade, as can be imagined."

From this judgment it would be inferred that merely being part of blockading squadron to prevent the egress of all vessels, without the special object of capturing that ship, or preconcerted measures for that particular purpose, would not have entitled the ships which remained at anchor to participate with those who pursued and captured, and that being associated both for that special purpose and the general object of the blockade would not have been sufficient without at some time being in sight. From this it would seem that, under the pressure of the authority of The Genereux, the learned judge no longer insisted upon the doctrine which he had laid down in The Forsigheid, in the year 1801. But in 1809, that case came again before him, after proof had been taken to support the allegations which he had admitted, and he then re-affirmed his former decision, using the following language: "Upon the principle which I laid down upon the admission of the allegation, I am bound to pronounce that the whole fleet must be entitled as joint captors." Edw. Adm. 127.

In Le Bon Aventure (decided in 1810 by the lords) 1 Act. 239, Sir William Grant, in delivering the opinion of the court, states the question to be "whether a vessel commencing a second chase, in sight of a fleet of which she had constituted a part before she had been detached, by signal, upon a former chase, and capturing the second chase at any distance from such a fleet, would necessarily, upon this principle, be compelled to let in the claim of the whole fleet to share in a prize so made, notwithstanding such fleet afforded no assistance or co-operation in the capture, but actually bore away from the captor on another tack." He declared that no such principle had ever been recognized, and the claim of the fleet was rejected. But in The Empress (decided by Sir William Scott in 1814) 1 Dods. 368, the ship-of-war Beagle, while pursuing an enemy's vessel, discovered another ship-of-war, the Rover, also in chase of her. Both continued the pursuit for some time, when a second enemy's vessel hove in sight. Thereupon the captain of the Beagle, being the superior officer, ordered the Rover to discontinue the pursuit of the first, and pursue the second enemy. She did so, and after continuing the chase for ten hours, and until out of sight of the Beagle, made the capture. The Beagle was admitted to share in the prize by reason of the alleged association, although her meeting the Rover on the ocean was accidental, and she had continued her course without pause or deviation in pursuit of the first enemy's ship, and had afforded no assistance or co-operation in the capture, but actually bore away from the captor. It is not easy to see how the officers and crew of the Beagle could be deemed to have taken the second enemy's ship, when they were, all the time, sailing for another object, in a different direction until out of sight, and did not even know of the capture until some time afterwards.

The L'Etoile, 2 Dods. 107, does not go so far as The Empress. In The Naples Grant, 2 Dods. 277, it is held as a general rule, that in order to confer a right to share in a prize upon a vessel which is engaged in the common service in a blockade, or in naval or military operations of that kind, it must be shown that such vessel was present at some period of the operation, either at the commencement, the intermediate stage, or at the time of the surrender. It is added that this rule may not be without exceptions.

In The Nordstern (decided in 1809, by the lords) 1 Act. 140, the court say, "Upon this we are decidedly of opinion, that it is not sufficient a joint enterprise shall exist at the time, except it expressly refer to the capture in question; or, in other words, that the capture grew out of the purpose and object for which the parties have been united, and be the joint produce of an actual co-operation and the object of union." This language, especially the concluding sentence, and the decisions in The Mars and The Genereux indicate a disposition in the appellate tribunal not to go beyond the line of actual joint capture. The courts have undoubtedly in many cases gone beyond this line; but their decisions have not been uniform, and to what extent they mean to carry the doctrine of constructive capture by association is left in doubt.

Looking at the adjudications of both the superior and subordinate courts, it cannot be said that they present any settled and well-defined rule. Indeed, the whole course of the decisions in favor of constructive joint capture is most remarkable. Their only foundation is the express language of the statute. And their only legitimate authority is to give a just construction to that language. Yet, except in the case of The Vryheid (decided in 1799) we find no reference whatever to any statute. We look in vain, not only for the terms of any act of parliament, but for any remark which indicates that any such act existed. The claims of captors are discussed, not as resting upon express grant, but as if they were questions of common law, depending merely upon previous decisions and general considerations of justice and policy.

In The Vryheid, 2 C. Rob. Adm. 21, Sir William Scott says that by the word "takers," in the act of parliament, are naturally to be understood those who actually take possession, or those affording an actual contribution of endeavor to that event. Either of these persons are naturally included under the denomination of takers; but the courts have gone further, and have extended the term "taker" to another description of persons,—to those who, not having contributed actual service, are still supposed to have rendered a constructive assistance; thus distinctly admitting that the courts had gone beyond the natural import of the statute. In a subsequent case, The Financier, 1 Dods. 67, the same learned judge says, "The admission of a constructive captor to share with an actual captor is, in itself, an indulgent construction of the law, which must not be further extended." Thus it appears that the constructive captor comes in by the indulgence of the court, and not by the natural construction of the statute grant. In reading many of the decisions, it is evident that the courts, following their own views of policy or expediency, have indulged in a latitude of construction which has carried them out of sight of the test which they were supposed to be expounding. That the decisions had gone beyond the just interpretation of the terms of the grant is not unfrequently admitted by the courts themselves.

Besides the remarks already quoted, Sir William Scott, in The Vryheid, page 22, after having stated that the act of parliament gave the prize "to the takers," says, "For, as the word has already travelled a considerable way beyond the meaning of the act of parliament, the disposition of the court will lean, not to extend it still farther, but to narrow it, and bring it nearer to the terms of the act than has been done in some former cases." In The Odin, 4 C. Rob. Adm. 325, the court says, "The principle of constructive assistance has been altogether thought to have been carried somewhat far."

In La Furieuse, Stew. Vice Adm. 179, the court says "that, as a general principle, it has been the object and intention of the courts of vice admiralty, to narrow rather than to extend the interest of joint captures, and to confine as much as possible the benefit of prize to such vessels as are the real and actual captors."

In Le Niemen, 1 Dods. 16, it is said by the court, "It certainly is not, at this time of day, the disposition of the court to extend the limits of joint capture." In The Arthur, Id. 426, it is said, "The principle of association has not been of late favored either here or in the court of appeal." This was in the year 1814. In L'Etoile, 2 Dods. 107, the court says, "There was an actual engagement between the Sparrow and the enemy; and this circumstance does, I think, discharge the legal prejudice which prevails against a constructive joint captor." This was in the year 1816, after the termination of the wars which grew out of the French revolution and the reign of Napoleon the First. Thus it appears that a "legal prejudice," that is, a prejudice by the legal profession, then prevailed against constructive joint captors. Since that time there have been no decisions upon that subject, which have come to my knowledge.

At the commencement of the Russian war, in March, 1854, the queen, by proclamation, granted the proceeds of prizes to the takers, and prescribed the manner in which they should be divided. That proclamation contained the following clause: "Ships or vessels, being in sight of the prize, as also of the captor, under circumstances to cause intimidation to the enemy and encouragement to the captor, shall be alone entitled to share as joint captors."

In June following, a prize act was passed by parliament, as usual, in confirmation of the royal grant made by proclamation. It did not contain this clause respecting vessels being in sight, and it has been suggested that such omission is to be regarded as a disapproval of it. But it is to be observed that the preamble refers to the proclamation as a grant made by royal munificence to the captors, and the act repeats the grant, but makes no distribution of the proceeds of prizes, but expressly confirms the division which had been made by the proclamation. From this the fair inference is that parliament deemed the clause giving vessels in sight a right to share, and none others, to be a part of the rules of division, and that it was not the intention of the legislature in any degree to change what they have recognized as a rightful grant by royal munificence. If this be so, then the doctrine of constructive capture by association has been discarded both by the advisers of the crown and by the parliament.

If it should be thought by any one that the omission of that clause in the act of parliament is to be regarded as a disapproval of it, then it would exhibit the same want of accord between the executive and legislative departments, and the same unsettled and unsatisfied state of mind as previously existed in the courts and the legal profession. But the act of parliament is passed chiefly for the purpose of confirming the royal grant of the prizes which belong to the monarch, but are held jure coronae, and grants of which, the commons contend, require the sanction of parliament.

From the foregoing review, it appears that the judicial doctrine of constructive capture by association has not been uniform, and is not well defined and well settled. It has encountered the decided disapprobation of the profession; and the courts have not unfrequently indicated that it was not satisfactory even to themselves, and seems finally to have been discarded by royal proclamation. It is by no means commended to our understanding, as founded on sound principles of interpretation.

I do not think that it could be rationally presumed that congress intended to adopt it by their act of 1862 [supra], even if the provisions of that act were the same throughout as those of the British acts. But they are not the same. Our statute contains a new and highly important provision. The third section says, that "when one or more vessels of the navy shall be within signal distance of another making a prize, all shall share in the prize." It is contended, on the side of these petitioners, that congress did not intend merely to follow our prize act of 1800 [supra], but that they must have known and had in view the British doctrine and decisions. Assuming that to be so, then they knew that one part of the doctrine of constructive capture was well defined and well settled upon rational ground, while another part was not well defined, and was not sustained by uniformity of decision or just principles of construction, and had been discountenanced by the profession. Thereupon they expressly adopt the first part, but do not so adopt the second.

Does not this clearly show, that they did not intend to leave it to the courts to determine how far the doctrine of constructive capture should be deemed or made a part of our law, but chose to determine it themselves, and fix the limits by express enactment? And having so introduced the first part of such doctrine, and not the second, must we not infer that they did not intend to adopt both?

It is not a case for the application of the maxim "expressio unius est exclusio alterius," especially as we see good reason both for the adoption of the one and the exclusion of the other. There is another view. By our statutes, there are two classes of ships, and two classes only, which are to participate in the prize. The first are those who make the capture, or, in other words, those making the prize. The second class are those within signal distance of one of the first class. The language is, any ship within signal distance of another making a prize. If, then, each one of a blockading squadron comes within the first class, and is a vessel making a prize within the meaning of the statute, then any vessel that is within signal distance of her is one of the second class, and entitled to share by the express words of the statute; and the result would be, that a ship of a blockading squadron lying at anchor, and not herself being within signal distance of another making a prize, and having no knowledge of the capture until some time after it was effected, will not only share herself, but bring in another vessel not associated in the blockade, which merely happened to be within signal distance of her at the time when a capture was made, of which both were wholly ignorant. This is an absurdity which no one can believe the legislature intended. It may be asked, why did not the same result follow from the English decisions? The answer is, that the whole doctrine of constructive capture was the creature of the courts, and in their hands all its parts were flexible. They moulded it at pleasure by limitations or alterations according to their views of expediency. They did not build construction upon construction. Thus, where a ship became a constructive captor by being in sight, they did not permit one associated with her, but not in sight, to be a captor by construction, although it was by obeying an order to pick up the boats of the first that she was prevented from being also in sight. The Financier, 1 Dods. 67.

But our legislature having provided that one class of those who had been decreed constructive captors shall be entitled to share, and thus given them an express statute right, if the court shall introduce another class of constructive captors, and hold that they are "ships making the prize" within the meaning of the statute, then the result which has already been stated will follow. This, as we have seen, congress could not have intended. The first class of grantees, therefore, can embrace only actual captors; and this conclusion is in accordance with the fair and natural import of the language of the statute.

The result is that no vessel is entitled to share with the Canandaigua.

NOTE [from original report]. We are indebted to the courtesy of the district attorney of the United States for the district of Massachusetts, the Hon. Richard H. Dana, Jr., for the foregoing opinion of the experienced and learned judge of that district, Mr. Justice Sprague; and we are assured by Mr. Dana, and fully concur in the assurance, "that this opinion of Judge Sprague is of the utmost interest to the navy; that it is the leading case, and is most thoroughly considered." Nothing which we could add would be esteemed of much value beyond such an indorsement, from such a source, Mr. Dana being not only a good lawyer, everywhere, but especially devoted to admiralty and prize law. But we desire to commend, in a special manner, this opinion of Judge Sprague to the bench and the bar throughout the land, as drawn up with that patient labor and research, which makes it a mine of wealth to all who may possess it. Such a thorough revision and careful analysis of the cases, presenting them in detail, and sufficiently at length to make them intelligible, even to unprofessional readers, renders the opinion, and any opinion drawn up in that authentic and reliable manner, almost invaluable as a matter of convenient reference ever after. There is no one thing wherein the public poorer proves economy, than in requiring so much labor of their judges, in courts of final adjudication, as to render it absolutely impracticable for them to wait long enough, to obtain a full survey of the field lying behind them, before they are compelled to take a leap into the future, which too often proves in the sequel, but a leap in the dark.—I. MISCONDUCT OF JURY.

1. Information given by one juror to his fellow jurors after they have retired, is not sufficient ground for a new trial, if the verdict has done substantial justice between the parties.

2. The court will not lend an easy ear to affidavits of jurors, as to their proceedings after they have retired to consider of their verdict.

Motion by defendant for a new trial, because one of the jurors gave information of his own knowledge, after they retired, viz.: that he had heard both from the defendant and plaintiff, that the defendant was not to be allowed anything for the services of her son; which was a claim in set-off which she had attempted to prove on the trial.

Mr. Law, for defendant.

1. It is a good ground for a new trial. 1 Bl. Comm. 374, 375; 3 Bl. Comm. 373.

COLLISION IN THE EAST RIVER — VESSELS CROSSING—PLEADING—MOVEMENT IN IMMINENT DANGER.

1. Where a propeller coming down the East river had a ferry-boat, which was crossing from New York to Brooklyn, on her starboard hand, and the ferry-boat kept her course, as was admitted by the answer—Held, that under articles 14, 16 and 18 of the rules of navigation, the propeller would be liable for a collision under such circumstances.

2. That the effort on behalf of the propeller to make out a special case under article 19 was not only inconsistent with her answer, but was not sustained on the evidence.

3. That under the circumstances it would have been prudent for the propeller to have ported her helm and gone under the ferry-boat's stern, whereas she did attempt to cross her bows, and that having selected the most hazardous of two courses open to her, she must be held responsible for its failure of success.

4. That the excuse that the ferry-boat stopped her wheels and so led the propeller to starboard, is not made out.

5. That the fact that the propeller, as she neared the ferry-boat, blew two whistles and received two whistles in reply, does not alter the case. The two whistles in reply would amount to nothing more than an indication that the ferry-boat acquiesced in the right so claimed by the propeller to select her own method of avoiding the former. Moreover, the danger was then imminent.

[2] [Affirmed in Case No. 2,643.]

BENEDICT, District Judge. This is a case of collision between the ferry-boat Manhasset, which was crossing the East river from New York to Brooklyn, and the propeller Chesapeake, which was passing through the East river, on her way to Fort Lafayette, on the 2d of December, 1864. The law applicable to the case, is to be found in the rules and regulations for preventing collisions, adopted by the act of congress of April 29, 1864 [13 Stat. 58]. By these regulations it is declared to be the duty of a steamer, which, when crossing so as to involve risk of collision, has the approaching vessel on her own starboard side, to keep out of the way of such approaching vessel, and the duty of the steamer so approaching, to keep her course. Articles 14, 18, Act April 29, 1864. Judged by this rule, the case as stated in the answer of the propeller would seem to be in favor of the ferry-boat; for the answer, while it admits that the ferry-boat was crossing, and the propeller coming down the river, the ferry-boat being on the starboard side of the propeller, also admits that the ferry-boat kept her course, and that the propeller, while attempting to cross her bows, struck her amidships on the port side. No fact is put forth in this answer as tending to take the case out of the general rule; and the fault it charges upon the ferry-boat is, in not changing her course and passing under the stern of the propeller. Upon such an answer, if it stood alone, the libellants would be entitled to a decree. As presented to the court upon the evidence, the case differs from that disclosed in the answer, in this, that special circumstances are claimed by the respondents to have been shown, which rendered a departure from the general rule, as laid down in articles 14, 16, and 18, necessary and justifiable under the proviso of article 19 of the same act.

This claim to have the case considered a special one rests upon evidence tending to show that a sloop and schooner were beating down the river on the New York side, between the propeller and the ferry-boat, rendering it impossible for the propeller to pass to the right and so allow the ferry-boat to keep her course, while the presence of another vessel coming down the river behind the propeller, is relied upon as showing that it was impossible for her to stop and back sooner than she did.

With regard to this evidence, introduced by the respondents without objection on the part of the libellants, for the purpose of making out a special case within the meaning of article 19, it is to be noticed that it is inconsistent with the answer. The theory of the answer is, that it was possible for the ferry-boat, and accordingly her duty, to have starboarded her helm, and so passed between the propeller and the New York shore; but if, as now contended, the presence of a sloop and schooner, beating down between the propeller and the ferry-boat, rendered it impossible for the propeller to port, it must have been, for the same reason, impossible for the ferry-boat to starboard; and as to the impossibility of stopping and backing, the answer nowhere avers such impossibility, but rather implies the intention on the part of the propeller to avoid the ferry-boat by keeping on.

The theory, then, advanced upon the trial, and based upon these special circumstances, might well be rejected as irreconcilable with the averments of the answer.

It is not, however, intended to rest the decision here upon a question of pleading, but to consider the whole case as disclosed in the evidence. With this view I have carefully examined the testimony relied upon as showing that the propeller was prevented from porting by the presence of other vessels, and while I find positive evidence that a sloop and schooner were beating down the river at the time in question, I also find evidence which satisfies me that these vessels were not in a position to interfere with the propeller in any attempt she might have made to pass under the stern of the ferry-boat. The controlling evidence upon this point is found in the testimony of the master of the propeller. This witness, who was at the wheel, directing the navigation of his vessel, states that when he saw the sloop and schooner he was just below Jackson street; that he starboarded his helm in order to clear them, and "held his sheer long enough to get by them;" that he "then ported the wheel, so as to steady the vessel," and "kept his course right down at full speed." He also says that he saw the ferry-boat when "in the act of passing the sloop and schooner," and not before. Now the fact stated by this witness that after he saw the ferry-boat, and when on a sheer towards the Brooklyn shore, he ported his wheel and steadied his vessel on a course right down the river, renders it highly improbable that the ferry-boat was then approaching on his starboard side, within any short distance. Had the ferry-boat, sloop, and schooner been so near each other as to render it necessary for him to pass across and near to the bows of the ferry-boat, as well as the bows of the sloop and schooner, he would not have ported his helm when he did. The manoeuvre, of itself, shows that the sloop and schooner, when passed by the propeller, were a sufficient distance above the ferry-boat, to have enabled the propeller to pass between them in safety and under the stern of the ferry-boat.

Other evidence in the case confirms this conclusion. Thus the master states that when he first saw the ferry-boat—which was when he was passing the sloop and schooner—he was probably three hundred yards from her, and that in going that distance in that tide he could sheer his vessel eight points. Of course, then, he had room to pass the stern of a vessel which, with helm hard a starboard, he only reached to strike amidships. The second mate of the steamer estimated this distance at 800 yards, and put the sloop and schooner 1,000 yards distant, approaching at right angles; while another witness introduced by the respondents, and who was standing upon pier 39, stated that he saw no vessels near enough to interfere with the movements of the propeller and ferry-boat. The testimony, then, of the respondents' witness—confirmed, as it is, by several witnesses produced by the libellants—clearly disposes of the allegation that the propeller was prevented by other vessels from passing to the stern of the ferry-boat.

So also the evidence fails to support the allegation that the presence of other vessels under the stern of the propeller rendered necessary a departure from the general rule requiring every steamship, when approaching another so as to involve risk of collision, to slacken her speed, or, if necessary, to stop and reverse. It would appear that there were some vessels passing down the Brooklyn side; but the fact that the last sharp sheer of the propeller to the Brooklyn shore compelled these vessels to back hard to avoid her, shows that before that sheer the propeller could have stopped without interfering with them. And, besides, if any vessels were following the propeller, it is to be presumed that they were being managed in view of the rule (article 17, Regulations of 1864), which casts upon a vessel following, the responsibility of avoiding the vessel ahead, and were therefore prepared for any stoppage, or other necessary manoeuvre on the part of the propeller.

As I view the case, then, it cannot be considered as a special one within the meaning of the proviso of article 19, of the act of 1864, but must be treated as a case of two steam vessels meeting under ordinary circumstances, and governed by the general rule.

Accordingly, the burden is upon the propeller, to show that she adopted timely and prudent measures to avoid the ferry-boat, which failed of success by reason of some fault on the part of the ferry-boat. This the propeller has failed to do. The prudent measure under the circumstances, was to port her helm and go under the stern of the ferry-boat. She attempted to pass her bows; and having selected the most hazardous of two courses open to her, she must be held responsible for its failure of success. But it is said, "the ferry-boat stopped her wheels and so led the propeller to starboard her helm as the proper consequent manoeuvre, and after she had starboarded, it was too late to again change upon seeing the wheels of the ferry-boat start." This excuse, which is not to be found in the answer, is without foundation in the evidence. The testimony of the pilot and engineer of the ferry-boat, which agrees in this respect with the answer of the propeller, shows that the wheels of the ferry-boat were stopped, but instantly put in motion again without affecting in any considerable degree the headway of the vessel; while the testimony of the master and mate of the propeller is positive that no change was made in the course of the propeller by reason of this momentary stopping of the ferry-boat's wheels. These two witnesses agree in the statement that the propeller kept on her course down the river until the wheels of the ferry-boat started, and that it was after the wheels of the ferry-boat were seen to start that the helm of the propeller was put astarboard. Upon the evidence, then, the stopping of the wheels of the ferry-boat cannot avail to excuse the propeller for starboarding instead of porting her helm.

Considerable stress was laid by the respondents upon evidence tending to show that the propeller, "as she neared the ferry-boat, blew two whistles as a signal that she desired to continue her course," and received two whistles in reply from the ferry-boat; but I do not see how this fact, if it were clearly proved, would, in view of the other facts of this case, materially change the aspect of the defense. Two whistles in reply, from a vessel crossing as the ferry-boat was, would amount to nothing more than an indication that she acquiesced in the right so claimed by the propeller, and given her by the law, to select her own method of avoiding the ferry-boat; and it is not shown that at the time of the alleged reply of the ferry-boat, any change of course was made in either vessel.

Moreover, to these whistles, as also to the starting of the wheels of the ferry-boat, the remark applies that the danger was then imminent. The master of the propeller says he rang his four bells in as quick succession as possible, and as soon as he saw the wheels start, and yet he struck the ferry-boat just as his engine began to work back. No mistake committed by the ferry-boat at this late moment would excuse the propeller for placing the vessel in a position of such peril. The duty to avoid the ferry-boat was upon the propeller from the time the ferry-boat was seen to be crossing on her starboard side; and yet, according to the testimony of her own principal officers, the propeller steadied herself on a course right down the river and across the track of the ferry-boat, and held that course, without change and at full speed, until so near that a collision was imminent, when she for the first time changed her helm and then put it to starboard.

Upon her own showing, there appears to me to have been an absence of that care and skill in the management of the propeller, which the law requires of a steamship when crossing the track of another, and I cannot doubt but that she should be held responsible for the damages that ensued.

Let the decree be for the libellants, with an order of reference to ascertain the amount of damages.

This case was affirmed by the circuit court on appeal. [Case No. 2,643.]

COLLISION BETWEEN STEAMERS—HOLDING COURSE—BURDEN OF PROOF.

1. Where a steam ferry-boat was about one-third of the way across the East river, on a trip from New York to Brooklyn, when a steam propeller was coming down the river, and the propeller undertook to pass across the bows of the ferry-boat, and a collision ensued: Held, that the propeller was in fault for violating article 14 of the act of April 29, 1864 (13 Stat. 60), as the propeller had the ferry-boat on her own starboard side, and was bound to keep out of her way, while the latter was bound to keep her course.

2. This rule will, on all proper occasions, be steadily enforced, and, in case of a departure from it, followed by a collision, the onus will be on the offending vessel to show a clear and undoubted special case of excuse.

[Cited in The Garden City, 19 Fed. 532.]

This was a libel in rem, filed in the district court, by the owners of the steam ferry-boat Manhasset, against the steam propeller Chesapeake, to recover damages for a collision, which occurred in the East river, at about nine o'clock a. m. on the 2d of December, 1864. The district court—The Chesapeake [Case No. 2,642]—decreed for the libellants, and the claimants appealed to this court.

Benjamin D. Silliman, for libellants.

John E. Parsons, for claimants.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. The Manhasset came out of her slip at the foot of Catharine street, on the New York side, on her way across the river to her slip at the foot of Main street, on the Brooklyn side. The Chesapeake was coming down the middle of the river, laden with a company of soldiers, going to Fort Lafayette. The propeller was some distance up the river, when she saw the ferry-boat about one-third of the way across from the New York shore, and, instead of adopting measures to pass her stern, and permit her to keep her course, as she was entitled to by the settled rule of navigation under such circumstances, undertook to dictate the course she must pursue, so as to enable the former to pass on her left or across her bows. By the fourteenth article of the act of April 29, 1864 (13 Stat. 60), "if two ships, under steam, are crossing, so as to involve risk of collision, the ship which has the other on her own starboard side, shall keep out of the way of the other." This is a simple and plain rule, and must be observed, except under very special and urgent circumstances, in order to avoid the result of fault in case of collision. The correlative duty is also imposed on the other ship to keep her course. Special circumstances have been set up, in this case, on the part of the propeller, to excuse a departure from the rule, namely, that two sailing vessels were in the way of a movement to pass the Manhasset under her stern. The weight of the proof is, that no such impediment existed; but, even if there had, it would have been easy for the propeller to slow and stop till the other vessel had passed, as the tide was hardly flood, which favored such a movement.

It is also insisted, on the part of the propeller, that, when she blew her two whistles, and the Manhasset slowed, if she had not again started on with speed, the collision would not have occurred, and that, in this movement, she was in fault. But the answer is, that this movement was in the moment of danger, and the pilot was influenced to make it, seeing the collision inevitable, in order to prevent a direct blow, and receive, as his vessel did, a glancing blow, so as to lessen the injury.

It is quite plain, on the proofs, that the collision, in the present case, occurred from ignorance, on the part of the master of the propeller, of the rule of navigation prescribed by the act of congress, or, if he was possessed of this knowledge, from a neglect to observe such rule, under circumstances to which it had a direct application; and, also, even in the absence of any such rule, in his mistaken movement, and persistence in it, to pass the Manhasset across her bows. The clear weight of the proofs is, that, if the propeller had kept her course down the river, no collision would have happened. I prefer, however, to place the decision upon her departure from the safe and fixed rule established by law, that, in the position the propeller held in relation to the other vessel, it was the duty of the latter to hold her course, and of the former to keep out of the way. It should be made known, that this rule will, on all proper occasions, be steadily enforced, and that, in case of a departure from it, followed by a collision, the onus will be on the offending vessel to show a clear and undoubted special case of excuse. No such excuse has been shown in the present instance, and, for this reason, the decree of the court below is affirmed.

CHESAPEAKE & O. CANAL CO. v. BINNEY.

[4 Cranch, C. C. 68.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May Term, 1830.

EMINENT DOMAIN—THE INQUISITION—CONTENTS—DESCRIPTION OF LAND — DISQUALIFICATION OF JUROR.

Quaere, whether a person who subscribed for stock in the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company, without paying a dollar a share at the time of subscribing, and who has never been required to pay any of the instalments called for by the company, can be considered as a stockholder, so as to disqualify him to serve upon an inquisition to condemn land for the canal? It is not necessary that an inquisition, taken under the charter of that company, should contain the names of such jurors as were summoned but not sworn. The land condemned is sufficiently described by reference, in the inquisition, to the description of it in the warrant.

CRANCH, Chief Judge (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, not sitting). This was an inquisition condemning land for the canal, under the fifteenth section of the charter.

Mr. Key, for the defendant, moved to set aside the inquisition: 1. Because John G. Wilson, one of the jurors, was a stockholder in the company. 2. Because the whole number (18) of jurors summoned, were not named in the inquisition. 3. Because the land valued is not described in the inquisition, otherwise than by reference to the warrant.

1. It is alleged that he was a stockholder because he was an original subscriber. The facts, in regard to this question, are admitted to be, that Mr. Wilson subscribed for three shares of the stock, but has never paid the dollar per share required by the charter to be paid at the time of subscription. That, some time afterward, in speaking of the stock to several persons, among whom was Mr. A. Hunter, he remarked, that he wished he had not taken any of the stock. Mr. Hunter replied that if he was tired of it, he would take it off his hands. That Mr. Wilson told him he should have it, and he never gave himself any further trouble about it, as he did not consider himself a stockholder; and was not aware that his name was on the list of stockholders until he was informed of it since the taking of the inquisition. That Mr. Hunter was one of the commissioners for receiving subscriptions at Harper's Ferry, where Mr. Wilson subscribed, and put his initials opposite the name of Mr. Wilson as having received the subscription money. That Mr. Wilson never paid anything upon the stock, and has never been required to pay any of the instalments which have been called for by the company. That his name was returned, as a subscriber, by the commissioners, to the board of public works in Virginia, agreeably to the second section of the charter. By the fifth section, it is provided, that upon all subscriptions which shall not be paid in the certificates of the stock or debts of the old Potomac Company, there shall be paid, at the time of subscription, on each share, one dollar; and thereafter, when the company shall be formed, the whole stock subscribed shall be paid in such instalments, and at such times as the president and directors shall, from time to time, require; and when any subscriber shall fail to pay any instalment called for by the company, it shall be lawful for the company, upon motion and ten days' notice, to obtain judgment against the subscriber so failing to pay; or may sell the stock of such subscriber, and the purchaser shall become a stockholder, and entitled to the same privileges as an original subscriber. And, by the seventeenth section, the stockholders may transfer their shares by deed registered in the company's books, and not otherwise, except by devise.

It is clear by the state of the case, that Mr. Wilson was not interested in the stock of the company at the time of the taking of the inquisition, unless he could then have been compelled to pay either the original dollar per share required to be paid at the time of subscribing, or to pay the instalments, or had then a right to make such payment and become a stockholder. He certainly was not then a stockholder, having never paid for, nor purchased any part of the stock; nor do I think he could then be called a subscriber; for there could be no valid subscription which could bind the company to admit him as a partner unless the dollar per share were paid at the time of subscription. There was no means of compelling him to pay the dollar per share. The remedy, given by the fifth section, is only for instalments called for by the president and directors, after the company was formed. I do not think he was a subscriber within the meaning of the charter so as to be charged with instalments, and to participate in the profits of the company. But if I should be mistaken in this view of the subject, as my brother judge, for whose opinion I have the highest respect, thinks I am, I concur with him in opinion, that if Mr. Wilson had been legally bound to pay the dollar per share which was to have been paid at the time of subscription, and might have been held bound at law to pay the instalments, yet, under the circumstances of this case he might be relieved in equity, and would, as a stockholder, be considered as a mere trustee for Mr. Hunter. I consider him, therefore, as having been quite free from any interest whatever in the stock of the company at the time of taking the inquisition.

2. The second cause alleged for setting aside the inquisition is, that the names of those jurors who were summoned but not sworn upon the inquest are not given in the inquisition. As I cannot perceive why they should have been named in it, I cannot see that the omission to name them is any cause for setting it aside.

3. The third cause alleged for setting it aside is, that the land condemned is not described in the inquisition otherwise than by reference to the warant, which the marshal in his inquisition, says he returns therewith. "Id certum est quod certum reddi potest." I do not see any use in burdening the records with a repetition, in the inquisition, of the description contained in the warrant.

These seem to me to be the only objections, applicable to this case, which were not considered and overruled in Mr. Key's Case [Case No. 2,649], at May term, 1829; and are also now overruled.

At December term, 1830, the inquisition was set aside because the jury by mistake had not given damages for a bridge which Mr. Binney was obliged to build to connect his land, which was intersected by the canal.

SERVICE ON SUNDAY.

A notice cannot lawfully be served on Sunday.

This was a motion for judgment for an installment on a joint subscription by the defendants, in the handwriting of Mr. Bradley, for one hundred shares. The ten days' notice, required by the fifth section of the charter, was served on Mr. Carroll on Sunday. Upon that ground the motion was overruled by the court, although the parties had appeared according to the notice. Roberts v. Monkhouse, 8 East, 547; Rex. v. Croke, Cowp. 26.

RIGHTS AND LIABILITIES OF STOCKHOLDERS.

1. A person who becomes a member of a corporation is bound to know the obligations which he thereby incurs. Those obligations are matters of law resulting from the construction of the charter.

2. If both parties were equally mistaken as to that construction, it is no ground, in equity or law, for setting aside the obligation of the contract.

Motion, by Mr. Wallach, for the plaintiffs [the Chesapeake & Ohio Canal Company] for judgment against the defendant, Patrick Dulany, for the amount of the instalment called for by the company, on his shares, upon ten days' notice, under the fifth section of the charter of 27th of January, 1824.

CRANCH, Chief Judge (nem. con.). The defence set up in this case is, that the defendant subscribed under a mistake as to the right of the plaintiffs to coerce payment of future instalments; and that he was led into that mistake by the opinion of Mr. McCleary, who took from him his power of attorney to Mr. Smith, to subscribe; and who, in answer to an inquiry by the defendant, said that he did not think that the future instalments would be enforced, but that the shares might be forfeited by their non-payment. The defendant, when he became a corporator in this company, was bound to know the obligations which he thereby incurred. Those obligations were matters of law resulting from the construction of the charter. Whether a subscriber was or was not liable to pay future instalments, was a question of law arising from that construction. If both the parties were mistaken as to that construction, it is no ground, in equity or law, for setting aside the obligation of the contract. 1 Fonbl. Eq. 106; Lord Irnham v. ORPHANS' COURT—POWER TO ANNEX CONDITIONS TO PAYMENT OF DIVIDEND OUT OF INTESTATE'S ESTATE.

The orphans' court has no power to annex conditions to the payment of the dividend of a judgment at law recovered against the intestate for instalments due upon the stock of the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company.

The Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company had recovered judgment against the intestate in his lifetime, upon motion and ten days' notice, for $2,500, for instalments upon 50 shares of the stock in that company, under the 5th section of the charter. After his death, the orphans' court for Washington county, on the 2d of August, 1839, ordered, "That [Lewis Johnson] the administrator of William Otis make a dividend among the judgment creditors of said Otis, of thirty-six and an half per cent., on their respective claims." And on the 21st of November, 1839, "at a special court held this day, at the request of Lewis Johnson, the administrator of William Otis, the court passed the following order: Ordered, that the administrator of William Otis pay to the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company, the amount of their dividend of said estate, provided he receive from them a certificate of the stock of said company, equal to the whole amount paid in." From this order the canal company appealed to this court.

Brent & Brent, for the appellants, contended that the effect of this order would be to compel them to issue full certificates of stock to the amount of the dividend, at $100 a share, which they were not bound to do. They had a right to apply the payment equally to all the shares subscribed for, or owned by the intestate.

Mr. Morfit, contra. There was not judgment at law. The court had no jurisdiction to render judgment on motion. The judgment was by default for breach of contract. There should have been a writ of inquiry of damages. The defendant had a right to apply the payment to particular shares, and thus obtain certificates in full.

THE COURT reversed the order of the orphans' court, with costs.

EMINENT DOMAIN—COMPENSATION—THE INQUISITION—CHESAPEAKE AND OHIO CANAL COMPANY—CONSTRUCTION OF CHARTER.

1. To condemn the land of an individual for the use of the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company, is to take private property for public use.

[Cited historically in Shoemaker v. U. S., 147 U. S. 282, 13 Sup. Ct. 370.]

2. The damages assessed by the jury must be considered as the just compensation required by the amendment of the constitution, which forbids the taking of private property for public use without just compensation. That compensation must be just towards the public, as well as just towards the individual whose property is taken.

3. The charter granted by Virginia having been ratified and confirmed by congress, became as much an act of congress, so far as it is applicable to the District of Columbia, as if it had been reënacted with such modifications as might be necessary to fit it for use in the District.

4. The power to take private property for public use, upon just compensation, is not a power in derogation of common right. All property is held subject to that power; and the right thus to take private property for public use, is as much common right as that of the individual. The canal is a great highway; and all lands are held subject to the right of the public to make a highway through them.

5. The charter should be so construed as to carry into effect the will of the legislature. The words "from" and "at" do not always exclude the place to which they refer.

6. The beginning of the eastern section of the canal is not precisely fixed by the charter, but is left to the discretion of the company, with this limitation only, that it should be in the District of Columbia, and upon tide water.

7. A certain day must be fixed, in the warrant, for the meeting of the jury on the land, and the want thereof is fatal to the inquisition.

This was a motion by F. S. Key, to set aside an inquisition which had been taken and returned to the court, condemning, for the use of the canal, a lot in Georgetown, owned by him.

The cause was argued by him and Mr. Jones, on the 23d and 25th of May, 1829. The statement of the case will appear in the opinion of the court.

CRANCH, Chief Judge. This cause comes before the court by a motion to set aside the inquisition which condemns Mr. Key's land in Georgetown, for the purposes of the canal, under the 15th section of the charter granted by Virginia, and confirmed by Maryland, Pennsylvania, and the United States. By that section it is enacted that the inquisition taken and returned in the manner therein set forth, shall be affirmed, unless good cause be shown against it. Mr. Key, in showing cause, has taken the following objections to the inquisition, and to the proceedings upon which it was founded. 1. That the provisions of the charter for condemning land, are unconstitutional, because no provision is made for just compensation. 2. That the act of Virginia, granting the charter, is not in force in this district, because that act is only confirmed, not reënacted by congress. 3. That the company has no right to condemn land in Georgetown. 4. That the warrant is insufficient in form and substance. 5. That some of the jurors were interested. 6. That the marshal has only certified that the fourteen jurors who were sworn were not interested; and not that the whole eighteen who were summoned, were not interested. 7. That the oath was not properly administered; and was not administered upon the land. 8. That the inquisition does not cure the defect of the marshal's return, nor the faults of the warrant.

1. That the company has no right to condemn land, because that clause of the charter, so far as it attempts to authorize such condemnation is unconstitutional, inasmuch as it does not provide a just compensation to the party whose land is sought to be condemned. The words of the 5th amendment of the constitution of the United States, upon which this objection is founded, are these, "Nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation." This amendment admits the principle that private property may be taken for public use, if just compensation be made. It is not denied that to take land for the use of the canal, is to take it for public use. The question, then, is, whether the charter provides for making a just compensation. It is said that it does not, because it directs that, in every such valuation and assessment of damages, the jury shall be, and they are hereby instructed to consider, in determining and fixing the amount thereof, the actual benefit which will accrue to the owner from conducting the canal through, or erecting any of the said works upon his land, and to regulate their verdict thereby; except that no assessment shall require any such owner to pay or contribute any thing to the said company, where such benefit shall exceed, in the estimate of the jury, the value and damages ascertained as "aforesaid." It is contended, that the constitution provides a positive, not a conjectural compensation; that under the provisions of this charter, it may happen that no compensation at all may be made; that the expected benefits which the jury shall have estimated, may never arrive; and that, therefore, the jury should not have been required, by the charter, to consider them in their estimate of value and damages. But the constitution only provides for the general principle. The means of ascertaining the just compensation were left to be decided by the public authority, which should give the power to take the private property for public use. All the states, prior to the adoption of the constitution, exercised this right, and still continue to exercise it where it is necessary to condemn land for roads, and other public uses; and they have generally provided for compensation through the intervention of a jury. It is impossible for the legislature to fix the compensation in every individual case. It can only provide a tribunal to examine the circumstances of each case, and to estimate the just compensation. If the jury had not been required by the charter to consider the benefit as well as the damage, they would still have been at liberty to do so, for the constitution does not require that the value should be paid, but that just compensation should be given. Just compensation means a compensation which would be just in regard to the public, as well as in regard to the individual; and if the jury should be satisfied that the individual would, by the proposed public work, receive a benefit to the full value of the property taken, it could not be said to be a just compensation, to give him the full value. If the jury would have a right to consider the benefit as well as the damage, without the provision of the charter which requires them to do so, the same objection would still exist, namely, that under the provisions of the charter, it might happen that no compensation at all, or, at most, a nominal compensation, would be made. The insertion, therefore, of that provision in the charter which requires the jury to do what they would be competent to do without such a provision, and which, in order to ascertain a compensation which should be just towards the public, as well as just towards the individual, they ought to do, cannot be considered as repugnant to the constitution.

2. But it is objected, 2dly, that the canal company has no right to condemn land within the District of Columbia; because Virginia had no right to legislate for that district, or in regard to lands therein. It is said that the act of congress only ratifies and confirms, but does not reënact the act of the state of Virginia, and that even that ratification is limited; that the act of Virginia is only ratified and confirmed so far as it may be necessary to enable the company to carry into effect the provisions thereof in the District of Columbia; and that "the provisions thereof," are not applicable to the state of things in that district, where there is no sheriff, no county clerk, and no prothonotary. This is understood to be the substance of the objection. For the purpose of considering this objection, I shall take it for granted that, by the charter, it is contemplated that some part, at least, of the canal, or its works, will be in the District of Columbia. It is evident, from a perusal of the charter granted by Virginia, that the legislature intended that it should be coextensive with the whole object in view, and should confer all the powers necessary to accomplish it. It professes to legislate as well over the District of Columbia and the state of Maryland, as over Virginia; but it restrains itself until the consent of congress and Maryland should be obtained. That consent only was wanting to give validity to its legislation; and it is expressly provided that the charter shall be so construed as to fit it for use in Maryland and in the District of Columbia. This charter, therefore, having been ratified and confirmed by Maryland and by congress, in the manner required by the legislature of Virginia, has become as much an act of congress, so far as respects this district, as if it had been expressly reënacted with such modifications as might be necessary to fit it for use in the district. In order to show that it was the intention of the legislature of Virginia, to legislate in regard to such part of the canal as should be within the District of Columbia, it is only necessary to read the provisions of the charter. In the first section, they expressly require the assent of the legislatures of Maryland, Pennsylvania, and the United States, before any of its provisions should take effect. By the 14th section they require the assent of the same States, and of the United States, to any alteration of the tolls for the use of the canal; that is, (according to the proposition before assumed,) a canal extending into the district. In the 15th section it is said to be necessary "for making the said canal," that provision should be made for condemning a quantity of land for that purpose; and it provides for the condemnation of any land "through which the said canal is intended to pass." These provisions show that the power to condemn land, was intended to be coextensive with the canal itself. And the 22d section provides that so much of the charter "as respects the canal and works designed to be constructed in the District of Columbia, and the states of Virginia and Maryland, shall take effect, with such necessary modification in the construction thereof, as shall fit it for such limited application and use upon the assent of the congress of the United States, and the legislature of Maryland being given thereto." All that is necessary to fit the provisions of the charter for use in the District of Columbia, so far as it regards the condemnation of land, is, so to modify it by construction, as to substitute the marshal of the district for the sheriff of the county; the clerk of the circuit court for this county, for the clerk of the county, and the circuit court, sitting in the county, for the county court, which seems to be alluded to in the charter. Such a modification in the construction of the charter is required by the charter itself; and, being confirmed by congress, is equivalent to an express provision by congress to that effect. The right, therefore, and the means, to condemn land in the District of Columbia, are given to the company, provided the charter intended to give, and purports to give the company a right to construct any part of the canal, or of its works in that district.

The third objection is, that the company has no authority to condemn land in Georgetown. Upon this point it has been contended, that the authority to condemn land for public use, without the consent of the owner, is in derogation of common right; and, therefore, the charter must be construed strictly. That none of the expressions in the charter indicate clearly a right in the company to extend the canal below the highest convenient and safe navigable tide-water of the Potomac. Thus the words in the preamble, "from the tide-water of the river Potomac, in the District of Columbia," are perfectly satisfied by commencing the canal at the highest part of the tide-water of the river Potomac, in the district; and the fourth section, which gives the company its authority to make the canal, only gives them power to make a canal from the tide-water of the Potomac, in the said district. The word "from," it is said, is exclusive of the point, or place, named; and, of course, the canal must strictly, according to the terms of the charter, begin at the highest point of tide-water in the district. But it is admitted that this strictness must have a reasonable construction; and that it must mean the highest point of safe and convenient navigable tide-water. So in the twentieth section of the charter, which describes and defines the eastern and western sections of the canal, the words are—"That the first, or eastern section of the canal, shall begin at the District of Columbia, on tide-water, and terminate at or near the bank of Savage river;" "that the second, or western section, shall commence at the said termination," &c., "to the highest steamboat navigation of the Ohio river." Here the word "at" is also supposed to be exclusive of the place named. A person, it is said, may be at a place and not in it; and the word is evidently used in that sense in the subsequent clause of the same sentence, where it is said that the second section shall commence at the termination of the first. Here it is impossible that "at" should mean "in." Then, in the strict construction which ought to be given to this charter, it is said that, if the tide-water of the Potomac extends as high as the upper line of the District of Columbia, the canal must stop at that line. But here, also, it is admitted, that this strict requisition of the charter must be relaxed, by the application of a reasonable construction; introducing a proviso that the tide-water, where the upper line of the district crosses the river, should be safely and conveniently navigable; and that, if it should not be so, the canal may be continued into the district until it shall meet such navigable water, but no further.

The only words in the charter which describe or define the lower terminus of the canal, are those which have been cited from the preamble, and from the twentieth section. The strict construction of those words, thus contended for, it is said, is corroborated by the terms of the charter of the old Potomac Company, and its practice under that charter; by the memorials of the committee of the canal convention to the legislatures of Maryland and Virginia, in 1823; and of the central committee to congress, in April, 1826; by the report of General Bernard, the chief executive officer of the engineer department; and by the common council of the city of Washington, in their resolution of the 5th of July, 1827, for calling a meeting of the inhabitants to consider the subject of the canal. Whether it will be necessary or proper for the court to resort to such extraneous evidence of the meaning of the charter, will depend upon the question, whether, after applying the proper rule of construction to the words of the charter itself, they shall remain obscure or ambiguous, in relation to the point in dispute?

The first question, then, is, what is the proper rule of construction applicable to charters, and such legislative acts as are in the nature of charters? Is it that the words shall have the strongest possible construction against the grantee? Or is it that they shall have a reasonable construction, drawn from the whole context of the instrument, or act, to carry into effect the intention of the parties? Here it is said that the strictest construction ought to be adopted against the powers granted to the company, because those powers are in derogation of common right. But is that true? Is the right to take private property for public use, upon making just compensation, in derogation of common right? The right of the public has been recognized by the constitution of the United States, and has, from time immemorial, been exercised by the several states ever since the Revolution; and was, before that period, exercised by the colonies, and by the mother country. It is one of the conditions upon which all property is holden by individuals; and, as a member of the public, the individual himself is as much interested in maintaining it, as he is in maintaining his individual rights. The public right is as much common right as the individual right. This public right is not a power exercised merely because the sovereign power cannot be controlled, and therefore in derogation of common right; but it is a constitutional power, primarily assented to by the people themselves, in their original primitive sovereignty, not applicable to any particular individual, but extending equally to all, and creating a lien upon all property, into whose hands soever it may come. The contemplated canal is intended to be a great highway; and no man can be ignorant that he holds his land always subject to the right of the public to make a highway through it, whenever the great interests of the nation or of the state may require it. It does not seem to me, therefore, that the power given by this charter, to condemn land for this highway, is such a power in derogation of common right as will justify the court in confining the words "at" and "from" to their strictest and strongest sense, against the company. Nor would I, on the other hand, entirely adopt the rule applicable to grants,—that the words shall be taken most strongly against the grantor; but the rule most properly applicable seems to be that which is applied to wills, and to ordinary legislative acts; to wit, to give that construction, which will best carry into effect the will of the testator or of the legislature.

The question then occurs, what was the will of the legislature of Virginia, in regard to the lower terminus of the canal? Did they mean to fix the precise spot at which the water of the canal should be mingled with the tide-water of the Potomac? Or did they mean to leave it to the discretion of the company, under any and what limits? The word "from" is not always, and, indeed, in common conversation is seldom exclusive of the place named. Thus, if I should say I had just come from Philadelphia, no one would suppose that I spoke the truth if I had never been in Philadelphia; and, if I had sworn to the fact, I could hardly be saved from the penalty of perjury, by proving that I came from the utmost boundary of the city, without having been either within or upon the boundary. "From" a town, or district, generally means from some indefinite place within that town, or district; and the expression is justified, if the person came from any part of the town or district. So the word "at," in ordinary speech, more generally means within than without. Thus, at a town, or at a county, means at some place within the town, or within the county, rather than a place without, or even at the utmost verge of, but not in the town or county. So in indictments, where the utmost legal precision is necessary, the fact is generally stated to have been done at the place; and, if it were not done in the place, the venue would be wrong. And in indictments in this district, where we have no hamlets or parishes, the act is generally averred to have been committed at the county; and if that did not mean within the county, the court would have no jurisdiction of the cause. The words "from" and "at," therefore, have not, in general, an exclusive signification; nor are they, in the charter, connected with any other words which render it necessary that they should be so construed. The words in the preamble are—"A navigable canal from the tide-water of the river Potomac, in the District of Columbia." This description would be fully justified by a canal from any part of the tide-water of the river Potomac, in that district. In the twentieth section, the words are—"The first, or eastern section, shall begin at the District of Columbia, on tide-water." This description, also, would be justified by a canal beginning in any part of the district, upon tide-water. There is no expression in the charter inconsistent with such a construction. On the contrary, there are several provisions which strongly corroborate it.

The first enacting clause of the charter, by Virginia, of the 27th of January, 1824, requires the assent of the congress of the United States to the provisions of that act; and, by the twenty-third section it is declared, that such assent is understood and taken to relate only to their authority as the legislature of the District of Columbia. But if the words "from" and "at" are to have this exclusive signification, no part of the canal could be within the district, and the assent of congress, as the local legislature of the district, would be wholly unnecessary. So in that case, the assent of congress, which is required by the fourteenth section to an alteration of the rates of toll, would be entirely useless. So in the twenty-first section, a right is given to the United States to retain the power to extend the canal in (not into) the District of Columbia, on either side, or both sides, of the river Potomac; and the same section provides, that "the United States shall authorize the states of Virginia and Maryland, or either of them, to take and continue a canal from any point of the above-named canal, or the termination thereof, through the territory of the District of Columbia." And by the twenty-second section it is enacted, "that this act, or so much thereof as respects the canal and works designed to be constructed in the District of Columbia, and states of Virginia and Maryland, shall take effect, with such necessary modification in the construction thereof, as shall fit it for such limited application or use, upon the assent of the congress of the United States and the legislature of Maryland being given thereto; and, upon its receiving the further assent of the legislature of Pennsylvania, the whole, and every section and part thereof shall be valid, and in full force and operation." So, also, the confirming act of Maryland, of the 31st of January, 1825, says —— "And for the purpose of removing all doubts as to the right of the state of Maryland to intersect the said Chesapeake and Ohio Canal, for the purpose of constructing a lateral canal, or canals, to Baltimore, or elsewhere, in the state of Maryland, from that part of the said Chesapeake and Ohio Canal which shall be within the District of Columbia, be it further enacted," &c.; thereby clearly showing the understanding of the legislature of Maryland, in the very act of confirming the charter, that a part of the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal would be constructed within this district. So also the act of congress of the 3d of March, 1825 (4 Stat. 101), confirming the charter, enacts, "that the act of the legislature of Virginia, entitled an act incorporating the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company, be and the same is hereby ratified and confirmed, so far as may be necessary for the purpose of enabling any company that may hereafter be formed by authority of said act of incorporation, to carry into effect the provisions thereof, in the District of Columbia, within the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, and no further." So also the second section of the same act speaks of the right of Virginia and Maryland, "to take and continue a canal from any point of the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal, to any other point within the territory of the District of Columbia," showing clearly the understanding of congress that a part of the canal would be made in the district. Again, by the fourteenth section of the charter, the old Potomac Company is authorized to transfer, and the new company to accept, all the property, rights, and privileges of the Potomac Company, which has been done, and among that property are locks below the little falls, which are within the district, and which are to be kept in repair by the new company until the new works shall be substituted for them. So, also, it is enacted by the second section of the act of congress of the 23d of May, 1828 (4 Stat. 293), that the authority designed by the former act of congress, confirming the charter to be given to the states of Virginia and Maryland, "to extend a branch from the said canal, or to prolong the same from the termination thereof, by a continuous canal within or through the District of Columbia towards the territories of either of those states, shall be taken to be as full and complete in all respects as the authority granted by that act to the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company to extend the main stem of the said canal within the said district." So, also, by the act of congress of the 24th of May, 1828 (4 Stat. 293), it is enacted, "that, for the supply of water to such other canals as the state of Maryland, or Virginia, or the congress of the United States may authorize to be constructed in connection with the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal, the section of the said canal leading from the head of the little falls of the Potomac river, to the proposed basin next above Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, shall have the elevation above the tide of the river at the head of the said falls, and shall preserve throughout the whole section aforesaid a breadth at a surface of the water of not less than sixty feet, and of depth, below the same, of not less than five feet, with a suitable breadth at bottom."

Nothing can be more clear than that the legislatures of Virginia, Maryland, and the United States, expected that some part of the canal and works would be constructed within the District of Columbia; and, consequently, that they did not mean to use the words "from" and "at" in their exclusive sense. If those words are not to be confined to their exclusive sense, they must be taken in their ordinary sense; and, taken in their ordinary sense, they authorize the company to commence the canal on any part of the tide water in the District of Columbia. Who, then, is to determine the precise spot where it shall commence? Surely it must be the company, for they only have a right to make the canal; and they are bound to make it in a certain time, under the penalty of a forfeiture of their charter. They must, therefore, act upon the subject; and who shall control their discretion, if they exercise it honestly? It is said, that the object of the charter was to make the river navigable where it was not navigable before; and as it was before navigable a mile or two above Georgetown, the meaning of the legislature was, that they should commence the canal a mile or two above that town. But the legislature has not said so. The only limit they have imposed to the discretion of the company is, that they should begin their canal on the tide water in the District of Columbia. Besides, if that idea were to limit their powers, they would have to let their canal down into the Potomac at every point where it is already navigable. And again, it is not probable, that when the legislature was contemplating the great object of a national highway from the eastern to the western part of this continent, they would have occupied themselves with an examination of all the minute and local circumstances which must be taken into view to determine the precise spot where it would be best for all concerned that the canal should commence. But it is sufficient to say that they have not determined it, and we can easily imagine many good reasons why they have not. It has also been suggested that this company is only a substitute for the old Potomac Company; that the object is the same, and that all the property, rights, privileges, and powers of the old company are transferred to the new; and, therefore, that the new company cannot extend the canal further down into the district than the works of the old company extended. But the old company was obliged, by its charter, "to make at or near the little falls, such canal and locks, if necessary, as will be sufficient and proper to let vessels and rafts aforesaid into tide water." But no such limitation is contained in the new charter, nor are the powers of the new charter at all limited by reference to those of the old. Whatever analogy there may be between the object and powers of the old company and those of the new, it does not affect the plain and clear provisions of the latter.

Not perceiving any ambiguity or uncertainty in the provisions of the present charter, in regard to the place of commencement of the canal; and being of opinion, that the fixing the precise point of commencement is left to the discretion of the company, within the limits fixed by the charter, it is unnecessary to examine the extraneous matter which has been offered in evidence, such as the memorials of the committee of the canal convention, &c., for whatever looseness or uncertainty there might be in papers of that kind, where the precise point of beginning was not the object of those memorials, the terms seem to be sufficiently settled by the charter itself. The company, therefore, having the right to determine the precise place of commencing the eastern section of the canal, within the limits prescribed to them by their charter, and having so determined it, have a right to obtain, by agreement or condemnation, all the land that may be "necessary for the making of the said canal, dams, locks," &c.; and the only remaining question is, whether the proceedings, in obtaining the condemnation of the land mentioned in this inquisition, are correct, and can be sustained.

The first objection taken to them is, that the warrant is insufficient: 1. Because it is general, embracing land belonging to divers persons having no connection with each other; whereas there ought to have been a separate warrant for each person's land. 2. Because the warrant does not state a disagreement between the company and the defendant (Mr. Key), before the issuing the warrant, so as to justify the company in requiring a warrant against his land, or to authorize the justice of the peace to grant it; nor does it state that Mr. Key was under age, or non compos, or out of the state or county. 3. Because the warrant does not, with sufficient certainty, describe the land to be condemned. 4. Because it does not name the owners. 5. Because no definite certain day was expressed in the warrant for the jury to meet on the land. Being of opinion that the fifth objection to this warrant, namely, that it does not express a certain day for the jury to meet on the land, is fatal to this inquisition; and it being very important to all the parties concerned that the opinion of the court should be known upon the other important points in the cause which it has considered; and as the other objections taken to the proceedings involve many new and nice questions, which it will take more time to decide correctly than the court can, during the short intervals between their daily sessions, bestow upon them, the court deems it to be its duty to deliver its opinion now, upon the points which it can decide; and to decline giving any opinion upon the other points at present. The fifteenth section of the charter requires that a day should be expressed in the warrant, for the meeting of the jury upon the land. This warrant commanded the marshal to summon a jury "to meet on the said quantity of land, and lands adjacent thereto respectively, on Thursday, Friday, and Saturday, Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday, the ninth, tenth, and eleventh, thirteenth, fourteenth, fifteenth, sixteenth, and seventeenth days of April next, or so many days thereof as may be necessary to complete the said inquisition. Who was to say which of those days would be necessary? It is evident that no certain day is fixed by the warrant, and for that reason it is the opinion of the court that this inquisition must, in the language of the charter, be "set aside," with costs.

The other two judges [THRUSTON and MORSELL, Circuit Judges] feeling interested in the questions involved in this cause, sat only to make a court, and declined giving any opinion; so that the foregoing opinion is, in truth, that of the CHIEF JUSTICE only.

CHESAPEAKE & O. CANAL CO. v. MASON.

[4 Cranch, C. C. 123.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May Term, 1830.

EMINENT DOMAIN—SETTING ASIDE INQUISITION.

An inquisition, condemning more land than can be reasonably required for the use of the Chesapeake & Ohio Canal Company, or if the boundaries are not ascertained with certainty, will be set aside by the court.

C. Cox and Mr. Swann, for plaintiff.

Mr. Key, for defendant.

This was a motion to set aside an inquisition condemning land of [John] Mason, in Georgetown, District of Columbia, for the use of the Chesapeake & Ohio Canal.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent), upon hearing the testimony of witnesses, and the arguments of counsel, set aside the inquisition, because they were of opinion that the company had unreasonably required the condemnation of the whole lot, when they might have left valuable property to Mr. Mason, which seems to be of no use to the company, and because the jury had not ascertained, with sufficient certainty, the bounds of the land condemned.

[3 Cranch, C. C. 598.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May Term, 1829.

CHESAPEAKE & OHIO CANAL COMPANY—JUDGMENT FOR NONPAYMENT OF INSTALMENTS.

The instalments due by the subscribers to the Chesapeake & Ohio Canal Company, may be recovered on motion, with costs.

This was a motion for judgment against [Nathaniel P. Poor], a stockholder, for instalments due upon the shares subscribed for by him in the stock of the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company; ten days' notice of the motion having been given, according to the fifth section of the charter granted by Virginia, and confirmed by the states of Maryland and Pennsylvania, and by the United States; by which it is enacted that "whenever any subscriber shall fail to pay any instalment called for by the company, it shall and may be lawful for the company, upon motion to be made in any court of record, after ten days notice, to obtain judgment against the subscriber so failing to pay." The charter says nothing respecting the costs of the motion.

Mr. Wallach, for plaintiff, observed that the statute of Glocester gives costs wherever damages could be recovered at common law, although a summary remedy may be given by statute. Hull. Costs, 5. If these subscriptions had been sued for at common law, upon the contract, damages would have been given.

THE COURT (nem. con.) ordered the judgment to be entered for the several subscriptions, with costs; and observed, that the charter was granted by Virginia, and confirmed and adopted by Maryland, Pennsylvania, and the United States; and that there was in Virginia, at that time, a statute authorizing the court in all cases of judgment on motion to give costs at its discretion. If such a motion as the present were made in Virginia against a subscriber under this charter, the judgment would be with costs, and the same construction should be given everywhere to this clause of the charter.

Judgment for $75, with costs.

CHESAPEAKE & O. CANAL CO. v. ROBERTSON.

[4 Cranch, C. C. 291.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. March Term, 1833.

CHESAPEAKE & OHIO CANAL COMPANY—RIGHTS OF SUBSCRIBER.

The original subscribers to the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company are bound by the alterations of the charter made by subsequent acts of legislation with the consent of the corporation.

This was a motion by C. Cox, for the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company, for judgment for an unpaid instalment under the fifth section of the original charter granted by Virginia on the 27th of January, 1824.

Mr. Key, for defendant [Henry B. Robertson].

The original subscribers are not bound by the alterations made by subsequent acts of legislation; although made with the consent of the corporation. The company cannot consent to any alterations that can bind the original subscribers. The subscriptions were made under the act of Virginia of the 27th of January, 1824; the act of Maryland was passed at the December session of 1824, and the act of congress on the 3d of

March, 1825. Material alterations have been made by the act of Maryland of the 10th of March, 1827; the Maryland act of December, 1826, and by the act of Virginia of the 25th of January, 1828. (Quaere, February 26, 1828?) These amendments make a new charter. The company afterwards assented to these alterations, but the old subscribers were not members of the company which so assented.

Mr. Key cited the following authorities: The case of Dartmouth College, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 590; Head v. Providence Ins. Co., 2 Cranch [6 U. S.] 127; Gozler v. Georgetown, 6 Wheat. [19 U. S.] 593; Terrett v. Taylor, 9 Cranch [13 U. S.] 43; Rex v. Pasmore, 3 Term R. 240; Wales v. Stetson, 2 Mass. 143; Ellis v. Marshall, Id. 269; Baggs' Case, 1 Rolle, 224; Dom. Civ. Law, 153; Poth. Obl. 565; Korn v. Mut. Assur. Soc., 6 Cranch [10 U. S.] 192; 3 Bac. Abr. 16; Kyd, Corp. 401; Currie v. Mutual Assur. Soc. 4 Hen. & M. 315.

Mr. Cox referred to Angell & Ames on Corporations. The company was first organized on the 20th of June, 1828. All those alterations had then been made. Mr. Robertson has paid all but the twelfth and following instalments. At a general meeting of the company on the 3rd of July, 1828, Mr. Key moved that the company assent to the alterations, and the motion was carried unanimously, the defendant being present, or represented, at the meeting.

THE COURT (nem. con.) overruled the objections, and ordered the judgment to be entered up, with costs.

CHESAPEAKE & O. CANAL CO. v. UNION BANK.

[4 Cranch, C. C. 75.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May Term, 1830.

EMINENT DOMAIN—THE INQUISITION.

1. Where several warrants have been issued and returned, with inquisitions for condemning land for the use of the company, and each inquisition refers to the warrant returned therewith, it is competent to prove by parol which warrant is applicable to each inquisition.

2. The jury ought to ascertain and describe the bounds of the land by them valued, and the quality and duration of the interest and estate in the same.

3. The canal company is the sole judge, what interest in the land will be necessary for their operations, and the jury are to value such interest as the company shall require.

4. The charter does not require notice to be given to the party whose lands are sought to be condemned; and, therefore, the inquisition need not state that such notice has been given; but it ought, in fact, to be given, if the party be, at the time, within the county.

5. It is not necessary that the inquisition should state the value of the land separately from the damages.

6. The benefit to the owner may be as well set off against the value of the land as against the damages.

7. Quaere, whether it be necessary that the jury should ascertain the bounds of the land, upon the land itself, by metes and bounds?

8. In authorizing the condemnation of lands for a highway, the United States only claim to exercise the power, which belongs to every sovereign, to appropriate private property to public use.

[Approved in Shoemaker v. U. S., 147 U. S. 282, 13 Sup. Ct. 362.]

This was a motion, by Mr. J. Dunlop, to set aside an inquisition condemning land in Washington for the use of the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company, under the fifteenth section of its charter of January, 1824, granted by Virginia, and confirmed by Pennsylvania, Maryland, and the United States.

Key & Dunlop, for Union Bank.

Swann & Jones, for canal company.

[Before CRANCH, Chief Judge, and MORSELL, Circuit Judge.]

CRANCH, Chief Judge. 1. The first objection to the inquisition is, that the name of the owner of land does not appear in the inquisition; and although the inquisition refers to a warrant supposed to be returned therewith, yet that warrant is not annexed to the inquisition, nor referred to by any mark or other description by which it can be ascertained to which of the various warrants returned, it refers. In answer to this objection, we think it is competent for the clerk to whom, by law, it was returned; or for the marshal who took and returned the inquisition and warrant, to prove, by parol, the fact of the return, and to designate which warrant was returned with the inquisition. It is admitted in argument that a warrant was returned and filed with this inquisition; in which warrant the property proposed to be valued is stated to be the property of the Union Bank of Georgetown; and the inquisition with which it was returned and filed, is marked on the margin with these letters: "Pt. & Drs. U. B." We thing it is competent for the canal company to prove those facts by parol.

2, 3. The second and third objections are, that the property is not sufficiently described either in the warrant or inquisition. The description is in these words: "All those parts of a lot of land, lying in the county aforesaid, and known and recorded as lots eight (8), nine (9), and ten (10), in the square one (1), in the city of Washington, which lie west of the west side of Twenty-Eighth (28) street west; and all those other pieces of land belonging to said lots, or any of them, and being due west of the said lots, or any of them, and extending thence to, and binding with, the channel of Rock creek,—the property of the president and directors of the Union Bank of Georgetown." It is evident, that neither the bounds of those parts of lots 8, 9, and 10, which lie west of Twenty-Eighth street west, if any such there be; nor of the pieces of land belonging or appertaining to said lots, are ascertained and described by the jury. The square 1 is bounded on the west by Twenty-Seventh street west; therefore no lot, in square 1, can extend west of that street. If any of the lots, in square 1, have privileges extending west of that street, such privileges are not parts of such lots, but appurtenances thereto. The pieces of land which are supposed to be "belonging or appertaining to said lots," are described as lying due west of the said lots; but whether contiguous thereto, or at what distance therefrom, does not appear. They are said to be extending thence. Whence? Not from the place where they were lying, for that would make them extend beyond themselves; not from the lots 8, 9, and 10, for Twenty-Eighth street intervenes; not due west of the same lots, for that designates no place at all. It is impossible to locate these appurtenances from the description. Nor does the plat of square 1, as recorded on the surveyor's books, or the engraved plan of the city, cure the defect. It does not appear that any water privilege is, by law, or by any authoritative regulation, in regard to the plan of the city, annexed to those lots; or, if there is, the extent of it does not appear to have been defined; the jury, therefore, ought to have ascertained and described the bounds of the land by them valued; and not having done so, the inquisition must be set aside. It is much better for all parties, that the error should be now corrected by a new inquisition, than that it should be left for future litigation.

4. The fourth objection is, that the jury ave not "described and ascertained the quality and duration of the interest and estate in the same required by the company for its use." The only reason for introducing this provision into the fifteenth section of the charter, seems to have been to show what quantity of interest in the land was in the contemplation of the jury at the time of the valuation; for that quantity of interest, only, would pass by the valuation. The jury were to value such interest only as the company should require; it was, therefore, necessary that it should appear, in the inquisition, what that interest was. It has been supposed, in argument, that the jury was to ascertain whether that interest was or was not needed by the company. The word, however, is not "needed," but "required," by the company, who are the sole judges what interest in the land will be necessary for their operations; and the jury are to value such interest as the company shall require. The fifteenth section of the charter authorizes the condemnation of land for the temporary use of the company in the construction of their works, as well as a more permanent interest for the actual bed of the canal, and the site of their locks, dams, ponds, and feeders; and the jury is to value the land itself, "as of an absolute estate in perpetuity," "or the partial or temporary appropriation, use, or occupation of such land," according as the same shall be required by the company; and upon such valuation, "and on payment thereof, the said company shall be seized of such land as of an absolute estate in perpetuity, or with such less quantity and duration of interest or estate in the same; or subject to such partial or temporary appropriation, use, or occupation, as shall be required and described as aforesaid, as if conveyed by the owner to them."

From a consideration of these and other provisions of this section, it seems to us very clear, that the canal company, so far as relates to the duty of the jurors, was to be the sole judge what interest in the land was required by the company; and that the only reason why the jury is to describe and ascertain the quality and duration of the interest required by the company is, that it may be known what sort of interest is valued by the jury, so as to know what interest passes to the company by the valuation and payment. The warrant states that the canal is intended to pass through certain land, and that the said land, (therein described,) "is needed as of an absolute estate in perpetuity, for the making of the said canal and its appurtenant works." The jury in the inquisition "say, that all the said land described in the said warrant as of an absolute estate in perpetuity and all damages," &c., "are of the value of one thousand dollars." They have, therefore, clearly expressed, in their inquisition, "the quality and duration of the interest and estate," in the land which they have valued. Its quality is "absolute," and its duration is "in perpetuity." They have not, indeed, stated that the company required an interest and estate of such quality and duration; but this they were not bound to do. They have stated what sort of interest and estate they valued; and the warrant which is returned with, and, by reference, made part of the inquisition, shows that the company required such an interest and estate as they have valued. They have, therefore, "described and ascertained the quality and duration of the interest and estate," "required by the company for its use," which is all they were, in this respect, bound to do.

Much stress, in the argument, was laid upon the word "as," in the finding of the jury in these words: "The jury say that all the said land described in said warrants as of an absolute estate in perpetuity," "and the damages," &c., "are of the value of one thousand dollars;" whereas, in the warrant, the words, "as of an absolute estate in perpetuity," do not constitute any part of the description of the land; so that it is uncertain what interest or estate in the land the jury valued. But this uncertainty is removed entirely by noticing the comma, placed after the word "warrant," in that sentence, which disconnects the word "as" from the word "described," and throws it into the latter clause of the sentence, so as to connect it with the valuation. It is evident, therefore, that the whole sentence ought to be read thus: The jury "say, that the said land described in the said warrant, as an absolute estate in perpetuity and the damages are of the value of one thousand dollars;" showing that they valued the land as of an absolute estate in perpetuity.

5. The fifth objection is, that the inquisition does not show that notice was given to the Union Bank of the time and place of taking the inquisition. The charter does not require notice to be given to any of the parties interested. But as the marshal is to summon jurors not related to the parties, it seems to be necessary that the parties should be named in the warrant; and, perhaps, it may be good cause to set aside an inquisition taken under this charter, that the real owner had no knowledge of the time and place of taking it, if he was, at the time, within the county. But the warrant and inquisition are in the nature of a writ of ad quod damnum, which was a writ to inquire whether a grant, intended to be made by the king, would be to the damage of him and others. The making of a new highway, or the change of an old one, is an act of sovereign power; and the writ is issued at the mere motion of the sovereign himself, to inform his conscience. It is, therefore, an ex parte proceeding; as will be seen in the forms of the writ in Reg. Brev. 247–255. The king commands the sheriff that by the oath of good and lawful men, "you inquire whether it will be to the damage or prejudice of us or of others if we grant to I., that he may give and assign one messuage, &c., in W. to a certain chaplain, &c., to perform divine services for the good of his soul," &c., "and if it should be to the damage and prejudice of us or others, then to what damage and prejudice of us, or of others, and of whom," &c. "And an injunction thereof distinctly and openly made to us in our chancery, under your seal, and the seals of those by whom it shall have been made, without delay you send, and this writ." Test, &c. In folio 255, is a like form for granting a mill-race; and in none of the forms is the sheriff required to give notice to any of the parties; nor does the oath in the present case require the jurors themselves to say whether notice was given or not. It seemed to be admitted in the argument that notice had been actually given to Mr. Beverly, the president of the Union Bank, and that he attended. If such was the fact, I do not think the inquisition should be set aside merely because it does not in itself contain the evidence of notice.

6. The sixth objection is, that the jury have not distinguished between the value of the land and the damages, but have found the value and damages all in one sum. The oath is to "value the land and all damages," &c., "and in every such valuation and assessment of damages," the jury are "instructed to consider, in determining and fixing the amount thereof, the actual benefit," &c., "and to regulate their verdict thereby;" except, that "where such benefit shall exceed, in the estimate of the jury," "the value and damages ascertained as aforesaid," the owner shall not be required "to pay or contribute anything to the said company." The benefits to be derived, therefore, may be as well set off against the value of the land as against the damages, and we see no reason why the jury may not find the result in one entire sum.

7. The seventh objection is, that the jury have not stated that they described and ascertained the bounds of the land upon the land itself by metes and bounds. The charter directs the jury "to describe and ascertain the bounds of the land by them valued." I think this requires them to describe the lands which they value, and to state the bounds thereof with certainty, so that it may be known what they valued, and what would pass to the company upon payment of the valuation. It does not necessarily imply that they themselves were to run and measure the lines, or to see it done by a surveyor.

8. The eighth objection is, that by the Maryland act of cession to the United States, of this part of the District of Columbia, 1791, c. 45, § 2, congress are restrained from affecting the rights of individuals to the soil, otherwise than as the same should be transferred to the United States by such individuals; and it is contended that this prohibits the United States from taking private property in this district, for public use; and that the right of sovereignty, which Maryland exercised, was not transferred. We think it is a sufficient answer to this objection, to say that the United States do not, by this inquisition, or by the charter to the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company, claim any right of property in the soil. They only claim to exercise the power which belongs to every sovereign to appropriate, upon just compensation, private property, to the making of a highway, wherever the public good requires it.

MORSELL, Circuit Judge, concurred in the judgment to set aside the inquisition, and in the opinion, except as to the fifth and seventh objections. In regard to the fifth, he was of opinion that notice ought to appear somewhere in the record; and as to the seventh, that it should also appear that the jury saw the lines run upon the land.

The inquisition set aside, and a new one ordered.

Case No. 2,654.

CHESAPEAKE & O. CANAL CO. v. UNION BANK.

[5 Cranch, C. C. 509.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov. Term, 1838.

RIPARIAN RIGHTS.

The lots in the city of Washington lying on Rock creek, are entitled to the water privilege in front of them, although separated from them by a public street, unless the bank of the creek lies between the street and the creek; and the owner of the lots is entitled to the condemnation money awarded for the water privilege in front of them, condemned for the use of the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company.

[Disapproved in Potomac Steam-Boat Co. v. Upper Potomac Steam-Boat Co., 109 U. S. 693, 3 Sup. Ct. 458. See the dissenting opinion in same case, 109 U. S. 701, 4 Sup. Ct. 17.]

So much of the water privilege of Rock creek as lay west of lots Nos. 8, 9, and 10, in square No. 1, in the city of Washington, had been condemned for the use of the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company; and the question arose whether the Union Bank of Georgetown, to whom those lots had been conveyed by Leonard Harbaugh, who had purchased them, thirty years ago, from the United States, to whom they had been allotted upon the division of the square, between the public and Robert Peter, the original proprietor of the land, had a right to the condemnation money. This question was submitted to the court.

C. Cox, for the canal company, contended that Mr. Harbaugh never had any water privilege as appurtenant to those lots because they were cut off from the creek by 28th street west; and as the streets belonged to the United States, the water privilege belonged to them also; although Mr. Harbaugh built a wharf into the creek, thirty years ago, and he and those claiming under him have occupied the same ever since without interruption, or adverse claim, by any one; no part of the bank of the creek, and no dry land west of the street, one half of which was in the creek.

Mr. Dunlop, for the Union Bank, contended that the streets were conveyed to the United States only as highways, and did not deprive the riparian proprietors of their water rights, and referred to Nicholas King's letter in Burch's Dig. 329, 353, 359, and the wharf regulations by the city commissioners in 1795, and the Maryland act of 1791 (chapter 45, § 12).

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, not sitting) decided that the title of Harbaugh to his wharf was good against the United States, claiming under a private citizen (R. Peter), and that the Union Bank is entitled to the condemnation money.

District Court, S. D. New York. May 6, 1862.[2]

PRIZE—THE CLAIM—PROOF—TRANSFER OF ENEMY VESSEL—RUNNING BLOCKADE—EVIDENCE.

1. A claim in a prize suit should be one of property merely, and should only put in issue, by a simple denial, the validity of the capture.

2. The papers found on board the captured vessel, and the testimony of the witnesses in preparatorio, can alone be considered on the hearing, in the first instance, in the determination of the issue.

3. A transfer of an enemy vessel by an enemy to a neutral, in an enemy port, during the war, is void.

4. In this case the vessel and cargo were falsely represented to be bona fide neutral property, when they were, in fact, enemy property, and as such liable to capture.

5. A contingent destination to a blockaded port must appear on the ship's papers; otherwise it will be presumed that there was a dishonest purpose in approaching such port.

6. In this case there was positive evidence of such dishonest purpose. The alleged purpose of making inquiry as to the raising of the blockade was a mere pretence.

7. A neutral vessel, with knowledge of the existence of a blockade, has no right to proceed to a blockaded port with the purpose of inquiring there as to the continuance of the blockade.

[Cited in The Empress, Case No. 4,477; Stokely v. Smith, Id. 13,473.]

8. The inquiry must be made elsewhere than at the mouth of the port itself.

9. Vessel and cargo condemned.

BETTS, District Judge. On the 6th of December, 1861, the United States ship-of-war Augusta captured the merchant ship Cheshire, with her cargo, at sea, off the harbor of Savannah, Georgia. The captors sent her to the port of New York for adjudication in this court, as prize of war. A libel was filed on the 23d of December, and, on the 17th of January thereafter, claims were interposed on behalf of Joseph Battersby and William

[1] [Reported by Samuel Blatchford, Esq.]

[2] [Affirmed by circuit court in Case No. 2,657; and by supreme court in The Cheshire v. U. S., 3 Wall. (70 U. S.) 231.]

Battersby by Thomas Stone, who represents himself to have been a passenger on board the ship, and her supercargo for the voyage. In these claims it is averred that the Battersbys are British subjects, and partners under the firm of J. & W. Battersby, and the entire cargo was the property of the firm. The test oath to these claims is made by Stone. Various allegations, under the oath of Stone, are annexed to the claims, but they are wholly irrelevant to the issue, except as they may bear upon the question of the credibility of Stone, who was examined as a witness upon the standing interrogatories.

On the 8th of February, following, a further claim was filed, on the part of the Battersbys conjointly, by James Craig, the master of the ship, represented by the same proctor as before, in which it is averred that Joseph Battersby was the sole owner of the vessel, and that Joseph and William, as a mercantile firm, were sole owners of the cargo. To this claim also averments and charges are appended, of tortious and culpable acts on the part of the captors towards the vessel and cargo, and her officers and crew; and to this is added an elaborate instrument, in the form of a protest, reiterating and amplifying the said charges, made in the name of the master, the mate, and three of the crew of the vessel, before the proctor for the claimants, as a notary public.

In the case of The Empress [Case No. 4,476] it has been adjudged in this court that such a mode of pleading in prize causes is irregular and improper; that the claim should be one of property merely, and by a simple denial putting in issue the validity of the capture; and that the papers found on board the captured vessel, and the testimony of the witnesses in preparatorio, can alone be read or considered on the hearing, in the first instance, in the determination of the issue. Such is the well-established rule. The reasons upon which it rests, and the authorities by which it is sustained, are set forth in the case alluded to, and need not be reiterated here. All these collateral statements and protests are, therefore, excluded from the case.

The grounds upon which the validity of the capture is maintained by the libellants are that the alleged neutral ownership of the captured property was simulated, and that the vessel was fitted out at Liverpool, England, and despatched thence on a voyage to Savannah, Georgia, with knowledge, on the part of the owners of vessel and cargo, that the port of Savannah was under blockade at the time, and with the purpose and intent of violating the blockade, which was only prevented by the capture.

On the part of the claimants it is insisted that the vessel and cargo are bona fide neutral property; that the voyage in question was honestly set on foot by them, without the purpose of violating the blockade, and, indeed, without knowledge that it was still in force; and that to avoid misapprehension, the voyage was planned and prosecuted under the precaution and direction that the vessel should sail from Liverpool first to the vicinity of Savannah, there to inquire and ascertain if the port was still under blockade, and if not, to make that her port of destination, and there deliver her cargo; but if the blockade was found to be in force, to go to the British port of Nassau, New Providence. And it is further insisted that these directions were carefully and truly followed and adhered to by the claimants and their agents, and that the vessel was captured by the libellants on their arrival off the port of Savannah, without any warning being indorsed on the ship's register, or any direct previous notice having been given that the port was under blockade.

It will be seen that there are three questions involved in the issue between the parties: 1. Were the vessel and cargo bona fide neutral property, or was the nationality merely simulated as a cover or protection from consequences of capture? 2. Was it truly the purpose of the vessel, on approaching the port of Savannah, to make an honest inquiry into the continuance of a known prior blockade before attempting to enter the port, or was it, on the contrary, designed to attempt to enter without speaking or being bespoken off the harbor, or making any previous effort to ascertain if the blockade were still maintained? 3. With the knowledge of the blockade possessed by the master and the owners of the vessel and cargo, in view of the character of her lading, and on the facts in proof, could she lawfully go to the port of Savannah, to inquire there as to the continued existence of the blockade?

First. As to the neutral ownership of the captured property. The prima facie evidence of this neutrality, as derived either from the ship's papers or from the testimony of the master and the supercargo, on their examination in preparatorio, is open to serious distrust. The vessel was of American build, and had been in the trade between Savannah and Liverpool, conducted, from the time of the breaking out of the rebellion, substantially, if not entirely, by the present claimants, J. & W. Battersby. It is proved that instead of both claimants being residents of Manchester, England, as is averred, one of them was at the commencement of the war, and ever since has been, domiciled in Savannah, and engaged there in conducting the trade of that vessel between that port and Liverpool; and that he being thus domiciliated, and therefore having full knowledge of the state of war between the so-called Confederate States and the United States, of the imposition of the blockade on the port of Savannah, and of its efficiency, the vessel was laden in that port with a cargo, the produce of that country, and actually evaded the blockade of that port and transported her cargo to Liverpool; that voyage being the one next preceding the voyage upon which she was captured. The American name of the vessel was the Monterey, of Savannah. She was furnished with a British register, under the name of the Cheshire, at Liverpool, on the 30th of August, 1861, about ninety days before her capture; and this constitutes the sole documentary evidence of a change of ownership. No bill of sale is produced, nor is there any evidence of the payment of a consideration for her alleged transfer. Stone, the supercargo, testifies (in answer to the 14th interrogatory) that the vessel was owned by Joseph Battersby. He thinks the bill of sale was given in Savannah by Brigham & Baldwin, or by their agents; and he thinks "it was some time last winter, on the passage from Liverpool to Savannah; they bought her to arrive." "I think this was the way the ship was bought." And, in answer to the 14th interrogatory, he says: "I know Mr. Battersby is the owner by the register, and I have heard him say he was." Brigham & Baldwin, the former registered owners of the ship, were citizens of Savannah, and, as such, were, in law, public enemies at the time of the alleged transfer to Battersby as a British subject. Such a transfer, being in fraud of belligerent rights, could have no validity. Battersby, the alleged transferee, was a partner in the house of trade domiciliated in Savannah, the residence of the other partner. A transfer to him, therefore, of property thus employed in the trade of the enemy would wholly fail in divesting it of its hostile character under the law of nations.

But supposing, for the moment, that such a transfer might have been lawfully made, and that the property might by such transfer have become neutral, yet the reality and integrity of the transfer itself so essentially rest upon the testimony of the witness Stone that his evidence requires special attention. He says that he is an Englishman by birth, but is an American citizen, and has for the last thirteen years resided with his family at Williamsburgh, New York; that he was on board at the time of the capture, which took place nine or ten miles from Tybee, but does not know why the vessel was captured; that she belongs to Joseph Battersby, of Manchester, England; that the master, he thinks, was appointed by Mr. Battersby, in Liverpool, where he took possession of her in October or September last; that the vessel's company when captured consisted of seventeen persons, but he did not belong to the vessel's company, and "had no part, share of, or interest in the vessel or cargo;" and that the vessel sailed from Liverpool to Savannah some time the previous winter with a cargo of salt, and some time in May last back from Savannah to Liverpool with a cargo of cotton, and returned from Liverpool in October, on the voyage upon which she was captured. In answer to the 14th interrogatory, he says that he knew Battersby was the owner of the vessel from his own declaration and the register, but "does not know who owned the cargo; it was shipped by Charles Hill, of Liverpool;" and he adds, in answer to the 28th interrogatory, that "he supposed the shipper," Charles Hill, "would have owned the cargo when it arrived;" that the Battersbys reside with their families in England, and have always resided there; and that he resides with their family when in England. To the 39th interrogatory, he says that he has "stated all that he knew or believes relative to the true property or destination of vessel and cargo." These formal interrogatories were replied to by the witness, under the solemnity of an oath, on the 17th day of January, 1862. On the same day the claim of the Battersbys is filed, accompanied by the test oath of this witness, who therein swears that "he had been in the employ of the claimants, Joseph Battersby and William Battersby, for upwards of four years, and that he was a passenger on board the ship Cheshire, and supercargo on the voyage on which she was seized, and makes this test oath, and deposes to the verity of the above claim." Thus, by averments of long acquaintance, residence in their families, employment for years, and being supercargo upon this voyage, the witness displays his abundant means of knowledge as to the ownership of the cargo, and states, in the claim, to which he swears, that "all the cargo was owned by the claimants," the Battersbys; while on his examination as a witness by the commissioner, he swears that he "has no knowledge as to the ownership of the cargo," but supposes "that it would, on its arrival, belong to the shipper," Hill.

When it is considered that the good faith of the alleged transfer of the vessel from Brigham & Baldwin rests entirely upon the testimony of this witness, it may well be asked, whether such an irreconcilable incongruity as this in his own sworn statements does not sufficiently impair his credit as a witness, to raise a very serious doubt of the good faith of the alleged transfer?

But the testimony of this witness, Stone, is not only thus impaired by the inconsistencies and contradictions of his own sworn statements upon material points, but upon other points equally material and relating to the questions of the honesty or culpability of the voyage, of the purpose to inquire at the mouth of the port before attempting to enter, and of the design and attempt to enter without inquiry, he is directly contradicted by another witness, examined in preparatorio, who is unimpeached, and who could have no motive or inducement to falsify from position or relationship to the parties, and whose evidence, entirely consistent in itself, and with all the known and conceded facts, is, moreover, confirmed by the vessel's journal or log. This testimony, in connexion with that of Stone, I shall advert to in considering the next proposition involved in the contestation. I here speak of it as evidence inherently reliable, which directly contradicts that of Stone. When added to this contradiction of himself, it casts such discredit upon his testimony (on which alone rests, the averment of the neutral ownership of the captured property) as, in my judgment, to raise an impressive presumption that the vessel and cargo were falsely represented to be bona fide neutral property, while they, in truth, belonged, wholly or in part, to persons domiciled in the so-called Confederate States, and, therefore, to public enemies of the United States under the law of nations, and were, as such, liable to capture and confiscation. Halleck, Int. Law, c. 21, §§ 1–3; Duer, Ins. lect. 6, §§ 1–3.

Second. Was the voyage of the ship Cheshire from Liverpool to the port of Savannah, and her approach to that port, undertaken and prosecuted with the honest intent to inquire there if the blockade was still in force, and by no means to enter the port without making inquiry; or, on the contrary, was the voyage set on foot and prosecuted, and was the port of Savannah approached, with the purpose and intent to enter without inquiry if a favorable opportunity should occur or could be made?

In entering upon this inquiry, the fact first presenting itself is not without its influence. The business of carrying cotton out of the port of Savannah, and, in return, taking needed supplies to the enemy within that port, in spite of the blockade, seems to have been the business to which the ship was devoted by her owners, and in which she was successfully employed until her capture. But the averment of the purpose, in good faith, to go to the mouth of the port, and there make honest inquiry as to the blockade, and to deliver her cargo there, as her destined port, only in the contingency of finding, on inquiry, that the blockade was raised, is met by an objection which Sir William Scott, in a like case, regards as the most pregnant evidence of the falsity of such representations. The ship's papers disclose no such contingent destination. She was documented simply for a voyage to Nassau or Halifax, and back to a port in Europe. If the averments on which the defence rests be true, then the ship's papers are false, in fraudulently concealing the fact of the contingent destination to Savannah, and representing the destination to be absolute to Nassau or Halifax. The dishonesty of the purpose of the approach to the blockaded port of Savannah is clearly evinced by the studied concealment in the papers of the intent to approach it at all.

In the case to which I have alluded (The Carolina, 3 C. Rob. Adm. 75) Sir William Scott says: "Had there been any fair, contingent, deliberative intention of going to Ostend, that ought to have appeared on the bill of lading, for it ought not to be an absolute destination to Hamburg, if it was at all a question whether the ship might not go to Ostend, a port of the enemy. There is, then, an undue and fraudulent concealment of an important circumstance which ought to have been disclosed." See, also, The Margaretha Charlotte, 3 C. Rob. Adm. 78, note. In a recent case (The Union, 1 Spinks, Prize Cas. 164) Dr. Lushington says that a ship's papers should show her destination to a blockaded port, in the contingency of a blockade being found raised upon her arrival, and otherwise should show her ulterior destination. This offence of clothing a vessel with false documents, which conceal her real destination, and set forth that as her absolute destination which is, in truth, but contingent, is justly regarded as sufficient cause for capture and confiscation.

This vessel, with papers on board which declare that her voyage is from the port of Liverpool to Nassau, New Providence, or to Halifax, Nova Scotia, and which do not disclose any destination as intended in any contingency, is found off the blockaded port of Savannah, in Georgia. Upon authority, the presumption of the dishonest purpose of the voyage, and of the dishonest approach to the blockaded port, arising from the papers, and in the absence of any explanatory proof, is conclusive. And here I might rest the second proposition. But there is positive evidence, in the testimony before me, of the dishonest purpose of the voyage, of such a character that I cannot pass it in silence.

The averred purpose of the approach to Savannah, for inquiry simply, and without design to enter without inquiry, is maintained by the positive testimony of the witness Stone. In reviewing the evidence of this witness upon another point, I have had occasion to show its unworthiness, resulting from its contradictions and inconsistencies, and have alluded to the fact that, upon the point I am now considering, it is in direct conflict with the testimony of a witness whose evidence is consistent in itself, and not only unimpeached, but confirmed by the conceded facts of the case. That witness is John Thornton, one of the crew of the ship, shipped at Liverpool as cook, but who afterwards served as cabin boy. He testifies substantially as follows: that Craig was only the nominal master; that Stone had the actual control on board; that Stone had been long a resident of Savannah, although his family was at Williamsburgh, New York; that Stone informed the witness that he was engaged by Battersby at Savannah, where Battersby lived and carried on business, to take command of the vessel, in Liverpool, for this voyage back to Savannah, with the intention of running the blockade; that the crew were all hired by Stone, who received the vessel from Captain Norton, in September, 1861; that he, Stone, had informed witness that he owned the vessel, and had an interest in the cargo; that this was in New York, and since the capture; that he heard Stone inform Craig that the vessel ran the blockade on the preceding voyage, when commanded by Captain Norton, under the name of the Monterey, of Savannah; that the cargo, upon this voyage, was to have been delivered in Savannah to Mr. Battersby, who resided there, as did Stone also; that the existence of the blockade was well known to all on board; that on the night before she was captured, the lights of the vessel were all extinguished, and an attempt was made to run the blockade, but that, having failed upon that occasion to find the water sufficiently deep the ship was put about and stood out to sea, till the following morning, when she again stood in for the port, and was captured about seven miles from Tybee; and that Captain Stone said, that if he could have got under the guns of Fort Pulaski he would have been safe; that the cargo cost $30,000, and that, if he had been able to get into the blockaded port, he would have realized $250,000.

No part of the testimony of this witness is inconsistent with the general evidence in the case, other than the conflict between his statements and those of Stone; and as to those differences there would seem to be no doubt, if he is entitled to full credit as to all the declarations and admissions imputed by him to Stone, that his contradictions are so direct and positive to important statements made in Stone's testimony, that the court is bound to withhold belief from the latter.

Thornton is also corroborated, and the averments of Stone are discredited by the ship's log. Stone says that the vessel lay off the port of Savannah two days, and tried to speak three or four vessels, but could not. The log discloses the fact that vessels were present "all around," and states no attempt to speak any of them; nor does it make any allusion to the least difficulty in communicating with either or all of them, had it been desired. The log shows that the Cheshire had been tacking off and on, from early dawn of Thursday, the 5th of December, until the afternoon of Saturday, the 7th, and was actually in a position, at the time testified to by Thornton, to make the attempt to enter the port at night; which attempt Thornton swears was made, and failed for want of sufficient depth of water.

Upon the testimony, and upon all the facts in the case, the conclusion is unavoidable that the ship, with full knowledge of the establishment and efficiency of the blockade of Savannah, was despatched upon a voyage to that port, with a fixed design to violate the blockade and there deliver her cargo, if practicable; and that the alleged purpose of making previous inquiry was a mere pretence, having no real existence. This result is conclusive as to all the alleged rights of the respective claimants, and involves the necessity of condemning both vessel and cargo.

Third. With the knowledge of the blockade possessed by the master and owners of the vessel and cargo, and on the facts in proof could the ship lawfully go to the mouth of the port of Savannah, for the purpose of inquiring there as to the continued existence of the blockade? Although the conclusion to which the evidence has directed me upon the preceding proposition renders it unnecessary to decide this point in the case, yet it is proper to say, whenever the question arises, that it is res adjudicata in this court. In the case of The Delta [Case No. 3,777], not long since argued and determined, the point arose and was decided.

The authorities are clear and conclusive that a neutral vessel, with knowledge of the existence of a blockade, had no right to proceed to the very port blockaded, with the pretended or actual purpose of inquiring there as to its continuance. It is the policy of the law to inhibit neutral vessels from assuming such positions with reference to the blockaded port, as must, of necessity, greatly increase the watchfulness and activity of the naval force, and at the same time afford to the neutral vessel extraordinary facilities for a fraudulent evasion of the rights of a belligerent. It is well settled, that where the destination of a neutral vessel to a blockaded port is contingent upon inquiry, that inquiry must be made elsewhere than at the mouth of the port itself. In the case which I have cited in another connexion (The Union, 1 Spinks, Prize Cas. 164,) Dr. Lushington says, that "where an excuse is set up that the vessel approached the blockaded port to make inquiry, it must be clearly proved by evidence perfectly satisfactory to the judgment of the court that she was ignorant of the fact of the blockade." Here no pretence of ignorance is set up; and, indeed, such pretence, in view of all the facts in proof, and especially of the violation of the blockade on the previous voyage, would be quite preposterous.

In the case of The Delta [supra], I considered, at length, the reasons upon which the rule is placed which prohibits neutral vessels from approaching the blockaded port to make inquiry, and reviewed the authorities which establish the doctrine. As the conclusion in this case is not exclusively or necessarily based upon this doctrine, I need only refer to what was there said, without reiteration. The vessel and cargo, in this case, were, for the several reasons stated, lawfully captured, and a decree of condemnation must be entered accordingly.

This decree was affirmed by the circuit court, on appeal July 17, 1863. [Case No. 2,657.] From the decree of the circuit court the claimants appealed to the supreme court, where the decree was affirmed March 5, 1866. [The Cheshire v. U. S., 3 Wall. (70 U. S.) 231.]

PRIZE—SALE OF PERISHABLE PROPERTY.

After a decision condemning the vessel and cargo, but before the entry of the decree, the libellants moved for an immediate sale of vessel and cargo, as being in a perishing condition. The court held, on the facts, that no necessity was shown for such sale.

[Cited in The Empress, Case No. 4,477.]

BETTS, District Judge. This suit was brought to hearing on the preliminary evidence of the ship's papers and the proofs, in preparatorio, on the 10th of March last, and was, after two days' discussion, submitted to the court for decision, with the reservation of a privilege to the counsel to file additional briefs during that week. Although the briefs were frequently asked for by the court, circumstances delayed their being furnished until about the 1st of May. In the meantime, the case had been so far considered by the court that it was enabled, immediately after reviewing the written briefs, (about the 5th or 6th of May,) to conclude the examination of the papers, and an interlocutory decision was rendered, condemning the vessel and cargo to forfeiture as lawful prize. [Case No. 2,655.] The papers were, with the decision, immediately placed in the hands of the clerk, with a view to the preparation of the formal decree to be entered on the minutes of the court, but such registry, it appears, has not been made, nor has the decree been notified to the claimants.

The district attorney, in behalf of the libellants, on the official report of the prize commissioners, accompanied by the sworn appraisements and statements of Cyrus Curtiss and E. B. Seaman, and the deposition of Walter S. Gove, who has had the custody of the vessel and the storage of the cargo a principal part of the time since their arrival as prize in this port, moves the court for an order for the immediate sale of the vessel and cargo as being both of them in a perishable and perishing condition. Mr. Edwards, on the part of the claimants in the suit, opposes the application, and reads the affidavits of Robert Mackie, Charles H. Marshall and Washington Durbrow, to prove that the vessel is not perishing, or in a perishable condition, and that the cargo is not perishing, or in a suffering condition, or liable to deterioration, in the situation in which it is now placed.

The testimony of the claimants' witnesses rests upon a more specific and distinct notice of the facts relating to the state and exposure of the property than is furnished by the affidavits filed on the part of the United States, and relieves the case from all apparent necessity for an immediate sale of the property, by an extraordinary interposition of the court, and without waiting the ordinary course of procedure in the cause. The libellants, holding a decree in the suit, in effect final, since its rendition, possessed the power to compel a sale of the prize at once, upon execution, and do not require the protection of any further order to guard their interests in the recovery. No legal reason is shown for seeking an additional interlocutory order, in place of using the final decree of the court for effectuating the same end within the same period of time. It is suggested by the district attorney, and in effect admitted by the counsel for the claimants, that an appeal will be taken in the suit, immediately on the entry of the final decree, which may lead to delaying final execution on the decree of this court. But the court will not intercept the free use to either party of all appropriate remedies provided by law, where no evidence is given that such election must be attended with palpable loss or damage to the other party, and that a restraint in that respect is necessary to the prosecution of rights involved in the subject of litigation. If property is shown to be in a state of absolute wastage, or in such predicament that the shortest delay in disposing of it would reasonably lead to imminent peril of its loss or large deterioration, the court will undoubtedly interpose the aid of a summary sale, to avoid the destruction of the property condemned; but, without the pressure of such urgency, the regular course of proceedings will be left to govern the remedy in prize suits, the same as in other civil causes in admiralty.

As I do not regard the preponderance of evidence filed in the cause as showing a reasonable necessity for an instant sale of the property, the application for a summary order to that end is denied, and the libellants are left to enforce the decree by regular writ of execution.

[NOTE. The claimants appealed to the circuit court, where the decree referred to herein was affirmed. See Case No. 2,657. The claimants then appealed to the supreme court, where the circuit court decree was affirmed. See The Cheshire v. U. S., 3 Wall. (70 U. S.) 231.]

[Proceedings to condemn the ship Cheshire and cargo for an attempted violation of the blockade. The claimants appeal from a sentence of condemnation rendered in the district court. Case No. 2,655.]

NELSON, Circuit Justice. This vessel was captured off the port of Savannah, Georgia, on the 6th of December, 1861, by the steamer Augusta, one of the blockading vessels. She was on a voyage from Liverpool to Nassau, N. P., with directions, from the shipper of the cargo and agent of the owner of the vessel and cargo, to call at the port of Savannah and inquire if the blockade had been removed. The vessel sailed from Liverpool on the 10th of October, 1861, with a cargo of coffee, salt, tin, blankets, &c. She was owned by Joseph Battersby, and the cargo was owned by him and his brother William, both of them merchants of Manchester, England, and British subjects. The firm had an agency at Savannah, Georgia, where they had carried on business several years. The vessel had been purchased from a house at Savannah, the previous winter, by J. Battersby, and carried a cargo from Liverpool to Savannah and back, leaving the port of Savannah in May, 1861. It is quite apparent, from the testimony in the case, that all parties concerned in the present shipment were aware of the blockade of the port of Savannah at the time the vessel left Liverpool, October 10, 1861; and, unless the right existed to call at the blockaded port, and inquire there for the purpose of ascertaining if the blockade was still in force, the condemnation of the vessel and cargo is unavoidable.

I agree that, as no official notice of the blockade was given to England, the condemnation in this case must be upheld, if at all, on the footing of the violation of a blockade de facto, in which case the master may have been justified in making the inquiry at the port if the owners and master were ignorant of its existence at the time the vessel sailed from Liverpool. This principle is, I think, well settled. But the difficulty lies in the fact that all the parties concerned were fully advised of the existence of the blockade, and no ground or reason is furnished for a belief that it had ceased. If the master, under the facts and circumstances of this case, could be justified in making the inquiry, he would be in any imaginable case. I lay aside the testimony of the boy, Thornton, as unworthy of credit, and see no ground for the condemnation of the vessel or cargo as enemy's property. But, within the case of the Hiawatha, in the supreme court, the decree below is correct, on the ground of an attempt to violate the blockade of the port of Savannah. Decree below affirmed.

[NOTE. For denial of a motion for the sale of the vessel and cargo, see Case No. 2,656.

[From this decree the claimants appealed to the supreme court, where the decree of the circuit court was affirmed. Mr. Justice Field, who delivered the opinion, assigned as grounds for affirmance that the intention to break the blockade would be presumed from the position of the vessel when captured; that she knew of the blockade when she sailed from Liverpool, had no just reason to suppose it discontinued; and that consequently her approach to the mouth of the port for inquiry was itself a violation of the blockade, which subjected the vessel and cargo to seizure and condemnation. Case No. 2,658.

The CHESHIRE.

[2 Spr. 28.] [1]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. Jan., 1861.

LIABILITY OF VESSEL TO SHIPPER—STOWAGE.

A vessel is liable in rem for damage caused to goods of one shipper by those of another, although the goods are stowed in the usual way, if the injury is caused by the goods of the third party being in bad condition when put on board.

In admiralty. This was a suit to recover for leakage of about one thousand two hundred and ninety-six gallons of sperm-oil, out of three thousand three hundred and five gallons, contained in twenty casks of various sizes, and shipped by said bark from Boston to London, in July, 1858. The libel alleged, that, by the bill of lading, the casks were received in good order, &c., but, when delivered, were shrunk by heat, and the one thousand two hundred and ninety-six gallons had leaked out between the staves and at the chines of the casks, and, running down among the ballast, were in part pumped overboard, and the rest not worth the trouble of recovering. The answer left the libellants to prove the loss, but said that it was customary and proper stowage to put oil in casks with the other articles of the cargo in this manner; and that the agent of libellants saw the ship when partly loaded, knew the character of her cargo, and requested that the oil be sent, though a part of the oil-cake already stowed would have to be broken out, to let the oil go to the bottom of the ship. The following facts were proved:—The casks were properly placed over the ballast, directly under the main hatch. Cattle hoofs were filled in among, and spread upon, them to make an even surface; and there was unusual dunnage of staves, pine fire-wood, and Calcutta mats upon and around them. The rest of the lower hold was filled with oil-cake. The cargo between decks was oil-cake, pails, shoe-pegs, &c., and in the fore-hold a large quantity of cattle-hoofs. The cake was from all of the three linseed-oil mills in Boston and Chelsea. The master kept the fore and aft hatches open during the voyage, but made no effort to save the oil pumped up. The capacity of the ship was five hundred and forty-seven tons. The quantity of oil cake on board was nine thousand five hundred bags. The quantity of hoofs was twenty-four tons. The length of the passage, forty-seven days of pleasant weather.

SPRAGUE, District Judge. There is no evidence that this loss was owing to any peril of the seas or any defect of the ship, and I do not think it is to be accounted for by the season of the year in which the passage was made. The warmth of the captain's cabin floor and the blistering of paint on the pails, with other testimony, point to heat as the cause of the loss, and this heat must have been from the cake or the hoofs. That such a loss cannot be said to be a common occurrence, is admitted by the defence made by claimant. There never could be a custom of stowing in any manner which would ordinarily result like this. There must have been some extraordinary cause of this phenomenon, and we have to rely on circumstantial evidence to ascertain what it was. The custom of stowing oil-cake near other cargo liable to be injured by heat shows that there is no principle of deterioration necessarily inherent in the cake. In its ordinary condition, the New York witnesses say it heats no more than grain. There must have been something unusual in the condition of this cake on the voyage. The only cause of the heat that any witness assigns is dampness; and this is strong circumstantial evidence that some of the cake was green when put on board, or that it was moistened afterwards. And a former agent of one of the mills has shown that a change has been made in the manufacture of the cake in that mill, by using less water than formerly. If a usage to store cargo in this way is to be made out, it is a Boston usage, and must depend upon the quality of the cake from all the mills that ship from Boston; and the fact that since 1858, changes have been made in the management of one of them, on account of actual damage to their cake on various voyages, is a presumption that the two other mills sent out a different article, for there is no proof that they experienced such losses. I cannot help thinking that the oil-cake from this mill may have been not in good condition when put on board.

There is some testimony that the hoofs stowed in the forepeak were wetted by showers before putting on board, and that steam issued from the fore hatch just over them, while the vessel was at the wharf loading. This is strengthened by the fact, that there was dampness in the cake from some source; and it may be, that the hoofs moistened the cake, and the cake then heated the hold and shrunk the casks. This seems to me to be the more probable solution of the cause of the loss. That position of the evidence seems to me to throw the burden of the loss on the carrier. If the shipper had assented to the mode of stowing his oil, it might preclude him from now objecting; but that assumes that the other articles of the cargo were in good condition, or at least that he assented to the stowing with those particular articles.

The shipper in this case only knew that the cargo was to be made up mostly of "oil-cake." He cannot be held to have assented to the stowing with this cake, or such as this, if this was unseasoned. It is not necessary to come to a conclusion whether this was customary stowage. If it were proved that it was customary, and that this cake was put on board no more than ordinarily wet, I am not sure how this case would be decided. The case of Baxter v. Leland [Case No. 1,124] is the strongest for the claimant; but the custom in that case is spoken of as one long established and well known. And a circumstance relied upon by both Betts, J., and Nelson, J., in that case, is the fact that the shipper knew of the usage, and made provision for it. And the loss was not as large in proportion as this. In Lamb v. Parkman [Id. 8,020] there was not such unusual damage as this. I should be surprised to find an established usage going the length of this case. Decree for the libellants.

CHESHIRE PROVIDENT INST. v. JOHNSTON.

Circuit Court, D. Minnesota. April 15, 1876.

ATTACHMENT BY ASSIGNEE OF DEBT FRAUDULENTLY CONTRACTED.

[1. A positive averment, in the words of the statute, that "the plaintiff's debt was fraudulently contracted," is sufficient, under Laws Minn. 1867, c. 66, § 1, authorizing an attachment in such a case.]

[2. The assignee of a debt fraudulently contracted is not entitled, under the act, to an attachment against the debtor, as fraud in the inception of a debt is personal to the contracting parties, and does not follow the assignment.]

[At law. Action by the Cheshire Provident Institution against George H. Johnston upon a promissory note, secured by mortgage, payable to George B. Sargent as agent of Austin Corbin, and assigned by him to Corbin, and by Corbin to plaintiff. The plaintiff procured an attachment upon the ground that the "plaintiff's debt was fraudulently contracted." The fraud charged consisted of alleged false answers to written questions submitted to defendant pending the negotiations for the loan. Defendant moved to vacate the attachment.]

Morris Lamprey, for plaintiff.
Charles D. Kerr, for defendant.

NELSON, District Judge. The agent of the plaintiff made affidavit that "the plaintiff's debt was fraudulently contracted," an attachment was properly granted upon the positive averment of the existence of this fact. Laws [Minn.] 1867 [p. 110], c. 66, § 1. The motion to dissolve is made upon counter affidavits, which tend to disprove the statements made in the affidavit upon which the writ was allowed, and is met by further affidavits on the part of the plaintiff. The issue presented is the truth or falsity of the statement, that "the plaintiff's debt was fraudulently contracted." In my opinion the plaintiff cannot invoke this clause of the statute to aid him in collecting his indebtedness, unless he shows that the fraud was perpetrated by the defendant immediately upon him.

Although, as between the original parties to the contract, the defendant may have been guilty of a fraud towards the person with whom he contracted, this plaintiff cannot by reason of such fraud sustain this proceeding. He became owner of the debt by purchase, and it is only when fraud is perpetrated upon an assignee of the debt by his immediate assignor, and suit is brought against him, that the right to the writ as a provisional remedy is given. Any fraud in the inception of the debt does not follow the assignment, but is personal to the contracting parties. The present plaintiff could not in a suit instituted against the defendant, succeed in setting aside the original contract between Sargent as the agent of Corbin, the immediate assignor of the plaintiff, and the defendant, for fraud in its inception. This right of action could not be assigned by Corbin, as the fraud upon him was a personal wrong. If the plaintiff could have no such remedy, his debt is not tainted with the fraud contemplated by the clause in the statute under consideration. It was urged that the representations to Corbin of the condition of the property upon which the money was loaned influenced the plaintiff in his purchase, and as the defendant made these representations to be used by Corbin as his agent to negotiate the loan, the plaintiff was privy to any action resulting from their falsity. If the facts divulged showed that the plaintiff advanced the money directly to the defendant in a negotiation with Corbin as his agent, then the fraud, if it existed, would have been perpetrated immediately upon the plaintiff, but such is not the case as presented. Motion granted.

CHESTER et al. v. BENNER.

[2 Lowell, 76.] [1]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. Nov. 1871.

SEAMEN — LIABILITY FOR CHARGES FOR IMPRISONMENT IN FOREIGN JAIL — CONSTRUCTION OF SHIPPING ARTICLES.

1. Where seamen were imprisoned in a foreign jail by order of the American consul at that port, and there was no evidence of bad faith on the part of the master,—Held, this court, in a case not large enough to be appealed, is bound to follow the decision in Jordan v. Williams [Case No. 7,528], though doubting its correctness; and that the doctrine of that case, fairly carried out, requires the men to pay the necessary charges of the imprisonment, and the expense of hiring substitutes.

[Cited in Coffin v. Weld, Case No. 2,953.]

2. But the consul's own charges, as judge, are to be paid by the ship. Reasons for this rule.

3. A clause in the shipping articles by which the crew agree to pay charges of imprisonment does not bind them to pay the fees of the consul acting as judge.

In admiralty. This libel was for wages of six seamen, earned on a voyage of two months and twenty days, from Boston to Paramaribo, in Surinam, and back to Boston, in the bark Tidal Wave. The only dispute was, whether seventeen dollars and sixty-seven cents which had been retained from the pay of each man was rightly deducted. The answer alleged that, at Paramaribo, the libelants [Charles Chester and others] "became intoxicated and drunk, incapable of doing duty, and disobedient, insubordinate, and mutinous," &c.; that the master called in the consul, who ordered and caused the libelants to be detained in custody upon due legal proceedings, and that they were so detained for four days; that the master hired other persons to do the libelants' duty, at a cost in all of eighteen dollars in gold; three dollars for each man; and that the costs and expenses of the arrest, custody, board, and release of the libelants were ten dollars and sixty cents in gold for each of them; all which was paid. The certificates of the consul were received as evidence, by consent, and the only witness examined to the occurrences abroad was the master, who swore that the men, or some of them, were intoxicated one morning while in port, and all refused duty under pretense that the food was bad; that the consul came on board and examined the food, and pronounced it good, and gave the men five minutes to return to duty, which they refused to do; and they were sent to jail until the ship was ready to sail, when they were returned on board, and performed the rest of the voyage; that before and after this time their conduct was irreproachable.

C. G. Thomas, for libelants.
J. B. Richardson, for respondent.

LOWELL, District Judge. This case, though small in the amount of money involved, is important to masters and crews generally. The imprisonment of our seamen in foreign jails has always been looked upon by courts of admiralty with disfavor, from the suffering and hardship which often accompany it; and there are many decisions which require the master to make use of this mode of restraint or punishment only in cases of necessity, where the great powers which the law gives him on board his own ship are inadequate to the emergency. It was also uniformly held that the consul had only an advisory power, and the master was responsible if the imprisonment was unjustifiable. Thus Hopkinson, J., in Johnson v. The Coriolanus [Case No. 7,380]: "I have repeatedly expressed my disapprobation of putting our seamen into foreign jails and dungeons, at the mercy of the local police-officers, for offenses by no means requiring such severity. For ordinary misconduct or insubordination, the power of the master on board his vessel is amply sufficient for all the purposes of discipline and subordination, and it is only in cases of extraordinary violence, where the safety of the vessel or of those on board requires that the offender should not be suffered to remain there, that he should be taken and imprisoned on shore. . . . And here I would again correct an error into which captains are continually falling. They seem to believe that, if they can get the consent or co-operation of the consul to their proceedings, it will be a full justification for them when they come home. . . . In all my experience I have never known a consul refuse the application of a captain to imprison a seaman," &c. In that case, on appeal, Mr. Justice Baldwin not only affirmed the decision, but said that if the case had come before him in the first instance he should have given damages for the imprisonment, as well as full wages. See note at the end of the report. The decisions, which, up to the year 1840, are entirely uniform, are collected in 2 Pars. Shipp. & Adm. 91, note 5. In 1840, congress passed an important act regulating the shipment and discharge of seamen, and the duties of consuls, of which the eleventh section requires those officers "to reclaim deserters and discountenance insubordination by every means within their power; and where the local authorities can be usefully employed for that purpose, to lend their aid and use their exertions to that end in the most effectual manner." 5 Stat. 395. This statute has been construed in the circuit court for this circuit to give consuls jurisdiction over the imprisonment of our seamen in foreign jails, and, in such case, to relieve the master from responsibility in the matter, if he has acted in good faith. Jordan v. Williams [supra]. That case virtually decides, that, in suits between the crew and the master or owners, such an imprisonment by order of a consul must be presumed to have been necessary; and, it seems to follow and is intimated by the court, that the necessary charges resulting from that course must fall upon the seamen, as between them and the owners, though they have a right of redress against the consul. In a case like this, in which no single sum in dispute is large enough to admit of an appeal, I must follow that decision of the circuit court, though I venture to think its reasoning unsound. Still, it remains my duty to inquire carefully into the nature and propriety of the charges, and whether they all fall strictly within the rule.

The sum deducted from each man's pay was seventeen dollars and sixty-seven cents in currency, equal to three weeks' pay of each able seaman, and more than six weeks' pay of the boy. At the rate at which the settlement was made, this sum is the equivalent of fifteen dollars and a half in gold; and, as I read the evidence, eighty cents of this, and no more, is the cost of subsistence for each man on shore, three dollars the cost of a substitute, and the rest is made up of fees of one kind and another, and largely those of the consul, who was the judge in the case. The evidence does not account for quite all the charges; but it is admitted that seven dollars in gold was charged against each man by the consul, and I think it may be not unfairly inferred that some of the items not accounted for were for his various certificates. At any rate, he charged in gold against each man two dollars for ordering the arrest, two dollars for ordering the imprisonment, two dollars for ordering the release, and one dollar for certifying. To the other reasons which admiralty courts have given for discountenancing this method of dealing with seamen, this case requires me to add the great and disproportionate expense which it entails. I am of opinion that it will be neither just nor prudent to oblige the crew to pay for a decision against them. If the ship pays the judge, the master will be interested to see to the charges; while, if the crew pay him, both the master and the consul will be interested in favor of a decision to imprison, because both will then recover costs. It is impossible that the crew should scrutinize the consular accounts, or even know of them until they are paid; and their right of action against the consul is, of course, of no value. In this instance, I doubt if any of these expenses would have been incurred if the ship had been known to be responsible for them.

While, therefore, I agree that in theory the owners should lose nothing, so long as the construction of the law remains as it is, yet practical justice requires, as a guarantee of good faith and a check on hasty action, and as the only possible means of keeping the fees within due bounds, that the consul's fees should be paid by the ship. There will be a trifling compensation in the subsistence which the ship will escape during the absence of the men.

The shipping articles contain this clause: "And whereas it frequently happens that the owner or captain incurs expenses while in a foreign port, relative to the imprisonment of one or more of his officers or crew, or in the attendance of nurses, or in the payment of the board on shore, for the benefit of such person or persons: now it is understood and agreed by the parties hereunto, that all such expenditures as may be incurred by reason of the foregoing premises shall be charged to and deducted out of the wages of any officer, or such one of the crew, by whose means or for whose benefit the same shall have been paid." Assuming, for the purposes of this case, that the stipulation is valid, it means only that the lawful and reasonable expenses of a necessary imprisonment shall be paid by the crew; and, if the action of the consul is to be conclusive of the necessity for imprisonment, his own fees do not appear to me to be a part of those reasonable expenses, for the reasons I have already given. The men, too, have all signed receipts in full; but it is testified by the respondent's witness that some of them protested against the amount of deductions: and courts of admiralty, when the facts are clear, and show that a smaller sum has been paid instead of a greater one due, never regard a receipt in full; though it is often of much significance in contradicting a case made up by an afterthought, or in cases of doubt or compromise.

Upon the whole, I think I ought to allow the respondents to deduct all excepting the consul's fees. I shall so examine the other charges with care, and require them to be well substantiated; but there seems nothing to impeach them here. It is admitted that the consul's charge against each man was seven dollars, and there is one dollar and ninety cents against each not accounted for. The burden of proof on the owners to establish their deductions may, perhaps, be fairly met by the receipts of the men; so that I ought not to charge this unexplained balance against the owners, unless it was probably a part of the official charges. There is some reason to believe that the consul did make further charges for his various certificates; and this may be inferred to be the origin of a part of the balance. I shall divide this between the parties. The crew, then, are to recover seven dollars and ninety cents each in gold, which is nine dollars in currency. Decree accordingly.

CHESTER et al. v. CURTIS.

[1 Blatchf. 499.][1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Oct. Term, 1849.

CUSTOMS DUTIES—"CARPET BINDINGS."

1. Under subdivision 2 of section 2 of the tariff act of July 14, 1832 (4 Stat. 584), worsted carpet bindings are not chargeable with a duty of 25 per cent. The clause in that subdivision, relating to bindings, refers exclusively to articles of that description when composed wholly or in part of wool.

2. Whether an action to recover back duties paid under protest after the act of March 3, 1839 (5 Stat. 348), and before the act of February 26, 1845 (5 Stat. 727), can be maintained against a collector, is not decided in this case. An objection on that ground was raised on a motion for a new trial, but was not taken at the trial; if it had been taken, evidence might have been given to obviate it.

At law. This was an action commenced in 1847, to recover back duties paid under protest, in 1841, to the defendant [Edward Curtis], as collector of the port of New York, on worsted carpet bindings. A duty of twenty-five per cent. was charged on them, as falling under subdivision 2 of section 2 of the act of July 14, 1832 (4 Stat. 584), which imposed a duty of twenty-five per cent. on "mits, gloves, bindings, blankets, hosiery, and carpets and carpeting." It was admitted that, unless the articles were properly chargeable with the duty imposed, they were entitled to come in free of duty, under the third section of the act. At the trial, before Mr. Justice Nelson, in November, 1848, he charged the jury that the articles were entitled to entry free of duty, and a verdict was found for the plaintiffs. The defendant now moved for a new trial, on a case.

Benjamin F. Butler, for defendant, besides arguing the question of the construction of the statute, contended that the action could in no event be maintained, the defendant having been required, by section 2 of the act of March 3, 1839 (5 Stat. 348), to pay the duties into the treasury, although they were paid under protest; and that the act of February 26, 1845 (5 Stat. 727), repealing the act of 1839, could not operate retrospectively to subject the defendant to an action to which he was not liable when the duties were received.

Daniel Lord, for plaintiffs [William W. Chester and others]. 1. The objection to the recovery, founded on the act of 1839, was not raised at the trial. 2. The act of 1845 restores the action of assumpsit, if it was taken away by the act of 1839. 3. The act of 1845 restores merely a remedy, not a right of action.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. It is insisted on the part of the plaintiffs, that the term

"bindings," in the connection in which it is used in the clause of the act of 1832 which is in question is to be limited to the article when composed wholly or in part of wool, and does not include it when composed wholly of worsted; and the case of Bend v. Hoyt, 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 263, is referred to as a decision to that effect. The article in question there was silk hose, and the duty was imposed upon it, under the impression that the articles enumerated in the clause embraced all articles of the kind, of whatever materials composed, and that silk hose, therefore, fell within the term "hosiery" there enumerated. But it was held, that the clause applied to articles of the description enumerated, composed wholly or in part of wool, and, therefore, did not embrace the articles of hosiery if composed of silk. The argument is somewhat stronger in favor of such a construction in respect to the article of silk hose, on account of other provisions in the act, than it is in regard to the article in question here. But, as I understand the decision, the court intended to hold and did hold, that the clause related exclusively to articles of the description specified, composed wholly or in part of wool. That decision covers and disposes of the question in this case.

The objection that the suit cannot be maintained against the defendant since the act of 1839, and the decision under it in Cary v. Curtis, 3 How. [44 U. S.] 236, notwithstanding the repeal of that act by the act of 1845, does not arise, as the point was not taken at the trial. If it had been, evidence might have been given to obviate it.

New trial denied.

CHESTER et al. v. WELLFORD et al.

[2 Flip. 347.][1]

Circuit Court, W. D. Tennessee. Feb. 22, 1879.

REMOVAL—PRO CONFESSO NO BAR — INDISPENSABLE PARTY —TRUSTEE NOT SUCH — REMOVAL OF CAUSES—CASE IN JUDGMENT.

1. A pro confesso, taken by complainant at return term, does not operate to prevent the removal of a cause, under the act of 1875 [18 Stat. 470], into the federal court.

2. The jurisdiction of the court cannot be defeated because the plaintiff cannot obtain full relief by the suit brought as to all parties against whom relief may be needed, but only when it cannot be had against a non-resident defendant without the presence of some resident defendant, whose presence is indispensable.

3. Where a citizen of Tennessee filed a bill in equity against an insurance company chartered by Missouri to cancel certain policies of insurance, loan and interest notes for an account of premiums and dividends and to enjoin a sale of his land under a deed of trust given to secure the loans, and the trustee was a citizen of the same state with the complainant: held, that the cause was removable as a controversy wholly between citizens of different states, and that the trustee was not an indispensable party.

[Distinguished in Chester v. Chester, 7 Fed. 3.]

Motion to remand.

J. B. & F. H. Heiskell, for plaintiff.

Wright & Folkes, for defendants.

HAMMOND, District Judge. This bill in equity was filed in the chancery court of Madison county, November 29, 1877, process and publication being returnable to January 7, 1878, the first day of the next succeeding term. On the fourth day of the term, no answer being filed, a pro confesso was taken by the plaintiff before the clerk and master, and the cause set for hearing by him, ex parte under the provisions of the Code of Tennessee (section 4370), which enacts that in such a case "the cause may be set for hearing at the return term of the process."

Subsequently, and on January 14, 1878, at the same term, the court by consent of parties set the pro confesso aside, and the defendants answered separately. The Life Association of America, the non-resident defendant, filed its petition and bond for the removal of the cause into this court, on June 28, 1878, prior to the next succeeding or July term of the court. The first ground of the motion to remand is that the petition to remove was filed too late. The act of congress of March 3, 1875 (18 Stat. 470), requires that the petition for removal shall be filed "before or at the term at which said cause could be first tried and before the trial thereof." It is argued that this was the January term, 1878, because the cause having stood for hearing on the pro confesso at that term it was the one at which it could have been first tried, and that the subsequent action of the court setting aside the pro confesso has not changed this attitude of the case.

It will be observed that this order pro confesso was taken on the very first day on which the defendants were in default for want of an appearance, namely, the fourth day of the term at which the process was returnable. Code, § 4350. If by taking this advantage the plaintiffs be allowed to defeat a removal of the cause into this court, it comes to this, that the defendant must file his petition for removal, or otherwise make his appearance, on or before the first moment of the first day on which he would be in default for want of such appearance, or it is within the power of the plaintiff to altogether defeat the right secured to him by this act of congress, and this although the court may subsequently, on good cause shown, set aside the pro confesso and permit him to make his defense. Id. § 4375. And so the right of the plaintiff to a removal may be defeated by the defendants taking some such advantage of his first default. In practice this would furnish a very effectual means of circumventing the act of congress solely by the prompt action of the adverse party in taking advantage of defaults; and that too for no other purpose than that of defeating this right of removal; because, for all other purposes the default could be avoided, while for this only it would become irrevocable, as the jurisdiction of this court is entirely gone if once defeated by such means. And thus, no matter how good may be the excuse for suffering a default, while sufficient to justify the court in requiring that no advantage shall be taken of it for any other purpose, it becomes ineffectual to avoid the absolute forfeiture of the right of removal. It seems to me that it was not intended, by the phraseology used in the act, and relied upon here, to place the right of removal so completely at the mercy of the adverse party. The right would be of little value if it could be so readily defeated by an adversary on the alert to prevent its exercise. See Hunter v. Royal Canadian Ins. Co. [Case No. 6,909].

I think the right of either party to remove a cause into this court under the act of 1875, is not within the control of the other party by any proceeding he can take prior to a final disposition of the cause. If a party seeking a removal has been guilty of such laches as entitles his adversary to a final judgment in the state court before the petition for removal has been filed, it may be that he cannot file the petition till after he has by proper proceedings reinstated his right to appear and defend, but whenever he has that right and issues are made up for adjudication by the court, he may remove those issues into the federal court, by filing a petition and bond for that purpose at the first term of the state court at which the suit is triable by the practice of the court, and before the trial thereof. Taking a decree pro confesso is in no sense a trial of the cause, as the taking of a judgment by default was held to be in construing this act of congress in the case of McCallon v. Waterman [Id. 8,675]; for, by the very sections of the Code relied on here, notwithstanding the case was set for hearing at the return term it remained to be tried, and until final decree the court had full power to reinstate the defendant to all his rights of defense. Code, §§ 4370–4375. And, after the pro confesso was set aside, the cause stood as if it had never been taken, and the first trial term was that which first came after answer filed and the expiration of the six months allowed the parties to take their proof; certainly not earlier in any event than the next succeeding term after the filing of the answer. Id. §§ 4375, 4401, 4432; Chancery Rules, No. 2, § 4. I think after a very careful consideration of the cases cited by the learned counsel for the plaintiffs, there is no conflict between those rulings and that I make here; but it would extend this judgment beyond proper limits to enter into any elaborate analysis of the facts upon which those adjudications rest. See Ames v. Colorado, C. R. R. [Case No. 325]; Scott v. Clinton S. R. Co. [Id. 12,527]; McCallon v. Waterman [supra].

The second ground for the motion depends upon the allegations of the bill and the nature of the controversy. The bill sets out that the plaintiffs insured their lives in the defendants' company by paid up policies for ten thousand dollars each. That in payment of the premiums, which amounted to $10,582.60, and for the further consideration of a loan by the company to them of $7,500, they executed their note for $18,082.30, due in five years, and likewise semi-annual notes for the interest at 10 per cent. To secure these notes they executed a deed of trust to the resident defendant, Wellford, as trustee, authorizing him in default of payment and at the request of the company to sell the lands conveyed and pay the notes. And because of the allegations of fraud contained in the bill the plaintiffs seek a rescission of the contract and to recover back the money paid to the company; or else for an account with the company to adjust an alleged equity to have certain credits which are claimed applied to the full satisfaction of the notes which are alleged to have been fully paid.

The bill asks no relief against Wellford, who resides in this state, except to enjoin him along with the defendant company from selling the land under the trust deed. The plaintiffs insist that they cannot get along against the insurance company without the presence in the suit of Wellford, the trustee; that this is, therefore, not a controversy which is wholly between citizens of different states that can be fully determined between them in this court; and that for that reason it is not within the acts of congress either of 1866 [14 Stat. 306] or 1875 [18 Stat. 470]. While the trustee is no doubt a proper party to the bill, I think he is not an indispensable party to the relief here prayed against the non-resident defendant. His presence is not in any way essential to a decree cancelling the notes, nor to a decree for an account with the insurance company, and all these matters can be adjudicated without him. Nor is it necessary to have him here in order that the insurance company may be perpetually enjoined from ever settling up or claiming any benefits under the trust deed and from seeking in any way to enforce it by a request for a sale or otherwise: and by such a decree, it seems to me very clear, that the controversy between the plaintiffs and the insurance company can be fully determined as between them, without having the trustee here. It is said he has the legal title to the land and that it is necessary to have him here to divest himself of it in order that the plaintiffs may have full relief. I do not understand that the jurisdiction of this court can be defeated because the plaintiffs cannot get full relief by the suit here as to all parties against whom they may need relief; but only when they cannot get full relief as against the nonresident defendant without the presence in court of some resident defendant whose presence is indispensable. If the contract of the plaintiffs with the insurance company is rescinded and the notes secured are cancelled, or if on a proper accounting they are decreed to have been satisfied, there is but little if any need of having Wellford here to divest title. After such a decree if his title were not divested ipso facto, it would be the most naked and harmless of titles. It would probably under our law divest ipso facto by such a decree, or rather to be entirely accurate, the existence of the facts which entitle the plaintiffs to a decree cancelling the notes have already divested the trustee of his title. Technically it could only revert by a reconveyance of the trustee or by a decree upon foreclosure. But it has been held, and is well settled, that it cannot be set up against the mortgagor after the debts secured by it are paid by him, even at law. Carter v. Taylor, 3 Head. 30; Peltz v. Clarke, 5 Pet. [30 U. S.] 481; Breckinridge v. Ormsby, 1 J. J. Marsh. 237, 257; Williams v. Neil, 4 Heisk. 279, 283.

The draughtsman of this bill did not, it seems, think the divestiture of the trustees title necessary, for it contains no prayer to that effect. The injunction sought against him is only incidental, the injunction against the beneficiaries being equally effective. But I do not put my judgment on this ground alone. Even if the injunction against the trustee is necessary—and to divest him of title is necessary to complete plaintiffs' relief; and moreover if plaintiffs have to bring another suit to accomplish it I hold that the jurisdiction of this court will not be refused to avoid a multiplicity of suits. The only inquiry here is not, whether Wellford is a proper party, or one necessary to plaintiffs' full relief, but whether he is an indispensable party to the bill in order to afford the plaintiffs the relief they ask as against the nonresident defendant. The case of Gardiner v. Brown, 21 Wall. [88 U. S.] 36, is not in point. There the relief sought was a foreclosure of the mortgage and the presence of the trustee was indispensable to afford that relief. Not so when the case is reversed and the object is to rescind the contract or cancel the notes because they have been paid. In such a case the trustee is at most only a proper party. Such nominal parties cannot oust the federal courts of jurisdiction. Wood v. Davis, 18 How. [59 U. S.] 468.

It is not necessary for me to determine now whether the trustee has been brought here by this removal. He has not joined in the petition, and is not here asking to have that question determined. It will be time enough at the final hearing, if any relief is asked as to him, to determine whether it can be granted. As to the controversy between him and the plaintiffs he is either enjoined in the state court or here, and that is all the plaintiffs have asked as to him. If he should appear here and move to dissolve the injunction, the plaintiffs can then take the objection that the court has no jurisdiction as to him. If he should move a dissolution in the state court, that court will determine whether it has jurisdiction as to him. Not having joined in the petition and bond for removal, the question whether he has been brought along by the removal made by his codefendants cannot arise on the motion to remand made upon the filing of their petition. Not until he takes some step assuming a jurisdiction over him, or the plaintiffs some step, asserting it, will the question properly arise. Until then, at least, I shall not be tempted to "assume the truth of the maxim that it is the duty of a good judge to enlarge his jurisdiction," as it has been said the federal judges generally do, by a learned state judge, who, somewhat loath, perhaps, to part with his own, has in a very able opinion, cited in argument here, denied, in such a case, any jurisdiction in this court over a controversy between residents of the same state. See Smith v. St. Louis Mut. Life Ins. Co., 2 Tenn. Ch. 656, 665. Mr. Justice Miller, in Taylor v. Rockefeller [Case No. 13,802], has intimated a contrary opinion, but I need not now decide the point.

I cordially assent to what has recently been said by the supreme court of Alabama as to the considerations which should actuate the courts in the determination of these questions: Per Manning, J.—"The acts of congress for the removal of causes from the courts of the states to those of the United States, require on the part of the judges of either government, who may have to consider and act under them, candor and good temper. Jealousy of jurisdiction, when too susceptible of alarm and resentment, is apt to hurry those under its influence into error. The institutions of both governments are established for the good of all; and it is the right of all to have them preserved and upheld in the performance of their respective proper functions. When, therefore, cases arise in which the question to be decided is, whether the cognizance of them belongs to the state courts or the federal courts, it is the dictate of patriotism, as well as of law, that jurisdiction shall be cheerfully declined by those to which it does not pertain, and exercised without offensive arbitrariness by those entitled to exercise it. According to the supreme court of the United States, through the late Chief Justice Chase: 'It may be not unreasonably said, that the preservation of the states and the maintenance of their governments are as much within the design and care of the constitution, as the preservation of the Union and the maintenance of the national government.' Texas v. White, 7 Wall. [74 U. S.] 700." Ex parte Grimball [61 Ala. 587]. The motion to remand is denied.

On the point that after order pro confesso it is not too late for petition for removal, read Hunter v. Royal Canadian Ins. Co. [Case No. 6,909.]

CHEW v. BAKER.

[4 Cranch, C. C. 696.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. March Term, 1836.

PLEADING—LIMITATION OF ACTIONS—ACCRUAL OF CAUSE OF ACTION.

1. If there be two counts in a declaration, and the statute of limitations be pleaded to both, it is not necessary that it should be supported as to both; but it may be supported as to both or either.

2. An account in bar, which consists of debits only, against the plaintiff, does not take the plaintiff's cause of action out of the statute of limitations, although the last item of debit be within the three years.

3. If a sub-contractor agreed with the original contractor to do a certain part of the work, and to receive his pay at the time the contractor receives his pay, and in like proportions, and the contractor is to receive four-fifths of every monthly estimate at the end of each month, and the remaining one-fifth when the work shall be completed and the final estimate made, the sub-contractor's cause of action against the contractor does not accrue until the plaintiff has notice that the money has been received by the defendant, or has demanded it of the defendant.

4. The moneys thus received monthly by the contractor are to be considered as received by him on account; and, if the final settlement of the account is made within the three years, the statute of limitations is no bar to the sub-contractor's action against the contractor, although the moneys so received by him on account should have been received by him more than three years before action brought.

At law. Assumpsit [by Samuel Chew against the administrators of J. W. Baker]. First count for work and labor. Second count for money had and received. Pleas, non assumpsit, and the statute of limitations. The defendant also filed an account in bar, consisting of sundry items of payments made to the plaintiff by the defendant. This suit was commenced on the 13th of November, 1834.

R. S. Coxe, for the plaintiff, contended that, as the statute of limitations was pleaded generally, it must be good as to both counts, or it was not good as to either. Webb v. Martin, 1 Lev. 48.

But THE COURT (nem. con.) was of opinion that it is not necessary that the plea of limitations should be supported as to both counts, but that it might be supported as to both or either.

Mr. Marbury, for the plaintiff, then contended that, as the last item of the count in bar was a payment made by the defendant to the plaintiff within the three years, it is an acknowledgment of a subsisting debt, and a promise to pay the balance. Catling v. Skoulding, 6 Term R. 189; 2 Saund. 127, note; Whetmore v. Smith, 6 Wheeler, Abr. Am. Com. Law, 472.

THE COURT (nem. con.) said that the account in bar, as it is called, (being only a statement of debits against the plaintiff,) did not take the case out of the statute, although the last item was within the three years.

Mr. Key, for the defendant, then contended that the plaintiff's cause of action accrued monthly, as the payments were to be made monthly; as the defendant received money from the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company, upon the monthly estimates of his work by the engineer; and three years had expired after the monthly estimates, and after the defendant had received the money, before the suit was brought. And he prayed the court to instruct the jury that if they believe from the evidence that prior to the 10th of August, 1831, all the money due for the work on section B, (which was the work for which this action was brought,) had been received by the defendant's intestate, except the balance appearing on the final estimate, then the plaintiff is barred of all his claim, except such proportion of the said balance as the work done by the plaintiff bears to the whole amount of work stated in the said estimate.

Which instruction THE COURT (nem. con.) refused to give; CRANCH, Chief Judge, and MORSELL, Circuit Judge, being of opinion, that as, by the agreement, Baker was to receive the money for the plaintiff, the statute of limitations did not begin to run against him until he had notice of the receipt of the money, or had demanded it.

THE COURT, at the prayer of the plaintiff's counsel, instructed the jury, in effect, that if the final settlement between the defendant's intestate and the canal company was not made before the 28th of January, 1832, the plaintiff's cause of action for his share of the one-fifth retained did not accrue before that day; and that the payments made from time to time by the company to the defendant's intestate were to be considered as payments made on account; and that if the final settlement was made on the 28th of January, 1832, and not before, and that the amount was paid on that day, the plea of limitations is no bar to the plaintiff's action, which was commenced on the 13th of November, 1834.

Verdict for plaintiff, $2,404.81, with interest from the 28th of January, 1832.

REMOVAL FROM STATE COURTS.

Where the real controversy is between a city and one of its citizens, a citizen of another state, claiming to be interested in the subject matter of the litigation, has not the right to remove the suit from the state into the federal court.

[Cited in Carraher v. Brennan, Case No. 2,441; Donohoe v. Mariposa L. & M. Co., Id. 3,989; First Presbyterian Soc., etc., v. Goodrich Trans. Co., 7 Fed. 261.]

In equity.

T. Lyle Dickey and Chas. H. Morse, Corp. Counsel, for complainant.

M. W. Fuller, for Wm. T. Ayres, intervening claimant.

BLODGETT, District Judge. This case was originally commenced in the superior court of Cook county, and removed to this court on the application of the defendant, Ayres. A motion is now made on behalf of the complainant to remand the case to the superior court, because of facts appearing upon the face of the record.

The record shows that, on the 27th day of December, 1873, David A. Gage and his wife, of the city of Chicago, executed and delivered to George Taylor, also of said city, a deed conveying to said Taylor, in trust, certain property for the purpose of securing the city against loss of any indebtedness which might exist from Gage to the city, as late treasurer thereof, and for other purposes therein expressed. Said deed did not state what the amount of said indebtedness was, but declared that said conveyance was not to be, in any sense, a satisfaction of any part of said indebtedness. It included and conveyed to Taylor a large amount of real property situated in Chicago, and its suburbs, some portions of which were improved and yielding income. It empowered the trustee, during the period of eight months from the date of the deed, to enter immediately into the possession of said property, control and manage the same, receive and collect the rents, income and profits thereof, and out of the same pay the taxes, assessments and insurance; to sell and convey, under the direction and with the concurrence of the comptroller of the city, all or any part of said property, and out of the net proceeds of the said sales, rents, income and profits, to pay over to the city, from time to time, to apply on the indebtedness of Gage to the city, such sums as might be available for that purpose. At the expiration of eight months the comptroller was authorized to require the peremptory sale of so much of said property as should then remain unsold, for cash, and the said Taylor, as trustee, was required to comply with said request and apply the net proceeds of the sales so made to the satisfaction of the unpaid remainder of said indebtedness. Taylor accepted the trust, entered upon the possession, control and management of the property, and made some sales thereof, and partial payments to the city within the eight months allowed for that purpose.

After the expiration of said eight months, a large portion of the indebtedness, claimed by the city, against Gage, as its late treasurer, still remaining unpaid, the comptroller ordered the trustee to sell the rest of the property on hand, for cash. Said trustee refused to comply with the order of the comptroller, alleging as the ground of said refusal, that said deed did not state the amount of said indebtedness; that he did not know the amount of it himself, and that he was unwilling to sell and pay over the proceeds of such sale to the city until a competent court had first found and decreed the balance due from Gage to the city. Thereupon the city filed the bill in this case, in the superior court of Cook county, setting out the said trust deed, and alleging that at the time of the making thereof Gage was indebted to the city, as treasurer, for a balance of five hundred and seven thousand, seven hundred and three dollars and fifty-eight cents, for the security of which it was claimed that Taylor held the property so conveyed to him by said trust deed; and prayed that the court would take an account and ascertain the amount due, and give a decree in favor of the city for the same, and order the said trustee to proceed and sell the trust property remaining unsold, and apply the proceeds of such sale to the satisfaction of the amount so found due. Gage and wife, and Taylor, were the only defendants to this bill.

Gage answered the bill, denying that he owed the city anything. Taylor also answered, stating his belief that the amount due from Gage to the city was that stated in the bill, but alleging that he did not know what was the real amount of said indebtedness, and prayed that the court would find and decree the amount of said indebtedness, and order the sale, and declare the amount to be paid by him out of the proceeds.

In February last, William T. Ayres, a citizen of Alabama, acting as executor for Charles P. Gage, deceased, late of said state of Alabama, recovered a judgment in this court against said David A. Gage for three thousand and six dollars and ninety-two cents. Execution was issued on said judgment, and returned "no property." Thereupon Ayres applied to the superior court to be made a party-defendant to the bill in this case, which application having been granted, he answered the bill, and also, by leave of court, filed a cross-bill, in both of which he alleged in substance the recovery in this court of said judgment against Gage, the issue of his execution and return, and charged that said judgment was an equitable and prior lien upon the property so held in trust by said Taylor; alleging that no indebtedness, in fact, existed from Gage to the city; that by the action of the common council of the city, Gage had been permitted to loan the funds of the city, and to pay certain interest arising therefrom to the city; that by reason of certain advances which had been made from certain of the general funds to certain specific funds by Gage while acting as city treasurer, certain equitable considerations had arisen which ought to defeat and did defeat any claim at law or in equity in favor of the city against Gage, praying it might be found and decreed that no indebtedness existed from Gage to the city, and that the property conveyed by Gage to Taylor, the trustee, be legally and equitably subjected to the lien of his judgment, as against the city, and asking the court to decree a satisfaction thereof out of the same.

After having filed his said answer and cross-bill, Ayres filed his petition in the superior court, setting up that he was a citizen of the state of Alabama; that there was a controversy in said suit between himself and said Gage and the city, who were citizens of the state of Illinois and of this district, and asking that said cause be removed from said superior court to this court for trial. The superior court entertained said petition and ordered the removal of said cause to this court; and the question is: Does there enough appear on the face of the record to justify this court in holding jurisdiction of the case?

The fifth section of the act of March 3, 1875 (18 Stat. 470, 472), provides, "that if, in any suit commenced in a circuit court, or removed from a state court to a circuit court of the United States, it shall appear to the satisfaction of said circuit court, at any time after such suit has been brought or removed thereto, that such suit does not really and substantially involve a dispute or controversy properly within the jurisdiction of said circuit court, or that the parties to said suit have been improperly or collusively made or joined, either as plaintiffs or defendants, for the purpose of creating a case cognizable or removable under this act, the said circuit court shall proceed no farther therein, but shall dismiss the suit, or remand it to the court from which it was removed, as justice may require."

The first question which suggests itself to my mind in discussing this motion, is, between whom is the controversy in this case? The original suit was brought by the city of Chicago to determine the amount of indebtedness due to it from Gage, and to require the payment of that indebtedness out of the property held in trust by Taylor, for that purpose. In his answer, in that case, Gage denied any indebtedness between himself and the city. I think it unnecessary for the purposes of this inquiry to investigate the grounds upon which Gage based that denial; it is sufficient for this motion, to say that by the bill, answer and replication in the case, as it stood at the time Ayres made himself a voluntary party thereto, the controversy in the case was between the city and Gage as to whether there was, in fact, an indebtedness, and the amount thereof, if any, from Gage to the city. The defendant, Ayres, does not raise any new controversy by his answer and cross-bill, but simply makes himself a party to that which already existed, alleging, perhaps, more in detail the grounds for denying any indebtedness from Gage to the city, but at the same time not changing in any degree the issue in the case or the character of the controversy. The main question still is, as the pleadings now stand, and as they stood before Ayres came into the case, does Gage owe the city anything which ought to be satisfied out of the proceeds of the property held in trust by Taylor, under the trust deed described in the complainant's bill? This being so, the controversy inaugurated in the suit is simply one between citizens of this state. True, Ayres, as a creditor of Gage, may be interested in the result of that controversy, because, if it terminates in favor of Gage, it leaves the property now held by Taylor subject, equitably if not legally, to Ayres' debt, but that does not in any degree, in my estimation, involve a controversy between the city and Ayres in the original suit.

As was intimated by the learned circuit judge of this circuit in the case of Osgood v. Chicago, D. & V. R. Co. [Case No. 10,604], the statute of March 3, 1875, clearly contemplates the removal of the whole suit from the state to the federal court, and not of such fragment or part thereof as may involve a controversy or question between two or more of the defendants. And we must look into the nature of the original controversy, which was the subject matter of the suit, to settle this question of right of removal.

A complicated chancery suit may, almost necessarily, involve in some of its collateral issues, the rights and interests of citizens of different states; but, unless the original controversy which the suit is brought to determine be between citizens of different states, or between such parties as give the federal courts jurisdiction, it would hardly seem that congress intended to provide for the removal thereof, inasmuch as the whole case must be removed instead of that collateral branch or part involving a controversy between citizens of different states.

Applying these suggestions to the case under consideration, it would seem that the controversy as presented by the issues and pleadings, is as to whether or not Gage owes the city anything which should be paid out of this trust fund. That being determined, if determined against the city, the defendant, Ayres, may have a standing in court to claim his pay out of the trust property, but not until then. Notwithstanding Ayres' interpolation into the suit, the real questio is still stand at issue between the city and Gage, and Ayres only has rights as he may be subrogated to those of Gage. It is nowhere intimated in this case that there is any collusion between Gage and the city, or that the city suit is not prosecuted in entire good faith. If it had been made to appear that Gage had given the trust deed to Taylor for the purpose of defrauding Ayres, or that the conveyance was not bona fide, the parties to the controversy might be changed, and Ayres, or any creditor of Gage, might be the real party to the controversy with the city and trustee; but there is nothing of the kind in this case. It therefore seems clear to me that, upon the facts shown in the record, this suit is not such an one as was intended to be removed from the state to the federal court.

The cause will therefore be remanded to the superior court of Cook county.

[NOTE. Ayres, the intervener, appealed to the supreme court, which affirmed the order of the circuit court. After the docket of the appeal, the complainant moved to dismiss, for the reason that the cause was not one from which an appeal would lie. This motion was overruled, the court holding that there was no doubt of its jurisdiction, as by the act of 1875, § 5 (18 Stat. 472), jurisdiction to review such an order was expressly conferred.

[The court then decided the case upon the merits, upon the following grounds, Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivering the opinion: That the original bill and cross bill constituted but one suit; that appellant had no separate dispute with either Gage or the city; that, at most, he and Gage had a controversy with the city as to its lien, and, Gage, who was on the same side of that controversy with him, being a citizen of the same state as the city, the suit was not removable, under the rule settled in the Removal Cases, 100 U. S. 457; Ayers v. Chicago, 101 U. S. 184.]

RAILROAD CROSSING AT GRADE—JURISDICTION.

1. Where the state legislature has not prescribed in what manner one railroad shall cross another, a court of equity has jurisdiction in a proper case, to control the matter.

2. In Illinois the policy of state legislation is to allow a new railroad, in most instances, to cross another road at grade; but if a new road can at small expense, cross the old one at a different level, a court of equity should require it to do so, especially if a grade crossing is dangerous to life and property.

3. The additional expense may, however, be apportioned between the roads, as in such case the old road has no vested absolute rights to control the new.

4. A corporation created by the laws of another state, although associated with one of this state, and having common interest with it, is entitled to file a bill in this court and claim its protection.

[Distinguished in Chicago & W. I. R. Co. v. Lake Shore & M. S. Ry. Co., 5 Fed. 22; Horne v. Boston & M. R. R., 18 Fed. 51. Cited in Burger v. Grand Rapids & I. R. Co., 22 Fed. 562.]

[2] [A bill in chancery was filed in the United States circuit court, alleging that the complainant was a corporation organized and

[1] [Reported by Josiah H. Bissell, Esq., and here reprinted by permission. The statement is taken from 7 Chi. Leg. News, 57. 22 Pittsb. Leg. J. 74, and 9 Am. Law Rev. 362, contain only partial reports.]

existing under the laws of the state of Wisconsin, and a citizen of that state, and that there was also a corporation of the same name organized and existing as a corporation under the laws of the state of Illinois; that by a certain agreement heretofore entered into between said respective corporations, commonly called articles of consolidation, the said two corporations became and still are the joint owners of all of the lines of railroad in the states of Illinois and Wisconsin, formerly owned by the companies separately, including a certain line of railroad from Chicago to Freeport; that the Chicago & Pacific Railroad Company were engaged in constructing a line of railroad from Chicago to the Mississippi river, which had been so located as to cross the complainant's road a few miles west of Elgin, and was now being constructed on that route; that at the proposed crossing point the grade of the Northwestern Railway was 24 feet to the mile, and on a curve, and from thence north the line passed through a deep cut 1,000 feet long, so that a train approaching the crossing from the west would be entirely out of sight of trains approaching on the Pacific Railroad; that it would at all times be difficult, and with a slippery track impossible, to stop a heavy freight train approaching the crossing on the down grade; that, as all trains were required by law to stop before crossing, the capacity of the entire Freeport line would be lessened to the extent of at least five loaded freight cars to each train, as this was the heaviest grade upon the whole road, and a locomotive could not haul as heavy a train, by five cars, if it was obliged to stop at the crossing and start again on the up grade.

[It was further alleged that under an agreement between the two companies a route for an elevated crossing, where the Pacific Railroad could pass over the Northwestern by bridge, had been surveyed by the engineers of both roads and was only some 500 feet distant from the proposed point of crossing, and would cost only about $13,000 more to construct than the proposed route; that this route was perfectly safe and feasible, and is the one that ought to be adopted; that the proposed route would make a crossing that would always be exceedingly dangerous and difficult, and materially lessen the capacity of the whole line from Chicago to Freeport, and materially impair its usefulness. The bill then prayed that the Chicago & Pacific Railroad Company be enjoined from making the proposed crossing. A large number of affidavits were filed with the bill, accompanied by plats and profiles showing the proposed crossing at grade, and also the surveyed route for the over crossing, and the gradients of the respective routes.

[The Chicago & Pacific Railroad Company filed several affidavits, in which they alleged that proceedings had been instituted in Kane county under the eminent domain act, to condemn a right of way on the proposed route, and those proceedings were now pending. They also denied that any agreement had ever been made as to the over crossing. They also alleged that the Pacific road was now being operated from Chicago to Elgin, and that the grading and bridging was finished from Elgin to a point 40 miles west; that the ties and iron were all on hand and ready to be laid on this 40 miles, and if it was prevented from making the crossing the line could not be built this year; also, alleging that the bill was filed simply to delay the building of the Pacific Railroad, which was alleged to be a competing line.

[The case was opened on the part of the Northwestern Company by B. C. Cook, general solicitor of the company, who made a full statement of the case, and claimed that under the facts, as shown by the bill and affidavits, the law would not allow the Chicago & Pacific Company to cross the Northwestern Railroad at grade, but would compel it to make an over crossing. The over crossing could be made in the immediate vicinity by a safe and feasible route, and at an expense of only $13,000 in excess of the proposed route. This expense was inconsiderable, in view of the danger of the crossing at grade, and the material injury which such crossing would inflict upon the Northwestern, by diminishing the capacity of the entire line to the extent of five loaded cars to each freight train.

[The defendant was represented by its attorney, John S. Wilcox, of Elgin, and B. F. Ayer, of Chicago.

[Mr. Ayer relied mainly upon objections to the jurisdiction of the court: First, that the United States court had no jurisdiction of the parties; second, that chancery had no jurisdiction of the subject matter.

[In support of the first proposition, he contended that the bill showed that the C. & N. W. Railway was a consolidated corporation of the states of Illinois and Wisconsin, and therefore a citizen of each of those states; that the corporation, as a citizen of Wisconsin and Illinois, could not bring a suit against a citizen of Illinois in the United States court; citing Bank v. Deveaux, 5 Cranch [9 U. S.] 61; Louisville R. R. v. Letsan, 2 How. [43 U. S.] 497; Marshall v. Baltimore & O. R. R., 16 How. [57 U. S.] 314; Ohio & M. R. R. v. Wheeler, 1 Black [66 U. S.] 286; Baltimore & O. R. R. v. Harris, 12 Wall. [79 U. S.] 65; Chicago & N. W. R. R. v. Whiton, 13 Wall. [80 U. S.] 270.

[Second, that a court of chancery had no jurisdiction of the subject matter. Mr. Ayer cited section 10 of the charter of the Chicago & Pacific Company, which authorized that company to cross any railroad, highway or water-course on its line, provided it should restore the same so as not to materially impair the usefulness of the railroad, highway or water-course so crossed.

He also cited the eminent domain act as providing the method by which right of way should be obtained in case the parties could not agree. He then contended that as proceedings had been commenced under the eminent domain act, in the circuit court of Kane county, that court had by law exclusive jurisdiction of the controversy.

[Mr. Wilcox also insisted that the circuit court of Kane county had sole jurisdiction, because the charter of the Pacific road authorized it to cross the Northwestern; and the eminent domain law provided a method for the assessment of damages, if the Northwestern should be damaged by the crossing. He also insisted that the bill and affidavits did not make out a case for the interposition of a court of equity; that the bill was filed to delay the construction of the Chicago & Pacific, and not because the crossing was a dangerous one; also that, if the Pacific road was prevented from crossing at grade, the over crossing was so expensive as to seriously delay its construction, and that the over crossing would be difficult to maintain and operate.

[Geo. C. Campbell concluded the argument on the part of the Northwestern Railway Company. The points made were as follows: First. The United States court had jurisdiction of the parties. Second. A court of chancery has jurisdiction of the subject matter. Third. The facts of this case call for the interposition of the court to prevent defendant from making the crossing at a point where there will be continual danger to life and property.

[In support of the first point, Mr. Campbell relied upon the cases cited by Mr. Ayer. In the Case of Wheeler, in 1 Black, 286, the supreme court of the United States had held that a corporation could not be formed under concurrent laws of two different states, but would exist as a separate legal entity in each state. In the Harris Case, 12 Wall. [79 U. S.] 65, this opinion was modified so far as to admit that an amalgamated corporation could exist under the laws of several states, but in such case the separate legal existence of the different corporations was not terminated. They existed, rather, as joint owners of the property, and, as the supreme court said in the case cited, "The jurisdictional effect of the existence of such a corporation, as regards the federal courts, is the same as that of a co-partnership of individual citizens residing in different states." This was conclusive upon the question of jurisdiction of the federal courts. The Case of Whiton, cited from 13 Wall. [80 U. S.] 270, was further confirmation of the rule, for there the supreme court of the United States held that this very corporation, the C. & N. W. R., was, notwithstanding the acts of consolidation, still two distinct legal entities,—one by the laws of Wisconsin, and one by the laws of Illinois. The question here was simply whether one joint owner, being a citizen of Wisconsin, had the right to invoke the aid of the federal court to protect the common property.

[Second. As to the jurisdiction of a court of chancery. Mr. Campbell contended that this court had exclusive jurisdiction of a controversy like the one at bar, and cited the railway act of 1871–72, § 15 (Myers' Laws, p. 70), which provides that one railroad shall have the right to cross any other railroad, and enacts that "if the corporations cannot agree upon the amount of compensation to be made therefor, or the points and manner of crossing, the same shall be ascertained and determined in manner prescribed by law." The controversy in this case was as to the point and manner of crossing. There was no statutory proceeding under which such a dispute could be settled, and no common law action in which it could be settled. Hence, there was absolutely no remedy at law, and that would give a court of chancery jurisdiction. Defendants claimed that the eminent domain act afforded a remedy, but it did not. The act provided a method of taking private property only. But the right of way of a railroad was not private property; it was acquired under the eminent domain act for public use, and was held for public use. That property held for one public use could not, under a general law providing for the condemnation of private property, be taken from the first use, and subjected to another public use. This rule had been laid down in Massachusetts, California, and New York. Boston & A. R. Case, 53 N. Y. 578. If conceded that the aid of the eminent domain act could be invoked at all, it did not meet this case, as it would only provide a method of determining the compensation to be paid by one road to the other. There was no dispute here as to compensation. The dispute was "as to the point and manner of crossing." Eminent domain law provided no method of settling that dispute. The bill alleges and the affidavits prove that the proposed crossing would be continually dangerous to life and property. Can it be supposed that the legislature intended that the Pacific road should institute proceedings under the eminent domain law, and have a jury determine what sum should be paid to the C. & N. W. Railway in order that it should be entitled to construct and maintain a crossing which should be forever fraught with danger to life and property? Yet the whole act will be searched in vain for authority to settle any dispute except as to compensation. It is equally plain that no common law action will afford a remedy, but the statute contemplates a dispute "as to point and manner of crossing," and enacts that it shall be settled as provided by law. It does not grant to the new railroad the right to choose for itself the point and manner of crossing, and merely have the compensation fixed by law. The conclusion is irresistible that chancery alone has jurisdiction to settle all disputes as to "point and manner of crossing."

[Third. Upon the facts in this case, defendant has no right by law to cross at grades, but must make an over crossing. Section 10 of the charter of the Pacific Railroad gives it the right to cross any railroad on the line of its route, provided "the said railroad shall restore the railroad thus intersected or crossed to its former state, or in a sufficient manner, not materially to impair its usefulness." The bill alleges and the affidavits show that the proposed crossing will materially impair the usefulness of the Northwestern road, as it will diminish the capacity of the entire road to the extent of five loaded cars per train, and also make it dangerous to life and property. This being the fact, it is not a question as to how much it will cost to make an over crossing, but such a crossing must be made if the evil cannot be avoided in any other way. This is precisely the rule in Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Payne, 59 Ill. 540. This was a case arising under section 24 of the railway act of 1849, which is, word for word, the same as section 10 of the charter of the Chicago & Pacific R. R. Mr. Justice McAllister, in delivering the opinion of the court, says: "The company was under the statutory duty to restore the highway to its former state, or in a sufficient manner not to impair its usefulness. The peril of crossing could have been avoided by the railway going under the highway, or, in other words, constructing the highway over the railway. If the highway could be restored in a manner not to impair its usefulness only in that way, it was the duty of the company so to restore it."] [2]

DRUMMOND, Circuit Judge. The question involved in this case is one of great importance, both as to the rights of railroads and those of the public. I am inclined to think that, under certain circumstances, an application may be made to a court of equity for the purpose of controlling, to some extent, the right of one railroad to cross another. If the legislature of the state has prescribed in what manner one railroad shall cross another, it may be that it would control all parties and the courts; but where the legislature has not declared in what particular way one railroad shall cross or intersect another, but has only referred to it in general terms, then, I think, within the true meaning of the act of the legislature, it may be competent for a court of equity to control the railroads as to the crossings. In this state, it may be said, in one sense, to be the policy of the state to allow a new railroad to cross the track of an old railroad, and at grade, in most instances. At the same time, the legislature has shown clearly enough that it does not intend that a railroad shall cross at grade in all instances; otherwise it would have been so stated. For the reason that I mentioned before, it is not likely the legislature ever will say so, because the topography of the particular locality where the crossing is to be made—indeed, various circumstances—control and determine how the crossing shall be made. For example, where two railroads are approaching each other, through a comparatively level country, and one is to cross the other, it may be said that, in such a case as that, ordinarily, the new railroad would have the right to cross the other at grade; not that it is universally true, but generally so. There might be, and often are, circumstances where it would not be consistent with the interests of the railroads themselves or of the public that they should cross at grade.

Now in this case, assuming that the facts are as stated, and that the new railroad (the Chicago & Pacific Railroad) can cross over the old railroad at so little expense as is stated, I should consider it the duty of a court of equity to require it to be done. If the old road comes into a court of equity and asks that the crossing should be so made, and there is an additional expense incurred in consequence, it may be competent for a court to say the expense shall not be wholly incurred by the new railroad company, because I adhere to the doctrine I laid down the other day in the Michigan Central and Baltimore & Ohio Case, that the fact that one railroad has been constructed does not give it any absolute rights, except so far as the question of mere property is concerned, over a new railroad. It takes its rights always subject to the power of the state to authorize any other railroad to cross or intersect it, as the case may be. Where there is a considerable expense growing out of the crossing, it may be a question for a court of equity to determine how that expense shall be apportioned.

In this particular case, assuming that the allegations of the bill are sustained by the affidavits, then it seems clear that it is for the interests of both roads that one should cross over the other. It is not a question for a day, a month, or a year; but it is a question for all time, so to speak, at any rate, for an indefinite time. The crossing of a road at grade involves a continual, never-ending expense and damage to both roads. It can be avoided by one crossing over the other, and the only expense then is the interest on the additional cost.

Now, in this case it is said that there is quite a steep grade; that one of the circumstances connected with the crossing at grade, namely, the stoppage of the trains, involves a peculiar loss and danger. In such a case as that, it certainly may be competent for a court of equity to interfere, under the provisions of law as they now exist. The mere question of damages to be ascertained by the exercise of the right of eminent domain does not reach the difficulty; therefore it may be a proper case for the interposition of a court of equity, even though the court under other circumstances, would not interfere, as in the case supposed, of two railroads in a level country, where they approach under such circumstances that the natural crossing may be at grade. Here it is not so.

If there is any additional expense involved in this to the new road, I do not say that expenditure would have to be incurred exclusively by that road. I should be very much inclined to apportion the expense under the circumstances of the case, because the old railroad comes in and asks for the interposition of a court of equity, and under the equity rule, might be required to bear its proper share of the expense, because the crossing at the elevation is for the common advantage of both roads.

I think this a proper case for the interposition of a court of equity. I am more and more inclined to hold that it is the duty of a court of equity to interfere in cases of this kind unless the legislature has unmistakably declared what the rule is. If the legislature comes in and says all crossings shall be located in a particular way, as a police matter, we will submit. But so long as they have left it open, I am inclined to hold that a court of equity can protect and assert the rights of railroads—the old and the new—and those of the public.

As to the question of jurisdiction, it is perhaps not entirely free from doubt. But I think that for the purpose of a standing in the federal court, within the language of the constitution and the judiciary act, we must hold that a corporation created by the laws of another state, although it may be associated with a corporation in our own state, and their interests may be common, will be recognized as being within the jurisdiction of this court; that a court of equity can protect the interests of a joint proprietor in property that is being injuriously affected. That is my present impression. Let the injunction issue pursuant to the prayer of the bill.

[2 Cent. Law J. 335;[1] 9 West. Jur. 347.]

Circuit Court, D. Iowa. May 12, 1875.[2]

LEGISLATIVE POWER TO REGULATE RAILWAY TARIFFS—STATE REGULATION OF RAILWAYS—LEGISLATIVE RESERVATION OF RIGHT TO MAKE RULES AND REGULATIONS — VALIDITY OF ACT WHICH PRESCRIBES DIFFERENT RATES FOR DIFFERENT ROADS.

1. Where a railway company has been organized under a general law of a state, which confers upon such companies "the power to make contracts," but does not in express terms confer on them the exclusive power to fix their own tolls and compensation, the state may afterwards pass laws regulating such tolls and compensation.

[See note at end of case.]

2. The United States granted to the state of Iowa certain lands for the purpose of constructing a described railway within the state. The legislature of Iowa accepted the trust, and conferred the donation upon a particular company, with the reservation that such company should at all times be subject to such rules and regulations as might from time to time be enacted and provided by the general assembly, "not inconsistent with the provisions of this act, and the act of congress making the grant" [11 Stat. 9]. Held, that this was an express reservation, on the part of the state, of the power to regulate the compensation which should be received for the carriage of freight and passengers over such road.

3. A state law which divides the railroads in such state into different classes, based upon the amount of the earnings per mile, and which prescribes a rate of charges for the roads of each class different from the rates prescribed for each of the other classes, is not obnoxious to a constitutional inhibition against the passage of laws not uniform in their operation.

Bill [against M. E. Cutts, attorney general, and William Christy, treasurer, of the state of Iowa, and Daniel Campbell] for an injunction.

On the 23d day of March, 1874, the legislature of the state of Iowa passed an act entitled, "An act to establish reasonable maximum rates of charges for the transportation of freights and passengers on the different railroads of this state." Acts 1874, p. 61. This act classifies all of the railroads within the state, according to their gross annual earnings per mile, and provides in substance that railroads earning $4,000 per mile and over (Class A.) shall not charge more than 90 per cent. of the fixed rate; that roads earning $3,000 per mile (Class B.) shall not charge over 5 per cent. above the fixed rate; and roads earning $2,000 per mile (Class C.) shall not charge over 20 per cent. in addition to the fixed rate; and that they shall not charge respectively for passengers more than: Class A., three cents, Class B., three and one-half cents, and Class C., four cents per mile. The present suit is brought by the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Railroad Company, of Illinois, as the lessee in perpetuity, under legislative authority, of the Burlington and Missouri River Railroad Company of Iowa, to enjoin suits by the attorney general of the state, for the enforcement of the above mentioned railway tariff act of March 23, 1874. The bill rests upon the ground that the act last named is in conflict with the constitution of the United States, in that it impairs the obligation of a contract, and is also a regulation of inter-state commerce; that it is also repugnant to the constitution of the state, for the reason that it does not affect all railroads alike, and is therefore not of uniform operation; and for the further reason that it conflicts with section 1 of the bill of rights. The answer admits most of the allegations of the bill, but denies that the B. and M. R. R. Co., either by the charter or the laws of Iowa, had the exclusive right and power to fix its rates of fare, and denies that any attempt is to be made to enforce the law, so far as regards inter-state commerce. It is averred in the answer that, if the B. and M. R. R. Co., ever did have such exclusive right, it yielded such right by its acceptance of the land grant in A. D. 1856, under the conditions stated in the act granting said lands. That since the original charter was granted, and after the adoption of the new constitution of Iowa in A. D. 1857, said charter has been amended in many material respects; and that by the acceptance of such amendments the charter became subject to amendment or repeal by the general assembly, under the provisions of said constitution conferring that power and right upon the general assembly; and that it especially applies to the Red Oak Branch, which was constructed by virtue of an amendment to the charter made in A. D. 1869; that as to the other branch roads, they were constructed by the aid of taxes levied and collected in various townships under the act of 1870, which provided that all roads constructed by such aid "shall be subject to the control of the general assembly, in regard to management of the same, and the charges for transportation of freight and passengers." On the bill, answer and certain exhibits and affidavits, the complainant moves for the allowance of a temporary injunction to restrain the enforcement of the act of March 23, 1874.

O. H. Browning, D. Rorer, and James Grant, for complainant.

M. E. Cutts, Atty. Gen. of Iowa, and W. H. Seevers, for respondents.

DILLON, Circuit Judge. Whatever rights the complainant corporation has are derived from the Burlington and Missouri River Railroad Company. It will be conceded for the purposes of the present application that the complainant possesses all the franchises, rights and powers of the Burlington Company, and is entitled to the relief here sought if the last named company would have been entitled thereto, if it were itself using and operating its road. An enquiry into the rights of the Burlington Company as respects compensation for services rendered by it, becomes necessary. This company was incorporated in 1852. The constitution of the state then in force provided that "corporations, except for political or municipal purposes, shall not be created by special laws, but the general assembly shall provide, by general laws for the organization of all other corporations." Under this provision of the constitution the legislature, in 1851, passed a general act for the creation of corporations for pecuniary profit, including railway corporations. No express power to alter or annul the articles of association of companies organized under the act, was reserved. Code 1851, art. 43, pp. 108, 109. It was under this general incorporation act that the Burlington Company was organized in 1852. By this act it was provided (Code 1851, § 673), that "any number of persons may associate themselves and become incorporated for the transaction of any lawful business, including the establishment of ferries, the construction of canals, railways, bridges, or other works of internal improvement; but such incorporation confers no power or privilege not possessed by natural persons, except as hereinafter provided." The next section (674) enumerates the powers of corporations organized under this act as follows: "(1) To have perpetual succession. (2) To sue and be sued by its corporate name. (3) To have a common seal which it may alter at pleasure. (4) To render the interests of the stockholders transferable. (5) To exempt the private property of its members from liability for corporate debts except as herein otherwise declared. (6) To make contracts, acquire and transfer property, possessing the same powers in such respects as private individuals now enjoy. (7) To establish by-laws and make all rules and regulations deemed expedient for the management of their affairs, in accordance with law, and not incompatible with an honest purpose." This, then, is the extent of the corporate powers and franchises of the company; and they are but little greater than those which the law "tacitly, and without any express provision, considers inseparable from every corporation," created for a like purpose. Ang. & A. Corp. § 110; 2 Kent, Comm. 224. The complainant seeks an injunction in this case, not on the ground that the maximum rates of charges allowed by the act of 1874 are unreasonable, but on the ground distinctly asserted in the argument, that the company has the exclusive power to fix the measure of its own compensation, and consequently that such an enactment as that of 1874 is a violation of its chartered rights.

In considering this claim of the company, it cannot fail to arrest attention that the statute nowhere in terms confers upon railway corporations organized under it, the power to fix or regulate their charges. We have, then, to deal with a case where the legislature has not expressly delegated to the company the power to fix its own tolls or compensation. When we consider the rule of construction, as it is definitely settled in Great Britain and by the courts of this country, that any ambiguity or fair doubt in the charters of corporations, operates in favor of the public, and that a corporate body can claim nothing not clearly granted, it is quite plain that the general power "to make contracts, the same as individuals," cannot be held to amount to a contract between the state and the company, that the latter should exclusively and permanently prescribe and regulate its own charges. The surrender of legislative power beyond recall, in so important a matter, can not, in my judgment, be implied from any such general language. Undoubtedly the railroad company may demand compensation for its services. It can not be imagined that the legislature supposed the capital necessary to construct and operate railroads would be invested therein except for the hope of profit to be thereby realized, and there is no source of profit to a railway company except its earnings for the transportation of persons and property. I have no difficulty, therefore, in holding that the legislature, either by the express power "to make contracts," or, what seems the more satisfactory ground, by just and necessary implication, did authorize railway corporations to demand and receive compensation for their services; but this is far short of conferring upon them an exclusive power in this respect, and one beyond future legislative control.

In all civilized countries the duty of providing and preserving safe and convenient highways to facilitate trade and communication between different parts of the state or community, is considered a governmental duty. This may be done by the government directly, or through the agency of corporations created for that purpose. The right of public supervision and control over highways results from the power and duty of providing and preserving them. As to ordinary highways these propositions are unquestioned. But it is denied that they apply to railways built by private capital and owned by private corporations, created for the purpose of building them. Whoever studies the nature and purposes of railways constructed under the authority of the state by means of private capital, will see that such railways possess a two-fold character. Such a railway is in part public, and in part private. Because of its public character, relations and uses, the judicial tribunals of this country, state and national, have at length settled the law to be that the state, to secure their construction, may exert in favor of the corporation authorized by it to build the road, both its power of eminent domain and of taxation. This the state cannot do in respect of occupations or purposes private in their nature. A way thus authorized and established is intended for the public use and benefit, although the capital is furnished by the corporators or shareholders, and the tolls belong to them. In its public character a railroad is an improved highway or means of more rapid and commodious communication, and its public character is not divested by the fact that its ownership is private. These general views have been asserted by many state courts, but in this court it is sufficient to refer to the judgments of the supreme court of the United States, in the cases of Olcott v. Supervisors, 16 Wall. [83 U. S.] 678; Council Bluffs & St. J. R. Co. v. County of Otoe, 16 Wall. [83 U. S.] 673; and the very recent cases known as the Topeka and Iola Tax Cases [Citizens' Sav. & Loan Ass'n v. Topeka, 20 Wall. (87 U. S.) 655; Commercial Nat. Bank v. Iola City, 22 U. S. (Lawy. Ed.) 463], the opinions in which were given by the presiding justice of this court. In its relations to its stockholders, a railroad or the property in the road and its income is private property, and subject to the lawful or reserved rights of the public, is invested with the sanctity of other private property. The distinction here indicated marks with general accuracy, the extent of legislative control, except where this has been surrendered or abridged by a valid legislative contract. Over the railroad as a highway and in all its public relations, the state, by virtue of its general legislative power, has supervision and control; but over the rights of the shareholders, so far as these are private property, the state has the same power, and no greater than over other private property. The power which the state may legitimately exercise over railways within it is subject to such further restrictions as it may have consented to by express grants in charters in respect of which no power of repeal or alteration is reserved, and by the commerce clause of the federal constitution, which withdraws interstate commerce from state control, and confines the state to the regulation of its internal traffic. As our railroad system is made up of links supplied under the authority of the several states, it may admit of doubt in our present knowledge, whether a power in a state thus limited can be beneficially exercised; but this is a legislative problem and not a judicial question.

Without further enlarging upon the public nature and uses of railways, or undertaking to review the authorities cited, or examine the positions assumed by counsel, which would necessarily lead through a broad field of discussion, I content myself, on this branch of the subject, with stating as my conclusion, that the legislature has not expressly conferred upon railway corporations in this state the exclusive power to fix their own charges; that such a power cannot be deduced by implication from the constituent act of the corporations, and that whatever powers are conferred in this respect, are subject to an implied condition that they shall not be oppressively or unreasonably exercised, and also subject to the future exercise of the police regulations of the state, or any other power possessed by the state, properly legislative in its nature, which includes the power to regulate, consistently with the charter, all of the franchises granted, and to prescribe and limit the amount of toll or charges which it shall be lawful to take.

This view, if sound, is decisive of the case against the railroad company. But if we should concede it to be erroneous, and that the company originally possessed chartered rights which the act of 1874 would violate, still it has surrendered any such right by its acceptance of the act of July 14, 1856. On the 15th day of May of that year, congress made a grant of lands to the state of Iowa, "for the purpose of aiding in the construction of a railroad from Burlington, on the Mississippi river, to a point on the Missouri river, near the mouth of the Platte river." The state could dispose of the lands for the sole purpose of building the line of railway, but it had the absolute power to select the company which should receive the benefit of the grant. The legislature accepted the trust by the act of July 14, 1856, and by that act gave the benefit of the grant to the Burlington Company upon condition that it should assent to the provisions of that act, which it did. Among the provisions of the act thus assented to by the company was the following: "That the company accepting the provisions of the act, shall at all times be subject to such rules and regulations as may from time to time be enacted and provided by the general assembly of Iowa, not inconsistent with the provisions of this act, and the act of congress making the grant." Rev. St. 1860, § 1311. The state of Iowa sustained towards these lands the relation of trustee of the general government, and in that capacity could not divert or change the trust, but it also sustained towards any company on which it should confer the benefits of the grant the relation of a sovereign, and as such was capable of enacting any valid law whatever, not in conflict with the act of congress making the grant. The state had the power, therefore, to say to the donee of its bounty, we will give you the benefit of this grant of lands provided you will agree to be at all times subject to such rules and regulations as the general assembly may enact. The company accepted the grant, and thereby agreed to be subject to this condition. The only question, then, is as to the extent of the power recognized or given by the words "rules and regulations." The interpretation of these words must depend upon their occasion and purpose. The occasion was an important one, both for the company and the state. The company was made the beneficiary of a large and valuable grant of lands. The state was endeavoring to secure for the benefit of the public the building of an important highway or line of communication from the Mississippi to the Missouri river.

Doubts as to the extent of the power of the state over the corporation, under the then existing legislation, suggested the provision in question, and it was undoubtedly the design of the legislature to secure a substantial right to the state, or a recognition by the company of such a right in the state. It is to be regretted that words were not used which would admit of no dispute, but as it is we must interpret those employed so as to effectuate the intention of the parties. Some aid to interpretation is afforded by the decisions of the supreme court of the United States, in respect to the word "regulate" as it occurs in the federal constitution. These are referred to in the recent case of Hamilton v. Dillin [Case No. 5,979]. In this case it was held under the act of July 13, 1861 [12 Stat. 257], that power to authorize commercial intercourse, during the rebellion, "to be conducted and carried on only in pursuance of rules and regulations prescribed by the secretary of the treasury," authorized the secretary to impose, as a condition of cotton permits, a tax of four cents a pound on cotton purchased. The following observations of Mr. Justice Bradley, in the case last cited, are pertinent to the case in hand. The learned judge says: "It is contended that the imposition of the bonus of four cents per pound was not a 'rule' or a 'regulation' within the fair meaning of the act; and it is conceded that in many cases the power to make rules and regulations on a particular subject is a limited power, having respect to mode and form, and time and circumstance, and not to substance. But it also must be conceded that in other cases the power is much more extensive and substantial. Thus in the constitution, the several powers 'to regulate commerce,' 'to establish a uniform rule of naturalization,' 'to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States,' are understood to give plenary control over those subjects. The power to regulate commerce has been held to include the power to suspend it (1 Kent, Comm. 432); and the power to make rules and regulations respecting the territory of the United States, has been held to include the power to legislate for and govern such territory and establish governments therein. [M'Culloch v. Maryland] 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 422; Story, Cont. § 1328. The extensive effect given to these clauses is undoubtedly largely due to the character of the instrument and that of the donee of the powers, to wit, the legislature of the United States, to whom the grant of a power means the grant of a branch of sovereignty. It shows, however, that the rule of construction depends, at least, in some sort, upon the nature of the subject-matter. In the case before us, the power of the government to open and regulate trade with the enemy was intended to be conferred upon the president and secretary of the treasury. The power of regulation in such a case is to be taken in the broadest sense, and, in our judgment, included the power to impose such conditions as the president and secretary should see fit."

So, in the case before us, the legislature of the state is the donee or possessor of the power to make the rules and regulations in question, and the power is to be construed accordingly, and not in a narrow and technical sense. Any construction that deprives words of a substantial purpose or meaning, would plainly thwart the purpose intended to be effected. The words, when carefully considered, satisfactorily evince a purpose of subjecting the companies to the control of the legislature. The language is that "the company accepting the grant shall, at all times, be subject to such rules and regulations as may, from time to time (that is, as occasion arises), be enacted and provided by the general assembly of Iowa," and the only limitation named is, that they shall not be inconsistent with the act of July 14, 1856, or the land grant act of congress. Such rules and regulations are, necessarily, laws. Referring to this subject, counsel say that these words "can justly be construed only to refer to what is called the public and general management of the road as a highway, and not to change the vital, life-giving principle of the charter to the corporation, to regulate its own tariffs." But the power to regulate the public and general management of the road as a highway existed before, and the interpretation suggested is open to the objection of making an important provision to which the company was expressly required solemnly to assent, useless and unavailing. The legislature, by this provision, meant, in my judgment, to put at rest any question that might then exist as to the subordination of the corporations accepting the grant to the legislative power of the state, so far as, consistently with the preservation of their franchises, the public good might from time to time require.

The act of 1874 is not void for want of uniformity, or because it does not prescribe a uniform rate for all railroads in the state. There may be good reasons connected with the cost of construction and expense of operating, and the amount of earnings, why railroads of one class should be allowed to charge more than roads of another class. The law is uniform in its operation upon all roads in each class; and similar acts, as for example dividing cities into classes, with different powers, are not uncommon in our legislation, and their validity has been sustained by the courts. The cases cited in the brief of the attorney general fully establish this proposition.

I need not discuss the objection made by the bill to the act of 1874, as interfering with inter-state commerce, since the answer expressly disclaims any intention to enforce, or attempt to enforce, the act in this respect. Injunction denied.

[NOTE. Plaintiff appealed to the supreme court, which affirmed the decree herein, holding, per Waite, C. J., that complainant was subject to legislative control as to its rates, there being nothing in its charter to prevent legislative interference; that the right to regulate such rates was not lost by failure to exercise it; and that the statute of March 23, 1874, was not repugnant to the constitution of the state, or that of the United States. COUNTY BONDS—HOW DECLARED ON.

Where a county by public statute has the power to issue negotiable bonds on certain conditions, and its bonds are issued and in the hands of bona fide holders, such a holder is not bound to allege in his declarations the election or other facts showing a compliance with the conditions on which the issue of the bonds is authorized.

[See note at end of case.]

The questions to be determined arise on a demurrer to the petition, which consists of one hundred and thirty-five counts, each of which is as follows: "That on the 1st day of January, 1870, at Nebraska City, in said county, the said defendant made and issued its certain bond, dated on said day at said place, whereby, for value received, it promised twenty years from date to pay the bearer one thousand dollars at the Broadway Bank in the city of New York, with interest payable semi-annually at said bank, at the rate of eight per cent per annum, according to divers coupons thereto attached, which bond, in order to distinguish it from others of like character, was marked No. ——; that attached thereto was, among others, a certain coupon, bearing date on the day and at the place aforementioned, made by said county, whereby it promised to pay to the bearer thereof forty dollars at said bank, on the 1st day of July, 1870, for the interest then and there to be due on said bond, which coupon is in words and figures as follows: '$40. Nebraska City, January 1, 1870. The county of Otoe, in the state of Nebraska, promises to pay to the bearer forty dollars, at Broadway Bank, New York, on the 1st day of July, 1870, being for six months' interest on bond No. ——. A. Stout, President Board County Commissioners. George R. McCallum, Clerk.' That before said coupon by its terms became due and payable, the said bond, together with said coupon, came to and for value became the property of this plaintiff, who thereupon became, and has ever since been and still is the true and lawful holder thereof; that when said coupon by its terms became due and payable, the same was duly presented at the place of payment therein mentioned, and payment demanded, but refused because said defendant had not nor did it ever have funds at said place; that the said plaintiff has often and in a friendly manner, applied to said defendant, at its treasury, in Nebraska City, in said county, to pay said coupon, but it has refused to do so, notwithstanding it is justly indebted thereon to this plaintiff in the full sum of forty dollars, with interest from the first day of July, 1870."

The defendant assigns its causes of demurrer as follows: "1. The petition does not state any facts which would authorize the said defendant, by its county commissioners, to issue or deliver to any person or corporation, the bond referred to in said petition, or the coupons mentioned and set forth therein, upon which this action is brought; nor does said petition show any authority or power in the county commissioners of Otoe county to make, issue, or deliver bonds and coupons of the defendant in any manner whatever. 2. It does not appear from the petition that the bonds therein referred to, or the coupons upon which this action is founded, were ever issued or delivered to the Burlington and Missouri Railroad Company, or to any railroad or corporation, to secure to Nebraska City and Otoe county, in the state of Nebraska, a direct eastern railroad connection, or otherwise, in conformity to an act of the legislature of the state of Nebraska, approved February 15, 1869, entitled 'An act to authorize the county commissioners of Otoe county to issue the bonds of said county to the amount of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars to the Burlington & Missouri Railroad Company, or any other railroad running east from Nebraska City,' as in conformity to or with any law whatever of the state of Nebraska, and that said pretended act of the legislature of the state of Nebraska, above mentioned, is repugnant to the constitution of the United States of America, and to the constitution of the state of Nebraska, and therefore null and void. 3. And for a further cause of demurrer to the petition, the defendant says that the bonds referred to in the said petition claimed to have been issued by the defendant, are not set forth in the petition, but only so much of said pretended bonds as is contained in the coupons thereto attached, and also that such petition and declaration is in other respects uncertain, informal, and insufficient."

Sweet & Schofield and H. M. & A. H. Vories, for defendant.

Before DILLON, Circuit Judge, and DUNDY, District Judge.

DILLON, Circuit Judge. There are three causes of demurrer set down against the sufficiency of the petition. The second ground of demurrer cannot be considered, since it refers to and rests upon matters de hors the petition. By the petition it does not appear that the bonds mentioned in the coupons were issued to the Burlington and Missouri Railroad Company or to any railroad company, or to aid in the building of, or to pay for stock in, any railroad company whatever. It is alleged in the petition that the defendant made and issued its negotiable bonds, with interest coupons attached; that before the coupons now in suit became due, the bonds together with the coupons, for value became the property of the plaintiff, the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad Company.

The first ground of demurrer raises the question whether the petition must set forth the facts showing that the county commissioners were authorized to issue the bonds. There are two acts of the state of Nebraska, under either of which (assuming their constitutional validity) bonds to aid in the construction of a railroad (assuming also, the bonds now in controversy to be of this character) might have been properly made and issued by the defendant. Laws Neb. 1869, pp. 92, 260. One of these is a general act to enable public and municipal corporations to borrow money on their bonds, or to issue bonds to aid in the construction of railroads or other works of internal improvement, after the proposition shall have been submitted to and approved by a vote of the people. The other is a special act "authorizing the county commissioners of Otoe county (the defendant) to issue $150,000 of its bonds to the Burlington & Missouri River Railroad Company, or any other company that will secure to Nebraska City a direct eastern railroad connection, as a donation to said railroad company, or on such terms and conditions as may be imposed by said county commissioners." Under which of these acts, if either, the bonds were issued, is not alleged. It appears, however, from an act of the legislature which this court will notice, that on certain terms the defendant was authorized to issue its bonds; and bonds having been issued, and being, as alleged in the petition, in the hands of holders for value, before maturity, the presumption is that the election was held and the other necessary terms complied with, which would authorize the commissioners to issue the bonds.

The question on this record is one of pleading; and a holder, under such circumstances, of bonds negotiable in their character, is not bound, when suing in the federal courts to allege in his petition, the election or other facts showing a compliance with the preliminary steps required of the officers before they are authorized to issue and deliver the bonds.

Such is the doctrine of the supreme court, which it is obligatory on this court implicitly to follow. If in the given case, the authority to issue bonds did not arise or exist, and the corporation is not liable thereon, the facts may be pleaded in defence. Knox Co. v. Aspinwall, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 539; Moran v. Commissioners, 2 Black [67 U. S.] 722; Rogers v. Burlington, 3 Wall. [70 U. S.] 364; Cincinnati v. Morgan, Id. 275; Mercer Co. v. Hackett, 1 Wall. [68 U. S.] 83; Gelpcke v. Dubuque, Id. 220; Curtis v. Butler Co., 24 How. [65 U. S.] 435; Bissell v. Jeffersonville, Id. 287; Meyer v. Muscatine, 1 Wall. [68 U. S.] 385; City of Kenosha v. Lamson, 9 Wall. [76 U. S.] 477; Supervisors v. Schenck, 5 Wall. [72 U. S.] 772; De Voss v. Richmond [18 Grat. (Va.) 338]. The averments in the petition show prima facie liability; and this view is entirely consistent with the case of Marsh v. Fulton Co., 10 Wall. [77 U. S.] 679, recently decided by the supreme court. The result, as well as the reasoning, of Mr. Justice Field in that case, is entirely satisfactory to my mind.

It only remains to add that it is not necessary to set out in the petition the bonds to which the coupons are attached. Knox Co. v. Aspinwall, 22 How. [63 U. S.] 539; Thompson v. Lee Co., 3 Wall. [70 U. S.] 377; City of Kenosha v. Lamson, 9 Wall. [76 U. S.] 477; Ring v. Johnson Co., 6 Iowa, 265; McCoy v. Washington Co. [Case No. 8,731]; Johnson v. Stark Co., 24 Ill. 75.

The constitutional question argued by the counsel for the defendant is not legitimately presented by the demurrer, and is not examined nor decided. The demurrer is overruled, and the defendant has leave to answer. Demurrer overruled.

[NOTE. On the trial upon the merits, the judges of the court were divided in opinion, and certified the case to the supreme court. The questions upon which the circuit court judges divided were as follows:

[1. Whether the act of the Nebraska legislature (Feb. 15, 1869) authorizing the issue of bonds by the county of Otoe in aid of the construction of a railroad outside the state conflicted with the state constitution.

[2. "Whether the county commissioners of Otoe county could, under the act of February 15, 1869, lawfully issue the bonds from which the coupons in suit were detached, without the proposition to vote the bonds for the purpose indicated, and also a tax to pay the same being or having been submitted to a vote of the people of the county, as provided by the act of the territorial legislature of Nebraska passed January 1, 1861."

[The certificate of the supreme court is as follows: First, that the act of February 15, 1869, is not unconstitutional; and, second, that the county commissioners of Otoe county could lawfully issue the bonds from which the coupons in suit were detached, without any submission to a vote of the people of the county of the proposition to approve the bonds, or a tax for the payment thereof. Circuit Court, N. D. Illinois. Aug. 1864.

NEW CERTIFICATES OF STOCK—WHEN NOT DIVIDENDS.

1. Where a railroad company, from time to time, made advances from their surplus earnings to another railroad company, taking leases and morgages therefor, and such second company finally became insolvent, and the loaning company, to secure their debt, foreclosed their mortgages and purchased the insolvent road for the amount of their advances, and issued stock certificates to each of their stockholders, representing their pro rata interest in this property thus acquired,—all the said advances having been made prior to the passage of the act of July 1, 1862 [12 Stat. 469],—such certificates are not dividends within the meaning of section 81 of that act, and are not subject to the three per cent. tax.

2. The advances having all been made prior to the passage of the act, and no money having been received at the sale, but the company having simply perfected their title and enforced a pre-existing lien, and having always treated this acquired property as added capital stock, such certificates are not properly dividends in money or scrip paid to the stockholders.

In equity. This was a bill to prevent the collection, by seizure, distress, or otherwise, by Mr. Schneider, the United States collector for this district, of a tax for $29,285, claimed to be due to the United States from the complainant, under the 81st section of the internal revenue law of July 1, 1862 (12 Stat. 469). A controversy having arisen between the government and the railway company as to the right of the former to assess and levy the tax, and the collector being ordered to enforce its collection, this bill was filed. By various acts of the legislature of Illinois, the complainant, prior to 1860, had the right to construct a railway from Junction, in the county of DuPage, to Galesburg, in the county of Knox. The road was in operation between those points in 1855. For the purpose of aiding the Peoria and Oquawka Railway Company, and to obtain for itself a connection with the Mississippi river at Burlington, the complainant, in 1854, advanced to the Peoria and Oquawka Railroad a sum exceeding three hundred thousand dollars, which was secured by a lease in the nature of a mortgage on that part of the Peoria and Oquawka Railroad west of Galesburg. This sum was not sufficient for the purpose contemplated, and, prior to the first day of January, 1862, the complainant, with the same object, had advanced other large sums of money to that company, amounting, in the aggregate, even as early as the first of January, 1860, to more than fifteen hundred thousand dollars. This whole indebtedness was secured by mortgages, leases, and contracts in the nature of mortgages on that part of the Peoria and Oquawka Railroad extending from Peoria to Burlington. The plaintiff was also obliged to purchase, in order to secure these advances, certain first and second mortgage bonds of the Peoria and Oquawka Railroad, amounting to twelve hundred and fifty thousand dollars, given and secured in 1852 and 1853, on the same part of the road. Prior to the first day of January, 1862, the complainant had become the owner of nearly all of these mortgage bonds. In February, 1860, the Peoria and Oquawka Railroad Company had become insolvent, and the complainant caused suit to be instituted to foreclose these mortgages in this court, and a decree of foreclosure was entered, and at the sale under the decree, which took place in October, 1862, the complainant became the purchaser of that part of the road between Peoria and Burlington, as the only means of saving any portion of the moneys previously advanced. From July, 1857, to November, 1862, but one dividend was distributed to the stockholders by the complainant. The earnings of the complainant's road were appropriated to aid in making the advances and purchases already referred to, and which have never been reimbursed, except by the sale of the part of the Peoria and Oquawka Railroad above mentioned, and of which the complainant is now the owner. In November, 1862, the complainant had on hand of the earnings of its road, $210,207.29, which had not been appropriated in the manner stated above, and which sum it divided among its stockholders, reserving three per cent. therefrom, which was paid to Mr. Schneider, the collector for the United States, as required by the 81st section of the internal revenue law. The complainant, with a view of ascertaining the amount of the earnings of the road, which had thus been advanced to the Peoria and Oquawka Railroad Company, on the 16th of November, 1862, caused an account to be taken, and the sum was found to be in the aggregate $946,900, and thereupon a stock certificate was issued to each of the stockholders of the complainant's road, showing the pro rata amount of earnings which had been advanced, the same amounting to about twenty per cent. to each stockholder on the original amount of stock held by each. The certificate which was issued under this arrangement was to the effect that the holder was entitled to so many shares of the full paid stock of the company —thus turning the property which had been acquired for the advances made, into capital stock of the company. It was three per cent. of the sum thus advanced and for which certificates were given in November, 1862, that the government claimed should be paid by the railway company.

DRUMMOND, District Judge. The 81st section of the act of July 1, 1862, provides that on and after that day "all dividends in scrip, or money, or sums of money thereafter declared due or payable to stockholders of any railroad company, as part of the earnings, profits or gains of said companies, shall be subject to and pay a duty of three per centum on the amount of all such * * * dividends whenever the same shall be paid; and said railroad companies or railroad corporations, or any person, or persons owning, possessing or having the care or management of any railroad company, or railroad corporation, are hereby authorized and required to deduct and withhold from all payments made to any person, persons or party, after the first day of July, as aforesaid, on account of any * * * dividends due and payable as aforesaid, the said duty or sum of three per centum." 12 Stat. 469, 470. In conformity with the joint resolution of July 17, 1862 [12 Stat. 627], the secretary of the treasury gave notice that the time mentioned in the foregoing section should be construed as referring to the first day of September, 1862.

It is insisted on the part of the government that the issuing of the certificates of stock in November, 1862, was a division among its stockholders of the profits and earnings of the road, or a dividend in scrip within the meaning of the law. There can be no doubt the assets, securities and mortgages held and owned by the plaintiff at the time of the passage of the law, and which were then in course of foreclosure and sale in this court, were partly acquired with the earnings and profits of the road; but they were laid out and invested in them—a large share prior to 1860, and all prior to July 1, 1862. These profits and earnings had then actually been disbursed for them and they were held as a part of the general property or assets of the company. When the company enforced its lien by a sale, the property and assets, in part purchased with the earnings of the road, did not produce the money which had been paid for them, but the company took in their place that part of the Peoria and Oquawka Railroad extending from Peoria to Burlington, and became the legal and equitable owner of the same. Its value as an acquisition to the property of the plaintiff was estimated at its cost, and a stock certificate was issued, showing the amount which each stockholder had contributed towards the purchase.

We think in no just sense can this be considered as a dividend. It was not intended or treated as such by the company. It is true that it is not necessary the division should be of money, but the act clearly contemplates that when it is in scrip, it shall be of a character to be paid,—and the payment of which can be deducted and withheld from the stockholders by the managers of the railroad,—and that it shall be due and payable. Apply these tests to this property and it will be seen the facts will not warrant the right claimed. Before the sale, it could be regarded only as a loan or purchase made; after, as a bona fide title acquired in the property by the company,—consequently by all the stockholders,—and not as something due and payable to them. If heretofore it had been converted into money, or hereafter it ever shall be, and the amount divided among the stockholders, there might be now, or then, some apparent reason for the position taken. And if the company had had on hand at the time of the passage of the law a portion of its earnings, and afterwards purchased with them property which it converted into stock, there would be some force in urging that the company could not in that way avoid the payment of the tax to the government. But the argument here is, that it is of no consequence what the actual value of the property was in November, 1862, or at the time of the advances,—though not one quarter of the money paid,—yet it must be regarded as a dividend for the whole, and it goes even further, and seeks to establish either that the property must be sold in whole or part to pay the tax, or that earnings on hand and not divided, or subsequently acquired, and for which, therefore, there might be a tax due, shall have an additional burden to the three per centum already imposed. It is plain that such a principle would reach every purchase made with its profits by a railway company in past years, either of real or personal property, added to the general stock, and any apportionment of stock so acquired, for which a certificate might be given after September 1, 1862, showing the amount of such purchase or apportionment, and the share of the stockholder in the same. A construction which leads to such consequences ought not to be given to this statute unless the language imperatively demands it. There is nothing in the scope or spirit of the law, or in its terms, to require such a construction. The true question must always be in these cases: Has there been a bona fide dividend in money or scrip paid to the stockholders, or has there been an attempt to cover up or conceal the payment of a dividend by some device or mere form? If there has been, it may be conceded that the tax should be paid.

If in 1860 a man had bought an estate, or a mortgage on one, with a portion of his income for that year, he thereby added to his estate the value of the purchase. If he in that way increased his income for 1862, that would be taken into account in assessing it, but if he were then to foreclose the mortgage or perfect his title, that would only be consummating a right of property by enforcing an absolute lien. If he made sale of the property, would the proceeds become part of his income for that year, even though reinvested in another estate?

It is contended on the part of the plaintiff that the law only refers to the earnings received after its passage, July 1, 1862. There is much force in the argument, particularly upon comparing the eightieth with the eighty-first section, the former of which declares that, on and after a certain day, railroad managers shall be subject to, and pay a duty of three per centum on the gross amount of all receipts for the transportation of passengers; but it is not necessary for us to decide that question. We think, however, that there must be, in substance or in fact, after the 1st of September, 1862, a distribution of a dividend in money or scrip, made to the stockholders, and not the mere evidence given of a title in property, the right to which already existed. But it may be said that when there are earnings to be divided, the right to them exists before the division. That is true, but it is also true that until actually divided, the managers of the railroad have control of them, and may appropriate them to the improvement or repairs of the road. It is the setting them apart as a dividend in money or scrip that makes the law operate upon them so as to authorize the tax of three per cent.

We think, therefore, under the circumstances of this case, these certificates of stock cannot be regarded as a dividend declared due and payable to the stockholders in November, 1862. The company and the stockholders treated that part of the property acquired with these earnings as capital stock, and it cannot be at the same time stock added to the capital and a dividend.

At the argument, objection was made by the counsel of the government, though not pressed, that the court ought not to interfere in this summary manner to prevent the collection of the revenue, and various authorities were cited upon that point. We have not fully considered that question, and any temporary order that may be made will be regarded as leaving that open for future consideration. This, we understand, is the wish of the counsel, while at the same time desiring the opinion of the court on the merits of the case. The plaintiff insists that a suit at law would be unavailing in consequence of the pecuniary irresponsibility of the collector, and because his sureties would not be liable, and therefore if this bill is not maintainable the plaintiff is without remedy.

We are informed that the judges of the circuit court of the United States for the eastern district of Michigan, at the June term of the present year, have decided that the sureties of the collector were not liable for illegal collections. If this be so, and the collector himself is not able to respond in damages in an action at law, there would seem to be some ground for the application in this case. However this may be, or whether the distinction taken in some of the cases is sound, that courts of equity will interfere when the tax is illegal or the property not subject to the tax (Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Frary, 22 Ill. 34), and not in other cases, we need not now inquire. The question in this case has been examined because of the desire expressed by the counsel to that effect, on both sides. If necessary, the right of the court permanently to interfere and arrest the collection of this tax may be hereafter considered. It is proper to add that Judge Davis, to whom it has been submitted, entirely concurs in this opinion.

Circuit Court, N. D. Illinois. March Term, 1871.

VALIDITY OF RE-ISSUED PATENT—ACTION OF COMMISSIONER — PATENTEE MAY OMIT PART OF HIS CLAIM — "AIR-TIGHT" — IMPERFECT CONSTRUCTION—ADDING TO PATENTED ARTICLE.

1. In considering the validity of a re-issued patent the only question is as to whether the invention described in the re-issued letters is to be found in the original model, specifications or drawings of the invention.

2. In the re-issued patent the patentee need not claim all that was claimed in the original patent, but may retain what he deems proper.

[Cited in McWilliams Manuf'g Co. v. Blundell, 11 Fed. 420.]

3. The courts must accept the action of the commissioner of patents, as the lawful exercise of his authority, unless it is apparent upon the face of the patent that he has exceeded his authority, and there is a clear repugnancy between the old and the new patent.

4. A patentee, the main and controlling element of whose invention was a metallic ice floor, may in a re-issued patent omit the specifications of the method and form of the supports which had formed a part of his original letters patent, without impairing his claim to the subject matter retained.

5. The term, "air-tight" as applied to the floor of an ice reservoir, means substantially "water tight," or such a construction of the floor that the water will not run down upon the articles stored below, nor the air escape to melt the ice above. A patent for such a floor cannot be evaded by constructing a leaky floor. A person cannot use a patented device by constructing it in an imperfect manner.

6. The fact that in combination with the floor patented, the defendants use another floor, cannot be allowed as a defense. If the floor patented is any part of the defendants' combination, any additions or improvements made thereto do not entitle them to use the part patented.

This was a bill in equity to recover damages for past and to restrain the future use by defendants, of a patent [No. 3,252] re-issued by the United States to Benjamin M Nyce, bearing date the 5th day of January 1869, for "an improvement in buildings for preserving fruit and other substances." The substantial allegations in the bill were, that on the 19th day of March, A. D., 1861, a patent [No. 31,734] was duly issued by the United States to said Benjamin M. Nyce for a new and useful invention before then duly made by said Nyce, for an "improvement in buildings for preserving fruit and other substances;" that afterwards said Nyce, in pursuance of the acts of congress in that behalf made and provided, duly surrendered his said patent, and on the 5th day of January, A. D. 1869, he received new and re-issued letters patent for said invention with amended specifications for the residue of said term of seventeen years from the 19th of March 1861; that on the 17th day of February, 1869, by his assignment in writing of that date duly executed, delivered and recorded, said Nyce assigned, sold and transferred to said complainant, who, it is averred, is a body corporate duly created and existing under the laws of the state of Illinois, all his right and title to make, use and vend the improvements specified in and by said re-issued letters patent, in and throughout the county of Cook, in said state of Illinois, and that ever since said assignment said complainant has been and is the sole owner of said patent, and has the sole right to make, use and vend said invention in said county of Cook; that said invention is of great value to complainants, and yet defendants although knowing complainant's right to said invention, did and have unlawfully and without right, used said invention and improvement, and are still using the same, to the great damage of complainant. The answer did not deny the issue of said letters patent nor the making of said invention by said Nyce, nor deny or put in issue the novelty of said alleged invention nor the validity of the patent. It also admitted that defendants were using buildings for the preservation of lager beer, but denied that said buildings were constructed substantially in the manner described in said patent.

King, Scott & Payson, for complainant.
Nisser & Barnum, for defendants.

BLODGETT, District Judge. The issue in this case under the pleadings is simply upon the question of the identity of the three devices used by the defendants with that invented and patented by Nyce. It appears from the evidence that the specifications in the original letters patent, described a building constructed with two or more outer walls with the space filled with chaff, tan-bark, charcoal or other non-conducting substances, after the manner usually adopted for the construction of ice-houses. This building was to be divided into upper and lower rooms or chambers by a floor to be made of metal, recommending galvanized iron as the best material for the purpose. The upper room or chamber was to be filled with ice, packed upon said metallic floor, and the articles to be preserved were to be placed in the lower room or chamber. The patentee then describes the method in which said floor is to be supported, providing for transverse joists, the upper edges of which should be beveled so as to cover as little as possible of the under surface of the floor, and the beveled edges should be tipped or covered with metal, thereby securing the contact of the atmosphere of the preserving chamber with the greatest possible amount of the surface of the ice floor. Provision was also made for the drainage of the water from the melting ice by means of pipes at the sides of the building, passing through the walls. To secure the necessary degree of dryness in the air of the preserving chamber, certain chemical absorbents were prescribed to be used. The specifications also described a vestibule or entry, to be so constructed as to enable persons to enter the preserving chamber without the admission of external air.

The claims of the patentee under this original patent were: "1st. The construction of a preserving house, whose lower chamber, to contain provisions, is separated from its upper or ice chamber by an air-tight metallic floor, 'M,' supported on metallic joists, 'L,' whose upper surfaces consist of a series of thin edges or points, substantially as set forth." (2d claim, not important in this case.) "3d. The combination of the vestibule and the preserving chamber, constructed as set forth. 4th. The combination of the preserving chamber with the use of the chemicals used for desiccating the atmosphere, and the hygrometric apparatus." In the re-issued letters the patentee only claims on: "1st. An insulated house * * * having an ice reservoir above, and separated from it by an air-tight metallic floor. 2d. The combination of such a house with a vestibule, as described. 3d. The use in such a house of a hygrometer, constructed substantially as explained."

It will thus be seen that while in his original patent the inventor claims the various parts of his house and apparatus in combination, in his re-issued patent his first and chief claim is for an air-tight metallic floor, separating the preserving chamber from the ice reservoir. He does not as in the first patent, claim for a metallic floor, resting on metallic joists with thin edges, although he states that method of construction as the best, when the lowest degree of temperature is desirable. But he says: "It is obvious that there are purposes to which these improvements are applicable, that do not require cold so excessive or an atmosphere so dry as to preserve fruit through successive seasons. For example, to preserve lager beer a temperature of forty-six degrees will answer, forty-three degrees being the best temperature to insure the slow and even chemical changes necessary during its two weeks of fomentation, a necessity which has heretofore closed almost all the breweries of the world from June to September. For all such purposes the strict conditions may be modified, as greater or less cold or dryness is desired. If moisture is not detrimental, leave out the absorbents. If a uniform temperature of forty degrees will suffice, the walls may be less perfect, and the instructions for insulating the metal ice floor less rigidly adhered to."

The defendants are brewers, and the alleged infringements are in certain buildings constructed by them in this city, for storing lager beer during the hot weather. The proof shows that all said buildings contain an ice reservoir, separated from the store or beer room by a galvanized iron floor, resting on wooden joists with flat edges or bearings, or on wooden knobs; that said floors pitch or descend from the center towards the outer wall, and next the wall have a trough or gutter to catch the drippings from the melting ice—the floor not fitting tightly to the wall. Defendants do not use the chemical absorbents described in the patent, but to protect the contents of the store room from the drippings from the ice floor, caused either by leakages or condensation, they construct another floor of zinc, or zinc and wood, under the metallic ice floor, which is made tight and sloping, or pitching from the center to the walls of the room. In fact, they construct a zinc roof beneath the ice floor and over the contents of the store room, to catch and carry off the water which would otherwise drip from the ice floor upon the beer casks. And defendants claim that the floor thus used by them does not infringe on complainant's patent, because: First. Complainant's patent calls for an iron floor, resting on iron supports—iron on iron. Second. The water runs off from their floor differently from what it does from floors described in the patent. Third. Their floor is not air-tight. It has a space next the wall, and also leaks some. Fourth. They use the metallic ice floor in combination with the zinc floor or roof beneath it, and without this zinc floor or roof the ice floor would be valueless to them.

By their first point the defendants insist that the patentee is bound by the specifications in his original patent, and can only hold under his patent an iron floor on iron supports or bearings. This involves the question as to the validity of the re-issued patent.

The 13th section of the act of July 4, 1836 (5 Stat. 122), provides that: "Whenever any patent * * * shall be inoperative or invalid by reason of a defective or insufficient description or specification, or by reason of the patentee claiming in his specification, as his own invention more than he had or shall have a right to claim as new, if the error has or shall have arisen by inadvertency, accident or mistake, and without any fraudulent or deceptive intention, it shall be lawful for the commissioner * * * to cause a new patent to be issued to the said inventor * * * in accordance with the patentee's corrected description and specifications."

In considering the validity of a re-issued patent, then, the only question is as to whether the invention described in the re-issued letters is to be found in the original model, specifications or drawings of the inventor. In other words, is it his invention? If it can so be found, although defectively described, or if claimed with other matters not new or not the invention of the patentee, the re-issue is granted; and the action of the commissioner in granting the re-issue cannot be impeached or inquired into, except for alleged fraud or collusion. Blake v. Stafford [Case No. 1,504].

In the re-issued patent the patentee need not claim all that was claimed in the original patent. He may retain what he deems proper. Crompton v. Belknap Mills [Id. 3,406]. In this case the original specifications described a metallic ice floor, but claimed it in combination with the beveled and metal-tipped joists or supports. And the courts must accept the action of the commissioner as the lawful exercise of his authority, unless it is apparent upon the face of the patent that he has exceeded his authority, and there is a clear repugnancy between the old and the new patent. Woodworth v. Stone [Id. 18,021].

"An inventor is always at liberty in a renewed patent to omit a part of his original invention, if he deems it expedient, and to retain that part only of his original invention which he deems it fit to retain. No harm is done to the public by giving up a part of what he has actually invented; for the public may then use it, and there is nothing in the terms or policy of the patent act which prohibits such a restriction." Carver v. Braintree Manuf'g Co. [Id. 2,485].

"When the commissioner accepts a surrender of an original patent and grants a new patent, his decision in the premises in a suit for infringement is final and conclusive, and is not re-examinable in a suit in the circuit court, unless it is apparent upon the face of the patent that he has exceeded his authority, that there is such a repugnancy between the old and the new patent that it must be held as a matter of legal construction, that the new patent is not for the same invention as that embraced and secured in the original patent." Per Clifford, J., in Seymour v. Osborne, 11 Wall. [78 U. S.] 516, citing Battin v. Taggert, 17 How. [58 U. S.] 83; O'Reilly v. Morse, 15 How. [56 U. S.] 111; Sickles v. Evans [Case No. 12,839]; Allen v. Blunt [Id. 216.]

"Corrections may be made in the description, specification or claim when the patentee has claimed as new more than he had a right to claim, or when the description, specification or claim is defective or insufficient, but he cannot under such an application make material additions to the invention which were not described, suggested, nor substantially indicated, in the original specifications, drawings or patent office model." Seymour v. Osborne, 11 Wall. [78 U. S.] 516.

In the re-issue he claims simply the metallic ice floor. This is certainly within the rule. This floor was described in the original specifications, although combined with something else the inventor does not now desire to insist upon. There is no dispute but the patentee was the first inventor of the metallic ice floor, and he had a right to claim it as the sole subject matter of his invention, if he chose to do so. There is no departure from the original subject of his invention. He has merely simplified his claim, and confines it now to a single element, instead of a combination of elements, as at first. He is not confined to iron resting on iron; but may rest his floor on any support which enables it to subserve the object for which it is used.

The metallic ice floor was the main and controlling element of the invention. The method of supporting it, of drying the air, of securing ingress and egress, were mere incidents, whose use secured the more perfect working of the invention. This also disposes of the second objection, that the water runs off differently from defendants' floor than it does from complainant's.

It is obvious that some provision must be made for taking off from the floor the water formed by the melting of the ice, but the patentee is not confined to any special method of taking it off. He can carry it off by a gutter or through holes in the walls, or otherwise, as is most convenient. But it is urged, thirdly, that the patentee's floor must be "air-tight," and it is said defendants' is not air-tight, because it does not close up and make a tight joint with the wall, but admits a gutter along its edge between the floor and walls. I think it evident the term "air-tight" used in the claim of the re-issued patent, is to be understood the same as "water-tight;" or, substantially, a tight floor through which the water would not run into the lower room to injure the articles stored there, nor the air escape into the upper room to melt the ice. This, of course, is a desirable condition, and the nearer air and water tight the floor is, the nearer the floor will be perfect. But I do not think the patent can be evaded by constructing and using a leaky floor.

Suppose a machine is patented in which a wheel is described as a material part—a wheel should be a perfect circle—could an infringer defend by showing that he used a wheel which was not a perfect circle? In other words, can any person use a patented device by constructing it in a slovenly or imperfect manner, so that it will accomplish the same kind of result as that intended by the inventor, but not so perfectly? But, as a matter of fact, the proof shows that all defendants' floors were made tight, and some have since become leaky by defective construction. Thus showing that in this regard the defendants attempted to make a tight floor, or an air-tight one.

But the defendants say they use the metallic ice floor in combination with the zinc floor underneath, and hence they do not infringe. This fact cannot be allowed as a defense, if in point of fact the complainant's floor is part of the defendants' combination, because the Nyce patent is for the metallic ice floor, and any additions or improvements added thereto do not entitle defendants to use what belongs to the owners of this patent. For the purposes to which this device is applied by defendants, I presume the zinc floor, to take the place of chemical absorbents, and to prevent drip, is a useful improvement, but that does not entitle defendants to use it without the consent of the patentee.

So, too, with regard to the vestibule. Defendants claim they do not use the vestibule described by the patentee, but they do use a room which performs the substantial functions of the vestibule in the patent. That is to say, the store room is entered through an adjoining room or entry, thereby preventing the external air from rushing into the preserving chamber or store room; so that this entry, as used by defendants in combination with the store room, is in all essential respects the equivalent of the patentee's vestibule. As this case stands, then, upon the pleadings and proofs, Nyce must be deemed the original and first inventor of a metallic ice floor for preserving houses, and of the vestibule in combination therewith. This fact, not being denied by the pleadings, must be held to be admitted, or, if not admitted, defendants only ask for proof, and that is furnished by the production of the letters patent. The right to use and vend this patent has been duly assigned to and is held by complainant. The floors used by defendants are, in their construction and functions, substantially like that described in the patent, and complainant, as assignee of the patent for the county of Cook, is entitled to recover its damages for the infringement.

The matter will, therefore, be referred to H. W. Bishop, Esq., one of the masters of this court, to take testimony, and report as to the amount of said damages, and the injunction will be granted, according to the prayer of the bill.

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Dec. 31, 1879.

REMOVAL—DIVERSE CITIZENSHIP—CORPORATIONS.

1. In determining, under the first clause of § 2 of the act of March 3, 1875 (18 Stat. 470), whether a suit is one in which there is a controversy between citizens of different states, the condition of the controversy when the petition for removal is filed is what is to be considered, and not its condition at a subsequent time. There must be a controversy between citizens of different states when the petition is filed, and all the parties on one side of such controversy must unite in the petition for removal, and they must all then be of different state citizenship from any of the parties on the other side of such controversy.

[Cited in Smith v. McKay, 4 Fed. 354; Curtin v. Decker, 5 Fed. 387, 388.]

2. A corporation defendant, which is not a real or actual or necessary party, but is a merely formal party, to the controversy in the suit, as such controversy stands when the petition for removal is filed, is to be considered as not a party.

3. The controversy is to be judged of, in part, by the pleadings, if any, which had been put in, in the state court, before the filing of the petition for removal.

4. In a suit by a corporation of one state against a citizen of another state, it is sufficient, in a petition for removal by the defendant, under the first clause of said § 2, to state, that the defendant is a citizen of such other state, and it is not necessary to state that he was such citizen when the suit was commenced.

5. Nothing had transpired, in pleading or evidence, since the case came into this court, to show that said formal defendant ought now to be held to be an actual, real and necessary defendant; and a motion to remand the cause was denied.

In equity.

John F. Dillon, for the motion.
Francis N. Bangs, opposed.

BLATCHFORD, Circuit Judge. The defendants in this suit filed in the state court in which the suit was brought a petition for its removal into this court. The petition was that of both of the defendants. It set forth, "that the plaintiff is, as alleged in the complaint, a corporation, existing under the laws of the states of Louisiana, Mississippi, Tennessee and Kentucky; that the said Henry S. McComb is a citizen of the state of Delaware, and that the defendant, the Southern Railroad Association, is a corporation existing under the laws of the states of Mississippi and Tennessee; that the said action was commenced against the defendant Henry S. McComb alone, by the service of a copy of the summons and complaint therein upon the said Henry S. McComb on the 28th day of May, 1878, and that said defendant has not yet appeared in said action; that no service of process in said action has yet been made upon the defendant, the Southern Railroad Association; that the matter in dispute in this action exceeds, exclusive of costs, five hundred dollars; that it relates to certain railroad bonds amounting to over $475,000 in par value; and that a controversy has arisen in this action between citizens of different states, and the defendants desire to remove the said action from this court to the circuit court of the United States for the southern district of New York, in which district the said suit is pending; wherefore, the petitioners pray that the said suit may be removed from this court to the said circuit court of the United States for the southern district of New York, and that this court will proceed no further in this action." The petition is dated and verified June 1st, 1878. A proper bond accompanied it. On the 6th of June, 1878, the state court made an order in the cause, reading as follows: "The defendants in this action having, pursuant to the third section of the act of congress of the United States, approved March 3d, 1875, made and filed in this suit, in this court, their petition for the removal of this suit into the circuit court of the United States for the southern district of New York, and having made and filed therewith a bond, with good and sufficient surety, for the defendants' entering in such circuit court, on the first day of its next session, a copy of the record in this suit, and for paying all costs that may be awarded by the said court if said court shall hold that this suit was wrongfully or improperly removed thereto, and also for there appearing and entering special bail in such suit, if special bail was originally requisite therein, now, on motion of C. W. Bangs, attorney for the said defendants, for this purpose, it is ordered that the said petition and bond be accepted, and it is hereby declared that this court will proceed no further in this suit, and this cause is hereby declared to be removed to said circuit court of the United States for the southern district of New York."

This suit, if removed, is removed under the first clause of the 2d section of the act of March 3, 1875 (18 Stat. 470). The petition for removal is framed under that clause. That clause, so far as it applies to this suit, provides, "that any suit of a civil nature, at law or in equity, * * * hereafter brought in any state court, where the matter in dispute exceeds, exclusive of costs, the sum or value of five hundred dollars, * * * in which there shall be a controversy between citizens of different states, * * * either party may remove said suit into the circuit court of the United States for the proper district."

A motion is now made by the plaintiff to remand this cause to the state court, on the following grounds, stated in the notice of motion: "First, that the said cause is not properly removable into this court under any of the laws of the United States providing for and regulating the removal of causes from the state courts into the courts of the United States; second, that it does not appear, from the petition for the removal of the cause, or otherwise, that the said defendant McComb was, at the time of the commencement of said suit in the said superior court of the city of New York, a citizen of the state of Delaware, or a citizen of a state other than the states of which the plaintiff is a citizen; third, that it does appear, from the papers and pleadings heretofore filed in this suit, that the said defendant, the Southern Railroad Association, is a necessary adverse party defendant to the case made and stated in the plaintiff's bill, and it also appears that said defendant is a citizen of the same state or states with the complainant."

On the 4th of November, 1878, the plaintiff filed a bill of complaint in this court, which avers the bringing of this action in the state court, and "that, thereafter, the said Henry S. McComb, according to the provisions of the statutes of the United States in such case made and provided, removed the said action into this court." McComb put in an answer, in this court, to said bill, in which those averments are admitted. The Southern Railroad Association and McComb, "as the alleged president, or as otherwise an officer of the Southern Railroad Association" put in an answer and disclaimer, in this court, to said bill, in which it is averred, "that neither the said the Southern Railroad Association, nor the said Henry S. McComb, as the president, or as otherwise an officer, of the said the Southern Railroad Association, had, at the time of the commencement of this suit, or at any time since, or now has, in its or his possession, or under his or its control, nor has he or it, at any time since the commencement of this suit, claimed, nor does he or it claim, any right, or title to, or interest in, any of the first or second mortgage bonds of the Mississippi Central Railroad Company, touching which any discovery or relief is sought by the said bill, and they, as such officer and corporation as aforesaid, severally disclaim having any right, title or interest, in, to or upon any of the first or second mortgage bonds or things in action in respect to which this suit appears by the said bill to be brought."

In determining, under section 2 of the act of 1875, whether a suit is within the description of one "in which there shall be a controversy between citizens of different states," so that "either party may remove said suit" into a federal court, it is plain, that the condition of the controversy at the time the petition for removal is filed in the state court is the condition of the controversy which must be taken into consideration, and not the condition of the controversy at a time subsequent to the filing of such petition, if there be a difference between the condition of the controversy at the one time and its condition at the other time. There must be, in the suit, a controversy between citizens of different states, at the time the petition for removal is filed, and all the parties on one side of such controversy must unite in the petition for removal, and, when they so unite, they must all of them be, at that time, of different state citizenship from any of the parties on the other side of such controversy. This is understood to be the view of the supreme court, so far as it is expressed in the recent decision of that court in Meyer v. Construction Co., 100 U. S. 457.

In the present case, the petition for removal states, that the plaintiff is a corporation of Mississippi and Tennessee, and that the defendant, the Southern Railroad Association, is a corporation of Mississippi and Tennessee. Therefore, if the Southern Railroad Association was, when the petition for removal was filed, a real and actual and necessary, and not a merely formal, party to the controversy in the suit, as such controversy stood at that time, this suit could not be removed into this court by virtue of the petition which was filed under the first clause of said 2d section, because there was not, at that time, the necessary diversity of citizenship between the plaintiff and the Southern Railroad Association.

That controversy must be judged of, in part, by the pleadings, if any, which had been put in in the state court, prior to the filing of the petition of removal. In this case, the only pleading in the state court, when the petition for removal was filed, was a complaint. That complaint relates, in the first place, to $106,000 of first mortgage bonds, alleged to have been illegally re-issued. Of those, it is alleged that $79,500 "are now held and claimed by the defendant, Henry S. McComb, as hereinafter stated." It then alleges, that certain second mortgage bonds, which it claims are invalid, are "in the hands of the said McComb," and that "said McComb claims to hold and own the same in his own right or for the Southern Railroad Association, and has demanded of this plaintiff that it should recognize the said bonds as outstanding and valid obligations." Again, in regard to such second mortgage bonds, it alleges, "that the greater portion thereof are now in the possession or under the control of the said Henry S. McComb, and that he claims to hold and own the same either individually or as an officer of, or for the benefit of, the said Southern Railroad Association, or of said associates or corporators therein;" and that "the said Henry S. McComb does not distinctly designate the particular right or title by which he claims the same, but he claims and demands that plaintiff should recognize these bonds and the coupons thereof, as valid and existing bonds and obligations secured under the said second mortgage." It then alleges, that "the said second mortgage bonds held by said McComb, or in his possession and control, as aforesaid, and which * * * he now claims and demands, without right, to hold and enforce against plaintiff and its property," are numbered so and so, "amounting, in all, to $398 300." It then avers, "that the said Henry S. McComb claims to hold as his own, or in behalf of parties he does not disclose, $79,500 of the said amount of $106,000" first mortgage bonds, "and threatens to enforce the same, as he does the said $308,300 of second mortgage bonds, against this plaintiff." There are no averments in the complaint which vary or control the foregoing. It is plain, from them, that McComb is the real defendant, holding, possessing and controlling the bonds which are attacked. The averments of the complaint are not sufficiently specific as to the Southern Railroad Association, to make it a necessary party, or any other than a formal or nominal party. Then the answer and disclaimer of the Southern Railroad Association, sworn to by McComb, in this court, January 31st, 1879, may be used, on this motion, as an affidavit, to the effect, that the Southern Railroad Association did not have, at the time this suit was commenced or at the time the petition for removal was filed, any of said bonds in its possession or under its control, and that it did not, when the petition for removal was filed, claim any right or title to or interest in any of said bonds. On this state of facts, it must be held, that the association was a merely formal party to the suit, at the time the petition for removal was filed, and that the suit and the whole suit was removed into this court by the proceedings which were had. These views dispose of the first and third grounds specified in the notice of motion.

As to the second ground, the petition for removal states that McComb is a citizen of the state of Delaware, but does not state that he was such citizen when the suit was commenced. This question has been decided by this court in McLean v. St. Paul & C. Ry. Co. [Case No. 8,892], in which the same point was taken as to a petition for removal under the act of 1875, and was overruled.

I do not understand that there is anything which has transpired, in pleading or evidence, since this case came into this court, which goes to show that the Southern Railroad Association occupies such a different position in regard to the controversy, that it must now be held to be, in this court, an actual, real and necessary defendant, although it may appear to have been only a nominal or formal defendant when the petition for removal was filed. The motion to remand the cause is denied.

Case No. 2,671.

CHICKERING v. HATCH et al.

[1 Story, 516.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Maine. May Term, 1841.

MASTER IN CHANCERY—POWERS ON REFERENCE—CERTIFICATE OF ENROLLMENT—CONCLUSIVENESS.

1. Where an interlocutory decree was made, referring it to a master, to ascertain and report to the court the amount of a claim, which the defendant had against certain real estate, which was conveyed to him, as a security for such claim; it was held, that the master was not bound by the statement of that claim in the defendant's answer, but was at liberty to inquire by all the evidence in the cause, and other evidence brought before him, what was the true extent and just amount of the claim, whether that evidence was in support of, or was contradictory to, the answer.

2. The statement of the title or ownership of a vessel in the custom house documents, whatever may be its effect between the parties to those documents, is not conclusive upon third persons, who have an adverse interest; but they are at liberty to show the real title to be different from what is stated therein.

This cause was formerly before this court, and the decision then made will be found reported in 3 Sumn. 474 [Case No. 2,672]. By the interlocutory decree then passed, it was referred to a master to ascertain and report to the court the amount of the claim of Gideon Hatch, which was declared to be a charge on the land stated in the bill. The master now made his report as follows:

The undersigned, a master in this court, to whom it was referred by order of the court to ascertain the sums of money due to the said Gideon B. Hatch from the said William B. Hatch, for the services mentioned in the said Gideon's answer, his first report having been recommitted to him, having heard the parties, and the evidence introduced by them, reports as follows: Gideon Hatch claims to be allowed wages as mate on board the schooner Infant, in the year 1825, for about nine months, at the rate of $16 a month. And wages on board the Tantamount from March 10th, 1826, to December 25th, 1826, nine and a half months, at about $15½ per month; on board the Tantamount from March to December, 1827, about nine months, at $20 per month; on board of the Tantamount in 1828, he claims in his answer nearly ten months, at $20 per month. On his examination he admitted, that his wages on board the Infant were $15 per month; and that he was entitled to wages for but three months and a half, in 1828, the vessel having then been sold.

The counsel for the defendant contends, that the court have decided, that the fund in question is chargeable with the amount of wages due to the said Gideon, for his said services; and that the only inquiry for the master is, as to the amount of wages so due; and that his answer is sufficient proof of his claims. But he introduces the deposition of Jeremiah Hatch to confirm the answer. This deposition is objected to on the ground of interest, and a certificate from the collector of the Passamaquoddy district is offered to prove, that on May 1st, 1826, the said Jeremiah Hatch was an owner of the said schooner with William B. Hatch, Seth Hatch, and Gideon Hatch; and that the said Jeremiah was master, and so liable to the said Gideon for his wages, and interested, that he should hold them out of his fund. This certificate is admitted, by agreement, as evidence in the same manner, as if it were a deposition from the collector, containing a copy of the record. The deposition is admitted by agreement, subject to the objection. This deposition confirms the answer of Gideon in some particulars, and contradicts it in some. It confirms it: 1. As to the Infant. Deponent knows, that Gideon was employed on board of her, because he was in company with and on board of her a great many times. 2d. As to the Tantamount. He knows that Gideon was employed as mate, because he was himself master of her for the year 1826, and part of 1827; and was on board of her the biggest part of the time in 1827 and 1828, and acted as master. Ans. 17, 18, 19, 20. He states, that he kept the account of Gideon's wages. That they were due to him from William B. Hatch, and that he never himself owned any part of that schooner. That Gideon purchased one quarter of William B. Hatch, but took his bill of sale from the Glovers. That he paid the money, that belonged to Gideon for wages, to the said Glovers, towards paying them what was due to them from William B. Hatch for his three quarters. That something over $300 of Gideon's wages was so paid to the Glovers. That there was due from William B. Hatch to Gideon, when the Tantamount was sold, from $500 to $600. On the other hand, he says, that Gideon received of his wages, from time to time, about $100, and that he paid him a balance of his wages of about $100. It does not appear very clearly, whether he means two different amounts, each of $100, or only $100 in all. He says, too, that he and Gideon did, on or about May, 1827, take the usual oath, that they were the owners of the vessel. He states, that Gideon was employed on board the Tantamount from about the first of March to the first of October, 1828, as near as he can tell; and adds, that it was to the time, that she was attached. It is admitted, that she was sold June 11th, 1828. As to the amount of wages due to Gideon, which he speaks of in round terms as being $500 or $600, it is more than could have been due on the largest calculation, without deducting the payment he testifies to. See Statement No. 1. Richard Warren was introduced by the defendants, to confirm the claims stated in the answer. But I do not perceive, that his testimony was material. Gideon Hatch, the respondent, was introduced by the defendants' counsel, and offered to the complainant for examination. The complainant's counsel declining to examine him, and objecting to his examination, he was examined by the defendants' counsel, generally, as to his employment in the service of William B. Hatch. But his testimony was not considered by me as proper evidence, and was allowed no other weight, than as far as it contained admissions against himself. If his statements should have been admitted as evidence, the master does not find in them any thing to vary the conclusions, at which he arrived.

The complainant [John Chickering] introduced, as evidence to contradict the statements of the respondent and of Jeremiah Hatch, 1st. The certificate of Samuel Philips, collector of the port of Newburyport, certifying, "that the schooner Infant, William B. Hatch, master, was enrolled at this port, April 11th, 1825, and that her enrollment was surrendered at Passamaquoddy, July 6th, 1826. On the 22d of March, 1826, Benjamin Small became master." Which certificate was admitted by agreement to be used as evidence of the same effect, as a deposition from the collector, containing a copy of the record. The only effect of this certificate, as contradicting the respondent's answer or evidence, seems to be in fixing the time of the commencement of William B. Hatch's liability for wages to be April 11th, 1825, instead of March, 1825, as stated in the answer. The complainant likewise introduced the certificate of S. S. Rawson, collector of Passamaquoddy, which is admitted in the same manner, as the one above mentioned. This collector certifies, that it appears on record as follows, viz.: "Nov. 10th, 1824. Oliver Glover and James Glover, of Lubec, in the state of Maine, and George Savory, of Bradford, in the state of Massachusetts, are owners of the schooner Tantamount, and John Allen was master of her." "May 1st, 1826. Jeremiah Hatch, William B. Hatch, Seth Hatch, Jr., and Gideon Hatch, all of Dennysville, in the state of Maine, were owners of the said schooner, and Jeremiah Hatch was master." "June 20th, 1827. Jeremiah Hatch and Gideon Hatch, of Dennysville, in the state of Maine, were owners, and the said Jeremiah Hatch was master." "Nov. 19th, 1827. Owners the same as June 20th, 1827, and Gideon Hatch, master." And the enrollment was surrendered in Boston, June 12th, 1828. Likewise a bill of sale from Henry H. Huggeford, deputy sheriff of the county of Suffolk, Massachusetts, dated June 11th, 1828, of the said schooner Tantamount, to Joseph Patch and others, for $800; "he having (as stated in the said bill of sale) attached the same, on a writ in favor of Oliver Glover and James Glover, against Jeremiah Hatch, and one other writ in favor of Oliver Glover, against William B. Hatch, Jeremiah Hatch, Seth Hatch, Jr., and the said Gideon Hatch," which bill of sale was admitted as evidence. The said certificate of the collector of Passamaquoddy contradicts the answer of the said Gideon, and the evidence of Jeremiah Hatch, as to the ownership of the Tantamount by William B. Hatch.

But it is contended by the respondent, that it has already been settled by the court, that Gideon is entitled to his wages for all the time he served on board the said schooners, and that it is only for the master to ascertain the amount. If this be the correct principle for the master to act upon, he is of opinion, that the said Gideon is entitled to claim for his wages, while on board the Infant, ninety-seven dollars and thirty-seven cents; viz. wages for nine months, at $15, which amounts to $135.63, from which is to be deducted $37.63, which has been paid; leaving a balance of $97.37, as above. And for wages while on board the Tantamount, one hundred and ninety dollars and forty-four cents, viz.:

From March 10, 1826, to Dec. 25, 1826, 9½ months, at $15½	$147 25
From March, 1827, to December, 9 months, at $20	180 00
From March, 1828, to June 11, 3 months, at $20	60 00
William B. Hatch owned but three fourths of the vessel, and
Three fourths of the above sum is	$290 44
From which deduct $100 paid	100 00
Leaving a balance of	$190 44

This, added to the balance due to him on board the Infant, makes the whole amount two hundred and eighty-seven dollars and eighty-one cents. See statement No. 1. But if the liability of William B. Hatch is not to be considered as already definitely settled by the court, but liable to be controlled by the evidence produced before the master, then the effect of that evidence is to be considered. If the custom house records were to be held as conclusive evidence of ownership, in determining a claim for wages, then it appears, that Glover and others were owners up to May 1st, 1826, when Jeremiah Hatch, William B. Hatch, Seth Hatch, Jr., and Gideon Hatch became owners, and so remained to June 20th, 1827. It is not stated in what proportion each owned; and the master infers, that each owned one quarter, and that Gideon would therefore be entitled to claim of William B. Hatch one quarter part of his wages for that time; viz. from May 1st, 1826, to December 25th, 1826, seven months and twenty-four days, at $15½, and from March 10th, 1827, to June 20th, 1827, three and a third months, at $20 per month, amounting to $46.91. As it appears, that on June 20th, 1827, Gideon Hatch, and the witness Jeremiah Hatch, became sole owners, Gideon could claim nothing of William B. after that time. Gideon would be entitled to his wages on board the Infant, commencing, as by collector Philips' certificate, April 11th, 1825, for seven and a half months, at $15, amounting to $112.50; from which is to be deducted the $37.63 paid, leaving $74.87, which, added to the balance due on board the Tantamount, $46.91, makes $121.78; from which is to be deducted the $100 paid as per Jeremiah Hatch's deposition, and there remains twenty-one dollars and seventy-eight cents, which the master finds to be the amount due on this view of the case. See statement No. 2.

If the master is authorized to weigh and compare the evidence of the records with Gideon's answer and evidence, his conclusion would be different. Jeremiah Hatch swears, that he himself never owned any part of the Tantamount, but that William B. Hatch owned three quarters and Gideon Hatch one quarter; but that the schooner "was papered three quarters in his name," "for security." He does not state, what he means by "security." He does not state, that any conveyance or pledge of her was made to him. The master infers, that the vessel was registered in his name, as a cover to keep it from the creditors of William B. Hatch. And that William B. may have been an equitable owner of three quarters of her, while so registered. This, however, does not account for the registry of William B. Hatch, Seth Hatch, Jr., Gideon Hatch, and Jeremiah Hatch, as owners, May 1st, 1826. The master is induced, therefore, to believe, that from May 1st, 1826, to June 20th, 1827. William B. Hatch owned one quarter, and Gideon Hatch one quarter, and that Gideon may claim of William B. one quarter of his wages for that period; and that after that time William B. was equitable owner of three quarters, while the record ownership was in Jeremiah and Gideon. If this equitable ownership, under a fraudulent cover, entitles Gideon to claim wages of William B., then he will be entitled in addition to his wages for one quarter, as above mentioned, to hold his wages against William B. for three quarters of the vessel, from June 20th, 1827, to June 11th, 1828, viz:

From May 1st, 1826, to Dec. 25th, 1826, 7 5/6 months, at 15½, is	$121 00
From March 10th, 1827, to June 20th, 1827, 3⅓ months, at $20, is	66 67
One quarter of which two sums is		$ 46 91
From June 20th to December 20th, 1827, 6 months, at $20, is	120 00
In 1828, three months, at $20, is	60 00
Three quarters of which two sums is		135 06
To which add the balance due on board the Infant, as by the first statement		97 27
		$279 28
And deduct the $100 paid		100 00

And the balance is one hundred and seventy-nine dollars and twenty-eight cents, which sum the master finds to be due upon this view. See statement No. 3.

The counsel for the complainant having suggested, that the answer being contradicted by the testimony of the plaintiff, and by the further answers of Gideon Hatch, and the testimony introduced by him, before the master, it becomes the duty of the master to reject the whole, and report in favor of the plaintiff. And if the master should not consider it his duty so to report, requesting him so to present the case, that he may have the benefit of exceptions to the report, the master states, that if the whole question of the credibility of the evidence were open to him, he should, from the contradictions, exhibited between the answer of the said Gideon and the evidence of his witness, Jeremiah, and the proof from the records, find great difficulty in believing the answer of the said Gideon, and the evidence of the said Jeremiah, entitled to sufficient credit to establish any claim in the said Gideon, and should be inclined to reject the whole claim as unsupported by evidence. For the oath of the said Gideon in his answer, and of the said Jeremiah in his deposition, are decidedly contradicted by their oaths made at the custom house. And it is admitted by Jeremiah, that he and Gideon did take the usual oaths at the custom house, at the time of the charges exhibited by the collector's certificate. There are contradictions likewise between Gideon and Jeremiah. Thus, Gideon states in his answer positively, that he was entitled to wages for ten months in 1828. But it is found and admitted, that he is entitled to wages for but three months of that year. He states, that he received of his wages but $37.63. Jeremiah says, that he paid him about $100. And it is doubtful, whether he is not to be understood to say $200. And this was from his wages on board the Tantamount, and the $37.63 appears from the answer to have been in part of his wages on board of the Infant. He states, that all his earnings were received and retained by William B. Hatch. But Jeremiah says, that a part of them we repaid to the Glovers to pay for Gideon's quarter of the Tantamount. And this sum must have been somewhere from $100 to $300. For the Glovers received for the vessel $1200; for Gideon's quarter $300. Of this a part came from the sale of the schooner in Boston. She was sold for $800; out of which was to be paid the debt and costs, for which she was sold, the amount of which is not stated, and Gideon's share of the balance was paid to the Glovers, and the remainder of the $300 was paid out of his earnings, or the earnings of his share of the vessel. Gideon says, that he bought one quarter of the vessel from William B. Hatch. Jeremiah says, he bought it from William B., but took his bill of sale from the Glovers. From the collector's certificate, that on June 20th, 1827, Jeremiah Hatch and Gideon Hatch were owners, it would seem, that they were then equal owners, and that Gideon's share was one half. But the master has not considered himself at liberty to take into consideration these circumstances, as impeaching the credibility of Gideon's answer. If the court should think, that the $100 balance spoken of by Jeremiah in his 85th answer was a different sum from that spoken of in his answers 71, 72, 73, then this $100 additional is to be deducted from Gideon's claim in all the statements. But the master, though doubtingly, thinks that one sum only of $100 was intended.

Signed, Henry Warren.

The statements Nos. 1, 2, and 3, referred to in the report, are omitted, as they are sufficiently explained in the report itself for the purposes of the decision made by the court.

To this report the following exceptions were filed by the plaintiff: Exceptions taken by the plaintiff to the report of Henry Warren, one of the masters of the said court to whom the said cause was referred, made in pursuance of an interlocutory decree of the said court: First exception. The said Chickering reserving to himself all exceptions taken at the hearing before the master, and which appear in his report, excepts to so much of the said report as allows the defendant, Gideon Hatch, any sum of money whatever; and insists upon the ground taken before the master, as set forth in the report, that the answer being contradicted by the testimony of the plaintiff, and by the further answers of the said Gideon, and the testimony introduced by him before the master, it becomes the duty of the master to reject the whole, and report in favor of the plaintiff. Second exception. But if, in the opinion of the court the first exception is not well taken, the plaintiff excepts to so much of the report, as allows the said Gideon, in the alternative, the sum of $287.81, or $179.28. Third exception. And the plaintiff excepts to so much of the said report as allows the said Gideon in the alternative the sum of $21.78 or $14.28, because the master in his statements Nos. 2 and 4, in which those two sums are reported, credits the sum of $100 only, instead of $200, the sum testified to by Jeremiah Hatch, as paid by him to Gideon Hatch.

Mr. Hobbs, for plaintiff.

C. S. Daveis, for defendant.

STORY, Circuit Justice. We think the true view of the case is that, which is presented in No. 3, annexed to the report of the master, by which $179.28 is allowed to the defendant, Gideon Hatch, under the order of the court. And we confirm the report accordingly; and overrule the exceptions filed in the case, so far as they touch this part of the report.

The short ground, upon which we have come to this conclusion is, that the statement No. 1, proceeds upon the supposition, that the answer of Gideon Hatch is conclusive as to his title to wages, and the extent of his claim, leaving to the master only to ascertain the amount. This is a mistake. The decretal order of the court left the whole matter open for inquiry before the master upon the answer and all the evidence in the case, which might be adduced in support of, or to control or contradict the answer or the claim. The statement No. 3 proceeds, therefore, upon the true ground, as the result, to which the master has arrived, upon a review of all the evidence, as well as the answer. Then, as to statement No. 2, it is founded upon the supposition, that the title or ownership of the vessel, as stated in the custom house documents, is conclusive of the title of the respective owners in a suit for wages. That is not a correct view of the law. On the contrary, whatever might be the case in a controversy between the respective parties to those documents, the true title or ownership may be shown to be different from that stated in those documents by a third person, whenever his interest is concerned therein. Now, this is precisely the predicament of the plaintiff; and hence the statement No. 2, cannot be supported. The result is, that the claim of Gideon Hatch for wages must stand upon the statement No. 3; and we are of opinion, that, under all the circumstances of the case, the allowance of $179.28 is the true balance due to him. The exceptions filed by the plaintiff are, therefore, overruled, and the report must stand confirmed for that sum; and a final decree for a sale of the property is to be entered, according to the opinion expressed at the original hearing of this cause, when the interlocutory decree was passed.

CHICKERING v. HATCH et al.

[3 Sumn. 474.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Maine. May Term, 1839.

MORTGAGE—CONVEYANCE ABSOLUTE IN FORM—VALIDITY.

A conveyance of certain premises, absolute in its form, but admitted, by the answer in chancery, to be a mortgage security merely for certain debts, was treated as a valid security to the extent of these debts, and the premises, subject to this charge, were held to be liable to judgment creditor of the original grantor.

Bill in equity, by an execution creditor under a levy, for discovery.

Hobbs, for plaintiff.

Daveis, for defendant Gideon Hatch.

No appearance was entered for William B. Hatch, the execution debtor, and the bill was taken against him, pro confesso.

STORY, Circuit Justice. The plaintiff is a judgment creditor, who has levied upon a part of the land conveyed to the defendant, Gideon Hatch, by the other defendant, William B. Hatch, his brother, by a deed absolute in its purport and form. The bill asserts the conveyance to be fraudulent. The answer denies the fraud; but admits that the conveyance, though absolute in its form, was designed by the parties to be a mortgage security merely for the debts then due for services by William B. Hatch to the defendant, Gideon Hatch. Subject to this claim, it admits the right of the plaintiff, and seeks satisfaction only for the amount of the claim under the conveyance. It appears to me, that the transaction, though very irregular, and loose, and inartificial, was founded in good faith, and not designed to defraud creditors, at least not to the knowledge, or with the assent, of the defendant, Gideon Hatch. He has made a full and fair disclosure of all the circumstances, and is therefore entitled to the protection and aid of the court to the extent of his just and equitable claim for services upon the property. Subject to that claim, he ought to be decreed to release all his right and title to the premises included in the levy. But the claim ought to be made primarily a charge upon that portion of the land, which is not included in the levy; and if, upon a sale thereof, to be directed by the court, there shall not be sufficient to satisfy the claim of the defendant, Gideon Hatch, when the same is ascertained by a master, then the residuum ought to be decreed to be a charge on the premises included in the levy; and when the plaintiff discharges the same, the release ought to be enforced by a decree against the defendant, Gideon Hatch.

The district judge concurs in this view of the case. And a decree will accordingly be entered, declaring the rights of the parties, and referring it to a master to ascertain the amount of the claim of Gideon Hatch; and further orders will be reserved until the coming in of the master's report.

CHILD v. ADAMS et al.

[1 Fish. Pat. Cas. 189;[1] 3 Wall. Jr. 20; 12 Leg. Int. 4.]

Circuit Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. Nov., 1854.

PATENTS — CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTE OF 1836 — POWER OF COMMISSIONER—FRAUD IN PROCURING ORIGINAL PATENT—REISSUE.

1. Section 13 of the act of July 4, 1836 [5 Stat. 122], by defining the conditions under which the powers it confers shall be exercised, necessarily excludes it in all other, except, perhaps, the correction of clerical errors.

[Cited in De La Vergne Refrigerating Mach. Co. v. Featherstone, 49 Fed. 917.]

2. Where a statute defines the extent of power given to one who acts ministerially, the courts can not extend it, or validate acts done without or beyond its authority.

3. The commissioner has no power to confirm a patent obtained by false suggestion, either by pardoning the offense or excusing it on the plea of innocent ignorance.

4. If an alien, either through ignorance or intention, falsely represents himself as a citizen in order to obtain a patent, the patent so procured is "inoperative and invalid" to vest a title in the alleged invention.

[Distinguished in Tonduer v. Chambers, 37 Fed. 337.]

5. The oath of citizenship, and other duties required by section 6 of the act of July 4, 1836, are conditions precedent without which the commissioner has no authority to grant a patent, and a defendant may allege the neglect or fraudulent omission to fulfill these conditions, or any of them, as a sufficient defense.

6. M., an alien, made oath that he was a citizen of the United States, and obtained a patent. Eight years afterwards he surrendered his patent, made oath that he was a citizen of France, paid the balance of the fee due the patent office and obtained a reissue, which recited (among other things) that said original letters were "granted to him upon his belief that he was a citizen of the United States, which belief arose from ignorance of the laws of the United States." Held: that the original and reissued patents were both invalid, first, because of false suggestion, the second from want of power in the commissioner to grant it.

[Cited in Hancock Inspirator Co. v. Jenks, 21 Fed. 914.]

7. Held, also, that the commissioner could not grant a new original patent eight years after the invention had been in public use.

In equity.

This was a bill in equity, filed to restrain defendants [Thomas Adams, William G. W. Jaeger, and Luther Martin] from infringing letters patent [No. 3,824] granted John Gilbert Mini, November 13, 1844, for an "improvement in making lampblack," and assigned to plaintiff [Richard S. Child]. The facts upon which the decision turned are fully stated in the opinion.

George Harding and John Cadwallader, for complainant.

John Fallon and R. P. Kane, for defendants.

GRIER, Circuit Justice. The first question in order, in the consideration of this case, will be, whether John Gilbert Mini, the patentee under whom the complainant claims, has obtained a legal grant or patent for the invention claimed. If this be answered in the negative, it will be unnecessary to notice the other questions, which have been so fully and so well argued by counsel.

The facts connected with this point are undisputed, and appear in the pleadings and exhibits annexed. The original letters patent to J. G. Mini for his "improvement in making lampblack," were issued on the 13th of November, 1844, and recited that Mini "has made oath that he is a citizen of the United States, etc.," "paid the sum of thirty dollars, etc." On this patent, the complainant, as assignee of Mini, filed his bill to April term, 1850, against the respondents, alleging an infringement and praying for an injunction. Among other matters of defense pleaded in the respondent's answer, it was averred that "J. G. Mini was not entitled to said patent at the time it was granted to him, because he was an alien, being a native of France and not a naturalized citizen of the United States; and that he had applied for, and obtained said letters patent, as a citizen of the United States, for the purpose of defrauding the revenue of the additional fees and charges, which, as an alien, he should have paid in order to obtain a patent."

Admitting the fact as alleged in this plea, but denying the fraudulent intent, the patentee surrendered his patent on the 24th of August, 1852, and received another called a "reissue," which is attempted to be connected with the original application by the following recital: "Whereas, John G. Mini, of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, has alleged that he has invented a new and useful improvement in making lampblack (for which letters patent were issued to him, dated 13th November, 1844, which letters having been surrendered by him, the same have been canceled, and new letters ordered to issue to him on the same specification, said original letters having been granted to him, upon his belief that he was a citizen of the United States, which belief arose from ignorance of the laws of the United States; he also having since paid into the treasury of the United States the sum of two hundred and seventy dollars, the balance due from the original granting of said letters patent), which he states has not been known or used before his application, has made oath that, at the time of his original application, he was a citizen of France; that he does verily believe that he is the original and first inventor or discoverer of the said improvement, and that the same hath not to the best of his knowledge and belief been previously known or used; has paid into the treasury of the United States the sum of fifteen dollars, and presented a petition to the commissioner of patents, signifying a desire of obtaining an exclusive property in the said improvement, and praying that a patent may be granted for that purpose, etc."

On this reissue patent the complainant filed, to October term, 1852, the bill in the present case, praying it to be taken as "a supplemental and original bill or original in the nature of a supplemental" to that filed on the original patent.

The question now to be considered, is, therefore, whether an alien, who has obtained a patent by a false oath, suggesting that he is a citizen, can, after a lapse of seven years, and a surrender and cancelling of the patent thus obtained, lawfully obtain what is called a reissued patent connected with his original application—and whether the commissioner of patents has any authority to grant such a "reissued" patent. The right of Mini, with the consent of his assignees to surrender his original patent, and to have it cancelled, can not be doubted, whether it had been obtained by false suggestion or not; and when the invention or discovery had not been in public use more than two years the commissioner might probably grant him a new original patent or an original application, alleging, inter alia, "that he does not know or believe that his invention was before known or used." But a new patent seven or eight years after the application, and after the patentee and others had publicly used the discovery or invention, would be of little use—unless it can be construed to retroact by way of confirmation of the first.

The patent act of 1793 did not provide for a reissue of a patent, after a surrender or cancellation of it, by the patentee on account of a defective or insufficient description or specification. The great difficulty of making a correct specification which will stand the test of judicial scrutiny, and the very frequent instances in which the most valuable inventions and discoveries have been lost to meritorious patentees through inadvertency, accident, or mistake, originated the practice of granting reissues, in such cases of hardship, without any statute directly authorizing or regulating them. This practice was confirmed by the decision of the supreme court in Grant v. Raymond, 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 218, in January, 1832. This was a case of a defective specification, and refers only to the practice of reissuing patents to cure such defects. It had never been suggested to the patent office or the court, from anything that appears, that a false or mistaken assertion, in regard to a matter of fact of which the applicant is presumed to be peculiarly cognizant, and by which his patent was obtained for one-tenth of its cost, was ever considered as an inadvertence, accident, or mistake which could be thus remedied. But in order to confirm the decision of the court and to define the power of the patent office on this subject—the act of July 3, 1832 [4 Stat. 559], was immediately passed. This act gave to the secretary of state a much more extensive power than previous practice had assumed, or the judgment of the supreme court had confirmed. But though it might have included a case like the present within its terms, it left the question of the connection of the new patent with the old in such a case, wholly unsettled.

This act was repealed by the act of July 4, 1836, which established a new system, entirely abolishing all that preceded it. The power of the commissioner of patents to issue patents, and the effect of them, are carefully defined by this statute. By defining the conditions under which the power it confers shall be exercised, it necessarily excludes it in all others, except perhaps the correction of their own clerical errors. The thirteenth section of this act declares that: "Whenever any patent, etc., shall be inoperative or invalid by reason of a defective or insufficient description or specification, or by reason of the patentee claiming in his specification, as his own invention, more than he had or shall have a right to claim as new, if the error shall have arisen from inadvertence, accident, or mistake, or without any fraudulent or deceptive intention, it shall be lawful for the commissioner, upon the surrender, etc., to cause a new patent to be issued for the same invention, etc., and the patent so reissued, etc., shall have the same effect and operation in law on the trial, etc., as though the same had been originally filed in such corrected form before the issuing of the original patent."

It needs no argument to show that this case comes neither within the letter or the spirit of this section of the act—nor can the case of Grant v. Raymond [supra] be cited as authorizing any such general power in the commissioner to grant a new patent to one who has obtained it by false suggestion, which shall retroact by way of confirmation of the original, or stand in its place. Where a statute defines the extent of power given to one who acts ministerially, the courts can not extend it, or validate acts done without or beyond its authority.

I would not be considered as imputing any moral guilt to Mr. Mini, or intent to commit perjury, in this particular case. It is possible that men may live thirty years in this country, and not know that in order to become a citizen, an alien must be naturalized. It is possible, too, that an alien dragged to the polls "by respectable gentlemen," and permitted to vote by a complaisant inspector without question, may fancy himself to have been thus transmuted into a citizen. But instances of such amiable ignorance are so rare, that it could hardly be expected that legislatures should anticipate it, by providing a remedy for those whose mistakes are the consequence of it. Nor will the hardship of this particular case justify the commissioner of patents in assuming a power not granted to him by the statute. He has no power to confirm a patent obtained by false suggestion, either by pardoning the offense or excusing it on the plea of innocent ignorance. A mistake or inadvertence on the specification of a patent, can be proved by the face of the paper, and the reasons alleged for it. But where a person makes a mistake in his oath of citizenship, and enjoys the benefit of it for more than half his term, his innocence can be proved by his own oath alone; and he ought not to be allowed to obtain a new patent for the other half by stultifying himself. This would be holding out a premium for profitable mistakes, and an encouragement to double perjury.

But, it is contended, that if the reissued patent is void because issued without authority, the original may be set up as a good title. That it is not void, but voidable, and that the payment of the additional fee is a matter which concerns the government only, and can not be alleged as a defense by third persons. This might be true if the applicant had truly disclosed his citizenship, and had given his note for the three hundred dollars which he had afterward neglected or refused to pay.

The act of 1836 permits aliens as well as citizens to receive patents for inventions, but under very different conditions. A citizen, or one who has declared his intention of becoming such, pays a patent fee of thirty dollars only. An alien, if he be a subject of the king of Great Britain, must pay five hundred dollars, and all other persons three hundred dollars. An alien patentee is also compelled to "put, and continue on sale to the public, on reasonable terms, the invention or discovery for which the patent is issued." If it were not so, it would be in the power of an alien inventor, by means of his patent, to completely prohibit the use of his invention for fourteen years in the United States.

The sixth section of the patent law, accordingly, provides that, "before any inventor shall receive a patent," among other things, he shall make oath "of what country he is a citizen." This, as well as the other duties required by this section, is a condition precedent, without which the commissioner has no authority to grant a patent, and a defendant may allege in his defense the neglect, or fraudulent omission to fulfill these conditions, or any of them, as a sufficient defense; and, although the court has no power to avoid or annul a patent, by its decree or judgment, the patent, so far as respects that suit, is "inoperative and invalid" to vest a title in the alleged invention.

Many of these defects or omissions may, by the act, be given in evidence, under the general issue, in an action at law; other defenses, such as "a license," or "alienage," must be specially pleaded. If, therefore, an alien, either through ignorance, or intention, falsely represents himself as a citizen, in order to obtain a patent, he not only fails in performing one of the conditions which the statute imposes in order to entitle him to a patent, but he commits also a fraud upon the government. And as this fact appears in the complainant's bill, the respondent may avail himself of it, as a defense to the title set up under the patent, and allege that the patent thus obtained is "inoperative and invalid."

We are of opinion, therefore, that the original patent of 1844, which issued to John Gilbert Mini, was invalid, because the applicant did not comply with the conditions of the patent act, in stating truly "of what country he is a citizen," and that the reissued patent of 1852 is equally invalid, the commissioner of patents having no power to grant such a patent, to act by way of confirmation of the original, nor to grant a new original, eight years after the invention has been in public use, which will give a valid title to such a patentee. The complainant's bill is therefore dismissed with costs.

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS—INFRINGEMENT—ACCOUNTING—PROFITS.

[On accounting for infringement of a patented invention used in connection with printing presses, it appeared that defendant credited other parts of his manufactory with materials supplied from them, so as to allow them profits as independent establishments. Held, that such credit was erroneous, and that defendant should account for the entire profits realized.]

BY THE MASTER. I now come to a consideration of the account filed by defendants in connection with the complainant's charge and defendants' discharge. The privilege is always accorded a defendant, in an accounting before me, to file an account of his profits; and, unless the complainant shows some error in the principles upon which this account is constructed, or in its details, I adopt it in my report. The defendants in this case filed an account, and, although they accompanied it with a statement that it was not an account of their profits from their infringement of complainant's patented improvement,—the extensible lever,—but an account of their entire profits from their printing press business, when I decided that they should account for such entire profits, this account became the basis for all subsequent proceedings before me. The first, second, third, fourth, fifth, and sixth specifications of the complainant's amended charge attack this account by alleging that certain classes of items are entered in the account at a higher price than the actual cost of these items to the defendants. The corresponding specifications of the defendants' amended discharge admit the correctness of the classification of the items referred to in the charge, and that the amounts thereof are correctly stated in pounds and hours, but deny that the prices charged are greater or other than the actual cost. This issue brings me to a consideration of the principle upon which this account is constructed. It appeared in evidence that the defendants carried on, during the period covered by the accounting, three distinct branches of business,—one, a foundry; another, a machine shop; and the third, the manufacture and sale of printing presses and paper cutters. In making up the press and cutter accounts, the foundry and machine shop were credited with whatever they furnished, at prices to allow them the profits to which it was considered they were entitled as independent establishments. In the printing press account, therefore, the castings which came from the foundry were entered at their estimated cost, but it is a cost based upon a credited purchase from the foundry upon such terms as to give the latter the profit which it would reasonably be presumed to have made; and labor and refined iron, which were furnished by the machine shop, are entered upon the same principle, so as to give the machine shop its reasonable profit. The machine shop and foundry, however, are but other names for the defendants, and the profits which they have made from the press business are profits which the defendants have made, and must be accounted for as other profits from the same business.

PATENTS — "PRINTING-PRESSES"— NEW COMBINATION OF OLD DEVICES.

1. A new combination of old mechanical devices, producing new results, or old results by a new method of operation, is patentable.

2. The patent granted Charles Montague, assignor to Cyril C. Child, Dec. 21, 1869, for an improvement in printing-presses, held valid.

Bill in equity to restrain alleged infringement of letters-patent [No. 98,087] for improvement in printing-presses, granted Charles Montague, assignor to the complainant [Cyril C. Child], Dec. 21, 1869. The defendant [The Boston and Fairhaven Iron Works] admitted the manufacture and sale of presses containing the patented improvement, but denied that Montague was the original and first inventor, and denied that it was new. The patented improvement consisted in a combination of mechanical devices, all of which were old; and the principal question in the case was whether the combination claimed was new.

T. M. Stetson, for defendant.

SHEPLEY, Circuit Judge. Letters-patent numbered 98,087 were granted Dec. 21, 1869, to Charles Montague, assignor to Cyril C. Child, for improvement in printing-presses. This invention consisted: "First, in the use of a vibrating lever for moving the type-bed, constructed in two parts, one of which is made to slide out and into the other, somewhat like the joints of a telescope, so that the upper end of the lever may be attached directly to the under side of the bed (dispensing with the use of a link), and move in a direct line with the bed, the upper portion of said lever moving out of or into the lower portion, as the distance of the fulcrum of said lever to the point of attachment to the bed is greater or lesser in the different parts of the movement of the bed." The complainant's claim is for the extensible vibrating lever in combination with a reciprocating type-bed, substantially as described. Defendant admits the manufacture and sale of printing-presses containing the extensible vibrating lever in combination with a reciprocating type-bed, as described in complainant's patent.

The answer sets up in defence that Montague was not the original and first inventor, and also that the invention set forth in the complainant's patent had been in public use for more than two years before the application of Montague. To sustain the defence of prior knowledge and use, defendant undertakes to prove that one B. F. Leonard was the inventor. Leonard was in the employ of the defendant as its superintendent at the time that the defendant constructed for Montague the first printing-press known by the name of the "extension press," which embodied the invention of the extending vibrating lever in combination with the reciprocating type-bed. This press was made for Byington & Co., and was used in printing the "Norwalk Gazette," in the summer of 1867; and it is clear from the evidence in the record, that Montague had conceived the idea of substituting the extensible vibrating lever for the lever-and-link connection previously used, as early as 1865, and had made drawings in that year clearly describing the invention, although, from the opposition he encountered from defendant, which was then building his presses under contract with him, he did not embody his invention in a practical working machine until the press was made for Byington & Co., in 1867. Leonard never seems to have claimed to have been the inventor of this improvement until January, 1869, when he represented in his caveat that he had made certain improvements in mechanism for operating the platen of a printing press, and that he was then engaged in making experiments for the purpose of perfecting the same. This caveat he prepared and made oath to, but never filed in the patent office. This was more than three years after Montague had exhibited to two or three persons his drawings representing his improvements, and a year and a half after the defendant had made for Montague the Byington press. The testimony is conclusive that this is only one more of the too frequent instances in which a person engaged as a mechanic or constructor in embodying the inventor's idea in a material form, attempts to prove that he was the first inventor, because he made or aided in making the first machine.

On the issue of novelty, a much more difficult question is presented on a comparison of the patented combination in complainant's printing-press with the mechanism in the machine of Mr. Hervey Waters for rolling bayonets, and a similar machine for rolling file-blanks. This is the machine referred to in the answer, for which letters-patent in Great Britain were sealed June 14, 1864, dated Dec. 23, 1863, No. 3,251, to George Tomlinson Bonsfield, for an invention consisting of an improvement in apparatus for forging and tempering bayonet-blades, files, and other articles, on a communication from abroad of Hervey Waters, of Massachusetts. This contrivance of Mr. Waters had two extensible vibrating levers in combination with a reciprocating sliding-gauge. The reciprocating sliding-gauge moved backwards and forward in right lines upon ways. The swinging levers worked upon a rock-shaft so that the ends of the levers described a curved line; pieces were pivoted to the sliding-gauge so as to turn on that pivot, their opposite ends fitting upon the ends of the swinging levers after the manner of a sleeve sliding away from and toward the axis of the levers upon the levers proper, and all so connected together as to allow the sliding-gauge to move in right lines, while the levers proper move in curved lines. This form of the file-machine with the extensible levers was used by Mr. Waters, at Ballardvale, as early as January, 1866, and was described in the English patent. Mr. Waters says he does not know who invented the extensible lever; that he put it into his machine, and knows that it was useful, but does not know that it was new with him. He says, "I am inclined to think that it was not, because I have no recollection of any particular effort about it." This combination certainly comes very near anticipating the complainant's invention. The three elements, considered separately and apart from the organization in which they are incorporated, the results of the organization, and the mode of operation in the combination, would seem to be the equivalents for the vibrating levers, the extensible sleeves, and the reciprocating platen or type-bed in complainant's combination. Nevertheless, old elements placed in new and different organizations, producing in such new organizations different results, or the same result by a new and different mode of operation, do not prevent such newly organized mechanism from being patentable. It becomes necessary, therefore, to compare the respective organizations into which these elements were incorporated, and the respective modes of operation, and the results of the operation, in the two machines.

Exhibit I is a model of the machine for rolling file-blanks. In this machine the forward movement of the gauge-bar is effected by means of a spring, and the backward movement by means of a projection on the lower roller, called by the witnesses a segmental die. Waters himself describes how this is effected: "The gauge is carried backward by the die on the bottom roll in its revolution, or by some part of the roll which is connected with the die, and the gauge swings backward the lever, at the same time raising the weight or cramping the spring according as the machine is organized. The gauge is carried forward by the spring which was cramped in the backward movement of the gauge, the spring actuating the lever, and the lever the gauge, or when the machine is organized with a weight in place of a spring, the lever is carried forward by the weight, and the gauge by the lever. But it should be understood that the motion of the lever forward, and consequently the motion of the gauge forward, is controlled by a can upon the lower roller, and altogether in the operation of the machine, the motion of the gauge backward and forward is controlled by the motion of the lower roll, and works in accordance with it."

It is noticeable here that, in the operation of the file-machine, the gauge-bar is not moved forward or retracted by the extensive vibrating levers in the same manner as the type-bed is in the comp'ainant's press. In the file-machine the gauge is carried back by the die on the bottom roll, and the gauge, instead of being moved back by the lever, swings the lever backward, and thereby cramps a spring which, when the gauge-bar is released by the revolution of the segmental die, actuates the lever, and, through the lever, the gauge in its forward movement. This organization—perfectly adapted to its purpose and object of presenting the blanks of metal in a proper position and at a suitable time to the rolls, without reference to regularity or uniformity of movement during its travel, provided the gauge presented the blank at the proper time to the rolls—would be unsuited to the operation of a printing-press, where a regular movement of the type-bed during its progress is indispensable. Practically, a type-bed during the period of taking the impression, could not be operated by a spring or any equivalent device. In the operation of the file-machine "the motion of the gauge backward and forward is controlled by the motion of the lower roll, and works in accordance with it."

The evidence in the record proves clearly the impracticability of operating a printing-press of the class to which this belongs, by using a device like this, as the diameter of the circle described by its revolution, in order to give sufficient impression movement to the type-bed, would be so great as to involve such an elevation of the type-bed above the floor as would place it beyond the reach of the printer. A crank or its equivalent is a part of the organization of complainant's combination, as will be seen on examination of the specifications; the crank acts upon the levers, and they in turn on the type-bed, and, as the rectilinear motion of the reciprocating type-bed is communicated from the levers which move in curved lines, the capacity of becoming longer or shorter (that is, the extensibility of the levers) becomes operative, while, if the type-bed could be practically moved in one direction by a revolving tappet, like that in the file-machine, and then in the contrary direction by a spring, this feature of the extensible levers would be dormant or useless in the operation.

Considering, therefore, the differences in the mode of operation and the differences in the results, and the fact that in the complainant's press the combination described is one in which the crank communicates the motion to the vibrating extensible levers, and they in their turn to the type-bed, and that the resultant motion given to the type-bed is one adapted by reason of its regularity and uniformity to the requirements of a printing-press of this class, I am inclined to think that there is sufficient invention to make the complainant's combination patentable, notwithstanding the use of these elements of it with a different operation and different results in an earlier, though different, organization.

It is also contended, in behalf of defendant, that the substitution of the extensible sleeve to the lever, in place of the link used in complainant's former patent, was a mere equivalent, and therefore that the invention embraced in the first claim had been in public use and on sale more than two years prior to his application for a patent. In many organizations of machinery it would be true that the one might be a mere mechanical equivalent of the other, where the same result would be produced by substantially the same operation. But in the application of the extensible lever to the printing-press, a different operation produces a different result from that in case of the link motion. The type-bed driven by the extensible lever has a uniformly accelerated movement during one-half of its travel, and a uniformly retarded movement during the other half of its travel, while the type-bed driven by the lever and link has an unequally accelerated movement during one-half of its travel, and an unequally retarded movement during the other half; other advantages, not necessary to be enumerated, result from the substitution of the one for the other, which, like the one above mentioned, are, in reference to the object and purpose of the organization, differences of operation, not of a degree, but of kind.

The patent is adjudged to be good and valid, and the decree is for complainant for injunction and account, as prayed for in the bill. Decree accordingly.

The CHILDE HAROLD.

[Olc. 275.] [1]

District Court, S. D. New York. Feb., 1846.

EXTRA SEAMEN'S WAGES FOR SHORT ALLOWANCE —BURDEN OF PROOF.

1. Extra or double wages are given seamen when put on short allowances of provisions or water on a voyage, only in case the quantity required by law is not supplied the ship by her master or owner.

2. If the ship has a proper supply laden on board, and the crew is insufficiently furnished on the voyage, their remedy is by action for the particular wrong, and not for double wages.

3. All the crew may unite in a suit for double wages because of a short allowance of bread, and each is a competent witness for his fellows.

4. It devolves upon the libellants, in such action, to prove both that a short allowance was served them, and that the vessel had an insufficient supply laden on board.

[Cited in The John L. Dimmick, Case No. 7,355.

5. If they fail in maintaining their action, and it appears there was no colorable cause for bringing it, they will be charged with full costs of suit.

6. When one of the libellants unites a demand for contract wages unpaid him with his claim for short allowance, and obtains a decree for those wages, the court will only allow him proportionate costs against the vessel on that demand, not including witnesses fees to his co-libellants, and will order full costs against him in connection with his co-libellants upon the other branch of the litigation.

The libellant, Duffie, sues to recover wages on a voyage from New-York to Callao and back, and he, with his five associates, also claim the equivalent of their contract—wages for a period of six months and a half, because, as they charge, they "were on a short allowance of good and wholesome ship-bread," the "master having neglected to put on board the requisite quantity of provisions for the said voyage, according to the act of congress," &c. The answer denies these allegations, and asserts that the vessel was supplied with a sufficient quantity of good and wholesome bread for the voyage. It avers, also, that all the libellants, except Duffie, were paid the wages claimed by them, in full, on the arrival of the vessel at this port, and that at the same time Duffie's wages were offered to him, which he refused to accept. The answer denies that he is entitled to enforce the payment of wages, because of his mutinous and insubordinate conduct on the homeward voyage, having refused to obey the orders of the master to assist at sea in repairing damages the vessel had received in a gale, which had placed her in a crippled and unseaworthy state, and that on the voyage homeward he accosted the master in rude and insulting language, seized hold of him, and threw him down, and held him confined on the deck, until he was relieved by his officers, &c.

E. Burr, for libellants.

F. B. Cutting, for claimant.

BETTS, District Judge. The provision in the act of congress of July 20, 1790, section 9 [1 Stat. 135], upon which the contestation for short allowance is founded, is this: "Every vessel bound across the Atlantic ocean shall, at the time of leaving the last port from which she sails, have on board, well secured under deck, at least one hundred pounds of wholesome ship-bread for every person on board, and in like proportions for longer or shorter voyages; and in case the crew of any vessel, not so provided, shall be put upon short allowance of bread during the voyage, the master or owner shall pay to each of the crew one day's wages beyond the wages agreed on for every day he shall be so put on short allowance, to be recovered in the same manner as his stipulated wages." The crew claim double wages in this action, because a sufficient allowance of good and wholesome bread was not served out to them during the voyage, and each of the libellants made a witness for his co-libellant, testified to the bad and unwholesome quality of the bread, and all concurred in saying, that after six weeks out to the completion of the outward and return voyage, the bread served the men was mouldy, rotten, filled with maggots and vermin, and when put in tea, the worms were skimmed off in spoonsful, and that it also stunk. Kelly, one of the men, and not a libellant, gave in substance the same representation. On his cross-examination, every witness stated that there was no short allowance of quantity, and most of them also said, the vessel sold from her stores of bread on the coast of South America, and brought back several barrels and three hogsheads of bread laden on board before the voyage began, and which had not been opened.

The question is raised by the claimants upon this state of facts, whether the libellants bring their case within the provisions of the act of congress. The statute is plainly intended to compel owners and masters to fit out vessels with a sufficiency of wholesome provisions for the voyage, and its direct language does not extend beyond that requirement. Mariners v. The Washington [Case No. 9,086]. No regulation is made respecting the distribution of bad provisions or short allowances, whilst the ship is supplied with good, or enough in quantity. Parties wronged, by being furnished at sea insufficient or improper provisions or water, are left to their legal remedies, as in other cases of maltreatment, not provided for by statute. Feeding a crew on unwholesome or spoiled provisions would justify their leaving the ship, and such neglect or malfeasance of the owner would subject him, at the least, to pay full wages for the voyage. 1 Hagg. Adm. 59; Id. 186; 1 Pet. Adm. 255, and note [Swift v. The Happy Return, Case No. 13,697]; 2 Pet. Adm. 411 [Dixon v. The Cyrus, Case No. 3,930]. The construction of the clause in this court has been, that the seamen must resort to their special action for damages against the master for giving them insufficient or improper food, whilst the ship had on board enough of good quality; and if the master proved his original supply had been sufficient, but it spoiled or was destroyed on the voyage, that he was still liable to the action, if he neglected to procure, when within his power, an adequate supply. This interpretation of the statute, and the rights of seamen in respect to their supplies of food on shipboard, I am inclined to maintain. I am persuaded seamen will be more thoroughly protected by such exposure of owners and masters to special damages, than if they may be exonerated by payment of this specific penalty for wrongs which must often demand a recompense more punitive and compensatory than a duplication of wages. The statute gives the right to double wages in case the crew of a vessel, not provided with the quantity of provisions specified, shall be put on short allowance; and manifestly the statutory right and cause of action does not arise when in fact the vessel commenced her voyage with the quantity of provisions on board demanded by the statute. The Mary [Id. 9,191]. Congress did not assume to regulate the provisioning of a crew further than regards the amount to be supplied on board for their support. The pleadings in suits for short allowances are framed in consonance with this understanding of the act. So, in this case, the libellants allege the master neglected to put on board the requisite quantity of provisions for the voyage, according to the act of congress. This allegation is the gravamen of the complaint, and the proofs and the recovery must be governed by it. The action is not to be maintained, then, upon the fact alone, that a crew is put on short allowance; the additional particular is equally an essential ingredient, that the ship had not on board the stores required by law when she sailed on the voyage.

It is contended by the libellants, that as they prove bread of a bad and unwholesome quality was served out, and they were not allowed a just ratio of that which was good and wholesome, that the burthen of proof is cast on the claimants to show the vessel properly stored on her departure. In ordinary acceptation, a party prosecuting is bound to prove on his part every fact necessary to the support of his action; so that when his right of action rests upon several facts and averments, it is indispensable that he furnish evidence of the existence of each. 1 Chit. 216–256. Moreover, it is a rule of evidence, when an issue involves a charge of culpable omission, it is incumbent on the party making the charge to prove it, although the proposition be a negative one, for the other party shall be presumed to be innocent of the imputation until he is proved to be faulty. Hartwell v. Root, 19 Johns. 345; 3 East, 192; Rosc. N. P. Ev. 52. The proofs, perhaps, need not be equally direct and cogent in respect to each particular, when two or more are the basis of the action, for the existence of one may be in some degree implied from that of another; as if the proof be satisfactory, that immediately on the commencement of a voyage the crew are put upon a close short allowance, and so kept habitually during the continuance of the voyage, very slight evidence of the insufficiency of the supply of provisions on board will cast on the owner the burthen of proving he had fully complied with the law.

I do not say the same implication might not arise respecting the fitness of the provisions, where those served were uniformly bad, although the evidence on the part of the libellants was limited to proving the quality of the rations, if there was any reliable evidence showing carelessness or fault in the selection and lading of the provisions put in the ship. But the rule ought not to extend to requiring the owner to give evidence of the quantity and quality of provisions stored on board, when the testimony of the libellants show, there was an abundant supply in the ship, and only accuses it inferentially of being unwholesome in quality when shipped.

Upon all the testimony submitted by the libellants in this case, I do not think even a presumption is raised that the provisions on board were deficient in quantity, which the claimants can be called upon to repel, by proving they furnished the vessel in the outset sufficiently. The whole contestation has proceeded upon the question of the wholesomeness of the bread served the men. If this point should be decided in their favor, there would be no semblance of right in them to recover the double wages demanded under the statute, without the further fact is found by the court, that the bread was not wholesome when put on board. These positions of law must control the case, and be fatal to the suit of the libellants upon their own evidence. But the testimony of Captain Dean and the mate Forsyth, respecting the quality of the bread remaining over from the previous voyage, and of the large excess brought back on this, and of Mr. Taylor, who furnished the supply for the voyage in question, proves, beyond any fair ground for doubt, that the bread was abundant in quantity and wholesome, and of a good quality when put on board and the ship went to sea. These facts would be decisive of the present action. But I feel constrained to say, that I am satisfied upon the whole proofs that the representation of the men as to the condition of the bread during the voyage is a sheer fabrication; that it is all grounded upon their receiving occasionally biscuits taken from some barrels which had been wet on the outside, and were approaching to mould, whilst the main body of the bread in the same barrels was sound and wholesome, and is found so now after the completion of the voyage, and the return of the bread to this port. It seems to me evident that this claim for short allowance was fabricated in aid of Duffie's suit for wages, and was not thought of by any of the crew when the vessel came in and had completed her voyage. All, except Duffie, received their wages when discharged, and intimated no claim of this character, or even complaint as to their fare on the voyage, and Duffie declined taking his wages with the others, threatening to sue the master for an assault and battery, without suggesting any demand against the ship or owners for short allowance. Afterwards he changed his mind, and wished to receive his wages. His counsel wrote the master they held his account for wages, and asked payment of the amount, without the coupling any demand for short allowance with it; and the owners not being willing to satisfy his demand, because of insubordination on the voyage and maltreatment of the master with which he was charged, this action was brought to recover his contract wages, and in the same suit his shipmates became joint parties with him, in a claim of extra wages for six and a half months' short allowance. A demand put in prosecution under such circumstances would, at all times, be looked at with great distrust. I do not say acceptance of the stipulated wages, and giving receipts therefor, would legally bar the crew from setting up afterwards a claim for short allowance; but such claim interposed subsequently must necessarily be subject to severe and jealous scrutiny, and when supported almost entirely by the oaths of the prosecuting parties, each swearing for his companions, and all expecting to recover upon facts mutually proved for each other, a court would exact a strong and most satisfactory case before making a decree in its favor.

The case, so obnoxious to suspicion and doubt on its face, is further met by evidence on the part of the owners, satisfactorily showing that the main representations on the part of the libellants in their testimony are unfounded in fact, or gross and wilful exaggerations as to the state and quality of the bread; and accordingly, on this branch of the case, I unhesitatingly decree against the libellants, with costs.

The remaining question respects the right of Duffie to wages. The pleadings and proofs in objection to this demand exhibit a case of gross insubordination and misconduct and violence on his part, which would justify a punishment equivalent to a forfeiture of wages, if the master or owners stood in a situation allowing them to make this defence. Considering the allegations of the answer fully proved, still it appears to me the master has remitted or pardoned the offence, if not entirely, certainly to that degree that he would not be allowed to plead the transaction as a bar to wages. Duffie was the best and most efficient hand on board. His conduct had been unexceptionable to the time of the disorderly and mutinous affray complained of. The master did not arrest and confine the offender, or subject him to the discipline of the ship for insubordination or misconduct, nor did he give Duffie to understand his offence would not be overlooked, or that he would be called to answer for it on the arival of the ship at a home port; neither did he make it the subject of complaint to the civil authorities, or even to his owners when the voyage was ended. On the contrary, the very day, and within a few hours after his misconduct, Duffie resumed his work as usual, doing his duty faithfully and quietly, and so continued at his place during the voyage, without reprimand or question on the part of the master. When the crew were discharged, the master procured the money for Duffie and offered him his wages in full, but Duffie refused to accept them, saying, he intended to sue the master for an assault and battery in the affray complained of. The master testified, in explanation of his proceedings, that he had intended accompanying the payment of wages with a suitable reproof, but he did not administer it, because Duffie declined taking his pay. On the same day, Duffie relented and called on the master, and asked to be paid his wages. The master then refused to pay them, and charged that they had been forfeited. The same afternoon, as the master was about leaving the city, he received a note from Duffie's proctors, requesting payment of the wages. He made no objection to the demand, and handed the note to the owners, who agreed to see to the matter for him. They subsequently refused to make the payment, but it is not proved that this was done at the request or with the approval of the master. I think, under these circumstances, it was too late for the master or owners to revert to the offence committed a month before, as working a forfeiture of wages for the voyage, or urge it to the court as a ground of punishment by way of mulct or abatement of wages. I shall accordingly decree wages to Duffie. If the amount demanded by him is not agreed to by the claimants, a reference must be had to a commissioner to ascertain the sum due.

There is a difficulty in disposing of the question of costs on this branch of the case. The court has arrived at the conclusion that the claimants could not properly contest the payment of wages with Duffie, after the open and continued acts of the master, by implication, at least, condoning his offence on the voyage. They ought not to be allowed, in gratification of their own resentments, to create a litigation on that point, with impunity from costs, knowing that the master had overlooked or condoned the misconduct of the seaman. On the other hand, it is manifestly inequitable that this libellant, who, in conjunction with his associates, has forced the owners to an expensive litigation upon the groundless claim for short allowance, should have the advantage of throwing on them the costs of the whole controversy, by now recovering against them full costs, with his wages. All the taxable costs, or nearly so, must necessarily have been incurred in the suit for short allowance, without the adjunct of this demand. The owners, finding this tacked to those unfounded claims, might have been induced to make defence to the demand of wages by Duffie, when if the action rested on that alone, they would have satisfied it without contestation. The costs decreed against the joint libellants on the claim for short allowance would not be an adequate redress to the claimants, because, if Duffie is allowed to tax full costs on this branch of the case, he imposes on them a large portion of the very costs they are exempted from by the decree in their favor. For instance, they should be discharged of the marshal's fees on arrest, and keeping of the vessel, all disbursements made in bonding her, and various other particulars entering into the charges of the proctors, clerk and marshal, as well as all expenses for the attendance of witnesses, no witness being called to Duffie's demand for wages, who was not also used to prove the short allowance sued for.

I shall, in view of the whole case, and in the exercise of the discretion the court possesses in the allotment of costs, order that a separate bill of costs be made up in favor of Duffie, and that the claimants be chargeable only with those services specially and necessarily applicable to his demand for wages; and that he be entitled to recover only one-sixth of the charges of the marshal and clerk on the arrest, bonding and discharge of the vessel, and only for the attendance of Kelly as a witness, the other witnesses being all parties to the suit, and not entitled to fees as against him. A decree will be entered conformably to these directions.

Circuit Court, D. Vermont. Oct. Term, 1810.

BILL OF EXCHANGE—LOSS BY REASON OF BAILEE'S NEGLIGENCE.

The defendant had sold the complainant a bill of exchange on a house in London, and received the complainant's note for the price, but kept the bill by agreement, as security for its payment. The bill was protested, the drawers became bankrupt, and dividends were declared upon their estates. The defendant refused to return the bill to the complainant, but made no effort to recover the amount or to obtain the dividends. He was held liable for any loss that might have happened by such negligence.

[In equity. Cross bill by Francis Childs against Samuel Corp.]

D. Farrand and E. Keyes, for complainant.
S. Hitchcock and A. Foote, for defendant.

LIVINGSTON, Circuit Justice. The object of this cross bill is to have a credit on the mortgage mentioned in the pleadings in this cause, for the amount of a certain bill of exchange for one thousand pounds sterling, which it is alleged, has been lost to the complainant by the negligence of the defendant.

It appears, that on the 29th November,

[1] [Reported by Elijah Paine, Jr., Esq.]

1803, the defendant sold to the complainant a bill of exchange for one thousand pounds sterling, which had been drawn by Robert Bird & Co. of New York, on Bird, Savage & Bird, of London, (both houses composed of the same persons,) and which had been protested for non-acceptance and non-payment. For this bill the complainant gave the defendant his promissory note for three thousand four hundred and eighteen dollars and seventy-nine cents, payable in the July following. The bill remained in the hands of the defendant, who gave his receipt for it, promising to return it to the complainant on due payment of his note. The note not being paid, the complainant was sued, and judgment obtained against him; after which, to secure the amount of the judgment, and some other demands, he gave the defendant three other promissory notes, dated the 8th of October, 1805, for one thousand seven hundred and forty-nine dollars and ninety-eight cents, each payable the 1st of April, 1806, 7, and 8, with interest, and executed a mortgage on certain real estate in Vermont. On the execution of this mortgage the receipt above-mentioned was given up, but the bill remained in the defendant's hands, without any written agreement respecting it.

Thus far there is no dispute about facts between the parties. The complainant asserts, that he expected the defendant would have delivered him the bill on receiving the new securities, but that he refused to do so, agreeing, however, that he would hold it for his benefit, and endeavour to collect the money due thereon for his use; which he neglected to do, to the great loss of the complainant. The defendant admits, that the bill remained with him as "a further security for the monies due from the complainant, until the same were paid by the complainant, or by the receipt of monies on the bill, which he was authorized to receive and apply toward his demands against the complainant," but denies, that "he was obliged to use any endeavours or be at any trouble or expense in endeavouring to collect the bill." Without stating that he had taken any measures to obtain payment, he alleges, that he was unable to do so by reason of the insolvency of the parties to it. It becomes necessary, then, to recur to the testimony, to ascertain the understanding of the parties at the time of leaving this bill with the defendant, which must determine the obligation and duty thereby imposed on him. In settling this question, the defendant's letter of the 9th of April, 1805, to his attorney, Mr. Foote, has been thought material. In this he desires Mr. Foote to take up the receipt he had given to the complainant, adding, "that it was understood, and he meant thereby to have it understood by his attorney and Mr. Childs, that whatever he might recover on said bill should be for his benefit."

Without going further, it would be very difficult to say that the defendant was at liberty to be entirely passive about the recovery of the monies due on this bill of exchange. He resided in the city of New-York, and the complainant at Colchester, in Vermont, at the distance of more than three hundred miles from each other. By consenting to retain the bill, and apply what was received on it to the complainant's credit, he put it out of the power of the latter to use any diligence for its recovery. The complainant, without the bill or protest, which was also in the defendant's hands, could not prove any debt, either under the commission against the house in England, or under the separate commission against Robert Bird in this country. He could not but believe that the defendant would do thus much, at least, or return him the bill, to enable him to do it himself. He could not suppose,—nor could it have been the intention or understanding of those gentlemen,—that the bill was to remain among the papers of the defendant, without a single effort on his part to secure to himself the dividends which might be declared on it—which must have been the sole object of his retaining it. If he found the trouble or expense too great, he should have relinquished his agency, and apprized the complainant of his unwillingness to incur either; and means might then have been taken by the complainant to prevent the loss which it is alleged has happened. But if, from the very nature of the transaction, some diligence was not imposed on the defendant, the testimony of Peaslee and Henry seems to remove every doubt. The first, who was employed by the complainant to come to some arrangement with the defendant, and who is mentioned in his letter to Mr. Foote as the person with whom he had a good deal of conversation on Mr. Childs' concerns, says, that the defendant "retained the bill in his own hands, and that it was an understanding between Mr. Corp and himself, that he was to act upon the bill, and to account to Childs for whatever the bill might nett." In another place he says, "he was directed by Mr. Childs to make a regular demand of the bill, but he did not, because Mr. Corp inclined to hold the bill; from whom he understood, that he would act for Mr. Childs, and collect what he could of the bill, and account with him for whatever he should collect." The other witness is not less explicit. Mr. Henry says, "that in 1807, two years after the interview between Mr. Corp and Mr. Peaslee, he called on him, at the request of Mr. Childs, and informed him, that it was his wish to have the bill, in order to obtain a dividend, which the witness had learned was declared on all the debts of the company; but the defendant declined giving it to him, alleging, that he would endeavour to obtain the dividend himself, and would not give out of his hands any security he had."

The court is bound to conclude from this testimony, as well as from the internal evidence of the transaction, that the defendant was considered by the complainant, and was regarded by himself, as his agent to act for him, as the witness expresses it, and to collect what might become due on this bill. Whether he were obliged to sue, or to attach property of the drawers, or not, it is unnecessary to say, because that is not the negligence imputed to him; but the court is of opinion, that with the full knowledge which he had of their bankruptcy, it was at least his duty to have used that ordinary diligence and care which no man, however negligent, would have omitted in his own concerns, that of proving the debt, and thus taking a chance of dividends which might be made. This was the only way left to collect any thing, and certainly when he promised to act for the complainant, and to endeavour to obtain the dividends, nothing short of this could be a compliance with his engagement. The trouble of such a step would be trifling, and the expense very inconsiderable. The court, however, does not think with the defendant's counsel, that Mr. Corp has made himself liable for the whole bill, but only for so much of it as shall appear to have been lost by his negligence. Such an indemnity is all the complainant can ask, and beyond this a court of equity will not readily go. It is impossible, however, from any evidence before us to say what credit the complainant is entitled to on his mortgage. The depositions of Mr. McCall and Mr. Henry, leave it too uncertain what might have been received, without some further inquiry. The court, therefore, before a final decree, thinks it proper to refer it to the master to report what dividends have been declared and paid to persons holding bills of exchange drawn by Robert Bird & Co. in this country on Bird, Savage & Bird in England, and not accepted by them, either by the assignees of the latter, or by those of Robert Bird, and to reserve all further directions until the coming in of his report.

Case No. 2,678.

CHILDS et al. v. GLADDING et al.

[11 Am. Law Reg. (N. S.) 386; 14 Int. Rev. Rec. 173.]

District Court, D. Rhode Island. June, 1872.

VESSEL OWNERS—RIGHTS OF MAJORITY IN INTEREST.

[A majority in interest of shipowners may dismiss the master, although a co-owner, at any time without cause.]

KNOWLES, District Judge. This is a cause of possession, civil and maritime, promoted by C. T. Childs and others, against Samuel Gladding and others, the libellants, as owners of twenty-three thirty-second parts of the schooner Allen Middleton, Jr., claiming possession and control of her, as against the respondents, the owners of the remaining nine thirty-second parts.

The libel, as filed on the 12th of April, 1871, alleged as grounds of judicial action, first, the ownership of the schooner, as above stated, and, secondly, "that the libellants are desirous of employing her in the coasting trade, and for this purpose, of placing in her a master satisfactory to themselves, and in whom they have confidence, but that the said Samuel Gladding, having heretofore been master of the said schooner, refuses, though requested to deliver up possession of her to the libellants, and persists in his claim to continue in her as master, notwithstanding the demand made upon him by the libellants for possession and control of her, and he, and some of the other part-owners refuse to unite with the libellants in the employment of said vessel, though, as the libellants believe, a part of the owners, now absent, would join with them in the employment of said vessel, if here present. On the 20th of April, without objection, the libel was amended by inserting three additional articles to the effect following: 1st, that said Gladding was appointed master of the schooner, about the 3d of March, 1871, under a special agreement that he should remain master only so long as he gave satisfaction to the owners, and that before the filing of the libel, "he was informed by the libellants, who constituted a large majority in interest of such owners, that he did not give satisfaction to the owners, and that they had removed him as such master, and demanded of him the possession of said vessel, and to surrender up to them the papers thereof: 2d, that said Gladding, while he was master of said vessel, misused and abused her by greatly overburdening her, whereby she was strained and caused to leak badly and otherwise damaged; and 3d, that said Gladding is incompetent to act as master of said vessel." To the libel, as thus amended, the said Gladding intervening for his interest in the schooner, filed his answer, embodying six defensive allegations, of the first and sixth of which, however, it is not necessary here to speak.

The second was, in substance, that during the months of December, 1870, and January and February, 1871, he acted as agent of all the owners concerned in the purchase of said schooner, who unanimously appointed him master thereof, without any stipulation or condition, and, in consideration thereof, he became part owner; that in a subsequent agreement, on the 3d of March, 1871, a contract concerning the employment of the schooner and the division of her earnings was embodied, and it was expressly stipulated that he, said Gladding, was to act as master of the schooner, as long as he gave satisfaction to the owners—that the meaning of the stipulation was, "that until he, said Gladding, did some act as master that gave the owners just cause of complaint or reasonable ground for dissatisfaction," he was to command and have possession of the schooner; that in pursuance of said agreement he gave up other employments, and on the —— of March, 1871, entered upon his duties as captain and manager of the schooner, having made in her since that date a successful trip to Baltimore, and having settled the accounts of the vessel for that trip with the several shareholders—they "all expressing themselves satisfied;" that he was arranging for and about sailing on a second trip, when the libellants, by instituting these proceedings and arresting the schooner, obstructed the sailing, use and employment of her, to his great damage as one of the owners and master of the same, and in unjust violation and breach of the said contract—he denying that the libellants or owners had any just cause of complaint against, or reasonable ground of dissatisfaction with him for any act done or suffered to be done by him in the command of said schooner, or the management of her affairs or settlement of her accounts.

The third allegation was, in substance, a denial or traverse of the charge of misusing, overloading or straining the vessel: the fourth, in substance, a denial of the charge of incompetency as master of said vessel, coupled with an averment that for over thirty years he had been a mariner by profession,—had served in all capacities (save that of cook) on board of vessels, and had been master of other schooners before, to wit, of the Mary H. Mifflin; Thomas Hallet; Flight; Gov. James Y. Smith; Science, of Bristol; Phoenix, of Stonington; and others, and that no vessel under his command ever had any injury done to her, or any accident happen to her that might have been avoided by the master. The fifth was, substantially, an allegation that he was the legal, bona fide owner of two thirty-second parts of the schooner, and that another thirty-second part is held for him by one William Butler, under an agreement to convey to him on payment of an agreed price.

The cause came to hearing upon libel, answer and documentary and oral proofs, several of the owners, the captain included, appearing as witnesses, and the several points set forth in, or suggested by the libel and answer, were distinctly presented and made the subjects of inquiry and argument. To such only of these as upon full consideration of the whole cause I deem of controlling importance shall I refer, as matters of comment on this occasion. In regard to certain principles or maxims of the law maritime, no question is raised at the bar. The learned counsel of the parties agree that in general the majority in interest of the owners of a vessel are entitled to the control, use and possession of her, and that this right of the majority the admiralty will protect,—of course,—duly regarding the rights of the minority, to demand security for the restoration of their property in specie or otherwise. Also, they agree that in general the owners of a vessel (that is the majority in interest of them), have the power of appointment and removal of the master at will, for any or no cause, as they may see fit, and that of course no objection of complaint, on the part of a captain, to an exercise of this power by the owners, is of any avail, unless grounded on the terms of some special contract between himself and those owners. But, at this point arises a question upon which the learned counsel are widely at variance, and upon which, it cannot be denied, text writers and jurists seem to be not fully in accord. Thus, on the part of the claimant, it is contended that when it happens that a part-owner, co-operating with the minority, occupies the position of captain, the general principles above stated lose their value for all practical purposes, unless the majority can show some adequate, just or reasonable cause for removing or dispossessing such captain. On the part of the libellants, on the other hand, it is maintained that the right of the majority in interest is as perfect and its power as irresistible, against the captain, though a part-owner, as against any other shareholder, whatever his occupation or his residence—landsman or seaman. And accordingly, as their first position, they claim that upon their petition or libel, as originally filed, in which the only ground for action set forth, is the majority's right of possession, without even an illusion to any cause of dissatisfaction, they are entitled to the relief prayed. On principle, they say, this claim can be sustained, and, while they acknowledge their inability to produce, in support of it, any adjudicated case from the English or American reports, they challenge a production of an adjudicated case militating with their position. In reply to this, and in support of his own position, the learned counsel of the claimant, with apt and cogent remarks and arguments, cites several authorities deservedly of high repute, viz.: 3 Kent, Comm. 162, and notes; Story, Partn. §§ 432, 445, and notes; Fland. Ins. § 65, and notes; 1 Pars. Shipp. & Adm. 95, and notes; Abb. Ins. 104, and notes. On referring to these, we learn that whatever is found in these works sustaining the claimant's views, is assumed and represented to be dictated or warranted by certain three cases in the English Admiralty, in tempore Sir William Scott (1802–10–11). The first of these is The New Draper, 4 C. Rob. Adm. 287. The owners of 9-16ths of a vessel sued for possession the owner of 7-16ths (who also was captain). The suit was contested, on the ground that the captain was in fact the owner of 14-16ths, having paid for seven of the nine shares holden at the commencement of the suit by certain of the libellants. The bills of sale, which he had taken, were, however, deemed by the court defective, and a judgment for possession was entered for the libellants, as being the majority in interest. So far as appears, the only point raised or discussed was the validity and effect of the alleged purchase of seven shares by the defendant, after suit brought. In pronouncing judgment, the court said: "The dispossession of a master is, in its nature, not an uncommon proceeding. All that the court requires in cases where the master is not an owner, is that the majority of the proprietors should declare their disinclination to continue him in possession. In the case of a master and part-owner, something more is required before the court will proceed to dispossess a person who is also a proprietor in the vessel, and whose possession, therefore, the common law is, upon general principles, inclined to maintain. It is not, however, by any means unprecedented for this court to proceed even to that extent; but then some special reason is commonly stated to induce the court to interpose. I observe there is a reason given in this case, and the same that most frequently occurs, 'that the master is irregular in his accounts with his owners.'" The conclusion of the court's opinion is as follows: "The case becomes, therefore, a common case of the majority of owners proceeding against one in which the common rule of the court must be pursued. Possession decreed." The head note of the case, it may be well to state, is simply "Case of possession. Master dispossessed at the application of a majority of interests." The second of these cases is The Johan & Siegmund, Edw. Adm. 242, decided in 1810, eight years after the decision in The New Draper. The head-note is, "Cause of possession. Suit not entertained by the court in the case of a foreign ship." The only allusion in the report of the case to the point in question, is this single sentence: "If this were a British ship, there can be no doubt that, by the practice of this court, it would, upon the application of a majority of the parties interested, proceed to dispossess the master, though a part-owner, without minutely considering the merits or demerits of his conduct." The third of the three cases is The See Reuter, 1 Dod. 22, decided in 1811. The majority of the owners sought to dispossess the captain, who was also an owner of 5-16ths of the vessel. The decree was against the captain. The only portion of the report of this case, of any pertinence in this connection, is the first sentence of the court's opinion, in these words: "In cases of ships belonging to British subjects (the See Reuter was owned exclusively by aliens), the court has no hesitation in ordering possession to be delivered up on the application of a majority of the owners, without entering very minutely into the causes of dissatisfaction existing between them and the master." That there is found no adjudication in support of the claimant's position is apparent. Nor less apparent is it, that, in the view of the judge, an assignment of a reason for the dispossession of a master part-owner was rather matter of form than substance. In The New Draper, he says merely that some special reason is "commonly stated"—not that this is necessary, or even important—and his after utterances, in 2 Edwards and 1 Dodson, negative the inference that even he would have sustained a demurrer to a petition in which the majority of part-owners claimed possession, without assigning other cause than the majority's will and order. Assuming, as I am warranted in doing, that no adjudication upon this point adverse to the libellant's position can be produced, and failing to find in the argument of the learned counsel of the claimant, or in the text-books to which reference is made, any sufficient answer to the argument in support of that position, I am constrained to concur in the views of the libellants. No satisfactory reason is assigned or suggested by Sir William Scott, or any commentator, or by the learned counsel of the claimant, for holding that a part-owner of a ship who secures for himself an appointment as master of the craft, is entitled to retain his office and keep possession of the vessel until he shall see fit to resign or surrender, against the expressed will of the majority of the owners,—unless that majority can show reasonable and sufficient cause,—some misfeasance or nonfeasance for his removal and deposition. Of special contracts between a ship's master and a ship's owners I am not now treating, but of the relations between a master who is also a part-owner and his co-owners after his appointment. Is the part-owner who is appointed master of a ship endowed with any new or additional right as a part-owner? When, on his election he steps upon deck, are his relation to the ship and his rights in and over it the same as those of a part-owner of a horse, in his exclusive custody in and over that horse, as settled at common law? To these inquiries it is believed a negative answer must be given. The individual remains a part-owner, with all his rights as such, as before his appointment to the mastership, and no more. As master he is to be regarded simply as the agent of the owners as a body, with no other rights qua master than he would have were he not a shareholder. This, as it seems to me, is, or of right ought to be, regarded as the better law upon the point in question It is, as is believed, consistent with well-settled and familiar rules and principles, while its opposite leads logically and necessarily to results and conclusions which the profession would be slow to adopt, and the business community quick to condemn. Refraining from further remark upon this point, as supererogatory labor, I sustain the point raised in limine by the libellants as above presented. It is obvious, moreover, that by the amendment of their libel above mentioned it is made to conform to the views of the English jurist. A "special reason" and "causes of dissatisfaction" are set forth; but how "minutely" these causes should be considered—whether as matters of contestation upon proofs and argu-

Of the evidence submitted by the libellants in the case in support of their charges or allegations of incompetency, and of misusing and overstraining the Middleton, it is sufficient here to say that it failed to substantiate those charges when weighed in the balance with the claimant's proofs in rebuttal. Assuming it is proven or admitted that the libellants are owners of 23-32 of the schooner, and the claimant owner of 2-32 only (the owners of the remaining 7-32 not entering appearance), and that the claimant, though requested, has refused to surrender possession, I must pronounce for the libellants, unless ground for a contrary judgment is found in the second defensive allegation of the claimant's answer, already stated in substance. On recurring to this it is seen that he claims to have been unanimously appointed captain of the Middleton in the winter of 1871, and in proof of this he exhibits the subscription list upon which the owners contracted for their several shares—reading thus: "We, the subscribers, agree to take or hold the respective shares set against our names of schooner Allen Middleton, Jr., said vessel to be commanded by Captain Samuel Gladding. Providence, November 30, 1870." Of this portion of the allegation and its proof I deem it sufficient to say that its relevancy and importance I have failed to perceive, inasmuch as the claimant proceeds to aver that subsequently, viz., on the 3d of March, 1871, a more formal agreement or contract between himself and his co-owners was made, in view of which, as he strenuously contends, the court should refrain from interfering "to aid either party in attempting to violate it." In the construction of this writing referred to, contended for by the claimant, I am unable to concur, and this whether it be considered separately from or in connection with "surrounding circumstances" concerning which testimony was received under objection. The co-owners of the vessel (the claimant among them), on the 3d of March, 1871, convened to ascertain the then will of the then majority in regard to the use of their joint property, and the action and will of the majority, so far as need here be inquired, was embodied in the following paper, to which the signatures of owners of 16-32, and no more, of the vessel (including the claimant owning 2-32) were attached:—

"It is agreed between the owners of schooner Allen Middleton, Jr., and Captain Samuel Gladding, as follows: Captain Gladding is to command the schooner so long as he gives satisfaction to the owners, and she is to be employed in the freighting business between ports not south of Cape Henry, and all northern and eastern ports. The division of gross earning is to be as follows:—Captain Gladding is to receive 3-5, and the owners 2-5 of the same. Captain Gladding to victual and man the vessel and to sail her, paying all port charges and all other charges appertaining to the running of said vessel, the owners only to pay such bills as are necessarily incurred in keeping the schooner in good running order. Captain Gladding is to make up his account after every trip, and after making deductions named above, he is to divide the balance among the owners. It is agreed that all bills made up for expenditure on the vessel shall, before being charged in Captain Gladding's account, be submitted to Mr. James M. Cross, of Providence, for his approval. Before the vessel leaves Providence all bills against the schooner are to be collected, and accounts made up by Captain Gladding and presented to owners for payment."

It is noticeable that of the seven signatures to this instrument (including Captain Gladding's) four are included among the libellants, and two have disposed of their shares.

For dissenting from the construction given by the claimant to this contract, it seems not necessary to state in full my reasons. It must suffice to say, that even did it bear the signature of each and every owner (instead of only half of them), and were they now, all of them, still owners (which is not the fact), and were there not now (which is the fact) owners who had no interest in the vessel in March last, I should nevertheless hold that the majority in interest is entitled to the possession of the vessel, either as against the claimant alone, captain and part-owner though he be, or against him and his co-owners of the minority. That the co-owners of a ship may not, by contracts and covenants or otherwise, estop themselves from exercising their rights in regard to the appointment or removal of a master, or the control and management of the ship, is not affirmed. It suffices to say that, under the facts in the case, the contract of March 3d, exhibited in proof, lacks more than one of the essentials of a contract of that species. Against any injury or wrong from mere wilfulness, caprice, or favoritism on the part of the majority owners of a ship, the master contracting can protect himself by bond, covenant, or otherwise; and if he neglect thus to guard his interests, himself, not the law, should he blame, if his employers dismiss him at a moment's notice, and without (so far as he may know or is entitled to know) any cause, reasonable or unreasonable.

PRACTICE—AMENDMENT OF PLEADINGS.

A defendant will not be allowed, as a matter of course, to put in new pleas in this court as in state courts, on the trial of a case. The court speaks of the practice of so doing as vexatious, and one which will be allowed only where a good reason is shewn for it, and then, generally speaking, only upon terms.

The "patent act," as it is called, of July 4th, 1836, § 15 (5 Stat. 123), "permits" a defendant, in suits brought for infringement, to plead the general issue in a variety of cases, which the act specifies, and to give any special matter in evidence of which he may have given thirty days' notice to the plaintiff. And the judiciary act of September 24th, 1789, § 32 (1 Stat. 91), gives authority to the court to "permit either of the parties to amend any defect in the impleadings," upon such conditions as the court may prescribe.

This cause was now called on for trial; and the defendant having pleaded the general issue, and given the thirty days' notice of his special matter, Mr. Cuyler and J. Fallon, asked leave to put in several special pleas, some of which, it was said, covered the same ground as the special matter, and others of which were new defences, which, however, might have been pleaded generally, with notice. They offered to the plaintiffs, if there was any surprise on them, to continue the case till next term, but shewed no reason, except the omission of their client to inform them of all his defences, why the pleas had not been put in, or notice given of their effect, thirty days before the trial.

Mr. Titus and Mr. Stephens, for the plaintiffs, objected to the new pleas being put in now. The pleas were a surprise; and a trial, not a continuance, was wanted by the plaintiff, who had brought many witnesses from a distance.

GRIER, Circuit Justice. This practice of putting in new pleas at the moment of trial, which we derive from the state courts, is a very vexatious one; and we are not disposed at all to encourage it here. The practice puts it in a defendant's power to put off the suit almost as often as it is brought to trial; for if the new pleas are artfully drawn (as they may be on purpose), and suddenly sprung upon the counsel, he may naturally not wish to reply to them on the spot. Even in the state, while I presided in a judicial district there, though I could not, under the state law, prevent a party from putting in new pleas, I have generally done whatever I fairly could to discourage it beyond the strict requirements of the act. But in this court we are under no obligation to allow pleas to be thus put in. It is a privilege which the court may permit in its discretion. In the state courts it is different. "The defendant," says the state act, act of March 21st, 1806, may "alter his plea or defence on or before the trial, * * * and if by such alteration or amendment the adverse party is taken by surprise, the trial shall be postponed until the next court." The defendant must, in this court, shew something which addresses itself to our conscience; and even then we should probably continue the cause only on terms; as, for example, the payment of costs of the term.

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. Oct. Term, 1806.

RIGHTS OF SURETIES—BOND FOR CUSTOMS DUTIES—MISTAKE—RECTIFICATION IN EQUITY.

1. R. D. imported a quantity of merchandise, in his own vessel, consigned to E. D., who received the goods, and gave bonds for the duties to the United States, with the plaintiffs as his sureties. The invoice and bill of lading showed the goods to be the property of R. D., but the bond was executed by E. D., without calling himself the agent of R. D. Held, that the sureties of E. D. are not entitled to recover the amount of the bonds paid by them, from R. D., under the provisions of the act of congress, giving a preference to sureties who pay bonds for duties.

2. The law of the United States clearly marks the distinction between owner, importer, consignee or agent; and the entry is to express the character in which it is made, at the time the duties are secured. If as agent, this must be so stated in the bond.

3. The act of congress considers a consignee, for all the purposes of the law, an owner; and unless he states himself not to be so, he is the principal in the bond; and it is only in favour of his sureties, and upon him, and his effects, that the law gives the preference.

4. The bond in this case was properly given by the consignee of the goods, and therefore there was no mistake; and if there were a mistake, it is not to be rectified at law; and in equity, the plaintiff would be told that equality is equity; and that a court of equity will not rectify a mistake, in order to violate one of its favourite maxims.

This cause came on upon a case agreed. Robert Denison imported, in 1801, a cargo of goods, in the Betsey, of which he was owner, which arrived at Baltimore, consigned to

[1] [Originally published from the MSS. of Hon. Bushrod Washington, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, under the supervision of Richard Peters, Jr., Esq.]

Edward Denison, who resided at Baltimore, and carried on trade under the firm of Robert & Edward Denison; Robert residing at Philadelphia. The invoice showed the goods to have been shipped by the order, and for the account of Robert Denison. The manifest states the cargo to be owner's property, as did the bill of lading. The cargo was entered by Edward Denison in his own name, and a bond was given by him in his own name, without mentioning Robert Denison, for payment of the duties, with the plaintiff and Brown as his sureties. Childs having been compelled to discharge the bond, and Edward & Robert Denison being bankrupts, this action was brought; and the question was, whether the plaintiff is entitled to a preference of the other creditors, or must come in equally with them.

It was contended, by Mr. Dallas, for the plaintiff, that though it does not appear, on the face of the bond, that Edward Denison subscribed the same, as agent for the real owner, yet, that this being made out in evidence, dehors the bond, the effect will be the same; and therefore, that under the 65th section of the Impost Law, Act of March 2, 1799 [1 Stat. 676], the plaintiff, the surety, is entitled to a preference of the other creditors of the owner. The agent need not sign as agent in this case, any more than in the case of an insurance made by him in England, under the statute. See Parker, Exch. 15, 16; 1 Term. R. 313; 1 Bos. & P. 345.

Rawle and Ingersoll, for the defendant, insisted: 1st. That the law which gave this preference, was unconstitutional; though under the 8th section of the first article of the constitution, congress might, as a consequence of the direct power to lay and collect impost and duties, give a preference to the United States, yet they could not transfer it to a surety, since the collection is complete by the payment of the surety; and therefore, all the power on this subject, is thereby expended. 2d. The preference is against the principal in the bond, not the owner of the goods. Edward Denison is the principal. The distinction between owner, consignee, and agent, is clearly marked out in the law. Even the United States could not sue the owner, if not principal in the bond, much less the surety, whose right is derivative. 3d. The preference given by the law which was read, was done away by the bankrupt law [2 Stat. 30], which puts all creditors on an equality, except the United States; and sureties being not included within the exception, are left on the ground of other private creditors.

Dallas and M'Kean, for the plaintiff, upon the third point, contended, that the law which gives the preference, and the section of the bankrupt law, which is relied upon, are affirmative statutes; and the latter does not repeal the former, as to priority given to the surety.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. The question upon the case agreed, is, whether the plaintiff, Childs, is entitled to the like advantage, priority, and preference, for the recovery of the money, paid by him as above mentioned, out of the estate of Robert Denison, as are reserved and secured to the United States, by the act of the 2d of March, 1799. If in the affirmative, judgment must be for the plaintiff; otherwise, for defendant. Throughout the law imposing duties on imports, the distinction between owner, importer, consignee, and agent, is carefully marked, and uniformly adhered to. The entry of the goods is to be made in the name of the owner or consignee, who, for all the purposes of the law, is considered, by the 62d section, as owner; or, in cases of the absence, or sickness of those persons, by their agent or factor, in the name of the owner or consignee; and is to be verified by the oath of the person making the entry; in a way to point out distinctly the character in which he acts, whether as owner, consignee, or agent. If the entry be made by an agent, or factor, where the particulars of the merchandise are unknown, it is, by the 86th section, to be in writing, and subscribed by him in his name, as agent or factor for the owner or consignee. The bond for securing the duties, is, by the 62d section, to be in the name of the importer or consignee; or, if it be given by an agent, then in the name of such agent, and of the importer or consignee, and the sureties, with condition for payment of the duties by the principal or his agent, and the sureties. In addition to this bond, the agent, if the entry be made by him, is to give a bond in the penalty of 1000 dollars, to produce an account of the goods, verified by the owner or consignee, within a stipulated time. By the sixty-fifth section of this law, a priority of satisfaction is given to the United States, against all the obligors in the bond, in case of insolvency; and, if the principal in such bond, given either by himself, or by his agent, factor, or other person for him, should be insolvent, or if his estate in the hands of his executors or assignees, be insufficient for the payment of his debts, and the bond should be discharged by his surety; such surety is entitled to the like advantage, priority, or preference, as are reserved and secured to the United States; and he may maintain a suit upon the aforesaid bond, in his name, in law or equity, for recovering all moneys paid thereon.

Here, then, we find that the distinction between owner and importer, consignee and agent, which runs through the various sections of the law, prior to the 65th, is dropped, when the remedy for the surety in the bond is provided for. The preference given to him is not against the owner, importer, consignee, or agent, but against the principal in the bond. Who is the principal in the bond? He is marked in the condition. The person who entered the goods, viz. the owner or importer, if the entry were made by him; or the consignee, if made by him; or either of those persons, if the entry were made by an agent, or other person, in their names, and who is an obligor in the bond, either by his own signature, or that of his agent, or other person authorized to bind him. No person can be a principal in a bond, who has not sealed it, either by himself, or by some person authorized to do it for him. If the bond be executed by a third person, in the character of owner or consignee, he is the principal, though he be not in truth the owner or consignee. If the factor make the entry in his own name, the bond will, of course, be in his own name, and he will be the principal; if made in the name of the owner or consignee, he in whose name it is made, will be the principal, if the bond be executed by or for him. But if he be not the obligor, he cannot be principal.

This is an action of debt; and the first count in the declaration states, that Robert Denison executed the bond by Edward Denison, his agent or factor. Now, in point of fact, the bond was not given by Robert Denison; because it was neither signed and sealed by him, nor by his agent or attorney for him. The second count states, that the bond was given by Edward Denison and the sureties, for and at the instance of Robert Denison. If so, it is not the bond of Robert Denison, but of those who executed it. But a complete answer to both counts is, that the bond was executed, not by an agent or factor, but by the consignee of the goods; who, as to all the purposes of the act, is to be considered as the owner; no parallel can be drawn between this case and that of an insurance effected in England by an agent. The statute directs, that the name of the agent shall be stated in the policy; but, it is not necessary that his character of agent should also be stated. But, in this case the preference is given against the principal in the bond, and the only inquiry is, who is principal. It is contended, that the not entering the name of Robert Denison, was a mistake of the public officer. In the first place, I do not agree that it was a mistake; because, Edward Denison being the consignee, he was properly the principal in the bond. But, if it were a mistake, it cannot be rectified on this side of the court; and, if the plaintiff were to seek relief on the other side, he would be told that equality is equity; and chancery will not cure a defect at law, in order to violate one of its favourite maxims. The decision of this point, renders it unnecessary to consider the other points made by the defendant's counsel. Judgment for defendant.

CHILDS v. SOMERSET & K. R. CO.

[Brunner, Col. Cas. 593;[1] 20 Law Rep. 561.]

Circuit Court, D. Maine. 1857.

PRACTICE—VERDICT, WHEN SET ASIDE AS BEING AGAINST EVIDENCE — CONTRACT—EXTRA WORK RECOVERABLE ON IMPLIED ASSUMPSIT.

1. This court will not set aside a verdict as being against the evidence, unless it can see that the jury, in coming to their result, were influenced by passion or prejudice, or unwittingly fell into a plain mistake.

2. The plaintiff, by special contract, agreed to build certain bridges and depots for the defendant corporation, for which he was to be paid partly in cash and partly in shares of their capital stock. In the progress of the enterprise it became necessary to do much extra work and furnish materials not provided for in the special contract. Held, that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the whole value in money of the extra work and materials thus furnished, upon an implied assumpsit, and that the agreement to take pay in shares did not extend to this part of the job.

At law. This was an action of assumpsit, in which the plaintiff [Enoch L. Childs] declared specially on two contracts in writing, whereby he agreed to build the bridges and depots on the line of the defendant's railroad, and also in a general count for work, labor, and materials. The contract provided, that he was to be paid for the bridges the sum of one hundred and three thousand dollars, twenty-five thousand dollars whereof was to be paid in shares of the capital stock of the corporation, and the residue in money. The payments were to be made monthly, upon certificates of the engineer of the proportion of the contract price earned during the preceding month, eighty per cent of such certified amounts being paid within ten days after the presentation of each certificate, and the remaining twenty per cent on the completion of the entire work. The depots were to be paid for wholly in money, at an agreed price for the whole work, upon similar monthly estimates. In the progress of the work it was ascertained, that it was necessary to rebuild one of the spans of one of the bridges, and to elevate it, to permit the public to use the river, and their contract was made touching such new work, for which the plaintiff was to be paid a fixed sum, seventy-five per centum in money and the residue in stock. The plaintiff alleged and offered evidence tending to prove that he had performed all these contracts, and had done a large amount of extra work upon, and furnished many materials for, the bridges and depots, not provided for by either of the contracts, and for which he was entitled to recover upon the general count for work, labor, and materials. The jury were instructed that he had a right to recover as upon a quantum meruit, for any work and materials done and provided which were not embraced within either of the contracts; and the question occurring whether he was to be paid therefor wholly in money, or partly in money and partly in stock, it was agreed that the jury might find the amount, if any, which the plaintiff might be entitled to recover, and the value of the stock at the time it was demanded, and the court should afterwards decide whether the extra work and materials were to be paid wholly in money, and amend the verdict accordingly. The jury having so found, the plaintiff moved to amend the verdict, and also for a new trial, because the jury had fixed the value of the stock at only twenty-five per cent of the par value, which, it was insisted, was contrary to the evidence.

E. R. Hoar and C. T. Russell, for plaintiff.

Lot M. Morrill and H. W. Paine, for defendants.

'CURTIS, Circuit Justice. The rule followed by this court in respect to setting aside verdicts as being against the evidence is entirely settled. It requires the court to see that the jury, in coming to their result, were influenced by passion or prejudice, or unwittingly fell into a plain mistake. They were instructed that the burthen of proof was on the plaintiff to satisfy them what the market value of this stock was at the time he demanded it; and that they ought not to fix its price at any greater sum than it appeared upon the evidence, to their reasonable satisfaction, it could have been purchased for, at the time of the demand, which, according to the evidence, was in the autumn of 1855. I do not understand that this instruction is complained of as incorrect in point of law.

The only evidence respecting the market value of the stock was, that in his contract of June 3, 1853, the plaintiff agreed to take, in part payment for his work, two hundred and fifty shares of the stock at its par value; and that he made a similar agreement in 1854, when he rebuilt and elevated the single span of the bridge at Augusta. The plaintiff, who was a witness, states that he had pledged some of the stock at the rate of eighty-five dollars per share, and afterwards some at fifty dollars a share; that he sold some at sixty-five dollars a share, and exchanged some for other property at a price not fixed. The dates of neither of these transactions were stated, but it appeared they were some considerable time before the demand. It is argued that the agreements between the plaintiff and defendants, that he would take a large amount of this stock in part payment for his work, at its par value, is evidence that such was its market value, and it is no doubt true, that it has a tendency to prove that it was so at the dates when these agreements were made. But, considering the highly speculative character of railroad enterprises, which is so notorious, that I should hesitate to say that either the court or the jury must be presumed to be ignorant of it, I should feel some difficulty in declaring that in the absence of all other evidence, it was a presumption of law, that the shares continued to bear their par value after the lapse of about two years, and the completion of the road. But this question is not of practical importance now, because the evidence clearly showed that in this instance the shares did not maintain their par value. The only sale put in evidence was at sixty-five dollars in the hundred; and whether the entire cost of the road was then ascertained, did not appear. The estimated cost of the road was six hundred thousand dollars. The actual cost, exclusive of the plaintiff's claim for extra work, was seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars. It was originally intended to encumber the road with a debt of three hundred thousand dollars, and to raise from stockholders the remaining three hundred thousand dollars in money and work. In point of fact, only about two hundred thousand dollars was paid in by the stockholders. I think it must be admitted that on this state of the evidence, a very difficult task was imposed on the jury, when they were required to assess the value of this stock on a given day in the autumn of 1855. It would not have been surprising if they had said, we have no satisfactory evidence by which we can fix the value at any particular sum; the plaintiff, on whom the burthen of proof is, has not shown us, with reasonable certainty, anything concerning it, and we cannot therefore allow more than a nominal value. If they had so found, it would have been difficult, to say the least, to disturb their verdict. Having, probably, that general knowledge and skill respecting the intrinsic as well as the saleable value of similar property, which a jury may be expected in some degree to possess, and the local knowledge of the country where the road is, which they also probably possessed, and applying them to the evidence in the case, they fixed the value at twenty-five per centum of the par value. I cannot say, upon the evidence, that they fell into a plain mistake in not fixing it at a greater sum; and the motion for a new trial must therefore be overruled.

As to the motion to add to the amount of the verdict, I think it should be allowed, and the verdict amended accordingly. At the trial a doubt occurred to me, whether the rule laid down in Pepper v. Burland, Peake, 139, and since followed in England and this country, that when a building contract has been departed from, and not abandoned, the contract is still to govern the price of the work done under it, so far as it can be traced and applied, might not entitle the defendants to pay for the extra work by stock, in the same proportion in which they were to pay for work under the contract in stock. In other words, whether the contract which the law implies, to pay for extra work, would not be a contract to pay for it in the same ways and by the same modes of payment as the other work was expressly agreed to be paid for. But after hearing counsel, and upon further reflection, I am satisfied the doubt was not well founded. The promise implied by the law, in such a case, is a promise to pay in money, what the extra work is reasonably worth; and is in no respect qualified or governed by the existence of a special contract for doing other work, however intimately the two kinds or amounts of work may, in fact, be connected together. The law cannot safely or consistently with sound principles imply any contract containing special stipulations as to the times and modes of payment. This case supplies an illustration of the difficulty of doing so. The amount of capital stock of the corporation was limited, and the value of each share depends upon the observance of such limitation. Both parties were willing to contract to give and receive a specific amount, for specific work. But it would be an unwarrantable assumption to imply from this a willingness to give or to receive an additional amount for additional work. The special contract has not been applied, in any case, so far as I know, to any work not done under it; and in Robson v. Godfrey, 1 Starkie, 275, 1 Holt, 236, Gibbs, C. J., refused to apply the terms of credit and mode of payment by a bill of exchange, to additional work not done under the special contract which provided for such credit and mode of payment. The verdict must therefore be amended by the addition of such sum as equals seventy-five per centum of the amount of stock found by the jury as due for the extra work.

CHILLICOTHE BRANCH OF STATE BANK OF OHIO v. FOX et al.

[3 Blatchf. 431.][1]

Circuit Court, N. D. New York. Jan. 29, 1856.

CORPORATIONS — POWERS — OFFICERS — ENDORSEMENT OF NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS—PROMISSORY NOTE—DEMAND OF MAKER—DEFENCES — MATURITY OF NOTE AFTER SUIT.

1. The usage is universal, for the presidents and cashiers of incorporated companies, acting as the executive officers and agents of such companies, to make in their behalf, endorsements and transfers of negotiable paper, by simply endorsing their names, with the additions of their titles of office.

2. Such an endorsement is sufficient to charge the corporation under whose authority the endorsement is made, and to transfer the note to the endorsee, so that he can maintain an action on it in his own name.

3. Where a note is payable "two years after date, on demand," it is not necessary, in an action against the maker, who is the principal debtor, to aver or prove any special demand.

4. Where a corporation, which has the right to do so, takes its own stock in payment of a debt due to it, it may, under general full power given to its directors to manage its business, sell such stock again; and a note taken by it on such sale is valid.

5. In an action by the endorsee of a note against its maker, if the maker fails to establish any defence to it as against the payee, he cannot claim that the endorsee is entitled to recover only so much of the note as is due from the payee to the endorsee.

6. A verdict for the full amount of a note upheld, where its full amount was due at the time of the verdict, although not due when the suit was commenced.

This was an action on a promissory note for $5,000, made by the defendants [Watson A. Fox and Elijah K. Bruce], payable "to the order of the Columbus Insurance Company, two years after date, on demand, with interest payable semi-annually." After a verdict for the plaintiffs [the Chillicothe Branch of the State Bank of Ohio], the defendants moved for a new trial, on a bill of exceptions. The facts in the case sufficiently appear in the opinion of the court.

HALL, District Judge. 1. It is insisted by the defendants' counsel, that there was no such endorsement and transfer of the note in suit, as to give to the plaintiffs, under the law merchant, the right to maintain an action upon the note in their own name.

The bill of exceptions states, that the plaintiffs, to maintain the issue on their part, proved (among other things) that the endorsement, "E. F. Drake, Presdt.," on the back of the note, was the genuine signature of the said E. F. Drake; that the said Drake, as such president, transferred the said note to the plaintiffs; that, at the time of the endorsement and delivery of the said note to the said plaintiffs, the said E. F. Drake was the president of the said the Columbus Insurance Company; and that such endorsement and transfer of the said note to the plaintiffs was made by the said Drake, as such president, by the authority and direction of the said Columbus Insurance Company. This, it is conceded by the defendants' counsel, shows a transfer and assignment of the note; but, it is contended that the endorsement was not, in terms, in the name of the insurance company, and that, therefore, the plaintiffs are not endorsees, so as to entitle them to sustain a suit on the note in their own name.

I confess I can see no force in this objection. The usage is universal, for the presidents and cashiers of incorporated companies, acting as the executive officers and agents of such companies, to make, in their behalf, endorsements and transfers of negotiable paper, by simply endorsing their names, with the additions of their titles of office. I cannot doubt that such an endorsement is sufficient to charge the corporation under whose authority the endorsement is made, and to transfer the note to the endorsee, so that the latter can maintain an action thereon in his own name. Folger v. Chase, 18 Pick. 63; Brockway v. Allen, 17 Wend. 40; Watervliet Bank v. White, 1 Denio, 608; Babcock v. Beman, 1 Kern. [11 N. Y.] 200. In this case, however, the transfer is fully admitted, and that, too, by an endorsement duly authorized. There certainly can be no reason for holding that the suit was improperly brought in the name of the endorsees.

2. It is insisted that the note on which the suit was brought is, by its terms, payable on demand, after two years; and that the special count in the declaration contains no allegation of a special demand of payment. The declaration contains the common money counts, with a copy of the note annexed, and the note was proper evidence under the money counts, even if a special demand was necessary. But I am inclined to think that no special demand was necessary. The makers of the note, as between them and the original payees of the note, and also as between them and the endorsees, were principal debtors; and, in such case, the general rule is, that no special demand is necessary. Nelson v. Bostwick, 5 Hill. 37.

3. It is insisted that the facts set up and proved by the defendants constitute a defence to the note. It appears, by the bill of exceptions, that the Columbus Insurance Company, to whom the note was given, had taken a considerable portion of their own stock in payment of debts due to them. This they had a clear right to do. Taylor v. Miami Exporting Co., 6 Ham. [Ohio] 218. This stock, so owned by the corporation, its directors had the right to sell and dispose of, for the benefit of the corporation. The stock was not extinguished or destroyed by the purchase thereof by the corporation. And, where a corporation becomes the owner of its stock, by purchase or forfeiture, the directors of such corporation, if they have, (as the directors of this insurance company had), full power to manage and conduct the affairs and business of the corporation, may sell such stock, and issue new certificates therefor; and notes taken for such stock are valid. The transaction between the defendants and the insurance company was, in substance and effect, nothing but a sale of such stock, although the resolutions of the directors expressed an intention to increase the stock and receive subscriptions therefor. This was, however, as the facts show, a misdescription of the real character of the transaction; and I can perceive no grounds upon which the validity of this note can be impeached in the hands of the insurance company or of their endorsees.

4. It is insisted that the facts stated in the bill of exceptions show that the plaintiffs, as against the insurance company, are at all events entitled to a portion only of the amount of the note, and that, therefore, they can recover in this suit only the amount to which they are entitled as against that company. This position is untenable. The plaintiffs, being the endorsees and legal holders of the note, are entitled to recover the whole amount due; and, if the whole does not equitably belong to the plaintiffs, they will hold what belongs to another, in trust for the party entitled thereto. With these equities, the defendants, having failed to establish any defence against the insurance company, have nothing to do.

5. It is insisted that, by the arrangement and resolutions under which the note was given, the whole amount of the note was not due and payable at the time the suit was commenced; and that the verdict should, therefore, have been for the amount actually due at the commencement of the suit, and for nothing more.

I am inclined to think that there is nothing in this objection. Upon the face of the note, the whole amount was due prior to the bringing of the suit, and, as the notice required by the terms of the resolutions and arrangement was actually given more than a year prior to the commencement of the suit, the whole amount was, I think, then demandable, under the arrangement referred to. At all events, it was all demandable at the time of the trial; and, as this objection goes only against the amount of damages recovered, and could only be available when the resolutions and arrangement were set up and proved by the defendants, I do not see how it can now prevent judgment upon the verdict.

If the whole amount had not been due at the time the suit was commenced, and the defendants had previously tendered, and then, under a plea of tender, brought into court, the amount actually due, or if, after the suit was commenced, the defendants had offered to pay the amount actually due and costs, and had then applied for a stay of proceedings, the objection might have been effectually urged. But, as the plaintiffs were, at the time of the verdict, entitled to the whole amount of the note, and the question is one simply as to the quantum of damages, I do not think a new trial ought to be granted on that account, even if the whole amount was not due when the suit was commenced.

It was objected that the exception was insufficient to raise this question, but, in the view I have taken of the case, this objection need not be considered. The motion for a new trial is denied, with costs.

Circuit Court, D. Ohio. July Term, 1848.

EJECTMENT OF PATENTEE — OCCUPYING CLAIMANT —COMPENSATION FOR IMPROVEMENTS.

1. An entry of land within the Virginia military district of Ohio, and a survey of the same before the extinguishment of the Indian title, is made void by certain acts of congress.

2. A person having such a claim is entitled, having a patent, to compensation for his improvements such as the occupying claimant law, he having acted in good faith.

Mr. Stanton, for plaintiff.

Mr. Lawrence, for defendant.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This is an ejectment to recover possession of a tract of land in the Virginia military district, between the Little Miami river and the Scioto. The lessor of the plaintiff claims under a patent dated 30th of January, 1827. The entry was made in July, 1819, and the survey was executed in 1821. The defendant's patent was dated 14th of April, 1806. His entry was made 16th of November, 1798, and the survey was executed 2d of April, 1799. The entry, survey and patent, under which the defendant claims, being of older date than the patent under which the lessor of the plaintiff claims, the counsel allege that the entry, survey and patent of the defendant were void, as the entry was made on the land whilst it was Indian Territory. By the proclamation of congress, at Princeton, the 12th September, 1783, "all persons were prohibited from making settlements on lands inhabited or claimed by Indians, without the limit or jurisdiction of any particular state, and from purchasing or receiving any gift or cession of such lands or claims, without the express authority and direction of the United States in congress assembled." By the act of the 3d of March, 1793, it is made a penal offense to treat with any Indians for the purchase of land. The same penalty is imposed, a thousand dollars, on any one who, without a license, shall settle upon the public lands by the act of 19th May, 1796. By the intercourse act of the 30th of March, 1802, and 5th section [2 Stat. 141], that any person who shall make a settlement upon Indian lands, and who shall survey or attempt to survey such lands, or designate any of the boundaries by marking trees, or otherwise, shall forfeit a sum not exceeding one thousand dollars, and be imprisoned not exceeding twelve months. By the Indian treaty at the rapids of the Maumee, on the 29th September, 1817, a large tract of land was ceded to the United States, within which the land in controversy was situated. It seems, then, that any entry made within this territory prior to the above cession was prohibited by law, and, of course, no right could be acquired against law. The court, therefore instructed the jury to this effect.

The jury found defendants guilty, etc. On motion, the court held that the defendant was entitled to relief under the occupying claimant law.

ACTION ON PROMISSORY NOTE—PLEADING—INTEREST—SPLITTING UP CAUSE OF ACTION—MERGER OF CAUSE OF ACTION IN JUDGMENT.

1. Interest need not be demanded in the declaration, nor its payment negatived in the breach.

2. The uniform practice is to declare for the debt alone, and interest is recoverable as damages.

3. Interest payable by the stipulation of the parties before the contract falls due, is a part of the contract, and the effect of a failure to demand and negative its payment, is that the plaintiff can only recover the debt and interest from the maturity of the note.

4. On a contract containing various undertakings, the plaintiff complaining of the breach of one, thereby waives any right as to the others.

5. A plaintiff is not allowed to split up various covenants or promises contained in one contract, and sue upon them separately, but he can have but one recovery, and the contract becomes merged in the judgment of the court.

[At law. Action by Richard H. Chinn against Robert Hamilton, executor of Samuel P. Carson, deceased.]

A. Fowler, for plaintiff.

Albert Pike and D. J. Baldwin, for defendant.

JOHNSON, District Judge. This is an action of debt upon a promissory note by which the testator, Samuel P. Carson, acknowledged himself indebted to Brander, McKenna & Wright, in the sum of $3,919.53, to be paid one day after the date thereof, with interest thereon at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum, from the date thereof until final payment, for value received, which promissory note has been assigned by Brander, McKenna & Wright to the plaintiff. In his declaration the plaintiff demands the sum of $3,919.53, and assigns as a breach the nonpayment of the said sum of $3,919.53, or any part thereof, and makes no averment in relation to the interest, and concludes the breach in these words: "To the damage of the plaintiff two thousand dollars." The defendant has filed a general demurrer to the declaration, and insists that it is substantially defective in omitting to aver the non-payment of the interest, as well as the failure to pay the original debt; and this is the only question presented by the demurrer.

In actions upon obligations, or promissory notes for the payment of money, containing no stipulation in regard to interest, it has not been deemed necessary to demand in the declaration the interest that may be due, nor to negative its payment in the assignment of breaches. The uniform and settled practice is to declare for the debt alone, and interest is recovered as damages for its detention. Upon a failure to pay money at the time it becomes due, the creditor is justly and legally entitled to be remunerated by the debtor, the damages he has sustained by the fault of the debtor. The law has declared the amount of these damages, and fixed them at the rate of six per cent. per annum, and allowed the parties to the contract to vary this rate, so that in no case shall it exceed the rate of ten per cent. per annum upon the amount loaned or withheld. In lieu of the damages which the creditor would be entitled to recover for the unjust detention of the debt the law has given interest; and although the law denominates it interest, it is in fact the damages which the creditor has sustained. He is, therefore, always allowed to recover the interest due at the rendition of the judgment, as damages for the detention of the debt. But in cases where the parties stipulate in the contract for the payment of interest, before the debt falls due, the interest cannot be regarded in the light of damages, but constitutes a part of the contract itself. The interest in this case accrues by the stipulations of the contract, and not as a legal consequence of its breach. It cannot be in the nature of damages, for it arises before any infraction of the contract or failure to perform it.

In the case at bar the plaintiff in his declaration has demanded the original debt alone, and damages for its detention. Is the declaration defective in omitting to claim the interest due him by the contract before the debt itself became due? I think not; the promise to pay the debt, and the promise to pay interest from the date of the contract, are two separate and distinct promises or undertakings,—one may be performed without performing the other. In declaring upon a covenant or a parol contract in writing containing various undertakings, the plaintiff has his election to complain of the breach of one or of all of the covenants or promises. If he complains of the breach or nonperformance of one only of the covenants or promises, he thereby admits that the others have been performed. The intendment is to be made most strongly against the pleader, and as he complains of the breach of only one of the covenants or obligations, the presumption arises that the others have been performed. It at all events waives any right of action upon them; for, having sued upon the contract once, he is for ever barred from suing again. It will not be allowed to split up the various covenants or promises contained in one contract, and sue upon each of them; he can have but one recovery upon one contract, which then becomes merged in the judgment of the court.

If the foregoing remarks are well founded, the declaration is not defective. Can the plaintiff in this case recover interest after the debt became due; and if he can, at what rate? He is entitled to recover interest, as damages for the detention of the money after it became due, and where the contract is silent the law fixes the rate at six per cent. per annum; but when the contract fixes the rate not exceeding ten per cent. the law declares that to be the rate. In this case the contract is set out in the declaration and fixes the rate of interest at ten per cent. per annum, consequently the plaintiff is entitled to recover interest at the rate of ten per cent. per annum. The fact that the parties have agreed upon the rate of interest, does not change the nature of interest after the debt becomes due, but it is still justly regarded in the nature of damages for the failure to pay at the time stipulated by the parties. Demurrer overruled.

CHISHOLM v. MONTGOMERY.

[2 Woods, 584.][1]

Circuit Court, M. D. Alabama. May Term, 1875.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — POWERS — ISSUE OF BONDS — TAXATION — SUBSCRIPTION TO PLANK-ROAD COMPANY.

1. The power to issue commercial securities, the consideration of which cannot be inquired into in the hands of a bona fide holder, is not inherent in municipal corporations, nor can it be implied from the ordinary police powers given to such corporations.

2. A municipal corporation is but a subordinate branch of the government; it represents the state sovereignty in a limited district for specified purposes, which are local government and police.

[Cited in Lewis v. Shreveport, Case No. 8,331.]

3. The power of taxation is given to municipal corporations as a means of carrying out these purposes, and a diversion of the revenues to other purposes is unlawful and ultra vires.

[Cited in Lewis v. Shreveport, Case No. 8,331.]

4. A municipal corporation possesses no powers except such as are given expressly or by necessary implication.

5. Such a corporation has no power, without express authority, to subscribe to the stock of a railroad or plankroad company.

[Cited in Desmond v. City of Jefferson, 19 Fed. 486.]

6. A municipal corporation was authorized by a special act to borrow a specified sum of money, and issue its bonds therefor; the money was borrowed and bonds issued accordingly. Held, that the power was thereby exhausted and became extinct.

[Cited in Hopper v. Town of Covington, 8 Fed. 779.]

7. A municipal corporation, without authority of law, subscribed for stock in a plankroad company, and issued its negotiable securities in payment thereof. Held, that it was not estopped by the resolutions of the city council, the acts of its officers, or by the negotiable form or other matter appearing upon the face of the bonds, from denying the authority of its officers to pledge the faith of the city in aid of the said road, or to issue the said bonds.

[Cited in Lewis v. County Com'rs, 3 Fed. 196.]

8. The fact that plaintiffs are bona fide holders of bonds issued by a municipal corporation is not a good reply to a plea setting up the want of power in the corporation to issue them.

This was an action at law brought [by Robert T. Chisholm] upon ten bonds for five hundred dollars each, purporting to have been issued by the city of Montgomery. The defense was the want of power in the city to contract the debt for which the bonds were given, and to issue the bonds. There was no dispute between the parties about the facts in the case, and an agreed statement of the same was submitted to the court. From this the following facts appeared: The charter of the city of Montgomery became a law on the 23d day of December, 1837, and by it there was conferred upon the city authorities the usual powers granted to municipal corporations, among which were the power to clean and keep in repair the streets and alleys, and to enact such laws and regulations as might be deemed necessary in relation to the streets and highways; also the power to do every other matter and thing which they might deem necessary for the good order and welfare of the city. On February 2, 1846, express power was conferred on the city, by an act of the legislature, to raise a sum of money, not exceeding seventy-five thousand dollars, by the sale of city bonds for that amount. This power was exercised. The bonds were immediately issued, and the money raised thereby was applied to the erection of a capitol building in the city of Montgomery. On the 2d day of February, 1850, the legislature chartered the Montgomery South Plankroad Company, with authority to "locate and construct a plankroad from the southern line of the city of Montgomery in a direct line south, as near as may be, crossing the Catoma creek at or near Norman's bridge, and extending south for thirty miles, and to receive from the authorities of any city or town in which said road might terminate, or through which it might run, the use of any street or streets for the location and construction of said road, and the municipal authorities of any such city or town were authorized to grant to said company the use of any street or streets for the purpose aforesaid." On February 22, 1850, the city council passed a resolution to subscribe twenty thousand dollars to the stock of this plankroad company; on September 12, 1850, the city council authorized the issue of the bonds of the city to pay for this stock, and they were issued on the 20th of the same month. They were negotiable in form, being payable to bearer in fifteen years after date. They were delivered by the city to the plankroad company, and were by it sold as stock securities in the market of Charleston, South Carolina, through brokers, at prices ranging from ninety to one hundred cents on the dollar. The bonds in suit are a part of said issue, and were bought by the plaintiff at par, in due course of trade, in December, 1850, before maturity of the bonds or any of the coupons attached thereto, and the plaintiff was the bona fide holder and owner of the bonds sued on by him. After the subscription of stock by the city, the plankroad company commenced work on its road, and constructed it from the Exchange Hotel, in the central business part of the city of Montgomery, running thence across the south line of the city to a point distant twenty miles, the city council having first granted to the plankroad company the right of way along Montgomery street from the said hotel to the city limits. Interest was paid by the plankroad company on some of the bonds, so issued, up to January 1, 1855, and on others by the city up to January 1, 1858, and the stock purchased by the issue of the bonds was represented by the city in the control and management of the plankroad company. After January 1, 1858, no payment was made upon the bonds on account either of interest or principal. By an act of the general assembly, approved February 25, 1860, passed at the instance of the city council, it was authorized to "extend" the said bonds by an issue of new bonds running ten years, provided that at an election, held for that purpose, a majority of the real estate owners in the city should vote in favor of "extension;" but if a majority should vote against "extension," then the law was to have no force or effect whatever. The election was held under this act, and fifty-seven votes were cast for "extension," and one hundred and five against "extension." After the result of the election was made known, the city council resolved, that said bonds, in the hands of bona fide holders "are a just and honorable liability of the city, and as such, some provision should be made for their payment." The parties waived a jury and submitted the cause to the court upon the pleadings and agreed facts.

John T. Morgan, Walter L. Bragg, and Wm. S. Thorington, for plaintiff.

I. The defendant had power, under its charter, to make and issue the bonds: 1. Its powers relating to streets and highways were unrestrained and unlimited. Within the scope of these powers the city was its own judge of what property it would acquire, what streets it would have and how it would improve them. Ely v. Rochester, 26 Barb. 133; Inhabitants v. New Orleans, 14 La. Ann. 452; Royalton v. Royalton & W. Turnpike Co., 14 Vt. 322, 323; Callender v. Marsh, 1 Pick. 418; Graves v. Otis, 2 Hill, 466; Waddell v. Mayor, etc., of New York, 8 Barb. 95; Smith v. Washington, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 135. 2. To carry into effect these express powers, the power to borrow money and issue bonds is clearly implied. Mills v. Gleason, 11 Wis. 470; People v. Brennan, 39 Barb. 522; New York v. Buffalo, 2 Hill, 434; State v. Common Council of Madison, 7 Wis. 688. 3. In the exercise of these powers, the city had the same power to contract and bind itself that any other corporation, public or private, would have. Ang. & A. Corp. (9th Ed.) § 31; Atkins v. Randolph, 31 Vt. 237, 238; New England F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Robinson, 25 Ind. 536; Brady v. Mayor of Brooklyn, 1 Barb. 584; Madison Plankroad Co. v. Watertown Plankroad Co., 5 Wis. 173; Allegheny City v. McClurkan, 14 Pa. St. 81. 4. A plankroad is an improved highway, a public improvement, which comes within the rule of being "indispensable to the public interest and successful pursuit of even local business." Mitchell v. Burlington, 4 Wall. [71 U. S.] 274; Rogers v. Burlington, 3 Wall. [70 U. S.] 663. To authorize aid to such an improved highway, it is not necessary that it should even come within the city limits; it is sufficient if it be connected with the material interests of the city. Talbot v. Dent, 9 B. Mon. 535, 536. 5. In giving construction to the powers of a corporation, the language of the charter should, in general, be construed neither strictly nor liberally, but according to its fair and natural import with reference to the purpose and objects of the corporation. Enfield Toll Bridge Co. v. Hartford & N. H. R. Co., 17 Conn. 454; Cincinnati v. Stone, 5 Ohio St. 39; Downing v. Mt. Washington Road Co., 40 N. H. 230. The power to issue the bonds in this case was unmistakable, for a portion of the plankroad was built within the city limits and along one of its streets.

II. The bonds and coupons, by universal consent, have all the qualities of commercial paper (Mercer Co. v. Hackett, 1 Wall. [68 U. S.] 83; Meyer v. Muscatine, Id. 384; Aurora City v. West, 7 Wall. [74 U. S.] 105); and when a corporation has power, under any circumstances, to issue negotiable securities, the bona fide holder has the right to presume that they were issued under the circumstances which gave the requisite authority (Gelpcke v. City of Dubuque, 1 Wall. [68 U. S.] 203; Murray v. Lardner, 2 Wall. [69 U. S.] 110). The case is brought within the scope of this rule by the act of February 2, 1846, authorizing the city to issue bonds for seventy-five thousand dollars.

III. After the issue of the bonds the legislature, by the act of February 25, 1860, authorizing an extension of the bonds upon a vote of the real estate owners of the city in favor thereof, recognized the bonds as being the bonds of the city and ratified their issue. 1. The proof shows that the act was passed at the instance of the city council. It was a matter of sovereign discretion with the legislature whether or not it would recognize this bonded liability of the city as a debt, and thereby ratify it, and the court will presume that legislative discretion, in a case where it properly exists, has been properly exercised. Cooley, Const. Lim. 186, 187; People v. New York Cent. R. Co., 34 Barb. 137; People v. Lawrence, 36 Barb. 193; Mayor of Baltimore v. State, 15 Md. 376. 2. The subject matter of the act necessarily included by expression as well as direct implication the power exercised by the city in issuing the bonds. 3. Whenever a statute is passed in furtherance of an acknowledged principle of right and justice, every reason exists for its most liberal application. Hoffman v. Hoffman, 26 Ala. 545; Wolcott v. Pond, 19 Conn. 597. 4. A loan or subscription, if made without authority, is valid if confirmed by subsequent legislative authority. Bridgeport v. Housatonic Ry. Co., 15 Conn. 495; Campbell v. Kenosha, 5 Wall. [72 U. S.] 194–205; Atchison v. Butcher, 3 Kan. 104; Watson v. Mercer, 8 Pet. [33 U. S.] 38; Nutter v. Ricketts, 6 Iowa, 92; Bartholomew Co. v. Bright, 18 Ind. 93; Thomas v. Leland, 24 Wend. 65; Guilford v. Cornell, 18 Barb. 615; Thompson v. Lee Co., 3 Wall. [70 U. S.] 327; Town of Guilford v. Supervisors of Chenango Co., 13 N. Y. 143; Brewster v. Syracuse, 19 N. Y. 116. 5. What is implied is as effectual as what is expressed. Croxall v. Sherrard, 5 Wall. [72 U. S.] 283; U. S. v. Babbitt, 1 Black [66 U. S.] 61; Haight v. Holley, 3 Wend. 258; Stowel v. Zouch, 1 Plow. 366. 6. A ratification, whether express or implied, is equivalent to an original authority. Kenosha v. Lampson, 9 Wall. [76 U. S.] 478; Beloit v. Morgan, 7 Wall. [74 U. S.] 619; Campbell v. Kenosha, 5 Wall. [72 U. S.] 194. 7. A contract originally void may be made binding by an act of the legislature. Wilkinson v. Leland, 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 627.

IV. Independent of the mere contract set out in the agreed facts, the plaintiff has the right to recover. By its transactions the city incurred liabilities which the law will enforce. 1. If a county obtains the money or property of others without authority, the law, independent of any statute, will compel restitution or compensation. Marsh v. Fulton Co., 10 Wall. [77 U. S.] 684; Maher v. Chicago, 38 Ill. 266–273; Gas Co. v. San Francisco, 9 Cal. 469, 473. 2. The legal effect of the city's transaction, as set out in the agreed facts, was a loan of money for which the bonds sold by the plaintiff to the city were issued. Rogers v. Burlington, 3 Wall. [70 U. S.] 666, 667. The plaintiff can, therefore, recover on his count for money loaned.

John A. Elmore and Wm. A. Gunter, for defendant.

I. The city had no power to issue the bonds: 1. When a power, exercised by the officers or agents of a municipal corporation, is not expressly given by the charter, and is not necessary and proper to carry out the purposes of the incorporation, the corporation is not bound. It is unnecessary to cite authorities on this point. 2. When the power is given, but the charter requires it to be exercised by particular persons or bodies, or in a specified mode, or for a specified purpose, if not so exercised, the act is as much ultra vires and void as if the power had not been conferred. Zottman v. San Francisco, 20 Cal. 96; McSpedon v. Mayor of New York, 7 Bosw. 601; City of Leavenworth v. Rankin, 2 Kan. 351; Butler v. Charlestown, 7 Gray, 12; Mayor of Baltimore v. Eschbach, 18 Md. 276; The Floyd Acceptances, 7 Wall. [74 U. S.] 666; Head v. Insurance Co., 2 Cranch [6 U. S.] 127; White v. New Orleans, 15 La. Ann. 667; Dey v. Jersey City, 19 N. J. Eq. 412; Baltimore v. Reynolds, 20 Md. 1; Bank of U. S. v. Dandridge, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 64; Diggle v. Railway Co., 5 Exch. 442; Homersham v. Wolverhampton Waterworks Co., 4 Eng. Law & Eq. 426; Trustees v. Cherry, 8 Ohio St. 564; McCracken v. San Francisco, 16 Cal. 591; Argenti v. San Francisco, Id. 255; Pimental v. San Francisco, 21 Cal. 351; Peterson v. Mayor, etc., New York, 17 N. Y. 449. 3. There is a class of cases in which it has been held that when a power is given to be exercised by certain persons upon prerequisites to be ascertained by them and they exercise the power, a holder for value of negotiable securities issued thereunder need not go behind the authority. But in all cases of this class there was express legislative authority to issue the bonds upon certain conditions, and they were issued by the body entrusted with the power to do so, and with the power of determining that the conditions had been complied with. Of this class are the following cases: Commissioners of Knox Co. v. Aspinwall, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 544; Bissell v. Jeffersonville, 24 How. [65 U. S.] 287; Moran v. Commissioners of Miami Co., 2 Black [67 U. S.] 723; Mercer Co. v. Hackett, 1 Wall. [68 U. S.] 85; Gelpcke v. Dubuque, Id. 175; Van Hostrup v. Madison City, Id. 271; Rogers v. Burlington, 3 Wall. [70 U. S.] 654; Supervisors v. Schenck, 5 Wall. [72 U. S.] 783; Lee County v. Rogers, 7 Wall. [74 U. S.] 181. 4. A distinction must be drawn between the cases of municipal and private corporations. The officers of a private corporation may, under certain circumstances, without authority, or even against positive instructions, bind the corporation. Farmers' & Mechanics' Bank v. Butchers' & Drovers' Bank, 14 N. Y. 623; Merchants' Bank v. State Bank, 10 Wall. [77 U. S.] 604. On the other hand, all persons who deal with a public corporation, or its officers, are bound at their peril to know whether the act done by its officers is authorized or not, or has been exercised as required by the terms of the charter. Brady v. Mayor, etc., of New York, 20 N. Y. 312; City of Leavenworth v. Rankin, 2 Kan. 357-371; Swift v. Williamsburg, 24 Barb. 427; Halstead v. Mayor, etc., 3 N. Y. 430; Marsh v. Fulton Co., 10 Wall. [77 U. S.] 676; Horn v. Baltimore, 30 Md. 218; Bridgeport v. Housatonic R. Co., 15 Conn. 475; Haynes v. Covington, 13 Smedes & M. 408; Taft v. Pittsford, 28 Vt. 286; Steam Nav. Co. v. Dandridge, 8 Gill & J. 248; Hodges v. Buffalo, 2 Denio, 110; Dill v. Inhabitants of Wareham, 7 Metc. [Mass.] 438; Branham v. San Jose, 24 Cal. 585; Sturtevants v. Alton [Case No. 13,580]; Wallace v. San Jose, 29 Cal. 180; State v. Haskell, 20 Iowa, 276. 5. The city charter gave no power to the city authorities to subscribe to the stock of a plank-road company, and to issue bonds therefor. (a) A special authority to borrow money, when once exercised, is exhausted. Savings Bank v. Winchester, 8 Allen, 109. (b) The power of a corporation can never be extended by construction beyond the object of its creation. Cooley, Const. Lim. 195, note 2; Pearce v. Madison & I. R. Co., 21 How. [62 U. S.] 441.

II. The bonds, having been issued without authority, are void in the hands of all persons. Marsh v. Fulton Co., 10 Wall. [77 U. S.] 676; Clay v. Nicholas Co. Ct., 4 Bush, 154; Logansport v. Legg, 20 Ind. 315; Pimental v. San Francisco, 21 Cal. 351; Price v. Grand Rapids & I. R. Co., 13 Ind. 58; State v. Bergen, 33 N. J. Law, 39.

III. There has been no ratification of these bonds. 1. Where contracts are ratified the ratification must be by a person or body having the power to ratify. Delafield v. Illinois, 2 Hill, 159; Hotchin v. Kent, 8 Mich. 526; Marsh v. Fulton Co., 10 Wall. [77 U. S.] 676; Dubuque Female College v. District Tp., 13 Iowa, 555; Estey v. Inhabitants of Westminster, 97 Mass. 324. 2. If the act be without the scope of the corporate authorities, no sort of ratification by them can make it good. Peterson v. Mayor, etc., of New York, 17 N. Y. 449; Brady v. Mayor, etc., 20 N. Y. 313; Hodges v. Buffalo, 2 Denio, 110; Gates v. Hancock, 45 N. H. 528; Reilly v. Philadelphia, 60 Pa. St. 467; Hood v. New York & N. H. R. Co., 22 Conn. 502; State v. Commissioners, 11 Ohio St. 183; Hopple v. Brown Township, 13 Ohio St. 311. 3. The act of the legislature authorizing an "extension" of the bonds on a condition therein specified was no ratification of the bonds. (a) The act was to take effect upon a condition that never happened. (b) The city of Montgomery before the passage of the act was no more liable for these bonds than if they had never been made. To create a liability on the bonds by statute would be to make a contract between the parties—a matter beyond the power of legislation. Hoke v. Henderson, 4 Dev. 15; People v. Haws, 37 Barb. 440; Hasbrouck v. Milwaukee, 13 Wis. 37; Medford v. Learned, 16 Mass. 215.

IV. The plaintiff cannot recover on the common counts. When a contract is void because entered into by a corporation in violation of or without authority of its charter, the party can neither recover upon the contract nor upon any implied liability in any form. Brady v. Mayor, etc., 20 N. Y. 317; Hodges v. Buffalo, 2 Denio, 110; Halstead v. Mayor, etc., 3 N. Y. 430; Boom v. Utica, 2 Barb. 104; Grogan v. San Francisco, 18 Cal. 590; Swift v. Williamsburg, 24 Barb. 427.

BRADLEY, Circuit Justice. This action was brought to recover the amount of certain bonds and coupons thereto attached, issued by the corporate authorities of the city of Montgomery in the years 1850 and 1852, to aid in the construction of the Montgomery South Plankroad, and the Montgomery and Wetumpka Plankroad respectively, extending from points within said city to certain points several miles outside of its bounds.

The main question raised in the case is, whether the city authorities had any legal authority or power to issue said bonds. If they had, it is admitted that the plaintiffs are bona fide holders thereof, and entitled to recover; if they had not, no recovery can be had. The original charter of the city was an act of the legislature of Alabama, passed December 23, 1837, which remained without material alteration, so far as the question involved in this case is concerned, until the bonds in question were issued. A careful examination of this charter does not disclose any authority to make or issue bonds or other commercial securities of a negotiable character. It confers upon the corporation the ordinary police powers which are given to municipal bodies—such as the power to pass by-laws and ordinances necessary and proper to prevent contagious and infectious diseases, to preserve the public health, to prevent and remove nuisances, to license and regulate shows and theatrical amusements, to restrain gaming, to establish night watches and patrol, to make, alter and regulate streets, to regulate the wharves, to erect and regulate markets, the conveyance of water, etc.

In 1846, a special act was passed authorizing the city council to raise seventy-five thousand dollars by the issue of bonds to that amount; which was immediately done, and the money was applied to the erection of the state capitol in said city. The power was exhausted and became extinct. This very act, however, shows the public sense as to the incapacity of the city to issue bonds without special authority. The mode pointed out in the charter for raising revenues to meet the public expenditures was by taxation. Indebtedness incurred by the authorities at any time, in carrying out any of the prescribed objects of the charter, is undoubtedly binding on the city; but such indebtedness, and the ordinary certificates or vouchers given as evidence thereof, stand on a very different ground from that of commercial securities issued by the city officials, the consideration of which cannot be inquired into in the hands of a bona fide holder, and which might be issued to an extent involving the financial ruin of the city. It is the latter species of securities for the issue of which no authority can be found in the charter; and the power to issue these is not implied from the ordinary police powers given to a municipal corporation. Mayor v. Ray, 19 Wall. [86 U. S.] 468. In the next place, the charter contains no authority to aid or subscribe for stock in private corporations created for constructing works of internal improvement. The bonds in question were issued for this purpose, as is shown by a printed memorandum in their margin.

A municipal corporation is but a subordinate branch of the government; it represents the state sovereignty in a limited district and for specified purposes. Those purposes are local government and police. The power of taxation is granted as a means of carrying out these purposes. The diversion of these revenues to other purposes is unlawful and ultra vires. If it is desirable that a municipal body should have the power of subscribing to railroads or plankroads, or of issuing commercial securities to be sold in the financial markets, it is time enough for it to do so when authorized thereto by legislation. It possesses no powers but such as are given to it expressly or by necessary implication. These views were recently expressed by the supreme court of the United States in the case of Mayor v. Ray, 19 Wall. [86 U. S.] 468, and substantially the same conclusion was reached by the supreme court of Alabama in the case of Montgomery v. Montgomery & W. Plankroad Co., 31 Ala. 84. The ruinous extravagance and demoralization which have resulted from the possession of unlimited powers of expenditure and issue of bonds by municipal bodies all over the country, evince the wisdom of these decisions. My attention has been called to the charter of the plankroad companies in whose aid the bonds were issued; but I find nothing in them to supply the fundamental defect of want of power to grant the aid and issue the bonds in question. Reference has also been made to an act passed in 1860, authorizing the city council to issue new bonds in the place and in extension of the issues of which the bonds in suit form a part, provided the owners of real estate resident in the city should vote consent thereto. But the vote was adverse to such reissue, and the law does not, if it could, cure the original defect of power in the issue of the bonds.

The plea that the city is estopped by the acts of its officers, by the resolutions of the city council, or by the negotiable form or other matter in the bonds themselves, from denying the authority of such officers to pledge the faith of the city in aid of said plankroads, and to issue the bonds in question, cannot be maintained. Public officers cannot acquire authority by declaring that they have it. They cannot thus shut the mouth of the public whom they represent. The officers and agents of private corporations, entrusted by them with the management of their own business and property, may estop their principals and subject them to the consequences of their unauthorized acts. But the body politic cannot be thus silenced by the acts or declarations of its agents. If it could be, unbounded scope would be given to the peculations and frauds of public officers. I hold it to be a sound proposition, that no municipal or political body can be estopped by the acts or declarations of its officers, from denying their authority to bind it. The Floyd Acceptances, 7 Wall. [74 U. S.] 666.

Finally the plea that the plaintiffs are bona fide holders of the bonds cannot avail where the defense is want of power to issue them. Of this defect the plaintiffs were bound to take notice. Had the power to issue the bonds existed, and had the question been, whether certain preliminary conditions had been complied with, the plea might, under certain circumstances, have been a good one. No doubt the plaintiffs in these cases are meritorious holders of the bonds; and no doubt there are considerations of equity in their favor; and perhaps it is to be regretted that the citizens of Montgomery did not, in their own vindication, under the act of 1860, vote for a reissue and extension of the bonds. An eminent citizen,[2] who was called upon, nearly twenty years ago, to investigate the rights of the parties holding these bonds, speaking for himself and a committee of which he was chairman, forcibly observed: "That the principles of common honesty, as well as a just regard for the credit of the city, demand that immediate provision should be made for the payment of the interest in arrear," etc., and he further observed: "The committee is aware that the authority of the city council in the issue of these bonds is questionable; that it is doubtful if such issue constitutes any valid legal obligation on the city; but as it was done in accordance with the deliberately expressed wishes of a large majority of the real estate holders of the city, and as they would have derived the principal benefit in the increased value of their property, had the enterprise to promote which the bonds were issued proved successful, they do not doubt under such circumstances, that the same property holders who united in recommending the issue and loan will most cheerfully submit to the slight increase of taxation which is proposed." Unfortunately, these anticipations have not, thus far, been realized; and the court, under the view of the law which I have been compelled to take, is powerless to afford relief. There must be a finding and judgment for the defendant.

Case No. 2,687.

In re CHISOLM et al.

[8 Ben. 242.][1]

District Court, S. D. New York. Oct., 1875.

EQUITABLE LIEN—TRUST AND TRUSTEE.

1. Certain real estate in Georgia was conveyed to Edward Willis, as trustee, in trust to and for the sole and separate use, benefit and behoof of Elizabeth L. Willis, his wife, "for and during the term of her natural life, free from the debts, liabilities or contracts of her present or any future husband, with remainder at her death to her children then in life by the said Edward begotten; * * * but, should the said Elizabeth L. die, leaving no child or issue of a child by the said Edward begotten, then with remainder to the said Edward and his heirs in fee simple: provided always, that the trustee for the time being, may at any time, by deed, in which Elizabeth L. Willis voluntarily joins, sell and convey, mortgage, or exchange the premises aforesaid, re-investing the proceeds of such sale subject to the same uses and trusts." On May 30th, 1870, Willis, as trustee under the foregoing deed, joined with his wife in conveying the premises to one Rogers, for $3000 cash, and a note of Rogers for $3000. This note and $2715 of the $3000 cash were received by Willis, and were by him used for the benefit of the firm of Willis & Chisolm, of Charleston, S. C., of which he was a member. On June 30th, 1870, he delivered to his wife a deed of real estate, which had been executed by one Johnston to the firm, with this endorsement on the deed, made by him: "For value received, we hereby transfer all our right, title, and interest to Mrs. E. L. Willis, to better secure her for money deposited with us, (Signed) Willis & Chisolm." The money referred to was the proceeds of the conveyance to Rogers. Bankruptcy proceedings were taken against the firm in January, 1872, and an assignee was appointed. Mrs. Willis claimed a lien on the real estate conveyed to the firm by Johnston. On the assignee's application, that real estate was sold, free from the lien, and the proceeds were paid to the assignee to abide the determination of the court as to the lien of Mrs. Willis: Held, that Mrs. Willis had only a life interest in the real estate conveyed to her husband, as trustee, or in the proceeds thereof; that she, therefore, had no title to the proceeds of the conveyance to Rogers; and that she, therefore, had no money on deposit with the firm of Willis & Chisolm, on June 30th, 1870.

2. That her claim, whatever it was, was against Willis alone, and he could not appropriate the firm's property, as against the firm's creditors, to secure such claim; and that she, therefore, had no claim or lien on the fund in question.

In bankruptcy. The assignee in this case presented a petition to the court, setting forth that the bankrupts [Alexander Chisolm and Edward Willis] were the owners of certain real estate in Richmond county, Georgia; that Mrs. Elizabeth L. Willis, the wife of one of the bankrupts, claimed to have a claim or lien upon such property; and that he had received an offer for the purchase of the property; and he prayed the order of the court that the property might be sold free and clear from all claims and liens of Mrs. Willis, and that the proceeds might be paid into court, subject to any claim of hers, to be thereafter adjudicated upon by the court. On this petition, an order was entered, authorizing the sale as prayed, and referring it to the clerk to take proofs in respect to the nature, extent and validity of the lien or claim of Mrs. Willis upon the premises or the proceeds thereof. The property was sold by the assignee for $4,500, and the money was paid into the hands of the assignee. The evidence showed that the bankrupts, previous to June, 1870, were in partnership, in Charleston, S. C., under the name of Willis & Chisolm; and that the property which had been sold by the assignee was conveyed to the firm by Adam Johnston, by deed dated January 7th, 1870, recorded 28th March, 1870. On the back of that deed was the following endorsement, made by Willis: "30th June, 1870. For value received, we hereby transfer all our right, title, and interest to Mrs. E. L. Willis, to better secure her for money deposited with us. (Signed) Willis & Chisolm. Witness, B. F. Huger."

The evidence further showed, that, on November 6th, 1863, George W. Evans conveyed to Edward Willis, trustee, certain premises in Richmond county, Georgia, therein described, which conveyance was in said deed stated to be in trust. The terms of the trust fully appear in the opinion of the court. On the 30th of May, 1870, Mr. Willis, as trustee under the deed from Evans, joined with his wife in conveying to one Rogers the premises described in the foregoing deed, and another tract of land of 50 acres, described as being in the hands of Mr. Willis as trustee under a deed from one Green. Rogers, the purchaser, paid $3,000 in cash, on the 14th of June, 1870, and gave his note for $3,000 more. Of the $3,000 paid in cash, $2,715, and also the note for $3000, were received by Mr. Willis, and were used by him for the purposes of the firm of Willis & Chisolm, and this money and the note formed the money referred to in the endorsement on the deed from Johnston to Willis & Chisolm; and it was for this money that Mrs. Willis claimed the lien upon the property sold by the assignee, by virtue of the delivery to her of the deed from Johnston to Willis & Chisolm, and the endorsement thereupon.

Hawkins, Barnett & Pannes, for Mrs. Willis.

C. W. Bangs, for the assignee.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. The deed of November 6th, 1863, made by Evans, conveys to "Edward Willis, as trustee, as hereinafter set forth," the premises therein described, being 131 94-100 acres, and 22 93-100 acres. The habendum is to "Edward Willis, trustee, his successors and assigns, forever, in trust, nevertheless, to and for the sole and separate use, benefit and behoof of Elizabeth L. Willis, wife of the said Edward, for and during the term of her natural life, free from the debts, liabilities or contracts of her present or any future husband, with remainder at her death to her children, then in life, by the said Edward begotten, or who have issue alive at that time, the issue of any deceased child taking the parent's proportionate share; but, should the said Elizabeth L. die, leaving no child or issue of a child, by the said Edward begotten, then with remainder to the said Edward and his heirs in fee simple: provided, always, that the trustee for the time being may, at any time, by deed, in which Elizabeth L. Willis voluntarily joins, sell and convey, mortgage, or exchange the premises aforesaid, reinvesting the proceeds of such sale, subject to the same uses and trusts, and, from time to time, when needful or advisable, sell and exchange, or otherwise dispose of, in a similar way, any other property held under the provisions of this deed: and provided further, that the separate receipt of the said Elizabeth L. shall be a full and sufficient discharge to the trustee for the time being, for the yearly income of the trust estate."

It is apparent, from these provisions of the deed, that Mrs. Willis had only a life interest in the property, and was to receive only its "yearly income;" that Mr. Willis was trustee, under the deed, not merely to receive the income of the property, and pay such income to Mrs. Willis during her life, but also to dispose of the property after her death, by turning it over to her then living children by him, and the issue of her dead children by him, and, in default of any such takers, by turning it over to himself, in fee simple. If it should be sold by him, as trustee, its proceeds were to be reinvested by him, subject to the same uses and trusts, and these provisions were to apply to all property held under the provisions of the deed. Mrs. Willis had no right or title to the property, or to its principal or capital, or to the proceeds of its sale, but only a right to receive the income from the property or from the proceeds of its sale. The property, and, if it were sold, the proceeds of the sale, went into the hands of Mr. Willis, as trustee, impressed with the trust declared by such deed. It was, as to the principal or capital, a trust for the benefit of Mrs. Willis's descendants, and, if she should die leaving none, then it was a trust for the benefit of Mr. Willis and his heirs.

By the deed of the 30th of May, 1870, Mr. Willis, as trustee under said deed from Evans, joined with his wife in conveying to Rogers the said premises, declaring in the deed that he considered it "needful and advisable to dispose of said tracts of land." This deed covered, also, another tract of land, of 50 acres, described as in the hands of Mr. Willis, as trustee under a deed from one Green. The consideration for the whole is stated at $6,000. The purchaser appears to have paid $3,000 in cash on the 14th of June, 1870, and to have given his note for $3,000, payable, with interest, January 1st, 1872, secured by a mortgage back on the premises conveyed. The mortgagee is described in the mortgage as Edward Willis, as trustee for his wife, Elizabeth L. Willis, under deeds from Evans and Green. Of the $3,000 paid in cash, the sum of $2,715 seems to have gone into the hands of Mr. Willis, and to have been used by him for the purposes of the firm composed of the bankrupts, and the note was used by him for the same purpose. I am not furnished with any copy of the deed from Green of the 50 acres; but I must assume, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that the terms of the trust in it were the same as those in the deed from Evans. Mr. Miller, the attorney for Mrs. Willis, speaks, in his testimony, of the sale to Rogers as being one which did not include the 50 acres, but this is not so. If the trust in the deed from Green was different in its terms from that in the deed from Evans, it was for Mrs. Willis to show it, and to show her absolute title to the proceeds of the 50 acres, and then to show how the $6,000 purchase money can be apportioned among the tracts covered by the deed to Rogers. As it is, Mrs. Willis shows no title to any of the proceeds of the sale to Rogers. The title to such proceeds was in Mr. Willis, as trustee, under a trust with the provisions before recited. That being so, Mrs. Willis had no money on deposit with Willis & Chisolm, on the 30th of June, 1870. Whatever claim she may have had to any income from the proceeds of the sale of the lands sold, that claim was one against Mr. Willis alone, and was not one against the firm, even though the proceeds were used by Mr. Willis for the benefit of the firm, and Mr. Willis could not appropriate the firm's property, as against the firm's creditors, to secure such claim.

These considerations require that Mrs. Willis's claim to the proceeds of the Belleville property be disallowed; and it is not necessary to pass upon any of the other questions raised and discussed.

CHITTENDEN et al. v. DARDEN et al.

[2 Woods, 437.][1]

Circuit Court, N. D. Georgia. Sept. Term, 1875.

JURISDICTION—FOREIGN ATTACHMENT — VOLUNTARY APPEARANCE — POWERS OF UNITED STATES COMMISSIONERS.

1. Section 6 of the "Act to further the administration of justice" [June 1, 1872]—17 Stat. 197; Rev. St. § 915—does not confer upon the United States courts jurisdiction to institute suits by the process of foreign attachment.

[Cited in Anderson v. Shaffer, 10 Fed. 267; Harland v. United Lines Tel. Co., 40 Fed. 312; Perkins v. Hendryx, Id. 657; Treadwell v. Seymour, 41 Fed. 581. Distinguished in Crocker Nat. Bank v. Pagenstecher, 44 Fed. 706.]

2. The voluntary appearance of the defendant in a suit so commenced would cure the defect of jurisdiction, but service of summons made upon him in invitum while in the district would not.

3. The giving of a bond by a nonresident defendant for the release of property seized by process of foreign attachment, issued from a United States court, is not a voluntary appearance, and does not give the court jurisdiction.

4. Commissioners of the circuit courts of the United States have not, by statute, any power to issue writs of attachment returnable to said courts.

The plaintiffs [Chittenden & Co.] were citizens of New York, and the defendants [Darden & Holston] citizens of Alabama. The action was commenced by a writ of attachment issued by a commissioner of the United States circuit court, on Nov. 23, 1874, which was levied on a stock of goods and other property of the defendants in West Point, Georgia, which is within this district. After the attachment was levied, the defendants, who, upon February 17, 1875, happened to be found by the marshal in West Point, within the district, acknowledged service of a notice provided for by section 3309 of the Code of Georgia. This section declares that "the plaintiff, his agent or attorney at law, may give notice in writing to the defendant of the pendency of such attachment and of the proceedings thereon, which shall be served personally on the defendant by the sheriff * * * at least ten days before final judgment on said attachment; * * which being done, the judgment rendered upon such attachment shall have the same force and effect as judgments rendered at common law." After the service of the notice provided for by the section just quoted, the defendants, under section 3319 of the Code of Georgia, gave bond with security, payable to the plaintiffs in attachment, binding themselves to pay them the amount of the judgment and costs they might recover in the case; whereupon, the property attached was delivered to them. The defendants moved to quash the attachment and to dismiss the cause, because the court was without jurisdiction in the premises.

E. N. Broyles, for the motion.
Geo. Hillyer, opposed.

WOODS, Circuit Judge. The theory of defendants is, that as neither plaintiffs nor defendants were citizens of the state of Georgia, and the defendants were not found within the district by service of process in personam at the commencement of the suit, the proceeding by attachment will not hold; in other words, that the United States courts have no jurisdiction to institute suits by the process of foreign attachment. Unquestionably this was true under that provision of the judiciary act (1 Stat. 79, § 11) which declares, "that no civil suit shall be brought in either of said courts, district or circuit, against an inhabitant of the United States by any original process in any other district than that whereof he is an inhabitant, or in which he shall be found at the time of serving the writ."

In the case of Toland v. Sprague, 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 300, the supreme court, having this subject under consideration, held, (1) That by the general provisions of the laws of the United States, the circuit courts can issue no process beyond the limits of their districts. (2) That independently of positive legislation, the process can only be served upon persons within the same districts. (3) That the acts of congress adopting the state process adopt the form and modes of service only so far as the persons are rightfully within the reach of such process, and did not intend to enlarge the sphere of the jurisdiction of the circuit courts. (4) That the right to attach property to compel the appearance of persons can properly be used only in cases in which such persons are amenable to the process of the court, and even in case of a person being amenable to process in personam, an attachment against his property cannot be issued against him, except as part of or together with process to be served on his person. The same doctrine had been previously held by the United States circuit court for the district of Massachusetts, in the case of Picquet v. Swan [Case No. 11,134].

The decision of the supreme court above cited settles the question in hand against the plaintiffs, unless it has been affected by subsequent legislation. It is claimed that this has been done by the 6th section of the act "To further the administration of justice," passed June 1, 1872 (17 Stat. 197; Rev. St. § 915), which declares that "in common law causes in the circuit and district courts, the plaintiff shall be entitled to similar remedies by attachment or other process against the property of the defendant, which are now provided for by the laws of the state in which the court is held, applicable to the courts of such state." It is claimed that this enactment repeals, by implication, the provision in the 11th section of the judiciary act above quoted. I do not think it was the purpose of the act of 1872 to enlarge the jurisdiction of the United States courts, by allowing them to issue writs of foreign attachment, and thus acquire jurisdiction over inhabitants of the United States in districts other than those wherein they resided or were found at the time of serving the writ.

The policy to require the suit against an inhabitant of the United States to be brought in the district where he resided or was found had been continued without interruption since the passing of the judiciary act of 1789, and it is reasonable to suppose that if congress contemplated a change in that policy, it would have made it clear and not left it to implication. That it was not the purpose of congress to change this policy is made evident by the enactment of sections 738 and 739 of the Revised Statutes of the United States (Rev. St. pp. 139, 140). Section 738 provides that when any defendant to a suit in equity to enforce any legal or equitable lien or claim against him is not an inhabitant of or found within the district, and does not voluntarily appear thereto, he may be brought in by publication. Section 739 reënacts the 11th section of the act of 1789, supra, by declaring that except in the cases provided by the preceding section (738) and in the two succeeding sections (740, 741), no civil suit shall be brought in either of said courts against an inhabitant of the United States by any original process in any other district than that whereof he is an inhabitant, or in which he is found at the time of serving the writ. The two succeeding sections referred to only provide for service of original process in certain cases where there are two districts in the same state. As the case of a foreign attachment does not come within either of the exceptions mentioned in section 739, it must fall under the prohibition of the body of the section. It is true that the 6th section of the act of 1872 is reënacted by Rev. St. § 915. But this section, and the section just quoted, must be construed together, and to give section 739 effect, section 915 must be held to apply only to cases of attachment when process in personam has been properly served on the defendant. I am of opinion, therefore, that there was no authority to issue the writ of attachment in this case. But it is said that notice of the attachment, and of the proceedings thereunder, which, by the law of Georgia, is equivalent to a summons, has been served on the defendant within the district, and that therefore the attachment will hold. I have no doubt that the voluntary appearance of the defendant to the suit would cure the want of personal service. Indeed, it has been expressly held in Toland v. Sprague, supra, that where a defendant, who was not within the district when process of foreign attachment issued, afterward appeared and pleaded to the merits, the judgment is valid. But is this true when there is no voluntary appearance, but the defendant is caught within the district and served against his will? Can a plaintiff issue a writ of foreign attachment and seize the property of a person not an inhabitant of a district where the suit is brought, and not personally served within the district, and when the latter comes into the district to recover possession of his property by giving bond, or for any other purpose, serve him with summons, and thus bring him into court against his will? It seems to me, that to allow this, would be to sanction an abuse of the process of the court. The right of a citizen to be sued by original process in the district only where he resides, or in which he shall be found, is a substantial right, of which he ought not to be deprived by any artifice. In my judgment, no writ of attachment can be served on the property of a nonresident until he has been found within the district and served with process in personam. The attachment must follow personal service, or at least be contemporaneous with it. I am therefore of opinion that the service upon the defendants, by the marshal, of the notice of the proceedings in attachment, was ineffectual to bring them into court or cure the defect of jurisdiction. If what has just been said is true, it follows that the fact that defendants gave bond in pursuance of the Georgia Code for the release of the attached property does not amount to the voluntary appearance of the defendants, nor give the court jurisdiction over their persons. I am therefore of opinion that the motion to quash the attachment must prevail.

The question has been raised in the case, whether a commissioner of the circuit court has power to issue the writ of attachment. The power is claimed for this officer on the ground that by the Code of Georgia an attachment may be issued by justices of the peace, returnable to their own, and in certain cases, to the superior courts of the county. Code, § 457. It is insisted, that as section 915 of the Revised Statutes provides that in common law cases, the plaintiff shall be entitled to similar remedies by attachment or other process against the property of the defendant, which are provided by the laws of the state where this court is held, and as under the law of Georgia, a justice of the peace may issue an attachment against the property of defendants, it follows by analogy that the same power is possessed by commissioners of the circuit courts. I think this is stretching too far the interpretation of section 915, Rev. St.

Commissioners can only exercise powers expressly conferred. Section 627 of the Revised Statutes provides for the appointment of commissioners, and declares that they shall exercise the powers which are or may be expressly conferred by law upon commissioners of circuit courts. Many powers are expressly conferred on the commissioners of the circuit courts. See Rev. St. §§ 945, 727, 1014, 1778, 2025, 2026, 5076. But the power to issue process for the circuit courts is nowhere conferred upon the commissioners, and they can be considered to have such power only by the faintest implication. I think section 716 of the Revised Statutes, excludes the idea that any such power resides in a circuit court commissioner. That section declares that: "The supreme court and the circuit and district courts shall have power to issue writs of scire facias, and to issue all writs not specifically provided for by the statute, which may be necessary for the exercise of their respective jurisdictions and agreeably to the usages and principles of law." Here the power to issue process, is conferred on the courts alone, and the idea that a commissioner possesses this power is plainly excluded. Whether the circuit court could confer the power to issue attachments upon its commissioners is a question we are not now required to decide. It is sufficient for this case to say that no such power has been conferred on its commissioners by this court. On all grounds, therefore, I am of opinion that the writ of attachment was improvidently issued, and that it must be quashed and the case dismissed.

[2] [Affirmed in Case No. 2,690.]

BENEDICT, District Judge. This action, which is said to be novel in the admiralty courts of this country, is brought by the owner of the canal-boat T. F. Sheehy, to recover of the steamboat C. H. Northam, damages caused to the canal-boat by the swell made by the C. H. Northam in passing.

The weather, at the time, was fine, and there was no sea. The canal-boat was passing up the harbor to New Haven, in tow of the tug Gladwich. The tow consisted of five boats, arranged three in the first tier and two in the second. The T. F. Sheehy was the middle boat in the first tier. When the tow was passing the narrow part of the harbor, about opposite Fort Hall, the Northam, a large side-wheel steamboat, bound in the same general direction, passed the tow on the east side. As she passed, her suction first caught the tow and dragged back the canal-boats in the stern tier so forcibly as to break some of the lines, and then the following swell drove the boats ahead upon the sterns of the boats in the first tier. The suction and swell were unusual and beyond the power of ordinary tows to withstand. The libellants' boat was so injured by the blow delivered on her stern by the canal-boat which was behind her in the last tier, that it was necessary to remove her at once from the tow and beach her on the shore. For the damages thus caused this action is brought against the C. H. Northam.

The following conclusions of fact are not open to question upon the evidence. The injury complained of was caused by the suction and swell made by the steamboat as she passed the tow. No negligence on the part of the canal-boat injured, or of the tug towing her, conduced to this injury. The character of the tow, its position and course were known to the steamboat as she approached from behind. No other vessels were near her, nor was there any circumstance connected with the navigation of that harbor which made it necessary for the steamboat to pass the tow where she did. It was within the power of the steamboat, not only by waiting to pass the tow at a less dangerous point, but by slowing her speed to pass where she did without endangering the tow.

These conclusions are sufficient for a determination of this case, and they point irresistibly to a decree in favor of the libellant. For the C. H. Northam is chargeable with a knowledge of the depth of the water and of the amount of suction and swell she would create by passing in such water. She was the following boat, and if she desired to pass the tow it was incumbent upon her to do it at such a place and in such a manner as to cause no injury to the tow by her swell. Her right to pass the tow where she did was dependent upon her ability to pass without causing injury. If she could not pass in that place without causing injury by her swell, she was bound to wait until beyond the narrow place, and the attempt to pass when she did was negligence. If, on the other hand, by going slower than she did, she could pass where she did without causing a dangerous swell, then it was negligence to maintain the speed she did in passing. It seems clear, from the evidence, that the C. H. Northam could have passed the tow at this point in safety, and that without reducing her speed beyond what would be necessary to give her steerage way and carry her by the tow. This neglect to reduce her speed is, of itself, sufficient to render her liable for the damages which ensued. Let a decree be entered in favor of the libellant, with an order of reference.

[NOTE. The claimant appealed to the circuit court, where the decree was affirmed. See Case No. 2,690.]

NEGLIGENT NAVIGATION — DAMAGES FROM SWELL.

1. A tug, with five boats in tow behind her, in two tiers, three in the first tier, and two in the second tier, was passing up the narrow part of a harbor, when a side-wheel steamboat, going in the same direction, went by the tug and her tow. In doing so, her suction dragged back the boats in the second tier, so as to break some of their lines, and then the swell she created drove them against the sterns of the boats in the first tier, so that the middle boat in the first tier was damaged: Held, If the steamboat desired to pass at the speed she had maintained up to the time she created the swell, she ought to have passed at a greater distance.

WOODRUFF, Circuit Judge. I am of opinion that the evidence in this case shows very clearly the want of proper care on the part of those controlling the navigation of the C. H. Northam, and that the tug and her tow were without fault. The steamboat was, of course, at liberty, to pass the tow. If she would pass at the speed she had maintained to the time when she created the swell that CARRIERS — LIABILITY FOR LOSS OR DAMAGE — PRESUMPTION — BILL OF LADING — REBUTTING PRESUMPTION RAISED BY STATEMENT IN.

1. Common carriers are not responsible for losses or damage which may happen to goods received to be carried, if the same result from the act of the owner.

2. When goods are lost or damaged after their reception by the common carrier and before their delivery, the prima facie presumption is, that the loss was occasioned by the carrier's default.

3. The legal effect of a bill of lading, affirming the goods to have been shipped in good order, is to raise a prima facie presumption that in all particulars open to inspection the goods were in that condition; but this does not preclude the carrier, in case of loss or damage, from showing that the loss proceeded from some cause which existed, but was not apparent, at the time he received the goods.

[Cited in Wolff v. The Vaderland, 18 Fed. 740.]

4. The responsibility of the carrier does not extend to damages resulting to a cargo of cotton in bales, from moisture of the contents of the bales received previous to the time of lading, which could not have been discovered by the master, and where the vessel was in all respects seaworthy, and there appeared to be no want of ordinary care, skill, and energy on the part of the master, to protect the goods against such injury while on board the vessel.

5. While cotton in bales was lying on the wharf, and while a vessel was loading with the same, it was discovered by the accidental opening of one bale that the contents thereof were wet. This fact was reported to the shippers, who said that the wet would do no injury, and the bale was thereupon tied up and placed on board. Held, that there was no evidence in the case to warrant the conclusion that the master had reason to believe any portion of the residue unfit for the voyage.

Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of Massachusetts.]

In admiralty. Libellants [Daniel L. Choate and others] were the owners of the ship Sciota, and they instituted this suit against the respondent [Francis B. Crowninshield] in the district court [case unreported] to recover the balance of the freight alleged to be due to them on seven hundred and seventy-two bales of cotton which they transported in that ship from New Orleans to Boston, and there delivered to the respondent, as the consignee of the goods. The description of the goods and the terms of the shipment, as expressed in the bill of lading, were in substance and effect as follows: "Shipped in good order, seven hundred and seventy-two bales of cotton under deck, being marked and numbered as in margin, to be delivered in the like good order and condition at the port of Boston, the dangers of the seas only excepted, unto the respondent, the consignee or assigns, he or they paying freight for the goods five eighths of one cent per pound, with five per cent primage, average accustomed." Four bills of lading of that import were signed by the master, and the ship with the goods on board, on the 8th or 10th of February, 1859, sailed from the port of New Orleans, where the master received the goods specified in the bill of lading. The allegations of the libel were, that the ship arrived at the port of destination on the 22d of March in the same year, and that the master then and there made a true delivery of all the goods described in the bill of lading, to the agents of the respondents, according to its tenor and effect. The admission of the answer also was, that the whole number of bales were delivered; but the respondent denied that they were all delivered in good order and condition, as alleged in the libel. On the contrary, he alleged that the contents of some of the bales were partially lost, and that the contents of some others were wet, and otherwise damaged, and that the coverings also had been wet and greatly damaged. The true amount of the freight was $2,407; and the libellants admit that the respondent paid the sum of $1,800 at the time the freight became due; $607.10 remained due to the libellants, if, as they alleged, the master made true delivery of the goods, as he stipulated to do in the bill of lading. The respondent denied that the master did so, and alleged that he suffered damage in consequence of the failure of the master to deliver the goods in like good order and condition as he received them on board, to the amount of $500, which he claims to recoup out of the sum which would otherwise be due to the libellants, as the unpaid balance of the freight.

Lothrop & Bishop, for respondent.

CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice. Exclusive original cognizance of all civil causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction is conferred upon the district courts by the ninth section of the judiciary act; but the first section of the act of the 3d of March, 1821, provides that in all suits and actions in any district court in which it shall appear that the judge of such court has been of counsel for either party, said suit or action may be certified to the next circuit court of the district. 1 Stat. 76; 3 Stat. 643.

Jurisdiction of the suit in this case is derived from that provision, the same having been duly certified into this court because the district judge had been of counsel to one of the parties. The obligations of a common carrier by water, who receives goods to transport from port to port, are to keep the goods safely, duly transport them, and make right delivery of the same at the port of destination. The Eddy, 5 Wall. [72 U. S.] 481; The Bird of Paradise, Id. 545; McAndrews v. Thatcher, 3 Wall. [70 U. S.] 369. Common carriers are responsible for all losses and damages which may happen to goods received to be carried, except such as result from the act of God or the public enemy, or from the act or default of the owner himself, unless such liability is limited or restrained by the terms of the contract under which the goods were received. Niagara v. Cordes, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 26; Hastings v. Pepper, 11 Pick. 42.

Dangers of the seas are excepted in the bill of lading in this case, but there is no other material limitation to the contract of affreightment. When goods in the custody of a common carrier are lost or damaged after their reception and before their delivery, the prima facie presumption is, that the loss or injury was occasioned by the default of the carrier, and the burden is upon him to prove that it arose from a cause for which he is not responsible. Nelson v. Woodruff, 1 Black [66 U. S.] 156; Clarke v. Barnwell, 12 How. [53 U. S.] 280.

Such a presumption, however, is nothing more than a prima facie presumption, and it may be overcome by any proper testimony which is sufficient to show that the fact was otherwise. The legal effect of a bill of lading such as was given in this case, affirming that the goods were shipped in good order and condition, is also to raise a prima facie presumption that, as to all circumstances which were visible and open to inspection, the goods were in that condition, but it does not preclude the carrier from showing, if he can, in a case of loss or damage, that the loss or damage proceeded from some cause which existed but was not apparent at the time he received the goods, and which, if satisfactorily proved, will discharge him from liability. Clarke v. Barnwell, 12 How. [53 U. S.] 280.

Between the shipper and the ship-owner the bill of lading is not conclusive as against proof of latent defects, even in a case where the bill of lading states that the goods were shipped in good order and condition. Ellis v. Willard, 5 Seld. [9 N. Y.] 530; Shepherd v. Naylor, 5 Gray, 592; Barrett v. Rogers, 7 Mass. 297; Haddow v. Parry, 3 Taunt. 303; Macl. Shipp. 339; Bates v. Todd, 1 Moody & R. 106; Sears v. Wingate, 3 Allen, 103; 1 Pars. Mar. Law, 37; Berkley v. Watling, 7 Adol. & El. 29; O'Brien v. Gilchrist, 34 Me. 554.

Applying these principles of law to the case, it is quite clear that the decision must turn upon the questions of fact which may be determined without any extended argument, as there is not much real conflict in the testimony, except as to a single point. The seaworthiness of the ship is not controverted, and the proofs show that she was staunch and strong, and that she was well manned and equipped. Due care was used in taking the cargo on board, and the goods of the respondent were well stowed and dunnaged.

The testimony of the master is, that there were two iron ventilators in the ship, one forward, and one aft, and that the hatches were left open till they left the bar, near the mouth of the river. The usual length of a voyage from New Orleans, as shown in the testimony, is eighteen or twenty days, but the ship in this case was detained twenty days inside the bar. During that period, the evidence is, there was little or no motion in the vessel, and that the weather was hot, sultry, and disagreeable, and that there were light showers with heavy fogs. Want of motion in the vessel doubtless rendered the circulation between decks and in the hold less than it would have been if the vessel had been under way. Proper care appears to have been taken of the goods from the time they were delivered on the wharf until they were stowed in the ship, and the proofs show that none of the bales remained on the wharf more than four days before they were shipped. The outside appearance of the bales was "ordinarily good," and nothing except a single circumstance occurred during the loading of the ship to awaken any suspicion that the contents of the bales were in any respect unfit for transportation in such a voyage. When about two thirds of the consignment had been loaded and stowed, the master discovered a man attempting to steal cotton from one of the bales on the wharf, but he escaped before he could be apprehended. He had cut the bagging so that the contents were exposed, and on examining the cotton the master found that it was wet, and immediately reported the fact to the shippers.

The statement of the master is, that when he reported the fact to the shippers, they told him that the wet would not injure it, as it was bound coastwise, and he immediately tied up the broken bale, and it was taken on board. Other than that circumstance, there does not appear that anything occurred, or that there was anything in the outside appearance of the bales calculated to create suspicion that the goods were not in a proper condition for the voyage.

Two propositions are submitted by the respondent in respect to that evidence: 1. He insists that it does not sufficiently appear that the bale cut open was one that belonged to his consignment. 2. But if it did, then it shows that the defect in the goods, if it existed at that time, was not latent.

Neither of the propositions, however, can be sustained to an extent to benefit the respondent. The better opinion from all the evidence is, that the broken bale was one which belonged to his consignment, and there is no evidence to warrant the conclusion that the master had any reason to believe that any portion of the residue was unfit for the voyage, especially as he was assured to the contrary by the shippers. The theory of the libellants is, that the bales had been exposed to rain, either on the plantation where the cotton was grown and put in bales, or on the way down the river, or on the levee before it was delivered to the master, or that it was injured by the humidity of the atmosphere and dampness of the ship's hold, where most of the respondent's consignment was stowed. The responsibility of the carrier does not extend to damage resulting from such causes, if it appear that the vessel was in all respects seaworthy, and that there was no want of ordinary skill and vigilance and energy on the part of the master to protect the goods against such injury. Clarke v. Barnwell, 12 How. [53 U. S.] 282; Abb. Shipp. 42; Lamb v. Parkman [Case No. 8,020]; 1 Pars. Merc. Law, 136, note 1.

Examined in view of the testimony that much of the top tier between decks appeared as if wet from steam and sweat, and that the bagging and bands were mouldy, and that the bagging was much decayed, it seems almost an irresistible conclusion that the cotton must have received the damage from a combination of both the causes suggested by the libellants, as the testimony negatives every theory suggested by the respondent. Twenty or thirty bales were slightly wet by sea-water, but the same witnesses who state the fact affirm that it was hardly sufficient to deserve notice. The plain inference from the evidence is, that the bales, before they were delivered to the master, had been exposed to the rain, so that the cotton within the bales was damp. Cotton in that condition when stowed, either in the hold or between decks, will soon create heat, and the moisture under the influence of the heat will generate steam and produce all the results shown in this case.

When the ship in the course of her voyage passed into cold weather, those in charge of her noticed that steam was escaping from the ventilators of the vessel, which is strong evidence in support of the libellants' theory. Weighed in any just view of the evidence, there does not appear to be any good reason to question the credibility of the master, or those associated with him in the charge of the vessel; and it is clear that the libellants are entitled to recover, unless the statements of those witnesses can be overcome. The actual delivery of all the bales is conceded, and the testimony shows that they were accepted by the respondent and sent to certain cotton-mills and appropriated to the use for which the cotton was designed. Nothing appears in the case to show how much the cotton in the broken bale was injured, beyond what is shown in respect to it at the place of loading.

Another theory of the respondent is, that the cotton in other bales belonging to other consignments was wet, and that the damage to their cotton was occasioned in that way, but it is sufficient answer to that proposition to say that it is not satisfactorily supported by the evidence. The amount not being a matter of dispute, it does not seem necessary to send the case to an assessor. Decree for the libellants.

Case No. 2,692.

CHOATE et al. v. MEREDITH.

[Holmes, 500.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. June, 1875.

DEMURRAGE—LAY-DAYS.

A bill of lading provided for demurrage after lay-days beginning "twenty-four hours after arrival at the above-named port, and notice thereof to the consignee." When the vessel arrived at the port named in the bill of lading, the consignee's wharf was inaccessible on account of ice and lack of sufficient water; whereupon the master took her to the only accessible wharf in the port, and notified the consignee, and offered to deliver the cargo, which offer was not accepted. Held, that the lay-days began to run twenty-four hours after notice to the consignee.

[Cited in Fish v. One Hundred and Fifty Tons of Brown Stone, 20 Fed. 202; Manson v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co., 31 Fed. 299. Applied in The Henry Sutton, 26 Fed. 927.]

Admiralty appeal from a decree of the district court of Massachusetts [unreported]. The libel was brought by [Samuel W. Meredith] the master of a schooner, for demurrage, under the provisions of a bill of lading of a cargo of coal consigned to the appellants [Alden Choate and others].

M. F. Dickinson, Jr., for appellants.

Charles F. Walcott, for libellant.

SHEPLEY, Circuit Judge. The libellant was master of the schooner E. I. Heraty, which brought from Philadelphia to Lynn a cargo of two hundred and forty tons of coal, consigned to appellants. The bill of lading undertook to deliver the coal to appellants at Lynn, for the agreed freight, and was in terms made subject to the conditions of the bill of lading adopted by "Vessel-Owners' and Captains' Association." The reference was to the following clause for demurrage: "And twenty-four hours after arrival at the above-named port and notice thereof to the consignee named, there shall be allowed for receiving said cargo at the rate of one day, Sundays and legal holidays excepted, for every hundred tons thereof; after which the cargo, consignee, or assignee, shall pay demurrage at the rate of eight cents per ton a day, Sunday and legal holidays not excepted, upon the full amount of cargo as per this bill of lading, for each and every day's detention, and pro rata for parts and portions of a day, beyond the days above specified, until the cargo is fully discharged."

The schooner arrived at Lynn, and reported to appellants on the morning of Saturday, Jan. 11, and was fully discharged Thursday, Feb. 13, making twenty-seven days beyond the stipulated time. When the schooner arrived at Lynn, the harbor was much obstructed by ice. By reason of the ice, and because the schooner drew more water than was to be found at appellants' wharf, excepting during a high course of tides, such as occurred twice a month, the appellants' wharf was inaccessible. During the delay, libellant took a steam-tug and broke through the ice, and carried his vessel to a coal-wharf in Lynn, known as "Lamper's Wharf," where he offered to deliver the coal; which offer was not accepted. Without waiving their rights, however, the appellants did take out about sixty tons of coal at Lamper's wharf; and the schooner was moved towards the appellant's wharf, but grounded, and was frozen in.

In the case of Aylward v. Smith [Case No. 687], decided in this court at the October term, 1873, affirming the decree of the district court, it was held, in the case of a bill of lading in the old and usual form, with an agreement for demurrage "after three days," that the lay-days did not begin until after the arrival at the wharf; and as in that case the schooner was frozen up thirty-five feet from the wharf, which was too far for safe delivery of the cargo, that the voyage was not completed, and the lay-days had not begun.

In this case, as the contract stipulates that the lay-days shall commence "twenty-four hours after arrival at the port, and notice thereof to the consignee," and as the vessel arrived at the port and gave the notice to the consignee, and there were suitable wharves accessible, to which the consignee could have ordered the vessel, although his own wharf was obstructed, the time commenced to run twenty-four hours after the arrival and notice to the consignee.

The new form of bill of lading seems to have been adopted to secure the ship-owner against the delay consequent upon an obstruction of the consignee's wharf by other vessels or from other causes, and against being compelled to await his turn to unlade at the consignee's wharf. Under this form of bill of lading, if the consignee desires to exercise the right of requiring the master to unlade at the consignee's wharf, he must pay for the detention consequent upon that wharf's being inaccessible, if there are other suitable and convenient wharves accessible after the arrival of the vessel in port, at which the vessel may be unladen. Decree of district court affirmed, with interest and costs.

CHOMQUA v. MASON et al.

[1 Gall. 342.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Rhode Island. Nov. Term, 1812.

PLEADING—STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS—REPLICATION—AGENCY.

1. It is a good replication to a plea of the statute of limitations, that the plaintiff is a foreigner, and has never been within the limits of the state where the suit is brought.

2. What words amount to an authority to take up money on credit.

At law. Assumpsit [against James B. Mason and others, executors of John Brown] to recover the amount of a promissory note, given by one Colvin Dana in behalf of the testator. The note was in the following words:

"Twelve months after date I promise to pay Mr. Chomqua or order three thousand seven hundred and sixty-four dollars with fifteen per cent. interest, being for the balance of the ship General Washington's cargo.

"For John Brown, Esq.

"Colvin Dana.

"If the note is not paid in twelve months I am to pay eighteen per cent. after.

"Witness, James Oliver.

"Canton, March 15, 1802."

The defendants pleaded, 1. The general issue. 2. That the testator did not promise within six years before the date of the writ. 3. That the action did not accrue against the defendants within six years. To the second plea the plaintiff replied, that at the time of making the promise the plaintiff was, ever since has been, and still is beyond sea, and out of the United States of America, to wit, at Canton aforesaid, in the empire of China, whereof he is and ever hath been a subject, as aforesaid; and this, &c. To the third plea the plaintiff replied in substance as to the second plea. To these replications there was a demurrer and joinder. On the trial of the general issue, the plaintiff proved the note aforesaid, and also a letter of instructions given by Brown to Capt. Simon Smith, the master of the ship General Washington, on the voyage on which the note aforesaid was given. It was admitted, that Capt. Smith died during the voyage, and before the arrival of the ship at Canton. The letter was as follows: "Providence, November, 1800. Capt. Simon Smith, Sir: You having the command and sole control of my ship General Washington, and cargo, bound round Cape Horn to the north-west coast of America, which being a long distance, you no doubt stop in Chili for refreshments of such supplies as you may stand in need of, and with the cargo you may get for the cargo you carry out, you may return home or proceed to Canton, as you think most to my interest, and as it is most likely you will proceed to Canton, I shall give you my letter of credit, so as to enable you to bring home a very valuable cargo of China, bohea, and green teas, nankeens and silks, &c., but I hope you will carry such a valuable cargo to China, that you will be able to purchase a very valuable return cargo without getting any credit, say from 120,000 to 160,000 dollars. The ship being coppered and fitted at so large an expense, that there must be a very valuable cargo returned to make a tolerable voyage, as the outfits, with the additional expenses of insurance, wages, interest of money, provisions and port charges, duties, &c., &c., when all added to the outfits, will make so large a sum as without a valuable return cargo there can be but little, if any, profit in the voyage. You'll therefore get a large credit, if you find it necessary, to load. As to your prudence and economy throughout the voyage, I have the fullest confidence in it," &c., &c. "If any thing happens to you, which renders you unable to command, your first mate, Mr. Edward Cole, must command the ship in your stead, and Mr. Colvin Dana, your assistant supercargo, must act in your place as to the sale and purchase of the cargoes. I think you will find no difficulty in getting all the credit, which you may want, to fill the ship with a cargo at Canton of 150,000 or 160,000 dollars, should you not carry there more value than 120,000 dollars; but I am in hopes, that you'll carry there a cargo to the value of 150,000 dollars. But be this as it may, you will take care to lay out your money for such articles, as are not generally to be had for credit, namely, nankeens, china, and silks; the teas are generally to be had with more ease for credit than the above articles are. If you find you can fill the ship with very valuable articles with the cargo you carry, and the credit you get, which is commonly for twenty-two months or two years without interest, you will in this case take less china and bohea tea, and more of the valuable articles." The residue of the letter is immaterial to be recited.

STORY, Circuit Justice, at the trial, ruled, that in the event that happened, namely, the death of Capt. Smith, Mr. Dana had authority to purchase on credit, in the same manner as Capt. Smith, under the letter of instructions, and under his direction on this point the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff.

After verdict, the counsel for the defendants moved for a new trial, on the ground of misdirection of the judge on the point aforesaid, and this motion came on to be argued before the court at the same time with the argument on the demurrers.

Burrill and Robbins, for defendants.

The question as to the sufficiency of the plaintiff's replication, as to the second and third pleas, depends upon the construction of the proviso in the 3d section of the statute of limitations of Rhode Island. 1 Acts R. I. 472. The words are, "Provided, &c., that if any person or persons now, or who hereafter shall be, entitled to any such action, shall be, at the time any such causes of action accrued, within the age of twenty-one years, feme covert, non compos mentis, imprisoned or beyond sea, then and in such case, such person or persons shall be at liberty to bring the same within such times, as are herein before limited, after their being of full age, discovert, of sane memory, or at large, or returned from beyond sea." We contend that no person is within the proviso, except persons, who originally were resident in Rhode Island, for such persons only can be said to return from beyond sea. Foreigners, who have never resided in the country, are not within the intent of the proviso.

Tristram Burgess and Searle, for plaintiff.

The legislature never intended to apply the statue of limitations to contracts made with foreigners, but only to contracts made between citizens or residents of Rhode Island. If the legislature did intend otherwise, still as the remedy and not the right is bound by the statute, it can apply to suits only, which are brought in the state courts, and not in those of the United States. It is not competent for the legislature of a state to circumscribe actions in the courts of the United States. But at all events the plaintiff is within the proviso. He was beyond sea, when the cause of action accrued, and has not been within the United States; the statute, therefore, cannot run against him. Strithorst v. Graeme, 3 Wils. 145.

STORY, Circuit Justice. There can be no reasonable doubt in the case. The proviso saves the action, as to all persons beyond sea at the time when the action accrued. The statute does not begin to run against such person until his return. How then can it affect the present plaintiff? He has always been "beyond sea;" and admitting that the language of the exception, as to returning from beyond sea, be correctly expounded by the defendants' counsel, it will not help the defendants. It would only prove, that the statute could never run against the plaintiff, since he would be within the saving clause, and without the exception. But the true construction of the statute is, that the party shall have six years after he comes into the state to pursue his legal remedy. The case of Strithorst v. Graeme, 3 Wils. 145, 2 Bl. 723, is decisive, if so plain a position needed an authority to support it. See, also, Ruggles v. Keeler, 3 Johns. 263, the same point recognised, and Dupleix v. De Roven, 2 Vern. 540. The language of the statute of limitations of Rhode Island, as to the enacting clause and proviso, is substantially the same as the English statute, 21 Jac. 1, c. 16, §§ 3, 7. As to the more general question, which has been raised, how far a statute of limitation of a state shall be permitted, in a court of the United States, to bar a remedy upon a foreign contract made in a foreign country, and by its terms not restricted to be executed within such state, I give no opinion. It is an important question, which will require much examination, as to the lex loci operating on contracts. It will be sufficient to decide the question, when it cannot otherwise be avoided. I shall adjudge the replications good.

Robbins then shortly argued the motion for a new trial, and contended that Dana had no authority to bind the testator upon the true construction of the letter of instructions; that the authority of Dana was confined to purchases to be made with ready money, and not on credit. He was a special and not a general agent.

STORY, Circuit Justice. I retain the opinion, which I expressed at the trial. The interests of commerce require a liberal construction of maritime contracts and authorities. The object of Brown was, in case of the disability of Capt. Smith, to confide to the mate the navigation and command of the ship, and to Mr. Dana the whole authority as to the sale and purchase of the cargoes. The owner looked to the purchase of a cargo partly on credit; he expresses his designs in the most clear and decisive language, and looking to the possible inability of Smith, he directs the purchases and sales to be made by the supercargo. What purchases, may I ask, are here meant? The defendants' counsel say, purchase for ready cash. But could this be the serious intention of the owner? The outward voyage might have been unsuccessful. The funds might have been inadequate to any considerable purchases. The vessel might have arrived at Canton without money sufficient to purchase any considerable cargo; was she then to return in ballast? I think that such a construction can hardly be contended for. The owner has not limited the purchases to be made by the supercargo to be purchases for cash. He uses the words with reference to the preceding statements, and I do not feel at liberty to interpose a limitation in his language, where he has used none. There has not been a shadow of evidence, to show that Mr. Brown was dissatisfied with this conduct, and I cannot believe that there ever could have been. I shall over-rule the motion for a new trial, and give judgment for the plaintiff.

Case No. 2,697.

CHRIST et al. v. BAKER.

[17 Leg. Int. 332.] [1]

Circuit Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. Oct. 12, 1860.

CUSTOMS DUTIES—"BLANKETS."

[The commercial meaning of "blanket," in the tariff act of 1857, is to be traced only to the time of the passage of that act.]

At law. This was an action brought by Christ, Jay & Hess against Joseph B. Baker, collector of customs, to recover the difference between the duties of fifteen and twenty-four per cent., which latter rate had been exacted by the collector upon certain invoices of blankets imported from England by the plaintiffs, and which they, the plaintiffs, alleged were entitled to be entered at the former rate. The tariff act of 1846 [9 Stat., 42] arranged articles in schedules. In Schedule C, "manufactures of wool not otherwise provided for," were charged with a duty of thirty per cent.; and in Schedule E, "blankets of all kinds" were charged with a duty of twenty per cent. The tariff act of 1857 [11 Stat. 192] referred to and adopted the schedules of the act of 1846, but reduced the rates of duty—Schedule C paying twenty-four per cent. instead of thirty, and Schedule E paying fifteen per cent. instead of twenty. The plaintiffs contended that they were entitled to enter these goods at the rate of fifteen per cent., and submitted that the question to be decided was, whether the articles in question were blankets, as commercially known at the date of the act of 1857. The evidence on the part of the plaintiffs showed that these goods were known in the market as blankets as early as 1850. On the part of the defence it was contended that the goods in court, called by the plaintiffs blankets, were not known as such until after the passage of the act of 1846, and that the meaning of the word "blankets" as used in the act of 1857 was to be determined by its fair and honest meaning, as used in the act of 1846, because the act of 1857, adopted the schedules of the act of 1846, and merely reduced the rates of duty; that the act of 1857 was not to be taken as an entirely new and independent enactment, but as supplemental to that of 1846.

GRIER, Circuit Justice, decided that the commercial meaning of the word "blanket" was to be traced back only to the time of the passage of the act of 1857. The schedules of the act of 1846 were referred to in the act of 1857 merely to save the trouble of transcribing the list of articles therein mentioned. A verdict was therefore rendered for the plaintiffs for $719.08

Case No. 2,698.

CHRIST et al. v. MAXWELL.

[3 Blatchf. 129.][1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Dec., 1853.

CUSTOMS DUTIES—SUFFICIENCY OF PROTEST — IMPOSITION OF PENALTY—POWERS OF COLLECTOR.

1. Where, on an appraisal both by official appraisers and merchant appraisers, the invoice value of goods was raised, and duties on the increase were paid under a protest, which objected "that the appraisals and reappraisals were not fairly, impartially, or legally made, nor by persons unprejudiced and duly qualified to make them:" Held, that no action could be maintained to recover back such duties on account of any irregularity either in selecting or qualifying the appraisers, or otherwise, because the protest did not, as required by the act of February 26th, 1845 (5 Stat. 727), set forth distinctly the grounds of objection to the regularity and legality of the appraisements made, or wherein the appraisers were prejudiced or not duly qualified.

[Cited in U. S. v. Earnshaw, 12 Fed. 287.]

2. The goods being the property of their manufacturer, when entered, and being consigned for sale to the party who entered them, and the collector having imposed an additional duty or penalty of 20 per cent. for such undervaluation: Held, that it was not legally imposed under section 8 of the act of July 30th, 1846 (9 Stat. 43), because that act relates only to goods which have been actually purchased in a foreign market, and such qualification is not rescinded or modified by section 1 of the act of March 3d, 1851 (9 Stat. 629).

3. Held, also, that such additional duty or penalty was not authorized by section 17 of the act of August 30th, 1842 (5 Stat. 564) or by section 13 of the act of March 1st, 1823 (3 Stat. 734), for the like reason, and also because the increased duty or penalty specified in each of those acts is 50 per cent., and the collector cannot exact a less or different one.

At law. This was an action [by George Christ and others] against [Hugh Maxwell] the collector of the port of New York, to recover back an excess of duties, and a penalty paid on an invoice of woollens. The owners of the goods, who were the manufacturers of them, consigned an invoice of woollens to the plaintiffs for sale, on which duties and a penalty were exacted at the custom-house, July 17th, 1852, amounting to $4,712.10. This action was brought to recover back $530.60 of that sum, with interest, composed of these particulars: The invoice value was advanced $414 by the appraisers, and a duty of 30 per cent. was exacted thereon, viz., $124.20; additional duty or penalty of 20 per cent. on $2,007, $401.40; fee paid merchant appraiser, $5; being a total of $530.60. The entry was made by the plaintiffs on the 28th of June, 1852. The invoice price was raised 25 per cent. by the appraisers. On the 16th of July, the plaintiffs notified the defendant, in writing, of their dissatisfaction therewith, and on the same day made a protest in writing, setting forth, among other things, that the collector had failed to order a reappraisement, as required by law. On the 12th of July, the oath prescribed by the treasury instructions was administered by one of the principal appraisers to a merchant, and, on the 13th, the merchant, in conjunction with the general appraiser, proceeded, as they stated in their return, to act upon the appeal of the plaintiffs, and reappraise the goods, pursuant to the act of congress of March 3d, 1851 (9 Stat. 629). The duty and penalty sued for were paid on this reappraisement. On the argument, the plaintiffs took fourteen exceptions to the regularity and legality of the proceedings in the custom-house.

Before NELSON, Circuit Justice, and BETTS, District Judge.

THE COURT held: 1. That the plaintiffs could not maintain an action to recover back the $124.20 for duties charged on the enhanced valuation of the goods, on account of any irregularity either in selecting or qualifying the appraisers, or otherwise, because the protest, which objected "that the appraisals and reappraisals were not fairly, impartially, or legally made, nor by persons unprejudiced and duly qualified to make them," did not, as required by the act of February 26th, 1845 (5 Stat. 727), set forth distinctly and specifically the grounds of objection to the regularity and legality of the appraisements made, or wherein the appraisers were prejudiced or not duly qualified.

2. That the collector had no authority to impose the additional duty of 20 per cent. on the importation, under section 8 of the act of July 30th, 1846 (9 Stat. 43), because that act related only to goods which had been actually purchased in a foreign market; and that section 1 of the act of March 3d, 1851 (9 Stat. 629), did not rescind or modify that qualification.

3. That the defendant was not authorized to affix the additional duty or penalty of 20 per cent. under the provisions of section 17 of the act of August 30th, 1842 (5 Stat. 564), nor under those of section 13 of the act of March 1st, 1823 (3 Stat. 734), for the like reason, and also because the increased duty or penalty specified in each of those acts was 50 per cent., and the collector could not exact a less or different one.

Judgment for the plaintiffs for $406.40, with interest.

Circuit Court, D. New York. 1860.

CUSTOMS—DUTY ON BLANKETS.

[The tariff act of 1857 did not change the legal effect of the act of 1846, but operated as a mere reduction of the duties provided for therein.]

At law. This action, which was concluded on Saturday, was brought [by Christ, Jay, & Hess against Augustus Schell] to recover the difference between the duties of fifteen and twenty-four per cent., which latter rate had been exacted by the collector upon an invoice of certain manufactures of wool, styled in the entry and invoice Gentian blankets. The tariff act of 1846 [9 Stat. 42] arranged articles in schedules. In Schedule C, "manufactures of wool not otherwise provided for" were charged with a duty of thirty per cent.; and in Schedule E, "blankets of all kinds" were charged with a duty of twenty per cent. The tariff act of 1857 [11 Stat. 192], reducing the duty on imports, provides that the articles enumerated in Schedule C of the tariff act of 1846, should, after July 1, 1857, pay a duty of twenty-four instead of thirty per cent., and those enumerated in Schedule E should, after the same date, pay fifteen instead of twenty per cent. The plaintiffs contended that they were entitled to enter the goods in question at the rate of fifteen per cent., and submitted that the question to be decided was whether the articles in question were blankets, as commercially known at the date of the tariff act of 1857.

NELSON, Circuit Justice, held that there had been no reconstruction of the tariff act of 1846 by that of 1857; that the latter act did not change the legal operation of the former, but operated as a mere reduction of the duties provided for in it; that the plaintiffs must, therefore, confine their testimony to a time at and previous to the passage of the tariff act of 1846.

The plaintiffs then called five or six witnesses, merchants and clothiers, to prove that the articles in question were commercially known as blankets prior to the act of 1846. Two witnesses on the part of the government testified that the article in question, before the tariff act of 1846, was imported in pieces of thirty or forty yards, and after that time it came in the shape of a pair of blankets, such as the importers produced in court; but that the article in both shapes was used mainly for the manufacture of overcoats.

The jury, having retired under the charge of the court, returned into court, and stated that they were unable to agree. The judge, at their request, again charged them that, if they believed that the article in question had been imported in its present form with a design to evade the legal duty on cloths, that they should find for the defendant. The jury again retired, and, being unable to agree, were discharged until Monday. It is understood that eleven of the jurors were in favor of a verdict for the collector.

MARINE INSURANCE—PAYMENT OF LOSS.

The question raised was whether, under a marine policy of $11,000, the insured could recover the full amount of the policy for a total loss where there had been prior general average loss, upon which the company had paid $1,208, or whether the company was entitled to have that amount deducted from the total amount due on the final loss. The company was held liable to the full face of their policy on final total loss, notwithstanding the payment of prior general average losses.

BANKRUPTCY — AUTHORITY OF ATTORNEY TO ACT AT CREDITORS' MEETING.

An attorney cannot act for a creditor at meetings held in the course of proceedings in bankruptcy, unless authorized to do so by a letter of attorney acknowledged before a register in bankruptcy or United States commissioner.

[Cited in Re Butterfield, Case No. 2,248.]

On certificate of register in bankruptcy.

At the first meeting of the creditors in the above entitled matter, Edward M. Tracewell, Esq., appeared and filed proofs of debt by Marcus M. Kendall and other creditors, and at the same time presented letters of attorney, purporting to have been executed by said creditors for the purpose of authorizing him to act for them in the proceedings herein, the execution of which said letters of attorney had been acknowledged in one instance before a notary public, and in other instances before the clerk of the Crawford circuit court, in the state of Indiana. The register presiding at said meeting declined to receive or recognize the said letters of attorney, or to permit said Tracewell to cast the vote of said creditors in the election of an assignee, as he desired and offered to do; and at his request, the question then arising was certified into court by said register, with the reasons for his action set forth in the following opinion, for the decision of the judge.

By Noble C. Butler, Register: The bankrupt law provides (§ 23 [14 Stat. 528]) that "any creditor may act at all meetings by his duly constituted attorney the same as though personally present." Neither the law as orignally enacted, nor any of the amendments thereto, prescribe the manner in which an attorney may be "duly constituted." The justices of the United States supreme court, under the authority conferred upon them by the 10th section of the law, authorized the appointment of attorneys by special and general letters of attorney. Forms Nos. 14 and 26. No form of acknowledging the execution of either of these is given, but in a note at the close of the latter form it is stated that the creditor "may acknowledge the same before a judge, register, clerk or commissioner of the court, or any officer authorized to take acknowledgments of deeds or other instruments in writing." Subsequently the justices of the supreme court in their revision of the general orders in bankruptcy [made at December term, 1871, explicitly][2] designated registers in bankruptcy and United States commissioners, as the only officers before whom such acknowledgments may be taken. See general order No. 34. The recent amendment to the bankrupt law, which authorizes notaries-public to take proofs of debt in bankruptcy cases, does not change the requirements of general order No. 34, as to letters of attorney, but is wholly silent concerning them. The execution of the letters of attorney, presented by Mr. Tracewell, having been acknowledged before neither one of the officers named in said general order No. 34, I do not think that the person to whom they are addressed can be regarded as the "duly constituted attorney," within the meaning of the bankrupt law, of the creditors who subscribed the same; or that he can be permitted to act for them in the selection of an assignee or otherwise in the proceedings herein.

E. M. Tracewell, for M. M. Kendall and others, creditors.

Woodbury, Peckinpaugh & Zenor, for objecting creditors.

TREAT, District Judge. The decision of the register is in all things affirmed.

Proofs of debt taken before a notary public, who is the attorney for the creditor, are not admissible. In re Nebe [Case No. 10,073].

CHRISTMAN v. HAYNES.

[8 N. B. R. (1873) 528.][1]

District Court, E. D. New York.

BANKRUPTCY — INSOLVENT DEBTOR — SUFFERING SEIZURE AND SALE ON EXECUTION — SUIT BY ASSIGNEE—MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

1. An insolvent debtor, within four months before the filing of a petition in bankruptcy, suffered his property to be seized and sold on execution by a creditor who had reasonable cause to believe the debtor insolvent at that time. Held, that the assignee in bankruptcy was entitled to a judgment against the creditor for the value of the property seized on the execution.

2. In this case the value of the property was fixed at the amount the creditor authorized to be endorsed upon the execution.

BENEDICT, District Judge. The present is a clear case. A bankrupt, Annie Hentall, within four months before the filing of a petition in bankruptcy against her, suffered her property to be seized on execution by the defendant, with the intent to give the defendant a preference over the other creditors. She was then insolvent, and the defendant had reasonable cause to believe her to be insolvent at the time. When chargeable with such knowledge, he took the proceedings which resulted in a judgment against the bankrupt and a subsequent transfer to him by the sheriff, through the machinery of a sale under this execution, of all the property of the bankrupt, to the exclusion of her other creditors. The evidence brings the case fully within the decisions of the circuit and supreme courts of the United States, and entitles the assignee to a judgment against the defendant for the value of the property. The testimony does not show very clearly what that value is. It is at least one thousand two hundred and two dollars; for the defendant, when he received the property, endorsed that sum upon his execution. The bankrupt says it was worth more and that if sold at retail would have realized as much as two thousand three hundred and forty dollars. But I do not feel justified upon her evidence, as she gives it, to give judgment against the defendant for the sum she states as being the value of the property received by him. Upon the evidence the judgment against the defendant must be for one thousand two hundred and two dollars, unless the plaintiff elect a reference at his own expense to take further evidence as to the actual value of the property of the bankrupt taken by the sheriff and delivered to defendant.

PATENTS—"PUMP FILTERS"—VALIDITY — REISSUE —CONCLUSIVENESS OF COMMISSIONER'S DECISION —INFRINGEMENT—DISCLAIMER—COSTS.

1. The re-issued letters patent granted to John Christman, March 24th, 1874, for an "improvement in pump filters," on the surrender of original letters patent granted to him November 28th, 1865, are valid, as respects the first claim.

[Cited in Dederick v. Cassell, 9 Fed. 308.]

2. The decision of the commissioner of patents as to the existence of a ground for re-issue set forth in section 53 of the act of July 8, 1870 (16 Stat. 205), is conclusive.

3. The said re-issued patent has not new matter introduced into its specification in violation of said section 53; nor is it open to the objection that it is not for the same invention, or for any invention, described in the original specification as the invention of the patentee.

4. It was lawful, under the decision in The Corn Planter Patent, 23 Wall. [90 U. S.] 181, to re-issue said patent with claims to combinations of fewer elements than were contained in the combination claimed in the claim of the original patent, the sub-combinations of the re-issue entering into a larger combination claimed in the original.

[Cited in Wilson v. Coon, 6 Fed. 620.]

5. The claims of said re-issued patent, namely, "1. The combination of a wire gauze, C, with an open grating or guard, A, of sufficient strength for the purpose required, and a point, A', constructed substantially as and for the purposes described. 2. The combination of a grating, A, having apertures through it for the passage of the water to the interior, forming the lower end of a pump tube, with a wire gauze, C, for filtering the water, substantially as described," are claims to combinations and not merely to aggregations of parts. The question of the infringement of the first claim, considered. The second claim is void for want of novelty.

6. The plaintiff was allowed to recover on the first claim, on making, before a decree, a disclaimer as to the second claim, it not appearing that there had been any unreasonable neglect or delay to enter such disclaimer, but, as the disclaimer was not made before the suit was brought, costs to the plaintiff were refused.

J. J. Greenough and Irving G. Vann, for plaintiffs.

David Wright, for defendants.

BLATCHFORD, Circuit Judge. This suit is brought on re-issued letters patent granted to John Christman, March 24th, 1874, for an "improvement in pump filters." The specification says: "In pointed pump tubes heretofore essayed, difficulties have arisen in keeping them free from clogging and rendering them efficient. My invention was made to overcome these difficulties, in which I have fully succeeded. The construction of my apparatus is substantially as follows, referring to the accompanying drawing, which is a side elevation of the filtering point made for driving, affixed to the lower end of a pump tube, with the side grating A broken, to show the wire gauze, C. I form an open grating A, of rods of proper sized wire of a convenient length and form, the upper ends of which are permanently affixed to a collar or head piece, B, on which a screw may be cut, to affix it to the lower end of the pump tube, D. This screw may be cut on the inside, as shown by the drawing, or on the outside, as preferred, the joint being made in any well known way. The open grate A extends down cylindrically in the drawing a sufficient distance, and is thence tapered and brought into a solid point, A', as in the drawing; or it may be made rounded or square, so there is a solid, compact end adapted to the purposes intended. Inside the grating A, I insert another tube, C, made of wire gauze, and covering the spaces between the bars of the grate A, and properly fastened in place, which, I find, makes, in connection with the strong supporting grating, a perfect filter, to be used at the bottom of pump tubes. Where it is required, as in quicksands, &c., there may be a filtering medium put inside the wire gauze, to resist the outside pressure; but, for ordinary cases, no such packing is necessary." The claims of the re-issue are as follows: "1. The combination of a wire gauze, C, with an open grating or guard, A, of sufficient strength for the purpose required, and a point, A', constructed substantially as and for the purposes described. 2. The combination of a grating, A, having apertures through it for the passage of water to the interior, forming the lower end of a pump tube, with a wire gauze, C, for filtering the water, substantially as described."

The original letters patent were granted to John Christman, November 28, 1865, for an "improvement in pump filters." The specification of the original says: "Be it known, that I, John Christman, of the city of Syracuse, N. Y., have invented a new and improved pump filter, and I do hereby declare that the following is a full, clear and exact description of the construction of the same and the form thereof, when complete, reference being had to the annexed drawings making a part of this specification. The letters used represent the same parts wherever they occur. To enable others skilled in the art to make and use my invention, I will proceed to describe the construction of the filter, and its form when complete and ready for use. I use any kind of common wire and arrange sections thereof in a tubular form, A, so that the longitudinal sections a, a, a, a, &c., will form an open grate. The ends of the wire sections designed for the lower part of the filter are welded together in a compact form, which may be round, pointed or square across. The ends of the wire sections designed for the upper part of the filter are made to pass between two shoulders, b the inner one and c the outer one, forming a part of the round head-piece B, thus keeping them in a circular or tubular form, and, to hold the same firmly, the outer shoulder, c, may be soldered down upon the wire sections, and the same thus held securely in their places. The head-piece will be of sufficient length, so that the upper end thereof may receive the cut of a screw, either on the inside or the outside, as may be desirable, as seen at d, to receive the pump tube D. Fitting the inside of the wire tube thus formed I insert another tube, C, made of common wire gauze, and the two thus formed make a strong and perfect filter to be used at the bottom of pump tubes. The tube of wire gauze may, in case there is quicksand, be packed with charcoal or other filtering substances, but, for ordinary use, no such packing would be necessary." The claim of the original patent was this: "A pump filter, composed of the parts A, B and C, substantially as and for the purposes described."

It is contended, for the defendants, that the re-issue is void. The petition for the re-issue sets forth, that, by reason of an insufficient or defective specification, the original patent is inoperative or invalid, and that such error arose from inadvertence, accident or mistake, and without any fraudulent or deceptive intention. This is a ground of re-issue set forth in section 53 of the act of July 8, 1870 (16 Stat. 205). The decision as to the fact so set forth belonged exclusively to the commissioner of patents, and his action conclusively established that fact. Seymour v. Osborne, 11 Wall. [78 U. S.] 516, 543–545; Herring v. Nelson [Case No. 6,424].

It is further contended, that new matter has been introduced into the specification of the re-issue, in violation of section 53 of the act of 1870. It is urged, that the original specification states the invention to be "a new and improved pump filter," while the re-issued specification states the invention to be "an improvement in pump filters;" that the original claims the whole and nothing less, while the re-issue makes two claims, neither of which claims the whole or includes the collar or head piece B; and that the first two sentences, above cited, in the re-issued specification, are new matter. These two sentences cannot properly be called "new matter," within the meaning of the statute. They do not at all relate to the description or operation of the apparatus of the patentee. The difficulties stated to have existed in prior pointed pump tubes may well have been known to the patentee from hearsay, although the first driven well point he may have seen was his own. Certainly, as the patentee's pump tube is a pointed pump tube, and as it does overcome the difficulties in clogging in such a tube, the presumption is that it was made to overcome such difficulties, and, therefore, that such difficulties had been heard of by the patentee.

It is further urged that the original specification describes the invention as applicable to all pump filters, whether used upon points for driven wells, or upon well tubes used in open wells or cisterns or streams, while the re-issued specification introduces new matter by confining the invention to driven wells only. This is claimed to be shown by the fact that the original states that "the ends of the wire sections designed for the lower part of the filter are welded together in a compact form, which may be round, pointed or square across." In the re-issue it is stated that the open grating, A, is formed of rods of proper sized wire, of a convenient length and form, the upper ends of which are permanently affixed to a collar or head piece, B, and that the open grate extends down cylindrically a sufficient distance, and is thence tapered and brought into a solid point, A'. The original states that sections of wire are arranged in a tubular form, A, so that the longitudinal sections form an open grate. It is contended, that, as there is no A' in the original drawing, and as A in that drawing includes the whole of the open grate from the welded point to the head piece, B, and as, in the re-issue drawing, the cylindrical part is lettered A, and the tapered part is lettered A', the restriction in the re-issue, of the grating A to the cylindrical part above the taper, and the lettering A' in the reissue drawing, are new matter not warranted by the original drawing or model. It is contended, that, in this, there is a violation not only of the provision of section 53 of the act of 1870 in regard to new matter, but a violation of the provision of that section, that, in case of a machine patent, neither the model nor the drawings shall be amended, except each by the other; that a new division or element is made in the drawing, called A'; that the drawing has been amended by dividing the grating into two parts, without any warrant therefor from the model; and that this was a material change, because it was intended to change the original hollow point, as described in the original specification and as shown in the original drawing and by the model, into a solid point, including all of the tapering part as solid matter.

There is no substantial difference between the drawing attached to the original patent and that attached to the re-issued patent. The form of the whole structure, as a whole, is the same in each. The forms of the several parts are the same in each. In each, the protecting grating is cylindrical above and then tapers below, in the form of an inverted cone, to a point. In the original drawing the whole grating, from the head piece to the point, is lettered A. In the re-issue drawing the cylindrical part of the grating is lettered A, and the tapering part is lettered A'.

It is not perceived that there is any force in these objections taken by the defendants. The drawing of the original patent shows a pointed pump tube, capable of being driven to make a driven well. The original specification says: "The ends of the wire sections designed for the lower part of the filter are welded together in a compact form, which may be round, pointed or square across." There is nothing in this language, properly construed, which indicates that the patentee contemplated the use of the structure in any other well than a driven well. It speaks of the "wire sections designed for the lower part of the filter." The "lower part of the filter" is the part from where the taper begins, downward. The ends of these wire sections, that is, their lower ends, are welded together in a compact form. Why in a compact form? Evidently, to get a driving point. Unless the ends were compact, in the sense of being compacted to a point, there could be no driving. There is no suggestion that the lower ends are to be rounded or square across. If they were, they could not be driven. The words "which may be round, pointed or square across" refer to something which may at the same place be, optionally, either round, pointed or square across. The extreme lower end may be pointed, but, for a driven well, it cannot be round or square across. It is not the "ends" which are to be "round, pointed or square across." It is "the lower part of the filter" which is to be "round, pointed or square across." The lower part of the filter is the part from where the taper begins, downward. Such part may not have its up and down outside line, from the lower end of the cylindrical part downward to the end, the line of a cone, as in the drawing, but such outside line may be rounded and more bulging than the line of a cone, so it be not of greater diameter than the cylindrical part, provided the lower ends of the wires are welded together in a compact form; or, such part may be pointed, that is, its outside line may be the line of a cone, going in a straight line from the lower end of the cylindrical part to the point; or, such point may be square across, that is, it may be an inverted pyramid, with its cross section any where a square, provided the lower ends of the wires in the four sides are welded together in a compact form. This is the only reasonable meaning of the words. They are inartificially put together, but in the re-issue the language is: "The open grate, A, extends [down][2] cylindrically in the drawing a sufficient distance, and is then tapered and brought into a solid point, A', as in the drawing, or it may be made rounded or square, so there is a solid compact end adapted to the purposes intended." In the drawing, the open grate, A, does extend down cylindrically for a distance, and it "is then tapered." That is, the open grate continues in the tapered part. The tapered part is not all of it solid. After that part of the tapered part which is an open grate, comes the solid driving point into which the tapered open grate is brought. The letter A', in the drawing of the re-issue, is not at or near the solid point. It is opposite the open grating, on the tapered part. The statement, that the open grate, after leaving the cylindrical form, "is then tapered and brought into a solid point, A', as in the drawing," does not mean that A' is the solid point, or that the solid point is A', or that the whole of the tapered part is solid. It means that the part below the cylindrical part is A', that it is tapered as it goes down, that it is brought at its lower end into a solid point, and that the whole part which is thus tapered and brought into a solid point is designated as A', in the drawing. The statement further is, that the part which is tapered, that is, conical, or, as in the original, pointed, may, alternatively, be made rounded or square, or, as in the original, round or square across, in the senses before explained. There is a proviso, that, in each one of the three cases, there must be a solid compact end, adapted to the purposes intended, that is, for a pointed pump tube made for driving. This same idea is found in the original specification and drawing, taken together. There is no new matter, in this regard, in the re-issued specification or in the re-issue drawing. Nor is the added lettering, A', new matter. It is not perceived that any intention is disclosed, in the re-issue, to make the whole of the tapering part solid.

It is further contended, that the re-issue is not for the same invention, or for any invention, described in the original specification as the invention of the patentee. The cases of Gill v. Wells, 22 Wall. [89 U. S.] 1, and Russell v. Dodge, 93 U. S. 460, are relied on as authorities. The claim of the original patent was this: "A pump filter, composed of the parts A, B and C, substantially as and for the purposes described." It is urged that such claim included the three distinct parts A, B and C, in combination, embracing the whole of the structure described; that there is no suggestion, in the original specification, that the patentee had invented any combination of parts less than the whole; and that each of the claims of the re-issue is for a combination of parts less than the whole, and is, therefore, void. The view taken by this court, in Herring v. Nelson (before cited), of the decisions in Gill v. Wells and Russell v. Dodge, seems to me to be a sound one. Under the decision in The Corn Planter Patent, 23 Wall. [90 U. S.] 181, which was subsequent to that in Gill v. Wells, the re-issue in the present case cannot be held to be void. The drawings of the original and the re-issue being the same, and the two specifications describing the same mechanical structure, with the same mode of operation, it must be held to be lawful to re-issue the patent with claims to combinations of fewer elements than were contained in the combination claimed in the claim of the original patent. The original claimed a general and larger combination, and the re-issue claims sub-combinations which enter into such general and larger combination. Such a re-issue was sustained in The Corn Planter Patent [supra], on the ground that the re-issue was for things contained within the apparatus described in the original patent, and against the effort to control the case by the decision in Gill v. Wells [supra]. It is of no importance that the wire gauze, C, may not, by itself, have been new, or that the open grating or guard, A, may not, by itself, have been new, or that any other ingredient of the combinations claimed in the re-issue may not, by itself, have been new, so long as the combinations, as claimed, were new.

As stated before, A', in the drawing of the re-issue, and in the text of the re-issued specification, does not mean the solid point alone, by itself, but includes the whole of the tapering part, which tapering part is an open grate from the lower end of the cylindrical part of the open grate down to where the solid compact end begins, and the solid compact end forms the rest of the tapering part, and the rest of A'. The re-issued specification says that the open grate is tapered from where its cylindrical part stops, that is, that the open grate continues into the tapered part down to where the solid compact end begins. The drawing shows that. So, where the first claim of the re-issue speaks of "a point, A'," it means the whole of what is lettered A', the whole of what is so tapered, from the lower end of the cylindrical part to the lower end of the solid compact end, and it does not mean merely the solid compact end.

It is further contended, that the two claims of the re-issue do not claim combinations but claim merely aggregations of parts. The object of the combination claimed in the first claim is to enable the structure to be driven into the earth, and there serve for a pump and a filter, without being injured in driving. Nothing less than a combination of all the elements in such combination will accomplish all the objects which such combination will accomplish. So, too, the grating and the wire gauze of the second claim act in combination, in controlling the passage of the water from the outside of the grating to the interior of the wire gauze. The objection is not regarded as tenable.

The application for Christman's original patent was filed in the patent office August 1st, 1865. The invention was made by h m in the spring of 1864. The model sent by him to the patent office was made in the spring of 1865. The patent to Phelps and Holton, of June 12th, 1855, for a "metallic medium for filtering," describes the use, for filtering water, of several thicknesses of fine wire gauze prepared by passing it through metallic rolls under a sufficient pressure to flatten the wire and reduce the interstices. There is no suggestion of a driven well, or of a protecting grating, or of any necessity for such grating. The patent to De Buffon, of April 14th, 1857, for an "improved apparatus for filtering liquids," describes a structure consisting of an internal metal tube, perforated with holes, through which the filtered water passes, and surrounded on the outside by a wire gauze cylinder, the space between the two cylinders being filled with permeable materials. There is no suggestion of a driven well. The patent to May, of August 1st, 1865, is subsequent in date to Christman's invention.

Hewitt's deep well pump, used in 1858, 1859 and 1860, was a perforated basket attachment, with wire gauze wound around its outside, as a water strainer. It could not be taken down by the driving of a well point. The apparatus of Hughes was a perforated pipe with a screen of wire gauze around it, and was not for driving. The apparatus of Suggett was a single tube for driving, with a point, and with perforations in the tube above the top of the point.

In the defendants' apparatus there is a perforated tube, surrounded on the outside by two thicknesses of finely perforated copper, and a covering of perforated metal outside of the perforated copper. Below this is a solid well point for driving. This solid point is enlarged near its upper part, so as to be larger in diameter than the pipe above, and thus afford additional protection to the finely perforated copper. The defendants allege that their structure does not infringe the claims of Christman's re-issue. They insist that their perforated tube and driving well point are like those used by Suggett before Christman's invention, and that their finely perforated copper, if substantially wire gauze, is the wire gauze of Phelps and Holton and of De Buffon and of Hewitt and of Hughes; that they use no wires, and have no wire grating and no head piece; that their driving point is solid from where the tapering begins and not at all open;[3] that the plaintiffs' structure cannot have its tapering part enlarged at its upper part; and that it required no invention to cover the perforated part of Suggett's apparatus with wire gauze or finely perforated copper sheets.

The defendants' apparatus can be driven, and then remain as a pump bottom and a filter. The filter in it is substantially wire gauze, and such filter is protected, in driving, by the perforated outside metal. The enlargement of the top of the point may be an added protection, but the office of the metal pipe outside of the finely perforated copper is to protect the latter while the structure is being driven and afterwards. Such outside perforated metal pipe, while it protects the copper inside of it, permits the water to freely pass inwardly through it, and it is substantially an open grating. The combination found in the first claim of the plaintiffs' reissue is substantially found in the defendants' structure. The defendants have substantially a wire gauze filter with a protecting grating or guard outside of it, of sufficient strength for the purpose required, and a tapering driving point. The perforated tube inside of the copper is an addition, which does not destroy the combination of the copper with the protecting guard outside of it. The plaintiffs' tapering part may have a less part of it solid than the defendants' tapering part, but all that is necessary is to have enough of it solid or compact, beginning at the lowest point, to enable it to be driven, according to the nature of the soil. It is in evidence, that structures like that described and shown in the specifications and drawings of Christman's original and re-issued patents were driven by him in 1865, and have worked successfully ever since. If the solid point for driving is sustained by a rigid metallic tubular grating that connects it with the pump tube above, that is all that is essential. Whether this connection be by a head piece or collar, where the open grating is of wires, or whether the head piece is omitted because unnecessary, where the grating is of inflexible metal, is not of the essence of Christman's invention. In either case, the structure is equally carried by the driving of the tube, so as to arrive at its resting place in a condition to act perfectly as a filter. It, therefore, appears that the combination covered by the first claim of the plaintiffs' re-issued patent is found in the defendants' structure. It also appears, that such combination is not found in any of the prior structures adduced by the defendants, and that it involved the exercise of invention to arrive at such combination, in view of everything that previously existed.

The combination covered by the second claim of the plaintiffs' re-issue seems to be a combination of the grating above the tapering part with the wire gauze inside of such grating, excluding the tapering part and the driving point, and to have no exclusive relation to a driven well, though capable of use in it. Aside from driving, the combination of the grating and the wire gauze, as a filter, is the same thing, as a combination, whether the wire gauze is inside of the grating or outside of it, so long as the apparatus is at the lower end of a pump tube. In this view Hewitt and Hughes anticipated Christman as to such second claim, and it is invalid, provided the testimony is available to the defendants. Hughes, Hewitt, Field and McCue testify to substantially the same prior arrangement. None of them are named in the answer. Although the testimony of Hughes was objected to, on that account, when taken, the testimony of the other three witnesses was not objected to.

Although the second claim is invalid, for want of novelty, the plaintiff can recover on the first claim, under section 60 of the act of July 8, 1870 (16 Stat. 207), now section 4922 of the Revised Statutes, although no disclaimer has been made as yet as to the second claim, provided that, prior to the entry of the decree herein, as to such first claim, they make a disclaimer, under section 4917 of the Revised Statutes, as to the second claim, it not appearing that there has been, heretofore, any unreasonable neglect or delay to enter such disclaimer; but, as such disclaimer was not entered before the commencement of this suit, the plaintiffs will not be entitled to recover any costs of this suit. Rev. St. § 4922.

Let a decree be entered for an account of profits and damages and for a perpetual injunction, as to the first claim.

COLLISION IN DOCK—NEGLIGENCE—LINES—COSTS.

1. A small schooner, the C. C., moored for the winter outside another vessel at a pier in Haverstraw bay, broke adrift during a storm, and, before fresh lines were made fast so as to hold her, ran into a canal boat lying on the other side of the slip, broke her fastenings and beached her. The canal boat was not in charge of any person, and before the owner came back to the town had become a wreck. He made some effort to discover who did the damage, but could not find out anything for more than a year. Then he libelled the schooner: Held, that, upon the evidence, the schooner was in fault, not being properly fastened, and not using due diligence in getting out fresh lines when her bow fasts gave way, and therefore the libellant must recover his damages.

2. Lines, intended to hold a vessel, so fastened that they must be cast off when a strain comes upon them, are no lines.

3. Costs must be awarded the libellant, notwithstanding his delay in bringing his suit, because of the willingness shown by the claimant to keep him in ignorance as to who did the damage.

In admiralty. The schooner, Christopher Columbus, owned by parties in Haverstraw, N. Y., was laid up for the winter at a dock in Haverstraw bay. She was fastened by a bow line to the dock and other lines to a vessel inside of her. During a storm her bow line parted and she swung round so as to threaten damage to the other vessel, whereupon the other lines were cast off, and she drifted across the slip, struck a canal boat lying fastened to the pier on the other side, broke her fastenings, knocked off her cabin and did some other damage before those on board the schooner got out fresh lines to hold her. The canal boat was also laid up for the winter and was without a keeper, her captain and owner having gone to the interior of the state, and the schooner's men did not attempt to make her fast again. She gradually worked up on the beach and before spring went to pieces, no one paying attention to her. After some time the owner heard of his loss, came down to Haverstraw, and made inquiries to find who did the damage; but no one could or would give him the information till a year and seven months after the accident, when he filed a libel against the schooner to recover his damages.

R. D. Benedict and Thomas C. Campbell, for libellant.

Elliot F. Shepard, for claimant.

BENEDICT, District Judge. This is an action brought to recover for injuries to the canal boat J. P. Hewitt, caused by a collision between that vessel and the schooner Christopher Columbus, which occurred at Haverstraw in 1870. It appears that those two vessels had been laid up for the winter between a dock, called the West dock, and another called Peck's dock, at Haverstraw. The canal boat lay above West's dock, and the schooner lay above her, but on the opposite side of the slip, moored alongside another vessel, to which vessel she was fastened, as well as to Peck's Dock. On the morning of the accident a wind arose, by which the fasts of the schooner were broken and she was carried across the slip and against the canal boat, causing the injuries complained of.

Two questions of fact are raised by the evidence, upon which the liability of the schooner depends, viz.: whether the schooner was properly secured, and whether the drifting of the schooner against the canal boat could have been prevented by the exercise of due diligence, after the fasts were broken. Upon both these questions my opinion is adverse to the schooner. The evidence shows, that while the schooner had lines sufficiently strong to hold her if properly fastened, she was so fastened as to make her safety depend upon a single part of a three-inch hawser, run to a spile on the dock. There were other lines out to the schooner which lay inside, but when the headline parted it became necessary to cast them off to avoid damage to that schooner. If these lines had been run to the dock, instead of to the schooner inside, it can hardly be doubted that the vessel would not have gone adrift. Lines, so fastened that they must be cast off when the strain comes upon them, are no lines. The fact, that of the two vessels moored on the lower side of Peck's dock, only the smaller and lighter vessel broke adrift, also leads to the conclusion that some defect existed in the fastening of the lighter vessel. I find, therefore, that the drifting of the schooner was the result of negligence in omitting to have more fastenings from the schooner to the dock forward. It seems also to me that reasonable activity on the part of those upon the Columbus, when the bow line parted, would have enabled them at that late time to have run a line to the dock and thus to have held the vessel. If this be so, there is also negligence in this regard.

I must, therefore, award to the libellant his damages sustained by the collision in question, and he must also recover his costs. I should refuse him costs because of the delay in instituting his action, were it not that the evidence indicates a willingness on the part of the claimant, to say the least, that the inquiries made to ascertain the names of the parties responsible for the damage should prove unsuccessful,—as they did, according to the evidence, for a year and nine months. Decree for libellant, with order of reference to ascertain the amount.

COLLISION—DAMAGES—SUBSEQUENT INJURY.

1. A schooner, having parted her lines during a storm, as she lay at a pier, was held liable for the damages occasioned to a canal boat against which she was driven. The canal boat had no one on board. She was injured by the collision. Her lines were also parted by the collision, and she was left so as to be subject to additional injury from the storm. The commissioner, to whom it was referred to report the damages sustained by the canal boat by the collision, reported as such damages the value of the boat as being totally lost. Exceptions were filed to the report. Held, that the schooner was liable for all the damages sustained by the canal boat, both from the collision and from the storm subsequently.

2. That, on the conflict of evidence, the court would not disturb the finding of the commissioner who had had the witnesses before him.

[In admiralty. A decree was given for libellant, with a reference to ascertain the amount of damages (Case No. 2,705), and the cause is now heard on exceptions to the commissioner's report.]

T. C. Campbell, for libellant.

E. F. Shepard, for claimant.

BENEDICT, District Judge. This case comes before the court upon exceptions to a commissioner's report of the damage arising from a collision between the schooner Christopher Columbus and the canal boat J. P. Hewitt. The canal boat had been laid up at Haverstraw, and when injured by the Christopher Columbus was in a proper location, but without any person on board of her. The accident occurred on March 16th, 1870, when, during a storm, the Christopher Columbus parted her fastenings and was driven upon the canal boat, so as to carry off her cabin, break her transom, part her lines and leave her subject to additional injury from the storm during its continuance. Upon the trial it was held that the collision between the vessels arose from negligence on the part of the Christopher Columbus, and it was referred to a commissioner to ascertain the amount of damages arising from such collision. Upon such reference a mass of testimony was taken before the commissioner upon the question of damages, and he has reported the sum of $1,300, with interest, being the value of the canal boat as totally lost, with interest. The correctness of this report is now to be determined by the court. Upon the evidence I am of the opinion that the schooner is liable for all the injuries sustained by the canal boat by the actual contact of the boats and by the storm of March 16th. The schooner was bound to know that she had parted the boat's lines and placed her in peril of further immediate injuries from the storm then raging. It was apparent that there was no one on board the canal boat, and under such circumstances it was the duty of the schooner to secure the boat again and do all that in her lay to prevent further immediate injury to the boat. If no efforts would diminish the injury to the boat, the responsibility for her condition rests upon the schooner. If timely efforts would have prevented further loss, the schooner was bound to make such efforts, and she made none. The injuries sustained by the boat on this occasion, as well by the elements as by the actual contact with the schooner, were the natural results of the schooner's acts and omissions, and may therefore with entire justice be charged to her as the damages caused by the collision in question.

As to the extent of these injuries the evidence is conflicting, but the weight of it appears to sustain the view taken by the commissioner, that they were such as to render her worthless. No doubt some injury was caused to the boat by winds and waves during the ten days that elapsed between the time of the accident and the time that the owner was notified of the occurrence, but the evidence points to the conclusion that the accident left the boat of little value. I therefore concur with the commissioner that the value of the boat before the accident is the measure of the damages to be recovered in this action. That value the commissioner, upon very conflicting evidence, has found to be $1,300. There is evidence to show that the boat was worth this if worth anything. Plainly she was a boat able to do work and of some value. The value found is supported by testimony apparently trustworthy; and the finding having been made after seeing the witnesses, I should hardly feel justified in disturbing it, even if I had more doubt than I have as to its substantial correctness. The exception is therefore overruled and the report confirmed.

LIBEL FOR REPAIRS.

Where a vessel goes from her home port to another state for the express purpose of being repaired, and the owners have no personal credit, a libel will lie against her at her home port for the balance due for such repairs.

[Cited in The James Farrell, 36 Fed. 501.]

Magee, Oleson, & Adkinson, for respondents.

BLODGETT, District Judge. This is a libel for repairs made by the Manitowoc Dry Dock Company, upon the schooner Christopher North, in the month of September, 1872. The facts of the case appear to be these: The Christopher North was owned in the city of Chicago, by Jacob Hansen and one Scharvey. She was in need of repairs, and for the purpose of having her repaired in the best and most economical manner, one of her owners, Hansen, went to Manitowoc and made a contract there with the Manitowoc Dry Dock

Company, a corporation doing business at Manitowoc, Wis., in the repair and building of vessels. This company were to do certain repairs to the vessel, for which they were to receive a fixed price, half the money down, and the remainder in sixty days. After making the contract, Hansen telegraphed to Scharvey, who was captain and part owner of the vessel, to make sail with her for Manitowoc for the purpose of having her repaired there. The schooner accordingly proceeded to Manitowoc, and underwent the repairs which had been ordered. When they were completed and the vessel ready to leave the dock, a draft was made for one-half of the expense, the captain giving a certificate of indebtedness for the remaining half, and certifying that it was for repairs done to the schooner, payable in sixty days. On account of this indebtedness the libel was filed against the schooner.

The defense is now interposed that this work was done upon the credit of the owners, and not upon the credit of the vessel, although it was done in a foreign port, Chicago being the port of the Christopher North. She, however, did not leave this port upon a commercial voyage in the ordinary course of maritime employment, but for the express purpose of receiving these repairs, and the question is whether upon the facts of the case the relations of the parties are not precisely the same as though these repairs had been made while the vessel was in the home port; whether for the purpose of these repairs Manitowoc may not be said to have been the home port of this vessel, and whether it was not upon personal credit rather than upon the credit of the vessel that the repairs were made. The evidence shows that the owners of the vessel were not men in financial credit. One of them was a shoemaker residing in this city, and the other was master of the vessel, and having no means outside of his interest in the vessel to give him credit. Neither of the owners had any property or credit at Manitowoc aside from this vessel. There is no doubt but that if this vessel had put into the port of Manitowoc to undergo repairs, that these repairs would have been a lien on the vessel upon the facts shown, and, although the owner took the precaution to go to Manitowoc and make a contract before taking the vessel there, yet that, it seems to me, does not divest the parties making the repairs of their maritime lien. Under the circumstances of the case it seems to me that the court must find, as a matter of fact, that the repairs were made on the credit of the vessel.

[The further objection is made to this proceeding, for the reason alleged in the answer, that the vessel, as soon as the repairs in question were made upon her, was libeled in this court and sold under a decree. The present owners own her under the sale made in pursuance of this decree. But there is no proof upon that point. If it is true, I should be obliged to hold that the present owners hold her free and clear of this lien because of that sale. The parties should have come into court and put in their claim before the sale, and I do not think, although one of the present owners is the same man, Scharvey, who was captain of her at the time, that the principle is changed. I find nothing in that. That objection, I think, must be overruled for want of proof in the record.][2]

The decree will be for the amount due on the certificate of indebtedness.

RESCISSION OF CONTRACT OF SALE — RETURN OF SUBJECT MATTER—ACTION ON PROMISSORY NOTE —DEFENSES.

1. To rescind a contract for the sale of a chattel, the property must be returned, unless it be valueless to both parties.

2. A plea to an action on a note given for the consideration, which avers that the goods purchased are of no value to defendant, is not good.

Powell & Bryan, for plaintiffs.

Mr. Southwick, for defendant.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This is an action on a note. The defendant pleaded that the note was given for merchandise which was represented to be sound, but was unsound and damaged. To this plea the defendant demurred, on the ground that there was no offer to return the goods. A vendee of a chattel cannot rescind the sale without offering to return it, unless it is worthless to both parties. Perley v. Balch, 23 Pick. 283. To render a rescission of a contract valid, the rescinding party must place the other party in statu quo. Holbrook v. Burt, 22 Pick. 546; Conner v. Henderson, 15 Mass. 319. The plea avérs, "that the goods were unsound and damaged, so as to be of no value to defendant." But there is no averment that they are of no value. For the purposes of the defendants they may have been, to them, of no value; but it does not appear that, if returned to the plaintiffs, they would have been of no value to them. The demurrer to the plea is sustained.

LIABILITIES OF COMMON CARRIERS—VARYING BILL OF LADING—CUSTOM AND USAGE.

[1. Where the loss of a portion of a cargo is caused by a "danger of navigation," within the meaning of that term in a bill of lading exempting the carrier from liability for a loss so occasioned, the carrier is entitled to freight upon the portion of the cargo actually delivered.]

[2. The general usage and custom, in the transportation of goods by water, to stow them under deck, annexes to a clean bill of lading; and carriage on deck is such a violation of the contract as will render the carrier liable for loss by a "peril of the sea," notwithstanding that the bill of lading exempts the carrier from liability for loss from such a cause.]

[3. This legal import of the bill of lading implied by the general custom may be varied by proof of the custom of a particular trade, and the contract then withdrawn from the operation of the general rule requiring carriage under deck.]

[Cited in The William Gillum, Case No. 17,693.]

[In admiralty. Libel by John H. Chubb and others against a quantity of oats (Louis Renaud, claimant).]

Mr. Van Santvoord, for libellants.

Mr. Bulkely, for claimant.

SHIPMAN, District Judge. This suit in rem is instituted to recover freight, at eight cents per New York bushel, on 7,800 bushels oats, transported on the libellants' boat, Mary Eva, from St. Antoine, Canada East, to New York, on account of Louis Renaud, of Montreal. A larger quantity of oats was shipped, as appears by the bill of lading, and not denied; but the excess over 7,800 New York bushels was lost overboard during a heavy blow on Lake Champlain. The libellants now seek to recover freight on the quantity actually delivered, and also demurrage for detention of their boat in New York, in consequence of the failure of the claimant's agents to discharge her in proper time.

The bill of lading was, so far any question before the court is concerned, in the usual form. The contract was to carry, and deliver in good order, "the dangers of navigation excepted." I think the proofs establish the fact, that the loss did occur from the dangers of navigation, and is therefore within the exception of the bill of lading, and it would follow that the libellants are entitled to recover their freight money on the quantity delivered, if there were no other question in the case. But the claimant resists this claim, and insists that the value of the oats lost should be first deducted, on the ground that they were stowed on deck in violation of the contract contained in the bill of lading, and that this departure from the contract was the occasion of the loss. The claimant also resists the demand for demurrage.

The bill of lading, under which the oats were shipped, was what is well known in law as a clean bill. It is well settled that the general usage and custom, in the transportation of goods by water, to stow them under deck, annexes to such a contract the condition, as the general rule, that they shall be so carried. If they are carried on deck, it is deemed a violation of the contract; and a loss occasioned thereby, although immediately produced by perils of the sea, falls upon the carrier. The Waldo [Case No. 17,056]; The Peytona [Id. 11,058]; The Paragon [Id. 10,708]. This is the rule which prevails wherever the maritime law is administered. The carrier can, of course, exempt himself from this liability by obtaining the express consent of the shipper. No express consent of the shipper has been proved in the present case. It is, however, insisted that a custom of this particular trade, to stow goods of this description on deck, has been clearly proved; and that the legal effect of this local custom is to relieve this contract from the operation of the general rule. The evidence in support of this custom is objected to by the claimant, on the ground that proof of such a usage is inadmissible to vary the well-known legal import of this contract. This is an important question, and demands an attentive consideration. In deciding this question, it must not be forgotten that this obligation of the master to stow the cargo under deck, does not rest upon any express provision in the bill of lading. That is usually silent on the subject. Neither is the obligation founded upon any legal construction of the terms of the instrument. It is an implication of law drawn from a well-known and general commercial usage or custom. The parties, where they enter into a contract of this character, are understood to recognize the usage, and to include its conditions in the unwritten terms of their agreement. Though the bill of lading is silent on the subject of the place of stowage of the articles named in it, whether in the hold or on deck, the eye of the law reads in every such bill the stipulation that they are to be stowed in the former. The obligation rests on the usage or custom of the maritime world, to which the shipper and carrier are presumed to be consenting parties, and which the law attaches to the instrument itself, where it is silent on the subject. This silence is a recognition of the usage and the rule founded upon it, and binds the parties as firmly as an express and formal stipulation. The Peytona [supra]; The Waldo [supra]; The Paragon [supra]; Vernard v. Hudson [Case No. 16,921].

The question then is presented—Can that part of the legal import of the bill of lading, which is implied by law from the general custom, be varied by proof of the custom of a particular trade, and thus withdraw the contract from the operation of the general rule requiring the cargo to be carried under deck? On this question, the case of The Paragon, above cited, is an authority in point. In that case, Judge Ware says: "It is not denied that such a custom may exist in a particular trade, as well as authorize the master to carry a part of his cargo on deck, without subjecting himself to responsibility for its loss, or any damage it may sustain from dangers of the seas, in being thus exposed." He also adds, after referring to the French Ordinance de la Marine, "In our law, the rule requiring the cargo to be safely stowed under deck, does not stand upon any express text of any act of the legislature, but upon the authority of general usage and custom. A rule of law that is established by custom may be repealed, or restrained by custom." On the nature of the proofs which should be required to establish a special custom of a particular trade, in conflict with the general rule of the maritime law, the same learned judge remarks: "But the general rule being founded on the custom of the country, universally known, and having the force of a general law, he who would exempt himself from its obligation, by a special local custom, is bound to prove the local custom by clear and conclusive evidence. Because the legal presumption is, that every contract is entered into with the understanding and intention of the parties that their rights under it are governed and determined by the general law. A local custom, in order to be binding on the parties and withdraw their contracts from the application of the common law, must be so generally known and understood, that it may fairly be presumed that all persons engaging in that particular trade are acquainted with it, and assenting to it. The presumption, then, will be that they form their engagements with a silent reference to the custom. And the custom, to be obligatory, must not be a loose practice, but precise, definite and certain, so as to supply the place of the general law in the given case, and be capable of being applied to the contract, and defining and fixing the rights of the parties under it. Such a custom, where it is established, and so generally known and recognized that the parties are presumed in their engagements tacitly to refer to it, applies itself to the contract, and forms, as it were, the complement to the terms in which the obligation is expressed by the parties, and, within its proper sphere, is equally binding with the general law." I have cited at length from this opinion, in the case of The Paragon, not because it is an isolated authority, but for the reason that it states the law on this point with singular clearness and accuracy. Judicial decisions to the same effect are abundant. It is well remarked by Hosmer, C. J., in Barber v. Brace, 3 Conn. 13, that the doctrine is "trite and familiar," that "a commercial usage, having existed a sufficient length of time to have become generally known, and to warrant a presumption that contracts are made with reference to it, is evidence of the intention of the parties, and illustrative of their agreement." Nearly the same language is held by the court in New York in Smith v. Wright, 1 Caines, 43. In both of these cases, the question was one of liability for loss of goods stowed on deck. The general doctrine of the admissibility of parol evidence to prove the existence of usage or custom to vary the effect of contracts, is now well settled, both in the English and American courts, and has been repeatedly applied to the contract contained in a clean bill of lading. 1 Conk. Adm. p. 233, and cases there cited. It is true that Mr. Justice Story, in the case of The Reeside [Case No. 11,657], makes some trenchant remarks on the subject, but they are levelled at the abuse, rather than the existence of the doctrine. He concedes the principle, but energetically protests against extending it, so as to embrace "loose and inconclusive usages and customs."

But it is objected that the admission of parol evidence to prove the existence of the custom, where the contract of lading is in writing, contravenes the well-known rule that such evidence is not to be received to vary the terms of the written instrument. But evidence of usage or custom is never deemed within this rule. Renner v. Bank of Columbia, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 581; 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. (5th Am. Ed.) 682; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 292. The case of Creery v. Holly, 14 Wend. 25, is relied on, as sustaining the objection to this evidence. But in that case the question arose not on objection to evidence of a custom, but to evidence of a parol agreement, that the goods might be carried on, instead of under, deck. The opinion of the court is expressed in the following terms: "It is true that nothing is said in the bill as to the manner of stowing away the goods—whether on or under the deck; but the case concedes that the legal import of the contract, as well as the understanding and usage of merchants, impose upon the master the duty of putting them under deck, unless otherwise stipulated; and if such is the judgment of law upon the face of the instrument, parol evidence is as inadmissible to alter it as if the duty was stated in express terms. It was a part of the contract." And, again: "If the implied obligation of the master in this case, arising out of the conceded construction of this bill of lading, may be varied by parol testimony, I do not see how any other stipulation included in it could be sustained in an offer to impeach it in the same way. Following the decisions of the federal courts, we have already suggested that the obligation of the master to stow the goods under deck, is not drawn by construction from the instrument itself, but is an implication of law springing out of the ordinary course of business. This implication of law rests upon general custom, and not upon judicial construction of the written contract. The Peytona [supra]; Vernard v. Hudson [supra]. In the latter case, Mr. Justice Story remarks: "I take it to be very clear, that, where the goods are shipped under a common bill of lading, it is presumed that they are shipped to be put under deck, as the ordinary mode of stowing the cargo. This presumption may be rebutted, by showing a positive agreement between the parties; or, it may be deduced from other circumstances, such, for example, as the goods paying deck freight only. The admission of proof to this effect is perfectly consistent with the rules of law; for it neither contradicts nor varies anything contained in the bill of lading, but it simply rebuts a presumption arising from the ordinary course of business." In that case the bill of lading was in the common form, and a witness was admitted to prove a parol agreement to carry the goods on deck. It is true that the judge, in his comments upon the evidence, incidentally remarks that if such an agreement had existed, "one of two things ought to have occurred, either that mere deck freight should be payable, or that there should have been some written memorandum on the bill of lading, to repel the inference from a full freight being stipulated for." But these latter remarks evidently refer to the preferable character of a written memorandum, and the bearing of its absence on the probability of the existence of such an agreement as that set up, and not to the exclusion of parol evidence of the agreement itself; for he had just previously stated that proof of such an agreement "neither contradicts nor varies anything contained in the bill of lading." But it is not essential, in deciding the case now before the court, to attempt to reconcile the principle laid down in Creery v. Holly, with other cases involving the precise point there determined; or, if it shall be deemed in conflict with them, to go into the inquiry as to which lays down the true doctrine. If that case conflicts with those here cited from the federal courts, we should feel called upon to follow the rule held by the latter. As we have already stated, proof of usage or custom, with reference to which parties are presumed to have entered into their contracts, is, under the law as declared by the courts of the United States, clearly admissible, as to their extent and scope, upon all matters which are not expressed in terms or evolved by construction. And especially where the law attaches conditions to a contract founded, not on the terms of the agreement, but on general custom, proof of a different custom of a particular trade may be given to show that the general custom does not apply to that trade. Indeed, such proof merely shows that, so far as that particular trade is concerned, the general custom does not exist, and therefore no presumption of law can be founded upon it.

We now come to the application of this doctrine to the present case. It is contended by the libellants that they have conclusively proved a clear, well-settled and uniform usage of the particular carrying trade in which this contract had its origin, in conformity to which goods of this description are stowed on deck in bins, as well as under deck. The evidence supports this claim. The route over which this trade passes, after leaving the St. Lawrence river, is by the Chambly river, the Chambly canal to Lake Champlain, down the latter to Whitehall, and from thence by the Champlain canal to the Hudson river, and by the latter to Albany and New York, the usual ports of destination. Owing to the shallow water of the canals, it is always necessary, when a full load is taken, to lighter the boats in passing through them, and this is done by removing the deck load, which is put in bins for that purpose, and replacing it when the deeper water is reached. This is the only way the business can be made remunerative to the carrier. The claimant in this case has long been engaged in shipping grain, including oats, over this route, and is chargeable with knowledge of this uniform usage—a usage which rests on the necessities of the trade as affected by the limited depth of water over the artificial portions of the route. By this arrangement of bins on deck the carrier is able to transport the commodity at less rates of freight than could possibly be done, if he could take only what he could stow under deck. Thus the practice inures to the benefit of the shipper as well as the carrier, and the custom has become uniform and established with the consent and acquiescence of both parties, until it has assumed a clear and well defined usage of the trade. This usage being thus shown by clear proof, it follows that the general custom of the maritime world, by which common bills of lading are understood to import that the goods named in them are to be carried under deck, has no application to this particular trade, and such bills of lading therein are relieved from its operation.

The accident by which a portion of the cargo was lost, occurred in a gale on Lake Champlain, while the libellants' boat was, with others, in tow of a steamer, the usual mode of passing this lake. The bins in which the deck load was contained, appear to have been built in the ordinary manner, staunch and strong; but as the steamer turned Cumberland head, to go into Plattsburg, to avoid the violence of the gale, the boats she had in tow rolled heavily in the trough of the sea, striking against each other with violence, when one of the bins of the libellants' boat gave way, and a portion of the cargo was lost overboard. On a review of the whole evidence on this point, I am satisfied that the loss must be attributed to the perils or dangers of navigation, and is therefore within the exception in the bill of lading. The burden of proof on this point, as well as that touching the existence of the particular custom, is on the libelants, and I think they have made a clear case on both. The libellants are also entitled, on the proofs, to fourteen days' demurrage. As to the rate of demurrage, I am not so clear. The testimony of the libellants on this question is confined mainly to one witness. He evidently states the highest rate. On the whole, I have fixed upon the rate at twenty dollars per day. As there is no serious dispute as to the quantity of oats delivered, or the rate of freight, or the number of days of detention, I see no occasion for a reference. Let a decree, therefore, be entered for the libellants for $624 freight, and $280 demurrage, making in all $904, with interest from December 16, 1861, the date of filing the libel.

Case No. 2,710.

CHUCK et al. v. MESRITZ.

[2 Woods, 204.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Louisiana. April Term, 1876.

COMPOSITION WITH CREDITORS—VALIDITY—SECRET ARRANGEMENT.

If a debtor in embarrassed circumstances enters into an arrangement with all his creditors to pay them a certain proportion of their claims, in consideration of a discharge of their demands, and he privately agrees to give a better or further security to one than to the others, the contract with the other creditors is void.

This case was submitted to the court upon the law and facts, the parties having waived the intervention of a jury.

George W. Race, for plaintiffs.

Thomas J. Cooley and Edward Phillips, for defendants.

WOODS, Circuit Judge. The suit is brought on two promissory notes made by defendant at New Orleans, and payable to his own order, both dated August 26, 1867; one for $652, due November 26, 1867, and the other, $656, due December 26, 1867, with current rate of exchange on New York, and by him indorsed to J. B. Jaroslowskie Brothers & Co., and by them to the plaintiffs. The execution, as well as the indorsement and transfer of the notes is admitted by the answer. The defense set up is as follows: That in February, 1869, an agreement was signed by all the creditors of defendant, including Jaroslowskie Brothers & Co., who then owned the notes sued on, to accept twenty-five per cent. of the amount due on their respective claims, in full satisfaction thereof. Of course it is incumbent on the defendants to establish their defense by the preponderance of evidence. There is some conflict of testimony as to the terms of this agreement, but I think the decided weight of evidence is in favor of the version of plaintiffs, that the defendant agreed with Amberg, a member of the firm of Jaroslowskie Brothers & Co., that if he would procure the written assent of all the other creditors of defendant to accept twenty-five cents on the dollar of their claims, he, the defendant, would pay Jaroslowskie Brothers & Co. their claim in full.

A most persuasive piece of evidence on this point is found in the fact that Berwin, of New Orleans, who acted in the matter of the adjustment as an agent of the defendant, and who furnished the money to the defendant wherewith to pay the twenty-five cents on the dollar, was informed by a letter from Jaroslowskie Brothers & Co., written by Amberg, that he, Amberg, had succeeded in getting the signatures of all the creditors to the contract of compromise, "ours, of course, excepted," stating that some of the creditors had imposed the condition that the money should be paid during the then current month of February, and urging him to instruct Converse & Co. of New York, by telegraph, to pay the amount of the compromise agreed on to the creditors. Berwin, in a letter dated February 22, 1869, acknowledged the receipt of this letter, and adds: "Everything is O. K. I will advise to-morrow Mr. Converse to pay all creditors according to settlement. You can rely upon it that everything is settled in regard to the balance between you and Mr. Mesritz. I had a conversation with him, and he told me he would inform you himself, and will settle everything satisfactory with you." But the defendant says that if the contract between him and Jaroslowskie Brothers & Co. was as claimed by the plaintiff, it was a fraud on the other creditors and void. The authorities sustain this position. Where a debtor, in embarrassed circumstances, enters into an arrangement with all his creditors to pay them a certain proportion of their claims in consideration of a discharge of their demands, if he privately agree to give a better or further security to one than to the others, the contract with the other creditors is void, because the very basis is that each creditor shall receive an equal benefit and take a proportionate share. Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 378, 379, and notes. A neglect by Jaroslowskie Brothers & Co. to make known to the other creditors the fact that they were to be paid in full, while the other creditors were to receive only twenty-five cents on the dollar, was a fraud on the other creditors, and if it was the understanding between Mesritz and Jaroslowskie Brothers & Co. that the arrangement should be kept secret from the other creditors, the contract is void. But if the contract is void, it is void on account of the fraud of both parties. It is void totally. This would leave the parties just where they would have been had no such contract been made.

The case is then in this position: The plaintiffs are the transferees of notes made by the defendant, the execution and transfer of which is admitted. The defendant having failed to prove that Jaroslowskie Brothers &

[1] [Reported by Hon. William B. Woods, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

Co. agreed, in common with the other creditors, to accept twenty-five cents on the dollar of their debt, now insists that if the contract was as claimed by Jaroslowskie Brothers & Co., it was fraudulent and void. If this be conceded, the defendant is in the position of striving to protect himself against a recovery on his own promissory notes, by alleging that the contract by which he agreed to pay them in full was fraudulent, and, therefore, void. The only successful defense that defendant could make was, by establishing the compromise at twenty-five cents on the dollar by a valid contract. In this he has failed. If the contract of compromise was as claimed by Jaroslowskie Brothers & Co., then whether it was valid or void, there must be a recovery against defendant for the full amount of his notes. If valid, the contract bound him to pay the full notes with interest. If the contract was void, the notes bound him to do the same thing. There must be judgment for plaintiff for the amount claimed.

ADVANCES TO SEAMAN BY BROKER—LIABILITY OF VESSEL.

[A vessel is liable for authorized advances to a cook, made by the broker who shipped him, although the cook subsequently deserts, as his continuance on board after being accepted is at the vessel's risk.]

[In admiralty. Libel by James C. Church against the schooner H. L. Scanton for advances.]

BETTS, District Judge. The libellant claims recovery of a payment of wages made by him to a cook hired for the ship. The evidence of a competent agency or authority in the libellant to charge the vessel for his advances is meagre, but may be regarded prima facie sufficient to put the owner or master on defence. The man was shipped as a cook, and was taken on board the schooner in that capacity, after having been paid twenty-five dollars advance wages by the libellant. The master now objects to paying the demand on the allegation that the cook did not perform the voyage he was shipped for, but deserted the ship in this harbor. His continuance on board, after being placed there by the shipping broker, was at the risk of the ship, and she is equitably and legally chargeable for the advance, by accepting him as one of the crew.

Ordered a decree for the libellant for twenty-five dollars, with interest from August 20, 1854, and costs.

Case No. 2,711.

CHURCH v. MARINE INS. CO.

[1 Mason, 341.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Rhode Island. Nov., 1817.

MARINE INSURANCE—TOTAL LOSS.

Where a vessel was stranded, and afterwards, before abandonment, was gotten off without material injury, but was, in the intermediate time, sold by the master at public auction, and purchased by him, it was held, that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover for a total loss.

[Cited in Barker v. Marine Ins. Co., Case No. 992; The Tilton, Id. 14,054; Michoud v. Girod, 4 How. (45 U. S.) 556; Veazie v. Williams, 8 How. (49 U. S.) 152; Allan v. Gillet, 21 Fed. 275; The Gulf Stream, 58 Fed. 606.]

At law. Assumpsit on a policy of insurance on the schooner Topaz for three months, the risk to be continued at the same rate, if, at the time, she shall not have arrived at Providence. The loss was alleged to be by perils of the sea and stranding. Plea, the general issue. At the trial it appeared that the policy was underwritten on the 2d of April, 1816. On the 12th of the same month the vessel was stranded on a bar, called New River bar, about thirty miles below Wilmington, in North Carolina. The master and crew abandoned the vessel soon after the stranding, and returned the next day and got on shore her sails, rigging, &c.; and on the 20th of the same month the hull, as it lay, and the sails and rigging, were, under the direction of the master, who was also a part owner, sold at public auction. The whole was bought by one Kendrick, who was a shipper on board of the schooner; and on the same day he conveyed all his right and title to the master, who immediately took measures to get the schooner off, and on the 23d of the same month, by the assistance of favorable winds and tides, effected his purpose. On the 29th of the same month, the plaintiff, who was a part owner, having received information of the disaster, abandoned to the defendants for a total loss. The schooner received very little damage from the stranding, and was soon repaired, and made a voyage with a cargo to Philadelphia, and from thence safely arrived at Providence. The master certified, that at the time of the stranding he was in prosecution of his voyage under a charter-party with Kendrick, by which he engaged to perform a voyage from New York to New River inlet, there to take a cargo of lumber for Wilmington, and perform three trips backwards and forwards, and then return to New York. And that, in consequence of the stranding, the subsequent part of the adventure was entirely abandoned by the parties to the charter-party. No charter-party was produced. There were some other circumstances, on which the defendant relied to establish his first point of defence, but which it is unnecessary to state in detail.

Mr. Searle, for plaintiff, contended that, under these circumstances, the plaintiff was entitled to recover for a total loss; and he cited and relied on the case of Sawyer v. Maine Fire & Marine Ins. Co., 12 Mass. 291.

Mr. Hazard, for defendant, contended: 1. That the loss was occasioned by fraud or gross negligence. 2. That the loss, if bona fide, was, by the subsequent events, a partial loss only, and that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover upon the abandonment, as for a total loss.

STORY, Circuit Justice. The question of fraud or gross negligence is a question of fact, which I shall leave to the jury, with proper directions as to the evidence. But as to the other point, I am decidedly of opinion, that there is no color to claim for a total loss. The vessel was stranded, and it is true, that if the abandonment had been made, while she remained in that state, the plaintiff might have been entitled to claim as for a total loss. But here the vessel was actually gotten off, without having sustained any essential injury, before the abandonment was made. It is argued, however, that the voyage under the charter-party was defeated, and a loss of the voyage is a good cause of abandonment. But how was the voyage defeated? Certainly not by the incapacity of the vessel to perform it, in consequence of any perils insured against; for she sustained very little damage, and was soon repaired, and capable of performing the chartered voyage. The voyage then was voluntarily abandoned by the parties, as not worth pursuing. But this, in respect to the underwriters, is no cause of abandonment, if the ship was capable of performing it. They engage, that the ship, notwithstanding any of the perils insured against, shall be capable of performing the voyage, not that she shall actually perform it. A loss of the voyage, as to the cargo, is not a loss of the voyage as to the ship. This is the doctrine of the supreme court (Alexander v. Baltimore Ins. Co., 4 Cranch [8 U. S.] 371); and, of course, is of conclusive authority in this court, even if I entertained (which I certainly do not) any doubts of its correctness.

The doctrine, too, is equally well recognised in England. Everth v. Smith, 2 Maule & S. 278; Falkner v. Ritchie, Id. 290; Cazalet v. St. Barbe, 1 Term R. 191; Parsons v. Scott, 2 Taunt. 363. The most, that can be said in this case, is, that the voyage was retarded by the accident. But the mere retardation of a voyage, is no ground for an abandonment as for a total loss. Anderson v. Wallis, 2 Maule & S. 240; Pole v. Fitzgerald, Willes, 641; Everth v. Smith, 2 Maule & S. 278; Falkner v. Ritchie, Id. 290. Besides; this is an insurance on time; and it does not insure any specific voyage, much less does it undertake to guaranty the performance of the voyage in the charter-party.

But it is argued, that the vessel was sold by the master while stranded; and that the ownership, once destroyed, never can return to the plaintiff, unless he elects again to become owner; and that, as the plaintiff has never made such election, the loss, as to him, continues total. And this case is assimilated to the case of a purchase by the master under a judicial sale. Assuming that the purchase of a ship, under a judicial sale, can be legally made by the master on his own account, and not solely for the benefit of his owners (on which I give no opinion); and assuming also, that the owners in such case may recover as for a total loss (on which also, until better instructed, I reserve giving any opinion); it is sufficient to say, that the present is not such a case. Marsh. Ins. bk. 1, c. 13, § 1, p. 581; McMasters v. Shoolbred, 1 Esp. 237; Story v. Strettell, 1 Dall. [1 U. S.] 10; Storer v. Gray, 2 Mass. 565; Oliver v. Newburyport Ins. Co., 3 Mass. 37; Sawyer v. Maine Ins. Co., 12 Mass. 291; Queen v. Union Ins. Co., Cond. Marsh. Ins. 582b, note; Abbott v. Broome, 1 Caines, 292; United Ins. Co. v. Robinson, 2 Caines, 280, 1 Johns. 592; Abbot v. Sebor, 3 Johns. Cas. 39; Walden v. Phoenix Ins. Co., 5 Johns. 310; Ogden v. New York Firemen Ins. Co., 10 Johns. 177, 12 Johns. 25; Havelock v. Rockwood, 8 Term R. 268. The sale, in this case, was made by the master, or under his immediate direction; and nothing can be clearer than that, at such a sale, he could not become a purchaser. He cannot be at once vendor and vendee. The sale was either merely an amicable sale, and the whole property bought in on account of the master; or it was a bona fide sale, which the purchaser declined to enforce, and released all his right acquired by the sale to the master. In either view, it is a void or ineffectual sale. Nothing can be better settled, than that an agent or trustee cannot, directly or indirectly, become the purchaser of the trust property, which is confided to his care. The law will not suffer any man to earn a profit, or expose him to the temptation of a dereliction of his duty, by allowing him to act at the same time in the double capacity of agent and purchaser, either at a public or private sale. This case then stands before the court, as if there was no sale; the ownership has never been legally devested, and the ship was, at the time of the abandonment, in good safety. There is no foundation, upon which to rest the claim for a total loss. Verdict for the plaintiff for a partial loss.

CHURCH v. SEVENTEEN HUNDRED AND TWELVE DOLLARS.

[4 Adm. Rec. 647.]

District Court, S. D. Florida. June 3, 1853.

SALVAGE—COLLUSIVE SPOLIATION — ARBITRATORS' AGREEMENT TO SHARE COMPENSATION —FORFEITURE OF COMPENSATION—SALVOR'S LIABILITY FOR WRONGFUL ACTS—PROCEEDS.

[1. Neither the salvor nor any person affected by his acts is entitled to compensation for services rendered to a vessel which has been wrecked, pursuant to an agreement between the salvor and the master of the vessel, for the purpose of salvage and division of the compensation allowed therefor.]

[2. The master of a wrecked vessel has no authority, as such, to submit the question of compensation for salvage to arbitration, where he acts in bad faith, and no existing necessity for the submission exists, his duty being to consult the owners, or await a decision in admiralty; and an award made under such circumstances is void as against the owners. The North Carolina, 15 Pet. [40 U. S.] 40, followed.]

[3. Such an award is not even prima facie correct as against the owners, but the burden is on the claimants under it of showing its correctness and validity. The North Carolina, 15 Pet. [40 U. S.] 40, followed.]

[4. Although a settlement by arbitration so made may be void, yet, unless the salvors have forfeited their right by fraud or other misconduct, they are entitled to reasonable salvage, which may be allowed to them in a proceeding in admiralty brought by the owners against the proceeds of the vessel and cargo assigned as salvage. The North Carolina, 15 Pet. [40 U. S.] 40, followed.]

[5. If salvors knowingly permit the master of a wrecked vessel, with or without knowledge of the fact, to consign to one of their number, or a partner, and the parties, by agreement, settle the matter of salvage by arbitration, when a court of admiralty is within easy access, the salvage compensation is forfeited.]

[6. A purchaser, with notice, under an award so made, takes no title.]

[7. An agreement whereby a salvor agrees with the master of a wrecked vessel to give him 10 per cent. of the salvage compensation, while immoral and illegal, may be lawfully performed, but in awarding the salvage the 10 per cent. should be taken into consideration, and the compensation made that much less.]

[8. The fact that a master has voluntarily cast away or destroyed his vessel will not prevent a salvor from recovering compensation, providing he has not aided the master in the criminal design, or concealed knowledge of the transaction.]

[9. A salvor having knowledge of the master's criminal act is bound to make a full statement of the facts within his knowledge to the tribunal deciding the question of salvage.]

[10. An admiralty court has jurisdiction to entertain a libel for "collusive spoliation" by the owners of a vessel wrecked in pursuance of an agreement between the master and a salvor, as against the salvor, and all persons responsible for his acts, in personam, for all the damage occasioned by the wreck.]

[11. Money paid to prevent a sale of property liable to be proceeded against as for salvage services, and not paid over to the claimants, may be treated as proceeds, and proceeded against by the owners of the property, on a libel for "collusive spoilation" in like manner.]

[In admiralty. Libel by Samuel W. Church and others, owners of the bark Empress, against $1,712.32 salvage money in the bark.]

S. I. Douglas, for libellants.
Thomas F. King, for respondent.

MARVIN, District Judge. This is a suit in rem against $1,712.32, being salvage money on the bark Empress and cargo, commenced by Church and others, as owners of the bark. The libel alleges that, in the month of August last, this bark, then under the command of James A. Leet, sailed from Havana, with a cargo of sugar and other merchandise, for Boston, and was afterwards run on to the Florida reef by her master, in pursuance of a previous understanding and agreement entered into in the port of Havana, between him and one Manuel Acosta, claimant in this case, with the intent to make money out of the salvage, and a division between them. That while the bark was aground on the reef several wrecking vessels and men rendered her assistance, and got her off, and brought her into the port of Key West; where the salvors claimed salvage for their services. That among these salvors was Manuel Acosta, master of the smack J. A. Latham, with whom the agreement in Havana is alleged to have been made. That the claim of the salvors to salvage was submitted by them and Captain Leet to the award of arbitrators agreed upon between them; and that the arbitrators awarded salvage; and that, that portion of the salvage, given by the award to Acosta for himself, owners and crew, amounts to the sum of $1,712.32, which is alleged to have been advanced and paid by the owners of the bark, in ignorance of these facts, by their acceptance and payment of Captain Leet's draft upon them, in Boston, for the amount of the salvage and expenses. That the salvage and expenses were advanced by Wm. H. Wall & Co., of Key West, on the captain's drafts, and that this sum of $1,712.32 still remains in their hands unpaid over to Acosta and crew, and ought to be considered as so much money substituted in place of the ship and cargo; and that the award of the arbitrators was void, on account of the fraud and collusion, and conferred no title upon Acosta and crew to the money, and that the sum should be restored to the owners of the bark. The libel then prays a special monition to W. H. Wall & Co., commanding them to bring into court the $1,712.32 or show cause why they should not be required to do so, and that the money may be decreed to be paid to the libellants. On the return of the monition, Wall & Co. appeared and filed their answer, stating, in substance, that after the award of the arbitrators in the case of the bark Empress [Case No. 4,476], that the sum of $1,712.32 came to their hands, as the share and earnings of the smack J. A. Latham, owners, master, and crew, and that they still had the same in their possession ready to be paid as the court might direct. The court ordered them to bring in the money and deposit it with the clerk. The money being brought into court, Acosta, as master of the smack J. A. Latham, now appeared and claimed the sum of $1,027.35 for himself and four of the crew; that sum being the aggregate amount of their shares of $1,712.32 awarded to them and the owners of the smack. The owners put in no claim to the balance. Acosta also put in an answer denying the alleged bargain or understanding, and all frauds or collusion.

The case thus presented by the pleadings is mainly one of facts, and involves an inquiry into the circumstances connected with the stranding or wreck of the bark Empress. Was this bark run ashore, on the Florida reef, voluntarily and in pursuance of an agreement or arrangement entered into between the captain and Acosta, in Havana, to divide the salvage or other moneys between them? The testimony must determine this fact. Captain Fish testifies, in substance, that he was master of the smack Eliza, and Acosta of the smack J. A. Latham. That they were lying together, at the smack wharf in the harbor of Havana, opposite the city. That on his return from the city, one day, some of his men said to him, that a captain of a vessel had been then talking with Acosta, which induced him to inquire of Acosta about it. That Acosta thereupon told him, that there was a want of men and sickness in the crew, and he supposed the bark Empress, Leet, master, was to come ashore on the Florida reef, that she was laden with sugar. Witness told Acosta, if the bark was to be wrecked, he wanted a chance. Acosta agreed to this. In the same conversation, Acosta further told him that he was acquainted with the master, Captain Leet; had seen him in Key West, and that the agreement was, that the bark was to run ashore, on the Florida reef, and that he (Acosta) was to wreck the bark and give the captain $1,500. He is positive that Acosta mentioned to him, the name of Captain Leet and the bark Empress. He supposed the bark would sail a few days after the smacks. Witness did not see the bark or Captain Leet in Havana. There were plenty of men there. Witness and Acosta left Havana together, in their respective smacks, and arrived at Key West. Acosta remained at Key West one day, and the next day left in his smack. Witness did not go to the wreck. Captain Geiger testifies, in substance, that the day after Acosta arrived in Key West from Havana, he asked the witness if he would consort? The witness asked why? Acosta answered that there was two or three vessels in Havana short of crews, and he believed that one of them would get ashore on the Florida reef; that the captains had said they were coming over here for crews; and that there was a bark there laden with sugar, cigars, cochineal or indigo. Witness consorted his vessel and men with Acosta's, "vessel for vessel and man for man, for four or five days." The second day after Acosta arrived from Havana, he and witness left Key West, in their respective vessels, on a cruise together, to go as far as Knight's Key. The witness anchored for the night, at Sall Bunches, about fifteen miles from Key West. Acosta passed him, and went on to the windward. The next day he saw a sloop coming down from the windward loaded with cargo. He proceeded up the coast to where the bark had been ashore. She had been got off before he arrived, and was in the charge of Temple Pent. Acosta was there. He told witness that this was the bark that was to come over to Key West to get a crew. In the conversation at Key West, Acosta told him that he believed the bark would run ashore, not that she was to run ashore. Acosta further told him, that he had had a conversation with the captain of the bark, on board his smack in Havana, and that the captain said if he did run ashore, he would consign to a big man who, Acosta thought, was the witness. The consignment was not made to witness, nor did he get any of the salvage.

Temple Pent testifies, that when he boarded the bark Empress, she was hard and fast aground. He offered his assistance to Captain Leet, who said: "I want to make some money as well as you. How much will you give me for the privilege of wrecking?" Pent answered that he would give him 8 per cent. on the salvage that might be awarded him. The captain replied that that was not enough. Witness then said that he would give him ten per cent., which he agreed to. They then went to work, and loaded the Hawkins, and the Lavinia, and while loading the Joseph Alexander, the smack J. A. Latham, Acosta, master, arrived and was taken in as a co-salvor. After loading these vessels, the bark was got off and brought to Key West, and upon the payment of the salvage, the witness paid Captain Leet the 10 per cent., according to agreement.

It does not appear in this case what sum was awarded by the arbitrators, for the entire salvage, but it is admitted that an award was made, and that the share awarded to the smack J. A. Latham is $1,712.32, which remained in the hands of Wm. H. Wall & Co.—they having advanced the whole salvage on the captain's drafts upon the owners—which sum, not having been paid over to Acosta and crew, is the sum now brought into court, $1,027.35 of which is claimed by Acosta and crew, as salvors, under the award; the balance, being the share of the owners of the smack, is not claimed by them. The testimony fully proves the fact that this bark was voluntarily run aground, on the Florida reef by her master, in pursuance of an agreement or understanding, had with Manuel Acosta, the claimant in this case, in Havana, to divide the salvage or other charges upon the property between them. This fact being established, the case is decided. Neither Acosta, nor any person affected by his acts, could earn or acquire any right to salvage, for any services rendered to a vessel under such circumstances. Consequently, this money belongs to the owners of the bark, and must be decreed to them.

One point, however, arises in this case, which, although not very much relied upon by Acosta's counsel, is nevertheless entitled to some consideration, and cannot, with propriety, be wholly overlooked by the court. The point is, that Acosta and crew are entitled to this money under the award of the arbitrators. There is no testimony before me as to who the arbitrators were, or what was the character of the proceedings before them. It is stated, that they were selected by the master of the bark and the salvors, and it is presumed that they were respectable and competent men, and made up their award according to their best judgment upon the facts as presented to them. The question is what authority, if any, had the master, under the circumstances, to submit this question of salvage to the arbitrament of arbitrators; and what effect or validity has the award made by them? The general duty of the master is to navigate his ship, and carry his cargo to its port of destination; and as a general rule his powers are equal to, and commensurate with, his duties. If he is compelled by stress of weather, or injuries to his ship, to put into an intermediate port; or if his ship strike upon the rocks, and is saved, or the ship be lost and the cargo saved, in all these and other cases of unforeseen accident and misfortune, his powers are commensurate with his duties and adequate to the emergency. But they do not go beyond. His duty is to do the best he can, in honest good faith, to protect, save and preserve the property committed to his care. In cases of necessity, he may borrow money on bottomry, or sell a part, or even the whole, of the property, but his authority to do so is founded on urgent necessity and good faith, to be judged of, afterwards, by the tribunals of the law. If he borrow or sell without justifiable necessity, or in bad faith, his acts are void, and the lender or purchaser will take no title. In these cases, which arise out of the ordinary line of his duty, necessity,—a real and certain necessity, not a fancied one,—and good faith on his part, seem to furnish the rule by which to determine the extent of his power. Applying these general rules to the present question, and there is no difficulty in deciding it. There was neither good faith on the part of the master, nor any necessity under the circumstances, to authorize him to submit this question of salvage to arbitration.

But the subject of the authority of the master to submit a question of salvage to arbitration has been considered by the supreme court of the United States in the case of Houseman v. The North Carolina, 15 Pet. [40 U. S.] 40. The case was this: The schooner North Carolina, laden with cotton, got ashore in the night on Pickle's reef, and was lightened by the schooner Hyder Ali, got off by removing 110 bales of cotton, and carried into Indian Key, where, by the agreement of the master and salvors, the question of salvage was submitted to Otis and Johnson, who awarded 35 per cent. upon the value of the vessel and cargo for salvage, and 122 bales of cotton were assigned in payment of the salvage on the cargo. The consignees residing in Charleston disapproved the master's acts, and caused a suit in admiralty, in the superior court of this district, to be instituted against the cotton taken in payment of salvage. Houseman appeared and claimed the cotton, as purchaser, under the award. The supreme court decided: First. That the master had no authority to bind his owners by the settlement at Indian Key. Second. That the settlement was fraudulently made. Third. That the salvors by their conduct, had forfeited all claims to compensation even for the services actually rendered. Fourth. That the owners were entitled to recover their cotton, or the value thereof.

In arriving at this conclusion the court says, that "there may be cases in which the contract of the captain in relation to the amount of salvage to be paid to the salvors, or his agreement to refer the question to arbitrators, would bind the owners. In times of disaster it is always his duty to exercise his best judgment, and to use his best exertions for the benefit of the owners of both vessel and cargo, and when, from his situation, he is unable to consult them, or their agent, without an inconvenient and injurious delay, it is in his power to compromise a question of salvage; and he is not bound in all cases to wait for the decision of a court of admiralty; so, too, when the salvage service has not been important, and the compensation demanded is a small one, the master may settle in order to proceed on his voyage." These remarks imply, that in addition to the master's exercising his best judgment, and using his best exertions, in times of disaster, that it is also his duty to consult the owners of the vessel and cargo whenever he can do so without injurious delay. They imply, also, that in some cases he is bound to wait for the decision of a court of admiralty, and not undertake himself to settle the question of salvage or to refer it to arbitrators. The court further say "that in all such cases of settlement of salvage, unless the acts of the master are ratified by the owners, his conduct will be carefully watched and scrutinized by the court, and his contracts will not be regarded as binding upon the parties concerned, unless they appear to have been bona fide, and such as a discreet owner placed in the like circumstances would probably have made. If he settles the amount by agreement, those who claim under it must show that the salvage allowed was reasonable and just. If he refers it to arbitrators, those who claim the benefit of the award must show that the proceedings were fair, and the referees worthy of the trust. These remarks imply that even in cases where, from the smallness of the demand, or the difficulties of consulting the owners, or other circumstances, the captain is supposed to have authority to settle a question of salvage or to refer it, yet, still, such settlement or award will not be deemed to be even prima facie correct or valid, but those who claim under it must show its correctness and validity by proving the settlement to be just and reasonable, or the award fair and the referees worthy of the trust.

The facts relied upon by the court to show that the captain of the North Carolina had no authority to bind the owners are: First. That the salvage demanded was exorbitant. It was 35 per cent. Second. That he could in a very few days, have communicated with the owners at Charleston or Apalachicola. Third. No reason is assigned for this hurried and extraordinary settlement. Fourth. It was his duty to have brought the subject before the proper tribunal, at the same time advising the owners or consignees, of what had happened, in order that they might have an opportunity of attending to their own interest. The facts relied upon to show that the settlement by arbitration was fraudulently made are: First, and principally. That Houseman became, at Indian Key, the consignee of the vessel and cargo, and took upon himself, to represent the interest of the owners, when he himself was a partner with the salvors, and had a direct interest in pushing the salvage to the highest possible amount. Second. That the captain did not appear to know anything about the arbitrators, but their situation obviously placed all their feelings and partialities on the side of the salvors. If Houseman selected the arbitrators for the captain, then both arbitrators were in fact selected by the salvors. It does not appear, in the present case, whether the consignee of the Empress, in this place, was, like Houseman, a partner with the salvors, or interested in the salvage. If so it would be difficult to distinguish this case, in this particular, from that of The North Carolina. The supreme court evidently considered, in such cases, the duty of a consignee and the interest of a salvor to be in opposition and incompatible with each other. Although a settlement by agreement or by arbitration may be void on account of a want of authority in the master to make it, or on account of his bad faith, or of the salvage being unreasonable, yet, in proceeding in a court of admiralty, by the owners against the property assigned for salvage, as in the case of The North Carolina [supra], or against its proceeds, as in the present case, the salvors are entitled to have allowed them a reasonable salvage, unless they have forfeited their right by fraud or other misconduct. The Sarah Ann [Case No. 12,342]; The Perseverance, 2 C. Rob. Adm. 239; The Nostra Conceicas, 5 C. Rob. Adm. 294. The supreme court adjudged the salvage to be forfeited in the case of The North Carolina for fraud and misconduct. Let us see if we can learn in what that misconduct consisted. It is not expressly and in few words stated in the opinion, but it may be gathered from the opinion that their misconduct consisted in taking the schooner into Indian Key and there making a demand of what the court thought an exorbitant salvage and permitting and assenting to the settlement by arbitration, under the advice of Houseman, acting as the master's consignee, he being, at the time, "their partner and interested in pushing the salvage to the highest possible amount." The court says "the evidence does not show whether the master was apprised of Houseman's connection with the salvors." And if he were ignorant of that connection, then, the salvors permitted him to act under a false impression when it was their duty to undeceive him. But the court says "the master's conduct leads strongly to the conclusion that he was not deceived, and that he knowingly betrayed the interest of his owners." If so, the salvors knowingly aided him in that betrayal.

The law of salvage, like all laws formed in reason, is tolerant of the frailties and imperfections of men. It often overlooks their errors of judgment, and mistake of ignorance, and pardons much in their conduct which may be attributed to a keen sense of interest, provided their conduct does not go beyond the bounds of common honesty and fair dealing. But there are principles of right and wrong, of honesty and dishonesty, of truth and falsehood, founded in the law of nature, known to all men, and recognized in the laws of all societies without a general observance of which no society can long exist. The great fundamental laws every court must enforce. The law cannot, therefore, tolerate in salvors dishonesty, corruption, fraud, falsehood, either in rendering the service, or in their proceedings to recover the salvage. If, therefore, salvors knowingly permit the master of a wrecked vessel to consign to one of their number, or a partner, and do not inform him of that connection, or he, knowing that connection, nevertheless, does make such consignment, and they afterwards go on to settle by agreement or arbitration the matter of salvage, when there is a tribunal, established by the government within reach, clothed with authority to make such settlement and protect the rights of all parties, and which holds the legal standard by which to measure the value of their services, there is no escaping in my judgment from the conclusion, that their salvage, under the authority of the decision made by the supreme court, may be justly and legally forfeited, and purchasers under the award, with notice, will take no title. The settlement being at Indian Key, and the fitness of the arbitrators not shown, are circumstances noticed by the court, but not as important in themselves, for had the settlement been, in other respects, honest and legal, the place of the settlement would not have made it illegal. By applying the principles of the decision of the supreme court to the present case, there is no difficulty in deciding the award of the arbitrators to be void. See, also, the case of The Britain, 1 W. Rob. Adm. (N. S.) 40, on the subject of the authority of the master of the saving vessel to bind his crew by submission to arbitration.

There is another feature in the history of this case disclosed by the proof to which I feel bound to advert. Temple Pent, not Acosta, was the first person to board the Empress when she lay upon the reef. He was met by Captain Leet with the declamation, "I want to make some money as well as you. How much will you give me for the privilege of wrecking?" This was really a proposal, on the part of Captain Leet, that the two should take the property of other people, without any right, but under color of salvage, and apply it to his own use; that Pent should aid him to appropriate to himself a portion of the cargo. Pent agreed to give him, and did give, 10 per cent. on the salvage. The immorality and illegality of this transaction is too plain for argument or comment. Pent's duty was, not to listen to the captain's proposal, but to reject it at once. Let the property be lost, if a captain will not permit it to be saved without the salvor's consenting to bribe and corrupt him, and that, too, with money belonging to neither of them. The making of such agreement is immoral and unlawful, but when made, it may be lawfully performed, if salvage be allowed, by taking the sum agreed to be given the captain into consideration in fixing the amount of salvage, and making the salvage so much less. In this manner, the agreement may be performed to the owner of the property, who, if anybody, is entitled to the benefit of it, and not the captain.

In the case of The James,[1] the court of appeals of Florida decided, in 1839, that an agreement to give the master of the ship a portion of the salvage was unlawful and immoral, and worked a forfeiture of the salvage. And the court forfeited the salvage of vessels and men in that case, on account of such agreement. The principle of law is that the master cannot, in any manner, directly or indirectly, lawfully make any money out of the wreck of his own vessel, or out of any business growing out of the wreck; and any agreement or arrangement enabling him to do so is deemed, in law, fraudulent and corrupt. Masters sometimes voluntarily cast their vessels ashore on this coast, and bore holes in them, or burn or otherwise destroy them without any previous communication or collusion with any of the wreckers. When this is the case, the wreckers, by saving the property, entitle themselves to salvage, provided they do not forfeit it by aiding the master in his criminal design; and do not conceal their knowledge of the transaction. But they are bound to make a full statement of the facts to the tribunal that decides upon the question of salvage, and to give evidence of the facts within their knowledge in order to a conviction of the master. Concealment in such cases is a participation in the crime.

One further point remains in the case, that of the jurisdiction of the court. Ships and their cargoes, crews, and passengers, in a voyage, upon the high seas, are governed and protected by the maritime law, which law is administered, appropriately, but not exclusively, in the admiralty courts. Assaults, beatings, imprisonments, collisions, pillage, unlawful seizures or restraints, spoliations and depredations upon property, tortious or collusive wrecks, unlawful deviations and negligences, and other wrongs, committed or happening upon the high seas, are within the jurisdiction of these courts. The jurisdiction in the present case is, I conceive, founded in a marine tort which consisted in the tortious wreck of the Empress, to which Acosta was a party, by his previous bargain, and by being present and aiding in the main design, and seeking to derive advantage from it. The act may be termed, in the language of the maritime law, collusive spoliation; and Acosta, and all persons responsible for his acts, may be sued, in admiralty, in personam for all the damage occasioned by the wreck. The libel does not seem to be drawn with reference to this idea of the foundation of the jurisdiction, but still it states the facts in such a manner as to enable the court to take jurisdiction and decree upon them.

The jurisdiction, in the present case, may be considered in another point of view. If goods be wrongfully taken at sea and brought to the land or if rightfully taken at sea, as by salvors, and afterwards wrongfully withheld, they may be seized in admiralty, and restored to the rightful owner. Bacon's Abr. tit. "Admiralty," B.; [Houseman v. The North Carolina], 15 Pet. [40 U. S.] 48. The libel seeks this remedy and is in rem against $1,712.32, which, it alleges, stands in place of so much cargo as the money represents; the cargo having been wrongfully taken at sea, and wrongfully withheld on land, under a pretended claim of salvage, and the money having been paid or placed in lieu thereof. Were this money a deposit in court, as a security for salvage, it would be restored; or were it the proceeds of an actual sale of cargo, it clearly might be proceeded against (Willis v. Commissioners of Appeals in Prize Causes, 5 East, 23); or, were it cargo itself, the case would be the same in principle as Houseman v. The North Carolina, 15 Pet. [40 U. S.] 48, and Peisth v. Ware, 4 Cranch [8 U. S.] 347. But as it is neither cargo nor proceeds of an actual sale, it is agreed that the suit is really for money paid and advanced, or had and received, over which it is conceded that the admiralty has no jurisdiction. But the whole subject matter of the dispute being a marine tort, and a pretended claim of salvage, as to which the court has a clear and peculiar jurisdiction, the objection here raised goes not so much to the court, as to the form of the remedy, i. e. whether the suit should be in personam or in rem. And I think it would be refining too much to say that money paid to prevent a sale of property liable to be proceeded against may not be treated as proceeds of that property and be proceeded against in like manner, when that money has not been paid over to the claimants, but remains in the hands of a third person. 5 East, 32; Sheppard v. Taylor, 5 Pet. [30 U. S.] 675; Brown v. Lull [Case No. 2,018]. For the purposes of the trial Acosta has admitted the libellants, Church and others, to have been the owners of the bark; but proof of their ownership, at the time of the disaster, must be made to authorize the decreeing of the money to them. Upon such proof being made, the money will be decreed to them, or their authorized agent, and Acosta condemned in costs. U. S. v. La Jeune Eugenie [Case No. 15,551].

Case No. 2,714.

CHURCH et al. v. SHELTON.

[2 Curt. 271.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. May Term, 1855.

COLLUSIVE SPOLIATION — SUIT BY SHIPPER — ADMIRALTY JURISDICTION — EVIDENCE — PROCEEDINGS IN OTHER SUIT.

1. Where a master fraudulently concerted with wreckers to strand his vessel and they came to his relief, and the libellant as owner of the cargo paid a large sum of money for salvage, it was held that the admiralty had jurisdiction of a suit in personam, against the owners, founded on the contract made by the master as their agent, by the bill of lading, to convey the merchandise safely, dangers of the seas excepted.

[Cited in The A. M. Bliss, Case No. 274; The Electron, 48 Fed. 690.]

2. Ordinarily a libel filed by a party to another suit, cannot be given in evidence against him as his confession. But if he brought the suit as a trustee, and recovered, the cestuis que trust may put the whole record in evidence, to show the recovery and the title on which it rested.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of Massachusetts.]

F. C. Loring, for libellant.

Bell & Goodrich, contra.

CURTIS, Circuit Justice. This is an appeal from a decree of the district court, sitting in admiralty. [Unreported.] The libel alleges that in August, 1850, the libellant caused to be shipped on board the bark Empress, Leet, master, belonging to the respondents, then lying at Havana, in the island of Cuba, 1,588 boxes of sugar, of the value of forty thousand dollars, to be carried to Boston, and delivered to the libellant, for an agreed freight. That bills of lading in the usual form were signed by the master making the sugars deliverable, dangers of the seas excepted, to the libellant or his assigns. That in the course of the passage from Havana to Boston, the vessel got ashore on one of the reefs in the neighborhood of Key West, was relieved by wreckers, and went into that port in distress. The master there referred to arbitrators the question of the amount of salvage; and the libellant, upon information of what was thus awarded as due from him, paid the sum of six thousand two hundred dollars, as and for his contributory share of the salvage compensation and its attendant necessary expenses. Thus far, the averments of the libel are admitted by the answer. The libel further alleges that the stranding of the bark was done by design of the master, in barratrous concert with the persons who came to her relief as wreckers, and with the purpose of sharing between the master and the wreckers, the sum which might be awarded as a salvage compensation. That all this was unknown to the libellant, until after he had finally paid his alleged contributory share, and had received his property. That the respondents also were ignorant of the truth, until after the money had been contributed and paid over, to satisfy the salvage claim; but that having ascertained the fraud, and that some portion of the money which they, in behalf of all concerned had paid, towards the claim for salvage, was still in the hands of the agents in Key West, who had received the same for the salvors, the respondents instituted a suit in the court of admiralty in Key West, in their own names, and upon allegations of the fraud above described, recovered the money, part of which had been contributed by the respondents. [Case No. 2,713.] The answer admits that the one of the respondents who was the managing owner of the bark, gave a power of attorney to a person in Key West to bring a suit to recover back so much of the money paid for salvage compensation, as was then in the hands of third persons there; and that when a recovery had been had, the same managing owner gave another power of attorney to receive the avails of the suit. But it denies that the bark was run on shore by design, and alleges it was by a peril of the sea.

The libellant has offered in evidence, an exemplification of the record of the suit in admiralty at Key West, brought by the respondents, first, as evidence of their confessions of the facts therein alleged, among which is the barratrous stranding of the bark by the master, in concert with the wreckers,—and second, that the decree being in rem, is conclusive evidence of the facts which it finds, and that it finds, though not in terms, by necessary implication, all the essential facts alleged in the libel.

Two principal questions have been argued at the bar. The first is whether this court, as a court of admiralty has jurisdiction. The second is, whether the record of the suit at Key West is admissible in evidence in this case. The first question has been argued as if this were a suit to recover back from the respondents money which they had received at Key West, by reason of the suit there. Viewed solely in that aspect, it would be difficult to sustain the jurisdiction of the admiralty; for it would be only another form of an action for money had and received. But I think this not the correct view of the relations of these parties. The owners of this vessel are responsible for the contracts made by its master within the scope of his authority as such. It is not questioned that he was authorized to sign the bill of lading of these goods, promising to deliver them to the libellant, dangers of the seas only excepted. By this promise he bound the respondents. This promise was broken; for instead of delivering the merchandise to the libellant, he fraudulently caused it to come into the hands of wreckers, and concerted with them a pretended lien thereon for salvage; and caused the libellant to pay a large sum of money to get possession of his property, instead of keeping the promise in the bill of lading and delivering it to him free from any such claim. That the contract contained in the bill of lading was broken, if the allegations in the libel are true, is clear. That the libellant has, without fault on his part, and only through the barratrous conduct of the respondents' master, suffered damage to the amount he has paid in ignorance of the facts, to relieve his property from a supposed lien for salvage, is also clear. And there can be no doubt, since the decision of the supreme court of the United States in New Jersey Steam Nav. Co. v. Merchants' Bank, 6 How. [47 U. S.] 344, that the admiralty has jurisdiction of such a contract of affreightment, in personam, as well as in rem. Having jurisdiction over the entire contract, it will proceed to inquire into all its breaches, and all the damages suffered thereby, however peculiar they may be, and whatever issues they may involve. Upon the question of the admissibility of the exemplification of the record of the suit at Key West, it has already been stated, that it is admitted in the answer, that the suit was instituted under a power of attorney executed by one of the respondents, who was the managing owner of the bark. And it appears by the record, that the object of the suit was, to recover a sum of money which had been paid over to certain agents of the alleged salvors, by the respondents, and remained in their hands undistributed; that the principal alleged salvor became a party to the proceeding, and a recovery was had, the court taking jurisdiction in the admiralty, upon the ground, as is stated, that it was a case of collusive spoliation, which was a marine tort, and that the money in the hands of the agent of the asserted salvors, was substituted for the property saved, and might be followed by a proceeding in rem, as the property itself could be; and that it is also admitted in the answer, that the same managing owner, after a decree in favor of the owners, gave another power of attorney to receive the money from the registry of the court.

The question whether a bill in equity, or a libel in the admiralty, can be used in evidence as a confession by the party filing it, of the particular facts stated therein, has been the subject of much doubt. Mr. Phillips, though he admits there is a conflict of decisions, inclines to the opinion the evidence ought to be received. 1 Phil. Ev. 371; 2 Phil. Ev. 28. Mr. Greenleaf says it is admissible, though very feeble evidence, so far as it may be taken as the suggestion of counsel. 1 Greenl. Ev. 225; 3 Greenl. Ev. 263. Mr. Daniell, though he does not consider it evidence at law, declares it is so in equity. 2 Daniell, Ch. Pr. 976. On the other hand, Mr. Gurley (Eq. Ev., 2d Ed., 426) denies that the statements of fact in a bill can be used against the complainant as confessions.

In Boileau v. Rutlin, 2 Exch. 664, decided in 1848, the court of exchequer, after very careful examination of all the previous authorities, at law and in equity, in England and Ireland, came to the decision that a bill in chancery is not evidence of the truth of the facts stated in it, as against the party in whose name it is filed, even though his priority be shown; but is only admissible to show that a suit was instituted, and the subject-matter of it. I consider this decision to be in conformity with the weight of authority in this country. The American cases are collected by Cowen & Hill (volume 4, p. 48). More recent decisions are, Adams v. McMillan, 7 Port. [Ala.] 73; Durden v. Cleveland, 4 Ala. 225; Isaac's Lessee v. Clarke, 2 Gill, 1. But though I do not think this record is admissible merely as evidence of the confessions of the respondents, there is another ground upon which it may be competent evidence. The libellant was the freighter, the respondents the owners, of a vessel, which met with what was believed to be, a general average loss. The managing owner saw to its adjustment, and collected from the respondent his contributory share for the purpose of paying it over. The libellant now alleges, among other things, that the respondents did not finally part with this money. That they brought a suit, arrested the money, tried their title to it, upon the ground that the claim, out of which the general average contribution grew, was a fraud, got a decree in rem, and authorized their agent to receive the money, or some part of it. If this be true, the libellant was the equitable owner of at least a part of what was thus recovered, and may, undoubtedly, show its recovery, and the title upon which the recovery was had. For this purpose, all the authorities agree the record would be admissible. And it is wholly immaterial for this purpose, whether the court had jurisdiction or not. The pertinency of the evidence, or its validity, does not depend on the validity of the decree of the court. If the respondents had made a claim to this money in pais, upon the same ground, and obtained it, their acts and the declarations accompanying them, and the receipt of the money, might be shown. Here, also, it is competent to prove that they received the money under a claim of title, which made the libellant interested in what was recovered; and as the claim was made, and the recovery had, in a court, which, de facto, took jurisdiction, the production of a copy of its record, accompanied by evidence, aliunde, of the power given by the respondents to receive the money under the decree, is competent proof of the claim made, its nature and grounds, and the recovery had. I am strongly inclined to the opinion, also, that the court at Key West had jurisdiction; and that its decree has the usual legitimate operation of decrees in rem. But I have not thought it necessary to examine the question, for the reasons drawn from the relations of these parties to each other and to the subject-matter of the suit. This evidence being admissible, has a pretty strong tendency to support the allegation of the libel that there was a fraudulent stranding of the vessel by concert between the master and wreckers. And the case is entirely bare of evidence to oppose this allegation. Neither the master, nor any one from on board of the vessel, nor any salvor, or other person, is examined by the respondents, and no suggestion of any reason, why some of these are not produced.

By consent of parties the libellant has, in this court, amended his libel, so as to allege, that some of the sugars which arrived, were damaged by stranding. It was also agreed in the district court, by a written stipulation on the record, that the decree there, which had been made for the libellant, should be for a nominal sum, and that instead of referring the cause to an assessor, that the amount should be increased or diminished here as might be found just. Let the case be referred to an assessor to ascertain the amount of damage, including the damage done to the sugars, by the stranding alleged in the libel, or by bad storage, if any, and all moneys paid by the libellant to the respondents to relieve the goods from an asserted claim for salvage compensation, making to the respondents all just allowances.

Case No. 2,715.

CHURCHILL et al. v. The BRITISH AMERICA.

[9 Ben. 516.][1]

District Court, E. D. New York. May, 1878.

COLLISION — LIMITATION OF LIABILITY — THE RIGHTS OF FOREIGNERS—PRACTICE—INJUNCTION.

1. The statutes of the United States, limiting the liability of ship-owners, Rev. St. 4282 to 4289, cannot be resorted to for the purpose of limiting the liability of a foreigner for a collision between an American and a foreign vessel, occurring on the high seas and beyond the territorial limits of the United States.

[Cited in Re Long Island Transp. Co., 5 Fed. 620.]

2. Courts of admiralty of the United States are authorized in a proper case to apply the rule of the general maritime law according to which the extent of the liability of owners of foreign vessels for collisions upon the high seas may be determined.

3. Where a British ship has been proceeded against in a district court of the United States, for a collision, happening on the high seas, and the parties affected have appeared, such district court has jurisdiction to decree the owners of such ship to be entitled to the benefit of a rule of the general maritime law, permitting them to abandon their vessel and freight, and thereupon to be exempted from further responsibility.

4. The district court has the power to issue an injunction order restraining the prosecution of suits against the ship and the ship-owners who have sought the benefit of the rule of the maritime law limiting their liability. Such an order is an essential part of the relief intended to be conferred by the rule of the maritime law.

5. The libellants in this court, having also commenced an action in personam against the owners of the ship in the southern district of New York, and having been unable to serve process upon any of them because of their being foreigners and non-residents, and such owners never having voluntarily appeared in that action, the injunction prayed for was ordered to be issued, provided that the ship-owners should first enter their appearance in the action pending in the southern district.

[In admiralty. Libel by George Churchill and others against the ship British America to recover damages caused by collision.]

W. W. Goodrich, for libellant.
Scudder & Carter, for Miller.

BENEDICT, District Judge. On the 12th day of February, 1878, the above-named defendants, who are the owners of the American brig called the Carrie Winslow, commenced an action in rem in this court against the British ship called the British America, to recover the sum of $201,000, being the damages alleged to have been sustained by reason of a collision between the two vessels above mentioned. [See Case No. 1,895.] The value of the British America being far less than the damages claimed, another action was commenced by the same libellants, against the owners of the British America, to recover of them in personam the same damages. This latter action was commenced in the southern district of New York, and as yet no service of process has been effected therein nor any appearance entered.

Thereafter the owners of the British America commenced this proceeding to obtain from this court a limitation of their liability to the value of their vessel at the time of the collision, and an injunction restraining the farther prosecution of suits against them to recover damages arising out of this collision. This proceeding was commenced by the filing of a libel in which, while denying any liability for the collision, the owners of the British America claim that in any event their liability is limited to the value of their vessel, and they tender a stipulation with sufficient sureties for the full value of the vessel at the time of the collision, whereby they agree to pay into court, for distribution in this action, the amount of such value, and they pray that in case it be found that the collision in question arose from fault on the part of the British America they may have the benefit of the limitation of liability according to the general maritime law, and as provided by section 4283 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. They further pray that a monition issue citing and admonishing all persons having claims against them arising out of the collision referred to, to appear and make proof of their respective claims, and that the value of said vessel may be apportioned by this court among the parties entitled thereto, and that an order may be made to restrain the further prosecution of all and any suit or suits against the said ship or her owners, in respect of any claim arising out of said collision, and that the depositions already taken in the action against the ship may be used on the trial of this action, and that such further relief may be granted as to the court shall seem meet.

Having filed their libel the owners of the British America now ask this court to ascertain by appraisement the value of the ship, and for leave to file a stipulation to represent the vessel according to the prayer of their libel, and that the monition prayed for be now issued, and also that meanwhile, and until the hearing of the cause, an order be made restraining the owners of the Carrie Winslow and her cargo from prosecuting any suits against them to recover damages arising out of the collision in question. Notice of those several applications having been given to the proctors of the owners of the Carrie Winslow, and of the officers and crew, and of the owners of the cargo, an appearance for those parties has been entered in this proceeding by their proctor and they now oppose the present motion.

The ground taken in opposition is that the owners of the British America are not entitled to a limitation of their liability to the value of the vessel, and that the court has no jurisdiction to entertain the present proceeding or to grant the relief prayed for, by reason of the fact that the ship British America is a British vessel, and the collision referred to occurred on the high seas and without the territorial limits of the United States. In disposing of this objection the first question to be considered is, whether the statute of the United States, limiting the liability of ship-owners (section 4283, Rev. St.), has any effect to limit the liability attaching to the owners of this British vessel by reason of a collision occurring on the high seas and without the territorial limits of the United States.

My opinion in regard to the extra territorial effect of this statute of the United States has been recently expressed in the case of Thomassen v. Whitwell [Case No. 13,929]; it is therefore sufficient here to refer to the opinion there delivered, for the reasons which have led me to the conclusion that the statute of the United States to which reference has been made, has no extra territorial effect and cannot be resorted to for the purpose of limiting the liability of a foreigner for a collision occurring on the high seas and beyond the territorial limits of the United States.

The question then arises whether there may be any rule of the general maritime law by which the extent of the liability of these ship-owners for the collision in question is fixed. And it must here be held—as in the case just cited it was held upon the authority of the supreme court of the United States—that there is a rule of the general maritime law, according to which the extent of the liability of ship-owners for collision upon the high seas may be determined, and which courts of admiralty are authorized in a proper case to apply.

But it is supposed that those conclusions are not sufficient to dispose of the present case, because of the fact that one of these vessels was American and the other British, and here the application is by British subjects to have enforced by an American court against American citizens a rule from which these applicants could derive no benefit in the courts of their own country, inasmuch as the English have enacted a statute, in terms made applicable to foreigners, which deprives not only citizens but foreigners in the courts of that country of any benefit of the rule of the general maritime law.

Whether a foreigner, in such a matter as this, is entitled to ask at the hands of this court a greater exemption than is allowed him by the laws of his own country, and whether it rests with the courts to take notice of the absence of reciprocity in statutory provisions respecting the limitation of the ship-owner's liability, and whether the enactment of such a statute as the English statute above referred to, can have the effect to suspend the operation of the rule of the maritime law in regard to the citizens of that nation, and whether the rule of the maritime law can be given effect in a case like this between a British and an American vessel, are questions that have not been very fully argued before me, and cannot properly be finally disposed of upon this motion. It appears sufficient, therefore, for the present occasion, to say that it is not so clear to my mind that these ship-owners are without a right to resort to this court for the relief they seek, as to justify me in refusing them protection during the pendency of the litigation, provided such protection is a part of the relief that this court is competent to grant.

It has been contended that this court has no jurisdiction to entertain such a proceeding as this, and if the proceeding can be upheld, that the court is without power to issue a restraining order, such as is sought to be obtained by the present motion. If these ship-owners, whose vessel has been proceeded against in this court, and who have also been sued in another district upon demands arising out of the same collision, have the right to be exempted from further liability upon abandoning their interest in the vessel, no reason occurs to me upon which to deny them access to the courts for the purpose of enforcing that right, and that they may resort to a court of admiralty for that purpose seems to follow from the decision of the supreme court in the case of the City of Norwich (Wright v. Norwich, 13 Wall. [80 U. S.] 104) and the general admiralty rules Nos. 54, 55, 56, and 57. In the case cited it was held that courts of admiralty have jurisdiction to enforce the provisions of the statute in respect to the limitation of the liability of ship-owners, because of the subject matter, and if a proceeding to take the benefit of a statute in regard to the limitation of a ship-owner's liability, is within the jurisdiction of the admiralty, by reason of the subject matter, a fortiori is a proceeding to take the benefit of a rule of the general maritime law upon the same subject within that jurisdiction. I am therefore of the opinion that this court, where the vessel is being proceeded against, and where the parties to be affected have appeared, has jurisdiction to decree these libellants to be entitled to the benefit of a rule of the general maritime law, permitting the ship-owner to abandon his vessel, and thereupon be exempted from further responsibility.

An essential part of the relief intended to be conferred by the rule of the maritime law, to which reference has been made, consists in restraining actions brought to enforce the liability from which exemption is sought. This is made evident by the provision in respect to an injunction, which appears in the rules prescribed by the supreme court for proceedings taken to obtain the benefit of the statute. The only difference between such a proceeding and the one under consideration is, that the former is taken to obtain the benefit of a limitation, declared by a statute of the United States, while this is taken to obtain the benefit of a limitation declared by the general maritime law. The two proceedings are alike in character, have the same object in view, should be conducted substantially in a similar manner, and must be given equal scope and effect. The general admiralty rules referred to, therefore, not only make manifest that the power to issue such an injunction is a power necessary to the exercise of the jurisdiction in question, but they furnish authority for the existence of such a power. The power, by virtue of which an injunction is issued in proceedings under the statute, is not derived from the general admiralty rules, but follows from the provisions of the constitution and the statutes by which the district courts of the United States are given jurisdiction of all admiralty and maritime cases. The general admiralty rules do not confer jurisdiction, but simply regulate the manner of exercising the jurisdiction conferred by law under authority derived from the statute which makes the form and modes of proceeding, in cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, subject to regulation by the supreme court, by rules prescribed from time to time, not inconsistent with the laws of the United States. Rev. St. § 913.

Since then the power to issue such an injunction as is here prayed for, is by the general admiralty rules recognized as existing in the district courts, those rules, of themselves, furnish authority in favor of the existence of the power here sought to be called into action. For these reasons I am of the opinion that the application for a preliminary injunction cannot be denied upon the ground of want of power in this court to grant the relief sought.

A single feature of this case remains to be noticed. On the part of the creditors of this ship it is contended that if it be held that this court has the power to restrain their proceedings, brought to recover the damages they have sustained by the collision, the injunction should issue only upon the condition that the ship-owners enter their appearance in the action already commenced in the southern district of New York. In this

I am of the opinion that the creditors are right, and for this reason. The questions involved are new, and the proceeding here instituted is without known precedent. An injunction at the present time without such a condition, might inflict irreparable injury, because the creditors may now be able to serve their process, or compel an appearance by attaching property in their action in personam, but may be wholly unable to do so hereafter, and may thus lose the benefit of their action, although the final decision as to the present proceeding should be in their favor; while on the other hand no injury will result to the ship-owners by so appearing, if in the end the present proceeding be sustained. These considerations appear to me to entitle the creditors of this ship to ask of the ship-owners, as a condition of obtaining an injunction at this time, that they appear in the action now pending against them in the southern district of New York.

The order will therefore be that a monition issue, according to the prayer of the libel, and that an appraisement of the vessel be had, and that upon the filing in this proceeding of the stipulation tendered in the libel, a preliminary injunction issue restraining, until the final decree of this court in this cause, all proceedings on the part of the parties now before the court, to enforce against these libellants any liability arising out of the collision in the pleadings mentioned, either in the two actions heretofore mentioned, or any other action, provided the libellants first duly enter their appearance in the action pending in the southern district.

Because of the novelty of the proceeding the injunction should also be so framed as to permit testimony to be taken in the action in rem, as well as in the one in personam, provided consent be given that such testimony be read in any of the three proceedings. If for any cause it be deemed undesirable to enter such appearance at this time, the libellants may take a denial of the present motion, with leave to renew the same when they shall be served with process in the action referred to, or their appearance be otherwise compelled.

LIEN ON FOREIGN VESSEL FOR SUPPLIES—WAIVER—STATE STATUTE.

1. Vessels belonging to one state when in the ports of another, are deemed so far foreign that a lien for necessary supplies is given by the general maritime law.

[Cited in The E. A. Barnard, 2 Fed. 722.]

2. The statute of New York was not intended to impair such liens; and if it were so intended, it would be nugatory. Such liens are beyond the reach of state legislation.

3. Taking the negotiable note of one of the owners, on time, is a waiver of such lien, upon the authority of The Nestor [Case No. 10,126].

[In admiralty. Libel by J. & G. Ring against the Massachusetts barque Chusan for supplies furnished in the port of New York; Broughton & Cushing, claimants.]

Mr. King, for libellants.

F. C. Loring, for claimants.

SPRAGUE, District Judge. This is a libel against a vessel owned in Massachusetts, promoted by material men, who furnished necessary supplies to her while in the port of New York. There is no question that vessels belonging to one state, when in the ports of another, are deemed to be so far foreign that a lien for necessary supplies is created by the general maritime law. The General Smith, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 438.

But it is contended that such lien has been prevented or defeated. In the first place it is said, that by a statute of New York (2 Rev. St. 493), all such liens are terminated when the vessel leaves the state. To this there are two answers; first, that the statute was not intended to impair liens arising under the general maritime law; and second, that if it were so intended, it would in that respect have been nugatory. Such liens are beyond the reach of state legislation. The courts of the United States will enforce them to their full extent, notwithstanding any attempt to abrogate or limit them, by local legislation.

The second objection is far more formidable. It appears that the supplies were furnished upon a credit of six months, and were charged by the libellants to the barque Chusan and owners. A negotiable note, signed by one Broughton, a part owner, was subsequently taken by the libellants, and a receipt signed by them was given therefor at the foot of the bill, as follows: "Received from N. Broughton, his note at six months, from September 3d, for the above amount." The note was negotiated by the libellants, and was not in their possession at maturity. Not being paid by Broughton, they took it up as indorsers, and it is now offered to be surrendered.

It is contended that the taking of the note was, under the circumstances, a waiver of the lien. This objection I sustain solely upon the authority of the opinion given by Mr. Justice Story in the case of The Nestor [supra]. In that case, speaking of a negotiable note given by the owner, on time, he says "that the receiving of such a note is direct proof that credit is given to the personal responsibility of the owner, and presumptive proof that no credit is given to the ship; or, in other words, that there is a waiver of any lien on the ship."

right to revise the decrees of this court, I think it proper that so strong and direct an opinion, deliberately given and promulgated by that tribunal, should govern the present case, although such opinion was not necessarily called for by the point decided. Libel dismissed.

LIEN ON FOREIGN VESSEL FOR SUPPLIES AND REPAIRS—WHAT LAW GOVERNS—STATE STATUTE—REGULATION OF COMMERCE—FEDERAL COURTS—WAIVER OF LIEN.

1. The barque Chusan, belonging to Massachusetts, being libelled for materials supplied for repairs done to it in the port of New York, it was held, that a lien therefor attached to the barque, as being a foreign vessel; but that the nature, extent, and character of such a lien is to be determined by the general maritime law, and not by the local law of any particular state; and, therefore, that it was not destroyed by the departure of the barque from New York, according to the statute of New York of 1829, (volume 2, p. 493).

2. In a lien for supplies or repairs to a domestic vessel, the admiralty jurisdiction depends upon the local law of the particular state where they are made; but questions of lien upon a foreign vessel are governed by the general maritime law, and not by the local law of any state.

3. The statute of New York (2 Rev. St. 1829, pt. 3, c. 8, tit. 8, § 1, p. 493), giving a lien to material men for repairs and supplies, &c., is to be considered as remedial in its nature, and not as restrictive; and is perfectly constitutional, as applied to cases of domestic vessels, but not as applied to foreign vessels.

4. The courts of the United States, in the exercise of their admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, are exclusively governed by the legislation of congress, or, in the absence thereof, by the general maritime law; and no state can, by its local legislation, narrow or enlarge such jurisdiction.

5. The power given by the constitution of the United States to congress, to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several states, includes the power to regulate navigation with foreign nations, among the states, and is an exclusive power in congress, which may be exercised with or without positive regulations.

6. Congress, by conferring the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction upon the courts of the United States, have, by implication, adopted the maritime law, inasmuch as such law is the law of the admiralty jurisdiction, until modified by congress. The case of The Nestor [Case No. 10,126] affirmed.

7. Where the libellants, being ship-chandlers, furnished materials to the barque Chusan, while in New York, and took therefor the promissory note of one of the owners, and gave a receipt, it was held, that the matter was governed by the lex loci, by which a note taken for a debt is only conditional payment, until it is duly paid.

8. By the general maritime law, material men have a threefold remedy for supplies and materials furnished to a foreign ship; 1st, against the vessel; 2d, against the owners; 3d, against the master; and neither remedy is displaced, except upon proof that an exclusive credit was given to one of the parties, or to the vessel.

[Cited in The Paul Boggs, Case No. 10,846; The Mary Bell, Id. 9,199.]

9. The lien of material men upon the vessel must be enforced within a reasonable time after the debt is due, or it will not avail against a bona fide purchaser, without notice.

10. Under a bill in equity, proof is not admissible with respect to matters not alleged in the bill or answer; and, therefore, one of the parties, who claimed to be a purchaser for a valuable consideration, without notice, not having so stated in his answer; it was held, that evidence with regard to the fact was not admissible.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of Massachusetts.

In admiralty. Libel for materials for repairs of the barque Chusan, belonging to the port of Marblehead, in Massachusetts, done in the port of New York. The material facts, set forth in the libel and answer, sufficiently appear in the following statement of facts, agreed to by the parties: The libellants, who are ship chandlers in New York, in September, 1841, furnished a large amount of copper, as per bill, for the barque Chusan, then lying at the port of New York. The said vessel was then owned, three quarter parts by N. Broughton, and one quarter part by —— Cushing, who was also master; both of whom were inhabitants of Massachusetts. The copper was purchased for the barque on a credit for six months, and was charged in the books of the libellants to the barque Chusan and owners. A negotiable note signed by Broughton alone, was subsequently taken by the libellants, and a receipt given therefor, as follows: "Barque Chusan and owners to J. & G. Ring, Dr. to copper materials, $1214.45. New York, Sept. 3, 1841. Received from N. Broughton, his note at six months, from Sept. 3d. for the above amount. J. & G. Ring, per J. N. Phillips." The note was negotiated by the libellants, and was not in their possession at maturity. Being not paid by Broughton, they took it up as indorsers, and it was offered to be surrendered at the hearing in the court below. In 1842, an action at common law was commenced by the libellants, in the court of common pleas, on the said note against the said Broughton and sundry persons summoned as trustees, which suit was ordered to be discontinued before this libel was filed, but is still on the docket of that court. At the time of the purchase of the copper, a part of the vessel belonging to Broughton had been transferred to Bates & Thaxter, two of the claimants, as collateral security, and stood in their names, but they were not in possession, and had no interest in the management and navigation of the vessel. Mack, the other claimant, proves that the said Cushing, the then other owner, settled an account with Broughton, in which the latter charged the said bill, Cushing being showed said receipt, and acting on the credit of it. Subsequently, Cushing sold his interest in the said vessel to the said Mack, who claimed to be a bona fide purchaser, without notice. The questions intended to be submitted are: First. Whether, under the circumstances, the taking the note was a waiver of the lien upon the vessel for the supplies created by the general maritime law? Second. Whether any lien existed after the departure of the vessel from the state of New York?

[For proceedings in the district court, see Case No. 2,716, next preceding.]

Mr. Ring, for libellants.

The argument for the libellants was as follows:

1. The libellants furnished the materials in September, 1841, on a credit of six months, to the bark Chusan and owners. This is proved by the entries in the books and the account rendered, all showing the bark and owners to be the thing and persons trusted for this debt; by the maritime law, therefore, they had a lien upon the bark in addition to the personal security of the owners. They had an inchoate right to sell the bark for the payment of the debt, at the time of furnishing the supplies, which right became complete, on the termination of the credit. The General Smith, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 438; Peyroux v. Howard, 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 341; The Nestor [Case No. 10,126].

2d. The subsequent taking of the note of one of the owners, did not discharge the original debt against the barque and owners, unless it was expressly agreed to be taken as such, of which, in the present case, there is no pretence. 6 Term R. 52; 7 Term R. 66; [Chappedelaine v. Dechenaux] 3 Cranch [7 U. S.] 311; [Sheehy v. Mandeville] 6 Cranch [10 U. S.] 264; [Peyroux v. Howard] 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 344; 2 Camp. 515. On this point the law of New York, as the lex loci, ought to govern (Story, Confl. Laws, 266–274; 1 Conn. 409; 1 Wash. C. C. 340 [Camfranque v. Burnell, Case No. 2,342]); and the law of New York is well settled, that a note is neither payment nor a waiver, except it be agreed to be taken as such (7 Johns. 311; 1 Cow. 290).

3d. If the note be not a waiver of the libellants' claim against the other owners, it cannot be presumed to be a waiver of their lien upon the ship, which the law has expressly given them for their own protection, in case the personal security of the owners should be insufficient. Peyroux v. Howard, 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 341; The Nestor [supra]. The taking the note is not inconsistent with the full intention on the part of the libellants to retain their lien, and that is the criterion.

4th. Were the note now outstanding, and not surrendered, the case would be different. The law would not then enforce the lien, because the party might be compelled to pay twice. Ramsay v. Allegre, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 611; The Nestor [supra].

5th. In the case of a lien upon real estate, for the purchase money, it has been expressly held, that the debtor's own note does not extinguish the lien; and the principle, in the present case, is precisely analogous. 15 Ves. 347; 1 Wash. C. C. 191 [Harris v. Burchan, Case No. 6,117].

6th. There is no pretence of any equities by third persons, purchasing without notice, except as to one quarter owned by Mack. It is, therefore, exactly as if Broughton, whose note the libellants took, claimed protection for his ship, because he had not paid his own note, when the law gives the libellants both as security.

7th. As to Mack's one quarter, Cushing is responsible to him. Cushing settled with Broughton in his own wrong. Their receipt on the bill informed him, that he was holden, and he was bound to know, that Broughton's note did not pay the debt. 2 Dow. 37, 38.

8th. The statute of New York is merely a domestic law, operating upon domestic ships. It does not pretend to, and could not, overrule the jurisdiction of the district court, as it existed before.

F. C. Loring, for claimants, argued:

1st, that the contract and lien in this case, were to be governed by the local law, by which the lien ceased when the vessel left the state. 2 Rev. St. N. Y. p. 493. That this law applied both to foreign and domestic vessels; and that it was competent for a state to pass laws regulating the maritime lien on foreign vessels.

2d. That if the lien was to be governed by the general maritime law, it was determined by the giving and receiving of a negotiable note of one of the part owners. The Nestor [supra]; Ramsay v. Allegre, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 611; The William Money, 2 Hagg. Adm. 136.

STORY, Circuit Justice. This is a libel by material-men for materials supplied for the repairs of the bark Chusan. The bark belongs to the port of Marblehead, in Massachusetts, and the materials were supplied for her repairs, while she lay in the port of New York. So that, in the sense of the maritime law, as recognized in this country, it is a case of supplies for a foreign ship lying within a port in a foreign jurisdiction, the different states of these United States being for this purpose held foreign to each other. By the general maritime law, a lien attaches upon the foreign ship, under such circumstances; and the nature, extent, and character of that lien is to be determined, not by the local law of the particular state, but by the general principles of the maritime law applicable to the case. This I conceive to be clearly established by the case of The General Smith, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 488, and Peyroux v. Howard, 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 324, 341; and it has been fully recognised in this court in the case of the Nestor [supra].

At the threshold of the present case, we are, however, met by the argument, that, by the statute of New York, respecting the lien of material men, and repairers of ships, it is provided, that the lien shall cease, when the ship, for which the supplies are furnished, has left the state. The language of the statute (2 Rev. St. 1829, pt. 3, c. 8, tit. 8, § 1, p. 493), is, that whenever a debt amounting to fifty dollars or upwards, shall be contracted by the master, owner, agent, or consignee of any ship or vessel within this state, for either of the following purposes: (1). On account of any work done, or materials or articles furnished in this state for or towards the building, repairing, fitting, furnishing, or equipping such ship or vessel: (2). For such provisions and stores furnished within this state, as may be fit and proper for the use of such vessel, at any time when the same were furnished. (3). On account of the wharfage, and the expenses of keeping such vessel in port, including the expenses incurred in employing vessels to watch her; such debt shall be a lien upon such ship or vessel, her tackle, apparel, and furniture, and shall be preferred to all other liens thereon, except mariners' wages. It is observable, that, in this language, there is no allusion to foreign vessels as contradistinguished from domestic vessels. The object of the provision seems to be to enlarge the maritime law by giving the same remedy in regard to domestic vessels, which already existed in relation to foreign vessels. The fair interpretation is, that it is remedial, and not that it is restrictive. The next section provides for the limitation of the lien to twelve days, when the vessel departs from the port of repairs to any other port of the state, and it is to cease when the vessel leaves the state. This statute is, as I conceive, perfectly constitutional, as applied to cases of repairs of domestic ships, that is, of ships belonging to the ports of that state. And if the present were the case of materials and supplies furnished to a ship belonging to New York, and the lien were sought to be enforced in the admiralty courts of the United States, I should have no doubt that the lien created by the law of that state, and not existing by the general maritime law, must be governed throughout by the law of that state, and that, when the ship left the state, it would cease. But in cases of foreign ships, and the supplies furnished to them, the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States is governed by the constitution and laws of the United States, and is, in no sense governed, controlled, or limited by the local legislation of the respective states. The constitution of the United States has declared that the judicial power of the national government shall extend "to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction;" and it is not competent for the states, by any local legislation, to enlarge, or limit, or narrow it. In the exercise of this admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, the courts of the United States are exclusively governed by the legislation of congress, and in the absence thereof, by the general principles of the maritime law. The states have no right to prescribe the rules by which the courts of the United States shall act, nor the jurisprudence which they shall administer. If any other doctrine were established, it would amount to a complete surrender of the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States to the fluctuating policy and legislation of the states. If the latter have a right to prescribe any rule, they have a right to prescribe all rules, to limit, control, or bar suits in the national courts. Such a doctrine has never been supported, nor has it for a moment been supposed to exist, at least, as far as I have any knowledge, either by any state court, or national court, within the whole Union. For myself, I can only say, that, during the whole of my judicial life, I have never, up to the present hour, heard a single doubt breathed upon the subject. The distinction between foreign ships and domestic ships, as to this very matter of lien, was stated with great precision and accuracy by Mr. Justice Thompson in Peyroux v. Howard, 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 341, where he said: "In the case of The General Smith, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 438, it is decided, that the jurisdiction of the admiralty in such cases, where the repairs are upon a domestic vessel, depends upon the local law of the state. Where the repairs have been made, or necessaries supplied to a foreign ship, or to a ship in the ports of a state to which she does not belong, the general maritime law gives a lien on the ship, as security, and the party may maintain a suit in the admiralty to enforce his right. But as to repairs and necessaries in the port or state, to which the ship belongs, the case is governed altogether by the local law of the state, and no lien is implied, unless it is recognised by that law. But if the local law gives the lien, it may be enforced in the admiralty." Language of a similar import was used in the case of The General Smith, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 443. Now, it is impossible to read this language, and not perceive, that the court never entertained the slightest notion, that the question of lien for repairs and supplies of a foreign ship did depend, or could depend, upon the local law of a state. It was treated throughout as governed solely by the maritime law. The very article of the code of Louisiana (article 2748) on which the case of Peyroux v. Howard, 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 34, turned, makes no distinction between foreign and domestic ships, as to the lien or privilege for repairs; and yet, as we have just seen, the court considered the distinction as clear between the application of that article to a domestic ship, and its application to a foreign ship, in the matter of the lien.

Suppose a state legislature should declare that there should, in future, be no lien of seamen for their wages, on any ship foreign or domestic, or no lien for salvage on any ship foreign or domestic; and no lien for any bottomry bond on a ship foreign or domestic; will it be pretended, that such a law would be obligatory upon the courts of the United States in the exercise of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction? If it would be, a more forcible and complete device to dry up and extinguish the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States in admiralty cases, could scarcely be imagined. The truth is, that the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, given by the constitution, covers not merely the cognizance of the case, but the jurisprudence and principles, by which it is to be administered. It covers the whole maritime law applicable to the case in judgment, without the slightest dependence upon or connection with the local jurisprudence of the state on the same subject. The subject-matter of admiralty and maritime law is withdrawn from state legislation, and belongs exclusively to the national government and its proper functionaries. Besides, by the constitution of the United States, congress has the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several states. The power to regulate commerce includes the power to regulate navigation with foreign nations and among the states; and it is an exclusive power in congress. This I conceive has been firmly established by the supreme court of the United States (see Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 193–198); and the doctrine stands, as I conceive, upon grounds which cannot be shaken, without endangering the interests of the whole Union, if not the very existence of the constitution as a frame of government for the professed objects and purposes, which it was intended to accomplish. Now, there cannot be a doubt, that the prescribing of rules for the shipping of seamen, and the navigation of vessels engaged in foreign trade, or trade between the states, is a regulation of commerce. In what respect does the exercise of a power to regulate, control, or extinguish the liens given by the maritime law for material men upon foreign vessels, differ from the power to regulate the shipping of seamen, or the navigation of foreign vessels? Each is a regulation of foreign commerce, or commerce among the states. Each includes the assumption of a power to act upon the subject-matter as one of concurrent jurisdiction, instead of belonging exclusively to congress. It would not, I presume, be doubted, that congress might, by an express act, adopt the whole maritime law upon this subject; and if it had so done, no state could rightfully interfere to control, or limit, or restrict it. It seems to me, since the maritime law constitutes the law of the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the United States, until modified by congress, that congress, by conferring this jurisdiction upon its courts, has, by implication, adopted that law as a regulation of commerce essential to its proper exercise. Perhaps it will be suggested, that if congress had passed an act upon this subject, it would be of paramount authority, and suspend or control state legislation upon the same subject; but that until congress shall pass such an act, the states have full authority to act upon it. This I utterly deny. If the power to regulate foreign and inter-state commerce be, as I conceive it to be, exclusive in congress, all state interference therewith is unconstitutional and void. Congress, having power to regulate the whole subject, regulates it as much by what it leaves without any positive regulations, as by what it expressly provides for. The will of congress is equally expressed in both cases. It cannot be that a state has a right to step in, and, by way of compliment, fill up by its own legislation, what is not actually occupied by that of congress. Such was the doctrine maintained by the supreme court in Houston v. Moore, 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 1, 21, 22; Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 1, 196–222, and Holmes v. Jennison, 14 Pet. [39 U. S.] 540, 569, 574–579.

I have thought it right to say thus much upon the general question of the operation of the statute of the state of New York. I ought to add, that I entertain not the slightest doubt that that statute was never intended to be applied to cases of foreign ships, or the repairs thereof, but was designed to be auxiliary to the maritime law, and to give it an extended application to domestic ships, from motives of public policy and general convenience. New York is the last state in the Union, which, in point of interest, could entertain the purpose of crippling the national authority over the regulation of commerce, or of interfering with the great principles of maritime law, upon liens for repairs and other kindred purposes. From what has been already stated, the first point relied on in the defence,—that the lien, if any was, under the circumstances, created by the repairs, ceased with the departure of the ship from the ports of the state, is overruled by the court, as incapable of being maintained as a bar to the suit.

We are next met by the question, whether, in the first place, any lien was created upon the brig for the repairs; and in the next place, if created, whether it was not waived or extinguished by the note of Broughton. The argument, that no lien was created, because of the credit given for the repairs, is not now relied upon, because it is completely disposed of by the case of The Nestor [supra] in this court; and to the considerations there stated, and the decision there made, my judgment still adheres with unabated confidence. Then, as to the note, it is a contract governed altogether by the law of New York (since it is not a maritime contract), at least, to the extent of disposing of the present objection. By the law of New York, as by the law of England, and, indeed, as far as I know, by the law of all the states of the Union, except Massachusetts and Maine, which are governed by a somewhat modified doctrine, a note taken in payment of a debt is ordinarily but a conditional payment thereof; that is, it is an absolute payment only when duly paid. See Schermerhorn v. Lorines, 7 Johns. 311, and the cases cited in the reporter's note to the third edition, 1832; Muldon v. Whitlock, 1 Cow. 290. The presumption, prima facie, in New York is, that a note taken for a debt is a conditional payment only; but this presumption may be rebutted by proof, that it was taken as an absolute payment. On the contrary, in Massachusetts and Maine the presumption is, prima facie, that a note taken for a debt is an absolute payment, but this presumption may be rebutted by proof, that it was intended as a conditional payment only.

Now, in the present case, there are no circumstances to repel the ordinary presumption, that the note taken in this case was taken otherwise than according to the lex loci contractus. The ship was not a domestic, but, in the sense of the law, a foreign ship; the owners were strangers, belonging to another state. The ship was, in New York, subject to a general lien for repairs. Under such circumstances, the natural presumption would be, that exclusive personal credit was not given to the owners of the ship, and a fortiori not to one of the owners. The very credit allowed might be naturally and conveniently allowed upon the ground, that the ship itself was a collateral security for the debt, from the lien of the maritime law adhering to it. Besides, upon the very face of the account, there is evidence that credit was originally given to the ship for the supplies and materials. The language of the account is: "Bark Chusan and owners bought of John and George Ring." So that this repels the notion that any mere personal responsibility of the owners was exclusively relied on or taken. We all know, that, by the general principles of the maritime law, material-men have a three-fold remedy for supplies and materials furnished for a foreign ship. First, the ship itself; secondly, the owners; and thirdly, the master; and neither of these remedies is displaced, except by conclusive proof, that an exclusive credit has been, in fact, given to one or more of the parties so liable, or to the ship itself. I need not quote authorities in support of this doctrine. It was fully recognised by Lord Mansfield in Rich v. Coe, Cowp. 636, and Farmer v. Davies, 1 Term. R. 109; and this is regularly true in all cases where the general maritime law governs, whatever may be the case, where the municipal jurisprudence inculcates a more restricted rule. See Abb. Shipp. (Ed. 1829) pt. 2, c. 3, §§ 2, 3, 10. It is certainly the well established doctrine in America, as the cases already referred to abundantly show. The lien, however, which is given by the maritime law on the ship, although it is, or may be treated as, a permanent or abiding lien upon the ship, until the debt is paid, as between the original owners and the material-men, and their personal representatives, is liable to a very different consideration, when the ship has passed into the hands of a bona fide purchaser, for a valuable consideration, without notice of the lien. In respect to such a purchaser, the lien must be enforced within a reasonable time after the debt is due, and the credit, if any, has expired; otherwise a court of admiralty will protect him, as a court of equity would do, against the claim as stale, and inequitable. What will constitute a reasonable time must depend upon the circumstances of each particular case, and is not a point susceptible of any definite or universal formulary of interpretation.

In the present case, no ground of this sort is set up as matter of defence in the answer; and, therefore, I am bound to presume, that none exists; for certainly it is not admissible, without being set up in the answer; for the cause must be decided secundum allegata et probata. Proof is not enough without a suitable allegation to allow its introduction, as allegation would not be enough without proof. In respect to Messrs. Bates & Co., it is clear, that they do not stand in the predicament of bona fide purchasers for a valuable consideration, without notice. Their title is as mortgagees only under Broughton, taking the property as collateral security for a debt due to them by Broughton; and with the admitted fact, that they never took possession of the ship, or interfered with her management, and that the mortgage was antecedent to the supplies of the libellants to repair the ship. Under such circumstances, they were benefited by the supplies, and must be deemed, by their conduct, to admit the right of Broughton to contract as absolute owner for them and to bind the ship by a lien; and this upon the plain maxim, qui sentit commodum, sentire debet et onus. In respect to Cushing's one quarter part of the ship, he paid his proportion of the amount to Broughton; but he was also master of the ship, and if the receipt on the account was shown him, that receipt would also prove, that the account had not been paid by Broughton, but that the latter had given his note only therefor; and under such circumstances he was bound to know that, by law, the note was no discharge of the debt, unless it was duly paid. If, on the other hand, he never saw the account or the receipt thereon, but he trusted entirely to the affirmation of Broughton, that it was paid; then his confidence in Broughton, although it might have misled him, is not to prejudice the libellants in their claim. In either view, therefore, it is plain, that the taking of the note would not discharge him personally, or his share of the ship from the maritime law. The case falls within the principle acted upon in Stewart v. Hall, 2 Dow, 29, and Wyatt v. The Marquis of Hertford, 3 East, 147, although the circumstances of those cases were not identical with those of the present. The case of Muldon v. Whitlock, 1 Cow. 290, goes the full length of the doctrine; and perhaps presses it somewhat further. See Story, Ag. §§ 433, 434. In respect to Mack, who is the purchaser under Cushing, of his share of the ship, there is nothing in the answer suggesting when he became the purchaser, or under what circumstances, or whether he had notice of the fact of repairs, and the giving of the note by Broughton, and the settlement between the latter and Cushing. This was certainly material to have been stated; and the defect is not entirely supplied by the statement of facts. It is only there stated, that Mack became a purchaser from Cushing, and "claims to be a bona fide purchaser, without notice." When he purchased does not appear. Now, there is nothing in the answer suggesting (as has already been stated,) that the libel was not filed within a reasonable time after the credit had expired, so as to entitle the libellants to enforce the lien. And under such circumstances, the court must presume, that it was filed within a reasonable time. If Mack purchased before the filing, with knowledge of all the facts, he must stand in the same predicament with Cushing. If he purchased without such knowledge, and yet the libel was filed within a reasonable time, he must take his purchase cum onere, and cannot be exempted from the lien. Of course, if he purchased after the libel was filed, he is affected with all the equities between the libellants and Cushing. But as between Broughton and Mack, the latter would have a clear right to have the whole repairs charged upon Broughton's three quarters of the ship, to the exoneration of Cushing's one quarter; and the only open question is, whether, under the circumstances of the present case, Bates & Co. are not affected with the same equities as Broughton. I incline to think, that they are; but if the parties desire to be heard upon that point, I will leave that part of the case open for argument.

My judgment upon the merits is, that the libellants have a complete subsisting lien upon the ship for the amount of their account; and that it is to be enforced by a decree. The decree of the district court (which is understood to have been given upon the mere footing of the authority of the case of The Nestor [Case No. 10,126]) is therefore reversed, and a decree will be entered, according to the opinion which I have now delivered, for the amount of the libellants' account, with costs.

SALVAGE COMPENSATION.

[For saving the cargo of a wrecked vessel, consisting of a locomotive and a quantity of railroad iron, the court allowed one-half of the net value of the property saved.]

[Cited in 35 Fed. 542.]

[See The Isaac Allerton, Case No. 7,088.]

[In admiralty. Libel by John P. Smith and others against the brig Cimbus and cargo, for salvage.]

Wm. R. Hackley, for libelants.

S. J. Douglas, for respondents.

MARVIN, District Judge. This brig, laden with an assorted cargo, a locomotive engine, and a quantity of railroad iron, bound from Philadelphia to New Orleans, ran ashore on the Dry Rocks, and soon broke up, and sank in two fathoms water. A portion of the cargo, including the locomotive and iron, was saved by divers. The value of all the property saved is $18,264.19. I shall decree one-half of the net value of the property saved, as a reasonable salvage. It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed, that the 753 bars of railroad iron saved by different salvors be charged with a net salvage of fifty per cent., i. e. that the salvage be ascertained by deducting from $6,617.18, the appraised value, the bills for wharfage, storage, and labor thereon, and its proportion of the proctor's fee for defending the cargo, and Captain Lodge's recompence for superintending the saving of the same, and, after such deductions, the salvage be one-half the remainder. That upon the payment of the aforesaid salvage and charges, and the merchant's commissions, if any, its proportion of the notary public's fee, and such other charges as shall be allowed thereon by the court, the marshal restore said iron to I. E. Martin, who claims the same, as agent for the owners, under a bill of lading assigned to him by the Brooklyn Warehouse Company in New Orleans. That the salvage on the locomotive and appurtenances be the same as upon the iron, and ascertained in the same manner; and that the charges upon the remaining proceeds be the same as upon the iron, or ascertained in the same manner; and that the residue be paid to Mr. R. W. Welch, agent for the Mercantile Mutual Insurance Company of Philadelphia; Captain Lodge, of the brig, consenting thereto. That the salvage to the Boat Union, which saved, of iron and other cargo, $1,655.24, and the Lizzy Wall, which saved $1,013.50 of iron and other cargo, be the same, and ascertained in the same manner, as upon the locomotive. That the residue of the property saved pay a salvage of fifty per cent., and that the residue of the costs, expenses, and charges not hereinbefore provided for be chargeable to the residue of the proceeds in court. That the recapitulation and statement hereunto attached be approved, and that the clerk pay the salvage and bills accordingly, and the residue undisposed of to Captain Lodge, for the benefit of whom it may concern.

Circuit Court, S. D. Ohio. Nov. 24, 1879.

RIGHT OF CITIZEN TO INSPECT COURT RECORDS.

[1. A citizen of the United States has not an unlimited right, as such, to inspect and examine all the records and papers belonging to the circuit and district courts, but only, under the express provision of the act of 1848, those books containing the docket or minute entries of the judgments and decrees of the court.]

[2. A petition, alleging the refusal by the clerk of the court of leave to inspect "books containing the docket and minute entries, judgments, and decrees" of the district and circuit courts, prayed an order that "the judgment and decrees of the said court, including the fee books and other books containing the public records and orders of said court," be open for inspection of petitioner. It was supported by an affidavit alleging that petitioner's agent was refused permission to examine the "public records, fee books, and decrees of said court." Held, that notwithstanding that the prayer was broader than the allegations of the petition, and that neither was supported by the affidavit, the petition was good on general demurrer, for petitioner was entitled to part of the relief prayed.]

In the matter of the application of the Cincinnati Enquirer Company for an order allowing them to examine the books and records of the court. Ex parte on demurrer to the petition.

Before BAXTER, Circuit Judge, and SWING, District Judge.

SWING, District Judge. This is a petition filed by Mr. John R. McLean and the Enquirer Company, in which they set out that "heretofore, to-wit, on the 7th day of November, 1879, application was made to Thomas Ambrose, clerk of this court, by J. H. Woodard, an agent of said Enquirer Company, for leave to inspect during office hours books containing the docket and minute entries, judgments, and decrees of the said district court and the United States circuit court, and that the said clerk then and there refused the said J. H. Woodard the privilege to so inspect or examine the books aforesaid. Your applicants would, therefore, respectfully ask the court to order that the judgments and decrees of said court, including the fee books and other books containing the public records and orders of said court, be open to the inspection of the said J. H. Woodard, agent of the said Enquirer Company and of said John R. McLean, under such regulations as to the court may seem proper." With this application there is filed the affidavit of one James H. Woodard, in which he says that he is employed by the Cincinnati Enquirer Company, a corporation doing business under the laws of the state of Ohio, and that acting under the orders of John R. McLean, the manager of said corporation, he made personal application to Thomas Ambrose, clerk of the United States circuit and district courts, for permission to examine the public records, fee books, and decrees of said court, and permission was refused him by the said Thomas Ambrose, clerk as aforesaid, and said application was renewed on this day and date by him as a citizen having the right to inspect said books, decrees, and minutes, and was again refused. To this application there is filed by the clerk, in the form of a demurrer, that the petition does not contain facts enough to entitle the applicants to the order they pray for.

This proceeding, in one sense, at least, is adversary in its character, and yet it is based upon the alleged refusal by an officer of this court for permission to exercise an alleged right of the petitioners. The right which they allege was refused was that of having one J. H. Woodard to inspect, during office hours, books containing the docket and minute entries, judgments, and decrees of the district court and the United States circuit court. This right is based solely upon the ground that John R. McLean is a citizen of the United States, and that the Enquirer Company is located in the United States. It is not claimed for either that they have any interest in the docket or minute entries, judgments, and decrees recorded in said books. If the prayer of the petitioners prayed simply for the right which they claimed an officer of this court had deprived them of, there would be no difficulty in determining the case. But such is not the fact. They pray for an order that the judgments and decrees of said court, including the fee books and other books containing the public records and orders of said courts, be open for the inspection of one J. H. Woodard. It will be seen at a glance that their prayer is greatly beyond what they alleged they were not permitted to examine. That was the books containing the docket or minute entries of the judgment and decrees, but this is not only that the judgments and decrees may be examined, but that all other books containing the public records and orders of the court shall be opened to their inspection. So much for the allegations of the petition itself.

But let us see how the allegation of the right which they allege they were deprived of is supported by the affidavit which has been filed. The petition says that the application was for leave to inspect the books containing the docket and minute entries, judgments, and decrees. The affidavit of the man Woodard is that he applied for permission to examine the public records, fee books, and decrees, showing clearly and conclusively that the petition is not supported by the affidavit. Such is this application as shown from the papers filed. But it is claimed that notwithstanding the variance between the allegations of the petition and the prayer, and the variance between the proof and allegations, that petitioners are entitled in law to the order prayed for; that they are so entitled by the statutes of the United States, or, if not by them, that they are by the common law entitled to it; that all the books and papers of a court of record are subject to the examination and inspection of any citizen, whether they have any personal interest in them or not; that it is the high and indefeasible right, at any time he pleases during working hours, to make such inspection. If this is true, it is very clear that the petitioners are entitled to the order prayed for. This doctrine is a new and strange one, and certainly finds no support in any adjudication which I have been able to find, and I am very certain none can be produced sustaining any such proposition. But the very formation, purposes, and duties of a court forbid such an idea. The court is composed of judge, ministerial and executive officers, together with the attorneys and members of it. To this party so organized is committed for determination the highest interest of the citizen, in his property, his reputation, and his person. And a careful record of every step which may be taken in relation to either must be carefully recorded; every paper connected with any proceeding affecting any one in either of these must be carefully filed and preserved. The title to the entire property of the whole country passes through the courts of this country almost in every half century. They are the repositories of the rights of persons and of property, and in many cases the only evidence in either, and the law imposes upon the court the duty of their secure and careful protection and preservation; a protection and preservation which would be greatly jeopardized if every citizen of the United States, at his pleasure and will, should be permitted to examine and inspect them in his own way. Not only is such an idea in opposition to the formation, purposes, and duties of the court, but it is clearly in opposition to the views of the highest judicial and legislative branches of this government. At a very early day, the supreme court of the United States adopted a rule, known as the fourth rule, which provides that "All motions, rules, orders, and other proceedings made and directed at chambers, or on rule days at the clerk's office, whether special or of course, shall be entered by the clerk in an order book, to be kept at the clerk's office, on the day when they are made and directed, which book shall be open at all office hours to the free inspection of the parties in any suit of equity and their solicitors." If the supreme court believed that all the books and records belonging to the court were open to the inspection of every citizen of the United States, why did they enact such a rule? Or why did they limit the right of inspection to parties or their solicitors? This rule itself is the most convincing proof that no such right as claimed by the petitioners, was supposed by the judges of the supreme court to have existed. But it is claimed by the learned counsel for the petitioners that there is a difference between suits in equity and at law; that there could hardly be a case in equity in which the government could have any interest. It is not perceived by the court upon what reason there can exist any difference in the care and custody of the records and papers in equity causes and actions at law, but learned counsel are mistaken in regard to the interest of the government in equity causes. The records of this court show numerous causes in equity in which the government of the United States is plaintiff. But it is said, if that is so, that the citizen is a party in interest, and would have a right to look into the records. In some general political sense it may be true that the citizen is a party in interest in every suit prosecuted in the name of the United States; but in a legal sense he is not such a party in interest as is contemplated by this rule.

That congress entertained the same view is abundantly shown by its acts. In 1848 it enacted a law providing that "all books in the office of the clerks of the circuit and district courts containing the docket or minutes of the judgments or decrees thereof, shall during office hours be open to the inspection of any person desiring to examine the same without any fees or charge therefor." [9 Stat. 292.] If congress believed the right already existed, why did they think it necessary to create such right by special legislation? Or if they believed it ought to exist, why did they limit the right to particular books, such only as contained the docket or minutes of the judgments or decrees? And again, by the act of February, 1875 [18 Stat. 333], congress provided "that the account and vouchers of clerks, marshals, and district attorneys shall be made in duplicate to be marked 'Original' and 'Duplicate,' and it shall be the duty of the clerk to forward the original accounts and vouchers of the officers above specified, when approved, to the proper accounting officers of the treasury, and to retain in his office the duplicate, which shall be open for public inspection at all times." If the public had the right already to inspect such papers, why did congress deem it necessary to create such a right by the passage of this act? It is, therefore, very clear to my mind that the unlimited right of a citizen of the United States to inspect and examine all the records and papers belonging to the court does not exist. The right to examine certain records and papers does exist. It exists as to the books containing the docket or minute entries of the judgments and decrees of the court, and these the petitioners allege that they have been refused by an officer of this court. The prayer of the petition is not in accordance with this averment, and the affidavit is different from both. This petition, however, must be governed by the rules of pleading in other cases, so far as the demurrer is concerned. If the party is entitled to any part of the relief he prays for, a general demurrer must be overruled. This application for the interference of the court is based upon the allegation that the petitioners have been deprived of a right given them by the law by an officer of the court. This is denied on behalf of the officer by two members of the bar, who are officers also of the court, and who appear in this proceeding on behalf of the clerk. This is a charge which the court is interested in having examined, and the truth or falsity thereof established. The demurrer therefore will be overruled, but no order will be made until a further hearing of the matter is had before the court, when we shall finally determine whether the petitioners are entitled to the order as prayed for.

To the above opinion, BAXTER, Circuit Judge, added afterwards, concurring: "The arguments and the discussion relate to the legal rights of the citizen to inspect the public record of the courts. I do not take issue with any principle announced by the district judge in reference to the questions there involved. But in consultation we agree that this is not a case for the application of technical law. The examination proposed professes to be in the public interest. No injury can result to any one from such examination."

District Court, S. D. New York. Nov. 1872.[1]

SUPPLIES FURNISHED IN HOME PORT — LIEN — CONSTRUCTION OF ADMIRALTY RULE 12.

1. Where necessaries are furnished to a vessel in the port or state where she belongs, the general maritime law does not give to the party furnishing them a lien on the vessel herself for his security.

2. The history of the 12th rule in admiralty given, and the decisions under it explained.

3. The amended 12th rule of May 6, 1872, which provides that "in all suits by materialmen, for supplies or repairs, or other necessaries, the libellant may proceed against the ship and freight in rem, or against the master or owner alone in personam," does not apply to suits brought, or to supplies, etc., furnished, before that date.

4. The purport of the rule is to provide that, in every case of a contract for supplies, etc., to a vessel, domestic or foreign, being a maritime contract, made after the rule takes effect, process in rem against the vessel or in personam against her master or owner, may optionally be resorted to where a suit is required to enforce the contract.

[In admiralty. Libel by Henry N. Wickes, against the steamboat Circassian for supplies furnished in the home port.]

W. W. Goodrich and W. R. Beebe, for libellant.

W. A. Butler and T. E. Stillman, for claimant.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. This libel is filed to recover against the steamship Circassian the sum of $3,936 for coal and wood furnished to her at New York, in October, 1866, she being then a domestic vessel, owned in New York, and bound on a voyage to Europe. The supplies were furnished by the firm of C. H. Bass & Co., who have assigned their claim to the libellant. The debt was contracted at the request of the agent of the vessel, the supplies were put on board of the vessel, and receipted for by the master, they were proper supplies for her intended voyage, and the evidence shows that credit was, in fact, given to the vessel, because of the want of pecuniary responsibility of the owner of the vessel. The libellants supposed at the time that the statute of New York would give them a lien which they could enforce by proceedings in rem against the vessel, according to the mode prescribed by that statute. The libel alleges that the claim is, by the maritime law, a lien on the vessel, and also that it was, at the time the supplies were furnished, and now is, a lien on the vessel by the law of the state of New York.

After the decision in the case of The General Smith, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 438, in 1819, it was no longer open to question, in the courts of the United States, that, where necessaries are furnished to a vessel in the port or state where she belongs, the general maritime law does not give to the party furnishing them a lien on the vessel herself for his security. The point arose directly, in that case, and was necessarily decided. The vessel was owned in Baltimore, Maryland, and the supplies were furnished to her at Baltimore. The supreme court held that there was no lien by the law of Maryland. This being so, there was no lien at all, and no foundation for the suit, which was one in rem, unless there was a lien by the general maritime law. The supreme court decided that there was no lien by the general maritime law. This decision has been recognized as a correct one in numerous cases since, which have come before the supreme court, to and including the case of The Kalorama, 10 Wall. [77 U. S.] 204, 208, 211, at the December term, 1869, in which last case it is said that "the question was put to rest" by the decision in the case of The General Smith. It had become a rule of property, established for nearly fifty years, when the supplies in the present case were furnished.

In the opinion of the court in the case of The General Smith, it was remarked that, "in respect to repairs and necessaries in the port or state to which the ship belongs, the case is governed altogether by the municipal law of that state, and no lien is implied, unless it is recognized by that law." This remark was understood to suggest that, where the municipal law of the state gave or recognized the lien, it would be enforced in the admiralty court. Accordingly, in the case of Peyroux v. Howard, 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 324, in 1833, it was held that the district court had jurisdiction of a suit in rem against a vessel for materials supplied and work performed, in repairing her at New Orleans, on the ground that the contract was a maritime contract, that the service was to be performed within the ebb and flow of the tide, and, therefore, within the jurisdiction of the admiralty, and that the local law of Louisiana gave a lien in the case. In The Orleans v. Phoebus, 11 Pet. [36 U. S.] 175, in 1837, it was stated that the decision in Peyroux v. Howard proceeded on the ground that, where the contract was a maritime one and the state law gave a lien, the admiralty had, in the first place, jurisdiction of the contract, as a maritime one, and then, finding that the lien had, by the state law, attached, would enforce such lien according to the mode of administering remedies in the admiralty. The jurisdiction of the admiralty was regarded as vesting under the laws of the United States, and not under the local law of the state, the latter law only conferring the right to a lien, which the admiralty, having jurisdiction of the maritime contract, would enforce by the appropriate admiralty remedy. Accordingly, the court decided that the admiralty court had no jurisdiction of a suit in rem against a vessel, to recover a claim by a master for his wages, as master, and for necessaries advanced by him to the vessel, while he acted as master, because the services and disbursements were not maritime, and that it made no difference that a lien was given by the local law, so long as the contract was not maritime. Following out these principles, it was stated by the supreme court, in Ferry Co. v. Beers, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 393, 402, in 1857, that it had never sanctioned the doctrine that admiralty jurisdiction in rem existed against a vessel, to enforce a carpenter's bill for work and materials furnished in constructing the vessel, because a lien had been created by the local law of the state where the vessel was built.

At the December term, 1844, the supreme court, in the exercise of what it regarded as the authority given to it by the sixth section of the act of August 23, 1842 (5 Stat. 518), to prescribe and regulate the forms of process and the forms and modes of framing proceedings and pleadings, and generally the forms and modes of proceeding to obtain relief, and generally to regulate the whole practice in suits in admiralty in the federal courts, promulgated the following rule, to take effect from the 1st of September, 1845, as a rule for the regulation and government of the practice of the circuit and district courts of the United States in suits in admiralty on the instance side of the courts: "Rule 12. In all suits by material-men for supplies or repairs, or other necessaries, for a foreign ship, or for a ship in a foreign port, the libellant may proceed against the ship and freight in rem, or against the master or owner alone in personam. And the like proceeding in rem shall apply to cases of domestic ships, where, by the local law, a lien is given to material-men for supplies, repairs or other necessaries." This rule recognized, in regard to domestic vessels, the principles as to liens which the supreme court understood to be recognized by the cases of The General Smith, Peyroux v. Howard, and The Orleans v. Phoebus, and established no new rule or practice. Those principles were, that where repairs were made or necessaries were furnished to a vessel in the port or state to which she belonged, the case was governed by the local law of the state, and no lien was implied unless it was recognized by that law; but that, if the local law gave the lien, it might be enforced in admiralty. The supreme court stated the principles in those terms, in 1847, in New Jersey Steam Nav. Co. v. Merchants' Bank, 6 How. [47 U. S.] 344, 201. At the December term, 1858, in Allen v. Newberry, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 244, the supreme court held that the district court for Wisconsin had no jurisdiction of a libel in rem against a vessel for the loss of goods shipped on board of the vessel at one port in Wisconsin, to be delivered at another port in Wisconsin, and, at the same term, in Maguire v. Card, Id. 248, it held that the district court for California had no jurisdiction of a suit in rem against a vessel to recover for coal furnished to it in California, it being engaged in trade exclusively within California, although a lien for the coal was then given by local law of California. The court then proceeded, at the same term, to repeal the 12th rule of December term, 1844, and to substitute in its place the following rule of practice, to take effect from May 1, 1859: "In all suits by material-men for supplies or repairs, or other necessaries for a foreign ship, or for a ship in a foreign port, the libellant may proceed against the ship and freight in rem or against the master or owner alone in personam. And the like proceeding in personam, but not in rem, shall apply to cases of domestic ships, for supplies, repairs or other necessaries." The first sentence of the new rule was in the same words as the first sentence of the old rule. The second sentence of the old rule read as follows: "And the like proceeding in rem shall apply to cases of domestic ships, where, by the local law, a lien is given to material-men for supplies, repairs or other necessaries." The words in italics in the old rule were omitted in enacting the new rule, and the words in italics in the new rule were inserted in enacting that rule. By the new rule the court intended to provide, and did provide, that a proceeding in rem should not be allowed in the admiralty against a domestic ship, for supplies, repairs or other necessaries, furnished to her, even though a lien on the vessel was given therefor to the material-man by the local law. The right to proceed in rem against the vessel in the admiralty, in the case of Maguire v. Card, was given by the letter of the old rule, then in force, but the court held that it did not extend to a contract growing out of the purely internal commerce of a state, and not extending to or affecting other states or foreign countries. It also said, in its opinion in the case, referring to the new 12th rule, that it had provided, by that rule, for leaving all liens which depended on the state laws, and did not arise out of maritime contracts, to be enforced by the state courts.

The purport and meaning of the new 12th rule were explained by the supreme court in the case of The St. Lawrence, 1 Black, [66 U. S.] 522, in 1861. The case was one of supplies furnished to a domestic vessel, at New York, in regard to which a lien on the vessel had been acquired under the local law, and a suit in rem, to enforce the lien, had been brought in the district court, against the vessel, before the new 12th rule took effect. The supreme court held that the libellant was entitled to a decree. It upheld the jurisdiction of the admiralty to enforce such a lien, founded on a maritime contract, even though the lien was created by the local law, and did not exist as a maritime lien. It stated that the alteration in the 12th rule applied altogether to the process to be used, and had no relation to the question of jurisdiction; that, in reference to the enforcement of a maritime contract, justifiable in the admiralty, congress, and the supreme court, by authority of congress, had a right to prescribe whether the jurisdiction should be exercised by an attachment of property, or merely by a suit against a person, or by both; that the contract, if maritime, was equally within the jurisdiction of a court of admiralty, whether process against the vessel were issued, because the supplies were presumed to be furnished on her credit, under the Maritime Code, or because a lien on the vessel therefor was given by the local law, or whether only process against the person were issued, because the supplies were presumed, by the Maritime Code, to be furnished on the personal credit of the master or owner of the vessel, and no lien therefor was given by the local law; that the old 12th rule, as well as the new 12th rule, was merely "a rule of practice;" that a lien given by a state law was enforced in the admiralty, not as a right which the admiralty court was bound to carry into execution on the application of the party, but as a discretionary power; and that the repeal of the old 12th rule proceeded on the ground that it was not convenient or practicable for the admiralty court to enforce liens which rested on the local law for their support. The old 12th rule was held to apply to cases commenced before the new 12th rule took effect, and the new 12th rule was held not to apply to such cases. At the December term, 1866, the supreme court, in The Moses Taylor, 4 Wall. [71 U. S.] 411, had under consideration a statute of the state of California, which made a vessel liable for services, supplies, materials, and some other matters of contract, and sundry torts, and constituted such causes of actions liens on the vessel, and authorized actions for such causes to be brought directly against the vessel, by name, with an attachment of her, and, if a judgment should be recovered, a sale of her, to satisfy the judgment. The court held that such statute, to the extent in which it authorized actions in rem against vessels for causes of action cognizable in the admiralty, invested the courts of California with admiralty jurisdiction; that the cognizance by the federal courts of civil causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction had been made exclusive by congress; and that the state court of California had no jurisdiction of a proceeding in rem against a vessel, under such statute, for a breach of a contract by her owner to transport a passenger from New York to San Francisco. In the case of The Hine v. Trevor (at the same term) 4 Wall. [71 U. S.] 555, the supreme court had under consideration a statute of Iowa, which gave a lien on a vessel for injury to property by such vessel, and authorized the seizure and sale of the vessel therefor, without any process against her owner or master. It held that a state court of Iowa had no jurisdiction, under that statute, of such direct proceeding against a vessel for such a cause of action, for the reason that the cause of action was one of admiralty cognizance, and within the exclusive jurisdiction of the admiralty courts of the United States. In March, 1868, the court of appeals of this state, in the case of In re The Josephine, 39 N. Y. 19, following the two decisions in 4 Wallace, held that a proceeding against a vessel, by name, in a state court of New York, under the New York statute of April 24, 1862 (Laws 1862, c. 482), on a lien given by such statute for supplies furnished to the vessel, was void, for want of jurisdiction, because exclusive cognizance of such a proceeding belonged to the district courts of the United States, the contract being a maritime one. This view was reiterated by the same court, in Brookman v. Hamill, in May, 1871, 43 N. Y. 554. Judge Rapallo, in delivering the opinion of the court in that case, says, with great accuracy: "Although our courts of admiralty may not recognize the lien of material-men for supplies to domestic vessels, not deeming the credit given to the vessel, they have retained jurisdiction over the subject of these claims, and whatever restrictions now exist as to the remedy are self-imposed by our own courts, and do not arise from any lack of jurisdiction over the subject. In view of the doctrine of the case of The St. Lawrence, I can see no want of power in the supreme court, should it see fit so to do, to restore the rule of 1844, or to allow a remedy in rem to material-men in all cases. * * * And, if the necessities of commerce require that, in this country, there should be a remedy in rem in all cases of material-men, it is much more appropriate that it should be administered by the courts of admiralty, than under the laws which may, from time to time, be in force in the several states, especially in respect to vessels not engaged exclusively in the internal commerce of a state, but which may be subject to liabilities incurred in different states, or in foreign countries, in favor of persons other than the attaching creditor." In this state of the decisions, the supreme court, on the 6th day of May, 1872, amended the 12th rule, so as to make it read as follows: "In all suits by material-men, for supplies or repairs, or other necessaries, the libellant may proceed against the ship and freight in rem, or against the master or owner alone in personam." The 12th rule of May 1, 1859, which was so amended, read thus: "In all suits by material-men for supplies or repairs, or other necessaries, for a foreign ship, or for a ship in a foreign port, the libellant may proceed against the ship and freight in rem, or against the master or owner alone in personam. And the like proceeding in personam, but not in rem, shall ap- ply to cases of domestic ships, for supplies, repairs, or other necessaries." The words in italics above, in the rule of 1859, were stricken out, and that was the only change made, to arrive at the rule of 1872.

What is the meaning and effect of the rule of 1872? The rule of 1859, recognizing the law of the courts of the United States as to maritime liens for supplies, etc., gave process in rem or in personam, optionally, in case of supplies, etc., to a foreign ship, or a ship in a foreign port; and gave process in personam, but not in rem, in case of supplies, etc., to a domestic ship. Jurisdiction of all contracts for such supplies, etc., belongs to courts of admiralty of the United States, under the constitution and statutes, because such contracts are contracts of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, but process in rem was allowed, by the rule of 1859, only in the case of a foreign ship, and was refused in the case of a domestic ship. The rule of 1872 provides, and was intended to provide, that, in every case of a contract for supplies, etc., to a vessel, domestic or foreign, being a maritime contract, process in rem against the vessel, or in personam against her master or owner, may, optionally, be resorted to, where a suit is required to enforce the contract. The libel in this case was filed on the 21st of May, 1872. The coal was furnished in 1866. The suit was brought after the rule of 1872 went into effect, but the supplies were furnished before that rule went into effect. When the supplies were furnished, no process in rem could be issued against the vessel therefor. There was no lien on the vessel therefor by the general maritime law, and the 12th rule of 1859 forbade the issuing of process in rem against the vessel, because she was a domestic vessel. The contract was made in view of this state of things, and no remedy in rem existed under the state law, because the provision therefor was void. The rule of 1872 now comes into effect. But, in the absence of all words indicating an intention that the rule shall apply to cases of supplies, &c., furnished before the rule took effect, it must be held, on familiar principles of interpretation, to apply only to cases of supplies, &c., furnished after it takes effect. The same principle which always applies to the interpretation of a statute must be applied to the construing of this rule. All statutes are to be considered prospective, unless the language is express to the contrary, or there is a necessary implication to that effect. U. S. v. Heth, 3 Cranch [7 U. S.] 399; Harvey v. Tyler, 2 Wall. [69 U. S.] 328, 347. There is nothing in the rule of 1872 to indicate an intention to give a remedy in rem against a domestic vessel where the supplies, etc., were furnished before the rule took effect.

Another consideration is of force. The supreme court, on the 6th of May, 1872, expressly state that they amend the 12th rule of 1859 so as to read thus and so. They do not repeal the 12th rule of 1859. By their order of May 1, 1859, they repealed the 12th rule of December term, 1844, and prescribed a new 12th rule. The 12th rule of 1859 is amended from and after May 6, 1872, so as to read in the new form thereafter, in respect to suits to be brought thereafter for supplies, etc., to be furnished thereafter. In respect to suits brought before May 6, 1872, and on or after May 1, 1859, for supplies, etc., furnished between those dates, and in respect to suits brought on or after May 6, 1872, for supplies, etc., furnished before May 6, 1872; and after the 12th rule of 1859 went into operation that rule is to govern; for, it is still left in force in respect to cases not covered by the amendment of 1872. That rule expressly forbids process in rem in the present case. It results that the libel must be dismissed, with costs.

[NOTE. Libellant appealed to the circuit court, where the decree herein was affirmed. See Case No. 2,726.]

Case No. 2,721.

The CIRCASSIAN.

[1 Ben. 128.] [1]

District Court, E. D. New York. 1866, 1867.

CONFLICT OF JURISDICTION—MARSHAL'S RETURN—VOID WARRANTS—ACTUAL CUSTODY BY OFFICER—INTERVENTION BY SHERIFF CLAIMING POSSESSION.

1. A vessel was seized by a state sheriff under a state lien law. Afterward, process was issued against her in the United States district court, in a suit on a bottomry bond. The proceedings in the state court having gone to a sale, the purchaser, who had paid twenty per cent. of the purchase money, but had not completed the purchase, applied to the district court for an order directing the marshal to surrender the vessel to him, Held, that the purchaser was not in a position to ask such an order, having bought her with full knowledge of the admiralty proceedings, not having completed his purchase, and not averring that the sheriff could not or would not put him in possession on his completing the purchase.

2. The question whether the custody by a sheriff of a vessel under a writ alleged to be void, is such as to prevent a court of admiralty from acquiring jurisdiction of the vessel, is one which should not be determined on motion.

3. Cases of Taylor v. Carryl, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 583, and of The General Smith, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 438, commented upon.

4. Where a marshal who had process against a vessel, made return that he had attached her, but that previous to his attachment she was in custody of a state sheriff, and where it appeared that, of the warrants under which the sheriff held the vessel, all that were in his hands at the time of the alleged attachment by the marshal were afterwards declared void for want of jurisdiction, and the libellant thereupon applied for an order to compel the marshal to amend his return by striking out all reference to the custody of the sheriff, Held, that the marshal is responsible for the execution of the process put into his hands, and should be left free to state what he does with it, subject to that responsibility, and that the court therefore would not interfere.

5. Where a question arose between the marshals of the southern and eastern districts of New York, as to which made the first seizure of a vessel in waters over which both district courts exercise concurrent jurisdiction, and on a petition by one marshal to the court to have the other give up the custody of the vessel to him, the court heard evidence as to which seizure was prior, Held, that such a question was more properly raised on a petition by the marshal, than on a plea to the jurisdiction by a party in whose favor the marshal held process.

6. As long as one court of competent jurisdiction has custody of property, no other court of concurrent jurisdiction can acquire jurisdiction of it.

7. The custody of the law, having been once fixed by the valid levy of an officer duly authorized to seize, continues whether the officer be present or not, unless acts equivalent to a surrender and withdrawal are shown.

8. On the facts, the petitioning marshal did not have the prior seizure. A marshal's return stating a seizure of the vessel, but that at that time the vessel was in custody of a state sheriff, does not imply any such seizure as would make the marshal responsible, or would give the court jurisdiction.

9. Where a libel was filed on a bottomry bond, on which process was issued and returned, and on the return a state sheriff filed a claim and answer, setting up that he was in custody of the vessel at the time of the alleged seizure by the marshal, and the libellant moved to strike out the claim, Held, that the power of the sheriff to bring, in this way, proceedings in a state court, before a United States court for adjudication as to their validity, is doubtful.

10. Where a conflict of this sort arises between a sheriff and a marshal, the sheriff has two courses open to him, either to apply to the state court to be protected, or to apply by petition to the federal court to order its officer to withdraw. The sheriff's answer stricken out, and leave given him to apply by petition.

In admiralty. On the 21st of September, 1866, the steamship Circassian returned to the port of New York, from a voyage to Antwerp. Previous to her departure from New York, she had been owned by William Salem of that city, who had mortgaged her to Ernest Fiedler, for $90,000, and had subsequently conveyed the title, subject to the mortgage, to the Continental Mail Steamship Company. When she sailed on that voyage, there were bills against her for supplies, &c., for which specifications of lien had been filed against her under the lien law of the state of New York. Sess. Laws 1862, p. 956. While she was in Antwerp, a bottomry bond was executed by her master to Jonathan R. Bischoffsheim. In Halifax, on her return home, another bottomry bond was executed to Edward Cunard. Before she returned to New York her owners had become insolvent, and on the day of her arrival she was seized by the sheriff of the city and county of New York, under a warrant issuing out of the supreme court of the state of New York, to enforce a claim of Benner & Burr, who had filed specifications of lien as above stated. Similar attachments were afterward issued to the sheriff, as follows: September 24th, in favor of Alex. Irwin. September 28th, in favor of Zeno Secor. October 9th, in favor of James Shaw. October 10th, Horatio G. Seeber. Several other attachments were afterwards issued, but need not be specified. On October 30th, the sheriff made a sale of the vessel under the warrant in favor of Benner & Burr, and Appleton Sturgis became the purchaser at the sale, and paid twenty per cent. of the purchase money. He, however, declined to complete his purchase, and, on his motion, the supreme court on November 8, 1866, set aside the sale for want of jurisdiction to issue the warrant (the affidavit on which that warrant was issued not complying with the requirements of the statute), and ordered the twenty per cent. to be refunded. The affidavits on which were issued the warrants in favor of Irwin, Secor, and Shaw, contained similar defects. On November 23, 1866, the sheriff made another sale under the Seeber warrant, and Sturgis again became the purchaser, and paid twenty per cent. of the purchase money, but never completed the purchase. During this time, proceedings against the vessel had been taken in the United States district courts of both the southern and eastern districts, the vessel lying in the waters of the city of New York, which are by statute within the jurisdiction of both those courts. 13 Stat. 438.

The proceedings in the southern district were as follows: On September 25th, Bischoffsheim filed his libel in the southern district to enforce his bottomry bond. Process against the vessel was issued to the marshal of that district on that day, returnable on October 16th. On October 2d, Cunard filed his libel in the southern district to enforce his bottomry bond. Another libel was also filed the same day, and process was issued to the marshal on that day on both libels. On October 16th, the marshal returned the process in the Bischoffsheim case, with the following return: "In obedience to the within monition, I attached the steamship or vessel called the Circassian, her tackle, &c., therein described, on the 25th day of September, 1866, and have not given due notice to all persons claiming the same that this court will, on the 16th day of October inst. (if that should be a day of jurisdiction; if not, on the next day of jurisdiction thereafter), proceed to the trial and condemnation thereof, should no claim be interposed for the same. Previous to my attachment the vessel was in custody of the sheriff of the city and county of New York, under various attachments issued out of the state court. Robert Murray, United States Marshal." This return being made, proceedings in the cause were postponed from time to time. The returns to the other processes were subsequently made in similar form, differing only in the dates of the service, and proceedings on these processes were also postponed. On November 18th, by order of the court, the marshal made a special return of his proceedings in all the suits, which was similar in form to the other returns, but which fixed October 2d as the day of the service of the Bischoffsheim process. On November 20th, an alias process was issued in the Bischoffsheim case, and a return was made of its service on the same day, the return being otherwise similar to the one given above. In this position of the matter, Sturgis, who, as above stated, had purchased the vessel at the sheriff's sale on November 23d, presented to the district court of the southern district a petition setting forth the proceedings under the state law, and that, by virtue thereof, the sheriff seized this vessel on the 21st day of September, and continued in possession up to the sale to the petitioner; that the marshal of the southern district claimed also to have taken possession of the vessel under the admiralty process in these causes, and claimed to have said vessel in custody, or to be entitled to the custody thereof; also, that the petitioner was ready to pay the balance of his bid to the sheriff, and was advised and believed that the sale by the sheriff passed to him a valid title to the vessel, free from all claims; wherefore he prayed that the vessel might be discharged from the custody of the marshal, and that the marshal might, by an order of this court, to be entered in these causes, be directed to surrender the possession of the vessel to him.

T. E. Stillman and Wm. Allen Butler, who appeared in support of the motion, argued that the case of Taylor v. Carryl [supra] had settled the law, that where a sheriff had possession of a vessel under a warrant from a state court, a United States marshal could not execute any process against her, and that the marshal's own return here showed that the sheriff was in such possession when the marshal undertook to attach, and that, therefore, the marshal never did or could attach, and should be directed by this court not to keep up the semblance of an attachment upon the vessel.

In opposition to the motion, J. Larocque, after arguing that the Irwin warrant, issued September 24th, under which the sheriff claimed to have been in possession on the 25th of September, when the process was issued to the marshal, was void for defect in the affidavit on which it was granted, argued the following points:

1. It has been held, that it is the right and duty of the court of the United States to enforce its possession when it is prior, as against a state officer. Slocum v. Mayberry, 2 Wheat. [15 U. S.] 1.

2. The warrant being void, it follows, that when the vessel was attached and seized by the marshal under the process in this action on the 25th September, the sheriff was not in possession qua sheriff, and held no legal or valid process. His presence was, therefore, no more an obstacle to the taking possession by the marshal than that of any other individual could have been.

3. The present, moreover, is not an application by the sheriff complaining of interference by the marshal. It is a petition of Appleton Sturgis claiming to be a purchaser, not under process issued prior to the attachment by the marshal in this suit, but under process confessedly issued only on the 10th of October. The petitioner makes the effort to tack the possession under this warrant of the 10th October, subsequent to the attachment by the marshal under the process in this action, to a prior alleged possession under other warrants. This he could not do even if those prior warrants were valid.

4. Mr. Sturgis, moreover, has become the purchaser under the sheriff's sale, and has not yet completed his purchase. He comes to the court in advance of doing so to obtain from it a judicial declaration by order that the marshal was not lawfully in possession before the right to take possession accrued to the sheriff under the warrant under which he purchased, for the purpose of concluding the libellant here on the question of jurisdiction in this suit. He has not even a standing in court for such an application. He is not owner of the vessel, and could not appear even to claim her in the ordinary way. Rule 26 of the supreme court in admiralty.

5. If, therefore, the court is satisfied that the marshal has the lawful possession of the vessel under the process in this suit, it is its duty so to declare and to enforce it. In any event, however, there is no state of facts shown which prevents the sheriff claiming to be in possession from delivering his bill of sale to the petitioner, and doing every formal act necessary to the delivery of possession. If in law the marshal is not in possession or entitled to possession on the facts shown, his process remains in abeyance until the possession of the sheriff has ceased. The return of that process on the 16th of October, stating that before he attached on the 25th of September the sheriff was in possession, does not interfere with the lawfulness of his possession from the time of the original attachment which he returns upon the facts now shown; and this case differs from those of Taylor v. Carryl, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 583; Freeman v. Howe, 24 How. [65 U. S.] 450; and Buck v. Colbath, 3 Wall. [70 U. S.] 334, in the essential particular that here has been no attempt as in those cases to proceed to adjudication in rem before the property shall be in the undisputed possession of the marshal of this court, and thus clearly under its jurisdiction.

6. This being an admiralty suit in rem to enforce the lien of a bottomry bond upon the vessel given by the master in a foreign country, the jurisdiction in admiralty under the constitution and laws of the United States is exclusive. The distinction between cases where it is exclusive of, and where it is concurrent with that of the state courts, is that it is exclusive where that of the British court of admiralty was so at the time of the Revolution, and concurrent in cases where the courts at Westminster exercised concurrent jurisdiction at that time; and at that time they did, and both in that country and this they have ever since exercised exclusive jurisdiction of an action in rem to enforce the lien of a bottomry bond. It is not material to inquire whether a court of common law has or has not concurrent jurisdiction of an action in personam against the owner or master of a vessel on a bottomry bond for subtraction of the security, or after it has become absolute and when there is a personal covenant to pay. Const. U. S. art. 3, § 2; Judiciary Act, § 9 (1 Stat. 76); 1 Pet. Adm. 91, 92, 93 [Brevoor v. The Fair American, Case No. 1,847]; [American Ins. Co. v. 356 Bales of Cotton] 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 545; The Volunteer [Case No. 16,991]; 16 Johns. 327; 1 Wheat. 304, 335; 1 Kent, Comm. 318, 319; 18 Johns. 392; Doug. 594; Menetone v. Gibbons, 3 Term R. 267; Ladbroke v. Crickett, 2 Term R. 649; Buggin v. Bennett, 4 Burrows, 2035; Blacquiere v. Hawkins, Doug. 378.

7. If, however, the state courts could exercise concurrent jurisdiction, the jurisdiction in this court has already attached by the filing of the libel to enforce the bottomry bond. Even if the libellant might have availed himself of the provisions of the act of the legislature of New York of April 24, 1862, entitled "An act to provide for the collection of demands against ships and vessels" (Sess. Laws 1862, c. 482), he has not chosen to do so. That act, whenever any lienholder under the state law originates proceedings, assumes to foreclose by those proceedings and to cut off, in favor of the claims of citizens of New York against the vessel arising in this state, whether prior or subsequent, every other lienholder having a claim, whether of exclusive admiralty jurisdiction, or concurrent admiralty jurisdiction, except seamen having claims for wages. Section 1, subd. 5. The act in this respect is a plain infringement of the jurisdiction of the federal courts in cases of admiralty conferred by the constitution of the United States, and void. It is to the suitor in admiralty that the United States judiciary act saves a "common law remedy in all cases where the common law is competent to give it"—not to the defendant or respondent. It is the suitor who is entitled to exercise the option as to the forum, where one exists. With that single saving, the jurisdiction of the admiralty is expressly made exclusive of the state courts. And even that saving is fully satisfied by the construction that the common law remedy must be sought in the federal court and not in the state court, and full effect cannot be given to all the language of the section by adopting any other construction. U. S. Judiciary Act, § 9; 1 Stat. 76.

8. The present motion, moreover, under color of that act of the legislature of New York, undertakes to deprive this libellant, who is an alien, of his right of proceeding in the federal court against a domestic ship owned by citizens of New York, and claims to abrogate the plain language and import of the contract of bottomry executed in the foreign port of Antwerp.

9. The state law also seeks to reverse the well-established rule of the general maritime law of the world, that a bottomry bond is entitled to a priority in payment over every other claim against the ship, and successive bottomry bonds in the inverse order of their dates and of the exigencies calling for them, the last given being entitled to be first paid. This state law postpones them all to claims of its own citizens under liens acquired prior or subsequently, in the ship's home port, as against a foreigner acquiring a lien in good faith in a foreign port, and in reliance upon the general maritime law adopted expressly by the constitution, laws, and decisions of the courts of the Union, but attempted to be set aside by this state enactment.

10. The court will, moreover, not pass upon such a question adversely to the libellant on motion. It would be in effect deciding against him a jurisdictional question involving that of the continuance of his lien under the bottomry bond, in a form which would deprive him of his right to appeal to the supreme court of the United States. The petitioner should be left to set it up by claim and answer in this suit. The prayer of the petitioner should therefore be denied with costs, and the order should declare that the marshal has possession of the vessel under the process in this action in law and in fact.

In behalf of Cunard, the other bottomry bondholder, G. D. Lord, also presented a brief, but cited no other authorities than those cited above.

BENEDICT, District Judge. I fully appreciate the unfortunate position of this steamer, and have considered with care the reasons which are urged in support of this petition. The impressions formed upon the argument are, however, confirmed, and I am satisfied that the motion should be denied. In the first place, the petitioner is not in a position to entitle him to ask such an interference of this court. He is simply a bidder at the sheriff's sale, who has not yet completed his bid. He bid off the vessel with full knowledge of the admiralty proceedings against her. He avers in his petition that he is advised and believes that if he completes his purchase he will receive a valid title to the vessel. He does not aver that the sheriff is unable or unwilling to put him in possession on receipt of the balance of the purchase money. It is not seen how a party so situated can ask this court to direct the marshal to surrender to him the possession of the vessel. If the action of the marshal had been such as improperly to delay or embarrass the proceedings before the state officers, the state court was competent to protect its officer and its custody of the vessel, if such it claimed to have; and the sheriff in such case might perhaps with propriety have applied to this court to restrain any unlawful action of the marshal. It might also be that the owners or creditors of the vessel could have applied to forbid action, on the part of the marshal, which was likely to prevent realizing a full price from the sheriff's sale. But since the service of the process by the marshal, proceedings in admiralty have been stayed; the proceedings under the state law have gone on: the vessel has been sold by order of the state officer, and for aught that appears, for a full price, under notice of all that has been done or is claimed in the admiralty causes. Neither the sheriff, nor the owners, nor the creditors, complain of any improper exercise of the powers of the officer of this court. How, then, can the petitioner, who has suffered no injury, and may never have any interest in the vessel, ask this court to interfere in his behalf?

There is another reason for denying this application, which is, that it raises a question which should not be adjudicated upon a motion. That question is, whether the custody of the sheriff, by virtue of the statute, is sufficient to prevent the court of admiralty from acquiring jurisdiction for any purpose during the custody of the sheriff, although the officer issuing the warrant to the sheriff had failed to acquire jurisdiction, and the proceedings before him were void. Such is claimed to be the nature of the sheriff's custody in this case; and it appears that the first proceeding taken before the state officer has been declared void by the state tribunal; that the second contains the same defect, and that the third and only other proceeding, previous to the marshal's attachment, is open to objections which may prove equally fatal. It is also to be noticed that the order of sale made by the state officer, under which the petitioner claims, was not made in either of the proceedings commenced before the marshal's attachment, and that it recites that the sheriff seized the vessel on October 10th, which was subsequent to the marshal's attachment.

Now, I do not decide that the proceedings in the state tribunal are void for want of jurisdiction; nor do I examine those proceedings further than to see that the objections taken to the jurisdiction are not frivolous, but simply determine that such a question as this petition raises, and on which the rights of these bottomry holders depend, if the theory of the petition be sound, should not be disposed of in a summary manner, on a motion which cannot be reviewed on appeal.

If there was no ground to contend that the case raised any other question than the one decided in the case of Taylor v. Carryl, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 583, on which the petitioner relies, it might, perhaps, be the duty of the court to end the controversy now. But the case is not identical with the case of Taylor v. Carryl. In that case, the prior custody was the custody of the superior court of the state, whose jurisdiction was conceded. The question was one of title, and what the court decided was, that a title derived from the sale of the vessel, as perishable, by a superior court of the state in a valid proceeding, made after the marshal had retired, and when the custody of the state court had been actual and continued, was a better title than one dependent on the marshal's seizure in the admiralty proceeding.

It may be, that for the same considerations which influenced the high tribunal which decided Taylor v. Carryl, it must also be held in this case that the custody of any state officer, whether acting with or without jurisdiction, is sufficient to oust the jurisdiction of the admiralty, even in an action like the present, where its jurisdiction is exclusive. But in the absence of any such decision by the supreme court, and in view of the effect of such a decision in cases of prize, in cases under the revenue and neutrality laws, and in this case, where the result, claimed by the petitioner to follow, would be to supersede the bottomry bonds by the prior state liens, and in effect destroy them, I do not feel bound so to decide on a motion like this, and enforce the decision by a final order directing the marshal to surrender possession to the petitioner.

So far this application has been treated as an application for the interposition of the court to avoid a conflict between federal and state authority; but it is not quite clear that the petition presents a case of conflicting jurisdictions. The averment of the petitioner is, that the proceedings before the state officer have gone to a sale of the vessel to him, and that the sheriff continued in possession, from his first seizure "up to the sale to the petitioner." There is no definite averment of any custody by the sheriff since the sale, and the prayer is, that the marshal deliver the vessel, not to the sheriff, but to the petitioner. It would not be a very strained construction of this petition, which is certainly ambiguous, to hold that it showed no conflict between the marshal and the sheriff, but that the controversy now lay between the bondholders and the buyer at the sheriff's sale. If such be the nature of the controversy, no reason is discovered for determining it by a summary order like the one prayed for.

In dismissing this application, I venture to add to these remarks a single observation, in the hope that the attention of the appellate court, before which this case will doubtless come, may be called to it.

The source whence such conflicts as the present, in regard to liens upon ships arise, is the distinction between foreign and domestic vessels, laid down in 1816 in the case of The General Smith, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 438. It is that decision, long considered by many able lawyers to be without solid foundation, which compels resort to state lien laws, and gives birth to statutes like the one here involved—a statute which assumes to foreclose and cut off by proceedings in the state court all other lien creditors except seamen, including those having claims of exclusive admiralty jurisdiction—a statute which creates a sort of state admiralty, liable at all times to be brought in conflict with the national courts, to which the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction has been intrusted under the constitution—of which statute I speak the more fully, as many of its features originated with me, when acting as a member of the legislature which passed it. Such laws are now deemed necessary to obviate the consequences of the decision in the case of The General Smith, but they would seldom or never be resorted to if the distinction of The General Smith could be reconsidered, and it be held that, "it is the ship, and not the ship of a particular owner, nor the ship of a particular flag, or national character; not a domestic ship, nor a foreign ship; not a ship in a port of a state to which she does not belong, or in which her owner does not reside; but a ship, every ship, that is bound for the bill of lading, the charter party, the wages of the seamen, repairs, supplies, materials, and maritime loans."

Application denied.

After this petition of Sturgis was thus disposed of, Bischoffsheim applied to the district court of the southern district for an order directing the marshal to amend the return in his action by striking out of it all reference to the prior attachment by the sheriff. This application was based on affidavits to show that the warrants held by the sheriff on September 25th, the day when the process was served by the marshal, were void for want of jurisdiction.

J. Larocque appeared in support of the motion, which was opposed, in behalf of the parties who held the state attachments, by W. R. Beebe, R. D. Benedict, and Wm. Allen Butler.

[Jan., 1867.]

SHIPMAN, District Judge. I have given the questions involved in this motion, and those with which they are necessarily and directly connected, an extended and a careful consideration, and am of opinion that this motion, so far as it calls upon the court to direct the marshal to amend his return to the process, should be denied. There are serious and almost unsurmountable objections to the court's dictating to the marshal what return he should make in any given case touching the facts to which the return properly relates. The marshal and not the court is responsible for the execution of this process, and he should be left free to state what he does in the premises subject to his responsibility to the law under which he acts. These remarks refer to the material facts touching an officer's action, and not to the mere form of the return. In the case of Wortman v. Conyngham [Case No. 18,056], Mr. Justice Washington, after argument of a rule to show cause, took the same view even as to a return on an execution. Much more should it apply to mesne process. If the marshal desires to amend his return, he will be permitted to do so, the court reserving all questions as to law or fact which may arise in the further progress of the cause.

Motion denied.

After the above motion, no further proceedings were taken in the southern district, the activity of the litigation being transferred to the eastern district.

The proceedings before the district court of the eastern district were as follows:

On the 27th day of September, two days after the filing of the first libel in the southern district, a libel was filed by C. K. Porter and others, seamen on board, to recover wages, and process in rem was issued. Thereafter three other libels, also for wages, were filed, the claims in all amounting to some $6,000. To the first of these processes the marshal made return that he had seized the vessel on the 27th of September, and given due notice to all parties to appear; and to the others a like return, except as to date. The return made no reference to any possession by the sheriff or the marshal of the southern district, and the marshal claimed that there was no such possession at the time of the service of this process. No one appearing to contest these claims, decrees were in due course entered by default, condemning the vessel. Subsequently, on application of Edward Cunard, who had filed the second libel in the southern district, and also on application of Ernest Fiedler, the mortgagee of the vessel, the defaults were opened, and, claims and answers being duly filed, the causes were placed on the calendar, and thereafter called in their order for hearing, when it was suggested that this court had no jurisdiction of the vessel for the reason that on the 27th of September, when the process of this court was served, the vessel was in the custody of the marshal of the southern district. Upon this suggestion, the hearing of the causes was postponed, and leave given to raise the question suggested by proper averment, and a day set for its determination. The leave thus given was never availed of, and the causes subsequently proceeded to trial on their merits, without objection, and after consideration decrees were rendered in favor of the libellants, according to which a venditioni exponas was issued to the marshal, and the vessel advertised to be sold at the foot of Joralemon street, Brooklyn, where she then lay. In none of these actions in either court did any owner appear to claim the vessel. It was always insisted by the libellants in this court, and by the marshal of the eastern district, that after the 27th day of September the vessel was always in his manual possession and under his actual control. Matters being in this position, after the denial of the motion to compel the marshal of the southern district to amend his return, an application was made to this court, on behalf of Bischoffsheim, to open the default in the seamen's wages suit, and to allow him to file a plea to the jurisdiction of the court, he claiming that this court never acquired any jurisdiction, because at the time of the alleged seizure by the marshal of this district the vessel was in custody of the marshal of the southern district. The court intimated that such a question would more properly be brought up by an application in behalf of the marshal of the southern district to remove the marshal of the eastern district. Accordingly the marshal of the southern district filed a petition, stating that he attached the vessel on September 25th, and had been interfered with by the marshal of the eastern district, and praying this court to have the "priorities of the respective attachments and of the jurisdictions of the courts of the respective districts investigated and determined by this court." Notice of hearing on this petition was ordered to be given to the libellants in this court, and the hearing was brought on before the court.

Mr. Larocque appeared for Mr. Bischoffsheim and for the marshal of the southern district.

Mr. Vanderpoel appeared for the sheriff of New York, and said that he had just heard of the proceeding, of which he had had no notice, and if the sheriff was to be prejudiced by it he should wish to be heard in the matter. It was stated, however, that the sheriff would not be affected by this proceeding, which was to affect the two marshals only, and Mr. Vanderpoel withdrew.

In support of the petition, Mr. Larocque put in evidence the libel of Mr. Bischoffsheim in the southern district and the process issued on it, on the 25th of September, with the return of the marshal of the southern district upon it, that he had on that day attached the vessel, and that previous to his attachment the vessel was in the custody of the sheriff of New York.

Mr. Hill, who appeared for the libellants, put in evidence the special return made by the marshal of the southern district in all the cases in that district, in which he returned that he attached her on the 2d of October, and previous to his attachment she was in custody of the sheriff, &c.; and the alias process issued in the Bischoffsheim case, with the marshal's return on it, that he had attached the vessel on the 20th of November, and previous, &c.

Mr. Larocque then put in evidence the proceedings in the state attachments, and rested.

Mr. Hill also rested.

Mr. Larocque then insisted that the court in this state of the case, must decide that the marshal of the southern district had the custody; that he had returned that he had it, and an officer's return was conclusive. He added that he had understood that evidence was to be given that no one was on board the vessel at the time the marshal of the eastern district made his arrest of her, and he had come with witnesses to give testimony on that point; but none had been given on the other side, and he supposed the court would at once pass on the case without his calling them.

The judge said he should pass on the case on the evidence which parties put in, but they must themselves decide as to what evidence to put in, and he should give it due consideration, as it was a matter of importance.

Mr. Larocque then asked leave to introduce further evidence, which was granted.

Witnesses were then called on both sides as to the facts of the service of the process by the marshal of the southern district. Their testimony is sufficiently detailed in the following opinion delivered by the court, in disposing of the petition.

BENEDICT, District Judge. Controversies like the present cannot always be avoided in a port where three sheriffs of three different counties, and two marshals of two different districts, to say nothing of other officers, have concurrent jurisdiction to make seizures on its waters. Of this class was the late case of the ship Ferdinand, cited on the hearing, where all the three sheriffs claimed to have the simultaneous custody of the vessel; and somewhat similar was the older case of the Alida, before Judge Betts, where the controversy was between the marshal, a sheriff, and a receiver.

This case differs, however, from most others in this important feature, that the rights and priorities of the various parties proceeding in admiralty, as between themselves, will not be affected by a determination of the question of the priority of seizure. This is because the character of the demands determines the order of payment, in whichever court the vessel may be sold and the proceeds distributed.

The application now made, therefore, does not look to a determination of any question of priority in payment, but rather seeks a determination of the question which of the two courts has legal custody of the vessel, and can make a valid decree of sale.

This question I much preferred to have raised and decided in the southern district, where the first libel was filed, but as more than ample time and opportunity have been given for its examination there, and as it is now distinctly raised here by the marshal of that district, I do not hesitate to examine and dispose of it.

As to the general principle of law which is applicable to this case, no question can arise; for it is settled that so long as one court of competent jurisdiction has custody of property, no other court of concurrent jurisdiction can acquire jurisdiction thereof; and this custody of the law having been once fixed by the valid levy of an officer duly authorized to seize, continues, whether the officer be constantly present or not, unless acts equivalent to a withdrawal and surrender are shown. 2 Pars. Mar. Law, p. 523; The Julia Ann [Case No. 7,577]. As to the controlling facts of the case there can be no reasonable doubt, and they are such as to render it unnecessary to consider whether the evidence offered with a view of showing a withdrawal by the marshal of the southern district, and an acquiescence in the custody of the marshal of the eastern district, does or does not establish that fact. The undisputed facts are such as to render it only necessary to consider whether the marshal of the southern district ever made any valid levy on this steamer prior to the 27th of September, the day when the process from this court was served.

Prior to the 27th of September, the marshal of the southern district had but one process in his hands, that in the suit of Bischoffsheim. This process Bates was deputed to serve, and what he did is proved by Bates himself, and by him alone. He says that he received the process on the 25th, and on the same day, by virtue thereof, seized a wooden side-wheel steamer, with two smoke stacks, which he supposed to be the "Circassian," which, when he seized her, lay in Brooklyn, south of the Hamilton ferry, opposite the Atlantic stores. This vessel, he says, went subsequently into the Atlantic basin, where he was several times on board of her, and she then went away, but where to he does not know.

Now the Circassian is an iron vessel, a propeller, with one smoke stack. She was at no time south of the Hamilton ferry or in the Atlantic basin. On the 25th, and when seized by the marshal of the eastern district on the 27th, she was between the Hamilton and Wall Street ferries, and has there since remained. Bates resided near the Hamilton ferry, and is well acquainted with the locality of which he speaks, and is positive as to where he found the vessel which he seized, and that he was on her in the Atlantic basin. He had no other process against any steamer, and if his evidence be true, he went to the wrong vessel, and made no levy at all on the Circassian prior to the 27th of September. Moreover, Bates could not read writing, or write, and says that he received no instructions from the marshal, or any other person as to the wharf at which the Circassian lay, but went on his own knowledge, having seen her come in a day or two before, as he supposed.

The probability is that he mistook for the Circassian another steamer belonging to the same company, which it is proved did at this time lie at the Atlantic stores, and subsequently went into the basin. It is quite clear he did not visit the Circassian, for of several persons present in court at this hearing, who were on board of her on the 25th, he can identify but one, and that one declares that he saw no such man as Bates at the vessel; while the quartermaster who was at the gangway the whole of the 25th, swears that Bates was not there on that day, nor was any seizure made on that day.

To this evidence is added the circumstance that when on the 2d of October, the marshal received a second process against the Circassian, he did not depute Bates to serve it, according to the usual practice, but gave it to another deputy, and in his special return he state his first seizure of the Circassian to have been made on the 2d of October. It would seem to be difficult upon such evidence to hold that the marshal of the southern district made any seizure of this vessel prior to the 27th of September. But supposing the Circassian to have been the vessel which Bates visited on the 25th, there are still other features of this case which are decisive of the present application.

It is conceded that on the 25th of September, the sheriff of New York was on board the Circassian claiming to have her in custody. The marshal of the southern district must therefore have done one of two things, either he ignored the custody of the sheriff and took the vessel into his own custody and control, or he acknowledged the custody of the sheriff and made no seizure himself. He could not acknowledge the special property of the sheriff and at the same time take the possession and control himself. That he acknowledged the possession of the sheriff, and took no possession himself is apparent from the returns which he made to the original and alias process in the case of Bischoffsheim.

The apparent inconsistency in the phraseology of this return is doubtless owing to the use of the ordinary blank return printed on the process, in which the marshal filled the date of the supposed visit of Bates to the vessel, and to which he added in writing the statement that the vessel was found to be in the custody of the sheriff. This written portion of the return is the controlling portion, and it announces and was intended to announce that the vessel was already in the custody of the law, and that therefore the marshal could not bring her before the court for condemnation. Taken together, the return cannot, as I view it, be held to return any such seizure of this vessel as would render the marshal responsible, or would give the court jurisdiction. The fact stated in it showed a seizure to be impossible, and the statement was useless and immaterial except as an excuse for his failure to levy.

That such is the true construction of this return is shown by the testimony of the marshal's chief clerk, Mr. Thompson, who swears that the return made in this case is the return made in all cases where the sheriff is found in custody, and I am not aware that the returns made in this form have ever been understood to import anything more than that the marshal had on a certain day presented himself at the vessel for the purpose of seizure and had been unable to make it because of the prior custody of the sheriff. Such seems to have been the construction put on the return in this case, for on its being made, an alias process was moved for and issued. Why an alias if the vessel was already in court? Why if the marshal levied on the 25th of September, did he return upon the alias that on the 20th of November the sheriff was in custody? Why in his special return say that the sheriff was in custody on the 2d of October? Why, if this return showed the vessel in court, was a motion made to compel the marshal to strike out the reference to the sheriff's custody? Why, if that portion was not material, does the marshal decline to strike it out? Why, if on such a return the court can entertain jurisdiction do the processes still lie over without action thereon, and the suits, although involving a large amount and pending five months without any defence being interposed, remain stagnant, without entry of default, time to answer, or other steps looking towards a final determination? I can conceive of but one answer, and that an obvious one. The return of the marshal showed that the court had not acquired jurisdiction of the vessel against which the suits were brought. Both the return and suspension of proceedings were in accordance with the opinion of the court in the case of The Robert Fulton [Case No. 11,890], where it was said: "If the marshal found the vessel held by the sheriff under his attachment, he should have so returned upon his process, and all further proceedings of the court would have been arrested." These considerations are, in my opinion, sufficient to remove all doubt as to the jurisdiction.

But if doubt does exist as to the jurisdiction of this court, it certainly would be neither useful nor just to the libellants here, to prevent the proposed sale, which, if the court lacks jurisdiction can injure no one, and which the libellants are urgent should be made, and of the validity of which they are willing to take the risk; thereby compelling them to resort to a tribunal where the action and return of the marshal have rendered it impossible to proceed beyond the filing of the libel. Nor is it seen that any advantage could be derived from such an order by any of the parties who have filed their libels in the southern district, but rather the contrary, inasmuch as proper proceedings on their part will enable them at once to obtain payment in this court out of the proceeds of the proposed sale, in the order of the priority to which they may be entitled, unembarrassed by the marshal's return in their present proceedings, which renders them ineffective.

A further feature of this case should be alluded to in order to explain the difference between the return of the marshal of the eastern district and that of the marshal of the southern district, and to prevent any inference that the propriety of either Marshal Murray's or Marshal Dallon's action as regards the sheriff is here called in question.

The custody of the sheriff of New York, announced by Marshal Murray as existing on the 25th of September and subsequently, was a custody, as it now appears, under two warrants issued by a judge of the supreme court of New York, in statutory proceedings against this vessel under the state lien law. One of these proceedings has been since held void for want of jurisdiction by the supreme court, and the other is claimed to be equally invalid, and all such proceedings in a state court are brought in question by the late decision of the supreme court in the case of the Moses Taylor. These warrants were however valid on their face, and the marshal of the southern district deemed it his duty to acknowledge the custody of the officer who held them. The marshal of the eastern district, on the other hand, saw fit to treat them as void, and insufficient to authorize any levy by the sheriff, or prevent a seizure by him, and he therefore took possession and assumed and has maintained control of the vessel. Whether the warrants held by the sheriff were void, and whether the marshal of the eastern district could lawfully terminate any possession which the sheriff may have had on the 27th of September, are questions not raised or disposed of here, but are properly left by the parties interested in them to be raised in such possessory action, replevin suit, or other proceedings, as may be instituted to test the validity of any title based upon the action of the marshal of this district.

What it is intended to determine here is simply the question of priority between the two marshals, and the consequent jurisdiction over the vessel. On this question my conclusion is, that the marshal of the southern district made no valid seizure of this vessel prior to the 27th of September, and that the sale of the vessel by the marshal of the eastern district under the writs held by him should be allowed to proceed. The prayer of the petition must therefore be denied.

The vessel was not, however, sold under these proceedings, the claims of the libellants being paid. The question which court had jurisdiction of the vessel being, however, thus disposed of, Bischoffsheim, before the discharge of the libellants' process, filed his libel anew in the district court of the eastern district.

Process against the vessel was issued on this libel, and the marshal made return that he had seized the vessel and given due notice to all parties to appear and defend. Upon the return of this process, besides other claimants, the sheriff of the city and county of New York appeared as a claimant and filed a claim, averring "* * * that as sheriff he was in possession of the said steamship at the time of the alleged attachment thereof by the marshal of the eastern district of New York, and prior to any attachment of or custody of said steamship by said marshal, and was lawfully entitled to such possession under divers attachments and process issued in due form of law to said sheriff out of the supreme court of the state of New York, and thereunder he has sold the said steamship, which attachment and process said sheriff is ready to produce, wherefore he prays to defend accordingly." To this claim and appearance the libellant, Bischoffsheim, objected, and moved that the claim be stricken out.

Larocque & Barlow, for motion.
Brown, Hall & Vanderpoel, for the sheriff.

BENEDICT, District Judge. I do not conceive that this court has any power by any form of process to require an officer of a state court to submit himself, and with him the tribunal which he represents, to the jurisdiction of this court; and I greatly doubt the power of the sheriff by making himself a party to proceedings in rem in this court, as here proposed, to bring proceedings pending in a state tribunal before this court for adjudication as to their validity. It is not seen how the decree of this court, adverse to the legality of the proceedings pending in the state tribunal, should such decree be made upon the issue sought to be raised by the sheriff, could be rendered effective to stay the action of the state court, and any determination which this court might make upon such issue, would seem, therefore, to be nugatory. If, on the other hand, the sheriff can submit himself to the jurisdiction of this court, it may be doubted whether, when he has appeared in an action in rem, and made himself a party by filing a claim to the vessel, he is in a position to insist that the vessel is not in the custody of the court. The appearance and claim may amount to an acknowledgement of a seizure by the marshal, and a seizure acknowledged by the sheriff would in such case doubtless give this court jurisdiction of the property.

What is desired by the sheriff is to bring to the notice of this court the fact that the marshal of this district has undertaken to seize a vessel which was in the custody of the sheriff, as minister of the law by virtue of proceedings pending in a tribunal of the state, in order that this court may stay its hand, and allow the proceedings in the state tribunals to go on without interference. In such an emergency two ways lie open to the sheriff. He may bring the facts before the court whose officer he is, and that court has doubtless full power to protect its own custody, if such it has; or he may bring the facts before this court by petition, and pray this court to instruct its officer to withdraw from the vessel. And whenever the latter course shall be adopted, this court will always be found prompt to investigate the facts and solicitous to respect the action of the state officers, and will always avoid a conflict of authority when it is possible to do so consistently with law and justice.

This method of procedure, if followed in the cases of conflicting jurisdictions which must sometimes arise in a harbor like this, will in most instances result in a summary and final determination of the question of possession between the officers of the respective courts, and promptly relieve those officers as well as the courts themselves from many of the embarrassments which otherwise attend such controversies; or if cases arise where questions of such novelty and difficulty are found to be involved as to make a final disposition of them upon a summary petition inadvisable, it will be made apparent to both courts at the outset that a disputed jurisdiction is necessarily exercised, to prevent injustice, and not from any want of regard or respect for the action of another tribunal. My opinion, therefore, is that the claim and appearance of the sheriff should be stricken out, and leave given him to apply by petition for the relief which he desires.

NOTE [from original report]. The proceedings in the United States courts against this vessel resulted in the payment of the seamen, the settlement of one bottomry claim, and the bonding of the vessel in the Bischoffsheim Case, in the eastern district, by the mortgagee. That suit is still pending. A brief statement of what was subsequently done in the state court will be of interest. While the above proceedings were pending, the decisions of the supreme court of the United States in the cases of The Moses Taylor, 4 Wall. [71 U. S.] 411, and the Ad. Hines (not yet reported), were made, and Judge Barnard, of the supreme court of New York, had in the case of the steamboat Josephine decided that under those decisions the state courts had no jurisdiction to enforce a lien on a seagoing vessel, and that the lien law of the state was so far unconstitutional. From this decision an appeal was taken to the general term. While this appeal was pending, a motion was made in the Circassian Case, on behalf of Fiedler as assignee of Sturges, who had bought at the sheriff's sale, to set aside the sale and all the proceedings as void. On the other hand, a motion was made in behalf of parties who had warrants against her, to compel Sturges to complete his purchase and pay the purchase money. The motions were heard together before Judge Sutherland, and his decision, denying both motions, will be found reported in 50 Barb. 490. The general term of the supreme court reversed the decision in the case of The Josephine [50 Barb. 501], holding the law constitutional. An appeal was taken to the court of appeals, which reversed the decision of the general term, and affirmed Judge Barnard's decision [39 N. Y. 19]. While this appeal was pending, Fiedler, who had acquired the title to the vessel by a sale under his mortgage and an assignment from Sturges, the purchaser, having paid off the decrees in the seamen's wages cases and bonded the vessel in the other cases in the United States courts, brought an action against the sheriff of New York to have the proceedings under the various warrants set aside and the twenty per cent. refunded, and to have the sheriff enjoined from further meddling with the vessel. He paid into court also a sum sufficient to cover the lien claims, which was by agreement to stand for the vessel, and she went to sea on the 10th day of August, 1867, having been in the custody of the law for nearly a year. In this suit by Fiedler, the sheriff set up the lien proceedings by his answer; and after the decision of the court of appeals, his answer was stricken out by the supreme court, and the money refunded to the mortgagee. The various material men, who had relied upon the lien law of the state, lost every dollar of their claims, amounting to nearly $20,000.

LIEN—STEVEDORE'S WORK—JURISDICTION.

Where a libel was filed to recover for stevedore's services, and exceptions were filed to it on the ground that the services were not maritime, and therefore the claim was not within the jurisdiction, held, that though the court would be disposed, if the question were a new one, to hold that such services were maritime, yet as the question had been repeatedly determined otherwise in the southern district, the law of those decisions would be followed until modified by concurrent action on the part of both courts, or by the circuit court on appeal.

In admiralty. The libel in this case was filed by James Adams to recover for stevedore services performed in taking in, storing, and in breaking out and landing cargo of the steamer Circassian. Exceptions were filed to it upon the ground that the services were not of a maritime character, and not within the jurisdiction of the court.

O'Sullivan, for libellant.

T. E. Stillman, for claimant.

BENEDICT, District Judge. I confess that I have never been able to see any sound distinction between the nature of the services performed in stowing and breaking out the cargo of a ship, and the services performed in its transportation. The stowage and the landing of the cargo form a necessary part of the contract of affreightment. Without the performance of this duty no freight can be earned. The safety of the ship and of the cargo depends in a great measure upon the care and skill displayed in the performance of this duty, and for its non-performance in a proper manner the ship is liable in the admiralty. It is a service which, when performed by the crew, as is frequently the case, is considered a maritime service, and compensated in the admiralty under the name of wages. And when not performed by the crew, it devolves upon a class as clearly identified with maritime affairs as are the mariners, and fitted for the duty by a special and peculiar experience.

These considerations seem to me sufficient to establish the maritime character of the service, and to bring it within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the district courts, and were the question a new one I should so hold.

But I do not feel at liberty to follow my individual opinion; for, although the question is now for the first time presented in this district, it has been repeatedly decided by Judge Betts adversely to the jurisdiction, and when a question frequently arising in the past has been thus settled, so far as the district court is concerned, by decisions in the southern district, I consider it to be my duty to declare the same law here, until the rule shall be modified by concurrent action on the part of the two district courts, or by the circuit court on appeal.

The exception is therefore allowed, but without costs, and leave given the libellant to file an amended libel within ten days.

SALVAGE—PLEADING.

1. Labor in unloading the cargo of a ship, which is on fire and in danger of destruction, attended with danger to life, and of unusual severity by reason of the danger to the ship, is not simple stevedore's services, and would be ground for sustaining an action in admiralty to recover compensation for them.

[Cited in Francis v. The Harrison, Case No. 5,038.]

2. The contract to render such services is none the less a maritime contract, because the compensation did not depend on the result.

[Cited in The Kate Tremaine, Case No. 7,622.]

3. Where a libel had been dismissed on exception, but leave had been given to amend, and a new libel was filed setting out a valid cause of action, but adding a second cause of action, which was substantially a repetition of the first libel which had been dismissed: Held, that this was an irregular and improper mode of pleading, and the libel must be dismissed, as not within the spirit of the order giving leave to amend.

BENEDICT, District Judge. This case, which has heretofore been before the court, —see 1 Ben. 209 [Case No. 2,722],—upon exceptions filed to the original libel, now comes up again upon exceptions to the amended libel. The original libel was dismissed upon the ground that under the adjudged cases binding this court, it could not, sitting in admiralty, entertain jurisdiction of a claim for stevedore labor. On application, leave was, however, given to amend, under which the present amended libel has been filed, to which exception is also taken upon the ground that it shows no facts which make the action other than one to recover for stevedore services, and consequently that, under the previous decisions, it must be dismissed. Upon the argument of the exceptions, it seemed to be assumed on the part of the claimants, that in order to sustain the libel, the facts presented must show a case of salvage, and it was argued that, upon the face of the libel, it appeared that it was no case of salvage, inasmuch as it is expressly averred that the services sued for were rendered in pursuance of an agreement to pay reasonable compensation for them without regard to the result. The assumption upon which this argument is based I cannot consider as well founded. There may well be a contract to render services to a ship in danger for a sum certain, without regard to the result, which, if it would not form the basis of a claim for salvage, in the strict sense of the word—that is, for a compensation exceeding the value of the services, and allowed out of considerations of public policy—would still be a maritime contract, enforceable as such in admiralty, and to be adjudicated upon according to the principles applicable to cases of contract. The A. D. Patchin [Case No. 87]. The facts set forth in this libel, in what is called the first cause of action, are sufficient, if proved, to make out such a case of contract clearly within the jurisdiction of a court of admiralty. These facts are, that the steamer was on fire in her lower hold, and in danger of being destroyed; that to save her, it was necessary to remove the cargo to get at the coal which was on fire, and to remove it; that owing to the fumes of the burning coal the labor could only be performed at the exposure of life; that the danger to the ship required unusual labor by day and by night, which the libellants performed at request of the owner. The distinguishing features which these facts present are, that the services in question were performed in aid of a ship in danger of destruction; that they were attended with danger to life, and were unusual in their severity by reason of the danger of the ship. Such circumstances have been considered as sufficient to change the character of a contract of affreightment where the agreement was to transship a cargo for a remuneration "according to the services rendered and the risk encountered" into a salvage contract. The Westminster, 1 W. Rob. Adm. 229. And in my opinion they change the character of the services sued for in this case, and render inapplicable the decisions upon cases of simple stevedore labor—decisions which I feel bound to follow, but which I conceive to be without any solid foundation in principle. My conclusion, therefore, is, that the facts set forth in this libel, and designated the first cause of action, are sufficient, if proved, to enable the libellants to maintain their action. But this libel, in addition to the matter already considered, contains what is called a second cause of action, which appears to be the same transaction again set forth in a different form, and here presenting only the features of a simple claim for stevedore labor. It is, in fact, no more than the contents of the original libel once dismissed again presented to the court in the same form, and designated a second cause of action. Such a mode of procedure is irregular and improper, and could hardly have occurred had proper attention been paid by the draughtsman, and I shall mark my disapproval of it by dismissing the libel under the fourth exception, as not within the spirit of the order giving leave to amend. Leave is given to file a proper pleading upon payment of costs of the exceptions.

BOTTOMRY—ARREST OF SHIP—TELEGRAPH.

1. Where a steamship, arriving in Antwerp from New York, was consigned to S., who took the agency of the vessel, put her up for passengers and freight, and paid bills for her, and the vessel was attached for a private debt due from her owner, and it became necessary to relieve the vessel from that attachment, in order that she might sail as advertised, and thereupon the master of the steamer executed a bottomry bond to S. for the amount of the claim of the attaching creditor, and also of the advances made by S. for the steamer: Held, that inasmuch as the advances had been made without any agreement, or any reasonable expectation, that they were to be secured by bottomry, the bond was invalid as to that item.

[Cited in The Roslyn, Case No. 12,067; The Edward Albro, Id. 4,290.]

2. Although the design of the bond to release the ship from arrest, might be a ground sufficient to sustain the bond, yet, as it appeared that the master took no means whatever of communicating with the owner, although he could have done so by telegraph, (the arrival of the ship at Antwerp having been so announced to the owner,) he had no authority to bottomry the ship, and that S. was chargeable with notice of his want of authority, and the bond was invalid.

[Cited in The Eureka, Case No. 4,547.]

In admiralty. This was a libel by Daniel Steineman and Hermann Ludwig, composing the firm of Daniel Steineman & Co., of Antwerp, against the steamship Circassian, to enforce payment of a bottomry bond for the sum of 61,133 francs, given by the master to the libellants in the port of Antwerp.

[1] [Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission. 3 Am. Law T. Rep. U. S. Cts. 4, contains only a partial report.]

The material facts were as follows: The Circassian was an ocean steamer, owned by one William Salem, a resident of New York, and was by him dispatched to Antwerp, as the first vessel of a line of steamers which it was proposed to establish between the ports of Antwerp and New York. The intention was to have such line conducted by a corporation, and such a corporation, called the Continental Mail Steamship Company, had been organized, and its officers designated; but its capital was not yet paid in, and it had neither the title nor the possession of the Circassian, or any other steamer. The Circassian, accordingly, went out under the command of a master appointed by Salem, her owner. Herman Troost was on board, in the capacity of secretary of the Continental Mail Steamship Company, and was also authorized by the owner to make the necessary arrangements, on the part of the ship, for the opening of the line in Antwerp. Upon the arrival of the steamer in Antwerp, the libellants were duly appointed agents of the proposed line, and the vessel was placed in their hands, as agents and consignees. They collected the inward freight, made arrangements with the government for the carriage of the mails, advertised the vessel to sail with the mails and passengers on a day certain, and procured for the vessel, furniture, bedding, provisions, &c., necessary and proper for a passenger steamer on the intended route. Passengers were also engaged, who paid their passage-money in advance. Freight also was shipped, on part of which the freight was paid in advance. After the vessel had fairly entered upon the adventure, and passengers had been engaged, the vessel was seized under an attachment issued to collect a personal debt of Salem, the owner; he being then insolvent, and his paper under protest in Antwerp. Efforts were at once made in court to procure the discharge of the attachment, but without success. Efforts to procure money sufficient to discharge the debt, for which the attachment was issued, were also made, and the master and Troost went to London for that purpose, but failed. An additional embarrassment arose out of the fact that the breaking out of the cholera had interfered with the engaging of passengers, so that, as the day of sailing approached, it appeared that the total amount of freight and passage-money collected was insufficient to pay the advances actually made by the agents towards fitting out the vessel for the voyage. When the sailing day arrived, the alternative was thus presented to the master of procuring, at once, the amount of the attaching creditor's claim, or of announcing that the departure of the steamer must be postponed until the termination of the legal proceedings by a judicial sale of the owner's interest in the vessel, which, with a vessel situated like this, was equivalent to a breaking up of the voyage, an abandonment of the line, and a termination of the prospect of a regular employment for the steamer on the proposed route. The result of such a breaking up of the voyage, or even of any extended delay in the departure of the steamer, would have been to encumber the vessel with maritime liens to the passengers and freighters, for damages and freight pre-paid, which would, in all probability, have far exceeded in amount the debt for which the vessel was attached. In this emergency it was agreed between the master and Steineman & Co., the libellants, that they should procure the release of the vessel from the attachment, by guaranteeing the payment of the demand, and should be secured therefor, and also for the amount of their previous advances, by a bottomry bond upon the vessel. The release of the vessel was accordingly effected as thus proposed; the master executed to Steineman & Co. the bottomry bond in suit, and the steamer sailed on her appointed day, with the cargo and passengers which had been engaged. The voyage was performed in safety. Upon the arrival of the vessel in New York, she was taken possession of by Ernest Fiedler, who held a large mortgage upon her, which he proceeded to foreclose, and who, when she was proceeded against in this action, appeared as claimant, and disputed the validity of the bond.

Bowdoin, Larocque & Barlow, and W. W. MacFarland, as counsel for the libellants, presented the following points:

1. The bond was absolutely necessary to protect the interest of the respondent, who was a mortgagee, inasmuch as the ship was liable for the engagements for freight and passage entered into by the captain, in the regular course of business, and within the scope of his authority as master. As to this liability the following authorities are quite conclusive: The Phebe [Case No. 11,064]; The William & Emmeline [Id. 17,687]; The Freeman v. Buckingham, 18 How. [59 U. S.] 182; Thomas v. Osborn, 19 How. [60 U. S.] 22; Jackson v. The Julia Smith [Case No. 7,136].

2. The general principle that the master cannot give a valid bottomry bond to a creditor, to secure an antecedent debt, where that is the primary object of the bond, and without the existence of other circumstances making it necessary, is not denied, but fully conceded. The principle is sustained by numerous authorities. Greeley v. Smith [Case No. 5,750]. The same general rule was laid down in Hurry v. The John & Alice [Id. 6,923], where it is accurately said, that the money must be advanced "for a purpose necessary to enable the master to complete the voyage he was about to perform at the time the necessity existed for making the contract."

3. It is obvious that this rule can have no application to a case where the primary object is not to secure an antecedent debt, and where the contract is not with the creditor, but where, on the contrary, the advance is absolutely essential to enable the master to "complete the voyage he was about to perform when the necessity arose," and likewise essential to enable the ship to fulfil her engagements, and escape condemnation for a failure to do so; and where the advantage to the creditor is incidental, but unavoidable. While necessity may be said to be the mother of bottomry bonds, yet the necessity itself may spring from innumerable causes. The law only requires that its existence should be shown, in order to pronounce the bond valid. The origin of that necessity is a comparatively unimportant consideration. "The advantage of allowing the master to take up money on bottomry consists in its enabling him to procure assistance when no other resource is at hand, and the adventure would be frustrated if no other resource was afforded." Smith Merc. Law, p. 418. "Necessity, to use the expression of Lord Stowell, is the vital principle of hypothecation, and the court of admiralty will consider every circumstance; will go into the whole history of the voyage, in order to determine whether there be that necessity without which an instrument of hypothecation is void." Id. p. 419. "Necessity creates the law, it supersedes rules, and whatever is reasonable and just in such cases is likewise legal." Sir Wm. Scott in the case of The Gratitudine, 3 C. Rob. Adm. 240, 266. See, also, The Nelson, 1 Hagg. Adm. 169; The Radamanthe, 1 Dod. 201; The Gauntlet, 3 W. Rob. Adm. 82. "That is a sufficient necessity which would induce an owner to do it on the spot." The Fortitude [Case No. 4,953]. "The master may hypothecate the vessel in a foreign country, to enable him to return home, though the original voyage was broken up by capture, and the compulsory sale of the cargo." Crawford v. The William Penn [Id. 3,373]. "In all these cases much must be left to the master's discretion, and he must exercise it conscientiously, for the general interest. If he acts bona fide, and with reasonable care, the rights of the parties are bound up by his acts, although it should afterwards be found that he had committed an error of judgment, and might have acted more beneficially in another manner." Judge Story in The Packet [Id. 10,654]. Bottomry bonds are the creatures of necessity and distress, and may be expected, therefore, to assume different shapes, which cannot be limited except by the condition of a faithful and beneficial discharge of the authority exercised in granting them, as being necessary for the preservation of the property. The Vibilia, 1 W. Rob. Adm. 7.

4. We come now to consider, in the light of the foregoing authorities, the precise question, whether, in any case, a bottomry bond may be given to obtain the money necessary to liberate a ship from arrest, where the cause of arrest is a claim constituting per se no lien on the ship, and to secure which a valid bottomry bond could not be voluntarily given. In examining this question, it will appear: 1. That in no case, English or American, is it decided that a valid bottomry bond cannot be given to relieve a ship from such arrest. 2. That in all the American cases, in which the question has arisen, it has been held that a valid bottomry bond may be given, if necessary to relieve the ship from such arrest. 3. That a stronger case of necessity would not be likely ever to arise than the one which gave birth to this bond.

The attention of the court is invited first to the American doctrine on this subject. Mr. Parsons says: "Nor can a master make this bond merely to secure former debts of the owner, but might, perhaps, if it were the only way to liberate the ship from arrest and sale for those debts." 1 Pars. Mar. Law, 417. And again, at page 423: "So we hold, generally, that if the liberation of the ship from arrest for debt is a good cause for bottomry, yet, if the attaching creditor is himself the obligee, the bond is invalid." Judge Story was clearly of the opinion that the master might raise money on bottomry to redeem a ship from actual arrest, while "a mere threat to arrest the ship for pre-existing debt would not be sufficient, nor could a valid bond be executed to the creditor himself," This opinion must be taken as the opinion of the whole court, inasmuch as there was no dissent from the judgment, or the reasoning on which it was founded. The Aurora, 1 Wheat. [14 U. S.] 105. A bottomry bond is good if bona fide made in a foreign port to relieve a ship under arrest at the suit of a foreign creditor, but it is doubtful if the creditor himself could acquire a valid title thereby. Abb. Shipp. p. 157, note. In the case of The Boston [Case No. 1,669], decided by Judge Betts in 1832, the precise question was involved, and was decided. Certain creditors of the ship for debts incurred on a previous voyage threatened to arrest her, whereupon another person bought the debts, and to secure them, took a bottomry bond. In the course of a very elaborate opinion, the judge says: "The pre-eminent security of bottomry, with its high privileges, is sanctioned only when a ship is under positive arrest, and cannot take effect when the money is advanced only to avert a menaced arrest." It is plain, therefore, that according to the received American doctrine, this bottomry bond was authorized by the necessities of the ship, and is valid.
