The English rule is thus stated in Maclachlan on Shipping: "The want which exacts the loan must be such as, if not supplied, would prevent the prosperous completion of the voyage, not extending to the master's own debts, or the discharge of his person from prison, or even the liberation of the ship herself from arrest without other circumstances combined." In Smith v. Gould, 4 Moore, P. C. 21, Lord Campbell expressed the opinion that a master might hypothecate his vessel in any case, where it might be arrested and sold for a demand for which the owner would be liable. In an earlier case, The Augusta, 1 Dod. 283, Sir William Scott uses this language: "It has been said that the party might, by the law of Russia, have detained this ship till the money was repaid, but I do not think that circumstance alone will be sufficient to convert this into a case of hypothecation." In The Lochiel, 2 W. Rob. Adm. 44, Dr. Lushington says: "Lord Stowell, when he decided the case of The Augusta, entertained great doubt, in the first instance, whether a vessel could be legally hypothecated merely to avoid her detention, but upon subsequent consideration, he was inclined to hold that it might be an additional reason for hypothecation, and that opinion I also adopted in a case that came under my own consideration, that of The Vibilia [1 W. Rob. Adm. 7]." This case was decided in 1843. In 1849, The Osmanli was decided, a case that will doubtless be mainly relied upon by the respondent, but which is in nowise hostile to the claim of the libellant in the case at bar, as to the point actually involved and decided. Mongredieu owned the larger share in, and had the management of the ship. Messrs. Duckworth & Co. were the agents of the ship at Malta. On the occasion in question she put into Malta, and applied to the agents for coal, who, instead of supplying it, arrested the ship for a balance of Mongredieu's account current. Leonard, the managing partner of Duckworth & Co., persuaded the master to give a bottomry bond, and undertook to find a person to advance the money. He did so. Messina nominally advanced the money, and the bond was given to him. There were no peculiar circumstances in the case. After laying much stress on the fact that the bond was, in substance, a bond to the ship's agents to secure an antecedent debt, the court declared it invalid. 3 W. Rob. Adm. 198.

From these authorities, then, it would seem to be a fair and accurate statement of the present English rule on this subject, to say that, independent of other circumstances rendering it necessary and proper, a valid bottomry bond cannot be given, directly or indirectly, as security for an antecedent debt. But a valid bottomry bond may be given to relieve a ship from arrest, where that is the primary object, and the security of the debt an incident, or, as it were, an accidental circumstance, the circumstances of the ship being such as to render it prudent and judicious to obtain her discharge in this mode. And it will, therefore, upon careful examination, appear that there is really no or very little conflict between the English and American courts, the latter being, if anything (as they always are in admiralty cases) rather more liberal and catholic than the former. And it may be safely asserted that under this rule, the bond in question would be sustained owing to the overpowering necessity that gave birth to it. This class of bottomry bonds bears a very strong analogy to a ransom bill. The creditor in the former derives a benefit from the necessity which he has imposed upon the ship, as does the captor in the latter; but the obligation is given, not that this benefit may be received, but that the ship may go free.

5. It is to be inferred from the answer that it is to be contended that it was the duty of the master to communicate with his owners, but inasmuch as his owners were in New York, and he was in Antwerp, it is submitted that this point is quite destitute of plausibility. 1 Pars. Mar. Law, p. 414 et seq.

Barney, Butler & Parsons and T. E. Stillman, on behalf of the claimant, argued as follows:

1. The bottomry bond, so far as it embraces the sum of 16,575 frs., the general balance of account between the steamship Circassian, and the libellants, her consignees, is invalid for the following reasons: Advances having been made, even though by a stranger, it is too late to secure them by a subsequent bottomry, unless that security was in contemplation at the time the advances were made, or unless the advances were made upon the exclusive credit of the ship; and in respect to consignees, no presumption arises, that in making advances they do so either relying upon the credit of the ship, or in contemplation of the security of a bottomry bond. On the contrary, the true rule is, that in order to enable a consignee to secure himself by a bottomry, if, indeed, he can do so in any case, he must give notice of his intention to do so, before making the advances. 3 Kent, Comm. 460; The Augusta, 1 Dod. 283; The Jane, Id. 461; The Hunter [Case No. 6,904]; The Hero, 2 Dod. 143; The Lord Cochrane, 2 W. Rob. Adm. 320; The John & Alice [supra]; Hurry v. Hurry [Case No. 6,922]; Liebart v. The Emperor [Id. 8,340]; Selden v. Hendrickson [Id. 12,639], and cases cited; The Yuba [Id. 18,193]; The Panama [Id. 10,703]. Here the advances were made by Steineman & Ludwig, relying upon the funds which they had, and would receive as consignees, and before a bottomry bond for them was in contemplation.

2. The lender on bottomry must exhibit an account of the items advanced, with sufficient proofs to support them, to enable the court to judge of their necessity, and in order that they may be separately weighed and considered. The Aurora, 1 Wheat. [14 U. S.] 96; The Bridgewater [Case No. 1,865], and cases cited. The only account exhibited, in the case at bar, is the general one, amounting to frs. 52,886. It shows, in a great measure, only the kind of supplies and materials furnished, and not the things, nor their amount. "Ship chandlery," to the amount of frs. 7,873.64, and "cash to captain, frs. 12,300," are general terms. The court can form from them no opinion as to the necessity of such expenditure. It is incumbent upon the creditor who claims an hypothecation, to prove both the actual existence of the necessity of those things which give rise to his demand, and that the funds requisite to obtain those things could be procured in no other way than by the execution of a bottomry bond. The Aurora, 1 Wheat. [14 U. S.] 96. (a) As to the necessity of the items, it must be shown that the expenditure was for the safety or security of the ship, or for repairs or necessaries which were reasonably fit and proper for the completion of the voyage, and such as a prudent owner would have ordered, under all the circumstances, had he been present. Prince of Saxe Cobourg, 3 Hagg. Adm. 392, 3 Moore, P. C.; The Reliance, 3 Hagg. Adm. 74; Selden v. Hendrickson [Case No. 12,639], and cases cited; The Orelia, 3 Hagg. Adm. 75; Rucher v. Conynham [Case No. 12,106]; The Hersey, 3 Hagg. Adm. 404; Hurry v. Hurry [supra]; The John & Alice [supra]; The Augusta, 1 Dod. 287; The Medora [Case No. 9,391], and cases cited; The Osmanli, 3 W. Rob. Adm. 198; The Lord Cochrane, 2 W. Rob. Adm. 320; The Aurora, 1 Wheat. [14 U. S.] 96; The Virgin, 8 Pet. [33 U. S. 538]; The Fortitude [Case No. 4,953]; 3 Wash. C. C. 484 [Crawford v. The William Penn, Case No. 3,373]; Wainwright v. Crawford, 4 Dall. [4 U. S.] 225; Merwin v. Shailer, 16 Conn. 489; 3 Kent, Comm., and cases cited; 1 Pars. Mar. Law, p. 422, and cases cited; Burke v. The M. P. Rich, Cliff. R. 314 [Case No. 2,161], and cases cited. (b) Libellants having failed to exhibit an account of the items covered by their general balance of account, must show the actual existence of the necessity of their entire expenditure, in order to sustain the bottomry given to sustain a general balance. This they fail to do. (c) Nor can the bottomry bond be sustained on the plea that the consignees might have arrested the ship for their advances by the general maritime law. They must meet the same question of necessity as to the items furnished, in order to sustain their claim to a maritime lien, that they have to meet in order to sustain a bottomry bond (Pratt v. Reed, 19 How. [60 U. S.] 359); and a mere liability to arrest will not sustain a bottomry bond (The Osmanli, 3 W. Rob. Adm. 198; The Prince George, 4 Moore, P. C. 21; The Augusta, supra; The Royal Arch, Swab. 279), nor will a mere threat to arrest the ship, though it be for a debt of the ship (The Aurora, supra; The Boston [Case No. 1,669], and cases cited). (d) Advances to the officers and crew are not such necessaries as will justify the giving of a bottomry bond. The Cognac, 2 Hagg. Adm. 385; Furniss v. The Magoun [Case No. 5,163]. In the former case, advances paid before the termination of the voyage, and included in a bottomry bond, were disallowed, on the ground that it was a premature payment, and might never become due, and, if paid in this form, might fall upon the owners of the cargo. In the case at bar, if such advances were allowed, they would fall upon a prior mortgagee. And, on the general principles of maritime law, the wages of the crew are made to depend upon their fidelity to the ship when she is in distress. 3 Kent, Comm. 274, and cases cited; 2 Pars. Mar. Law, 589, and cases cited; Abb. Shipp. Marg. p. 173. (e) The libellants cannot avail themselves of the words "fit and proper," found in the opinion of Judge Story, in the case of The Fortitude, supra, for these words are qualified by the expression, "such as a prudent owner would have purchased, had he been present." The conduct of the consignees, in the case at bar, was far from prudent. With the ship under attachment for frs. 39,000; forewarned, by the prevalence of cholera, that their expectations of procuring a full complement of passengers would not be realized; professedly aware of the impossibility of raising funds upon the credit of the owner of the ship, or of the Continental Mail Steamship Company; and fully aware of the existence of Mr. Fiedler's mortgage for $90,000 on the ship, they made no effort to check the reckless expenditure proven in this case, but paid bill after bill, without investigation or inquiry, and, at the last moment, sought to save themselves from loss, by shifting it upon the shoulders of the mortgagee. Such conduct, if it be not willfully fraudulent, is so grossly negligent as to be virtually so. Libellants have entirely failed to prove any effort to obtain the money necessary to cancel their claim for general balance of account in any other way than by the giving of a bottomry. As to the general balance of account, there is no evidence of the necessity of a resort to bottomry, in order to secure it. It does not follow that, because no one would advance frs. 39,000, without the security of a bottomry bond, that the sum of frs. 17,000 could not be raised without that security; and, indeed, libellants nowhere say or pretend that it could not.

3. The bond in suit is not only clearly invalid, so far as it sought to secure the general balance of account, but it is equally invalid as to the amount raised upon it to release the vessel from arrest for the debt of Salem. The attachment of the vessel at Antwerp was to enforce the payment of a debt due from William Salem, growing out of bills of exchange drawn on him, and protested for non-payment. By the general maritime law, such debt did not constitute a maritime lien upon the Circassian, nor is there any evidence that it did by the laws in force at Antwerp. The prayer of the request to seize the Circassian invokes a principle of equity, that creditors may be protected by the "order of the courts of the country where the personal property or real estate of a foreign debtor is situated, even though the creditor be also a foreigner." In every respect, so far as the papers disclose, the proceedings at Antwerp were precisely identical with our state proceedings by attachment against non-resident debtors, and could no more constitute or give rise to a maritime lien, than could an attachment, issued out of the courts of the state of New York against a non-resident debtor, and levied upon his interest in a foreign ship. Therefore, only the interest of William Salem, over and above the mortgage, could have been attached, or sold, had the proceedings so commenced terminated in a judicial sale. The vessel was not seized under a law giving a specific lien upon the ship, as contradistinguished from a lien upon the interest of the owner in the ship, and the cases in which the master may hypothecate his ship to procure her discharge from arrest to enforce such lien do not apply. In such cases, good sense and equity support the bottomry, because: (a) It has been given in discharge of a debt, by which the ship has been preserved, or its value enhanced—i. e., a debt for repairs, supplies, or to relieve the vessel from distress, enable her to perform her voyage and earn freight—and has imposed no new burden upon the ship. In such a case, the lien has only changed its form from a tacit to an express one, with the addition of maritime interest. (b) The liability of a ship, in specie, for supplies and repairs furnished in a foreign port, and for advances made to relieve her when in distress from casualties incident to navigation, may be presumed to be known to all interested in her; and the law presumes their assent, when, under such circumstances, her master, unable to communicate with her owners, gives a bottomry for her relief. In the case at bar, however, the above reasons do not apply. Here, the question is simply, can a general creditor, finding a ship of his insolvent debtor in a foreign port, by means of an attachment, turn his debt from a simple contract debt into a maritime one, and thus secure the advantage of maritime interest, and the security of a bottomry? This proposition cannot be maintained. (1.) It would be unjust, and productive of irreparable damage and confusion of rights and remedies, if a creditor could, at his option, enforce and secure his simple contract debt against a debtor happening to have a ship, or an interest in a ship, in a foreign port, by converting it into a maritime lien, by hypothecation, upon the entire ship. If he could do this, then, whether the debt were valid or invalid, honest or dishonest, outlawed or still existing, usurious or otherwise, the sacred obligation of bottomry would exist therefor; and, made payable at the end of a voyage other than to the home port, it would be enforced, without an opportunity to the owner to defend himself against a claim, which, in the place where the contract was made, could never be enforced. "It would seem against the policy of the law," says Judge Story, in the case of The Aurora, "to permit a party in this manner to obtain advantages from his contract, for which he had not originally stipulated. It would hold out temptations to fraud and imposition, and enable creditors to practice gross oppressions, against which even the vigilance and good faith of an intelligent master might not always be a sufficient safeguard in a foreign country." These results would follow, whether the bond were given directly to the creditor or to a third person. If, in the latter case, the bond could be allowed, the creditor would only need to secure the services of a friend, who should appear upon the scene as a stranger, and, after the plunder was secured, divide the profits with his principal. Rarely, if ever, could the collusion be proved to the court. (2.) In the case supposed, the rights of part owners must be overridden, and the bottomry, given to release the vessel from arrest for the debt of one part owner, must be enforced against the whole ship. The only remedy of the part owner, whose property has thus been, through the prostitution of legal process, appropriated to pay another man's debt, is a civil action against a probably insolvent debtor. (3.) If the creditor be rapacious, or the debt exceed the value of the ship, then the cargo must be embraced in the bottomry bond; for, where the master may hypothecate the ship, he may the cargo also. (4.) Not only the foregoing consequences would result from the proposition that a bottomry bond may be given to release a vessel in a foreign port from an arrest for a general debt of her owners, but, as in the case at bar, mortgagees who in good faith have advanced their money to the owner upon the security of the ship, are robbed of their priority, and postponed to subsequent general creditors, who, in their contracts, trusted to the personal credit of the owner, without any security. And, generally, it is not too much to say, that to maintain such a doctrine, would be to overturn well-settled principles of the maritime law, to the great detriment of commerce, and the security of property in ships and vessels. The bond in the case at bar is not only void upon principle, so far as it includes the moneys given to release the vessel from arrest, but is also void according to the decisions in the following cases: The Osmanli, 3 W. Rob. Adm. 198; The Aurora, 1 Wheat. [14 U. S.] 96. Even if the bond could be sustained upon principle or authority as to the frs. 39,000, there is no proof of any debt due from Salem to the attaching creditor, or that the proceedings commenced by the attachment ever established any such debt, or indeed ever proceeded to a judicial determination, or that the libellants ever paid or were called upon to pay the debt, or any part of it, or to make good their guaranty to the attaching creditors, or any part of it. They stand only in the relation of sureties to Salem, their principal. They show neither that Salem has been called upon to pay the amount of the debt, nor that they have paid it, in his default, as sureties.

4. The evidence shows clearly that, although means existed, and were available, by which the master and consignees of the Circassian could have communicated with the owners in New York, and received their advices as to giving a bottomry bond on the ship, long before the appointed day for sailing, and long before the giving of the bond, no such communication was made or attempted. The testimony is positive, that they telegraphed to the owners in New York the arrival of the Circassian at Antwerp, and that by the same means they could have asked instructions as to the proposed bottomry bond. They should have done so. However great the necessity, and notwithstanding the presumption or probability that the owner cannot respond, the authority of the master to execute a bottomry, arising as it does clearly ex necessitate, does not exist when he can communicate with the owner. There is no pretence of an attempt to do so in this case, nor any excuse for its omission. The omission to do so is fatal to the validity of the bond in suit. La Ysabel, 1 Dod. 274; Royal Arch, Swab. 275; Wallace v. Fielden, 3 W. Rob. Adm. 243; same case, 7 Moore, P. C. 398; The Bonaparte, 8 Moore, P. C. 460; The Lord Cochrane, 2 W. Rob. Adm. 333; The Hamburg [33 Law J. Adm. 116].

BENEDICT, District Judge. In considering the questions which the facts of the case present, it may be noticed at the outset, that, although the circumstances under which this bond was taken afforded opportunity for collusion between the creditor, who attached the steamer, and the agents, who subsequently took the bond, none is suggested here. Had any circumstances appeared in any way pointing to collusion, it would have been incumbent upon the bond-holders to present a full and satisfactory explanation of them, before the court could be asked to consider their demand.

Nor is there anything oppressive in the rate of interest, which was inserted in the bond; but it is shown that the ten per cent., which is provided for, is the usual charge upon commercial advances on merchandise, intended to cover simple interest, with the difference of exchange, commissions, and insurance; so that the demand represented by the bond is simply a sum of money advanced by the libellants, with the ordinary expenses of such an advance. The case thus presents no features of hardship, as against the claimant, but, on the contrary, shows a strong equity in favor of the libellants. There appears, therefore, no reason why the bond in question should not receive that favorable consideration which courts of admiralty are always inclined to give to this class of security. It must also be held subject to those rules which the courts have declared to be applicable to such instruments.

Turning then to the bond, it is found to be composed of two items, differing from each other in their nature. One is that of frs. 16,575, consisting of the general balance of the libellants' account of advances, as agents of the steamer. As to this balance, it has been shown in evidence that the libellants made no suggestion of security for it, until after the advances had been made, and the vessel was ready to depart, when, on presenting the bond to the master for signature, they stated that they had not intended to ask security for the account, but it might as well be inserted, since a bond was to be given. This evidence brings the portion of the bond now under consideration clearly within the rule which declares that advances cannot be secured by bottomry, unless made under an agreement, or at least a reasonable expectation, founded upon surrounding circumstances, that such security would be given. The rule must therefore be applied, and, accordingly, it must be held that, as to this item, the bond is invalid.

The remainder of the principal of the bond represents the amount claimed to have been advanced by the libellants, to procure the discharge of the attachment which had been levied upon the vessel for the personal debt of the owner, as to which bottomry security was agreed on by the master.

To this item several objections have been taken, a single one of which will be noticed here. It is said that the item—assuming that it represents an actual advance by the libellants—cannot be allowed, for the reason that the maritime law does not authorize the master of a ship in any case, to raise money by bottomry for the purpose of releasing his ship from an attachment levied to collect a personal debt of the owner, for which the ship herself is in no way liable.

To the important question thus raised I have given great consideration, aided by very careful arguments on the part of the advocates, and a reference to all the cases calculated to throw light upon it. There are, undoubtedly, difficulties and dangers in permitting the exercise of such a power by the master of a ship; but there are also strong reasons against the absolute denial of the power, arising out of the nature, employment, and possible necessities of this peculiar class of property; and I greatly doubt whether the rule contended for by the claimants can be laid down as a fixed rule, applicable in all cases.

Bottomry bonds are the creatures of necessity and distress. They are permitted, in order to enable the ship to save herself from disaster, and to continue the employment for which she is constructed; and when, in any case, that object has been attained in a proper manner, by means of a bottomry bond, as a last resort, it is doubtful whether it will do to hold that the instrument is unauthorized.

As Sir William Scott has well said: "Necessity creates the law—it suspends rules—and whatever is reasonable and just, in such cases, is likewise legal." The Gratitudine, 3 C. Rob. Adm. 266. It would seem neither reasonable nor just to say that a steamer sent out to Europe to be the pioneer vessel in a new line, when attached for a debt of the owner, and the owner's interest liable to be sold by due process of law, must therefore throw herself out of a permanent employment, and abandon her voyage, thereby rendering herself liable in rem to demands by way of damages exceeding the amount of the attaching debt, when she possesses in her bottom a sufficient basis of credit upon which the master could raise the smaller sum needed to discharge her from the attachment, and thus avert the disaster.

If, therefore, the validity of this bond depended upon the question whether a sufficient necessity existed to authorize its execution by the master, I should be inclined to hold that the peculiar and embarrassing circumstances which attended the seizure of this steamer—certain as they were, in all human probability, to bring disaster to the vessel, and great loss to all interested in her, if the seizure could not be promptly terminated—were such as to authorize the master to raise by bottomry the amount necessary to discharge the attachment. The primary object of the bond was to avoid the disaster to the steamer, which these attending circumstances would certainly entail, if the attachment continued; and the bond should not lose the characteristic which it derives from its primary object, because an incidental effect of it would be to pay a debt for which the ship herself was not liable.

But the validity of this bond cannot be made to depend upon the determination of this question alone, inasmuch as an additional objection, applicable to the whole bond, has been taken by the claimants, which the libellants have not been able satisfactorily to answer; and that is, that the master omitted to communicate with his owner, before executing the bond. Such a communication, when it can be had, is as important to be shown as the necessity of the ship. In the case of The Oriental, where the point escaped the attention of the court below, a reversal was granted upon this point alone. 7 Moore, P. C. 398. The utility of the rule requiring notice to the owner, when practicable, is obvious. It imposes no additional burden upon the ship, and no difficult duty upon the lender, while its observance makes fraud and collusion more difficult, and often dispels doubts which would otherwise arise in cases of this class. It is a rule which should not be relaxed, and in the present case—a case the equities of which I have fully stated, in order that my opinion may indicate the importance which I attach to the rule—it is fully applicable, for it is shown that there was, at the time, telegraphic communication between Antwerp and New York, the home of the owner, and that resort was had to that mode of communication to announce the steamer's arrival in Antwerp. This fact must have been known to the libellants, from their position as agents of the ship, and ordinary prudence on their part would have suggested notice to the owner of the necessity of the ship, and the intention to take a bond. They knew that such notice was practicable, and that it had not been given, and they are chargeable with knowledge that, in the absence of such notice, under the circumstances, the master was without authority to bottomry his ship.

For this reason, therefore, I must declare the bond in question not to be binding upon this steamer, and, accordingly, I dismiss the libel, with costs.

Case No. 2,725.

The CIRCASSIAN.

[6 Ben. 512.] [1]

District Court, S. D. New York. May, 1873.

MARSHAL'S COSTS—CUSTODY FEES—PROPERTY HELD UNDER SEVERAL PROCESSES.

1. Where the marshal holds property under several processes in admiralty, the proper rule, as to the per diem custody fee, is to divide it equally, for each day, among the cases wherein the vessel was held by process in force on that day, saving to the marshal, in case any party fails to pay his proper proportion, a remedy therefor against the other parties.

2. No compensation for custody of property held by the marshal under process, in admiralty, can be made to him, beyond $2.50 per day.

H. E. Tremain, for marshal.

C. Donohue, for libellants.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. The vessel being in the custody of the marshal on process in each one of several cases, the question is presented, whether the entire custody fees are to be charged in the suit wherein the process was first served. I think the proper rule is that laid down by Judge Sprague, in the case of The John Walls, Jr. [Case No. 7,432]. In that case, the vessel was in the custody of the marshal on a previous libel, when the second suit was instituted, and it had been the practice of the marshal, where he held property by virtue of two warrants of arrest, to charge the whole custody fees in the first suit; but the court directed that they should be apportioned equally, charging one-half to each suit. The proper rule in the present cases is to divide the per diem custody fee, for each day, equally among the cases wherein the vessel was held by process in force on such day, saving to the marshal, in case any party fails to pay his proper proportion, a remedy therefor against the other parties.

[1] [Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

As to an allowance to the marshal for keeping the personal property attached in these cases, as a compensation beyond the sum of $2.50 per day, as the necessary expenses of keeping the property attached, I do not think the court has any power to make such allowance. These suits are civil suits, in rem, in admiralty, against a vessel. The act of February 26, 1853 (10 Stat. 161), provides, that no other compensation to marshals than that prescribed by said act shall be taxed and allowed, and that the compensation prescribed by said act shall be taxed and allowed. Under the head of "Marshal's Fees," the act says: "For service of any warrant, attachment, summons, capias, or other writ (except execution, venire, or a summons or subpoena for a witness), two dollars for each person on whom such service may be made, provided, that, on petition, setting forth the facts on oath, the court may allow such fair compensation for the keeping of personal property attached and held on mesne process, as shall, on examination, be found to be reasonable." But, subsequently in the act, there are provisions covering compensation for the sale of property under process in admiralty, in the nature of commissions on the proceeds, and the fee for serving process in admiralty, and the expense of keeping property attached in admiralty, and commissions to the marshal in case of a settlement by the parties of a claim in admiralty without a sale of the property attached. Among the provisions is this one: "For serving an attachment in rem, or a libel in admiralty, two dollars; and the necessary expense of keeping boats, vessels, or other property, attached or libelled in admiralty, not exceeding two dollars and fifty cents per day." This covers the entire subject of the expense of keeping property attached or libelled in admiralty. Only the necessary expense can be allowed, but the amount can never exceed $2.50 per day. The clause in regard to the allowance of a fair compensation, by the court, on petition, for the keeping of personal property attached and held on mesne process, refers to property other than that attached or libelled in admiralty. The word "compensation" means the same thing, in the act, as fees or expenses; and, when the expenses of keeping property are limited, that is, within the meaning of the act, a limitation on the "compensation" of the marshal in respect of such keeping. The act authorizes the bill of "fees" of the marshal to be taxed and included in the judgment or decree against the losing party; and it forbids the marshal from receiving any other or greater "compensation," for any services rendered by him, than is provided in the act, and repeals all acts allowing to him any other or greater "fees" than those allowed in the act. It may be that the limitation in respect to the expense of keeping property attached in admiralty is, at present, fixed at too low a rate, for this port; but the remedy is with congress. Since the act of 1853 was passed, there has never been, so far as I am informed, any allowance made, in this district, or in any other district, for the expenses of keeping property attached in admiralty, beyond $2.50 per day.

Case No. 2,726.

The CIRCASSIAN.

[11 Blatchf. 472.][1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Feb. 19, 1874.[2]

MARITIME LIENS—EFFECT OF ADMIRALTY RULE 12—PRIORITIES.

The new 12th rule in admiralty, of 1872, cannot, in respect to a libel filed since such rule was adopted, have the effect to revive a claim which is almost barred by the statute of limitations, and make it a lien upon a vessel, so as to cut off titles thereto perfected or acquired before such rule was adopted.

[Cited in Whittaker v. The J. A. Travis, Case No. 17,599. Stated in The John Farron, Id. 7,341, to be overruled in part by The Lottawanna, 21 Wall. (88 U. S.) 558.]

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the southern district of New York.]

This was an appeal from a decree of the district court, dismissing a libel in rem. The opinion of the district court was as follows: [The original report contains the opinion of the district court in full. For this opinion, see Case No. 2,720a.]

William W. Goodrich and Thomas M. Wheeler, for libellant.

William Allen Butler, for claimant.

WOODRUFF, Circuit Judge. The decision I have felt constrained to make in the case of The Edith [Case No. 4,283], in which an opinion is herewith filed, is conclusive against the libellant in this case. That opinion, mutatis mutandis, must be taken as my opinion herein. It differs only in the form of proceeding, the absence of any bond taken on the attachment in the state court, and the fact that the libel herein was filed since the new 12th rule in admiralty, of 1872, was adopted. Neither of these differences can affect the result; and it may well be added, that, by their new rule, the supreme court did not intend to revive claims which were almost barred by the statute of limitations, and to make them liens, either directly or by implication, upon vessels, so as to cut off the rights of mortgagees and subsequent purchasers of the ship, whose title had been perfected or acquired before the rule was adopted.

Let the libel be dismissed, with costs, in accordance with the decision appealed from.

[1] [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

[2] [Affirming Case No. 2,720a.]

Case No. 2,727.

The CIRCASSIAN.

[19 Leg. Int. 220.] [1]

District Court, S. D. Florida. 1862.[2]

PRIZE—INTENT TO VIOLATE BLOCKADE—EVIDENCE.

[1. The act of sailing for a blockaded port with knowledge of the blockade, and an intention to violate it, is of itself an attempt to break it, which will authorize the capture and condemnation of a vessel employed in carrying out the intent of such a voyage.]

[See note at end of case.]

[2. If after the sailing of the vessel, and before her capture, the original purpose is voluntarily abandoned, and the direction and destination of the vessel changed, the original offense will be condoned.]

[See note at end of case.]

[3. A vessel bound from Bordeaux, ostensibly for Havana, was captured about 30 miles from the latter port on suspicion of a purpose to run the blockade. When she was stopped, but before she was boarded, the master destroyed a packet of letters, but from other letters and papers found on the vessel it was evident that the intention was to break the blockade, and discharge the cargo at New Orleans. Held, that the ship and cargo should be condemned.]

[See note at end of case.]

[4. As none of the cargo was to be delivered at Havana, the intent to touch there in no way changed the character or extenuated the criminality of the voyage, nor interrupted its continuity.]

[See note at end of case.]

[Proceedings by the United States to condemn the British steamship Circassian, Hunter, master and claimant, and her cargo, as a prize. Decree of condemnation.]

MARVIN, District Judge. This ship of the burden of about 1,500 tons, having a British register, wherein Zachariah Charles Pearson, of London, is stated to be the owner, and Edward Hunter, master, laden with a large and valuable cargo of assorted merchandise, bound from Bordeaux, in France, ostensibly for Havana, in Cuba, was captured on the 4th day of May, 1862, about thirty miles from Havana, by the United States armed vessel, the Somerset, English commanding, on the supposed ground of a purpose to break the blockade of the port of New Orleans, and was sent into this port for adjudication. Breaking through or attempting to break through the cordon of vessels stationed off the blockaded port is not essential to the commission of the offense of breaking a blockade. The act of sailing for a blockaded port, with a knowledge of the blockade, and with an intention to violate it, is itself an attempt to break it, which authorizes the immediate capture and condemnation of the vessel and cargo. The capture, however, must be made while the vessel is in delicto,—that is to say, while she is employed in carrying out the illegal purpose with which the voyage was commenced; for it is quite possible that, after the sailing of the vessel, and before her capture, the original purpose may be repented of and voluntarily abandoned, and a new and lawful purpose formed. The direction and destination of the vessel may be voluntarily and wholly changed. If such should be the case, the original offense would be condoned and overlooked, and the vessel and cargo acquitted. The authorities are: The Columbia, 1 C. Rob. Adm. 154; The Neptunus, 2 C. Rob. Adm. 110; The Adelaide, Id. 111, in notes; The Imina, 3 C. Rob. Adm. 167; The Minerva, Id. 229; The Spes & Irene, 5 C. Rob. Adm. 76; Yeaton v. Fry, 5 Cranch [9 U. S.] 335; 1 Duer, Ins. 691, note; 1 Kent, Comm. (5th Ed.) p. 147. Such being the law, it is only necessary to a just decision in the present case to ascertain the facts, and apply the law to the facts as ascertained. The facts are to be ascertained by the testimony, and I think the testimony shows that the ship owner, master, freighters and underwriters got up this voyage, and entered upon its prosecution, with the deliberate purpose of violating the blockade of the port of New Orleans, and that the vessel was taken in delicto.

The testimony consists mainly of letters and other papers found on board the vessel at the time of her capture, and in the legitimate inferences to be drawn from the fact that the master destroyed a package of letters after the vessel had been stopped by the captors, and before they had boarded her. He says, in his deposition: "A package of letters, which were sent on board at Pauillac after the Circassian had cleared from Bordeaux, was burnt after the vessel was hove to, and before the officers of the Somerset came on board at the time of the capture." The chief engineer also testifies to having seen a package of papers put into the furnace at the time referred to. The nature and character of the letters and other papers which escaped the flames, and which are now in evidence before the court, justify the conclusion that the burnt package contained the letters of advice from the shippers to their consignees in New Orleans, enclosing the bills of lading, invoices, etc., and that, if produced, they would show conclusively that it was intended that the vessel should force the blockade of New Orleans, and deliver her cargo in that port. The letters burnt were put on board the vessel just before sailing. The letters preserved were taken from the post office in Bordeaux, and are mostly under cover to persons residing in Havana. It was undoubtedly supposed by the master that these letters possessed no relation to the cargo, and that none of them would disclose the ultimate end of his voyage; otherwise these would probably have shared the fate of the others. But in this supposition he was mistaken. These letters and papers do show that the intention was that the vessel should violate the blockade at New Orleans. There appears to have been no concealment, or disguise of the intentions of the parties concerned in getting up this voyage in Great Britain and France; on the contrary, their intentions seem to have been openly avowed. Messrs. Nartigne & Bigourdan of Bordeaux, writing to Messrs. Carriere & Co., of New Orleans, under date of the 13th March, say: "We are going to have a British steamer here which will take 1000 tons cargo for your port. There will be only about 150 tons of wine and brandy. The rest of the cargo will consist of coffee, preserved meats, &c. This steamer will endeavor to force the blockade. The freight is $40 and ten per cent. per ton, and the British insurance companies have insured against marine and war risks at fifteen per cent. and twenty per cent., and at present they are charging twenty-five per cent. We have shipped nothing by this vessel, because, according to our judgment, this affair has been badly managed. Instead of keeping it a secret, it has been announced in Paris, in London and in Bordeaux. Of course the American government is well informed as to all its details, and if this merchant steamer enters your port it must be because the commanding officer of the blockading squadron closes his eyes; but, if the contrary, she must be captured." Several other letters, some of them from shippers of goods, speak of the purpose of the Circassian to run the blockade. One from Drouet & Gautier, of Bordeaux, to Mr. Victor Maignan, of New Orleans, says: "This will reach you by British steamer Circassian, which arrived in this port a month since to take on board a very fine cargo with which to force the blockade of your port." One from the York Street Flax Spinning Company, Belfast, covering an invoice of linen and cotton goods for their correspondent in New Orleans, says: "We take it for granted that the Circassian, by which we send this, will proceed to New Orleans with her freight." But it is unnecessary to refer to any more of these letters, which may have been written by unauthorized or ill-informed persons, and which speak only in a general way of the purpose of the Circassian to run the blockade, for the fact is clearly proved by a regular business transaction between parties concerned in getting up the voyage. Mr. Eugene Bouvet, of Bordeaux, under date of the 1st of April, 1862, writes to his correspondents, Messrs. Brulatour & Co., of New Orleans, and says: "We enclose you a charter party and private memorandum per Circassian, in order that you may have no difficulty in settling the freight by that vessel." Now, the copy of the charter party enclosed contains an agreement between Z. C. Pearson, the owner of the vessel, and J. Soubey, Esq., "agent to the merchants in Paris," dated at Paris, February 11, 1862; wherein it is agreed that the Circassian shall proceed to Bordeaux, and there load from the factors of the said merchants, a full and complete cargo; "and being so loaded, shall proceed to Havana, Nassau, or Bermuda, as ordered on sailing, and thence proceed to a port of America and to run the blockade if so ordered by freighters, and to sail for such final port of discharge, within ten days if practicable after receiving such orders, which are to be given immediately on arrival," the freighters to pay freight at the rate of forty dollars per ton of twenty hundred weight, or of forty feet by measurement. There is also in the charter party a stipulation that the ship owner shall not cover more than half the value of the vessel as against war risk. The private memorandum or memorandum of affreightment, enclosed in the letters with the copy of the charter party by which the freight in New Orleans was to be settled, is a printed form, the blanks being filled up as the parties had agreed, wherein the shipper, M. Bouvet, hires of Mr. Soubey, the charterer, the quantity of fifty or sixty-five tons of the ship at the rate of forty dollars per ton, besides ten per cent. average and primage. The agreement then says: "Mr. J. Soubey engages to execute the charter party of affreightment,—that is to say, that the merchandise shall not be disembarked but at the port of New Orleans; and to this effect he engages to force the blockade." The memorandum is signed by Laibertveven "for account and with the authority of J. Soubey," by Eugene Bouvet and by P. Desbordes, who appears to have been the ship's agent at Bordeaux. Now, here appears to be an express agreement between the charterer of the vessel and the shipper, that the goods should not be unloaded at Havana, or any other place than at New Orleans, and for this purpose the charterer binds himself to force the blockade. The owner of the ship binds himself not to insure against war risks over one-half of the value of the ship, and engages that the vessel shall run the blockade if the freighters require. One of the freighters, at least, does require that the vessel shall run the blockade, and exacts a written agreement from the charterer that she shall. He accordingly writes to his correspondent in New Orleans, enclosing the agreement, a bill of lading, and an invoice of goods, and informs him that the premium of insurance will be about twenty-five per cent. Now, is it unreasonable to infer that other freighters, and perhaps nearly or quite every one of them,—some seventeen, at least, in all,—exacted from Mr. Soubey, the charterer of the vessel, a similar agreement; that is to say, that the goods should not be unloaded except at the port of New Orleans, and for that purpose the vessel should run the blockade? It is true no other letter produced before the court besides that of M. Bouvet encloses a copy of the charter party and a memorandum of the affreightment, but it is equally true that not more than three or four of the letters produced have any business relation whatever to this cargo. They relate mostly to other and different business transactions.

[1] [Reprinted by permission.]

[2] [Affirmed in 2 Wall. (69 U. S.) 135.]

The letters relating to the shipment of this cargo, and which ought to contain the bills of lading, invoices, etc., were burnt by the master, but, had they been preserved and produced here, it is not unreasonable to suppose that they would show that the freighters very generally had taken the precaution which M. Bouvet had, to exact from the charterer a stipulation that their goods should be unloaded only at the port of New Orleans, and that they had effected insurances accordingly. One of the invoices from a house in La Rochelle enclosed to Messrs. Brulatour & Co., of New Orleans, charges the premium of insurance upon the goods shipped, covering marine and war risks, at over twenty-seven per cent. of the value. But, passing by the further consideration of these letters and their enclosures, let us look at the bills of lading taken and kept by the master for his own use and convenience. They are seventeen in number. The master, in his deposition says that they are like those delivered to the shippers. Fourteen of them required the goods to be delivered to the order of the shippers,—two of them to Messrs. Brulatour & Co., who are shown by the correspondence established in New Orleans, and one to Messrs. Leon Pierre & Co., whose residence is not disclosed. Every one of these bills of lading bind the master to carry the goods to Havana, there to receive orders for the final destination of the vessel, and then to deliver them. Not one of these bills of lading calls for a delivery of the goods at Havana. Every one of them calls for a delivery of the goods at some other port after touching at Havana.

Upon the whole, is it possible that testimony could be any more overwhelmingly convincing to prove that ship owner, charterer, shippers, and underwriters, got up and prosecuted this voyage with the deliberate purpose that the vessel, after touching at Havana, should proceed and force her way through the blockading vessels to the port of New Orleans, and there deliver her cargo? The intention to touch at Havana in no way changes the character or extenuates the criminality of the voyage, nor interrupts its continuity. The Richmond, 5 C. Rob. Adm. 325; The William, 5 C. Rob. Adm. 385; The Minerva, 3 C. Rob. Adm. 229; The Imina, Id., 167; The Thomyris, Edw. Adm. 17. The voyage, notwithstanding the intention to touch at Havana, was a voyage to New Orleans, and although the character of the voyage seems to have been quite generally known in London, Paris, and in Bordeaux, yet the attempt is made to conceal and disguise its true character on board the vessel. The vessel is cleared for Havana, the letters on board intended for New Orleans are put under cover and directed to Havana, and the bills of lading conceal the port of delivery. In addition to this, when the vessel is arrested by the Somerset, important letters and papers are destroyed. The case is too plain to my mind to admit of any argument. A simple statement of the facts decided it. The parties concerned engaged in a speculation; they took a risk. Had they succeeded they would have made large profits. They have failed. They are caught in delicto. They will not now probably deem it unreasonable if they are called upon to submit to corresponding losses. A decree of condemnation of ship and cargo must be entered.

[NOTE. The claimant appealed to the supreme court, which affirmed the decree of the district court. The following is the substance of the opinion of the majority of the court, delivered by Mr. Chief Justice Chase, for the affirmance: The blockade of New Orleans was not terminated by the military occupation by the United States forces on May 1, 1862, but was in force on May 4, 1862, the date of the capture of the Circassian, and the evidence established the contention of the captors that, at the time of the capture, the intention of the vessel was to violate the blockade, and consequently she was liable to capture as prize. The Circassian, 2 Wall. (69 U. S.) 135.]

Case No. 2,728.

In re CIRCUIT COURT.

[1 Dill. 1.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Missouri. 1870.

CIRCUIT COURTS—SCHEME OF ORGANIZATION—DISTRICTS OF MISSOURI.

1. The organization of the circuit court for the districts of Missouri is peculiar, and is provided for by the act of March 3, 1857 (11 Stat. 197).

2. By this act it was provided that Missouri should be divided into two districts, with but one circuit court for both, and that the two judges of the district court should sit in the circuit court: Held, that the act of April 10, 1869 (16 Stat. 44), creating the office and providing for the appointment of circuit judges, and declaring who should hold the circuit courts, did not exclude either of the district judges from the right still to sit in the circuit court.

3. The scheme of the organization of the national courts by the judiciary act and the purpose of congress in creating the new circuit judgeships, commented on by the circuit judge.

Before DILLON, Circuit Judge, and TREAT and KREKEL, District Judges.

DILLON, Circuit Judge. Respecting the constitution of this court, an important question has been started, which it is necessary to determine at the outset of this, the first regular term which has been held since the taking effect of the act of April 10, 1869, entitled "An act to amend the judicial system of the United States" (16 Stat. 44), and which modified the scheme of the national judicial tribunals, by providing for the appointment, in each circuit, of a judge called and commissioned as the "circuit judge." That question is: What judges have the legal right to sit in this court? Or more specifically stated, have both the district judges, or has either of them, this right?

[1] [Reported by Hon. John F. Dillon, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

The answer to this inquiry depends on the effect of the above-mentioned act of 1869, upon the prior act of congress of March 3, 1857, dividing the state of Missouri into two judicial districts and making special provisions, of an unusual character, as to the constitution of the United States circuit court therein. 11 Stat. 197.

Prior to the year 1857 the national courts in Missouri were organized on the usual plan, that is, the state constituted one district, having a district court, and a circuit court for the district, held by the supreme justice, sitting with the district judge, or by either, in the absence of the other; but in that year the act of March 3d, before referred to, was passed. By it the state was divided into two districts, the eastern and western, each district to have a judge and a district court of its own, the court for the eastern district to be held at St. Louis, and that for the western district at Jefferson City. Before this division of the state, the circuit court had always been holden in the city of St. Louis.

Respecting the circuit court, the 10th section of the act of 1857 made the following peculiar provisions which it is necessary to notice with particularity. This section is in these words: "The circuit court of the United States in and for the present district of Missouri shall be held at the same times (the first Mondays of April and October in each year) and place (St. Louis) as heretofore; shall retain jurisdiction of all matters now pending therein, and shall have and exercise the same original jurisdiction in said state as is vested in the several circuit courts of the United States, as organized under existing laws: and shall also have and exercise the same appellate jurisdiction over the district courts of the United States for said eastern and western districts of Missouri, as by existing laws is vested in the several circuit courts of the United States over the district courts of the United States, in their respective circuits. The said circuit court shall be called the circuit court in and for the districts of Missouri, and shall be composed of the justice of the supreme court assigned to said circuit, and the two judges of the eastern and western districts of Missouri; but may be held by one or more of said three judges in the absence of the remainder." Then follows a provision that in the circuit court the district judge shall not sit in appeals from his own district, and certain regulations respecting a division of opinion, &c., not essential to be now specially noticed.

It will be seen that instead of the usual mode of providing a circuit court for each district, only one such court was established for both, but it was provided that each of the district judges should sit therein, and the court should continue to be held in this city. If the act of 1869 does not repeal or modify the act of 1857, it is clear that the two judges of the United States district courts may continue, as heretofore, to sit in this court as members of it. It is to be observed that the act of 1869 makes no express repeal of the act of 1857. If there is any repeal it is by implication: therefore, on plain, familiar, and acknowledged principles of construction, both acts are to stand and both are to be considered in force except so far as the latter act is necessarily inconsistent with the former one.

It is now proper to notice the act of 1869. Section 2 enacts as follows: "For each of the existing nine judicial circuits there shall be appointed a circuit judge, who shall reside in his circuit and possess the same power and jurisdiction therein as the justice of the supreme court allotted to the circuit. The circuit courts in each circuit shall be held by the justice of the supreme court allotted to the circuit, or by the circuit judge of the circuit, or by the district judge of the district sitting alone, or by the justice of the supreme court and circuit judge sitting together, in which case the justice of the supreme court shall preside, or in the absence of either of them, by the other (who shall preside), and the district judge."

How far, then, are the provisions of the two acts in conflict? Not as to the supreme justice, for by both his right to sit in the court is expressly given. By the prior act no such officer as the "circuit judge" was given the right to sit, but this right is conferred by the act of 1869 [16 Stat. 44]. This necessarily changed, to this extent, the provisions of the act of 1857 as to the constitution of the circuit court, but this change did not operate to displace those who had previously the right to sit there, but simply to confer this right upon the newly created circuit judge.

By the act of 1857 [11 Stat. 197], it was enacted that the two district judges should be members of the court, and that any one of the three judges might hold it in the absence of the others. And so by the act of 1869 "the district judge of the district" may hold the circuit court alone if the other judges are absent.

Manifestly, then, it was not the intention of congress that there should, in any case, be a circuit court in which no district judge should be entitled to sit, for it is expressly provided that the district judge may sit alone or in connection with the supreme justice or the circuit judge. No construction is admissible which would exclude both of the district judges from seats in the court, for the plain reason that such a result would frustrate the clearly declared legislative will. To my mind it is plain that if both the judges of the eastern and western districts of this state may not sit in this court, neither can.

There is no act of congress providing a distinct circuit court for each of the two districts. The statute of 1857 enacts that the "court shall be called the circuit court for the districts of Missouri." This act is not repealed. It is still the constituent statute of this court. It is by virtue of it that the court is authorized to sit here at all.

What superior right has the judge of the eastern district to that of the judge of the western district to be regarded as a member of the court? Surely the circumstance that the law directs this court to be holden alone at a place in the eastern district, is not material, since it does not make it alone the court for that district, and hence, as it would seem, does not give to the judge of that district any more right to sit here than is given to the judge of the western district. The same construction which would exclude Judge Krekel would exclude Judge Treat, and the exclusion of both would be a result so plainly in conflict with the scheme of the organization of the circuit court, with the language of the act of 1869 not less than that of 1857, that the view which leads to it or involves it, cannot be sound.

This court owes its existence to the act of 1857 which gave it its constitution. In passing it congress was adopting special provisions to meet the wants of this state. The act of 1869 had no reference to the special case of Missouri. It did not abolish the circuit court for Missouri, nor change the law by which that court was created and organized, except in the particulars wherein the two acts are repugnant. It conferred powers and jurisdiction upon the judges it created, but did not destroy or interfere with the rights, powers, or jurisdiction of the district judges, to sit with the justice of the supreme court, or with the newly created circuit judge. This conclusion finds support in other considerations to which I may briefly advert.

The "Judiciary Act" [1 Stat. 73], so styled by way of eminence, passed during the same year in which the constitution itself went into operation, and which organized the national courts, provided both for the district and the circuit courts. The states were erected into districts, and the districts arranged into circuits. By that act the district judge sat in the circuit court, and except for a brief period under the act of 1801, repealed in 1802, the district judges have ever been entitled to sit in the circuit court. Through the district judge, the circuit court had a connection with the district court, and through the supreme justice with the supreme court. The plan though complex, was nicely adjusted, and its different parts skillfully fitted together and made into a symmetrical and harmonious system. The scheme of juridical organization and jurisdiction provided by judiciary act, has, from that time to this, been the object of the unqualified admiration of statesmen, lawyers, and judges, so much so, indeed, that congress has hesitated to touch or amend it even when it seemed clearly defective or inadequate.

If the act of 1869, which it is suggested has wrought so great a change as to deprive one or both of the district judges from sitting in, or holding, this court, is carefully examined, it will be seen how cautious congress was, in attaining the end designed, to innovate as little as possible upon the long established and approved judicial system. The care and deliberation which it evinces, as well as the plain, direct and perspicuous language in which its provisions are expressed, make it a fitting supplement to the famous act which it amends.

By the judiciary act the circuit court was peculiarly constituted. It was a distinct tribunal, with a separate, clearly defined, and most important jurisdiction, original and appellate, embracing causes criminal and civil, at law, in equity, and in admiralty. Though it was a court thus distinct and thus important, it had no judge of its own. It was held by the justice of the supreme court and by the district judge, each of whose duties was mainly in another tribunal, and neither of whom was commissioned as a circuit judge. In 1789, and for years thereafter, the judicial force thus provided was adequate to the wants of the country; but long prior to 1869 it had ceased to be so. The business of the supreme court had increased and accumulated so as to demand quite all the available time of the judges of that court. It had become simply impossible for them to do all their circuit and all their appellate work. Additional judicial force was absolutely necessary, and congress was called upon to supply it. To provide this, was the object of the act of April 10, 1869. To provide it without radical and unnecessary changes in a system of judicial organization which long experience had sanctioned and approved, was the obvious dictate of wisdom and sound policy. Thus viewing the matter, congress, in passing the act of 1869, in substance, said: We have courts enough, but not judges enough to do the work; there is no need to recast the courts; the district courts in general are not overworked, and when they are the remedy is easy; the circuit court has no separate judges of its own; we will create them, thus at once relieving the labors of the supreme justices, and furnishing additional force in the circuits, but we will otherwise maintain the existing constitution of the circuit courts by still requiring, in the manner specified, both the supreme justices and the district judges to sit in and hold the same.

Such was the purpose of the legislation of 1869. The general language of the act should be viewed in the light of the objects sought to be effected, and construed accordingly. Thus viewed and thus construed, it cannot have the effect to annul special provisions in other acts passed to meet special wants, when thus to hold would be to declare that congress, with respect to the circuit court for this state, had departed from a line of policy almost coeval with the existence of the government, and which has been sanctioned by the approving judgment of nearly three generations of lawyers, judges, and statesmen. 3 Webst. Works, 150 et seq. The argument might be extended and the reasons multiplied, but it is not necessary. I am of the opinion, in which the district judges concur, that the latter are both members of this court, with the powers, jurisdiction, and duties conferred and enjoined by the act of 1857, except so far only as the same are necessarily modified by the act creating the circuit judges.

It may be added that by the statute of 1869 the district judge does not, in any case, sit in the circuit court when the supreme justices and circuit judges are both present. In this respect that act necessarily modifies the prior act of 1857, and to this extent innovates upon the judicial system established by the judiciary act. But this is a conjunction not likely often to occur, and the change in this respect is more nominal than real; and congress was induced, doubtless, to give its sanction to it, perhaps partly to keep the circuit court from being too large to allow divisions of opinion to be certified, and perhaps to economize the judicial force, and not unnecessarily to take the district judges from their own courts.

The result is that both or either of the district judges of this state may sit as heretofore with either the supreme justice or the circuit judge, and in their absence, both or either of the district judges may, as before, sit in or hold the circuit court.

NOTE. Confirmatory of the correctness of the foregoing view, see the act of July 1, 1870 (16 Stat. 179), passed since the above opinion was delivered.

CISCO (VICTOR v.). See Case No. 16,934.

CISNA (CURTS v.). See Case No. 3,507.

CISNA (UNITED STATES v.). See Case No. 14,795.

Case No. 2,729.

CISSEL v. McDONALD.

[16 Blatchf. 150;[1] 25 Int. Rev. Rec. 138; 7 Reporter, 553; 57 How. Pr. 175.]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. April 3, 1879.

REMOVAL—JURISDICTION—CITIZEN OF STATE AND FOREIGN CITIZEN—CITIZEN OF DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

1. A citizen of the District of Columbia brought a suit, in a state court, against a subject of Great Britain. The defendant removed the case into this court, under section 2 of the act of March 3d, 1875 (18 Stat. 470). Held, that, as the suit was not one between a citizen of a state and a foreign citizen or subject, it could not be removed.

[Cited in Darst v. City of Peoria, 13 Fed. 564; Glover v. Shepperd, 15 Fed. 836.]

2. A citizen of the District of Columbia is not a citizen of a state.

[This was an action by George W. Cissel, a citizen of the District of Columbia, against Augustine R. McDonald, on a promissory note, and was commenced in a court of the state of New York. The defendant removed the cause into this court under the act of March 3, 1875, § 2 (18 Stat. 470), and the plaintiff now moves to remand same to the state court.]

Henry Greenfield, for plaintiff.

Solomon F. Higgins, for defendant.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. This is an action at law, commenced in the marine court of the city of New York on the 28th of February, 1879, by the personal service on the defendant of a summons and complaint. It is a suit to recover $804.11, with interest, on a promissory note made by the defendant. On the 11th of March, 1879, the defendant presented a petition to the marine court for the removal of the cause into this court, accompanied by a proper bond. The petition sets forth, that the plaintiff was, at the time of bringing the suit, a citizen of the city of Washington in the District of Columbia, and that the defendant was, at the said time, an alien and a subject of the queen of Great Britain. The marine court made an order removing the cause into this court. The papers from the state court have been filed in this court and the plaintiff now moves to remand the cause to the state court, on the ground that this court has no jurisdiction to entertain it. The constitution of the United States (article 3, § 2) provides, that the judicial power of the United States shall extend to controversies between the citizens of a state and foreign citizens or subjects. This is the only grant of jurisdiction over cases to which foreign citizens or subjects are parties. The distinction between the District of Columbia and a state is clearly recognized in article 1, § 8, of the constitution. The ground taken by the plaintiff is, that he is not a citizen of a state, being only a citizen of the District of Columbia.

The 11th section of the judiciary act of September 24th, 1789 (1 Stat. 78), gave original cognizance to the circuit courts, of all suits of a civil nature, involving more than $500, exclusive of costs, where "an alien is a party." Section 12 of the same act provided, that if a suit should be "commenced in any state court against an alien," involving more than $500, exclusive of costs, it might be removed into the circuit court of the United States. Such provision of section 11 is embodied in subdivision 1 of section 629 of the Revised Statutes, and such provision of section 12 is embodied in subdivision 1 of section 639 of the Revised Statutes. The provision of section

[1] [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission. 25 Int. Rev. Rec. 371, contains only a partial report.]

11 came before the supreme court, for construction, in 1800, in Mossman v. Higginson, 4 Dall. [4 U. S.] 12, where it appeared that the plaintiff was a British subject, but it did not appear that the defendants were citizens of the United States. The court said, that the section must receive a construction consistent with the constitution, and that, although the statute said, in general terms, that the circuit court should have cognizance of suits where "an alien is a party," yet, the legislative power of conferring jurisdiction on the federal courts, was, in this respect, confined to suits between citizens and foreigners. In Jackson v. Twentyman, 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 136, in 1829, the plaintiff was alleged to be a subject of the king of Great Britain, but no citizenship of the defendants was alleged, and the supreme court held, that section 11 "must be construed in connection with, and in conformity to, the constitution of the United States;" and "that, by the latter, the judicial power was not extended to private suits in which an alien is a party, unless a citizen be the adverse party." In Prentiss v. Brennan [Case No. 11,385], Mr. Justice Nelson says, speaking of section 11: "This act is defective in respect to the jurisdiction conferred upon the circuit courts in the case of aliens, as it would seem, from its language, that it might be sufficient to give jurisdiction to the court, if one of the parties was an alien. Construing it, however, in connection with the provision of the constitution, there can be no difficulty as to the meaning intended by congress. The controversy, in order to give jurisdiction, must be between a state, or a citizen thereof, and a foreign state, or a citizen or subject thereof; that is; speaking with reference to individual parties, the suit must be one in which a citizen of a state and an alien are parties." The above defects in sections 11 and 12 of the act of 1789 are corrected in the act of March 3d, 1875 (18 Stat. 470). By the 1st section of that act, original cognizance is given to the circuit courts, not of suits where "an alien is a party," but of suits in which there is "a controversy between citizens of a state and foreign states, citizens or subjects," thus returning to the language of the constitution in respect to foreign citizens or subjects. So, section 2 of the act of 1875 provides, that a civil suit in which there is "a controversy between citizens of a state and foreign states, citizens or subjects," brought in a state court, may be removed by either party into the circuit court of the United States. There is no ground, therefore, for saying that this cause is removable into this court because the defendant is a foreign subject, unless the plaintiff is a citizen of a state.

The plaintiff is alleged to be a citizen of the District of Columbia. He is not alleged to be a citizen of any state. As a citizen of the District of Columbia, is the plaintiff a citizen of a state? In Hepburn v. Ellzey, 2 Cranch [6 U. S.] 445, in 1804, it was held, that a circuit court had no jurisdiction of a suit between a citizen of the District of Columbia and a citizen of a state, because a citizen of the District of Columbia was not a citizen of a state. The question arose under that clause of section 11 of the act of 1789 which gave original jurisdiction to the court, of a suit "between a citizen of the state where the suit is brought and a citizen of another state." This ruling was followed in Wescott v. Fairfield [Case No. 17,418]. In New Orleans v. Winter, 1 Wheat. [14 U. S.] 91, in 1816, the supreme court held, that the circuit court had no jurisdiction of a suit between a citizen of a territory and a citizen of a state, because a territory was not a state. The above ruling in regard to a citizen of the District of Columbia was followed in Vasse v. Mifflin [Case No. 16,895]. In Picquet v. Swan [Id. 11,134], in 1828, Judge Story says: "A citizen of one of our territories is a citizen of the United States, but he is not by law entitled to sue or be sued in the circuit courts of the United States." In Prentiss v. Brennan, ut supra, Mr. Justice Nelson says: "A person may be a citizen of the United States and not a citizen of any particular state. This is the condition of citizens residing in the District of Columbia, and in the territories of the United States, or who have taken up a residence abroad, and others that might be mentioned. A fixed and permanent residence or domicil in a state is essential to the character of citizenship that will bring the case within the jurisdiction of the federal courts." This view was again asserted by the supreme court in 1867, in Barney v. Baltimore City, 6 Wall. [73 U. S.] 280, 287, in reference to a citizen of the District of Columbia.

The defendant refers to section 1891 of the Revised Statutes, as making the plaintiff a citizen of a state. That section reads thus: "The constitution and all laws of the United States, which are not locally inapplicable, shall have the same force and effect within all the organized territories, and in every territory hereafter organized, as elsewhere within the United States." It is a compilation of the provisions found in eight statutes, in regard to eight different territories, which statutes are referred to in the margin of the section. The provisions were substantially alike, and are found in the statutes organizing the several territories, from 1850 to 1868. One is a specimen of all. The latest, Wyoming, in 1868, reads thus: "The constitution and all laws of the United States, which are not locally inapplicable, shall have the same force and effect within the said territory of Wyoming, as elsewhere within the United States." It is sufficient to say, that these enactments have no reference to the District of Columbia, as originally enacted. They refer only to the specific territory named in each statute. The words "organized territories," in section 1891, cannot be so construed as to include the District of Columbia. And, if they could, the section could not be properly so construed as to have the effect to convert a citizen of such District into a citizen of a state, within the meaning of the statutes in regard to the jurisdiction of the circuit courts over suits, either by original cognizance or by removal.

As it appears, within section 5 of the act of 1875 [18 Stat. 470], that this suit does not involve a controversy within the jurisdiction of this court, an order will be entered to that effect, and that this court will proceed no further therein, and that this suit will be remanded to the marine court of the city of New York, and that the defendant pay to the plaintiff his costs in this court, to be taxed.

NOTE [from original report in 57 How. Pr. 175]. Before making the above application in the United States court, the plaintiff applied in the state court to vacate the ex parte order for the transfer upon the ground it was improvidently made, and the following opinion was filed thereon:

McAdam, J. The record in this action has been removed to, and filed in, the United States circuit court on the usual petition and bond. Any order I might now make in the premises would be coram non judice (see Dill. Rem. Causes, p. 67, note; Kanouse v. Martin, 15 How. [56 U. S.] 198; Insurance Co. v. Dunn, 19 Wall. [86 U. S.] 214; Livermore v. Jenks, 4 How. Pr. 479; Mahone v. Manchester & L. R. Co., 111 Mass. 72; Stevens v. Phoenix Ins. Co., 41 N. Y. 149), for, as Judge Allen (in Bell v. Dix, 49 N. Y., at page 237) says: "It is a novel proceeding for a suitor to apply to a court from which the record and cause have been removed for relief which the court having jurisdiction can only effectually grant." Having no jurisdiction, it would be unbecoming to say one word upon the merits of the application either pro or con, although I have fixed impressions in regard to the matter. If the United States court determines to remand the record to this court, the order will be respected and enforced.

CITIZEN, The (BIBBINS v.). See Case No. 1,384a.

CITIZENS' SAV. BANK (WATSON v.). See Case No. 17,279.

Case No. 2,730.

CITIZENS' BANK v. NANTUCKET STEAMBOAT CO.

[2 Story, 16.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. Term, 1811.

CARRIERS — RIGHTS—DUTIES AND LIABILITIES — WHAT CONSTITUTES A CARRIER — EVIDENCE — PROOF OF DOCUMENT—COMPETENCY OF WITNESS —"MERCHANDISE"—PLEADING IN ADMIRALTY—BLENDING ACTIONS IN REM AND IN PERSONAM.

1. The transportation of passengers, or of merchandise, by common carriers, does not necessarily imply that the owners are not common carriers of bank notes or specie. The nature and extent of that employment or business which the owners expressly or impliedly hold themselves out as undertaking, furnishes the limits of their rights, duties, obligations and liabilities.

[Cited in Baxter v. Leland, Case No. 1,124; The New World v. King, 16 How. (57 U. S.) 473.]

2. No person is a common carrier, in the sense of the law, who is not a carrier for hire. It is not necessary, that the compensation should be a fixed sum; it is sufficient if it be in the nature of a quantum meruit, enuring to the benefit of the owners. Nor is it necessary, that the goods or property should be entered upon a freight list, or the contract be verified by any written memorandum; although both may be important ingredients in ascertaining the true understanding of the parties, as to the character of the bailment.

[Cited in New Jersey Steam Nav. Co. v. Merchants' Bank, 6 How. (47 U. S.) 420.]

3. Where, in answer to a cross interrogatory, proposed by counsel in a deposition, as to whether the witness had received a release from all liabilities, the witness produced the release from his own possession, as a part of his testimony; it was held, that he need not prove the execution of the release by the subscribing witness. And the question having been asked by the respondents, in order to establish the competency of the party as their own witness, they were estopped from denying it.

4. But in the case of a release, produced by a party to a suit, to establish his own title he must prove its due execution by the subscribing witness.

5. A release of all actions and causes of action, or of a particular cause of action, which has happened before the time of the release, will discharge the witness from all liability, dependent upon the event of the suit, in which he is called to testify, touching his conduct in the matters on which the suit is founded.

[Cited in The Peytona, Case No. 11,058.]

6. Quaere, whether usages and customs can be introduced as evidence to control the construction of contracts, and the principles of law.

7. Where a certain charter, incorporating the Nantucket Steamboat Company, granted a right to run a steamboat "for the transportation of merchandise," and the master thereof, being intrusted with a certain sum of money in bank bills, lost it, or never duly delivered it; it was held, that the term "merchandise" does not apply to mere evidences of value, such as notes, bills, checks, policies of insurance, and bills of lading, but only to articles having an intrinsic value, in bulk, weight, or measure, and which are bought and sold; and that, in order to render the company liable, it must be clearly proved, that they had held themselves out to the public as common carriers of bank bills for hire; and that they had authorized the master to contract on their account and not on his own, for the carriage thereof, which in the present case was not established by proof.

[Cited in The Marine City, 6 Fed. 416.]

8. The onus probandi was upon the libellants to make out a prima facie case, in the affirmative; and then the onus probandi of displacing this inference was shifted upon the respondents.

9. The knowledge of the owners, that the master carried the money for hire, would not affect them, unless the hire was on their account, or unless the master held himself out as their agent in that business, within the scope of the usual employment and service of the steamboat.

10. Proceedings in rem and in personam cannot be blended in one libel.

[Cited in The Zenobia, Case No. 18,208; Ward v. The Ogdensburgh, Id. 17,158; The Young America, Id. 18,178; The Clatsop Chief, 8 Fed. 164; The Alida, 12 Fed. 344; The Director, 26 Fed. 710.]

Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of Massachusetts.]

Libel in admiralty. The libel states in substance as follows: That on or about the 22d day of October, last past, the libellants were the owners of a certain package, containing a large number of bank bills, issued by the president, directors and company of the Pacific Bank, in Nantucket, the particular denominations of which the libellants are unable to set forth, but the whole sum and amount whereof was $1,600, of the lawful money of the United States of America, and, also, containing a check drawn by the cashier of the said Pacific Bank on the president, directors, and company of the New England Bank, a banking corporation duly established by law in the state of Massachusetts, for the sum of $422, which said package was directed to J. B. Congdon, Esq., cashier of the Merchants' Bank, New Bedford. That the respondents were the owners of a certain steamboat called the Telegraph, whereof Lot Phinney was master, which said steamboat was then, and had been for some time, employed in carrying passengers and freight from the island of Nantucket to the main land of Massachusetts, and particularly to the town of New Bedford. That the libellants by their cashier, Mr. Starbuck, delivered the said package to the said Phinney, to be carried by and on board the said steamboat from Nantucket to New Bedford aforesaid, and there to be delivered, the dangers of the seas excepted, to the said Congdon, for a certain reasonable freight to be paid therefor; and the said master thereupon accepted the said package, and understood and agreed, that the same should be carried and delivered as aforesaid, or else, as the libellants aver, the said package was delivered as aforesaid to the respondents, through the said master, to be, by the said respondents, transported and delivered as aforesaid; all dangers and accidents and losses excepted, save such as should arise from want of ordinary care on the part of the said respondents or their agents. That the said respondents never did deliver the said package or any of the contents thereof to the said J. B. Congdon, or to any other person at New Bedford aforesaid, or elsewhere, for the use of the said libellants, but through want of ordinary care did lose the same. That by reason of the premises, the libellants have wholly lost and been unlawfully deprived of the said package and the contents thereof, and of all benefit and advantage therefrom, and have suffered damage to the extent of $1,600, for which the respondents are liable, and ought justly to pay to the libellants. The libel concludes with a prayer for the allowance of the said damages and for general relief.

[1] [Reported by William W. Story, Esq.]

The answer denies any knowledge on the part of the respondents, that the libellants were the owners of the package, as alleged, and of the contents of the package, or that the said package was delivered to Lot Phinney, in the manner and for the purpose alleged, or that the package, if so delivered to him, was not by him safely carried and delivered, as is alleged, or that the libellants have suffered any loss, or the respondents incurred any liability as alleged. The answer goes on to allege that the libellants, and other corporations and persons in Nantucket and New Bedford, have frequently, as these respondents have been informed and believe, delivered sums of money or packages of bank bills to the said Phinney, to be by him carried, as their agent and for their accommodation, to and from the said places, for the purpose of making payments and deposits, and of other mercantile transactions, but that the said packages were not so delivered to or received by the said Phinney, in his capacity of master of the said boat, nor as within the scope or course of any business, which he was authorized to transact, as such master, and were not delivered to him, and received by him, to be carried for any stipulated or implied hire or reward, to be paid to him or to the owners of the said boat, but were so received and delivered for the accommodation of the said corporation and persons; that if any compensation was made to the said Phinney, it was made as a gratuity or voluntary donation for his private and personal benefit, and not as stipulated or agreed reward or hire; that these respondents have never authorized directly or indirectly the said Phinney to carry on such transactions on their account and risk, and in their behalf, and have never received any payment, hire or reward, for such services, as will appear by their book of accounts, which is submitted for examination; and that such services were in behalf of the persons sending such packages, and of the libellants in the case alleged, as their agent and servant, and not as the agent and servant of the respondents; that the said Phinney had no authority to enter into any such contract to carry and deliver such packages as is set forth in the libel, in behalf of these respondents, and that they have never received any reward therefor, nor has any been tendered to them or to any one as their agent; but that the same, if received and carried by the said Phinney, was received by him to be carried on his own individual risk and responsibility, and not on the risk and responsibility of these respondents. That from the insulated position of the community, it has been necessary to send, at all times, money by water conveyance, a portion of the distance, to the various places with which they have business connections, and that packages of money have been for a long period of time, conveyed by packet masters, without receiving compensation.

The cause came on to a hearing in the district court upon the libel and other pleadings, and evidence in the case; and the late district judge, (Judge Davis,) upon the hearing, in January, 1840, dismissed the libel with costs. [Case not reported.] From the decree of dismissal an appeal was taken by the libellants to the circuit court.

C. P. Curtis, for libellants.

The respondents are common carriers. The charter incorporating this steamboat company (Stat. 1833, c. 11) grants to sundry persons the authority to run a steamboat and two other vessels, for the convenience of the public travel and the transportation of merchandise, between Nantucket and New Bedford. The respondents do not aver, that the company have not the right to carry bank bills or specie as freight, but only, that the libellants and others have sent packages of bills by Phinney as their agent, and not as master of the vessel, and that the respondents have never authorized Phinney to carry money in their behalf, nor have received any compensation for so doing. The respondents cannot argue, (as they have not so averred), that the property sent by the libellant, was not such property as they might legally carry; and if they could, such would not be a true construction of the charter. Specie and bank notes come within the definition of merchandise, "any thing to be bought or sold." By the Revised Statutes (c. 97, p. 21), bank notes may be taken in execution and sold like other chattels. So, in New York (Handy v. Dobbin, 12 Johns. 220), a policy of insurance on "property" covers bank bills. Whiton v. Old Colony Ins. Co., 2 Metc. [Mass.] 1–7. Shaw, C. J., says in 20 Pick. 9, 13: "The word merchandise is broad enough to cover stocks or shares in incorporated companies;" and the same court decided in another case, that the sale of such shares was within the statute of frauds. Tisdale v. Harris, 20 Pick. 9. Bona et catalla include choses in action. Calye's Case, 8 Coke, 33. In Allen v. Sewall, 2 Wend. 327, it was decided by the supreme court, and afterwards by Chancellor Walworth, that bank notes came within the words "goods, wares, and merchandise," and judgment was given against the defendants. The court of errors, however (6 Wend. 335), overruled the decision, it appearing, that the master had been forbidden by his employers to carry bank bills.

There may be common carriers of bank bills, as well as of any other species of property. Kemp v. Coughtry, 11 Johns. 109; Dwight v. Brewster, 1 Pick. 50. And there is nothing in the present charter to prohibit the respondents from carrying bank bills, either gratuitously or for compensation. It is not necessary, in order to charge a person as a common carrier, to prove that a specific sum was agreed on for the hire; for if none is agreed on, he is entitled to a reasonable compensation. Story, Bailm. 505; 6 Wend. 350. And common carriers are liable for property lost or destroyed by gross negligence, even where they carry it without hire. Foster v. Essex Bank, 17 Mass. 498. Common carriers are responsible for the acts of their servants and agents, and any arrangements with them, whereby they may receive exclusively the compensation for the carriage of particular packages, will not exempt the carrier from responsibility for loss, unless it be known to the party, when it may be deemed that he contracts exclusively with the servant or agent. Tracy v. Wood [Case No. 14,130]; Story, Bailm. 507. Where the master of a vessel is consignee of the goods to sell them, and it is the course or usage of trade for the master to receive, on behalf of the owner, a compensation, which is divisible between the owner and master, by private agreement, the owner is responsible. Id. 546; Emery v. Hersey, 4 Greenl. 407; Kemp v. Coughtry, 11 Johns. 107. The freight of the cargo is the compensation for the whole duty performed. 2 Kent, Comm. (3d Ed.) 609; Kemp v. Coughtry, 11 Johns. 107. So, if the master of a vessel, who is the agent of the owners, receive the property of another to be carried in his vessel, the owners are bound by his contract, unless they can prove that his authority was limited, and that it was known to be so to the other party. Ward v. Green, 6 Cow. 173; 1 Bell, Comm. § 432; 2 Kent, Comm. (3d Ed.) 609; Story, Ag. 119; The Rebecca [Case No. 11,619]; The Phebe [Id. 11,064]. It is the duty of the carriers to take the utmost care of the goods; to make a right delivery of the property, according to the usage of trade, or the course of business; and to expose the property to no unnecessary hazard. Story, Bailm. 327, 509, 543. And the onus probandi is on the carrier to exempt himself from liability (Id. 529), which attaches from the time of his acceptance of the goods, and does not cease until no duty remains to be done by him (Id. 533, 538). Where there is no fraud or intentional concealment of the value of the parcel, the carrier is responsible for the whole value, unless he bring home to the other party notice of the limitation of the carrier's authority.

In the present case, Capt. Phinney is the master of a steamboat established expressly for a carrier. The cashier of a bank delivers to him parcels to be delivered to another cashier. He knows from the course of dealing, and also from his being paid for carrying them, that the parcels contain money and valuables. He asks no questions as to value, and prescribes no limits to his responsibility; and various small sums are paid to him, as the cashier testifies, by way of freight. No notice of any private instructions of his employers is brought home to the libellants or their cashier; nor does it appear there were any such, forbidding him to take money, although it is matter of notoriety that he carries such packages for pecuniary reward. A parcel is lost by gross carelessness of the master; for what could be more so, than for the carrier or his servant to hang his coat, containing a package of bank notes, on a chair, and to go to bed and to sleep, in another room, in a house filled with people, some of whom were strangers? Tracy v. Wood [Case No. 14,- 130]. Why did he not carry it to Mr. Congdon's house, if the bank was closed? But Phinney declared, that he did not think of the package after leaving the bank till the next morning.

What is the ground of defence against this claim? 1st. A general denial of the delivery of the parcel to Phinney, of its contents, and of its loss by him, all of which we have proved. 2d. That the libellants delivered their parcel (if at all) to Phinney, as their agent, and not as the servant or agent of the owners (respondents.) This we deny. Phinney was and had been for a considerable time in the open and notorious command of the boat, with all the usual powers of master. No limitation or restriction of the common authority of the master of a carrying vessel was prescribed by his owners, and his contracts have the same effect in law as if they were the personal acts of the owners. The Phebe [supra]. The property was delivered on board the respondent's vessel, to the respondent's servant, who was the master of said vessel. It was carried in their vessel. Whatever time was occupied by Phinney in transacting the business was their time, for the whole time of the master is due to the owners. Abb. Shipp. p. 132. It was delivered under a contract to pay for the transportation. Mr. Starbuck swears to this positively, and that when he first sent packages of money he did not know Phinney by sight; he was a stranger to him. But if no specific compensation had been expected, to obtain the freight of other merchandise was the object in view, and this was the motive of the directors in permitting their master to carry small packages without particular charge of freight; and this was a sufficient consideration on their part. This case closely resembles that of Foster v. Essex Bank, 17 Mass. 498, which was to recover the value of a special deposit of specie, taken without reward. The court say, "As the building and vaults of the company were allowed to be used for this purpose, and their officers employed in receiving into custody the things deposited, the corporation must be considered as the depositary, and not the cashier or other officer, through whose peculiar agency commodities may have been received into the bank." There, the bank derived no benefit whatever from the deposit, yet were holden to be liable for any loss arising from gross negligence. Here the steamboat company obtained the benefit derived from the freight of the merchandise of the directors and principal owners of the bank; for if the respondents had refused to carry bank bills, &c., for the bank, they would have lost the carriage of their merchandise. The capacity in which Phinney received the package was as master of the boat, and therefore as agent of the owners, and they were bound to give notice if they meant to limit his authority. There was not a syllable of his receiving it in any other capacity. If Starbuck, when he first sent money by him, did not even know him by sight, why should he trust him personally? It is incredible, that the cashier should confide a large sum of money to a stranger, unless he relied on his official character as agent and servant of the respondents. The contract of the respondents was that of common carriers, and carriers are liable for every species of loss, except such as are caused by inevitable accidents or by the public enemies. This rule is enforced in the case of a steamboat, grounding by mistaking a light in another vessel for a light-house. McArthur v. Sears, 21 Wend. 190. The case at bar is almost exactly like the case of Allen v. Sewall, 2 Wend. 327. But the respondents attempt to set up a usage, by which the master of their boat is to be deemed the agent of the bailors, and not of the steamboat company. There is no evidence in this case sufficient to establish a certain and uniform usage by the respondents to carry packages without making themselves responsible for them, in case of loss. Such a usage cannot be determined by the opinion of witnesses, but must be established by instances. Winthrop v. Union Ins. Co. [Case No. 17,901]; Cunningham v. Fonblanque, 6 Car. & P. 44, 2 Burrows, 1223; Savill v. Barchard, 4 Esp. N. P. 53. And such a usage cannot be sustained in opposition to established principles of law. Homer v. Dorr, 10 Mass. 26; The Reeside [Case No. 11,657]. There is no evidence here to establish any certain and uniform usage to carry money without compensation and without the carriers making themselves accountable for it. Wood v. Wood, 1 Car. & P. 59, 7 Car. & P. 711; Bleaden v. Hancock, 4 Car. & P. 152. To exempt themselves, they must also prove a usage not to pay for such property, if lost. 22 Pick. 108. The burden of proof is on the respondents to establish the entire usage. Not a single instance of loss by the respondents is shown: if the previous practice of the packet masters is admitted, only two instances are shown, in all time; one was by shipwreck, the other by theft; and this last was of a sum of money received by the master for goods sold by him as agent of the shipper.

F. C. Loring, for respondents.

On the evidence, the matters in dispute are the nature of the contract, and the parties to it, and the question of negligence. To make the respondents liable as carriers, the libellants must prove a delivery of the package to the master of the boat, as the agent of the respondents, and that it was to be carried for hire. The proof of a special contract is not made out, and is contradicted by the evidence in the case. The libellants then resort to the presumptions arising from the facts, that the respondents were owners of the boat,—the master their servant, viz., that the package was received by him to be carried as their agent, and for a reasonable compensation. Their own evidence does not make out such a case. For it appears, that it was not the usual business of the boat to carry packages of money for hire, and there is no proof of any authority in the master so to do. It also appears, that, for many years, the libellants have been in the habit of sending packages of this kind by the boat, and that the whole amount paid by them as a compensation or gratuity to the master is $13. The entire inadequacy of this sum, considered as a compensation for the trouble of carrying these packages, and the assumption of the risks of common carriers, shows, that neither party could have considered the contract as of that nature. If this ground fails, the libellants must resort to the contract of mandate, and show, that the respondents were the mandatories, and that there was gross negligence. The respondents admit, that the contract was a mandate, but deny, that they were parties to it, and that there was such negligence.

All the elements of a mandate are here to be found. 1st. The thing to be done, to wit, the carriage, and delivery of the package: 2d, that the contract was gratuitous: 3d, that the parties to it, to wit, the libellants and the master of the boat, voluntarily entered into it. To prove these positions, and that the master was the mandatary, and the respondents were not parties to the contract, they offer proof of former transactions between the libellants and the present and former masters of the boat, and of the constant practice and usage at Nantucket, existing ever since its settlement, in relation to the carriage of similar packages. It is not attempted to show that the law or liability of carriers, or mandataries, is different at Nantucket from what it is elsewhere, but only to ascertain what was the nature and extent of the contract, and the meaning of the parties, from the prevailing usage, and their former dealings in the absence of an express contract; and for that purpose, evidence of usage is always admissible, The Paragon [Case No. 10,708]; The Reeside [supra]. If it can be shown, that the masters of this boat, and of vessels belonging to Nantucket, have been for many years in the constant practice of rendering such services gratuitously, and that this service was rendered in the usual manner, the presumption then arises, that this service was performed gratuitously, and not for hire. There can be no quantum meruit in such a case; for that arises by implication of law, where there is no contract; such a custom would make a contract. If the master had been in the habit of carrying such packages for hire, he might recover in a quantum meruit; but not if his practice were otherwise, and he had made no special contract for hire. The evidence shows that it has been the daily practice of merchants, banks, and persons generally, at Nantucket, to send packages of bills to the main land by the masters of boats and vessels for many years; and no compensation is ever demanded for this service; that frequently other services, such as the payment of notes or bills, the settlement of accounts, (certainly no part of the duties of common carriers,) are required; that no compensation is usually given; and when made, is given to the master, and intended, either to cover expenses incurred or as an acknowledgment to him personally for a favor rendered; that the owners of the vessel never received any compensation; and that this practice is universally known and understood at Nantucket; but that whenever a receipt was required, which was very unusual, and was imagined to impose an additional degree of responsibility, a commission was charged.

If this evidence shows the contract to have been a mandate, the next inquiry is, who was the mandatary? If the respondents, it is only because the master was for certain purposes their agent. The presumption arising from this fact may be rebutted by proof, that the agent, in making this contract, was not acting in the scope of his authority, or that the bailor contracted with him personally. This inquiry, as to the bailor, is equally material, whether the contract is to be considered as a bailment for hire, or as a mandate. If it was a mandate, it would seem to be a necessary conclusion, that the master was the bailee, and not the owners. For it would be unreasonable to suppose, that they employed and paid him to do friendly acts for his neighbors. The presumption, that he was acting in the scope of his business, which was to carry freight and passengers for hire, could not arise in relation to acts from which the owners derived no advantage. If it was a bailment for hire, the owners could not be responsible, if it appears, that they never authorized the master to carry packages of money for hire, and that the libellants knew so; or that they allowed him to retain whatever compensation was given to his own use, and that the libellants knew so; for then the contract was made with him and not with them.

1st. The charter of the respondents (St. Jan. 26, 1833, c. 11), gives them no authority to engage in the carriage of such packages either gratuitously or for hire. The charter is granted "for the convenience of public travel, and transportation of merchandise." Bank bills are in no sense merchandise. The custom of carrying bills gratuitously existed long before the charter was granted, was known to the corporators, and probably considered in framing the charter. It was known, that this custom was of great importance to the islanders; that such packages could not be carried as freight, except at rates, which would cover the risks of guaranty and insurance; and that the transportation of them on such terms would be of no public advantage. They, therefore, never intended to be carriers of bank bills, and confined their powers to the carriage of merchandise. There is no proof of any authority to the master to carry such packages for the owners; and no presumption can arise of any, when their business is limited by law in such manner as not to permit of it. The presumption is, that they conformed to the law, and the charter is constructive notice to the public of the limitation of the powers and business of the corporation.

2d. If the proof be, that whatever compensation was given, was intended for and received by the master to his own use, it follows, that he was the bailee. If the contract were a bailment for hire, this conclusion is necessary, because the carrier is liable only in consequence of his reward: if a mandate, then the person to whom the gratification was made was the mandatary, conferring the obligation of which the gratification was the acknowledgment. That the obtaining of freight was not an inducement to carry these packages gratuitously, appears from the evidence, that they were carried indiscriminately for every one, whether likely to furnish freight, or not; that the freighting business is almost exclusively in the hands of the respondents, so that they are not in danger from competition; and that the withdrawal of their supposed liability as carriers, or as mandataries of these packages, could not affect their other business, is obvious, because all the witnesses, except Starbuck, say that it never was imagined that the respondents incurred any responsibility for them. The proof is conclusive that the respondents never received any advantage or pay for the carriage of such packages; that the compensation sometimes made to the master was so trifling, and so seldom given, that it could not affect the rates of wages required by him; and that it was always intended for him: and not one witness can be found to testify otherwise. It is not pretended, that the respondents were direct parties to this contract, and it is proved, that it was not in the scope of their business, and that they derived no benefit from it; therefore, they are not the bailees. It is proved, that compensation was made very infrequently, and for other services, as well as the carriage and delivery of the packages, and that when made it bore no proportion to the risks assumed by common carriers, and was intended as a gratuity to the master; and that when any additional liability was supposed to be assumed, as by giving a receipt, a commission was charged, which was never done otherwise; and that the carriage of these packages, in this way, was a matter of most frequent occurrence, and no instance is known in which a master had refused to carry one gratuitously. The contract was, therefore, not a bailment for hire, but a mandate, and the master the mandatary. The fact, that compensation was occasionally given does not affect the nature of the contract, if not given or claimed as a debt; nor would it be, if expected as a matter of course, if it could not be recovered at law.

The evidence as to the loss does not show such a case of gross negligence as to make a mandatary liable. Story, Bailm., passim; U. S. v. Duval [Case No. 15,015]; Davis v. New Brig [Id. 3,643]; The Rebecca [Id. 11,619]; Halsey v. Brown, 3 Day, 346; Story, Confl. Laws, 226; Trott v. Wood [Case No. 14,190]; Renner v. Bank of Columbia, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 581; Allen v. Sewall, 2 Wend. 341; Id., 6 Wend. 350; King v. Lenox, 19 Johns. 235; Walter v. Brewer, 11 Mass. 99; Reynolds v. Toppan, 15 Mass. 370; Butler v. Basing, 2 Car. & P. 613; Tracy v. Wood [Case No. 14,130]; The Rendsberg, 6 C. Rob. Adm. 142; Foster v. Essex Bank, 17 Mass. 498.

STORY, Circuit Justice. This cause has come before the court under circumstances, involving some points of the first impression here, if not of entire novelty; and it has been elaborately argued by the counsel on each side on all the matters of law, as well as of fact, involved in the controversy. I have given them all the attention, both at the argument and since, which their importance has demanded, and shall now proceed to deliver my own judgment. The suit is in substance brought to recover from the steamboat company a sum of money, in bank bills and accounts, belonging to the Citizens' Bank, which was intrusted by the cashier of the bank to the master of the steamboat, to be carried in the steamboat from the island of Nantucket to the port of New Bedford, across the intermediate sea, which money has been lost, and never duly delivered by the master. The place where, and the circumstances under which it was lost, do not appear distinctly in the evidence; and are not otherwise ascertained than by the statement of the master, who has alleged that the money was lost by him after his arrival at New Bedford, or was stolen from him; but exactly how and at what time he does not know. The libel is not in rem, but in personam, against the steamboat company alone; and no question is made, (and in my judgment there is no just ground for any such question,) that the cause is a case of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction in the sense of the constitution of the United States, of which the district court had full jurisdiction; and, therefore, it is properly to be entertained by this court upon the appeal.

There are some preliminary considerations suggested at the argument, which it may be well to dispose of before we consider those which constitute the main points of the controversy. In the first place, there is no manner of doubt that steamboats, like other vessels, may be employed as common carriers; and when so employed, their owners are liable for all losses and damages to goods and other property intrusted to them as common carriers to the same extent and in the same manner, as any other common carriers by sea. But whether they are so, depends entirely upon the nature and extent of the employment of the steamboat, either express or implied, which is authorized by the owners. A steamboat may be employed, although I presume it is rarely the case, solely in the transportation of passengers; and then the liability is incurred only to the extent of the common rights, duties and obligations of carrier vessels of passengers by sea, and carrier vehicles of passengers on land; or they may be employed solely in the transportation of goods and merchandise, and then, like other carriers of the like character at sea and on land, they are bound to the common duties, obligations and liabilities of common carriers. Or the employment may be limited to the mere carriage of particular kinds of property and goods; and when this is so, and the fact is known and avowed, the owners will not be liable as common carriers for any other goods or property intrusted to their agents without their consent. The transportation of passengers or of merchandise, or of both, does not necessarily imply, that the owners hold themselves out as common carriers of money or bank bills. It has never been imagined, I presume, that the owners of a ferry boat, whose ordinary employment is merely to carry passengers and their luggage, would be liable for the loss of money intrusted for carriage to the boatmen or other servants of the owners, where the latter had no knowledge thereof, and received no compensation therefor. In like manner the owners of stage-coaches, whose ordinary employment is limited to the transportation of passengers and their luggage, would not be liable for parcels of goods or merchandise intrusted to the boatman employed by them to be carried from one place to another on their route, where the owners receive no compensation therefor, and did not hold themselves out as common carriers of such parcels. A fortiori, they would not be liable for the carriage of parcels of money, or bank bills, under the like circumstances. So, if money should be intrusted to a common wagoner, not authorized to receive it by the ordinary business of his employers and owners, at their risk, I apprehend that they would not be liable for the loss thereof as common carriers, any more than they would be for an injury done by his negligence to a passenger, whom he had casually taken up on the road. In all these cases, the nature and extent of the employment or business, which is authorized by the owners on their own account and at their own risk, and which either expressly or impliedly they hold themselves out as undertaking, furnishes the true limits of their rights, obligations, duties, and liabilities. The question, therefore, in all cases of this sort is, what are the true nature and extent of the employment and business in which the owners hold themselves out to the public as engaged? They may undertake to be common carriers of passengers, and of goods and merchandise, and of money; or, they may limit their employment and business to the carriage of any one or more of these particular matters. Our steamboats are ordinarily employed, I believe, in the carriage, not merely of passengers, but of goods and merchandise, including specie, on freight; and in such cases the owners will incur the liabilities of common carriers as to all such matters within the scope of their employment and business. But in respect to the carriage of bank bills, perhaps very different usages do, or at least may, prevail in different routes, and different ports. But, at all events, I do not see how the court can judicially say, that steamboat owners are either necessarily or ordinarily to be deemed, in all cases, common carriers, not only of passengers, but of goods and merchandise and money, on the usual voyages and routes of their steamboats; but the nature and extent of the employment and business thereof must be established as a matter of fact by suitable proofs in each particular case. Such proofs have, therefore, been very properly resorted to upon the present occasion. In the next place, I take it to be exceedingly clear, that no person is a common carrier in the sense of the law, who is not a carrier for hire; that is, who does not receive, or is not entitled to receive, any recompense for his services. The known definition of a common carrier, in all our books, fully establishes this result. If no hire or recompense is payable ex debito justitiae, but something is bestowed as a mere gratuity or voluntary gift, then, although the party may transport either persons or property, he is not in the sense of the law a common carrier; but he is a mere mandatary, or gratuitous bailee; and of course his rights, duties and liabilities are of a very different nature and character from those of a common carrier. In the present case, therefore, it is a very important inquiry, whether in point of fact the respondents were carriers of money and bank notes and checks for hire or recompense, or not. I agree, that it is not necessary, that the compensation should be a fixed sum, or known as freight; for it will be sufficient if a hire or recompense is to be paid for the service, in the nature of a quantum meruit, to or for the benefit of the company. And I farther agree, that it is by no means necessary, that if a hire or freight is to be paid, the goods or merchandise or money or other property should be entered upon any freight list, or the contract be verified by any written memorandum. But the existence or non-existence of such circumstances may nevertheless be very important ingredients in ascertaining, what the true understanding of the parties is, as to the character of the bailment. In the next place, if it should turn out, that the steamboat company are not to be deemed common carriers of money and bank bills; still, if the master was authorized to receive money and bank bills as their agent, to be transported from one port of the route of the steamboat to another at their risk, as gratuitous bailees, or mandataries, and he has been guilty of gross negligence in the performance of his duty, whereby the money or bank bills have been lost, the company are undoubtedly liable therefor, unless such transportation be beyond the scope of their charter; upon the plain ground, that they are responsible for the gross negligence of their agents within the scope of their employment.

Having stated these preliminary doctrines, which seem necessary to a just understanding of the case, we may now proceed to a direct consideration of the merits of the present controversy. And in my judgment, although there are several principles of law involved in it, yet it mainly turns upon a matter of fact, namely, whether the steamboat company were, or held themselves out to the public to be, common carriers of money and bank bills, as well as of passengers and goods and merchandise, in the strict sense of the latter terms; or the employment of the steamboat was, so far as the company are concerned, limited to the mere transportation of passengers and goods and merchandise on freight or for hire; and money and bank bills, although known to the company to be carried by the master, were treated by them as a mere personal trust in the master by the owners of the money and bank bills, as their private agents and for which the company never held themselves out to the public as responsible, or as being within the scope of their employment and business as carriers.

The question has been made at the bar, upon whom, in this case, the burden of proof lies to establish, that the company were common carriers of money or bank bills, or not. It does not appear to me to be of any great importance in the actual posture of the present case, how that matter is decided. But I have no doubt, that the onus probandi is upon the libellants to establish the affirmative; for, until that is done, no liability can attach to the respondents; and the libellants are bound to establish a prima facie case; and indeed it is scarcely within the rules of evidence to call upon the respondents to establish the negative. But it seems to me the less necessary to sift this matter, since the evidence on the part of the libellants is in my judgment sufficient to establish such a prima facie case, at least to the extent of a compliance with the exigency of the rule. It is abundantly proved, that the masters of the steamboat have been constantly and habitually employed in the transportation of money and bank bills for banks and private persons (as indeed common packet masters were likewise employed long before steamboats existed) upon this very route, and upon the common routes from Nantucket to other ports. This usage, or practice, or employment, (call it which we may), was so notorious, that it must be presumed to be known to the steamboat company; and indeed, that fact is not controverted. Under such circumstances the natural inference would be, that the transportation of money and bank bills was within the scope of the usual employment of the master in his official capacity, and on account and at the risk of the owners, unless the inference were repelled by other circumstances. The onus probandi then, of disproving this inference, may be deemed to be fairly shifted upon the respondents.

The ground of the defence of the company is, that in point of fact, although the transportation of money and bank bills by the master was well known to them, yet it constituted no part of their own business or employment; that they never were in fact common carriers of money or bank bills; that they never held themselves out to the public as such, and never received any compensation therefor; that the master in receiving and transporting money and bank bills acted as the mere private agent of the particular parties, who intrusted the same to him, and not as the agent of the company or by their authority; that in truth he acted as a mere gratuitous bailee or mandatary on all such occasions; and even if he stipulated for, or received, any hire or compensation for such services, he did so, not as the agent of or on account of the company, but on his own private account, as a matter of agency for the particular bailors or mandators. Now, certainly, if these matters are substantially made out by the evidence, they constitute a complete defence against the present suit. There are some facts in the case, which are beyond the reach of any just controversy. In the first place, there is no pretence to say, that the company have ever received any freight, hire, or compensation, for the carriage of money or bank bills transported in the steamboat, either from the master, or from the owners thereof, or have ever supposed themselves entitled thereto. No claim of that sort has ever been set up by them against the owners of such bank bills, or against the master, although the carriage of packages of money and bank bills by him has been constantly known and understood by them; nor has the master ever credited them with any such hire, freight, and compensation, although he has constantly credited them with the freight of goods and merchandise carried in the steamboat, whenever he has received it. This is a very significant circumstance to establish, on the part both of the master and the company, their mutual understanding of such transactions,—that they were mere private agencies of the master, and not agencies on behalf of the company, authorized by them, either as common carriers, or as mandataries. There is also a total absence of all evidence to establish that the company ever held themselves out to the public by advertisement or otherwise, through their directors, or the other regular officers of the corporation, as common carriers for such purposes; or that they ever entered into any contracts of this sort, for hire or compensation, directly with any person or persons for whose benefit the money or bank bills were transported. The most, that can be said, is, that the master might well be deemed their agent for such purposes. But that must proceed upon the ground, either that he had full authority, or that he was held out to the public as having full authority, or that his acts admit of no other reasonable interpretation. If his acts may just as fairly be attributed to a private personal agency for third persons, and, a fortiori, if taking all the circumstances, they naturally lead to the latter conclusion, then the presumption of the liability of the company therefor is completely repelled. In the next place, if the testimony of the persons, who have been successively masters of the steamboat is admissible, and is believed, they state facts and circumstances, which directly confirm the material grounds of the defence. They state in substance, that at the successive periods of their command of the steamboat, they have been accustomed to carry packages of bank bills for the banks at Nantucket, and for various private persons, to New Bedford, for several years, to the amount of hundreds of thousands of dollars; that they have always deemed themselves as acting therein as the private agents of the bailors; that they have never received any such packages for the account of the company or by their authority; that they have always done this business as gratuitous bailees, never charging any commission or requiring any compensation as a matter of right, except when requested to give a special receipt therefor, (which, however, was rarely done,) and then they charged on their own account a small commission; that they have occasionally received from the banks, as well as from private persons, a small compensation for these services, such as they chose to pay, as a mere gratuity, or voluntary recompense, but without any claim of its being due to them as a matter of right or duty; that such gratuities and recompenses have been rarely paid by private persons, and not even uniformly paid by the banks, which were in the constant habit of sending such packages; but it has been sometimes intermitted by them for a considerable length of time; and that such gratuities and recompenses were never accounted for by them to the company; but were always applied to their own private use and benefit.

Such is the substance of the facts and circumstances, either directly stated by the masters, or fairly deducible from their testimony. It is in no small degree corroborated in its general bearing by the testimony of common packet masters, who have been accustomed to carry like packages of bank bills for the last forty years, and who always treated such bailments as gratuitous, and as special agencies of their own, and never claimed any compensation therefor, on account of the owners of their vessels. It is also in no small measure sustained by the absence of any positive testimony on the part of the libellants of any instances except those stated by Mr. Starbuck, in which a compensation has been claimed of banks, or allowed by them, as a matter of right by the master, or of its having been paid by individuals at any time otherwise than as a gratuity to the master, or as a personal compensation to him for his services. There is this additional consideration of no small weight, that if these packages were within the scope of the business of the company, and were carried at their risk, and for compensation and hire, it is surprising that there should not have been a uniform course of dealing with all persons sending the packages, and a uniform price, or at least a reasonable recompense, always charged on one side, and paid on the other. Yet there is a total absence of all proof to this effect. It is not pretended that the company ever received any such price or recompense, or ever claimed an account therefor from the master; or ever made it an item of charge or credit in their dealings with the bailors. How are we to account for such a state of things, if in truth they were incurring on every trip such vast risks and responsibilities for uncounted sums? One should suppose, that such risks and responsibilities would naturally introduce a regular commission or charge therefor, such as is generally paid in other cases, in nature of a commission del credere or guaranty. It would seem strange, that the company should slumber over their own rights during so long a period, and should indiscriminately receive all such packages from all persons, and yet should not charge any fixed commission, or uniformly claim any from the bailors for such risks and responsibilities. On the other hand, if these were cases of gratuitous bailments, or of personal agencies on the part of the master unconnected with his official duties, or the common business of the company, the state of the facts is exactly what it ought to be; and there is nothing which either requires explanation, or solicits inquiry. On the opposite supposition, there would seem to be many circumstances admitting of no reasonable or satisfactory explanation. But the testimony of the masters has been denied to be competent; and the exception has been especially urged against that of Capt. Phinney. The latter was the master, who took the package of bank bills, for the loss of which the present suit is brought. In order to establish his competency, notwithstanding his relation to the cause, the respondents upon their direct interrogatories annexed to his deposition, asked him, if he had not received a release from them of all liability on account of the subject-matter of the suit? He answered, that he had, and produced the supposed release and annexed it to his answer. Now, it was first objected, that his answer upon the interrogatories of the respondents was no proper proof of the execution of the release, (whatever might have been the case, if the answer had come out upon the cross examination upon the interrogatories of the libellants) but the execution should be proved by the subscribing witness. I thought at the argument, that the objection was untenable, and that it was wholly immaterial, by which party the question was asked; because a witness, producing a release from his own possession, as a part of his testimony, in answer to a question put to him, need not prove the execution of the release by the subscribing witness; but it is to be taken as a part of his testimony. Indeed, when the question was asked by the respondents in order to establish the competency of the party, as their own witness, they would be estopped afterwards to deny it, and the witness having received the release, it would be and must be treated as between him and them as a true and valid release, without any other proof. The case of such a release, produced by a witness, is entirely different from that of a release produced by a party to a suit, to establish his own title. In the latter case, the party must prove its due execution by the subscribing witness. Several of the cases cited at the bar turned upon this distinction. Moises v. Thornton, 8 Term R. 303; Jackson v. Pratt, 10 Johns. 381, were cases where the party to the suit founded his title upon the deed or diploma. The case of Hall v. Connecticut Steamboat Co., 13 Conn. 319, stands upon a distinct ground; for there the witness did not produce the release, nor did it appear ever to have been delivered to him, and his interest was established by independent testimony, and not upon his own examination or cross-examination. Whether some of the dicta in the opinion of the court are maintainable, or not, in point of law, is a matter, therefore, which this court is not now called upon to consider. In all cases of this sort, where the question of comtency of a witness arises upon his deposition, and not otherwise, it is to be disposed of upon the interrogatories in the deposition, in the same manner as it would be upon an examination upon the voir dire; that is to say, the objection of incompetency may be removed in the same way and by the same evidence of the witness, by which it has been established. The doctrine is fully borne out by the language of Mr. Phillipps in the later editions of his work on Evidence, and by the cases there cited (Phil. Ev., Amos' 8th London Ed., 1838, pp. 149–151; S. P. 1 Phil. Ev., Cowen's 7th Am. Ed., 1839, p. 134); and especially by the case of Ingram v. Dada (before Lord Ellenborough, in 1817) 1 Car. & P. 235, note; and Goodhay v. Hendry, 1 Mood. & M. 319; and the case of Wandless v. Cawthorne, 1 Mood. & M. 320, 321, note; and Carlisle v. Eady, 1 Car. & P. 234. Indeed, the only point of difference among the learned judges upon any of these occasions has been, not, whether the release should be proved by other witnesses; but whether it should be produced at the trial by the witness.

Another objection of a more serious cast has been taken to Phinney; and that is, that the release cannot be operative at all to discharge the master from the damages, which may be recovered by the libellants in this case, because it is not a release of a present but of a future interest, not yet vested in the releasors; and for this position the dictum of the court in Francis v. Boston & R. Mill Corp., 4 Pick. 367, 368, is relied on, that a release cannot operate to extinguish or defeat future rights or claims; a dictum, which may be perfectly correct, when applied (as it there was) to a release of future damages for future acts; but which cannot be applied to a release of future damages for past acts, without shaking the well established doctrine. If the argument be well founded, then every person, who is sued as principal, for any act of negligence of his agent, or servant, such as a coachman, or a factor, or a master of a ship, could not by a release restore the competency of such person; and yet, as we all know, this is every-day practice. In the case of Green v. New River Co., 4 Term R. 589, which was an action against the principals for the negligence of their agent, the court held the agent incompetent without a release; and by necessary implication, therefore, held him competent with a release. The same doctrine is abundantly shown to be well established by Mr. Phillipps in his treatise on Evidence, and in the cases there cited. Phil. Ev. (Amos' 8th London Ed., 1838) pp. 84–104; Id. 152; S. P. 1 Phil. Ev. (Cowen's 7th Am. Ed. 1839) p. 56; Id. 134; Com. Dig. "Release," E. See, also, Trueman v. Loder, 11 Adol. & E. 589, 596. Indeed, it may be taken as a general principle, in cases of this sort, that a release of all actions and causes of actions, or of a particular cause of action, which has happened before the time of the release, will discharge the witness from all liability depending upon the event of the suit in which he is called as a witness, touching his conduct in the matter on which the suit is founded; for the cause of the liability then existing, the release will operate to discharge that, and incidentally the future damages recovered on account thereof. The cases of Scott v. Lifford, 1 Camp. 246, and Miller v. Falconer, Id. 251, and Cartwright v. Williams, 2 Starkie, 342, are directly in point. Another objection was taken to the language of the release; and certainly there was an accidental mistake in it, which might, perhaps, have brought its true construction into doubt, as a release of the present cause of action. But I should have had no difficulty, if this objection had not been waived, in deciding, that time ought to be allowed to correct the mistake, as it was obviously a matter of entire surprise upon all the parties thereto. But it does not appear to me, that, upon a just survey of the whole evidence, any thing very material hinges upon the admissibility of any of the witnesses whose testimony has been objected to; for the main facts are abundantly supported by evidence aliunde; and presumptive inferences against its force are equally repelled by the offer, as they would be by the production of their testimony. Now, it is not a little remarkable, (as has been already suggested), that most of the witnesses, who have been examined on each side, agree, that they never supposed the owners responsible, but they have treated the case as one of a private personal agency of the master, either gratuitous, or as his personal and private perquisite. Most of them have deemed the service gratuitous; and not one of them pretends, that the company ever, to their knowledge, held themselves out as common carriers, for hire, of bank bills; or that they avowed any responsibility for the carriage thereof, or ever demanded any compensation therefor.

The main stress of the argument for the libellants is, indeed, founded upon the general proposition, that steamboat owners generally are common carriers not only of passengers, but of goods and merchandise of all sorts, including money and bank bills, for hire. Now, if this were clearly made out, there would, in my judgment, be great difficulty in maintaining, that any evidence would be admissible to prove any usage or custom in this particular business, to exempt them from the ordinary liabilities of common carriers, and to throw the responsibility exclusively upon the masters of the boat. I have in former cases had occasion to express my entire dissatisfaction, with the practice of introducing supposed usages and customs, to control the construction of contracts and the ordinary principles of law. Donnell v. Columbian Ins. Co. [Case No. 3,987]; The Reeside [Id. 11,657]. And I greatly rejoice to find, that my own doubts and difficulties have been fully borne out and confirmed by very recent decisions in England, and especially by the case of Trueman v. Loder, 11 Adol. & E. 589, 597–601, where the subject was very elaborately considered by Lord Denman, in delivering the opinion of the court. I am not unaware of the bearing of the cases of Halsey v. Brown, 3 Day, 346, and Renner v. Bank of Columbia, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 582, 590, 591, in the opposite direction, but they are clearly distinguishable. They do not go to the extent of establishing that a local custom or usage will dispense with the principles of law; but merely to establish, in the one case, what the local custom, as to days of grace, was, and in the other case, what were properly to be deemed contracts on account of the owners of the ship, and what merely personal contracts of the master. That is the very question involved in the present case. It is, therefore, assuming the very point in controversy, to assert, that the company in the present case were common-carriers for all purposes for the carriage of bank bills, as well as for the carriage of passengers and goods and merchandise for hire; and that the master acted as their agent, and on their account, in the receipt of bank bills, as well as in the transportation of passengers and goods and merchandise. That is a matter to be made out by proofs, establishing that it was within the ordinary scope of their business, and adopted and sanctioned by them; or, at all events, that they held themselves out to the public as general carriers to such an extent. It is said, that the owners of a ship are bound by the contracts made by the master thereof, notwithstanding he may have violated his private orders; and this is true, where the act done is within the scope of the ordinary employment of the ship; for to that extent he is held out by the owners as having a general authority. But this doctrine leaves the question quite open and untouched, what is the ordinary employment of the ship; for the master cannot bind them beyond it. Lord Tenterden in his treatise on Shipping (see Johnston v. Usborne, 11 Adol. & E. 549, 557) lays down the rule of law on this subject in its true terms, that the owners are bound to the performance of every lawful contract of the master relative to the usual employment of the ship (Abb. Shipp. pt. 2, c. 2, §§ 2, 3, 6); and he adds in illustration of the rule, that if a ship were built for the purpose of conveying passengers only, or merchandise only, and employed in that particular trade, the owners are not answerable for a contract made by the master to employ the ship for a different purpose or in a different trade; for it does not relate to the usual employment of the ship. Abb. Shipp. pt. 2, c. 2, § 3; Id. § 6. The case of Boucher v. Lawson, Cas. temp. Hard. 85, Id. 194, turned mainly at the argument upon this consideration. The property (gold) there taken on board in Portugal was on freight, and shipped under a bill of lading; and the special verdict found that fact, as also that it was usual, when any gold is exported from Portugal to England, for the master of the vessel to take the whole freight to his own use, without accounting for any part of it to his owners, unless there be some special agreement between them to the contrary, which there was not in that case. The cause was several times argued, and finally went off upon another point. Lord Hardwicke however seems to have thought, that the special verdict was not as full as it should be. He said, that the property being shipped on freight, and freight, being the fruit and earnings of the ship, by the rule of law, belonged to the owners, and the master was only entitled to wages; and, therefore, upon the terms of the bill of lading, the freight would belong to the owners under such circumstances. The usage might not make any difference; for then it might amount only to this, that the owners intended to make an allowance to the master of this part of the freight, in consideration of paying him less wages, or on some other consideration; so that it would be but an allowance of part of their own profits to the master; and they would, notwithstanding, be liable. And, therefore, if the finding on the usage was to be taken consistently with the bill of lading, and the reward for carrying the gold was freight, and consequently by the rule of law belonging to the owners, they would be liable for the loss. The whole of his lordship's reasoning turned upon the peculiar wording of the special verdict, as to the shipment being on freight and technically so called; and upon this, that the taking of goods on freight was within the scope of the ordinary employment of the ship. But it seemed to be understood on all sides, that if such was not the ordinary employment of the ship, or if the shipment was a mere personal contract of the master, on his own account, and he alone was entitled to the hire, and the owners had no title to the hire as owners, that then and under such circumstances, they were not liable for the loss. See Abb. Shipp. pt. 2, c. 2, §§ 6-9. The case of Dwight v. Brewster, 1 Pick. 50, 54, does no more than affirm that the owners are liable, where they are common carriers, and the profit made by the carriage of bank bills is within the scope of their business and for their account; and that of King v. Lenox, 19 Johns. 235, shows, that the owners are not bound for shipments not made in the course of the employment of the ship on their account, but on account of the privilege of the master. The case of Middleton v. Fowler, 1 Salk. 282, is, however, still more directly in point to the circumstances of the present case. There, the action was against the proprietors of a stage-coach for the loss of a trunk of the plaintiff; and Lord Chief Justice Holt was of opinion that the action did not lie, saying that a stage-coachman was not liable, within the custom, as a common carrier, unless such as take a distinct price for carriage of goods as well as persons; as wagons with coaches; and though money be given to the driver, yet that is a gratuity, and cannot bring the master within the custom, for no master is chargeable with the acts of his servant, but when he acts within the execution of the authority given by his master. See, also, Story, Bailm. §§ 500, 507, and cases there cited. The case of Allen v. Sewall, 2 Wend. 327, is not an authority the other way, for it was reversed upon error by the court of errors of New York. Sewall v. Allen, 6 Wend. 335. If I were compelled to choose between the relative authority of these decisions, upon the ground of the reasoning contained therein, I should certainly have deemed that of the court of errors the best founded in the principles of law. The reasoning of the court below in that case seems to me to have been founded mainly upon an assumption of the very point in dispute; that is, whether the owners of the steamboat were common carriers of money for hire; for no one can well doubt, that they were not liable therefor, if the ordinary employment of the steamboat, on account of the owners, was confined to passengers and common merchandise for hire, and that the carriage of money was a personal perquisite of the master upon his own sole account, and he received the same and pay therefor, not by their authority, or as a part of their business, or by their command, but simply at his own personal risk as special bailee. The knowledge of the owners, that he carried the money for hire, would not affect them, unless the hire was for their account, or the master held himself out as their agent in that business, as being within the scope of the usual employment and service of the steamboat. That is the true doctrine, and is fairly deducible from the case of Edwards v. Sherratt, 1 East, 604, although the circumstances of that case called for a somewhat modified statement of it. The case of Shelden v. Robinson, 7 N. H. 157, directly decided, that the driver of a stage-coach (the proprietors of which were common carriers of passengers, for hire), did not, by carrying packages of money and bank bills for hire, which he received for his own sole account, become himself responsible as a common carrier; but was merely a common bailee for hire, and subject only to the responsibilities thereof; which necessarily supposes, that he did not in such cases act as agent of the proprietors in their common stage-coach business; and that they were not responsible for his acts.

In short, in all cases of this sort, the true solution of every question of the liability of the owners of a steamboat must depend upon this, whether the master is acting within the scope of the ordinary employment of the owners of the boat, or not. If the master alone receives the hire for himself, and on his own sole account, and does it as a matter of favor and not of duty, and it constitutes no part of the business or employment in which the owners are engaged, and is not performed by their orders or authority, and they are entitled to no share of the profits, then the owners are not responsible, unless, indeed, the owners hold the master out to the public as acting in these respects for them, and as capable of binding them by his acts. And my judgment, therefore, is that the onus probandi is upon the libellants to establish, that the owners are common carriers to the full extent of incurring liability for the carriage of these bills before they are entitled to recover. If they leave the matter in doubt, that is decisive for the respondents. It is precisely in this view, that the evidence, as to the supposed usage or practice introduced into this case, is admissible, not to show, if the owners were common carriers of bank bills for hire, some usage or practice to treat them as not liable for losses of bank bills intrusted to them, for I am not prepared to say that any such evidence would be admissible to control the well-established rules of law; but as evidence to show what was the ordinary employment or business of the company, and whether they ever held themselves out to the public as common carriers of bank bills for hire, or that the master was authorized as master to contract for the carriage thereof on their account. In this view it appears to me, that the evidence is exceedingly strong and cogent to establish that the public, at large, did not understand that the company ever held themselves out as common carriers of bank bills for hire, or even as gratuitous bailees; or that the masters of the steamboat ever held themselves out as capable or authorized to bind the company by any such contract, or that it was within the scope of the ordinary employment or business of the company. Most of the witnesses, as has been already suggested, treat it clearly as a case of personal agency of the master on his own personal account, either as a common bailee for hire, or as a gratuitous bailee. The weight of the evidence, indeed, seems to lead to the conclusion, that the master acted often, if not generally, as a gratuitous bailee, and that the reward sometimes paid him was either a mere gratuity, or at most a mere personal charge on his own account. If it was a mere gratuity, it would be difficult to show, how the company could be liable therefor, since it would be almost incredible, that they should be willing to incur said extraordinary risks without any compensation; and, indeed, since it might well be questioned, whether any such business was within the scope and objects of their charter. At all events, no presumption of this sort should be indulged, unless upon the most direct and positive proofs, that the company had expressly sanctioned and authorized it. And this leads me to say a few words upon the language of the charter of incorporation of the company, by the act of 1833, c. 11 (7 Mass. Sp. Laws, p. 283). That act incorporates the company, expressly for the purpose of running "a steamboat and two other vessels, not exceeding seventy-five tons each, for the convenience of the public travel, and the transportation of merchandise between Nantucket and New Bedford, and the intervening places." Now, certainly, it may be fairly presumed, that the public either knew, or were bound to know, what the powers and rights conferred by the charter upon the company were; and the company are to be presumed not to intend to transcend the powers and rights so conferred, or to usurp other functions. Unless then the word "merchandise" in that act, fairly interpreted in its common sense, includes the transportation of bank bills, it is certain that the company had no authority to engage in such business for hire, as common carriers; and the public had no right to contract with the company for the transportation thereof. The argument, therefore, has been addressed to the court, that bank bills are "merchandise" within the scope and objects and sense of the charter. I confess, that I am unable to accede to the argument. I agree, that the word "goods" may in some connections, (certainly not in all) include bank bills; for the term goods (bona) in the common law has a very extensive signification. So, the word "chattels" may; and a fortiori the word "property," which is of larger signification. Some of the cases cited at bar go to this effect. In Tisdale v. Harris, 20 Pick. 9, it was held, that under the word "goods," in the statute of frauds, the sale of the stock or shares of an incorporated company is included. But the same question has never yet been decided in England; and upon argument, at one time, before all the judges of England, they were divided in opinion upon the point. See Pickering v. Appleby, Comyn, 354; 2 P. Wms. 308; Mussell v. Cooke, Finch, Prec. 533; Long, Sales (Rand's Ed. 1839) pp. 90, 91; 2 Starkie, Ev. (4th Am. Ed.) 608; Id. (2d Eng. Ed. 1833) p. 352; Calye's Case, 8 Coke, 32, 33. In Whiton v. Old Colony Ins. Co., 2 Metc. [Mass.] 1, the same learned court held that "bank bills" were well insured under the word "property," in a policy on time in the coasting trade. In this case the court placed some reliance upon the nature of the business, the insured being the master, as well as the owner, and therefore contemplating various changes of the property from sales and purchases. But at the same time the court admitted that, ordinarily, bank bills are treated as money or cash. In Turner v. Fendall, 1 Cranch [5 U. S.] 117, 133, the supreme court of the United States held, that money (that is, coin or specie) might be taken in execution; and in Handy v. Dobbin, 12 Johns. 221, the supreme court of New York held, that "bank bills" were money, and might be taken in execution. On the other hand, it was held by Mr. Justice Dampier in Thomas v. Royal Exch. Assur. Co. [1 Price, 195] (Man. Dig. "Insurance," B. a, pls. 5, 6; 1 Phil. Ins., 2 Ed., p. 172, c. 5, § 2), that although a policy on goods and merchandise will cover specie dollars, yet it will not cover "bank bills." In Rex v. Beacall, 1 Car. & P. 310, 454, it was held, that an indictment for embezzlement of money, alleged to be the money of certain directors, who were by statute vested with "all goods, chattels, furniture in the house of industry, clothing, and debts," due to the corporation, established by the act, was not sustained by proof, that the money belonged to the corporation; for that the word "goods, chattels," &c. did not include money. Under a bequest in a will of "goods," bank bills and money will pass; and under a bequest of "money" bank bills will pass. But no case can be found, at least as far as my researches extend, in which it has been held, that a bequest of merchandise would include "bank bills." The term

"merchandise" is usually, if not universally, limited to things, that are ordinarily bought and sold, or are ordinarily the subjects of commerce and traffic; and is never applied to choses in action, as bank bills really are. In truth bank bills are ordinarily treated as money or currency, and the phrase "merchandise" is used in contradistinction thereto. The fact, that a thing is sometimes bought and sold is no proof, that it is merchandise. A bond, an annuity, a legacy, a debt due on account, may be bought and sold; but no one would assert any of these things to be merchandise. They would never pass by a grant of merchandise. A sale of all the goods and merchandise in a certain shop would never be presumed as intended to include the personal wearing apparel of the owner, although at the time it might be deposited there. It is said, that bank bills are often bought and sold; that is true; but it does not hence follow, that they cease to be currency and become merchandise. Their primary function, that of currency, gives them their common denomination, and they are, therefore, in the ordinary transactions of life, treated as money. They may, if not objected to, be a good tender in payment of a debt. But no person ever supposed that merchandise, in the ordinary acceptation of the word, could be a good tender. In short, the term "merchandise" is usually applied to specific articles, having a sensible, intrinsic value, bulk, weight, or measure in themselves; and not merely evidences of value, such as notes, bills of exchange, checks, policies of insurance, and bills of lading. In the case of Sewall v. Allen, 6 Wend. 335, the court of errors held that a steamboat charter, authorizing the company to transport "goods, wares, and merchandises," did not necessarily or naturally include the carriage of bank bills, so that, unless the company actually made that a part of their ordinary business of common carriers, they were not liable for any loss thereof. Upon that occasion two of the learned judges, constituting a part of the majority, were of opinion that "bank bills" did not fall within the denomination of goods, wares, or merchandises; and another judge held that although they might fall within the denomination of goods, under certain circumstances, yet that they ought not to be held so in that case, unless that was a part of the ordinary business of the company. My own judgment strongly inclines me to the same conclusion; and the reasoning of the judges of that high court, in support of it, appears to me very cogent and striking. But in the charter now under consideration, the word "goods" is not found. If it were, there might be a more distressing difficulty to be encountered in construing it. 2 Williams, Ex'rs (2d Ed. London, 1838) pt. 3, bk. 3, pp. 854, 855, 861, 862, c. 2, § 4. As it is, I have not been able to persuade myself, that either the corporation or the legislature, under the word "merchandise," meant to include "bank bills," as an object of regular transportation for hire. At all events, if they did, it seems to me, that the word merchandise, ordinarily, has a much more restricted meaning, and in this respect I adopt the doctrine of the court of errors of New York. It is incumbent upon those, who assert, that the charter includes such an expanded meaning, to show by some clear and determinate proofs, that the company have positively adopted and acted upon that meaning. If they had advertised, that they would transport merchandise or freight in their steamboat, it would hardly be pretended, that the public were misled, by supposing, that it included transporting bank bills for hire, unless some unequivocal act of the company established that interpretation beyond controversy. There is no evidence in the present case, that the company ever did intend to receive any bank bills for transportation for hire, or held out such an intention to the public, or ever gave any authority to the master, to receive it on their account. All his acts admit of a very different interpretation, whether the compensation received by him was a gratuity or a price for the service, and are of just such a character as must occur, if he was acting on his own personal account, and at his own personal risk, and for his own personal advantage, or his desire to oblige others. It is no sufficient answer, that the company did not give notice, that they would not be responsible for the acts or negligences of the master, in the carriage of bank bills. Such a notice could be required only in cases, where they had reason to believe, that the master held himself out to the public as entitled to contract on account of the company, or it was an act done within the ordinary scope of their business or employment.

In the view, which I have taken of the law applicable to the present case, and the evidence produced by the parties, it has been unnecessary for me nicely to compare and sift the relative credibility of those of the witnesses, whose testimony is in contradiction to each other, because the facts, which stand uncontradicted, or are supported by an unequivocal weight of evidence, in my judgment satisfactorily dispose of the whole merits. The result to which I have arrived upon a review of the evidence, is, that the company never intended to be common carriers of bank bills for hire; that they never held themselves out to the public in that character; that they never authorized the master to contract on their account for the carriage thereof; that he never intended to do so, or held out to the public that he had any authority; that all the contracts made by him for the carriage of bank bills, were designed by him to be his own personal contracts, and upon his own personal responsibility; that for the most part the services performed by him in the carriage of bank bills were gratuitous; and even when he received any compensation, it was commonly received by him as a gratuity, and not as a matter of right, although there were some instances to the contrary. That the public generally, although not universally, seem to have understood these to be the mere personal contracts of the master, and not at the risk, or for the account of the company; or, at least, that this was a common impression among many of those who intrusted him with the carriage of bank bills; that the charter of the company does not seem to have contemplated the transportation of bank bills as an ordinary business or employment of the company, even if capable of being construed to include the right so to do, under the term "merchandise;" and, therefore, clear and unequivocal proofs ought to exist, to establish the broader construction on the part of the company, before they should be affected with liability therefor; and, finally, that in this case there are no such proofs. Under such circumstances, it seems to me that the decree of the court below, dismissing the libel, ought to be affirmed. In delivering this opinion, I have studiously abstained from deciding, whether the master in this case was guilty either of gross or of ordinary negligence, in the loss of this package of bank bills, because that question may yet arise, and be brought directly in judgment in a suit against the master. I feel, however, bound to say, that if I had been entirely satisfied, that the master was not guilty either of gross or of ordinary negligence, I should have been spared the many other laborious inquiries, to which this opinion has been addressed. It is the doubt on this head, brought to my mind, which has compelled me to go at large into all the other grounds, upon which I hold the company absolved, even if the master was guilty either of gross or of ordinary negligence.

In the course of the argument it was intimated, that in libels of this sort, the proceedings might be properly instituted both in rem against the steamboat, and in personam against the owners and master thereof. I ventured at that time to say, that I knew of no principle or authority, in the general jurisprudence of courts of admiralty, which would justify such a joinder of proceedings, so very different in their nature and character, and decretal effect. On the contrary, in this court, every practice of this sort has been constantly discountenanced, as irregular and improper. The case of The Triune, 3 Hagg. Adm. 114, was cited at the bar, in support of the right to join the proceedings. That case is very imperfectly reported. But it appears that the original proceeding was in rem against the ship, for a collision, and that Wardell, who was the master, and also the principal owner, and to whose negligence the libel attributed the collision, alone appeared in the suit. By the statute of 53 Geo. III. c. 159, the owners, when the loss has been without their fault or privity, are not liable beyond the value of their ship and freight; but the owners, who are in fault, and the master also, are liable to full damages to the extent of the injury done to the other party. No bail was given. The freight was brought into court, the ship was sold, and the proceeds falling short of the damages by £400, a monition issued against Wardell to pay that sum, which failing to do, he was imprisoned upon an attachment, moved for and granted by the court. Now, it is apparent, that there was a great peculiarity in this case, Wardell being the sole party, who intervened, and being by the statute liable for the full damages. A monition issued before the attachment was granted; and if that monition was preceded by a supplementary libel, or act on petition, stating the facts of the sale of the ship, and the deficiency to pay the damages, the proceeding was clearly regular and right. But if no preliminary proceeding was had, I confess that I do not well see how a proceeding, originally in rem, could be prosecuted in personam against a party, who in such proceeding intervened only for and to the extent of his interest. Probably there were other circumstances which varied the general rule. At all events, I am not prepared to accede to the authority of this case, if it is to stand nakedly, and only upon the circumstances above stated. In cases of collision, the injured party may proceed in rem, or in personam, or successively in each way, until he has full satisfaction. But I do not understand how the proceedings can be blended in the libel. The case of The Richmond, 3 Hagg. Adm. 431, is a case more conformable to my notion of the practice. But there the ship was not arrested; and the proceedings were in personam against the owners.

On the whole, I am of opinion that the decree of the district court ought to be affirmed; but as the appeal seems to me, under all the circumstances, in a case of such novelty and intricacy, to have been fully justifiable, I should have inclined to award that one half of the respondents' costs in this court should be borne by them, and the other half should be borne by the libellants, if it could have been done without breaking in upon the settled practice of the court. As it is, the respondents must take their full costs.

Case No. 2,731.

CITIZENS' BANK v. OBER.

[1 Woods, 80;[1] 13 N. B. R. 328.]

Circuit Court, D. Louisiana. Nov. Term, 1870.

SALE IN BANKRUPTCY—AGREEMENT AS TO BIDDING—PURCHASE BY SOLICITOR OF ASSIGNEE.

1. A person who intends to bid at a cash sale of a bankrupt's estate, may agree, in case he becomes the purchaser, to sell to another person at a fixed price on terms of credit, when he has no notice that such second person has any purpose to bid at the sale, or has the means to make his bid good. Such an agreement will not avoid the sale.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William B. Woods, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

2. A sale of a bankrupt's estate made to a solicitor of the assignee, retained generally in the bankruptcy, will be set aside as against public policy.

This was a petition addressed to the supervisory jurisdiction of the circuit court, under the second section of the bankrupt act. Certain property of York & Hoover, the bankrupts, having been sold and the sale confirmed by the district court, sitting in bankruptcy, this petition was filed to reverse the decree confirming the sale.

[A motion to dismiss this appeal was previously denied. See York's Case, Case No. 18,139, which case also contains a statement of the prior steps had in this proceeding.]

Wm. M. Randolph and H. M. Hyams, for petitioner.

John A. Campbell, for Ober.

WOODS, Circuit Judge. It appears from the record that on the 16th day of February, 1869, two plantations called respectively, "White Hall" and "Home," the property of the bankrupts, were sold at public sale by the assignee to Albert G. Ober, of the firm of Ober, Atwater & Co., said firm being among the mortgage creditors of the bankrupts. The motion to confirm the sale in the bankrupt court was resisted on the ground that the purchaser had used illegal and improper influences to deter other persons from bidding, and that the purchase was made by Ober for and in behalf of Norton, the assignee, and that Norton was in fact the purchaser. The district court referred the question of the fairness and validity of the sale to a commissioner, who reported in favor of the fairness and bona fides of the sale. The district court, after argument, confirmed the report of the commissioner, and it is to reverse this order that the present petition was filed.

The testimony taken by the commissioner establishes conclusively that the assignee was not a party directly or indirectly to the purchase, nor interested therein in any manner or degree; that so far as he was concerned, the sale was conducted fairly and according to law; and the objection that he was interested in the purchase appears to have been abandoned. Relative to the averment that Ober, Atwater & Co. had used illegal and improper influences to deter other persons from bidding, the following facts are established: John S. Scott, about an hour previous to the sale, proposed to Ober, Atwater & Co. that in case they became the purchasers of the "Home" place, he and his friends, whom he represented, would buy the place of them for the price of $35,000, of which $20,000 was to be paid in cash, and the residue, $15,000, in October following the sale. Ober, Atwater & Co. gave Scott the impression that they would sell to him at the price and upon the terms named; but Scott did not inform them that he intended to bid at the sale, nor that he was prepared to pay cash for the property. Scott, who made this arrangement, was ready to bid $35,000 and had the means of his friends at his command to make his bid good. He testifies that he refrained from bidding on account of the arrangement which he supposed he had made to purchase from Ober, Atwater & Co. It is further shown that H. D. Stone, Esq., was the solicitor of the assignee of York & Hoover in the matter of their bankruptcy. That about an hour before the sale, Ober, Atwater & Co., at the suggestion of Stone, made to him the following proposition in writing, the handwriting of the body of the paper being Stone's: "New Orleans, La., Feb. 16. H. D. Stone:—We will sell you White Hall plantation for $20,000 at any time after we purchase it. But you shall not be obliged to take it till our mortgage thereon is judicially determined to be valid as a first mortgage; or you may have one-half of White Hall and Home place for $22,500 at any time, but you shall not be obliged to take it until it is judicially determined that we have a first mortgage upon both places. For value received, we agree to carry out the above proposition in good faith. Ober, Atwater & Co." Ober, of the firm of Ober, Atwater & Co., became the purchaser at the sale of both places; of the Home at the price of $19,800, and of White Hall at $22,000. These are substantially the facts as shown by the evidence.

In regard to the arrangement with Scott, standing alone, I cannot go the length to say that it is sufficient to avoid the sale. In my opinion it is permitted to a party who expects to bid at a sale, when the terms are cash on the day of sale for the whole amount of the purchase price, to agree with another party that in case he becomes the purchaser, he will sell the property to him at a named price on terms of credit. This is clearly so when the person proposing to purchase has no knowledge or notice that the party proposing to buy is prepared to pay cash, and is ready to bid, and able to make his bid good. The proposition for a credit for a part of the purchase money is a strong indication that the party making the proposition is not able to buy at the sale and pay cash, and may well be taken by the person to whom the proposition is made as an admission to that effect. Phippen v. Stickney, 3 Metc. [Mass.] 384; Smull v. Jones, 1 Watts & S. 128. In regard to the proposition made to Stone, it is admitted by counsel for Ober, Atwater & Co., that the assignee could not purchase at his own sale, nor, under the bankrupt law and practice in England, could his solicitor, because, there, the solicitor of the assignee is chosen by the creditors. But, under our law and practice, it is claimed the rule is different, because here the assignee is allowed to choose his own solicitor, without regard to the wishes of the creditors. I do not see how the method, by which the solicitor is selected, can change the rule. The assignee represents all the creditors. It is his duty so to administer the estate as to produce the best dividends, and so to distribute it as that each creditor shall receive his just rights. To enable him to discharge these duties, the law allows him the assistance of counsel and authorizes payment to his counsel out of the assets of the estate. The solicitor is not the personal counsel of the assignee, but of the assignee as the representative of the creditors. His fees are paid, not by the assignee, but in effect by the creditors. His first duty is to the estate. It is therefore his duty, when he is retained generally in the bankruptcy, to assist the assignee in the interest of all the creditors—to aid him in the collection and just and equitable distribution of the assets, and, if possible, to allow no creditor to obtain an unfair advantage over others. In re Mallory [Case No. 8,990]. With these obligations resting upon him, it is difficult to see why the solicitor should be allowed to purchase at an assignee's sale when the assignee is not. When he becomes a purchaser his interest is to buy at as low a price as he can; his duty as solicitor to the assignee is so to advise his client that the property sold may bring the highest price; so that if he is both purchaser and solicitor, his interest is in conflict with his duty.

Judicial and bankrupt sales ought to be protected by the application of such general rules as to insure the utmost fairness and good faith, and to remove far from those whose duty it is to conduct them or who are in any way officially connected with them, any temptation to fraudulent or unfair practices. If the sale was made to Stone, either directly or indirectly, or if the arrangement made with him was for the purpose of suppressing bidding at the sale, and had that effect; in either case, I should not hesitate to set the sale aside as void. It was not a direct sale to Stone. Was it an indirect one? It is not pretended that Ober, Atwater & Co. bid for Stone; they bid for themselves, expected to pay, and did pay their own money on their bid. They did not agree to let Stone have the property at what they bid for it. The arrangement was that he was to take it at a price fixed between them in advance, and without any reference to the amount at which they bought. It was nothing more than an agreement to sell to him at a fixed price, should they become the purchasers. It was not therefore an arrangement for an indirect purchase by Stone at the assignee's sale, but a contract to buy from a purchaser on an entirely different consideration. Did it have a tendency to suppress bidding at the sale? Stone swears that he had no intention of bidding, and in this he is uncontradicted. There is no evidence to show that Ober, Atwater & Co. had any suspicion that Stone's purpose was to bid. It did not have the effect to restrain bidding on the part of Ober, Atwater & Co., for it was their interest, with or without the bargain with Stone, to get the property at as low a price as possible. Norton, the assignee, was in utter ignorance of the contract. So was the auctioneer. Stone did not advise about or interfere with the sale. It was conducted fairly, according to law. The understanding with Stone did not have the effect to suppress competition; was, in all probability, not made for that purpose. Stone did not buy, directly or indirectly, at the assignee's sale. Ought the sale to be declared void by reason of his understanding with Ober, Atwater & Co. I think not. The case is in precisely the same plight as if Stone had made an illegal contract with Ober, Atwater & Co., about some matter entirely disconnected with the sale. After a careful consideration of this case, I am unable to say that the understanding of Ober, Atwater & Co., with either Scott or Stone was such as to render the sale fraudulent or against public policy. The district court was therefore right in confirming the sale. The petition to reverse its decree must therefore be dismissed at costs of petitioner.

CITIZENS' BANK v. OBER. See Case No. 18,139.

CITIZENS' BANK OF LOUISIANA (CASE v.). See Case No. 2,489.

CITIZENS' BANK OF TOPEKA (FIRST NAT. BANK OF MANHATTAN v.). See Case No. 4,802.

Case No. 2,732.

CITIZENS' NAT. BANK v. CASS et al.

[6 Reporter, 579; 18 N. B. R. 279; 6 Wkly. Notes Cas. 371; 19 Alb. Law J. 119; 26 Pittsb. Leg. J. 25.][1]

Circuit Court, W. D. Pennsylvania. Sept. 23, 1878.

BANKRUPTCY—BANKRUPT PARTNERSHIP—NONJOINDER OF PARTNERS—DEBTORS—CREDITORS—REMEDY OF CREDITORS—DISCHARGE.

1. Where a voluntary petition in bankruptcy has been filed, omitting the names of certain members of a firm, which it is asked shall be declared bankrupt, proceedings in invitum against the nonjoining partners can be had only on application of the petitioning debtors; a creditor cannot make such application.

2. The nonjoinder of any partner leaves the creditors in full possession of their remedies against him, irrespective of the bankruptcy proceedings; and the omission of the names of partners in the petition may cause the court to refuse a discharge to the petitioners.

[1] Reprinted from 6 Reporter, 579, by permission. 19 Alb. Law J. 119, contains only a partial report.]

[Bill of review of the proceedings in the district court of the United States for the western district of Pennsylvania, in the matter of Harbaugh, Mathias, and Owens, bankrupts, upon the petition of the Citizens' National Bank, asking the joinder of additional alleged members of the firm as bankrupts. The facts are these: A petition in voluntary bankruptcy had been filed by Springer Harbaugh, David Mathias and Samuel T. Owens, claiming to constitute the partnership firm of Harbaugh, Mathias and Owens. A schedule of the assets and liabilities, as well of the individual members, as of the firm itself, was filed, and, in the ordinary course of proceedings, an adjudication was made, and an assignee appointed, to whom all the property, partnership and individual, of the petitioning debtors was conveyed.

[Nearly two years after the adjudication was made, a petition was filed by the Citizens' National Bank of Pittsburgh, alleging that they were creditors of the bankrupt firm, and had proved their claims against it to the amount of nearly $35,000; that the firm of Harbaugh, Mathias and Owens consisted in addition to the petitioning members, of George W. Cass, and the Cambria Iron Company; that all of the members of the firm, including Cass and the Iron Company, were general partners, though not ostensibly so, and that this general partnership existed, from about the first of January, 1870, until the filing of the petition in bankruptcy, which included the period during which the indebtedness to the petitioners was incurred. The petition further alleged that the indebtedness to them was allowed to be incurred upon the belief and representation that Cass and the Iron Company were general partners in the firm. It then set forth at length a number of transactions between Harbaugh, Mathias, Owens, the Iron Co., and Cass, as evidences of the existence of a general partnership between them, and prayed for an order directing Harbaugh, Mathias and Owens to amend their petition in bankruptcy, by including Cass and the Cambria Iron Company, as general partners in the firm, and directing the said Cass and the Cambria Iron Company to file their individual schedules in bankruptcy on or before a certain day, or, in default, that the assignees of the firm should file formal schedules in their respective names, unless, on or before a day certain, they should show cause to the contrary; all proceedings for the discharge of any of the said bankrupts in the mean while to be stayed. The district court refused the prayer of the petition, whereupon the petitioners filed the present bill of review.] [2]

S. Schoyer, Jr., and George P. Hamilton, for complainants.

[McKENNAN, Circuit Judge. Strongly impressed as I am with the equity of the petitioners' contention, I have endeavored to reach a conclusion which might give effect to what seems to me to be the ultimate merits of the case, resulting from the true relations of the parties to each other. But the desired result can only be accomplished by an exercise of the appropriate jurisdiction of the court, within the limits and in accordance with the spirit and object of the law which confers it.

[A voluntary petition was presented to the district court, for a discharge from their debts, by three persons, claiming to constitute a partnership, and as such to have contracted debts and acquired property. A schedule of these assets and debts, as well as of the individuals represented to compose the firm, was filed, an adjudication was made in due course, and an assignee duly appointed, to whom all the property of the petitioning debtors, partnership and separate, was conveyed. Nearly two years after this, the complainant in this bill, a creditor of the bankrupt firm, presented its petition to the district court, alleging that the firm consisted of the three petitioning debtors and the two respondents, and asking the court so to adjudge, and to order the joinder, in the bankruptcy proceeding, of the respondents with the other acknowledged members of the partnership. This the district court refused to do, and the question is whether this decision was right. I am of opinion that it was, and for the following reasons, which I am only able to state with great brevity.] [3]

The unquestionable effect of the assignment was to vest in the assignee all the joint property of the petitioning partners, and to make it available for the payment of the firm creditors, so that the plain object of this proceeding is to subject the individual property of the respondent to the payment of partnership liabilities. But two methods are provided by the bankrupt law by which this can be done: 1. Upon the petition of one or more partners in trade in which one or more of the alleged partners refuse to join. 2. Upon the petition of the required number of the firm creditors, representing the required proportion of the partnership indebtedness. In the first it is essential that the names of all the members of the firm should be stated in the petition, because notice is required to be served upon those who refuse to join, to the end that they may make any available defence against the application. Rev. St. § 5121; General Order 18.

The primary object of the first mode is to secure to the petitioning bankrupts a discharge from their debts. To this end the law requires a surrender of all the property of the bankrupts, and an honest disclosure of every material fact within their knowledge touching the nature of their indebtedness, as necessary conditions of their discharge. If they withhold in their petition the names of any of their copartners, they may defeat their application for a discharge; but it is not incumbent upon any of their creditors to supply the omission, nor can they do so, because in voluntary bankruptcy the law provides for a proceeding in invitum against nonjoining parties, only upon the promotion of their petitioning associates. Nor will such omission affect the rights of creditors against partners who are not parties to the proceeding. The law leaves them in the possession of all the remedies against parties not joined which they had before, while it may, as the penalty of bad faith, deny the fundamental object of the application. And the bankrupt court will in its discretion so control the proceedings as to protect firm creditors from embarrassment in the pursuit of their lawful remedies against recalcitrant partners.

[2] [From 6 Wkly. Notes Cas. 371.]

[3] [From 18 N. B. R. 279.]

In its initial features the second mode of proceeding differs from the first. Its object is to supersede the control of the bankrupt over the property, and to secure its appropriation to the payment of his debts. Hence, it is adversary to him, and can only be instituted by creditors, a certain proportion of whom, representing a certain proportion of the debtor's liabilities, must unite in the application. [In both modes of procedure, then, essential conditions must exist.][3] In a voluntary application the initiative must be taken by the debtor, and, in case of a partnership, by one or more of its members, at whose instance alone can other members who refuse to join be brought in. If any are excluded who ought to be joined, the court will refuse the petitioners the benefit of the act, and leave them and their associates [who refuse to join them][3] subject to all the remedies to which their creditors might resort, irrespective of the bankruptcy proceedings. But the court cannot aid a creditor in accomplishing by indirection a result which could only be reached directly by the observance of indispensable conditions. Bill dismissed.

Case No. 2,733.

CITIZENS' NAT. BANK v. LEMING et al.

[This is a state case, and is reported in 8 Int. Rev. Rec. 132.]

CITIZENS OF CINCINNATI, In re. See Case No. 13,628.

[3][From 18 N. B. R. 279.]

Case No. 2,734.

CITIZENS' SAV. ASS'N v. TOPEKA.

[3 Dill. 376.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Kansas. 1874.[2]

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—LIMITS OF TAXING POWER—AID TO PRIVATE ENTERPRISES.

1. Taxation can only be authorized for public as distinguished from private purposes.

[See note at end of case.]

2. A statute which authorizes a municipality to issue bonds, that can only be paid by taxation, for the benefit of a manufacturing enterprise of private persons, is void, because it violates the fundamental rights of property, since the purpose is essentially private in its nature, although the public may be incidentally benefited.

[Cited in Jarrott v. Moberly, Case No. 7,223.]

[See note at end of case.]

Action upon interest coupons to bonds issued by the city of Topeka. Demurrer to petition.

A. Ennis, for plaintiff.

A. L. Williams, for defendant.

DILLON, Circuit Judge. The city of Topeka issued one hundred bonds of $1,000 each, as a donation to the King Wrought Iron Bridge Manufacturing and Iron Works Company, of that place, to aid it in establishing therein its manufactory of iron bridges. The bonds are payable to that company and purport to be issued in pursuance of section 76, of an act of the legislature of Kansas, to incorporate cities of the second class, approved February 29, 1872 (Laws 1872, p. 192), and of an act approved March 2, 1872, to authorize cities and counties to issue bonds to build bridges, aid railroads, water-powers, and other works of internal improvement (Laws 1872, p. 110). The purpose for which these bonds were issued appears on their face, and is stated in the petition. It is alleged that the city has paid one year's interest thereon out of funds raised by taxation, and that it was after such payment that the plaintiff became the owner of the bonds and the coupons in suit, for value.

I concede that the legislative provision is broad enough to warrant the issue of these bonds by the city of Topeka, and the demurrer must be overruled if the authority to this end conferred upon the city is one which the legislature had the rightful power to grant. This question I have already decided in the case of the Commercial Bank of Cleveland v. City of Iola [Case No. 3,061]. I have given at some length the reasons for the conclusion that bonds like those in suit are absolutely void. That opinion was deliberately formed; and I am still satisfied with it and adhere to it. The payment of interest cannot cure the absolute want of power. It is not sufficient to distinguish this case from the one cited. Following that case, the demurrer will be sustained and judgment entered for the city. Judgment accordingly.

[1][Reported by Hon. John F. Dillon, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

[2][Affirmed in Loan Association v. Topeka, 20 Wall. (87 U. S.) 655.]

NOTE [from original report]. Before the decision in the Iola Case [Case No. 3,061], it is estimated that over $2,000,000 of bonds had been issued in Kansas to aid private enterprises, such as hotels, manufactories, etc., and at the time that decision was given, preparations to issue large amounts of similar bonds were making. To the judgment in that case and the Topeka Case, writs of error were prosecuted and both were affirmed by the supreme court in February, 1874. The opinion of the court was given in the Topeka Case, which was very carefully prepared by Mr. Justice Miller, and contains the sanction of that high tribunal to sound principles of constitutional law, which have been too often overlooked or disregarded in this country.

[NOTE. The judgment entered in accordance with this opinion was affirmed by the supreme court on a writ of error prosecuted by the plaintiff, Mr. Justice Miller delivering the opinion of the majority of the court. The reasons of the affirmance were that the statute authorizing the town to issue the bonds in aid of a private manufacturing enterprise was void, because the taxes necessary to pay the bonds would, if collected, be the transfer of property of individuals to aid in the projects of gain and profit of others, and not for a public use, in the proper sense of that term, and also because the legislature had no power to pass the statute in question. Loan Association v. Topeka, 20 Wall. (87 U. S.) 655.]

Case No. 2,735.

In re CITIZENS' SAV. BANK.

[9 N. B. R. 152.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. South Carolina. Dec., 1873.

BANKRUPTCY—RESTRAINING PROCEEDING IN STATE COURT.

A depositor in savings bank filed a bill to have the bank wound up under the state laws. The bank was soon after adjudicated bankrupt. Held, the bankrupt court had jurisdiction to restrain the prosecution of the depositor's bill in the state court, though commenced prior to the filing of the petition in bankruptcy.

Watson, treasurer of York county, filed a complaint in the state court of South Carolina, alleging that the Citizens' Savings Bank was insolvent and had refused to pay its checks, and prayed that the bank should be compelled to render an account of its funds and be restrained from the exercise of its corporate rights, and that a receiver be appointed to administer its assets for the benefit of its creditors. An order was issued to show cause why the injunction should not issue and a receiver be appointed as prayed for. While these proceedings were pending in the state court, the Citizens' Savings Bank filed a petition in bankruptcy [November 29, 1873]. Bryan, J., issued an order compelling the surrender of all the property and assets of the bank to E. M. Seabrook, register in bankruptcy, to keep until the appointment of an assignee [December 1, 1873]. A return to the order of the state court denying the jurisdiction of the state court, and averring that the bank had been adjudged a bankrupt in the United States district court was then filed. Upon hearing this return the judge decided that its jurisdiction was not ousted by the decree of bankruptcy. The injunction was made permanent. The bank then filed a petition in the United States district court, asking an injunction against Watson and all other persons, restraining them from prosecuting any action in the state court. [Case not reported.] This injunction was granted upon an ex parte hearing [December 10, 1873]. The plaintiffs thereupon filed their petition in the United States circuit court, claiming that the jurisdiction in the case properly belonged to the state circuit court, and asking the court to review the decision made by the United States district judge, and to set aside the order made by him.

Mr. Trescot, for petitioners, contended that the bankrupt court had no authority to issue an injunction, except up to the time of the adjudication in bankruptcy; that suit having been commenced in the state court previous to the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy, under the amendment of 1873 [17 Stat. 436] of the bankrupt law, the case should remain in the state court.

C. D. Melton, on the same side, contended that while the United States courts had frequently enjoined proceedings in the state court, yet in all these cases the injunctions had been issued to restrain creditors from establishing separate liens or judgments, exclusive of and without regard to the rights of the other creditors. In this case, however, the creditor had no such object or view. He only desired under the state laws to procure an equitable administration of the assets of the insolvent debtor.

James H. Rion, for defendants, claimed the suit in the state court was actually a proceeding in involuntary bankruptcy, and the administration of bankruptcy property belongs to the United States court. In this case no receiver had been appointed by the state court yet, and the United States district court could, therefore, with perfect propriety, assert its jurisdiction, without being reduced to the necessity of dispossessing a receiver appointed by another court. The object and intent of the bankrupt law was to place the administration of the assets of a bankrupt's estate within the control of the bankrupt court, and the passage of the law superseded or suspended all state insolvent laws. The action of the state court must yield to the paramount authority of the United States court. It was clearly laid down in all the authorities that the United States court had full power to suspend or control all proceedings in a state court against a bankrupt or his estate. This suspension or control could properly be effected by an injunction, as had been done in this case.

[1] [Reprinted by permission.]

A. G. Magrath, in reply, urged that the order of Judge Bryan was in direct violation of the order of the state court, and was granted without notice to the petitioners, who had instituted the proceeding in the state court. If the circuit court of the state had jurisdiction in this case in limine, the jurisdiction continued to the end of the suit.

BOND, Circuit Judge. The order granted by the district judge must be affirmed, but I have not time to write out any opinion in the matter.

[NOTE. For the opinion subsequently delivered by Bond, Circuit Judge, see Watson v. Citizens' Savings Bank, Case No. 17,279.]

CITY BANK (JAUDON v.). See Case No. 7,230.

CITY BANK (UNITED STATES v.). See Case No. 14,796.

CITY BANK (WILSON v.). See Case No. 17,797.

CITY BANK OF NEW YORK v. YONGE. See Case No. 2,739.

Case No. 2,736.

CITY BANK OF COLUMBUS v. BEACH et al.

[1 Blatchf. 425.][1]

Circuit Court, N. D. New York. Oct. Term, 1849.

POWERS OF BANKING CORPORATION—RESTRICTION AS TO LOCATION AND BUSINESS.

1. Where a banking corporation, whose location and place of business was at Columbus, Ohio, had power by its charter to deal in bills of exchange, without restriction as to place: Held, that it could purchase such bills at Cleveland, Ohio, for the purpose of remitting to New-York the proceeds of paper belonging to the bank, collected at Cleveland.

2. And it could even deal generally in exchange at Cleveland, through an agent there, with the funds thus collected and remitted.

3. The cases of Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 13 Per. [38 U. S.] 519, and of Tombigbee R. Co. v. Kneeland, 4 How. [45 U. S.] 16, quoted and approved.

4. The City Bank of Columbus, under the acts of Ohio incorporating it, passed March 17, 1838, and March 6, 1845, and under the general banking law of Ohio, passed February 24, 1845, is restricted to Columbus as its location and place of business. (Per Conkling, J.)

Assumpsit, tried before Mr. Justice Nelson and Judge Conkling, in October, 1847, at Albany. The action was against the acceptors, on two bills of exchange, each for $1000, drawn by one Haskell, at Cleveland, Ohio, on the defendants, William Beach & Co., at Auburn, New-York, and accepted by them, payable at the office of H. Dwight, Jr., in New-York, to the order of and endorsed by Haskell; one dated October 27th, 1845, and payable 63 days after date; the other dated November 12th, 1845, and payable 45 days days after date. The plaintiffs were a banking corporation incorporated by the state of Ohio, and having their banking-house and place of business at Columbus in that state. They became a corporation under three several acts of the legislature of Ohio: 1st. "An act to incorporate the Mechanics' Saving Institution of Columbus, Ohio," passed March 17th, 1838; 2d. "An act to incorporate the State Bank of Ohio, and other banking companies," passed February 24th, 1845; 3d. "An act to amend the act entitled 'An act to incorporate the Mechanics' Saving Institution of Columbus, Ohio,' passed March 17th, 1838," passed March 6th, 1845. The first act contained nothing fixing, in terms, the location of the corporation; but the first section of it incorporated certain persons "by the name and style of the 'Mechanics' Saving Institution of Columbus.'" The third act converted the "Mechanics' Saving Institution of Columbus," incorporated by the first, into a banking company, under the name of the "City Bank of Columbus." The first section of that act enacted: "That the Mechanics' Saving Institution of Columbus shall be held and adjudged a banking company within the meaning of the act entitled 'An act to incorporate the State Bank of Ohio and other banking companies,' passed February 24, A. D. 1845, and as such shall be entitled to receive from the treasurer of state circulating notes, and issue the same, and to transact banking business during the term, under the conditions, and subject to the limitations, restrictions and liabilities prescribed by said act relating to independent banking companies;" and, by the third section, the governor, upon being satisfied that the new corporation had complied with certain conditions, was, by proclamation, to declare the company to be "entitled to receive and issue notes for circulation, and to transact business as an independent banking company, subject in all respects to the provisions of the act incorporating the State Bank of Ohio and other banking companies." The capital of the new bank was fixed at not less than $75,000, nor more than $150,000. Among the powers granted expressly to independent banking companies by the act of February 24th, 1845, was the power to "buy, sell and discount bills of exchange." Section 51. That act provided prospectively for the voluntary formation of banking companies; divided the state, by counties, into twelve districts; limited the number of companies that might be formed in each district and in each county, and the aggregate capital of those formed in each district; prescribed the maximum capital for each bank; and fixed the aggregate capital of all the banks authorized by the act to be formed, at the maximum of $6,150,000, but that sum was not to be "construed to include the capital stock of such companies as, by name, shall be authorized to continue or to resume the business of banking, subject to the provisions of this act;" all which provisions were to apply to the new banks, whether organized as independent banking companies, or as branches of the State Bank of Ohio. Sections 1–4. By sections 68 and 69, certain banks therein named were authorized to re-commence and continue the business of banking subject to the provisions of the act. The certificate of association of each bank was to specify, among other things, "the name of the city, village, or town, in which its banking operations shall be carried on," and the companies were "authorized to commence and carry on the business of banking at the places severally designated in their certificates of association." Sections 7, 11. On the trial, the defendants proved, by one Morrison, that he received the two bills of exchange in question from Haskell, the drawer, in Cleveland, about the times they respectively bore date; that he discounted them both as the agent of and for the plaintiffs, and paid the proceeds to Haskell, in Cleveland; that the proceeds so paid were funds in his hands, belonging to the plaintiffs; that he, (the witness,) was the agent of the plaintiffs in Cleveland, and kept an office in Cleveland in which he conducted the business of such agency, for the purpose of collecting bills; that the nature of that business was, that the plaintiffs sent to him, for collection, their business paper discounted by them, and when he collected it he invested the proceeds, as their agent, in bills of exchange on New-York and elsewhere; that he bought bills to remit the funds; that sometimes the plaintiffs sent him mutilated circulating notes issued by other banks, for him to procure their redemption by those banks, and to invest the proceeds, as their agent, in the purchase of bills on New-York, which he had done; that they had also sent him, not more than once or twice, their own circulating notes, with which he had purchased bills of exchange on New-York; that he also sold, at Cleveland, as the plaintiffs' agent, bills of exchange on New-York and elsewhere, such bills being drawn by him as the plaintiffs' agent, on their funds; that he did anything with the funds of the plaintiffs in his hands that they thought proper; that he sent to New-York for collection the bills purchased by him, and kept an account in New-York as such agent; that, when he sold exchange on New-York, he re-invested the proceeds in other bills payable there; that he kept, at his agency in Cleveland and as such agent, separate books of account, in which the business of his agency was entered, and in which collections made and monies received for the plaintiffs were entered; that his standing orders from the plaintiffs' cashier were, to purchase bills, for the purpose of remitting to New-York all the funds he had of theirs in his hands; that he would not say, but he thought he paid Haskell the amount of the proceeds of the two bills, out of the proceeds of paper collected for the plaintiffs; that he did not know as he had, at the time he purchased the two bills, any funds of the plaintiffs in his hands, other than the proceeds of collections; and that the average amount of funds of the plaintiffs in his hands, to be employed in purchasing exchange on New-York, was about $30,000. It also appeared that Columbus was in Franklin county, in the 5th district as established by the act of February 24th, 1845, and that Cleveland was in Cuyahoga county, in the 12th district. The defendants' counsel requested the court to charge the jury, that the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover on the two bills so purchased by them, as testified to by Morrison, in the general course of his business as their agent; that the plaintiffs had no right, under the laws of Ohio before recited, to establish an agency in Cleveland, and to carry on, through such agency, the kind of business conducted by Morrison as their agent, and that the purchase by Morrison of the two bills, with the funds of the plaintiffs, and for them, and under the circumstances testified to by him, was unlawful and in violation of the said laws of Ohio, and against their policy. The court refused so to charge, but charged the jury that the plaintiffs had acquired a valid title to the bills in question, and had not in such acquisition violated any public law of Ohio, and were therefore entitled to recover. The defendants' counsel excepted to the refusal and charge, and the jury found for the plaintiffs. The defendants now moved for a new trial, on a bill of exceptions.

[1] [Reported by Samuel Blatchford, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

Alvah Worden, for defendants.

I. Under the act creating the plaintiffs a banking company, and the act incorporating the Mechanics' Saving Institution, the plaintiffs are a corporation located, for the purpose of doing business, in the city of Columbus. Ang. & A. Corp. (2d Ed.) c. 13, 368; 2 Inst. 703, index "Inhabitant;" People v. Trustees of Geneva College, 5 Wend. 219. II. The plaintiffs, being a banking company located and established in Columbus, within the 5th banking district of Ohio, could not, under the laws of Ohio, conduct or carry on any kind of banking business in Cleveland, in the 12th district. Pennington v. Coxe, 2 Cranch [6 U. S.] 33; Griswold v. National Ins. Co., 3 Cow. 96; Crocker v. Crane, 1 Wend. 211. III. If the plaintiffs had no power to discount the bills in Cleveland, they acquired no title to them by the act of discounting them there. State v. Granville Alex. Society, 11 Ohio, 1; Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 587; Runyan v. Lessee of Coster, 14 Pet. [39 U. S.] 122; Lessee of Knowles v. Beaty [Case No. 7,896]; New York Firemen Ins. Co. v. Ely, 2 Cow. 678, and 5 Conn. 560; Life & Fire Ins.

Co. v. Mechanic Fire Ins. Co., 7 Wend. 31; Perkins v. Savage, 15 Wend. 414; New Hope & D. Bridge Co. v. Poughkeepsie Silk Co., 25 Wend. 650; North River Ins. Co. v. Lawrence, 3 Wend. 482; Head v. Providence Ins. Co., 2 Cranch [6 U. S.] 127; Beaty v. Lessee of Knowler, 4 Pet. [29 U. S.] 152; Beatty v. Marine Ins. Co., 2 Johns. 109; People v. Utica Ins. Co., 15 Johns. 358; De Groot v. Van Duzer, 17 Wend. 170, and 20 Wend. 390; New York Firemen Ins. Co. v. Sturges, 2 Cow. 675; Goszler v. Corporation of Georgetown, 6 Wheat. [19 U. S.] 597; Slark v. Highgate Archway Co., 5 Taunt. 792; Broughton v. Salford Water-Works, 3 Barn. & Ald. 1. IV. Nor did they acquire any title to the bills, if by the laws of Ohio they were prohibited from establishing an agency and discounting the bills at Cleveland. Holman v. Johnson, Cowp. 341; Parsons v. Thompson, 1 H. Bl. 322; Armstrong v. Toler, 11 Wheat. [24 U. S.] 258; Langton v. Hughes, 1 Maule & S. 593; Biggs v. Lawrence, 3 Term. R. 454; Pennington v. Townsend, 7 Wend. 281; Bank of U. S. v. Owens, 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 527; Thalimer v. Brinkerhoff, 20 Johns. 397. V. The plaintiffs transferred a portion of their capital to Cleveland, and employed it there in the business of banking. They thus violated the laws of Ohio, and the bills were discounted without authority. People v. Utica Ins. Co., 15 Johns. 386; King v. Nicholson, 1 Strange, 299; Sharp v. Speir, 4 Hill, 83. VI. The court erred in instructing the jury that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover, and had not, in acquiring title to the bills, violated the law of Ohio. VII. Even if the case did not authorize the court to charge the jury as requested by the defendants' counsel, it presented a question for the jury, and it should have been left to them to say, under proper instructions, whether the plaintiffs had transferred their capital or any portion of it to Cleveland, to be employed in the business of banking, and, if so, whether, in the prosecution of such business, they had discounted the paper in question.

William H. Seward and Stephen A. Goodwin, for plaintiffs.

I. The purchase of the bills in question, by Morrison, as the plaintiffs' agent and at Cleveland, was a valid and legal transaction. 1. No place of business or location was prescribed for the plaintiffs by the laws of Ohio which have been cited, and they were not restricted to any particular place for doing their business. 2. Even though the plaintiffs may have been required to keep at Columbus their office for the redemption of their notes and the transaction of their ordinary banking business, yet they had a right to purchase bills of exchange, without restriction as to place, and to employ agents for the purpose. 3. The purchase of bills of exchange was no part of their banking business strictly. Swan's St. Ohio, 136; Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 563. 4. The transaction in question must be judged by itself, as an individual one, and, in this view, it is abundantly sustained upon authority. Bank of Augusta v. Earle, Id. 519; Tombigbee R. Co. v. Kneeland, 4 How. [45 U. S.] 16; People v. Brewster, 4 Wend. 498; Potter v. Bank of Ithaca, 5 Hill, 490, and 7 Hill, 530; Suydam v. Morris Canal & Banking Co., 5 Hill, 491, note a, and 6 Hill, 217. II. The legal title to the bills is in the plaintiffs, and they show a legal right to recover upon them, which the defendants cannot defeat by showing that they have forfeited their charter, even if that were true. 1. The paper is on its face business paper, accepted by the defendants, and, by legal inference, upon funds of the drawer in their hands. 2. The defence is not that the paper was void in its concoction, and the defendants being ex aequo et bono liable to pay it, it does not lie in their mouths to say that they will not pay their just debts on the ground that the plaintiffs had no power to buy exchange at Cleveland. That is a question between the plaintiffs and the government only. Little v. O'Brien, 9 Mass. 422. 3. The paper being negotiable paper, which they are liable to pay at all events to some one, it is immaterial who sues it. Mauran v. Lamb, 7 Cow. 174; Gage v. Kendall, 15 Wend. 640; Watervliet Bank v. White, 1 Denio, 613. III. The defendants' counsel, at the trial, presented the whole question to the court as a question of law, and did not ask to have it put to the jury as a question of fact, whether the plaintiffs had transferred their capital to Cleveland.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. The acts under which the bank became a corporation, conferred upon it the power to deal in exchange, without restriction, and hence the purchase of bills at the city of Cleveland, for the purpose of remitting the proceeds of paper belonging to the bank collected at that place, or even the dealing generally in exchange at that place by an agent, with the funds thus collected and remitted, was not in contravention of the charter of the bank, or of any law of the state of Ohio. I think this case falls within the principle of the cases of Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 519, and of Tombigbee R. Co. v. Kneeland, 4 How. [45 U. S.] 16, and that a new trial ought not to be granted.

CONKLING, District Judge. If, according to the true interpretation of the plaintiffs' charter, it in fact conferred on them no power to purchase bills of exchange at the place and in the manner stated in the bill of exceptions, then it follows that no title was in this instance acquired in virtue of such purpose, which can be enforced in a court of justice. It was from their charter that the plaintiffs, as a body corporate, derived their existence and their capacity to make contracts of any kind, and it is to this, therefore, that recourse must be had to ascertain the limits of their capacity, and thus to determine whether or not it extended to the contracts in question.

It is conceded that the plaintiffs had the power, granted to them by their charter, of buying and selling bills of exchange. But it is insisted by the defendants' counsel that, under this general grant of authority, the plaintiffs had no right to establish an agency for the purpose of dealing in bills of exchange, and by that means to carry on that business elsewhere than at Columbus, in the manner they are described by the witness Morrison to have done at Cleveland.

In answer to this objection it is argued in behalf of the plaintiffs, in the first place, that they are not by their charter restricted to Columbus as the place at which their franchise is to be exercised; but that they are at liberty to establish their bank at any place in the state of Ohio. This proposition, I think, cannot be maintained. It is essential to the convenience and security of the public that every bank should have a fixed, known and permanent place of business, where it is bound to fulfil all its engagements, and where those who have dealings with it may safely resort for the purpose of fulfilling theirs. Bank charters, moreover, are not granted for the benefit of stockholders, but for the sake of those engaged in the productive and in mercantile pursuits; and, though a bank may be wanted at one place, it may be unnecessary at another. Persons who apply to the legislature for a banking charter always deem it necessary, therefore, to designate the place at which it is proposed to establish their bank, and to set forth the need of banking facilities at that place; and a charter is granted or withheld according to the opinion of the legislature, respecting the truth or sufficiency of such representations. It may, I imagine, be safely added also, that bank charters are never intentionally granted with power to the corporators to select, ad libitum, their place of business. The legislature of Ohio, by the act of February 24th, 1845, evinced a strong degree of solicitude on this very point. The design of that act was to supersede the necessity of special legislation for the purpose of establishing banks from time to time, at places where they might be required, by providing prospectively for the voluntary formation of banking associations. But in order, as far as possible, to secure a proper distribution of these institutions, the act divides the state into twelve districts, and prescribes the maximum amount of banking capital which may be employed in each, and the maximum number of banks which may be established, not only in each of these districts, but also in each of the counties of which they are composed. It is true that the City Bank of Columbus was not formed under this act, nor did the act restrain the legislature of Ohio from disregarding its policy, by incorporating a bank ten days afterwards without a local habitation. But it is very improbable that this was intended to be done. A saving institution had already for several years been in being, carrying on its business, it is presumed, as its name indicates, at the city of Columbus. This institution, by the act of March 6th, 1845, was converted into a bank, under the name of the City Bank of Columbus, and unquestionably, without any intention of authorizing a change of location. But, in reality, this question is of little importance, for the bank was in fact established at Columbus, and it would be idle to assert that the corporation had a right at the same time to set up another bank at Cleveland. It is equally clear, also, that the legislature intended to place this bank, when organized, on the same footing in all respects as the "independent" (in contradistinction to the "branch") banks to be found under the act of February 24th, 1845. This design, indeed, appears to be sufficiently declared in the first and third sections, above recited, of the act of March 6th, 1845. It is very unlikely, moreover, that it should have been intended so soon to innovate upon a system so elaborately devised as that established by the preceding general act. The contrary presumption derives additional strength from the solicitude manifested in the 68th and 69th sections, by the inducements they hold out to bring the existing banks therein named under the provisions of the act.

It follows, therefore, that the question before the court depends upon the same principles that would govern it, if it concerned a bank formed under the general banking act of Ohio, instead of one owing its existence to a separate statute. This point, however, appears to me to be less important than it seemed to be considered by the counsel at the argument. It is true, the act of February 24th, 1845, evinces an anxious desire to secure a proper distribution of banking capital among the several districts and counties of the state; and it requires the several associations which may be formed under it, to designate beforehand the particular place at which they propose to establish their bank, and, having done so, limits them thenceforth to the place selected. But, it is to be recollected, that the act provides for the establishment from time to time of a great number of banks, without any further exercise of legislative discretion; and I am unable to discern in the scheme of distribution adopted, anything more than an attempt to do at once, prospectively, what the legislature would otherwise have been required to do by successive acts—that is to say, to adapt the supply of bank facilities in different parts of the state, to the exigencies of each, as far as they could be foreseen. Viewed in this light, those provisions of the act upon which so much stress was laid, ought to have no influence on the decision of the question before the court; for they impose no restrictions with respect to locality, not usually imposed by separate acts of incorporation, and import no state policy affecting the rights of the plaintiffs.

The question, then, is resolved into the simple inquiry whether a state bank, having power by its charter to deal in bills of exchange, without any express restriction as to place, can lawfully establish an agency, for the purpose of buying and selling bills of exchange, in a part of the state other than that of its location. It was argued, indeed, by the plaintiffs' counsel, that the purchases of these two bills of exchange, coming as they do separately before the court, are to be regarded as isolated acts, and, as such, free from objection, whatever might be thought of the right of plaintiffs to establish an agency at Cleveland for the purpose of dealing in exchange. But these purchases were shown by the witness Morrison to constitute parts of a series of similar acts, performed by him as the agent of the plaintiffs, by them constituted for this express purpose; and to adjudge all these acts to be severally lawful, and admit them at the same time to have been collectively contrary to law, would seem to be inconsistent. But, whether they are to be considered individually or collectively, unless it can be shown that a bank may lawfully do without, what it cannot lawfully do within the limits of the state whence it derived its corporate existence, the question before the court has already been authoritatively answered by the supreme court of the United States, in the cases of Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 519, and of Tombigbee R. Co. v. Kneeland, 4 How. [45 U. S.] 16. In the first of these cases the question was, whether a bank incorporated by the legislature of the state of Georgia, and established at Augusta in that state, having power conferred upon it in general terms by its charter to deal in bills of exchange, could lawfully buy bills of exchange in the state of Alabama, through an agent employed there for that purpose. The court decided that it could. The case was in all respects essentially like the present, except that in that case the bill of exchange on which the suit was founded, was purchased by the Georgia bank in another state, instead of a different place in the same state. The case decides, therefore, that if the City Bank of Columbus had employed its agent and purchased these bills at Mobile, instead of Cleveland, its title would have been indisputable. Is its title then to be held invalid, because the purchases were made within the limits of the state of Ohio?

A corporation is a legal entity, endowed with those faculties only with which the legislature have seen fit to invest it. The power to purchase bills of exchange is, by the statutes of Ohio, conferred on the plaintiffs, as it was by the statute of Georgia on the Bank of Augusta, in general terms, without restriction as to place. If this grant imports a capacity to deal in exchange, through an agent appointed for that purpose, in other states, by what sound principle of construction can it be maintained, that the grant confers no power to do the same thing in any part of the state of Ohio? If, indeed, the statute, while conferring the power, had also, in terms, forbidden its exercise within the state of Ohio, elsewhere than at Columbus, it may be conceded that this action could not be maintained; and it would then be impertinent to inquire, whether, notwithstanding this restriction, the plaintiffs might not, according to the doctrine of the case of Bank of Augusta v. Earle [supra], lawfully send an agent into another state to purchase bills of exchange. But, in the absence of any such restriction, I am unable to distinguish the present case from that. Indeed the principal question in that case was, not whether the bank possessed a more extensive power to make contracts out of the state of Georgia than within it, but whether it had the capacity to contract beyond the limits of that state at all. The question turned upon the comity of nations, supposed to be recognized by the laws of the several states with respect to each other, and upon certain provisions contained in the constitution of Alabama. It was, however, deemed necessary, before proceeding to the consideration of these points, to determine first the extent of the power to deal in bills of exchange, conferred on the bank by its charter; for, said the chief justice, in pronouncing the judgment of the court, "it may be safely assumed that a corporation can make no contracts, and do no acts, either within or without the state which creates it, except such as are authorized by its charter; and those acts must also be done by such officers or agents, and in such manner as the charter authorizes." After laying down this fundamental principle, the court proceeded to observe: "The charter of the Bank of Augusta authorizes it, in general terms, to deal in bills of exchange, and consequently gives it the power to purchase foreign bills as well as inland—in other words, to purchase bills payable in another state; and the general power to purchase bills, without any restriction as to place, by its fair and natural import authorized the bank to make such purchases wherever it was found most convenient and profitable to the institution, and also to employ suitable agents for that purpose. The purchase of the bill in question was, therefore, the exercise of one of the powers which the bank possessed under its charter, and was sanctioned by the law of Georgia creating the corporation, so far as that state could authorize a corporation to exercise its powers beyond the limits of its own jurisdiction." Now, it seems quite clear from this language, that the general grant of power to deal in exchange, contained in the charter of the bank of Augusta, was considered by the court sufficient to warrant the exercise of this power at any place within the state of Georgia, and that, if this had been found to be otherwise, all further inquiry would have been deemed unnecessary. But it is needless to dwell longer upon this point. All that was urged at the argument, to prove that the plaintiffs had unlawfully assumed to exercise their banking franchise through their agency at Cleveland, is fully answered by the case of Bank of Augusta v. Earle, and the other cases embraced in the same report; and especially by the subsequent case of Tombigbee R. Co. v. Kneeland, in which the doctrines of the former case were reasserted and more strongly applied.

My opinion, therefore, is, that the motion for a new trial ought to be denied.

Case No. 2,737.

CITY BANK OF COLUMBUS v. BEACH.

[1 Blatchf. 438.] [1]

Circuit Court, N. D. New York. Oct. Term, 1849.

ACCOMMODATION PAPER—APPLICATION TO PRE-EXISTING DEBT—ACTION ON ACCEPTANCE—PLEADING.

1. H. drew a bill of exchange on "B. & Co.," which B., one of the firm, accepted, for the accommodation of H., without restriction, and without the knowledge or consent of his copartners, and not in the course of the partnership business. The acceptance was made by B.'s writing the name of the firm on the bill. The bill, with the acceptance upon it, was discounted by the plaintiffs for H., and the proceeds applied in payment of paper then held by the plaintiffs on which H. was liable, the plaintiffs knowing at the time that the bill was accommodation paper: Held, that H. had a right to use the bill in payment of an existing indebtedness of his, as well as for the purpose of raising money, and that, although the plaintiffs were chargeable with knowledge of the character of the bill, they were bona fide holders of it for value.

2. The plaintiffs were entitled to recover on the bill against B. as sole acceptor; and that such recovery could be had under a count in the declaration stating the bill to have been drawn on "B. & Co.," and to have been accepted by B. by the name and style of "B. & Co.," by writing the name of "B. & Co.," thereon.

At law. Assumpsit, tried before Mr. Justice Nelson and Judge Conkling, in October, 1847, at Albany. The action was on two bills of exchange, each for $1,000, drawn by one Haskell, at Cleveland, Ohio, on "Messrs. Wm. Beach & Co., Auburn, N. Y.," payable at the Bank of Commerce in New-York, to the order of and endorsed by Haskell; one dated February 2d, 1846, and payable four months after date, and the other dated February 10th, 1846, and payable three months after date. The action was against William Beach as sole acceptor of the bills. In the first four special counts of the declaration the bills were stated to have been drawn on the defendant by the style and description of "Wm. Beach & Co.," Auburn, N. Y., requesting him by that name and style to pay the sums therein specified, and it was averred that he accepted the bills according to the usage and custom of merchants. In the last four special counts the bills were stated to have been drawn on Wm. Beach & Co., Auburn, N. Y., and to have been accepted by the defendant by the name and style of Wm. Beach & Co., and by writing the name of "William Beach & Co." thereon. At the trial, the corporate existence of the plaintiffs, (they being a banking corporation at Columbus, Ohio.) and the endorsements of the bills by Haskell, were admitted, and it was also admitted that the signatures, "William Beach & Co.," to the acceptances of the bills were in the handwriting of the defendant. The bills having been read in evidence, the plaintiffs claimed a verdict on them. The defendant insisted that the evidence did not support any one of the eight special counts, as the bills appeared on their face to have been drawn on the firm of William Beach & Co., and to have been accepted by the firm, whereas in the first four counts they were stated to have been drawn on the defendant, and in all the counts to have been accepted by him. On this ground the defendant moved for a nonsuit, but the court denied the motion. It was then admitted by the plaintiffs, that there was a firm of William Beach & Co., consisting of the defendant, of John C. Beach, and of Ebenezer S. Beach; and by the defendant, that the bills in question were accepted by the defendant individually, by writing thereon the name "William Beach & Co.," and that such acceptances were without the knowledge or consent of the other members of said firm, for the accommodation of Haskell, the drawer, and not in the course of any partnership dealings of the firm. The defendant then renewed his motion for a nonsuit, on the same grounds as before, and insisted further, that the plaintiffs could not recover under the common counts in their declaration, because the acceptance of a firm was not evidence, under the common counts, against one of the members of the firm; while the plaintiffs contended that the objection taken by the defendant should have been pleaded in abatement, and that, under the proof, the acceptances were the individual acts of the defendant. The court again overruled the motion. The defendant then proved by one Morrison, that, as agent for the plaintiffs, at Cleveland, Ohio, he discounted the bills in question, receiving them from Haskell, the drawer, and crediting him with the proceeds in payment of paper then held by the plaintiffs on which Haskell was liable; that Haskell then said that the two bills in question were to be paid by him; and that the acceptances were then upon the bills. On this evidence, the defendant requested the court to charge the jury, that if the bills in question were accepted without value for the accommodation of Haskell, and the plaintiffs or their agent had notice thereof when the bills were received from Haskell, the plaintiffs could not recover upon the proof in the case, although they paid full value for the bills. The court refused so to charge, but instructed the jury that it appeared from the evidence that the plaintiffs had acquired a valid title to the two bills in suit, to which refusal and charge the defendant excepted. The jury found for the plaintiffs, and the defendant now moved for a new trial, on a case.

[1] [Reported by Samuel Blatchford, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

William H. Seward and Stephen A. Goodwin, for plaintiffs.

I. The defendant's motions for a nonsuit were correctly refused. 1. The defence that there were other joint contractors, which was the substance of the objection, could only be set up by plea in abatement. Burgess v. Abbott, 6 Hill, 138; Gilman v. Rives, 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 298; Gow, Partn. 180; 1 Chit. Pl. 52, 53. 2. The defendant, having accepted the bills as accommodation paper, without the authority of his copartners, was individually liable on them. Laverty v. Burr, 1 Wend. 529; Green v. Beals, 2 Caines, 254; St. John v. Holmes, 20 Wend. 609; Tombeckbee Bank v. Dumell [Case No. 14,081]. 3. The bills were evidence under the common counts. Pierce v. Crafts, 12 Johns. 90; Cruger v. Armstrong, 3 Johns. Cas. 5; Mack v. Spencer, 4 Wend. 412; Barry v. Foyles, 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 311. II. The court was correct in its refusal to charge the jury, that if the bills were accepted without value, for the accommodation of Haskell, and the plaintiffs or their agent had notice thereof when the bills were received from Haskell, the plaintiffs could not recover upon the proof in the case, although they paid full value for the bills. A contrary rule to that contended for by the defendant has been established in the courts of the United States. Townsley v. Sumrall, 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 170; U. S. v. Bank of the Metropolis, 15 Pet. [40 U. S.] 393; Swift v. Tyson, 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 1. In New-York. Brown v. Mott, 7 Johns. 361; Grant v. Ellicott, 7 Wend. 227. In Massachusetts. Cole v. Cushing, 8 Pick. 48; Munroe v. Cooper, 5 Pick. 412; Fall River Union Bank v. Willard, 5 Metc. [Mass.] 221; Chickopee Bank v. Chapin, 8 Metc. [Mass.] 42; Pacific Bank v. Mitchell, 9 Metc. [Mass.] 301. In Pennsylvania. Knight v. Pugh, 4 Watts & S. 445; White v. Hopkins, 3 Watts & S. 99. And in England. Charles v. Marsden, 1 Taunt. 224; Collins v. Martin, 1 Bos. & P. 651, per Eyre, C. J.; Bank of Ireland v. Beresford, 6 Dow, 237, per Lord Eldon; Fentum v. Pocock, 5 Taunt. 192; Haly v. Lane, 2 Atk. 181; Morris v. Lee, 1 Strange, 629; Edwards v. Dick, 4 Barn. & Ald. 212; Bowyer v. Bampton, 2 Strange, 1155; O'Keefe v. Dunn, 6 Taunt. 305; Ex parte Marshal, 1 Atk. 131; Arden v. Watkins, 3 East, 325; Darnell v. Williams, 2 Starkie, 166; Atwood v. Crowdie, 1 Starkie, 483; Bosanquet v. Dudman, Id. 1; Watkins v. Maule, 2 Jac. & W. 237; Millis v. Barber, 1 Mees. & W. 425. And the same rule is laid down by elementary writers. Chit. Bills (9th Am. Ed.) 90, 245, 334; Bayley, Bills (5th Ed. 1830) 223, notes 16, 523, 524; 3 Kent, Comm. 86; Story, Bills, § 191, note 3, § 253.

Alvah Worden, for defendant.

I. The court should have ordered a nonsuit. 1. The averments in the first four counts, that the bills were drawn on the defendant by the style and description of Wm. Beach & Co., requesting him by that name and style to pay, were not proved, nor was it proved that the defendant accepted the bills. They were drawn upon and accepted by the firm. Mitchell v. Ostrom, 2 Hill, 520; Pope v. Barrett [Case No. 11,273]; Pease v. Morgan, 7 Johns. 468. 2. It is true, as stated in the last four counts, that the bills were drawn on Wm. Beach & Co., requesting them to pay, but it was not proved, as alleged in those accounts, that the defendant, by the name and style of Wm. Beach & Co., accepted the bills. Mason v. Rumsey, 1 Camp. 384; Wells v. Masterman, 2 Esp. 731; Dolman v. Orchard, 2 Car. & P. 104; Colly. Partn. (Last Ed.) § 410. 3. There was no necessity in this case, of pleading in abatement the non-joinder of the other members of the firm, because on such a plea the same issue would have been tendered that was made on the declaration. Id. § 401, note; Barry v. Foyles, 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 315; Cabell v. Vaughan, 1 Saund. 291b. II. Morrison, as the agent of the plaintiffs, received the bills from Haskell with full notice of their accommodation character, and under such circumstances as to take away from the transaction the character of a bona fide transfer. Grant v. Ellicott, 7 Wend. 227; Swift v. Tyson, 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 1; Chit. Bills (Ed. 1842) 80; Brown v. Taber, 5 Wend. 566; Bank v. Irvine, 3 Pa. St. 250; Grandin v. Le Roy, 2 Paige, 510; Griffith v. Reed, 21 Wend. 505; Charles v. Marsden, 1 Taunt. 224; Chit. Bills (Ed. 1842) 218, note r; Bayley, Bills (5th Ed.) 500, note 17; Martin v. Morgan, 1 Brod. & B. 289, 3 Moore, 635; Riley v. Johnson, 8 Hammond [Ohio] 526; Carlisle v. Wishart, 11 Ohio, 172; Cone v. Baldwin, 12 Pick. 545.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. Inasmuch as the acceptances of the defendant were without restriction, the drawer had a right to use them in payment of an existing indebtedness, as well as for the purpose of raising money; and, although the plaintiffs were chargeable with knowledge of the character of the paper, they were bona fide holders for value, and entitled to recover upon the bills.

The acceptances were made by the defendant without the privity or authority of the other members of the firm of William Beach & Co., and the plaintiffs were, therefore, entitled to recover against the defendant upon the bills, notwithstanding they were drawn upon the firm, and accepted in the name of the firm. There was, also, no variance, in contemplation of law, between the declaration and the proof, especially as it respected the last four special counts.

CONKLING, District Judge. A new trial is asked for by the defendant, on account of the refusal of the court, first, to grant a nonsuit, and secondly, to instruct the jury as requested by the defendant.

The principles of law which are to govern the decision of the court upon the facts of this case as they appear from the evidence and the admissions of the parties, are well established and obvious. The bills having been accepted by the defendant in the name of the firm of William Beach & Co., which is proved to have consisted of three persons, of whom the defendant was one, the plaintiffs had a right prima facie to sue those persons jointly; but, the acceptance having been given by the defendant without the knowledge and consent of his copartners, and purely for the accommodation of the drawer, they were entitled to repudiate the act, and would have had it in their power, by so doing, to defend themselves successfully against a joint action, unless it should appear that the plaintiffs took the bills without notice of the defendant's want of authority to use the partnership name. On the other hand, the defendant having, by his own act, made himself absolutely liable, the plaintiffs had a right also to proceed against him individually, at the hazard only, with a declaration properly framed, of being met with a plea in abatement of the non-joinder of the other partners. They have chosen to adopt this latter alternative, and no plea in abatement has been interposed. It is argued, indeed, that when, in an action ex contractu, it appears on the face of the declaration that there were other joint contracting parties who have been omitted, a plea in abatement is unnecessary, and it seems to be assumed by the counsel for the defendant that the mere form of the acceptance in the present case was sufficient to bring it within the operation of this rule. Conceding both the assumption and the asserted rule of pleading, it would follow, not that the defendant can avail himself, under the plea of the general issue, of the non-joinder of the other two partners, but only that it furnishes ground for a demurrer, or may be made the foundation of a motion in arrest of judgment. But the assumption cannot be admitted. No person except the defendant being named as constituting the firm of William Beach & Co., for aught that appears on the face of the declaration, the defendant alone may have chosen to transact his mercantile business under that name, or his acceptance, in point of law, (as in reality appears to have been the case,) might have been his own individual act, for want of authority to bind his copartners.

It is, however, further argued, that there is a fatal variance between the declaration and the proof. Admitting this to be so with respect to the first four counts, in which the bills are represented to have been directed to the defendant under the name and style of Wm. Beach & Co., I think it is otherwise with respect to the next four succeeding counts. The averment in these latter counts, that the bills were directed to Wm. Beach & Co., and were accepted by the defendant under that name, is according both to the facts, and to the legal effect of the transaction as disclosed at the trial. I am unable, therefore, to discern any variance between the four last special counts and the evidence adduced to support them; nor have I been able to find any precedent for a form of pleading, better adapted to the case than that which the plaintiffs have adopted.

It follows, therefore, to say nothing of the indisputable want of power in the courts of the United States to grant a nonsuit in any case against the will of the plaintiff, that the denial of the motions made at the trial for a nonsuit, and also the refusal of the court to give the instruction prayed for, were perfectly proper.

Case No. 2,738.

CITY BANK OF COLUMBUS v. FARMERS' & PLANTERS' BANK OF BALTIMORE.

[Taney, 119.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Maryland. Nov. Term, 1847.

RIGHTS OF HOLDER OF BANK-NOTE.

1. Where a bank-note is taken in the usual course of business, bona fide, and under circumstances which would not have excited the suspicion of a person of ordinary prudence and care in business, that it was lost by, or stolen from, the rightful owner, and was not the property of the person who then held it, the fact of its having been lost or stolen from the rightful owner, will be no defence to an action on the note brought by the person so taking it.

2. But such defence will be a good one, if the note were taken under circumstances which ought to have excited the suspicion of a person of ordinary prudence and caution, and led him to make inquiry before the note was taken by him.

Plaintiff's prayer: If the jury shall believe, from the evidence, that the plaintiff took the bank-note which is the subject of this action, for a valuable consideration, in the usual course of the plaintiff's business as a bank, fairly and bona fide, without notice or knowledge that said bank-note had been lost or stolen, or that any former holder had been illegally dispossessed of it, then the plaintiff is entitled to recover.

Defendant's prayer: Where a bank-note is lost or stolen, a party who seeks to make title to it against the owner, must show, not only that he has given value for it, but also that he took it under circumstances which were not calculated to excite the suspicions, in regard to it, of a prudent and careful man.

[1] [Reported by James Mason Campbell, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

J. Meredith, for plaintiff.
J. Mason Campbell, for defendant.

TANEY, Circuit Justice. The City Bank of Columbus is entitled to recover in this action, if the bank-note in question was taken for a valuable consideration, in the usual course of its business as a bank, bona fide, and under circumstances which would not have excited the suspicion of a person of ordinary prudence and care in business, that the note had been lost by, or stolen from, the rightful owner, and was not the property of the person who then held it. But if it was taken under circumstances which ought to have excited the suspicion of a person of ordinary prudence and caution, and led him to make further inquiry, before the note was taken, then the bank took it at its peril, and is not entitled to recover.

Verdict for the plaintiff.

Case No. 2,739.

CITY BANK OF NEW-YORK v. SKELTON et al.

[2 Blatchf. 14.][1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. March 2, 1846.

INTERPLEADER BY BANK — ENJOINING SUIT IN STATE COURT—ENJOINING PROSECUTION IN FEDERAL COURT.

1. Upon the general principles of equity jurisprudence, a bank may, in a proper case, have relief by bill of interpleader against separate and adversary parties who claim title to moneys therein deposited.

[Cited in Foss v. First Nat. Bank of Denver, 3 Fed. 190.]

2. This court has no power to restrain or interfere with a suit prosecuted and pending in a state court, by enjoining the further prosecution of such suit.

[Cited in Fisk v. Union Pac. R. Co., Case No. 4,827; Reinach v. Atlantic & G. W. R. Co., 58 Fed. 44.]

3. But this court, in executing a jurisdiction vested in it, may, in a case of which it has cognizance, act upon parties who are suitors in a state court in relation to the same subject matter, so far at least as to compel their submission to such judgment as this court may render in the case.

4. Where funds were deposited in a bank, and afterwards S., claiming the funds as his property, commenced a suit for their recovery in a state court against the bank and Y., the depositor of the funds, and, while that suit was pending, Y. commenced two suits in this court against the bank, to recover the funds and damages for their detention, the bank having no interest in the funds: Held, on a bill filed in this court by the bank against S. and Y., that although this court would not decree an interpleader in the case, or enjoin the suit in the state court, yet it would enjoin the prosecution by Y. of his suits in this court, until the final decision of the suit in the state court.

[Cited in Foss v. First Nat. Bank of Denver, 3 Fed. 190; Harrison Wire Co. v. Wheeler, 11 Fed. 207.]

5. This court would give the parties the option to consent by stipulation to interplead in this court on the subject matter, and, in case they did so, would allow the bank to pay the funds into court, first deducting such costs and expenses as the court should allow.

In equity. This was a bill in equity filed in December, 1845, by the plaintiffs, a banking corporation in the city of New-York, against Elizabeth Skelton and Mary Ann Frazer, citizens of the west coast of Africa, and Philip R. Yonge, a citizen and resident of Georgia. The facts were these: At the instance of Lot Clark, the plaintiffs, on the 5th of July, 1844, agreed to receive on deposit for safe keeping, for a short time, and until some conflicting claims in respect to them should be adjusted, certain bonds and moneys and a promissory note. Accordingly, the said Clark, Samuel L. Burritt and Erastus C. Benedict, (the latter acting, as was alleged, on behalf of the defendant Yonge,) deposited with the plaintiffs sixteen six per cent. bonds of the United States, amounting in the whole to $52,000, with coupons attached for the payment of interest, and a promissory note of one Gibbs for $1,000, and $2,490 in cash, said to be interest previously collected on the bonds. The plaintiffs' teller, who received the deposit, delivered to Benedict, with the knowledge and concurrence of Clark and Burritt, a bank book, commonly called a dealer's book, containing this entry. "City Bank, New York, in ac. with Philip R. Yonge. Bonds deposited for collection of the interest alone, no part of the said deposit, principal or interest, to be withdrawn before the first day of September next, unless Samuel L. Burritt, of E. Florida, shall in writing request said Yonge or his attorney to withdraw the same, or some portion thereof;" and then the particulars of the deposit were stated. About the 1st of August, 1844, three of the bonds, for $3,000 each, and the note of Gibbs, were withdrawn from the bank pursuant to the above condition; and the bank subsequently received, for interest on the remaining thirteen bonds, $2,580 in cash. The bill alleged that the plaintiffs continued to hold the said assets under such deposit, without making any claim to any part of them, and had always been and were ready and desirous to deliver the same to whosoever might be entitled to them.

In August, 1844, the defendants Skelton and Frazer, by the said Clark as their solicitor, filed a bill in the court of chancery of the state of New York, against the plaintiffs and the defendant Yonge, claiming the said assets and funds as their property, as legatees and heirs at law of John Frazer, deceased, representing that the said assets belonged to and were derived solely from his estate, of which the defendant Yonge was one of the executors, and that the executors had received other and sufficient assets to satisfy all the debts and specific legacies of the estate, and setting forth various other facts to show that the assets so deposited belonged to them and ought not to be paid over to the defendant Yonge, and praying an injunction against the plaintiffs and Yonge, and other appropriate relief. An injunction was issued by the state court, on the bill, and served on the plaintiffs, restraining them from parting with the bonds and money. They appeared in the suit and filed their answer in January, 1845, disclaiming all title to or interest in the assets, and offering to pay over the same as the court might direct. Yonge also appeared in that suit and answered the bill. The injunction was subsequently dissolved by the chancellor, leaving the subject-matter of the suit to be prosecuted between the parties as they might be advised; and the suit was still pending, undetermined, when this bill was filed. On the 3d of November, 1845, after the dissolution of the injunction, a notice in writing was served on the plaintiffs on behalf of the said heirs, to the effect that the said assets belonged to the said heirs, and that, if the plaintiffs should deliver them to Yonge, they would do so at their peril. On the 25th of November, 1845, Yonge commenced two suits at law in this court against the plaintiffs, one in trover and the other in assumpsit. In the former, he sought to recover the value of the said remaining thirteen bonds, with coupons attached; and, in the latter, damages for not delivering to him the said bonds, and for not paying to him the interest so collected thereon. Those suits, also, were pending, undetermined, when this bill was filed. The bill contained other averments usual in bills of interpleader, and prayed that the defendants might be decreed to interplead and settle their rights to the said bonds and moneys, or might proceed and determine them, if possible, in said suit in the state court of chancery; or that, on the discontinuance of the latter suit, the plaintiffs might be at liberty to pay over the assets to the parties on being indemnified by this court in so doing, or to pay the same into this court, to be disposed of as it might direct, on the discontinuance of said suit in chancery; that Yonge might be enjoined from prosecuting his suits at law, and Skelton and Frazer from prosecuting their suit in chancery; and that the plaintiffs, on paying the assets into court, might be discharged from all liability to the defendants in the premises, and have allowed to them all their costs and counsel fees in all the suits. A motion was now made, upon the bill, for provisional injunctions.

[1] [Reported by Samuel Blatchford, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

George William Wright, for plaintiffs.
Samuel Sherwood, for Skelton and Frazer.
Erastus C. Benedict, for Yonge.

BETTS, District Judge. Two questions have been discussed on this motion: (1.) Whether the facts establish a case for a decree of interpleader. (2.) Whether this court has jurisdiction to make such a decree.

The strong objection taken to the right of interpleader in this case is, that the plaintiffs received the deposit as bailees of Yonge, and became absolutely bound to him to return it at his call; and that the qualification in the deposit, that the written concurrence of Burritt should be necessary to a withdrawal of the deposit, operated only for a limited period, and ceased to have any effect after the 1st of September, 1844. Eminent judges speak of the doctrines respecting bills of interpleader as perplexing and not well defined. 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 814, and notes. The fundamental principle upon which relief by bill of interpleader is founded is, that two or more persons are claiming the same thing by different or separate interests, of a person who does not claim any interest therein himself, and does not know to whom he ought of right to surrender it, and that one or both have brought, or threaten to bring, actions against him. In such case, he may appeal to a court of equity to protect him from the vexation attending such suits, and also from being compelled to respond to several parties for the same thing. Id. § 806; 2 Kent, Comm. 567, 568; Jeremy, Eq. Jur. 347; Eden, Inj. (1st Am. Ed.) 242; Crawshay v. Thornton, 2 Mylne & C. 1; Atkinson v. Manks, 1 Cow. 691. The defendant Yonge insists that the rule does not apply to bailees or to bankers, but that they are bound by the general principles of law to restore to the bailor the deposit made with them. 2 Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 816, 817; Story, Bailm. § 110. But the cases which seemingly support that objection are counterbalanced by a weightier array of authorities, both English and American, to the contrary. 2 Kent, Comm. 566–568; Atkinson v. Manks, 1 Cow. 691; Schuyler v. Pelissier, 3 Edw. Ch. 191; Birch v. Corbin, 1 Cox, Ch. Cas. 144; Jeremy, Eq. Jur. 348. The rule has been directly sanctioned in the cases of funds deposit in a bank (Birch v. Corbin, 1 Cox, Ch. Cas. 144), and with a stakeholder (Id. 145); and it has been applied in behalf of a captain of a vessel, against whom there were adverse claims upon bills of lading (Lowe v. Richardson, 3 Madd. 277). Each of these cases is strong in analogy to the present one, and I should feel no difficulty in declaring, upon the general principles of equity jurisprudence, that a bank may be entitled to relief by bill of interpleader against separate and adversary parties who claim title to moneys therein deposited.

But there is an impediment to the enforcement of that principle by this court in the case now before it. One of the suits pending, against which the plaintiffs ask relief, is prosecuted in the state court of chancery, and this court is clothed with no power to restrain or interfere with a suit so situated. A court of the United States, in executing a jurisdiction vested in it, may undoubtedly act upon parties who are suitors in a state court in relation to the same subject matter, so far at least as to compel their submission to such judgment as the United States court may render in a case of which it has cognizance. But, even then, it cannot interdict their prosecuting their suit in the state court, much less control any action pending in such court. It is understood that the state courts uniformly adopt the same doctrine in respect to courts of the United States. Here it is to be assumed that the state court is competently possessed of the case before it, and a decree of this court compelling the plaintiffs and one of the defendants in that court to interplead here, would be an exercise of that authority and control over the state court itself which can only be allowed to a tribunal of general jurisdiction under the same government.

But the plaintiffs have made out a case of the most stringent equity against allowing Yonge to proceed in his suits in this court against them, while the suit brought by Skelton and Frazer is pending in the state court for the same subject-matter, and to which he is a party defendant. The conflicting rights of these two prosecuting parties are directly at issue in the suit in the state court, and that forum has full capacity to decide the right between them. There the controversy should be continued so far as these plaintiffs are to be affected, and, with the determination of that case, they should legally know to whom they can rightfully deliver over the funds in their possession.

I think the cases of Mallow v. Hinde, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 193, and Dunn v. Clarke, 8 Pet. [33 U. S.] 1, furnish a guide to the order proper to be made in this case. The former was a case similarly circumstanced to the present one, and is an authority that this court may, in its discretion, restrain the prosecution of the suits brought by Yonge, until he has had an opportunity to settle his controversy with Skelton and Frazer in the suit in the state court of chancery. I shall accordingly order an injunction to that effect, giving to the parties the option to consent, by stipulation, to interplead in this court on the subject-matter, and thus place it wholly under the control of this court.

NOTE [from original report]. Order. The bill in this case having been read, and counsel for the respective parties having been heard, and the premises being fully considered, and it appearing to the court that the plaintiffs hold the assets and funds in the bill mentioned for the true owner, without having or claiming any right or interest therein, and that they are ready and willing to deliver the same over to whosoever may have right thereto; and it appearing to the court that the defendants Elizabeth Skelton and Mary Ann Frazer have heretofore filed their bill in the court of chancery of the state of New-York against the plaintiffs and the defendant Philip R. Yonge, alleging the full right and title to the said funds and assets to be vested in and to belong to the said Skelton and Frazer; and it appearing to the court that the plaintiffs and the said Yonge entered their respective appearances in said suit in said court of chancery, and that said suit is still pending and undetermined; and it further appearing to the court that after such suit was instituted the said Yonge commenced in this court, in his own name, two separate actions at law against the plaintiffs, one in trover, in which he seeks to recover the value of the said funds and assets, and the other in assumpsit, in which damages are demanded for the detention of the said assets, and that the plaintiffs have appeared in the said actions, and the same are yet pending and undetermined in this court: It is, therefore, considered by the court that the plaintiffs are entitled to relief in this court in the premises; but, inasmuch as the suit instituted against the plaintiffs by the said Skelton and Frazer is prosecuted in the court of chancery of the state of New-York, and the proceedings before that tribunal are not within the cognizance of this court, or subject to its control, it is considered by the court, that so much of the prayer of the said bill as seeks an interpleader in the premises, and prays the same to be decreed by this court against the above named defendants, ought not to be granted, and it is, therefore, ordered, that the same be denied. It is further ordered, that an injunction issue, according to the prayer of the bill, against the said Yonge, restraining him from further prosecuting his said actions at law, or either of them, instituted in this court against the plaintiffs, until the final decision of the said suit pending in the court of chancery of the state of New-York, unless the said Yonge and Skelton and Frazer shall, within twenty days from the date of this order, file their stipulation in writing in this court, electing to interplead between themselves in this court, in respect to the subject matter aforesaid; and, in case of such interpleader between the said parties, it is ordered that the said plaintiffs thereupon pay into this court the funds and assets aforesaid, first deducting therefrom such their costs and expenses as shall be allowed them by the court.

[NOTE. For denial of a motion to dissolve the injunction granted by the foregoing order, see Case No. 2,740.]

Case No. 2,740.

CITY BANK OF NEW YORK v. SKELTON et al.

[2 Blatchf. 26.][1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. July 31, 1846.

JURISDICTION—ENJOINING SUITS—RIGHTS OF SUITORS IN FEDERAL COURTS.

1. This court has power, in a proper case, to prohibit a non-resident plaintiff from prosecuting an action against a defendant residing within this state.

2. A party entitled to sue in this court by reason of a constitutional qualification, acquires no right to any standing here different from what he would have in any other tribunal competent to take cognizance of his case.

3. Whenever, therefore, jurisdiction over his case has attached, this court will proceed with it conformably to the general principles of law, and to the usage and practice of the court.

4. The circuit courts of the United States have power to control and stay actions pending before them, either by order on the common law side of the court, or by injunction on the equity side.

5. But they will not exercise such authority over actions pending in a state court, nor will a state court interfere with actions pending in the federal courts.

[1] [Reported by Samuel Blatchford, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

6. The decision in this same case [Case No. 2,739], that this is a proper case for this court to stay by injunction an action at law pending here, reviewed and affirmed.

In equity. After the injunction in this case was granted [Case No. 2,739], the defendant Yonge answered the bill, and now moved for a dissolution of the injunction.

Erastus C. Benedict, for Yonge.
George William Wright, for plaintiffs.

Before NELSON, Circuit Justice, and BETTS, District Judge.

BETTS, District Judge. This motion is urged principally upon the ground that this court has no constitutional power to inhibit a non-resident plaintiff from prosecuting an action against a defendant residing within this state. The constitution, in designating the parties and subjects over which the courts of the United States shall take jurisdiction, does not prescribe the manner in which such jurisdiction is to be exercised. It of course devolves upon congress to regulate the mode of procedure by which the functions of the judiciary are to be executed. This is sometimes done by a specific direction to the courts, but most commonly by very general provisions, such as are embodied in the process acts, or in section 34 of the judiciary act of 1789 (1 Stat. 92). The equity powers of this court, and the practice by means of which such powers are enforced, are, by act of congress, made substantially the same as those of the high court of chancery in England. Act May 8, 1792, § 2 (1 Stat. 276); Robinson v. Campbell, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 212, 223. Whenever, therefore, jurisdiction over a case attaches by virtue of the constitution, the court proceeds with it conformably to the general principles of law prescribed by the statute, or established under authority derived from it; and, in this respect, the courts of the United States stand upon the same footing as those of this state or of Great Britain having general jurisdiction. A party entitled to sue by reason of a constitutional qualification, acquires no right to any standing in this court different from what he would have in any other tribunal competent to take cognizance of his case. Wherever he is entitled to resort for relief, he must take his remedy, not upon the footing of his capacity to sue, but conformably to the law and usage of the court. A suitor in this court must accordingly be subject to such regulation and control as the court, under authority of law, may deem proper to apply to his particular case, or such as may exist in the form of general rules of practice or decision.

This power of circuit courts to control and stay actions pending before them is distinctly recognized by the supreme court. Mallow v. Hinde, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 193; Dunn v. Clarke, 8 Pet. [33 U. S.] 1. In both of those cases, the suits at law stayed by injunction were pending on the law side of the circuit court; and, in the latter case, although the supreme court held that the injunction bill could not be maintained for the want of proper parties, yet they ordered a stay of the suit at law in the circuit court until the parties should have had time to seek relief from a state court. The stay of proceedings in the present case might, therefore, have been rightfully made by order on the common law side of the court, or the court may, on a proper bill, act on the equity side, and effect the stay by injunction.

The supreme court of the state of New York exercises a broad equitable power over suits and suitors, in staying proceedings on mere motion, when the justice of the case demands such interference. 3 Grah. Pr. c. 2. It is also a common head of equity to restrain suits at law by injunction from chancery whenever the relief at law is inadequate or imperfect, or whenever the court of chancery has cognizance of the case already, and is competent to give the parties full relief. Thompson v. Brown, 4 Johns. Ch. 619, 643; Denton v. Graves, Hopk. Ch. 306. And no doubt, if Yonge had instituted his actions in a state court of law, the chancellor would have enjoined their prosecution. But the courts of the United States will not exercise such authority over the state court (Diggs v. Wolcott, 4 Cranch [8 U. S.] 179), nor will the state court of chancery interfere with actions pending in the federal courts.

The case of Dunn v. Clarke, before cited, is full authority for staying proceedings in the actions at law in this court, to await the decision upon the subject-matter in the state court, the case here being clothed also with the additional feature, that the suit in the state court was first brought and is at issue there between the same persons who are parties to the suits here.

The power of this court thus to interfere being possessed in ample plenitude, we are satisfied that the facts of this case will warrant and indeed demand the exercise of that power. The motion to dissolve the injunction must, therefore, be denied.

Case No. 2,741.

CITY BANK OF RACINE v. BABCOCK.

[Holmes, 180.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Rhode Island. Nov., 1872.

POWER OF SALE BY PLEDGEE — CONDITION PRECEDENT — WAIVER BY ACT OF PLEDGOR.

1. Where the giving of a certain notice is made the condition precedent of the execution of a power of sale, and performance of the condition has been rendered impossible by the act of the party for whose benefit it was made, the power may be executed without the giving of the notice.

[1] [Reported by Jabez S. Holmes, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

2. Certain bonds were pledged by a bank as security for the performance of an agreement between the bank and the pledgee, and the pledgee was empowered to sell the bonds in case of breach of the agreement by the bank, on thirty days' notice to it of the intended sale, and credit the proceeds on a debt due from the bank. The bank afterwards failed, closed its place of business, and thereafter transacted no business, and had no office nor acting officers; and did not perform the agreement. About three years afterwards, the pledgee sold the bonds in good faith at their market value, without notice to the bank. Held, that the giving of the notice had been rendered impossible by the act of the bank, and that neither the pledgee nor its agent in the sale was liable for a conversion of the bonds.

C. Hart, for plaintiff.

B. R. Curtis and S. Curry, for defendant.

SHEPLEY, Circuit Judge. This is an action of trover, commenced by the plaintiff corporation, as trustee of Alfred W. Davison, for the alleged conversion of thirty-five bonds, each for the sum of one thousand dollars, with the interest coupons unpaid thereon, issued by the Racine and Mississippi Railroad Company; and for five bonds of the town of Rockton, in the state of Illinois, of one thousand dollars each; and a certain real-estate mortgage, specially described in the declaration. The conversion is alleged to have taken place on the thirty-first day of October, 1862. Defendant pleads nul tiel corporation, and also the general issue; and issue is joined upon both pleas.

The bonds of the town of Rockton, and the real-estate mortgage which was sold under a decree of court, need not be considered in this case, the conversion relied upon by the plaintiff being of the thirty-five bonds of the Racine and Mississippi Railroad Company.

It appears from the evidence that these bonds were pledged by the City Bank of Racine to the Phenix Band of Westerly, R. I., to secure the performance of a certain contract between the parties, and the payment of a note given by the City Bank to the Phenix Bank, for the sum of twenty thousand dollars, dated Oct. 1, 1856.

This contract was subsequently modified by a supplemental agreement, dated the third day of October, 1859, extending the payment of the principal sum to the third day of June, 1861, with interest to be paid semi-annually on the first days of October and April in each year. By the terms of the agreement, upon the failure of the City Bank of Racine to perform the conditions of the contract, or to pay the note or interest at maturity, the Phenix Bank had the right, upon giving thirty days' notice to the City Bank, to sell the securities at the Merchants' Exchange in the city of New York, or elsewhere, and credit the proceeds thereof, after the payment of all expenses thereon, to the indebtedness of the City Bank of Racine.

The City Bank of Racine failed, and closed its doors in the fall of 1859. Previous to its failure it had its office and place of business in the city of Racine. After its failure it had no office or place of business, and since that time has not transacted any business as a bank in any public manner.

On the 1st of October, 1859, a draft given to the Phenix Bank for the semi-annual interest due on that day was duly protested, and since that time no payment has been made of principal or interest by the bank.

On the 31st of October, 1862, the defendant, as president and agent of the Phenix Bank, sold the bonds of the Racine and Mississippi Railroad in the city of New York to Richard Irvin & Co., for the sum of $13,948.34, being twenty-five per cent. of the amount due on the bonds and interest coupons to that date.

No notice was given to the City Bank of the time and place of sale. The sale in other respects appears from the evidence in the case to have been made in good faith. The bonds were sold for their full market value at the date of sale. The purchasers of the bonds, representing a large amount of the other outstanding bonds of the road, purchased the balance, and subsequently, by the expenditure of large amounts of their own funds, extended and completed the unfinished and unproductive and insolvent railway which was mortgaged to secure the bonds, and thereby made that available as a security which had comparatively little value before, and thus greatly advanced the value of the bonds. But the evidence entirely fails to show that there was any collusion or unfairness or want of good faith at the time of sale, or that there was any sacrifice of the securities at a rate below their then market value.

The proceeds of the sale were duly credited on the indebtedness of the City Bank of Racine. After applying the proceeds of this sale, and of a subsequent sale made under a decree of court of the other securities, there still remained a large balance due to the Phenix Bank.

No tender has ever been made of payment of the debt, nor any action taken of any kind until after the lapse of many years, and after the additional value had been given to the bonds by the expenditures made by the purchasers.

The claim of the City Bank of Racine was subsequently transferred to Davison. The present action is brought in the name of the bank, for his benefit, against the president of the Phenix Bank. Plaintiff claims that by effecting the transfer and sale of the bonds as agent of the Phenix Bank, without notice to the City Bank of Racine, the defendant was liable for a conversion of the bonds, and for the highest price at which the bonds could have been sold prior to the commencement of the action, and that he is not entitled to offset the claim of the Phenix Bank against the City Bank of Racine.

On the plea of nul tiel corporation, the defendant contends that by the provisions of the statutes of Wisconsin, in force at the time of the failure of the plaintiff corporation, that corporation, by continuing insolvent for one year after its failure, and by suspending for three years thereafter its ordinary and lawful business as a banking corporation under the laws of Wisconsin, had thereby surrendered its rights and privileges as a corporation before the commencement of this action, and was and is incapable of prosecuting this suit. The provisions relied upon in the statutes of Wisconsin are not now in force, and during their existence do not appear to have ever received any judicial construction by the supreme court of the state of Wisconsin. In the view taken by the court, it becomes unnecessary to decide this question. In the opinion of the court, the defendant cannot be held to have converted the bonds by reason merely of the omission to give notice of the time and place of sale, under the state of facts proved in this case.

The Phenix Bank held the bonds in pledge, with a power to sell in case of failure to perform the contract. There was coupled with the power of sale a condition for the benefit of the pledgor, that the pledgee should give thirty days' notice before the sale. The performance of this condition became impossible by the act of the party for whose benefit it was made. For years before the sale (if the bank had any corporate existence, which is at least doubtful), it certainly had no place where, or acting officers upon whom, notice could have been served.

"It is a rule common to all conditions of obligations, that they be taken to be accomplished when the debtor who is obliged under such condition has prevented its accomplishment. 'Quicunque sub conditione obligatus curaverit ne conditio existeret, nihilominus obligatur.'" 1 Evans, Poth. 212; 2 Evans, Poth. 38; Hotham v. East India Co., 1 Term R. 638.

Mr. Justice Washington, in the case of Williams v. Bank of the United States, 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 102, states the rule thus: "If a party to a contract, who is entitled to the benefit of a condition upon the performance of which his responsibility is to arise, dispense with, or by any act of his own prevent, the performance, the opposite party is excused from proving a strict compliance with the condition."

The rule is one of general application. Wherever a precedent act is to be performed at a particular time or place, if the precedent act be a notice, and the party to whom the notice should be given has, by his absence, prevented it, if he be absent from the state, and has no known agent to receive it, and has no place of residence or business which reasonable diligence could discover, the law dispenses with the necessity of giving regular notice, and will not permit him to set up the non-performance of the condition as a bar to the liability imposed upon him by the contract.

The question whether the agent who acted merely as agent between the bank and the purchasers in effecting the transfers, and had no possession except as agent without any claim of title, should be held liable for a conversion, is one upon which there was great difference of opinion in the minds of the learned judges in the case of Fowler v. Hollins, L. R. 7 Q. B. 616; but we are not called upon to decide that question in this case, for we are clearly of opinion that the sale of the bonds upon the facts of this case did not constitute a conversion for which the Phenix Bank would have been liable, if the action had been brought directly against the bank.

Judgment for defendant.

CITY BANK OF ST. PAUL (VANDERHOOF v.). See Case No. 16,842.

Case No. 2,742.

In re CITY BANK OF SAVINGS, LOAN & DISCOUNT.

[6 N. B. R. (1873) 71;[1] 4 Chi. Leg. News, 81; 6 West. Jur. 65.]

District Court, D. California.

ASSIGNMENT OF DEBT BY CREDITOR OF INSOLVENT TO DEBTOR OF SAME—OFFSET.

A creditor of an insolvent who has reasonable ground to believe him to be such, can assign his demand to a debtor of the insolvent whose debt is not yet payable, so as to enable the latter to offset the demand so assigned to him against the debt due from him to the insolvent, the latter debt having become due and payable at the time the offset is claimed.

[Cited in Hitchcock v. Rollo, Case No. 6,535; Hovey v. Home Ins. Co., Id. 6,743; Lloyd v. Turner, Id. 8,436; Mattocks v. Lovering, 3 Fed. 213.]

HOFFMAN, District Judge. The question presented on the facts as developed by the evidence taken by the register, is whether a creditor of an insolvent who has reasonable ground to believe him to be such, can assign his demand to a debtor of the insolvent, whose debt is not yet payable, so as to enable the latter to offset the demand so assigned to him against the debt due from him to the insolvent, the latter debt having become due and payable at the time the offset is claimed. The register was of opinion that the debts and credits which it sought to offset against each other were not "mutual" within the meaning of the statute, inasmuch as at the time of the bankruptcy the debt owed by the bank was due and payable, while the debt to it was not.

The question whether a debt payable in futuro could be set off against a debt payable in praesenti was one of the earliest which arose under the English bankrupt act. It was decided in the affirmative on the ground that though there might not be debts mutually payable between the parties, there were mutual credits, and that the case came within the equity of the statute. Ex parte Prescot, 1 Atk. 230; Dobson v. Lockhart, 5 Term R. 133; Alsager v. Currie, 12 Mees. & W. 751; Ex parte Wagstaff, 13 Ves. 65; Sheldon v. Rothschild, 8 Taunt. 156; Atkinson v. Elliott, 7 Term R. 378; Robs. Bankr. 265. The same question has received a similar solution in the United States, under both the former and the present bankrupt acts. In Marks v. Barker [Case No. 9,096], it was held by Washington, J., that the acceptor or endorser of a bill of exchange who has paid the bill after the bankruptcy of the drawer, may offset the same against the bankrupt's assignees, the case being one of mutual credits given before the bankruptcy, although the money was not paid until after. In the case of Catlin v. Foster [Id. 2,519], Deady, J., after a careful consideration of the whole subject, held that a party who has acted under a deed of trust declared void, as being contrary to the provisions of the bankrupt act, may set off the value of the services rendered by him under the deed, against the claim of the assignees for property of the bankrupt received by him. In Fort v. McCully, 59 Barb. 87, cited in A. L. Reg., it was held that deposits made with a private banker, subject to the call of the depositor, are not to be deemed due until demand, and, therefore, if the banker transfers the depositor's notes before demand, the latter it seems, cannot enforce a set-off against the holder, either at law or in equity. But that where the banker being insolvent, made a general assignment, including the notes of the depositor whose deposit was not yet due, and directed his assignee to pay his debts in the same order and manner in which the estate of a bankrupt is required to be used and applied for the payment of debts proved and allowed under the provisions of the bankrupt act, the depositor was entitled to his set-off, and the assignee could only recover the balance after deducting the set-off.

[1] [Reprinted from 6 N. B. R. 71, by permission.]

These decisions seem not only the unavoidable result of the express terms of the bankrupt act, but necessarily required by considerations of reason and justice. By the nineteenth section, all debts existing, but not payable until a future day, may be proved against the estate (a rebate of interest being made when no interest is payable), and by the twentieth section, mutual debts and credits are required to be set-off against each other whenever the claim sought to be used as a set-off is "in its nature a debt not provable against the estate and has been purchased or transferred after the filing of the petition." A claim, therefore, for a debt provable against the estate, and transferred before the filing of the petition, falls within the very terms of the section. The rule thus established seems indispensable to the attainment of justice. "Natural equity," says Lord Mansfield, in Green v. Farmer, 4 Burrows, 2214–2220, "requires that cross demands should compensate each other by deducting the less sum from the greater, and that the difference only is the sum which can be justly due. But positive law, for the sake of the forms of proceeding and convenience, has said that each must sue and recover separately in separate actions." The civil law followed what Lord Mansfield declares to be the dictate of natural equity. 2 Evans, Poth. 98. And in England and most of the states of the Union, statutes of set-off have been enacted, allowing cross demands to be used as set-offs in specified cases; and even courts of common law have long been in the habit of allowing judgment to be set-off against each other. But even in those where the counter claim cannot be set up as a defence pro tanto to the action, the party holding it can sue and recover judgment upon it. The refusal to allow him to use it as a set-off leaves his right to enforce his demand unimpaired. But when a bankruptcy has occurred, the creditors' right of action is suspended. The whole estate of the debtor is taken possession of by the court, and the holder of an unsecured claim against it is entitled merely to his pro rata share of the assets. It would therefore be the height of injustice to compel a debtor of the bankrupt to pay to the assignee the full amount of his debt, while for a demand of equal or greater amount against the bankrupt he can only receive such dividends as the assets may afford. A similar injustice would be done to the estate of the bankrupt, (if offsets were not allowed,) where the creditor has also become bankrupt. For the estate of the creditor might receive dividends on the debt due him, while it might be insufficient to pay dividends of a like amount on the debts due by him. To avoid these results, liberal and comprehensive provisions for the allowance of offsets have been made in the bankrupt acts of England and America; but their object would be in a great measure defeated, if their operation were restricted to those debts only, which, at the time of the bankruptcy, were not only due but payable. The objection therefore that the debt of the debtor who seeks the benefit of the set-off was not payable until after the filing of the petition, must be overruled.

The second objection urged has more force. It is contended that the transaction was in its nature a fraud upon the bankrupt act; that its object and effect was to hinder or defeat its operation and to evade its provisions, by preventing assets from coming into the hands of the assignee, and by indirectly enabling a creditor to obtain full satisfaction of his demand by selling to a debtor of the bankrupt a claim to be used by him as a set-off. That such may be the effect of this transaction, if this set-off be allowed, I am not prepared to deny. But I am unable to see what authority this court has to prevent it. By the terms of the act, all mutual debts and credits must be set off against each other, and the balance only allowed or paid subject to two conditions: first, that the claim is in its nature provable against the estate; and second, that it has not been transferred or purchased by the debtor claiming the benefit of it, after the filing of the petition. This latter proviso contains an obvious negative pregnant, and implies a declaration that the claim may be used as a set-off, if acquired even by purchase, at any time before the commencement of the proceedings. Had congress seen fit to prohibit the acquisition of such claims, for the purpose of using them as set-offs by a debtor of a bankrupt who has reasonable cause to believe that the latter is insolvent, it would have been easy so to provide. But there is no such provision. And even if such a limitation upon the right to acquire or use a demand as a set-off had been imposed, it is reasonable to suppose that some period of time would have been fixed after which the transaction could no longer be questioned. By the thirty-fifth section, certain transfers intended to give a preference, or to hinder or delay the operation of the act, or to prevent the property of the bankrupt from coming into the hands of the assignee, are declared void, provided they have been made within four months and six months respectively before the filing of the petition. But if the court should declare in this case the transfer of the demand against the bankrupt void, and unavailable to the debtor as a set-off, for the reason that it would have the effect to give a creditor a preference, and to hinder and defeat the operation of the act, what period of time is it to assign within which the transfer can be avoided? Is it to adopt the period of four months, or six months, or some other arbitrary limitation? That some period of time should be fixed after which transfers analogous to this, and which the act pronounces void cannot be assailed, congress has clearly indicated.

It seems an unavoidable inference that if it had been intended to prohibit transfers like that in the case at bar, or rather to render them unavailable for the object intended, the act would not only have so declared in explicit terms, but a definite period would have been fixed within which its provisions should operate upon them; and that the court in the absence of any such provision, has no right to assume the legislative function by first declaring the transfer ineffectual, and then fixing an arbitrary period, after which it shall be held valid. The bankrupt act, moreover, being a special statute, and to a certain extent in derogation of rights existing at common law, or under state legislation, its provisions ought not to be construed under suggestions of its probable object, policy or spirit, to embrace cases not provided for by its terms. By the law of this state, and I presume of that of the most of the states, the claim set up in this case could be used by the debtor as a set-off in action brought against him by the bank. He who contends that it is made unavailable by the bankrupt act should point to some clear and unmistakable provision to that effect in the act.

It is also to be observed that by the amended insolvent law of Massachusetts, from which the provisions of the bankrupt act are in great part derived, the benefit of offsets acquired under circumstances like those of the case at bar was withheld. Congress, therefore, in omitting to incorporate that provision into the bankrupt act may justly be deemed to have intentionally declined to adopt it. It would seem, on the contrary, as if it had been designed in this particular to follow the English bankrupt act. The proviso in that act is as follows: "Provided that the party claiming the benefit of the set-off had not, when such credit was given, notice of an act of bankruptcy by such bankrupt committed." Under this proviso it was held, in an action brought by the assignees of certain bankers, that a party had a right to set-off notes of such bankers, taken by him after he knew they had stopped payment, but before he knew they had committed an act of bankruptcy. Hawkins v. Whitten, 10 Barn. & C. 217; Dickinson v. Cass, 1 Barn. & Adol. 343. And the act of bankruptcy must have been that on which the adjudication was founded, or one capable of sustaining it. Ex parte Birkett, 2 Rose, 71; Ex parte Sharp, 3 Mont., D. & D. 490; 8 Jur. 1012; Robs. Bankr. 272. But a debtor of this bankrupt will not be allowed to set-off a debt transferred to him after the bankruptcy, for the debt is to a third person, and the creditor cannot, after the bankruptcy, by a transaction with a third person, vary the relation in which he stood to the bankrupt at the time of the bankruptcy. Dickson v. Evans, 6 Term R. 57; Marsh v. Chambers, 2 Strange, 1234.

The rule established by these cases seems to have been adopted by congress in framing the provisions of the bankrupt act with regard to offsets. A debtor of the bankrupt is allowed to set-off a debt due to him from the bankrupt, provided it has been purchased by or transferred to him before the filing of the petition, i. e. before the bankruptcy. I think that these provisions must receive a similar construction to that given by the English courts to the closely analogous provisions of the English law. The objection is therefore overruled. It is also objected that the transfer of the debt sought to be set-off was not absolute, but conditional on the debtor's being allowed to avail himself of it. But I see no ground for this suggestion in the evidence. The claim of the depositor seems to have been regularly and formally assigned to the debtor of the bankrupt, and the latter appears to be the legal owner and holder of it. My opinion is that the offset claimed should be allowed.

CITY FIRE INS. CO. (SEMMES v.). See Case No. 12,651.

CITY INS. CO. (ROTH v.). See Case No. 12,084.

CITY INS. CO. (TROTT v.). See Case No. 14,189.

Case No. 2,743.

CITY NAT. BANK v. PADUCAH.

[2 Flip. 61;[1] 5 Cent. Law J. 347; 1 Thomp. Nat. Bank Cas. 300.]

Circuit Court, D. Kentucky. June 1, 1877.

TAXATION OF SHARES OF NATIONAL BANK ENJOINED — BANK A PROPER PARTY, WHEN — GROUNDS OF INJUNCTION IN SUCH CASES—RATE OF TAXATION OF NATIONAL BANK SHARES—DIFFERENCE OF TAXATION—RATES — DOUBLE TAXATION.

1. To a bill in equity a bank is a proper party complainant when it is sought to enjoin the collection of a tax upon its shares assessed against its stockholders, if it appear that the bank would be subjected to a multiplicity of suits and its business be interfered with, its stock be depreciated and its credit impaired.

2. An injunction may be had to stay the collection of a tax on personal property, if the enforcement of the tax would lead to a multiplicity of suits, or where the law authorizing the tax is invalid.

3. Where different rates of taxation are imposed under the laws of a state or municipal government upon different classes of moneyed capital, it is not lawful to tax the shares of national banks at the highest rate imposed upon any class, regardless of the proportion which that class bears to other classes; nor is it confined to the lowest rate upon any class. And where different rates of taxation are imposed upon different classes of moneyed capital the rate of taxation on national bank shares should not exceed the rate imposed upon shares in state banks.

4. The banking capital of Kentucky paid only fifty cents per share as a tax. One of the state banks was located in Paducah whose capital exceeded that of all the national banks there: Held, that an ordinance which imposed a tax of $1.05 per share nominally on all banks, but, from the payment of which the state banks had been adjudged exempt, was an unlawful discrimination against the national bank, and invalid.

5. Where other moneyed capital was also taxed $1.05, but a reduction of the whole amount of the owner's indebtedness was to be made before the assessment, and no such deduction was allowed where the capital consisted of national bank shares, the tax upon such shares was declared invalid.

6. It was further held that as the value of the real estate held by the bank was not deducted, it was subjected to double taxation, and the tax was invalid.

Bill filed against the city and tax collector of Paducah to enjoin the collection of a tax upon national bank shares. The legislature in 1867 passed an act to tax the shares of national banks, but provided that the same should not exceed that upon state bank shares. The amount so assessed under the state law was fifty cents per share. This amount complainant had paid for years to the state on its shares.

The city of Paducah in 1871 levied a tax of $1.05 on all bank shares. This was under the provisions of an ordinance passed by its common council, deriving its authority from the amended charter. The tax applied to state as well as national banks, but the courts of Kentucky decided that as to the state banks the tax was invalid. This tax was assessed for the year 1875, and the books were in the collector's hands when this bill was filed.

C. S. Marshall, L. D. Husbands, J. W. Bloomfield, and Henry Burnett, for complainant.

J. Q. A. King, J. C. Gilbert, James Campbell, Jr., W. D. Greer, and E. W. Bagby, for defendants.

BROWN, Circuit Justice. Upon the threshold of this case, we are confronted with the objection that, inasmuch as the tax in question is laid upon the individual shareholders, the bill cannot be maintained in the name of the bank; that the suit is one which concerns the stockholders only, and that they are the only proper parties complainant. Though this question has been raised before the supreme court several times, it has never been directly passed upon. In Dows v. City of Chicago, 11 Wall. [78 U. S.] 108, the bill was filed by a stockholder simply upon the ground of the illegality of the tax. The bank itself filed a cross-bill, also alleging the illegality of the tax assessed on various grounds; and averring that if the share were permitted to be sold, irreparable injury would not only be done the shareholders, but also to the bank, which would be thereby subjected to great loss of standing, and other injury, for the redress of which the law afforded no remedy; and that such also would be the result if the bank paid the taxes, and was subject to suits by each of the shareholders by reason of so doing; and that in either event a multiplicity of suits would be rendered necessary to adjust the rights of the parties. A demurrer was interposed to both bills, and both were dismissed; the original bill because it was based solely upon the ground that the tax was illegal, and the cross-bill because it must share the fate of the original. The court intimated, however, that if the cross-bill had been an original bill, with like averment, it might have been sustained, to avoid a multiplicity of suits. The question appears to have been fully argued in Tappan v. Merchants' Nat. Bank, 19 Wall. [86 U. S.] 490, under an allegation in the bill similar to the one under consideration, and to have been ruled by the circuit court of northern Illinois in favor of the jurisdiction. Union Nat. Bank v. Chicago [Case No. 14,374]. In the supreme court, the case went off on another point, and the court expressly declined to pass upon this question. The only case I have found in which the jurisdiction was denied is that of the First Nat. Bank of Hannibal v. Meredith, 44 Mo. 500, where, notwithstanding the taxes were assessed against the bank and sought to be collected by seizing and selling all the shares comprising the capital stock, the court declined to interfere on the ground that an injunction to restrain the collection of the tax was not the proper remedy, unless the sale of the property was accompanied by irreparable damage. Incidentally, the court remarked, that the plaintiff had no equity, for the reason that its property was not in jeopardy; that the bank, as a corporation, would lose nothing if the shares of its stockholders were sold, and that its shareholders, if any one, were entitled to relief. The point, however, does not seem to have been maturely considered, and, indeed, it is doubtful whether the petition in that case, charging as it did, not an impending multiplicity of suits, but that the sale of the shares, would greatly damage the bank, by impairing its credit and stability, and injuring the owners of the stock, by casting a cloud over the title and destroying its convertibility, made out a case for relief.

[1] [Reported by William Searcy Flippin, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

The bill under consideration alleges, and the evidence meets, substantially, the averment, that the city is threatening to sue the bank and each of its stockholders, in separate suits, and will, unless restrained, sue out attachments garnishing the bank and attaching the stock of the shareholders, involving the plaintiff in a great many petty suits; breaking down the business of the bank, depreciating its stock, bringing endless confusion on the ownership of the same, injuring the credit of the bank, putting a cloud upon the same, and doing it an irreparable injury. That if the bank pays these taxes, the stockholders will sue it, and in either event, a multiplicity of suits will result. Upon the whole, I think the bank is so far the trustee of the stockholders, and the custodian of the dividends that it is entitled to maintain the bill. It might be subjected to great annoyance by stockholders, who denied the legality of the tax, and gave the bank notice that it would pay it at the peril of being sued by them. It is certainly no hardship to permit the whole question to be litigated in a single action.

We assume in this connection that all the stockholders in this bank, each having the same ground for relief, and the same defense being applicable to all, might have united in a single bill without multifariousness. Cooley, Tax'n, 545. This being so, we see no objection to the bank maintaining a like bill as trustee for the entire body of stockholders. We should feel inclined to go to the limit of the law in sustaining a practice so convenient, and, so far as we can see, so unobjectionable.

It is also insisted that a remedy by injunction cannot be invoked in this case. While it is freely conceded that a court of equity has no general power to restrain the collection of taxes for any irregularity of assessment, or for overvaluation or unjust discrimination, and that to sustain a bill the case must be brought within some acknowledged head of equity jurisdiction, we think this exigency is met in either of the two following cases:

1. Where the enforcement of the tax would lead to a multiplicity of suits; or

2. Where the law authorizing the tax is itself invalid.

Upon the first ground the interference of a court of equity was held proper in Heywood v. City of Buffalo, 14 N. Y. 534, and in Dows v. City of Chicago, 11 Wall. [78 U. S.] 108, 111. The opinion in that case received the sanction of the supreme court of the United States. The second ground of interference was also recognized by the supreme court in the same case, approving Cook Co. v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co., 35 Ill. 465. In the case of Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Frary, 22 Ill. 34, speaking of exceptions to the general rule, that a court of equity will not interfere, it is observed, "Those exceptions are confined almost, if not entirely, to cases where the tax is unauthorized, or it is assessed upon property which is not subject to the tax. The case of Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. McLean Co., 17 Ill. 291, fell within the latter exception. The same rule is practically affirmed in Munson v. Minor, 22 Ill. 601, and Center & Warren Gravel Road Co. v. Black, 32 Ind. 471. In Warden v. Board of Sup'rs, 14 Wis. 618, an exception is mentioned of objections which go to the very groundwork of the tax assessed, so as to affect materially its principle and to show it must necessarily be illegal. "Where it appears that the established principle of taxation has been violated, and that actual injustice will ensue, or that the tax is levied for an unauthorized purpose, of course equity will interfere in proper cases, to prevent the wrong." See High, Inj. 195–200. Both of the reasons above given for the exercise of equity jurisdiction, are apparent in this case, and we think the complainant has not mischosen its remedy. While in a case of over-valuation, or unjust discrimination an appeal to the supervising officers might correct the error, they would have no power in a case like this to question the validity of the ordinance by virtue of which the tax was assessed.

Coming now to the vital point in this case, viz.: The validity of the legislation by which the tax in question was imposed, we find the general proposition firmly established, that banks organized under acts of congress are regarded as fiscal agents of the government and exempt from taxation, except as congress may specially authorize it. McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 416; Weston v. City of Charleston, 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 448; Farmers' Bank v. Dearing, 91 U. S. 34.

In the organization of national banks, congress has given a qualified authority for state taxation in the following section of the Revised Statutes:

Sec. 5219. "Nothing herein shall prevent all the shares in any association from being included in the valuation of the personal property of the owner or holder of such shares, in assessing taxes imposed by authority of the state within which the association is located; but the legislature of each state may determine and direct the manner and place of taxing all the shares of national banking associations, located within the state, subject only to the two restrictions, that the taxation shall not be at a greater rate than is assessed upon other moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens of such state; and that the shares of any national banking association, owned by nonresidents of any state shall be taxed in the city or town where the bank is located and not elsewhere. Nothing herein shall be construed to exempt the real property of associations from either state, county or municipal taxes to the same extent, according to its value, as other real property is taxed."

While the section in question would not be open to construction if the entire moneyed capital of the state, in the hands of individuals, were taxed at a uniform rate, the interpretation to be put upon it, where different rates of taxation are imposed upon different classes of moneyed capital, is not free from doubt. Has the state a right to tax the shares of national banks at the highest rate imposed upon any class of moneyed capital, regardless of the proportion which that class bears to other classes? On the other hand, is it confined to the lowest rate imposed upon any class of moneyed capital, with like disregard of the relative amount of the different classes? The last question is answered directly, in the case of Hepburn v. School Directors, 23 Wall. [90 U. S.] 480, in which it was proved that mortgages, judgments, recognizances and moneys owing upon articles of agreement for the sale of real estate were exempt from taxation in a certain district, except for state purposes. This was held a partial exemption, and it is said it cannot be the intention of congress to exempt bank shares from taxation, because some moneyed capital was exempt. Suppose, however, there were in a certain district a very small amount of moneyed capital of one species and a very large amount of another; that the former was heavily taxed and the latter exempt altogether, would the municipality be authorized to tax the shares of national banks at the rate imposed upon the former? Suppose, for example, that state banks, exempted from taxation, absorbed three-fourths of the "other moneyed capital" of a certain city, and the remaining one-fourth was heavily taxed, would it not be not only an unjust discrimination but a mere evasion, to tax the shares of national banks at the rate imposed upon the taxed quarter? These questions have never been definitely settled, but bearing in mind that the obvious intention of congress was to permit taxation, but to inhibit unjust discrimination, it would seem the answer would be easy. I regard the true construction to be this: That when by local legislation different rates are prescribed for different classes of moneyed capital, the rate imposed upon shares in national banks should approximate as closely as may be to the rate imposed upon other moneyed capital of the same or similar class, viz., shares of state banks. While this rule might be subject to qualifications in localities where the capital of state banks bore a very small proportion to other moneyed capital, and the exemption was intended as a bounty, I think it furnishes, as a general rule, a safe guide to the validity of the tax.

It is urged, however, that the course of legislation upon this subject repels the inference here drawn from the language of the section, and shows, affirmatively, that congress intended to permit the states to discriminate in favor of their own banks, by repealing a proviso inhibiting such discrimination, originally annexed to the section in question. The 41st section of the original act of 1864 (13 Stat. 112) provides that "nothing in this act shall be construed to prevent all the shares in any of the said associations, held by any person or body corporate from being included in the valuation of personal property of said person or corporation, in the assessment of taxes imposed by or under state authority, at the place where such bank is located, and not elsewhere; but not at a greater rate than is assessed upon other moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens of such state: provided, that the tax so imposed under the laws of any state, upon the shares of any of the associations authorized by this act, shall not exceed the rate imposed upon the shares in any of the banks organized under authority of the state where such association is located: provided, also, that nothing in this act shall exempt the real estate of associations from either state, county or municipal taxes, to the same extent, according to its value, as other real estate is taxed." In 1868 a short act was passed (15 Stat. 34) not amending, but explanatory of the 41st section, entitled, "An act in relation to taxing shares in national banks." The language is as follows: "That the words 'place where such bank is located, and not elsewhere,' in section 41, etc., shall be construed and held to mean the state within which the bank is located, and the legislature of each state may determine and direct the manner and place of taxing all the shares of national banks located within said state, subject to the restriction that the taxation shall not be at a greater rate than is assessed upon other moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens of such state: and provided always, that the shares of any national bank owned by non-residents of any state, shall be taxed in the city or town where said bank is located, and not elsewhere." The intent of congress was manifest. A difference of opinion had arisen with regard to the meaning of the words "place where the bank is located," and in some states the assessing officers were taxing the shares in the town or city where the bank was located, notwithstanding that the owner lived in a different town or city in the same state. To define the meaning of these words was the sole object of the act of 1868. This is evident, not only from the language of the act itself, but is an actual fact—(though possibly it is not a legitimate argument here)—as appears from the remarks of the chairman of the committee which reported the bill. See Cong. Globe, 2d Sess., 40th Cong. p. 921. The two provisions in the original act were neither of them alluded to in the act of 1868, although out of abundant caution the words "the taxation shall not be at a greater rate than is assessed upon other moneyed capital" were repeated, and an entirely new proviso added, that the shares of non-residents should be taxed in the city where the bank was located. There is certainly no express repeal of the two provisos in the original act, and nothing from which an implication of repeal can arise. Were it not for the Revised Statutes, I should hold both the provisos in the act of 1864 to be still in force. I am aware that in the case of Lyonberger v. Rouse, 9 Wall. [76 U. S.] 468, Mr. Justice Davis indicates an opinion that under the act of 1868 the power of state taxation was subject only to the restriction that "the taxation shall not be at a greater rate than is assessed upon other moneyed capital;" but the point does not seem to have been argued, and was unnecessary to the decision of the case. In the revision, the second proviso, that the real estate of the bank should remain subject to taxation, is retained; while the first, limiting the tax expressly to the rate imposed upon the shares of state banks, was omitted. If there were anything in the act of 1868 which could be construed as a repeal of the first proviso, I see no reason why it should not operate also as a repeal of the second; but, as observed before, I think the two acts should have been construed harmoniously, and the restriction in the act of 1868 should not have been regarded as exclusive as those in the former act, while the omission of the first proviso in the Revised Statutes undoubtedly operates, under section 5596, as a repeal of such proviso; yet considering the manner in which the repeal was affected, I think no intent can be inferred on the part of congress, thereby affirmatively to permit states to subject the shares of national banks to a greater rate of taxation than they impose upon state banks, if any such intent could ever arise from the repeal of a prohibitory clause. So far as the question arising in this case is concerned, section 5219 should be construed precisely as if no prior legislation on the same subject had been had.

The ordinance of Paducah nominally imposed a tax of $1.05 upon all banks within its limits, state as well as national, but as there is but one state bank in the city, viz., the Commercial Bank, which is exempt from taxation beyond fifty cents per share, and a possible tax of fifty cents on each hundred dollars of its contingent fund, which seems never to have been collected, the tax is really applicable only to the three national banks, the aggregate capital of which is less than the capital of the Commercial Bank. It is true an attempt was made to assess the same tax upon the Commercial Bank, but an injunction against its collection appears to have been granted and perpetuated by the state court. I feel authorized then, to treat it as exempt from this tax. That the Commercial Bank is not exceptionally favored in this particular, is shown by the certificate of the auditor of public accounts of the state, which is in evidence and exhibits a complete list of all banks doing business under the laws of Kentucky. They are fifty-three in number, having an aggregate capital of $12,473,641.50, and each pays the state a tax of fifty cents on every hundred dollars of its capital, in lieu of all other taxes, though there are slight variations in the different charters. If there are any state banks, the taxation of which is not regulated by their charters, they fall within the general provision of chapter 92, article 2, section 1, "on bank stock, or stock in any moneyed corporation of loan or discount, fifty cents on each share thereof, equal to one hundred dollars." The result is the same in either case, a few apparent exceptions being set forth in the answer; but practically the entire banking capital of the state is subject to a tax of fifty cents per share on one hundred dollars, in lieu of all other taxes. If the city of Paducah may tax national banks at $1.05 per share for the year 1875, it may increase the tax at any time to $2.50, the amount authorized by the legislature, and to as much greater an amount as the legislature may hereafter see fit to authorize. It was conceded upon the argument that the tax for 1877 had been increased to $1.40. Indeed, the legislature may authorize like taxation by every municipality in the state, while the state banks under their special charter will escape the burden altogether. Certainly here is a large discrimination in favor of state banks. I am not unmindful in this connection of the case of Lyonberger v. Rouse, above cited, nor of the case of Hepburn v.

School Directors, 23 Wall. [90 U. S.] 480, in which it was held that the exemption of small amounts of moneyed capital, in particular cases, would not invalidate the tax, if the great body of moneyed capital was subjected to it. In both these cases, however, the amount exempted was small in proportion to the aggregate amount of moneyed capital, and the great mass of moneyed property was subjected to the same tax levied upon the shares of national banks. It is true that the fifty-three state banks in Kentucky are not chartered by general law, but by special acts in each case; but this seems to me to make no difference. The fact remains that practically the entire banking capital of the state pays a tax of fifty cents in lieu of all other taxes, even upon its real estate. The law will look, not at the manner in which the tax is imposed, but at the result of the system. A like answer may be made to the argument that many of these state charters have expired, and that in renewing them the power to increase the taxation is reserved. This power never seems to have been exercised.

It is insisted, however, that although the legislation in question may discriminate in favor of state banks, there is no discrimination against national banks, inasmuch as "all other moneyed capital, in the hands of individuals," except shares in state banks, pays the same tax. Under the general laws of Kentucky (and the charter of Paducah adopts the same rule of assessment) property subject to taxation is listed in five classes:

1. Real estate; 2, horses, mules and the like; 3, cattle; 4, watches, plate, clocks, pianos, vehicles and harnesses; 5, "the assessor after having taken the lists of all property required to be taken listed as above, shall require each person on oath to fix the amount he or she is worth from all other sources on the day to which said list relates, after taking out his or her indebtedness from said amount; and the said assessor shall take from the said amount the sum of one hundred dollars, and list the balance for taxation." This section includes all property not exempt or previously mentioned, such as spirituous liquors, the produce of mines, farms, forests, manufactures, notes, accounts, bonds, bills of exchange and choses in action, debts and demands of every kind, but does not include bank stock. The whole amount of this fifth class, in which "other moneyed capital" is included, in the city of Paducah, is shown by the assessor's books to be in all $303,865. From this must be deducted all which is not moneyed capital. The residue, consisting of money on deposit, notes, bonds, mortgages, judgments and other choses in action, is the only "other moneyed capital," and the amount of this it is impossible to ascertain, as it is nowhere listed or taxed as such. A liberal estimate would probably not place it over $200,000. Upon this the tax of $1.05 is imposed, subject, however, to a deduction of all the indebtedness of the tax-payer. If, then, the property of the tax-payer consists of national bank stocks, purchased by him and for which he has given his note for the full amount, he pays, notwithstanding, the tax of $1.05 per share; but if his property consists of any other moneyed capital, and his debts are equal to the value of the capital, he pays nothing. It is true, exact uniformity can never be attained, but the law requires at least an approximation to it, else the proviso in the Revised Statutes is useless. While the tax is legal, if laid at the same "rate" as other moneyed capital is taxed, (and it may be said to be uniform if the rate is uniform,) yet uniformity of rate presupposes uniformity of valuation. If, for instance, state bank stocks were appraised at their par value and national bank stocks at their cash value, there would be no real uniformity of rates, though the percentage might be the same in both cases, since the cash value might be half or double the par value. This principle is recognized in Railroad Tax Cases, 92 U. S. 611, where the tax was sustained upon the ground that the rate imposed on railroad property was no greater than that upon other property, and the valuation was assessed upon the same principle which was applied to the property of individuals. Although by the term "moneyed capital" in section 2519, is meant taxable moneyed capital, yet this must be understood only as distinguishing a class of capital which is taxable from another, which, from motives of public policy, is exempt. All moneyed capital listed under the fifth subdivision of the equalization law belongs to the class of taxable moneyed capital, made the basis of comparison in section 2519; but if in the hands of "A." this capital is taxed, and in the hands of "B." it is not taxed, because he is in debt to its full value, like discrimination should be made if this capital consists of national bank stock, or the tax is not uniform. The legislature may discriminate among different classes of capital without violating the requirements of uniformity, yet as between individuals of the same class the burden must be laid equally. It cannot tax A. and exempt B., if the property is of the same class. Now the act of congress classifies national bank stock with other taxable moneyed capital, and inhibits discrimination against it and in favor of other moneyed capital. If a deduction of debts is allowed in one case, it should be in the other, or there is no uniformity.

Nor is this discrimination likely to work a hardship only in rare instances. Most business men, among whom bank stock is principally owned, are more or less indebted, and the system which permits the debts of one to be deducted and not those of another can hardly be said to be uniform. It is true the deduction of this indebtedness may be practically impossible so long as the shares of banks are listed under the equalization law above quoted; but this is an argument to show, not that the tax is uniform with that levied upon other moneyed capital; but that the rule announced earlier in this opinion, that the taxation of national banks should conform to that of state banks, is the only one under which taxation can be practically and uniformly imposed.

Another want of uniformity exists in the fact that no provision is made for the deduction of the value of real estate from the aggregate value of the shares. The laws of Ohio, and it is believed of other states, require the appraised value of the real estate to be deducted from the actual total value of the shares before they are listed for taxation. Without such provision, a double tax is paid upon the value of the real estate, from which other moneyed capital is exempt.

I lay no stress upon the deduction of one hundred dollars allowed by the equalization law, or upon the fact that shares owned by colored people may be taxed for the support of common schools in violation of the law applicable to other moneyed capital. These exemptions fall within the rule laid down in Hepburn v. School Directors, supra, and Everitt's Appeal, 71 Pa. St. 216, and do very little to disturb the practical uniformity of the law. De minimis non curat lex.

But from whatever point of view this case is considered, the fact is apparent, that by the ordinance of Paducah a large tax is imposed upon the shares of national banks, from which the banking capital of the state is wholly exempt; and though the percentage is nominally the same, the tax is far more onerous than that laid upon other moneyed capital in the city. For these reasons, it seems to me the legislation is in conflict with the act of congress, and therefore invalid.

A decree will be entered perpetuating the injunction.

CITY OF.

[Note. Cases cited under this title will be found arranged alphabetically under the names of the cities; e. g. "City of Brownsville v. Cavazos. See Brownsville v. Cavazos."]

Case No. 2,744.

The CITY OF BALTIMORE.

[5 Ben. 474;[1] 5 Amer. Law T. 25.]

District Court, S. D. New York. Jan., 1872.

MARINE TORT—RUNNING OVER A SEINE—NEGLIGENCE.

1. A steamship, coming into New York, in charge of a pilot, ran over a seine, in which had been inclosed a quantity of fish which are caught for the manufacture of fish oil and guano. A libel was filed against her, to recover damages: Held, that, inasmuch as it appeared that the steamship was in a regular course of navigation, and that the seine was in such a part of the channel that, if the steamship had deviated to go around it, she would have been in danger of grounding, the seine was an obstruction to navigation;

2. As the seine was put in the way while the ship was in sight, coming in, and as no negligence was shown on the part of the ship, the libel must be dismissed.

In admiralty.

Smith & Cole, for libellants.

J. W. Gerard, Jr., for claimants.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. The libel alleges, that, on the 21st of October, 1869, the libellants were the owners of a vessel, fitted up as a manufactory of fish oil and guano, at Sandy Hook, and employed constantly in said business about forty-five laborers, and were also the owners of a large seine, employed by them, in taking the fish used in the factory; that, on that day, while the laborers were employed with the seine in the ocean, opposite Sandy Hook, and after they had secured a large number of fish in the seine, and were taking them out, the steamship City of Baltimore, negligently and wilfully and wantonly, came upon them, ran over the seine, tore it in pieces and let out the fish; that this occurred in the day time, and on the open sea; that the seine was in no channel where it was necessary for the steamship to go; that there was no negligence on the part of the laborers; that the damage to the seine was $200, the number of fish secured at the time, and thus lost, was 50,000, and their value $300, and there was a further loss of $500, in the suspension of the libellants' business, while the seine was being mended.

The answer avers, that the steamship was at the time completing a voyage from Liverpool to New York, and pursuing the regular and ordinary channel from Sandy Hook to the city of New York, in charge of a duly licensed pilot, and, if she came in contact with the seine, it was owing to its being in the channel, in an unlawful and improper place, and any loss occasioned to the libellants proceeded from negligence on the part of their laborers, in placing, anchoring or hauling the seine.

The burden of proof is on the libellants, to make out the negligence alleged. I am not satisfied that they have done so. On the evidence, it is not established that the ship could have gone further to the westward than she did, without danger to herself. She drew eighteen feet of water, and was in a narrow channel, where, with the tide running, she was obliged to keep under headway. Under the circumstances, the seine was an obstruction to navigation, if the ship, in deviating to avoid it, would have been in danger of grounding. The weight of the evidence tends to this conclusion.

[1] [Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

Besides, the seine was put in the way while the ship was in sight, coming in. She was pursuing her regular course of navigation, and I do not think any negligence on her part is established. The libel is dismissed, with costs.

Case No. 2,745.

The CITY OF BRUSSELS.

[6 Ben. 370.][1]

District Court, S. D. New York. Feb., 1873.

NEGLIGENCE—DEATH OF INFANT PASSENGER.

A child, which was a passenger on a steamship from Liverpool to New York, was poisoned on the passage, and died, as was alleged, in consequence of negligence on the part of the officers of the ship. The father, having been appointed administrator of the child, filed a libel against the vessel to recover damages, to which libel exceptions were filed by the claimants of the vessel: Held, that the cause of action arose on contract, and survived to the administrator, and might be sued for in rem.

[Cited in The Charles Morgan, Case No. 2,618; Hollyday v. The David Reeves, Id. 6,625; The Columbia, 27 Fed. 720; The Harrisburg, 119 U. S. 207, 7 Sup. Ct. 143.]

This was a libel by John Ryall, administrator, &c., of John Ryall, Jr., alleging, that, in 1871, John Ryall, Jr., who was a child of five years of age, took passage on the steamship City of Brussels, with his mother, at Liverpool, to be carried to New York, for a good consideration, that, while on the voyage, the child was poisoned by carelessness on the part of the officers of the vessel, and died on board, and that the libellant had been appointed administrator; and it claimed damages against the steamer. The claimants excepted to the libel.

Salter & Cowing, for libellant.
Platt, Gerard & Buckley, for claimants.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. I think that the libel is one for breach of contract, and that the cause of action survived to the administrator, and may be sued for in rem, in like manner as if the deceased had sustained an injury short of death, through the negligence of those in charge of the vessel, and in breach of the contract of carriage, and had sued in rem therefor. Chamberlain v. Chandler [Case No. 2,575]; Crapo v. Allen [Id. 3,360]; The New World v. King, 16 How. [57 U. S.] 469; The Washington, 9 Wall. [76 U. S.] 513; The Aberfoyle [Case No. 17]; The Pacific [Id. 10,643]. The breach is alleged to have occurred during the running of the contract, and before the end of the voyage. The exceptions to the libel are disallowed.

CITY OF DUBLIN, The (ROWE v.). See Case No. 12,094.

[1] [Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

Case No. 2,746.

The CITY OF FREMONT.

[2 Biss. 415;[1] 13 Int. Rev. Rec. 149; 3 Chi. Leg. News, 233.]

District Court, E. D. Wisconsin. Jan. Term, 1871.

SEAMEN'S WAGES—MASTER'S DUTY AS TO SHIPPING ARTICLES.

1. A seaman on a lake vessel, having shipped under a verbal agreement without signing shipping articles, may leave the vessel at any time.

[Cited in Graham v. The Exporter, Case No. 5,667; The Pacific, 23 Fed. 155.]

2. If he draws the wages promised, not demanding more, he cannot recover a larger amount under the act of July 20, 1840 [5 Stat. 394].

3. Duty of master as to shipping articles stated.

In admiralty. This was a libel by Robert Brittain, a seaman, for additional wages. The vessel libelled was employed in trade between the port of Sarnia, in Canada, and the city of Chicago, in connection with the Grand Trunk Railroad. On the twenty-fourth day of May, 1870, at Chicago, the libellant shipped on board as first mate on verbal contract with the master, at seventy dollars per month, no shipping articles being signed. Libellant continued in service on board, drawing his wages from time to time as he wanted money, until the thirty-first day of October following, when he left the vessel at Milwaukee, having drawn his full wages at the rate of seventy dollars per month, and not making demand for any larger sum. The vessel was on a trip from Sarnia to Chicago when libellant left, having notice to return on board, as the vessel was ready to put out; he declined or neglected to appear, and the vessel had to be navigated to Chicago without a first mate, where the master procured another in his place.

Emmons & Hamilton, for libellant.
James MacAlister, for respondent.

MILLER, District Judge. It is contended on behalf of the libellant that not having signed shipping articles in a printed or written contract, he was at liberty under the law to leave the vessel at pleasure, and demand the highest rate of wages.

By the act for the government and regulation of seamen in the merchant service, approved July 20, 1790 (1 Stat. 131), every master of "any ship or vessel of the burthen of fifty tons or upwards, bound from a port in one state to a port in any other than an adjoining state, shall, before he proceed on such voyage, make an agreement in writing or in print with every seaman or mariner on board such ship or vessel," etc. By the tenth article of the act approved July 20, 1840 (5 Stat. 394), in addition to the several acts regulating the shipment and discharge of seamen, "All shipments of seamen made contrary to the provisions of this and other acts of congress shall be void, and any seaman so shipped may leave the service at any time and demand the highest rate of wages paid to any seaman shipped for the voyage, or the sum agreed to be given him at his shipment." The general scope of this act relates to vessels bound on a foreign voyage, but the tenth article above quoted extends to and includes all shipments of seamen. Even if these statutory provisions did not embrace seamen shipped on vessels employed in the lake trade, they should be enforced by the courts as correct principles of maritime law. This vessel, at the time of the shipment and service of the libellant, was employed in trade with a foreign port. Libellant had drawn his full wages promised him at the time of his shipment, and left at his pleasure. He took advantage of the right extended to him under the act of 1840. Before leaving the service he had not demanded or given notice that he claimed a larger amount. Libellant had a lawful right to leave the service at Milwaukee, and having received the full wages up to that time, as promised him at his shipment, he should not maintain this libel for a larger amount, if he had proven himself entitled to it, which he did not. If the master was put to inconvenience by libellant's leaving the service, it was his own fault in not complying with the law. It is the duty of every master navigating the lakes to have his seamen sign shipping articles, specifying the ports or places to which his vessel trades, and the trip or season for which they are shipped, and the wages to be paid. In cases of such neglect, every legal intendment will be taken against the master and owners. It is not the fault of the seaman that shipping articles are not signed, but of the master.

[1] [Reported by Josiah H. Bissell, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

It does not appear that libellant is legally entitled to any larger amount of wages than he received before leaving the service; and this libel must be dismissed.

Case No. 2,747.

The CITY OF GUATEMALA.

[7 Ben. 521.][1]

District Court, S. D. New York. Dec., 1874.

COLLISION AT SEA—STEAMER AND SCHOONER—FOG—SPEED—DAMAGES.

1. A schooner was sailing about south half west, the wind being about east south-east. The night was foggy. The green light of an approaching steamer was seen about two points on her starboard bow, and the schooner kept on without changing her course till the collision which ensued. The steamer was going between eight and nine knots an hour. The light of the schooner was seen about a quarter of a mile distant, on the steamer's starboard bow. Her engine was stopped and reversed, and, being a propeller, she turned her head to starboard at right angles, and her stem struck the schooner on her starboard side. Two of the schooner's crew, when the vessels were together, jumped aboard the steamer. The schooner also received damage by chafing, while the vessels were together, and the steamer charged negligence upon her, in not adopting proper and speedy measures to free herself: Held, that the collision was caused by the too great speed of the steamer in the fog.

[Cited in The City of Panama, Case No. 2,764.

2. The loss of men by the schooner under the circumstances, if crippling her, was chargeable to the steamer, she being in fault for the collision.

3. The steamer was also responsible for any injury caused to the schooner by chafing while the vessels were together.

In admiralty.

R. D. Benedict, for libellant.

E. Pierrepont and H. S. Bennett, for claimants.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. The libellant, as owner of the schooner Benjamin T. Biggs, files this libel against the steamship City of Guatemala, to recover for the damages sustained by him through a collision which took place between the two vessels on the 16th of May, 1874, shortly after midnight, in a fog, in the Atlantic ocean, about east of Chincoteague. The schooner was bound from New York to Newbern, N. C., and was heading about south half west, the wind being about east southeast. The steamer was bound to the northward. The stem of the steamer and the starboard side of the schooner, aft of the after hatch, came together, and the schooner was cut down nearly to the water's edge.

The libel alleges, that when the steamer was first seen, she was about two points on the starboard bow of the schooner, showing her green light, steering about north, and on a course which, had she continued it, would have carried her far to the west of the schooner; that, after sailing on that course till she was about five points on the starboard bow of the schooner, she suddenly changed her course and headed to the east, showing her red light and hiding her green one, and headed directly across the course of the schooner, and continued on that course till she struck the schooner; that the schooner did not change her course; and that the collision was caused solely through the fault and negligence of those on board of and in charge of the steamer, in that, among other things, she had no lookout, and improperly and wrongfully changed her course, and did not stop and back in time to avoid the schooner, and proceeded at too high a rate of speed.

The answer avers, that the steamer was moving backward and directly away from the schooner, and was run into by the schooner; that, at the time of the collision, and for an hour previous thereto, the steamer and the schooner were surrounded by and enveloped in a fog so dense as to render it impossible for lights to be discerned at a greater distance than one quarter of a mile; that, even at that distance, the color of the lights could not be distinguished; that the steamer was constantly sounding steam whistles, and had three lookouts and the master on deck watching; that the schooner's light was discovered by the lookout on the steamer the moment it was possible to distinguish it; that, at that moment, the steamer was moving at between eight and nine knots an hour; that, by reason of the respective courses on which each vessel was then sailing, and the character of the sea, and their close proximity, it was impossible, when the schooner's light was first descried, to divert the steamer's course by the helm, in time to avoid a collision, but the proper orders were instantaneously given to the helmsman, and obeyed by him, and at the same time the master struck the engine bell, and the engines were immediately reversed, and before the contact the steamer had lost her headway, and was going back, and had swung broadside to her previous course; that, from the moment the schooner's light was first visible, or could possibly be seen on board of the steamer, until the moment of collision, was an interval of but two minutes and a half, during which period all that human skill or ability, promptly exercised, could do to avoid a collision, was done on board of the steamer; that the collision might have been avoided by those on board of the schooner with perfect ease, certainty and safety, by luffing, yet they pertinaciously and wrongfully held on, and thereby ran into the steamer; and that the steamer was a propeller, and, at the time of the collision, having reversed her engine and moving backward, unavoidably and naturally swung broadside to her previous course, and necessarily showed her red light to the schooner, which approached her without changing her course, or any means being used to change it, while the steamer, having lost her headway, could not be controlled by her helm.

[1] [Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and B. Lincoln Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

The answer, reduced to a few words, makes out this case: There was a fog so dense that lights could not be seen at a greater distance than a quarter of a mile. The steamer was going at a speed of between eight and nine knots an hour. She discovered the schooner's light as soon as it was possible to do so, but too late to enable her, by the use of her helm or of her reversing power, to avoid the collision. The interval between seeing the schooner's light and the collision was two and a half minutes. The steamer, by reversing, turned herself at right angles to her former course, and, having also lost her headway, would not mind her helm. The schooner did not change her course, and failed to luff, and ran into the steamer, and is responsible for the collision.

The facts set up in the answer, so far from exonerating the steamer, establish her fault and acquit the schooner. The steamer was bound to avoid the schooner, and the schooner was bound to keep her course. The only fault charged in the answer against the schooner, as causing the collision, is, that the schooner did keep her course and did not luff. The schooner was sailing as close to the wind as she could. She had an adequate crew and a proper lookout and proper lights. The steamer made the schooner's green light nearly ahead, and immediately stopped and backed. The schooner made the steamer's green light a little on the starboard bow. The schooner held her course. The green light of the steamer got to be more on the starboard bow of the schooner. Then the steamer's green light was shut in and her red light came in view, and she struck the schooner. This accords with the evidence showing that, when the steamer backs, the effect is to throw her head to starboard, so that, on this occasion, she turned, by backing, six points to starboard.

Two of the schooner's crew jumped on board of the steamer while the vessels were afoul. This was because there was good reason to fear the schooner would sink. Any loss of men, in this way, if crippling the force on the schooner and rendering her less manageable after the collision, cannot be charged as a fault against the schooner, but is something for which the steamer, if in fault for the collision, is responsible. So, too, any injury sustained by the schooner, while the vessels were afoul, by the chafing of the two together, is injury for which the steamer is responsible.

It is evident that this collision was caused by the too great speed of the steamer in the fog. She was sailing at a rate of speed such that, because of the difficulty of seeing lights in the fog, she could not avoid this collision, although, at the moment when she saw the danger, she took all possible measures to avoid it. This was a fault, especially in a locality so frequented by vessels. The Pennsylvania, 19 Wall. [86 U. S.] 125.

There must be a decree for the libellant, with costs, with a reference to a commissioner to ascertain the damages sustained by the libellant.

Case No. 2,748.

The CITY OF HARTFORD.

[4 Ben. 568.] [1]

District Court, S. D. New York. Feb., 1871.[2]

COLLISION IN EAST RIVER — STEAMBOAT AND TUG CROSSING — WHISTLES.

1. A collision occurred in daylight in the East river, between a steamboat and a schooner, which, with another schooner, was in tow alongside of a tug, by which the schooner was sunk. The tow was bound up the East river, and the steamboat was bound down, and their courses were crossing, the tug having the steamboat on her starboard side. When the steamboat saw the tug, she blew one whistle, and without waiting for a reply, ported her helm, and got a sheer to starboard, but this whistle was not heard on the tug. The tug then blew two whistles, and the steamboat replied to them by also blowing two whistles. Both vessels then starboarded. The tug, seeing that a collision was impending, stopped and reversed, which turned the head of the tow to starboard, and the steamboat, which had also stopped and reversed, struck the port bow of the schooner which was lashed on the port side of the tug. Both vessels were running much nearer the Brooklyn side of the river: Held, that, as the vessels were crossing, it was the duty of the steamboat to have kept her course.

[1] [Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

[2] [Modified in Case No. 2,752.]

2. As the tug had not heard the single whistle of the steamboat, she had the right to give the signal of two whistles, as she did, and was not then called on to stop. When the steamboat heard the two whistles of the tug, there was to her a confusion of signals, calling upon her at once to stop and reverse, unless she were certain that she could, by starboarding, avoid the tug. The tug, on hearing the two answering whistles from the steamboat, had the right to assume that a collision would be avoided by acting in accordance with them.

3. The stopping and backing of the tug was proper, and the steamboat was responsible for the effect which it produced on the tow, because a collision had then become inevitable, by reason of the previous action of the steamboat.

4. The tug was not in fault in not slowing and stopping sooner, but the steamboat was in fault in not slowing and stopping sooner.

5. The position of the vessels near the Brooklyn shore did not contribute to the collision.

6. The steamboat was responsible for the collision, and the tug was not in fault.

In admiralty. These were two libels filed by [Hudson S. Rideout and others and Charles Robinson, respectively] the owners of the schooner Alice S. Oakes and her cargo, against the City of Hartford and the Unit, to recover for the loss of the schooner and her cargo, by a collision with the City of Hartford, in the East river, on the morning of the 27th of March, 1869. The schooner was in tow of the Unit, lashed on her port side, another schooner being lashed on the starboard side of the tug, and was bound up the East river towards Hell Gate, while the steamboat was bound down the river to her berth. The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion of the court.

Joseph H. Choate and James C. Carter, for libellants.

Beebe, Donohue & Cooke, for the Unit.

R. H. Huntley, for the City of Hartford.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. I have no difficulty, in this case, in holding that the City of Hartford was wholly in fault, and that the Unit was free from fault. When the City of Hartford first saw the Unit and her tows, she saw, or ought to have seen, that the Unit had the City of Hartford on the starboard side, and that, therefore, the Unit was bound to keep out of the way of the City of Hartford, and that the City of Hartford was bound to keep her course. Instead of obeying this rule of navigation, the City of Hartford, on seeing the Unit and her tows, blew one whistle, and, without waiting for a reply, ported her helm, and got a sheer to starboard. It does not appear that this whistle was heard on board of the Unit. The Unit, seeing that she had the City of Hartford on her starboard side, and that their courses were crossing, so as to involve risk of collision, and that it was the duty of the Unit to keep out of the way, blew a signal of two whistles, indicating that she intended to starboard, and pass to the left. She had a right to give this signal. She had heard no signal from the City of Hartford, and could not see that the City of Hartford was porting. There was, to the Unit, no confusion of signals, calling upon her to stop. The City of Hartford heard the signal of two whistles from the Unit, and replied to it by a signal of two whistles, indicating her assent, not only that the Unit and the City of Hartford should both of them starboard, but that there was time and room for the City of Hartford, by their starboarding, to pass safely between the Unit and her tows and the Brooklyn shore. As the City of Hartford had blown one whistle and been answered by a signal of two whistles, there was then to her a confusion of signals, because of which she should have instantly stopped and reversed, unless she were certain she could, by starboarding, avoid a collision. The Unit had on her port hand, when she blew her signal of two whistles, a wide space of river. The City of Hartford had then on her port hand a narrow space of river. If, on receiving that signal, the City of Hartford was not certain that she would, by complying with it, go clear, she should have refused to respond to it by a signal of two whistles, and have responded by some signal showing confusion of signals or danger. Then she would have imposed on the Unit the necessity of desisting from her starboarding, and the further necessity of instantly stopping and reversing. As it was, the City of Hartford understood that the Unit was starboarding, directed the Unit to keep on starboarding, and announced that she herself would starboard, and that she had room and time to starboard and go clear, if the Unit should keep on starboarding. But, whatever starboarding there was on the part of the City of Hartford was ineffectual, either from the sheer to starboard she had previously got by porting, or from the effect of the flood tide on her port bow, or some other cause. The Unit proceeded with her tows, keeping her starboard helm, until she saw that the City of Hartford was likely to collide with her, or with one or the other of her tows, and then she stopped and reversed. The effect of this was to turn her head, and the heads of her tows towards the Brooklyn shore, so that the City of Hartford struck the port bow of the schooner on her port side. But the City of Hartford must be held responsible for this effect. The stopping and reversing was proper. It was certain that the City of Hartford would strike some one of the vessels. Besides the effect mentioned, another effect was produced by the stopping and reversing of the Unit, and that was, that she got sternway through the water, and lessened the force of the blow, and, perhaps, confined the damage to the sinking of one vessel, instead of the sinking of three. The City of Hartford had no right to maintain so high and dangerous a rate of speed up to so near a point to the Unit and her tows, and, even if the stopping and reversing by the Unit, at the time, were not the most proper manoeuvre, it was one forced upon her, in the jaws of peril, by the fault of the City of Hartford.

Nor do I see that the Unit was in fault in not slowing or stopping and reversing sooner. Receiving the answering signal of two whistles from the City of Hartford, and having a clear space to pass to her own left, she had a right to suppose that the City of Hartford would starboard, and could starboard effectually, and she also had a right to keep on until the necessity arose for her slowing, stopping and reversing. She did stop and reverse as soon as that necessity arose.

The City of Hartford was in gross fault, irrespective of any other question in the case, in not slowing sooner than she did, and in not stopping and reversing sooner than she did. I do not think that the fact that both vessels were running much nearer to the Brooklyn piers than to the New York piers, can, in this case be taken into account, so as to charge either of them with fault in that respect. Their positions in that regard did not contribute to the collision, for each vessel saw the other in abundant season for the collision to have been avoided by proper manoeuvres thereafter.

There must be a decree in each case against the City of Hartford, with costs to the libellants, and a reference to a commissioner to ascertain the damages. The libel in each case must be dismissed, as to the Unit, with costs.

[NOTE. From this decree an appeal was taken to the circuit court, which modified the decree herein, entered a decree against both steamboat and tug, and ordered a division of the damages. See Cases Nos. 2,752, 2,753.

[For a synopsis of the opinion of the supreme court, rendered on a decision affirming the circuit court decree in part and reversing it in part, see Case No. 2,753.]

Case No. 2,749.

The CITY OF HARTFORD.

[7 Ben. 350.][1]

District Court, S. D. New York. June, 1874.

COLLISION IN HELL GATE—STEAMER AND SCHOONER—KEEPING COURSE—CHOICE OF COURSES.

1. A steamboat going eastward against an ebb tide, through Hell Gate, at night, as she approached the bend in the channel at Hallett's Point, saw the red light of a schooner coming through the Gate. The wind was about north northwest. The light was seen on the starboard bow of the steamboat. The latter went on and ported her wheel, so as to go around the Point and meet the tide head on. Just before she reached the tide, the schooner, being then about two or three hundred feet from the steamboat, and on the steamboat's port bow, starboarded her helm, and let go her sheet, to turn around the Point into the channel in which the steamboat was. This movement brought the green light of the schooner into view from the steamboat, and shut in her red light, whereupon the engine of the steamboat was stopped, and her helm was put amidships, but the vessels came into collision, the stem of the steamboat striking the starboard side of the schooner aft of the main rigging. Held, that, in that difficult and dangerous channel, the steamboat was in fault in not waiting, before turning Hallett's Point, until she knew whether the schooner was intending to turn into the channel in which the steamboat was, or not.

[Cited in The City of Springfield, 26 Fed. 161; The Dasori, 47 Fed. 331.]

2. Although the schooner intended all the time to take the east channel, and took the necessary and proper steps to turn into it, and in that sense kept her course, yet, seeing the steamboat as she did, and knowing that the latter had but one course to take if she kept on, while she herself had the choice of turning into the east channel or taking either one of two other channels, she was in fault in not holding herself up to the wind, and refraining from starboarding and letting her sheet go, until she had gone by the steamboat.

[Cited in The Iron Chief, 53 Fed. 512.]

3. Both vessels were in fault, and the damages must be apportioned.

In admiralty.

W. R. Darling, for libellants.

E. H. Owen, for claimants.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. On the 2d of May, 1872, at about midnight, the schooner William R. Knapp, owned by the libellants, and loaded with a cargo of sand, collided with the steamboat City of Hartford, off Hallett's Point, in Hell Gate, and she and her cargo were thereby sunk and totally lost. The schooner was proceeding towards New York, and the City of Hartford was on a trip from New York to New Haven. The starboard side of the schooner was struck by the stem of the steamboat. The schooner, just before the collision, had starboarded her helm and let her main sheet run off so as to go around Hallett's Point, and down the east channel, which was the same channel the steamboat was in. The wind was about north northwest, a fresh breeze, and the tide was ebb. The answer alleges, that the schooner improperly and unexpectedly changed her course, and did not have a competent lookout, properly stationed and faithfully attending to his duties; that, if the schooner had continued the course upon which she was heading when first discovered, the steamboat could and would have passed her on her port side, at a safe distance; and that, in so changing her course, the schooner so baffled the navigation of the steamboat, as to prevent her keeping away from the schooner, and as to render a collision inevitable.

[1] [Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and B. Lincoln Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

The steamboat had her proper lights set and burning. She was a large vessel, 270 feet long. She had gone up on the east side of Blackwell's Island. Her master, her pilot and two wheelsmen were in her pilot-house. She had a lookout at her bow. When she had reached a point two or three lengths below Flood Rock, her master and her pilot saw the red light of the schooner bearing about three points on the starboard bow of the steamboat. At that time the steamboat was heading about northeast. The schooner was then some distance to the eastward of Hallett's Point, and below Negro Point. At Flood Rock, the steamboat, as it was necessary and proper for her to do, to go around Hallett's Point, and meet the ebb tide there stem on, ported her wheel, and swung gradually to starboard on a swing which, by the time she met the tide at the Point, would amount to a change of her heading so that she would head east, being a change of four points. Just before the steamboat reached the tide at the Point, and when the two vessels were not more than the length of the steamboat apart, the green light of the schooner came into the view of those in the pilot-house of the steamboat, and immediately afterwards the red light of the schooner went out of their view, and the collision ensued. The green light of the schooner, when it so appeared, appeared a little on the port bow of the steamboat, and the red light of the schooner, when it disappeared, was a little on the port bow of the steamboat. Notwithstanding the swinging of the steamboat to starboard at the time, the green light of the schooner crossed the bow of the steamboat, from her port to her starboard, so that the schooner was struck just aft of her main rigging. As soon as the green light of the schooner came into view, the engine of the steamboat was stopped, and her wheel was let go to midships. She was in a rapid and dangerous tide, the schooner was sailing at the rate of seven miles an hour, and the collision came so soon after the green light of the schooner appeared, that it is quite evident that nothing which the steamboat could have done, after she saw the green light of the schooner, would have avoided the collision.

To those on the schooner, the green and white lights alone of the steamboat were visible, until just before the collision, when the steamboat's red light also came into their view.

The channel at the place of collision is narrow, the tide strong, and the navigation intricate and dangerous. The entire bend around the Point is six points, from northeast to east southeast, or from west northwest to southwest. The tide was favorable for the schooner; and the steamboat, seeing the red light of the schooner a considerable distance above Hallett's Point, when the steamboat was below Flood Rock, could not tell whether the schooner was intending to go through the east channel, the middle channel, or the main ship channel, for the schooner was at a point where she might still have elected to go through either one of the three channels, and she was free to do so. It was the duty of the steamer to avoid the schooner, and it was the duty of the schooner to keep her course, and not to embarrass the movements of the steamboat. It would have been very easy for the steamboat, seeing the red light of the schooner, and uncertain whether the schooner was, or was not, intending to go through the east channel, to stop and reverse, before porting, at Flood Rock, so as, by the aid of the adverse tide, to check her speed, until the movements of the schooner should be developed. In such case, the steamboat being necessarily to the westward, with a view to go, by porting, around Hallett's Point, the schooner, coming down the east channel, would have passed to the eastward of the steamboat. Even if there had been no collision in this case, the steamboat was going on with unabated speed, with the certainty of meeting the coming sailing vessel in the most dangerous part of the strait. I cannot but regard the steamboat as in fault, in not waiting to see which channel the schooner would take.

Was the schooner, also, in fault? Did she keep her course, or did she embarrass the steamboat? In one sense, the schooner kept her course, for she intended, all the time, to go down the east channel, and she took the necessary and proper steps to do so, and she turned into the east channel. But she saw, all the time, that the steamboat, if continuing to move forward, had but one channel to go in, to round Hallett's Point. If the steamboat continued to advance, she must swing around to her own starboard. With the wind north northwest, and the channel from Negro Point to Hallett's Point running about east southeast and north northwest, and the tide as it was, the schooner, before she starboarded and let her sheet run off, must have been going substantially with the tide, without much aid from the wind; and, if not shaking, was hauled very close to the wind; and it ought to have been seen by the schooner, that, if the steamboat should come on, and the schooner should starboard to go down the east channel, the courses of the two vessels would be likely to cross each other, and in such proximity as to involve danger of collision. As it was apparent, therefore, that the steamboat was not in the main ship channel, or in the middle channel, and as the schooner could equally well have gone down either one of those two channels, I think the schooner must be held in fault for not holding herself up to the wind, and refraining from starboarding and letting her sheet go, until she had gone by the steamboat. As it was, she, in fact, crossed the bows of the steamboat, as the steamboat was moving in the only course, and the only channel, which the steamboat could take. This manoeuvre of the schooner contributed to the collision, and for it the schooner must be held in fault.

A decree will be entered dividing the damages between the two vessels.

[NOTE. A subsequent decree awarded costs to libellants. See Case No. 2,750.]

Case No. 2,750.

The CITY OF HARTFORD.

[7 Ben. 510.] [1]

District Court, S. D. New York. Dec., 1874.

COLLISION—COSTS—APPORTIONMENT OF DAMAGES.

In a collision case, both vessels were held to have been in fault, and an apportionment of the damages was decreed. No cross-libel had been filed, and the libellant recovered half his damages. He now applied for costs: Held, that the general rule in this district, in such cases, is that costs will be allowed to the party who recovers.

[Cited in Vanderbilt v. Reynolds, Case No. 16,839; The Hercules, 20 Fed. 205.]

[In admiralty. Libel by the owners of the schooner William R. Knapp against the steamboat City of Hartford for damages caused by collision. There was a decree dividing the damages between the two vessels (Case No. 2,749), and libellants now ask that costs be awarded to them.]

W. R. Darling, for libellants.

E. L. Owen, for claimants.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. This is a libel for a collision. The court held that both vessels were in fault, and directed the damages to be apportioned. The libellants' damages are fixed at $2,209.89, and, as the claimants' vessel sustained no damage, the libellants are entitled to recover the one-half of the above amount. The libellants ask that they may have costs in the cause.

In Hay v. Le Neve, 2 Shaw, App. Cas. 395, both vessels were held in fault, and the house of lords decreed that, as both vessels were in fault, the loss should be borne equally by both parties, and that each party should pay their own costs. The same rule was followed in The Monarch, 1 W. Rob. Adm. 21. In The Rival [Case No. 11,867], the court held that both vessels were in fault; that the whole damage should be equally divided between them; and that one of the vessels, which the court held to be most in fault, should bear all the costs. But in Lenox v. Winisimmet Co. [Id. 8,248], the same court held both vessels in fault, and divided equally between them the aggregate damage to both, and decreed that each party pay one-half of the costs. In Foster v. The Miranda [Id. 4,977], the loss was equally divided, and costs were allowed to neither party, each being left to pay his own. In The Favorita [Id. 4,694], both vessels were held to be in fault, and the damages were divided. As to costs, the district court says: "The case is one of mutual fault, and although I entertain no doubt as to the propriety, in a proper case, of mitigating the effect of the rule of equal division of loss, in cases of mutual faults, by awarding full costs to either party, I do not consider that the present case called for any deviation from the practice, which is to refuse costs to both parties, when both are equally in fault."

In this district the practice has been to allow costs, in a case of this kind, to the party who recovered, even though the amount he recovered was diminished by the application of the doctrine of apportionment because of mutual fault. I consider this practice to be sustained by the recent decision of the supreme court in the case of The Sapphire, 18 Wall. [85 U. S.] 51. The Euryale sued the Sapphire for a collision, claiming $15,000 damages. There was no cross-libel, nor did the Sapphire set up, in the answer, that she had been damaged. The Euryale had a decree in the district court for $15,000 damages. The circuit court affirmed it. On appeal, the supreme court held that "both parties were in fault, and that the damages ought to be equally divided between them," and directed that a decree should be entered "in conformity with this opinion." The circuit court thereupon entered a decree in favor of the Euryale for $7,500, and for her costs in the district and circuit courts, less the costs of the appeal by the Sapphire to the supreme court. The Sapphire appealed again to the supreme court, alleging, as errors, that no damage to the Sapphire was taken into consideration, and that costs in the courts below were allowed to the Euryale. For the Sapphire it was contended, that, in collision cases, where both parties were in fault, each should pay his own costs. The supreme court held that the only damages which could be divided in that particular case were those sustained by the Euryale. As to the costs the court say: "The appellants further complain that it was erroneous to allow the libellant his costs in the district and circuit courts, deducting therefrom the costs allowed them by this court—i. e., the costs of the reversal of the former decree. We do not perceive, however, in this, any such error as requires our interposition. Costs in admiralty are entirely under the control of the court. They are sometimes, from equitable considerations, denied to the party who recovers his demand, and they are sometimes given to a libellant who fails to recover anything, when he was misled to commence the suit by the act of the other party. Doubtless, they generally follow the decree, but circumstances of equity, of hardship, of oppression, or of negligence, induce the court to depart from that rule in a great variety of cases. In the present case, the costs allowed to the libellant were incurred by him in his effort to recover what has been proved to be a just demand, and a denial of them under the circumstances of the case, would, we think, be inequitable."

[1] [Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and B. Lincoln Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

The libellants must have a decree for their costs.

Case No. 2,751.

The CITY OF HARTFORD.

[10 Ben. 150.] [1]

District Court, E. D. New York. Oct., 1878.

RATE OF WHARFAGE AT BULKHEAD—COSTS.

A steamboat, 272 feet long, occupied a berth at a bulkhead in the city of New York for 28 days. The bulkhead was owned by three parties. B. owned one hundred feet of it, all of which was occupied by the steamboat or by lines which ran from her bow forward to a spile at the corner of the bulkhead. F. owned the hundred feet next, all of which was occupied, and K. owned one hundred and fifty feet next, seventy-five feet of which was occupied. The rate of wharfage which, by the statute of the state of New York, the steamboat would be called on to pay for a single berth was $9.50 a day. B. filed a libel, claiming to recover of her for wharfage $9.50 a day. The owners of the steamboat claimed that he was only entitled to his proportionate share of the $9.50 a day and tendered and paid into court $89.22: Held, that the libellant was not entitled to recover $9.50 a day, but only his proportionate share of that sum, viz., 100-275 of it, and without costs.

[Cited in The William H. Brinsfield, 39 Fed. 219.]

In admiralty.

Gale & Chalmers, for libellant.

D. & T. McMahon, for claimant.

BENEDICT, District Judge. This is an action to recover wharfage. The material facts are not in dispute and are as follows: For a period of twenty-eight days in November, 1877, the steamboat City of Hartford occupied a berth at the bulkhead between Bank and Bethune streets, in the North river, while undergoing some repairs.

The rate of wharfage to be paid by vessels using wharves and piers in the cities of New York and Brooklyn, is regulated by a statute of the state of New York, which provides: "It shall be lawful to charge and receive, within the cities of New York and Brooklyn and Long Island City, wharfage and dockage at the following rates, namely: From every vessel that uses or makes fast to any pier, wharf, or bulkhead, within said cities, or makes fast to any vessel lying at such pier, wharf or bulkhead, or to any other vessel lying outside of such vessel, for every day or part of a day, as follows: From every vessel of 200 tons burden and under, two cents per ton, and for every vessel over 200 tons burden, two cents per ton for each of the first 200 tons and one-half of one cent per ton for every additional ton, except canal-boats, etc., * * * but every other vessel making fast to a vessel lying at any pier, wharf or bulkhead, within said cities, or to another vessel lying outside of such vessel, or at anchor within any slip or basin when not receiving or discharging cargo or ballast, one-half the first above rates; and from every vessel or floating structure, other than those above named or used for transportation of freight or passengers, double the first above rates, except that floating grain elevators shall pay one-half the first above rates; and every vessel that shall leave a pier, wharf, bulkhead, slip or basin without first paying the wharfage or dockage due thereon, after being demanded of the owner, consignee, or person in charge of the vessel, shall be liable to pay double the rates established by this act." At the rate fixed by this statute $9.50 per day would be the sum the City of Hartford would be liable to pay for an inside berth.

There were three different persons each of whom owned a portion of the bulkhead at which the steamboat lay. The length of the water-front thus occupied which belonged to Brainard the libellant was 100 feet. The whole of this portion of the bulkhead may properly be considered as having been used by the steamboat, the lines from her bow extending to a spile at the corner of the libellant's portion, for although there was a small space between the bow of the steamboat and the adjoining pier, that space was not only covered by the lines so as to prevent its use by any other vessel, but was also too small to be used by any other craft.

Next south of the libellant's portion of the bulkhead for a distance of 100 feet, one Fagan owned the bulkhead. The steamboat was 272 feet long, and, of course, she covered all of Fagan's portion, so as to prevent its being used as a berth for any other vessel. Lines ran from the steamboat to Fagan's portion as well as to the libellant's portion. Next south of Fagan's portion for the space of 150 feet, the bulkhead was owned by one Keenan. Keenan has been paid for the use of 75 feet of his bulkhead by this boat, and the evidence shows that, at least for that distance, the bulkhead of Keenan was substantially used. To this part as well as to the libellant's part, ingress and egress was had by those on the boat, and lines ran from the boat to spiles thereon.

Upon these facts the libellant claims to be entitled to $9.50 per day for the use of his portion of the bulkhead; while the claimant insists that $9.50 per day is the whole sum chargeable upon the boat for the whole berth, and that the libellant is entitled to a part of that sum proportionate to the extent of his bulkhead which was opposite to the hull of the steamboat as she lay in the berth.

[1] [Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and Benj. Lincoln Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

I cannot agree with either of these positions. As to the claim of the libellant to be paid $9.50 per day for use of his bulkhead, I have no difficulty. It is impossible to suppose that the statute intended to allow every owner of a part of a bulkhead to charge for the use of his water-front the full amount of wharfage prescribed by the statute for a full berth, without any regard to the amount of water-front used. Such a construction of the statute would compel a vessel to pay full wharfage to several different persons whenever the frontage used belonged to different persons; and this boat would be compelled in this instance to pay three wharfages, that is $28.50 per day, and if the owners of this bulkhead had happened to number thirty, instead of three, according to such an understanding of the law the liability would be $285.00 per day. Such can not have been the intention. The meaning of the statute is that a boat shall pay the amount provided by the act and no more for her berth. This charge for a berth being required to be calculated by the tonnage, of course the amount of wharfage increases with the size of the boat; but it is a single charge for a single berth. It follows that when the berth used is owned by different persons, the statutory charge must be justly apportioned among the several owners. The claim made by the libellant to be entitled to $9.50 for each day this boat lay at his pier is therefore rejected.

The remaining question is how to apportion the wharfage chargeable by the statute for the berth among the various owners. The claimant's view is that only that part of the bulkhead against which the boat actually lay was used by the boat, and in accordance with this view he has tendered and paid into court the sum of $89.22. But upon the evidence the boat substantially appropriated to her own use for her berth at this bulkhead an extent of water-front exceeding her own length by some few feet. She required for her berth, and substantially appropriated, 275 feet of the bulkhead, of which 100 feet belonged to the libellant. A just division of the legal wharfage allowed for the whole berth would therefore be to give to the libellant 100-275 of the gross sum. This would be equity.

According to this mode of division the libellant is entitled to the sum of $95.66. The claimant has tendered only the sum of $89.22, and the libellant must, therefore, have a decree for the sum of $6.44. But I give no costs, because the question is novel, and the evidence shows a desire on the part of the claimant to pay without suit all that was legally chargeable.

It has been contended that the decision in the case of The Virginia Rulon [Case No. 16,974] is adverse to the foregoing conclusion and in favor of the claim made by the libellant. But the distinction between the two cases is this: The Virginia Rulon occupied and used two berths, one at the pier and one on the bulkhead, and discharged cargo on both the pier and the bulkhead at the same time. In such a case—and others might be imagined—the vessel is considered as using two berths and for that reason chargeable with lawful wharfage for each. The present is a different case, because here the vessel occupied only the space necessary to give her a berth, and that space was along the water-front of a continuous bulkhead: She used no more than was necessary, if she was to have a berth at all, and therefore occupied but a single berth.

The view I have taken of this case disposes of the claim for double wharfage based on the provision of the statute, that when the vessel leaves the wharf without paying her wharfage after demand made, she is liable to double wharfage; because the only demand ever made by the libellant was at the rate of $9.50 per day. As he was only entitled to $3.07 per day, such a demand was properly refused and does not entitle the wharfinger to double wharfage.

Let a decree be entered in accordance with this opinion.

Case No. 2,752.

The CITY OF HARTFORD.

[11 Blatchf. 72;[1] 17 Int. Rev. Rec. 125.]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. April 7, 1873.[2]

COLLISION—STEAMBOAT AND TUG CROSSING—WHISTLES—SPEED—MUTUAL FAULT.

1. A steamtug, either meeting a steamboat end on, or crossing her course, having the steamboat on her starboard side, and, in the latter case, bound to keep out of the way, held in fault for starboarding, instead of porting, and thus contributing to a collision between a vessel in tow of her and such steamboat.

[Cited in The Fanwood, 28 Fed. 375; The Baltimore, 34 Fed. 662.]

2. The steamtug blew two whistles, on starboarding. The steamboat responded by two whistles, and, although then on a port helm, starboarded herself: Held, that, although the steamboat was in fault for assenting, by her two whistles, yet that fact did not absolve the steamtug from the fault she so committed.

[Cited in The Nereus, 23 Fed. 455; Conover v. The City of Chester, 24 Fed. 92; The Galileo, Id. 392; The Greenpoint, 31 Fed. 232; The St. Johns, 34 Fed. 766; The Sammie, 37 Fed. 909.]

3. The steamboat was also in fault for too great speed, and for not stopping or porting. The steamtug was also in fault for not stopping sooner than she did.

4. The damages were apportioned. The value of the steamtug being less than one-half of the damages, whether recourse can be had to the steamboat, to make up the rest of such one-half, in addition to her own one-half, quere.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the southern district of New York.

[In admiralty. Libels by Hudson S. Ride-

[1] [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

[2] [Modifying the decree in Case No. 2,748. Affirmed in The City of Hartford and The Unit, 97 U. S. 323.]

out, owner of the schooner Alice S. Oakes, and by Charles Robinson, owner of her cargo, against the steamboat City of Hartford and the steamtug Unit, to recover for a loss sustained by collision. The district court decreed in favor of libelants against the City of Hartford, ordered a reference to ascertain the damages, and dismissed the libels as to the Unit. See Case No. 2,748. From this decree an appeal was taken to this court.]

Joseph H. Choate and James C. Carter, for libellants.

Richard H. Huntley, for the City of Hartford.

Charles Donohue, for the Unit.

WOODRUFF, Circuit Judge. I concur fully with the conclusion of the judge of the district court that the City of Hartford [Case No. 2,748] was in fault, and that her fault contributed to the collision which caused the loss sustained by the respective libellants. But I am unable to find that the Unit was without fault therein. Her navigators saw the City of Hartford coming down the river, at such a distance that there was time for whatever manoeuvre, by either or both vessels, was necessary to avoid collision. The direction of the two courses was such, that one of two situations was involved—that is to say, first, they were approaching so nearly end on, as to involve danger of collision; or, second, they were crossing each other's course, so as to involve risk of collision. Doubtless, the latter best describes their situation; but, either situation leads to the same conclusion.

(1st.) If regarded as approaching nearly end on, then it was the duty of each to port the helm, and go to the right, and so pass port to port. This the City of Hartford attempted to do, (being, in fact, already on a sheer to starboard.) The Unit, in plain violation of the rule, attempted the opposite manoeuvre, and starboarded, with intent to go to the left, and pass starboard to starboard. This was wrong. She had no right to make such an attempt, without, at the same time, assuming the risk of its successful accomplishment, unless defeated in her endeavor by an unwarranted counter movement of the other vessel.

(2d.) If the vessels be regarded as crossing, so as to involve risk of collision, then it was the clear duty of the Unit, having the City of Hartford on her starboard side, to keep out of the way of the City of Hartford, and the like clear duty of the latter to keep her course, unless the conduct of the Unit created a duty to depart from such course, or to stop. The City of Hartford was keeping her course, and, in fact, attempted to indicate to the Unit her purpose to do so, and even give the Unit a wider berth, by increasing her own swing to westward, when she was admonished that the Unit proposed to go to the left instead of the right, and to cross her bows. The primary fault was on the part of the Unit, in making this attempt.

Upon the evidence, I cannot doubt, that, if the City of Hartford had continued on her port helm, as she was when she came in sight, and the Unit had even done nothing, no collision would have happened. Indeed, the witnesses whom the Unit herself called, to charge fault on the City of Hartford, make her fault, not that she ought to have starboarded, but that she did so, when they say she should have ported and swung towards New York, which, in fact, she was doing when arrested by the manoeuvres of the Unit. This fault of the Unit is the more striking, when it is considered that the pilot of the Unit knew and recognized the City of Hartford, which was a regular passenger and freight boat between Hartford, Connecticut, and the city of New York, and knew where was her regular landing place, near Peck slip, on the New York side, and, therefore, that her regular course would take her to the westward, across the river. To attempt, then, to take the Unit to the westward, across her bows, was not only a violation of the first rule above referred to, calling upon the Unit to keep to the right, but it was choosing the course which, (under the rule requiring the Unit to keep out of the way,) was least likely to avoid the other vessel, and most likely to embarrass her in proceeding to her destination.

Thus far, I have said nothing of the signals given by either. On that subject, I observe, that the City of Hartford, rightly and, in all respects, properly, intended to go to starboard, (to the port of the Unit,) and was doing so, and blew one whistle, the proper signal to indicate to the Unit her intention. Let it be conceded that her signal was not heard, that did not justify an attempt by the Unit to cross her bows, if that was not a safe attempt. That it was not a safe endeavor is conclusively proved by the fact, that, although, in compliance with the request of the Unit, the City of Hartford cooperated with her, to enable her to do so, a collision was the result, and, as I think, this also shows what I have before stated, that, had not the City of Hartford been diverted from her course by this attempt of the Unit, no collision would have occurred. But, it is said, that, when the Unit blew two whistles, to indicate her design to go to the westward, the City of Hartford assented to her proposition, as a safe and proper one. I concur with the court below, that the City of Hartford ought not to have assented. She ought either to have kept off towards New York, or to have stopped. But, I cannot concede that this excuses the Unit for making the unwise endeavor. It comes with ill grace from her to say, that the fault is solely due to the City of Hartford, for causing a collision, by doing what she (the Unit) expressly requested her to do. The manoeuvre was fatal. It was an unskilful and improper one, under the circumstances. In the most favorable view for the Unit, it was an error in which both concurred. Observations pertinent to the case of an erroneous manoeuvre, proposed by one vessel and assented to by the other, resulting in collision, and held to involve mutual or concurring fault, were made in The Albermarle [Case No. 135]. I feel great doubt, whether those who navigated the Unit acted upon the signal which was given by herself, and whether, in fact, there was not great incompetency, and even mistake, in giving the signal at all. Certainly, the City of Hartford, by assenting to the manoeuvre proposed by the Unit, no more guaranteed its safety and propriety than the Unit did in making the proposition. The City of Hartford had, surely, as clear a right to accept the two whistles as an assurance by the Unit, that, with her co-operation, the Unit could and would pass to the west, as the Unit had to infer from the response, that the City of Hartford could and would pass to the east.

The conclusion seems to me inevitable, that both were in fault. The City of Hartford ought not to have come down at such speed, she ought not to have accepted the proposal of the Unit, and she ought either to have stopped or to have kept off to the westward. The Unit ought not to have made the attempt to go to the west, and she too, in view of her mistaken signal, ought, (after the signal was given,) to have kept off, or stopped entirely much sooner than she did. It is doubtful whether, after she had called the City of Hartford from her course, she did not herself see her error, and neglect to go to the westward at all, as her signal promised. But if she found she could not, in that way, escape the consequences of her own mistake, she should have instantly given signals of alarm, and stopped. Although those signals might have been ineffectual, they might have disclosed the error to the City of Hartford, and induced her sooner to stop and back, increasing the chances of safety. The decree should, therefore, direct contribution; and, as the counsel expressed a desire to be heard on the question whether, as the value of the Unit is less than one-half the damages, the libellants should have recourse to the City of Hartford for the deficiency, I will hear them on that subject, on the settlement of the decree. I ought to add, that I find no sufficient reason for disturbing the report of the commissioner upon the amount of the damages.

[NOTE. On the settlement of the decree the court denied the contention of libelants as to their right of recourse to the steamboat in the event that the tug was not of sufficient value to pay the moiety of the damages awarded. See Case No. 2,753.

[An appeal was taken to the supreme court from the final decree herein, which was affirmed in so far as it declared both steamer and tug in fault, and awarded damages against both, and a division thereof, but sustained the contention of libelants as to the deficiency. See note to Case No. 2,753, next following. The City of Hartford and The Unit, 97 U. S. 323.]

Case No. 2,753.

The CITY OF HARTFORD.

[11 Blatchf. 290.] [1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Aug. 20, 1873.[2]

DECREE DIVIDING DAMAGES—INSUFFICIENT VALUE OF ONE VESSEL — RIGHT OF INJURED PARTY TO DEFICIENCY.

The C. and the U., two steam vessels, were held liable for the damages caused to the owners of a schooner, and also for the damages caused to the owners of the cargo on board of such schooner, by a collision between the C. and the schooner, the schooner being, at the time, in tow of the U., and the collision being due to the fault of both the C. and the U. The U., on her arrest, was discharged from custody, on a stipulation for her value, which was in an amount less than one-half of the damages awarded to the libellants: Held, that the libellants could recover against the C. only the one-half of the damages, and that they could not recover against her any deficiency in the value of the U. to make up the other half of such damages.

[Followed in The Alabama, Case No. 123. Cited in The Hudson, 15 Fed. 164.]

[See note at end of case.]

In admiralty. In this case a libel was filed, in the district court, by the owners of the schooner Alice S. Oakes against the steamboat City of Hartford, and the steam-tug Unit, and a separate libel by the owners of the cargo of said schooner, against the same two vessels, to recover for the loss of the schooner and of her cargo, by a collision between the schooner and the steamboat, the schooner being, at the time, in tow of the steam-tug. The district court decreed against the steamboat, in each case, and dismissed the libels as against the steam-tug [Case No. 2,748]. On appeal [Id. 2,752], the circuit court held the steamboat and the steam-tug to have been, both of them, in fault, for the collision, and decreed a contribution, by each, of one-half of the amount of the loss, but directed further argument on the question whether, as the value of the steam-tug was less than one-half of the damages sustained by the libellants, in the two cases, the libellants could have recourse to the steamboat, for the deficiency, in addition to recovering against the steamboat the one-half of such damages.

Joseph H. Choate and James C. Carter, for libellants.

Richard H. Huntley, for the City of Hartford.

Charles Donohue, for the Unit.

WOODRUFF, Circuit Judge. These cases having been heard upon the merits, and an opinion filed directing contribution by the steamboat City of Hartford and the steam-tug Unit, they are again heard, agreeably to the suggestion in that opinion [Case No. 2,-

[1] [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

[2] [Reversed in The City of Hartford and The Unit, 97 U. S. 323.]

752], for the purpose of determining whether, in case the libellants shall be unable to collect so much as one-half of their loss from the steam-tug, (which appears to have been discharged from custody upon filing a stipulation for her value, which is less than one-half of such loss,) the steamboat City of Hartford shall be held liable for the deficiency.

It is suggested in behalf of the City of Hartford, that the Unit was discharged upon an appraisal to which the owners of the City of Hartford were not parties, and of which they had no notice; that, if the effect of a valuation of the Unit at less than one-half of the loss claimed by the libellants is permitted to prejudice the City of Hartford, a most unfair and dangerous precedent will be established; that, in cases of collision in which a third party claims to recover for an injury, there will be opportunity for collusion, and a temptation thereto; and that owners of cargo on board of one vessel, and owners of the tow, where, as in this case, one of the colliding vessels is a tug having vessels or barges in tow, are almost universally in sympathy with the tug or the vessel bearing their cargo, and they and their witnesses are usually found struggling to cast the whole responsibility upon the other colliding vessel, and may be expected to collude with the former against the latter. Observation and experience, no doubt, give some foundation for this apprehension; and, were there any evidence in this case that the tug Unit was of greater value than that for which the stipulation was given, it would be entitled to grave consideration. The rule in admiralty being well settled, that, where both of the colliding vessels are in fault each shall contribute one-half to make up the loss, it is clear that neither should, by appraisal and bond for value, to which the other is not a party, be permitted to evade payment of, or condemnation for, her full share. My conclusion, however, upon the principal question does not require that I should dwell further upon this point.

It is also suggested, that the property of the libellants in this case having been voluntarily placed in charge of the tug, for transportation, the libellants, in a legal sense, took the risk of the care and good management of the tug; that, in the admiralty, the fault of the tug placed the owners of such cargo, and of such tow, in the same relation to the City of Hartford as the tug was herself; that the rule in the admiralty requiring contribution in cases of mutual fault, is not, and ought not to be, affected by any inquiry into the ownership or title to the property on board of either vessel; that this view of the subject works no hardship, because, the owners of cargo on a vessel towed, and the owners of such vessel, may protect themselves by proper contracts, so that, if their property is lost by negligence on the part of the tug, they will have full indemnity, even though they may not obtain it through the contribution ordered; that such right to full indemnity was clear, without any special contract, before the passage of the act of congress of March 3, 1851 (9 Stat. 635) for the relief of ship owners; that that act was intended to leave them to bear the loss over and above the value of the vessel employed by them, and was not intended to cast a further or additional burthen upon the City of Hartford, in a case like the present, or to make it necessary that she pay any greater sum, as contribution to the loss, than if that act had not passed; that this is illustrated by supposing the libels had been filed against the owners of the Unit in personam, and against the City of Hartford in rem; that, the fault of both being proved, and contribution being ordered, it was not the intention of the act of congress to relieve the owners of the Unit in part, and thereby to cast the greater burthen on the owners of the City of Hartford, who, by the rules of the admiralty, ought to be compelled to pay one-half only; and that there is no hardship to the libellants, because they have their remedy against the master of the Unit for his negligence in this case, for any deficiency which contribution should leave unsatisfied, as his liability is not relieved by the act of congress.

The question whether, in case of collision between two vessels, caused by the faulty navigation or negligence of each, the rule that each shall bear one-half of the loss is an absolute measure and limit of the liability of each, does not appear to have been raised or decided in the supreme court of the United States, and I am advised of but one opinion upon the question in any court of admiralty in the United States. In the case of The Atlas [Case No. 633], in the district court for the eastern district of New York, the question is discussed, and the liability of the respective vessels was held to be, in admiralty, definitely limited to one-half the loss. In the affirmance of the decision in that case [Id. 634], it was only necessary to say, that a libellant could not, by proceeding against one of the offending vessels alone, deprive her owners of the right to such contribution from the other vessel, and of the means of enforcing it. The case of The Gregory and The Washington, in the supreme court, 9 Wall. [76 U. S.] 513, went no further than to hold it a decree of which a libellant could not complain, when he was required to exhaust his remedy by process of execution against each for one-half, before collecting more than half from either. There was, in that decree, an implied affirmance, that either would be liable for a deficiency, if one-half should not be collected from the other. But, as, in that case, both were abundantly adequate, and more than adequate, to the payment of the half charged on each respectively, the point made in the present case was wholly immaterial, and does not appear to have been at all considered.

In this state of the adjudications here, I am disposed to follow the English court of admiralty, as authority on the question. It is important that such a question should be settled, and I am much impressed by the reasonableness of the rule as stated and commented upon by Dr. Lushington, in The Milan, 1 Lush. 388, which largely influenced the opinion of the district judge in the case of The Atlas, before referred to. If the rule in this country is to be settled contrary to the rule in England, it is fitting that it should be so declared by the court of last resort. It is not manifest that the owners of cargo, or of a tow, employing a vessel for carriage or towage, which is found guilty of fault producing a collision, ought, in equity, to stand in any better position, as against a colliding vessel, than the owners of the vessel conveying their cargo or towing their property. To require them to look solely to the vessel which they employ for their more complete indemnity, is recognizing their right to a full recovery, but entitling them to recover from each what each ought to contribute, while, as said by Dr. Lushington, it is not clear that justice requires that they be permitted to recover from one the whole amount of the damages occasioned by the act of both.

Let the decree be settled in conformity with these views.

[NOTE. From the final decree herein, appeals were taken by the Hartford & New York Steamboat Company, claimant of the steamboat, in both cases, and by Charles Robinson, the owner of the cargo, in the suit brought by him, and the decree was affirmed as to the finding of mutual fault by the steam vessels, and as to the award of damages and the division thereof, but as to the denial of the right of the libellant to recover more than a moiety against the steamboat, in the event of the inability of the tug to pay her share, the supreme court held, by Mr. Justice Clifford, that the libellant was entitled to be fully compensated for his loss, if the offending vessels were of sufficient value, and that, if the value of either vessel was insufficient to pay its share of the damages, then he might recover the deficiency from the other. The City of Hartford and The Unit, 97 U. S. 323.]

Case No. 2,754.

The CITY OF HOUSTON.

[Cited in The E. B. Ward, 16 Fed. 258. Nowhere reported; opinion not now accessible.]

Case No. 2,755.

The CITY OF HOUSTON.

[Cited in Acosta v. The Halcyon, Case No. 32. Nowhere reported. The records of the court having been destroyed by fire, the opinion cannot now be obtained.]

Case No. 2,756.

The CITY OF MEXICO.

[7 Ben. 31.][1]

District Court, E. D. New York. Oct., 1873.[2]

SEAMEN—ARTICLES—REPEAL — SHIPPING COMMISSIONER'S ACT.

1. By the maritime law, as well as by the act of 20th July, 1790 (1 Stat. 131; Rev. St. § 4520), a written contract is required to be made on the shipment of seamen. That requirement of the act of 20th July, 1790, was not repealed by Act June 7, 1872 (17 Stat. 262).

2. In the year 1873, a steamship bound from New York to the West Indies and Mexico, caused a crew to be shipped for that voyage by written shipping articles executed on board the ship before a notary public, and not before a shipping commissioner. Held, that this was in violation of the 13th section of the act of June 7, 1872, and that the ship had incurred the penalty provided by the 14th section. See sections 4512, 4513, Rev. St.

In admiralty.

G. W. Hoxie, Asst. U. S. Dist. Atty., and Benedict, Taft & Benedict, for the United States.

Salter & Cowing and John A. Parsons, for claimants.

BENEDICT, District Judge. The present is a proceeding to condemn the steamship City of Mexico in a penalty for an alleged shipment of seamen, contrary to the provisions of the act of June 7, 1872 [17 Stat. 262], entitled "An act to authorize the appointment of shipping commissioners by the several circuit courts of the United States to superintend the shipping and discharge of seamen engaged in merchant ships belonging to the United States, and for the further protection of seamen."

The facts are conceded to be, that the owners of the steamship City of Mexico caused a crew to be shipped on board that vessel, for a voyage from the port of New York to the West Indies and the republic of Mexico, by written shipping articles, executed by the crew on board their vessel, before a notary public, and not before the shipping commissioner. Such a shipment of a crew the government contends is in violation of the 13th section of the act referred to above, and renders the ship liable to a penalty of $200, as prescribed in the 14th section of that act.

The argument on the part of the vessel is, that the original act of 1790 [1 Stat. 131], which requires an agreement in writing or in print, in a certain form, with any mariner on any vessel bound from a port of the United States to any foreign port, is, as to vessels engaged in voyages like that of the City of Mexico, repealed by the passage of the shipping commissioner's act of June 7th, 1872—the latter act being intended to be a substitute in such cases for the act of 1790; and that, by the amendment of the shipping commissioner's act of January 10th, 1873, vessels in voyages like that of the City of Mexico are excepted from the effect of the substitute. Consequently, it is claimed, all vessels bound to the West Indies and the republic of Mexico are exempted from any legal obligation to have any shipping articles; and, therefore, are not liable to any penalty for a shipment in violation of the act of 1872.

[1] [Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and B. Lincoln Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

[2] [Affirmed in Case No. 14,797.]

Upon this question my opinion is, that, in the present condition of the statutes, no such effect can justly be given to the shipping commissioner's act of 1872 as to work a repeal, by implication, of the original act of 1790. It is difficult to suppose that it was the intention of congress, by any provision in the act of 1872—an act declared to be intended "for the further protection of seamen"—to depart from the uniform practice of this government from its foundation, as of all maritime nations, in the regulation of the shipment of seamen, and to leave all seamen engaged in the extensive commerce included within the language of section 12 of the act, without any statutory protection as to the mode of hiring them. Such has not been the construction given to the act, in the practice of the merchants, nor was such the construction put upon it by the claimants in the present instance, for they caused the crew to be shipped in accordance with the act of 1790. The act of 1872, as also the act of 1790, recognizes and should be construed as in harmony with the rule of the general maritime law upon this subject. "The maritime law, as a general principle, requires seamen's contracts to be evidenced by writing." Ware, J., in The Crusader [Case No. 3,456]. By the general maritime law, then, as well as by the act of 1790, a written contract with this crew was doubtless required. Certainly such an agreement was not forbidden. But by section 13 of the act of 1872, certain rules are prescribed which are to be observed in respect to all written agreements procured to be executed by seamen, one of which is, that the agreement shall be signed by each seaman in presence of a shipping commissioner. There is much reason for the application of this rule in all cases, for seamen are children. They sign anything placed before them, and such a rule is calculated to prevent the obtaining of their signatures as evidence of their agreement, except in the presence of a duly authorized officer charged with the duty of protecting them against imposition and fraud. It was for this reason, no doubt, that the 13th section of the act, which forbids the execution of a written contract with a seaman, except in the presence of the shipping commissioner, was made generally applicable to all written agreements with seamen. No words in the section indicate an intention to limit its effect to the cases of agreements provided for in section 12, and I consider it applicable to every agreement made in writing by a sailor for his services on any vessel.

This provision of the law was disregarded in the shipment of the crew of this steamer; and by virtue of the 14th section of the act of 1872, which provides a penalty of $200 for receiving or accepting on board any merchant ship any seaman who has been "engaged or supplied contrary to the provisions of this act," the steamer became liable to that penalty. A decree must, accordingly, be entered condemning the steamer in the sum of $200 and costs.

[NOTE. The claimants appealed to the circuit court, where the decree of the district court was affirmed. See Case No. 14,797.]

CITY OF MEXICO, The (UNITED STATES v.). See Case No. 14,797.

Case No. 2,757.

The CITY OF NEW BEDFORD.

[10 Ben. 17.][1]

District Court, S. D. New York. June, 1878.

COLLISION ON THE SOUND—STEAMER AND SCHOONER—LOOKOUT.

1. A schooner bound east and a steamer bound west came in collision in Long Island Sound in the night. Both vessels had proper lights set. The schooner averred that she was heading east half north; that the steamer was seen ahead a little on her port bow; that the schooner was kept on her course, and the steamer changed her course to the southward across the schooner's bows, and thus caused the collision. The steamer averred that she was heading due west, and that the schooner was seen ahead a little on the steamer's starboard bow, and that the schooner changed her course to the southward and ran into the steamer. Held, that, on the evidence, the story averred on behalf of the schooner was correct, and that, she having kept her course, it was the duty of the steamer to have avoided her, and that the steamer, having failed to do this, was liable for the collision.

2. Although the schooner had no lookout except her master, who was on her quarter-deck, yet, as the steamer was seasonably seen and kept in view and the schooner was kept on her course, there was no fault in reference to the lookout, which either charged the schooner with the collision or relieved the steamer from her responsibility for it.

In admiralty.

R. D. Benedict, for libellants.
H. J. Scudder, for claimants.

CHOATE, District Judge. This is a libel by Driscoll Brothers and others, the owners of the schooner J. W. Scott, against the steamer City of New Bedford, for damages caused by a collision between said vessels about one o'clock in the morning of the 24th of November, 1876, in Long Island Sound. The schooner was bound from New York for St. John, New Brunswick, with a general cargo of merchandise. The steamer was bound on her regular trip from New Bedford for New York. The collision took place about five miles northerly from Horton's Point light. The night was dark, but lights could be seen a long distance. The libel avers that the schooner was heading east half north; that the steamer was seen at a long distance nearly ahead, but a little on the schooner's port bow; that the steamer did not make any change in her course till within about one hundred and fifty feet of the schooner, when she suddenly changed her course, sheering suddenly to port, directly across the bows of the schooner, too late to pass her, and striking her side against the bowsprit of the schooner; that, from the time when the steamer was first seen till the collision, the schooner headed on her course east half north, and the steamer was heading about west by south until she changed her course to cross the schooner's bows; that the collision was caused by the negligence of the steamer in not keeping a proper lookout, in not avoiding the schooner, as she might have done by sheering, or slowing and stopping, and in unnecessarily crossing the bows of the schooner.

[1] [Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and B. Lincoln Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

The answer avers that the steamer's course was due west; that those in charge of her made a green light about one point on her starboard bow, and a few minutes afterwards a red light about one point on her port bow; that she kept her course due west for a few minutes longer, when the vessel on her starboard bow suddenly showed both her green and red lights, and appeared to be bearing directly down upon the steamer; that the steamer's wheel was immediately thrown hard to starboard, and she was slowed to half speed, and at once began to fall off, and when she had fallen off about a point the vessel on her port bow also kept off sufficiently to keep out of her way, and the vessel on her starboard bow (the J. W. Scott) ran into her, the bowsprit striking on the starboard side on the first stateroom and breaking off, and the schooner striking the steamer again about amidships; that the collision was caused wholly by the carelessness of the schooner in changing her course instead of keeping her course, and in not having a proper lookout and in not being properly manned and equipped. The wind is stated in the libel to have been northwest by west, and in the answer about north northwest.

The witnesses on the schooner—her master who was on the lookout, and the man at the wheel—testify, that they saw the bright light of the steamer about a mile or more away; that they kept on their course east half north; that when they first saw the steamer's light it bore a little on their port bow; that as she neared them it drew a little further open; that they then saw the green light of the steamer, and soon after the steamer swung to the southward across their bows, but before she could get across their course the vessels came together.

The witnesses on the steamer testify that she was running due west, when she made the green light of the schooner about one point on her starboard bow, and soon after a red light on her port bow; that as the green light approached, the vessel bearing it suddenly showed both her lights, bearing then about two points on her starboard bow; that the wheel of the steamer was immediately thrown hard a-starboard, and she was slowed, and the schooner struck her as they came together, the courses of the vessels being nearly at a right angle.

It is obvious that the two accounts cannot be in any way reconciled. If the steamer kept on her course due west and made the green light of the schooner on her starboard bow, and while she was so keeping on her course the schooner showed her both lights, the schooner must have changed her course. On the other hand, if the schooner kept her course east half north, and made the steamer's green light on her port bow, the steamer must have been heading considerably more to the southward than she claims to have been. The schooner was bound to keep her course, and the decisive question in the case is whether she did so. Upon a careful examination of all the testimony, I am satisfied that the schooner's account of the collision is correct, and that given by the steamer's witnesses is a mistake.

The witnesses on both vessels agree that they came together at about a right angle. Now to bring them into this position at the instant of collision, if the steamer was, as she says, heading due west before she starboarded, and then fell off a point and a half, as she says, the schooner must have headed at the time of the collision six points to the southward of an east course. With the wind as it was, somewhere from west northwest, as the libellant's witnesses say, to northwest by north, as the steamer's witnesses say, and they agree that it was a fresh breeze, the wind would very probably have been on the schooner's starboard quarter before the vessels came together, and in that case she would have jibed over before she struck. It is testified by the schooner's witnesses, and not contradicted by the steamer's witnesses, that, after she struck, her head was hauled round by the collision to the southward, and she then jibed over.

But without relying too much on this circumstance, which depends, perhaps, upon greater exactness as to the direction of the wind and the course of the schooner than can be with certainty arrived at, it is difficult to understand why the schooner should have made a course so far to the south as it is necessary to put her on to find the steamer's account substantially true.

The claimants called two witnesses from the schooner Merwin, and rely upon their testimony as corroborating that of the steamer's witnesses. Their testimony, however, tends strongly to confirm the case of the schooner, that she was not before the collision heading at all to the southward. If they are not mistaken in the identity of the vessel that came into collision with the steamer, she passed the Merwin on the starboard side, being a faster sailer, and, having got by, she luffed across the Merwin's bows, and when she got a very short distance to windward of the Merwin, stood on her course about east until the collision, which took place, as they say, about a quarter of a mile from them on their port bow.

This evidence is relied on by the steamer as accounting for the steamer's first seeing the green light of the schooner, which she would show when luffing up across the bows of the Merwin, and then both her lights, when afterwards she changed her course. But the testimony does not bear out the theory of the case, which is essential to the corroboration of the account given by the steamer, which requires the schooner to have been standing at least on an east southeast course when the steamer starboarded, and still further to the southward when she struck. This testimony does not show that, when the schooner stood on her course to the eastward after crossing the bows of the Merwin, she was so near to the steamer as to make it improper for her to stand to the eastward, but rather the contrary; and although the Merwin had made the steamer's light before the other schooner passed her, the Scott may upon the testimony of the Merwin's witnesses have been three-quarters of a mile or more from the steamer when she headed east on her course again, and if she then made the steamer's light and kept on her course, this evidence is all consistent with that of the libellants' witnesses, And if, as the witnesses from the Merwin say, they kept the Scott in view till the collision, seeing her binnacle light, they could hardly have failed to observe it if she had headed southeast, thus crossing the bows of the Merwin again. Indeed, no conceivable motive is suggested for the schooner's taking a southeasterly course, especially just after luffing up to get further to windward. It is not shown that anything was in her way. She cannot have sheered to the south to avoid the steamer. Such a movement was not called for by the account which either party gives of the relative positions of the two vessels. Her proper course was easterly. The wind was fair. To head south of east would be going out of her proper course. On the other hand, although the proper course of the steamer was due west, yet she was bound to vary from that course as should be found necessary to avoid sailing vessels, of which her witnesses admit there were very many in that part of the Sound at that time. She was going through them at full speed, twelve miles an hour. That she should be off of her course for this reason is no ways improbable; and it is much more probable that the witnesses on her deck should be mistaken as to the precise course she was on when she made the two lights of the schooner, and that they should fail in remembering a departure more or less from that course to the southward for the purpose of avoiding some vessel, than that the schooner without any reason should have made a southeasterly course, and that the witnesses from her and from the Merwin should all be mistaken. There is really only one witness from the steamer who testifies that the vessel whose green light was seen on the starboard bow was the same vessel whose two lights were afterwards seen, and which ran into the steamer; and he was looking out for the lights of other vessels in sight. It is not very improbable, as claimed by the libellant's counsel, that it was not the same vessel. The lookout on the steamer having reported the green light on the starboard bow, paid no further attention to her till both lights appeared close by. But if the vessel was the same, and the green light of the schooner was seen as she luffed across the bows of the Merwin, the evidence is satisfactory that her movements were not properly attended to by the steamer; that she again stood east at a perfectly safe distance from the steamer, and that the steamer afterwards took a more southerly course across her bows, thus bringing on the collision. The steamer was in fault in not keeping a good lookout, and in not avoiding the schooner, as she was bound to do.

The counsel for the claimants insists that the schooner was at fault in having no lookout forward, the master having acted as lookout, and being stationed on the quarter-deck. If this management had led to the schooner's not observing the steamer, and from not observing her she had changed her course, and thus brought on the collision, the collision might be attributed to this cause; but as she saw the steamer seasonably and kept her in view, and kept on her course, as she was bound to do, it is impossible to attribute to the schooner any fault in respect to the lookout, which either charges her with the collision or relieves the steamer from the responsibility for it.

The claimants' counsel also insists that the schooner had an incompetent wheelsman, and attributes the erratic course which is charged upon the schooner to his wild steering; but the evidence shows that he had sufficient experience to hold the schooner to her course, and there is no ground in the testimony for this theory.

There must be a decree for the libellants, with a reference to compute the damages.

Case No. 2,758.

The CITY OF NEW YORK.

[3 Blatchf. 187;[1] 12 N. Y. Leg. Obs. 300.]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Sept., 1854.

SUPPLIES IN FOREIGN PORT—CHARTERED VESSEL.

1. Under a charter of a steam vessel, by which the charterer becomes her owner for the voyage and charged with her navigation, the agent of the charterer can bind the vessel for coal necessarily supplied to her in a foreign port, although the person furnishing the coal knew of the charter, and knew that, according to its terms, the charterer was bound to furnish coal for the voyage.

[Cited in The Lucia B. Ives, Case No. 8,590; The Columbus, Id. 3,044; The William Cook, 12 Fed. 920; The India, 16 Fed. 263; The Bombay, 38 Fed. 513; The Stroma, 53 Fed. 283. Distinguished in Stephenson v. The Francis, 21 Fed. 725; The Pirate, 32 Fed. 488.]

2. Where the charterer merely hires the use of the vessel, and her navigation remains with the general owner, if the master, on the credit of the vessel, procures coal for her, in a foreign port, when she has none, the vessel is chargeable for the price of the coal.

[Cited in The Washington Irving, Case No. 17,244; The Metropolis, Id. 9,503; The India, 14 Fed. 479; The Sydney L. Wright, Case No. 6,082a; Stephenson v. The Francis, 21 Fed. 723; The Cumberland, 30 Fed. 451.]

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the southern district of New York.]

In admiralty. This was a libel in rem, filed by Pennell Churchman and others, in the district court, against the steam-propeller City of New York, to recover the price of 130 tons of coal, furnished to that vessel at Porto Cabello, on the isthmus of Darien. The propeller, at the time the coal was furnished to her, was under charter to the firm of Haight & Palmer, of New York. The purchase price of the coal was $2,080. Captain Thompson, the agent of the libellants, who sold the coal, received from the purser of the propeller, on the sale, $1,000 in cash, and a draft on Haight & Palmer, for $1,080. The draft not being paid, this libel was filed, to recover the $1,080. The district court held that the sale was not made on the credit of the vessel, and dismissed the libel. [Case not reported.] From that decree the libellants appealed to this court.

Francis F. Marbury, for libellants.

George F. Betts and Charles Donohue, for claimants.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. 1. I am strongly inclined to think that Haight & Palmer, the charterers of the vessel in this case, are to be deemed owners of her for the voyage. If so, the purser of the vessel, who was their agent, was competent to bind her for the necessary supply of coal at Porto Cabello; and this, although the person furnishing it knew of the charter, and knew that, according to its terms, the charterers were bound to furnish coal for the voyage. Upon any other rule, the master or agent of a vessel in distress, in a foreign port, would oftentimes find himself unable to procure the necessaries essential for his relief. The voyage might be broken up, for want of supplies, or the vessel might go to decay in port, for want of proper repairs. I have found no case where it has been held that this knowledge on the part of the person furnishing the supplies or making the repairs, under the circumstances stated, affects the right to charge the vessel as security for the payment. The right to charge the general owner personally, is a very different question.

2. But, admitting that the charterers were not owners for the voyage, and were but hirers of the use of the vessel to carry passengers and freight, and that the general owners and the possession and navigation of her, the charter party resting in covenant, and not in a letting of the vessel, the result must, in my judgment, be the same. The proof shows that the vessel was out of coal, and went to Porto Cabello, it may be properly said, in distress for supplies, without which she could not have performed her voyage. I cannot doubt that the coal, if procured by the master under such circumstances, is a charge upon the vessel, according to the settled maritime law. The claimants, it is true, seek to exonerate her upon the testimony of the purser, who was the agent of the charterers, that he, and not the master, contracted for the supply of the coal, and that the master, for himself and the vessel, repudiated the purchase. The master has not been examined, the defence in this respect being allowed to rest upon the evidence of the purser. He is contradicted by Captain Thompson, who made the sale. According to his evidence, all parties were given to understand, expressly, that the vessel would be looked to, in case the draft drawn on Haight & Palmer should not be paid. The purser contradicts himself in several parts of his evidence, and, in other respects, it is not calculated to inspire confidence. He testifies, in the first place, that Captain Thompson did not tell him, at the time he consented to take the draft, that he should look to the vessel if it was not paid; but afterwards he is obliged to admit that Captain Thompson did tell him so. He also testifies that he had sufficient funds on board to pay for the coal and for the other expenses of the voyage, but he afterwards shows that in this he was mistaken.

I think the evidence of Thompson entitled to the most credit; and, according to that, the master of the steamer participated, or should be regarded as participating, in the purchase. He was present when the contract was made for the coal, and when the draft for the balance of the purchase money was accepted; and Captain Thompson, according to his own evidence, agreed to accept the draft only on condition that the ship should be liable if the draft was not paid at maturity. It is true, the master was silent, but the inference naturally drawn, under the circumstances, must have been, that he acquiesced in the condition.

[1] [Reported by Samuel Blatchford, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

3. The proofs show, that the sale was made and the draft taken under the expectation, on the part of Captain Thompson, that the vessel would be liable for the unpaid balance, if the draft was not paid at maturity. This is not contradicted by the evidence of the purser. That evidence seeks to establish the fact, that the master gave notice, at the time, that the vessel would not be considered as liable. On this point, in the absence of the testimony of the master, I think that of Captain Thompson entitled to the most weight, for the reasons already stated; and, according to that, the credit was given to the vessel.

I must, therefore, reverse the decree below, and decree that the vessel is chargeable for the balance due for the coal, with a reference to the clerk, if necessary, to ascertain the amount.

Case No. 2,759.

The CITY OF NEW YORK.

[8 Blatchf. 194.] [1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Feb. 6, 1871.

COLLISION—STEAMER AND VESSEL AT ANCHOR—FOG—LOOKOUT—SPEED—LIGHTS.

1. A steamboat, under way, colliding with a schooner at anchor in a customary anchorage place, held to be presumptively in fault and bound to excuse herself, by showing either that the schooner was in fault or that the accident was inevitable.

[Cited in The Florence P. Hall, 14 Fed. 417; The Rockaway, 19 Fed. 451; The Echo, Id. 454.]

2. There being a fog, the steamboat was also held to be in fault for not having a lookout on her bow.

3. The steamboat was also held in fault for being out of her proper track and for running at too great a rate of speed.

4. The schooner was held in fault for having her light in such a position that it was hidden from view by her sails, which were set.

In admiralty.

James C. Carter, for libellants.

Edward H. Owen and Charles Donohue, for claimants.

WOODRUFF, Circuit Judge. The schooner Mary Mankin was anchored on the usual anchorage ground for vessels of her class, in the harbor of New London, in the night of the 3d of May, 1862. The steamboat City of New York was one of a line of steamboats running between New London and the city of New York, entering or departing daily from the harbor of New London, and her officers must be taken to have known that the place where the Mary Mankin lay was customarily used for the anchorage of vessels. The place was on the west side or edge of the channel, and, to the eastward thereof, the width of the channel was abundantly sufficient for vessels entering and departing to do so without any inconvenience. The usual track of steamboats entering and departing was very considerably to the eastward of the place where the Mary Mankin lay, and she had lain anchored at that place since the previous Thursday afternoon. The City of New York had, during that time, passed her more than once. At about half-past eleven o'clock in the night, the steamboat ran into the schooner, striking on her starboard side, and cutting her down on that side, so that she sank within a very few minutes. These facts raise a presumption of fault in the navigation of the steamboat, which casts upon her the burthen of excusing herself; and this would require proof either that the schooner was in fault or that the accident was inevitable.

The steamboat has, I think, failed to show herself without fault. The night was very foggy, the fog so dense as at times to shut out lights from view. It was not so dense near the water or for some feet above the water, but was so dense a little higher up, that a vessel entering the harbor shortly before the collision could not, when passing it, see the light of the light-house a short distance below where the Mary Mankin lay, and yet she could see a light on shore and on the schooner and on another vessel lying near, when she came near to them. The steamboat, coming from her wharf, did also see lights on shore and on some other vessels which she passed, but she saw no light on the Mary Mankin. A vessel was lying a short distance above the Mary Mankin and another a short distance below. The light of the first was seen from the City of New York a few moments, and but a few moments, before the collision, and the light of the other was not seen until after the collision.

The first fault I impute to the City of New York is, that she had no look-out on her bow. She relied solely upon observations made from her pilot house and made by her master and pilots, her master declaring that he was himself on look-out, and at the time engaged in nothing else. Without saying that, under any possible circumstances, the master cannot divest himself of other cares and assume and discharge the duty of a look-out, so as to satisfy the rules of navigation, it is clear, that, in general, one to whom belongs the responsibility of controlling and directing the conduct of all the affairs on board, is not a proper look-out; and it is clear that, on such a night especially, the duty could not be performed so as to comply with the rules of prudence or the law, without a look-out in his proper place. Indeed, I think that this case well illustrates the importance of a rigid enforcement of the rule, that a look-out must be stationed forward, and for two reasons: (1.) If the fog was of uniform density, a man on the bow could penetrate it further, and see an object ahead sooner, than one who stood back at the pilot house; (2.) On such a night as this, when the fog was lighter nearer the water, he would see much further than the master or pilot, whose position was some eighteen or twenty feet above the water.

[1] [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

Again, I think the proof quite conclusive, that the steamboat was not, at the time of the collision, in her proper track down the channel. The general declaration of her master and pilots is, I think, overcome by the other testimony to the location of the schooner. One fact testified to by her own witnesses seems to me to render it certain that she was more to the westward than she should have been, and not only so, but that she was headed too far to the west. That fact is, that if she had not collided with the schooner, she would have gone between the two vessels between which the schooner lay. This is testified to by her own pilots. The proof touching the actual locations of those vessels, suggests that, if she had not struck the schooner, and had persisted in her course, she would probably have soon reached the shore.

I am not satisfied that the steamboat was running at a prudent rate of speed. The testimony of her master and pilots, confirming that of other witnesses, shows, that she did not, and probably could not, see the lights of the two vessels between which the schooner lay, until she was very near to them. In such a fog, with knowledge of the customary anchorage ground for vessels, and, especially, if she be taken to have known that the schooner was there at anchor, the highest degree of caution was required, either to keep her course well to the eastward, or to proceed so slowly as not to strike with power sufficient to cut a vessel nearly in two; or, else, if the fog was so dense as not to make these precautions practicable, not to attempt to go out. While the master, pilot and engineer describe her movement as slow, and as involving barely the motion of the engine, I think all the proof warrants the conclusion that her speed, at the time of the collision, was from six to eight miles an hour. True, this was in part due to the current setting out; but the alternative here again recurs—if the circumstances of danger called for a more moderate speed, she must observe it, or, if the current was such that she could not do so, and at the same time keep under control of her helm, she should not attempt it in so critical a situation.

I am, however, not satisfied that the accident is solely due to the fault of the steamboat. The proof does, indeed, abundantly show that the schooner had a light, and it also shows, to my entire satisfaction, not only that it was not seen from the steamboat, but that it was not visible to that or any other vessel coming down the channel. That channel was, according to the claim of the libellants, and by the concurring testimony of their witnesses, to the eastward of the place where the schooner lay. Indeed, one of their witnesses locates her on the very edge of what he calls the bank. She was headed, as the libellants allege and claim, and as their witnesses testify, north or but little to the west of north, meeting, head on, the current setting out of the harbor, and presenting her starboard side to the channel and to all vessels passing therein. This would be her natural position, and would be her permanent position, unless a wind should arise, violent enough to force her around against the current. Instead of having a light at her foremast, so elevated and open to view that it could be seen on either hand and however the wind might change her position, as, I think, she should have had, and instead of having the light on her starboard side, which might be permissible while she lay headed northerly, as the libellants allege she was, her light was placed in her port rigging. Heading northerly, the more clearly the libellants prove that she was on the westerly edge of the channel, the more conclusively they show that she placed her light where it was least likely to be seen by any to whom it was important to give notice of her presence. Whether persons on shore were so notified or not was of no importance. But, to make this error more certainly effectual to prevent vessels in the channel seeing her light, she had her foresail and mainsail set. Even if it were conceded, that, under ordinary circumstances, with sails all furled, a light in the port rigging might be sufficient and might be seen from starboard, she was bound to notice the effect of setting her sails, and, if there was adequate reason for setting them, to take care that her light was shifted or so set that the sails would not hide it; and she was bound, also, in reference to this precise point, to notice the direction of the wind and the position of these sails. On this occasion, the wind was southerly, blowing a little on her port quarter; and, of course, the sails, while hanging, would be in a line to receive the wind edgewise, and nearly fore-and-aft the schooner—a position well adapted to hide the light from view. That, if the light continued to burn brightly till the time of the collision, it was so hidden, is, I think, fully established. Now, although the steamboat was in fault, she was entitled to all the chances of avoiding collision, which a proper light in a proper place would give her.

It is strenuously insisted, that, before the collision, the schooner had, by force of the south-westerly wind acting upon her sails, been forced around to the eastward, so that her stern was much further out in the channel than the place where, after the collision, she was found. The claimants' witnesses describe her as lying crosswise the channel, when struck by the steamboat; and the length of her chain, 35 fathoms, is claimed to have been too great and to have permitted such a result, from the action of the wind on her sails. It is quite clear, that, if this be true, the light was most effectually hidden from view; and that fault becomes more obvious. It is not shown, however, by express testimony, that the length of chain was unusual or greater than prudence required, though I am myself wholly unable to perceive the propriety of giving a vessel anchored on one side of the channel so great a length of chain that, if the wind arose sufficiently to swing her outward towards the channel, she would project from two to three hundred feet from her anchor into that channel. Upon all the proofs, I think that this effect had been but partially produced, and that the direction of the blow and the course of the steamboat indicate that, while this fact may have contributed to the result, it is not sufficient to exonerate the steamboat from responsibility.

A decree for contribution by each vessel to the loss should be entered, each party bearing their own costs.

CITY OF NEW YORK, The (BAKER v.). See Case No. 765.

Case No. 2,760.

The CITY OF NORWICH.

[3 Ben. 575.] [1]

District Court, E. D. New York. Dec., 1869.

COMMON CARRIER—LOSS BY COLLISION—FIRE—BILL OF LADING.

1. A steamer and a schooner collided on Long Island Sound, in the night. The steamer was bound from New York to New Haven, and the schooner was closehauled, on a course nearly at right angles with the steamer's course, and kept that course unchanged. The steamer also kept her course unchanged, until close upon the schooner, which she did not see, as she claimed, until it was too late to avoid her. The schooner struck the steamer on her starboard side, making a large hole in her, into which the water rushed. When it reached the lower furnaces, flames burst out, and soon enveloped the boat. As the fire burnt off her upper works, and as she filled, she slowly sank, rolling over as she filled. Libels were filed against her, by several owners of the cargo on board. Some of the cargo was shipped on simple receipts, and some on bills of lading containing the following clause: "Dangers of the seas, fire, water, breakage, leakage, and all other accidents excepted—the risk of all which, it is stipulated, shall be borne by the owner." Held, that, if the schooner was not seen, as claimed by the steamer, until it was too late to allow of any change of her course, there was negligence on the part of those in charge of the steamer, in not seeing her sooner.

2. The restriction in the bills of lading could not relieve the vessel from loss occasioned by such negligence.

[Cited in The Montana, 17 Fed. 379.]

3. The fire must be considered as an incident of the collision. If it were true, as claimed, that, but for the fire, the vessel would not have sunk, and could have been towed in, such a consideration would not have the effect to screen the carrier, whatever might have been its weight in a question between insurers and insured; moreover, it was not proved that these particular goods were burned, or sunk in the boat.

4. There was no defence, under the act of March 3, 1851 [9 Stat. 635]. The vessel was liable, therefore, to all the libellants.

[Cited in Re Norwich & N. Y. Transp. Co., Case No. 10,362.]

BENEDICT, District Judge. These actions (fourteen in all) were separate proceedings in rem, instituted against the steamboat City of Norwich, by various shippers of cargo, to recover the value of certain goods, which were received on board the steamer, for transportation to New York, but were never delivered. After the seizure of the vessel, under processes issued upon several of the libels, it being made to appear that the claims likely to be brought against her, arising out of the same disaster, would exceed her value, she was bonded in her full value, the stipulation to be for the benefit of all parties who might come into this court and file libels against her, for damages caused by the same disaster.[2] After the discharge of the vessel under such a stipulation, one or two other libellants commenced proceedings in this court, and were, on motion, declared to be entitled to the benefit of the stipulation given for the vessel, and all the cases have been heard together upon their respective pleadings and proofs, and are now to be disposed of.

The various actions may be divided into two classes—one, where the goods sued for were shipped under a bare receipt, without any limitation of liability on the part of the carrier; the other, where there was a bill of lading containing the following clause: "Dangers of the seas, fire, water, breakage, leakage and all other accidents excepted—the risk of all which it is stipulated shall be borne by the owner." In other respects all the cases are alike.

The proofs showed the loss of the goods to have occurred as follows:—

The steamer, while proceeding from New Haven to New York in the night, and when in the Sound, some seven or eight miles north easterly of Eaton's Neck, came in collision with the schooner General Van Vliet, which was sailing close hauled, on a course nearly at right angles with that of the steamer. The steamer was seen from the schooner at some distance, and the course of the schooner was held unchanged. The steamer also held her course unchanged, until close upon the schooner, when it was too late to alter her course or materially check her speed, and the vessels came in violent contact, at nearly right angles with each other. The steamer received the blow on her larboard side, about sixty feet abaft the stem, where her hull was stove by the schooner's bow, a large hole being made, through which the water at once poured in large volume. In a very few moments after the blow, the water in the steamer reached the lower furnaces, and at once flames burst out, which shortly enveloped the boat. As the fire burned off her upper works, and as she filled, the steamer sank slowly, rolling over as she filled, and finally resting at the bottom, upside down. Much evidence was introduced on both sides tending to show the cause of the collision, which I have carefully considered, and as to which I deem it sufficient to say, that, if it be true, as claimed by the steamer, that the schooner was not seen from the steamer, until the vessels were too close together to admit of any change of course on the part of the steamer, there was, in my opinion, negligence, on the part of those in charge of the steamer, in not seeing the schooner as soon as they might have done, and in time to have avoided her.

[1] [Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

[2] For this stipulation, and the decision under which it was given, see 1 Ben. 89 [Place v. City of Norwich, Case No. 11,202].

The collision which is claimed to have caused the loss of the goods being thus found to have arisen from the negligence of the carrier, it follows that the libellants are entitled to recover, as well those having bills of lading as those having simple receipts, for it must be considered to have been settled that, while a carrier may restrict his liability by contract, such restrictions as appear in these bills of lading do not relieve from losses caused by the negligent navigation of his master and crew. 1 Pars. Mar. Law, p. 171–191.

But it is said that the goods in question were lost by the fire, and not by the collision, and that the fire was accidental, and not the result of negligence. My opinion, however, is, that the fire must be considered to have been simply an incident of the collision, a natural result, almost sure to follow such a blow inflicted in certain places upon such a vessel as this steamer—a result which, in this instance, did follow the blow almost immediately and directly—and, as between the shippers and the ship, in law, a result of the negligence which brought the steamer in contact with the schooner.

Indeed, the answer in the fourth article describes the fire as caused by the collision, and supposes it to be properly chargeable to the bad navigation of those on board the schooner.

I have not overlooked the argument which has been drawn from a line of proof, tending to show, from the specific gravity of the steamer, that, in the absence of the fire, the vessel would not have sunk below her promenade deck, and could then have been towed ashore, and her cargo saved; and, were this an action upon a policy of insurance against fire, it might be held, upon such proof, that, as between the insurers and insured, the sinking of the vessel was caused by fire; for fire, which was insured against, was one cause of the loss. But here the actions are against the carrier, who undertook to carry with care, and is shown guilty of a negligence which set in motion a train of circumstances, not necessarily indeed, but naturally, leading to the loss which occurred. The distinction between such actions and actions upon policies of insurance will be found stated in Grill v. General Iron Screw Collier Co., L. R. 1 C. P. 600.

And besides, the burden of proof being upon the carrier, it is not here shown that the particular goods sued for were burned by the fire or sunk in the boat. The evidence shows that some of the cargo was burned, and some sunk in the boat, and that some floated off, and was either picked up or lost in the water. But there is no evidence disclosing what became of these particular goods. All that is shown in regard to them is, that they were received by the carrier and never delivered, and that all the cargo was involved in the disaster of the 17th of April.

The proofs, therefore, fail to make out a foundation for the argument derived from the effect of the fire upon the specific gravity of the steamer and cargo.

These views dispose of the argument, which was based upon the act of March 3, 1851. Assuming that this steamer was not excluded from the effect of the act by the seventh section—a question which has not been raised upon this argument—and assuming, also, that the act, although confined, in terms, to the owners, can be construed as applying also to the vessel—neither of which questions I here decide—it appears to be clear, that the first section of the act can have no application in a case where fire is but an incident of a collision. Losses by collision are provided for in a subsequent section, where, by the terms of the statute, the owners are made liable for such losses, to the extent of their interest in the vessel.

My conclusion, accordingly, is, that these respective libellants are entitled to recover, of this steamer, the amount of the damages by them sustained by reason of the non-delivery of their goods. A decree will be, accordingly, entered, with orders of reference to ascertain and report the amount of such damages.

[NOTE. For a history of the subsequent proceedings in this case, see Case No. 2,762, and note.]

Case No. 2,761.

The CITY OF NORWICH.

[4 Ben. 271.][1]

District Court, S. D. New York. June, 1870.

COLLISION—CARRIER—LIMITATION OF LIABILITY BY NOTICE—NEGLIGENCE.

Where a receipt by a common carrier for property entrusted to him, stated that no package, if lost, damaged or stolen, should be deemed of greater value than $100, unless specifically receipted for, and it appeared that the property in question was lost by negligence of the carrier, held, that the limitation of liability was ineffective, against a loss arising from negligence, as being against public policy.

[1] [Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

[Cited in Hart v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 112 U. S. 342, 5 Sup. Ct. 156.]

This case came up on exceptions to the report of a commissioner, to whom it was referred to ascertain the libellant's damages. The action was by a shipper of cargo on board the steamer, which was sunk in a collision with a schooner, occasioned by negligence on the part of the steamer. [See Place v. The City of Norwich, Case No. 11,202; and, also, The City of Norwich, Id. 2,760, next preceding.]

BENEDICT, District Judge. The only one of the questions, sought to be raised by the exceptions in this cause, which is now open in the court, is, whether the portion of the receipt, given by the carrier upon the shipment of the goods lost, and put in evidence by the libellants, which states "no package, if lost, damaged or stolen, to be deemed of greater value than $100, unless specifically receipted for at a greater valuation," can be effective to limit the amount of the recovery in this action. My opinion is that the words referred to cannot be effective to limit the recovery of the libellants, in a case like this. It has been decided, that the loss of these goods arose from actual negligence on the part of the carriers, and the reasons, which lead to the determination that the receipt is not effective to exempt from liability caused by actual negligence, apply to the portion of the receipt in question, as well as to any other part. To permit carriers to fix a limitation to the amount of their liabilities for their own negligence, is, in effect, to permit them to exempt themselves from such liability. Every consideration of public policy, which applies in the one case, seems equally applicable in the other. The exceptions must therefore be overruled, and the report confirmed.

[NOTE. For a history of the subsequent proceedings in this case, see Case No. 2,762, and note.]

Case No. 2,762.

The CITY OF NORWICH.

[6 Ben. 330.] [1]

District Court, E. D. New York. Jan., 1873.

LIMITING LIABILITY OF SHIP OWNERS—COLLISION—PRACTICE.

1. A collision occurred between a steamboat and a schooner, by which both vessels were sunk. The steamboat was raised by her owners and repaired, after which various suits were brought against her in this court in admiralty, to recover damages for such collision. Those suits were consolidated, and, by order of the court, one stipulation for the value of the steamboat was given in all. Subsequently her owners filed this petition, for the purpose of obtaining the benefit of the act of March 3, 1851 (9 Stat. 635), limiting the liability of ship owners, praying an appraisement of the value of the petitioners' interest in the steamboat and her freight, for that purpose. Objection was made on behalf of the parties who had claims against her: Held, that it was not necessary to the jurisdiction of the court over this matter, that the court should have possession of the vessel or her proceeds, or of a fund representing the proceeds, over which the court had already obtained control, through the exercise of its ordinary jurisdiction.

2. The pendency of the suits against the vessel, and the existence of the stipulation for value given in those suits, afforded no reason why this proceeding should not be taken, and that the petitioners were entitled to the order directing the appraisement as prayed for.

[Cited in Thomassen v. Whitwell, Case No. 13,930; Re Norwich & N. Y. Transp. Co., Id. 10,362.]

3. A proceeding, to obtain the benefit of the act in question, is not an action in rem, but is a proceeding sui generis, which partakes rather of the character of a suit in personam.

[See note at end of case.]

[In admiralty. Libel by George Place and Charles Place against the steamboat City of Norwich to recover damages for loss of cargo by reason of a collision between the libelled vessel and the schooner General Van Vliet, April 18, 1866. The Norwich & New York Transportation Company, owner of the steamboat, filed an answer and petition to have the benefit of the act of 1851 for a limitation of its liability. The court denied the prayer of the petition, but a stipulation was entered into, between the libellants and other shippers and the claimant, whereby the vessel was bonded for her full value, the stipulation to be for the benefit of all parties who might come in to recover damages for the same disaster. See Place v. The City of Norwich, Case No. 11,202. The vessel was discharged under the stipulation, and the cases of all the parties who came in were heard together, a decree entered for the respective libellants, and a reference ordered to ascertain and report the amount of the damages. See Id. 2,760. Exceptions were taken to the report of the master, which were overruled. See Id. 2,761.

[On March 4, 1872, the supreme court rendered a decision in the case of Norwich & N. Y. Transp. Co. v. Wright, 13 Wall. (80 U. S.) 104, on an appeal from the circuit court for the district of Connecticut. See Wright v. Norwich & N. Y. Transp. Co., Case No. 18,087, affirming same case in the district court, Id. 18,086. In that case the claimant of the steamboat had filed a petition setting forth the filing of the libel in the eastern district of New York, and praying for relief under the limited liability act of 1851. The district court denied the relief, and on appeal the decree of the district court was affirmed. The claimant then appealed to the supreme court, which, in the opinion before referred to, held that the limited liability act of 1851 adopted the general maritime law in reference to limited liability, as contradistinguished from the English law measuring the liability by the value of the ship and freight after, instead of before, the collision; that the act embraced cases of damage received by collision, as well as cases of injury to the cargo of the offending ship; that the district courts, as courts of admiralty, have jurisdiction to administer the law; and that the proper court to hear and determine the question is the court which has possession of the fund, i. e. the ship and freight, or the proceeds and value thereof.

[1] [Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

[By leave of the court, and in view of the decision of the supreme court before referred to, the Norwich & New York Transportation Company commenced the present proceeding.]

J. W. C. Leveridge, for petitioners.

Martin & Smith and H. C. Place, in opposition.

BENEDICT, District Judge. This is a cause of limitation of liability promoted by the owners of the City of Norwich to exempt them from liability for the loss and damage resulting from a collision between that steamboat and the schooner General Van Vliet, which occurred in the Sound on the 18th of April, 1866.

The cause has been commenced by a petition which prays, among other things, that this court would direct an appraisement of the value of the interest of the petitioners in the said steamboat and her freight pending, to the end that a sum of money equal to the said value be paid into court by the petitioners, or secured to be so paid by them, and they declared exempt from further liability, and that a monition issue against all persons claiming damages from any loss occasioned by said collision, citing them to appear before this court and make due proof of their respective claims. Upon the presentation of this petition, notice of a time when the application for the order prayed would be made, was directed to be given by publication, at which time many persons, having demands arising out of said collision, appeared, but only for the purpose of calling the attention of the court to certain aspects of the case, as it stands.

In behalf of these parties, the first proposition urged upon me is, that the jurisdiction of a court of admiralty over a cause of limitation of liability is dependent upon a prior possession of the vessel's proceeds, or a fund representing such proceeds over which the admiralty court has already obtained control through the exercise of its ordinary jurisdiction. This is claimed to have been decided by the supreme court in the case of Wright v. Norwich & N. Y. Transp. Co., 13 Wall. [80 U. S.] 104.

I do not so understand that decision, and the law must be otherwise. As I read the opinion of the supreme court in the case referred to, the jurisdiction of the admiralty over a cause of limitation of liability is there maintained, upon the ground that the subject-matter of such a cause makes it a cause of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction within the meaning of the constitution. It is the nature of the relief to the owner of a ship which determines the jurisdiction. The supreme court declares that a court of admiralty is better adapted to administer that relief than any other. "The district courts, as courts of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, have jurisdiction of the matter." The matter involved is the ascertaining of the extent of the liability of the owner of a ship, by reason of some occurrence in the course of the employment of the ship, and, unless that liability is proved to have been terminated by the total destruction of the ship without freight earned, apportioning among the creditors entitled thereto a sum equal to that liability, to which fund alone when paid into the registry the creditors can resort, and upon the payment of which or the surrender of his interest in his ship and her freight, the ship owner is entitled to be decreed exempt from all liability, in pursuance of the act of 1851. The nature of the relief being sufficient to bring the cause within the jurisdiction of the admiralty, it is not necessary that there should be prior suits in the admiralty to recover such demands, nor a prior possession of the vessel or of any fund by the admiralty court under the ordinary process in rem of the admiralty, or otherwise.

In England this jurisdiction is exercised by the court of chancery, and it there attaches upon the mere existence of claims against the owner of a ship, against which he is entitled to relief under the limited liability acts. The English admiralty also has jurisdiction, but only by virtue of a statute which confers the jurisdiction when "the ship or her proceeds are under the arrest of the admiralty." An actual possession of the ship or her proceeds, or "a state of things amounting to an equivalent for the arrest of the vessel," is, therefore, necessary to enable the English admiralty to entertain a cause of limitation of liability. But we have no such statute in the United States, and the jurisdiction of the American admiralty over such a cause is held by the supreme court to be conferred by the act which, in creating the district courts, gave them cognizance of all causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction. The power so acquired, to be effectual, must be as ample as that exercised by the English chancery in similar cases, and so the supreme court appear to intend.

It may well be, and indeed must be, in order to proceed to the final accomplishment of the result aimed at by the act of 1851 that, in cases where there is any subsisting liability on the part of the ship owner by reason of an interest in a ship in existence, the court must have the possession of the fund representing the value of that interest, upon the surrender of which the act of 1851 transfers thereto all the rights of the creditors; but the jurisdiction of the court cannot be dependent upon the possession of such a fund, otherwise it would follow that, when the ship is wholly lost and no freight earned, and consequently no fund to distribute, notwithstanding the act exempts the ship owner in such a case, no court of admiralty could give effect to the act; and, as the supreme court has decided the state courts and the national courts of law and equity to be without jurisdiction, the precise result would follow which the supreme court has sought to avoid—namely, a failure of the act for want of a court to give it effect.

It may not be amiss, in this connection, to notice that the relief given by the act of 1851 may be sought under a variety of circumstances. There may be a ship left by the disaster in existence, which her owner has ready to be surrendered, free from all liens or demands other than those against which the act gives relief. She may be in his possession ready to be surrendered, but encumbered with liens, arising prior to the accident against the result of which the ship owner asks to be protected. She may be in existence, but in the custody of a state court under an attachment against the property of the owner, on one of the demands against which he is entitled to be relieved by her surrender. She may be in existence, but at the bottom of the sea, whence she cannot be raised except by an expenditure equal to her value, or at the bottom of a river whence she could be raised by a small expenditure, but one larger than her owner can make. Her freight may be in the hands of the ship owner ready to be surrendered, but it may also be in the hands of an irresponsible master; it may be still due from the freighter, and the right to it disputed by him in some other tribunal, or it may be in some foreign land. It will often occur, therefore, that there is no vessel in custody which will afford foundation for a proceeding in rem, and no fund to be paid into the registry of the court; and yet the act of 1851 intends that in all cases the ship owner shall obtain the relief afforded by the act, when the value of his property put at the hazard of the voyage, proves insufficient to discharge the liability arising out of the voyage. While, then, in most cases, doubtless, the possession of a fund for distribution will give to the cause of limited liability the aspect of a proceeding in rem, it is not such a proceeding, but rather partakes of the character of an action in personam. It is a proceeding sui generis, quite analogous, in respect to the maritime adventure involved, and the liability which arises therein, to a proceeding in bankruptcy—a proceeding limited, of course, to the maritime capital involved, and resulting in a discharge of the owner from certain classes of demands to which he has become liable in the use of that capital. It is taken in the admiralty by reason of the subject-matter, and is there to be conducted as the necessities of such a cause may require, in order to accomplish the result intended by the act of 1851.

But, if the presence of a fund within the control of the court of admiralty were necessary to give that court jurisdiction of a cause of limitation of liability, it is going far to say that it is also necessary that the court should have acquired the prior possession of the fund by virtue of its ordinary admiralty process. Even in England, where an arrest of the ship is by statute made necessary to give jurisdiction to the admiralty, it has been held that "a state of things amounting to an equivalent for the arrest of the ship," is sufficient to support the jurisdiction; and the deposit by the ship owner of a sum equal to the extent of his liability has been considered such an equivalent. James v. London & S. W. R. Co., 26 Law T. 195; The Northumbria, 21 Law T. 683. Certainly then, in this country, where there is no such restriction as in England, the deposit of such a fund in the court of admiralty will support the jurisdiction of that court to administer it. In this case there is such a fund tendered by the petitioner, and ready to be paid into court when so directed.

Nor does the proposition that the possession of a vessel or her proceeds is necessary to give jurisdiction of a cause of limitation of liability derive any support from the admiralty rules of 1872. On the contrary, rule 57 provides for the conduct of such a cause when the vessel has never been libelled, nor any suit brought in any court of admiralty, but only a suit against the owner in a court of law.

But it is further urged, that these petitioners are already in court, because their vessel has been libelled in this court, in an ordinary proceeding in rem, which is still pending. There is pending in this court a proceeding in rem brought against the steamboat City of Norwich by some of the creditors, against whom the petitioners are asking now to be protected; but that proceeding is no obstacle in the way of this proceeding. The only effect of the suit in rem is to fix this district as the one in which the cause of limitation of liability is to be taken by virtue of rule 58. The act of 1851, does not take away the right to institute a proceeding in rem, nor does it in any way interfere with the discharge of a vessel on bail in such suit, but it does permit the ship's owner thereafter to institute his cause of limitation of liability, and, upon complying with the statute, thereby to obtain a stay of all proceedings in the suit in rem, and thus in effect be released from any stipulation given in that suit. It is doubtless true, that if this vessel was still in custody, in the suit in rem pending against her, a transfer of her to a trustee appointed by this court, in pursuance of the act of 1851, would secure a transfer of the possession from that of the marshal to that of the trustee; and it is no less true, that if a sum of money, representing the proceeds of a sale of this vessel in the suit in rem, was in the registry of the court, that fund, or so much thereof as should be necessary, could be transferred to the credit of this cause to save trouble and expense; and the probability that some such action would often be found convenient or necessary to prevent injustice, may have been one of the reasons for causing the pendency of a suit in rem to determine the district in which the cause of limitation of liability is to be taken; but the two causes should not be considered as connected or in any sense dependent one upon the other. I think it would prove detrimental to all interests, if any effect be given to the act of 1851, calculated to impair either the right of a lien creditor to seize the vessel by a proceeding in rem taken in time, or the right of the owner to obtain the discharge of his vessel from such seizure, by giving the ordinary stipulation for value, with a knowledge that by proper proceedings taken in a cause of limitation of liability, he can be relieved therefrom, when it shall appear that he is exempt from liability, either because the disaster which caused the loss resulted in the total destruction of his vessel without freight earned, or because he has in such cause surrendered all his interest in the ship and freight, and thereby transferred to such fund, all liability for the demand, to secure which until such time his stipulation for value was given. So, as I conceive, the supreme court have intended to be understood. It cannot well be supposed, that it has been intended to decide that the value of this steamboat, when seized in the suit in rem after she had been raised and repaired, is the limit of the liability of her owners, by reason of a disaster which occurred some time before. No such question appears to have been involved in the case before the court.

These remarks dispose also of the further objection made, that the petitioners do not afford the court of admiralty, any case for the exercise of its jurisdiction, because they do not offer to bring in their vessel, nor pay into the registry the sum, at which her value was fixed in the suit in rem, nor do they admit that the stipulation for value given in the suit in rem may be subjected to the claims of those who are to be cited to appear in this cause. There is no fund in this court, in the suit in rem, nor any stipulation there, such as is to be given in this cause, nor any necessity for any resort to the stipulation that was there given, to create a fund which might be transferable to this cause, nor was the value of the petitioners' interest in the vessel and her freight ever ascertained in that suit. An application was made to have that value ascertained in that suit, and to be permitted therein to give a stipulation for the amount of the owners' liability, and to pay in the freight; but the application was denied, on the ground that the proceeding to obtain relief under the act of 1851 was a separate proceeding, and could not be taken as a part of the proceeding in rem. The stipulation which was afterwards taken in that suit does not purport to represent the amounts of the owners' liability, under the act of 1851, and was not taken with any reference to the provisions of that act. The action of this court, in denying the application made in the suit in rem—see 1 Ben. 89 [Place v. The City of Norwich, Case No. 11,202]—seems to be confirmed by the decision of the supreme court in the Case of Wright, and accordingly this cause is now instituted. It is the first institution of such a cause by these petitioners, and it is to be conducted as a cause by itself, in which the petitioners, if they succeed, may obtain a decree exempting them from liability, and restraining any further action in the suit in rem, pending in this court, as well as in the other actions pending against them elsewhere.

I am unable, therefore, to see why, as this cause now stands, the petitioners are not entitled to an order directing an appraisement of the value of their interest in the City of Norwich, and her freight, pending the proceedings, and it is accordingly referred to a commissioner of this court to hold such appraisement, and report to this court the said value and amount. Notice of the time and place of such appraisement will, of course, be given to any parties who may duly enter their appearance in this cause.

[NOTE. On the coming in of the commissioner's report, exceptions were taken thereto, which were overruled, and the court made a decree authorizing the payment of the appraised value of the steamer into court, and appointed a commissioner to take proof of claims, etc. On a subsequent report of the commissioner, a final decree was entered (January, 1879), distributing the fund in court and discharging the petitioners from further demands. Case unreported.

[The case was then appealed to the circuit court, which affirmed the decree of the district court (October, 1879; decree entered July 3, 1882, case unreported), and from this decree the claimant of the schooner, and Place and others of the libellants, appealed to the supreme court.

[The decree of the circuit court was affirmed by the supreme court, the grounds of which affirmance are set forth in the syllabus to the case, by Mr. Justice Bradley, reported in 118 U. S., at pages 468, 526, 6 Sup. Ct. 1150, under the title of The City of Norwich. So much of the grounds of affirmance as bear upon the specific questions involved in the case are here given:

[The owner of the City of Hartford was entitled to a limitation of liability to the value of its interest in ship and freight, under the act of 1851. Rev. St. §§ 4282–4287.

[The point of time at which the amount or value of the owner's interest in ship and freight is to be taken for fixing its liability is the termination of the voyage on which the loss or damage occurs.

[In the present case, the voyage was terminated when the ship had sunk, and her value at that time was the limit of the owner's liability; and the subsequent raising of the wreck and repair of the ship, giving her an increased value, had nothing to do with the liability of the owner.

[No freight except what is earned is to be estimated in fixing the amount of the owner's liability.

[Insurance is no part of the owner's interest in the ship or freight, within the meaning of the law, and does not enter into the amount for which the owner is held liable.

[The limitation of liability is applicable to proceedings in rem against the ship, as well as to proceedings in personam against the owner; the limitation extends to the owner's property as well as to his person.

[The right to proceed for a limitation of liability is not lost or waived by a surrender of the ship to underwriters.

[The district court had jurisdiction to receive the new petition and to proceed thereunder.]

Case No. 2,763.

The CITY OF NORWICH et al.

[8 Ben. 206.] [1]

District Court, E. D. New York. July, 1875.

COLLISION IN EAST RIVER — STEAMBOAT AND TUG —CROSSING COURSES.

1. The brig T. Z., while being towed down the East river by the tug F. W., at the end of a hawser, came in collision with the steamboat C., and her owner filed a libel against the C. and the F. W. to recover the damages. The case was heard on a single deposition, that of the captain of the T. Z., examined as a witness in behalf of the libellants. The tide was ebb and the day was fair, and the vessels came in sight of each other at a good distance apart, the C. having come round the Battery from the North river into the East river. The C. claimed that it was the duty of the F. W., because she had the C. on her starboard hand, to keep out of her way, and that instead of doing so she sheered in towards the New York shore across the bows of the C., and thus brought the brig in collision with her. The F. W. claimed that the C. was on her port hand as she came down the river, and instead of keeping on the port hand starboarded her helm and ran across the hawser, and thus came in collision with the brig. Held, that the claim made by the C. was not taken in the libel, nor was it sustained by the witness, his evidence showing that the C., in coming round from the North river, had reached to the middle of the East river, on the port hand of the tug and tow, and after that had so neared the New York shore as to be within 400 feet of the piers when she struck the hawser.

2. No reason being shown for her changing her course so as to approach the New York side of the river, she must be held to have caused the collision by such movement, and to be solely in fault.

In admiralty.

Goodrich & Wheeler, for libellant.

J. W. C. Leveridge and W. R. Beebe, for the City of Norwich.

R. D. Benedict and Andrew Stewart, for the Woodruff.

BENEDICT, District Judge. This action is brought by Henry Thackray, the owner of the brig Torrid Zone, to recover of the Sound steamer City of Norwich, and the steamtug F. Woodruff, for damages arising from a collision which occurred in the East river, on the 18th day of June, 1874.

While the pleadings interposed by the respective vessels are at issue upon most, if not all, material points, the case has been submitted to me for determination upon the deposition of a single witness, the master of the brig, produced by the libellants. The right of parties to ask a decision of the court upon the written deposition of a single witness from one of the colliding vessels, out of many at hand, cannot be denied; and still I must say that I dislike to be compelled to determine the rights of parties in this way, when those rights are made to depend in great measure upon the construction to be put upon the expressions of the witness. From this deposition and the admission of the pleadings, it appears that the brig Torrid Zone was being towed down the East river upon a hawser by the tug Franklin Woodruff. The City of Norwich was bound up the East river, having come around the Battery and into the East river upon a starboard helm. The weather was fair, the tide ebb, and all vessels could be easily seen. When in the East river the City of Norwich ran across the hawser by which the brig was being towed by the Woodruff, and so came in contact with the brig, causing the damage sued for. It appears that the vessels saw each other as they approached, and that the collision arose from the attempt of both the steamer and the tug to take the New York side in passing.

On the part of the City of Norwich, it is contended that the tug, having the City of Norwich on her starboard hand as she approached, ported, and ran across the steamer's bow, thus causing the collision.

But this position is not taken by the libellant upon the argument, does not appear in the libel, and is not supported by the witness. On the contrary, the deposition shows that the course of the tow was down the New York side of the river, bearing towards the New York side, while that of the City of Norwich was outside of the course of the tow, and bearing towards the middle of the river until she reached the middle of the river, and that afterwards she neared the New York side, so that when she struck the hawser of the tow she was only about 400 feet from the New York side. The channel of the East river curves sharply between the points at which these vessels sighted each other and the point of collision; and the course pursued by the City of Norwich, as described by the only witness called, was a course which crossed the course of the tug from the middle towards the New York side of the channel. No cause is shown for taking this course. For all that appears, she might have kept in the middle of the river, which the witness swears she had once reached. Had she done this no collision would have occurred.

Upon this evidence, therefore, I cannot do otherwise than hold the City of Norwich in fault for thus crossing towards the New York side before a tow, seen by her to be intending to pass down on that side.

[1] [Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and B. Lincoln Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

Let a decree be entered condemning the City of Norwich to pay the damages, and dismissing the libel against the Woodruff.

CITY OF NORWICH, The (PLACE v.). See Case No. 11,202.

Case No. 2,764.

The CITY OF PANAMA.

[5 Sawy. 63;[1] 1 San Fran. Law J. 329.]

District Court, D. California. Jan. 15, 1878.

COLLISION—MODERATE SPEED.

When a steamer was being navigated at the rate of at least eight miles an hour, in a dense fog, and in the usual track of vessels approaching this harbor, from ports to the northward: Held, that she was not going at a moderate speed, as required by section 4233, rule 21, Rev. St. U. S.

[Cited in The Pennsylvania, 12 Fed. 917.]

In admiralty.

Milton Andros, for libellant.

Delos Lake and H. P. McKoon, for claimant.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. On the night of the thirtieth of June, 1876, during a dense fog, the steamer City of Panama came in collision with the schooner Bill the Butcher. The collision occurred at some distance from the shore, but in the usual and frequented track of vessels entering this harbor from ports to the northward. No fault appears to be attributable to either vessel in respect to lights, lookouts, sounding the steam-whistle, or blowing the fog-horn. The only question is, whether the steamer was going at the "moderate speed" required by the statute.

In the very numerous cases which have arisen in this country and in England with regard to the meaning of this term it has been uniformly held that it admits of no precise definition. What under some circumstances would be a moderate speed would under others be considered excessive. Mr. Justice Lowell observes that the decisions only prove that there is scarcely any rate of speed that has not been held to be too great upon some state of facts. The Blackstone [Case No. 1,473]. The general rule seems to be that steamers, in a fog, must go at such a rate of speed as will enable them to avoid a collision by slowing, stopping, or reversing, within the distance at which, under the particular circumstances of each case, an approaching vessel can be discovered.

In the case of The Europa, 1 Pritch. Adm. Dig. 187, the privy council is reported to have decided that if the steamer was navigated at a rate which made it impossible for her to avoid collision with a ship, "discovering it only at the distance at which alone it could be discovered, that it followed as an inevitable consequence that she was going at a rate of speed at which it was not lawful for her to navigate." "This," as Mr. Justice Lowell remarks, "makes the fact of collision the conclusive test of negligence in all cases in which the sailing vessel is in no fault," to which may be added the qualification "where some overruling necessity does not deprive the steamer of liberty of action." The diligence of counsel has collected a long list of cases in which the general rule above laid down is applied, under a great variety of circumstances, to steamers going at rates of speed, in some instances, far less than that (eight miles per hour) at which the City of Panama was navigated.[2]

The cases also disclose the inflexibility with which the courts of this country and of England reject the various and sometimes plausible excuses set up by steamers for what is in fact a violation of the law. Some of these are: That in inland navigation it is necessary to maintain, in a fog, the usual rate of speed, in order that the vessel's position may be known; that by running rapidly through a fog the vessel is sooner out of it, and thus the danger of collision is diminished; that the vessel was under contract with the government, or was carrying the mails; that in Atlantic voyages, to diminish the speed would paralyze mercantile transactions and interfere with business and trade; that a vessel is more easily and quickly checked if going at a considerable speed and with a high pressure of steam than if going at a slower rate and with low pressure of steam, and therefore that a high speed conduces to safety. To all these excuses it is answered that the law requires steamers to go in a fog at a moderate speed, and it is not for their managers to violate or for the courts to disregard the provisions of the law.

In the case at bar the steamer's rate of speed was at least eight miles an hour. A very dense fog prevailed. The schooner was not discovered until about half a minute before the collision. At the steamer's rate of speed a collision was then inevitable. The evidence shows that at a speed of eight miles an hour she would go about four times her length if shut off and reversed. This would be more than three times the distance between the vessels when the schooner was discovered. The steamer's course lay on the track of vessels entering the harbor from the north, and this was made known to her not only by the usual course of trade but by the fog-horns which she heard at intervals during the night. The quartermaster testifies that he heard a fog-horn about six or eight seconds before the collision. This witness, who was called by the claimant, states the speed of the steamer to have been eight or nine miles per hour, and that at the time of the collision the vessel had gone off only about a point and a half, notwithstanding that her helm was put hard a-starboard the moment the schooner was discovered. I think there can be no doubt, under these circumstances, that the steamer was going at too great a speed, or else that her lookouts were inefficient.

[1] [Reported by L. S. B. Sawyer, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

[2] The Pennsylvania [Case No. 10,947]; Id., 19 Wall. [86 U. S.] 125; The Westphalia [Case No. 17,460]; The City of Guatemala [Id. 2,747]; The Hansa [Id. 6,037]; The D. S. Gregory [Id. 4,099]; The Franconia [Id. 5,049]; The Western Metropolis [Id. 17,441]; The Colorado [Id. 3,028]; The Magna Charta, 4 Marit. Law Cas. 153; Dolner v. The Monticello [Case No. 3,971]; The Java [Id. 7,232]; Jane v. The Great Eastern, Holt, Adm. Cas. 167, 180; The Pennsylvania, 3 Marit. Law Cas. 477; The Virgil, 2 W. Rob. Adm. 202; Macready v. Goldsmith, 18 How. [59 U. S.] 91; The Batavier, 1 Spinks, 378; The James Adger [Case No. 7,188]; The Blackstone [Id. 1,473]; Rogers v. The St. Charles, 19 How. [60 U. S.] 108; The Europa, 1 Pritch. Adm. Dig. pp. 186, 187, §§ 550, 551.

Decree for the libellants and reference to the commissioner to ascertain and report damages.

Case No. 2,765.

The CITY OF PARIS.

[1 Ben. 174.][1]

District Court, E. D. New York. May, 1867.[2]

COLLISION IN NEW YORK HARBOR — STEAMER AND SCHOONER — LOOKOUT — CHANGE OF COURSE IN EXTREMIS.

1. Where a steamer going to sea through a crowded harbor, chose a passage between two vessels at anchor, and seeing a schooner crossing the passage, at once starboarded her helm to go under the schooner's stern if possible, and slowed and stopped her engine, and the schooner, which had not kept a good lookout, on seeing the steamer as she passed by the vessel which was anchored off the steamer's port bow, luffed a little, and then kept off immediately, and the steamer struck the schooner near her foremast and sunk her, held, that the steamer had no right of way out to sea through the passage in question.

2. Though the steamer did all she could after undertaking the passage, she was in fault for not stopping sooner. Having kept on and placed herself in a position involving danger of collision, and well calculated to excite alarm, she must be held responsible for the consequences.

3. The schooner's luff did not appear to have prevented her from passing the steamer's track, but if it did, being a movement made in extremis, and under the alarm caused by the near approach of the steamer, it was no ground for holding her chargeable.

[Cited in The Havilah, 33 Fed. 877.]

4. If the court could see that the careless watch on the schooner had contributed to the collision, she would have been held in fault; but with a good lookout she would have been bound to hold the course she did till the luff, and the luff, if it was a false manoeuvre, was not caused by the want of a lookout, but by the dangerous attitude of the steamer.

[See note at end of case.]

In admiralty. This action was brought [by Henry P. Simmons and others] to recover the sum of $7,200, being the alleged value of the schooner Percy Heilner, which vessel, while proceeding across the North river to Jersey City, was sunk by a collision with the steamer City of Paris, at the time proceeding down the river bound to sea. The place of the collision was below the Battery, and to the east of Ellis' Island,—the time, about nine o'clock in the morning,—the tide, ebb,—the weather clear, and the wind blowing freshly from the E. N. E. The river below the Battery was quite full of vessels, riding athwart the river, tailing to the west, so that the passage of vessels down the river was much obstructed. Just to port of the direction of the Narrows, and east of Ellis' Island, there was an opening between the stern of the brig Hermania and one or two vessels lying to west of and a little below her. This opening formed a passage, which, although of sufficient width to permit the steamer to pass through, was too narrow to allow her to change her direction more than a point or two, when once her course was laid for it; and, as the wind and tide were, when once in the passage, she could not stop, without danger of being driven upon the vessels to the west and below. The schooner was sailing before the wind, upon a course which would carry her across this passage, passing from east to west, a short distance below the brig, and her rate of speed was such as to bring her to the passage at about the same time with the steamer. Some doubt appears to have existed in the minds of those in charge of the steamer as to where they should pass through the fleet of vessels which lay before them, and after consultation the opening described to the west of the brig was selected. When the schooner was first seen by those in charge of the steamer, the steamer was heading for the middle of the passage in question, and the schooner was in range of the brig off the steamer's port bow. As soon as the schooner was seen, the wheel of the steamer was put hard-a-starboard, and the engine slowed. When she had swung a point and a half to the east, and as far as it was safe to swing, for fear of the brig, her course was steadied, and the engines stopped, but her headway continuing, she passed the brig and came in contact with the starboard side of the schooner. Being then in danger of getting on the vessels to the west, she started her engine again, and pushed through the passage with the schooner hanging to her bow, and when through, backed off from the schooner which at once sank.

Owen, Gray & Owen, for libellants, argued: 1. That the steamer was in fault upon the facts, (a) in that she was running at too high a rate of speed for a crowded harbor, (b) in that she was not slowed down before coming up to the narrow passage between the vessels, (c) in that she did not have a proper lookout, and (d) in that she was not stopped soon enough.

[1] [Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

[2] [Affirmed by the circuit court (case not reported). Decree of circuit court affirmed by supreme court in The City of Paris, 9 Wall. (76 U. S.) 634.]

2. That it was the statutory duty of the steamer to "keep out of the way" of the schooner, and not having done so, she is responsible for the consequences of the collision, unless she has succeeded in showing that she was prevented from so doing by the schooner not keeping her course. 13 Stat. 60; The Fairbanks [9 Wall. 420], Judge Betts; 13 Eng. Adm. R.

3. That the claimants had failed to show that the schooner did not keep her course, as the law required her to do, but that the weight of the testimony was that she did keep her course.

4. That if the schooner did luff, and then immediately kept off, as claimed by the steamer, still that furnished no excuse for the steamer. Even in such case she might and could have, with due and proper precautions, avoided the schooner. (a.) Such luffing and then keeping off did not embarrass the movements of the steamer. Her wheel had been put to starboard, and there it was kept, as was testified, until the collision. There was no changing of the wheel in consequence of such alleged luffing. All that was done by the steamer after the luffing was to stop and back. This was what ought to have been done before coming into such dangerous proximity. (b.) But the weight of testimony shows that by the alleged luffing the schooner did not materially change her course or lose time.

5. That even if the schooner had committed an error by luffing as alleged, still she was not responsible for any of the consequences that accrued therefrom. She did not voluntarily bring herself into the danger in which she found herself. She had not previously committed any fault in her navigation, but she was brought into such danger by the improper navigation of the steamer, in coming down at great speed, and in attempting to pass through the narrow opening between the bow and the stern of the vessels at anchor. This comes clearly within the rule upon this subject. The Genesee Chief, 12 How. [53 U. S.] 450; The Pacific, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 372. A change of course "in extremis" is not held to be a fault.

T. C. T. Buckley and R. D. Benedict, in behalf of the steamer, argued the following points:

1. In this, as in all other cases of collision, no presumption of liability arises from the fact of collision. The John Frazier, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 194; The Morning Light, 2 Wall. [69 U. S.] 557. Before the loss occasioned by a collision can be fastened on a party, it must be established by preponderating evidence that the loss has been occasioned by his culpable neglect. The Ligo, 2 Hagg. Adm. 356, 360.

2. It is urged that the rules of navigation established by the act of 1864 establish that in all cases of collision occurring between a sailing vessel and a steamer, proof of the mere fact of collision is sufficient, and the fifteenth article is invoked in support of the claim. Such latitude of construction would not only be subversive of the purposes for which it is presumed the rules were adopted, but it is opposed to the language of the nineteenth and twentieth articles of the same code, which preserve in their full integrity all rules which have heretofore formed part of the general maritime code regulating the duty of sailing vessels and steamers approaching on opposite courses.

3. One of the most elementary of those rules requires that there should be a proper lookout. By that is clearly meant a person engaged in observing the movements of approaching vessels; and where such a duty is not discharged at all, or defectively discharged, to say the least, the burden is cast on the side where such fault is shown to exist, of clearly satisfying the court that absence of a lookout in no wise contributed to cause the collision. The Saxonia [1 Lush. 410]. The schooner had an absolutely free wind, and was crossing a thoroughfare which was the legitimate track of outward-bound steamers, and if the law imposes on such steamers the obligation to give way to her, the correlative obligation also exists that the schooner shall observe the movement, and do nothing to thwart or impede it.

4. Another rule of equal force has also been established by numerous decisions,—Parker v. The Scotia [Case No. 12,512]; Caldwell v. The State of Maine [Id. 2,304],—to wit: that a sailing vessel approaching a steamer shall keep her course, and the steamer has the right to regulate her movements on the supposition that such a rule will be fully complied with. The law in relation to collisions between steamers and sailing vessels is laid down very fully by Judge Betts, in the case of The New Jersey [Case No. 10,161]. It is just as good law now as it was before the adoption of the regulations for the prevention of collisions. They merely made statutory what was previously the law of the sea in such cases. And from the law, as laid down by Judge Betts, it is clear that the libellants cannot recover in this action in either of the three following cases: (1.) If the schooner had no competent and careful lookout, unless she establishes that the want of it in no way contributed to the collision. (2.) If she changed her course so as to throw herself across the steamer's track. (3.) If she could have avoided the collision by any manoeuvre, when she saw or could have seen that the steamer could not avoid her without it.

5. The schooner had no proper lookout, as was shown by the testimony.

6. She altered her course, and was in fault in so doing, and the case does not come within the rule of a change "in extremis," because if it was made in fright by those on the schooner, that fright was not caused by any movement on the steamer's part, but because she had not been seen as she should have been, owing to the negligence of the schooner's lookout.

7. After changing her course she should have kept on instead of shifting her helm again.

8. As to the faults charged against the steamer, it would have been very imprudent for the steamer to stop as she approached the passage, for she would have lost steerage way, and would have been carried down on the vessels at anchor. But she had as good a right of way out to sea, as the schooner had across to Jersey City, and all that could be reasonably required of her was that she should pursue her course at a moderate rate of speed, and keep a sharp lookout; and both of these things she did.

9. The steamer has shown that she could not have avoided the collision; while the burden of proof is thrown upon the schooner in consequence of her want of a lookout, to establish that she could not avoid it, and this she has failed to do.

BENEDICT, District Judge. It is manifest that this steamer, having run down a sailing vessel, in broad daylight, must be held responsible for the loss unless it appears that the accident was caused by some false manoeuvre on the part of the sailing vessel.

Such a manoeuvre is charged here, and it is insisted that the cause of the collision was a sudden luff made by the schooner after she had passed the range of the brig's stern, which threw her under the bows of the steamer.

The evidence shows, that some such movement did take place at the time indicated. What the movement was is best shown by the testimony of a pilot who was watching the two vessels from the deck of the brig, who says that when the schooner was abreast of the brig's stern "she came to, luffed a little, and then kept off immediately after she luffed."

It is not claimed that this movement on the part of the schooner had any effect to change the course, or speed, of the steamer; but it is insisted that it caused unnecessary and unexpected delay on the part of the schooner in crossing the passage; and several witnesses from the steamer express a confident opinion that the time thus lost was sufficient to have enabled the schooner to pass the steamer's bows in safety.

The schooner was, however, moving rapidly before the wind. She did not come to till abreast of the brig's stern, and filled away again instantly. The point of first contact was her foremast, and when struck, her position was some one hundred or one hundred and fifty yards to the west of the range of the brig's stern. The delay caused by the luff must therefore have been very slight, and to determine positively that it was the cause of the collision, would involve a nicer calculation than could be safely based upon the facts proved here.

But if the delay was the cause of the collision, it cannot be charged upon the schooner as a fault, for the luff was made in extremis, and was caused by the close proximity of a large steamer, made more dangerous from the fact, that owing to the position in which the steamer had placed herself, she could neither stop her way, nor sheer further to the east.

As I view this case, the collision was caused by the fault of the steamer in attempting to pass through a narrow passage across which she saw, or ought to have seen, that a sailing vessel must pass at the same time. It is indeed true, as claimed on behalf of the steamer, that she did all that she could after she had undertaken the passage; but she should have stopped sooner, and had she done so, no collision would have occurred. I do not assent to the claim set up here on behalf of the steamer, that "she had as good a right of way out to sea, as the schooner had across to Jersey City, and all that could be reasonably expected of her was, that she should pursue her course at a moderate rate of speed, and keep a sharp lookout."

The sailing vessel having taken a course which lay across the passage in question, in plain sight, had a right to continue upon it, and the steamer should have stopped before she came to the passage. She had no right of way out through the passage, when the course and speed of the schooner was such as to make it dangerous to attempt to pass through it; having kept on, although at moderate speed, and placed herself in a position involving danger of collision, and well calculated to cause alarm, she must be held responsible for the consequences.

In arriving at this conclusion, I have not overlooked the fact that the schooner was not keeping such a lookout as is required of a sailing vessel when moving across a crowded harbor. If I could see that the careless watch kept on the schooner contributed in a material way to the accident, I should hold her in fault. But with ever so bright a lookout, the schooner would have been bound to hold the course she did up to the luff, and the luff if a false manoeuvre, was not caused by want of lookout, but by the dangerous attitude which the steamer was seen to present.

Decree for libellant, with order of reference to ascertain the amount of damage.

[NOTE. Pending the reference the Delaware and Mutual Safety Insurance Companies petitioned to be joined as colibellants, on the ground that they had paid to the owners of the cargo the amount of the insurance for a total loss, and thereby became substituted in the place of the owners, and to their right of recovery against the libelled vessel, and the court granted the prayer of the petition. See Case No. 2,766.

[There was a final decree in favor of libellants, which was affirmed by the circuit court (case unreported), and from this decree of affirmance the claimant, The Liverpool, New York & Philadelphia Steamship Company, appealed.

[The supreme court affirmed the decree below for the reasons stated by Mr. Justice Swayne, i. e. that the steamer was in fault for maintaining a rate of speed higher than was consistent with the safety of other vessels in so crowded a thoroughfare; that the acts of the schooner, complained of as contributing to the disaster, were done in extremis and in the excitement of the moment; that their wisdom could not be inquired into; and that the evidence failed to show any ground for holding the schooner responsible in any degree for the casualty. The City of Paris, 9 Wall. (76 U. S.) 634.]

Case No. 2,766.

The CITY OF PARIS.

[1 Ben. 529.] [1]

District Court, E. D. New York. Nov., 1867.

COLLISION—APPLICATION BY INSURERS TO BE MADE CO-LIBELANTS.

1. Where a libel was filed by the owners of a schooner, which was sunk in a collision, to recover for her loss, and contained the allegation that it was filed "in behalf of the libellants and all parties having a common right of action arising out of the collision, who may intervene as co-libellants, or otherwise;" and, after a decree for libellants, and while the reference to ascertain the damages was pending, insurers, who had paid a loss on the cargo, applied to the court on petition to be made co-libellants; Held, that, as no injustice would be caused to the claimants, the application would be granted, although the court saw no necessity for, or advantage in, the proceeding.

2. That a special reference must be had, to take and report to the court the evidence produced by the petitioners to show their right to participate in the decree, and any evidence in opposition.

[Cited in The City of New York, 25 Fed. 153.]

This case came before the court upon a petition presented under the following circumstances: The libel was filed by Henry P. Simmons and other owners of the schooner Percy Heilner, to recover of the owners of the steamer City of Paris the damages arising out of a collision which occurred in the harbor of New York, on the 14th day of April, 1866, and averred that it was filed "in behalf of the libellants and all parties having a common right of action arising out of the collision hereinafter mentioned, who may intervene as co-libellants or otherwise." It also set out the amount and value of the cargo on board the schooner, and averred that the same was being transported by the schooner as a common carrier, and prayed that the libellants might recover the value of the cargo, freight, and vessel, as the damages sustained by reason of the collision. Upon this libel, and an answer denying these averments, the cause went to a hearing upon the merits, no other person having applied to be allowed to intervene as co-libellant or otherwise. Upon the hearing, an interlocutory decree was made in favor of the libellants, and a reference ordered to ascertain and report the amount of damages sustained by the libellants in the collision in question. [Case No. 2,765.] Pending the reference, the Delaware and Mutual Safety Insurance Companies appeared before the court, and petitioned to be joined as co-libellants in the action, upon the ground that they were the insurers of the cargo on board the schooner, and, as such, paid to the owners of the cargo the amount of their insurance upon said coal as for a total loss, whereby they claimed to have become substituted in the place of said owners of the cargo, and entitled to recover of the City of Paris the value thereof.

BENEDICT, District Judge. In actions of damage, where there are claims for injury to both vessel and cargo, the more usual, and, as heretofore generally considered, the better practice, has been to bring separate actions in behalf of the various parties entitled to recover, which actions are directed to be heard together upon the question of liability for the collision, separate decrees being rendered, and, in case of recovery, separate references ordered. Such is also the practice in the English admiralty, although there it is usual to formally consolidate the actions for the purpose of the main hearing, and to dissever them before proceeding with the reference. Lown. Col. p. 209; Coote, Adm. p. 26. A single action in the name of the owners of the vessel, as owners and as carriers of the cargo, is, in this country, also of frequent occurrence, and I know of no case where injustice or inconvenience has followed either of the methods referred to. The practice now proposed in this case seems to be considered to be now necessary, by reason of the decision of the supreme court in the case of The Commander in Chief, 1 Wall. [68 U. S.] 43, but I do not understand that decision to compel any change in the practice. That case decides that, in causes of damage, when timely objection is not taken to the parties libellants, the owners of the injured ship will be allowed to recover for injury both to the ship and her cargo; and that when such an action has been carried to a decree in rem, for the injury to cargo as well as vessel, upon a seizure of the vessel proceeded against, and due notice thereof, according to the course of the admiralty, a court of admiralty will not entertain a second action in behalf of the owners of the cargo; but, if necessary for the purpose of justice, will protect the interests of such owners in the distribution of the proceeds of the decree, rendered in the suit of the owners of the ship. This seems to me the extent of the decision, and, so construed, its correctness cannot well be doubted. See, also, The Ilos, Swab. 100. But while I do not understand the effect of this decision to be to compel a joinder of all parties injured by a collision, as parties libellants in one action, the remarks of the court clearly indicate an opinion that such a joinder may well be made, and it will therefore be permitted in the present case, though I confess that I do not see the necessity or advantage of the proceeding. According to the opinion in the case of The Commander in Chief, the interests of the petitioner, in any amount which may be recovered by the owners of the schooner for cargo on board, can be protected in the distribution of the proceeds on the stipulation given; or, inasmuch as the action of the owners of the schooner has been conducted without publication of the usual notice of seizure, and has proceeded no further than an interlocutory decree, a second action for the loss to the cargo might, at this stage, be instituted in the names of the petitioners. There may, however, be reasons which are not disclosed, which render the practice proposed desirable in this case, and, as no injustice will be caused to the claimants by allowing it, an order may be entered to join the petitioners as co-libellants, according to their prayer; but it must be accompanied by a special order of reference, directing the commissioner, before whom the reference is pending, to take and report to the court, with his opinion thereon, such lawful evidence as the petitioners shall produce, to establish their right to participate in the decree, together with any evidence which the claimants may produce by way of defence to the demand.

[1] [Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

Case No. 2,767.

The CITY OF PARIS.

[14 Blatchf. 531.] [1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. June 21, 1878.

COLLISION IN SLIP—MUTUAL FAULT — INTERVENTION BY INSURER — INNOCENT OWNERSHIP OF CARGO — LACHES — COMMISSIONER'S REPORT OF DAMAGES—MEASURE OF RECOVERY.

1. A., the master and owner of the canal boat M., filed a libel in rem, in admiralty, in the district court, against the screw steamer C., for himself and for an insurance company, alleging that the company was the insurer of the cargo of the M., and that the M., and her cargo had been damaged by a collision between the M. and the C., through the fault of the C. The libel did not allege that the cargo was owned by an innocent party, nor that the insurance company had paid the loss. The collision occurred in a slip, as the C. was moving out. The district court held that the C. was in fault for allowing herself to be drawn over toward the M., by a stern line fastened to the opposite pier, which was not cast off in time; and that the M. was in fault for being insufficiently fastened, so that she was drawn over towards the C. by the suction caused by the screw of the C. On appeal by both parties, this court held, for the same reasons, that both vessels were in fault, and made a decree holding the C. liable for only one-half of the damages sustained by both the M. and her cargo. After the decision of this court was announced, the insurance company moved (1) that it might be allowed to prosecute the suit for its own interest; (2) that it might be made a party libellant, and allowed to prove that the cargo on board the M. was owned by an innocent party, that it was insured against loss by the company, and that the loss had been paid in full; (3) that the record brought up on appeal might be amended by inserting in the apostles the minutes of the commissioner, on the reference in the district court to ascertain the amount of damages; and (4) that a decree might be entered against the C., and in favor of the insurance company, for the full amount of the damages to the cargo: Held, that the company might, if necessary, be admitted as a party, in order to settle its rights to its share of the recovery, as against the libellant, but only to that extent.

[Distinguished in The Martino Cilento, 22 Fed. 861. Cited in The Iniziativa, 50 Fed. 231.]

2. As the M. was sold three times between the time of the collision and the time of the decree of the district court, and as the remedy over against the M., in favor of the C., had been lost by the delay, the company could not now be allowed to make proof of the innocent ownership of the cargo, so as to charge the C. with the entire damage to the cargo, under the rule established in The Atlas, 93 U. S. 302, although the decision in The Atlas was not made until after the libellant had appealed.

[Cited in The City of New York, 25 Fed. 153.]

3. As the report of the commissioner was not excepted to, it was not necessary that his minutes of testimony should be brought up.

4. There could not be a decree against the C. for the full amount of the damages to the cargo.

[Cited in The Nevada, Case No. 10,131; The Gulf Stream, 58 Fed. 606.]

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the southern district of New York.]

In this case, there were appeals by both parties from a decree of the district court [case not reported], in a suit in rem, in admiralty, in a cause of collision, finding both vessels to have been in fault, and dividing the damages.

Robert D. Benedict, for libellant.

James W. Gerard, for claimants.

WAITE, Circuit Justice. The libellant was, at the time of the occurrence hereinafter mentioned, the master and owner of the canal boat Montana, having on board a cargo of wheat, taken in at Oswego, New York, to be transported to New York City, and there delivered to Tompkins & Co., consignees. Between 2 and 3 o'clock in the afternoon of November 11th, 1871, the boat, with her cargo, was moved into the slip between piers 44 and 45 North river, in New York City, for the purpose of having her cargo transferred to the steamship Erin, then moored along the north side of pier 44. The Erin was a seagoing steamer, 370 feet long and 41 feet wide, lying with her bow towards the river, and her stern near to an L, on pier 44, 47 feet wide, and extending 130 feet from the bulkhead of the slip at the street. The Montana was 96 feet long and 17 feet 6 inches wide. Soon after her arrival in the slip, she was moored along side of the lighter Fret, 23 feet wide, and from 60 to 70 feet long, which lighter was made fast to the Erin, opposite the after hatch of that vessel, with her bow towards the bulkhead, by lines leading from her deck, bow and stern, to the deck of the Erin. The deck of the Erin was much higher out of water than that of the Fret. The Montana, with her bow also toward the bulkhead, was made fast to the Fret by lines from her stern and middle cleats, which latter cleat was about her midships, to the bow and stern of the Fret. The decks of these two boats were about equal distances above the water. The bow of the Montana extended from 25 to 30 feet beyond that of the Fret, and there was no line from it either to the Erin or the pier. A floating elevator, 24 feet wide, and 100 feet long, was made fast to the Erin at her middle hatch, between the Montana and the river. Outside of, and made fast to, this elevator, was a grain barge 17 feet 6 inches wide, and 100 feet long. The slip was 160 feet wide at the river, and varied from that to 163 feet, until it reached the L. From there to the bulkhead, it was 115 or 116 feet wide, and, alongside the L, in the narrow part of the slip, two coal barges were moored side by side. The depth of the water in the part of the slip where the steamer laid varied from 18 to 22 feet. The steamship City of Paris, 416 feet long, and 40 feet 6 inches wide, was lying in the slip along side of pier 45, when the Montana came in. Her bow was towards the river, and her stern was on a line nearly at right angles with the end of the L, on pier 44. She was an ocean steamer, and one of a line of packets plying between New York and Liverpool, and leaving that slip on regular sailing days. When the Montana came in, the steamer had her steam up, and there was every indication that she was about to leave upon her voyage. This was observed and understood by the libellant. Some time before she left, she got out lines from her bow and stern, took them across the slip, and made that from the bow fast to pier 44, and that from the stern to the L. By these lines she was worked off from pier 45, 10 or 12 feet, so as to avoid collision with her own dock and the sheds upon it, as she moved out of the slip. A short time before starting, the usual whistle was blown. The captain, being on the bridge of his vessel, sent aft to inquire whether all was clear, and, receiving an affirmative answer, blew the last whistle and gave orders to go ahead. The lines leading to pier 45 were let go, but both of those leading across the slip, and made fast upon pier 44 and the L, were held on. No special notice was given from the steamer to the boats in the slip, that she was about to leave, but the libellant, standing upon the deck of his boat, saw what was being done, and knew what it meant. He took no additional precautions to protect his boat against injury by the movement of the steamer, supposing what he had done was sufficient. The officers and men on the steamer were in a situation to see how the Montana was moored and fastened, and did see her when the orders were given to go ahead. The movement of a large steamer like the City of Paris out of her slip necessarily causes a displacement of the water, and the revolution of her propeller has a tendency to suck in under her stern, with great force, everything which comes within its influence. This is a fact well understood by all engaged in that business. The stern line leading from the steamer to the L was not let go until she had gone some distance ahead. This caused her stern to swing over towards the Montana. The suction created by the revolution of the propeller drew the bow of the Montana toward the steamer, and, when the propeller passed by the Montana, one of its flanges struck her under water about 20 feet from her bow, causing a leak and damaging the cargo. The boat herself suffered but slight injury. The second officer of the steamer noticed the Montana moving toward the steamer, and called out to stop the engine, but no attention was paid to him, and the steamer proceeded to sea without any knowledge, on the part of her officers, of what had occurred. Usually, when a steamer goes out under the circumstances which existed at this time, the stern line is let go before she is started ahead. No notice was given to the Montana, that any other than the usual course was to be taken in this case. The swinging of the steamer on her stern line contributed directly to the collision which occurred, but still there would have been no collision if the bow of the Montana had not been drawn toward the steamer.

[1] [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

While it is the duty of a large steamer, in leaving her dock, to take care that no unnecessary damage is done to other vessels lying in proximity to her, it is equally the duty of the other vessels to take all reasonable precautions to protect themselves from the dangers to which they will be exposed by her movements. The libellant, in this case, had ample notice that the steamer was about leaving. He saw or could have seen her lines passing across the slip. He knew, or ought to have known, that, unless his boat was securely fastened, she would be drawn in under the stern of the steamer and exposed to being struck by the propeller as it passed. He also knew, or ought to have known, that, with the Fret lying close to the Erin, fastened only by lines leading up to the deck of that vessel, she could be moved to some extent outwards into the slip. With his own boat fastened only by lines at her stern and midships, it must have been evident to him that her bow could be swung some distance outwards. He also could and did see that the space between him and the steamer was not more than 20 or 25 feet. It needed, therefore, but a slight movement of the two vessels toward each other to bring them together. Under such circumstances, it was clearly his duty to be specially careful that the bow of his boat, which was the first to be exposed to the action of the propeller, was held fast in its position. It is evident that a line from his bow to the Erin, properly fastened, would have prevented the accident. This simple precaution he failed to take. It matters not that neither of the lines by which he was made fast to the Fret was broken. His boat was left so that she could swing to some extent upon her line amidships, and she did do so. This, added to the swing of the stern of the steamer, caused the loss. The libellant was, therefore, clearly in fault.

But the steamer was equally in fault. If her stern line had been cast off before she started, there is no reason to believe that her stern would have gone over toward the Montana, as it could not but do with the line fast. Thus the injury was caused by the combined fault of the two vessels. That of neither was sufficient alone to produce it. The damages of the parties in fault must, therefore, be divided between them.

It is contended, however, that, under the rule as established in the case of The Atlas, 93 U. S. 302, the owners of the cargo are entitled to their damages in full, as they are innocent parties. The libel is filed by the master and owner of one of the faulty vessels, for himself and the Pacific Mutual Insurance Company, of New York, and there has been no intervention by any owner of the cargo. It is averred that the insurance company was the insurer of the cargo, but it is nowhere averred or proved that the owner of the boat was not the owner of the cargo, or that the insurance company has paid the loss. There is nothing in the case, therefore, as it stands, to relieve the cargo from the fault of the Montana. The decree of the district court is affirmed, and a decree to that effect may be prepared.

Subsequently, the Pacific Mutual Insurance Company moved the court, (1) that it might be allowed to prosecute the suit for its own interest; (2) that it might be made a party libellant, and allowed to prove that the cargo on board the Montana was owned by an innocent party; that it was insured against loss by the company, and that the loss had been paid in full; (3) that the record brought up on appeal might be amended, by inserting in the apostles the minutes of the commissioner, on the reference in the district court, to ascertain the amount of damages; and (4) that a decree might be entered against the City of Paris, and in favor of the insurance company, for the full amount of the damages to the cargo.

WAITE, Circuit Justice. The original libel was filed by the master and owner of the Montana, "for himself and for the Pacific Mutual Insurance Company of New York." In it the libellant avers, on information and belief, that "the said Pacific Mutual Insurance Company were insurers of about 7,405 bushels of wheat, constituting the cargo," and "that the damage done to the cargo by reason of the said collision, and the flooding of the cargo with sea-water, was so great as to cause an almost total loss of the said cargo to the owners thereof, and that, by reason of the damage done to said canal boat, the libellant herein, and the insurers of the cargo, have suffered loss," &c. Under these averments there will be no difficulty in framing the decree, if it is desired, so as to separate the amount of the recovery on account of the insurer of the cargo from that on account of the owner of the boat. Unless there is a dispute between these parties as to their respective interests, there can be no necessity for the actual intervention of the company. The court will, upon its own motion, make the necessary separation, if the parties intimate such a desire. But, if the division is not agreed upon, and a controversy arises as to the amount each is entitled to, the insurance company will be allowed to appear and prosecute the suit to that extent, for its own interest. The libellant, having admitted that he sued for the company as well as himself, and having succeeded in recovering something for his beneficiary, cannot now object to a separation, in the decree, of that which he recovers in trust from that which he recovers as actual owner. If, therefore, it is necessary that the insurance company should be admitted as a party in order to a full and complete settlement of its rights in the action, as against the libellant, an order to that effect may be entered. In this question the City of Paris is not interested.

Upon the other branches of the motion, an entirely different question arises. The collision occurred November 11th, 1871. The libel was filed December 13th, 1871. At that time the Montana was owned by the libellant, and could have been proceeded against by the owner of the cargo or the insurance company, as well as by the City of Paris. The libel made no claim of any innocent ownership of the cargo. The hearing was had in the district court without any proof whatever of the interest of the insurance company, and a decision was rendered, June 10th, 1874, finding both vessels in fault, directing a division of the damages, and ordering a reference to ascertain the amount of damages. The commissioner filed his report February 6th, 1875. No exceptions were taken to this report, and a decree was accordingly entered, February 23d, 1875, dividing the damages as found and stated by the commissioner. The appeal of the libellant was taken March 1st, 1875, and perfected soon after. Between the time of the collision and the decree below, the Montana was sold and conveyed three times—once July 31st, 1872, again April 29th, 1873, and again June 29th, 1874. To allow the insurance company to make proof now of the innocent ownership of the cargo, would be to allow it to make a new case against the City of Paris, not specifically stated in the libel, after all remedy over against the Montana had been lost by delay. An owner of cargo injured by a collision between two vessels, both of which are at fault, may sue either one or both of the vessels, as he chooses, and recover the full amount of his loss. The Atlas, 93 U. S. 302. Without doubt, too, the master or owner of the carrying vessel may sue in his own name for the benefit of the owner of his cargo; but if, in such case, a recovery is sought for the full amount of the loss, notwithstanding the fault of the party in whose name the suit is brought, the facts which give the right to such a recovery and the claim should be clearly stated, or otherwise made to appear upon the record. This is because the prosecuted vessel may, in such a case, by some appropriate form of proceeding, call upon the other vessel to respond in the action for its share of the loss. Unless this is so, it would be in the power of the carrying vessel, by commencing suit in the name of its owner, for the benefit of the shipper, to relieve itself from all liability for a loss to its cargo, resulting in part from its own fault.

If the owner of the cargo adopts as his own a suit commenced by the owner of the carrying vessel for his benefit, he is bound by the case which is made on his account. If that case does not disclose his innocence, or his right to claim for his whole loss, even though it happened in part through the negligence of his carrier, he must suffer the consequences of that omission. When this suit was commenced, the Montana could have been sued by the insurance company jointly with the City of Paris, and, if that had been done, each would have been decreed to pay one-half the loss. If the case had been so stated, in the libel actually filed, as to relieve the cargo from the consequences of the fault of the Montana, the City of Paris might have brought the Montana into the suit, to answer for the consequences of her own wrongful acts. This was not done, and, down to the time of the decision below and the reference to ascertain the amount of damages, nothing had been done in the case, or stated in the pleadings, which called upon the owners of the City of Paris to take affirmative action for the purpose of relieving themselves from liability for more than one-half the loss, in case the Montana was shown to have been in any respect in fault. Previous to the decision the right of action against the Montana had been lost by laches and delay. At that time, it is conceded that neither the insurance company nor the City of Paris could have proceeded against her. The laches which barred the action is chargeable solely to the insurance company. To allow the company now to make a new case against the City of Paris, and recover for the whole loss, after, by its own neglect, the Montana had been relieved from liability for its share, would be grossly inequitable. If the difficulty rested upon the failure of proof alone, the case would be different. As it is, neither the proof nor the libel, at the time of the decision below, would have justified any other decree than the one which was given.

I am aware, that, until the case of The Atlas, which was after this appeal, the supreme court had never decided that any innocent party could recover from one of two faulty colliding vessels the full amount of his loss, and that, possibly, until that time it may not have been considered necessary to state or prove the fact of innocent ownership, in a case like this. If the rights of the parties had not been changed by the delay, this would be a good reason for allowing the original defects in these pleadings and proofs to be supplied now. In admiralty, amendments are liberally allowed, and opportunities to supply omissions in proof are freely afforded, when the equity of a case is plain, but care is always taken to see that wrong is not done in that way. Here, as has been seen, the rights of the parties have been changed by the delay, and wrong would be done to the City of Paris if the insurance company is permitted to make its new case. For that reason, I am clear that this part of the motion should be overruled.

It only remains to consider the application to amend the record by inserting in the apostles the minutes of the commissioner on the reference in the district court to ascertain the amount of damages. The commissioner made his report February 6th, 1875, stating his findings from the evidence submitted to him, but making no reference to any return of the evidence. It is now said, that the minutes of the testimony were put on file below, February 9th, 1875. In the order of reference the court did not direct a return of the evidence. No exceptions were taken to the report, and it nowhere appears that the commissioner was requested by either party to report the evidence. If actually filed, it was never considered or acted upon in the court below. No question raised below required the court to examine it. No question is raised here upon the report. All parties appear to be satisfied with the result reached by the commissioner. Under such circumstances I do not think the minutes of the commissioner are at all necessary for the proper consideration of the case here. If sent up, they can only be considered in connection with questions raised upon the report. As no such question has as yet been made here, the motion to amend must be denied. If, in any adjustment of the amounts payable to the owner of the boat and the insurance company, respectively, an examination of this evidence shall become important, nothing now decided will be permitted to have the effect of preventing another application to bring it into the record, from the court below. The practice in admiralty in respect to the disposition and use of testimony taken before a commissioner upon a reference to state an account, is not different from that in equity upon a reference to a master for a like purpose. The rule in equity is clearly and correctly stated by Mr. Justice Clifford, in Union Sugar Refinery v. Mathiesson [Case No. 14,398].

The motions are all overruled, except that which relates to the allowance of leave to the insurance company to prosecute the suit in its own interest. As to that, an order may be entered permitting the company to appear and prosecute the suit, as between itself and the libellant, to the extent that may be necessary for the purpose of ascertaining its share of the recovery from the City of Paris, upon the principle of an equal division of the damages resulting from the collision, between the Montana and the City of Paris. For the purposes of any further prosecution against the City of Paris, the motion is overruled.

Case No. 2,768.

The CITY OF PHILADELPHIA.

[The case reported under above title in 37 Hunt, Mer. Mag. 449, is the same as Case No. 1,152.]

Case No. 2,769.

The CITY OF TROY.

[9 Ben. 466.] [1]

District Court, E. D. New York. April, 1878.

COLLISION IN NORTH RIVER—TUG AND TOW—LIGHTS.

1. Where a tug coming up the North river with a barge in tow encountered below West Point a passenger steamer coming down, and a collision ensued between the steamboat and the barge; Held, that the failure of the tug to display the lights required by law as indicating that she had a tow was not a fault conducing to the collision, it appearing from the evidence that there was no darkness sufficient to prevent an approaching vessel from seeing the vessel in tow of the tug.

2. Whether the display by a tug-boat of two lights, substantially vertical, hung abaft the pilot-house and not at the bow, is a compliance with rule 4 of the navigation rules (Rev. St. § 4233) quaere.

3. The decision in the case of The Blanche Page [Case No. 1,522] questioned.

In admiralty.

Butler, Stillman & Hubbard, for libellant.

S. B. Caldwell and C. Van Santvoord, for claimant of steamboat.

James McKeen, for claimant of tug.

BENEDICT, District Judge. This action is instituted by the owners of the barge Republic, to recover the damages caused by the sinking of that barge in a collision that occurred on the morning of July 13th, 1877, just above Limestone Point, in the Hudson river. The barge was bound up the river, and was being towed astern of the tug Atlas. The City of Troy was bound down the river.

The questions in the case are, whether the collision arose from the omission of the barge to exhibit a light, or from the omission of the tug to display lights indicating that she had a tow, or from failure on the part of the Troy to maintain a proper lookout, or from an attempt on the part of the Troy to pass to west of the tow when she should have passed to east.

The testimony shows that the Troy, having seen the Atlas and being near to her, stopped her engine and hove her wheel aport, with the intention of passing down to west. This sheer carried the Troy clear of the Atlas to the west, and there is no room to doubt that, if the sheer had been maintained, it would also have carried the Troy clear of the barge which the Atlas had in tow. But the sheer was not maintained; after a sheer sufficient to clear the Atlas had been obtained, the wheel was allowed to run and the engine was permitted to remain still until the two steamboats were fairly abreast of each other. When so abreast of the Atlas, a signal was given on the Troy to start the engine again, which was countermanded before the engine had fairly begun to move, and the collision immediately followed, the Troy striking the port bow of the barge in tow of the Atlas. The blow was given nearly head on, and at that time the Atlas and the barge were bearing to east under a port helm.

The course of action pursued by those in charge of the Troy, after the engine was stopped and the boat given a sheer to west, was the immediate cause of the collision that ensued. The manner in which the two boats came together and the position of the respective vessels conclusively show that, if the Troy's engine had been put in motion as soon as the sheer had been given to the Troy, and if the wheel had been kept aport, the Troy would have cleared the barge, as she did the Atlas. It is equally certain that there was nothing to prevent the Troy from keeping her sheer and from starting her engines as soon as she had got headed to west of the course of the Atlas. Under the circumstances it was imperative on the Troy, if collision was to be avoided, to get further to the west as soon as she could. This course was plainly demanded by the position of the respective vessels, and I cannot doubt that it would have been pursued had the pilot of the Troy known of the presence of the barge in tow of the Atlas. Instead of pursuing this course, the pilot of the Troy allowed the speed of his vessel to diminish and broke his sheer, with the intention of passing as close as possible under the stern of the Atlas. This he did upon the assumption that there was nothing in tow of the Atlas.

[1] [Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and Benj. Lincoln Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

The decisive question of the case, then, as I view it, is whether the pilot of the Troy was justified by the circumstances in assuming at that time that there was no tow astern of the Atlas. He claims to be justified in so assuming, by the fact that it was dark, and the Atlas failed to display the lights required by law to give notice that she had a tow. This justification consists of two elements: darkness such as to render signal lights necessary to show that a boat was in tow of the Atlas, and absence of such lights. If either element be wanting, the justification is not made out. It is clear, upon the evidence, that there was no darkness sufficient to prevent the barge in tow of the Atlas from being seen by those in charge of the Troy at the time when the wheel was let run and even when the boat was slowed. Disinterested witnesses, called by the Troy, prove that the night was not so dark but that, shortly before the collision, the hull of the barge in tow of the Atlas had been seen at a distance much greater than was required to enable the Troy to avoid the barge. The collision occurred on a clear July morning, when the dawn was already breaking, and the weight of evidence is, that the barge was carrying a light at her bow that could have been seen at a considerable distance. Nevertheless, the barge, although plainly visible, was not seen by those on the Troy, and the reason why is disclosed by the evidence. The lookout of the Troy, instead of attending to his duty, had betaken himself to the pilot-house, and with the pilot was engaged in heaving the wheel hard over in the effort to clear the Atlas. The attention of both the pilot and the lookout was engrossed in endeavoring to clear the Atlas, whose presence, moreover, the evidence gives room to contend, had suddenly become known to them. Beyond all question, if the lookout had been at his station, and diligently observing what was ahead of him, he would have warned the pilot, and the barge in tow of the Atlas would have been avoided, for the sheer that carried the Troy to west of the Atlas, if maintained, would certainly have carried her to west of a vessel that was following the Atlas at the length of a hawser. I am, therefore, forced to the conclusion, that the collision in question was caused by the fault of the Troy in not maintaining a proper lookout.

Having arrived at this conclusion, it is unnecessary to determine whether the lights proved to have been carried by the Atlas were such as are required by law to indicate the presence of a tow. There is abundant proof that the Atlas did display two lights substantially vertical, that could be seen at a distance, and it would seem hardly possible that any pilot, seeing those lights, would have failed to infer that he was meeting a tow; but this pilot did not so infer, indeed he says he saw but one of the high lights on the Atlas. The point is therefore made, that the statute requires the high lights to be hung at the stem of the boat, and inasmuch as on the Atlas they were hung abaft the pilot-house—twenty-two feet abaft the stem—they were not such lights as will in law charge the pilot with notice that the Atlas had a tow.

If it were not that a contrary opinion had been expressed by Judge Blatchford (The Blanche Page [Case No. 1,522]), I should have thought that rule 4 of the navigation rules, which by its terms certainly only requires two high lights, carried vertically, without saying whether forward or aft, as the signal for a tow, was complied with by displaying two high vertical lights aft. Such I had supposed was the general understanding of that rule, it having been considered that rule 7, which contains the requirement in respect to those important lights, the range lights, and which directs that an after range light shall be carried at least fifteen feet above the light at the bow, indicates that the vertical lights required by rule 4 are not to be at the bow, because it would be impracticable to carry an after range light fifteen feet higher than lights carried at mast-head on the bow. I may add that I recollect two cases—The Atlas [Case No. 634]; The Tillie [Id. 14,049]—which have proceeded, not only in this court, but in the appellate court, upon the assumption that high vertical lights aft are proper lights to indicate a towing vessel. In both these cases the question of lights was raised, and in both cases the vertical lights were hung aft. The opinion delivered in these cases by the circuit court could hardly have failed to notice the fact if lights so hung had been considered as improperly located. Indeed, in the former case, where the tug engaged in towing carried two high lights aft on the flag-staff, and also two lights on her bow (not mast-head), the opinion declares that "she had her own proper lights set and burning and bright."

But as I look at this case it is unnecessary to decide whether the Atlas complied with the statute in regard to vertical lights, for the reason that, whether she was so equipped or not, there was no difficulty in those on the Troy seeing the barge behind her at the time when they committed the mistake that brought them in collision with the barge, nor to determine whether the failure of the pilot of the Troy to see but one of the two high lights displayed by the Atlas can be supposed to have arisen from the circumstance that the two lights were placed twenty-two feet abaft the stem instead of at the stem. It is equally unnecessary in this view of the case to determine whether, as has been contended, it was a fault of the Troy that she kept a course so nearly approaching the course of the Atlas, and brought herself so close to the Atlas before she changed, instead of passing to east at a safe distance. If the Troy was faulty in this regard that was not the fault which caused the collision. As already shown, the fault that caused the collision was committed after the Troy began to sheer to the west, and consisted in not seeing the barge when she might have been seen, and in not sheering sufficiently far to the west to avoid her.

No fault contributing to the accident appears in either the Atlas or the barge. The Atlas did not stop or break her sheer but passed as far and as rapidly to east as it was possible to do after receiving the Troy's signal. The barge behind her had a light displayed and she too was as far to east as it was possible for her to get under the circumstances.

According to these views the Troy alone must be held responsible for the collision.

There must therefore be a decree directing that the libellant recover of the City of Troy the amount of damages sustained by the libellant, and that, as against the Atlas, the libel be dismissed with costs.

Case No. 2,770.

The CITY OF WASHINGTON.

[6 Ben. 138.][1]

District Court, E. D. New York. June, 1872.[2]

COLLISION AT SEA — STEAMER AND PILOT BOAT—LIGHTS—BURDEN OF PROOF.

1. A steamer, bound to the westward, discovered the flash lights of a pilot boat to the northward, about abeam. She replied to them, indicating that she wanted a pilot, and changed her course to N. W. by N. The pilot boat changed her course to the southward and westward to meet the steamer, showing her torches as she proceeded. The wind was fresh. When the vessels were four or five lengths apart, the courses of the vessels were crossing, and the starboard side of the steamer was the lee side. She showed a light on that side to guide the pilot to his place, and a pilot left the pilot boat in a yawl, having with him a light, to board the steamer. The steamer was kept in motion, and starboarded her helm, and, before the yawl boat reached her, she ran into the pilot boat and sank her. The pilot boat had no masthead light, but the light, which the pilot carried as he went into the yawl, was seen by those in charge of the steamer: Held, that the steamer was in fault, in not stopping still before she reached the pilot boat, and also in starboarding her helm.

[Cited in The Columbia, 27 Fed. 708; The La Champagne, 43 Fed. 447.]

2. The burden was on the pilot boat of proving that the absence of the masthead light, which she should have carried, did not contribute to the collision.

3. As the exact position of the pilot boat was known to those in charge of the steamer, and as the absence of the masthead light was not set up in the answer of the steamer as an act of negligence, the absence of the masthead light did not contribute to the collision, and the steamer must be held solely liable.

Scudder & Carter, for libellants.

Platt, Gerard & Buckley, for respondent.

BENEDICT, District Judge. This action is brought by Peter A. Baillie and others, owners of the pilot boat John D. Jones, to recover of the steamship City of Washington some twenty thousand dollars, for the sinking of the pilot boat, in a collision which occurred between those two vessels on the night of March 28th, at sea, and about 200 miles from Sandy Hook.

The steamer, bound to the westward, at about 11 p. m. discovered the flash lights of a pilot boat to northward, about abeam, and some four or five miles distant. She replied to the signals, indicating that she wished to receive a pilot from the boat, and altered her course to about N. W. by N., to meet the boat. The boat, on her part, kept away to the southward and westward to meet the steamer, showing her torches as she proceeded. The courses of the two vessels were thereafter crossing each other, with a fresh breeze of wind.

When the two vessels had approached within four or five lengths of each other, the steamship had hauled up sufficiently to make her starboard side the lee side, and she showed a light on her lee side to guide the pilot to his place to board the steamer; and a pilot left the pilot boat in the yawl, having with him a light, to pull to the light on the starboard side of the steamship. Before the pilot had time to reach the steamer in the yawl, the pilot boat was under the steamer's bows, and was struck by the steamer on her port side, causing her to sink and be lost. The negligence charged upon the steamer as the cause of this loss, is, that she starboarded her helm, whereby the pilot boat was brought under her bows, and that she did not back in time to stop her way before she struck the pilot boat.

The starboarding is admitted in the answer, and, under the circumstances disclosed by the evidence, I consider it negligence. The course of the pilot boat was known to be crossing that of the steamship, the breeze was fresh, and it was known to the steamship that at her request the pilot boat was endeavoring to place a pilot on board her. This manoeuvre the pilot boat was entitled to be permitted to accomplish without embarrassment from the steamer. Certainly the steamer, by starboarding and giving herself a course across the course of the pilot boat, while the yawl, which was to be picked up by the boat after the pilot was placed on the steamer, was in the act of passing to the steamer, attempted a manoeuvre which cast upon her the risk of its success.

I think, also, that it was the duty of the steamship to stop still before she reached the pilot boat, instead of which she was kept moving ahead—slowly it is true, but yet with a momentum which, with the starboarding, brought her upon the pilot boat and sank her. I must, therefore, hold the steamer responsible in this action, by reason of these faults.

[1] [Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

[2] [Affirmed in Case No. 2,771.]

The only remaining question is, whether the pilot boat must not also be held in fault for not having the masthead light, which the law requires. It is conceded, that the pilot boat had no such light, and the burden is, therefore, on the pilot boat to show that the absence of such a light did not contribute to the collision. This is made to appear by the clear proof given by the witnesses for the steamship, that the other lights of the pilot boat were seen by them. Her exact position was known by those on the steamship, as appears from the fact, that they saw the light which the pilot carried when he went into the yawl. I consider, therefore, that the evidence shows, beyond dispute, that the absence of the masthead light in no way contributed to the accident. Furthermore, the absence of the masthead light is not set up in the answer as an act of negligence, nor is its absence alluded to therein. I, therefore, cannot hold that the fault of the pilot boat, in not having a masthead light, renders her chargeable with any part of the loss. The decree will accordingly be in favor of the libellants, with an order of reference.

[NOTE. The Liverpool, New York & Philadelphia Steamship Company, claimant, appealed from the decree herein to the circuit court, where the decree was affirmed. See Case No. 2,771.]

Case No. 2,771.

The CITY OF WASHINGTON.

[11 Blatchf. 487.] [1]

Circuit Court, E. D. New York. Feb. 19, 1874.[2]

COLLISION — STEAMER AND PILOT BOAT — LIGHTS — CUSTOM.

1. A pilot-boat, at night, by her flash light, was seen from a steamer at a distance of several miles, and the officer of the steamer saw her movements, and saw that her course was such as would cross the course of the steamer. The pilot-boat came to a position nearly ahead of the steamer, and lowered a boat, with a lantern on board, to take a pilot to the steamer. This was seen from the steamer. The pilot-boat was crossing from starboard to port of the steamer, and kept her course. The pilot-boat showed no mast-head light. The steamer did not stop, but starboarded, and collided with the pilot-boat: Held, that the collision was not due to the want of a mast-head light on the pilot-boat.

[See note at end of case.]

2. The steamer was in fault in starboarding, and in not stopping to receive the pilot.

[Cited in The Columbia, 27 Fed. 708.]

[See note at end of case.]

3. It being shown to be the custom, it was not a fault in the pilot-boat to put herself into the path of the steamer, and there lower her yawl, to put a pilot on board of the steamer.

[Cited in The La Champagne, 43 Fed. 447.]

[See note at end of case.]

[In admiralty. Libel by Peter R. Baillie and others, owners of the pilot-boat John D. Jones, against the steamship City of Washington, to recover for the loss of the pilot-boat by collision. The district court decreed in favor of the libellants (Case No. 2,770), and the Liverpool, New York & Philadelphia Steamship Company, claimant of the steamship, appeals.]

Townsend Scudder, for libellants.

James W. Gerard, Jr., for claimant.

WOODRUFF, Circuit Judge. The preponderance of the evidence is, I think, clearly in support of the decree made in the court below. The pilot-boat, by her flash light, was seen from the City of Washington at a distance of several miles, and the testimony of the second officer and of the wheelsman of the steamship both show that they saw her movements, and saw that her course was such as would cross the course of the steamship. Other testimony from the pilot-boat shows that the repeated exhibition of the flash light must have apprized those on the steamer of her movement in that direction; and even the master of the steamer must have observed her near approach in that direction, when he saw the letting down of her yawl, to bring a pilot to the steamer, with a lantern on board. From that moment his attention was diverted to watching the approach of the yawl; and, even according to his testimony, the pilot-boat was then nearly ahead. He seems to have trusted to his own supposition, that, so soon as the yawl left her, she would put up her helm and fall off to leeward, (as he thinks she should have done,) and, therefore, paid no attention to her. But she in fact, continued her course, and the weight of the testimony is that she was in the act of crossing the course of the steamer when her yawl left her, if, in truth, she had not crossed it, so as to bring the steamer's port light into view. Under these circumstances, and with the knowledge of the course of the pilot-boat, most decisively established by the testimony of the second officer and wheelsman, and implied in that of the master of the steamer, it is impossible to say that the collision was in any degree due to the want of a mast-head light on the pilot-boat.

It is equally clear, that the collision was due to fault in the navigation of the steamer. If, as the witnesses from the pilot-boat testify, the pilot-boat had crossed the course of the steamer, so as to bring the port light of the latter into view, before the steamer starboarded, then the fault of such starboarding is manifest. If the pilot-boat was only ahead at that moment, still, as her course was to the port of the steamer, such starboarding was improper. In any event, it seems to me that the steamer was in fault, in not slowing, and, if necessary, stopping, at an earlier moment, and before coming into such dangerous proximity to the sailing vessel. Indeed, upon the proofs, it was the duty of the steamer to stop to receive the pilot, attempting to board her in the night season.

[1] [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

[2] [Affirming Case No. 2,770. Affirmed in The City of Washington, 92 U. S. 31.]

Left to my own unaided judgment, I should have deemed it an improper risk assumed by the pilot-boat, when approaching to place a pilot on board a steamer, to put herself voluntarily and deliberately in the path of the steamer, to there lower her yawl for putting the pilot aboard. It would have seemed to me that taking such a position was unnecessary and greatly dangerous; but, the proof is, without contradiction, that this is the custom, and reasons are given for it which, to the witnesses, seem satisfactory. Doubtless, this custom proceeds upon an assumption that the steamer will stop to receive her pilot. Upon the proofs, as they stand, I am not able to find it a fault in the pilot-boat that she acted in conformity with this custom; and yet, I do not feel quite satisfied that it would not be wiser to take some other position. The libellants must have a decree for their damages found in the court below, with costs.

[NOTE. Claimant appealed to the supreme court. The grounds of the affirmance are thus summarized by Mr. Justice Clifford: "The court here concurs with the circuit court that it is impossible to say that the collision was in any degree due to the want of a mast-head light on the schooner, or to negligence on the part of those in charge of her navigation; on the contrary, it is clear that the steamship is guilty of both charges preferred against her by the libellants. She improperly starboarded her helm after the yawl was launched, and she continued to advance, whereas she should have stopped and backed, if it was necessary to back, to prevent any forward movement." The City of Washington, 92 U. S. 31.]

Case No. 2,772.

The CITY OF WASHINGTON.

[13 Blatchf. 410.] [1]

Circuit Court, E. D. New York. June 13, 1876.

MARSHAL'S FEES—SETTLEMENT OF CLAIM.

1. Under section 829 of the Revised Statutes, which provides, that, "when the debt or claim in admiralty is settled by the parties without a sale of the property, the marshal shall be entitled to a commission," the marshal is entitled to such commission, in a suit in rem, against a vessel, if process is issued, and a bond to the marshal is given under the act of March 3, 1847 (9 Stat. 181), (now section 941 of the Revised Statutes), although the service of the process is waived and the vessel is not actually seized under the process.

[Cited in The Acadia, Case No. 23; The Clintonia, 11 Fed. 741; Smith v. The Morgan City, 39 Fed. 572.]

2. Under said section 829, where the amount of a final decree is paid before execution, the debt or claim is "settled."

[Cited in Robinson v. Fifteen Thousand Five Hundred and Sixteen Bags of Sugar, 35 Fed. 603.]

In admiralty.

John J. Allen, for marshal.

Platt & Gerard, for claimants.

BENEDICT, District Judge. This is an appeal from the clerk's taxation of the marshal's costs. It appears that a libel was filed against the City of Washington, and process in rem issued against that vessel, on April 3d. On April 4th, before the process was served, service of the process was waived, and the claimants gave a bond, under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1847 (9 Stat. 181). Such bond was given and filed on April 4th. Thereafter the case proceeded to a final decree, the amount of which having been paid, the marshal now claims his commission thereon, according to the provisions of section 829 of the Revised Statutes, which provides, that, "when the debt or claim in admiralty is settled by the parties without a sale of the property, the marshal shall be entitled to a commission." To this it is objected, that there can be no allowance to the marshal, because he made no seizure of the vessel.

The provision of the statute which gives to the marshal a commission is applicable to all cases where the debt is settled by the parties without a sale. There are no other terms of limitation. Nevertheless, I cannot think it was intended to apply where no service is performed, or responsibility assumed, by the marshal. If, therefore, this were a case where process against the vessel had never been issued, and a stipulation for value had been given under the rules, I should have little hesitation in determining that the marshal would not be entitled to his commission, upon the ground that, in such a case, the marshal would perform no service and incur no responsibility, to afford foundation for a claim to compensation. But, in this case, process was issued, and thereafter a bond to the marshal was given, in which it is recited that the marshal has possession of the vessel. The recital is inaccurate, as the marshal never in fact had possession of the vessel. The statute makes it the duty of the marshal to stay the execution of the process upon receiving the statutory bond, and compels him to receive a bond when tendered in pursuance of the act, in lieu of a seizure of the vessel; which bond he is to return to the court. Where such a bond is given, the marshal must, therefore, exercise some judgment, and he is compelled to take some risk in respect to the form of the bond, &c., and he must make a return. Some service is, therefore, in such a case, performed, and some risk encountered, by the marshal, for which he is entitled to compensation. The provision for paying the marshal a commission on the amount is without any words limiting the allowance to cases where the vessel has been actually seized, and the intent appears to be to give the marshal a commission in all cases where he performs any service which affords the basis for a claim to compensation. I am of the opinion that he is entitled to his commission, when a bond under the act of 1847 is received, although service of the process by seizure of the vessel is stayed, and that this right is not affected by the circumstance that, in practice, the bond under the act of 1847 is ordinarily filed in the clerk's office by the claimant. Although filed in the clerk's office after approval, it is still a bond to the marshal, as obligee, and is deemed to be taken and returned by the marshal, who, upon his own responsibility, stays the execution of the process. The marshal is, therefore, in this case, entitled to his commission, provided the case is one where the debt or claim has been settled by the parties, within the meaning of the section. It has been heretofore held by Judge Blatchford, that, when the amount of a final decree is paid before execution, the debt or claim is settled, within the meaning of section 829. The Russia [Case No. 12,170]; and such is also my opinion.

[1] [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

For the reasons above given, I am, therefore, of the opinion that the marshal is entitled to his commission in this case, and the taxation is affirmed.

CITY SCHOOLS (BERTONNEAU v.). See Case No. 1,361.

Case No. 2,773.

CIVIL RIGHTS ACT.

[21 Int. Rev. Rec. 173; 7 Leg. Gaz. 165.]

[See Append. Fed. Cas.]

Case No. 2,774.

CIVIL RIGHTS BILL.

[1 Hughes, 541.]

[See Append. Fed. Cas.]

Case No. 2,775.

The CIVILTA.

[6 Ben. 309.][1]

District Court, S. D. New York. Jan., 1873.[2]

COLLISION IN THE SOUND—STEAMER AND SCHOONER—TOW-BOAT AND TOW.

1. A schooner was sunk, in Long Island Sound, by a collision with a ship which was at the time being towed at the end of a hawser, by a tug. The night was bright moonlight. The wind was light, from a little west of south, and the schooner was heading about northeast, and going at the rate of from two to three knots an hour. The ship and tug were heading about southwest. The schooner saw the ship and tug a little on her port bow at first, but the tug crossed to her starboard bow when a short distance ahead, and the schooner, keeping on her course, came against the hawser by which the tug was towing the ship, and was then struck on her port side by the ship's stem. The tug was towing the ship at the rate of about seven miles an hour. The ship and tug claimed that the course of the schooner was parallel to theirs, and that, just as she passed the stern of the tug, she ported her helm and so came across the hawser and between the tug and ship, and thus caused the collision. The ship was under the charge of a pilot, who was on board of the ship, but he gave no order to the tug. The hawser by which the ship was towed was about two hundred and fifty feet long. Held, that the ship must be regarded as a ship under steam at the place of collision, because she was moving by steam alone, and her steam power, though two hundred and fifty feet away, was so by her option.

2. It was, therefore, the duty of the schooner to keep her course, and the duty of the ship to keep out of her way.

[Cited in The U. S. Grant, Case No. 16,803; The Jesse Williamson, Jr., Id. 7,296.]

3. On the evidence, the courses of the vessels were nearly end on, and yet drawing across each other, the tug and ship drawing across the course of the schooner from port to starboard.

4. The burden was on the ship to establish that the schooner changed her course. On the evidence, the schooner did not change her course.

5. In the absence of any special instructions from the pilot who was in charge of the ship, to the tug, as to what was to be done on the approach of the schooner, it was the duty of the master of the tug to take care so to navigate the tug and the ship as to avoid a collision between either and the schooner.

6. Both ship and tug were, therefore, liable.

[See note at end of case.]

[In admiralty. Libel by Augustus B. Perry and others, owners of the schooner Magellan, against the ship Civilta and the steamtug Restless, to recover damages for the sinking of the schooner by collision.]

R. B. Benedict, for libellants.

Beebe, Donohue & Cooke, for the tug and the ship.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. This is a libel to recover for the damages caused by the sinking of the schooner Magellan, through a collision which took place between that vessel and the ship Civilta, off Hart's Island, at a little after half past two o'clock in the morning, on the 22d of December, 1872. The schooner was bound for Boston, from New York. The ship was in tow of the steamtug Restless, being towed behind her, by a hawser, and was bound to New York, from New Haven. The night was pleasant and lit by the moon. The wind was light, and a little to the west of south. The schooner was sailing free, with her booms off to port, and was making from two to three knots an hour. The ship and tug were making over seven knots an hour. The schooner went safely by the tug, and came in contact with the hawser, and broke it, and then the ship struck the port side of the schooner at about the port fore rigging of the schooner, the schooner's port side being crushed in, and the ship's bowsprit being broken, and the two vessels becoming so entangled that the schooner, when she sank, sank under the ship's bows.

[1] [Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

[2] [Affirmed by circuit court (case not reported), and by supreme court in The Civilta v. Perry, 103 U. S. 699.]

The libel avers, that the schooner was heading about northeast; that the lights of the tug and of the ship were discovered about half a mile off, bearing a little on the port bow of the schooner; that the schooner was kept steadily on her course, without change; that the tug headed for the schooner, until she was very near to the schooner, and then suddenly sheered to port, across the bows of the schooner, and just cleared her, but brought the ship down upon the schooner; that the schooner made no change in her course, and did nothing to cause the collision, and the same could have been easily avoided by the ship and tug, if they had either changed their course earlier, or had changed it to starboard, instead of changing it to port, or had stopped in time; that the schooner could have been seen in abundance of time to enable the tug and ship to avoid her, and she was so seen, but, if she was not, it was in consequence of the want of a lookout, or of negligence on his part; and that the ship was in charge of a pilot, and the collision was caused by negligence on the part of both the ship and the tug.

The answer of the ship sets forth, that the ship had a Hell Gate pilot on board, and was being towed with general instructions from the tug to follow in her wake; that the course of the tug was southwest, that being the regular and proper course, in the neighborhood of Hart's Island, for vessels bound westerly; that the schooner was made ahead and off the starboard bow of the tug, and steering about northeast, and about on a parallel course with the tug and the ship, and on a course which, if continued, would have carried the schooner at a safe distance on the starboard side of the tug and ship; that the schooner passed the tug, the tug having kept steadily on her course; that, when the schooner had thus passed, and when, by keeping steadily on her course, she would, with equal safety, have passed the ship, she kept away to the right, between the tug and the ship, and, although she was repeatedly hailed, from the tug and the ship, as soon as such change was made, to starboard, kept on, and ran upon the hawser by which the ship was being towed, and, by striking it, and by her onward motion, came in contact with the stem of the ship; that, the instant the change of the course of the schooner was seen, the wheel of the tug was starboarded, and she kept off to the left, and the wheel of the ship was promptly starboarded, to follow in the wake of the tug, and, if possible, avoid the schooner, but, owing to the change of the course of the schooner, the collision could not be avoided either by the tug or the ship; that, as the schooner approached the ship, and although careful attention was given, no one could be seen on the deck of the schooner until after the collision, when they were seen hurrying up from below, only partially dressed; that there was no lookout on the schooner, and, if there was any man at the wheel, he was asleep; that the collision was caused by no fault of those navigating on board of the ship, as she was helpless, and steadily followed, as directed, the wake of the tug; that the collision was not by the fault of the tug; and that it was caused by those on board of the schooner, and in charge of her navigation, in, among other things, not having a lookout, and not having a man at the wheel attending properly to his duties, and not seeing the ship in tow of the tug, and changing the course of the schooner, when she had a free wind, and not changing back, when hailed. The answer of the steamtug contains like averments.

The course through Long Island Sound, from the eastward, to a point between Execution Rocks light and Sands' Point light is west southwest, by the coast survey chart. From that point to a point some distance to the westward of where this collision occurred, the course, to the westward, is, by such chart, southwest one-quarter south. The schooner insists that she was heading, by compass, northeast, when she sighted the green and red lights of the tug, and the white bow light of the tug, and two white lights aloft on the tug, and a white light on the foreyard of the ship, and that those lights were sighted bearing from a point to a point and a half on the port bow of the schooner, or, as the libel says, "bearing a little on the port bow of the schooner." The tug and the ship insist that they were heading, by compass, southwest, when they saw the sails and hull of the schooner, but none of her lights, bearing from a point to a point and a half on the starboard bow of the tug and of the ship, or, as the answers say, "ahead and off the starboard bow." The libellants claim that the tug and the ship, from being thus off the port bow of the schooner, drew across her course, she keeping her course, until the tug crossed such course and shut in her red light, so that the tug left the ship in such a position that the schooner, in her onward course, got in between the tug and the ship. The defense claims, that the schooner was on a parallel course with the tug and the ship, and at a sufficient distance off to pass safely to their starboard, and that the schooner, after getting by the tug, ported suddenly, and sheered sharply in between the tug and the ship.

The witnesses on the part of the schooner are Tracy (her mate), who was at her wheel, George Parker (a hand), who was forward on the lookout, Sargent (her master), and Clark Parker (a hand). As the two vessels approached each other, Tracy and George Parker were the only persons on the deck of the schooner. Sargent and Clark Parker were in the cabin. Tracy had taken the wheel at two o'clock, some thirty to forty minutes before the collision. He had been on the lookout, forward, from one to two o'clock, and, during that hour, George Parker was at the wheel. At two o'clock Tracy and George Parker changed places. Tracy says, that, when he took the wheel, the schooner was a little past the Stepping Stones; that her course, when he took the wheel, was north northeast; and that, as soon as he took the wheel, he changed her course to northeast. The point of change would be about the point where, on the chart, the marked course, going to the westward, changes from south southwest to southwest one quarter south, such marked course being north northeast, from off Throg's Neck, eastwardly, to a little to the eastward of the Stepping Stones, and then northeast one quarter north to a point between Execution Rocks light and Sands' Point light, and then east northeast nearly up to Stratford Point buoy.

Tracy says, that he saw the lights of the tug, namely, her green and red lights, and the white light at her stem, and her two lights aloft, and the light on the foreyard of the ship, all at the same time, bearing about a point, or a point and a half, on his lee, or port, bow; that he saw them before any report was made to him by the lookout, of any light; that the lookout's hail was, "a steamer on your lee bow;" that the tug and ship were then from a half to three-quarters of a mile off, and steering, as he thought, about southwest by south; that, when 50 or 100 yards off, the tug changed her course and went across his bows, to his starboard, and hid her red light; that, up to that time, there had been no change in the course of the schooner, and her helm was then about amidships; that, when the tug showed on his starboard bow, he stepped three or four feet, to the gangway, and called to all hands to come on deck, letting go of the wheel and coming back and taking it again; that there was no change of it while he was gone; that he was steering northeast at the time, by compass; that, when the tug had got her length clear of him on his weather bow, he heard a hail from her, "keep off;" that, at that time, the ship was under his lee, tending a little ahead; that the schooner struck the ship's hawser, and then the two vessels struck each other; that the schooner had up her mainsail, foresail, jib, flying jib and main gaff-topsail; that, up to the time the tug changed her course, he had seen no colored lights on the ship; that, when he first saw the lights, he thought it was a tug towing a vessel; that he heard no whistles from the tug, before the collision; and that, if the tug had kept on, without changing, she would have hit the schooner.

George Parker testifies, that he was forward of the foremast, looking out; that, when he first saw the lights, he saw the side lights, and bow light, and a light aloft, on the tug, and a light on the ship, from three-quarters of a mile to a mile off, and bearing from one to two points on his lee bow; that he reported to Tracy, "a steamer on the lee bow," and Tracy answered that he saw her; that, when the tug was from 50 to 100 yards off, and her lights were bearing a point or more on his lee, she hid her red light; that, after the tug went by the bow of the schooner, he heard a hail from the tug "keep off;" that he did not leave his place forward until the tug had got within 20 feet; that he saw no colored lights on the ship before the collision; and that he did not hear any whistles from the tug.

Sargent was in the cabin. He did not hear the report of the lookout, or the answer of Tracy, or the whistles from the tug. The first thing he heard was Tracy's call for all hands to come on deck, and then he went out. He says, that, when he got on deck, the ship was under his lee bow, and Sands' Point light was nearly ahead, on the starboard side, between the jib boom and the fore rigging of the schooner; that he and his crew got into a small boat; that he was astern of the schooner, in the boat, and about in a line with the keel of the schooner, when she sank, and then noticed that Sands' Point light bore from two and a half to three points on the starboard bow of the schooner, which would make the schooner head about north northeast when she sank, she not having separated from the ship.

The witnesses for the defence are, Franklin (pilot of the tug, and who was at her wheel in the pilot house), Parks and Milliken (hands on the tug, and who were in the pilot house), Banta (a Hell Gate pilot, who was on the ship, on deck), Valcich (master of the ship, who was on deck), Dik (a hand on the ship, who was on the lookout, forward), Rosa (a hand on the ship, who was steering her by a tiller), and Stanger (mate of the ship, who had been below, but came on deck before the collision, on hearing whistles blown by the tug).

Franklin says, that he first made the schooner probably 700 yards off, and bearing about a point or a point and a half on his starboard bow; that he saw her sails and the shape of her, but saw no lights on her; that he judged her to be heading about northeast; that she passed his bow, to his right, and about from 60 to 100 feet off; that he was steering southwest; that, as the schooner passed him, she changed her course, by putting down her helm, and went in between the tug and the ship, and struck the hawser; that, when he saw that change, he blew five whistles and hailed to the schooner to keep off, that he had a ship in tow, and put his wheel to starboard; that the tug changed her heading one point to the southward, before the collision; that the schooner was heading about southeast when the ship struck her; that, from Sands' Point the tug and ship were in charge of the Hell Gate pilot who was on the ship; and that he had received no orders from that pilot.

Parks and Milliken each give substantially the same testimony as Franklin, in regard to the above matters.

Banta says, that the ship had her colored lights up, and a white light forward; that he was aft near the tiller; that, when he first saw the schooner, the ship was heading southwest, by compass; that he saw the sails of the schooner bearing about a point and a half on his starboard bow, and about 600 yards off; that he saw no lights on the schooner; that he next heard five whistles from the tug, and saw the schooner luffing sharp, and heard a hail from the tug to keep off, and helped to put the tiller of the ship to starboard, and then ran forward, by which time the vessels had struck; that, up to the time of the whistles, he noticed no change in the tug; that, when the vessels struck, the schooner was heading about southeast; that the ship changed only one point by starboarding; that he was pilot of the ship from Sands' Point, and it was his place to hail the tug if her course was not suitable; and that he gave no direction to the tug, and was not close enough to her to give any.

Valcich says, that the first he saw of the schooner was her sails, bearing nearly a point off his starboard bow, and a little on the starboard side of the tug, and from 600 to 700 yards off from the tug; that he saw no lights on her; that he was standing on the forecastle of the ship, and saw the schooner, when she had got nearly past the tug, alter her course more to the southward, by a quick sheer; that, when the schooner changed, the tug blew five whistles, and hailed to the schooner, and he and his lookout hailed to her; that the schooner changed from northeast to southeast; that, when the schooner changed, the tug kept off one point, and the ship starboarded one point; and that he starboarded as the schooner was going across his bow. The above is his version, on his direct examination. On his cross-examination, he says, that he was standing aft when he heard the tug's whistles; that he then saw the ship starboard; that he then went forward; and that, before the ship starboarded, he saw that the tug had changed her course. On his direct examination, again, he reiterates, that he was on the forecastle when he saw the schooner change, and adds, that the schooner changed her course after he heard the whistles of the tug; that, when he heard those whistles, the schooner was heading about northeast; that the tug went off to the southward before the schooner did; that he was running forward when the tug changed; and that he was on the forecastle, on the starboard side, when the schooner changed.

Dik says, that he was on the lookout, on the forecastle of the ship; that he first saw the schooner ahead of the tug, on his starboard bow, and about 20 or 30 fathoms from the tug; that he saw the schooner pass the tug; that, after the tug blew her whistles, the schooner, when a little astern of the tug, changed her course; that, after the schooner changed, the tug changed, to go more to the south; and that he saw no lights on the schooner.

Rosa says, that he had the tiller of the ship, and was steering southwest, when he heard the whistles from the tug; that, soon after that, he saw the schooner crossing his bow; that then he put his helm to starboard, by the order of, and with the aid of, the pilot; that the ship had changed about a point towards the south when the crash came; that he did not see the schooner before he heard the whistles; and that he saw the tug change, when the schooner got across the bow of the ship.

Stanger says, that, while below, he heard the whistles of the tug; that he came up, and looked at the compass; that the ship was then heading southwest; that he then ran forward and saw the schooner astern of the tug, crossing; that he saw the schooner strike the hawser, and was on the forecastle when the vessels struck; that he saw no lights on the schooner; and that, when he got on the forecastle, the tug was keeping to the south.

On the facts proved in this case, the ship must be regarded as a ship under steam, at the place of collision. From Sands' Point, westward, the ship and tug were under the charge and direction, as to navigation, of the pilot on board of the ship, who was in the service of the ship. It is true, that the steam power of the ship was on board of the tug, more than 250 feet away; but, the fact that it was at that distance off was owing to the voluntary action of the pilot, who might have had the tug alongside of the ship, and did put her alongside after the collision. The steam power of the ship, by which alone she was moving, was where the ship chose to have it. If the tug had been alongside of the ship, the two would, in law, have been regarded, quoad the schooner, as one vessel, and that a steam vessel, the motive power being in the tug, and the governing power in the ship. It can make no difference, so far as the rights of the schooner, as against the ship, are concerned, that the tug, at the option of the ship, was 250 feet away (The Cleadon, 14 Moore, P. C. 92, 97). If the schooner did nothing to produce the collision, it was the duty of the ship, as a ship under steam, to keep out of the way of the schooner, and the duty of the schooner to keep her course. The question is, whether the ship failed to discharge that duty, through any fault of the schooner, in not keeping her course, or otherwise. The burden is on the ship, to exculpate herself. In my judgment she has not done so.

The ship sets up, in her answer, that the schooner did not have a lookout. This is sought to be maintained by evidence that he was not seen from the other vessels. But, it is shown that he was at his post, and reported the tug, and left his post only when it was becoming dangerous for him to remain there.

The ship also sets up, in her answer, that the schooner did not have a man at the wheel, properly attending to his duties, and that, if there was any man at the wheel, he was asleep. This is shown, by the evidence, to be a reckless assertion, and void of foundation.

The ship also sets up, that the schooner did not see the ship in tow of the tug. This is disproved by the evidence.

The ship also sets up, that the schooner changed her course at a time and place when otherwise she would have gone safely by the ship, and did not change back, when hailed. It is for the ship to establish this change of course, and to establish it, if made, as one not made in the moment of peril.

The positive evidence from the schooner is to the contrary of any such change. If it is to be taken as absolutely true, that the schooner and the ship were steering opposite and parallel courses, it cannot be true that the tug and ship were seen off the port bow of the schooner, and that, at the same time, the schooner was seen off the starboard bows of the tug and ship. The testimony from each vessel, as to where away she saw the other vessel, is more reliable evidence, when such testimony from both vessels is applied to the case, as to the manner in which the two vessels were approaching each other, than any testimony as to compass courses, particularly where, as here, the vessels were in a comparatively narrow strait, and had lights ahead, the schooner being headed to go between Execution Rocks light and Sands' Point light, and being about two miles away from them, and the tug and ship being headed about for Throg's Neck light, and being about three miles away from it. It is true, that the proper chart courses of the two vessels, in the reach where they met, would be, that of the schooner northeast one-quarter north, and that of the ship southwest one-quarter south, and thus directly opposite; but, allowing for a little divergence from such courses, and for a tendency on the part of the witnesses from both vessels to exaggerate, the schooner, the extent to which the ship was on the port bow of the schooner, and the ship, the extent to which the schooner was on the starboard bow of the ship, and the vessels are brought each nearly ahead to the other, and nearly end on, and yet drawing across the courses of each other, the tug and ship drawing across the course of the schooner from the port side of the schooner to the starboard side of the schooner, and the schooner drawing across the course of the tug and ship from their starboard side to their port side, and thus the schooner seeing the tug and ship a little on her port bow, and the tug and ship seeing the schooner a little on their starboard bow. Then again, the schooner saw both of the colored lights of the tug, up to a time when the tug was but a few feet off from the schooner, and then the green light of the tug remained in view, and her red light went out of view, showing that she must have been nearly ahead to the schooner, but drawing from port to starboard of the schooner. And, in this regard, it is very important to note, that the tug and ship saw no lights on the schooner, although the evidence is that they were set, and properly burning. All that the persons on the tug and ship saw, was the sails and hull of the schooner. If they had seen her colored lights, and observed and described their bearing and movements, we should have been able to see how the schooner was approaching the tug and ship, as we are able to see how the tug and ship were approaching the schooner, from the view had on the schooner of the colored lights of the tug. I conclude, from these considerations, and from the whole evidence, that the schooner did not change her course; that the tug and ship mistook the course of the schooner; that the schooner's course was really drawing on to the course of the tug and ship, in such wise that the two courses were practically end on, where they crossed; that the unchanged courses of the schooner and the ship crossed each other just in advance of the ship, and either between the tug and the ship, or at a point ahead of the tug, so that the tug, by starboarding, avoided striking the schooner; and that the tug and ship, not seeing any colored lights on the schooner, and thus not being able to know which way the schooner was coming, ought not to have kept on, with undiminished speed. The tug did not slow until the schooner got up to her, and did not stop until the schooner was just striking the hawser.

The change attributed to the schooner is a deliberate one, made by porting, to luff into the wind. It is not a change which could have taken place by the leaving of her wheel, because that would have caused her to go to port, by falling off with the wind. The schooner cannot be held in fault for not starboarding, either before being hailed from the tug or after that. She had a right to suppose the tug and ship would avoid her; and the discovery by her that the tug was crossing her bows, and that the ship was getting in her way, was made, and the hail from the tug came, at a time when a collision with the ship was inevitable, so far as there appears to have been any power in the schooner to avoid it by starboarding.

The suggestion that the schooner's lights were not burning, because they were not seen from the tug or ship, cannot control the distinct evidence from the schooner that they were burning. Moreover, it is not set up, in either of the answers, that any want of lights on the schooner misled the tug or the ship, or contributed to the collision. Nor is any allegation to that effect made, in either of the answers, respecting the non-exhibition of a flash light by the schooner. The ship had her colored lights burning, and yet neither of them was seen from on board of the schooner, before the collision, while all the other lights of the tug, and the white light of the ship, were seen; and the whistles of the tug were not heard on the schooner. It is, therefore, not a strange circumstance, that the schooner's colored lights were not seen.

Is the tug, also, liable for this collision? She was subject to the orders of the pilot in charge of the ship, as is clearly shown. But the tug received no orders from him. While it would have been the general duty of the tug to have followed all orders from the ship, and while the tug would not have been liable, if the collision had resulted from her following improper orders given from the ship, yet, under the actual facts of this case, I think the tug is liable equally with the ship. In the absence of any special instructions from the pilot in charge of the ship, as to what was to be done in view of the approach of the schooner, it was the duty of the master of the tug, knowing, as he did, that, from Sands' Point, the pilot on the ship was in charge, and knowing, also, that the ship was too far behind for orders to be given, and that it was the privilege and duty of the tug to be placed alongside of the ship, where orders could be readily received, to take care so to navigate the tug and the ship as to avoid a collision between either and the schooner. The Secret, 8 Mitch. Mar. Reg. 116. If the collision had happened to the eastward of Sands' Point, the tug would clearly have been liable, and the ship not liable. The fact that the ship is held liable for this collision, for the reasons before given, cannot exonerate the tug from responsibility for not practically giving the charge up to the ship, by taking the ship alongside from Sands' Point, and for leaving the state of things, as regarded the relations of the tug to the schooner, to continue the same as they were before the tug and ship reached Sands' Point.

There must be a decree for the libellants, against both vessels, with costs, with a reference to a commissioner to ascertain the damages sustained by the libellants.

[NOTE. The claimant of the ship, Casimir Casulich, and the owner of the tug, John R. Baker, appealed from the decree herein to the circuit court, which affirmed the district court decree in an unreported case. Claimants then appealed to the supreme court.

[Both ship and tug were in fault. Those on board mistook the course of the schooner and failed to observe her lights, although they were properly set and burning brightly, and took no steps in time to avoid the collision. Both were responsible for the navigation,—the ship, because her pilot was in general charge; and the tug, because of the duty which rested on her to act upon her own responsibility in the situation in which she was placed. The tug was in fault in failing of her own motion to change her course so as to keep both herself and the ship out of the way; and the ship was in fault because the pilot, who was likewise in charge of the tug, neglected to give her the necessary directions, when he saw or ought to have seen, that no precautions were taken by the tug to avoid the approaching danger. Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivering the opinion of the court in The Civilita and The Restless, 103 U. S. 699.]

Case No. 2,776.

CLAFLIN v. ROBBINS.

[1 Flip. 603;[1] 4 Am. Law Rec. 505.]

Circuit Court, N. D. Ohio. Oct. Term, 1876.

REMOVAL—ON MOTION TO REMAND—SUIT AT LAW—WHAT IS IT?

1. The definition of a suit of a civil nature under the removal act [March 3, 1875; 18 Stat. 470].

[Cited in Fidelity Trust Co. v. Gill Car Co., 25 Fed. 745.]

[2. A proceeding under the Ohio statute to compel an assignee for the benefit of creditors to allow a claim is a suit at law within the removal act.]

[Action by H. B. Claflin & Co. against Ambrose M. Robbins, assignee of George V. De Forest.]

Homer B. De Wolf and R. P. Ranney, for plaintiffs.

Ingersoll & Williams and Grannis & Henderson, for defendant.

WELKER, District Judge. The plaintiffs filed their petition in the court of common pleas of Cuyahoga county, on the 28th of June, 1875, against the defendant as assignee of George V. De Forest, alleging that De Forest was indebted to them on sundry notes described in the petition, amounting in all to over eighty-six thousand dollars; that on the 11th day of September, 1874, De Forest made an assignment for the benefit of his creditors to the said Robbins; that the trust was duly accepted by the said Robbins on the 15th of September thereafter, and he was duly qualified as such; that within six months after legal notice of the assignment and qualification, the plaintiffs presented their claims, duly authenticated, to the said assignee for allowance, and who then rejected the same and endorsed his disallowance thereon; and praying judgment against said assignee that he allow the claim in the settlement of his trust and for costs of suit.

Before answer, and before the term of the court of common pleas at which the case could be first tried, the plaintiffs filed their petition in said court for removal of the suit to this court and the necessary affidavit with bond and surety. Thereupon the said court accepted the surety and ordered that no further proceedings be had in said court. On the 15th of July, 1875, the plaintiffs entered in this court a copy of the record in the suit, and the case was accordingly docketed.

The defendant files a motion to remand the action to the court of common pleas, for the following reasons: 1st—That the action was improperly removed to this court. 2d—That it does not really and substantially involve a dispute or controversy properly within the jurisdiction of this court.

[1] [Reported by William Searcy Flippin, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

On the hearing it was admitted that plaintiffs were nonresidents, and had complied with all the provisions of the statute for removal, and the only question raised and insisted upon was as to the character of the suit; whether it is covered by the statute authorizing removals, and comes within its provisions. The statute provides (section 2): "That any suit of a civil nature, at law or equity," may be removed, etc. Is this, then, a suit of "a civil nature, at law?" In order to determine this question it will be necessary to examine the statute under which the suit was instituted. It is founded upon the statute of Ohio "regulating the mode of administering assignments in trust for the benefit of creditors," which provides in section 74 (1 Swan & C. 710), as follows: "Creditors shall present their claims within six months * * * to the assignee for allowance, and the assignee shall endorse his allowance or rejection thereon, and claimants whose claims are rejected shall be required to bring suit against the assignee to enforce such claims within thirty days after the same shall have been rejected, in which, if he recover, the judgment shall be against the assignee, that he allow the same in the settlement of his trusts, with or without the costs, as the court shall think right; provided, however, that the assignee may make any defense to such action that the assignor might have made to a suit instituted against him before the assignment for the same cause of action."

What is a suit at law? It is defined in 2 Bouv. Law Dict. 558, to be an action, civil action, and applies to any proceeding in a court of justice in which the plaintiff pursues in such court the remedy which the law affords him. It will be seen that the proceedings authorized and directed in this statute embody all the elements of a suit at law—provide for a trial and a defense, a recovery and a judgment for the amount claimed, and for costs. The only difference between this and other actions consists in the fact that after judgment no execution is issued in the usual form, but instead thereof the assignee is required to allow the claim, which will entitle the plaintiff to a pro rata share of the estate in his hands, and is in this way executed. In all other respects the trial is to be conducted in the same manner as if the assignor were sued. It will also be observed that no tribunal is fixed in the statute in which the suit must be prosecuted, nor any particular form or mode of proceeding prescribed, leaving the parties to their rights to select the courts having jurisdiction of the case, and the modes and forms adopted therein.

It is claimed that this suit is only authorized by the statute. This is true, but it must also be borne in mind that after suit is brought it is to be conducted to judgment like other suits at law, involving all the incidents of other trials and may be tried even by jury as other cases. The assignee is not an appointee of the probate court under the statute. He is selected by the assignor in his instrument of assignment. These assignments in Ohio are common law assignments. The statute in question does not authorize them, but only undertakes to "regulate" them. The probate courts only get control of such assignments when either the assignee, assignor, or some creditor files such assignment in the probate court. If not so filed such trusts would be under the control of the common law courts of the state, if appealed to by any persons interested therein.

This action is a suit at law, and comes clearly under the description of "suits authorized" to be removed from state courts to this court. The motion is therefore overruled.

CLAFLIN, Ex parte. See Cases Nos. 17,387 and 17,388.

CLAFLIN (SMITH v.). See Case No. 13,026.

Case No. 2,777.

CLAFLIN v. STEINBERG.

[2 Dill. 324.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Kansas. 1871.

PRACTICE—POWER OF JUDGE IN VACATION — DISCHARGING ATTACHED PROPERTY.

1. One of the judges of the circuit court will not, against the objection of the adverse party, hear in vacation a motion to discharge property attached pursuant to the local laws of the state, although the motion is one which may be properly made and heard by the court in term.

2. The provision of the state attachment act, that such a motion may be made in vacation before, and decided by, the state judge, in whose court the action is pending, has, although the attachment act be adopted by rule in the federal court, no application to the judges of the latter tribunal.

On motion to discharge property attached. The plaintiff, a citizen of New York, brought an action in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Kansas, against the defendant, a citizen of that state. The action was commenced by attachment, and property of the defendant was seized under the writ, and is in the custody of the marshal. By rule, the court has adopted the statutes of Kansas in relation to practice and proceedings at law when not inconsistent with the constitution and laws of the United States, including the attachment act of that state. By that act it is made a ground of attachment that the debt for which the suit is brought was fraudulently created or incurred; and the plaintiff made an affidavit to this effect in this case. It is also provided in this act that the defendant may move to discharge the attached property; and the practice in the state courts under this statute is to receive affidavits in support of such a motion, and counter-affidavits in opposition to it. In other words, the truth of the ground for the attachment is, in this manner, inquired into, and if found not to be true the property attached is ordered to be discharged. Gen. St. Kan. 672, §§ 228, 229. By a statute of Kansas relating to the district courts of the state it is provided, among other powers of the district judges, that they may in vacation hear motions to dissolve injunctions, and to discharge attached property. Id. 304, § 2. In the present case, commenced, as above stated, by attachment, the defendant gave to the plaintiff notice that he would move before the circuit judge at his chambers in the city of Davenport, to discharge the attached property, and the motion was, by consent, postponed, to be heard before the circuit judge at his chambers in the city of St. Louis, on October 5, 1871. Accordingly, on that day the parties appeared; the defendant's counsel producing affidavits to negative the truth of the cause alleged for the attachment. The plaintiff's counsel produced counter-affidavits, and made the point that the motion could not be heard at chambers.

[1] [Reported by Hon. John F. Dillon, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

Fenlon & Stillings, for the motion.

John M. Krum, Henry M. Herman, and Hiram Griswold, opposed.

DILLON, Circuit Judge. The federal circuit court for Kansas has adopted the attachment act of the state, and under it the writ of attachment was issued. That act provides that a motion may be made to discharge the attached property, and it is admitted to be the settled practice under it that such a motion may be grounded upon a denial of the truth of the cause stated for the attachment, and may be supported and opposed by affidavits. Accordingly, I have no doubt that the court in term may entertain and hear this motion. Garden City Co. v. Smith [Case No. 5,217].

But may it be heard and decided by one of the judges of the court in vacation? Without going at large into a discussion of the question of power, it is my judgment that I ought to decline to act upon the motion, even if I have the authority to hear it at chambers. The circuit court does not derive its jurisdiction, nor its judges their powers, from the state legislation; and the statute of the state which authorizes a state judge to hear in vacation a motion to discharge attached property, has no application, and can have none, to the federal court or its judges. There is no act of congress giving the federal judges this power, and there has been no rule adopted authorizing such a practice. Whether it would be competent to adopt such a rule I need not inquire. The state court is held by a single judge, who resides near the place where the suit is pending, and, for convenience, the legislature has authorized him to hear in vacation a matter which the same judge would otherwise hear in term. But there are three judges entitled to seats in the federal circuit court, two of them living hundreds of miles distant from the district. If I must hear this motion, as a matter of right so might either of the other judges. Such a practice would be inconvenient and expensive; but the chief objection to it is, that it would deprive the plaintiff of the right to a decision of the question by the court, which sits in the state, and which the law contemplates shall, whenever practicable, be held by two judges, and not by one.

This may be illustrated by the practice established by the United States statutes when there is a difference of opinion between the federal judges. In such an event, the legal questions involved must be certified to the supreme court; for the opinion of neither judge can then prevail. But the practice contended for in this case involves a practical disregard of that plain requirement of the federal statute, and the assumption of authority not intended to be vested in one judge of the court without respect to the opinion of his associate. Motion denied.

CLAFLIN (TOBEY v.). See Case No. 14,066.

CLAFLIN (UNITED STATES v.). See Cases Nos. 14,798 and 14,799.

CLAFLIN v. WELLS. See Cases Nos. 17,387 and 17,388.

Case No. 2,778.

CLAGETT et al. v. GIBSON.

[3 Cranch, C. C. 359.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec., 1828.

MANUMISSION IN FRAUD OF CREDITORS—WHO IS A CREDITOR—CLAIM FOR ALIMONY — EVIDENCE — PROCEEDINGS IN OTHER SUIT.

1. A feme covert, who has sued for alimony, is so far to be considered a creditor of her husband as to make it competent for her, in a suit by his slaves for freedom, to show that her husband's deed of manumission, made pending the suit for alimony, and while he was prohibited by injunction from conveying away his property, was made in fraud of her rights; although he had, at the date of the deed of manumission, other property, more than sufficient to pay all the equitable or legal debts due by him to his wife, and left enough to pay the amount due to her.

2. A deed of manumission, by the husband of his slaves, pending a suit by his wife for alimony, and made for the purpose of preventing her from recovering her claim, is fraudulent and void; but if only made to prevent her from obtaining, at his death, a distributive portion of his personal estate, such motive for making the deed is no ground for impeaching its validity.

---

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

3. The proceedings in the suit for alimony are competent evidence for the defendant in the suit of the negroes for their freedom.

Petition for freedom. The defendant [Ann Gibson], while the widow of Abraham Young, married one Gerard Gibson. The petitioners [Phillis Clagett and her children] were her [defendant's] property at the time of her marriage with Gibson; and claimed their freedom under his deed of emancipation, dated October 31, 1826, duly acknowledged and recorded according to the Maryland act of 1796 (chapter 67, § 29), by which he emancipates them to be free after his death. The defendant had filed a petition to this court against Gibson, her husband, for alimony, and obtained an injunction on the 10th of July, 1826, to prevent him from conveying away his property. This suit for alimony was pending at the date of the deed of manumission. He died in the following year.

Mr. Key, for defendant, offered in evidence the transcript of the record in the suit for alimony, in order to show that the deed was made to prevent the defendant from obtaining a sentence for alimony.

Mr. Elkins and Mr. Coxe, for petitioner, objected that it was res inter alios acta.

THE COURT (nem. con.) permitted the record to be read in evidence only to show the existence and pendency of the suit for alimony.

Mr. Jones, for defendant, contended that the defendant must be considered as a creditor of her husband, (having sued for alimony,) at the date of the deed of emancipation, and that the deed, being made in fraud of her rights, was void; and being "in prejudice of" a creditor, was also void as to her under the 29th section of the act of 1796 (chapter 67). By filing the bill, she had a lien on all his property for her separate maintenance.

Mr. Coxe, contra. By a manumission by deed, the right of freedom vests instanter, although to take effect in futuro. It is otherwise in emancipation by will. The order for alimony was not made until the following March. The decree is only in personam; it created no lien on the property.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, contra) was of opinion, that the wife, at the date of the deed of manumission, ought to be considered as a creditor in equity, and it was therefore competent for her to show that the deed was made in fraud of her rights. She had a right to maintenance; she had claimed it in her petition; and whether it would be granted or not, was immaterial.

THE COURT also, at the prayer of the defendant's counsel, instructed the jury, that if they should be satisfied by the evidence that Gerard Gibson made the deed of manumission while the claim of his wife for alimony was pending, and for the purpose of preventing her from recovering her said claim, then such deed of manumission was fraudulent and void, and the petitioners are not entitled to their freedom under the said deed. But if the jury shall believe, from the evidence, that he made the said deed with the view of preventing her from obtaining, at his death, a distributive portion of his said property, such motive for making the said deed, is no ground for impeaching its validity.

Verdict for the defendant.

CLAGETT (QUANDO v.). See Case No. 11,492.

Case No. 2,779.

Case of CLAGGETT.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 247.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Oct. Term, 1821.

DISCHARGE OF JUROR.

A juror who has a cause at issue which he expects will be tried at the same term, will be discharged, and if not discharged, may be challenged.

Darius Claggett, who was summoned as a juror, made affidavit that he had a cause at issue in this court, which he expected would be tried at this term, and prayed to be discharged. See Acts Md. 1715, c. 37, § 9; 1778, c. 21, §§ 2, 3; and 1797, c. 87.

THE COURT (MORSELL, Circuit Judge, contra) discharged him.

Case No. 2,780.

CLAGGETT v. WARD.

[5 Cranch, C. C. 669.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. March Term, 1840.

DISCHARGE OF INSOLVENT—EXONERATION OF BAIL.

If the defendant has been discharged under the insolvent law of Maryland the bail will be exonerated.

Motion by R. J. Brent, for an exoneretur upon the bailpiece, the defendant [Thomas Ward] having been discharged under the insolvent law of Maryland. Beers v. Haughton, 9 Pet. [34 U. S.] 329.

Mr. Morfit, for the plaintiff [Darius Claggett] contended that as the law of Maryland went to discharge the debtor from the obligation of the contract, and as this debt was not contracted in Maryland, the act of Maryland, so far as it impaired the contract, was unconstitutional and void; and cited Gordon v. Tumer, 5 Har. & J. 369; Hickley v. Farmers' & Merchants' Bank, 5 Gill & J. 377; 3 Story, Comm. 340, 365; Smith v. Buchannan, 1 East, 6; Campbell v. Claudius [Case No. 2,356]; Constitutional Class Book,

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

82. He also contended, that upon the principle of comity, a discharge in Maryland could not affect a citizen of this district, because a discharge here does not affect a non-resident creditor.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent) ordered the exoneretur to be entered, upon filing the certificate of discharge of the debtor in Maryland.

CLAIRBORNE, The (JARVIS v.). See Case No. 7,225.

Case No. 2,781.

In re CLAIRMONT.[1]

[1 Lowell, 230;[2] 1 N. B. R. 276 (Quarto, 42); 1 Am. Law T. Rep. Bankr. 6.]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. 1868.

BANKRUPTCY—CONFIRMATION OF ASSIGNEE—DISQUALIFICATION.

1. In passing upon the confirmation of an assignee who has been chosen by the creditors, the court must be guided by a sound judicial discretion, and ought to reject one whom there is probable cause to believe disqualified by character or otherwise from performing the duties of the place with fairness.

[Cited in Re Wetmore, Case No. 17,466.]

2. A person who resides out of the district, or who has a direct interest adverse to that of the creditors generally, or who is the attorney of such a person or of the bankrupt, is disqualified.

3. But a general creditor, or the attorney of one, or a person who has been an attorney of the bankrupt in matters not connected with the bankruptcy, is not necessarily ineligible. Mere bias or prejudice arising from information concerning the conduct and dealings of the bankrupt will not usually disqualify.

LOWELL, District Judge. The person whom the majority in number and value of the creditors choose to be the assignee ought to be confirmed, unless disqualified by residence out of the district, by personal character, or by come interest adverse to that of the body of creditors. I expect the register to report any such objection, if known to him, whether taken by any creditor or not. When objection is taken the burden of proving it is undoubtedly upon the objector, and yet in so delicate a matter, and one in which direct evidence is not always possible, reasonable cause of suspicion might in some cases be sufficient for my action, which is intended to be discretionary. The most common application is to add an assignee to those chosen by the creditors, and this is often put on the ground that two parties have been formed among the creditors who have very closely contested the election and divided the vote. I do not usually yield to this suggestion because, as was said by counsel in one case, the statute does not appear to intend a minority representation; and it is within the jurisdiction of the creditors to decide upon the number of the assignees as well as to choose them. It is suggested perhaps that one of these parties is more favorable to the bankrupt, and the other is disposed to treat him with rigor, but I do not consider that any such general bias ought to disqualify a person of standing and character. One reason is that it would be almost impossible to find, in these contested cases, any suitable assignee, connected in any way with the estate, who had not formed such an impression. When there is a failure to elect from a balance of power in different sets of creditors, the majority in number differing from that in value, I have found it to be inexpedient to undertake to compromise the difference by appointing one assignee from each side, and I shall usually in such cases go outside of the estate and take some person who is entirely unbiased: and so where I add an assignee to those chosen. But I do not dictate to the creditors and require them to follow my example. If they choose one of their own number, I shall not usually refuse to confirm him merely because he may have taken one side in a contest of this kind, and have formed some general impression favorable or unfavorable to the conduct and dealings of the bankrupt.

If, on the other hand, the party supposed to be favorable to the bankrupt should prevail, I should not set aside the election unless there were similar grounds for it in the character or interest of the assignee as I have already referred to. The attorney of a creditor would not be ineligible unless his constituent were, and one who has been the attorney of the debtor in matters not connected with the bankruptcy, but who has ceased to have any retainer, might be confirmed.

It must be remembered that creditors retain an important power over the settlement of the estate. They have a right to require the assignee to prosecute or defend actions, to object to the proof of debts, and to examine the bankrupt; or they can do some of these things in their own behalf if they prefer it; they ought to exercise an oversight of the affairs, and to keep the assignee advised of important facts, and they can oblige him to act upon the information given him. This being so, I look to the character of the assignee, his direct interest, if any, and his present relations to the parties to any actual or probable litigation, but not much to any supposed general bias for or against the bankrupt or his dealings.

CLANCEY (UNITED STATES v.). See Case No. 14,800.

[1] This report contains the substance of the observations of Lowell, J., in several cases, including that of Clairmont.

[2] [Reported by Hon. John Lowell, LL. D., District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

Case No. 2,782.

In re CLANCY.

[10 N. B. R. (1874) 215.][1]

District Court, E. D. Michigan.

BANKRUPTCY—CLAIM OF LANDLORD.

Where premises under a lease are taken and condemned to the use of a railroad company, and damages are paid by the company to the tenant, upon the basis that his obligation to pay rent during the remainder of the term will continue, which obligation he expressly recognizes when he receives the money, and which he partly performs; the landlord, on the bankruptcy of the tenant, will be allowed to prove, as a claim against the estate, the amount of the unpaid installments of rent, at their value at the date of the bankruptcy.

The register certified that Guy F. Hinchman, executor of the estate of James Abbott, tendered as proof of debt against said bankrupt's estate his deposition, setting forth that at and before the filing of the petition for the adjudication of said [John] Clancy as a bankrupt, he, said Clancy, was indebted to said Hinchman, as such executor, in the sum of two thousand six hundred and twenty dollars, for rent of land leased by Hinchman to Clancy by a lease in writing, a copy of which, together with other exhibits, were annexed to the proof, from which the following facts appeared: First. The term for which the premises were leased began on January 1, 1872, and would end January 1, 1877. Second. The rent has been paid in full to the 1st day of April, 1873, and the sum of seventy dollars on account of the rent which became due July 1, 1873, leaving unpaid of the rent which became due by the terms of the lease on that day, the sum of one hundred and five dollars. The instalments of rent which would become due October 1, 1873, and January 1, 1874, would be, each, one hundred and seventy-five dollars, and for each of the remaining years of the term 1874, 1875, and 1876, two hundred dollars would become due at the end of each quarter. The whole sum unpaid, due and to become due by the terms of the lease, being two thousand eight hundred and fifty-five dollars. The claimant rebates the interest on the sums not due, and claims two thousand six hundred and twenty dollars as the sum to which he is entitled, as computed at January 1, 1874. Third. On the 15th of March, 1873, the premises leased were, by an order of the circuit court for the county of Wayne, upon proceedings instituted by the Detroit, Lansing, and Lake Michigan Railroad Company, and in due form of law, as prescribed by the statutes of the state of Michigan, condemned for the use of said company, and under the statute provided in such cases, the damages or compensation which ought justly to be made by said company to the owners of or persons interested in the premises so condemned were adjudged by the court, on the verdict of the jury empaneled under the statute, to the owners of the fee or reversionary interest in the premises leased to the bankrupt, as well as to other persons, the sum of six thousand two hundred and twenty-five dollars, and to the said bankrupt by reason of the taking of his leasehold interest in said premises, the sum of nine thousand five hundred dollars, which last-mentioned sum was paid to said Clancy March 27, 1873. Fourth. The jury empaneled to inquire what damages or compensation ought to be allowed to parties interested, were instructed by the circuit judge "that, in estimating the value of the leasehold interest of said John Clancy, and in awarding him the value thereof, said jury were to take into consideration that said John Clancy would not be released from paying the rent * * * as it might become due, and that they should make their estimates and award upon the basis that out of the moneys so paid by said company to said Clancy, said Clancy was to pay said installments of rent as they should become due."

[By Hovey K. Clarke, Register:]

This claim is for rent, which section 19 of the bankrupt act [14 Stat. 525] provides may be proved "as if the same grew due from day to day," a provision which, so far as I know, has been uniformly construed to authorize the proving of claims for rent up to the date of the bankruptcy, and no longer. The section cited concludes with the words: "no debts other than those above specified shall be proved or allowed against the estate." There is no other provision concerning the proof of claims for rent than the one cited; and whether the bankrupt will remain liable on the lease for rent which subsequently becomes due, even though he should be discharged from other indebtedness or not, it seems to me unavoidable that no claim can be maintained against his estate in bankruptcy for rent accruing after December 12, 1873, the date when the proceedings in this case were commenced. It may become a question, however, whether, notwithstanding this claim is stated to be for rent, it may not be included in that class of provable claims described in the first paragraph of section 19 as a debt existing at the date of the bankruptcy, but not payable until a future day. This raises the question, what was the effect of the proceedings in the Wayne circuit court on behalf of the railroad company, by which the premises leased were taken under the authority of the state and appropriated to the use of the company. If the circuit judge correctly charged the jury that the tenant would not be released from his obligation to pay rent, and that the jury must take that fact into consideration, the effect of which would be to enhance the compensation to be allowed to the tenant, and to diminish that to be allowed to the landlord—then, so far as the agreement to pay rent is concerned, the relation of landlord and tenant is undisturbed, the landlord's right to collect his rent as it shall become due remains unaffected until the happening of the bankruptcy, when, by force of the bankrupt act, this right is so far changed that the rent is to be computed "as if the same grew due from day to day," instead of at the stated quarterly period fixed by the lease. The direction of the circuit judge to the jury simply confirms the lease as an existing contract on the part of the tenant to pay rent, and this contract is the basis of the proof offered here. There is nothing in the principle as stated by the circuit judge, which authorizes any claim here except upon the lease, and that in the same manner as though the tenancy had never been disturbed by the proceedings to take possession of the premises leased; nor is there anything in the bankrupt act which, in the exceptional condition of this particular case, will allow a landlord to prove a claim for over three years' rent yet to accrue—a right which is uniformly denied to all other landlords. If these views be correct, the amount to be allowed in this case cannot exceed the rent accrued and unpaid at December 12, 1873, the date of commencing proceedings, which I compute as four hundred and eighty-nine dollars and fifteen cents, out of which the seventy dollars paid must be deducted, leaving due, at that date, four hundred and nineteen dollars and fifteen cents.

[1] [Reprinted by permission.]

There is, however, another question which is presented upon the facts set forth in the deposition offered in proof of this claim, and one of sufficient importance, as it seems to me, to entitle it to the consideration of the court. The rent had been paid in full to the 1st day of April, 1873. Prior to that date, the right of both landlord and tenant to the possession of the premises had been terminated by a proceeding in the state court, by which the state, in its exercise of the right of eminent domain, had authorized the railroad company to assume exclusive possession of the premises leased. By the lease on which this claim is founded, the landlord assured to the tenant the quiet enjoyment of the premises in language as explicit as that which bound the tenant to pay the rent. That eviction by a paramount title discharges a tenant from the obligation to pay rent, is undisputed. That this tenant has not been evicted, and that by a paramount title, it seems to me impossible to deny without violence to the substantial import of these terms. The character of this eviction and of its consequences to the parties affected by it, are properly the subject of inquiry, but that inquiry ought to lead to the application of such a rule as will be just to all parties. It is true that courts, in the application of well established, and, for the most part, wisely established principles, are sometimes obliged to sanction results which are not approved by their sense of justice. If any such principles control the facts of this case, of course they must be applied.

I understand it to be asserted by the claimant who offers this proof, that the words "eviction" and "paramount title" have a technical significance, which so restrains their natural and obvious import, that, while a landlord will be discharged from his obligation to protect his tenant in the enjoyment of the subject of the tenancy, when that enjoyment has been disturbed by the exercise of the right of eminent domain, yet such disturbance is not equally available as a defense by the tenant against the landlord in an action for the rent. It is true that the exercise of the right of eminent domain involves no impeachment of that title of the landlord on which he relied to assure his tenant the quiet enjoyment of the premises leased; and for that reason it is just that the landlord should not be liable for a breach of that covenant. The inability to make good that covenant results from the assertion of a title to which both landlord and tenant are equally subject; and in view of the possible assertion of which, the lease must be supposed to have been executed by both parties. The assertion of the right and power of the state puts an end, practically, to the rights of both landlord and tenant to the possession of the premises, and they are remitted for compensation for the invasion of their rights to the company for whose benefit their property has been seized. And, if compensation to the landlord is to be adjusted upon the theory that the tenant will still be liable for the payment of the rent, why should not the compensation of the tenant be adjusted upon the theory that the covenant for quiet enjoyment still remains in force? It is true that this method of remitting the parties to each other for their compensation would inure greatly to the advantage of the company, and therefore is not likely to be adopted; but this illustration of the principle ought to be conclusive against its application so as to transfer to one party compensation for damages which are really suffered by the other—which was actually done by the circuit court in this case. For, the actual damage to the claimant in this case was the value of the fee of the land, less the value of the lease, in excess of a sum for which the rent is a fair income. Ordinarily, the value of a lease is accurately indicated by the rent reserved. But, as was probable in this case, and will always be likely to be where the value of real estate is from year to year increasing, the value of a lease may be ascertained by the bonus which a party would pay for an assignment of it. If it was worth no bonus, then a release from the obligation to pay rent would be all the tenant could claim, and the whole compensation would go to the landlord. But, by the rule adopted in the circuit court, assuming that the obligation to pay rent remains, then the tenant must be entitled to such a sum from the company as will enable him to meet those payments. This sum in gross being paid to the tenant, what security has the landlord that it will be applied to discharge the obligation which was the only ground of its allowance, and not a very reliable one, as the result in this case shows? While the lease remained, the landlord's right of re-entry afforded abundant security. Of this, by the rule contended for here, the landlord is arbitrarily deprived, by some technical views concerning eviction, which, if the law compels us to regard as sound, do not reflect much credit upon the law, as a system for securing justice to those who appeal to its tribunals.

It is surprising that the attempt to apply a rule so artificial as this, has not led all courts to see that on the assertion by the state of the right of eminent domain, over premises subject to a lease, that the nearest approach to justice to both parties can be made by treating the lease as at an end, and allow each party to look for compensation—irrespective of any possible contingencies as to future claims against each other—to the law, which provides for damages or compensation in such cases. I have been referred to the case of Dyer v. Wightman, 66 Pa. St. 425, as an authority for the rule contended for by the claimant in this case. Its force seems to me much greater against the rule, than in support of it. Dyer brought an action of debt against Wightman for two years' rent. The defense was that the premises had been appropriated by a railroad company. The defense offered evidence of the allowance of damages against the company to the party under whom the plaintiff claimed. The court admitted the evidence, and charged the jury that the title of both parties to the lease, as well as the owner of the fee, under whom Dyer claimed, and to whom the damages, the proof of the payment of which was offered, were paid, "was changed. Each could recover the value of his or her particular interest or estate in the land from the railroad company; but the relation of landlord and tenant between the parties was thereby extinguished, and their rights under such relationship ended." Page 426. The verdict was for the defendant, and the judgment was carried by writ of error to the supreme court. The court, in delivering the opinion (page 427), concede it to be "well settled that a taking by the sovereign under the right of eminent domain is not an eviction." Yet, notwithstanding this ceremonious act of homage to the traditions of the law, to the constraints of which courts feel so often compelled to submit, the court in Pennsylvania found reason to affirm the opinion of the court below, that the relation of landlord and tenant was extinguished, and their rights under such relationship ended (page 429), and the judgment was accordingly affirmed. The reasoning of the opinion fully supports the conclusion of the court, that by such a taking the relation of landlord and tenant was extinguished, and that therefore the tenant was no longer bound to pay rent. "The dispossession of the tenant, by an authority which neither he nor his landlord could resist, would strike most men as an adequate reason why he should no longer be obliged to pay rent; and a reason none the less conclusive because of the doubts expressed by learned judges, whether such dispossession was or was not a technical eviction."

It is insisted before me, as I understand, by the counsel who appeared for the claimant, that the court in Pennsylvania was able to reach the result in the case of Dyer v. Wightman only because of certain equity powers exercised by the courts in that state, not competent to common law courts. I am unable to see anything in this suggestion of any importance to the case presented by the claimant. The proceedings before the Wayne circuit court were not according to the course of the common law, but were in pursuance of a statute conferring a special jurisdiction, without which the circuit court would have had no power to affect the title of the parties to the premises, or confer any right upon the railroad company. Before this can be done the statute laws of 1871 (page 339) require notice to all "parties, so far as they can be ascertained, who own or have, or claim to own or have estate or interest in said property." It provides a mode to "ascertain and determine the damages or compensation which ought justly to be made by said company to the owners of or persons interested in each particular description of land." Laws 1871, p. 343. I think it not only an unnecessarily narrow view of the scope of this statute, but also essentially erroneous, to withhold from the jury the power to pass fully on the question of damages and compensation in which any party has an interest; and that it is a mere mockery to tell a landlord that he must take, as a part of his compensation for the loss of premises under a lease, the unsecured liability of the tenant to pay rent for the period the lease may have to run, whether it be five years or fifty; for the performance of which the lease while in force was ample security; but, in the subject of which, in the now changed circumstances, the tenant has no enjoyment, nor any duty except the continued payment of rent for the remainder of the term. Such a view of "compensation" I am persuaded is not what the statute contemplated. If the power of the jury over the whole subject of compensation was as ample as by the views above presented it appears to me to have been, then the compensation as fixed by them to be allowed to all the parties before them, of whom the claimant was one, has concluded all such parties; and if the claimant has suffered by an erroneous ruling of the circuit judge, he is remediless, except as the statute under which the action was had, may afford him an opportunity to have it reviewed. If this ruling had been submitted to and affirmed by the supreme court of the state it might then become proper for this court to accept the law of the state as interpreted by its highest tribunal. In the absence of any such decision, the law, I think, must be interpreted as it applies to cases in this court, as the district judge shall determine, or the circuit judge, if a case shall be made calling for any such review.

These views lead me to the conclusion that no claim can be made on the lease of Hinchman, executor, etc., to Clancy, against the bankrupt's estate. I send herewith the proof of debt offered by the claimant and its accompanying schedules and depositions.

Pending the proceedings on the register's certificate before the district judge, the claimant was allowed to introduce additional evidence tending to show an actual agreement by him at the time he received the damages awarded in his favor, to continue to pay the rent during the unexpired portion of the term at the rate fixed by the lease.

LONGYEAR, District Judge. Without taking issue with the foregoing views of the learned register, on general principles, or, as applied to an ordinary case of a claim for rent, I think the peculiar circumstances of this case are such as, in equity at least, to entitle the claimant to the whole of his claim. By receiving from the railroad company the money allowed on account of rent to be paid in the future, and agreeing, in consideration thereof, to continue to pay rent the same as though his use and enjoyment of the premises had not been disturbed, Clancy must be held to have waived any and all legal objection he may have been entitled to make to the payment of rent on account of such disturbance; and the assignee occupies no better position than, but precisely the same as, Clancy in that respect. The claim in question must therefore be allowed as proven. Let it be so certified to the register.

Case No. 2,783.

In re CLAP.

Ex parte TARBELL.

[2 Lowell, 168.] [1]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. Sept., 1872.

BANKRUPTCY—PARTNERSHIP DEBTS — DECEASE OF PARTNER—RIGHTS OF CREDITORS.

1. Upon the death of one member of a firm, the survivor is bound in equity to apply the joint estate to the payment of the joint debts; and the representatives of the deceased partner, and, in case of bankruptcy, the creditors of the firm may enforce this equity.

2. A partner, by his will, made his brother, who was his copartner, executor, and devised to him the residue of his estate in trust for certain purposes, and authorized him to use in his business the property given him in trust, until it should be wanted for distribution. Held, that the intent of the will was, that the residue only should be used in business, and that the surviving partner was bound to settle the affairs and pay the debts of the firm in the usual way, notwithstanding this clause.

3. The surviving partner carried on the business as before, and notified creditors and others dealing with him that his brother's capital remained in the business; he paid the greater part of the joint debts, and contracted new debts; he converted a part of the joint property into money, but less in value than the sum of the joint debts, and became bankrupt, having in his possession bank-stock and other specific assets standing in the name of the firm, without change, since the death of his brother,—Held, that a joint creditor of the old firm, who had not received the notice above mentioned, could require that joint property remaining in specie, as it stood at the death of the deceased partner, should be applied to the payment of his debt in exclusion of the separate creditors of the bankrupt.

4. It seems, if the creditor had received the notice, it would not have affected his lien, unless he had done some act amounting to an election.

5. The fact that the surviving partner was executor and trustee of the deceased partner does not affect the rights of joint creditors, for equitable rights are not lost by the union or merger of different legal titles in one person; and, when bankruptcy occurs, the creditors may themselves assert the lien, which, while the surviving partner is solvent, is vested in the executor of the deceased partner.

The petitioner asked to have the assets marshalled by the trustee appointed, and acting instead of an assignee, under section 43 of the bankrupt act [14 Stat. 538]. The parties agreed to the facts, which were substantially these: Samuel G. Clap and Edmund W. Clap were partners for many years under the firm of Clap & Brother, and during that time the petitioner lent them $10,000, for which he held their firm notes. Samuel died in 1870; and Edmund carried on the business under the same name, until his bankruptcy in 1872, and used therein the assets of the old firm, of which several persons dealing with him, some of whom are now creditors, had notice; but the petitioner had no such notice. Edmund had drawn out of the firm, at the time of his brother's death, a very large sum beyond what Samuel had drawn. Since that time he had paid the old debts beyond the specific joint assets then on hand, if his indebtedness to the firm is omitted from the computation; but if that were counted in, he was still in arrears to the firm at the time of his bankruptcy. There then remained, and have come to the possession of his trustee, specific assets, consisting of bank-stock, real estate, &c., which was the property of the old firm. By his will, Samuel Clap, after giving to his wife certain chattels and a life-estate in his house, provided as follows: "3d. I give the residue, including the reversion of the house so given to my wife, of all the estate of which I shall be possessed at my decease, to my brother, Edmund W. Clap, for ever, in trust, for the uses hereinafter set forth," authorizing the trustee to sell, invest,

[1] [Reported by Hon. John Lowell, LL. D., District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

&c. He then provides for a division of the income between his wife and his two daughters during their lives, giving large discretion to the trustee to advance money to the daughters out of the principal, in certain contingencies; he appoints the same brother executor; and, finally, 11th. "My brother is authorized to employ and use in his business the estate and property herein given him in trust, or any part thereof, before the same shall be required for distribution, charging himself with interest therefor at six per cent." The petitioner asked that an account be taken of the joint assets remaining at the time of the bankruptcy, and that the same be applied to the payment of his debt, before any part thereof should go to the separate debts of the bankrupt.

C. B. Goodrich, for petitioner.
W. A. Field, for respondents.

LOWELL, District Judge. The petitioner asks that the trustee may be ordered to keep distinct accounts of the joint and separate estates, and that the proceeds of each may be appropriated to the corresponding class of debts. The bankrupt act—section 36 [14 Stat. 534]—requires this to be done when partners are bankrupt, but does not, in so many words, refer to the bankruptcy of one partner only; but there is no doubt that it applies generally to all settlements in bankruptcy, whether one or all the partners are before the court. Under a similar section in the insolvent law of Massachusetts, it was held that separate accounts ought to be kept whenever there were joint debts still outstanding, whether there remained joint assets or not, and whether one or more of the partners were before the court: Barclay v. Phelps, 4 Metc. [Mass.] 397; Howe v. Lawrence, 9 Cush. 553; Harmon v. Clark, 13 Gray, 114; Robb v. Mudge, 14 Gray, 539. These cases, and others cited by the respondent for another purpose, which will be noticed presently, carry the doctrine to its utmost length, by deciding that, in the absence of positive fraud, the joint creditors have no claim on what was once specifically joint property, and has been converted into separate property by the agreement of the parties. I have expressed my doubt on former occasions whether some of these cases do not go too far; but I will not discuss them now, because they are not cases which concern a dissolution of the copartnership by the death of a partner. In such a case, the representatives of the deceased partner have a right to require the survivor to apply the joint property to pay the joint debts; and, if he becomes bankrupt, the joint creditors may insist that this shall be done: Story, Partn. § 361; Lindl. Partn. 577; Evans v. Evans, 9 Paige, 178; Stocken v. Dawson, 9 Beav. 239, affirmed 17 Law J. Ch. 282; Tillinghast v. Champlin, 4 R. I. 173. The supreme court has applied this equity in favor of joint creditors as against the United States, claiming a priority for a separate debt of one of the partners, and in favor of separate creditors as against joint creditors, under a trust deed which was ambiguous on its face, but dealt only with separate property: U. S. v. Hack, 8 Pet. [33 U. S.] 271; Murrill v. Neill, 8 How. [49 U. S.] 414.

Partnership debts being in equity joint and several, it has been held in some cases that, in the settlement of the estates of deceased persons, all creditors come in equally against the separate assets. Such was formerly the law of Massachusetts, when estates of deceased persons were insolvent: Sparhawk v. Russell, 10 Metc. [Mass.] 305. But a statute has changed the rule in that state, and the same mode of marshalling applies, whether the insolvent is dead or living: Gen. St. c. 99, § 18; Rice's Case, 7 Allen, 112. I am not aware that it ever was held that the separate creditors could claim against joint assets, until the joint creditors were satisfied. The superior position of the joint creditors was founded on the higher nature of their security, being several as well as joint. See the able note of the American editors to Silk v. Prime, 2 [White & T.] Lead Cas. Eq. 111. So that, even when the law of Massachusetts permitted the joint creditors an equal share of separate assets, I suppose a court of equity would have given the surviving partner a prior right to joint assets. But however this may be, it has always been the rule in equity, when a living person was bankrupt, that the assets should be marshalled.

The respondent, not denying the general proposition, insists that this case does not come within it; because the late Samuel G. Clap has, by his will, relinquished the lien, and that the bankrupt has so dealt with the property as to convert it into his separate estate. The cases cited establish the doctrine already referred to, that where partners, acting in good faith, whether before or after the dissolution of the firm, convert the joint into separate property, in whole or in part, the creditors are bound by that action; because their lien depends on that of the partner himself, and, if he has in good faith relinquished it, they cannot revive it. Whatever was done here is admitted to have been done in good faith; and there is no intimation even of a knowledge of insolvency on the part of the present bankrupt, at any time before he filed his petition, so that, if these cases apply, he comes within them. But I do not read the will as making any such severance. The residue is given to the surviving partner upon certain trusts, and he is authorized to use, in his business, "the estate and property herein given him in trust, or any part thereof, before the same shall be required for distribution." This language is broad enough, perhaps, to include the whole property; because he held it all in trust, either as executor or trustee; but, in the connection in which it is found, it clearly means the trust fund, as I believe both parties concede. The residue, which is to constitute the trust fund, cannot be ascertained until debts as well as legacies are paid. I can find nothing in the will that contemplates a continuance of the business in the old name, nor any gift of the whole joint estate to Edmund, in order that he might continue it; nothing, in short, that binds the testator legally or equitably for new debts, or relinquishes the right of his representatives to insist that the old debts shall be paid, and the business of the firm shall be wound up in the usual way. If, by the will, the surviving partner is possessed of the whole estate, in one capacity or another, still his duty is the same in either: Wedderburn v. Wedderburn, 4 Mylne & C. 41. Equity never permits equitable rights to be lost by the merger or union of different legal titles in one person; and, when bankruptcy occurs, the joint creditors may assert the lien which before that time was vested in the executor of the deceased partner. It may be that there is a stronger legal hold upon him to do as executor what he would be bound to do as surviving partner; I mean to say, a remedy for a breach of duty may be simpler, but the duty is the same, to wind up the business, pay the joint debts from the joint assets, and dispose of the testator's share, as required by his will. If he had, in fact, converted all the joint assets into money, and paid it away, the lien might have been lost; but he has not done so. The case finds that there are specific assets, consisting largely of bank-stock, remaining in his hands, in the same condition that they were in at his brother's death; and the lien, certainly, has not been displaced from these.

Nor can the fact that he retained Samuel's property, and did business thereon, and so notified some of his creditors, affect the rights of the petitioner, who was not notified. Indeed, it is very doubtful whether notice would make any difference: Newsome v. Coles, 2 Camp. 617. It being found that this action was not in accordance with the will, nothing but a legal or equitable estoppel can change the rights of the parties. The rule that chattels and personal property, left in the order and disposition of a bankrupt by the consent of the true owner, are to be held for his debts, has never had a place in the more recent bankrupt and insolvent laws of this country, and certainly has none in our present law. And even in England a surviving or remaining partner does not hold the joint assets in his order and disposition in this sense, unless the other partner was dormant, or unless there was an express agreement to that effect, because he holds in trust to pay the joint creditors: Colly. Partn. § 883; and, a fortiori, if he holds under a will which is notice to all the world. This case, in its present aspect, does not bring up the whole account for settlement; and I do not know precisely what proportion of the joint assets have been converted. If it should turn out that there is any balance due the bankrupt on the final adjustment, no doubt that will go to his separate creditors. In the absence of fraud or preference, I cannot review the acts of the surviving partner in paying either joint or separate debts, both of which I suppose he continued to pay until he found he must suspend. I understand that proceedings will be taken by the representative of Samuel Clap to settle the partnership account, and I do not now decide whether any balance which would be otherwise due that estate will be affected with any equity in favor of Edmund's creditors, by reason of the permission to use the trust fund in business. Petition granted.

Case No. 2,784.

In re CLAP.

Ex parte SMITH.

[2 Lowell, 226.][1]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. March, 1873.

PARTNERSHIP DEBT—CONVERSION INTO DEBT OF SURVIVOR.

The mere exchange of the note of a firm, dissolved by the death of one partner, for a note similar in all respects to the surrendered note, signed with the firm's name, by the surviving partner, does not convert the joint debt into a separate debt of the surviving partner, unless it appears that such conversion was intended by the holder of the note.

In bankruptcy. The facts concerning the partnership of E. W. & S. G. Clap, and its dissolution by the death of the latter, the provisions of his will, and the state of the accounts and assets, were shown, in the case of George G. Tarbell [Case No. 2,783], petitioner. In 1852, J. C. Smith lent the firm $1,000, and took their promissory note, signed in the firm name, and was afterwards, before the death of S. G. Clap, paid $250 of the principal sum; interest was paid him yearly; and, in June, 1871, after the death of Samuel, he surrendered the old note, and took a new one, signed in the same firm name, which he held at the time of the bankruptcy. Neither party had any intention of changing the security by giving and taking the new notes; and whether Smith knew of the death of one partner is uncertain. The change was made merely because the old note was worn, and covered with indorsements. Smith petitioned to prove his debt against the joint estate.

T. L. Wakefield, for petitioner. 1. The new note was not payment of the old debt. Even in Massachusetts, whose law goes farther in this direction than that of most of the states, a note is only presumed to be payment until shown not to be so intended: Butts v. Dean, 2 Metc. [Mass.] 78; Curtis v. Hubbard, 9 Metc. [Mass.] 328; Watkins v.

[1] [Reported by Hon. John Lowell, LL. D., District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

Hill, 8 Pick. 522; Reed v. Upton, 10 Pick. 524; Thurston v. Blanchard, 22 Pick. 21; Melledge v. Boston Iron Co., 5 Cush. 170.

2. Taking the note was not an accord and satisfaction; because there was no new consideration and no advantage: it merely lost him one promisor: 2 Pars. Cont. 683, and notes g and li.

3. The consideration of the debt determines against whose estate it should be proved: Ex parte Christie, 3 Mont. D. & D. 736; Ex parte Brown, cited in 1 Atk. 225.

W. A. Field, for administrator of S. G. Clap. 1. Death of a copartner is a public fact of which persons interested are to take notice: Marlett v. Jackman, 3 Allen, 287.

2. The firm having been dissolved by the death of one partner, the survivor cannot bind his estate, unless by a contract duly made in closing up the business; and this note does not purport to be given by E. W. Clap as surviving partner, and was not so given in fact: Palmer v. Dodge, 4 Ohio St. 21; Lockwood v. Comstock [Case No. 8,449]; Parker v. Macomber, 18 Pick. 505; Perrin v. Keene, 19 Me. 355; Lumberman's Bank v. Pratt, 51 Me. 563; Lusk v. Smith, 8 Barb. 570; Hurst v. Hill, 8 Md. 399; Kilgour v. Finlyson, 1 H. Bl. 155.

3. The petitioner may have mistaken the law; but he did the act he intended to do, and the legal consequences are conclusively presumed to be within his knowledge and intent. It is now well settled that an express or implied agreement to take the continuing partner as sole debtor is founded on good consideration, and slight circumstances will be sufficient to prove that the assent of the creditor to such a conversion: Thompson v. Percival, 5 Barn. & Adol. 925; Shaw v. McGregory, 105 Mass. 96; Ex parte Channel, 3 De Gex, F. & J. 752; Evans v. Drummond, 4 Esp. 89; Hart v. Alexander, 7 Car. & P. 746; Robs. Bankr. 508, 509, and notes.

Wakefield, in reply. If the note be treated as made by the surviving partner, it was within his authority as such: Ide v. Ingraham, 5 Gray, 106. See, too, T. Pars. Partn. 404; 5 Whart. 530; Brown v. Clark, 14 Pa. St. 469; Robinson v. Taylor, 4 Barr. [Pa. St.] 242. There are no circumstances, even slight, to prove a conversion of this debt.

LOWELL, District Judge. The doctrine laid down in Lodge v. Dicas, 3 Barn. & Ald. 611, and David v. Ellice, 5 Barn. & C. 196, that a promise by a joint creditor to look to one partner only and release the other is void for want of consideration, was soon changed in England by the case of Thompson v. Percival, 5 Barn. & Adol. 925, which has been followed ever since. And it is now perfectly well settled that such a contract is not void, and that the reason given for holding it so is unsound, since a separate debt may be more beneficial to the creditor than a joint debt: Hart v. Alexander, 2 Mees. & W. 484; Lyth v. Ault, 7 Exch. 669. Supposing the partners to have agreed to convert the joint into a separate debt, the only inquiry is, whether this has been assented to by the creditor; and this is usually to be ascertained from the conduct of the parties. See an excellent summary of the decisions in 1 Lindl. Partn. (2d Ed.) 353. The question arises often in bankruptcy; because the fund out of which the creditor is to be paid may depend upon the answer. In bankruptcy, the prevailing doctrine is, that if the continuing partner has assumed the debts, whether by deed or parol, and the joint creditors have assented, before the bankruptcy, the conversion is complete. "It is apprehended," says Collyer (Partn. 5th Am. Ed. § 918), "that the conversion must depend on the assent [of the creditor], in whatever manner the assent is evidenced; that, although there be a deed, bare assent will be sufficient, though it would be insufficient at law; and that where there is no deed, assent will be necessary, although perhaps it might be unnecessary at law." In this country, the courts were reluctant to lose sight of the old common-law idea that a promise to take the sole responsibility of one of two joint debtors was nudum pactum; but I understand the later English doctrine has now fully prevailed here. For a discussion of this point, see In re Johnson [Case No. 7,369].

When the partnership has been dissolved by the death of one partner, the joint remedy is lost; but his estate may be followed in chancery, unless equitable considerations exist to prevent it, such as an express promise, or a course of dealing, or other circumstances, like those which would exonerate a retiring partner at law. Mr. Lindley, at the place above cited, says, "A court of equity will consider all the circumstances, and decline to assist the creditor, if, upon the whole, justice so requires;" but adds, that the small number of cases in which relief has been refused, compared with those in which it has been granted, shows the leaning of the court in favor of the creditor. And this remark is fully borne out by the authorities: Devaynes v. Noble (Sleech's Case) 1 Mer. 530; Winter v. Innes, 4 Mylne & C. 101; Harris v. Farwell, 15 Beav. 31. In Massachusetts, the debt is severed at law by the death, and the creditor may proceed against the estate of the decedent as if for his sole debt. Gen. St. c. 97, § 28. It is not necessary to resort to chancery; but the citations above given will prove that the rule is substantially similar in both jurisdictions. In bankruptcy, notwithstanding the severance, the joint creditor retains his right to be paid out of the joint estate: Burnside v. Merrick, 4 Metc. [Mass.] 537; Howard v. Priest, 5 Metc. [Mass.] 582; Lodge v. Prichard, 1 De Gex, J. & S. 610; Ridgway v. Clare, 19 Beav. 111; Hills v. McRae, 9 Hare, 297. In this case, there is no evidence that the estate of Samuel Clap was entitled to be exonerated from the joint debts, or that the bankrupt had agreed to assume them, or any other of the circumstances or equities from which such an agreement would be inferred; so that there is no foundation on which to base a supposed assent of creditors. The case stands nakedly on the fact that the creditor has taken a negotiable security from the surviving partner. It is undoubtedly true, that if a creditor of two partners takes the negotiable security of one, in satisfaction of his debt, his remedy against the other is gone. The leading case of Thompson v. Percival, above cited, was of that character. This decision is approved by Mr. Justice Story, Partn. (6th Ed.) § 155, and see the cases in note 3 to that section. But if the note or bill of one partner is not taken as satisfaction, but as security for the joint debt, the creditor may, if the security is dishonored, sue or prove in bankruptcy, as the case may be, on the original debt. Indeed, he may often have his election to prove against one or the other. This is familiar law in ordinary transactions, and has been often applied to the case of partners. Thus where, at the time of taking the separate security, the creditor expressly reserved his rights against the retiring partner, and retained the bill which had his name upon it, no discharge was worked: Bedford v. Deakin, 2 Barn. & Ald. 210. The intent is the pivot of the matter; though there are a few cases, like Harris v. Lindsay [Case No. 6,123], in which the intent is conclusively presumed from conduct which would amount to a sort of estoppel, of all which circumstances this case is free. Potter v. McCoy, 26 Pa. St. 458.

The difference between the law of Massachusetts and that of England and most of the states of the Union, I understand to be merely this: That in the courts of this state a negotiable bill or note is taken to be a more beneficial security than a book account, or any debt of that kind, and, though it does not operate as a merger in law, is presumed prima facie to be taken as payment. But it is a mere question of fact, and any evidence which rebuts the presumption is competent, and it is easily overcome. In other courts, the ordinary presumption of fact is the other way. On the other hand, I suppose that it is not difficult to find cases out of Massachusetts in which the deliberate exchange of one note for another is presumed to be intended as a payment of the note given up; but this is rather because the old one is given up than because the new one is taken. See Newmarch v. Clay, 14 East, 239; Arnold v. Camp, 12 Johns. 409. But the question always comes back to the intent of the parties. Melledge v. Boston Iron Co., 5 Cush. 158, cited by the petitioner, much resembled the present case. There the plaintiffs sold goods to an incorporated company, and took the note of its agents, supposing the signature to bind the company. The judge at the trial ruled that if the plaintiff received the notes under a misapprehension concerning the identity of the parties, and this mistake was caused by the acts of the company, the original debt would not be merged or lost. This instruction was held by the court to be sufficiently favorable to the defendants. I do not consider the latter clause of the instruction, that the belief was induced by the acts of the company, to be essential. The question is one of intent; and, if there was a misapprehension, that is enough, provided no equities have intervened to make it unjust to correct the mistake. It was on this ground that the ruling was sustained, and was said to be not too favorable to the plaintiff. It was less favorable than the law would have warranted. In this case, I am asked to presume that the petitioner must have known the death of one partner, the contents of his will, and the legal effect of these facts; and thence to infer that the note was taken for whatever it might legally turn out to be; which, on the face of it, is precisely what the old one was, but in law, it is said, can only bind the bankrupt individually. If there was a mistake, it is added, the law only was misconceived.

If the mere fact of the exchange of notes were shown, the presumptions might follow; but inferences cannot prove what both parties testify was not the fact. If the mistake were wholly one of law, such a mistake is often sufficient, even in a criminal case, where policy allows no mistakes of law, to rebut an inference of intent; but the mistake here appears to have been partly concerning the status of the partnership, depending on facts not known to the petitioner, though he might, perhaps, if the contrary were not proved, be presumed to know them.

There is another point to be considered. The surviving partner, who was likewise executor of his brother's will, was liable in two capacities to pay this debt; and his giving a note for it, in one capacity, ought hardly to be held to exonerate himself in the other, especially when on the face of it the intent is to bind both. By the death the debt was severed; the creditor might sue the surviving partner for the whole at common law, and he might sue the executor for the whole by virtue of the statute. Why should an acknowledgment of the debt by one exonerate the other, in the absence of any direct evidence of such a purpose, and even against the direct evidence? I hold, therefore, that this note ought not in bankruptcy to be construed as the separate note of E. W. Clap, doing business under the name of the late firm, because it was not so intended by the parties; and that the note, whatever it may be in itself, being made under the circumstances admitted here, does not convert the debt into the separate debt of the now bankrupt, nor extinguish the original liability of the old firm; and it follows that the petitioner is entitled to come in against the joint assets remaining in specie of the original firm. Order accordingly.

Case No. 2,785.

In re CLAPP et al.

[2 Lowell, 468;[1] 14 N. B. R. 191.]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. March, 1876.

BANKRUPTCY—ATTACHMENT—DISSOLUTION.

1. Attachments are not dissolved by the acceptance and recording of a resolution of composition.

[Cited in Re O'Neil, Case No. 10,528; Re Hazens, Id. 6,285.]

2. All liens are preserved which are not expressly disposed of by the bankrupt act of 1867 [14 Stat. 517].

3. An attachment can be dissolved only by an assignment.

LOWELL, District Judge. Objection has been made by three attaching creditors and by two deputy sheriffs that certain expenses of attachments of the debtor's property are not provided for by the resolution for composition. This objection might be a very important one in some cases. It would be very unjust that creditors should be bound to accept a certain amount of their debt and lose all their costs. It will, however, be soon enough to decide such a case when it arises. Here there has been no first meeting of creditors, no assignee chosen, and of course no assignment. It follows, as I have repeatedly decided, that attachments are not dissolved. My attention has lately been called to a decision of the court of appeals of Maryland, that an attachment less than four months old ought to be quashed after a composition has been duly accepted and recorded. Miller v. Mackenzie [43 Md. 404]. And I think it due to that decision to give my reasons for the opposite opinion. It cannot be denied that all liens of every kind, legal, equitable, maritime, statutory, are preserved by the bankrupt law, and by every such law, unless expressly mentioned and disposed of by the statute. As early as the time of James I. the English law provided that neither attachments nor judgments should give the holders of them an advantage over the other creditors in bankruptcy, unless the lien of the judgments were perfected by seizure or levy on execution. The bankrupt act of 1841 [5 Stat. 440] split on this very rock, the highest court holding, in opposition to the able argument of Story, J., that attachments were all preserved. Peck v. Jenness, 7 How. [48 U. S.] 612. It is true that liens were expressly preserved by the act of 1841, and the decision of the supreme court was only required upon the definition of liens; but, as I have said, it is plain, and has been decided by every court that has had the question to consider, that liens are as carefully preserved by our present law as by any of its predecessors, excepting where positively affected by express words. The argument of the case I have cited is precisely that of Story, J., which the supreme court overruled, that the debt being gone, the security must go with it; and, logically followed, it cannot stop with attachments less than four months old, nor, indeed, with any other security. The true rule is, that, liens being preserved, the debt is preserved, so far as necessary in rem.

Now, there is nothing in the bankrupt law, including the sections which authorize a settlement by composition, that dissolves an attachment, excepting an assignment by the judge or register. Accordingly, it has been the practice here to call a first meeting, and have an assignee chosen, when it was found that there were attaching creditors who were not willing to come in. It seems almost a technical point, I agree, but there is no help for it; and there are, besides, some advantages in having an assignee to see that the composition is duly carried out. Where no such advantage would be derived, I have not found attaching creditors disposed to insist on obstructing the proceedings, provided their reasonable costs incurred in good faith are paid. In this case, the attaching creditors have the remedy in their own hands; for they can refuse to release their attachments until their costs are paid, and, indeed, their debts too, for that matter, unless they have in some mode released their attachments or estopped themselves. This state of things might be a reason for setting aside the resolution at the request of the other creditors; but as no one has asked for the order on that ground, and as I infer from the papers that the attaching creditors are ready to accept their share with the rest, if their costs are paid, I shall order the resolutions to be recorded, subject to be rescinded hereafter if it shall be necessary for the protection of the general creditors. Resolutions to be recorded.

[1] [Reported by Hon. John Lowell, LL. D., District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

CLAPP (FORSYTH v.). See Case No. 4,949.

CLAPP (MASON v.). See Case No. 9,233.

CLAPP (WILSON PACKING CO. v.). See Cases Nos. 17,850 and 17,851.

Case No. 2,786.

CLAPP v. YOUNG et al.

[1 Spr. 40;[1] 9 Hunt, Mer. Mag. 173; 6 Law Rep. 111.]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. Feb., 1843.

FRAUDULENT SALE — WHO MAY COMPLAIN—COLLISION—VESSEL AT ANCHOR—BURDEN OF PROOF.

1. The question whether the sale of a vessel was fraudulent as against creditors, cannot be raised by third persons, who have no interest in the question.

[1] [Reported by F. E. Parker, Esq., assisted by Charles Francis Adams, Jr., Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

2. In cases of collision, where it appeared that one of the vessels had neglected an ordinary and proper measure of precaution, the burden was on her to show that the collision was not owing to her neglect.

[Cited in Bulloch v. The Lamar, Case No. 2,129; Martinez v. The Anglo Norman, Id. 9,174.]

3. The schooner Eddington went into Provincetown harbor in a gale of wind. After coming to anchor, she was driven from her moorings toward the flats, where she was brought up by her small anchor, and lay head to the wind. In this position, she was run foul of in the night time by another vessel, the Lion, having no person on board. Held, that the owners of the Lion had omitted a reasonable and ordinary measure of security, and that the collision was to be attributed to their neglect, notwithstanding a usage at Provincetown to leave vessels, owned in that place and manned by persons residing there, at anchor in the harbor, without any person on board.

In admiralty.

Benjamin R. Curtis, for libellant.

F. C. Loring and C. W. Loring, for respondents.

SPRAGUE, District Judge. This is a libel by the owner of a schooner called the Eddington against the owners of a schooner called Lion, for damage by collision. The first question is whether the libellant was owner of the Eddington. He has produced the usual muniments of title, a bill of sale, and an enrolment in his own name. It is insisted that the sale was without consideration, and for the purpose of defeating the creditors of Chandler Clapp, the former owner. But the respondents are not his creditors and are not in a position to raise that question. If Chandler Clapp chose to give the vessel to the libellant, it was no concern of the respondents; the sale would be good as to them as well as between the parties.

The next question is, whether there was any collision between those two vessels. On the morning of the third of October, 1841, the Eddington went into Provincetown harbor as a place of refuge, as a gale had then commenced. She came to anchor, but was subsequently driven from her moorings to the flats or near them, where she was brought up by her small anchor, and lay head to the wind. In this position she was run foul of in the night by some vessel having no person on board. Was that vessel the Lion? The master, mate, and a seaman by the name of Brennan testify that they were on board the Eddington and saw the vessel which came in contact with her, and when she was cleared from her, and kept sight of that vessel until she had drifted ashore; and the captain and Brennan testify that on the next day they went on board the same vessel, and that it was the Lion. They all three testify to certain distinctive marks of the vessel which came in collision with them, as to some of which they concur, and others are stated by one or two, but not by all. And it is shown not only by the testimony of the captain and Brennan, but by Howard, the mate of the Lion, that these marks belonged to that vessel, and there is no proof that they belonged to any other; and they were such that it cannot be supposed that any other vessel would bear, some of them being descriptive of injuries received. The Lion is proved to have been a pink-sterned schooner of about sixty or seventy tons, which had previously during the same night drifted against the Tarquin, where she received considerable injury, and among other things, her larboard bulwarks were carried away, and her anchors were left, one on board, and the other under the Tarquin, both her cables having been cut by one of the crew of the latter vessel. The vessel which drifted against the Eddington came broadside on, the bowsprit of the Eddington going between her masts, and it is testified by one at least on board of the Eddington that her waist was cut down. Now it is testified by Howard, the mate of the Lion, that when he went on board of her the next day she had her bulwarks on both sides knocked down nearly to the mainmast, which is most satisfactorily accounted for; if, after the larboard bulwarks were carried away by the Tarquin, as testified by Jefferson, she drifted broadside upon the Eddington, and there carried away her starboard bulwarks. There were several other marks testified to by those on board the Eddington which it is not necessary to enumerate. It is sufficient to say that if they were in fact seen at the time of the collision they identify the Lion beyond any rational doubt. But it is insisted that such was the darkness of the night that it is impossible that those on board the Eddington should have seen what they testify they saw, or kept sight of the vessel until she reached the shore, nearly or quite half a mile distant. Six witnesses have been produced by the respondents, who testify strongly to this impossibility; while six other witnesses have been produced by the libellant, who testify that it was practicable to see as stated by those on board the Eddington. Now, it is to be observed, in the first place, that these last, three in number, testify affirmatively and positively that they did see certain things, and that of the six witnesses in behalf of the respondents, five were on land, while the other six witnesses produced by the libellant were on board six different vessels in the harbor, and testify that the foaming and combing of the sea was such that a person could see better on the water than on the land, and they state certain things which they themselves saw and did. We cannot be certain that those on shore speak of the same point of time as those on board the Eddington, and we may well suppose that there was some variation in the degrees of light and darkness during the night; and as the moon was only three days from the full, I do not think it is shown to be incredible that the witnesses for the libellant should have seen what they affirm.

It is further contended that from the position of the two vessels and the direction of the wind it was impossible that they should have come together, and a number of witnesses have expressed this opinion. But it is to be observed,

1. That some of them, at least, seem to refer to the position of the Eddington the morning after the gale, which was a considerable distance, and by the plan offered by the respondents, nearly a quarter of a mile from the edge of the flats where the collision is alleged to have taken place.

2. Some if not all assume, that the Lion went in a straight line, by a "dead drift" as it was expressed, from the place of her moorings to the point where she was found after the gale, which is founded on the supposition that the wind was all the time in one direction, whereas Cowan, one of the witnesses for the respondent, testifies that the wind changed about eleven o'clock to the north, and other witnesses also speak of a change of the wind. Now it appears, that the Lion dragged her anchors from the place of her moorings until she came in contact with the Tarquin, when her cables were cut and her anchors left. As there was no one on board the Lion, we cannot know how long she was in drifting, how often she brought up while her anchors were ahead, or how near she may have been to the Tarquin when she last brought up. She remained in collision with the Tarquin about half an hour. I am not aware that the relative positions of the Tarquin and the Eddington have been stated, or that any witness has expressed an opinion that a vessel could not have been carried from the Tarquin to the Eddington. If the Tarquin was north of the Eddington and the Lion parted from the Tarquin after the wind had come to the north, as testified by Cowan, there would be no improbability in her striking the Eddington, and being afterward carried in a southerly direction to the point where she was found next morning.

3. Other witnesses who saw the position of the two vessels and had every opportunity to know the state of the wind, express the opinion that they did come in collision.

4. What other vessel could it have been that run foul of the Eddington? The captain of that vessel, before he left Provincetown, and soon after the occurrence, charged it upon the Lion, and said he should claim compensation. The attention of the respondents was early called to this subject; and yet in all their testimony they have presented but one ground of probability that it was some other vessel, and that is that other vessels were found after the gale lying nearer to the Eddington. It so happens that all those vessels, as appears by the testimony of Cowan, a witness for the respondents, who, from the proximity of his residence, seems to have had the best means of knowledge, were strangers with their crews on board. The only two that are named are the Vestal and the Amanda. Martin Stoddard also testifies that the Vestal had a crew on board; and Charles Bruce testifies that he was on board the Amanda, that she came in collision with no other vessel, and that there was no vessel on shore nearer to the Eddington than the Lion, excepting his own. It also appears, that the Vestal had a square stern. It has already been stated that there was no person on board the vessel which came in contact with the Eddington; and the captain, mate and Brennan testify that she had a pink stern. It has been contended that these three witnesses are not entitled to belief. As to the captain, although his general character is shown to be good, yet from the character of the conveyance of the vessel to his brother, the libellant, and the bias that he may be under as master or agent of his brother, if indeed he have not a pecuniary interest, I think reliance should not be placed upon his testimony when in conflict with that of disinterested witnesses, or in matters of opinion.

But against the mate and Brennan no such objections exist. It is indeed suggested that the latter expects to go to sea again with the captain, but the mate was discharged immediately after a gale, for a cause, as appears by the log book, which would be far from conciliating his favor, and there is no reason to suppose that he has any partiality whatever, either for the captain or the libellant. On the whole, I do not think there is any substantial reason to doubt that it was the Lion which came in collision with the Eddington. It has been suggested that the Eddington was in fault in not having let go both anchors, in the first instance, and in keeping her yards and topmasts aloft. This, however, has not been much urged, and I do not think that the evidence shows it to be blameworthy.

The most important and the most difficult question still remains. Is the collision to be attributed to negligence on the part of the Lion? The only neglect alleged is the leaving her alone when it was seen that a gale was coming on, with from thirty to fifty vessels at anchor in the harbor. Notwithstanding the wide diversity of opinion among the witnesses, I am fully satisfied, from testimony, that a vessel is rendered more safe from collision by having some person on board. But this is by no means decisive; for it has been well contended by the counsel for the respondents that the owners were not bound to take extraordinary measures of precaution, however conducive to safety. The question is, whether they have omitted a reasonable and ordinary measure of security. Now I think it appears by various maritime codes, adopted by different nations, in different ages, to have been the opinion of those who have legislated upon the subject, that a vessel ought not to be left without some person on board, and this is strongly indicative of the general sense of the maritime world. The evidence in this case, derived from numerous witnesses who have had much experience as mariners in all kinds of vessels, satisfactorily proves that, as a general rule, some person ought to be left on board a vessel while lying at anchor in a harbor, especially when a gale is coming on, and that the omission to do so is a neglect of duty. But it is also fully proved to have been for a long time the established usage at Provincetown to leave vessels, owned in that place, and manned by persons residing there, at anchor in the harbor without any person on board; and that this usage prevails at all times, whether a gale is coming on or not, and embraces not only fishermen and small craft, but coasters and other vessels there owned; some of them being as large as two hundred tons burthen. Some evidence has been introduced to prove that a similar usage prevails in other places in Massachusetts. But it is to be remarked that all those named, excepting Cape Ann, are tide harbors; and that the testimony comes only from occasional visitors, and not from the residents of any of those places, and is by no means satisfactory as to the generality of the usage, and its extent or limitations, and especially whether it prevails when a gale is foreseen. That it is material that the witnesses should have spoken to this point is apparent from the testimony of witnesses from Truro, which lies on the harbor of Provincetown, by which it appears that, although they adopt the usage of their neighbors in fair weather, yet when a gale is seen to be approaching, some persons are put on board their vessels for greater security. The usage, therefore, which is to cover the present case, is not shown to exist except among the inhabitants of Provincetown.

It is proved that the usage was followed in the present case. Howard, the mate of the Lion, testifies that seeing a gale coming on, he and the captain went on board of her and let go a second anchor and moored her in the usual manner. It has been urged with much force by the counsel for the respondents: 1. That all the ordinary and usual precautions were adopted, and that they were not bound to extraordinary and unusual measures; and 2. That the fact that such usage had been adopted and universally practised upon by the people of Provincetown, known to be prudent, sagacious and economical, is conclusive evidence that it is safe and proper. As to the last point, it may be observed in the first place, that the practice of the people of Truro is evidence on the other hand that it is not safe and proper to leave vessels alone when a gale is foreseen; and in the next place that the usage is not adopted by the people of Provincetown for its safety, or because there is less danger of vessels striking adrift or coming in collision in that than in other harbors, but for their own convenience, their vessels being generally small and employed in the fisheries, are much in the harbor, and very often with little or no lading on board; and the officers and crew having their families and homes at Provincetown, the convenience of the practice to them outweighs its hazards; and therefore they have been content to adopt it with the mutual understanding that when accidents occur each one shall bear the damage occasioned to his own vessel by drifting or collision. This may be all very well as among themselves, but the question is whether a stranger vessel, not assenting to the usage or participating in its benefits, shall be subjected to its hazards. It is to be borne in mind that this is not a case of contract, where a party having made an agreement with reference to a known usage, thereby assents to and adopts it. The harbor of Provincetown, as part of the great highway, is equally open to all vessels of the United States, and much resorted to as a place of safety by strangers, and oftentimes by those laden with valuable cargoes. The libellant's vessel did not enter it by the indulgence of the people of Provincetown, but used its waters as a matter of right, independent of their consent. When it is said that all the usual and ordinary precautions were adopted, the truth of the proposition depends on the standard to which reference is had. If referred to the practice of the inhabitants of Provincetown it is true, but with reference to the general maritime practice it is not true. The question, then, is whether a person who has adopted the usage of a village of about 2,200 inhabitants in contravention of the practice of all the rest of the maritime world, can be correctly said to have adopted all the usual and ordinary precautions? Is it not apparent that the inhabitants of Provincetown have habitually violated a general rule for safety adopted by mariners? And the defence of the respondents is, that they have only participated in this violation. When the libellant entered the harbor of Provincetown, he was bound only by the general maritime rules and usages, and he had a right to rely upon their observance by others using the same public waters.

It has been further contended that, even if there was negligence in leaving the Lion without any person on board, yet the injury to the Eddington was not occasioned thereby. Now I think that when it is shown that a collision has taken place between two vessels, and that one of them had neglected an ordinary and proper measure of prevention, the burthen at least, is on her to show that the collision was not owing to her neglect, but would have equally happened if she had performed her duty.

This burden the respondents have assumed and insist that such was the extreme darkness of the night and violence of the gale, that human efforts would have been vain, that no sail could have been set, nor the course of the vessel in any manner changed, and that if it could a vessel could not have been seen far enough to avoid striking her.

I have already stated that after examination and comparison of the mass of conflicting evidence, I am satisfied that upon the water a vessel could have been seen at some distance, and far enough to be avoided by any vessel which could be sheered. As to the possibility of changing the course of the vessel, opposite opinions have been strongly expressed by different witnesses; but I am relieved from the necessity of settling the pretensions of conflicting theories, by the fact that some vessels were sheered so as to avoid others.

I refer particularly to the testimony of Joseph Barnes, who was master of the Panther, who states that his vessel went ashore when the gale was the heaviest; that several vessels lay to leeward of his; he slipped his cable and "run through the fleet before the wind;" that he had a jib set, "sheered through the other vessels very well, passed several, and run ashore safe." And Martin Stoddard, master of the Gentile, who, after stating that he slipped his cable and hoisted the jib up, proceeds to say: "Our vessel swung off before the wind. I took the helm with one other man and steered her ashore by sheering one way and another to clear her of vessels. When we hoisted the jib up it burst, but it held until we swung off before the wind." Charles Bruce, master of the Amanda, testifies that he sheered his vessel; and to this we may add the success of Jefferson in disengaging the Lion from the Tarquin. These are pregnant facts, and they stand wholly uncontroverted. There is no evidence that any one attempted to sheer his vessel without some success.

Upon the best consideration which I have been able to bestow upon this case, I am of opinion that the defence is not sustained, and that the decree must be in favor of the libellant.

It has been stated that a decision adverse to the local usage which has been relied upon will subject the people of Provincetown to great inconvenience. If so, it is a consequence much to be regretted, but cannot vary the duty of the court.

Case No. 2,787.

The CLARA.

[13 Blatchf. 509.][1]

Circuit Court, E. D. New York. Aug. 16, 1876.[2]

COLLISION AT DELAWARE BREAKWATER — STORM — WATCH — LIGHTS — LOOKOUT.

A vessel, the N., was lying at anchor inside of the Delaware breakwater, in the month of February, having gone there for safety from an approaching storm. Night came on, and it was very dark, and a large number of vessels came in, and a severe snow storm set in. The N. had no watch on deck. It was not proved that she had a light set. The C. came in for shelter from the storm, having proper lights, and a proper lookout, and, in anchoring, collided with and sank the N. Held, that the N. was in fault in not having a watch on deck, and could not recover against the C.

[Cited in The Isaac Bell, 9 Fed. 848; The Erastus Corning, 25 Fed. 574.]

[See note at end of case.]

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the eastern district of New York.

[In admiralty. Libel by Jotham Shepherd and others, owners of the schooner Julia Newell, against the schooner Clara, for a loss sustained by collision. There was a decree for libellants in the district court (case unreported), and Lemuel H. Hopkins and others, claimants of the Clara, appeal.]

Scudder & Carter, for libellants.
Owen & Gray, for claimants.

HUNT, Circuit Justice. A collision occurred about five o'clock, a. m., of the 25th of February, 1874, inside the Delaware breakwater, between the schooners Clara and Julia Newell, whereby the latter was sunk. The Newell, a small schooner of 78 tons burden, on the afternoon of the 23d of February, anchored within the breakwater for shelter from an approaching storm, and the Clara, being on a voyage from New York to Baltimore, foreseeing the approaching storm, bore away for and also put into the breakwater for safety, where she arrived about five o'clock, a. m., of the 25th of February, and, while proceeding to a suitable and proper anchorage, collided with the Newell. There were then a large number of vessels in the breakwater, and others were constantly arriving. At the time the Clara entered the breakwater the night was cold and very dark, the moon having gone down several hours before. The Newell was lying without a watch on deck. The storm set in about the time the Clara came to anchor, and was a very severe snow storm. If the Newell had had a sufficient watch on deck, the accident might have been prevented. The Clara was well manned, and had proper lights and a proper lookout.

Whether the Newell had set and burning the light required by law for a vessel at anchor, is a matter of considerable doubt. The evidence is conflicting, and it is quite difficult to determine what the truth is. I do not, however, pass upon this point, as I hold that the absence of an anchor watch on the Newell is fatal to her right of recovery. On this point there is no conflict of evidence. The mate of the Newell testifies, that, at the time of the collision, and for a considerable period before, no one was upon the deck of the Newell. It was his watch, and he kept it by going on deck occasionally, but remaining the most of the time in the cabin. At the time of the shouts and clamor preceding the collision, he was in the cabin, reading an almanac, and no one was on the deck. When he reached the deck, it was too late to avoid the catastrophe.

[1] [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

[2] [Affirmed in The Clara, 102 U. S. 200.]

The place of refuge sought by each of these vessels was an artificial harbor off the coast of Delaware, constructed by the United States in aid of the coastwise commerce of the country. Sixty or seventy vessels had, at this time, put in there, to avoid an impending storm. It was an inclement season of the year, the month of February. The night was dark and rough, and a severe snow storm soon came on. The Newell and the Clara had each a perfect right, as had all other vessels, to take advantage of this place of safety. It was, however, the duty of each to take the proper and customary measures for its own protection, and to avoid injury to others. As she came in, the Clara was bound to have a sufficient and careful lookout, in addition to the lights required by the statute. This, I think, she had. The Newell was bound to keep a head light, and was, also, bound to keep a watch upon her deck. The latter duty she entirely omitted. If her mate had been upon deck, keeping a careful lookout, he might have seen the Clara and her lights at such a distance, that, by hails and shouts, he could have warned her of the position of the Newell. If he could not have seen her lights, he might have heard the noise arising from lowering her sails and casting her anchors. It is testified, that the Clara could have heard a hail from the Newell at a distance of one hundred yards, and thus the accident might have been avoided. The omission was a want of proper vigilance, and it is by no means certain, that, if well kept, the watch would not have preserved both vessels in safety. The Sapphire, 11 Wall. [78 U. S.] 170, 171; The Indiana [Case No. 7,020]; Cohen v. The Wilder [Id. 2,965]; The Lydia [Id. 8,614]. The lookout of the Clara failed to discover the light of the Newell, if she had one, but the Newell might have seen her lights, or heard her noise, and, by shouts and hails, have given that notice which was needed. For this negligence I think she loses her right of recovery, and that the decree must be reversed and the libel dismissed.

[NOTE. From this decree, libellants appealed to the supreme court [102 U. S. 200], where the decree of the circuit was affirmed.

[The grounds of the affirmance are thus stated by Mr. Justice Swayne: "While undoubtedly it was the duty of the Clara to enter the breakwater and proceed to her anchorage with the greatest care and circumspection, the case discloses no fault whatever, of omission or commission, on her part. The findings, however, as to the Newell, put her deeply in the wrong, and there is nothing in the record which mitigates in any degree the severe condemnation which her recklessness invoked."]

Case No. 2,788.

The CLARA.

The CLARA CLARITA.

[5 Ben. 375.] [1]

District Court, S. D. New York. Nov., 1871.[2]

COLLISION—SALVAGE—TOWING A VESSEL ON FIRE AGAINST VESSEL AT ANCHOR — INEVITABLE ACCIDENT.

1. A ferry-boat, lying at a dock, caught fire at night. A tug went to her assistance, and, after having in vain attempted to put out the fire, she, at the request of those in charge of the ferry-boat, who feared the spread of the fire, towed the ferry-boat out into the stream by a hempen hawser, for the purpose of taking her to where she could be beached. The hawser burned off twice, the ferry-boat drifting each time. The second time, before the tug could prevent it, she drifted against the bows of a schooner, and set her on fire. The tug, fastening to the ferry-boat again, pulled her away, and towed her till she sank, and then returned to the schooner and rendered her assistance in putting out the fire on board of her. The schooner was lying at anchor in a usual place, having no anchor-watch on deck, and it appeared that it was not usual to keep an anchor-watch upon vessels so anchored, except in cases of fog or storm. The owners of the tug claimed to recover salvage from the schooner, and the owners of the schooner claimed to recover damages from the tug for the setting of the schooner on fire. Held, that, the schooner being at anchor in a proper place, the burden of proof was on the tug to prove that she was not in fault in towing the ferry-boat against the schooner, and none the less so, because the ferry-boat was on fire.

[Cited in Southwestern Transp. Co. v. Pittsburg Coal Co., 42 Fed. 920.]

[See note at end of case.]

2. That the action of the tug, in towing the ferry-boat away from the dock, was not within the rule which authorizes one, in case of necessity, to destroy another's property, in order to prevent the spread of a fire.

[Followed in The Chickasaw, 38 Fed. 361, 362.]

[See note at end of case.]

3. That the towing of the ferry-boat out by a hempen hawser, which was likely to burn off and let her drift, was an act of negligence on the part of the tug.

[Followed in The Chickasaw, 38 Fed. 361, 362.]

[See note at end of case.]

4. That the drifting of the ferry-boat against the schooner was not an inevitable accident, but was the result of negligence on the part of the tug, and the latter, therefore, was not entitled to recover salvage.

[See note at end of case.]

5. That the schooner was without fault, and was entitled to recover her damages.

[Cited in The Fremont, Case No. 5,094.]

[See note at end of case.]

[In admiralty. Libels by the New York Harbor Protection Company, owner of the steamtug Clara Clarita, against the schooner Clara to recover for services rendered in ex-

[1] [Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

[2] [Affirmed by circuit court in Case No. 2,789, and by supreme court in The Clarita and The Clara, 23 Wall. (90 U. S.) 1.]

tinguishing a fire, and by Augustus M. Cox and others, owners of the schooner, against the tug to recover the damages caused by the fire.]

Cornelius Van Santvoord, for steamtug.
Edward H. Owen, for schooner.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. These are two causes heard together. The libel in the first above entitled cause is filed by the owners of the steamtug Clara Clarita, to recover a salvage compensation for services rendered to the schooner Clara, in extinguishing a fire on board of her. The libellants are a corporation, and the libel is filed on behalf of the libellants and of all others entitled. The substance of the libel is, that, on the evening of the 1st of August, 1870, a fire broke out on board of the ferry-boat James Watt, lying in a slip on the New Jersey shore, opposite the city of New York; that the steamtug proceeded to the ferry-boat, and, at the request of those in charge of the ferry-boat, endeavored, by the use of the hose and steam pumps of the steamtug, to extinguish the fire, but without success; that, when this was apparent to those in charge of the ferry-boat, they, fearing that the fire would spread to the adjoining wharves and to other vessels, requested the master of the steamtug to take the ferry-boat in tow, and drag her out of the slip, for the purpose of beaching her in some place where, even if she could not be saved herself, she would be prevented from causing damage and danger to others; that, in compliance with such request, and under the employment of those in charge of the ferry-boat, the master and crew of the steamtug made fast a hawser to the ferry-boat, and dragged her clear of the slip, and started with her on the way to Hoboken flats, about a quarter of a mile distant; that, when she started, the flames were chiefly confined to the hold of the ferry-boat, and there was every reason to believe that she could be successfully towed to and beached upon the flats; that, as the wind and tide were setting up the river, the steamtug made all haste, with their aid, towards the nearest place of safety, but the flames suddenly broke out in all parts of the ferry-boat, and the hawser by which she was being towed was burned off, and she swung adrift; that she was then taken in tow again by another hawser, but that also was soon burned away, and she drifted off a second time, and in spite of all efforts that could be used to prevent it, and, without any fault or negligence on the part of the master and crew of the steamtug, drifted, under the impulse of the wind and tide, against and upon the schooner, which was lying at anchor; that another hawser was made fast to the ferry-boat, as soon as it could be done, and she was finally dragged clear of the schooner, but not before the schooner had caught fire from the burning ferry-boat; that the ferry-boat, soon afterwards, sank in the river; that, after that, the master and crew of the steamtug immediately turned their attention to the schooner, which was then burning fiercely from her foremast forward to and including her bowsprit and all her head sails; that the steamtug was brought alongside of her, and made fast to her, and two or more streams of water, through hose, were brought to bear on the flames; and that, by the use of the apparatus of the steam tug, after three or four hours of exertion on the part of her master and crew, during which they were exposed to great danger and hardship, the flames were subdued, and the schooner was preserved from entire destruction, and restored, with comparatively trifling damage, to her master and owners. For this service, the libellants claim salvage, alleging the value of the schooner to have been $20,000.

The answer to this libel avers, that it was gross carelessness and negligence on the part of the steamtug to attempt to tow the burning ferry-boat, with the wind and tide as they were, by a hempen hawser, which was liable at any moment to be destroyed, as it was, in fact, by the flames which enveloped the boat; that the libellants had the sole care and management of the burning boat; that, when they undertook and agreed to haul her from her slip around upon the Hoboken flats, and commenced that service, no person remained on board of her, who had been previously connected with her, or who had any power or control over her; that she was, in fact, under the exclusive direction and control of the libellants; that, inasmuch as the libellants voluntarily undertook to tow the burning ferry-boat, they are responsible for all the consequences, and are liable to the claimants for causing her to get foul of and to set on fire the schooner, which was then lawfully and properly lying at anchor in the river; that the libellants are not entitled to salvage for the services rendered; that the schooner would not have been set on fire by the burning ferry-boat, if the libellants had not voluntarily agreed and attempted to tow the burning boat, or if, in doing that, they had exercised proper care; that the schooner was run into and set on fire by the negligence of those in charge of the steamtug, and from no fault or neglect of duty on the part of the schooner; and that the schooner was not set on fire by any accident, but by the sole and culpable fault of those navigating and having charge of the steamtug in towing the burning ferry-boat.

The libel in the second above entitled cause is brought by the owners of the schooner against the steamtug, to recover for the damages caused by the fire. The libel alleges, that, while the schooner was lying at anchor, having the proper light, a white light in the starboard fore rigging, about twenty feet above the deck, she was carelessly and wrongfully set on fire by the burning ferry-boat, which the steamtug had been, and was, attempting to tow; that the night was clear, and the tide flood; that the steamtug, when first discovered by those on board of the schooner, was in dangerous proximity to the schooner, although there was abundant sea room on all sides, and was wrongfully attempting to take the burning boat across the schooner's bows; that the burning boat, over which the steamtug had the exclusive and entire control, was wrongfully towed against, and permitted to strike, the bows of the schooner, where she hung for some time, setting fire to her; and that such collision and fire were caused solely through the fault and negligence of those navigating the steamtug, in that she had no competent look-out, properly stationed, and faithfully attending to his duties, and was negligently navigated, in that she attempted to cross the schooner's bows, when in such close proximity to her as to endanger her safety, and not through any fault on the part of those in charge of the schooner.

The answer of the owners of the steamtug sets up the same matters, in substance, that are contained in the libel filed by them against the schooner, with the variation, that it avers, that, after the hawser to the ferry-boat had been twice burned away, it was again made fast, but the fastening pulled out or gave way, and afterwards, and before it could be again made fast, the ferry-boat drifted against the schooner. It also alleges, that, when the ferry-boat broke loose the last time, the schooner was a considerable distance away from her; that the steamtug was proceeding with all speed, and with every precaution, in a direction away from where the schooner was lying, and diagonally up and across the river, towards the New Jersey shore; that, shortly before or immediately after the ferry-boat got afoul of the schooner, the officers and crew of the schooner deserted her; that the movements of the burning boat were distinctly visible for a great distance; that, if the officers and crew of the schooner had exercised even ordinary precaution, skill or diligence in the management of their vessel, they had ample and sufficient warning of the approaching danger to have easily avoided it; that, if the steamtug was not discovered by those on board of the schooner, until she was in dangerous proximity, it was because of the negligence and want of care and attention on the part of those in charge of the schooner; that the collision or injury was not caused by any negligence on the part of those in charge of the steamtug; and that it was, as far as they were concerned, the result of inevitable accident, the effect of which might, however, have been avoided by proper care on the part of those in charge of the schooner.

The schooner was, on the evidence, at anchor in a proper place, and exhibited the light required by article 7 of the rules concerning lights in the act of April 29, 1864 (13 Stat. 59). Under these circumstances of helplessness on the part of the schooner, the burden is upon the steamtug to show that the steamtug was without fault, or that the schooner was in fault, or that the disaster was the result of inevitable accident. Amoskeag Manuf'g Co. v. The John Adams [Case No. 338]. This duty is incumbent on the steamtug in this case, because she was in the exclusive charge of her own master and crew, and was engaged, on the employment of the ferry-boat, in towing that vessel, which had no master or crew on board. The steamtug was, therefore, responsible for the proper navigation of both herself and the ferry-boat; and those who have suffered damage through any fault of the persons in charge of the steamtug are entitled to look to her for recompense. Sturgis v. Boyer, 24 How. [65 U. S.] 110, 122. Such would have been the rule if the ferry-boat had been under tow, under like circumstances, without being on fire; and the fact that she was on fire when taken in tow cannot alter the rule, as between the schooner and the steamtug, in regard to the burden of proof.

It is contended, on the part of the schooner, that the steamtug, knowing the burning condition of the ferryboat, anticipating that the flames, which were as yet confined to the hold, would ultimately burst forth, because an unsuccessful attempt had been made to reach, with water, the seat of the fire, having in view the object of protecting the wharf, and sheds and buildings and vessels adjacent, from being burned, when the flames should so burst forth, voluntarily, and without any legal compulsion or duty, undertook to tow the ferry-boat, for hire, to a place of safety, the owners of the steamtug having no proprietary interest in the ferry-boat, or in any of the property supposed to be in danger of taking fire; that the steamtug, however properly fitted to tow a ferry-boat that was not on fire, was not furnished with the necessary appliances to tow a burning vessel, so that the work could be done with safety to other vessels; that the fact, that a hempen hawser would be liable to burn off, if, as was anticipated, when the towing was commenced, the flames should burst out from the hold, and that, as a consequence, the ferry-boat would drift with the wind and tide, the direction and force of which were seen and known, and without control, no one being on board of her, and would be liable to come into contact with vessels at anchor, and set them on fire, was obvious, and should have induced either the towing by a chain or the refraining altogether from the towing; and that, however properly, in the actual predicament, the steamtug may have managed the navigation of the ferry-boat, after once getting her clear of the slip, the case is not one of inevitable accident, or absence of fault on the part of the steamtug, because of the original gross negligence in taking the ferry-boat in tow at all, under the circumstances, with a hempen hawser.

It is impossible to resist the force of these considerations. It was negligence and carelessness on the part of the steamtug, to undertake to tow the burning boat with a hempen hawser; and the fact that the anticipated bursting forth of the flames occurred, and burned off the hawser twice, at least, so that the burning boat drifted against, and set fire to, the schooner, instead of remaining in the slip, and setting fire to something other than the schooner, when the flames burst forth, is not, in the eye of the law, a case of inevitable accident. The Juliet Erskine, 6 Notes of Cas. 633.

The view urged on the part of the steamtug is, that negligence is not predicable of the act of towing the ferry-boat out of the slip, with the ordinary appliances with which the steamtug was furnished, it having been necessary so to do, to prevent the spread of the fire; that any individual may do what is necessary to prevent the spread of a fire, even to the pulling down of buildings, without being responsible, in trespass or otherwise; that such act is, in contemplation of law, one done for the commonwealth, and is, as a ground of exemption from damages, of the same effect as a loss happening by a tempest or other irresistible force; and that the act of towing, being justifiable, carries with it the right to exemption from liability for contingent and unavoidable damage done to other vessels, in the course of the towing.

Without calling in question the well-settled principles, that, at common law, any person, in case of actual necessity, to prevent the spreading of a fire, may prostrate a building in a block or street, without being responsible in trespass or otherwise, that the sufferer, in such case, has no legal redress for the injury, and that, in case of a danger happening by tempest, a passenger in a vessel may, if necessary to save the lives of the passengers, throw overboard the goods of another, without being liable in trespass to their owner, I do not think the present case is brought within these principles. It cannot be held that it was necessary to set this schooner on fire in order to prevent the apprehended spread of the fire if the ferry-boat should be left to burn in the slip, in the sense in which the word "necessity" is understood in the principle of law referred to. The necessity must be a direct one, an obvious one, a necessarily resulting one. In the case of the building, or of the goods in the vessel, the necessity for the sacrifice, as well as the act of sacrifice, must both of them be direct, in reference to the thing sacrificed. There must be no fault, in either substituting a fancied necessity for a real necessity, or in negligently doing what is done, so that the existence of necessity comes to rest only on the fact of sacrifice, when the sacrifice would not have occurred but for the negligence.

In the present case, it was entirely plain, before the towing commenced, that the ordinary hempen hawser would be likely to burn off if the flames should burst out, and it was anticipated that they would burst out. It is not contended, on the part of the steamtug, that, if the hawsers had not successively burned off, she would not have been able to haul the ferry-boat in safety out of the way of the schooner. It must, therefore, be held to have been negligence on the part of the steamtug to tow the ferry-boat at all with a hempen hawser, and the damage done to the schooner cannot be regarded as unavoidable, however properly the steamtug may have managed the navigation after once getting the ferry-boat out into the river. The risk of the burning of the hawsers must be borne by the steamtug and not by the schooner. The steamtug was, therefore, in fault, in allowing the ferry-boat to collide with the schooner and set her on fire, such collision being shown to have been directly the result of towing the burning boat with a hempen hawser.

The next inquiry is, as to whether the schooner was in fault. The only fault alleged against her is, that she had no watch on deck at the time the burning ferry-boat approached her. It is claimed on the part of the steamtug, that, if there had been a competent watch on the deck of the schooner, the approach of, and the danger of collision with, the ferry-boat, would have been observed from the schooner in time for her anchor-chain to have been sheered or slipped, so as to have allowed the ferry-boat to pass by without striking or setting fire to the schooner. The proof in this case is, that the officers and crew of the schooner were on board of her, but were asleep in the cabin, with the exception of one man, who was on deck, but had not been set as a watch, and was probably asleep, and that they were aroused by a shout from the steamtug, and came on deck just before the ferry-boat struck the schooner; and that it is not customary for vessels of the size and character of this schooner to have an anchor-watch on deck in the locality where she was anchored, unless in case of a fog, or of bad weather. There was no fog on this occasion, and the night was clear and fine, the wind moderate, and the tide flood. Nor is it established on the part of the steamtug (and the burden of proof is on her, in this respect), that anything which the schooner could have done, in the way of sheering or slipping her chain, after she could or ought to have reasonably apprehended danger from the ferry-boat, if she had had an anchor-watch, or even if her crew had all of them been on deck, would have avoided the collision and its consequences. Under these circumstances, the schooner was not at all in fault. I do not intend, however, to imply that there is any rule of law in the admiralty which required this schooner to keep an anchor-watch on the night in question.

As to the claim for salvage, the owners of the steamtug are not entitled to its allowance. The steamtug having, through her own fault, set the schooner on fire, has no claim for salvage for putting out such fire, the service being one rendered for her own benefit, one in which she herself was the most deeply interested, and one which only had the effect to reduce the amount of her liability for damages to the owners of the schooner. The Iola [Case No. 12,279]; Cargo ex Capella, L. R. 1 Adm. & Ecc. 356.

The libel against the schooner must be dismissed, with costs. In the case against the steamtug, there must be a decree for the libellants, with costs, with a reference to a commissioner to ascertain the damages sustained by them.

[NOTE. The Harbor Protection Company appealed from the decree herein to the circuit court, where the same was affirmed. Case No. 2,789, next following.

[From the affirmance, the claimant of the tug appealed to the supreme court, which affirmed the circuit court decree, Mr. Justice Clifford, who delivered the opinion, speaking for the court, holding that the ferry-boat was not liable, as at the time of the injury complained of she was in charge of, and under the control of, the tug, the officers and crew of which were the agents of her owners, and not the agents of the ferry-boat, by reason of the contract for the service having been made with the master of the tug; that the evidence failed to disclose that the injury to the schooner was the result of inevitable accident; that, as the schooner was anchored in a proper place, and had her signal light properly displayed, the burden of proof was on the tug to show that the disaster was caused by the fault of the schooner, or occurred through inevitable accident; and that the evidence failed to show that the schooner did not have a proper anchor-watch, or that the absence of such a watch in any wise contributed to the casualty. The Clarita and The Clara, 23 Wall. (90 U. S.) 1.]

Case No. 2,789.

The CLARA.

[5 Ben. 376, note.][1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Aug., 1873.[2]

[For a statement of the facts of this case, see Case No. 2,788, next preceding.]

WOODRUFF, Circuit Judge. I concur in the conclusion of the district judge in these cases, and for substantially the same reasons assigned in his opinion. Assuming that the owners of the ferry-boat exercised a lawful right to remove their boat from the slip in which it lay (and, no doubt, they had such right, notwithstanding she was on fire, and whether her remaining in the slip did or did not involve danger to other property), whoever attempted her removal was bound to use precautions to prevent her from being carried by wind and tide against other vessels lying at anchor in the harbor, corresponding to the danger and consequences of such a result. The danger was extraordinary, and more than usual precautions to secure and retain control of the burning mass were, therefore, required by ordinary prudence. Reasonable care, in such circumstances, is not to be determined by the ordinary usages of tugs engaged in towing when no such circumstances of peril to others exist. Proofs, therefore, of the customary practice of tugs engaged in towing vessels in and about the harbor, to use hempen hawsers only, does not furnish a satisfactory test of the caution and care, due from a tugboat professedly engaged in the business of rescuing vessels from conditions of extraordinary peril, including fire on board. The testimony taken in this court does not, I think, exonerate the tug. It is so obvious as hardly to require proof, that a chain attached to the burning boat would have prevented the loss of control over her. The use of such a chain is not proved impracticable, and it is equally obvious, I think, that it was not only practicable but easy. No heavy anchor chain, extending from one boat to the other, which the hands of the boat could not manage, was required. All that was essential was, that the attachment to the burning boat, extending a few feet therefrom, should be incombustible; for the rest, a rope or hempen hawser was sufficient. The parties expected the flames to spread through and over the burning boat. It was this expectation which induced the attempt to remove her from the slip. In view of this, it was negligence to remove her under no other control than a rope, which, presumptively, would be burned off so soon as the expected spread of the fire should reach it. In this respect, it was not like a shifting of the location of the boat, with a view to the extinguishment of the fire before it should thus extend. Before any hawser was attached for the purpose of drawing her from the slip, chains were to be found, both on the ferry-boat and on the tug, and it is not to be doubted, that a chain, of suitable length to form a connection of the hawser to the burning boat, might readily have been elsewhere procured. In regard to the alleged neglect of the schooner in not keeping an anchor watch, and as to the allowance of damages by the commissioner, it is sufficient to say, that I concur in the opinion of the district judge, and in his overruling the exceptions to the report of the commissioner. The decree in each case must be entered in conformity with the decision below, dismissing the libel for salvage in the first entitled cause, and awarding the damages found in favor of the libellants in the second, with costs in each case.

[1] [Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

[2] [Affirming decree of the district court in Case No. 2,788. Decree of the circuit court affirmed by supreme court in The Clarita and The Clara, 23 Wall. (90 U. S.) 1.]

[NOTE. This decision was affirmed by the supreme court in The Clarita and The Clara, 23 Wall. (90 U. S.) 1. See Case No. 2,788, note.]

Case No. 2,790.

CLARA v. EWELL.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 208.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. June Term, 1820.

EVIDENCE—PROOF OF AGE—MEMORANDUM BY DECEASED PERSON.

An old entry in a memorandum-book of a deceased person, stating the ages of the several members of the writer's family, may be given in evidence to prove the age of a witness.

To prove the age of Mrs. Storer, a witness in this cause, the defendant [Thomas Ewell] offered a memorandum-book in the handwriting of the Rev. Lee Massy, deceased, dated April 19th, 1777, in which he stated the names and ages of his family, who were then inoculated for the small-pox, and the different modes of treatment and different doses of medicine for their respective ages. Mrs. Storer was then one of his family, and her name was placed in the class of those between six and ten years old.

Mr. Jones, for plaintiff, objected to the competency of the evidence.

But THE COURT (nem. con.) overruled the objection, and permitted the memorandum to be read to the jury.

CLARA CLARITA, The. See Cases Nos. 2,787-2,789.

Case No. 2,791.

The CLARA DAVIDSON.

[6 Wkly. Notes Cas. 356.]

District Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. Jan. 10, 1879.

ADMIRALTY PRACTICE—DECREE AGAINST DECEASED STIPULATOR.

A decree rendered against a stipulator after his death, although in ignorance of that fact, is void, and will be set aside on motion.

In admiralty. McCoy and others, owners of the schooner Eliza Ann, filed a libel for the collision against the schooner Clara Davidson. The master of the latter vessel appeared and made claim with one Edwards as stipulator. The suit proceeded and a decree for half damages was made against the claimant and stipulator, in 1876. Edwards had died before the decree, but the fact was unknown to libellant, had never been suggested of record, and no substitution was made.

E. B. Watson, for administrator, moved to vacate the decree.

J. W. Carleton, contra.

THE COURT (CADWALADER, District Judge), holding the decree against the surety void by reason of his previous death, ordered it vacated.

Case No. 2,792.

The CLARA M. PORTER.

[3 Ware, 39;[1] 18 Law Rep. 678.]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. Jan., 1856.

COLLISION—SAIL AND SAIL—WIND FREE AND CLOSE-HAULED.

1. When a vessel comes down with the wind free in an open sea, to speak another vessel which is close hauled on the starboard tack, the former has the entire duty of so manoeuvring as to avoid a collision, and it is the duty as well as the right of the latter, in case a collision is apprehended, to keep her course.

2. If a vessel with the wind free attempts, without necessity, to cross the bows of a vessel close-hauled, and a collision takes place, the former vessel will be held prima facie to be in fault.

In admiralty.

R. H. Dana, Jr., for libelants.

Bartlett and Thaxter, for claimants.

WARE, District Judge (holding the court for SPRAGUE, District Judge). The schooner Jenny Lind, a vessel of about eighty tons burthen, duly licensed for carrying on the codfishery, sailed from Southport, in Maine, on the 4th of April, fitted out for a fishing voyage on the Bank fisheries. On the 5th of May, near Sable island, while pursuing the objects of her voyage, and having on board two hundred and seventy quintals of fish, being then under sail, close hauled to the wind on her starboard tack, she saw a sail ahead at the distance of one-and-a-half or two miles, which proved to be the Clara M. Porter. The Jenny Lind was sailing on a north-westerly course, with a six knot breeze from the northeast, and the vessel seen was sailing nearly, if not precisely, in an opposite direction on her larboard tack. She was seen from the Jenny Lind over her weather-bow, and consequently the line on which she was sailing was to the windward. The vessels being under sail, on lines nearly, if not exactly, parallel, the Clara M. Porter would have passed to the windward. But soon after she was seen, she changed her course, put off before the wind, and came down with the intention of crossing the line of the Jenny Lind and speaking her at the leeward. From some miscalculation or mismanagement in one or the other vessel, or in both, instead of passing the Jenny Lind, as she intended, she came directly in collision with her, striking her amidships, head on, and damaged her so severely, that within half or three-quarters of an hour she sunk. Her crew saved themselves by escaping on board the Clara M. Porter. The Jenny Lind being close-hauled on her starboard tack, had, by the well-known law of the sea, the right of way. She had not only a right to hold on her course, but ordinarily, when a vessel, thus close-hauled on this tack, sees another sail approaching, with the wind free, and there is a possible danger of collision, it is her duty to hold her course, and it belongs to the vessel having the wind free to keep clear of her. In this case, the Clara M. Porter, having the entire command of her motions, and with ample sea room, if there had been danger of meeting, was bound to give way and avoid it. The collision would have been avoided if she had held her course, which would have carried her to the windward. If she wished to speak the Jenny Lind, she should have changed her course only so far as to have passed her within speaking distance at the windward, and then have crossed her track astern, if that was her object. The danger of collision would then have been avoided. Instead of this, she attempted the experiment of crossing her bows. It requires but little nautical experience to inform us that this is a hazardous manoeuvre, which ought not, in ordinary cases, to be attempted. If it is, without something like a necessity requiring it, and a collision is the consequence, the party making the attempt must be held prima facie in fault. In this case, with a fair and moderate breeze, and an open sea, no such necessity could exist.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

[1] [Reported by George F. Emery, Esq.]

It is admitted in the argument for the respondent, that the Jenny Lind had a right to hold her course, and it is argued that if she had done so, the Clara M. Porter would have crossed her line ahead safely and passed to her lee; but it is contended that the Jenny Lind, instead of holding on her course, first bore away before the wind and then luffed back into her first course, and that the collision is to be ascribed to this cause; that she was in fault, first, by deviating and bearing away, and again, after doing this, in luffing back. The argument proceeds on the ground that the Jenny Lind was bound to hold her course. This is the important and turning point in the case. If the Jenny Lind did what was imputed to her, it being her duty to hold her course, it is contended that the collision must be ascribed to her fault, and if the counsel is correct, even admitting that the Clara M. Porter was in fault in attempting the hazardous experiment of crossing the bows of the Jenny Lind, the collision must be considered as having been occasioned in part by faults on both sides. If so, then according to the recent decision of the supreme court in the case of The Catharine v. Dickinson, 17 How. [58 U. S.] 170, the loss is to be equally divided between the two vessels. Such, also, is the rule of the English admiralty. The Monarch, 1 W. Rob. Adm. 26; Hay v. Le Neve, 2 Shaw, 395.

The evidence on this point is conflicting. The two principal witnesses for the libelants are Silas Orne, the master, and Baker Orne, his brother, and the mate, both part owners of the Jenny Lind and parties to the suit, and admissible as witnesses in such cases only from necessity. But both of them were on deck, Baker having the helm, and both in situations in which they must have known whether their vessel was put off before the wind or not; and they both swear positively and directly that she was not; that she had, for a considerable time before the Porter was in sight, been on that course, and that it was at no time changed. The captain states that he several times hailed the Porter, and this is confirmed by Captain Woodbury, to put her wheel down and luff, but though she seemed to change her wheel back and forth, no change was made in her course. Most of the crew of the Jenny Lind, just before the collision, were below at dinner, and on hearing the captain hail they hurried on deck. Their statements on this point are, consequently, not so clear nor so much to be relied on, but as far as they go, they fully confirm the testimony of the master and mate. On the other hand, Captain Woodbury, of the Clara M. Porter, says, that when he was coming down before the wind, at twice hailing distance, the Jenny Lind appeared to put off, and fearing a collision, he put his wheel down; that he heard the hail from the Jenny Lind to put his wheel down, but that it was then hard down, and that the Jenny Lind, after bearing away, appeared to him to come to. Stewart, an experienced seaman on the Porter, says, that he saw the Jenny Lind on the wind, and that if she had kept her course, the Porter would have passed ahead of her, or she would have come into us; but that she kept off, and then he feared a collision. Foster, who was at the helm of the Clara M. Porter, says, that after they approached the Jenny Lind, coming down before the wind, she put off more free; that he intended to cross her bows, and come under her lee. These witnesses confirm the testimony of Captain Woodbury, that the Jenny Lind, as they approached her, put off more before the wind, but none of them say, that after she put off she again luffed back into the wind. Now, if the Jenny Lind put off more before the wind, and the Clara M. Porter was also before the wind, the latter vessel, if she came in collision, must have struck the Jenny Lind obliquely. But she, in fact, struck her head on, perpendicularly. The only way by which the manner of the collision can be explained, if the Jenny Lind went off before the wind, is, by supposing that she came back again as stated by Captain Woodbury. But there is, it appears to me, an intrinsic improbability in this supposition. If it was done by the Jenny Lind shortly before the meeting, as it was, if at all, it would only make the collision more dangerous, by converting an oblique into a perpendicular collision. Besides, if I have the testimony of the witnesses correctly, no one of them confirms Captain Woodbury in this particular.

The testimony of the two Ornes is fairly open to the observations made upon it, as coming from deeply interested witnesses. But similar remarks will apply with about the same force to Captain Woodbury, who feels as strong an interest in justifying himself to his owners; and will also apply with diminished force to all testimony on one side and the other. The crews of each vessel probably had a natural inclination to find their own vessel clear of blame.

There then remains the testimony of the witnesses from the Tamerlane. At the time of the collision, and for some time before, the Tamerlane was from half a mile to a mile astern of the Jenny Lind, the latter being a point or a point and a half on her starboard bow, and sailing on the same course. Her crew were all, or nearly all, on deck, and the depositions of three of them have been taken by the libellants. They state that they were on deck observing the two vessels in plain sight, with a full opportunity of noticing their movements. They were so situated, sailing nearly on the same line with the Jenny Lind and almost directly astern, that if she had changed her course it could clearly be seen from their vessel. They all concur in saying that there was no change in her course, and fully confirm the testimony of her crew. The Tamerlane was from the same port with the Jenny Lind; the masters and crews of the two vessels neighbors and acquaintances; and the counsel for the respondents has, with some reason, argued, that in a controversy between the owners of the Jenny Lind and strangers, their sympathies would naturally be with their townsmen and friends. Some deduction, it is supposed, ought to be made from their testimony on this account. I do not mean to deny that this circumstance might be entitled to some consideration, if their testimony consisted of minute facts, each of minor importance in itself, and deriving their importance from the combined effects of the whole, and from the coloring given to the facts. But their testimony is to a single fact, and one, which from their situation, they could observe and know, if not with absolute certainty, at least with a pretty near approximation to it. To this fact their testimony is direct and precise. We are, then, reduced to the necessity of supposing that it is, if not certainly true, at least probably so, or of imputing wilful prevarication to the witnesses. An attempt is made by the claimants to discredit the two principal witnesses for the Jenny Lind, her master and mate, by showing that they have, at different times, made declarations and admissions inconsistent with their testimony given in court. But this evidence does not appear to me materially to impair their credit, sustained as their testimony is by other witnesses.

My opinion, on the whole proof of the case, is, that the collision was occasioned by the fault of the Clara M. Porter, and the decree must be against her. The case will go to a commissioner to ascertain the amount of the damage.

Case No. 2,793.

CLARE v. NATIONAL CITY BANK.

[14 Blatchf. 445.][1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. May 2, 1878.

COSTS AFTER REMOVAL.

Items of costs which would have been taxable in favor of a party in a state court, on a judgment for him, are not taxable in his favor, on a judgment for him in this court, after the removal of the cause into this court, unless such items are taxable under sections 823 and 824 of the Revised Statutes.

[Followed in Chadbourne v. German-American Ins. Co., 31 Fed. 625. Cited in Henning v. W. U. Tel. Co., 40 Fed. 659. Cited, but not followed, in Cleaver v. Traders' Ins. Co., Id. 864.]

[At law. Action by William K. Clare against the National City Bank.]

James S. Stearns, for plaintiff.

William H. Arnoux, for defendant.

CHOATE, District Judge. This is an appeal from the clerk's taxation of costs. The suit is an action at law originally brought in a state court. After three trials in the state court, in two of which the plaintiff had a verdict, which, upon appeal, was set aside, and the judgment reversed, with costs to the defendant, to abide the event, the cause was removed into this court by the plaintiff, and the defendant now has a verdict and a judgment. The clerk, in taxing the costs, has disallowed the fees taxable by the New York Code, to the defendant's attorney, as fees for proceedings before and after the granting of a new trial, term fees, trial fees, argument fees, fees for making and serving a case, &c., which, if the case had proceeded to the same result in the state court, would have been taxable against the plaintiff, for the proceedings prior to the removal of the cause, amounting, in all, to $435. From the disallowance of these items the defendant appeals.

The clerk is right in his taxation. In this court, the amount of costs to be allowed to attorneys is governed by sections 823 and 824 of the Revised Statutes, which do not give to the attorney any of the fees now in question. In general, there is no vested right to costs till judgment, and they are only recoverable as taxable by the law in force at the time of taxation. The acts authorizing the removal of causes to this court provide that the cause removed shall proceed in the same manner as if originally commenced here, and there is nothing in those acts which lends support to the defendant's claim for these costs.

[1] [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

CLAREMONT BANK (KITTREDGE v.). See Cases Nos. 7,858 and 7,859.

CLARENCE, The (PERSEE v.). See Case No. 11,016.

CLARENDON (LEWIS v.). See Case No. 8,320.

Case No. 2,794.

The CLARION.

[Cited in Cartwell v. The John Taylor, Case No. 2,482. Nowhere reported; opinion not now accessible.]

Case No. 2,795.

The CLARION.

[Brown, Adm. 74.] [1]

District Court, N. D. Ohio. March, 1859.

JURISDICTION—HAULING OFF STRANDED VESSEL.

Admiralty has jurisdiction of a suit to recover for services of a tug in hauling off a vessel aground, though the same do not amount to a salvage service.

In admiralty. Exceptions to libel for services rendered by libellants' tug John Owen to the brig Clarion, aground upon St. Clair flats, in towing her off the flats and into Detroit river, in October, 1857.

Willey & Carey, for libellants.
Basset & Kent, for claimant.

WILLSON, District Judge. Exceptions were filed to the libel in this case upon the ground that the services set forth were not of a maritime character, and that this court has no jurisdiction. I am satisfied, however, they cannot be sustained. The services of a steam tug, in hauling off a sailing vessel aground, are of a very meritorious description; if the vessel were aground upon a lee shore, exposed to the open lake, they might amount to a salvage service. In any event, they could not be less meritorious than towage, and this court has already held, in the case of The Acadia [Case No. 24], that a lien exists for towage. I think the contract in this case is a maritime one, within the definition laid down in De Lovio v. Boit [Id. 3,776].

Exceptions overruled.

[1] [Reported by Hon. Henry B. Brown, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

CLARISSA ANN, The (GRIGG v.). See Case No. 5,826.

CLARITA, The CLARA. See Cases Nos. 2,787–2,789.

Case No. 2,795a.

Case of CLARK.

[Cited in Re Moore, Case No. 9,751. Nowhere reported; opinion not now accessible.]

Case No. 2,796.

Ex parte CLARK.

In re HEALEY.

[1 Spr. 69.] [1]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. Nov., 1843.

MARITIME LIENS—DISBURSEMENTS ABROAD BY MASTER.

A master of a ship having expended his own money for necessary disbursements abroad, has a lien therefor, which may be enforced after the return of the ship to her home port.

[Cited in The Eliza Jane, Case No. 4,363; The Tangier, Id. 13,744.]

This was a petition filed under the United States bankrupt law, by W. F. Clark, master of the brig Maria Theresa, to be allowed $83 out of the estate of Mark Healey, a bankrupt and sole owner of the Maria Theresa, for which sum Clark claimed a lien on the vessel. It was agreed that the Maria Theresa sailed from the East Indies for Boston, in the autumn of 1842; that during the voyage, in January, 1843, she put into St. Helena and obtained provisions and supplies, for which the master drew a bill of exchange, for $83, on the owner. It was also agreed that the Maria Theresa did not arrive in Boston until sometime after the 14th of March, 1843, on which day Healey was declared a bankrupt, and his property assigned; and that, immediately upon her arrival, she was taken possession of by Healey's assignee. Meanwhile the draft drawn by Clark at St. Helena was presented, and upon non-acceptance immediately protested, and Clark was notified that he would be held as drawer. He thereupon filed this petition, praying that upon his delivering up the draft, the assignee should be directed to pay the amount in full.

Edwin Howland, for petitioner.
A. H. Fiske, assignee, pro se.

SPRAGUE, District Judge. The question is whether the master of a vessel, having expended his own money for necessary disbursements abroad, has a lien therefor on the vessel, after she has returned to her home port. It is the settled law in this country that he has no lien upon the vessel for his wages (Abb. Shipp. 147, note); but he has a lien on the freight not only for disbursements (The Packet [Case No. 10,654]), but also for his wages (Drinkwater v. The Spartan [Id. 4,085]; Ingersoll v. Van Bokkelin, 7 Cow. 670; Abb. Shipp. 139, 147, 377, note). Such lien extends to the cargo also, when it belongs to his employers. Id. 139, note; Hussey v. Christie, 13 Ves. 594 (Sumner's Ed.) note.

[1] [Reported by F. E. Parker, Esq., assisted by Charles Francis Adams, Jr., Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

No satisfactory reason has ever been given why a master should not have a lien upon the vessel, even for wages. It is often said that it is because he has a contract with the owners; but this is assigning no reason, for in nearly all the cases of acknowledged lien there is such personal contract. It is said, also, that having the custody and care of the vessel, and being bound to protect it against adverse claims, it would be dangerous to allow him to libel the vessel in a foreign port. But this is no argument against the existence of a lien, but only against a particular time or place of enforcing it; and it presents no show of reason why, after the return of the vessel to her home port, the actual residence of her owners, he should not be allowed to enforce a claim against the vessel, for his personal services in navigating and preserving her. But the rule against such lien for wages is too firmly established to be shaken. The master's claim for necessary disbursements for the vessel in a foreign country, stands upon stronger grounds than his claim for wages. Such expenditure has actually gone to the repairs, equipments, and necessaries for the ship, without which she could not have properly pursued her voyage, and been restored to her owners, and any other person making the same advances would have a maritime lien therefor. There is no rule or principle, either of law or justice, that deprives the master of such a lien, or precludes him from enforcing it, by process against the vessel in her home port, in the presence, and with the knowledge of her owners. The Packet [supra]; Hussey v. Christie, 13 Ves. 594, note; Gardner v. The New Jersey [Case No. 5,233]; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1241; Whitt. Liens, 73, 74; 3 Kent, Comm. 167. The claim of the master, therefore, in the present case, is sustained.

Decree for petitioner.

NOTE [from original report]. It is now held in England, that the master has no lien, on the ship, freight or cargo, in the home port, for necessary disbursements abroad, or for wages. Wilkins v. Carmichael, 1 Doug. 101; Hussey v. Christie, 9 East, 426; Smith v. Plummer, 1 Barn. & Ald. 575; Atkinson v. Cotesworth, 3 Barn. & C. 647; Richardson v. Campbell, 5 Barn. & Ald. 203, note; Gibson v. Ingo, 6 Hare, 112; The Johannes Christoph, 33 Eng. Law & Eq. 600; Bristowe v. Whitmore, 35 Law T. 173. In the United States, it is settled that he has such a lien on freight (and on cargo, when it belongs to the owners of the ship,) for his disbursements. See, in addition to the authorities cited in the text, Lane v. Penniman, 4 Mass. 91; Lewis v. Hancock, 11 Mass. 72; Goodridge v. Lord, 10 Mass. 483; Ingersoll v. Van Bokkelin, 7 Cow. 670, 5 Wend. 315; Richardson v. Whiting, 18 Pick. 530; Shaw v. Gookin, 7 N. H. 16; Hodgson v. Butts, 3 Cranch [7 U. S.] 140; Newhall v. Dunlap, 14 Me. 180; 3 Kent, Comm. 167. These cases have followed the earlier English decisions: Watkinson v. Bernadiston, 2 P. Wms. 367; Ex parte Cheesman, 2 Eden, 181; White v. Baring, 4 Esp. 22; Ex parte Halkett, 3 Ves. & B. 135, 2 Rose, 194, 229, and 19 Ves. 474; Pierson v. Robinson, 3 Swanst. 139, note. It is intimated in The Larch [Case No. 8,085], that the American cases do not necessarily decide that the master has a lien on the freight; but only an equitable right to have the freight applied to pay the expenses incurred in earning it, as in Green v. Briggs, 6 Hare, 395. But see the cases. As to the master's lien on the freight for wages, see Drinkwater v. The Spartan [supra]; The Packet [supra]; and also the remark in the opinion of Putnam, J. (Richardson v. Whiting, supra), that this lien had been enforced in the United States district court for Massachusetts, by Davis, J. Contra, Ingersoll v. Van Bokkelin, 5 Wend. 315, overruling, on this point, the same case in 7 Cow. 670. As to his lien on the ship, for disbursements, it is stated in The Larch [supra], that "it has never been decided in this country," that the lien exists. But see, in addition to the decision of the learned judge of the United States district court for Maine, overruled by The Larch, and the decision in the text, Gardner v. The New Jersey [supra]. Compare, also, The Packet, supra, and the remarks of Chancellor Kent thereon (Comm. 167), with The Orleans, 11 Pet. [36 U. S.] 182.

Case No. 2,797.

In re CLARK.

[2 Ben. 540.][1]

District Court, S. D. New York. Nov., 1868.

HABEAS CORPUS — EXAMINATION BEFORE COMMISSIONER — EVIDENCE — INDICTMENT IN ANOTHER DISTRICT.

1. Where, on writs of habeas corpus and certiorari to a United States commissioner, it appeared that the commissioner had issued a warrant to arrest the petitioner, on a charge of conspiring to defraud the United States, in the eastern district of Michigan, who had been arrested and brought before him, and demanded an examination, and on the examination the evidence consisted of an indictment found against him in the eastern district of Michigan, and proof that on that indictment the district court of that district had issued a warrant for his arrest, the indictment averring that the prisoner, with certain others named, did, at the city of Washington, conspire, combine, confederate, and agree together to defraud the United States, in a manner particularly set forth, and that one of the parties to said conspiracy, named Lee, at Detroit, in the eastern district of Michigan, in pursuance of said conspiracy, did do an act to effect the object of said conspiracy, said act being particularly set forth, and on such proof the commissioner committed the prisoner for trial in the eastern district of Michigan, and thereupon this habeas corpus was issued, and the discharge of the prisoner claimed, on the sole ground that the indictment produced did not aver that an offence against the United States had been committed in the eastern district of Michigan: Held, that the question whether the indictment sufficiently averred an offence committed in the eastern district of Michigan should not be prejudged on a proceeding like this.

[Cited in Re Buell, Case No. 2,102; U. S. v. Haskins, Id. 15,322.]

2. That on such a proceeding the indictment must be considered sufficient, unless it be so defective in its material averments that it would be the manifest duty of a court before which it was presented by a grand jury to decline to take action upon it.

[1] [Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

[Cited in Re Doig, 4 Fed. 195.]

3. That this indictment was not of that character.

4. Whether, in such a proceeding before a commissioner, such an indictment can be examined, and its sufficiency passed upon—quere.

[Cited in Re Alexander, Case No. 162.]

BENEDICT, District Judge. The prisoner, Beverly Clark, being detained in custody by the marshal of this district, has been brought before me by a writ of habeas corpus and by a writ of certiorari. The proceedings before Commissioner Osborn, which resulted in his committal, are also before me.

By these returns, it appears that in September last, a deputy marshal of the eastern district of Michigan procured a warrant from Commissioner Osborn, in this district, directing the marshal of this district to apprehend and bring the prisoner before him to answer to a charge of conspiring to defraud the United States in the eastern district of Michigan. The prisoner having been arrested on such warrant, was brought before the commissioner, and demanded an examination, which was had. Upon this examination, an indictment found against the prisoner by a grand jury in the eastern district of Michigan was put in evidence, together with proof that it had been filed in the district court of that district, and was still pending undetermined, and that upon it the court had issued to the marshal of that district a warrant directing the arrest of the prisoner. No other evidence was produced to the commissioner, and he thereupon committed the prisoner for trial in the eastern district of Michigan, by virtue of which commitment he is now held by the marshal of this district.

The sufficiency of these proceedings is now called in question, and I am asked to discharge the prisoner because, as it is claimed, the indictment produced before the commissioner does not aver that an offence against the United States has been committed in the eastern district of Michigan.

In disposing of the single issue which has been thus made, I notice at the outset that the question here is not whether proof before a commissioner of the fact that an indictment against the person before him has been found by a grand jury of the United States, in a court of the United States, and that such court has so far acted upon the indictment as to issue its warrant for the arrest of the person to answer to the charge, is not sufficient proof to require the commissioner to commit such person for trial in the district where the indictment was found. Nor is the question here whether the proceedings in the district court of Michigan would not have been sufficient to justify the detention by the marshal of this district, had that court seen fit to issue its bench warrant to that officer directly.

Here the proceeding seems to have been an original proceeding instituted in this district before Commissioner Osborn, in which the indictment itself was put in evidence, as showing sufficient cause for the committal of the prisoner for trial in Michigan.

The questions then are, whether, in such a mode of procedure, the commissioner is at liberty to examine the indictment, and pass upon the sufficiency of its averments, and if so, whether the averments of this indictment are sufficient to warrant the committal of the prisoner for trial in Michigan.

For the purposes of this case, I shall assume —although I do not intend so to decide— that when the method of procedure is such as that adopted in this case, the indictment, which is put in evidence before the commissioner, must be looked into, and accordingly I have examined the present indictment, and I find that it avers that the prisoner, with certain others named, did, at the city of Washington, conspire, combine, confederate, and agree together to defraud the United States, in the manner particularly set forth, and that Andrew T. Lee, one of the parties to said conspiracy, afterwards, at Detroit, in the eastern district of Michigan, in pursuance of and according to said conspiracy, combination, and agreement, had as aforesaid, did do an act to effect the object of said conspiracy, which act is also particularly set forth. It was here intended to set out the offence created by the act of March 2d, 1867 [14 Stat. 484]. which declares, "that if two or more persons either conspire to commit any offence against the laws of the United States, or to defraud the United States in any manner whatever, and one or more of said parties to said conspiracy shall do any act to effect the object thereof, the parties to said conspiracy shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor;" and were this indictment before me upon demurrer or plea to the jurisdiction, it might not perhaps be difficult to decide whether the averment in question did or did not amount in law to an averment of an offence committed in Michigan. But that question, as it seems to me, should not be prejudged upon a proceeding like the present. Upon such a proceeding, the indictment must be considered sufficient, unless it be so defective in the material averments that it would be the manifest duty of a court before which it was presented by the grand jury to decline to take action upon it. In the present case, the court in Michigan has felt bound to receive this indictment, and to issue a warrant upon it; and, to my mind, the averment in question is not so clearly an averment of an offence committed in Washington, instead of one committed in Michigan, as to justify the commissioner in refusing to commit the prisoner upon it, or to warrant his discharge before me. It raises a question which properly belongs to the court in which the indictment is pending.

My conclusion, therefore, is, that the prisoner must be remanded to the custody of the marshal.

Case No. 2,798.

In re CLARK et al.

[4 Ben. 88; 3 N. B. R. 491 (Quarto, 123); 3 N. B. R. 524 (Quarto, 130); 1 Am. Law T. Rep. Bankr. 189.] [1]

District Court, S. D. New York. Feb., 1870.

PARTNERSHIP—STATE COURT RECEIVER—CONFLICT OF JURISDICTION.

1. B. & C. were partners. C. began a suit in a state court for a dissolution of the partnership and a settlement of the accounts, claiming that on such settlement a large amount would be due to him, and in that suit he procured the appointment of receivers, who took possession of the partnership property. On that ground proceedings in bankruptcy were taken against the firm, and it was adjudged bankrupt. An assignee was appointed and an assignment executed. The assignee applied to the bankruptcy court for an order directing the marshal to take from the possession of the receivers the property of the bankrupts in their possession, enjoining the receivers and the bankrupts from interfering with the property, and enjoining C. from the further prosecution of the suit in the state court; and for general relief. Held, that the amount claimed by C. in the suit in the state court would be individual property of C., which, under the 14th and 36th sections of the bankruptcy act [14 Stat. 523], passed to the assignee in bankruptcy to be applied to the payment of his separate debts.

2. That, therefore, the assignee would be allowed to prosecute the suit in the state court in his own name; that C. must execute the proper papers to enable him to do so; that C. must be enjoined from further prosecuting the suit in the state court; and that the bankrupts must be enjoined from interfering with the property in the possession of the receivers.

3. That a decision on the other prayers of the petition be suspended.

4. After the making of the above order, the assignee applied to the state court for an order declaring that, as the interests of both parties had vested in the assignee, the suit had abated. Pending that application to the state court, he applied again to the bankruptcy court for an order to the marshal to take the property from the possession of the receivers and enjoin them from interfering with it, or, if it should refuse this order, that it would direct him to make such application in the state court. Held, that, as the jurisdiction of the state court over the subject matter of the suit and over the parties, when it was instituted, and its power to appoint a receiver were not questioned, this court had no power to grant the relief asked; and that it was not necessary to make the order directing the assignee to apply to the state court.

[Cited in Hewett v. Norton, Case No. 6,441.]

On the 19th of November, 1869, an action was commenced in the superior court of the city of New York, by the bankrupt [Abraham B.] Clark against the bankrupt [Abraham] Bininger. The complaint in that action, the truth of which was deposed to by the plaintiff therein, set forth, that a copartnership which had existed between the parties to the action since the 1st of June, 1861, in the business of the importation and sale of liquors, &c., was dissolved on the 19th of November, 1869; that the said parties then owned certain real estate, and a large and valuable stock of goods, and had a large amount of debts due them, and a valuable good will; that the copartnership suspended payment on the 4th of November, 1869, owing to sundry specified wrongful acts of the defendant; that its assets amounted to $500,000 or thereabouts, and its entire indebtedness did not exceed the sum of $200,000; that the defendant had, since such suspension, usurped the entire control and management of the business, to the exclusion of the plaintiff, and with a view to deprive him of his rights in the copartnership; that if the management and settlement of the business should be left to the defendant, the rights and interests of the plaintiff and of the creditors of the copartnership would be greatly jeoparded if not sacrificed; and that, on a final accounting between the parties to the action, a large sum would be found to be due to the plaintiff, after paying all just debts of the copartnership, over and above all advances or otherwise made by the defendant to the plaintiff or to the copartnership. The complainant demanded judgment, that the copartnership should be dissolved; that a receiver of the property, rights and good will of the copartnership should be appointed, with power to dispose of the same for the benefit of all parties entitled thereto; that the proceeds thereof, after the payment of all just debts of the copartnership and of the costs of the action, should be divided between the parties to the action, according to their respective rights; and that the defendant should be enjoined and restrained from interfering with the property, rights and good will of the copartnership. On the 19th of November, 1869, an order was made in said action appointing a receiver of the property and effects of said copartnership, who, on the same day, took possession, as such receiver, of certain goods, wares and merchandise, real estate, and other property of the said copartnership. Subsequently a co-receiver was appointed in the action, who entered into possession as such, with the original receiver, of the said property.

On the 11th of December, 1869, a petition in involuntary bankruptcy was filed in this court against Clark and Bininger, under which they were adjudged bankrupts. [See Case No. 1,420.] An assignee was appointed, and the usual assignment was made to him, and a warrant of seizure, according to Form No. 59, was issued to the marshal. The assignee now presented a petition to this court, setting forth that the said original receiver resisted the marshal in his endeavors to take possession of the copartnership estate of the bankrupts; that the marshal had never become exclusively possessed of said estate; that most of the joint creditors of the bankrupts had proved their debts in these proceedings; and that the said assignee had notified the receivers of his appointment, and had requested them to deliver to him the said property in their possession. The petition claimed that the right, title, and interest of the bankrupts in the property which was the subject of controversy in the state court, had ceased, by means of the proceedings aforesaid, and had become vested in the assignee; that all the interests, claims, and remedies of creditors of the bankrupts against the said property had also ceased and become vested in the assignee; and that the only remedy and resort of the bankrupts, or of their creditors, against the said property, was in this court.

[1] [Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission. 3 N. B. R. 491 (Quarto, 123), contains only a partial report.]

The prayer of the petition was (1), that this court would order the marshal to take from the possession of the receivers the joint estate and property of the bankrupts, now or heretofore in the possession of the receivers; (2), that this court would enjoin the receivers and the bankrupts from any further interfering with the said property, to the end that it might be brought within the jurisdiction of this court, so that this court might collect all the assets of the bankrupts and ascertain and liquidate the liens and other specific claims thereon, and adjust the various priorities and conflicting interests of all parties, and marshal and dispose of the different funds and assets, so as to secure the rights of all parties, and the due distribution of the assets among all the creditors, and that, thereupon, the proceedings on the petition might be further continued in this court, in order that any lien and claim of the receivers upon the property might be determined and provided for; (3), that the bankrupt Clark might be restrained and enjoined from further prosecuting his said action against the bankrupt Bininger, or applying for any order or decree therein, without the leave of this court; (4), that such further, or other, or different rule, or order, might be made as might be proper in the premises.

The receivers appeared and resisted the granting of the prayer of the petition, so far as it affected them. They claimed that their appointment was legal and valid; that their duty required them to hold and safely keep the said property; and that they had a lien upon the said property for their lawful fees and disbursements therein incurred. Clark also appeared in opposition to the application.

F. N. Bangs, for assignee.
R. A. Pryor and J. F. Morgan, for receivers.
M. Compton, for Clark.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. It is apparent, from the frame of the complaint in the suit in the state court, that the reason for bringing it was, that a large sum would, on a final accounting between Clark and Bininger, be found due to Clark, after paying the debts of the copartnership, over and above all advances or otherwise made by Bininger to Clark, or to the copartnership, and that the conduct of Bininger had been such towards Clark, and in the management of the business of the copartnership, before and after its suspension, that, if the management and settlement of such business were to be left to Bininger, the rights and interests of Clark and of the creditors of the copartnership would be put in peril. Hence the prayer for a receiver, for a judicial winding up of the the affairs of the copartnership, and for an injunction against Bininger. On the facts stated, and with a net surplus of assets amounting to $300,000, after paying the debts of the copartnership, it is apparent that a large individual property would remain, to go to Clark. By virtue of the 14th and 36th sections of the bankruptcy act, this individual property of Clark's passed to the assignee in bankruptcy, to be applied, if necessary, to the payment of his separate debts. By the 14th section it is specially provided, that all rights in equity of the bankrupt, and all his rights of action for property or estate, real or personal, and for any cause of action which he had against any person, arising from contract, with the like right, title, power, and authority to sue for and recover the same, as the bankrupt might or could have had, if no assignment had been made, shall, in virtue of the adjudication of bankuptcy and the appointment of his assignee, be at once vested in such assignee. Under this provision, all the rights and rights of action which Clark is seeking to enforce in the suit brought by him, have passed out of Clark and are vested in the assignee in bankruptcy. The 14th section also provides, that the assignee may sue for and recover such estate, and may prosecute and defend all suits at law or in equity, pending at the time of the adjudication of bankruptcy, in which the bankrupt is a party, in his own name, in the same manner, and with the like effect, as they might have been prosecuted or defended by such bankrupt. The 16th section provides, that if, at the time of the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy, an action is pending, in the name of the debtor, for the recovery of a debt or other thing, which might or ought to pass to the assignee by the assignment, the assignee shall, if he requires it, be admitted to prosecute the action in his own name, in like manner, and with like effect, as if it had been originally commenced by him. These provisions of the 14th and 16th sections include suits and actions pending in the state courts, and are addressed to the courts in which such suits or actions are pending, quite as much as to the federal courts. The 26th section provides, that the bankrupt shall, at all times, until his discharge, be subject to the order of the bankruptcy court, and shall, at the expense of the estate, execute all proper writings and instruments, and do and perform all acts required by the court touching the assigned property or estate, and to enable the assignee to demand, recover, and receive all the property and estate assigned, wherever situated, and that, for neglect or refusal to obey any order of the court, such bankrupt may be committed and punished as for a contempt of court.

As all the rights of action which Clark is seeking to enforce in the suit pending in the state court, are now vested in the assignee in bankruptcy, it is proper that such assignee should be allowed to prosecute such action in his own name, and that this court should require Clark to execute all such writings, and do all such acts, as will enable such assignee so to prosecute such action. To that end, an order will be entered, that Clark execute and deliver to the assignee the proper papers to enable the assignee to be admitted to prosecute such action in his own name, in the same manner, and with the like effect, as it might have been prosecuted by Clark, and that Clark himself refrain from further prosecuting said action, or applying for any order or decree therein, without the leave of this court. The bankrupts must be enjoined from interfering with the property of which the receivers have possession.

This relief, of turning over to the assignee the prosecution of the action brought by Clark in the state court, though not specifically prayed for in the petition, was asked for by the assignee, on the hearing on the petition, under the prayer for general relief, and as a corollary to the prayer for an injunction restraining Clark from further prosecuting such action. As it is quite probable that, if the assignee be substituted as plaintiff in the action, it may be desirable that the possession of the receivers should not be disturbed until such substitution shall take place, a decision on the other matters involved in the prayer of the petition is suspended for the present.

After the making, on the 17th of February, of the order above granted, the assignee applied to the state court for an order adjudging that, as the former interests of both of the parties to the action in that court in the property in controversy therein had become, by the bankruptcy act, vested in the assignee in bankruptcy, such action had abated for want of proper parties to prosecute or defend the same, and that such assignee was entitled to the property in controversy in the cause, subject to any lawful right or claim of the receivers, for the purpose of disposing of the same pursuant to the bankruptcy act, and directing a discontinuance of such action, and a dismissal of the complaint therein. The question of the granting of such order by the state court was still pending unheard, when the assignee renewed his application to this court for an order to the marshal to take the property in question from the possession of the receivers, and to enjoin the receivers from any further interfering therewith. This application was founded on the petition before presented, and on an affidavit made by the assignee on the 23d of February, in which he set forth that he was unwilling to make any further application to the state court, lest he might expose himself to censure and punishment from said court; that he believed that if this court had jurisdiction to take from the receivers the possession of the property in controversy, there was a great necessity for the exercise of such jurisdiction, and he prayed that it might be exercised; that the claims of the receivers for compensation and fees were extravagant, and far beyond what the law allowed; that while he did not apprehend that the state court would make any allowance beyond what the law authorized, yet he believed that the receivers would persist in their extravagant demands, and that, by reason of the appeals which are permissible in the state courts, a very great length of time must necessarily elapse, in case an attempt was made to adjust such fees in the state court; and that so long as the receivers were permitted to retain the property as security for a lien which did not exceed five per cent. of its actual value, sales were prevented, expenses were accruing, and waste was committed. The affidavit concluded with the prayer that if this court decided that it had no jurisdiction or power to take the property from the custody of the receivers, and put it into the custody of the assignee, to the end that, without prejudice to the lien and claim of the receivers, it might be converted into money, this court would direct the assignee to apply to the state court, so that he might be acting in that court upon the order and responsibility of this court, and might not seem voluntarily to have gone out of or waived any reliance upon the jurisdiction of this court.

F. N. Bangs, for assignee.
J. F. Morgan, for receivers.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. The petition of the assignee, on which this application is founded, and which makes the bankrupts and the receivers parties thereto, is not founded upon any allegation that the transfer of property effected by the proceedings in the state court, was void under the 35th or the 39th section of the bankruptcy act, nor does it pray that such transfer may be adjudged void and set aside. On the contrary, it sets forth, on its face, that prior to the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy, the action in the state court was brought, and one of the two receivers was appointed by that court, and such receiver had taken possession of the property in question. The property is still in his possession and in that of his co-receiver, and the application to this court is, that, under these circumstances, this court will summarily declare such property to have so been the property of the bankrupts at the time of the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy, and to have so passed to the assignee by the assignment in bankruptcy to him, as to warrant this court in directing the marshal to forcibly dispossess the receivers, and take the property and put it into the hands of the assignee. The jurisdiction of the state court over the subject-matter of the suit therein, and over the parties thereto, when it was instituted and the receiver was appointed, and its jurisdiction to appoint such receiver, are in no manner impeached or questioned. It is only claimed, that, by reason of subsequently transpiring events, this court shall decide that the state court ought to, and shall be made, by compulsion from this court, to give up possession of the property, without its being shown that such possession of the property by the state court can be properly adjudged by this court to be void or invalid, by reason of provisions of the bankruptcy act.

It would seem to be only necessary to state these propositions, to reach the conclusion that this court cannot grant the particular relief asked. The questions involved were considered by this court in the case of In re Vogel [Case No. 16,982]. When property is lawfully placed in the custody of a receiver by the court which appoints such receiver, it is in the custody, and under the protection and control, of such court, for the time being, and no other court has a right to interfere with such possession, unless it be some court which has a direct supervisory control over the court whose process has first taken possession, or some superior jurisdiction in the premises. Peck v. Jenness, 7 How. [48 U. S.] 612, 625; Williams v. Benedict, 8 How. [49 U. S.] 107, 112; Wiswall v. Sampson, 14 How. [55 U. S.] 52, 66; Peale v. Phipps, Id. 368, 374; Taylor v. Carryl, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 583, 594–597; Freeman v. Howe, 24 How. [65 U. S.] 450; Buck v. Colbath, 3 Wall. [70 U. S.] 334. In the present posture of this case, it does not appear that this court has such superior jurisdiction in the premises, or such supervisory control over the state court, in respect to the property in question, as to authorize it to take away from the state court the possession of such property, or to enjoin the receivers from further interfering with such property. This court will always be sedulous to enforce its just powers, but it will not demand from any other tribunal anything which it would not itself be willing to concede under like circumstances. In the case referred to, of In re Vogel, it compelled the restitution to an assignee in bankruptcy of property which had been taken away by process of a state court, from the custody of this court, and its decision was affirmed by the circuit court on review. The principle on which such restitution was enforced would authorize the state court, in the present case, to compel restitution to its receivers of such property as this court should take away, by force, from the custody of such state court, and this court might then retaliate, and the confusion and endless strife would ensue which are so forcibly characterized by the supreme court, in the opinion delivered in the case of Buck v. Colbath, before cited.

In respect to the application made at the conclusion of the assignee's affidavit, that this court will direct him to apply to the state court, so that he may be acting in that court on the order and responsibility of this court, and may not seem voluntarily to have gone out of, or waived any reliance upon, the jurisdiction of this court—inasmuch as he has asked and obtained from this court an order providing him with the means of being admitted to prosecute, in his own name, the action in the state court, and enjoining the bankrupt Clark from opposing his application to the state court in the premises, and giving him leave to apply to the state court for such order in the action as he should be advised to apply for, and inasmuch as he has applied to the state court for the granting of the order, before mentioned, discontinuing the action in that court, and dismissing the complaint therein, it seems hardly necessary that this court should direct him to apply to the state court.

The applications are, therefore, denied.

Case No. 2,799.

In re CLARK.

[5 Ben. 389;[1] 6 N. B. R. 197.]

District Court, S. D. New York. Nov. 16, 1871.

AUDITING ASSIGNEE'S ACCOUNT—SECOND MEETING.

1. At the second meeting of creditors, the assignee must present his accounts, in accordance with section 27 of the bankruptcy act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 529)]. Such accounts it is the duty of the register to audit, under section 4 of the act and general order No. 5. Creditors must be prepared then to object to such accounts.

2. The provision, in section 28, for the passing of the final accounts of the assignee, does not imply that accounts presented by him at the second meeting of creditors shall not be then audited by the register.

In bankruptcy.

[On certificate of I. T. Williams, Register:]

[2] [I, the undersigned register in charge of this case, do hereby certify that I was, on the thirty-first day of October last, served with a paper requesting me, among other things, to audit and pass certain accounts filed with me at an adjourned second meeting of creditors of said separate estate, held on the ninth day of October, eighteen hundred and seventy-one, and direct the payment of such of the outstanding claims as were not objected to. The said paper recites that the period of ten days had elapsed since the accounts were so filed, and that no creditor had objected to said accounts, nor to any of said outstanding claims, and that there had been filed with me consents of several creditors to the payment of said claims.

[1] [Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

[2] [From 6 N. B. R. 197.]

[And I further certify that the said second meeting was so as aforesaid held after several adjournments, and that but one of the creditors of said estate attended this second meeting, to wit, Mr. Mortimore Addoms; that the accounts aforesaid were filed on that day, and a dividend declared of ten per cent. upon the claims proved; that at the close of the meeting checks were drawn and countersigned for the payment of all said dividends; that the claims against the said assignee by his attorneys amounted to the sum of five thousand one hundred and eighty-nine dollars and nine cents; that believing the said assignee and his said attorneys all perfectly responsible for any overpayment that might be made, I determined to countersign checks for the payment of said claims of said attorneys upon receiving from them an affidavit that the services so charged for had in fact been rendered, and that they were fit and proper services, and that the sum charged therefor was reasonable and proper, and thereupon drafted such an affidavit for that purpose; that said attorneys refused to swear to the same, all of which proceedings will appear from the certified copy memorandum of said day and filed with the clerk of this court; that on the twelfth day of October aforesaid, I received a notification from said attorneys, addressed to the said assignee and myself, which is herewith submitted. Whereupon, on the same day, I wrote a note to the said assignee, in reply to which I received, on the fourteenth day of October aforesaid, a letter from the said assignee; also a letter from his said attorneys, both of which are herewith submitted. Unwilling to have any unfavorable consequences follow upon my omission to countersign checks for the payment of the said claims of said attorneys, I determined, as I deemed the said assignee as well as his attorneys perfectly responsible, to countersign the said checks in case the said assignee—with full knowledge of the fact that I believed the law to be such, that the said claims of said attorneys would be open to be objected to by the creditors at the final meeting in case they or any of them should elect so to object—desired me to do so. I thereupon, on the sixteenth of October aforesaid, wrote him a note, in reply to which I received on the seventeenth of October a letter, which is herewith submitted. That on the same day I received a paper from several of the creditors protesting against the said bill of said attorneys; and having received from the said attorneys a note in which they say, "Under your extraordinary ruling that even the register's own check is no protection to an assignee on a final accounting, we should not permit him to pay us any money even if you ordered him to do so," no further steps in that direction have yet been taken.

[And now, touching my duty to "audit and pass the said accounts prior to the final meeting of creditors, I have been desirous to do so if it could be legally done. The difficulties that present themselves to my mind are as follows: The fourth section provides that the register "shall audit and pass accounts of the assignee." Section twenty-eight provides that "preparatory to the final dividend the assignee shall submit his account to the court and file the same, and give notice to the creditors of such filing, and shall also give notice that he will apply for a settlement of his accounts and for a discharge from all liability as assignee, at a time to be specified in such notice; and at such time the court shall audit and pass the accounts of the assignee," &c. I find nothing in the act or general orders to modify or change this provision. It seems to be imperative as to time and manner. The creditors are relieved from objecting at any other time or under any other circumstances, and if so relieved, they cannot be bound to object at any prior time, or forever after hold their peace.

[The request to direct payment of such of the said outstanding claims as were not objected to, would seem to imply a duty on the part of the creditors to object at such second meeting or be precluded of all objection thereafter. But that meeting was called under the provisions of section twenty-seven, and no notice was given to creditors that the assignee would file his accounts and apply for a settlement of the same as required by section twenty-eight. It cannot possibly be said, therefore, even if the register have power to audit and pass the accounts at any save at a final meeting, that he has power to audit and pass them at a meeting at which no notice to that effect was given to creditors. The attempt therefore to bind the creditors thus without notice ought not to be urged upon the court. The assignee ought not to be heard to object that the court may not, at the final meeting, allow him for sums paid as counsel fees. This would be to impugn the honor and integrity of the court. The presumption at least is that the court, as well as all officers of the law, will do its duty.

[I have usually, in similar cases, attempted to protect the assignee as well as the fund, when paying claims against the estate, by taking an affidavit of the justness of the claim before countersigning the checks. This would perhaps throw the burden of proof upon the creditor objecting at the final meeting, and require of him something that would be in the nature of a surcharging or falsifying of the claim. Had the attorneys in this case been able to swear to the affidavit as required, it is scarcely probable that the creditors would at the final meeting take upon themselves the burden of surcharging or falsifying their claim; certainly not unless they thought the claim grossly unjust. All of which is respectfully submitted.] [2]

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. Inasmuch as the register has, by section 4 of the act and general order No. 5, the general power to audit and pass the accounts of assignees, and, by section 27, it is provided, that, at the second general meeting of creditors, the assignee must report and exhibit to the court and to the creditors just and true accounts of all his receipts and payments, verified by his oath, and produce and file vouchers for all payments for which vouchers are required by any rule of the court, I think that the register has power, and that it is his duty, to audit any accounts so reported and exhibited. Section 27 requires the assignee to exhibit at the same time a schedule of creditors and property, and a statement of the whole estate, as then ascertained, and of property recovered and property outstanding, and debts or claims undetermined, and moneys remaining in hand, and then and there the creditors, by a majority in value, are to determine what net sum shall be divided, retaining a sum sufficient to provide for undetermined claims not proved, and for other expenses and contingencies. The creditors are to have notice of this meeting, and must, therefore, be prepared to object, if they desire, to such accounts as the assignee shall then report and exhibit, under section 27. In order to arrive at the net sum to be divided, the outstanding claims, not disputed or objected to, must be arrived at, and their amount deducted. If they are not disputed or objected to, and appear to be proper charges, it is the duty of the register to direct their payment, as part of the business of auditing and passing the accounts even though they have not been actually paid by the assignee. They may properly come under the head of "other expenses," the amount of which is to be retained by the assignee, such retention being specifically authorized by the meeting and the register, to meet the specific items, as such expenses.

The provision in section 28, for auditing and passing the accounts of the assignee at the meeting for the final dividend, cannot be regarded as in any manner implying that such accounts of the assignee as are presented at the second general meeting of creditors shall not then be audited and passed by the register.

[2] [From 6 N. B. R. 197.]

Case No. 2,800.

In re CLARK.

[2 Biss. 73;[1] 3 N. B. R. 16 (Quarto, 3); 1 Chi. Leg. News, 113.]

District Court, N. D. Illinois. Dec. Term, 1868.

DISCHARGE OF INVOLUNTARY BANKRUPT.

1. An involuntary bankrupt may be discharged unless some act specified in the 29th section [of the act of 1867 (14 Stat. 531)] is proved against him.

[Cited in Re Bunster, Case No. 2,136.]

2. His estate having been administered upon, and the object of the law having been fulfilled, if he has acted in good faith there is no reason why he should be compelled to go through the vain ceremony of filing a voluntary petition.

Application by involuntary bankrupt for discharge.

DRUMMOND, District Judge. In this case the register of the first district has certified to the court that there is no opposition to the discharge of the bankrupt by any creditor, and that he is entitled to his discharge provided it is competent in law to discharge an involuntary bankrupt.

I understand, also, that doubt has been expressed on this point in other quarters, and I have therefore examined the question. It is rather singular that the bankrupt law nowhere refers in express words to the discharge of an involuntary bankrupt, but I think that the necessary conclusion from the whole law is, that the fact of the applicant being an involuntary bankrupt should not of itself alone prevent his discharge.

The 42d section declares, that "the warrant shall be directed, and the property of the debtor shall be taken thereon and shall be assigned and distributed in the same manner and with similar proceedings to those hereinbefore provided for the taking possession, assignment, and distribution of the property of the debtor upon his own petition." The object in both cases—voluntary and involuntary—is the same, the distribution of the assets of the bankrupt among his creditors in conformity with the modes pointed out by the law.

Undoubtedly, if the act of bankruptcy alleged and proved against the involuntary bankrupt comes within any of the alternatives specified in the 29th section, which prevent or render invalid any discharge, he should not be discharged; but if there be nothing of that kind set forth in the petition by the creditor, nor otherwise shown, I see no good reason why the party should be compelled to go through the vain ceremony of filing a petition himself, to be released from his debts, when his debts and assets have just been administered by the bankrupt court, at the instance of a creditor. For example, under the 39th section, if a debtor shall conceal himself to avoid the service of legal process in an action for the recovery of a debt or demand provable under the act—that would constitute an act of bankruptcy, and authorize proceedings by a creditor against him, but unless that concealment were accompanied with some of the acts or omissions specified in the 29th section it would not prevent his discharge; and so of some other acts of bankruptcy mentioned in the 39th section. Upon principle, if the involuntary bankrupt has acted in good faith, there is no good reason why he should not be released from the payment of his debts upon the surrender of all his property to the assignee, as well as the volunteer; and, though the language of the act touching discharges applies generally if not always to those who have filed their own petition, yet I think the necessary implication is that if the 29th section does not prevent it, the involuntary bankrupt is entitled to his discharge.

[1] [Reported by Josiah H. Bissell, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

It seems to me if congress had intended to exclude all involuntary cases, without distinction from the relief of a discharge, it would have been clearly expressed. But there are two words used in a parenthesis in the form of discharge given in the 32d section, which, though it is merely in a form, and the law declares that the form of a certificate may be that in substance, yet would seem to indicate that the discharge might be as well of the involuntary as voluntary bankrupt: "On which day the petition for adjudication was filed by (or against) him." There is also, possibly, an inference to be drawn from the language used in the beginning of the 30th section, in favor of the opinion already intimated, by the words "on his own application," and a similar inference may be drawn from parts of the 36th and 37th sections.

On the whole, therefore, I can have no doubt that in a proper case an involuntary bankrupt may be discharged.

This is also declared to be the law in Re Bunster [Case No. 2,136].

Case No. 2,801.

In re CLARK.

[9 Blatchf. 372;[1] 6 N. B. R. 403.]

Circuit Court, D. Vermont. Jan., 1872.[2]

BANKRUPTCY — POWER OF THE DISTRICT COURT — SUMMARY JURISDICTION — MODE OF REVIEW — TESTIMONY IN EQUITY.

1. The district court has, under the 1st section of the bankruptcy act of March 2d, 1867 (14 Stat. 517), power to prohibit any proceeding in a state court by a creditor, to liquidate and enforce a lien on the property of a debtor who is adjudged a bankrupt by such court. Such power is to be exercised summarily, and does not require a formal suit.

[Cited in Re Ulrich, Case No. 14,328; Re Brunquest, Id. 2,055; Re Duncan, Id. 4,131; Re Cooper, Id. 3,190; Re Mead, 58 Fed. 312.]

2. When the property affected by a lien is confessedly the property of the bankrupt, and has passed to the assignee, and it only remains to ascertain and liquidate the alleged lien, the summary jurisdiction of the district court is entirely adequate.

[Cited in Re Duncan, Case No. 4,131; Re Casey, Id. 2,495; Re Sims, Id. 12,888.]

3. The power of the bankruptcy court to give further relief, in protection of the estate of the bankrupt, on a renewed application, on new or further evidence, after it has made one order in the premises, considered and sustained.

[Cited in Phelps v. Sellick, Case No. 11,079; Re Hufnagel, Id. 6,837.]

4. Semble, that the mode of review of an order made in the exercise of such summary jurisdiction, is not by an appeal under the 8th section of the bankruptcy act.

5. The testimony, in a suit in equity, may be taken orally, in open court.

6. An order of the district court, restraining an alleged creditor of the bankrupt's from further prosecuting an action in a state court, in which he had attached property of the bankrupt's, affirmed.

[Quoted in Hudson v. Schwab, Case No. 6,835.]

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of Vermont.]

In bankruptcy. One Burton, many months before proceedings were commenced in bankruptcy against [Alanson M.] Clark, had commenced an action in the state court, against the latter, on book account, for $150,000, and therein had attached property of Clark, to be held to satisfy any judgment he might recover in that action. He had also recovered a judgment for $46,000, against Clark, on a set-off in another action, pending at the same time, and for this judgment he had no security. Clark, becoming greatly embarrassed, and, in fact, insolvent, other attachments were levied on his property. In January, 1870, by consent, the judgment for $46,000 was reversed, and soon thereafter an agreement was made by Clark with Burton, that all suits between Clark and Burton, (of which there were several,) except the action on book account, should be discontinued, and that, in such last named action, Burton might prove all his demands against Clark, without objection as to the form of action, and without any claim that they or any of them were barred by the statute of limitations. Clark was adjudged a bankrupt in February, 1870, and Samson, his assignee in bankruptcy, applied to the district court to enjoin Burton and Clark from acting under that agreement, and to stay the prosecution of the action on book account, on the ground that the arrangement between Burton and Clark was collusive and fraudulent, and made to give Burton an unlawful preference; and an order was made forbidding the parties from making any use of the agreement, but not forbidding the prosecution of the suit. [Case No. 12,285.] On a review of that order in the circuit court, it was affirmed, and leave was given to make a further or renewed application to the district court, upon new or additional evidence. [Case unreported.] Thereupon, the assignee presented the petition now in question, to the district court, praying an injunction against the prosecution of the action on book account in the state court. The bankrupt and Burton appeared and answered. The issues were tried by the district court, by the examination of witnesses and the taking of proofs orally before the court. The proofs were deemed to establish that the fraudulent scheme or contrivance to give to Burton a preference was entered into before the reversal of the judgment above mentioned; that that reversal by consent was in execution of that scheme; that its design was to remove an obstacle to proving, in the action on book account, the matters claimed as a set-off, and determined by that judgment, and so, by letting them, with other claims, into the action on book account, waiving all forms and the statute of limitations, bring them within the scope of the attachment lien, whereas, in truth, and without such reversal, Burton had not and could not gain any security therefor; and that, from a period shortly before that reversal of the judgment, Clark and Burton, who were brothers in law, were acting throughout in collusion, and with the fraudulent design to make use of the attachment lien acquired in the action on book account, as a means of sweeping into the hands of Burton so much of the bankrupt estate as possible, by the use of claims theretofore unsecured, and claims outlawed, collusively exaggerated, or fictitious, and not to be seriously contested by Clark, and so pervert the action to a fraudulent use, to the prejudice of other creditors, if not to deprive them of any share of the estate. The court, thereupon, made an order restraining Burton from further prosecuting the action on book account, in the state court. [Case No. 12,286.] From this order, Burton brought an appeal to this court, in the form and manner prescribed by the 8th section of the bankruptcy act of March 2, 1867 (14 Stat. 520), as if the order had been made in a suit in equity, proceeding on pleadings and proofs to a decree. On the hearing of the appeal, the assignee moved to dismiss it, on the ground that the order was made in the exercise of the summary jurisdiction given to the district court by the 1st section of said act, and could only be reviewed in accordance with the provisions of the 2d section.

[1] [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

[2] [Affirming Samson v. Burton, Case No. 12,286.]

George F. Edmunds and Edward J. Phelps, for assignee.

Luke P. Poland, Reuben C. Benton, and Heman S. Royce, for Benton.

WOODRUFF, Circuit Judge. In the conclusions of the district judge upon the questions of fact, I concur. I shall, therefore, content myself with stating the questions raised on this appeal, and, very briefly, my conclusions thereon.

It is contended, for the appellant: (1.) That the district court had no power to proceed summarily, in this case; (2.) that the assignee is concluded by a former order, which will be hereafter referred to; (3.) that this proceeding is, in substance, a suit in equity, and an appeal, under the 8th section, is proper; (4.) that it was irregular and erroneous to try the questions of fact by the examination of witnesses in open court, but the testimony should have been taken [and reduced to writing][3] before an examiner [which is claimed to be prescribed by the rules of the supreme court in equity].[3] (5.) that neither the proofs, nor the law applicable thereto, warranted the order, in any form of proceeding.

(1.) I have no doubt whatever of the power and jurisdiction of the district court, under the 1st section of the bankrupt law, to assume the entire administration of the estate of the debtor, to determine all questions touching the existence of liens thereon, to ascertain and settle the amount of such liens, and to make provision for the liquidation and settlement thereof; and, as incidental to this, it has ample power to restrain a claimant of such lien from proceeding elsewhere to enforce his lien. Language more comprehensive can hardly be suggested than is employed in the act, giving power to collect all the assets, to ascertain and liquidate the liens and other specific claims thereon, adjust the various priorities, and marshal and dispose of the different funds and assets, so as to secure the rights of all parties. To this end, power is given to compel obedience to all orders, by process of contempt and other remedial process. The entire estate is brought within the reach of these comprehensive powers, by vesting it in the assignee appointed by the court, to administer it, under the direction of the court. Nor can it make any difference with the power of the court over this subject, that the lien or alleged lien is inchoate, and incapable of execution, until the amount secured thereby is ascertained and settled. Ascertainment and liquidation are expressly authorized; and the subsequent provisions of the act, relating to creditors having mortgages, liens or other security, show how fully the whole administration of the estate is confided to the court. True, it does not necessarily follow, that, in all cases, the court must prohibit any proceeding in the state court for the benefit of a creditor having a lien. There is, however, no want of power. Often, it is quite convenient, and, ordinarily, it may be quite desirable, to permit pending actions to proceed, so far as to ascertain the amount due. In one case,—In re Iron Mountain Co. [Case No. 7,065],—a foreclosure of a mortgage in the state court was permitted, though begun after petition filed in the district court, and, under the special circumstances of the case, I deemed it proper, on review in this court, to affirm the order. But, the power to control the creditors in this respect is, I think, clearly given. Two considerations illustrate the importance of the power, which are especially applicable to liens by attachment: 1. Without such power, there is no adequate protection to the other creditors, against collusion between the bankrupt and the claimant, not even aided by the authority given to the assignee to defend. 2. The early settlement of the estate may sometimes require that the court in bankruptcy should take the determination of claims which are in dispute into its own hands. I deem it equally clear, that this power conferred by the 1st section is to be summarily exercised, and does not require a formal suit. Indeed, whatever powers are given by the 1st section are designed to be exercised summarily.

[3] [From 6 N. B. R. 403.]

There are cases, in which, in order to bring the property pursued by the assignee within the control of the court or its assignee, or to remove obstacles to its administration, it may be necessary for the assignee to prosecute an action at law or a suit in equity; and such cases are provided for in the 2d section. But, when the property affected by a lien is confessedly the property of the bankrupt, and has passed to the assignee, and it only remains to ascertain and liquidate the alleged lien, the summary jurisdiction of the district court is entirely adequate.

(2.) On a prior petition, setting out some of the matters alleged in the present petition, the district court had made an order enjoining Burton from making any use of a written agreement entered into between him and the bankrupt, on the ground that it was a collusive and fraudulent arrangement, for the purpose of securing to Burton a preference over other creditors, in respect of certain claims which had already been merged in a judgment, or barred by such judgment, and for which, so long as such judgment was in force, Burton had no security. But such order did not invalidate or impeach a previous reversal, which had been entered by consent, of that judgment, because it did not then sufficiently appear that such collusive and fraudulent arrangement was entered into prior to such reversal, or that such reversal was part of the scheme devised to secure to Burton a preference. Shortly after such reversal, the said written agreement was entered into between Burton and the bankrupt, which, if carried into execution, would have permitted Burton to prove all claims which he had or alleged against the bankrupt, in an action "on book," in which he had attached the bankrupt's property, and thus secure an apparent lien, and, possibly, an actual lien, for the amount due to him upon the said claims, for which, so long as the said judgment was in force, he had no security. The former order of the district court left to Burton such right to prove the said claims, as the laws of Vermont might give to him. That order, this court, on review, affirmed, but leave was given to the assignee to renew his application for other or further order in the premises, upon new or additional evidence. Thereupon, the present petition was presented to the district court.

The suggestion, that the decision upon the former hearing was final and conclusive, as res adjudicata, is without foundation. Even in a formal suit in equity, the court may qualify the decree, so that it shall not operate to prevent a new suit; and nothing is more common, in disposing of motions, than to give leave to renew, or apply, upon new or further evidence, for additional relief. The highly equitable and remedial powers conferred on the court in bankruptcy are not less free from restriction, nor are they hampered by such technical rules as will prevent the doing of what is just and for the protection of the estate, even if it requires the revocation of an order once made.

(3.) The proceeding in question was not a formal suit, but was a summary proceeding. It does not conform, in the manner of its institution, the manner of its prosecution, or in its form, to a suit in equity. True, the facts stated and the relief sought were like, in some of their features, to bills for analogous relief in suits in equity; but that proves nothing. These same facts were the proper ground of a summary application, and for the relief which it was competent for the court summarily to grant. If these proceedings are compared with the rules prescribed to the courts of the United States in equity, relating to the commencement of suits, the form of bills, appearance therein, &c., &c., no question will, I think, remain on this point. It would seem to follow, that the mode adopted to obtain a review of the order of the district court, was not warranted. It will, however, be more satisfactory to the parties, if the case is disposed of upon grounds which import that no error was committed in the order appealed from, and, also, upon grounds alike applicable to the proceeding, if it were regarded as a suit in form; and I therefore consider the other points.

(4.) It was not ground for a reversal of the order, that the witnesses were orally examined before the court. The rules of the supreme court have not taken away the power which the court has, as a court of equity, to have the testimony of the witnesses taken in open court. That power is expressly reserved in the seventy-eighth rule, which implies its existence and its perpetuation. It is there left to the discretion of the court.

(5.) I have, perhaps, already sufficiently expressed my views of the merits. The conclusions of the district judge were, I think, warranted by the evidence. The power of the court over the subject I have already stated. Independent of any question of actual corrupt design, the arrangement to remove the impediment of an actual adjudication, and bring the claims therein determined under the operation of the attachment in the action "on book," was an attempt to give an illegal preference in fraud of the bankrupt law. On that subject I have already expressed my opinion, on the former review, above mentioned. It is not enough to say, that, if the debt were permitted to be established in the pending action, the court could control the execution of the judgment. I would not express any doubt of that; but it will save embarrassment, expense, and any apparent effect of a formal judgment, to be avoided by the assignee, to arrest the execution of the fraudulent scheme. And this is especially true, in view of the evidence of actual fraudulent collusion, which is deemed established.

The order should be affirmed.

Case No. 2,802.

In re CLARK.

[9 Blatchf. 379;[1] 6 N. B. R. 410.]

Circuit Court, D. Vermont. Jan., 1872.

BANKRUPTCY—REVIEW BY CIRCUIT COURT—PRACTICE — EVIDENCE — POWERS OF THE DISTRICT COURT.

1. The jurisdiction of the circuit court, to review summary proceedings in bankruptcy, is not limited by any measure of the value of the property involved.

2. A petition of review, in bankruptcy, merely reciting the proceedings in the district court, and its decree, and alleging that the petitioner is aggrieved thereby, and praying a review and a reversal, without pointing out any errors, or supposed errors, in law or in fact, or specifying any ground or reason for such reversal, except that the petitioner is aggrieved, commented on, as loose practice, not to be sanctioned.

3. Where property comes to the possession of an assignee in bankruptcy, as part of the estate of the bankrupt, and is taken from his possession under a writ of replevin, issued from a state court, in a proceeding to which the assignee is not a party, and in which the title of the assignee is not in question, the district court is bound to see that such possession by the assignee is not forcibly displaced.

4. A finding of fact, by the district court, on the examination of witnesses in the presence of the court, should not be reversed by the circuit court, without a very clear and decided conviction that it is erroneous.

5. The review given to the circuit court, by the 2d section of the bankruptcy act of March 2, 1867 (14 Stat. 518), is given to it as a court of equity; and it is not bound to reverse upon strictly legal grounds, if satisfied that the facts are correctly found, and that no injustice has been done.

6. Declarations of the bankrupt, held to have been properly admitted in evidence, on the trial of a suit between the assignee and a third person, as to the title to certain property, as declarations made by him while in conspiracy with such third person to cover and conceal such property, and as part of the res gestae.

7. Where an assignee in bankruptcy proceeded, in the district court, by petition, to recover certain property, as assets of the bankrupt, and the respondent answered the petition, and did not object to the form or substance of the proceedings, or to the jurisdiction of the court, but submitted to its jurisdiction, and set up, by his answer, his own title to the property, and prayed that the court would adjudge as to the title, between him and the assignee, and it did so adjudge, the circuit court, on review, will not consider the question as to whether a more formal suit would or would not have been proper.

[Petition of review.]

Reuben C. Benton, for Blake.

Edward J. Phelps, for assignee.

WOODRUFF, Circuit Judge. Amos J. Samson, the assignee of Alanson M. Clark, in bankruptcy, applied, by petition, to the district court, to compel the return to him of certain property, which he alleged to be part of the personal estate of the bankrupt, of which he had taken possession, and which had been taken from his possession, and delivered by the sheriff to William H. Blake, by virtue of a writ of replevin, issued in the name of the said Blake, against one La Crosse. Blake appeared, and, without objection to the form of the proceeding, answered the petition, denying that the property was in the possession of the assignee, averring title to the property in himself, denying, also, that the property was ever the property of the bankrupt, and praying the court to adjust and settle the right to the said property, as between himself and the assignee, and to direct the assignee to interfere no further therewith.

A trial of the issues thus raised was had in the district court, on which it appeared, that the assignee of Clark, after his appointment, entered upon a farm, of which the title, at the time of the adjudication in bankruptcy, was in the bankrupt, and which was occupied by one La Crosse, under an agreement with the bankrupt for the purchase thereof, but for which the consideration was to be paid at a future day, upon notes which had been given therefor by La Crosse. The property in question was upon this farm. La Crosse made no claim to this personal property, yielded the possession thereof to the assignee, as the property of the bankrupt, and agreed to take care of the same for him. After this, the property was taken by Blake, through the writ of replevin out of the state court, to which La Crosse alone was made defendant. Evidence was given, tending to show that the personal property, prior to the proceedings in bankruptcy, belonged to the bankrupt, and remained on his farm. On the other hand, evidence on the part of Blake tended to show, that the property in question belonged to La Crosse, and that, prior to the proceedings in bankruptcy, an execution on a judgment against La Crosse was levied thereon, and the same was sold by the sheriff, and purchased by the said Blake. Other evidence tended to show that the sale on the execution, and the purchase by Blake, were part of a fraudulent scheme by the bankrupt, when wholly insolvent, and on the eve of the proceedings against him in bankruptcy, by the aid of Blake, to cover and conceal his property, by the form of legal proceedings, wherein the property was levied upon and sold as the property of La Crosse, though, in truth, belonging to Clark himself; that Blake bid off the property by the procurement of Clark; that the purchase money was furnished or repaid by Clark to Blake, the design being to prevent the property from being thereafter taken by his creditors; and that the possession of the property was not changed, but the same remained on the farm of Clark. The district court found and adjudged, that the said Blake has not, and never had, any right, title, or interest in the property; and that the same was the property of the said bankrupt, until the filing of the petition against him in bankruptcy, and became vested in the assignee, and came lawfully into his possession; and the court thereupon ordered and decreed the restoration of the said property to the possession of the assignee, or in default thereof, payment by the said Blake of its value, $178, with costs. The said Blake has brought this petition of review, stating the proceedings above detailed, and that it was adjudged and decreed by the district court as also above recited, and then alleging, "that he is aggrieved by said adjudication and decree," wherefore he prays a review and reversal, and that this court will make such adjudication and decree as shall seem meet, &c., &c., without pointing out any errors, or supposed errors, in law or in fact, or specifying any ground or reason for a reversal of such decree, except the sweeping statement that he is aggrieved. The respondent, the assignee, moved to dismiss this petition, on the grounds, that the value of the property is not sufficient to give this court jurisdiction; and that the petition alleges no error in law, assigns no specific error in fact, and contains only an allegation that the petitioner is aggrieved. At the hearing, the court reserved the consideration of this motion, and directed the argument to proceed on the merits.

[1] [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

I find no warrant for limiting the jurisdiction of this court to review summary proceedings in bankruptcy by any measure of the value of the property involved; and no statutory provision, nor any decision of the courts, was referred to, prescribing or affirming any such limitation. If, therefore, the proceedings below ought to be regarded as summary proceedings, this court has jurisdiction to review them. If, on the other hand, though informal, they were, in substance, a suit, as upon bill and cross-bill, then no proper appeal was taken; upon which, however, it will not be necessary to rest any conclusion.

As to the other ground on which the motion to dismiss was urged, it is sufficient to say, that, although I shall dispose of this case when I hold that there is no sufficient ground for reversing the decree of the district court, I do not desire to sanction so loose a practice as this petition of review pursues. Nevertheless, as the defect might be cured by amendment, and as no prejudice can come to the assignee or to the estate, under the conclusion which has been reached on the other branch of the case, it is better for all interested as creditors or otherwise, that no further delay should happen, through mere defect in the formal proceedings.

The proofs, I think, warranted the conclusion of the court below, that the property in question came to the possession of the assignee as part of the estate of the bankrupt, and was in his possession when Blake took it by his writ of replevin. The district court would have failed in its duty, had it suffered that possession to be forcibly displaced by a third person, although using the form of process of the state court, to which the assignee was not a party, and in which the title of the assignee was not in question, but the property was to be subjected to such fate as a contest between two strangers to the proceedings in bankruptcy might involve. The district court was open to the application of such third party, if he desired to assert title and claim a delivery of the property by the assignee to him; or, a suit at law or in equity, as the case might require, could have been brought against the assignee, by such third party, in that or in this court.

As to the title to the property itself, that depended upon questions of fact, in respect to which there is no such preponderance of evidence against the conclusion of the district court, as calls for a reversal. On the contrary, my own conviction concurs with that of the district judge. If it were otherwise, a finding of fact, upon an examination of witnesses in the presence of the court, where the opportunity for judging correctly of the credibility of the witnesses and weight of the testimony is better than can ordinarily be afforded by an inspection of the testimony when reduced to writing, should not be reversed without a very clear and decided conviction that it is erroneous.

It was strenuously insisted, that error was committed in the admissions of declarations of the bankrupt in evidence. On this point, these observations are pertinent: (1.) This review is given to the court as a court of equity; and there, on an enquiry into questions of fact, the court, on appeal, are not bound to reverse upon strictly legal grounds, if satisfied that the facts are correctly found, and that no injustice has been done. (2.) The declarations in question were in aid, and in partial execution of, or, at least, while Clark was engaged in, the alleged scheme to cover and conceal his property, to which Blake was a party. They were, therefore, admissible, as a declaration of a co-con-spirator in the attempt to defraud. (3.) For the reason last stated, they were properly regarded as a part of the res gestae, when title in La Crosse was set up by Blake, and the fraudulent sale and pretended purchase by Blake were relied on.

It was not objected, on the argument of this review, that the proceedings on the petition of the assignee were not regular and proper, or that the order or decree sought to be reviewed was not within the summary jurisdiction of the district court. Blake, the petitioner in review, appeared in the district court and answered the petition. He not only raised no objection to the form or substance of the proceeding, or the jurisdiction of the court therein, but, submitting to the jurisdiction, he invoked its exercise in his own behalf, by filing an answer, in the nature of a cross bill in equity, alleging his own title, and praying the court to adjust and settle the right to the said property, as between him and the assignee, to give to him the control thereof, and to restrain the assignee from interference therewith. Upon the issues of fact, the parties went to trial, and with the result above stated. This court is, therefore, not called upon to consider whether the determination of the question of title to this property should have been sought by a summary proceeding in the district court, or by a proceeding formally commenced by process. Jurisdiction of the subject-matter and question existed in the court, and both parties submitted themselves to its exercise, and, indeed, invoked it in the form and manner stated. Nor does the petitioner in review raise any objection, in this court, that there is any defect or error in the decree or order, founded on the mode of procedure in the district court. Besides, the court having found, as matter of fact, that the property was in the possession of the assignee, the court had power to protect that possession against interference except by resort to a proper legal proceeding to which the assignee should be a party; and, therefore, when Blake, the claimant, by his cross petition, invoked the controlling power of the court over the assignee, as its officer, and submitted to a trial of the questions which he asked the court to determine, no question arises here whether a more formal suit would or would not have been proper.

The judgment or decree must be affirmed, with costs.

Case No. 2,803.

In re CLARK.

[43 How. Pr. 70.]

District Court, S. D. New York. April 5, 1872.

BANKRUPTCY—ALLOWANCE FOR SERVICES OF BANKRUPT'S COUNSEL.

[Services of counsel, rendered bankrupt in resisting the petition filed against him, in examination before register, in preparing schedules, and in settling conflicting claims and rights between the bankrupt and the assignee, may be allowed out of the estate on the written approval of the assignee and certificate of the register.]

[In bankruptcy. Application of Mansfield Compton for compensation out of the fund in the hands of the assignee for services rendered the bankrupt as an attorney in resisting the petition filed against him, for services while the bankrupt was under examination before the register, for services in preparing schedules, and for other services in settling conflicting claims and rights between the bankrupt and the assignee.]

[On certificate of I. T. Williams, Register.]

I, the undersigned, register in charge of the above-entitled matter, do hereby certify and report that on the 27th day of October last a claim against the assignee of the said estate for professional services was filed with me by Mansfield Compton, Esq., amounting to the sum of $1,000, upon the back of which said claim was indorsed the words and figures following: "I the undersigned, object and disallow the foregoing claim, and require evidence to be produced to establish the same; and I apply to the register for an order for the examination of the claimant and his witnesses touching his claim. The said claim was presented to me this 27th day of October, 1871. John S. Beecher, Assignee of A. B. Clark, by C. W. Bangs, his attorney, pro hac vicae;" which said claim with said indorsements thereon are hereto annexed. That on the 6th day of November, aforesaid, I received a written request from the said Bangs, reciting that said Compton had presented the claim aforesaid to the said assignee, and that he had been served with a notice by said Compton that the examination of said claim would be proceeded with before the register on the 8th day of November, 1871, at 11 a. m., and that he was advised that John J. Monell and Richard H. Corbett are each of them necessary witnesses for the assignee on the hearing of said claim, and applying for a summons or order for the examination of said witnesses returnable on the 8th day of November, at 11 a. m., at the office of said register; and the assignee thereby raised the point "that it was the duty of the register upon said application to issue the summonses or order thereby applied for, and that, should the register decline to issue such summonses or order the register was requested to certify to the court the point so raised," which said notice is hereto annexed. That I did not issue such summons or order as so requested, not thinking it necessary to bring said Corbett or the said Monell down from his residence at Newburgh on that day, for the reasons hereinafter stated. That on the 8th day of November aforesaid, at 11 a. m., the said Compton appeared before me, and the said assignee also appeared by F. M. Bangs, Esq., his counsel. That the said Bangs thereupon asked for an adjournment, alleging as a ground thereof "that certain creditors had filed a protest against any attorney's fees being allowed the assignee, and that the assignee had taken measures to call the creditors together, and had notified the protesting creditors, that they might, if they chose, employ attorneys and counsel to attend the trial of this claim, and that such protesting creditors did not appear, and that there was no proof that M. Compton had notified any of the creditors of his claim. That thereupon the assignee had not thought it expedient to employ counsel at his own expense, nor to pledge the estate to meet such expenses." Mr. Bangs further stated that he appeared only for the purpose of making that point. I overruled this application, stating as a reason therefor that "I should not pay any attention to such a protest save to execute the accounts of the counsel carefully, and allow them for all services properly rendered to the estate, the full going prices usually charged by competent counsel for similar services. That I did not think that a ground of adjournment, and, if the assignee did not take care of the estate by a proper defense, I should do my best to supply the omission." The said Bangs thereupon renewed his application for a postponement of said hearing, alleging as a ground therefor that "he had applied to the register for an order that the said Corbett and Monell appear as witnesses for the said assignee on this hearing, and that said application had not been granted." I denied this application also, stating as a reason therefor, "1. That the grounds alleged therefor were not consistent with those above alleged for such postponement. 2. That M. Compton had informed me that when he served the notice for this hearing upon Mr. Bangs he was informed by him that he should not dispute the amount of the bill, but only raise the point of law, and that M. Compton had also informed him that his testimony would probably occupy the whole of one sitting." To this Mr. Bangs urged that "the general orders required the register to sit six hours, and he denied that it would require six hours to take the testimony on the part of M. Compton." I then decided that, as Mr. Corbett had come in and was present, and could be examined by Mr. Bangs, if the time should permit, I would go on and take the testimony of the witnesses who were present as far as the same could be done at one session. Thereupon Mr. Bangs stated that he now appeared for Hardy, Blake & Co., and "demurred to the bill on its face;" but I decided, that I would take the testimony, and pass upon all these questions at the close of it. And thereupon Mr. Bangs proceeded to put his said objection in the nature of a demurrer to the bill of items of M. Compton's claim into writing, and, having done so, handed me two papers, both of which are hereto annexed, asking me to certify the point so raised to the court. I decided that, "under the 11th general order the pendency of such an issue before the judge ought not to suspend or delay the proceedings in this case before the register. That it would not be a convenient practice to send the case up till the testimony was in, unless, indeed, it should be lengthy, in which case I might think it proper to send it up before;" and thereupon the said Bangs left. I therefore proceeded and took the testimony of the said Compton and the testimony of Balestier, which are hereto annexed. And I submit the two points above raised by the said Bangs, without comment.

And touching the said claim of the said Compton, I submit that I am unable to see, from the testimony, any privity of contract between the assignee and the claimant. The only ground upon which his claim can rest is, the provision of the act itself. The services claimed were, for resisting the petition filed against the bankrupt; for services while the bankrupt was under examination before register; for services in preparing schedules, and for other services in settling conflicting claims and rights between the bankrupt and the assignee. They are services that are rendered in almost every case of involuntary bankruptcy, and if allowed here, they must be allowed in every similar case. The question, therefore, becomes important, and with a view of obtaining a careful consideration of it, I beg to call the attention of the court to what it seems to me, must be the effect of rejecting this and similar claims. The bankrupt's first notice of proceedings in bankruptcy against him is the service of the order to show cause why he should not be adjudged a bankrupt. The moment of that service, is the moment that fixes his status with regard to his property. That moment his property, if afterward adjudged a bankrupt, becomes the property of the assignee thereafter to be appointed. He has, therefore, nothing with which he may retain counsel, call witnesses, or assist himself in his defense; yet, the 41st section of the act [14 Stat. 537], provides, that he may appear in court and defend. It further provides that, in case he is successful in his defense, he may have costs of his antagonist. Clearly this implies the right—a right in virtue of the very terms of the act itself—to retain and be aided by counsel. There is no presumption of law that counsel will serve, or witnesses attend, without compensation. Where shall the money to defray such expenses come from? It must come from the property—what should be the assets—of the bankrupt. It will be taken before or after the adjudication. It will be taken either stealthily by the bankrupt, or openly by order of the court. There can be no doubt, as to which of these two courses will most promote the public interest and the wholesome administration of the law. It will not answer this view to say, that the law presumes all men honest, that the law will not presume that a man will commit a fraud or violate a law. It is enough to say that good legislation will not place a man under temptations to commit a wrong, which experience shows the mass of mankind have not the virtue to resist. It is true, we must submit to the law as we find it; but I think it clear, that if the bankruptcy act will bear the construction contended for, it ought to be adopted.

Upon the question then of the true construction of the act, it would seem, that congress must have intended that the costs and expenses of the bankrupt in his defense, and other proceedings should be paid out of the proceeds of his estate. A court will be reluctant to hold, that the law making power while expressly providing, that a party may appear in court and defend himself by the aid of counsel and witnesses, intended in the same act to deprive him of all the means of doing so. The fact, that no provision is made for withholding from the assets to be handed over to the assignee sufficient to pay these costs and expenses, warrants us in looking sharply to the act to find from what source it was intended, that such costs and expenses should be paid. We find in section 28, a provision for paying out of the fund "the fees, costs and expenses of suits and the several proceedings in bankruptcy under this act." This language would seem to be broad enough to cover the case before us. The words "fees, costs, and expenses" are not limited to the side of the creditors or the assignee, nor yet to the officers of the court. It is the daily practice of allowing the counsel for the petitioning creditor to be paid out of the fund for his services in the bankruptcy court. On what express words of the act are similar fees for similar services denied to the counsel for the bankrupt? Certainly none. By whatever argument these words of the act are made to embrace the compensation of counsel for the petitioning creditor the same argument will apply a fortiori to the compensation of counsel for the bankrupt.

I submitted the question herein presented to this court in 1868, in the Case of Heirschberg [Case No. 6,329]. In that case, the bankrupts' attorneys had not thought it right to take from the funds of the bankrupts their compensation in advance for filing his petition, &c., but had come in after the estate had gone into the hands of the assignee and asked to be paid from the fund. I then submitted to the court as a reason for allowing it, that "the funds from which the solicitor is paid must come from what should be the assets of the bankrupt, or from his future earnings. In pursuing the course here pursued, the solicitor submits the amount of his compensation to the court under the eye of the creditors. In the course ordinarily pursued, he obtains his compensation from the same fund, the amount being measured by the good feelings of the bankrupt, and under some temptation to give him a larger sum than the creditors would sanction, or the court might think a just compensation. If the act will bear this construction, it would seem to tend to a better practice than that which it is believed now generally prevails." I recur to these remarks now only to say that the experience of three years has only deepened the impression then expressed—and since the Case of Comstock [Case No. 3,074], in which one of our ablest judges has taken the same view here urged, I have thought it right to submit the question again, asking for a careful reconsideration of the question. Should the court think the views here expressed, well taken, I recommend that an order be entered, allowing the claimant the sum of $250, which I think would be a fair compensation for the services which would seem to come under provisions of the act, upon the principle of construction above contended for. Respectfully submitted.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. On evidence and a certificate bringing this case within the decision in Re Montgomery [Id. 9,726], I should follow that decision.

NOTE. The decision in the Case of Montgomery, above referred to, is as follows, Blatchford, District Judge: "If the assignee shall, in writing, approve of the payment of this bill out of the funds of this estate on the grounds set forth in the petition of Mr. Olney, and in the certificate of the register, and of the amount of the charges, and order will be made allowing its payment."

Case No. 2,804.

In re CLARK et al.

[The case reported under above title in 3 N. B. R. 487 (Quarto, 122), and in 1 Am. Law T. Rep. Bankr. 186, is the same as Case No. 1,418.]

Case No. 2,805.

In re CLARK et al.

[4 N. B. R. 237 (Quarto, 70).][1]

District Court, S. D. New York. Nov. 7, 1870.

EXAMINATION OF BANKRUPT—RELEVANCY AND MATERIALITY OF EVIDENCE.

Where wife of a member of a bankrupt firm loaned the firm, previous to its bankruptcy, moneys arising from the sale of property which had been held in her husband's name, but the proceeds of which were promised to her in consideration of her executing a deed therefor, said moneys not appearing on the firm books to the credit of the wife, but to credit of her husband as a member of the firm, no separate account appearing in the husband's separate account-books, except under the head of family expense—and where the husband purchased, as the agent of his wife in her absence from home, real estate, which was conveyed to her in her own name, and which real estate was improved by his wife through her husband, as her agent, and the implements paid for by firm checks, as in payment to her of her loans to the firm, this testimony being objected to as immaterial and irrelevant, and given under and subject to such objections, and the question as to what estate said bankrupt's wife had, and had she any estate except the property above referred to, and was she possessed of thirty-seven thousand dollars, being also objected to, held, the questions must be answered.

[1] [Reprinted by permission.]

[In the matter of Clark, West, Maxwell and Davis.]

I, Isaac Dayton, register in bankruptcy, having charge of these proceedings, and holding examination of E. Spencer West, one of the above-named bankrupts, under section 26 of the bankrupt act of 1867 [14 Stat. 529], hereby certify that in the course of said examination certain questions hereinafter stated at length, were refused to be answered by said E. Spencer West, and a certificate thereof and of the question so arising requested by him.

After testifying to the following effect: That his wife had loaned his firm money; don't know how much, or when; but at one time, in 1863, five or six hundred dollars; at another time, in 1864, about twenty-two thousand dollars; that this loan was a portion of the proceeds of the sale of a house which stood in his name, and which he promised to give to her in consideration of her executing the deed, and she was opposed to the sale of the property, and had hesitated to execute it without that assurance, and he did so give it to her; that this house cost eighteen thousand dollars and sold for thirty thousand five hundred dollars; that the money received for this was in check of the purchaser, payable to order of the bankrupt; that these were transferred to his firm. "Q. 410. What account did your firm keep with your wife as to this money (loan of five or six hundred dollars in 1863)? A. The firm of Clark, West & Co. had no account with my wife, and kept no account at any time, but the loan went into my own individual private expense account, as agreed in our copartnership between Clark and myself, that the expense account of either larger than the other should draw interest. Q. 428. Did you keep any account individually with your wife of this loan made by her, of the profits on the 34th street house and furniture? A. I kept no book-account, but we talked the matter over about what the amount was. Q. 429. Was any account kept by the firm of this amount? A. All money that passed this way through me was kept in my family expense account." That, in November, 1865, he heard by common report that land was for sale in 152d street; that his wife negotiated for this; was himself the party to the agreement, as his wife was away from home at the time it was drawn and executed. The price was sixteen thousand dollars. That his wife made the necessary payments; three thousand dollars of the purchase-money was paid in checks either of himself or Clark, West & Co. Clark, West & Co. owed her that amount, they had been having the use of her money; the deed of the property is in the name of his wife, Mrs. Sarah O. West. That his wife built upon the property; that he acted as her agent in calling at various places to ascertain the price of materials, and after consultation about the price requested the material to be sent and delivered, and on presentation of the bill it would be paid for, and with various parties who were in the habit of performing certain portions of the work on the buildings, and that workmen they would employ would be paid on Saturday; don't know that he ever informed any one that he acted as agent, may have done so; that he did not hire any workmen. The bills were presented to his wife; he looked over the most of them; bills were paid by checks of Clark, West & Co. The checks which were so given were to return the loan made by his wife. The work was done by the day's work; no accounts or memorandums were kept of payments or amounts due. Don't know how much it cost to build. Had some receipts and some checks (returned from bank), but these are lost or destroyed. This property he thinks worth sixty or seventy thousand dollars, or more, perhaps, but there are three mortgages on it—one for twelve thousand dollars, one for twenty-five thousand dollars, and one for fifty thousand dollars. There are sixteen lots in all; there is a brick house, frame house, and stable upon them; don't think he would advise their sale for four thousand dollars per lot. When the first frame house was completed he removed into it, and has remained there ever since, and has not paid his wife any rent; the second house (brick) is for sale, applications to be made to bankrupt. Don't know how much firm owed Mrs. West at any time; don't know how much has been paid to his wife, or for her use; think she has been paid in full with interest. No account has been kept with Mrs. West in books of the firm, or in bankrupt's private books, nor any account with E. S. West in the books of the firm (except his general expense account and loan-book account) to show how much Mrs. West was creditor or debtor at any time.

(All the foregoing testimony relating to the property of the bankrupt's wife was objected to as immaterial and irrelevant, and the questions were answered subject to that objection.) "Q. 632. What estate has Mrs. Sarah O. West? (Objected to as irrelevant, and requested to be certified by counsel for bankrupt.) Q. 633. Is Mrs. S. O. West possessed of any estate except the property in 152d street? (Same objection and request.) Q. 634. Is Mrs. S. O. West possessed of thirty-seven thousand dollars?" (Same objection and request, which questions the bankrupt requested to be certified to the judge for his opinion, which is hereby done.)

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. The questions must be answered. The clerk will certify this decision to the register, Isaac Dayton, Esq.

Case No. 2,806.

In re CLARK et al.

[5 N. B. R. 255.] [1]

District Court, S. D. New York. April 25, 1871.

BANKRUPTCY—PROOF OF CLAIM BY SECURED CREDITOR.

Where a creditor who has ample security for his claim makes proof of the same, without mentioning the security, through inadvertence and ignorance of the law, an order will be entered granting to the said creditor leave to withdraw his proof and restoring to him his rights as though no proof had been filed.

[Cited in Re Hope Min. Co., Case No. 6,681; Re Parkes, Id. 10,754; Re Baxter, 12 Fed. 75.]

[On certificate of I. T. Williams, Register:]

The undersigned register to whom the above entitled case is referred, respectfully reports and certifies to this honorable court: That John Byrne, by his attorney in fact, on the seventeenth day of January, eighteen hundred and seventy, made proof in due form of law, before me, of his claim against the estate of said bankrupts for the sum of six thousand seven hundred dollars, without making any reference to any security held therefor. That afterwards and on the thirtieth of March, eighteen hundred and seventy-one, the said John Byrne filed his petition before me which is hereto annexed, from which it appears that he has ample security for his claim, and that the proving thereof was made and filed through inadvertence or ignorance of his attorney of the fact that any security was held therefor, praying for leave to withdraw his said proof, and that he be restored to his rights in all things as if no such proof had been made or filed. That notice of the filing of said petition was given to the assignee in these proceedings who thereupon appeared before me and objected to the granting of the prayer of the said petition, on the ground that the said security had been by the making and filing of said proof waived, and that the estate had thereby assumed rights which he did not feel at liberty to relinquish. Whereupon I hereby certify the issue so framed to this court for decision. And I further certify and report that I am perfectly satisfied that the said proof was made and filed solely through inadvertence and in ignorance of the law, or of the facts of the case on the part of the said attorney who made the same, and that the said petitioner, had he known the facts and law, would not have made or filed the said proof. Wherefore I recommend to this honorable court that an order be entered giving leave to said petitioner to withdraw his said proof, and that he be in all things restored to his rights as though no proof of claim had been made or filed.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. An order to the effect recommended by the register should be entered.

[1] [Reprinted by permission.]

Case No. 2,807.

In re CLARK et al.

[6 N. B. R. 194.] [1]

District Court, S. D. New York. Nov. 11, 1871.

POWER OF REGISTER IN BANKRUPTCY — INFORMATION FROM ASSIGNEE—CALLING MEETINGS.

1. The register in charge has power to order an assignee to furnish him with all necessary information as to funds in his hands.

2. A third meeting of creditors—not being a final meeting—should not be called except for cause shown, and if the register be satisfied that no such cause exists, he is justified in refusing to grant the order for such a meeting.

[On certificate of I. T. Williams, Register:]

I, the undersigned register in charge of the above entitled proceedings, do hereby certify to this court, that I did, on the twenty-seventh day of October, eighteen hundred and seventy-one, receive from the assignee in this case a request to call a third meeting of creditors. That, as the said request did not state the reasons why such a request was made, I applied to the said assignee by letter, dated the thirty-first day of October, eighteen hundred and seventy-one, to call at my office and confer with me upon the subject of such application. That I received in reply thereto a letter from Messrs. Bangs, Sedgwick & North, "attorneys for the said assignee, pro hac vice," bearing date first November, eighteen hundred and seventy-one, which is herewith submitted. That, upon an examination of the accounts of said assignee on file in my office, I find, so far as I can understand the same, that no funds have been received since the last dividend meeting of the creditors held on the twenty-ninth day of March, eighteen hundred and seventy-one, at which meeting a dividend of six per cent. was duly declared and paid—save the sum of ninety-seven dollars and forty-one cents, which appears to be the amount of interest which has accrued upon the sum of eight thousand eight hundred and twenty-six dollars and seventy-six cents, which is now and was, as I understand, on deposit in the United States Trust Company at the time of the said last dividend meeting, and is not yet in a condition to be divided among the creditors. In doubt whether any further sums were in the hands of the said assignee and uncertain if the said sums so in the said trust company could yet be divided among the creditors, I did, on the sixth of November, eighteen hundred and seventy-one, issue an order to the said assignee for information on this subject. In reply to the said order, I received a letter from the said attorneys for the said assignee on the seventh day of November, eighteen hundred and seventy-one, and on the same day I also received from said attorneys a request to certify the point to the court as to whether I had authority to make the said order. Upon the question of the power of the register to make such an order, I submit that section twenty-eight of the act devolves upon the register the exercise of a discretion in reference to "further dividend meetings." He should call them if "occasion requires." This makes it his duty to ascertain if the occasion does require it. What other means of information has he at command? If he cannot order this information to be given, he is powerless to execute the duty imposed upon him by statute. General order 5 makes it his duty to "take proceeding for the declaration and payment of dividends." Dividend meetings are most generally called for at the request of creditors, or, in many cases, they would never be called. In such cases creditors often aver that the assignee has funds, &c. The practice then is to order the assignee to file accounts from which this fact can be ascertained, or otherwise inform the register upon the subject. When the fact is ascertained the register exercises a discretion—calling or not calling a meeting as the facts may warrant. It is clear from section twenty-eight that the meeting asked for, not being the final meeting, should not be called except for cause shown. See In re Son [Case No. 13,174].

[1] [Reprinted by permission.]

And I further certify that on the fourth day of November inst., I was served with a paper to which was appended divers printed papers, being accounts and so forth, raising the point that it is my duty by law to grant the order so applied for, and requesting me to certify the point so raised to the court; and I further certify that before I had sufficient time to prepare said certificate I was served—to wit, on the eighth day of November—with an order of this court requiring me to call a meeting of creditors or certify the point so raised as aforesaid. I have not been served with a copy of the petition upon which said order is founded, and am ignorant of what it may allege. But in obedience to said order I certify that under rule six of this court, and the ruling in Re Son [supra], it is the duty of the register to ascertain for what purpose the meeting is asked, and whether there be any funds for distribution. That without such information on the subject, I cannot be called upon to exercise the discretion, which the act devolves upon me the duty of exercising, upon an application of this character. I have therefore waited in the hope of receiving such information so that I might intelligently pass upon the application. In Re Littlefield [Case No. 8,398], Lowell, J., in speaking of the second and third meetings of creditors which had been held, says: "The meetings in this case having been called by order of the court, it must be presumed that good cause was shown for the action of the court in the premises." And I further certify that from my knowledge of this case, and from what has transpired before me, I do not understand that it is the purpose of the assignee or his counsel, that a further dividend should be declared at the meeting asked for. But if the contrary be shown, or if reasonable grounds of any character whatsoever for calling such meeting be made to appear, I shall most cheerfully grant the order asked for. All of which is respectfully submitted.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. I think the register had the authority to make the order of November sixth, eighteen hundred and seventy-one, and I concur in his views in regard to the calling of a third general meeting of creditors in this case.

Case No. 2,808.

In re CLARK et al.

[6 N. B. R. 202.][1]

District Court, S. D. New York. Nov. 23, 1871.

BANKRUPTCY — OBJECTIONS TO PROOF OF DEBT—CERTIFICATION.

When written objections to a proof of debt are filed with the register and testimony is taken thereon, it is his duty, if requested by either party, to certify the same to the district judge for decision, even though no proof whatever be offered tending to invalidate the debt so proved.

[On certificate of I. T. Williams, Register:]

I, the undersigned register in charge of the above entitled matter, do hereby certify that on the second of August, eighteen hundred and seventy, Thomas D. James made proof before me of his claim against the said estate in due form of law. That on the third day of April, eighteen hundred and seventy-one, the assignee, by C. W. Bangs, his attorney, objected in writing to said claim, and filed said objection with me. That on the second day of November inst. the said Thomas D. James voluntarily appeared before me in person, and the said assignee, by Mr. F. N. Bangs, his counsel, also voluntarily appeared and stated that they desired to take proof of said claim, whereupon the said James was by me duly sworn and proceeded to give testimony. That at the close of said testimony, the said Bangs stated that he desired to state a question and have it certified to the court. He then wrote and signed a paper and handed it to the said James, who thereupon, at the request of Mr. Bangs, signed the same. And I further certify that in my judgment no "point or matter" is raised upon the said papers within the meaning of the sixth section of the act. The words "point or matter arising" in said section must be construed so as to harmonize with the other provisions of the act. It cannot be that everything that a register is required to do can, at the request of a party, be carried before the judge. The order of reference in this case directs the register "to take such proceedings therein as are required by the said act." The act requires the register, in addition to divers specified things, "to sit in chambers and dispatch there such part of the administrative business of the court and such uncontested matters as should be defined in general rules and orders, or as the district judge shall in any particular matter direct."

[1] [Reprinted by permission.]

Now if, upon the papers herewith presented, any point or matter is raised which is not equally raised by every other act a register may do, such point or matter is not perceived by me. The proof of debt, filed the second day of August, eighteen hundred and seventy, established prima facie the right of Mr. James to be placed on the list of unsecured creditors for the sum of one thousand one hundred and twenty-nine dollars and sixty-three cents, principal and interest. The objection to this claim made it proper, and gave both him and the assignee an opportunity to submit such evidence as each might see fit to offer. They have had this opportunity; Mr. James has but repeated the testimony which he gave in his deposition of August second, eighteen hundred and seventy. The assignee offers nothing, but asks that the "point or matter raised" be certified to the judge. How, then, does the case differ from what it would have been had the assignee or any creditor asked to have the point or matter raised on the deposition of August second, certified to the court? Except, perhaps, that there is less reason for such a certifying up, as the deposition of November second gives the proof more circumstantially and more fully than the law seems to require in the deposition of August second. It is perfectly plain that if this may be required to be certified, the register may be compelled to certify every deposition of a creditor proving his debt, when asked to do so by an assignee or a creditor. Such a practice, it is certain, would not be tolerated by the court. It is my custom, and I believe the custom of most of the registers throughout the country, under the decision of this court in Re Orne [Case No. 10,582] to examine upon my own motion, into claims upon which suspicion is thrown either by the assignee or by a creditor, giving to either party if not satisfied with the conclusion to which I have come, an opportunity to have it certified to the judge for decision. I therefore submit that this matter should be remitted to the register to proceed thereon according to law. Respectfully submitted.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. I am of opinion that the facts set forth in the certificate of the register show a case within the provision of the fourth section of the act, that in all matters where an issue of fact or of law is raised and contested by any party to the proceedings before a register, it shall be his duty to cause the question or issue to be stated by the opposing parties in writing, and he shall adjourn the same into court for decision by the judge. In the present case the opposing parties have stated in writing the question or issue. I think on the evidence that all of the claim of Mr. James is allowable, except the item of ten dollars and fifty-six cents.

Case No. 2,809.

In re CLARK et al.

[6 N. B. R. 204.][1]

District Court, S. D. New York. Nov. 23, 1871.

ORDER BY REGISTER IN BANKRUPTCY OF PAYMENT OF ACCOUNTS.

When the register gave notice at the second meeting of creditors called only under the twenty-seventh section of the act [14 Stat. 530], that the accounts of the assignee filed at such meeting would not be audited or passed at such meeting, as no notice of such auditing or passing had been given to creditors, and as the amounts had not been on file ten days, as required by the twenty-eighth section of the act, Held, on an application by the assignee to the district judge to compel the register to order the payment of such accounts, that the register was right in refusing to make such order.

[On certificate of I. T. Williams, Register:]

I, the undersigned register in charge of this matter, do hereby certify and report, that a petition was filed with me on the twentieth day of November inst., by the assignee in these proceedings, John S. Beecher, Esq., reciting that on the twenty-ninth day of March, eighteen hundred and seventy-one, a second general meeting of the creditors of the said bankrupts was held before me, at which time the said assignee filed a report and an account; that at said meeting no objection was made to the said accounts or any item therein, and that at the said meeting a dividend of six per cent. was declared and ordered to be paid; that no order has been made auditing or passing said accounts, or determining or adjusting the balance of money with which the assignee was then chargeable and applying to the register in charge to make an order: "First. That the said credit be allowed and the amount of the balance of money with which the said assignee is chargeable, after allowing him the said credits claimed by him, is fixed, determined and adjusted, at the sum of nineteen thousand three hundred and ninety-nine dollars and sixty-six cents, and the said account is audited and passed accordingly. Second. A dividend of six per cent. having been duly ordered to be paid by the creditors present at said meeting, it is further ordered that the same be paid by means of checks, to be countersigned by the said register, pursuant to a dividend list (form thirty-eight,) to be furnished to the assignee by the register." The said petition further prays that if the register refuse to grant said application or decide not to grant the same, that then the petitioner, upon said application and upon said accounts to said petition annexed, raised the point that it is by law the duty of the register to grant said application, and requests the register to certify to the court the point so raised.

[1] [Reprinted by permission.]

I, the said register, having decided not to grant said application, do, pursuant to said request, now certify: That the said second meeting so above referred to, was ordered under the provisions of the twenty-seventh section of the bankrupt act, and not under the twenty-eighth; that the notice of said meeting given to creditors was as follows: "This is to give notice that the second general meeting of the creditors of said bankrupts will be held at 27 Chambers street, in the city of New York, on the twenty-ninth day of March, eighteen hundred and seventy-one, at one o'clock p. m., at the office of and before Isaiah T. Williams, Esq., register in bankruptcy, pursuant to an order made by said register, for the purposes named in the twenty-seventh section of the bankrupt act of March, eighteen hundred and sixty-seven;" that no other or different notice was given to said creditors of said meeting; that at said meeting the said assignee presented his accounts for the first time; that the register took said accounts and stated to the meeting in substance that the said accounts would then be filed and that they could be examined thereafter by any creditors who desired to examine the same, and that they would not be audited or passed until the final meeting of creditors, and thereupon made an entry to that effect, to which ruling no one then and there in anywise objected; that said accounts were not nor were any or either of them examined by the register or by any creditors to his knowledge; that the same were then filed in the office of the register where they have ever since remained, and have since that time been examined by several of the creditors, most of whom, so for as the knowledge of the register extends, have objected to the same; that on the nineteenth day of October, ult., written objections and a protest against said claims were filed with me. And I further certify that it has always been and is now the uniform practice, where it is proposed to ask to have the accounts of the assignee audited and passed, to order the meeting under the twenty-eighth section of the act, and to require the assignee to file his accounts before such meeting is ordered, and then under the order for such meeting to give notice to the creditors ten days before such meeting that such accounts have been filed with the register, and that the assignee will apply at such meeting for a settlement of the same under the twenty-eighth section of the act. And I further certify, that in my opinion, the order asked for in said petition would have the effect to mislead and betray the said creditors touching their rights, and in my judgment would be a violation of the letter and spirit of the provisions of the bankrupt act in such case made. But I forbear to enter further into the discussion of the case, deeming it unnecessary to do so and for the further reason that I am informed that should the court desire to hear an argument upon the questions now raised, Mr. L. R. Marsh, of counsel for the Continental Bank, Mr. E. L. Fancher, of counsel for the Ocean Bank, and divers other creditors by their respective counsel, will submit either oral arguments or written points.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. In view of the statements made by the register to the second meeting of creditors, I think he is correct in refusing to make the order applied for so far as the first direction therein is concerned. As to the second direction, I understand the certificate as not applying to it.

Case No. 2,810.

In re CLARK.

[9 N. B. R. (1874) 67.][1]

District Court, S. D. New York.

REGISTER IN BANKRUPTCY — COUNTERSIGNING CHECKS—OBJECTION TO ASSIGNEE'S ACCOUNT.

1. The duty of countersigning checks devolved upon the register by the act is a judicial and not a ministerial duty.

2. Creditors are not bound to object to the assignee's account save at a meeting called pursuant to the provisions of the twenty-eighth section of the act [14 Stat. 530].

[Cited in Re Brunquest, Case No. 2,055.]

[On certificate of I. T. Williams, Register in Bankruptcy:]

I, the undersigned register in charge of the above entitled matter, do hereby certify the facts of this case as follows:

That on the 27th day of March, 1871, a meeting of the creditors of the estate of Bininger & Clark, also a meeting of the creditors of the separate estates of said bankrupts was called by an order of the register, under the provisions of the twenty-seventh section of the act, and not pursuant to the provisions of the twenty-eighth section of the act. That at the time said meeting was so called no accounts of any kind whatever had been filed with me by said assignee; that the notice of said meeting sent to creditors contained no notice that the assignee would apply at said meeting for the settlement of his accounts, or for a discharge of his liabilities as assignee, as is required by the twenty-eighth section of said act; that no accounts were filed until the said meeting was actually being held; that said meeting was then adjourned, nothing whatever being done save the filing of said accounts; that after several adjournments, said meeting came on to be, and was, held on the 9th day of October, 1871, at which meeting there was no attendance of any person save Mr. F. N. Bangs acting for the assignee, and Mr. Addoms, a creditor, or an attorney for one of the creditors; that it appeared from the said account then filed that the sum of thirteen thousand nine hundred and fifteen dollars and eighty-three cents had come to the hands of the assignee from the separate estate of the said Clark; that the assignee had paid therefrom to Messrs. Bangs, Sedgwick & North, the sum of two thousand five hundred and seventy-three dollars and eleven cents for their professional services and disbursements in said separate estate, and to the register in charge thereof the sum of ninety-seven dollars and ninety-five cents, and that claims were prosecuted against said estate as follows:

[1] [Reprinted by permission.]

Messrs. Bangs, Sedgwick & North, for professional services and disbursements	$5,187 09
The applicant as assignee	238 16
The register, for fees	350 00

As a majority in amount of the creditors were not present at said meeting, it devolved upon the assignee to fix the amount of the dividend, and thereupon the said Bangs, for the said assignee, declared a dividend of ten per cent. upon the undisputed claims against said separate estate. For the payment of which said dividend, amounting in all to one thousand and forty-nine dollars and eight cents, checks were duly countersigned by me and delivered to the said Bangs for said creditors; that I did not audit or pass said accounts at said meeting, but, on the contrary, duly ruled and gave notice at said meeting to the effect that I would not audit or pass said accounts until the final meeting of the creditors, at which meeting they would have received the notice required by the twenty-eighth section of the act, and made an entry to that effect, to which no one dissented or in any manner objected; that on the same day Mr. Bangs, for the said assignee, drew divers checks for the payment of said claims, to wit: checks for the payment of the said sum of five thousand one hundred and eighty-seven dollars and nine cents, to the order of the said Bangs, Sedgwick & North, for the payment of their said claims for professional services and disbursements; a check for the said sum of two hundred and thirty-eight dollars and sixteen cents, payable to the order of the said assignee, for the payment of his said claim for his commissions as assignee, and a check for the said sum of three hundred and fifty dollars, to the order of the register, for the payment of his said claim for register's fees in this matter; that I declined to countersign said checks so payable to the order of the said Bangs, Sedgwick & North without some proof that the services charged by them had been rendered, and that they were necessary and proper, and were reasonably worth the sums charged for the same, and thereupon I drafted an affidavit to that effect for the said Bangs, Sedgwick & North to verify the said claim; that the same was presented to said Bangs and he declined to swear to it, whereupon I declined to deliver the said checks; that afterwards, and on the 31st day of October, the said Bangs for said assignee, filed with me written objections to my said claim, and on the 19th day of October, 1871, divers creditors filed with me written objections to the claim of the said Bangs, Sedgwick & North, protesting against the same. And I further certify, that in my opinion, if it be the law that the register is bound to pass all accounts of the assignee, and pay all claims presented by him, at the second meeting of creditors, which are not at such second meeting objected to by creditors, this case, under the circumstances above set forth, should be an exception to such rule. But the order asked for would require me to audit those accounts and pass them, not at such sums and amounts as I might think just, but at such sums and amounts as the assignee has thought fit to set down. This would have the effect to strip the language of the act of all its force, and efficacy. "Audit" means "to hear, examine, adjust, pass upon, and settle the account * * * in its nature it requires the exercise of judgment." Morris v. People, 3 Denio, 391.

I cannot think that the duty of countersigning checks devolved upon me by the act is a mere mechanical duty. The law is settled otherwise. See People v. Wood, 35 Barb. 653, 657. The court say, "It is their duty (officers required to countersign checks, &c.,) to inform themselves in regard to it and countersign or refuse as they may deem proper after such investigation." But were my duties less strictly and clearly defined, there is something in this case that almost suggests the exercise of even doubtful powers. Here is an assignee who has received from the separate estate of one of the bankrupts the sum of thirteen thousand nine hundred and fifteen dollars and eighty-three cents. He shows at the meeting that he has paid therefrom to his counsel, for their services and disbursements in said separate estate, the sum of two thousand five hundred and seventy-three dollars and eleven cents; that they claim for similar services and disbursements the further sum of five thousand one hundred and eighty-seven dollars and nine cents, amounting in all to the sum of seven thousand seven hundred dollars and twenty cents. At the same meeting he declares a dividend to creditors which amounts in all to one thousand and forty-nine dollars and eight cents, leaving the balance of what remains in his hands for his future action. Add to this the fact that the counsel making this claim was unable or unwilling to swear to the rendition and value of their services as required by me; and I cannot but think that had I yielded to the pressure and countersigned those checks I should neither have been secure upon my official bond nor innocent upon my oath of office.

NOTE [from original report]. The animus in the above opinion is so apparent as to render it utterly valueless as authority, but we print it to point a moral: to call the attention of the law makers to the necessity of a carefully prepared clause to secure the conscientious auditing of assignees' accounts, and to prevent estates in bankruptcy being eaten up by assignees, their counsel, and registers.

Case No. 2,811.

In re CLARK et al.

[17 N. B. R. 554.][1]

District Court, S. D. New York. May 8, 1878.

VACATING PROVISIONAL WARRANT.

A provisional warrant issued in voluntary proceedings upon papers regular on their face, and upon proof by affidavit of facts showing that it was very necessary for the protection of the estate, will not be vacated where such facts are not disproved and it appears that the purpose of the bankrupts in making the motion is to deprive the marshal of his fees, and this whether it was one which the court had power to issue or not.

[In the matter of James A. Clark, a bankrupt.]

Hugh Porter, for motion.
Wm. F. Scott, contra.

CHOATE, District Judge. Motion to vacate a provisional warrant. The bankrupts filed their voluntary petition March 28, 1878. April 4th, and before adjudication, this warrant was issued, on affidavit of a creditor showing that the property of the firm was not safe in the hands of the bankrupts. The affidavit also stated that an adjudication had been made. The bankrupts gave notice of this motion on proof that an adjudication had not been made, and on affidavits tending to disprove in part the facts alleged in the moving papers as to the danger of allowing the bankrupts to retain possession. Before the hearing of the motion, an adjudication was made and an assignee appointed. The averment in the creditor's affidavit, that an adjudication had been made, was made by mistake. It is now insisted that the court had no power, in a voluntary case, to issue a provisional warrant before adjudication. But, without determining this question, the motion must be denied. The only object of vacating the warrant since the appointment of an assignee, is to deprive the marshal of his charges for the custody of the property, as a charge on the estate. This is the avowed purpose of the bankrupts in pressing this motion. The warrant was issued on papers in any view regular on their face, and upon proof by affidavit of facts showing that it was very necessary for the protection of the estate, facts which the affidavits now produced in behalf of this motion do not disprove. Under these circumstances it would be highly unjust to deprive the marshal of his proper charges incurred in good faith, and whether the warrant was one which the court had power to issue or not. I do not feel called upon to vacate it. Motion denied.

[1] [Reprinted by permission.]

Case No. 2,812.

In re CLARK et al.

[36 Leg. Int. 414;[1] 19 N. B. R. 301.]

District Court, D. New Jersey. Sept., 1879.

OPPOSING BANKRUPT'S DISCHARGE.

In order to defeat a discharge on any of the grounds set forth in section 5110, Rev. St. U. S. (Bankrupt Law), the creditors must take the initiative. The court will not become the actor when interested parties are quiet.

[In the matter of James S. and John N. Clark, bankrupts.]

NIXON, District Judge. This is an application for a discharge by two partners, the firm having been adjudicated bankrupt. The register has made a special report in the case. He says that the bankrupts have conformed to all the modal requirements of the law, and that he recommends their discharge, unless the court will take notice of their violation of the fifth clause of section 5110 of the bankrupt act, without any appearance of opposing creditors or specification against their discharge. No creditor has formally resisted their application for a discharge; but an extended examination of the bankrupts before the register, pending the proceedings in bankruptcy, shows quite conclusively that the applicants had given fraudulent preferences, contrary to the provisions of the law, by the payment to a number of their creditors, in full, when they were hopelessly insolvent, and knew that they were so.

It has been held, and I think, properly, that in order to defeat a discharge on any of the grounds set forth in section 5110, the creditors must take the initiative. In re Schuyler [Case No. 12,494]; In re Rosenfeld [Id. 12,057]. If they do not enter an appearance and file specifications they are not regarded as opposing the discharge, but, on the contrary, as assenting to it. The court cannot be expected to become the actor, when interested parties are quiet, except in those cases where there is a question whether the modal requirements of the law have been complied with. The discharge will be granted.

[1] [Reprinted from 36 Leg. Int. 414, by permission.]

CLARK, IN RE. See Cases Nos. 2,842–2,844.
CLARK (ABBE v.). See Case No. 5.

Case No. 2,813.

CLARK v. BAILEY.

[Nowhere reported; opinion not now accessible.]

Case No. 2,814.

CLARK et al. v. BAILEY.

WORK et al. v. BAILEY.

[12 Blatchf. 156;[1] 19 Int. Rev. Rec. 207.]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. June 16, 1874.[2]

INTERNAL REVENUE—TAX ON BANK CAPITAL—"DEPOSITS OF MONEY SUBJECT TO CHECK OR DRAFT."

1. Whether the mere business of buying, carrying and selling stocks for others, on the deposit of money or property as a "margin" for their security, would come within the definition in the 79th section of the act of June 30, 1864 (13 Stat. 251), as originally enacted, and as amended by the 9th section of the act of July 13, 1866 (14 Stat. 115), describing "bankers," quere.

2. Section 110 of the said act of June 30, 1864 (13 Stat. 277) as amended by the 9th section of the said act of July 13, 1866 (14 Stat. 136), declaring that there shall be levied, collected and paid "a tax of one twenty-fourth of one per centum, each month, * * * upon the capital of any bank, association, company or corporation, and on the capital employed by any person in the business of banking, beyond the average amount invested in United States bonds," does not authorize or justify the levy or collection of a tax of one twenty-fourth of one per centum upon money borrowed, in the ordinary course of business, by a copartnership firm engaged in the business of banking.

3. A tax of one twenty-fourth of one per centum each month, upon the average amount of the deposits of money subject to payment by check or draft, is leviable and collectable, under said section 110, even though interest at an agreed rate is allowed and paid on such deposits.

4. But, securities or money left as a pledge, for indemnity, to save the pledgee from loss on purchasing or selling stocks for his customer, are not "deposits of money subject to payment by check or draft."

[See note at end of case.]

[At law. Separate actions by Luther C. Clark and others, comprising the firm of Clark, Dodge & Co., and by Frank Work and others, against Joshua F. Bailey, collector of internal revenue, to recover back taxes imposed and collected.]

John E. Burrill, for plaintiff.

George Bliss, Dist. Atty., for defendant.

WOODRUFF, Circuit Judge. 1. I am of opinion, that, at the respective times when the taxes were imposed and collected, for recovering back which the plaintiffs in the first above named action bring their suit, they were bankers doing business as such, within the definition given in the acts of congress of June 30, 1864, and July 13, 1866 (13 Stat. 251, § 79; 14 Stat. 115, subd. 1). Besides their business of purchasing stocks, advancing money therefor, and, in the language of those engaged in such business, "carrying them on a margin," they had "a place of business where credits were opened by the deposit of money * * subject to be paid upon draft, check, or order."

Whether the mere business of buying, carrying, and selling stocks for others, on the deposit of money or property as a "margin" for their security, would come within the definition in the statute describing "bankers," and, therefore, whether the plaintiffs in the second above suit are or are not bankers, the conclusion I have formed on the point next to be stated renders it unnecessary to determine. They did no other business.

2. I am of opinion that the terms of section 110 of the act of June 30, 1864, as amended by the 9th section of the act of July 13, 1866 (13 Stat. 277; 14 Stat. 136), declaring that there shall be levied, collected, and paid "a tax of one twenty-fourth of one per centum, each month, * * upon the capital of any bank, association, company, or corporation, and on the capital employed by any person in the business of banking, beyond the average amount invested in United States bonds," do not authorize nor justify the levy or collection of a tax of one twenty-fourth of one per centum upon money borrowed, in the ordinary course of business, by a copartnership firm engaged in the business of banking.

The term "capital," in the statute, has its ordinary signification, as universally used in trade, commerce, manufacturing, and other specific business. It is that stock in trade which, irrespective of particular transactions or dealings, constitutes the basis of credit, or the fund belonging to the person, invested in the business. It is money or property appropriated to the purposes of the business of a person or firm, analogous to the capital in a corporation, derived or derivable from the contribution of stockholders, and denominated "capital stock."

Under the act of June 30, 1864, there was some uncertainty in the application of the terms used, when applied to a mere individual or firm. By the 110th section of that act (13 Stat. 277) the tax was directed to be levied each month "upon the average amount of the capital of any bank, association, company, or corporation, or person, engaged in the business of banking, beyond the amount invested in United States bonds." When a person was found engaged in the business of banking, it was not clear that, as he answered the description in the statute, the tax was not to be levied on all of his capital, however invested or employed. The same individual or firm might be engaged in the business of banking, and, at the same time, have capital employed in manufacturing or otherwise. In a comprehensive sense, his or their capital would embrace all, and it might, perhaps, not be permitted to hold that the capital to be taxed was, under that statute, only such part of his capital as was employed in banking. The act of 1866 removed this doubt. Where an individual or firm appropriated a portion of his or their capital to manufacturing or other distinct business, and another portion to the business of banking, this statute of 1866 made a discrimination, and confined the tax to the latter. So, it might often be true of an individual, that, in reliance upon his known wealth, he commenced and carried on a large business as a banker, when the largest portion of that wealth was invested in real estate. In popular sense, such a man is called a "capitalist," defined to be "usually a man of large property, which is or may be employed in business." Under the act of 1864, what was the "capital" of such a person? It was not easy to say, unless, by construction, it was held to mean, what the act of 1866 makes it mean, the capital employed in the business of banking, i. e., such portion of his wealth as he might, either at the beginning, or from time to time, withdraw from other investment or other uses, and employ, either in the form of money or securities or property, for the carrying on of his business as a banker.

[1] [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

[2] [Affirmed in Bailey v. Clark, 21 Wall. (88 U. S.) 284.]

In the case of a copartnership, the meaning of the term "capital" is very closely analogous to the same term applied to a corporation. It is the capital stock, or stock in trade. It is the basis of the joint adventures —the contribution of the several copartners —a ground upon which, in general, distribution of profits proceeds, in whole or in part.

The plaintiffs in each of these cases are a copartnership firm, having a capital contributed, in money or property, to the uses of the joint business. In a supposable case, such capital may not be limited to the original contribution, nor even to any definite sum named in articles of copartnership, but may include successive further contributions or advances by the partners for the purposes of such business. On that possible case, it is, however, not material to dwell, as nothing in these cases raises such a question. It is suggested in order to avoid a different inference from what it is intended to hold. So, also, in a supposable case, the capital of a firm may consist, in part, or even in whole, of money or property borrowed to be employed as capital, as the basis of the financial reputation and credit of a firm, and, as between the lender and the creditors of the firm, to be at the risk of the business. No doubt, a member of a copartnership often borrows a portion, and sometimes the whole, of his contribution to the capital stock, from personal friends. It may be lent for the very purpose of such contribution, and so become, in every sense, a part of the capital or stock in trade. No doubt, all of the members of a copartnership, and even the firm in its joint capacity, may procure such special advances, to be placed, as between the lenders and the copartnership creditors, at the risk of the business, as the basis of copartnership credit, and to constitute the fund to which creditors may look as their security, before the lender is permitted to withdraw it. This suggestion is also made in order to exclude the contrary inference, and not because any such state of facts exists in these cases.

It is not according to the ordinary use of language, and, as I think, not according to any proper use of language, to say, of a mercantile firm, that every discount which they procure at bank is so much added to their capital; and yet, if they buy goods with the proceeds, they use such proceeds in their business. It would not satisfy the demands of common honesty, if a man, engaged in business of any kind, being asked the amount of capital employed in his business, should include in his reply all the sums which, in the conduct of his business, he had borrowed and had not yet repaid. When the debts of a copartnership are paid, what remains is capital, or capital and profits, as the case may be.

The argument in support of the tax on money borrowed in the ordinary course of the business, assumes that "capital employed by any person in the business" means precisely what "the money or property employed by any person in the business" would mean, and so it includes all money, however derived. This begs the whole question. It deprives the word "capital" of any distinctive meaning. It withdraws it from its intimate association with the other part of the sentence, and the meaning of the same word, "capital" there applied to an association or company. It overlooks the consideration, that no reason exists why a copartnership should pay this tax on borrowed money, when an association or company, (not necessarily incorporated,) in any other form, should not. It would give to the term "capital" a new and unusual meaning. It would make every bank discount an addition to capital. The statute does not so read. It would have been easy, very easy, to say so in terms, if congress had so intended.

It is not an insignificant circumstance, that, by the act of June 6, 1872, 17 Stat. 256, congress expressly enacted, that the words "capital employed," in said 110th section, "shall not include moneys borrowed or received from day to day, in the usual course of business, from any person not a partner of, or interested in, the said bank, association, or firm." It is possible to say that this statute changed the law. But it seems to me that the language is better adapted to declare the construction and meaning of the law. It would have been easy and appropriate, if that alone was the design, to say that hereafter money so borrowed shall not be liable to the tax. My opinion, that the terms employed did not include money so borrowed, renders it unnecessary to do more than say that this further enactment is not inconsistent with that view, and may well have been passed in order to remove any doubt theretofore entertained on the subject.

I have not overlooked the suggestion in behalf of the defendant, that this construction of the statute enables persons having a very small capital to carry on a very large business of the kind now in question—buying stocks on commission, "carrying" them, by borrowing thereon the amount required to pay for them, and selling them when directed by the customer, and paying the loan without paying the specified tax on the money used for the purpose. This may be so. I do not know how large a capital may be necessary to the establishment of such a financial credit as will secure to a person or a firm a large patronage from stock dealers or speculators. But the answer is, that the statute does not declare money borrowed for the purposes of the ordinary and daily conduct of the business, taxable. Had it been intended to tax such money, it was easy to say so. If the evil urged required remedy, it was easy to correct it, and it was for the legislature to correct, and it is not for the courts to give a forced and unnatural meaning to language, for that purpose.

The result of these considerations is, that the tax levied and collected from these plaintiffs in both cases was illegal, and the necessary preliminary proceedings, protest, appeal, and suit in due season, having, as admitted, been taken by them, they are entitled to recover.

3. As to the firm of Clark, Dodge & Company, the plaintiffs in the first of the above named cases, I am of opinion that they were liable to the tax levied and collected, each month, upon the average amount of the deposits of money subject to payment by check or draft. That they received such deposits in their business is distinctly proved, and the amounts are shown, entirely distinct from moneys borrowed, in the statements put in evidence. The circumstance that they allowed and paid their depositors interest, at some agreed rate, does not affect this question. The same is done in favor of depositors by very many duly incorporated banks in this city and elsewhere. But, securities or money left with either of the above plaintiffs as a pledge for their indemnity, to save them from loss on purchasing or selling stocks for the customer, are not of this character. They are not "moneys subject to payment by check or draft," in any just sense of those terms, as applied to moneys deposited with a bank or banker.

Judgments in these cases must be entered for the plaintiffs, in conformity with this opinion. The amounts are mere matters of computation, from the statements of the taxes paid, admitted and used on the trial. If the parties do not agree on the computation, I will settle the amount on entering the judgment herein.

[NOTE. "The term 'capital' employed by a banker in the business of banking, in the 110th section of the revenue act of July 15, 1866, does not include moneys borrowed by him from time to time temporarily, in the ordinary course of his business. It applies only to the property or moneys of the banker set apart from other uses and permanently invested in the business." Mr. Justice Field, in Bailey v. Clark, 21 Wall. (88 U. S.) 284, on error by the plaintiff to the circuit court.]

CLARK (BEECHER v.). See Case No. 1,223.

Case No. 2,815.

CLARK v. BININGER.

[Cited in Lamson v. Burton, Case No. 12,285. Nowhere reported; opinion not now accessible.]

CLARK (BOWEN v.). See Case No. 1,721.

Case No. 2,816.

CLARK v. BURNHAM.

[2 Story, 1.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Maine. May Term, 1837.

STATUTE OF FRAUDS — MEMORANDUM — SUBSTITUTION OF PAROL AGREEMENT—RESULTING TRUST.

1. Where an agreement was made for the purchase of lands, and the following paper was given,—"Ellsworth, Dec. 15, 1834. Received of Daniel Burnham and Cyrus S. Clark, one thousand dollars, to be accounted for if they shall furnish me satisfactory security for certain lands on the Naraguagus river, say one hundred and nineteen thousand acres, for one hundred and thirteen thousand dollars, on or before Friday morning next; otherwise to be forfeited. John Black,"—it was held to be a sufficient memorandum of the terms of sale, under the statute of frauds.

[Cited in Williams v. Morris, 95 U. S. 456.]

2. By a parol agreement having been subsequently substituted therefor, by which the said land was transferred, by deed, to other persons than those therein mentioned, and a bill being brought by Clark to recover a certain part from the grantees, as a resulting trust to him, it was held, that the written memorandum only created a presumption of a resulting trust, which could be rebutted by proof; and proof being given, that Clark did not advance any portion of the purchase money, as stated in the memorandum, it was held, that he was not entitled to a resulting trust, and that the contract was within the statute of frauds.

[Cited in Smith v. Burnham, Case No. 13,019.]

Bill in equity. The bill, in substance, states, that about December 15th, 1834, Clark and Burnham entered into an informal contract with John Black, agent of the devisees named in William Bingham's will, for the purchase of sundry large tracts of land, in different parts of Maine, (particularly described in the bill) for which there was to be paid $113,000 as nearly as recollected; of which agreement, a memorandum was then made, and signed by said Black, and, by consent of Clark, delivered to Burnham; and which Burnham is called on to produce in court—by which agreement, Black was to give bond to Clark and Burnham, conditioned to give them a deed or deeds of said lands, on payment of the sum above named; that Clark and Burnham then paid Black $1,000, in equal portions, in part of consideration, the same being to be forfeited, if the contract should not be completed; that, afterwards, about the 19th of said December, it was agreed between Clark and Burnham, that David Webster should be interested in the purchase one half, Burnham three eighths, and Clark one eighth, in common; but that it was farther arranged and agreed, that the bond or bonds to be given by Black should be conditioned to convey the lands to Burnham and Webster only; and that they should be the obligees; and that, in this manner, Clark's one eighth should be secured to Burnham in trust for Clark. That bonds or contracts were accordingly so given by Black to Burnham and Webster, for conveyance of the said lands, on payment, as before mentioned, of the sum of $113,000, by five instalments; the first of which was payable in 60 days from December 15th, 1834; the second on December 15th, 1835; the third on December 15th, 1836; the fourth on December 15th, 1837, and the fifth on December 15th, 1838. That in consequence of the above agreement and arrangement with Clark, and of his giving up all his interest in the contract, except the one eighth, and the sum of $500, advanced to Black, Burnham engaged, on request, to assign and transfer to Clark one eighth part of his interest in the said contract and lands, and return to Clark the balance of the $500, after deducting one eighth of the said $1,000 paid as aforesaid. That on December 22nd, Clark demanded of Burnham such transfer and assignment, it being before any payment became due; but that he fraudulently refused to do it. That Clark was ready to pay his proportion of the said instalment on receiving such assignment, and of the other instalments, as they should become due.

[1] [Reported by William W. Story, Esq.]

The answer was, in substance, as follows: The defendant first denies, that there was ever any contract in writing between the parties, in relation to the subject-matter of the bill, and pleads the statute of frauds in bar. And in support of his said plea, he answers, that some time in the first part of December, 1834, he had some conversation in Portland with one David Webster, touching the purchase of certain lands, which had been previously advertised by Black, and he then and there agreed with Webster to purchase the same in company with him; and then and there farther agreed to go immediately to Ellsworth, and secure the said purchase for himself and Webster, he, (Webster), being obliged to make a previous journey to the forks of the Kennebec, and agreeing to meet the defendant on Thursday, December 18th, and then proceed to Ellsworth, and close the purchase, if the defendant should succeed in securing the same. That the defendant, accordingly, left Portland on December 12th, and arrived in Bangor on the next day, where he found Clark, with whom he had no previous acquaintance, but whom he knew, by reputation, as a merchant, who had failed in Portland. That he had a conversation with Clark about the purchase of a tract of land, situated on Hog bay, in Hancock county, which the defendant thought could be purchased for three thousand dollars. That Clark proposed to become interested in the said purchase, and that they agreed to examine the said tract, and if it looked well, to purchase together. But that the defendant did not then inform Clark of his previous agreement with Webster, not deeming it prudent to inform any one of it, until the purchase should be secured, and intending to avail himself of the Hog bay purchase afterwards. That Clark and the defendant then went to Ellsworth in company, and on his arrival, this defendant called on Black, and told him of his and Webster's desire to purchase. It being Sunday, little was said, and the defendant agreed to call on the next day; and, on his return to the public house, informed Clark of the same; considering himself now safe, by having so notified Black. That some conversation then took place between Clark and the defendant about the quality of the lands, and of the defendant's and Webster's chance in making the said purchase; but nothing was then said about Clark's becoming interested; neither did this defendant then think of it, as he had never had it in contemplation to be interested with any one except Webster, and he also knew Clark's inability to engage in so large a speculation. That on the next day, the defendant called again on Black, and Clark went with him by invitation. That the defendant then stated to Black his agreement with Webster, and requested the refusal of the lands until Webster's arrival. Black, at first, peremptorily refused; stating, that Webster well knew that such was not his mode of doing business; that he did not know Burnham; and that, although he knew and had confidence in Webster, yet if he wished to make the purchase, he should have come in person, and closed the bargain at once. That the defendant and Black then had much conversation in Clark's presence; that the defendant urged Black to give the refusal, and stated the reason why Webster was not present; and that he did not wish the refusal for the purpose of speculating upon it, but for the purpose of purchase; and that he offered to deposit with Black one or two thousand dollars, to be forfeited if the lands were not taken by the time specified. That while this was going on, Clark occasionally made remarks, and put questions about the lands, and also made remarks going to induce Black to give the refusal; his object being, as this defendant supposed, to aid the defendant in obtaining the refusal. That Black finally consented to take one thousand dollars, as proposed, and to give the defendant the refusal, until the morning of the next Friday; that the defendant then paid to Black one thousand dollars of his own money, and that Black then gave him a written paper, of which the following is a copy, as near as the defendant can recollect: "Ellsworth, Dec. 15, 1834. Received of Daniel Burnham and Cyrus S. Clark, one thousand dollars, to be accounted for, if they shall furnish me satisfactory security for certain lands on the Naraguagus river, say one hundred and nineteen thousand acres for one hundred and thirteen thousand dollars, on or before Friday morning next; otherwise to be forfeited. John Black." That, on taking this paper, the defendant noticed the insertion of Clark's name, but did not think it worth his while to object to it, as the money was paid by the defendant, and the paper was in his own possession; and as he was accordingly anxious to secure the refusal, and did not consider the shape or form of the writing to be material. That after receiving the said writing, the defendant inquired of Black, if he would take some other responsible man in the place of Webster, in case he did not arrive by the time appointed; that the defendant made such inquiry, in order that he might be prepared, in case of any unforeseen occurrence, which might prevent the said arrival; that the defendant named R. M. N. Smyth, of Bangor, and that Black expressed his willingness to take him, and also some others named by defendant. That, after some other conversation, Clark and the defendant returned to their lodgings; that Clark then inquired whether he could not be interested in the purchase, and said he thought he could procure some responsible individuals to become interested with him, whose security would be satisfactory to Black; that the defendant expressed his willingness to let Clark take an interest, if Webster did not arrive; but if he did, no third partner could be admitted; but that the defendant should be glad to admit him if Webster did not arrive; and he, Clark, could procure such security, as would be satisfactory to Black; as the defendant had no idea of forfeiting his thousand dollars. That Clark then proposed to pay the defendant five hundred dollars, and to be considered interested in one half if Webster did not arrive; that the defendant at first refused, as he doubted Clark's ability, and had no doubt that Webster would arrive. But that Clark became urgent, in order that he might be considered as having the first claim in case of Webster's non-arrival, and that the defendant finally consented to take it, on this express condition, that if Webster did arrive, the money was to be returned, and Clark to be considered as no farther interested; and that Clark accordingly paid the defendant two hundred dollars, and gave him his note on demand for three hundred dollars more, which Clark agreed to pay, as soon as they should arrive in Bangor. In consequence of all which, and of the necessity of immediate action, the Hog bay speculation was deferred. That Clark and the defendant then returned to Bangor; and that Clark, then and there, as he informed defendant, tried to find some responsible individual to become interested, and make the cash payment, in case Webster did not arrive; and that Clark, also, as he told the defendant, tried to procure three hundred dollars, to pay his aforesaid note; but, as he informed defendant, he entirely failed in both attempts, and did not pay, or offer to pay the note. That the defendant also tried to find some responsible individual to take Webster's place, in case of his failure to arrive; but that the defendant was also unsuccessful; the magnitude of the undertaking, and its uncertainty, deterring all to whom defendant applied. That on Thursday, Webster did arrive, and expressed his readiness to complete the purchase; and that Clark then expressed his desire to be interested in some way, and said, that he was unable to purchase any part himself, or to procure any one to do so for him; but that he desired to have the right of pre-emption in one eighth, and wished the defendant to use his influence with Webster to procure it for him; that the defendant declined making any agreement with Clark about it, and told him that as Webster had arrived, he, Clark, had no claim on the purchase; and then offered to repay Clark his money and note, which Clark then declined receiving, stating, that he hoped to make some arrangement by which to become interested; that he admitted, that he had no claim to any part; and that the defendant then distinctly told Clark, that he had no wish to have any third person interested with them, and did not think, that Webster had; but that he finally agreed to sound Webster on the subject. That the defendant and Webster then went to Ellsworth, and on the way, the defendant hinted to Webster that there were others desirous of becoming interested with them, (one R. M. N. Smyth having also, after the arrival of Webster, expressed his desire to take a share,) but that Webster expressed himself so much averse to it, that the defendant dropped the subject, and did not, previous to the completion of the said purchase, mention Clark's name as in any way connected with it. That on arriving at Ellsworth on Friday, the defendant and Webster notified Black, and received a conveyance of the lands, and some others, for which they gave their joint and several notes for one hundred and thirteen thousand dollars, divided into five equal payments; that the said notes were dated December 15, 1834, the first being payable in sixty days, and the residue in one, two, three and four years from date; that the one thousand dollars advanced by the defendant was indorsed on one of the notes, and that the defendant gave up the receipt aforesaid to Black, retaining no copy. That after completing the said purchase, the defendant and Webster returned to Bangor, where the defendant again saw Clark, who then, to this defendant's astonishment, claimed to be interested in said purchase, by virtue of the insertion of his name in the paper afore described, and of having paid two hundred dollars and given his note for three hundred dollars. But that Clark did not then, or any other time, offer to pay or secure any part of the purchase-money of the said lands, or pretend, that he could or would furnish the said security; that the defendant then told Clark, that neither he nor Webster was willing to admit any other partner, especially one whose notes would not be acceptable to Black, or of any value in the market; neither could they give a bond of the lands, as they had given their own notes to a large amount, one fifth part of which must be paid in sixty days, and they relied on making a sale in order to meet said payment; that the defendant then recapitulated to said Clark all the circumstances of his connection with the transaction, declined admitting him to a share in the purchase, and offered him his note and money, which the said Clark then and there received, and this defendant then supposed the whole matter ended, so far as Clark was concerned. That shortly afterwards, and before the defendant left Bangor, Clark sued this defendant, and claimed to recover five hundred dollars for so much money had and received; that the defendant employed counsel to defend, but that the said suit was never entered; and why the said suit was commenced, the defendant could not conceive, except it might be for the purposes of intimidation. That the defendant and Webster left Bangor on Tuesday, December 23rd, and in the course of the same winter, before the expiration of the sixty days, contracted to sell all their interest in eleven sixteenths of the said purchase; that before the said sale was completed, the said first payment became due, and was made accordingly, deducting the aforesaid one thousand dollars advanced by the defendant to Black. That the defendant and Webster were enabled to make the said first payment, by reason of the said contract to sell eleven sixteenths; that accordingly, on the 19th of February, they completed the said sale; but that before it was completed, on the same day, the defendant was served with a subpoena to appear before Judge Ware, to answer to the said Clark, in a bill in equity, on Thursday, March 5th, 1835, at which time he appeared, and not being prepared with any evidence, an injunction was granted, restraining the defendant and Webster from selling the remaining five sixteenths. That this defendant has since understood, and believes, that the said Clark's object, in filing the said bill, was to embarrass the said sale, and force the defendant to a compromise of his inequitable claim, knowing the necessity, under which the defendant and Webster were, of making a sale, in order to make the first payment; that the defendant has understood and believes, that Clark has repeatedly so declared, —and that the said Clark has, in fact, much vexed and harassed the said Webster and the defendant, and prevented their making a sale up to the present time. That the defendant denies that any agreement, of the purport set forth in the bill, was ever made between the said Clark and the defendant, that Webster should become owner of one half, and the defendant of three eighths, and Clark of one eighth; or that the contract should be in the names of Webster and the defendant alone, and thus one eighth should be secured to the defendant, in trust for Clark; or that it was ever agreed by the defendant, on any consideration, to hold one eighth in trust for Clark; or, at his request, to assign one eighth to him; or that any part of the said five hundred dollars should be deducted, as part pay for the said one eighth; or that there was ever any understanding, express or implied, as to the points above specified between the said Burnham and Clark. The defendant further denies, that the said Clark ever demanded any transfer or assignment of the said eighth; or expressed his readiness to make his proportion of any payments, other than is hereinbefore stated; neither does the defendant believe, that the said Clark has ever, at any time, been ready or able to make said payments, or to give security therefor.

P. Mellen, for plaintiff.

W. P. Fessenden and Fessenden, for defendant.

STORY, Circuit Justice, delivered the opinion of the court, in substance, as follows: The present bill is not founded upon the original paper or receipt of John Black, given to the plaintiff and the defendant, dated on the 18th of December, 1834, and referred to in the bill and answer. Under that contract, if Clark (the plaintiff) is entitled to any part of the purchase from Black, he is entitled to a moiety, his name being used in that contract as one of the purchasers, and there being no other evidence to explain the interest of the purchaser. It has been said, that the receipt so signed by Black, is nothing but a naked receipt, and not a memorandum of any contract for the purchase of the lands. I think otherwise; and that however imperfect in its expressions, it purports to contain a memorandum of the terms of the purchase by Burnham and Clark, viz. the purchase of the lands (119,000 acres) on the Naraguagus river, for the sum of $113,000, to be received on or before the next Friday. The terms of the instrument are as follows: "Ellsworth, Dec. 15, 1834. Received of Daniel Burnham and Cyrus S. Clark one thousand dollars, to be accounted for, if they shall furnish me satisfactory security for certain lands on the Naraguagus river, say one hundred and nineteen thousand acres for one hundred and thirteen thousand dollars, on or before Friday morning next; otherwise to be forfeited. John Black." The money, according to the terms of the memorandum, was plainly to be paid and secured by Burnham and Clark, and the lands were to be conveyed or secured jointly to them upon their complying with the conditions of the contract. But there is the less need to dwell on this point, because it does not constitute the groundwork of the present bill.

The case made by the bill, and for which the plaintiff now seeks relief, is founded upon a subsequent substituted contract, by which the same lands were to be purchased on the joint account of David Webster and Burnham and Clark, in which Webster was to have one moiety, and Burnham three eighth parts, and Clark one eighth part; and that Clark's share was to be conveyed to Burnham in trust for Clark. The bill seeks from Burnham a conveyance of this one eighth part as a trust for Clark, upon the latter's paying and securing his proportion of the purchase-money. The answer denies, that there ever was any such substituted contract as the bill asserts; and insists on the benefit of the statute of frauds. It is clear that the substituted contract was not in writing. It is, therefore, a mere parol contract for the purchase of lands, and open to the objection of being within the statute of frauds, unless it constitutes a case of a resulting trust. But is the substituted contract itself sufficiently proved as an absolute, unconditional parol contract, as asserted in the bill? The answer positively denies it. The proofs are not clear to establish it. The most that can be said, is, that there is proof of some loose talk and indeterminate conversations between Burnham and Clark on the subject. It does not appear to me, that the court can, under such circumstances, say, that the contract itself is sufficiently proved. But if the substituted contract were sufficiently proved, as a parol contract, it would be within the statute of frauds, unless, at the time when it was entered into, Clark was entitled to a resulting trust in the lands, in virtue of the original contract of Burnham and himself with Black. Now, that depends upon this,—whether any part of the purchase-money of $1,000, paid to Black, belonged to Clark. If it did, then the argument is, that a resulting trust arises, by operation of law, in favor of Clark to the extent of the share of the purchase-money paid by him. The argument in its general bearing in cases of joint purchases, is sound; for where lands are purchased with the several funds of two persons, there arises a resulting trust in the land to each, according to his share of the purchase-money, in whosesoever name the conveyance may have been taken. See 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1206, and the cases there cited.

The defendant insists, that he paid one half of the sum of $1,000, which was delivered to Black for the purpose of securing the bargain. Now, the answer denies that any part of the money paid to Black was Clark's, or paid on Clark's account. It admits, however, a conditional agreement afterwards, to let Clark into an interest in the purchase, if Webster would consent; and that upon this agreement, $200 was paid in money to Burnham, by Clark, and a note given by him for the remaining $300. Afterwards the purchase was made exclusively by Burnham and Webster with Black, and they, and they alone, gave their notes and security for the whole purchase-money, in which Clark did not join; nor had any part in the final negotiation. The $200 were afterwards repaid by Burnham to Clark, and the note of $300 was also given up to him. Now, there is no sufficient proof, that the $500 was, at the time, paid by, or on account of, Clark: and, taking the whole evidence, it seems to me, that the final bargain for an interest in the land, by Clark, with Burnham, was a subsequent transaction; and no fixed agreement existed between them at the time, when the money was paid to Black, and the money then paid, was not in any part the money of Clark, but wholly of Burnham. It is true, that the memorandum purports, that the money was paid jointly by Burnham and Clark; and without that, the plaintiff would scarcely have any ground to stand upon. But this receipt creates only a presumption of a resulting trust for Clark; and a resulting trust may always be rebutted by counter parol evidence. Now, in the present case, the answer, which is responsive to the bill, expressly denies, that the money was paid to Black by, or on account of, Clark; and asserts, that it was all Burnham's own money, and paid upon his own sole account. At all events, the transaction is so obscure and doubtful in its circumstances, that a court of equity would not be warranted in pronouncing upon such imperfect materials, that there was a clear resulting trust for Clark. If there was any such trust, it would be in a moiety of the whole purchase then contemplated. Besides; there is another most important consideration in the case, and that is, that the money was not paid as a part of a present fixed bargain between the parties for the land. It was a mere deposit, to be forfeited if the purchase was not finally made, and satisfactory security given for the whole purchase-money ($113,000,) on or before the ensuing Friday morning. Now it is manifest that Clark never did give any such security; nor did he ever complete, or offer to complete, the bargain with Black; but it was completed exclusively by and in the names of Burnham and Webster, who gave their own satisfactory security therefor. Indeed, the whole evidence shows, that at this time Clark was utterly insolvent and had failed; and it is certainly extremely improbable, that Burnham would, under such circumstances, become liable in effect as surety for Clark for half the purchase-money; or that Clark would, as an insolvent debtor, attempt to purchase half the land. And yet this is his statement as to the original contract between Burnham and himself. The other fact is not less significant. Clark actually received back his $200, and his note for $300. Why was this done, if he was then understood to be an absolute co-purchaser of any part, much more of a moiety of the land, the purchase being admitted to have been an advantageous bargain? The receipt of the money and the note by Clark certainly furnish strong evidence, under the circumstances, that he either considered the bargain as to himself a conditional one with Burnham, or that he voluntarily waived it upon the ground of his utter inability to furnish satisfactory security for his own part of the purchase-money, or of his consciousness, that he had no claim upon the land, unless Webster would consent to let him in to a participation in the purchase, which Webster refused. The taking back, then, of his money and note by Clark has, or at least may justly have, a twofold operation. 1. As evidence pro tanto in support of the allegations in the answer. 2. As evidence of a deliberate waiver of any claim to the enforcement of any right or trust in the land. The bill does not allege any fraud, or mistake, or surprise, in thus taking back the money and note. If the plaintiff meant to rely upon such a ground, it was indispensable, that he should have stated it in his bill. So far from doing so, he silently passes over the whole transaction, as if it never had existed. Now, it seems difficult to suppose a case, where a court of equity would interfere to help a party who had deliberately waived his right under a contract voluntarily, and without any fraud, or mistake, or surprise. A waiver with full knowledge of all the facts, is, we all know, in many cases a complete defence at law, or a good bar to a defence at law, according to circumstances, where it is voluntarily made. Nay, the doctrine has gone farther, and it has been held, that, if made under a mistake of law with full knowledge of the facts, it binds the party. And equity in this respect generally follows the law. And here, again, I may repeat, that in such a transaction, so obscure and imperfect in its character and proof, a court of equity ought not to act, for the very reason, that the onus probandi is on the plaintiff, and the answer of the defendant admits no part of the case. But in reality, the bill proceeds, not upon the original agreement with Black, (for he is no party to the bill, nor is any relief asked or even pretended to exist with him); but upon an original parol agreement between Burnham and Clark, which was displaced by another substituted parol agreement between them, in which Clark's interest is reduced from a moiety to an eighth in the land. Now, it seems to me clear, that such an agreement, being for an interest in lands, is within the statute of frauds, and should be in writing; for the statute applies not only to legal interests, but to equitable interests and trusts in lands, except resulting trusts. That the present is not a resulting trust has been already stated.

Upon the whole, my judgment is, and the district judge concurs in it, that the bill must be dismissed with costs.

Case No. 2,817.

CLARK v. CHICAGO.

[4 Biss. 486.] [1]

Circuit Court, N. D. Illinois. March, 1868.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATION—NEGLIGENCE—STEPS IN SIDEWALKS—DUTY OF CITY—ICE UPON THE SIDEWALKS.

1. The mere existence of a descent or step in the sidewalks of a city is not such a defect as to render the city liable for accidents to passengers in stepping from one elevation to another; the question is, whether the sidewalk or descent was properly constructed, in reference to the character of the city and condition of the streets.

2. The city is not bound, under all circumstances, to keep the sidewalks free from ice; it is only required to exercise reasonable diligence under the circumstances of the case.

[At law. Action by Charles Clark against the city of Chicago to recover damages for negligence.]

DRUMMOND, District Judge, charged the jury as follows:

The plaintiff on the morning of the 6th of February, 1866, was walking along the street at the corner of Randolph and Wells streets. Stepping upon what is called an apron, which, it is alleged, had some ice upon it, he slipped, fell and broke his leg. Doctor Pope was called in to set his leg. The healing process did not go on satisfactorily, and the surgeon came to the conclusion that it was necessary to amputate the leg, and called in

[1] [Reported by Josiah H. Bissell, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

Dr. Burgess, and at the end of a few days it was amputated, when hemorrhage set in, and other unfavorable symptoms. It was amputated again, and finally the patient's life was saved. For the injury resulting from this fall, and in consequence of alleged negligence on the part of the city, this action is brought.

The first question to be determined is, whether it can be maintained under the circumstances of the case. That depends upon two questions. First, was the city guilty of negligence as to the manner in which the apron was constructed, or as to the manner in which it was occupied and maintained at the time? Secondly, was the plaintiff guilty of any negligence which contributed in any considerable degree to the result?—because, even admitting that there was negligence on the part of the city, if the plaintiff was guilty of any negligence which contributed to the result, he cannot maintain this action against the city.

The first question is one of law and of fact, and which the jury, under the direction of the court, is to decide. This apron, as it appears, consists of boards or planks, constructed for the purpose of enabling passengers to pass over the space where the water flows down to the sewer and is carried off. This particular apron was not even with the sidewalk in passing across Wells street from the west sidewalk to the roadway of the street, but there was a descent or a step from the sidewalk down to the apron, and in stepping from the sidewalk to the apron the plaintiff slipped and fell.

In determining this question, of course we have to look to the nature and object of the apron, and the mode and manner of its construction. In the first place, was it properly constructed? Was it placed in such a position as to be safe with reference to the grade and structure of the streets and to the object in view? Secondly, was it kept and maintained properly at the time; that is to say, looking at it in its position as it then was, was it unsafe—was it dangerous?

In a city like this it cannot be said that the mere fact that there is a descent or a step from a higher to a lower elevation of the street or sidewalk constitutes a defect of such a character as to render the city liable for any accident which a passenger may meet with in stepping from one level to another. In properly grading the streets, it is impossible that there should be a smooth, level walk in all places. Therefore, it is not, I think, such a fault or defect as to make the city liable simply because there was a step from a higher to a lower level.

Still, it is the duty of the city in constructing these aprons to have reference to the condition of the crossing at the place where they are constructed. What might be suitable in one place might not in another. There should be a fitness in things, looking at the grade and condition of the streets at the time. We have to build the streets gradually. We have to bring them up to grade gradually. We cannot expect the city to make complete streets at once. We must interpret their duty upon a reasonable basis in reference to the actual condition of affairs, and not require impracticable things from the city authorities. Looking at it in this light, was this apron constructed properly under the circumstances of the case? If it was, then, as a matter of course, so far as the structure is concerned, there was no fault on the part of the city. Then, was it maintained properly?—that is to say, in a proper condition.

The ground assumed on the part of the plaintiff is that ice was suffered to accumulate there, in consequence of which the accident happened. We must also, in looking at the question in this light, consider the circumstances of the case, and construe the duties of the city and its officers with reference thereto. The law requires of the city that it should keep its streets and sidewalks and crossings reasonably safe, all things considered. It does not require impossibilities, nor what is impracticable. I could not, then, instruct you that it was the duty of the city, under all circumstances, to remove the ice in mid-winter from the streets and crossings. That might be impossible. You must look at the question, therefore, by the light of the circumstances existing at the time, the state of the temperature and of the weather, taking all these things into consideration. Was it something required of the city and of the officers of the city that the ice at this particular apron should be removed at that time?

It must be admitted that while it was not the duty of the city, under all circumstances, to remove the ice from the streets or crossings, still, if there was anything out of the ordinary course of things which rendered the sidewalk and crossings especially dangerous, and which could have been removed, that it ought to have been done. For example, if there should be on one of the aprons, or at one of the crossings, anything which in its nature was especially dangerous, it would be the duty of the city to cause it to be removed. If there was an accumulation of ice which rendered that crossing especially dangerous, I think it was the duty of the city to remove it, while it might not have been its duty to remove entirely the ice from the apron. We have to apply a reasonable rule to the officers of the city in determining what is their duty in the premises. No absolute, inflexible rule can be laid down. You have to judge of the action of the city under the special circumstances of the case.

I cannot, therefore, instruct you that the mere fact that there was ice upon this apron in the early part of February, 1866, did of itself, irrespective of all other circumstances, constitute negligence on the part of the city. I would not impose so harsh a rule upon the city authorities as to require them to cause all the ice that should be upon the sidewalks or crossings, at such an inclement season of the year, to be removed.

Verdict for defendant.

CLARK (CORY v.). See Case No. 3,260.

CLARK (CRABTREE v.). See Case No. 3,314.

Case No. 2,817a.

CLARK et al. v. CROPPER.

[Hempst. 213.] [1]

Superior Court, D. Arkansas. July, 1833.

ACTION BY ASSIGNEE OF NOTE—PROOF OF ASSIGNMENT.

1. The assignment of a note must be proved on the trial to entitle the assignee to judgment.

2. The case of Stroud v. Harrington [Case No. 13,546a] cited and approved.

In error to Hempstead circuit court.

[At law. Action by Levi Cropper against John Clark and Allen M. Oakley on a promissory note. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error.]

Before ESKRIDGE and CLAYTON, Judges.

OPINION OF THE COURT. There is an error in the judgment of the circuit court in rendering judgment against the defendant without the production of any evidence to prove the assignment of the note on which the action was brought. The case of Stroud v. Harrington, decided at the January term, 1831 [Case No. 13,546a], is in point, and contains the reasons upon which this opinion is based. The time at which the assignment was filed up at the trial, we do not regard as erroneous. Judgment reversed.

CLARK (DELAWARE & H. CANAL CO. v.). See Case No. 3,764.

Case No. 2,818.

CLARK v. DICK.

[1 Dill. 8; [2] 9 Am. Law Reg. (N. S.) 739.]

Circuit Court, D. Missouri. 1870.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—LIMITATION OF ACTIONS—REMOVAL OF CAUSES INTO THE FEDERAL COURTS.

1. Section 4, art. 11, of the constitution of the state of Missouri, which in substance exempts persons from liability for acts done during the recent civil war, by virtue of military authority vested in them by the government of the United States, or in pursuance of an order received from any person vested with such authority, is valid, and protects from prosecution or action all who can show for their acts the authorization of a military officer, acting under the commander-in-chief of the army of the United States.

2. Where in an action of trespass, the defendant pleaded, in substance, that civil war existed; that martial law was in force, and that the alleged trespasses were compulsory assessments, made upon the plaintiff or his property by virtue of an order of the commanding general of the army in that department: Held, that the facts pleaded brought the case within the above-mentioned section of the constitution of the state, under which they were a good defence to the action. That provision of the constitution is not void because of its retrospective operation, nor because other provisions of the constitution may prohibit the legislature from passing retroactive statutes. Nor does it conflict with the national constitution limiting the power of the states; nor is it rendered invalid by the fifth amendment to the constitution, as that is a limitation on the powers of the general government, and not on those of the states.

3. The facts above mentioned, pleaded as a defence to the action, bring the case within the two years limitation clause of the act of congress of 1863 (12 Stat. 757), and this limitation is applicable to a case originating in a state court, and by virtue thereof properly removed into the federal court.

4. This statute, providing for the transfer of this class of cases into the federal courts is constitutional (Cooper v. Nashville, 6 Wall. [73 U. S.] 247); and congress has the power to regulate the remedy, and to prescribe the period within which suits must be brought.

5. This statute, by its terms, applies to all cases described therein, and the limitation period extends to and includes cases of the character mentioned in the state courts as well as in the federal courts.

At law. This was an action of trespass originally commenced in one of the state courts of Missouri, and afterwards removed, under the act of congress of 1863 (12 Stat. 757), to the circuit court of the United States, for the district of Missouri. The right of removal was not contested or denied.

The trespasses were alleged to have been committed in the city of St. Louis, in January, 1862. The defendant [Franklin A. Dick] pleaded that at the time the alleged trespasses were committed, a state of civil war existed; that martial law was duly declared, and that the alleged trespasses were compulsory assessments or contributions, made by order of the general of the army of the United States in command of the department of Missouri; and claimed the benefit of section 4, art. 11, of the constitution of the state of Missouri, and of the two years' limitation clause of the above-mentioned act of congress of 1863, both of which are referred to in the opinion of the court. The plaintiff [William G. Clark] demurred to the pleas.

Lackland, Martin, & Lackland, for demurrer.

Sharp & Broadhead, contra.

Before MILLER, Circuit Justice, and TREAT and KREKEL, District Judges.

MILLER, Circuit Justice. The first plea is a very minute and specific statement of facts intended to show that at the time of the supposed trespasses there existed in the state of Missouri, and in the city of St.

[1] [Reported by Samuel H. Hempstead, Esq.]

[2] [Reported by Hon. John F. Dillon, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

Louis, where the transaction occurred, a state of flagrant war; that in consequence the commanding general had placed the city of St. Louis under martial law, and that by virtue of such military authority he had caused contributions to be levied on certain persons, of whom the plaintiff was one; that a commission had been appointed to assess these contributions, by the commanding general, and afterwards a committee authorized to revise the original assessment; that of this latter committee the defendant was a member and took part in its revision; but that they took no specific action in plaintiff's case; that the defendant had no other or further connection with the alleged trespasses, though other officers seized the goods mentioned under orders of the commanding general, in pursuance of said assessment. The proclamations and orders of the commanding general are set out in full, and the fourth section of article eleven of the constitution of Missouri is pleaded as a defence.

The second plea is, that the said supposed trespasses and wrongs complained of and set forth by the plaintiff in his petition, were done and committed under and by virtue of authority derived from the president of the United States, and more than two years before the commencement of this suit and during the Rebellion. The first plea may be liable to objection on the ground that it is a recital of facts after the manner of an answer in chancery, rather than a statement of the legal proposition which is supposed to be proved by these facts, and it is called by the pleader an answer. But we understand counsel for plaintiff to waive this objection, and the court is requested to pass upon the question, whether the plea discloses a substantial defence to the cause of action set out in the petition.

The validity of the plea is based by counsel on two distinct grounds: 1st. That the facts set out bring the case within the protection of section 4, art. 11, of the constitution of the state of Missouri. 2d. That the same facts show a condition of flagrant war which justified the substitution of martial law for the civil law, so far as to protect persons acting in obedience to military orders.

The provision of the constitution of Missouri relied on in this plea is as follows: "No person shall be prosecuted in any civil action or criminal proceeding, for or on account of any act by him done, performed, or executed, after the first day of January, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-one, by virtue of military authority vested in him by the government of the United States, to do such act, or in pursuance of orders received by him from any person vested with such authority; and if any action or proceeding shall heretofore have been, or shall be hereafter instituted against any person for the doing of any such act, the defendant may plead this section in bar thereof."

There does not seem to be any reason to doubt that the averments of this plea bring defendant's case within the language and intent of this provision. They show very clearly that the defendant acted under the orders of the military officer highest in command in the department of Missouri. That this officer represented the president, who is commander-in-chief of the army, and was vested with all the authority, as such military commander, that belonged to the president, cannot be doubted.

The defendant thus acted in pursuance of orders from one vested with full military authority; and unless we are to go into the question whether such authority can possibly exist in this country, we must concede that the case is one intended to be provided for by this section. If the defendant is required to show that the authority of the military commander was a rightful and legal authority in the particular matter in question, then the provision in the Missouri constitution is useless. For it must be conceded in all courts, that an act justified by lawful and competent authority in the particular case, cannot be the foundation of an action.

The clause we are considering was not intended for such a case. It was not needed. But the framers of that instrument were aware that many acts of violence had been done by the military, and by those subject to military orders, for which it might be difficult to find legal and technical justification, but which were thought to be necessary and proper to maintain the national supremacy. They therefore intended to provide for those cases. And while they did not pretend to give protection to lawless violence, committed by persons without orders from any competent authority or any recognized military officer, they did intend to shield from prosecution all who could show for their acts the authorization of a military officer, acting under the commander-in-chief of the army of the United States. The wisdom of this ordinance has lost none of its force by the lapse of time. As a provision for the repose and quiet of the community, it could nowhere be more useful than in Missouri. This section of the constitution was not in force when the acts complained of occurred. It has become a part of the constitution since, but, as its language clearly shows, was intended to have effect on such past transactions. It is said that for this reason it is void.

It has been repeatedly decided that retrospective laws are not void, for that reason, unless they are made so by express constitutional provision. There may be such a provision in the Missouri constitution as to retrospective statutes. But it is not a statute whose validity we are considering. It is one of the articles of the constitution itself, a part of the very fundamental law whose authority is invoked. Of course this must stand as well as any other part of the constitution, and cannot be nullified by the more general provisions of the same instrument concerning the powers of the legislature. There does not seem to us to be anything in the nature of this law itself, or in its relation to the power of the people when in convention assembled to enact organic laws, which forbids them to pass this ordinance.

It is to be observed that plaintiff's right to recover by action in the courts for such trespasses as he describes, rests on the common law as adopted by the state of Missouri, that is, on the law of the state, and not on any law of the federal government. There is no common law of the federal government. The right to bring this suit is founded on the law of the state, however that right, once existing, may be restricted by the federal constitution, of which we shall inquire presently. We repeat, then, that we know of no limitation, except it can be found in the constitution of the United States, of the right of the state of Missouri, when represented in her sovereignty in convention, to take away the right of action which it had previously given, if the best interests of the body politic so convened require it.

This very proposition came before the supreme court of Missouri, in the case of Drehman v. Stifle, 41 Mo. 184, and the validity of this section, as applicable to suits for damages for trespass, was affirmed on grounds similar to those stated above. That case, however, was contested on the further ground, that this section of the Missouri constitution was in violation of the federal constitution, and therefore void. It was accordingly taken by a writ of error to the supreme court of the United States, and in that court it was urged that it was forbidden by several provisions of the federal constitution, limiting the power of the state legislatures. But that court held that it was not a bill of attainder, nor an ex post facto law, nor a law impairing the obligation of contracts,—in fact, that so far as the federal power in the matter was concerned, the courts saw nothing to render the section invalid. Drehman v. Stifle, 8 Wall. [75 U. S.] 595.

It is strenuously urged here, however, that plaintiff's right of action in this case was property, and that the Missouri constitution deprives him of that property without due process of law, within the meaning of the fifth amendment to the federal constitution. If we could see our way clear to hold that a right to sue for a personal trespass was property within the meaning of that amendment, the argument is in no way advanced. For it has been often held by the supreme court of the United States that the fifth and sixth amendments to the federal constitution are limitations upon the powers of the federal government, and not upon those of the states. In Twitchell v. Com., 7 Wall. [74 U. S.] 321, this is said to be no longer an open question. This amendment to the federal constitution cannot therefore render invalid the provision of the constitution of Missouri.

We are of opinion, for these reasons, that under the facts set out in the first plea this provision is a valid defense to the action. This renders unnecessary any further examination of the reasons urged in support of that plea.

The limitation clause of the act of congress of 1803 (12 Stat. 757) also covers this case, both in its language and spirit. The only objections made to this plea are that it is inapplicable to a case originating in a state court, and if so construed it is void because beyond the power of congress.

That congress has a right to provide for the trial of this class of cases in the federal courts is established by the case of Cooper v. Mayor of Nashville, 6 Wall. [73 U. S.] 247, in which that part of the statute is considered fully, and its constitutionality affirmed. The right of removal does not seem to have been contested or denied in the present case. The right of removal under this statute does not depend on the citizenship of the parties, but on the nature of the controversy. The defence set up is one which rests upon the exercise of certain powers in the name of the federal government, and the federal judiciary is the proper one to try such questions, because the constitution of the United States declares that the judicial power of the United States extends to all such questions.

If congress has the right to determine in what court such questions must be tried, it must necessarily have the power to regulate the remedy, including the right to prescribe the time within which the suit may be brought. That congress has the right to protect the officers upon whom it imposes delicate and important duties, from vexatious suits, arising out of transactions in which their official duties may involve them, by prescribing a reasonable time within which such suits may be brought, seems to be properly incidental to the right to command such services.

Nor is the objection sound, that in such cases the action if tried in the state court would be subject to the law of limitations prescribed by the state, while in the federal court a different rule would prevail. For the act of congress, by its terms applies to all cases of the character described in the statute, and we see no reason to limit its application to the federal courts. If congress has a right to legislate on this subject, it has a right to make that legislation the law of all courts into which such a case may come, and we think they have done this in the statute under consideration.

It will thus be seen that all the questions involved in these demurrers have been settled by the supreme court, and the demurrer is overruled. Judgment accordingly.

CLARK (DOYLE v.). See Case No. 4,053.

Case No. 2,819.

CLARK v. The ELLEN.

[32 Hunt, Mer. Mag. 716.]

District Court, N. D. New York. 1855.

COLLISION BETWEEN STEAM VESSELS — CROSSING COURSE—ERRONEOUS MANEUVER.

[A towboat left a landing just above a ferry slip in the East river, started down, and across the course of an incoming ferry boat. On discovering the latter, she stopped and backed, when, had she kept on, the collision complained of would not have ensued. Held, that the towboat was in fault in not making at once for the center of the stream as required by local laws, and in starting ahead at such time, and that the ferry boat had a right to presume that the towboat would not be suddenly put in motion or as suddenly stopped, and was, therefore, not in fault.]

[In admiralty. Libel by Oliver N. Clark, owner of the towboat King Philip, against the ferry boat Ellen, to recover damages sustained by collision.]

HALL, District Judge. This libel is filed by the owner of the steamboat King Philip, to recover the damages occasioned by a collision between the two steamboats, which happened September 14, 1853, in the East river, near the slip on the Brooklyn side of the Catherine ferry. The Ellen was one of the regular ferry boats at that ferry, and was crossing from New York. The King Philip was a towboat about the harbor, and was bound from Grand street to Staten Island. She had stopped just above the ferry to take a schooner in tow, but not succeeding in obtaining the job, she started ahead, straight down the river. The Ellen was in sight, heading for her slip before the King Philip started. The King Philip went on until about abreast of the upper slip of the ferry, when the Ellen was discovered, and the engine was stopped and backed, but the Ellen came into her, striking her nearly at right angles. The engine of the Ellen was stopped, and backed, but at the last moment. The collision occurred about three or four o'clock in the afternoon, and the tide was flood.

Held, by the court, that upon the proofs there was no proper lookout on board the King Philip. That it was the duty of the King Philip, when she started ahead, in accordance with the state law of April, 1848, to take such measures as would bring her to the center of the river, by the most direct and shortest route which was practicable under the circumstances, and to do so she would necessarily also follow the general rule of navigation by porting her helm as she approached the Ellen. That on the evidence she was so far above the Ellen, that, if she had so done, she would have passed under the Ellen's stern. But if she was not distant enough to have done so, as was claimed by the libelant, a difficult duty was imposed upon her. She was at rest, and could choose her own time for changing her position. The Ellen was in full view, and her purpose, and destination, and speed were sufficiently known; and those in charge of the King Philip knew, or were bound to know, the capabilities of their own vessel. They were also bound to know whether or not she could get under way and pass under the bows of the Ellen with safety, and, if she could not, she should have remained at rest until the Ellen had so far passed that the King Philip could pass in safety under her stern. The Jamaica [Case No. 7,173]. That the King Philip, therefore, was in fault, whatever her position was. That it is probable also that, if her engines had not been stopped, she would have passed the slip before the Ellen reached it, and no collision would have taken place. That the pilot of the Ellen had a right to assume that no steamer lying at rest at a safe distance above his track would suddenly be put in motion and run directly under his bows, so as to block the entrance into the slip, and especially that no steamer would suddenly get under way to cross his bows, and then as suddenly reverse her engine so as to block the entrance. And when he saw the wheels of the King Philip in motion, he was bound to act upon the supposition that the statute and the laws of navigation would be complied with until a contrary intention was clearly manifested. He was right in relying upon the proper navigation of the King Philip until the last moment, and then the engine was stopped and backed, and the helm ported, which was the proper course under the circumstances.

Libel dismissed, with costs.

Case No. 2,820.

CLARK v. FORD.

[1 Hayw. & H. 6.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Jan. 12, 1841.

TRIAL — ELECTION OF PLEA — REFUSING INSTRUCTIONS—LIBEL—CANDIDATE FOR OFFICE—PROBABLE CAUSE.

1. A motion compelling the defendant to elect on which plea he will go to trial, allowed.

2. On a difference of opinion between two judges sitting on the bench, the court will refuse to give the instructions as prayed.

3. Where a paper was written for the purpose of preventing the reappointment of a party to office, and stating that his general reputation and character were such as to make him unfit for such appointment, and there was reasonable or probable cause for writing the said paper, it was held, that the plaintiff could not recover in an action for libel.

At law. Trespass on the case for libel. The declaration claims damages for injury received by the plaintiff. The defendant [Thomas Ford] pleaded not guilty and justification.

[1] [Reported by John A. Hayward, Esq., and George C. Hazleton, Esq.]

Brent & Brent, for plaintiff.
Joseph H. Bradley, for defendant.

This is an action of trespass on the case brought by John D. Clark, a justice of the peace for the county of Washington, whose office was about to expire, against the defendant, for libel. The case will appear in the bills of exceptions.

On motion made by the counsel for the plaintiff as to which plea the defendant would elect to go to trial, the plea of not guilty was stricken out, and the plaintiff joined issue. Upon the trial of the issue joined in this cause, the plaintiff, to maintain and prove the said issue on his part, gave in evidence a certain written paper addressed by the defendant to the president of the United States, and it was admitted by the said defendant that he wrote the said paper, and laid it before the said president; and the plaintiff further proceeded to show that the words set out in his said declaration are contained in said paper writing, and further that said John D. Clark was not renominated to office when his term of service expired, and the said plaintiff here rested his proof. Whereupon the defendant, by his counsel, did then and there pray the said court to instruct the jury, that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover in this action upon the evidence aforesaid, and the two judges then upon the bench did differ in opinion as to the law, and did therefore refuse to give the said instructions so prayed for by the counsel of the said defendant. For which refusal the counsel for the defendant excepted.

On the further trial of this cause, the plaintiff further, to maintain the issue on his part joined, offered evidence tending to show that the said defendant, before the presentation of the said paper to the president, threatened to have the said plaintiff broke if it cost him $20,000 to do so; that his character was not as represented in said paper.

Thereupon the defendant gave evidence to show that it was; and also that a great many other citizens of Washington united in an address to the president praying that the said Clark should not be renominated to the office of justice of the peace, his commission being about to expire. And the plaintiff then offered evidence that a majority of the citizens of the Second ward, with whom the witness had conversed on the subject, appeared to be desirous that the said Clark should be re-appointed to said office, and that he knew many of the most respectable citizens of said ward were in favor of it.

Thereupon the said defendant, by his counsel, did then and there pray the court to instruct the jury that if, from the evidence aforesaid, the jury shall be of the opinion that the said paper was written by the defendant to the president for the purpose of preventing the re-appointment of the said plaintiff to the office of justice of the peace, and if they shall further find that his general reputation and character was such as to make him unfit for such appointment, and also that there was reasonable or probable cause for the said defendant to write the said paper to the said president with the intent aforesaid, then the said plaintiff is not entitled to recover. And the said plaintiff, by his said counsel, then and there objected to the granting of the said instructions so as aforesaid prayed for, and on the part of the said defendant prayed the court to instruct the jury that, if the jury believe the defendant published the alleged libel, and that the defendant has failed to justify the same, then the plaintiff is entitled to recover, if the defendant maliciously or without probable cause published the alleged libel; which instructions prayed for on the part of the plaintiff were refused and the instructions prayed for on the part of the defendant, as aforesaid, were granted by the court, which refusal of the prayer of the plaintiff and granting of the prayer of the defendant were excepted to on the part of the plaintiff.

Verdict for the plaintiff. Damages, $900.

Joseph H. Bradley, for the defendant, moved for a new trial for the following reasons: That the verdict was against the evidence; that the verdict was against the law; on the ground of newly discovered evidence; that the damages given by the jury were excessive.

The motion was argued by counsel on both sides, and overruled by the court.

CLARK v. FOSS. See Case No. 2,852.

CLARK (GARRETSON v.). See Cases Nos. 5,248–5,250.

Case No. 2,821.

CLARK et al. v. GIBBONEY et al.

[3 Hughes, 391.][1]

Circuit Court, W. D. Virginia. June 3, 1879.

RES JUDICATA — ASSIGNMENT FOR BENEFIT OF CREDITORS—WAIVER OF BENEFIT — BREACH OF TRUST — ALLOWANCE OF CONFISCATION BY ASSIGNEE.

1. In a suit brought to enforce payment of a debt secured by an assignment out of a trustee's estate on the ground of breach of trust, held, that a former suit is invalid as a plea of res judicata, unless the record shows that the same subject-matter was involved and the same questions raised, or so involved in the main object of the controversy as to spring necessarily therefrom.

2. A suit on the note secured by an assignment, never prosecuted to final judgment, is not a waiver of the benefit of the assignment.

3. Payment of a debt by a trustee to a receiver under a confiscation decree of a Confederate court is a breach of trust for which the estate of the trustee is liable.

In equity. The general facts of this case are the same as those in the preceding case of Dorr v. Gibboney's Ex'x [Case No. 4,006], except that there was no attachment suit in this case. Besides this, Clark, Dodge & Co. had brought suit on the note, but had never prosecuted it to final judgment, and it had been dismissed at the beginning of the war. The defendants claimed that this was a waiver of the benefit of the assignment. They also filed the record in the case of Preston v. Stuart, reported in 29 Grat. 289, in which case Clark, Dodge & Co. had been made nominal parties defendant, and attempted to use it as a plea of res judicata. These were the only additional questions raised.

[1] [Reported by Hon. Robert W. Hughes, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

James H. Gilmore and Robert M. Hughes, for the complainant, cited New England Bank v. Lewis, 8 Pick. 113; Coverdale v. Wilder, 17 Pick. 178; Skipwith v. Cunningham, 8 Leigh, 271; Clark v. Ward, 12 Grat. 440.

Joseph W. Caldwell, for Gibboney's executrix.

Johnston and Trigg, for Stuart & Palmer.

RIVES, District Judge. An estoppel by a former adjudication is pleaded in bar of this suit. It is alleged that this adjudication was had in the suit of Preston v. Stuart [29 Grat. 289], to which these complainants were nominally defendants. These complainants were parties, because secured by the assignment of 7th July, 1859; but no question was thereon raised or could have been adjudicated under the allegations of the bill as to the claim now preferred by the complainants. This suit was because of alleged frauds of the trustee constituting grounds on which his acts were assailed; and his sale to Palmer, Stuart & Parker of 10th June, 1862, under and by virtue of said assignment, was specially sought to be rescinded. Instead of the object of this suit being involved in the former, and barred thereby, it actually grows out of it, and is wholly consistent with its pretensions. Reference is had to this suit of Preston's for the evidence thereby afforded of the credit taken to himself for the payment of this debt by Gibboney, the trustee. With the main purpose of the controversy between Preston and his trustee, and the purchasers from the trustee, these plaintiffs had no connection; their claim is outside of that suit; in no wise conflicting with it; but, on the contrary, consistent therewith, and based thereon. An inspection of that voluminous record, is sufficient to snow the inapplicability and invalidity of this estoppel; so this plea, if not already received, should be overruled, or otherwise refused. For yet a stronger reason, the ex parte settlement of accounts by the trustee is no bar to a recovery in this case. The creditors in this suit need not to have assented to this assignment for their benefit. Their assent will be presumed. They can now be only deprived of it by some act of theirs so clearly inconsistent therewith as to constitute a waiver of it. The depositions of William Gibboney and his counsel are relied on as express waivers. They prove only an instruction of the creditors to their agent and counsel to sue for and press the collection of their debt at law; and not to wait upon the execution of the assignment for their benefit. This they had a perfect right to do; they were not restricted to the deed, and did not lose the benefit thereof by a resort to a suit on this note. They could concurrently proceed with both remedies. It is only when the creditor does some act or takes some step clearly indicating an abandonment of the deed for his protection, that he will be taken as waiving it. This doctrine of waiver is a reasonable one; and is not applicable to the state of facts relied on by the executrix of Gibboney. This suit, and its dismissal under the circstances of this case, cannot be tortured by any ingenuity into a renunciation of the benefits of this assignment.

The disposal of these preliminary objections to a recovery in this case brings us to the consideration of the merits of the controversy. It seems now conceded in the argument that the plaintiffs cannot be affected by the judicial sequestration of their debt. It was a nullity, and must be so regarded by this court upon reason and authority. Such a belligerent act is in its nature contingent; it must depend upon the success of the rebellion, in whose behalf it was enacted, and it must perish with the victory of the nation over its rebellious subjects. The question, then, reverts to one of liability as between the defendants to the original bill. To settle this the cross-bill was allowed; and under that, and the answers and pleading thereto, will this question be now considered and determined. It is conceded that this debt, thus illegally discharged and sequestrated, was the debt of the defendant Preston. He, however, had provided for it by his deed of assignment of 7th July, 1859. Gibboney united in that deed, and thereby undertook its execution. In pursuance thereof he chose to receive payment thereof, and take credit on his account of the trust estate therefor. Was not this an acquittal of the grantor? Can the credit inure to the trustee, and as between grantor and trustee be allowed to the latter, and still be claimed, as between them, of the grantor as a subsisting demand upon him? Surely not; he cannot have this credit and claim against it at the same time; the act of taking the credit in his settlement with the grantor acquits and discharges the latter, and the trustee cannot be allowed to repudiate his act when he has received the benefit of it. As between Preston and Gibboney the matter is finally and definitely settled; but otherwise as between these two and the creditors; but in consideration of the equities between the two former, the creditor's resort should be primary against Gibboney and secondary against Preston in the event of Gibboney's insolvency. This view, doubtless, accounts for the failure of the defendant Preston to answer. He thus confesses his eventual liability, and doubtless has no fear of it.

The liability of Palmer & Stuart rests upon the mistaken declaration that they had assumed to pay such debts as were to be postponed because of the refusal to receive currency. There was no such understanding on their part. The provision is quite different, and is as follows: "It is further agreed and distinctly understood that in the event said Gibboney shall be unable to pay off the creditors of said Thomas L. Preston with the funds paid by said purchasers, in consequence of the refusal of said creditors or any of them to receive the money in payment, that then the said parties of the second part shall substitute their notes for the amount so refused, secured to the satisfaction of said Gibboney in notes, for equal instalments, payable in 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5 years from first July next, or sooner if the parties of the second part shall elect so to do, with interest on same from first July next, and interest on the whole amount, payable annually." It is clear from this quotation, therefore, that so far from its being true, as alleged, that these purchasers agreed to pay these deferred debts, it was incumbent on Gibboney, when unable to use current funds, to defer the payment through five years, if agreeable to the purchasers, so as to secure for such creditors a satisfactory medium of payment. Neither was there any obligation on the part of the vendees to see to the application of the purchase-money. The effect of the deed of assignment was to interpose for the discharge of the debts secured, a trustee whose acquittance or receipt should be all that the purchasers could require to discharge them of liability. It would be, therefore, to defeat the plain provisions of the assignment, and its manifest intent to deny Palmer & Stuart in this case the protection of the trustee's receipt for this debt, and his acquittance therefor. I cannot, therefore, think that they can in any event be held liable for the malversation of the trustee in turning over this debt to the hands of the Confederate receiver. Singular infidelity attended the agencies employed by these foreign creditors. One of their attorneys was William Gibboney, also a Confederate receiver, who, as his deposition shows, claimed this fund, and apparently gave up his claim upon the allowance of his commission of $120.85, being five per cent. on the amount of $2,417 paid Receiver Johnston, and upon the receipt of liberal fees by him and his associate. Truly, it might be said of this transaction, it was verily "quasi agnum committere lupo."

To ascertain the liability of Gibboney, let us reproduce the credit he takes to himself in his settlement of accounts in the Preston suit against him. It is as follows:

"73. Clark, Dodge & Co. v. W. K. Heiskell, acceptor, and Thomas L. Preston, on an acceptance due March 21st, 1859..	$2,017 05
Interest to July 12th, 1862....	400 38
	$2,417 43

"Received of Robert Gibboney, trustee of Thomas L. Preston, the sum of $2417.43 cents, according to the above statement, which debt was due from Thomas L. Preston, and recognized as such in his deed of trust to said Gibboney, and so paid me under the sequestration law as receiver for Washington county, the said Clark, Dodge & Co. having domicil in the state of New York. John W. Johnston, Receiver for Washington County. July 12, 1862."

In exhibit (Z), being trustee's settlement before Commissioner H. S. Mathews, under date of 4th November, 1862, Gibboney takes credit to himself, under date of July, 1862, as follows: "By amount paid John W. Johnston, receiver, $2417.43." The identity of the sum proves beyond all doubt the identity of the item. See exhibits of Thomas L. Preston, p. 105. This is indubitable documentary proof, that Gibboney, as trustee, has received credit for this payment to the receiver. Where now is the proof that he made this wrongful payment under any species of duress whatever? The language of his receipt sets out the domicil of Clark, Dodge & Co. as in New York; the suit being brought in the United States court, evidenced the jurisdictional fact that these suitors resided in another state; and I have no doubt that that residence was, under the proofs in this cause, known by Gibboney to be in New York. Hence, he was aware of his duty in behalf of these cestui que trusts, to refuse to receive this debt, and under the terms of this deed, to demand in its stead a note or notes at such time as would probably outlast the Rebellion. Did he, in good faith, such as is exacted of a fiduciary under these circumstances, seek in the mode thus provided by the deed to tide this debt over the war, and protect these loyal citizens in their just claims? He surely had the opportunity and authority to do so; but no proof is offered of any attempt on his part thus to protect these residents of a loyal state in their rightful dues during the Rebellion. On the contrary he seems to have seized with impatience and haste this opportunity of signalizing his fealty to the insurrectionary tribunals of the revolted states, and of acquiring cheaply and at the expense of those whom he should have protected and not betrayed, a reputation for a flaming, superserviceable zeal in these ungracious, if not vengeful, tasks of confiscation. While I acknowledge the favor shown by the courts to fiduciaries in the honest and well-meant, though mistaken, discharge of their duties, I cannot but regard the voluntary participation of the trustee in this lawless act of sequestration under the proofs in this cause, as a reprehensible breach of trust, properly entailing upon his estate, the recovery sought of it in this cause. Whatever relief he may be entitled to from his confederates in this wrong-doing, must be sought in another action and before another tribunal. I am clear, neither his grantor nor his vendees can be required to indemnify him for this wrongful and void payment to the Confederate receiver.

Hence, a decree must be entered in the original suit for the plaintiff's debt, and interest and costs, with a reservation of their right to charge the estate of Preston in the hands of his present trustee, if the execution de bonis testatoris in this case should prove fruitless, and the cross-bill of Gibboney's testatrix must be dismissed with costs.

Case No. 2,822.

CLARK et al. v. GILBERT et al.

[5 Blatchf. 330;[1] 4 Int. Rev. Rec. 42.]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. July 14, 1866.

INTERNAL REVENUE—BROKERS—ACT OF JUNE 30, 1864.

1. A person who, having a license as a banker, under the 1st subdivision of the 79th section of the internal revenue act of June 30, 1864 (13 Stat. 251), receives stock, bonds, &c., for sale for others, and sells them, charging the customary compensation, as a banker, and also loans money on stocks, bonds, &c., and sells such securities on account of the borrowers, and deducts from the sales the money loaned, with interest and the customary charges as a banker, is not liable to the tax of 1-20th of 1 per centum monthly, on such sales, under the 99th section of the act, which imposes such tax on brokers, and bankers doing business as brokers.

2. A person who purchases in his own name stocks, bonds, &c., for others, and advances his own money, and takes the transfers in his own name, and holds the stocks, bonds, &c., a security for the repayment of the money, and, on its repayment, delivers the securities as per agreement, or, in default of repayment, sells them to reimburse himself, and who also purchases and sells stocks, bonds, &c., for others, under certain stipulations as to risks, losses, and profits, is doing the business of a broker, and is subject to such tax of 1-20th of 1 per centum, monthly.

3. Under the 9th subdivision of the 79th section of the act, a person may, under his license as a banker, do business as a broker, without paying further license money; but, so far as he does business as a broker, he is to be regarded as a broker, and must pay a broker's tax on his transactions.

[2] [This suit was brought by the plaintiffs [Luther C. Clark and others, comprising the firm of Clark, Dodge & Co.], who were regularly licensed bankers, to enjoin [Sylvester S. Gilbert and Sheridan Shook] officers of the revenue, from assessing and collecting from them the broker's tax on sales imposed by section 99 of the excise act of June 30, 1864. An abstract of the points and argument submitted in support of the motion on the part of the plaintiffs to continue the injunction was published in volume 3, Record, p. 182.

[The officers of the revenue claimed under the instructions of the commissioner that the plaintiffs should pay such tax as bankers doing business as brokers. The counsel for the plaintiff made the points of which the substance is here given: (1) The tax imposed by the 99th section of the revenue act, is imposed upon brokers, and not on bankers. (2) The 79th section of same act expressly authorizes bankers to receive stock and securities for sale or discount, "and to lend and advance on such stocks and securities;" and this necessarily carries with it the right to sell the same, either to reimburse themselves or to discharge the duty to sell, imposed by the receipt of such stocks for the purpose of sale. (3) That the transactions in the fourth sub-division of the bill mentioned were equally exempt, because: (a) No tax is imposed on the purchase of stocks and securities but only on the sales. (b) When the purchase is made, no tax or duty is payable until the banker sells. (c) In such cases no sale is made, unless by order of the principal, or to reimburse the amount paid by the banker on the purchase, and in either case the transaction is within the category of "stocks received for sale or on which loans or advances are made." (4) That the distinction between the banker and the broker is clear and well defined, and that even if it should be that the transaction above mentioned were such as a broker might engage in, this did not convert the banker into a broker or deprive the banker of his exemption. (5) That even if the transactions in the fourth or other subdivisions should be decided to form part of a broker's business, and taxable as such, this did not render the plaintiffs taxable in respect to transactions which formed a part of the business of bankers. (6) That by combining the business of a banker and broker, the broker did not lose the exemption to which he was entitled as banker. (7) That even if the plaintiffs were taxable in respect to transactions had on account of others, this did not render them taxable on transactions made on their own account. (8) That the supreme court of the United States, in the Case of Fisk and Hatch, decided that bankers were exempt from taxation as bankers. (9) That in the Case of Cutting, that court decided that a broker doing business under the ninth paragraph of section seventy-nine was liable to pay taxes on all transactions specified in that paragraph. (10) That the supreme court had not decided that a banker licensed under the first sub-denomination of section seventy-nine was liable to pay any tax on the business for which he is so licensed, nor that where bankers engage in transactions in which brokers likewise engage that they thereby lose such exemption as bankers.

[1] [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

[2] [From 4 Int. Rev. Rec. 42.]

[The district attorney controverted these propositions, and, in addition to the oral agreement, presented a printed brief, in which the questions were thoroughly discussed.] [2]

John E. Burrill and William M. Evarts, for plaintiffs.

Samuel G. Courtney, Dist. Atty., for defendants.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. [The bill is filed in this case against the defendants, who are the assessor and collector of the thirty-second collection district of New York, under the internal revenue laws, for the purpose of restraining them from the assessment and collection of the tax claimed to have accrued against the plaintiffs as bankers, doing business as brokers within said district, under the following circumstances:] [2] The plaintiffs have a license as bankers, and have, from time to time, received at their banking-house, stocks, bonds, and bullion for sale, and also have, during the same time, received bills of exchange and promissory notes for discount and sale, and did discount and sell the same for the account of the parties from whom they were received, and charged the customary compensation as bankers, and, also, during the time aforesaid, did, at their banking-house, lend and advance moneys to various parties, on stocks, bonds and bullion, and, after such advances and loans, did sell said stocks, bonds and bullion, on account of the parties from whom the same were received, and to whom the moneys were lent and advanced, deducting from said sales the moneys so loaned and advanced, with interest and the customary charges as bankers, and also bought and sold stocks, bonds, &c., on their own account, and not on commission or for others.

The tax claimed as having accrued out of the above dealings is 1-20th of one per centum, monthly, on all such sales of stocks, bonds, &c., under the 99th section of the act of June 30, 1864 (13 Stat. 273), which imposes the tax on brokers, and "bankers doing business as brokers." The question in the case is, whether or not the plaintiffs, in carrying on the aforesaid business, under a banker's license, are to be regarded as bankers doing business as brokers.

The 1st subdivision of this 79th section of the act enacts, that bankers employing a capital not exceeding $50,000, shall pay $100 for a license, and two dollars for every thousand over this amount, and then defines the term "banker" thus: "Every person, firm, or company, &c., having a place of business (1) where credits are opened by the deposit or collection of money or currency, subject to be paid or remitted upon draft, check or order; or (2) where money is advanced or loaned on stocks, bonds, bullion, bills of exchange, or promissory notes; or (3) where stocks, bonds, bullion, bills of exchange, or promissory notes are received for discount or sale, shall be regarded a banker, under this act." Besides the license fee exacted, the banker, under the 110th section, pays a tax of 1-24th of 1 per centum, monthly, upon the average amount of deposits, 1-24th of one per centum, monthly, upon the average amount of the capital of his bank, beyond the amount invested in United States bonds, 1-12th of 1 per centum, monthly, on the average amount of circulation issued by the bank, and, in addition, 1-6th of 1 per centum, monthly, on the amount of circulation beyond 90 per centum of the capital. The license fee and the above tax are the burdens imposed on the banker for the privileges conferred. Now, among these, is the privilege of doing the business set forth in the bill of complaint and to which I have referred at large; and yet, it is claimed, that the plaintiffs are liable to the additional tax as brokers specified in the 99th section of the act. According to this construction, the license or privilege of the banker would be of little value. He might, indeed, receive deposits and pay them out, and advance or lend money on stocks, bonds, &c., but, in case of default in repayment, he must not sell the pledge to reimburse himself; and he may receive stocks, bonds, &c., for discount or sale, but is not at liberty to sell. If he does, it is insisted he instantly becomes a broker, and liable to the broker's monthly tax, in addition to the banker's, which he has already paid. I cannot agree to this view of the act. On the contrary, I am satisfied that the banker is, both by express terms, as well as by necessary implication, empowered to carry on the business authorized under his license, to its practical and useful results; that, when he is authorized to lend or advance money on stocks, bonds, &c., he has the right, in case of default in the repayment, to convert the security into money by way of reimbursement; and that, when he is authorized to receive stocks, bonds, &c., for sale, he may sell the same without, in either instance, making himself a broker.

The case of U. S. v. Fisk, 3 Wall. [70 U. S.] 445, decided by the supreme court at its last term, carried the privileges of the banker far beyond the present case; for, it was there held, that he could purchase and sell stocks, bonds, &c., for himself, and on his own account, under his license—a business not specified in the definition of a banker. That case, in effect, decided, that any business which a banker could carry on, as such, did not fall within the 99th section of the act.

The case of the plaintiffs, which is set forth in the fourth paragraph of the bill, is, in substance, that, in carrying on their business as bankers, they purchase stocks, bonds, &c., for others, but make the purchases in their own name, and advance their own money, and take the transfers in their own name, and hold the stocks as security for the repayment of the money by the persons for whom the stocks are purchased; and, on receiving such repayment, with interest and the customary charges, deliver the stocks, bonds, &c., as per agreement, or, in default of repayment, sell the same to reimburse themselves. This business is not only outside of the business of a banker, as defined by the act, but comes directly within that of a broker, and is subject to the tax under the 99th section.

[2] [From 4 Int. Rev. Rec. 42.]

But, it is urged, that if the plaintiffs, in any of their dealings in stocks, bonds, &c., are brought within the category of bankers doing business as brokers, their whole business as bankers is thereby brought within it, and subjected to the broker's tax; and this extraordinary proposition is supposed to be decided in the case above referred to. The 9th subdivision of the 79th section, declaring who shall be a broker, is as follows: "Every person, firm, or company, &c., except such as hold a license as a banker, whose business it is, as a broker, to negotiate purchases or sales of stocks, &c., shall be regarded as a broker." The exception takes the banker out of the category of brokers; and, to make it more clear as to what was intended by the exception, a proviso is added, "that any person holding a license as a banker shall not be required to take out a license as a broker," meaning, obviously, that he may do business as a broker under his license as a banker. But, surely, there is nothing in the provision which thus permits the business of both a banker and a broker to be carried on under the banker's license, that suggests the idea, or gives any countenance to it, that dealing in both capacities merges the banker in the broker, so as to subject all his dealings to the broker's tax. The fair and natural inference would seem to be the other way, namely, that the broker is merged in the banker. But, I suppose, that the reasonable and proper conclusion is, that, although the license of the banker authorizes him to do the business of a broker without further payment of money, yet, so far as he may do that business, he is to be regarded as a broker, and must pay the broker's tax. This, I think, is not only the natural conclusion, and fair legal effect, from the provisions of the law referred to, but is confirmed, as will be seen, by the language of the 99th section, imposing the tax on brokers, which is as follows: "That all brokers and bankers doing business as brokers, shall be subject to pay the following duties," &c., clearly enough implying that the banker, besides carrying on his own business, may also engage in business as a broker; but, in such case, and as respects the business done as a broker, he must pay the tax imposed, over and above what he has already paid as a banker. This view of the statute was taken in the case of U. S. v. Fisk [3 Wall. (70 U. S.) 445], and is stated in the opinion in a few words: "Now, a banker," says Mr. Justice Grier, "pays a much higher license-tax than a broker, and is permitted to 'prosecute or carry on' the business or profession of a broker without paying any further license; but, if he prefers, he may not combine that business with his own."

An injunction must issue in conformity with this opinion.

[NOTE. The case of Peabody v. Gilbert, Case No. 10,868, was heard and disposed of in accordance with the foregoing opinion at the same time.]

CLARK (GONG BELL CO. v.). See Case No. 5,529.

CLARK (GREENOUGH v.). See Case No. 5,784.

Case No. 2,823.

CLARK v. HACKETT.

[1 Cliff. 269.][1]

Circuit Court, D. New Hampshire. May Term, 1859.[2]

BILL TO SET ASIDE SUPREME COURT JUDGMENT FOR FRAUD — JURISDICTION—CORROBORATION—AMENDMENTS—LIMITATION OF ACTIONS.

1. Circuit courts have no jurisdiction to review the judgments or decrees of the supreme court; and a circuit court for one circuit is equally destitute of authority to review a judgment or decree of a circuit court in another circuit; but semble, a judgment or decree of the supreme court, affirming a judgment or decree of a circuit court, may be reviewed in a circuit court, upon proof that both judgments or decrees were obtained by fraud.

[Cited in Glenny v. Langdon, 98 U. S. 24.]

2. Where fraud is charged in the bill, and positively denied in the answer, a decree cannot be pronounced for the complainant on the testimony of a single witness, without some corroboration either from the testimony of other witnesses, or from the circumstances proved in the case.

[See note at end of case.]

3. Under Act Cong. Aug. 19, 1841 [5 Stat. 446], limiting suits by or against assignees of bankrupts to two years after the cause of action accrued, a bill filed after two years cannot be regarded as an amendment to one for the same cause of action, filed before the expiration of the two years, but dismissed by the court.

This was a bill in equity, wherein the complainant sought to set aside and annul a certain decree of the supreme court of the United States of America, affirming on appeal a decree of the circuit court of the United States for the District of Columbia, and also to set aside the decree of the circuit court so appealed from and affirmed. Those decrees were made in a suit in equity, in which one Benjamin C. Clark and the present defendant were complainants, and Ferdinand N. Clark, then known as Ferdinand Clark, was respondent. In the published decisions of the supreme court, in the case of Clark v. Clark, 17 How. [58 U. S.] 315, it appears that the complainant prosecuted a claim against the republic of Mexico, for the unlawful seizure of the cargo of the schooner Louisiana, and that there was awarded to him therefor the sum of $86,985.29 by the commissioners appointed under the treaty of April 11, 1839, with that republic.

[1] [Reported by William Henry Clifford, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

[2] [Affirmed in Clark v. Hackett, 1 Black (66 U. S.) 77.]

After deducting some twenty per cent. as compensation to the agents employed in recovering the claim, there was left the sum of $69,429.14 as the amount in controversy in that suit. That award was made on the 15th of April, 1857, and on the 15th of May following Benjamin C. Clark, of Boston, filed a creditor's bill in the circuit court of the United States for the District of Columbia, claiming the fund for himself and other creditors of the respondent, who had taken the benefit of the bankrupt law on the 27th of March, 1843, in the district court of the United States for the district of New Hampshire.

On the 30th of the same May, W. H. Y. Hackett, the respondent in the present suit, and the then assignee in bankruptcy of the respondent in that suit, filed his bill in that court, also claiming the entire fund for the purpose of distribution among the creditors of the bankrupt, alleging the decease of the original assignee in bankruptcy, and setting up his own appointment in his place. In that bill the complainant, who is the present respondent, set forth his own appointment as assignee in bankruptcy in the place of one John Palmer, deceased, and prayed for leave to come in under the prayer of the original bill, and to be made the complainant in that suit. He then alleged that the respondent, the present complainant, was regularly declared a bankrupt in 1843, and that all his property vested in the assignee, who subsequently deceased, with proceedings in bankruptcy still pending; that the bankrupt had a claim against the republic of Mexico, to satisfy which claim the award was made; that the claim was not described so as to render it available to the bankrupt's creditors, and that no such evidences as would enable the assignee to recover the claim were put into his hands, leaving the assignee ignorant of the true value of the assets, and that the assignee therefore reported them to the court as of no value; that no right, title, or interest in the claim ever passed out of the assignee or became vested in the bankrupt; that the bankrupt had subsequently prosecuted the claim in his own right, falsely and fraudulently claiming that his own debts in bankruptcy had been satisfied, and that the claim had been revested in him; and finally the complainant in that suit alleged that the award belonged to him as the assignee of the bankrupt's estate. Whereupon he prayed for an injunction under the eighth section of the act of congress of March 3, 1849 [9 Stat. 394], and for general relief. The answer in that suit averred that the claim against the republic of Mexico was described in the schedule in the manner prescribed by the rules of the district court, and that it was mentioned as subject to a mortgage, and that no value was then set upon the claim, because he then believed it was without value. The answer further set up that the respondent communicated to the assignee the situation of all the claims mentioned in his schedules; that all the papers and evidences in support of the claims were not in his possession, but had been in the year 1842, or earlier, publicly filed before the commissioners under the convention of April 11, 1839, were afterwards placed in the public archives of the government, and there remained till the time of the award. The proceedings in the bankrupt court were then set forth in the answer, and the discharge of the bankrupt on December 17, 1844. Then the answer alleged that on March 14, 1845, the assignee filed a petition to sell the estate described in the bankrupt's schedules, and that, in pursuance to an order made to that effect, the estate and demands of the bankrupt were afterwards sold at public auction to R. M. Clark; that the respondent, on the day following the sale, purchased all the estate and demands from the said R. M. Clark, and that he afterwards prosecuted this claim at his own expense. On the 20th of June, 1847, the circuit court of the United States for the District of Columbia issued an injunction restraining the secretary of the treasury from paying the amount of the fund, and the respondent from receiving it till the further order of the court. On the 30th of May, 1853, the circuit court decreed that the fund should be paid to W. H. Y. Hackett, as assignee, for distribution among the creditors of the respondent. From that decree the respondent appealed to the supreme court of the United States, and in the December term, 1854, the decree of the circuit court was affirmed. Among the questions discussed at the bar in that suit, and included in the pleading, was whether the sale of the claim of R. M. Clark, and the purchase of the same by the respondent on the following day, was fraudulent or valid, and it was determined in the supreme court to be fraudulent.

The conditions of the pleadings, and the allegations therein in this suit, are sufficiently expressed in the opinion of the court.

H. B. Fernald and C. W. Tuttle, for complainant.

Mr. Hackett, pro se.

CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice. Both the circuit court and the supreme court, in their respective spheres of judicial action, had undoubted jurisdiction of the cause and the parties, and their determination of the matter is final and conclusive, unless it be shown, in due form of law, that their respective decrees were procured by the fraud of the complainant in that suit. Circuit courts have no jurisdiction to review the judgments or decrees of the supreme court in any case, and a circuit court for one circuit is equally destitute of authority to review or in any manner to revise the judgments or decrees rendered or passed by a circuit court for another circuit. They can only be reviewed on writ of error, or on appeal to the supreme court. Such obvious truths need only to be stated in order to command universal assent as self-evident propositions, so much so that any attempt to support or fortify them by argument or authority would be quite out of place. It is not upon any such grounds that the complainant in this suit seeks redress for his alleged wrongs. The charge against the respondent is, that the respective decrees pronounced in that suit were procured by fraud as alleged in the bill, and it is upon this ground alone that he prays that they may be set aside and annulled. Some reference now becomes necessary to the pleadings in this suit, in order that the causes of complaint and their nature may become more fully understood.

According to the allegations of the bill, the complainant filed his petition in bankruptcy on the 28th of January, 1843, and was declared a bankrupt on the 22d of March following, and on the 7th of December, 1844, a decree of the district court was passed, discharging him from the debts he owed in his private right at the time of presenting his petition. On the 22d of March, 1843, John Palmer was appointed assignee of his property, rights, and credits, and on the 14th of March, 1845, the district court decreed a license to the assignee to sell the assets of the bankrupt, and on the 9th of April, in the same year, the assignee sold all his assets at public auction to one R. M. Clark, for the sum of two dollars, and on the 14th the complainant purchased the same under a formal and sufficient bill of sale from the auction vendee for a valuable consideration. Among those assets so purchased, as the complainant alleges, was a certain claim against the republic of Mexico, for the unlawful seizure of the cargo of the schooner Louisiana, for which claim he admits the commissioners under the treaty aforesaid awarded him the sum of $86,786.29, payable from the treasury of the United States, on the 15th of May, 1857. He then alleges that one Benjamin C. Clark of Boston, falsely claiming to be one of his creditors by virtue of a certain pretended judgment, did on the 15th of March, 1851, petition by bill the circuit court of the United States for the District of Columbia, for an injunction to restrain the secretary of the treasury from paying him the fund until the further order of the court. That judgment which is particularly described in the bill he alleges was obtained against him by the fraud and collusion of the attorney employed to defend the suit, and therefore he avers that it is void. B. C. Clark, in his bill before mentioned, prayed that the then assignee, or such other as should be appointed, might come in under the prayer of the original bill and be made the party complainant in that cause. In that connection, the complainant in this cause alleges that one Charles G. Nazro, the copartner of Benjamin C. Clark, falsely pretending that the copartners were creditors of his estate in bankruptcy, on the 19th of May, 1851, petitioned the district court of the United States for the district of New Hampshire for the appointment of an assignee instead of John Palmer, deceased, praying that the respondent in this suit, or some other person, might be appointed as such assignee, and falsely representing at the same time that John Palmer left assets unsold, and that recent occurrences had given them value, and that the district court, on the same day, decreed that the respondent be appointed assignee for the purpose prayed in the petition. Upon receiving that appointment as assignee, the complainant alleges that the respondent, on leave granted by the circuit court of the United States for the District of Columbia, was made complainant in that cause, under the prayer of the original bill filed by Benjamin C. Clark, and that such proceedings were had in that suit so prosecuted by the respondent, that on the 28th of March, 1853, the said circuit court did decree that the fund, less twenty per cent, paid to the agents who prosecuted the claim, be paid over to the respondent as such assignee, to be by him distributed among the creditors of the complainant. He further alleges that he appealed from the decree of the circuit court to the supreme court of the United States, and that such proceedings were had in the supreme court, that the decree of the circuit court was affirmed. That fund was then received by the district court of the United States for the district of New Hampshire, as the complainant alleges, and still remains in its custody under that decree.

Such is the substance of the stating part of the bill. Certain denials are then made by the complainant, which it becomes important to notice. He denies that he owed the judgment in favor of B. C. Clark, or any part of the same since the filing of his petition to be declared a bankrupt, and repeated the allegation that it was obtained by fraud and collusion. He also denies that any debt was due to Nazro and Clark on the 28th of January, 1851. On the contrary, he avers that they were indebted to him, and he also denies that John Palmer, as assignee, left unsold any of the assets, but avers that he closed and ended all the business appertaining thereto on the 9th of April, 1845. His theory is that all the proceedings in bankruptcy were closed by the original assignee, and he accordingly alleges that the respondent was not authorized to set aside the proceedings of the former assignee, and in so doing that he exceeded the authority of the court, and being deceived by the false representations of others, misrepresented the facts to the circuit court of the United States for the District of Columbia, and to the supreme court, by which false representations, and by the fraud and collusion of his own counsel, both courts, not knowing the real facts, were induced to decree, and did decree, that the fund should be paid over to the respondent. That claim, as he alleges, was considered valueless at the date of his petition to be declared a bankrupt, and continued to be so considered up to the time of its sale by the original assignee, and would not have been allowed by the commissioners but for his great skill and effort in prosecuting it, wherefore he claims that he was equitably entitled to the whole amount. He then sets forth the evidences on which he relies, to show that the judgment of B. C. Clark, described in his creditor's bill, was obtained by fraud and collusion. They consist chiefly of the alleged fraudulent and collusive conduct of the attorney employed by him to defend the suit in which the judgment was rendered. According to the allegations of the bill, his attorney was seasonably employed, duly instructed how to prepare and conduct the defence, and well knew that the complainant was ready and willing to aid and assist when called on for that purpose, and yet, as he alleges, his attorney fraudulently colluded and conspired with the plaintiff in that suit, and others in his interest, and fraudulently abandoned the defence, so that he was defaulted. These matters he admits were not pleaded in defence in the circuit court of the United States for the District of Columbia, and the reasons why they were not he alleges to be that he was fraudulently instructed by his counsel that the proceedings in bankruptcy, together with the sale of the assets by the original assignee, were a perfect and complete bar to that suit. Other minor matters are then set forth as showing the motive of some of the parties implicated, or the inducement which prompted them to aid in procuring the appointment of the respondent as assignee. On this point he alleges that Charles H. Dougherty and Michael Dougherty respectively claimed certain portions of the fund, on account of services alleged to have been rendered in getting it allowed, which he refused to admit, and that the latter said if he did not comply he would tie up the fund in Washington so that the complainant would not get any part of the award. Prompted solely by the reason that he refused to allow those claims, the complainant charges that Charles H. Dougherty and Michael Dougherty, and Joseph Hopkins Stewart, and one John L. Hayes, afterwards his counsel, and the respondent, intending and combining to defraud the complainant out of his just rights and to deprive him of the benefits of the award, conspired and confederated together, and, as the means of the final consummation of their designs, caused the proceedings before mentioned to be instituted in the district court of the United States for the district of New Hampshire, and by misrepresentation fraudulently induced that court to appoint the respondent assignee, and as further means of consummating their designs, caused the original proceedings to be commenced in the circuit court of the United States for the District of Columbia, and also caused the respondent to present his bill in that court, and become a party complainant in that cause. As a more effectual means of accomplishing their designs, he alleges that one of them offered his professional services to him, to act for him in the conduct and management of his defence, and that being ignorant of their purposes, he did retain and employ him to prepare and conduct his defence, but that he so aided and assisted the adverse party by keeping out material matters of defence contrary to his instructions, that the court decreed the case against him and granted the prayer of the bill. After stating in detail the several evidences so withheld, and specifying the several fraudulent acts, omissions, and conspiracies of his counsel in preparing and conducting his defence, he avers that he was ignorant of all those fraudulent acts, omissions and conspiracies of the parties named, until after the decree of the supreme court affirming the decree of the circuit court, and until after the final decree. Wherefore he prays that the decree of the supreme court affirming the decree of the circuit court, and the decree of the circuit court ordering the fund to be paid to the respondent as assignee, and enjoining the secretary of the treasury from paying the same to the complainant, may be set aside and annulled, and for other relief. On the 15th of August, 1857, the respondent appeared and filed his answer. Having already determined that this court possesses no jurisdiction to review the decree either of the supreme court or of the circuit court, it will only be necessary to refer to such portions of the answer as are responsive to the charge of fraud and collusion as set forth in the bill. Those allegations of the bill can only affect the respondent in this suit, and no one of the other persons implicated in the suggestions of fraud has become, or in any manner been made, a party to this proceeding. Separate denials are introduced into the answer to each distinct charge of fraud. They are full, clear, and explicit, and in respect to each subject-matter embraced in the bill are as comprehensive as the charge. Actual fraud, when charged as in this case, is of course issuable, and as in all other cases where it is directly imputed, the burden of proof lies on the party who seeks to set aside the proceedings. Stronger evidence may be required to satisfy the court of the truth of a fact, irrespective of the effect of the answer in cases of fraud, than in other issuable matters in controversy, whether at law or in equity, but the fraud must be established by fair and reasonable inferences to be drawn from the facts proved, and unless it is so established the case fails, and the transaction rests unimpaired. Askham v. Barker, 19 Eng. Law & Eq. 529. Charges of actual fraud, unsupported by evidence showing the truth of the imputations, if denied by the answer, are of no avail, for the plain reason that fraud is not to be presumed in any case without proof, and he who makes the charge has the burden of proof to establish the imputation. Superadded to that general rule, which is applicable in all cases whether at law or in equity, is another equally salutary, which is peculiar to hearings in equity upon bill and answer, and that is, where the charge as made in the bill is positively denied in the answer, a decree cannot be pronounced for the complainant on the testimony of a single witness, without some corroboration either from testimony of other witnesses or from the circumstances proved in the case. In equity the established rule is that an answer, responsive to the allegations and charges made in the bill, and which contains clear and positive denials thereof, must prevail unless it is overcome by the testimony of two witnesses to the substantial facts, or at least by one witness, and such attendant circumstances as will supply the want of another witness, and thus control the statements of the answer, or show its incredibility or insufficiency as evidence. 3 Greenl. Ev. § 289; Daniel v. Mitchel [Case No. 3,562]; Hughes v. Blake, 6 Wheat. [19 U. S.] 453; Lenox v. Prout, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 520.

Separate denials to each and every charge of fraud as made in the bill are contained in the answer, and in language as clear, positive, and explicit as could well be chosen, and in addition thereto the respondent declared that he wholly denies that he has at any time, for the purposes set forth in the bill or for any purpose conspired or confederated with the persons therein named, or any or either of them, to consummate any design in respect to the complainant, or the award, or any matter or thing charged in the bill. That denial is repeated and enlarged when the respondent says he wholly denies that he has confederated, conspired, or combined with any person or persons whether named or not named in the bill, in any way to defraud, injure, or prejudice him, or to deprive him of the award or any part thereof, or to influence the conduct of any person or persons retained or to be retained as counsel for the complainant in any or either of the suits mentioned, or in any other matter whatsoever. These references to the bill and answer are sufficient to show what the state of the pleadings is in the particular under consideration, and the result is, that the burden of proving the charges of fraud against the respondent as made in the bill is upon the complainant, according to the rule of law already laid down. Without repeating the charges of fraud as alleged in the bill, it will be sufficient to say that, so far as the respondent in this suit is concerned, not one of them is made out of any testimony in the case. Seven witnesses were examined by the complainant, and, after a careful perusal of their depositions, it is not perceived that there is anything in their statements, or the exhibits accompanying the same, which has any tendency to show, either that the decree of the circuit court of the United States for the District of Columbia, or the decree of the supreme court affirming the same, was procured by or through any fraud practiced by the respondent. This conclusion renders it unnecessary to enter upon a separate consideration of the several propositions assumed by the counsel for the complainant on this branch of the case, as the answer already given applies to them all, and as their separate examination would only serve to protract this investigation without accomplishing anything particularly beneficial to either party, it will be omitted. Recurring to the pleadings in this suit, there is not alleged in the bill so much as one fact deemed material to the decision of the controversy in its present stage, which is not directly met by the respondent and emphatically denied in the answer. Such positive denials in the answer, inasmuch as they are directly responsive to the charging part of the bill imputing actual fraud, must be considered by every rule of equity pleading as an insuperable barrier to any recovery by the complainant, unless those denials are overcome by competent and sufficient evidence. Eyre v. Potter, 15 How. [56 U. S.] 56; Price v. Berrington, 7 Eng. Law & Eq. 254. No such evidence has been exhibited by the complainant, and as this court has no power to grant relief under the circumstances of this case, except upon the ground of fraud, the prayer of the bill must be denied.

Another ground of defence assumed by the respondent deserves to be considered, for the reason that if tenable, it furnishes a complete answer to the suit, not only in its present form, but in any form in which it may be hereafter brought. By the eighth section of the bankrupt act of the 19th of August, 1841, it is among other things provided that no suit at law or in equity shall in any case be maintainable by or against such assignee, or by or against any person claiming an adverse interest touching the property and rights of property aforesaid in any court whatever, unless the same shall be brought within two years after the declaration and decree in bankruptcy, or after the cause of suit shall have first accrued. Assuming the facts to be true as they are stated and charged in this bill of complaint, the cause of action in this suit accrued at the time when the complainant became possessed of the knowledge of the fraudulent acts, omissions, and conspiracies whereby the persons named in the bill procured the respective decrees which he now seeks to have set aside and annulled. In his bill the complainant alleges that he was ignorant of those fraudulent acts, omissions, and conspiracies until after the decree of the supreme court affirming the decree of the circuit court, and until after the final decree. It is conceded by the counsel on both sides, that the decree of the supreme court affirming the decree of the circuit court went into operation as early as the 7th of May, 1855. On that day the fund was paid over to the district court of the United States for the district of New Hampshire, under the final decree of the circuit court of the United States as affirmed by the supreme court, and it is admitted in argument by the counsel for the complainant that the limitation, if it applies at all, commenced to run from that date. Payment of the fund could not have been made until after the final decree in the circuit court, and the bill in effect admits that after the final decree the complainant became informed of the fraudulent acts, omissions, and conspiracies whereby those respective decrees had been procured. It is clear, therefore, that the limitation commenced as early as the 7th of May, 1855, when the fund was paid over to the bankrupt court, for distribution among the creditors of the complainant. As appears by the record, the bill in this suit was filed on the 19th of June, 1857,—more than two years after the cause of action accrued. Three propositions are assumed by the counsel for the complainant in answer to this ground of defence. In the first place, they insist in effect that so much of the answer as sets up this limitation as a bar to the suit is not properly before the court. No such defence was set up in the answer as originally filed on the 15th of August, 1857. A motion to amend the answer in this particular was made at the October term, 1858, and the amended answer was filed on the 1st of March following, which was duly allowed in court on the 16th of the same month. That motion was addressed to the discretion of the court, and being one which it was competent for the court to allow, it must be considered that it was duly and properly allowed. In the amended answer, the respondent set up the limitation in the act of congress before mentioned, and claims the same benefit of the provision as if he had pleaded the same, and the only question is whether it constitutes a bar to the suit.

It is insisted by the counsel for the complainant that it is not a bar because the respondent is not now, and was not at the time the decrees were pronounced, the legal assignee of his bankrupt estate. Their argument on this point assumes that his appointment was procured by fraudulent misrepresentations, as charged in the bill. It overlooks the important and controlling fact that all these charges of fraudulent misrepresentations as made in the bill are particularly and emphatically denied in the answer, and, being unsupported by any sufficient proof, cannot avail. In the absence of competent and sufficient proof to sustain the allegations of fraud when thus denied, it must be assumed, on the principles already explained, that the appointment was legally and properly made, and if so, then it is obvious that the proposition cannot be maintained.

One other branch of the argument only remains to be considered, and in respect to this last proposition a few words will be sufficient. It is insisted that the present bill is no more than an amendment to an original bill filed in this court on the 18th of March, 1856, which was subsequently dismissed by the court. Regarding the proposition as directly contradictory to the record in this suit, it cannot be sustained. As already remarked, this bill was filed in court on the 30th of June, 1857, and is in theory and fact an original bill, as clearly and fully appears by the record, which cannot be contradicted. King v. Robinson, 33 Me. 114, and cases cited. Suits, whether at law or in equity against an assignee in bankruptcy, under the act of congress of the 19th of August, 1841, by any person claiming an adverse interest touching the property or rights of property of the bankrupt's estate, must be brought within two years after the cause of action shall have first accrued, and if not so commenced within that time, that provision of the act of congress, if well pleaded, constitutes a complete bar to the suit. This suit was not commenced within the two years after the cause of action first accrued, and therefore is not maintainable.

On both grounds I am of the opinion that the suit cannot be maintained, and the bill is hereby dismissed with costs.

[NOTE. Complainant appealed to the supreme court, which affirmed the decree dismissing the bill, stating that the circuit court correctly held that the evidence entirely failed to establish the allegations of fraud. Mr. Justice Nelson delivered the opinion. Clark v. Hackett, 1 Black (66 U. S.) 77.]

CLARK (HARDY v.). See Case No. 6,058.

Case No. 2,824.

CLARK v. ISELIN et al.

[9 Blatchf. 196.][1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Oct. 26, 1871.

APPEAL IN BANKRUPTCY.

Where a suit in equity is brought in the district court, under the jurisdiction conferred on that court by the second section of the bankruptcy act of March 2, 1867 (14 Stat. 518), by an assignee in bankruptcy, against a person claiming an adverse interest, touching property vested in the assignee, no appeal can, before a final decree in the suit, be taken to this court, by the defendants therein, from an interlocutory decree made by the district court.

[Cited in Re Casey, Case No. 2,495.]

[In equity. Bill by James R. Clark, Jr., assignee in bankruptcy of Henry E. Dibblee, D. P. Bingley, and J. J. Knauss, against Adrian Iselin and Isaac Iselin to set aside certain transfers and securities, as in fraud of the bankrupt law. Complainants move to dismiss an appeal from an interlocutory decree of the district court.]

Charles H. Smith, for plaintiff.

Henry W. Clark, for defendants.

WOODRUFF, Circuit Judge. It is conceded that this is a suit in equity in due form, commenced by bill, and proceeding, by answer, replication and formal proofs, to a hearing and decree, upon pleadings and proofs, in the district court. The suit is brought to set aside certain transfers of securities and a payment of money, alleged to have been made by a bankrupt to the defendants, in fraud of the bankrupt law, and to compel the defendants to account therefor, and for an account of certain securities previously held by the defendants, as security for certain indebtedness by the bankrupt to them, and of the moneys collected thereon. The decree in the district court adjudged the invalidity of the first named transfers, and directed an accounting by the defendants, referring the case to a master to take the account, with special directions in relation thereto, and ordered a recovery upon the coming in and confirmation of the report of the master. It is conceded, that this decree is interlocutory, and not a final decree. From such decree the defendants appealed to this court; and the complainant now moves to dismiss the appeal, on the ground that no appeal can regularly be brought until final decree is entered in the district court.

The jurisdiction in virtue whereof this suit was brought in the district court was conferred by the second section of the bankrupt law of March 2, 1867 (14 Stat. 518), wherein it is declared, that the circuit courts "shall have concurrent jurisdiction with the district courts of the same district, of all suits at law or in equity which may or shall be brought by the assignee in bankruptcy against any person claiming an adverse interest * * * touching any property or rights of property of said bankrupt transferable to or vested in such assignee." Without this provision no such suit could have been brought in that court, and it is, therefore, true, that no provision of any prior statute regulating appeals had specific or express application to such a suit in the district court. Section 8 of the bankrupt law, however, provides, that "appeals may be taken from the district to the circuit courts in all cases in equity, * * * under the jurisdiction created by this act, when the debt or damages claimed amount to more than five hundred dollars;" and the section, after providing, also, for an appeal from a "decision" of the district court, allowing or rejecting a claim made by a supposed creditor, requires notice of the appeal to be given "within ten days after the entry of the decree or decision appealed from."

It is claimed, that there is no statute restriction which prohibits an appeal to the circuit court from an interlocutory decree made in the district court, and that, therefore, the practice of the high court of chancery in England, in this respect, like the practice in the late court of chancery in New York, permitting appeals from such decrees, ought to govern this question. Act Sept. 29, 1789 (1 Stat. 93, § 2); Act May 8, 1792 (1 Stat. 276, § 2); Hinde v. Vattier, 5 Pet. [30 U. S.] 398; Rule 90, Equity Rules Cir. Ct. It is also claimed, that the language of the eighth section, requiring that the appeal shall be taken within ten days after the entry of the "decree or decision," imports that such appeal may be taken without awaiting a final decree. There is no force in this last suggestion. The section provides for an appeal in two classes of cases, namely, in "cases in equity," and on a "decision" allowing or rejecting a claim. It was, therefore, appropriate to use the expression, "decree or decision appealed from." That language refers to, and is apt to describe, each class, and only indicates, that, in cases in equity, a decree may be the subject of appeal, and that, where a claim is allowed or rejected, the appeal is to be taken within ten days after the "decision," referring to the immediately preceding language, giving an appeal "from the decision" of the district court allowing or rejecting such claim.

I am of opinion, that the appeal, in cases in equity, must be from the final decree, and from that only. The language last referred to plainly indicates that it is to be from a decree, and not from any and every order in the progress of the cause; and yet appeals might, in England and in the state of New York, have been taken from orders in the progress of the cause, antecedent to even an interlocutory decree. The policy indicated in the legislation of congress, on the subject of appeals, as well as writs of error, in all other statutes, whether taken from the district court to the circuit court, or from the circuit court to the supreme court, is uniform, in confining the review, in the appellate tribunal, to final judgments and decrees. The judiciary act of September 24, 1789, gave an appeal to the circuit court in causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, from final decrees only. 1 Stat. 83, § 21. The review in the circuit court, provided for by the 22d section of that act, was only of final decrees and judgments. So, also, under the same act, and under the act of March 3, 1803 (2 Stat. 244), the appeal from the circuit court to the supreme court is given from final decrees only. Under the statutes giving such appeals, provision is made for the giving of a bond by the appellant, which has been uniformly held to require, if a supersedeas of execution was sought, that such bond be sufficient to secure the whole judgment or decree; and the provisions in respect to the operation of such an appeal, or writ of error, as a supersedeas of execution, if such bond be given, indicate that none other than judgments, or decrees ripe for execution are contemplated. In this respect, section 8 of the bankrupt law, now under consideration, implies the same, in the provision, that "no appeal shall be allowed unless the appellant, at the time of claiming the same, shall give bond in manner now required by law in cases of such appeals." The whole policy of the statutes has been to allow but one appeal, and that from the final decree; and no reason exists for allowing appeals from other orders or decrees, in a suit in equity brought by or against an assignee in bankruptcy, which would not have equal force in any other cause. It is true, that, if the interlocutory decree should be reversed, the labor and expense of the proceedings before the master may be lost; but that is equally true of causes in admiralty, and equally true of all appeals from the circuit court to the supreme court; and it is, moreover, true, that the proceedings before the master may not be wholly lost, even if, in some respect, the interlocutory decree be deemed erroneous. It may be modified. It may be even adapted to the facts which shall be reported by the master. Even the district court has power, on the coming in of the master's report, to conform the final decree to all the proofs in the cause. It is, at least, doubtful, whether to permit appeals from any other than final decrees does not, as the general rule, tend to prolong litigation and increase expense, without corresponding benefit; and it may well be, that congress did not, in this particular, regard the possible delays and protracted duration of chancery suits in England as desirable.

[1] [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

If, notwithstanding these suggestions, the question under the act was deemed doubtful, the authority given to the supreme court, by section 10 of the bankrupt law, to frame general orders "for regulating the practice and procedure upon appeals," followed by general order No. 26, in which the supreme court declare, that, "appeals in equity from the district to the circuit court, and from the circuit to the supreme court of the United States, shall be regulated by the rules governing appeals in equity in the courts of the United States," ought to be regarded as conclusive, at least as an opinion of the supreme court, that appeals under section 8 are to be made from final decrees only, if not a binding regulation upon the subject.

The appeal must be dismissed; but, as the question was deemed doubtful, and the appeal was taken out of abundant caution, and lest it should be urged, on appeal from the final decree, that the decision embodied in the interlocutory decree could not be reviewed, no costs should be allowed on this motion.

[NOTE. For proceedings on appeal from the final decree, and subsequent reversal of the circuit court decree thereon by the supreme court, see Case No. 2,825, next following.]

Case No. 2,825.

CLARK v. ISELIN et al.

[10 Blatchf. 204; 9 N. B. R. 19; 21 Pittsb. Leg. J. 82.][1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Oct. 2, 1872.[2]

BANKRUPTCY—UNLAWFUL PREFERENCE.

1. The mere giving of security, on a loan of money, is not an illegal preference, under the bankruptcy act.

[Cited in Re Reynolds, Case No. 11,724; Re Strenz, 8 Fed. 313.]

[See note at end of case.]

2. A creditor, holding a warrant to confess judgment, who enters judgment on it, and levies, under such judgment, an execution on the property of his debtor, at a time when the debtor knows, and the creditor has cause to believe, that the debtor is insolvent, obtains an illegal preference, under said act, even though the debtor was not insolvent when the warrant was given.

[See note at end of case.]

3. If a creditor releases the goods of a debtor from the lien of an execution in favor of such creditor, and takes a transfer of other assets from the debtor, in payment of the debt, when the debtor is insolvent, and the creditor has cause to believe so, the preference is an illegal one, under said act.

[See note at end of case.]

In equity. This was a bill in equity filed, in the district court, by the plaintiff [James R. Clark, Jr.], as assignee in bankruptcy of [Henry E. Dibblee, D. P. Bingley, and J. J. Krauss, comprising] the firm of H. E. Dibblee & Co. against [Adrian Iselin and Isaac Iselin] the members of the firm of A. Iselin & Co. The bankrupts were adjudged such,

[1] [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission. 21 Pittsb. Leg. J. 82, contains only a partial report.]

[2] [Reversed by the supreme court in Clark v. Iselin, 21 Wall. (88 U. S.) 360.]

in involuntary proceedings, on the 2d of June, 1869, the petition having been filed May 3d, 1869. [See Case No. 3,884.] The bill set forth, that, on the 25th of February, 1869, Dibblee, one of the bankrupts, without the knowledge of his other two copartners, Bingley and Krauss, gave to Iselin & Co. a confession of judgment in his own name, and in the name of the firm, for $54,100, with authority in it to enter judgment for that sum against the members of the firm, the consideration stated in the confession being securities amounting to the cash value of $54,100, loaned and advanced by Iselin & Co. to Dibblee & Co., some on the 20th of February, 1869, some on the 23d of February, 1869, and some on the 24th of February, 1869; that, on the 30th of April, 1869, Iselin & Co. entered a judgment, in their favor, against the three bankrupts, in the supreme court of New York, on such confession, for $54,100, and docketed the same, and issued an execution thereon, in which, on the same day, a levy was made on the stock in trade and merchandise of the bankrupts; that the securities mentioned in the confession of judgment were hypothecated by Dibblee, in February, 1869, to various banks in New York, as collateral security for loans made by said banks to the bankrupts, on their notes for $46,000; that, afterwards, Iselin & Co. paid the loans to the banks and received from them the securities; that, on the 1st of May, 1869, the bankrupts gave to Iselin & Co. a bill of sale of bills receivable and accounts amounting, on their face, to $47,839.52, and paid to Iselin & Co. $1,900 in cash, and Iselin & Co. accepted the same, and the securities received from said banks, which they had taken subject to their lien thereon for the money they had paid to said banks, in satisfaction of said judgment and execution, and the same were thereupon cancelled and satisfied of record; that the advance of the securities hypothecated to said banks was made by Iselin & Co. to enable the bankrupts to borrow money and apply it, or to apply other money, and which money was applied, to pay other debts due by the bankrupts to Iselin & Co.; that, in March and April, 1869, the bankrupts transferred to Iselin & Co. upwards of $61,000 of their assets, as collateral security for $61,000 of indebtedness to Iselin & Co., part of which Iselin & Co. had collected at the time the petition in bankruptcy was filed; that, between March 22d, 1869, and May 1st, 1869, the bankrupts paid to Iselin & Co. $20,108.52, in payment of $20,000 of call loans made by Iselin & Co. to the bankrupts on March 5th, 6th and 8th, 1869; that, on or about April 8th, 1869, the bankrupts paid to Iselin & Co. $7,944.88, for interest on prior indebtedness; that these transactions took place with a view, on the part of the bankrupts, to give a preference to Iselin & Co., as creditors of the bankrupts, and when the bankrupts were insolvent, and in fraud of the bankruptcy act; and that Iselin & Co. had reasonable cause to believe the bankrupts to be insolvent, and that a fraud on said act was intended by such dispositions of property. The bill prayed, that the title of Iselin & Co. to the securities and moneys so paid and assigned to them be decreed to be fraudulent and void as against the plaintiff, and that Iselin & Co. be decreed to account for, and pay to the plaintiff, the value of said securities, (less the amount for which the same were hypothecated to said banks), and all payments and transfers so made by the bankrupts to Iselin & Co., and the value of the assets so assigned in March and April, 1869, and by the bill of sale of May 1st, 1869. The district court decreed that the title of Iselin & Co. to the property assigned by the bill of sale of May 1st, 1869, and to the $1,900, and to the securities received from the banks, (subject to the amount paid by Iselin & Co. to redeem the same), was void, under the bankruptcy act, as against the plaintiff, and that Iselin & Co. should be precluded from proving in bankruptcy their judgment for $54,100, or debt for which it was recovered, and should account for the said property and money and securities. The final decree was for $61,988.14. In other respects the prayer of the bill was denied. [Case unreported.] Both parties appealed to this court.

[For dismissal of a prior appeal from the interlocutory decree, see Case No. 2,824, next preceding.]

Charles H. Smith, for plaintiff.

Stephen P. Nash and Henry W. Clark, for defendants.

WOODRUFF, Circuit Judge. The uncharitable prejudice which regards every one who does not pay his debts as a knave, and esteems every one who has befriended him a conspirator to defraud others, may, perhaps, find reasons for most unjust imputations upon the defendants in this cause. They are, in my opinion, wholly unwarranted by the proofs. On the contrary, looking to the purpose and intent of the actors in the transactions in question, the proofs fail to show any actual bad faith, or want of the highest integrity, in either of them.

The assignment made to Iselin & Co., May 1st, 1869, was, I think, a violation of the provisions of the bankrupt law, in the sense, that, by that law, it was invalid; but, even this was, I think, made under a real misapprehension, in the mistaken belief that it was proper, and in the discharge of a valid lien, which it was for the interest of the insolvent firm and its creditors to remove from their stock of goods then in the possession of the sheriff.

I think there was nothing in the transactions prior to that date, which was liable to any imputation, either as fraudulent in fact, or as contravening the provisions of the bankrupt law. Lending to the firm of H. E. Dibblee & Co. $54,100, and taking security therefor, whether in the form of a confession of judgment, or a pledge of promissory notes, or a bond and mortgage of real estate, was not the taking of a preference, in any sense of that term, used in the bankrupt law. Had the firm, on the 25th of February, 1869, applied to an insurance company, or an individual having funds, for a loan upon bond and mortgage, and, receiving the loan, had given security, no one could say that an illegal preference had been given. In that case, and equally in the case of the loan made by Iselin & Co. here, the firm received the whole amount for which the lenders took security. The estate of the firm was enhanced for the payment of debts, or for the purposes of business, to the precise extent which it was burthened by the giving of the security. The balance sheet remained the same. If Iselin & Co. had been content to rest on the security they then had, I think their position would have been safe from impeachment on any ground.

Whether they could, after knowledge or reason to believe that H. E. Dibblee & Co. were insolvent, proceed, (on the authority given on the 25th of February,) to enter up judgment, and levy and collect the amount by execution, is, however, a different question. They would, at least, have been permitted to prove the debt against the estate of the bankrupts, even if the proceedings in bankruptcy had intervened, to prevent their having the benefit of the authority to enter up a judgment. Prior to the entry of judgment, Iselin & Co. had in their hands an instrument authorizing the entry of a judgment, but had, in fact, no lien upon the property of the firm. This instrument was called a security, but it was, in truth, only a means or instrument placed in their control, by which security and payment might be effected. It contemplated the possible necessity of being made effective, but it was, in itself, only inchoate, and, so long as it remained in the hands of Iselin & Co., it had no legal operation, and vested in them no right of property in any part of the estate of the debtors, either absolute, qualified, or contingent. In this condition of Iselin & Co. and Dibblee & Co., the proof shows, I think, that both Dibblee and Iselin became satisfied that the firm of the former was insolvent, and then attempted to make the instrument previously executed effectual.

It may be conceded, that it would have been a violation of good faith for Dibblee to do anything to prevent Iselin & Co. from obtaining full security by means of a judgment. It may even be conceded, that, as between Iselin & Co. and Dibblee & Co., the former had acquired an unquestionable right, both legal and equitable, to enter up judgment and enforce it. But, this is not the test of their right as against creditors, when Dibblee & Co. were adjudged bankrupt. Iselin & Co. had obtained no actual preference, when the affairs of Dibblee & Co. reached such a condition, that Dibblee must have known, and Iselin had cause to believe, and, I think, did believe, that the debtors were insolvent, and entered up the judgment, for obtaining the actual security and preference which it was in his power to effect through the instrument theretofore executed. In this point, the case does not differ from an example readily suggested. Suppose Iselin & Co. had made a loan, upon a promise by Dibblee & Co. in proper legal form, to give a bond and mortgage as security, whenever required. It would be bad faith in Dibblee thereafter to refuse to give the bond and mortgage, or to do anything which deprived him of the power to give such bond and mortgage, as a valid security; and yet, if, before it was given, Dibblee became or was insolvent, and Iselin became aware of it, the performance of the promise would have been, in fact, a giving and receiving a preference, and not less so because of the previous promise. So, of a promise to give a judgment; and so, of a writing actually delivered to Iselin & Co., but not made effective. As against creditors, the right to carry the promise, or the intention, into effect, is defeated. As against them, the actual gaining of the preference is forbidden. In the case of the promised bond and mortgage, I think this would not be questioned; and I perceive no distinction between the cases. As against the debtors, a court of equity would enforce their duty to make the contemplated security; and, in the absence of any conflicting rule, that court would consider that done which ought to be done, and so give effect to the intended security, as of the time when the loan was made. But, when the provisions of an express statute have intervened, and the exigency has arisen in which the statute declares the right of creditors to an equal distribution of the property, I think the creditor who has, in the mean time, relied upon an executory promise, or upon his possession of what is practically a mere authority to acquire and enforce a lien, must rest where he finds himself. To then give or take the preference is prohibited.

This is not all. On the 1st of May, after the insolvency of the firm was clear, the debtors made an actual transfer of assets, for the payment of the debt to Iselin & Co., and consented that the latter obtain further payment, by redeeming other assets from banks to which they were pledged for less than their value. This was a clear preference of Iselin & Co., whatever motive, in respect to liberating the stock of goods from the levy of the execution, may have prompted it. Freedom from the lien of the execution was an inducement to this transfer, but did not justify it. The creditors of the bankrupts had a right to have the estate in the condition in which it was when Dibblee & Co. and Iselin & Co. became conscious of the insolvency, and of the effect of paying Iselin & Co. their debt.

These views result in an affirmance of the decree made below, so far as the surplus of the assets redeemed from banks, the cash payment of $1,900, and the transfer of the notes and accounts mentioned in the assignment of the 1st of May, 1869, were declared void as against the complainant, and so far, also, as it excludes Iselin & Co. from proving the debt thereby attempted to be paid.

As to the sum of $2,229.08, also decreed to be paid to the assignee, I am not able to discover, from the proofs, nor from the stipulation made by the parties, when this surplus, (over and above the amount due to Iselin & Co. upon their previous advances,) accrued. If they had collected it, and held it, at or before the petition in bankruptcy against Dibblee & Co. was filed, then they are entitled to retain it, and to apply it on the debt which was secured, or attempted to be secured, by the judgment. That debt was, and still is, a valid debt against the bankrupts, notwithstanding the creditors are not permitted to prove it against the estate in the hands of the assignee; and, if the moneys referred to are collected, so as to constitute a debt from Iselin & Co. to Dibblee & Co., by overpayment or collection on the securities for the other advances, then their claim against the bankrupts, for which the judgment was confessed, was a valid set off thereto, and Iselin & Co. should not be required to pay over that surplus to the assignee. The bankrupt law allows and requires such set off. Any collections in excess of the advances for which they were specifically pledged, made after the filing of the said petition, were collections for the account of the assignee, and, as to them, no such right of set off exists. As this point was not urged by counsel as an impeachment of the decree, I conclude that the sum of $2,229.08, in question, was so collected. If so, the decree must be affirmed; and, as both parties have appealed, neither should be allowed costs, as against the other.

[NOTE. Both parties appealed to the supreme court, where the decree of the circuit court was reversed,—the majority of the court holding, per Mr. Justice Strong, that the return of the notes held by defendants as collateral to Dibblee & Co. was merely to facilitate the collection thereof, and in no degree affected defendants' title thereto; that the withdrawal of the collateral for the first three notes, and the contemporaneous pledging of others in their stead, amounted to a mere exchange of securities; that the circumstances of the transactions between defendants and the bankrupts sufficiently showed that defendants did not suspect the insolvency of Dibblee & Co. at the time of the transactions in question, nor was there any evidence that during this period the bankrupts contemplated insolvency. The court further held that the confession of judgment was lawfully made, and that the subsequent entry of the judgment, the issue of the execution, and the levy thereunder, were not fraudulent, nor a procurement by the bankrupts of a seizure of their property with a view on their part to give a preference under the thirty-fifth section of the bankrupt act. Clark v. Iselin, 21 Wall. (88 U. S.) 360.]

Case No. 2,826.

CLARK v. KENNEDY MANUF'G CO. et al.

[14 Blatchf. 79;[1] 2 Ban. & A. 479; 11 O. G. 67.]

Circuit Court, D. Connecticut. Jan. 1, 1877.

PATENTS—"MANUFACTURE OF BOLTS"—CONSTRUCTION—INFRINGEMENT.

The invention set forth in reissued letters patent No, 6,291, granted to William J. Clark, February 16th, 1875, for an "improvement in the manufacture of bolts from round rods," consists in the manner in which the inventor applies lateral compression to the manufacture of an angular neck, and in the manner in which he permits the shaping mechanism to become anvil heads upon which the header can operate to form a head upon the bolt. The patent is to be construed as claiming a method or process, which consists in the combination of the operation of swaging the blank laterally by the described dies, or their equivalent, operating in substantially the same way, with the operation of upsetting the end of the bolt upon the anvil ends of the dies, to form the head. It does not claim broadly swaging by suitable dies, combined with upsetting to form a head. Therefore, a machine in which the swaging is produced by dies of a construction radically different from the dies of the patent, does not infringe the patent.

[In equity. Bill by William J. Clark against the Kennedy Manufacturing Company and Edwin Hills to restrain infringement of the second reissue of patent No. 43,669, the first reissue of which was numbered 1,916.]

Charles E. Mitchell and Benjamin F. Thurston, for plaintiff.

Charles R. Ingersoll, for defendants.

SHIPMAN, District Judge. This is a bill in equity to restrain the defendants from an alleged infringement of reissued letters patent of the United States, No. 6,291, granted to the plaintiff and dated February 16th, 1875, for an "improvement in the manufacture of bolts from round rods." The original patent was ante-dated February 2d, 1864, and the first reissue was dated March 28th, 1865. The answer alleges that the second reissue was not for the invention which was described in the original patent, and denies that the defendants have infringed the patent, and denies that the plaintiff was the first inventor of the patented improvement.

The main question in the case is in regard to infringement, and this question involves the precise character and extent of the plaintiff's invention, and the proper construction of the letters patent. It is necessary to ascertain, in the first place, from the testimony as to the state of the art, and from the original and reissued patents, what was the invention of the patentee. Prior to the date of the plaintiff's invention, angular necked, round stemmed and headed bolt blanks had been made from iron whose cross section was square. The round stem, which was to receive the screw thread, was made cylindrical by rolling or hammering, which required expensive machinery and much labor. Angular necked bolt blanks were also made from the round iron of commerce. These blanks were formed in dies, a portion of which was round and a portion was square, but the neck of the bolt was formed wholly by the operation of upsetting or driving the metal into the square fixed matrix of the dies. It was practically impossible by the upsetting process to form a neck whose length would exceed the diameter of the bolt. The average length of the necks of bolts made by "staving up" was somewhat less than the diameter of the bolt. The head was formed by the same upsetting operation. It is necessary that the neck should be of considerable length, in order to prevent the bolt from turning around after it is driven into the wood and the nut is screwed upon the shank. The necks of staved up bolts were too short, and the bolts revolved in the wood. It is also desirable that the corners of the neck should be full and angular, so that the bolt may remain firmly imbedded in its place. The plaintiff's invention resulted in making from round iron an angular necked, round stemmed and headed bolt blank, having a neck of sufficient length to meet these mechanical requirements. He succeeded in making a cheap bolt, which has gone into general use, and the validity of his patent has been substantially acknowledged by the manufacturers of the country. His mechanism is described in the original specification as follows: "I construct a pair of dies of cast iron or other metal, making the grooves therein, for a portion of their lengths, of a semi-cylindrical form, and the remaining portion of an angular form. Each die being provided with a groove of this character, will permit the two, when placed together, to present at one end a cylindrical opening corresponding in diameter to that of the cylindrical bolt blank, while the opening at the opposite end, instead of being cylindrical, will be square or angular, but of similar sectional area to the cylindrical end, so that, when the two dies are forced together upon the bolt blank, (which is heated to a proper degree before being placed therein,) that part of the blank lying within the angular portion of the grooves will be swaged out, and forced to take the angular form corresponding to that of the angular portion of the groove, while the part lying within the cylindrical portion of the groove will retain its original shape, and, while the bolt blank is held in the dies, they form an anvil upon which a portion of the blank projecting from the dies, at the end containing the angular grooves, is upset, and formed into a head, by any proper machinery."

[1] [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

It will be understood that the process of moulding or shaping hot iron by swaging had long been understood at the date of the original patent, and that the manufacture of bolt blanks by swaging or lateral compression was also then known. Round necked bolts from square iron had been made by swaging, and square headed bolts had been made by the same process, but square necked bolts had not been made from round iron by lateral compression, prior to the plaintiff's invention.

The plaintiff, in the first place, insists that his invention consisted in constructing the angular neck mainly by the operation of swaging, supplemented by the operation of staving up, so that the neck of his bolt had all the advantages of swaging, in point of length, and was completed by the necessary result of the action of the header in forming the head, by pressing and forcing the metal into the mould, and that the invention resides in the combination of these two separate operations, which co-operate with each other in forming the bolt. The defendants, while conceding the importance of the invention, insist that it consists in the peculiar character of the dies which are described in the patent.

The main object of the patentee was to construct an angular necked bolt blank from round iron. The blank was, of course, to be headed, for a head is a necessary part of a bolt, and it was to be headed by some kind of upsetting machinery theretofore in use; but his inventive skill was directed to the construction of an angular necked bolt which was to be headed by old mechanism of some sort. If the patentee had supposed that the assistance which the upsetting operation furnished to the swaging operation, in the formation of the neck, was a part of his invention, the second reissue would naturally have distinctly pointed out this feature. The important part of the specification is as follows: "According to my invention, I make an angular necked, round stemmed, headed bolt blank from a round piece of iron, by first forming the neck into an angular shape in cross section by lateral pressure at all sides simultaneously, and then, while the said piece is firmly held in proper position, forming its projecting end into a protuberant head of the desired contour, by upsetting against the dies, as an anvil, by suitable machinery, that acts to upset the metal against the anvil ends of the closed dies, and form the head by a motion in the line of the axis of the bolt blank. * * * The operation of the dies is as follows: A round piece or rod of metal, suitably heated, is placed between the open swaging dies, with a sufficient portion protruding at the anvil ends thereof to form the head. A lateral pressure is then brought against the dies and they are forced together, giving to the metal substantially the angular shape of the matrix formed by the dies. While the metal remains thus held, the upsetting machinery drives the protuberant end of the rod or piece longitudinally against the anvil ends of the closed dies, thereby forming the bolt head by upsetting the metal against the anvil ends of the dies, which only shape its under surface." It is true, that the patentee says that the lateral pressure gives to the metal "substantially the angular shape of the matrix formed by the dies," but he does not say that the shape is perfected by the upsetting operation, or give any further suggestion that the upsetting machinery performs any other office than that of shaping the head. Neither was there any testimony to the effect that, after the metal had been swaged, the angular shape of the neck was made more perfect and complete by the upsetting operation. It is undoubtedly true, that the portion of the neck under the head is made more full by the upsetting process, but the angularity of the neck is not increased thereby; and in neither of the patents is this fullness claimed as an improvement, or that the formation of the neck by the aid of upsetting is a part of the invention. On the contrary, the patentee says, in his first reissue, that the fullness is not intentional, but is incident to the operation of making the head. Again, the first two claims of the patent, which are the process claims, are as follows: "1. The process, substantially as hereinbefore set forth, of forming from a round piece of metal a headed bolt blank having an angular neck and a round stem, which process consists in subjecting a portion of the length of the round piece of metal to lateral swaging or compression on all sides simultaneously, to form the angular neck, and, while the piece is firmly held with the neck portion inclosed at all sides, upsetting the projecting end of the swaged piece of metal, to form the head of the bolt blank. 2. The process, substantially as hereinafter set forth, of forming the angular neck and protuberant head of a bolt, which consists in subjecting a round piece of metal to lateral swaging between angular grooved dies, the end surfaces of which dies, when closed, form the anvil against which the projecting end of the swaged piece of metal is upset and formed into a head by proper machinery." From the language of each of these claims, it appears to be manifest, that the formation of the neck is claimed to be effected by the swaging dies, before the heading machinery commences the formation of the head; and all that is claimed for the heading machinery is the compression of the head against the anvil ends of the dies.

It is next contended, that the invention consisted in the making a new and useful bolt by a process composed of two operations —the first, that of lateral swaging by dies capable of swaging; and the second, that of upsetting, to form the head—and also consists of a process to produce the result by means of certain described mechanism. It is true, that the bolt is formed by both swaging the neck and upsetting the head, and that the patentee is entitled to claim the upsetting in combination with the swaging operation, because these operations in combination had not existed in the formation of an angular necked and headed bolt from round iron. The gist of the invention and the inventive skill, however, consisted in making an angular necked blank from round iron, and, irrespective of the claims of the patent, and regarding the state of the art in connection with what was actually done by the patentee, I am of opinion, that his invention, or the new and useful method by which he manufactured bolts, consisted in the manner in which he applied lateral compression to the manufacture of an angular neck, and in the manner in which he permitted the shaping mechanism to become anvil heads upon which the header could operate to form a head upon the bolt. The patentee did not discover that swaging round iron would form an angular neck, and that upsetting would form a head, and that both operations would form a bolt; but he did invent, what was previously unknown, the mechanical means by which swaging would form an angular neck from round iron, which mechanism could be used in connection with upsetting. This opinion is confirmed by the description which the patentee gives of his invention in the specification of his reissued patent, which has been quoted, and in which the mode of operation is clearly described.

Such being the character and extent of the invention, the next question is, as to the construction which shall be given to the reissued patent. The first two claims, upon which the controversy mainly turns, have been quoted. The defendants contend that these claims can only be sustained by a construction which shall limit the process to the use of the specified dies, and that, if the claims are broadly for a process, irrespective of the peculiar mechanism, the reissued patent is for an invention which was not indicated in any part of the original patent or in the drawings attached thereto. The claim in the original patent is as follows: "The combination and use of metallic dies for the purpose of giving angular shape to a portion of a cylindrical bolt, by compression laterally, leaving the remaining portion of the bolt in its original form, and which dies, at the same time, serve the purpose of an anvil, upon which the head of a bolt is formed, by upsetting a projecting portion thereof, substantially as set forth;" and the plaintiff insists, that, inasmuch as the patentee's process involved both the swaging and upsetting operations and possessed the advantages of each, the reissue was properly allowed.

I am of opinion that the reissue was properly granted, and that the patentee had a right either to claim his invention as a process, within certain limitations, or as a part of a machine. But the patentee cannot, by obtaining a reissue for a process, enlarge his right to a monopoly beyond the actual invention; and, when it is insisted that he invented a new process of using his improved dies or any other dies, "which process consisted in the combination of the operation of swaging the blank laterally, with the operation of upsetting the end of the bolt to form the head," such a proposition is broader than the invention will justify. All that can properly be claimed in behalf of the patentee is, that he has invented a new way of manufacturing bolt blanks by the described swaging dies, to be used in connection with upsetting machinery; and his invention may properly be claimed as a method or process, which process consisted in the combination of the operation of swaging the blank laterally by the described dies, or their equivalent, operating in substantially the same way, with the operation of upsetting the end of the bolt upon the anvil ends of the dies, to form the head. The thing invented and patented was not any mode of swaging combined with upsetting, but it was "the employment of specified means, or their equivalents, for the accomplishment of a desired end." Roberts v. Dickey [Case No. 11,899]. By limiting the first and second claims of the reissued patent to the use substantially of the dies described in the specification, or their equivalents, the patent will not be broader than the invention, and no question can be made that it is not for the same matter which is contained in the original patent. But the plaintiff is not limited to the exact form of the dies which is mentioned in the third claim. That form is not particularly relied upon in the specification and is not a material part of the mechanism.

The remaining question is in regard to infringement. The round portion and the square portion of the plaintiff's dies are of similar area, and, by means of this similarity, the swaging operation is performed. The form of the defendants' dies is substantially like that of the dies which were previously used to form bolts by the upsetting operation alone. One of the defendants' dies is solid, the upper part being V-shaped and the lower part cylindrical. The other die is in two separate parts, each portion being the same as the corresponding portion of the solid die. The area of the squaring dies is larger than the area of the round dies, so that there can be no lateral compression by the angular dies until after the intervention of some operation other than the grasping of the iron by the dies. If the ordinary round rod of commerce is placed within the dies, and the two parts of the divided die are placed upon a line with each other, and the dies are brought together, there will be no swaging. Swaging in this machine takes place only after the header has begun to operate. Although the fact that swaging does take place was denied by the defendants, the sharp and well-defined corners of the neck portion of the blank, and the result of the operation, prove that the bolts have been swaged. The swaging must have been effected in one of two ways. Sometimes the separate square part of the necking die is not set in a line with the round or griping portion, and the griping dies come in position and are locked before the squaring dies are locked. Meanwhile, the header has partially filled the matrix with hot iron, and, while the header is within a very short distance from the ends of the dies, the angular dies come completely together upon the iron which has been pressed into the matrix and complete the square by lateral compression. Again, when the separate portions of the die are on a line, the separate angular die is held in its place much less firmly than the round die. The round die is held in place by the whole strength of the frame of the machine, while the angular die is so weakly held that it yields or "gives" a little as the iron is being upset by the header. Then, and before the header has completed its movement by about one-eighth of an inch, a second cam comes into action behind the angular die, for the purpose of locking it, and forces the die laterally, whereby the swaging operation is performed.

Is the swaging operation in the two machines effected in substantially the same way? In one, the iron is swaged in dies which are constructed to swage, in which the different parts of the dies are of similar sectional area. In the other, the angular neck is substantially made by upsetting the iron into a matrix, and is completed by swaging. In the plaintiff's machine, the necks are swaged, and the head is formed by upsetting. In the defendants', the necks are formed by upsetting and by swaging. But the material difference is, that the swaging is produced by dies of a construction radically different from the plaintiff's dies, and, unless swaging by suitable dies, combined with upsetting to form a head, is secured by the plaintiff's patent, it will not be contended that the defendants' machine is an infringement.

The vital point in the case is in regard to the extent of the plaintiff's invention, and the construction to be, therefore, given to his patent. In order to constitute infringement, a broad construction must be placed upon the patent, so as to include any machine for making bolts from round iron, in which machine the two operations of forming the angular neck by dies which will swage, and forming the head by upsetting, are combined. Such a construction, I have already said, is, in my opinion, broader than the actual invention.

"The general terms, and, sometimes, special words, in the claims, must receive such a construction as may enlarge or contract the scope of the claim, so as to uphold that invention, and only that invention, which the patentee has actually made and described, where such construction is not absolutely inconsistent with the language of the claim." Estabrook v. Dunbar [Case No. 4,535].

The bill is dismissed, with costs.

CLARK (LANMON v.). See Case No. 8,071.

Case No. 2,827.

CLARK et al. v. LAWRENCE et al.

[Brunner, Col. Cas. 637;[1] 21 Law Rep. 392.]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. 1856.

OFFICERS OF CORPORATIONS—LIABILITY TO CREDITORS FOR NEGLIGENCE.

An action on the case cannot be maintained by a creditor of a corporation against the directors thereof for gross negligence in the management of its affairs, whereby its property has been wasted and its means of paying the plaintiff destroyed.

[Cited in Cleveland v. La Crosse & M. R. Co., Case No. 2,887.]

[At law. Actions by Robert A. Clark and others against Samuel S. Lawrence and others for negligence.]

H. M. Parker, for plaintiffs.

Mr. Merwin, contra.

CURTIS, Circuit Justice. The question raised by the demurrer to the declaration in this case is, whether a creditor of a corporation can maintain an action on the case at the common law in Massachusetts against the directors of the corporation, for gross negligence in the management of its affairs, whereby its property was wasted and its means of paying the plaintiffs destroyed. In Smith v. Hurd, 12 Metc. [Mass.] 371, it was decided that such an action could not be maintained by a stockholder of a banking corporation, and the same law in reference to a manufacturing corporation was laid down in Abbott v. Merriam, 8 Cush. 588. Most of the considerations upon which that decision was rested are equally applicable, and some apply with even greater force to the case of a creditor. They are:—1. That the directors are the agents of the corporation and not of the creditors, and there is no legal privity between them. That for misfeasances and nonfeasances in the execution of their agency, whereby their principals are injured, agents are responsible only to their principals: and that this rule is as applicable to corporate agents, as to agents of natural persons. 2. An injury done to the capital of a corporation is not, in contemplation of law, an injury to each of its creditors. It is true, such injury may prevent the corporation from paying its debts, in whole or in part; and a similar injury to an individual may be followed by the same consequence to his creditors. But compensation for such injuries must be sought by the party on whom they are inflicted; and actions for them cannot be maintained by every one who is so connected with the principal as to suffer consequentially and indirectly through him. 3. If one creditor may have such an action, every creditor may; and thus a vast multiplicity of suits may be brought for one wrong. 4. How can a court of law, in each of such actions, take an account of the corporate property and debts, and decide how far its liability to pay its debts has been destroyed by the acts of the directors, and apportion among the creditors the damages which the directors are liable to pay? and, if not thus apportioned, what is to be done? 5. If a creditor may have such an action, he may compound and release it; and what effect is that to have upon the claims by the corporation for the same damages? and what effect upon the rights of other creditors?

Without pursuing these inquiries, I think it clear that such an action as this cannot be maintained consistently with the principles of the common law. The demurrer must be sustained, and the declaration adjudged bad.

[1] [Reported by Albert Brunner, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

Case No. 2,828.

CLARK v. The LEOPARD.

[4 Law Rep. 153.]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. July 7, 1841.

BOTTOMRY BONDS TO CONSIGNEE OF VESSEL.

1. Under the circumstances of this case, the court refused to enforce certain bottomry bonds.

[2. Where the consignee of a vessel employs her as he sees fit, without accounting for her earnings, he cannot enforce bonds on the vessel taken by him for wages, port charges, insurance, and the like.]

This was a libel filed for the recovery of several sums of money, alleged to have been advanced at different times by the libellant in the years 1834 and 1835, and claimed to be secured by different instruments, designated as bottomry bonds. The Ocean Insurance Company appeared as claimant, under protest, as owners of a bottomry bond executed by P. & C. Flint & Co., on the 20th July, 1833, on a loan of $8,000, and excepted to the jurisdiction of the court, on the ground that the bonds stated in the libel were not bottomry bonds, (1) inasmuch as the respective masters of the bark had bound themselves personally and at all events for the repayment of the money; and (2) because the lender took upon himself no maritime risks, although there was a stipulation for maritime interest in the different instruments. A defensive allegation was also made, that if the instruments were to be considered as of the character of bottomry bonds, they ought not to have priority over the bond of the claimant, because the libellant had wrongfully taken possession of the bark, and the expenses, &c., to secure which the bonds articled were taken, arose during a wrongful detention. There was much evidence in the case, but the most important of it disclosed the following facts: In January, 1834, an arrangement was made in Boston, between the Flints, Clark, and S. Austin, agent for George Wildes & Co., to send the bark to the Havana, to Clark's consignment, to be there loaded for Cowes and a market. In February afterwards the Flints stopped payment, and made an assignment of their property to Cartwright & Train, for the benefit of their creditors: the latter confirmed the arrangement about the bark, but Clark declined to become a party to the assignment; sent out to the Havana to countermand the loading of the bark, and claimed to hold her as security, or rather, as he termed it, to "embargo her," for the amount due to him from Flint & Co. Both the assignees and the Ocean Insurance Company sent out powers to the Havana to demand there the restoration of the bark, but were unsuccessful in the object. Those of the bonds articled in the libel were executed at Havana during the detention, one by the master originally appointed, the others by masters appointed under the direction of Clark. It appeared, that after some detention, the bark was despatched by Clark on various voyages, and without crediting the freights earned against the expenses, he passed them to the credit side of a general account with the Flints, and debited them with a loss on cargo upon one of the voyages. The bonds were taken by his direction, so as to include wages and all port charges, with insurance, &c. Eventually the bark was sent to Antwerp, where a fourth bond of similar character was executed, and from that port she departed for and arrived at Montevideo, where, after legal proceedings of many months' duration, the bark was delivered up by the tribunals to the agents of the assignees. To cover the expenses of these last proceedings, a fifth bond was executed, under which the vessel returned to Boston in the spring of 1837. No sanction to the doings of Clark appeared to have been given at any time by the Flints, the assignees, or the insurance company.

The case was argued at much length more than a year ago, and has since been retained under advisement.

Mr. Washburn, for libellant.
Aylwin & Paine, for claimant.

DAVIS, District Judge, now delivered his opinion. After remarking that the case was peculiar, and having much in the various transactions that was strange, he proceeded shortly to recapitulate the facts. Passing over the exceptions taken to the jurisdiction, and the point raised, whether the libellant was entitled to any relief either in a court of law or equity, he held that Clark, having abandoned his character of consignee, had placed himself in a position that did not permit the court to enforce the instruments articled as bottomry bonds. He gave up the relation of consignee, in which, under proper circumstances, a bond might be taken to himself, and chose to employ the vessel as he saw fit, without accounting for the earnings. It was impossible that these bonds could be sustained here, whatever might be done in any other jurisdiction. The judge then declared that he must dismiss the libel with costs to the claimants.

Case No. 2,829.

CLARK et al. v. MANUFACTURERS' INS. CO.

[2 Woodb. & M. 472.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. May Term, 1847.[2]

INSURANCE — REPRESENTATIONS — WARRANTY — ADOPTION BY RENEWAL — NOTICE OF CHANGE — ACTION ON POLICY — DEFENSES — RECOVERY OF PREMIUMS — NEW TRIAL — PRACTICE.

1. Where a policy in the body of it refers to representations made by the assured, and provides that they are to be true, or the insurance is void, it is competent to show by evidence, dehors the policy, what the representations were.

[Cited in Albion Lead Works v. Williamsburg City F. Ins. Co., 2 Fed. 486.]

2. The usual printed questions and written answers as to cotton manufactories, made before an insurance existed in this case, as to this establishment, are presumed to be those referred to, until the contrary is shown.

3. A warranty is generally a stipulation made and described in the policy itself, and must be complied with, whether material or not; but a representation is generally not given in detail in the policy, but verbally, or in a separate writing, if the property be situated at a distance.

4. After an insurance has been renewed several times, in new names often, but for the same party largely in interest at each time, and no new representations are filed, and it is applied for by that party as agent, and for a continuance or renewal of the former insurance, this is competent evidence to show an adoption or subsequent assent to those representations, as being what is referred to in the policy.

5. Where a material fact is suppressed in such representations, the insurance is avoided, and the policy does not attach, whether the suppression happens by neglect or fraud.

[Cited in Nicoll v. American Ins. Co., Case No. 10,259.]

6. So if a material change happens after in the mode of using the property insured, and notice of this is not given to the insurer, at the time or before a renewal, the old and new policy both become null.

7. In assumpsit to recover for a loss by fire on a policy of insurance, with counts for money had and received, as well as on the policy, the plaintiff is entitled to recover for any premiums paid, where the policy did not attach; but they must have been paid by the same plaintiff, and within six years.

[1] [Reported by Charles L. Woodbury, Esq., and George Minot, Esq.]

[2] [Reversed in Clark v. Manufacturers' Ins. Co., 8 How. (49 U. S.) 235.]

8. Where the representation was, that no lamps were used in the picking room of a manufactory, and lamps had been suspended and occasionally used there for several years, the policy did not attach. Lamps so suspended, and used when needed, must be considered, in common parlance, as used all the time, and not merely when lighted up.

9. Neglect in trusting to the memory of an agent, rather than examining the written representation on file, will not prevent a recovery back of the premiums in such case; but a fraudulent use of lamps, knowingly contrary to the representation, would prevent it.

10. Where a trial was had on the merits to recover for a loss, and a verdict was ordered for the defendants, and the claim for return of premiums was not tried, but was moved for at a subsequent day in the term, the court considered this as virtually a motion for a new trial.

11. After argument, the new trial pro forma was allowed; but it was ordered that the premiums should be returned, on condition that the plaintiff pay the costs of the first trial, the defendants having prevailed in the chief matter in controversy, viz. their liability to pay the amount of the insurance.

At law. This was an action on a policy by the defendants in favor of the plaintiffs [Eli Clark, William Green, and Hugh McGill], made August 13th, 1845. It was on a cotton factory and machinery, situated in Malone, in the state of New York, for $14,000, and was to run one year from the date. The property was alleged to be under a contract of sale by the Ogdensburg Bank to the plaintiffs, the consideration of which having not been paid, any loss happening was to be paid to said bank. A total loss of the buildings and machinery was averred to have occurred on the 13th of March, 1846. Notice and demand were alleged; and, at the trial here under the general issue of non-assumpsit at October term, 1846, the notice and demand, as well as the loss by fire and the execution of the policy, were proved or admitted. It was further proved, that the title of this property was in the Ogdensburg Bank, derived by mortgage deed and sheriff's sale, from Jonathan Stearns, between 1832 and 1838; and that the bank, January 26, 1842, contracted to sell the same to the plaintiffs, on certain terms; the plaintiffs, in the mean time, to have possession and insure the buildings and machinery, and assign the policy to the bank. Certain payments were proved to have been made on this contract, but the sum of $14,054 was still due.

The evidence showed, likewise, that the fire originated in the picking-room, which was situated in the center of the building, and in which a glass lamp was permanently suspended from the ceiling, and into which room a glass lantern was carried that evening, and placed by the workman on the window-sill while the picker was in operation. Around the top of this lantern he first saw the light and fire, as if the cotton-dust had become ignited through the air-holes, and the fire was communicated with such rapidity to the whole cotton he was unable to extinguish it. The evidence showed further, that when the picking-room had been occasionally used to work in during the night-time, this lantern, or one like it, had, for three years, been carried in; and that the globe lamp had been long used there suspended with a reflector over the top, and was lighted, when they worked at night in the picking-room, as well as the lantern. This appeared to have been the practice soon after 1834 or 1835, but no evidence was offered that it had been before.

It was also shown, in the progress of the case, that the first insurance on this property by the defendants was made July 1, 1834, to J. Stearns, for one year. It was made after previous representations by Stearns in writing, April 24, 1834, in answer to fifty interrogatories concerning the building and machinery and securities against fire. Among them were the 33d and 34th, with the answers annexed, in the following words: "(33.) How is this building lighted? If there be any lights, not inclosed in glass, used in any part of the building, state in which of the rooms such lights are used? (Answer.) No open lamps used in any part of the building except the machine-shop, and those are intended to be kept covered. (34.) Is the picker inside of the building? If within, state where situated and how secured. If in a separate building, state if the passage-way communicating with the factory is secured by an iron door at each end, or how otherwise secured? (Answer.) The picker is inside of the building; but no lamps used in the picking-room. The doors are wood, and not secured."

In that policy to Stearns was the following agreement by him: "The assured warrant that the waste shall be removed as often as once in forty-eight hours, to a safe distance from the mill, and that the lamps in the carding-rooms shall be inclosed in glass." It was further inserted as a condition in the policy, that "being made and accepted upon the representation of the said assured, contained in his application therefor, (to which reference is to be had,) it is fully understood by and between the parties thereto, that if said representation does not contain a full and true exposition of all the facts and circumstances in relation to the condition, situation, value and risk of the property hereby insured, so far as the same are material to the risk; or if the situation of the property or the circumstances affecting the risk shall be, during the existence of this policy, altered or changed by or through the advice, consent or agency of the assured, so as to increase the risk hereby assumed," &c. &c., "then, and in every such case, the risk hereby assumed shall cease, and this policy shall become void." There was an agreement on the back of that policy by the agent for the defendants, assenting to the assignment of it to the Ogdensburg Bank. In July, 1835, the cashier of that bank applied for the renewal of that policy to Stearns for another year, inclosing the premium, and stating that it had been by him assigned to the bank; and a renewal was accordingly made in the same terms as the first policy, except that any loss was made payable to the bank. In August, 1836, a similar application and renewal took place between the same parties, and again in August, 1837. In August, 1838, Stearns informed the agent of the defendants, that the title to the property had become vested in the bank, and the cashier applied for a "continuance of insurance" on the former policy on the factory and machinery, omitting the stock, as the factory was not then in operation, but with liberty to put it in operation; and as the property had been transferred to the bank, the "new policy" was requested to be in its name. The new policy was accordingly issued August 13, 1838, only changing the direct insurance to the bank, with the old warranty and conditions, and the following additional clause: "It is understood that the factory is not in operation, and that the assured have liberty to put the same in operation, agreeably to the representations heretofore made by Jonathan Stearns." In August, 1839, an application was made for "the continuance" of that policy another year, and granted in the same terms, with the omission of the clause last cited. On the 12th of August, 1840, the bank applied for the "continuance" of the policy another year, and on the 14th of the same month wrote again, stating that the clause had been omitted the last year, probably by mistake, about the liberty to put the factory in operation on the representations made by Stearns, and wished it inserted this year. It accordingly was issued, dated 31st of August, 1840, for one year, in the terms used in the policy of August, 1839. On the 27th of August, 1840, the cashier of the bank wrote a letter, of which a copy is annexed:

"Ogdensburg Bank, August 27th, 1840. Parker L. Hall, Esq., Agent, &c. Dear Sir, —Will you do me the favor to send me a copy of the original survey and application, as made by Jonathan Stearns, at the time Stearns effected an insurance on the cotton factory, &c. at Malone; as I observe that the first policy made out for us specifies, 'agreeably to the representations heretofore made by Jonathan Stearns.' This institution does not know what those representations are, and as the factory is soon to be put in operation by Stearns, we having leased the same to him for one year, we wish you to send us a copy of the survey and application, in order to have Stearns's act within those representations. We also wish you to send us your assent of having the factory put in operation by Jonathan Stearns, under the policy that will take effect on the 30th instant, for one year from that time. If, on receipt of a copy of survey and application, it shall not be found sufficiently correct, you will be notified, and shall expect you will consent to have the policy adapted to the corrected application, &c. &c. In the policy of 1839 you say 'contained in their application;' I am not aware that this institution has made any specific application, and suppose you intended the one given as to details by Stearns. Very respectfully, yours, &c. John D. Judson."

To this letter the agent of the defendants replied, August 31st, 1840, stating, among other things, that he had not in his possession Stearns's representations in the "original survey;" but perhaps they could obtain a copy of him, (S.) or he could procure one from the office at Boston; adding, "You will of course see to it that the waste is removed according to the warranty, and that the lamps be enveloped in glass." The bank applied to Stearns, thereupon, and he replied that no copy of the survey had been preserved by him; "but I think," says he, "there is no provision in it but what has, as long as I run the mill, been complied with." Among other things he says, "there is not an open lamp for use in the mill, and never was;" but says nothing specially about the picking-room.

It further appeared in evidence on this, that the bank did not write to Boston for a copy of Stearns's statement, but were advised by their solicitor, in 1841 or 1842, that they were not liable for his representations. On the 4th of August, 1841, the bank applied for another "continuance" of the policy for one year, adding that the factory had been leased to Jonathan Stearns, and put in operation; and, as they might wish to continue to lease it, desired a clause allowing it. Accordingly a new policy was made, as before, with the following clause instead of the special one before named: "It is understood that the mill is under lease to Jonathan Stearns, and may again be leased to him or some other tenant, the assured being answerable for the warranty as above." In August, 1842, the tenant again applied for a further continuance of the policy one year, but having contracted to sell the property to the present possessors, who were carrying on the business, they wished the policy to bear their names, stating these facts, and providing for the payment to the bank of any loss. The policy was thus renewed on the 30th of August, 1842, adding also, "This policy is issued on the representations formerly made by Jonathan Stearns, the former owner, which representation is binding on the assured." In September, 1842, the bank wrote a letter, desiring a mistake corrected in the sum insured on the machinery, separate from that on the building, but said nothing as to any other matter. In August, 1843, another continuance of the policy was desired by the bank, retaining the same clause as to the payment of any loss to the bank. This was done, but no repetition made in the policy of the above clause as to Stearns's representations. On a like application in August, 1844, a like renewal was made, and so in August, 1845. The plaintiffs offered to prove, further, that it was customary to use inclosed lamps in picking-rooms, and the defendants to prove the contrary, if that usage was deemed material in deciding this case. But the plaintiffs admitted as a fact, that the use of any kind of a lamp in the picking-room would enhance the danger from fire; and that though insurances were often made without written representations, when the property was situated near and its condition known to some of the directors, yet when it was remote written representations were usually required. Various objections were taken to the admissibility of parts of this evidence on both sides, and it was agreed by the parties to have the court consider them, as well as the law of the case on the parts which the court should deem to be legally proved, and direct a verdict to be entered for either party as might be thought proper by the court after such examination.

R. Fletcher and T. P. Chandler, for plaintiffs.

B. R. Curtis, for defendant.

WOODBURY, Circuit Justice. Among the preliminary questions to be decided in this case is the admissibility of some of the evidence on both sides. But that involves much of the merits, and is not free from difficulty. The various pieces of testimony as to Stearns's representations are objected to by the plaintiffs, on the ground that they bring their action on the last policy, in which nothing is said of Stearns or his representations, eo nomine; and that to prove them and make them binding would be to alter or add to this written instrument. It is certain that a written contract cannot, as a general rule, be varied by parol evidence. Some of the leading cases on this are familiar, and may be seen in 1 Greenl. Ev. c. 15, p. 315; 8 Bing. 244; Philips v. Preston, 5 How. [46 U. S.] 291. Their application to policies of insurance as well as other writings, is shown in Duer, Ins. 71; 2 Johns. Cas. 1; Higginson v. Dall, 13 Mass. 96; 8 Wend. 160; 8 Metc. [Mass.] 348; 2 Cranch, C. C. 249 [Bank of Washington v. Way, Case No. 957].

It is not necessary to multiply references on this general principle, or its application to policies, nor to explain the numerous exceptions which do not affect the present transaction; for the testimony here is offered, not with the design to show representations different from those referred to in the policy, or to add to them, but to show what those were which had thus been referred to. The policy itself does not profess to embody into it the representations which had been made and which were to be binding, but merely alludes to them, and makes their truth a condition precedent to any recovery. Such references to other matter, written or parol, are very common in deeds, wills, and other contracts, and it is no violation of the contract to prove, either by writing or verbally, the foreign matter thus alluded to. On the contrary, it complies with the contract when doing this, rather than contradicts or waives it. Most of the descriptions of boundaries in deeds are by such references to other deeds or to monuments and other facts, and showing dehors the matter thus referred to, is carrying the deed into effect and not altering it. 1 Phil. Ins. 47; 1 Durn. & E. [Term R.] 343; 16 Pick. 502. Had certain representations been introduced into the policy itself, as to the condition of this property, stating in detail how it stood in respect to various items affecting the risk by fire, the presumption would be that these were the representations meant to be referred to in the policy, and others, perhaps, could not be shown. But when none such were inserted in it, as here, and when it is usual not to do it in such instruments, but to place on file such written statements as to particular matters affecting the risk, if the property is at a distance, and sometimes to make them verbally, the policy, in speaking generally of the representations, must of course refer to such, and be intended by both parties to rest upon them as binding. [Columbia Ins. Co. v. Lawrence] 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 47, 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 515. They are as if a part of the contract. 2 Denio, 75. In showing what they were under such a reference, the general rule, not to change a written contract by parol evidence, or to vary it by other matter not belonging to it, though in writing, cannot be considered as impugned either in form or substance. Houghton v. Manuf'g Ins. Co., 8 Metc. [Mass.] 114; Ellery v. Merchants' Ins. Co., 3 Pick. 350; Foxcroft v. Mallet, 4 How. [45 U. S.] 353; Wig. Ev. 54, 55; 3 Barn. & Ald. 299; 1 Paige, 291; 20 Pick. 121. This conclusion rests on this ground, and not on the admissibility of parol evidence to explain a latent ambiguity, or expression, which, from surrounding and connected facts, may have one of two meanings, and which facts may therefore be shown by parol, if the ambiguity or uncertainty be one as to facts and not as to law. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. 563; Wig. Ev. 176; Colpoys v. Colpoys, Jac. 463. The parol evidence is not to contradict the writing, but in such case is consistent with it. 2 Brod. & B. 553; 4 Russ. 540.

Another objection to the admissibility of some of the evidence here is, that the representations made by Stearns are not binding on the plaintiffs; but it is a well settled principle, that what a party says or does by an agent, is as binding as if said or done by himself; and the doings of a person may be adopted or ratified afterwards as if an agent, no less conclusively than if he was authorized beforehand. This is elementary law in every text book on agency. Hence, throughout, in this case, the bank was the chief, the real principal; and is now. All said or done by others, or in others' names, was said or done in its behalf. The bank was the party in interest here from the start to the close. It was to receive any payments for losses on any of the policies from the first to the last inclusive. The next objection to the admissibility of evidence was made by the defendants, and related to that offered by the plaintiffs to show what Stearns wrote to them in respect to his representations, and what the bank was advised on this point by their counsel. If the chief question in this case was one of intent, such testimony might be competent as a part of the res gestae, to prove efforts on the part of the plaintiffs to conform to Stearns's supposed representations. But it was unnecessary to show their omission to do more on the subject to obtain a copy of them, under professional advice, because they were not liable on account of their intentions. This evidence may also operate in favor of the defendants, being a circumstance to show the recognition by the bank at that time of their duty to conform to Stearns's representations, in that particular policy where a clause requiring it was expressly introduced, as it had been, at the time one letter was written to the agent of the defendants and one to Stearns on this matter. But it is not evidence to exonerate the bank from its duty to comply with the representations on file on account of what Stearns or their counsel afterwards said, it being the misfortune of the bank, if either of them erred in their statements they made or in their advice; and the only remedy, if any, by the bank for such an error, being against those persons.

Having disposed of these preliminary points, the next inquiry is, what were the representations which the present plaintiffs must in fact and law be considered as having made in respect to their property, as connected with the risk by fire? In order to decide intelligibly, it will be necessary to advert to the fact, that the first nominal insurer of this property at the office of the defendants, was Jonathan Stearns. However the case may be as to insurances, where no representations are made to the insurers as to the risks belonging to the premises, which are great and would sensibly increase the danger; and however in marine policies any omission to make full disclosures on such matters may vitiate the insurance on account of the suppression of a part of the whole truth, rather than a suggestion of what is false, it is to be remembered, that Stearns in this case actually made long and written representations on inquiries put by the defendants. They were his written answers to the printed interrogatories, usually put in the case of distant manufactories applying to be insured. The insurance was effected to him on the faith of the truth of those representations, and on the express stipulation, that the policy should be void, if they were materially untrue, or the condition of the property should become changed so as materially to increase the risk, and notice not be given to the defendants of such change. The representations referred to in this policy, were not then a mere form in the instrument, when none whatever had been really made; but they referred to an actual occurrence between these parties, and an important occurrence, considering the distance of the factory from the office, and the probable want of personal knowledge about its condition by the directors.

Under this view of the facts of the present case, the next inquiry, and one of some complexity and difficulty is, whether the same representations must be considered as made or adopted by the plaintiffs in the insurance for 1846, now in suit. In order to form a correct conclusion as to that, being a matter of fact principally, it will be necessary to advert to the important circumstance before mentioned, that the Ogsdenburg Bank, for whose benefit the present suit is instituted, was the chief party in interest in the first insurance by Stearns, and has been in all the intervening insurances made from 1834 to 1846. That not only the first one was assigned to the bank at its date, but the defendants, informed of the bank's interest, and assenting to the assignment and in every renewal since, any loss happening was to be paid to the bank, and the cashier of it was the agent to effect the renewal and advance the premium; and that the bank now appears to have a claim on the property to a larger amount than the sum insured. All the different persons then in 1834 and since, to whom the insurances nominally run, including the present plaintiffs, were virtually in this transaction but agents for the bank to the extent of its interests. They acted at its request, and in its behalf, and for its security; and generally, the bank itself, rather than they, transacted the business, and saw to its correctness, and had possession of the policies as well as advanced the premiums. The other persons had rights and interests, also, but subordinate. They either had a residuary interest, or a right by contract to the property and insurance after the bank was satisfied. In 1838 the title had become vested entirely in the bank; and the policy was then made in its own name, as well as on its account and for its interest. No new representations had been made since Stearns's original ones on file in 1834; and this the bank doubtless knew, as it not only received the assignment of their policy for that year, referring to those representations, but had itself taken out the subsequent renewals without filing any new representations. In order to remove any doubt, that in the general allusion to representations in the policy as made by the insured, and on which the policy in 1838 was founded, it was meant to adopt those on which the policy of 1834 and in the intervening years had issued, it was stated separately in A. D. 1838, that though the factory was not then in operation, "the assured have liberty to put the same in operation, agreeably to the representations heretofore made by Jonathan Stearns." If the bank did not know with certainty the extent of those representations, it was the fault and risk of itself to undertake to act on them without such knowledge. In 1839 that special clause was omitted. This was probably done either because deemed unnecessary to repeat it in addition to the general clause referring to representations, or because the factory was not in operation. And in 1840, the bank itself, fearing lest it might not be permissible to resume operations without a special permission, desired it, and this same clause was restored among other things, expressly specifying Stearns's representations as those which were in that event to govern. The bank then, by letter, asked of the agent a copy of those representations, but as he had not the original, applied to Stearns, who also had no duplicate original or copy. But Stearns stated that he had always complied with the representations, saying nothing in particular about the picking-room. Without inquiring further as to their exact contents, unfortunately the bank, under advice of counsel, acquiesced in the policy as it stood, and put the factory in operation under it, through Stearns himself, by a lease to him for that purpose, having stated in their letter that they supposed "the application referred to in the policy was that made by Stearns." Not the least doubt, then, can exist, that the property was used in 1840, under Stearns's representations as originally made, and used by himself under the bank. They either knowingly and deliberately expected to conform to them, and, in case of material variation and a loss, to have the policy void; or relied on advice of counsel that they were not binding. It is likewise clear, that if Stearns misled the bank, either through forgetfulness or design, as to the extent or character of his written representations to the defendants, which seems probable, the consequences must fall on them, the employers of Stearns, and the confiders in him, rather than on the defendants. See Smith v. Babcock [Case No. 13,009]; Mason v. Crosby [Id. 9,234]. The change in phraseology in the policy of 1841 creates some difficulty as to that year, and may have misled their counsel, if his advice was predicated on that, and applied to that year, and not the previous one. It does not omit the special clause entirely, as in 1839, and thus appear to rely on the notice given by it in 1838, and the general reference to representations, which could mean only those made by Stearns originally, and since adopted by the bank, as none others had been made, and Stearns was their agent in interest. But it specially permits the factory to be used, "the assured being answerable for the warranty above," there being immediately above a warranty to remove the waste once in forty-eight hours; and "that the lamps in the carding-rooms shall be inclosed in glass." It may hastily have been inferred from this that these were the only precautions to be observed, and that the insured had no farther concern or liability on account of any of Stearns's representations. But it is to be noticed, that this same warranty was in the original policy in 1834, and a reference also to the representations made by Stearns, and their binding force in all respects was there, as well as here, recognized, so that one had not been introduced for the other. This was the case also in the intervening years, while the factory was in operation, both provisions being often inserted together; and when the special clause was inserted referring to Stearns's representations, eo nomine, it seemed to be only because the factory was not then in actual operation, but might become so in the course of the year, and was then to be used in the manner he had represented. The parties, too, being presumed to know the law, must be considered as aware of the distinction between warranties and mere representations. Both usually exist, though as to different matters. Generally, likewise the former are in the body of the instrument, and are there named as warranties in words or substance, or referred to as such (5 Hill, 101; 2 Hall, 589; Cowp. 785; Doug. 11, note); while the latter are referred to only as representations or statements of facts, and are seldom introduced in detail in the policy itself (3 Hill, 501; 5 Hill, 101, 188). The former, likewise, bind the party to them as a condition precedent, whether material or not; while the latter binds only to a substantial or virtual compliance, and may vary from the exact part, if the variance be not so material as to increase clearly the risk. In 1841, then, the warranty was one thing, and provided for by itself; the representations were another, and provided for by themselves, and in the same manner they had been in 1834. Stearns was the real operator at both periods. The bank was the virtual owner at both. The representations at both were only those originally made by Stearns, and this the bank probably knew, and that they were relied on by the defendants, as being adopted by the bank. The bank, too, had paid the premium, and took out the policy in 1841, as only a "continuance" of the previous policies. It seems to me, then, to be inconsistent with the general character of the whole transaction, and it would be bad faith to suppose that the representations, referred to in the general clause, were not meant by both parties to be those at first made by Stearns, and since continued, or renewed, or in other words, adopted by the bank as its own. If any aggregatio mentium, any unity of views existed, it must be presumed to have been that. In 1843, the bank desired a renewal of the policy, still running to pay the loss to them, though wishing the policy to bear the names of the plaintiffs, as they had made a contract to purchase and use the factory. The policy was accordingly then renewed; and, perhaps, because a new party was introduced, a special provision was inserted, so that the plaintiffs could not, any more than the bank, plead ignorance of the representations upon which the insurance rested. It was in these words: "This policy is issued on the representations formerly made by Jona. Stearns, the former owner, which representation is binding on the assured." No objection was made to this, though the policy was sent back for correction in another particular. In 1844 and 1845, "continuances" of the policy were granted, in like form, without repealing the special clause, as the nominal or real parties in interest remained the same; and the reason applicable to those representations being in force, and being, in my opinion, in point of fact, adopted by the insured, for the causes which have just been named and explained in respect to the year 1841.

I have been thus particular in tracing through to the close, and assigning various reasons why Stearns's representations must be considered as adopted by the plaintiffs themselves, in the policy itself, and binding on them as a part of the written contract; and not as parol evidence of matter introduced to vary or contradict the written contract. But were this otherwise, it is by no means certain, whether, on the general principles of insurance, the plaintiffs would not be responsible for the use of any lamps in the picking-room, considering either that none were used originally, or that Stearns's statement to that effect was untrue. If an absolute representation is made by the insured in respect to the risk, which is material, and others then interested renew the insurance without varying the statement, and a privity of interest or contract is kept up until a loss occurs, surely the loss ought not to fall on the insurer, when it happens by a departure from that statement and on a particular, which it is agreed increased the risk. Columbian Ins. Co. v. Lawrence, 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 508; Alsop v. Commercial Ins. Co. [Case No. 262]; 2 Denio, 75. Surely the assured ought not to recover when they were expressly notified that the insurance was founded and renewed on the representations thus made, though the assured may not have examined what they were, but had an opportunity to do it, and unwisely confided in the recollection of the person making them without examining the original on file. If the lamps were used in the picking-room at first when Stearns stated otherwise, such a material misrepresentation would vitiate insurances generally. [Columbian Ins. Co. v. Lawrence] 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 47, 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 516. If they were not so used at first, but the lamps were soon after introduced into the picking-room, any material change like this in the risk of property, without communicating it, (before a new insurance, or a further continuance of the old one to the same parties in interest,) renders the new policy void. It clashes with the stipulations of the policy itself, and in all stages of the case there must be neither suppressio veri, nor suggestio falsi. Duer, Ins. 380. There need be no fraudulent intent; but if either of these acts exists without such an intent, it saps the foundation on which the insurance rests, and the latter fails. Id. 506; 1 Phil. Ins. 210; [Columbian Ins. Co. v. Lawrence] 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 25; 22 Pick. 200; [M'Lanahan v. Universal Ins. Co.] 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 185; 3 Mass. 103; [Murgatroyd v. Crawford] 3 Dall. [3 U. S.] 491; 6 Mass. 220; 18 Pick. 419; 10 Pick. 535; 5 Hill, 101, 188; [Hazard's Adm'rs v. Marine Ins. Co.] 8 Pet. [33 U. S.] 557; 20 Me. 125; 8 Metc. [Mass.] 114. Another fact, strongly indicating that the bank, the party in interest throughout, must have known and expected, that all the continuances or renewals of the policy were founded on the original representations, was, that these renewals were all made through the agent at Pittsfield, and not at the office at Boston; and that in this case, as in most cases of insurance, the office alone takes new insurances or new risks, and acts on new or different representations, and not the agent.

Regarding the evidence here offered as to the representations to be in law competent, and to show in fact the adoption by the plaintiffs of those made by Stearns, and considering also that this evidence would, independent of the words of the policy in another view, show either a material misrepresentation by the original assured, or a material change in the risk since, not communicated by him or the privies in interest and contract since, the policy must in law be considered void. This is a misfortune to the present plaintiffs as well as the bank; because the latter was probably misled by Stearns's letter as to the extent of his original representations, and may have believed that they extended only to the keeping of no uninclosed lamps in the building, but allowed such in the picking-room as well as in other parts of the building. Had they not believed this, they would probably have discontinued the use of them in the picking-room, or had the original representation altered, or a new one communicated, and paid the increased premium, which such use of lamps would justify and require. The difference is conceded to be material, and well may be, as in this very instance the loss was caused by the use of lamps there, though inclosed in glass. Such is the extraordinary fineness of the cotton fibres and dust which fills the air in that room, in factories in great quantities, that any lamp which has air holes, or an open top and loose cover, (such as are necessary to continue or preserve the light,) is liable to be filled with them and to ignite them, and, unless the building is detached or secured by iron doors, to cause the almost inevitable loss of the whole establishment. Again, the insured, had they examined the policy carefully, would have seen from the warranty, that the use of any lamps in the picking-room was probably not contemplated. The warranty extends only to "the lamps in the carding-room;" that they shall be "inclosed in glass;" and, had it been represented, or at any time understood by the insurers, that lamps were to be used in the picking-room also, the insured must presume that they would doubtless have required the warranty to cover them, as well as those in the carding-room, it being more necessary for safety to have them so inclosed if in the picking-room. But the original representation was, "no lamps used in the picking-room;" and hence no warranty was required to keep them there inclosed in glass, and no increase of premium asked on account of their being kept there at all, so dangerous as it was in a room not separate from the main building, and not made safe by iron doors. It is to be recollected, that such a room in a cotton factory, thus situated, is almost as perilous as a powder-magazine, to use lamps in. It is full of the material for gunpowder cotton; and all representations concerning it, or changes of risk in relation to it, must be known by all the parties to be vital. It is conceded, that the assured is entitled to a favorable construction, in particulars which are doubtful. Duer, Ins. 132. But this is where the insured is not misled by any erroneous representation, or any material change in the risk not communicated to him. For where either of those occur, whether through the fault or neglect of the assured, or his agent, the policy cannot be enforced. Carpenter v. Providence Washington Ins. Co., 4 How. [45 U. S.] 185. The insurer is entitled, both in law and equity, to all the material information, connected with the risk, which the insured possesses, in order that he may have the fullest means of deciding on the extent of the risk and premium. 1 Wash. C. C. 161 [Kohne v. Insurance Co. of North America, Case No. 7,922]; [Livingston v. Maryland Ins. Co.] 6 Cranch [10 U. S.] 279; [Maryland Ins. Co. v. Ruden's Adm'r] Id. 338. The law is rigorous and unaccommodating, even to forgetfulness, mistake, or neglect of agents on the part of the insured, in respect to matters like these. Jennings v. Chenango Mut. Ins. Co., 2 Denio, 75.

Something has been said in the argument that the word "lamps," as used here in the representation, meant only permanent ones, and not movable lamps or lanterns; and that the latter might be used any where. But as the warranty was to keep them inclosed in glass when used in the carding-room, and by the original representation none were used in the picking-room, the word "lamp" would seem to include any light or blaze in the lamp form, as any such was to be inclosed in glass. The spirit of the provision, as well as the general meaning of the expression, would extend to any thing of the kind that could cause combustion in giving light, whether movable or permanent. Indeed, movable lights or lanterns are in such rooms more dangerous, though inclosed in glass, than permanent ones, as the latter can be fixed more remote from the machinery, while the former are usually employed to aid in closer observations and repairs, and constantly subject to be carried nearer what is most combustible. On the hypothesis of the plaintiffs, as to this point, this inconsistency would follow, that movable lights, the most dangerous, could be used in the picking-room, but not permanent ones, the least dangerous; or that the parties would deem it so important to have lamps covered with glass in the carding-room, as to enter into a warranty to do it, and yet intend or assent that lanterns or lamps should be used in the picking-room, without any warranty to keep them inclosed in glass. It becomes unnecessary, therefore, to go into the evidence, whether it is customary to use lamps in picking-rooms; or if at all, in those situated within the factory, and without iron doors. Because, whatever may be the usage, it is conceded, that they enhance the risk; and the representation here was originally that none were used in the picking-room. If that statement was true, then they were since introduced, without notice, and thus materially increase the risk, and avoided the policy. If that statement was false, then the policy was void, on the ground of a false and important representation. [Columbia Ins. Co. v. Lawrence] 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 49, 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 512; [M'Lanahan v. Universal Ins. Co.] 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 185; [Carpenter v. Providence Ins. Co.] 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 496; 10 Pick. 535; 1 Wash. C. C. 161 [Kohne v. Insurance Co. of North America, Case No. 7,922]. In either of these aspects of the case, therefore, that evidence becomes of no importance; and a verdict must, according to agreement, be entered for the defendants.

After the above opinion had been delivered, and at a subsequent day in the term, the plaintiffs moved for a verdict and judgment for a return of the premiums that had been paid on these insurances. The grounds assigned were, that the policy did not attach, looking to the opinion of the court, and that a money count was in the declaration, which would cover the premiums. After argument for and against this motion, by the same counsel, the court took time to consider of it, and before the term closed, made the following decision, delivered by WOODBURY, Circuit Justice. My first impressions were not in favor of this motion, either on its merits or on the adopted form.

On the merits it seemed doubtful whether the policy must not be considered to have attached from the time named in it, till some actual instance of the use of lamps in the picking-room occurred. If it once attaches, the premium is not to be restored, however short the time. Cowp. 668. Certainly not the whole of the premium, and none unless it can be properly divided, and a part of the risk, as in some sea usages, can be considered as never having been incurred. 3 Burrows, 1240; 1 W. Bl. 315. But on consideration that, in this class of cases, the construction more favorable to the insured is the approved one, and seems on the whole most equitable, I think the representations can fairly be regarded as of such a character that the risk never did commence. The representations were on this point, "no lamps used in the picking-room." Now, in fact, lamps were there suspended in that room constantly, and had been for some years, and others carried into it occasionally at the time of the last insurance, and of all the others made to those plaintiffs. This must be regarded as "lamps used" there, in common parlance, during this period, though not really lighted up the whole time, nor on the precise day when this policy commenced. If the lamps had been first introduced after the year began, it would be otherwise. Pim v. Reid, 6 Scott, N. R. 982. What strengthens this view, that they must be considered as used before, is another consideration, that the plaintiffs used them there under a false impression caused by Stearns, the former owner and the original maker of the representation, stating that he had a right to use them there under the policy, if kept inclosed in glass. Hence they were placed there to be used long before, were used when needed, and must be regarded as a violation, though undesignedly, of the terms of the policy during the whole period, after introduced. It is well settled, that where the risk never attached, the premium must be returned, if there was no fraud. Feise v. Parkinson, 4 Taunt. 641; Colby v. Hunter, Moody & M. 81; 3 Car. & P. 7; 2 Phil. Ins. 526. It must be returned, though there was "neglect and even fault," by the assured. Stevenson v. Snow, 3 Burrows, 1240; Tyrie v. Fletcher, Cowp. 668. Here neglect existed in relying on Stearns's memory, but probably no designed departure fraudulently from what the policy was supposed to be. If the lamps were fraudulently used there, in disregard of the representations, the premiums should be retained by the company. 4 Taunt. 641; 1 Park, Ins. 329; 2 Marsh. Ins. 661. It will be seen, however, that the circumstances just referred to, showing how these parties were misled into their use, repel any presumption of such fraud.

All that remains, then, are some questions of form. How many of the premiums can be recovered back in this action, in the name of these plaintiffs? Manifestly none, except those paid on policies executed to these plaintiffs. Any others, paid on policies to others, must be recovered, if at all, in suits in their names; and the statute of limitations would bar all except those paid by these plaintiffs, and perhaps one other, if an action is ever instituted for that. Again, in respect to form, this suit, looking to the count for money had and received, can, in my view, properly cover all premiums between these parties paid within six years, and is not confined to the premium paid on the last policy, named in the special count. The other premiums are in cases where the risk did not attach as well as this. The parties are the same. The form of the count applies to all; and all of them rest on the same basis of not being ex aequo et bono, retainable by the office, when the risk never attached. The first premium paid by these plaintiffs on an insurance to them was in August, 1842, and the last one in August, 1845; making four in all to be returned.

The remaining point to be considered, in respect to form, is the time and manner of moving "for the return" of the premiums. At the trial of the cause, no claim of that kind was understood to be urged. In the testimony submitted to me, and in the argument, my attention was not called to any claim of this kind. It was not till an opinion on the merits of the action for a loss under the policy had been given by agreement, on both the facts and the law, and a verdict directed for the defendants, that this claim on a subsequent day was presented. If allowed now, unless by consent, it must be virtually, by granting a new trial. That was the course pursued under like circumstances, in Feise v. Parkinson, 4 Taunt. 641.

What should be the terms which are just for allowing this new trial, under all the circumstances, or, which is the same thing in substance, for changing at this time the verdict, so as to be for the plaintiff instead of the defendants, and throwing the burthen of costs in the cause on the latter, rather than where it now is, on the former? It seems to me that the just terms should be the payment to the defendants of the costs of the trial, in which they succeeded, which was upon the great point in controversy, and the fruits of which, so far as regards costs, are now asked to be taken from them by allowing this motion. As another illustration, showing that these terms are the proper ones, if this claim for a return premium had been set up at the former trial, the defendants might have paid the amount into court, with costs to that time; and then, if the plaintiffs failed to recover any thing for losses, they would have to pay the defendants the costs of that trial. See, also, 4 Bing. 676.

Let then the former verdict, ordered for the defendant, be considered as set aside, and a new trial granted, on the payment to the defendants of the cost of the former trial. Then on the new trial let a new verdict be entered for the plaintiffs for the four last premiums and costs of suit, except those incurred at the former trial, and which we now allow to the defendants, as the prevailing parties in that trial.

NOTE [from original report]. By agreement of counsel, the opinions of the court on the law of the case, as originally presented, were turned into rulings and instructions, and a bill of exceptions filed so as to carry the case to the supreme court.

[NOTE. Plaintiffs brought error, and the supreme court, without overruling the law of this case, reversed the judgment for the purpose of having the defective record corrected. Clark v. Manufacturers' Ins. Co., 8 How. (49 U. S.) 235.]

Case No. 2,830.

CLARK v. MARX.

[6 Ben. 275.][1]

District Court, S. D. New York. Dec., 1872.

VOID ASSIGNMENT — EXPENSES OF ASSIGNEE — DEPRECIATION OF PROPERTY.

1. In March, 1869, the firm of R. B. & A., made an assignment to M., of all their property in trust for all their creditors. In April, 1869, a petition in bankruptcy was filed against them, and they were adjudged bankrupts. An injunction was issued against M., to prevent his selling the assigned property. The assignee in bankruptcy commenced a suit against M., to set aside the assignment to him, and compel an accounting by him. In May, 1870, the injunction against M. was modified so as to allow him to sell parts of the property. In May, 1871, on final hearing, a decree was made setting aside the assignment to M., and directing an accounting, which was had. On the report of the master, exceptions were filed by the plaintiff to various allowances to M., as reported. Held: That the effect of the decree, was to declare the transfer to M. to have been void, and to substitute the title of the plaintiff for any title in M., as of the day of the filing of the petition.

2. That M., therefore, could not be allowed for any disbursements or expenses which he made or incurred by virtue of such transfer, or to maintain his title or possession thereunder.

[Cited in Hunker v. Bing, 9 Fed. 279.]

3. That, in so far as M. acted with the permission of this court in making sales of the property, he ought to be allowed such expenses as were necessary and proper in so acting.

[Cited in Hunker v. Bing, 9 Fed. 282.]

4. That, as the plaintiff furnished no evidence as to any definite loss or depreciation of the property, by reason of the interference of M. with it, or that its value was greater than the price it brought on sale, the court could not speculate as to what such loss was.

[Action by Lester M. Clark, assignee in bankruptcy of Rosenthal and others, against Marcus Marx].

Charles H. Smith, for plaintiff.

W. A. Coursen, for Marx.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. The petition in bankruptcy against Rosenthal, Black & Alexander was filed April 7th, 1869. On the 2d of March, 1869, they made to the defendant Marx an assignment, wherein they declared that they were unable to pay their debts in full, and whereby they transferred to Marx all their property, in trust to convert it into money, and therewith to pay the expenses of making and carrying into effect the assignment, and then to pay all their debts in full, if possible, and, if not, then pro rata. Marx accepted the transfer and took possession of the property. On the 7th of April, 1869, the usual injunction in involuntary cases was issued and served on Marx. On the 21st of April, 1869, this court modified such injunction, so as to permit Marx to sell certain fixtures and property, and retain the proceeds thereof to abide the further order of this court. This suit was commenced on the 4th of November, 1869, to set aside the assignment to Marx, as fraudulent and void as against the plaintiff, and to compel an accounting to the plaintiff therefor. Marx answered the bill, and therein maintained the validity of the assignment, and demanded to be permitted to proceed with the execution of the trusts created by it, and denied the plaintiff's title to the relief asked, and prayed for the dismissal of the bill, with costs. The property transferred to Marx embraced a quantity of cloths and ready made clothing, which continued in his possession, boxed up and unsold, until May, 1870, when this court relieved Marx from the operation of the injunction in respect to it, so far as to permit it to be sold by him. Proceeds of sales of property were deposited by Marx in the United States Trust Company, under the direction of this court, and subject to its order, as follows: May 28th, 1870, $1,325 63, and September 28th, 1871, $470 87. On the 6th of May, 1871, on final hearing, a decree was made herein, adjudging that Marx should account to the plaintiff for all of said property, and that the plaintiff became vested with it, by operation of law, through his appointment as such assignee, and was entitled to recover it from Marx, and appointing a master to take (1) an account of all the property which passed to Marx; (2) an account of the moneys received by Marx from the property; (3) an account of the property and proceeds remaining in the hands of Marx; (4) a debit and credit account, charging Marx with the value of all the property which passed to him, and crediting him the value of so much as had been sold, and the proceeds deposited, under the order of this court, and with the present value of any property remaining in his hands, and with all sums properly allowable in account to him, as against the rights of the plaintiff.

The master now reports the accounts so taken, and further, that Marx has delivered to the plaintiff all the property which passed to Marx, and the proceeds thereof, except the sums "necessarily expended by him in the collection, care and preservation" of the property, and except the proceeds deposited in the United States Trust Company; that there is no property, nor any proceeds thereof, in the hands of Marx, to which the plaintiff is entitled; that no money is due from Marx to the plaintiff; that the whole value of the property is correctly set forth in the account of Marx; that Marx is not chargeable with any damages or other loss in regard to the property, or its proceeds; that Marx ought to be credited with $3,015 10, and debited with $2,540 73, showing a balance due him of $474 37; and that Marx is not entitled to be allowed the further sum of $500, claimed by him to be an indebtedness incurred by him in the care and preservation of the property. The plaintiff excepts to the report in respect to each one of 53 items credited to Marx, amounting to $1,218 60, being all the items credited to him by the master except the two, amounting to $1,796 50, for moneys deposited in the trust company. He also excepts to the report because the master has not charged Marx with any loss or depreciation of the property, by way of damages, for his interference therewith.

[1] [Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

By the express provision of the 14th section of the bankruptcy act [14 Stat. 522] the assignment to the assignee, in its conveyance to him of the title to the property and estate of the bankrupt, relates back to the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy, which is (section 38) the filing of the petition for adjudication, and such title, by operation of law, vests in the assignee as of the time of such filing. The title to the property transferred to Marx, if it was the property of the bankrupts, vested in the plaintiff as of the 7th of April, 1869. The effect of the decree in this case is, to declare the transfer to Marx to have been void, and to substitute, for any title in Marx, the title of the plaintiff, on the ground that, notwithstanding the transfer to Marx, the property still remained the property of the bankrupts, as against the plaintiff, if he successfully challenged such transfer within the time, and on the grounds, prescribed in the bankruptcy act. While the title of Marx might have ripened into a good title, if it had not been questioned by the plaintiff, yet Marx took such title at the risk of the result of such a suit as this. The transfer to Marx being now adjudged to have been void, he cannot, under such transfer, claim to be allowed for any disbursements or expenses which he made or incurred by virtue of such transfer or to maintain his title or possession thereunder. The result of the litigation, is that he is adjudged to have been in default in not surrendering to the plaintiff the property in question. It ought to have been so surrendered when the assignment to the plaintiff was made, which was July 8th, 1869. In so far as Marx acted with the permission of this court, given in its orders, in making sales of the property, he ought to be allowed such expenses as were necessary and proper to enable him to so act in compliance with the terms of such orders.

On these principles, there are many items allowed which are inadmissible. The items, in March, 1869, for stationery, cases, 2 days' work, books, stamp, copying schedules, 4 weeks' work, postage, premium on insurance, and cartage, would seem to be not allowable. They all seem to have arisen out of the acting of Marx under the unlawful transfer to him. It may be that something ought to be allowed as rent or storage, in respect of the goods, from April 7th, 1869, to July 8th, 1869, but there is no evidence to warrant the allowance of the two items of $141.66 each, for rent, or of the items of $150 and $10, for storage. The items, in April, 1869, for work and preparing stock for auction (the latter being for a sale under the unlawful transfer) cannot be allowed. The items for moving and cartage of fixtures may be allowable, if necessary in respect of the sale of fixtures authorized by this court. The items which follow thereafter, for insurance, taking care of stock, cartage, repacking stock, camphor, and 4 cases, must be disallowed. The items, in May, 1870, for auction invoices, cartage and labor, 2 days' work, and preparing stock, &c., may be allowable, if necessary in respect of the auction sale of the goods authorized by this court. The items for copy schedule, copy auction sales and making accounts, do not seem to be allowable. The item of $250 paid to counsel cannot be allowed. It is stated to have been for services rendered in May, 1870, in respect of the sale of the property. It was not a necessary or proper expense of the sale, and a surrender of the property to the assignee, which Marx was at liberty to make at any time, would have rendered that expense, and all other expenses which he incurred after July 8th, 1869, unnecessary.

This case is an illustration of the manner in which estates of bankrupts would be frittered away, if such expenses incurred by wrongdoers in regard to them were to be allowed. Marx receives, as the avails of sales, $2,540 73. Out of this he claims to retain, as expenses, the $1,218 60 before named, and $500 in addition, for the services of counsel in drawing the void assignment and defending it against the plaintiff—in all $1,718 60, or nearly 70 per cent. of the avails. The master disallowed the $500.

The plaintiff furnishes no evidence as to any definite loss or depreciation of the property by reason of the interference of Marx therewith, or that its value was greater than the price it brought on sale. The court cannot speculate as to what the loss was. There must be evidence.

The first exception of the plaintiff is so far allowed as to refer the case back to the master for a new report on the principles and views hereinbefore set forth, with leave to either party to put in further testimony, as to any of the items allowed by the master in Schedule G to the report. The second exception is disallowed.

CLARK (NIETO v.). See Cases Nos. 10,261 and 10,262.

CLARK (NORTH v.). See Case No. 10,308.

CLARK (PACKWOOD v.). See Case No. 10,656.

Case No. 2,831.

CLARK et al. v. PEASLEE.

[1 Cliff. 545;[1] 26 Law Rep. 609.]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. Term, 1860.

CUSTOMS DUTIES — STORAGE OF IMPORTATIONS IN PRIVATE STORE—HALF-STORAGE—CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTES—EFFECT OF REPEAL.

1. Where importations were deposited by the importer in his own store, under the act of March 28, 1854 [10 Stat. 271], held, that the collector correctly required the importer to pay half-storage, under the treasury regulations, February 17, 1849.

2. The regulations of July 2, 1855, did not have the effect to repeal those of February 17, 1849.

3. Where there is no repealing clause, subsequent regulations only have the effect to repeal those previously existing, to the extent that the last issued are clearly repugnant to the former.

4. Under the regulations of February 17, 1849, the importer, before he can use his own store for the deposit of importations, must indorse on the entry an agreement to pay the collector an amount equal to the salary of an inspector, or one half storage, and the importer must make his election in advance.

5. In the treasury regulations of July 2, 1855, the alternative provision for the payment of half-storage is dropped.

6. The regulations of 1857 provide that the importer shall pay monthly to the collector such sum as the collector deems proper for the service, not less, however, than the pay of the officer in attendance.

7. Where an importer, under the act of March, 1854, elected to deposit the goods in his own store, held, that he was not deprived of that right by being required to pay half-storage, and that such requirement by the collector was properly made, as the store was "a private bonded warehouse," and the owner as importer was bound to pay "appropriate expenses."

[Cited in U. S. v. Macdonald, Case No. 15,668, 5 Wall. (72 U. S.) 658.]

8. When the interpretation of the revenue laws and regulations is invoked, considerable weight should be given to the practice of the government as a contemporaneous construction of the provisions under consideration.

9. Goods deposited in private stores by the importer are to be taken possession of by the collector, at the charge and risk of the owners; consequently the goods are in the custody of the United States, and in charge of an inspector.

At law. Action of assumpsit to recover back certain duties on imports, paid under protest. The goods, consisting chiefly of fish and oil, were imported and duly entered for warehousing. The first entry was made January 23, 1855. Application in writing was made by the plaintiffs [William R. Clark and others], to the defendant [Charles H. Peaslee], collector of the customs in Boston, for leave to warehouse the importation in their own store, which was granted; and on withdrawing the same for consumption, they paid twenty-five dollars and twenty cents as half-storage, in addition to the regular duties. Various other entries were made by them of similar goods, and in all cases similar exactions were made of them, and were all paid under protest. All of the entries were made under the acts of congress concerning the warehousing of imported goods, and the half-storage was claimed by the defendant under those laws, and the regulations of the treasury department. Suit was commenced April 1, 1859, and the declaration [as amended][2] embraced sums paid by the plaintiffs from March 31, 1854, to August 14, 1855. Defendant pleaded non-assumpsit [and at the October term the parties went to trial on that issue. Testimony was introduced by both parties],[2] and a verdict was taken for the plaintiffs for $1,813.35, subject to the opinion of the court, upon questions of law, and with authority to amend the verdict or enter a general verdict for the defendant. [Sufficient has already been remarked to show that the main question in this case is whether the charge of half storage was a proper one to be made, under the circumstances disclosed at the trial. It is insisted by the plaintiffs that the charge was unauthorized and illegal, and consequently that the verdict is right. On the other hand it is insisted by the defendant that the charge was a legal and proper one, and consequently that the whole claim of the plaintiffs is invalid and without foundation.][2] Amount was the only question to be settled if the plaintiffs were right; but if they were wrong, then the verdict was to be set aside and judgment entered for the defendant.

S. J. Thomas, for plaintiffs.

The plaintiffs, as importers, were by law entitled to the option to deposit their goods, at their expense and risk, either, 1. In any public warehouse owned or leased by the United States; or, 2. In their own private warehouse used exclusively for the storage of warehoused goods of their own importation or to their consignment; or, 3. In a private warehouse used by the owner, occupant, or lessee, as a general warehouse for the storage of warehoused goods.

In either case they were bound to bear the expense of depositing and keeping deposited; that is, the expense of storing. More than this the collector had no lawful authority to exact. He could not, nor could the treasury department for him, adopt such rules or rates as to deprive the plaintiffs of the benefit of the warehouse system. The authority conferred on the secretary by the act of 1854 was to make rules and regulations to give effect to the act, not to deprive importers of the benefits of it. In the first and last cases, the rates must be reasonable. In the second case, the storage is the importer's own concern. If the importer elect to deposit in a public warehouse of the United States, he pays storage to the United States. But those rates must be reasonable. Foster v. Peaslee [Case No. 4,979], Oct. term, 1856, Curtis, J. If, on the contrary, he elect to deposit in a private warehouse used by the owner, occupant, or lessee as a general warehouse, he pays such storage to such owner, occupant, or lessee, and not to the United States. But such storage, too, must be reasonable. If, instead of depositing in a public warehouse of the United States, or in a general warehouse provided by another, he elect as he may, to deposit in a store provided by himself, of which he is the owner, or for which, as lessee, he already pays rent, then, of course, he is not to pay storage to another who does not provide it, and no more to the United States, who is not the owner and does not provide the place than to an individual who does not. The expense contemplated in the section under consideration, it is submitted, is plainly the expense of storing,—the expense of providing a place of deposit for the goods until they are withdrawn,—and that alone.

[1] [Reported by William Henry Clifford, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

[2] [From 26 Law Rep. 609.]

In this case, the goods were not deposited in either of these classes of stores. They were deposited in the plaintiff's own stores, but not stores used for the storage of warehoused goods exclusively, but stores used by the plaintiffs for goods warehoused by them, and goods not warehoused,—some of the latter which belonged to them, and others of which belonged to others. They were not under the lock of the customs, nor in the charge of any officer of the customs, nor in the joint custody of the owner and any officer of the customs, but in the actual custody of the plaintiffs, and at most only the constructive custody of the collector.

The regulation invoked by the defendant, under which it is claimed importers had the option whether to pay the salary of an inspector, or half-storage, it is submitted, had no application whatever to this case. In the first place, it will be observed, this regulation was made in 1849. The exactions of which the plaintiffs complain were all made after March, 1854. The regulation purports to be made under the authority of the act of August 6, 1846 [9 Stat. 53], and has reference, of course, to then existing laws. Now the provisions of the act of 1846 are quite different from those of the act of 1854. By the former the importer had no option; by the latter he had the option to warehouse his goods, at his own expense, in his own store. It was solely on the ground of this material difference that Judge Sprague, who first tried this case, granted a new trial. The new trial was granted for the reason that that distinction had in the first trial been overlooked, and expressly on the condition that the plaintiffs should waive all claim on account of exactions prior to the passage of the last-mentioned act; and all such were stricken out. Under the act of 1846, the goods were to be deposited in public stores or in other stores to be agreed on by the collector or chief revenue officer of the port and the importer.

By the act of 1854, as before stated, the goods were to be deposited, at the option of the owner, in either a public warehouse of the United States, a private bonded warehouse, or the importer's own store, as he, the importer, might prefer and determine. By the act of 1846, the "other stores to be agreed on" were "to be secured in the manner provided by the first section of the act" of April 20, 1818 [3 Stat. 469]; that is, they were to be under the joint locks of the inspector and the importer. Not so, of course, the importers' private store mentioned in the act of 1854. In the second place, the regulation of 1849 purports to relate to bonded warehouses, and only those. It says: "All bonded warehouses under the act of August 6, 1846, will hereafter be known and designated as follows." It then proceeds to speak of three classes: 1. Stores owned or leased by the United States prior to that time; 2. Stores in the possession of an importer and his sole occupancy, "which he may desire to place under the customs lock"; and 3. Stores in the occupancy of persons desirous to engage in the business of storing.

By the act of 1846, the secretary of the treasury was authorized to make such needful rules and regulations, not inconsistent with the laws of the United States, as he might deem necessary to give effect to that act. In pursuance of that authority the secretary made the above three classes of warehouses; the law had suggested but two. They were all to be bonded. The classes spoken of in the regulation of 1849 were the secretary's classes. In 1854 the law made the classes. We have seen what they were. The first class was, stores owned or leased by the United States; the second, the importer's own store, the goods bonded, but not the store; the third, private bonded warehouses.

The difference between these acts was not wholly overlooked by the department. I find it noticed in a general regulation, by the secretary of the treasury, under date of March 30, 1854. "There are," he says, "several important provisions of this act, which require a modification of the warehouse regulations of the 17th of February, 1849." No regulation touching the terms of storing in the importer's own store was, however, made, I believe, until the general regulation of 1855. Meantime, the practice of exacting half-storage, which had its origin even earlier than the warehouse system, was continued. At the former trial of this cause, a circular was introduced by the defendant, bearing date October 9, 1845, the substance of which was, that "where, at the instance and for the accommodation of the merchants, goods may be allowed by the proper officer of the customs in pursuance of law to be deposited in other than the regular public stores, it is deemed but just and reasonable that a charge of half-storage should be exacted on all such goods, to reimburse the United States to some extent for the expense of hiring public stores, and in which the collector might insist on such goods being deposited, subject to the full charge for storage." This is undoubtedly the origin of half-storage. It was instituted when the importer had no option secured to him by law, whether to use the public stores or his own, and when, therefore, the collector might perhaps impose terms as the condition of such option, and the importer as matter of convenience assented; and thus having grown up, it was continued, in derogation of the importer's right and against his will, after such option had been secured to him. It will be observed this circular does not rest the claim for the exaction upon any legal right.

If it be said the plaintiffs never applied to pay the salary of an officer instead of half-storage, there are two answers: First, the evidence shows there was but one condition on which the deputy collector was allowed to permit the plaintiffs to warehouse their goods in their own stores, and that was the payment of half-storage, and the plaintiffs had been repeatedly so told and so understood. Second, the option to store their goods in their own store, on condition of paying half-storage or the salary of an inspector, is not the option the law gave. The paragraph relied upon in the regulation of 1849 is as follows: "Before any importer shall be permitted to use his own store for class two, he shall indorse upon the entry for warehouse his written request to use such store as the place of deposit, and also indorse thereon an agreement to pay to the collector an amount equal to the salary of the inspector or one half storage, to be determined in advance by the inspector."

It will be observed that, unlike the regulation of July, 1855, this regulation does not provide that the importer may pay a just proportion of the salary of the officer, but the whole salary. Applied to a case like this, the rule is simply absurd. A merchant desires, for example, to warehouse one hundred barrels of fish. Having complied with the forms of law, he has the right, under the act of 1854, to warehouse these fish, at his own expense, in his own store; that is, he is to bear the expense of storing. There is no occasion for the services of an officer. He has given the required bond. The government is secured. There can be no conflict between him and the owners of other warehoused goods, for he has no other.

The plaintiffs were bound to bear the expense of storing; that is, the actual expense. The case was similar to cases under the debenture acts. There, as in this case, the importer gave bond, and took his goods to his own store, and then kept them till he was prepared to export them. No charge was ever made or claimed for the service of an officer, and of course none for storage. And if there had been any right to charge for the service of an officer, the charges in this case were wholly disproportionate. The money was paid under a controlling necessity arising from the circumstances under which the money was demanded, and it may be recovered back. Elliot v. Swartwout, 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 137.

C. L. Woodbury, for defendant.

Was the regulation of the secretary of the treasury referred to in accordance with existing laws? As to the authority of the secretary to regulate the warehouse system. 10 Stat. 273. He was to make such regulations, not inconsistent with the laws of the United States, as he might deem necessary for the due execution of this act. The rates of storage were to be fixed by the secretary of the treasury, and were left to his regulations by this act. 10 Stat. 270. "Goods subject to duty * * * may be deposited at the option of the importer, at his expense and risk in," &c. The option given the importer in this statute was between the three classes of warehouses described in the section, and did not concern "his expense and risk." There is no pretence that this option was denied to the plaintiffs in fact or in theory; it is only insisted by the plaintiffs that they had a right to use their own stores without paying anything. The privilege of warehousing goods in bond has always been coupled with the condition that it should be at the expense and risk of the importer. Warehouse Act 1846 says, "at the charge and risk of the importer." Revenue Act 1799, § 56, says, "at the charge and risk of the owner." The act of 1841, § 6 [5 Stat. 432], authorizes the secretary of the treasury "to regulate the rates of storage." The power here granted was extended with the enlarging of the warehousing system in 1846 (section 5), "to make regulations not inconsistent with the laws, to give full effect to the provisions of this law, and to secure a just accountability." These several acts are to be construed together to constitute the whole warehousing system of the United States, and only those parts which are repugnant to later statutes are to be regarded as repealed.

The right to regulate the rates of storage granted in 1841 is not repugnant to any of the other powers given the secretary by subsequent statutes, and exists in full force. The revenue from storage is apportioned by the United States. See Act March 3, 1849, §

4 [9 Stat. 398]. The fact of the expense of the warehousing being a charge on the owner of the goods, and the right of the secretary to regulate the rates of storage being thus shown to exist, there only remains to be considered, whether the government was put to any expense whatsoever in the case at bar, so as to justify the levying of a rate where the store class two was used. The custody of the goods is in the United States during the period of warehousing. Act 1846, § 1. Duties to be paid in cash. Whenever the owner shall make entry for warehousing, "the goods shall be taken possession of by the collector and deposited in public store or other stores, &c., there to be kept, at the charge and risk of the owners, &c., and subject to their order on payment of proper duties and expenses." The mode of keeping is prescribed in various acts, the objects being safe-keeping, prevention of frauds, and the retaining of the actual goods until the duties are paid. Act 1818, § 5, and Act 1846, § 3, describe offences which may be committed as to these goods, and from which they are to be protected; Act 1846, § 5, "to secure a just accountability" for the goods. The treasury regulations of June 26, 1854, direct the mode of doing this, all of which are distinctly part of the expense of the warehousing in that division which relates to custody, and occurred in the case at bar. There is no pretence that custody and delivery service were not performed as to the plaintiffs' goods by the warehousing department of customs. The jurisdiction of the secretary to establish a rate of storage, and the rate being shown, and the fact that there was a custody service performed in consequence of the warehousing of plaintiffs' goods, the further fact remains that under the term "half-storage" the secretary classified and collected the expenses of custody and delivery of the goods. See Treasury Regulations, Feb., 1849, where the option given to the importer is to pay an absolute officer or custodian's salary, or "half-storage," as a composition; and, again, see Treasury Regulations, July 2, 1855, where half-storage is disused as a composition, and a division of the officer's salary among the private stores substituted. The term "storage" always has been held wider than the word "rent," and certain responsibility for care and safe-keeping devolves on warehousemen, not known or connected with those who rent stores to others. The word "half-storage," therefore, literally expresses a custody fee,—the safe-keeping. See Sim. Dict. Com. Terms; Webst. Dict. "Storage;" Brissac v. Lawrence [Case No. 1,888].

Again, had the duties been paid in cash, then no custody would have been required from the government; it was the use of the privilege of warehousing which put the government to the expense of custody in order to execute the existing laws; and by statute this expense was to be at the expense of the importer. The secretary of the treasury having jurisdiction, and there having been a custody service performed by the customs at the warehouse of the plaintiffs, there was no exaction in compelling the plaintiffs to make their election under the Treasury Regulations, Feb., 1849; and the fees were legally received by the collector.

CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice. Considering the nature of the question, it is evident that it cannot be satisfactorily solved without a careful review of the acts of congress concerning the warehousing of imported goods, and of the principal regulations and circulars of the treasury department upon the subject.

Warehousing, as a system, was established in the United States by the act of 6th of August, 1846. 9 Stat. 53. Among other things, the first section provides, that upon the failure or neglect to pay the duties within the period allowed by law, or whenever a warehouse entry shall be made in the prescribed form, the importation "shall be taken possession of by the collector," and be deposited in "the public stores or in other stores," to be agreed on by the collector and the importer, owner, or consignee; and by the same section, such stores are required to be secured in the manner provided for by the first section of the act of the 20th of April, 1818, entitled "An act providing for the deposit of wines and distilled spirits in public warehouse." Such goods are not only required to go into the possession of the collector, and be thus deposited under his control, but they are also required to be kept in the place of deposit at the charge and risk of the owner, importer, or consignee. Goods so deposited are at all times subject to the order of the owner, importer, or consignee, upon payment of the proper duties and expenses; but those are required to be secured by a bond to the satisfaction of the collector, in double the amount of the duties. Duties upon such goods are required to be paid within a prescribed period; and in case the goods remained in public store beyond that time, without payment of the duties and charges thereon, they were to be appraised and sold by the collector at public auction, and the proceeds, after deducting the usual rate of storage at the port, with all other charges and expenses, including duties, were to be paid to the owner, importer, or consignee. Whether the merchandise is deposited in the public stores, or in the other stores therein described, there is not one of the provisions here referred to which does not assume that the goods are in the possession and under the control of the collector; and whether deposited in a public or private warehouse, it is clear that the goods cannot be withdrawn for consumption without the payment of the duties; nor for transportation or exportation, except by paying the appropriate expenses. Most of the provisions of the act are general in their phraseology, and doubtless were made so, because the system was new and untried in this country; and they were necessarily framed and passed without the light of experience. Details, for the most part, were apparently avoided, but the fifth section authorized the secretary of the treasury, from time to time, to make such regulations, not inconsistent with the laws of the United States, as might be necessary to give full effect to the provisions of the act, and secure a just accountability under the same. By virtue of the authority conferred under that provision, the secretary of the treasury, on the 17th of February, 1849, promulgated an extended circular of instructions and forms, in place of those previously issued, with a view to enlarge the benefits of the warehouse system in this country. Treas. Cir. & Dec. (Ogden) p. 118. Those regulations greatly advanced the system by supplying important details, and prescribing the mode in which the system was to be carried into effect.

Some few details, however, were prescribed in the act itself, which must not be overlooked in this investigation. Importations in warehouse were assumed to be in the possession and under the control of the collector, and were to be kept at the charge and risk of the owner, importer, or consignee, and when withdrawn from warehouse, the appropriate expenses were to be paid by such owner, importer, or consignee. "Appropriate expenses" are the words of the act, but the expenses are in no way defined, except by necessary implication, arising from the obligation imposed of keeping the merchandise. Custody and control of merchandise in warehouse necessarily involve the expense of storage, superintendence, cartage, and drayage. All of these elements of charge are obviously included in the term "appropriate expenses," but the amount is not prescribed, and was necessarily left to be ascertained under the regulations of the department.

Moneys derived from that source are recognized by the act of the 3d of March, 1841, as public moneys, and collectors are required to pay the same into the treasury of the United States. 9 Stat. 349; U. S. v. Walker, 22 How. [63 U. S.] 313. Bonded warehouses, under the regulations of the 17th of February, 1849, were divided into three classes: 1. Public stores, or stores owned by the United States, or leased by them prior to the date of the regulations; 2. Stores in the possession and sole occupancy of the importer, and placed under a customs lock and that of the occupant, for the purpose of storing importations of the importer; 3. Similar stores in the occupation of persons desirous of engaging in the business of storing dutiable merchandise. Such classification was not, in terms, required by the act under consideration; but, in view of the explanations already given, it may be assumed that it was fully authorized by the fifth section.

Looking at the details of those regulations, and comparing them with the provisions of the act of the 28th of March, 1854, it will be seen that many of the latter were substantially borrowed from those regulations. Changes, undoubtedly, were made, and some entirely new provisions were enacted; but, in many respects, there is a marked similarity between the old regulations and the new law upon the same subject. All merchandise subject to duty might be warehoused under the act of 6th of August, 1846; but the regulations contained a provision that perishable articles and gunpowder, firecrackers, and other explosive substances, should be sold forthwith, or at the earliest day practicable, which rendered the privilege valueless in respect to all such articles; and the first section of the new law accordingly excluded those articles altogether from the benefit of the system. Other imported goods subject to duty, and which have been duly entered and bonded for warehousing, may be deposited, at the option of the owner, importer, or consignee, at his expense and risk, in any public warehouse owned or leased by the United States, or in the private warehouse of the importer, the same being used exclusively for the storage of warehoused goods of his own importation or to his consignment, or in a private warehouse used by the owner, occupant or lessee, as a general warehouse for the storage of warehoused goods, subject to the express conditions stated in the act, and such as are necessarily to be implied from other provisions. Such selected place of storage must be designated on the warehouse entry at the time of entering the merchandise at the custom-house.

But there are other and more material conditions expressly or impliedly annexed to the option given to the owner, importer, consignee, or agent, which it becomes important to notice. Warehouses for the deposit of imported goods are divided into two classes, public and private; but of the latter class there are two kinds, as already described. Importers, under that act, can have no option to deposit any importation in a public store unless such a store be owned or under lease by the United States, because one of the main purposes of the act was to discontinue the use of all such stores for warehousing, and to provide for the establishment of private bonded warehouses. Existing leases were to be cancelled at the shortest period of their termination, and new leases were forbidden at ports where there existed private bonded warehouses. Right of option, therefore, so far as public stores are concerned, must be considered as limited to cases where such stores were owned or under lease by the government. Conditions more express, however, in respect to the right of option to deposit imported goods in private warehouses, are to be found in the proviso annexed to the provision conferring the right. Stores must be first constituted private warehouses for the storage of warehoused goods within the meaning of the act, before any such option exists at all in respect to such stores.

Private warehouses, according to the first proviso of the section, must be used solely for the purpose of storing warehoused goods, and must have been previously approved as such by the secretary of the treasury, and have been placed in charge of a proper officer of the customs, who, together with the owner and proprietor, shall have the joint custody of all the merchandise stored in the warehouse; and all the labor on the goods so stored must be performed by the owner or proprietor under the supervision of the officer of the customs in charge of the same, at the expense of the owner or proprietor. Cellars and vaults of stores for the storage of wines and distilled spirits only, and yards for the storage of coal, mahogany, and other woods and lumber, may, at the discretion of the secretary of the treasury, be constituted bonded warehouses for the storage of such articles under the same regulations and conditions as are required in the storage of other merchandise; but the cellars or vaults must be exclusively appropriated to the storage of wines and distilled spirits, and have no opening or entrance, except from the street, and be under the separate locks of the custom-house and of the owner or proprietor.

Subject to these conditions and qualifications, the right of option undoubtedly is conferred by the act, but it is a mistake to suppose that it exists in the unrestricted and unqualified sense set up in the argument. Government had no public stores, except such as were already filled with imported merchandise; and in order to secure the right to deposit their importations in private warehouse; but the third sec- it necessary to comply with the conditions annexed to its enjoyment. Other differences exist between the act of the 6th of August, 1846, and that of the 28th of March, 1854, and one or two more of them may be profitably mentioned in connection with the question involved in this case.

Private warehouses might be agreed on between the collector and importer, under the former, subject only to the condition that the same should be kept under the joint locks of the custom-house and the importer, not in terms forbidding the use of the building for other purposes; but the latter expressly requires that private warehouses shall be used solely for the purpose of storing warehoused goods, and the application must not only have been previously approved by the department, but the store must be under the charge of a proper officer of the customs. Provision is wanting in the act of the 6th of August, 1846, to save the government harmless from risk, loss, or expense in keeping the importation in private warehouse; but the third section of the latter act provides, that before any store or cellar, owned or occupied by private individuals, shall be used as a warehouse for other merchandise, the owner, occupant, or lessee shall enter into bond exonerating and holding harmless the government and its officers from any such risk, loss, or expense.

Authority to establish, from time to time, such rules and regulations, not inconsistent with the laws of the United States, as he might deem to be expedient and necessary, was also conferred upon the secretary of the treasury by the ninth section of this act. Pursuant to that authority, additional regulations and forms were framed on the 2d of July, 1855, and promulgated on the same day, to give effect to the provisions of the several acts of congress establishing and extending the warehouse system. Some alteration is made in the classification of warehouses, under these regulations, which must be briefly noticed. Class one is stores owned by the United States, or hired by them prior to the date of the instructions, the leases of which have not yet expired or been cancelled. Classes two and three are the same as in the previous regulations, and need not be further noticed. Class four consists of yards and sheds of suitable construction, which, by the regulations, are allowed to be bonded in the manner prescribed for other depositories, and used for the storage of wood, coal, dye-woods, molasses, sugar in hogsheads and tierces, railroad, pig, and bar iron, chain cables, and other articles specially authorized. Bonded yards must be enclosed by substantial fences, with gates provided with suitable bars and other fastenings, so as to admit of being secured by customs locks, and must be used exclusively for the storage of the above-named goods. Sheds, also, must be provided with suitable fastenings, and be secured by the different and separate locks of the occupant and of the customs. Cellars and vaults of stores occupied for general business purposes may, under certain prescribed conditions, be used by the owner or lessee as bonded warehouses of class two, for the storage of wines and distilled spirits only and exclusively of his own importation. Neither stores, yards, sheds, cellars, nor vaults are private bonded warehouses, within the meaning of the act of congress, until they are constituted such by the sanction of the proper authorities.

Merchants or other persons desirous of having any building constituted a private bonded warehouse of the second or third class must apply to the collector of the port in writing, describing the premises, the location and capacity of the same, and setting forth the purpose for which the building is proposed to be used; as, whether for the storage of merchandise imported or consigned to himself exclusively, or for the general storage of merchandise in bond. Examination of the premises is then directed, and a report of the particulars required to be made by the proper officers in writing. On the receipt of the report, it is the duty of the collector to transmit the same to the department, together with the application of the party, and certain required certificates, and a statement of his own views and opinion. Decision is then made by the secretary of the treasury, and, if the application is granted, the owner or occupant is then required to enter into a bond, of a prescribed form, in such penalty and with such security as the collector may deem proper. Applications for the bonding of yards and sheds as warehouses must be made in a similar manner, and under like regulations. Reg. July 2, 1855, p. 9. Express stipulation is contained in the prescribed form of the bond that the obligor will pay the salary of the officer in charge of the goods, or such part of the salary as may be required in pursuance of the regulations of the treasury department.

Merchandise in warehouse was covered by a bond, under the act of the 6th of August, 1846; but the place of deposit was only secured by the joint locks of the customs and of the owner or occupant, under the superintendence of the officer in charge. Places of deposit now, as well as the goods deposited, must also be covered by a bond, so that all such depositories, before the goods are placed within them, are in point of fact private bonded warehouses, as described in the act of congress. Foreign merchandise received into public stores is declared, by the act of the 3d of March, 1841, to be subject, as to the rates of storage, to regulations by the secretary of the treasury; but the charge on that account cannot exceed the usual rate at the port. 5 Stat. 432; Treas. Cir. & Dec. (Ogden) p. 132, § 35; Reg. July 2, 1855, p. 3; Foster v. Peaslee [Case No. 4,979]. Rate of storage allowed to be charged under the regulations of the 17th of February, 1849, for the privilege of warehouse in stores of classes two and three, and for the time of the inspector in superintendence, was a sum equivalent to the pay of such officer, or one half of the amount which would accrue as storage on the goods, if stored at regular rates in a public store. Other regulations and instructions upon the same general subject have been issued since those were promulgated.

Special reference is made by the plaintiffs to the regulations of the 2d of July, 1855, and they insist that the last-named regulations had the effect to repeal those that previously existed, so far, at least, as respects the rate of storage allowed to be charged in cases of this description. Direct repeal is not pretended; and the rule is, where there is no repealing clause, that the subsequent regulations only have the effect to repeal those previously existing, to the extent that those last issued are clearly repugnant to the former. Dwarris, Stat. 533; U. S. v. Walker, 22 How. [63 U. S.] 311. Half-storage, it is admitted, was a proper charge, under the regulations of the 17th of February, 1849; and the admission is a very proper one, because the regulations expressly require the importer, before he can use his own store for such deposit, not only to request such use, but also to indorse on the entry an agreement to pay the collector an amount equal to the salary of the inspector, or one half storage, and the importer was required to make his election in advance. Under the regulations of the 2d of July, 1855, the provision for store class two is, that for the time of the customs officer necessarily required in attendance at such store, the proprietor shall pay monthly to the collector of the port a sum equivalent to the pay of such officer, but the alternative provision for the payment of half-storage is dropped. Unexplained and separated from the other regulations in pari materia, the provision would seem to imply that the collector must in all cases exact a sum equal to the full salary of the officer in charge, which, in most conceivable cases, would be much greater than half-storage. That provision is made more stringent in the regulations of the 1st of February, 1857, which provide that the proprietor shall pay monthly to the collector of the port such sum as he (the collector) may deem proper for the service, not less, however, than the pay of such officer. Gen. Reg. p. 211. Appropriate expenses were authorized to be charged, and required to be paid, under the act of the 6th of August, 1846; but the charge is described in the regulations of the 17th of February, 1849, as one "for the privilege" and for the "time of the customs officer necessarily employed in attendance at such store." Goods duly entered for warehousing under bond may, according to the act of the 28th of March, 1854, continue in warehouse without the payment of duties, for a period of three years, and may be withdrawn for consumption on due entry and payment of the duties and charges, or upon entry for exportation within the same period, without the payment of duties; and the provision is, that in the latter case the goods shall be subject only to the payment of such storage and charges as may be due thereon.

Storage and charges, therefore, are the words of the last-named act, but the language of the regulations is, "for the time of the customs officer necessarily required in attendance at such store." Those regulations, however, expressly recognize half-storage as a proper charge in cases where liberty is granted to the importer after entry to take the whole or any part of the goods from the vessel by paying the duties on a withdrawal entry for consumption. Payment of one half storage for one month is expressly required under those circumstances, and the same regulations provide that charges for storage, labor, and other expenses, accruing on the goods, shall not exceed the regular rates for such objects at the port. Unless the charges for storage can be allowed to exceed the regular rates at the port, it is difficult to see how an arbitrary rule requiring the collector to exact in all cases a sum equal to the full salary of the officer in charge could be sustained. One officer, under the regulations first issued, might have as many cellars in charge as in the judgment of the collector he could superintend efficiently, not exceeding six, and the same provision is retained in the subsequent regulations in the same words. Stores of class three were expressly excluded from that rule under the first regulations, and the prohibition was retained in those subsequently adopted, and made to include classes three and four. Class two was not within the prohibition, but the regulations of 1855 provided that, where one officer had charge of more than one warehouse of the second class, or more than one cellar or vault, the amount to be contributed by each must be agreed on by the owners or occupants and the collector. Authority to make such agreements was not conferred by the regulations of 1849, and the provision was changed in those of 1857, so that the amount to be contributed by each must be determined by the collector; and an agreement in writing must be made in all cases for the payment of the compensation of the officer.

Collectors are authorized to accede to these arrangements when the circumstances render the arrangements reasonably practicable, and the public interest will not be prejudiced by it; but it is necessarily in their discretion to determine those preliminary inquiries.

Comparing the acts of congress touching the matter in question, and the several regulations upon the same subject, one with another, it is quite obvious that the several provisions were all intended to accomplish the same general purpose. Warehoused merchandise is required to be kept by the government, and the keeping involves appropriate expenses, and the object of those provisions was to supply the means to defray those expenses and save the government harmless. Differences of phraseology undoubtedly are noticeable; but those differences have respect to matters of detail, and not of principle or substance. Importers, under the first regulations had, in express terms, an election whether to pay a sum equivalent to the salary of the officer in charge, or one half storage at regular rates, in the public stores; and, taken as a whole, I am of the opinion that the subsequent regulations do not repeal that provision. Expressions are certainly to be found in the subsequent regulations which, if taken separately, would strongly support the view that collectors are required in all cases to exact an amount equivalent to the salary of the officer in charge; but it is not possible to support the regulations at all, if that be their proper construction, for two reasons. Regarding the charge as storage and as an arbitrary exaction, then it would be contrary to law, because in most cases it would exceed the regular rates at the port; but if regarded as payment of the salary of the officer in charge, then the officer receiving it would incur a penalty of two hundred dollars. 1 Stat. 680. Difficulties so formidable cannot be overcome, and consequently the construction assumed by the plaintiffs must be rejected. Where the interpretation of the revenue laws and regulations are involved, considerable weight should be given to the practice of the government as a contemporaneous construction of the provision under consideration When the subsequent regulations were issued, the practice was not changed, but continued the same; and, as a general remark, it may be said that it has never been changed to the present time. Full confirmation of the last remark, if any be needed, is found in the abstract of decisions forwarded to the collectors of the customs on the 30th of June, 1857, by the secretary of the treasury. On that day certain additional instructions were issued to the collectors, and the secretary took occasion to subjoin an abstract of decisions on questions under existing revenue laws. Among the abstract of decisions is one in respect to "storage in private stores"; and the instructions say, "It has been decided that, in cases where goods are stored under bond in a private store, the importer shall either make monthly payment of a sum equivalent to the pay of an inspector placed in charge of the same, or one half of the amount which would accrue as storage on the goods so stored if placed in public store, the importer to make his selection at the time of placing the goods in store." All of the collectors, it is believed, have conformed to that decision since it was made, and, in view of all the provisions upon the subject, it is difficult to see what other rule can consistently be adopted, except when the arrangement is made for one officer to have charge of more than one warehouse, as before explained. Warehouse Manual (Bruce) p. 205.

Several grounds are assumed by the plaintiffs to show their right to recover, but it is clear, from the explanations already given, that none of them can be sustained. 1. They insist that, under the act of the 28th of March, 1854, they had a right to elect to deposit the importations in question in their own store, and that they were virtually deprived of that right by being compelled to accept the condition to pay half-storage to secure the enjoyment of the right. Sufficient answer to this complaint has already been made in the previous explanations. Government had no public stores which were not full, and the plaintiffs had to comply with the regulations in order that their own stores might be constituted "private bonded warehouses." Election was made by them, and they have enjoyed the right, and, in the language of the law, must pay the appropriate expenses. 2. In the second place, they deny that there were any expenses, but the error of this assumption has already been shown, and the explanations need not be repeated. 3. Lastly, they insist that, if the collector had a right to demand anything, it was a sum equivalent to the salary of the officer in charge, and not half-storage, and that no such demand was ever made. Half-storage, it is admitted, is much less than the salary of the officer, but the proposition is, that half-storage could not be exacted under the regulations; and, although the collector might have demanded a much larger sum, still, as the sum received could not be legally exacted in that form, they have a right to recover it back in an action for money had and received. After full consideration, I am of the opinion that no part of the proposition can be sustained. Half-storage was properly demanded under the regulations; but if the collector accepted a less sum than he was entitled to receive, the plaintiffs in this form of action could not recover it back merely because the sum paid was characterized by a wrong name. In view of the whole case, I am of the opinion that the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover; and, under the agreement, and notwithstanding the verdict, there must be judgment for the defendant.

Case No. 2,831a.

CLARK v. PHILLIPS.

[Hempst. 294.] [1]

Superior Court, D. Arkansas. Jan., 1836.

VARIANCE—"WRITING OBLIGATORY"—ASSIGNMENT.

1. A trivial variation in describing a deed or written contract is fatal, and the variance may be taken advantage of on demurrer in arrest of judgment, or on error.

2. The term "writing obligatory" imports a sealed instrument.

3. To enable a person, by assignment of a bond, to vest the legal title in the assignee, it must appear that he has the right to make the assignment.

In error to Pope circuit court.

[At law. Action by Thomas Phillips against Josiah Clark upon a bond assigned to plaintiff. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brought error.]

Before YELL and CROSS, Judges.

CROSS, Judge. This cause comes up on a writ of error to the Pope circuit court, and has been submitted without argument. At the return term in the court below, Clark, the plaintiff in error, appeared by his attorney, and craved oyer of the writing declared upon, which was given in the words and figures following, namely: "The first day of October next, we or either of us promise to pay to John Rossman & Co., or order, eight hundred and fifteen dollars and fifty cents, for value received of them, this 29th day of October, 1830. (Signed) Josiah Clark, B. D. Johnson." On the back of which was the following indorsement, namely: "I assign the within note to Thomas Phillips for value received, this 22d day of October, 1832. (Signed) A. Dilerac." Whereupon he filed a general demurrer to the plaintiff's declaration, to which there was a joinder, and on submitting it, the circuit court gave judgment for the plaintiff, overruling the demurrer. Phillips alleges in his declaration "that Josiah Clark and one B. D. Johnson, otherwise Bolus D. Johnson, who is not sued in this case, by their certain writing obligatory signed with their own proper hands, and sealed with their seals, promised to pay," and then goes on to state "that John Rossman & Co., to whom, or to whose order, the payment was to be made, indorsed and assigned the said writing obligatory, by which said indorsement and assignment they, the said John Rossman & Co., then and there ordered and appointed the sum of money specified in said writing obligatory to be paid to Thomas Phillips, and then and there delivered the same to Phillips." There being an obvious variance between the writing described in the declaration, as well as the assignment, and that exhibited on oyer, we shall consider the question only as to whether this variance ought to have been regarded in deciding upon the demurrer. The rule of law is that a trivial variation in setting out a deed or written contract is fatal. 1 Chitty, Pl. 304. And such variation may be taken advantage of after craving oyer, and setting out the writing by demurrer. 2 Saund. 366, note 1; 1 Chit. 416. The same authorities also show that the variance will be available on the trial, in arrest of judgment, or on a writ of error.

In the case before us, the declaration alleges, in describing the written contract, that it was sealed with the seals of Clark and Johnson, when the instrument shown on oyer is without seals. There is also a discrepancy in the assignment, as the declaration states it to have been made by John Rossman & Co., when it appears, from the oyer given, to have been made by A. Dilerac. To designate a written contract in a declaration or plea as a writing obligatory would doubtless be equivalent to an allegation that it was sealed, as the words "writing obligatory" are technical, and imply a sealing. 4 Com. Dig. tit. "Fact;" 1 Saund. 290; 1 Chit. 348. It follows, therefore, that if the allegation as to sealing had been entirely omitted, the misdescription would have been in legal contemplation and effect the same, by describing the instrument as a writing obligatory. It may be proper to remark, in relation to the assignment, that, from anything on the record, it does not appear that Phillips, the plaintiff below, had any transfer of the written contract vesting the title in him, so as to authorize a suit in his name. Certainly "A. Dilerac" could not assign it, because he had, to all appearances, no legal interest in it. As well might Richard Roe or John Doe have assigned it, so far as we can perceive. Believing that a misdescription of a writing declared on after oyer may be taken advantage of on demurrer, and the misdescription being obvious in the case before us, we are unanimous in the opinion that the demurrer was improperly overruled by the circuit court, and that the judgment rendered thereon ought to be reversed. Judgment reversed.

[1] [Reported by Samuel H. Hempstead, Esq.]

Case No. 2,832.

CLARK et al. v. PROTECTION INS. CO.

[1 Story, 109.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. May Term, 1840.

INSURANCE ON SMUGGLED PROPERTY—DIVISIBILITY OF POLICY—FORFEITURE—PENALTY.

1. A policy of insurance is not divisible, so as to be good in part and bad in part. If, at its inception, it is founded in any illegality, in which one only of the owners participated, it is utterly void as to all.

[Cited in Blandy v. Griffith, Case No. 1,530.]

2. Where a ship was insured on a voyage to Liverpool, and took on board in the port of New Orleans a chain cable, smuggled by another vessel, and was lost upon the voyage to Liverpool, by the perils of the seas, it was held, that she was not subjected to a forfeiture in rem, but that the master was personally liable to the pecuniary penalties prescribed by law therefor, and that the underwriters were liable for a total loss on the policy. Held, also, that the insurance on the chain cable was good; the title being in the owner of the vessel, and the illegality not attaching to the voyage, on which it was used.

3. When property is forfeited, it does not vest in the government until after a seizure, which then relates back to the time of the forfeiture.

4. The 27th and 28th sections of the duty collection act of 1799, c. 128 [1 Story's Laws, 597; 1 Stat. 648, c. 22], are not applicable to such a case as this; but it is covered by the 50th and 59th sections of the act, which provide a penalty for unlading goods without a special permit or license from the collector, or for knowingly receiving or concealing goods, liable to seizure. But the vessel receiving smuggled goods is not liable to forfeiture.

[Cited in U. S. v. Distilled Spirits, 14 Wall. (81 U. S.) 61.]

5. Every statute, imposing a penalty, imports a prohibition, and makes the prohibited act illegal.

[Cited in Hatch v. Burroughs, Case No. 6,203.]

6. A mere intention to do any act, which would avoid a policy, if done, but which has never been consummated, does not vitiate the policy. The voyage, to avoid the policy, should be originally either wholly or in part illegal as to trade and objects.

7. If a voyage as originally insured be valid, any subsequent illegality in the course of the voyage will not affect the policy, so far as concerns losses on property not tainted with such illegality, though connected with the res gestae.

8. If the illegal act is followed by a forfeiture and seizure of the thing insured, the underwriters are not liable for the loss. But the mere liability to forfeiture, does not avoid the insurance, or prevent a recovery for a loss by any independent peril.

At law. Assumpsit on a policy of insurance underwritten by the Protection Insurance Company, on the 10th of November, 1837, whereby they insured the plaintiffs, "Means & [Joseph] Clark, for whom it concerns, payment to them to be insured, lost or not lost, twenty thousand dollars on the ship Avon, at sea and in port, for and during the term of one year from the 12th day of November, 1837, at noon; and if at sea at the expiration of said term, the risk to continue until her arrival at the port of destination, at a pro rata premium." The vessel was valued at $28,000, and the premium was four per cent. per annum. The policy in other respects was in the common form of the Boston policies.

The parties agreed upon the following statement of facts: The defendants, on the 10th of November, 1837, made a policy of insurance, whereby they insured Means & Clark, for whom it might concern, in the sum of twenty thousand dollars on the ship Avon, valued at $28,000, for one year. The vessel was owned by Joseph Clark, James R. Groton, George Sproul, Arthur Child, who was master, and Thomas Johnson, all of Waldoborough, in the state of Maine, and the plaintiffs, and the policy was made for them and by their orders. She sailed from Waldoborough, Maine, on her first voyage, in November, 1837, for New Orleans, arrived there in December, thence went to Natchez, and sailed thence for Liverpool, about February 1st, 1838, and was totally lost by the perils of the seas on her passage. When she sailed from Waldoborough, she had on board, besides her stream cable, one hempen and one iron cable. The master was employed for the owners to obtain the rigging and part of the equipments of the ship, and it was his intention to change the hempen cable for the iron one hereinafter mentioned. At New Orleans, the hempen cable was taken out, and an iron one substituted, of the value of more than $400, which was purchased, and put on board in the following manner:—In September, 1837, the said Arthur Child requested his brother, Samuel, then about to sail for Pictou, in the province of Nova Scotia, to purchase an iron cable there for said vessel. The cable was bought there, shipped on board of a vessel belonging to citizens of the United States, concealed under a cargo of coal, thence carried to the port of New York, not entered or landed there with the rest of the cargo, but concealed on board, and thence carried in the same vessel to New Orleans, and there secretly taken out, without any license or authority of any officer of the customs, and put aboard the Avon at night, long after sunset, and kept there concealed, while the Avon remained in the United States; the object being to evade the payment of the duties, to which such cable was liable on importation into the United States. There is no evidence, that any of the plaintiffs except the said Arthur Child were privy to, or had any knowledge of these doings or of his intentions. The Avon without the hempen cable, or the iron cable substituted for it, was unseaworthy. The insurance company, in ignorance of these facts, on June 25th, 1838, paid Means & Clark, on account of said loss, the sum of ——; but, on coming to a knowledge of these circumstances, conceive themselves not to be liable at all, and claim to recover back the amount paid. The case is submitted to the court on the above statement of facts. If the court shall be of opinion, that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover, judgment is to be rendered for $3995.54, with interest from May 11th, 1840, and costs, and otherwise the defendants to have judgment for costs.

[1] [Reported by William W. Story, Esq.]

F. C. Loring, for plaintiffs.

The facts admitted show a prima facie case for the plaintiffs. The defence consists in one single fact, that the ship insured had on board a cable, which, having been smuggled into the United States, was by law liable to be seized and forfeited to the government. From this fact, it has been suggested, that the following conclusions may be drawn. First. That by the 27th and 28th sections of the act of 1799, c. 128, the vessel was liable to forfeiture, by reason of being the recipient of smuggled goods, and therefore not capable of being insured. Second. That the cable, being liable to forfeiture, was not capable of being insured; and that being part of the ship, its infirmity infected the whole ship, and rendered it also incapable of insurance. Third. That as the cable was liable to be seized and removed, and the vessel to be detained, in consequence of such seizure, it was thereby exposed to an additional risk, either from the want of the cable, or the delay, which would discharge the insurers from any subsequent loss. Fourth. That the concealing the cable on board the Avon was an illegal act, by which the policy was avoided.

To the first point, without admitting the conclusion, it is sufficient to say, that the provisions contained in the 27th and 28th sections of the act do not apply to vessels, which have arrived at the usual places of loading and discharge. The Industry [Case No. 7,028].

To the second, that the liability of an article to be forfeited, does not render it incapable of being the subject of insurance, until it is seized. And the better opinion is, that, in cases of seizure, the forfeiture does not relate back to the time of the committal of the offence, but to the time of the seizure. When there is no seizure, the use, possession, and property remain in the owner, and constitute an insurable interest The Mars [Id. 9,106]; U. S. v. The Anthony Mangin [Id. 14,461]; Id., 3 Cranch [7 U. S.] 356; Polleys v. Ocean Ins. Co., 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 157; Lockyer v. Offley, 1 Term R. 260.

To the third, that no detention actually took place; that if the cable had been seized, detention was not necessarily a consequence; that the seaworthiness of the ship did not depend upon the ownership of the cables and anchors on board, but on their sufficiency in number and quality for the ship and voyage; that while actually on board, the ship could not be unseaworthy in that respect; and that the possibility of a detention, like an intention to deviate, could not have the effect of avoiding the policy.

To the fourth. The 60th section of the same act provides, that the concealing of goods liable to seizure, shall subject the offender to a penalty. But it does not enact, that the vessel or warehouse, in which the goods may be placed, shall be forfeited, or liable to any penalty.

If the position assumed be correct, then the commission of any offence against law, even a common assault, would avoid a policy on the vessel or house, in which it occurred. To avoid a policy on the ground of illegality, it must be shown, that the insurance is void, as against law, from matters appearing on the face of the policy, or that the insurance was intended to aid in effecting some illegal object. The former cannot be pretended. There is no illegality apparent on the face of the policy. Of the latter, there is no proof. The voyages, on which the ship was employed, were legal; the perils insured against were such as were legal risks; the parties to the contract contemplated nothing illegal when the policy was made. If at that time, the master expected to use a smuggled cable, he did not intend to smuggle it in this vessel; and the policy would not cover the cable, till the illegal act was consummated, and the cable became an appurtenance of the ship. There was no illegality in carrying a smuggled cable to sea, nor in using one. Armstrong v. Toler, 11 Wheat. [24 U. S.] 258; Polleys v. Ocean Ins. Co., 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 157.

B. Rand, for defendants, argued in substance as follows:

By the act of 1799, c. 128, § 27, it is made unlawful to unlade any goods, imported from a foreign port, before the ship shall have come to the proper place for the discharge of her cargo or some part thereof, and shall be duly authorized to unlade the same; and in such case the goods are to be forfeited, which are thus unlawfully unladed. By the 28th section of the same act, it is made unlawful to put or receive any goods so unladen into any vessel, and the commander, and those who aid therein, forfeit thereby treble the value of the goods, and the ship, into which they are put, is thereby forfeited. By the 50th section of this act, no goods can lawfully be unladen between sunset and sunrise, nor at any time without a permit therefor, and the commander of the ship, and others aiding therein, forfeit $400 each; the goods also are forfeited, and the ship, if, as in this case, the goods are over $400 in value. By the 68th section of the act, it is made unlawful to conceal goods, on which the duties are unpaid, in any ship or vessel, and the goods are forfeited thereby. And by the 69th section it is declared, that if any person shall buy or conceal any goods, knowing them to be liable to seizure, he shall forfeit double the amount thereof. The iron cable was forfeited, therefore, under the provisions of the 27th, 50th, or 68th sections of the act. The vessel, that is, the Avon, into which the iron cable was so unladen from the other vessel, without a license, was also forfeited by virtue of the 28th section. The putting, receiving, and concealing the iron cable on board the Avon were unlawful acts, by the 28th, 68th, or 69th sections. The defendants, therefore, insist, that the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover, because,—

1. The contract of insurance is illegal and void. Whether we regard the cable only, or the ship and cable, the policy covered property, which was dealt with illegally during the voyage, or during the time mentioned in the policy. It is quite immaterial, what part of the voyage, or time, the ship, or cable, which became a part of her, was so illegally dealt with, or for how long or short a space of time. If it were the last moment only of the voyage or time, it would be just as fatal to the policy, as if it were the first, or for the whole time. Story, Ag. p. 184, § 195, last paragraph; 3 Marsh. Ins. (3d. Eng. Ed.) 52; Wilson v. Marryat, 8 Durn. & E. [Term R.] 31; 1 Bos. & P. 430; Bird v. Appleton, 8 Durn. & E. [Term R.] 562; Bird v. Pigou, Selw. N. P. (8th Eng. Ed.) 994, note i.

It seems to be a general principle, established by decisions quite too numerous to admit of citation, that a contract immediately connected with, in aid of, or countenancing a violation of the law, such as a policy of insurance covering property, and intended by the owner to protect himself against loss in respect of it, while he is dealing with it contrary to the law, is utterly void. Policies upon goods afterwards, during some time in the course of the voyage or risk, smuggled into or out of the country, contrary to the provisions of the revenue laws, form only one class of cases, coming under the general rule. But they may well be referred to, as exemplifying the principle, on which all the decisions referred to seem to depend. 3 Marsh. Ins. (Eng. Ed.) 52. For other exemplifications, see Bensley v. Bignold, 5 Barn. & Ald. 335; Stephens v. Robinson, 2 Cromp. & J. 209; Bartlett v. Vinor, Carth. 251, approved in De Begnis v. Armistead, 10 Bing. 110, per Tindal, C. J. Inasmuch as the policy was intended to attach to the cable, without regarding the illegal use of the rest of the ship, it seems, that the whole policy is void. It was a valued policy. And the contract in this case certainly must be considered as indivisible. It is a much stronger case than many in the books. Parkin v. Dick, 11 East, 502, 2 Camp. 221; Camelo v. Britten, 4 Barn. & Ald. 184; 3 Marsh. Ins. 52 et seq.; Shiffner v. Gordon, 12 East, 294. But the whole ship was violating the law, whether we regard merely the 28th section of the act, or the general tenor and spirit of the revenue laws, while she was receiving on board and concealing the cable. This was clearly an unlawful use and employment of the ship. Not merely a part of the property covered by the policy, but the whole of it, was dealt with illegally during the risk, or voyage. The ship was aiding in a violation of the revenue laws, for the benefit solely of the owners. It is clearly immaterial in what form of words the act is rendered illegal, whether it be expressly forbidden, or the doing it be attended with a penalty or forfeiture, or however otherwise. 10 Bing. 110.

2. There was no insurable interest in the Avon at the time, when the loss happened. Both the ship and the cable were forfeited by the illegal transactions referred to. The property in them was so vested in the government, that the owners could afterwards have maintained no action for the ship, or any of her appurtenances. The owners could have made no valid transfer or abandonment of her to the insurance office; the forfeiture being declared by statute to take place immediately on the doing of the forbidden act. Gelston v. Hoyt, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 311; McLane v. U. S., 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 427; Fontaine v. Phoenix Ins. Co., 11 Johns. 293, also cited and approved 15 Johns. 25; U. S. v. 1,960 Bags of Coffee, 8 Cranch [12 U. S.] 404.

3. The policy is void by reason of the concealment of a material fact. The insured knew, when they smuggled the cable on board, that they should have, to say the least, no more than a defeasible title to the ship, including the cable; that they could almost give no other title to the wreck, to the insurance office, in case of shipwreck afterwards; and that the ship would be liable to be arrested, taken out of her course, detained, and deprived of her cable, if nothing worse. These, especially in the case of a valued policy, were matters material for the defendants to know. Parkin v. Dick, 11 East, 502.

4. The vessel was unseaworthy. It is admitted, that, without the iron cable, she would be unseaworthy. But the title to the iron cable, as we have seen, was vested in the government from the moment it was put on board, and dealt with contrary to law. It was liable to be taken at any moment. It did not belong to the owners of the ship, and could not be considered, under the circumstances, as making a part of her for the purpose of rendering her seaworthy. Nor can the plaintiffs be permitted to show and insist upon this illegal transaction as rendering their ship seaworthy. It is to be remembered, that the hempen cable, which the Avon had on board, when she sailed from Waldoborough, was not intended to be kept on board but for a short time, and until the iron cable should be substituted. It was not intended to, and did not render her seaworthy for the whole voyage, or the whole time of the risk, or insurance. Unless the iron cable can be taken into view for this purpose, she was, therefore, unseaworthy.

STORY, Circuit Justice. The present policy was underwritten for all the owners upon their joint account; and under such circumstances I agree, that if the policy at its inception, was founded in any illegality (in which one only of the owners (the master,) who is said to be the owner of one eighth, participated, it is utterly void as to all; for the policy is not divisible, so as to be good in part, and bad in part. It must then stand in toto, or not at all. The case of Parkin v. Dick, 2 Camp. 221, is not exactly like the present; but it may serve to illustrate the principle. The policy here is a joint contract for all the owners; and no recovery can be had, unless it is legal as to all of them; for whatever is recovered must go for the joint account. If all the plaintiffs had sued on the policy in their own names, we should see at once, that the objection would be fatal. It can make no difference, that the suit is brought in the name of their agents; for if the principals could not recover, by reason of any illegality, their agents cannot. In Parkin v. Dick, 2 Camp. 221, the policy was on different articles, each package of which was to pay the same average, as if it were separately insured; and some of the articles specified on the back of the policy were naval stores, the exportation of which was prohibited, without a license from the crown. No such leave was obtained for the voyage; and Lord Ellenborough first, and afterwards the court of king's bench, held the policy utterly void, as to all the other articles insured, as well as the naval stores. Lord Ellenborough, in delivering the judgment in the court of king's bench (11 East, 502, 503), said: "The policy is one entire contract on goods to be thereafter specified, to which the underwriters subscribed; and the subsequent specification, by the assured, cannot alter the nature of the contract with respect to the underwriters, so as to sever that, which was originally one entire contract. It has been decided a hundred times, that if a party insure goods altogether in one policy, and some of them are of a nature to make the voyage illegal, the whole contract is illegal and void." Now, this language applies, a fortiori, to a joint contract, where one party, by reason of his own illegality, is incapable of recovering See, also, De Begnis v. Armistead, 10 Bing. 107, 110, 111.

But the main questions in the present case are, first, whether there is any illegality in the transactions, which affected or could affect the owners personally, or could justify proceedings in rem against the vessel insured; and secondly, if there was, whether that illegality was of a nature, which affected or could affect the present policy, or the voyages thereby insured. In respect to the first question, the material facts are, that before the ship sailed from Waldoborough, the master being, as before stated, a part owner, was employed by the other owners to procure the rigging and a part of the equipments of the ship. The master employed his brother, who was about to sail for Pictou in Nova Scotia, to procure there a chain cable for the ship, which was afterwards intended to be brought into the United States, and placed on board of the ship (as I think the subsequent circumstances show) without the payment of duties upon the importation thereof. The chain cable was accordingly bought and shipped on board of an American vessel, concealed under her cargo. The vessel afterwards arrived at New York without the cable's being entered or landed there; and the cable was thence carried in the same vessel to New Orleans, where it was secretly and without any license, and without the payment of any duties, put on board of the Avon, then lying in that port, and kept concealed on board until her departure from the port, on the voyage for Liverpool, during which she was lost. The statement of facts further admits, that there is no evidence, that any of the owners, except the master, were privy to, or had any knowledge of these doings, or of the master's intention.

The question, then, is, whether the taking on board of this chain cable, at New Orleans, under the above circumstances, was an illegal act, for which the owners were immediately liable by a suit in personam, or the vessel herself was subject to forfeiture. The argument for the insurance company is, that the transaction was within the provisions of the 27th and 28th sections of the duty collection act of 1799, c. 128, and also against the provisions of the 50th and 69th sections of the same act. It seems to me, that the twenty-seventh and twenty-eighth sections of the act may at once be laid out of the case. The former applies only to vessels, which unlade a part of their cargo within the limits of some district of the United States, or within four leagues of the coast thereof, and before such ship or vessel shall have come to the proper place for the discharge thereof. The 28th section applies only to the vessel, which shall have received the same goods so unladen. So that it is apparent, that the forfeitures and penalties do not cover a case, like the present, where the cable was unladen after the arrival of the vessel at her proper port of discharge, and there taken on board of the Avon. This construction has nothing new in it. It was many years ago adopted by this court in the case of The Industry [Case No. 7,028].

The 50th section of the act is, however, directly in point. It prohibits the unlading of any goods brought in any vessel from a foreign place, without a special license or permit of the collector, or other proper officer of the customs; and if they are unladen without such a license or permit, and are of the value of four hundred dollars, the vessel, from which they are unladen, is forfeited. But this forfeiture attaches only to the unlading vessel, and not to the receiving vessel. The Industry [supra]. So that under this section of the act the Avon was not subject to any forfeiture. But there is a clause in the same section, which imposes a pecuniary penalty of four hundred dollars upon the master, and any other persons, who shall knowingly be concerned or aiding in such unlading, or in removing, storing, or otherwise securing the goods. The master of the Avon was clearly within the reach of this prohibition and penalty; for he was knowingly concerned in the unlawful unlading of the iron cable. The sixty-ninth section of the same act, also, seems to me clearly to cover the present case, and to inflict a pecuniary penalty on the master of the Avon. It provides, that if any person shall conceal, or buy any goods, knowing them to be liable to seizure under the act, he shall forfeit and pay a sum double the amount in value of the goods so concealed or purchased. The state of facts shows a most studied concealment of the iron cable by the master of the Avon, and, therefore, brings him clearly within the reach of the penalty. But then, there is no forfeiture inflicted upon the vessel, or other vehicle, or the store, in which the concealment takes place.

The result, therefore, is, that in the present case the Avon was not subjected to any forfeiture whatsoever in rem; but the act of smuggling and concealing the iron cable was illegal, and the master of the Avon was concerned in such smuggling and concealment, and personally liable to the pecuniary penalties prescribed therefor. I adopt the doctrine of Lord Holt, in Bartlett v. Vinor, Carth. 252, and of Lord Chief Justice Tindal, in De Begnis v. Armistead, 10 Bing. 107–110, that every contract made for, or about a matter or thing, which is prohibited, and made unlawful by statute, is a void contract, although the statute does not mention that it shall be so, but only inflicts a penalty on the offender; because a penalty implies a prohibition, although there are no prohibitory words in the statute. In other words, every statute, imposing a penalty, imports a prohibition, and makes the prohibited act illegal.

So that, in this view, we are driven to the consideration of the other question in the case; and that is, whether this illegality was of a nature, which affected, or could affect the present policy, or the voyage or voyages thereby insured. Now, it is material to state, that the question is not, whether, if a seizure of the ship had taken place, on account of this illegal conduct of the master, the underwriters would have been liable for any loss or injury consequent thereon, or whether, if the iron cable had been seized and confiscated by a regular sentence of condemnation for the illegal unlading thereof, the underwriters would have been liable for such a loss, as an appurtenance of the ship. There is no doubt whatsoever, that in neither case would the underwriters have been liable on the policy; for the proximate cause of the loss would have been the illegal or fraudulent act of the master, from which, under our policies, the underwriters are ordinarily exempted. The present loss was by the peril of the sea,—a peril clearly insured against; and if we are to regard the maxim, "Causa proxima, non remota, spectatur," the plaintiffs are entitled to recover for that loss, unless the policy itself, or the voyage was illegal.

I confess myself wholly unable to perceive upon what ground the policy itself is void, or the voyage, during which this transaction took place, is illegal. The policy was on time, for the term of one year; and, of course, covered all legal voyages, which might be undertaken during that period. At the time, when it was underwritten, there is no pretence to say, that it was in the contemplation of the insured to engage in any illegal voyages whatsoever. The voyage from Waldoborough to New Orleans, and from thence to Liverpool, was in all its objects and ends perfectly legal. The only possible suggestion, which, upon the state of the facts, can be made, is, that the master about that period contemplated the procurement of a chain cable for the ship from the British provinces, which might at a subsequent period be illegally taken on board at another port, and which was in fact taken on board, long after the policy was underwritten and had attached upon a voyage then in progress. Now, I am unable to see, how the validity of a policy can be affected by a mere contingent future contemplated illegal act in the progress of a voyage, the voyage itself being otherwise in its origin, concoction, and accomplishment perfectly legal. Suppose, in the present case, the chain cable never had been carried to New Orleans, or taken on board the Avon, it would certainly be difficult for a moment to maintain the doctrine, that the policy was utterly void. A mere intention to do an illegal act, or other act, which would avoid a policy, if done, but which has never been consummated by any act, has never, as far as I know, been deemed per se to vitiate the policy. There is in all cases of this sort a locus poenitentiae; there must be the act and the intent coupled together. If, when a policy on a ship is underwritten, the owner has in contemplation a deviation from the voyage insured, but, from a change of purpose or otherwise, no deviation in fact takes place, we all know, that the policy is good, and covers all losses insured against. Put the case much stronger, and indeed one, which reaches in its scope the present; suppose, at the time when a policy on the ship is underwritten on a voyage perfectly lawful, out and home, the owner has it in contemplation to smuggle a part, or even the whole of the cargo on the return voyage, but it is a mere contingent intention, and not absolute; and, in point of fact, he afterwards in the course of the voyage changes his intention, or, without changing his intention, no smuggling ever takes place; would the policy be utterly void in its concoction, so as not to cover any losses occurring in the course of the voyage by the perils of the sea? I know no case, that goes to such an extent. In order to produce such an effect, as to make the policy utterly void in its origin, it is necessary, that the plan of the voyage itself, and the main purposes of the enterprise should be absolutely illegal. The voyage should be originally and absolutely, in whole or in part, illegal, as to trade and objects; such as a voyage to and from an enemy's port, or a voyage for the purpose of smuggling goods out and home; or a voyage in the violation of some other public law, such as the breach of an embargo or non-intercourse edict (see 1 Phil. Ins., 2d Ed., 1840, pp. 85, 91, 92); and not merely a contingent intention to do some collateral act in the course of a legal voyage or trade, which might itself, if done, be illegal. The illegality should not only be contingently contemplated; but there should be some overt act put in progress, as by sailing in furtherance and accomplishment of the illegal voyage.

The case of Parkin v. Dick, 2 Camp. 222, 11 East, 502, 503, was a case, where the insurance was on goods, a part of which were by law prohibited from exportation; it was held, that the voyage, as to such goods, was illegal in its origin; and that, therefore, the whole policy was void. The queston in Wilson v. Marryat, 8 Term R. 31, 1 Bos. & P. 430, was, whether a policy on a circuitous voyage from America to the East Indies was prohibited by the British laws. It was held, that such a circuitous voyage was not so prohibited; and consequently the policy was valid; but otherwise it would have been void. In Bird v. Pigou (see 2 Selw. N. P., London Ed., 1831, p. 991; Id., Wheat. Ed., p. 191, note; 1 Phil. Ins., 2d Ed., 1840, p. 91) Lord Kenyon held, that if any part of an integral voyage be illegal, a policy upon the integral voyage is void. I see no reason to doubt the correctness of this decision. It seems founded in a plain principle of law, that a contract is an entirety, and cannot be good in part and bad in part. It is true, that Lord Kenyon is reported in Wilson v. Marryat, 8 Term R. 31-46, to have gone further, and to have said, that if there were any infirmity or illegality in any part of the integral voyage, it would have made the whole voyage illegal, so that the assured could not recover on a policy on any part of it, even a policy on that part alone, which was legal. This was a mere obiter dictum, not called for by the case; and it is certainly somewhat shaken, although not overturned, by the decision in Bird v. Appleton, 8 Term R. 562. On that occasion Mr. Justice Lawrence said; "In order to render the insurance illegal, the illegality should exist during the course of the voyage insured." It will be found exceedingly difficult, in point of principle, to distinguish between an illegality in a former voyage, and that in a prior part of a sound voyage, where the policy covers only the part of the voyage, which is legal.

There are, moreover, other cases (on which I shall presently have occasion to comment), in which a doctrine has been asserted, which is perhaps not easily reconcilable with that in Parkin v. Dick, unless upon the ground, that the policy in that case was made upon the illegal goods, as a part of the specification on the policy. But, certainly, these cases go far to invalidate the broadness of the argument, which has been addressed to the court upon the present occasion. That argument goes to this extent, that if the policy covered any property, which was dealt with illegally during the voyage or time mentioned in the policy, it avoided the policy. It would hence follow, that if a ship was insured upon a lawful voyage, and afterwards, during the course of the voyage, she should be engaged in any transaction, which was illegal, and a fortiori, if she should be engaged in a transaction, which would subject her to seizure, and she should afterwards be lost by a mere peril of the seas (no seizure having been made), no recovery could be had for the loss. Now, I am not ready to accede to that proposition. On the contrary, as I understand the law, although the underwriters would not be liable for a loss by such a seizure; yet a loss occasioned by any other peril would be recoverable; because the policy itself would originally be valid at its inception, and the voyage would be lawful, when the risk attached. I agree, that if there was an illegality attaching to a part of the voyage insured at the commencement of the risk under the policy, it would avoid the policy. So it was held, in regard to the insurance on the ship in Bird v. Appleton, 8 Term R. 563, 566. But in that very case, there was another policy on goods; and the objection taken was, that the insured could not recover on the policy on goods belonging to the owner of the ship, because the ship was liable to seizure on account of an illicit traffic in the anterior part of the voyage. Mr. Justice Lawrence, on that occasion, said, that he did not think the objection well founded. "Here (said he) the illegality commenced by the captain's taking on board a cargo at Bombay in order to carry it to Canton for sale (the insurance being on a cargo at and from Canton). But the doctrine relied upon by the defendant is perfectly new, that the insured cannot recover on a policy against the underwriters, because the ship, on a prior voyage, had been guilty of some transgression, for which she was liable to seizure. That is not a risk within the policy. If the ship had been seized for this cause during the voyage, the underwriters would not have been liable. They are only liable for risks in the course of the voyage insured." The same doctrine was held by Mr. Justice Le Blanc, in the same case. So that we see, that past illegality in the voyage will not affect a policy, which is otherwise legal. Neither should a future contingent illegality. There must be a present, actual illegality attaching to the very policy, at the commencement of, and as a part of, the risk.

But, then, it may be said, that here the illegal intent was completely carried into effect at New Orleans; and, therefore, there is both act and intent; and then the policy is utterly void ab initio. But we must take the present case according to the truth of the whole circumstances. The first question is, whether the policy ever attached as a valid contract to the ship. If it did, then the question is shifted. It is no longer, whether the policy had any original validity; but whether an intended subsequent illegal act, consummated long after it attached to the ship, in the progress of a lawful voyage, would avoid it ab initio, or only exempt the underwriters from any losses occasioned by that illegal act.

Now, it is here, that the cases, to which I have already alluded, may be deemed to apply. They in effect decide, that if the voyage, as originally insured, was valid, any subsequent illegality in the course of the voyage will not affect the policy, so far as concerns losses on property, not tainted by such illegality, although connected with the res gestae. In Butler v. Allnutt, 1 Starkie, 222, the policy was on a cargo, on a voyage from an enemy's port, with a clause for a return premium of 4 per cent. on the safe arrival of the vessel in London from Bordeaux, the enemy's port. The voyage was undertaken under a license from the crown; but it was for the importation of certain specific articles; and others were taken on board, not included in the license. The suit was brought for the return premium, the vessel having safely arrived; and one objection taken was, that the articles taken on board, and not included in the license, vitiated the whole license and policy. But Lord Ellenborough held, that under the license the voyage was lawful, and although the ship took on board other articles, that only removed the protection pro tanto. The same point was held in Keir v. Andrade, 6 Taunt. 498, which was the case of a policy on goods at and from London to Madeira, valued at £1,000, to pay average on each package. The goods were 300 barrels of gunpowder, of which the exportation of 150 barrels only was authorized by a license from the crown; and the plaintiff claimed for a loss by capture. One objection taken was, that the exportation of the second 150 barrels was prohibited, and by statute the same barrels, as well as the ship, were thereby forfeited; and that, therefore, the whole adventure was illegal, and the insurance also illegal for the whole. But the court held, that the policy was valid, and covered the 150 barrels, the exportation of which was lawful, but not the other 150 barrels. Now, here, we see, that there was not only an original intention to make an illegal exportation of the second 150 barrels, but that it was carried into effect by an actual exportation; so that there was intent and act. But the court thought, that as the voyage was, under the license, in itself legal, the illegal exportation of a part of the property insured, did not affect that, which was within the license. See, also, Camelo v. Britten, 4 Barn. & Ald. 184. This is certainly a very strong case, since it may well be presumed, that the whole enterprise, in its origin and concoction, was for the whole 300 barrels; and the policy was made to cover the whole; and the voyage was commenced and prosecuted with the same intent. The case of Sewell v. Royal Exchange Assur. Co., 4 Taunt. 856, approaches very near to the present. In that case there were two policies of insurance, one on the ship, and another on the ship and freight; the first on a voyage at and from Ramsgate (England) to St. Michaels; the second on a voyage at and from St. Michaels to London. The ship was Norwegian built, and owned in Denmark, then hostile to England, and was purchased by the plaintiffs under a license from the king. The ship was chartered by the master, as agent for the plaintiffs, to the freighter of the cargo, for a voyage from London to St. Michaels, and there to take on board a full cargo of fruit, and bring the same to London. The vessel was seized at St. Michaels, and carried to Tercera, and there sequestered. The loss was averred to be by a public seizure and capture. At the trial, one objection taken was, that, under the British navigation act, an importation in the vessel of such a cargo was prohibited; and that, since the charter party was for the entire voyage out and home, the illegality vitiated, as well the policy on the outward voyage as that upon the homeward voyage. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiffs upon the policy on the outward voyage; and this verdict was afterwards confirmed by the court. On this occasion, Sir James Mansfield, in delivering the opinion of the court, stated the ground of the decision to be, that it did not necessarily follow, that the master might not have obtained a license for the importation from the crown, which was authorized to grant one, before the actual importation; and therefore the homeward voyage was not necessarily illegal. But the court intimated very strongly, that if the homeward voyage had been illegal, the outward voyage being legal, there was a locus poenitentiae for the party not to perform the latter, and therefore a recovery might be had on the policy on the outward voyage. The language of Sir James Mansfield was: "Much of the argument was, that this was an illegal voyage, not only in the contemplation of the master; but that he was bound by the charter party, which he had entered into, to pursue it at all events. It is not necessary now to decide, what would be the consequence of a person entering into a charter party for a voyage out and home, the voyage home being illegal, and of his separating it into two voyages, by insuring the outward voyage separately, and the homeward voyage separately. The court are not called upon to decide, whether in that case the outward voyage is part of the homeward and illegal voyage. If there were a clear locus poenitentiae, it would be unnecessary to decide, that the outward voyage was illegal; for if the captain, getting out thither, discovered, that he was on an illegal charter party, and that he could not enforce the payment of his freight, he might go off to any other part of the world." Now, this language is applied to a case far more stringent, than that now before this court. There, the original voyage, out and home, was absolutely fixed and in progress under the charter party. Here, the whole voyage contemplated by the policy was legal; and there was only a contingent future act of illegality contemplated to be done by the master, and which might never be done. There was not only a locus poenitentiae, but there was a contingency as to the future purchase and arrival of the chain cable.

The case of the Ocean Ins. Co. v. Polleys, 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 157, 163, 164, clearly shows, that although a vessel insured has been previously guilty of an illegality, which subjects her to forfeiture, that circumstance will not affect any contracts touching her future employment in a legal trade, or on a legal voyage, or a policy on her for such a voyage. Nay, as was said in Bird v. Appleton, 8 Term R. 562, 569, 570, the antecedent character of the property insured or the title, by which it has been obtained, whether illegal or not, makes no difference. It still may be insured on a legal voyage. Suppose goods, smuggled on a former voyage, were afterwards embarked on a new, and lawful voyage, never having been seized, it seems clear, that they would be insurable. The contract is one degree removed from the illegality. See Armstrong v. Toler, 11 Wheat. [24 U. S.] 258.

We have seen, according to the reasoning and authorities already stated, that, where the voyage is legal, a future contemplated illegality in the course of that voyage does not make it void ab initio. Then does it make any difference, that the future illegal act is consummated, if the act does not contaminate the voyage itself? I think not. If the illegal act is followed by a forfeiture and seizure of the thing insured, I agree, that the underwriters are not liable for the loss. But the mere fact of liability to forfeiture does not avoid the insurance, or prevent a recovery for a loss by any independent peril. The fact is, that a ship or other property does not lose its insurable character by being liable to seizure and forfeiture for an antecedent act or for a subsequent act, by which she is by law forfeitable. Until seized, and forfeited, the owner retains his original ownership thereof. Here, as has been already suggested, the voyage from New Orleans to Liverpool was a legal voyage; the taking on board the chain cable there was a collateral act, illegal, indeed, but no more touching the legality of the voyage, than if there had been taken on board some illegal ship-stores, or smuggled wines for the voyage. It would be an alarming doctrine, if once established, that any collateral act of illegality in the course of a voyage, not an original practical ingredient in the voyage itself, should avoid a policy ab initio. A single bale of goods, smuggled by the master or owner of the cargo, in the course of the voyage, might, under such circumstances, defeat the whole insurance upon the ship and cargo, or both, although there was no illegality otherwise directly attaching to them. When the chain cable was taken on board at New Orleans the act of illegality was complete, and ended. It had nothing to do with the further prosecution of the voyages of the ship for the remaining term of time, covered by the policy. Suppose the chain cable had been smuggled on a former voyage by the owners, and put on board at Waldoborough or New Orleans, would that illegality have infected the subsequent voyage of the ship, while it remained on board? Suppose a ship's sails are made of smuggled canvass, illegally smuggled into the country, will that avoid an insurance on her on any subsequent voyages? Certainly, upon authority and principle, not.

But, then, it is suggested, that the insurance, as to the chain cable itself, is void at all events. It seems to me not, upon the ground, that the title was in the owner, and the illegality did not attach to the voyage, on which it was used. It is like an insurance on goods already smuggled. The chain cable did not become an appurtenance of the ship, until taken on board and concealed. The act of illegality was then, as has been already suggested, consummated before it attached to the ship as a part of her equipment. The time, when the antecedent liability to forfeiture took place, under such circumstances, is of no consequence, whether it be a day, or a year.

Again, it is suggested, that here the policy is void ab initio by reason of the concealment from the underwriters of the original intention to smuggle this chain cable on board of the ship during the voyages and term of time insured. Reliance seems to be placed for this suggestion upon an obiter dictum of Mr. Justice Bayley, in Parkin v. Dick, 11 East, 504, where he said, that the ship being liable to seizure in consequence of having the naval stores on board, was thereby subjected to an extra risk, which ought, therefore, to have been communicated to the underwriters; and the omission of such communication would alone have avoided the policy. I meddle not with that proposition, with reference to circumstances, like those in Parkin v. Dick, although it is open to much observation. It is sufficient to say, that in that case the insurance was directly in part on property exported for an illegal voyage. Here there was in contemplation only a contingent future act of illegality. Has it ever been held, that the nondisclosure of a contingent intention of future deviation, or even a present positive intention of future deviation from the voyage by the insured, was such a concealment, as would avoid a policy? Certainly, such a doctrine could hardly be maintainable. Again, it is suggested, that the ship and chain cable were both forfeited to the government, and vested eo instanti in the government by operation of law, as soon as it was taken on board; and consequently the owners had nothing to abandon to the underwriters; and at all events, the chain cable was forfeited, so that it was no lawful appurtenance of the ship, and she was not seaworthy for the voyage. The argument, so far as concerns the ship, has been already answered, by showing, that she was not liable to forfeiture. But if the case were otherwise, the argument is founded on a fallacy. It is not correct to say, that property forfeited is vested in the government at the very moment of forfeiture, and the title of the owner immediately devested. On the contrary, the established doctrine is, that, notwithstanding the forfeiture, the property remains in the owner, until it is actually seized by the government, and then by the seizure the title of the government relates back to the time of the forfeiture. In the case of U. S. v. 1,960 Bags of Coffee, 8 Cranch [12 U. S.] 404, and Gelston v. Hoyt, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 247, 311, there had been a seizure and prosecution for the forfeiture by the government. The case of The Mars [Case No. 9,106], in this court, as to this point, has never, to my knowledge, been doubted or denied. The case of Lockyer v. Offley, 1 Term R. 252, 260, manifestly proceeded upon the ground, that until seizure the property of the owner was not devested. Mr. Justice Wilies, in delivering the opinion of the court in that case, said; "But it has been said, that under St. 24 Geo. III. c. 47, and the excise laws, the forfeiture attaches, the moment the act is done; and that the barratry (smuggling) was committed during the voyage. It may be so for some purposes, as to prevent intermediate alienations and incumbrances. But I think the actual property is not altered, till after the seizure, though it may be before condemnation." The same doctrine was taken for granted by the supreme court in Ocean Ins. Co. v. Polleys, 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 157. I am aware of the bearing of the cases of Fontaine v. Phoenix Ins. Co., 11 Johns. 293, and also of the incidental confirmation of the doctrine thereof, in Amory v. McGregor, 15 Johns. 24. But I am not prepared to accede to the doctrine there stated, opposed, as it is, to the other authorities and doctrines already stated. In short, I have been long accustomed to lay it up as an elementary axiom that, in all cases of forfeiture of personal chattels, the property of the owner is not devested, until there is an actual seizure thereof by or for the use of the government. This view of the matter disposes of this part of the argument in both of its branches, viz. as to the abandonment, and as to the seaworthiness of the ship.

Upon the whole, my judgment is, that the plaintiff is entitled to recover for a total loss on the policy.

CLARK (REED v.). See Case No. 11,643.

Case No. 2,833.

CLARK et al. v. SCOTT.

[9 Blatchf. 301; 5 Fish. Pat. Cas. 245; 2 O. G. 4; Merw. Pat. Inv. 129.][1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Jan. 16, 1872.

PATENTS — "HAND-MIRRORS" — VALIDITY — INFRINGEMENT—CONSTRUCTION OF ASSIGNMENT.

1. The letters patent granted to W. U. Dudley and Lawrence W. Clark, as assignees of W. U. Dudley, the inventor, July 27th, 1869, for an "improved hand-mirror," are valid.

2. The claim of said patent, namely, "A hand or portable-toilet mirror, constructed, substantially as described, of a base-piece, P, with its handle-extension piece or stiffener, C, glass, A, and outer back and handle, D, made of any suitable composition or cement, substantially as specified," covers a hand-mirror made of a cement applied in a plastic state and afterwards hardened, and which has in it two flat wires or strengtheners, made of metal, embedded in the cement and concealed from view, and running, from the body of the mirror part, through the neck and into the handle, and serving to stiffen and strengthen the article, particularly at the junction of the handle with the body.

[Cited in Florence Manuf'g Co. v. Boston Diatite Co., Case No. 4,882.]

3. The brush described in letters patent granted to J. S. Parsons and George A. Scott, as assignees of Alanson C. Estabrook, June 19th, 1866, for an "improved brush," namely, a brush in which the bristles, inserted through a perforated plate, are embedded and held firmly in a suitable cement, which cement, at the same time, in combination with the plate, and an extension of the plate into the handle, forms the back and handle of the brush, is not, as a structure, substantially the same thing as the hand-mirror covered by the patent to Dudley and Clark. Such hand-mirror, as an article of manufacture, was patentable, as distinguished from a brush, even though the backs and handles of the two were made in the same way, there having been a point of utility and adaptability, in applying the non-warping property of the back and handle to rendering the glass of the mirror free from liability to fracture, which constituted sufficient invention to support a patent for a mirror, even though a brush with a like back and handle had existed before.

[1] [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission. Merw. Pat. Inv. 129, contains only a partial report.]

4. Dudley, at the time he applied, in August, 1866, for a patent for the hand-mirror, also applied, as inventor, for a patent for an "improvement in brushes," with this claim, namely, "A brush, in which the bristles are inserted through a perforated plate or holder, embedded in a composition or cement of any suitable substance, as described, which cement shall, in combination with a base-piece and stiffener of metal, or other material, form the back and handle of the brush, substantially as specified." Both of the applications were rejected. In December, 1866, he assigned to a corporation, who were the real defendants in this suit, all his inventions "in the manufacture of composition brush backs and handles, with suitable strengtheners," and all applications for a patent "therefor," and certain apparatus used by him "in said manufacture," with all his useful information "for making and selling said composition brush backs and handles," "meaning hereby to transfer" all his rights "to the manufacture and sale of said composition brush backs and handles." The applications for both of the patents were pending at that time: Held, that the assignment was one only of the invention of the brush, and of the application for the brush patent, and did not carry a right to the invention of the hand-mirror.

5. Dudley, from August, 1866, until May, 1869, did nothing further towards obtaining a patent for the hand-mirror. The said corporation put into the market, in the fall of 1867, hand-mirrors made in accordance with Dudley's invention. Dudley did not know that fact. His co-patentee, Clark, obtained no interest in the invention until April, 1869: Held, that these facts constituted no objection to the validity of the patent.

[Cited in Goodyear Dental Vulcanite Co. v. Willis, Case No. 5,603.]

[In equity. Bill by Thomas Clark, Jr., trustee of W. U. Dudley, and Lawrence W. Clark, and the said W. U. Dudley and the said Lawrence W. Clark, against George A. Scott, agent of the Florence Manufacturing Company, to enjoin infringement of letters patent No. 92,942, granted to said Dudley and L. W. Clark, and for an accounting.]

Frederic H. Betts, for plaintiffs.
Daniel W. Bond, for defendant.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. This suit is founded on letters patent granted to W. U. Dudley and Lawrence W. Clark, as assignees of W. U. Dudley, the inventor, July 27th, 1869, for an "improved hand-mirror." The specification, signed by the inventor, says: "My improvement relates to that description of hand-mirrors for toilet use and other purposes, in which the frame that holds the glass is elongated at one end, to form a handle, or it may be similarly shaped at both ends. The usual mode of constructing such mirrors is to mount the glass in a solid frame or thin block of wood, either naturally of ornamental character, or afterwards made so by veneering, cut or shaped so as to be of similar contour to the glass, and with a projecting end formed to constitute a handle. Apart from the expense of hand-mirrors so constructed, where a very ornamental appearance is required, there is not only a general want of strength, especially at the neck or junction of the handle with the body, but a great liability to fracture of the glass by the twisting or warping of the wood of which the frame or holder is made. This latter defect is not merely at first, or peculiar to any greenness of the wood or newness of the article, when fracture of the glass from such causes frequently occurs, but is induced at any time by sudden and violent changes in the temperature of the atmosphere, exposure to damp and extreme heat. My improvement obviates such defect, being non-absorbent as regards damp, and free from any liability to warp, at the same time combining beauty with strength at a comparatively trifling cost; and the nature of my invention consists in mounting the glass on a base piece, of wood or other material, having a stiffening extension running into the handle, and embedding the whole in a composition or cement of suitable description, that, on hardening, forms the back, edges and outside handle of the mirror." The manner of constructing the article is then described, with references to the drawings: "A, is the glass; B, a base-piece, of wood or other suitable material, preferably of similar contour to the glass which is designed to be mounted on it, but elongated at one end, which extension, with a strip of metal or other stout material at its back, forms a handle-stiffener, C, to the mirror. This base-piece, with its handle extension or stiffener, C, is then laid in a mould or on a block, face downward, with or without the glass, A, in its place, and a composition or cement of any suitable plastic material, applied in sufficient quantity to cover the back and extend beyond the edges of the base-piece, B, and so as to surround the handle-stiffener or end extension of the latter, when an upper mould, of suitable configuration, and having its interior embellished with any ornamental device or devices, is pressed down upon the cement, which, when hard or dry, on removing the upper mould and lifting the article from the lower one, constitutes a smooth or finished, and, it may be, highly ornamental outer back and handle, D, impervious to damp, exempt from warping, with its consequent liability of fracturing the glass, and preservative of the wooden or other base-piece, which may be of a cheap and rough construction; and that, by its end extension, with strengthening strip at its back, gives not only a general stability to the whole article, but especially stiffens the handle at its junction with the back or body, where it is naturally weakest or most liable to break. The under mould or block may also be embellished with any ornamental device. The glass may either be laid on a cushion of the lower mould, so as to be embedded at its edges, simultaneously with the forming of the outer back and handle, in the plastic composition or cement, or it may be afterwards inserted and restrained to its place on the base-piece, either by an ornamental bead around the edges of the glass, and formed of the same composition or cement of which the outer handle and back are made, or of different material afterwards run around and applied thereto. As I do not desire to confine myself to any particular composition or cement of which to form the outer handle and back, but design to use any plastic substance or compound of suitable character, it will here suffice to state, that a mixture in equal parts, more or less, of paint, sifted sawdust and shellac, forms a very desirable composition for the purpose, and one which readily admits of the color being varied to suit different tastes or demands." The claim is in these words: "I claim, as a new article of manufacture, a hand or portable-toilet mirror, constructed, substantially as described, of a base-piece, B, with its handle-extension piece or stiffener, C, glass, A, and outer back and handle, D, made of any suitable composition or cement, substantially as specified."

The hand-mirror of the defendant is made of a cement applied in a plastic state, and afterwards hardened, and embedded in the cement and concealed from view are two flat wires or strengtheners, made of metal, and running from the body of the mirror part through the neck and into the handle, and serving to stiffen and strengthen the article, particularly at the junction of the handle with the body.

The defendant insists that the claim of the patent must be construed as being for a hand-mirror made by means of a glass mounted on a piece of wood shaped for the glass, and a handle, the handle being strengthened by a strip of iron, and the whole covered with a cement; that the defendant's mirror is a hand-mirror with a composition back, the composition being strengthened by the two wires; that the only office of the wires is to give strength to the back, and they are not, in any sense, the base-pieces or foundation on which the cement is pressed; that, in the defendant's mirror, the composition is the base or foundation, while, in the patent, the wood is the base or foundation; that the defendant's mirror has nothing corresponding to the base-piece, B, of the patent, the two wires corresponding only to the stiffener, C, of the patent; that the base-piece, B, is an essential part of the article claimed, and is claimed in the patent as such part; and that, therefore, the defendant's mirror does not infringe the patent. But, the patent is not fairly susceptible of this limited construction. According to the description, the glass is to be mounted on a base-piece of any suitable material, which base-piece is, at its end, to be elongated or extended through the neck and into the handle, the extension being made sufficiently strong not only to give general stability to the whole article, but especially to stiffen the handle at its junction with the body, and the whole being embedded in a suitable cement, applied in a plastic form, and which, when hardened, forms the back, edges and outside handle of the mirror. The defendant's wires act as a base-piece or support for the glass, and the wires extend through the neck and into the handle, and act at the neck and in the handle as stiffeners, and there is an outer back and handle of cement. There can be no doubt that the defendant's mirror is, in its construction, substantially the same as the patented mirror.

Various defences are set up in attack on the validity of the patent. To understand them, it will be necessary to give a history of certain events. The application for the patent sued on was filed on the 6th of August, 1866, the oath to the specification having been made by W. U. Dudley, on the 1st of August, 1866. The specification presented was in the same language as that attached to the patent. The application was rejected on the 23d of August, 1866, as being anticipated by a patent granted to Alanson C. Estabrook, June 19th, 1866. Nothing further was done towards procuring the patent until the 1st of May, 1869, when an argument in favor of granting the patent, notwithstanding the Estabrook patent, was sent to the patent office by the attorneys for Dudley. The office, on the 8th of May, 1869, decided to grant the patent; but, through accident, it was not issued till the 27th of July, 1869.

On the 6th of August, 1866, Dudley filed an application for a patent for an "improvement in brushes," the oath to the specification being made by him August 1st, 1866. The specification said: "In the manufacture of toilet and other brushes, it is customary to insert the bristles in a block or stock, which, by its extension, may be made to form the frame or handle of the brush, and afterwards to cover by veneer the unfinished and usually perforated and wired back that holds the bristles. This is a slow and expensive process, and the article, when completed, is but slightly ornamented by the veneer or outer covering to the back. My present invention constitutes a great improvement upon such articles, combining strength with a high degree of ornament, at a cheap cost of manufacture; and the nature of it consists in inserting the bristles through a perforated plate, which is united, by cement, or otherwise, to a back frame of wood, having attached to it a strip of metal or other stiffening material, that runs into the handle of the brush, and that, together with the back frame, is covered by any suitable composition or cement, which, after being moulded, hardens, and forms a compact mass, that constitutes the stock and handle of the brush." The mode of constructing the brush is then described, with references to drawings. A suitably perforated plate or holder, of, say, corresponding configuration to the brushing surface, is taken, and in it are inserted the hairs or bristles, which may be bound and held therein by the usual wire-threading at the back, or otherwise. This perforated plate holding the bristles is afterwards connected, by cement, or otherwise, with a frame and handle constructed as follows: A wooden back, or other suitable base-piece, mainly of similar contour to the perforated plate, but longer, so as to form an extension into the handle of the brush, and having lashed to its back and handle end a strip of metal, or other stiffening material, is inserted in a mould, the form of which embodies the frame or body and handle of the brush, and may include any fanciful design or ornament to the back and handle. In the mould is put any suitable composition or cement, that, after receiving the impression of the mould, hardens into a compact mass, such, for instance as that used in photographic picture frames or cases, including the many well-known combinations of coal tar admixed with various materials, or composition or cement having shellac as a basis. The base-piece, with its stiffener, is so embedded and pressed in this composition, as that it is not only backed by it, and the composition made to project beyond the edges thereof, so as to form a border to the edges of the bristle holder, but the handle end of said base-piece is entirely covered by said composition or cement, which constitutes the outside frame, back or body, and exterior part of the handle of the brush. There is a drawing representing the base-piece with its stiffener before being coated with the cement; and another drawing representing the same after being coated, and, when ready to receive the bristle holder, which, being united by cement with the base-piece, forms one with it. The stiffening strip serves to strengthen the brush where it is naturally weakest, namely at the junction of the handle with the frame or body, and prevents the cement or composition, which, conjointly with the base-piece and stiffener, forms the back and handle, from fracturing at such part, to which it otherwise would be liable. The claim applied for was in these words: "I claim, as a new article of manufacture, a brush constructed substantially as described, that is to say, a brush in which the bristles are inserted through a perforated plate or holder, embedded in a composition or cement of any suitable substance, as described, which cement shall, in combination with a base-piece and stiffener of metal, or other material, form the back and handle of the brush, substantially as specified." This application was rejected August 23d, 1866, as being anticipated by the said patent granted to Estabrook June 19th, 1866. On the 15th of December, 1866, W. U. Dudley and his father executed to the Florence Manufacturing Company the following assignment: "Be it known, that we, W. J. Dudley and W. U. Dudley, brush makers, in the city of New York, under the firm of W. J. Dudley and Son, in consideration of three thousand dollars, to us paid by the Florence Manufacturing Company, of Florence, Massachusetts, the receipt whereof is acknowledged, do hereby bargain, sell, assign, convey and transfer unto said company, its successors and assigns, all the inventions and improvements in the manufacture of composition brush backs and handles, with suitable strengtheners, made, contemplated, or hereafter to be made, by us or by either of us; also, all applications for a patent now pending or hereafter to be made therefor, by us or either of us; also, one press, three dies and one heater, used by us in said manufacture, with all our useful information for making and selling said composition brush backs and handles, in the best way known to us or either of us, meaning hereby to transfer to said company all our rights to the manufacture and sale of said composition brush backs and handles, and all our implements therefor, and hereby agreeing not to continue the same ourselves, nor to authorize or instruct others so to do; and we covenant that we have good and exclusive right to convey and transfer the aforesaid invention and property, and that no other person has any right or interest therein, and that we, and each of us, will, at the request and sole expense of said company, its successors and assigns, do all further acts and things necessary and proper to secure any patent or patents, for said inventions and improvements, which patents, if allowed, are to be granted to said company for its exclusive benefit."

Before proceeding further it is proper to refer to what is before spoken of as the patent granted to Estabrook June 19th, 1866. It was granted to J. S. Parsons and George A. Scott, as assignees of Estabrook, as inventor, for an "improved brush." It describes a brush in which the bristles, inserted through a perforated plate, are embedded and held firmly in a suitable cement, which cement, at the same time, in combination with the plate, and an extension of the plate into the handle, forms the back and handle of the brush. As a structure, such brush was not substantially the same thing as the hand-mirror of Dudley. The patent office so decided, necessarily, in granting the patent for Dudley's mirror, and the decision was proper. The removal from Estabrook's brush, of the plate and bristles, removes also the extension of the plate, which forms the strengthening piece in the handle, and, if a mirror were inserted, in lieu of the plate and bristles, the article would be without a strengthening piece. The cutting off of the bristles would leave no cavity for the glass. The specifications of the Parsons and Scott patent give no suggestion as to how to construct a mirror like Dudley's.

The hand-mirrors sold by the defendant are made by the Florence Manufacturing Company, and they are the real defendants in this suit. The defendant contends, that the company, by the assignment of December 15th, 1866, acquired a right to use the invention covered by the patent sued on. The ground taken is, that the entire invention embodied in that patent is embraced in Dudley's "improvements in the manufacture of composition brush backs and handles, with suitable strengtheners," and in his application for a patent for such improvements; or, in other words, that, as the company have the right to make such brush backs and handles as are described in the application of Dudley, filed August 6th, 1866, for a patent for an "improvement in brushes," they have also the right to make and sell such mirrors as have been sold by the defendant, on the ground that the assignment of December 15th, 1866, embraces the latter right as well as the former right. It is claimed, on the part of the defendant, that the only invention involved in making the mirror covered by the Dudley patent, is in the manner in which the back and handle are made; that the back and handle, when made, are equally ready and suitable for the insertion, in the recess, of a plate with brush bristles or of a mirror glass; that there is no invention in inserting a mirror glass in the recess, or in removing the plate with brush bristles from the recess and inserting in its place a mirror glass; and that the back and handle, with a mirror glass inserted in the recess, cannot properly be treated as a distinct article of manufacture from the article of manufacture consisting of the same back and handle with a plate with brush bristles inserted in the same recess. The sum and substance of these propositions is, that Dudley ought to have applied for and obtained a patent for the back and handle, consisting of the base-piece, handle-extension piece or stiffener, and cement outer back and handle, with a recess, such recess admitting of the insertion in it of a mirror glass, or of a plate with brush bristles, or of anything else; and that he ought not to have covered by his patent the back and handle with the mirror glass in the recess. If such back and handle with the recess had clearly existed before the invention of Dudley, the question as to whether he could insert a mirror glass in the recess, and claim a patent for the article thus formed, would arise; or, if such back and handle, with a plate with brush bristles in the recess, had clearly existed before the invention of Dudley, the question as to whether he could remove the plate with brush bristles and insert in its stead a mirror glass, and claim a patent for the article thus formed, would arise. But no such questions arise on this branch of the case. And, if Dudley had patented the back and handle, with a recess unfilled, and had then conveyed to the Florence Manufacturing Company the exclusive right to the invention so far as it could be applied to making brushes, such conveyance would not have carried any right to apply the invention to the making of mirrors or of anything except brushes.

What was the actual state of things when the assignment to the Florence Manufacturing Company was made? Dudley had not only invented the back and handle, consisting of the base-piece, handle-extension piece or stiffener, and cement outer back and handle, with a recess, but had demonstrated its applicability to the making not only of brushes but of hand-mirrors. He had applied for a patent for a brush, embodying such back and handle, and had claimed such brush as his invention. He had also applied for a separate patent for a hand-mirror, embodying such back and handle, and had claimed such hand-mirror as his invention. It is stated, in the specification of the mirror patent, and is manifest, and the evidence shows, that, where the glass in a hand-mirror is mounted in a wooden frame, it is liable to be broken by the warping of the wood; and that, in the mirror of Dudley, there is no liability to warp in the frame, and no danger of the fracture of the glass from such cause. It is also shown, that this point of advantage in the mirror does not exist in the brush. Consequently, there is a special function exerted by the mirror back, in protecting the glass from fracture through the warping of the frame, which is not exerted by the brush back. A wooden brush back and handle may be warped and disfigured to the eye, yet its usefulness not be materially impaired, while an equal extent of warping in a wooden mirror back and handle would fracture the glass and render the mirror useless. The applications of Dudley were both of them rejected in August, 1866. Less than four months afterwards, the Florence Manufacturing Company, which was at the time making cement brushes but not cement hand-mirrors, applied to the Dudleys and paid them the sum of $3,000 for the assignment in question. It is limited, on its face, to "brush backs and handles." It only conveys improvements in the manufacture of "brush backs and handles," and applications for a patent "therefor," and information for making and selling "said brush backs and handles," and states that the assignors mean to transfer to the company all their rights to the manufacture and sale of said "brush backs and handles," and agree not to continue the same themselves, or to authorize or instruct others so to do. At that time, the application by Dudley for the mirror patent, as well as his application for the brush patent, were both of them pending. Subsequently, the Florence Manufacturing Company applied to Dudley to execute a paper having reference to mirrors, but he declined to do so. I am entirely satisfied, from the evidence, and the tenor of the assignment made by the Dudleys, that it was in fact, and was intended at the time as, an assignment only of the invention of the brush and of the application for the brush patent.

The mirror, as an article of manufacture, was, in my judgment, patentable, as contradistinguished from the brush, even though the backs and handles of the two were made in the same way. There was, as before explained, a point of utility and adaptability in applying the nonwarping property of the back and handle to rendering the glass of the mirror free from liability to fracture, which constituted sufficient invention to support a patent for the mirror, even though a brush with a like back and handle had existed before. Whether, if the mirror had existed before, a patent for a brush with a like back and handle could be sustained, and whether, the Dudley mirror being patented, a patent for the Dudley brush could be sustained, are questions which do not here arise. The Dudley mirror has been patented. The Dudley brush has not been patented.

It is contended, by the defendants, that the neglect of Dudley to prosecute further his application, after it had been rejected, until a period of two years and eight months had elapsed, constitutes an abandonment of the application, or an abandonment of the intention further to prosecute the application. It is not alleged in the answer, that this constituted an abandonment of the invention to the public. The answer only avers, that, after the rejection of the application, for want of novelty in the invention, the plaintiffs "abandoned said application for over two years, well knowing that said Florence Manufacturing Company were making and using this pretended invention, and that the patent afterwards granted was obtained upon false and fraudulent representations by the plaintiffs, or some of them, made to the commissioner of patents, and is wholly void in law." The answer does not set up any abandonment of the invention to the public, nor does it set up the defence that the invention was in public use or on sale, with the consent or allowance of Dudley, for more than two years prior to his application for a patent for it. The answer, in the averment cited, is entirely frivolous. The abandonment of an application amounts to nothing, unless it is in such wise as to become an abandonment of the invention to the public; and the allegations as to false and fraudulent representations are too general to raise any triable issue. But the answer does not even aver an abandonment of the application. It avers that the plaintiffs abandoned the application for over two years. It does not set up a conclusive or final abandonment. It implies that the abandonment was only temporary and was made with the intention of resuming the application. The proofs, however, show, that there was no abandonment of the application, or of the invention, and no obtaining of the patent on false or fraudulent representations. Hand-mirrors made by the Florence Manufacturing Company in accordance with Dudley's invention, were first put into the market in the fall of 1867, which was less than two years prior to the time when Dudley, in May, 1869, again pressed his application. Nor is there any evidence that Dudley had any knowledge, prior to the granting of the patent, that any mirrors made in accordance with his invention had been made by the Florence Manufacturing Company; and, although his co-patentee, Clark, may have known of the making of such mirrors by the company, Clark obtained no interest in the invention until April 30th, 1869.

The only other defence set up in the answer is, that Dudley was not the first inventor of what is patented. It is not set up that he was not its inventor, or that he stole it from another. It is not set up that one Dane invented it, and that Dudley stole it from Dane. That defence was urged at the hearing; but the answer does not suggest it, nor does the evidence sustain it. The defence in the answer is, that the same thing was, before Dudley's invention, known to and used by the Florence Manufacturing Company, A. C. Estabrook, Isaac S. Parsons, and William Gerhard, at Florence, Massachusetts.

Without discussing the details of the evidence, which is quite voluminous, it is sufficient to say, that Dudley fully conceived and described his invention in May, 1865; that he at that time, or a month later, ordered the construction of dies with which to make the mirrors; that the dies were cast in the summer of 1865, and proofs taken from them in plaster of paris by November, 1865; that, prior to November 27th, 1865, Dudley took the dies into his possession, and removed them from Newark, New Jersey, where they were made, to the city of New York; and that, soon afterwards, and during the month of November, he exhibited some backs made in the dies, which backs were complete, and constructed entirely in accordance with the description in the patent. On the 12th of March, 1866, he employed attorneys to procure the patent. He made some samples of finished mirrors in accordance with the invention, but he did not prosecute the business, for want of means. The only date in this series which the defendant undertakes to controvert with any show of reliance, is the date of the making of complete backs by Dudley. That date is claimed to have been not in November, 1865, but in January or February, 1866. Then the defendant undertakes to carry back the existence of the same invention at Florence, as made by Gerhard, Estabrook and himself, all or some of them, to December, 1865. But the attempt fails. There was no such invention in the Parsons and Scott patent of June 19th, 1866, taken out on Estabrook's brush, as has been already shown. There was no suggestion of a mirror in connection with the first die made at Florence, which was a die for the brush of the Parsons and Scott patent; and there is no satisfactory evidence that the invention of a mirror like Dudley's was made at Florence earlier than the latter part of February, 1866, if even as early. The burden is on the defendant to make out clearly an anticipation of Dudley's invention. The evidence fails to do this, and there must be a decree for the plaintiffs, for a perpetual injunction, and an account of profits, with costs.

[NOTE. For another case involving this patent, see Florence Manuf'g Co. v. Boston Diatite Co., Case No. 4,882.]

Case No. 2,833a.

CLARK v. SHELTON.

[Hempst. 190.] [1]

Superior Court, D. Arkansas. July, 1832.

JURISDICTION OF SUPERIOR COURT, ARKANSAS.

The superior court, since the act of 22d October, 1828, has appellate jurisdiction only, and cannot entertain jurisdiction in a case certified to it from the circuit court.

[In equity. Bill by Benjamin Clark against Jesse Shelton. Motion by defendant to dismiss the suit for want of jurisdiction.]

Before JOHNSON and ESKRIDGE, Judges.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This suit was originally commenced in the circuit court of Hempstead county, on the —— day of March or April, in the year 1832. At the April term, 1832, the judge of that court, having been personally concerned as counsel for one of the parties, certified the cause up to this court, that it might be here tried. The counsel for the defendant have moved the court to dismiss the suit for want of jurisdiction, and to remand the same to Hempstead circuit court.

The only question presented by the motion is whether the court can entertain jurisdiction of the cause. The decision of this question must depend upon the acts of congress and the legislature of this territory. By an act of congress passed on the 17th April, 1828 (section 3), "the legislature of the territory of Arkansas shall be authorized in all cases, except where the United States is a party, to fix the respective jurisdictions of the district and superior courts." In the acts of the legislature of this territory, on the 22d of October, 1828, we find the following provisions: "That from and after taking effect of this act, the superior court of this territory shall, in all cases of law and equity, be exclusively an appellate court, and shall not have original jurisdiction, in any civil case, unless such as may arise under the laws of the United States, or take cognizance of any criminal cases, alleged to have been committed within this territory, provided that nothing in this section shall be so construed as to prevent said superior court from deciding all cases, civil or criminal, at law or in equity, that are now pending in said court, or returnable thereto." Section 13: "Be it further enacted, that in all cases where a judge of the superior court is concerned or interested in any suit or action now pending, in any of the circuit courts, the parties in such suits may cause the same to be certified to the superior court to be there tried and determined; and all suits or actions that may hereafter be brought by any of said judges against others, or to which either of the said judges is a party, shall be returnable to, and tried in the superior court; provided, that no judge shall be compelled to hear and determine any criminal case wherein the defendant or defendants are related to him; but shall cause the same to be certified to the superior court, to be there tried and determined." These are all the provisions of the act of 1828, relative to the jurisdiction of the superior court. It is material to observe that the judges of the superior court are also judges of the circuit courts. From the foregoing provisions just recited, it is manifest that all original jurisdiction which the superior court had theretofore possessed is taken away, excepting such as may arise under the laws of the United States, and a few other specified cases. It is admitted this case does not arise under a law of the United States, nor does it fall within any of the cases specified in the act of 1828. How, then, can this court entertain jurisdiction? The only ground relied on by the counsel for the complainant is that an act of our legislature, of 1821, and an act of 1823, confer the jurisdiction upon the court. The conclusive answer to this argument is that the provisions of these acts of 1821 and 1823 are inconsistent with the provisions of the statute of 1828, and consequently the latter repeals the former. By the act of 1828, the previous original jurisdiction of this court is abrogated, annulled, and taken away, with the exception of a few cases provided for in the act. No statute, anterior to 1828, can have any operation upon the subject of the jurisdiction of this court. By the act of congress, and of the legislature of this territory, both enacted in 1828, the question of jurisdiction must be decided. According to the provisions of these acts, it is placed beyond doubt that this court cannot entertain jurisdiction of the present suit. Suit dismissed.

[1] [Reported by Samuel H. Hempstead, Esq.]

Case No. 2,833b.

CLARK v. SHELTON.

[Hempst. 207.] [1]

Superior Court, D. Arkansas. Jan., 1833.

APPEAL—WHEN LIES—FINAL DECREE.

1. Appeals only lie from final decrees. An appeal from an interlocutory decree dissolving an injunction will not be entertained. Young v. Grundy, 6 Cranch [10 U. S.] 51.

2. Appeals and writs of error at common law adverted to. Act of 1807 (Geyer, Dig. 261), and fifth section of act of congress of 17th April, 1828 (Acts, p. 46), construed.

Appeal from Hempstead circuit court.

[Benjamin Clark against Jesse Shelton.]

Before JOHNSON, ESKRIDGE, and CROSS, Judges.

OPINION OF THE COURT. The object of the motion submitted to the court is, to dismiss the appeal in this cause, upon the ground that no appeal lies from an interlocutory order dissolving an injunction. In England, appeals are allowed from interlocutory orders, as well as from final decrees. 1 Har. Ch. 454. But such appeals do not stay the execution of the order appealed from, nor suspend the proceedings in the court from which the appeal is taken, without a special order granted to that effect. This is the rule in regard to appeals from the rolls to the lord chancellor, as well as to appeals from the chancellor to the house of lords. Warden, etc., of St. Paul's v. Morris, 9 Ves. 316; Gwynn v. Lethbridge, 14 Ves. 585; Willan v. Willan, 16 Ves. 216; Macnaghten v. Boehm, 1 Jac. & W. 48. The analogy is thus preserved to the doctrine at law that a writ of error does not operate as a supersedeas without a special direction for that purpose. Entwistle v Shepherd, 2 Term R. 78; Kempland v. Macauley, 4 Term R. 436. The only check ever imposed to prevent the party from proceeding to enforce the decree is, to require bond and security to repay, in the event of a reversal of the decree.

In the United States a different course of practice has prevailed very extensively, to prevent the inconvenience of having a cause pending in the original and appellate court at the same time. The rule has been adopted that appeals should only be allowed from final decrees, and then the whole cause is considered to be open, and every order subject to revision and correction. In the case of Young v. Grundy, 6 Cranch [10 U. S.] 51, the supreme court of the United States decided that "no appeal or writ of error will lie to an interlocutory decree dissolving an injunction." A similar decision has been made by the court of appeals of Virginia, and the same doctrine is settled in the courts of Kentucky and Tennessee. In New York it was regarded, so late as the year 1823, as an open question, whether an appeal would lie from an order dissolving an injunction. But it was deemed to be settled that the order must be carried into execution, and could not be suspended by an appeal. Wood v. Dwight, 7 Johns. Ch. 295. By a statute passed at a subsequent period, the right to appeal from an interlocutory decree, under special circumstances, was granted. This statute may be seen. 7 Johns. Ch. 316, note a. With this view of the law, let us proceed to the consideration of the statutes in force here bearing upon the subject.

The first is the act of 1807 (Geyer, Dig. p. 251, § 54), which provides in substance, that if any person shall feel himself aggrieved by any final decision or judgment given in any of the courts in any cause wherein the amount in controversy exceeds one hundred dollars, he may appeal to the superior court, and after such appeal the court below shall not proceed any further in such case. If this provision stood alone, there could be no ground to dispute that no appeal will lie from any other than a final decision. But it is contended in argument, that the 5th section of the act of congress, passed the 17th day of April, 1828 (Acts, p. 46), repealed the clause above referred to. It is our opinion that it does not have such effect. The two laws form part of the same system. They are in pari materia. They do not of necessity conflict with each other, but may and will stand together. The first act is not inconsistent with the last, and, in our opinion, they are both in force. Yet, if the former were repealed by the latter, the consequence to the appellant would be the same, because, but for the provision in the act of 1807, that after an appeal no further proceedings shall be had in the court below, the appellee in this case might have gone on to enforce his judgment at law, notwithstanding the appeal. Warden, etc., of St. Paul's v. Morris, 9 Ves. 316; Hoyt v. Gelston, 13 Johns. 139.

If this were not the case, the evil so forcibly depicted by Lord Eldon would ensue. If a petition to stay proceedings were refused, the party would only have to appeal from that order, thus carry his point, and produce interminable delay. The only protection which the court can extend to the complainant in a bill for injunction when the injunction is dissolved, is to require bond and security from the defendant in equity, to refund the amount, in the event of a different decision upon final hearing. This is consistent with the practice of the English courts. Monkhouse v. Bedford, 17 Ves. 380; Way v. Foy, 18 Ves. 452. And it is in accordance, entirely, with the course pursued in some of the state courts of the Union. In conclusion, we believe that no greater latitude in regard to appeals was intended to be given, by the act of congress referred to, than had previously been given by the act of 1807, and that no repeal of the act of 1807 was intended. We are, therefore, of opinion that no appeal lies from an interlocutory decree dissolving an injunction, and that this appeal was improvidently granted, and must be dismissed. Dismissed accordingly.

[1] [Reported by Samuel H. Hempstead, Esq.]

CLARK (SHERMAN v.). See Case No. 12,763.

CLARK v. SICKEL. See Case No. 2,862.

Case No. 2,834.

CLARK v. SKILTON et al.

[20 Int. Rev. Rec. 175.]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. Sept. Term, 1874.

BANKRUPTCY—DEALINGS WITH INSOLVENT—PREFERENCE.

[Creditors receiving from an insolvent a larger per cent. of their debts than the apparent assets would give to all are bound to be very careful that they do not obtain preference.]

[Cited in Re Hamilton, 1 Fed. 807.]

This action was brought, under section 35 of the bankrupt act of 1867 [14 Stat. 534], to recover money alleged to have been paid to the defendants [William E. Skilton and —— Dole] by Black, Currier and Osgood, insolvent debtors, (as a preference). The case was tried by jury, and, after verdict for plaintiff [A. B. Clark, assignee], came up on motion for a new trial.

E. P. Nettleton and S. K. Hamilton, for plaintiff.

Edward Avery, for defendants.

LOWELL, District Judge. The motion for a new trial is made on the ground that the verdict is against the evidence and the weight of evidence. The case was a very unusual one. The bankrupts had failed, and sold out their stock under suspicious circumstances, and offered their creditors forty per cent. of their debts. Some of the creditors insisted that they ought to pay more, and they then offered fifty per cent. A paper was drawn up and signed by most of the larger creditors, agreeing to take fifty per cent. of their respective debts in fourteen days. The defendants and two or three others received their dividends, and then it was found that the debtors either could not, or would not, pay the others, and within four months they were forced into bankruptcy. Here was an admitted insolvency, and knowledge of it by the defendants, and a payment that was in fact a preference. This may have come about in several ways. It may be that the bankrupts had honestly offered more than they were able to perform; or they may have offered not intending to perform, or circumstances may have changed after the offer was made. I ruled that the bankrupts having been admittedly insolvent, and to the knowledge of the defendants, the intent to prefer would be shown by evidence that they were either knowingly unable or unwilling to pay fifty per cent. to all their creditors, and that if the defendants had reasonable cause to believe such inability or unwillingness, if such there were, they would be bound to refund the payment, but, if there was reason to believe that they were both able and willing to treat alike, the intent and notice would not be made out. Neither party objected to this ruling. The jury found for the plaintiff.

I am not prepared to say that the verdict can be set aside. There are many cases in which a verdict either way cannot be said to be against evidence, in the sense of a motion of this kind. This is one of them. There was evidence which, I think, would warrant the jury to infer that the traders could not pay so large a dividend as they had offered, and that the defendants had their doubts about it. Two or three of the preferred creditors insisted upon a better offer than the showing of the debtors warranted. There was some ground for the inference that they believed that somewhere or other were assets from which this amount could be furnished. This was not enough. If they insisted on a larger payment than the apparent assets would give, they were bound to be very careful that they were not obtaining a preference. The defendants took no pains about the matter, but took their fifty per cent. and went their way with facts before them which would warrant the jury to find that they had reason to believe that the transaction would operate as a preference. Motion for new trial denied.

[NOTE. The preference was thereafter paid to the assignees on execution, and subsequently the defendants were allowed to prove their debt against the bankrupt estate. See In re Black, Case No. 1,459.]

CLARK (SMITH v.). See Case No. 13,027.

Case No. 2,835.

CLARK v. SOHIER.

[1 Woodb. & M. 368.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Maine. Oct. Term, 1846.

NEW TRIAL—PRACTICE—AMENDMENTS TO PLEADINGS—STATE STATUTES—PROCEEDINGS AT COMMON LAW.

1. Where a party in an action to recover a note had never enjoyed one trial in this court, but was defaulted, supposing the case was agreed to be continued, he is entitled to a trial on petition within three years, under a statute of the state of Maine, and on proof of a probably good defence.

2. That statute is not repugnant to the provision in the judiciary act of 1789 [1 Stat. 83], authorizing a new trial on motion after a verdict. But it confers an additional right, not inconsistent with the other, and not merely a new remedy for an old right.

[Cited in Conrad v. Griffey, 11 How. (52 U. S.) 491.]

[1] [Reported by Charles L. Woodbury, Esq., and George Minot, Esq.]

3. This court is empowered to enforce rights under the statutes of states, as well as under acts of congress, when they are not hostile to the latter, and are asked to be enforced in relation to proceedings at common law.

[Cited in Upham v. Brooks, Case No. 16,797; Perry Manuf'g Co. v. Brown, Id. 11,015; Moan v. Wilmarth, Id. 9,686; Ex parte McNeil, 13 Wall. (80 U. S.) 243.]

4. Such proceedings mean any litigation at law, as distinguished from equity or admiralty.

5. A new trial in such case is usually had by a writ of review sued out and served, rather than by bringing forward the old action, and serving a notice on the opposite side to defend.

6. In either case, all proper amendments in the pleadings will be allowed on the new trial, and the service must be on some administrator of the deceased, who has taken out letters in this state.

7. Quere, whether if one appears as administrator and defends against the petition for a new trial, he is not estopped to deny that he is an administrator in this state.

This was a petition for a new trial. The original action was a proceeding to recover a balance alleged to be due Tuckerman, a citizen of Massachusetts, from [Jonathan Clark] the executor of D. Clark, who had been a citizen of Maine. There had been a mortgage given originally to Tuckerman to secure the debt, which had been foreclosed by Tuckerman, and who averred that the premises in the mortgage so foreclosed were not worth the whole debt, and therefore presented a claim to the commissioners on Clark's estate, for about $2000 more. The commissioners decided against Tuckerman. The estate of Clark was supposed not to be in fact insolvent, and an action at law was then instituted for Tuckerman's demands, in this court, under a statute of the state of Maine allowing an action in such case, and after an appearance and one continuance, a judgment was rendered on default for Tuckerman against Clark's executor, for $2092 debt, and $34.71 costs, at the October term, 1842. Tuckerman has since died [and William D. Sohier qualified as his executor]. The petitioner avers that said action was defaulted by mistake; that there was a good defence to the same, and therefore prays that this court will grant a new trial therein.

The petition was filed September 30th, 1844, and was argued on the evidence adduced, October term, 1845.

Mr. Appleton, for petitioner.

Mr. Hobbs, for respondent.

WOODBURY, Circuit Justice. It is hardly necessary to go into a very minute examination of the evidence in this case, though I am satisfied upon it that a new trial, if it can in this way be legally granted, would be proper and judicious. The testimony on some points is conflicting, yet this much is rendered certain—that the petitioner never really had a trial of the claim against him in this court; that when he did have one before the commissioners, a decision was made in his favor. Thus that he has a defence, and had grounds to expect success in it, is placed beyond any reasonable doubt. It is equally certain, that he and his counsel intended to set up the defence; but a negotiation having been entered into for a settlement, they understood the cause would be continued till the settlement was made, or the negotiation abandoned. The other side admits the pendency of the negotiation, but denies any agreement for a further continuance. However this fact may have been, it will be seen, that the petitioner acted under a different impression, and has thus lost an opportunity of laying his defence before a court and jury, unless a new trial can be obtained.

The objection made to a new trial on account of the delay to petition for two years after the default, is no legal bar, as the statute of Maine allows three years, and in an equitable view, is answered by the fact of the continued pendency of the negotiation for a settlement up to the time of filing the petition. But another difficulty which occurred to me at the hearing, and was named to the petitioner's counsel, has not, I regret to say, been removed entirely; but still it is so far overcome as to induce the court to grant a new trial. It was, that the 17th section of the judiciary act of congress, of September, 1789, which empowers us to grant new trials, does it only in cases "where there has been a trial by jury." 1 Stat. 83. Here there has been no such trial by a jury. Hence it cannot be granted under that act. But in some states, by special laws, though in technical language it is hardly correct to speak of a new trial in case of a default, where there was no old trial, courts are permitted to set aside the default for proper reasons, and grant a trial; and this is sometimes, in popular language, called "a new trial." Such is the special law in Maine on a petition filed. See Revised Statutes. But I am aware of no act of congress to that effect, nor of any formal adoption in practice or otherwise by the United States or their courts, of the statute of Maine on this subject. The words of the judiciary act seem to contemplate only motions as at common law for new trial, and before judgment is rendered after a verdict. See post.

In this situation of that act, and the practice under it in the courts of the United States, so far as it has come to my knowledge, it requires some careful discrimination to see how a new trial can be legally granted in the present case, on a petition, and after the lapse of so long a time as two years between the default and the filing of the petition, and where in the mean time judgment has been rendered and carried into effect. The form of asking it by petition probably did not exist when the act of May 8th, 1792, passed (1 Stat. 275), and of course not being then or previously adopted, has not by any action of congress since, or by any judicial decisions on former acts, been put in force in any particular case, cited at the bar, or found by the court.

The question then remains to be settled, whether it can be allowed as a right under the state laws, and not inconsistent with any legislative action had by congress. The law of Massachusetts passed since, allowing partition of lands on petition between tenants in common in that state, has been considered by this court as binding on it in Ex parte Biddle [Case No. 1,391]. I have no doubt that decision was correct under the 34th section of the judiciary act of 1789, providing "that the laws of the several states, except where the constitution, treaties, or statutes of the United States shall otherwise require or provide, shall be regarded as rules of decision in trials at common law in the courts of the United States in cases where they apply." A new trial is a proceeding at common law, quite as much as a petition for partition, and a hearing to obtain it may be regarded as a hearing at common law on a common law question. The subject-matter, also, to which it relates here, was a suit at law which may have been what was meant by the expression, "Trials at common law," as distinguished from trials in equity. "Suits at common law," in the 7th amendment of the constitution, has been held to mean merely "cases in law." 1 Baldw. 405 [Baker v. Biddle, Case No. 764]; 1 Baldw. 554 [Bains v. The James & Catherine, Case No. 756]; [Kendall v. U. S.] 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 634. That is, cases not in equity or admiralty. Parsons v. Bedford, 3 Pet. [28 U. S.] 433, 447. And "suit" means a right litigated between parties in a court of justice. Kendall v. U. S., 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 524, 645; [Plowden v. City Council] 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 449; Holmes v. Jennison, 14 Pet. [39 U. S.] 540, 566. As in a habeas corpus or mandamus as well as in a common action. But if that expression, "at common law," meant only a "litigation in court," instead of a direction purely ministerial or as to process only, which seems to have been the idea of some, this was of that character likewise. Conkl. Pr. 95. The only difficulty, then, remaining is, whether the statutes of the United States have not legislated on this subject fully, and by that have excluded any subsequent legislation of the states as applicable to the same subject. I have no doubt that the clause in the 17th section of the judiciary act, providing "that all the said courts of the United States shall have power to grant new trials in cases where there has been a trial by jury, for reasons for which new trials have usually been granted in the courts of law," would justify the grant of a new trial in such case, though it should be prohibited by the laws of the state where the application is made. Picquet v. Swan [Case No. 11,134]. But whether the states may not pass laws granting such trials in different or additional cases and in new modes, and which the courts of the United States ought to enforce in cases coming before them, is a distinct question.

After careful consideration, I am inclined to the conclusion that the act of congress is a provision for only one class of cases, and to that extent cannot be modified or limited by the states. But that in other classes of cases, if the state laws give merely other and additional remedies, they must be regarded as not conflicting nor inconsistent, but in harmony with the other remedy by act of congress, leaving that as before, and merely providing a further and new remedy in certain specified cases. In such cases, to adopt the new form and right is only to conform to the state statutes, where no act of congress applies, and is doing this under the authority of the 34th section. But it is not to nullify or disregard the 17th section in instances coming within its purview of motions, where there have been verdicts, because it leaves that in such cases in full force. Finally, as the state statute purports to confer an additional right or power, and not one in conflict with what is conferred by the judiciary act, I feel a reluctance to deny a claim made under it, and the more especially as by granting a new trial, the merits of the parties in their original controversy will not be decided on, but left open for a full and just hearing and disposition on the new trial.

It seems to be well settled in Robinson v. Campbell, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 212, 222, that the laws of the states must govern as to rights, when the acts of congress do not provide exclusively on the subject. 5 Mason, 39 [Picquet v. Swan, Case No. 11,134]. See, also, U. S. v. Ames [Case No. 14,441]. But mere remedies remain as at common law, and as in the states when adopted originally, from 1789 to 1793, except as altered since by congress or the United States courts. 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 222. If state laws operate on new trials, they of course must govern if no act of congress interferes and forbids it. There is none which is repugnant, and like two statutes on the same subject by the same legislature, one does not repeal or annul the other, unless words of repeal are used, or the provisions in one are opposed or repugnant to those in the other. Beals v. Hale, 4 How. [45 U. S.] 37; Washington, J. [Houston v. Moore] 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 22. So if any state law makes that legal which was before only equitable, it must prevail. [Robinson v. Campbell] 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 223. The petition given in this case is not merely a new remedy or form, but a new right; and that right can be recognised or adopted without any act of congress, except the 34th section of the judiciary law before quoted. That 34th section makes the state laws a rule to govern future decisions, in a trial at common law; and when they do not give merely a new form of prosecuting for an old right, they must be complied with. Wayman v. Southard, 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 1, 10. The mere forms of proceeding standing alone, are governed by the other acts of 1789 and 1790, made permanent 8th May, 1792. [Wayman v. Southard] 10 Wheat. [35 U. S.] 24. And a change of them only by the states, is not binding on this court till adopted by congress or the supreme court. Beers v. Haughton, 9 Pet. [34 U. S.] 330. But here new rights, rather than new forms for old ones, are conferred by the Maine statute. A new trial is given in new cases—in those where it did not exist before, and a mode to enforce them is provided.

I am disposed to sustain these new rights, not as new forms for rights before existing, as none did before exist under the present circumstances, but as new rights allowed to be prosecuted in a way specially pointed out there. In such cases parties have a claim to the protection of such rights in this court when residing, so that we have jurisdiction as fully as they have it in the state courts. Thompson v. Philips [Case No. 13,974]; [Satterlee v. Matthewson] 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 413; [Lewis v. Marshall] 5 Pet. [30 U. S.] 470; Lorman v. Clark [Case No. 8,516]. In U. S. v. Knight, 14 Pet. [39 U. S.] 301, 315, is a strong illustration on this point, allowing a debtor of the United States to swear out of jail under a state statute, though no such privilege had been granted by congress. This 34th section of the judiciary act is a very important one, and reaches all rules as to civil rights by state statutes within their jurisdiction, where congress have not regulated the case, but probably does not include criminal matters. 2 Burr's Tr. App. 185. It includes rules of evidence altered by state statutes. McNeil v. Holbrook, 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 84, 89. It reaches usages in states, that have the force of laws. Swift v. Tyson, 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 18. And liens by judgments. [Case No. 13,974.] And all statutes of states regulating most rights, and especially local laws as to real estate, not inconsistent with the laws and rights of the United States. The Orleans v. The Phoebus, 11 Pet. [36 U. S.] 175. But, as before remarked, it does not reach mere changes of process by state statutes. [Wayman v. Southard] 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 24. Nor give jurisdiction under them, which did not before exist in the United States courts. [Barron v. Baltimore] 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 243; [U. S. v. Knight] 14 Pet. [39 U. S.] 315. Nor include mere judicial decisions on general questions and commercial topics at large. [Swift v. Tyson] 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 19.

A new trial of the merits is therefore to be had at the next term. The default must of course be allowed to be stricken off; and if appropriate pleadings were not made before, amendments be allowed to make them. Garland v. Davis, 4 How. [45 U. S.] 154. The form of having the new trial seems by the Maine statute to be by a writ of review, sued out and served on the opposite party. But if any other form has been adopted in this state or in this court, as by bringing the old action forward, it can be followed.

NOTE [from original report]. At May term, 1847, this action was brought forward, and a notice served on the attorney of Sohier, the executor of Tuckerman, to appear and defend. The attorney declined to defend, but stated in court, that Tuckerman had not taken out letters of administration in Maine, and was not bound to defend this cause; and further suggested, that no practice existed in Maine, under the statute, as to granting new trials on petition, which allowed them in this form, but only by a writ of review. It seemed doubtful how the question stood, and a further inquiry into it was instituted. But in the mean time the court expressed no doubt that the service of the motion or of a writ of review must be on some administrator, whose letters are taken out in this state. See cases in Aspden v. Nixon, 4 How. [45 U. S.] 467.

The presiding judge observed, that as Tuckerman was stated to have left property still unsold in this state, some other person could take out letters here and administer on it, if Mr. Sohier declined, and then a good service could be made on him. Sohier, or his attorney, might be willing to appear to resist a new trial, but not be required to defend the original suit on a trial of the merits, until administration had been granted to Sohier in this state. Whether, however, he is not now estopped, and his attorney for him to deny he is an administrator in this state, after appearing and defending the petition for a new trial, is a graver question, and will be considered hereafter, if necessary.

Case No. 2,836.

CLARK v. SPARHAWK et al.

[2 Wkly. Notes Cas. 115.]

Circuit Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. June 17, 1875.

SET-OFF—NOTICE TO JOINT OWNER OF SALE OF COLLATERALS.

1. A., having purchased stock on joint speculation with B., pledged it to secure his own debt. Becoming insolvent it was sold by the pledgees at a loss, without any notice to B. A. and B. then agreed that the balance due A. by B. for his share of the loss should be set off against a larger debt due by A. to B.'s firm. A. then made a general assignment for creditors, and subsequently was adjudged a bankrupt. After the general assignment (but before the bankruptcy), the other members of B.'s firm concurred in the agreement for set-off, with the exception of one absent partner, who afterwards also concurred. In an action by A.'s assignee in bankruptcy to recover from B. the balance originally due A., held that, B.'s partners not having agreed to the set-off until after the rights of A.'s creditors had become fixed by the assignment, the set-off could not be allowed.

2. B. was, however, entitled to notice from A., and an opportunity to redeem the stock before its sale, in default of which he was entitled, by way of set-off, to the benefit of a subsequent rise in the market, within a reasonable time, which was a question for the jury.

Error to the district court for the eastern district of Pennsylvania.

Assumpsit by Sparhawk, and others, assignees in bankruptcy of Yerkes, against Clark.

It appeared from the evidence that in pursuance of an agreement between Clark and Yerkes to enter into a joint speculation, Yerkes purchased (and paid for) certain stock which he then pledged, mingled with other similar stock of his own, and afterwards, on October 16, 1871, became insolvent. On October 20, the larger portion of the pledged stock was sold by the pledgees at a loss, of which sale Clark received no notice from either Yerkes or the pledgees, whereupon Yerkes rendered Clark an account charging him with the difference between half the cost and half the proceeds of the stock. Clark made no objection to the account, or to the transaction, but agreed with Yerkes that the said balance should be set off against a larger debt due by Yerkes to the firm of E. W. Clark & Co., of which firm Clark was a member. On October 24, Yerkes made a general assignment for the benefit of creditors, under the state law, and in November following proceedings in bankruptcy were commenced. After the general assignment (but before the proceedings in bankruptcy), the other members of B.'s firm concurred in the agreement for the set-off, as above recited, with the exception of one absent partner, who subsequently also concurred. The course of dealing employed by Yerkes was a common one among brokers, and of this Clark was aware. It further appeared that the stock rose in value after the said sale, and that in December, 1871, a remaining portion of the pledged stock was sold by the pledgees thereof at a higher rate than the portion first sold, and that Clark did not know, when notified of the sale, that Yerkes had this stock on hand. [Clark brought error.]

THE COURT (CADWALADER, District Judge) instructed the jury as follows: The stock was sold by Mr. Yerkes without any notice to Mr. Clark although a crisis in the market had occurred, causing a loss and a derangement in rates and prices. I am of opinion that Mr. Clark was entitled to notice, and to an opportunity to redeem the stock before it was sold, and also of opinion that the fact, which is undisputed, that Mr. Yerkes had, by pledging this and other stocks put it out of his power to control the sale of them, would make it the more necessary to consider Mr. Clark's interest. Therefore, Mr. Clark is not chargeable with the actual loss on the day of sale; but you may look at the subsequent state of the market for such reasonable time as might be allowable for the redemption or taking up of the stock. I do not think he was entitled to an indefinite delay, and it seems that within the limits of a reasonable time his loss would not have been reduced more than $875. Another objection is to the whole of the demand in dispute. It seems that Mr. Yerkes was indebted to E. W. Clark & Co., of which defendant was a member, in a larger amount than the present claim. It appears that there was at some period an agreement among all the partners that he might make use of that by way of set-off. (I should hold that if all the partners of E. W. Clark & Co. had agreed that these debts should be set off before Yerkes' assignment to his voluntary assignee in bankruptcy, the debts could be set off; but it is not contended that all the members of the firm had agreed to this before the assignment to Mr. Pile October 24, nor that all had agreed before proceedings in bankruptcy. Therefore, I instruct you that this defence can not be maintained, and that the assignment vested the rights of creditors which could not be disturbed by any subsequent agreement. I am requested to say to you that under the circumstances of the case the defendant is entitled to have the account liquidated according to the highest price of any one thousand shares of such stock as included the stock in question, and which was on hand at the time of failure. This would be true, and might be applicable if Mr. Clark had not been notified, as he was, of the sale on the 20th of October, and had not omitted to object. Nor was this omission to object to stand in his way if he did not know that the course of business between the parties excused Mr. Yerkes from setting apart any particular one thousand shares. Notwithstanding this circumstance, the proposition is correct, so far as the highest price within a reasonable time is in question.)

Verdict for the plaintiffs for the full amount claimed, less $875 deducted as suggested by the judge, and judgment thereon. The defendant took this writ of error, assigning therefor that portion of that judge's charge inclosed in brackets.

Samuel Dickson, for plaintiff in error.

Set-off should have been allowed, notwithstanding Gray v. Rollo, 18 Wall. [85 U. S.] 629, because the right depends upon the law of this state. Ratification is retroactive. The subsequent assent of the other members of E. W. Clark & Co. was sufficient. "Omnis rati habitio," etc. But Clark was entitled to the best discretion of Yerkes, his partner in this transaction in selling the stock. No discretion was exercised, and it was sold by a pledgee at a forced sale. Yerkes took the good sale to himself, while the bad one was put upon Clark. The partnership, in such cases, should always be credited with the best bargain. See the cases in 1 Lindl. Partn. (2d Ed.) 595-613. His ratification of the sale, when notified by Yerkes, cannot bind him, as he was not told that there was other stock of the same kind still on hand, and knowledge of all the facts is necessary to make a ratification final.

Mr. Junkin, contra.

Gray v. Rollo, supra, rules this case, and agrees with the law of this state. The actual consent of all the partners was necessary, but here this was not obtained until after a general assignment which fixed the rights of all parties, and that of F. H. Clark not till after proceedings in bankruptcy. Clark knew the course of dealing employed, and is presumed to have contracted in accordance therewith. Moreover he was notified of the sale and afterwards accepted it.

June 18. McKENNAN, Circuit Judge. Judgment of district court affirmed.

NOTE [from original report]. The rule laid down in this case, as to the measure of damages on a wrongful conversion of stock was adopted by the New York court of appeals in Baker v. Drake (1873) 53 N. Y. 211, where the cases are reviewed by Rappallo, J., overruling Markham v. Jaudon, 41 N. Y. 235. In Pennsylvania, however, it has been frequently said that the measure of damages is the highest price of the stock between the time of contract to return, or the time of conversion, and the date of the trial. See Bank of Montgomery v. Reese, 2 Casey [26 Pa. St.] 143; Reitenbaugh v. Ludwick, 7 Casey [31 Pa. St.] 131; Musgrave v. Beckendorff, 3 P. F. Smith [53 Pa. St.] 310; Persch v. Quiggle, 7 P. F. Smith [57 Pa. St.] 247. This rule has been limited, however, to cases where it is the duty of the defendant "to deliver the stocks at a particular time, and that duty has not been fulfilled." Phillips' Appeal, 18 P. F. Smith [68 Pa. St.] 130; Neiler v. Kelley, 19 P. F. Smith [69 Pa. St.] 403; Work v. Bennett, 20 P. F. Smith [70 Pa. St.] 487.

CLARK (THOMAS v.). See Case No. 13,894.

Case No. 2,837.

CLARK v. UNITED STATES.

[2 Wash. C. C. 519.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. April Term, 1811.

SEIZURE FOR VIOLATION OF NON-INTERCOURSE ACT—ADMIRALTY JURISDICTION—TRIAL BY JURY—CONFESSION AS EVIDENCE.

1. The Sea Nymph and her cargo, were seized for a violation of the non-importation laws, in importing the goods seized into the port of Philadelphia. The vessel and part of her cargo were seized in the river Delaware, and part of the cargo after it had been landed.

2. The ninth section of the judiciary act of the 24th of September, 1789 [1 Stat. 76], assigns to the district courts jurisdiction of all cases, purely of admiralty maritime jurisdiction, if they arise under the laws of impost, navigation, and trade; where the seizure is made in waters navigable for vessels of ten tons burthen from sea. In all other cases, where the seizure is on land, or waters of less depth, the jurisdiction is on the common law side of the court.

3. An information in rem against the thing itself, in a case of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, is not a suit at common law, but an admiralty proceeding, and does not require a trial by a jury.

4. Informations in rem, on the admiralty side of the district courts, for forfeitures incurred under the laws of impost, have been sanctioned by the supreme court of the United States.

5. If a party, charged with a forfeiture under the laws of the United States, shall, in his answer, on oath, to the information, furnish evidence against himself, the court, in an action of debt brought against him for a penalty under the same law, would reject his confessions, if offered in evidence.

Appeal from a sentence of the district court [for the district of Pennsylvania, unreported], condemning the Sea Nymph and her cargo, for a violation of the non-importation law (volume 9 Laws, p. 243.) The ground of forfeiture is, that the goods in question were imported in this vessel into the port of Philadelphia, from Port-au-Prince, a possession of France, contrary to law. The Sea Nymph and part of her cargo were seized at the port of Philadelphia, on the river Delaware, and part on land; and the question made in the district court, and insisted upon in this, is, whether the trial of the vessel and cargo, wherever seized, ought to have been by jury.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. It has been contended for the appellant, that this is not, upon general ground, a case of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, nor is it assigned to that jurisdiction by the judicial law; and if it be so assigned, still, the act under which the forfeiture was incurred, prescribes a common law remedy for enforcing it. The two first grounds of objection to the mode of trial in the district court, will be considered together; the last will require a distinct examination.

The ninth section of the judicial law, gives to the district court cognizance of all civil causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, including all seizures on waters navigable from the sea, by vessels of ten or more tons burthen, as well as upon the high seas, under the laws of impost, navigation, and trade. This section, we consider as assigning to the district court all cases, purely of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, as well as cases not properly belonging to that jurisdiction, according to the decisions of common law courts of England, if arising under laws of impost, navigation, and trade, where the seizure is made on waters of a certain depth, from the sea, and all other cases of the latter description, that is, cases not strictly of admiralty jurisdiction, where the seizure is on land, or on waters of a less depth than are above, to the common law side of the same court. If cases of seizure, under laws of impost, &c., were necessarily and indisputably cases of admiralty jurisdiction, strictly speaking, then it would seem to have been unnecessary to class them with admiralty cases, because they would, without such a provision, arrange themselves with those cases, and be triable in the same mode, and before the same tribunal. Cases may arise under a law of impost, &c., which are purely of admiralty jurisdiction, where the whole transaction is at sea, or on waters out of the body of a county; and there may be others not proper for the admiralty, which would not belong to that jurisdiction, and which, therefore, are intended by this law to be assigned to that jurisdiction. In the former case, we conceive it to be unimportant where the seizure is made, whether on land, or on waters of a depth less than a vessel of ten tons could navigate; in the latter case, the jurisdiction, according to this law, must be decided by the place where the seizure is made. In this way only, can the dictum of the supreme court of the United States, in the case of The Betsey, be reconciled with former decisions, and with established principles of law; for surely the court never intended to say, that the jurisdiction of the admiralty, in a case of strict admiralty jurisdiction, would depend upon the place where the seizure was made. There was nothing in that case to call for such a decision.

[1] [Originally published from the MSS. of Hon. Bushrod Washington, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, under the supervision of Richard Peters, Jr., Esq.]

The case of U. S. v. La Vengeance [3 Dall. (3 U. S.) 297] is the leading one on this subject, and is referred to in the case of The Betsey [4 Cranch (8 U. S.) 442] as governing that; and the decision in the former case, appears to us conclusive as to that now under consideration. It was an information in rem, in the district court, for exporting from the United States to a foreign country, arms and ammunition, contrary to law. It was contended, upon the broad ground of the admiralty jurisdiction, that it was not a case belonging to that jurisdiction, because it did not arise wholly upon the sea; exportation being an act arising partly on land, and partly on the sea. The operation of the ninth section of the Judicial Law, which assigns to the admiralty, cases of seizure under laws of impost, &c., was not hinted at in the argument, and the court decided that it was a case of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, because exportation is entirely a water transaction. If that was a case of admiralty jurisdiction, because it was a water transaction, is not this, too, a water transaction? What is the offence created by the non-intercourse law? It is the importation of goods into the United States, from French or English possessions. But to complete the offence, it is not necessary that the goods should be landed, if they are brought from those countries with intention to be landed. For we find that even the putting of goods on board of a vessel, with intention to import the same into the United States, is an offence against the law, and subjects the vessel and goods to forfeiture; and, consequently, they may be seized before the vessel has arrived at her port of destination, or even before she has entered the river. This, then, is a stronger case of admiralty jurisdiction, than that of the Vengeance. Even in the case of The Sally [2 Cranch (6 U. S.) 406], where the seizure was at Nottingham, within the body of a county, the court considered the question of jurisdiction settled by the case of the Vengeance, and thereby pronounced it to be a case of admiralty jurisdiction. If, then, this be a case of admiralty jurisdiction, because wholly a water transaction, it can hardly be contended, that the offender, by landing the cargo, can oust the jurisdiction of the court, and convert a maritime into a common law cause. The rule is clear, that if the original cause arise at sea, and other matters happen on land, depending thereon, as if a thing be taken at sea, and afterwards brought to land, the admiralty retains its jurisdiction over the subject. See 2 Bac. Abr. 178. So, too, if the cause of forfeiture arise at sea, the bringing of the thing forfeited to land, will not oust the admiralty of its jurisdiction.

This brings us to the consideration of the third point, which is, that the eighteenth section of the law, under which this forfeiture is claimed, has prescribed a common law mode of recovery; and, consequently, that the trial must be conformable to that practised in the courts of common law. If the premises be correct, the conclusion must be granted. The recovery is to be by action of debt, by indictment, or information. It is admitted, that the two first of these remedies are inapplicable to cases where the thing forfeited is demanded, although they are quite proper for the recovery of the penalties, or for enforcing personal punishment. The question then is, whether a trial by jury is indispensable, where the proceeding is by information against the thing itself? Because, if the object be to punish the offender in his person or property, generally, it is not questioned but that the trial of an information must be by jury. What is there in the constitution or laws of the United States, which requires the trial to be by jury, in the case of an information in rem, on the admiralty side of the district court? The former preserves that mode of trial in suits at common law. But an information in rem, in a case of admiralty jurisdiction, is not a suit at common law, but an admiralty proceeding, where the trial never is by jury. As to the latter, the saving clause in the ninth section of the judicial law, obviously means, that in cases where the jurisdiction of the admiralty is not exclusive, a party may, at his election pursue his common law remedy, if the common law be competent to afford him redress. It has no allusion to the mode of trial, in any case; for that would, without any provision of law, adapt itself to the remedy to which alone the saving refers. But what places this subject beyond all doubt, is, that informations in rem, on the admiralty side of the district court, for forfeitures incurred under laws of impost, navigation, and trade, of the United States, have been common in the practice of our courts as an admiralty proceeding, as much so as the proceeding by libel. The correctness of this practice has been brought directly into the view, and received the sanction of the supreme court of the United States, in the case of The Vengeance, when it was decided that the information in rem, is in the nature of a libel, and to be tried, according to the course of the admiralty, without jury. The mode of trial is here settled by the highest tribunal in the United States, and the term information, in respect to admiralty proceedings, had received a precise meaning, before it was used by congress. We think we are warranted in presuming, or are rather bound to conclude, that this decision was known to the legislature, and that the term was used in this law, in reference to the practice of the courts thus solemnly recognised. If, then, the information in rem in a civil suit of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, be of the nature of a libel, we are compelled to say that the use of the expression in this law, does not vary this case from those of The Vengeance, The Sally, and The Betsey [supra].

Another objection made to the mode of trial in this case, is, that the defendant may be compelled to give evidence against himself, contrary to a well-established principle of law, which excuses a man from answering, upon oath, any thing which may subject himself to a forfeiture. If forfeiture of the thing, which forms the subject of the suit, be meant, that point is settled by the decisions which have been mentioned; and if, in an action of debt, or an indictment for the penalty, the confession should be offered in evidence against the defendant, and he is entitled to the benefit of the rule which is contended for, the court would, of course, reject the evidence for that reason; and in this way the difficulty would be got rid of.

Upon the whole, we are of opinion that, as to the mode of trial, there is no error in the sentence of the district court.

Cases cited by the appellant: Fitzg. 66; Cro. Jac. 643; 1 Show. 118; 4 Bl. Comm. 304, 305; 6 Mod. 143; 7 Mod. 99; 3 Bac. Abr. 635, 636; [U. S. v. The Betsey] 4 Cranch [8 U. S.] 446, 452; 3 Atk. 276; 2 Ves. 245, 456; 3 Bl. Comm. 262; 4 Bl. Comm. 308; 2 C. Rob. Adm. 245; [U. S. v. The Sally] 2 Cranch [6 U. S.] 406; 1 C. Rob. Adm. 271.

Cases by appellee: 6 C. Rob. Adm. 341, 347; Priestman's Case, 4 Dall. [4 U. S.] 28; [U. S. v. The Union] 4 Cranch [8 U. S.] 216; [Peisch v. Ware] Id. 347; [U. S. v. La Vengeance] 3 Dall. [3 U. S.] 297; [Murray v. The Charming Betsey] 2 Cranch [6 U. S.] 64; [Hallet v. Jenks] 3 Cranch [7 U. S.] 217; [Maley v. Shattuck] Id. 459; 3 Bl. Comm. 68, 106; 1 Wood. El. Jur. 137, 138; 2 Browne, Civ. Law, 123, 124; Doug. 615; Yel. 135; Burrows, 74; [James' Claim] 1 Dall. [1 U. S.] 48; Reeve, Shipp. 255; Peake, 8, 9; 4 Bl. Comm. 281; [Keane v. The Gloucester] 2 Dall. [2 U. S.] 37; [Henderson v. Clarkson] Id. 175.

Case No. 2,838.

CLARK v. UNITED STATES.

[3 Wash. C. C. 101.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. Oct. Term, 1811.

NON-INTERCOURSE ACT—TRANSFER OF SOVEREIGNTY—ST. DOMINGO.

1. The island of St. Domingo is a dependence of France, and within the act of congress of March 1, 1809 [2 Stat. 528].

2. It is for the government of the United States to decide, whether this island is independent or not; and until such a declaration is made, or France shall relinquish her claim, the courts of the United States must consider the ancient state of things as remaining unaltered, and the sovereign power of France over the country as still existing.

[Cited in The Hornet, Case No. 6,705.]

3. The surrender of a town to an invading enemy, does not divest the sovereign of more country than that which has submitted to the conqueror. If the whole island of St. Domingo had been conquered by the British, and given up to the blacks, the right of France would have revived; since the conqueror gains nothing but the temporary right of possession and government, until a pacification; and cannot, in the mean time, impair, by any transfer, the rights of the former sovereign.

Appeal [from the district court of the United States for the district of Pennsylvania].

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice, delivered the opinion of the court. These cases arise under an act of congress, passed on the 1st of March, 1809, which prohibits the importation into the United States, of any goods, &c., from any place situated in France or Great Britain, or in any of the colonies or dependencies of either; and the question is, whether the island of St. Domingo, in October 1809, when the importation charged in this information was made, was a colony or dependence of France, or not?

On the part of the United States, it is contended, that in point of fact, this island, at the time above mentioned, was, and still continues, a dependence of France; and that even if this were not the case, according to the principles of the law of nations, still, it is not for this, or any other court, to decide on the ground of her independence, until the government of the United States has so declared, or France has relinquished her claim.

On the part of the claimant, it was insisted, that the people of this island had not only declared themselves independent, but have thus far shown themselves able to maintain it; having, ever since the declaration, exercised without interruption from the armed force of France, the rights and powers of self-government, under a constitution framed by themselves. That neutral nations are bound, by the law which ought to govern nations, to consider St. Domingo as a government separate from, and independent of

[1] [Originally published from the MSS. of Hon. Bushrod Washington, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, under the supervision of Richard Peters, Jr., Esq.]

France; and the war, if any there be between them, as being equally just on both sides. That the law of nations, is as much obligatory, as a rule of decision, upon courts, as of conduct on sovereigns; and consequently, in all questions coming before these tribunals, where the relations between the dismembered part and the mother country, are incidentally brought in question, and must be decided, the former must be considered equal in all respects with the latter, although the sovereign power may have made no declaration upon the subject. As an illustration of these principles, the case of a seizure and condemnation in a court of the new government, as prize, or for breach of a municipal law of that government, was mentioned, which a foreign court would clearly be bound by the law of nations to consider as valid. These arguments, on the side of the appellants, had great weight with us, when they were urged; and we must candidly confess, that they lost nothing by the examination which we have given the subject during the vacation. But they seem to us to be so completely borne down by the opinion of the supreme court, pronounced in the case of Rose v. Himely [2 Cranch (6 U. S.) 241], that it is impossible, we think, to sustain them, without disregarding principles most clearly expressed in that opinion. That was the case of an American vessel, which, after trading with the brigands of St. Domingo, as they were termed, sailed with a cargo; and when at the distance of ten leagues from the island, on the high seas, she was captured by a French privateer, on the 23d of February 1804, was conducted into the island of Cuba, was sold, and afterwards condemned, in July 1804, at St. Domingo, under an arret of the Captain-General Farrand, issued on the 1st of March, 1804.

The chief justice, in delivering the opinion of the court, whilst considering the particular character in which the court at St. Domingo acted, in condemning this vessel and cargo, says, "the relative situation of St. Domingo and France, must necessarily be considered." He then proceeds to lay it down, that "St. Domingo had declared herself independent of France, and was by arms asserting her sovereignty;—a war de facto existed. Vattel, who has been quoted to prove that St. Domingo, having declared herself independent, and so far maintained it by arms, must be treated by other nations as such, in fact, and entitled to maintain the same intercourse with the world, as is maintained by other belligerent nations, addresses himself to sovereigns, not to courts. It is for governments to decide, whether they will consider St. Domingo as an independent nation; and till such decision is made, or France shall relinquish her claim, courts must consider the ancient state of things as remaining unaltered, and the sovereign power of France over the colony as still subsisting." In that case, the arguments urged in behalf of these appellants, were stronger than when applied to this case; because in that, the dependence or independence of St. Domingo, was only incidentally involved; whereas, in this, the court is called upon, in construing an act of congress, to decide directly, that she is independent; for, if not so, then, the case is clearly within the law. The authority of the opinion just quoted, can lose nothing of its weight, from the circumstance, that, at the time when the vessel in that case was seized and condemned, the city of St. Domingo was in possession of the French; and that no efforts have been made, since its surrender to the arms of Great Britain and Spain, to recover the possession of the island, or any part of it. The superior maritime strength of Great Britain, accounts for this circumstance, and precludes all presumption of an implied abandonment by France, of her claim of sovereignty over the island. In the words of the chief justice, in the case quoted, "France has not relinquished her claim, nor has the government of the United States acknowledged the independence of the island."

One of the counsel for the appellants, sensible of the difficulty of clearing this case from the authority of Rose v. Himely [supra], endeavored to avoid it, by considering the island of St. Domingo as a conquered country, belonging first to Great Britain, and by her ceded to Spain. But this ground is as difficult to be maintained as the other; because, it was never yet pretended, that the conquest of a town, or even of a province, divested the original sovereign of more than the country which had submitted to the conqueror; and consequently, no other part of the island passed by the surrender into the hands of Great Britain and Spain, but the town of St. Domingo; and even that is now possessed by the blacks. We are inclined, indeed, to think, that if the whole island had submitted to the arms of Great Britain and Spain, and had by those powers been afterwards surrendered to the blacks, the rights of France would have revived; since the conqueror gains nothing but a temporary right of possession and government, until a pacification; and cannot, by any transfer in the mean time, impair the rights of the former sovereign. But, admitting the soundness of the arguments urged by the appellant's counsel, and that they stood uncontroverted by the decision in Rose v. Himely; still, we apprehend, that in relation to the island of St. Domingo, they would be inapplicable. The court is called upon to construe an act of congress, and to say, whether, within the meaning of the legislature, this island was to be considered as a dependence of France? Although there is nothing in the law itself, to decide this point, yet it is not improper to refer to the acts of our government, in relation to this island, in order to discover the light in which congress viewed it. In pursuing this investigation, we deem it unnecessary to go further back into the revolution of St. Domingo, than to the 8th of July, 1801, when a constitution was framed by the people of this island, which was subsequently administered by Toussaint, as governor, and captain-general, under the French government; the supremacy of which, was repeatedly acknowledged by him, as chief of the colonial government. Subsequent to that period, a civil war raged between this colony and France, which was carried on with various success until July 1809, when, by the surrender of the city of St. Domingo, the French army was entirely expelled the island; which has ever since remained in the possession of the blacks, arrayed under different chiefs, contending with each other for the sole command. Previous, however, to this forced abandonment by France, this island was, in 1804, declared by the people to be independent; and the supreme executive power was placed in the hands of Dessalines, with the title of governor-general.

Let us now see what has been the conduct of our government in relation to this island, since the period when it was claimed by France, as a colony, and acknowledged as such, by the colony. On the 28th of February 1806 [2 Stat. 351], congress passed a law to suspend the commercial intercourse between the United States and such parts of the island of St. Domingo, as were not in the possession, and under the acknowledged government of France; which was continued in force until the 4th of March 1808. In the mean time, however, viz. in December 1807, the embargo laws, interdicting the commerce of the United States with all foreign nations, were passed, and consequently, rendered a further continuance of the former law unnecessary. This general interdiction of commerce continued until March 1809, when the embargo laws were repealed, except as to England and France; and a non-importation law, as to those nations, their colonies, and dependencies, and places within their actual possession, was enacted; to take effect from the 20th of May following; which continued in force against France until a late period.

When the non-intercourse law passed, in February 1806, the island of St. Domingo was in a state of open public war with France; having declared herself independent, framed a constitution of government, and shown herself able to maintain that independence. As an independent nation, the United States had an unquestionable right to carry on a commercial intercourse with that island. The attempt of any foreign nation to interdict such commerce, and still worse, a demand upon the government of the United States, to enforce such prohibition by law, would have been an insult, to which no nation ought, and to which our government most certainly would not have submitted. But it is well known, that the law of 1806, was passed in consequence of a remonstrance of the French government, made upon that of the United States, through her minister. The United States were at liberty to acknowledge the independence of St. Domingo, and to treat her as a sovereign power, or to refuse such acknowledgment, and to consider her as a colony and dependence of France. We view the law of 1806, under the circumstances which produced it, as a clear acknowledgment of the sovereignty of France over the island, which no subsequent act of our government, has in any respect impaired. When congress, therefore, by the law on which this information is founded, interdicted the importation into the United States, of goods, &c., from the colonies and dependencies of France, we feel ourselves compelled to say, that St. Domingo was considered by that body as included. So that the government has not only not acknowledged the independence of this island, but has very plainly declared the contrary.

As to the evidence, we shall only observe, that the depositions of Elisha Kane, James Handy, and W. Hunt, together with the acknowledgment of one of the claimants, in his petition to the secretary of the treasury, sufficiently prove, that the cargoes of both vessels, the Sea Nymph and the Emma, were imported from Port-au-Prince, to require exculpatory evidence from the claimants; which no where appears in the record. Sentence of the district court affirmed.

CLARK (UNITED STATES v.). See Cases Nos. 14,801–14,808.

CLARK (WALLACE v.). See Case No. 17,098.

Case No. 2,839.

CLARK v. WASHINGTON.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 502.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. 11, 1824.[2]

LOTTERIES—SALE OF RIGHT TO CONDUCT—LIABILITY TO TICKET-HOLDERS.

The corporation of Washington, under the power given by their charter to authorize the drawing of lotteries, sold to one Gillespie, for $100,000, a right to draw a certain lottery. Held, that a person who bought a ticket of Gillespie could not recover from the corporation of Washington the prize drawn against that ticket.

[See note at end of case.]

At law. Assumpsit [by Chastein Clark against the mayor, aldermen, and common council of the city of Washington] for $100,000, the amount of a prize drawn against the ticket No. 2,929 in class No. 5 of the National Lottery.

The case was elaborately argued on the 7th, 8th, 9th, and 10th of December, 1824, by Mr. Swann and Mr. Wirt, for plaintiff, and Mr. Jones, for defendants.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

[2] [Reversed in Clark v. Washington City, 12 Wheat. (25 U. S.) 40.]

CRANCH, Chief Judge (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent). The declaration in this case contains four counts, one of which is for money had and received; the other three are special counts, setting forth the special circumstances, and averring a resulting liability on the part of the defendants to pay the amount of the prize.

The counsel for the defendants, after stating the evidence and testimony, prayed the opinion and instruction of the court to the jury, that if they "find the said evidence so offered on the part of the defendants to be genuine and true as above stated, and that the lottery ticket in the declaration mentioned and offered in evidence as aforesaid was sold to the plaintiff by the said Gillespie as the purchaser of the said lottery, and for his own account and risk, the evidence so offered on the part of the plaintiff is not admissible, competent, and sufficient to charge the defendants in this action." This prayer involves two questions: 1st. Is the plaintiff's evidence admissible notwithstanding the defendants' evidence? 2d. Is it sufficient to support the action notwithstanding the defendants' evidence, and notwithstanding the fact that the ticket was sold to the plaintiff by the said Gillespie as the purchaser of the lottery, and for his own account and risk?

1. Upon the first question we can see no valid objection to the admissibility of the plaintiff's evidence. It consists of acts of congress; by-laws and resolutions of the corporate government of the city of Washington; the acts of the managers appointed under those by-laws; the scheme of the lottery; the advertisement of that scheme; the ticket which drew the prize in question; sundry depositions proving the purchase and lawful possession of the ticket by the plaintiff; the manager's official list of prizes, showing that that ticket drew the prize of $100,000; and the letters of the plaintiff and his agent demanding payment of the prize from Gillespie, and from the mayor of the city, and their refusal to pay it; and the testimony of Mr. Webb, who was admitted to be a competent witness. There seems to be nothing, in the nature of this evidence, to render it inadmissible; and if the declaration sets forth a good cause of action, this evidence tends to support it, and therefore seems to be admissible. If the plaintiffs' evidence, by itself, is admissible, we do not see how it can be rendered inadmissible by any evidence which the defendants can offer. The defendants' evidence may counteract the plaintiff's, but cannot render it inadmissible.

2. The question is, whether, if the jury should find that the ticket was sold to the plaintiff, by Gillespie as the purchaser of the lottery, and for his own account and risk, the plaintiff's evidence is sufficient to support his action, notwithstanding the defendants' evidence. The principal question, upon this branch of the prayer, as we understand it, is, whether the plaintiff can recover in this action, if the jury should be satisfied that Gillespie sold the tickets in his character of purchaser of the lottery with all its benefits and responsibilities, and the sales were for his own benefit and he was to receive the proceeds thereof to his own use, and not as agent of, or for the use of, the corporation, although the jury should be also satisfied, by the evidence, that the plaintiff, at the time of purchasing the ticket, did not know that Gillespie was selling it in the character of purchaser of the lottery as aforesaid, but, in fact, believed he was selling it in the character of agent for the managers, and was led to that belief by the declarations and acts of the managers themselves as well as of Gillespie. This leads to the question, upon what grounds can the defendants be made liable in this action? Their liability must be the consequence of an undertaking, either express or implied. If the undertaking be express, it must be by some corporate act, or by the intervention of some agent authorized to bind them to such an undertaking. No corporate act is shown by which they have expressly undertaken to pay this prize; nor is there evidence of any authority given by the corporation, to any agent, so to bind it. If there be an implied undertaking on the part of the corporation to pay the prize, it must result from some equitable principle of the common law. But what equitable principle is there that will oblige a party to pay money without a valuable consideration? The corporation have received no valuable consideration for such an undertaking. It is true that they received $100,000 from Gillespie; but that was for the license to draw the lottery; which license they were empowered by the act of congress, to grant. The receipt of that sum of money was no consideration as between the defendants and the plaintiff, upon which the law will raise an assumpsit to the extent of the plaintiff's claim. An implied assumpsit can only be coextensive with the consideration. If the defendants had received the money arising from the sales of the tickets, they would have received the fund out of which the prizes were to be paid, and would therefore have received money to the plaintiff's use, and the law would raise an implied assumpsit, on the part of the defendants to pay it.

Whether the defendants did, in law, receive the proceeds of the sales of the tickets, may depend upon the question whether Gillespie acted as the agent of the corporation, and received them to its use, and for its benefit; or whether he received them to his own use as the purchaser of the whole lottery. This question of fact is, by the instruction prayed, left open for the consideration of the jury. Mr. Gillespie may have been the agent of the managers to conduct the drawing, yet if he was not the agent of the corporation in the receipt of the proceeds of the sales of the tickets, but received them to his own use, as the purchaser of the whole lottery, the corporation cannot be considered, in law, as having received them. We do not think it necessary to say more upon the construction of the ticket, than that it does not import an express undertaking, by the corporation, to pay or to guarantee the payment of the prizes. Upon the whole, the court is of opinion that the plaintiff's evidence is admissible, notwithstanding the defendants' evidence; but that if the jury should find that the evidence so offered as aforesaid on the part of the defendants is genuine and true as stated, and that the lottery ticket, in the declaration mentioned and offered in evidence as aforesaid, was sold to the plaintiff, by the said Gillespie as the purchaser of the said lottery, and for his own account and risk, the evidence so offered on the part of the plaintiff is not sufficient to charge the defendants in this action.

THE COURT refused to instruct the jury, as prayed by Mr. Jones, that, upon the whole evidence in the cause, the plaintiff was not entitled to recover; but, upon the further prayer of Mr. Jones, instructed the jury, in substance, that if they should find, from the evidence, that the lottery was sold to Gillespie, (as stated in the testimony of Mr. Webb,) and that he sold his ticket to the plaintiff, and received the purchase-money therefor, and for all the other tickets in the said lottery, to his own use and benefit, then the plaintiff cannot recover upon the said evidence.

Verdict for plaintiff, $35,000, and interest from 17th March, 1823.

The defendants moved for a new trial, which THE COURT granted. And at April term, 1825, a case was agreed, upon which THE COURT rendered judgment for the defendants, which was reversed by the supreme court. 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 40.

[NOTE. Complainant brought error, and the supreme court reversed the judgment and remanded the cause, with directions to enter judgment for the plaintiff.

[The charter of the corporation required that the lotteries authorized by it should be drawn under its superintendence and on its own account. The contract with Gillespie was no more than a sale of the profits of the lottery, and did not, under the circumstances of the case, relieve the corporation from responsibility. The ticket, having been satisfactorily proved to have been issued and sold under authority of the corporation, was properly admissible in evidence, and amounted in fact to the promise of the corporation, made by its authorized agent, to pay the prize. (Synopsis of opinion by Chief Justice Marshall.) Clark v. Mayor, 12 Wheat. (25 U. S.) 40.]

Case No. 2,840.

CLARK v. WILSON.

[Nowhere reported; opinion not now accessible. See next following case, No. 2,841.]

Case No. 2,841.

CLARK v. WILSON.

[3 Wash. C. C. 560.][1]

Circuit Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. Oct. Term, 1819.

FOREIGN ATTACHMENT—PARTIES—FORMER ATTACHMENT.

1. Motion to dissolve a foreign attachment. The cause of action stated in the affidavit, which was made by one Smith, as the agent of the plaintiff's testator, was the non-performance, by the defendant, of the stipulations in a charter party, made with the plaintiff's testator, the owner of a ship; the defendant having refused and wholly renounced the employment of the ship on the voyage described in the contract; by which damages were sustained to a large amount. The amount of the plaintiff's claim cannot with propriety be averred or sworn to; and being entirely for unliquidated damages, to determine which no known standard can be referred to, a foreign attachment cannot be sustained.

2. The charter party having been entered into by Smith and the defendant, although in the body of it he states himself the agent of Clark, yet, as all the covenants are made with Smith, and he executed the instrument in his own name, without reference to Clark, the action cannot be sustained in the name of Clark.

3. It is no objection to a foreign attachment, that the plaintiff had sued out an attachment, in another state, for the same cause of action.

4. Quere. If the defendant had given bail in the first attachment, whether a second could be sustained.

This was a rule upon the plaintiff [Clark's executor] to show his cause of action, and why the foreign attachment, which had been issued, should not be dissolved. The plaintiff showed cause, by producing the affidavit of John E. Smith, in which he swears; that, on the 31st August, 1805, a covenant was entered into between the defendant and the deponent as agent of James Clark, the testator, at London, a copy of which is annexed to the affidavit; and that, in pursuance thereof, the ship Portsmouth, therein named, took on board, at Portsmouth, from the defendant, such lawful goods as the defendant thought proper to ship, and proceeded on her voyage for Montevideo, and touched, agreeably to said covenant, at the coast of Africa, for passengers for Montevideo; and, on her voyage thence, the ship, before her arrival at Montevideo, was, without any fault of the owner or his agents, seized on the coast of Africa and sent to London, where she was detained for a long time, and then liberated, and restored to the deponent, as agent of Clark. That, with all possible despatch, he caused the said ship to be repaired, and then proposed to the defendant to cause the said ship to prosecute and complete the aforesaid voyage, and to do and perform every thing incumbent on him to do by the terms of the said covenant; and that he was willing and ready to perform the same. But the defendant did not, and would not, permit the ship to perform the voyage, and refused so to do; and absolutely violated his contract therein, and wholly renounced the charter party, and the farther prosecution of the transaction connected therewith. That, if the said voyage had been proceeded in, agreeably to the covenant, and the deponent's offer as agent as aforesaid, the ship would have been employed during her said voyage 24 months, as the defendant believes; which, agreeably to the terms of the covenant, would have yielded a freight of £16,080 2s., and which, with the exception of a small credit, has been lost to the plaintiff, by the breach of the said covenant by the defendant. He firmly believes, that damages, including interest, have been sustained by the plaintiff, by said violation, to the amount of 102,000 dollars. The material parts of a charter party similar to that referred to in this affidavit, are well stated by the judge in 8 East, 437.

[1] [Originally published from the MSS. of Hon. Bushrod Washington, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, under the supervision of Richard Peters, Jr., Esq.]

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice, delivered the opinion of the court. Various reasons have been assigned why this attachment should be dissolved, of which two only will be particularly examined. The first is, that this action is brought to recover unliquidated damages, which, it is contended, cannot be the subject of a foreign attachment under the law of this state. This subject was very much considered in the case of Fisher v. Consequa [Case No. 4,816], cited at the bar; and although we do not think that the court, in that case, gave too liberal a construction to the attachment law, we should nevertheless examine the ground with great caution, before we make any further advance. The principle decided in that case was, that a demand arising ex contractu, the amount of which was ascertained, or which was susceptible of ascertainment by some standard, referable to the contract itself, sufficiently certain to enable the plaintiff, by affidavit, to aver it, or a jury to find it; might be the foundation of a proceeding by way of foreign attachment, without reference to the form of action, or to the technical definition of debt, the expression used in the law.

The cause of action shown in this case was, in substance, that the defendant, in the attachment, agreed to deliver to the plaintiff teas of a certain quality, and suited to a particular market; and, on failure to do so, to pay the difference between teas of the stipulated quality, and such as should be delivered; that teas of inferior quality to that stated in the agreement, were delivered; and the plaintiff swore, that the difference amounted to a precise sum, in which the defendant was justly indebted to him. The standard, therefore, was the difference in the quality of two articles, and all that remained to be ascertained, was the value or amount of such difference; which was as easily ascertained, as the value of goods sold, where no price was agreed upon. The standard was fixed by the contract itself; and the amount of the claim, in reference to it, was so plainly to be ascertained, that the plaintiff was enabled to aver it in his affidavit, and he did so.

This action is founded on a charter party, by which the defendant covenants to pay to John E. Smith, his executors, &c., £670 per month; during the time the ship shall be employed by the freighter, during her intended voyage; and so in proportion for any time less than a month, in full of the freight of the said vessel; and he covenants also, to pay two third parts of all pilotage and port charges, during the voyage; and also two third parts of all expenses of storing the ship's cargo at Montevideo—such freight, pilotage, and port charges, to be paid on the arrival and discharge of the ship at her destined port in Great Britain. He further covenants to furnish sufficient water and provisions, for all passengers she may take on board, during the voyage to Montevideo. These are all the covenants in this instrument, on the part of the defendant; and it is obvious, that he is not liable for a breach of any of them, inasmuch as his performance depended upon the completion of the voyage, and the arrival and discharge of the ship at her destined port in Great Britain.

Whether the plaintiff can maintain any action upon this charter party, by reason of the refusal of the defendant to take on board a cargo, and to prosecute the voyage, is a question which has not been considered by the court; nor is it necessary that it should be decided. For, if an action can be maintained upon it, it still remains to be inquired, by what standard are the damages, which the plaintiff has sustained on account of the refusal of the defendant to perform the voyage, to be ascertained? That furnished by the contract, was a certain sum per month, during the voyage, to be ascertained at its termination; but that event never took place; and consequently, no rule can be deduced from this source, to fit the present case. The affidavit, showing the cause of action, refers to the same standard; and must necessarily be equally defective. The plaintiff's counsel is therefore compelled to go out of the contract; and there, finding himself perfectly at large, he has suggested a scheme for ascertaining the amount of the plaintiff's loss; which he considers to be so entirely unexceptionable, that there could not be two opposing opinions respecting it, entertained by legal minds. This rule is, to deduct from the ordinary time consumed in performing such a voyage as that described in this charter party, estimated at the rate of £670 sterling per month, the usual expenses incident to it; and to give to the plaintiff the difference. We must be permitted to dissent from such a standard as this; because, if it be such a one as deserves the appellation of a legal rule, it would apply as well to the case of an original refusal of the freighter to proceed on the voyage, as to the subsequent refusal, after the fruitless attempt which was made in this case; and then it would happen, that the plaintiff would be entitled to the stipulated freight, as if it had been earned; and yet the ship might be employed, during the whole period of the supposed duration of the voyage, in earning other freights for the owner. This would be most unjust; and yet it would result from the proposed rule:—discard it, and then it is not easy to perceive any other which affords a solitary landmark to guide, either the plaintiff, in stating and swearing to the amount of his demand, or the jury in ascertaining it. Smith swears, that he believes the plaintiff has sustained damages, including interest, equal to the sum of 102,000 dollars; and this belief is obviously founded on another, that the freight would have amounted to that sum, if more contingencies than we have time to enumerate, had not happened. But, it has been already observed, that this witness assigns a very unsatisfactory reason for his belief; and consequently, it is entitled to very little respect.

This, then, is a case, in which unliquidated damages are demanded;—in which, the contract alleged as the cause of action, affords no rule for ascertaining them;—in which, the amount is not, and cannot, with propriety, be averred in the affidavit; and which is, and must be, altogether uncertain, until the jury have ascertained it; for which operation, no definite rule can be presented to them. In our opinion, it has not one feature of resemblance to the case of Fisher v. Consequa [supra]. In the latter, there was a promise by the defendant, alleged and supported by oath, to pay the difference between two articles of different value; in the former, there is no promise or covenant of any kind, verified by oath, or even stated, to pay anything in the event which took place. 2. We are of opinion, that this attachment cannot be supported; because the plaintiff has shown no cause of action whatever. In answer to this rule, calling upon him to show his cause of action, the plaintiff exhibits a charter party, entered into between the defendant and John E. Smith, the only parties who executed it, and between whom all the covenants are made. John E. Smith styles himself, it is true, in this instrument, agent of James Clark; and in his affidavit, he states, that he acted in this transaction as agent. But notwithstanding these allegations, it is too much to contend, that James Clark, who, by himself, or by his attorney, did not execute the deed, who is not even stated in the body of it to be a party, and with whom no one covenant is made, can support this action.

It is admitted, by the plaintiff's counsel, that, if the action were in the name of a total stranger to this transaction, advantage might be taken of it upon this rule; but it is insisted that the plaintiff is beneficially interested in this covenant, and consequently, that the defendant should be put to his plea, to bar the plaintiff's right to maintain the action. We cannot accede to this distinction. The question is not whether the plaintiff is a stranger in interest, but whether he shows a probable cause of action in himself? and if by his own showing he is not entitled to bring the action, the defendant ought not to be subjected to the inconvenience of giving special bail; in order to release his property from the attachment, and to enable him to defeat the action by plea. In a doubtful case, depending either upon the law or the evidence, the court will not interfere in this summary mode to take from the plaintiff the security he has obtained. But where the defect is apparent from the plaintiff's own showing, we take the rule to be otherwise. The defendant assigned another cause for dissolving this attachment, which the court does not think sufficient:—this was the record of an attachment, sued out by this plaintiff against this defendant, in the state of Maryland, for the same cause of action, with a capias claim against the garnishee, who, it is sworn by the plaintiff, has effects in his hands belonging to the defendant, and who, it appears by the sheriff's return, has been arrested. The mere pending of an attachment by the plaintiff against the defendant, for the same cause of action, in another state, affords no ground for dissolving this attachment, although that was the first laid; since the funds found in one state may be quite insufficient to discharge the debt. The case might be different, if the defendant had given bail on the first attachment, unless under very special circumstances, addressed to the sound discretion of the court. The rule must be made absolute for dissolving the attachment.

CLARK, The JULIET C. v. WELSH. See Case No. 7,580.

CLARK, The W. H. See Case No. 17,482.

Case No. 2,842.

In re CLARKE.

[2 Ben. 72;[1] Bankr. Reg. Supp. 41; 1 N. B. R. 188; 6 Int. Rev. Rec. 206.]

District Court, E. D. New York. Dec., 1867.

BANKRUPTCY—REGISTER'S FEES—ADJOURNED MEETINGS.

[Where, on application of an opposing creditor, the register orders the bankrupt to appear for examination, and on his appearance the examination is adjourned at the instance of the creditors, the register is not entitled to a fee of five dollars as for a "day's service while actually employed under the especial order of the court."]

[1] [Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

[In this case Register Winslow certified [Nov. 22, 1867], that G. A. Seixas, attorney for a creditor who had proved his claim, applied for an order for examination of bankrupt, which was granted. Upon the return of the order the bankrupt appeared for examination with his attorney, but the attorney for the creditor was not ready, and at his request the examination was postponed.

[The attorney claimed and insisted that the register's fees for services in taking examination of bankrupt under an order for that purpose, and granted upon the application of a creditor, were paid out of the bankrupt's deposit, under section 47, eleventh paragraph [Act 1867; 14 Stat. 540]; that an adjournment of an examination without taking any testimony was merely a meeting under 3d paragraph of same section, and $3 are the fees therefor instead of $5, under the 8th paragraph of same section; that the meeting at which testimony is taken is only to be charged for under same section, 3d paragraph, $3.

[The register claimed that this was a day's service under a special order,—the order for the examination,—and that the register's fee was (5) five dollars. Section 47, subd. 8.

[1. Section 47 prescribes the register's fees, and when paid by the bankrupt he is to pay according to those rates, and when the services are rendered for creditors and others they are to pay according to the same rates. Section 4 provides that "the fees of said registers as established by this act and by the general rules and orders required to be framed under it, shall be paid to them by the parties for whom the services may be rendered, in the course of proceedings authorized by this act." This service was not rendered for the benefit of the bankrupt, and upon no pretence can he be called to pay for it. The service is for the benefit of the creditor; he is in search of concealed assets, or is endeavoring to show that his claim is of such a nature that a discharge in bankruptcy will not wipe it out, or is searching for facts to defeat the proceeding altogether; so his claim may stand until barred by the statute of limitations if not paid.

[2. The fee for this service is chargeable under the 8th subdivision, and not under the 3d.

[Judge Blatchford has held in MacIntire's Case [Case No. 8,821] that the meeting referred to in the 3d subdivision and elsewhere means a "meeting of creditors" such as is spoken of in section 12, pp. 27 and 28.][2]

BENEDICT, District Judge. A register is not entitled to five dollars upon the adjournment of an examination, as for "a day's service while actually employed under the especial order of the court," where, on the application of an opposing creditor, an order has been made by the register that the bankrupt attend and be examined before him, and on the day fixed the bankrupt appeared, but the opposing creditor was not ready, and accordingly the examination was adjourned.

[2] [From Bankr. Reg. Supp. 41.]

Case No. 2,843.

In re CLARKE et al.

[2 Hughes, 405;[1] 10 N. B. R. 21.]

District Court, E. D. Virginia. March 28, 1874.

BANKRUPTCY—PREFERENCE — SURRENDER—PROOF OF DEBT—INSOLVENCY—NOTICE OF—MISTAKE—CORRECTION IN EQUITY.

1. The provisions of section 5084, Rev. St. U. S., must be construed in connection with the clause in section 5021, which prohibits certain creditors to prove their debts, so as, if possible, both may stand.

2. Where the trustee of an illegally preferred creditor surrenders the trust property to the assignee without suit, the preferred creditor may prove his debt.

3. If a deed of trust by mistake describes a note secured as signed by the maker and indorsed by an indorser, it may be corrected in equity, so as to cover a bond signed by the principal and signed by a surety as such.

4. The section 5128 does not require that the debtor should know that he is insolvent, but only that the fact should exist.

5. It does not require that the creditor should be aware that reasonable cause existed for believing the debtor insolvent, but only that the reasonable cause should exist. (This decision was before the amendment of June 22d, 1874, requiring knowledge on the part of the creditor.)

[Cited in Alderdice v. State Bank of Virginia, Case No. 154.]

6. The existence of a financial crisis constitutes of itself reasonable cause to believe men, otherwise in doubtful circumstances, to be insolvent.

In bankruptcy. This was a case of involuntary bankruptcy. The adjudication was on the 9th day of January, 1874. A deed had been given by the firm of Clarke & Daughtrey, on the 19th of September, to A. C. Withers, trustee, to secure certain debts to T. W. Smith, a merchant of Suffolk, to the amount of $1,500. By this deed the firm granted to the trustee all their estate, both real and personal, of every description, then owned and enjoyed by them, consisting of a steam sawmill and fixtures, teams, tramroad, tools, wagons, and all other appliances and appurtenances of the mill; also two tracts of land connected with their operations as lumber manufacturers, and all timber, logs, or lumber then on hand, or that might be on hand at any time before sale under the deed, including all the personalty or realty of every sort and description owned by them up to the time of foreclosure. The debts secured were evidenced by promissory notes to the amount of $1200, and the deed also secured a prospective store account, which the firm was to be at liberty to run up to the amount of $300 in addition. The grantors also stipulated in the deed to waive the benefit of their homestead exemption as to the notes and the accounts secured. Thus, the instrument not only covered all property of every description which the firm then owned, but all they should own up to the foreclosure of the deed, and not only secured existing debts, but a future debt of open account besides. The preferred creditor in the deed declined to put the assignee to his bill in equity to test the validity of the deeds, and after having surrendered the property to the assignee, voluntarily made himself party defendant to a petition filed in bankruptcy submitting the question of the validity of the deed. The general creditors, through the assignee, John R. Kilby, assail this deed, as one which if not void by common law and the statute law of the state, as designed to secure advantages to the debtors in fraud of other creditors, was at least void as a deed of preference made in fraud of the purposes of the bankrupt act of 1867 [14 Stat. 534].

[1] [Reported by Hon. Robert W. Hughes, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

Thomas R. Kilby, for general creditors.

A. C. Withers, and Thomas R. Borland, for preferred creditors.

HUGHES, District Judge. I need not advert to the law of Virginia relating to fraudulent acts. The first clause of the 35th section of the bankrupt act virtually embodies the state law, and, adding to its provisions, declares that if any person, being insolvent within four months before the filing of the petition against him, with a view to give preference to any creditor, makes any transfer or conveyance of any part of his property, absolutely or conditionally (the person to be benefited by such transfer having reasonable cause to believe the grantor to be insolvent, and that such transfer is made in fraud of the provisions of this act), the same shall be void, etc., etc. In order to succeed, it is incumbent on the creditors who assail this deed to show four things, viz.: 1st. That on the 19th of September last the bankrupts were insolvent. 2d. That the trust deed was intended to give a preference to T. W. Smith. 3d. That T. W. Smith had reasonable cause to believe that Clarke & Daughtrey were insolvent, and 4th. That Smith had reasonable cause to believe that the trust deed was made in fraud of the bankrupt act. [Toof v. Martin] 13 Wall. [80 U. S.] 46.

The essential questions are, whether the bankrupts were insolvent on the 19th day of September last, and whether Smith had reasonable cause to believe them so. If they were insolvent, and he had reasonable cause to believe they were, the second and fourth requirements follow as corollaries from these two facts. For, in regard to the fourth requirement, it is held—[Toof v. Martin] 13 Wall. [80 U. S.] 51—that the bankrupt act, having been designed to secure an equal distribution of the property of an insolvent debtor among his creditors, any transfer made with a view to secure his property or any part of it to one creditor, is a transfer in fraud of the act, every one being presumed to know the necessary and unavoidable consequence of his acts.

The questions for decision are, therefore, whether Clarke & Daughtrey were insolvent in September, and whether Smith had reasonable cause to believe they were. It is not necessary that Clarke & Daughtrey should have known or believed themselves to be insolvent, but only that they were in fact insolvent. It is not necessary that Smith should have believed they were insolvent, but only that he should have had reasonable cause to believe they were. As to the insolvency the facts were as follows: Clarke & Daughtrey had previously executed a deed of trust on all their existing property, on the 11th April, 1873; and this deed had not been recorded until the 4th September, 1873, two weeks before the execution of the deed of trust for the benefit of Smith. This deed was known to Smith when he took the deed for his own benefit on the 19th September. The deed of April was made for the benefit of Jones & Riddick to secure $1500, nearly all of which debt was still due and unpaid in September; and Smith knew the fact. Clarke testified by items in February to debts which he then recollected to have been owing by the firm on the 11th of September to the amount of $4,041.65. It is reasonable to suppose that their entire indebtedness in September was greater. The amount of their debts scheduled in bankruptcy in January was $5,915.72. Clarke testifies that before going to T. W. Smith in September for a loan of $500 in addition to what his firm already owed Smith, he had tried Jones & Riddick for a like loan without success, and had also tried the firm of Smith & Clark in vain. T. W. Smith knew of the application to Jones & Riddick and of its rejection before he took the deed in question. He also knew of the application to Smith & Clark, and of its failure. Several witnesses testify that these occurrences took place at the beginning of the financial crisis of last fall, when the solvency of all men engaged in trade was put to test, and when all business men were more or less pressed for money; a state of things calculated to put everybody on inquiry as to the solvency of others; a state of things tending itself to produce insolvency in doubtful cases, and itself constituting reasonable cause for believing doubtful men to be insolvent.

It is plain, from all the evidence in the cause, that, in the sense of not being able to meet their obligations as they matured in the ordinary course of business, this firm of Clarke & Daughtrey were insolvent. There is cogent evidence to the effect that they had been so during the whole summer. Even their laborers had been put off, and the wages were in great part overdue and unpaid in September. They were then and had been quite unable to meet current payments. Whether the firm were absolutely insolvent or not in September depends upon a comparison of their debts and assets. Clarke itemizes from memory debts due in September to the amount of $4041. They were not probably less than $5000. The schedules show, as of January, that they were $5915. The debts being somewhere between five and six thousand dollars, what was the value of their property in September? We have no exact data for that date. The firm scheduled its value in January, embracing very nearly the same property which they had held in September, at a gross estimate, made by themselves, of $3565. If we add some $600, due them from sales in Baltimore, their assets do not show a value of more than $4200. Their assets actually sold (except the Baltimore credit) at what the assignee reported as a remarkably good sale (which was made on time) for the gross sum of $3275.28. These facts show that the cash value of the assets of the firm must have been materially short of the amount of their debts in September, and there is no reasonable doubt that these men were in fact insolvent at that date, whether they or their friends knew it or not. This conclusion is strongly corroborated by the additional fact that the bargain which they made with Smith, set forth in the trust deed which they gave for his benefit, was one which no man in solvent circumstances would be likely to give at all, or could give without instant destruction to his credit.

The firm of Clarke & Daughtrey being insolvent when they gave this deed of preference to Smith, the next question is, Did he have reasonable cause to believe they were? The extreme financial pressure which had then just set in must have suggested the question of solvency in a very cogent manner as to such a firm as Clarke & Daughtrey, who had already given a trust deed which remained unsatisfied. The stringent and sweeping provisions of the deed which Smith exacted of them implies, in its whole tenor, that Smith distrusted their solvency, and was providing for its probable development. He certainly knew that the firm were unable to meet the two notes already due to himself. He certainly knew that the debt of some $1400 due to Jones & Riddick, secured by the first deed, was unsatisfied, and that they could not pay it. He certainly knew that, without selling out the property covered by the two deeds, it was not possible for Clarke & Daughtrey, on the 19th of September, 1873, to pay their debts, or even to pay that portion of their debts secured by the two deeds. He, therefore, had reasonable cause not only to believe but to know the fact of insolvency, and he had reasonable cause also to believe that if the firm were then required to liquidate their debts, his deed would operate in fraud of that equal distribution of their estate among creditors which is sought to be secured by the bankrupt act. He not only had cause to believe these facts, but he is morally precluded from denying them. For no creditor has a right to claim, after exacting an assignment so stringent as to destroy the credit of an insolvent debtor and force him into bankruptcy, that he had no reasonable cause to know that the debtor was insolvent, and that the assignment would operate in fraud of a pro rata distribution of the effects in bankruptcy. This deed, interpreted by the proofs in the case, is as clear a violation of the provisions of the first clause of the thirty-fifth section of the bankrupt act as is ever likely to come for question before a court of law. It is accordingly set aside and annulled.

It is further insisted, on behalf of the general creditors, that this being a case of involuntary bankruptcy, and the adjudication having been founded upon this deed as one of the acts of bankruptcy charged to have been committed, therefore, the final clause of section 39 of the bankrupt act applies to this claim of Smith, which clause provides that a creditor who has received a conveyance such as the deed in question, having reasonable cause to believe that a fraud on the act was intended, shall not be allowed to prove his debt in bankruptcy. The provisions of this section must be construed in connection with those of section twenty-third, which allows a creditor who has accepted a deed of preference, and who has voluntarily surrendered the advantage given by such deed, by allowing the trustee to surrender the property conveyed to the assignee in bankruptcy, to share pari passu with other creditors. It has been held in many cases that where the creditor avails himself of the provisions of section 23, by voluntarily surrendering the property to the assignee, he ceases to be a party to the fraud and may prove his debt. The trustee here did surrender the property to the assignee in bankruptcy without demur. The creditor in this deed, T. W. Smith, is therefore allowed to share in the distribution of the estate on the footing of a general creditor.

Another question, which has been argued in this cause, is upon the power of this court, as a court of equity, to correct a mistake which was made in the description of one of the debts secured by the deed of 11th April. The amount secured in that instrument was $1,500. A part of that amount was represented by a bond for $250 dated February 5th, 1873. This bond was partly in the form of a promissory note, yet concluded with words, "witness our hand and seals," and was signed and sealed by Clarke & Daughtrey, and by Jones as surety. It was described in the trust deed as a note of Clarke & Daughtrey, indorsed by Jones. All parties to the note, and to the trust deed admit the mistake, and that this bond was the obligation referred to in the deed as a note indorsed. There can be no doubt of the power of this court to correct this mistake of description, by allowing the bond to be paid out of the trust fund, all parties admitting that this was the paper intended to be provided for by the deed. It was an error made by the scrivener, which was not detected by the parties to the deed when executing it, in consequence of the bond being written in the form of a note. The authorities for the exercise of this power of correction are so numerous that they need not be cited. Besides those adduced in argument by Judge Garnett, others are given by Kerr in his book on Injunctions, p. 55. The reasons are given by Story in his chapter on "Mistake." The bond must be paid as part of the amount secured by the trust deed of 11th April.

Case No. 2,844.

In re CLARKE.

[2 N. B. R. 110 (Quarto, 44).][1]

District Court, S. D. New York. Sept. 22, 1868.

BANKRUPTCY—FRAUD IN CONTRACTING DEBT—DISCHARGE.

1. An objection to the discharge of bankrupt, grounded upon the fact that the debt was created by fraud, is not a valid one.

2. Debts created by fraud are excepted from the operation of the discharge.

[Cited in Re Wright, Case No. 18,065.]

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. The specifications filed by the creditor as grounds of objection to the discharge, go entirely to the point that the debt due to the creditor was created by the fraud of the bankrupt. This is not a ground, under section twenty-nine [Act 1867; 14 Stat. 531], for withholding a discharge. If the debt was in fact created by the fraud of the bankrupt this will (sections thirty-two and thirty-three) except the debt from the operation of the discharge, and in that way, as to that debt, a discharge will be really withheld. A discharge is granted.

CLARKE (BANK OF ALEXANDRIA v.). See Case No. 844.

CLARKE (BOONE v.). See Case No. 1,641.

CLARKE (CASE v.). See Case No. 2,490.

Case No. 2,845.

CLARKE et al. v. CHASE et al.

[Brunner, Col. Cas. 638;[2] 21 Law Rep. 34.]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts, 1856.

REMOVAL OF CAUSE FROM STATE COURT—EFFECT ON ATTACHMENT—ATTACHMENT—EFFECT OF ASSIGNMENT ON.

1. On the removal of a cause, an attachment will have the same effect as if the cause had remained in the state court.

2. Rights under an attachment depend on the state of the property when the attachment was levied, and cannot be affected by a transfer of the securities for the debt by the assignee under a void assignment.

This was a question whether the Manufacturers' Insurance Company were chargeable as the trustee of Franklin Chase. The plaintiffs [J. W. Clarke and others], being citizens of Massachusetts, brought an action against Chase, a citizen of the state of Rhode Island, in the supreme judicial court of the commonwealth of Massachusetts, and summoned the Manufacturers' Insurance Company as his trustee, under the trustee process provided by the law of that state. The defendant removed the suit to this court pursuant to the twelfth section of the judiciary act of 1789 (1 Stat. 79). It appeared from the disclosures of the trustee that on the 3d day of January, 1854, one Henry Parks procured a policy of insurance, to be underwritten by the Manufacturers' Insurance Company, on machinery and stock in a cotton mill; and in case of loss $2,500 of the amount insured was, by the policy, made payable to the defendant Chase. That before the service of the trustee process, a loss had occurred which made the sum of $2,500 due and payable, and that the trustee was ready to pay it to its rightful owner; but that the trustee was informed that one George W. Butts claims to be the owner of the said sum of money by assignment from the defendant Chase. Under provisions of the law of Massachusetts, Butts intervened, and made allegations, from which, being admitted to be true, it appeared that on the 6th day of January, 1854, before the service of the trustee process, Chase, being insolvent, conveyed to Butts, a citizen of the state of Rhode Island, by a voluntary assignment, all his property, including his rights under the policy of insurance above mentioned, in trust, to pay, first, certain preferred creditors, and secondly, to pay, pro rata, all such of his creditors as should release the assignor from their claims. That Chase was the creditor of Parks, who procured the policy, in the sum of $5,699.65, and the sum of $2,500 was made payable to Chase as security therefor. That after the assignment was made to Butts, this indebtedness of Parks was consolidated and liquidated, and Parks gave his promissory note for the amount, payable to Butts as assignee, and as security therefor executed a mortgage on real property. That Butts, after the service of the trustee process, assigned this note and mortgage, and the assignee afterwards acknowledged payment thereof on record; and afterwards Parks assigned to Butts all his right and interest in the said sum of $2,500; and that all these transactions took place within and between citizens of the state of Rhode Island.

Mr. Hillard, for plaintiffs.

Mr. Ball, contra.

[1] [Reprinted by permission.]

[2] [Reported by Albert Brunner, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

CURTIS, Circuit Justice. The first question is, whether the title made by Chase to Butts, by the voluntary assignment for the benefit of creditors, can prevail over the attachment. It is admitted at the bar that it is settled law in the supreme court of Massachusetts, that the assignment could not prevail over the attachment. The cases of Ingraham v. Geyer, 13 Mass. 146, and Zipcey v. Thompson, 1 Gray, 243, and Edwards v. Mitchell, Id. 239, are decisive on this subject. And if the attachment was valid by the laws of Massachusetts, the express words of the twelfth section of the judiciary act, under which this suit was removed to this court, make that attachment equally valid here. Its language is: "And any attachment of the goods or estate of the defendant by the original process shall hold the goods or estate so attached, to answer to final judgment, in the same manner as by the laws of such state they would have been holden to answer the final judgment, had it been rendered by the court in which the suit commenced." I have been referred to the decision of Mr. Justice Grier, in Caskie v. Webster [Case No. 2,500]. But this is purely a question of the local law of Massachusetts, and that being settled, the judiciary act requires me to administer it precisely as it would have been administered in the supreme court of Massachusetts, if the suit had not been thence removed.

The next question is, whether the consolidation of the debt, as security for which the $2,500 was made payable to Chase, and the giving of a promissory note secured by a mortgage to Butts, the assignee, put an end to any attachable interest of Chase, the assignor. As respects any title acquired by Butts, as assignee, by means of this transaction, it is open to precisely the same objection as his original title under the deed of assignment; for it was but a mode of perfecting that same title. Nor can it be maintained that what was thus done amounted to a payment of the debt for which the $2,500 stood as security, and so released that security. It is not alleged that the new note was negotiable; and if it were, the taking of a negotiable note is not presumptive evidence of payment in Rhode Island; and there is no allegation that it was intended as a payment. The old evidences of debt were relinquished; but there was no reason for retaining them after the debts they evidenced had been consolidated, and new evidence of the liquidated sum given.

Neither can it be maintained that the discharge of the mortgage by the assignee after the service of the trustee process destroyed the attachment. The plaintiffs' title depends on the state of things existing when the attachment was made. Chase was the legal owner of this sum of money, which was absolutely due to him. If he had received it, so much of his claim against Parks would have been paid. In contemplation of law, as between him and Parks, Chase does receive it when it is appropriated by law to pay the debt due to the plaintiffs. And while the plaintiffs are seeking for this appropriation, and the money is sequestered, it would not be competent for Chase and Parks to defeat Chase's title. And what Chase and Parks cannot do to this effect, Butts, or his assignee, and Parks cannot do.

It inflicts no injury on Parks, and deprives him of no right to require him to consider the $2,500 in the hands of the insurance company as so much money already paid by him; and to hold that if he chooses to pay that sum to Chase or his representative, it is a voluntary payment so far as the rights of the plaintiffs are concerned. It is a voluntary payment; for while this process is pending Parks could not be compelled to pay; nor would he be allowed in any event to lose anything by force of this attachment. I hold the trustee chargeable.

Case No. 2,846.

CLARKE et al. v. CLARKE et al.

[3 Woods, 408.][1]

Circuit Court, S. D. Georgia. April Term, 1877.

STATE TAXATION OF EXPORTS.

Logs which were the property and in possession of persons engaged exclusively in exporting timber from the United States to foreign countries, which had been purchased from citizens of Georgia for the purpose of exportation, were in a port of Georgia and of the United States awaiting shipment, though not on shipboard, which had been inspected according to the laws of Georgia and were afterwards exported by the owners, were, while so awaiting shipment and still on land, "exports" within the meaning of section 1, article 10, of the constitution of the United States, and as such were protected from imposts or duties or any taxation by the state of Georgia by whatever name it might be called, except such as was absolutely necessary for the execution of the inspection laws of the state.

[Cited in Kidd v. Flagler, 54 Fed. 369.]

Heard on demurrer to the declaration. The declaration averred in substance: That the plaintiffs [James E. Clarke & Co.] were aliens and subjects of Great Britain and partners in business; that on the first day of April, 1875, at the city of Darien in the state of Georgia, the plaintiffs, as such partners, were merchants engaged exclusively in exporting timber from the port of Darien to Great Britain and to other foreign countries, and had in their possession in said city a large quantity of timber as exports which had been purchased and fully paid for to citizens of Georgia, and inspected according to the laws of the state of Georgia before the said April 1, 1875, and at the time was being shipped and awaiting shipment to Great Britain, and which, before the trespasses of the defendants complained of, was in fact exported. That the plaintiffs were required by defendant, S. E. Clarke, to return said timber for taxes, which they declined to do. That said Clarke, pretending to act as receiver of tax returns for the county of McIntosh, assessed said timber at a valuation of $16,000, and assessed a state and county tax thereon of $240. That said Clarke, after said timber had been exported as aforesaid, placed the said assessment in the hands of the defendant Allen McDonald, who claimed to be collector of taxes for McIntosh county, and said McDonald, after demanding said tax of plaintiffs, which they refused to pay, issued an execution and delivered the same to the defendant Thomas B. Blount, sheriff, commanding him to enforce the payment of said tax out of the property of the plaintiffs. Thereupon Blount levied said execution on one hundred square logs, the property of plaintiffs, and sold and disposed of, at public sale, forty-four of said logs of timber, of the value of one thousand dollars, for which they bring suit. To this declaration the defendants [S. E. Clarke and others] filed a general demurrer.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William B. Woods, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

Julian Hartridge and W. S. Chisholm, for plaintiffs.

Rufus E. Lester (who filed a brief of N. J. Hammond, lately attorney general of Georgia), for defendants.

WOODS, Circuit Judge. The plaintiffs claim that the logs of timber mentioned in the declaration on which the said tax was levied, were exports, and therefore exempt from state taxation under section 10, article 1, of the constitution of the United States, which declares: "No state shall, without the consent of the congress, levy any imposts or duties on imports or exports except what may be absolutely necessary for executing its inspection laws." Section 799 of the Code of Georgia declares that "all real and personal estate, whether owned by individuals or corporations, resident or nonresident, are liable to taxation unless specially exempted," and section 798 of the same Code exempts from taxation "all property specially exempted by the constitution of the United States."

The defendants claim, first, that the timber logs of the plaintiffs on which the tax was levied were not "exports" in the sense in which that word is used in the constitution of the United States; and, second, that the tax levied was neither an "impost" nor a "duty," and therefore the said tax was not prohibited by the constitution of the United States. The logs on which the tax was levied were the property of, and were in possession of persons engaged exclusively in exporting timber to foreign countries, they were purchased from citizens of Georgia for the purpose of exportation, they were in a port of the United States awaiting shipment, they had been inspected according to the laws of the state, and the purpose of the owners to export the logs was, after the levy of the tax thereon, actually carried out and the logs were exported. It is clear, and it seems to be conceded by defendants, that if the logs had actually been on shipboard when the tax was levied, they might have well been considered exports. Is the fact that they were still on land, though awaiting shipment, such a circumstance as deprives them of their character as exports? The reasoning of the court in the case of Brown v. Maryland, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 419, demonstrates that it is not. The court in construing section 10, article 1, of the constitution, says: "The limitation is, 'except what may be absolutely necessary for executing the inspection laws.' Now, the inspection laws, so far as they act on articles for exportation, are generally executed on land before the article is put on board the vessel; so far as they act on importations, they are generally executed on articles which are landed. The tax or duty of inspection, then, is a tax which is frequently if not always paid for services performed on land, while the article is in the bosom of the country. Yet this tax is an exception to the prohibition on the states to lay duties on imports or exports. The exception was made because the tax would otherwise have been within the prohibition." Mr. Madison, in defending the clause under consideration, in the convention of Virginia called to adopt the constitution, said: "Some states export the produce of other states; Virginia exports the produce of North Carolina; Pennsylvania those of New Jersey and Delaware, and Rhode Island those of Connecticut and Massachusetts. The states exporting wished to retain the power of laying duties on exports to enable them to pay expenses incurred. The states whose produce was exported by other states were extremely jealous, lest a contribution should be raised of them by the exporting states by laying heavy duties on their own commodities. If this clause be fully considered, it will be found to be more consistent with justice and equity than any other practicable mode." These views show that, in the opinion of Mr. Madison, the commodities of the producing states were considered exports even before they reached the port of shipment. It seems clear, then, from these authorities, that these logs were, when the tax was laid upon them, even though they were still on land, exports within the meaning of the constitution of the United States, and as such protected from imposts or duties by the state. But the defendants claim that the tax upon the logs was a tax levied upon the general mass of property in the state, and does not therefore fall within the constitutional prohibition, being neither an "impost" nor a "duty." This construction would defeat the purpose for which section 10, article 1, was adopted. It would put it in the power of the state, by changing the manner of levying the tax, and by giving it another name, to evade the prohibition of the constitution.

In the case of Low v. Austin, 13 Wall. [70 U. S.] 29, the supreme court of the United States, having the subject under consideration, said: "The supreme court of California appears from its opinion to have considered the present case as excepted from the rule laid down in Brown v. Maryland [supra], because the tax levied is not directly upon imports as such, and consequently the goods imported are not subjected to any burden as a class, but are only included as a part of the whole property of its citizens, which is subjected equally to an ad valorem tax. But the obvious answer to this position is found in the fact which is in substance expressed in the citations, made from the opinions of Marshall and Taney, that the goods imported do not lose their character as imports and become incorporated into the mass of the property of the state until they have passed from the control of the importer or been broken up by him from their original cases. While retaining their character as imports a tax upon them in any shape is within the constitutional prohibition. The extent and character of the tax are mere matters of legislative discretion." This authority is directly opposed to the claim of defendants under consideration.

These views dispose of the main questions in this case. In the case of Brown v. Maryland, supra, Mr. Chief Justice Marshall remarks: "The constitutional prohibition to levy a duty on imports may certainly come in conflict with their acknowledged power to tax persons and property within their territories. The power and the restriction on it, though quite distinguishable when they do not approach each other, may yet, like the intervening colors between black and white, approach so nearly as to perplex the understanding as colors perplex the vision in making a distinction between them, yet the distinction exists and must be marked as the cases arise. Till they do arise it might be premature to state every rule as being universal in its application." Profiting by this caution, all I undertake to decide in this case is, that under the circumstances set out in the declaration, the logs of the plaintiffs were exports and exempted from state taxation by the constitution of the United States. As they are exempted by the federal constitution they were exempted from state taxation by express provision of the Code of Georgia. Code, § 798, par. 1; Act 1875, § 9; [Laws Ga.] 117. The defendants, in enforcing the tax levied on plaintiffs' property, were acting without authority of law. The assessor and collector were clearly without jurisdiction to assess and collect the tax, and the execution issued to the sheriff is no protection to him. They are all trespassers alike, and this action is well brought against them. Wise v. Withers, 3 Cranch [7 U. S.] 331.

Demurrer overruled.

Case No. 2,847.

CLARKE et al. v. CRABTREE.

[2 Curt. 87.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. Term, 1854.[2]

BREACH OF CHARTER-PARTY.

1. Where a charter-party contained a covenant to furnish a full cargo of salt at Bonaire, and no salt could be obtained there, it was held to be broken, though it was also stipulated, that the master was to "use the vessel's funds in payment for the salt which he is to purchase."

[Cited in brief in The B. J. Willard, Case No. 1,454.]

2. If the master ascertained on his arrival, that no salt could be obtained, he was not bound to wait, but might sail immediately, and recover empty for full.

[Cited in Hart v. Shaw, Case No. 6,155; The Maria White, Id. 9,083.]

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of Massachusetts.

[In admiralty. Libel by Enoch Crabtree against Albert P. Clarke and others. There was a decree for libelant in the district court, and the respondents appealed.]

Goodrich and Lathrop, for appellants.

Mr. Dodge, contra.

CURTIS, Circuit Justice. This is a libel in the admiralty filed by the appellee against the appellants to recover a sum of money alleged to be due for the hire of the bark Carniola. The charter-party was entered into by the appellee, as master and agent for the owners, of the first part, and the appellants of the second part, on the 23d day of June, 1853; and it is thereby declared that the whole of the bark, except the cabin, and room necessary for the crew, stores, &c., is let to the party of the second part, for a voyage from Bonaire to Boston, after discharging at Demarara, cargo taken on board at Machias in the state of Maine. The charterers covenant to provide and furnish to the bark at Bonaire, a full cargo of salt, and to pay for the freight of the vessel fourteen cents per bushel, customhouse measure, for each and every bushel delivered at Boston, payable on the discharge of the cargo. The charter-party also contains at its close the following written clause: "It is further understood and agreed, that the master is to use the vessel's funds in payment for salt, which he is to purchase at the lowest cash price, and, on the vessel's arrival at Boston, the charterers are to pay the master, or his agent, the invoice cost of the salt, export duty, if any, and insurance on amount invested in purchase of salt from Bonaire to Boston, and Boston wharfage, all in addition to the freight." The vessel went to Bonaire; the master was unable to purchase salt, owing to a failure of the supply, and returned to Boston in ballast. And the principal question is, whether, under the provisions of this charter-party, he can recover for dead freight.

[1] [Reported by Hon. B. R. Curtis, Circuit Justice.]

[2] [Affirming Case No. 3,314.]

If the charterers covenanted to furnish to the vessel a full cargo of salt at Bonaire, and broke this covenant, and, in consequence, the vessel returned empty, it is not denied, that according to the settled law, the charterers must pay the same freight as if a full cargo had been provided and brought; or, as it is generally expressed, empty for full. But it is denied that this is the effect of this charter-party. To decide this question, it is necessary to put an interpretation upon its very peculiar provisions; and in order to do so, the whole instrument must be examined, due effect allowed to each part so far as it qualifies, restricts, or explains other parts, and the light of surrounding circumstances applied to it, to enable me to see what the parties intended. The latter is particularly important in this case. It is always proper for the court, as much as practicable, to place itself in the condition of the parties to written instruments, so far as to know what they knew, and contracted in reference to, before construing such instruments. And it is more than commonly needful to do so, when the instrument contains provisions, manifestly adapted to and influenced by peculiar circumstances of the trade and business to which it relates.

I proceed, therefore, in the first place to state what the most material of those circumstances are. It appears, that the trade in salt, between Bonaire and Boston, is usually carried on in vessels which go to the Windward Islands with lumber, staves, ice, &c., and having discharged their cargoes, proceed to Bonaire. The salt is sold by the government directly to the exporter, for specie; the governor of the place being the seller. There are no mercantile houses established there to act as agents; and masters of the vessels which take the salt, usually purchase it. Sometimes specie is sent out from here to buy the salt; but, usually, an arrangement is made to use for that purpose, the proceeds of the outward cargo. It is thus apparent that the provisions of this charter-party are in accordance with the usual course of the trade. When the charter-party was made, the vessel was lying at Boston, having a cargo taken on board at Machias, to be delivered at Demarara: after delivering that cargo, the bark was to proceed to Bonaire. The vessel's funds, that is the proceeds of that outward cargo, were to be used in payment for salt, to be there purchased; and the master was to make that purchase. Thus far there can be no doubt. But it is strongly urged that, in substance and effect, the whole charter-party taken together, amounted only to an agreement by the charterers, to receive and pay for the salt in Boston, adding to its prime cost and charges, fourteen cents per bushel. To this I cannot accede. In the first place, it converts what is plainly a charter-party of affreightment into a mere contract to buy a cargo on arrival; and it is inconceivable, if this had been the intention of the parties, that they should not have said, in four lines, "If you will go to Bonaire and get a cargo of salt for your bark, and bring it to Boston, we will buy it of you there, and pay you therefor its prime cost and charges, and fourteen cents per bushel in addition." To suppose that merchants, of ordinary intelligence, would have resorted to a charter-party, containing all the usual provisions of such an instrument, to make a contract to buy a cargo of salt on arrival, is wholly inadmissible. Nor can such a contract be reconciled with the particular stipulations, any more than with the general frame and nature of the instrument. The charterers covenant, expressly, to furnish a cargo of salt to the vessel at Bonaire, and to pay for bringing it to Boston. The cargo contemplated was therefore to be their property, unless there is something in the instrument which controls these plain provisions, and shows that the cargo was not to belong to the charterers until arrival in Boston. I perceive nothing which can have this effect. The fact that the master was to buy the salt with the funds of the vessel, is consistent with the covenant of the charterers to furnish a cargo, and with the ownership of it by them from the moment of its purchase. If he advanced the money for them and acted as their agent in the purchase, they would own and furnish the cargo as truly as if one of them being at Bonaire should buy it, and deliver it on board. It is provided that insurance may be obtained, at the cost of the charterers, on the amount of the vessel's funds invested in the salt; but if the master made advances to buy the cargo, the owners of the vessel would have a lien on it for those advances, and an insurable interest to that extent; and, it is to be observed, it was only to that extent, insurance was contemplated. It has no tendency, therefore, to show the owners of the ship owned the cargo.

It was also argued, that the covenant of the charterers to furnish a cargo at Bonaire, was qualified by the subsequent provisions of the charter-party that the vessel's funds should be used, and the master should make the purchase; that this was the only mode of furnishing the cargo contemplated by the parties; and that inasmuch as providing the funds and buying the cargo, necessarily preceded the furnishing it to the vessel, the covenant of the charterers to furnish it, was dependent on the covenant of the master to provide funds and buy it; and therefore the latter were conditions precedent, the non-performance of which would excuse the charterers from keeping their covenant. This position requires careful examination. The fact that the master executed this charter-party for the owners, does not change its legal effect. But it may simplify the case, to suppose the owners themselves had executed it. Thus viewed, it would contain an agreement by the owners, that the funds of the vessel should be used in purchasing the salt, and also a declaration that the master was to purchase it. But in what character, and on whose account would the master act? So far as he was to advance funds belonging to the owners, he would act as their agent, and they may properly be understood as covenanting, that they will thus advance the vessel's funds through him, as their agent; but so far as he should act in buying the cargo, he would act as the agent of the charterers; they would buy through him, and the fair interpretation of the instrument would seem to be, that the master had the permission of the owners so to act, and that they agreed he should not voluntarily neglect to act in that capacity. From the nature of the case, it cannot be supposed they intended to covenant that he should, at all events, act as the agent of the charterers in buying a cargo. Such an agency is, of necessity, revocable, and its execution must depend upon the will of the principals. From the nature of the case, too, if its execution depend upon conditions of the market, or other circumstances, the principals must be understood to take those risks. The business to which the risks belong being theirs, the risks of failure to accomplish it are theirs also; and a third person cannot be considered as assuming them, simply by agreeing that his servant may act in their behalf in the matter. Such exposition of the charter-party makes it amount to this: the owners agree that the vessels' funds shall be advanced at Bonaire, and that the master shall act as agent of the charterers to buy the cargo; the charterers covenant that they will buy the cargo at Bonaire through the master; the funds are offered, the master is ready to act as the charterers' agent, and buy the cargo, but there is no salt there. The charterers fail to keep their covenant, not because of any non-performance by the owner, but because their business cannot be done. And this interpretation seems to me to be in accordance, not only with the entire language of the charter-party, but with the nature of the contract, and the relations of the parties growing out of it. In my judgment, it would lead to much confusion and difficulty in practice, if the rights and duties of the owner were considered as affected, as claimed in this case, by a stipulation that the master should act as supercargo. We must consider for whom he acts, to whom the risk of that business properly belongs; and if found to attach to the charterer, by virtue of his character as charterer, or by his express covenants, or both, it must rest with him. In this case, the charterer covenanted to furnish a cargo. The risk of failure belonged to him. And its burden was not shifted upon the owner, because the charterer having no agent at Bonaire, obtained the privilege of employing the master to buy the cargo.

The remaining questions do not seem to me to be attended with much difficulty.

It is objected that the master waited but twenty-four hours at Bonaire; that if a master sails away, without waiting the stipulated number of lay days, if the number is stipulated, or a reasonable number, if there be no stipulated number, he cannot recover for dead freight. Lawes, Chart. Part. 34, 35; Abb. Shipp. 463. And that the evidence shows three to five days is the usual, and therefore the reasonable number at Bonaire. But the evidence only proves three to five days, the ordinary time occupied in taking a cargo of salt on board there; not to wait to find a cargo; and if the master ascertained in less than twenty-four hours, that by waiting three to five days he could not obtain a cargo, he was not only not bound to wait, but he had no right to wait and impose the charge of lying there on the charterers. Moll. de J. Mar. bk. 2, c. 4, § 3, p. 255; Kleine v. Catara [Case No. 7,869]. I am satisfied by the evidence, that the master found his further delay there would be useless, that he did remain a reasonable time, and not being bound to wait any specified time, his departure did not deprive the owners of their right to the charter money.

It was also insisted that if the covenant of the charterers to provide a cargo was broken, the damages were but nominal, because the effect of the charter-party was to take up the vessel at Bonaire, not to send her there. I cannot accede to this view. Looking at the course of the trade, and the facts of this case, I consider the charter money was to be paid for going from Demarara to Bonaire, and coming thence to Boston with the cargo on board. The vessel went to Bonaire, and came thence to Boston; the owners performed all that on their part was to be done, and the fact that there was no cargo on board on her homeward voyage, was the fault of the charterers, for which the owners are not to suffer.

A question was also made respecting the authority of the master to enter into such a charter-party, and the jurisdiction of admiralty over a libel upon it. As to the authority of the master, it being proved that, in point of fact, such a charter-party is within the usual limits of the trade and employment of the vessel, he has an implied authority, which is sufficient. And although admiralty would not have taken jurisdiction over the contract to use the vessel's funds to buy the cargo, it is not necessary to do so to sustain this libel, which is only to recover the freight money under the charter-party. The covenant as to the funds having been fully kept, by the readiness to advance them at Bonaire, does not in any way affect the jurisdiction of the court.

Decree of the district court affirmed, with interest at the rate of six per centum per annum and costs.

Case No. 2,848.

CLARKE v. CRAMER.

[1 MacA. Pat. Cas. 473.]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec., 1856.

PATENTS—PRIORITY—CONFLICT OF EVIDENCE.

[Where the evidence as to priority of invention is conflicting, its weight must govern.]

[Appeal from the commissioner of patents.

[Interference. Eneas P. Clarke, as assignee of Joseph W. Henery, and James P. Cramer, claimed priority of invention for an improved cultivator tooth. The commissioner of patents decided in favor of Cramer, and Clarke appeals.]

J. Dennis, Jr., for appellant.

DUNLOP, Chief Judge. In this case the closing argument of Clarke's counsel was presented to me during the present session of the circuit court of the District of Columbia, and the appeal submitted for my decision. I have carefully read and considered the mass of testimony taken in this controversy, much of which is confused and contradictory, and subject to exception, on the ground of interest in the witnesses, and have also read and considered the arguments of the counsel of the parties litigant submitted to me in writing.

I think the commissioner of patents has properly decided to award the priority of invention of the "improved cultivator tooth" to James P. Cramer, upon the admissions of Mr. Henery, Eneas P. Clarke's assignor, made before his assignment to Clarke, and proved by the depositions of Osborne, Follick, Welsh, Mott, and Whitman. These witnesses are unimpeached, and in the argument of Clarke's counsel the admissions proved by them are not denied, but attempted to be explained. This explanation will be noticed hereafter. It is true Shaw and Clarke, witnesses for E. P. Clarke, assignee, who are also unimpeached, prove admissions by Cramer inconsistent with his claim as inventor, and assigning the discovery and merit of the contrivance to Mr. Henery. Supposing these admissions of Cramer, so proved by Shaw and Clarke, not to be reconcilable with the idea that Cramer, in making them, meant only to ascribe to Henery the mechanical merit of perfecting the machinery of the improved cultivator tooth according to his (Cramer's) suggestion, still, in this conflict of testimony, the commissioner of patents and the judge on appeal must be governed by the weight of evidence, which certainly preponderates on Cramer's side. I have not referred to Henery's testimony given on the present interference between Cramer and E. P. Clarke. Upon his cross-examination, it appears that the only consideration paid to him for the assignment to E. P. Clarke was the sum of one dollar, and that he advanced his own money to pay the expenses of the officers (Boice and Bryon) in summoning witnesses for E. P. Clarke, his assignee. It would seem, therefore, that the assignment is only colorable, and that Henery is the real plaintiff in the case, and not a competent witness. But if I am wrong in this, and Henery is to be received as a witness, it would not alter my opinion as to the weight of testimony in this controversy.

I will now allude briefly to the attempted explanation made by E. P. Clarke's counsel of Henery's admissions. It is urged in the argument of the counsel before me and in the examination of Henery as a witness that Cramer deceived Henery, and induced him to believe that he (Cramer) intended to apply at Washington for a patent in his (Henery's) name, and that, relying on the good faith of Cramer, he (Henery) had made the admissions proved against him. But if Henery knew himself to be the true inventor of the improved cultivator tooth, and had authorized Cramer to apply for a patent for it in his (Henery's) own name, it is altogether in conflict with all the principles of action which would govern a reasonable man that he should make false admissions to five different people, the only effect of which would be to defeat the object he had in view, to wit, the getting of a patent in his own name. Besides, Henery seems to have been well aware that to get the patent the inventor must himself swear to his invention. He well knew that he had taken and furnished to Cramer no such oath, and therefore that Cramer could not at Washington obtain the patent in his (Henery's) name. The untenable excuses thus made only serve to fortify the truth of the admissions proved by the five witnesses above referred to.

As to the reasons of appeal, to which my revision is by law limited, the first, third, fifth, and sixth reasons of appeal are answered together in the aforegoing remarks. The second reason of appeal is immaterial in this controversy, and need not be decided, if I am right in the conclusion that the commissioner of patents did not err in awarding priority of invention to Cramer on the proved admissions of Henery. The fourth reason of appeal is also immaterial, because I have not relied at all on French's evidence, but have treated him as an incompetent witness. I therefore affirm the judgment of the commissioner of patents awarding priority of invention of the improved cultivator tooth to James P. Cramer.

[NOTE. Patent No. 16 364, for the improvement in question, was granted to J. P. Cramer, January 6, 1857.]

Case No. 2,849.

CLARKE et al. v. The DODGE HEALY.

[4 Wash. C. C. 651.][1]

Circuit Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. April Term, 1827.

SALVAGE—PLEADING AND PROOF.

1. The allegations in a libel, not admitted or denied by the claimants, are not to be taken as true, but must be proved.

2. Quaere, whether the forcible taking possession of a vessel exposed to danger, against the will of the commander; can entitle the persons so acting to the merit and reward of salvors, although they should contribute to save the vessel.

[Cited in The John Gilpin, Case No. 7,345; The John Perkins, Id. 7,360; The Choteau, 9 Fed. 211; The C. D. Bryant, 19 Fed. 606; The Cherokee, 31 Fed. 170.]

3. Unless the property be saved in fact by those who claim as salvors, salvage will not be allowed; be their intentions however good, and their exertions however heroic and perilous.

[Cited in The Narragansett, Case No. 10,020; Edwards v. Thirty-Five Boxes of Gold Dust, Id. 4,299a; Montgomery v. The T. P. Leathers, Id. 9,736; The Williams, Id. 17,710; The Cleone, 6 Fed. 525.]

[4. Cited in Bean v. The Grace Brown, Case No. 1,171, to the point that in determining the intention of a master and crew in leaving their vessel, great weight must be given to their subsequent acts.]

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of Pennsylvania.]

In admiralty.

C. J. Ingersoll, for libellants.

J. R. Ingersoll, for claimants.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. This case comes by appeal from the district court, where a pro forma decree, dismissing the libel, was given. The libel states that on the 24th of January last, the libellants, whilst in their oyster boats in the mouth of Back creek, in Delaware bay, saw the brig Dodge Healy drifting down the bay in a solid cake of ice, of about four acres in extent, from Cohanzey cove, about ten miles higher up the bay. In about three hours after they first observed her, she had drifted down opposite Back creek, and was proceeding in the direction of the Cross Ledge shoals, when she was abandoned by her pilot, officers and crew, who came on shore at Ben Davis's point; bringing with them, in their boats, their colours, compass, quadrants, clothes, bedding, cabin furniture, and other articles, as many as the boats would stow. That seeing the brig in this situation, threatened by the danger of running on the shoals, where she must inevitably have been either cut to pieces, or overwhelmed by the ice; they put off in their boat, with the intention, if possible, to save her. In about half an hour after they got on board, the mate, with some men employed for the purpose, returned to the brig; but being informed by Clark, one of the libellants, that they had, and should retain possession of, and endeavor to save the brig, he returned to the shore, taking with him the papers belonging to the brig. After his departure, a consultation was held as to the best mode of saving the vessel, which resulted in efforts to cut a channel for the brig through the ice, so as to extricate her from her confinement in the mass; in which they, with great labour and peril, succeeded; the ice snapping in half from its great weight, as soon as the channel was cut through. The vessel was nevertheless driven on to Cross Ledge, and was in imminent danger, but finally she drifted off the ledge with the flood tide; but she was again encircled in a large cake of ice, from which she was again extricated by the libellants, by cutting the ice from around her; finally, they got her into water clear of ice, and by using the sails, ran her into a place of safety, where she remained in possession of the libellants; who intended to bring her to Philadelphia; until they were dispossessed by a writ of replevin issued by a court in New Jersey, under which possession was restored to the captain.

A claim was interposed by the owners and consignees of the vessel and cargo, and by the master; which does not admit that the vessel was saved by the exertions of the libellants, and professes entire ignorance of all the circumstances in relation to the alleged acts of the libellants to save her; none of the claimants having been present until the captain boarded her on the day she was conducted into a safe harbor.

The facts in this case, which are not disputed, are the following: After the Dodge Healy had ascended the bay as high as Cohanzey, or Ben Davis's point, finding that the ice was collecting in such a manner as to endanger her, she was forced ashore in Cohanzey cove, within about a half a mile of the shore, where she was soon encompassed by ice, and remained for about five days confined in a body of ice, from twelve to eighteen inches thick, and from two to four miles in extent up and down the river, and on her stern. During this time, the captain left the brig under the command of his next officer, and came to Philadelphia. In consequence of a very high tide, the ice lost its hold on the shore, and a cake some miles in extent, floated with the ebb tide down the bay, carrying with it the brig which was firmly fastened in it. In this situation, and believing from the direction the brig was taking, that she would drift upon the Cross Ledge shoals, where she would probably be cut in pieces, or be overwhelmed by the ice, the pilot ordered the boats out, that the officers and crew might avoid the apprehended danger by reaching the shore. After stowing away in the boats the articles stated in the libel, the officers, the pilot and crew, left the brig, whilst yet drifting towards the shoals, under a confident belief that she would be driven on them and be lost. After they reached the shore, the mate with some of his men returned to the brig, and brought away other articles belonging to the crew which had been left on board. When within about half a mile from the shore on his return to it, he observed a boat pushing out of Back creek, and proceeding apparently for the brig: and apprehending that the persons in this boat intended to take possession of the brig, which it was his wish to prevent, he hastened on shore, and having engaged four or five volunteers to assist him, he returned to the brig, and got alongside within ten or fifteen minutes after the persons whose visit he had endeavoured to anticipate had boarded her. He found them on board, engaged in an attempt to extricate one of the cables from the ice: he told them they had better cut the ice from around the vessel; but was answered by Clark, one of the libellants, that he (the mate) had nothing to do with the brig, and that he (Clark) was then master. Whether the mate was ordered to leave the vessel, or whether he determined to do so in consequence of the assumption of the command of her by Clark, is by no means certain, the evidence being both ways, and nearly balanced. The fact is, that the mate having taken from the cabin some of the papers, departed with two of the men whom he hired to accompany him to the brig, the other three having deserted him and joined Clark's party, and are now numbered with the libellants. The captain returned the same evening, and was anxious to board the brig immediately, but was dissuaded by the mate from making the attempt before the next morning, when two efforts were made to get on board, and were defeated by the unfavourable state of the ice. He succeeded the next morning, and the persons on board continuing to assert their right to the possession of the brig, he prevailed upon them to take her into Cohanzey, where she was secured, and possession of her delivered to the captain under a writ of replevin.

[1] [Originally published from the MSS. of Hon. Bushrod Washington, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, under the supervision of Richard Peters, Jr., Esq.]

The material facts disputed are: 1. Whether the brig was abandoned by the officers and crew, and was in a state of derelict, when she was taken possession of by the libellants or not; and 2. Whether the brig was saved by the exertions of the libellants from the imminent peril which, it is acknowledged by all, threatened her, at the time the mate first left her, as well as during the greater part of the time that she was in the possession of the libellants?

As to the abandonment, there are four witnesses who swear, that they heard the mate declare, upon his first landing from the brig, that she was abandoned, and that those who should save her would be well rewarded. The pilot states, that when he left the brig, nothing was said about returning, nor did he expect it was the intention of the mate to do so. Two other witnesses give it as their opinion that she was abandoned, but form their judgment from what they saw, and not from any declarations by the mate or pilot to that effect. On the other side, the two mates swear positively that, although, when they left the brig, their expectations were that she would be lost on the shoals, towards which she was then drifting; yet it was their intention to return to her the next morning, in case she should escape the threatened danger. The same witnesses, together with William Bennet, concur in the statement that when the pilot had ordered out the boats for the purpose of quitting the brig, he expressed his apprehensions that she would drift on the shoals, and be lost; but added, that if she should escape that danger, she would return with the tide the next morning, nearly to the same place where they then were, when the officers and crew could return to, and again take possession of her. That the reason he assigned for advising the measure of leaving the brig, was, that, by no human exertions could they prevent her from going on the shoals, and being there cut to pieces, or overwhelmed by the ice, if the tide should force her on them; and that of consequence, it would be useless to remain in her. But he anticipated the possibility, at least, that she might take a different direction; in which event, the mate and crew might return with some advantage. But in judging of the mate's intention at the time he left the brig, I depend much more upon his subsequent acts, than upon declarations made by him to the other witnesses, or when he was himself examined, after this controversy had arisen. If his intention was to leave her to her fate, and to use no further exertions to save her, he could have no motive for remaining on the shore for the purpose of watching her motions, and of discovering her situation the next morning; as is testified by one of those very witnesses, who says he heard the mate declare that the brig was abandoned. When within a few hours after he had first left the brig, he discovered the libellants moving towards her, and suspected that their design was to take possession of her; what but a sense of duty, as commanding officer in the absence of the captain, could have induced him to hire another crew to assist him in regaining the possession, before it could be taken by others? The declaration attributed to him by some of the witnesses, that he expected to come in as a salvor; is not only denied by himself, but is incredible, as he must have known that he could not abandon as mate, and, in violation of his duty to the owners, claim the merit of a salvor. When he returned to the brig for the avowed purpose of anticipating the libellants in taking possession of her, why did he take with him his compass and quadrant, unless for the purpose of navigating her, in case she should be driven to sea? It is further in proof, that, when he engaged the men to accompany him to the brig, it was under an express engagement on their part to stick by the vessel, and to obey his orders. I am, in short, quite satisfied that an abandonment of the brig, without the intention to return to her in case she should escape the danger that threatened her, was, at no period of time, in the contemplation of the mate; and that when he spoke of her being abandoned, he was far from annexing a technical meaning to the phrase, but merely intended to express the danger he apprehended her to be in, and his abandonment of the possession of her, until the danger should be over, or should appear to be less imminent. I consider the brig as having at no period of time been out of the constructive possession of the agents of the owners; if by continual claim, or acts in the nature of it, it could be retained. She was deserted on account of an immediate danger, and only during the continuance of such danger, but animo revertendi, if the danger should pass away. She was watched by the mate, and was always in his view whilst on the shore. The moment that he observed an attempt was making to take possession of her, he endeavoured to anticipate and prevent it, and asserted his right to the possession, which was retained against his will by the libellants. The same day that possession was taken by the libellants, the captain returned, used every exertion to board the brig immediately, and succeeded in doing so the day but one after. His right to the possession was denied and resisted by the libellants, but yet he remained on board until she was got into a place of safety; and he immediately applied to the civil magistrate, and succeeded in removing what, under all the circumstances of this case, I must consider as the tortious possession of the libellants.

The only remaining and the all-important inquiry is, whether the brig was rescued from the danger which impended over her at the time the libellants took possession of her, by any acts or exertions of theirs? Her extreme danger is admitted by all. She was fast locked in an immense field of floating ice, from twelve to eighteen inches in thickness, and her danger consisted in being drifted by the tide on the shoals below her, and being there cut to pieces, or overwhelmed by the ice, which, being thus resisted in its course, would probably accumulate and run over her. If the ice had been cut away, and a passage made for her extrication from it, she might have been saved; and if this was performed by the libellants, she owed her safety to them. This is agreed by all the witnesses who speak upon that subject. But unless she was so extricated, they all concur in saying, that no human force could have prevented her running on the shoals. She avoided the danger, however, as is stated by David Jones one of the libellants' witnesses, by the circumstance, providentially interposed, of her taking another direction than towards the shoals, and drifting to the eastwards of Ben Davis's shoals; by which circumstance, to use the expression of this witness, "she escaped." The impracticability of cutting a passage for the brig through so extended, and so firm and thick a body of ice, is proved by William Bennet one of the libellant's witnesses, Jonas Mason the second mate, and the other William Bennet, one of the claimants' witnesses. Whether the mere act of cutting away the ice around the brig would have saved her, or even diminished her danger, is uncertain from the testimony, the witnesses appearing to entertain different opinions upon that matter. It would seem to me that the pressure of the ice would have filled the opening almost as soon as it was made. But be this as it may, there is not one witness who proves that even that, or any other act, was performed, which did, or could by any possibility tend to the saving of this vessel. The libel, it must be admitted, makes out a case of some merit, and if it were proved would entitle the libellants to some compensation in the nature of salvage. It is not proved; but the counsel for the libellants has contended, that the facts alleged in the libel, not being denied by the claim and answer, must be taken for true. This is a doctrine as novel as it is untenable.

The respondents state in their answer that they were not present at the time of this transaction, nor can they of course admit or deny the facts stated as concerns this part of the case. As honest men, regardful of the sanctity of an oath, how could they deny the allegations of the bill, however extravagant or untrue they might be? But to argue that they must either do so, or subject themselves to the legal consequences of impliedly acknowledging them to be true, cannot for a moment be maintained. If the answer does not acknowledge the truth of the allegations of the libel, it must be proved by those who assert it. The maxims of the civil law—"ei incumbit probatio, qui dicit, non qui negat," and "nullus idoneus testis in re sua intelligitur;" are equally the maxims of the admiralty, equity, and common law courts. I am willing to allow to the libellants the merit of good intentions when they first boarded this brig. How far they continued to merit this praise, when, by the return of the mate with a crew, they perceived they were mistaken in their impression that she was abandoned, and persisted after that in holding the possession, and either expelling the mate from her, or denying his right to the possession and command, need not now be decided. If the question turned solely upon that point, I should have a word or two to say upon that subject; and I shall merely observe, for the present, that I am not to be considered as admitting that a forcible taking or retaining possession of a vessel by strangers, against the will of the officer who, with his own crew, is capable of saving her without the forced assistance, if she can be saved at all, will entitle such strangers to the merit of, and to the reward due to salvors, although they should afterwards contribute to save her. Had the mate never left the vessel, but remained in the actual possession of her, it could not surely be contended that the libellants might, under the impressions, however honestly entertained by them, that she was in danger, and that their assistance to save her might be necessary, force themselves upon the mate in the character of salvors, against his will, and without the necessity for their aid being made apparent; and thus entitle themselves to the merit, and to the reward of salvors.

Without however pursuing that inquiry further, it may confidently be laid down, as an undisputed principle upon which a claim for salvage at all times rests, that unless the property be in fact saved by those who claim the compensation, it cannot be allowed, be their intention however benevolent, and their conduct however heroic. If providence kindly aids their exertions, by which the object is attained, so much the better for them; nor would that circumstance deprive them of merit, although it might diminish the rate of compensation; but exertions must be made, and the probability that they contributed, or might contribute to save the property should appear by some proof, although, from circumstances, slight proof only could be expected. I will not say that where the danger is proved, and the vessel is conducted by the asserted salvors into a place of safety, every presumption, in the necessary absence of other evidence, may not be made in their favour. But where it is proved by other evidence, as it is in this case, that no human force could have averted the danger unless a particular act was done, which act the same evidence shows was nearly impossible to have been accomplished, the court cannot say that the vessel was saved by the exertions of these libellants.

The general principle before stated is too firmly established by authorities to admit of controversy. "Salvage," say the court in the case of The Amelia, 1 Cranch [5 U. S.] 1, "is a compensation for actual services rendered to the property charged with it." And in the case of The Alerta, 9 Cranch [13 U. S.] 367, it is said, "salvage is allowed as a reward for the meritorious conduct of the salvor, and in consideration of a benefit conferred on the person whose property he has saved." It is also stated in the first of these cases, that not only must the service rendered be meritorious, but the possession taken of the thing saved must be lawful.

I am, upon the whole, of opinion that this is not a case of merit; and that the libellants have not shown that the brig was saved by their instrumentality. I have the pleasure to add that the venerable and learned judge of the district court of this district, concurs entirely in this opinion. The pro forma decree of the district court must therefore be affirmed, but without costs.

Case No. 2,850.

CLARKE et al. v. DRUET.

[4 Cranch, C. C. 142.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May Term, 1831.

ACCOUNT—PRACTICE.

An affidavit, annexed to an account, that it "is just and true as stated, and no part thereof has been paid, except what is credited," is sufficient to hold the defendant to bail.

Motion to rule the defendant [James Druet] to special bail, on the affidavit of Briscoe, one of the firm of Clarke & Briscoe, at the bottom of an account, "that the above account is just and true as stated, and that no part thereof has been paid, except what is credited."

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent) was of opinion that the affidavit was sufficient, within the rule laid down by this court in the case of Smith v. Watson [Case No. 13,124].

Mr. Morfit, for plaintiffs.

Mr. Wallach and Mr. Coxe, for defendant.

The following cases were referred to: Smith v. Watson [supra]; Jolly v. Rankin [Case No. 7,440]; Bartleman v. Smarr [Id. 1,074]; Traverse v. Hight [Id. 14,151]; Way v. Selby [Id. 17,302]; Dawson v. Boyd [Id. 3,667]; 1 Sell. Pr. 105, 108.

Case No. 2,851.

CLARKE v. The FASHION.

[2 Wall. Jr. 339.][2]

Circuit Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. Oct. 30, 1852.

ABANDONMENT IN ADMIRALTY.

1. Where a vessel is injured and sunk by collision in such a place, or under such circumstances, that for a small sum of money in comparison with the value of the vessel and cargo, she can be raised and repaired and the cargo recovered with slight damage, her owners have no right to abandon her and claim for a total loss.

[Distinguished in The D. Newcomb, 16 Fed. 277.]

2. The doctrine of abandonment as connected with cases of insurance, has not been imported into courts of admiralty.

The steamer Fashion had run very negligently into a small river sloop, the Syrian, of 43 tons, owned by Clarke, and had injured her hull and stranded her in the mud near one of the Philadelphia docks. As she lay keeled over, the damaged side of her was partially above water even at high tide, and at very low water a part of her keel fore and aft was exposed. Not having been much injured, she was thus in a position capable of being raised and repaired without great difficulty or cost. She was a common coal sloop, with a cargo of coal worth at most $225, which was not essentially injured by the submersion; though rendered dirty and less saleable; a small part also, which had been on deck, being lost. The owners of the steamer raised and repaired her; the cost of the raising being $150, and that of repairing her $50: and this, with the loss of $20 in bank notes which had been in the cabin; the injury or destruction of her sails, (not new) and whatever damage such a vessel and cargo would suffer from being "from four to seven days" under water as it came and went with the tide, and whatever loss might occur by the detention—all which the owners of the steamer asked to have ascertained and were willing to pay—appeared to constitute the whole loss resulting from the accident. The value of the sloop before the accident was about $1,600. Clarke, her owner, would not take her, thus repaired; but insisted upon abandoning her to the steamer as a total loss. She was accordingly now lying idle at the wharf; and whether she could be thus abandoned by Clarke insisting on her value, was the question before the court. The district court was of opinion and decreed that she might be.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

[2] [Reported by John William Wallace, Esq.]

Mr. Donnegan and Mr. Kane, for sloop.

The Columbus, 13 Jur. 285, is in point. There, the Tryal, a fishing smack, had been run down by the Columbus, and the last vessel having been condemned generally in damages and the matter referred to the registrar to assess them, the whole value of the smack was allotted by that officer and his merchants; but nothing was allowed by them for wages and victualing, nor for net profits for the employment of the smack. After the collision, the smack had been raised at the expense of the Columbus, and part of her stores, apparel and furniture saved; and she was now lying in harbour repaired. No exception appeared to have been taken originally by the owners of the Columbus to the registrar's report allowing full value; but the owners of the smack having excepted to the report because there was no allowance for wages, victualing and profits, the owners of the Columbus in turn excepted to being made to accept an abandonment at all, and to pay full value as for one. They insisted that under a decree of general condemnation merely the registrar had made a mistake in forcing the smack upon them and allowing as for a total loss, "and without regard to the hull of the smack or the stores," &c.: "that the smack might have been repaired, and put into a fit and serviceable condition in all respects, 'within a month after the collision at a moderate expense;' and that they were not liable, under the decree of the court for any other charges or expenses in respect of the damage than the charges and expenses which would have been incurred in repairing her and obtaining possession of her stores, &c.: and that all further loss and expenses were incurred by the owners' not taking possession of and repairing the smack, as he ought to have done." The reply made by the owners of the smack alleged that the owners "had a right to renounce and disclaim all title to the smack and stores." The exact point now before us was therefore raised on the pleadings, and directly in issue.

The court, Dr. Lushington, after casting out some speculations not very relative to his decree, says "On the whole I think the registrar and merchants have come to a just and equitable conclusion." And the reporter considered the point now before us as decided, for he says in his syllabus: "The owners of the ship doing the damage, raised, at their own expense, the vessel sunk, and offered her to her owner, who claimed as for a total loss; he refused to take her:—Held, that the owner of the sunken vessel was not bound to take her, and might proceed and recover as for a total loss."

John Fallon, for steamer.

The Columbus [supra] is really an authority in our favour, though cited with some apparent show against us. In the 1st place: the vessel appears from Dr. Lushington's opinion, to have been "sunk at sea," or on the sea coast. The extent of the injury as compared with her value, is not stated, but it must have been large, for it was not alleged even by the Columbus, that the smack could have been put into a serviceable condition in less than "a month after the collision;" and Dr. Lushington's opinion would indicate that it was so bad a case, that she was in danger, after the accident of being "utterly destroyed." He refers to the "state she was in," after raising, as obviously bad: and states that it was alleged she could have been repaired "at much less than the sum allowed;" i. e. much less than her whole value. 2nd. The owner of the Columbus seems to have been content with the registrar's decree, as it was made by that officer and the merchants. "He would not," says Dr. Lushington, "have disputed the report unless it had been objected to in the first instance by the owner of the smack." He had disputed it, therefore, only to have it stand. He disputed it as a defence against the smack's attempt to disturb it: and to balance the alleged error of the registrar in his favour, if there was one, by another not alleged, which was certainly against him. Dr. Lushington seizes this fact, and it is manifest that he did not mean to decide, as on a common law demurrer, the point which it may be admitted the pleadings technically raised, and was so far, "in issue." Ancient, common law, technical pleadings are not the forms of the admiralty, nor are the doctrines derived from their character applied as of course to the forms of this court. Dr. Lushington decides his case upon a natural equity; and somewhat as this court did in Stimpson v. The Railroads [Case No. 13,456], where they refused to disturb a verdict, because a blunder in one way was balanced by another blunder, in another. "On the whole," he says, "I think the registrar and merchants have come to a just and equitable conclusion." The processes by which they reached it were obviously not so satisfactory, and the difficulty was in regard to the point for which the case is cited on the other side as an authority. Speaking of "the objection by the owners of the smack," he says, "I have no desire to disturb the report on that ground." But speaking of the objection by the owners of the Columbus, he speaks differently; and there it is that he indulges "in speculations" which, though "not very relative to his decree," are very relative to the grounds of it, and to this and other cases in which his opinion might be cited. "With regard to the other branch of the case," he says, "I mean the objections taken by the owners of the Columbus—I admit the case to be one of great difficulty, in which it is impossible to lay down any general principles; and I am reluctant to make remarks that might lead to litigation in future cases, but I entertain no doubt whatever, as to the true principle on which we ought to act. I have no intention of importing into this court the principles that apply to insurance cases, with regard to abandonment. The rule on which I must proceed is this: if a vessel is sunk at sea, it is not incumbent on her owners to go to any expense whatever, for the purpose of raising her, thus incurring the risk of failure in bringing her to a place of safety. But I apply this only where a vessel is sunk, not where there is a chance of bringing her safe into port; for where a vessel is only partially damaged, and there is the slightest chance of bringing her into port, provided the expense does not exceed the value of the ship, the effort must be made." And while he says that on the whole, the registrar and merchants had come to an "equitable" conclusion, which he would not refer back; he says also, that he is not without doubt, what course either or both parties ought originally to have pursued. And he argues and speculates thus: The vessel having been "sunk at sea," her owner was under no obligation to raise her. The owner would, however, have run the risk of failing in a suit, if he chose to leave her, to sue here. But the owners of the Columbus did raise her, and then offered her to her owner, in "the state she was then in." And his honour thinks that if they had proceeded formally, each party would have applied for a sale, and that the proceeds might have been brought into court. Going back, however, to a general, though irregular, equity, reached by the registrar, he will not disturb it.

GRIER, Circuit Justice. The doctrine of abandonment, as connected with cases of insurance, has never been imported into courts of admiralty, and has no application to cases of collision. Where a vessel is injured by collision at sea, and then sunk, the owners are not bound to risk a greater loss than that of the vessel and cargo, on the mere possible chance or speculation of saving something, by endeavours to raise her, and are entitled to recover to the whole extent of their loss. But where she is only partially injured, and there is the slightest chance of bringing her into port, the effort must be made. The injured party cannot increase his claim for damages by a voluntary abandonment of his property, and make a profit on his own negligence. He cannot compel the owners of the colliding vessel to become the purchasers of his injured vessel, where she is only partially injured. His abandonment of his own property, confers no title on the offending party, who has no right to take possession or assume any ownership over a vessel, because he has injured it by collision. It is true, it would be his duty and policy to assist the injured vessel, if in his power, and to help save her, whether he should be ultimately liable for the injury or not.

The measure of damages in cases of collision, is the sum it would take to restore the injured vessel, and make her as good as she was before the collision. To this may be added, the loss of the daily hire of the boat during the time it would necessarily take to repair her, in the nature of demurrage. This amount is not to be decreased by introducing the rule of insurance cases, of a deduction of new for old, nor increased by consequential speculative damages, much less for those which are the consequence of the libellant's own negligence or voluntary dereliction of his property, and endeavours to convert a partial into a total loss. Collisions are daily occurring in our crowded ports, in which small sailing vessels are injured by steamboats. In such cases the steamboats are generally held liable for the damage. But I cannot countenance the doctrine, that if by such collision a hole is knocked in the side of a sloop or schooner, which causes her to sink in port, within a few feet of the wharf, where assistance can be obtained and the vessel raised and restored for a sum not exceeding eight or ten per cent. of her value, that the owner of such vessel shall abandon her, and convert a small injury into a total loss, and thus sell his vessel to the owners of the steamboat, or leave her to perish, without the slightest endeavour to save her.

Yet such is the case before us. The sloop is partially sunk, in port, close to the wharf, where persons are ready and willing to raise her for $150, and repair her for $50 more;

nevertheless, the libellant, instead of endeavouring to save his vessel, runs off to the admiralty and files his libel for a total loss, under pretence of abandonment. And when the respondents raise the vessel for him, and when she can be repaired for less than fifty dollars, he refuses to have anything to do with her, and leaves her tackle to the mercy of thieves, and her hull to rot from the effects of the weather. If a case could be produced which affirms the doctrine, that under such circumstances, the libellant should recover the whole value of his vessel, I should not hesitate to dissent from it. The case of The Columbus, 13 Jur. 285, relied on at the bar, supports no such doctrine. There the vessel was sunk at sea—the mariners could not bring her into port, and were forced to abandon her. And although the defendants did afterwards raise her, the court decided that, although the libellants were bound to use every endeavour to bring her into port, yet they were not bound to risk money, in uncertain attempts to raise a wreck at sea. The case is no precedent for the conduct of the libellant in this case; nor can he be permitted to speculate on the accident or misfortune, and compel the respondents to pay damages incurred by the libellant's negligence and folly. It is enough if the owners of the steamboat have to pay the damages consequential on the negligence of their servant, without being liable for those voluntarily and unnecessarily caused by the libellant. This case is therefore referred to the clerk of this court, to assess the damages according to the principles we have stated, with directions to examine and report any further testimony which may be produced on the subject.

Case No. 2,852.

CLARKE v. FOSS et al.

[7 Biss. 540;[1] 17 N. B. R. 261; 10 Chi. Leg. News, 211.]

District Court, W. D. Wisconsin. March, 1878.[2]

CONTRACTS FOR FUTURE DELIVERY—SECRET INTENTION—MUTUAL INTENT.

1. A contract for the delivery at a future time of personal property, which the seller has not on hand when the contract is made, nor any means of getting it, is not void for illegality.

2. The secret intention of one of the contracting parties not to fulfill his contract, uncommunicated to the other, is not enough to make the transaction illegal.

[Approved in Ward v. Vosburgh, 31 Fed. 14.]

3. The intent that such a transaction should be a mere betting on the market, without any expectation of actual performance, must be mutual, and constitute an integral part of the contract, in order to render it invalid.

[Approved in Ward v. Vosburgh, 31 Fed. 14.]

4. If the contracts were valid in their inception and not tainted with any gambling intent or device, a subsequent mutual settlement by the parties, by payment of differences, instead of by actual delivery, cannot make them void for illegality.

[Approved and applied in Gilbert v. Gauger, Case No. 5,412; Ward v. Vosburgh, 31 Fed. 15, 16; Cited in Third Nat. Bank v. Harrison, 10 Fed. 250; Jackson v. Foote, 12 Fed. 41; Hentz v. Jewell, 20 Fed. 593.]

5. Many authorities cited and commented upon.

[In bankruptcy. Bill by Charles Edward Clarke, assignee, etc., against Sylvester D. Foss and others.]

Thomas & Fuller, and H. M. Lewis, for complainants.

Dent & Black and Burr W. Jones, for defendants.

William P. Black, for defendants, cited the following authorities: In this case the lex loci contractus determines the rights of the respective parties. These contracts were made and to be performed in Chicago, and are therefore to be governed by the laws of the state of Illinois. Edw. Bills & N. §§ 177, 185; Stacy v. Baker, 1 Scam. 417. These contracts were valid under the decisions of Illinois. Pixley v. Boynton, 79 Ill. 351; Logan v. Musick, 81 Ill. 415; Wolcott v. Heath, 78 Ill. 433; Lyon v. Culbertson, 83 Ill. 33 (dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Dickey). Such contracts are also held valid by the courts of other states of the United States, and by the English decisions. Rumsey v. Berry, 65 Me. 570; Hibblewhite v. McMorine, 5 Mees. & W. 462; Petrie v. Hannay, 3 Term R. 418; Owen v. Davis, 1 Bailey, 315; Porter v. Viets [Case No. 11,291]; Lehman v. Strassberger [Id. 8,216]; Knight v. Fitch, 80 E. C. L. 566; Rosewarne v. Billing, 109 E. C. L. 316.

BUNN, District Judge. This is a suit in equity begun by the assignee of C. B. Stevens & Sons, bankrupts, to set aside and cancel six certain promissory notes for the sum of one thousand two hundred and thirty-one dollars and ten cents each, aggregating seven thousand three hundred and eighty six dollars and sixty cents, and a mortgage upon real estate in De Soto, in Vernon county, Wisconsin, to secure the same, executed by C. B. Stevens & Sons to the defendants, December 1, 1874, on the ground that the same are void as being given to secure a consideration arising out of certain option contracts for the sale and delivery of grain, which it is claimed were wagering contracts, under the laws of Illinois in force at that time.

The bankrupts were and for many years prior to the fall of 1874, when these transactions occurred, had been merchants and dealers in grain and produce upon the Mississippi river at De Soto, Wisconsin, and, as such, had for several years purchased and shipped wheat and other grain to the defendants, who were commission merchants at Chicago, and members of the board of trade for twenty years or more, doing business under the firm name of S. D. Foss & Co., and had, also, from time to time speculated in grain in the Milwaukee market, and also in the Chicago market, through the defendants, acting as their factors and commission men at that place. They were then in good financial circumstances, though with small capital; had a running account, and were in good credit and standing with S. D. Foss & Co. In October, 1874, the bankrupts ordered defendants, at different times, by telegraph, to make sales of grain for them upon the Chicago market for November delivery, amounting in the aggregate to seventy thousand bushels of corn, and five or ten thousand bushels of wheat. The defendants, upon receiving these orders, went upon the market in Chicago and executed them, by making, as was the custom, contracts, generally in writing, and in their own name, with different parties, for the sale of the grain for November delivery, in lots of five thousand, or multiples of five thousand bushels, and immediately and from time to time, notified bankrupts, by telegram and by letter, of what they had done, and their acts were fully ratified and approved by the bankrupts. No "margins" were required to be put up by C. B. Stevens & Co., as they had an account with defendants, and were accounted by them responsible.

[1] [Reported by Josiah H. Bissell, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

[2] [Affirmed by circuit court (opinion orally delivered, and nowhere reported).]

At about the time or a little before these contracts matured, as they did on the last day of November, the defendants performed a part of them on the behalf of C. B. Stevens & Sons, by a purchase and actual delivery of the grain to the parties to whom the sales were made. The evidence shows that, as to twenty thousand bushels of corn, there was an actual delivery of the grain, and as to ten thousand more, a delivery of warehouse receipts for that amount. As to the balance of the grain contracted to be sold, the defendants went upon the market and purchased it of different parties and had it ready for delivery; and then finding other parties who had similar deals for November purchases and sales, formed rings, or temporary clearing houses, through which, by means of a system of mutual offsets and cancellations that had grown up on the board, the contracts were settled by an adjustment of differences, saving an actual delivery and change of possession. It so happened that there was a considerable rise in the market price of corn during the month of November; and it was found that, after these transactions were closed out, there had been a loss to C. B. Stevens & Sons of something over ten thousand dollars, and which the defendants, having paid in cash for them on the purchase of the grain, debited to their account, according to the previous course of dealing between the parties.

The notes and mortgage in suit were soon afterwards given by the bankrupts to secure a portion of these sums so advanced by the defendants for them, including also about three hundred and seventy-five dollars, charged by S. D. Foss & Co. as their commissions. Unsecured notes were also given for three thousand dollars, balance of the ten thousand three hundred and eighty-six dollars and sixty cents indebtedness, which were afterwards paid by C. B. Stevens & Sons.

Two years afterwards, on November 19th, 1876, C. B. Stevens & Sons filed their petition in bankruptcy in this court, and were on the same day adjudged bankrupts. The assignee in bankruptcy brings this suit to set aside the notes and mortgage, and in substance claims that C. B. Stevens & Sons, at the time the orders for the sale of grain were made and executed in October, 1874, had no corn to sell, and no expectation of having any, with which to fill these contracts. That these facts were known to both parties, that is to the bankrupts and to the defendants, S. D. Foss & Co., and that it was understood by and between them at the time, that no grain was in fact to be delivered by C. B. Stevens & Sons, but that the contracts were to be settled by the payment or receipt of differences, according as the market should rise or fall in the month of November, and that they were thus mere wagers upon the November market, and, as such, contrary to law, and void, and that the notes and mortgage confessedly given to secure cash advances made by defendants, as the factors of the bankrupts, and with their approval, to pay the losses sustained upon these sales, should be cancelled and delivered up.

The question is whether this should be done. The question is, of course, a mixed question of fact and law. But I regard it as more a question of fact than of law; and I cannot help thinking, in looking through the cases on the subject, that more confusion and discrepancy has crept into them, from a failure to determine precisely the facts, than from any essential difference of opinion upon the abstract propositions of law applicable to them. This seems to be notably the case in Rumsey v. Berry, 65 Me. 570, where, in the trial court, instead of submitting the question of fact as to what the contract really was, it not being in writing, to the jury, instructions were asked, that, as a matter of law, the contract was a wagering contract. This instruction was properly refused, but there was a total failure to fairly submit the question of fact to the jury. It is not to be wondered at, that on an appeal to the supreme court, the facts not being fairly determined, the opinion sustaining the transaction as legal should have been given by a divided court, four judges concurring in the decision of the court, one judge delivering a dissenting opinion, one judge concurring in the dissenting opinion, and still another judge "inclined to concur" in it. If there had been an eighth judge, it might not be improbable that he would have been "inclined to concur" in both opinions. And all this simply because the facts themselves not having been determined, there was no tangible, well-defined question of law before the court.

The testimony in the case at bar is quite exhaustive and voluminous. It is confined, however, to a few points, and though somewhat conflicting, I have had no great difficulty in determining the facts to my satisfaction. It is proven that, at the time these contracts were made, C. B. Stevens & Sons had not the grain on hand at De Soto, where they purchased grain, or elsewhere, nor any expectation of having it, with which to fill the contracts.

Chas. B. Stevens, the active member of the bankrupt firm, testifies that at the time he telegraphed to defendants to purchase the corn, they had not a bushel on hand, and did not expect to have any to deliver on the orders; that they were not then dealing in corn at De Soto, or anywhere else, and never did except "scalping" in it at Chicago; that they had no agreement with defendants to ship corn to fill the orders, and that the understanding was that they were merely "scalping" or option deals, and were to be settled by paying or receiving the difference at the maturity of the contract, or before; that they never did deliver any corn on these sales; that defendants claimed that they bought in the options at different times and charged the difference to C. B. Stevens & Sons.

He says, also, that he had no conversation with defendants until after the transactions were closed up; that he then had a talk with both of them in relation to these deals; that it was on the board of trade at Chicago; that he asked M. H. Foss how they settled these options or "scalps," and if there was any wheat or corn delivered, and he said, no; that it was done generally by forming rings among members of the board, by clerks that they employed; that these clerks settled the deals between parties in the ring whom they may have sold to, or bought of, and by paying or receiving differences, as the case may be; that he thinks he asked him about the delivery of grain, and he said no grain ever passed. Witness says this was the kind of transaction he was operating in, as he understood it, and that no grain was to be delivered or received on these contracts, and that he understood them to be mere wagers on the future price of grain, and that defendants regarded them in the same light. That they continued this kind of deal with defendants until the fall of 1876.

On cross-examination he says, he commenced sending orders to defendants before he had any conversation with them; that it was a month after these transactions that he had the talk with them in Chicago; that defendants were their agents and commission merchants in Chicago; that he understood that Foss & Co. were liable for the damages for the non-fulfillment of the contracts they made for C. B. Stevens & Sons, and that they expected to make good to them the losses which they might incur in their behalf; and that if defendants failed to comply with the contracts they made for the bankrupts they would be deprived of their privileges on the board of trade; that Foss and he never talked about their agreement with one another in respect to these transactions, and that their conversation only related to the general course of business on the board of trade; that he (witness) understands that all contracts where wheat is sold, and not actually delivered, are wagering or betting contracts; and that all option contracts are betting contracts. The other Stevenses testify substantially in the same way as to their understanding of the transaction, but not as to the conversation with defendants in Chicago. And this is the substance of the testimony for the complainant. The defendants positively deny the conversation testified to by C. B. Stevens. They swear (in substance) that they had no understanding about these contracts, different from what might be inferred from what appears on the face of the transaction itself; that they were executed in their usual course of business, in the same manner that all the business on the board of trade relating to option contracts for future delivery of grain is transacted; that instead of understanding that no wheat or corn was to be delivered, their understanding was just the contrary; that the grain must be delivered according to the terms of the contract in all cases; that there was no option in the matter except as to the day in November on which the delivery was to be made; that if not delivered before, it must at all events be delivered on the last day of the month; they did not know whether Stevens & Sons had the grain to ship from De Soto, and did not stop to inquire, but supposed they might have it; that if they did not ship it, they (Foss & Co.) were bound to deliver the grain for them; that the contracts, according to universal custom on the board of trade, were made in the name of S. D. Foss & Co.; the name of their customer not being disclosed to the other party, or even inquired after. They testify that they have never dealt in what are called "puts" and "calls," such as are described in Ex parte Young [Case No. 18,145]; [In re Chandler, Id. 2,590],[3] and that such contracts, which give the option to deliver or receive, or not, are prohibited by the board of trade as well as by the laws of Illinois; that they made these contracts with various members of the board of trade, for and on behalf of the bankrupts, at their request, and for their benefit, in entire good faith, without any understanding that they were not to be performed, and that Stevens & Sons not shipping the grain, they performed their contracts by going upon the market and purchasing the wheat and corn; that as to thirty thousand bushels of corn they made a delivery, and as to the balance they closed out the deal in the manner before indicated, by mutual offset and adjustment of differences; that this adjustment of differences is a mere matter of convenience to the members of the board, and to their customers; that no person is under the least obligation to settle in that way, and that dealers may and often do insist upon an actual delivery of the grain, and that settlement frequently saves to their customers the cost of insurance and storage. That the object of forming these rings or clearing-houses, is to close out the transactions and get them off their books; and this is what they call "ringing it out." But that it frequently cannot be done in that way; as if, for any reason, one whose assistance is essential to complete the circle, prefers an actual delivery, in which case the ring is "burst;" and then each must perform his contract by actual delivery of the grain. Their testimony is full, and fair, and intelligent upon the questions at issue, and they are corroborated by several other witnesses, ex-presidents, ex-directors, ex-commissioners of appeals, and present members of the board of trade, and some of the persons with whom these contracts were made. The testimony is conclusive that this business was done much in the same manner that all the other business on the board of trade is done respecting contracts for the future delivery of grain. They all agree that there is no option except the option to deliver on any day of the month; and that the seller is bound, not only by the contract but by the rules of the board, to which it is made subject, to perform his contract by an actual delivery, unless excused from the performance by the act of the other party; and for a violation of this rule he is subject to the discipline of the board, and to be dismissed therefrom if he insists upon the violation of his contract.

[3] [From 10 Chi. Leg. News, 211.]

Now, which party is best corroborated in their understanding of the contract by the admitted facts of the case?

It is clear to me, by all odds, that the defendants are best corroborated.

It is very easy for either party to swear to what his own understanding of the contract was, but that standing alone is manifestly immaterial. The secret intentions of one party contrary to what appears on the face of the contract, and not communicated to the other party, cannot prevail to make a contract illegal which is otherwise valid. The real question is, what was the contract? and that implies an inquiry as to the mutual understanding and meeting of the minds of the parties. What was that? It is easy for a party to swear what his own understanding and intentions were, but when he comes to swear to the intentions and understanding of the other party, the consideration due to his testimony stands on an entirely different footing. He may be presumed to know his own intentions, but the evidence of the intentions of the other party should not be of a merely subjective character, but should consist of tangible facts and circumstances outside of his own consciousness, and a knowledge of which would be capable of satisfying other minds.

The conversation with the defendants testified to by Stevens, besides being denied by them, if proven, is not very strong evidence, for Stevens admits that this was a month after these transactions occurred, and was a general conversation relating to the general manner of doing business upon the board, and not to the transactions in question. But aside from the testimony as to this conversation, what is there in the case to show that S. D. Foss & Co. had any intention in regard to these contracts different from what is fairly evidenced by the contracts and transactions themselves, as they appear upon their face? The telegrams were orders in writing, and gave positive directions to sell grain; not to sell a privilege to deliver or not. The evidence shows at the time they were made there had been no previous communications or understandings in regard to these purchases. When received, Foss & Co. went upon the market and executed the orders by making written contracts of which the following is a blank copy, or verbal contracts to the same effect:

"Grain Contract. Chicago,—1874. We have this day sold A. B. & Co. ten thousand bushels of No. 2. corn, in store, at —— cents per bushel, to be delivered at sellers' option during the month of November, 1874, —— in lots of 5,000 bushels each. This contract is subject, in all respects, to the rules and and regulations of the Board of Trade of the city of Chicago. M—at—cts. S. D. Foss & Co. Per ——."

When these contracts matured, the defendants performed them by a delivery of the grain, except when, by the mutual arrangement of the parties concerned, the contracts were taken up and cancelled, and then they invariably paid in cash the damages which the law would have obliged them to pay upon a failure to perform their agreement; that is to say, the difference between the contract price and the market price on the day when delivery should have been made.

Now, in the absence of more convincing testimony, what the parties actually did is pretty good evidence of what they intended to do; and I must conclude that upon the face of the transaction, as shown by the acts and conduct of the parties, the evidence is very strong that these sales were bona fide sales, and not made with any intent, mutual between the parties, to violate the law.

The notes and mortgages sought to be set aside (as well as the original contracts for the sale of the grain, both as between the bankrupts and S. D. Foss & Co., and between S. D. Foss & Co. and the parties with whom they contracted), being in writing and perfectly fair on their face, and given for a full money consideration without any pretense of fraud or unfair dealing, the burden of making a clear case for setting them aside for illegality, lies with the complainant. There should be in his favor a clear preponderance in the weight of the evidence. Pixley v. Boynton, 79 Ill. 351. Contracts made and so deliberately entered into upon adequate consideration, without fraud, should not be set aside for light or transient reasons, or mere suspicion of being contrary to law. But instead of there being a preponderance of proofs in favor of the complainants, I am obliged to believe that the weight of evidence is the other way, and I must find as facts:

1. That C. B. Stevens & Sons, when they gave the orders for the sale of the grain, had no grain to deliver, no contracts made by which they expected to obtain it, and no expectation of ever having it delivered, by shipping it to the defendants.

They did expect and intend, however, that S. D. Foss & Co. would make these contracts much as they did, in fact, make them, and that they would, at their maturity, take care of them for C. B. Stevens & Sons in about the same manner they did take care of them, by a delivery of the grain, or by a settlement and adjustment of differences according to circumstances; and that whatever the profits were, they were to be credited with them, and if there were losses, such losses were to be borne by them.

2. That the defendants did not know that C. B. Stevens & Sons had not the grain, but had no reason to expect that they had or would obtain it to ship to Chicago in sufficient amounts to fill the orders, but intended that if C. B. S. & Sons did not ship the grain, they (defendants) would perform their contracts with the parties with whom they were severally made in C. B. Stevens & Sons' behalf, in good faith, by a delivery of the grain, unless delivery was dispensed with by the parties who had a right to insist upon a fulfillment of the contracts, and that there was no mutual understanding that the contracts were mere wagers on the price of grain for the November market, or that there was to be, in fact, no delivery, but only an adjustment of differences.

3. The understanding of the other parties to these contracts, to whom sales were made, as to their being performed, was the same as that of the defendants.

Having determined the facts, the law applicable to the case is not difficult.

1. The contracts sought to be set aside are written contracts, and the mortgage is under seal. Nevertheless, the weight of authority, and I think that of doctrine is, that you may go behind the writing and show what the real intent and meaning of the parties were; and if it appears that the writing does not express the real intent of the parties, but is merely colorable, and used as a cloak to cover a gambling transaction, the court will not lend its aid to enforce the contract, however fair on its face; or if securities are given, as in this case, will interfere on grounds of public policy and for the public good, rather than for the purpose of relieving a party who is himself particeps criminis in an inhibited transaction, to set aside such securities. In re Green [Case No. 5,751], and the cases there cited.

2. A contract for the future delivery of personal property, which the seller has not got when the contract is made, nor any means of getting it, is not void for illegality.

That was held in Porter v. Viets [Id. 11,291], and is the settled law. See Logan v. Musick, 81 Ill. 415; Hibblewhite v. McMorine, 5 Mees. & W. 462.

The seller is bound by the contract to deliver the goods, and if he fails he must pay damages.

Such contracts, though entered into for pure purposes of speculation, however censurable when made by those engaged in ordinary mercantile pursuits, and who have creditors depending for the payment of their just claims upon their prudent management in business, are nevertheless not prohibited by law.

As said in Porter v. Viets, supra, "People might differ about the propriety of making such a contract by one who did not know certainly where he was to acquire the property, but, having made it, the courts will compel him to abide by it." That case was on demurrer, and was in many essential respects similar to the one at bar.

3. The substance of the contract itself is what must control. The secret intention of one of the parties uncommunicated to the other party, not to fulfill his contract, is not enough to make the transaction illegal. The intent that it should be a mere betting upon the market, without any expectation of actual performance, must be mutual, and constitute an integral part of the real contract, in order to vitiate it.

Furthermore, supposing it had been the mutual intention of S. D. Foss & Co. and the bankrupts, that these contracts were not to be performed, I do not see that that would make them illegal, so long as the other parties to the contract did not participate in that illegal intention. S. D. Foss & Co., and C. B. Stevens & Sons did not constitute the parties to the contract. There was no contract for the sale and delivery of grain made between them. As between them the relation existed of principal and agent. S. D. Foss & Co. made the contract in their own name, but for, and in behalf of C. B. Stevens & Sons; and S. D. Foss & Co. and C. B. Stevens & Sons constitute but one party to the contract, whether it be considered as a contract between S. D. Foss & Co. and the parties in Chicago, with whom they dealt, or as a contract between C. B. Stevens & Sons and those same parties; and there is no evidence, whatever, to show that those other parties had any notice or knowledge of this gambling intent. On the contrary, they knew that Foss & Co., as the evidence shows, and some of these same parties testify, were men of high standing and responsibility on the board of trade, and would perform their agreements. Lehman v. Strassberger [Case No. 8,216], and Wolcott v. Heath, 78 Ill. 433, are directly in point.

4. If the original contracts for the sale of grain were liable to the taint of illegality, as charged, it does not necessarily follow that the notes and mortgage executed by one of the principals in the transaction, to secure the payment of moneys previously advanced by their agent to pay losses springing out of, and resulting from those original transactions, are contaminated with the same vice.

This question is fairly presented by this record, though the decision of the point is not necessary to the case, and I do not care to decide it. I shall, therefore, content myself with reference to some few high authorities, which hold such a contract valid. The leading English case, decided by Lord Mansfield, is Faikney v. Reynous, 4 Burrows, 2069. Following this are Petrie v. Hannay, 3 Term R. 418; Farmer v. Russell, 1 Bos. & P. 296.

The first case cited is a strong case, and though seemingly questioned by Lord Kenyon in Petrie v. Hannay, supra, has never been overruled, I believe, in England. Marshall, C. J., cites it approvingly in Armstrong v. Toler, 11 Wheat. [24 U. S.] 258. See, also, Owen v. Davis, 1 Bailey, 315, and the recent case before cited of Lehman v. Strassberger [supra], which is very much in point, I think. This, I believe, is undoubtedly the result of the English cases. How far the rule has been changed by statute, or by decisions in the several states, I do not care to inquire.

5. Whatever might be the judgment of discreet men as to the propriety of such purely speculative transactions as are disclosed by this record, undertaken by men in mercantile pursuits, I am unable to see, on general principles, any objection to them in point of law. The law does not undertake to prevent speculation. It does not undertake the Quixotic task of nicely governing men in all the relations of life, and compelling them to do, under all circumstances, what is prudent and reasonable. The truth is, men are speculative creatures as certainly as they are eating and sleeping ones. And, although it is undoubtedly true that much harm comes to the community from over speculation, it is more than doubtful if the world would be better off without speculators; or, if it would be, that the law can do much in the way of abolishing them.

As a common thing, business men are prone to regard their own judgment of the market as a part of their capital, and to a certain extent they have a right so to do. It is only with the more manifest abuses of the privileges of citizens in their dealings with one another, and when the evil touches and infects the public welfare, that the law assumes to interfere. In the main, commercial transactions must be left to be regulated by the higher and more inexorable laws which govern the trading world. If the transactions disclosed by this case are illegal, then, undoubtedly, a great part of the banking and clearing-house transactions in our great commercial centres are illegal also.

I am persuaded that to hold them so would be trenching too severely upon the business of the commercial world, without any corresponding benefit to be expected from it.

It might be a difficult task to lay down any single rule or draw a straight line which should define or divide all merely speculative from all pure gambling transactions, for it must be admitted that the same prime element of risk is common to both. But it has seemed to me that, according to any reasonable rule which it would be practicable to enforce, these transactions must fall on the side of legal speculations. They were carried on in good faith, and in the usual and ordinary course of business, upon the board of trade, which it seems undertakes to exercise a salutary control over its members; it appearing in evidence that if any member fails or refuses to perform his contract by delivery or receiving grain which he has agreed to deliver or receive, he is subject to the discipline of that body; and if the offending member is still refractory or contumacious, he is suspended or finally dismissed from the board; thus adding to the penalties which the law attaches to a violation of contracts, the sanction of a wholesome family discipline. The witnesses agree that what are called "puts" and "calls" are not allowed to members of the board, and that "scalpers" cannot live in that atmosphere, they bearing the same relation to that fraternity of commercial gentlemen that shysters do to full-bred lawyers. If that be so, certainly they are far enough asunder.

Then again, if we look at the equities of this case, aside from the special head of equity, under which the court, in the interest of the public good, will interfere to set aside and cancel securities given upon a gambling consideration, the general equities and intrinsic justice of the case are largely with the defendants. The whole business was originated and carried on at the instance and for the benefit of the bankrupts. Whatever of legal turpitude attaches to these transactions, it is evident that C. B. Stevens & Sons were not merely particeps criminis, but the principal offenders. When profits ensued, as they frequently did, they put them down in their own pockets. On one occasion it is in evidence that they represented to defendants that they made quite large amounts, something like ten thousand dollars out of these deals. Why then, if it was their deal, and they enjoyed the profits when there were profits, should they not bear the losses when the market turned against them and these fell to their lot, and not shuffle them off upon their agents who, it is not denied, had acted fairly and honorably with them?

Foss & Co. had no interest in these transactions, except their commissions, and instead of leading the bankrupts on in this business, the evidence of the bankrupts is that they discouraged them on every occasion. Their letters, introduced in evidence by the complainant, show that S. D. Foss & Co., from time to time, dissuaded the bankrupts from these speculating deals—told them they were taking too much risk, both in respect to wheat and corn; that there was a small stock of old corn in the market; that the new crop had not yet been moved; that there was danger of a "corner" being run, and sending prices up, and on one occasion protested that if they insisted upon taking such risks, they must employ other commission men. These letters were relied upon to show that the defendants understood these deals to be gambling transactions; but to my mind they simply show a proper appreciation, on the part of the defendants, of the risks which men, in the circumstances and business of the bankrupts, were taking on themselves, and a due consideration for the interests of their principals in that behalf. But C. B. Stevens & Sons, relying confidently on their own judgment and sources of knowledge, as men are inclined to do, continued the business until the tide turned against them. Under these circumstances, one would say that the commonest kind of honesty that passes current among men should require C. B. Stevens & Sons to pay these losses, and not shift them off upon their factors. Of course the assignee stands, as far as legal right goes, in no better case than the bankrupts; and it is due to the bankrupts to say that, as far as they are personally concerned, they have never objected to the payment of these claims, though they are now the main witnesses for the complainant, and in their testimony say they want him to succeed. The assignee, of course, in the interest of the creditors, has only done his duty in bringing these matters before the court for adjudication.

I have not undertaken to review the decisions upon this subject. I have not thought it essential. Those of the highest tribunal in Illinois, though not perhaps entirely reconcilable, I think are so in the main, and go to support the transaction disclosed by the case at bar. Whatever discrepancy there is, as I have before remarked, arises more from the facts than from the law. The most that can be said is, that different courts have come to different conclusions upon different states of facts. This cannot be wondered at, and is unavoidable. How far the judgment of the court, in a given case upon the facts, may be influenced by its opinion of the law and the essential justice of the case, cannot always be known. I confess I have a strong predilection in favor of holding men of full age and right mind to their contracts deliberately entered into upon full and adequate money considerations, without deceit or imposition, and when the consequences of their contracts, however ill-advised, are mainly personal to themselves.

I think the cases cited of Wolcott v. Heath, 78 Ill. 433, Pixley v. Boynton, 79 Ill. 351, and Logan v. Musick, 81 Ill. 416, express the law of that state on the subject, and are authorities in the case at bar.

The case of Lyon v. Culbertson, 83 Ill. 33, in which Justice Dickey delivers a rigorous dissenting opinion, I am told was decided before the cases in the 79th and 81st Illinois Reports. However that may be, and whether the decision be good law or not, I do not see that it is necessarily at variance with the other cases, nor that it attempts to overrule or qualify them in the least. That seemed to turn on a question that is not presented in this case.

There is no failure to perform, or of offer to perform, on the part of S. D. Foss & Co., on any of the contracts which they made; nor anything in the contracts dispensing with an offer to perform.

Again, it must be incontestible, that if the contracts were valid in their inception, and not tainted with any gambling intent or device, a subsequent mutual settlement by the parties, which took the place of actual performance, cannot have the retroactive effect of making them void for illegality. If the contracts were void at all, they must have been void when made. The subsequent conduct of the parties may, and should be considered as evidence tending to show what the real contracts were when entered into; but if they were originally valid, no subsequent act of the parties can have the effect to render them obnoxious to the taint of illegality as being gambling contracts.

I have not overlooked the case of In re Green, supra, decided by my learned and lamented predecessor.

I have not had occasion to review the evidence from which the conclusions of fact in that case were drawn; and it is enough to say that upon the findings of fact made, the law is undoubtedly correctly stated.

Bill dismissed.

[NOTE. It is stated by Dyer, District Judge, in Ward v. Vosburgh, 31 Fed. 15, that an appeal was taken from the judgment herein to the circuit court, and that in an oral opinion delivered by Drummond, Circuit Judge, the contracts involved in the foregoing case were sustained, and the decision of the district court affirmed.]

Case No. 2,853.

CLARKE v. HEMPSTONE.

[Cited in Brook v. Brown, Case No. 1,931. Nowhere reported; opinion not now accessible.]

Case No. 2,854.

CLARKE v. JANESVILLE.

[1 Biss. 98:[1] 4 Am. Law Reg. 591.]

District Court,[2] D. Wisconsin. May Term, 1856.

RAILROAD BONDS AND COUPONS.

1. A bond under seal given by a city to a railroad company located in the same state cannot be sued in the federal courts, even by an assignee.

2. Interest coupons annexed to such a bond, and referring to it have no independent vitality, and, even though made payable to bearer, come under the same rule.

3. Such coupons are not negotiable paper. They are merely evidences of interest, and it is upon the bonds alone that the interest is recoverable, and action of assumpsit will not lie.

Declaration in assumpsit upon the common counts; to which the general issue was pleaded. In support of the issue on the part of the plaintiff were offered in evidence several bonds of the city of Janesville to the Rock River Valley Union Railroad Company, with coupons or interest warrants annexed. The bonds were issued in the year 1853, for one thousand dollars each, payable in twenty years, with interest at the rate of eight per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually, at the city of New York, signed by the mayor of the city, with the seal of the city annexed, and countersigned by the treasurer of the city. They are payable to the said railroad company or assigns, and on the day of their date they purport to have been assigned by the president of said company to ——, or bearer. Printed on the same sheet of paper, with each bond, are forty coupons, or interest warrants, each for forty dollars, for semi-annual interest, according to the condition of the bond. These coupons are signed by the treasurer of the city, and are made payable to the bearer, in regular succession of every six months, for twenty years. This suit is to recover the interest that had accrued on these bonds since their date.

To this evidence the defendant's counsel objected for several reasons, of which the following are here noticed. 1. These coupons or interest warrants have no legal validity independent of the bonds to which they are annexed, and they pass to the assignee of said bonds. 2. There is no law in this state empowering an assignee of a bond or specialty to maintain a suit in his own name. 3. This court has no jurisdiction of this cause, the jurisdiction being excluded by section 11 of the judiciary act of 1789 (1 Stat. 78). These bonds were issued in pursuance of an act of the legislature of Wisconsin, entitled "An act to incorporate the city of Janesville," approved March 19, 1853 (P. & L. Laws 1853, c. 93). By section 7 of said act, "the common council shall have power to submit to the legal voters the question, whether said city shall take stock in any railroad running to, or passing through said city. And if a majority of the votes cast on any such question be in favor of taking stock, then the common council shall, by resolution to be entered on the city records, authorize the mayor to subscribe for the city the amount of stock voted to be taken." And by section 9, "the common council shall have power to issue the bonds of the city, with coupons or interest warrants attached, drawing not more than ten per cent. interest, to pay the stock so subscribed, and shall have power to levy a special tax on the taxable property in said city, to pay the interest on such bonds, and also the principal, when the same becomes due. But the common council shall not have power to dispose of such bonds for less than the face thereof." The Rock River Valley Union Railroad Company and the city of Janesville are corporations created by the laws of Wisconsin; and they are located and doing business in said state.

Browne & Ogden, for plaintiff.
Noggel & Rexford, for defendant.

MILLER, District Judge. The clause of the eleventh section of the judiciary act, in regard to the jurisdiction of the federal courts, is this: "Nor shall any district or circuit court have cognizance of any suit to recover the contents of any promissory note or chose in action in favor of an assignee, unless a suit might have been prosecuted in such court, to recover the said contents, if no assignment had been made, except in cases of foreign bills of exchange." This section is restrictive of jurisdiction contemplated by the third article of the constitution of the United States, which provides that the judicial power shall extend to controversies between citizens of different states. The constitution has defined the limits of the judicial power of the United States, but has not prescribed how much of it shall be exercised by the circuit or district courts. These courts were created by statute, in pursuance of the constitution, and can have no jurisdiction but such as the statute confers. Sheldon v. Sill, 8 How. [49 U. S.] 441. It is well understood, by those experienced in the jurisprudence of the United States, that congress has conferred upon the federal courts but a portion of the jurisdiction contemplated by the constitution. This prohibition was inserted in the law for the purpose of relieving the federal courts, as much as possible, of enforcing local contracts; and also of preventing assignments of choses in action to non-residents, for the purpose of rendering a defense upon the merits or a set-off less available to defendants.

A suit might be sustained in this court, by the plaintiff against the defendant, to recover possession of these bonds in specie, or damages for their wrongful caption or detention; for this law has no application to such a suit by the assignee of a chose in action, but only to a suit or action to recover the contents. Deshler v. Dodge, 16 How. [57 U. S.] 622. So in Smith v. Kernochen, 7 How. [48 U. S.] 198, an assignee of a mortgage between parties of the same state, maintained ejectment against the mortgagor to recover possession of the mortgaged premises.

[1] [Reported by Josiah H. Bissell, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

[2] In Wisconsin, the United States district court had, until the regular organization of the circuit court, in 1862, circuit court jurisdiction.

In Sheldon v. Sill, supra, it is decided, that a bond for a debt with a mortgage to secure it, is a chose in action; and that the assignee of a mortgage between citizens of the same state, cannot maintain a bill in chancery to foreclose, when the mortgagee cannot, because it is a suit to recover the contents of a chose in action. Nor have the federal courts cognizance of a suit to recover the contents of any promissory note or other chose in action, in favor of an assignee, unless a suit might have been prosecuted in such courts to recover the said contents, if no assignment had been made, except in cases of foreign bills of exchange. This restrictive clause is literally construed. Gibson v. Chew, 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 315; Dromgoole v. Farmers' & Merchants' Bank, 2 How. [43 U. S.] 241.

It is contended that these bonds were intended for negotiation as promissory notes, and that they were so put in circulation by the assignment. In pursuance of the act of incorporation of the city of Janesville, these bonds were given to the railroad company, in payment of stock in said company, subscribed for by the city. The law did not require the railroad company to accept these bonds in payment of the stock; nor did it authorize them to be given to any particular person or corporation, or to be put in circulation as negotiable paper. The bonds might either be given to any person or corporation who would furnish their amount at par, as a loan to the city, or to the railroad company in payment of the stock. The act prohibited the common council from disposing of them for less than their face; thereby placing the city of Janesville, as a stockholder by means of these bonds on an equality with the other stockholders who paid in cash. And whether the assignment of the bonds is equitable or legal, the effect thereof, as to the assignee, in regard to the jurisdiction of the court, is the same. Sere v. Pitot, 6 Cranch [10 U. S.] 332. The assignment of these bonds is not to the plaintiff by name, but to ——, or bearer, leaving the space for their or any other names to be inserted. This may be proper in a financial point of view, to save the necessity of a formal assignment at each transfer. But these bonds are made to the railroad company or its assigns; and an assignment is necessary to pass them. The railroad company being a corporation created by the laws of this state, and located and doing business therein, cannot maintain a suit upon these bonds to recover their contents or the interest accrued on them, either in its own name or in that of an assignee.

When the plaintiff has a legal right to sue, the court will not inquire into the residence of those who may have an equitable interest in the demand, as in Bonnafee v. Williams, 3 How. [44 U. S.] 574, where it is decided that the court has jurisdiction where a note is made by a citizen of one state, and payable to another citizen of the same state or bearer, and the party bringing the suit is a citizen of a different state, although upon the face of the note it was expressed to be for the use of persons residing in the state in which the maker and payee lived. But in its inception, a bond should be made payable to some certain obligee, and cannot be made payable like a note or bill to bearer. [Ann. Dig. 1851, p. 70, § 63;][3] Marsh v. Brooks, 11 Ired. 409. And the legal right to recover on a bond is in the obligee. Irish v. Johnston, 1 Jones [11 Pa. St.] 483. These bonds are under the seal of the corporation of the city, and are specialties, and not negotiable as bills of exchange and promissory notes, either by the law merchant or by statute. All interest in them, either legal or equitable, must pass from the obligee by assignment or endorsement. By the assignment of these bonds, the plaintiff may have acquired an interest in them sufficient to control them, and to receive their contents, but he cannot sue in his own name. There is no statute authority in this state for the assignment or transfer of a bond or specialty, whereby the assignee or holder may become the legal owner, and be enabled to sue in his own name. The law authorizing the execution, and delivery of these bonds, and the consideration expressed show the railroad company to be the legal obligee, which can be the only plaintiff in a suit upon them, either for principal or interest, in the absence of a law enabling an assignee to become a legal party. In the case of Irvine v. Lowry, 14 Pet. [39 U. S.] 293, the note in suit was made by Lowry, payable to Irvine or order, in the notes of the Lumbermen's Bank, and was endorsed to the bank. The supreme court in the opinion say, "The paper on which the suit is brought is not negotiable by the usage or custom of merchants. It is payable to order. The promise is to pay so many dollars, but not to pay any certain sum of money. It is a promise to pay the amount 'in the office notes of the Lumbermen's Bank at Warren,' which are not money, and, at most, a chattel. Not being a promissory note, either by the law merchant, or by the statute of Anne, or the kindred act of assembly of Pennsylvania, it is not negotiable by indorsement; and not being under seal, it is not assignable by the act of assembly on that subject relating to bonds. The bank, therefore, cannot sue in their own name, by virtue of the endorsement of Irvine in blank; nor could they so sue if it was specially endorsed to them, because the legal right of action would still remain in Irvine, though the equitable interest in the thing promised may have passed to the bank."

[3] [From 4 Am. Law Reg. (O. S.) 591.]

So it is in this case, in the absence of a statute providing for an assignment of bonds, and for the assignee maintaining suit in his own name. The legal right of action remains in the railroad company, the obligee, though the equitable interest in the contents of the bonds may have passed to the plaintiff.

It may be said, that, although these obligations have been issued by a corporation having a seal, and which is thereto annexed, they should be considered as negotiable choses in action. But it is now well understood, that corporations can issue promises in writing to pay money, and can contract debts, without the use of their seal. The coupons call these papers certificates; but the law, authorizing the council to issue them, terms them bonds, and on their face they have the form of bonds. But let them be technically bonds or not, they can only be transferred by assignment.

This suit is in assumpsit upon these coupons, for the semi-annual interest payable before the date of the summons. The plaintiff has proceeded upon them as promissory notes or negotiable paper payable to bearer; and he contends that the law restrictive of our jurisdiction is not applicable to them. It is well settled, that this provision of law does not extend to notes payable to bearer; upon the ground, that the original promise is to pay any person, who may happen to be the bearer; and that as the interest in such a note passes by mere manual delivery, the holder cannot therefore be said to claim by virtue of an assignment, and is not affected by the disabilities of the nominal payee. Bullard v. Bell [Case No. 2,121]; Bank of Kentucky v. Wister, 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 318. But is the original promise or obligation of the city of Janesville in these coupons? The charter of the city authorized the common council to issue bonds, with coupons or interest warrants annexed. In pursuance of that law, and a resolution of the common council, bonds were executed by the mayor, as the head and president of the council and corporation, under the corporate seal, for one thousand dollars each, payable in twenty years, with interest at the rate of eight per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually at the city of New York, with forty coupons or interest warrants attached to each bond, representing the interest condition of the bond.

The bonds are signed by the mayor and countersigned by the treasurer of the city. The coupons or interest warrants are signed by the treasurer alone; and they do not purport to be obligations of the city through the common council, but have a direct reference to the bond, using the word certificate, to which it is attached. There is no question, that by the face of the bonds, in connection with the coupons, the interest is recoverable semi-annually, as it becomes payable. The coupons are appendages to the bonds for convenience in receipting for interest paid, and also as evidence to the purchaser of the bonds of the non-payment of any previous interest; and they pass by assignment of the bond to which they are attached. They had no legal force or validity at their inception independent of the bonds; and it is upon the bonds alone that the interest is recoverable. They draw the attention of the court directly to the bond, to which they are attached, as the original contract. The bonds are special contracts of a city, in pursuance of a local law, for a local and specified purpose, which the court must disregard in pronouncing the coupons negotiable paper payable to anybody, and recoverable by the holder, while they continue annexed to the bonds.

For these reasons the evidence is rejected and the suit dismissed.

NOTE [from original report]. If the coupons are so made as to be separable from the bonds and negotiable, the owner can sue on them without producing the bonds, or being interested in them. Thomson v. Lee Co., 3 Wall. [70 U. S.] 327; Clark v. City of Janesville, 10 Wis. 136; City v. Lamson, 9 Wall. [76 U. S.] 477. Coupon disconnected from bond is not negotiable, unless such intention appears on its face. Myers v. York & C. R. Co., 43 Me. 232; Crosby v. New London, etc., R. Co., 26 Conn. 121. Coupons may be detached from the bonds which they accompany, and transferred or recovered on, without production of the bonds or showing title to them. National Exch. Bank v. Hartford, etc., R. Co., 8 R. I. 375; McCoy v. Washington Co. [Case No. 8,731]; Com. of Virginia v. Chesapeake, etc., Canal Co., 32 Md. 501; Burroughs v. Richmond Co., 65 N. C. 234; Knox Co. v. Aspinwall, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 539; Murray v. Lardner, 2 Wall. [69 U. S.] 110; Thomson v. Lee Co., 3 Wall. [70 U. S.] 327. All persons must inquire into power of corporation to make contract and authority of its officers. Hodges v. Buffalo, 2 Denio, 110; Taft v. Pittsford, 28 Vt. 286; City of Leavenworth v. Rankin, 2 Kan. 357; Mayor, etc., of Baltimore v. Reynolds, 20 Md. 1; Wallace v. City of San Jose, 29 Cal. 180; State v. Kirkley, 29 Md. 85, 111; State v. Haskell, 20 Iowa, 276; City of Bridgeport v. Housatonic R. Co., 15 Conn. 475; Mayor, etc., of Baltimore v. Eschbach, 18 Md. 276; Dill v. Inhabitants of Wareham, 7 Metc. [Mass.] 438. Consult Mygatt v. City of Green Bay [Case No. 9,998]; Luling v. Racine [Id. 8,603]; Goedgen v. Supervisors of Manitowoc Co. [Id. 5,501], to appear hereafter in this series; and for a full citation of authorities on the question of municipal bonds, see Schenck v. Supervisors of Marshall Co. [Id. 12,449], to appear in subsequent volume of these reports.

Case No. 2,855.

CLARKE v. JOHNSON.

[16 Blatchf. 495;[1] 4 Ban. & A. 403; 17 O. G. 1401.]

Circuit Court, E. D. New York. July 21, 1879.

PATENTS—"ELASTIC PACKING"—CONSTRUCTION.

The first claim of the reissued letters patent, No. 3,579, granted, August 3d, 1869, to Nathaniel Jenkins, for an "improvement in the manufacture of elastic packing," namely, "an elastic packing composed of at least four-tenths of finely pulverized refractory earthy or stony material, intimately mingled with, and held together by, rubber prepared for vulcanizing, and then vulcanized, as and for the purpose described," includes only soft vulcanized rubber, and does not include hard rubber, or vulcanite, so called, made of rubber mingled with 25 per cent., or over, of sulphur, and then vulcanized.

[In equity. This bill was filed by Thomas W. Clarke, trustee, etc., against John Johnson.]

Thomas William Clarke, for plaintiff.

Alexander Cameron and James H. Gilbert, for defendant.

BENEDICT, District Judge. This action is brought to obtain an account and also an injunction to restrain the defendant from manufacturing and selling a certain kind of rubber disc used as packing for steam joints. The bill sets forth letters patent owned by the plaintiff, issued to Nathaniel Jenkins, and known as reissue No. 3,579, dated August 3d, 1869, for an "improvement in the manufacture of elastic packing." It also sets forth a decree rendered by the circuit court of the United States for the southern district of New York, in the year 1871, rendered in an action brought by the plaintiff against this defendant, upon this same patent. 9 Blatchf. 516 [Jenkins v. Johnson, Case No. 7,271]. It also sets forth a decree upon pleadings and proofs, rendered by the circuit court of the United States for the district of Massachusetts, on the 22d of March, 1872, in an action brought by this plaintiff upon this same patent against George W. Walker and another. 1 O. G. 359 [Jenkins v. Walker, Case No. 7,275]. General acquiescence is also averred, and infringement by the defendant.

The first claim of the patent sued on, which is the only claim here involved, is in the following language: "An elastic packing composed of at least four-tenths of finely pulverized refractory, earthy or stony material, intimately mingled with, and held together by, rubber prepared for vulcanizing, and then vulcanized, as and for the purpose described."

Upon this bill and certain affidavits, the plaintiff now moves for a preliminary injunction. The defendant reads, in opposition to the motion, his answer, in which the equity of the bill is denied, and he puts in evidence, in support of his denial of novelty, a number of patents prior in date to the invention of Jenkins, and, in support of his denial of infringement, a number of affidavits, and he insists that this evidence either defeats the Jenkins patent entirely, upon the ground of want of novelty, or compels a construction of it so limited as to exclude from its scope the article which the defendant now manufactures.

In a case like this, where it appears that the patent sued on has been twice sustained upon final hearing, in contested actions, before different courts, in one of which the defendant was the same person who is defendant here, it can hardly have been expected, that, upon a preliminary motion like the present, a construction would be given in conflict with any construction given to the patent by the distinguished judges who were called on to consider the patent in the former cases set up in the bill. Neither would it, in my opinion, be proper to deny the present application because of any doubt in regard to the validity of the patent, that the defendant may consider to have been raised by the patents prior in date to the Jenkins invention or the rubber balls which have been now, for the first time, proved. For, these patents, now newly exhibited, and the prior manufacture of the rubber balls, could have been proved by the defendant in the former action against him, but were not then relied upon. No evidence has been here produced to show that any articles were ever made in accordance with any of these patents, except by way of experiment. Nor do the affidavits show the employment of the rubber balls for the purpose of resisting the action of heat in steam valves. Moreover, some eight years have elapsed since a decree was rendered against the defendant for an infringement of this patent. During all this period he has, as he says, acquiesced in the validity of the patent. During all this period it has occurred to no person that the patent could be defeated by the production of the patents that are now exhibited for that purpose, although packing was constantly made under the patent, and sold publicly as a patented article, during all this period.

Under such circumstances, I should have little hesitation in compelling the defendant to await a final decree before putting upon the market an article adapted for precisely the same purpose as the Jenkins packing, and very similar thereto in appearance, if his right to manufacture this article depended solely upon the question of the invalidity of the Jenkins patent for want of novelty. But another, and, as I view it, more serious ground of defence is the denial of infringement. This denial raises the question whether the Jenkins patent covers the packing which the defendant now seeks to make and sell. The nature of the defendant's present manufacture is not left in doubt, upon the affidavits, although the evidence in regard to it is not, in all respects, harmonious.

[1] [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

The moving papers show valve seat discs made by the defendant, similar in form and general appearance to those made under the Jenkins patent, and adapted to accomplish the same purpose, viz., to constitute an elastic packing for steam joints and valves, that will render the valve tight and successfully resist the corrosive action of the steam. The moving papers also present an analysis of the defendant's discs, according to which they are compounded of the following elements, viz., rubber, 38.97 per cent.; sulphur, 7.23; bone black, 52.89; sand, dirt, .91. This analysis shows, according to the somewhat ambiguous statement of the plaintiff's witness, "a rubber packing compound consisting of more than 40 per cent., (including the sand,) of refractory mineral matter, with 52 per cent. of carbon and about 6 per cent. of surphur in a pulverized state, intimately incorporated with, and held together by, vulcanized india rubber or caoutchouc." The defendant denies that his discs are compounded as stated by the plaintiff's witness, and says that he never made, sold or used such a compound as the plaintiff describes, but that all the discs he has made for sale or use have been made upon the following formulas: para rubber, 10 lbs.; gutta-percha, 5 lbs.; sulphur, 4½ lbs.; bone black, 22½ lbs.—or para rubber, 14 lbs.; gutta-percha, 7 lbs.; sulphur, 6 lbs.; bone black, 28 lbs. These formulas the defendant says he has always used, except that he has sometimes slightly increased the quantity of sulphur, so as to bring it up to the proportion of 5 ounces of sulphur to 1 pound of rubber and gutta-percha together.

I suppose there is no good reason to doubt the truth of the defendant's statements as to the compound of which his discs are composed, and that the subject of the present controversy may justly be considered to be valve seats for steam joints, made as the defendant says he makes them. The question then first arising is, whether the decree rendered in the action between the same parties upon the same patent precludes all enquiry in regard to the right of the defendant to make and sell valve seats such as he says he is now making. Here the burden is upon the plaintiff; and, accordingly, he has exhibited the pleadings and decree in the former action between these same parties, together with an affidavit tending to show that the valve seat discs which formed the subject of such former suit were similar in character to the discs which the defendant now claims to be making. In opposition, the defendant produces two affidavits, tending to show that the subject-matter of the former suit was a disc differing in character from the discs now being made by the defendant, in this, that it contained a portion of oxides of lead, copper and tin, which, in the process of manufacture, absorbed a portion of the sulphur used, and that the compound, when vulcanized, consisted of a skeleton of refractory matter equal or exceeding 40 per cent. of the mass, mingled with, and held together by, the other portion of the mass, which other portion consisted of soft rubber. The formulas of the defendant, as above given, contain no metallic oxides, or other element capable of absorbing the sulphur in the process of manufacture, and produces a packing that consists of a skeleton of refractory material, exceeding 40 per cent. of the mass, mingled with, and held together by, the other portion, which other portion is vulcanite, as distinguished from soft rubber.

Vulcanite and soft rubber are different things, having different properties, and are in no sense equivalents. Vulcanite is produced when rubber is mingled with 25 per cent., or over, of sulphur, and subjected to the vulcanizing process. Soft rubber is produced when the sulphur mingled with the rubber is less than 25 per cent. This difference in the proportion of sulphur absorbed by the rubber, and this only, as I understand it, causes the difference in the product. The introduction of a portion of vulcanite, and the withdrawal of soft rubber from the compound, would, therefore, effect a substantial change in the article. Not only would the elements of the compound be changed in respect to the proportion of sulphur employed, but the result would be different. The proofs show, that the capacity of the compound to resist steam is greatly increased by such a change, and the packing is thereby rendered more efficacious.

It must follow, therefore, that if, in the compound that formed the subject of the former suit, the proportion of sulphur absorbed by the rubber in the process of manufacture was less than 25 per cent., the subject-matter of the former suit was substantially different from that here involved. It is impossible to discover, from the face of the record in the former suit, so far as here produced, what was the character of the disc involved in the proceedings. Upon the affidavits read, the weight of evidence is in favor of the defendant's contention, that the discs complained of in the former suit were so compounded that 25 per cent. of sulphur was not absorbed by the rubber, and that those discs did not exhibit any vulcanite, but were refractory material held together by soft rubber instead of vulcanite. Indeed, the bill filed in this action no where avers that the former suit relates to matter similar in character to that now complained of, and the bringing of this suit seems to indicate that the packing in question must be substantially different from that adjudicated upon in the former action; for, if the defendant had simply resumed the manufacture that was forbidden by the former decree, a new action would be unnecessary.

The burden being upon the plaintiff, and it not being made to appear that the matter now in controversy formed the subject of the former suit, the decree rendered therein can avail nothing upon the question of infringement that is raised here. In so far as concerns the infringement charged, the present is, therefore, to be treated as a new case, dependent, for its determination, upon a question that did not arise in the former suit against this defendant, viz., whether a rubber packing compound, consisting of a skeleton of refractory material, forming at least 40 per cent. of the mass, the remainder being vulcanite, mingled through the mass, holding the same together, and forming an elastic packing capable of resisting the action of steam, is within the scope of the Jenkins patent.

This question does not appear to have received the consideration of any court, nor does any allusion seem to have been made to it in either of the cases referred to, where the patent was sustained at final hearing. There is, in the opinion delivered by Judge Shepley, the expression, "hard rubber," but I do not understand the reference to be to vulcanite. The phrase is used by Judge Shepley, as it has been here, by the plaintiff's counsel, to mean, not vulcanite, but rubber that is hard to compression. And I find no expression, in his opinion, indicating that his attention had been called to the question upon which this case, as I view it, must turn.

That question—to repeat it in a slightly different form—is, whether the invention of Jenkins, as described in his patent, embraces a packing composed of 40 per cent. and over of refractory material, mingled with, and held together by, vulcanite, so as to form an elastic packing capable of resisting the corrosive effect of steam. This is a question to be determined by the language of the patent, read in the light of the evidence in respect to the state of the art. The language of the claim in the patent has been already given, and seems clearly to be broad enough. Rubber, mingled with 25 per cent. and over of sulphur, and then vulcanized, is as plainly covered by the words, "rubber prepared for vulcanizing and then vulcanized," as is rubber mingled with less than 25 per cent. of sulphur. These words, taken by themselves, are broad enough to cover both compounds, but the difficulty is, that they must be read in connection with the words, "as described," by which words reference is made to the specification for the meaning of the phrase, "rubber prepared for vulcanizing," used in the claim. Turning, then, to the specification, it is found carefully to state the limits of the proportion of sulphur to be used, and fixes that limit at "from one to three per cent." In all places where the proportion of sulphur to be used is spoken of, the proportion is less than the proportion absolutely necessary if the product is intended to be vulcanite. The language of the specification, therefore, plainly excludes from the scope of the patent a compound where the proportion of sulphur used is such that the product is vulcanite.

The difference between vulcanite and soft rubber was well known to the patentee. Equally well known was the fact, that, by using less than 25 per cent. of sulphur, in combination with rubber, soft rubber is produced, and, by using 25 per cent. and over of sulphur, in combination with rubber, vulcanite is produced. If, therefore, Jenkins had considered his invention to include a packing where the refractory material was to be mingled with, and held together by, vulcanite, it is not conceivable that his specification would have fixed the limit of the sulphur to be used at from one to three per cent.

In behalf of the plaintiff, it is said, that Jenkins' patent does not provide that the formula should be simply of soft rubber, but the patent says: "With the following ingredients the proportion would be within the following limits," and then gives the limits of sulphur at "from one to three per cent." There is added the statement: "I do not confine myself to these exact proportions, but consider the composition most accurately stated by the limitations given before." These limitations exclude a composition which would produce vulcanite. This statement shows, that the idea of so compounding his packing as that it should be refractory matter mingled with, and held together by, vulcanite, had not occurred to Jenkins. Read in the light of the specification, the claim of the patent covers simply an elastic packing composed of at least four-tenths of finely pulverized refractory, earthy or stony matter, intimately mingled with, and held together by, rubber prepared for vulcanizing, by using less than 25 per cent. of sulphur.

This understanding of the patent derives support from the circumstance, that no evidence is produced to show, that, under the Jenkins patent, a packing has ever been produced where the refractory material was held together by vulcanite; and from the further fact, so strongly stated by various witnesses, that such a packing as the defendant now makes was never known until within a year, and that it will outlast all elastic packing previously known, and is considered, by those having occasion to use packing, to involve an important discovery in regard to the efficiency of vulcanite, when used in connection with refractory material, for the purpose of packing steam valves. Such an understanding of the Jenkins patent, as I have above stated, is fatal to the present motion, for the reason, that, according to the weight of the evidence, the defendant's packing is always so compounded as to furnish, for absorption by the rubber, more than 25 per cent. of sulphur, and, when vulcanized, never contains soft rubber, and invariably contains vulcanite, whence results, according to the affidavits, an article essentially different from the article described in the Jenkins patent, not only being compounded in a different manner, but possessing different properties, and being more efficacious to effect the object sought to be attained by both articles than it is possible for the Jenkins packing to be. The motion for a preliminary injunction must, therefore, be denied.

[NOTE. On the final hearing, the bill was dismissed because of the failure of plaintiff to prove infringement. Clarke v. Johnson, 4 Fed. 437.

[For other cases involving this patent, see note to Jenkins v. Johnson, Case No. 7,271.]

Case No. 2,856.

CLARKE et al. v. JOHNSTON et al.

[8 Blatchf. 557.][1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Sept. 12, 1871.[2]

WILLS—CONSTRUCTION.

A codicil to a will contained the following provision: "The remaining two-thirds of the portions or shares of my daughters shall be held separate and distinct, and not liable to the control, debts, or engagements of either of their husbands which they now have, or may hereafter have, as well those who are married as she who may hereafter marry, giving, however, to the husbands of either or all of them, in case the wife shall die first, either with or without issue, the income of said reserved part of my estate, as long as he shall live, arising from his wife's portion, and, after his death, then to the child or children of my said daughter so dying." Held, that there was, in such provision, no expression or indication of any intention on the part of the testator, that there should be a limitation over in favor of the children of a daughter who should survive her husband; and that, where the husband of such daughter died, and she survived him, his death terminated the operation of the provision for his life estate, and the operation of the provision in favor of the child or children of his wife.

[See note at end of case.]

[In equity. Bill by George Augustus Clarke and Jeanet Virginia Clarke, infants under the age of twenty-one years, by Reuben Middleton, their guardian and next friend, against James B. Johnston and Adam Norrie, as executors of the last will and testament of James Boorman.]

Louis Janin and Max Goepp, for plaintiffs.
Charles O'Conor, for defendants.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. The prayer of the bill, in this case, is, that the defendants, as executors of the last will and testament of James Boorman, may come to a just and fair account of the settlement of the estate of James R. Smith, the great-grandfather of the plaintiffs, James Boorman having been an executor, and the last surviving executor, of the last will and testament of James R. Smith, and may be ordered to deliver to the plaintiffs a certain legacy, alleged to have accrued to them under the will of James R. Smith, or, if that be impossible, to pay to them the just and present value of certain real estate, alleged to have accrued to them under such legacy.

James R. Smith, who was a merchant in the city of New York, died early in June, 1817, leaving a will executed January 23d, 1817, and a codicil executed May 30th, 1817, which were duly probated before the surrogate of the county of New York, June 11th, 1817. James R. Smith left surviving him four children: (1.) Jeanet, then the wife of the Reverend John X. Clarke, and who then had a child living, George Augustus Duncan Clarke, who was the father of the plaintiffs; (2.) Hannah, then the wife of Matthew St. Clair Clarke, and who then had children living; (3.) Elizabeth, then a minor, and unmarried, who afterwards became the wife of Joseph Duncan; (4.) James C. R., then a minor. By his will, James R. Smith appointed, as his executors, his widow, Hannah, and Andrew Foster, John Thomson, James Boorman, and Matthew St. Clair Clarke. Letters testamentary were granted to all of them but Foster. By his will, James R. Smith authorized his executors, in their discretion, to sell the whole, or any part, of his estate, real or personal, and directed that the residue of his estate, after the payment of his debts, should, unless the same, or any part thereof, should be otherwise disposed of, by codicil or codicils to his will, be distributed according to the laws of the state of New York, in the same manner as in case he had happened to die intestate. By the codicil, James R. Smith ratified and confirmed the will in all respects, except so far as any part thereof might or should be revoked or altered by such codicil. The codicil, after making various devises and bequests, in eleven clauses, proceeds as follows: "Twelfth. All the rest, residue and remainder of my estate, of every kind and nature whatsoever, and wheresoever situate, I give, devise and bequeath unto my said executors, in trust that the same shall be equally divided to and amongst my four children, share and share alike, and to their respective heirs. My will further is, that my son James and my daughter Elizabeth shall each have the sum of fifteen hundred dollars set apart by my said executors for their support and education, until they arrive at the age of twenty-one, and, if that sum shall not be found sufficient, my executors shall take such further sum, from their respective shares of my estate, as shall be necessary; and I do hereby give the tuition, care and guardianship of my said son James and my daughter Elizabeth to my said wife. My will further is, that my son James shall not come to the full possession and enjoyment of his portion of my estate until he shall arrive at the age of twenty-five years, nor shall he have the power to pawn, pledge, mortgage or dispose of it in any way, the same or any part thereof, before the expiration of that time, but shall be entitled to receive the income arising from his portion between the years of twenty-one and twenty-five. I further direct, that my daughters Jeanet, Hannah, and Elizabeth, if she should arrive at the age of twenty-one years, shall have the privilege of expending and appropriating, by and with the consent of the executors, one-third part of their portion of my estate herein devised to them, in such manner as they may think proper, and over which, when so appropriated, they shall have absolute control; and the remaining two-thirds of the portions or shares of my daughters shall be held separate and distinct, and not liable to the control, debts, or engagements of either of their husbands which they now have, or may hereafter have, as well those who are married as she who may hereafter marry, giving, however, to the husbands of either or all of them, in case the wife shall die first, either with or without issue, the income of said reserved part of my estate, as long as he shall live, arising from his wife's portion, and, after his death, then to the child or children of my said daughter so dying, and, if either of my daughters shall die without lawful issue, or having issue which shall not attain the age of twenty-one years, and without issue, then the share or portion of my said daughter, after the death of her husband, or if there be no husband living at her death, shall go and be divided among my other children, share and share alike, and to their issue, in case of the death of either of them, share and share alike, such issue to take the portion that would have belonged to his, her or their father or mother." John X. Clarke, the grandfather of the plaintiffs, died in 1824. His wife, Jeanet, the grandmother of the plaintiffs, died in September, 1847. George Augustus Duncan Clarke, the father of the plaintiffs, was born in November, 1815, and died in October, 1855.

[1] [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

[2] [Affirmed in Clarke v. Johnston, 18 Wall. (85 U. S.) 493.]

The question involved in this case arises under the twelfth clause of the codicil. The plaintiffs contend, that, by the will and the codicil, the residue of the estate of James R. Smith, after the payment of debts and legacies, was devised to his executors, in trust, to be divided equally among his four children, share and share alike, and to their respective heirs; that each of the four children was to take one-fourth of the estate; that the son, James C. R., was to take his one-fourth in fee; that each of the three daughters was to take one-third of her one-fourth in full ownership, and a life estate only in the other two-thirds of such one-fourth, with remainder over, after such life estate, to her husband, if he should survive her; and that, after his death, the fee of such two-thirds of his deceased wife's one-fourth was to go to her child or children, if they attained the age of twenty-one years, and, if they died before that age, and without issue, then to the other children of the testator, or their surviving heirs. This suit concerns the fee of the two-thirds of the share of the plaintiffs' grandmother, Jeanet, in which two-thirds the plaintiffs claim that their grandmother had only a life estate, and which fee they claim passed to their father on the decease of their grandmother. They allege that James Boorman, by his acts as executor, in wilful default, in conjunction with Matthew St. Clair Clarke, acting as executor, in like wilful default, placed such two-thirds of the share of the plaintiffs' grandmother, Jeanet, which two-thirds consisted wholly of real estate, in such a position that the title to such real estate passed into the hands of bona fide purchasers for a valuable consideration, without notice, whereby the plaintiffs and their father were deprived thereof entirely, and that, therefore, the estate of James Boorman must respond to the plaintiffs for such breach of trust, in the present value of the property of which they have been so deprived. By 1829, James Boorman and Matthew St. Clair Clarke had come to be the sole acting executors of the will of James R. Smith, the widow and Thomson having died, and Foster never having acted as executor. On the 1st of October, 1829, James C. R. Smith having attained the age of twenty-five years, and all the debts of the testator having been paid, a partition, division, and valuation of his estate, into four parts equal in value, was agreed upon by the parties interested in it, namely, the three daughters, the husbands of Hannah and Elizabeth, and James C. R. By a deed of November 15th, 1829, all those parties, other than James C. R., conveyed and confirmed to him certain real estate described in the deed, which he thereby accepted as his one-fourth part of the estate. The two acting executors, described therein as surviving executors, joined in this deed. By a deed of the same date, executed by the two acting executors, and by Matthew St. Clair Clarke and his wife, James C. R. Smith and his wife, and Joseph Duncan and his wife, and which recited that the debts of the estate had all been paid, that the residue of the estate of James R. Smith consisted principally in real estate, that the daughters of the testator were desirous to appropriate their respective one-third parts of their respective portions of the estate, that the executors were willing that they should do so, that it was universally admitted by all the heirs and devisees, namely, the three daughters, the son, and the husbands of Hannah and Elizabeth, that a sale of the estate to convert it into money would be very injurious to all concerned, and that, by agreement among the heirs, the whole of the real estate had been parted, divided, and valued, in four distinct and equal parts, the grantors conveyed to Jeanet Clarke certain real estate, in satisfaction of the one-third part of her portion, authorized by the will to be appropriated to her, and over which, when so appropriated, she was to have absolute control. By a deed of the same date, executed by the two acting executors, and by Jeanet Clarke, Hannah Clarke and her husband, and James C. R. Smith and his wife, and containing like recitals as the last named deed, the grantors conveyed to Elizabeth Duncan and her husband certain real estate, in satisfaction of the one-third part of the portion of Elizabeth, authorized by the will to be appropriated by her. By a deed of the same date, executed by the two acting executors, and by James C. R. Smith and his wife, Jeanet Clarke, Hannah Clarke and her husband, and Elizabeth Duncan and her husband, and which expressed a consideration of $8,948.68, and contained no recitals except that the executors, in pursuance of the power contained in the will, had sold to the grantee, for such consideration, the real estate described in such deed, the grantors conveyed to one Robert Dyson such real estate. By a deed of the same date, containing no recitals, and expressing a consideration of $8,948.68, Dyson conveyed the same real estate to Hannah Clarke and her husband, to have and to hold to them and to the heirs and assigns of Hannah forever. These two deeds, the one to Dyson and the one from him, though not so expressed, were, in fact, conveyances of the one-third part of the portion of Hannah, authorized by the will to be appropriated by her, and were so given and received. By these conveyances, and others made at the same time or previously, the entire estate of James R. Smith was disposed of, except the two-thirds of the shares of each of the three daughters.

On the 26th of December, 1829, the two acting executors, James C. R. Smith and his wife, Jeanet Clarke, Hannah Clarke and her husband, and Elizabeth Duncan and her husband, conveyed to Robert Dyson, by deed, certain real estate therein described, which was in fact all the residue of the real estate left by James R. Smith. This deed expressed a consideration of $64,710.59, paid by the grantee to Matthew St. Clair Clarke, and stated that the executors had, for such consideration, and in pursuance of the power contained in the will, sold to the grantee the described real estate. On the same day, Dyson, by a deed, expressing a consideration of $21,573.13, conveyed to Jeanet Clarke certain of the real estate so conveyed to him; and, by another deed, expressing a consideration of $21,614.56, conveyed to Hannah Clarke and her husband certain other of the real estate so conveyed to him; and, by another deed, expressing a consideration of $21,522.90, conveyed to Elizabeth Duncan and her husband the residue of the real estate so conveyed to him. These deeds were all of them deeds in fee. It is of this conveyance to Dyson that the plaintiffs complain, as having disposed of the reserved two-thirds of the share of their grandmother, so as to deprive them and their father of the fee of such two-thirds. The real estate so conveyed to Dyson passed into the hands of bona fide purchasers. Such real estate represented the two-thirds of the shares of the three daughters, as agreed upon in the partition, and each of the three deeds from Dyson represented one-third of such two-thirds. As a part of this arrangement, it was agreed among all parties, that all the heirs should enter into a bond of indemnity to Mr. Boorman, to save him harmless on account of making the deed to Dyson; that James C. R. Smith should give to Matthew St. Clair Clarke an indemnity bond to the same import; and that Jeanet Clarke, and Elizabeth Duncan and her husband, should execute mortgages of certain property to Mr. Boorman and Matthew St. Clair Clarke, as an indemnity to the latter and further assurance to Mr. Boorman, such mortgages to hold until the trust named in the will concerning the two-thirds of the portions of the three daughters should have been legally extinguished or complied with. The mortgages contemplated were not given. But Matthew St. Clair Clarke, James C. R. Smith, Jeanet Clarke and Joseph Duncan executed, on the 10th of July, 1830, an instrument of indemnity to Mr. Boorman. That instrument recites the provisions of the twelfth clause of the codicil, the conveyance of real estate to the son for his one-fourth share, the conveyance of other real estate for the one-third part of the share of each daughter, the conveyance to Dyson, December 26th, 1829, of "all and singular the remaining two-third parts of the portions or shares of the daughters of the said testator, comprehending all the rest, residue and remainder of his real estate," the fact that no portion of the consideration of the sale to Dyson had been received by Mr. Boorman, but that it had, with the consent of all parties interested, gone exclusively into the hands of Matthew St. Clair Clarke, and the fact that Mr. Boorman had accounted for all the effects of the estate which had come to his hands, and had discharged himself of all the trusts reposed in him by the will and the codicil, and then provides, that Matthew St. Clair Clarke and Duncan, for themselves and their wives, and the others for themselves, discharge Mr. Boorman from all moneys which he could have received in his trust, and from all claims concerning the estate of the testator, or any trust relating thereto, and agree to indemnify him from all demands by reason of his having executed any of the conveyances thereinbefore mentioned, or by reason of any other thing by him done, committed or suffered, concerning the estate of the testator, whether under the trusts in the will and codicil, or otherwise. On the 30th of June, 1830, a mortgage was executed by Elizabeth Duncan and her husband to Jeanet Clarke, Hannah Clarke and her husband, and James C. R. Smith. It recites the provisions of the twelfth clause of the codicil as to the two-thirds of the shares of the daughters, and then proceeds: "And whereas, by mutual and universal agreement of all the parties interested, the whole of the said two-thirds of the real estate of the said James R. Smith, deceased, has been parted and divided, and, by divers conveyances, has been vested absolutely in the respective daughters and their heirs and assigns, and whereas, it is the wish and intention of the said parties of the first part, that this indenture shall operate and be a security on the part of them, the said parties of the first part, for the faithful fulfilment of the provisions contained in the said recited portion of said will and testament and codicil." The consideration of the mortgage is $10,000, and it covers certain real estate in the city of New York. Its condition is, that the provisions contained in the recited portion of the will and codicil shall be fully and faithfully fulfilled on the part of the mortgagors, they to retain the right to rent and lease the property for a period not exceeding twenty-one years. This mortgage was recorded October 2d, 1830, and was satisfied of record January 19th, 1835. On the 10th of July, 1830, two other mortgages were executed, one by Jeanet Clarke to Hannah Clarke and her husband, James C. R. Smith, and Elizabeth Duncan and her husband, and the other by Hannah Clarke and her husband to Jeanet Clarke, James C. R. Smith, and Elizabeth Duncan and her husband. These mortgages contain similar recitals and provisions, and a like condition, mutatis mutandis, with the mortgage from the Duncans, and cover real estate in the city of New York. They were recorded October 2d, 1830, and were satisfied of record March 26th, 1835.

At the time the two-thirds of Jeanet Clarke's share of the estate was thus conveyed to her in fee, her son was but fourteen years of age. So far, therefore, as Jeanet Clarke's share was concerned, Mr. Boorman needed indemnity against the contingency that such son might die under the age of twenty-one years and without issue, in which case the mother and sisters of Jeanet Clarke, or their issue, would come to take the two-thirds of the share of Jeanet Clarke.

The first question to be considered is the proper construction of the provision of the twelfth clause of the codicil as to the two-thirds of each daughter's share. So far as Jeanet Clarke's two-thirds of her share is concerned, the fact that the plaintiffs' father survived his mother, and died when over twenty-one years of age, leaving issue, defeated the limitation over to her brother and sisters and their issue, in any view that may be taken of the provision for such limitation over. The only practical question, therefore, is, as to what estate Jeanet Clarke took in the two-thirds of her share of the estate. The controlling provision is thus worded: "The remaining two-thirds of the portions or shares of my daughters shall be held separate and distinct, and not liable to the control, debts or engagements of either of their husbands which they now have, or may hereafter have, as well those who are married as she who may hereafter marry, giving, however, to the husbands of either or all of them, in case the wife shall die first, either with or without issue, the income of said reserved part of my estate, as long as he shall live, arising from his wife's portion, and, after his death, then to the child or children of my said daughter so dying." It is impossible to say that there is, in this provision, or in any part of the twelfth clause of the codicil, the expression or indication of any intention on the part of the testator that there should be a limitation over in favor of the children of a daughter who should survive her husband. The two-thirds of the daughter's share is to be held separate and distinct, so that it may not be liable for her husband's debts, and so that, if he survive her, he may have the income of it for his life. If he does not survive her, the fee of such two-thirds is freed from all possibilities in favor of her children, and remains subject only to the contingent provision in favor of the other children of the testator and their issue. The provision in favor of the child or children of a daughter "so dying," is one that is expressly made to take effect only after the death of the husband of a daughter who survives such daughter. Jeanet Clarke survived her husband. His death terminated the operation of the provision for his life estate, and the operation of the provision in favor of the child or children of his wife. It is admitted, on the part of the plaintiffs, that they have no cause of action unless Jeanet Clarke took only a life estate in the two-thirds of her share, and unless, at her death, such two-thirds passed to the plaintiffs' father. As the two-thirds of her share did not pass to the plaintiffs' father, it follows that the bill must be dismissed, with costs.

[NOTE. An appeal was taken to the supreme court, where the decree of the circuit court was affirmed.

[The court left the construction of the will on the question of estate in fee or life estate with vested remainder undecided, commented on the inefficiency of rules of decision and decided cases as guides, and held, as appears by the headnotes, prepared by Mr. Justice Miller, as here set forth:

[That the violation of trust growing out of a mistaken construction of a will by the executors, unaccompanied by fraudulent intent, was within the ten-years statute of limitation of the state of New York, concerning actions for relief in cases of trust not cognizable by courts of law.

[That the court was inclined to the opinion that such a case was not within the protection of the statute which allows bills for relief on the ground of fraud to be filed within six years after the discovery of the fraud.

[That the party interested, in his lifetime, having had notice of all the facts which constituted the ground of fraud alleged in the bill, and for eight years that he lived after the cause of action accrued to him, with notice of his right and of the whole transaction, having brought no suit nor set up any claim, his heirs were not entitled to the benefit of this exemption from the bar of the statute on the ground of recent discovery of the fraud.

[That when a trustee has closed his trust relation to the property and to the cestui que trust, and parted with all control of the property, the statute of limitations runs in his favor, notwithstanding it is an express trust.

[That the general doctrines of courts of equity concerning lapse of time, laches, and stale claims will protect the executors of a trustee sued after his death for matters growing out of the trust which occurred forty years before suit brought, which were known to the ancestor under whom plaintiffs claim for over twenty years before his death, and where the suit is brought by those heirs fourteen years after his death, and two years after the death of the trustee, and where no person connected with the transactions complained of remains alive.

[Clarke v. Johnston, 18 Wall. (85 U. S.) 493.]

CLARKE (KOUNSALAER v.). See Case No. 7,927.

CLARKE (LORMAN v.). See Case No. 8,516.

CLARKE (McCOMBER v.). See Case No. 8,711.

Case No. 2,857.

CLARKE v. MATHEWSON et al.

[2 Sumn. 262.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Rhode Island. Nov. Term, 1835.[2]

JURISDICTION—CITIZENSHIP—BILL OF REVIVOR.

1. The circuit court of the United States cannot entertain a bill of revivor, where the controversy, which it seeks to revive, is now between citizens of the same state, though the parties to the original bill, were citizens of different states. As where a bill of revivor was brought by an administrator, who was a citizen of the same state with the defendant, though his intestate was of a different state.

[Cited in U. S. v. Parrott, Case No. 15,998.]

[See note at end of case.]

2. Where the parties are citizens of different states, at the commencement of the suit, a subsequent change of domicil and citizenship will not oust the jurisdiction.

This was the case of a bill of revivor, brought by Clarke as administrator of Willard W. Wetmore, deceased, to revive a suit in equity, brought by Wetmore in his lifetime, against the defendant Henry Mathewson. The bill of revivor stated, that the present plaintiff, John H. Clarke, was a citizen of Rhode Island; that his intestate, W. W. Wetmore, was a citizen of Connecticut, and on the 22d of February, 1830, filed his original bill against Mathewson and others [Cyrus Butler, Edward Carrington, and Samuel Wetmore], all citizens of Rhode Island, in which bill, praying an account, &c. That the defendants appeared and answered the bill; that the cause was afterwards at issue; and at November term, 1831, it was referred to a master, to take an account, &c.; and, that afterwards and before any report was made, viz. in 1834, the said W. W. Wetmore died, whereby the suit became abated. That the present plaintiff had taken administration of his estate in the state of Rhode Island; and he therefore prayed, that the suit might stand revived, and be put in the same state and condition, as the same was, previous to the death of the said W. W. Wetmore.

A motion was now made, by Tillinghast and D. Webster, for the defendants to dismiss the bill of revivor, upon the ground, that the plaintiff and defendants were all citizens of the same state; and, that the plaintiff suing as administrator, made no difference in the case.

Whipple and R. W. Greene, for the plaintiff, e contra, contended, that the court had jurisdiction, because it was not the case of an original bill, but a mere bill of revivor of a suit, originally brought between citizens of different states.

STORY, Circuit Justice. If this were the case of an original bill, brought by the plaintiff, as administrator, against the defendants, it is clear, that the suit could not be maintained, although the plaintiff's intestate was a citizen of another state; for the parties before the court would be all citizens of Rhode Island. The plaintiff's suing in autre droit could not help him, although his intestate was a citizen of Connecticut; for the suit would still be his own personal suit. This is the necessary result of the doctrine, maintained in Chappedelaine v. Decheneaux, 4 Cranch [8 U. S.] 306; Childress v. Emery, 8 Wheat. [21 U. S.] 642; and Dodge v. Perkins [Case No. 3,954]. But the present bill being a bill of revivor only of an original suit, between citizens of different states, it is supposed, that the plaintiff is entitled to revive and continue the former suit, although he is a citizen of the same state as the defendants. The difficulty upon this is, that the moment the suit stands revived, it is in reality a suit between the plaintiff and the defendants personally; and the decree must treat them as the only parties to the bill. The death of the original plaintiff severed him forever from the suit.

This is not like the case of a bill, brought for an injunction to a judgment of the circuit court. There it has been held, that if the plaintiff in the judgment is a citizen of another state, than that in which the suit is brought, he may still be compelled to appear and answer the injunction bill. But the reason is, that the judiciary act of 1789, c. 20, § 11 [1 Stat. 78], requiring the suit to be brought in the district, of which the defendant is an inhabitant, or in which he is found, does not apply to any bill, but an original bill; and an injunction bill is treated not as an original, but as an incidental bill. The same rule applies to a cross bill, filed in the same circuit court, where the original bill is brought. In each of these cases, the difficulty does not arise from the constitution, but from the act of congress. The constitution would justify a suit between citizens of different states in any circuit court. The act of congress narrows it down to the circuit court of the district, where the defendant dwells, or is found.

[1] [Reported by Charles Sumner, Esq.]

[2] [Reversed in Clarke v. Mathewson, 12 Pet. (37 U. S.) 164.]

In the cases of injunction bills and cross bills, the parties are supposed still to be citizens of different states; and therefore, the only difficulty, that arises, is, as to the service of process on them. But, in the present case, the bill of revivor seeks to carry on a suit between adverse parties, who are all citizens of the same state. When the suit is revived, it is a suit by Clarke, a citizen of Rhode Island, against Mathewson and others, citizens of Rhode Island. I confess, that I have difficulty in seeing, how this court can entertain such a suit, or make any decree therein; for the controversy is no longer between the original parties, but between the new parties on the bill of revivor. I agree to the doctrine, that, where the parties are citizens of different states at the commencement of the suit, a subsequent change of domicil and citizenship, will not oust the jurisdiction. That was so held in Morgan's Heirs v. Morgan, 2 Wheat. [15 U. S.] 290, 297, and Mollan v. Torrance, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 537. But in that case, the original parties were still before the court. But in the present case a new party plaintiff is introduced, whose citizenship is, at the time of his filing his bill, in the same state with the defendants. It is true, that the judiciary act of 1789, c. 20, § 31 [1 Stat. 90], authorizes executors and administrators to appear and prosecute and defend suits, pending at the time of the death of their respective testators and intestates, unto final judgment. But I am not aware, that this provision has ever been held to apply to executors and administrators, who could not sue or defend as original parties in such suits. If there had been any known course of decisions, which had established such a right and practice, I should follow it, whatever might be my private doubts. But no such course of decisions has been appealed to.

It appears to me then, that the bill of revivor must be dismissed, as the controversy, which it seeks to revive, is now between citizens of the same state. As the district judge concurs in this opinion, the bill is accordingly to be dismissed, for want of jurisdiction.

After this opinion was delivered, the cause was continued to the next term, at the suggestion of the parties. The court, at that term, suggested, that they entertained, upon farther reflection, great doubts on the point; and recommended that the case should be taken to the supreme court for a final decision, which was accordingly done. [12 Pet. (37 U. S.) 164.]

[NOTE. The supreme court reversed the decree of the circuit court on complainant's appeal. Mr. Justice Story delivered the opinion, and stated as the reasons of reversal that, as the parties to the original bill were citizens of different states, and the jurisdiction of the court had attached to the controversy, it could not be divested by any subsequent event; and, further, that the bill of revivor was in no sense an original suit, but a mere continuation of such suit.

[The court added that if any doubt existed on general principles as to the correctness of this view, it was removed by section 31 of the judiciary act of 1789, c. 20, which provides that, if either of the parties to a suit pending in the federal court die before final judgment, the executor or administrator of such deceased party, if the cause of action survive, may prosecute or defend the same to final judgment; and which also empowers and directs the court before whom the cause is depending to hear and determine the same. Clarke v. Mathewson, 12 Pet. (37 U. S.) 164.]

Case No. 2,858.

CLARKE v. MAYFIELD.

[3 Cranch, C. C. 353.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. Term, 1828.

LIMITATION OF ACTIONS—PLEADING—AMENDMENTS.

1. Upon the plea of the statute of limitations, the plaintiff cannot avail himself of the exception in favor of merchants' accounts, without stating it in his replication. It is not admissible in evidence upon the general replication to the plea.

2. After the jury is sworn, the court will not suffer the plaintiff to amend, if the justice of the case be against him.

At law. Assumpsit for work and labor. Plea of limitations; general replication and issue.

R. P. Dunlop, for the plaintiff, offered evidence of mutual dealings and accounts between the parties, and cited Ball. Lim. 70, 71.

Mr. Redin, contra. That clause of the statute only applies to merchants, where there are mutual accounts and mutual credits.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent) said, that as the exception in favor of merchants' accounts is not stated by way of replication, the evidence could not be admitted. The replication is, that the cause of action accrued within three years, &c., and according to the decision of the supreme court in Bell v. Morrison, 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 351, mutual accounts are not evidence on that issue.

Mr. Dunlop then moved for leave to withdraw a juror and amend his replication.

Mr. Redin objected, that it appears by the defendant's books of account, which he produced in court, that the plaintiff's whole claim has been paid; but the books, being in his own handwriting, are not evidence.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

THE COURT refused leave to amend under such circumstances. The plaintiff admits there were mutual accounts, and upon that ground moves to amend, and yet refuses to admit the defendant's books in evidence, although the defendant offered to waive the plea of limitations.

Verdict for plaintiff, $30; which, being below the jurisdiction of this court, the plaintiff took a non-pros.

CLARKE (NEVITT v.). See Case No. 10,138.

Case No. 2,859.

CLARKE v. NEW JERSEY STEAM NAV. CO.

[1 Story, 531;[1] 4 Law Rep. 134.]

Circuit Court, D. Rhode Island. June Term, 1841.

ADMIRALTY JURISDICTION — PROCEEDINGS AGAINST NON-RESIDENT FOREIGNERS AND FOREIGN CORPORATIONS.

1. In all proceedings in rem, when a court of admiralty has jurisdiction over the thing itself, it is wholly unimportant, to whom it belongs.

2. By the common law, foreign corporations and non-resident foreigners cannot be served with process by any of the courts of common law, nor can their property be attached to compel their appearance. The authority, whenever it exists, results from special custom or statute provisions.

[Cited in Ashbrook v. The Golden Gate, Case No. 574.]

3. It seems, that the principles of the common law are inapplicable to process and proceedings in courts of admiralty.

[Discussed in Wilson v. Pierce, Case No. 17,826. Cited in Atkins v. Fibre Disintegrating Co., Id. 600; Winans v. McKean R. & Nav. Co., Id. 17,862; Cushing v. Laird, Id. 3,508.]

4. The district courts of the United States, as courts of admiralty, may award attachments against the property of foreign corporations, found within their local jurisdiction.

[Discussed in Wilson v. Pierce, Case No. 17,826. Cited in Boyd v. Urquhart, Id. 1,750; Atkins v. Fibre Disintegrating Co., Id. 600; Winans v. McKean R. & Nav. Co., Id. 17,862; Cushing v. Laird, Id. 3,508; Myers v. Dorr, Id. 9,988, 18 Wall. (85 U. S.) 305; Louisiana Ins. Co. v. Nickerson, Case No. 8,539. Distinguished in Atkins v. Fibre Disintegrating Co., Id. 602.

5. It is well settled, that a foreign corporation may sue in another jurisdiction.

This was a suit in admiralty, brought by an appeal from a pro forma decree of the district court [for the district of Rhode Island], dismissing the libel. The original libel was brought in February, 1841, and prayed only for personal process against the corporation, and that Moses B. Ives, one of the directors of the company, might be summoned to appear and answer the libel. At the return day Moses B. Ives appeared, and declining to appear for the company, prayed that the writ might be dismissed; and thereupon it was dismissed against him personally; but the libel was retained for further process against the property of the company. Afterwards an amended libel was filed, praying for process against the property of the company to be found within the district; and, accordingly, the district judge awarded a process of attachment against the property; and, upon that process, the marshal attached a scow, the property of the company, found within the district.

The amended libel was in substance as follows: First. That the respondents, in the month of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and forty, were common carriers of merchandise on the high seas, from the city of New York, in the state of New York, to Stonington, in the state of Connecticut, and were then owners of the steamboat Lexington, then lying at the port of New York, in the state of New York, and which vessel was then used by the defendants as common carriers as aforesaid, for the transportation of goods, wares, and merchandise on the high seas, from the said port of New York to the port of Stonington, in the state of Connecticut. Second. That the libellant, on the high seas and within the ebb and flow of the tide, and within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the United States, and of this court, on the 13th day of January, 1840, contracted with the respondents for the transportation by water, on board of the said steamboat Lexington, from the said port of New York to the said port of Stonington, of twenty bales of cotton to the libellant belonging, of the value of fifteen hundred dollars. And the said respondents, then and there, for a reasonable hire or reward, to be paid by the libellant therefor, contracted with the libellant, that they would receive the said twenty bales of cotton on board of the said steamboat Lexington, and transport the same therein on the high seas from the said New York to the said Stonington, and safely deliver the same to the libellant. Third. That the libellant, on the high seas and within the ebb and flow of the tide and within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the United States and of this court, on the 13th day of January, A. D. 1840, contracted with the respondents for the transportation by water on board of the said steamboat Lexington, from the said port of New York to the said port of Stonington, of twenty bales of cotton of the value of fifteen hundred dollars to the libellant belonging, and thence by the railroad of the New York, Providence and Boston Railroad Company, to the city of Providence, in the state of Rhode Island; and the respondents, then and there, for a reasonable hire or reward to be paid them therefor by the libellant, contracted with the libellant, that they would receive the said twenty bales of cotton on board of the said steamboat Lexington, and transport the same therein from the said port of New York, on the high seas, to the said Stonington and there receive the said cotton upon the cars of the said railroad company, and convey the same thereon to Providence, in the state of Rhode Island, and safely deliver the same to the libellant. Fourth. That the libellant, on the said 13th day of January, A. D. 1840, at the said New York, delivered to the respondents at the said port of New York, on board of the said steamboat Lexington, then lying at the said port of New York, and within the ebb and flow of the tide, and within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the United States and of this court, and the respondents then and there received on board of the said steamboat the said cotton, for the purpose of transporting the same by water on the high seas from the said New York to the said Stonington, and deliver the same to the libellant as aforesaid. Fifth. That the said steamboat Lexington sailed from the said New York on the said 13th day of January, 1840, with the said cotton on board, and bound to the said port of Stonington. Yet the said respondents, their officers, servants, and agents so carelessly and improperly stowed the said cotton, and the engine, machinery, furniture, rigging, and equipments of the said steamboat, were so imperfect and insufficient, and the said respondents, their officers, servants, and agents so carelessly, improperly, and negligently managed and conducted the said steamboat Lexington during her said voyage, that by reason of such improper storage, imperfect and insufficient engine, machinery, furniture, rigging, and equipments, and of such careless, negligent, and improper conduct, the said steamboat together with the said cotton, to the libellant belonging, was destroyed by fire on the high seas, and within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the United States and of this court, and wholly lost. Sixth. That by reason of the destruction of the said steamboat Lexington, and of the said cotton, the libellant has sustained damage to the amount of two thousand dollars. Seventh. That the said New Jersey Steam Navigation Company are possessed of certain personal property within the said Rhode Island district, and within the ebb and flow of the sea, and within the maritime and admiralty jurisdiction of this court, to wit, of the steamboat called the Rhode Island, her tackle, apparel, furniture, and appurtenances and of other personal property. Eighth. That all and singular the premises are true and within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of this court, in verification whereof, if denied, the libellant craves leave to refer to the depositions and other proofs to be by him exhibited in the cause.

[1] [Reported by William W. Story, Esq.]

Wherefore, the libellant prays, that process in due form of law according to the course of the admiralty and of this court, in causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, may issue against the respondents, and against the said steamboat Rhode Island, her tackle, apparel, furniture, and appurtenances, or any other property to the respondents belonging, within the said Rhode Island district, and that the said property, or any part thereof, may be attached and held to enforce the appearance of the respondents in this court to answer the matters particularly propounded, and to answer the damages, which may be awarded to the libellant for the causes aforesaid. And that this court would be pleased to pronounce for the damages aforesaid, and to decree such damages to the libellant as shall to law and justice appertain. To this process, the company appeared under protest against the jurisdiction; and afterwards, by their proctor and counsel, they filed the following plea: And now the New Jersey Steam Navigation Company, a corporation duly and legally incorporated by the legislature of the state of New Jersey, and established and transacting business in Jersey City, in the said state of New Jersey, appear before this honorable court by Peter Pratt, their proctor and attorney, and protesting against the process and the service of the same in manner and form, as the same has been issued and served in the case of the libel and complaint of John H. Clarke, of Providence, in the Rhode Island district, against the said corporation, say, that this honorable court here have no cognizance or jurisdiction over this corporation or the subject matters set forth in the libel of the said libellant to compel or require them to appear in this court and to plead to or answer to the said libel and complaint; because the said New Jersey Steam Navigation Company are a corporation, legally incorporated by the legislature of the state of New Jersey, established and transacting business in Jersey City, within the limits and jurisdiction of the district of New Jersey, and can alone be required and compelled to appear and plead or answer to matters within the maritime and admiralty jurisdiction of the United States, in the district court of the district of New Jersey, and this honorable court have not jurisdiction and ought not to proceed to enforce their pretended claim alleged in the libel aforesaid against their property or against the said corporation. Wherefore, the said New Jersey Steam Navigation Company pray, that this honorable court would be pleased to pronounce against the libel and the process and service thereof as aforesaid, and that the same may be dismissed with their costs.

The cause was thereupon, by the consent of the parties, brought by appeal to this court from a pro forma decree of the district court dismissing the libel.

R. W. Greene, for libellant.

Pratt & Whipple, for respondents.

STORY, Circuit Justice. No question has been made at the bar, that the case stated in the libel is a case of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, it being founded in a maritime contract, and asserting, as a breach thereof, a maritime loss by negligence. The Orleans v. Phoebus, 11 Pet. [36 U. S.] 175–184. Neither has it been doubted, that the process of attachment well lies in an admiralty suit against the property of private persons, whose property is found within the district, although their persons may not be found therein, as well to enforce their appearance to the suit, as to apply it in satisfaction of the decree rendered in the suit. Ever since the elaborate examination of this whole subject, in the case of Manro v. Almeida, 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 473, this question has been deemed entirely at rest.

The real point of controversy is, whether the respondents, being a corporation created by, and having its corporate existence and organization in the state of New Jersey, is, as a foreign corporation, liable to a suit in personam in the admiralty in this district, not directly, but indirectly through its attachable property here, so as to compel the appearance of the corporation to answer the suit, or at all events to subject the property attached to the final judgment and decree of the court. The whole argument turns upon this proposition, that there is a distinction between the case of a private person, and that of a corporation. The former is suable in the admiralty by process of attachment in a suit in personam, against his property found in the district, although he may not personally be found within the district; whereas a corporation is liable to be sued only in the state, where it has its corporate existence, and from which it derives its charter, and not elsewhere, although its property may be found in the district, where the suit is brought. If the present were a suit in rem against the property to enforce a right of property or a lien, or to subject it, as the offending thing, (as in cases of collision,) to the direct action of the court, the case could not admit of any real doubt; for in all proceedings in rem, the court having jurisdiction over the property itself, it is wholly unimportant, whether the property belongs to a private person or to a corporation, to a citizen or to a foreigner, to a resident or to a non-resident, to a domestic or to a foreign corporation. In each and in every such case the jurisdiction is complete and conclusive. If the case were one exclusively dependent upon the local law of Rhode Island, the jurisdiction of the court would be equally clear; for by the statute of Rhode Island of January, 1840 (Sess. Acts, p. 103), it is enacted, that "when any incorporated company, established without this state, shall be indebted or liable to any person or persons, the personal and real estate of such company shall be liable to be attached and held to answer any just debt and demand." And the mode of serving the process is specially pointed out by the act.

The exemption of the corporation is sought to be established upon other grounds; first, upon the ground, that the state law is not applicable to an admiralty suit, the state being incapable of conferring or taking away the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States; and next upon the ground of the non-amenability of a foreign corporation to answer in any suit in any other state, than that, from which it derives its corporate existence and charter, upon the principles of the common law, which furnish a just authority or analogy for a similar rule in courts of admiralty. It may well be doubted, whether the principles of the common law, as to process and proceedings, can be properly imported into courts of admiralty, to regulate their process, or proceedings, or jurisdiction. It is plain, that the supreme court of the United States in Manro v. Almeida, 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 473–490, repudiated any such doctrine, and treated it as a grave mistake to suppose, that the process of attachment in the admiralty was borrowed from the foreign attachment by the custom of London; or, indeed, that it had any other origin than in the civil law. But the argument, founded on the supposed analogies of the common law, is not as stringent, as has been supposed. The process of the common law could not reach foreign corporations, for the plain reason, that they were not inhabitants of and had not any corporate existence within the realm. But this was equally true in respect to natural persons, not inhabitants of, or found within the realm. Foreigners, who were non-residents, could not be served with process to appear in any of the courts of common law, nor could their property be attached to compel their appearance. Whenever and wherever, in any such cases, process can be served upon the property, either of foreign corporations, or of foreign natural persons, who are non-residents, the authority to do so results either from special custom, or from statute provisions. See Com. Dig. "Attachment," B, D.

The cases cited at the bar all turn upon this distinction. In McQueen v. Middletown Manuf'g Co., 16 Johns. 5, the only question was, whether a foreign attachment, under the foreign attachment act of New York, lay against the property of a foreign corporation; and it was held, that no such attachment did lie upon the true interpretation of the act; and, indeed, that it could not lie against a domestic corporation; for it could not conceal itself or abscond. The court, upon that occasion, said, that a foreign corporation could not be sued in New York; for the process against a corporation must be served upon its head or principal officer within the jurisdiction of the sovereignty, where this artificial body exists. That is clear enough upon the principles of the common law, as already stated. The case of Peckham v. North Parish of Haverhill, 16 Pick. 274, 285, 286, merely affirms the same doctrine, that foreign corporations are without the jurisdiction of the courts of the state. But it so happens, that an opposite doctrine has been asserted, as to the operation of the local laws of Pennsylvania, in cases of the process of foreign attachment; and it has been there held, that foreign corporations are within the reach of that process. Bushel v. Commonwealth Ins. Co., 15 Serg. & R. 176. The decision in the case of Wilson v. Graham [Case No. 17,804], and that of Ex parte Graham [Id. 5,658], turned upon other considerations. But the court there affirmed a principle, which seems directly applicable to the present case; and that is, that it is essential to give jurisdiction to the district and circuit courts of the United States in any district, that the person or the thing, against which the proceedings are directed, should be within their local jurisdiction. Now, here the thing is within the jurisdiction, and it may be added, that even in suits in personam only, if a person, who is out of the jurisdiction, chooses to appear and defend the suit without objection, there is nothing to prevent the courts of the United States from entertaining the suit, if otherwise unexceptionable; for his appearance without process is a waiver of the objection of the non-service of process within the district; and the case does not fall within the prohibitory clause of the eleventh section of the judiciary act of 1789, c. 20 [1 Stat. 73]. This is clearly established. See Harrison v. Rowan [Case No. 6,140]; Gracie v. Palmer, 8 Wheat. [21 U. S.] 699; Pollard v. Dwight, 4 Cranch [8 U. S.] 421; Knox v. Summers, 3 Cranch [7 U. S.] 496; Logan v. Patrick, 5 Cranch [9 U. S.] 280. It was applied to the very case of a foreign attachment against the property of non-resident defendants, in the case of Pollard v. Dwight, 4 Cranch [8 U. S.] 421, where it was held, that the appearance of the defendants was a waiver of all objections to the non-service of process upon them within the district, where the suit was brought. There is nothing in the nature or character of a corporation, which prevents it from falling within the scope of the same doctrine. The case of Flanders v. Aetna Ins. Co. [Case No. 4,852], is directly in point, on this very question; for, there, the corporation was a foreign corporation; and it was held, that the jurisdiction attached, and the non-service of process within the district did not present any obstacle to the proceedings, as the corporation had appeared and defended the suit; and it was but a privilege to the corporation to be sued within the district, where it was established, which it was at full liberty to waive. The supposed authorities, then, at the common law, which have been relied on, furnish no ground, on which the present objection can be sustained. They all turn upon this simple proposition, that a foreign corporation cannot be compelled to appear and defend a suit in any other state, than that, where it is created and established, unless the local law otherwise provides, and property or effects of the corporation can be found, and by the local law can be attached, to respond the exigency of the suit, or to compel an appearance thereto. If the local law provides such a remedy, then it is competent for the local tribunals to exert it against the foreign corporation. Now, it is precisely in this very view, that the jurisdiction of the courts of admiralty applies. That jurisdiction may be executed, not only against persons, found within the district, but also by attachment against their property, found within the district, although the persons are not there. This was the very point decided (as we have seen) in Manro v. Almeida, 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 473. So that the jurisdiction is as complete, when the property is found within the district, as it is, when the person is there.

What difference, then, can it make upon principle, whether the owner of the property be a natural person, or a corporation? In each case, where the court acts upon the property, it acts solely in rem; and it is at the option of the owner, whether he will appear and allow the proceedings to go on in personam, or not. What ground is there to say, that a foreign corporation may not appear and defend its rights of property, as well as a natural person in a foreign jurisdiction? In all proceedings directly in rem, this is the universal rule and practice. It is difficult to perceive, why it is not equally true, where the property is before the court, to be subjected to its action; for unless there is an appearance and a general defence, the decree of the court ultimately binds and acts in rem only upon the thing, which is attached.

But upon the principle, what is the foundation of the objection? It is exceedingly clear, that a foreign corporation may sue in another jurisdiction. Not to multiply authorities upon so clear a point, I will simply refer to the case of Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 519, 520, 587–591, where Mr. Chief Justice Taney, in delivering the opinion of the court, examined the subject, as well upon principle as upon authority. If a foreign corporation may sue, it may also be sued in another jurisdiction, at least to the extent of subjecting its property, found within the jurisdiction, to the process and decree of the courts thereof, upon the acknowledged principle, that all persons and all property found within the territorial limits of any sovereignty, are subject to its authority and laws. This is a well established doctrine of international law. Story, Confl. Laws, §§ 530–618. Even the property of foreign sovereigns has not been deemed exempt from this territorial jurisdiction; and courts of admiralty have not unfrequently exerted their authority over such property. U. S. v. Wilder [Case No. 16,694]. Bynkershoek and other jurists maintain, that the private property of foreign sovereigns, whatever may be the case as to public property, is subject to the local jurisdiction of the courts, where it is found. Bynk. De Foro Legatorum, cc. 3, 4; S. P. cited [The Exchange v. McFaddon] 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 125, 126; The Prins Frederik, 2 Dods. 458–462; Mart. Law Nations, B. 5, § 9.

Upon the whole, I find no sufficient authority upon principles of general law, or maritime law, or admiralty law, to maintain the distinction contended for between the cases of an attachment of the property of a foreign corporation, and that of a private person, so far as the process of the admiralty is concerned. The exceptive plea or allegation to the jurisdiction of the court must, therefore, be overruled, and the corporation be assigned to appear and answer over to the merits of the cause; otherwise proceedings will be had upon their default against the property, as in other like cases.

CLARKE (ORME v.). See Case No. 10,577.
CLARKE (PELTZ v.). See Case No. 10,914.

Case No. 2,860.

CLARKE v. PROTECTION INS. CO.

[Cited in Martin v. Kanouse, Case No. 9,162. Nowhere reported; opinion not now accessible.]

Case No. 2,861.

CLARKE v. RIST et al.

[3 McLean, 494;[1] 2 West. Law J. 252.]

Circuit Court, D. Ohio. Dec. Term, 1844.

BANKRUPTCY—ACT OF 1841—LIEN—ENJOINING PROCEEDINGS IN STATE COURT.

1. Where a judgment is fairly obtained against a defendant who has only equitable rights, and a creditor's bill is filed to subject those rights to the payment of the judgment, if the process issued on filing the bill be served before the defendant's petition is filed under the bankrupt law, the proceeding constitutes a lien under the bankrupt law.

[Cited in Johnson v. Rogers, Case No. 7,408; Kimberling v. Hartly, 1 Fed. 574; Platt v. Mead, 9 Fed. 96.]

2. In such a case, the court will not issue an injunction to restrain the parties from proceeding on the creditor's bill in the state court.

[Cited in Clark v. Binninger, 38 How. Pr. 341; Myer v. Crystal Lake Pickling & Preserving Works, 14 N. B. R. 16; Kimberling v. Hartly, 1 Fed. 575.]

3. If fraud were alleged against the lien set up in the state court, that would be a ground on which the circuit court might take jurisdiction.

In equity.

Mr. Clarke and Mr. Coffin, for plaintiff.

Mr. Moodey and James Mason, for defendants.

LEAVITT, District Judge. This bill is filed by the complainant, as the assignee in bankruptcy of Godfrey Beaumont. The facts before the court, so far as it is necessary to notice them, are—that in 1842, the bankrupt Beaumont was possessed of an equitable interest in certain valuable real estate, described in the bill; and in connection with his two sons, constituting the firm of J. Beaumont and Sons, was engaged in business, in the county of Columbiana, as a manufacturer of woollen goods; that in the early part of November, of that year, this firm, laboring under some embarrassments in their business, transferred by bill of sale, to one Springer, nearly all their personal property, to indemnify him for his suretyship to the Bank of New Lisbon, and Springer took possession of said property, the 1st of December, 1842; that at the November term, in said year, of the court of common pleas of said Columbiana county, sundry judgments were obtained against the firm of Beaumont & Sons; on which executions severally issued the 2d of December, and were returned partially satisfied by a levy on personal property of the defendants; that shortly after, the plaintiffs in the several judgments recovered against said firm, filed bills in chancery in said court of common pleas, to subject the equitable interest of G. Beaumont in the real estate aforesaid, to the satisfaction of such judgments; and subpoenas duly issued, and were served in said cases, between the 3d and 7th of December. It also appears, that the Beaumonts filed their several petitions for the benefit of the bankrupt law [of 1841, 5 Stat. 440], the 15th of December, 1842, and were decreed bankrupts, and the complainant appointed their assignee, the 30th of January following; that soon after his appointment as assignee, the complainant was made a party to the proceedings in chancery, instituted by the judgment creditors, as aforesaid; and, as such appeared, and filed answers, denying the jurisdiction of the court, and insisting on the dismissal of the bills on that ground; that the court of common pleas retained jurisdiction of said petitions in chancery, and upon hearing decreed the sale of Beaumont's equitable interest in the real estate aforesaid, and the distribution of the proceeds among the judgment creditors; but no sale has yet been effected. It is also charged in the bill, that the counsel for the judgment creditors had notice of the assignment to Springer, and that Springer was in possession under it, previous to the institution of said proceedings in chancery. The bill prays for an injunction, restraining the parties from further proceedings in the state court; and, that the liens of said judgment creditors may be set aside, and the property sold by the complainant, for the benefit of the general creditors of G. Beaumont.

The question arising on this state of facts, and which this court is called upon to decide is, whether the judgment creditors (the defendants in this case) by their judgments, and the institution of the proceedings in chancery, to charge the equitable interest of the bankrupt as set forth in the bill, have acquired a lien on that interest, which is protected by the bankrupt law. The last proviso of the second section of the act declares, "that nothing in this act contained shall be construed to annul, destroy or impair, any lawful rights of married women, or minors, or any liens, mortgages, or other securities on property, real or personal, which may be valid by the laws of the states respectively, and which are not inconsistent with the second and fifth sections of this act."

[1] [Reported by Hon. John McLean, Circuit Justice.]

It is insisted on the part of the complainant, that the application of Beaumont for the benefit of the bankrupt law, suspended the jurisdiction of the state court in the chancery proceedings; and, that consequently, the decrees of that court in favor of the judgment creditors, for the sale of the equitable interest of Beaumont, in the real estate in question, were inoperative, and created no valid lien, in their behalf. On the other hand, it is contended, that as these judgments against Beaumont were obtained in the usual course of proceedings in the state courts, and without fraud or collusion between the parties, the court had full jurisdiction of the chancery proceedings, in their inception; that the subsequent application in bankruptcy by Beaumont, did not deprive that court of its power to proceed; and, that from the date of the service of subpoenas in the chancery cases, a lien existed in behalf of the judgment creditors, which this court will recognise and protect. It will be seen from the provision of the bankrupt act, above quoted, that liens which are valid by the state laws, and are not opposed to, and in contravention of, the bankrupt law, are unimpaired by its operation. The law of Ohio, under which the judgment creditors filed their bills, is intended to afford the means by which certain property and interests of a judgment debtor, may be rendered available for the payment of his debts, which could not be reached by the ordinary process of execution. To charge the equitable interests of a judgment debtor in real estate, and subject those interests to the payment of a previously acquired judgment, is one of the most common cases, in which this statutory proceeding is resorted to. The creditor, on a proper case made, is entitled by the provision of the statute, to a decree for the sale of the equitable interest of the judgment debtor. The statute declares, that "the said courts shall decree sales, and enforce all necessary transfers and conveyances, to vest in any person purchasing, or taking under such decree, all the right, title, and interest of the said debtor, in the interest sold, or the subject of the decree, at the time of the service of process in such case," &c. Swan's St. 704. From the language here used, it is undeniable that the lien of the judgment creditor is coeval with the date of the service of the subpoena in chancery. This, it is understood, is in accordance with the uniform construction of the law by the courts of Ohio, and the practice of those courts under it. The statute proceeds on the principle, that by the judgment at law the creditor acquires an inchoate right to the equitable interest of the judgment debtor; which, however, can only be perfected and made available, by a decree of sale by a court of chancery. But it is within the evident design of the statute, that from the time of the service of the process in the chancery proceeding, legal validity and force are given to this previously existing, but imperfect right. Under a similar statute in New York, the same practice and the same principle of construction have obtained in the courts of that state. The case referred to in the argument of this case, decided by the district judge for the northern district of New York, reported in the fifth volume of the Law Reporter, page 362 [General Assignee, Case No. 5,305], is very analogous in its facts to that now under consideration. In that case, certain creditors of a bankrupt, previously to the entry of a decree of bankruptcy, had filed their petitions in chancery, in a state court, under the statute of New York, to charge certain equitable interests of the bankrupt with the payment of their judgments. And the court held, that in the absence of any facts impeaching the original judgments as being fraudulent under the bankrupt law, the liens of the judgment creditors were protected; and an injunction to stay the proceedings of the parties in the state courts was refused.

The inquiry then arises, whether in the rendition of the several judgments in favor of the defendants in this bill, there was fraud, in fact or in law, vitiating not only those judgments, but also the subsequent proceedings in chancery, instituted to enforce the asserted liens, which are the subjects of controversy in this case. By the second section of the bankrupt act, it is provided in substance, that all payments, securities, transfers, &c., in contemplation of bankruptcy, and for the purpose of any preference or priority to any creditor, &c., or to any person, not being a bona fide creditor, or purchaser for a valuable consideration, without notice, shall be deemed utterly void, &c. The settled and uniform construction given to this clause is, that it condemns and invalidates all transfers of property, or rights of property, made in view or contemplation of an application for relief under the law; or, when the person is in such a condition of embarrassment as amounts to a state of bankruptcy, under either of the circumstances here supposed, it is in direct contravention of the policy of the bankrupt law, that the bankrupt should make any changes or transfers of his property, whereby the rights of his general creditors may be injuriously affected. Do the transactions between the bankrupt, Beaumont, and the defendants, fall within the prohibitions of this provision? In reference to the judgments obtained against the bankrupt, there is no allegation in the bill, that there was any actual fraud or collusion, in their entry or rendition. Nor is there any fact before the court from which, as a matter of necessary legal deduction, those judgments can be pronounced invalid. They were obtained in November, 1842, for debts contracted long before; and according to the usual course of proceedings in the state courts, either upon the issue and service of process, or by virtue of warrants of attorney previously executed for that purpose. The judgment creditors are not charged with a knowledge of the bankruptcy of the Beaumonts, at the time of the entry of these judgments; though the allegation is made, that their counsel was apprised of the bill of sale to Springer, before the commencement of the proceedings in chancery. But this does not infect the judgments with the taint of actual or constructive fraud. And no doubt can be entertained that, if Beaumont had then possessed the legal estate in the lands in controversy, the lien of the judgment creditors would have been effective and wholly unimpaired by subsequent application for relief under the bankrupt law. This position is fully sustained by the opinion of Judge McLean in the case of McLean v. Rockey [Case No. 8,891]. It is there said: "that a judgment constitutes a lien on real estate, which is recognised in the second section of the bankrupt law, is undisputed." And there is no allegation in the bill, that either in the causes of action, or in the prosecution of the above suits to judgment, there was fraud. The judgments therefore, having been rendered against the bankrupt, before his petition was filed, create a valid lien on his real estate. Are the rights of these judgment creditors impaired by the fact that at the time the judgments were rendered, the bankrupt Beaumont had no legal interest in the property in question on which a lien attached, under the statute of Ohio? The interest of Beaumont, as already stated, was merely an equitable interest. The proceedings under the statute, in the state court, to charge those interests, have been noticed. And it is to be observed, that these proceedings do not partake of the character of original suits. They are to be regarded in the light of incidents, or continuations of those suits. It would seem clear, from this view, assuming the judgments to be valid, that the state court had undoubted competency to entertain jurisdiction of the chancery proceedings, both before and after the application was filed by Beaumont for relief, under the bankrupt law. The lien of the judgment creditors, though not perfect on the rendition of the judgments, became so upon the service of the process in chancery, which was prior to the filing of the application in bankruptcy. These creditors then occupy the same position, and are entitled to the same rights, as if the bankrupt had possessed the legal estate, instead of an equitable interest, in the lands mentioned in the bill. Their liens are saved under the bankrupt law; and the state court having rightfully taken jurisdiction of the proceedings, designed to perfect those liens, may retain it, till the object sought for is consummated, in accordance with the statute. It is regarded as indisputable, that there is no ground for the imputation of fraud, actual or constructive, in commencing and carrying forward the chancery proceedings in the state court. If fraud attaches to these, it must be because the conduct of the parties has given them this quality or characteristic. So far as the judgment creditors are concerned, there is clearly no room for any unfavorable inference. They stand before the court on the footing of persons, who, with no discreditable vigilance, have legitimately pursued their rights, under a statute sanctioning the procedure to which they resorted. Nor is there any better foundation for an impeachment of the conduct of the bankrupt. It was not by his procurement or agency, that the creditors commenced proceedings to enforce their equitable liens. In these transactions he was merely passive; and could not therefore have imparted to them the quality of fraud. By these judgments, and the subsequent proceedings thereon in the state court, the defendants in the bill acquired a bona fide lien, prior to the filing of the petition in bankruptcy. The equitable interest of the bankrupt, in the property in question, did not therefore pass to, and rest in, his assignee; and no ground is presented for the exercise of the power of this court, in the withdrawal of those interests from the final disposition of the state court. The lien of the judgment creditors is saved, by the express terms of the bankrupt law; and this court has neither the right or the inclination to disturb it.

In the argument of the counsel for the complainant, the decision of this court in the case of McLean v. Lafayette Bank [Case No. 8,885], was referred to; and it was insisted, that the principles laid down by Judge McLean in the opinion delivered by him, vindicate the exercise of the jurisdiction of this court, in the case in which it is now invoked. But it will be observed, that the two cases differ in many essential features. In that decided by Judge McLean, there are various liens on the property of the bankrupt, by mortgages and judgments; some pending in a state court for adjudication; and in regard to all the liens, there was an express "allegation in the bill, that they were given in fraud of the bankrupt act." The judge, after reviewing the ample jurisdiction conferred on the federal courts by that act, in the settlement of all controversies growing out of bankruptcy, very justly concludes, "that where the foundation of the liens depends upon the construction of the bankrupt act, it would seem that the jurisdiction under which the law was passed, should carry it into effect." The case was argued on a motion to dissolve the injunction, so far as the rights of one of the defendants was concerned; and on full consideration, the motion was refused, and the case continued for final hearing; but with the express declaration by the court, that the question of jurisdiction was not to be considered as finally decided.

In controversies, involving the proper construction of the bankrupt act, the validity of liens under it, and the adjustment of conflicting rights and priorities, there is great propriety in invoking the exercise of the jurisdiction of the federal courts. Their powers in these matters are more ample than those possessed by the state courts, and they can more satisfactorily act upon and adjust the rights of all the parties concerned. But when a state tribunal has rightfully taken jurisdiction of a case, though having some connection with an estate in bankruptcy, it affords no sufficient reason for its withdrawal from that jurisdiction, that a federal court might have taken cognizance of it. And it is proper, that the courts of the nation should cautiously abstain from the unnecessary exertion of powers, which may bring them into conflict with the state courts. Nothing can tend to the more serious disturbance of the harmonious action of the state and federal authorities, than these conflicts. And as far as practicable, consistently with the operation of the just powers of each, they are to be studiously avoided. The injunction prayed for is refused.

Case No. 2,862.

CLARK v. SICKEL. FARNUM v. SAME. LEA v. LEEDS. SELLERS v. SICKEL.

[14 Int. Rev. Rec. (1871) 6; 4 Am. Law T. 141; 18 Pittsb. Leg. J. 309; 1 Leg. Op. 151.]

Circuit Court, E. D. Pennsylvania.

INTERNAL REVENUE—INCOME TAX—ACT JUNE 30, 1864.

1. The act of June 30, 1864 [13 Stat. 225], is within the power conferred by the constitution upon congress, so far as it imposes a tax upon incomes.

2. The income tax is not a capitation or other direct tax.

[At law. Actions by Clarence H. Clark against Horatio G. Sickel, Mary E. Farnum against the same, William Sellers against the same, and by Henry C. Lea against William R. Leeds.]

STRONG, Circuit Justice. The pleadings in all these cases raise the question whether the act of congress of June 30, 1864, and its supplements, so far as they impose a tax upon the annual gains, profits, or income of every person residing in the United States, or of any citizen of the United States residing abroad, are within the power conferred by the constitution upon congress. If it be true, as has been argued, that the income tax is a "capitation or other direct tax" within the meaning of the constitution, it is undoubtedly prohibited by the first and ninth sections of the first article, for it is not "apportioned among the states." But I am of opinion that it is not a "capitation or other direct tax" in the sense in which the framers of the constitution and the people of the states who adopted it understood such taxes. The reasons for my opinion it would answer no good purpose for me to state at length, inasmuch as these cases will doubtless go to the supreme court for ultimate decision. It is sufficient for me now to state that in my judgment congress has a constitutional right to impose all the taxes of which the plaintiffs complain, and that none of them are such as must necessarily be apportioned. With the policy of such an imposition I have, as a judge, nothing to do. Let judgment be entered for the defendants on the several demurrers.

CLARKE (SMITH v.). See Case No. 13,028.

Case No. 2,863.

CLARKE v. SOUTHWICK.

[1 Curt. 297.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. Term, 1852.

EQUITABLE LIENS—ENFORCEMENT—PRIVIES—LIMITATION.

1. Certain mill-owners having, by articles of agreement, associated themselves for the purpose of constructing reservoirs, &c., to improve the flow of the stream, and agreed that there should be a lien on their respective estates for the share of the expenses which each was to pay: Held, that this agreement was an equitable lien, which each member who had paid more than his proportion might enforce, without joining the others; and that the defendant, having purchased certain of the mills, with notice of the lien, after the debts were incurred by the association, took the estates cum onere.

[Cited in The Young Mechanic, Case No. 18,180; Lawrence v. Dana, Id. 8,136.]

2. Such a lien is not barred by lapse of less time than is sufficient, by the local law, to bar a suit for the foreclosure of a legal mortgage.

[In equity. Bill by Edward Clarke against James C. Southwick.]

CURTIS, Circuit Justice. This is a bill in equity, to establish and enforce a lien on certain mills, lands, and their appurtenances, belonging to the defendant. The facts upon which the lien is asserted are, that on the fifteenth day of April, 1837, articles of agreement, under seal, were entered into by certain persons who owned mills upon a stream of water in the town of Sutton, in the county of Worcester, the object of which was to associate themselves, under the name of the Sutton Water-Power Company, for the purpose of creating reservoirs of water, to render the stream, by which their mills were driven, more constant and full, for their common benefit; that the proprietors of six different mills were parties to this agreement; that they thereby agreed, among other things, that there should be a lien on their respective estates, to secure the faithful performance, by each to the other, of the covenants contained in the articles. Among these covenants was one, that the associates would pay all debts incurred in creating and managing this water power, in the proportions specified, one-sixth part thereof being chargeable to each of the six mills. The complainant was a member of this association, as one out of three owners of one of the mills; and two days after the execution of the articles, he became, by purchase from his co-tenants, sole owner thereof. The articles contained a provision, that, if either of the mills should be sold, the purchaser might become a member of the association. Three of the mills were conveyed, after the execution of the articles, to the Sutton Woollen Mills, a manufacturing corporation, which became a member of the association; and, while thus a member, and through its action as such, large expenses were incurred in the purchase of lands, the erection of a dam, and liabilities for land damages, from a flowage, which, though in part paid by the association, through regular contributions for that purpose, was mostly left unpaid; and the complainant, as one of the members of the association, has been obliged to pay the residue; and he now seeks, by this bill, to charge upon three of the mills, formerly owned by the Sutton Woollen Mills, but now owned by the respondent, three sixths of what he has thus paid, being the proportions stipulated by the original agreement to be borne by the owners of those mills.

[1] [Reported by Hon. B. R. Curtis, Circuit Justice.]

The first question made at the bar is, whether the articles created a lien on the real estate. Of this, I have no doubt. The parties covenant, each with the other, for the payment of all debts incurred in the execution of their common object; and then go on to bind, not only themselves, but "his and their respective estates hereinafter mentioned," to the faithful performance of all the provisions of the instrument; and after describing each estate, and the contributory share to be borne by it, they use this language: "Meaning and intending hereby to create a lien upon, and to bind our said estates, so far as we may, either in law or equity, do the same," &c. Whenever the owner of real property agrees, in writing, for a valuable consideration, that a lien for a debt or duty shall exist on that property, in the view of a court of equity, it does exist. Such an agreement is not executory merely, but so far as respects the parties, and those claiming under them as volunteers, or with notice, it is executed; it creates a trust, which this court will enforce, and by means of it, work out, according to its modes of proceeding, the payment of the debt, or the performance of the duty, which the parties have manifested their intention to have thus secured. The authorities in support of this position are numerous. I will refer to some, in which the principles upon which this position rests, are most clearly stated. In Legard v. Hodges, 1 Ves. Jr. 477, Lord Loughborough said: "I take the maxim to be universal, that wherever persons agree concerning any particular subject, in a court of equity, as against the party himself, or any claiming under him voluntarily, or with notice, a trust is raised." In Collyer v. Fallon, 1 Turn. & R. 469, the principle is laid down: "Contract, with respect to a given matter, binds the property, as between the parties to the contract, and all claiming under them, with notice." And in the recent case of Malcolm v. Scott, 3 Hare, 39, 46, 52, it is taken to be clear, that when you make out an agreement to give a lien, the lien exists. Upon this principle, Burn v. Carvalho, 4 Mylne & C. 702; Hankey v. Vernon, 2 Cox, Ch. 12; Clark v. Mauran, 3 Paige, 373; Parker v. Muggridge [Case No. 10,743]; and many cases in bankruptcy, from 1 Glyn & J. 13 to 2 Mont. & A. 224,—have been decided.

My opinion is, that the articles of agreement now in question, which in express terms declared that there was to be a lien on these estates, created an equitable lien, capable of being enforced through the power of this court.

The next question is, whether this lien is capable of being enforced at the instance of the plaintiff. It is argued, that only the association or company has this lien. This depends on the intent of the parties, manifested in the instrument; and I do not so construe it. The lien accompanies the covenant, and is intended to secure its performance. The covenant, that each will pay his proportion of the debts, is a several covenant by each with each member. Its language is, "and the members of the said company, each for himself respectively, &c., does covenant, promise, and agree, each with the other, &c., for the due and faithful execution," &c. Whatever several rights the plaintiff has, are, therefore, intended to be secured, and, in a court of equity, are secured by the lien, which is coextensive with the obligation of the covenant, and binds the lands, as that obligation bound the parties to it. It has been argued, that the members were not liable inter sese until after an assessment made; but there is nothing in the instrument on which to rest this position. The covenant by each to discharge and pay his stipulated proportion of all debts, is absolute and unqualified. The words "assessed" and "assessment" do occur in the instrument, but only as synonymous with share or proportion; and there is nowhere any provision calling for any formal act of assessment as a condition precedent to the right of each member to have every other member pay his stipulated part of the expenses of the association. It is true these debts were contracted while the Sutton Woollen Mills owned the three estates in question; and that corporation was not originally a member of the association, and did not execute the articles. But the articles contained a provision that any purchaser of either of these mills might become a member of the association, and the bill avers that this corporation did become a member. This averment of the bill is admitted to be true. Indeed, the very debts which the plaintiff has paid were contracted by that corporation as a member of the association. I am inclined to think that a purchaser of one of these mills, though he took his estate incumbered by the lien to secure the performance of this covenant, might exempt it from the charge for future debts by refusing to become a member of the association; but if he became a member, and actually participated in creating debts, I think the lien extended to his share of them. When he takes the title, it is charged with a lien, to secure the payment of the just contributory share of expenses which have been or shall be incurred, for the common benefit of that and five other estates. So far as expenses have then been incurred, they are clearly a charge on the land. Independent of any stipulation in the articles giving the purchaser a right to withdraw, and refuse to participate in future expenditures, it would be difficult to show that the estate would not be bound for them, even if he did not expressly consent to what was done. There are cases, in which, without any actual contract, equity will compel the owner of property to contribute to the cost of a work erected by another for their common benefit, as in case of a party wall. Campbell v. Mesier, 4 Johns. Ch. 334. This principle has never been extended to works designed to improve the flow of a stream, for the advantage of all the mills upon it, and there are sufficient reasons why it should not be so applied; but I know of no reason why the owners should not make a contract, not only to build, but preserve and manage reservoirs and other works for the common benefit of their respective mills, and charge the expenses thereof, permanently, on their respective estates, so that any purchaser would take his title cum onere, and be liable to pay the share belonging to his mill, even if he expressly dissented from the expenditure. As already intimated, I do not consider these articles were intended to bind the estate of any purchaser for expenses incurred after the purchase, against his will; but I see no difficulty in holding that the lien, which existed on these three mills when the original members of the association sold them, secured not only the payment of what there had been, but of what thereafter should be, expended, with the assent of the purchaser. It is true, that a purchase for a valuable consideration, and without notice, would take the estate discharged of the lien; but the bill avers notice to all the purchasers, including the defendant, and this averment is admitted to be true. My opinion is, that the Sutton Woollen Mills took these estates, charged with a lien for three sixths of the expenditures which had then been made pursuant to the articles, or which should thereafter be made with its assent; and that this lien was capable of being enforced by any member of the association.

It is urged, however, that this bill is defective, because the plaintiff has not joined the other members of the association. But they have no interest in this suit, the object of which is to charge on the defendant's estates, their contributory share. I am aware that formerly the rule was, that in a bill for contribution, all those liable to contribute must be joined, upon the hypothesis that each might assist the others in the taking of the account; but this rule has been found so inconvenient, and so little beneficial in practice, that, by an order made in 1841, it has been abrogated in England (1 Daniell, Ch. Pr. 331); and under the fifty-third rule for the practice of this court, I can have no doubt, that it is my duty to make a decree in the absence of those parties, as their joinder would defeat the jurisdiction, and a decree can be made without affecting their interests. If there was any property of this association capable of being applied, and which, equitably, ought to be applied in payment of its debts, before resorting to the lien asserted by the bill, all the members would be necessary parties, because they would then have an interest, both in the account of the debts and of the property, and in its application. But there is no such property. The works which the association has erected for the improvement of these mills, cannot be sold without defeating the very object for which the association was formed. Every member has a right to have them preserved, and to have every other member pay his contributory share, in order that they may be preserved. So far from these works constituting a fund to be resorted to in relief of the contributors, they are the very object of the contribution, and equity requires it to be made in order that the original purposes of the parties may be fulfilled. It is objected that the defendant may hereafter, by other suits, have other debts of the association charged on his estates, so that he is exposed to pay more than his just share, and thus be forced to seek for contribution himself, in another suit. If this were so, it would be a fatal objection; but the defendant not being a member of the association, and so not being personally liable, can never be forced to pay any more than three sixths of any debt, and so can never have any claim for contribution; for this proportion is what is justly and ultimately chargeable on his estates.

These are all the objections growing out of the supposed defect of parties, which have been assigned at the bar, and, in my opinion, they are not tenable.

The defendant insists that this is a stale claim; that the plaintiff has been guilty of such laches that this court will not lend its aid to enforce the lien. He relies on the doctrines of courts of admiralty respecting maritime liens, and several decisions on that subject were cited. But there is no occasion to resort to analogies drawn from another branch of jurisprudence, because equity has its own settled rules and principles which govern the case. First of all, equity protects bona fide purchasers without notice. Against such a purchaser it does not enforce such a lien. This leaves for consideration, only the rights of the party creating the lien, and those who succeed to those rights. As against them, an equitable mortgage is like a technical legal mortgage. If there be a statute of limitations, barring the rights of a legal mortgagee after the lapse of a certain time, equity will follow the law, and hold the same time a bar to a bill to foreclose an equitable mortgage. But it will not distinguish between an equitable and a legal mortgage in this particular. Hughes v. Edwards, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 494; Lingan v. Henderson, 1 Bland, 282; Moreton v. Harrison, Id. 491; Sheratz v. Nicodemus, 7 Yerg. 9. The fact, that the action at law for the debt, is barred by the statute is not material in equity, as it is not at law. Thayer v. Mann, 19 Pick. 535; Baldwin v. Norton, 2 Conn. 163. Keeping these principles in view, it is plain that the court cannot refuse relief in this case, either by reason of the statute of limitations, or upon the ground of laches. By the law of Massachusetts, twenty years adverse possession bars an action at law to foreclose a mortgage. Less than twenty years is not sufficient to afford a positive bar to a bill to foreclose an equitable mortgage, on land in that state. Neither is this a case in which laches can be imputed to the plaintiff. He paid these moneys from time to time, between 1839 and 1843, and in 1843 he brought a suit in the state court to enforce this lien. The suit failed, for want of a sufficient equity jurisdiction, in October, 1847, and in April, 1848, this bill was filed. Whatever might be said of this, if the plaintiff were seeking to call into action the discretionary authority, which this court exercises to give relief concurrently with courts of law, as in bills for the specific performance or rescission of contracts, there can be no pretence for saying, that this lapse of time has affected the right of a creditor, to obtain payment of his debt, through an equitable mortgage on land. Nothing short of such time and circumstances as raise a presumption of payment can avail the debtor, or discharge the land.

A decree is to be entered, referring the cause to a master to state an account, with directions to ascertain what debts of the association have been paid by the plaintiff, in full, and what in part only, if any, and also what debts of the association have been paid in full by the owners of the three estates held by the defendant, and what in part only, and let the report show when all such debts were contracted and paid.

Case No. 2,864.

CLARKE v. STRICKLAND et al.

[2 Curt. 439.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Maine. Sept. Term, 1855.

TAXATION—LEVY—FORFEITURE FOR NONPAYMENT—WAIVER.

1. Whether an uninhabited township of land, owned in severalty by different proprietors, was rightfully included in a tax act, which made no provision for a valuation of the land of the different owners, and an apportionment of the tax as is required by the constitution of the state of Maine (article 9, § 8), quaere.

[Cited in Hodgdon v. Burleigh, 4 Fed. 117.]

2. If the tax was legal and the land forfeited for the non-payment of the same, the forfeiture was waived by the levy of another tax, after the title of the state had become perfect under the forfeiture.

[Cited in Hodgdon v. Burleigh, 4 Fed. 127.]

3. A subsequent act of the legislature, giving further time for the payment of the tax, was also a waiver of the forfeiture, at least so far that a title under a tax sale must be made under this law.

4. If the county commissioners, in levying a tax, assess a larger sum than is granted by the legislature, it renders the whole tax void.

5. All the proceedings directed by statute for enforcing a forfeiture must be strictly followed.

6. The treasurer, in advertising the delinquency in this case, gave as the sum due the whole amount including the county tax. This was a fatal defect in the proceedings. The county tax being illegal, was not due.

7. The land agent is directed to sell the land, and he sold all the right, title, and interest of the state in and to the land. This is a different thing from the sale of the land itself

At law. This was a suit [by Joseph W. Clarke against Hastings Strickland, and others] to recover a certain tract of land, part of number 2, range 12 west from the east line of the state, in the county of Piscataquis, particularly described by metes and bounds in the writ. It was admitted for the purpose of this hearing that the demandant's title was good, unless it had been divested by a forfeiture to the state, and by a legal sale for non-payment of taxes. The forfeiture claimed was for the non-payment of the tax to the state and county, for the years 1842, 1843, and 1844. By the Revised Statutes [Me. 1840–41, p. 87] c. 14, § 9, if any taxes imposed by the legislature on any township, or tract of land not taxable by the assessors of any town or organized plantation are not paid within four years from the passing of the act making the assessment, the land shall become forfeited to the state.

[1] [Reported by Hon. B. R. Curtis, Circuit Justice.]

Mr. Rowe, for plaintiff.
Mr. Shepley, for the tenant.

WARE, District Judge. The first objection urged for the demandant against the tenant's title is, that this township is not rightfully included in these tax acts. They purport to levy a tax on "cities, towns, plantations, and other places," and one sixth of the tax is to be assessed by the assessors on polls. As this was an uninhabited township, it had no assessors, by whom the tax could be assessed, and no polls, on which it could be imposed. If, however, the difficulty, with regard to the capitation tax could be overcome, another remains not so easy to be removed. The township belonged to several owners, not owning in common, but holding in severalty, and by the constitution of the state, art. 9, § 8. "All taxes on real estate assessed by the authority of the state shall be apportioned and assessed equally, according to the just value thereof." But in this township, there were no assessors, by whom the valuation could be made, and no mode of making a valuation and apportionment is provided by the law, so that the tax must be levied on all the different proprietors pro rata, according to the quantity owned by each, without regard to the relative value of the different lots, though there might probably be a wide difference in this respect between them. On this ground it is contended that by the true construction of these tax acts, taking the constitution for our guide in interpreting them, they do not extend to and include uninhabited townships and tracts of land owned by different proprietors in severalty, as this was; but that when the acts mention cities, towns, plantations, and other places, these last descriptive words must be confined to places ejusdem generis, that is to places that have a municipal organization, so far at least as to have assessors, by whom the tax can be constitutionally apportioned.

The question thus raised, is evidently one of much practical importance, and as it appears to me of no inconsiderable delicacy, but as it involves a construction of the constitution and statutes of the state, it is more fit to be submitted in the first instance to the state tribunals than to this court, and as it is not deemed necessary to be decided in this case, it is passed.

In the second place it is contended, that if there has been a forfeiture, it has been waived by the state. If there has been a forfeiture, it was for the non-payment of the taxes assessed in the years 1842, 1843, and 1844, and in each case, it became perfect in four years from the time when the taxes were respectively levied. But the state continued to levy and assess taxes on this land, after the time when their title is supposed to have become perfect by forfeiture. It is not the practice of the state to impose a tax on its own property. Such an act would amount only to an unmeaning and expensive formality, so far as the tax was for the benefit of the state. It is argued therefore, that the imposition of a tax, after the supposed forfeiture, affords a conclusive presumption, either that there had been no forfeiture, or if any had accrued, that it was waived and remitted, otherwise it is said, that we must suppose it to have been the intention of the state, to extract from the former owners of the land, a tax levied after they had been divested of their title and it had become invested in the state itself, an imputation on the good faith of the state, equally indecent and untrue.

In reply it is said, that this very question was before the supreme court of the state, in the late case of Hodgdon v. Wright, 36 Me. 327, and that it was there decided that in such a case there was no waiver of the forfeiture. I do not understand the decision, precisely as it is understood by the tenant's counsel. The language of the court is: "The state does not appear to have insisted on forfeitures, when it could obtain payment without. Such a course of proceeding (that is, the levy of a tax after a forfeiture), might perhaps be properly considered as a pledge that the owner would be permitted to redeem." If it was such a pledge, it appears to me to be nothing less than a remission of the forfeiture, or if not an unqualified remission, at least an engagement, that it should not be enforced without further proceedings and notice. The legislature, it seems to me so to have understood it. The act of August 10th, 1848, c. 65 [Laws Me. 1848, p. 56], directs the treasurer of the state, within sixty days after the approval of this act, to publish a list of all tracts of land forfeited to the state, for the non-payment of taxes, specifying the amount of taxes due on each, and the time allowed by this act to pay the same, in certain newspapers named in the act. The second section authorizes the owner of land that had before become forfeited, to pay into the treasury the tax and other charges before the first day of the ensuing March, and provides that the treasurer's receipt shall discharge the land. The third section directs the treasurer, to furnish the land agent with a list of all tracts and townships of land, that had been advertised according to the direction of the first section, with the amount of tax, and charges thereon, who within sixty days, shall sell the same, after giving notice of the time of sale for three weeks in the manner pointed out by the act. This act appears to me to be a complete waiver of all prior forfeitures, and includes the land now in controversy. By a compliance with its terms, the owner becomes perfectly reinstated in his former rights. The land may again become forfeited by a non-compliance with its terms. If, however, it be considered as a conditional and not an absolute waiver and remission, and so the title in this case be considered ultimately to rest on the old forfeiture, it will still remain true, that whatever title the tenant derived from the sale must have its foundation in this law, because it was under the authority of this, that the sale was made.

The counsel for the demandant contends, that the proceedings of the state authorities to enforce the forfeiture were not in conformity with the law, but were in some respects fatally defective, so that either no title passed to the purchaser, or if any, only a defective title, which was liable to be extinguished by the repayment or tender of what the purchaser paid, and it was admitted that such a tender had been made.

One objection to the proceedings of the state authorities is, to the treasurer's advertisement. He is directed to specify in his advertisement the amount of taxes due, and he gave as the sum the whole amount, including the state and county tax. But in each year the county commissioners made an overlay, and assessed an amount beyond the grant of the legislature. The tax granted in 1842 was $3,620, that assessed by the county commissioners was $3,631.32; in 1843, the tax authorized was $3,000, that assessed was $3,076.32; and in 1844 the authorized tax was $3,560, and that assessed, $3,591.34. The assessors of towns and plantations are authorized to make an overlay to an amount not exceeding five per cent., but no such power is intrusted to the county commissioners. All the authority they had for levying any tax was derived from the statutes, and these limited them to the precise amounts named in the respective acts. The additional tax imposed by them was an excess of power that rendered the whole tax void, so that the state tax was all that was legally due. Such is the settled rule of jurisprudence. Stetson v. Kempton, 13 Mass. 272; Libby v. Burnham, 15 Mass. 144; Joyner v. Egremont School Dist., 3 Cush. 569. The object of requiring the treasurer to name the sum due is, to give notice to the owners of what they have to pay to redeem their land, and the stating in the advertisement a false sum is equivocal to giving no notice. It is insisted by the counsel for the plaintiff, that this is a fatal defect in the proceedings, that renders the defendant's title void. And the court is of this opinion.

Another objection is, that the land agent, by his advertisement, and sale pursuant to it, advertised and sold, not the land itself, but all the right, title, and interest which the state had in and to the land. The language of the act of 1848 is:—"The treasurer shall furnish the land agents with a list of all the tracts and townships of land, which have been advertised as is provided in this act, &c. And the land agent shall sell the same at auction," &c.,—that is, he shall sell the tracts or townships of land, and not the right or interest which the state has in them. These are, or at least may be, very different. The interest of the state may be the land itself, or it may be a lien upon it for what is due to the state for taxes. Rev. St. c. 14, § 2.

It is a familiar principle of jurisprudence, applicable to such cases, that he who would defend a tax title must be prepared to show that all the requirements of the statute, which provide a forfeiture and sale of any land for the non-payment of taxes, have been strictly complied with. Such titles, by which proprietors are deprived of their property usually for a mere fraction of its value, and often by surprise and without their knowledge, are not favored by the law. And therefore, as was observed by Chief Justice Whitman, (Brown v. Veazie, 25 Me. 362). "Great strictness is to be required, and it must appear that the provisions of the law preparatory to and authorizing such sales have been punctiliously complied with;" and he proceeds to commend the counsel for their astuteness, in scrutinizing the proceedings of the officers in that case. But this last objection is hardly open to the criticism of being inter apices juris. It rests on a substantial foundation of justice and equity. The fourth section of the act of 1848, provides that the owner of the lands at any time within three years after the sale, on producing evidence to the treasurer of his ownership, shall be entitled to receive back the balance of the price, for which the land was sold, after deducting the taxes and other charges. He has therefore, an equitable right before his title is extinguished, to have the land sold on the most favorable conditions, being interested in the surplus. A sale of the right, title, and interest of a party, naturally suggests to bidders a clouded title; it implies a doubt of the vendor as to the extent of his interest, and cannot be expected to sell for so much as would be given for the land itself. In the present case, the price paid by the purchaser was only the exact amount of the taxes and charges.

The opinion of the court is, that the demandant is entitled to recover.

CLARKE (THOMPSON v.). See Case No. 13,951.

Case No. 2,865.

CLARKE et al. v. THRELKELD.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 408.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. April Term, 1823.

REHEARING IN EQUITY.

A cause in equity in this court may be reheard if the petition for rehearing be filed before the end of the next term after the final decree, and if no appeal lies to the supreme court in that cause.

[Cited in Glenn v. Dimmock, 43 Fed. 551.]

This was a bill filed against Threlkeld and others, to obtain conveyance of a lot in Georgetown, to the complainants, in consequence of the deed, formerly made by Threlkeld to the ancestor of the complainants, of the same lot, having been lost before it was recorded. Threlkeld had no interest in the cause, and did not oppose the prayer of the bill. At June term, 1882, the court decreed that he should convey the lot to the complainants, and pay the costs. At the next term (October term, 1822) Taney, for the defendant, contended that the decree ought not to have been for costs. Key, contra, waived the formality of a petition for rehearing, and now, at this term (April term, 1823), consented that the court should consider the case as if the petition had been filed at October term, 1822. By the 31st rule of the equity practice of the courts of the United States, as prescribed by the supreme court, it is declared, that if no appeal lies to the supreme court, a rehearing may be granted, at the discretion of the court, at any time before the end of the next term after the final decree shall have been entered and recorded. The value of the lot decreed to be conveyed does not appear in the papers in the cause, but was supposed to be of less value than $1,000, so that it was a cause in which there could be no appeal to the supreme court.

THE COURT, under these circumstances, was of opinion (MORSELL, Circuit Judge, contra), that they had now a right to rehear the cause; and upon the rehearing, they ordered so much of the decree to be rescinded as regarded costs.

CLARKE (UNITED STATES v.). See Cases Nos. 14,809–14,813.

CLARKE (WHITE v.). See Cases Nos. 17,540–17,542.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

Case No. 2,866.

CLARK PATENT STEAM & FIRE REGULATOR CO v. COPELAND.

[2 Fish. Pat. Cas. 221.] [1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Feb., 1862.

PATENTS — "SAFETY APPARATUS FOR STEAM BOILERS"—VALIDITY—INVENTION — ANTICIPATION — CONSTRUCTION—DUTY OF COURT.

1. Clark's patent is for a mechanism, so organized and connected to the boiler of a steam engine or steam generator, that, when properly set to a given pressure in the boiler or generator, it will, automatically and promptly, by force of the pressure in the boiler or generator, open and close the damper, as the pressure in the boiler or generator rises above or falls below the figure at which the mechanism is set. In order to find this invention anticipated in a prior printed publication, the jury must find, from the evidence, that the description embodies substantially the same organized mechanism, operating substantially in the same manner as that described in Clark's patent.

[Cited in Gottfried v. Phillip Best Brewing Co., Case No. 5,633.]

2. Where a patent is offered in evidence as proof of prior invention, the construction of such patent, as of other written or printed instruments, is a duty which devolves upon the court.

[Cited in Goff v. Stafford, Case No. 5,504.]

3. It is a pertinent question, if the mechanism described in the prior patent was substantially the same as the plaintiff's, organized and capable of operating substantially in the same way, why, during the period of nearly thirty years that it was known to the world, it was not applied to the same use as the plaintiff's?

[Cited in Gottfried v. Phillip Best Brewing Co., Case No. 5,633.]

4. Old instruments, placed in a new and different organization, producing, in such new organization, different results, or the same results, by a new and different mode of operation, do not prevent such newly-organized mechanism from being patentable.

[Cited in Westinghouse v. Gardner, etc., Air-Brake Co., Case No. 17,450.]

5. With regard to the degree of mental labor and inventive skill required in the work of invention, the law has no nice or rigid standard. There must be some inventive skill exercised, but the degree of that skill is not material. It not unfrequently happens, in the progress of the mechanic arts, that the time arrives when the whole atmosphere of inventive thought is quickened with the life of an approaching discovery, that many liens of investigation and experiment, converging for a long time toward the point, almost, but not quite, reach it; when, at last, some mind, by a happy thought, supplies some new element, or instrument, or mode of organization, and instantly gives birth to the organized idea.

This was an action on the case [against Charles W. Copeland] tried by Judge SHIPMAN and a jury, to recover damages for the alleged infringement of letters patent [No. 5,254] granted to Timothy Clark August 21, 1847, and extended for seven years from August 21, 1861, for an "improved safety apparatus for steam boilers."

[1] [Reported by Samuel S. Fisher, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

The improvement consisted in the employment of a flexible vessel, which is expanded by the pressure of the steam; the outside of the said vessel being connected with the damper or valve which regulates the draught or blast, by a lever or levers controlled by a weight or spring, set to the required pressure of steam, so that when the pressure in the boiler exceeds the required pressure, the weight or spring shall be lifted to close the damper or valve, to check the fire; and when the pressure in the boiler falls below such required pressure, the weight or spring preponderating, shall produce motion in the opposite direction to open the damper or valve, and thereby increase the intensity of the fire.

The effect is to maintain a uniform pressure in the boiler, avoid the wasteful use of fuel, and prevent explosions.

The disclaimer and claim of the patent were as follows:

"I am aware that dampers for steam boilers have been operated by the pressure of the steam, by means of pistons, in various ways; and, therefore, I do not claim the opening and closing of the dampers by the pressure of the steam by means of pistons.

"But what I do claim as my invention, and desire to secure by letters patent, is the application of an elastic vessel, substantially as is herein described, instead of the piston, whereby the friction of the piston is avoided, and the operation on the damper is rendered much more uniform, the whole constructed and operated substantially as herein described."

Charles M. Keller, for plaintiffs.

George Gifford, for defendant.

SHIPMAN, District Judge, charged the jury as follows:

The plaintiffs are the owners of what is termed, in the present controversy, the "Timothy Clark" patent.

The alleged invention secured by the patent was made, according to the testimony of the inventor, in the spring of 1847. The original patent was issued in August of the same year. Owing to some defect or obscurity in the original specification, a very common circumstance, the patent was surrendered, a new specification filed, and the patent reissued. The patent was afterward extended, by the commissioner of patents, for a further term of years.

This suit is brought on the reissued patent; and, although the plaintiffs seek to recover for an infringement, it has been wisely agreed between the parties, that if the jury find a verdict for the plaintiffs, they may find nominal damages only.

The main object of the controversy is to settle the validity of the patent, as it generally is in patent suits, damages being of minor importance. It is always wise, where it can be done, without too great a sacrifice, to relieve the controversy of the embarrassment which often arises in attempting to fix the amount of damages, where the rules to be applied are not very clear, or easy of application. The jury, in this case, then, are relieved from all perplexity on that subject, and, if they find for the plaintiffs, should assess the damages at six cents.

But the important question for the jury to determine is, is this Timothy Clark patent valid?

Congress has wisely provided by law that inventors shall exclusively enjoy, for a limited season, the fruits of their inventions. To enable them thus to reap the benefits of their inventions, letters patent are issued to them, conferring upon them an exclusive grant, authorizing them alone to manufacture, sell, or practice what they have invented.

Upon such letters patent or grant the present suit is brought.

In order to sustain the suit, the grant must be valid. In other words, the invention described in it must be new and useful, for it is to new and useful inventions alone that the law applies.

A small degree of utility is sufficient to support a patent; and, in the present case, the defendant frankly admits that the patent is useful in some degree, and, therefore, is valid, so far as that question is concerned.

This leaves but two questions for you to dispose of: 1. Was the invention new? 2. Has the defendant infringed? If you find the first question in favor of the plaintiffs, you will, I apprehend, have no difficulty in coming to a correct conclusion on the second; and I shall follow the course pursued by both counsel, and confine my remarks to what I deem the only question which will require much of your attention.

Was the invention described in the plaintiffs' patent new at the time Clark says he invented it—in the spring of 1847?

In order to start correctly on this inquiry, let us first see clearly what is the precise invention described in the plaintiffs' patent; what, in other words, is the true construction of the plaintiffs' patent.

It is the duty of the court to determine this construction.

I charge you, then, gentlemen, that the invention described in the patent is a mechanism, so organized and connected to the boiler of a steam engine or steam generator, that, when properly set to a given pressure in the boiler or generator, it will, automatically and promptly, by force of the pressure in the boiler or generator, open and close the damper, as the pressure in the boiler or generator rises above or falls below the figure at which the mechanism is set.

The practical object of this organized mechanism, in its application to a steam engine, is to regulate and control the steam by uniformly maintaining the pressure at which the steam shall work the engine, at any given power the engineer chooses to fix, within the range of his engine, and thus to release the hand and mind of the engineer from the performance of that duty.

This is the invention which the inventor describes in his patent. His patent is prima facie evidence that this invention is new, or, in other words, that he is the first and original inventor of it. The defendant insists that, notwithstanding the patent, the invention is not new. He says that substantially the same organized mechanism existed, and was well known, before Clark's invention, and that it is to be found in the—1. Float regulator. 2. Piston regulator. 3. Brunton's operative thermometer.

As to the float regulator, it is not claimed that it is adapted to high pressure engines, and it is for the jury to say whether they find, in any description of this float regulator before them, the invention of this patentee. That the float regulator was described in books before the invention of Clark was made, of course, there is no doubt. That its description was well known to inventors and engineers for years before the invention of Clark, is equally true. But, in order to affect the validity of Clark's patent, the jury must find, from the evidence, that the description of this float regulator embodies substantially the same organized mechanism, operating substantially in the same manner as that described in Clark's patent.

As to the piston regulator—this is older than Clark's, but the same inquiry arises, and is to be disposed of by the jury: Does this piston regulator embody substantially the same organized mechanism, operating substantially in the same manner as Clark's?

In regard to both the float and piston regulators, the plaintiffs say that it may well be asked, why neither of these old contrivances were in any considerable use, at the time of Clark's invention, and why they have not been since, if they were substantially the same as his.

They claim to have proved that Clark's contrivance possesses great beauty and utility; that it performs, with ease and precision, what engineers were desirous of having performed by some mechanism that would dispense with their constant attention; and they insist, that if either the float or piston regulator was substantially like Clark's, it would have possessed substantially the same beauty and utility, and would have come into use. Of the force of this claim of the plaintiffs; when tried by the clear light of the evidence before them, the jury are to judge. If the jury do not find that either the piston or float regulator, as presented to them by the evidence, embodies the invention of Clark, as I have defined that invention, then they will inquire, if the description of Brunton's machine, contained in the printed specification of Brunton, sets forth substantially Clark's organized mechanism, as an organized mechanism, operating in substantially the same way? There has been a question raised as to the construction of one portion of Brunton's patent, and as the construction of printed or written instruments is a duty which the law devolves on the court, I will determine its construction upon that point.

The question is, whether the "Brunton's Operative Thermometer," as he terms it, is described as to be operated by liquids merely, or by fluids, when understood in the broad sense, as including both liquids and elastic vapors, such as steam and gases?

Brunton's patent speaks of his machine as having the elastic vessel expanded by fluids, and if the term fluids, as he used it, is to be understood as embracing elastic vapors, then the description includes steam as one of his agents of expansion. But, as I read his patent, he describes his machine or apparatus as to be expanded by liquids only. It does not necessarily follow from this construction that his operative thermometer could not be expanded, and operate by the expansive power of steam. Whether the organized mechanism he described was substantially like Clark's, and would, like Clark's, operate substantially in the same manner by the pressure of steam, the jury must determine from all the evidence.

And upon this point, the plaintiffs properly, in their argument, present to the jury the question—If the mechanism described by Brunton was substantially the same as Clark's, organized and capable of operating substantially in the same way, why, during the period of nearly thirty years that it was known to the world, was it not applied to the same use as Clark's?

That the elastic vessel in Brunton's machine was substantially like that of Clark's, there is no doubt.

This is conceded by the plaintiffs, and is obvious to any one. But this is not of itself sufficient to invalidate the plaintiff's patent. Old instruments, placed in a new and different organization, producing, in such new organization, different results, or the same results, by a new and different mode of operation, do not prevent such newly-organized mechanism from being patentable.

You will then look at Brunton's description, and see if you find there substantially described the invention of Clark, to wit: a mechanism, so organized and connected to a steam generator, that, when properly set by the engineer or operator, at a given pressure in the boiler or generator, it will, automatically, by force of the pressure in the boiler or generator, open and shut the damper, as the pressure in the boiler or generator rises above or falls below the figure at which the mechanism is set. If you find in Brunton's patent such a mechanism, so organized, then, of course, Clark's invention is not new. But, if you do not find such a mechanism, not only substantially the same in its particular parts, but so organized as that, when set in operation, it will produce substantially the same results in substantially the same way, then Clark's patent is valid, unless the change made by Clark is so obvious that it required no invention or labor of thought to make that change.

With regard to the degree of mental labor and inventive skill required in the work of invention, the law has no nice or rigid standard. There must be some inventive skill exercised, but the degree of that skill is not material. It not unfrequently happens, in the progress of the mechanic arts, that the time arrives when the whole atmosphere of inventive thought is quickened with the life of an approaching discovery, that many lines of investigation and experiment, converging for a long time toward the point, almost, but not quite, reach it; when, at last, some mind, by a happy thought, supplies some new element, or instrument, or mode of organization, and instantly gives birth to the organized idea.

If this inventor, Timothy Clark, has in this instance, supplied to what was old some new element, instrument, or new organization, and thus produced a better practical result than had been included by the old means, he is entitled to the merit and fruits of his labor.

It is claimed by the defendant, that the hand of the engineer is a better regulator than any automatic machine, and that it is a sufficient answer to the question, why these inventions, to wit: the float, piston, and Brunton's regulators are not in use, and have not attracted more attention from engineers.

Of the force of this you are to judge, in the light of the evidence, of the value of Clark's invention, and in view of the fact that the defendant, himself an engineer, has patented an apparatus having the same object.

If you find Clark's invention new, then the only remaining question is, has the defendant infringed? On this point, I do not apprehend that you will have any difficulty. The mere change in the form of the elastic or flexible vessel, or the material of which it is composed, does not take it out of Clark's invention, if the original mechanism is substantially the same, and operates substantially in the same way.

As I have already remarked, if you find for the plaintiffs, you will assess the damages at six cents only. The plaintiffs then can resort to a court of equity for any further protection of their rights.

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiffs.

Case No. 2,867.

CLARKSON v. MANSON.

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Nov. 15, 1880.

[Cited as an unreported case in Falls Wire Manuf'g Co. v. Broderick, 6 Fed. 654. Reported in 4 Fed. 257.]

CLARKSVILLE (GAUSE v.). See Case No. 5,276.

CLARKSVILLE (NORTHWESTERN UNION PACKET CO. v.). See Case No. 10,342.

CLARK THREAD CO. (WILLIMANTIC LINEN CO. v.). See Case No. 17,763.

CLASEN (PHELPS v.). See Case No. 11,074.

Case No. 2,868.

CLASON et al. v. SMITH.

[3 Wash. C. C. 156.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. April Term, 1812.

INSURANCE—REPRESENTATIONS—MATERIALITY.

1. A misrepresentation, which will avoid a policy, must not only be false, but it must be material, either in relation to the rate of premium, or as offering a false inducement to the underwriter to take the risk, when otherwise he would not have done so. If it had no influence, or ought to have had none, it cannot be said to have been material.

[Cited in Coles v. Marine Ins. Co., Case No. 2,988.]

2. The mere expression of an opinion by the assured, or an expectation as to a matter which might even imply that the party had some ground, deemed by himself sufficient, on which to build his opinion, would not amount to a material misrepresentation. It was the folly of the assurer, not to have inquired into the grounds of the opinion.

[Cited in Ruggles v. General Interest Ins. Co., Case No. 12,119.]

Action [by Clason & Dunham] on two policies of insurance; one on the ship Horatio, and the other on the cargo, at and from New-York to Tonningen, at a premium of 20 per cent. She sailed with her cargo on the voyage insured, in February, 1810, and has never been since heard of. There were two questions made in the cause—1. As to the seaworthiness of the vessel. 2. A material misrepresentation.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice, in the charge, summed up the evidence, and then left the question of seaworthiness to the jury.

As to the second question.—The misrepresentation asserted to have been made, is contained in a letter from the plaintiffs to their agent in Philadelphia, of the 23d of January, in which they agree to give 15 per cent. premium, and add, "we have no doubt, but that we could get the insurance effected in New-York at that premium." The defendant refused to take the risk for less than 20 per cent., and after some time the insurances were completed at that premium. The evidence proves, that applications were made to the different offices, the whole of whom refused to take the risk at all. In point of fact, then, this statement in the plaintiffs' letter of the 23d of January, was not true; and in this respect, the statement cannot be defended at the bar of conscience. But the question to be decided by the court and jury is, how stands the law in relation to this representation? A misrepresentation, to avoid a policy, must not only be false, but it must be material, either in relation to the rate of premium, or as offering a false inducement to the underwriter to take the risk at all; when otherwise, perhaps, he would not have done it. If, in point of fact, it had no influence, nor ought to have had any in these respects, then it is impossible to say that it was material. Now, it is clear, that in this case, the misrepresentation had no influence in affecting the rate of premium; because the underwriters proceeded upon their own judgment, and demanded 20, instead of 15 per cent., as the rate of premium; nor ought it induce them to take the risk at all, or in any respect to influence the rate of premium. The letter asserts nothing, but merely expresses an opinion, that the insurance could be effected in New-York, at 15 per cent. The very terms used, imply that the opinion was not formed on any thing certainly ascertained as to the fact; because if that had been the case, it would have ceased to be a doubt. The mere expression of an opinion, or an expectation, as to a matter which might even imply that the party had some ground, deemed by himself sufficient, on which to build his opinion, would not amount to a misrepresentation sufficiently material to avoid a policy; because it is the folly of the other party, not to inquire into the grounds of the opinion. But, when the opinion is such as cannot possibly be well founded, and bears on the face of it the full evidence that it is unauthorized, it becomes obviously harmless, so far as the insurer is concerned; and the conclusion becomes irresistible, that he was not misled, or if he was, that he has only himself to blame for it. Such is the present case. The plaintiffs say, they do not doubt that they could have the insurance effected in New-York, at 15 per cent. The insurer cannot possibly believe this to be a candid opinion, because, if it was, why should the plaintiffs come to Philadelphia, and at once offer to give the same premium here, and finally, consent to give 20 per cent.? If, indeed, the plaintiffs, by this uncandid statement, had endeavoured to get the insurance effected for less than fifteen per cent., and had succeeded, the defendant might have been deceived by the misrepresentation, inasmuch as it would have assigned at least a plausible reason for applying to the underwriters in Philadelphia. But even in that case, the statement would not have amounted to more than an opinion. If a man, in order to enhance the value of his property, asserts his belief, that he could get for it, from those who know its value, a certain sum, and offers it for the same price; or even for more; and in truth he knew that he had no just ground for the opinion he had expressed, but the contrary; we do not think that a court of law or equity would, on that account, set aside the contract of sale; for, it was the folly of the purchaser to govern himself by a mere opinion, without examining into the facts on which the opinion was founded. Nothing can be more clear, that in this case the misrepresentation was not material. Verdict for plaintiffs.

[1] [Originally published from the MSS. of Hon. Bushrod Washington, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, under the supervision of Richard Peters, Jr., Esq.]

CLAUDIUS (CAMPBELL v.). See Case No. 2,356.

CLAUSON (BREWERS' FIRE INS. CO. v.). See Case No. 1,851.

Case No. 2,869.

CLAY v. McCALLY et al.

[4 Woods, 605.][1]

Circuit Court, N. D. Alabama. Oct. Term, 1877.

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES—CONSIDERATION.

1. M., who was insolvent, conveyed to L., the mother of his wife, substantially all his property which was subject to execution, the alleged consideration being the payment of an account due from M. to L. Within two days thereafter, L., in consideration of natural love and affection, conveyed the same property to her daughter, the wife of M. Held, that these circumstances were indications of bad faith, and the deed executed by M. to L. could be sustained only on the ground that it was made for a valuable consideration and to pay an honest debt.

2. The consideration for the conveyance made by M. to L., mentioned in the first head-note, was an account said to be due from M. to L. for more than $42,000. The account had been running for twenty-three years. No demand for the payment of it or any part of it had ever been made. Some of the items were such as showed conclusively that their amount had been guessed at; others were for rent of land which L. did not own, but had previously conveyed to the wife of M., and for all it was evident that L. had not considered M. her debtor. No part of the account had ever been reduced to writing, and it was stated for the first time on the day the conveyance was made. Held, that the account was trumped up and fraudulent, and would not sustain the conveyance.

3. A gratuity cannot subsequently be converted into a debt so as to become the consideration of a conveyance made by the grantor to the injury of his creditors.

In equity. Heard for final decree on the pleadings and evidence.

The facts were as follows: On May 15, 1866 [the defendant] Thomas S. McCally, by his deed of that date, conveyed to his mother-in-law, the defendant Ann E. Langford, certain real estate, to wit: Nineteen acres and the undivided fourth of one hundred and thirteen and one-half acres in fee simple, and his life estate in the remaining three-fourths of said one hundred and thirteen and one-half acres, and his life estate in five hundred and forty-three acres, all situate in Madison county, Alabama. The personal property consisted of the following goods and chattels, to wit: Live stock, farming utensils and household furniture. The property so conveyed was worth about $10,000, and included nearly all his property subject to execution in Alabama. The consideration of this conveyance, as expressed in the deed, was a debt due from McCally to Mrs. Langford of $42,904.45. Within two days after said conveyance, Ann E. Langford conveyed the same property to the defendant Catharine M. McCally, who was her daughter and the wife of Thomas S. McCally, the consideration expressed being natural love and affection. On March 17, 1868, McCally was adjudicated a bankrupt by the district court for the northern district of Alabama, and complainant [Hugh L. Clay] was appointed the assignee of his estate. After appropriating all the assets that came to the hands of the assignee, there remained due to the creditors of the bankrupt estate more than $40,000. At the time of executing the conveyance to Mrs. Langford, McCally was insolvent.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William B. Woods, Circuit Justice, and here reprinted by permission.]

The debt which was the consideration of the deed from McCally to Mrs. Langford was evidenced by an account which purported to have been stated on the day the deed bore date. The debt due Mrs. Langford, as shown by the account, was for her share of four crops of cotton raised by McCally jointly with her in the years 1843, 1844, 1845 and 1846, and for rent of lands and hire of negroes from 1847 to 1862 inclusive. McCally had been a merchant, carrying on business from 1840 to 1861. There was no entry of the items of this account in any book kept by him, nor in any book kept by Mrs. Langford. The land for which rent was charged was that allotted to Mrs. Langford as dower in lands of which her husband had died seized. She had relinquished all except one hundred and twelve acres at the time of its assignment on March 3, 1843, and in 1856 had conveyed this one hundred and twelve acres to Thomas S. McCally's wife. The bill charged that the conveyance from McCally to Mrs. Langford was not bona fide, but, on the contrary, was made fraudulently with intent to hinder, delay, and defraud the creditors of McCally. The prayer of the bill was that said deed be set aside, and the property conveyed thereby be declared to be assets of the bankrupt estate and turned over to the assignee to be administered as such.

David P. Lewis, S. D. Cabiniss, and F. P. Ward, for complainant.

L. P. Walker, D. D. Shelby, and Paul L. Jones, for defendants.

WOODS, Circuit Judge. The defendant Thomas S. McCally, as appears clearly from the evidence, on or about May 15, 1866, conveyed substantially all the property of which he was seized or possessed subject to execution in Alabama, to his mother-in-law, Mrs. Langford, to pay an alleged debt due to her from him of over $42,000. The property so conveyed consisted of the live stock and farming implements on his plantation, and the plantation itself, and the house in which he with his family resided and the household furniture therein. In the fall of 1865, McCally had invested $13,000 in the bonds of the Memphis & Clinton Railroad Company and distributed them among his children, several of whom were minors, and in the year 1866 he had expended on the lands conveyed by him to Mrs. Langford the sum of $13,000. Within two days after the conveyance to Mrs. Langford, she conveyed, for the consideration of natural love and affection, the same lands and property to her daughter, the wife of McCally, by a deed which left him no interest therein which could be seized to pay his debts. The circumstances which surround these conveyances are certainly suspicious. The deed to Mrs. Langford can be sustained, if at all, only on the ground that it was made for a valuable consideration, and to pay an honest debt due by the grantor to the grantee.

Was there any such indebtedness as the deed recites? The account consists of charges for Mrs. Langford's share of cotton produced by her jointly with McCally in the years from 1843 to 1846 inclusive, for stock and plantation tools bought of her by McCally, and rent of land and hire of slaves from 1847 to 1862 inclusive. The account amounts to over $42,000. A most remarkable fact about it is, that no statement of the account or any part of it was ever made until May 15, 1866. Neither McCally nor Mrs. Langford, during the entire time which the account covered, from 1843 to 1866, a period of twenty-three years, ever put a single item in writing. Until May 15, 1866, there was no memorandum, entry, account, note or other scratch of a pen to show that McCally owed Mrs. Langford any amount, or that she claimed any amount from him. The first four items of the account are for the share of Mrs. Langford in the cotton crop produced by her and McCally jointly in the years 1843, 1844, 1845 and 1846. The account states her share at twenty thousand pounds each year, and the price at six cents per pound each year. That such an account is correct is incredible. That it is fabricated is clear. If McCally ever received the proceeds of any cotton produced in the years named, the property of Mrs. Langford, which it is unnecessary to deny, it is clear that no account was ever made of it, and the amount of the cotton and the price at which it was sold was guessed at, when the account stated was made up in 1866, after the lapse of twenty years.

The items of the account for the hire of negroes are open to similar objections. These items cover the period from 1847 to 1862 inclusive. It is not pretended that any account has been kept of these charges. No memoranda of these large items, running over a period of fifteen years, was ever made either by McCally or Mrs. Langford; nor is there a word of evidence to show that any contract of hiring was made which specified the number of slaves to be hired, or the price to be paid for their services, or any of the usual terms embodied in such contracts. The only hint that looks like a contract is the statement of McCally that in 1847 he hired the slaves referred to in the account. What this hiring really was, is made evident from the will executed by Mrs. Langford on October 7, 1864. In that will, after dividing her slaves between her two daughters, Mrs. Thomas S. McCally and Mrs. Wm. J. McCally, who were her only children, she declares: "I also direct and request, if desired by either one of my daughters, that an account current shall be made out for the hire of above negroes, including those that are dead, for the year 1847, being the year that I hired or let them have the negroes, taking into consideration the breeding and raising of young negroes, either one having to pay the other, that the balance may be against." This clause in the will makes it perfectly clear that in 1847 Mrs. Langford divided her slaves between her daughters and let them each have a portion of them, and that it was not her purpose to demand compensation for the hire, but that she intended their use to be a gratuity or something in the nature of an advancement to her daughters. It is utterly inconsistent with the pretense now set up, that from 1847 to 1862 there was a contract between Mrs. Langford and Thos. S. McCally, by which she hired to him, for a compensation to be paid her by him, the slaves referred to in the stated account.

The items for rent of land are also open to criticism. In the first place, Mrs. Langford is credited with the rent of two hunderd and thirty-five acres of land, when she only had one hundred and twelve acres to rent, and she is credited with rent of land year by year up to 1862, when she had, in 1856, conveyed the identical lands to her daughter, Mrs. McCally. It is not pretended that there was any contract between Mrs. Langford and McCally by which the amount of rent to be paid was agreed on. None of the terms of the contract were settled between them, even verbally.

It is perfectly clear from the evidence what were the dealings between Mrs. Langford and McCally. Mrs. Langford, during the period which the stated account covers, lived with her daughters, Mrs. Thos. S. McCally and Mrs. Wm. J. McCally, spending about half the time with each. No account appears to have been kept or charges made against her for subsistence. On her part, she appears to have been liberal and generous to her daughter, Mrs. Thomas S. McCally, and her daughter's husband. It is incredible that she ever expected to exact payment from McCally, or that he ever expected to make payment for the various items set out in the account stated, when we consider that no specific contract was ever made between them, even by parol; that no account of any sort was kept by either of the parties; that for a period of twenty-three years no demand was ever made by Mrs. Langford for payment of the amount now claimed to be due her, or any part thereof. From January 1, 1844, to May 15, 1866, no memorandum was made by either Mrs. Langford or McCally and no word passed between them that would indicate any indebtedness by the latter to the former; and Mrs. Langford out of regard for her daughter, who was the wife of McCally, seems to have allowed McCally to use the proceeds of her cotton, and to use her land and slaves to carry on his business and support his family without any purpose of ever demanding compensation therefor, and with no expectation on the part of McCally that pay would ever be expected. After a lapse of many years, when McCally had become embarrassed in his circumstances, evidently with the purpose of saving his visible and tangible property from execution by his creditors, the plan is conceived of stating an account between him and Mrs. Langford. The account shows on its face that it is an afterthought. No one reading the evidence would suppose for a moment that if McCally had not become embarrassed, and if there had not appeared to be a necessity to shield his property from execution, Mrs. Langford would ever have made out the account, or ever demanded payment, or that she ever expected to demand of McCally to make payment. If she had sued McCally to collect the amount claimed to be due her (as shown by the stated account), and he had pleaded the general issue, the evidence in this case would have made his defense complete and perfect. There was no debt due to Mrs. Langford from McCally; the deed to her from him was therefore without consideration.

The case is full of the evidence of bad faith. The device by which McCally put his property in the name of his wife, and beyond the reach of his creditors, is transparent. It is seldom that a clearer case of a fraudulent conveyance is brought to the attention of a court of equity.

There must be a decree in accordance with the prayer of the bill.

Case No. 2,870.

The CLAYTON.

[5 Biss. 162.][1]

District Court, N. D. Illinois. July, 1870.

LIEN FOR SEAMEN'S WAGES.

Seamen have a lien on the freight and cargo for their wages, and where the charterer of the vessel is also the owner and consignee of the freight, the lien nevertheless attaches, and the freight will be the amount which the transportation was fairly worth.

[Cited in The L. L. Lamb, 31 Fed. 34.]

In admiralty. This was a libel filed by the mates and crew of the bark Clayton against the freight and cargo of said vessel, on a voyage from Chicago to Collingwood and return, for their wages as seamen in the management of the bark.

BLODGETT, District Judge. The evidence discloses this state of facts: One Samuel D. Clark was the manager of the bark Clayton, under a charter party from her owner for the year 1867; was engaged in the lumber business in this city, and was running this bark between his mills and places where he procured his lumber and the lumber yard in this city, for the purpose of transporting lumber and timber. In the month of June, 1867, said bark started upon a voyage, with the libellants on board, from Chicago to Collingwood after a load of timber, and returned in due course of the voyage to this port with a cargo of pine timber consigned to S. D. Clark, the charterer of the bark and the owner of the cargo. Between the time this voyage was undertaken and the time of its accomplishment, Clark became embarrassed in his circumstances and made an assignment for the benefit of his creditors to C. M. Smith, and on the arrival of the bark with her cargo in this city, Smith, as the assignee of Clark, took possession of the cargo, the captain notifying Smith, at the time the cargo was unloaded, that he claimed his lien upon the cargo for the freight and seamen's wages. In point of fact, there was no technical freight earned in this case, the consignment being made by the owner to the owner. The shipment being for the benefit of the owner at this place, the assignee Smith taking possession of the cargo, he stepped directly into the shoes of the original consignee, Clark.

I think the authorities are clear that the crew of a vessel engaged upon the navigable waters of the United States have a lien for their wages upon the freight earned. As to whether that lien extends over and attaches to the cargo or not, I do not deem it necessary to decide in this case, but I have no doubt but they have a lien upon the vessel and upon the freight. In this case, the freight would be, although there were no freight bills made out as such, what it was fairly worth to bring the cargo from the place of shipment to the place of destination. There was no contract as to what the freight should be, because Clark was consignor and consignee both. He owned the cargo and had a season charter for the vessel, and was freighting the cargo here to be sold in due course of business by himself; but it does not follow that because he was thus engaged in transporting property from the place of shipment to the place of destination, to be sold, that no freight is earned in the sense of our maritime law, because he did not collect freight at the end of the voyage, but simply took the enhanced value of the cargo at this point as the advantage which he received by the shipment. I think, as between himself and the seamen employed upon his vessel, the freight earned is a fair quantum meruit for the transportation of the cargo from the place of shipment to the place of destination, and that the seamen have a lien upon that freight for the amount of their wages.

I shall therefore order a reference to the commissioner for the purpose of taking proofs as to what the freight of this vessel would fairly amount to on this cargo, and on the coming in of that report shall decree as against the freight earned the payment of the amount of the wages, not against the cargo specifically, but as against the freight earned. I am not disposed to discuss the question of the liability of the cargo, for I understand that the freight earned will be sufficient to pay the amount due to these men.

[1] [Reported by Josiah H. Bissell, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

CLAYTON (BATTEN v.). See Case No. 1,105.

CLAYTON (GRUBB v.). See Case No. 5,849a.

CLAYTON (HAMMEKIN v.). See Case No. 5,996.

Case No. 2,871.

CLAYTON et al. v. The HARMONY.

[1 Pet. Adm. (1807) 70.][1]

District Court, D. Pennsylvania.

SALVAGE—RESCUE OF PRIZE—COMPENSATION—SEAMEN—SUSPENSION OF WAGES BY CAPTURE.

1. The Harmony, bound to Philadelphia from Great Britain, was captured by a French vessel of war, part of her crew, &c., taken out, and ordered to Rochelle. The libellants and others, seven in number, including two female passengers, rose on the French prize-master and his crew, ten in number, rescued the Harmony, and brought her into Philadelphia. One fourth of the whole value of ship and cargo allowed as salvage.

[Cited in Hart v. The Littlejohn, Case No. 6,153.]

2. The contract between owners and mariners suspended by capture, as to all claims for wages.

[Cited in Strout v. The Cuba, Case No. 13,549.]

3. No difference, in justice, whether rescue by ship's crew, or those of another vessel.

4. Captors enemies on the sea.

[1] [Reported by Richard Peters, Jr., Esq.]

5. Legal obligations on mariners continue in cases of wreck, but not to rescue captured property.

6. Rewards beyond wages given to mariners, saving from wreck. Not fixed, but vary according to circumstances.

[Cited in The Massasoit, Case No. 9,260.]

7. No salvage allowed to fraudulent claimants.

8. Policy and justice of liberal salvage.

9. Quantum of salvage, on what principles adjusted.

10. Salvage on recaptures, by act of congress.

11. Wages from last port of delivery in part of shares of salvage.

BY THE COURT.

The libel states, that the ship sailed from Portsmouth in Great Britain, on the sixth of April in the present year, under convoy, from which she parted on the twenty-second of May following, and while proceeding on her voyage to Philadelphia, to wit, on the twenty-seventh of the same month she was captured by a French corvette commanded by a Captain Gallabert. That the captain of the Harmony, the officers, seamen and passengers, were taken on board the corvette, except the libellants, who were suffered to remain in the Harmony, on board whereof were put three French officers and seven seamen, who were ordered to conduct her into Rochelle in France. That the ship being on her way to Rochelle, on the twenty-ninth of May, she having been forty-eight hours and upwards in possession of the captors, was recaptured by the libellants and the mate of the said ship Harmony. The ship and cargo are stated to belong to Messieurs Crawford and Company, of Philadelphia, and divers other citizens of Pennsylvania. The prayer is, for such part of the value of ship and cargo to be awarded to the libellants, as shall be found due, according to the laws of the United States or by the laws of nations. The answer of James Crawford and Company, owners of the ship, in behalf of themselves and the owners and consignees of the goods, accords with the allegations of facts in the libel, as to the capture, but states that Anne and Esther Collet, two female passengers, were also left on board the Harmony. It also states, that considerable quantities of goods were plundered from the cargo by the French captors, the amount whereof, at the time of filing the libel, was unknown. The respondents allege, that Brown and Revel were articled seamen, that Clayton was a passenger, and had goods on board, as was also Ardley; but the latter was not an active party in the recapture, he having remained neuter. That the mate, John Nelson, was the principal author and agent in the recapture, to whose courage and abilities it was chiefly due; and that Anne and Esther Collet assisted, to the best of their abilities, therein. The respondents deny, that by reason of the premises, the libellants are entitled to salvage by the laws of the United States, or of nations, and pray, that the libel be dismissed with costs, &c. The libellants reply, that, though Clayton had goods on board, to the value of three hundred pounds sterling, they were insured in London, and that Ardley had no goods on board, and was a party to the enterprise, and did co-operate in the recapture. They allow that Nelson exerted himself for the rescue of the ship, but he could not have effected it, without their co-operation and assistance; but they deny that the recapture was chiefly due to his courage and abilities, or that he was the author thereof. They allege, that it was, in an essential degree, due to the courage, the arms and the abilities of the libellants, that the enterprize succeeded.

The testimony, of all the witnesses, concurs in the leading circumstances of the rescue, which was accomplished when the vessel had been forty-eight hours in possession of the enemy, by the joint efforts, of all the passengers and crew of the Harmony, left on board by the captors. There is no doubt, however, that some had more active merit and agency than others. The evidence with respect to Robert A. Ardley, is the least clear and intelligible. It would take up too much time to abridge the arguments of the counsel for the libellants, to whom I am obliged for many of the observations I shall hereafter make. It is contended, on the part of the respondents, that there is no positive law of the United States (the acts of congress only operating on the cases therein enumerated, and this is not one) or any adjudged case under the laws of nations, to warrant the claim of salvage, which is an imperfect right, like that to compensation for saving a house on fire, or goods in it—rescuing a person or his property from ruffians, robbers, &c. depending on the generosity of the persons benefitted. That the mariners are the servants of the owners, and are bound to recover the ship, whether wrecked or captured, or lose their wages, and they shall not be paid for doing their duty.[2] That the passengers or some of them, had goods on board, and if they were insured, they had the profits, if saved, in contemplation; the personal liberty of all was an object worth the contest. None of these could be obtained without recapturing the ship and cargo, which remained the property of the owners, until brought infra praesidia of the captors, and condemned in a court of admiralty. It was conceded, that such condemnation would, in all probability, have taken place if the property had been brought within the power of a French tribunal. It was prevented, by the recaptors, from going into a French port, to benefit themselves, and not the owners; but, if the property was not changed by the capture, the libellants can claim no part, it being wholly in the owners of the ship and goods. If the capture made it enemy's property, and divested the rights of the owners, then the recapture, if lawfully made, was prize to those who took it. Therefore, in either case there can be no right of salvage, nor is there any remedy either at common law or in the admiralty; there being no legal obligation on the owners to comply with such a demand. That it is dangerous to allow the principle of salvage, in case either of wreck or rescue by the crew; the mariners would, in one case, be tempted to run ships on shore; and, in the other, to submit to a trifling force, that, by saving the ship and goods, or recapturing them, they might obtain an unmerited reward. That, if there is an allowance for salvage in this case, a discrimination must be made between the salvors, and the female passengers should share the compensation given; from which Mr. Ardley should be totally excluded, as not being active, or any wise concerned in the recapture.[3]

[2] See 2 Azuni, Mar. Law (N. Y. Ed.) p. 274, and note cited from Emerig. Traité des Assur. p. 505: a similar doctrine held in argument; but the crew, rescuing the prize, were rewarded.

I think much has been said in this cause, tending to perplex, however unintentionally, a plain question, and, by no means relevant to the subject of enquiry. I did not anticipate, from counsel so truly respectable, such laboured opposition to compensation, under a plain principle of common law and common justice, evident to the most moderate understanding, and mentioned by Lord Holt, in the case of Hartford v. Jones, 2 Salk. 654: "He that serves another, ought in reason to be paid for his service." In the same case, this great and able judge, who was well acquainted with the general subject of laws, though peculiarly eminent in those of his own country, declares that, "salvors of goods cast away and saved may retain for payment, as a carrier for his hire; and salvage is allowed by all nations."—See, also, 1 Ld. Raym. 393. It is unfortunate that books reporting admiralty adjudications are rare. If the proceedings of these courts were published, the respondents' counsel would, no doubt, have had it less in their power to make the objection, that adjudged cases, to establish the libellant's claim, could not be shewn. This assertion, however, is not supported. There are not only particular instances, quoted from writers on the laws of nations, but clear and decided opinions, from the most distinguished authorities, adduced to warrant the present claim: nor are instances wanting, of cases determined in the courts of this country, both of common law and admiralty jurisdiction, as well those of the United States, as of the individual states. Though the cases, similar in circumstances are few, as they but seldom occur, the principles of the claim are supported by many authorities. See 2 Wood. El. Jur. 429–434; 1 Inst. Adm. 53–55, and authorities there cited; Lee, Capt. 95–100; 19 Vin. Abr. 275; Salk. 35; 2 Valin, Comm. 258; Wesk. Ins. 499, and many others. It is unnecessary to enquire into the motives inducing the recapture, or rescue. Speculative, or interested investigators, who, in analyzing the human mind, view the dark side of human nature, find that the best actions of men spring from selfishness. I do not envy them this discovery, or the humiliating reflections which flow from it.—It is enough for our present purpose, that the recapture has been made; and, that the owners of the ship and cargo have recovered their property to a very great amount. The benefit accruing to them, and not the motives, but the services of those, who, at the risk of their lives, and with highly meritorious exertions, restored, what would otherwise have been totally lost, are the leading objects of our present enquiry.

In opposition to the claim of the mariners, the cook and the steward, and the same objection lies to the mate, it has been stated, that they were the servants of the owners, and bound to recover the ship and cargo, or lose their wages. To these they were entitled, up to the time of arrival at the last port of delivery and for half the period of stay there, though the vessel and cargo had been lost; so that the part of their wages, put in jeopardy by the capture, was a small object. Nor is the benefit derived to the owners the less, because, in serving them, the salvors regained their persoual liberty, and, with it, some advantages to themselves. But it appears to me, that the contract between the mariners and the owners, was suspended—see note in the case of Brevoor v. The Fair American [Case No. 1,847]—or (as it respects any thing occurring thereafter) dissolved by the capture. Nor was the recovery of the ship and cargo from enemies, any part of the original contract with the seamen. 1 C. Rob. Adm. (Phila. Ed.) 234. I am confirmed in this opinion by Bynkershoek (2 J. P. l. i. c. 20), who says in a case similar in principle, though not in circumstances, "The owners and freighters of the vessel hired the mariners for the purpose of merchandizing only; and not to cruise for booty." This eminent writer puts the case of the company of a merchant ship, without commission, being attacked, and taking the ship assaulting them. He determines that the whole of the capture ought to go to the captors. In England there is a statute declaring how such capture shall be distributed, to wit, "That the officers and mariners shall receive such [3] Authorities cited by Ingersoll and Lewis, for libellants: 2 Wood. El. Jur. 448, 432, 428–430; Moll. de J. Mar. bk. 2, c. 5, § 4; 19 Vin. Abr. 275; Lex Merc. Red. 157; Wesk. Ins. 499; Kames, Eq. 10–172; 2 Salk. 654, pl. 2; Lee, Capt. 97–100; 1 Ld. Raym. 393; Mal. Lex Merc. 119, 106, 108; acts of congress relative to captures, &c., from French; 2 Valin, Comm. 258; 1 Jour. Old Cong. 260; 2 Jour. Old Cong. 13; 2 Burrows, 695; Lee, Capt. 78, 82; 2 Burla. Nat. 295, 15–18; Inst. Adm. 503, 504; 12 Mod. 134; 2 Wils. 213; Brooke, Prop. pl. 18, 38; Lee, Capt. 232, 238; Salk. 35.

By Rawle and Tilghman for respondents: 1 Emerig. Mar. Loans, 123; 2 Valin, Comm. 713; Lee, Capt. 86, 8; 2 Wood. El. Jur. 456; Wesk. Ins. 17; Inst. Adm. 54; 4 Bac. Abr. 616; 4 Com. Dig. 271, 16; Vin. Abr. 411, pl. 43.

share of the condemned ship and goods, as is usually practised in private men of war. Wood. El. Jur. 434. Whether the retaking be from pirates or enemies, does not alter the principles of justice; nor do I see any important distinction between a crew in another ship, taking or recapturing a vessel, or the crew and passengers of a ship, taken, vanquishing the captors and restoring the property; the latter, no more than the former, being under no obligation, thus hazardously, to serve the owners. As to passengers, there is no pretence of a contract, between them and the owners. In the enterprize there is more hazard and less means, and, of course, more merit in a recapture or rescue under the present circumstances, than in a retaking by an armed vessel, whether public or private. Be this as it may, the recaptors eminently served the owners, and "ought in reason to be paid for their services." There being then, clearly a right, the law would be very inefficient and defective indeed, if it did not give a remedy, but left the salvors at the mercy, or, as it is said, generosity of the owners. There is certainly a legal remedy, and it being a transaction within the jurisdiction of the admiralty, the remedy is here properly pursued.

Under the foregoing view of the subject, it is useless to discuss the point, insisted on by the respondent's counsel, of the property remaining in the owners, until a condemnation in a court of the captors. My opinion on this point has been given long since. Besides, there is no dispute here, about the property; for on the restoration of it, the whole claim to salvage rests. It is a claim for compensation, and not a claim to property.

That the French, on the sea, are our enemies, I have, on a former occasion, given my reasons for deciding.[4] That this vessel and cargo would have been condemned in a French court, is not denied. I consider the recapturing, in the present instance, as certainly within the equity and principles of the prize acts, if I may so call them, of congress, so far at least as to authorize the recaptors to consider the captors as enemies, from whom the spoil might be lawfully wrested. The rewards given by these acts to those within their terms, shew the sense of the legislature, as to all who are within their spirit and meaning. If it be granted, as it ought to be, that there is a similarity in principle between this case and that of ships and goods saved from wreck, I have no doubt that the same reasoning and law will apply. If there be a difference in the cases, it is favourable to the libellants; the legal obligations on the mariners continuing in the case of wreck, and not existing in that of re-capture. Although seamen are bound, if possible, to save a ship and goods wrecked, or lose their wages, they are also entitled to further compensation, by way of salvage. 1 Pet. Adm. 55 [Taylor v. The Cato, Case No. 13,786]. In some countries they have daily wages, by special ordinances or practice. But in all countries they are allowed more than their wages; if the property saved warrants this extra claim. This allowance is variously determined, according to the circumstances of the cases respectively. I could refer to many authorities and marine regulations, in addition to those before cited to prove this position. Even Wesket, who probably was largely concerned in insurances, as an underwriter, allows this to be law, though as has been observed by the counsel for the libellants, he closes his chapter on the subject, querulously. As to others than mariners, saving goods or ships, their right to salvage is, unquestionably, just and legal. It is true that frauds and abuses may be committed by sailors, as well as others, let a general principle or practice be never so just. Vessels are run on shore to obtain the amount of insurances—but it is not argued from hence that no insurances ought to be made; or, that those who are bona fide entitled, should not recover. Those who do right, ought not to be deprived of their reward, because others have done, or may do wrong. No salvage would be allowed to fraudulent claimants.—It is not only dictated by the plain principles of justice, but it is highly politic to give the mariners, either saving from wreck or recovering by recapture, and restoring property, liberal salvage beyond a mere quantum meruerint. Abundantly more benefits will accrue to commerce, by encouraging recoveries of property lost, or in imminent danger, than will ever happen by any abuses arising from the establishment of a principle, so just in itself, and exemplary in its consequences. The business of this court has so much encreased, that I have found it not only useful, but absolutely necessary, to settle general principles, as well for my own convenience, as to facilitate the business of suitors. It is for this reason, that I have gone into the general subject so extensively. I add these observations, to those I made on claims to salvage, in the case of Warder v. La Belle Creole [Case No. 17,165], that this point in its general principles may be at rest, in this court, so far as depends on me.

[4] In a case of prize on the capture of a French armed vessel. The supreme court of the U. S. in the case of Talbot v. Seeman (1 Cranch [5 U. S.] 1), gave salvage to a ship of war of the United States, for the recapture of a Hamburg vessel, out of the hands of the French (France and Hamburg being then neutral to each other) on the ground that the Hamburger was in danger of condemnation under the French arret of 18th January, 1798. In the same case (1 Cranch [5 U. S.] 31) the court considered the situation of France and the United States, in the year 1799, as a state of partial war. Sir William Scott has, in many cases, allowed salvage on recapture and rescue of neutral vessels from the French. See the case of the American ship, The Two Friends (M'Dougal, master), 1 C. Rob. Adm. (Phila. Ed.) 271, and a note to that case (page 284); the case of a Swedish ship, The War Onskan (Biedumpel, master), 2 C. Rob. Adm. 299; also the case of the Russian ship, The Eleonora Catharina (Kreagh, master), 4 C. Rob. Adm. (Phila. Ed.) 156.

From a consideration of all the circumstances, it appears to me, that, according to the evidence and the situation and capacities of the male recaptors, they should be classed in the following order.

1. John Nelson, the mate. The cook, in a manner highly meritorious, first mentioned to the mate that "he did not think it right the ship should go to France." He may have expressed the first idea of the recapture, yet it does not follow that the mate had not conceived it, or that the cook was the author of the plan. It was sufficient for the mate, who reproved this venial loquacity in the cook, to find him ripe for the attempt. Animated, no doubt, by this favourable omen, the mate immediately proceeded to discover the inclinations of his intended coadjutors. Perceiving a proper desire to co-operate in all, except R. A. Ardley, who, for some cause or other, was kept entirely ignorant of the plan, he proceeded to combine and arrange the design, and advise and direct, as well as finally to take his share in the dangerous, but successful, attack on the French officers and crew. His nautical skill was indispensable, as well, to the favourable issue of the recapture, as ultimately, to render it of any use in bringing the ship into port; which is as much a part of the ground for a claim to salvage, as the act of recapture.

2. Mathew Clayton, a passenger, whose personal courage, ready assistance, when he had determined to co-operate, and successful combat with the chief officer of the prize, were among the leading circumstances, which contributed to the fortunate issue of the contest.

3. The cook, Stephen Revel, a man of colour, whose merit is very distinguished. His reward should follow the spirited and beneficial exertions of one, whose station in life does not always produce persons of such courage and good conduct.

4. James Bowen, the steward, a black, whose deserts in cheerfully undertaking, and bravely accomplishing, his part of the enterprize, entitle him to share the reward of such hazardous services. I have a pleasure in declaring, that these are not the only instances I have had judicially before me, of virtuous, patriotic, and spirited conduct, in men of the African race.

5. Robert A. Ardley. There is a contrariety of testimony as to Mr. Ardley—he was not previously acquainted with the plan of, or engaged as a combatant in, the recapture. When he received the blunderbuss (the only fire-arm then in possession of the victors) from the mate, is not clear; it was after the officers in the cabin were subdued, and a short time before the whole of the French crew were confined. He appears to have done as much as was expected of him, after confidence was placed in him. Perhaps, towards the close of the contest, his being armed, overawed those, who, though dismayed, had not entirely submitted. Through the passage, after the recapture, he took his share in the watch, and in guarding the prisoners, which enabled others to assist in navigating the vessel. These services, in which all the recaptors partook, were necessary to the final accomplishment of the design. The bringing the ship into port was an essential part; and there was constant danger of the French crew rising and retaking possession.

The female passengers, Mrs. Anne Collet, and Miss Esther Collet, I have not yet noticed. But I should do great injustice to their merit, if I did not mention them with high approbation.—The firmness of mind evidenced by both of these ladies, in the critical situation in which they were placed, is as honorable to them, as their humanity, in attending the wounded, after the contest was over: their risk, in case the attempt to recapture had failed, was peculiarly great. Miss Collet was actively useful during the last scene of the enterprize, by taking the helm, when her services, in this essential part of the business was required in execution of the plan, with which both were made acquainted by the mate in its origin. Nor were they without their share of merit in the preparatory arrangements for digesting and executing the design. I do not estimate the circumstance of Miss Collet's obtaining from the French commander of the corvette, the return of Mr. Clayton and the steward on board the Harmony. This was, no doubt, accidental, and without any view to the object their return ensured, but it is still a circumstance of good fortune to the owners, derived from her influence and address.—She lost, by the plunder of the French crew, the greater part of the goods she had on board.

As to the quantum of salvage, I have taken into consideration all the circumstances—of value of the property—bravery in retaking—labour and risk in the recovery, and bringing into port. I have had some reference to the acts of congress, and endeavoured to discriminate, as justly as I can, between the relative merits of the salvors. I have found, in all cases of salvage, that it is impossible to satisfy all parties, and therefore endeavour to satisfy my own mind. But I do not find this to be unattended with difficulties. The appraised value of the ship is eight thousand dollars. The value of the cargo, according to the estimate made at the custom-house, is, deducting duties, ninety-two thousand eight hundred ninety-five dollars, sixty-nine cents—in all, one hundred thousand eight hundred ninety-five dollars, sixty-nine cents. By the act of congress, of July 9th, 1798 [1 Stat. 579], recaptured American vessels and cargoes pay salvage, not less than one-eighth, or more than one-half. By the act of March 2d, 1799 [1 Stat. 651], relating to public armed ships—American or friendly property in possession of the enemy more than forty-eight, and less than ninety-six hours, is liable to pay, on recapture, one-third part of the whole value. The expense of outfit was, no doubt, a consideration with congress in fixing the salvage. I have given less, than I otherwise should, to the present recaptors, as no such expense was incurred—I respect the principles of these regulations, though I am not bound to follow them exactly in the present case, which is not included in the acts. Considering the latitude allowed in the first act, of from one-eighth to one-half, without regard to time; and the fixed proportion of one-third in the second act, I have determined under all circumstances, to allow one-fourth part of the whole value of the ship and cargo to the salvors in full recompense for salvage, being the sum of twenty-five thousand two hundred twenty-three dollars, ninety-two cents. The wages of the mate, cook and steward, from the last port of delivery, to be in part of their shares of salvage respectively; and the costs and charges to be thrown on the remaining three-fourths. Had all those concerned in the recapture joined in the libel, I should have distributed the sum allowed as salvage, in the following manner and proportions. The whole sum to be divided into seven shares of three thousand six hundred and three dollars and forty-one cents each—whereof

1. John Nelson, the mate, to have two shares, or seven thousand two hundred and six dollars and eighty-two cents.

2. Mathew Clayton to have one share and an half, amounting to five thousand four hundred and five dollars and eleven cents.

3 & 4. The cook, Stephen Revel, and the steward, James Bowen, to have, between them, two shares, being seven thousand two hundred and six dollars and eighty-two cents, whereof the cook is to have three thousand eight hundred and fifty-three dollars and forty-one cents; and the steward three thousand three hundred and fifty-three dollars and forty-one cents.

5. Robert A. Ardley, half a share, or eighteen hundred one dollars and seventy cents.

6 & 7. Mrs. and Miss Collet, one share, or three thousand six hundred and three dollars and forty-one cents to be equally divided between them.

Therefore, I do hereby adjudge, order and decree, that the several libellants in this cause, have and recover the sums following, that is to say,

1. Mathew Clayton five thousand four hundred and five dollars and eleven cents.

2. Stephen Revel three thousand eight hundred and fifty-three dollars, and forty-one cents.

3. James Bowen three thousand three hundred and fifty-three dollars and forty-one cents.

4. Robert A. Ardley, eighteen hundred and one dollars and seventy cents.——The same to be in full satisfaction for their services, for the causes, in the libel mentioned. And I further adjudge, order and decree, that the said ship Harmony, with her tackle, apparel and furniture, and also her cargo aforesaid, be condemned, and that the same be sold by the marshal of this district, for the payment of the several sums of money herein before decreed to the libellants, respectively, and of the costs and charges, legally accruing in the premises.

CLAYTON (HOUSER v.). See Case No. 6,739.

CLAYTON (LE ROY v.). See Case No. 8,268.

Case No. 2,872.

CLAYTON et al. v. STONE et al.

[2 Paine, 382;[1] 1 U. S. Law Int. 69.]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. 1829.

WHAT MAY BE COPYRIGHTED—NEWSPAPERS.

1. A literary production to be the subject of copyright, need not be a book in the common and ordinary acceptation of the term; a volume written or printed, made up of several sheets and bound together. It may be printed on one sheet, as the words of a song, or the music accompanying it.

[Cited in Keene v. Wheatley, Case No. 7,644; Taylor v. Gilman, 24 Fed. 634; Harper v. Shoppell, 26 Fed. 519.]

2. The act of congress securing to authors and inventors the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries, was passed in execution of the power given by the constitution of the United States, and its object was the promotion of science and the useful arts. The act is for the encouragement of learning, and was not intended for the encouragement of mere industry, unconnected with learning and the sciences.

[Approved in Baker v. Selden, 101 U. S. 99. Cited in The Mark Twain Case, 14 Fed. 730.]

3. A newspaper or price-current is not such a publication as falls under the protection of the copyright law.

This was an action qui tam for an alleged infringement of copyright by the defendants [William L. Stone and Francis Hall], who were editors and proprietors of the "New York Commercial Advertiser," in copying into their paper the daily price-current or review of the market, compiled by plaintiffs [Edwin B. Clayton and others]. Defendants pursued a regular system of appropriating the substance of the price-current, a few hours after its appearance in each issue of their paper. At the trial, the jury, for the purpose of bringing the questions of law before the court for review, were directed to find a nominal verdict for the plaintiffs. Subsequently, Judge THOMPSON delivered the following opinion of the court upon the case which had been argued before them, ordering judgment to be entered for the defendants:

[1] [Reported by Elijah Paine, Jr., Esq.]

THOMPSON, Circuit Justice. Copyright was formerly considered to be founded on common law, but it can now only be viewed as part of our statute law. Gods. Pat. 8. A book within the statute need not be a book in the common and ordinary acceptation of the word, viz., a volume made up of several sheets bound together; it may be printed only on one sheet, as the words of a song or the music accompanying it. Id. 218.

The requisites to secure copyright under our act are: The author, before publication, must deposit a printed copy of the title of the map, chart or book in the district clerk's office, which must be recorded, a copy of the record to be printed on title page, and within two months thereafter cause such record to be published in one or more newspapers printed in the United States for the space of four weeks, and within six months after publishing the book cause to be delivered a copy. 2 Kent, Comm. 306.[2]

I am inclined to think the price-current cannot be considered a book within the sense and meaning of the act of congress. The literary property intended to be protected by the act is not to be determined by the size, form or shape in which it makes its appearance, but by the subject-matter of the work. Nor is this question to be determined by reference to lexicographers, to ascertain the origin and meaning of the word book. It will be more satisfactory to inquire into the general scope and object of the legislature, for the purpose of ascertaining the sense in which the word "book" was intended to be used in the statute.

It seems to be well settled in England, that a literary production, to be entitled to the protection of the statute on copyrights, need not be a book in the common and ordinary acceptation of the word—a volume, written or printed, made up of several sheets and bound together. It may be printed on one sheet, as the words of a song or the [2] The power of granting and protecting copyrights is vested, by the constitution of the United States, in congress. Article 1, § 8. The act of the 31st May, 1790 [1 Stat. 124], entitled "An act for the encouragement of learning, by securing the copies of maps, charts, and books, to the authors and proprietors of such copies, during the time therein mentioned." And the act of April 29th, 1802 [2 Stat. 171], "supplementary thereto, and extending the benefits thereof to the arts of designing, engraving and etching historical and other prints," compose the law of this country on this subject.

By the first of these statutes it is provided that the authors of any map, chart or book, or the proprietors of the copyright of any map, chart or book, printed in the United States, or made and composed, and not yet printed and published, and their executors, administrators or assigns, shall have the sole right of printing, publishing and vending the same for the term of fourteen years from the recording of the title in the clerk's office, as thereinafter mentioned. Such authors or proprietors must be citizens of the United States, or residents within the same. And if, at the expiration of the term, such authors are living and residents within the United States, the right shall be continued for the further term of fourteen years, provided the title of the book, &c., is again recorded in like manner. If any person, without the consent in writing of the author or proprietor, shall print, publish, or import any copies of such books, or shall publish, sell, or expose the same to sale, he shall forfeit every copy and every sheet thereof to the author or proprietor, to be destroyed by him, and shall also forfeit fifty cents for every sheet which shall be found in his possession, the one moiety to the author or proprietor who shall sue for the same, and the other to the United States, to be recovered in an action of debt, in any court of record of the United States wherein the same is cognizable; such action to be commenced within one year after the cause of action arises. A printed copy of the title of the map, chart or book, must, before publication, be deposited in the clerk's office of the district court, where the author or proprietor resides, who shall record the same in the manner and form specified in the act, and a copy of such record shall be published by the author or proprietor, within two months after the date thereof, in one or more of the newspapers printed in the United States, for four weeks. The author or proprietor of such map, chart, or book, is also required, within six months after the publishing thereof, to deliver to the secretary of state a copy thereof. But it is provided, that nothing in the act shall be construed to prohibit the importing, vending, printing or publishing, within the United States, of any map, chart or book, written, printed or published, by any person not a citizen of the United States, in foreign parts. The act further declares, that any person printing or publishing any manuscript, without the consent of the author or proprietor, in writing, (if such author or proprietor be a citizen of, or a resident of the United States,) shall be liable to such author or proprietor for all damages occasioned thereby, to be recovered by special action on the case, in any court having cognizance thereof; and provides that persons prosecuted by virtue thereof, may plead the general issue, and give the special matter in evidence.

The act of the 29th April, 1802, requires the author or proprietor of every book to insert a copy of the record, at full length, in the title-page or in the page following, and if a map or chart, to cause the following words to be impressed on the face thereof: "Entered according to act of congress," stating also the time when and the person by whom entered. This act also extends the benefits of the former act to every person being a citizen of the United States or a resident within the same, who shall invent and design, engrave, etch or work, or from his own works and inventions shall cause to be designed, engraved, etched or worked, any historical or other prints for the same term and upon the like conditions; the entry to be engraved on the plate, with the name of the proprietor, and to be printed on the print. Any person, within the time limited by the act, engraving, etching or working, copying or selling such prints, in whole or in part, or printing, reprinting or importing the same or any parts thereof, or causing the same to be done, or publishing, selling, exposing to sale or otherwise disposing of such prints, without consent in writing of the proprietors, shall forfeit the plate or plates, and the sheets wherever such prints are printed, to the proprietor of the original print, who shall destroy the same; and shall also forfeit one dollar for every print found in his custody, the one moiety to the person who shall sue for the same, and the other to the United States, to be recovered as provided in the former act. This act also provides, that if any person shall print or publish any map, chart, book or print, who has not legally acquired the copyright thereof, and shall insert therein or impress thereon that the same has been entered according to the act of congress, or words purporting the music accompanying it. 11 East, 244, note; 2 Camp. 27, note. It is true that the English statute of 8 Anne, in the preamble, speaks of books and other writings; but the body of the act speaks only of books, the same as in the act of congress; and a same, or purporting that the copyright has been acquired, such person shall forfeit one hundred dollars, one moiety to the person who shall sue for the same, and the other to the United States, to be recovered as aforesaid; the action to be brought within two years after the cause of action has arisen.

Statute of February 15, 1819 [3 Stat. 481], provides that the circuit courts of the United States shall have original cognizance, as well in equity as at law, of all actions, suits, controversies and cases arising under any law of the United States, granting or confirming to authors or inventors the exclusive right to their respective writings, inventions and discoveries; and upon any bill in equity, filed by any party aggrieved in any such cases, shall have authority to grant injunctions, according to the course and principles of courts of equity, to prevent the violation of the rights of any authors or inventors, secured to them by any laws of the United States, on such terms and conditions as the said courts may deem fit and reasonable: provided, however, that from all judgments and decrees of any circuit courts, rendered in the premises, a writ of error or appeal as the case may require, shall lie to the supreme court of the United States, in the same manner and under the same circumstances as is now provided by law in other judgments and decrees of such circuit courts.

Statute of February 3, 1831 [4 Stat. 436], provides that from and after the passing of this act, any person or persons being a citizen or citizens of the United States, or residents therein, who shall be the author or authors of any book or books, map, chart or musical composition, which may be now made or composed, and not printed and published, or shall hereafter be made or composed, or who shall invent, design, etch, engrave, work, or caused to be engraved, etched or worked from his own design, any print or engraving, and the executors, administrators or legal assigns of such person or persons shall have the sole right and liberty of printing, reprinting, publishing and vending such book or books, map, chart, musical composition, print, cut or engraving, in the whole or in part for the term of twenty-eight years from the time of recording the title thereof in the manner hereinafter directed.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, that if, at the expiration of the aforesaid term of years, such author, inventor, designer, engraver or any of them, where the work had been originally composed and made by more than one person, be still living, and a citizen or citizens of the United States, or resident therein, or being dead, shall have left a widow, or child, or children, either or all then living, the same exclusive right shall be continued to such author, designer or engraver, or if dead, then to such widow and child, or children, for the further term of fourteen years; provided, that the title of the work so secured shall be a second time recorded, and all such other regulations as are herein required in regard to original copyrights be complied with in respect to such renewed copyright, and that within six months before the expiration of the first term.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, that in all cases of renewal of copyright under this act, such author or proprietor shall, within two months from the date of said renewal, cause a copy of the record thereof to be published in one or more of the newspapers printed in the United States, for the space of four weeks.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, that no person shall be entitled to the benefit of this act, unless he shall, before publication, deposit a printed copy of the title of such book or books, map, chart, musical composition, print, cut or engraving, in the clerk's office of the district court of the district wherein the author or proprietor shall reside, and the clerk of such court is hereby directed and required to record the same thereof forthwith, in a book to be kept for that purpose, in the words following (giving a copy of the title, under the seal of the court, to the said author or proprietor, whenever he shall require the same): "District of ——, to wit: be it remembered, that on the —— day of ——, Anno Domini, ——, A. B., of the said district, hath deposited in this office the title of a book, (map, chart or otherwise, as the case may be,) the title of which is in the words following, to wit: (here insert the title:) the right whereof he claims as author (or proprietor as the case may be); in conformity with an act of congress, entitled 'An act to amend the several acts respecting copyrights.' C. D. Clerk of the District." For which record the clerk shall be entitled to receive, from the person claiming such right as aforesaid, fifty cents; and the like sum for every copy, under seal, actually given to such person or his assigns. And the author or proprietor of any such book, map, chart, musical composition, print, cut, or engraving, shall, within three months from the publication of said book, map, chart, musical composition, print, cut or engraving, deliver or cause to be delivered a copy of the same to the clerk of said district. And it shall be the duty of the clerk of each district court, at least once in every year, to transmit a certified list of all such records of copyright, including the titles so recorded, and the dates of record, and also all the several copies of books or other works deposited in his office according to this act, to the secretary of state, to be preserved in his office.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, that no person shall be entitled to the benefit of this act, unless he shall give information of copyright being secured by causing to be inserted in the several copies of each and every edition published during the term secured on the title page, or the page immediately following, if it be a book, or if a map, chart, musical composition, print, cut or engraving, by causing to be impressed on the face thereof, or if a volume of maps, charts, music, or engravings, upon the title or frontispiece thereof, the following words, viz.: "Entered according to the act of congress, in the year ——, by A. B., in the clerk's office of the district court of ——," (as the case may be.)

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, that if any other person or persons, from and after the recording the title of any book or books, according to this act, shall, within the term or terms herein limited, print, publish or import, or cause to be printed, published or imported, any copy of such book or books, without the consent of the person legally entitled to the copyright thereof, first had and obtained in writing, signed in presence of two or more credible witnesses, or shall, knowing the same to be so printed or imported, publish, sell or expose to sale, or cause to be published, sold or exposed to sale, any copy of such book without such consent in writing; then such offender shall forfeit every copy of such book to the person legally, at the time, entitled to the copyright thereof; and shall also forfeit and pay fifty cents for every such sheet which may be found in his possession, either printed or printing, published, imported, or exposed to sale, contrary to the intent of this act, the one moiety thereof to such legal owner of the copyright as aforesaid, and the other to the use of the United States, to be recovered by action of debt in any court having competent jurisdiction thereof.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, that if any person or persons, after the recording the title of any print, cut or engraving, map, chart or learned commentator upon American law (2 Kent, Comm. 311) seems to think the English decisions on this subject (Cowp. 623; 11 East, 244, note) have been given upon the body of the statute of Anne, without laying any stress upon the words other writ-musical composition, according to the provisions of this act, shall, within the term or terms limited by this act, engrave, etch or work, sell or copy, or cause to be engraved, etched, worked or sold, or copied, either on the whole, or by varying, adding to or diminishing the main design with intent to evade the law; or shall print or import for sale, or cause to be printed or imported for sale, any such map, chart, musical composition, print, cut or engraving, or any parts thereof, without the consent of the proprietor or proprietors of the copyright thereof, first obtained in writing, signed in the presence of two credible witnesses; or, knowing the same to be so printed or imported, without such consent shall publish, sell or expose to sale, or in any manner dispose of any such map, chart, musical composition, engraving, cut or print, without such consent as aforesaid; then such offender or offenders shall forfeit the plate or plates on which such map, chart, musical composition, engraving, cut or print, shall be copied, and also all and every sheet thereof so copied or printed as aforesaid, to the proprietor or proprietors of the copyright thereof; and shall further forfeit one dollar for every sheet of such map, chart, musical composition, print, cut or engraving, which may be found in his or their possession, printed or published, or exposed to sale, contrary to the true intent and meaning of this act; the one moiety thereof to the proprietor or proprietors, and the other moiety to the use of the United States, to be recovered in any court having competent jurisdiction thereof.

---

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, that nothing in this act shall be construed to extend to prohibit the importation or vending, printing or publishing of any map, chart, book, musical composition, print or engraving, written, composed or made by any person not being a citizen of the United States, nor resident within the jurisdiction thereof.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, that any person or persons who shall print or publish any manuscript whatever without the consent of the author or legal proprietor first obtained as aforesaid, (if such author or proprietor be a citizen of the United States, or resident therein,) shall be liable to suffer and pay to the author or proprietor, all damages occasioned by such injury, to be recovered by a special action on the case founded upon this act, in any court having cognizance thereof; and the several courts of the United States empowered to grant injunctions to prevent the violation of the rights of authors and inventors, are hereby empowered to grant injunctions in like manner, according to the principles of equity, to restrain such publication of any manuscript as aforesaid.

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, that if any person or persons shall be sued or prosecuted, for any matter, act or thing done under or by virtue of this act, he or they may plead the general issue, and give the special matter in evidence.

Sec. 11. And be it further enacted, that if any person or persons, from and after the passing of this act, shall print or publish any book, map, chart, musical composition, print, cut or engraving, not having legally acquired the copyright thereof, and shall insert or impress that the same hath been entered according to act of congress, or words purporting the same, every person so offending shall forfeit and pay one hundred dollars; one moiety thereof to the person who shall sue for the same, and the other to the use of the United States, to be recovered by action of debt, in any court of record having cognizance thereof.

Sec. 12. And be it further enacted, that, in all recoveries under this act, either for damages, forfeitures, penalties, full costs shall be allowed thereon, anything in any former act to the contrary notwithstanding.

Sec. 13. And be it further enacted, that no action or prosecution shall be maintained, in any case of forfeiture or penalty under this act, unless the same shall have been commenced within two years after the cause of action shall have arisen.

Sec. 14. And be it further enacted, that the "Act for the encouragement of learning, by securing the copies of maps, charts and books, to the authors and proprietors of such copies during the times therein mentioned," passed May thirty-first, one thousand seven hundred and ninety, and the act supplementary thereto, passed April twenty-ninth, one thousand eight hundred and two, shall be, and the same are hereby repealed: saving, always, such rights as may have been obtained in conformity to their provisions.

Sec. 15. And be it further enacted, that all and several the provisions of this act intended for the protection and security of copyrights, and providing remedies, penalties and forfeitures, in case of violation thereof, shall be held and construed to extend to the benefit of the legal proprietor or proprietors of each and every copyright heretofore obtained, according to law, during the term thereof, in the same manner as if such copyright had been entered and secured according to the directions of this act.

Sec. 16. And be it further enacted, that, whenever a copyright has been heretofore obtained by an author or authors, inventor, designer or engraver, of any book, map, chart, print, cut or engraving, or by a proprietor of the same: if such author or authors, or either of them, such inventor, designer or engraver, be living at the passage of this act, then such author or authors, or the survivor of them, such inventor, engraver or designer, shall continue to have the same exclusive right to his book, chart, map, print, cut or engraving, with the benefit of each and all the provisions of this act, for the security thereof, for such additional period of time as will, together with the time which shall have elapsed from the first entry of such copyright, make up the term of twenty-eight years, with the same right to his widow, child or children, to renew the copyright at the expiration thereof, as is above provided in relation to copyrights originally secured under this act. And if such author or authors, inventor, designer or engraver, shall not be living at the passage of this act, then his or their heirs, executors and administrators, shall be entitled to the like exclusive enjoyment of said copyright, with the benefit of each and all the provisions of this act for the security thereof, for the period of twenty-eight years from the first entry of said copyright, with the like privilege of renewal to the widow, child or children, of author or authors, designer, inventor or engraver, as is provided in relation to copyrights originally secured under this act: provided, that this act shall not extend to any copyright heretofore secured, the term of which has already expired.

Statute of June 30, 1834 [4 Stat. 728], provides, that all deeds or instruments in writing, for the transfer or assignment of copyrights, being proved or acknowledged in such manner as deeds for the conveyance of land are required by law to be proved or acknowledged, in the same state or district, shall and may be recorded in the office where the original copyright is deposited and recorded; and every such deed or instrument that shall in any time hereafter be made and executed, and which shall not be proved or acknowledged, and recorded as aforesaid, within sixty days after its execution, shall be judged fraudulent and void against any subsequent purchaser or mortgagee, for valuable consideration without notice.

ings in the preamble. In determining the true construction to be given to the act of congress, it is proper to look at the constitution of the United States, to aid us in ascertaining the nature of the property intended to be protected. Congress shall have power to promote the progress of science and useful arts, by securing for limited times to authors and inventors the exclusive right to their writings and discoveries. Section 8, art. 1, Const. U. S. The act in question was passed in execution of the power here given, and the object, therefore, was the promotion of science; and it would certainly be a pretty extraordinary view of the sciences to consider a daily or weekly publication of the state of the market as falling within any class of them. They are of a more fixed, permanent and durable character. The term science cannot, with any propriety, be applied to a work of so fluctuating and fugitive a form as that of a newspaper or price-current, the subject-matter of which is daily changing, and is of mere temporary use. Although great praise may be due to the plaintiffs for their industry and enterprise in publishing this paper, yet the law does not contemplate their being rewarded in this way; it must seek patronage and protection from its utility to the public and not as a work of science. The title of the act of congress is for the encouragement of learning (2 Bior. & D. Laws, 104 [1 Stat. 124]), and was not intended for the encouragement of mere industry, unconnected with learning and the sciences. The preliminary steps required by law, to secure the copyright, cannot reasonably be applied to a work of so ephemeral a character as that of a newspaper. The author is required to deposit a printed copy of the title of his book in the clerk's office of the district court, and the clerk is required to record the same, a copy of which record must be published for four weeks in one or more newspapers within two months from the date thereof; and a copy of the book is to be delivered to the secretary of state within six months from the publication, to be preserved in his office; and all this would have to be done for every newspaper. The right cannot be secured for any given time, for the series of papers published from day to day or week to week; and it is so improbable that any publisher of a newspaper would go through this form for every paper, it cannot reasonably be presumed that congress intended to include newspapers under the term book. That no such pretence has ever before been set up, either in England or in this country, affords a pretty strong argument that such publications were never considered as falling under the protection of the copyright laws. We are, accordingly, of opinion that the paper in question is not a book, the copyright to which can be secured under the act of congress. Judgment must, accordingly, be entered for the defendants.

CLAYTON (UNITED STATES v.). See Case No. 14,814.

CLAYTON, The JOHN E. See Case No. 7,338.

C. L. B. REED, The (MANHATTAN FIRE INS. CO. v.). See Case No. 9,021.

Case No. 2,873.

CLEARY v. MARTZ.

[Cited in Austin v. O'Reilly, Case No. 664. Nowhere reported; opinion not now accessible.]

Case No. 2,874.

CLEAVELAND v. SMITH.

[2 Story, 278.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Maine. May Term, 1842.

DEEDS — CONSTRUCTION — DESCRIPTION — BOUNDARIES — LATENT AMBIGUITY — CY PRES.

1. In the construction of written instruments, the intention of the parties is to be ascertained, not by parol evidence thereof, nor by mere conjecture, but by the application of certain rules of interpretation to the instrument itself.

2. Wherever there is a latent ambiguity in an instrument, as in the case of a mutual mistake in the descriptive words therein, the intention of the parties is to be collected from the instrument taken as a whole, and effect given thereto cy pres, and whatever is inconsistent therewith is to be rejected.

3. The general rule in the interpretation of the descriptive words of deeds and grants, is, that courses, distances, admeasurements, and ideal lines, must yield to known and fixed monuments upon the ground itself, whether they be natural or artificial.

4. Where, in a grant of land from the commonwealth of Massachusetts to the towns of Taunton and Raynham, the land was described as "beginning on the north line of the million acres at a yellow birch tree, six miles east from the south-east corner," &c. (the said birch tree being marked as a monument in the original survey of the land); whereas the said birch tree did not, in fact, stand upon the said north line, as supposed, but was so situated, that a gore of land was left between it and the said north line; it was held, that the said birch tree, and not the said north line, was to be taken as the boundary of the land granted.

This was a writ of entry, brought to recover a tract of land described in the demandant's writ, in which he declared on his own seisin, and a disseisin by the defendant [Francis O. J. Smith], within twenty years. The defendant pleaded nul disseisin, and on this plea issue was joined. The cause was tried before the district judge (Judge Ware). At the trial, the plaintiff [Stephen H. Cleaveland], to prove his title to the land in dispute, offered his deed from the agent of the commonwealth of Massachusetts, and state of Maine, of the land described in his writ, executed and bearing date Sept. 25th, 1834. The agency was admitted, and he contended, that the said tract passed to him by the said deed. The defendant, to prove his title to the said tract of land, introduced a deed from the commonwealth of Massachusetts to the towns of Taunton and Raynham, dated on the 31st day of January, 1820, of the following described tract of land, namely, "One half of a township of land, of the contents of six miles square, lying in the county of Somerset, as the same was surveyed by Thomas McKecknie, the 30th Nov., 1813, bounded as follows, viz., beginning on the north line of the million acres, at a yellow birch tree, six miles east from the southern corner of the township number three, in the first range of townships, north of William Bingham's Kennebec purchase, thence running east six miles on said million of acres north line to a yellow birch tree, within about half a mile of Moosehead lake, thence north three miles, thence west six miles, thence south to the yellow birch tree begun at, containing eleven thousand five hundred and twenty acres." And this deed, he contended, on its southern boundary, covered all the lands to the north line of the million acres, (commonly called the Bingham purchase), and extending on that line the full length of six miles; and that the said deed towns of Taunton and Raynham being prior in date to the grant of Massachusetts and Maine, dated on said 25th September, 1834, Maine and Massachusetts had no lands, which could, on that day, be conveyed; but that the whole passed by the grant of Massachusetts to Taunton and Raynham on January 1st, 1820. The million acre tract (the Bingham purchase) was located and surveyed in 1792, and the north line thereof was marked and distinguishable. The plaintiff contended, that the tract in dispute was not conveyed by the grant of the commonwealth of Massachusetts to Taunton and Raynham, but remained in Massachusetts and Maine, on the 25th of Sept. 1834, when these two states conveyed the same to the plaintiff; and he introduced testimony, tending to prove that the two yellow birch trees on the said grant of the 1st of January, 1820, were not, as originally fixed and marked on the face of the earth in the original survey in said million acre north line; but were at a distance and to the north of the said line, and were in the line originally marked and surveyed as the south boundary of the Taunton and Raynham grant, and left, between the marked birch tree and the said million acre line, a strip or gore of land, which the said commonwealth and state conveyed to the plaintiff by their grant aforesaid, dated the 25th day of September, A. D. 1834. And he contended, that, inasmuch as the said two birch trees, marked as monuments in the original survey, did not coincide with the million acre north line, mentioned as part of the description in the said grant, the two birch trees established on the face of the earth, as monuments, must govern in fixing the boundaries of the said grant on the south line of the same; and that the strip or gore aforesaid passed to him by the said grant of September 25th, 1834; and to this effect the judge instructed the jury.

[1] [Reported by William W. Story, Esq.]

The judge was requested, by the counsel for the tenant, to instruct the jury, that if they were satisfied, that it was the intention of Massachusetts to grant, and of the towns of Taunton and Raynham to receive, according to the terms and language of the grant, viz., to the north line of the million acre tract, that they should find accordingly, notwithstanding there might be a discrepancy in the evidence, as to the actual running of the line of the said towns of Taunton and Raynham, or a variation, by mistake, in the marking of it. Which instruction the judge refused to give to the jury. And the judge left it to the jury, to determine, from the evidence, whether the south line of the Taunton and Raynham half township was identical with the north line of the million acre tract, stating to the jury, that this was to be determined by ascertaining, whether the two yellow birch trees were, in fact, in that north line. If they were, then their verdict ought to be for the tenant; otherwise it ought to be for the demandant.

The jury found, that the said birch trees, referred to as monuments, and descriptive of the said grant, were not in the million acre north line; but were so situated, as to leave the strip or gore aforesaid between the said million acre north line and the south boundary line of the Taunton and Raynham grant, as located on the face of the earth, at the time of the original survey and location thereof. The defendant produced the original plan of the survey and the laying of the said half township, granted to the towns of Taunton and Raynham, by Thomas McKecknie; and the plaintiff proved other monuments in the said survey, tending to establish the lines of the same, as contended for by him. The tenant moved for a new trial, for misdirection of the judge, at the trial, in matter of law.

The motion for the new trial was argued at this term by C. S. Daveis for the tenant, and by Deblois, (with whom was Wm. Pitt Fessenden,) for the demandant.

Deblois, (with whom was Wm. Pitt Fessenden,) against the new trial, argued, in substance, as follows:

There is a mistake in the description of the grant from the commonwealth of Massachusetts to Taunton and Raynham, dated January 1st, 1820, inasmuch as the several trees, marked as boundaries, are not found in the north line of the million acre tract; and, there being such a mistake, the actual location on the face of the earth is to govern; and, in the case at bar, the line marked by these monumental trees is to govern, instead of the north line of the million acre tract. The rule of law is, that where land is conveyed by a deed referring to a plan, between which and the original survey, there is a difference in the location of lines and monuments, the lines and monuments originally marked are to govern, however they may differ from those represented on the plan. Cherry v. Slade, 3 Murph. 82; Conn v. Penn [Case No. 3,104]; Mageehan v. Lessee of Adams, 2 Bin. 109; Ripley v. Berry, 5 Greenl. 24; Brown v. Gay, 3 Greenl. 126; Esmond v. Tarbox, 7 Greenl. 61; Machias v. Whitney, 4 Shep. [16 Me.] 343; Herbert v. Wise, 3 Call, 239; Dimmitt v. Lashbrook, 2 Dana, 2; Brown v. Gay, 3 Greenl. 126; Pernam v. Wead, 6 Mass. 133; Magoun v. Lapham, 21 Pick. 135. The case of Frost v. Spaulding, 19 Pick. 445, is directly in point; and affirms the principle, by which, we say, the present case is governed. In the present case, however, the facts are stronger to support the principle than in the case last cited, inasmuch, as in the case at bar, the monuments are set forth in the grant, while, in the case cited, the monuments were not fixed until after the deed was made. See, also, Vose v. Handy, 2 Greenl. 322; Wing v. Burgis, 1 Shep. [13 Me.] 111; Wendell v. People, 8 Wend. 190. All grants and conveyances are supposed to be made with reference to an actual view of the premises by the parties thereto; and it is, therefore, a general rule, in the construction of grants, that both course and distance must give way to natural or artificial monuments or objects; and courses must be varied, and distances lengthened or shortened, so as to conform to the natural, or ascertained objects or bounds called for by the grant. Wendell v. People, 8 Wend. 190. Parol evidence is admissible to show, that a course and boundary, in a survey and patent, are incorrectly stated, and that they are otherwise upon the ground. Mageehan v. Lessee of Adams, 2 Bin. 109.

C. S. Daveis for the defendant, in support of the motion for a new trial, argued in substance as follows:

The first rule of construction requires, that the intention of parties should, if possible, be carried into effect. It is not disputed, and does not admit of question, that the half-township, granted to Taunton and Raynham, should abut upon and adjoin the million acre tract, granted to Bingham. But it is contended, that this should not prevent the introduction of proof by parol evidence, that such intention was not carried into effect, and that the yellow birch tree, referred to in the survey as standing on the line of the million acres, did not, in fact, stand there. The general rule that monuments referred to in a deed may be ascertained and established by parol evidence, is not to be questioned. Even this case affords example and occasion for its application.

Parol evidence is to be received to prove the location and previous existence of the million acre grant to Bingham, and the north million acre line. Such testimony does not vary, nor contradict, the language in the conveyance. On the contrary, it only applies it. So, there may be two or more streams, trees, (yellow birch trees,) stakes, or other monuments, each conforming to the description in the deed; and in such case, a latent ambiguity is disclosed, which may be explained by parol evidence. If, in attempting in this case to designate upon the earth the bounds named in the conveyance, it had been found that there was no such location as the million acres, and no such north line; then so much of the description, though apparently plain and clear, would have been found to be false, and that portion must have been rejected. And parol proof might then have been admitted, to prove the situation of the yellow birch tree; and that proof would not have contradicted any thing, which could be regarded as a part of the deed. When a conveyance declares a fact, as that the land, conveyed or granted, adjoins a river, or a street, or a road, parol evidence cannot be admitted to prove that it does not, unless a latent ambiguity be found, or unless the allegation be found to be false, and is, therefore, rejected. When the monuments referred to in the location of this grant, such as the million acre grant, and the north million acre line, are found to exist, as described, to allow the land granted to be separated from them by parol evidence, would be to give a preference to that which is uncertain, dependent on memory, and subject to change, to that which is clearly expressed, and declared in writing, and is of positive and certain designation. The north line of the million acres, already surveyed, was a monument named in the grant, as where the yellow birch stood; and it appears to have been adopted for the purpose of defining with certainty its position and situation. The yellow birch tree is not to be disturbed or separated from the million acre north line. The language used in the conveyance would be contradicted, and the conveyance itself so far defeated. If there should be two monuments, equally certain and permanent, and alleged to be found at the same point, and it should appear in proof, that both existed, but not at the same point, a false description would be disclosed; and it would become necessary to determine, from other parts of the conveyance, which allegation was false, and which was to be rejected. But where two monuments, one of certain, and one of uncertain location, are stated to adjoin each other, the one of certain location must be regarded as named for the purpose of making the position of the other certain. The grant in this case declaring, that the land granted to Taunton and Raynham does adjoin the million acres, the parol evidence to show, that the yellow birch tree, mentioned as being in that line, was elsewhere, is inadmissible.

The following cases were then cited: To the question of construction: Frier v. Jackson, 8 Johns. 396; Preston v. Bowman, 6

Wheat. [19 U. S.] 580; Blagge v. Miles [Case No. 1,479]; Thomas v. Hatch [Id. 13,899]; Vose v. Handy, 2 Greenl. 322; Frost v. Spaulding, 19 Pick. 445; Wing v. Burgis, 1 Shep. [13 Me.] 111. To the question of boundary: Newson v. Pryor's Lessee, 7 Wheat. [210 U. S.] 7; Preston v. Bowman, 6 Wheat. [19 U. S.] 580; Loring v. Norton, 8 Greenl. 69; McIver's Lessee v. Walker, 9 Cranch [13 U. S.] 173; 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 488.

STORY, Circuit Justice. The charge of the learned judge of the district court comes to this; that if the north line of the Bingham purchase was not coincident with the monuments on the land, granted by the commonwealth of Massachusetts to the towns of Taunton and Raynham, then the monuments were to govern, and not the Bingham line, and consequently, that the title of the defendant, under the towns of Taunton and Raynham, did not extend to the Bingham line, and the demandants were entitled to the gore or strip of land between that line and those monuments, under the grant to them by the commonwealth.

The argument on behalf of the defendant is, that the charge of the learned judge was erroneous, because it was the intention of the government, in the grant to Taunton and Raynham, to make the southern line thereof coincident with the Bingham line; and that it is consequently the duty of the court to give effect to that intention, although thereby the monuments actually on the land should be disregarded. But this is assuming the very point in controversy. I agree, that, in this case, as in others, arising upon the construction of written instruments, the court are to carry into effect the intention of the parties, if, by law, it may be so carried into effect. But, then, how are we to ascertain the intention of the parties? Certainly not by parol evidence, varying the language, or by mere conjecture; but by the application of just rules of interpretation to the very language of the instrument itself. Now, it may be assumed, that the intention of the government in its grant was, that the southern line thereof should begin at the Bingham line; but it was equally the intention of the government that the land granted should be bounded by the descriptive monuments stated in the grant. The government, from the survey, presumed, that the monuments were actually on the very boundary line of the Bingham purchase. This turns out to be a mistake, the monuments are at a considerable distance north of that line; and they leave a gore or strip of land between the two tracts. It is the common case of a latent ambiguity; and the real question is, what, in a case of mutual mistake in the descriptive words of the instrument, is to be done? Now, there can be but one of two courses adopted by a court of justice, under such circumstances; one of which is, to set aside the instrument, as inoperative, on account of the mistake, which would, in this case, be to defeat the object of both parties; the other is, to ascertain the real intention of the parties from the words of grant taken altogether, ex visceribus concessionis; and to give effect to that intention, notwithstanding the misdescription, if I may so say, cy pres, rejecting such of the descriptive words as are inconsistent with that intention, or are properly to be deemed subordinate, as accidents, and not as incidents thereto. This latter doctrine is the doctrine adopted by courts of law, upon the ground of the well known maxim, "ut res magis valeat, quam pereat." There is no magic in particular instruments; the doctrine is equally applicable to all instruments, where the intention is sought for, and is to be executed. Thus, in a will, if there be a general intention expressed, and a particular intention repugnant to the former, the rule of interpretation is, that the particular intention is to be rejected, and the general intention is to be carried into effect, as the predominant intention of the testator. So if there be a partial misdescription in a will of the devisee or legatee, or of the thing devised or bequeathed, and yet the party or the thing can, by reasonable interpretation, be ascertained with reference to the extrinsic evidence, creating the doubt, courts of law, as well as of equity, will reject such part of the misdescription as is manifestly unessential, and give full effect to the main intention, deducible from the words. Now, precisely the same doctrine is applied to the interpretation of deeds, and other written instruments. If the descriptive words are, with reference to the actual facts, repugnant, or inconsistent with each other, and yet the intention of the parties can be ascertained, the misdescription will not vitiate the instrument; but it will yield to the clearly ascertained intention. And it is only when the language, with reference to the actual facts, involves such fatal errors, and mistakes, as leaves the court without reasonable means of ascertaining the real intention, that the instrument will be treated as a nullity.

It is with a view to ascertain the intention of the parties to deeds and grants, that courts of law, for the purpose of founding just presumptions of the intention, have adopted certain rules of interpretation, not as artificial rules, built upon mere theory, but as the true results of human experience. When, therefore, they have held it to be a general rule, in the interpretation of the descriptive words of deeds and grants, that courses, and distances, and admeasurements, and ideal lines, should yield to known and fixed monuments, natural or artificial, upon the ground itself, they have but adopted the result of the common sense of mankind, because sources of mistake may more easily arise from the former than from the latter; and it is more likely that men may commit an error in courses, or distances, or admeasurements, or in references to ideal liens, such as those of surveys, than in monuments, and fixed and stationary objects, visible on the very land; and that in purchases and sales and bounties, the latter, as the best ordinary means of information, as well as of exclusive possession, are uppermost in their minds, and regulate their acts and intentions. Hence, a known spring, referred to as the corner of a boundary line, has always been deemed a more certain reference, in the understanding of the parties, than the ideal line of a survey of the land of another person, supposed to terminate at the same place. If they differ in point of location, the uniform rule is, that the spring governs as to the corner boundary, and not the survey. For the like reason, the plan of a survey, if it does not coincide with the actual monuments on the land, yields to the latter in point of certainty and proof of intention. The same ground is equally true as to courses and distances from monument to monument. If they differ, the monuments govern, and not the courses or distances; or, in other words, measurements yield to monuments, because they are more open to mistake, and less carefully observed, or significantly marked. I have dwelt the more upon this point, because the main stress of the argument has been rested upon the supposed intention of the parties; and is has been pressed upon the court, that the cases, which have been already decided, do not conclude the present case; or, indeed, if they otherwise would, that they are not founded upon satisfactory reasoning. In my judgment, all the cases, cited at the bar, turn upon one and the same general principle; and that is, to give effect to the real intention of the parties, whenever it can be ascertained from the words of the instrument, and the actual state of the facts; and if there is a misdescription, to apply the common rules of interpretation to resolve the doubt, and to give effect to the predominant intention. Besides, we must treat the present case exactly in the same way, as if the grant, instead of being a bounty, had been a sale for a valuable consideration by the government. Suppose, then, that the north line of the Bingham purchase, instead of falling short of the monuments, had actually extended far beyond and within them, so as to have cut off one third of the granted land, owing to the monumental boundaries, what would have been the legal result? Would the government, if the grant had amongst other covenants contained a covenant of warranty, be entitled to set up the defense, that the Bingham line was the boundary, and not the monuments; and hence, that there was no breach of the warranty? Clearly, such an interpretation would be held inadmissible; and yet it ought to prevail in that case, if it be allowed to prevail in the present case. Indeed, in cases of this sort, the principles of interpretation must be the same, whether the grant be a public grant, or a private grant. The boundaries, in case of a misdescription, must be ascertained precisely by the same rules, and none other, since the intention must be the same, whether the grant be public or private. It is essential to the protection of titles, that the interpretation should depend upon known, fixed, uniform principles, and not upon the conjectures of judges, or the nice balancing of possible intentions, or the supposed leading but undefined motives, in a particular grant. What ground is there in the present case, any more than in any other, to suppose, that the line of the Bingham purchase was, in the view of the parties, primary in importance, and that the monuments on the ground were to yield to that line, although it might be a mere imaginary line, wholly dependent upon courses, and distances, and quantity of acres, not included within any visible boundaries on the land, or otherwise precisely defined? I profess myself unable to perceive any ground for such an interpretation. Suppose the Bingham line, truly run, had receded three miles south of the line, held by possession, would the grant to Taunton and Raynham reach those three miles, and over all the intermediate space, although instead of a half township, it might then include a whole township? Or, under the like circumstances, would the line by possession govern, although it varied equally from the monuments and from the true line? The truth is, that the moment we desert the old rules of interpretation, we are off of soundings, and deliver over the titles to lands to interminable doubts. Here, if ever, the rule should apply, "via trita, via tuta." For myself, I must say, that all the authorities, cited on the present occasion, are in my judgment harmonious upon this subject; and they differ only in applying the same general rule to the varying circumstances of each particular case, with a correspondent flexibility of force and adaptation.

The case of Newsom v. Pryor, 7 Wheat. [20 U. S.] 7, affords a strong illustration of the general doctrine. It was there said, by the court, that the general rule in all cases of this sort, is, "That the most material and most certain calls shall control those, which are less material and less certain. A call for a material object, as a river, a running stream, a spring, or even a marked tree, shall control both course and distance." The same doctrine was fully recognized and acted upon in McIvers' Lessee v. Walker, 9 Cranch [13 U. S.] 173; in Preston v. Bowmar, 6 Wheat. [19 U. S.] 380; in Barclay v. Howell's Lessee, 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 498; in Boardman v. Reed's Lessee, 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 328,—and, indeed, in all the subsequent cases, which have come before the supreme court of the United States. Decisions of a similar nature are to be found in the reports of many of the states of the Union; and with such a uniformity of interpretation of the doctrine, as is rarely to be found in any other class of cases. See many cases collected in 1 Metc. & P. Dig. tit "Boundaries," pp. 473–476; Greenl. Ev. § 301, and the authorities there cited. The authorities, cited at the bar, from the Maine and Massachusetts Reports, fully sustain the same position. The same rule pervades the whole current of the English authorities; and the leading cases will be found referred to, in Doe dem. Smith v. Galloway, 5 Barn & Adol. 43. In short, the maxim, "falsa demonstratio non nocet, cum de corporo constat," is here applied with good significance and propriety; and the intention, which overrides the mistake in the description, is deduced from other demonstrations less fallible and more certain, both in character and importance. The case of Frost v. Spaulding, 19 Pick. 445, approaches very nearly in its main circumstances to the present case; and if an authority was wanting, it would certainly have a persuasive influence. But I prefer to place the present case upon the general ground already mentioned, as one sustained by solid reasoning, just interpretation, and general convenience.

The motion for a new trial must therefore be overruled, and judgment on the verdict be given for the demandant.

Judgment for the plaintiff.

CLEAVELAND (TREADWELL v.). See Case No. 14,155.

CLEAVER (FIRST NAT. BANK OF ASHLAND v.). See Case No. 4,800.

CLEINS (ATLANTIC & PAC. R. CO. v.). See Case No. 631.

Case No. 2,875.

The CLEMATIS.

[Brown, Adm. 432.] [1]

District Court, E. D. Michigan. June, 1872.

EXCEPTIONS TO LIBEL—NEGLIGENT TOWAGE—LIABILITY OF AGENT TO THIRD PERSONS FOR TORTS.

1. Where a tug, which had agreed to tow a barge from Saginaw to Cleveland, was compelled by stress of weather to turn the barge over at an intermediate port to the master of another tug, by whose negligence she was lost: Held, that the owner of the barge could maintain an action for negligence against the second tug.

2. Quaere, whether he could not also support an action for breach of contract.

In admiralty. Libel for "negligent towage."

The libel alleged that the barge Mohawk was bound on a voyage from Saginaw to Cleveland, with a cargo of about 200,000 feet of lumber, October 30th, 1870; that on leaving Saginaw the said barge, with five other barges, was taken in tow by the tug Zouave, to be towed through to Cleveland; that on arriving at Port Austin bay, the weather was so threatening that the master of the tug Zouave, then having the said barge so in tow, requested the master of the tug Clematis, which then lay at anchor in said Port Austin bay, to take the said barge Mohawk, together with two others of the said barges, and tow them through to St. Clair river. The libel then proceeded as follows: "4. That in compliance with said request the said tug Clematis, which was then engaged in the business of towing vessels, barges and rafts over the proposed route to St. Clair river, took the said barge Mohawk, together with the said barges Mills and Holland, in tow for the said river, and it then and there became and was the duty of the said tug Clematis to exercise ordinary care and skill and good seamanship in the management of the said barges; and the master of the said tug Clematis thereupon impliedly undertook and agreed to tow said barge Mohawk safely through to said river." The libel then charged the tug with having cast off the barge's line and abandoned her to her fate in a rough sea, nearly abreast of Pointe aux Barques, without just cause, by means of which the said barge was foundered and lost, with her entire crew. The claimants put in an answer to the libel, and accompanied the same with an exception to the said fourth article, as follows: "And your respondents hereby except to said libel and said article: for that it does not allege that respondents or the master of said tug undertook and agreed either with said libellant, or with the master of said barge, or any other person, to do said towing, so as to give said libellant any right of suit; and respondents pray the same benefit of this exception as if they had filed a separate exception."

Alfred Russell, for exceptors.

The description of the action, taking the introduction in connection with articles 4 and 5, is a cause of contract, civil and maritime. In such case the jurisdiction depends on the subject-matter, Waring v. Clarke, 5 How. [46 U. S.] 459, 462. No privity of contract between the owner or master of the tug and the owner or master of the barge is anywhere set forth in the libel. There can be no such thing as a contract without parties —at least two in number—and a consideration moving from one to another. Although the rules of pleading in admiralty are not technical, yet the parties to the contract, the contract itself, and the consideration must be distinctly set forth. Jenks v. Lewis [Case No. 7,280]. Claimants may object for want of proper parties, or for absence of detailed allegations of fault. The Commander in Chief, 1 Wall. [68 U. S.] 43–52. Who were the parties is a fact necessary to be alleged. The Havre and Scotland [Case No. 6,233]. As much certainty is required as in a declaration or plea at common law. Treadwell v. Joseph [Id. 14,157]; Pettingill v. Dinsmore [Id. 11,045]. The libel cannot be sustained without an allegation that the master of the tug contracted with the libellant himself or the master of his barge. The facts show that libellant's only remedy is against the tug Zouave, whose master contracted with libellant to do the towing, and who subsequently on account of the weather requested claimants to help him.

[1] [Reported by Hon. Henry B. Brown, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

W. A. Moore and H. B. Brown, for libellant.

There are no technical rules of pleading in admiralty, and it is only necessary to state the facts; but even in a common law declaration it is unnecessary, in an action of tort, to state the consideration for the contract, from the breach of which the tort has arisen. 1 Chit. Pl. 417; Elsee v. Gatward, 5 Term R. 143; Webster v. Hodgkins, 25 N. H. 128; Barney v. Dewey, 13 Johns. 224; Corwin v. Davison, 9 Cow. 22; Moseley v. Wilkinson, 24 Ala. 411. The great case of Coggs v. Bernard, 2 Ld. Raym. 909, upon which the entire modern law of bailments is founded, holds that a person who undertakes gratuitously to do a service for another is yet liable for negligence in the performance of it. This is still the law. Phila. R. R. Co. v. Derby, 14 How. [55 U. S.] 468; The Deer [Case No. 3,737]; The Brooklyn [Id. 1,938]. It is claimed in this case that the Clematis was merely the agent of the Zouave, that no liability was incurred except to the principal, and that the action should have been against the Zouave. It is true that an agent is not liable to third persons in an action of tort for a non-feasance, omission or neglect of duty. Story, Bailm. § 404, and cases cited; Shear. & R. Neg. 128. But where an agent has been guilty of a misfeasance, violation of duty, or of negligence in the performance of a public employment, there is no doubt of his liability to third persons. Shear. & R. Neg. 129, 130; Phelps v. Wait, 30 N. Y. 78; Wright v. Wilcox, 19 Wend. 343; Suydam v. Moore, 8 Barb. 358; Montfort v. Hughes, 3 E. D. Smith, 591; Hewett v. Swift, 3 Allen, 420; Johnson v. Barber, 5 Gilman, 425; Spraights v. Hawley, 39 N. Y. 441; The R. B. Forbes [Case No. 11,598]; The Rescue [Id. 11,708]; The John Fraser, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 184; Sturgis v. Boyer, 24 How. [65 U. S.] 110; Sawyer v. Rutland & B. R. R. Co., 27 Vt. 377.

The following authorities indicate that, in cases like the present, an action would lie as upon a contract. Certainly it would, if the case has any analogy to those of common carriers. 2 Redf. Ry. 14; New Jersey Steam Nav. Co. v. Merchants' Bank, 6 How. [47 U. S.] 344; Sanderson v. Lamberton, 6 Bin. 129.

LONGYEAR, District Judge. The case has been argued and submitted on the exception, before proceeding to a hearing on the merits. Other objections to the libel were raised at the hearing, but as the above is the only exception found stated in the pleadings, it will be the only one noticed. The argument in support of the exception proceeds upon the assumption that there is no privity of contract between the barge and the tug Clematis. The right of action in this case does not necessarily rest upon breach of contract. It has a sufficient foundation in tort. The casting off of the barge's line and abandoning her to her fate in time of peril, as charged in the libel, was a misfeasance. It was a violation of a duty toward the barge, which had become incumbent on the tug by her taking the barge's line and towing her to the place of danger, in which she is charged in the libel with having left the barge to her fate, without just cause. No matter whether the tug so took the barge's line and did such towing with or without a contract with the barge. In other words, after she had taken the barge's line and towed her to a place of danger, it was the tug's duty to retain the line and stand by her so long and so far as possible, and for a breach of that duty an action will lie. Shear. & R. Neg. § 112. See, also, opinion of Justice Woodbury, 6 How. [47 U. S.] 418. And even upon the basis of a breach of contract, I am inclined to think that, upon the authority of the decision of the United States supreme court, in the case of New Jersey Steam Nav. Co. v. Merchants' Bank, 6 How. [47 U. S.] 344, 380, the action will lie. But from the view already taken, it is unnecessary to discuss this aspect of the case. Exception overruled.

[NOTE. On the trial of the action herein the libel was dismissed. See Case No. 2,876, next following.]

Case No. 2,876.

The CLEMATIS.

[Brown, Adm. 499;[1] 6 Chi. Leg. News, 405.]

District Court, E. D. Michigan. Aug., 1874.

DESERTION OF TOW BY TUG — JUDGMENT OF MASTER.

1. Where a tug abandons her tow of barges during a storm, the burden is upon the tug to show a sufficient excuse for such abandonment.

2. Much, however, must be left to the judgment of competent officers in such an emergency, and such judgment formed upon the spot and acted upon in good faith will not be impeached, except upon a clear preponderance of proof that it was erroneous.

[Cited in The James P. Donaldson, 19 Fed. 266; The Frederick E. Ives, 25 Fed. 450; The Maria Luigia, 28 Fed. 249; The Wilhelm, 47 Fed. 93.]

3. Where it was shown that the tow-line parted in the night, during a storm of great severity, and that the master of the tug was unable to pick up the line, to discover the lights of the tow, or to make any efforts to regain it without great danger to the tug: Held, he was justified in abandoning it.

This was an action for breach of duty, resulting in the loss of the barge Mohawk, by reason of the alleged unlawful desertion of the same during a storm in Lake Huron. On October 30th, 1870, the tug Zouave left Saginaw with six barges in tow, bound to Cleveland. On arriving off Pointe aux Barques, the weather became rough, and the tow put into Port Austin bay for shelter. Here they found the Clematis. The tow was then divided, and, at the request of the master of the Zouave, the Clematis took three of the largest barges, of which the Mohawk was one, and put to sea, about half past seven in the evening. Although the storm continued to increase in violence, everything went well, the barges losing none of their deck loads, until about eleven o'clock, when the line connecting the tug with the forward barge parted, and set the tow adrift. The tug turned around, but failing, as her officers alleged, to see the lights of the tow, made no efforts to pick them up, and in a few minutes resumed her course down the lake. During the night, the Mohawk went to pieces, and was lost, with a part of her crew.

[1] [Reported by Hon. Henry B. Brown, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

[For a decision overruling the exception of claimants to the fourth article of the libel, see Case No. 2,875, next preceding.]

H. B. Brown and W. A. Moore, for libellant.

Alfred Russell, for claimant.

LONGYEAR, District Judge. The libel, as amended, contains one, and only one, charge of fault, viz.: That the tug negligently deserted the tow; which charge, as set up in the amended libel, is in the following words: "That after taking the said barges in tow as aforesaid, and upon the night of the said 30th of October, the said barges Mills. Mohawk and Holland, being attached to said tug by lines astern in the order last above stated, the said tug Clematis, when off and about abreast of Pointe aux Barques, the lake being then somewhat rough, and the said barges being then solely dependent upon the said tug for their safety, and the line connecting her with the said barges having parted, without rounding to or stopping, negligently deserted said barges, with their cargoes and crews, and left them to their fate." Upon the argument, other faults were sought to be pointed out, and were urged with some earnestness, but, as the above is the only fault charged in the libel, it is the only one that can be considered.

The answer admits that the tug left the tow after the line had parted, but denies that she did so without rounding to or stopping, or negligently, as alleged; and avers that she not only rounded to, but for about an hour made exertions to find and secure the tow, and that she left only when it was found to be impossible, on account of the darkness of the night and the severity of the storm. The answer also alleges that the barge was unseaworthy in several respects, and that she failed to ride out the storm, and was lost on that account. It is undisputed that, when the line parted, a storm was in progress of greater or less severity, but at all events of such severity as to endanger the safety of the vessels composing the tow if left to their fate (being vessels of the kind called barges, and dependent solely upon towage, instead of any efficient means of propulsion of their own); also that the tug did in fact fail to regain the tow, and did leave the vessels composing it to their fate. In view of these undisputed facts, the burden was on the tug to show a sufficient excuse for such failure and abandonment; and it is to this one point that the issue in the case is really narrowed down. There is a preponderance of proof that after the line parted, the tug, after keeping on her course a short distance, rounded to, and for a short time, variously estimated by the witnesses at from fifteen minutes to an hour, stood up toward where she left the barges, and then, not finding them, and not seeing any lights by which to determine their whereabouts, and the darkness being such that except by means of lights they could not be seen from the tug until the tug should be too near them for safety in such a storm, and the tug's captain, for these reasons, deeming it useless and unsafe to attempt to find the barges, and if found, to attempt to approach them so as to regain the line, without further effort abandoned the attempt, and came in toward the land for shelter, and made no further effort to rescue the barges until the next day, in the afternoon, when the storm had abated. It certainly would have been more satisfactory if the tug had made a more persistent effort to find the barges and pick them up; yet, if the storm was in fact of such severity as to render such further effort hopeless under the circumstances, the want of it cannot be attributed as a fault.

The business of towing by steam vessels has come to constitute one of the great interests of navigation—so much so upon the great lakes and their connecting waters that it has brought into existence a class of vessels of great carrying capacity dependent almost solely upon being towed as a means of propulsion. Hence steam tugs, making the towing of vessels a business, often necessarily assume great responsibilities; and it is but fair and right that they should be held to a strict account in the manner of the discharge of their important duties. It will not do to hold that they may excuse themselves and abandon the safety of interests, and often of lives, intrusted to and dependent upon their courage and fidelity, for slight causes, or on account of even ordinary obstacles. The causes must be ample, and the obstacles in the way of performance must be at least of an extraordinary character, if not absolutely insurmountable Questions of this character are, however, often among the most difficult to determine. Of the truth of this the present case is a marked instance. Storms and their severity are so variable in degree, and the opinions of even competent and experienced seamen in regard thereto in any given case are often so conflicting, as is the case here, that in most cases it is exceedingly difficult to decide in regard to them with any degree of nicety or satisfaction. In all such cases much must be left to the judgment of the officers in charge during the emergency. They have the circumstances then all before them far more clearly and intelligibly than they can possibly be reproduced in court; and when such officers are able, competent and experienced navigators, a judgment formed upon the spot, and acted on by them in good faith, ought not to be impeached or disregarded, except upon a clear preponderance of proof that it was erroneous. Lawrence v. Minturn, 17 How. [58 U. S.] 109, 110. The general ability, competency and experience of Capt. Rumage, of the tug, is in no manner questioned nor assailed. It is in evidence that in his judgment at the time, the severity of the storm, combined with the darkness of the night and the absence of lights by which the whereabouts of the barges could be determined, rendered it impossible for him to regain them, and extremely hazardous to make the attempt, and the good faith of that judgment is not impugned. Its correctness only is questioned. Capt. Ellery, of the Mills, the head barge, and to which the tug's line was attached, seems by his actions to have entirely coincided with Capt. Rumage in opinion, in this, that he made no preparations, and was in fact entirely unprepared to second any attempt to regain the tow should any such attempt be made by the tug, but, on the contrary, confined his exertions entirely to means of safety at his own command. I have examined and analyzed with care the voluminous and somewhat conflicting testimony upon this point, and the able and exhaustive arguments of the learned counsel on both sides, but shall not extend the opinion by going into that analysis here. It must suffice here to say that while I am in some doubt, I fail to find in the proofs that clear preponderance necessary, in my opinion, to overcome the opinion and judgment of Capt. Rumage formed upon the spot and acted on by him, and that I therefore consider it my duty to give him the benefit of the doubts I entertain. In this view of the case, it is unnecessary to notice the question of the unseaworthiness of the barge, raised by the answer. Libel dismissed.

Case No. 2,877.

In re CLEMENS.

[2 Dill. 533;[1] 9 N. B. R. 57; 21 Pittsb. Leg. J. 30.]

Circuit Court, E. D. Missouri. 1873.

BANKRUPT ACT—SECTION 39 CONSTRUED—ACCOMMODATION INDORSERS.

An accommodation indorser of negotiable paper, whose indorsement is in no way connected with the business of the indorser, cannot be forced into bankruptcy for suspending and failing to resume payment of such paper. Such paper is not "his commercial paper," within the meaning of the ninth clause of section 39 of the bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 536)].

In bankruptcy. This is a petition by John Clemens under section 2 of the bankrupt act, to have reviewed an order of the district court by which his answer to a petition to show cause why he should not be adjudicated a bankrupt, was held insufficient. The material facts are these: Morris Langsdorf filed his petition in the district court of the United States against John Clemens, praying that he might be decreed a bankrupt. The petition alleges that one Christian Staehlin made his note for $3,000, dated St. Louis, February 14, 1873, which was indorsed by respondent and three other persons, which note, before its maturity, came to the hands of the petitioning creditor for value, and that the note was subsequently duly protested for nonpayment. A copy of the note and indorsements is set forth in haec verba in the petition. The petition also alleges that the respondent, Clemens, being a merchant, manufacturer, and trader, being insolvent and in contemplation of bankruptcy, suspended and did not resume payment of his commercial paper within a period of fourteen days.

The answer of the defendant is as follows: "And now comes the respondent, John Clemens, and shows cause why he should not be declared a bankrupt, and states: First. That he indorsed the note described in the petition, and he also indorsed several others also made by Christian Staehlin, for the accommodation of said Staehlin; but the note described in the petition, as well also as the other notes indorsed by this respondent for said Staehlin's accommodation aforesaid, were not, nor was either of them, made or indorsed in the ordinary course or in connection with the business of this respondent. This respondent admits that the note described in the petition, as well as several others indorsed by him for the accommodation of said Staehlin, as aforesaid, became due and remaind unpaid for a period of fourteen days and more before the filing of said petition. Second. This respondent avers that no note or bill made by him has become due and remains unpaid; that the only paper outstanding on which his name appears consists of the note described in the petition, and several other notes made by said Christian Staehlin and indorsed by this respondent for the accommodation of said Staehlin, and that all of said paper so indorsed was not made, indorsed, or given for, or on account of, or in settlement of, any debt or liability of this respondent, and said notes were not, nor was either of them, made or indorsed in the ordinary course of, or in connection with, the business of this respondent. This respondent avers that he is not insolvent, but is fully able to pay his own debts in full, contracted in and about his own business. Wherefore respondent says he is not, by reason of his said accommodation indorsement aforesaid, subject to the provisions of the act of congress mentioned in the petition." To this answer the petitioning creditor filed his general demurrer which presented the question, whether the note set out in the petition, which was indorsed by the respondent for the accommodation of the maker, is the commercial paper of the respondent in the sense of the bankrupt law. The district court held the answer to be insufficient, and thereupon Clemens filed in the circuit court his petition for a review of that decision. [Case No. 2,878, next following.]

[1] [Reported by Hon. John F. Dillon, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

H. N. Hart and Krum & Patrick, for petitioner for review.

A. Binswanger, for petitioning creditor.

DILLON, Circuit Judge. The respondent below, who is here as the petitioner in review, was sought to be thrown into involuntary bankruptcy, under the clause of section 39 of the bankrupt act, which provides that any person "being a bankrupt, broker, merchant, trader, manufacturer, or miner, who has stopped or suspended and not resumed payment of his commercial paper within a period of fourteen days, shall be deemed to have committed an act of bankruptcy."

The respondent belonged to one of the enumerated classes, and the act of bankruptcy charged is that he stopped or suspended, and, for the prescribed length of time, failed to resume payment of his commercial paper. He is an accommodation indorser on a note negotiable in form, made by one Staehlin and held for value by the petitioning creditor. It is admitted on the record that the note was indorsed by him solely for the accommodation of Staehlin, and that the note did not originate in the business of the respondent below, and was not indorsed in the course of, or in connection with, his business.

Upon this state of facts, the single point presented by the record is, whether he can be proceeded against in invitum and be adjudicated a bankrupt. And this depends solely upon the question, whether he has failed to meet "his commercial paper." Was the note of Staehlin indorsed by the respondent below the respondent's commercial paper within the meaning of the bankrupt act? This question is not settled by adjudication. There is no such act of bankruptcy in the insolvent laws of Massachusetts, from whence so many provisions of the bankrupt act have been taken, and of course no decisions in that state determining its meaning. Commenting on this clause of the bankrupt act, Mr. Edwin James (James, Bankr. Law, p. 261) says: "This act of bankruptcy is confined exclusively to bankers, merchants, and other traders. It is the first time in legislation here or in England that such an act of bankruptcy has been created. By the English bankruptcy acts, the suspension of payment by a banker, merchant, or trader, of his commercial paper and liabilities, is resolved into an act of bankruptcy by summoning him before the court of bankruptcy, and if the debt or demand be not paid or arranged to the satisfaction of the creditor within a prescribed time, the non-arrangement or non-payment within such prescribed period constitutes an act of bankruptcy."

The question now before me has never been decided by the supreme court, nor, so far as I am advised, by any circuit court of the United States. Mr. District Judge Withey (In re Nickodemus [Case No. 10,254]) and Mr. District Judge Blatchford (Innes v. Carpenter [Id. 7,049]; and see, also, In re McDermott Bolt Co. [Id. 8,750]; In re Lowenstein [Id. 8,574]) have expressed the opinion that the accommodation indorsement of the note of another did not make it, within the meaning of the clause of the act under consideration, the commercial paper of the accommodation indorser. On the other hand, Mr. District Judge Lowell (In re Chandler [Id. 2,591]) and in the case under review Mr. District Judge Treat (In re Clemens [Id. 2,878]) have reached the opposite conclusion.

The question is by no means free from difficulty; and although I distrust my judgment when it differs, upon a question of bankruptcy law, from that of the learned judge whose ruling is under review, yet I have not been able to concur in his conclusion that the present petitioner was, upon the facts admitted by the demurrer, liable to be adjudicated a bankrupt. While I need not deny that the note of Staehlin was commercial paper so far as the maker is concerned, although it does not appear that he belonged to any of the six enumerated classes, yet I do not think it became, by the accommodation indorsement of the respondent below "his (Clemens') commercial paper," so that he would be liable to be declared a bankrupt for failing to pay it for fourteen days.

Giving to the words of the act, "stopping or suspending and not resuming payment of his commercial paper," their natural meaning, it seems to me that they do not refer to the case of accommodation indorsers. If a merchant should indorse negotiable paper owned by him in the course of his own business even to borrow money, and his liability be fixed thereon, it may be admitted that it would or might be an act of bankruptcy not to meet it for the period of fourteen days, for the paper thus indorsed by him would be connected with his business. But where we say a merchant, trader, manufacturer, or other person has suspended payment of his paper, the words do not naturally convey to the mind the idea that reference is made to paper which is his only because he has indorsed it for the accommodation of another. It is an inapt expression to say that a person has stopped payment of his accommodation paper. Persons do not make a business of indorsing paper for others, and it cannot be that this exceptional class of indorsements was primarily in the contemplation of the law-maker. To make the act embrace accommodation indorsers is not necessary to give it full effect and operation. The non-payment of commercial paper by persons not within the enumerated classes is not an act of bankruptcy though made in connection with their own business. A railroad company cannot be thrown into bankruptcy for failing to pay its notes or bills—even its own notes and bills; but if it commits an act of bankruptcy by fraudulent transfers or preferences, it may be proceeded against in bankruptcy by its creditors.

So on the respondent's indorsement he is liable, and may be sued; and if, in consequence of such a suit, an illegal preference will be obtained, any creditor may, for that reason, force him into bankruptcy. But it is, in my judgment, a misconception of the bankrupt act, to regard it as having been intended to collect debts or to regard a resort to it as among the peculiar privileges which the law throws around commercial paper in the hands of a bona fide holder. The order below sustaining the demurrer to the answer is reversed. Reversed.

NOTE. As to accommodation bill transactions: Ex parte Mee, 1 Ch. App. 337; Downing v. Traders' Bank [Case No. 4,046]; Ex parte Hammond, 6 De Gex, M. & G. 699; 24 Law J. (Bankr.) 2; In re Mortimore, 7 Jur. (N. S.) 320, 9 Wkly. Rep. 423, 3 L. T. (N. S.) 828; Bassett v. Dodgin, 9 Bing. 653; 2 Moore & S. 777.

Case No. 2,878.

In re CLEMENS.

[8 N. B. R. 279;[1] 5 Chi. Leg. News, 511; 5 Leg. Op. 116; 2 Am. Law Rec. 171; 8 Am. Law Rev. 168.]

District Court, E. D. Missouri. July 25, 1873.

ACT OF BANKRUPTCY—SUSPENSION OF PAYMENT OF COMMERCIAL PAPER.

The endorser of a promissory note or bill of exchange, who, after due protest and notice, fails to provide for payment of his liability within fourteen days, thereby commits an act of bankruptcy, and may be adjudged a bankrupt upon the application of a petitioning creditor, and it matters not whether the paper be endorsed for accommodation or in the course of business.

[In bankruptcy. Petition by Morris Langsdorf that John Clemens be adjudicated a bankrupt. Clemens answered, and showed cause, and the petitioner demurred to the answer as insufficient.]

[1] [Reprinted from 8 N. B. R. 279, by permission. 8 Am. Law Rev. 168, contains only a partial report.]

TREAT, District Judge. The defendant, against whom the petition is filed, does not deny that he belongs to the class the suspension of whose commercial paper for fourteen days is an act of bankruptcy. The petitioning creditor avers that he is the holder for value of a negotiable promissory note for three thousand dollars of which Christian Staehlin is the maker and the defendant the first endorser, and that said note was presented for payment, protested for non-payment, and notice thereof duly given to the defendant. There are several endorsers of the note. The petition alleges an act of bankruptcy as follows: "And your petitioner further represents that within the six calendar months next preceding the date of this petition the said John Clemens, being insolvent and in contemplation of insolvency and bankruptcy, did commit an act of bankruptcy within the meaning of the act, to wit: In that the said John Clemens did heretofore, to wit: on the 12th day of May, 1873, being a merchant, manufacturer and trader, suspend, and did not resume payment of his commercial paper within a period of fourteen days, nor at any time thereafter." Defendant avers that he endorsed the note set out in the creditor's petition, and several others made by said Staehlin, solely for the accommodation of Staehlin; that said notes were not made or endorsed in the name of, or in connection with, defendant's own business; that said notes have remained past due more than fourteen days; that no notes made by the defendant are past due; that the only notes outstanding and past due on which his name appears are those so endorsed by him for Staehlin's accommodation, the same being in nowise connected with defendant's business; and that "he is not insolvent, but is fully able to pay his own debts in full, contracted in or about his own business."

The present purpose of the answer is to obtain the ruling of this court on the several propositions involved, concerning which there are conflicting opinions. In a few of the earlier cases decided under the bankrupt act, doctrines were announced by some of the district courts to which this court never assented. To interpret this law it is necessary to keep strictly in view the cardinal canon of construction, which requires reference to all its parts and to its scope and object. Its main purpose is, while furnishing relief to unfortunate debtors, to secure equality among creditors. Another important object is to prevent over trading by requiring those whose commercial paper is put into circulation to meet it promptly according to the law merchant, if they embark in any of the classes of business specified.

Without going into a review of decided cases, with a labored analysis of the act of congress, it must suffice for the present case to say that, in the opinion of this court, as often heretofore held, the clause in question does not mean that the suspension of payment for fourteen days of one piece [or more][2] of commercial paper is an act of bankruptcy, irrespective of the circumstances under which the suspension occurred. In Doan v. Compton [Case No. 3,940], and in Re Brown, Webber & Co. [Id. 1,973], as well as in other cases decided by this court, it was held that the suspension contemplated was a general suspension, or a suspension from financial inability to meet one's indebtedness as it matures, and not a suspension with respect to some paper the liability to pay which is honestly questioned, it being supposed bona fide that a good defence thereto existed; nor a suspension through mere inadvertence, the ability to pay being clear, and tender made as soon as the inadvertence was known; so of a suspension at the instance of the holders of the paper pending negotiations for renewals, &c. In this respect this court has differed from some other district courts, as it does also on the following points, on which it holds that by "commercial paper" the act of congress does not mean only such paper when issued in connection with one's own mercantile, trading, banking, manufacturing or mining business—or what is sometimes denominated "business paper." Some courts have ruled that such paper, when given for money borrowed, though for the purpose of conducting the business described, is not within the meaning of the act, a construction wholly irreconcilable with the scope and object of the law. The doctrine held by most of the courts is the correct one, that the term "commercial paper" means all negotiable paper known as such by the law merchant as modified by the statute of Anne and the various American statutes.

It seems obvious that, when congress applied a special rule concerning commercial paper to specified pursuits, it did so to enforce punctuality of payment. In addition to ordinary days of grace it allowed the fourteen days, within which a merchant, if solvent, ought to be able to take up his paper or make satisfactory arrangements therefor. It is well known that many business men holding such paper rely on its prompt payment to enable them to meet their own obligations at maturity and that the failure of one to pay promptly may affect not the holder of his paper alone but the creditors of the holder. Indeed, in the present modes of business, the non-payment of such paper by one may produce serious consequences to many who are successively creditors of each other. The reasons for insisting upon such prompt payment are so urgent that some judges have erroneously held that any one who issued commercial paper is a merchant, within the meaning of that term as used in the act of congress, irrespective of his real occupation. If the origin of the paper is to determine whether it is "commercial" or not, the elemental qualities of such paper are destroyed, for it loses in the hands of a bona fide endorser for value, the element of certainty which the law merchant imposes. Being for a sum certain, payable at a specified time, such an endorsee is not affected by any equities existing between the original parties. Each endorser contracts with his immediate endorsee and all subsequent endorsees, for the payment of the sum named, and the contract of the maker is not more definite under the law merchant than is the contract of endorser. As to bona fide endorsers for value it is immaterial whether endorser put his name to the paper merely to accommodate the maker or not. The very object of such an endorsement was to give the paper currency—make it negotiable under the law merchant with all the qualities that the law imposes. Why, therefore, there should be any distinction between an accommodation or other endorser, where the plaintiff in a suit or a petitioning creditor is a bona fide endorser for value, is not apparent. It is immaterial whether the paper is "business paper" so-called, or "accommodation paper," for it is commercial paper, and the liability of the endorser is the same under the act of congress as it is under the law merchant.

The act of congress declares that those who embark in the pursuits specified shall punctually meet their obligations evidenced by commercial paper. That paper may pass through many hands, not on the faith of the maker alone, but mainly, and sometimes solely, on the faith of the endorser's name. The endorser has contracted to pay if there is non-payment at maturity, and notice to him is duly given. If that endorser is a merchant and fails to meet his endorsement when his liability is fixed, his indebtedness is to that extent increased to the detriment of his other creditors—possibly to their great loss. It is of no less moment to his creditors that he has become insolvent through [accommodation indorsement than if he became insolvent through][3] business disasters. It may be that he sells merchandise and takes negotiable paper therefor, which, after being discounted in bank with his endorsement, he has to meet, through the failure of the maker; and why any court could suppose that the bankrupt law, which looks to the rights of creditors as well as the obligations of debtors, intends, what it nowhere says, that insolvency caused by "accommodation" endorsements is not insolvency within the meaning of the law, but that insolvency otherwise caused is within the law. Why such a distinction should be drawn is not reconcilable with any well considered views of the legal relationship of the parties. Congress evidently designed to have merchants, traders, bankers, &c., keep good their commercial paper, whether they were makers or endorsers. If, through misfortune, they become insolvent, whether from the one or the other cause the same result follows in law and fact. It is then for them to seek the relief the bankrupt act provides, or for their creditors to resort to its provisions in order to secure an equal distribution of the bankrupt's assets.

[2] [From 5 Chi. Leg. News, 511.]

[3] [From 5 Chi. Leg. News, 511.]

It is unnecessary to go into the analysis as carefully made by others or to repeat the reasons so forcibly urged by Lowell, J., in Re Chandler [Case No. 2,591]. His conclusions, on the points at issue, this court holds to be correct. The case at bar illustrates the subject. The defendant "avers that he is not insolvent, but is fully able to pay his own debts in full, contracted in and about his own business." That averment is based on the hypothesis that the cause of insolvency affects the question. The liability of the defendant on the Staehlin notes has so swollen his indebtedness, it would seem, that he cannot aver his ability to meet all his obligations. If his property is to be seized on execution to pay these endorsements, and thereby his other creditors suffer, the equality among creditors is destroyed, and the same result would follow if his other creditors absorb his assets, to the loss of those to whom he is indebted on these endorsements. If he cannot pay all his indebtedness, the law demands that all his creditors shall share pro rata.

There is one view not presented in argument, which seems to have weighed with no little force, with some persons, against the conclusions reached, and that is, that even supposing Staehlin were unable to pay the whole of his debts, it might be that the defendant's pro rata share of Staehlin's assets added to his own would leave him ultimately a surplus. This view would apply more strongly to the last of the four endorsers, for if he took up this paper and all four who precede him on the paper should go into bankruptcy, it might be that his distributive shares, out of their respective estates would nearly equal his whole liability on these notes, leaving him far from insolvent, ultimately. To this view is opposed the evident design of the bankrupt act as to prompt payments by merchants. It is not, as the United States supreme court holds, and as all the courts have held, dependent on the ultimate outcome of a merchant's affairs whether he is solvent or not, but a merchant is "insolvent" in the sense intended by the act of congress when he is unable to pay his debts as they become due in the ordinary course of business. Toof v. Martin [13 Wall. (80 U. S.) 40]. Hence, when that condition exists, creditors are not bound to wait unpaid until the ultimate winding up of a merchant's affairs determines whether he can pay in full or not. Were it so, the creditors might from that delay be themselves fatally crippled. Prompt and full compliance with the obligations imposed by the law merchant is what the act of congress exacts from all parties to commercial paper. As some of the courts say: Congress, in this respect, adopted the general mercantile view, viz: That when a merchant lies under protest he has suspended payment or failed. Whether temporarily or permanently, still it is a present suspension or failure. Recognizing that view congress deemed it wise that such suspension, unless followed by resumption within fourteen days, should entitle any creditor to cause the assets of the debtor to be subjected to the payment of all creditors' lawful demands—that is, when the suspension and non-resumption occur under the circumstances mentioned at the commencement of this opinion.

As this question can be reviewed by Judge DILLON at chambers, there need be no delay in procuring a reversal, if his views differ from what are here presented. The doctrine ought to be settled for this circuit as early as practicable. The demurrer is sustained.

[NOTE. Clemens brought the case to the circuit court by petition of review, and that court reversed the order sustaining the demurrer. See Case No. 2,877, next preceding.]

CLEMENT, In re. See Case No. 8,917.

Case No. 2,879.

The CLEMENT.

[2 Curt. 363.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. May Term, 1855.[2]

PLEADING AND PROOF IN ADMIRALTY—VARIANCE—COLLISION—BURDEN OF PROOF—LESSENING EFFECT—RULES OF NAVIGATION—EXPERT TESTIMONY.

1. There is no technical rule of variance in the admiralty; and in describing the particular circumstances attending a collision, an omission to state some facts, which prove to be material, which cannot have occasioned any surprise to the opposite party, can have no effect except to raise suspicions in the mind of the judge, as to the existence of those facts.

[Cited in The Iris, Case No. 7,062; The Quickstep, 9 Wall. (76 U. S.) 670; The Coleman and Foster, Case No. 2,981; Holmes v. Oregon & C. Ry. Co., 5 Fed. 76; The Young America, 31 Fed. 753.]

2. In collision causes, the court will look at all the allegations of both parties, upon which fault depends,—consider which are true, and not allowing either party to contradict, by proof,

---

[1] [Reported by Hon. B. R. Curtis, Circuit Justice.]

[2] [Affirming decree of the district court in Case No. 2,880.]

what he has alleged, will extract the true case from the entire record, and decree accordingly.

[Cited in Burton v. Salter, Case No. 2,218; The Cambridge, Id. 2,334; The Coleman, Id. 2,981; The Clytie, Id. 2,913; The Maryland, 19 Fed. 557.]

3. If two vessels are approaching each other on converging courses, one having the wind two points free, and the other closehauled, and a collision occurs, the burden is on the former to show that all possible care and skill were used on her part, and that the collision was the fault of the other vessel, or was inevitable. It is not enough that, at the moment of the collision, the one having the wind free, used all possible efforts to avoid or lessen the effects of a collision; previous precaution and foresight are required.

[Criticised in Whitridge v. Dill, 23 How. (64 U. S.) 455. Cited in The Maria & Elizabeth, 7 Fed. 254; The Commodore Jones, 25 Fed. 508.]

4. A very clear case for a departure from a rule of navigation must be made out, before a vessel can be pronounced in fault for adhering to it.

[Cited in Baker v. The City of New York, Case No. 765; The Sunnyside, Id. 13,620; McCoy v. The Currituck, Id. 8,730; The Golden Grove, 13 Fed. 688; The Britannia, 34 Fed. 553; Meyers Excursion & Nav. Co. v. The Emma Kate Ross, 41 Fed. 828.]

5. The rule which requires a vessel having the wind free to keep clear of one sailing close to the wind, applies between pilot boats and other vessels, and in bays and harbors as well as on the high seas.

6. Experts must give their opinion on an ascertained or supposed state of facts, not upon reading depositions. Their testimony is not admissible to prove that a rule of navigation, recognized by the general maritime law, does not exist in a particular locality.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of Massachusetts.

[In admiralty. Libel by Matthew Hunt and others, owners of the pilot boat Hornet, against the brig Clement, for damages caused by collision. There was a decree for libellants in the district court (Case No. 2,880), and the claimant Paul Mayo appeals.]

F. C. Loring, for appellant.

C. P. Curtis, Jr., contra.

CURTIS, Circuit Justice. This is an appeal from a decree of the district court pronouncing for damages in a cause of collision. The libel alleges that, about one o'clock, p. m., of the tenth day of June, 1854, the pilot boat Hornet, of the burden of fifty-three tons, and the brig Clement, were both sailing towards the "Graves," which are ledges of rocks lying outside of the harbor of Boston; that the wind was fresh from the north-west by west, the sea smooth, both vessels on the starboard tack, and the pilot boat close to the wind, and to the leeward of the brig, when the brig suddenly changed her course, and kept off and struck the pilot boat, which sunk and was totally lost. The answer avers, that at the time in question, the Hornet was to leeward of the Clement, and sailing faster and nearer to the wind, and in such a direction as must bring her across the course of the brig; that no particular attention was paid to the Hornet, by the Clement's people, until it was perceived that the Hornet was so near the Clement, as to make the danger of collision imminent, by attempting to run across the bows of the Clement; when the Hornet was hailed, and told to keep off, which might easily have been done; and though the hail was heard on board the Hornet, her course was not changed, and a collision being then apparently inevitable, the helm of the brig was put down, and the brig so far luffed into the wind that only her jib-boom caught in the rigging of the Hornet and tipped her over. The answer denies that the Clement kept off and struck the Hornet, as is averred in the libel, and says she kept her course until she luffed to lessen the force of the collision. The district judge was of opinion, that the evidence did not support the allegation in the libel, that the Clement kept off and struck the Hornet, but that it appeared from the allegations of the libel and answer, that the case was one of two vessels sailing in converging courses on the same tack, the Hornet being closehauled, and the Clement having the wind two points free; that the rule of navigation required the Hornet to keep her course, and the Clement to keep out of the way; that there were no special circumstances in this case to render this rule inapplicable, or to shift the fault, or any part of it, from the Clement to the Hornet; and consequently that the former must bear the whole loss.

The main ground upon which the appellant has sought to reverse the decree is, that it was rested upon facts not alleged in the libel. And he relies upon the rule that a decree in the admiralty must be secundum allegata as well as probata. This is a well settled and important rule. But it does not follow that a decree awarding damages to the libellant can be rested only on his allegations. On the contrary, there is an entire class of collision cases, in which the decree is in conformity with the separate allegations of neither of the parties. I refer to cases of mutual fault. In such a case the libel states fault on the part of the vessel proceeded against, and the exercise of due care and skill in the management of the libellant's vessel; the claimant denies the fault imputed to him, and alleges fault on the part of the libellant's vessel; the court finds part of the allegations in each pleading to be true, and the residue untrue; that the real case is substantially different from the one shown by the allegations of either of the parties; and upon that real case makes a decree apportioning the damages between them. And so I apprehend that in all collision cases, the court will look at the allegations of both the parties of all matters of fact, upon which fault, or its absence, depends; they will consider which of those allegations is proved, not allowing either party to contradict by proof, what he has alleged; and having thus extracted the real case from the whole record, will pronounce for the one party or the other, as that case requires. I do not intend to say that a libellant may plead one fault on the part of the vessel proceeded against, and offer evidence of another. On the contrary, I think his proofs must, generally, be restricted to his allegation, to prevent surprise of the respondent. But when he has been thus restricted, if the facts alleged and proved by him, taken in connection with other facts admitted upon the record by the claimant, entitle the libellant to recover damages, and the claimant has not succeeded, by his allegations and proofs, in repelling that claim, in my opinion a decree should be made for the libellant. It must be remembered that the variance occurs, not in describing the substantive cause of action, which is a collision occasioned by neglect; nor in proving the contrary of any allegation; but in detailing the particular circumstances, which accompanied or constituted the neglect, the party has omitted to allege some fact which his adversary supplies by his allegation on the record. The rules of common law pleading are fully satisfied by a general allegation of negligence. The admiralty requires that each party should state all the essential particulars which go to make up the fault alleged. The Virgil, 2 W. Rob. Adm. 204. Their absence may injuriously restrict the evidence of the party, by whose fault they are omitted, or give rise to suspicions of the fairness of his statement. And yet it may happen, as Dr. Lushington declares it did in the case of The Lady Anne, 1 Eng. Law & Eq. 674, that the very point on which a case of collision hinged, had never been touched upon at all in the pleadings. In that case he remarked, "it is certainly desirable, in all these cases, that the pleadings should state the facts with precision, and should also state with accuracy the grounds upon which both parties rely. But I think we must be also well aware, that in matters of this description, it will be quite vain to expect perfect accuracy as to facts or pleadings, and for a very obvious reason." I agree with Mr. Justice Washington (Crawford v. The Wm. Penn [Case No. 3,373]) that there is no doctrine of merely technical variance in the admiralty; and that aside from the influence produced upon the mind of the judge by the fact that a party has not stated his case accurately, no effect is allowed to a variance, which cannot have surprised or injured the opposite party. And when the court takes the facts to be, as a party has distinctly averred them on the record, it is plain that party cannot be surprised or injured by a different statement by his opponent.

In the case before me, the libel alleges a collision through the fault of the brig. The facts that the vessels were sailing on the same tack, the Hornet being to leeward, and so closehauled that she could not luff any nearer the wind, are stated in the libel. It is not stated, in terms, that the brig also was not closehauled; but the answer alleges that the brig had the wind two points free, that the two vessels were sailing on converging courses, and neither changed its course until a collision was inevitable. This makes a case of fault on the part of the brig, unless it is repelled by other facts; and the burden is on the claimant to prove those facts. The Baron Holberg, 3 Hagg. Adm. 245. The claimant's counsel insists that this burden has been sustained, and that the libellant should not recover: because the steersman of the Hornet did not do all he was bound to do, to avoid a collision, after the danger had become apparent. If this were so, it might make a case of mutual fault. The Commerce, 3 W. Rob. Adm. 288. But I am not satisfied that he omitted any thing which he ought to have done. Upon the rule of navigation applicable to such cases, he was not only in the right, in acting upon the assumption that the brig would be so steered, as to keep out of his way, but he was bound to act on that assumption and keep his course, unless he saw that there would be no probable chance of a collision, if he disregarded the rule. Undoubtedly a rule is not to be followed, if it is apparent, a collision must ensue from an observance of it, and will be avoided by disregarding it. But considering the great importance of a steady observance of the rules of navigation, and the danger of allowing departures therefrom, I shall be found slow to condemn an observance of one of these rules, and shall require a clear case, demanding a departure from it, to be proved, before I declare it to have been a fault to observe the rule. The Hope, 1 W. Rob. Adm. 155. In my opinion such a case is not made out by this claimant.

The claimant insists that the rule is not applicable except upon the high seas, and never between pilot boats and other vessels. I think otherwise, on both points. The rule is as applicable in bays and roadsteads, and for obvious reasons is of more frequent application, and more practical importance there, than in the open sea. The Speed, 2 W. Rob. Adm. 225; The Eastern State [Case No. 17,494]. And I know of no safe ground, upon which I could hold, that pilot boats are neither to be subjected to, or have the benefit of these settled rules of navigation, which no class of vessels can be released from, consistently with the general safety.

It is further insisted, that at the time in question, the brig was so near the "Graves," she could not luff sufficiently to clear the Hornet, and keep clear of the "Graves," nor bear away without running the Hornet down. This may be true; but those in command of the brig should have foreseen these difficulties, before the brig was in a position, where she could not keep out of the way of the schooner, which she was bound to do. Why the brig was in such a position, is explained by what is admitted in the answer, "that no particular attention was paid to the schooner, until it was perceived she was very near the brig;" this was a fault on the part of a vessel having the wind free, the other being closehauled. Probably the brig could have done, before the collision, what she did immediately afterwards; wear round and stand on her course for Light House channel. Whether she could or not, this was a case where the collision occurred in a summer's day, in a six to eight knot breeze, under no circumstances which a navigator ought not to have perceived or foreseen; and I cannot hesitate to pronounce that vessel in fault which, having the wind free, came into collision with the other closehauled, and exhibits no sufficient excuse for having done so.

A question was made at the hearing, concerning the admissibility of the testimony of experts, in answer to questions proposed to them, not on a given state of facts, but upon the depositions of the witnesses who were present at the collision. I am of opinion such evidence is not admissible. Fenwick v. Bell, 1 Car. & K. 312, would, perhaps, justify such a question; but Sills v. Brown, 9 Car. & P. 601, is the other way; and in The Ann and Mary, 2 W. Rob. Adm. 195, the necessary qualification was made, that a clear statement of facts must be laid before the experts. If this be not done, the court cannot know, whether the opinion pronounced by the expert, is upon the case found by the court, or upon some essentially different case. See U. S. v. McGlue [Case No. 15,679]; Rex v. Searle, 1 Moody & R. 75; Rex v. Wright, Russ. & R. 456; Com. v. Rogers, 7 Metc. [Mass.] 500.

Evidence of two experts was also offered, concerning rules of navigation, where two vessels were sailing on converging courses, the one being closehauled, and the other two points free. The rule of the maritime law upon this subject is so well settled, that I cannot regard opinions of individuals in opposition to, or qualification of it. And though it is undoubtedly true, that special circumstances may exist, upon which the opinions of nautical men may be taken, without controverting the rule, but only for the purpose of ascertaining whether the particular case is within it, yet the court has not found, in this case, any such special circumstances as render the opinions of the experts applicable.

Nor do I think their evidence is sufficient to prove a local usage, binding in point of law, that no attention is required to be paid by other vessels to pilot boats; the latter being bound to take care of themselves. Local usages, on this subject, if capable of being established at all, by any evidence, which I greatly doubt, should be admitted only with the utmost caution. To hold that sailing vessels of a particular class are to take care of themselves, under all circumstances, or under circumstances in which other sailing vessels do not do so, involves the necessity of manoeuvres on their part, which if not foreseen, must produce collisions; and while the usage is local, or forms an exception to the common rules of the sea, how can it be expected to be so known as to be generally foreseen? In my opinion, it would be extremely unsafe to declare, that pilot boats were exempt from the rules which govern other sailing vessels; and I must so declare, if I were to hold them not entitled to the protection of those rules.

The decree of the district court is affirmed, with damages at the rate of six per cent. per annum, and costs.

[NOTE. An appeal was taken to the supreme court, but the judges of that court were equally divided in opinion. See note to case No. 2,880.]

Case No. 2,880.

The CLEMENT.

[1 Spr. 257;[1] 17 Law Rep. 444; 31 Hunt, Mer. Mag. 712.]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct., 1854.[2]

NAVIGATION—SAILING VESSELS—CONVERGING COURSES.

1. A vessel off the wind, must give way to one close-hauled.

[Cited in The Commodore Jones, 25 Fed. 508.]

2. Where a square-rigged vessel and schooner, both close-hauled, are sailing upon convergent courses, on the same tack, and the convergence is caused by the ability of the schooner to lie nearest to the wind, the latter must give way.

[Cited in Whitridge v. Dill, 23 How. (64 U. S.) 455; The Commodore Jones, 25 Fed. 508.]

In admiralty. This was a cause of collision, promoted by Matthew Hunt and another, owners of the pilot boat Hornet, of Boston, against the brig Clement [Paul Mayo, claimant], for running down and sinking the Hornet, in Boston harbor, in June, 1854. The libel alleged, that the two vessels were coming into the harbor, by the wind, (which was W. N. W.,) the schooner being a half a mile to leeward of the brig, and both vessels on the starboard track, bound for Broad sound; that when nearly up to the north-east ledge of the "Graves," the brig suddenly kept off three or four points towards Lighthouse channel, and ran afoul of the Hornet, and sank her. The answer of the respondent denied this statement, and alleged that the brig was sailing towards Lighthouse channel, by the Graves, two points free, and about S. S. W., while the Hornet was close-hauled; that the Hornet persisted in trying to run across the bows of the brig, although hailed and told to keep off, and thereby caused the collision. The answer further alleged, that the brig was so near to the Graves, that she had no room to luff, or tack; but that the Hornet had plenty both of room and time, to have avoided the other vessel, by keeping off.

[1] [Reported by F. E. Parker, Esq., assisted by Charles Francis Adams, Jr., Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

[2] [Affirmed by circuit court in Case No. 2,879.]

Charles P. Curtis, Jr., for libellants.
F. C. Loring, for respondents.

SPRAGUE, District Judge. The collision between these two vessels took place in Boston harbor, about noon, on a fine summer day, when there was a good breeze, and the sea smooth. It is, therefore, a necessary inference, that it must have been caused by the fault of one or both of them. The alleged change in the course of the brig, I do not think is made out by the evidence. But the libel, taken in connection with the answer, presents a case of two vessels sailing on converging courses, both on the same tack, the one close-hauled, and the other two points free. Then the question is, which is to give way? There is some discrepancy in the testimony, as to where this collision took place, and whether it was practicable for the brig to have done otherwise than keep her course; but from the respondent's witnesses, taken in connection with those of the libellant, I infer that it must have been outside of the buoy, which is on the north-east ledge of the Graves. The captain of the brig says he was then eastward of "the buoy;" and it is shown that there is but one buoy near the Graves, and that, half a mile from the Graves proper.

The respondent says, that the Hornet was trying to run across the brig's bows. That is true; but it is equally true that the brig was trying to run across the schooner's bows; and it is to prevent collision in similar cases, that a rule of the sea has been established. The present case appears to be one to which the rule applies, viz., that when two vessels are approaching on convergent courses, one close-hauled, and the other free, and there is danger of collision, the vessel having the wind free must give way. If the brig had been close-hauled, and the Hornet close-hauled also, and the convergence of their courses had been owing to the schooner's ability to lie nearer to the wind than the other, then the brig would not have been bound to give way; for the reason that the schooner would have been in a condition, in which she would have had an advantage over the square-rigged vessel, and she might have altered her course, and still been on equal terms with the other. But, in this case, the brig was not close-hauled; she was two points free, and it was therefore incumbent on her to give way. It is in evidence, that the captain of the brig saw the Hornet half an hour before the collision; and he had it in his power either to keep off [at once in front of the schooner, or he might subsequently have gone under her stern],[3] or haul his wind [and either backed his topsail or gone about],[4] and afterwards to regain the line on which he was previously sailing. In fact, the brig luffed and wore round after the accident, and it is therefore justly inferrible, that there was room enough for her to have done so before. As she was heading toward Lighthouse channel, and was up to windward, she might have adopted either of the above measures, without any more detention than would be caused by a short deviation, while the schooner being as close to the wind as she could go, heading for a narrow passage near the Graves, any deviation by her would have been [a detention and][5] a loss of ground to leeward. It was therefore incumbent upon the brig to adopt some one of these measures, and so avoid the schooner.

Another fact tends to show negligence on the part of the brig. It appears that the captain saw the schooner half an hour before the collision, and that although he saw that the two vessels were upon converging courses, he says he paid no attention to her, from that time, till the collision was imminent. This was negligence on the part of the brig. Every vessel is bound to keep watch of all vessels in her vicinity. and to observe their motions and courses. In addition to this, the man at the wheel of the brig testified that he heard the hail from the schooner, before the collision, but took no measures to alter the course he was steering; and he gave, as his reason for not doing so, that he had no order from the captain to that effect, and would not do so till he had. This cannot be justified; having it in his power to avoid the collision when it was imminent, it was his duty to do so immediately, without waiting for orders from the captain, when life and property were hazarded by his delay. For these reasons, I think the brig was to blame.

The question then arises: Was the Hornet in fault also, because she did not keep away, when hailed from the brig? I do not think she was. If she were to be adjudged in fault, because she persevered in holding her course, then the rule requiring a vessel with the wind free to give way to one close-hauled, would be practically abrogated. The rule authorizes and requires the vessel by the wind to hold her course, under the confident belief that the other will give way. [It is not for the brig to complain that the Hornet held her course, when she herself was already off the wind, and could have kept off a little more with difficulty.][5] I think the brig was alone to blame in this collision, and therefore a decree must be entered for the libellants, with costs, and an assessor appointed, to ascertain the damages, unless the parties can agree on the amount thereof.

This case was affirmed, upon appeal to the circuit court. [Case No. 2,879.] Upon appeal to the supreme court, the judges were equally divided. [Case not reported.]

[3] [From 17 Law Rep. 444.]

[4] [From 31 Hunt, Mer. Mag. 712.]

[5] [From 17 Law Rep. 444.]

Case No. 2,881.

CLEMENT et al. v. PHOENIX INS. CO.

[6 Blatchf. 481.][1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. June 25, 1869.

INSURANCE—KNOWLEDGE OF LOSS—DEFENSES—EVIDENCE.

1. Where an insurer sets up, as a defence to a policy of marine insurance, that the insured was advised of the loss of the subject insured before he procured the insurance, the insurer assumes the burden of proving such defence.

2. If the attempt is made to prove such defence, by showing that such advice was conveyed by a letter, it must be shown not only that such letter was sent, but that it was received.

3. Knowledge of the loss, before insurance, possessed by a person who is not the agent of the insured for any purpose connected with procuring the insurance, is not notice to the insured.

At law. This was an action [by Francis M. Clement and Elam W. Ditterline, against the Phoenix Insurance Company, of Brooklyn, N. Y.], tried before the court without a jury.

Edwin W. Stoughton, for plaintiffs.
James C. Carter, for defendants.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. This suit is brought on a policy of insurance, issued by the Phoenix Insurance Company, of Brooklyn, N. Y., to A. H. Cardozo & Co., "on account of whom it may concern," for the sum of $15,000, on the 8th of August, 1867, on 52 hogsheads of tobacco, lost or not lost, valued at $300 per hogshead, on transportation, by steamer and railroad, from Dycusburgh, Kentucky, to New York, being the property described in a bill of lading therefor, dated July 22d, 1867. The tobacco belonged to the plaintiffs, who resided at or near Dycusburgh. On the 22d of July, 1867, they placed it in charge of one McCoy, at Dycusburgh, who, by a written and printed agreement, then signed by him, in the shape of a receipt, or bill of lading, and in which he described himself as a contracting agent, contracted to deliver it at New York, to A. H. Cardozo & Co., by a transportation which was to be by railroad all the way from Cincinnati, and over the Baltimore and Ohio railroad. The tobacco was shipped by McCoy, at Dycusburgh, on board of a steamboat, which carried it down the Tennessee river, to Paducah, where it was shipped on board of a steamboat, called the Mary Erwin, to be carried up the Ohio river to Cincinnati. The bill of lading was forwarded from Dycusburgh, by the plaintiffs, to A. H. Cardozo & Co., at New York, and was received by them on the 2d of August. The insurance was effected at New York, on the 8th of August. The Mary Erwin struck a log or snag, in trying to back off from a reef, on which she had grounded, on the morning of the 1st of August, about forty miles west of Cincinnati, and sank. The tobacco in question was submerged, and damaged by water. It was rescued, and taken to Cincinnati, and sold there at auction, under the direction of an average adjuster, and netted the sum of $812.11.

The defendants have assumed the burden of proving, as a defence, that A. H. Cardozo & Co. were advised of the loss of the tobacco before they procured the insurance. I do not think this defence is satisfactorily made out by a preponderance of proof. The evidence relied on to show notice of the loss to A. H. Cardozo & Co. is entirely circumstantial. It is claimed that a letter was written and mailed by McCoy, at Cincinnati, on the 5th of August, addressed to A. H. Cardozo & Co., at New York, informing them of the loss of the tobacco. The receipt of that letter by A. H. Cardozo & Co. is not shown, and the two persons who composed the firm of A. H. Cardozo & Co. deny that it was received by them. The fact that a letter, written by McCoy at the same time, to the firm of R. L. Maitland & Co., of New York, informing them of the loss of some property of theirs on board of the Mary Erwin, was received by them, at New York, as early as the 8th of August, is relied on, in connection with testimony as to the regularity of the mail communication between Cincinnati and New York, and with the fact that a letter, mailed at Cincinnati, for New York, on the 5th of August, ought to have reached New York, in due course, not later than the 7th of August, to induce the conclusion that A. H. Cardozo & Co. must have received the letter, notwithstanding their denial, as witnesses, that they received it. But the fact that Maitland & Co. received the letter sent to them, and that the mail was regular, and ought to have brought to Cardozo & Co., by the 7th of August, a letter leaving Cincinnati on the 5th of August, is of no effect to show the receipt of such a letter by Cardozo & Co., unless it be clearly shown that such a letter was sent. The regularity of the mail, and the receipt of the letter by R. L. Maitland & Co., would rather serve to show that no letter was sent to Cardozo & Co., in view of the fact that the receipt of such a letter is denied by Cardozo & Co., and is not directly proved. No copy of the letter claimed to have been sent to Cardozo & Co. by McCoy is put in evidence, and, on the proofs, I am not satisfied that any such letter was sent. The burden of showing that such a letter was sent, as well as that, if sent, it was received, is on the defendants, and they have failed to make out either point. They must make out both, to establish their defence as to notice to Cardozo & Co.

It is also claimed by the defendants, that, as McCoy had notice in Cincinnati, as early as the 5th of August, of the loss of the tobacco, and as he was the agent of the plaintiffs to transport the tobacco to New York, and as they had put it into his custody, to be retained therein at least until it reached Cincinnati, he was bound to communicate notice of the loss to Cardozo & Co. by a telegraphic despatch; that, whether he did, or did not, communicate with Cardozo & Co., by writing to them, he was advised, by the face of the receipt, or bill of lading, or contract, which he entered into at Dycusburgh, that the tobacco was to be forwarded to Cardozo & Co., at New York, and that he was bound, immediately on hearing of the loss, to adopt the most speedy means of communication known to the commercial world, for imparting information of the loss to the consignees, in order to guard against a possibility of their effecting an insurance after the loss had happened; and that, in this way, notice to McCoy became, in law, notice to Cardozo & Co. In support of this view, the case of Proudfoot v. Montefiore, 2 L. Q. B. 511, is cited. In that case, one Rees, the agent, at Smyrna, of the plaintiff, who was in England, purchased at Smyrna a cargo of madder, and shipped it to the plaintiff by a vessel which was stranded soon after leaving Smyrna, so that the cargo became a total loss. Rees learned, at Smyrna, of the loss, seven days before the insurance in England was effected by the plaintiff. It appeared that the fact of the loss might have been communicated to the plaintiff by Rees, by telegraph, and it also appeared, from a letter written by Rees, two days after he heard of the loss, to the plaintiff, but which was not received by the plaintiff until after the insurance was effected, that Rees abstained from telegraphing to the plaintiff, for the fraudulent purpose of enabling the plaintiff to insure. Chief Justice Cockburn, in giving the judgment of the court, says: "We think it clear, looking to the position of Rees, as agent to purchase and ship the cargo for the plaintiff, that it was his duty to communicate to his principal the disaster which had happened to the cargo; and, looking to the now general use of the electric telegraph, in matters of mercantile interest, between agents and their employers, we think it was the duty of the agent to communicate with his employer by this speedier means of communication. From the letter of the agent, it appears that, but for the fraudulent motive for his silence, he would, in the ordinary course of his duty, have conveyed the intelligence of the loss to his employer, and would have availed himself of the telegraph for that purpose." On these facts, the court held, that the plaintiff was so far affected by the knowledge by Rees of the loss of the vessel, and of the damage to the cargo, as that the fraud thus committed on the underwriter, through the intentional concealment of the agent, though innocently committed, so far as the plaintiff was concerned, afforded a defence to the underwriter, on a claim to enforce the policy. That case was, undoubtedly, on its facts, properly decided. But no such state of facts exists in the case at bar. Whatever the character of the agency of McCoy was, he was not the agent of the plaintiffs for any purpose connected with procuring insurance on the tobacco. In the case of General Interest Ins. Co. v. Ruggles, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 408, the supreme court considered the question, as to how far the negligence or misconduct of an agent of an insured party, in withholding from such party knowledge of the loss of the subject insured, where the insurance was effected, lost or not lost, after the loss had happened, would affect such party, where it appeared that knowledge of the loss did not, in fact, reach such party until after the insurance was effected, and he acted in entire good faith. It held, that, if the agent guilty of the negligence or misconduct was the agent of the owner for any purpose connected with procuring the insurance, the owner would be chargeable with the loss. The court say: "It is not, therefore, true, as a universal rule, that either the fact of loss, or the knowledge of such fact by the agent or the principal, at the time the policy is procured, will vacate it. But such knowledge must be brought home to some of the parties or agents connected with the business of procuring the insurance; and then the rule properly applies, which puts the principal in place of the agent, and makes him responsible for his acts." This doctrine must be regarded as the law of this court, and of this case. Under it, a knowledge of the loss by Cardozo & Co., before they procured the insurance, would, of course, vitiate the policy. But a knowledge of it by McCoy cannot affect the plaintiffs. He appears to have been only a contracting agent, to solicit shipments of property, and, in view of his actual attitude toward the plaintiffs, and the extent and character of his agency, I am not disposed to hold that he was under any such obligation to communicate intelligence of the loss to Cardozo & Co., as would vitiate the insurance for his failure to do so. The bill of lading informed him that the tobacco was sent for account of the plaintiffs. He sent a notice of the loss, on the 5th of August, to the plaintiffs, at Dycusburgh, from Cincinnati, but they did not hear of the loss until the 15th of August, and did not receive that letter till after that time. The nearest telegraphic station to Dycusburgh was Paducah, thirty miles' distance. Even if it were shown that a telegraphic despatch, sent by McCoy to Paducah, could have reached the plaintiffs in season for them to have communicated by telegraph with Cardozo & Co., before the insurance was effected, I do not think that the agency of McCoy, or his implied legal obligation, through the plaintiffs, to the underwriters, was such as to make his failure to communicate by telegraph to the plaintffs operate as a vitiation of the policy.

[1] [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

I find for the plaintiffs, for the sum of $16,543.57, as of the 9th of June, 1869.

[NOTE. Subsequently defendants submitted to the court a special finding for signature and filing, which finding the court declined to make. Case No. 2,882, next following.]

Case No. 2,882.

CLEMENT et al. v. PHOENIX INS. CO.

[7 Blatchf. 51.] [1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Nov. 19, 1869.

TRIAL WITHOUT JURY—FINDINGS—PRACTICE.

1. Where an action at law is tried by this court, without a jury, under the provisions of the 4th section of the act of March 3d, 1865 (13 Stat. 501), it is discretionary with the court to make either a general or a special finding upon the facts.

[Cited in Folsom v. Mercantile Mut. Ins. Co., Case No. 4,903.]

2. The proper mode of procedure, on such a trial, in respect to propounding propositions of law, and to passing thereon, and to excepting to rulings thereon, with a view to a writ of error or an appeal, stated.

3. It is not necessary there should be a special finding on the facts, in order to secure to the defeated party the right to move for a new trial, or to have a review by the supreme court, or the full benefit of any exception taken by him at the time to any ruling of the court, on any question of law, in the progress of the trial.

[Cited in Folsom v. Mercantile Mut. Ins. Co., Case No. 4,903.]

4. A trial by the court, without a jury, is not concluded until the formal finding of the court upon the facts is made

5. The danger of prejudice to the successful party, by a special finding of facts, on a trial by the court, in case of a review by the supreme court, stated.

This was an action at law [by Francis M. Clement and Elam W. Ditterline] (see [Clement v. Phoenix Ins. Co., Case No. 2,881]) on a policy of insurance made by the defendants [the Phoenix Insurance Company of Brooklyn, New York], insuring $15,600 on 52 hogsheads of tobacco, on transportation by steamer and railroad from Dycusburgh, Kentucky, to the city of New York.

Edwin W. Stoughton, for plaintiffs.

James C. Carter, for defendants.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. This action was tried before the court, without a jury, under the provisions of the 4th section of the act of March 3, 1865 (13 Stat. 501), a jury having been waived by a stipulation in writing signed by the attorneys of record, and filed with the clerk of the court. That section provides as follows: "Issues of facts in civil cases in any circuit court of the United States, may be tried and determined by the court without the intervention of a jury, whenever the parties, or their attorneys of record, file a stipulation in writing with the clerk of the court, waiving a jury. The finding of the court upon the facts, which finding may be either general or special, shall have the same effect as the verdict of a jury. The rulings of the court in the cause, in the progress of the trial, when excepted to at the time, may be reviewed by the supreme court of the United States, upon a writ of error or upon appeal, provided the rulings be duly presented by a bill of exceptions. When the finding is special, the review may also extend to the determination of the sufficiency of the facts found to support the judgment." The proceedings in open court at the trial having been concluded, the case was submitted for determination to the court, which subsequently announced that it found for the plaintiffs for the sum of $16,543.57, as of the 9th of June, 1869. [Case No. 2,881.] No formal finding, either general or special, has been signed, or filed, or entered in the minutes of the court. The defendants now submit to the court the draft of a special finding of the court upon the facts, which they ask the court to sign and file as the finding of the court upon the facts. It consists of eleven statements or propositions. The plaintiffs object to the making by the court of any special finding upon the facts.

It is apparent that, under the statute, it is discretionary with the court to make either a general finding or a special finding. Especially is this so, in view of the prior act of February 19, 1864 (13 Stat. 5), which provides, in its 7th section, as follows, in reference to the circuit courts for the districts of California and Oregon: "Issues of fact in civil cases may be tried and determined by the said circuit court, without the intervention of a jury, whenever the parties, or their attorneys of record, file a stipulation in writing with the clerk, waiving a jury. Upon the trial of an issue of fact by the court, its decision shall be given in writing and filed with the clerk. In giving the decision, the facts found and the conclusions of law shall be separately stated." This court, therefore, when trying an issue of fact in a civil case, when a jury is waived, is not required to state separately the facts found and the conclusions of law, nor is it required to make a special finding upon the facts. The inquiry then arises, whether it is necessary or proper that the court should make such special finding in this case.

By the statute, the finding, when made, has the same effect as the verdict of a jury. As the trial of an issue of fact before a jury is not concluded until the verdict of the jury is rendered, so the trial of an issue of fact by the court without the intervention of a jury is not concluded until the formal finding of the court upon the facts, which is to have the same effect as the verdict of a jury, is made. When, therefore, the statute speaks of the rulings of the court in the cause, in the progress of the trial, it includes all rulings on questions of law which the court may make in the progress of the trial, down to the time the finding on the facts is formally made. The trial is to proceed in all respects as if before a jury, except that there is to be no charge to a jury, and, instead of a verdict by a jury, there is to be a finding by the court on the facts, which finding, if general, is to have the same effect as the general verdict of a jury, and, if special, is to have the same effect as the special verdict of a jury. The rulings of the court in admitting or rejecting evidence are to be made and excepted to as on a trial before a jury. When the evidence is concluded, the respective parties are to propound to the court the propositions of law which they respectively conceive to arise therefrom, as on a trial before a jury, except that a proposition of law, instead of running to the effect that, if the jury find thus and so, the law on such a state of fact is thus and so, will run, that if the court find thus and so, the law on such a state of fact is thus and so. The court must pass on such a proposition of law, when it tries an issue of fact, just as it must pass on a proposition of law when made at a like stage of the trial, on a trial before a jury. On a trial before a jury, the court passes on such a proposition when it is made, and before the jury retires to consider of its verdict. On a trial before the court, the court may pass on such a proposition when it is made, or it may take the proposition into consideration and pass upon it afterwards, before making its finding on the facts, and, therefore, during the trial, and, in either event, the party advancing the proposition, as well as the opposite party, will, accordingly as the court does or does not affirm the proposition, have the opportunity of excepting to the ruling of the court thereon at the time such ruling is made; and such ruling being within the 4th section of the act of 1865, a ruling of the court in the cause in the progress of the trial, and being excepted to at the time, may, under that section, when duly presented by a bill of exceptions, be reviewed by the supreme court upon a writ of error or upon appeal. In this way the rights of both parties are preserved. The propositions of law that are affirmed by the court are like the charge of the court to the jury, and its rulings can be excepted to by the party that is dissatisfied with them. When propositions of law are overruled by the court, its action can be excepted to by the party which advances the propositions. There is no absolute necessity, therefore, for a special finding by the court on the facts, any more than there is an absolute necessity, in every case tried before a jury, for the finding by it of a special verdict. If the counsel for each party discharges properly and seasonably the duty of presenting to the court such propositions of law as he conceives to arise on the evidence, no right of either party can be prejudiced. There will be the same right and the same opportunity to move, with effect, for a new trial, on a case, because the finding is against the weight of evidence, that there are, on a trial before a jury, to move for a new trial, on a case, because the verdict is against the weight of evidence. There will be the same right and the same opportunity to move, with effect, for a new trial, because of an error in law committed by the court, that there is on a trial before a jury. It is not necessary, in order to enable those remedies to be pursued, that there should be a special finding by the court upon the facts, any more than it is necessary there should, on a trial before a jury, be a special verdict, in order to enable those remedies to be pursued. By the course above indicated, as the one proper to be pursued on a trial before the court without a jury, the separation of the matters of law from the questions of fact, which is necessary in order to a review upon the matters of law in a higher tribunal, is effected as completely as it can be in the case of a general verdict rendered by a jury. The rulings of the court on the propositions of law advanced by the respective counsel, after the evidence has been put in, on a trial by the court without a jury, are equivalent to the charge of the court to the jury, and stand out separate and distinct from the questions of fact, and can be specifically excepted to. In several of the circuit courts of the United States, it is not the custom for the court to charge the jury, on the trial of an issue of fact, otherwise than by its responses to the propositions of law, advanced in writing by the respective parties after all the evidence is taken.

[1] [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

In the present case, it is said, on the part of the defendants, that they desire to raise the point, that, as matter of law, on the evidence, one McCoy, at Cincinnati, ought to have given notice, by telegraph from there, at a certain time, to the consignees at New York of the tobacco, of its previous loss, and that, as he did not give such notice, the plaintiffs cannot recover. This is based on the view, that McCoy knew of the loss on the 5th of August, 1867, at Cincinnati, and that the insurance was not effected by the consignees at New York, until the 8th of August, 1867. Now, the proper and effectual way to raise this point, is to have it appear, by the record, that the defendants requested the court to rule, as matter of law, that if it should find that McCoy had notice in Cincinnati, as early as the 5th of August, 1867, of the loss of the tobacco, and that McCoy was the agent of the plaintiffs to transport the tobacco to New York, and that the plaintiffs had put it into McCoy's custody, to be retained therein at least until it reached Cincinnati, then McCoy was bound to communicate notice of the loss by telegraph to the consignees at

New York as soon as he had notice of it himself, and that if it should find that McCoy did not communicate such notice by telegraph, the plaintiffs could not recover. This would be the mode adopted to raise the point on a trial before a jury, and there is no reason why it should not be adopted on a trial by the court without a jury. Of course, the substance of the request above suggested may be varied, if it is not full enough, either in its statement as to the finding of fact, or as to the proposition of law. The form suggested for the request is only intended to indicate that there can be no difficulty, on the evidence given in the case, in framing a proper and adequate form of request to secure, to the same extent, the same right of review to which the defendants would have been entitled if a trial by jury had not been waived by them. Nothing is more usual in a request to charge a jury, than to say that if the jury finds thus and so to be the fact from the evidence, then such and such is the law thereon. The hypothetical finding of fact indicated in the request must necessarily be based on something antecedent in the record, showing that evidence was given tending to establish the fact indicated. If there be such evidence, the request is a proper one to have been made, and the party making it can have the full benefit, on an exception, of a refusal by the court to charge in accordance with the request. These same views hold true in regard to a request to the court, on a trial by it without a jury, to rule thus and so as to the law, on a hypothetical finding of fact indicated in the request. The court will necessarily, by its response to the request, have indicated clearly whether or not it gave to the party making the request the benefit of the principle of law propounded therein.

The cases decided by the supreme court, cited by the defendants' counsel, do not, as I understand them, hold, as is contended, that, whenever a jury is waived, that court cannot and will not review anything unless there is in the record a special finding of facts. In Hyde v. Booraem, 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 169, there was no bill of exceptions, and the court, on a statement of facts, held that, in point of law, the judgment below could not, on those facts, be maintained. Mr. Justice Story, in that case, says, speaking of a trial before the court without a jury: "If either party in the court below is dissatisfied with the ruling of the judge in a matter of law, that ruling should be brought before this court by an appropriate exception in the nature of a bill of exceptions." In Minor v. Tillotson, 2 How. [43 U. S.] 392, the case was tried before the court without a jury, but there was no bill of exceptions. In Prentice v. Zane's Adm'r, 8 How. [49 U. S.] 470, there was a trial before a jury, and a special verdict. In Graham v. Bayne, 18 How. [59 U. S.] 60, there was no bill of exceptions presenting questions of law. The case of Guild v. Frontin, 18 How. [59 U. S.] 135, only decides that where there is a trial before the court without the intervention of a jury, there must be either a special verdict or an agreed statement of facts, or a bill of exceptions to the decisions of the court on questions of law, in order to enable the supreme court to review the judgment of the court below.

But, even if a refusal by the supreme court to review a case when a jury was waived, unless there was, in the record, a special finding of facts, had been the established practice before the passage of the act of 1865, the 4th section of that act expressly provides that, where a trial by jury is waived, the finding of the court on the facts may be general, and shall, when general, have the same effect as the general verdict of a jury; and that, in the case of such a general finding, every ruling of the court in the cause, in the progress of the trial, when excepted to at the time, may, when duly presented by a bill of exceptions, be reviewed by the supreme court on a writ of error or on appeal. A special finding in this case, is, therefore, unnecessary, to give to the defendants the full benefit of any exception taken by them at the time to any ruling of the court or any question of law in the progress of the trial.

But there is a further provision in the 4th section of the act of 1865, namely, that, "when the finding is special, the review may also extend to the determination of the sufficiency of the facts found to support the judgment." A losing party in a cause can always have the substantial benefit of this provision, without a special finding on the facts, by requesting the court to rule, as matter of law, that unless every one of such and such facts is found by it to exist, or unless a particular fact is found to exist, his adversary cannot have a general finding in his favor. But a winning party may be seriously prejudiced by a special finding, because, on a review by the supreme court thereon, if any one fact, however slight, really necessary to support the judgment, should, merely through inadvertence or accident, have been omitted from the finding, the judgment would have to be reversed. Graham v. Bayne, 18 How. [59 U. S.] 60, 63.

The court, therefore, declines to make a special finding of facts in this case. But, under the circumstances, both parties will now be allowed to propound to the court such written requests as to matters of law, on the evidence taken in the case, as they shall desire, and the court will make written rulings thereon, and exceptions can then be taken thereto. The court will then make a general finding in form. This course can be taken, because the trial is still in progress.

CLEMENT (UNITED STATES v.). See Case No. 14,815.

Case No. 2,883.

CLEMENT'S EX'RS v. DICKEY.

[1 Paine, 377.][1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. April Term, 1825.

AUTHORITY OF MASTER TO DRAW BILLS OF EXCHANGE.

The owner of a vessel sent her from New-York, consigned to his correspondents at Antwerp, with directions that they should despatch her to India, furnishing the master with a letter of credit, entitling him to draw on London for 5,000 pounds. The master was instructed if he should not have funds to purchase a cargo in India, to "extend his drawing." Being in want of funds, he drew, not on the house in London on whom he had drawn the 5,000 pounds, but on the consignees at Antwerp, who had obtained the letter of credit, and to whom the vessel and cargo were to return. Held, that the bills were drawn without authority, and should have been drawn on the house in London.

At law. This was an action of assumpsit [by Clement's executors] to recover of the defendant [Robert Dickey] the amount of three bills of exchange, drawn by Francis Allyn, as master of the defendant's ship, Frances Henrietta, upon Parish, Agie & Co. of Antwerp, and for goods sold and delivered by the plaintiffs' testator to Allyn, as such master. The cause was tried at the September term, 1823, and now came before the court on a case made by the plaintiffs. At the trial it appeared on the part of the plaintiffs, that Allyn, in April, 1818, sailed as master of the defendant's ship, Frances Henrietta, on a voyage from New-York to Antwerp. The vessel was consigned to Parish, Agie & Co., who were to decide after she arrived at Antwerp, whether the voyage should be continued round the Cape of Good Hope. Allyn was informed by his letter of instructions, that if such an extension of the voyage should be determined on, "Parish, Agie & Co. were to put on board the ship 55,000 or 60,000 Spanish dollars, and to furnish an effective letter of credit, to enable his passing bills from the port of lading, on Holland or London, to the amount of 5,000 pounds sterling; and that after leaving Antwerp, the care and management of the voyage would be reposed in him." He was also instructed by the same letter, "to proceed to the Isle of France, to procure on fit terms, a cargo chiefly of coffee and sugar, and if he should there discover that it would be more advantageous to go to Batavia, to proceed thither. If disappointed at Batavia, to proceed on to Manilla, or return by the Isle of France, or go to Bombay, or Calcutta. That wherever he might load, it was the defendant's desire, that it should eventually be a full cargo, and that if the specie and credit he carried should fall short, he could take on freight or extend his drawing, and if needful, give security by bill of lading on so much of the shipment as his extra credit paid for. To return to Europe when loaded, proceeding to such port in the British Channel as Parish, Agie & Co. might point out to receive their orders as to what port of discharge he should take the ship to, which would be Antwerp, or a port in Holland. That he should have the papers both outward and homeward made out for the defendant's account and risk, the outward cargo to be consigned to himself, and the homeward to Parish, Agie & Co." He was further directed, "to acknowledge in writing to Parish, Agie & Co. these orders of the defendant; to inquire at Antwerp about the crops of grain, which would affect rice, and help him in his conclusion as to filling up with that article, particularly if his funds should be short." He was also informed, "that if this voyage to India should be undertaken, the defendant would, when he should hear that it was determined on, effect the necessary insurance, and would also again write, so that the letter would reach him before he left Antwerp." In June the ship arrived at Antwerp, to Parish, Agie & Co., who directed the master to proceed on the India voyage, and furnished him with 55,000 dollars in specie, and a letter of credit on Thomas Wilson & Co. for 5,000 pounds sterling. The master received no written instructions from Parish, Agie & Co., but was verbally directed by them to proceed to the Indian seas. The letter of credit contained a provision, that the proceeds of the drafts should be invested in goods and shipped on board the Frances Henrietta, to Holland, to Parish, Agie & Co. The ship not being able to enter at the Isle of France, went to Batavia, where she arrived the 2d of December, 1818. There had been lately a great rise in the markets, but the master, on the whole, concluded to purchase of Clement, the defendant's testator, 2,700 piculs of coffee at 30 dollars per picul, and 514 piculs of sugar at 9 dollars 50 cents per picul, at the specie value of a dollar, for which he paid him in the specie and proceeds of the drafts on Thomas Wilson & Co. These funds being inadequate to the payment of the amount purchased of Clement, Allyn showed him his letter of instructions, and probably also another letter he had received while at Antwerp, from the defendant, dated May 23d, 1818, advising him about prices, and informing him, that sugar at about five cents pound English would be the best return cargo, and coffee at 21 or 22 cents without our duty, the next best. Allyn and Clement then entered into an agreement in writing, that Clement should receive from Allyn in payment of the residue of his purchase, bills of exchange drawn by Allyn on Parish, Agie & Co. in favour of Clement for 5,900 pounds sterling, payable in London, and that as security for such bills, Allyn should ship 700 piculs of coffee contained in 763 bags as per invoice and bill of lading, consigned to Clement, freight free, and that on the payment of the bills, the invoice and bill of lading should be endorsed and given up to Allyn's order. The bills were drawn at the rate of 5 shillings 2 pence the dollar, so as to allow Clement the difference in exchange. Allyn believed that this agreement was according to his instructions, and that he was authorized to draw as he did. Clement was the master of an American ship then on a voyage to India, and the sugar and coffee sold to Allyn, had been purchased by Clement at Batavia, for his own ship, but he had changed his mind in consequence of intelligence received, and determined to go to Canton. Allyn wished to purchase no more of Clement's cargo than he had funds for, but Clement would not break it. In pursuance of their agreement, Allyn drew the bills of exchange, and also delivered to Clement the bill of lading and invoice of the 763 bags of coffee, which were shipped for account and risk of the defendant. Allyn informed Clement, that he had ordered insurance upon that part of the cargo which exceeded his funds, but it was understood that either he or Clement might order the insurance to be effected. They both sent orders for the insurance to London, where their correspondents made an arrangement that it should be insured on Clement's order, and not on Allyn's. Nothing was said about insurance in the written agreement. The Frances Henrietta arrived at Antwerp in October, 1819, consigned to Parish, Agie & Co. The cargo was delivered to them; the 763 bags of coffee on account of Clement, and the residue on account of defendant. It also appeared that Clement received the 55,000 Spanish dollars at par, although they were worth a premium of ten per cent. Government sales, however, were always made for dollars, and just before Allyn's arrival at Batavia government sales of coffee had been made at 22 dollars per picul, but the prices had risen very rapidly, and before he made the purchase of Clement, these sales had been made at 33 dollars. Allyn could not obtain at Batavia either a full or part freight. The price of rice was 2 dollars per picul. A picul is equal to 133 pounds. Samuel Williams, who effected the insurance for Clement on the 763 bags of coffee, paid a premium amounting with charges to 171 pounds 5 shillings and 6 pence. He also paid for Clement 40 pounds for law expenses, on account of the bills of exchange. The proceeds of the 763 bags amounting to 4,842 pounds, were also remitted to him for Clement's account, and Williams's charges amounted to about 50 pounds. On the 29th September, 1819, Allyn, on his passage from Batavia to Antwerp, touched off Dover, and there received notice of the protest of the bills for non-acceptance, and while he was at Antwerp, a judgment was recovered against him at the suit of Clement on the bills. The protest for non-acceptance was dated the 13th of August, 1819, and of non-payment the 12th of November following. No other notice of the protest of the bills was ever received by either the defendant or Allyn, than the one received by the latter when he touched off Dover. A deposition of Allyn, proving most of the facts of the case, to which was annexed a release to him from Clement, executed before the taking of the deposition, was read at the trial, but objected to by the defendant's counsel, on the ground of interest in the witness. The court charged the jury, that Allyn was authorized to purchase the cargo of Clement, but not to draw bills in payment on Parish, Agie & Co. and that the plaintiffs could not therefore recover damages on the bills or re-exchange. That in making up their verdict, they should allow the defendant credit, without any premium, for the monies paid the plaintiff, and the proceeds of the 700 piculs of coffee shipped as security, and find the balance of the price of the coffee for the plaintiffs. That the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover for the insurance and law charges. The jury found a verdict for 6,818 dollars 21 cents.

[1] [Reported by Elijah Paine, Jr., Esq.]

H. D. Sedgwick and R. Sedgwick, for plaintiffs, contended, that the bills were drawn by the master necessarily and bona fide; and that the proper construction of the expression "extend your drawing," was, that he should draw on his consignees, who were the only persons to draw on except Thomas Wilson & Co., whose letter of credit had been exhausted, and on whom, of course, he had no right to draw.

C. Graham for defendant, contended, 1. That Allyn was not on account of his own liability as drawer of the bills, under the circumstances of the case, a competent witness on the part of the plaintiffs. 2. That the plaintiffs could not recover on the bills of exchange. They were drawn without authority. The master, it is conceded, could not have drawn the bills without the power to draw contained in his letter of instructions. Parish, Agie & Co., as he was informed by that letter, were to furnish him with a letter of credit, which would enable him to draw to the amount of 5,000 pounds on Holland or London. They were to determine whether the drawing should be on Holland or London, and did determine in favour of the latter place. The authority of Allyn to extend his drawing was, therefore, an authority to draw only on Thomas Wilson & Co. of London. 3 Term R. 757; 1 Esp. 111; 2 J. P. Smith [Eng.] 79, 80; 1 Taunt. 347; 2 Johns. 48. The release to Allyn enured to defendant's benefit, and destroyed the plaintiffs' right of action on the bills. [M'Fadden v. Parker] 4 Dall. [4 U. S.] 275; 2 Caine, 121; 12 Johns. 189. No notice was given to the defendant of the protest of the bills. Chit. Bills, 213–216. 3 That the defendant was entitled to have credit for the whole proceeds of the 700 piculs of coffee shipped as a security for the bills of exchange and the interest thereon; and that the charges for insurance, law expenses, commissions, &c. mentioned in Samuel Williams' account, ought to be rejected. 4. That the plaintiffs were not entitled to damages or re-exchange upon the bills. 5. That if the defendant was at all liable to the plaintiffs, it was upon the footing of an account stated between the plaintiffs' testator and the defendant for goods sold, crediting the defendant with the monies paid at Batavia, and the proceeds of the 700 piculs of coffee. 6. That interest ought to have been calculated at 5, and not 7 per cent.

THOMPSON, Circuit Justice. The main question in this case relates to the authority of Captain Allyn to draw the bills, which form the principal subject of litigation in this cause. It is objected, however, preliminarily, that Captain Allyn, who was admitted as a witness, was incompetent on the ground of interest; the bills appearing on their face to have been drawn by him on his own account, and not as agent of the defendant. This objection however is not tenable. For admitting Captain Allyn's personal responsibility upon the bills, he was completely discharged therefrom by the release given to him previous to his examination. This release not only embraced his liability on the bills of exchange, but extended to all matters touching this suit. And besides, if he by exceeding his instructions had thrown on the defendant a loss, he would be responsible over to him. His interest was, therefore, against the party calling him; as by exonerating Dickey he would screen himself from any responsibility over to his principal.

This objection being out of the way, I proceed to examine the point whether Captain Allyn had authority to draw the bills in question. It has not been contended that the character of master of the ship would confer upon him such authority for the purpose for which the bills were drawn. It must, therefore, arise entirely from his letter of instructions, if it existed at all. And the opinion I entertained upon the trial, that no such authority is to be found in his instructions, is strengthened and confirmed, by farther reflection and a more attentive examination of the question. He was a special agent, and bound to pursue strictly the orders of his principal, where no latitude of discretion was left to him. We must, therefore, look to these instructions only to ascertain his authority on this subject. From their general scope and object it is fairly to be inferred that the defendant intended to provide funds to purchase a full return cargo for his ship. But he chose to point out the way in which these funds were to be procured, and his agent had no authority to depart from his instructions. Captain Allyn, on the outward voyage from New York, went consigned to Parish, Agie & Co. of Antwerp, and was to receive their instructions as to its farther prosecution; and in case it should be round the Cape of Good Hope, they were to furnish him with fifty-five or sixty thousand Spanish dollars, and an effective letter of credit to enable him to pass bills from the port of lading of the return cargo on Holland and London to the amount of five thousand pounds sterling. Parish, Agie & Co. on the arrival of the ship at Antwerp, determined to send her round the Cape, and accordingly furnished Captain Allyn with fifty-five thousand Spanish dollars, and procured for him a letter of credit from Thomas Wilson & Co. of London, for five thousand pounds sterling. The defendant, however, to guard against a deficiency of funds, adds, in his instructions, the following clause: "Wherever you load, I wish it eventually to be a full cargo, and if the specie and credit you carry should fall short, you can take on freight, or extend your drawing; and, if needful, give security by bill of lading on so much of the shipment as your extra credit pays for." The captain, at Batavia, where he purchased a return cargo of coffee and sugar, finding the funds with which he had been provided insufficient to purchase a full cargo, drew the bills in question on Parish, Agie & Co. And whether he had authority so to do, depends on the clause in his instructions above cited.

When these instructions were made out, it was unknown to the defendant on whom the captain would have authority to draw for the five thousand pounds expressly provided for. That was to be left to Parish, Agie & Co. who procured the engagement of Thomas Wilson & Co. of London, to accept Captain Allyn's draft for that amount. And the contingent provision for further drafts in case of necessity, has reference to the first drawing. This is not only the literal interpretation of the language made use of, but the fair construction of what was the understanding and intention of the defendant. The word "extend" is relative in its application, and refers to something already begun, and implies a continuation of the same act. A power to extend or continue an act or piece of business, cannot authorize a totally distinct transaction. Can an authority to draw on A for a certain sum, with a contingent power to extend such drawing, by any possibility confer the right of drawing on B for such further sum? Suppose the letter of instructions had expressly directed the draft for the five thousand pounds sterling to be made on Thomas Wilson & Co. of London: Can there be a doubt, but that the authority to extend the drawing would be limited to drafts on the same house? And if so, what difference can it make whether the house of Thomas Wilson & Co. was designated by the defendant himself, or by Parish, Agie & Co. by his authority? As soon as this designation was made known to Captain Allyn, it was precisely the same as if inserted in his original instructions; and his extended drawing was therefore restricted to the house of Thomas Wilson & Co. I can discover no more authority from the letter of instructions to draw on Parish, Agie & Co. of Antwerp, than on any other house in Holland or London. Captain Allyn no doubt acted in good faith, and supposed his drafts on Parish, Agie & Co. would be accepted, as the return cargo was to be consigned to that house. But it will be recollected that this house furnished the funds to purchase the return cargo; and the case discloses no evidence of the state of accounts between the defendant and Parish, Agie & Co. or the indemnity which the latter had for such large advances. And besides, they could not with propriety have accepted these bills, with a view of looking over to the defendant for reimbursement; for there can be no doubt that Captain Allyn's instructions were made known to them, not only because he was directed by the defendant to communicate his orders to that house, but the agency they were to have in projecting the voyage, made such a communication necessary and proper. This house then knowing the authority given to Captain Allyn to extend his drawing, and knowing that the first draft for the five thousand pounds was to be upon Thomas Wilson & Co. must have known that Captain Allyn had no authority to draw on them; and, of course, that Dickey could not be made responsible for such drafts. Nor could they have reasonably calculated upon indemnity from that part of the cargo purchased with these bills; for, although by the defendant's instructions the return cargo purchased with the funds taken out by Captain Allyn, was to come consigned to them, yet they knew from his instructions that he had authority to give security by bill of lading, on so much of the cargo as was paid for, by the extra credit. Nor could Clement have had any just grounds to suppose these bills would have been accepted. He was fully apprised of Captain Allyn's instructions, and was bound to know their legal import, and of course on whom he had authority to draw; and the precaution he observed, by taking security on the cargo, shows that he did not place implicit reliance on the bills themselves.

The right of the plaintiffs, therefore, to recover upon these drafts, as bills of exchange, cannot, I think, be sustained. And this is conformable to the real justice of the case, as it will put at rest all claim for damages, by reason of the bills having been protested, which I should consider at least a hard case, if under any circumstances I felt myself bound to allow it. But although the action cannot be sustained upon the bills of exchange, yet I think the defendant is answerable, as for goods sold and delivered, for the whole of the cargo purchased by Captain Allyn of the plaintiff's testator. Believing, as I think I am fully warranted in doing, that Captain Allyn acted in good faith, and with a view to promote the interest of his principal, his instructions ought to receive a liberal construction, where there is any latitude of discretion given. In a voyage so distant as the one in question, it is impossible to foresee and provide for every event, and some discretion must almost necessarily be left to the agent who is to have the management. In the present case we find in Captain Allyn's instructions these clauses: "After leaving Antwerp, the care and management of the voyage will be reposed in you."—"Wherever you load, I wish it eventually to be a full cargo, and if the specie and credit you carry should fall short, you can take on freight, or extend your drawing, and, if needful, give security by bill of lading on so much of the shipment as your extra credit pays for." It is evident from these parts of the instructions, it was the wish and intention of the defendant that at all events the ship should return with a full cargo. And Captain Allyn had authority to purchase it, and give the security he did by bill of lading. An account must therefore be stated between the parties, as for goods sold and delivered by the plaintiff's testator to defendant, to the full amount of the cargo; crediting the defendant with the moneys paid at Batavia, and the proceeds of seven hundred piculs of coffee, deducting therefrom the sum paid for insurance, and rejecting all the other charges in the account of Samuel Williams.

Upon the trial I thought the insurance ought not to be allowed; but, upon further reflection, I am inclined to allow it. Captain Allyn, by his instructions, was authorized to give security on the shipment paid for by his extra credit; and to make this security effectual and safe, insurance was necessary. It was actually paid on account of the plaintiff's testator. And the case fully warrants the conclusion, that no insurance was effected by the defendant that would have covered this part of the cargo. The purchase of the cargo was entire, and laying the bills out of the question, as I have done, there is no rule or principle by which a distinction can be made as to price between that part paid for at Batavia and the other part of the cargo. The sale was undoubtedly a very advantageous one for Captain Clement. Captain Allyn was averse to taking any more than he could pay for with the funds he had, but Captain Clement insisted on his taking the whole. The bills being out of the question, we must look to what Captain Allyn did, which was authorized by his instructions. He gave security on a part of the cargo, as he had a right to do, by assigning to the order of Captain Clement seven hundred piculs of coffee, which went free of freight, and out of the proceeds of this coffee he had a right to pay himself for the balance; as this coffee was not charged with freight or insurance, there was every reason to conclude it would be amply sufficient to pay the balance due Captain Clement.

Under these circumstances, I think it would not be just to charge the defendant with interest before the arrival of the vessel at Antwerp. The account must therefore be made up as upon an entire purchase, crediting what was paid at Batavia; the balance payable out of the proceeds of the seven hundred piculs of coffee, which came consigned to Clement's order. That not being sufficient, interest must be allowed on such balance from the time it was ascertained at 5 per cent.; balance payable in London, as the whole transaction, as appears evidently to have been the understanding, was to be wound up there.

The account must be stated on the principles above laid down, and judgment entered for the balance.

CLEMENTS (MUDD v.). See Case No. 9,900.

CLEMENTS (ODORLESS EXCAVATING CO. v.). See Case No. 10,437.

CLEMENTS (UNITED STATES v.). See Cases Nos. 14,816 and 14,817.

Case No. 2,884.

CLEMENTSON v. BEATTY.

[1 Cranch, C. C. 178.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. July Term, 1804.

PLEA IN ABATEMENT.

If the contract was with the defendant and another as joint partners, the defendant cannot take advantage of it but by plea in abatement.

At law. Assumpsit [against F. Beatty, Jr.] for goods sold and delivered.

Mr. Mason objected that the goods were delivered to Fisher & Beatty jointly as partners.

Mr. Swann contended that he could not take advantage of this on the general issue, and cited the case of Rice v. Shute [unreported].

CRANCH, Circuit Judge, stated that he considered the principle to be laid down generally, that where a partnership was alleged by the defendant, he must plead it in abatement, and name all the partners.

Mr. Mason abandoned the point.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

Case No. 2,885.

CLEMENTSON v. WILLIAMS.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. June, 1812.

[Cited in Waller v. Stewart, Case No. 17,109. Nowhere reported; opinion not now accessible. See Clementson v. Williams (possibly same case on appeal), 8 Cranch (12 U. S.) 72.]

CLEMSON (DAVIS v.). See Case No. 3,630.

Case No. 2,886.

The CLEOPATRA.

[5 Ben. 290;[1] 14 Int. Rev. Rec. 29.]

District Court, E. D. New York. July, 1871.

SMUGGLING—FORFEITURE — EVIDENCE OF INFORMERS.

Seamen engaged on board a steamship were arrested while engaged in smuggling segars, which they had brought into the port on board of her. The seamen were promised immunity, and an information having been filed against the steamship to forfeit her under the 50th section of the statute of March 2, 1799 (1 Stat. 665), the evidence of the seamen was relied on to secure the forfeiture. It appeared that neither the owners, nor the master, nor any officer of the ship, was engaged in or knew of the smuggling, but all had been solicitous to prevent smuggling. Held, that the evidence of the men was sufficient to sustain the action, and the decree required by the statute must follow, but that the course pursued in the matter by the government officials was open to severe criticism. The district attorney was therefore recommended to present the facts to the attorney general, before the signature of the decree.

In admiralty.

J. J. Allen, Asst. Dist. Atty., for the United States.

Sherwood & Howland, for claimants.

BENEDICT, District Judge. The charge against this steamer is, that segars, subject to duty, were imported in her, and landed from her in the night, and without a permit, in violation of the 50th section of the statute of March 2d, 1799, according to which a forfeiture of the vessel follows such acts. The proof of the charge consists of the evidence of hands employed on the steamship, who were arrested for smuggling certain segars, which were found in their possession and seized. Although the evidence is open to some suspicion, still I am bound to declare it sufficient to maintain the action. The commission of the offence is sworn to positively by the offenders. The segars said to have been landed from the steamer were actually found, and no evidence is produced to disprove the statements of these witnesses. The value of the segars landed is proved to have exceeded $400, and consequently I am bound to render the decree, which the law declares shall follow when such proof is made. In performing this duty, I must say that, if I had any discretion in the premises, I should certainly abstain from any action in the proceeding. Provisions of law which render ships liable to forfeiture for smuggling, conducted by their means, though without the action or connivance of the owners or officers of the vessels, seem to be necessary. Such laws are undoubtedly severe, but they are accompanied with the power of remission which is conferred upon the secretary of the treasury, and, if judiciously administered, they tend to reduce the amount of smuggling.

[1] [Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

The temptation to smuggle is great, and the temptation to wink at it is also great; but by laws which imperil the ships themselves, which are the vehicles ordinarily made use of to accomplish the crime, masters and owners are impelled to exert themselves in detecting the smugglers, and bringing them to justice. The object of the law is manifestly to insure the detection and punishment of actual offenders and their aids; but here it has been used to secure immunity for the offenders, and, by forfeiting the ship, to punish only the innocent. According to the evidence, neither the owners nor officers of this steamer knew anything about the criminal acts which their employees were perpetrating. The officers of the customs prove that the owners have been solicitous to prevent smuggling in the vessel. Their acts prove their solicitude to be real, and yet their steamer is forfeited, while the offenders go free. At least two of the men engaged and interested in the act of smuggling were arrested in New York City. They confessed their guilt to the persons arresting them, and were then promised immunity. The information thus acquired is not used to convict any person engaged in the adventure. The boatman who transported the segars in his boat does not appear to have been arrested, and, in fact, one of the offenders was at once taken into the employment and pay of the United States. But the steamer is seized, and sent here for prosecution, where the testimony of the smugglers is relied on to condemn her, and this without any pretence of any criminality or even neglect on the part of her owners or officers. The effect of such a prosecution is to say to seamen, stewards, firemen, and others on steamers, "If you smuggle, and are caught, you will not be prosecuted; the steamer only will be seized." I cannot believe that such a result should be permitted.

But the responsibility of instituting and suspending prosecutions does not rest upon the court. The simple duty of the judge is to pronounce the decision which the law and the evidence produced by the parties requires; and upon those who are charged with directing the legal proceedings of the government must rest the responsibility which attaches to this mode of administering the law. I recommend, however, to the district attorney, that before I am asked to sign a decree in accordance with this opinion, the facts attending the case be communicated to the attorney general for his information.

CLEOPATRA, The (UNITED STATES v.). See Case No. 2,886.

CLERK'S FEES, Case of. See Case No. 472.

CLERK'S FEES IN BANKRUPTCY CASES. See Append. Fed. Cas.

CLEVELAND, The (HUNT v.). See Case No. 6,885.

CLEVELAND (BHOLEN v.). See Case No. 1,381.

CLEVELAND (DRAKE v.). See Case No. 4,059.

Case No. 2,887.

CLEVELAND v. LA CROSSE & M. R. CO. et al.

[7 Am. Law Reg. 536; 4 Quart. Law J. 230.]
District Court, D. Wisconsin. 1859.

VALIDITY OF CONVEYANCES BY CORPORATION—RIGHTS OF CREDITORS.

1. A deed of land by the corporation to two of its directors is void as against creditors of the corporation.

2. A lease of a railroad and rolling stock, with the power in the lessee to run the road and to purchase additional rolling stock at his discretion, and to extend the road out of the proceeds of revenue, the lease being for an indefinite term of time, is void as against creditors of an insolvent company, for hindering or delaying them in the collection of their debts.

[In equity. Bill by Newcomb Cleveland against the La Crosse & Milwaukee Railroad Company, Selah Chamberlain, Moses Kneeland, and others, to subject certain real estate conveyed by the corporation to judgment and execution, and for a conveyance by the defendants Kneeland and Ludington to the purchaser on the executor's sale.]

MILLER, District Judge. The complainant recovered a judgment in this court for $112,271 against this company, on the 7th October, 1857. On the 22d of the same month he issued a writ of fi. fa. on the judgment; under which was levied the railroad of the company, and all the franchises, rights and privileges thereunto belonging and appertaining, including roads, roadways, rights of way, and real estate of every description, station houses, buildings, and the grounds and lots, cars, locomotive engines, etc. And also the Milwaukee and Watertown Division. And also several lots in the city of Milwaukee, describing them. The company, having the lots for sale, accepted a proposition of purchase from C. D. Nash, a person not connected with the company; and for the consideration of twenty-five thousand dollars, part in farm mortgage bonds and part in stock of the company, the lots were conveyed to him. This sale was brought about, and the consideration was furnished by Moses Kneeland, a member of the board of directors; who afterwards received the title from Nash, and conveyed an undivided interest to James Ludington, another member of the board. There was a large amount of testimony respecting the value of the lots; some witnesses valuing them about the amount of the consideration of the conveyance, some less than that amount, and some very much higher. There was proof of large expenditures by Kneeland and Ludington in dredging the river, building docks, and in other permanent improvements. At the time of this sale the complainant was a creditor of the company, as a contractor for building a portion of the road. The bill prays a decree that the lots be subject to the judgment and execution, and to a sale in satisfaction of the judgment, and that Kneeland and Ludington shall convey them to the purchaser under the execution.

Directors of an incorporated company are trustees of the corporators; and have possession of the corporate property for the corporators, and the creditors of the company. All property of a corporation not sold in good faith, is liable to its creditors for the payment of its debts. 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1252; Curren v. State Bank of Arkansas, 15 How. [56 U. S.] 304; Mumma v. Potomac Co., 8 Pet. [33 U. S.] 281–286. It is well settled that trustees cannot purchase the trust estate. They are the vendors dealing for the interest of the corporation in making sale; the representatives of the company. Such persons cannot be permitted to purchase, where they have a duty to perform inconsistent with the character of purchasers. Deeds made between persons who are not standing in the relation of vendors and purchasers, whether directly or indirectly, are voidable, even upon a fair consideration paid. Michaud v. Girod, 4 How. [45 U. S.] 503; Hawley v. Cramer, 4 Cow. 717; Torrey v. Bank of Orleans, 9 Paige, 649; 7 Hill, 260; Grant, Corp. 159, and notes. And the use of a go-between is an evidence of fraud. Such deeds convey a title good against all persons but the cestui que trust, and as to him they are void; but he may confirm them by receipt of the purchase money, or by release, with full knowledge of the facts. The company made no objection to the sale after it became known that the purchase was made for Kneeland and Ludington; but by a resolution, the board confirmed those deeds, since this bill was filed. The question is, whether this plaintiff, as a creditor of the company, can by this bill and proceeding, obtain a decree affecting these deeds. If those deeds had not been made, it is clear that the lots would be subject to levy and sale as the property of the company, under the plaintiff's execution. And if the lots are now in equity the property of the company, they are subject to sale in satisfaction of the judgment, according to the law of the state. The company might have obtained a decree vacating those deeds, and then have turned out the lots, discharged of the apparent clouds upon the title, for sale under this execution. This the company should have done, after it became known that two of the directors were the purchasers.

A creditor of an insolvent corporation cannot sustain a suit at law against the directors thereof for negligence in the management of its affairs, whereby its property has been wasted, and its means of paying the plaintiff destroyed. Clark v. Lawrence [Case No. 2,827]. But a stockholder in a corporation has a remedy in chancery against the directors to prevent a misapplication of their capital or profits, which might lessen the value of the shares if the act intended to be done amount to a breach of trust or duty. Dodge v. Woolsy, 18 How. [59 U. S.] 331. Then why should not this judgment creditor sustain this bill against the company and directors of the company, to have applied to his debt property which was conveyed by the company to those directors by either voidable or fraudulent deeds, after the company has refused to discharge its duty as an honest debtor? It is a grave question whether these deeds should not, under the circumstances, be considered voluntary conveyances in fraud of creditors. It is said, in the opinion in the case of Curren v. State of Arkansas, 15 How. [56 U. S.] on page 307: "The plaintiff is a creditor of an insolvent banking corporation. The assets of such a corporation are a fund for the payment of its debts. If they have been distributed among stockholders, or gone into the hands of others than bona fide creditors or purchasers, leaving debts of the corporation unpaid, such holders take the property charged with the trust in favor of creditors, which a court of equity will enforce and compel the application of the property to the satisfaction of their debts." In that case the state of Arkansas, as a stockholder, by acts of the legislature, invested itself with assets of the corporation. See 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1252; Mumma v. Potomac Co., 8 Pet. [33 U. S.] 281; Wood v. Dummer [Case No. 17,944]; Wright v. Petrie, 1 Smedes & M. Ch. 319; Nevitt v. Bank of Port Gibson, 6 Smedes & M. 513; Hightower v. Thornton, 8 Ga. 493; Nathan v. Whitlock, 3 Edw. Ch. 215, 9 Paige, 152; Vose v. Grant, 15 Mass. 505; Spear v. Grant, 16 Mass. 9; Curson v. African Co., 1 Vern. 121. But if there should be any doubt of the right of the plaintiff to bring this bill, the law of the state entirely removes it. The statute provides, that the circuit courts of the state shall have jurisdiction over directors, managers, trustees, and other officers of corporations, to compel them to account for their official conduct in the management and disposition of the funds and property committed to their charge; to order and compel payment by them to the corporation whom they represent, and to its creditors, of all sums of money, and of the value of all property which they may have acquired to themselves; to set aside all alienations of property made by trustees or other officers of the corporation, contrary to the provisions of law, in cases where the persons receiving such alienations knew the purposes for which the same were made. And the jurisdiction thus conferred may be exercised as in ordinary cases on complaint or petition of a creditor of the corporation. The statute is sufficiently comprehensive to cover the case made by this bill. It is contended on behalf of the defendants, that that law cannot be enforced by this court; but in this I think the counsel are mistaken. The statute laws of the state do not confer jurisdiction on the federal courts, but those courts extend to their suitors the remedies provided by those laws of the states wherein they are located, according to their own rules of practice. Ex parte Biddle [Case No. 1,391].

It is contended on behalf of the defendants, that if the lots should be adjudged bound by plaintiff's judgment and execution; the consideration of the purchase, and their disbursements for taxes and improvements should be recognized as a paramount lien in equity. With the consideration paid this plaintiff has nothing to do. He is not such a cestui que trust as an heir, legatee or ward who has received a part of the consideration to be accounted for, as in the case of Michaud v. Girod, 4 How. [45 U. S.] 503. What they or the company did with the consideration is not a matter for inquiry. The consideration was of rather an unusual nature, to pass between a corporation and its directors. The company and these directors will have to settle the matter between themselves. If the consideration had been paid in cash, and proven to have been appropriated to the payment of legitimate debts of the company, it might possibly be considered a paramount lien; but I do not consider that these defendants have any such claim. It is the duty of the court to place these parties, as nearly as may be, in such position that, by doing justice to one, injustice may not be done the other. For this reason the court will order a reference to a master, to ascertain the annual rents and income of the property, with interest; and also to ascertain the amounts paid by these defendants for taxes, and for the extinguishment of liens and the actual cost of permanent improvements made by them, with interest. The master may take additional testimony to that on file, and he may examine these defendants on oath touching the matter submitted to him. Upon the confirmation of the report, a decree will be made, so that the proceeds of the sale of the lots may be equitably appropriated to these parties.

This is technically a bill in aid of an execution levied; but under the prayer for general relief, the court may decree the deeds to be void, and may appoint a receiver to make sale of the property. The lien of the judgment was sufficient for this purpose, without the service of an execution. 1 Paige, 305; 4 Johns. Ch. 677; Clarkson v. De Peyster, 3 Paige, 320; Chautauqua Co. Bank v. White, 2 Seld. [6 N. Y.] 236. The company and Chamberlain made a contract on the 20th Nov., 1856, for ballasting a portion of the road from Beaver Dam to Portage City, at forty cents per yard, the company to find the motive power. On the 20th January, 1857, they made another contract for the construction of the roadbed on the western division, extending from Portage City to La Crosse, about one hundred and ten miles of main line and side track, at $12,000 per mile; extra work specified to be paid in addition and ten per cent. to be retained from estimates; to be paid on the completion of each thirty-four miles. It was also agreed that at any time during the progress of the work, the company shall have the right to suspend the performance of the work, as it may deem expedient, and again to require it to be resumed, without being held liable for damages for such suspension; provided, that at least thirty days' notice of such suspension to be given, and a reasonable extension of time for the completion of the whole work, be allowed. And on the same day the parties made a further agreement, whereby the company extended the time for completing the work contracted for, and released Chamberlain of any claim of damages for not completing the work at the times specified. On the 30th of April, 1857, the company and Chamberlain entered into a contract for tunneling the dividing ridge, instead of a through cut, at prices largely exceeding the price specified in the original contract. On the 20th of September, 1857, the company and Chamberlain made two agreements in writing, under seal. In one, the parties agree that the contract for the construction of the western division, from Portage City to La Crosse, of January 20th, 1857, and the supplemental contract of April 30th, 1857, be so modified, that Chamberlain shall proceed to complete the construction of the road as far as the depot at New Lisbon, with reasonable dispatch, and by the first of December following. The time for completing the road from New Lisbon to La Crosse is extended indefinitely, and the road to be constructed between these last points as fast, and no faster, than the company shall be prepared and ready to pay in cash, on monthly estimates. The contract of November 20th, 1856, is also modified. And "in consideration of the extension of the time of constructing the road from New Lisbon to La Crosse; and the damages which Chamberlain will sustain by reason of such extension; and by loss on teams, materials, tools, machinery, and in other ways; and also in consideration of the mode of payment of the amount now due and the amount to become due to him for finishing the road to New Lisbon; and in consideration of the failures and delays of the company in making payment theretofore due; and in the further consideration of the services, risks, and personal expenses of Chamberlain in the operation and management of the road, according to a contract and lease; the company agrees to pay him two hundred thousand dollars!" It is further agreed: "That before the 20th October following, a full and correct statement shall be made of the amount due to Chamberlain on the date of the agreement under the previous contract, which, together with the said sum of $200,000, shall be the balance due him on the 1st day of October, 1857, from the company. And on the first day of every month thereafter, Chamberlain shall charge the company with the amount that shall be due under or by virtue of the said contracts, or this contract, for constructing the road between Portage City and New Lisbon; and he shall credit the company with such sums as he shall receive from the net earnings of the road, by virtue of the contract of lease of this date. And on the first days of July and January in each year thereafter, a semi-annual statement of the accounts between the parties shall be made out, in which interest shall be added to the day of making such statement, at the rate of twelve per cent. per annum. Whatever sums of money shall hereafter become due Chamberlain for work in the construction of the road between New Lisbon and La Crosse, shall be paid by the company from means derived from other sources than the income of the railroad." By the other contract of the same date, the company "in consideration of the undertakings and agreements of Chamberlain, sells and conveys to him all its personal property of every name, kind and description, in the state of Wisconsin (except all such as is used on, and is appurtenant to the operation of the Watertown Division of the La Crosse and Milwaukee Railroad), of which an inventory shall be taken and attached so soon as the same can be conveniently done." "And the company, in consideration of the said undertakings and agreements of Chamberlain, leases and lets to him from and after the thirtieth day of September, 1857, for an indefinite term of time, to be determined in the manner specified, its entire railroad and railroad route from the city of Milwaukee, by way of Horicon and Portage City, to the city of La Crosse, together with its right of way, depot grounds, and all buildings, tenements and fixtures of whatever kind or description, connected therewith, or appurtenant thereto, together with all estate, rights, privileges, appurtenances and franchises connected therewith, or belonging or incident thereto, subject only to such prior or superior liens, as may or do exist thereon. Chamberlain shall operate so much of the road as is ready for operation, and from time to time such portions as shall be made ready for operation, in such manner as will produce the largest amount of net receipts. He shall keep the road and rolling stock in good thorough repair; and he shall receive and appropriate all the receipts or income derived from the operations of the road. If it shall be found for the interest of the company, he may purchase additional rolling stock, and appropriate the receipts of the road for its payment." It is then agreed that monthly accounts shall be rendered by Chamberlain, and that the officers of the company shall at any time have the right to examine his accounts. Then follows a statement of coupons of prior mortgages on the road, that are to be the first paid out of the net receipts of the road, and of the amount to be appropriated to the sinking fund; and the residue of the net receipts shall be applied by Chamberlain in payment of the amount due, or hereafter to become due to him, by virtue of the contracts, as specified in the agreement of this date, and also of this said agreement. And Chamberlain agrees that whenever he shall have received from the earnings of the road such sum as by the terms and conditions of the several contracts, (describing them,) he is, or shall be entitled to receive; or whenever the company shall pay him any balance he shall be entitled to, that he will surrender up to the company the quiet and peaceable possession of the whole premises in good repair, and all rolling stock and other personal property put on said road by him, and all personal property that shall not be worn out; and then the contract shall cease and determine. The bill prays that these contracts may be annulled as fraudulent; and that Chamberlain may be enjoined from further controlling or running the road, and for general relief.

The answer of the company alleges that the contracts or agreements were made with the sole view and design, on its part of vesting in Chamberlain the right of possession, enjoyment and use of all and singular the property, rights, privileges, franchises and emoluments therein mentioned, upon the terms therein expressed, for the purpose of securing the payment to Chamberlain of the several debts due and owing him by the company, and as a security and as a means of payment of a large sum of indebtedness then due and owing him. And it denies that the contract was made with a fraudulent intent. The answer of Chamberlain is very nearly a duplicate of that of the company, in this respect.

On the 2d day of October, 1857, and during the trial of the plaintiff's suit at law against this company, the company confessed a judgment to Chamberlain, in this court, for six hundred and twenty-nine thousand and eighty-nine dollars. It is alleged in the bill, that the company did not then owe him exceeding fifty thousand dollars; and that the judgment was confessed to hinder or delay creditors, and is fraudulent. The bill prays that the judgment be vacated.

Mr. Kilbourn, the president of the company, testified that he was present, and acted in the board when the judgment was confessed, and when the lease was given. Chamberlain was anxious for security for his debts; he thought he was incurring too large responsibilities on uncertainties. The company gave him assurances of security, as the great point with the company was the completion of the road. As September and October approached, the company was getting deeper into embarrassments. An association of bondholders was threatening the company, and he saw but one way to save the road and secure its ultimate completion, which was to make the lease to Chamberlain. The board came to the same conclusion; and the lease was made. The only remaining hope for the continuance of the work on the road, seemed to be, to give Chamberlain such a lien on it as would assure the payment of what had already become due for the work then done, as well as for that to be done under the contract. This was the great and paramount danger which threatened to overwhelm the company; but there were other and nearer dangers threatening the company more immediately, against which it was equally necessary to guard. One or two attachments had been issued against the company, for a few hundred dollars, and it seemed quite evident that by such means the company's resources would soon be so exhausted as to render it entirely powerless for further progress. The floating debt of the company then amounted to $300,000 in small sums, which, if sued under the panic, would have effectually arrested the progress of the work, and prevented the completion of the road. At the time of giving the lease, the amount of indebtedness to Chamberlain was not known. It was the intention of the company to give him a perfect lien on the road and its earnings; to secure all indebtedness accrued and accruing under his contracts, until the whole amount should be paid; and such was one of the conditions of the lease, without reference to the specific amount. The amount of indebtedness at that time, or any other time, was not a necessary element of the lease. The reason why the judgment was ordered by the board, he understood to be, in consequence of a doubt entertained by the counsel of Chamberlain, whether more legal difficulties might not be raised, as to his lease lien covering the iron not laid down on the road; and to avoid all questions in that respect, and in part to render the transaction so regarded a lien, as perfect as possible; and to accomplish the ends proposed to be secured by it, it was deemed advisable by the board, under advice of counsel, to give the force of a judgment in support of the previous lien, for the amounts then reported to be due by the chief engineer, whose statement was considered conclusive by the company. Cleveland's suit was then pending. It was rather a hurrying time with the company. Other matters were pressing. Chamberlain first suggested the judgment. It had particular reference to the iron which Vose, Livingston & Co. were endeavoring to reclaim. He wanted, first, to secure the completion of the road; second, to secure the Wisconsin stockholders. In order to secure these objects, he deemed it necessary to give the lease and judgment before Cleveland got his judgment; and he explained his views to the board. The iron was to be devoted to the use of the road, and Chamberlain was to have the use of the road to secure him. The agreement was understood to be, that the iron was to be laid on the road. So far as anything was said by Chamberlain, it was evident that his motive was to secure payment of the debts due and accruing to him from the company. The judgment was for a specific amount then due, as reported by the chief engineer. The leading object of the directors was the completion of the road. The judgment was not in derogation of the lease, but to carry out its objects. There was no understanding, when Chamberlain proposed that the judgment should be given, that it should be used in any way inconsistent with the completion of the road. Probably Chamberlain's object in proposing the judgment was not only to protect himself against Vose, Livingston & Co., but also against Cleveland's claim. In our conversation with Chamberlain the principal matter talked of was his security. It was understood that he should go on with the work. The allowance of $200,000 to Chamberlain was not included in the judgment.

A great amount of testimony was submitted on this subject, and on the amount of indebtedness of the company to Chamberlain, which is not necessary to be here stated. The company is authorized by its charter "to make such covenants, contracts and agreements, as the execution and management of the work, and the convenience and interests of the company may require." And it is "empowered to borrow money at any rate of interest, and to make all necessary writings, notes, bonds, mortgages, or other papers and securities, in amount and kind as may be deemed expedient, or in discharge of any liabilities that it may incur in the construction, repair, equipment or running of said road." The lease to Chamberlain was intended as a security, in the kind or nature deemed expedient for liabilities incurred, and to be incurred, in the construction, repair, equipment and running of the road. The company, by virtue of the general powers vested in it as a corporation, has all the powers contained in this provision of the charter. It does not materially enlarge the general power of the grant to contract and be contracted with. It was not intended to embrace a contract for a transfer, or lease of all the franchises of the company for an unlimited term. The powers and privileges granted to the company are in many respects unusual and extraordinary; but unless so expressed, public policy and the rights of creditors should exclude any such construction of the charter as to sanction this lease.

The law of the state empowers railroad companies to borrow money and to execute trust deeds, or mortgages, or both, on railroads constructed, or in process of construction, for the sums borrowed or owing, upon such terms and in such manner as the company shall deem expedient; and the company may make such provisions in the trust deed or mortgage for pledging or transferring their railroad track, right of way, depot grounds, rights, privileges, immunities, machine house, rolling stock, furniture, tools, implements, appendages, and appurtenances belonging to or used in connection with such railroad, in any manner whatever, as security for any bonds, debts or sums of money that may be secured by such trust deed or mortgage. And in case of the sale on such mortgages or trust deeds, the purchasers shall acquire and shall exercise and enjoy all and the same rights, privileges, grants, franchises, immunities and advantages in the mortgage, or trust deed enumerated and conveyed, as fully as the corporation, shareholders, officers and agents of the company might or could have done. And the purchasers may proceed to organize anew and elect directors, distribute and dispose of stock, take the same or another name, and may conduct their business generally under and in the manner provided in the charter, with such variations in manner and form of organization as their altered circumstances and better organization may seem to require; but not greater or enlarged powers shall be exercised by the new organization. These laws establish the policy of the state in regard to the power of railroad companies to mortgage their roads; and they relieve the court of all embarrassment on that subject. By the laws of this state, railroad companies and individuals are placed on an equality in respect to their mortgages.

The two agreements of the 26th September, 1857, must be considered as one. They are so intimately connected, that they might have been embraced in one agreement.

It is contended that the defeasance gives the agreement the character of a mortgage; but without it the company would have the equitable right to regain possession by discharging its liabilities to Chamberlain. Nugent v. Riley, 1 Metc. [Mass.] 117; Erskine v. Townsend, 2 Mass. 493; Hughes v. Edwards, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 489; 1 White & T. Lead. Cas. 510; Hil. Mortg. 22; Conway v. Alexander, 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 218; Morris v. Nixon, 1 How. [42 U. S.] 118; Russell v. Southerd, 12 How. [53 U. S.] 139; Sprigg v. Bank, 14 Pet. [39 U. S.] 201; Conard v. Atlantic Ins. Co., 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 386; Redf. R. R. 584, 585, and cases cited.

A court of equity will look to the substantial object of the conveyance, and will consider an absolute deed a mortgage whenever it is shown to have been intended merely as a security for the payment of a debt; and the grantee may maintain a bill to foreclose the equity of the grantor. But Chamberlain could not proceed in equity to foreclose on this agreement, if he had not been placed in possession. I apprehend his remedy would then have been at law upon the contract. It was not given nor received as a security for money borrowed; but as a security for a debt accruing and to accrue, with a transfer of possession of the premises. If possession had not been delivered to Chamberlain, I know of no means he had for enforcing a foreclosure, or acquiring possession. But being placed in possession he may be proceeded against by a bill at the suit of the company to redeem, and for an account. Technically this agreement is not a mortgage. It is an assignment to a preferred creditor, with a lease for the mutual interest of the parties. If this were a mere assignment of a part of the property of the company, it might, if bona fide, be adjudged as a mortgage of the property transferred, so that the residuary interest of the grantor may be reached by execution, or by a bill in equity, as in Leitch v. Hollister, 4 Comst. [N. Y.] 211. A debtor has a right to prefer one creditor to another in payment; and his private motives for giving the preference cannot affect the exercise of the right, if the preferred creditor has done nothing improper to procure it; but any unlawful consideration moving from the preferred creditor, to induce the preference, will avoid the deed which gives it. Marbery v. Brooks, 7 Wheat. [20 U. S.] 556. And it is no object to such an assignment that it defeats other creditors of their legal remedies. Brooks v. Marbery, 11 Wheat. [24 U. S.] 223. A debtor may lawfully apply his property to the payment of the debts of such creditors as he may choose to prefer; and he may select the time for doing it, so as to make it effectual. Such preference must necessarily operate to the prejudice of creditors not provided for, and cannot furnish any evidence of fraudulent intention. And such assignments may be made direct to the creditor. Tompkins v. Hughes, 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 106. It is not a legal objection to this agreement as an assignment, that it was made during the trial of the plaintiff's cause against the company, and before judgment was rendered. So long as a person or corporation is the owner of property unincumbered, an assignment may be made for the payment of debts, giving preferences where there is no statute law prohibiting it, as in this state. But where fraud is alleged, the time, the occasion, and the inducement for making the assignment are proper subjects for consideration.

Under the pecuniary embarrassments of the company, the assignment was made to Chamberlain, as a security for a debt partly accrued and partly to accrue, in building the road to New Lisbon. The whole road from Milwaukee to La Crosse is embraced in the lease, while a great portion of it was not then completed. There is no doubt, from the testimony of the witness, and from the face of the agreement, that the intent of the parties was to prevent the creditors of the company from further interfering with, or interrupting its operations. Chamberlain obtained a preference over other creditors, for a debt then existing; and he acquired possession of the whole property of the company, with which to carry on the business of the company. And while increasing the amount of his debt against the company, he enjoys the exclusive possession and control of its property for an indefinite period of time; subject to the duty of rendering an account semi-annually, showing his balance against the company, on which he draws interest at the rate of twelve per cent. per annum. In operating the road and in supplying rolling stock; at his discretion, he is substituted for the directory of the company. For an indefinite period of time he is the company for all practical purposes.

Assignments of insolvent debtors, giving unlimited discretion to the assignee, cannot be sustained against creditors. Assignments must be absolute and specific in their directions and not coupled with trusts not authorized by law. 7 Paige, 568; Boardman v. Halliday, 10 Paige, 223. Nor can such an assignment be used as a device to continue the business of the assignor uninterrupted by his creditors. Owen v. Body, 5 Adol. & E. 28; American Exch. Bank v. Inloes, 7 Md. 380. And a debtor cannot make a reservation at the expense of his creditors, of any part of his income or property, for his own benefit; nor can he stipulate for any advantage to himself. Green v. Trieber, 3 Md. 11. Assignment must be made in good faith, for the purpose of paying debts, and without any intent to lock up the property from other creditors for the use of the debtor. A conveyance of the owner in trust for himself, is in effect a conveyance to himself; and the grantor in such deed can have but one motive, and that must be to hinder or delay the claims of creditors. The law does not tolerate any hinderance in assignments for the benefit of creditors, beyond what may be necessary for the purpose of the assignment. And any stipulation in a deed, which materially hinders or delays the rights of creditors, renders it void. A deed of assignment authorizing the assignee to sell the assigned property on credit, is void as to creditors, on account of the delay. Barney v. Griffin, 2 Comst. [N. Y.] 365. A transfer of property, which creates a trust, whether secret or avowed, in favor of the grantor, renders the transaction fraudulent and void in legal contemplation, even though there may be mingled with it provisions in favor of preferred creditors. Shaffer v. Watkins, 7 Watts & S. 219. In the case under consideration the time for executing the assignment is unlimited; to be terminated only by the payment of the assignee's accrued and accruing debt by the insolvent company, or out of the avails and proceeds of the property and business of the company. The whole profits, beneficial interest, enjoyment and control of the road and property of the company passes to this preferred creditor, with powers to manage and run the road, and to purchase additional stock at his discretion. The direct tendency as well as the avowed paramount object, was to carry on the business of the company, and to pay the assignee and preferred creditor out of the profits. The cases of Arthur v. Commercial & Railroad Bank of Vicksburg, 9 Smedes & M. 394, and Bradley v. Goodrich, 7 How. [48 U. S.] 276, are irresistible authorities for determining this case against the defendant Chamberlain. The commercial and Railroad Bank of Vicksburg assigned all its property to trustees, reciting that "the embarrassed situation of the bank and the present inability of its debtors to meet the liabilities and by consequence, that the bank was unable to pay its debts promptly, rendered it necessary that a general assignment should be made for the benefit of its creditors and the completion of the railroad;" it therefore assigned all its property to trustees, with authority to sell the effects assigned, to collect all debts due to the institution and to complete the railroad, for which they were authorized to borrow a sum not exceeding $250,000; and out of the proceeds collected, to pay the principal and interest of the loan. After that dividends were to be made pro rata among the creditors; the trustees to receive eight thousand dollars each per annum for their services. The supreme court of the United States decided "that the deed was fraudulent and void as against creditors of the bank; that the deed showed on its face an intention of the bank to postpone its creditors, use the effects of the bank for the completion of the railroad, pay the trustees enormous salaries, and make no dividends among the creditors until the object was accomplished." The deed in that case made some show of regard for the rights of creditors, but the deed in this case only contemplates a benefit to the parties, the insolvent assignor, and the preferred assignee. How much salary was allowed Chamberlain in the $200,000 is not specified, but from the recklessness exhibited on the part of the directors, it may be presumed to be enormous. The whole recital of items comprising that amount strikes me as extraordinary and enormous after Chamberlain's original contract price for building the road had been extravagantly enhanced, and while he had in his hands funds of the company amounting to nearly $150,000 which the directors did not require to be accounted for or applied. And it is questionable whether, under the circumstances, Chamberlain was entitled to any damages for the temporary suspension of the work west of New Berlin. The principles here stated apply to assignments direct to a preferred creditor, as well as to those in trust for creditors. McClurg v. Lecky, 3 Pen. & W. 83; Passmore v. Eldridge, 12 Serg. & R. 198. The assignment and lease to Chamberlain will be decreed to be void as against this complainant.

The defendant Chamberlain in his answer denies that the judgment confessed by the company in his favor was based on any fictitious consideration, or was given and accepted with any intent or design to hinder or delay or defraud the creditors of the company; but on the contrary, he says that it was given for effectual indebtedness from the company to him. And he claims the amount of work done for the company under his contracts exceeds the amount of the judgment. In the testimony of the witnesses there is very great discrepancy as to the amount of work done, and also as to the prices that should be paid. One thing, however, is beyond dispute; that the amount included in the judgment far exceeds the amount he would be entitled to on his original contract. The company might increase his compensation within reasonable bounds without incurring the imputation of fraud. In pursuance of the agreement between Chamberlain and the company in the month of December, 1857, for re-measuring the work, for the purpose of ascertaining the amount due him on the 1st of October, 1857, a survey and estimate were made, which showed an amount greater than that of the judgment. If that survey and estimate had been made on notice to the complainant, more reliance could be placed on the evidence upon that subject. Neither that survey nor the one for the complainant can be accurate, on account of the length of time the work had been done. Chamberlain may not be entitled to anything near the amount of the judgment. But liberality on the part of the company should not be considered fraudulent, unless it be so excessive as to bring the mind to that conclusion, after an examination into all the circumstances. This is not a suit of Chamberlain against the company on the contracts, requiring a legal enquiry into the amount due him; but the only question for our consideration is whether the judgment is fraudulent as against creditors. The judgment was confessed a few days after the assignment, while the company was laboring under its pecuniary embarrassments. The testimony of Mr. Kilbourn is, "that the judgment was suggested by Chamberlain and his counsel. That it had particular reference to the iron Vose, Livingston & Co. were endeavoring to reclaim. The completion of the road first, and securing Chamberlain, were the objects of the company, and they deem it necessary to give the lease and the judgment before Cleveland should get a judgment. The judgment was not in derogation of the lease, but to carry out the object of the lease. Probably Chamberlain's object in proposing the judgment was not only to protect himself against Vose, Livingston & Co., but also against Cleveland's claim."

The confession of a judgment to a bona fide creditor, even though it have the effect of giving him a preference over other creditors, is not a fraudulent disposition of an insolvent estate. While there is no statute prohibiting it, an insolvent debtor, has a right to give preference to his creditors by confessing judgments. But if such judgments are given and received for the purpose of hindering or delaying creditors, they are voidable as against those creditors if even for a bona fide debt, and if not used for that purpose. When a judgment is given and received for a fraudulent purpose, the giving judgment is such an act done in pursuance of the fraudulent purpose, as to render it voidable by any person who is in a position as a creditor, to question it. And such a judgment originally given for the purpose of defrauding creditors, cannot even be used as against such creditors to collect the amount due to the party to whom it was given. Bunn v. Ahl, 5 Casey [29 Pa. St.] 387. If Chamberlain had merely demanded and received the judgment, even to the known delay of Cleveland and the other pressing creditors of the company, it would not be legally invalid as against them. But would the judgment have been demanded and given, after the assignment and lease, but for the purpose of forestalling Vose, Livingston & Co., in reclaiming the iron, which the interests of Chamberlain and the company required should be laid on the track of the road; or to further the paramount object of the assignment and lease? The suits of Vose, Livingston & Co., respecting the iron, and the two contracts of settlement between them and Chamberlain and the company, show that they were pressing a claim for the iron, which was compromised by those contracts. So far it appears that Vose, Livingston & Co. had a claim, to effect which the judgment was demanded. But be this as it may, it appears satisfactorily that the judgment was given and received as a part of the arrangements to secure the future operations of the company and Chamberlain, in the prosecution of the work towards completion, while the creditors of the company should be hindered or delayed for an indefinite time; and it must fall under the same condemnation as the assignment and lease.

The assignment and lease to D. C. Freeman, of the Milwaukee and Watertown Division, having expired by its own limitation, it is not necessary to make any decree against him, except that he pay his share of the costs.

The plaintiff is left now to pursue his legal remedies against the company on his execution.

Case No. 2,888.

CLEVELAND v. TOWLE.

[3 Fish. Pat. Cas. 525.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Maryland. April, 1869.

PATENTS—PRIOR USE—INFRINGEMENT.

1. A manufacture and sale, by persons other than the patentee, of articles made upon the same principle as the patented thing, for more than two years prior to the application of the patentee, avoids the patent.

2. The defendant will infringe the complainant's patent if he use the invention of complainant as one of the elements of a combination which he has himself patented.

This was an action on the case [against William P. Towle], tried by Judge Giles and a jury, to recover damages for the infringement of letters patent [No. 69,629] for "improvement in suspenders," granted to plaintiff [Charles H. Cleveland] October 8, 1867.

The claim of the patent was as follows:

"The shoulder brace meets at each end in a single attachment that buttons to the sides of the waistband.

"The suspender or shoulder brace, composed of two single straps, CC, each passing from its attaching strap at the one side over the shoulder to the attaching strap on the other side of the body, substantially as herein described."

Joseph L. Brent and Robert J. Brent, for plaintiff.

William H. Norris, for defendant.

GILES, District Judge, (charging the jury). The patent of complainant is for a suspender composed of two straps, either elastic or non-elastic, crossing each other on the back and passing over and under the shoulder, and being attached to the pantaloons at two points, one on either side, just above the hip, as described in said patent. And if the jury shall find from the evidence that in 1858, and more than two years before the complainant applied for his patent, suspenders made upon this principle were manufactured and sold by the American Suspender Company, in Connecticut, or sold by Mr. Church, their agent in the city of New York, then the said complainant was not the first and original inventor of the said suspender, and the jury will find the first issue in the negative.

2. If the jury shall find that the patent of defendant, although for a combination which contains as one of its elements the same principle or substance which is embodied in complainant's patent, the same is an infringement on complainant's patent, and the jury will find the second issue in the affirmative.

3. If the jury shall find that the defendant manufactured or vended suspenders which, in their manufacture, contained the principle which is described in the first instruction, as patented to complainant, they will find the third issue in the affirmative, if the jury shall find the first issue in the affirmative.

[1] [Reported by Samuel S. Fisher, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

CLEVELAND & P. R. CO. (EVANS v.). See Case No. 4,557.

CLEVELAND CO-OPERATIVE STOVE CO. (HENDERSON v.). See Case No. 6,351.

CLEVELAND, C. & C. R. CO. (TOPPAN v.). See Case No. 14,099.

CLEVELAND INS. CO. (GLOBE INS. CO. v.). See Case No. 5,486.

Case No. 2,889.

CLEVELAND INS. CO. v. REED et al.

[1 Biss. 180;[1] 6 Am. Law Reg. 406.]

District Court, D. Wisconsin. Sept. Term, 1857.

ATTORNEY CANNOT ACQUIRE TITLE AS AGAINST PRINCIPAL—FORECLOSURE SUIT—HOW BARRED—SUBSEQUENT MORTGAGEE NOT MADE PARTY—COMMON LAW LIMITATIONS REGARDED IN EQUITY.

1. Where an agent, by virtue of a power of attorney, conveys the property of his principal and takes a conveyance to himself, and then mortgages it, such use of the power of attorney would not give him the title as against his principal.

2. Though the principal might have repudiated the acts of his attorney, a purchaser under decrees of foreclosure of prior mortgages, being a stranger to the transaction, cannot object to the validity of the mortgage; but he can inquire into its true consideration.

3. Usury must be specially pleaded or specifically set forth in the record, and supported by evidence, or the court will not inquire into it.

4. The statutory limitation of ten years should be applied to a bill to foreclose filed seventeen years after the mortgage debt was due, the mortgagee having notice that the land had been sold under prior mortgages, and for taxes, and that the purchaser was in possession, claiming title. This is true, although the statute was passed subsequent to the maturity of the mortgage debt.

5. Without such a statute equity would not disturb the possession or title of such a purchaser, he having been in possession fifteen years to the knowledge of the mortgagee. There must be conscience, good faith, and reasonable diligence, to call into action the powers of a court of equity.

6. Nor will the fact that the mortgagee was not made a party to the bills foreclosing the prior mortgages, under the circumstances of this case, enable the bill to be sustained.

7. Cases under the statute of limitations cited and commented upon.

8. Statutes for foreclosure and redemption are rules of property, and also laws of limitation; and in the absence of laws limiting proceedings in equity, the limitations as to similar demands at common law are considered as proper rules to be observed in courts of chancery.

[1] [Reported by Josiah H. Bissell, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

[In equity. Bill by the Cleveland Insurance Company against George Reed, Juliet S. Reed, James H. Rogers, and the Milwaukee & Mississippi Railroad Company.]

Butler & Buttrick, for complainant.

James S. Brown and Waldo & Ody, for defendants.

MILLER, District Judge. This is a bill filed in February, 1856, against George Reed and wife, James H. Rogers, and the Milwaukee & Mississippi Railroad Company, to foreclose a mortgage for $22,000 executed by George Reed and wife to complainant, dated February 10th, 1837, and recorded in April of the same year, covering certain lots in Finch's addition to Milwaukee, and thirty-six acres of land in the county of Milwaukee.

Reed answers, admitting the execution of the mortgage, and that the same is due and unpaid, and pleads a discharge under the bankrupt law of the United States in December, 1842.

Rogers, in his answer, says that he is the owner in fee simple of the property in Finch's addition, and of which he had been in the full and actual possession as owner for nineteen years; that he has resided in Milwaukee constantly, where he could at all times be found; that he has been in the actual occupation of the land for more than ten years since the right of action on the mortgage accrued, and before the commencement of this suit, and that the right of action is barred by the statute of limitations of this state.

He further says that the property in Finch's addition was and still is the property of Curtis Reed, and that neither George Reed nor the complainant ever had any title to or equitable lien or claim upon it; that George Reed never had any business transactions with complainant, except through Edmund Clark, the president and owner of the controlling interest of the capital stock; that George Reed on the 10th of February, 1837, as the attorney in fact of Curtis Reed, and by virtue of a power of attorney to sell and lease, dated June 23, 1836, conveyed the property by warranty deed to Clark, who at the same time re-conveyed by quit-claim to George Reed for the nominal consideration of $30,000, and he then executed these notes and mortgage to complainant; the whole being one transaction, in the absence of and without the knowledge or consent of Curtis Reed, and with intent to defraud him.

Rogers also sets forth that Curtis Reed, prior to the execution of above instruments, gave two mortgages upon these premises to one Nathaniel Finch, which were recorded prior to the mortgage to complainant, and assigned to him, Rogers, before maturity, and afterwards foreclosed in the territorial district court, and the land was sold to him, and the sale duly confirmed. He also claims title by deed from the assignee of George Reed, and under tax deeds, and insists that the cause of action is stale, and should not be enforced in equity; that it is nowhere stated in the bill that the money claimed to have been loaned was a part of the capital stock of the company, and that the charter of the company gave it no power to deal in real estate, or to loan money other than its corporate funds, for which reason the mortgage is void; that the company has long since ceased to exist; and that the transaction is usurious, and the conveyance and mortgage were a device to avoid the usury laws.

Everything connected with the transaction excludes the idea that the mortgage is upon any land in that section, but Curtis Reed's. The purchase by Rogers of George Reed's interest in the section of land, at his assignee's sale, does not affect this mortgage. George Reed's bankruptcy and the proceedings and sale under it have nothing whatever to do with this case, so far as Rogers is concerned. The return of this debt by George Reed, in the schedule annexed to his petition in bankruptcy, cannot in any way affect the interests or rights of Curtis Reed or Rogers in regard to the mortgage or the mortgaged premises.

This mortgage was a security for money loaned, and the insurance company had authority by its charter to take security for money loaned, as part of its capital.

Clark testifies that the amount paid Reed was entered on the books of the company, as paid by it; that he made the arrangements with Reed after consulting some of the directors; that eleven thousand dollars, part in cash and part in paper was the true sum advanced [and was the true consideration],[2] the other eleven thousand dollars being simply a guaranty, that the mortgaged premises would be worth the amount, when the notes should become payable; that a private note of $3,000 was given by Reed as a penalty to ensure the punctual payment of the notes. The notes were given in Ohio, and were made payable in New York [and the mortgage is on land in Wisconsin].[2] The pleadings do not authorize the court to inquire into the subject of usury; they are altogether too indefinite and uncertain. Usury must be specially pleaded, and the evidence must sustain the plea. The whole transaction appears to have been a desperate device of George Reed, to make a raise of money, and an unwarrantable scheme of Clark to embarrass a customer. [Rogers pleads in his answer, that the transaction was a violation of the usury laws of either the states of Ohio, New York or Wisconsin, and is void. Upon such pleading I shall not examine the subject; nor shall I stop to inquire whether Rogers could plead usury without tendering the amount actually loaned with interest.][2] It is certain that George Reed could not use the power of attorney so as to acquire title adverse to or exclusive of his principal, Curtis Reed. The mortgage is in equity, the mortgage of Curtis Reed, though the notes are at law George Reed's personal obligations.

[2] [From 6 Am. Law. Reg. 406.]

A power to sell lands, usually includes a power to mortgage, but a mortgage under such a power for a greater sum than is actually loaned may be repudiated by the principal.

Curtis Reed might have required the cancellation of the conveyances and mortgage, at all events upon payment of the sum loaned. But Rogers is a stranger to the transaction, and he cannot make the objection to the validity of the mortgage. He can only cause inquiry to be made of its true consideration, if it is a lien on his land. Jackson ex dem. McCarty v. Van Dalfsen, 5 Johns. 43; Childs v. Digby, 24 Pa. St. [12 Harris] 23.

Rogers became the assignee of the two mortgages of Curtis Reed to the Finches, dated in April, 1836. In pursuance of decrees of the district court for Milwaukee county, at the suit of Rogers against Curtis Reed, Edmund Clark, and others, the mortgaged premises were sold in satisfaction of those mortgages to Rogers, and a deed was made to him of the premises, by the master, according to the order of confirmation of the sales. Those mortgages being prior liens, Rogers became the purchaser of the legal title. The mortgage in suit is dated in February, 1837, and is of Curtis Reed's equity of redemption merely. An ejectment would not lie, at the suit of this mortgagee against Rogers, the owner of the legal title. The only remedy of the complainant is by bill in equity for the sale of the mortgaged premises, which is this bill, or for redemption, and the subject matter is of the peculiar and exclusive jurisdiction of a court of equity.

At the date of this mortgage there was no statute limiting suits in equity. An act went into force in the month of January, 1839, that "bills for relief in case of the existence of a trust not cognizable in the courts of common law, and in all other cases not herein provided for, shall be filed, within ten years after the cause thereof shall accrue, and not after." This limitation was continued in the state statutes of 1849, and is now in full force. This mortgage is dated February 10, 1837. The first note is payable in twelve months, the second in eighteen months, and the third in two years. When the act of limitations went into force, the cause of action had accrued. This court will administer statutes of limitation of the state as rules of property. I shall proceed to inquire whether the statute is applicable to this case.

This case is one of the "cases not provided for" in the statute. If the word "hereafter" had been inserted in the statute (as in similar laws of some of the states) so that it would read "hereafter accrue," the question would be relieved of doubt. The statute seems to direct the attention to such causes of action as shall accrue, and not to those that have then accrued. The supreme court of this state has applied this statute to causes of action accrued at the time of its enactment. Fullerton v. Spring, 3 Wis. 667; Parker v. Kane, 4 Wis. 1. This statute was copied from the statute of the state of New York. In that state a contrary application of the statute was made in Williamson v. Field, 2 Sandf. Ch. 533, and cases cited. In those cases the general rule is announced, that no statute is to have a retrospect beyond the time of its commencement, and to affect vested rights unless expressly so declared. But in the subsequent case of Spoor v. Wells, 3 Barb. Ch. 199, it is decided that an equitable claim, upon which a bill in chancery could have been filed previous to the time when the statute first took effect, and when the complainant was under no disability, is barred by the provisions of the statute at the expiration of ten years after the statute went into operation. The statute of the state of Massachusetts, in its general provisions as to claims that shall accrue, is the same as the statutes of New York and of Wisconsin, and a similar application is there made. Smith v. Morrison, 22 Pick. 430; [Sedg. St. Lim. 691]. The legislature of the state of Mississippi passed an act, in the month of February, 1844, that judgments rendered before the passage of the act in any other state of the Union, should be barred, unless suit was brought thereon within two years after the passage of the act. In the case of Bank of Alabama v. Dalton, 9 How. [50 U. S.] 522, it is decided by the supreme court of the United States that the act could be pleaded in bar to an action on a judgment rendered in the state of Alabama one year previous to its passage, and that the constitution of the United States did not prohibit that legislation as a law impairing the obligation of contracts. The time and manner of the operation of statutes of limitations generally depend on the sound discretion of the legislature. Cases, though, may occur where the provisions of a law may be so unreasonable, as to amount to a denial of right, and call for the interposition of the court.

A statute of limitations affects the remedy, not the contract, where a reasonable time is given for bringing suit on existing demands. Jackson v. Lamphire, 3 Pet. [28

[2] [From 6 Am. Law Reg. 406.]

U. S.] 280; Sturges v. Crowninshield, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 122; Bronson v. Kinzie, 1 How. [42 U. S.] 311; McCracken v. Hayward, 2 How. [43 U. S.] 608; Lewis v. Lewis, 7 How. [48 U. S.] 776; McElmoyle v. Cohen, 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 312; Call v. Hagger, 8 Mass. 423; Holyoke v. Haskins, 5 Pick. 20; Smith v. Morrison, 22 Pick. 430; Morse v. Goold, 1 Kern. [11 N. Y.] 281. In Ross v. Duval, 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 45, the court remarks: "It is a sound principle that where a statute of limitations prescribes the time within which suits shall be brought or an act done, and a part of the time has elapsed, effect may be given to the act, and the time yet to run being a reasonable part of the whole time, will be considered the limitation in the mind of the legislature in such cases." From a careful examination of the case of Murray v. Gibson, 15 How. [56 U. S.] 421, it will appear that the decision does not conflict with the previous decisions of the court. The act of the state of Mississippi, passed in March, 1846, as an amendment to the limitation law of the state, provided that, "no record of any judgment recovered in any court of record without the limits of the state against any person who was at the time of the commencement of the suit, on which the judgment is founded, or at the time of the rendition of such judgment, a citizen of this state, shall be received as evidence to charge such citizen, after the expiration of three years from the time of the rendition of such judgment without the limits of this state." The declaration was in debt on a judgment rendered in the state of Louisiana, in the month of November, 1844. By the literal terms of the act, the rights of a judgment creditor seem to be made dependent, not on his diligence in the institution or prosecution of his suit, but upon the trial of the action on his judgment, which is an event over which he has no control. The peculiar language of the act, if taken in its literal acceptation, might suggest a serious doubt as to the compatibility of its provision with the principles of common right, or with the federal constitution. For these reasons the courts construed the law to relate to the time of bringing the suit and not to the time of offering the record in evidence at the trial, and also confined its operation to judgments rendered in other states after its date. In addition to these reasons the law of the same state as then existing, and on which the case of Bank of Alabama v. Dalton [supra] was ruled, was applicable to the case of Murray v. Gibson [supra], and would have barred it if pleaded. The court applied the law to judgments rendered after its date, to prevent the injustice intended by the legislature, of excluding judgment records at the trial. The court remarks, "That laws should be so construed as not to allow a retroactive operation, where this is not required by express command, or by necessary or unavoidable implication. Especially should this rule of interpretation prevail, when the effect and operation are designed, apart from the intrinsic merits of the rights of parties to restrict the operation of those rights."

This bill was filed nineteen years after the date of the mortgage, seventeen years after the whole cause of action had accrued, and sixteen years and five months after the statute of limitations went into force. The complainant was under no legal disability, and might have brought suit before the ten years prescribed by the law had expired. I am of the opinion that this case should be considered as barred by the statute, but it is not essential to the proper disposition of the case, that the bill be dismissed on this ground.

In the year 1840 the sales to Rogers, in the foreclosure of the Finch mortgages, were confirmed, and deeds were executed and delivered, when he went into possession. Clark testifies that "I think I first began to look after his real estate in 1841 or '42. We got a man, who was going up there, to look into it, and he came back with rather a poor story. I first learned that James H. Rogers was in possession of the property ten years ago, perhaps more. I wrote to some gentleman in Milwaukee, and they wrote me that Rogers was in possession, claiming title. The information which John W. Allen gave us, whom we requested to look after our interests in Milwaukee, and who went there, was, that the thirty-six acres embraced in the mortgage had been foreclosed and sold on a previous mortgage, and that the twenty acres in Finch's addition embraced in the same mortgage had been sold at several tax sales, and that it was not then valued at over ten dollars per acre. This statement was made in 1841 or '42. This Mr. Allen was the first president, and a stockholder in the Cleveland Insurance Company." Rogers has continued in actual possession, and has paid the taxes mostly by suffering the property to be sold, and then taking deeds, and has made valuable improvements. The property has become very valuable, not from any labor, expenditure, or exertion of the complainant. It is the policy of this new state that titles should be quieted. The growth and improvement of the state requiring this policy, the legislature have wisely limited the time for bringing ejectments to ten years. Clark, the controlling officer of the insurance company, had notice by his agent and a stockholder of the company, that Rogers was in possession fifteen years before this bill was filed. From these facts, this bill should not be maintained at this late day. From the delay in bringing suit, after the notice that Rogers was in possession, claiming title to the land not considered worth the costs of a suit, the claim may be considered as abandoned or stale. In this respect this case somewhat resembles the case of McKnight v. Taylor, 1 How. [42 U.

S.] 161, in which it was remarked by the court—"In relation to this claim, it appears that nineteen years and three months were suffered to lapse before any application was made for the execution of the trust by which it had been secured. No reason is assigned for this delay, nor is it alleged to have been occasioned in any degree by obstacles thrown in the way by the appellant. * * * If, indeed, the suit had been postponed a few months longer, twenty years would have expired, and in that case, according to the whole current of authorities, the debts in the schedule would all have been presumed to be paid. But we do not found our judgment upon the presumption of payment, for it is not merely on the presumption of payment, or in analogy to the statute of limitations, that a court of chancery refuses to lend its aid to stale demands. There must be conscience, good faith, and reasonable diligence, to call into action the powers of the court. In matters of account, where they are not barred by the act of limitations, courts of equity refuse to interfere after a considerable lapse of time, from considerations of public policy, and from the difficulty of doing entire justice when the original transactions have become obscure by time, and the evidence may be lost. The rule upon this subject must be considered as settled by the decision of this court in the case of Piatt v. Vattier, 9 Pet. [34 U. S.] 405; and that nothing can call a court of chancery into activity but conscience, good faith and reasonable diligence, and where these are wanting, the court is passive and does nothing, and therefore, from the beginning of equity jurisdiction, there was always a limitation of suit in that court." The demand is not to be favored, even for the amount actually loaned, on account of the circumstances attending the negotiations, and for the reason of the delay in either redeeming the land from Rogers, or instituting proceedings for such redemption. In this case, on the part of the complainant, there is a want of conscience, of good faith, and of reasonable diligence, and upon the principle and spirit of the statute of limitations, and also of the policy of the country, this claim shou... not, at this late day, be enforced in a court of equity against Rogers.

This suit was sought to be maintained, on the ground that the equity of redemption of the Cleveland Insurance Company was not barred by the foreclosure of the Finch mortgages, as it was not made a party defendant on the record of those cases. If this complainant had been nominally made a defendant in those cases, there would be no doubt of its foreclosure by those decrees of all equity of redemption as a subsequent mortgagee, even if the proceeding had been against it, by a newspaper publication of a rule to appear and plead, answer or demur, according to the statute. Why Edmund Clark was made a defendant and the Cleveland Insurance Company was omitted cannot be accounted for, unless from the nature of the several conveyances and the active agency of Clark in the negotiation, it was supposed that the mortgage was taken nominally in the name of the company for his use. In the whole business the name of the company only appears as payee of the notes and as mortgagee. The business was transacted by Clark without authority from the directors of the company, by a vote of the corporate body. There is no pretence that the directors entered on the minutes or records of the corporation any resolution or order authorizing Clark to consummate the negotiation by those deeds to and from himself, and to take the mortgage in the name of the company for double the sum actually loaned. Clark swears "that he did not know whether it was the funds of the company or his own funds that were advanced to Reed, and also, that if the company would not advance the money he would." From a subsequent examination of the books of the company and of memoranda, it may be inferred that the money advanced was the funds of the corporation. But be this as it may, Clark was the president of the company, the owner of the principal part of the stock, and the business man of the company. Under these circumstances, it was quite convenient for him to take a mortgage in the name of the corporation to secure a debt of his own, particularly in such an unconscientious transaction. He had the controlling power of the company. If he consulted the directors it was but mere matter of form. He was the company for all business purposes, and he testifies that he and the company had notice by their agent one or two years after the sale to Rogers, that he, Rogers, was in possession of the mortgaged premises claiming title.

If Rogers was claiming title, either by virtue of his purchase under the decrees of foreclosure of the Finch mortgages, or by purchase at sales for taxes, it was the duty of the Cleveland Insurance Company, by its officers or agents, upon the receipt of the notice, to have redeemed the land from those sales. They at the same time had notice that the land was not considered worth over ten dollars per acre, which would not warrant the expenses and disbursements required for redemption. Under these circumstances, it would not be equitable or just to decree, at this late day, after the land had become valuable, that Rogers' title and possession should be disturbed, for the mere omission of the Cleveland Insurance Company as a nominal defendant in the bills and proceedings to foreclose prior mortgages. If the Finch mortgages had been foreclosed by a newspaper advertisement and sale, in pursuance of authority in the mortgages, the Cleveland Insurance Company would have been entitled by law to redeem within two years. By the law then in force, the mortgagor had two years time to redeem from such sale, and "any person to whom a subsequent mortgage may have been executed shall be entitled to the same privilege of redemption to the mortgaged premises, that the mortgagor might have had, or of satisfying the prior mortgage, and shall by such satisfaction acquire all the benefits to which such prior mortgagee was or might be entitled." And the law directs that if the mortgaged premises so sold shall not be redeemed, the officer making such sale shall make a deed to the purchaser. And if there is an overplus of purchase money on hand, it shall be retained for subsequent incumbrances.

In the proceedings in court to foreclose the Finch mortgages, Clark, as a non-resident not served with process, was entitled by law to three years time to come in and petition the court to open the decree as to him, for the use of the insurance company. But, by the law, if such application be not made, the decree shall be adjudged to be confirmed, which confirmation shall have relation to the time of making the decree. And by law, land sold under execution was redeemable by the owner within two years after the sale, and a creditor by judgment or decree could acquire the interest of the purchaser within three months after. These several laws are rules of property, strictly observed, as to time, in all cases, and they are also laws of limitation. They fully demonstrate the policy of the state in regard to sales of land for the payment of debts. In the absence of laws limiting suits and proceedings in equity, the laws of limitation as to similar demands in courts of law are considered as rules proper to be observed in courts of chancery. From analogy to these laws, it is questionable whether a subsequent mortgagee, not named as a party in a bill to foreclose a prior mortgage, shall be allowed to redeem after two years. I am aware that the opinion prevails that such redemption cannot be denied, as the person claiming it was no party to the proceedings in court. The opinions of some courts favor this idea. But in several of the states a proceeding in court, and a decree against the prior mortgagor and terre tenant are sufficient to bar all subsequent incumbrances. The proceedings in court are open; the advertisement and sale are supposed to be known to all persons interested, who should attend the sale and bid up the property to cover their liens.

Every person is expected to look after his mortgages and liens, within a reasonable time. But whether a subsequent mortgagee should be limited in equity to redeem within two years, by analogy to the statute referred to, I need not now determine. But that he should redeem within a reasonable time, there is no doubt. The company, through its officers and agents, had notice of Rogers' possession under claim of title [within two years after his purchase at the master's sale in the foreclosure of the Finch mortgages. Inquiry should then have been made into his right to possession and claim of title],[3] and the land should have been redeemed from the sale within the two years, or a reasonable time thereafter. The complainant was under no disability to proceed on its mortgage, nor has Rogers done any act to delay or prevent a redemption or sale of the land. The complainant has done no act to enhance the value of the land, while Rogers has. The complainant cannot be allowed to profit by the delay, at Rogers' expense. For these reasons the court will not order a decree on this bill, that would disturb the possession or title of Rogers, or require him to pay the sum with interest, advanced to George Reed.

Rogers disclaims title to, or interest in the property in Finch's addition, consequently there is no decree to be ordered against him as to that. George Reed was discharged from his debt under the late bankrupt law, and he is thereby released from all personal responsibility or liability on the notes and mortgage.

The Milwaukee and Mississippi Railroad Company, I presume, was made a defendant, as claiming the right of way through section thirty. There are no parties, then, against whom a decree could be made in regard to the thirty-six acres. But if that land was sold under a decree in the case of Increase A. Lapham, as set forth in Rogers' answer, I presume the complainant has no claim of lien against it. If so, the bill will be dismissed as to both tracts. Bill dismissed.

NOTE [from original report]. That agent cannot acquire title as against principal. Ringo v. Binns, 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 269; Church v. Marine Ins. Co. [Case No. 2,711]; Galbraith v. Elder, 8 Watts, 81; Barker v. Marine Ins. Co. [Case No. 992]; Hall v. Hallet, 1 Cox, 134; Lees v. Nuttall, 1 Russ. & M. 53; Andrews v. Mowbray, 1 Wils. Exch. 71; Whichcote v. Lawrence, 3 Ves. 740; Ex parte James, 8 Ves. 348; Chalmer v. Bradley, 1 Jac. & W. 59; Whitcomb v. Minchin, 5 Madd. 92; Norris v. Taylor, 49 Ill. 18; Collins v. Case, 23 Wis. 230; Grumley v. Webb, 44 Mo. 444. It is the settled doctrine of courts of equity that great delay of either party, unexplained, in not prosecuting his claims, constitute such laches as forbid the interference of a court of equity. Hough v. Coughlan, 41 Ill. 130. The statute of limitations binds courts of equity as well as law in cases of concurrent jurisdiction; and sometimes, by way of analogy binds equitable titles. Story, J., in Pratt v. Northam [Case No. 11,376]. As to doctrine of courts of equity, as to limitations, laches, and stale claims, see opinion of Clifford, J., in Badger v. Badger [Id. 718]; also, Ferson v. Sanger [Id. 4,751].

[NOTE. On complainant's appeal the decree of the circuit court, dismissing the bill, was affirmed.

[The grounds of affirmation were: That the deed of Reed's assignee in bankruptcy to Rogers vested in the latter such title as Reed had at the time of the decree adjudicating him a bankrupt. Consquently, Rogers held the relation of mortgagor to the complainant more than

[3] [From 6 Am. Law Reg. 406.]

10 years before the suit was brought; also, Rogers held the actual possession in 1839, when the 10-years statute of limitations was enacted, and the bar was complete in 1849. And, further, that the suit in question, being solely cognizable in equity, was within the fortieth section of that act, and was manifestly barred thereby.

[The court further held that, assuming the bill to be true, no relief could be had as to the other defendants, for, by his purchase of the bankrupt's title, Rogers took the equity of redemption, and thus cut off whatever claims to the land the other defendants had.

[The opinion was delivered by Mr. Justice Catron. Cleveland Ins. Co. v. Reed, 24 How. (65 U. S.) 284.]

CLEVELAND INS. CO. (STARKWEATHER v.). See Cases Nos. 13,308 and 13,309.

Case No. 2,890.

CLEVELAND, P. & A. R. CO. v. FRANKLIN CANAL CO. et al.

[1 Pittsb. Leg. J. No. 36.]

Circuit Court, W. D. Pennsylvania. 1853.

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE OF TAINTED CONTRACT — FOLLOWING STATE DECISIONS — POWER OF CONGRESS—POST ROADS.

[1. A foreign railroad corporation, by agreement with a domestic corporation, secured most of its corporate stock, and the building and control of a railroad totally different from that required by the latter's charter. Held, that it had no standing in equity to enforce performance of such contract, or to restrain interference with the line of road so built. Following Com. v. Franklin Canal Co., 21 Pa. St. 117.]

[2. A decision of a state court declaring a railroad to be different in character, location, and object from that authorized by the charter from the state legislature under which it was constructed, though not followed by a judgment or decree, is binding upon the federal courts within the state.]

[3. The power given by the constitution to establish post roads means such roads as are regularly laid out by the authority of the states, or by counties under the laws of the states.]

[4. The act of congress making all roads post roads means only such as have charters from the several states, and not such as are built in derogation of law.]

[5. Such act does not give to the United States, to a mail contractor, or to the owner of a road the right to an injunction to restrain a threatened injury.]

[In equity. Bill by the Cleveland, Painesville and Ashtabula Railroad Company against the Franklin Canal Company and sundry persons.]

A. W. Loomis, E. M. Stanton, C. Shaler, and Th. Umhstaetter, for complainants.

S. W. Black, E. Babbitt, and J. Thompson, for respondents.

IRWIN, District Judge. This is a bill for a specific performance, and an injunction to restrain the respondents from entering upon the railroad track of the Franklin Canal Company in the city of Erie, and injuriously destroying and disturbing the said road and causeways, as it is alleged is threatened to be done by them. The complainants, under a charter from the state of Ohio, as they allege, have made a railroad extending from Cleveland, in said state, to the boundary line of the state of Pennsylvania, parallel with the shore of Lake Erie, towards the city of Erie, upon which they are engaged in transporting merchandise and passengers, and, under contract with the postmaster general, the mail of the United States. They further allege that the Franklin Canal Company is a body corporate and politic, created by the laws of Pennsylvania, and that they have constructed a line of railroad connecting and joining with the railroad of complainants, extending from the point of junction at the boundary line of the state of Pennsylvania to Peach street, in the city of Erie, which is used by the complainants under an agreement with the said Franklin Canal Company. The charter from the state of Ohio to the complainants extends only to such rights as are granted to them within that state; which, alone, does not enable them, for the causes alleged in the bill, to become complainants in this court. If they have any such right, it is derived from their agreement with the Franklin Canal Company. It becomes necessary, therefore, to inquire—1st. What are the chartered rights of the Franklin Canal Company? 2d. What is the nature of the agreement between the complainants and that company, and whether by it they can sustain this application for an injunction?

By an act of assembly of the 27th of April, 1844, the Franklin Canal Company became vested with the title to the Franklin division of the Pennsylvania Canal from the aqueduct over French creek, on the French creek feeder, to the mouth of French creek, together with all the estate, real and personal, owned by the commonwealth for the use of the said canal. And by another act passed on the 9th of April, 1849, it was inter alia provided, that the said company, instead of constructing the canal, or completing and repairing the work done thereon by the commonwealth, should have the privilege of constructing a railroad, if deemed most expedient, and using the graded line or towing path of the canal as the bed of the road; and with the further privilege, upon the increase of their stock to the amount of five hundred thousand dollars, of extending the same from the north end of said Franklin Canal to Lake Erie, and from the south end thereof to Pittsburgh, by such route as the said company might deem most expedient and advantageous, but subject to the provisions and restrictions of the act of assembly of the 19th of February, 1849, regulating railroad companies. Such, in brief, is the substance of the chartered privileges of the Franklin Canal Company.

How did the complainants become invested with these privileges, or any part of them?

In their bill they say, "that large sums of money being required for the construction of the railroad from the boundary line of the state of Pennsylvania to the city of Erie, the complainants became the owners of a large amount of stock of the Franklin Canal Company, to the amount of $448,500, the whole capital stock being $500,000, and that they also advanced large sums and guaranteed the bonds of the said company to the amount of $50,000," and to indemnify themselves for these advances for stock and pecuniary liabilities, they entered into a contract and agreement with the Franklin Canal Company, dated the 14th of May, 1851, in which, among other matters, they say "that pursuant to the terms of the statute of the states of Ohio and Pennsylvania, incorporating them, and other statutes affecting them, they are engaged in constructing a railroad from the city of Cleveland to the easterly line of the state of Ohio, in the direction of the borough of Erie, in the state of Pennsylvania, and from that state line to the borough of Erie, in connection with and forming a continuation of the railroad of the complainants. The complainants then agree to enable the Franklin Canal Company to complete their part of the road, to advance and pay for iron, and the transportation thereof, the sum of $125,000, and $125,000 in money, payable in instalments; they also agree to furnish the engines, cars, and equipments for securing the entire route from Cleveland to Erie, for all which the Franklin Canal Company agree to give their bonds with interest, at seven per cent. per annum, payable on the first of February, 1861; which bonds are to be secured by mortgage to be the first lien upon the division of the road between the Pennsylvania line and Erie. The Franklin Canal Company also agree to pay to the complainants commissions, discounts and expenses, for raising the money agreed to be paid, and for the purchase and transporting the iron. Each party agrees to keep their respective portions of the road in repair. And it is further agreed that the complainants, as soon as the roads are completed from Cleveland to Erie, shall assume and thereafter during their existence have the entire control and management of the transportation of persons and property, with power to appoint all necessary officers, superintendents and agents, to collect all the tolls and revenues, and to do whatever else is lawful and needful in the management and transportation department of the railroad, and all such tolls, revenues, incomes and receipts which shall be collected either upon or for the interest of either road, shall go into one common treasury. They further agree that no contract, lease or agreement injurious to either of the parties shall be made by either party with any other railroad company, or person or persons whatsoever, without the consent of both parties, the terms and conditions of the agreement to be in full force and binding upon both parties for and during the existence of the complainants and all contracts and arrangements heretofore made between the parties to their agreement are declared to be void.

It thus appears that the complainants, under a charter from the state of Ohio for making a railroad within that state, have become shareholders to the amount of four hundred and forty eight thousand five hundred dollars, of a capital stock of five hundred thousand dollars, in the Franklin Canal Company, chartered by the state of Pennsylvania to make a canal or railroad between certain designated points, to which the whole of that capital stock could alone be legitimately appropriated. Has this been done? By the agreement there was a common object which both companies determined to effect, and have since effected,—the making of a continuous railroad from Cleveland in Ohio, along the shore of Lake Erie, to the city of Erie, in Pennsylvania. For this purpose the whole available capital stock of the Franklin Canal Company is authorized to be used by the complainants; their advances secured by mortgage on the road, by way of lien, with power to appoint all the officers and agents of the company, to receive its profits, make disbursements, and finally to conduct all its operations during the corporate existence of the complainants. By these concessions several of the essential franchises of the Franklin Canal Company became merged in the Cleveland, Painesville and Ashtabula Railroad Company. Whether they amount to such an abuse of the corporate powers of the former company, as to disable the complainants, who were parties to them, from claiming the equitable interposition of this court, by way of injunction, or otherwise, I will not now stop to inquire. All the available pecuniary resources of the Franklin Canal Company have been appropriated, and it would seem exhausted, in making a road from the state line to and within the city of Erie. Is this the road which they are required to make by their charter? On this part of the case I am relieved from making any remarks by the opinion of the supreme court of the state, given after a full hearing in the case of Com. v. Franklin Canal Co. [21 Pa. St. 117]. In this opinion I fully concur, but from which, if I differed, I should feel myself bound to regard as the settled judicial interpretation of the several statutes of the state, under which the Franklin Canal Company derives its chartered rights. The chief justice, after an examination of several acts of assembly conferring corporate powers on the Franklin Canal Company, says: "The road made by the defendants begins at the depot of the Erie and North East Railroad, three-quarters of a mile from the lake, and one hundred and ten feet above it, and runs thence directly as the nature of the ground will permit, to that point on the Ohio state line, where the Cleveland, Painesville and Ashtabula Railroad meets it, and there it stops. We do not say that there is any obligation to begin at one place more than another; and if this could properly be called a part of the work required, it might very well be justified. But it is no part of the road chartered; it is the whole of another road not chartered. It bears no resemblance to that described in the act of incorporation; it is different at both ends—different in character, location and object, and is used at this moment for purposes totally opposite to those which the legislature ever expressed an intention to permit."

There was no decree in this case; but it is not a judgment or decree, but the interpretations and decisions of the highest court of the state, on matters arising out of their own statutes, which this court is bound to regard. It is what in such cases they declared to be the law, which is the law for this court. A judgment or decree may be for many reasons rendered unnecessary; but the law as pronounced must be the rule of action until reversed. It must follow, from this opinion, that the railroad made from the state line where it connects with the road of the complainants along the shore of Lake Erie to the city, and within the city of Erie, is not the road, or any part of the road, for which a charter was granted to the Franklin Canal Company; and as complainants claim under this charter, and do not pretend that there was any other authority for making it, I must conclude that it was made without lawful authority, and without regard to the eminent domain of the state. The duties assigned by an act of incorporation, are conditions annexed to the grant of the franchises conferred, and it is a tacit condition of the grant that the grantees shall act up to the end or design for which they were incorporated. This the Franklin Canal Company have not done; and although the abuses of their charter cannot be enquired into collaterally, yet if they act without charter, and do what is essentially different from what they are authorized to do, as by making a canal instead of a road, or a road other than that expressly designated in their charter, they would be trespassing upon the ground they occupied, and subject to immediate proceedings for eviction, although their charter should not be judicially annulled. The supreme court of the state have said that the road which the Franklin Canal Company have made is "the whole of another road not chartered," and by the agreement which that company has made with the complainants by which they have absorbed all their available capital stock in making that unchartered road, it is not assuming too much to say that the road which the Franklin Canal Company are required to make by their charter, never will, in the present situation of that company, be made. They have disabled themselves from doing it, and also of complying with the act under which they hold their charter.

Regarding then the railroad made from the western boundary of the state of Pennsylvania along the shore of Lake Erie to and into the city of Erie, as not being made under the charter granted to the Franklin Canal Company, and as being unauthorized by any law of Pennsylvania, how will it affect the complainants in their prayer for a special injunction? It is not enough that they are entitled to sue in this court, and that there is danger of immediate and irreparable injury to their property; for if the bill discloses that they are not invested with a legal or equitable title, right or interest in that on which their claims alone are based, and which would certainly prevent a decree in their favor upon a final hearing, the prayer for a special injunction must be refused. In their bill the complainants say in substance that they are shareholders in the Franklin Canal Company, which derived its charter from the statutes of Pennsylvania, and that they entered into an agreement with that company, by which they have large pecuniary interests and other advantages secured to them, and that they have made a railroad from Cleveland along the lake shore to the Pennsylvania line and from thence to the city of Erie; the latter division being the railroad, or a part of it, which the Franklin Canal Company was, by its charter, required to make. Though purchasers of the stock of that company to a very large amount, they do not claim relief from this court merely as shareholders; but, under their agreement, by which among many concessions, they are entitled to the whole control of the road during their corporate existence. Now it has appeared that there was nothing done by the Franklin Canal Company as required by their charter. They did not make the railroad specified in their charter, or any part of it, but under the agreement referred to, another road was made, either separately or in connection with the complainants' road. On the part of the Franklin Canal Company this was, in law, a fraudulent diversion of their stock and funds, and a transfer of material parts of their corporate powers for an object wholly inconsistent with and at variance with these powers. The complainants purchased stock of the company to the amount of $448,500, and from that time were members of the corporation; and it is fairly inferable that they were then, if not before, fully informed of their chartered privileges, obligations, and disabilities. But instead of making the road required by their charter, they made another; different on its whole line and different in termini. The complainants may have been ignorant of this fraud in law, and may have done nothing more than, by their charter from the state of Ohio, they were authorized to do. But when a court of equity is invoked to enforce a specific performance of an agreement tainted with fraud in law, on the part of one of the contracting parties, and of which fraud the other party, if not the participants, were its beneficiaries, it would, as soon as the rules permitted, be prompt in dismissing the bill, and in rejecting the prayer for an injunction. Exclusive privileges by charter are granted by a state, in trust as well for the public as the persons to whom they are granted; and although the state courts are alone competent to inquire into an alleged abuse of these privileges, there is nothing to prevent the complainants from filing a bill in this court to enforce the agreement arising out of the charter, and to which agreement they are parties. But where, as is the case before the court, a bill seeks the enforcement of an agreement, in terms not expressly forbidden by law, but which requires either party to it to do, or to omit to do anything the obvious effect of which would be to defeat or evade the obligations and trusts of that law, to the manifest injury or wrong of a third party, though not a party to the agreement or to the suit, I know of no principle of equity by which it could for a moment be sustained. The complainants rest their prayer for an injunction upon an agreement founded exclusively upon the charter of the Franklin Canal Company, and the acts of assembly connected with it. If that company has done great wrong by the act out of which this controversy has arisen; if they have disabled themselves from performing their obligations and trusts, and for which it is apparent they may be lawfully held to answer, the party benefited by that wrong cannot, surely, reasonably expect a court of equity to interfere by decree to maintain that wrong. Enough has been said to show that the preventive remedy by injunction should not be employed to protect the property which the complainants claim under the agreement referred to.

But the complainants allege that they are entitled to an injunction on another ground. They are contractors for carrying the mail of the United States over the road they have made, in railroad cars from Cleveland to Erie and from thence back to Cleveland; and by an act of congress this road has been made a post road. The power given by the constitution to establish post roads has always been construed to mean, and as I think rightly, such roads as were regularly laid out by authority of the states, or by counties under the laws of the states. The government of the United States cannot construct a post road within a state of this Union without its consent; but congress may declare, that is, establish, such a road already opened and made a public highway by the direct or indirect authority of the state. The post roads of the United States are the property of the states through which they pass; they may temporarily part with the possession of them by charter, and the grantees, while the charter continues, have the right to preserve such roads, and prevent their threatened destruction. The United States have the mere right of transit over these roads for the purpose of carrying the mail, and in case of obstructing this right their laws provide an adequate remedy. The government itself could not obtain the injunction applied for to prevent the destruction of a mail road; the right to do so follows the right of property or possession; a mail contractor and any other person may have a right of action for damages in the courts of the state, for an obstruction to a mail road, or the wrongdoer there may be punished by indictment, but no injunction can legally issue upon an application to restrain a threatened injury to the road. This power must always be exercised with great caution; to allow it in a case like this, would be an alarming extension of jurisdiction, open to great abuses and extending over many thousands of miles, and to persons who as mail contractors, have no interest in the roads they pass over. The act of congress making all railroads post roads, means only such as have charters from the several states; it is not to be inferred that they intended to do anything in derogation of the sovereignty of a state, by declaring that to be a post road which was the work of an individual or of a company for his or their profit without law, or it may be in opposition to law. The road of the complainants was made a post road either from mistake or misrepresentation, and it is to be presumed without information to the department charged with making contracts for carrying the mail, that it was not authorized by law. The bill shows no sufficient cause for the interposition of this court. The prayer, therefore, for a special injunction, is dismissed, with costs.

CLEVELAND ROLLING-MILL CO. (WOOD v.). See Case No. 17,941.

CLEW (UNITED STATES v.). See Case No. 14,819.

Case No. 2,891.

In re CLEWS.

[19 N. B. R. 109.][1]

District Court, S. D. New York. Nov. 30, 1878.

PROOF OF FRAUDULENT DEBT AGAINST BANKRUPT —SUBSEQUENT ACTION.

A creditor whose debt was created by the fraud of the bankrupt does not, by proving his claim and taking a dividend, waive his right to maintain an action for the balance of the debt.

In bankruptcy.

Abbott Bros., for motion.

W. L. Sessions, contra.

CHOATE, District Judge. This is a motion to stay proceedings in a suit brought in a state court against the bankrupts, and to set aside a warrant of arrest issued in that suit against the bankrupt Clews. The bankrupts have received their discharge in bankruptcy, and it is claimed on their behalf that this creditor has waived his right to maintain any action against them for the cause of action sued on, even if that cause of action was created by the fraud of the bankrupts, because they came in and proved their debt and took a dividend. The statute provides: "No creditor proving his debt or claim shall be allowed to maintain any suit at law or in equity therefor against the bankrupt, but shall be deemed to have waived all right of action against him, and all proceedings already commenced, or unsatisfied judgments already obtained therein against the bankrupt shall be deemed to be discharged and surrendered thereby." Stat. 1867, c. 176, § 21 [14 Stat. 526]. And by the 33d section of the same act it was provided that "no debt created by the fraud or embezzlement of the bankrupt, etc., shall be discharged under this act, but the debt may be proved and the dividend thereon shall be a payment on account of said debt." In re Robinson [Case No. 11,939], Mr. Justice Nelson held that the effect of these provisions, considered together, was that in case of a fiduciary debt or debt created by fraud coming within the class of debts described in section 33, the creditor might prove his claim and take his dividend, and that he did not thereby waive his right to maintain an action for the balance of the debt. That case is decisive of this point in the present case. It is urged that that decision is clearly in conflict with the decisions of the federal courts, including the supreme court, under the fifth section of the bankrupt law of 1841 [5 Stat. 444], it being held under that act that a fiduciary creditor who proved his claim thereby waived his right to maintain an action for the debt. Chapman v. Forsyth, 2 How. [43 U. S.] 202; In re Tebbetts [Case No. 13,817]; In re Comstock [Id. 3,073]; and other cases. But there is no such conflict. The provisions of section 5 of the act of 1841 were substantially the same as those of section 21 of the act of 1867, cited above; but the act of 1841 contained no similar provision to that quoted above from section 33 of the act of 1867, permitting the creditor to prove his debt, and making the dividend a receipt on account, and there were other provisions of the act of 1841 indicating a different policy from that so clearly appearing in section 33 of the act of 1867. The decision in Robinson's Case [supra] proceeds upon a difference in the language of the two acts, and was in accordance with the obvious meaning of the thirty-third section of the act of 1867.

[1] [Reprinted by permission.]

The case made by the complaint and the affidavits on which the order of arrest was issued is a clear case of a debt created by the fraud of the bankrupt within the meaning of the thirty-third section of the bankrupt law. The case as stated is that the defendants were agents of the plaintiffs to collect drafts and other evidences of debt belonging to them; that while so employed they became insolvent, and with full knowledge of such insolvency nevertheless collected the drafts and passed the proceeds to the credit of the plaintiffs. In other words, the bankrupts (as the case is stated against them) receiving a draft of the plaintiffs upon the trust in respect to them, which they knew they could not perform otherwise than by keeping them and their proceeds wholly distinct and separable from all other funds, turned them into money, and mingled the money with their own, so that they could no longer be traced. They thereby ceased indeed to hold the drafts or the proceeds in trust, and became debtors for the amount to the plaintiffs. The very creation of this debt, however, was an actual fraud and a violation of a duty which they had assumed in a fiduciary character. The point made by the bankrupts might be good, if they had, without knowledge of their insolvency, collected the drafts and passed the proceeds to the credit of the plaintiffs, as they claim in their answer was the fact. In that case the decisions that have been made in the cases of factors and others, who have been held not to be liable to arrest after discharge in bankruptcy, might be in point. But the case here made is a case of positive fraud, or fraud in fact, and not one of implied fraud, or fraud in law. Neal v. Scruggs, 95 U. S. 704. Still the question of fact on the issue of fraud being triable in the state court, that question does not come up for determination in this court. Motion denied, and stay of proceedings vacated.

Case No. 2,892.

CLEWS et al. v. LEE COUNTY.

[2 Woods, 474.][1]

Circuit Court, S. D. Alabama. April Term, 1874.

MANDAMUS TO COMPEL COLLECTION OF TAX.

1. Upon an application for the peremptory writ of mandamus to compel a court of county commissioners to assess and collect a tax to pay off a judgment recovered in a federal court against them, no matter can be set up against the application which was properly used as a defense against the recovery of the judgment.

2. Nor will it be a reason why the writ should not be granted, that the court of county commissioners has been enjoined from the assessment and collection of the tax by a state court. The effect of the case of Supervisors of Carroll Co. v. U. S., 18 Wall. [85 U. S.] 71, considered.

On May 10, 1872, [Henry Clews and Theodore S. Fowler, as] Henry Clews & Co., recovered in the federal court for the middle district of Alabama a judgment against the county of Lee, in the state of Alabama, for the sum of $13,722, being the amount due upon certain unpaid coupons which had been attached to certain bonds of said county, issued by it in payment of a subscription to the capital stock of the Eufala, etc., Railroad Company. Execution was issued on this judgment and returned nulla bona. This application was made to the court for a peremptory writ of mandamus to compel the court of county commissioners of Lee county to levy and assess, as required by law, a tax not exceeding one per centum per annum upon the real and personal property of the county sufficient to pay the judgment. At a former term of the court an alternative writ had been granted, issued and served upon the persons composing the court of county commissioners for Lee county. They filed their answer to the same in which they alleged as reasons why the peremptory writ should not issue: (1) That the bonds on which the judgment was recovered were void in the hands of the first holder, namely, the railroad company to which they were issued in payment of stock, because the terms of the law which authorized their issue had not been complied with; and (2) that Clews & Co. were not bona fide holders for value.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William B. Woods, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

Samuel F. Rice, for motion.
Geo. W. Stone, contra.

WOODS, Circuit Judge. In the action at law, brought by Henry Clews & Co. against the county of Lee, in which the judgment was recovered, the defendant pleaded the general issue, and two special pleas in which the invalidity of the bonds was alleged, and in which it was asserted that the plaintiffs were not bona fide holders for value of said bonds. These matters must necessarily have been passed upon by the court, adversely to the assertions of defendant, before judgment could have been recovered for plaintiffs. Having had its day in court upon these issues, can they be again raised upon this motion? The respondents are concluded by the judgment at law. They cannot go behind it to raise any question touching the causes of action upon which it was rendered. Mayor v. Lord, 9 Wall. [76 U. S.] 413.

It is further alleged as a reason why the writ should not issue, that the court of commissioners of Lee county has been restrained by an injunction issued by the chancery court of Lee county from the collection of any tax to pay the interest upon the bonds; that the bill, upon which the injunction was granted, was filed on the 26th day of November, 1870, and the injunction was made perpetual. So far as the pendency of this bill is supposed to be notice of the invalidity of the bonds to all persons, and to establish that Henry Clews & Co. are not bona fide holders, they having, as claimed, come into possession of the bonds after the filing of the bill, what has already been said has disposed of this point. That defense has already been passed upon and adjudicated by the judgment at law. Is the fact that the court of county commissioners has been enjoined by the state court of chancery from collecting the tax, which it is the purpose of the mandamus prayed for to compel them to levy and collect, a reason why the writ should not issue? The decisions of the supreme court of the United States are adverse.

In Riggs v. Johnson Co., 6 Wall. [73 U. S.] 195, which was a case, in most of its features similar to this, it was held that "state courts are exempt from all interference by the federal tribunals, but they are destitute of all power to restrain either the process or proceedings in the national courts. Circuit courts and state courts act separately and independently of each other, and in their respective spheres of action, the process issued by one is as far beyond the reach of the other as if the line of division between them was traced by landmarks and monuments visible to the eye. "Viewed in any light, therefore, it is obvious that the injunction of a state court is inoperative to control, or in any manner to affect the process or proceedings of a circuit court, not on account of any paramount jurisdiction in the latter courts, but because, in their sphere of action, circuit courts are wholly independent of state tribunals." To the same effect is the case of U. S. v. Common Council of Keokuk, 6 Wall. [73 U. S.] 516, where the supreme court says: "Principal question in the case is, whether the injunction of a state court had the effect to take away the jurisdiction from the circuit court to issue the writ of mandamus. Discussion of that question is unnecessary, as this court decided at the present term, in the case of Riggs v. Johnson Co. [supra], that a state court cannot enjoin the process of the federal court." So in Mayor v. Lord, 9 Wall. [76 U. S.] 409, where an answer was filed to the petition for the writ of mandamus, alleging, among other things, that the respondents had been enjoined by the state court from levying the tax, the supreme court says: "The injunction cannot avail the respondents. The relator was not a party to the proceeding. If he had been, it is not competent for a state tribunal thus to paralyze the process issued from a court of the United States to give effect to its judgment. This is a sound and salutary principle. It is vital to the beneficial existence of the national courts, and has heretofore been applied by this tribunal, upon the fullest consideration, in other cases presenting the same question." These decisions conclusively settle the question that the injunction issued by a state court restraining the collection of a tax to pay these bonds can have no effect upon the duty or power of this court, in a proper case, to direct the issuance of a mandamus.

The case of Supervisors of Carroll Co. v. U. S., 18 Wall. [85 U. S.] 71, recently decided by the supreme court of the United States, has been pressed upon my attention as showing a disposition on the part of the court to recede from the position taken in the cases above cited. I do not so read the case. The relator in that case had recovered a judgment against the county of Carroll upon county warrants issued for the ordinary expenses of the county. At the time of their issue, it was the settled law of the state, as prescribed by statute, and settled by the supreme court of the state, that the board of supervisors could not levy a tax for the ordinary expenses of the county to exceed four mills upon the dollar. The warrants were issued with this implied understanding, that no greater tax was to be levied for their payment than that prescribed by law. The board of supervisors, in answer to the alternative writ, stated that they had levied a tax of four mills to pay the ordinary expenses of the county, and that the law did not authorize them to levy any greater tax. This was held to be a sufficient return. The court says, "It is very plain that a mandamus will not be awarded to compel county officers of a state to do any act which they are not authorized to do by the laws of the state from which they derive their powers. Such officers are the creatures of the statute law, brought into existence for public purposes, and having no authority beyond that conferred upon them by the author of their being. The office of a writ of mandamus is not to create duties, but to compel the discharge of those already existing. A relator must have a clear right to the performance of a duty resting on the defendant before the writ can be invoked. Is it, then, the duty of the supervisors to levy, in addition to a county tax of four mills, a special tax to satisfy a judgment against the county for its ordinary indebtedness? This question can be answered only by a reference to the statutes of the state."

After a critical examination of the state laws, the court reaches the conclusion that no law authorized the levy of a tax exceeding four mills for ordinary county expenses at the time these warrants were issued. "The holders of the warrants were therefore informed," says the court, "that by the laws of the state no special tax could be levied for their payment. It follows, therefore, that the return was sufficient." This case is very different from the one now under consideration. Remembering that all questions touching the validity of the bonds in this case, and the ownership thereof by Clews & Co. are closed by the judgment in their favor, let us see what is the duty imposed upon the court of county commissioners by law. The 7th section of the act, approved December 31, 1868, under which the bonds were issued (Acts 1858, p. 516), declares that "the court of county commissioners of such counties in which the electors shall have voted in favor of subscription are hereby authorized and required to levy and assess, in the same manner as is now required by law for the collection of state and county taxes, such tax as may be necessary to meet the interest falling due semi-annually on said bonds," etc.

As already intimated, the judgment in this case has settled all questions touching the validity of the bonds, including the question whether the electors had "voted in favor of said subscription." There is nothing, then, left for the court of county commissioners to do, but to levy the tax as authorized and required by the statute. This is their duty. To have this duty performed is a right of the petitioners. The section of the law authorizing and requiring this tax was a part of the contract under which they took those bonds, as much so as if it had been written upon their face. Gunn v. Barry, 15 Wall. [82 U. S.] 610. Here, then, we find the right of the relators to compel the levy of the tax, and the duty of the respondents, coupled with the power to levy the tax. Under these circumstances the duty of the court is plain, namely, upon the application of the petitioners, to compel the respondents to perform that duty which it is the right of the petitioners to have performed. Let the peremptory writ of mandamus issue as prayed for.

Case No. 2,893.

In re CLIFFORD.

[2 Sawy. 428.][1]

District Court, D. California. May 8, 1873.

GOODS IN BONDED WAREHOUSE IN POSSESSION OF U. S.—DELIVERY.

Goods in a United States bonded warehouse, and on which the duties have not been paid, are in the possession of the United States, and an order by their owner and vendor for their delivery by the warehouseman to the vendee, even though presented to and accepted by the warehouseman, will not be good as a constructive or symbolical delivery, nor constitute a receipt or acceptance of the goods sufficient to satisfy the statute of frauds.

[Cited in Northwestern Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Elliott, 5 Fed. 228.]

[In the matter of George Clifford, a bankrupt.]

McAllister & Bergin, for Tong Wo & Co.

S. A. Jones, assignee, in pro. per.

D. T. Sullivan, for bankrupt.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. On the nineteenth of December, 1872, the bankrupt purchased of Tong Wo & Co., Chinese merchants of this city, 4,189 mats of rice for the sum of $10,472.50. The rice was at the time of sale in a bonded warehouse, and on the succeeding day the vendors gave to the bankrupt delivery orders on the warehouseman, which were duly presented, and the corresponding entries made in the warehouseman's book. The purchase money was to be paid, one half on the twenty-eighth of February and one half on the thirteenth of March, 1873. The goods have remained in the warehouse (with the exception of a small portion delivered by mistake) until the present time, the duties thereon (with the exception just mentioned) being unpaid.

[1] [Reported by L. S. B. Sawyer, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

On the ninth of January, 1873, a petition in bankruptcy was filed by Clifford, and on the tenth of January he was duly adjudged a bankrupt. A petition was subsequently filed by the vendors of the goods, praying that their title thereto should be adjudged valid, and that all claims of the assignee should be declared invalid and void. At the time of the sale a memorandum was made, in which the goods sold, the price and the terms of payment were set forth. At the head of this paper the name of the vendor is printed, but the memorandum is not subscribed, nor is the name of the vendor anywhere written in the document. It is therefore clearly insufficient under the statute of frauds of this state, which requires the note or memorandum of the contract for the sale of goods, etc., to be subscribed by the party to be charged therewith. Davis v. Shields, 26 Wend. 350; James v. Patten, 2 Seld. [6 N. Y.] 13; Stevens v. Stewart, 3 Cal. 140.

It is contended, however, that the contract is valid under the statute, inasmuch as the buyer has "accepted and received the goods;" and the question presented is—Did the receipt by the buyer of the delivery orders, and their presentation by him to the warehouseman, constitute a receipt or acceptance of the goods sufficient to satisfy the statute? It is not questioned that in general, where goods at the time of the sale are in the possession of a third person as bailee of the vendor, the order of the latter to the bailee to deliver the goods to the vendee or to hold them subject to his order, with an assent on the part of the bailee so to hold them, will be sufficient to effect a change of possession, and to constitute a valid receipt and acceptance under the statute of frauds. The possession of the bailee, the agent of the vendor, is the possession of the latter, and where, by his direction, the bailee consents to become the bailee of the vendee, his possession is thereafter that of the vendee. But to effect a change of possession sufficient to constitute an actual receipt by the vendee, the bailee must accept the order, or recognize it, or consent to act in accordance with it; and until he has so agreed, he remains agent and bailee of the vendor. Benj. Sales, p. 128 et seq.

The evidence in this case does not clearly disclose what acts were done by the warehouseman when the delivery orders were presented. I will assume, however, that he accepted and recognized them, so far as he lawfully might, and that what was done by him would have been sufficient to effect a change of possession if his relation to the parties and the goods had been that of an ordinary bailee or agent of the vendor.

But such was not the case. The goods were in his custody as a custom-house officer in charge of a United States bonded warehouse. He did not hold the goods subject to the vendor's order, or to be delivered to him on demand, or to any person by his direction. The goods were in the possession of the government, which held them subject to the lien for duties, and they could be withdrawn only on payment of duties and by virtue of a permit obtained from the proper officers of the customs.

By the act of March 28, 1854, § 1 [10 Stat. 270], goods subject to duty may be stored in a private warehouse, to be designated on the warehouse entry at the time they are entered, "provided that such warehouse is used exclusively for the purpose of storing warehoused goods, and shall have been previously approved by the secretary of the treasury, and have been placed in charge of a proper officer of the customs, who, together with the owner or proprietor of the warehouse, shall have the joint custody of all the goods stored in such warehouse; and all the labor on the goods so stored must be performed by the owner or proprietor of the warehouse, under the supervision of the officer of the customs in charge of the same, and at the expense of the aforesaid owner and proprietor."

By the third section, the owner, occupant or lessee of the warehouse is required to give bonds to the United States, to be approved by the secretary of the treasury. By the third section of the act of August 6, 1846 [9 Stat. 54], warehouse goods fraudulently concealed or withdrawn from a public or private warehouse are declared to be forfeited, and the parties so concealing or withdrawing such goods are made liable to the penalties for smuggling; "and if any importer or proprietor of any warehoused goods, or any person in his employ, shall, by any contrivance, fraudulently open the warehouse, or shall gain access to the goods except in the presence of the proper officer of the customs acting in the execution of his duty, such importer or proprietor shall forfeit and pay for every such offense one thousand dollars."

In the revised customs regulations, framed by the treasury department in pursuance of law, the duties of the officer in charge of a warehouse are minutely prescribed. He is required to keep a correct account of receipts and deliveries of goods, with their marks, description of packages, date of delivery, date of receipt, of permit, etc., and daily returns to the collector and naval officer of the goods received and permitted for delivery, are required. Article 164. By article 165, "no goods are to be delivered unless on a permit signed by the collector and naval officer, and indorsed by the clerk in charge of the general storage books at the custom house, to show that he has entered it on his books, and the further indorsement of the cashier, as evidence that the custom house charges have been paid." By article 166 it is provided that "in the collector's office accounts are to be kept with the several public stores and bonded warehouses of all goods received into and delivered therefrom, to be a check on the account of the same. The account will be debited with the goods received, as shown by the daily return of the officer in charge, and be credited with the several permits as they issue from the collector's office. These permits will be treated as deliverances in this account, and the goods permitted marked off as delivered. When this is done, the clerk will indorse the permit and state above his indorsement the charges to be collected by the cashier. When inventories are taken at the several warehouses, their correctness is to be tested by these books and not the books of the warehouse; and when certificates are required, either for claims for damage or for any other purpose, that the property is in store, the verification must come from these books, and not the warehouse books, as any property remaining in store after presentation of permits, will not for such purpose be considered in the custody of the collector."

The importer is by the custom house regulations regarded not only as the person primarily and absolutely liable for the duties, but as alone authorized to obtain a permit for the withdrawal of the goods. He may, however, by making an assignment on the original warehouse entry, substitute in his stead his assignee or vendee. A note of this assignment is taken in the warehouse books at the custom house, and the permit may thereafter be obtained by the assignee.

From the foregoing laws and regulations, it is plain that goods subject to duty, stored in a warehouse, are de jure and de facto in the possession of the government, and that possession cannot be divested by an attachment at the suit of the creditor of the importer (Harris v. Dennie, 3 Pet. [28 U. S.] 303), nor by the officer in charge, nor by the importer, except in the manner provided for by law. The officer is in LO sense the bailee of the importer, and no attornment by him to a third person by order of the importer can have any effect to change the possession of the goods.

Admitting, then, that in ordinary cases an indorsed warehouse receipt, or a delivery order on a warehouseman, accepted by the latter, will operate to transfer the possession, or be good as a constructive or symbolical delivery of the goods, the delivery order in the case at bar can have no such effect; for the importer had no right to order the delivery, and the warehouseman had no right to make it. To hold otherwise would involve the absurdity of supposing that there may be a good constructive delivery by means of certain documents where an actual delivery is legally impossible. See Zachrisson v. Poppe, 3 Bosw. 180; 3 E. D. Smith, 538, 4 E. D. Smith, 504, 505; 1 Daly, 112.

I am, therefore, of opinion that in this case there has been no receipt or acceptance of the goods sufficient to satisfy the statute of frauds, and that, therefore, no valid contract of sale has been made by the parties. It may be observed, in addition, that in holding the delivery orders in this case ineffectual, as a constructive delivery of the goods, it is by no means certain that we are defeating the intention of the vendor. He may not unreasonably be supposed to have been aware that the buyer could not obtain actual possession of the goods until a permit should be obtained for them, and this could only be procured after he (the vendor) had executed an assignment of them on the original entry as required by the custom house regulations. This, if the credit had expired, or the buyer became insolvent, he might decline to do, and it is possible that in making his contract he intended to reserve to himself the control over the goods which their situation and his relation to them gave him, and to retain in this form a lien for the purchase money.

The delivery order recites that the duties had been paid, which was untrue. The vendor must have been aware that it was wholly ineffectual and inoperative to enable the vendee to obtain possession of the goods, and it was intended, no doubt, merely to furnish the vendee with evidence of his right to take possession to be available and operative only after the vendor had paid the duties and obtained and presented a permit.

It is strenuously urged by the counsel for the assignee that in this case there was an actual delivery of part of the goods, sufficient to take the case out of the statute. It appears that the officer in charge of the warehouse did deliver on the bankrupt's order four hundred mats, erroneously supposing that the duties had been paid, as the delivery order recites, and that a permit had been obtained. On discovering his mistake, he applied to Tong Wo & Co., representing that he would be obliged to pay the duties out of his own pocket. Tong Wo & Co. thereupon consented to pay the duties.

But it is clear that this delivery under a mistake and contrary to law cannot constitute a receipt or acceptance of a part of the goods under the statute. The officer acted in clear violation of his duty, misled very probably by the recital in the order that the duties had been paid. If the order was intentionally drawn in that form, or was knowingly presented by the bankrupt, it was a fraud upon the United States, and was a criminal offense within the third section of the act of 1846. The most lenient construction of the transaction is, that it was a mistake on the part of the bankrupt, but whether an innocent mistake or an intentional fraud, neither he nor his assignee can now be heard to affirm that the obtaining of a portion of the goods under such circumstances constituted a receipt and acceptance within the meaning of the statute.

CLIFFORD (ARNOLD v.). See Case No. 555.

Case No. 2,894.

CLIFFORD v. COLEMAN et al.

[13 Blatchf. 210.][1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Dec. 7, 1875.

AMENDMENT IN EQUITY.

A motion to amend a bill, by adding new parties defendant, after replication filed and the production of evidence, it appearing that the plaintiff was in a position to make the amendment before replication filed, refused.

[In equity. Bill by Neil Clifford against John Coleman and others.]

R. B. McMaster, for plaintiff.
George Gallagher, for defendants.

JOHNSON, Circuit Judge. An application to amend the bill after replication and the production of evidence ought to be accompanied by very satisfactory proof that the proposed amendment could not, with reasonable diligence, have been sooner introduced into the bill. The amendment asked for is to add as parties defendant George H. Newbold and Susanna Newbold individually and as executrix of John A. Newbold, deceased. Upon the case, as presented to me on this application, I am satisfied that the complainant was in a position to make the proposed amendment, certainly before the replication was filed, and that he ought not now to be allowed to change his case, according to the rules governing amendments, at such a stage of the cause. Motion denied.

CLIFFORD (MORRISON v.). See Case No. 9,846.

CLIFFORD (ROBINSON v.). See Case No. 11,948.

CLIFTON (JONES v.). See Case No. 7,457.

Case No. 2,895.

CLIFTON v. QUANTITY OF COTTON.
SHELDON v. The WATER WITCH.
BROWER et al. v. SAME.

[36 Hunt, Mer. Mag. (1856) 706.]

District Court, N. D. New York.

PAROL CONTRACT OF AFFREIGHTMENT — DUTY TO CARRY UNDER DECK—SUIT BY CONSIGNEES FOR DAMAGE TO CARGO.

[1. Where cotton is shipped as upon a general ship at a uniform rate of freight, it is the duty of the master, in the absence of any contract, consent, or proof of any established usage to the contrary, to carry such cargo under deck as would be required by a clean bill of lading.]

[2. Where the consignees or agents of the shippers made advances on such cotton, which was, on arrival, delivered to them, together with the freight bill, they may maintain a suit against the shipowners for damages to the cargo, although the bill of lading was not signed by the master.]

[In admiralty. Libels by John Clifton, claimant of the brig Water Witch, against a quantity of cotton, to recover freight, and by William H. Sheldon, and by John W. Brower and others, claimants of the cotton, against the brig for damages to the same. The suits were heard together.]

HALL, District Judge. In the suit first above entitled, the libelant seeks to recover the freight, claimed to be due to the Water Witch, for the transportation on board that vessel of the cotton libeled, from a port in Texas to New York City. This claim of the owner of the Water Witch is resisted on the ground that the cotton received on shipboard, by the fault of the master and owners of the vessel, a damage exceeding in amount the whole freight, which would otherwise have been due for such transportation. The other suits are prosecuted to recover such damages to the cotton, and the three suits were heard together.

I think the evidence sufficiently establishes the right of the libelants, Sheldon and Brower & Co., to maintain these suits in their own names, as the consignees and agents of the shippers, having a personal interest, by reason of advances made upon the cotton consigned to them respectively. It is true that the bills of lading prepared and presented by the shippers for the master's signature, and in which these libelants were named as consignees, were never signed by the master; but his refusal to sign these bills was based upon grounds entirely distinct from the objection that they did not name the proper consignees, and on the arrival of the vessel at New York they were by him recognized as the consignees of the cotton, by delivering it to them as such, and presenting to them his bill for the freight thereof.

The charter party proved in these cases was not made with the shippers or consignees, nor were they or either of them bound by its provisions, or even made acquainted with its contents. The cotton was shipped, as upon a general ship, at a uniform rate of freight, and there was no agreement or consent, on the part of the shippers, that part of the cargo should be carried on deck. It was, therefore, the duty of the master—as it is always the duty of a master, in the absence of any contract, consent, or established usage, allowing the cargo, or a part of it, to be carried on deck—to carry it under deck, as would be required under a clean bill of lading. Upon a parol contract of affreightment, where there are no express stipulations in regard to the extent of the shipowner's liability, the extent of that liability, as implied by law, is doubtless that which is ordinarily assumed under the customary or common bill of lading, and the goods must, as a general rule, be carried under deck. I agree that a well-known and well-established custom to carry on deck at the shipper's risk, in a particular trade and between particular ports, in the absence of any express contract or consent, on the part of the shipper or owner of the freight, avoids, in respect to that particular trade, the force of the general rule, which had its origin in the general usages of commerce; and this, whether the contract of affreightment in the particular case is by parol, or is contained in the ordinary form of what is called a "clean bill of lading;" but such particular custom must be clearly established, and well known. The established rule upon the subject is well laid down by Judge Ware, in the case of The Paragon [Case No. 10,708], with his accustomed precision and elegance of expression, as well as with the accustomed accuracy of that learned and able admiralty judge. See, also, The Rebecca [Id. 11,619].

[1] [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

But in this case there is no satisfactory proof of such a custom. On the contrary, the preponderance of the proof is against the existence of such custom. Besides, the freight agreed to be paid was a uniform rate, and the ordinary rate of under-deck freight; and if, as stated by Mr. Justice Story in Vernard v. Hudson [Id. 16,921], an agreement that goods shipped under a clean bill of lading are to be carried on deck may be deduced from the fact that the goods are, by the terms of such bill, to pay deck freight only, it would seem to follow that an agreement for the payment of under-deck freight, in the absence of any proof of an express contract to the contrary, ought to be held to establish conclusively the obligation of the master to carry the goods under deck.

Upon the whole evidence, then, I shall hold that the liabilities of the Water Witch are the same as though the cotton had been shipped under a clean bill of lading, (except that there is no admission that the cotton was shipped in good order,) and had, under such a bill of lading, been consigned to the libelants in the suits for damages.

In regard to the condition of the cotton when it was shipped, and the great question in regard to the damage received on shipboard, and for which the vessel is liable, there is a most decided conflict of testimony,—equaling, in that respect, the conflict of testimony in a collision case between two vessels, each with a numerous crew, who witnessed the collision from entirely different points of view, and severally testify under the influence of the natural and strong prejudice always felt in favor of "vessel and owners." Nevertheless, I cannot doubt that the very bad condition of the cotton at the time of its delivery in New York resulted, in part at least, from sea-damage, for which the vessel is liable. It is true that it was probably received in bad condition, from what is called "country damage," and certainly the vessel is not liable for the whole damage received from the time it was first packed in bales to its arrival in New York; but I see no satisfactory mode of determining the amount of sea-damage, (as distinguished from "country damage," or damage received before shipment,) for which the Water Witch is liable, except by a reference, affording all parties full opportunity to produce all the evidence which can be adduced upon this question.

There must, therefore, be an order of reference in the three suits to ascertain: 1. The amount of freight upon the cotton delivered to Brower & Co. and Sheldon, respectively, allowing only at the "on-deck" rate for so much of the cotton as was actually carried on deck. Vernard v. Hudson [supra]. 2. The amount of sea-damage upon each lot of such cotton, for which the brig is responsible. And on the coming in and confirmation of such report a final decree should be entered, according to the rights of the parties, as determined by such report.

[NOTE. On the coming in of the report the district court made a final decree (case unreported) dismissing the libel of Clifton, but in favor of the libelants Brower and others, and Sheldon, and from this decree Clifton appealed to the circuit court, where the decree was reversed as to him, but affirmed as to the libelants in the other suits. Brower v. The Water Witch, Case No. 1,971.

[Both Clifton and Sheldon appealed to the supreme court. The appeal of Sheldon was dismissed for want of jurisdiction, and, on the hearing on Clifton's appeal, the decree of the circuit court was affirmed. See note at end of Brower v. The Water Witch, supra.]

CLIFTON v. QUANTITY OF COTTON. See Case No. 1,971.

CLINCH (MERRIAM v.). See Case No. 9,460.

CLINCH (ROPES v.). See Case No. 12,041.

Case No. 2,896.

In re CLINE.

[1 Ben. 338.] [1]

District Court, S. D. New York. Aug., 1867.

ENLISTMENT OF MINOR—HIS OATH AS TO HIS AGE CONCLUSIVE—POWER OF ARMY OFFICER TO ADMINISTER THE OATH — BURDEN OF PROOF—PRESUMPTION.

1. Under the act of congress of February 13th, 1862 [12 Stat. 339], the oath of a military recruit, in his enlistment papers, as to his age, is conclusive upon himself and upon this court, and, where he has sworn that he was not a minor, evidence to show that he was such is not admissible.

[Followed in Re Riley, Case No. 11,834. Cited in Re Davison, 4 Fed. 509.]

2. Where the oath is taken before a military officer, the presumption is that the services of a civil magistrate could not be obtained, as required by the act of June 12, 1858, § 3 [11 Stat. 336], and the burden of proof is on the recruit to show that such services could be obtained.

[1] [Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

At law. This was a habeas corpus issued on the petition of John Edward Cline, a private soldier in the army of the United States, held therein by virtue of his enlistment. The petition set forth that, at the time of his enlistment, Cline was a minor, and enlisted without the consent of his parents. The return to the writ, made by Brevet Major-General Daniel Butterfield, general superintendent of the recruiting service, set forth, that Cline was regularly enlisted into the service of the United States, according to the laws thereof governing the enlistment of recruits, by his signing the proper statement or declaration required for recruits to take; that the oath of enlistment was regularly administered by an officer of the army authorized to administer oaths; and that the recruit was regularly examined by the surgeon appointed for that purpose. A certified copy of the original enlistment paper was annexed to the return, and such original was submitted to the court with the return. This paper consisted of four documents: 1. The statement or declaration required to be made by recruits. 2. The certificate of the examining surgeon. 3. The certificate of the recruiting officer, J. Christopher, Capt. 25th U. S. Infantry, and Brevet Major U. S. A. 4. An affidavit signed by Cline, and certified to have been sworn and subscribed to at Chicago, Illinois, May 20th, 1867, before Major Christopher, and reading as follows: "Oath of Recruit—I, John E. Cline, desiring to enlist in the army of the United States for the term of three years, do solemnly swear that I am twenty-two years and —— months of age; that I have neither wife nor child; that I have never been discharged from the United States service on account of disability or by sentence of a court-martial, or by order before the expiration of the term of enlistment; and I know of no impediment to my serving honestly and faithfully as a soldier for three years." It was claimed, on the part of Cline, that, being enlisted while a minor, without the consent of his parents, his enlistment was unlawful, and that he was entitled to be discharged. Testimony satisfactorily establishing the facts that he was a minor and enlisted without the consent of his parents was received, by the court provisionally, on the hearing of the writ, subject to a decision by the court as to the admissibility of such testimony.

Dudley Field and Thos. G. Shearman, for petitioner.

Lieut. A. B. Gardner, 9th Infantry, for respondent.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. It is not contended that, if the soldier was twenty-one years of age when he was enlisted, his enlistment was in any manner illegal, but his discharge is sought solely on the ground that he was in fact under twenty-one years of age, and was enlisted without the consent of his parents.

The act of February 13, 1862 (12 Stat. 339, § 2), provides, that "the oath of enlistment taken by the recruit shall be conclusive as to his age." It is as conclusive and binding upon this court as it is upon the recruit or upon the United States. The intent of congress manifestly was, that no evidence should be received to contradict a statement as to the age of the recruit, contained in the oath taken by him on his enlistment. This view of the act of 1862 was taken by Judge Daly, in the case of George Reilly, in the court of common pleas, in the city of New York, in March, 1867, and also by my predecessor, Judge Betts, in January, 1867, in the cases of Michael J. Conley and John Jump. I am entirely satisfied that the view is a sound one. In the present case Cline swore, in his oath of enlistment, that he was then twenty-two years of age. That oath is conclusive that he was not then a minor, and no evidence is admissible to show that he was.

An objection is taken to the validity of the enlistment of Cline, on the ground that the act of June 12, 1858, section three, does not authorize an officer of the army to administer the oath of enlistment to a recruit unless the services of a civil magistrate authorized to administer the same cannot be obtained; that the act of August 3, 1831, section eleven, does not authorize an officer of the army to administer an oath of allegiance, unless it appears that he could not obtain the attendance of a civil officer authorized by law to administer oaths; and that the return should show that the attendance of such civil officer could not be obtained. It is a sufficient answer to this objection to say, that the presumption is in favor of the regularity of the proceeding, when it appears that the oath was administered by the military officer, and that, in such case, the intendment is, that the services of a civil magistrate could not be obtained, and the burden is upon the recruit to show that such services could be obtained, and not upon the United States to show that they could not be obtained. In this case, nothing appears on the subject except what is shown on the face of the enlistment papers. The enlistment of Cline was, in all respects, regular, and he must be remanded to service under his proper military officer.

Case No. 2,897.

CLINE v. HULERY

[Cited in Fitch v. Cornell, Case No. 4,834. Nowhere reported; opinion not now accessible.]

CLINTON (GROVER & BAKER SEWING MACH. CO v.). See Case No. 5,845.

Case No. 2,898.

CLINTON v. The HANNAH, ETC.

[Bee, 419.][1]

Admiralty Court of Pennsylvania. 1781.

ADMIRALTY JURISDICTION—SHIPWRIGHT'S WAGES.

A shipwright cannot sue in the admiralty for his contract wages for building a ship or vessel designed for navigation on the high seas.

[Cited in Shrewsbury v. The Two Friends, Case No. 12,819; Pritchard v. The Lady Horatia, Id. 11,438; Levering v. Bank of Columbia, Id. 8,287; Ramsay v. Allegre, 12 Wheat. (25 U. S.) 618, 619; The Stephen Allen, Case No. 13,361; Bains v. The James and Catherine, Id. 756; The Draco, Id. 4,057; U. S. v. New Bedford Bridge, Id. 15,867; Waring v. Clarke, 5 How. (46 U. S.) 480; Jackson v. The Magnolia, 20 How. (61 U. S.) 331; People's Ferry Co. v. Beers, Id. 402; Cunningham v. Hall, Case No. 3,481. Distinguished in Zane v. The President, Id. 18,201. Disapproved in The Richard Busteed, Id. 11,764.]

[This was a suit by Clinton against the brig Hannah, and the ship General Knox.]

